“Then do it,” she insisted. “They don't know about your powers, they could never expect it. Kill the bastards.” He hesitated. “Do it, Bran. Beat them.”

“And what happens if I do?” he said slowly. “We're still chained, Meera. We still can't escape.”

“We’ll find a way, but you've got to stop them from hurting anyone el–”

“But it won't stop them. How many fully-grown, armed men can birds and rats defeat?” Bran argued. “Maybe I could take down ten. Maybe even twenty. But one hundred? They won't fall that quickly. And all it will take is one of them to come down here with a sword and then we're dead. We're at their mercy.” A shiver ran down his spine, his voice cracked. “One man with a sword could kill us both, and they’re all experienced killers.”

Maybe if it was just Bran’s life he would have taken the risk, but Meera’s too? No, he wouldn't. He couldn't. I can't let Meera get hurt.

Meera looked stunned. “Bran, we… we don’t have any other choice.”

“We do,” he whispered. “If Ramsay Snow wanted us dead, he would have killed us. He’s not going to.” Not until he gets his use out of me, whatever that is. I must figure it out. “Our plan hasn’t changed.”

He tried to imagine what his father would do in this situation. Father would do what he had to do, no matter how scared it made him. I am a Stark, I must return to Winterfell. “He’s going to hold us prisoner. We’re going to let him,” said Bran. “We’re going to let him take us to Winterfell. We’re going to let him bring me close to Roose Bolton. And then I’m going to end this war once for all.
Roose Bolton is the one who must die, not Ramsay.”

“Bran…”

“It will work,” Bran insisted. “I’ve done it twice now. First on that wildling, then on the bastard’s soldier. I steal their skin, and their minds break. They can’t handle it, they snap, and they die bleeding from the eyes. There’s no defence against that. Ramsay caught me off-guard before, but if I had another chance I could do it. I can do it.”

His insistence sounded so empty in the dark prison cell. Meera stared at him, agape.

“You were dead to the world for over a day after the battle in the forest,” Meera warned. “You do it, and you collapse too. You fall unconscious and you drop into… whatever that place is where you go.”

“So I only have one shot,” Bran said, suppressing the gulp. “But I’ll collapse for a while, Roose Bolton will collapse for good. As soon as Lord Bolton dies it’s over. I can save my sister, I can the end the war. I can do this, Meera.”

“And in the meantime?” She demanded. “What are we supposed to do until then?”

“We just wait. Let them think that I’m helpless,” Bran whispered. “That’s the plan, Meera. We wait and we get ready.”

They argued for a while. Meera tried to convince him otherwise. She talked a lot about reinforcements that could be coming, ways to set traps and ambushes for the men. Ways to get them out of their prison.

By noon, she was interrupted by the sounds of boots coming down the stairs. A foul-faced man with a hunched back came to finally feed them – bringing cold chicken stew and water. Bran didn’t like the way the man leered at Meera, but Bran was thirsty enough he swallowed the water down so fast he was nearly sick.

The man left the prison door open when he left. There was no point to close it, considering the thick chains around their legs. Meera didn’t say a word, but he heard her counting the footsteps of the man walking up the stairs, to try and plan out an escape.

Through the skin of rats on the main floor, Bran heard grumbling. The men were complaining about how Ramsay took the women with him. A lot of the men seemed to establishing their camp tightly.

He heard the crooked man calling the holdfast as Thistle Hall. “Thistle Hall. I think this place must have belonged to House Norrey, they have green thistles on their coat of arms,” Meera said, after Bran told her. “So we must be close to the Gift.”

“House Norrey,” Bran repeated. “Why doesn’t anyone know we’re here? House Norrey is a friend to Winterfell.”

“Maybe this holdfast is abandoned. Or maybe none of the Norreys survived.”

He didn’t reply. In the distance, Bran felt Summer cry mournfully. The direwolf was left limping, struggling to survive in the cold. The thought made Bran’s heart ache. Be safe, boy. Just be safe.

Every hour felt torturous. The next day was the same. They slept on the floor. The same crooked man coming to feed them, the same tense, constant and quiet fear. Meera tried asking for a bucket for their waste, but the man just jeered. Bran needed the toilet first, and there was choice but soil himself. His eyes stung and he finally broke down into sobs, but there was no judgement from Meera. Only fear.

In their cell, Hother Umber’s corpse turned pale and bloated, and started to stink. Bran watched the old man’s flesh slowly rot, the foul odour filling the air.

This is what Ramsay Snow wants, Bran thought weakly. He wants to torture us. To leave us trapped in a cell like this. He wants us to suffer, he wants us to break down. For no real reason other than that being what Ramsay Snow likes.

Bran remembered what it felt like to touch the mind of a person who lived solely for hate.

He spent most of his time in different skins, looking through his third eye. Bran escaped his body by slipping into the bodies of animals, as far away as his powers could reach.

He felt sorry for Meera, though. She couldn’t escape it.

The days were agonising. And then it was a week, and the weeks felt so, so much worse.

One night, through Summer’s skin, Bran saw a huge shadow fall over the earth, heard a sound like a hurricane fill the air. The trees shook as something huge passed over the wolf, heading into the mountains. The great wolf was left hiding in its den, trembling in fear.

Bran couldn’t even process what it was, it had been too immense. Meera had been confused too when she told him. She sudden maybe it had been a sudden squall, but it wasn’t. There are monsters in this realm. He thought back to the Stranger he had seen in his dream. Summer would have fled the woods, but the wolf was left hiding and starving in his lair. With Summer’s injury, he couldn’t even hunt properly, he had to scavenge for meals.

Shortly afterwards, in Thistle Hall, Bran saw some huddled men talking very nervously. The gates were sealed, and no one was even allowed outside. They didn’t even allow open fires in the courtyard, lest the smoke give away the garrison.

In his cell, the stink turned so hideous that even the man with crooked back could barely stand it. Meera never stopped scratching and struggling to break the iron manacles.

I am Brandon Stark of Winterfell. I am Brandon Stark of Winterfell.

He felt himself struggling just to stay sane. Frequently, the men in the keep would comment on the erratic behaviour of the rats and birds around them.

One night, Bran collapsed out of pure exhaustion. Flies and bugs were buzzing around him. He opened his eyes, and he was standing in the middle of the courtyard of Winterfell itself. He could see the grounds where he and Arya used to play, and all the towers and turrets that he used to climb...

“I am sorry, Bran,” a voice cawed from atop the stables. Bran saw a flutter of black wings. A raven. A raven with three dark eyes.

“You,” Bran gasped. This is a dream. His legs wobbled. “You could help us.”

The raven didn’t reply.

“You could help us!” he shouted. “Bring help, bring anyone. Do something!”
The bird’s voice was soft. “I cannot.”

“You must! They’re going to kill us! Or they’re going to keep us here until we break! You must help!”

“I did try to help, Bran,” the three-eyed crow said sadly. “I tried to bring you out of this realm. I wanted you to escape before this war sucked you in as well. If only you had crossed the Wall, things could have been different.”

“I couldn’t, I couldn’t cross—” he stammered. I chose not to cross the Wall. “Does Jojen still live? What about Hodor?”

The crow did not reply. “Why won’t you tell me?” Bran demanded.

“Because such attachments are dangerous. There is no answer I can give that won’t cause one hurt or another.”

He’s evading the question. The three-eyed crow always evades the question. “Does anyone know where we are? Is anyone coming for us?”

“This is not your war, Bran.”

“This is my war! I’m trapped here, I’m part of it!”

“You are meant for greater things.”

He shook his head. “What did you want from me? No more half-answers, no more vague statements. What do you want from me?”

“I give vague statements because you would not thank me for details,” the bird replied.

“Answer me!” Bran screamed. His legs collapsed. There were tears in his eyes. “You say that I was meant to fly, that you could help…” Bran gulped. “You said that winter is coming. And I saw something. In my dreams. It was cold, it was death, it was…”

“A white walker. An Other.” The voice turned softer. “Yes, they are the reason I need you. They are the… well, let us call them the enemy. The true enemy.”

The stranger of black and white. The very thought still made him shudder. “And you want me to defeat them?” Bran demanded. “What was I supposed to do?”

No reply.

“Answer me!” Bran screamed. “Answer me, or I’ll never listen to you ever again. I swear it by the Old Gods and the New.”

Wings fluttered, the beak twitched. There was a soft mutter of breath. A sigh, he realised. “No. You were not to defeat them. I wanted to keep you safe, Bran. I summoned you north to try and protect you from them.”

“Why?”

“Because they cannot be defeated,” the three-eyed crow admitted.

There was a long pause. Bran just stared incredulously.
“The Others cannot be defeated any more than the cycle of the world can be changed. To fight them is to fight winter itself,” the crow said. “They can only be endured.”

“I… I don’t understand.”

“You are the next greenseer, Bran. You are part of a legacy that goes beyond you, in ways you cannot possibly know. When the Long Night comes, the living will turn cold and the forests will perish, but afterwards there must be a greenseer to restore balance. To bring back the trees. It was your place to save the world, but only after the Others have destroy it. That was why I tried to keep you safe.” The birds ruffled its wings. “Yours is the place somewhere between ice and fire; to represent the living between two elements.”

Bran shook his head trying to understand. “But… but my family. My friends.”

“There must be sacrifices, Bran.”

Realisation struck. The greenseer manipulated Jojen to come to Winterfell, so that the crannogmen would take him north. “You mean… when you were calling me north of the Wall, you wanted me to abandon them all to die!”

“Death will be a mercy compared to what comes next,” the bird said darkly. “This is not a safe place for you. For anyone.”

All of the stories of the Long Night, the white walkers and the monsters came rushing back to Bran. Old Nan’s tales. “Then the last hero,” Bran muttered, “and the Battle for the Dawn, when the white walkers were defeated…”

“They are children’s tales, Bran. Exaggerations of a history long past but coming again. The Others were not defeated; the Long Night ended only because the Others chose to retreat.”

Bran stared in shock. There was a hollow, humourless and croaky laugh from the three-eyed crow. “Yes,” the bird agreed. “I do not easily accept it either. I try to fight against it, I try to give men a chance to resist. For what little it is worth, I oppose them however I can. But in my bones, I know that it is useless.”

His head was spinning. “In the stories,” Bran said with a gulp, “the white walkers were beaten by the children of the forest.”

“The children of the forest know the futility of opposing them better than most; this song has been written for a long time.” The bird’s beak shook. “No, the children cannot stop them. The children created the Others, once upon a time.”

“What? They created them…!”

“I suppose summoned is a better term,” the crow explained, “not created. They accessed a force elemental and eternal, and the children of the forest summoned it into the bodies of men. Ice given flesh, how the Others as we know them came to be. That was the beginning of the white walkers – created during the time of the First Men. Perhaps the children responsible intended the Others to win the war for them, but I think it more likely that it was an act of final spite against all men.” The bird sighed. “A curse such that men would suffer eternally the same torture that they inflicted on the children.”

He didn’t know how to reply. The bird hopped down from its perch. “Like I said, Bran, this war is greater than you know. You are not prepared.”
“How am I supposed to prepare? I’m captive, I’m in a prison surrounded by killers. Ramsay Snow,” Bran said with a gulp. “Can you help stop him?”

The three-eyed crow scoffed. “‘Ramsay Snow’ is meaningless. Just another mad man who wants to rape the world, I have faced his like many times. He is nothing to be concerned about.”

“He is a concern!” The thought of Hornwood, Winterfell and Last Hearth all flickered before his mind. “He holds me prisoner! He tortures me! He has Meera too, he…!” Bran hesitated. “I felt his mind. It was full of hate. It wasn’t normal, it wasn’t…”

“Hm. A legacy of his ancestry, perhaps?” the three-eyed crow mused. “I know of the bloodline, he does claim distant descent from the Others themselves.”

“What?”

“During the Long Night, and afterwards during the Cold Spring, while the Others ruled as overlords there were many twisted offspring formed between unions between them. Half Other, half human. Some came from sacrifices given, or from captives, and other men and women would even lie with them willingly for promises of power,” the bird explained. “Over the thousands of years the bloodlines mostly either went extinct or were exterminated, but some traits still emerge. Did you look at his eyes, Bran? You can see the Other’s influence in his eyes.”

Those pale, blue eyes. “Ramsay Snow is a white walker?”

“No. Gods no. He is human, but he has something of their influence in his blood. Perhaps he is not even aware of it, but you can see the traits. It breeds men and women without empathy, to whom cruelty is in their nature, and everyone around them is but cattle. House Bolton earns its reputation – it is not a power that should be underestimated.”

Bran stared. He remembered that moment; he had tried to jump into Ramsay’s skin and the man had flinched back. The bastard had reacted instinctively. “Is he a skinchanger?”

The bird paused. “No,” the three-eyed crow said finally. “I do not believe he has had any training as a skinchanger. But he does have a similar sort of power, one which I do not think he is even aware of.”

Bran needed to take a deep breath. All around him, Winterfell was shaking. “Could I kill him?” Bran demanded. “Or his father? Could I take his body and kill him?”

The bird stopped. There was a silence longer than the previous ones. “You have power over nature itself,” the crow said distastefully. “It is a gift you do not know the value of, and you are wasting it. Like a philistine who has been given a precious gem, yet you use it to crack stones.”

“Don’t you understand, Bran?” the three-eyed crow insisted. “As foul as this bastard is, he is but a pale imitation of the Others. Do not waste your time with this war in the north; there is a greater duty that is needed of you.”

“I can’t. I’m trapped,” he panted. “I’m in a cell.”

“No,” the crow said sadly. “You are not trapped. You were never trapped, no more than you were crippled. You must come to me, Bran. I can show you how to use your powers properly.”

“I can’t, I–”
“If your body can’t move, leave it behind. It is not needed, you know it’s not.” The voice turned harsh, strict. “Leave your body, and move into your wolf. Take your wolf to a heart tree. And then leave your wolf, and enter the tree. Come to me directly, through the weirwood roots. I will be there to greet you.”

He froze. The air in the courtyard was cold. “But… but…” he stammered softly. “If I leave my body behind then how do I get back?”

“You do not, Bran.”

He wanted me to abandon everything, he realised with a gasp. The thought of Meera in that cell flickered before his eyes.

“I summoned you. I do not need your physical form,” the three-eyed crow said. “You have a way to escape. You must leave it all behind you.”

There was a long moment of a silence. Bran stared, his mind running through all of the vague comments and promises the crow had ever given him. For so long, Bran had believed that the three-eyed crow was the only way he would ever walk again. ‘You will fly’, the crow had said…

“You monster.” The words from Bran’s throat were like a wolf’s growl. They were so vicious the anger surprised even him.

“Bran…”

“You lied to me! You deluded me! You said you would make me whole! That you would teach me to fly!” There were no tears, but his eyes burned. “You promised me my legs, and you knew that I would go anywhere to not be a cripple! And you never told me what you really needed because you knew I wouldn’t want to.”

“Sacrifice is not an easy duty to ‘want’, Bran.”

“You just want to use me!” he screamed. “Just like Ramsay, just like all the others, I’m just another piece to you!”

“I want you to save the world!” The crow’s voice turned into thunder. The whole castle trembled. Bran saw towers collapsing into rubble. “This cannot be neglected. You have a choice, Bran. A choice between damning the earth or saving it. You can either remain trapped or fly free.”

The dream was collapsing around him. He saw Winterfell falling under a storm. “And what about my friends? What about my family?”

“That is the choice. That has always been the choice.”

The earth collapsed. Bran felt darkness swallow him.

Suddenly he was back in the cell. His whole body lurched, wheezing and cough. He could barely breathe, arms flailing. The stink, the fear, the pain… he felt it all again.

“Bran… Bran…” Meera’s voice. “It’s alright Bran… It’s alright…”

He felt her hand holding his. She had to stretch herself out across the floor to reach him despite the manacles, but he could feel her hand. She had slender fingers, but strong. She didn’t stop muttering in his ear, trying to calm him.
Even in the horrible, disgusting prison, she was the only thing holding him together. And yet there was a pain in her eyes like she might break too.

The night was quiet. The three-eyed crow’s words echoed in his head. I could do it. I could move myself into Summer. I could leave everything behind. I don’t have to be the crippled little boy anymore.

A choice between saving the world or damning it, the crow had said. I could close my eyes, leave my body and not come back to it.

Then he looked at Meera, frail, trembling and holding his hand. She was trying to reassure him even though she needed more help than anyone. Bran looked at Meera and made his decision in an instant.

I choose her. I won’t leave her behind.

The days and nights passed slowly. Every day was the same, trapped in that cell.

On the second week, Bran threatened to bite his own tongue, or strangle himself, or anything, unless they were given buckets, linens, and basic hygiene. Their prison was left so foul by then that not even the guards could walk in without cringing, but the crooked man only smacked him over the head in reply. Still, Bran made the same threat the next three days, and by the fourth the boy must have looked so desperate that they had to concede.

They can’t let me die. That’s not much power, but it’s some.

The bastard’s men grumbled and moaned as they wiped the cell with a dirty mop. Meera and Bran would pretend to be unconscious so they wouldn’t beat them. One of them gave Bran and Meera a flea-infested horsehair shirt so long that it could be used as a dress, while Bran’s old, stained, wool clothes were discarded into the latrine. By the time they finally moved Hother Umber’s corpse, the body didn’t even look recognisable. Bran had spent over a fortnight watching it decay, barely six feet away from him.

In return for a bucket, regular waste disposal and occasional clean linens, Bran promised not to try and kill himself. When the guards unfastened his manacles to change his clothes, they didn’t bother putting the chains back on. After all, the men laughed, he was a cripple – it wasn’t like he could run.

The cell door was open and he was unchained, but he couldn’t even leave. Instead, he dragged himself over by Meera to sit by her.

Every chance they had, they would talk. The conversations were only things keeping them sane. Meera would tell him about life in the Neck, about Greywater Watch, about her father, and all about the ways that crannogmen would hunt. And Bran would tell her about skinchanging, and what felt like to take another skin. Together, they started to plan.

There were ninety-two men garrisoned in Thistle Hall. Bran counted them one by one through the eyes of animals. He even tried to learn their names; like Luton, Yellow Dick, Grunt, and, their leader, Skinner.

Then, one of the Bastard’s Boys was kicked in the head while tending to a horse, and after that there were ninety-one.

A few days later, another man fell off the palisades while patrolling, and then there were only ninety.
The very next day, a man was ambushed by a pack of wolves while foraging in the forest, and then there were eighty-nine. That one was perhaps a mistake, because afterwards the garrison became far more paranoid.

Then, Bran had to get more creative. He took the body of the biggest rat he could find, and he directed it towards Yellow Dick while he slept. The rodent bit Yellow Dick’s toe clean off, and then mauled the man’s foot with sharp, gnarly teeth. The rat died quick for its efforts, but a week later Yellow Dick lost his foot from the infection.

Bran could feel the keep become more and more tense. The men never knew what was happening, but the mood in Thistle Hall was changing. They were a small force of men garrisoned in an old keep in an isolated forest. Confined. Trapped.

“Be subtle,” Meera insisted. “Don’t push too hard lest we lose our advantage. We want them to be just the right amount of scared.”

Bran stalked and hunted them one by one. He thought of Last Hearth, and he felt nothing when he killed them. He felt more sympathy towards the animals than he did towards them.

The weeks passed slowly. It turned into months.

Gradually, Bran felt Summer begin to heal and head west towards him. After weeks of scavenging and starving, the direwolf grew strong enough to move. One night, Bran heard Summer’s howl from the forests right outside, and the sound gave him strength.

The wolf howl also made the Bolton men even more scared. The very next day, a horse went mad in the stables, and trampling three men and killing one. The horse was so crazed it had to be killed.

They served horse meat the next morning.

Afterwards, at Meera’s suggestion, Bran started to target their leaders more selectively, the men who were keeping control. Perhaps if the competent leaders were killed, Meera said, someone incompetent would take over. Learn more about them, kill the right ones and you could herd a force of men into poor leadership and reckless actions.

Bran stalked the men through birds across the keep; watching, listening, waiting.

They are all scared. Even killers and monsters could get scared. One time, Bran snuck a rat close enough that he could overhear frenzied whispers between Skinner and two others. The rat’s ears couldn’t make out sentences, but he caught some words – he heard ‘wildlings’, ‘dragon’ and ‘Jon Snow’.

Bran’s heart pounded as he made out his brother’s name.

As the weeks passed, Bran began to understand why the men were remaining so confined and holed up in Thistle Hall. “They’re hiding,” he said. “They’re not hiding from Umber or even Bolton men, they’re hiding from wildlings.”

“So it’s true,” Meera whispered. “Wildlings across the Wall. The Bolton Bastard must have picked the most backwater and isolated holdfast he could find so that nobody will find you, or even know where to look. That means he’s scared, Bran.”

Bran nodded. The thought that Ramsay Snow might fear something was not as comforting as it might have been, however. He remembered the black shadow that passed over Summer.
Over the next few weeks he caught many more murmurs mentioning “dragon”, but the men seemed nervous to say the words out-loud. The word only made Bran more confused. Wildlings and dragons.

What is Ramsay planning? Why not take me to Winterfell already, if there are wildlings about?

For so long, absolutely nothing happened. The mood in the garrison became so tense that fights broke out in the courtyard. The men forbade hunting parties, or even anyone leaving the gate.

The number of Bastard’s Boys in the garrison fell below eighty.

Bran heard men muttering, saying that Thistle Hall was haunted. And they are right – it is.

The boy spent so long in that cell that he started to forget what it was like outside. There were no rowdy celebrations in Thistle Hall anymore, the mood was too grim and silent. At night, the only sound in the cell was Meera, scraping constantly against her manacles using chips of stone. She had been scraping for weeks, months.

It was a moonless night when Bran’s birds finally sensed movement in the forest. He felt Summer stir, prowling in the dark. He smelt horses on the dirt road – horses with riders, along with hounds barking. A party of half a dozen hooded figures riding straight for Thistle Hall.

The men reached the keep and pounded four times against the wooden gates. There were no horns, very little noise at all. From the courtyard, the men seemed to tense, but once they heard the four knocks the mood changed.

It took three men to move the wooden logs barricaded behind the gate. The only sound in the forest were bats and birds. As soon as Bran had found a chance, he jumped from a crow into the body of one of the hunting hounds. The dog tried to howl in pain as he forced his way into his skin, but Bran took control so quickly the animal could only whine.

Bran could feel the colour around the dog’s neck. The dogs were yelping, but the man holding the leash was ruthless with the lash. The door crept open slowly. “Quickly, m’lord,” a man hissed. “Come inside. This forest is a cursed place.”

One of the hooded figures chuckled snidely. “Cursed? You think there’s anything in these trees more dangerous than me, Bones?”

“Of course not, m’lord.”

The man lowered his hood. Bran recognised that smirk instantly. Through a dog’s senses, Ramsay Snow stunk of old and dried meat, covered in an old dark wool cloak. He’s returned, Bran thought. Finally. How many months has it been?

The riders came inside. Every man stationed in the keep gathered around, all of them worn and tense and clutching torches. “What news, m’lord?” a man asked with a gulp. Luton. “Is it time?”

“Aye, it’s time,” Ramsay laughed. “The trap is readied and it’s time for the bait. I trust the little prince has been kept well?”

“Be sure of it. Time is short and I cannot linger, but after this is done I intend to give Brandon Stark the treatment he deserves.” He glanced around the men, and snapped, “What are you standing around for, fools? Tend to the horses. Ben Bones, see to my girls.”

The aging man, Ben Bones, bowed quickly and yanked the hounds. The dog Bran possessed tried to squirm, to stay in earshot of where Ramsay was huddled with his men.

“–sure he’s ready to leave,” Ramsay was ordering. “This ends at Winterfell, and the little prince has his role.”

“How many?” One of the men said nervously. “I hear there’s legions of the savages.”

“My father prepares for thirty thousand, but there’s less,” Ramsay said with a chuckle. There was a cruel edge to his voice. “Deluded savages without a clue, and fools that chose their side over my father’s. We give them time to muster, and we destroy them all at once. The Bastard King wants a battle, and we will oblige.”

There was hesitation among the garrison, but Ramsay just laughed, clear and mocking. “What of the Dreadfort?” Yellow Dick asked. “I heard that the Dreadfort has fallen.”

“No, the Dreadfort still stands. It’ll likely last for another few weeks now, until their armies reach it, but my lord father has already resigned himself to its destruction,” Ramsay snorted. “It will be torched in dragonfire, no doubt, and I must arrive south before it does.”

The words caused the crowd to ripple. “The dragon,” a man said. “So it’s true.”

“How can we face that?” another gulped. “If it’s truly so large…”

Ramsay sneered. “You scared, Jarl?”

“No, m’lo–”

“I got no need for scared men in my ranks,” Ramsay snarled. “I need hounds. Men willing to tear open a few throats. If that thing between your legs is so small, then I’ll cut it off and turn it into the girl you act like.”

The man called Jarl quivered and retreated quickly. The Bastard of Bolton glared around them, those sharp blue eyes alert for any sign of weakness. “The dragon can be taken care of,” Ramsay hissed. “Do not concern your fool heads over that.”

Luton looked around the men, twitchy. “And the army?”

Bran caught Ramsay’s smirk in the torchlight. “The army isn’t a problem either,” he chuckled. “My lord father has been arranging that. Not all of the Bastard King’s ‘allies’ are as loyal as they might pretend.”

Ramsay stepped back, motioning to the garrison. All eyes were on him. “Listen up, boys! This will not be a battle, it will be a massacre!” he shouted. “We will let the Bastard King gather up his army, right outside Winterfell gates, but the battle will be won by daggers, not by lances, swords or shields. We will kill ‘King’ Jon Snow right in the middle of his camp!”

King Jon Snow?! Bran was so shocked that the dog whined, but Ramsay only laughed louder. “Did you know that the dragon goes berserk whenever the Bastard King is threatened?” Ramsay continued. “We kill the king, and then the dragon kills all of the wildlings for us! They have already lost, but none of them have even realise it yet.”

The Bastard’s Boys were clapping, stomping their feet. The hound struggled to hear the words over...

“My lord father has his task, and I have mine,” Ramsay scoffed. “Yours is to be sure that the little prince is in place for when—”

That was all Bran managed to hear, as the kennelmaster yanked the dogs away. Bran tried desperately to overhear what Ramsay was saying, but the man huddled at the other end of the courtyard with his men. Ramsay gave instructions in a sharp, firm voice and forced each man to repeat it.

The whole keep was stirring, for the first time in months. Bran tried to listen in through the bodies of crows on the wall, but birds didn’t have the right ears to make out human words.

The night felt dark, dangerous. Dogs were barking and boots stomping. Bran watched with bated breath, but Ramsay didn’t even enter the keep. The Bastard of Bolton stayed only long enough for his horses to rest and to pass instructions to his men, before ordering that the riders would be on their way before daylight. Ramsay was impatient to set off again, but there were no ravens in Thistle Hall so he had to stop to deliver instructions again.

It was the hour of the nightingale when the gate opened for the second time in one night, and Ramsay’s horses set off down the dirt path at a quick gallop. Bran could feel Summer in the trees, stalking the road from the foliage. He wanted to attack Ramsay, to stop him leaving, but there were ten other riders with him. Summer wouldn’t be able to fight ten armed, mounted men, not even with Bran’s help, and Bran couldn’t risk his wolf’s life.

They closed the gates behind him. Bran heard Skinner shouting for men to ready supplies and horses for a quick march. The lull that had settled over Thistle Hall was shaken off quickly. Whatever Ramsay ordered them to do, it seemed they were to abandon Thistle Hall and follow quickly.

With a gasp, Bran returned to his body. His heart was pounding. Meera was over him, green eyes wide with concern. “Bran,” she whispered. “What happened? What’s happening out there?”

“Ramsay Snow,” Bran gulped. “He arrived and then left again quickly. The garrison is preparing to set out.”

“Are they taking us to Winterfell?”

Bran nodded. “There’s to be a battle at Winterfell.” He paused, trying to make sense of what he heard. “My brother. I think my brother is leading wildlings. Jon Snow is leading an army to take Winterfell.”

It was the only thing that made sense. Meera just stared at him. Jon Snow, wildling king? How? Why?

No, Bran could answer that last one. He must be trying to save Arya. If they’ve got Arya, then Jon would go to the ends of the earth to save her. Did Jon abandon his vows, and open the gates for the wildlings in return for an army?

“And they’re going to kill him.” Bran was shaking with fear. “I heard them, they’re going to kill Jon.”

Her mouth opened in surprise, and then she nodded. She focused on what was important, no questions or doubts. “We’ve got to stop them. Warn him.”
“I don’t know where he is,” Bran hissed. There were heavy bootsteps across the floor above. “I don’t where we are, Meera.”

“Then we escape. We find out,” she said. “How many men are there? Did any leave with Ramsay?”

“Five did,” Bran replied. “But we still can’t go, we’re trapped…”

“Actually no,” Meera admitted. There was the clatter of iron rings. “We’re not.”

Slowly, she raised her leg upwards. The iron bracelets still clattered around her ankles, but the chain to the wall had been broken from the joint. Bran stared at shock. “I broke through two nights ago,” she explained, with a grim face. “Rusted iron is not as strong as you’d think. You were too deep in your warg, there was no chance to show you.”

Bran could only stare. Meera’s fingers were scarred and gnarly from where she scratched at her manacles. She broke chips of stone from the wall to scrape at the metal, he thought. Her nails were ruined and blistering, it must have pained her hands, but she didn’t stop. She worked day and night, for months, no matter how much it hurt.

Those manacles had been thick. Bran remembered thinking it was pointless; the guards must have thought it would be impossible too. And nobody put the manacles back on me because I’m just a cripple. They never bothered closing the cell door either.

“What of the door at the stairs?” Bran asked, breathless.

“That’s locked, I already checked,” she answered. “But that’s just a normal door. I could break through, with a bit of work.”

She’s been free to move around for the first time in months, Bran realised. And yet she stayed on the floor to keep me company. His heart fluttered. There’s nothing holding us back, we could escape together. Then he remembered. “What about the men?” His voice trembled. “Meera, how are we supposed to get through all of those men and out of the gate?”

“How many are there?”

“Seventy-four.”

“I could set a trap, ambush a few while they’re sleeping. I’m a bog-devil, that’s what I do.”

“Can you ambush so many?” She didn’t reply. “And if we sneak out, they have horses and they could track us down.” Bran grimaced. “And we’ll never be able to sneak out anyways, because I’m a cripple and I’ll just slow you down.”

“We’ll find a way, we will. We’ve got Summer to help us.”

“We still need to get out of the gates first. There’s seventy-four men standing between us and the gates – seventy-four murderers.” Each one bigger and stronger than Meera. Maybe she was smarter and a better hunter, but that could only count for so much.

“Seventy-four men who have grown complacent. They won’t be expecting me, they won’t even see me coming. And they don’t even know about what you can do.”

“And if there were ten, sure. Maybe twenty would be possible. Thirty is pushing it. But seventy?” He shook his head. “It’s not going to work, Meera, you know it’s not.”
“We have to try!” she argued. “We have to.”

Bran realised why she was pushing so hard. “Because as soon as they move us they’re going to realise you’re not chained anymore,” said Bran. “As soon as they start marching we’re going to lose our advantage.”

“We can do this,” she insisted. Her eyes didn’t flicker; she was a hunter, she didn’t allow herself to hesitate. “Trust me, Bran.”

“I do. But I won’t let you kill yourself trying.” She was so beautiful. Her ropey brown hair was a mess, her skin pale and pasty, and her face gaunt, but somehow Meera was still so strong, lean and determined after so long of captivity. Every night he had seen her flexing her legs and straining her muscles, forcing herself to stay fit even when chained. “We’ll find another way, Meera. Somehow.”

There was a long moment of quiet. In the gloom, he saw her face crinkle. “Could you make a distraction?” she said finally. “Some distraction, enough to give me a chance.”

I don’t know. He couldn’t say the words, but his expression was enough of an answer.

Meera paused, and then continued. “We can steal a horse, Bran. Steal a horse and ride away.”

“And how do we get the gate open? Or get through the courtyard?”

She didn’t reply. Thistle Hall wasn’t very big, but it was secure. Meera had been trapped in the dungeons, but Bran had inspected all the sharpened wooden palisade through birds and rats. He had seen no escape large enough for two children.

“Can you even carry me up the stairs? Escaping is hard, but you have to do it carry a useless body with you,” Bran asked in a croaky voice. His face was pained. “Meera, if I hold you back, then you should just try to run witho—”

“Don’t even say that, Brandon Stark,” she said sharply. “And don’t insult me by asking. I took a vow, remember? By earth and water, bronze and iron, ice and fire.”

Her tone caused him to twitch. He didn’t know how to reply. I need to do something. Some way to get rid of the men. A direwolf alone won’t be enough, maybe a big elk, or a bear, or a…

Bran stopped. He heard her words. Ice and fire.

The idea came slowly. “What?” Meera asked. “Bran, what is it? Do you have a plan?”

I do. But it’s not a good one. “Meera, are you sure?” he pressed. “Are you sure that you’re strong enough to carry me?”

“I can carry you, Bran.”

“And how fast will you be able to move?”

“Fast enough,” she promised. “Tell me how fast I must go, and I’ll do it. We’re both getting out of here.”

And it had to be soon. Before the garrison was ready to move out. We’re only brave when we’re scared. I must be very brave now. “Alright,” Bran nodded. “I think I have an idea. Just promise me you’ll be ready to run when the time comes.”
She did. Bran gulped, closed his eyes, and he tried to concentrate. He tried to picture ice and death. He opened his third eye, extended his mind, and tried to see how far he could go. The world blurred, like stepping out of his body and into a dream.

He felt the earth around him. He felt the roots, he felt the snow. Everything was twisted and distorted, slipping away from his body, but he pushed outwards.

Bran remembered that feeling of pure cold and he tried to find it again. He focused on the image of a Stranger of black and white. The last time, at Last Hearth, Bran had felt himself drawn to it as he slept.

He could feel its presence. Something about it felt like it polluted the land for miles around. In his mind, the Stranger felt like a beacon – a beacon of power as bright and as horrible as a cold blue sun.

Bran followed its trail like a moth drawn to the flame. He felt the power shiver as he approached. The white walker sensed him searching for it too. He could feel it and it felt him.

There’s something about our abilities, Bran realised. They feel similar. We share common powers. Except the Other was colder and more powerful than he could even imagine – like an unholy, unnatural storm pressed into the shape of a man. Cold given flesh.

The vision came into focus. He saw it; the Other was exactly how he remembered it; half scorched black and half icy white. There was only a single bright blue eye, the rest of its skull looked scorched by flames. It was covered in darkness, limping on the ground in earthen cave. Hiding in the shadows, body crouched and infinitely patient.

Outside, a snowstorm howled. The air felt so cold it chilled Bran’s ethereal body. Something about the Other made the very earth colder. Bran was in the earth and in the roots, watching it through the ground itself. The Other twitched, like a predator sensing prey.

“Little boy,” the voice croaked. A voice like scraping ice, so cold it chilled Bran to his bone. “I see you.”

It doesn’t speak the Common, yet I can understand it. Can it understand me? “I can see you as well,” Bran replied.

The Other paced, twitching. It had its icy sword in its hand, so cold that mist chilled around the blade. Bran backed away instinctively. This is just a dream, the exact same as I do with the three-eyed crow.

“Yes,” Bran agreed, gulping. “I’m very scared. I also will be very brave.”

It was looking right at him, like a cat might stare at a particularly interesting mouse. “‘Brave’. I know that word too. Mortals call themselves brave for denying the inevitable, but they’re not. Only blind.”

He remembered what the three-eyed crows said. “You want to kill us.” The cold seemed to chill him to the bone, his throated choked. “You want to kill all men.”

“Kill. Kill. No, we do not… we do not want to kill.” It took a step forward. Bran took three steps back. “Death is coming to all mortals. We are here to save you all.”
It didn’t blink, it didn’t each twitch, Bran noticed. Like a statue of ice, or a predator staying very, very still. “Fire and ice, little boy,” the Stranger continued. “Fire would burn the world into ash, but ice freezes. Preserves. The fire would destroy you all, but ice offers immortality.”

It took another step. Bran forced himself to meet its gaze. Every instinct he had screamed at him to run but…

“I saw you killing those men. Those Night’s Watch men. You killed them without a second glance.” It didn’t reply. “But then you saw me. You stopped to talk to me, and I don’t think you do that very often. Why? Why did you pay any attention to me?”

“Scared little boy,” it replied.

Bran shivered. “I was drawn to you. I don’t understand it, but… but I think that you have power, and I have power too. We see each other. And you feel like a threat to me, my whole body is trembling. I feel like screaming and running away right now. It’s like every instinct I have is yelling at me to run.” Bran took a deep breath, trying to focus. “And I have to wonder… if our powers are similar… maybe you feel the same way about me too?”

No answer. “I think that’s why you stopped to focus on me,” Bran continued. “I think you paid attention to me because I’m more of a threat to you than thousands of men combined.”

_That was why the three-eyed crow wanted me. Whatever plan the Others have, I’m not a part of it. Maybe I’m a challenge to it. “And I don’t think you like threats. I think you would want the chance to kill me. Or freeze me, or use me, or whatever.”_

There was a long moment of silence. “Little boy,” the Stranger said finally.

No time to back down now. Its attention was on him. “I think you’d want to come and get me, then?” Bran challenged. His voice turned into a shout. “Come on! I’m right here, why don’t you get me? Think about how good that would be for your war!”

The world blurred. Bran tried to picture Thistle Hall, and pass the scenery onto the Other. _It shone like a beacon to me, maybe I can be a beacon to it too._ “Come on. Right here. West, towards the mountains,” Bran gasped. The vision shuddered. He felt a cold sweat on his brow. “Follow the wolf’s howl. It will lead you right to me. Come and get me.”

Its head cocked. There was no reply, but that eye shone. _This is my only chance._ What could defeat seventy-four monsters except one bigger, scarier monster? “If you knock four times on the gate,” Bran continued, “then they’ll think you a friend and open the gate for you. The men will try to stop you, but they can’t, can they? They won’t be able to stop you.”

No reaction. “You think it’s a trap,” Bran said. “And it is, but not for you. And I think that I’m valuable enough of a prize that you’re going to come anyways. And you better come quickly, because otherwise you might lose your chance.”

The dream was shaking, dissolving. “So come on!” he screamed. “Come and get me!”

The cave dissolved. Bran shot awake, gasping for air. He saw darkness. Stone walls. The cell. The cold still lingered to his brow, and shivers down his spine.

Meera was staring at him, squeezing his hand. “Bran, what happened? What was it?”

He was still struggling for breath. “I’ve got a way to get us out,” Bran wheezed. “Something very dangerous is going to come for us. There’s going to be screaming, and then everyone between us and the gates is going to die.”

Heavy boots above him; seventy-four Bastard’s Boys. This cursed keep where they had been imprisoned for so long. Whatever happens, Ramsay Snow will not be able to use me as bait. “Just be ready to run, Meera. Just be ready to run.”
Chapter 31

Chapter Summary

The Battle of Oldtown.

The Sphinx

He could see the faint rumbling of ships over the horizon, gathering like crows. At first they had only been a black shadow at the mouth of the Honeywine, but slowly Alleras watched the fleet take form. There were hundreds of sails, from great longships, small raiding vessels, to captured cogs, carracks and galleys with the fading sun glowing red like blood behind them.

_Thousands of reavers_, Alleras thought. For months, Oldtown had been terrified by tales of over twenty thousand ironborn sailing against them. Archmaester Benedict assured them all that Euron Greyjoy had far less than twenty thousand – somewhere between five and ten – but the rumours still swirled.

From even the lowest terrace of the Hightower, Alleras stood four hundred feet over the sea level. The lantern itself was nearly nine hundred feet high. The cityfolk of Oldtown liked to say that you could see the Wall from the top, but Alleras knew that was untrue. Within his first month at the Citadel, he had risked sneaking up to the very top of the tower to prove it false.

The Hightower was fascinating to Alleras. One of the tallest structures built by man, most certainly the tallest in Westeros. From below it looked like a looming solid structure, an immense needle piercing the sky, but when you walked through the gloomy halls inside you could see the mismatched architecture, the patchwork columns and clashing stonework. The foundations were black stone and unadorned, yet the base was granite bearing the spires and columns of the First Men. The higher levels bore the gargoyles and sphinxes of distinctly Andal design, with elements of Rhoynar and Valyrian slipping through now and then. A thousand different architects contributed to the same structure; Alleras knew that in the first days of the Kings of the High Tower, it had been mostly a timber tower rising some fifty feet above the original fortress. Piece by piece, century by century, the wood was replaced by stone and the Hightower rose upwards.

Both Alleras and Archmaester Perestan, who held the copper ring, mask and rod showing mastery over history, had shared some fascinating conversations concerning the Hightower and its mysteries. It was rare that acolytes of the Citadel were even allowed into the Hightower, and Alleras jumped at every chance. He was a curious person, and he couldn’t help but be amazed by the ancient stonework beneath his fingers.

Alleras’ usual fascination with the tower was faded tonight, though, by the sight of the army mustering in the Bay of Whispering Sound. Tonight would be the first battle that the Hightower had seen in over a hundred years.

In truth, the Hightower was a poor castle. The Battle Isle was high with sharp cliffs and couldn’t be sieged, but it meant the Hightower stood removed from the city. It was too big to be easily manned, and many of the halls and rooms were left defunct. Some of the lower levels had to be reinforced and filled up altogether as the stone started to creep. The seat of House Hightower was so isolated and large it was essentially a small town within the structure, and entry was usually heavily restricted except for kin and trusted allies to the Hightowers. The Lord of the Tower, Leyton Hightower, had not left the upper floors in decades, and it was often said that many of House Hightower lived and died without coming closer than four hundred feet to the sea. The Hightower was too large and too much of a labyrinth to be easily defended in battle.

A poor castle it may be, Alleras thought, but as a landmark it is unmatched. The men rally around the Hightower in times of war.

Below him, bells were ringing from the city, horns blaring from the mass of Tyrell and Hightower forces taking formation. The ships were set to defend the harbour all the way up to the rocks of the Battle Isle, where the Honeywine widened into the Bay of Whispering Sound and soft, gushing water drifted through the city. It was a deep harbour and a slow river – dotted with small isles and lazy currents, and usually filled with pleasure yachts sailing between the isles, with cogs all the way from the Free Cities overflowing the ports and merchant barges trading up and down the river all the way to Brightwater Keep. There were no yachts or barges today, though; the only ships allowed on the water were warships or those requisitioned for the defence of the city.

It seemed like the perfume of war was lingering over the usually fragrant city. It stunk of sweat, smoke and tension.

A strong wind blew from the west, bringing with it the cries of men on the boats, and the smell of so many torches. As Alleras watched, he saw the ships working to fasten into formation, anchoring themselves and wrapping ropes between them to keep them steady against the wind. There were so many ships that if they had been slightly closer together you could have crossed from one side of the Honeywine to the other, several times over.

From above, the city was a labyrinth of wynds, crisscrossing alleys, narrow crookback streets and markets, built in stone with cobbled roads. King’s Landing may be the most populated, but Oldtown was the largest, oldest and richest city in Westeros. Alleras could see the maze of streets and alleyways that he had committed to memory laid out before him, but now the docks seemed strangely quiet. There was no movement or trade on the piers and wharves today – there was nothing but grim silence, smoky torches burning, and rapidly-built barricades facing the sea.

If he walked around to the other side of the Hightower, Alleras would see the great Starry Sept looming downriver, its huge marble dome at the heart of the city. Further upriver, there were the Citadel buildings spreading on both sides of the water, and the Isle of Ravens located in between and joined by a weathered wooden drawbridge. While most of the Citadel buildings were sleek and marble, distinguished and adorned with dragons and sphinxes, the Isle of Ravens held the oldest building in Oldtown, dominated by the gnarly, moss-covered Ravenry and the great weirwood tree on which the ravens perched.

Alleras spent a long time staring at the city as he thought of all the ancient histories he had learnt of it. Tales of pirate kings that once held the Ravenry, the ruins of the First Men that the city was built upon, and dragons that used to perch on the Hightower.

He heard lopsided footsteps behind him. Alleras recognised the gait without even turning. “Oi,” Mollander called. “There you are, I was looking for you. What are you doing out here?”

Alleras grinned wryly. “Enjoying the view. It may be a while before I see it again. My father always taught me to enjoy the moment.”

“Well, next time bloody warn somebody,” Mollander grumbled. Alleras’ Dornish drawl was clear against Mollander’s broad Reach accent. “Armen has been pestering me to keep the group together. And have you seen Pate? The pig boy?”
“I have not.”

“He bloody vanished this morning. Nobody seems to know where he’s disappeared off to,” Mollander said with a sigh. “Archmaester Theobald will have my head – the Seneschal warned me to keep the acolytes together.”

“Hmm,” Alleras muttered. Personally, he had his doubts about Pate, but he didn’t let them show. “How goes it with Benedict?”

“Nearly done, I hear they’re winching up the last trebuchet now.” Mollander cast a worried eye over the horizon. “What about them? How long do you reckon?”

“I think six hours or so, perhaps,” Alleras replied.

“Benedict said four, but he said the same three hours ago too.” Above on the higher balconies, Alleras knew there were men watching the ironborn taking ranks through Myrish lenses. The Reach ships were forming ranks the same in the harbour ready to meet them.

“It depends on how fast the ironborn can muster. It will be time enough for us to return to the Seneschal’s Court, in any case.”

And that’s concerning, Alleras thought. It seemed like the threat of a mass raid had hung over Oldtown’s head for months, but when it finally did come it was slow. Early morning the criers rode through the city saying that the Redwyne fleet had arrived, Three Towers had fallen and ironborn were mustering past Blackcrown, but the attack in response was sluggish and obvious. Alleras heard some confidently declare Euron Crow’s Eye a fool, but Alleras didn’t share that opinion. In his experience, it was unhealthy to dismiss anyone as a fool. And yet if he’s not foolish, then what is he?

For so many months the ironborn had left the city constipated with tension and dread, it felt a weird relief to finally see them attacking. The Citadel had offered to assist House Hightower however possible; maesters volunteered themselves to manage stocks and coins, rations and supplies, and all the acolytes, students and scribes were expected to drop their regular duties to assist the war effort. Everything from writing troop movement reports to counting arrows and swords.

Archmaester Benedict, who bore the iron rod, ring and mask showing his specialisation in war and siegecraft, offered himself and the Citadel’s students to repair the ancient trebuchets and mangonels that were fixed on the lower levels of the Hightower. Soldiers built poor stonethrowers, Benedict often said, and it took learned men who understood projectiles, tension and motion to do the job properly.

It had been a hundred years since the great trebuchets on the Battle Isle had been last used, Alleras heard. They had fallen into disrepair, and fixing them proved no simple task. It took acolytes and men-at-arms by the dozen to ferry lumber and stones from the mainland, and carry them up the tower.

The stairs were too narrow to hoist rocks large enough for ammunition through the Hightower. Instead, they had to bring empty barrels and fill them up with smaller stones at the top. For days, the Citadel students had been trekking back and forth with rocks for the trebuchets, preparing stacked barrels.

Not that Alleras was complaining; it offered opportunity to inspect the Hightower, and it contributed towards his iron link on his maester’s chain. Practical experience of warcraft, Benedict called it, as much as a maester would ever get. There will be many students earning their iron links after this battle, Alleras mused. Still he couldn’t shake the unease.

“The last ferry will be here in an hour,” Mollander sighed, limping to join Alleras over the balcony. “But I don’t mean to join the others in the Seneschal’s Court. Better to wait out the battle in some tavern with plenty of ale.”

A tavern far, far away from the water, I think. Their usual haunt, the Quill and Tankard, was on its own small island on the Honeywine and had been taken over by a garrison. “Shame,” Alleras said idly. “I hear that Archmaester Perestan means to give a special lecture for the students taking shelter.”

“Well, that’s one way to put us to sleep rather than fret. But I prefer to get drunk.” Mollander paused. “It’s either that or stand on the walls. I hear Garlan Tyrell has promised a silver for every man that stands with the militia on the wall.”

“A silver isn’t very much for fighting in a battle.”

“Nobody expects much of a battle. Not at the walls, at least. They’re defending the harbour, the ironborn will never break that far through. Doubtful the militia will do much, except maybe loose some shafts.” Still, Mollander looked excited with the thought of taking part in the battle, even a small part. Mollander could have been a knight, Alleras thought, if not for his limp foot. “What do you say? You’re a hell of an archer, Alleras. They could use you on the walls.”

“I think not. I prefer shooting apples to men.”

“Why? It’s an easy silver.”

“It is until the men shoot back.”

Mollander scoffed. “We’ll win, you know. This will be an easy battle and everyone knows it.”

Yes, Alleras thought. And how can you be unconcerned by that statement? Surely the ironborn must know it too?

The ideal time for the ironborn to assault had come and gone. There had been a time, after ironborn victories in the Arbor and Redwyne straits, when Lord Hightower had been left panicking about the defence of the city. Rumors said that Leyton Hightower had been so scared he resorted to consulting a book of spells along with his daughter, the Mad Maid Malora, to which all the maesters scoffed. When the ironborn first took the Arbor, the Redwyne and Tyrell forces had been miles away and distracted. The militia was raised and a ragtag fleet assembled, but then later the panic was relieved when allies started to muster. Garlan Tyrell arrived through the city with thirty thousand Tyrell men coming from the crownlands. That number had slowly risen as more and more gathered.

All the while the Arbor was being pillaged and razed, Oldtown readied for war. For weeks, knights had been riding down the squares, calling upon all able-bodied men to join the battle and bring justice for the atrocities committed in Ryamsport, Vinetown and Starfish Harbor and all down the Redwyne Straits.

“I hear Benedict wagered Norren good odds that the ironborn will fall back as soon as they see the defence,” Mollander continued. “They’d be smart to do so, too. That’s the Arbor Queen down there – the greatest ship in the Seven Kingdoms. She’s never been beaten at sea.”

Yes, the Arbor Queen was a great galleas, no argument. Even compared to the other great warships of the Redwyne fleet, she was huge. She bore three large burgundy sails, triple decks of oars painted white and gold, and decks filled with scorpions and armed soldiers. A hundred great warships of the Redwyne fleet had arrived at noon and very quickly reinforced the defence around the city. The battle lines that Archmaester Benedict had drawn on his maps looked so different when staring at them from above.

“I hear that ironborn longships are faster.”

“Faster, yes. Stronger, no. Most longships are built small and swift for raids, not naval battles,” Mollander replied eagerly. “Only a very few of the Iron Fleet and similar can even compare to the Arbor Queen and the Honour of Oldtown. They are the two biggest ships in Westeros.”

Alleras nodded, still thinking quietly. Lord Paxter would lead and command the battle from the mouth of the harbour, and Alleras couldn’t fault him. The Redwyne fleet was made up of solely galleys, galleases, and dromonds. In contrast to the sleek and powerful warships of the Arbor, the fleet of House Hightower consisted of far more carracks, wine cogs, trading galleys and whalers refitted for battle.

The flagship of the Hightower, the Honour of Oldtown, would lead the reserves captained by Ser Baelor “Brightsmile” Hightower, eldest son. The second son, Garth “Greysteel” Hightower would lead the troops and militia on the docks. Although technically Lord Leyton Hightower was to command the weapons and stonethrowers on the Battle Isle, the Old Man of the Tower was old and reclusive, and his role was an empty honour.

When Alleras and the others had arrived by ferry to the Battle Isle this morning, he had witnessed the Hightower sons, noble knights, captains and commanders all leaving – all of them dressed for battle and eager for it. They had been young knights laughing and cheering.

The most dangerous command would perhaps be the force of infantry established as a beachhead on the Bloody Isle – the isle to the front of the bay – but Ser Garlan Tyrell had shown no sign of shirking that duty. Sharpened spikes and trenches had been dug in deep into the sand to resist any longships, while scorpions were raised on the muddy isle. Ser Dickon Tarly – a very young and very freshly spurred knight, but said to be strong and bold – commanded forces on the east side of the bay by the Thieves’ Market to block any landing on the coast, while Ser Mattis Rowan led forces on the west near the Guildhalls.

Even while the Lord of the Reach Mace Tyrell was distracted with the schism in King’s Landing, an impressive number of heirs and great knights had assembled at Oldtown. Sixty thousand, Alleras was told – a force he knew that Lord Paxter intended to take north to conquer the Iron Islands themselves after the battle was won or repelled. After the destruction on Redwyne's own seat and people, he doubted the retaliation would be gentle.

If the ironborn expected the Reach’s response would be weak, they were sorely mistaken. Alleras heard tavern talk saying that Lord Paxter would make the Iron Islands pay tenfold for the damage in the Arbor; he would raise an island from their bones.

Sixty thousand. At least six to one odds, and the advantage of heavy fortifications besides. Alleras spent a long time staring at the formation, and found little to fault with it. The wind was unfortunate – it meant the defence would be fighting into a sharp headwind and the ironborn ships would have an edge – but Lord Paxter seemed prepared for such. They had set formations on every side to counter whatever scheme the ironborn used; understandable, but Alleras also feared it may leave their forces too spread out.

Mollander was still talking about how swiftly the battle would be won, but Alleras just smiled absently while paying very little attention. His’ sharp, black eyes never left the blot in the distance.
The skies were growing dark and the sun was setting slowly.

“– is a fool to test Oldtown,” Mollander was saying. “I do not know what this Crow’s Eye wishes to accomplish here, but he will lose.”

“I think he is here to send a message,” Alleras said slowly. “He wishes to prove something.”

“How small his army is?” Mollander laughed.

“No,” Alleras mused as he rested his head over the balcony, hands under his chin. There were gulls flapping in the air. “He taunted the Reach and they answered in strength. He must have known the response.”

“But he will flee. Crows are cowardly creatures. He will flee just as Dagon Greyjoy was known to do, the last time ironborn threatened the Hightower.” Mollander shook his head. “They have no business here.”

Yes, Alleras thought. All of the maesters – experts in war, mathematics, logic and reasoning – agreed that the ironborn would not break their harbour. Strangely, the thought made Alleras think of Archmaester Marwyn. The grey sheep are fools, Marwyn oft said, they bleat the same facts over and over again until those facts were all they know. They have all the facts but so little truth.

“I wonder…?” Alleras bit his lip. “Do you know of the black stone foundations of the Hightower?”

Mollander looked at him in surprise. “Huh?”

“The foundations of the Hightower is a labyrinth fortress of unadorned black stone. What the Hightower was built upon. It’s one of the great mysteries; nobody knows who built those foundation, or where it came from, or even what stone it is made from.”

Mollander shook his head. “No, I heard Theobald talking about this. The archmaester said the stone is dragonstone – the type the Valyrians used for their dragonroads. Evidence to say that the Hightower could have once been an ancient Valyrian outpost in eons past.”

“No, there’s more evidence to say that’s untrue. The stones are similar, but dragonstone is harder and stronger than metal, while the black stone of the Hightower feels wet to the touch with stranger properties. Some say it is black basalt, but no stonemason can reproduce its queer texture. The stone doesn’t seem to age either – none can even truly guess when it was first hewn. The foundations bear more similarity to the Five Forts of Yi Ti, and they predate the Old Valyrians by thousands of years.” Alleras fiddled with copper link on the chain. He was a quick study, and he had earned his links in both history and architecture. “I know that Archmaester Quillon suggests a connection between the fortress and the mazemakers of Lorath. The construction and style is very similar.”

Mollander just looked confused. “The mazemakers of Lorath,” Alleras continued, still not turning his gaze, “were said to have been destroyed by an army of creatures coming from the sea. By merlings, selkies or walrus-men.”

“You believe that?” Mollander laughed. “You’ve spent too much time with Marwyn. Archmaester Perestan would strip that copper link from your neck if he heard you saying such.”

“I don’t know what I believe,” Alleras lied. “I just find it curious. The mazemakers of Lorath weren’t human – the bones found are closer to giants – and they built some of the greatest ancient cities ever raised. Older than Valyria, older than Ghis. And then they were destroyed, seemingly overnight.”

“What does that have to do the ironborn?”

“It’s making me thoughtful, I suppose. Did you know that there is only one other example of the same black stone used in the Hightower foundations in Westeros?”

“Is this a riddle? What?”

“The Seastone Chair,” Alleras answered. “The same throne that Euron Greyjoy claims. An ancient throne of oily black stone, and nobody knows where it came from. But there is some link between Seastone Chair of Pyke and the foundations of the Hightower, yet nobody can even answer what or how.”

He could see the smoke rising in the distance, dark clouds swirling on the wind. “Nobody knows where the ironborn themselves come from, either,” Alleras continued, thoughtfully. “They weren’t Andals, very little evidence to say they were First Men. Some say they are descended from visitors across the Sunset Sea. The ironborn themselves have been known to claim they descended from merlings from the Drowned God’s hall, yet the maesters reject the notion. Maester Theron once posited the existence of a species he called the ‘Deep Ones’, a race of misshapen fish-men, but he was mocked out of the Citadel.”

Mollander looked baffled. “You’re not usually this talkative, Alleras. What are you going on about?”

He shrugged. “Don’t really have a point. If there’s answer to these questions, then I don’t have it. We’re surrounded by riddles going back thousands of thousands of years. Like Nagga’s Hill on Old Wyk – was that truly made from the bones of an ancient sea dragon? The best answer anyone here can give is ‘maybe’. Or what of the Wall? The children of the forest and the giants? Even the mysteries surrounding Moat Cailin and Storm’s End. A maester could tell you every scion and every lord of every major house, but cannot answer how their most prominent castles came to be.”

Mollander paused. All around them, they heard bells from hundreds of ships chiming below. “Lazy Leo was right about you,” he said finally, still looking baffled. “You earn your name, the Sphinx.”

“I just find it curious. There’s a big and ancient world out there and the maesters still know so little of it.”

I came to the Citadel to find the truth. But is there is little truth here, only facts.

The thought made him think of Archmaester Marwyn, and not for the first time Alleras wished he had gone with him. Marwyn the Mage left on one of the final ships to pass the ironborn blockade, before the harbour was locked. Alleras’ time as Marwyn’s student had been brief, but… enlightening.

He wondered where Leo Tyrell – Lazy Leo – was now. Probably getting drunk in some dive on the eve of the battle. Leo’s father, the captain of the city guard, had been insistent that his son should take part in the battle, but that was hardly going to ever happen. Lazy Leo was the outcast in his own family, in good part by his own choosing, who had been shunned into joining the Citadel. Still, for all Leo was degenerate, unmotivated and arrogant, Alleras didn’t think Leo was stupid.

Quite often, Leo tried to flirt with Alleras, in his own snide and taunting way. He was one of the few who noticed. Alleras recognised the smirks when few others did, the constant teasing comments about Alleras being a ‘nobleman’s son’, and the way Leo’s eyes would linger. Leo was perceptive and quick-witted enough to be a fine maester, and yet cursed with a temperament so grating that none but Marywn would take him as a student. Alleras had seen little of Leo since

Where is Leo? Alleras wondered. And how many glass candles do we have left?

There was a voice calling for them. Armen the Acolyte stood on the pavilion, bellowing at them to move for the docks. “The last ferry is coming in,” he shouted. “Get a move on or you’re stuck here!”

Armen looked flustered as he ran off again. “We have time,” Alleras said lazily. “Linger for now, we’ll reach the ferry in good time. I want to watch for a bit longer.”

“Perhaps I should stay,” Mollander mused, standing up and stretching out his clubfoot. “This place will give us the best view of the battle in the city, and should they breach the harbour the Hightower might be the safest place in the city.”

It was a jest, but Alleras still felt uneasy. No, I don’t think this is the safest place at all. Alleras’ father had once said that fear and nerves were nothing more than weakness that most weren’t able to purge. Something to be fought against, not heeded. Doubt was debilitation, and panic was a plague. But then again, Alleras mused, my father is dead.

From the Battle Isle, they saw the streets were clear and many of the harbourside buildings had been barricaded, just in case. The cityfolk would be fleeing en masse to take refuge in the Starry
Sept for the night, and the Citadel students and scribes were expected to gather in the Seneschal’s Court, but more would be holing up in taverns during the battle. Few would be sleeping, that was for certain. Alleras had heard that many winesinks and whorehouses would be offering discounts.

I wish I had left with Marwyn, Alleras thought for the countless time.

Mollander was staring at him. Alleras made no rush to move, still leaned over the stone wall.
“What is with you?” he asked. “You seem very… distracted.”

“It is just nerves, I suppose,” Alleras replied. “I feel uneasy.”

“Well, understandable.” Mollander pursed his lips, but there was a smirk playing over his features too. “But we will beat them. They don’t stand a chance, Benedict says so.”

Alleras didn’t reply for a good while. He heard gulls chirping – all of the activity in the bay disturbed the birds. He knew the birds wouldn’t settle tonight, he could feel it in the air. Come dusk, the skies would be swarming with ravens and crows from the Isle of Ravens.

“Did you hear Archmaester Benedict calling this the War of the Five Monsters?” Alleras said finally, still not taking his eyes off the horizon.

“Excuse me?”

“The War of the Five Kings is over. Once there were five kings, each noble in his own way. The Young Wolf fought for justice, Renly fought for prosperity, even Balon fought for independence.
Now, the noble kings are dead and we’re left with a war between five villains and tyrants, each more foul than the last,” Alleras explained. “The War of the Five Monsters, this will be called.”

“Five monsters?” Mollander frowned. “That doesn’t seem right. I mean, yes, Euron Crow’s Eye is undoubtedly a monster; we’ve all heard of his atrocities in the Arbor. The man is as wicked as they come; he would rape and enslave the world to hear the tales.” Alleras nodded, still watching the clouds drifting in the distance. “And yes, the Bastard King in the North is a monster, no doubt,” Mollander continued. They had all heard of King Jon Snow too – even amongst everything else the Citadel had been abuzz with that news. Apparently, House Bolton had sent letters requesting aid to every major house in the realm, but they were all denied due to all the other troubles. “The wildling king that controls beasts and works savage witchcraft – he comes south to pillage and destroy the realm. The Bastard King is another monster, sure enough, but that’s only two. Who are the other three?”

“Stannis Baratheon,” Alleras said quietly.

Mollander opened his mouth to object, but Alleras cut him off. “Oh yes – a righteous man Stannis once was, according to some. And arguably justified, depending on which tale you believe. But now it seems Stannis has turned crazed and tyrant – a madman haunting the Narrow Sea and leaving ruins behind him in his desperate war. He is the only contender from the last war still fighting, and he has been left bitter, broken and crazed from it.”

“Alright,” Mollander conceded. “That’s three. But what of King Tommen? Do you consider the little boy a monster?”

“Not him.” Alleras shook his head. “His mother. The Mad Queen.”

“Ah.” Mollander grimaced.

“The mad woman who holds her own son hostage, along with his fair wife,” Alleras continued. “An adulteress and murderess who denies the Faith, and holds siege in the Red Keep. Cersei would see the kingdom burn, if not for Mace Tyrell and Kevan Lannister trying to stop her.”

“Point. Then the fifth contender is Aegon Targaryen, I suppose? And yet to call him a monster seems unfair,” Mollander noted. “I have heard that the boy is brave and chivalrous. The Young Dragon, some call him.”

“I have heard the same. But that assumes Aegon Targaryen is any true king.” Alleras shook his head. “No, to the mind of many, this ‘Aegon’ is naught but a puppet, and the true contender is Tyrion Lannister.”

Mollander didn’t reply. “Perhaps that makes the Imp the most dangerous villain of them all,” Alleras mused. “What could be scarier than the monster that tries to hide out of sight? Tyrion Lannister raised a puppet king and called him a Targaryen, all the while his influence grows. The Imp is both kin and king slayer; malformed and cursed in the eyes of gods and men. If this Aegon is crowned, then it will be the Imp that takes the throne.”

“You don’t know that for sure.”

“I do not. But still, what does the truth matter, compared to what everyone believes? They see Aegon as the Imp’s puppet, so he becomes the Imp’s puppet. And if it’s true,” Alleras said grimly, “then no matter who wins, the Seven Kingdoms are doomed.”

Mollander barked with laughter, slapping him on the back. “You are too grim, Alleras. It will not happen. Lord Paxter will defeat the ironborn tonight, and Lord Tyrell will force the Mad Queen to yield. Their armies will defeat the Imp’s Dragon, and the rightful Tommen and Margaery will reign. As for the Bastard King, well, I cannot say. Too many rumours and talk; I know little truth of what is happening in the savage north.” Neither do I, Alleras thought but he didn’t speak. “Regardless, House Bolton is set to defy the Bastard King valiantly, and I doubt his armies will be able to move south come winter. Whatever happens in the north is not worth fretting over tonight.”
Mollander chuckled. “Come on, you definitely need a drink. Find a cheap winesink and a pretty girl, and this night will be over before you know.” He laughed as he shook his head. “But we really must go. The ferry will be coming in any moment now.”

Alleras cast one final glance to the horizon, before slowly pulling himself up and rolling his shoulders. His muscles felt tense. No; I do not think I want to be in the streets tonight.

“Are you sure you don’t want to go to the walls?” Mollander insisted, limping as he walked. “My father always said you have to face your fears head-on.”

“My father said the same.”

“Then let’s go! We’ll have a grand view of the battle, and it’ll be the easiest silver you’ve ever earned. I know that the militia will be bringing wine to celebrate when the ironborn are driven off, and I doubt we’ll even need to fire an arrow.”

“I think not.” Alleras glanced behind him, at the dark clouds swirling over setting sun. There was a sharp edge to the wind. “It looks to be a stormy night.”

Mollander shook his head surely. “Norren said not.” Archmaester Norren bore the ring, mask and rod of electrum, showing his expertise in meteorology and the weather patterns. The old maester had devoted his life to mapping the wind and clouds. “He predicted a warm easterly wind for at least the next quarter, and good sailing weather up until the turn of winter. There should be no storms.”

“The maesters say a lot of things,” Alleras replied. “But I can still see the storm clouds.”

The Kraken

The world was shaking. Oceans roared, the waves churned, and the wind howled, while Euron laughed as he stumbled through the gloomy hull as if drunk. He felt giddy, actually giddy. From the deck above, loud voices were bellowing,

He clutched a sloshing skin of leather, filled with liquid as thick as bile. It smelt like burnt flesh and rot. Without even hesitating, he took a long chug, gulping the shade of the evening so fast that blue wine poured down his beard.

The shade of the evening was a good drink. It was drink that helped to… open the mind, for those that had the gift to see it. A drink that let you fly.

For those unaccustomed to the nectar, shade of the evening would taste disgusting, initially, before calling upon the rich sensations of memory. Euron had drunk so much of it tasted only like the blood of the world, rich and thick, staining his lips blue. It was an expensive drink to find on this side of the world, but Euron drank so much of it that his fingers would tremble the longer he went without its nectar. He needed it now, he needed the power and clarity the blue wine brought.

As soon as the wine gulped down his throat, he felt free. The world transformed into glorious shades of blue and red.

Euron heard himself laughing. High above, it was like he could see into the heavens themselves, where the storm gods shook their mighty hammers and stirred the sky itself to battle. Below him, the waves trembled and quivered, and he could see something great and ancient flexing beneath the depths. Soon.

In the darkness, there were eyes. Eyes all around him, invisible in the black, but Euron knew they were there. The world was staring at him. Watching. Cheering.

_The world is watching me. Those eyes, so many eyes. This is my moment._

He felt a rush of… wisdom, awareness, hit him – like suddenly he could _feel_ his place in the universe, see the way forward – but it was gone too quickly as the shade of the evening faded. _I need more_, Euron cursed. _More wine, more power, more knowledge. There can be no error, not tonight._

The lower decks were flooded, ankle-deep. Water gushed over the sides. Euron splashed through the salty water and clambered upwards, stumbling drunk with the waves. The sound of his laughter broke through screams. His lower deck was crowded, filled with stirring men and the dangling of chains and slaves.

He saw restless bodies lingering in the gloomy hull, clutching blades. A few of the chained warlocks and mages were whimpering, chained against the wood.

“What is happening?” A large, monstrous man grumbled. Mall the Monstrous was a Norvoshi, born disfigured and given to the bearded priests to train as an infant. Before he even reached puberty, he had been discarded. He was a big, bloated man; his skeleton misshapen and his back hunched, but his arms were thick and strong.

“It will be battle, soon,” Euron chuckled, shambling as the ship jerked in the rough seas. “Prepare yourselves.”

Other men crowded around him, all eyes dark. Euron was proud of his Grotesques – he considered them the finest killers in the world.

Most of the time, the _Silence_’s Grotesques stayed below deck, watching over the mages and spellbinders. There were Braavosi, Tyroshi, Myrish, Ghiscari, Ibbenese, Yi’Tish, Lhazareen and Sorthoryi among them – a selection of as many freaks and monsters Euron could collect. About half of them were missing tongues, but they were all chosen for their certain… temperament.

Mall the Monstrous had been sold to a freak show near Lys before Euron raided the town, the huge man’s lumpy back was crisscrossed with scars. Also among them was an evil, Ghiscari dwarf clutching two daggers that was prone to raping corpses and body parts, an unnaturally tall, skinny Tyroshi man who could contort as if boneless whom Euron stole from a Astapori Master’s collection, an albino Summer Islander with striking red eyes, a couple of eunuchs from the fighting pits of Meereen, a hooked-face corsair with a whip, two Ibbenese brothers with long, hairy arms and crunched faces, one malformed Ibbenese-human crossbreed, and a cone-headed Jogos Nhai rider that Euron found in the blood pits of New Ghis. Not all of them had wanted to join Euron’s Grotesques, but there were ways of making them… compliant.

Typically, the ironborn sailed the ship above, but Euron’s mutes, monsters and dedicated murderers had their place too.

In the corner of the hull, Euron saw the disfigured, blistered figure of Falia Flowers, her pregnant belly swollen and her arms chained to a hammock. After Euron had finished with Falia, he had gifted her to Mall the Monstrous and the other Grotesques to rape. The thought of the festering, tortured ball of hate and cruelty that was gestating inside Falia caused Euron to grin.
“Mall, you are in charge of the lower deck. Prepare the men for a fight,” Euron ordered. “You know your duty?”

A twisted, swollen hand pounded against Mall’s chest. His left hand was so twisted he couldn’t even grip anything. “Yes, Your Holiness.”

Holiness. Soon everyone will be addressing me like that, not just my Grotesques. A beefy, hairy figure stood arms folded by the doorway. “Ghrazzac,” Euron called. “I appoint you in charge of my hull. Prepare Urgard and my mages.”

Ghrazzac made a guttural sound that could only be agreement. The man didn’t speak the Common, he didn’t have the tongue, but he could understand it. Ghrazzac was of the Brindled Men from the forests of Sothoryi; massively muscled and big-boned with long arms, sloped foreheads, huge square teeth, heavy jaws, and flat noses more like snouts and thick skins brindled in patterns of brown and white more hoglike than human. Ghrazzac had been a slave once too, before the Silence raided a slave ship around the Basilisk Isles. Euron liked the man; freaks were useful, and Ghrazzac was too dim to be manipulated.

“We will need their power. Give them fire as needed, and see to it they fulfil their role,” Euron continued. “Now is everything we’ve been working towards.”

Ghrazzac grinned a bloody smile, his scars twisting. He looked more animal than man.

A wordless war cry burst from Mall the Monstrous, and the Grotesques started moving. The Silence was so crowded that every level was filled with bodies. “And bring me more shade of the evening!” Euron ordered. “Whatever stores we have left, I need it!”

A scarred, burnt mute brought him another satchel, with blue wine sloshing out of the mouth as the cabin lurched. Euron gulped it down hungrily. Colours twisted into shades of red and blue. Euron shambled up the red stairs, and into the storm. The decks were filled with rushing bodies, horn blasts and shouts. Euron had to clutch the guide rope leading out on deck, all the while feeling the grin widen across his face.

He could feel the shade of the evening taking effect. He could see shadows flying across the air. All around him, he could see ghostly phantoms littering the floor of the Silence. But they cannot speak, Euron thought proudly. I took out their tongues so that their ghosts could never haunt me.

All around him, the battle was only just getting started. The sound of the Silence breaking through waves was deafening.

Euron laughed.

His crew were rushing, frantically trying to fight the wind. Euron stared, and all of the men around him had no eyes. Blood dripped from their empty eye sockets. Their skins were bloated, corpse-pale and water soaked.

“Captain!” Torwold Browntooth called. Bloody water was gurgling from his mouth and half his skull had been cut open, but the man didn’t seem to notice. “Orkwood has fallen. The Bloody Watchman is ablaze!”

“Their numbers?” Euron demanded.

“Three hundred vessels,” Kemmet Pyke shouted from the prow, barely audible over the wind. There was a phantom arrow sticking half-through the man’s skull. “Including a hundred great galleys.”
Most others on the ship were dead and maimed too. The shade of the evening allowed him to see their phantoms.

In the distance, Euron saw flames and great burgundy sails. The bright red, greens and purples of their sails and banners clashed with the setting sun.

He saw three spikes breaking the sky, like the prongs on a broken crown. On the coast, the first husks of longships were burning in the shallows. He saw mammoth shapes of the great galleys up ahead, swirling in the black waters.

The Redwyne fleet had finally arrived. And the ironborn were ready.

Lord Orkwood’s garrison holding Three Towers had crumbled under the force of Lord Paxter’s galleys. Lord Orkwood’s sons had held it valiantly, yet the size of Redwyne’s fleet meant a brief battle. Raiding vessels had seen the fleet approaching, but by the time Euron's reinforcements had gathered from Blackcrown, Ryamsport, Starfish Harbor and Vinetown, the battle was already nearly over.

The castle itself was burning in black, smoky flames. Good, Lord Orkwood proved that he was a true ironborn, Euron thought approvingly. He torched the castle before they allowed it to be reclaimed. May Lord Orkwood enjoy his time in the Drowned God’s halls.

Around them, the seas were choppy and the wind howled. The storm that had been brewing over the Arbor was finally being released.

Yes, tonight is the night. A vision of bloody, churning seas flashed before his eyes. It will be glorious.

“Blow the horns!” Euron bellowed, shambling forwards. His Valyrian steel armour clanked. “All ships. Signal the formation and prepare for assault. Tonight we reap some grapes!”

“What about Lord Orkwood?” A young raider – Steffarion Sparr, he remembered – shouted. He had a spear through his chest. “There might still be survivors held up on Three Towers.”

Who cares? “Lord Orkwood did his duty.” The first sacrificial lamb of the night. “We assault the Redwyne fleet. Burning those galleys matters more than a castle.”

The shadows of the Redwyne fleet loomed. As they got closer, they could see skirmishes on the beaches of Three Towers – the ironborn of the castle fighting against the Reach men, even after their longships had been crushed. Euron had no interest in relieving them. Tonight is about killing, not saving.

“We call the fleet! Bring our full force to bear!” Euron shouted.

The men on deck were but half of his tried and tested crew, with whom he’d ranged to the world’s edge; the other half were nobles and heirs of the houses of the Iron Islands. Lord Goodbrother, Steffarion Sparr, Dagon Ironmaker and Quenton Sunderly and many others had all been ‘invited’ to crew the Silence in preparation for the battle, while their fathers or sons led other ships in the fleet.

Euron walked among his men, looking at how each one would die. “Lord Goodbrother!” Euron proclaimed. The aging lord’s eyes narrowed. “As is fitting for a man of your experience, I grant you command of my deck and sails. Stonehand – you are in command of the rowers and coxswain. Kemmet Pyke, you man the crow’s nest.”
“Aye captain!” the Stonehand called as the bodies rushed around him. Ropes strained and wood groaned – it took ten men to drag the black masts in against the wind. Euron saw a figure with seawater gushing from his mouth, gasping through lungs filled with salt. Euron grinned. “Rodrik Freeborn!” he announced. “I appoint you as hornblower – see to your duty below.”

Rodrik Freeborn looked shocked. He was a tall, wiry man clad in the heavy chainmail – a reaver past his prime, but still as hard and as worn as rock. “Hornblower?!” Rodrik exclaimed. “I’m one of the best damn spears on this ship, and you’re putting me as hornblower? Let me lead the first raid.”

“Your duty is with the damn horns, see to it,” Euron snapped. “You listen for my command – my command alone – and you blow accordingly. We must rally the fleet – now blow the first horn for them to muster and follow.”

The hornblower was a crucial task, but hardly the most glorious one. It was a duty usually fulfilled by squires and apprentices, but tonight Euron couldn’t risk any but one of his most loyal men as hornblower. The ships of the fleet would be looking to the Silence to lead, and for this battle the Silence had been fitted with five great horns to pass instructions. They were horns of iron, silver, bone or oak, all very different shapes and sizes. The smallest horn was four feet and the largest over seven, but each one had a very distinguishable pitch and tone – the sound of which gave different orders. It was the only way to pass orders through a fleet of hundreds of ships.

He could see the fleet mustering down the Redwyne Straits. The first horn – a long, sullen sound like a whale’s cry – echoed over the water. Euron saw flares and signals rise from the longships in response. My fleet has been prepared for this, he told himself. They will be ready.

He couldn’t stop his heart from beating. In the distance, the Redwyne fleet grew closer.

“He flees like a craven!” Quellon Humble snapped.

“Craven? No, it seems Lord Paxter has his wits,” Lord Goodbrother called darkly. The lord was a ‘guest’ aboard the Silence, but a capable tactician. Yes, he will do to command the sails. “He doesn’t wish to face us in open water, not when we have more ships than he does. He could lose too many if his galleys are encircled by our longships. Instead, he leads us down into the bay itself so he can fortify around Oldtown. He expects to crush us with the size of his hulls if we dare to follow.”

The Stonehand’s face twisted. “Then what do we do?”

“We follow, of course,” Euron grinned as he stepped forward. “Blow the horns. Sound the drum. Tonight’s the night – we break through their fleet and we take the attack to Oldtown itself. Come, tonight let the Drowned God sing!”
Lord Goodbrother looked nervous. “Your Grace,” he said hesitantly. “Those are great galleys. The Great Kraken and the Silence are more than equal to any lesser warship, but most of our vessels are not. Our fleet is primarily longships built for raiding, not battle.” He shook his head. “Only the Iron Fleet itself could stand to match the force Paxter Redwyne commands, right now we do not have the ships—”

“The ships?” Euron taunted. “We are ironborn. We can break them.”

Over the horizon, he could see the immense burgundy sails and the three hundred oars of the Redwyne flagship. The Arbor Queen alone was three times the size of any ship the ironborn could field.

The sound of drums and rowers was deafening. The entire fleet was behind him, one of the largest Westeros had ever known. He could see the cliffs come into view as the ironborn fleet spilled into the bay.

The Silence led from the centre rear, alongside the Thunderer and the Dusk. The ships of House Drum and House Harlaw kept their crews but were now captained by Euron’s captains, the Red Oarsman and the Harren Half-Hoare. Euron had been sure to place his own men and allies at strategic points in the fleet.

Command of the Great Kraken, his dear brother’s old flagship, had been gifted to Donnor Saltcliffe to lead the starboard rear. The Nightflyer, formerly belonging to House Blacktyde, until its lord had been cut into seven pieces, was now captained by Lord Waldon Wynch to lead the port rear, along with Hotho Humpback Harlaw on the Gargoyle to support him. Germund Botley on the Silverfin and Lord Maron Volmark on the Leviathan’s Wail led the front flanks, while the Sparr led the vanguard from the centre aboard the Hatchet’s Edge.

Euron could make out the greatest ships of their fleet – the Foamdrinker, the Axe Maiden, the Bone Reaper, the Last Light, the Maiden’s Tears, the Forsaken, the Northern Hunter, the Salt Bitch – as they gathered around them. The strongest few of the ironborn longships were the only longships that could match war galleys, and beyond those they had hundreds of smaller vessels with a dozen oars filling the waves.

Their ranks were supported with cogs and merchant ships captured from the Arbor, gathered mostly at the front. The largest of which was a towering three-deck galleas they had captured in Raymsport – its masts still bore the golden lion of Lannister, yet the lion was crossed out in blood. The ‘King Joffrey’s Valour’ had been under construction when the ironborn razed the port, originally a gift from the Arbor to the Crown. It was a two hundred oar vessel, barely a quarter of which were filled, and the ship had been built by Redwynes and very hastily finished by ironborn. Barely seaworthy.

Euron had given the vessel to Eldred Codd to command from the front, but he had refused to allow anyone to change ship’s name. It made Euron laugh to call her the King Joffrey’s Valour.

The gathering from anchor to open water took time, and their force blanketed over the choppy seas leading to the bay. Euron didn’t rush. The Redwyne fleet attacked Three Towers in the morning, and by late evening the entire force of the Iron Islands was gathering to give chase into the Honeywine. The leading longships moved faster than the galleys, but their numbers were large and Redwyne fleet had too much of a head start.

Lord Goodbrother scattered onto the deck, peering over the prow. Everyone was shouting and running, but the lord looked worried. “My king!” Lord Goodbrother called to Euron. “This is folly! Our fleet won’t catch them in time before they reach Oldtown!”
Euron just smirked, and didn’t respond. The lord’s features were writ deep with worry.

The skies were growing dark and the storm rumbled. The wind was still building in intensity, howling through the Bay of the Whispering Sound. Rain splashed, waters churned. We will have the wind behind us, Euron thought smugly.

He ordered the coxswain to beat the drum, and the rowers to begin.

“Crow’s Eye!” Lord Goodbrother bellowed once more. “We aren’t ambushing them, they are ambushing us. Lord Paxter has joined up with the fleet at Oldtown and means to crush us in the harbour!”

Exactly. And we will fight straight through them. As soon they positioned themselves at the mouth of the Honeywine and the harbour, the Redwyne’s forces would have a significant defensive advantage. Let the grape lord think that he has the upper hand for now.

“King!” Lord Goodbrother shouted again. “Please, stop the oars! Bring the sails in, let us take formation! A blockade, perhaps, or a landing force, but not a charge. We have more ships, but they have far more men – we cannot survive it.”

The sky crackled, an enormous growl rumbling over the fleet. This storm is only just getting started. In the distance, a shadow flashed against the intense blue-white light. “Do you see that over the horizon, my lord?” Euron asked, pointing across his ship. “That is the Hightower itself – one of the Nine Wonders made by man.” Euron grinned. Lord Goodbrother looked at him as if he were mad. Foolish little minds. “What arrogance that is, don’t you think! For there are only Seven Great Wonders made by nature, and it is the arrogance of man to think that they can do two better! Men truly believe that they can spew forth more wonders than nature?”

His eyes were wide. “Please, my lord… if we follow, then this will be a battle we cannot win.”

Euron’s lips stretched into a mad grin. Blue wine still stained his beard. “I am a force of nature, my lord. I am fury made flesh.” He turned and bellowed to Rodrik Freeborn below. “Blow the second horn! We charge!”

The horn blew, a high-pitched screech in the wind. The Thunderer and the Dusk replied first with their flares, but the other ships followed suit. We attack with the storm. We are the storm.

Lord Goodbrother tried to object, and then Qarl the Thrall imposed over him threateningly, eyes dark, fingering two long and slender daggers on his belt. Last thing I want now is discord among the men. “Take him to oversee the scorpions on deck,” Euron ordered Qarl. “But if he questions my orders again, throw him overboard.” Seas red with blood. “Sound the commands! The plan has not changed. Signal the fleet to form up.”

The lord was walked away, his jaw tight and his face pale. “Remember where your sons are,” Euron overheard Qarl the Thrall warning Lord Goodbrother.

Above him, the clouds were churning, black and roiling. He could see the great dark storm forming, it was a pillar of the sky, an immense funnel to the gods. “Many other captains will have the same doubts, my king,” Quellon Humble warned, sticking again close by Euron’s side. “They are emboldened now, but their courage will fall when they see the size of the army we face.”

“It doesn’t matter,” Euron smirked. “As soon as we enter the bay, the wind will be smashing against their backs and they’ll be unable to flee even if they try to.”

The ironborn were starting to chant as the rowers splashed, paeans to the Drowned God echoing over the salt water. The beacons on longships stretched out before him, sea spray crashing against hundreds of ships.

Slowly, without an obvious order, the Silence started to break ranks and fall back slightly. The Silence, the Great Kraken, the Thunderer and the Dusk were all falling back towards their positions at opposite sides on the rear ranks, to cut down any longships that tried to break formation. Hopefully, in the frenzy, few of the other captains would realise that their formations were herding certain ships towards the front.

Euron had his own captains in the most vital positions. His men would destroy ironborn ships themselves, before allowing any to flee.

The excitement didn’t fade. He took another swig of shade of the evening, so he could watch the world twist around him. The blue wine dripped from stained lips, it made his head swirl, but he also felt sharper and more focused than ever.

All around them, wind grew into a frenzy. “This storm!” he heard Ralf of Lordsport call through the air. “Have you ever seen the like of it?”

“Yes,” Euron laughed as he walked forward, “in my dreams!”

Euron clambered up the sails, so he could bellow orders from the crow’s nest. He clutched the rope tightly, heavy raindrops bouncing of his Valyrian armour, feeling the whole ship shudder below. I will not die. Death cannot take me.

He hung metres off the roaring seas, bellowing and laughing so loud that even the ships either side of him could hear. “Tonight we reap the Garden! Tonight we break the Tower!” he roared. “Forward! Forward, reavers! Slam the drums and man the oars! We bring the Drowned God’s fury!”

The war drums were ringing. The ironborn fleet sailed through the storm, each man chanting and singing over the howl of the wind. “By the Drowned God’s fury!” the reavers chanted, banging axes against shields. “By salt, stone and steel! Salt, stone and steel! Salt, stone and steel!”

“What is dead may never die!” Euron bellowed.

“BUT RISES AGAIN! HARDER! STRONGER!”

Yes, he thought happily. There’s nothing like a storm and a charge to build up passions and quench rational thought.

The leading ranks were of all the smaller vessels, captured carracks or cogs or longships of a dozen oars, a fleet of the weak so thick it could blanket the sea. Oars splashed, warriors pounded drums. Every fighter was wearing heavy iron as the rowers swept saltwater to the heartbeat of war.

So many will fall to the Drowned God today, but we are ironborn. Tis a gift.

From the prow of Euron’s ship, the Damphair was screeching and wailing madly, but he couldn’t make out the words over the sound of the storm. “Bring my brother in from the prow!” Euron said to the Stonehand, like an afterthought. “Poor Aeron shouldn’t die yet. He has yet to meet his god.”

The Bay of the Whispering Sound was screaming. He felt the wind batter the ships, fighting against the current, jerking with every wave. They broke through the bay, sailing up towards the small isles scattering the harbour around the mouth of the Honeywine.
The storm only grew, until every man was struggling to wrestle with the flapping sails.

And in the distance, the blob of lights of Oldtown became clearer. They hoisted up great torches from the docks and walls, but it was too dark to make out any detail in the city. The sky was pitch black, but they could see the shadows of hundreds of vessels of the Reach, highlighted by the pinpricks of torches on their prows. Above them, the great lamp atop the Hightower shone. Like a giant flaming eye in the darkness, brighter than the moon.

The Hightower was huge. Nine hundred feet high, an absolutely gargantuan stone structure, pronged like a crown, the giant lantern glowing ghostly yellow in the dark.

Bells rung from the city, another chime in the deafening orchestra of the world. The great bell of the tower boomed like thunder.

The solid wall of vessels approached. The city was ready for a fight, and the ironborn rushed to meet them.

“We have the wind on our side!” Queer Qarl Kenning bellowed. “We sail against them and smash them with the force of the storm!”

The lights became close. The lights of a city, and strong walls and defenders filling the docks. “We have the wind.” Steffarion Sparr’s voice sounded grimmer. “But they have the numbers.”

More and more vessels became visible as the isles emerged. The Hightower sat on the Battle Isle, at the mouth of the Honeywine, while the ships streamed out from the harbour.

The ships of the green lands sailed to meet them. Their sails and hulls were covered in bright colours, banners and heraldry, stark contrast to the bleak and grey vessels of the ironborn. The fleet of the Reach pulled their sails in tightly, battering together against the winds and shouting for formation. They fastened ships together with ropes and grapnels to keep tight rank, their sails high and their oars fighting against the waves.

He saw the burgundy sails of the Arbor Queen at the front of the barricade.

Lord Paxter angles his ships prow first, Euron noted, skewed along the window and roped into formation. But he chooses to use his most valuable vessels at the front. It wasn’t an unwise decision, though it was an exploitable one.

More and more shapes took form from the darkness. Great banners of Hightower, Redwyne, Tyrell, Tarly and Rowan came into view first. The Redwyne galleys hunkered together, forming a solid wall across the harbour while the fleets of Oldtown poured in from the flanks.

Boom. Boom. Boom. The crashes exploded into the air, as sharp as thunder. Euron saw heavy shapes clattering in the air.

Their booms were so loud, it could have been thunder. From atop the Hightower itself, the arms of immense stonethrowers unravelled, launching projectiles from higher and further than any Euron had seen before. He heard the splash as they crashed into the ocean with the rain; still too early to hit any of their ships, but coming frighteningly near. They are testing their range in this wind.

Barrels filled with stones, Euron guessed. The great stonethrowers on the tower could barely aim at all in winds like these, and they had to use light and dense projectiles that would scatter in the storm. Doubtless as we get closer they’ll be supported by siege weapons from the docks and walls too. It doesn’t matter.
There was only a brief window while their trebuchets would be devastating – but after their ranks collided the greenlanders wouldn’t be able to risk firing their siege weapons without hitting their own ships.

“The Stonehouse and Lord Sunderland are raising flares to retreat!” Ralf of Lordsport shouted.

“Ignore them,” Euron ordered. “Blow the second horn again. The charge continues!”

The sharp horn blast sounded strangely forlorn amidst the storm. Euron could feel the mood changing quickly.

Oh yes. Euron could only laugh. The weakest of their number would likely break in fear, but his men were positioned to ensure none would stop the charge. My men know their duty.

Around them, the fleet’s oars were being pulled by thralls captured in the Arbor. There were thousands of farmers and fishermen that had been captured and put to work, and then whipped until all rebellion died in them. Euron promised that any thrall that could not keep pace to the drumbeat would be thrown overboard. Each time a thrall collapsed in a pool of blood and sweat, they were replaced by another prisoner from their hold. All of the oars of the ships moved sharply, frantically.

The ironborn had razed the Arbor to all hell, capturing thousands of thralls and salt wives. They will speak of the devastation I brought to the Arbor for a hundred years. Euron thought smugly. But it will be nothing compared to what I will bring to Oldtown.

Once the news of his brutality in the Redwyne Straits had spread, it was little wonder that House Tyrell had assembled such a force to face him. Even despite the wars brewing in King’s Landing, the Reach must have mustered absolutely every single man and ship they could spare to try to meet him here today. Euron saw banners bearing roses and towers, huntsmen and centaurs, knights and castles, foxes and weasels, cranes, swans and pelicans, butterflies and yellow suns, apples and horns of fruit, golden trees and oak leaves, dolphins, wyverns and lions. More heraldry than Euron recognised, or could ever care to learn.

“How many are there?” Dagon Ironmaker demanded.

“I count a hundred of Redwyne warships leading the fleet, another hundred ships supporting their rear,” Kemmet Pyke replied from the perch on the mast. “Thirty from House Hightower and Tyrell each. Another hundred assembled ships from other houses. At least two hundred so from Oldtown’s docks fill the ranks, merchant vessels and cogs included. No more than five hundred, I say.”

Five hundred vessels then, of greatly varying quality, but most were much far bigger than the standard longship. A ragtag fleet could be overcome, though, the true risk was still the warships. “They have more men than they have ships to carry them!” Lord Goodbrother warned, twitching fearfully. “Each one of their vessels will be overcrowded with swords, if they’ve even had to seize merchant ships to carry all their men.”

Whereas we are the opposite. I have over four hundred ships yet not enough fighting men to properly fill them.

“It will be the Redwyne ships that will hit us first!” Euron chuckled. “Strong galleys built for war – they will hold like a wall and crush us with their size. I expect Hightower will lead their ships along the flank, to cut through our number while we grapple with the Redwynes. The assorted ships will hold position at their rear; they can’t risk such a ragtag fleet ruining their own formation.” He scratched his beard. “Yes, Lord Paxter proves himself a capable strategist. He risks taking heavy losses against our rams, but after the charge we will only lose momentum and positioning while they will gain it.”

“Look to the east and south!” Steffarion Sparr shouted, voice cracking. “There are hosts of men on the beaches, in formation.”

Across the coasts, they could see men on horseback riding along the beaches, following the fleet. Men jabbed wooden spikes into the rocky sand, and raised roses on their banners. The thorns sought to trap them, to hold the coasts while the ships clashed. Lord Meldred Merlyn had wanted to take a force of men on the beaches too, to support the naval assault, but Euron refused. True ironborn fight at sea.

“Aye, the Tyrells mean to stop us disembarking, they pre-empt us setting a beachhead. If any of our ships go near the coast we will suffer for it,” Euron agreed. Not that it matters. I always intended this as purely a naval battle.

“How many men do think there are against us?” Dagon Ironmaker shouted. “Lord Orkwood feared forty thousand.”

Euron shook his head. “No, we’ve made our intentions very clear, and they’ve met us in kind. I expect sixty thousand.”

There was a mumble through the men. “We will give glory to the Drowned God tonight,” the Stonehand mumbled.

Oh yes we will. Nine thousand against sixty. Absolutely perfect. They will remember this as the greatest victory since the Fields of Fire.

There were more booms. The stonethrowers had launched another volley, and this time he heard screams and crashes. Wood shattering under the force of rock. The first deaths of the night, at the fringes of their front rank. Dozens dead maybe, but it wasn’t enough.

More and more screams, and Euron could barely make out half of them.

“Garrison on the Bloody Isle! More trebuchets being readied!”

“I see reserves on the wall!”

“There are forces on the starboard and port taking position!” another voice called, cracked with fear. “They mean to trap us in the harbour!”

Euron could see the longbows and scorpions being readied. Then there were horns blown from their rear.

“My king!” Kemmett Pyke bellowed, loud enough to cut through all others. “Lights to our rear! Fifty or so heavy cogs!”

They heard the whine of distress horns to their rear. He saw longships raising red flares. Euron was totally unsurprised, but a ripple of fear started to pass through the Silence. So even my men can still feel nerves. They are only mortal, I suppose. “But of course,” Euron laughed. “Lord Paxter has entrapped us. While we chased after his vessels, he left a small but heavy force behind the cape, to follow us as we chased the main fleet. He means to entrap us in the Honeywine.”

And yet his trap only serves us. One of Euron’s biggest concerns had been if his own ironborn would desert him in the battle. By entrapping them with a rear force, Lord Paxter Redwyn had quite helpfully ensured that no ironborn would escape even if their courage did break. Between the trap and the storm, there was no choice but to fight to the death. Trapped men would fight crazed.

A few men gawked at him. “There will be no retreat in this battle,” Euron promised. “But what do enemies behind us matter, when we will be attacking forward?”

He saw Lord Goodbrother’s face was pale and his eyes wide. The man might have been trying to speak, but the experienced captain could only stammer in fear. Euron had taken steps to ensure this would be a battle that held nothing back.

Yes, they are in a good position. They will expect a bitter battle, but one that they would win. Lord Redwyne's trap would embolden them to commit as many men as they had into the battle. The Reach intended to slaughter the ironborn soundly, and so they were holding little back. And thank you for that, for my plan only works if both sides clash in full force.

He hadn’t been sure whether or not the defenders would try to hole up in Oldtown. That would have been bad – trying to lay siege to the city would go poorly for Euron. Instead, he had needed to provoke them into meeting him with force. He spent his time razing the fields of the Arbor into ash, and taking slaves by the thousands, to provoke the Reach so badly that they would have no choice but to muster an army to crush him. They would not allow him to bring such destruction to their precious green lands, so they had rallied every farmer’s boy and greybeard in all the land to fight.

That they were able to gather such a host even despite how occupied Mace Tyrell was in King’s Landing… it was a testament to how gravely Euron had provoked them.

It had taken months of planning for this very moment. First, he had to embolden his own army with easy victories in the Shields and the Arbor. Then, he had to make sure there was no one to deny him when ordered to a full-scale assault on Oldtown. All of the objectionable voices in his fleet, his brother included, had been quietly weeded out or distracted.

It hadn’t been easy. Even among ironborn, it had been a tall order to convince nine thousand men to sail into the bloodiest battle of their lives. Euron had no delusions about how many would be surviving.

Let’s see… Lord Paxter Redwyne commands the battle from the Arbor Queen, while one of the Hightower’s sons leads the rear from Honour of Oldtown. Garlan Tyrell will likely lead the force on either the Bloody Isle or the docks.

There was nothing to be done about the heavy siege weapons on the Battle Isle, they could only be endured. He had seen them gathering in the glass candles.

The Honeywine was a deep and slow river. So many ships blanketed the black, churning waters. The sound of the drums and oars felt like the frenzied heartbeat of an enormous god.

The sky seemed to crack. The rain poured from the rumbling clouds, heavy droplets splashing over axes and helms. The beats of the drums seemed to grow into a frenzy.

“It seems the Drowned God won’t allow defeat either! Can you hear him blowing his horn?” Euron shouted as the sky crackled. “The Drowned God has called forth a storm for us! The only way forward is over the ruins of our enemies!”

“This is madness!” Dagon Ironmaker trembled, struggling to clamber against the wind. “They are lining up prow first! We cannot ram against a formation like that!”
“We can. Brave men can do whatever they want.” They just won’t survive doing it.

The first salvo of arrows filled the sky. Euron heard men in the front ranks screaming, clutching shields, trying to take shelter while still rowing.

“What commands from the front?” Steffarion Sparr gasped.

“That would be the Lords Codd, Sharp and Myre, with Harlaw and Stonetree not far behind.”

“Tis a slaughter,” the young man gasped. Another boulder fell from the air, and a longship shattered into splinters. The sounds of screams, waves and snapping wood all mixed together in an immense boom.

The front row of longships collided with the Redwyne formation. One after another, like bloated ants trying to swarm giants. The longships looked so tiny compared to the bulk of the galleys. Euron could hear the screams even above the storm as the arrows cut them down. He had given the privilege of leading the front rank to a select few reavers, all of them sons of salt wives or lesser lords.

More and more flares requesting asking to retreat were raised, but Euron didn’t return them. They would all look to the Silence for their lead, but the Silence was merciless. “Raise the red banner,” Euron ordered. “Make sure every ship knows to keep the charge.”

Besides Euron, Quellon Humble shook his head grimly. “It’s a bloody slaughter,” he muttered. “Longships that size don’t stand a chance against ships like that.”

“They were never meant to.”

Euron’s grin widened. The Redwyne ships were slaughtering one longship after another, but he could still see the warships hesitating. They are starting to realise, Euron thought happily.

The sounds coming from the breaking longships were not the cries of warriors.

“Do you want to know what every ship I placed in the front rank has in common?” Euron chuckling, his smiling eye shining. “They are all full of slaves. Every single one of them has their hulls filled to the brim with thralls taken from the Arbor.”

From ahead of them, he could hear the screams of panic and pain as arrows and bolts shredded the hulls to pieces. The Arbor fleet looked to be shifting and shouting – the men on board must have finally noticed that the men they were shooting at weren’t enemies.

That wreckage started to fill the bay, shattered husks of longships grinding against the Arbor fleet in the waves. It was a slaughter, but not of ironborn. The churning salt waters began to darken with red.

Hundreds dead, maybe. But this is just beginning.

“Aye, Lord Paxter is killing more of his own people than he is mine,” Euron chuckled, before shouting. “Signal the second rank to assault! All sails forward!”

The second rank was more of the same; there were at least twenty thralls and slaves for every one ironborn. Another set of sacrificial goats. By now, Lord Redwyne’s men must be feeling rather unnerved.

Lord Goodbrother stared at him with horror. “This is your formation… sending ships to the slaughter en masse! What are you doing here??”

Euron laughed. “They want blood, I will give them blood. I will send more and more ships at him; until they run out of arrows and their men’s courage breaks. Let them listen to the screams of our slaves – let them kill their own smallfolk one after another.”

Euron knew that at least a dozen of those longships had been filled solely with children. Even hardened soldiers weren’t emotionless. And they’re greenlanders. Not ironborn.

If Lord Paxter broke ranks to try and rescue the slaves, he risked letting ironborn through. And yet, if he didn’t, his men would become more and more distressed.

Even in the dark, even in the spraying salt, Euron could see it. The hulls of Redwyne’s galleys were losing formation, all the while the wreckage of longships drifted against them. Bodies floated thick in the water, some of them still screaming. Euron saw slaves and thralls begging for mercy, trying uselessly to clamber up Redwyne's hulls to escape the churning waters. Lord Redwyne must know they couldn’t break formation to rescue them, but that wasn’t an easy thing for mortal men to accept.

And that's why he will lose. He cares about things like innocence or justice. ‘Morality’, Euron had to stop himself laughing with the thought. He is only mortal. I will be something greater.

The men of the Arbor fleet were panicking, losing control. The wind and waves and the wreckage were taking their toll. Many ships cut down the enslaved smallfolk climbing onto their decks, fleeing the salt. Others lost their rank to rescue as many as they could. Redwyne’s formation, his wall of a hundred galleys, began to splinter.

But from behind, the cogs attacking the ironborn’s rear were quickly enclosing, entrapping them into the bay.

“Signal the third rank!” Euron ordered. “Break their formation apart!”

The Silence sat on the fifth rank, along with the bulk of his main strength. He could see the battle coming closer. Wreckage groaned against the galleys. Lord Waldon Winch and Hotho Harlaw were doing a valiant job holding back the Hightower ships moving in from the starboard flank, but Euron wanted his true force focused at the Redwyne warships. Like a lance to their shield.

More and more arrows and stones fell from the sky. Shafts poured like the rain, great boulders crashed like thunder.

Their losses were drastic already, but the tide of ironborn didn’t stop – as relentless as the waves and growing more and more frantic. All above him, the ships were being forced into the meatgrinder one after another, and Euron could feel the air slipping into pure chaos.

“The King Joffrey’s Valour is taking the line!” the Stonehand announced, banging his axe against his shield.

“Then let us beat the drums for our valiant flagship!” Euron cackled through the wind. “Beat the drums! Beat them louder!”

The King Joffrey’s Valour shuddered uncertainly in the waves. The huge galleas was wobbling, threatening to keel and sloping in the rocky water, but its huge sails pushed it forward. It was the largest ship in the ironborn armada, but barely even seaworthy. Arrows and scorpion bolts pierced its hull, its mast quivering, but the galleas tumbled straight into the wall of wreckage.
The ship was all oak and solid construction. Even without its oars, the huge sails swept it forward—an unstoppable mass in a straight charge. The captain didn’t back down for a second.

_Brave Eldred Codd_, Euron thought. _He knows what is expected of him._ “Forward!” Euron boomed. “Their lines will be breaking, forward!”

In the dark, he glimpsed ironborn jumping off the hull into the water. Bodies pouring into the churning waters. The _King Joffrey’s Valour_ was groaning, tearing itself apart, but pounding towards two of the great warships. They tried to flee out of the way, but their ranks were too tight and they couldn’t turn into the headwind. He could see their men were panicking, the storm was pushing them backwards almost as much as the ironborn were.

Euron recognised the galley with yellow and green sails; a great warship, the _Pride of the Reach_. The _King Joffrey’s Valour_ crashed straight into it.

When they collided, Euron felt the immense thud, a boom shocking through the water. Screams, panic, solid oak splintering into pieces. The grinding of solid wood, splintering under pure force.

He saw the _King Joffrey’s Valour_ buckle and capsize, turning over itself as the wind swept up the pieces. The _Pride of the Reach_ broke, a great rent torn into its side, and then both immense vessels were twisting in the water. Ropes snapped and men desperately leapt overboard, bodies churning in the waves.

On-board the _Silence_, the men were clanging their shields to the beat of screams. “You sent those men to their deaths,” Lord Goodbrother gasped. “All of those men…”

“My men walked willingly.” Euron said with a smirk. “My men know that godliness demands sacrifice.” _I spent a long time teaching them such._

“All forward!” the Stonehand was bellowing to the rowers. “Faster! Forward! Forward!”

All around him, ships were being crushed into wrecks. The _Gargoyle_ and the _Silverfin_ had collided against the _Honour of Oldtown_, the _Nightflyer_ crashing against the _Vigil_. He saw the _Great Kraken_ crushing the _Wise King Urrigon_, and then the _Hatchet’s Edge_ struggling against a great cog with purple sails and a spiked ram.

Their flanks were collapsing inwards. His army was left mad with fear, but they would charge forward into the meatgrinder because there was no choice of retreat. The storm and wind howled like a mad beast.

Still, he saw the formation of the Redwyne fleet slipping. The _Arbor Queen_ was left flailing against the tide of bodies and wreckage. There were men on the flotsam, hacking bodies, raining arrows and churning waters. Survivors in the ocean fought frantically to stay afloat, hands clawing uselessly at the sleek hulls. Euron didn’t stop to rescue anyone.

_Lord Paxter chose to meet us on the water, his great warships first. Let us make him regret that choice._

“So signal the _Thunderer_ and the _Dusk_,” Euron ordered. “Bring us into the battle.”

In front of them, the _King Joffrey’s Valour_ had split into half. One half was sinking, yet the other half was still dragging the _Pride of the Reach_ down with it. It gave Euron one last chuckle at _King’s Joffrey Valour_.

“The port rank is being slaughtered!” Lord Goodbrother screamed. “Hotho Humpback raises a distress flare, and the Leviathan’s Wail is taking on water. They’re breaking us from the sides.”

Damn, I’ve taken on too many new crewmembers, Euron cursed. He had to – he had needed spread his loyal and proven men out over the fleet – but in doing so he been required to refill the Silence’s own ranks with new ironborn. They were all seasoned warriors, the veterans of many raids, but they weren’t the men who had sailed with the Silence from Valyria to Ibben to Asshai. My old crew would never be so cowardly.

“And we will break them from the front. I told you; there will be no retreat here, my lord,” Euron replied, before turning to the Stonehand. In the choppy waves, he needed to clutch the roping so tight it hurt. “Bring the Golden Antler into the fight. We take down the Dusk and the Thunderer charge the Gardener’s Glory."

“Leave them, let Lord Paxter flail against the headwind. We have done our damage; abandon the assault against the centre and focus on the starboard side.”

“‘Done’ our damage?” Lord Goodbrother shouted incredulously. “We’ve lost over a quarter of our ships and for what? Half a dozen of theirs? They’re slaughtering us here!"

We broke their formation. In a battle like this, as soon as their formations break everything snaps. “Aye, and can you not see the crack in their rank? Lord Redwyne is struggling to keep control. We charge the Golden Antler leading their starboard and the Arbor Queen will have to tack to intervene. She’ll fall back in the wind, we open up the crack a bit more, and then the Great Kraken will drive in the lance.” Euron laughed madly, taking another swig of shade of the evening. “Push through them, turn their numbers into a weakness!”

The wreckage of broken ships bounced off their hull. The black scorpions of the Silence thudded, firing flaming bolts ahead. The ocean was screaming. Some of his men called for ropes to throw to the bodies in the water.

“Leave them,” Euron ordered. “We will not rescue cravens, and if they were true ironborn then they would have sunk.”

Flailing hands scraped at his ship, bodies trying desperately to stay afloat. One man grabbed a hold of an oar and almost managed to pull himself aboard, until a mute put an arrow in his eye.

The Oldtown fleet didn’t look so well-positioned now. Large galleys were not manoeuvrable. As soon as we push through them, they will struggle to turn to face us. Their own ships will block each other as we push deeper into their ranks.

The battle would turn close and bloody. It is time for my Grotesques to prove their worth.

Arrows thudded against their hull. Both the Golden Antler and Gardener’s Glory were bracing for the Silence. A ship bearing a green huntsman on their port was coming into intercept them. The galleys had the mass, but the longships had the speed and momentum. “Bring in the sails and twist to port!” Euron bellowed. “Prepare to ram and prepare to board. Rorq, you’re leading the charge over the prow!”

Euron turned to Rorq. The Tyroshi was short and scarred, grim and one-eyed. He had a hooked blade instead of a right hand, and a spear in his left. Euron had cut off Rorq’s right hand years ago, during a fit of rage.
“What say you, Rorq?” Euron asked. “Do you have any qualms going prow to deck?”

“None, my king,” Rorq grumbled, bowing deeply. “For the glory of our god.”

“Good man.” Euron turned back to Lord Goodbrother. The fat lord was trembling in his chainmail. “There is no fear of death on this vessel, my lord. We are holy men; each one is worth ten cravens.”

Lord Goodbrother looked at him, and then at his crew, as if they were all monsters. They were.

The noise and the chaos was reaching fever pitch. Two boulders from the stonethrowers crashed to either side of the ship, making it shudder on the water. Many of the crew were screaming or panicking, but not Euron’s men. The Silence’s killers were emerging from the hold, mute and scarred men clutching barbed weapons. He saw Mall the Monstrous clutching a warhammer with his one good hand, and booming orders in his grumbling, lispy voice.

It was a good time to clear the decks. The Silence had ramed many ships before, but few in winds like these, with this speed and force. Euron stumbled, still drinking wine, as he pulled himself towards the stairs.

“Signal Ghrazzac,” Euron ordered to Mall as he passed. “His time is coming up.”

Around them, Euron watched the Great Kraken break ranks, turning portside to meet a cog spitting flaming pots. The Honour of Oldtown was shoving its way through smaller ships and into their lines. The ironborn were folding, but there was no retreat. The Stonehand was screaming on deck while the waves rocked. “Brace!” the voice bellowed. “Brace! Brace! Brace!”

The galleys were so close that Euron could hear men screaming the same from the Golden Antler. The mouthless iron maiden cresting the Silence’s prow gleamed eerily in the smoky gloom.

Euron went below deck, and calmly took his position hiding under the stairs. He sat down on the wet wood, placed his feet upwards, and braced for impact.

Still, the Stonehand’s voice shouted on repeat, growing in pitch and trying to drown out the chaos. “Brace! Brace! Brace!”

Euron took his position clutching to the ropes on the stairway below deck, taking a deep breath in the dark. He had no interest in being on deck for the fighting, not yet. Beneath the stairway, a mumbling gasping shape discarded in the fighting. Euron grinned as he recognised the gaunt figure.

It had taken three men to drag Aeron Greyjoy up from the prow, but the man was all bone and rags. Euron’s men must have had dumped the Damphair down the stairs beneath deck during all the chaos. Aeron was a man on death’s door, his arms so frail he couldn’t even pull himself up.

Instead, Euron shuffled himself closer to his brother. Euron kneeled down and wrapped his arms around the Damphair’s shoulders, holding him securely and bracing for collision. His gauntleted hand softly stroked Aeron’s gaunt cheek. The man tried to squirm, but he was weak, delirious. Euron’s grip was gentle, comforting.

“This is the moment, brother,” Euron whispered softly into Aeron’s ear. “These are the last days, when the world will be broken and remade. Kneel, bother. I am your king, your god. Worship me, see my divinity, and I will raise you to be my priest.”

“You… You…” Aeron wheezed weakly. “You are mad…”
Euron only laughed.

The Silence was trembling. He could hear the arrows thudding, the rain pounding and the storm howling. Still, that voice bellowed intensely, “BRACE! Now, brace! Brace, brace, brace…!”

“Just keep your eyes open, brother,” Euron whispered. “Watch me and see true power.”

You will bow before me. I have seen it.

With that, he yanked Aeron’s salt-soaked long hair, pulled his head backwards, and poured the shade of the evening down his brother’s throat. The man sputtered and gasped, drowning in the blue wine. Why can’t you see what I see?

Euron let Aeron fall, sputtering and he gulped down the last of the shade of the evening in the skin himself. Blue-white light filled the air, a bolt of lightning bursting against the Hightower.

Everything blurred. There was one final, strangled scream, “BRA–”

The boom was tremendous. Euron kept his legs pinned up against the wall, but the impact still nearly snapped his spine.

The ships collided. The sound was more intense than thunder. First there were screams, and then there was nothing but grinding wood against the iron lady of the Silence. Solid iron crunched, tearing the figurehead off the prow.

Wood screeched, men shrieked. Two ships were groaning against each other, but the Silence pushed its way through. The Golden Antler was bigger, but the Silence moved faster and more fiercely.

Euron almost crumpled with the crash, but he was laughing through the pain in his chest. All around him, reavers and Grotesques were bursting out on to deck, and men screeching for more grapnels, more arrows and more shields.

In his arms, the Damphair was wailing nonsensically, like a mewling babe. The sound reminded Euron of his childhood, and the creaking of the rusted iron hinge.

He heard thuds so loud that they drowned out the storm. The Thunderer and the Dusk collided next to them, bringing their main force to bear. The rear ranks of the ironborn had joined the battle with their most powerful ships, and he could feel the Redwyne fleet buckling.

They were breaking into the harbour.

All around him, the world was red. With the shade of the evening pulsing through his body, Euron could see so, so clearly. The white veins in the sky were breaking, and the world itself was bleeding.

“More blood,” Euron gasped. “I need more blood.”

He tripped as he stumbled to his feet, clutching the rope with both hands against the quivering ocean. He had to drag himself up onto the deck, and the Golden Antler was already breaking against the force of the Silence. Euron’s Grotesques had been released – every freak, mute and murderer the Silence had to offer, burst over the deck.

He saw Rorq leap over the prow and onto the deck, only to miss horribly and bounce into the water, limbs crushing. The men behind him didn’t even hesitate as they jumped after him.
The ram had split the Golden Antler’s hull open, and Rorq’s vanguard was already slaughtering the men on the crippled ship. He saw iron lady from the Silence’s prow left jammed into the rent on the through ship’s deck.

Euron saw Kemmet Pyke crumple out of the masts and thud onto the red decks, with an arrow in his eye. The rocking took his body into the frothing red waves.

Lord Goodbrother was left crazed in panic, but the Stonehand stepped up. “Raise the sails to starboard, pull tight!” the Stonehand bellowed. “We push through! Through!”

Euron could see the Thunderer ramming the Gardener’s Glory, and then the Tarly vessel rammed them. All around him, ships collided one after another. The wind had pushed them all backwards towards the harbour of Oldtown, and all order collapsed.

There were no more stones being launched from the Hightower. The ships were left metres apart, pushing through each other.

“The Great Kraken has fallen!” Euron didn’t know who was screaming, but the voice was quivering with fear. “The Honour of Oldtown has brought her down.”

“Forward!” the shout continued. “Forward, forward, forward!”

The Golden Antler was done, but his reavers were left to fall with it. The Silence was already breaking through the ranks, and the galleys couldn’t turn to stop her. Then the Dusk was through too, and then the Nightflyer, and then the Gargoyle…

“Give them all to the Drowned God!” Quellon Humble bellowed, swinging an axe. “What is dead may never die!”

But rises again! the chant of men replied. “Stronger! Harder!”

Others ships were chanting too. He saw the Gardener’s Glory capsizing in the wind. Warships burning, bodies thick in the water.

“More blood,” Euron growled, and then raised his voice. “More blood!”

He drew both his swords. Nightfall in his left, Red Rain in his right. The world was churning, spasming, bleeding.

Cogs came to meet them. Arrows, ropes and men. The two ships scraped against each other, and then soldiers were jumping the gap from both ways. Euron saw bodies crashing, men with swords and boiled leathers, but they weren’t even human to him now. They were just corpses that hadn’t yet fallen.

Valyrian steel flashed. This time, Euron was at the front of the battle. Two bodies fell, then three, then five, then six…

“More blood!” Euron heard someone screaming. It was his voice. “We need more blood!”

The cog was burning. The Silence pushed its way through, yet there was another ship to the right. The ships and flotsam were so thick that a man might have walked all the way across the harbour, but the water churned so violently. No more battle lines here, only crazed frenzy.

So many screams that the ocean seemed alive.
Even the most veteran reaver had never, ever experienced a battle like this. There was something in the air that turned men berserk with panic. The storm had a bloodthirsty edge to it.

The Thunderer collapsed, but its men were still fighting. Euron glimpsed the Red Oarsman, spear lunging, defiant to the last as he cut a bloody path through Tarly men with his spear.

On the Silence’s other side, the Gargoyle was burning. Euron heard Hotho Humpback wailing and shrieking as the ship went down.

“Blow the horn, Rodrik!” Euron bellowed. “Blow the horn!”

From below deck, the third horn blew. It was a strangled, desperate cry, like the cry of a painsed animal. Rodrik Freeborn did his duty – he strapped himself in and blew the horns. The third horn was a signal for Euron’s loyal men, with orders he didn’t trust to most captains.

Heavy footsteps clambered out onto deck. Euron saw Ghrazzac stepping out as he hoisting a flailing, screaming body who was wrestling uselessly against the Brindled Man’s bulk. The Brindled Man knew no fear, no disobedience. The man being carried was bald and clad in filthy, shredded blue robes with blue lips, screaming nonsensically. “Pryat, pryat!” the warlock screamed, right up until Ghrazzac tore open the man’s throat with his beefy hands and threw the thrashing body out into the red water.

There were other Grotesques behind Ghrazzac, each marching mages up from the hull to be slaughtered and given the waves.

Euron had given his men explicit orders; when the time came, they were to kill every mage, warlock and spellbinder on-board and toss their bodies overboard, one after another. Execute them all until it was enough.

The death of a single mage was sacrifice enough to bring forth a storm. Euron would sacrifice hundreds to bring forth a god.

Ships crashed. The decks were littered with arrows and bodies. Lord Redwyne had planned this battle for a mortal, sane man, but Euron had given him a storm instead. Their men were panicked, frightened. The battle was turning, and the Redwyne fleet was suffering losses they had never expected. It sounded like the sky itself was applauding.

Euron felt himself howl with laughter. “She’s keeling!” a voice called. “The Arbor Queen is keeling!”

He saw the burgundy sails of the great flagship ahead. Their masts were tearing trying to fight the wind. “We bring her down!” Euron bellowed. Lightning flashed, so close the booming thunder was instantaneous. The mast of a ship exploded into blazing sparks. “Paint the sea red! We need more blood!”

He stepped to the prow, staring around him. There were crew boats in the water, and fighting on every deck. Waves smashed and ships crashed, and all the while the mad, maniac laughter burst from Euron’s throat. Visions of red, black and white swirled before his eyes.

“Can you not feel it?” He screamed. “Can you not feel the heavens applauding us? The sea is rumbling – the Drowned God hungers!”

Bodies wrestling on the deck, arrows falling. He heard screams for the rowers to push forward, forcing their way through the wreckage churning in the waves. In the middle of the battle, Euron stood and laughed.
“We stand at the dawn of a new age! The storm that will break the earth and shatter the heavens! The bleeding star bespoke the end, these are the final days and a gibbering god will be raised from the graves and charnel pits to forth bring their end!” Euron shrieked as his swords swept left and right, each stroke a bloody brush painting the world red. “Feel the beating of the world, feel the waves, feel the wind! Feel the force of all nature itself swirling around us, that is what we give blood for, that is ineffable truth for which we sacrifice our bodies!

“There is no tribute more sacred than that of an axe through a skull! No greater glory than killing and dying for a higher power. Divinity is blood – the gods are built from pain and death and devotion! The drowned men gave you naught but tales and stories of gods and glories, but I can give shape to myth!”

The warship in front of them was blazing in blood-red flames as the waves swallowed it, men disappearing into the dark water. “For every man that falls into the water, we rise up! Rise up to greater heights, and the glory of eternal sacrifice! There is no place for fear or hesitation – this is my gift. You will all bear witness to the rise of a god, what is the value of your lives compared to that?”

Bodies fell, faster and faster. Euron saw Torwold Browntooth take an axe through the skull. “We have a new destiny before us, waiting for our grasp,” Euron screamed, “and we must leap for it! Leap for it and fly!”

He was still screaming maniacally, the words almost nonsensical, as a cog crashed into the port of the Silence. The ship cracked, and groaned as the waves and wind wrestled around it.

Then they were all the way through the harbour, pushing against the Battle Isle and right underneath the Hightower itself. The defenders were struggling to force their way through each other to stop the ironborn, but the storm never ceased.

The ocean shuddered as the Arbor Queen smashed through the Nightflyer. Lord Waldon Wynch didn’t stand a chance. The flagship was recovering, reclaiming its might. She was a strong ship, twisting in front of the Silence like a leviathan. Even when caught against the wind and attacked from the rear, the Arbor Queen didn’t fall – the great galleas was too large even for the Silence to ram.

There was a huge groan, and the Silence shook so violently Euron felt his entire body bounce. Men were swashed off the deck as she jerked, swept away like insects helpless in the elements. The sails, Euron saw. He could see the wood tearing, almost in slow motion. Solid planks rippled like paper. The black sails of his ship had finally cracked, tearing off the main mast. Ropes snapped and the rigging buckled.

The mast collided against the deck so hard the impact rattled his bones, and the whole ship was sloping.

Men were struggling to keep control. Ahead of him, he saw the Arbor Queen pushing her way through. The Redwyne fleet had suffered in the ironborn charge, but now the longships were losing against the wind too and the fleet of the Reach was rallying. The rocks of the Battle Isle were before them, and the furious currents crushed ships against the shallows.

“Retreat?” The thought was outrageous. Are these mortals really so blind? Why can no one see what I can?

“Retreat!” Lord Goodbrother shrieking, voice cracking. “Rally whatever ships we still can, try to force our way out of the harbour! We have lost!”

Euron shook his head. “How many times must I say it, my lord? There will be no retreat here. Rally the ships to attack, we focus on the Arbor Queen. There is still more blood to be spilled.”

The lord’s face twisted in pure horror, stammering as he tried to speak. It looked like the lord had soiled himself. “You’re – you’re… they’re crushing us, we can’t–”

Euron drew Red Rain and placed it under the lord’s throat. The Valyrian steel blade came so close it drew a dribble of blood from his chin. “I told you. We need more blood,” Euron growled, but he was still grinning. “Now, I would prefer it if it they were the ones to bleed, but if not your blood will suffice. Do you understand?” Eyes bulged but there was nothing from the lord’s throat but frenzied gasps. “Now get on with the bloodletting!”

“Blow the fourth horn!” the Stonehand bellowed. “Blow the fourth horn and press together to attack!”

The noise rang out as, below deck, Rodrik Freeborn blew the great auroch’s horn. It was a sharper pitch than the others, like a knife cutting through the battlefield. The signal for the final push.

Euron heard horn blasts from the Arbor’s Queen as well, calling the defenders together. The two flagships were barely five hundred feet apart.

My men know what to do, Euron thought. They are all well-prepared for the fourth horn.

From below the deck, Euron heard the screams from the rowers. There was the sound of axes hacking, feet stomping through the ship, and the thud of dying flesh. Frenzied screams and abrupt silences. The fourth horn was the signal for Mall the Monster to slaughter every single rower on the Silence. One by one, the reavers cut through the chained, helpless men and dumped their bodies into the water.

Similar sounds were coming from other ships. He could see the bodies pouring from their hulls, a waterfall of corpses. Every thrall or salt wife that the ironborn had left was to be slaughtered and given to the waves.

Any man who was no longer contributing to the killing could instead help by contributing to the dying. It was simple maths, really; Euron just wanted to maximise the amount of blood. It did not strictly matter whose.

Lord Goodbrother was shouting, demanding to know what was happening, what was going on, but Euron only laughed. He reckoned that even the Redwyne fleet was left shocked to see the ironborn turning on their own crew and dumping the corpses.

Some ironborn tried to object. There was fighting on the remaining longships in panic, but Euron’s killers were all ready. From the Leviathan’s Wail nearby, he saw Lord Volmark protesting. His objections died when Left-Hand Lucas Codd, Euron’s man, cut his dagger across the lord’s throat.

First there were scores, then hundreds, thousands of bodies falling and splashing one by one into the salt. Not enough. I need tens of thousands.

Even in the dark, Euron could see the red water plume outwards.
“MORE BLOOD!” Euron screeched. His desperate pants for air were half-gasps and half-chuckles. “We need… more… blood!”

Somehow, even amidst all the noise, Euron heard Aeron clutching at the railing, chanting to his god in a frantic voice. Soon, brother. Soon.

Euron saw Urgard and seven other mages being walked out of the hull by Ghrazzac. Urgard gave one final glance towards Euron with sullen, resigned eyes, before bringing a bone knife across his own throat. The other spellcasters did the same, blood weeping from their necks, as they stumbled overboard and into the churning seas, blood pouring, gibbering and hooting bile.

The Silence’s fanatics didn’t need to be forced, not anymore. They gave their own lives willingly.

Euron was almost sad to see Urgard go. Almost. He felt far more jubilation with the thought of their sacrifice. Urgard knew what was required of him. Ghrazzac was emptying Euron’s hull quicker now, dumping bodies until there were none left.

Blood is the only currency the gods accept. The storm growled voraciously and the sky blackened like whirring ash.

There were birds in the air. Crows and ravens and black shapes all swirling around the stormy harbour. Wrecks of ships crashing against the rocks, and so, so many corpses. It would be a feast.

Even missing its main mast, the Silence pushed forward for its final charge. There was no holding anything back this time – Euron was on the front ranks, both red and black blades in his hands and laughter on his lips.

The shadow of the Hightower had never seemed so high. Arrows were raining all around them, but Euron knew all of them would miss him. He could see all of the corpses before him, just waiting to die.

The ships crashed. The storm howled.

The Silence buckled, its prow ripped apart. Redwyne men were spilling from the decks of the Arbor Queen, men in boiled leather and armed with rapiers. Men afraid to wear heavy steel. Euron stood at the edge of his sinking ship, clad in Valyrian steel, both swords swiping left and right, high and low, slashing and stabbing as if hacking through vines. They weren’t even men to him – the blood just poured out of their bodies like pierced wineskins.

The ocean was thick with corpses. Tens of thousands were dead already – the fighting broke through the harbour and reached the edge of the docks themselves. Men were on the wharves, trying to fire arrows into the churning ships.

Euron saw brave ironborn staggering over bridges made of wreckage, axes in hand as they charged to a frantic, bloody end. The Drowned God took all of their bodies home.

The ironborn fleet was devastated, but the Reach’s fleet had suffered for it too. Maybe there were barely a tenth part of the ironborn still fighting, but there were tens of thousands of corpses and wrecks littering the bay.

Nearly there, so close…

He heard Aeron wailing. Lord Goodbrother was left clutching the broken mast’s stump, hanging on for his pathetic life. Men’s courage broke and their ranks shattered, but they were all just more sacrifices to the deep dark.
Grapnels hung all around the Silence’s railings, as the Arbor Queen tried to drag her in. Euron wondered if Lord Paxter was watching above from the decks, grim-faced, as his men overpowered his broken flagship. The thought pushed Euron to move a little faster, swing a little harder, as he danced over the waves and broken planks and cleaved men down one by one…

Just a few more… just a few more…

Red Rain splattered. Blood gushed over the planks.

And Euron heard the storm crack. The ships quaked with the sound of thunder. Thunder coming from beneath the sea.

The breath he didn’t realise he had been holding exploded from his throat. He felt his heart pounding so hard it might explode from his chest. For a brief second, his laughter drowned out the storm as the sea broke.

A wave, larger than any before, swelled in the harbour. There was only one brief moment of warning as the tidal wave crashed against the coast with an immense groan. Soldiers were washed straight off the decks, vessels shuddering. The ship was groaning, the wind howling, and then suddenly there was a louder, deeper roar filling the chaos.

In that moment… he was smeared in blood, his heart racing, his hands trembling and he looked out over the bloodied stormy seas… and in that moment he was a god.

This is my storm. The last storm, as was promised to me.

Another great wave hit them. Euron dived to the decks, jumping for the broken mast and clinging on for dear life. The whole ship buckled – but few people on deck managed to brace in time, and bodies were washed off by the impact. The Arbor Queen trembled. Euron heard the cries. The Redwyne sailors had to cut the grapnels and try to brace themselves, lest the fierce waves bring them down too.

Even the great Arbor Queen rocked like a toy boat in a bathtub.

The world was spinning. There was no thought, just panic. He felt the bone-crunching crack as the shattered husk of the Silence crunched against the rock.

Each impact threatened to shatter bones. The waves cracked against the broken ship, grinding it again and again. The keel was shattered, prow falling apart, and it was all Euron could do just to hold on. Every time the blows slammed his body against the wood, he could feel the bruises forming on his chest. There was blood in his mouth.

And yet he laughed. Despite the pain and the fear, he laughed and laughed.

There were barely a dozen left alive on-board, all screaming and trying to cling to the broken rigging, but the sacrifice of the others had been so worth it.

Over the dark horizon, at the mouth of the bay, Euron saw the water swell upwards.

The backwash alone scattered great ships as if they were nothing but flies. The Oldtown fleet was being washed wild, whole ships lifting upwards and crashing into the city's wharves.

The noise, the chaos, the sight of it… it was all beyond immense. Cacophonous.

Euron could barely hear a thing over the immense boom, but he saw Aeron shrieking and praying.
The drowned man would have fallen to his knees if not for hanging on for dear life. Yes, Euron thought happily, I told you that you would bow to me.

“By the God…!” he heard Lord Goodbrother scream.

“Yes,” Euron called, voice breaking. “The God indeed… the Drowned God’s chosen… they are the true masters of the ocean, not men…!”

The waves were breaking, water gushing over the piers and into the city as the gargantuan shape rose upwards from the ocean. The sea spilled over its banks, sweeping through the city’s streets and tearing through the walls of Oldtown. The men didn’t stand a chance. They looked upon it and went mad.

Screams. So many screams, but they were like the hissing of flies compared to the monster.

“The Old Ones!” Euron cackled. “I summoned it here and it is here!”

A great tentacle rose up from the black waters, stretching and uncoiling. Hard, spiny skin broke over the crests. A gaping mouth opened, and the roar it let forth was a thousand storms exploding at once.

The kraken wreaked pure devastation with every slight movement. He saw its body rise upwards, a endless pit of black teeth as its jaws unfolded.

The backwash swept a dozen ships straight into the kraken’s maw. Hundreds and hundreds of black teeth ground through wood with ease. It was large enough to swallow whole ships and the men onboard in the same way a whale swallowed krill.

Not even the thunder itself could drown out that noise.

The kraken. The heraldry of the Greyjoys. There was no beast that better represented the Drowned God. The storm, the black ocean itself made flesh.

The people didn’t believe they existed – they preferred to think of them as they would giants and dragons, unicorns and basilisks; as something historical and mythical, fit only for the fantasies of children. Perhaps it was just the sense of scale – men didn’t want to accept the truth that they shared their oceans with such as this. That they were not the masters of this world. Euron knew better; he knew of the krakens, of the Old Ones in their black depths.

It was Euron’s second time seeing such a creature. The first had been eight years ago, on Euron’s first journey around the Stepstones. He had seen a Ibbenese whaler struggle to bring in a whale, when a typhoon struck. The Silence had set to attack the whaler, but the kraken emerged from the depths, and dragged the entire ship and her whale both under the waves.

Euron hunted the black lore. The ruins of the mazemakers of Lorath, the forgotten scrolls of dead, cyclopean Sarnath, the barnacled runestones of the Grey King, the humanleather-bound tomes of corpse-city Stygai. The rituals of the chittering flesh-priests of Gogossos, the pagan idolatry of the fishfolk of the Thousand Islands, the black rites of the Sorcerer Lords of Carcosa, the oily hieroglyphs of the Bloodstone Emperor, carved into black stone. The oldest myths of the Pale Child Bakkalon, the Black Goat of Qohor, the Lion of Night and dead dreamer Nyar of the Church of the Star’s Wisdom. The scattered points of forgotten lore, drawn together into a line. It had all led to this. A piece of the power of the Old World, of the time before the Dawn.
And that beast he’d seen near the Stepstones had been barely a quarter of the size of this one. A kraken this size must be tens of thousands of years old, older than the First Men, its rust-red skin so hard and rough, smeared in algae and ancient scars. This is what all of those lives have bought, Euron thought in awe. Let no one say that I have not paid the iron price.

Sailors told ghost stories about krakens. Maybe one in a thousand ever actually saw one, and fewer lived to tell about it. The kraken lived in the ocean’s blackest depths, hunting leviathans, feasting on flesh and magic and enduring the ages of the world. There were so few of them left in this era, but Old Ones would sleep rather than die.

Still, during the worst storms, krakens would occasionally come to the surface. Blood in the water could entice them towards the shore. Euron had supplied both the storm and the feast, and the kraken had come. Just as the glass candles foretold.

Everything he had done, working towards this moment.

“Blow the horn!” Euron bellowed. “Blow the horn! Blow the fifth horn!”

The huge shape was coming closer, so large the mouth of the Honeywine could barely fit it. Its crest was covered in spines, its skin was greyish-red, its body a solid mountain of flesh. Its jaws extended circularly, needle-like teeth in rows around the top and sides, and its mouth convulsed to grind ships whole. Euron saw the Honour of Oldtown shattered into splinters by its jaws, men uselessly jumping overboard as the currents rushed into the kraken’s maw.

Giant tentacles extended, drifting in beats, capturing the waves to waft the red water into its mouth. With every twitch of its huge limbs, there were tidal waves.

With an enormous gush, the kraken swallowed, and water ejected from the great creature’s gills – a stream so intense it was like a flood dropping from the sky, let forth by the Storm God howling above.

There was no order anymore. There was nothing but panic. The sky stank of desperation and raw fear.

“Blow the horn!” Euron screamed. “BLOW THE HORN!”

Finally, Rodrik Freeborn must have heard him. The fifth horn was special compared to all the others. It was a horn over seven-feet tall, fixed in the most secure cabin the Silence had, held in place by thick lashes of black leather. It was solid, ivory white – the polished bone of some huge beast, and bound in oily black stone. Runes older and darker than Valyria’s were etched over its surface, yet Euron had smeared mud over the horn to disguise its significance.

As soon as Rodrik Freeborn placed his lips against the horn, the sound echoed like the scream of Nagga herself. The horn sounded, and suddenly the storm seemed to freeze.

The noise sent Euron deaf. Men were screaming in pain, clutching their skulls. Rodrik Freeborn would twist and convulse, his body held kissing the horn as unseen fingers squeezed the life out of him. Euron could hear the soul-shrieking blast take the full range of his sense, battering high and low and all in between, like the wail of the world, of a soul on fire and lit for kindling. The sound of the horn seized the waves like the Drowned God’s own scream of fury. The ocean bubbled, the wind hissed, and men fell.

Euron felt the pure power explode into him, bound by dragonsteel. His armour was singing, the runes etched on the breastplate glowing like white fire. Beneath the patch, Euron’s bloody eye pulsed. The kraken convulsed and thrashed. The tsunami wave crushed a dozen ships. The \textit{Silence} was very nearly swept away, but the wreck of the ship clung to the rocks, grinding with the world’s heartbeat.

After ten eternal seconds, the horn fell silent. Euron knew that Rodrik Freeborn would die coughing salt water from his lungs, without touching the waves.

Waves crashing, great red tentacles rising upwards, beating with the storm. The beast was trembling twitching, a strangled roar coming from its maw… \textit{“I BIND YOU! I BIND YOU, I BIND YOU, I BIND YOU!”}

The kraken’s cry broke. The sky split. An immense sound of pain so loud the earth and seas rumbled. The power was rushing around him… he could feel the waves crash beneath his tentacles, the ghost of sensation…

His awareness hammered into something immense beyond mortality; a mind cthonic, an archean beast of flesh and magic that measured the passage of time in eons and moved with the fury of storms. An abyssal awareness that could have hammered the minds of a hundred skinchangers into bloody, gibbering foam.

It was a mind rent by torture, aflame with the agony wrought by Krakenbinder, entrapped in a body searing with the brands of a blood magic ancient and foul, made vulnerable and pliant.

It could not resist.

Suddenly, Euron was larger, more powerful than ever. The world of the mind’s scope expanded, the range of awareness \textit{stretched}. His whole body was trembling, overflowing with might. The kraken was twitching, yet the magicks of the horn scolded its greatness over its skin, binding the immensity of its will. Ancient runes burnt into abyssal flesh, binding its muscles and its black limbs, its very mind to his own. Two hearts beat as one in the storm.

Euron heard the hiss of steam billowing off the horn. The water around the ship was bubbling. Lightning cracked, and the kraken let forth one final, strangled roar.

And suddenly Euron was laughing again. Laughing louder and sharper than ever. Laughing so hard he might explode from his own body. \textit{You are mine. The God is mine.}

Lord Goodbrother’s eyes were bulging, but he was left unable to speak, only gasp. Euron couldn’t breathe either, otherwise there would have been a snide remark. \textit{What? Euron wanted to taunt. Did you really think that I would entrust my only hellhorn to Victarion?}

Krakenbinder was one of the five sorcerous horns that Euron had in his possession. Euron had sacrificed Dragonbinder to Victarion, but Euron would never, ever give up his other four.

The great beast stopped moving. The harbour seemed to turn strangely silent. There were still screams, but Euron couldn’t hear them. \textit{Like insects.}

He saw the Damphair fall to his knees.
The Silence was still shuddering too intensely for him to stand, but Euron raised his hand.

In the distance, a great red tentacle rose upwards from the surf at the same time, uncoiling itself slowly.

Euron brought his hand down sharply.

The crash of water rocked the world. Two dozen Oldtown ships were destroyed at once. The tidal waves swept over the Blood Isle, and the garrison stationed there didn’t stand a chance. All of the Tyrell men were crushed and swept away under the waves.

There were screams, wails. Most of the men in the bay seemed to have collapsed in pure, bloodcurdling horror, but there were a few ships that were trying to flee. But it doesn’t matter, there will be no escape.

Slowly, curiously, the kraken flexed its muscles, twitching gills, squirming its body and fins as Euron experimented with its strength, reaching out with the new scope of his will. Gingerly, the kraken pushed its way forward, its huge underbody scraping against rock and sand. A rust-red wall of mass and muscle extended towards the Silence.

He heard the squelch as its suckers ground over the wood. Each suction cup was like a set of teeth biting into the wood. With extreme care, the red tentacle wrapped itself around the Silence, sheltering the ship protectively from the waves. The tentacle was pure muscle, hard as stone. The whole vessel lurched as the kraken pulled it upwards from the rocks.

With another limb, the kraken crushed the Arbor Queen as idly as a child would stomp on a bug. Or perhaps popping a grape, and feeling it splat. All of the ships panicking, collapsing or trying to flee were all nothing before it. Great tentacles stretched outwards, curling upwards from the depths.

There was chaos all around him, but Euron could barely feel it. He could feel nothing but power.

The kraken’s lower body scraped over the sands in the harbour, its tentacles flailing and digging as it pulled itself upwards into the shallow harbour. He could see the beast’s eyes, huge, black ovoids larger than small boats. Its milky gaze was empty, but Euron knew its attention was all on him.

It took two great tentacles to lift the Silence straight out of the water and shove the ship roughly onto the shallows, away from the waves. Three men fell overboard as the vessel lurched, but Euron didn’t care. His whole body was wrapped around the broken mast, but controlling the beast felt like an extension of his will. The runes embedded on Euron’s armour shone ghostly pale.

With its other limbs, the monster devastated the fleet in long, idle swipes. Thousands, tens of thousands of men crushed dead by the waves and yet Euron had to struggle to notice them.

Euron’s two gazes turned upwards towards the Hightower. The bells were ringing in frenzy. He saw men shooting arrows and scorpions, but even the largest iron bolts were nothing but splinters to the kraken’s mass. Stones fired from trebuchets bounced uselessly off the kraken’s skin.

And the world watched in stunned awe and horror as the great beast roiled its way forwards. Euron finally let go of the mast, his body aching in pain as he felt the beginning of ugly, deep bruises forming across his body. Still, there was no emotion but elation, no pain of that but victory, as he stepped forward across his ruined ship.

The few survivors were staring at him, eyes bulging so hard they might burst. The kraken dragged its way deeper into the harbour, the Honeywine barely deep enough to cover its gills. From behind, all Euron could see was a spine-covered mountain, black and reddish and barnacle-strewn

“How arrogant,” Euron mused as he stared at the nine-hundred-foot-tall Hightower. “The Nine Wonders made by man. How arrogant to think that man can even compare to nature.”

The kraken’s body was screaming in pain, in unaccustomed motion, but Euron forced it to into the shallows. He forced its tentacles to shatter the docks, and then the immense mass was heaving itself out of the water. Its body was bloated, flailing and hulking, but strong enough to squirm forward even on land. Tentacles thrashed, crushing houses to try and drag itself forward all the while the monster’s body squirmed and twisted like a slug.

Huge limbs crushed the walls of Oldtown with ease, sending stone flying into the storm. From a distance, it looked almost… serene. An act of nature. Euron watched from the far side of the harbour, and wondered what it would be like to be one of all those screaming mortals as the rubble came crashing down.

Men were staring at Euron with horror, but he could only laugh, and laugh, and laugh. Who can doubt my godliness now?

Then, the kraken turned and surged its way towards the Hightower, moving as slowly and as unstoppably as an earthquake, a glacier made of chthonic flesh, leaving a flattened world behind. The cliffs of the Battle Isle posed some difficulty, but the kraken’s tentacles were strong. Its limbs carved a grip, cleaving into soft stone, and then its whole body was heaving upwards.

Across the horizon, Euron heard the bells ringing, the thunder rumbling, and the sea screaming as the great limbs wrapped themselves as far around the base of the Hightower that they could reach. Then, enormous muscles clenched and heaved, stone strained and cracked, the foundations shuddered, and the great shining Hightower was toppling towards the sea.

Sansa

The Merry Midwife creaked and groaned with the waves. She was an old cog, her figurehead carved of ill-treated white pine, rotten at the edges. A laughing matron at the prow cut through the waves, holding an infant by one foot, as if dangling the wooden babe over the water. The woman’s cheeks and the babe’s bottom were pocked with wormholes, and the leavings of seagulls speckled her brow. Sansa leaned over the railing and for a long time found herself staring at the carved midwife and her fixed, wooden smile. Perhaps it was just poor craftsmanship, but that wide, merry grin seemed forced, desperate, as the mother offered her child to the sea.

Sansa pulled her wool-lined hood up against the bite of the wind, but her long hair still whipped across her skin. After so long, the black dye was beginning to fade; Sansa’s tips were still dark, but the red roots were showing. On the narrow cog, there had never been the time or space to braid her hair properly as she had used to, so Sansa let it hang and grow free.

A horn sounded in the distance, and the chiming of bells carried over the water, to the sound of faint echoes. In the distance, she could see the shape of the Seal Rock jutting out of the bay, wreathed in mist like some great, eroded hunter. A remnant of a past age, a protector. White Harbour, the city beyond, was a faint haze obscured in the cold morning mist, inscrutable in the distance, but the shadows of sails loomed over the mouth to the White Knife. All aboard, from captain to sailor to cook, were tense as the Merry Midwife wafted in the wind towards the fleet of House Manderly.

Yet above all, Sansa wondered if she would see the dragon. Her heart was in her mouth with the thought. Her eyes lingered on the shadow of the Seal Rock, trying to imagine a dragon hidden atop it in the mists. After all that she had heard, the rumours and hedge tales whispered over meals or muttered in dark corners, it couldn’t help but remind her of the tales Old Nan had once told.

There was a cold edge in the soft wind, she clenched her furs closer to her form. Jon Snow. An ice dragon. The north at war. My home. She felt like a girl venturing into the storm, the legends of an earlier age made real. Should I be excited or scared? she wondered. Instead, she just felt queerly detached to it all.

“You should not be on deck, my lady,” a low voice warned. “It would not do if you were to fall ill. And we ought to keep your return as discreet as possible.”

Sansa found herself smiling faintly at the exiled knight’s words. She glanced at him from the corner of an eye, as he took a place beside her at the cog’s prow, slightly staggering into place.

Ser Jorah’s face was a slowly recovering ruin, his features still bruised and bloated, his eyes a little weary, lined by shadows. He was clad in a moth-eaten cloak of wool, lined with sealskin, looking larger and gruffer than ever under layers of worn and salt-stained clothes.

“They will know soon enough.” Sansa could see the shadows of sails through the fog, an indeterminate number of them rocking in the bay’s waters, forming a barricade across the harbour. Galleys, she realised. Fairly large hulls, large enough to be seen across the great distance yet remaining. The fleet of House Manderly slowly took shape from the vapours, each one looking crisp and clean, fresh from the shipyards. The first northern fleet in a hundred years. “Will we be allowed to pass?”

“They will board us first, and search our hull,” Ser Jorah admitted. His voice carried weirdly in the damp air. “White Harbour is under lockdown; even more so than it was when I was last here.” Silence stretched for a passing of moments as the bear knight stared into the mist, his eyes visibly roaming for detail in the grey vapour. He was on edge; shoulders tense, his fingers drumming.

“How do you suppose so?” Sansa asked.

“The evidence is before your eyes.” He pointed, drawing her attention to the harbour’s near shores. Port and starboard, the two shorelines slowly converged as the Merry Midwife approached the White Knife’s mouth. She saw nothing, save for dark shorelines. She shook her head.

“Look,” Ser Jorah insisted, drawing her attention to a point in the distance, drawing her attention away from the vessels of the blockade. “There.”

She saw it. Empty wharfs, silent docksides speckling the far shoreline. A small yellow flag, devoid of decoration or heraldry, raised above the quay, flying beneath a pennant emblazoned with the Manderly merman. It was a small stead, too small to even be called a village, at the very edge of the harbour outside of the city proper.

Ser Jorah continued at the slight widening of her eyes, at her curiosity. “Do you see the empty berths? The guttered lighthouse? You look upon the plague wharf, the cheapest dockage along the waters of the White Knife. At any other city, a fleet blockade would normally escort vessels to such a dock, or some equivalent. In times of peace, the vessels of smallfolk will likely seek harbourage there. All port cities of sufficient size have such a wharf.” Somehow, Ser Jorah’s features darkened even further.

“All throughout the seas, during times of blockade, vessels seeking entry to port are typically brought to the plague wharf or some lesser equivalent for inspection.” He took a breath, gripped the railing, and explained through a grimace. “If they are not repelled, taken, or sunk at first sight, that is. If brought in by the blockade, standard practice dictates a full and thorough inspection by the port authorities, ensuring that a hull’s contents conform to the law of the land. It is a process that may take days of labour. It isn’t so unusual to see vessels lie in wait for weeks, if they seek entry during times of blockade. In my time in Lys, I once saw the Triarch refuse to admit all vessels for a month, during a rumoured outbreak of the Sothoryi Sailor’s bane in the Stepstones – the boats were jammed so tightly in the water that one could have all walked across the bay.”

She stayed quiet. The bear knight turned to her a little, glancing at her with rough, but not unkind, features. “White Harbour is the busiest port north of the Neck, my lady, yet we see no vessels under inspection here. It is a dark, dark sign.”

She could see the lines tightening across his eyes. She measured him quietly through the edge of her gaze. Yes, she thought, he’s very nervous. Scared of facing the north’s law again? Scared of facing his family? “One does not look need to see through these mists to know that there have been few merchants seeking harbour in the city, my lady.” Jorah continued. “None, perhaps. In times of quiet, a plague wharf may see use by petty fishermen, seeking less tax. Yet we see none; no vessels under inspection, no smallfolk, though we are still in the season for herring. Meaning that the smallfolk dare not tread these waters now. Where even commoners fear to tread, men of birth and power will never walk. The blockade has been blockading nothing, I think.” The bear knight paused for a breath, his eyes lingered on the small tower. “Set the plague wharf aside. I imagine that the Lord’s Port and the Merchant’s Quay will be places for fit for ghosts.”

Silence lingered for a long moment, as their small cog tepidly approached the Manderly fleet.

“What will that mean for us?” Sansa asked finally.

“They will be suspicious of our ship, if only out of one part prudence, two parts boredom.” Ser Jorah muttered. “We will be boarded and inspected. Thoroughly, I expect. Few with petty cause would seek berth at a city that has raised its banners in revolt, and the caution of the inspectors and longshoremen will be redoubled now that they have a vessel in sight.

“But, when they learn of you, my lady. then I have no doubt that Lord Manderly will be most eager to welcome you home. Before, he would have certainly seen you smuggled into the keep, under hood and cowl and in cover of darkness. Now, with their banners raised against the Iron Throne?” There was a pause, and he seemed to consider his words carefully. “I do not know. Lord Manderly will certainly want it known that the eldest daughter of Eddard Stark has returned to the North, and stands with him. I would suspect he would want tale of you known amongst the people sooner, rather than later. But he will want to speak with you for himself, to understand your wishes.”

Sansa just nodded absently. Ser Jorah was so quick to speak of the great lords of the north, but Sansa had to wonder. Would she even be recognized? Would Lord Manderly know her? Doubtful. So many years had passed, and Lord Borrell had declined to send a letter to vouch for her identity. Arriving like this, unannounced, gave the Lord of Sweetsister deniability should the news of her arrival spread, but it weakened her stance. He’d refused to put any words to writing – men could talk, he had said. Ravens weren’t secure enough, he had insisted, any word or letters so found could reach back to the Vale.

It had taken over a fortnight of negotiations and arguments before she had convinced Lord Borrell to send her on to White Harbour. The Lord of Sweetsister had been slow to convince, but Sansa persevered. This could be a huge benefit to your house, she had argued, in a dozen separate facets of argument. There is no better way to earn advantage than to openly stand with those who would win.

But still, even after he had come to agree with her, Lord Borrell wanted to hedge his bets. He had put her on a small cog and sent her to the city unannounced. The Merry Midwife, captained by the hard and hairy Casso Mogat, was the only ship willing to even approach White Harbour – a ship that had done the journey a thousand times. Men spoke of the city as though it were cursed, whispering of wildlings, dragons, and rebellion.

I will need to convince Lord Manderly of my identity, she knew. After being someone else for so long, the need to convince someone, anyone that she was Sansa Stark felt so queer. She had spent the trip trying to recall all the details she knew of House Manderly, but it all still felt… unreal.

Sansa had visited White Harbour before, only once, and it had seemed a grand thing then. But, now, strangely, the city seemed so much smaller. White Harbour was a dwarf compared to King’s Landing.

Sansa kept her black-hilted dagger hidden in her dress. She had never had a dagger before, her mother would never have allowed it. It was unladylike, but now the sleek, sheathed blade had become… comforting? No, comforting was the wrong word. So many restless nights had been spent cradling the dagger for protection and sleeping in the rough, as she was smuggled across the Vale and through the Bite. And now I am sailing into a dragon’s lair.

Maybe the thought should have scared her, but instead she just felt thoughtful. Recollective, even melancholic. The north is my home, but I barely know it anymore.

Weirdly, Ser Jorah seemed even more nervous and agitated than she was. His maimed hand – wrapped in wool – never strayed far from his sword. She kept a watch on his expression from the corner of her eye.

They stood in uneasy silence for a long time, watching for their vessel’s approach. Strangely, the wind no longer felt cold. She heard the chime of bells above.

“Will we see the dragon, ser?” she asked finally.

Ser Jorah twitched. “Casso says it is unlikely.” His voice was torn, his expression strained. “He says the dragon is often away, but returns frequently enough.”

“I see.” Sansa looked to a large white sail emerging from the mist, pennant above flying the merman and trident of the Manderlys, lined with a border of silver. “Do you believe the tales of Jon Snow and the dragon?”

There was a long pause, the swell of small waves shuddering the prow. “I have heard many people saying it so, my lady.”

“That is not what I asked, ser.”

“And I cannot say for certain,” he said, shaking his head. “I dare not say. It is the way of smallfolk, to confuse and exaggerate in times of strife. But the stories all agree on a precious few points; that the Night’s Watch is fallen, brought down by a King-Beyond-the-Wall and dragonrider named Jon Snow.” His lips twisted. “Little else can be trusted.”

He was rambling, talking on about little and less; rumours and tall tales. Her focus went elsewhere. She remembered her brother Jon.

She remembered the often sullen, brooding boy. A bastard who retreated from her mother’s glances, but came to life with her father and older brother. She remembered a boy more at home in the practice yard than the great hall. She remembered a few of the countless times he’d spar with tourney swords against Robb, Theon or the men-at-arms, or sometimes boys from the winter town.

She didn’t remember much else. What were his likes, his dislikes? What had he thought of her? Had he ever seemed jealous, hateful, as she’d oft heard that bastards were wont to do, for their trueborn siblings? She couldn’t say – she could hardly recall sharing more than single word conversations with him.

She tried to match what remained of her memories to the stories she heard – those of the Bastard King-Beyond-the-Wall and his ice dragon larger than a storm – and she struggled to see it. She had often wondered if it was a different Jon Snow, or an imposter pretending to be Lord Stark’s once-least-known son.

Yet I am still going to him willingly, because there is no other option. Whatever happens, whatever Jon is, I will handle it.

Sansa’s eyes flickered towards Ser Jorah. The memory of that moment, jumping off the cliffs into the lake, running from clansmen, flashed before her eyes. She remembered thrashing and flailing, screaming as cold water consumed her and heavy limbs dragged her down. Ser Jorah hadn’t been able to swim in his armour.

But that was me, she remembered. I saved Ser Jorah’s life and dragged him to shore. That was me.

She spent a long time staring at the knight, grizzled and worn. White Harbour was the end of their journey. She could hardly even describe the emotions scintillating inside of her.

“You have seen dragons before, haven’t you, ser?” Sansa said finally.

His mouth tightened, but he was slow to reply. “I saw the way you talked of Queen Daenerys. How you reacted to news of dragons,” Sansa insisted. “You said you spent your exile in Essos, but you were with Daenerys Targaryen, weren’t you? That is why you returned to Westeros now.”

“Aye,” Ser Jorah replied, reluctantly. “Those tales are true. Queen Daenerys has three dragons – I was there when they were hatched.”

“So when you saved me?” Sansa asked. “You were doing it for her?”

Jorah nodded, averting his gaze. Sansa didn’t feel betrayed. Rather, she felt relieved – it felt good to understand more of the knight’s motivations. Everyone has their own ambitions and vulnerabilities, and understanding is power. It was a relief to know the strings which Ser Jorah danced on.

There was a moment of quiet contemplation. She heard the bells chiming in the distance, becoming clearer. “And what do you want, ser?” she asked curiously, still leaning over the railing. “Tell me, what do you hope to gain here?”

The man shifted, looking uncomfortable. He took a deep, slow breath. “I want you to convince your brother to ally with Queen Daenerys Targaryen,” he said finally. “Advocate for her, for an alliance. Convince Jon Snow to support her, to renounce his rebellion, and in return Daenerys could legitimise him and put the Seven Kingdoms to order.”

Sansa laughed hollowly, after a brief silence. “I have not spoken to Jon Snow in over three years, ser. I barely spoke to him before then. I did not say goodbye when he left to join the Night’s Watch. We grew up in the same castle, but we lived at different ends of it. Were it not for meals, I could go without seeing him for days at a time.” She shook her head. “I have no influence with him. I don’t even know his feelings towards me – perhaps he resents me for our childhood, perhaps he’d be threatened by me, perhaps he’d want to punish me? For all I know, he might just be another man who’d try to exploit me.” Like yourself, she thought quietly.

“And yet still you're going to him?”

“What choice do I have? I am a Stark – the north is where belong.” She shook her head. “There must always be a Stark in Winterfell. No matter the type of man Jon is, I’ll deal with it. But I do not know Daenerys Targaryen.”

“She is the Seven Kingdom’s best option for peace and stability,” Ser Jorah insisted. “A good queen that all will rally behind – one with the most rightful claim to the Iron Throne. She will bring dragons – three dragons – she will bring an order that the realm has not seen for hundreds of years. If you convince your brother to join with her, then the war will be half-won already.”

“And why would he?” And why would I?
“Queen Daenerys could legitimise his position in the north. He is a king of wildlings. The realm will turn against your brother quickly, but Daenerys could help him.” Ser Jorah’s eyes were grim. “Or she could destroy him. Unless your brother wants to see the Dance of Dragons come again, then he must make an alliance.”

Sansa nodded, but didn’t reply. She kept her posture non-committal. Jorah grimaced. “My lady, please. Queen Daenerys is good and kind and just, I can vouch to it. She freed the slaves in Astapor, Yunkai and Meereen, brought liberation to Slaver’s Bay. I swear to you, there could be no better liege – no one more deserving or worthy than Daenerys Targaryen.”

She paused, measuring his expression. “Do you love her, ser?”

Ser Jorah seemed to falter. “She has my undying loyalty.”

So that’s a yes. For some reason, Sansa had to suppress the bitter chuckle rising from her throat. “By the telling, your queen is half the world away, yet you still advocate for her? Here, to the granddaughter and niece of lords whom her father burned alive? You have such ‘loyalty’ that you went halfway around the world with no clear goal, I think, if you set your hopes on something so dubious.” Sansa mused. “You were willing, perhaps eager, to die in her service, ser. You set yourself to an impossible task with no idea how you could return from it. And then you found me.”

His eyes narrowed with her tone. “Are you mocking me, my lady?”

“No. Quite the opposite.” A jaded, humourless smile played over her lips. “What you do goes beyond loyalty. She can do no wrong in your eyes, can she? You’ve devoted yourself to her, you define yourself by her. Do you consider her your future, your destiny? She… she owns you, I think.”

“She is my queen,” Ser Jorah growled, bristling.

Sansa shook her head. “No, ser. She is much more than that to you.”

The knight was obvious. She could see straight through him – there was nothing but possessive love and admiration inside him. I know that type of love. I’ve felt that type of love.

The images of all the handsome and horrible men she had loved flashed before her eyes. Sansa thought of Lysa, crazed and mad with devotion. Strangely, she even thought of Cersei too. That type of love is worse than poison.

He didn’t reply. In the distance, the hulls of the White Harbour galleys were slowly taking shape through the mist. Nineteen, she counted. Their freshly painted hulls gleamed, even in the fog.

From the city, bells were still ringing. The first few chimes were expected as a ship came into harbour, but the bells didn’t cease. They were close enough towards the White Knife now to make out the walls of the inner harbour, and there was hectic movement on the docks. Sansa frowned. Why are the bells ringing?

“My lady,” Jorah tried again cautiously, unwilling to let the matter lie. “You must consider it – when Queen Daenerys arrives—”

“Sails!” A sharp voice called through the cry of gulls. “Sails to the south!”

Jorah jumped. Sansa turned, but she couldn’t see anything through the mist. “Who is it?” Casso Mogat boomed in his gravelly voice, stomping out onto deck as the planks creaked. “Mermen?”

The whole cog stirred as footsteps rushed towards the stern. Sansa had to squint to try and make out anything through the fog.

The great grey cliffs seemed so tall and looming in the mist. The galleys in the bay were forming tight ranks, each one flying the green merman of Manderly.

She heard Ser Jorah bellowing, demanding to know what was happening, while Casso placed a seashell horn to his lips and blew tightly. His dyed green whiskers wafted in the cold air, and his red cheeks bulged.

Sansa still couldn’t see, there were too many bodies covering the deck. She felt herself linger back, as the pitch of the voice raised.

“Turn her around!” the captain ordered, his voice somehow cutting through the air. “All hands to deck – tack and bring her to the beach.”

“What of White Harbour?” Ser Jorah bellowed over the sudden clamour. “We must go to White Harbour!”

“I ain’t having no part of that!” Casso objected. He was short man, barely five-foot-tall, but stocky and muscled enough to size up against Ser Jorah. The man was hairy and stout-legged, clearly of Ibbenese heritage. “Get us out of this bay!”

“How many are there?” One of the men called out to the crow’s-nest.

“I count eight!” the spotter high above called down. “No, wait… twelve – no, more… Oh, by the gods…”

“We must go to White Harbour!” Jorah bellowed at the captain. “We can’t go back! Go forward! Into the city!”

Sansa finally managed to see, climbing onto a crate and clutching the rigging against the rocking deck. She could see the masts coming through the mists, taking shape as the vessels turned the cape. At first, they seemed small in the distance, but then she saw all the oars.

Oars, hundreds and hundreds of oars, sweeping through the waves in trained synchronisation. Moving quickly, forming into a charge. The ships at the front were three-decked dromonds; great vessels with red sails and painted hulls of gold, green, and brown. There were more dromonds, and then galleys and more warships. The vessel at the front, leading the charge, was massive – as large or larger than the King Robert’s Hammer.

Dromonds of that size made the White Harbour galleys look like dwarves.

The mists weakened, and the shapes beyond were becoming clearer. At least thirty, she realised with a gasp. Maybe as many as fifty. The ship at the front bore a coat of arms showing a black shape against red that Sansa couldn’t recognise, but then she could slowly make out the colours of the vessels. Some were plain and bleak, others had brightly striped hulls, but Sansa’s eyes were drawn to the reds and golds, purples and greens – the colours of Lannister and Tyrell. The royal fleet.

Her breath froze. How could… No, it’s impossible, why are they…?
It was a fleet. A mixture of ships from great dromonds to cogs, some Westerosi and others in the style of the Free Cities, of mismatched colours and sizes, but they all looked ready for war.

Behind her, White Harbour’s bells were still ringing, and growing in pitch. Ser Jorah and Casso Mogat were screaming at each other in the middle of the deck. Sansa could barely process it, but slowly the thoughts started to form.

The bay of White Harbour seemed so peaceful and serene for a moment, but Sansa watched the warships coming closer and coming fast.

Jon

They camped in the middle of a frozen farmstead, a hamlet of barely a dozen houses and barns that had been overwhelmed by the legions of men. A city of tents surrounded the scarce few wooden structures, sprouting endlessly from the snows, like a field of winter mushrooms. The ghost of a cold, pale sun loomed overhead, washed out from behind the thick, dark clouds.

The snow was three feet deep in places, and crunched underfoot into a muddy slush. The army – my army – flooded out over the snow and the ice, camped in the ruined fields. A few of the further perimeters spilled forth onto a nearby frozen lake, squeezed outwards from the camp’s cramped core. Jon watched a few men fish on the lake, in separate groups around holes laboriously cut through foot-thick ice. Out on the ice, wildling stayed far from northerner, and vice versa, occasionally shooting one another mistrustful looks. The sight made Jon frown.

He’d wanted to keep going, but then the threat of snowstorms to the north had brought the march to a halt, forced the army to take shelter and hold out for better weather.

Long Lake was to the northeast, where the White Knife and a dozen streams cut over the rolling hills. The kingsroad was somewhere to the east, but the host had abandoned the road to trek through the acres of hard, deserted farmland. Jon stood out atop one of the snowy hills, staring at the silhouette of stone walls and towers hovering in the distance.

Winterfell, my home. It has been so, so long.

Even despite the dull clamour of the men below, and the faint howl of the wind, it seemed so quiet from the hilltop. Jon stood and stared at the Winterfell, trying to reconcile the far-off view with his memories.

“That storm looks like a killer,” Ewan Bole warned, looking off at the clouds swirling over the mountains to the north. Jon did not turn to him. He remained focused on the castle.

“Hard to say. Anywhere between three days or a fortnight, but she’s moving south quickly,” Ewan grimaced. They could hear the wind howling faintly, the storm looming over the forests on the horizon to the north. The weather had slowly but surely been worsening. “We better be well and truly dug in before the snows hit.”
The Boltons are as unlikely to risk the weather as us, but their shelter is superior. Winterfell is old and strong, fit to station an army. The longer this lasts, the more desperate our efforts. Jon’s eyes were still fixed on the seat of House Stark, trying to map the pale and looming towers to what he remembered from all those years of childhood. I was a summer child.

“Strong enough to survive dragonfire, do you think?” Tormund Giantsbane scoffed from his other side.

It seemed like no matter where Jon went, he walked with a constant retinue. Of his Dragonguard, Ser Alek, Ewan Bole and Toregg the Tall were on duty around him now. Men were constantly demanding his ear, and more and more problems demanded his attention.

“We want to take Winterfell, not destroy it,” Jon said, as he turned away with a final, forlorn glance. My hands are trembling, he suddenly realized. He willed them to still. “Sonagon’s frostfire could raze the castle to the ground, but I’d not destroy the seat of the north. Not while other options yet remained.”

“What about the men?” the Greatjon asked, folding his arms. “You have any problem torching those inside?”

“If they refuse to surrender, then none.”

“Good.” Tormund guffawed. “Then all we got to do is get them out of their castle.”

“They’ll be fools if they did. They likely have several thousand holed up in there. We’ve got eighteen thousand out here,” grunted Hugo Wull, the great-chested leader of Clan Wull. The Big Bucket, as he was called, was said to be the largest stomach in the north, and he looked even broader with a rugged tapestry of furs, leather and mail wrapped over his body. “This fight is ours.”

Men from the northern mountain clans had joined their host a week past, and before that Lord Umber’s and the Weeper’s hosts joined together at the curve of the White Knife. The last reinforcements from White Harbour sailed up the river to meet them. Slowly, painfully, his army had converged together.

Twelve thousand wildlings, Jon thought, and six thousand northmen. There were around one thousand from the mountain clans, one thousand Umbers and Mormonts, and one thousand from White Harbour. We could outnumber the Boltons three to one, Jon thought. And yet they still haven’t surrendered.

Yes, the Boltons had a castle, yet he had a dragon. Logic said that they never stood a chance. So why haven’t they surrendered?

Jon could raze Winterfell down if he had to. It would be a bitter victory for him, yet he could do it.

His army was camped around a small lake, a pond in the curve of the hills and sentinel trees. The host had encamped around the north and western edges of the lake, with wooden spikes jammed into the snow along with a bulwark of troops wrapped around the perimeter.

To the south, he could see the dragon roosting in the middle of the frozen lake, coiled like an island rising from the snow and ice. The water was so frozen the ice was as solid as the earth, easily strong enough for the dragon. The Dragonguard had set up a perimeter around the dragon to keep back any onlookers, but Sonagon had been snoozing sluggishly for days. Their slow progress and his rationed meals food seemed to have gradually pushed Sonagon into a lull, for which Jon was grateful. A sleeping dragon was far better than an agitated one.

Supplies were already a problem, and the dark clouds stirring to the north gave him worry. The mountain clans and the supplies they brought had helped save lives, but even the semi-regular supply chains from White Harbour struggled to feed a host of their size. I could likely lose more men to starvation and the weather than I will to battle, Jon thought with a grimace. A quick battle is good for us.

We are only a day’s march away from Winterfell. Arya is so close.

Tormund and Greatjon were bickering again. “Gather up the war council and bring them to my cabin,” Jon ordered, turning around and limping away. “We must discuss battle plans. Call the Weeper, Lord of Bones, Ser Wylis Manderly, Jeremy Locke, Alysane Mormont, Robett Glover, Torghen Flint, Morgan Liddle and Brandon Norrey to me.” Now there’s a list of names I never thought I would see sitting around the same table together.

Jon’s cabin was a wooden thatch fishing hut on the lake. He had felt guilty about ejecting villagers from their homes, but there had been little choice. His commanders took the dozen simple wooden houses for themselves, but most of his men still had to sleep exposed to the elements. Jon himself took largest building in the hamlet, but it was a bare and empty barn – previously it had been used to store salmon. The fish had been requisitioned, but the stink remained. They used empty barrels and crates as chairs. It was hardly warmer inside than out, but it was shelter from the wind.

Jon’s squire, Bennard Locke, waited at the doorway. “Is there to be a battle, Your Grace?” the dark-haired boy asked. It was hard to tell if there was fear or excitement in his voice.

“Perhaps.” Likely. “If there is, I will fight on Sonagon. I expect my squires to hold position with the Dragonguard.”

Bennard’s face looked crestfallen. “Your Grace, I can fight! I am man grown, I should be with you in the battle.”

He’s fourteen; same age I was when I joined the Night’s Watch. The thought made Jon flinch. “You have your duties. You will support the guard – I expect you to stick by Fur’s side throughout. Pass the message onto him.”

It took a few hours for the commanders to gather from their various posts. Jon dressed himself in his armour – steel and iron wrapped under wolf and shadowskin furs – as he broke his fast on dried horsemeat. Two dozen men came and went giving reports and updates. His lords trekked through the doorway; some walked easily, others more tense. This close to the battle of Winterfell, every man in the camp kept their swords close and they were clad in chainmail at all times.

“Robett,” Jon called. “Any update on enemy numbers?”

Robett Glover shook his head, dark brown mane bristling with snow. Jon had appointed Robett as commander of their scouts and outriders, a duty the man had once served for Robb. “None, Your Grace,” he replied. “There are no hosts as far as Cerwyn; all resistance must be within Winterfell. If Roose Bolton has been consolidating his power, you could expect up to ten thousand.”

Ten thousand. Most likely less, though – the Boltons must be struggling to keep rank by now. The last commander through the door was Rattleshirt, his bones crackling as he skulked in at the rear.

“We are going to win this battle,” Jon announced to the room. “We have far more than their number, and Sonagon can breach the walls. We can beat them.”

There were quiet nods, but hard eyes meeting his. “However,” Jon continued. “Right now, the difficulty is not how to beat them, but how to make it a good victory. We cannot afford a long fight, we cannot let them bleed us. We must capture Winterfell soundly.”

“And Ned’s girl,” added Morgan Liddle – the Middle Liddle, as he was called, although not out loud in his earshot – second son of Clan Liddle. His father was too old to fight, so the Middle Liddle came south along with Glover and Mormont reinforcements. Morgan was a big, bearded, bald man, wearing a byrnie of patched and rusted mail, arms folded. “We rescue Ned’s girl.”

“Aye,” Jon agreed. “We save Arya Stark and any other hostages they are holding.”

There was a moment of quiet. I do not want to raze Winterfell, so Sonagon cannot destroy the castle. And I cannot let my sister die.

“Roose Bolton is a cunning as they come,” Ser Wylis Manderly noted, casting a nervous look around the room. “He won’t fight any battle that he can’t win.”

“In all likelihood, Bolton has already fled,” Jeremy Locke agreed. He was a slender and short man – Lord Ondrew Locke’s son and heir – but he had hard, sharp eyes. Ser Wylis and Jeremy Locke both shared command of their rear. “Perhaps to Cerwyn, more likely to Moat Cailin to raise forces from allies in the south. He knew we were coming, why would he stay?”

“We haven’t received any reports of any large force heading south. Sonagon hasn’t spotted any host leaving, either.” Jon looked to Robett for confirmation, and the man just nodded.

“We have the men. We could take that castle,” the Weeper said with a scoff. All of the northern lords kept their distance from the man, Jon noticed. Come battle, the Weeper was to lead the vanguard.

“You could lose ten thousand men against Winterfell’s walls and count yourself lucky,” Alysane Mormont warned. The second daughter of Lady Maege was a big woman. She’d arrived days before with the reinforcements from the north, and was to command their reserves in her mother’s absence.

“How about with a dragon fighting alongside us?” said a gnarly toothless man with red-knuckled hands as big as hams. Old Torghen Flint, appointed commander of their train.

Jon shook his head. “Sonagon can’t aim his breath very well,” he said. “If it’s a dispersed battle, the dragon could hurt our own as much the enemy by scorching the land with dragonfire.”

“So all we got to do is getting them lined up in a row in the open for your dragon, then?” the Greatjon said sarcastically.

“The Norrey muttered, not quite under his breath. Brandon Norrey was wrinkled and slight of build, but sly-eyed and spry like an old fox clad in fur and iron. “How do you hope to win with it if you refuse to use it properly?”

“Sonagon will destroy as much as he helps.” Jon replied coolly. The thought of Mole’s Town and the Twins flashed before his eyes. “Sonagon will assist, of course, but this battle can only be won by men.”

The Norrey’s eyes narrowed, but he didn’t reply. “If you’re a coward, Norrey, then walk away,” said the Middle Liddle, but his gaze drifted towards Jon. The Flint and The Wull muttered agreements too. “The rest of us are fighting for the Ned’s girl.”

“And how do we breach those walls?” The Norrey objected. “We got the strongest walls in the north standing between us and the lass.”

“Then we need to draw them out. Set a trap,” Rattleshirt spoke up, his voice low, arms folded.

“Hard to imagine them failing for any trap when they know that dragon is out there,” Hugo Wull grumbled. “Them cowards are holed up in the castle like rats.”

“Fuck traps,” the Weeper objected. “I got raiders that are real good at climbing. We get hooks over those walls at night, we get in there and we start cutting throats. We’ll steal your sister from her bed and we’ll slaughter those fuckers from all sides.”

“You expect to climb over eighty-foot walls and cut through thousands of soldiers?” Jeremy Locke said doubtfully.

The Weeper grinned toothily. “That’s what my men are good at. Hells, I’ll lead them myself – you think I haven’t done it before?”

Jon noticed how the Greatjon and Torghen Flint stiffened, both of them hatefully glaring at the grinning Weeper. The wildling’s voice was taunting.

Rattleshirt nodded in agreement. “It could work. We’ll have the dragon in the sky making a big distraction for us too,” the Lord of Bones agreed. “You southerners pretend like you’re ambushing one side of the walls, while the free folk climb over the opposite side and do all the real work.”

“You wildlings want another castle to rape and raze?” The Norrey growled, but others pushed in.

“If it goes wrong, you could be sending a lot of people climbing to their deaths,” Alysane Mormont warned.

“What I want to know,” the Big Bucket said loudly, “why should anyone be climbing at all? Your dragon has wings, don’t it?”

“Sonagon cannot ferry men over,” Jon said, shaking his head. “Not easily, at least. He could only carry fifty men at a time, and it takes too long to dismount.”

“How about dropping men on to the roof then?” The Wull grumbled. “If you’ve got a dragon with wings, we should bloody use them.”

“You said that dragonfire is too destructive to use easily,” Ser Wylis noted. “But what about other ways? Could your dragon drop boulders or whatnot?”

Jon wasn’t sure how to reply. He stayed quiet, hesitating, while the chorus of voices became more pitched.

“We need siege engines. Ropes,” Torghen Flint was shaking his head, his raspy voice crackling. “If your dragon could help make a bridge over the walls, then our men would do the rest.”

“It’s a bloody dragon,” the Greatjon grunted. “Let it go in first and break down the gates. Problem solved.”

“The Bolton men have been holed up in there for months,” Ser Wylis warned. “We’d be fools to think they haven’t made preparations against a dragon. They would have trained their men not to panic, and expect them to have built scorpions and heavy weapons.”

That was a concerning thought. Sonagon wasn't invincible, and had to be used very carefully. If I lose my dragon I lose everything. Sonagon is too important to risk.

Jeremy Locke slammed his hand on the table. “I’ve seen your wolf. And that cat,” the northmen announced suspiciously, looking at Jon and then around at the wildlings. “Your king can control animals. Why not let them chew those men out?”

Jon was about to protest, when the Big Bucket guffawed. “We got giants,” the clansmen laughed. “Giants and mammoths. Let those bloody beasts go first and break the walls for us.”

“Those walls are eighty-foot-high, my lord, and the gates are solid. We don’t have enough giants to risk them on the front lines.”

“Your dragon is bigger, ain’t it? Use it.”

Sonagon could do a lot, and the dragon would be nigh-unbeatable flying overhead and spewing down frostfire. If the dragon had to break a fortified gate, however, or drop into the courtyard, then that became riskier. All I need is to open up a way to get men into the castle, Jon thought. But how to do that when the castle is as strong as Winterfell and the enemy is heavily entrenched?

The Wull was insisting on storming the gates. Ser Wylis argued constructing siege equipment, while other voices were mixed. Jon was caught trying to answer three different questions at once.

“Fuck off if you think free folk are going to bleed for you,” Rattleshirt snapped, glaring at The Wull. “It’s your castle, you southerners should take the front-lines.”

“You expect to use our men as fodder?” Jeremy Locke accused. “Like you do with Karstark?” That caused the Weeper to snap. Jon tried to intervene, but the voices were rising.

The meeting was dissolving into a pointless bicker. Tormund and the Greatjon were arguing again, the Weeper was spitting angrily against Ser Wylis and Jeremy Locke. Everyone at the table had their own ideas, their own way of doing things. Nobody’s used to this type of battle, he thought with a grimace. Nobody had ever fought alongside a dragon before. Or with each other.

“You southerns like to argue,” Rattleshirt sneered quietly, arms folded as he clattered towards Jon and then rested back against the wall. The thought made Jon grimace. This is not a unified council.

Jon listened for as long as he could handle, but every man was talking over each other. “Enough!” Jon snapped. It took a while for the room to silence. “Enough! We will not be divided. The Boltons will take advantage of us if we are. No, this is a battle that will be won calmly and with certainty.”

A man scoffed from the back. Jon suspected it was Rattleshirt. “Lord Umber,” said Jon carefully, looking around the room, “Tormund and Morgan Liddle shall lead the forward siege. We’ll set up camp at the east gate and fortify position. Sonagon will do regular passes overhead to keep them down. We assess their strength, and go from there.”

There were a few grunts and nods. “Rattleshirt, you take the northern boundary, Ser Wylis, the south. Watch for any attempts to flank us around the walls. We need eyes on every gate and scouts watching every stretch of outer wall.” Jon wasn’t going to risk his numbers trying to siege every gate; they’d focus their efforts on the Hunter’s Gate. Jon turned around. “Alysane, Lord Norrey and Jeremy – I need you to start preparing siege weapons. Battering rams, ladders and ropes at the very least. Stone-throwers and towers if you can.”
“And how bloody long is that going to take?” the Weeper grumbled.

“I did not come to camp outside castle’s walls,” the Big Bucket agreed. “Winter is almost upon us, boy. My men are here for Ned’s little girl, not to waste ourselves in the snows.”

“The weather could easily turn,” The Flint warned. “If we’re still exposed…”

“It will take as long as it needs to,” Jon said sharply. The argument gave him worry. These are my commanders, they should not be squabbling such. “We have the clear advantage, I will not lose it with rash action. We go forward step by step.”

“What of our supplies?” Ser Wylis pressed.

“And what of your sister?” the Middle Liddle demanded, louder. Morgan Liddle was focused on Arya, Jon noted.

“When they feel the jaws closing, they’ll ransom her as a hostage. Their men will mutiny, and sooner or later they’ll try for a deal to save themselves,” Jon promised, wishing he believed it.

“Aye,” the Greatjon nodded, mouth twisting. “But we will not let those rats get away. Not after what they’ve done.”

“No,” Jon agreed. “We will not.”

The men started to shuffle. “Tormund, Weeper,” Jon said quietly. “Get some good men ready to climb if need be.”

The two wildling raiders nodded as they headed to the door. He met with the men one by one afterwards, trying to delegate the commands fairly. Jon was painfully aware that every man there had more experience than he had. Still, their attitudes towards him ranged from stoic to vaguely aggressive. The Norrey only grunted at him.

My army still has its fractures, he thought with a grimace. The northern coalition came together, but not cleanly. Sonagon is the only thing really keeping the host together.

That and Arya.

Alysane Mormont was waiting for him afterwards; a short, chunky and muscular figure with big breasts and thighs, who seemed round under layers of leather and mail. Alysane was heavier-set than her mother, but Jon could see the likeness around the eyes. Alysane also shared her mother’s hands – she had a calloused grip that seemed built for holding a mace. Underneath the half-helm, her hard face was lined with worry.

“You know Winterfell is one of the strongest castles in the realm?” Alysane commented.
“Somewhere between Casterly Rock and Storm’s End, if I had to rank it. She’s larger than the Red Keep and the walls are thicker than Harrenhal. Not the fanciest castle, but it’s hard to find many stouter or well-built.”

“I’m aware.”

“Then do not go thinking this battle is won just because you’ve got a dragon,” the woman warned. “Winterfell has never once been taken by siege before and I worry that men seem to think the Boltons are no threat to us. I do not like the attitude in your army.”

“Yes. I will need your help to keep them in line,” agreed Jon. “Stop any from advancing too far. I don’t trust the Boltons not to set a trap.”

Alysane gave a curt nod, but the discontent on her forehead didn’t ease. “Aye. Just be wary, Your Grace.” The honorific sounded more flippant than respectful. Her head barely bobbed as she bowed and left.

Jon pursed his lips. This is the last battle, he told himself. Winterfell is only days away.

He turned to look at a rough map one of the scouts had carved in a piece of bark, with the walls as crude oblong and the gates and positions marked in crosses. Jon remembered his childhood home, and tried to imagine besieging it. Winterfell was huge – it spanned several acres, the outer granite walls eighty feet high, the inner walls a hundred feet. The battlements were old, but they had never decayed. The great keep alone could withstand an invasion.

I could have another five thousand men here in a fortnight, Jon thought. Sigorn of Thenn and forces from the Shadow Tower had yet to arrive. There may be up to twenty-five thousand with me in a month. If they turn this into a prolonged siege, we won’t lose.

Still, perhaps the greatest threat was the weather. An early winter storm could be devastating for a large force camped outside. Is that the Boltons’ plan – hold out and hope for the elements to take care of us?

No, Jon wasn’t willing to wait months. Sonagon would end the battle for us, one way or another.

The visitors to his cabin didn’t stop. Even as the sun started to drip down over the cloudy hills, more and more protesters were coming and going. Jon had to oversee everything from supplies to perimeter, to give a hundred different orders. “You’ll wear yourself out like this, Snow,” Ewan Bole warned from the doorway, as he stood guard stiffly.

Jon could only grimace. The news had spread quickly that they would be marching out on the morn.

It was dusk, but the thick, black clouds left the air bleak and cold. Jon was wide awake, fretfully pacing all night. He could have looked for Val, but he was left too anxious and unquiet to even think of taking comfort with her.

The camp was stirring restlessly, torches fighting against the wind and snow. I am so close, Jon thought, only days away. The stress of leading a whole army felt unbearable sometimes.

He saw the dragon snoozing gently on the ice, white scales shimmering in the torchlit gloom. His Dragonguard had set up camps circling the dragon, huddled around fires and small fishing holes on the lake. There were twenty-seven men in his Dragonguard now, but only twenty of them were with the host at the moment.

Jon reached out gently, and the dragon felt tired. Too snoozy to respond. Mayhaps Sonagon is the only creature that is sleeping tonight.

The camp was fortified. The men were organised. It was nearing dusk, which meant there was nothing to do but wait until morning to start the final march to Winterfell. Jon looked around the camp staring at the bulwark of shovelled snow and earthen spikes around their camp.

Tomorrow, I assault the castle I was raised in, he thought with a sigh. He could feel the tension in the night. Tomorrow there will be a battle, perhaps several. It lingered in the air, put everybody on edge.
In the sky, a gibbous pale moon glimmered behind the black, swirling clouds, barely visible. Why is it that full moon always makes everything feel more… agitated?

A muffled roar echoed from the distance, followed by the sound of great mammoths trumpeting. Jon could barely see the giant camp at the far side of the host – huge figures huddled like rocks across the lake. The giants and their mammoths were still a source of conflict in the camp; even after months of travelling with the free folk they had to be kept to their own corner at the north-eastern fringes of the host. As devastating as the giants and their mounts were in battle, they were not the most docile to camp alongside.

Much like Sonagon, actually, Jon thought with a grimace. Twice now, men had almost died from irritating Sonagon in his sleep, and it reached the point that Sonagon had to be kept well away from the host.

The sound of a mammoth’s horn filled the air. “Toregg,” Jon ordered to his man. “Find Hatch and see to the giants, they sound unsettled.”

“Aye, king,” Toregg nodded, before stomping off. Doubtless there would be another complaint of northmen intruding on the giant clans, or their mammoths breaking the perimeter, Jon thought. Such scuffles happened several times a week.

Across the ridge, there was sound of yet another squabble breaking out between free folk and northmen, while raiders and soldiers rushed to extinguish it. Jon turned, trying to assess it. The camp was never quiet or peaceful.

“Snow,” Jon heard the Greatjon call to him from behind. “We need words.”

“Lord Umber.” He turned. The lord’s jaw was tight, his gaze dark under his half-helm.

“I’ve been hearing things, Snow. What do you know about Creston?” the Greatjon demanded.

“I’m not familiar.”

“It’s a village by the kingsroad to the north of here. Little place, my son and I stopped at it often enough on the road to Winterfell.” His voice was grim, walking closer imposingly like a wall of mail and muscle. “A few farms, a mill, a pretty lass used to serve in the tavern.” There was a pause, as if daring Jon to speak. He didn’t. “And now I hear that your wildlings burnt the village to the ground.”

What? Dammit. “Lord Umber, I was not–”

“Does it fucking look like I care for excuses?” the Greatjon growled, dangerously low. The man was often shouting, but his voice was most dangerous when it turned quiet. “You promised me you’d keep those savages under control, Snow, and then my men overhear yours bragging – bragging! – about what they did to that village.”

“It was not my order,” Jon protested. He could see the commotion in the camp spreading to the north. Dammit.

“Yet it happened. You promised me there’d be no raids, Snow.”

“I will see to it, Lord Umber, I will.” He stepped forward, sizing up against the lord. The Greatjon looked ready to spit on him. “I don’t know which warband was responsible, but I’ll find out.”

“Aye, and now I’m wondering how many more villages have been pillaged that I haven’t even
“I will find whoever is responsible, I will make sure—”

“Your Grace!” A voice called through the gloom, and Jon heard shuffling feet through the snow. A podgy figure was running towards him. Harlow was panting for breath, face covered in wool-lined hood. The Greatjon glowered. “Your Grace, there’s – the Ser Wylis says there’s a rider from White Harbour, Your Grace. They are calling for you.”

“I think a messenger, Your Grace,” Harlow said with a gulp, quickly lowering his head.

“We ain’t done here,” the Greatjon warned looking at Jon.

Jon turned to the Greatjon impatiently. “I will deal with this later, my lord. If there’s been word I must see to it.”

There were other bodies moving in the same direction. From the Manderly encampment, a trumpet bellowed. Jon heard Lord Umber calling after him, while Harlow quickly rushed away to spread the word. On the ice, he saw the fires of his Dragonguard stirring.

The Manderly encampment was towards the southern edge of the village, by the broken and rickety dock on the edge of the icy lake. In summer, you could have launched fishing vessels from the small boathouse that would trawl all the way to Long Lake, but not when the waters were ice. Ser Wylis and the White Harbour knights took the old boathouse for themselves, while their men huddled in wool and sealskin tents compared to the hide and leather of free folk. House Manderly provided the vast majority of their heavy horse, and the green merman banners fluttered over tents. Another trumpet blew – they weren’t under attack, but calling for attention urgently. “What the blazes is going on there?” Jon heard the Greatjon grumble behind him as he followed. Jon didn’t reply.

He saw Ser Wylis’ party at edge of the encampment, figures gathered in front of a bonfire by the boathouse. A crowd was already forming, their sharp murmurs barely audible over the windy wails. Jon heard Tormund’s voice shouting over the din. “Bugger off, you cravens!”

“If we do not move out now, we could—” That was a highborn voice, fighting amidst the rising frenzied racket.

“You don’t get to give us orders, kneeler!” a wildling jeered.

“–is more important, they won’t be able to hold!”

“The commands are clear, we must gather south–!”

“You do not command us.” Jon easily recognised the Weeper’s guttural voice, growling to the sound of murmured agreements.

“–under attack!”

Jon broke into lopsided jog. He could see the figures gathered before a bonfire in front of a barnhouse, horses neighing while more and more pressed to be heard.
“What’s going on?” Jon shouted, while Ser Alek and Ewan shoved their way through. Jon noticed how the White Harbour knight received more than a few glares. His voice struggled to be heard – Jon was wearing his hood, and few had recognised the king approaching. “What is happening?”

“Order, you bastards!” the Greatjon boomed, so loud that everyone went silent. “The blazes is this?”

He saw Ser Wylis, red-faced, caught off-guard. “Your Grace,” the knight gasped. “The southern patrols spotted a rider, but in the snows they weren’t sure. Three men had to go out to find him, I thought it urgent, but your wildlings…”

“Speak, Ser Wylis,” Jon ordered. “There was a rider?”

“Aye,” the Weeper snorted, and his armour clanged as he stepped forward next to Jon. “And these cravens want to run away.”

“A messenger hailing from House Beck of Daleton to the south, the man rode his horse so hard the beast nearly died. House Beck relayed a raven from Ramsgate,” Ser Wylis insisted, “who received the message from House Locke, who speaks of fishing sloops coming from Sisterton. Your Grace, Lord Locke must have sent many ravens, we’re lucky that this one managed to find us, Oldcastle is reporting—”

“—is reporting a fleet of warships sailing through the Bite. Your Grace, White Harbour itself is under threat.”

What? Jon could see the nervousness in Ser Wylis’ face. Many other northern knights looked the same. “How many?”

“He writes of a great fleet. Truthfully, Lord Locke doesn’t know, but he guesses fifty.”

“Aye, and I could write that my member is four-foot-long and oft used as a spear,” Tormund harrumphed. “Those little words mean nothing unless someone is actually about to get stabbed.”

Standing next to Ser Wylis, Jeremy Locke flustered. “You doubt my father’s word?”

“I doubt his sense, his wits and, hells, his messenger,” Tormund retorted. “How do we know those words are true?”

“Let me be clear, ser,” Jon pressed. “Are you saying that White Harbour is under attack?”

“Aye,” Ser Wylis gulped. “Lord Locke writes with the utmost urgency. The garrison at the city will not be able to hold.”

Jon shook his head, but he felt uneasy. “It doesn’t make sense, a fleet of fifty ships? On the east coast? How could House Bolton muster such a thing?”

We were never expecting an attack against White Harbour. We secured the lands piecemeal, and House Bolton doesn’t have a fleet.

“Perhaps it’s not them, the fleet of King’s Landing, or the Redwyne’s…”

“They are both indisposed with their own wars,” the Greatjon said. “There should have been more warning.”
“Your Grace, I do not know,” said Ser Wylis. He sounded pained. “But the message is at least three days old already. White Harbour could be under attack right now.”

“What of the White Harbour fleet?”

“Manderly’s fleet is dispersed, but even if it musters in time they will not be able to hold the harbour against such numbers,” Jeremy Locke chimed. “The city is in peril.”

“Only if the force is a large as the man says,” the Weeper said, to mutters of agreement. Lord Umber looked torn. “How can we base anything on a single bloody scrap of paper?”

“But if it is,” Ser Wylis urged. “Your Grace, White Harbour will need support. Let us gather mounted men to move swiftly. And we must fly the dragon south.”

“On one letter, on the eve of battle?!” Tormund’s voice was incredulous, and Jon was caught looking at Ser Wylis’ desperate face. He felt the dread seeping through. “Far more likely that someone is sending bloody lies.”

Move Sonagon south? “The storms…” Jon muttered. They had seen the black clouds rumbling south, not even Sonagon could fly safely through such weather. When the storms hit it could well block the path.

“My father would not have lied…”

“What of our families?” Ser Wylis insisted. “We have families – wives, children, babes – in the city, to lose such… We must delay the march on Winterfell, Your Grace, turn south instead.”

“To delay costs lives, boy,” an old wildling said angrily. “We got eighteen thousand men exposed right here in the snow.”

“If we knew for sure the words were true, then maybe…” the Greatjon muttered, and then shook his head. “But no, we can’t commit from one letter alone. Those words and seal are too easily forged.”

Jon agreed, but Ser Wylis’ face looked desperate. Jeremy Locke was by his side, and many other White Harbour knights looked unnerved. “And yet the second letter could arrive far too late! To wait on a second rider reaching us, in this weather, how could we…?”

“We can’t trust them,” the Weeper insisted.

“You dare to doubt–” Jeremy bristled.

“If there’s an assault–”

“–re outside the gates of Winterfell!”

The voices reached fever pitch. In the distance, he heard the sound of giants booming, barely audible over the wind and snow. The ripples were spreading outwards, the whole camp felt like a melting pot. Where could such a fleet come from? Could White Harbour truly be under attack? His initial instincts said no, but…

Jon’s hands tightened. “Enough!” he snapped, but the voices barely ceased. “Enough! Ser Wylis, I understand your concern, but I cannot move Sonagon right now without proper cause.”
The knight’s mouth opened to object. “However,” Jon continued. “I have my shadowcat at New Castle still. If the city is truly under attack, I can soon tell through her.”

“You can know?” Jeremy Locke demanded.

“Aye, I am linked to her.” And yet the shadowcat is far away, and my link to Phantom has always been tenuous. Jon grimaced. “I need… I need concentration. Let me focus. Give me time, and I will bring you a better answer.”

Ser Wylis gaped, and then nodded. Other northmen looked confused too – few of them understood warging.

Phantom is sealed in her chambers. Would any of the household think to warn the shadowcat in an emergency? Jon could only try to concentrate, but the chorus of voices still rang around him. The noise and wind echoed around his head.

Jeremy was shouting that that wasn’t good enough, while Ser Wylis was fretting. Arguments rising from the free folk and knights all around him. Focus, Jon pushed. He could only try to feel the sliver of the shadowcat’s presence. Focus.

… He felt stone floors, darkness, and hurried noises…

And yet the voices still rang in his eye. More and more demands coming at him, making it impossible to think: “What is happening?”, “The letter says…”, “Your Grace, the giants…”

“Fuck you and you kneelers.” Jon heard the Weeper curse. “Fuck you if you think the free folk will jump to attention for you and yours!”

Jon’s eyes snapped open. In the crowd, he saw the Weeper facing off against a burly knight. “You are obligated to White Har–”

“I ain’t obligated to shit,” the wildling’s voice rang, spittle dribbling with every word. “You and your pansy knights don’t order free folk around.”

“That’s enough, Weeper!” Jon snapped. The air was too tense, everyone’s blood running too hot. The dread and the panic seemed to seep into the air. This is not helping. “Move these people out, this is over! I want this fire cleared. Weeper, go patrol the bulwarks.”

The raiders face twisted in fury, but Jon was already turning away. “Clear it out, we’ll deal with this properly in the morn,” Jon ordered to Tormund, and then turned to Ser Alek. “Ser, see to Ser Wylis. He seems distressed – reassure him, keep him content.”

Both Tormund and Ser Alek nodded. Too much happening, Jon cursed. Could barely keep track of half it. I need time to think and focus.

“We’ll deal with it in the morn!” Jon snapped. With cooler heads.

There was already a crowd, blocking his way back to his cabin. Jon could have groaned. The night was stressed and anxious and nobody was sleeping. It didn’t sound like the arguments around him were settling.

Morgan Liddle was at the front of the group, along with many other clansmen. “Snow, I heard about the letter,” he growled. In the dark, his eyes flashed with anger.
Jon’s voice turned curter than he intended. “Ser, the Manderly men will inform you, but excuse me—”

“I want you to inform me, Snow,” Morgan replied, stepping sharply in front of him. There were shouts from the free folk. There was an iron axe at the clansman’s side, and his hand wasn’t far. “Is it true?”

Jon blinked, startled. The clansmen were stirring, and the Middle Liddle looked seething. “Excuse me?”

“Bloody bastard,” Morgan cursed. “I knew we shouldn’t have called for you, Snow.”

“Stand back, Morgan,” Jon growled, fingers twitching for Dark Sister. “What are you speaking of?”

“The letter, Snow.” Morgan waved a curled parchment in his other hand accusingly, as if that was supposed to mean something. “You think we wouldn’t find out?”

“You are mistaken, ser.” What is this? The man seemed to think Jon was being evasive.

The man’s jaw clenched, the scar over his cheek twisting. He stepped in confrontation, towering over Jon. “You deny it? I got from your own man, Snow. You promised that you would save the girl, and I’m fool for trusting an oathbreaker’s word.”

Jon stepped forward too, until they were nearly pressing against each other. Ewan Bole shouted warning, while free folk clutched spears. “I have not seen that parchment before. I do not know what it says. You are mistaken. And I do not have time for this.”

He tried to push back, but the man blocked his way. “Step back Morgan!” Ewan shouted.

“ Fucking liar,” the Middle Liddle spat, slamming the parchment against Jon’s chest. “It says that you’re a fucking liar.”

The heavy hand jarred his shoulder. Jon fumbled trying to grip the parchment in his gloves. In the dark he couldn’t make out any words, but it was written in pink paper. Boltons? Jon thought confusedly.

“I trusted the Lady Mormont when she said we could trust you,” the man cursed. He was really angry, and Jon was just left baffled. “And the one thing that you promised – the one thing that actually made us rally for you – you said you would rescue the Ned’s girl.”

Wildlings stepped forward warningly, and Jon had to hold up his hand to stop them. “She is my sister and I will.”

“Then explain the bloody letter,” Morgan growled. “And the nose!”

What?

The seal was already cracked, the parchment worn. It was so hard to even pull the page straight in the howling wind and flecks of snow. Jon had to squint to make out the words in the flickering torchlight. “To Jon Snow, King Beyond the Wall,” the curled handwriting read, “I, Roose Bolton, Lord of the Dreadfort, Warden of the North, offer my complete surrender.”

What??
All around him, there were shouts and rustling bodies. The Middle Liddle was demanding answers from Jon when he had none to give. The mountain clans were well and truly riled up. All semblance of order was lost in orchestra of incensed voices. It felt like the chaos was rising around him. What’s going on here?

Jon could only struggle to make out words, still staring baffled. “All I ever intended was a peaceful land and a quiet people, and yet I will not ruin the realm in defiance. In return for safe passage for me, my wife and my loyal men beyond the Narrow Sea, taking with us the wealth of our houses,” the letter read, “I offer the complete and unconditional surrender of my forces, and the safe return of Arya Stark of Winterfell.

“My prime concern is the security of the realm, my family and my allies, and I am forced to place my faith in that you can preserve it.

“If accepted, I shall surrender Ramsay Snow, my ill-blooded ilk, to answer for his crimes. I do not, I have never, condoned such brutality; I am prepared to surrender Ramsay to your justice. All I seek is the promise of safe exile and there need not be a war.”

It was signed, “Roose Bolton, Lord of the Dreadfort.”

People were shouting. Jon was caught off-guard, trying to keep up. “And that arrived a month ago, with more following it. Lord Bolton offered the same surrender four fucking times,” Morgan Liddle accused. “Why the fuck did you refuse the offer, Snow, and why did you not tell anyone of it?”

Wait, what? Jon was struggling to process it all, but Morgan Liddle had already reached his own conclusion. All around him the camp was howling. “I have not seen this before.”

“Your maester says otherwise. It was delivered to your quarters.” What? “You know I think, Snow? I think you never intended to save Ned’s girl from the beginning. I think it’s better for you if you let Arya Stark die, so nobody can challenge you.”

“Tell us about the nose, Snow.” That was Old Torghen Flint’s voice, staggering with his spear as a walking stick. “The Bastard of Bolton threatened you with the poor girl’s severed nose, and then you abandoned her for the dog to cut off more parts of her. You wanted Arya Stark to die.”

“I… I did not,” Jon protested, but his head was spinning. The severed, wrinkled nose that Ramsay Bolton sent to him at Castle Black. The nose? I never told anyone about the nose. I’ve been trying not to even think about the nose. Sam and Val were the only ones who knew of the pink letter, how could the clansmen find out…?

“You didn’t want a surrender, did you?” a man accused. “You wanted to burn them all and let Arya Stark die.”

They were pushing too close, the crowd stirring. “Stand back!” Ewan Bole ordered. “Your Grace, get back.”

“Why did you keep the letters a secret?” Torghen Flint demanded. Crowds turn into mobs turn into riots… “Why hide them unless you had something to hide?”

“I did not keep that bloody letter from you, I have never seen it before!” Jon snapped, but there was no chance to explain. Too many voices all shouting, he couldn’t reply to them.

Their glares were all accusing. They found these letters and they were already convinced of his guilt, for it confirmed what they had already feared. The mountain clans were fiercely loyal to Stark. Declaring for Arya was the only thing that persuaded them to come to my side, and if they think I abused that…

He heard more accusations. Jon’s head was spinning. “You are mistaken,” he shouted, shaking his head and pushing his way through. Heart was pounding. Get to the cabin. Calm down, focus…

“Enough of this, I have urgent matters to see to.”

Bodies all around him, and in the dark Jon couldn’t hardly make out anything more than stomping and flickering figures.

“Your Grace…!” That was Ewan Bole, shouting warningly.

He heard White Harbour men stomping up behind him, their green cloaks billowing in the increasing wind. “Ser Wylis demands to know what of White Harbour!” A White Harbour knight shouted from behind.

There was a panic rising. More voices, blurring into each other. Jon tried to see, but the bodies blocked his view. All the cries muffled together, a howl like the storm…

“What’s bloody going on here?”

“You want your sister to die, trying to usurp…”

“Bastard–!”

“Fires!”

“We must return to the city…!”

“Snow, the giants are–!”

“Fucking wildlings! A sudden voice shrieked through the gloom. Jon didn't know who was bellowed, but it was like scraping a flint over dried kindling. “Fucking savages!”

Something snapped. He heard a muffled cry, and bodies thumping together. A fight. The earth rumbled. Somebody lunged at somebody else. Jon couldn’t even tell who was attacking who, or where…

There was no order, there was just so many bodies. All of them armed and on-edge and not sure what was happening… “ENOUGH OF THIS!” Jon screamed at the top of his lungs. They all wore hoods against the snow, in the crowd and dark it was so hard to even tell who was who. “ENOUGH OF TH–”

And suddenly the cabin collapsed as with an almighty shape exploded through. Jon felt something collide against his skull.

The earth trembled, great roar trumpeting…

Bodies screaming, running in chaos.

Flames, immense cries of pain.

His head spinning, couldn’t understand…
Jon glimpsed a great mammoth running amok, stampeding wildly through his cabin. Its shaggy fur flickering smoky red, blazing with the stench of scorched meat as the creature went mad with panic. Everyone was running, crashing into each other, while the mammoth thrashed.

Its great trunk blared with an ear-shattering cry. It’s on fire, Jon realised dumbly. Someone set the mammoths on fire, and they stampeded…

All around him, it was like the whole camp was being plunged into pandemonium. People were running, screaming, fighting. He saw more flames; the ground was shaking…

His forehead was bleeding. A splinter from the cabin cracked against his skull when the mammoth burst through. Ash and smoke in the air. The whole crowd had been sent scattering, he couldn’t even make out any figures.

Under attack. That one thought pushed its way to forefront of his mind. We’re under attack. Need to muster, need to rally…

Men screaming his name. “Snow!” the call came. A chant in the dark, the voices strained, urgent. “Snow, Snow, Snow!”

“To me!” he screamed, but he was still gasping for air. Bodies rushing towards him. “To m–”

His throat jammed, the word turned into a grunt. His blurry eyes focused to see a flash of steel. A dagger in a man’s hand, as it slashed at him. Jon twisted from the knife, just enough so it barely grazed his skin. He felt blood welling over his cheek, the warmth stinging against the cold.

Jon could barely even make out the figures approaching him. They had just been shapes in the crowd, slipping out of the blackness. His hands reached for Dark Sister, but his fingers were suddenly stiff and fumbling.

Steel flashed again. His flailing arms managed to catch the blow from the front, but the blade from the side caught him completely off-guard.

His felt himself gasp as blade hit his torso, grinding against chainmail. He didn’t feel the edge, it was more like a kick to his chest. Pain washed over him. Stick them with the pointy end. His whole body trembled, trying to thrash, but in the dark and madness…

Someone was still screaming for him, calling his name. He heard the clash of fighting. In that moment, there was absolutely nothing but stampeding feet, black shadows and screaming shapes.

Val

It was a cold night. Tense. Quiet and restless.

She sat and she watched the sun slowly setting over the snows, her face huddled under double-lined furs. Val had spent a long time debating on whether to try to sleep; to keep herself focused for the coming morn, but her nights had been restless for a while now. In an army on the march, most would welcome whatever rest they could have, wherever they could find it. But something in Val kept her awake, restless and pondering, where others would sleep.

Instead, tonight, she sat by the cages of ravens, sheltered under a thick hide tent, snows packed around it. The birds had been carted by donkey all through the snows. The black birds fluttered, pecking at their metal bars, cawing for corn. The maester, a brown-haired, round-shouldered and aging man named Medrick seemed nervous with her presence. Still, she didn’t care to leave, and the birds fascinated Val.

There were two maesters travelling with the army; one a young greenboy named Henly who seemed constantly scared out of his wits, and the other the fretting, fidgeting Maester Medrick. Henly had come serving House Slate along with the Manderly men, while Medrick had been with Lord Umber’s host since Hornwood. As far as Val could tell, their duties including ferrying letters, seeing to injuries among the nobles, and trying to stay away from all the free folk.

Outside, the sky was dark and the camp was ready for war, but during her restless walks Val oft found herself lingering by the maesters’ tents. Benefits of being the king’s paramour, she thought with a quiet scoff. I can go wherever I wish.

Paramour. She knew what it meant, but the label was meaningless to her. Still, these southerns seemed to have put the name onto her, and Val had better things to do than object.

The ravens pecked the tips of her fingers hungrily, while she dangled her hand over the cage. Maester Medrick was fidgeting, cycling around his birds with handful of corn, as he always did when he was nervous. He is a podgy greybeard, not a man comfortable with war.

“So these birds,” Val asked curiously, after long stretch of silence. “They send messages. But how do they learn where to go?”

The maester blinked in surprise. “My lady?”

“These birds, how do they work? I’ve known men who trained hawks to hunt, but how could you train so many birds to deliver messages?”

“Um, the ravens are trained to recognise castles, my lady,” Medrick explained. “They are bred for strong homing instincts. Most know only of a single castle. Some few can be taught to fly between two or three castles, but those are rare.”

“Rare,” a raven echoed between the bars. The maester flicked at the cage. “Rare, rare.”

“So I understand. Then you keep a bird trained for a certain location?” The maester nodded. Val scratched her chin. “But then how do you get the birds back?”

“Often you don’t,” Medrick admitted. “Most of a maester’s rookery is collected from birds that have been sent to you.”

“And if you run out of birds?” she mused. “If you send more ravens than you receive?”

“Then you must either trade birds from a nearby castle, or send a request to the Citadel in Oldtown for a new shipment.”

“And then who teaches them?” Val pressed. “Does that mean there must be a person who walks a learning raven to a new location and repeats the name? Is there a poor sod who has to travel between every castle to teach the ravens?”

The maester seemed off-guard by her questions. Perhaps it was so mundane to them that nobody else asked? “It is difficult,” he explained, blinking. “Most maesters have to work together to teach their flocks. When a bird is learning, first we teach it to follow a more experienced bird. Quite often, there are birds that arrive with blank parchment – they are requests for a local maester to train that bird, release it, ensure it comes back to their castle reliably – and afterwards it is expected they send the trained bird back to the maester who sent the request.”

“I see.” Val mused. “And yet that could only work so long as every maester train each other’s flock.”

“Just so.”

“Is that not exploitable? What stops one person from using their birds without helping any others? Or couldn’t an enemy steal all the ravens from a certain a castle?”

“The... The Citadel, my lady. That is why all maesters are trained at Oldtown – we are an order that must rise above such conflicts. Maesters must focus on the greater good,” There was just a hint of a quiver in Medrick’s voice. “Maesters must share and trade with each other freely to keep the communication working. Lest your castle may end up like Greywater Watch, which can neither send nor receive any messages at all because they have neglected their ravencraft.”

She nodded as she moved her hand away from one of the cages. The bird cawed for corn. “But you are not in your castle at the moment – these ravens won’t know where to return to, correct?”

“That is correct. We can only reliably send messages; a camp on the move cannot receive them. The birds will return to their trained roost only.”

Her gaze moved around the cages. The maester stood stiffly like he was being interrogated, Val noted with amusement. She was just curious.

“I took a good selection ravens, trained to the most significant of the northern castles, and a few of the greater keeps. And I keep track of the birds diligently,” he explained quickly, pointing to each in turn. “Those birds are trained to White Harbour, they are important. Those are for Last Hearth. Those three are for Castle Black, and they have suddenly become in high demand. I cannot send any raven further south than Moat Cailin, I’m afraid, with the exception of one bird trained for King’s Landing, which I dare not send but for the direst message.”

“They try. But Hornwood has had little reason to message distant castles in the realm for a long time. If my lord wished to send message to a holding for which we lacked the birds, then common practice is to relay the raven through a greater rookery, like Winterfell or White Harbour, and request for that maester to forward the message onwards. If I were to send a letter for... somewhere in Dorne, for example, it is possible that the letter would have to be relayed between several castles.”

“So many distant places. How queer to think your little words can travel between them,” she mused. “But it hardly the most secure means.”

“It has its limitations,” Maester Medrick said, before risking, “You... You are very curious about ravencraft, my lady.”

“It is... interesting,” she admitted. “You southerners treat it as something so mundane.”

She wondered what it would be like, to have a raven’s wings. To be able to fly between some many queer and exotics places, lands so vast that Val hadn’t even known of them beyond the Wall. Tis a big world, Val thought with a twinge of sadness.

“The art of ravenry is one of the cornerstones on which the Citadel itself was founded,” Medrick explained. “It is one of the core duties of every maester, to allow communication between the realm. Without us, the realm would shatter and break.”

“Indeed.” What a strange thought. Val tried to imagine any of the free folk devoting their life to something as trivial as other people’s letters, and she couldn’t. Sacrificing themselves for the convenience of others. And yet, nevertheless, all of these ravens in cages and maesters in chains kept this southern realm running. Each one of them was a greying old man, but they contributed to something greater.

How long would it have taken an army of this size to assemble, if we hadn’t have been able to send ravens from White Harbour to Castle Black to Eastwatch to Last Hearth? They would have had to wait for messengers on foot, and maybe they would have lost their timing altogether.

Maybe that was why the free folk had always lost in every invasion, she mused. The southerners were just so much better established, better organised, the ‘wildlings’ had never really had a chance.

Outside, the sun was setting, and the gloomy skies were turning dark. The camp felt restless. Nervous. It would likely be a battle tomorrow, and the unease lingered in the air. Val had found that it was better to distract herself rather than fret.

“Help,” a raven cawed dumbly from its cage. “Help, help, help.”

Val stared at the bird curiously, as a few others picked up the chant. She just shrugged, and turned away.

Jon will be pacing, she thought quietly. He always started pacing, winding himself up and obsessing manically. She knew Jon well enough to know how prone he was to turning stoic or snapping with nerves. Perhaps Val would have gone to him, except Jon wouldn’t want to ease off tonight. She cared for him, sweet fool that he was, but there were times when getting him to relax was like drawing teeth.

“Jon,” another raven cawed. That caused Val to stare. She wondered where it had picked up the word. “Jon, Jon, Jon.”

Noise from outside, beyond the tent’s furs. The camp was a bustle. Val didn’t care to be caught up in it, she wished to linger in this little place of peace and quiet.

She roused herself and idly set herself to her curiosity. She found herself thumbing through scrolls and parchments filled with words that she could not understand, keeping out of the maester’s way as he saw to his own duties. Medrick’s logged all of the army’s correspondence, she noted. She couldn’t make sense of the words, but she could still tell something of the nature of most of the letters. The messages meant for nobles and lords were all long and squiggly, filled with far more details, courtesies and addresses than needs be, while the stock counts and scouting reports were all short and abrupt, oft with few words, some marked with more scrawling numbers than words. Many field commanders couldn’t read, and so they oft sent doodled sketches with stick figures and maps rather than proper letters.

Occasionally, there were small sheaves of parchment with large, crude lettering, written by a hand using the charcoal as one would a carving knife to wood. She had caught glimpses of these letters in Jon’s rooms. So the Lord of Bones has been teaching himself to write, Val noted, riffling through the sheaves.
There were quite a few letters from Rattleshirt, actually.

She found herself distracted, flicking through the crude letters and trying to figure out what they were saying. Maester Medrick was twitching, his hands fumbling as he went through the locks on the cages, feeding the ravens a cage at a time. Oft, he would fumble, dropping a handful of corn to the floor of the cage, where the ravens would fight over the cobs. Val observed him through the corner of her eye, as he fumbled yet again, slightly sweating despite the cold. He is really nervous.

After a passing of minutes, a haggle of mountain clansmen came looking for the maester, and he met with them outside the tent. Whatever they spoke of, she didn’t pay attention. The maester went off together with the clansmen, seeming to linger outside the tent for a moment, not quite looking at her. Val frowned, realising her sudden solitude.

Time trickled by. Slowly, the hairs on the back of her neck started to shiver. She went through all the papers and squiggles again, picking out Rattleshirt’s. She could tell the Lord of Bone’s letters from the hand they were written in. The force from Eastwatch, under his command, had joined them two weeks ago. Yet there were copies of letters sent by him, from after that time. Now why is Rattleshirt sending messages when there was nothing to be sent?

Val couldn’t read, but she had good instincts. Something felt off but she couldn’t quite place it. It took her some time to realise what was bothering her; Medrick’s organisation was meticulous. He kept all the slivers of parchments jammed under the respective raven’s cages, everything ordered by sender and time, copies of letters sent and received in separate loosely bound books. Every letter sent and received had been copied and put into its place in the maester’s system. And yet there were holes in the system, spaces were no letters had been sorted. Differences in the numbers of letters sent and received. On its own, it wouldn’t have brought about her attention – ravens are sometimes lost, the maester had said – but the numbers were high, too high, for letters from certain specific locations and commanders.

It was all so foreign to her, but Val had to go through it again. She tried to match up the birds to their destinations, which ones were from White Harbour, which ones to Eastwatch. The nagging suspicion in the back of her head just kept on getting louder.

“Jon, Jon, Jon…” the ravens mournfully intoned, attracting her brief glance.

The southron lords all insisted on having their maester around. But who really checks what the maester is doing?

In the distance, she heard a roar coming from the giant’s camp. Snow and wind whipped through the night. Outside, she saw men shuffling in the dark.

After a moment, Val made her decision.

She pulled her cloak on quickly and stepped out through the muddy slurry, between the mismatch of tents and fire pits clustered together haphazardly. It seemed like everyone was sharpening swords, fletching arrows or wrapping rope for the march tomorrow.

Val saw the mountain clansmen stirring, and then she caught the glimmer of the maester’s chain in the gloom. Men were haggling together, ganged around Maester Medrick. Val couldn’t hear the words, but she could read their posture and tone. The maester was crouched, scared, while mountain clansmen were demanding answers.

In one of their hands, she caught sight of a pale pink parchment. A bald man held up the parchment
Val kept her hair hidden under the hood, watching from the distance. She looked for familiar faces – free folk she trusted, that could reinforce her – but she saw only strangers in every tent.

Men were moving out, trekking through the fire pits. Val’s hands twitched towards the blades on her hip – two steel shortswords with leather grips, hidden under her cloak.

This is wrong. Something was happening, yet the camp was so large she could barely tell what.

As soon as the men left, the maester was left tottering in the snow nervously. First chance she got, she confronted Medrick. The old man squealed – actually squealed – as she lunged at him, grabbed him by the collar and dragged him to one side.

“What are you playing at?” Val demanded. “What was that about?”

Wordless gasps came from the man’s throat, stammering helplessly. Val tightened her grip. “What is going on?”

There was sweat on his brow even despite the cold. Trembling weakly. Even before any accusations had been made, Medrick looked guilty. “It’s not... I... I didn’t...”

Not all correspondence made it through him, Val realised. The ravens don’t add up; he’s been sending birds nobody told him to, and receiving ones he has not been telling people about. And that pink letter the clansmen had been holding... Val had been with Jon most of the march, there had never been a pink letter. But why...?

Val had seen Medrick nod as the Liddle men confronted him.

Somebody is playing silly buggers. Her grip tightened. “Who are you answering to?!?” she demanded. “Who?”

“I didn’t... I didn’t have a...” Medrick choked, weeping. His chain dangled like the chime of bell. “… It’s my... conclave... I didn’t...”

He fell back into the snow a sobbing mess. Around her, Val heard men shouting, demanding to know what she was doing with the maester.

Val grimaced. Their camp was too large, too quickly assembled. They had free folk from dozens of clans, northmen from over a dozen houses, and clansmen that had all come together quickly. Lots of unfamiliar faces to everyone. Everyone knew that Jon Snow was in command, but nobody was really sure of the chain beneath him. Nobody really knew where they were expected to get their orders from.

She heard a muted roar break over the camp. It was coming east, from the giant’s camp. She couldn’t see anything in the dark, but she could feel the camp stirring. Movement to the east.

This is wrong. With barely a moment’s hesitation, she turned and she ran, towards the noise. She drew her blades, sprinting through the snow.

Across the lake, she saw great shapes rippling. There were specks of fires dancing. Then, shouting. Screaming, amidst dull giant’s roars. There were already groups of armed men, and hundreds of voices shouting.

There had been orders for men to leave the giant’s camp alone. The giants and their mammoths were too easily agitated.

She heard cries, grunts and in the gloom there were wrestling shapes. Men tried to rush to help, but all the bodies just made it worse.

Toregg the Tall stood head and shoulders over most of the crowd. Men were trying to push forward, but a white-haired giant at the front was stomping and wailing. “Bugger if I know!” he snapped. “Lun Leg Dar Tar just started screaming!” In front of them, the giant took a thundering step forward, Toregg’s voice bellowed in the Old Tongue. “Back down Lun! Back down and calm down!”

The great hulking shape howled something. Technically it was the Old Tongue, but the giant’s dialect was so thick Val couldn’t even make sense of it. Men were trying to push back, and Lun Leg raised a great wooden maul with an iron tip.

“Get back!” Toregg bellowed, but even his voice was lost in the chorus of sounds. “Get back, you fools!” Then, in the Old Tongue, he shouted, “What are you saying, Lun – whose attacking you, who…?”

There was an earth-trembling cry. Val caught a glimpse of flames. Suddenly, an immense mammoth burst from the camp, raising up onto hindlegs and trumpeting. Not even the giants could stop them – the mammoths lost control. Bodies were sent scattering, and the mammoths were stampeding.

Each mammoth was like an avalanche, the ground trembling as they thudded.

Everything lost control. In all the noise, it was near-impossible to tell it was happening. Maybe that was the point.

Val caught a flick of flames. The giant’s camp was on fire. She saw great shapes wielding clubs, chasing after shadows in the dark.

Three men charged forward, Lun Leg’s maul snapped outwards with bone crunching force. Three bodies splattered.

Val heard the cry that the giants were attacking. And yet Lun Leg’s posture seemed more panicked than aggressive. Men charged forward around her. “NO!” Val bellowed against the tide. “NO! NO YOU FOOLS, LOWER YOUR STEEL! STOP!”

Her voice wasn’t loud enough. No voice could be. You fools, Val cursed. They’re giants – they can’t differentiate between humans.

Somebody had slipped into the giant’s camp and started lighting fires. All the while the giants tried to chase after their assailants in the dark, more men rushed from the camp to help. Except the giants couldn’t tell that – they thought that all of the people coming to help them were also attacking them. The men just thought the giants were going berserk.

And then when the mammoths stampeded, all semblance of order was lost.

“STEP BACK!” she heard Toregg boom. Another two bodies were crunched by Lun Leg’s great swings. Corpses sent flying, men smeared by immense strength. Some were listening to Toregg’s orders, but others were not. Maybe they never heard, maybe they weren’t listening. The camp was too large, too many bodies, nobody could make sense of it. “STEP BACK!”

Giants were wrestling to try and control their terrified mammoths. Val couldn’t blame them… in that moment, with all the shouting, the darkness, the panic and the chaos… her heart was beating furiously and even she was terrified.

She saw fires spreading. She heard the clash of steel, mammoths charging blindly…

To the south, a flaming mammoth trampled through the opposite edge of the camp.

More giants coming, but they were pulling Lun Leg back, restraining him. Toregg’s voice was starting to take control of the situation, at least locally. Another giant – a matriarch, more level-headed than the fighters stepped forward and wailed questions. She was demanding to know what was happening. Toregg demanded the same.

In a beefy paw, the giant raised up a corpse from the ground, a man whose body had been crushed into pulp. Her huge hands wrapped around the corpse’s skull, easily lifting it like a ragdoll, holding it up as an example. “Attacker,” she cried. “Attacker.”

The dead man was dressed in hides and bone totems. He was a free folk. Val cursed.

Fuck. Enemies in our camp. One foe inside the camp could do more damage than a hundred outside. Traitors in our camp, and they’re hitting us we’re most vulnerable.

It was all so chaotic. Toregg was bellowing for order. The mammoths were stampeding and the giants were flailing trying to recover them. Frantic activity all around her, and Val had to make the decision on where she could do the most good.

Instantly, Val turned to the north. Rattleshirt. She saw moving speck of lights at their northern perimeter.

“Toregg!” Val screamed, pushing her way forward to be heard. “Look to the north. It’s him, it’s the bloody Lord of Bones!”

He turned. From incline, they could see the northern bulwark. It was impossible to tell any details through the dark and snow, but there was a patter of torches that were heading outside of the camp. Men in the hundreds were breaking ranks.

The Lord of Bones has been sending dozens more messages than he should have been, Val cursed, and now his men were fleeing a devastated camp. The man learnt to write so he could betray us.

“That’s him, isn’t it?” Val hissed. “Rattleshirt is in command of the north perimeter.”

King Snow had been clear. Nobody should be going anywhere tonight. Val’s hand went to her sword.

“Oh that cunt,” Toregg cursed, voice turning dangerously low. He barely hesitated before he turned towards war chiefs he recognised. “Abel, Rolf – work with Tar Tun here, help her get those bloody mammoths under control. Sten, run to Snow, let him know what’s happening. And alert the Dragonguard, make sure they’re ready!” Toregg turned and raised his greatsword, white cloak fluttering in the howling wind. “All others, on me! Now!”

Val clutched her swords tightly and ran with them. Toregg was at the front, charging north and screaming orders.
The whole camp was alive, screaming, moving, fighting. Men were bellowing, demanding to know what was happening, but Val was most fearful of all those men who might reach their own conclusions.

Panic spread faster than communication. Chaos was the bane of every army. Miscommunication was worse of all.

If Rattleshirt was up to something, a lot of loyal men might follow him out of the camp on the assumption he was obeying the king.

Val could see Rattleshirt’s men moving at the fringes of the camp. There weren’t that many – a few hundred men amidst eighteen thousand – but the torches in their hands still lit them up. It was very easy to trace the fluttering torchlight in the dark night.

A cold wind cut through them, a flurry snow sputtering from the skies. The threat of a storm hadn’t past, but the night was still bitter.

Val heard a scream howl on the wind. A clash of metal, coming from the north.

Toregg’s eyes were bloodthirsty in the gloom, and he growled. “Come on!” the warrior roared. “Rattleshirt!”

Bodies rushed everywhere. Val saw flames. She past a stable, and it blazed with fire and billowy smoke through the snow. Men were setting stables and tents alight. She heard the flames roar, horses neighing. She saw bodies clashing, but in the darkness she couldn’t even make out who was attacking who.

“Stand down you fuckers!” Toregg bellowed, but his voice barely broke through the chaos. “Stand down or I’ll put you down!”

There was another shouts and roar of flames somewhere else. It sounded further away. Somewhere else in the camp, she saw tents burning as torches were thrown madly. She could see corpses littering the crowd – but were they of foes or allies? How could you tell?

Enemies in the camp, Val thought with a flash of dread. There was nothing scarier. Foes outside could be dealt with, but how could you even identify your enemies mixed between your own men?

The brawling, the crashing bodies, the panic – was spreading outwards. Toregg rushed into the fray, while Val held back, trying to make sense of it. It was hard to understand anything from sight – the camp was too large, too crowded, too dark – instead she had to rely on all the sounds. Where was the fighting coming from, where were the screams the loudest?

Standing here, right in the middle of it, it sounded like everything was magnified a hundred times.

Suddenly, a man lunged out of the darkness at her, a cry broke through his lips as he jumped between the tents. Val barely reacted in time. She dropped as bronze speartip cut at her skull. It came so close that it scraped her hood off her cloak, but then her sword was in her hand, slashing upwards. Her blond hair billowed in the wind as blood splattered. As he fell, she glimpsed a man wearing sheepskin tied with hemp. A free folk.

She didn’t have the swing – her blade crunched against his torso, but it lacked the leverage to pierce deep enough. Instead the man howled, and jumped at her. He was too heavy, dragging her into the snow.

Her sword was in her hand, but then another – one of Toregg’s men – reacted in time. Her attacker’s head was crushed beneath a stone maul, teeth shattering. Blood splattered across Val’s face.

Across from her, Toregg had cleared through the dozen or so men who lit the fire, but the fighting wasn’t stopping. The fighting was everywhere. We are fighting free folk.

“Rattleshirt!” she heard Toregg roar. “Fucking Rattleshirt! My pa should have bitten the head off that chickenshit.”

Rattleshirt didn’t scare her, but those letters outside the camp did. This was planned, this was organised. Hitting us from within and without.

She saw the earthen spikes of their encampment to the north – dunes of snow packed around sharpened logs. Horns were echoing in the wind.

The warriors rallied quickly. At once, Toregg was charging through the snow into the tents, demanding Rattleshirt’s head. She saw figures meet them, everyone clutching weapons.

Val’s head spun as she tried to keep up. The Lord of Bones only had about three hundred men, yet Toregg’s men were still gathering.

It wasn’t a battle. No battle could ever be so mad.

So many feet pounding, hearts racing, bodies grunting and wrestling.

Focus, Val thought with a gasp. Focus, don’t let the panic overwhelm you too. Focus, stay back, think.

She heard a voice howl. Toregg was leading the charge through the tents, but Val turned around and slipped through to the barricades. Rattleshirt wasn’t the sort to get trapped in the meatgrinder of bodies; he would try to sneak away. Val kept on running, until she heard the distinctive crackling of bones and the slashing of swords.

The Lord of Bones looked like he was halfway out of the gate, trying to sneak out through the barricades in the dark. Val’s hands tightened around her sword. Grunts of fight, gurgling of blood. She saw two men fall to Rattleshirt’s spear, stabbing with bloodthirsty ferocity. His eyes looked crazed, blood splattered over his giant skull helm.

Just for a second, their eyes met. He froze at the sight of Val. Her hood was missing, and her golden hair whipped in the wind.

Then, Rattleshirt’s face twisted in rage.

“You fucking bitch!” Rattleshirt hissed, as he turned and charged. Abandoning his escape to try and kill me, she noted.

She twisted as the mammoth tusk spear jabbed into the snow. He’s fast for someone so scrawny.

Val dropped and spun, listening to the clatter of his bone armour coming for her. Blood pounded through her, so much anger… so much fury…

Her sword slashed outwards. She could see the wide-eyed, crazed fear as the blade clipped against bone. “I will gut you will like a pig!” Val shouted, meeting spear with sword. Fighting all around them, but Val could only focus on Rattleshirt.
“You traitorous fucking whore!” His spear flashed again and again. He has the reach on me, need to get close. “You chose southern cock over your own people!”

That spear was deadly. Val fell back, losing ground, but Rattleshirt was relentless. She darted backwards and forwards, forcing Rattleshirt to parry, all the while her two blades spun.

Underneath the giant skull helm, his wide eyes looked mad, greasy hair whipping over his brow. “If that fucking ‘king’ wants me head, he’ll not get it!” The spear grazed her furs, far too close for comfort, but there was no time to think of that. “I warned him what would happen when the cunt betrayed us!”

“You’re the cunt here!” He overreached himself. As he tried to pull the spear back, her sword glanced against his shoulder. Bones crackled in the wind. “Fucking traitor!”

“Like hells I am,” he hissed, and they paced around each other. There was a slight flicker in Val’s eyes.

“Who are you working with?” Val demanded. “You must have planned this with someone.”

“Bah! I told the ‘king’ – the minute he stopped acting for the free folk, my spear would be the first through his treacherous back!” he spat. “Bloody kneelers, I knew it!”

She paused. His voice, his body language… “What are you talking about, Rattleshirt?” Val demanded.

“Fucking ambush,” Rattleshirt spat. “You give me orders to lead a sortie in the middle of the goddamn night. What, did you want me out of the camp so you could get rid of me?”

She blinked. “Wait, what?” She had to shout to be heard over the wind. “There were no bloody orders!”

“Well, I sure received them.”

Was that why Rattleshirt’s men had been breaking ranks? “What about the letters?” Val bellowed. “Those secret messages you’ve been sending?”

Now it was Rattleshirt’s turn to look confused. “What bloody letters?”

There was a long pause. Around them, men were still fighting or running in the dark.

“Who gave you the order to move out?” Val demanded.

“King Snow.”

“Directly?”

“No.” She caught a flicker of doubt. “He sent one of his guards.”

They stared at each other. They both swore.

“Get your men to back down!” Val ordered, turning to run.

“Get that fool to stop killing my men!” Rattleshirt screamed, but he was running too. The bones crackled with every panting step.

She saw Toregg stamping his way through the tents, his greatsword bloody. One of Toregg’s own men tried to attack her as she ran towards him, and if Toregg hadn’t have noticed and bellowed at him to stop the stone axe could have broken her skull.

“It ain’t Rattleshirt!” Val shouted.

“What?”

“Those weren’t Rattleshirt’s men, Rattleshirt thought it was us.” Her mouth tightened. “Someone’s playing us.”

Toregg swore. She heard Rattleshirt howling for order, but it was hard for men caught in blood-fury to accept commands like that. It wasn’t a fight, it was a brawl.

They were at the northern fringes of the camp. In the camp proper, the conflict wasn’t stopping.

For a second, she caught the flicker of fearful doubt in Toregg’s eyes. Normally the young warrior was so bold and brash. “Where’s Snow?” she demanded. “Where is he?”

“Last I saw, he was with the Manderly men. He sent me off to see to the giants.”

I should have gone to Snow straight away. If this is happening here…

“We need to rally around him,” Val ordered. “Gather around him, call loyal men. If we get these people into ranks, then we’ll be able to see easily which ones aren’t friends.”

“Aye, aye, except…” Toregg looked pained. “If it’s not Rattleshirt, then who exactly screwed us?”

Val grimaced. The sounds of fighting were only getting longer, turning as loud as a battle proper, not damping down. Just how many attackers were there?

Above them, the pale shimmer of full moon glittered over the snow. The wind was churning. It might have started out as few brawls, but it was escalating. Too many warriors who attacked first and asked questions later, too little trust.

The traitors were nothing, the chaos was devastating. Firefighting is only spreading more fires. This isn’t working.

Jon. Val grimaced, and cursed in the Old Tongue. “Start calling warbands!” she shouted, as she started to break into a run. “Gather them one by one – make sure they’re men you trust. Reform the ranks, gather them together. Do it!”

Her whole body was gasping, shivering for air, but she couldn’t stop now. The king’s tent was to the south, near the edge of the lake. I’m running backwards and forwards over the bloody camp like a bloody fool, she cursed.

Over the lake, she could see the shadow of the dragon coiled on the ice. The dragon was kept far away, but it hadn’t reacted at all. That could either be good or very bad. Perhaps Jon was deliberately holding the dragon back, to avoid more chaos in the camp?

Val sprinted as fast as she could, shambling through tents and stomping bodies. Some were fighting, others were trying to call for order. She saw men fighting, being dragged to the ground. Where those the attackers or men trying to defend themselves? In the chaos and the dark, it was impossible to tell.

Eighteen thousand men, all of them unfamiliar with each other, all suspicious, all crammed together in a crowded camp on high alert. The bulbous moon was gloating over them in the

Yet these types of attacks can only work for a brief period, she thought. There were maybe a few hundred enemies scattered over a large camp? Burning tents, attacking small parties – trying to sow as much confusion as possible while slipping within their own numbers. It was devastating at night and when nobody could track them, but as soon as people caught on they would lose any advantage. Come morning, the traitors wouldn’t stand a chance.

That thought wasn’t encouraging, though. This attack is well-planned, which implies …

She saw the old fisher’s village, nestled in the tide of soldiers. She had to push her way through the mob. She heard men calling for King Snow, but Val could only push her way through the ramble.

There was a dead mammoth littering the snow, its bloody hide littered in dozens of spears. The king’s cabin had been destroyed where the mammoth rampaged through, and afterwards it looked like it had taken half a hundred men to hack the great beast down. There were corpses left as squashed paste from where the beast stampeded over them.

But there were other corpses that had died from wounds made by blades, Val realised. There had been fighting here, right next to the king’s cabin. She could see the signs of battle – skirmishes, really – leading all the way down south towards the Manderly boathouse.

Val ran. Other free folk were running too. Val heard screaming, and bodies wrestling in the snow.
She ignored the fighting outside, and burst straight into the main building.

Snow and wind howled behind her. Even in the gloom, the first thing she saw was blood.

Someone was weeping. Bodies littered the building, and they were all wearing steel armour, green cloaks, and tridents on their clasps. The sound of a sharp blade grinding through skin and bone filled the air, blood gushing.

Inside, she saw the Weeper, covered from head to toe in blood. The man had his scythe in his hand, as he separated Ser Wylis Manderly’s head from its shoulders. The bloody, decapitated head dropped to the floor. The heir to White Harbour had his mouth open, blood covered his beard, and a look of surprise and fear fixed on his face even in death.

Val’s eyes widened. She clutched her sword, trying to take it in. All around her, free folk raiders pulled up spears. There were dead bodies littering the floor and walls, blood-stained wooden planks beneath. All of the Manderly knights and commanders had been residing in the boathouse, and the Weeper’s men killed them all.

“Oh gods, Weeper,” Val called. “What did you do?”

The Weeper cast her a look, and then grunted as he motioned the others to lower their weapons.
“These bastards fucking betrayed us,” the Weeper growled, kicking the headless corpse. “Their men attacked Snow, murdered his guards and I found them trying to run.”

Attacked Snow? Would Lord Manderly betray us, or…?

There was only one Manderly man left alive in the boathouse. He was a tall figure wearing a steel hauberk with a white dragon stitched over his surcoat. The knight was sobbing uncontrollably, surrounded by dead men. By the looks of it, the Weeper had killed most of them single handed.

One knight. He only left one knight alive. “Take this traitor out,” the Weeper snapped, motioning at the knight sobbing nonsensically. Piss stained the knight’s breeches. “I figured Snow might still want this one.”

Her head was still spinning. “Where is Snow now?” Val looked around desperately, such for some semblance of order to latch on to.

“I don’t know. He disappeared in the attack, I got men out looking for him.” The Weeper spat over Ser Wylis’ headless corpse. “Fucking kneelers tried to screw us. I bloody knew they would.”

Val’s lip pursed. “Are you sure?” she demanded. “Are you sure that it was really Manderly men?”

“Fuck yes. These cunts faked a letter, trying to give them an excuse to run away before setting up this ambush. Snow refused, he was heading back when the assassins hit.” The Weeper kicked Wylis Manderly’s head as he walked, and it rolled leaving a bloody streak over the floor. The heir of White Harbour stared blankly up at the ceiling. “I saw the bodies, and a dozen witnesses pointed me to this scunner here leading the attack.”

That statement, Val struggled to process it. Jon attacked, missing, but… “Witnesses,” Val repeated. “Where are these witnesses?”

There was a feeling of pure dread coiling in her stomach. She really, really hoped that she was wrong. The Weeper stormed out of the boathouse, a great cry cutting through the air as he bellowed orders. The crowd was still forming, both northmen and free folk. So many unfamiliar faces, demanding answers. As far as anyone knew, the mammoths had stampeded and there were skirmishes breaking out throughout the camp.

Val heard the Weeper scream for his lieutenants, trying to figure out what was happening. Others in the crowd were calling for Manderly. Nobody knew where Jon had disappeared to in the ambush. Gods no…

The voices grew more pitched. There had supposedly been eleven free folk witnesses that saw Manderly men attacking Jon. As it turned out, all while the Weeper had been slaughtering Manderly’s men, those ‘witnesses’ had died trying to escape from guards the Weeper had assigned to them.

Four of the men run away and slipped into the chaos of the camp, but another seven bodies in sheepskin furs littered the bloody snow. No one in the crowd had known what was going or how to intervene.

The Weeper’s face twisted. “What the hells is going on?”

“Oh, you fucking fool!” Val hissed, keeping her voice low. Pieces started to fall in place. “Those men weren’t witnesses, they were the bloody attackers! Your men found them, and they pointed the finger at the Manderlys.”

The Weeper froze. She saw his mouth twist, jaw clenched. “No, couldn’t be – they were free folk,” he growled. “Snow’s men, white stones.”

“How do you know? Did you recognise them?”

“I can’t recognise most the people in this bloody camp!” he snapped, but his hands were gripping his scythe angrily. “But they were free folk!”

Val could have screamed. Of course the Weeper would instinctively believe free folk over kneelers. In the heat of the moment, the Weeper had been all too willing to believe that the southerners had betrayed them. The Weeper was not known for his calm head during battle.

Too much panic, the winds were howling and the chaos…

Her hands went to her head, taking deep breaths. She stared around her, listening to the shouts, screams and fights. The northmen would demand to know what happen, and the bodies of House Manderly’s noblest knights were littering the boathouse. The lords would demand answers, otherwise the whole army could schism…

How many enemies actually were there? Who could count?

No, there was no time for counting. There was nothing but the moment. “Get this bloody camp under control!” Val bellowed. “Get the men to form up, get them to stop fighting. Rout out who the real enemies are.”

The Weeper’s face twisted, but he nodded and turned away. Val’s hands were shaking. How did this happen? Who did this?

No, those were fool’s questions. It happened all too easily, actually – the free folk had no discipline. Wildlings had little experience forming large armies, and no experience in working with anyone who weren’t wildlings. Despite his best efforts, not even King Snow could change an entire culture. The intruders had cut through them in all the cracks in the army.

As for the whom… she cast a wary eye over to the black horizon in the west.

Val’s eyes looked outwards. She saw the shadow of the dragon in the distance, still coiled on the lake. There were firelights on the ice too – the king’s Dragonguard.

“Find me the king. Find me Snow!” Val bellowed, pointing over the lake. She could only guess what happened. Jon had been attacked, disorientated, so he must have run instinctively towards his dragon. A single figure in the wake of the mammoth’s stampede and the ambush would have been all too easily missed.

The wind was picking up intensity. She couldn’t see in the darkness, but she could the black cloud churning overhead.

There was a pit of tar twisting in her stomach. It was coordinated, and we reacted far too late. There had been letters being send outside the camp, that maester had been a part of some scheme. This was planned, for the maximum effect; maximum discord, maximum chaos, maximum opportunity. If I was planning an assault like this, she thought, then what would be the next step?

She didn’t like the answer she came up with.

Val heard the horns far, far too late. They were panicked, urgent horn blasts that strangled over the western perimeter. We should have had more warning – what of the scouts, the outriders… no, that is foolish too. The scouts and outriders, or anyone who could have provided warning, must have been the very first to fall.

Instead, there was nothing but a salvo of frantic howling horns in the wind, and the cries of alert rippling through the camp.

She knew what was about to happen before it did, but there was no way of reacting in time. One faction inside their camp, sowing bedlam, making sure everything was nice, chaotic and vulnerable for the main assault.
The ground was shaking, rumbling with the sound of cavalry while the air churned like a storm.

Val looked to the west, staring out over the fires and the screaming as she saw arrows raining down from the sky.

Jon

The bright blade flashed. Jon rolled.

His body oomphed as he landed onto cold, hard snow. All around him, bodies were wrestling, tumbling together. Black shapes against black.

The attacker lunged again. He tried to twist. Jon felt the edge scrape off against his iron mail, like a punch to the stomach.

Dark Sister was on his hip, but he barely even had time to reach for it…

Across from him, the flaming mammoth roared and thrashed, crashing through tents as it tried to extinguish itself.

Someone screamed, roared. Perhaps there were words, but Jon couldn’t even make them out.

He glimpsed Ewan Bole slamming into his attacker, his sword swinging hard. Jon’s head was still spinning trying to catch up, struggling to think…

Ambush. Assassins.

So many bodies, some running, some fighting, all screaming…

It was less a battle, and more fighters fumbling around in the darkness.

Ewan’s blade cracked the man’s skull. Then, another shadow skewered Ewan from behind. The Dragonguard didn’t drop, but he staggered, flailing…

Jon gasped, dragging himself to his feet. Another body lunged at him from the dark, and Jon barely twisted to block him. Strong hands wrestled at him, both men staggering as they tried to tear each other down. In the dark, Jon caught a glimpse of wild, frenzied eyes and crooked teeth. He wore sheepskin fur, with a white stone patched to his cloak.

The attacker toppled first, flailing wildly as Jon twisted out of his grasp. The man fell face first into the snow, while Jon staggered backwards. The shadows were coming for him – hooded figures in sheepskin clutching knives…

There more shouts. Jon saw green-cloaked knights drawing swords and rushing to help him. Jon was gasping for breath, trying to focus…

A great bellow broke through the wind. The mammoth reared up in pain, maddened as soldiers tried to bring it down. Help! Over here! Jon could have yelled, but his voice wouldn’t have broken over the chaos, and he was panting too hard to even scream.

Maybe there weren’t many assassins, but Jon couldn’t count them. They were better prepared, they had the advantage of surprise. The attackers were coming for him, abandoning all else just to try to kill him. Knights trying to stop them, but in the gloom and madness…
He saw Ewan Bole fall to half a dozen swipes. The assassins were coming forward. It was so dark Jon couldn't make out any details, only black bodies and bright blades.

_Run_. That one thought cut through everything else. Can’t fight them in the dark, don’t know how many, who, or where… _Just run. Run._

Jon turned and staggered away, wheezing and fumbling with every breath. His cloak had been ripped off sometime during the attack, and the cold wind cut straight through him. There were shouts behind him, but Jon could make sense of the knight.

Men were running past him. Jon staggered, still struggling to breathe. In full armour and shadowskin, surrounded by his retinue, he was a king – but now he was just another bloody and wounded man lost in the chaos. He slipped by the men in the dark, limping away still clutching his side.

The assassins had been following him and waiting for a chance to ambush the king. There was safety in anonymity for now. _Need to recover, focus…_

Jon’s feet tripped, and then he was falling down the snowy dunes leading towards the lake. The fall took his breath away, but he was up and staggering away a second later.

He felt frozen twigs snap under the snow. Then, he felt the crunch of ice as he stepped onto the lake, shuffling through the snow. Everything was pitch black – nobody could follow him in the darkness.

Behind him, the camp was alive. Screaming. All of the noises mixed together, impossible to tell any details.

He felt a slickness on his side. Warmth. Blood. His mail hadn’t quite stopped the blade. He was bleeding from his torso. He hadn’t even felt the cut.

The sounds of fighting behind him didn’t cease.

Finally, Jon collapsed into the snow, wheezing for breath. _I’m bleeding and it’s cold_, Jon cursed. _I will lose strength quickly. Focus. Think._

_Assassins_, he thought. Enemies. _Mingled among the camp to get close, taking full advantage of the chaos._

He couldn’t head back to the camp. Those assassins, they had been waiting for him, following him around in the camp. The mammoth simply provided a suitable distraction, and then they had all attacked at once. Any man among those looking for him might be secretly wanting to kill him.

Jon was in no state to defend himself. He didn’t know how many more might be waiting for another chance, or where…

There was no safety, not in the chaos. The ambush had been well-prepared, swift and devastating. And, from the sounds, it was happening all over the camp.

In the morning light they could sort out the infiltrators from the loyal men, but in the bloody night under the full moon there was nothing but panic.

Jon was shivering the snow, as pale and trembling hands tried to tighten his belt around the cut. He heard men shouting for him in the distance – “Snow, Snow, Snow!” – but Jon didn’t return the cry. _How do I know if they are assassins?_ He couldn’t even recognise them. _Focus, recover. I am safer_ by myself until I do.

I won’t die here, he thought. He was weak, wounded and exposed, but he wouldn’t die alone on the ice. How many nights did I spend trekking through the snows alone beyond the Wall, all by myself on the hunt for Sonagon?

Jon could rely on himself, he knew.

The sky was howling. The snowstorm from the north had was stirring in the need, and the skies were twisting in frenzy. Whirling snow obscured his vision. It wasn’t as bad as a snowstorm beyond the Wall, but it was building.

Sonagon. That thought was the only thing he could be sure about. I need Sonagon.

As soon as he was mounted upon the dragon, he would be unbeatable. No assassin could threaten a dragon. The Dragonguard, Jon thought desperately. All loyal and good men. Gather the Dragonguard, get Sonagon into the fray, retake control. Let the camp rally, and flush out the infiltrators…

Through the snows, he could barely make out of the shadow of Sonagon’s bulk jutted from the frozen lake in the distance. The glittering white scales illuminated by the faint fires of the Dragonguard camped around the dragon. Jon’s vision was hazy, his eyes blinking through the snows battering against his face.

With a pained breath, he pushed himself to his feet and staggered forward. He tried to reach out to Sonagon, but he couldn’t. Couldn’t concentrate. The blood loss, Jon thought with panic. It made everything woozy.

The cold clung to his skin, shambling through the snow as he tried to push one leg in front of the other.

Jon made it two dozen steps before his knees failed him. He collapsed, face first into the snow. A hundred yards, two hundred, from the shore, lost on the expanse of ice, there was nothing but snow and darkness.

Behind him, the sounds of battle rang out over the storm, torches flickering. Jon was panting, struggling to breathe, struggling to focus. He couldn’t feel the pain, it was too cold.

His mind blacked out. He might have lost consciousness, he wasn’t sure.

Jon! a ghostly voice called on the wind. Jon!

Jon’s eyes flickered. It so hard to hear anything but the rumbling of the storm, but there it was. Jon! the cry echoed again, like a wail. Strangely, it felt like he recognised the voice.

“Bran…?” he mumbled weakly, yet the wind didn’t reply. His brother’s voice was so distant, like he was shrieking something urgently yet Jon could hardly make it out.

Why my brother’s voice? Am I so close to death that I’m hearing ghosts?

Jon had to force himself to pull himself up, and kept trekking forward.

He was already so far from the coast that there was nothing but a haze of fires and frenzies struggling against the snows. The sky rumbled above him like an enormous beast stomping in the clouds.
Sonagon was before him, but Jon couldn’t see the bonfires of the Dragonguard anymore. Instead, there was nothing but Sonagon’s massive bulk in the darkness, a black shadow snoozing over the ice.

They had very deliberately let Sonagon roost as far away from the camp as possible. But where is the Dragonguard? he thought fogily. Furs, Hatch and the others should be camped around dragon. It was a cold and lonely post, but there had been nothing for it.

It hadn’t been safe to keep Sonagon in the main camp, but the dragon still needed protection. Jon remembered him thinking that the lake was a good position for the dragon – isolated, yet in the very centre all their fortifications with an army positioned by the coast.

A forlorn shriek of wind cut across the lake, nearly taking Jon off his feet. In the distance, he could see the shadow of Sonagon’s coiled over the snow. Sleeping. Why is the dragon still sleeping?

The battle was thick in the air. Sonagon should have responded. The dragon should be all ice and fury right now.

With no torch and amidst the snows, it was too dark for anyone to see him on the ice. Jon would have called out, but his lungs were straining just to breathe. His eyes tried desperately to such out any figures, but then his foot collided with something solid and he stumbled into the billowing snow.

Jon felt a shape beneath him that was so hard and cold that at first he thought it was a rock. Then, his flailing fingers grasped the jawline of a man’s thick stubble, frozen solid in the ice. A lifeless corpse that was stiff, with frozen blood gushing out of a gash across the body’s neck.

In the dark, it took a long time for Jon to recognise the body. Furs had died with his neck slit open, his contorted face frozen stiff, his whole body flailing from where the man had tried to crawl through the snow.

Jon’s breath froze. The attacker had slit Furs’ throat, and then left the corpse where it dropped.

Desperate eyes made out the shapes of the Dragonguard’s camps, the bodies already cold and half-buried by the snows. The Dragonguard had been huddled together around bonfires in camps of three or four, forming a perimeter surrounding the dragon’s roost. Now, Jon saw nothing but lifeless shapes littering the floor.

Rolf, Maris and Gregg, all slopped around a burned-out campfire with their throats slit, and frozen blood coating their cloaks. The three of them, ambushed from behind and slaughtered. The bodies were cold.

They were all dead. Every one of them. Some had tried to squirm, but many looked like they had died at their posts, bodies hunched over their cups. Jon saw the large shape of Hatch, his hands so frozen that he was still clutching a tankard in his grip.

All of the Dragonguard camped on the lake had been slaughtered.

They must have been killed first, he realised. Sonagon roosted away from camp, nobody was allowed near. The Dragonguard had been ambushed and slaughtered before any of the attacks happened in the camp, and nobody had even been close enough to realise.

Fifty men, the elite guard, all dead on the ice. How did the attackers get so close? Why did no one react? Jon stared in pure horror, barely believing his eyes. How…? It didn’t make sense. No alarm had been raised. Nobody had tried to fight, or run. How could they all just… just die and nobody Why wasn't an alarm raised?

... Why didn't Sonagon react?

The thought of Fur’s and Hatch’s empty eyes haunted him as he pushed forward. He couldn't feel Sonagon at all.

He could see the wall of Sonagon's flesh and scales above him. The dragon was coiled on the ice, its body as still as stone. For one horrible second, he thought Sonagon was dead.

Then, he saw Sonagon’s great hide rising and falling in long, slow breaths. He's alive. Jon wasn't sure whether to be scared or horrified. He's weak, but alive.

With all the concentration he had, Jon focused and tried to reach out towards the dragon. He could see Sonagon, barely fifty feet away. Sonagon! Jon screamed mentally, pressing forward with as much focus as he could muster.

The dragon didn’t even stir. Jon could feel only the faintest slivers of a connection, and through them the dragon’s body felt weak, stiff and laboured. Sonagon’s breaths were hoarse, strained. The dragon couldn’t even rouse itself.

The dread that fell through Jon’s body was colder than the ice beneath him. This was planned, a small voice whispered in the back of his mind. They attacked the camp, they needed a way to attack the dragon too.

He heard movement. There were bodies taking shape through the snows, and they had noticed him too. Jon’s hand fell to Dark Sister, his ice-coated gloves clenching the hilt.

He could see three figures stepping forward. The sound of laughter was barely audible over the roar of the wind.

How did the Boltons do this? Jon thought with frantic gasps. How could anyone do this?

“Bastard!” an elated voice called, so cheerful it was mocking. “There you are, bastard! Oh, I was really hoping I’d see you.”

Jon froze. He heard footsteps shuffling towards him. Three men. “You hear the music?” The voice laughed. “That's my father slaughtering your troops. Oh, is it not the most lovely sound?”

Jon's right hand was on Dark Sister, his left was on the wound in his side. “Did you not think that some of those northern lords seemed all too eager to join your side?” the shapeless voice laughed. “We've got ten thousand men outside your camp and one thousand inside it. Which means you really didn’t stand a chance at all, bastard.”

Jon backed away slowly, staggered towards the dragon. Sonagon, he thought, trying desperately to concentrate. Sonagon, I need you. The dragon still didn't even stir.

“Except for the dragon, of course,” the figure continued. “The dragon would have been a problem. That was my job, you see; get close enough to put the dragon down.”

Jon finally recognised the voice. In the dark, he saw a mad grin, and bright eyes. “Harlow?!“

“In the flesh,” said Harlow. Jon saw the bright grin that he had come to recognise, but it was bloodier than he had ever seen it. His blue eyes seemed to shine in the dark. He was clutching a bloody slab of iron like a cleaver. The normally clumsy stable boy looked very comfortable holding it too.

Jon stared, his brain barely working. No, Harlow has served me well for months. He was the one who saved me from the black brother’s assassination attempt. I named him in my Dragonguard. I… I made him Hatch’s squire. So many thoughts raced around Jon’s head, but the one that reached his lips… “Yo-You saved my life.”

“Why, of course I did.” Harlow seemed almost insulted by the accusation. “I don’t want you dead, bastard. I don’t want to kill you. I was really, really hoping we’d have this moment.”

I named him Dragonguard. He was a good servant; good with Sonagon, good with animals. The dragon even liked him. The other Dragonguard would have trusted him.

He slit their throats, Jon thought with stunned horror. The Dragonguard regularly carry my orders. Harlow had run of the whole camp. If Harlow passed a message, people would have assumed it came from me.

Jon's hand clenched so tight that he couldn’t feel his fingers. He raised Dark Sister, looking between Harlow and the other unfamiliar figures. “Harlow…” Jon growled.

The man only laughed, loud and clear. “Oh, we haven’t actually been properly introduced, bastard,” he mocked. “My name is not Harlow. I am Lord Ramsay Bolton, and from now on I think I’m going to call you Reek. Do you like that, bastard? Reek. Reek – it rhymes with bleak.”

Chapter End Notes

Well, hiatus is officially over. It started out with a holiday, then a stretch of busy real-life stuff, and then I decided I wanted to wait until after the end of Game of Thrones season 7 before restarting.

Next chapter should be coming pretty soon.

Also, just point out something – Jon did get pretty screwed here, and there were quite a few reasons for it. One of the main reasons is because, well, Jon is not very good at being in command.

Which shouldn’t really be surprising, to be honest; leadership is a skill like anything else, and it needs to be learned. Robb was the heir, he learned and was groomed for his role from birth, and so Robb took to commanding men naturally. Jon wasn’t – Jon’s style of leadership is almost entirely self-taught, and as such it has flaws in it.

Even in canon, Jon was appointed the leader of 600 men, most of whom he knew and was familiar with, and yet Jon still made a lot of critical mistakes. Here, he became the leader of tens of thousands of men and a very fragile alliance – Jon was not prepared for that role.

All through recent chapters, there have been a lot of mistakes going on which maybe haven’t been that obvious since it was Jon’s POV. As a general, he has been failing at delegation, neglecting the commanders beneath him, micro-managing too much, fixating on the wrong areas, and overall failing to get a good breadth of things.

Take, for example, his conversation with Galbart Glover in chapter 29. There, Galbart was warning Jon that nobles are more reliable because they’ve got families, rank and reputation that they want to preserve, whereas commoners don’t. A random person could backstab you with far fewer consequences than a person from a house that you know. Jon didn’t grasp that one though, yet Jon walked away thinking ‘Galbart doesn’t understand’. A lot of his own mistakes he makes he doesn’t realise from his POV.

The Boltons realised though. They realised and they hurt him for it.

Also, special thanks to Diablo Snowblind on FF.net for helping me a lot with these chapters. He’s writing an Iron-Blooded Orphans fic, “The Devil’s Reprisal”, that I highly recommend checking out.
Chapter 33

Chapter Summary

The Battle of the Snows

Bran

It was time.

The night air came alive with the Stranger’s coming. Stirring and shivering. Bran could feel the cold around him, icy tendrils twisting round every corner, curling like a spectral hand tightening all around them.

Meera was already moving. She hoisted Bran’s body up off the ground with a strained grunt, heaving him over her shoulder like a sack of potatoes. Meera nearly buckled lifting him, but she didn’t stop. She held a rusted iron bar in one hand to pry the door open, and a sharpened, knifelike hunk of stone in the other. Even with Bran’s dead weight across her shoulders, even after months of captivity, the bog-devil was fully willing to go down fighting.

Bran was left trying to hold on, with Meera’s bony shoulder digging painfully into his chest, staring down at her feet where the broken iron manacle on her ankle clattered across the stone. He could feel her beneath him, gasping and panting with the strain as she staggered up the stone steps of the dungeon.

“Two men outside in the hall,” Bran whispered when she reached the doorway, crowbar in hand. “Don’t.”

“Tell me when,” Meera said in a hoarse voice.

It was past the hour of ghosts, but Thistle Hall was wide awake. The Bastard’s Boys were all moving towards the courtyard, staring upwards at the sky. Even in the dark night, they could see clouds churning over the waxing moon. There was something in the air – an eerie energy that even they could feel in the night.

It's the Stranger, Bran thought with a gulp. It distorted the world around it with every step it took. I called it and it is here.

The storm brewed all around them, the sky stirring unnaturally fast. The first flurries of hail were spitting downwards.

Bran was out of his body. He could feel everything through two dozen different skins. The rodents were all twitching, screaming silently. In the woods, he heard Summer’s howl echo through the trees, warning. It's here, he thought with a shiver. It's here.

A slow boom rattled through the courtyard above. The knock of something solid jarred against the barricaded gate. The whole keep seemed to hush, every breath frozen by the noise.

Three knocks, but each one felt slow, rasping, steady. The noise felt mocking. The courtyard was rustling; dogs barking, horses quivering, and the Bastard’s Boys moving towards the gate, blades held to hand.

Bran felt the horses buckle in panic as the sound of tearing wood filled the air. Men shouting. The solid oak gates were being torn from their hinges. Old hardwood tore apart underneath an inhuman strength, the sound of splintering cracking the air.

He felt birds and bats explode from the bushes as dead things rushed through the woods. Summer smelt them; dead, decayed bodies milky white in the cold, but shambling through the leaves from all directions. The Stranger had them surrounded.

There was shouting across Thistle Hall, calling for arms. Meera broke through the door, her feet clapping over the hard stones. The walls were shivering from the buffering winds, the gales howling through the stone hallways.

Bran was in dozens of bodies at once; flickering through so many skins he couldn’t process them, trying to make sense of the chaos. He could see it. He could feel it. It was maddening, like the whole world was screaming – howling – at him to run.

The white walker was pure cold – a figure of scorched black and icy white, blade in hand as it cut forward, shambling things pouring forth from the tear in the gate. The Bastard’s Boys were all armed, holding spears, bows, axes and swords.

Seventy-four men facing against one white walker. There could have been seven hundred, and they still wouldn’t have stood a chance.

Bran could barely hear their screams over the howl of the winds.

“Run,” Bran gasped. He could feel Summer in the woods, the direwolf tearing through the leg of a misshapen corpse. There were more walking bodies, all of them flooding around the Other like a tide of rotten flesh. “The stables. The horses.”

Meera didn’t reply. One of the men spotted her, but before he could call out there were a dozen crows swooping through the hall to peck at his face. He fell screaming, thrashing at the squawking, flapping shapes. A murder, Bran thought numbly. A murder of crows.

The dead creatures shambled over the walls from all sides, shaking the battlements as they swelled upwards. Arrows were useless against them. Wood splintered and tore, and bones cracked, but they found grip where no man could. Ramsay’s men hacked, shouted, staggered, and died.

Meera had reached the main doors of the hall. Bran had already seized control of a horse’s body; there was no gentleness from him, nothing but raw force. The beast felt mad with fright, but Bran grasped the animal so hard it could have crushed – forcing the horse to stand as still as shivering statue. Meera tripped over the stone steps and Bran dropped off her shoulders. Still, she barely even hesitated as she clutched his arm and started to drag him instead. Bran’s body thumped hard against the stone, but he couldn’t even feel it.

The hallway. The steps. The stables. Bran was trying to plot their path, gathering birds to clear the way for Meera. His heartbeat was pounding so fast that even a dozen yards felt like an age. Two dead men tried to jump at her, but Bran grabbed the body of another horse and jerked it to trample through the creatures. The dead creature dragged the horse down with it, and crushed the horse’s spine with its black hands. You can’t stop them, Bran realised. You could only hope to slow them down and run.

The Other was coming closer. Bran could feel it, cutting like a blade of ice, an unstoppable knife shredding through the tide of chaos. Meera reached the horse, but her strength failed her trying to hoist Bran’s body over its back. The Stranger was outside, cutting through men with such ease its movements seemed lazy.

Bran could feel it. His lungs froze in its presence. He could feel it staring at him, even through the wall, its single blue eye as bright as a star.

“Scared little boy,” its crackling voice was almost soft as snow. It lifted the milky blade and limped forward. Even despite its lopsided gait, its every movement was sleek and graceful, like a predator in its element.

The Other was only a dozen heartbeats away. Meera was screaming something. Bran couldn’t hear it. Couldn’t think. There was nothing but terror.

And then suddenly a black cloud dropped from the sky. Everything exploded into flailing, squawking bodies, lunging and flapping at the Other. Meera fell to the floor as the shapes burst through the windows, tearing over Thistle Hall.

“Bran!” Meera screamed.

_It’s not me_, Bran would have shouted, if only he had control of his tongue. Ravens, crows, bats and a hundred other creatures swarmed around them. There were even moths, flies, hornets and wasps. Insects. Bran hadn’t even known it was possible to possess insects. Hundreds, thousands of swarming creatures all bursting around them. Bran could feel the presence blanket over the keep – an immense, shapeless being that seemed to swell upwards from the earth.

The three-eyed crow. The greenseer. Bran could feel his power in the air, seizing control like a force of nature itself. The greenseer had been unwilling to intervene to save Bran from men; perhaps the greenseer had even preferred Bran to be held captive and out of the way. Still, the greenseer would never allow the Other to reach Bran.

It was a power so immense Bran could hardly even imagine it. The birds were all around them, so many that the Other had to slash its way through. The Stranger spat a sound, a word Bran couldn’t recognise – not so much in anger, more like annoyance.

“Old crow,” Bran heard the Other tut to the screeching air. “Lost watcher. Tree-fiend. Death-stealer.”

_Dead-stealer?_ Bran didn’t know what the what the words meant, but they were said like an insult. Like it was something taunting, foul. There was no time, Meera was already pushing him onto the horse’s back. The birds spiralled and burst around them, forcing a path for them.

It felt like the wind and snow were clashing above them, like the clouds were wrestling. The storm was raging, the air crackling with power. It was so intense Bran could barely even process it, he could do nothing but try to hold on.

Bran felt himself tumbling. He was falling out of those bodies, his mind dislodged and spinning.

Behind him, he heard the creak as the tide of the dead pushed their way through the wooden palisades. The gale tore the roof off Thistle Hall, sending tiles and bricks scattering over the yard.
Bran felt Meera fumbling, trying to fight off some bloated dead woman in washerwoman clothes. Meera could only slash out with her iron bar to beat the thing back. The horse didn’t wait for her as it broke into a gallop. Bran couldn’t even be sure who was controlling the horse anymore, but it wasn’t him.

He felt Summer, rushing through the gate with jaws bared. The great wolf tore a dead man down with his fangs, and then shook the body like a rodent. Bran’s heart nearly pounded out of his chest when he saw his old friend again, leaping to protect him.

The three-eyed crow’s birds were slamming against the Other like a hail of frantic bodies. They couldn’t hurt it, but the animals were throwing themselves just to try and slow it down.

The wind, the dead, the panic… it was all too much. The air crackled. Bran felt it all spinning, burning, screaming, unable to make sense of it. It was all blurring. The world – blurring around Bran… He couldn’t…

He felt himself falling off the horse at the gates, only for Summer’s jaws to yank him out of the mud and drag him away. He remembered how the ground seemed to be shaking. He saw the forest was rippling, every tree seemed to shift in the wind. Summer dragged him roughly through the brambles, while Meera ran backwards as she fought off the dead things as well.

The earth was churning. Bran could feel an otherworldly sound echoing in the air, ringing like a song that roused the woods. A dead corpse of a black-cloaked man tried to lunge at Bran, only for the trees around it to twist – the roots of the ironwood trees seemed to curl around the thing’s legs, gripping it still. Another dead woman, entangled in rippling branches. The forest itself, Bran realised, the greenseer is in the trees.

The trees themselves were dancing around them, clearing their path and blocking the dead.

In the moment, all of the old stories that Maester Luwin or Old Nan had ever told him about the magic of the children of the forests came rushing back to him. Wearing animal’s skins, possessing the trees and the streams, moving through rocks, like reshaping the earth and the hammer of the waters. Bran could feel the power – the magic – all around him, and it was so intense it felt like a different scale to warging. This is a greenseer’s power.

Bran could see the Other’s blue eye watching him. There were yards of trees and palisades blocking the distance between them, but Bran could still feel the Other’s gaze. Above them, the storm seemed to be growing.

The last of the Bastard’s Boys was hiding, weeping, in the cellar beneath the main hall. Bran could feel him vaguely through a dozen scattering rats. The Stranger killed the man with a lazy lunge through his chest, barely even breaking stride.

We would never have escaped without the greenseer’s assistance, Bran thought with a gulp. He didn’t know how many dead things there were, but they couldn’t overwhelm an entire forest. There was strength in the trees. Even the Stranger itself seemed hesitant to follow them through the thick forest.

Meera was screaming something at him, but Bran couldn’t hear it. He couldn’t feel or hear a thing from his own body. Sometime in the clash of elements, he had become dislodged from his skin. Everything just felt numb, surreal.

Visions swirled around him. Bran saw an ancient lord – as pale as a corpse – coughing and spitting blood amongst old white roots, as he was tended to by small creatures with the shape of men. Bran saw a frail, wailing babe abandoned in the snows, waiting as silent figures came to collect it. He saw nearly a hundred cloaked men dying to an icy blade, their eyes bulging in horror before their bodies turned cold. The visions flashed before him, writhing and dancing in the air.

The whole forest was alive, pulsing with a power the trees hadn’t known for millennia. The snowstorm was spreading outwards over the mountains, the clouds brewing and churning. Flashes of cold lightning burst through the dark, and thunder rolled over the hills.

It’s a song. Bran didn’t know where the thought came from, but he knew it to be true. It felt like song, reverberating in the earth. A song so intense that Bran was left spinning in it.

And Bran saw Meera. She was gasping, wheezing and coughing blood. She looked barely able to stand, but she was dragging his limp shape, shambling through the snows. Meera was the only thing keeping him tied to his skin.

It will be chasing us, Bran thought with quiet horror. Whatever it was that the greenseer did to let them escape, Bran didn’t think he could keep on doing it.

It was a long and cold night, huddled for shelter on the mountainside, shivering in the fierce winds. Meera kept on trying to rouse Bran, but he faded in and out of consciousness. There was so much energy all around him, Bran didn’t understand how Meera could even stand it. It felt like the earth was still quaking, squirming beneath them. It was a power so vast that Bran fluttered before it like a leaf in a gale.

“Bran!” Meera was shouting in the distance, shaking his shoulders. “What do we do? Where do we go?”

I don’t know, Bran would have replied. He could feel the Stranger moving over the hills, leaving a ruined Thistle Hall in its wake. Bran remembered the warning of Osha, a lifetime ago. Osha had warned him where to run. South, as far south as south goes.

“Bran! Bran, wake up!” Meera hissed, trying to shake him awake. Bran was outside, staring down at his own unconscious body. “Bran, I don’t know what happened back there or what you did, but… but you’ve got to…”

She didn’t seem to know how to finish that. Summer moaned, nuzzling against Bran’s chest.

Meera had to hoist Bran over Summer’s back to move him the next morning. The direwolf whined in protest. They had to trek through the winds, moving as quickly and as quietly as a fatigued woman and a cripple could. The storm didn’t ease – the winds were so fierce that even Summer struggled, so sharp that they could kill a man within minutes.

The only cloak that they had was one which Meera snatched from a dead man – a hemp cloak that felt mouldy and smelled foul. Still, they both huddled beneath it, desperate to preserve any heat on their skin. Bran pressed against Meera, her lean and strong arms hugging around him so tightly, but he flickered in and out of his skin.

They could light no fires. The snows swallowed all warmth.

Vaguely, Bran could recognise the plains stretched out before them – the fields to the north of Winterfell. We trekked through here, once, he thought, back when we heading north towards the Wall. There had been eight of them back then – six people and two wolves – but now there were only two and one wolf.

Osha, Rickon and Shaggydog were gods-know-where, while Hodor and Jojen could well be dead.
Ramsay had said they were dead, but Bran wasn’t sure if he believed him. How many people died, all because the three-eyed crow was calling me?

Once, these fields had been grassy and green, but now it was hard to see anything but endless plains of snow. Winter isn’t coming anymore. It’s here.

They holed up in the roots of an old birch tree, and they chewed on bark for dinner. Not even Meera could hunt in weather like this. They had few supplies after their escape, and no help. We will starve if we do not escape the snows quickly, Bran knew.

They hid from any hunting parties, either Boltons or worse, all the while trying to make their way south. Meera had to lash Bran onto Summer’s back, despite the direwolf’s protests. A direwolf was not a pack mule – Summer might have lashed out, if they had not been so desperate.

It was an uncomfortable journey, but Bran spent most of it unconscious as he scouted around him. The storm scattered everything, even the wildlife. There were no fluttering wings in the branches, there were no foxes scratting through the trees. The north seemed to be huddled, hidden, bracing against winter.

Then, to the south, Meera reported seeing a shadow in the distance – a huge host of men marching south towards the kingsroad. It was an army, but there was no way of telling whose or where they were heading. Meera wanted to follow in their wake, to see if they could sneak in amongst the camp followers to find shelter.

“A cripple will draw attention,” Bran mumbled weakly. They had to press up close to hear each other over the sound of the snows. He was so close he could feel her heartbeat, soft and steady.

“I know,” Meera said with a grimace. “But I could go myself, try to steal some supplies for us.”

It spoke to how dire their conditions were, that Meera would even suggest leaving him.

They made poor time, and all the while the winds didn’t ease. Bran could only watch as Meera became more frail, pale and helpless – weaker than he had ever seen her. If not for Summer sticking by Bran’s side, he didn’t know how they could survive.

No, Meera would be able to survive. If she left me, she would be able to survive by herself. The very thought caused his stomach to twist. Perhaps I could survive without her too – if I left my old body behind and moved into the trees.

Still, neither of them did. They clung to each other, still futilely trying to push through the snows together.

“I can see the wolveswood,” Meera called to him. “We can shelter there. This is the last chance if we want to meet up with that army.”

Bran only nodded. Winterfell, he thought with a gulp. We must get to Winterfell. The Boltons in Winterfell didn’t matter, not anymore. Bran had to return home.

It was a dark morn when they reached the first pockmarked sentinel trees of the wolveswood. He knew these lands; he had ridden through them with Father as a boy. Those days felt like an age ago. Bran had never seen the forest so grim, so foreboding, every tree trembling in the gale. Meera clutched that rusted iron bar – the closest thing to a proper weapon they had – with both hands. Even Summer was so frail they could barely last much longer. Bran watched Meera fumble uselessly trying to light a fire, cursing and begging the woods, and he felt his gut clench.
As night fell, they saw the bulbous full moon shimmering over the woods. With the light reflecting over the snows, the moon seemed to glow as bright blue as an eye.

The weather had followed them south. Bran could feel the rumbling of northern winds moving closer. There was something in the air, that power again.

The cold crept after them, sucking their strength. The snows made hard travelling, and they had to retire for shelter quickly. We need help, Bran thought. We’re going to die out here, buried under the snows...

There was no choice. Bran took a deep breath, and he stretched out his mind.

For a second, he felt nothing but emptiness, or animals hiding against the snow. He felt an owl stranded by the winds, torn out of the sky. He felt a fox starving in its den.

Then, he felt something at the edge of awareness, like a bonfire in the darkness. There were men, thousands of men all huddled together. The minds of men felt so different from animals – where animals were sharp, distinct and focused, humans felt intricate, bright and wispy. Bran could barely focus on the presence of humans.

There were more. Horses, plenty of horses, and there were ravens too. Birds squawking in cages. He reached out to them, trying to understand, trying call for attention.

It was an army. Not too far from them, either. Ramsay had been preparing to fight against someone, Bran remembered. The Bastard King, he had said. Wildlings?

Bran reached out further, trying to understand. His mind extended, his presence flittering over the fields.

He could only blink, stuttering. Bran recognised that feeling in a way he could barely describe. “It’s my brother,” Bran stammered out. “Jon.” Jon?

Meera gaped at him. Bran could barely make sense of it. Around him, the winds howled.

They sat for a while in quiet confusion, huddled by the trees, as Bran reached out, trying to feel what was happening. Bran couldn’t make sense of half the things he sensed through his third eye.

Then, in the distance, Bran felt something spark. Like a little flash in his mindscape. It was followed by a second, and then a third, until one by one there were dozens. Each one was so wispy that he could barely feel it, but together they became something more.

It was only by the hundredth spark that he started to understand. In his mind, every presence was like a little light and when they died, they flashed. People are dying, Bran thought. I can feel them dying.

It felt like power. Like every person was a little bit of power, and when they died they sparked. Like fireflies in the night, that he could reach out and hold.

I felt the same thing at Last Hearth and Thistle Hall too, back when I had been so close it felt overwhelming. I blanked out both times, Bran realised. The feel of all those people dying around me overwhelmed me.
The tide of deaths didn’t stop. Bran could feel it growing in intensity. It was a battle. A storm of death.

Meera shuffled to his side, staring wide-eyed. Her brown hair looked wispy, like it was going grey in the snow. “Bran?” Meera asked. “What’s happening? What is it?”

Bran wasn’t sure how he could answer that. He felt like a near-sighted man trying to describe events in the distance.

He couldn’t make out any details, but he could make out the general shape of it. A cluster of men, the air broiling in the storm, and more and more presences were being extinguished. Sparks of power lighting up the sky as they dissipated. It was like raw energy, the same type that had been at Thistle Hall. Bran could feel it…

He could feel it. He felt it so much it hurt.

The flow of energy didn’t stop. He was too alert, too aware. It felt like his skin was on fire, it felt like burning.

His body started to spasm, gasping. “Bran!” Meera shouted in his ear, holding him uselessly. “Bran!”

A battle. Bran thought. It was a battle, and the clash of men – the emotion, the pain, the deaths… Bran could feel it all.

Oh gods…

“It’s Jon,” Bran sputtered. “My brother. Jon. I… I can feel him, and…”

The tide didn’t cease. In the sparks, Bran could see flashes of visions. Like beyond the green, he thought with a gulp, but… but closer… coming closer… “It feels like Jon’s going to die.”

All around him, the sky cackled and rumbled, the winds and snow tearing over the earth – like immense giants rumbling and wrestling in the sky.

The False Guard

“Oi, Harlow,” the wildling called. “Bring the bloody horses around, will ya?”

Harlow jumped to his feet at once, as quick as a rabbit. “Yes ser, right away!” he replied, grinning brightly.

“Boy, you were meant to sharpen this blade,” another Dragonguard complained, not too long afterwards, dropping the bone-handled greatsword onto the snow. “How am I supposed to swing an edge like that?”

“Oh – apologies, ser, I’ll sharpen it now,” Harlow gushed as he bowed low.

“Squire!” another shouted for him later. “Message from Eastwatch came in, deliver it on to the king.”

Harlow dropped all of his many tasks to run to his feet, eagerly. “Yes, of course!”
“Oi! And fetch us some ale while you’re up,” a Dragonguard ordered from the campfire.

“I will, ser.” Harlow broke into an urgent jog through the flurry of snow.

As soon as he returned, he heard, “Those stables are a bloody mess!”

“I’m so sorry, I’ll clean them now,” Harlow replied eagerly.

“And ready those saddles when you’re at it,” the man ordered, before shuffling away with a skin of ale in his hand.

Harlow bowed and hopped to it. “Right away!”

“Harlow, where the bloody hells are you?” another called for him shortly afterwards. “We need to prepare the dragon’s meal.”

“Of course, I’ll handle it.” He bowed again, just for good measure. “I can handle it all.”

He did everything they asked of him and more. He took on the duties of half a dozen squires, and he devoted himself to each task eagerly. He smiled and he laughed, and he laboured with such zeal.

They could have fucked him up the ass, and Harlow would have grinned and asked for more.

He wore a white stone on his chest, polished to perfection. At night, Harlow would pray with the free folk around the idol of the dragon, accepted into their fold. Even as only a squire, he was a member of the Dragonguard too. The woods witch said that he was blessed, to be able to serve the dragon so.

When the dragon shat, Harlow would be the one to clean it up. He was so very grateful too.

It took a very special type of man to be able to maintain such an act for months. One day at time – bowing low, obeying orders, and all the while he watched, listened and planned.

Of all the accusations they could lay at him, nobody could say Ramsay was not devoted.

Every single time Jon Snow greet Harlow, he bowed deeply. Ramsay bowed like a buffoon and he lowered his head – all to hide his eyes.

Dressed in finery, in his armour and bloody helm with his bone falchion, Ramsay was the Red Helm, the Monster, the Bastard of the Dreadfort. Without them, he was just a podgy young man with wide eyes and slumped shoulders, who stuttered as he spoke and was always eager to please. A boy like that could go anywhere.

It was a scheme that had been months in the making, the plan evolving and adapting at every step. The Bastard King had required extreme measures. You couldn’t backstab anybody, Ramsay had reasoned, unless you got behind them first. Jon Snow would be planning a campaign, Roose Bolton would be scheming to stop him, and so Ramsay made a plan of his own.

It had been the middle of the night in Winterfell, after a very rushed wedding, when Ramsay and his men abandoned his father’s plan and snuck off into the night.

First, Ramsay had ridden fast and sacked Last Hearth for all it was worth, and put every man, woman and child to the blade. Ramsay couldn’t allow his father or the Bastard King to get their hands on Bran Stark – either one of them would happily replace Ramsay’s status as Lord of Winterfell. Razing Last Hearth to the ground had helped Ramsay get things moving in the right direction.

While most of the Bastard’s Boys took shelter in Thistle Hall, Ramsay himself took a few handpicked men, and rode north. Ramsay killed his own horse, and dressed himself as a commoner. They buried their swords, wool and mail in favour of bows, hemp and hide. Without any armour, they became just another group of huntsmen, stumbling around the forest after the battle at Last Hearth.

There was a refuge in audacity. They had been captured, stripped, and interrogated. He had begged and shivered. Ramsay Bolton had walked right into the wildling’s army, cold, scared and exposed.

After all, acting the prisoner had been a tactic that had served Ramsay very well indeed with Theon Greyjoy at Winterfell. Ramsay’s impression of Jon Snow had reminded him much of Theon, actually. Ramsay had known that the wildlings were capturing villages rather than killing them – the risk of being put to the sword was very low. At the time, Ramsay figured that the Bastard King was trying to expand his ranks, that they would be very eager to recruit another few northmen soldiers.

Very quickly, Ramsay realised that acting servile, young and innocent would serve him far better. Even from their very first meeting in the woods by the kingsroad, Jon Snow demonstrated himself as a man who went out of his way to save the ‘innocent’.

That was what Roose never really understood. His father could only think in terms of the ‘big picture’ – he was a man leaning over a cyvasse board. Ramsay knew differently; armies were more than just blobs, they were people. Together they became a force to topple countries, but individually each man was weak, exposed and prone to manipulation. If you wanted to beat a bigger army, you had to do it man by man.

Ramsay had been born a commoner. So often, the generals forgot that their army relied on the messenger boys, the scouts, the watchmen. It was quite easy to infiltrate an army if you were alone and looked harmless, and if you could outwit a single, bored sentry keeping watch on a snowy night. The little pieces were as important as the big, but nobody ever focused on them. One man, Ramsay told himself. One man, one blade. One very... focused man is all it takes.

That’s what made the Bastard’s Boys special. They were a small force, handpicked for their cruelty, but without the cunning for treachery. Every Bastard Boy had no greater ambition than to kill and rape. Ramsay considered each one of his men, his hounds, to be worth a hundred sheep, and so far he hadn’t been proved wrong.

It had served him at Hornwood, it worked at Winterfell, it worked at Moat Cailin, and it worked at Last Hearth. Wildlings or not, Ramsay knew about human nature. Hounds and sheep.

The plan hadn’t been perfect – the dragon’s attack on Mole Town had been unexpected, and too often Ramsay had to fluke his way through. Still, he had walked into Castle Black unarmed and he made it work.

During the assassination attempt by the Night’s Watch, Ramsay had been tailing Jon Snow. The only reason that ‘Harlow’ managed to save the Bastard King’s life by raising the alarm was because Ramsay had been prepared for it. And so Ramsay acted the resourceful little goon, and he screamed for help and he saved the king. The dragon’s rage proved that it would have been unhealthy to do otherwise at the time.
Afterwards, once in earshot of King Snow, Ramsay meekly revealed a secret route to make contact with the mountain clans. Ramsay himself had been planning on ambushing the mountain clans, but he surrendered his plans to the Bastard King and Harlow started to work so loyally and gratefully to earn his place.

For all his efforts, Harlow had been so grateful to be named to the king’s Dragonguard, and very dedicated to prove himself too. The pink letter that arrived at Castle Black had been written months in advance, and prepared to provoke the wildlings into moving south with Ramsay among them. The king’s attack on the Twins in retaliation had been unexpected, but Ramsay hadn’t been disappointed.

And so Ramsay’s plan started to adapt. It wasn’t so much a plan – he didn’t need a step by step scheme, that was far more how Roose thought. Instead, Ramsay had only an intention, and the dedication to see it through.

They had planned everything to come together on the night of the full moon, all that work for a single night. The Bastard King had made his moves, and the Boltons had prepared for their own. Their armies would have been soundly defeated in the field; there had been no other choice but to risk everything in a different form of battle.

The goal had always been the same; either kill Jon Snow, or capture him, and then see to the dragon. Roose had preferred assassination, but personally Ramsay had been really, really hoping they’d capture him. With the dragon, even a rampage, even uncontrolled chaos had been acceptable to his father. If it were to rampage free, bereft of its master, his father had explained, it would only drive the realm back into their own hands. Eventually the dragon would retire and find a roost like any other beast, or the north would be forced to rally together to stop it.

For the same reason, even a mass wildling horde raiding through the north was manageable.

“War is a zero-sum game,” Lord Bolton had told him once, months ago, “and where absolute victory cannot be had, relative victory will suffice. There will be chaos, but we will cope with the chaos better than our enemies can. It doesn't matter whether or not victory is found cleanly, so long as our enemies lay defeated at the game’s end.”

“That sounds like a complicated way of asking me to kill somebody for you,” Ramsay remembered scoffing.

“Of course I’m asking you to kill somebody,” Lord Bolton had replied calmly. “That is your talent, that is why I tolerate you. And I have no doubt that you will – you are my son, after all.”

Despite all of their differences, despite their clashing mentalities and styles, there were times when Ramsay and his father did work together quite well. My father’s plan, my execution.

And now, he could see the end. Harlow stepped over the frozen bodies of the men he had spent months serving, and he laughed.

Months of work, of study, of worry, of copying orders, of passing secret messages and discreetly forging replies, intercepting ravens and constantly acting clueless… so much effort, all for working towards a single night.

And it was glorious.

The look in the Bastard’s face, as he stared up at Ramsay’s bloody grin. All around them the wind was howling and the men were screaming. “Bastard!” Ramsay cried, his heart beating in pure elation. "There you are, Bastard! Oh, I was really hoping I’d see you!"

The Bastard looked as lost as a puppy. Around them, the night screamed. "You hear the music?" Ramsay called as he stepped forward. "That's my father slaughtering your troops. Oh, is it not the most lovely sound?"

Ramsay stepped closer. The Bastard was on the snow. His eyes were wide, his face as pale as his hair. His furs were bloody, his face pale and dishevelled. He didn’t look the king anymore – he was nothing but a frantic, wounded man lost in the snows.

While Ramsay… Ramsay felt like a god.

The Bastard still didn’t understand, not really. Ramsay loved this moment. He loved the faces. He loved be close enough to see their expression after he screwed them. "Did you not think didn't think that some of those northern lords seemed all too eager to join your side? We've got ten thousand men outside your camp and one thousand inside it. Which means you really didn’t stand a chance at all, bastard.

"Except for the dragon, of course," Ramsay continued with a sneer, as he drew his sword with the utmost care. "The dragon would have been a problem. That was my job, you see; get close enough to put the dragon down."

"Harlow?!" the Bastard gasped finally. Ramsay could have choked with mirth.

"In the flesh," he chuckled.

"Yo-You saved my life," he stuttered.

"Why, of course I did." Ramsay stepped slowly, waiting for his men to catch up. He wasn’t fool enough to risk a wounded wolf by himself. "I don’t want you dead, Bastard. I don’t want to kill you. I was really, really hoping we’d have this moment."

"Harlow…" the Bastard’s voice turned to a growl, staggering as he pulled himself to his feet.

"Oh, we haven’t actually been properly introduced, Bastard," Ramsay mocked, lingering for that one last moment of satisfaction. "My name is not Harlow. I am Lord Ramsay Bolton, and from now on I think I’m going to call you Reek. Do you like that, Bastard? Reek. Reek – it rhymes with bleak."

Ramsay didn’t need to draw out the moment, but he wanted to see the man’s face. He loved savouring their expressions. He watched, and watched, and smiled, as the Bastard’s features twisted, his skin paled, and the wind howled.

The moment passed. Ramsay drew his sword high, and the laughter broke his throat as he leapt forward, blade swinging in a downwards arc. The Bastard stumbled backwards, almost slipping on the ice.

There was laughter by his side. Two of the Bastard’s Boys paced next to Ramsay, stalking forward. Werwick and Lems were both sniggering, their hands on their weapons as they moved after the king.

They could see the battle in the camp in the distance. Northmen and wildlings, men and women, all running mad. Behind him, Ramsay heard the rumble of the ice dragon’s great breaths – each one was laboured, hoarse and weak.
There were only fourteen Bastard’s Boys with him on the ice – as many as Ramsay had been able to sneak through with him into the camp – but it was enough. Fourteen men were enough to hold position until the Bolton forces won the battle.

They were in the middle of it all – just a few men scattered over a black, frozen lake, sheltered by a sleeping dragon, as the battle waged on the shore all around them. Warhorns, drums and screams all echoed together in a dull roar in the distance, drowned out by the fury of the storm above them.

There were no torches, they didn’t want to make themselves a target with the light. Instead, the Bastard King was naught but a shadow as they scrambled in the dark, illuminated only by the rippling light of distant fires through the snows.

“How…?” the Bastard gasped as he stumbled, hidden in the dark. “How could…?”

Ramsay only laughed, stalking forward and swiping with his blade. The Bastard had his own black sword drawn, fumbling in the dark. Ramsay had heard that the Bastard was a great swordsman, but all the skill in the world couldn’t help if you couldn’t even see your opponent.

Footsteps shuffled around him. Werwick and Lems went far, circling around to stop the Bastard from running. He snapped out in the dark, like a wolf surrounded by hounds.

The dead men’s camp littered the snows, their blood already cold. The ‘Dragonguard’ died scattered around the ice. Ramsay heard the strained gasps and grunts as the Bastard stumbled over the half-buried body of his own men. Dark blots stained the snow with each of the Bastard’s steps.

The blood of the leader – Furs – was already cold. He died face first in the snow, his throat slit, his body stiff, frozen and contorted.

“Your men died painlessly, I want you to know that. Mostly painless,” Mock him – Make him angry. Lure him into a mistake. “It only took just a bit of poison in their cups – they drank it all.”

Cold men huddled on a lake, drinking to stay warm at night. Nobody even thought twice when Harlow rushed around with skins of ale, as he had every night for months. “Some of them died quickly, but him – Furs tried to run. I had to cut his throat myself.”

“What did…” the Bastard stammered. “What did you…?”

Behind them, the bulk of Sonagon shifted slightly, a long drawl breaking from the dragon’s maw. “What did I do?” Ramsay laughed. “I beat you.”

His voice was loud and clear. The Bastard focused on the sound, and he lunged. He was quick, and sword was sharp. He swung fast and darted over the snow with surprising speed, but Ramsay was ready for him. Ramsay ducked low, and hacked forward with his blade like a cleaver.

Metal chimed. The Valyrian steel jarred against Ramsay’s blade, taking a notch out of the iron, but the ferocity still knocked the Bastard backwards. He recovered swiftly, but Ramsay was already hacking again – screaming like a madman as he slashed and hacked There was no skill to it, no restraint – nothing but a bloodthirsty growl between crazed chuckles of laughter.

The first few strikes caught the Bastard off-guard. He managed to recover, and that sharp black blade of his struck out like a snake. It sliced straight through Ramsay’s shoulderguard, the leather splitting and the blade cutting deep through skin.

If not for Lems stepping in, Ramsay might well have lost his head. Instead, Jon Snow crumpled as the Bastard’s Boy lunged his sword into Jon’s back. Ramsay didn’t stop laughing, even with the blood swelling from his shoulder. Ramsay couldn’t even feel the pain, he was too high.
Lems’ iron blade didn’t pierce the armour, but the Bastard still staggered. He reacted admirably, twisting to meet the attacker behind him, and then Ramsay charged forward with a backhand strike with his other arm. His sword crashed into the Bastard’s ribs, clattering against chainmail under hard leathers.

Blood splattered from the Bastard’s mouth. Ramsay felt the warm droplets against his face. His smile widened.

Maybe one on one, Ramsay might have lost, but three-on-one? While the Bastard was dazed and wounded? Not a chance. The Bastard staggered, but Ramsay’s boys surrounded him. Both Lems and Werwick were there, darting around from either side and forcing Jon to twist and parry.

“Sonagon!” the Bastard screamed at the top of his lungs. “Sonagon!”

The dragon stirred and groaned, but it could hardly even twitch. It was left too weak, too strained. Ramsay’s laughter didn’t stop.

“What did you do?” the Bastard bellowed. “What did you do?”

It was almost impressive, how the man was fast enough to hold off two at once. Ramsay held back, nursing his wounded shoulder. Blood wept from the cut, stinging against the cold. In the dark, Ramsay could only see the blades flashing. The Bastard rippled and parried, while Werwick and Lems hacked closer. It was a dance of steel and snow – desperate, strained.

Ramsay heard the squelch of blood. The Bastard’s blade lashed out, gutting Lems straight through the stomach.

Ramsay struck. Before the blade could even recoil from the Bastard Boy’s stomach, Ramsay’s fist slammed into his face. Both Jon and Lems fell to the snow at the same time. “Bastard!” Ramsay howled as he kicked the sword from the Bastard’s writhing hand. It clattered away over into the snow. “Bastard!”

The Bastard was left unarmed, trying to flail, trying to find his feet, but Ramsay was all ferocity and strength. Ramsay was shorter, but stockier and heavier, and still strong enough. He kicked the Bastard’s feet out from under him, and kicked again where he saw dark fluid staining the Bastard’s furs. Jon retched and Ramsay fell on him, grabbing him. They writhed in the snow. The Bastard twisted and punched, splitting Ramsay’s lips. Ramsay could taste the red, where his lips had been cut on his teeth.

His eyes glittered. His lips widened. Ramsay had felt harder blows before his eighth name-day. Weak. He’s so weak now. Ramsay felt the world… widen. Come into clarity. Oh, I will so very enjoy this.

Ramsay smiled, twisting his form, and answered the bastard with his own punch, then another, and another. The Bastard weakened, his limbs shaking, and the dragon twitched. Ramsay hooked around the Bastard and dug the hilt of his blade under the Bastard’s chin. Ramsay heaved in and dragged the Bastard him a few paces away, letting the iron crush into the Bastard’s soft throat. Ramsay could feel him gurgle and thrash through the metal.

“Come on now, Reek,” Ramsay growled. His grip tightened. “Do you really think the men were the only ones I poisoned?”
Ramsay yanked the Bastard’s neck. The dragon didn’t even squirm, even as its master was being strangled right under its nose. The Bastard gargled for breath, squirming beneath him.

“Do you know how long it took find a poison that would work on your dragon?” Ramsay whispered in his ear, and Jon convulsed. “Why, I spent months researching what it ate. I spent a long time taking care of it. Beautiful animal.”

Discovering a means of disabling the beast had always been the hardest task Ramsay faced. Poisoning it had been difficult – the beast could eat metal and stone, even. Trial and error had been needed; every night for months Ramsay had been switching up what went into the dragon’s meals, and then observing its behaviour afterwards. It had required months of study to develop a poison that would be crippling for a dragon.

He’d gone to the greatest lengths, never allowing himself to be discovered. Many ideas had been settled on, tried, and discarded. Flesh infused with the bloody flux, the pox, the greywater fever – even the flesh of rabid foxes. The dragon had shrugged it all off, not even noticing his efforts. The heavy metals had proven more promising – a mixture of natural waste-rock, lead and sulphur from the Manderly silver mines could make the dragon sickly. It was not obvious at first; the dragon’s constitution was just too great, and it had not been enough for a reliable poison.

Their deadline had loomed with little success. The easy solution that Ramsay desired proved difficult, and all other alternatives were rather more… messy. Ramsay had nearly thought the mission lost, his task failed, until they had found an ally – ready and willing, dancing to another’s strings for the same end. A maester, with whose assistance he had finally made the true breakthroughs.

Greyscale. Greyscale-tainted flesh, mixed into the dragon’s meals... now that had given a marvellous result.

The first sample had come from a plague ship quarantined by the White Harbour port, but the maester had access, and then House Bolton had allies that helped ferry it through the city. Ramsay brought it to the dragon’s roost. The plague flesh required extraordinarily careful handling, and afterwards Ramsay had planted the contents into the dragon’s meals, one small strip at a time.

His initial source had been too small to debilitate such a large beast, but greyscale was so infectious; Ramsay had found that it was easy enough to simply create more stock. All it took was a thick pair of gloves and a piece of raw, poisoned meat – for every barrel of raw fish that came to the dragon, Ramsay dropped an extra piece of meat in it, and then let the fish simmer for a day or two before serving. Sometimes Ramsay had taken aside barrels and let them linger in fermentation for weeks, scurried away in dark corners, to replenish his stocks. No one but Ramsay had noticed that the dragon was eating a few barrels less on some days, and a few more on others. If a few barrels happened to stink more than the others? If the dragon didn’t care, why should they?

The ‘Dragonguard’ trusted him to watch over the dragon’s food, and no one noticed. The Bastard King filled his guard with dumb warriors, not a drop of cunning between them. That Hatch, the big one, the supposed leader, was the worst. All of them were fighters, they were above such stewardly duties. Ramsay ran circles around them all.

There was no food-tester to protect a dragon. The dragon was gluttonous enough to eat it all.

Even from the first meal, the results were instant. Whatever the disease did to the dragon, it seemed to drain the beast’s strength. Ramsay had been carefully, increasing the dragon’s intake of tainted food only in small increments, so as to avoid attention. Eventually, as the march to Winterfell began, he’d settled into a pattern, constantly weakening the dragon over many tainted meals, and eventually drawing it into a lull. The others had dismissed it as the dragon just being tired on the march, perhaps they had even been grateful for how complacent the beast had become, but Ramsay had known the truth.

The Bastard’s dragon had unknowingly consumed nearly all of Ramsay’s tainted supplies earlier in the day, and now it could hardly seem to breathe. Ramsay honestly wasn’t certain whether it would survive or not. He hoped it would; he didn’t want the dragon dead, after all.

The disease drains their strength, makes them weak, Ramsay had decided, weeks before. The symptoms differ, from human to dragon, but the terminal result is the same. Petrifcation. Outwardly in man, inwardly in dragon. The maester had been so very helpful. Ramsay had started to wonder just how exactly the dragons went extinct the first time around.

Ramsay could feel the fear in the Bastard’s body, in his desperate shudders and strained breaths.
Ramsay squeezed, pulling backwards tighter and tighter, choking the life out of him. Ramsay only laughed.

It felt like the world was cheering for him. The sky was screaming, and the ground was rumbling.

Ramsay watched the Bastard’s face turn red, his eyes bulging so much that they might pop…

The Bastard jerked, like the final spasm of a convulsing fish. “No…” Ramsay muttered. “I’m not going to kill you, Bastard. I don’t want to kill you.”

After a moment’s pause, Ramsay relented. He had to force his hands to relent. His grip slackened, and the Bastard gasped for air. Ramsay still hugged him tightly, pinned to the ground.

“I’m going to destroy you,” Ramsay whispered. “I’m going to break you, piece by piece. You are mine. You will be my new Reek.”

Oh, you’ll be the best Reek too. Theon is nothing compared to you. I will have the whole world coming to see my Reek, crawling and begging around on the floor. You will lick the stones under my feet.

They would look at the great and proud Bastard King, once a conqueror and a dragonrider, now something less than human and dancing for Ramsay’s pleasure. He would be Ramsay’s pet. No, pet was the wrong word, Ramsay quite liked his pets. Rather, puppet. Yes, Reek – Ramsay’s little puppet.

Werwick was hunched over the wounded Lems, wailing in shock as his guts spilled outwards.
Lems gut was oozing outwards, where the black blade had slice his chest open. “Werwick!”
Ramsay snapped, with no regard to his fallen man. “Gather up the others, as many that are still alive. We hold position on the lake, keep near to the dragon.”

Werwick jumped to attention, shivering and trembling in the cold. Lems was still gasping with his stomach bleeding out. If Ramsay had his hands free, he would have cut the man’s throat just to get it over with.

Instead, Ramsay hooked his arm around the Bastard’s neck, and dragged him to his feet. The man tried to thrash, but the headlock was too tight. His feet kicked at the snow, slipping on the ice while Ramsay heaved him upwards.

“Your training begins now, Reek,” Ramsay said, his voice bouncing with joy. Cold, bleeding and fatigued, but Ramsay had never felt happier. “We’re going to watch, you and I. Let’s watch everything you care about be destroyed.”
The storm was deafening, but they could still see the flurry of battle. There would be warhorns, charging horses, arrows raining and boots stamping, but it all felt just strangely unreal watching from a distance. The Bastard might have tried to say something, but made nothing but a choking sound. “It’s already over,” Ramsay cackled. “I poisoned your dragon. I killed your men. Mine were set to raise havoc in your camp, and my father convinced yours to betray you. We beat you.”

More of Ramsay’s men were slipping out of the shadows. He only had only a dozen of his Boys with him on the ice, but that was enough. The Bastard squirmed, and Damon Dance-for-Me slammed his fist into the Bastard’s stomach. Werwick, Lou and Merwyn all laughed. “I need him alive,” Ramsay ordered to his men, “but I don’t want him healthy. Wrap up his wound, and then beat him until he stops resisting.”

Ramsay stepped backwards to tighten his cloak around his bloody neck, to stop the bleeding. All the while, Lems was left gurgling in the snow – dying slowly as his intestines spilled out. Ramsay ordered someone to shut him up, and, finally, Yellow Dick hacked open Lems’ head to silence him, before stealing the sword that killed him.

The Bastard was left flailing on the ground. Ramsay’s men were already thumping spears into the snow, ready to defend against any who might be coming to save him. They all knew the plan – the Bastard King would die before they would ever let him be recovered.

There was still a fire – a defiance – in the Bastard’s grey eyes. Ramsay leant over him, pulling him close. That is good, Ramsay thought with a laugh, I will have fun beating that fire out of you.

“The only reason you made it so far was because we let you,” Ramsay whispered into the man’s ear. He made gasps that could have been pleas. “We wanted you here, your army gathered right now – so we could destroy all of our foes on a single night. What use is an ambush, if the prey isn’t all gathered for it?

“But do you want to know the secret?” Ramsay’s voice lowered slightly. “We didn’t win. This isn’t our victory, this is your loss. We wouldn’t ever have beaten your army in a straight battle. If it was anyone else, any other commander, I don’t think this trap would have worked. No one else would have so often hesitated, while wielding so much power. No one else would have let me get so close. An anonymous man, with no family and no past save that I spun out of whole cloth, and you let me so close to the most precious beast in the world. No one else… But it wasn’t anybody else, it was you.”

He moved so close his lips brushed against Jon’s ear. “This is your loss, yours,” Ramsay whispered. “Your failure, your fault – all yours.”

The look on the Bastard’s face – the pale, wide-eyed look of horror as he stared out and struggled futilely – it was just… it was beautiful. It sounded like the Bastard would have screamed, if only he could breathe in Ramsay’s chokehold.

The snowstorm was only getting stronger. Ramsay laughed and laughed and laughed. Even from over a mile away, they heard the tremble as camp’s bulwarks collapsed, and heavy cavalry pierced through the host. The wildlings were all disorganised, their camp was in shambles, and Ramsay knew that his well-prepared assault would make short work of them.

If the fighting did break out to the ice, Ramsay would hold their king hostage until his father’s army slaughtered them. Ramsay’s men could hold position, or Ramsay would cut the Bastard King’s throat and run.

Either way, as soon as soon as the battle was won, they’d have the manpower to secure the dragon.
Ramsay reckoned he’d be able to tame it. The methods… starvation and chains, certainly. Whips wouldn’t do, the hide was too thick to inflict pain by ordinary means, but what of needles in the eye? It was an ice dragon, could it be made to feel pain by fire? It was a beast, not so different from any other, and he hadn’t met a beast yet that couldn’t be broken. And, after all, the dragon liked Harlow. The thought made him smile. Maybe it won’t even be so difficult.

His grip around the Bastard’s throat tightened. First, I will break the dragonrider, then I will break the dragon. With a dragon under their thumb, the Bolton regime would truly begin – and Ramsay would become invaluable to it. Indispensable to his father.

It was all about the dragon – that had been the only thing that the Boltons could not handle, and so instead they targeted the dragonrider. You came prepared for a battle, but we spent our time readying a trap, Ramsay thought with satisfaction. Several traps, in fact.

Sound gargled from the Bastard’s throat as he thrashed against Ramsay’s grip. They were short, sharp and hoarse cries, as if the man could overpower the storm, screaming for his army in the distance. The army that was being massacred.

“Look at it,” Ramsay whispered into the Bastard’s ear, smiling, as his Boys took him away and set to binding his injuries. “This is you. All you. You did this. Your army, your allies, your dragon, your loss.”

Tonight will be a good night, Ramsay thought. Oh, tonight is a good night!

Val

The commanders bickered. Even as the arrows rained down from the sky, she heard a hundred voices and a hundred conflicting orders, orders that few had any business giving. Trying to project authority by sheer overwhelming volume. It was all such a blur that in the din she could only make out the loudest of the rabble.

She stood by the commander’s tent, near the central stead of the fishing village, staring over the horizon where great army was being torn apart. She couldn’t see the charge, she could only see the haze of a thousand torches writhing, and the shimmer of arrows raining downwards.

They were a good day’s march away from Winterfell, maybe half a day if they really pushed. The Boltons must have left the gates even before the fighting in the camp began. It was coordinated.

Val could hear the horns echoing, the sounds of battle chiming in the pandemonium. The Boltons were at the perimeter, with absolutely no warning from the scouts or outriders. An organised defence could have routed the Boltons – fortified men on the earthen encampments could have resisted the ambush, sent them back bleeding – but there was no organisation. No discipline, no clear-minded orders. Their camp was large, dispersed and now fractured; even by the time the northern coalition gathered to resist them at the fortifications it would be too late.

The storm was growing like the wrath of gods. Val could only stare, feeling numb with fear and cold. There were no details, she could see nothing of the battle – it was too dark and too chaotic to see anything other than incoherent panic. The blizzard tore the weaker tents apart, sending the leathers flapping madly in the wind. The howling wind, the snow, the screaming - it all blended together, set the world to madness.
They’re attacking from both the north and west, she realised. They’re pushing with soldiers from the front, horses to the rear. A hammer from behind, to the anvil. She could see the arrows in the distance, the shafts scattering wildly in the winds. It was an ambush – a solid line of soldiers taking full advantage of superior discipline, bowmen and cavalry. They would be pressing forward slowly to keep their lines intact, but as unstoppable as a dagger through the heart. Rattleshirt’s men had been holding the north perimeter, but they were lost. As soon as the Boltons broke through the bulwarks then was no easy way to stop them.

One collected force fighting through a disjointed one.

The snow fell from the sky in a fierce flurry, nearly horizontal with the winds. Tents were torn out of the ground, men running huddled under billowing cloaks. In weather like this, every man would be running blind.

“We got horns over the ridge! West and south!” the Weeper shrieked as he stomped forward. “Warriors on me, we break their charge! On me! On me!”

“Retreat! We must run!” some southron lord – Locke something or other – shouted. “Retreat!”

“Fuck that, where the hell is Snow?” Tormund Giantsbane exclaimed, barrelling past them all. “The king??”

“Archers! Archers! Bowmen!”

“Retreat! Retreat to the southern bulwarks!” a scared voice shrieked. “Cavalry! Cavalry breaking through!”

“Southron traitors!” a wildling’s voice - a mad-eyed raider clutching two stone-headed axes, facing off against some Manderly soldiers. “You bloody fucking traitors!”

“Reinforcements to the west!” That was the Greatjon's voice, a heavy bellow as he pushed through, heading towards the Manderly boathouse. “Where are the bloody heavy horse?”

That was the problem, Val thought quietly. In moment of alarm, all rational thought stopped. Men would just follow the loudest voice.

Gods… the fear in the air. It was overwhelming. Every single second, somebody was dying. There were a hundred crises happening all through the camp, and Val just couldn’t respond to it. How could you stop a tide of a thousand men?

Her hands were shivering. She could feel it too. A certain type of panic was infectious.

No, Val thought. Now is not the time. Not everybody can be helped, focus on what I can do.

She cast her gaze around the frenzied, burning camp, and her heart skipped. The thought of the battle at the Frostfangs fluttered through her mind. The Others hit Mance’s host from multiple sides, scattering them, before bringing in the main assault. I've seen this type of chaos before. The Boltons are even using similar tactics to the white walkers.

Tormund and the Greatjon were arguing – one wanted to hold the line, the other insisted on reinforcing the perimeter. In the pandemonium, the men looked close to coming to blows against each other. Accusations still ran through the camp – shouts of ‘craven’ or ‘traitors’, and Val couldn’t even pick out who or what. There’s no calm, not here. Their blood is too hot.

Val saw the Weeper already pushing his way through, screaming. The man had no patience for arguing, his warband was already rallying to his roar. The Weeper already had his scythe in hand and he was on the hunt for his enemy’s heads. In a pinch, any head would do.

I can’t let this happen. Val made her decision quickly; she ignored the others and ran after the Weeper, shoving her way through the snows and the raiders.

“Weeper!” Val snapped, stepping towards him. “You fall back! Gather your men, send the signal to fall back.”

The Weeper twitched, his bloody scythe snapping at her. Blood was dribblling down from his eyes, his face twisted into a feral snarl. “What the fuck–?”

No time to back down now. “Fall back, Weeper,” she ordered. “With as many as you can gather, fall back to the shore and regroup.”

“Are you fucking mad, bitch?” he snarled. “They're slaughtering us!”

“We got cavalry breaking the encampments,” a scarred wildling growled. “The bulwarks–”

“–are already lost. The instinct is to counterattack. That's what they're expecting. Resist that instinct, Weeper.” Val was already storming her way through. “Gather them all, fall back and rally!”

Too much of a rabble, her voice didn't gather enough attention among the warriors. “Orders from the king!” Val screamed at the top of her lungs, but it still felt barely loud enough. “Gather anyone you can! Fall back!”

The Weeper’s arm grabbed her shoulder, his grip so tight it hurt. He left a bloody handprint on her furs. Manderly blood. “Bitch,” the Weeper snapped. “You do not order my men.”

His eyes bulged. No weakness. He’ll kill me if I show weakness. “If you had your wits, then I wouldn’t have to,” Val challenged. “You fall back, Weeper, and the ranks rally around you. Let the men see their commanders, know who to follow. Run mad and you’ll only get more killed. Again.”

He didn’t slacken his grip. They could hear the screams in the distance, howling with the wind. He could kill me. One word, one movement, one look in the eyes, and I’m dead. The thought of Ser Wylis’ bloody head flickered before her gaze. Still, Val said, “Move your hand or lose it.”

After a pause, the Weeper relented and lowered his hand, but his eyes didn’t lose their ferocity. She caught the flicker of hesitation moving through the men, and Val turned around between the warriors and raised her voice, “King Snow has gone to rally the dragon! He'll be flying through any moment now!” I hope. “So bloody fall back already!”

Jon’s name caused a few stirs, but there was just so much confusion and bustling bodies around her. Val was fighting against a tide – the whole camp was flooded with bedlam, and she had to fight and scream just to get a single message through.

The Weeper twitched, but Val was already turning and pushing away. A man with a bloody winged pig on his surcoat moved to stop her, but he froze at as the Weeper shook his head.

She could hear the sound of hooves rumbling closer. It felt like an earthquake - slow, steady, but unstoppable. How many men have died in the last minute alone?

“The men on the perimeter!” someone protested.
“Leave them!” Val snapped. She drew her blade and raised it high. “Fall back! Fall back and rally!”

Men were stirring all around. She had to shove and barge her way through. She glimpsed the Weeper's face twitch, curse, and turn after her.

“King Snow!” a red-faced man – a southerner – bellowed at her. “Where is he? Where is he?”

“He’s fighting a battle! Like you should be!” Val snapped, turning and screaming. “Now are you going to stand around with your cocks in the air, or are you going to get moving?”

There was no time to look for Jon. They had minutes to spare, and Val had to make the hard choice. Either Jon was dead and they wouldn't find his corpse until morning, or he was moving but lost. Either way, Val couldn't distract herself with him right now.

“Ser Wylis!” a man, a knight, was screaming. “Where is Ser Wylis? The wildlings–”

“Your commander was a fucking traitor!” that was one of the Weeper’s men, an ugly man with a bloody winged pig on surcoat, heaving a greatsword. “House Manderly betrayed us!”

The knight moved his hand to his sword. “Ser Wylis! What did–”

“Enough!” Val shrieked, so loud her throat hurt. “Enough! Fall back! Rally! Fall back!”

Some were trying to keep the fights going, but the call was starting to spread around her. “Fall back!” they were screaming. “Fall back!”

How many thousands would die in the retreat? Val wondered. How many are the Boltons cutting down right now, and how long would it buy us? Still, their sacrifice was the only chance the rest had.

There was a certain flow to battle. The tides of men would wax and wane, and churn like turbulent waters. When one side started to gain ground, they would build momentum. It became more and more difficult for the other side to recover against a moving charge. The Boltons had already had a strong ambush against a disorientated host, there would be severe casualties.

Val turned to the north; she couldn't see anything through the crowds, she couldn't even make sense of all the noises – but she could feel the enemies pushing closer and closer.

We need the kneelers. The free folk have the strength, we need the discipline.

In the camp beyond, Manderly men were rushed to arms, but their ranks had already fallen apart. The northerners and the free folk wouldn't fight together easily.

There were skirmishes all around them, and Val couldn’t tell who; nobody who the betrayers were, but the fighting still seemed to be spreading. Val pushed her way through a dozen raiders howling against the Manderly knights, their words lost in the storm. We can't win like this.

She heard bellows. Tormund. The Greatjon. Val saw their shadows, sizing off against each other, clashing. The Greatjon wanted to move men south, Tormund wanted to stop him. They were spitting with each other, each one flanked by a dozen other lords and chieftains.

There are too many commanders in this army. No general.

“You fucking chickenshits!” Tormund was roaring, maul in hand. “You fucking cunts!”
“Out of my way, fat man!” The Greatjon was so much bigger, his ugly greatsword lifted high. “Out of my fucking way!”

“Enough!” Val screamed, lurching into a run. “Gather your men! Rally at the lake!”

The Greatjon twitched. Men shouting all around her, but the Lord Umber was louder. “Girl! Where’s Snow? Where the fuck is he?”

“These bastards have traitors in their ranks!” Tormund hollered. “Get your fucking men under control!”

She wasn’t the only one screaming. Their voices blurred together, fighting against the wind. “Where’s the king?” another man bellowed at the same time.

“Ser Wylis!” a northern lord demanded. “What happened to Ser Wylis!”

“The dragon! Where is the dragon?”

“Retreat!” Val recognised the scrawny man – Jeremy of House Locke, heir and commander in Lord Locke’s place. “We must retreat!”

The cries of retreat gave Val the most concern. If their ranks fell apart, in this weather, then they would all die fleeing in the snow. Val had seen it happen before.

As the tide kept on crushing them, morale would completely shatter and they would lose as many to desertion to death. After that, there was no chance.

Lord Umber raised his greatsword, ready to swing at Tormund. “You get out my bloody way or I’ll kill you all!”

_The loudest voice. The loudest voice is the most important._ Val focused on the Greatjon, pushing up against the hulk of a man. “Enough!” Val screamed, pushing so hard even Lord Umber was knocked back. “Fuck you and fuck your cock measuring! Get to the fucking centre and rally your fucking army!”

For half a second, Lord Umber looked speechless. A few men made to grab her, but Val twisted away and shoved the Greatjon again. “Move! Rally! Now!”

“They got traitors!” Tormund warned. “Bloody kneelers—”

Val spun her head so fast her hair whipped. “Who gives a fuck!” she snapped at Tormund. “Fuck traitors – there’s your enemy!” She pointed to the west, where Bolton cavalry was pushing through their ranks. “If they stab you, kill them – and do what I say if you want to fucking live!”

She sounded crazy. She felt crazy. _Good. Crazy is good, so long as they don’t try to argue. We can’t beat the tide swimming in different directions._

The Greatjon's eyes bulged. He was a hulk of man in leather and steel byrnie, and Val was a slender young woman banging against his chest. “Little girl…” he growled.

“Fuck off,” Val snapped, already turning around. “Get moving.”

Thousands of bodies frenzied all around her, shoving and bellowing. Horses were galloping. She heard a hundred screams echoing on the wind. Val glimpsed a spear-ridden corpse of a mammoth, littering the ground nearby.

“Retreat!” Jeremy Locke was still shouting. “Retr—”

At once, before anyone could stop her, Val drew her sword and stormed towards the heir of House Locke, pressing the blade against his chest.

“Say that word one more time,” Val promised. “I’ll kill you right now,”

Jeremy only gaped at her. With Ser Wylis dead, Jeremy Locke was now in command of the White Harbour men. All of the knights had steel in their grip. If I do kill him, then his soldiers will kill me a second later and everyone will dissolve into fighting, Val thought. She couldn’t even feel her fingers, that rush of fear was just so… One twitch of a sword and she’d be dead. But there’s no choice – if he keeps on screaming to retreat, then too many will follow it.

Val could only hope that Jeremy was not as stupid as he seemed.

With her sword at his chest, the heir to Oldcastle could only stutter. The White Harbour knights seemed speechless too. Good enough, Val thought with a tut. “If anybody calls to retreat,” she shouted to whoever was listening. “Kill them!”

It probably wouldn’t make a difference, but it made her feel better. Gods, her heartbeat was so fast it was fluttering – fear and adrenaline made everything fuzzy.

“Why the fuck should we listen to Snow’s lay, you cunt?” an angry voice snapped. Val turned to see a bald and scarred man in an iron byrnie glaring at her. It took a few seconds for Val to recognise him; the Middle Liddle, of the mountain clans.

Val raised her hands open. “You see anyone else keeping their wits?” The Middle Liddle looked ready to strike her. “No? Then bugger off.”

She heard a few grunts that could have been guffaws. Maybe they were laughing at her; the little girl who thought she could boss them around. That was fine. Even mockery was better than panic. Before the Middle Liddle had a chance to respond, Val turned to the men, and it was the soldiers that were really important, not the commanders. “Whatever grievances you have – whatever problems with King Snow or with each other!” Val screamed. “Then sort them out in the morning! Tonight, you bloody fight them!”

The Middle Liddle spat a word that sounded like ‘cunt’, but Val was already pushing away. Don’t focus on anyone, don’t get drawn into an argument. Just keep on pushing through and keep the cry spreading. Everybody had to know the same thing.

“Rally! Rally! Rally at the village – free folk and northerners gather together!”

The village was defendable, at least. The lake at our back would stop them from surrounding us. If the Boltons pushed forward too fast after the perimeter broke, then they’d overreach themselves and hit against a hard defence. If enough of the commanders pulled together, then there would be a chance. If they stayed fractured, there’d be none.

She could feel the rumble of battle pushing closer, the pitch turning so loud it overpowered the storm. They must be through the bulwarks now – there would be horses storming through the camp and raising havoc. Only a solid line of infantry stood a chance at stopping cavalry.

How many men have already died, in the time it took for the commanders to get their shit together?
She hadn’t even realised how much they were relying on the dragon until it was missing. Nobody, not even her, had been expecting a proper fight because they had a dragon. Their armies were a smouldering mess without it.

Val stopped. Her eyes flashed around the crowd, trying to find free folk she recognised. She saw a tall and lean raider she recognised from beyond the Wall. “You! Bjarl! Follow me!” Val ordered. There was another young man she vaguely recognised. Lars, Leif, Lothar, maybe? “And you! Lars! Both of you, on me.”

Bjarl looked surprised. Maybe-Lars didn’t react in time, so Val had to grab his hand and yank the man away. The wreckage of Jon’s cabin wasn’t far; half the building had been pulverised by the mammoth’s stampede through, but there was another half that was still upright. Val had to scramble over the splintered debris, noting the bodies littering the ground. In these snows, it was already a foot deep surrounding everything.

It had only been the other day, when Val had taken solace in this boathouse with Jon, wrapped around him and underneath the sheets. The thought made her curse. Gods, how did I let myself become so complacent?

Maybe-Lars gulped. “What are we doing here?”

Val didn’t hesitate. She saw a shadowskin cloak littered over the broken planks, Val picked it up and threw it at the wildling. “Get dressed,” she ordered. “Into whatever you can find. Both of you. Dress yourselves like a king, and there’s chalk over there. Break it and smear it into your hair.”

“Wait, what–”

“We need the king. You two, both dress like him, and make your hair white.” She found a steel hauberk, right where Jon had left it, and pushed it into Liam’s arms. The king had more armour than he could wear. “Now. You go south, and you go east. Shout as loud as you can, and people will rally around you. So give them a king, get them to the centre.”

Bjarl’s jaw dropped as he realised what she wanted of them. “You can’t… we’re not…”

Both men were roughly the right height and build. Neither of them looked remotely like Jon, but that wouldn’t matter much in the dark and snow. So long as they could make their hair appear white, then they’d pass. Perhaps any other time, Val would have explained the need to them, but right now she really didn’t have the time or patience. “What makes you think you have a choice here?” Val raised her swords, pointing one blade at each man. “Get your clothes off. Now.”

If they had had their wits, they could have maybe protested. The trick was to not give them an opportunity to protest. Men scared witless tend to become compliant.

Val shoved them into Jon’s spare armour and cloak, pointing them into the right direction. “If you can’t think what to say,” she ordered, “then just shout the same word over again – Rally. The words don’t really matter, the men just need to think that you’re in control. Do you understand me? Even if you’re about to shit yourself, even if you don’t clue what to do, you must sound like you’re in command.”

Bjarl gave something like a nod, his mouth agape and a chunk of chalk in his hair. There was no time for anymore instruction than that. As soon as Val stepped out of the cabin, the fighting was coming towards them.

It moved like a wave – like a swell bursting over rocks, sweeping the camp. It surged through the encampments and it wasn’t stopping.

She could see the Bolton cavalry was upon them; a tide of horses trampling through tents, each man with a lance in one hand and a torch in their other. It was a storm, crushing men beneath an avalanche of hooves and iron. Their formation was a wall of mounted, armoured horses that scattered free folk. Val heard their chants, a war cry that sounded wordless as it echoed through the winds.

In thefluttering torchlight, she caught a glimpse of the banner flapping at the front – two grey keeps castles on blue, with a red band crossing through them.

Val was already running. She ran as fast as her legs could manage, stumbling through the snows. She heard the Greatjon bellow, and a tide of soldiers was rushing out to meet the charge. “Shields! Shields front!” the cry came. “Shields and lances!”

A few flimsy arrows shot through the air, but they were scattered by the wind. She saw some of the riders fall, but the charge was already shifting direction. The cavalry turned, notching to the side. The horses won’t charge against a solid mass of men, Val realised. The cavalry will carve their way south instead and try to flank us.

In the distance, Val saw the Bolton’s infantry pouring over the bulwarks, pushing forward with armoured lances. The free folk were falling back; whatever men Rattleshirt had left to hold the perimeter had already crumpled.

They are keeping rank, Val thought with a grimace. She could see the tactics being used against them. The Boltons ambushed the west and north simultaneous to confuse any attempt to retaliate, and then their cavalry charged through to clear the path and divide the enemy. While their flanks held off any attempt to rally using bowmen, the van was free to push all the way through to the centre of the camp.

It’s organised. Firm regiments and a coordinated plan of attack. This was rehearsed.

A gale cut through the camp so fierce that she saw tents dragged out of the ground. It was so, so cold but Val could hardly even feel it. Any body that fell would be buried under snow in minutes, or they’d be trampled by the frenzied tide of boots pushing through.

“Hold the line!” The Greatjon boomed. “Hold the bloody line!”

Val had never seen a battlefields so tight, so close quarters and cramped. She had never been in the mash of soldiers slamming together. There were so many men, all ramming into each other like livestock crammed in cages. If she fell, she could be trampled to death and nobody would even notice. This is a southerner’s battlefield – the free folk liked to fight spread out in raiding parties, not rank and file.

It felt livestock, rambling together in a herd – a stampede – towards the slaughter.

A chant filled the air, beating with the footsteps of men. “For the north!” they boomed. “For the north! For the north!”

That’s not our side, Val realised dumbly. The Bolton forces were fighting for the north too, as they trampled through them.

All around her, she heard screaming. Crying. Howling.

It was almost overwhelming. Get to the front. They’ll need me on the front.
The Bolton cavalry was coming around again, twisting around to the south, trying to flank them. “The south!” someone called. “The horses! The south!”

“On me!” That was the Weeper’s voice, a roar distinctive even amidst it all. He was pulling men to meet the cavalry charge. “Raiders on me!”

She saw the shadows pushing through. A few men were still fumbling with bows and arrows, but archers were left nearly useless in winds like these. There was no way to count numbers, there was no way to make sense of it. Val was trapped in the bedlam, every man crashing together like stones in a great wave.

The two battle lines were about to collide. Two tides of men crashing forward to meet each other, the battle churning like a storm.

In the moment… her mind blanked out with the raw frenzy of it all. The night was too wild, too raw.

There will be no surrender here, she knew. She could feel it her bones. There would be no peace, no quarter given. It was all too wild; there was too much bad blood between the armies. This war has been simmering, festering, for too long, their forces turned too bitter.

The snows and the wind felt like all of that hatred given form.

Val had to claw her way to the front. Behind her, she heard the cries as her two decoy kings left in opposite direction to rally men from around the lake.

She heard the war cries, the stomps as the Weeper’s warband gave chase after the cavalry, meeting lances with axes and shields. Val would have called the Weeper a fool for breaking rank like that, but there was no doubting the man’s bravery.

They were coming closer. She felt their footsteps as they broke into a charge, she heard the deafening screams. The earth rumbled with the pounding of boots.

When the two ranks collided, it felt like absolutely everything went black.

It was no ‘fight’ she had ever seen. It felt more like a riot.

“Hold steady!” the Greatjon roared, ahead of her. “Hold steady!”

The clash eased off, and the wildlings lost ground. She could see anything through all the bodies, but she felt it as the two forces collided again and again, pressing forward until one side fell back. It was like the oceans breaking against the rocks – crashing together all around her, and then easing off. It was waxing and waning, churning and crashing. Two forces tearing against at each other until something broke. The men would pull back only to charge again.

Bodies surged and fell around her. Val had two swords in her hands, but she didn’t even have the space to swing them. She could only lunge and hack, all the while she was being battered from all sides. She was hit more by the men around her than she was by the foes in front.

She wasn’t even sure if there were foes to the front at all; there were only black shapes.

Several times, she nearly stumbled over bodies littered in the snow. If you fell, you were trampled, and if she stopped to help anyone she’d be trampled too. Val had no idea whether the men were enemies or allies; there was little distinction between the two in the thrashing.
“For the north! For the north! For the north!”

That chant didn’t stop, it only reached fever pitch. A voice at the back of her mind wondered how queer it was that both sides could have chanted the exact same thing.

She couldn’t make out any details of her enemies; she couldn’t see their faces, not even the whites of their eyes. Bodies blurred together. Instead, it was more instinctual than that – any figure coming towards you was an enemy.

“Press!” That was Tormund’s voice. Was she near Tormund? Val wasn’t sure; amidst the surge of bodies she had no control of her movement. “Press forward!”

By the time the ranks finally broke, Val had no idea where she was, but it felt like they had fallen back a hundred feet or so. The Boltons were dropping back to retreat, and as they flowed away Val saw a sea of buried corpses scattered like stones.

Val was panting for breath. There was bruises across her body she couldn’t even feel. This was a bad decision, she thought with a gasp, the thick of the rabble is a bad place to be.

“Regroup!” Tormund’s voice bellowed again. “If you can fight, stand up!”

All across the camp, there were more battles. Skirmishes, really, and the shouts echoed in the storm. If I collapse here, I die. “Tormund!” Val called, her voice turning to a croak. “Tormund!”

“Val,” she saw the great white-haired man turn towards her. Tormund was bleeding from a gash across his forehead, but he barely seemed to notice her. “Val, get out of here! Go support the rear!”

“Fuck that,” Val gasped. There was blood on her swords. She honestly couldn’t remember stabbing anyone. It was all hazy. “How many are there?”

“Buggered if I can tell,” Tormund grumbled, casting a wary eye to the west. “But those bloody horses are going to slaughter us like this.”

Val understood – their men were on foot, and mostly lightly armoured. The free folk favoured axes and arrows over than lances and shields. Without a solid rank to support them, a mounted force could tear straight through them.

The cavalry charge would be turning around. Their forces were already scattering faster than they could rally them. If the Weeper couldn’t stop the charge… “We need the giants, Tormund,” Val said suddenly. “The giant camp. We need to get them with us, into the fight.”

Tormund caught her gaze, and shook his head. “You want me to go?”

“You know the chieftains better than I do,” she argued. “The giants know you, they’ll rally with you. Hells, you speak their tongue better than me.”

“Bugger that,” Tormund growled. “I ain’t leaving here.”

“Toregg was over there,” Val pressed. “Your son was fighting that way.”

She caught the flicker of doubt pass over his face, and Tormund swore in the Old Tongue. Once, before joining with Mance, Tormund had many sons, but he had already lost three sons and one daughter in this war. He couldn’t lose any more. “Dammit. Fine, aye, I’ll go,” he cursed, before turning to the men and shouted, “Twenty raiders! On me! The rest to the centre!”
Tormund was already pushing off, moving as fast he cut over the thick snows and scattered corpses. There wasn’t a minute to spare, the wildlings were running haggard as it was. “Gather to the centre!” Val shouted to the remaining men, as she pushed through to the opposite direction. “Move! Regroup!”

There were skirmishes all around them – men wrestling in the snows – but there was no time to intervene. The Boltons would be regathering, and the free folk clans were already drifting apart, fracturing away from the northerners. She needed to form a defence, to gather around a single commander and turn the tide.

But it won’t be me. Val saw the towering figure of the Greatjon, standing head and shoulders above the rest, as large and bulky as a bear. The loudest voice.

“All free folk!” Val shouted as she approached, raising both her swords to gain attention. “Lord Greatjon Umber has command of the battle! Follow him! The Weeper commands the vanguard and Tormund Giantsbane the reserves – spread the word, all raiders must flock around the Greatjon!”

Val saw the Greatjon turn to stare at her, caught off-guard. A few free folk chieftains shouted objections, but she didn’t even hear them. “Orders from King Snow!” Val snapped. She could only hope she had enough of a reputation that the free folk would listen to her. “The Greatjon has command!”

Lord Umber glared at her, and for a second it seemed like he was going to say something to her. Then, a horn blasted in the distance, and the march of men demanded his attention. “Form up, you bastards!” the Greatjon bellowed, so loud even the storm couldn’t match. “Form up! Form up!”

Val was gasping for air, trying to make sense of the rumbling chaos all around her. She would have stolen a shield or lance from one of the men, except she didn’t have the upper body strength to wield either properly, and her swords were more comfortable in her grip.

She was a good enough fighter, but she knew she couldn’t last on the front lines like this – not in ranks so tight there was no place to dodge or swing properly. That was where big men like the Greatjon excelled, but not her. Val hesitated momentarily, searching through the snows at where she would be most useful.

The rear, Val decided. Let the Greatjon hold the line, I need to keep the host together from the back. She was already running – stumbling, rather – through the snows to the edge of the lake.

Across the fields, she heard the cries as the Weeper kept the push the charge against the cavalry – his warband fearlessly pushing against mounted men. For any other man, Val would have called it suicide, but the Weeper was holding on.

If Tormund could rally the eastern camp as well, then there could be a chance to change the tide. The Boltons had already broken through half of the camp, but there was a proper line starting to take form around the Greatjon. They were pushing back.

Val didn’t stop shouting. Even when wheezing for breath, even when she was barely audible over the wind, she still shouted. “Form up! Form up and push!” she called. “They’re falling backwards, push!”

It hardly mattered the words she said, Val just knew that she had to keep on shouting anything she could to stop them from breaking down and fleeing.

Crash. Val felt the lines collide again against Bolton forces. It felt different this time, the battle lines were crumbling, scattering outwards in the snow. Discipline was being shredded, turning into more a skirmish than a charge. Val couldn’t tell if that was good or bad.

The fighting felt strained, desperate – there were no great battles, there was nothing but men staggering through the snow and trying to thrust spears at each other. The enemies weren’t to the front anymore, they were all around her. Either the free folk were pushing back or they were falling apart, Val couldn’t tell.

“Fight! Northerners! Free folk! Fight!” Val shrieked, so loud it hurt her lungs. “Whatever you care about, whatever your reason, just fight for it! For freedom! For honour! For justice!” For Jon.

It was impossible to tell who was ‘winning’, not from the middle of it all. Not through the snows and screams. Too many men were fleeing, or too many were going wild in the chaos. She couldn’t count the enemy, she couldn’t count anybody. The winner would only be whoever was standing upright by the end of it all.

In the moment, it felt like a slaughter.

She glimpsed a wild-eyed figure, stumbling mad around the frenzy. Jeremy Locke looked like a man crazed, staggering through the snow. The young heir seemed like he had lost his wits somewhere along with his courage. “Wylis…!” Jeremy called, lost. “Ser Wylis, where are you?”

Even between the dozens of rushing men, they caught sight of each other. Val’s golden hair fluttered madly in the wind, marking her clearly on the battlefield. She would have covered her hair, except it was a distinctive enough rallying point. “Get a sword in your hand and get to the fight!” Val ordered. “If you can’t fight, see to the wounded, or search for survivors. Collect arrows, secure supplies, or even just stand steady. Whatever you can do, just do something!”

He didn’t seem to hear her. Jeremy blinked, mouth agape. Gods, for all he was a man grown, the heir to House Locke just seemed lost. “You…” he stepped towards her. “It’s you… The battle is lost. The battle is lost!”

His voice was too loud. Val grimaced. She couldn’t allow anyone to be screaming things like that. Think it, fine, but don’t scream it. Morale was fragile enough already. “Ser Jeremy–”

“The battle is lost!” the man wailed, crying as he stepped towards her. “I have family, I have a son, we must retrea–”

Val’s sword was already swinging. Jeremy Locke was caught completely off-guard as the blade hit him. Her wrist jarred as it hacked through mail, and then jarred against bone. “I warned you,” Val cursed. “Nobody is allowed to say that word.”

Jeremy dropped quickly, but he was still wheezing for breath as she stepped over him. Val left her blade where it jammed, embedded through his shoulder and neck. Just another corpse for the snows.

Her arms were trembling. No weakness, not here, Val ordered. “To the fight!” she screamed. She saw men holding spears, rushing at her. Maybe they were Boltons, maybe deserters, but they were moving in the wrong direction regardless. “To the fight! Push them back! Push them back!”

The Greatjon was leading the surge forward, a tide of men coming together and pressing outwards. All around her, the screaming, the madness… it was all just so much she couldn’t even make sense of it. She might have soiled herself, except she honestly wasn’t sure that she would notice if she did.
And all the while, the storm roared above her. The camp was in shambles – so much snow flurrying from the sky that a man could be buried just standing still. She could see snow dunes rolling over the ground, being pushed across the camp by the wind.

The armies were left fighting the wind and snow, shambling in the dark and wrestling blindly. So much fear, panic and rage in the air that it could have made her sick – physically nauseous. It was all more feeling than sense.

The world is convulsing, Val thought, and the thought made her twitch.

The wind howled over the lake like a banshee’s wail. Val stood, staring out, just trying to make sense of the world again.

Then, she heard a voice echoing through the rumble. A voice so faint she could hardly hear make it out. Help him, the ghostly sound cried. Save Jon!

It sounded like a child’s voice. A young boy’s. Even amidst everything else, the sound made her freeze.

Val turned to stare out over the lake, watching the snow churn across the blackness.

---

Jon

Sonagon! Jon shouted through the warg-sense, just trying to rouse the dragon, trying to achieve anything at all. Sonagon! I need you!

He had been trying to break through to his dragon for hours, pushing with all the strength he had. But it was so hard. The dragon’s mind felt like an ocean of sickness. Sonagon could recover. Sonagon could turn the battle, could save the camp.

The dragon stirred slightly, cracking the ice with every movement, but it didn’t wake. Jon could feel Sonagon’s pain – its lungs were in agony, struggling to even breathe. Even its heartbeat felt sluggish, straining against the poison in its blood. Jon felt sick and ill. He felt faint. He had lost so much blood.

Jon was left trying to fight on the ice, with Ramsay Bolton’s – no, Ramsay Snow’s – arm wrapped under his neck. The Bastard of Bolton’s grip was solid, keeping Jon trapped with the blade poised at his throat.

Around him, he heard the cries as the Ramsay’s men dug themselves in, but Jon couldn’t make out the words over the roar of the wind.

On the centre of the lake, the storm felt earth-shattering. The winds were sweeping across the frozen water so sharp they could cut down to the bone. Whatever hope Jon had that someone would come for him dwindled as the storm grew in pitch.

Even Ramsay’s men had to take shelter beneath the Sonagon’s mass, all the while the wind swept through snow so furiously it looked like the ground was flowing.

And in the distance, Jon watched as the burning fires were extinguished, one by one. All over the coast, the light fizzled out into shapeless blackness. Swallowed by the snows. He could hear the screams on the wind, the horns so faint they sounded like dying gasps.
Jon screamed. Sonagon!

There was a low groan as the dragon shifted a wing.

Jon’s body jerked. Something heavy collided against his skull, and Jon gagged. “Oh no,” Ramsay growled in his ear. “You’re doing that thing, aren’t you? Oh no, bad Reek. None of that. Not until you teach me how to do it too.”

The man is mad. Still, Ramsay dragged him backwards, but held off from hitting him again. One of Ramsay’s men had even wrapped up Jon’s wounded side, and they wrapped him in a cloak tightly to keep him out of the snow. Ramsay even seemed restrained, hesitant.

They can’t risk me dying, Jon realised. If they’re confronted, their only chance is to hold me hostage. They were only fourteen men, relying on the cover of darkness and confusion to keep them safe.

“That’s some trick you do, Reek,” Ramsay continued, hissing. “It made a lot of my men really nervous too – the Bastard King that could control animals. But they didn’t see you like I did; they didn’t see the little boy who didn’t have a clue. You’re out of your element, Reek, nothing but a failure.”

Ramsay had taken Dark Sister for himself, and wore the Valyrian blade on his hip. He didn’t wield it, though; Ramsay seemed to prefer his brute of a butcher’s blade rather than the slender sword. Jon was left defenceless. Jon could have struggled, would have tried to wrestle, but the sword was poised to slice open his throat as soon as he twitched.

The Bastard of Bolton was being paranoid, paranoid or carful – he had never once lowered his blade.

Sonagon, Jon pressed so much it hurt, forcing open what felt like an ocean of sickness. Sonagon, I need you. Now.

Sonagon felt so weak, but Jon was close enough to warg as strongly as he ever could. Just raise your head, Jon begged. Just raise your head and crush them.

The dragon could barely even breathe, but he was slowly beginning to stir. Trying to twitch with muscles that felt like lead…

They all heard the dragon tremble. This close, the dragon was a mountain of flesh. Jon glimpsed Sonagon’s snout twitch, and then his serpentine body rumbling as the dragon raised its head upwards. Jon’s heart was pounding so fast, watching the dragon uncurl laboriously.

Ramsay reacted smoothly. “Move away!” he shouted to his men, as he yanked Jon back quickly. “Move away, take positions!”

The Bastard’s Boys scattered around him, fleeing as the dragon groaned. A single wing struggled to unfurl, shuddering as claws scraped against the ice.

Ramsay’s arm was under Jon’s neck, dragging him backwards. Couldn’t breathe. Jon tried to struggle, but he didn’t have the strength. His arms thrashed, he tried to get a grip, and then agony shot through his side as Ramsay slammed a fist into Jon’s open wound, under the cloaks and bandages. He retched as Ramsay scrambled to his feet, dragging him up with.

“Get back, dragon!” Ramsay was screaming, barely audible over the wind. He was facing up against Sonagon’s immense snout, holding Jon before him like a shield. “Get back!”
The dragon was above them. Its neck unraveled, and then they were both staring at an immense jaw of white scales lined with red.

Sonagon’s black eyes… even in the darkness they seemed to gleam murderously.

Cold mist billowed from Sonagon’s nostrils. The dragon was struggling to breath, but Jon saw dark eyes flickering as they tried to focus. Sonagon’s body protested, but the dragon was staggering upwards, its great jaws opening. Sharp teeth as long as swords glinted in the dark, a cold luminescence shining deep in the dragon’s maw. Hoarfrost billowed from Sonagon’s jaws in faint sheets.

And even when facing down a beast as large as castle, Ramsay didn’t back down for a second. “That’s right!” Ramsay screamed, and manic laughter broke from his throat. “I’m right here! Now what you are going to do?”

Sonagon could have swallowed him whole without chewing. The man is mad.

His men scattered, running around Sonagon’s body as the dragon lumbered. Sonagon body shuddered, trying to unfurl. Immense claws scraped against ice, uselessly clattering. Sonagon can’t pull himself up, Jon realised. The dragon couldn’t even find its feet. He was reminded of a wounded man, or a drunkard, fumbling in disorientated anger and pain.

Ramsay’s grip around Jon’s neck tightened even further, strangling. “One breath of dragonfire,” Ramsay warned, snarled into Jon’s ear. “We’ll die together, bastard. I don’t think your beast is that good at aiming.”

For a second, Jon could have almost willed Sonagon to do it anyways. The dragon could smell the blood in the air. He didn’t know what was happening.

There was raw hatred in Sonagon’s eyes as they slowly focused on Ramsay, but the dragon was so weak he couldn’t even stand properly. Jon heard shouting, and in the darkness he glimpsed Ramsay’s men picking up spears and lances.

“I didn’t want to hurt your dragon, bastard,” Ramsay warned, his grip not slackening. “But I will. I can’t kill it, but I can gouge out its eyes. I can cut out its nostrils. I can hurt it, I can maim it. Lets see what a blinded dragon is worth, shall we?”

Ramsay’s men were prepared. A dozen men against a dragon. Normally Jon wouldn’t have been concerned about such numbers, but now? A dozen men while the Sonagon was addled and weak, drunk with pain?

Don’t, Jon gasped. Can’t. Stop him.

Jon’s body spasmed with all the strength he had left, his elbow snapping backwards. Ramsay took the blow on the chin, but hardly staggered. Somehow, Jon managed to slip out of the man’s grip, but he didn’t even make it a single step before Ramsay gripped his furs and dragged him face first into the snow.

A cry broke through Jon’s lips. Sonagon growled, but the noise was strangled, strained.

They both toppled. Arms flailed, their bodies grappled against each other in the snow. Jon could feel the hard ice beneath him, could feel Ramsay’s grip against his neck.

Ramsay’s other hand found Jon’s wound, and Jon felt him squeeze. Flesh ripped. The pain… Jon couldn’t even…
Amidst all the chaos, just two bastards wrestling in the snow.

“Bastard!” Ramsay’s fist collided against his chin. He was on top of Jon, pinning him down.

“Bastard!”

Sonagon growled, retching and wheezing before clambering to its feet. Sonagon staggered towards them. Ramsay dragged Jon up. “Come on!” the Bastard of Bolton howled at the dragon. He was almost laughing. “Come on!”

The man’s mad, Jon realised.

The dragon could have crushed Ramsay in his jaws, would have, if not for Jon lying so close. Instead, the dragon hesitated. There was no way a thing of Sonagon’s size could intervene without crushing Jon too. Because of me, Jon thought, struggling to breathe. My weakness.

The Bastard’s Boys shouted something. Jon saw a flash of a spear through the air.

Jon felt the jab, felt a spark of Sonagon’s pain, only a foot away from his eyeball. Ramsay’s men were all around the dragon, and they had spears. In the dark, weak and poisoned, with enemies all around him, Sonagon could hardly resist. Jon saw a man pull back the string on a longbow, his arms hoisting the weapon upwards.

Straight towards Sonagon’s soft, fleshy eyeball. The dragon’s scales were hard enough to stop metal, but his eyes were not. Jon felt the ice beneath quiver as Sonagon shuddered, flinching in pain.

The other Bastard’s Boys were throwing spears, from all sides. One man was crushed as Sonagon’s neck whipped out, but the rest were still pushing. One man was gouged by the horns on Sonagon’s crests, but then the dragon fumbled, and two others had a clear shot at its right eye.

Jon heard their cries of victory, and white blood plumed from Sonagon’s eye. The dragon cried out – a bone-curdling shriek of pain.

Sonagon was trembling, bleeding heavily from his right eye as he flailed. Jon felt the panic, fear and anger pulsing from the dragon. Sonagon didn’t understand what was happening – the memories were vague, sick with pain. He’d fallen asleep after a great meal, and when he woke his body was screaming and there were men attacking him. The pain left the dragon disoriented. Weak and confused. The storm. The wind was so loud it overwhelmed the senses, the poison in his blood paining his muscles.

Sonagon was too weak, too dazed. The men were like fleas, gnashing at the dragon while the animal was wounded.

“Get your dragon to back down,” Ramsay snarled into Jon’s ear. “Or they will blind it. I will blind it and shred its wings – I will turn your beast into ruin.”

Another spear jabbed. Sonagon was so disorientated, so pained and fatigued. The rage was the only thing overcoming the poison. If Sonagon’s eyes were pierced, he would go berserk with blind rage…

Through at all, Ramsay just laughed. The world was mad and thick with panic, but it was as though the Bastard of Bolton… loved it. The man holding him was laughing, laughing and howling even as the frostfire welling in Sonagon’s throat threatened to freeze them all. Even in the middle of the chaos, Ramsay Bolton laughed. Sonagon could roll at any moment, and smear them all like ants…
“Last chance to calm your fucking dragon down!” Ramsay cackled, voice howling over the storm. “Calm it down like a good little Reek. It doesn’t matter if you live or die here, bastard. It doesn’t matter if your dragon kills me here. My father’s army is killing yours right over there, our allies are taking your city right out from under you. You’ve lost! Bastard!”

Those words haunted Jon, trembling in the cold, in the pain. He just didn’t have the strength anymore… This is me. My fault.

Sonagon’s gasp of strength waned, and the dragon sank into the snow.

“Company!” someone cried suddenly. “Over the shore! Someone! Someone’s incoming!”

“No, more!” Another of Ramsay’s men bellowed. “Too many!”

At once, the words caused everything to change. “Fuck it!” Ramsay cursed, and then turned to order. “Leave the beast, get ready! Hold position! Hold steady!”

_Is it help?_ Jon tried to focus, tried to see what it was the others could. And then he saw it, the pinprick of a torch fighting against the flurry of snow. Sprinting over from the shore, from the direction of the camp. Jon’s heart skipped. A single person, against Ramsay, against a dozen of his men?

No. There was more movement. A single person, leading a column of at least twenty raiders in thick furs. They tore over the ice, bellowing war-cries.

“Hold them back!” Ramsay screamed. Jon’s body lurched, the bastard yanking him back. “Hold them back!”

Everything was blurry. Jon couldn’t make sense of it, not through the pain, the blood loss and the cold.

Spears and arrows flashed through the snows. There was a strangled cry of pain, followed by the thud of an axe embedding itself into a chest. Jon saw two men crashing against the Bastard’s Boys, only for both of them to fall with the whizz of arrows. There were bodies wrestling, and then a flicker of golden hair between the snows.

Jon was being dragged backwards. Ramsay was running away as his men fought, but the blade never left Jon’s throat.

The cries of pain and fury could barely even break over the din of the wind. Another two bodies fell into the snow, but Jon couldn’t even tell if they were Ramsay’s men or his own.

The dragon screeched, trembling with pain. A flurry of arrows wafted overhead, splattering down onto the bodies wrestling in the dark.

Jon was left so weak he could barely even gasp. He heard Sonagon growling – a low moan like a whine - as the dragon thrashed madly with pain. All around them, bodies fumbled and thrashed.

He heard another clash of steel, followed by a strangled scream. Sounds of battle were getting further away. Ramsay still dragged him backwards, still keeping the blade at Jon’s throat. Away from Sonagon.

The dragon’s tail thrashed again. Jon felt the ice crack with a tremendous crash. Ramsay stumbled, but he didn’t fall. Even here, dozens of paces away, it felt like the ice beneath them was groaning, ready to break.
Jon was gasping, but Ramsay’s grip felt strong. Relentless. “Come on, bastard,” Ramsay growled. “I’m not done with you yet.”

Ramsay was fleeing. There was no visibility in this storm. All Ramsay had to do was take a dozen steps and he as good as vanished into the pitch black. Men were running around blind.

Jon heard someone cry out – he couldn’t make the words, but he recognised the voice, high and sharp. Val? Everything was spinning so madly he felt delirious.

Jon felt another jab of Sonagon’s pain. A spear. In the chaos, the pain, the confusion, Sonagon collapsed. The dragon dropped and thrashed, his claws, his wings, his tail toppling into the ice like the calving of a glacier. Like the falling of a mountain. The ice tore asunder with an unholy roar, the entire lake rippling beneath the ice, swelling and cracking as far as the eye could see.

Shouts all around him. Screams. Men scattered. Men died. Great geysers of slush, blocks of ice the size of horses scattered through the air as the dragon’s churning tail tore the frozen lake apart. Jon watched men fall, consumed by the black water.

For a moment, he was alone. Ramsay’s grip from his throat had vanished, and Jon gasped, breathing the pure cold air. He looked up imploringly into the darkness. Jon couldn’t see anybody coming for him, but he was so dazed he could barely make sense of anything. It was dark, so dark – the wind and snow… and then Ramsay yanked him up, too quickly to see.

The bastard was spitting and cursing a flurry of winds Jon couldn’t even make out. Ramsay’s footsteps were heavy, desperate, wheezing as he still dragged away Jon’s flailing body.

He isn’t even trying to fight them, Jon realised. Ramsay had ordered his men to hold position, and then he just ran. All Ramsay intends is to run with me and find somewhere to hide in the dark until morning. The Bastard of the Dreadfort expected Roose Bolton to win the night, after which Ramsay could deliver Jon to his father.

Even in the worst case for him, Jon thought numbly, Ramsay will cut my throat before he lets anybody recover me.

Either way, the Boltons would win.

The sword’s edge was on his neck, pressing into his skin as Ramsay jerked. Jon felt his blood oozing out into the cold.

Behind him, Jon felt Sonagon split the ice further. The frozen lake burst with a crack like thunder, and more bodies toppling into the water. The dragon staggered, half-collapsing into the lake and too weak to drag himself out. The dragon was groaning, breathing with a bellows and shuddering in agony, trying to hold on…

Ramsay was gasping for breath, but he didn’t stop running. A man could die from frostbite in this weather, but Ramsay didn’t seem to care. His eyes were crazed, still holding his cleaver to Jon’s throat.

There was nothing but darkness. No torches, no light, only snow and wind. He’s going to do it, Jon thought. He’s going to kill me. Maybe we will both die, trapped in the storm...

“JON!” He heard the cry split through the wind. Coming towards them. Ramsay stopped. Jon’s heart pounded, his hands flailing uselessly.

That voice. Even in the black, he recognised Val’s hair, streaming in the blizzard like a golden banner as she pushed her way through the snow, staggering with every step. How did she find me? How could she…? Even in the dark and the storm, despite Ramsay running randomly, Val came straight for him. Jon had no idea how she had found him, but she had.

“Jon!” she called again. It sounded like her voice could have cracked. She was panting for breath.

Ramsay’s hands tightened, and Jon glimpsed bloody teeth. It wasn’t a smile, not really. “You…” Ramsay growled, raising his blade closer to Jon’s neck.

Val had a sword too. A single short steel blade she gripped with both hands, the edge slick with frozen blood. “Harlow. You fucking bloody bastard…” Val snarled. With every step, she had to push her way through three feet thick of snow, struggling to balance in the wind.

“Stay back,” Ramsay shouted. “You step closer, I’ll slit your little boy’s throat! You hear me? Don’t you take another fucking step!”

Val didn’t even hesitate. She took another step. “No.”

Ramsay’s face twisted. “You fucking bitch. I’ll kill him, you hear me? I’ll kill him.”

“Fuck you,” Val replied simply, shambling another step, her sword still raised. “Bastard.”

In that moment, Jon’s heart was beating and his head was spinning so fast he could barely even think. Ramsay’s blade hovered less than inches away from carving out Jon’s jugular, before he stopped. Ramsay’s eyes scanned through the snow, glaring around suspiciously.

Every heartbeat felt painful. Ramsay was looking back to front, squinting for any more shapes, any movement between the snows. Jon could only gape and beg quietly, willing for there to be more figures materialising behind Val in the dark, but there was nothing. There was nobody left but her, shuffling forward through the snows.

“You’re alone,” Ramsay said slowly.

Val didn’t reply, she just kept on pushing forward, sword drawn. They stared at each other, both squinting as the snows roared. Then, Ramsay started to laugh.

“Oh!” Ramsay’s voice turned into a howl. “You’re alone! Oh, this is my lucky day. This is going to be good.”

Without even another word, Ramsay’s grip slackened, and Jon collapsed weakly into the snow. Even an hour ago Jon still had strength to move, but now he could barely tremble. Move, Jon tried to force himself, but his limbs weren’t replying.

Jon could barely even pull himself up, but Ramsay was still moving strong. The man was a monster – relentless as a hound. Ramsay held his blade tightly, and stepped forward to meet Val. “Are you watching, bastard?” Ramsay called happily without turning. “I want you to watch. I told you I’d make you watch!”

If Jon was strong enough, he would have screamed for Val to run. He couldn’t, he could barely even gasp. Too much blood loss, too much pain. His wound was seeping blood, frozen solid against his furs. Run, Jon begged. Just run.

Val didn’t make a sound, she just stared. Ramsay’s pale blue eyes glinted in the dark, his chuckles like a rabid dog’s growls.
“And you. Bitch. I’ve been wanting this for a long time. I’m not going to kill you,” Ramsay promised. “Not straight away. I want my Reek to watch.”

Ramsay lunged. The cry broke his throat as he brought his cleaver downwards, hacking like a butcher. Jon heard the ringing of steel as Val parried, and fell backwards under the assault. Ramsay was relentless. Like an animal, not a swordsman. Val was a good fighter, but…

Move, Jon cursed himself. He tried to pull himself to his feet, but the wind took him down again. His body was trembling, his knees failed him. Have to move. Have to…

Jon didn’t have a sword. He didn’t even have any strength left. He couldn’t walk, he could barely even crawl.

Val met Ramsay’s blade, time and time again. Val might have been faster, but the snows were too thick for mobility. The odds were against her from the beginning. Ramsay had more weight behind him, he had the heavier weapon. Val’s short sword could barely even compare to Ramsay’s cleaver, and yet the sound of steel rang out, the blades chiming like bells in the storm.

He saw Val fall onto the back foot, stumbling in the snow. Ramsay was injured too, but the man was a monster. Val couldn’t keep up. She stumbled, and…

It should have been me. That was the last rational thought before raw emotion consumed everything. Jon staggered upwards, just trying to reach her. He was so weak. He’d lost so much blood, taken too many wounds.

They were a dozen yards away. It might as well have been a dozen miles.

Ramsay saw the advantage and he took it, laughing like a madman. Val stumbled, and Ramsay lunged. In that moment, it seemed like time froze, and Jon could count every frenzied stroke of his cleaver. One, two, three, four…

And on the fifth stroke, Val’s grip broke. Her sword fell from her hands, she fumbled to grab it, and then Ramsay’s blade hacked straight down into her chest.

His throat jammed. Jon couldn’t even scream.

He just watched Val stumble, red pluming against white.

The butcher’s blade hacked through her furs, straight down into her shoulder and down into her chest. She didn’t scream, there was no sound except a strained gasp.

And then, a heartbeat away from ripping open her ribcage, Ramsay froze. His lunge stopped, his sword embedded her chest, and Jon saw the bloody grin flicker over his features. Ramsay pulled back before giving her the quick death. He wants to savour it, Jon thought dumbly. He likes to savour the moment.

That moment seemed to last forever. Jon frozen, Val falling, and Ramsay grinning.

Val’s knuckles tightened around her blade. Even before Ramsay could retract his lunge, Val’s sword slashed upwards.

Ramsay’s smile stopped. Val’s sword cut sliced straight through his stomach. Perhaps it was just a trick of the dark, but Jon could have sworn that she spat at Ramsay just as time reasserted. He made a noise that sounded a lot like “Oh.”

And then they both dropped together, falling backwards into the snow.

“Val!” Jon screamed, and his voice broke. “VAL!”

She landed on her back, trembling, bleeding. Jon could see the life pouring out of her, blood swelling from the cut, her warmth steaming against the stone. She was alive, gurgling for breath, as Jon collapsed over her.

Ramsay was struggling too, dying – gargling in agony, flailing with Val’s short sword embedded in the bone of his chest. Jon glimpsed the man’s hands clutching at his stomach, trying to hold in glistening loops of intestine.

Jon’s numb fingers went to her wound, as if he could hold her body together himself, or squeeze the blood back into her veins. The blade hacked all the way into her breast. He could feel sliced flesh, the cut from her shoulder down to her torso.

He couldn’t even see her properly in the dark. There was nothing but snow, darkness and blood.

“Val!” Jon’s voice was a strained cry. “Somebody! Somebody help!”

The shriek of the wind was his only reply.

Val was making sounds that could have been words. He couldn’t hear her. He couldn’t hear her words. A gurgling noise came from her throat, coughing up blood. He could hardly even see her in the dark, instead his fingers were left groping helplessly.

Jon was left kneeling in the snow, clutching her body, his tears freezing against his cheeks as the storm howled and wailed. The snows fell so furiously they could bury him.

Sansa

The world was screaming. There was no logic, no understanding, no civility. There was absolutely nothing but an unending frenzy – a drumming in the air like the heartbeat of a crazed god – that sent the world mad.

“—hold fast, hold the line, hold the line, HOLD THE LINE...!”

Sansa could have shrieked, as another tower collapsed over the harbour in the distance and stone rained from the sky.

The hulls of the enemy fleet were launching barrels by trebuchet; filled with sharp stones and nails, raining death over the harbour and decimating whatever they crashed into. The heavy, tumbling projectiles crashed through the walls, tearing through mortarworks as shrapnel scattered like hail. A few of the enemy vessels, larger, further in the water, were launching flaming barrels of oil, setting aflame even the stones they splattered over. And the people, the people...

She did shriek as nearby a stout stone building next to the Merchant’s Quay collapsed, rubble scattered everywhere. The last vestige of morale among the guards of White Harbour outer docks collapsed along with their barricades.

“Stand and fight!” Ser Jorah roared, standing tall and strong against the current of men. “Hold the line! Hold the line!”

But it was meaningless. The barricades on the Merchant’s Quay had already fallen. The Fisher’s Port probably had as well. The outer harbour was lost. Only the Lord’s Port – the defence that Ser Jorah led – had managed to cling on, their discipline holding despite the frenzied human tide slamming against their chokepoint.

Ser Jorah was nothing but one man trying to stop a flood. He could swing his sword at a hundred men, but there were a thousand pushing behind them. They thumped upwards from the docks in a great mass, each one shapeless, faceless and never-ending.

Sansa could feel it in the air. The tide of the battle was already set. It was rising, rising and set to drown them.

The enemy fleet assaulted the outer and inner harbour, overwhelming the ships blockading the harbour as they pushed their way through to the docks. The Manderly’s fleet was lost, and now the fighting was in the city. Arrows and stones rained from the wharves and walls, but they were met by scorpions and trebuchet, longbows and heavy crossbows. All the while, the frenzied guards tried to hold the piers against the attackers – they had torn down trader’s stalls and merchant carts for makeshift barricades to bar the way up the docks. There were dozens of men bearing tridents clad in the tabard of the Manderly merman, trying to huddle behind flimsy barriers of broken wood and cloth, organising a desperate defence and failing.

Sansa had watched the Battle of the Blackwater from afar, but she had never been so close to so much fighting before. She had never seen the fear in the men’s eyes, or heard the clattering of arrows as they scattered on the cobbles around her. She’d never smelled them as they died, crying and wailing and full of fear.

“Stay low and hide,” Ser Jorah had said, as he pushed her into a crevice by the road, a cleft in the storm drain running along the stone wall of the wharf. The grating was not large enough to clamber through and climb down, otherwise she might have tried to escape down into the sewers, but the enclave was still enough to shelter her in the alleyway. The stink was horrible, her dress was grimy with mud, but at that moment Sansa simply didn’t care. “Tear your dress,” Ser Jorah ordered of her. “Smear mud on your face and – if they come for you – cry and wail and sob. Spit, wail or piss yourself even. If they get past me, you must cry for your mother and hope these men have some conscience.”

_He’s worried about the city being sacked_, Sansa had realised. _He doesn’t want me to be identified as highborn._

“We must– we must head for New Castle,” she had argued, shaking and stammering.

“There will not be time, _Beth._” His grizzly head shook, and she noticed the glint in his eyes. _Beth – I am back to pretending to be his daughter._ The Manderly guards were nearby, Jorah deliberately hadn’t addressed by her real name. _He doesn’t want me to reveal myself, not in the mere minutes before the battle._ “If we run to the New Castle now, we are liable to end up trapped outside its gates. And the city is in a panic, I dare not risk these streets. The wharves are the only place that they stand a chance at holding the enemy, so I must stay here. Stay near me; the fighting will be close, but you are safer with the guards than you are by yourself.”

The _Merry Midwife_ had sailed past the blockade, and as they’d hurriedly disembarked there were Manderly criers calling for able-bodied men to help hold the docks. Jorah had walked into the Lord’s Port holding himself high, looking so strong and experienced that it seemed the Manderly men just parted around him. Jorah had introduced himself as a knight – sounding loud, strong and sure – and the men were so desperate that they’d just accepted his authority, put him at the head of the port’s defence. In the distance, despite its captain’s protests, the _Merry Midwife_ was joining the force of ships to meet the enemy on the water.

“And if you hear me screaming your name – if you hear me screaming _Beth_ – then I am lost and you must turn and run,” Jorah said grimly, lowering his voice. “Just run and hide, no matter where. Hide in a sewer, hide in a latrine, or hide in the manure of tanner’s shop. Do it without shame, just _hide_. Stay away from the crowds, any crowds, and hide and wait.”

Her hands fumbled at the Valyrian steel dagger, hidden in the folds of her dress. Her hands gripped the plain black handle. “Put that away,” Jorah ordered. “Keep that dagger hidden at all times. Do not let anybody see you with it.”

He shook his head. “_No_. Keep it hidden. If they see you with steel, they will treat you differently. A man might show compassion to a woman, but he won’t if there’s a blade in her hands. Your best defence is to have none. Just run.”
The soldiers wore steel or leather, but a woman’s only defence was to try and look so ugly, weak or mad that no man would take her. They always said that during the Sack of King’s Landing, women had been raped by hundreds in the streets.

“Ser Jorah,” she choked, trying to protest.

“You don’t understand.” he growled. He looked… scared. She’d never seen him with such a look before. “Panic is the worst enemy tonight. You will want to run for help, to seek shelter in a crowd of people, but you must overcome that urge. You do not know how quickly a crowd can turn to mob, or how quickly such a thing can trample a young girl to her death.”

Her heart was beating so fast. She remembered all of the warnings she had been given before the Battle of the Blackwater. It had been terrifying, but she’d been a lord’s daughter sheltered in a strong keep. Now, she was nothing more than a young woman exposed on the streets.

The bells were ringing madly as the dromonds on the water rumbled closer, ready for battle. They moved like a storm through the mist, each splash of the oars like a drum.

If the soldiers catch me, they will rape me, Sansa thought. Lollys Stokeworth had been raped by half a hundred men behind a tanner’s shop, in broad daylight. The thought of being dragged to the cobbles and defiled in the street was more frightening than death itself.

That quiet dread in the knight’s eyes made her shiver. “There is a beast in every man,” Jorah muttered, his voice turning low. “It growls when you put a sword in his hand. You can feel it in the air, can’t you? Tonight the beasts run free.”

Then, the knight pulled himself straight, turned around and bellowed orders to the guards around him. Sansa didn’t think it mattered what he was shouting – the men just needed to hear a strong voice.

She noticed how Ser Jorah positioned himself with his back to her hiding spot, as he bellowed orders at the White Harbour guards. In times of crisis, it seemed that scared men would listen to anyone with a loud voice. He ordered them to seal the streets, to prepare to resist enemies coming through the pier. But he’s not trying to save the city, Sansa realised, he’s only trying to protect me.

For all his crimes and flaws, none could fault Ser Jorah’s bravery in the face of battle.

The battle seemed to move so slowly. Perhaps it would have been easier if was quick. Instead, Sansa was left crouching in the mud, while the oars of the ships and the bells of the city reached a deafening frenzy. Through the harbour, through the ships, and against the docks…

Slow, but inescapable. Sansa thought. Like the tide.

Boom. When the first dromond collided against the White Harbour galley, black iron ram tearing through oak, it was like the world cracked.

Shouts. Screams. Boots running past, frantic cries and dull crashes. Loud voices and sudden, abrupt silences. Sansa remembered being in King’s Landing again, sheltering in her room in Septa Mordane’s arms as the flood of red cloaks swept through the Tower of the Hand and slaughtered her father’s men…

Sansa didn’t close her eyes. She didn’t want to watch, she didn’t want to be there, but she refused to close her eyes.

“Stand and fight!” Ser Jorah was screaming. “On me! On me!”
Sansa couldn’t even count the men. She was struggling to make sense of it, her mind reeling to fight back against the panic.

As the ships clashed in the harbour and men fired arrows down from the towers and walls along the docks, it was left to the White Harbour guards to try and hold the wharves at a few dozen choke points.

Ser Jorah hadn’t been sure whether or not they would dock and take the plague wharves first, to attack the city from land as well. Instead, the enemy chose to sail straight against the main harbours with their full strength. It was the fastest, most direct, route of attack, but also the most dangerous for them. Maybe the garrison has a chance to resist?

But her hopes were dashed, as the enemy came closer into view and she saw the immense size of those three-decked dromonds. The ships on the water didn’t stand a chance. The White Harbour vessels folded around them, and the first of the dromonds pushed all the way up to the jetty.

The ships let fall thick planks, and began to disgorge their contents into the city. Soldiers came up from the docks with lances, halberds and polearms – all manner of long weapons at the column’s vanguard, forming a wall of spikes and blades. They were not marching. Nothing so rushed, so mad, could be called a march. A stampede. A tide, maybe.

Many of them wore rapiers, shortswords and cutlasses sheathed at their sides, or javelins slung across their backs. They were dressed for war in the fashion of corsairs; clad in mismatched boiled leathers and jerkins, some with arms threaded through small bucklers. Not many were wearing plate, instead they clad themselves in coifs and hauberks. A few of them wore peacock plumes on their heads, or had bright colours like yellows and reds smeared over their tunics. Through panicked glances from behind the wall, Sansa glimpsed tanned skin and dark hair, in so, so many shades.

These men aren’t Westerosi. The soldiers were chanting something as they marched; at first Sansa thought it was gibberish, then she made out the tones and pitches of words she couldn’t understand. Tyroshi, Sansa realised dumbly. Why are Tyroshi men attacking White Harbour?

She glimpsed a figure in purple-trimmed furs trying to charge through the failing barricade, only for Ser Jorah’s bastard sword to cleave his head clean off. Red splattered against the cobbles, and a bloody blond-haired skull rolled. Before he died, Sansa recognised words of bastard High Valyrian. Lyseni, Sansa thought. That man was Lyseni.

Jorah and the White Harbour men were holding the alleyway, barely, but then Sansa caught sight of figures scaling up the buildings and scattering over the tiled roofs. Voices screamed to stop them, but the men were slipping through from above. One of them raised a rapier high, and screamed a war cry in a different foreign tongue. Braavosi, Sansa recognised. They are speaking Braavosi.

They were from all the Free Cities, in clad in armour as mismatched as their fleet. Most didn’t even seem like they spoke the Common Tongue. These are sellswords, sellsails, pirates.

On the water, the fleet was powering through what remained of the White Harbour defences, cracking the Manderly galleys with ease. The red dromond towards the front looked as big as the King Robert’s Hammer, while the flagship at the rear looked even larger. Such ships were immense leviathans, wildly superior to the White Harbour galleys. They would be the pride of any great lord’s fleet. It doesn’t make sense; how could sellswords have ships like that?

There had been nineteen vessels in the White Harbour blockade, and then reinforced by another seven galleys resting in port, plus a motley ragtag of hastily ‘requisitioned’ merchant vessels. As many as they could muster, but the White Harbour fleet was already either falling back or being crushed by the enemy’s might.

Another flaming barrel launched overhead, scattering into the street beyond. The screams rising from where it landed were as nothing human. The fleet was already through the harbour, and slamming up against the port. To the west, Sansa saw the Merry Midwife blazing, the sails aflame, the ship falling to a striped Lysene vessel’s black iron ram and breaking into the waves. Men were jumping overboard, but archers from a nearby dromond picked them off in the water with methodical and well-practised volleys. Less than an hour ago that ship had ferried her to the harbour, and now it was a wreck in the waves.

That was me, Sansa realised breathlessly. It was me who convinced Captain Casso to volunteer to defend White Harbour. I warned him of Lord Borrell’s wrath should he run, I pleaded with him that he would be safest among the defenders even though I knew it was a lie. His ship was destroyed, his men dead, because of me. There was no guilt, only shock.

From the sounds of things, Ser Jorah was the only thing keeping the White Harbour men fighting. Their courage would have broken long ago, if not for Jorah’s booming voice and relentless blade. But all the while Ser Jorah holds this one alleyway, will all of the other barricades hold as well?

Despite all the knight’s ferocity and resolve, the enemy was still slipping through into the city itself. Most of the enemy ships on the water hadn’t even pushed through to the docks yet. There would be more men in their hulls, more sellswords waiting to unload.

The unloading is the only saving grace we have, Sansa realised. Even the inner and outer harbours together weren’t large enough to fit so many great ships at once. Shallops or rafts could have unloaded faster, but those would leave their men more vulnerable during the approach. The docks were crammed, the piers were raining arrows – their ships were limited in how many men they could actually land at once. It was the only reason the White Harbour soldiers on the wharves could actually put up a fight.

Sansa didn’t know how much of a garrison White Harbour had, but she could tell it wasn’t enough. Sansa saw greenboys and greybeards wearing green cloaks, fumbling to hold their tridents. The older men kept to the bowmen on the walls, leaving the boys failing as they tried to hold the barricades.

“Stand fast!” Ser Jorah boomed, but Sansa saw two young recruits throw down their spears and turn to run.

She heard screams behind her. The sellswords had already breached the city, White Harbour was being sacked. She saw smoke rising from the stout buildings near the Merchant’s Quay, corsairs pushing towards the banks, the insurers, the silversmiths. From the port authority geysered yellow flames so strong they seemed to split the sky, as pirates carrying blazing torches marched up the pier for the merchant’s warehouses.

Ser Jorah was a man swinging his blade trying to stop a river, all the while the current rushed around him.

There was no mercy from the sellswords, no restraint in their assault. They attacked hard and fast, and seemed intent on looting the city as quickly as possible, and burning all else.

The dragon, Sansa thought suddenly. Perhaps they fear the dragon could return at any moment? Their fleet was only exposed during the approach to the city, so they tried to cover the distance and break the defences as quickly as possible. As soon as the sellswords reached the streets, then not even dragonfire would be able to target them easily from the air. Not without hurting White Harbour itself too.

What if they manage to hold? Will the Manderly men hold the streets, or will they have to fold? They can barricade themselves up in the New Castle, but if their–

Boom. Another barrel crashed from the sky, stone and rubble scattering, and instantly all of Sansa’s thoughts went blank. It came so close that the wall opposite her collapsed and Sansa felt a wave of dust against her face.

“Hold!” she heard Ser Jorah’s voice. It sounded like he was in the distance, although she knew he was less than a dozen yards away. “HOLD!”

Bodies littered the alleyway, so many that men staggered trying to step over them. She saw arrows raining down through the gap between the walls, their barbed shafts squelching into corpses. She saw tanned men in boiled leather raising crossbows, pulling back on heavy winches. They wielded big, ungainly crossbows, the Myrish type so rarely seen in Westeros, that could fire three quarrels at a time. The crude barricades couldn’t stop the salvo of bolts.

The first twang of a dozen bolts together shredded through any fight the Manderly guards still had. The green cloaks either fell or ran.

She heard heavy footsteps, and saw the bear knight staggering backwards towards her. Blood dripped from his forehead, and she saw the shaft of an arrow sticking out of his left forearm. Jorah cradled the arm, but made no move to remove the arrow.

She staggered to her feet, flinching as she stepped out onto the bloody cobbles. Blood and mud and corpses. “Run where?”

“To the walls. Still men holding out. Hurry.” His feet shambled, nearly tripping over his boots. The knight was so exhausted he could barely walk.

“The city–”

He shook his head. “The city is lost.”

As soon as she left the alleyway, she saw a wider view of the battle. A cold morning mist filled the air, and there were a dozen burning wrecks on the water. They were through the wharves, and flooding out into the cobbled streets.

The soldiers would be rushing forward to New Castle. To fall back would leave them trapped in the thickest fighting. Ser Jorah meant to go east instead, along the Fisher’s Port and towards the shipyards and inner harbour.

She could still hear fighting. The outer harbour had been overwhelmed, but it looked like the wharfs along the inner harbour was still holding. A mile-long thirty-foot-tall granite wall surrounded House Manderly’s private piers and shipyards, with towers every hundred yards, leading down to the Wolf’s Den on the rocks at the far end of the pier. The sellswords seemed intent on pushing through into the city’s heart, but even as they surged past the defence on the inner harbour still held. There were still green cloaks holding the walls of the shipyards, the garrison based around the Wolf’s Den.
Ser Jorah wrapped his beefy arm around her, clutching his sword tightly with his one good hand, but he was so exhausted that she had to try to carry him. The knight stunk of sweat and fresh blood. She saw the old bandages around his missing fingers weeping again, the blood from his maimed hand dripping onto her shoulder.

As they stepped onto the street, she saw a gaggle of sellswords marching down the road, bursting through houses and slinging stones wrapped in burning rags through shuttered windows. They scattered the cityfolk around them, screams and wails filling the air. Sansa and Jorah slipped out behind them, and ran in the opposite direction.

“Surrender! Surrender all defiance!” one of the sellswords bellowed from a rooftop, clutching a flaming torch. One of the few Westerosi voices she had heard from them. “The Lord of Waters owns this city now!”

She barely made out the words. The Lord of Waters? What?

There were skirmishes in the streets. Sansa saw soldiers clashing with figures in furs with spears. Women, she realised dumbly. She saw women clad in furs, with hard-bitten features wielding spears, shrieking battle cries in a queer language, clashing with corsairs on the cobbles. Sansa could have stared, but Jorah was pushing her forward into another alley.

Behind her, she heard the rumbling footsteps as the soldiers pressed through.

Less than a few hours ago, she had arrived in hectic cobbled wharves of a strong port city, filled with stalls and fishmarkets. Now, the wharves were burning, the stalls had been smashed and the docks looked like a totally different place.

Men, women and children gushed in the streets around her, trampling to the west away from the battle. The Manderly guards were falling, trying to recover some semblance of order. There are not enough fighting soldiers, she thought. This attack came when there was not a proper force to defend against it. The streets felt like they were full of women and children, old men and mewling babes, or scared folk trying to push away. She heard clashes, snapping voices and cries of pain...

The crowds were different to what she would expect, Sansa realised through the fog of fear. She didn’t know what was happening, but it all felt… tense. She saw women wearing animal hides rather than wool, and old men with shaggy figures with bone daggers. There were fishwives and sailors among them – cityfolk – but also crowds of hard-worn figures that just seemed different. Like they had come out of the wilderness, filling the city. Refugees? she thought in a daze.

Across the yard, Sansa saw an aging woman with skin like leather, wearing a necklace of a white stone, step on top a cart and raise a spear high – shrieking in a weird language for others to join her. Sansa couldn’t even recognise the language. She nearly tripped as she stared, but Ser Jorah pushed her forward towards the gates.

She heard shouting from the men on the walls of the inner harbour, and Jorah pushed his way out of the rabble and towards the huddle of Manderly men at the base of the tower. Sansa half-expected someone to demand Jorah and herself to identify themselves, but nobody did. Perhaps it was because Ser Jorah had fought with the soldiers on the pier, or maybe because he was sheltering a girl.

“They are coming up behind us,” Ser Jorah shouted at once, looking around the men. “A dromond and a galley docked at the east pier. They broken the wharves, heading towards us through Baker Street!”
“Baker Street?” a man looked alarmed. “The crowds–”

“Get them in or get them away!” the knight snapped, glaring at the shocked soldiers. “Move! Now! They’ve already got a foothold – close the gates and hold them!”

A few of the men were already moving even before waiting for command from their superior. The others turned to look for orders from their officer – look to a white-bearded man with a gnarled face and a green cloak, swaying slightly on the spot. The man wore a greying hauberk and ringmail, with one of his eyes gouged out from an old battle wound under its helm. “Aye,” the one-eyed soldier ordered. “Get to the gates, prepare to hold the yards!” He turned to Jorah with a heavy limp. “And you are?”

“Ser Jeor, knight of House Mormont,” Jorah replied promptly. Why give a false name? Sansa wondered briefly, before realising herself; on the off-chance that anybody had heard of Jorah Mormont the slaver, he didn’t want the issue to distract them now. If it came to it, the names Jeor and Jorah were similar enough that he could claim they misheard.

“Ser Bartimus, castellan of the Wolf’s Den,” the old man introduced. He didn’t look much like a knight. It was only when he staggered around that Sansa noticed Ser Bartimus had a peg-leg. “Ser Marlon is off at war, Ser Garth ran for reinforcements to the New Castle, I am in command here.”

“How many?” Jorah demanded.

“Not enough. We held them back at the harbour, but these gates haven’t been sealed in a hundred years,” Ser Bartimus said, shaking his head as he hobbled forward. “We must hold the Castle Stair. I need every man I can get to hold the gates!” He turned towards another greybeard. “Serjeant! Clear the yard of savages and brace for attack!

Savages. Sansa noted the word even between a hundred other shouts, thinking of the women in hides clutching spears. She could hear the scuffles even from here. While the cityfolk ran to the Manderly guards, the ‘savages’ were huddling in the streets, holding their own councils as they prepared to battle.

Those are wildlings, she realised suddenly. There were wildlings filling the streets.

“All women and children get to the Old Mint,” a Manderly man-at-arms shouted. A heavy figure moved to grab Sansa with a beefy hand. “Women and children run to the Old Mint!”

Jorah stepped into stop him, keeping Sansa close to him. “The Old Mint is already lost. They’ve broken Fishfoot Square.”

Sansa didn’t know enough about White Harbour’s layout, but the words caused ripples through the guards. They all seemed so young, so pale, quivering and pissing in their breeches.

“What of Sept of Snows?” a man demanded, his voice breaking. “My wife and daughter ran to the Sept of Snows.”

“Dammit, we can’t help them now,” Ser Bartimus ordered. Even despite his age, he had the grizzled and loud voice of a captain. “If you’re lucky, they will have made it to the New Castle, but we must hold position. Serjeant – open up the Wolf’s Den, get as many as we can in there. We hold steady here for as long as we can fight, and then fall back to the Wolf’s Den!”

The Wolf’s Den is a prison, Sansa remembered. She had seen the old and squat fortress during their approach, dark, thick and dreary like a cave on the rocks at the easternmost end of the docks. It used to be a castle; once the seat of the Greystarks, but then it fell into ruin after their rebellion, and the Manderlys built New Castle as its replacement.

She could hear chaos clamouring outside. The cityfolk gushed through the gates, but the others – the wildlings – were clashing with the guards. Either the Manderly soldiers weren’t letting them through, or the savages refused to go – Sansa couldn’t even tell.

She could still feel the booms of stone-throwers from the ships, and smoke billowing over the tiled roofs. Houses were burning towards the city’s centre, along the plaza through which the Castle Stair ran.

The assault has broken the city in half, she realised. The sellswords had breached the outer harbour, the main docks, and they rushed to the centre of the city; the New Castle, the Sept of Snows, and the bulk of the city was on the west side, while the inner harbour, the shipyards, and the Wolf’s Den were on the east. If the sellswords controlled the Castle Stair and the central plaza, then they could choke any defence trying to muster against them.

Jorah pulled himself off her, staggering forward with a visible wince of pain. The arrow was still embedded in his arm, but he didn’t remove it. A barbed arrow, Sansa realised. He would maim himself even more trying to remove it.

Still, he didn’t lower his sword, not for a second. Sansa was dazed in the moment, watching so many men either rushing with purpose or running mad with panic.

“Any able man, get to the bloody gates! Block the road!” Ser Bartimus bellowed. “We’ve another two ships coming in towards us! All women, children, get to the Wolf’s Den!”

They were pushing around her, shoving and trampling. A man-at-arms made to move drag Sansa away, but Jorah stopped them. Sansa was left clinging to the knight’s side. “My daughter, Beth,” Jorah snapped quickly. “She knows how to shoot a bow. She can help.”

Sansa stared speechless. For a second, the old knight looked like he might have objected to a woman fighting, but then he thought better of it. It was too dire, he need every able body he could get. “Get the bloody lady a bow!” Ser Bartimus snapped. “All bowmen, get to the walls!”

The walls? A bow…?

The rush of bodies almost pushed her away, but Sansa clung to Jorah like a rock. She stared at the man in horror, stuttering. “The Wolf’s Den is a cave, it has no escape route,” he muttered lowly in answer. “If they break through, you would be trapped there. The bowmen, though, are always kept in the safest place in a battle.”

“I don’t know how to fire a bow!” Sansa shrieked. She didn’t mean for her voice to be so high-pitched, but she was breathing so hard, her heart was jumping so fast, she couldn’t stop it.

“Doesn’t matter. It’s simple enough,” Jorah hissed, his eyes commanding her to quiet. “Just take a bow, and get to the quietest corner of the walls you can find. Whichever side they attack us from, you run in the opposite.”

He expects them to lose, she realised. He wants me to have an escape route when they do. “I…”

People were shouting all around her, calling for arms. Her hands clung to the knight’s shoulder. “Go, Beth,” he roared above the clamour, with a firm shove towards the tower. “Go!”

She could have stumbled. A man-at-arms slammed a flimsy willow shortbow into her hands and pushed her forward, in through the gatehouse and up the stone spiral staircase. Sansa stared at the wooden thing like it was foreign object. I’ve never fired a bow before. Her mother would never have allowed it.

Sansa wasn’t a lady here; she was just a scared young girl, smeared with sweat and mud, shivering in the cool and bloody air. Nobody even gave her a second glance. Panic is the worst enemy, she thought vaguely. I cannot be a mindless body in the herd here; I must keep my wits to survive. I am not Lady Sansa Stark today.

She smelled smoke. She was nearly knocked down, as two men heaved a huge pot of boiling, bubbling oil up the staircase, so frantically the pot splashed.

Her heart was beating so fast the pounding of her own blood was deafening. People were shouting things, but she couldn’t even make them out. Each step up the stone wall felt bone-shuddering. Her first sight from atop the walls, and she could see nothing but smoke and chaos.

She heard the cries, the screams, the wails, echoing from below. She heard the creaking as the old wooden gates were heaved shut. Sounds of scuffles, stampeding boots, bodies clashing – it was all coming closer.

She tried to focus, she did, but it was too much. Sansa couldn’t even make anything out in the seething frenzy.

Around her, men were already firing shafts, bow strings snapping. Pots of wooden arrows were dropped around the battlements, every man rushing to grab them. “Fire!” somebody was crying. “Notch! Ready! Loose! Notch! Ready! Loose!”

She fumbled with the bow feebly, but her fingers couldn’t even find a grip on the string. Then, objects clattered over the stone, and something solid chimed off a man’s helm right next to her. Blood plumed, and he fell screaming with a notch carved through his helm and cracked his skull. Slingshots, she realised dumbly. The corsairs were firing slingshots, launching stones hard enough to crush bone.

Footsteps stormed beneath her. They had reached the walls, slamming their way through the guards.

“Push them back!” that was Ser Jorah’s voice. “Push them back!”

Sansa clung to her useless bow and hung back among a pile of crates, paces away from the battlements. Bodies were falling around her, stones clattering, shafts falling. The morning sea breeze brought with her the sound of screaming and the stink of smoke.

There were mobs beneath her. Mobs of soldiers, mobs of sellswords, mobs of panicked wildlings. It all mixed together in such fury that the streets were writhing and crashing together.

It felt like the boots were retreating – no, regrouping – but the clamour didn’t stop. She could see them huddling out of bow-range at the edge of the yard, she could even hear the foreign tongues as commanders ordered them to reform ranks, for archers to climb the buildings, ready for another surge.

The white city was burning. She could see fires as far off as the gates of New Castle, and the blur fighting on the Castle Stair. The harbour was a massacre – a graveyard of broken ships being washed up against bloody docks.

And yet, still, the rear ranks of the dromonds were only just reaching the shores of the city. The final ship at the very rear was a striped galley hovering at the edge of the harbour. More and more men were rushing out their hulls – their bright colours clashed against the cold and dreary morning mist of the White Knife.

Tides of refugees were filtering in from the north. The guards could barely control them. They tried to bring as many as possible into the Inner Harbour, but then the orders rang out to seal the gates. The cityfolk barrelled against them, while the soldiers shouted them to go elsewhere. They couldn’t risk enemies slipping in amongst the refugees, perhaps, or maybe the soldiers just didn’t have the manpower to protect them anymore. Citizens were left stranded, wailing, in battle-torn streets. The city was seething like a melting pot, bubbling and thrashing all around her.

The flagship of the enemy fleet had finally reached the docks. Sansa saw the shadows of men struggling to pull out wooden logs – rams – over the gangway while the echo of boots clattered over the commons.

Sansa watched it all happen from a distance, and she just felt numb. Dazed and numb, like it was all a dream.

The inner harbour had walls to split it from the rest of the city, but it wasn’t a fort, not truly. The shipyards were never built to withstand siege. As soon as they breached the wharves, the defenders were left at a disadvantage – the only true way to protect a city from naval assault was to hold the ships in the harbour, to prevent the battle from spreading into the streets, but those dromonds had proven far too powerful for that.

Even while more and more men charged through the city, she could see the catapults and stone-throwers from the ships raining destruction downwards. The charge of soldiers seethed through the streets, burning buildings, cutting through panicked mobs.

Among the sellswords flooding up the narrow-cobbled streets, she heard Westerosi voices. “Surrender now!” a loud and shrill voice called, to the beat of thumping spears. “Surrender and open the gates, or we’ll bring them down.”

There was no reply. The sellswords didn’t wait for one either. Instead, the footsteps reached fever pitch as they stampeded.

Archers were shouting for more arrows. Then she saw a pocket of swarthy figures clad in the seahorse tabard, clutching crossbows on the opposing rooftops, and then she heard the pang of a score of crossbow bolts fired as one. Organised crossbowmen moved in formation, reloading and firing with perfect synchronicity and shredding through the archers. A dozen men fell from the battlements, raining down onto the streets, screaming right up until the thudded against the stones.

The sellswords pushed forward in organised ranks, spears and shields paired together – one rank covering the other as rams were relayed to the front. These were men that did this for a living; sellswords that just wanted to do the job and get paid. Their ranks were filled with experienced and hardened soldiers. The leftover Manderly garrison and its sloppy defence couldn’t even compare to them.

Jorah knew it. He knew that the garrison wasn’t going to last.

Sansa did what she was told – she fell backwards and found a place to hide. She ducked and scrambled for cover against the battlements, all the while steel-tipped bolts scattered overhead.

There was a corner on the walls, near a stout guard tower, and she curled up as far back as she possibly could. There was no order, no discipline left.

So many deaths, and she just felt numb to it. She had never even imagined what this moment would truly be like. She could never have comprehended it. Somehow, Ser Jorah and only a few experienced soldiers managed to make sense of it, to stay focused, but for all the rest the panic and chaos was suffocating.

She kept on crouching, eyes skittering as she tried to search for something to focus on, something to make sense of. From the walls, she could see a flag fluttering over the largest dromond on the water – black and red and fluttering in the wind. Even despite the colours, Sansa recognised the sigil; the seahorse of Horse Velaryon, but it had inverted colours. A black seahorse in red waters – the Velaryon sigil but Targaryen colours.

She couldn’t understand it. House Velaryon declared for Stannis. But didn’t they change fealty after the Blackwater? That means…

Those dromonds must be of the Royal Fleet, Sansa thought suddenly. Some of the galleys looked like they were of the Redwyne fleet too. There were many more ragtag sellsail vessels or reclaimed merchant ships among them, and they didn’t bear the colours Sansa would have expected, but the bulk of the fleet must have come from King’s Landing.

That means Cersei. She did this. Cersei wants to scorch White Harbour off the map. Maybe the royal army was too depleted, so she hired sellswords by the thousands to do it. It must have been extraordinarily expensive, but she paid it.

She heard the boom of the rams slamming against the gates, and the sound of straining wood. There was another bellow demanding surrender, but none answered it.

Across the commons, there sellswords chasing down to grab figures fleeing their houses, or barricading streets to herd the crowds of stampeding cityfolk. Others were marching lines of wailing captures backwards to docks at spearpoint, or dragging women into dark corners. Their shrill screams carried even over the cacophony of battle, and sent tremors down Sansa’s spine.

They are going for the civilians, Sansa realised. The sellswords were deliberately targeting the cityfolk. Of course, it made sense – they wanted hostages, just as many hostages as possible. They would burn the city and capture prisoners.

The dragon. If this is part of an organised assault to outmanoeuvre the dragon, then attacking fast and taking captives is the only way to win.

Sansa stared up at the sky, and wondered if she would see wings. If there was ever an ideal time the dragon could appear to save the city, then that window was closing. She looked upwards, and no help came.

She heard the bone-crunching crack as the gates snapped, the desperate cries as men tried to hold them. The defenders would be poking spears through the gaps of the splintering wood, just trying to force the assailants backwards. It sounded like the gates had been torn off their hinges, but the men were still trying to hold them up.

Sansa’s heart could have stopped. All around her, she saw bowmen falling to arrows, or breaking ranks completely. Sansa took shelter at the back of the walkway, but she could still feel shafts scattering around her.

Whichever side they attack from, move in the opposite, Ser Jorah had told her. She repeated the instructions to herself, over and over in her head. But right there, in the moment, it was hard to see anything that wasn’t battle.

Then, she heard the clunk of metal against stone. The sound of metal hooks clanging against the gatehouse’s battlements. Grapnels, she realised suddenly. Hooks were being flung upwards – some as crude as ropes tied around axes. They were climbing over the walls, right towards her.

Men tried to unhook the ropes, but there were too many of them. The walls weren’t high enough and there weren’t enough defenders. Sansa knew she needed to run, but the arrows… so many shafts scattering through the air, even a single one might pierce her skull as soon as she raised her head.

She saw the first figure climbing over the battlements, clutching a rapier in one hand and the rope in the other. The man was straining for leverage against the stone, with a knife in his teeth.

The gates were breaking, the walls falling… Sansa was left paralysed, gasping for air.

“Beth!” the cry came from below. “Beth!”

That was the signal. Run. She knew she had to. She had to crawl away over the walkway, but she risked a glimpse down below into the yard. Her eyes couldn’t recognise anyone through the flailing bodies, but she looked for her knight in the chaos. “JORAH!” Sansa screamed, her voice breaking. “JORAH!”

“Beth!” the cry came again, moving away from the fighting too, and Sansa turned towards his direction. The stairwell. Get off the walls, get to safety. Find a place to hide. Maybe I can slip towards the docks, swim down the shore…?

Sansa turned and ran. South, away from the gates. Away from the Wolf’s Den and towards the jetty between the two docks. She turned and ran over the walls. Her dress was so shredded it barely stopped her feet.

She saw the streets collapsing into chaos. It looked like a mob – a riot – flushing through the streets and rumbling towards the city centre. Manderly guards, against wildlings, against corsairs.

She glimpsed Ser Bartimus, the old one-legged knight stumbling as he tried to swing a sword, only to be hacked apart by the men pouring through the broken gate. The Castle Stair is lost.

“Jorah!” Sansa shouted as she ran, and she was replied to with a cry of, “Beth!”

Sansa caught sight of him. A tall figure in bloody wool and sealskin, shambling through the muddy backstreets. Ser Jorah stood head and shoulders over the figures fleeing around him, using his bastard’s sword like a walking stick. Their eyes met. He was running towards her. Where are the nearest stairs? I need to get off the walls…

“Jorah Mormont!” a voice called suddenly, splitting the air. “Ser Jorah bloody Mormont!”

Even in the chaos, Sansa froze at the sound of the voice. She turned, just as a figure cut down two green cloaks at once, shoving their bodies out of the way to push forward.

She saw a short and stout man in grey dour armour, crouching behind a shield to ram a bloody path through Manderly men. There were sellswords around him, but he turned towards the direction of her cry. Following the sound of my voice, Sansa realised. Even amongst all of the other screams and shouts, the man focused and followed the name ‘Jorah’.
“Jorah Mormont!” the man bellowed again, sounding the name like a war cry. “You here, Jorah Mormont?”

Ser Lothor Brune, the knight of Brownhollow, was covered in blood. She recognised his squashed nose and square jaw even underneath the iron helm. His heavy plate armour wasn’t shining or polished, but it was hard and worn. Not a strong or gallant figure charging through battle like the knights Sansa used to dream of, but he was sharp, lean and hardened.

The sight of him even in the battle, this battle, caused Sansa’s heart to shudder. If he’s here…

The tide of sellswords pushed down the road towards the Wolf’s Den, but Ser Lothor shoved his way free of it. “Ser Jorah Mormont!” Ser Lothor called, striding towards Jorah with his sword and shield raised. “I bloody knew it!”

Lothor Apple-Eater, she thought in a daze. During the Battle of the Blackwater, Ser Lothor was said to have cut a bloody path through Fossoway men-at-arms, to capture the Fossoway heir and kill his brothers. Sansa heard the tale, but never really understood it; at the Vale, Lothor had been quiet, polite, respectful and even gentle.

Sansa had danced with Ser Lothor at the start of the tourney, and she had giggled with how he fancied and smiled towards Mya Stone. An honest face, Sansa had thought of him when they first met, what felt like so long ago, and later it had always struck her as queer how such a stoic and unassuming man could earn a knighthood by such rumoured brutality.

That was before she saw him in battle. Now – Lothor Brune’s sword was bloody and he walked over the corpses, and it was like seeing the man in his natural element for the first time. Where other men would walk through a battlefield, he strode. A short, grey-haired, middle-aged man, but he moved through the battle as if he lived for it.

Jorah fumbled, gasping for breath. In the moment, Jorah gaped towards Lothor, and his eyes flickered back at Sansa. Ser Lothor followed his gaze, turning to stare at the muddy, dishevelled woman watching from the walls.

Their eyes met, and everything froze. Sansa saw the flicker of surprise pass over the knight’s face. He came expecting to see Jorah on the battlefield, but he wasn’t expecting to see me.

But if Ser Lothor is here, then that means…

There was that moment where everything seemed to click. Ser Lothor looked between Sansa and Jorah, evaluating it the situation. “Lady Alayne,” Ser Lothor’s voice turned polite, like the respectful, quiet man she had once known. “I’m here to take you home.”

Sansa’s heart could have stopped.

“Beth!” Jorah roared, raising his sword with all the strength he had left. “Run!”

She did. She turned and ran, even as Ser Lothor flourished his blade, racing to meet Jorah’s in the middle of the road.

“Alayne!” Lothor shouted at her, his voice broken by the clash of steel. “Come to me, I can keep you safe!”

Their blades rang out. Jorah charged, and Ser Lothor fell back. “Alayne!” he called again, crouching behind his shield. Clash. “Your father has been missing you so!”
Sansa didn’t stop. She just ran, faster than she ever thought she could. Faster than she ever thought she would have to.

Ser Lothor cursed, while Jorah roared bloody fury and tried to overwhelm him. Both hands were on his blade, staggering and screaming with every swing. Sansa could only watch through strained glimpses behind her. The first blow Ser Lothor deflected on his shield, and then the second and third he sidestepped. His footwork was faster, and Jorah had to swing wide to keep up.

The moment Ser Lothor counterattacked, his lunge very nearly sliced through Jorah’s chest. Jorah stumbled, barely able to swipe upwards before Lothor’s second lunge parted his head.

Ser Lothor was the better fighter. It was obvious from the very first strike.

Jorah’s sword was twice the size of Ser Lothor’s, and he swung it like a club. Flailing like a bear – strong, big and desperate. But Ser Lothor crouched behind his shield, dodging as often as he blocked, with a fine and tireless footwork. The man moved calmly and with experience, yet striking with startling speed, methodically stepping and sidestepping into flanking strikes. Strike after strike, clash after clash, Jorah was being forced backwards, blood trailing at his heels.

The great bear of a knight panted with every clash, the exhaustion deeply set in his hard features, but he swung with all the might he had left. Even in his prime, Sansa didn’t think Jorah could have matched the Apple-Eater. The only thing keeping Jorah alive now was pure desperation. Ser Lothor took the strikes on his shield, and then pushed him backwards. The sword in Ser Lothor’s hand was singing, while Jorah was left staggering trying to keep up, grunting and sweating.

Ten strikes and a dozen heartbeats and it was over. The fighters broke away from each other, distracted by the bodies swelling behind them. Jorah took one look at all the men rushing towards Ser Lothor’s side, and he turned around. Jorah was shambling down the road, running west along the walls. He was gasping – heavy, heaving pants – as his footsteps stomped over the cobbles.

Even as Sansa ran, even as the battle flooded the shipyards, she heard Ser Lothor bellow. “After him! After her!” the knight ordered, motioning to the sellswords behind him. “The dark-haired girl on the walls, catch her, bring her to me! Do not hurt her, not a hair, just catch her!” He then repeated the orders in Tyroshi, and over a dozen men rushed to his side.

Of course he is, a small voice in the back of her mind replied. Ser Lothor is exactly the sort of man that Littlefinger would send to reclaim back his property.

White Harbour was in shambles. This assault had been ruthlessly effective, well-planned, and well-financed, and suddenly everything clicked into place. Cersei wouldn’t have been able to do something like this. This is all Littlefinger.

I’m here to take you home, Lothor had said.

Even as her feet clattered along the stone walkway, her mind raced trying to piece it all together.

He used sellswords. Of course, Littlefinger wouldn’t have the influence to commit the knights of the Vale for such an assault, so he’d called upon sellswords and sellsails from the Free Cities instead. They were expensive, even more with them so far from their usual climes, but Littlefinger could afford it. More importantly, sellswords were both expendable and deniable.
Footsteps behind her. Ser Jorah was running too, trying to reach her, with Ser Lothor not far behind. There was fighting all around her, battles raging in the street. Women with spears and white stones, men in green cloaks, battling the sellswords and corsairs. A beast in every man.

White Harbour was in flames. This is what Littlefinger is. Hundreds, thousands dead, just to get at her.

How did Littlefinger know I'd be here? No, he didn’t need to know; he only needed to suspect. White Harbour was a likely target to where she might run, and in any case was now her brother’s seat of power, and so he’d moved to wipe it off the map. Maybe he hoped to flush her out, or to cut off a kidnapper’s options. Maybe he suspected that Ser Jorah had been working with the Manderlys, or maybe he just didn’t want to take the chance.

I should have known that Littlefinger would never stop until he got me.

And even if he hadn’t gotten her, in this assault, he’d still strike the King-beyond-the-Wall’s cause a blow; maybe even a mortal blow, by the mere act of sacking the city. Even in failure, Littlefinger would find success.

The blisters on her feet burst, but Sansa didn’t stop running. The pain was everywhere. Ladies shoes weren’t made for running. Why aren’t they made for running?

“Alayne!” Ser Lothor shouted after her. “Stop, please, stop! I promise, I can help you!”

No. You will only help Littlefinger.

The wall turned around, stretching towards a gatehouse across from wharves. Fighting was everywhere, but Ser Lothor abandoned the battle to chase her. Behind her, Sansa could see the White Harbour shipyards, where the half-constructed skeletal husk of a galley stood out of the water. The wharves were in the distance – the docks burning with great billows of smoke.

All of the ships were finally docked at the coast. There was only one vessel still on the water – a Lyseni ship with a striped, painted hull – that lingered in the harbour while the rest were storming the city. Sansa heard cries coming from the docks, but she couldn’t focus on them. She couldn’t focus on anything, it all blurred.

Feet behind her. Clattering of boots, running up the stone stairs. They were behind her – she could hear the grunts and frenzied swings. Jorah almost fell to his hands as he stumbled up the steps, flailing his sword to push back the men chasing her. There were a dozen of them, with Ser Lothor at the very front, and Jorah could only flail as he tried to hold them back at the staircase.

The staircase. The wall. Sansa realised too late – the walkway came to an end as it curved around to another set of gates. There was nowhere else to run, not over the iron-spiked edge of the wooden gates. I should have run down the stairs, Sansa cursed. Maybe I could have lost them in the shipyards, but there’s nowhere to hide or run atop the wall…

She turned, yet Ser Lothor and his men were already pushing through up the stairs. Even when fighting from the high ground and using the steps to channel, Jorah couldn’t hold them back. They were there, blocking anywhere she could go.

Can I jump down? Could I climb the wall, just find some way to get to the ground? No, it was too high and the walls were too smooth. The thirty-foot drop onto hard cobbles would surely kill her…

Ser Jorah could finally run no more. The knight looked ready to keel over in exhaustion, but even as he gasped and staggered, he turned and he swung his sword. The soldiers easily avoided the swing, and one of them stepped forward to bring the flat of his blade against Jorah’s leg.

Jorah collapsed to his knee. He was a bloody wreck, beaten, bruised and weak. His size was the only thing keeping the men back— even bent and bowed, he swung his huge sword like a man possessed, defiant to the very last. Even as they surrounded him, even as he was on his knees.

“I knew you were a bloody traitor, Mormont,” Ser Lothor said darkly. “Lord Baelish welcomed you under his roof, gave you his hospitality, you repaid him with treachery!”

The knight didn’t reply. A guttural noise spat from his throat as he rose once more, bracing his weight against the blade’s pommel as he forced himself back to his feet.

For a second, it looked like Jorah was praying as he fought for his life.

A Lyseni sellsword stepped into the fray, his blade flashing as he swung. Jorah batted the scimitar aside with a gloved hand and crashed the pommel of his huge sword down the corsair’s skull. The pirate cried out, shrieking, the orbits of one his eyes shattered, pale gelatinous fluid mixed with red leaking from behind clenched fingers. Jorah trembled, retching in exhaustion. The other sellsword hesitated uneasily, but then, Ser Lothor stepped forward in bounding strides, one, two, three, and slammed his shield forward like a battering ram into Jorah’s two-handed guard.

She didn’t see what collided, but she heard the distinctive crack of bone. Sansa screamed, but her throat could hardly form the word. She felt like she was shaking. “Ser Jorah…”

Jorah was half on the ground, blood dribbling from his beard. He took one gasp for breath and pulled himself up, clutching his sword with both trembling hands. It was as though he could scarcely lift it. Ser Lothor stepped forward to meet him. “You are a traitor, ser.” Ser Lothor muttered, levelling his sword. “And this is the only reward you have ever deserved.”

“For my queen.” Jorah’s voice was so low Sansa barely heard it. “For my queen.”

Jorah lunged at the knight with a great upwards slash, face twisted, eyes bloodshot. Lothor Apple-Eater easily blocked the attack on his shield, and then his sword lashed outwards.

The air turned red as the blade plunged straight through Jorah’s cheekbone, and out of the back of his skull.

“NO!” Sansa was screaming, as the great bear of a knight collapsed to the stones. “Ser Jorah, no…”

Even in death, the man’s bloody face was contorted into a snarling growl. She heard the sickening squelch, saw the squirt of gore, as Ser Lothor dragged his steel out of the man’s brains.

Jorah flopped. Even with a sword through his head, the man’s limbs spasmed and grasped.

Her lungs weren’t working. It felt like Sansa’s whole world was breaking apart. He’s… he’s dead… he’s just…

The image flashed before her eyes over and over again— watching Ser Jorah flop.

Lothor Apple-Eater turned to her, his sword still slick with blood and brains. The sellswords stood back to let the knight pass. “Lady Alayne…” he said softly. “It’s alright. It’s alright.”

She stared at him like he was a monster. A monster with soft and honest eyes. “No…!” Sansa said blankly. “No…”
“My lady…!” He stepped towards her, and she recoiled back.

“Stay away!” Sansa shrieked. “Get away! Get away!”

Defenceless. I’m defenceless. He could overwhelm me, grab me… pull me away… deliver me to his puppetmaster…

Her legs clattered, shoes knocking against the stone as she shambled backwards away from him. She felt something tear, tripping over her own tattered dress as she staggered. Her whole world was rocking, tears streaming from her eyes.

It’s Littlefinger. It’s all Littlefinger.

“My lady, the edge!” Ser Lothor cried in alarm, as Sansa tottered closer and closer towards the edge of wall. “My lady…!”

He made to grab her, but she recoiled from his touch like it was foul and shrieked. “Get away, get away!”

Her foot spun off the side of the edge, and she very nearly fell off the wall.

“No!” Ser Lothor cried, and Sansa barely managed catch herself onto the battlements before she toppled.

There was a cool sea breeze wafting from the coast. The moment was frozen still. Sansa was left hanging at the very edge of the wall, above a twenty, thirty foot drop onto cobbled stones. Her body was trembling, tears pouring from her eyes and her breath broken by frantic gasps.

Sansa turned to stare down at the drop.

Ser Lothor caught the look in her eyes. He stopped still, his face going pale.

“I won’t let him take me,” Sansa promised. “I won’t, I won’t, I won’t…”

“My lady,” Ser Lothor gasped. “Don’t do it, just… step away from the edge. Step away.”

“He won’t have me!” Sansa cried, her shrill voice turning into a shriek. “I’d rather…”

I would as well, she realised, feeling numb. I’d rather drop than let Littlefinger win.

The thought of crazed Aunt Lysa shrieking and dangling over the open Moon Door flashed before her eyes.

Ser Lothor tried to step forward, trying to calm her down. He looked scared, more scared than he had been in battle. “My lady,” he gulped. “You can’t… Lord Baelish cares about you. He only wants to protect you – he made me swear to bring you back at all costs. On my honour I will protect you.”

“He doesn’t. He wants me for himself,” she sniffled, casting another look behind her. “I won’t let have me, I won’t be part of his scheme.”

“Alayne… Sansa…” Ser Lothor pleaded, risking another step. There was about a dozen yards between them, any closer and he’d be able to catch her. Sansa shuffled backwards, so far back her heels were dangling off the precipice. “I don’t know what lies they’ve been telling you, but it’s not true. Everything he’s done has been for your own good.”
“This?” Sansa shrieked, staring wide-eyed at the sellswords behind him, and at the burning docks. “This is good?!”

“This city is in rebellion! The streets are filled with savages. They are traitors to the realm, this is war.” The sellswords were looking confused. One man stepped forward, and Ser Lothor motioned him back. “Lord Baelish offered his aid in routing them, for the good of the Seven Kingdoms.”

She could see Jorah’s corpse staring at her. “You killed them!” Sansa cried, sobbing shrilly. “You killed them all! He killed everybody – he killed my aunt, he… he killed them all!”

A sellsword called something in a tongue she couldn’t tell, but his face was uncertain. Asking for orders. Ser Lothor turned and snapped, “Get back! Leave us!” The men didn’t react, not until the knight then hissed a string of Tyroshi words. Then, the sellswords hesitated, before turning to move back down the stairs.

They stepped over Jorah’s corpse as they pushed their way back down. Sansa caught a few of the looks towards her. He thinks I’m liable to spook, she thought, and so he cleared the rest away. The sellswords were running towards the gate. And he’s ordered them to run around to try and catch me under the gates, should I fall.

I won’t let them. She could jump headfirst into the ground. Sansa met Lothor’s gaze and she could feel nothing but a crazed desperation.

“It’s alright,” the knight soothed. “Look, it’s alright… It’s just us.” In an idle motion, Ser Lothor dropped his sword and slung his shield off, both clattering to the stone. He opened his arms wide, unarmed, but there was still blood splattered over his armour. “Nobody is going to hurt you, Alayne. I promise it. I swear it on my life, my family and my honour. We’re here to protect you, that’s all…”

She didn’t twitch. Ser Lothor held himself low, with a bent back, moving in small steps to make himself seem less threatening. Approaching her like she was unnerved animal, like a spooked bird that could fly off. All around him, all across the city, there were screams.

“I protected you once, remember?” he said softly. “At the Fingers, the singer – Marillion – he was drunk and would have forced you, overpowered you, but I stopped him. I saved you. That was the only thing my lord ever commanded of me – to protect you. I saved you then, let me save you now.”

She didn’t twitch. “Maybe you’re unhappy about what happened to your aunt, or what Lord Baelish did to the singer.” Ser Lothor said, taking another careful step. Sansa’s eyes were fixed on his feet, measuring the distance. “But that singer was a bad man, and Lysa would have thrown you from the Moon Door. Lord Baelish just wanted to protect you. He saved you from King’s Landing, from Joffrey and from Cersei. I don’t know what lies they told you to get you to go with them, but that’s all they were – lies. Lies to steal you from the man who sheltered you, who rescued you.”

There were not many steps left. A few more feet and he could grab her. She would have to move soon, or she would lose her chance. Sansa’s body was so tense it was trembling.

“Lord Baelish isn’t angry with you. He’s worried,” Ser Lothor said. One more step. “He’s been searching the whole realm and beyond. I didn’t know you’d be here, but Lord Baelish warned me there was a chance, and I…”

His throat seemed jam, as he gulped. She could see the sweat dribbling from his brow. Sansa pulled her gaze to meet his. He had honest eyes. “Think of your friends,” Ser Lothor pleaded.
“Think of Randa. Sweetrobin. Mya. Think of all those who love you, who are missing you so.”

Believe me, I am.

She couldn’t feel her heart beating. She felt too numb. After a long moment of tense hesitation, she pulled away from the edge. She heard Ser Lothor’s deep sigh of relief. “Come to me,” the knight promised softly. “I can bring you home.”

Ser Lothor’s arms were wide, as if to hug her. Sansa stood still, shaking, as he wrapped his arms around her shoulders in a soft, comforting embrace.

His armour jangled around her. She felt the blood smeared on his breastplate.

Ser Lothor didn’t even notice the Valyrian steel dagger hidden in her grip as he moved in to hug her. The blade had been in her hands the whole time, hidden from view as she cowered, and as soon as Ser Lothor held her it was in her hands again. She held it tight, bringing the blade down against the nape of his neck as she returned the hug.

Blood splattered beneath the sharp edge. The knight convulsed so tightly he could have crushed her.

She felt that gasp – a gasp of pain, shock and horror – as Sansa pulled the blade in and twisted it against bone. The blow was awkward, unsteady, but the blade’s sharpness, her desperation – drove it home. Like coring an apple, she thought, hysterical – and the thought was so jarring so could have laughed.

His heavy body fell onto her, she nearly toppled before she managed to push it backwards. It clattered, flopping against the stones. Sansa was left standing there, bloody with streaks of tears down her face, clutching the dagger with horror. It was like they were someone else’s hands.

Then, before anyone even managed to react, Sansa turned and she ran.

The Leech Lord

He watched the battle from the hills, using a Myrish spyglass to try and find the answers through the snows. Roose had his squires boil up a skin of thick brew, which he sipped to warm himself as he watched it all unfold.

In the valley below, by the lake, raged the storm of steel.

Roose always enjoyed the moonlight. He found that he was so often bored and dreary during the day, but at night everything seemed to come alive. It offered a rare clarity, a perspective, a solace that he found… comforting. He stood as still as statue, staring down through the darkness, before turning around to the pale faces surrounding him.

“Send a runner to Lord Ryswell,” Lord Bolton quietly ordered to his serjeant. “Begin the western charge.”

The mounted man nodded, and quickly turned and cantered off through the drifts. Roose only had eighteen men with him on the hills as a personal guard, all trusted Bolton men-at-arms. There had hardly been a point, to bring any more than that. Roose didn’t consider himself a wasteful man.
Besides, every last soldier was needed for the assault.

His guard were all mounted, but the frenzied snows were swiftly reducing horses, even the sturdier northern breeds, to barely a step above useless. Our cavalry will be hindered in this weather, Roose thought with mild annoyance. He was making a mental list of everything that could go wrong, and trying to think of how to compensate for it.

“I cannot see a flare!” one of his serjeants called, bellowing to be heard over the wind even half a dozen feet away. “Ser Aenys was supposed to light a flare!”

Lord Bolton didn’t reply, or react. One of the more likely points of failure. The signal flare could be all too easily missed in these inclement conditions, or, even more likely, it had simply failed to fly. Perhaps they hadn’t even tried, perhaps they’d been slain, perhaps they’d panicked at the key moment and failed in their task.

Either way, regardless, he had to proceed without the signal. There was no practical option, save to attack. This ambush had been far too long in the making. Every resource, every soldier, every sword – everything that could be wagered, had been wagered. There could be no retreat.

The armies had ridden out from Winterfell before the break of dusk, their force a touch over ten thousand strong. The Bolton army had been readied for a night-time march at breakneck speeds, as Lord Rodrik Ryswell led the centre, Ser Aenys Frey led the right, and Ser Walder Rivers led the van. Roose claimed to be commanding the reserves, but in truth, he delegated that duty to Arnolf Karstark while Roose moved out of the way just so he could watch from an isolated area.

If – despite all his efforts – the dragon was still active, then Roose really didn’t want his person to be anywhere near the bulk of his men.

Roose allowed himself a small smile as the initial charge proceeded perfectly. True to his word, the wildlings had no warning. The commander of the enemies’ outriders, Robett Glover, had quite helpfully ensured that all of their scouts would be blind to the Bolton’s approach.

He could barely make out the assault through the dark and snowy night, but he knew it would be starting. He had rehearsed it all in his head.

The wind was vicious, even through his black ringmail lined with wool. Unlike most of his past battles, his armour was unimposing. Roose had left his distinctive spotted pink cloak behind, and had selected the plainer boiled leather and ringmail of his house guard, rather than the suit of dark grey plate armour with rondels shaped like human heads, quilted with blood-red leather. Such extravagant, imposing armour had its uses to inspire fear and mark him on the battlefield, but it would have been nearly useless on a battlefield fought in the dark. Even despite the usefulness of pageantry, Roose preferred much a plainer, tasteful decorum.

Not that it really mattered. Roose himself had absolutely no intention of fighting tonight.

The riverlanders would lead the charge. The two thousand men from House Frey that had been stationed at Winterfell were eager for blood. After the destruction of the Twins, Ser Walder Rivers – the eldest bastard – had vowed revenge and gathered as many men he could rally from the ruin to ride north for Winterfell. Ser Walder Rivers had brought another one thousand-plus riverlanders – many Frey remnants, but also including Blackwood, Bracken, Mallister, Vance, and Ryger men – and Roose wanted those men at the very front of the ambush.

He stared out through the spyglass, and tried to judge what needed to be done. “The van is faltering,” Roose decided finally. “Send a runner with all haste – Ser Aenys must move south urgently to support.”

In the dark, there was little else to do but stare at the squirming mass of shadows through the Myrish glass, willing himself to make sense of the flow of battle. In this storm, it was a coin’s flip of whether or not any orders he gave would actually get through. Roose allowed himself a small tut, before taking another sip of his brew.

The night passed by, the hours churning, all the while Roose watched from the hill.

He had hoped that the weather would turn, but the snows only seemed to be growing in intensity as the night went on. His men around him were getting nervous, warning him that snows threatened to overwhelm their hosts.

Roose himself could have laughed. So much preparation, and the one thing that I couldn’t predict, he thought with a bitter, soft smile. The weather.

A lesser general would have screamed or cursed, or howled at the gods. Roose considered such acts with disdain. Instead, Lord Bolton remained completely calm and focused, as he made preparations and tried to recover from the disadvantage.

From the few details he could make out, Roose eventually decided that Walder River’s charge must have failed. A pity. The bastard of the Twins had certainly been… passionate about taking vengeance. Roose had hoped that such passion could fuel the heaviest fighting.

We had as much of an advantage as we could have ever had, Roose reminded himself. He had taken the mark of his enemy, measuring their strength and weakness, and reacted accordingly. The attack on White Harbour would be well under way by now, if his ally had come through; and thus the enemy’s organisation would be broken on two fronts. They had the advantage of surprise, of superior discipline. Roose had spent months planning, preparing for this single night. Now, all that remained was to see it through, and find out whether or not it was enough.

It had always been a gamble. Roose knew from the beginning that they were going up against far superior numbers, but he had tried to play the odds as best he could.

He could see the writhing shadows in the dark; the armies were... shifting, but the mass of men was shifting towards the wrong direction. The wildlings were gaining ground, rather than losing it. Their camp wasn’t falling to pieces like Roose had been counting on. He had wanted to settle the battle by ambush – by meeting the enemy in pitched, confused slaughter, before their numbers could be rallied. To break their organisation before attrition could come into play. If it ever came to that, then the Bolton forces would lose their edge. Precisely the possibility he’d been trying to avoid, and yet, it had happened still.

The battle still looked like a massacre, but not the type Roose had been planning.

It’s the snows, he thought sourly. The weather is hurting us just as much as it hurts them. His ambush was stalling. What should have been a well-coordinated and prepared pincer charge was slowly degrading into an incoherent mess. The snowstorm had blunted the momentum of his ambush, given the enemy more time to organise.

Still, Roose couldn’t see a dragon flying overhead, so that gave him hope. There was most certainly no option to retreat, in any case. He gave the command to commit the reserves into the fight.

Afterwards, Roose stood back, watching and waiting.

Around him, amidst the blizzard, his men had been forced to slaughter two horses, to put the beasts out of their panic. Their horses had been bred from a long, long line of Bolton horseflesh, with an eye for hardiness and reliability. No mere weather, save the deepest winter or thunderstorm, would scare them so. Still, there something was in the air, something that Roose liked little, and the horses liked still less.

Perhaps an hour later, and they received a frantic runner from Lord Ryswell. The courier was a seasoned northmen, but he was gasping, pale and shivering. In the frigid wind, Roose noted the stink of piss. “Giants, m’lord!” the man wheezed. “Giants have taken to the field!”

Ah, I had been musing over those inhuman figures, he thought, staring through his glass into the battle’s heart. Giants, indeed. The view was so dark, so obscured he hadn’t been certain on what the shadows were. All he could see was that where they went, the field parted before them. In a flash of morbid curiosity, Roose wondered how many of the giants there were, or if it would be possible to see them up close.

Roose had anticipated that they would likely have to fight a number of such beasts, and still irked him that he hadn’t managed to come up with a way of combating such monsters. There were limits to what spies could accomplish, and in the open field only mounted cavalry with lances of the longest stripe seemed like they would be effective, and only in overwhelming numbers at that. By all reports, the giants possessed a constitution, a natural resistance that shrugged off most weapons and arrows. Perhaps scorpions… but no, that never could have been a possibility, never in a battle of this kind.

His officers were squabbling, but Roose barely heard them. He was too busy thinking, deliberating. Ramsay is surely dead by now, Roose decided, and he surprised himself by feeling a twinge of sadness towards his bastard son.

All around him, the men were having difficulty controlling their horses. The beasts were nickering, neighing, even screaming where discipline fell lax. Even the horses were going mad, turning useless. Why? Roose wondered with narrowed eyes. These snows were extreme, but he had seen the stallions of the Bolton bloodlines endure past winters with little complaint. What is scaring them, so?

Regardless, fleeing men wouldn’t make it far in snows like these, not afoot. Roose paused, pondering over his options. The weather continued to turn for the worse, the snows becoming so heavy that they could swallow them. The night was pitch black, with winds howling over the hill that could bowl a man over.

The battle was breaking out of the camp, rumbling through the hills. By Roose’s reckoning, his ambush had been fairly successful, all things considered. He expected there would be mass casualties to testify to that.

Still, he thought with a sigh, it seems it simply comes down to pure numbers. The ‘northern coalition’ was large enough that they could suffer mass casualties, and still have enough men to match them in the storm.

He saw the shape of men break – the Bolton reserves were being crushed under the force of the giants, their once-disciplined formations degenerating into a crazed, vulnerable incoherence. The fighting was breaking out over the hills, but Roose expected it would be more a slaughter than a fight by now. A fight without discipline. Men cut down in the snow.

“We must retreat!” one of Roose’s serjeants was screaming at him. “Retreat! We must run!”

Lord Bolton paused, considering it. “Why?” he said finally. He still didn’t raise his voice, his tone was as calm, as soft as ever. “We will not escape, not in this weather.”

In other circumstances, Roose would have agreed with the serjeant—now was indeed a good time to run. But even northern horses would be trapped in these snows, if they were fit to ride at all, and Roose had no interest in dying while blindly and futilely trying to sprint away in the dark.

There was no emotion. He had bled himself of emotion a long time ago.

They were coming closer. He saw immense figures—taller and broader than any man—tearing through the collapsing ranks. He heard their roars, as loud as thunder. He saw wildlings storming the hills with axes. It seemed that, as the weather turned worsened even further, the wildlings retook more of a relative advantage. The blizzard hobbled the wildlings, but not so much as it did his own men. The cavalry had been far less useful than anticipated.

Half of his guard had already broken ranks and scattered, but it didn’t seem like there was any point in trying to recover them. Let them run. Roose could already see wildling raiders with axes and spears, mercilessly hacking down fleeing figures in the snows.

No, he decided, I always knew that there would be no retreat here.

It was the risk he had decided to take, months before. To fight, rather than flee from this King-Beyond-the-Wall. A gamble. And sometimes, the coin just doesn’t go your way. Roose could accept that. The garrison he had left behind at Winterfell had been prepared for this eventuality, as bitter as it was.

He had never enjoyed gambling.

In any case, he thought with a sigh, there is only one thing left for me to do. Roose drew his sword, and then idly let it fall away from him. It sank into the snow.

He calmly knelt down into the drifts. He raised his hands above his head, gloved palms open, unarmed, and waited until the savages came for him. There were half a dozen brutes in furs, the blood rage shining in their eyes as they stomped through the darkness.

“I surrender,” Lord Bolton said meekly.

Theon Greyjoy, Heir of the Iron Islands, Turncloak, Kinslayer, Ghost, Prince of Winterfell, Prince of Fools, Prince of Stink…

They were dragging her. He saw them yank her by the heels and drag her through the corridor, even as the girl clawed and scratched, trying to find a grip against the stone floors. Reek watched it happen, and he just froze like a scarecrow. Twitching. Like a useless, pathetic scarecrow.

“No! No!” she wailed. “No, don’t, I—I’m Arya Stark! I swear, I’m Arya Stark!”

She used to be pretty, Reek thought dumbly. She had dark mousy hair and sweet brown eyes. She had been pretty, once. Not beautiful, but cute, full of life and giggles, and so very pretty. But being trapped in this cursed place had left her body a wreck, her face a ruin—her eyes red with tears, her jaw jarred and bruised and an ugly gash across her brow. Every time she screamed, he saw a mouth of broken or missing teeth.

Ramsay’s doing, Reek knew. The Lord of Winterfell had spent only a short time with his wife, but he had been sure to leave his mark. He had broken her jaw and pulled out her teeth when she tried to bite him. And he forced Reek to watch.

Arya clawed so furiously that her fingernails snapped against the rough stone, leaving a bloody trail from her hands, but the men didn’t care. It wasn’t Ramsay’s men dragging her now – it was Rorg the Queer, Red Lucy, Halvert and Dirt Dalton. Big, ugly men – Roose’s men-at-arms. The four of them had barged through the tower at the break of dawn and dragged the Lady of Winterfell away.
Reek was left quivering at the end of the corridor, staring with wild, fearful eyes.

They were dragging her towards him. Arya was screaming, convulsing. Rorg had his hand on his sword… “Move out of the way, Reek,” Halvert spat.

Reek stared. He saw her bloodshot eyes staring at him, begging him…

Then, with a gulp, he stepped out of their way and he let them pass.

They were dragging her up to the West Tower – back to Arya’s own bedchambers. They had been sheltering in the Great Keep when the men came for her. She was screeching, sobbing, wailing.
She pleaded for mercy, she begged to know why they were doing this. None of them replied. They didn’t even look at her.

He stepped after them, and then flinched as the winds broke through the shuttered windows, slamming and bashing the wood against the frame. Reek could hear the sounds of screaming, and of arrows flying over the gates. Down below, he saw the ant-like figures of the remaining Boltons scattering around the courtyard – they all would have fled, if there had been anywhere to run.

The savages were at the gates, and slamming against them as madly as the wind.

Winterfell was falling, and the world was falling with it.

He could see it all going mad. He could feel all semblance of order collapsing. The feeble Bolton garrison was confused, helpless, being overwhelmed. It was morn, but there was no sunlight to be seen through the grey thick clouds. The towers of Winterfell were trembling against the winds.

He heard the clattering of the bell, so loud and frantic it was like a drumbeat. Reek couldn’t tell if there was actually anybody ringing it from the Bell Tower, or if the bell was just chiming madly with the wind.

Reek stood on the upper floors of the Great Keep, watching the castle – the castle he once called home, the castle he had conquered, the castle he had been imprisoned in – dissolve around him.
Technically, Lord Harwood Stout had been left as castellan of Winterfell in Lord Bolton’s absence, but he was an old and tired one-armed man. Everyone knew that Lady Barbrey Dustin truly had command. Reek had crept past her, earlier in the morn, shrieking commands, trying to order the remaining scrapings of men-at-arms into something resembling a formation.

Lord Bolton had taken nearly every fighting man Winterfell had with him on his march. The castle had been filled to bursting the day before, reinforced by the men of the lesser houses garrisoned in the winter town. The army of Boltons, Freys, Ryswells, Dustins and a dozen other northern houses left the castle before dusk the previous night, nearly ten thousand strong, and they hadn’t returned.
The garrison left behind was a skeleton crew, barely fit to maintain the castle; mostly women, children, or the old and infirm.

_The outer walls have already fallen_, Reek realised. Along with most of their army.
Lord Bolton had gambled everything on his night-time ambush. There had been no preparation, no men to spare, for a defence should the attack fail.

A boulder barreled through the sky, collapsing straight into the stables. How could they have siege weapons? Reek stared and stared at the immense shadows, and then he realised. Giants. Not siege weapons, giants. He was felt… numb, with fear. Uncomprehending. Giants. There were giants storming the gates.

They were throwing the stones, throwing them with an immense, inhuman strength. Even from here, so far away, Theon could feel the tremors in the air as huge forces collided against the outer gate again and again. Winterfell’s gates were ancient, carved of old growth oak fourteen inches thick, reinforced with iron bars and steel hinges, but even they were failing against their inhuman might.

And then a dozen giants slammed forth, pushing and heaving, roaring in effort, and the gates fell.

The ‘northern coalition’ that poured through the outer gate didn’t look like an army at all. It looked more savage than that, more like a horde. There were no ranks, no formation, there was nothing but maddened warbands. The wildlings had chased and cut down the retreating Bolton men, and then they kept storming all the way to Winterfell itself.

The booming figures of giants stood twice as tall any man, but they were not like men. They were far too broad at the hip, too thick at the leg. Like hills, hills carved of flesh and clad in furs. They were too hairy; like beasts, beasts out of legend, set loose against the Boltons.

The inner walls would fall shortly. Maybe Lady Dustin would try to hold up in the keep, but it was useless. Reek could feel it in the air, everybody knew it. Lord Bolton had lost. They were all going to die.

Is this how it ends? Reek thought numbly. The castle stormed and razed – again – and every man and woman put to the sword?

Reek could have laughed.

He could hear the wildlings below, howling savage war cries as they climbed the walls.

Reek stood there on the balcony, frozen, with the wind whipping through his white hair. His hair used to be dark, once, but then it had greyed and turned white after Ramsay reshaped him into Reek. The whispers said that Jon had white hair now, too. Any second now, the Bastard King, Jon Snow, might be bursting through the gates, riding upon dragon or wolf or whatever the rumours were saying. Jon was a wildling king, now, while Reek was… something else. Reek wondered briefly whether they would be able to recognise each other.

No, Reek thought, as he gulped. His thoughts felt blank. Theon Greyjoy is dead. That smirking, dark-haired youth was dead. Reek didn’t know what he was anymore, but he wasn’t Theon. He didn’t want to see Jon Snow again, he didn’t want Jon to see him.

I should just jump. He knew he should. His life was worthless, and all he needed to do was step off the tower and fly. Of all the ways he had been thinking about dying, a long fall and a hard landing didn’t seem so bad.

There was nothing left for him in this world. Asha was dead – the Boltons had routed her men while reclaiming Deepwood Motte, and then afterwards Ramsay had gifted Reek his sister’s tar-smeared head just to mock him. The Crow’s Eye had taken the Isles, and murdered his father. His brothers were dead. They were all dead. Theon Greyjoy was a ghost now, a dead man.

A while back, Lord Bolton had even sent a raven to the Crow’s Eye, demanding ransom for Theon, and his nuncle had replied with his own raven, asking how much it would cost for the Boltons to keep Theon instead. His nuncle didn’t even care enough to ask for him back.

One more small step, he thought. One small step, before the wildlings reach me, that’s all I need…

He raised his foot, hovering…

He heard her screaming. She was screaming, wailing for help.

Reek paused. Her cries cut through the wind – Arya was shrieking for somebody, anybody, to save her.

There were tears down Reek’s cheeks and he didn’t know why. Didn’t know why he bothered. It didn’t matter, nothing mattered. Still, before he even realised that he made a decision, he had turned and was shambling down the corridor.

The tower. Arya Stark’s bedchambers. Her screams. He could hear the rabble of voices as he loped up the stone staircase. “Chains!” a gruff voice called. “Bring the bloody chains!”

“Hurry!”

“Where’s the oil? We need more–”

“Please don’t! Please, by the Mother’s mercy, you can’t–”

“Orders from the lord, m’lady. Don’t–”

Reek burst through the doors. These chambers… the same chambers where Ramsay had defiled her, where Ramsay had played all of his wicked games… the winds sheering through the windows sounded like Ramsay’s ghostly laugh.

Everything blurred, in the moment. He glimpsed Arya on the floor, with heavy manacles around her wrists, fastening her to the bedpost. Chains fastening her to the thick support of the four-poster bed, rattling against oak. The men were fetching lamp oil…

“No!” Reek screamed. “No, you can’t!”

Bodies moved to block him. He threw himself at the nearest man – Halvert. Reek was all skin and bones, and maimed flesh. There was no muscle on him, no strength in his arms. The Bolton man staggered backwards, but it was like assailed by a feeble, old man.

Still, Reek scratched and clawed with bloody nails, trying to push his way through.

“Bloody Reek!”

“What’s he doing her–”

“Get him off me!”

Oomph. Something solid and heavy collided with his jaw. Reek staggered, but he couldn’t feel pain. He lashed out with maimed hands, all the while screaming near-nonsensically. “NO!” Reek howled. “Don’t! Get away from her! Get away!”
Strong, gauntleted hands gripped his shoulders, yanking him backwards. A Bolton man slammed their fist into Reek’s chest.

He could see Arya’s wide eyes, staring at him with horror. “Get away!” Reek protested. “You can’t, just… don’t…”

Another blow rattled his skull, his world spinning. Reek couldn’t even… wasn’t strong enough…

Her marriage bed, that same bed where she had been… all of those soft hideous velvet pillows and sheets were soaked in oil. The soldiers were piling kindling from the fireplace at the doorway. Arya was shaking the chains, trying to pull herself free, and Reek tried to push forward. Her hand was outstretched, reaching for him, and Reek just tried to hold it…

He tried to grab her. He just wanted to hold on to her.

He saw Dirt Dalton ready a matchbox, holding the flint ready to strike over a candle.

The world was drumming as fast as his heart. Reek stared at Dirt Dalton, the man’s hands fumbling slightly with the flint. “Don’t…!” Reek begged. “You can’t.”

He did. The spark flashed.

The candle hissed into life. Dirt Dalton lit another two candlesticks, before passing them around and throwing the fire onto the bed and into the pile of kindling.

The fires were crackling, fizzing and sparking for more. Growing into life. The flames were hungry like rabid dogs, blazing even despite the cold wind shaking the tower.

Flames fluttered from both corners of the room, but they were already jumping to the drapes. Then the Myrish rug over the stone floors, and then the bed.

Arya was shrieking. She was shrieking. Reek was screaming too, but he couldn’t hear any words.

It took two men to drag Reek out of the chambers – hoisting his frail body upwards and dragging him away. He flailed and scratched and squirmed but it wasn’t enough.

The Bolton men were already stomping down the staircase, moving quickly as the fires crackled to life behind them.

The sight of Arya – slender, frail and broken Arya – thrashing against the bedpost haunted Reek’s eyes.

The hissing was turning into a roar. Smoke billowing out through the doorway. They soaked the floors and stairs in lamp oil. The entire West Tower could be consumed. The door was blazing, the flames spreading down the tapestries over the snows.

The Bolton men finally released Reek. They dropped him onto the stones, like discarding a hunk of rubbish, and a heavy boot kicked into his chest. Reek could only stare upwards from the floor, mouth agape, at the flames and smoke hissing above of him.

He heard laughter. They were laughing at him, laughing at his expression. He was Reek, the court jester, and they laughed at him.

“Remember, boys,” one of the men said behind Reek. “The wildlings did this. The wildlings killed Arya Stark.”
The fire was roaring now like an animal, hissing so madly. The only thing that Reek could hear was Ramsay’s laughter.

The tower was blazing, the heat so intense that it scorched his face even from the bottom of stairs. Burning ash snowed down the keep. They had left the Lady of Winterfell to her bed, Reek thought numbly. Death by fire.

“Grab that thing,” Halvert ordered, pointing to Reek in the same way he might point at horseshit. “We got our orders.”

Reek was a trembling wreck. He was pathetic, mutilated lame excuse of a man. No – less than a man, a thing. Reek, reek, it rhymes with weak…

She was the only one in this twice-cursed castle that had ever treated him as a human. The only decent human among them. She was a better person than Reek could ever be.

They left her to burn.

The Bolton men were stepped towards him, moving to grab him. Reek was left paralysed, looking upwards at the burning, howling tower. Ash and soot flickered down the stairwell, burning sparks fluttering down into Reek’s face like painful kisses.

The whole castle was mad.

And suddenly Reek was running. Running upwards, clattering over the stairs and into smoke.

He heard the bark of laughter behind him. “Oi! Where do you think you’re going?”

Reek didn’t care. He just kept on running.

A blazing tapestry crashed off the wall, showering sparks all over the stairwell. Fires fluttered upwards, but Reek kept on running. None of the Bolton men moved to follow him – they were just laughing at him. Laughing at his desperate attempt to die by running into a burning tower.

Smoke, so much smoke – he couldn’t breathe, he couldn’t see. Everything was just black and hot, flames dancing over the stones. The walls were on fire, and the flames were spreading upwards to the ceiling. He couldn’t hear a thing; there was absolutely nothing but the howling crackle of the fires.

No, he realised suddenly. I hear her. He could hear screaming. She was screaming.

The tower shuddered and Reek almost toppled, but he clambered upwards and kept on running. He tried to push his head to the floor to escape the smoke – crawling – on his hands and knees.

The doorway. The doorway was on fire. Reek couldn’t breathe, he couldn’t think, but…

But she is screaming.

There was no decision. She was screaming, and he need to go through.

He braced himself, and barged through the blazing timbers with all the might his broken body still had.

Pain. So much pain. He felt the fire bite against flailed skin, burning tendrils whip his arms and chest, the sparks catching his rags and white hair. He was on fire – his shit-stained clothes were burning, the flames lashing his skin. His rags had been soiled with piss, shit and blood, and they were burning.

Reek could have screamed, but he couldn’t even breathe.

There was soot everywhere, burning ash scorching his face. He squirmed and mewed, rolling over the floor like a mewling babe, trying to strip off his clothes. The fires had engulfed the entire chamber, howling all around him. Like one of the seven hells themselves had overflowed, to consume these horrible chambers.

It felt like the fire was scouring his flesh bare.

This is the first time I’ve been free, he thought suddenly. He didn’t know where the thought came from, but it jarred his mind. The first time he had ever been away from the Boltons’ control, out of those rags. The first true decision that Reek had ever made for himself.

It hurt, it hurt so, so much, but he kept on crawling through the fire.

He saw her. The air was so hot that it was flickering, but he could see her. Arya was still chained to the bedpost, flailing and trying desperately to swat the fires away from her. She was screaming, weeping, trembling – eyes bulging so madly they might pop.

The flames snapped around them, like a pack of dogs barking hungrily. The walls, the bed, the lady’s vanity, the closet full of fine dresses, and the furniture – it was all on fire.

She reached for him desperately, hand engulfing his. Their hands were touching. It felt like the first true human contact Reek had felt in months, years. Nobody hitting him, just holding him.

Even despite his flesh screaming, he could feel her. He could feel her crying, could feel her against him. His heart was fluttering like he had never known, and then suddenly she was clinging onto him for dear life.

Frantically, he tried yanking her away, but then he felt metal jar. The chain on her other wrist rang. She was still bound to the burning bed. The mattress and sheets were on the floor, where she had tried to throw them away to shield herself.

Wide eyes wet with tears stared up at him. “Theon…” Arya gasped.

He was left naked, covered in ash, his scarred and tortured body pressed up against hers. “It’s alright,” he gasped. “I’m here.”

His head was foggy. Suffocating. Couldn’t breathe, smoke burning his lungs. The ceiling was shuddering. The fires burning away at the roof. He didn’t know which death would come first – he didn’t know if they whether they would burn, choke, or be crushed by the debris – but he knew it wouldn’t be long now.

They both turned to stare at Arya’s skinny, manacled wrist. Her skin was mutilated and blistered from where she had tried to drag herself out of it, but the Bolton men had clamped her so tight.

Hands groped at the steel links, as if he could tear it apart. He didn’t have even have enough fingers left for a proper grip. Even the metal burned, it must have been so painful for her. “I’ve got you,” Reek gasped. “I’ve got you.”

He could feel the burning bed creaking as they both tried to pull. Trying desperately to pull her
The steel was solid. The bed post was hard oak; solid and thick, it would not snap. The wood was charring, but old wood like that burnt slowly. Her body would burn before the oak did.

Every heartbeat was pure, frantic panic.

What about her arm? Reek gripped her arm, squeezing. There was no time to be gentle. The metal was too strong, the oak was too thick, but what about flesh and bone? He needed to snap the bone, or cut off the hand.

The bed was already on fire, the flames creeping closer even despite her desperate attempts to push the mattress and sheets away. I need a blade, Reek thought desperately. I need a sword, or a knife – maybe even just a poker.

There was nothing but fire. Nothing but hell.

They dragged the four-poster bed away from the walls as far as it would go, trying to hide under it as they pulled. They threw whatever they could to form a barrier against the flames. There was too much smoke, too much hot ash blazing against his face. He needed a tool, just something to give him a bit more strength.

There’s nothing sharp, he realised. They hadn’t allowed sharp objects into Arya Stark’s room, not since she had been found bloody, with a sewing needle on the floor. There were still bloody scars across her wrists, where the maester had ministered to her. He grasped her arm, braced it against the bedpost.

Could I lever it? Break the bone, drag it through? Maybe just pull it enough to snap…

She was shrieking, wailing in agony. It was her arm. Reek could have screamed, with both pain and frustration.

I need to do this, he thought desperately, pushing his weight into it. I need to… I can do this… I have to…

… I just have to be the hero…

The tower rumbled, the first supports already quivering. He looked down into her eyes, and he realised that he couldn’t. He looked at her, and he just knew.

The chains were tight. She was trapped. Their skin, their flesh, was their prison.

I can’t do it.

The flames crackled and laughed, mocking him.

“Run,” Arya gasped, tears running down her eyes. “Just run. You can still get out… go!”

Time seemed to freeze. She was on the floor, frail and innocent, bloody and maimed, the flames and ash spitting at her. She needs me, he thought. I can’t save her, but she needs me.

“No,” Reek shook his head. “I don’t want to.”

“You have to–”

“I’m not leaving you.” He knelt down by her, pressing up close.
“Please,” she wept. “Please, Theon, just ru–”

He wrapped his arms around her tightly, hugging her as tightly as he could. “My name is Reek, my lady,” he croaked as he wept. “Reek.” It rhymes with shriek.

Fire was a horrible death. It was slow, gruesome and agonising, and he would feel every moment of it. Reek had seen it before. He had seen men watching their own skin slough from their flesh, melting and dribbling like tallow, screaming and shrieking, right up until their eyes popped. Burning was like being maimed, being eaten alive by the flames. He could hardly imagine a worse way to die.

“W-w-why?” Arya stuttered.

Reek gulped. “I won’t allow let you go through it alone.”

I hadn’t been able to help her before, but he couldn’t… I need to…

There was a heartbeat of stunned silence, and then Arya hugged him back. They both cradled each, dropping to the floor in the middle of the blazing room. The ceiling was alight like a sky of burning red – spewing ash over them.

“Jeyne,” he heard Arya whisper in his ear, through desperate sobs. “My name’s Jeyne, I…”

“Jeyne,” Reek repeated. “Jeyne.”

Reek held her so tight, like he could smother her with his body and take the flames for her. His body was being scorched, but he could hardly feel it. He was on top of her, trying to shield her from the ash.

Outside, he heard the storm howl against the fire’s roar.

This was never how I wanted it. Any of it. I just wanted a family, I wanted to prove myself. I wanted to belong. He had never wanted the tarred corpses of children, or dead and bloated drowned men, or the charnel-prisons of flayed skin and blood.

He never wanted to disappoint his fathers – neither of them, Ned Stark, Balon Greyjoy – or his brothers – Robb, Rodrik, Maron, Bran and Rickon. He had wanted the north and the Iron Islands. He had wanted to be a man. They had warned him, they had given him a chance. He could have been a good man, but he…

I deserve it. I deserve Reek.

Still, then he looked down at Jeyne’s wide, beautiful eyes and, well, maybe there were worse ways to die.

They held each so close, like lovers embracing, pushed against the smoking stone. They were both crying, and Reek could taste the salt of her tears on his scorched lips.

Reek could have laughed. It was romantic, even; the Prince of Winterfell and the Lady Stark, holding each close as their castle burned.

No, not romantic. There was nothing romantic about it. Still, it was all Reek had to hold on to.

She wasn’t shaking any more, she wasn’t screaming. She was still weeping into his shoulders, but they weren’t fighting it. He didn’t want to die fighting. He wanted to find whatever peace a creature like him deserved.

“I… I don’t…” Jeyne wept, before she gulped. “The mother used to say that the Seven were kind. Gentle. That all our sins are washed away, they’d welcome you into their light.”

Reek only nodded, barely able to hear her panicked mutter into his ear. The flames licked at his toes, and Reek tried to curl up as small as possible. The red priests said that death by fire was a clean death. A pure death. He wasn’t sure where that thought came from.

The Drowned God had renounced him. It seemed urgent – he needed to find another deity quickly. The Drowned God was cruel, the Red God was harsh, and the Old Gods were silent and distant. Reek just wanted something better, something kinder. “The Mother’s mercy,” Reek croaked. “The Father’s judgement.”

“I tried to be good. I tried. The Father will judge me as good, won’t He?” she murmured desperately.

“He will,” Reek gasped. The fires were crawling closer, so hot even the stones burnt. “You are.”

“The…” Jeyne yelped in pain as ash fell from the ceiling, before she gasped, “The sisters said that fair maidens and heroes hear singing when they die.” Her frail voice nearly shattered. “… I loved singing.”

Reek’s vision blurred in blackness. His head felt delirious with agony and fear, but trying to think of a song. There was nowhere to hide, the flames were coming for them – they were burning up through the floor now. A song, Reek thought, she deserves a song.

In the moment, there was only one tune he could think, the only one that scorched and dry lips could gasp out. “… The-the Dornishman’s wife,” Reek gasped, shivering, “was as fair as the sun, and her kisses… her kisses were warmer than spring…”

Jeyne didn’t react, she only shuddered into his shoulder. Reek took a deep breath of smoke, and wheezed out, “… But the Dornishman’s blade…” A coughing fit broke his words, spluttering them out. “Dornishman’s blade… was made of black steel… and its kiss was a terrible thing.”

“The Dornishman’s wife would sing as she bathed.” Crash. The ceiling collapsed, dust and ash hissing everywhere. “… In a voice smooth and soft as a peach. But the Dornishman’s blade had a…!” The groan of timber supports beneath them, the tower wobbling… “… had a song of its own, and a bite as cold and as sharp as a leech!”

Reek didn’t even know why he was singing, why he was so desperate to force out the words out of his throat. The song was an absolutely horrible, horrible one – such an inappropriate song for the circumstances. It felt jarring, incoherent, but now, now Reek could think of nothing else to sing.

It was supposed to be a merry, bawdy chanty thing, to be sung in taverns among friends. It was supposed to celebrate life, it wasn’t meant for… for…

“But as he lay on the ground, darkness around, the taste of blood on his tongue… his brothers knelt by him and prayed him prayer…!” Reek felt the flames roll their barbed tongues over the scarred skin on his back. Like being whipped by invisible tendrils. Reek bit back a scream, strangling out the words. “… and he smiled and he laughed and he sung!”

“Brothers, oh brothers, my days here are done,” Reek choked, as Jeyne wept into his shoulder. “The Dornishman’s taken my life…”
Jeyne’s arm was clenching around him, so tight it was choking. “But what does it matter…” The fires inching closer, the pain. The pain! “But what does it matter, for all men must die…!”

They couldn’t scurry away any further. There is nowhere to hide, there never was. Reek squeezed her hand, even as he shuddered and coughed and cried, and even as the white agony began to eat – for a moment, for a single moment – he remembered what it was, to be home.

Gods, gods, gods. The fire... It was all around him, in the floor, in the walls, in the air... The fire was like a huge monster, a giant slobbering yellow monster as it opened its maw, licking at his skin and beginning to eat. “… and I’ve… and I’ve tasted… tasted th… the… ahh! Oh gods, no, no… Theon! AHH! THEON—”

The flames swallowed them.

SER WALTER RIVERS,
LORD RODRIK RYSWELL,
LORD RAMSAY SNOW.

Prelude:

The northern coalition declares an alliance with the free folk and declares rebellion against House Bolton. The coalition begins a campaign to rescue Lady Arya Stark and take Winterfell in the name of the Starks. King Jon Snow leads hosts from White Harbour and Castle Black, in a slow westerly conquest of Bolton and Bolton-allied lands. The coalition slowly approaches from the Dreadfort in the west, to allow them time to rally to more houses to their cause, to combine with forces from Glover, Mormont, Umber and northern mountain clans, and to integrate the free folk hosts with allied northmen. King Jon Snow’s ice dragon makes the coalition's armies seemingly unstoppable.

This, however, grants House Bolton plenty of time to prepare. Roose Bolton consolidates his power in Winterfell, and the northern coalition’s eager search for allies allows Bolton the opportunity to slip his own sympathizers into enemy ranks. House Bolton successfully manages to separate and harry many of their enemy forces, gradually weakening them during their march. The Battle of the Weeping Water highlights several weaknesses in the northern coalition’s armies and within their command.

Ramsay Bolton breaks away and disappears with his own force of men, loyal to him alone, to seek an advantage against Jon Snow and his dragon.

After the destruction of the Twins, reinforcements rallied in the riverlands, led by Ser Walder Rivers and the remnants of House Frey, ride north to assist House Bolton.

Battle:

The northern coalition prepares for siege against Winterfell, encamped on the plains a half-day’s march away from the castle. The winter snowstorms threaten the march, and the army is plagued by command-level personality conflicts and conflicting secondary objectives, leading to a state of uneasy tension and potential conflicts within the host of the allied coalition.

News arrives of a naval assault against White Harbour. The command is torn, uncertain about their course of action. Debate is derailed by the spread of false information by Bolton sympathisers within the allied host.

Miscommunication, false information and false orders are spread throughout the camp at night, exploiting the simmering instability within the northern coalition's forces. The Bolton forces emerge from Winterfell under cover of darkness and march quickly against the encamped host.

Robett Glover, in command of the scouts and outriders, deliberately neglects his duties. The camp is given no warning of the ambush.

False allies turn their blades within the camp, burning tents and inciting mobs. The mammoths stampede, and assassins strike. In the chaos, nobody can tell which party is responsible.

Unbeknownst, Ramsay Bolton (masquerading as the Dragonguard steward ‘Harlow’) effectively poisons Sonagon’s meals over the course of months. Ramsay’s loyal men, the Bastard’s Boys, are smuggled into the northern coalition’s numbers. Ramsay Snow poisons the Dragonguard at their posts, and spreads false information and then ambushes a wounded Jon Snow as he attempts to rally Sonagon.

The chain of command is left uncertain by King Jon Snow’s disappearance. Traitors have crept inside the command’s ranks, all the while the first wave of the Bolton ambush collides with perimeter forces. Amidst attack, tensions between northmen and free folk boil over. The Weeper – believing that Ser Wylis Manderly and his men are among the betrayers – kills the heir to White Harbour and all his knights.

Cavalry led by Ser Walder Rivers pierces the coalition's bulwark, while Roose Bolton leads from the rear. Superior discipline from the Bolton men against the camp’s disorganised state proves devastating.

The coalition's perimeter fighting lines break, all the while the high command struggles to determine leadership. The command’s indecisiveness is fostered and exploited by traitors within the ranks, until Lady Val of Whitetree proves vital in establishing a command, subsequently rallying the allied forces to counterattack. The joint efforts of Tormund Giantsbane and Lord Greatjon Umber succeed in holding the line, while Val re-musters their men.

The storm continues to grow. The snows begin to work against Lord Bolton, routing his cavalry and hindering his infantry, and spoiling his plan for a coordinated attack. The Bolton ambush flounders in the poor visibility and broken communication lines.

The arrival of the giants starts to turn the battle. The Weeper manages to break Ser Walder River’s cavalry charge.

Jon Snow and Ramsay Bolton fight on the ice amidst heavy snows, but Jon is bleeding, injured and outnumbered, and loses his connection to the near and desperately ill dragon. Ramsay captures him, and attempts to hold him hostage. After turning the tide of the battle, Val of Whitetree musters a score of raiders and turns to rescue Jon. The Bastard’s Boys are routed, Ramsay defeats Val, but Val kills Ramsay as she falls.

The Bolton ambush fails, and their men forced to fall back. Despite severe losses, and the efforts by Bolton sympathisers to spread confusion in the ranks, the northern coalition wins by pure numbers. Wildlings lead the front ranks, breaking the Bolton men in the snows.

Once his defeat becomes clear, Warden of the North and Lord Paramount Roose Bolton surrenders non-violently.

The wildling forces under The Weeper, Tormund Giantsbane, and the Lord of Bones hound the fleeing Bolton forces through the snows, chasing them down. Winterfell is left undermanned, and the castle falls easily to wildling warbands in the morning of the following day.

The fighting begins after the hour of ghosts, lasts all night, and continues until noon the next day. The storm does not subside. Extreme casualties on both sides.

In the fall of Winterfell, Arya Stark is murdered. Her tower is set alight. Other highborn hostages, including Lady Jonelle Cerwyn, Lady Berena Talhart and Lady Walda Bolton, are massacred and mutilated. The deed is blamed on blood-lusted wildling warbands.

Casualties:

- ~7,000 of House Bolton and allies.
- ~13,000 of the northern coalition.
• Lady Arya Stark.

Result:

• Pyrrhic victory for the northern coalition.
• Jon Snow takes Winterfell, regardless.
• Ice dragon is left sickly, state unknown.
• Several highborn hostages are murdered. Nobody who was capable of testifying that Arya Stark was an imposter survives the battle, with the exception of Lord Bolton. Lord Bolton does not testify, and her identity remains undiscovered.
• Extreme tensions within the northern coalition.

The Attack on White Harbour

Date: 301 AC

Place: White Harbour, the Bite

Combatants:

House Manderly:

The Defence at White Harbour:

• 26 Manderly war galleys,
  • 19 participating in the blockade, another 7 tied up in port during their rest-shift.
• 6 requisitioned merchant vessels, including the Merry Midwife,
• Garrison of ~500 men-at-arms,
• ~1,000 militia and volunteers.

The free folk:

• Between 3,000~6,000 spearwives, old men, and young boys; the families of raiders, and refugees from the Wall.

Mercenary Fleet:

• 10 dromonds, formerly part of the royal fleet,
• 17 war-galleys, formerly part of the Redwyne fleet,
• 21 assorted sellsail vessels,
• ~6,000 mercenaries, sellswords and pirates.

Commanders:

• Lord Wyman Manderly,
• Ser Mardrick Manderly,
• Ser Garth Woolfield,
• Robin Flint,
• Ser Bartimus,
• Ser Jorah Mormont,
• Mother Mole.
Aurane Waters, the Lord of Waters,
Ser Lothor Brune,
Oswell Kettleblack,
Salladhor Saan (betrayer).

Prelude:

After the Scouring of The Twins, the Lord Paramount of the Trident, Lord of Harrenhal, and Lord Protector of Eyrie and the Vale of Arryn, Petryr Baelish, offered support and coin towards Lord Paramount Roose Bolton’s efforts against the King-Beyond-the-Wall Jon Snow. Lord Baelish’s coin helps House Bolton to remain strong, to maintain their levies, and to ensure that their bannerman loyalty despite the northern coalition’s conquest of Bolton territory.

Lord Bolton planned a simultaneous assault on both the northern coalition forces in the field, and their primary seat of power, White Harbour. Lord Baelish sponsors the White Harbour attack.

The naval raid was part of a coordinated attack intended to pursue several objectives at the same time; the recapture of Sansa Stark, the destruction of the northern coalition's seat of power, the capture of hightborn captives, the distraction the ice dragon away from the primary battle should efforts to kill or disable the dragon fail, and to more broadly defeat the northern coalition and its allies on two separate synchronous fronts.

Lord Baelish, partly motivated by strong suspicions that House Manderly was behind the disappearance of Sansa Stark and Ser Jorah Mormont, financed the assault from the background. Lord Baelish also heavily funded efforts to sabotage the dragon, as it was an obstacle against Lord Baelish’s own ambitions towards the north.

Aurane Waters, former Master of Ships to the Iron Throne, now pirate lord of the Stepstones and self-styled Lord of the Waters, leads the assault against White Harbour, commanding dromonds and galleys stolen from the royal fleet and the Redwyne fleet. Mercenaries, sellswords and oarsmen staffing the ships were recruited from the Stepstones, Tyrosh, Myr, Lys, and Braavos. Ser Lothor Brune and Oswell Kettleblack commands the mercenary fleet’s ground forces on Lord Baelish’s behalf during the assault.

A large number of free folk refugees were being housed in the city, led by the Mother Mole, the leader of the Cult of the White Dragon. Some several thousand free folk, primarily the families of raiders and clansmen, arrived from Eastwatch-by-the-Sea to White Harbour over the course of several months.

Salladhor Saan, on assignment for King-Beyond-the-Wall Jon Snow, joins up with the mercenary fleet as it was recruiting in Braavos. Upon hearing of the attack on White Harbour, Saan joined the pirate lord’s fleet, pledging apparent loyalty.

Lord Godric Borrell of Sweetsister was offered an alliance with the north by Sansa Stark. Lord Borrell provided early warning of the attack to Oldcastle as the mercenary fleet passed the Bite.

Battle:

Warning from Sweetsister sent by Lord Godric Borrell provides some time to build a defence. Timing coincides with Sansa Stark’s arrival in White Harbour, and her companion Ser Jorah Mormont joins to lead the defenders at the harbour.
The mercenaries attack with overwhelming force, and their fleet makes short work of the freshly commissioned navy of White Harbour.

Sellswords and sellsails overwhelm the outer harbour’s garrison. The Merchant’s Quay and the Fisher’s Port are swiftly lost, and the Manderly men retreat to the inner harbour. Meanwhile, the cityfolk run to the Wolf’s Den and the New Castle for shelter. The sellswords push up through Fishfoot Square and to the gates of the Castle Stair, burning and razing the city as they go.

Manderly soldiers at New Castle manage to hold, but the city itself is left defenceless. The White Harbour defenders can only hold out at a few locations, while the rest of the city burns. The sellswords are given free rein to loot and pillage and raze as much destruction as possible.

The defence at the inner harbour collapses, but the sellswords fail to break through to the Wolf’s Den. The sudden disappearance of their commander, Ser Lothor Brune, causes the attack to stall.

The sellswords attempt to take prisoners of the smallfolk, and capture refugees taking shelter at the Old Mint and Sept of Snows. The mercenaries try to force their captives back to the ships, but they encounter unexpected resistance from the free folk refugees in the city. Riots are triggered in the streets.

As the sellswords pierce further through the city, the fighting dissolves into mass pillaging and looting. The leader of the free folk refugees, Mother Mole, raises the wildlings into a frenzy. The mobs force the attackers to fall back.

Meanwhile, Salladhor Saan, captaining a single ship among the mercenary fleet, waits until Aurane Waters is fully invested into the battle on the docks, before changing his banners to support King Jon Snow, and proceeds to ambush the other vessels from behind. Several dromonds are captured as such, devastating the mercenaries. In the confusion, several other vessels botch their retreats, and are seized by the mobs on the harbour.

The sellswords are pushed out of the city, and Aurane Waters is forced to retreat on his flagship, the former Lord Tywin, with half his force and twenty-four ships, remaining.

The battle lasts from early morning until dusk. Even after the fleet’s retreat, large groups of sellswords are left abandoned in the city, and the riots continue to rage. It takes two days for the Manderly garrison and reinforcements from the surrounding area to restore order.

Result:

- House Manderly victory, although with very heavy damage to the city itself.
- All twenty-six Manderly galleys in the harbour are destroyed or damaged, along with all six requisitioned merchant vessels, but twelve enemy hulls are captured, including the former Sweet Cersei, a flagship-class, four-hundred-oar dromond, and the Lioness and the Queen Margaery, eighty and one-hundred-and-twenty-oar class dromonds respectively.
- Large number of casualties among the free folk.
- Sansa Stark remains uncaptured.

Aftermath:

The attack leaves White Harbour and its docks heavily damaged, with the breakout of fires along the inner harbour and core merchant districts. Riots are triggered between free folk refugees and White Harbour civilians.

As the mercenary fleet flees through Bite, Lord Godric Borrell smothered of the Night Lamp at Sweetsister. Shipwreckers and lampers associated with House Borrell carry dummy flares along the beaches. At the lord’s orders, the lights of Sisterton are dowsed.

The fleeing mercenary fleet under Aurane Waters lose their bearings in the night, and significant elements of the fleet are foundered against the rocks of the Three Sisters. Less than a quarter of the assembled fleet makes it out of the Bite.

A large investment by Petyr Baelish is spoiled.

Chapter End Notes

Author Notes:

Well, I try to avoid doing this, but there's been enough comments to justify a blanket response, I think.

Winterfell was never going to fall easily. The Boltons were always going to find a way to fight back, and it wasn't even just the Boltons this time. You had Roose Bolton, Petyr Baelish, and the conclave of maesters - some of the best players of the game in all of Westeros - all coming together to decide that Jon Snow and his dragon needs to die.

Regardless of Jon's leadership ability, political acumen, his age - that type of opposition is not something you can brush past. That's the type of resources and sabotage that would hurt absolutely anybody.

Littlefinger has ambitions on the north of his own, and Jon was ruining them. The best outcome for Littlefinger was if the Boltons and Jon would both kill each other, leaving the north vulnerable for Littlefinger to swoop in. Littlefinger thought that Jon was going to win too easily, however, and so suddenly there's a lot of Littlefinger's support going to back the Boltons to even the odds.

The maesters are regarded as completely independent, but there have been more than a few times when they have pulled the strings behind the scenes. One of the big reasons that Roose was able to recruit so many traitors was because every northern house had a maester in it, who was subtly leaning against Jon. After all, maesters serve the realm, while Jon is the leader of wildlings. The maesters are the closest thing to dragon-killers that Westeros knows - they don't like dragons, they are responsible for the Targaryen dragons dying. The maesters have manipulated wars and poisoned dragons before, and they fully capable of doing it again (see the maester conspiracy).

And then there's Roose Bolton, professional backstabber with a few decades more experience than Jon. Roose was always, always, going to find some vulnerability, any vulnerability, and then stab a dagger into it.

It's like chess; imagine a competent-but-still-beginner player going up against a grandmaster. If the younger player starts with enough of a material advantage, then the grandmaster is not guaranteed to win. However, it is absolutely certain that the grandmaster will still find a way to make the other guy bleed for it.

As for Ramsay, well, he got involved because Roose needed somebody who: a) has experience with poisons (which Ramsay does - see Domeric); b) is a good liar (which Ramsay is - see Theon); c) has investment enough to be dependable for a high-stakes task (which Ramsay does, actually) and d) is a very, very good murderer (which Ramsay very much is). Ramsay fits the qualifications of someone who could do very well in those circumstances.

Just because you don't like the character, don't pretend that he is totally incompetent. In the books, Roose tolerated Ramsay, not because of any emotion, but because Ramsay was very good at killing all of House Bolton's enemies. In the books, Ramsay has captured three of the strongest castles in the realm (Hornwood, Winterfell, Moat Cailin) and defeated much larger forces to do so. Ramsay has cunning enough to assemble and lead his Bastard's Boys, and singlehandedly go from being a disregarded bastard to the Lord of Winterfell. That is not incompetent; Ramsay is exactly the sort of person that Roose would exploit for a task like infiltrating an army. After all, there's nothing for Roose to lose if it fails, but everything to gain.

In the books, Ramsay has been well-established as a major foil for Jon and I can all but guarantee that book-Jon will have a lot of trouble with Ramsay too. Just because the show did a lot of things wrong, doesn't mean that you should cross it all out just because of 'twenty good men'. Don't conflate them.

And, while I'm at it, in the books Ramsay's weapon of choice was a falchion. He only ever used a bow in the show. Ramsay was described as being very strong and ferocious with a blade, although with little skill and proper form. More like an animal with a sword. There have been over a dozen reviews so far saying "you powered up Ramsay by making him a swordsman - he should be a bowman!" which is just, no, not true.

This is very much the books, not the show.

The King in the North

Even after the battle, it wasn't over. In a fairer world there would have been a moment to rest, a moment to think. But the chance never came; the challenges kept coming, there was never a moment to breathe, and that just made everything more tiring. Like Jon had to force himself to keep on going, to pick up the pieces even after it all collapsed, trying to stop everything from shattering.

The storms faded, but they never quite broke. The snows never stopped. The winds were still buffeting the towers, the snow blanketing the land. The world outside Winterfell's walls became smothered in white and cold. The clouds above were grey, and dark.

Lady Barbrey Dustin and the last of the Bolton garrison had managed to hold out for the better part of a week by barricading themselves in the crypts, and it took Jon most of that time just to find his feet again.

There were a hundred schisms in the wake of the battle. A hundred crises that he couldn't handle, a hundred emergencies that just overwhelmed him. Reports were coming in daily of skirmishes as far south as Cerwyn, as warbands of the free folk pursued the surviving Boltons. Jon was left frail and injured, left behind, trying to sort it all out.

The first time that Jon finally laid eyes upon Roose Bolton, the Lord of the Dreadfort was behind bars, in bloody rags. Rattleshirt hadn't been gentle when they captured him; Lord Bolton hadn't resisted, but the wildlings had still stripped him of his armour, beat him with the butts of their spears, and frogmarched him through the cold into Winterfell's prisons. Then they had beat him again before putting him in chains.

And yet, despite it all, Roose Bolton didn't twitch. The man's face was bloody, his left eye sealed shut with swollen bruises, chains on his wrists and ankles, but he was still, straight-backed, and composed in a corner of the stone cell. Most injured people couldn't help but tremble – it was a reflex, and yet not for Roose. He didn't even twitch. That sort of eerie, inhuman calm made the whole room uneasy.

Roose Bolton was behind bars, beaten and in chains, and yet it was like Jon still felt the weight of his wounds more than Roose.

There was a long moment of silence as they both stared at each other. It was the first time they had ever seen each other, the first time that Jon had laid his own eyes on the man who'd brought him to the edge of ruin. Jon was still staggering with every movement, bloody bandages still wrapped around his torso under his furs. The snows, his injuries, the battle and the fallout had left Jon's face pale and sickly, while Roose's was bloated and red.
They looked at each other, unnerving pale blue eyes against barely restrained grey.

"Is this the interrogation?" Roose asked finally, his voice a croak. His calm eyes took in each of them in turn. "I suppose it is time."

Jon felt his hands curl into fists. That voice, that calm, calm voice... So much anger, pounding through his body, he could barely breathe. He needed to say something, but that rage...

"This one is still too smug by half," Rattleshirt growled, bones clinking as he walked up next to Jon. The Lord of Bones had a bloody brow, and a bone dagger in his hand. "Let me spend some time with him first. I'll make him talk."

"Excuse me? 'Make me talk'?" Roose said, managing to sound mildly amused. "I'm curious, how exactly are you going to do that?"

Rattleshirt growled, and would have lunged at Roose, if not for Tormund holding him back. "You want to fucking bloody see--!

"Enough of this," Tormund ordered, glaring at Rattleshirt. "This fucking leech," he spat at Lord Bolton's face. He didn't even twitch. "loses his bloody head, that much is certain. Don't let him provoke you any more than that."

Rattleshirt scowled angrily, but Jon's gaze flickered behind him. Lord Greatjon Umber stood by the doorway, with pure, silent hate. The Greatjon's silence felt more dangerous, more murderous, than when he was roaring bloody fury.

"Why, Roose?" Lord Umber said, slowly. His eyes were on the prisoner, narrowed and dark, all his hatred focused on the man behind bars. "For all this time... for all those months I rotted in the Twins, locked in the same cell as my own son's headless corpse, I wanted to ask that one question."

He took a brittle breath. "Why did you betray us, why did you kill Robb Stark?"

Roose's bloody lips twisted, like he could have smiled. "I never expected to see you again, Jon. Not with my own eyes. You look... well."

"Answer." The Greatjon's voice was lower than a growl.

Roose shrugged, his pale blue eyes still and calm. "The boy was a weak fool, he and his Tully mother and his Westerling whore. He led us all to the brink of ruin, in wars and lands that didn't concern us. Ironborn in Winterfell, ironborn in Moat Cailin, wildlings at the wall, winter howling from the north, crops rotting in the fields for lack of men to the harvest, and he had us marching on Lannisters. He ignored my advice, and he played the part of a foolish boy to the last. Tywin Lannister simply made me an attractive offer." He tilted his head. "I saw a chance and I took it. I am a pragmatist."

"I... proclaimed him my king..." The Greatjon's hands trembled, his eyes bulged. His breath was faint, almost strangled. "Three times, Roose. Three times... the Boltons have risen against Winterfell. There will never be a fourth. You will be the last."

"So it would seem." Roose Bolton said, his voice a croak, but his posture uncaring. He didn't even flinch.

Jon ignored it all. He couldn't talk. He couldn't think. He didn't trust himself to open his mouth. He could only stare, his hands trembling.

Rattleshirt stepped forward, bones clattering. He had jagged bone blade in his hands, holding it like a saw. "I see no point in drawing it out," Rattleshirt growled. "Do you want to do the honours, or should I?"

"He has crimes he needs to answer for," the Greatjon muttered. It was weird to hear the Greatjon speaking so quietly, so low. "Confessions that he must give."

"Aye, I get that," Tormund agreed, as Rattleshirt spat. "And he can he either give his answers and lose his head swiftly, or maybe he'll decide to be stubborn and lose his arms and legs first."

Rattleshirt grinned evilly, like nothing would please him more. "Not the arms and legs," the Lord of Bones snarled. "I'd start with the fingers and toes first, and I'd shred him inch by inch. Let him see his body being cut down slowly, as I make a necklace from his bones. I'll cook his own meat and make him eat it. He will do whatever I want him to, I promise it."

Roose raised an eyebrow. His eyes were on Jon, unblinking. He didn't even look at Rattleshirt. "And then will you cut off my cock and force me to swallow it? I'm guessing needles in my eye as well. You'd probably pull out my teeth – brutes like you tend to think that's the height of torture. Do you think that more pain equals more compliance?" Roose croaked, that half-smile still playing over his lips, like this was all just a little joke. Rattleshirt didn't reply. "Low cunning. No imagination. I have been on the other side of the knife more times than you have. There is nothing you can do to me that I haven't done myself. I have seen torture, and all the ways to resist it. I have made songs of the screams of better men than you."

His pale blue eyes were still boring into Jon. "Defeat is a state of mind more than a circumstance, boy. You can never be beaten if you do not let yourself lose." He turned to glance at Rattleshirt. "So go ahead, wildling; work your trade if you wish. The worst comes to it, I think I will just bite off my tongue or choke myself until I die."

Nobody replied. If looks could kill, Roose would have been burnt alive. "But my confession isn't the point, is it?" Lord Bolton mused. "You don't really care about what confessions I have to give, they are irrelevant. You just want to hurt me, to punish me for my crimes. Will my torment make you feel better? Will it ease your minds? Which is fair enough, really; who am I to judge you for taking that satisfaction? But at least be honest with yourself for your reasons."

The voice was a croak through cracked lips, but still so soft, so gentle. Even when he was in chains, Roose had a way of silencing the room as he spoke. He's smiling, Jon thought hollowly. He's smiling.

"Nevertheless," Roose said after a pause. "It will not be necessary, for I will cooperate with you completely. Pray tell, what do wish to know, Your Grace?"

He did as well. Lord Bolton answered absolutely every question without hesitation. He didn't shift, he didn't stammer, he didn't even begin to resist in the least. Questions were answered exhaustively, with details expounded on to the second and third degrees and beyond. The lords spent the full day down in that cell, nothing but questioning him. Afterwards they walked outside the prisons and bellowed at each other. Men-at-arms scampered off to search out the men and women who'd been named.

Jon could hardly even twitch, after it all. Traitors. He just felt numb. His mind was spinning. More traitors than I ever...

Winterfell felt like a ruin, or maybe a crypt. There were bloodstains in every room, a mountain of corpses piled in the courtyard. Women, serving girls, and stableboys had been butchered when the castle fell. His own army had been filled with bloodlust.
Jon himself hadn't even been present for the taking of Winterfell; he had been found unconscious and half-dead in the snows. He had only woken up, bloodied and pale, in the castle's dining hall as it was being used as infirmary.

They had won; House Bolton was defeated, Jon could walk – or limp, rather – through the halls of Winterfell. And yet he had never known such a bitter, foul victory.

Early the next morn, Jon found himself back in front of Roose Bolton's cell again, staring through the bars at the leech lord's pale eyes.

"Your Grace." Roose even bowed as far as the manacles would allow. "How may I help you?"

Jon could hardly speak. His throat… it jammed. The heartbeats passed in pure silence. They were alone, just two men staring at each other in the cold and dusty prisons beneath the keep.

"Do you have more questions, Your Grace?" Roose asked eventually.

Finally, Jon spoke. "Tell me how," he said lowly.

"How what?"

"Everything." There was so much anger, hate, pounding through him his voice almost cracked.

There was no reply. Lord Bolton pulled himself closer, as far as chains allowed. "If you're looking for some kind of meaning, Your Grace," he whispered, "then I have little to offer you. I did it because this is war, and it was my job."

Jon was trembling. His fists were actually trembling.

Roose leant back.

"As far as specifics go, it was… it was a tedious effort," Lord Bolton said with a sigh. "From the moment you crossed at Eastwatch, I knew that I was likely facing certain defeat. Your appearance was really quite vexing, I admit. My moves against House Stark, my appointment as Warden of the North, they had been calculated risks which left me in a quite unpopular position. I had really been gambling on a long winter to freeze any movements against me, a stretch of peace and quiet in the north – I needed some time to let the resentment bleed away while I solidified my power. Your appearance – your wildlings, your dragon – occurred at the absolute most inopportune moment for me. I could not predict it, I had no preparations for it.

"I had hope I could maybe recover, maybe rally a divided north in time to oppose you," Lord Bolton said with a sigh. "But then once I heard that you were Ned Stark's bastard, of all people, then I realised I stood no chance. Not by traditional methods. From that moment onwards, I retreated my men and pulled back into damage control. There was no real option otherwise for me – but did you really think I would just let you come and usurp my position?"

"You really think so?" Roose tutted, and shook his head. "Millennia ago, the Red Kings and Kings of Winter came to an… agreement. The Boltons bent the knee, but the Starks would never take that for granted. Never take advantage. The Dreadfort was what kept the restless loyal to Winterfell; we kept our blades sharp, while the Starks united. The mailed fist, to the gloved hand."
"If a restless lord were to refuse Winterfell's welcoming hand, then they would know the Dreadfort's blades. That was the partnership that built the largest and oldest kingdom of Westeros. Even the most pricklish of the Kings of Winter knew to appreciate the alliance; they learned that my family was too useful to extinguish and too powerful to neglect. That has been the rule of this land since time immemorable — so long as the Starks stay strong and put the north first and foremost, then the Boltons are their sturdiest ally." Roose tsked slightly. "But if they don't... for any Stark who breaks that pact... and then, well, the collection of skins that we keep beneath the Dreadfort becomes slightly larger. Your brother broke the rules, so I did my civic duty by putting a dagger through his stomach. His skin now rests in my dungeons too, next to a few of the more foolish of the old Kings of Winter."

His voice... it was patronising. The edge of his vision blurred with rage, but Jon didn't speak. Robb. He couldn't speak, Jon didn't dare open his mouth. He didn't know what he would do if he did.

"As a matter of fact," Roose continued slowly, "My plan was to make life as difficult for you as possible, for as long as possible. Defeating you in the field was desirable, but I would be satisfied with starving you out as winter came. I resolved myself to accept any victory, no matter how bitter, so long as you were dead by the winter's end. I knew that I could not defeat you through conventional means, and so I was forced into my gambit."

"Ramsay." Jon's voice was a growl, the name like a curse.

"Ramsay." Roose nodded. "Among others. There were other attempts made, but Ramsay was just the one that got the furthest." A pause. "Truth be told, Ramsay was never critical to the plan — I had nothing to lose if Ramsay failed, but I had everything to gain if he succeeded. My own plans would have proceeded with or without his."

The thought of Ramsay's blade hacking into her chest flashed before his eyes. Jon had to take a deep breath just to calm himself.

"The core plan was relatively simple, actually," Roose was talking, so easily, almost like it was conversation. "You had a dragon that could stop any army, but you only had one dragon. It could only physically be in one place at a time. Thus, I had resolved that I had to attack you from multiple fronts.

"Two simultaneous assaults; one against White Harbour, one against your army. Not even a dragon would be capable of stopping them both."

He paused, like he was waiting for a reply. Jon didn't give him one. After a long silence, Roose continued.

"I expected that at the first word of an attack, you would fly off on your dragon with all haste to White Harbour's defence, like the chivalrous, bold and foolhardy boy I believed you to be — much like your brother. In doing so, you would leave your army unprotected, and mine would assault it at night," Roose explained. "If I was lucky, you would have arrived too late to save the city, and you would have ended up losing on both fronts. Even if I was unlucky, you would obliterate one of the assaults from dragonback, but then the other one would have still stood a reasonable chance of success.

"I would have been content with either victory, truth be told. You would lose either your infrastructure or your army, and your efforts would be crippled either way. Without your army, it would become impossible for you to hold all of the land you had already conquered. Without White Harbour, your alliances with northern lords would fracture, but more importantly you'd be unable to provide for your wildlings. Winter would come, and your army would starve. Maybe even turn against you. It would have bought me time – time enough to consolidate my position, to position my agents, perhaps time enough to assassinate you."

Jon struggled to even process the words. His voice was just so cold, emotionless. Even mocking. "Afterwards, circumstances became harder to predict," Lord Bolton mused. "but my odds improved regardless. I expected that as you became desperate, you would be forced to use your dragon more aggressively by razing castles and holdfasts freely – which would be devastating, true, but it would also turn the masses against you. As Aegon experienced in Dorne to his torment; if you act the tyrant, then people will oppose the tyrant to their last." Lord Bolton smiled faintly. "Every castle you raze, every pile of corpses, and, well, that just makes my reign look all the better in comparison, does it not?"

"In any case, sooner or later, I believed it would just become a matter of logistics," he explained softly. "Winter would come, and the snows would freeze both our efforts. Your wildlings would starve, you would lose your control, they would raid the smallfolk and the lesser lords, and then any hope you had of free folk reconciling with the northmen would shatter. Nobody would support you, nobody would ally with you, and, in true northern fashion, winter would damn you. All I needed to do was stay in the game, shielded behind the walls of Winterfell, shielded by your sister, and watch it all happen."

He stopped, took a breath, and thought about it. "Yes," Roose decided. "That is the 'how' of it. Do you have any questions?"

The air turned dead. Jon's eyes twitched. He had never felt such hate before. It was a hatred so intense he couldn't even speak, like all the fury was jamming up his body.

_He surrendered_, Jon thought. _Roose Bolton bloody surrendered_. After everything he had done, the man could have at least had the pride to die in battle, like ten, twenty thousand better men already had.

"You are going to die here," Jon promised, his voice cold.

"I am well aware," Roose sounded like he could have shrugged. "I never claimed my plans were perfect."

Another silence.

_His capture is a victory for us_, Jon tried to tell himself. _It meant that Roose could be judged, that they could bring the north to order_. He wasn't a martyr, he was a hostage against any that might still fight for him. Lord Manderly had already sent word that they wanted Lord Bolton alive; to be tried and to answer questions.

And yet still, Jon just looked at those pale eyes and imagined them bleeding. He imagined them screaming. That vision… it was so, so close. _I want him to scream._

"Tell me about Ramsay," Jon demanded, after a passing of minutes.

"Ramsay's solution was the optimal one," Roose admitted. "Many of my headaches would have vanished if Ramsay had been capable of removing you or your dragon. I encouraged Ramsay's efforts to that end."

_Optimal_. Ramsay's phantom blade still hovered at Jon's throat. "How?" Jon said lowly. "What poison did he use?"
This time, Roose did shrug. "I haven't the foggiest."

"He's lying. "Tell me the poison."

"I told you, I don't know it." Roose paused. "But should I take from your questioning that you don't have an antidote?"

"I could bring Rattleshirt back in here," warned Jon, throat strangling. "I will let Rattleshirt have you."

"Go ahead. And – who knows? – if your 'Rattleshirt' is capable enough, then my answer may even change." Roose sounded doubtful. "But it won't change into anything more coherent or honest."

Jon's eyes were unblinking, trying to look for any sign of weakness. He saw nothing, not even a twitch. "Ramsay handled the poison, not me," Roose said. "Ask him yourself."

"He is dead."

"He is?" Roose sighed. "What a shame. My son was a brute, yes, but he was always a very useful one."

Trembling. Jon's hands were trembling. He had to grip his knee, forcing himself still. He saw her falling to the ground, red blood and golden hair.

Focus. Jon took a deep breath. Just focus.

"What of my wife?" Roose asked in a mildly curious tone. "Does she still live?"

No. Walda Bolton, Walda Frey, was one of the highborn who'd been killed in the castle, when the free folk broke through. Jon didn't reply, though; he let the question linger in the air.

"Why did the maesters side with you?" Jon demanded finally. They had discovered of at least two different maesters, from Hornwood and Ramsgate, who had assisted the Boltons when by rights their loyalty should have been to their lords. They were being kept in the higher levels of the dungeons, alongside Lady Barbrey Dustin and the few other prisoners. A half a dozen maesters were being imprisoned, in all.

Another ring in the chain that choked me.

Roose shrugged again. "Because they are intellectuals, perhaps?" he suggested. "And any learned man would choose me over you."

Focus. Don't rise to the barb. Jon didn't want to press Roose on any subject, not right now – for now Jon just wanted to probe him, to see which subjects Roose was willing to answer and which he deflected. To try and understand.

"Who attacked White Harbour?" Jon demanded.

"Oh, sellswords, pirates and such. Mostly from the Free Cities, a large portion from the Stepstones. There was little time to hire any of the larger mercenary companies, so I had make do with enough of the smaller ones. They were just hired blades that were willing to sack a city for coin."

That answer – he answered the question, but not the full question. He was subtly trying to avoid more questioning by providing unnecessary details. "You couldn't have paid for them yourself," Jon said slowly. "You never had the gold, you never had the opportunity."
"A large portion was from the Dreadfort's vaults, actually." Lord Bolton actually managed to sound insulted. "But you're right. I had… hmm, let's call them sponsors."

Jon was sure he didn't visibly react, but Roose still smiled. "Are you surprised? You shouldn't be – the dragon was a threat to the status quo, and nobody wanted a beast like that flying around. The beasts caused the realm enough grief during the Targaryen's civil war. I was the first line of defence to stop it, so my efforts received… I suppose charity is the right word." He cocked his head. "All the while you were reaching out to House Manderly and the other northern lords, I was reaching out for support as well – to the south and beyond."

He's a good liar. "Who?"

"Many different sources. The crown promised support, but they were too distracted to ever provide it. Your scouring of the Twins was an unexpected move, but hardly a setback. Men only believe what they can see, and the trickle of support I had from the south before your flight became a flood. Your power made you sloppy, and arrogant, and, it brought me many benefactors. I received more from the Reach, as a matter of fact – House Hightower sent two cogs, loaded with weapons, arms and currency, in contribution.

"After your… Frayed Crossing," Roose's lips twitched, "the riverlords were left panicked that any of their castles could be next, and so I bargained for aid. The remnants of House Frey received unexpected support. But, by far, the biggest benefactor was from Braavos – the Iron Bank was very generous."

Jon bristled at that. "You're lying," he growled. "I'm in negotiation with the Iron Bank. They wouldn't have moved against me."

"Really?" Lord Bolton said doubtfully. "But that's how the Iron Bank operates. The Iron Throne of the Seven Kingdoms owes them a great debt, and you threaten the Seven Kingdoms. Therefore, you threaten the Iron Bank. Every time a king or conqueror threatens the Iron Bank's interests, all of their enemies suddenly receive an influx of funding. Empires come and go, but the Iron Bank takes their due. Do you think I'm ruthless? I'm nothing compared to those bankers, stamping their sheets of parchment."

Jon had received the early messages from White Harbour. They used blunt words – like death, devastation, destruction. Tens of thousands – smallfolk and refugees, not even soldiers – were dead in the city alone, but nobody had yet been able to count them all.

_This man orchestrated all of it. He masterminded such chaos without ever even going near._ It was mass murder through parchment, dark wings and dark words, and Jon held his 'sponsors' just as responsible.

"Who?" Jon growled. "I want you to list all your accomplices, right here."

"I told you last night."

"Do it again."

"Very well." Roose nodded. "Well, House Glover deserves special mention. Robbett Glover was very helpful in his job as commander of the outriders–"

"Robbett Glover. And his brother?"

"Oh yes, Galbart too. I made contact with Galbart first, actually, while he was at Ramsgate – he accepted the deal I offered, and passed on my letters to Robett." He paused. "Did you find the
They had. Roose had logged all of his ravens in an exquisitely organised filing system, including letters supposedly written in Galbart Glover's own hand. Jon didn't reply, though. He would not answer a single question Lord Bolton asked. Do not let him turn this interrogation around.

"From the mountain clans, there were quite a few allies of mine," Lord Bolton continued regardless. "Brandon Norrey lost two daughters and a son to wildling raids, he was quite easy to convince that your free folk were bad for the realm. Clan Norrey supported Bolton from the moment the Wall fell. Old Torghen Flint has fought against wildlings half his life, while The Harclay had very strong links to the Night's Watch. I offered them all the same promise; that I could stop the wildlings plaguing their land.

"Aside from the mountain clans, let's see…" He raised his hand, chains rattling, to count on his fingers. "Jeremy Locke of Oldcastle refused the marriages that Lord Manderly was trying to force onto his family, but he couldn't protest safely. He chose the options I offered instead. Lady Lyessa Flint was a scared pregnant woman, who wanted the security I offered rather than the wrath of a dragon. Lord Woolfield was trapped underneath Lord Manderly's thumb. And of course House Umber…"

"The Greatjon did not side with you." Jon was unable to hold his tongue. The man is a liar.

"The Greatjon didn't," Lord Bolton agreed. "But his uncle, Mors Umber, the Crowfood, did. Lord Umber came back from the Twins a shade of his former self, unhinged and disturbed from captivity – many of the Umber petty lords have fought wildlings for centuries, and they thought their liege mad for siding with you."

"You're lying." Last night, when Roose gave the same accusation, the Greatjon had been in a fury. "Mors Crowfood would have never betrayed the Greatjon, not after Last Hearth."

"Last Hearth?" Roose looked confused. "Do you mean when the wildlings razed the castle?"

Jon bristled. "The Bastard's Boys razed Last Hearth. Ramsay Bolton did that, not me."

And Roose smiled. Actually smiled. "Prove it."

Jon could have exploded. His hands clenched so tight his nails almost cut through skin. "It seems to me more logical that it was your wildlings, Your Grace," Lord Bolton noted, innocently. "After all, the wildlings breached the Wall, and immediately afterwards Last Hearth, the northernmost castle of our lands, was razed and pillaged. You say it was my bastard son, and yet he was at Winterfell at the time, by all accounts. Many and more can attest to it."

"You dare…?" Jon snarled. Rewriting history, twisting all the facts…

"I apologise, Your Grace." He held up his hands, chains rattling. "But frankly, it doesn't matter what I think happened, or even what you think happened. What matters is what the realm thinks happened. Who will history judge as the villain, or the champion?"

Jon had seen the letters that the Bolton's maester logged. All the while Jon's campaign had been ongoing, Roose Bolton had been sending ravens to the northern lords, spreading his own narrative of events. They had been subtle lies, a web that Roose weaved like a spider.

"And Mors Crowfood thought the wildlings responsible too," Roose continued, in quiet mocking. "Mors, a man present for the attack, believed it had been wildlings. He thought that wildlings had murdered his family, but then you hoodwinked his nephew into blaming someone else. Mors couldn't confront you over it, of course – not while your armies and dragon were on the move – so instead he came to me."

He's lying, Jon told himself. Still, the lies came so easily from his tongue.

Jon had to wonder – the Crowfood had taken a spear to the gut during the Sack of Last Hearth, and it had been sudden. It was unlikely that Mors actually had a good view of the assailants. How many men might have died, just because an old man might have misidentified the attackers in the dark?

Jon had only met the Crowfood twice, both years ago, but the letters from House Forrester said that the castellan of Last Hearth had recovered. Mors hadn't been with the army, but he had been rallying soldiers from Umber lands. The Greatjon had been in a fury at the charge against his uncle, but then there were Umber men-at-arms who confessed to where their orders came from.

Jon wasn't sure. Some part of the chain of command had been hijacked, but he wasn't sure which part, or how much of it.

It was Roose. Even from the beginning, it was him. Those unblinking eyes as pale as ice stared back at him. Every alliance I ever made, Roose Bolton was there to corrupt it. The amount of work that had gone into sabotaging him was staggering. A war in the shadows, a false war, waged by quills and golden dragons, all the while Jon had been waging a real one with blades and dragonfire.

"Go have a look at my letters, Your Grace," Roose said softly. "I assure you I kept them all – every betrayer that worked against you put their name to writing. Please, take them – use them to punish those responsible."

Jon had seen the letters; the Boltons had kept every letter and then some. Too organised, as if Jon had been meant to find them. Copied in triplicate, filed and organised by date, and stamped with official seals. If the letters were to be believed, then about a third of the lords under Jon had accepted promises or sabotaged him in some way or another. Some of the betrayals were small – like promising the Boltons they would deliberately hold back on the number of men they were committing to the war – and other betrayals were major – like northmen turning their blades against others in the camp.

Maybe they were genuine, or maybe Roose Bolton had just spent a long time crafting a fine web of lies, and this was just another way the man meant to trap Jon.

Roose was telling the worst type of lies – he was telling truths and lies mixed together, and his face didn't even twitch.

Jon tried to relax his grip. "Enough," he growled. Focus. There were more questions that Jon had to ask. "What did you do to Bran, to Brandon Stark?"

"How queer," Roose mused. "I was going to ask you the same thing, I assumed that you killed him, in the same way you killed your sister."

That did it. Jon finally snapped. "YOU DARE?!" Jon roared, composure broken. His fist crashed against the bars. His knuckles rang against iron, the sound ringing out. "YOU BLOODY DARE?"

The bars were between them, and Jon didn't have the keys to the cell on him. He kicked his chair to the ground, groaning and pacing. Roose didn't twitch, but his eyes were glittering. He's trying to provoke me, Jon cursed. The more unsettled I become, that's another small victory to him.

And it was working. Jon's breaths were hoarse, his fists screaming to punch something.
"She's dead, isn't she?" Roose's voice was a whisper. "Your sister died, your wildlings caused it."

Arya. Jon didn't even know how it happened. Somewhere, as men shuffled through the mountain of corpses, somebody began calling for Arya Stark. It had taken two days before they realised, and they turned to look at the wreckage of the West Tower. It would be even longer before they could dig out the charred corpse.

My wildlings. The free folk had been berserk, and swinging torches...

That wound should have hurt, but Jon couldn't feel it. There were too many wounds, too much pain, like he had been stabbed a dozen times. He just felt numb.

They still hadn't fully identified the bodies. There were many dead, many women. Wives and babes in particular; Lady Jonelle Cerwyn, Lady Berena Talhart, Lady Walda Bolton, and Lady Arya Stark...

Wildling raiders were renowned for targeting the women first.

"So what did you do to your brother, Your Grace?" Roose continued. "After all, Last Hearth is only ten leagues from Castle Black – your army was very much in the vicinity. Do you really claim to be ignorant? I'm sure others must be asking the same question."

Lord Bolton's voice was so soft. "And Brandon Stark was a threat you, was he not? A trueborn child that might steal the position you fight for."

Jon knew what Roose was doing. What he had done. He remembered the letter that the mountain clans had 'come across' – the letter where the Boltons offered surrender. There would be more letters, which would have found their way to other houses.

Anybody who heard about those letters, who heard about the disappearance of Bran, then the death of Arya... they would come to their own conclusion.

Roose had been writing his narrative for a while now; framing Jon as responsible for Last Hearth, painting him as a conqueror and tyrant, a liar, usurper and kinslayer. A bastard. The death of Arya Stark would clinch the matter for many people.

Even when Lord Bolton lost, he still found a way to win.

He did this, Jon cursed. Even months ago, it had been the reason that the Boltons had sacked Last Hearth. The Bastard's Boys deliberately hadn't flown banners, deliberately left few alive. He framed me for Bran's death and I wasn't even aware. Even when he lost, he planned his defeat just to hurt me too.

And Arya. Bright, wilful, wild Arya. She had been married to a monster, held captive for months, and then burnt to death as she hid in the tower. In Winterfell, they described Lady Stark as a meek, timid and fearful girl, and Jon could only wonder with horror at what his sister had suffered to break her spirit such.

Ramsay would have tortured her, a little voice in Jon's head whispered. She was strong, so Ramsay broke her.

Nobody had heard anything from Bran for months. If Ramsay had truly gotten him too, then his brother was likely dead as well.

Jon's breaths were strained. He stared at Roose, and... by the gods, that hate. Jon had never felt a hatred like it.

I want to hurt him. I just want to hurt him. Make him feel it too.

The blood rushing through Jon's body, drumming against his ears, sounded like Ramsay's laughter.

"I will bring back Rattleshirt," Jon promised. "I will bring worse than Rattleshirt. This is the only time that I will ever ask these questions nicely. I will take the truth from you, regardless of what else I have to take."

"Go ahead," Roose replied. "And will that make you happy? To hear my screams?"

Yes. Very much so, actually. Still, somehow, Jon just couldn't imagine Roose ever screaming. Jon's eyes narrowed.

"Why?" he asked finally. "Tell me why. Why are you doing this, why go so far? You have nothing to gain by being difficult now, you've already lost."

"I told you," Roose said, as if were obvious, "I will take whatever victory I can get. I may not be triumphant, but I can still be spiteful."

Jon could only stare. What happened to him, what was broken inside of him, for there to be any man to live that was just so... cold? Empty? Jon had known plenty of killers, but even the most blood-crazed warrior would be unnerved by that soft voice, and the complete and utter disregard for life.

The man is madder than Ramsay ever was.

"Still, do you know a secret, Your Grace?" Roose continued, while Jon was left frozen in anger, still as a statue. "If you want to know who I was working, who plotted your downfall, then... well, there are many responsible, but if you wish to know my greatest accomplice, you need only look in a mirror."

Jon's arms were trembling, fists clenched so tightly it hurt.

"I played you," Roose said, his voice a whisper. "You had an easy victory, and you let me turn it into a near defeat. It was your own incompetence that saw your army destroyed. I think you would have been completely destroyed too, if not for the snows. I think that you only survived that night by sheer chance.

"And I think that if I had been leading your army, then I would have won this castle without issue."

Jon had never, ever wanted to hurt somebody as much as he did right then. It's what he wants, he told himself. He wants me to lose control.

"The north is already starving, Your Grace," Roose said slowly, as Jon could only glare, teeth grinding together. "I can promise you, the granaries have already been spoiled, the last of the harvest is gone, and winter is already upon us. The west has been ravaged by ironborn, the north and east abandoned and pillaged, the smallfolk and petty lords have fled before your wildlings. Robb Stark lost our armies to the south. Ten thousand men of working age, and you lost us even more. Lords and knights and heirs, the cream of the north, lost. How many great houses will even remain after you punish your traitors? White Harbour burns. Our lands are barren, there is no more coin, and no one will trade with us. Winter is coming, and the north is ruined."

That wasn't a lie. None of it was a lie. Jon was so painfully aware that those words were all true, however distorted. "You have… however many tens of thousands of wildlings coming south, but we can't even feed our own people. They say that this will be the longest winter in a generation. How do you hope to maintain this fragile independence of yours, without trade and produce from the south?" Roose scoffed quietly. "You may hate me, you may despise me, but I can promise you something; I could have kept the north fed."

Jon didn't reply. There was a smirk on the man's swollen face. "Mine was a quiet and peaceful rule. My reign was born in blood, yes, but only after your brother took ten thousand men to their deaths down in the south. I killed Robb Stark with my own hand, I did, but I saved the north from his war by doing so. There had been no need for further conflict; there were no wildlings pillaging the countryside, or dragons devouring villages." Jon twitched. "And yet, you ruined it all when you opened the gates and you came south."

"That's not true," Jon growled.

"Which part? You didn't open the gates, or you didn't come south?" he scoffed. "Go outside and count the bodies, Your Grace. Go look at your sister's corpse."

Jon's voice guttered in his throat. He thought of the white walkers, but he didn't, he couldn't reply, and Roose Bolton's eyes flashed like a predator sensing weakness. "I believe you had the best intentions, I'm sure," he said nodding, "but you asked me what I wanted, so allow me to answer… when this all done, when the cold winds blow and castles of the north turn to charnel-houses and the trenches overflow with corpses… I want you to look in a mirror, 'King', and ask yourself, really ask yourself – is the world better for all I've done?"

He was met by silence. Jon turned stiffly and limped away, staggering heavily with his wounded side. He heard Roose chuckle behind him, the noise like nails scratching over bone.

Damn him, Jon cursed. Damn him to seven hells and more, damn him to the fire, damn him to the Others. Whatever the worst torture there is, he deserves it and more. Damn him, damn him, damn him.

Roose had been behind bars and in chains and Jon had been the one interrogating, yet somehow Roose Bolton still managed to get inside his head.

As he left the dungeons, Jon passed an old man in grey robes rattling and pleading at a cell door, his chain chiming around his neck. Jon ignored him. Every maester with the northern coalition had been placed in chains and locked up, save one. There had been too many ravens sent, too many missing letters. Nobody was sure who was responsible, but not a single maester could be trusted, not any more.

Outside, the wind still hissed. The storm had cleared, somewhat, but the snows hadn't stopped. The sky was spitting clumps of snow, the winds were still hard enough to shake the keep. As he pulled up his hood and stepped outside, he saw a pile of corpses littering the courtyard, a hill of the dead already peaked with cornices of snow.

Over a week later, and they still hadn't cleared even half of the bodies.

Jon saw the spires and burnt towers of the Great Keep. Winterfell looked charred and blackened, even under the layers of ice and sleet. Black and white. The castle looked so different to how Jon remembered it, but still so hauntingly familiar. A burnt memory.

He needed to take deep breaths to control all that frustration. The anger. Jon hadn't known what he wanted from Roose Bolton, but he should have known he wouldn't get it.
"Snow!" a voice called for him across the yard, and he heard urgent footsteps. Toregg was looking for him, running with three other men. All were armed. "Snow, where did you–"

"Alone." Jon's voice was cold. "I needed to be alone."

"Aye, well," Toregg scoffed, glancing behind him as he panted. There was noise in the distance, sounds of shouting. Jon tensed. Another schism? "The dragon is over the walls. Come quick."

Even from the opposite end of the castle, Jon heard a great moan from the godswood, and then a creaking of trees. Sonagon. The free folk were already scattering, the giants in the courtyard wailing. Birds – snow shrikes, robins and ravens – burst from the woods. Jon was already striding quickly towards the ruckus, wincing so badly with every lopsided step.

Jon saw a flash of white wings over the top of the Guest House, followed by an immense boom of the beast dropping downwards.

He was running. He could hear the growling as the dragon twisted restlessly, crashing through rubble and trees with every pained movement. Sonagon's wings were flapping, the huge beast trying to clear a space for itself.

The godswood was the largest, most isolated area of the castle; three acres of old, packed earth and humus and moss, a grove that had stood untouched for ten thousand years. Even in the centre of one of the largest castles in the realm, the godswood was a small forest. It would have been an ideal place for the dragon, if not for all the densely-packed trees. Instead, the huge beast had to push its way through the chestnuts, hawthorns, oaks, ironwoods and soldier pines, clearing a place to curl over the frozen pond.

Once, the godswood had been a place for rest and meditation, but now the air was filled with sounds of immense trees splintering and men shouting.

As Jon got closer, he could see the white mass of scales writhing. He heard pained moans and pants, followed by a gagging noise so loud the earth rumbled.

"Get everybody back!" Jon ordered, but his voice was barely audible over the roar. He saw great plumes of cold mist rising. "Get them back!"

He was close enough to the hot spring pools to see Sonagon; the dragon's jaws were open as it gagged, the great tail whipping. Globs of frozen ooze splattered from its throat, bursting over an oak tree. He is puking, Jon realised quietly. As Sonagon heaved, frostfire spewed from its jaws.

Jon saw black and yellow bile splatter and hiss out of the dragon's throat. The great dragon made a pained noise, so loud and high it caused his eardrums to ring.

He moved to comfort it, but Toregg placed his hand to stop him. "Stay back," the Dragonguard warned. "Your dragon trampled two men outside the walls and didn't even notice."

Dammit. Jon had never seen Sonagon so weak; it felt like the dragon's stomach was burning. The poison. "We have find a way to treat him."

"How?" Torregg asked, looking baffled. "How the hells are you supposed to treat a dragon?"

Jon didn't reply, but his jaw clenched. It had taken two days to even rouse Sonagon from the lake's edge, and another two to herd the dragon towards Winterfell. From the looks of things, even the very short flight over the castle's walls had robbed the last of Sonagon's strength.
Another great sentinel tree crunched, roots tearing from the ground, as Sonagon twisted. He was lucky that the dragon hadn't destroyed the heart tree itself as it tramped through, but even the ancient weirwood was now missing many of its red leaves. The bloody face on the white bark stared mournfully out over the pools, where Sonagon panted and writhed.

Steam from the hot springs shimmered in the air, crackling against ice. The dragon's tail splashed across the water.

Finally, Sonagon's sharp spasms started to settle, and it collapsed in between the broken husks of trees. The dragon's convulsions of pain could be destructive, but they would die as its strength faded. The dragon was weak, still falling in and out of consciousness; barely even able to breath.

They needed to keep the dragon out of the open, especially while it is sickly. Toregg was already shouting orders, assigning men to seal the godswood. The gates of the grove were to be shut and barricaded. Nobody was to be allowed anywhere near the dragon. Sonagon is strong, Jon told himself, his body would burn through the poison sooner or later. He will recover, surely.

Still, Sonagon hadn't been eating. The dragon's body was trembling, spasming as it tried to fight against the weakness. The dragon's muscles felt like lead.

Sonagon's wounds were fairly minor. The spear to the eye was less than a flesh wound, it would heal. The rest amounted to a few shallow scratches, but the poison was something else.

Jon stared at the great beast, feeling his own gut wrench. Nobody knew what poison Ramsay Bolton had used, there was no treatment that any healer could offer. Either the maesters didn't know, or they refused to tell. His dragon was suffering and there was nothing Jon could even do to help.

"Pass word to Rattleshirt," Jon ordered stiffly. "Task him with finding out what poison was used. Whoever he needs to question, do it."

He felt Sonagon rumble – a low and weak growl as its serpentine body curled. Jon just went stiff as he stood and watched. "It's not safe for you out here, Snow," Toregg warned, his voice low. All men kept weapons close to hand. "We don't how many more might be…"

His voice trailed off. How many more traitors might still be biding their time. Jon's hand moved to hover over the wound on his torso, where the assassin's blade had cut straight through. He had spent the days after the battle being nursed in a bed of the infirmary, and his control over Winterfell was less than a thread. He couldn't even walk through the grounds for fear of a dagger, or an arrow.

Everywhere he looked, he saw dark gazes lingering at him. The air felt so tense it was simmering.

Sonagon is just vulnerable as I am, Jon thought quietly. A dragon was only fearsome while it was in the air, untouchable and unstoppable. Every other time, every time it rested or grew lazy, it could be hurt. A week ago, Jon had been strong and powerful too – but that power had been all too easily stripped away. Power evaporated like a shadow on the wall, or dissolved around a single, unexpected blade.

There was no more Dragonguard to protect Sonagon, not anymore. Every single member of the Dragonguard travelling with the host, bar Toregg the Tall and Ser Alek, had died that night.

The north had known many bloody battles, but that one would surely go down in history as one of the worst. There was were as many men that died to the weather as they did in the fighting. Out of their eighteen thousand men, over two thirds were dead.

Alysane Mormont had died trying to hold the perimeter. Hugo Wull had took an arrow through the chest, and died bleeding out three days later. Jeremy Locke had been found dead on the ice. Many and more were still missing, or injured. The lack of supplies and the overflowing infirmary in Winterfell meant that more were still to die.

And Val… No, Jon cursed. Don’t think about Val. Not now.

There had been schisms all while Jon had been on a hospital bed – the Greatjon and Tormund Giantsbane had been the ones to hold the army together. Clans Harclay and Knott had already broken away altogether to return to their own lands. As had Houses Forrester, Woods, Mollen, and many of the Mormont bannermen. Jon had been unconscious, he hadn’t even been able to stop them.

Personally, Jon suspected that more would have left if the snows had allowed them to leave. For the ones that remained, the castle was like a melting pot, set to boil over.

The remnants of the Bolton host had mostly been slaughtered, though some few had fled south for Cerwyn. Only a precious few had been taken prisoner.

And the word of Arya Stark's death had spread like wildfire. How long, how long before the entire north is thinking 'Jon Snow's wildlings killed Lady Stark'/?

The memory of pale blue eyes haunted the edge of his vision. We need order again. "Send word to the Greatjon and Tormund. Call the Weeper's warband to return," Jon said quietly. "Have them gather up the accused."

"The accused?" There had been many, many accused. "Which accus—"

"All of them." Jon ordered, and Toregg grimaced. "As many as we can find – any with doubt to their name. Any traitor who marched in my army, I want them in chains." He paused, thinking of Roose's smug pale eyes. "The suspicion is a worse of a poison than anything, so we will cleanse it. There will be a trial."

"Hells, Snow..." Toregg shook his head. "I don't even know how many men my Pa can still round up to follow orders. You start this and we might have to arrest half this bloody castle."

"Ser, I am in no mood to debate this." Jon's voice was like ice. "See it done."

He didn't take his eyes off Sonagon. He could feel the dragon's pain, ringing at the back of his mind. Still, there was nothing he could do to help Sonagon, not right now. Jon could barely even help himself.

Lady Stark

Pure, feral panic.

She didn't know how long it lasted; it could have been hours, it could have been days, could have been weeks – there was no way to tell when her vision was blurred with tears, her heart skipping like it would burst from her chest. She ran until her side was a black stone, she ran some more, she vomited into a ditch, and she kept running, she just kept running until she found a street that wasn't gripped by battle.
Sansa crawled into the mud beneath the foundations of a brewery, hiding among the rats. Hide, just hide. She ran, had slipped away in the chaos, but there was no telling how many sellswords were still looking for her.

Outside, in the streets, White Harbour burned and raged.

It was dawn when she finally emerged – barefooted, filthy, and ragged. The fires were extinguished, leaving only charred remains, but the streets were still heaving. It felt like the city was convulsing and spewing around her like a drunken man. Sansa hesitated, but she couldn't hide any longer. Instead, she turned and moved hesitantly towards the plaza at the city's heart.

She saw crowds of men, women and wailing babes; smallfolk, all swarming around the gates of the Castle Stair. She looked down the hill, into the city. Fishfoot Square was a Lord's Port was a ruin. It looked like there was still fighting to the outer wharves; she could see sprawling groups of men and plumes of smoke. Broken husks of ships filled the harbour.

All throughout the city, bloody corpses littered the streets, left where they fell. Everything smelled of smoke and blood. It made her want to retch, but her stomach was so empty.

"All wildlings!" a voice boomed from a cluster of men-at-arms. They looked scared, clutching their tridents tightly. "All wildlings are expelled from the bloody city! Clear the streets! Savages clear the fucking streets!"

Sansa could only watch. It sounded like riots in the farther streets – wildlings facing Manderly men-at-arms. The surviving sellswords must be trying to flee the city on foot. Nearby, Sansa saw that the Old Mint had been burnt into ruins. All of the smallfolk had nowhere to go, they could do nothing but huddle around the steps to the New Castle, begging for aid. The castle didn't open its gates.

The whole city felt dazed. Broken. There was nothing Sansa could do, no one to approach, no one to look after her; she was just another face in the crowd. Just another of the filthy, powerless smallfolk.

She didn't cry. Maybe it was just dehydration, but she refused to cry. She found a place for herself beneath a statue of a merman in the plaza's centre, and waited.

It was dusk, when she saw the columns of men-at-arms flying banners push the plaza. She saw the crossed keys of House Locke, the woolsacks of House Woolfield and the eyes of House Flint marching through the streets. Reinforcements from the nearby lands had arrived, but it seemed only a pitiful few of them. There were a few cavalry, men garbed in hauberks of mail and plate – knights who cleared a path through the crowds and trotted into the New Castle. Sansa tried to call out to them, but her voice was lost in the cacophony of smallfolk.

It was a long night. The wailing of women, the cry of babes filled the air. Arguments. Fights.

The next morning, someone in the castle finally must have realised that the smallfolk desperately needed food, water and shelter. She saw a convoy of men coming down the Castle Stair, bringing blankets and rations into the crowd. The smallfolk were all so desperate it was almost a riot right then, and Sansa had to fall back from the front or be trampled.

Still, she caught a glimpse of figure in a green dress, with brown hair bound in a long braid, guarded by men-at-arms while she passed out bags of onions. The young woman's eyes were bloodshot, nearly red – she had been crying. Sansa's heart nearly stopped when she recognised her. "Spring solstice, they played Fair Maids of Summer and we ate lemon cakes!" Sansa screamed at the top of her lungs. "Your sister dyed her hair green, and we called her Froggy for it!"

A few of the women around her looked at her like she was crazed, but Sansa kept on repeating the words. She kept shouting, just hoping the words would draw attention. Finally, or maybe she was just lucky, Sansa saw the young woman step forward from the convoy, staring around at the hustle of filthy faces. Look at me, Sansa could have begged. I'm right here.

"Wynafryd!" Sansa shouted. "We ate lemon cakes, it was at the spring solstice. I braided your hair!"

Even from the distance, even through the mass, she saw Wynafryd Manderly's mouth hang open. Sansa hadn't been sure if anybody would even be capable of recognising her, but Wynafryd did.

"Sansa?!!"

After that, everything was a whirl. She could have collapsed. Men-at-arms stomped forth to drag Sansa out of the crowd.

There were questions, many questions, to which Sansa gave dazed answers – but honestly she just wanted to get something to eat. It started with Wynafryd staring at her like she was a ghost, stammering as she tried to explain it to the men. Soon there were more people, knights and smallfolk staring at her – some with disbelief, others with suspicion. One knight tried to insist that Wynafryd was mistaken, that Sansa was crazed, right up until she recounted the names of every single member of the Manderly delegation to Winterfell four years ago.

She had spent a long, long time in the mud under that filthy brewery preparing all the knowledge she could remember, anything that could prove her identity. She needed every last scrap of it.

New Castle hadn't been breached in the fighting, but it felt like it was just as much of a shambles as the city. There were wounded men littering the main hall, the infirmary overflowed into the hallway. There were arguments from the Merman's Court, shouting matches in the corridors, and soldiers running around like chickens; still terrified but they didn't know what to do.

Wynafryd clung to Sansa's arm, trying to drag her through it all. "Sansa?" Wynafryd gasped. "By the Seven, it's been so long. Where have you been, how did you get here? How could you…?"

Sansa tried to explain, she did, but she could barely a say word through all the panic and confusion around her.

"The wildlings are in riot!" a voice bellowed. "They refuse to leave the city!"

"The Commoner's Quarter is in flames!" another voice called. "We need more men, men and water!"

"To the sword!" an old, toothless lord demanded. "Put the wildlings to the sword."

Of all the ways that I wanted to return, this is not one. Not when tensions were so high, not when she was so shocked she could barely think. Maybe Sansa could have talked to the lord in a private audience, but it looked like the castle was dealing with a dozen crises at once. She caught a glimpse of Lord Wyman, standing, not sitting, before the throne of the Merman's Court. He was obese, a red-faced lord even fatter than she had remembered, bellowing bloody murder and staggering for breath while a plump, blonde-haired woman was weeping on the floor.

"Traitor!" a voice called.
"Where is King Snow? The dragon should be here!" another bellowed.

"The wildlings are decapitating the prisoners! Hundreds are marching on the Merchant's Squares!" A red-faced man-at-arms called. "An old woman is marching at the front with spikes of severed heads!"

"Corsairs fleeing the docks!" a knight bellowed, clambering to be heard. "Corsairs fleeing for the plague wharves!"

"To the sword!" the toothless lord shouted, stomping his foot. "Put the traitors to the sword!"

It was all so hectic. There was nothing she could do about it, so she didn't even try.

"Salladhor Saan!" that was a voice Sansa turned to see, made distinctive by the accent of the Free Cities. She saw an aging, slim man with tanned skin, wearing boiled leather and silks and a bright green cap, trying to call for attention. "Let the king know he has no better ally than Salladhor Saan – no greater friend, none more loyal! Salladhor the Saviour! I demand audience with the king!"

Wynafryd was pushing through the throng, and Sansa heard her name being called. More and more attention was turning towards her. Sansa just went numb, answering every question they asked and forcing herself not to be overwhelmed.

"The king!" a woman called over the clamour. "The king must–"

"She's a Lannister!" she heard one voice exclaim. "The Lannisters attacked us!"

The world was spinning. Sansa was so hungry, so thirsty. She could barely understand anything. She shook her head, just trying to clear the fogginess vagueness. More and more were turning towards her, her name was spreading through the Merman's Court. Some demanding to know where she came from, others were calling her a fake.

There was no chance to answer any of them, not truly. Her words would be wasted in the moment. Instead, Sansa only said, "I fled from King's Landing, and I ran north. I arrived in port moments before the battle." She repeated the words dumbly to any that shouted at her, forcing herself to stay detached. It is too dangerous to mention Littlefinger, not right now.

The room exploded.

Questions.

Accusations.

Questions.

Screams, but not at her. Men were screaming at other men, more bodies still rushing into the hall.

Questions.

Men-at-arms were marched into the Merman's Court, and then there were men, hysterical with panic, being marched out.

More questions.

At the end of it all the world was spinning, and attention turned away from her and the lords were screaming at each other, Lord Wyman attempting to bellow over the cacophony, trying to restore order. Sansa would have stayed, but went she went numb and Wynafryd was already dragging her away. "Come, my lady," she hissed. "It is not…" her voice trailed off and Sansa didn't press her. Wynafryd shuffled her upstairs, and dragged her into her bedroom.

Wynafryd gave her stale bread and water, and tried to dress her, tried to clean the grime off her face, but there was no time for a proper bath. Sansa was reminded of how Arya would always run off and get filthy before noble guests arrived, leaving her mother in a fluster to try and clean her. Sansa tried to ask of Arya, but Wynafryd wouldn't answer. There was banging on the door. They were already demanding to see her, more voices demanding Sansa answer their questions. Wynafryd reluctantly dragged her downstairs, back into the chaos.

So many unknown figures all boomed across the Merman's Court, she could hardly make sense of it. She answered what little she could, and listened to what little she could understand. Sansa caught fragments of words being yelled, like "wildlings", "treachery", and "battle". At some point, Wylla left the hall, trembling.

So much information she had to digest quickly. Wildlings south of the Wall; the north caught in a civil war and an invasion. Mercenaries amassing on the roseroad against King's Landing, and a storm in Oldtown. The northern coalition, the Bolton ambush. King Snow fighting a battle in the snows, and the only raven White Harbour received said that the wildlings had taken the castle.

"Send her off to Winterfell," she heard Lord Wyman proclaim later towards dusk. The grossly fat lord looked sickly, wheezing for breath. Wynafryd was still clutching on to Sansa's arm, but the daughter of White Harbour was crying too. "King Snow must know."

There had already been a supply convoy set for Winterfell, to bring arms and food that were said to be sorely needed in the wake of the battle. Sansa was to go along with it.

Less than a day later, there was a wheelhouse rumbling into the castle's courtyard, and a small force of mounted men were very hurriedly trying to push her on her way. To Sansa's mild surprise, Wynafryd came too, along with her sister, Wylla, and their weeping mother. Wylla Manderly was older than Sansa remembered – she was now nearly a woman grown, still with that green hair tied into a braid, but her eyes were fierce. Wynafryd tried to comfort Sansa, but Wylla glared suspiciously at her. Sansa saw Wylla snapping at her mother, crying and hissing angrily as they were shoved into the carriage. They loaded the wheelhouse to the brim with tents and supplies, loaded for urgency rather than comfort.

"We are to go to Winterfell with all haste. The snows could soon seize the roads, and we must get through before they do," a plump, fresh-faced knight explained from outside the wheelhouse – Ser Mardrick Manderly. "Winterfell has been taken, my – my lady."

_They didn't know the honorific to use_, Sansa noted. There had been many who called her an imposter, or a traitor. They needed King Snow's judgement, and Lord Wyman didn't think White Harbour was secure. Still, the news of Winterfell made her heart flutter. "What of my sister?" Sansa demanded. "What of Arya Stark?"

The look on his face told her everything she needed to know. _Oh. _"I… I am sorry, my lady."

_Oh. _Sansa knew that it should have hurt, but, honestly, she was just too numb to even feel anything. _Three years, _she thought, _it's been three years since I've even last seen Arya. My sister was wed and murdered without me even knowing._

Wynafryd was chattering – jabbering in the way nervous young ladies did – but Sansa just felt too cold.
The last time I saw Wynafryd, she thought numbly, she was only a few years older, but she was so kind. We ate lemon cakes, we danced and played with each other. She showed me how to stitch a merman. I begged Father to let Wynafryd stay, but Lord Wyman... was Lord Wyman looking for a match? Did Father turn him down? We hugged, and Wynafryd promised to return often and I thought Wynafryd a better sister than the one I had.

Looking back, Sansa wished she could have slapped herself.

They were escorted by a half a hundred knights and men-at-arms, along with twenty, thirty wayns filled with supplies and pulled by oxen. There still heavy snows around the barrowlands, but their escort pushed the beasts hard to make good time. She could feel the wheelhouse buffeting in the winds, the snows howling outside. The worst of the storm had past, but several times Ser Mardrick shouted from his horse outside the wheelhouse, warning that their convoy might well be left stranded until the weather broke.

Sansa half-expected that they would be trapped, as if the gods themselves were intervening to stop her from seeing Winterfell again. Still, the sturdy horses managed to push their way through, and the wheelhouse rattled on through the snow.

The wheelhouse wasn't very big; it felt like a coffin, and their escort a funeral procession. All of the occupants braced themselves in uneasy silence. She barely said a word unless spoken to. Wynafryd held her mother's hand, but Wylla just glared at them all and huddled in the corner.

Finally, they were on the trade road following the White Knife and she was told they were only two, three days away, but Sansa couldn't see through the haze of snow. They stopped at a minor Woolfield holdfast briefly, but the other nights they slept in tents and in the wheelhouse on the road. Ser Mardrick pushed their way forward even past dusk, for as long as the horses and oxen would allow.

They weren't heading towards the kingsroad, Sansa noted. She had had expected them to cross the White Knife. "The Cerwyn lands to the west of the White Knife are not secure," Ser Mardrick explained when she asked. "We will take the coming roads through Hornwood lands instead, and cross near Peddler's Crossing. Slightly longer, but we will keep the river to our left."

That route would also take them very close to Bolton lands, but she was told that the armies had already passed through. It all belonged to the King Snow now. The journey was long and uncomfortable – Ser Mardrick refused to stop for anything more than the bare minimum, and snows didn't cease. They passed through a few villages, but Sansa saw nothing but barred doors and snow-smeared thatch houses.

To the very end of the third day, they finally reached the crossing, and the men needed to drag the wayns over the uneven and cracked stone bridge. They made camp near the frozen water, and she was told that Winterfell was less than a day away, though she couldn't recognise anything through the flurry. Early the next morning, as the wheelhouse rocked, Wynafryd suggested that she needed to dress herself for meeting her half-brother again, and Sansa just nodded.

She approached the trunk of lady's clothing slowly, and picked her dress in the same way a knight would choose his armour.

Sansa clad herself in white fur and silver. The cloak was like none other she had ever seen; a thick, white and rich white that was so heavy and warm it was nearly suffocating as it draped over her shoulders. It was a gift that the wildlings brought to House Manderly; the furs of a snow bear from beyond the Wall, one that could stand twelve feet tall, Sansa was told, but she struggled to imagine it.
Her dress was white samite with a light saffron lining, and Wynafryd braced the corset up so tightly it was suffocating, while Sansa braided her hair in silver hairnet. She had spent a while staring at herself in the looking mirror. She looked beautiful, with her bright red hair and pale face, but also older, more mature. All Sansa could think about was how much she looked like her mother.

That could have been a thought of pride, once, but now there was nothing but sadness. I am Lady Stark now.

The final leg of the journey felt so tense it was suffocating. Wynafryd ran out of things to say, and her mother wouldn't stop sniffling. They all sat in uneasy silence against the wheelhouse's jostling, the windows shuttered against the gale.

I will see my bastard brother today, she thought. Perhaps I will see a dragon too. She had heard all of the talk, but she still couldn't match the words to the Jon Snow she remembered. Still, there was no running or hiding now, and no matter what happened Sansa resolved that she would be ready for it.

The coach had trundled over the snowy roads for miles, and then finally she heard the sound of clattering wheels as they hit the cobbledstones of Winterfell's road. The winter town, she remembered. That was where the cobbles began. The wheels clattered as fast as her heartbeat. Sansa wanted to stick her head out of the window to see Winterfell again, but she couldn't trust herself to look. She kept the windows firmly shuttered against the howling winds.

Even when the coach stopped in the courtyard, it took several deep breaths to compose herself before she opened the door. The Manderly knights trumpeted her arrival. The snow hissed around her face, and Sansa's first sight was of the dark and cold walls standing high, icicles hanging like swords.

By the Seven... Winterfell looks so different. There was smoke in the air, and tents had been erected all over the yard. The thick oak of the East Gate had been smashed through, torn from its hinges, splinters scattered in the snows. The towers had collapsed, the guest house was a burnt-out ruin, the Guards Hall looked destroyed and crudely rebuilt, and absolutely everywhere rubble, arrows and debris littered the courtyard. Winterfell looked burnt, broken and turned savage.

"My apologies, my lady," Ser Mardrick said with a grimace. "The battle is still fresh, there was fighting here not a week past and they have not disposed of... well, please avert your eyes."

Sansa could have snorted. There is no need to hide the corpses from me, ser, she thought.

If she had thought New Castle was in shambles, then Winterfell felt like a broken ruin. There were tents and bonfires sprawled over the snowy courtyards – an army camped in the grounds outside rather than inside the castle.

Sansa had resolved herself, promised herself, that she wouldn't flinch, gasp or turn away no matter what she saw. She had heard all of the rumours, all the whispers, and she vowed that she would face them all without a flinch. That promise became very hard to keep to keep when she saw the massive beasts of brown fur, muscle and tusks lumbering in the courtyard.

Mammoths. Giants and their mammoths, camping outside the Great Keep of Winterfell itself. They were the biggest creatures she had ever seen. Many of the White Harbour knights stared open-mouthed at the sight, staring at the immense humanoids towering over them. Sansa forced herself not to gape. One of the giants roared when a mounted knight trotted too close, a cracking wail splitting the air as it stomped its huge foot. The knight's horse reared back, sending the man tumbling into the drifts.

This is a different place now, she thought, staring at it all. The wildlings and the Bastard King rule Winterfell now. Where is the dragon, though?

The stairs of the keep were so familiar from her childhood, but she had never seen them smeared in dried and cracked blood. They had never felt so cold either. So many of the windows were broken. The hissing snows were all around them, the Manderly knights escorting them in a tight procession. Sansa saw the eyes of wildlings glaring suspiciously at them. White Harbour brought food and aid, but they still look at them like they're the enemy.

Wynafryd clung to her arm tightly. "Welcome home," she croaked under her breath into her ear. Sansa didn't reply.

Despite how she kept her posture rigid, her heart was beating wildly as they escorted her into the hall. The men lingering the corridors to the Great Hall weren't knights; they were rough figures in hides, and they all kept spears or axes close to hand. The battle may have been a week ago, she thought quietly, but there has been fighting here, more recently than that.

"Lady Sansa Stark of Winterfell!" the crier called, when the great doors of oak and iron opened. "For her half-brother, King Jon Snow of the North!"

The Great Hall. It had once been so familiar, now it felt so foreign. The rafters along the roof were charred – it looked like it had been burnt and then repaired. Once there had been eight long trestle tables that could seat five hundred people, but now those tables were gone and every man inside was standing up, and armed.

A hundred eyes were on her. She heard the mutters, but the cavernous hall still felt quiet. Her gaze turned upwards to the raised platform at the hall's far end, where her father had once supped with noble guests. The lord's table was gone, and now there were a score of savage figures that had to be wildling chieftains. There were few lords, but she did recognise Lord Greatjon Umber, who looked so much thinner, and darker, than her memories. His arms were folded, his face a scowl.

Looming over them all, there was only one who was sitting. He is sitting on father's seat, she realised suddenly. On Winterfell's throne of ironwood, weirwood and steel; a thing of silver and white and dull grey looming over the hall – the seat of the old Kings of Winter. He was sitting on her father's throne.

Her eyes focused solely on the dark figure, looking down on her. A figure with white hair, slouched on the weirwood seat, resting one cheek on a closed fist. Staring at her. That is not Jon, Sansa thought instantly. Gods… It is an imposter stealing Jon's name. For that moment, she wasn't sure whether to be horrified or relieved. She let nothing show on her face.

She stepped forward, walking the distance. Her eyes never left his, her mind reeling. So long had been spent preparing for this moment, bracing herself. So a wildling king must have stolen Jon's identity to trick the northern lords into supporting him? It made sense – Jon must have died at the Wall, few people would recognise Jon in any case, and claiming to be a bastard of Ned Stark gave the imposter some legitimacy.

But that means he will likely have me killed if I expose him, she realised. Perhaps this king was panicking, expecting that his ruse could now be foiled. Perhaps that was why his soldiers were so tense, holding their weapons so close. He will expect me to call him a fake, to denounce him.

So what is his plan here? To kill me? To name me an imposter instead?
She kept on walking towards the stranger, feeling the air stiffen around her. No, she thought. Neither of those options were very good. The Bastard King had already won. So what if I don't? What if I verify his identity instead, and greet him like a brother?

Sansa could pretend to greet him like a brother – she could even greet him with more kindness than she had ever shown the real Jon.

Her head spun, deliberating a hundred different possibilities with every step. Yes, Sansa thought. I will be useful to him. Telling the truth would gain her nothing, so she would have to go along with his ruse. She would treat as if he really were her brother, and he would pretend too. Sansa would become indispensable to the wildling king, the perfect way to maintain his act, so long as he treated her as if she was his kin.

He would become reliant on her, on her lie, and she would have power over him. She felt relieved – she felt like she had a plan, she felt she had control.

She walked closer, measuring the man up. His posture was slouched, but tensed and wary. His mouth pursed, his eyes narrowed. The white hair gave his dark eyes and pale skin a ghostly look. Definitely not Jon, Sansa thought surely. This wildling king is too old.

Her footsteps ticked across the hall. The King Snow wore black – a thick black shadowskin cloak and dark grey chainmail underneath. White hair against black clothes, clashing with her red hair against a white cloak. He is handsome, Sansa decided, in a grim and well-worn way. His face was too gaunt and his eyes too dark to be typically good-looking, but he had good cheeks and a strong chin. Maybe he could even look fair, if he smiled. Perhaps she'd be able to seduce him, but it was too soon to make that decision.

Sansa was already rehearsing what she would say. 'Jon! My brother, it's truly you!', perhaps, and then her voice would crack as if she was about to cry. She was still debating on whether she would break down in tears, or if she would rush to hug him. Or maybe she would bow, that might be better – the respectful, emotional sister. It was all about making the right impression, particularly to those watching.

She was close enough to see his eyes. He looked restless, with dark bags under his eyes and lines at the corners. He had grey eyes. Sansa paused, and a flicker of a frown fell over her face.

No, she thought firmly. The memory of the raven-haired youth flashed across her gaze. The hair, the face… it definitely wasn't Jon.

She stepped closer, trying to trace his features. No…

The King Snow stood upwards, staggering slightly. Her eyes glanced to his leg. He didn't step forward to meet her, but he bowed his head in a polite, respectful nod.

Jon?!

Sansa could only stare. Her whole body froze. Neither of them spoke. There was something in his gaze, as if he were greeting a ghost.

"Lady Stark," the king greeted, and his voice choked slightly. "Sansa."

Her mouth opened, and for once she didn't know how to reply. "You… Your Grace," Sansa stammered finally. She didn't bow.

That moment stretched out for what felt like an eternity. Neither of them said a word after that, just looking at each other like strangers.

Chapter End Notes

Author Notes:

Well, this chapter has been something of a pain to write. Originally, this chapter and the next were a single one but, for various reasons, I had to cut them into two. As such, expect chapter 36 to be coming very quickly.
Chapter 36

Jon

He broke his fast on dried, salted bacon, and a turnip he snatched from one of his men. Hardly the feast of kings, but it was all so hectic that Jon had to eat while walking.

Outside, around the steps of the Great Keep, he could see the castle stirring. Crowds of men were slowly moving through the main hall. Jon lingered at the edge of the balcony, half-hiding out of the way as he watched.

The stitches on his side were bleeding again. Jon could feel the blood welling in the wound, threatening to dribble down his torso, under the furs. His side felt fit to scream, every time he moved his leg.

There were footsteps behind him. Tormund Giantsbane walked with his arms folded, his white beard speckled with snow. "Snow!" Tormund called for him, keeping his voice low. "We're ready for you, Snow."

Tormund looked at him expectantly, but there was nothing more to be said. Jon was already walking away, wincing so badly with each step he walked lopsided. Tormund stuck closely by his side, heavy footsteps next to his. Ever since the battle, over the course of a long, long week, the number of men that Jon could actually rely on had fallen to single-digits.

The castle was simmering. Jon knew that Tormund's raiders would all be on high-alert, watching for any moves to cause disturbance, on any side. Jon just felt stiff as he limped down the steps.

Every man they passed had a white stone on his chest. Without the Dragonguard, Jon had been forced to rely on men of the Cult of the Dragon to secure the Great Keep and the godswood. It wasn't the most reliable protection, but it was the closest thing Jon had.

This has to be done now, he told himself. Even over a week after the Battle of the Snows, they were struggling to pick up the pieces.

The mood in the Great Hall was sombre, tense. He saw the Greatjon glowering at the edge of the throne, while Tormund took the other side. Jon needed Toregg's help just to climb up the stairs, and he couldn't help but breathe a deep sigh of relief when he removed the weight from his legs.

It was a sign of weakness, he knew. Jon was still injured, he hadn't slept in days, and the vultures were everywhere.

"Snow," the Greatjon muttered to him. "We need to—"

"Did you find them?" Jon said sharply.

Lord Umber hesitated. "Aye," he replied. "We got them."

"All of them?"
"They're in chains now."

"Then bring the first one in," Jon ordered.

The whole castle was still reeling from the battle, but Jon couldn't let the tensions simmer. Every man, every chieftain, highborn or commander that could still walk had crowded into the hall. He saw hundreds of eyes filling the hall and flooding the podiums, all staring at him.

The room was still. All those gazes, they felt accusing.

No, Jon thought. This has to be done now. They need to see justice.

His army had nearly been destroyed by sabotage, distrust and treachery. The recent White Harbour reinforcements helped, but tensions remained. The anger was still dangerously high, still volatile.

The guilty needed to be punished, that was certain. They needed order again. Jon had agreed to hold the trials in the way of the free folk – where the accused would be walked through a public forum, and the chieftain would pass judgement openly, before the whole clan. Everyone could air their grievances, witnesses could come forward, and justice would be done, for all to see.

Four men-at-arms pounded spears against stone. The doors opened, and Jon heard the rattle of chains as Robett Glover was walked through.

He was wearing chains, frogmarched at spearpoint, but he didn't lower his gaze. His brother, Galbart Glover, Master of Deepwood Motte, walked behind him. Galbart wasn't wearing chains, but the men-at-arms still shadowed him closely.

There was a long pause, as they stood before Jon. A few wildlings in the crowd jeered, but others hushed them silent. Robett met Jon's gaze, while Galbart was staring at the ground.

Both brothers had been accused, in days past, but Robett was the only one on trial now. He held himself well, for a man facing death. "Guilty, Your Grace," Robett said, his voice gruff and loud. Galbart's shoulders were shaking.

Jon wasn't surprised. There was little for him to deny, and scores of witnesses. Robett had been the commander of their outriders, and all the outriders had reported that Robett had deliberately sent them away, letting the Boltons strike without warning. Robett had claimed it had been the king's orders – for the scouts to move south urgently to search for a missing caravan. There had been nobody on the plains to blow the warhorns when the Bolton army came through.

Still. Justice had to be seen to be done, for all to see.

"You willingly and knowingly participated in the Bolton attack?" Jon demanded.

"I… I abused my duty. I was ordered to clear the scouts, and I did." His eyes were hard. "I stood back, but I did not raise my blade against any man. I had no part in the violence, I committed no murder."

"I do not see the difference. Men died by your actions. You must have known the ambush was coming, did you not?"
"Only hours before it arrived," Robett explained dourly. "There was another man, called himself Gregor, but others knew him by different names. I only knew that he worked for House Bolton. He was pretending to be one of your soldiers. He tapped me on the shoulder and ordered me to do it, and stood by acting like my guard as I did."

"You were not forced." That dark growl was the Greatjon, his eyes bulging. "Do not claim to be a victim here."

"I was not," Robett admitted. "I could have overpowered the man, or alerted others of him. And yet the Boltons had my wife and children, Your Grace. I received the first threat from him months ago – telling me they wouldn't be harmed so long as I followed instructions when they came. Otherwise, my wife Sybelle, my son Gawen, my daughter Erena – they would have been flayed alive."

Jon shifted in his seat, glaring. "That is your excuse, for condemning many more to certain death? You allowed the Bolton army to ambush us without warning – a warning that would have saved lives."

"Aye." He gulped. "And it did save lives. It saved my family."

There were rumbles in the crowd. Robett grit his teeth and pushed forward. "I did not think the ambush would be so bad! I expected a raiding party, or something that the bulwarks would have held against. I did not think the attack I allowed could have threatened us, not with the dragon."

"You believed treachery would be inconsequential?" The Greatjon stomped his foot. Others in the hall were muttering accusations too.

Robett nodded. "But that is an excuse. I am guilty – I knew the crime and I committed it." He took another deep breath. "And I would do so again. They honoured their deal. I thought my family would be doomed, but they are still alive."

Jon believed him. He held himself with honour – he had prepared and resigned himself to this. Jon looked to a northmen serjeant, and the man nodded. "We received word from Deepwood Motte," the serjeant admitted. "Sybelle, Gawen and Erena Glover have all been released unharmed. Roose Bolton did honour the deal." Damn him.

"Were you aware of any other traitors in the camp?" Jon demanded of Robett Glover.

"I was not. I thought I was the only one."

"And what of your brother?"

"He had naught to do with it." Robett's voice turned sharp. "Lord Bolton lied on that count. I hid the blackmail from Galbart, I was ashamed. My brother didn't know anything."

The letters that Lord Bolton had said otherwise, but they had found no witnesses to implicate the elder Glover brother as well. The parchments, the handwriting and the seal could well be forged. Lord Bolton had reason to lie, Jon reminded himself, to try and trick me into persecuting innocents as well.

The crowd was chanting. The northmen were more reserved in their judgement, but for the wildlings it was clear. Damn him, Jon cursed. It would be easier if Robett was cowardly, and yet he held himself with honour. Too many had died that night because of him, Jon couldn't do anything less. He knew the mood in his castle; there would be riots if he pulled back in judgement now.
"For the lives of your family, you knowingly condemned thousands of others. Robett Glover. I sentence you to death."

Galbart looked ready to fall apart, shaking and trying to restrain himself. There was no outburst, just a hard and grim nod from Robett.

An honourable sentence, Jon remembered saying those words. He would swing the blade himself, he had promised, and his family would be protected and provided for. Robett didn't respond.

"His brother is just as guilty as he is," Rattleshirt growled to Jon. "They planned it together, they must have. The man knows he's dead, but he can still lie to save his brother."

"We have no evidence against Galbart," Jon said. He turned to the men in the hall, and raised his voice slightly. "But neither will Galbart Glover walk free. He will remain in Winterfell, under supervision. Robett Glover's family will be brought to Winterfell too, to remain as hostages. I will take many of the lands sworn to Deepwood Motte, and give them to distinguished warriors of the free folk. House Glover will rue its betrayal, I promise you."

Rattleshirt was still fuming – the Lord of Bones had lost more men than anyone trying to hold the bulwarks against the surprise attack. Jon wondered how many others would agree with Rattleshirt's assessment of Galbart.

Jon just felt numb. That look in Galbart's eyes haunted him. Still, it wasn't over. No weakness, not now. The spears thudded again, and the next traitor was brought through.

Brandon Norrey of Clan Norrey still had defiance in his eyes, spitting against the men who escorted him. He was brought along with three of his sons, and two other leaders within Clan Norrey. One of the men spat "Fucking wildlings!" into the hall.

Jon had hoped Lord Norrey's sentence would be easier. Clan Norrey had worked with the Boltons more than most; helping to smuggle Bolton men in the camp. Several of Clan Norrey had dressed themselves in furs, pretending to be of Rattleshirt's warband, and they had executed the ambush against the giants. Afterwards, The Norrey had started screaming to the clansmen that the wildlings had betrayed them, and many otherwise loyal men had believed him.

His charges were levelled against him, and Brandon Norrey spat on the floor and said, "Aye, I did it."

"What did the Boltons offer you?" Jon demanded.

"Protection. The north," he turned to glare at the Greatjon. "We loved the Ned, we owed him much and more, but not this. Never this. You are all fools if you think those wildlings can be trusted. They are savages, rapers and murderers and you – Lord Umber, you should know that better than most."

"Just looking at some of Snow's savages sickens me," the Greatjon growled at the man. "But you're the goddamned fool, Norrey, if you think the Boltons are any better."

"This bastard, the Ned's little girl—!" The Norrey's eyes widened fit to bulging, he almost shrieked in fury. He struggled and writhed and spat curses until a man-at-arms laid him low, with a punch to the gut.

"I've heard enough," Jon announced, his voice hard. "For your crimes, Brandon Norrey of Clan Norrey, you are sentenced to death. I declare your clan attainted. Your sons shared in your crime, and will share your fate."
His sons screamed protests, but they would share their father's sentence. They'd willingly assisted in their father's betrayal. Their entire clan would be stripped of their holdings, their fief given to the free folk. The Norrey didn't flinch when Jon passed his judgement, but his sons wept. "And what of his crimes!" He slammed his finger at Rattleshirt. "How can you punish me, you bastard, and turn a blind eye on the crimes of those around you?"

"The free folk have renounced their old ways," Jon said, raising his voice to cut off any defiance, "Their days of raiding smallfolk will never come again, and they received amnesty for all past crimes when they crossed the Wall."

"You say that?" The Norrey howled, stepping forward. The men-at-arms had to stop him. "You dare to say that! My daughters! Two little girls of twelve and eight!" He tried to lunge forward, squirming against the grip. "They were raped and mutilated by a wildling in an armour of bones!

Jon paused, posture cracking slightly. By his left, Rattleshirt's eyes narrowed, but he didn't object to the accusation. That was the reason Clan Norrey had been against him from the start? Dammit. I did not know that.

It can't make a difference, Jon told himself. There was nothing he could do. Nearly all of the wildlings raiders had kills to their name, and were many who'd stolen women. If I punish Rattleshirt, I'd have to punish a thousand others.

Still, Jon's eyes lingered on Rattleshirt for just a moment longer. "… They received full amnesty," Jon said finally.

"YOU BLOODY BASTARD!" Brandon Norrey shrieked. "You fucking bloody bastard! They were my girls! It only happened a year ago! He butchered them! He's wearing their fucking ribcages around his fucking waist!"

Jon winced. Rattleshirt's armour, Jon remembered vaguely, was made out of the bones of the people that he'd killed.

They had to drag The Norrey away, still spitting curses as his sons struggled, or wept. His clansmen will have to stew in the prison cells, Jon decided. The mountain clans were different, their loyalty to their lord was stronger than most – a loyalty more akin to that of family, rather than house. Jon would take the guilty's heads, but others could well kill themselves trying to take vengeance. Still, there was nothing else he could do. Clan Norrey had knowingly, wilfully, betrayed them all, and they would pay the price. From root to stem, if need be.

The Greatjon had to excuse himself, he was shaking with rage. The Lord of Bones smiled hesitantly. "Huh. Never knew who their father was," Rattleshirt admitted sheepishly, before resigning himself to the very back of the room. Jon's glare followed him. Damn him.

The others in the clan, first cousins and lesser relations, were questioned further, cross-referencing with the stories of other traitors. They answered the same as Robett did; none of them knew of any other traitors in the camp – as far as each had been aware, they had been the only Bolton spies. A hundred little mice, scurrying about, each thinking that they were alone in the world.

It wasn't over. The spears thumped again, and more traitors were brought out.

Lord Cregan Karstark was brought out, even though he was one who Lord Bolton hadn't named. Cregan Karstark stood in front of the hall, and Jon called for testimonies from men who had been near Karstark during the battle.
Nobody was quick to step forward. As far anybody could tell, the Karstark men hadn't betrayed them. When the battle happened, the Karstark men had fought 'loyally' to the coalition.

Of course they did, Jon thought. Cregan Karstark's loyalty is clearly tenuous, but Roose Bolton would have known we'd be suspicious of him. The Boltons hadn't even tried to bring House Karstark into their scheme.

Jon dismissed the unsupported charges, and Cregan left without a sentence. Still, Cregan glared at Jon darkly as he was walked away. Arnolf Karstark, Cregan's father, had fought and died for House Bolton during the battle. Cregan Karstark may not be a traitor, not this time, Jon thought sourly, but he's no friend. Lord Karstark's guard won't be disappearing anytime soon.

Four more 'trials' followed; each one of them very guilty. Lord Ethan Whitehill stood accused of smuggling Bolton men into the camp and sneaking supplies through White Harbour; Mandon Slate, heir to Blackpool, and his men were accused of setting fires in the camp, Lord Hoster Moss accused of assaulting free folk patrols, and Old Torghen Flint accused of deliberately spreading discord.

Lord Moss was the only one who tried to deny his charges, claiming he never knew what his men were doing. The others pled the same as Robett when they admitted to the charges; that they didn't know that anybody else was involved in the plan. Roose Bolton recruited traitors to raise havoc in the camp, and didn't tell any of them who else was in the scheme; none of them that could point the finger at anybody else.

It had been nothing short of masterful, the way the Boltons had organised them.

And each one had their own reasons; Lord Whitehill was fuelled by suspicion of Jon and the new religion that the wildlings brought, Mandon Slate feared for his family, while Old Torghen Flint had just spent too long fighting wildlings to ever abide them. Not a single one had betrayed them for greed or personal ambition. They had been fuelled by fear – or by duty, as they understood it.

Jon shifted in his seat. The sentences would remain the same; they would all be executed. Regardless of their reasons, it could not be forgiven.

"There were more than this, you know that, right?" Tormund muttered to Jon quietly after Lord Moss was dragged away weeping. "I don't know who, but I was in that camp. There were far more saboteurs in that camp than what we're seeing now."

"I know," Jon replied, his voice a whisper. "Not all the betrayers are with us; there are more trials to be had. Ondrew Locke, Malcolm Woolfield, Mors Umber and Lyessa Flint must stand trial." Jon shook his head, remembering that night. "And other traitors likely would have died in the snows. We can only guess how many."

Still, they had only managed to 'catch' the traitors that were very obviously guilty – so many others had managed to slip away in the confusion. If there aren't witnesses that can finger them, Jon knew, then everybody else will deny being involved to their dying breath.

Roose Bolton knew it too. The letters. Jon suspected that Lord Bolton had honestly confessed as to who the actual traitors were, but had also thrown a few other names in there for good measure. Many more, perhaps. Enough to muddy the waters, to make everything a bit more doubtful and to spread as much suspicion as possible. If Jon were to punish everyone that Lord Bolton had named, there would hardly be an army left to command.

Trying to sort out the lies from the truth was the hardest part. Damn him. Damn him.
Perhaps harsh interrogation of the maesters would yield some answers, but Jon had his doubts. Everything he had found so far was indicating a higher influence coordinating them all. Strangely, Jon thought of Luwin. Would he have opposed me too?

It was already getting late, but he could hardly tell through the thick storm clouds that were beginning to rumble once more outside. Jon was sitting tense in his seat, so upright he might snap. He had to force himself to stay stoic.

The spears thumped again, and the last traitor was brought out. Jon's stomach lurched, while the men in the hall shifted.

Lady Leona Manderly was weeping, tears staining her yellow dress. She was a plump, homely woman with blond hair that was now more like a straw heap. Her eyes were red, bloodshot. She looked so haggard, her face somehow both flushed and ghostly pale with snot dribbling down her chin. She could barely breathe, she had to be half-carried, half-pushed. Last he had saw her, Lady Leona had been poised and well-dressed, however nervous, but now she looked like a wreck.

Both her daughters, Wynafyrd and Wylla, entered with her – the daughters weren't on trial, only the mother was. Wynafyrd, sharp-eyed with long braided hair, supported her mother as they walked, arms wrapped around her mother's. The younger daughter, Wylla, followed behind from a short distance. From the red in their eyes and their cheeks, both girls had been crying.

I had to do it, Jon cursed. He had already promised that all traitors among them would be tried publicly. And then another traitor arrived along with the convoy from White Harbour, the day before. This one is a mother where the others were fathers, but it can't make a difference.

"Lady Leona Manderly, of House Woolfield," Jon said, taking a deep breath. Give me strength. The hall turned quieter that it had been. "You are accused of treason and conspiring with the enemy. How do you plead?"

She was too busy sobbing, her daughter had to shake her to respond, before croaking out the words. "G-Guilty, Your Grace."

They would never have even discovered Leona's treachery, if she hadn't broken down and confessed it all herself in a fit of weeping panic, in the aftermath of the assault on White Harbour. She had been working with Lord Bolton from the New Castle itself. Ever since the Manderly maester was arrested, Lady Leona and the castellan had taken over the maester's duties at the ravenry. And then, every letter that the city had sent out, Lady Leona made a copy of, and relayed it to Winterfell.

The Boltons had a spy in White Harbour all along, passing information straight to Winterfell.

And of all the names that Lord Bolton had admitted to, Leona's hadn't been among them, Jon remembered. Lord Bolton hadn't given her up. Perhaps he thought we would never have believed it.

"Tell me what you did, Lady Leona," Jon ordered, though he already knew.

"I…” Leona sniffled. "I forwarded ravens to Winterfell, Your Grace."

"How many?"

"I do not… I don't know. As many that concerned you, I was told to forward anything that could be useful," she croaked. "The castellan would log the parchments, I made a copy."
"You were working with the Boltons?" She shakily nodded. "Did Roose Bolton approach you with a deal? Did they hold a hostage over you?"

She shook her head, still sniffing. "I approached him. I sent a message to Winterfell."

There were stirs in the crowd. "Why?"

"I… I…" the woman looked like ruin, barely able to stammer out the words. "I just wanted…" she gulped, between sobs. "I wanted to protect m-my family."

The Greatjon stepped forward, looming imposingly. "You fucking what?"

Her eldest daughter, Wynafryd, moved to cover her mother against the Greatjon defiantly, as if the Greatjon could charge the woman at any moment. Wylla just lingered back, her eyes wide and twitching. "It's…" Leona stammered from behind her, looking everywhere but at Jon. "You don't understand! It was only a few letters!"

"Those letters gave away all of our troop movements, my lady," Jon said darkly. "The Boltons knew exactly when and where we were coming."

Even from the beginning, Lord Bolton had known straight away of absolutely every alliance Jon was trying to make, every troop movement, every order he had given. At a certain point, Jon thought fouilly, it must have become easy for him.

"I…" she was gasping. Her head was swivelling desperately, looking for help from the crowd, but finding none. All glared at her. The air was thick with condemnation. "It was… my husband. My children. I… I…" Tears in her eyes. Jon wished he could scream at her to stop crying and face him. "I didn't want…"

"Your husband was with that bloody army!" a White Harbour knight shouted to mutters of agreement. Ser Mardrick, from a branch of House Manderly. Jon couldn't bring himself to speak. "You put him at risk!"

"No, I… no…" Leona looked ready to keel over. "I made a deal," she gasped finally. "He promised he wouldn't hurt my husband… my family… if I helped him."

Damn him. DAMN HIM.

Wylla Manderly started trembling, fists clenched. Voices murmured accusingly. It was a lame excuse, but Jon knew the real reason she had done it. "You don't understand!" Leona wailed, after a passing of moments. She was weeping, insensate. "They said that he would be safe, but they said he would be safe with Robb Stark too! I lost my husband for nearly a year at that horrible place – he could have died at the Twins! My girls lost their father! I couldn't, I couldn't take it…"

"Mother…" Wynafryd whispered, moving to hold her. Wylla didn't step close, she didn't budge. The daughters were both crying, but their expressions were so different.

"It was only some letters," Leona cried. "I didn't think it would make any difference – not with a dragon, we were going to win regardless – but just in case!" She gasped for breath. "Just in case we didn't win. Just in case the… the dragon betrayed us…!" She shrieked the words, finally managing to stare at Jon. Her eyes were filled with pure fear. "They said that the wildlings couldn't be trusted, and I… Lord Wyman was gambling everything, but I… just in case it didn't go, I wanted to give my family a safety net!"

The fool. Damn him and damn her. "That's all it was, just a safety net. Just in case. But it didn't really matter!" Leona insisted. "It shouldn't have made any difference at all, because, well, the dragon!"

*I saw her, Jon thought softly. I saw her, I noticed how disturbed she was. I was just too busy to even focus on her. Leona had thought victory with Sonagon was guaranteed, so therefore her own betrayal would be inconsequential. And Lord Bolton would have encouraged that mindset, wouldn't he?

If that was the attitude within my army, then no wonder Lord Bolton screwed me.

"They were burning septs!" Leona pleaded, her voices nearly nonsensical through the panic. "The wildl– the free folk were burning septs and worshipping dragons! They said that they were sacrificing men to the dragon, bleeding men to the trees, and there were so many horror stories, and…" She collapsed to the ground, taking deep gulps of air like she could barely breathe. "I just wanted to protect my husband!"

Jon winced. Wynafryd moved to support her mother, but something snapped in the air.

"You killed him!" Wylla Manderly screamed, recoiling back. She was pointing her arm at her own mother, her slight frame quivering. "You killed father, you killed father!"

Leona Manderly stiffened, trembling, as she stared wide-eyed at her daughter. Leona would have fallen to her knees, if not for Wynafryd holding her half-upright. The mother was sobbing, and Wylla was still screaming. "YOU KILLED FATHER, YOU–!"

"Take her away!" Jon slammed his fist on the throne's arm.

Wylla was shrieking all the while that Toregg dragged her from the Great Hall. The young woman's red and wide eyes locked on Jon, thrashing in grief and rage. "Kill her, kill her, KILL HER…!"

The doors slammed shut, and Jon could only feel a bone-deep exhaustion, while the men in the Great Hall muttered amongst themselves, a low chorus of voices.

Leona Manderly and her daughters had only discovered that Ser Wylis was dead after they arrived in Winterfell. They had come to bring their mother to trial, and discovered on arrival that their father was dead. Nobody had put it to writing, the maesters were all in chains. No one had even told Lord Wyman yet.

Jon's head felt like it was spinning. Focus. Do not let yourself be moved just because she's crying.
"Did Ser Wylis know of your actions?" Jon demanded, but she was on the floor in hysterics.
"Answer the question; did Ser Wylis know?"

"No! He would never, he…" Her voice stammered, breaking down into wheezy gasps and sobs.
"… I didn't mean… I never wanted… Oh gods… I… I… I'm sorry, I never wanted…!"

"Did you ever meet with anyone else, any other conspirators, anyone working with the Boltons?"

She shook her head frantically. "It was only letters, it was only…!

"Did you ever send letters, anything concerning us, to anywhere other than Winterfell?* Like Braavos, or King's Landing?* He could feel the question churning in his gut, so violently he wanted to scream. Who else was Roose working with?

She shook her head, sobbing madly, and Jon stiffened. She knew nothing. She was just a tool.
The only sound in the room were her sobs. Nobody was chanting, not for her. She's a fool, Jon cursed. A traitor, but not a malicious one. Still, Leona's treachery had been more damaging than many of the others he had judged. Lord Bolton could never have planned his assault without her.

"… I cannot make final judgement at this time," Jon said finally. "I will withhold a sentence and deliberate for the time being. Lady Leona, you are excused for now. You will stay here, in the Great Keep, under guard."

She was such a wreck that the men had to carry her out. Wynafyrd's glare never left Jon's eyes. Even when all the others were moving away, the daughter of White Harbour, and new heir of the house, walked forward, and stood before Jon's throne. "I will not condone my mother's actions, Your Grace," Wynafryd said quietly, her voice thin, like a thread at the edge of breaking. "But you will not execute her."

"Lady Leona committed treason," Jon replied coldly. "Thousands may be dead because of her. Do you expect me to forgive that because she is a woman?"

"I expect you to treat her kindly because she is my mother." With that, Wynafryd pulled up her dress and walked away, her jaw clenched.

Jon could feel the weight of the eyes of those men, still in the hall, weighing on him. Judging him. "Lady Manderly," Jon called after her. She stilled, without turning. "Your grandfather sent your mother here to die. She was sent to Winterfell to be tried for treason, and Winterfell's punishment for treason is death." She turned then, eyes wide, staring at him as though she'd never seen him before.

No weakness, Jon reminded himself. All your fault, a mad voice howled.

"Even with your defence of her, even if your grandfather were here to speak for her, your mother's crimes are clear." Jon warned. "I will deliberate on a final judgement, I will speak with her further, but she will pay a price for her treason."

"I simply…" She gulped, nearly stammering. He could see the sweat beading on her brow, the paleness of her skin. Her whole body began to tremble. "I merely ask… Your Grace, that the punishment not be death. That… is all."

Jon slowly nodded, attempting to keep his voice hard. It was… difficult. He could feel his throat beginning to go hoarse from overuse. "You are dismissed, Lady Manderly." The hall slowly started to file away, and few left feeling satisfied. Jon just left numb. I will have to behead over a score of men on the morn. He would kill more men, so many more men in the executioner's yard than he had during the actual battle.

Sooner or later, Jon thought, I will have to pen a letter coursed for White Harbour, to inform Lord Wyman of his only son's death. He honestly couldn't even imagine the lord's reaction. His memories flashed, and he remembered the breaking of the Frey delegation, in the middle of the Merman's Court.

Jon could have screamed.

"Rattleshirt," Jon called to the wildling, one of the last men remaining in the hall.

"Aye?"

For a moment, Jon just stared at him, eyes glancing over suit of bones. "We will… speak with the other prisoners after the morn on the morrow. I want you there."

The Lord of Bones just grinned in a sickly way, and shuffled away.

Jon dropped out of that horrible weirwood throne and limped away as fast as his lopsided gait would take him, wincing with every step. Jon limped quickly up the stairs, Toregg on guard, passing the bloodstains on the walls.

He retreated to the lord's solar – his father's solar – but it wasn't over. It was already dusk, and the castle was still hectic. He heard the angry barks and snaps outside as the accused was escorted through the keep. There were knocks on the doors behind him, demanding attention. One more urgent issue to see to. One more judgement I must give, he thought hollowly, one more traitor.

Lord Bolton had kept a tankard of mulled wine under the desk. Jon yanked it and took a large gulp, just to calm his nerves. It tasted foul, nearly made him gag. "Bring him in," he ordered to Toregg, without turning.

This was one trial that Jon didn't dare hold in public, this one he had tried to keep as quiet as possible.

The Weeper barged through the solar door, spitting curses. Jon could feel his glare on his back, and he slowly turned. Tormund's men had escorted the Weeper, and the wildling warlord looked furious. Jon gave Tormund a look, and the door was shut.

"Boy," the Weeper spat, snow still coating his furs. "What the bloody hell is this?"

"Weeper." No weakness. Not here. "You stand accused of murder."

Behind him, Ser Alek of White Harbour crept through the doorway, his face pale and his eyes wide as he stared at the Weeper. The young knight was trembling slightly, Jon noticed.

The Weeper only snorted. "Oh bugger off, Snow."

Tormund and Jon shared a dark look."Do you deny it?" Jon growled. "You murdered Ser Wylis Manderly and over a dozen of his knights, Weeper."

"Snow," the Weeper said, like a talking to a child. "I murdered a lot of people that night. I helped win the bloody battle for you."

"There is killing, Weeper," Jon said. "And then there is murder."

Still, it was true – the Weeper had more than distinguished himself on the battlefield. Jon had heard that the Weeper nigh-singlehandedly broke the cavalry charge, and took their commander's, Ser Walder River's, head himself. He'd been one of the first men to breach through the gates of Winterfell. And yet, still, he committed murder too.

Ser Alek was standing as far away from the Weeper as the room would allow. The knight of the Dragonguard had been a wreck ever since the battle, ever since he had been the only survivor of that boathouse. The only Manderly man to survive, and the Weeper only spared him because Ser Alek wore a white dragon on his hauberk. "You took his head!" Ser Alek shouted. "Ser Wylis didn't do anything to you, he wasn't a traitor and you took his head!"

The Weeper snarled, snapping around. "I could have taken yours too, runt," he snapped. "Don't make me regret that one."
"Enough!" Jon barked, but his eyes were on the Weeper. He didn't have his scythe, and that was a small mercy. Jon couldn't even imagine how hard it must have been for Tormund and the Greatjon to confiscate the Weeper's weapon. "Tell me why, Weeper? Explain this to me."

The Weeper shrugged. Not even a hint of guilt. "I thought he was an enemy. I'm still not sure that he wasn't."

"Ser Wylis did not betray us."

"So you say. But his bloody wife did, didn't she?"

"There is no evidence against Ser Wylis." Jon's voice was a growl. He stepped forward, meeting the Weeper's mad eyes. "The Manderly knights fought loyally. White Harbour is our strongest ally. Why did you do it, Weeper? Walk me through it."

The Weeper's lips twisted. The whole room was tense; only Jon, Tormund and Ser Alek facing off against the Weeper. "It was a bloody battle, Snow," he said after a pause. "There were assassins, it was an ambush. You were missing, maybe dead – I didn't know. I saw there was a battle, and then folk screaming that the kneelers had betrayed us. So I grabbed my raiders, and I marched into the boathouse to demand what was going on."

Nobody spoke. The Weeper grunted. "That fat kneeler – Ser Wylis – he was there. His guards drew their swords when they saw me, but I decided to let that one pass. I walked straight up to him and demanded to know what was bloody going on, and then that fat man goes on and gives me this bloody smug, smartass reply."

"It wasn't a smug reply!" Ser Alek cried. "Wylis didn't know – he was actually asking! He said 'what are you talking about?!'"

"Well, it sounded smug to me," the Weeper grumbled. "At that point, I figured these kneelers were clearly responsible, so I handled it."

Jon stared speechless. "So… So Ser Wylis picked a poor choice of words," Jon said slowly, "and you decided to kill him for it."

"They could have been traitors, Snow," the Weeper said, with another shrug. "I didn't have a chance to find out for sure."

"They were not traitors, Weeper, and you murdered the heir to bloody White Harbour!"

"Fine." The raider rolled his eyes. "Let's say I believe that. Whatever. It was a battle, Snow, a bad one. Sometimes it happens. I'd reckon every single warrior out there has seen men stab at their allies in the dark, or shoot arrows at the wrong side. Sometimes you just get confused."

Jon wasn't even sure how to reply to that one. His mouth stammered. The thought of Lady Leona's desperate gulps for breath flashed before his eyes. "How many men died?" Jon asked finally, turning to Ser Alek.

"Fourteen," Ser Alek said instantly, glowering. "All knights of White Harbour, Ser Wylis' personal guard. There were six other raiders with the Weeper, but he still killed nine himself. He sliced them apart singlehanded."

"Aye," the Weeper agreed. "Those guys were fucking soft summer pansies."

Wylis' guard would have been the heirs, the second sons, of the most powerful Manderly bannermen. Ser Alek looked, half-crazed, ready to snap. Jon's head was spinning. "Are we done here, Snow?" the Weeper demanded. "I got a warband ready and waiting for me down there, and there are bunch of fleeing men that I ain't planning on letting get away."

"Weeper…" Jon said blankly, almost disbelieving. All our food, our weapons, our supplies, our allies… The wealthiest family in the north. "Can you truly not see how much of a problem this is?"

"I don't see a problem at all," the Weeper grunted. "If that fat fool's fatter father wants to take vengeance against me, then fine – let him try. I'll go to that bloody castle myself and explain why that'd be a poor idea."

Ser Alek looked horrified. He turned to Jon, begging. "Your Grace! He was the lord's son, my liege lord! I swore loyalty to you, but I swore myself to House Manderly too, and he…!" Ser Alek gulped. "Lord Wyman will demand – he deserves – justice!"

Jon hesitated. Damn him. "Ser…" he said slowly. "… there was a lot of chaos in that camp. The enemies deliberately spread discord. The Weeper was not the only man who turned his blade against others in the heat of the moment."

By the gods… Would my father curse me for saying those words?

"It… it was murder!" Ser Alek stammered, appalled.

"It was bloody war," the Weeper scoffed. "I mean, 'murder'? What a load of fucking kneeler shit. There were a lot of sons that died in those bloody snows, are you going to demand 'justice' for all of them?"

Jon turned to him. "Weeper," he warned. "You are not helping your case here. Have more respect, show more remorse."

He spat on the floor. Jon twitched. "Bugger that. I've been real good to you, Snow. I've been loyal, I've fought for you. Ever since I met you in those woods, I've been working with you – you owe me for that. You promised the free folk that you'd take us south and protect us, and there's me keeping the others to their fealty too." He stepped forward. "Was I wrong?"

Damn him. Damn them all.

Ser Alek looked between them, agape mouth agape. "There must be justice. I…" He stammered, with another gulp. "I demand trial by combat, Your Grace." The knight turned, trying to face off against the Weeper. "I made the accusation, and I will stand as House Manderly's champion. I will fight to avenge Ser Wylis."

The Weeper stopped, and the guffawed. "Aye? Alright, aye!" the raider barked. "Alright, I'm happy with that, runt. Give me my scythe and let's deal with this one quickly."

Jon could have groaned. "Ser Alek," he said lowly. "Please retire to your quarters."

"Your Grace–"

"This matter will be resolved later. Leave."

Ser Alek looked like he had been slapped, but he turned away. Jon was pacing, stepping back and forth across the solar as he cradled his head in his hands. Damn him. "If that boy wants to die for his dead friend, then I'm happy for it," the Weeper called.
"Ser Wylis had a wife, Weeper," Jon replied tiredly. The day had drained his strength. "Two daughters."

"Lots of folk have daughters, ain't nothing special about that," the Weeper grunted, "and everybody dies occasionally, no need to make a big fuss over it."

Jon stiffened. "Leave."

His hands were shaking. Damn him, Jon cursed. Damn him and damn them all. Damn myself too.

The Weeper barged out the solar. Tormund lingered, looking at Jon cautiously. Jon didn't even know what to say.

"Every man has a right to justice," Tormund said, breaking the silence. "If the fat lord objects, let him take it against Weeper. Trial by combat, you call it? The free folk way is similar enough, when you get down to it. If the young boy wants to fight, then let him."

"The Weeper would win, Tormund," Jon groaned. "The Weeper is one of the best fighters I have ever known. He's the only man I know of to survive trading blows against a white walker." Myself included. "The Weeper will cut down Ser Alek in a heartbeat, and that would be salt in Lord Wyman's wound."

Tormund didn't disagree. The wildling hesitated. "How many men follow the Weeper?" Tormund asked finally.

Jon knew what he was really asking; how much of a problem could the Weeper be? "I don't know," Jon replied honestly. "He commanded over four thousand raiders at one point, but I don't know how many still follow him. But it's more than that – there were a lot of the free folk who were unhappy when I forced their fealty. There were many that only ever chose to follow me because the Weeper did it first. Anybody who doesn't trust me, trusts the Weeper. He's a very influential figure among the raiders."

"How influential?" Tormund pressed.

"I don't know," he admitted. And I don't want to test it, either.

Jon's hands were shaking, his world strained, his body raw. The stress he felt – physical and emotional – had never felt so hard.

Finally, Jon had to ask, "How many men know of Ser Wylis' murder?"

Tormund paused. "Well..." he paused, considering the words carefully. "The Weeper's raiders are the only witnesses alive who saw the deed. And that Ser Alek of course." A moment of hesitation. "Lots of rumours are going around about it, though – but I don't know how many could actually say for certain."

Jon felt like a bastard for even thinking those thoughts.

"I need time to think," Jon said finally, pushing himself to his feet and hobbling to the door.

"Hells, you've been running yourself ragged," Tormund grunted. "How bout some rest instead?"

"I'm fine, I just--" he stopped and winced, cursing slightly as he jerked his leg too fast. The stitches, Jon cursed. The stab wound from the assassin's blade on his lower torso was not healing well. It needed rest and recuperation, but Jon had none to spare. He hadn't even been able to eat enough.
Jon's jaw clenched, his body staggering against the doormake.

"Dammit, Snow." Tormund moved towards him, as if Jon might topple. "Rest yourself."

"I'm fine!" Jon snapped clutching the doormake. "I just need--" Jon hesitated, and then relented. "I need a walking stick, Tormund – can you have one of your men fetch one?"

And just hope that nobody sees me limping around like a cripple. Jon's command was hanging by a thread as it was, the sight that their king might be lame could certainly snap it.

Not long afterwards, and Jon was hobbling up the stairs of the west wing – past the old rooms where the Stark children had once roamed. His cane thumped against the steps, tapping with each step. There had been corpses even here, and black drag marks were the soldiers had pulled the bodies down the stairs.

The thought of Leona Manderly's red and weeping face flashed before his eyes. He wondered how many of his men were ruthless enough to demand a death sentence for a grieving widow, and then he tried to imagine himself swinging down the blade…

The ruins of the West Tower weren't far from here, and the bedchamber where Arya had tried to hide while the wildlings stormed the keep…

It was all too much.

"Dammit!" Jon screamed to the empty halls. "Dammit! Dammit!"

His fists collided against the stone walls, so hard it hurt. He kept on punching until his knuckles were bloody, and the pain started to numb.

He could have torn this whole cursed castle down with his bare hands, and it wouldn't be enough. It wasn't enough.

The winds were outside were still fierce, and from the great keep it sounded like Ramsay Snow's ghostly laughter shaking the castle. Jon could feel it ringing in his ears, Ramsay's blade against his neck…

That moment in the snow. He relived it a hundred times. The images flashed before his eyes, all vivid in red and black. Jon kept on punching the wall.

Finally, Jon stopped, picked himself off the floor again, and kept on limping down the corridor.

He headed towards Sansa's old room, the chambers on the far end. Under Bolton occupation, it had been held by Lady Walda Bolton, but then it became another infirmary. Jon's hands were still shaking, he had to force himself into the room. Val.

Jon walked in and saw Val lying unconscious on bloodied sheets, her breaths hoarse and shallow. Exactly where he had left her. Val's skin was milky pale. The room stank of dried blood.

It was the cold, Jon thought. The prolonged exposure, bleeding out in the elements, threatened her almost as much as the blade had. Severe shock, the maester, the only one they still dared to trust, had called it. Val had been alive when they found them in the snows, but she still hadn't woken up yet.

Ramsay's blade had sliced her from shoulder downwards, severing straight through her right breast, hacking into the shoulderbone. Mutilated skin had been stitched together, but it still looked as bad a wound as any Jon had seen. He could see the ugly gash, the tear under the bloodied sheets, like a solid chunk out of her shoulder. The maester hadn't been able to say if she'd survive, but then warned that she could well lose the arm even if she did. An infection now would kill her as surely as any sword, if the hypothermia didn't first.

Jon had never seen Val so frail. She was always so bold, so fierce, so strong. Lying on the bed now, she was a pale and weakened thing.

Val had been awake but near-delirious for a while; moaning in pained fever dreams. She had been made to fall unconscious, as drank of the scant few precious stores of milk of the poppy, and the maester stitched together her hacked flesh. Jon hadn't even been able to talk to her, unable to form any words.

She had been barely clinging to life for over a week, yet Jon had only visited her four times. Jon had to force himself, drag his legs through the corridor, just to come to her bedside, because it hurt so much.

"She's alive," Jon told himself. Val was breathing and Ramsay was dead in the snow. Still, no matter how much he reminded himself, it didn't feel like much of a victory.

"I'm sorry," a voice said quietly, from behind. "I didn't know what other room to go to."

Jon didn't jump at the sound, but his shoulder stiffened. He turned to see Sansa, sitting upright and alert behind the doorway. Her eyes were on his, and then slowly looking up and down, between Val and him.

They looked at each other like strangers, tensing in each other's presence. Every time he saw her, Jon's instinctual reaction was to think of Lady Stark, her mother. They looked so alike it was jarring.

Sansa. Perhaps it is a trade – I lost one sister, but the gods returned to me another, he thought. I lost the little sister I loved and played with, in return for the sister that shunned me. It was a cruel thought, but he was feeling too bitter to care.

She was looking at him, waiting for a reply. It was the first time that Jon had even been alone with Sansa, and only the third that he had seen her since she had arrived in Winterfell two days ago. Everything had been so busy, so urgent, that there had never been a moment. Or maybe I just didn't want to face her.

Jon blinked. It was dusk. She was in Val's room, Sansa's old room. Sansa hadn't been assigned new chambers. Another of the many things that he had let pass into oversight.

"It's… it's fine." Jon didn't shake his head. He didn't know what to say to her. "Where is the maester?"

"He went for some more milk of the poppy," she explained. "The guards followed him."

"Ah." The single word hung in the air. Maester Henly was a young maester with honest features, the only one that Jon had been forced to trust so he could treat Val, but every move the maester made was still done under escort, and watched.

"I was told to keep the fires warm for her." Sansa's eyes drifted towards to the unconscious woman. "She is… Lady Val, yes?"

A nod. "Just Val."
"You were close." It wasn't a question, but Jon nodded again. Her eyes slightly widened. "Oh. I'm sorry."

"She's clinging on." His voice was low. I couldn't even come to her bedside.

There was a long, long silence.

Sansa was so, so different to what he remembered. He remembered a young girl full of polite courtesies, who loved to sing, loved to dance, who longed for all the comforts of a southron lady. She loved the harvest feasts, the masked balls, the mummer's shows. The woman before him was... harder, more jaded, with sharper eyes and fewer smiles. Her hair was shorter and darker, worn downwards rather than in a braid.

The eyes were the most unnerving – it was like Jon half-expected to hear Catelyn Stark's cold, chiding voice every time Sansa spoke.

I never expected to see her again. Somehow, he didn't think she expected him either.

The only sound in the room was crackle of the flames, and the wheeze of Val's unconscious breaths.

Her gaze was guarded, suspicious. He noticed how she always kept two steps between them, as if he might lunge at her at any moment. "Tell me something, Your Grace," Sansa said finally. "I spent a full day explaining myself to Lord Umber and the others. They demanded to know everything about me, for me to describe everything that happened at King's Landing. Even now, some still call me an imposter, a traitor, or Lady Lannister."

"When things go wrong, when the unexpected happens, people look for someone to blame," Jon said lowly. "Tensions are high."

"They are," Sansa agreed. "I came prepared for it, since I knew they'd be suspicious. And yet you never questioned me at all."

"I did not."

"Why is that, King Snow?"

Because you look just like her. It was like seeing a ghost. "You are my sister, Lady Stark," Jon said instead. "We grew up together."

"We did. And yet this is already the longest conversation I can ever recall us having," Sansa agreed. "Do not feel obligated to pretend otherwise. I do not expect warm feelings from you."

For a second, he was caught off-guard with the bluntness. They had been estranged as children, distant, but never that cold. Jon blinked. "Then why are you here?"

A humourless ghost of smile passed across her face. "Where else should I be?"

Jon stopped and stared. "What happened to you?" he asked finally, "Sansa?"

"You first," she challenged, and then hesitated, "Jon."

He paused, and then scoffed as he sat down on a chair by Val's bedside. Slowly, hesitantly, he began to explain. He told her about joining the Night's Watch, about taking the black, about the Great Ranging. He explained about Craster's Keep, the Fist of the First Men, about meeting Qhorin Halfhand and joining his expedition to scout out Mance's army. He talked encountering Rattleshirt's men, being ordered by Qhorin to abandon his cloak, to infiltrate the enemy's army. He told her about the white walkers attacking them at the Frostfangs.

Perhaps Sansa didn't believe him, but there wasn't a flicker of doubt or surprise on her face as he mentioned the Others. She was too guarded to let any emotion through. Jon didn't mention anything about Ygritte.

When it came to Sonagon, he became more vague. He didn't want to speak of the undead ranger, or the greenseer, or the children of the forest. He only told her the broad terms; of uniting the free folk, the attack at Hardhome, of flying the dragon over the Wall at Eastwatch.

Sansa just stopped and listened. The hours ticked by, the logs burnt.

It was the hour of the ghosts when Jon finally went quiet, and it was her turn to speak. Her voice was low, soft in the still air. She told him of going to King's Landing, of the Hand's Tourney, of father's sudden decision to flee the capital and then King Robert's death in a hunting accident. The Stark men murdered, Ned Stark imprisoned as a traitor, Arya disappearing, and Sansa begging for mercy for father's life. And then Joffrey taking their father's head, on the steps of the Sept of Baelor.

Her voice didn't even waver. After that, it was the Battle of the Blackwater, then Queen Cersei's madness and being married to the Imp, and then Joffrey's wedding. Being smuggled to the Vale by Lord Baelish, sheltered by her aunt until Lysa was murdered, engaged to Harry the Heir and then her betrothed murdered when she was kidnapped. Ser Jorah Mormont rescued her, fleeing across the Bite…

She has been set to marry to four different men, Jon thought quietly, and then they all either died or betrayed her.

We both took the long route home.

"The attack on White Harbour," Jon said eventually. "You were present for it."

"I was." She nodded. No emotion, not from her. "Ser Jorah saved my life."

"Jorah Mormont," Jon repeated. "I knew his father."

"Jorah died nobly. Tis a small thing, but it would be good to tell his aunt the same. Let his family know that he did try to redeem himself."

Jon just nodded quietly. He didn't even know what he could say to Lady Maege. Alysane had left behind two children, by the tell of it.

The air was so tense between them, the words were so awkward. She was the last of his family, but they had to force the words out, struggling to even talk over the chasm between them. "The attack on White Harbour," Sansa continued, "has Lord Bolton answered for that?"

"He planned it," Jon admitted. "As a way to destroy me from the rear, with funding from the Iron Bank."

With that, Sansa shook her head firmly. "No. Lord Bolton has been lying through his teeth. It was not the Iron Bank – it was Littlefinger who supported him."

"Littlefinger?" Jon frowned.
"Lord Petyr Baelish. The same man that smuggled me from King's Landing." Jon was confused, but she explained. "Former Master of Coin, Lord of Harrenhal, Lord Paramount of the Riverlands, Lord Protector and Regent of the Vale. Littlefinger is what we call him. He is the man who betrayed father, who started the war, who tried to destroy you."

Jon felt lost. "What? Why would he--"

"Littlefinger would burn the world down, if only so he could be the king of the ashes." Her voice turned dark; the first emotion he had really seen from her – anger. "I think Littlefinger never really wanted the Boltons to win, but the best option for him would be if you and the Boltons destroyed each other in a long and bloody war. That is what Littlefinger does; he turns chaos into profit. He wants the north, and then the Iron Throne, and he thought me the key to getting it."

He almost stammered. "There are letters that we took from Roose Bolton," Jon said slowly, "that say the Iron Bank offered him funding."

"Are those letters forgeable?"

"Perhaps," Jon admitted.

"Then they are fake," Sansa said with a nod. "Lord Bolton is trying to play you. He doesn't want you to have the Iron Bank's support – that would make your reign more stable. It is far better for him if you believe the Iron Bank is your enemy instead."

"And you are sure?" Jon insisted. "That this man… this Littlefinger is responsible instead?"

"I am." Sansa's voice was definite. "I know how Littlefinger thinks."

Still, for a moment, Jon wasn't sure if she hated or admired the man. There was something of both in her voice.

"I… I will consider it." Jon didn't even know what else to say.

"Do more than consider," Sansa replied coolly. "Take my advice; the realm will be a better place if you fly to the Eyrie and scorch Littlefinger off the map." She paused. "But your dragon. I heard that it is in the godswood, but I have not approached it. It is sickly?"

"Poisoned," Jon said darkly. Sonagon had been puking globs of frozen ooze from his stomach just days past, the dragon was still writhing from whatever poison they had used. "Boltons' work."

"Then just be careful," Sansa said lowly. There was a flicker of nervousness on her face too. "One mistake. That's all it takes to damn you. Just one."

He didn't reply. Nobody had told him just how it easy it was to make the mistakes. The thought of his father's severed head, or his brother's mutilated corpse, flashed in the still air.

Unwillingly, Jon's gaze flickered towards the sealed window, rattling slightly in the wind, beyond which he knew lay the burnt ruins of the West Tower. Even now, the cinders still plagued Winterfell's spires. Sansa caught his glance, and they both knew what he was looking at.

"… You never asked either," Jon said slowly. "Do you blame me?"

She hesitated, for longer than he would have preferred. "No," Sansa said. "I do not. You were not the one that abandoned her, not the one that dragged Arya off to be married, not the one that trapped her here. You were not the one who killed her. It was Cersei. Cersei, the Lannisters, and "Then why is my stomach still churning with guilt?" Sansa's eyes flickered back to Val, so still she could be a corpse. "You loved Arya more than anybody," she said lightly, her voice softening for the first time. "I know you did. She was more your sister than mine."

"That's not--"

"You tried to save her, and it wasn't you who killed her." Sansa insisted, and there was a sharpness in her eyes. "I will tell the northern lords that too, I promise. I will support you."

He had to blink to stop the itch in his eyes, taking a deep breath. What time is it? It felt like the hour of the wolf or later, the dead of night where everything felt stiff and sluggish. "Sansa you don't have to…" His voice trailed off. Do what? He wondered vaguely.

"I do." She stood up from the chair. "Winterfell is my home, and I will not let them take me from it again. Do not let them take this from us." Her mouth curled, her jaw set. "We've both lost too much to be here. You are king now. Do not let them."

He shook his head, blinking and rubbing his eyes tiredly. "I am king," he said, humourlessly. "I never wanted this, I didn't want any… I…" Jon's voice flickered, casting another glance towards the window. "I am a better fighter than I am leader."

"Then fight," Sansa said, her voice low. "That's all you've got to do. Just fight."

The silence dripped by slowly. Jon had to turn away, forcing himself towards Val's body, as still as the grave. The entire day had been exhausting, draining his strength, but it wasn't over. Jon couldn't let it be over.

"I… I should go, my lady," Jon said eventually. "I will see you are prepared a room."

"As you wish, King Snow." Sansa gave a small curtsy, a light movement something so automatic it felt aloof.

She opened the door for him, and he hesitated before crossing it. "It was… It was good finally talking to you, Sansa."

"It was." She nodded, and then bit her lip. "Do you know that I didn't recognise you at first? You changed so much, you look so different. I thought you were a stranger sitting on father's chair." Sansa cocked her head. "Tell me something, did you recognise me?"

"Yes," he replied truthfully. "Very much so."

"Perhaps you shouldn't have," Sansa said quietly. "Neither of us are the same children are the same children we once were."

She hesitated. "We're… We're different people, Jon, and I think it's okay to embrace that. Do what you have to do, King Snow."

He didn't know how to reply. He didn't. Jon just nodded as he walked out of the room, casting one final glance at Val, lying bloody in the bed.

Jon took a deep breath as he walked out into the hallway, the tap of his cane against the stones. He felt raw. He felt so weary that all he wanted to do was lie down and fall away, but he couldn't. There is no rest for a king.

I chose this, he thought as he sighed. Dammit, I chose this.
He kept on walking down the hall, his mind spinning with so many different visions. The bodies he had walked over, the men he had sentenced. The only sound he could hear was the tap, tap, tap of the cane.

Jon hadn't even realised he had made the decision until he was hobbling back down the steps, out of the west wing.

There were five guards – all free folk raiders – lingering tiredly in the clearing at the bottom of the steps with spears in their hand. They all straightened, looking surprised, as Jon stepped down the steps. "Send a message to the Weeper," Jon ordered to one of the man. "Find him. Have him meet me in the godsdwood right away."

"King, you shouldn't--"

"Now."

They scattered around him, but he was no mood to explain himself. Jon also took a hemp hood off one of the men, and he slung it over his head to hide his hair. As he limped down towards the main hall, he saw another group of raiders guarding the main hall. "Who goes there?" one of the men called as Jon approached, raising spears. The guards were on edge. It was only when Jon came closer that they made out his features, and stiffened.

"Find Toregg of the Dragonguard," Jon ordered. "Have him bring Ser Alek to me in the godsdwood at all haste."

"Tormund said that nobody was to leave the keep," a raider hesitated.

"I gave you an order, ser. Now."

Jon was already walking away, through the great double doors. The whole castle felt eerily silent at this hour. He crossed the yard, towards the outhouse leading down to the dungeons. There were five men guarding the prisons, the doors sealed. Jon had to bang onto the wood, and then order them to give him the keys to the cells. The men looked flustered by Jon's sudden arrival, but he was already sweeping past.

The dungeons felt eerily silent. As he passed, Jon saw Lady Barbrey Dustin staring up through the bars, looking at him like he was a ghost limping through the cold and dusty hallway.

He reached the cell. The keys jangled against the lock. Roose Bolton was wide awake, even despite the hour. The prisoner's chains rattled as Jon opened the cell door, his eyes narrowing. "You're back," the leech lord said. "Do you have more questions, You--"

That was the only thing he managed to say, before Jon swung his walking stick straight into Roose's skull. Heavy oak crunched against flesh and bone.

Not even a moment of hesitation. Jon's whole body was screaming to hear the man's scream. There was much rage that he just felt cold.

The cane cracked into the man's skull and then clattered the stones, but Jon was already lunging. Roose tried to squirm, yet Jon's hands were already wrapping themselves around the man's throat. His knee collided against Lord Bolton's stomach.

A cry – a snarl – broke Jon's lips, but otherwise he didn't say a word. There was nothing to say. There was no reason behind it. Jon just really, really wanted Roose Bolton dead.
He grabbed Roose by the neck and he forced him downwards, slamming his skull into the stone. Whacking the man's head off the wall. Hammering his face into rock with all of Jon's might and fury. Over and over again, each time gasping as Lord Bolton's head thumped against the stone, until blood smeared and teeth cracked.

Roose didn't scream. He hardly even gasped.

Even after the man's face was a bloody pulp, he was still twitching. Jon was on top of him, his knee jammed into the man's chest and his hands on his throat. Jon squeezed and wrung Roose's neck so hard he felt his throat crack.

The chains jangled, as Roose's body flopped.

Afterwards, Jon let Lord Bolton drop, before taking a deep, deep breath. I needed to do that, Jon thought with a sigh, staring down at the corpse. Had to be done.

There were already armed guards running through the dungeons, shouting to know what was happening. Jon cast one final look at the corpse beneath him, the man who had nearly damned everything, before turning away. "Roose Bolton strangled himself in his cells," Jon explained simply, wiping the blood off his hands.

"Wait, h–"

"He strangled himself," Jon repeated. "Do you understand?"

The free folk on guard blinked. "Ah. Yes, of course, yes – Your Grace."

Jon winced up his cane again and started limping away. "Then deal with the body. There are hungry dogs in the kennels, are there not?" Lord Manderly had wanted Roose alive, but Jon simply couldn't find it in himself to care. The man needed to die, and Jon needed to feel it. "When Rattleshirt arrives in the morning," Jon told the guards, in full earshot of the other prisoners, "tell him that he has full permission to do whatever it takes to draw the truth from the others. He is to start with the maesters."

Wide and pale eyes stared at him through cell's bars as he left the dungeons.

Afterwards, Jon pulled his hood up again and crept outside, moving through the snowy night towards the godsdowd at north-western edge of Winterfell. He walked quickly, keeping his distance from the bonfires of the camps sitting in the grounds. He could feel Sonagon snoring, coiled through a mess of broken trees, his body resting over a ruined pond, twitching slightly while the dragon slept. In the distance, he could see the ruined glass houses, and slight puffs of steam billowing from the hot springs. The heart tree loomed over it all.

The Weeper was already waiting for him, at the rusted iron gates surrounding the godsdowd. The Weeper had his scythe over his back. The air was so quiet, even the flurry of snows seemed tamer, less frantic.

"Snow?" the Weeper demanded as Jon approached. "I got your message. What the hell is so urgent?"

He didn't reply. Jon turned, and he could see the figures of Toregg the Tall and Ser Alek shuffling through the snow towards them. Both men were armed, both squinting to see through the darkness. Even in the pale and fragile light, Jon saw Ser Alek's features turn ghostly white as he recognised the Weeper.
"What--" Ser Alek gasped, and then gulped. "What is he doing here?"

"I invited him, ser," Jon replied, leaning on his cane. "You challenged him to trial by combat, did you not?"

"I… I…" the knight froze. The Weeper straightened, step forward to stare at Ser Alek with folded arms. The man was shivering as he mustered about his courage. "I did. There must be justice, Your Grace."

"Aye," Jon agreed, bracing himself. "There must be."

Then, without even another word, Jon picked up his walking stick and swung it like a club. There wasn't even a moment's hesitation before the solid wood collided against the Weeper's face.

No warning, the raider couldn't even react. His arms had been folded, and he didn't see the blow coming. Jon just heard the crack of the man's nose beneath the impact, and he staggered.

Jon was already swinging again. In the torchlight, he saw mad, bloody eyes staring at him in shock. Crack. Another impact against the Weeper's skull, and the raider dropped. "Is this what you wanted, ser?" Jon demanded, turning back to a dumbfounded Ser Alek. "Is this the justice you wanted?"

"You bloody--" the Weeper gasped, blood pouring down his face, just as Jon lashed out again. There wasn't time for the man to draw his weapon. Another solid impact took him down to the snow.

The Weeper tried to recover, but Toregg was already there to stop him. The taller man pushed the Weeper to the ground, just as Jon whacked the cane into his jaw once more.

Jon heard the crack. His tooth, Jon thought. In a fair fight, Jon would have been soundly defeated. Still, all it took was one sudden impact over the head with a heavy stick, and afterwards it wasn't much of a fight.

The Weeper seemed to lose consciousness out for a few heartbeats as flailed madly in the snow. He recovered his senses, spitting and cursing, but Jon gave him no chance to fight back.

"Is this the justice you wanted?" Jon demanded again, while Ser Alek paled and sputtered. He hit the Weeper again. Crack. "Does this make you feel better?" Crack. "Is this what you wanted?"

The last blow was so hard that the walking stick slipped out of Jon's fingers as his hand jarred. The Weeper screamed, sputtering blood and trying to thrash, but Toregg kept the man's arms pinned behind his back. Jon turned to face Ser Alek, before turning back and kicking the Weeper in the stomach. His leg jarred, and Jon nearly tripped while the Weeper wrestled.

Ser Alek didn't reply; the knight looked frozen in the snows, like a rabbit quivering in fear. Jon picked up his bloody cane, and held in outstretched to the knight. "Take your vengeance, ser," Jon ordered. "Go on. Hit him. Beat him. If this is justice, then take it."

The knight was sputtering, his mouth flapping. The Weeper screamed a roar like an animal, trying to squirm. Jon slammed the butt of the stick into the wildling's stomach, a cry of pure rage breaking Jon's lips.

"I gave you an order!" Jon snapped, and Alek flinched. "Whatever vengeance you want – whatever Wylis' death deserves – take it now. This is your chance. This is justice, is it not? He killed your friend, and you wanted to beat him?

The knight was staring at him like he was mad. "And – after tonight – you forget about it," Jon growled. "Do you understand me? After tonight, you will never mention it again."

"You-you-your…" Alek stammered.

The Weeper almost succeeded to squirm to his feet, but then Jon hit him again. The Weeper was a tough man; he didn't stay down for long, even despite all of Jon's strength behind each blow. A sharp cry burst from Jon's lips, and the thought of Lady Leona flailing on the ground flashed before his eyes. "Lord Wyman will never know how his son died, ser," Jon snapped, pacing in the snow. "Ser Wylis was killed by Boltons, and that is the only truth you will ever speak of. There is nothing to be gained by saying anything else, and any justice you require – any punishment, any retribution – that happens tonight. So swing the damn stick if you need to, but do you understand me?

Alek could have said something, but it was drowned out by the Weeper's howl. "He deserves it," Jon spat. "He does. He's a violent bastard and he killed Ser Wylis for no other reason than because he was angry. It was murder, it was, and the Weeper killed your friends, but that doesn't matter because I still need him. I need him, and I need White Harbour." Jon shook his head, jaw clenching. "Lord Wyman will never know and you will never speak of this."

There was a pause, waiting for a reply. Jon threw the cane onto the snow at Ser Alek's feet. "So hit him as many times as you want," Jon warned. "But either pick up the stick or walk away now."

The man was twitching, wide eyes looking desperate. After a long, tense moment, a flash where their eyes met, Ser Alek chose to walk away, nearly stumbling over the slush.

There was no breath of relief. Instead Jon just screamed wordlessly into the night – all of that rage, pain and guilt bursting out of his chest. Jon's hands were still shaking. He just felt like hitting something again.

The Weeper was still trying to struggle against Toregg's grip, but his movements were haggard, his throat coughing blood. Jon picked up the cane, hobbling on it as he took the weight of his leg.

"You were right, Weeper," Jon said finally. "I do owe you. I likely wouldn't be here if not for you, you have helped me… many, many times. It's because I owe you that much, that you get a second chance."

He motioned for Toregg to back away. Jon knelt down, and whispered in the Weeper's ear, "And if you ever put me in this situation again," he snarled. "I smash your fucking skull."

Jon shuddered as he tried to calm himself, nodding at Toregg. The Dragonguard looked nervous too, but he let the Weeper drop and sag into the snow. "Get him to the infirmary. The Weeper will stay as a guest in Winterfell as he recuperates," Jon ordered to Toregg. "In the meantime, Tormund will lead the Weeper's warband. I will talk to your father shortly. And Tormund will bring the Weeper's raiders into line. I need to get the wildlings under control too."

He was already limping away, leaving the Weeper bloodied and sputtering in the snow behind him.

Winterfell was a melting pot, and Jon had to cool it. The Weeper was better off in an infirmary bed than he was leading warbands right now. Jon returned to the Great Keep, to his father's… to his chambers, but he couldn't rest. He was pacing over the open balcony even as the snow flurried into his face. Jon didn't mind the snow. The cold gave him focus, clarity. It kept him awake.

As soon as the storm clears, he thought, I need to write a raven for White Harbour. He would need to write a letter with the list of those killed by the Boltons, but also declaring the return of Sansa Stark, the Lady of Winterfell. That was the only victory that gave him hope.

I can keep the Weeper under control, he thought with a sigh, Lord Wyman will be furious, but so long as his anger and grief is in the right direction the alliance will not break. I could grant Leona Manderly a belated sentence, but her and both of her daughters will need to be stay in Winterfell as ‘guests’. Lady Leona's betrayal gave him justification, Lord Wyman wouldn't be able to object. Jon needed to take hostages from all the northern families. Just in case the White Harbour alliance did turn sour, then House Manderly was the first that Jon needed to secure leverage over.

He would have to refuse the betrothal to Wynafryd that Lord Wyman had offered. Lord Wyman would need something to distract, to placate his rage. The lands of Hornwood, perhaps.

He needed to be careful. He couldn't allow a single house, however useful, however loyal, to gain too much power. Not if their loyalty could be turned. The highborn are just as untrustworthy and as dangerous as the wildlings, Jon thought foully, just in different ways.

The north was not at peace, there would be more battles still. What if the Ryswells of the Rills, the Tallharts of Torrhen's Square, or the petty lords, still refused his new rule? Would he have to march on them, even as winter raged? The Wall desperately needed men to hold it, while Moat Cailin was presumably still under Bolton control. There were still ironborn raiders along the Stony Shore and Sea Dragon Point. There were pirates to the east. He needed to deal with the Bolton's southern allies. He needed to visit Braavos. He had no idea how Bullden's search to find Rickon was proceeding, he hadn't felt Ghost's presence in days. There were still hunting parties pursuing the white walker. The exodus of the free folk south of the Wall was still on-going, the Others still plaguing refugees while the search parties hunted for survivors north of the Wall. Had the wildlings of the Frozen Shore been evacuated? The clans that were still lingering in the Frostfangs? Jon honestly didn't know how many of the free folk Mance and the other chieftains he'd left north might have assembled by now. Fifty thousand? Sixty?

There were reinforcements on the way to Winterfell, led by Lady Maege Mormont and Sigorn of Thenn. With them, he would have more men that could keep the peace. Jon didn't know how much territory he had lost in the fallout of the battle, but it had to be secured before the snows settled. The allies that had already left them had to be brought back into line, and those few that had stayed neutral had to be forced to accept the new regime.

He didn't even know where to begin.

And the force besieging the Dreadfort, Jon thought bitterly, has until Sonagon recovers to secure a surrender – else that castle will be destroyed by dragonfire, hostages be damned. He needed the men more than he needed a castle, or the prisoners.

A haze of torches flickered below him, but the rest was all pitch black. Jon couldn't see the ground; he couldn't see the frozen fields spewed with bodies, or the charnel-pits of corpses. He had ordered men to deal with the bodies, but they would be burning all those corpses for weeks.

He thought of his father and Robert's Rebellion, and he wondered what Robert Baratheon had felt after arriving in King's Landing after the Sack – after receiving the throne only when a devastated city and a mountain of bloody bodies were spewed around him. Jon had never imagined that feeling before, could never have even visualised the experience. 'King' was such a bitter title, a bitter reward – a reward that only a man like Roose Bolton could relish in. No wonder King Robert
The keep shuddered with the wind, as the storms still stirring over the plains. It wasn't over. It was never over. One battle was done, one 'victory' behind him, but the true war was still to come. Jon was left standing in the scorched castle, the capital of a war-torn and ruined north, just trying to think what he could do.

Jon was still standing hours later, watching the night turn slowly towards the break of dawn. He was huddled over the balcony, thickly wrapped in furs as he watched the men in the tents below begin to rise.

A wolf's howl broke over the plains outside the castle – a long, slow and pained sound. The very sound caused his body to freeze, a shiver running up his back as heard the cry echoing through the snows. The sound was strangely mournful, weak and weary against the wind, but he thought he recognised it. A wolf?

Wolf howls in the night weren't uncommon, but this felt different. His whole body stopped, tensing as he tried to listen over the wind. The silence went so long that he thought he might have imagined it, that his sleep-deprived mind was hallucinating, but then he heard it again. That long, sombre sound, reverberating on the wind…

AAAaaaAH-OOOWOOOOOOOOo000000… AAAaaaAH-OOOWOOOOOOOOo000000…

No, Jon realised, straining to make out the sound. That's not a wolf. A direwolf.

Jon was already backing away from the balcony, feeling his fingers twitch.

It is coming from the north, he realised.

There was a figure in the hallway; her wide eyes meeting his. Sansa was awake too, carrying a candlestick in her hands. She can feel it too. "Is that…?" Sansa whispered, her voice so low, like she was afraid to break the fragile silence.

Jon didn't reply. He hesitated for a long moment, but then turned to walk away. Instinctively, he tried to reach out to Ghost, but his friend was so far away, and he felt little. The direwolf was asleep, in what felt like the midst of a distant, icy forest. It wasn't Ghost. That howl was different, but it felt so familiar. Could it be Shaggydog? But wouldn't Shaggydog be with Rickon, or maybe they weren't on Skagos after all? Could Grey Wind or Nymeria have somehow survived? Or could it be another wild direwolf? Sum–

He broke the thought off, and shook his head. Maybe I'm fooling myself. Maybe it's just a normal wolf. Or maybe…

He stepped down the stairs, half-staggering with every step, as quickly his limp and his cane would allow. He could have called for men, but he didn't. Not when it might just be a false alarm, not when he wasn't sure what he might find. Instead, Jon threw the hood over his head to cover his hair, and he walked out the servant's exit towards the back of the kitchens.

The sun was only just starting to rise, a dim haze of light through clouds. The army in the tents started to rouse, only a few patrols across through the grounds.

Jon hesitated, but he could still hear the phantom echo of the wolf's howl lingering in the air. With the ruckus of men in the background, it was hard to focus on it. He was already striding north, he passed the shattered glass gardens and the slanted Broken Tower. His heart was beating quickly, but he forced himself to stay calm.

The North Gate was sealed – it had been for weeks; the Boltons barricaded it, and his men hadn't cleared it, and now snow drifts were piled before it. Jon was panting slightly as he staggered through the snow, looking for men on the walls and guard tower. He stood alert for any sound at all, begging quietly to hear the noise again.

He heard it. The wolf's cry. It was quieter this time, but closer. A lone wolf crying for attention, howling outside the gates.

"Halt!" a distant man's voice bellowed suddenly, from above. "You take another step and we put an arrow in your skull, girl."

It wasn't addressed at Jon. There was shouting on the wall, movement from the battlements. He heard voices; and then a strained, high-pitched voice came from the other side of the walls. Jon was already running, pushing his way up to the guard tower.

A haggle of men lingered near the battlements. A voice was shouting something, but the words were lost in the wind. He could feel the gale around him, buffeting against the stones walls. "Should we blow the horn?" he heard a voice ask.

"Just chase her away," a gruff man grunted.

"She could be a scout. I've seen clans use children before – the brats can get closer than adults can."

Jon saw a man pulled back on a recurve bow, and shaft notched. "Put an arrow in her," a wildling ordered. "Maybe not the head, but mak–"

"Stop!" Jon ordered, clattering as he stepped out. "Stop!"

"Who the hell are y–" a narrow-eyed man began to demand, but his voice froze as Jon pulled down his hood and the recognition flashed. Jon's bone white hair was better than any crown.

"Lower your bow. Now," Jon snapped, his hand instinctively moving to Dark Sister. "Who is it?"

The men looked stunned, but Jon saw white stones on a few of their chests. "Um… eh… a looter, y-Your Grace," a man gulped. "Little rat has been stalking around the gate. She had been about to climb the walls too, when we spotted her."

Jon blinked, glancing downwards over the granite battlements at the fields of snow. There was a girl standing before the oak gates, shouting upwards. She was slight of build, huddled underneath a ragged, hoarfrost-coated cloak. A smallfolk?

Winter Town had been deserted as his army approached. Everyone had but the hardest or the most desperate of the smallfolk had fled before the wildlings. The girl below looked fraught – she was shouting, crying for attention. The men had been threatening her with arrows, but she hadn't run.

The wolf's howl had been strained, desperate, too.

"Open the gates," Jon ordered.

"We were told–"

"She's a single girl. Open the gates."
The men scattered under his tone, and Jon was left pacing. He felt uneasy. He turned, looking down from the eighty-foot drop, with a quiet grimace. The girl had been trapped in the elements, huddling against the razor sharp wind.

It took over a dozen men to finally heave the gates open through the pile of snow. As the North Gate finally creaked open, the wildlings were holding spears. The girl didn't run, even though Jon saw her wide eyes glaring with fear. One man pushed his way forward, but Jon held him back. The girl had a strong gaze for one so frail and weak, even as shivered.

"I don't care who you are. I don't care if you are flayed men or worse," she said, gulping and she walked forward. "I don't care what you might do to me. Just save him. Save him."

She was staring at him with such fear, her eyes glancing around at the wildlings. She had wide green eyes, wispy brown hair that seemed grey with frost, and a face so gaunt she looked all skin and bones. "Who are you?" Jon demanded, standing back cautiously.

Her voice nearly cracked, teeth gritting and hesitating. "Meera Reed," she said finally. "Sworn spear to Brandon Stark."

Jon could only stare. No…

In the distance, over the snow drifts and towards the frozen wolfswood, he heard the wolf wailing.

He made his decision so quick it was nigh-automatic. "Send word to Toregg the Tall," Jon ordered

The girl – Meera – was staggering. "He was freezing," she gulped, raising a trembling hand to him.
"I couldn't carry him, I couldn't…"

He heard a clanging. Jon glanced downwards, and he noticed a ring of iron – a broken manacle – chiming around Meera's ankle. His head was spinning, trying to understand. Could it be?

It wasn't safe to leave the castle alone, and even less safe to bring uncertain men with him. The grounds outside of Winterfell's gates were still unsecured, there were still likely roving groups of soldiers left scattered in the snow. But, at that moment, Jon just didn't care. "Where?" he snapped, so sharply it caught the girl off-guard. "Where?"

She couldn't reply, too busy wheezing, but her hand raised to point to the north, towards the trees.
Jon was already striding away, jogging lopsided through the snows. "On me!" he bellowed to the men. "On me!"

If it's true…

The snows were three-foot-deep, Jon had to force his way through the hard-worn, frozen ground.
He broke off the road and headed straight north, into the woods of pines and chestnuts. The men were breaking out of the gates, shouting after him, following him – all the while the snow geysered around them. "Bring horses!" Jon bellowed. "And dogs! Move!"

The forest was so thick and dark it could swallow a man whole. The wolf – the direwolf, it was – needed to howl, it needed to howl, but he couldn't hear anything. The going was hard, but Jon was desperate. He forced his way to the edge of the trees, head snapping around, searching for any sign.

The memory of a different time flashed before his eyes; a different age – back when Jon and his brothers would play hide-and-seek in these very woods. Before the snows, before the death. Back when they had been summer children…
"BRAN!" Jon bellowed at the top of his lungs. "Bran!"

Maybe he was wrong. Maybe he had misheard, or maybe this was a trap. Maybe this was another of Roose's Boltons schemes, to lure himself outside the walls and there were assassins in wait. Maybe he was too late. Jon didn't want to believe – he didn't want to let himself believe…

But still… his brother…

He heard the wolf's wail again, and it was so close.

The last time he had even… Jon thought back to that moment when Bran had been bedridden, unconscious, just before Jon needed to leave for the Wall. He remembered Catelyn Stark's cold gaze, and Summer's wail while the pup lay over base of Bran's bed.

The vision of a pale and broken Bran, unconscious in bed, couldn't leave his mind. They hadn't been sure if Bran would survive at the time. That had been the last time Jon had seen his brother, the day he had left home…

I wanted to show him the Wall. I wanted to say goodbye.

Men were shouting behind him, but Jon didn't care. He kept on pushing forward, limping deeper into the wolfswood. He saw the tracks where Meera had run through, and he followed them. The girl had been desperate, cold, but running for aid…

He saw an ancient gnarly oak tree, and there was massive wolf curled into its roots. A direwolf, with silvery grey fur and sharp yellow eyes. The last time Jon had seen Summer, the wolf had been the size of a large dog, but now it was as large as a pony. Frost and dried blood coated its furs. The wolf wailed, mewling piteously, but it didn't move.

There was a small figure in the roots, huddled under a rotten blanket, and the great wolf hunkered down over him, lying protectively, hackles raised. The direwolf lay over the boy, thin and emaciated, fur ragged, but still the size of a small horse. The direwolf was trying to warm him, sharing what scarce little remained of its body's heat.

Jon felt the same twitch – the small shiver over his skin – that he felt every time he met another warg. Summer stared straight at him, quivering, but didn't move.

"Bran…" Jon gasped, before finding his voice. "Bran!"

The small figure wasn't twitching. The boy looked older than what Jon remembered, but still so, so small. Older, but with the baby fat stripped from his cheeks and his auburn hair turned dark. Hoarfrost coated his skin, ice sticking to his brow. The vision of a young, lively boy who loved to climb flashed before his eyes.

But it was him. It was him.

Men were running behind him, shouting, sprinting to keep up. Jon could only grip his brother's limp body, hugging him so tightly. He felt so cold, so frail, like a broken little doll.

How long has he been out in the cold? Jon cursed. How long has it been since his strength failed him? How far had the boy – a cripple! – managed to fight before he finally collapsed? With no shelter, no fire, the snows could smother even the strongest man, and his brother was only a little boy…

Then, he felt his brother shiver, and frail, tiny hands clenched around his shoulders. Jon could have sobbed, the tears freezing on his cheeks.

You Starks are hard to kill.

Chapter Summary

The Maiden and the Mother...

Part 3 - The Convergence

The Maiden

She could hear the sound of children playing – sweet innocent voices ringing in the clear air. Cobblestones of pale pink marble paved the gardens and courtyard, and terraces overlooked the pools and fountains of the Water Gardens. Nymeria was shaded by blood orange trees, standing on the fluted pillar gallery leading to the triple archway.

The Water Gardens were pleasant in autumn. The days were hot and the nights cool, the salt breeze blew in from the sea, and the lily-coated, scented fountains and pools looked so lovely. Nymeria had such fond memories of the Water Gardens – she remembered playing in the pools herself along with Sarella, Tyene and Arianne – all the while her father and uncle would watch and laugh. Arianne used to be so vibrant and passionate, eager to play pretend elaborate scenarios and determined never to lose, while Tyene stuck closely besides Nym, both of them terrors at the games, while Sarella would just splash everybody all playfully. They had all been closer than sisters, and the memories of laughter and pleasant summer days still echoed in her head.

She could understand her uncle’s love for the Water Gardens. It was such a sweet and innocent place. A refuge from the world.

But it is a place for children, Nym thought, sighing. And now I'm all grown up.

She plucked a dried grape from the ceramic bowl, rocking her hips slightly as she walked across the red terrace, shaded by the palms. Nymeria had picked a sleek samite dress that hugged her form, showing the yellows and reds of her family’s colours, and sleek enough that her tanned skin shivered slightly in the cool air. She would have worn a shawl, but she favoured the sleek fabric; it made it obvious that there were no weapons hidden on her body, and sometimes obvious was useful.

Two men-at-arms with halberds, stood stiffly as she crossed the bridge towards the pavilion. Nymeria gave one of the men a soft smile, causing the young guard to blush. He had sandy hair and a clean-shaven chin, with small dimples on his cheeks. He's a new one, she took care to note. Usually Doran preferred older and seasoned guards around him, but the new guard was young and foolish enough to be distracted by a pretty face. Nymeria made note of it, just in case it could be useful. Her father had taught her to use every advantage.

She saw Prince Doran Martell on his usual seat in the evening shade beneath the lemon trees, his face passive. He didn’t turn to face her. Instead, he just sat on his cushioned seat, soothing his bloated feet in cool water, looking out over the tranquil trees and pools. He looks old, Nym thought sadly. The news – or rather the lack of news – concerning Quentyn had drained the last of the strength from him.

The Prince of Dorne has a soft heart. She would have felt sorry for him, except Dorne had no need for a soft-hearted prince.

“Well met, nuncle,” Nymeria called, flashing him a sweet smile. “It has been so long since I’ve been in these gardens.”

He paused before replying. “I remember a time when you and your sisters would splash in the pools,” he said, sounding wary, before turning his gaze away. “How was your journey?”

“Eventful. I docked in Sunspear three days ago.” That was a lie, Nym had actually arrived, discreetly, a fortnight past. “Did you hear the news, nuncle? The queen is going mad.”

Prince Doran took a long, deep breath, shifting his feet in the bowl of perfumed water. The rim of his golden silk robes were drenched. “So I hear. The whole realm says the same, and I have lost contact with my friends in the capital since the Red Keep has come under siege. The ravens say her brother tormented her to the edge of insanity.”

“Imps are wicked creatures, are they not?” Nym laughed, with more humour than he had. “I find that madness is a slow venom. Slow, but very effective.”

She sat down cross-legged on the chair opposite him. Doran cast her a wary look, heavy wrinkles over his eyes. He looked old, older than ever, but his attention was solely on her eyes. He knows me too well. She picked up another grape. “I travelled all the way to King’s Landing, only to be barred at the gates,” Nym chuckled. “The queen revoked Dorne’s seat at the small council. I think my presence may have insulted her. Something about no snakes allowed in her court, can you imagine that? Oh, that was surely the first sign the woman was crazed.” She squeezed the moist grape gently, feeling it ready to burst, but didn’t eat it. “Still, mayhaps, I was fortunate. If I had been allowed in, I would be a hostage right now, just like the poor Tyrell queen and her little king.”

And if I had been taken hostage, Cersei would likely be dead, she thought viciously. Nym had brought with her a dress lined with poisons and daggers, and the Lannisters deserved cruel deaths. But now, she mused, I find that we might be better served with Cersei staying alive. Oh, how quickly things change.

Not so long ago, Nym and her sisters had been all arrested and confined to the Spear Tower of Sunspear for conspiracy to treason. But not long after that, Arianne, Obara, Nym, and Tyene had met with Doran in his solar, to discuss the Dornish plot to rebel. It had seemed a good plan too; Arianne would go north to join with Daenerys and Quentyn as they landed with the Golden Company, Obara would escort Myrcella and Trystane back home, while Nym and Tyene both went ahead to King’s Landing via sea. They had all been convinced that their long-awaited revenge would be theirs soon enough. But that was when we assumed it had been Daenerys invading the realm, she thought, not this ‘Aegon’. How quickly my nuncle’s plans fall apart.

Nym felt sorry for Doran, she truly did. His son Quentyn was missing, and Arianne was in the middle of a war.

Doran always waited a good few seconds before replying. Even when he spoke he thought of every word carefully. “I have not received news from Arianne in near a fortnight. Have you?”
“I have not. Arianne was last at Storm’s End, was she not?”

He nodded, unhappily. “Tis not going to plan,” Prince Doran said lowly. “What of your sisters?”

“Oh, Tyene stayed behind with the High Septon. I’m sure she’s doing well there. Tyene gets along well with holy men – my sister is certainly pious. I thought that I was better served returning home quickly with news, nuncle.” She finally ate the grape, smiling sweetly as it burst in her mouth. “And as for Obara, well, I’m not sure, I have not spoken to her,” Nym lied.

“Obara is at High Hermitage, along with Ser Balon Swann, to bring the Darkstar to justice,” Doran replied. Ah, so he had asked only to see if I would answer.

“How grand, Gerold Dayne should pay for his crimes. But is House Dayne of High Hermitage still sheltering that fiend?”

“It appears so. I have sent Areo Hotah to bring him to justice.”

“Ah. I thought that the Water Gardens was lacking the captain's presence.”

There was a pause longer than usual. Doran’s eyes linger on her. She smirked, and something in her gaze spoke volumes.

They both knew the smalltalk was meaningless. Their eyes were fixed on each other, trying to measure the other’s stance.

“Nymeria,” Doran said finally, “whatever you are planning, do not.”

Nym threw her head back and laughed, loud and clear. “You wound me, nuncle. We want the exact same things, do we not? We want to protect our family, to protect Dorne. And we want justice.”

“We have different interpretations to what that word means.”

“So we do,” Nym agreed. “I was willing to go along with your plan before, nuncle. My sisters were as well – we were all eager to assist. I love my family dearly, nobody wants a strife between us. When you told me about the Targaryen alliance you prepared, about Daenerys and her dragons, I was so, so relieved. I had never been happier to learn I was wrong, to learn that you were not the slouch you pretend to be.” A touch of sadness entered her tone. Prince Doran didn’t speak, he only stared. She still heard the sound of children’s cries behind her. “But that plan has not come to pass; neither Daenerys nor her dragons are coming. Instead, I hear that you have two Dornish armies amassed at the Prince’s Pass and the Boneway which are not marching. You have Lords Yronwood and Fowler standing idle.”

“They are waiting on a word,” Doran said slowly. “They are waiting for dragons.”

“Arianne has already negotiated an alliance.”

“I do not call that an alliance,” he said foully. “The Imp twisted her arm and left her no choice. This Aegon expects Dorne’s friendship, but gives nothing but promises.”

“This Aegon could be your nephew,” Nym noted. “Elia’s child.”

“He could be,” he said chillly. “Or he could be a pretender exploiting her death, how would I know? Aegon Targaryen was a babe dead for eighteen years, and now he just returns?” Doran shook his head. “My daughter writes well of him, but I will not commit to a failed cause. I will wait, and see if this Aegon is right about Daenerys coming to support him.”
Nym’s smile turned waxy. Please, nuncle, she begged. I thought you had a spine. “Wait,” Nym repeated. “That is all you do, is it not? You waited for your sister's killers to die rather than taking revenge. Do you consider that a victory?”

“They are dead. Tywin Lannister and his creatures rot in the ground.”

“And it only took seventeen years. It wasn’t even we who killed him. In another fifty years, absolutely everyone involved with those murders might be dead, and you will consider that a victory?”

He didn’t reply. Nymeria picked up another grape, squashing it in her fingers. The juice was cold. “While you waited, Prince Viserys died and Daenerys was lost to the edge of the world. You waited for a betrothal that never happened. Decades wasted by waiting,” she pressed. “And now you wait for Quentyn to come back, when he never will.”

His eyes turned dark at the very mention of his son’s name. “Mind your tongue.”

“Apologies, nuncle. No disrespect meant,” she lied. “I am just tired of waiting.”

“Enough of this. What do you want, Nymeria?”

“I tried it your way, I truly did. But your plan has failed, nuncle. Without Daenerys, the victory you imagined is no longer possible. We must try a different approach, and seize the opportunity before us.”

He didn’t reply. He just stared suspiciously, thinking. The guards standing behind his chair looked tense. Nymeria leant forward on her seat. “It seems to me that the queen’s madness is doing more for our cause than dragons ever could. Tyene reports that Cersei is falling towards the same depths of insanity as Aerys.”

“And?”

Nym smiled. “Why not give her an extra push?”

There was no reply, but she saw the shift in his features, the tightening of his lips – the prince knew what she meant. She could see his gaze darkening. “King’s Landing is balancing on a knife edge, I’ve seen it myself. The Tyrell queen is being held hostage, while their lands are plagued by ironborn… The Lannister-Tyrell alliance is collapsing. If Queen Cersei does something really drastic, then it all breaks down and the High Septon becomes sure to renounce her – Tyene is working her magic there,” Nym said softly. “And we hold Myrcella, do we not?”

Doran’s hands clenched. “No.”

Myrcella Baratheon was currently at Starfall, where her escort had been halted indefinitely. Originally, the little princess was to head to King's Landing, but then news of the Golden Company made traveling north too dangerous. After the Faith's revolt and the Red Keep locked down, Ser Kevan wrote to Doran asking him to keep Princess Myrcella secure and in Dorne, lest her presence in King's Landing turn a dangerous situation even more volatile.

Ser Kevan is afraid, Nym thought. King Tommen was being held hostage by his own mother, and Faith was at the gates. Cersei had quite successfully pitted Lannister, Tyrell and Faith against each other. That left Myrcella in Dornish hands.

“The little princess,” Nym sighed, “what a poor girl. I do feel sorry for her, you know. I hear she's sweet and innocent. It's not her fault that she was birthed into the wrong family. But then again, daughters so often suffer for their family's sins, do they not? I feel like Lannisters deserve a taste of their own medicine.”

“She is betrothed to my son.” His voice was dark, low.

“Surely you cannot possibly still wish to marry Myrcella to Trystane?” Nym said, incredulous. “Why would we bind ourselves to a losing lion? No, Trystane’s betrothal is a union that it is best…severed.”

“Nymeria,” Doran warned, “we will not hurt children.”

What arrogance it is, Nym thought. A commander will send countless sons and fathers to their deaths in battle, but suddenly daughters are forbidden? Why is it that boys are allowed to die in war, but girls are not? “Justice is balance, nuncle,” Nym said in a low voice. “They brutally murdered a daughter of Dorne. I can think of no more fitting punishment against them.”

“No. Never.” Doran’s voice turned into a growl. “We spoke of this before. The answer has not changed.”

Ah yes, she remembered that ‘conversation’ well. One time, after the Red Viper’s death, the Sand Snakes had been ready for war: Obara had advocated an invasion, Nym suggested assassination, and Tyene favoured rebellion. Doran had replied by imprisoning them all. The Sand Snakes had forgiven the prince for that after he had shared his secret plan, but now his plan had failed.

This time was different. Nymeria and her sisters had come to a compromise that they were all happy with. I want you to be in agreement too, Nym begged silently.

“We will never have a better moment, nuncle. We must act now or we could spend another two decades waiting,” she insisted. “Have you forgotten that Cersei tried to arrange the assassination of Trystane too? She had his ambush planned, she meant to blame it on the Imp while Ser Balon performed the deed. Cersei plotted to murder your son to free her daughter from their betrothal. Isn't it justice to return the favour?”

“You speak of vengeance, not justice.”

Nym thought about it. “Either one will suffice, truth be told.”

“Your father would be ashamed of you right now,” Doran muttered, his face twitching. “Myrcella is eleven years old. Have you truly forgotten your own childhood, when you would play in the pools right there? Oberyn would never harmed an innocent girl.”

“Yes, well…” Nym shrugged. “My father is dead. He died shamefully and unfulfilled, and I don’t want the rest of my family to share his fate.”

“You sound determined.”

“Very much so. I will not wait, nuncle.” Dorne will not wait.

“Very well.” Doran paused, and then shook his head, coming to a decision. “Captain,” he called to one of the guards. “I am done here, bring me inside. Fetch me Maester Caleotte.” He glanced at her. “And then arrange a guard to take Nymeria to the Shield Tower. She is to be kept there under arrest.”

Nym sighed. “Again, nuncle? I had really hoped we might find common ground, but do we have to do this once more?”
“Do you give me a choice? You talk of murdering a child, an innocent under our solemn protection. You are my family, my brother loved you so, but you will not leave the Water Gardens.”

“I really, really wanted you to stand with us,” she said sincerely. “Please, let us talk about this. It is a good plan – a way to make sure our enemies destroy themselves. We hurt Cersei where she is most vulnerable; her family, her alliances, and her sanity. It is a way to keep Arianne safe.”

“I will not discuss the murder of children,” he said firmly. It took two men to help the Prince of Dorne to his gouty legs. They had to carry him away. My uncle has no heart for doing what is necessary.

A big bulky man stood over her suspiciously, holding a spear. She gave him a smile, and then ate another grape. Prince Doran was already having a frenetic talk with the maester as he rounded the corner, and left her sight. I tried, sisters, I truly did.

Nymeria spent the rest of the day watching the pools of the Water Gardens, under guard but with every comfort. Prince Doran refused to allow her another audience. At nightfall, she was escorted back to her chambers. The palm breeze rustled in the cool air, causing her to shiver. The lanterns glowed over the cream spires and arches, making everything seem so serene. Tis a beautiful place.

There were half a dozen men to escort her to her room now. Nym didn’t protest, or object. Instead, she just walked inside of her airy chambers she slipped out of her dress. She slowly dressed herself in leather and wool inside, wrapping a dark cloak around her neck. Nym searched for the blades she had brought with her, but found them missing. Doran must have given orders to confiscate my daggers, she thought, amused. Not that I need them.

She knocked on the door, opened it and then sweetly asked one of the two men standing guard out front if he could bring her a cup of tea for the night. He hesitated, but nodded and said he’d find a servant.

Then, as the man bowed and left, Nym turned to the other guard and whispered, “It is time. See it done – quiet and bloodlessly.”

That guard bowed and left too. Nym sat back and waited. Let no one say that I did not try to do this reasonably.

Not long later, the guard returned, knocked on her door, and bowed as he entered. “My lady,” the man said respectfully. “We are ready.”

“Ryden, you are an absolute dear,” Nym said with a beautiful smile, flicking her hair. “Any objections?”

“Few, but we can handle them. We support Dorne, my lady. Unconquered and unbowed.” Ryden banged his fist against the sun on his breastplate. Then he handed Nym a pair of matching sheathes from his belt. “And I believe these are yours.”

She took her daggers back, and placed them over her hips. The dual blades were long and sharp, curved and slender. As she left her ‘prison’, the guards all bowed their heads. My father always taught me the need to be prepared. “The maester’s quarters first,” Nym ordered. “There are ravens to be sent.”

The Water Gardens were still and quiet. It was the hour of the bat, few were moving. Nym had instructed her men that they needed to move swift and subtly.
She saw Maester Caleotte was still awake, moving restlessly between the ravens as she walked towards the rookery. His old, wrinkled face paled, his mouth stammering. Nym’s smile was sweet, reassuring. “Lady Nymeria,” the old maester gasped. “You are under arrest.”

“No, maester,” she said apologetically. “You are.”

The maester staggered backwards looking at the guards flanking her. “What is the meaning of this?” The man demanded. “Captain Ryden, your prince gave you an order!”

“I serve for the good of Dorne,” Ryden said stiffly, stepping forward. “Not Doran. It has become clear that their interests are not in line.”

Caleotte gasped, staring around in shock as he backed up, his chain tinkling. The courtyard was so quiet, but figures were stirring slowly. There was no rush, no panic – just men moving systematically from room to room of the Water Gardens. It had been prepared long before Nymeria had even stepped into Doran’s sight. “Please do not fight it, I beg you not to run,” Nym said reassuringly, waving Ryden to secure the room. “I do not wish to hurt anyone.”

“How could you…?” Caleotte stammered.

“Oh, it was quite easy. After Areeo Hotah left, I simply made arrangements concerning the prince’s personal guard. There are many in Dorne that are unhappy with my father’s death, and my nuncle’s inactivity. Many who feel slighted by the Iron Throne.” Ryden moved to push Maester Colemon into the wall, but she motioned for him to be gentle. “Our prince has always been reclusive, and the Water Gardens are isolated. Men will not be loyal to what they cannot see. I had servants placed sleeping draughts into the stew of any guards not on our side. The patrols are asleep, and we will seize the castle without a bell being rung.”

“Doran is your prince!” the maester protested.

“That’s a title which means very little if the people with swords do not wish to follow him,” Nym said, sadly.

Doran had once had all of her sisters imprisoned when he disagreed with their intentions. Later, after Arianne had found Doran’s trust, the Sand Snakes had been persuaded to forgive and join forces, but they did not forget. Obara, Tyene and Nym had devised the backup plan together; to seize the Water Gardens discreetly, should the prince’s plan fall through. We would never allow Doran to do the same thing again, Nym thought. Still, she felt so remorseful that it actually had to come to this. He should have listened.

There was sounds of a scuffle on the terrace below. Nym heard the muffled grunts of a man who tried to protest. She saw servants running quickly, but the guards were sealing the rooms and hissing for people to stay silent. Please do not disturb the children sleeping, she prayed.

Caleotte was trembling, but he didn't try to protest against the men with spears. All around him, the ravens cawed and fluttered, while Nym took the old man’s arm and pulled him to one side.

“Prince Doran…” the maester gasped. “What will you do to him?”

Nym felt insulted by the accusation. “Nothing! He’s my nuncle, he’s a kind man, I will allow no harm to come to him.” She shook her head. “No, but the prince is old and sickly. His legs are stiff with gout, and he needs men to carry him out of bed. Why not grant him more bedrest?”

The maester’s eyes were on her, and she could see the realisation dripping before his eyes. “Who helped you?” he said slowly. “Was it Ladybright?”
“I have no idea what you mean,” she said innocently, but the truth was yes. Alyse Ladybright, the lord treasurer at Sunspear, was one of three that Doran left behind to manage Sunspear in the prince’s absence. Alyse had also been a very close confident of Oberyn’s.

“This won’t work, Ser Manfrey—”

“... is already taken care of; he turned sickly after drinking from a bad batch of wine, I’m afraid.” Caleotte stared in horror. Nym frowned. “Incapacitated, not dead. Manfrey Martell will have an extreme case of the shits and will be bedridden for weeks, but he won’t die. Ricasso is old and blind, I’m sure he won’t be a problem.”

Both the castellan, Ser Manfrey, and the seneschal, Ricasso, at Sunspear had already been sorted – discreetly, of course, and disabled rather than killed. Nobody could stop a coup if nobody even knew one had happened.

Nymeria doubted that any would even realise what had happened here tonight, at least not for a while. So far as the realm was concerned, Prince Doran was still in the Water Gardens – ruling Dorne from his chair, and sending ravens and orders out to his kingdom – while his stewards managed Sunspear. Sooner or later, the news otherwise would spread – but if she was careful then Nym might have a good few weeks before that happened. Maybe months, with a bit of luck.

It will be time enough, in any case, she thought.

She walked around the room, inspecting the birds. Slowly, Nym picked up a scrap of parchment from the pile, making note of the correspondence. Captain Ryden’s stare alone kept the maester pressed up against the wall. The old man was still stammering. “This is treason,” he managed.

“Hardly. I consider it more a leave of absence. We are all loyal to Dorne here,” Nym replied, and Ryden nodded. “No, this is a kindness. It has become clear that Doran lacks the resolve to do what is necessary, and so my sisters and I will remove the responsibility from his shoulders. We will allow Doran an early retirement – he has long been most comfortable watching the children play in the Water Gardens.”

And Arianne will be upset, Nym thought, but when all is done, she will understand. Obara was already in position, waiting on the signal. Nym dabbed her quill in the inkpot and leaned poised over the parchment. The black ink dribbled from the sharp point, dark blots splattering over the table like blood. Nymeria kept the message short and concise.

“See it done” she wrote. Three little words, but as dark as the raven’s wings.

Maester Caleotte was still making noise, trying to protest, but she barely heard him. Nym spent a long time staring over the letter, just thinking. After a moment’s thought, she added another line. Six more words, but they made Nym grin.

“And blame it on Tyrion Lannister.”

For Elia, Nym told herself. For her babes, for justice, and for Dorne. Blood for blood.

The Mother

It was eleven days until the Mother’s Day, the third new moon of the year – a day designated for the celebration of all those blessed by the Mother’s hands. This time last year, Tommen had gifted her a cluster of flowers he had picked himself from the godswood, and there had been a special sermon held in the Royal Sept, in which the Queen Mother had taken a seat of honour.

This year, though, Cersei was expected to shame and surrender herself, her family, on that same day. The deadline of seventy-seven days was fast approaching, and no doubt the High Septon had chosen it to coincide with the Mother’s Day deliberately. A day blessed by the Mother.

Over two months she had been trapped in the cursed keep, barely even leaving Maegor’s Holdfast, and the mood had only become more dire.

Ser Kevan Lannister walked through the Great Hall with his head raised and his gaze hard. He was clad in full regal armour, with a gold-leafed breastplate showing the Lannister’s lion, and a red cloak draping from his shoulders and swirling from the floor. His pot belly was tucked in by a belt fastened so tight that it must have been suffocating.

Ser Kevan and his guards had left their swords at the gates, but they didn’t remove their helms. He didn’t bow either, and Cersei’s eyes narrowed. He should bow. The lack of courtesies spoke volumes.

There was a long, long moment of silence, as Ser Kevan cast his eyes over the ghostly Great Hall. The cavernous room was hushed, and the few onlookers hovering between the plinths never said a word. Nobody was allowed to speak in Cersei’s court. Their eyes were desperate, pleading silently at the Lannister envoys. Ser Kevan and his five men were the first new faces permitted to enter the Red Keep in two months.

At the base of the Iron Throne, Ser Robert Strong loomed.

Finally, Cersei spoke, and her voice was low, calm and dead. “Nuncle,” she greeted. “Why do you dawdle while the traitors stand at our gates?”

“Niece,” Ser Kevan’s voice was just as cold. “Where is the king?”

“Retired for the night.” This is how he speaks to me? “I am Queen Regent, you will address me as such.”

“Where is Queen Margaery, Cersei?” Kevan demanded. “Does Margaery still live?”

Insolence. “The traitor Margaery is imprisoned,” said Cersei, “awaiting her trial, and she has already confessed to her crimes.”

“Gods damn you,” Ser Kevan barked a curse, shaking his head. “Her trial? Cersei, enough. This has to end.”

The hall shifted slightly. Cersei could see her guards – her men – stirring at the doors. “Mind your tongue, nuncle,” her voice was a whisper, so quiet Kevan could barely hear.

“Queen Margaery is not facing trial, Cersei.” Ser Kevan took a step forward. “Your seventy-seven days is nigh at end, and in just over a week the Faith Militant will be barging through the doors. You will either face trial, or you will be brought to trial. The keep will be stormed and the High Septon will accept no surrender after that.”

“Then you must stop them. Are you not Lord Marshal, Warden of the West?” Her eyes narrowed. “You lead His Grace’s armies, ser.”

Ser Kevan shook his head. “You must concede. The High Septon will not allow this, and neither will Lord Tyrell.”

Cersei shifted on the metal seat, but she couldn’t stand. Her body was hunched, draped in coils of red velvet. Ser Kevan is weak. Why, by all the gods, was my nuncle fated to stand here and not my father? “You would allow them to break through the gates?” she said incredulously “To ransack the Red Keep itself, to break the seat of royal power? You are letting the Faith seize the Crown, nuncle.”

“I do not see what choice I have,” Ser Kevan replied coldly. “What choice have you left me?”

“Why not grow a spine and do your duty?” Cersei spat. “You’re a Lannister. They stand in open defiance to our throne. House Tyrell plots blatant treason with this puppet of a High Sparrow – and you continue to delude yourself–”

“By the gods, Cersei!” Ser Kevan snapped, and the queen even flinched. She had never heard her nuncle’s voice break in such anger before. Ser Robert Strong tensed, ready to move should Ser Kevan take another step. “Lord Tyrell is not the enemy! The High Septon is not even the enemy! The greatest enemy to the king is sitting in that bloody chair!”

The words caused her to bristle, pure rage swelling from her body. Her eyes were murderous. One nod, she thought, that’s all it would take. I only need to nod, and Ser Robert Strong will smear Kevan’s skull over the tiles. Her champion had done it before. “You forget your place, nuncle.”

“So do you.” Ser Kevan shook his head. “If Lord Tyrell wanted this castle, or even this city, then he could have taken it. I have spent the last two months begging – begging! – Mace to be considerate, but he cannot allow this stalemate last forever. The High Septon most certainly won’t.” His shoulders were stiff. “At a certain point, they will break down the gates and consequences be damned. Do not pretend as if you have the men to hold the walls.”

“I have enough men to hold swords,” Cersei warned. “And I gave Mace Tyrell an ultimatum of my own – if he breaches the city, then his daughter, his son, his family will die long before I will.”

“Mace Tyrell does not need to breach the city. The city will let him in. The city likes him more than it does you.” Ser Kevan’s teeth grit. “And what of your own son, the king – do you count him among your list of hostages?”

* I will not let them take Tommen. He was the only thing she had left. She would die before she lost her only son. “I will protect Tommen to my dying breath,” Cersei warned, her voice a growl. “You are a fool, nuncle. You are such a fool the Imp may as well place you in motley.”

“Dammit, you–!” His eyes bulged, and he took a step forward. One more step, Cersei thought. One more step against the throne, and Ser Robert will kill him. She didn’t know what would happen after that, but she wouldn’t allow Kevan one more step. “I do not work for Tyrion!” Kevan snapped. “Neither does Lord Tyrell. There is no conspiracy, this is delusion! This is Aerys!”

“Mind your place, nuncle,” Cersei whispered.

His eyes turned to Ser Robert’s hulking figure, standing as still as a statue, and he paused. “… Surrender, niece,” Ser Kevan said finally. “Surrender Tommen and Margery, unharmed, and I can still calm Lord Tyrell. I can persuade the High Septon of a merciful sentence – nobody wants to see more war in the realm. You must surrender.”

Do not tell me what I must do. “The Imp is playing you–”

“There is no Imp here!” Kevan barked, nearly bellowing. “Tyrion Lannister is three hundred leagues away, raiding my homeland. I am now the Warden of the West, but I cannot even leave King’s Landing to stop him! Mace Tyrell desperately needs to return to his own lands too, but he cannot leave his children behind.” The man had a pained expression. “Cersei, you are not thinking clearly.”

There it is. He considers me delirious, a mad woman sitting on a man’s chair. Cersei had suffered it all her life. It would have worked, she cursed. We could have forced the Faith and the Tyrells to fight each other, we could have played our enemies off against one another. If only Kevan Lannister had a spine, if only men would listen to her.

She hadn’t been able to rally any more men to her, not with the whole city in stalemate. Ser Kevan had taken the title Warden of West after Devan Lannister’s death, and westerland lords chose him over her. Cersei had fought tooth and nail to secure the Red Keep, to secure her son, but it wasn’t enough. Enemies were all around her, yet supposedly ‘loyalist’ men had still abandoned her, all because she was a woman.

This is Tyrion’s doing. She could see her brother’s mutilated grin every time she closed her eyes.

There was a long quiet, so long that the entire hall went deathly still. Cersei took a deep breath, just to focus herself. This is my uncle’s final chance. “Ser Harys Swyft,” she said finally, her voice low, “your own goodfather. He is dead, Ser Kevan.”

Ser Kevan froze, his face twisting into a scowl. Not surprised, only angry. “Damn you Cersei,” he cursed. “How could you–”

“I did not have him killed, nuncle,” she said harshly. “Rather, Ser Harys was found dead two weeks past, in Maegor’s Holdfast itself, with a crossbow bolt through his gut.”

Ser Kevan didn’t reply, but his eyes narrowed. “Before that,” Cersei continued darkly, “It was Ser Boros Blount – he is on death’s door right now, after working as a food-taster and ingesting poison in a meal meant for Tommen himself. A meal prepared in these very kitchens.

“Two of my own handmaidens have disappeared in the last four weeks, nuncle,” she continued, “and three of my guards were picked off – one ambushed from behind, one with a crossbow, and the other one his stomach gutted with a blade. I had Lord Qyburn inspect the bodies – the wound that kill them came from an upwards thrust; the attacker was of a child’s stature.”

“Cersei…” Ser Kevan pleaded.

“One of the Redwyne twins – Horas Redwyne – he is dead too, but not by my order. Rather, the boy had snuck out of his chambers, snooping through the keep, he must have seen something he wasn’t supposed to, and an attacker killed him,” she explained stiffly. “First it was Grand Maester Pycelle and our Lord Hand, and now fourteen more bodies have joined them. An assailant is stalking these very halls, trying to reach me, and my son. How many bodies must there be before you realise it?

“Don’t you understand, nuncle? This is him – the Imp is in these very walls.”

Ser Kevan didn’t reply, but she saw his face grimace, biting his lip. “I locked the gates to keep him out,” she growled. “I barred all the exits, there’s been nobody in or out, but he’s still here. Just like when he killed father, and now he is going for my son.”

“Cersei,” Kevan said slowly. “Tyrion Lannister is in the westerlands, waging war against Casterly Rock. He leads a force of sellswords hounding my lands, threatening to even sack Lannisport. Ser Benedict writes--”

“The Imp is playing Ser Benedict for a fool!” Cersei could have screamed. “Who else do you think it is? How else do you think he knows who favours poison and crossbow, with reason to hurt my son? No, the Imp is here – snooping around in secret tunnels and crawl spaces – and it must have been the Tyrells who let him in. He is playing you all for fools.”

Ser Kevan gaped at her. “I will not allow him to get my son. Even if I must keep Tommen locked in his room, even if I must keep this whole castle locked down. So no, nuncle, the gates will remain sealed until the Imp and his plans are stopped, once and for all.”

Her shoulders were shivering, and she had to flex her hand just to calm herself. “I have given you your orders,” she said, lowering her voice again. “Arrest the fraud of a High Septon, force the Faith Militant to disband. Only then will the gates open, and we can focus on these sellswords and the mummer’s dragon my brother has arranged.”

His jaw was so tense, teeth grinding together. “I will get to the bottom of the murders, I swear I will,” Ser Kevan said carefully. “If there has been foul play, I will find out. Nobody – not myself, not Lord Tyrell – is going to allow the Golden Company to take this city. But if you surrender now, I will be able to ensure a compassionate sentence. The High Septon can be convinced. Every man and woman in this castle can walk free out of the gates.”

“I will send them over the walls by trebuchet before I allow the Imp to win,” Cersei promised. “And Mace Tyrell’s family will be the first to drop from the towers. The Imp wants to see me ruined, I will not trust his catspaw.”

Ser Kevan froze, glaring. “You have no support, Cersei. None.” He doesn’t even address me as queen.

“I have the Red Keep. This is the last bastion of the king’s rule left in the city, and your negligence could see it ruined. You forget your duty, nuncle.”

Kevan shook his head. “My duty is to my king, my family and my realm, but those interests do not align with yours.” He paused. “Once, during the Defiance of Duskendale, my brother was forced to sit outside the castle for over a year – unable to act in fear of harming the king, frozen in a stalemate that near-ruined the realm. Tywin could not act, not while the Darklyns held a blade to his liege’s throat, but that inaction cost him so much. I will not repeat his mistake.” His eyes were grim. “In eleven days’ time, when the Faith comes to tear down those gates, I will not stop them. I will help them, and gods damn you for making me.

“So no – House Lannister does not stand with you, Your Grace. House Lannister is in agreement with the Faith and House Tyrell.”

I could kill you. I need only say a word, and you will not walk away. Ser Robert Strong was ready and waiting. For a moment, there was nothing Cersei wanted to do more.

She didn’t, though. Ser Kevan waited for a reply, but Cersei gave him none. He stood and waited, but then he saw her expression and turned to walk away. Her guards held blades closely, but none blocked him. Her nuncle deserved to die for his defiance, but he was still the strongest voice commanding Lannister men in the city. Matters could become troublesome if Ser Kevan didn’t walk out again.

Still, he is a fool. If only Ser Kevan had been willing to act, then maybe it would not have turned so bad. She had allowed her nuncle to enter the Red Keep to negotiate, but in her heart Cersei had known it would be pointless.

_Ser Kevan is just too weak._

There was a long stretch of frantic, panicked silence as Ser Kevan left. Cersei didn’t stand up from the throne. She needed to stay sitting down on the damnable seat, to hide her swollen stomach from the court. She could not allow anybody to find out the pregnancy, she had taken great care to try and hide it, to stay out of view.

Even after all this time, even despite sickness every morning and constant queasiness, Cersei hadn’t the heart to drink moon tea and rid herself of the babe growing in her stomach.

*This bastard may be the only chance I have to break that cursed prophecy. If I birth four children instead of three, then the fortune Maggy the Frog set for me will be shattered._

Ser Oswell Kettleblack, upjumped sellsword and traitor, and yet Cersei was still bearing his babe.

It was all so bitter she could have laughed.

“I must beg you to forgive Ser Kevan, Your Grace,” a kindly voice said carefully, as the whiterobed figure stepped up to Cersei’s side. Lord Qyburn’s eyes were soft, compassionate, and Ser Robert Strong shifted to let him pass. “I’m afraid he’s under a great deal of stress. There has been recent news from the westerlands; the caravan carrying Ser Kevan’s wife Dorna, his son Martyn and babe Janei was ambushed less than a moon ago, as they fled from Casterly Rock to Cornfield.
There is no news yet of any survivors, and the brotherhood without banners is thought responsible.”

Cersei paused, thinking of the wrinkled lines across Ser Kevan’s brow. She had never seen her nuncle so disturbed, so frustrated. “The brotherhood without banners,” she repeated slowly, “is in the westerlands?”

Qyburn nodded. “I’m afraid so. Lady Stoneheart has been moving west ever since Riverrun.”

_They’re targeting Lannisters_, Cersei thought, feeling numb. Lady Stoneheart, the hangwoman, had been picking her targets with cold precision. The brotherhood without banners had been born in the riverlands in the wake of the War of Five Kings, but, as the new war emerged, the outlaws had moved to pillage and raze those they deemed responsible. The outlaws razed the Saltpans to seven hells, they hunted down surviving Freys, they even raided Riverrun itself, and then they brought similar destruction to the west.

“It is the Imp,” Cersei muttered, and she knew it to be true. _Why can they not see?_ “Tyrion is behind those outlaws, he’s exploiting them just as he did with the Vale clansmen. He’s using them, setting them to pillage and raze while his army moves west.”

_Of course it is him_, Cersei thought, cursing herself for not realising it sooner. A _roving group of outlaws would be the perfect tool the Imp would use to hurt my family a bit more. This Lady Stoneheart likely works for him too._

“As you say, Your Grace.”

Finally, Cersei dared to ask, though she feared she already knew the answer. “What of my brother?” she asked. “You have made inquiries into Jaime?”

Qyburn’s voice was soft. “I know only what the birds have been chirping, Your Grace,” he said apologetically, “and yet whispers have been spreading that Ser Jaime was taken by the brotherhood as well. I’m afraid your brother was captured by both the Hound and Brienne of Tarth, and is said to have been executed by Lady Stoneheart.”

He paused, trying to measure her reaction. She did give him one. “One whisper said that they pushed Ser Jaime off the cliffs at Acorn Hall,” Qyburn said lowly, “but I have not been able to find a soul to confirm.”

Cersei just nodded.

She had refused to believe it for so long. For a long time, she had clung to the hope that Jaime would return, bringing reinforcements from their scattered army that might save her. Her beautiful knight would return to protect his sister and his son. But then the weeks had turned into months without sight or sound of her brother, and Cersei’s heart had turned to stone.

_We were supposed to be together forever; Jaime and I had been joined for life._ And yet Tyrion had stolen that joy from her as well. First it had been Cersei’s mother, then her son, her father, her brother… Cersei knew what he was doing. The Imp was going to kill her whole family, but leave her for last.

_There is no creature more accursed and wicked than a dwarf._

Qyburn was still talking, gently chattering away while Cersei stared down at the doors on the other side of the hall. “I know that Lord Tyrell is feeling very… stretched, as well. The news from Oldtown has caused many of the Reach bannermen to become restless. The city is said to have been left devastated in the storm, but I cannot tell to what extent the reports have been exaggerated.” He grimaced quietly. “My apologies, Your Grace, but with the siege and our movements restricted, I do not have the same sources of information that I used to.”

There was no reply. Lord Qyburn sighed, and continued, pacing around the steps of the throne as he talked slowly. “Fear of for his daughter’s life has held Mace Tyrell at bay, but that will not last much longer. Without Ser Kevan’s support, then we have none of the westerland lords with us, Your Grace. Ser Kevan has seized control of the gold cloaks in the city too,” he warned. “And, regardless, both Lord Tyrell and the High Septon maintain a strong presence in the city, and both their forces greatly outnumber his.

“I hear that the Faith Militant continues to grow; a thousand knights have joined the Warrior’s Sons, and many times that number Poor Fellows.”

A city in stalemate. All around her, it felt like the kingdom was falling apart. The Golden Company had been making great progress, because there was nobody capable of stopping them. _Exactly as the Imp planned_, Cersei cursed, _I tried to break free of the web but I only got myself entangled in it_.

“Kevan’s inactivity has doomed us all,” Cersei muttered.

“Not yet, Your Grace,” Qyburn whispered. “We are not doomed yet.”

“It proceeds?” she asked, and her master of whispers nodded.

“It proceeds very well,” Lord Qyburn said with a smile, but he said no more than that. _We can’t speak of the plan here_, she told herself, _not in the court, where there are still those who might overhear_. Still, that glimmer in Qyburn’s eyes gave her hope.

She knew that he had been scurrying through the tunnel, twice, thrice a fortnight, bringing captives from the city by the score – whores and other lowborn women that she doubted would be missed.
The Red Keep had so few serving women left now. She didn’t know, or care to know, his reasons for needing so many women. She only knew that he needed captives to… process. Preferably women, and in some quantity for his work. Still, Cersei had seen the results of his efforts, and she was more than happy to finance them.

I am a lioness, she thought, even if my nuncle is toothless, I will bear fangs myself.

“Escort me to my chambers, Lord Qyburn. Your work in the Black Cells is all the more urgent.”

“Very well, Your Grace.” She winced slightly as she stood up, the pain in her stomach causing her to grimace. “And I will prepare a poultice to ease your back – I know what a burden sitting in that chair is.”

“Much obliged, my lord.” He is the only true ally I have left. If not for Lord Qyburn’s gentle hands, his skills and knowledge, Cersei might truly be doomed. She wrapped his arm around his, stepping down the dais from the Iron Throne. Ser Robert Strong walked close behind.

One week left, she thought. It would be a coin flip whether or not their preparations would be done in time.

I will not let them have my little boy. I am doing this for you, Tommen.

Cersei knew that not even Maegor’s Holdfast itself was safe. The Red Keep had degenerated into a tense and frightful place. The cells were overfilled with hostages, many of the doors were locked, and even her own guards never walked anywhere alone. There were shadows everywhere, threatening to strangle her.

The highborn hostages couldn’t be trusted, nor could the servants. Lord Qyburn had to prepare the meals for Cersei and the king with his own hands, to avoid poison in their meals. There had been attempts to form riots by their noble ‘guests’ themselves, and the threat remained of the Faith Militant. Many times now, soldiers with grapnels had tried to sneak over the walls under cover of darkness, to rescue hostages.

King Tommen had to stay locked up in his room constantly; the whole tower was sealed while only a precious few even allowed through. Her son wailed and begged, trapped alone in his chambers for weeks on end, but he didn’t understand.

Not even Cersei could walk freely through the castle. Everywhere she went, Ser Robert Strong was a constant shape behind her. Her champion was a hulking, tireless figure clad in steel so thick it could have been used to plate a war elephant. The voiceless knight was stronger than a dozen men, and nothing short of an army could threaten her while Ser Robert was by her side.

It should have made her feel reassured, but it didn’t. If they couldn’t hurt her physically, Cersei knew her enemies would just find another way to get at her.

One week left. Cersei knew she would need every single day just to prepare.

“Lady Margaery,” Cersei whispered as they walked. “Have the men resume their efforts with zeal, we must draw a confession from Margaery quickly. Prepare her, for her trial.”

“As your say, Your Grace.” Qyburn bowed.

Cersei’s one reassurance was that Margaery was surely despising their captivity more than she was. The little whore was locked in the Maidenvault – a place that was too good for her – but Qyburn had handpicked the guards to watch over her and question her.

It was a long day, and a restless night. They barred the door to the queen’s apartments, and Ser Robert Strong stood and waited outside like a golem.

She slept in an empty bed, and she despised sleeping alone. Cersei thoughts lingered back to Taena Merryweather – warm and shapely, beautiful and trustworthy. She had been the last person to share Cersei’s bed, the last solace Cersei had. And then Taena had been the first victim, the first body to be found, along with her husband and the Grand Maester. The Imp murdered her just to hurt me, Cersei thought, stirring as she tried to sleep. The pain had yet to fade. Another happiness that my brother stole from me.

Cersei didn’t actually manage to sleep, but she was still shook by the sound of ringing from the gates early in the morn.

Even before she walked out of her chambers, she knew there was something happening. The drawbridge was raised, but she could still see activity on the streets below. She always could, now. The Faith had been camped outside the castle for months, swarming the streets like rats. A permanent garrison of barefooted mongrels, outside her very gates. They even had raised cloth and straw effigies of topless wantons not too long ago, lifting the caricatures up on sticks in an attempt to shame her.

Now the streets were moving, bells ringing attention. We’re not under attack, then – they wouldn’t alert us so. Another messenger perhaps? Did Kevan return? Unless her nuncle’s stance had changed, there was little to renegotiate.

Cersei had to dress herself, for there were no handmaids left to tend to her.

She wrapped a heavy, red velvet shawl around her shoulders, so long it covered down to her knees. The cool early winter air was cold enough to justify it, and the shawl was thick and loose enough to disguise her pregnancy, at least to anyone who didn’t step too close.

Ser Robert was in the exact same position as he had been the night before, waiting to escort her down the stairs.

As she walked through the main hall, she saw Ser Meryn Trant – the last Kingsguard still serving – while he hesitated in the hallway. He still wore his white and silver armour, but his rich, wool cloak was looking rather more grimy since the washerwomen’s rounds had ended. “Ser,” the queen called. “What is happening?”

“They have spread orders to clear the streets, Your Grace” Ser Meryn replied, looking hesitant. He had never been the best of the Kingsguard, she thought, but he knew where his loyalties lay. “A convoy of Warrior’s Sons wishes to bring a messenger through the gates.”

“Really?” She frowned. “The Faith has blocked all messages to the castle.” The flea-bitten fools even had archers poised to shoot down any ravens coming to or from the keep. Not that it had actually stopped me, as the secret tunnels under the Red Keep remain undetected.

“The High Septon decreed that this one is allowed through,” Ser Meryn explained. “They must see it as important, Your Grace. Should we allow it?”

Cersei considered it. The Faith had been very diligently trying to completely cut the Red Keep off from the outside world. Ser Kevan had spent weeks pleading with High Septon to be allowed through. “Do so,” Cersei ordered. “But under heavy guard. Double the patrols on the walls – it may be a trap or a distraction – and alert Lord Qyburn when this envoy arrives. No more than four are allowed through, and bring them straight to me before the Throne – do not let any out of your sights.”
That damnable iron seat again. Still, she had to sit on it – she would not let herself be seen as anything less than in control when they arrived.

They rang the bells as the drawbridge was lowered, and again when it raised. Still, the wait until they actually passed through the gates and walked to the holdfast was excruciating. Cersei wouldn’t pace or twitch, though – she sat rigid like a statue in the cavernous, ghostly Great Hall.

Four men in bright inlaid silver armour, polished to perfection, were walked stiffly through the doors, none of them were allowed swords on their hip. A seven-pointed star was engraved onto their breastplate, they wore rainbow cloaks clasped with silver stars.

Her eyes narrowed. They didn’t bow. Why do they refuse to bow?

One of the men – a clean-shaven man with wrinkled eyes – stepped forward. He was withered stork of a man with a stern, sad face like it was carved from gnarly wood. “I am Ser Bonifer Hasty of the Holy Hundred, serving the Noble and Puissant Order of the Warrior’s Sons, my lady,” the knight said by way of greeting. “I was given explicit orders by the Most Devout not to lower my head in your presence. The Faith honours King Tommen Baratheon, but it does not recognise the legitimacy of your regency.”

She tensed. My lady. Another barb meant to hurt her. That disrespect alone was enough to kill him. And yet the Warrior’s Sons could well intensify their siege if I do take his head. The Swords and Stars could well become more aggressive. The High Sparrow will likely demand retribution, and it is too early for such rash action. Cersei still needed more time.

“I know of you, Ser Bonifer. Ser Bonifer the Good, as you call yourself,” Cersei replied coldly. “You served for Renly, and then you served Stannis. You submitted to the rightful King Joffrey after defeat, and then you abandoned that duty as well to join a rebellion uprising. You seem to enjoy treason, ser.” The wages of treason should be death.

She expected him to grimace, or to fluster. Instead, Ser Bonifer only nodded. “I serve what is right and what is just, my lady – as the Warrior commands me to,” he said solemnly. “I thought that was Stannis, once, but I was mistaken. And yet the Crone’s lantern has cleared the fog from me now, and I serve in the Light of the Seven.”

“You serve a fraud, ser.” Her eyes narrowed. “You have spent months outside my gates, keeping them closed. Nothing in or out, that was your sparrow’s ruling. So tell me, why do you break that rule now?”

“Out of respect for your loss, my lady,” he replied grimly, and nodded to his man. One of the knights was holding a box, keeping it at arm’s length. “The Most Devout wanted you to see this message as exactly as it arrived.”

The Warrior’s Son stepped forward, carrying the box gingerly. A heavy box of ebony and silver, smooth and extravagant. The knight placed it solemnly at the foot of the dais to the Iron Throne, and then backed away.

Cersei’s gaze went dark, but she didn’t step up from her seat to take it. She did not want to reveal her bloated stomach, she would not stand up for these pious fools of knights. She waited until Lord Qyburn scampered across the hall, to lift the box up and bring it to her. The air was silent for a few long heartbeats as Lord Qyburn scampered.

That box, Cersei thought slowly, a hint of recognition coming to her. I’ve seen that box before.
There was a parchment fixed atop the lid, the envelope left open. Qyburn picked that up first, unrolled it, and brought towards her. They’ve already read it, Cersei knew, looking at the gaze in the Warrior’s Son’s eyes. The knights were all tense with anticipation as the dry parchment reached her hands.

She didn’t recognise the handwriting, but her heart skipped as she saw the name signed at the bottom.

“My dear sister,” the curled letters read. “I promised you that I would hurt you. I said that a day would come when you think yourself safe and happy, and suddenly your joy will turn to ashes in your mouth.

“Now you know the debt is paid.”

It was signed, “Tyrion Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock.”

There was no visible reaction, but Cersei’s hands couldn’t move. She just froze, as if her blood had turned to solid ice. “It was brought on a galley from Dorne, my lady,” Ser Bonifer was saying as Lord Qyburn bent down the box, the old man’s back causing him to wince. “They paid the captain fifty gold pieces to deliver it straight to your hand. We intercepted the vessel as it arrived in port.”

The lid opened with a creak. As it opened, she saw Lord Qyburn grimace as soon as he looked inside. Her master of whispers gave something that sounded like a sigh.

Lord Qyburn lifted up a bleached white skull, padded inside the large, felt-lined box. Cersei just stared woodenly, and then she noticed the locks of golden hair that were also shoved inside.

The skull was far too small for an adult. A child’s skull; the flesh picked clean off it and the bone so white it could have been polished. It had perfect white teeth that seemed to sneer.

Cersei couldn’t breathe. The world turned.

Dorne. It came from Dorne.

That hair… The locks of hair that filled the box. Cersei remembered her daughter’s silky golden hair, she remembered stroking it, brushing it as her baby fell asleep in her lap. She remembered Myrcella’s smile, her laugh, so bright and full of life.

Empty eye sockets stared back at her.

It had been over three years since she had last seen her little girl, and now the skull was sneering at her. You let them take me, the toothy smile mocked, *you let the Imp take me away from you.

Couldn’t… breathe. Throat jammed, fingers twitching. Her hands clenched the Iron Throne so tightly that one of the blades nicked her wrist. Blood swelled, but she couldn’t even feel it…

All eyes were on her, staring at her so intently, but she couldn’t even…

That box, a small part whispered in the back of her brain. That’s the same box we used to send the Mountain’s head to Dorne. My daughter’s head.

They used the same box.

She could have screamed, wailed, but her throat wasn’t working. The hall was spinning, the sky was collapsing.
Vaguely, somewhere in the distance, she heard words. Lord Qyburn’s voice was weirdly sharp, demanding answers, and the Warrior’s Sons recounted the others letters they had received. Even when the skull was set back into the box, she could feel it staring at her. Myrcella’s empty gaze was on her, her eyes accusing.

The walls were melting, the ground breaking, her heart dying…

A force of men had been besieging High Hermitage on the order of Queen Cersei and Prince Doran’s, voices were saying, to bring Ser Gerold Dayne to justice. To punish the fiend that had maimed the princess’s face and murdered Ser Arys. The small force of men led by Obara Sand, Areo Hotah of prince’s personal guard, and Ser Balon Swann of the Kingsguard, to bring the Crown’s justice.

Ravens from Dorne said that House Dayne of High Hermitage had refused to surrender the Darkstar to Obara Sand and Ser Balon Swann at first, but then Areo Hotah arrived with more reinforcements. After a short standoff, High Hermitage conceded. They opened the gates, and Ser Gerold Dayne was surrendered by his family.

Areo Hotah, Ser Balon and Obara Sand came to collect him. The Darkstar tried to resist, but he was outnumbered and overpowered.

And then Obara Sand switched sides.

Obara Sand ambushed Areo Hotah from behind while the Darkstar attacked Ser Balon. There had been a fight, a battle breaking out in the courtyard. The Darkstar overpowered and decapitated Ser Balon himself.

Obara Sand had fought Areo Hotah off until the Darkstar could join that fight as well. As the captain of the prince’s guard tried to match two against one, the Sand Snake put her spear through the captain’s back.

Afterwards, Obara Sand and Gerold Dayne joined forces and rode very quickly to Starfall, where Princess Myrcella was being held. They arrived before news of what happened at High Hermitage could follow them. Together they walked through the castle on the Prince of Dorne’s command, and they killed Princess Myrcella in the middle of Starfall itself.

“Armies in the Boneway and the Prince’s Pass have started to move north,” Ser Bonifer was saying. “Ravens have been flying from Sunspear. Dorne has declared open rebellion, my lady.”

Obara Sand. Somewhere through the haze of indescribable emotions, that was the name Cersei focused on. Obara Sand – the bastard daughter of the Red Viper. Her father had fought as the Imp’s champion, and then he had the bastard daughter kill Cersei’s little princess.

“We understand that this must be difficult for you, and the High Septon is not unsympathetic to your loss. The Faith recognises your right to mourn,” the knight continued. “There will be candles lit for Myrcella Baratheon, and the High Septon will pray for the Stranger to take her gently to a better place. And I bring a message from Ser Kevan Lannister too, who offers his very deepest apologies, and urges you to be reasonable—”

“Reasonable? Reasonable?!” she said shrilly, the first words she said since the box opened. She was gasping for air, barely able to breathe… “He killed my little girl!”

Ser Bonifer paled. “I assure you, my lady, that the High Septon will never allow such monstrous act – the Most Devout has condemned the murder–”

“Kill them.” Her voice turned as sharp as a knife.

The Warrior’s Sons blinked, but Cersei was looking at Ser Robert. “Kill them,” she ordered.

Lord Qyburn grimaced, rubbing his eyes. Ser Robert took a slow step forward, and the knights backed away. They were clutching at empty scabbards. “Your Grace, I am a messenger – I came under a banner of truce!” Ser Bonifer screamed. “You promised safe passage, you–”

“Kill them!”

“Stop! By the rights of hospitality!” Ser Bonifer screamed to the giant knight. “In the name of the Fathe–”

Ser Robert didn’t even need to draw his sword. The Warrior’s Sons tried to flee, but the hulking white-cloaked man lunged with startling speed. So fast that the stones cracked under his massive weight, a solid boom of metal against rock as the iron boots hit the ground. A hand like a sledgehammer shot out, and suddenly goliath fingers were wrapping around Ser Bonifer’s head.

Ser Robert’s arm jerked, and Ser Bonifer flopped.

She heard the crack of bone. The stones cracked as the man’s skull exploded over the hall.

Another of the Warrior’s Sons tried to stop him, but then he swung a single, massive backhanded swipe from the gauntleted fist. The man’s neck cracked.

The final two tried to run, but they weren’t fast enough. Ser Robert was already lunging, yanking the first Warrior’s Son by the neck and hoisting him physically off the floor in a casual swing. The other knight barely managed to skitter a dozen steps away, before the body of his colleague was being slung into his back like a rag doll.

Cersei heard their shiny armour clinging together like a broken bell.

They both crumpled to the floor, and Ser Robert walked, slowly, towards them. One of them looked dead, but the other Warrior’s Son was squealing, begging for mercy in the name of the Mother. He was squealing right up until Ser Robert raised a massive steel boot, and stomped down on the man’s face.

“Your Grace,” Lord Qyburn said slowly. Not angrily, or even shocked, just… disappointed. “That may have been ill-advised.”

She didn’t care. Four bloody corpses were left smeared over the stones, Ser Robert Strong’s boots stained with red. Cersei didn’t even blink. Her gazed was focused entirely on the box, and that smiling, sneering skull…

“‘Ther!’ Myrcella screamed, gap-tooth mouth grinning. “Mother! Look what I got!”

She held a butterfly in her hands, her tiny little fingers clenched around her. The four-year old had been so determined to catch one, and so eager to show it off.

The babe was so energetic, so youthful. She couldn't quite pronounce ‘Mother’, instead she’d skip the first syllable. Cersei’s little girl was grinning so brightly, so proudly, as the bright red wings fluttered. Cersei heart swelled, it felt like her chest could have burst…
“Your Grace,” Lord Qyburn was saying, though she could hardly focus on the words. “We must…”

“Mother!” Myrcella called, running for her. “Mother!”

Even as a child of five, she was so beautiful and courteous. She grinned as she did her curtsies, but Myrcella was so eager she stumbled slightly as she lowered her head. Cersei could only laugh, kneeling down for her little girl. Her daughter’s emerald eyes were glowing, as she clutched a wisp of red fabric. “The septa helped me stitch it,” Myrcella said sheepishly, holding up the needlework, “but I made it for you to wear.”

It was the worst sigil of a lion Cersei had ever seen, in truth – it looked more like a crumpled dog, and the gold thread was stained red from where the needle pricked her fingers. Myrcella so wanted her to wear it on her dress, but Cersei had to wear the golden clasp instead. Still, the queen kept that handkerchief tucked into her dress, close to her skin, all through the feast…

While most girls were stitching favours for boys or gallant princes, Myrcella only ever stitched for her mother or her little brother.

“May the Mother’s blessing be upon you,” her daughter giggled, just like the septa told her to…

“You Grace!” Lord Qyburn was shaking her shoulder, just trying to get her to respond. “Your Grace, the Faith will expect its messengers to retu–”

“Leave me,” Cersei said, her voice so low and her shoulders so stiff. Lord Qyburn didn’t move, and Cersei’s voice broke. “Leave me!”

Lord Qyburn backed away. Cersei took a long gaze between the silver box and the bloody tiles, and then her arms shook. She stood up herself, storming away…

“I don’t want to go to Winterfell,” her little girl squirmed, a strong and stubborn child of seven. “It’s cold up there. I hear they have snows during summer.”

“You’ve never seen the snow before, my darling,” Cersei chided, tucking at the collar of her dress.

“No, but I heard the septa talking about it. She said that the seven hells were cold, filled with ice and heretics,” Myrcella said, “and that the north is half as bad. Do I have to go?”

“I’m afraid so,” Cersei sighed. She hoped that Myrcella would never have to see snow at all, that her summer would last forever. “Your father insists.”

The girl pouted. “I had bad dreams about the north. They scared me.”

“None of that now,” Cersei tapped her on the head, frowning. “You’re princess and you’re a lion. You don’t show fear.”

She turned around to pick out Myrcella’s dresses, while the girl folded her arms unhappily.

“Well, will we see Uncle Tyrion?” Myrcella asked suddenly, her voice turning hopeful. Cersei froze, face twisting into a scowl. “I like him!” the girl protested. “He makes me laugh” …

She nearly collapsed. On to the floor, shivering. There were tears down her cheeks, and she couldn't stop them. Her shoulders shaking, her body trembling. Couldn’t move, couldn’t…

“Myrcella’s phantom voice called. “Mother…!””
Her daughter's cry was drowned out by the Imp’s cackling laugh.

Her stomach was churning, the unformed babe felt like it was writhing. She was doubled over in grief and pain. He did this, Cersei thought. The Imp did this. He killed my little girl.

Her demon brother was laughing at her, making his cruel jests. “My sister,” Tyrion’s voice mocked in her ear, “I returned your box for you, but the rest of your daughter just didn’t fit inside of it!”

It was him, him and that sparrow of a septon, those treacherous snakes, all the fiendish cutthroats, fools and flatterers dancing on his strings…

“Your Grace,” Lord Qyburn said nervously, hovering behind her. The master of whispers looked more lost than he ever had. “I apolog– um, there’s another parchment inside the box. Another letter.”

He was holding out a different leaf of paper. Cersei could barely see straight through all the tears, but she needed to know, she needed to…

She grabbed the parchment and stared at it. This one was written in a different hand, a different writer. It's my brother’s handwriting, it is. Cersei recognised Tyrion’s jotted scrawl anywhere.

The parchment read, “Release the rightful Queen Margaery immediately, dear sister, or I will take even more from you. This is your final warning.”

Cersei stared. Her hands tightened, crumpling the parchment in her fist.

It was him. Him and that dolt of a Lord of Highgarden, and the little whore…

I knew it. I knew it was. Her hands curled so tightly her nails pierced the skin. They killed my daughter.

“Where is Margaery Tyrell?” Cersei demanded, so loud that Qyburn flinched. “Where is she?”

“Your Grace, mayhaps–”

“Where is she?” Cersei bellowed, her bloody hands gripping Qyburn’s white collar. Her palms were bleeding from the jagged edges of the Iron Throne, but she didn’t care. She couldn’t feel it. “I want to see her.”

“The Maidenvault, Your Grace,” Qyburn gulped. “I will have her brought–”

“No.” Cersei’s voice was a snarl. “I want to see her.”

She was already storming upwards, swaying slightly as she walked, her shoes nearly tripping over her long, red shawl. Lord Qyburn called after her, but she couldn’t hear it.

It was the first time in nearly four weeks that she had left the Maegor’s Holdfast. The bright sunlight was nearly blinding, her shoes tapping down the stone steps. The guards on the door looked stunned and confused as she barrelled past, but Ser Robert Strong trailed behind her in long, slow steps.

The Maidenvault was a long-slate-roofed keep built behind the Royal Sept, pale and proud overlooking the cliffs at the east side of the Red Keep. Two tall carved doors blocked the way, each one showing images of the Maiden herself – that gentle smile sneering at her.

Cersei tottered up the steps, her brother’s cruel laugh still echoing on the wind. The doors were locked, she cursed, and likely barricaded too. “Open up!” she demanded. “In the name of the king!”

A hatch opened on the door, and she heard the rustle of weapons. “Who goes th–” a gruff voice bellowed, but it stopped as the man saw Cersei. “Your Grace!”

“Open up. Let me see her.”

She heard the clatter of heavy bolts shuddering. They opened with a groan, and a corridor of half a dozen men in tattered armour looked at her. The corridor was a tip – the marble floors of the hallway littered with splats of ale, chicken bones and scraps of rotten food. A flicker past through their gazes with the sight of her, many glancing down to her swollen stomach, but the hulking figure of Ser Robert kept them back.

“Where is Margaery Tyrell?” Cersei demanded.

“In the whor–” a man with sandy blond hair hesitated. “In Rhaena’s Chamber, Your Grace.”

Cersei was already stepping forward, moving up to the spiral staircase. Qyburn was behind her, ordering to the men. “Go back to your duties,” he snapped, panting slightly as he chased after his queen.

There was a man on the upper landing – a gruff and broad figure with cheeks scarred by pox and a ragged beard over his chin – flinching in surprise as Cersei came stepping up. Craster, Cersei recalled vaguely. The door to the chambers was locked and sealed by a slab of timber, and she noticed improvised… tools piled up before it. Lengths of wood, leather belts, and a few chains.

Craster stood by the marble hearth, where an iron pot filled with water bubbled over the fire. “Margaery,” Cersei demanded, deep breaths to calm herself. “How have you been questioning her?”

“You– Your Grace?”

“How?” she snapped, “Describe the methods you’ve applied.”

The man paused, stepping backwards slightly. “Lengths of cloth soaked in boiling water, squeezed around her face,” Craster said cautiously, motioning to the pot. “Leather belts, occasionally, but softened to avoid welts. We give her nothing but vinegar in her drink, sometimes the boys swapped it out for piss. One time, Raff tied her to the bed, and whipped her with a stick wrapped in wool. You said not to leave lasting marks, Your Grace.”

“I did.” Her eyes turned to the pot of boiling water. “And the questions?”

“Lord Qyburn instructed us what to ask, and the answers she needed to give.”

“Does she give them?” She glanced around the pile of tools, eyes searching for one with the sharpest edge.

“Sometimes,” Craster nodded. “Not reliably enough. But we’re working on it.”

“Not fast enough.” Her gaze settled on the iron poker sticking out of flames, its edge glowing red hot. “Leave.”

There was a pause. “Leave!” Cersei snapped. “All of you leave, now!”
On the edge of the steps, Lord Qyburn looked disapproving, but he didn’t move to stop her. Cersei pulled the iron poker from the flames, flinching slightly as she touched it.

Daena’s Chamber had been a lavish room of white marble, but now it was stripped bare – the windows were shuttered and slammed, the silk drapes ripped from the walls and the Myrish carpet torn from the floor. The marble remained, but there was no luxury left – the queen-sized four-poster bed was lacking a mattress, no pillows allowed.

And Margaery Tyrell was standing upright, wide eyes fixed on the door, as Cersei came barging through.

The young woman was pale and gaunt. Her once silky brown hair was like straw, her unblemished skin was covered in ugly, red welts. Lips that had once been red and plump were dry and cracked. There were no silk or satin dresses for her, not here – instead Margaery only a dress that once might have been fine, but now it was torn and stained. The shoulders of her dress were ripped, and her trembling hands had to clutch the fabric to cover her modesty.

The whole room stunk of piss and shit and tears.

She is not more beautiful than me. She was never anything more than a little whore.

The girl’s mouth stammered. Her gaze flickered between Cersei’s wide and crazed eyes, Cersei’s bloated stomach, and then the red-hot poker in Cersei’s hands.

Even just seeing Margaery again… so much grief and rage pulsed through Cersei’s body that her vision blurred.

Her hands tightened around the poker, the burning end hissing quietly. Margaery backed away, stammering to speak.

Cersei brandished the poker, gripping it like a sword. “Tell me what you did,” Cersei said quietly, “You were working for him, and I want you to admit it.”

Margaery’s mouth hung open, and for a few seconds Cersei thought maybe the girl had lost the ability to speak.

“You’re mad,” the little queen croaked.

Wrong answer. Cersei’s body flushed with pure, mindless rage. A cry broke her lips as the burning poker struck out.

Margaery staggered backwards, but the burning edge came so close it clipped Margaery’s wrist. She shrieked, squirming. “Get away from me!” Margaery howled. “Get away! Somebody help! Help!”

“Admit it!” Cersei roared furiously. “You will confess, you little slut!”

The feeling… it was like gripping a sword. She had always wanted to hold a sword. I want to do this myself.

The woman fell to the floor, whimpering and squirming. Cersei lashed out again, swinging the poker in mad strokes. Cersei tried to lunge, yet Margaery scampered out of the way.

Release Margaery, Tyrion had demanded in his letter. Why was the Imp so concerned for the little slut’s safety, unless they were working together?
A vision flashed before Cersei’s eyes. The wedding. The little whore had been laughing and smiling, dressed smugly in silk and sapphires, all the while Margaery watched Tyrion drop the poison into Joffrey’s cup. They had planned it together from the beginning. Margaery had distracted Joffrey with her low-cut cleavage, while Tyrion did the deed.

Margaery might have been trying to form words, but they were lost in a shriek of pain.

She cowered against the wall, all the while Cersei held the poker’s edge against her pretty little face. “Admit it! Admit it!”

He killed my daughter. Tyrion was trying to intimidate her, to her cow her into surrendering. He hopes that I will be so lost in grief and fear that I’ll release Margaery. It wouldn’t work. Cersei wouldn’t let it work.

They had been working together all along.

The little whore raised her hands to cover herself, and the poker clipped against them with a hissing of burning flesh. Margaery wailed. “You killed my son! You killed my daughter!” Cersei screamed, standing over her. “Admit it! Admit what you did.”

Tears streaming down her cheeks. Margaery’s face was red and twisted with pain. Her dress was falling off her shoulder, her modesty forgotten about. “You evil fucking spiteful bitch!” Margaery wailed through the pain. “You fucking bitch!

She shrieked. The words… they sounded like Tyrion’s voice. Cersei’s hands lashed out, and the poker stabbed straight into Margaery’s shoulder. The girl convulsed, smoke hissing.

Cersei expected her to fall down, and yet Margaery lunged like a wounded animal.

One second she was on the ground, and then the next the little whore was leaping at her. The poker was knocked straight out of Cersei’s grasp, and furious hands lunged for her.

The world spun. Everything smelled of burnt flesh. They both landed against the stone floor together with a painful thud, squirming and wrestling.

“You bitch!” Margaery was wailing. “You bitch! You bitch!”

The girl was desperate. Cersei was caught off-guard but her hands struck out, a clenched fist that caught the bitch’s cheek. Shrieking, Margaery toppled. Cersei kicked her in the ribs, in the breasts, once, twice, thrice, but frantic fingers grabbed her foot, her dress, and pulled her down.

They were both on the ground. Margaery’s arms were skinny, her body frail. Starved and tortured for two months. Even off-guard, even pregnant, Cersei could overpower her.

Yet Margaery kicked and screamed, thrashed and hissed. Squirming with all her might just to push Cersei away.

Cersei’s hands were tried to grip her wrists, to hold her down, but them her knees whacked into Cersei’s side. She staggered, and lunged for the throat instead.

Margaery was beneath her – on her back like a common little whore – while Cersei’s hands wrapped around her neck. She kicked and she thrashed, but Cersei squeezed. She had never squeezed so hard in her life, there had never been anything she wanted to do more…

It felt like her brother’s neck.
Margaery’s hands were thrashing, squirming at Cersei’s face. Her nails were like claws, gouging her. Cersei felt the red worms tear at her cheeks, at her brow, she blinked at the blood swelling over her vision. A knee slammed into her stomach. But she couldn’t move her hands.

Cersei was screaming while Margaery gurgled – the bitch’s hands tearing and scratching at her cheeks and eyes, her forehead and lips. There was blood spurring downwards, dripping against the floor as Margaery choked.

The little queen’s face turned red, and then darker. Her cheeks plumed purple, and her movements became more jagged, more desperate.

Cersei’s grip didn’t slacken.

It was only when Margaery finally turned still, that Cersei dropped. She was lying bloodied on the floor, tears and blood dripping from her chin. Her hands moved upwards, and she could feel the scratches gouged by the woman’s nails. The scratches went deep, they would scar.

Margaery died with her face bloated and eyes ready to burst, and yet she had left Cersei a ruin. The queen could hear Tyrion’s howling laughter echoing around the room.

Her stomach was writhing. Cersei felt blood, dripping down the inside of her legs.

As she heard footsteps scampering back at the steps, Cersei was still on the floor. Lord Qyburn looked between Margaery’s still corpse, back to Cersei and her bloody face.

“IT was him,” she gasped. “IT was Tyrion. He did this, he did this.”

“My queen…” the spymaster knelt onto the floor beside her, wrapping his arms around her shoulder. Blood against his white robes. “It’s alright, Your Grace. We can handle us…”

“My son!” Cersei wailed, through the wheezy sobs. “My daughter! They killed my…!”

Qyburn nodded, holding her so, so gently. “They did, Your Grace. They did.”

She could feel his hands patting against her back, his body cradling hers. “But we have solution, Your Grace. We have the ultimate solution,” he whispered soothingly. His head turned, to stare at Margaery's wide-eyed body. “My skills… they have improved. Joffrey, Myrcella, your father, your brother…. we could bring them back, Your Grace. We could bring them all back.”
Chapter 38

Chapter Summary

The Father and the Stranger...

The Father

He could see the army of men stretched out over the distance, their banners bright against the green and brown landscape. There was a winter chill in the air and grey clouds to the west, but the sun was bright and the morning air crisp and clear with the sound of boots and warhorns.

The Golden Company was camped along the roseroad, a few leagues south from where it joined with the kingsroad. The road was wide and muddy, the trees hacked away and the twisting path through the woods carved by a stream of travellers and carts. Normally there would be caravans, peddlers and horses moving up and down the path, but today there was nothing but quiet, and a tense frenzy in the foreground, where soldiers felled trees of the kingswood to build stakewalls, battering rams and stonethrowers.

The kingswood was thick with oaks and pines, and the Golden Company hacked them down by the hundreds. They were now so deeply encamped and barricaded into the road that it would take a force many times their number to scatter their position.

To the centre of the sprawling camp, all around the cloth-of-gold command tent, flew a forest of banners. Looming over them all was the three-headed dragon, riffling in the wind. For the first time in a generation, the red and black banner of House Targaryen was flying over Westeros.

"We are only leagues away from King's Landing, Lord Connington thought. They hold the Blackwater against us, but we hold the roseroad. It was a strategic position; no more caravans from the Reach could get through to the capital, and Mace Tyrell could not pass back to his own lands – not while the main force of the Golden Company blocked the path.

Still, Jon rode twice around the encampment, inspecting every inch of the fortifications. The Golden Company were professionals, and set a good camp. Even Arthur Dayne would be proud. There can be no mistake, not here.

A sound boomed through the air. A horn, signalling the return of one of the Company's forward parties. Jon kicked and sent his horse into a canter, and was waiting for the troop of men as they came through the bulwarks. They were flying a banner of a black ploughman on brown, one that, until a few fortnights ago, he hadn't seen in years. River's party, Jon realised. They've returned.

Jon glanced over the column of men as they approached. They had sent Ser Tristan Rivers to the riverlands with fifty soldiers over a moon's turn ago, and he had returned as Lord Tristan Darry, with three hundred mustered men in tow. Now the man was returning again, with twenty of his picked soldiers, all mounted cavalry. The men trotted through the bulwarks, and Jon approached their commander, giving a single nod.

"How many are there?" Lord Connington demanded from atop his grey palfrey. There was no waste of smalltalk or greetings.
Lord Tristan Darry paused and scratched his red whiskers. Once an exiled sellsword bastard, now legitimised and married into the newly-reformed House Darry. It had been one of the Imp's better notions, Jon was loath to admit. House Darry lives again. Married less than a moon ago, Tristan's lordship remained tenuous. The man hadn't even had the time to sleep under his new roof, had been forced to leave his new Frey wife behind after a single bedding. Still, it was one of the threads in the rope that was steadily gaining them the support of the petty lords.

"I reckon no more than thirty thousand," the new lord decided. "We saw them amassing on the Blackwater, I spoke to a few smallfolk running from the capital. Thirty thousand across the river, and far more Reachmen than anything else."

"Not so many," Ser Marq Mandrake argued by his side, his pox-ridden face twitching. "I saw the same host, and my scouts got closer. There were closer to twenty than thirty, I say, but they would not admit it themselves – the rose lord keeps his ranks wide to try and bloat his numbers. I suspect that much of their bulwark guard were scarecrows wearing helmets, trying make his army to appear more imposing than it is. Entire pavilions of empty tents, false fires at night, by my reckoning. Mark my words; say two and twenty thousand."

"We will assume five and twenty," Jon said firmly. Many of their scouts had been similarly unsure. Mace Tyrell leads the forces, but the care and cunning in their tactics reeks of Lord Randyll Tarly's hand. It was not an encouraging sign. "But I want better numbers as soon as possible, and have your scouts log all of the banners they can see. Tell me exactly who we are facing."

"Aye, my lord." They both nodded.

"What of news from the riverlands?" Lord Connington demanded of Lord Darry. "Did you beseech House Mallister?"

"Aye. The new Lord Mallister is a boy of twelve," Tristan said foully. "Too busy pissing his pants in fear of ice dragons to join behind the rightful one. We'll have no support from him."

"Pity." But not unexpected. "That means both Mallister and Blackwood refuse to support us."

"None of the riverlords are rushing to join with the usurper either," Will Cole, another serjeant, noted. "There is little will left to fight left in the riverlands."

Lord Connington nodded. The riverlords were more occupied trying to feed their people, and exhausted by earlier wars. Still so long as they weren't joining their enemies, he would take that as a victory. The Golden Company still holds Harrenhal and Darry, he thought, with nominal support from Piper, Ryger, Vance and Mooton. With the Twins razed, and the remnant of Frey strength gone north, the Lannisters most certainly had no remaining support from the riverlords. House Tully had been well-liked, and their former bannermen would not bestir themselves to aid Lannisters.

Riverrun itself was said to be poorly held, with a token force of the Golden Company led by Old John Mudd moving to besiege it. Their advance parties had split the Golden Company of a good portion of their strength, but they had proved very effective. Old John Mudd had went towards Oldstones, Jon Lothston held Harrenhal, Lord Laswell Peake was besieging Bitterbridge in the Reach, while the force with Ser Franklyn Flowers went further west. While the bulk of their numbers successfully held Mace Tyrell's army in position, their vanguards had made good progress through the riverlands and the west.

The discussion continued, and Jon pressed the men on everything they had seen. They were gaining ground. They held Storm's End, and the stormlords were scattered. The Golden Company had support from both Rosby and Stokeworth in the crownlands, and Lord Stokeworth was already preparing the way for their siege. Gorys Edoryen was at Evenfall Hall, focused on drawing House Tarth to their side.

Stannis Baratheon had not returned any of their ravens, but so long as the Broken King was harrying the shipping of King's Landing then he still served their cause. Jon planned to isolate King's Landing from any that might come to the city's aid, by land or sea. Jon meant to enclose the city and tighten the hangman's noose, once the Tyrells were scattered.

Force the enemy to lose ground and influence, cut them off from allies, wear them down from multiple fronts, Jon told himself, it is the only way to defeat larger numbers. Fight with patience and discipline – two traits that he had trained himself in for decades, but his enemies were apparently lacking.

"Find me the king," Lord Connington ordered to a page. "He must be updated."

"He was entertaining Princess Arianne at the pavilion, my lord," a young knight said, bowing.

Of course he is. It was a bitter thought. The princess of Dorne should have stayed at Storm's End; women have no place at a battle. Aggravingly, she had insisted on coming with the host. Lord Connington nodded brusquely, and the men returned to their duties. He twisted around and kicked his mare into a trot, making for the great Targaryen banner in the centre of the camp, overlooking the Golden Company's host.

With every step, he was adding up and weighing the numbers in his head.

Twenty-five thousand against us, Jon thought. The Golden Company had started the campaign with less than ten thousand mercenaries, while the usurpers holding the throne had legions. Still, the numbers were shifting. Slowly, more and more of the realm rallies for us.

He turned to stare out over his men, over the sea of tents and canopies and banners. The red-on-black dragon of Targaryen flew the highest, but it was surrounded by the pure gold banners of the Golden Company, and alongside flew the griffins of Connington, the ploughman of Darry, the three keeps of Peake, the purple maiden of Piper, the bat of Lothston, and black sheep of Stokeworth. Many of the exiled knights and lords had their own banners, banners of lands and fiefs lost for decades, which were finally flying again.

The most recent banners that were only just being raised included the sun and spear of Martell, the gates of Yronwood, the hawk of Fowler, the vulture of Blackmont, the leopards of Vaith and the sword and star of Dayne.

Jon saw a dark-skinned woman waiting for him at the king's pavilion, but it was not the princess. Obara Sand; Princess Arianne's bastard cousin. Rather than the elegant, fair features and silky hair of Arianne, Obara was a squat woman, her hands thick with callus. She had a squashed nose and hair braided like a heavy chain, with a spear slung over her back. She wore boiled leather rather than silk. "My lord," Obara greeted stiffly.

Jon's eyes narrowed. He glowered down on her from atop his palfrey. "Where is His Grace?"

"A raven has arrived for your Halfmaester, and the news seems to have excited His Grace," Obara said with a nod of her head towards the maester's grey tents. "There is much talk of battle, but words are wind, and steel is steel." She met his eyes coolly. "When are we set to march out, my lord?"
His attention shifted to her hand; her fingers were stretching and curving, ever so slightly. Ghost reflexes, already set to clasp around the haft of a spear. He returned to her gaze, and she met his. This one is too eager to fight by half. "That is a decision for the king to make," Jon replied stiffly, already turning his horse away.

It still bothered him that, of the force Doran Martell had committed, Obara Sand had been assigned its commander. Lords Yronwood or Fowler would be far more respected, but instead it was the bastard woman that Jon had to deal with.

"They are amassing against us and we do nothing," the Sand Snake accused after his back.

Mind your place. The horrible woman would likely want to lead from the front lines too. Lord Connington was riding away, but he turned to her with a rearward half-glance. "I will not see an advantage ruined by rash action." His eyes narrowed into a warning glare. "We will move when the time has come."

"Dorne is waiting for war, my lord," Obara called after him, keeping her voice low.

Let Dorne wait.

Another Dornish bastard was waiting for him on the way to the raven's tents, and Lord Connington's mood fell further. This bastard was wearing a white cloak. "His Grace is waiting," Ser Daemon Sand said respectfully, bowing low. He was lithe and tall figure, with a handsome face, sandy hair and sharp eyes. "He sent me for you. There is urgent news that the king is wishes to share."

Jon didn't reply. He had to suppress his glower, as he looked down upon the Dornish knight. He kicked his horse into a trot through the camps, and Ser Daemon walked after him.

Ser Daemon Sand, the Bastard of Godsgrace – said to be one of Dorne's deadliest swords, the Red Viper's former squire and the princess' sworn sword, he reminded himself. And yet the very sight of the man still caused Jon's mood to sour further. Another of Prince Doran's demands, to give this bastard a white cloak. Jon would have refused the Ser Daemon for his status and repute alone, and yet King Aegon had happily given the man a place in his fledgling Kingsguard.

A Kingsguard consisting of Ser Rolly Duckfield and Ser Daemon Sand, he thought foully. Both knights were frustratingly lowborn – but that was an issue King Aegon could not be swayed on. At least Duckfield was a solid man of the Golden Company, but neither of them had the standing to serve as Kingsguard.

It seemed like half the prince's escort was Dornish nowadays – it was the princess' doing, Jon knew. We bent over backwards to accommodate Dorne and they still want more.

And yet Dorne was far too valuable an ally to risk. The first of the Dornish banners had marched ahead through the Prince's Pass under Obara Sand to join them. Five thousand Dornishmen had already joined them, with more to come as the Dornish lords continued raising their banners.

But the war is moving fast, and will they be able to come quick enough?

"Any news from King's Landing, my lord?" Ser Daemon asked as he strode to keep pace besides Jon's palfrey. Obara Sand was trailing behind them. As he rode through the clamour of the war camp, the men in his path shifted and lowered their heads.

"Yes," Jon said haughtily, not deigning to look down on the knight. "To be discussed with the king."
Five and twenty thousand against us. Give or take three thousand, perhaps.

After splitting their forces and suffering casualties in battle, only four thousand six hundred men of the original Golden Company remained with their main host. Their numbers had been bolstered by more sellswords, and allies recruited from the stormlands, riverlands, and crownlands. Now, with Dorne committing their strength behind them, the force on the roseroad stood at fourteen thousand strong.

Fourteen thousand against twenty-five. Hardly the best odds, admittedly, but they weren't unworkable either. The men around King Aegon were all seasoned and well-motivated soldiers – soldiers that had joined them for a reason. The defence around King's Landing was far less organised. The rose lord had drawn upon many of the semi-skilled smallfolk from the city, and Lord Tyrell's bannermen must be feeling the strain.

Lord Tyrell cannot be feeling as confident as the numbers might suggest, Lord Connington thought, considering he's trying to puff up his own numbers to intimidate us. To keep wide ranks, dummy tents and false fires at night – all tactics to make an army seem larger than it truly was. It could be effective, it could well work against inexperienced enemies. But the rose lord underestimates the Golden Company.

He heard the squawking of ravens in cages, and there was already a haggle of commanders and serjeants gathering inside the tent. There was arguing from within, but Jon could catch only scattered mutters. Something has happened.

Jon moved to dismount the horse, struggling slightly with the reins. Ser Daemon Sand extended his hand to help him down, but Lord Connington ignored it. His gloved hand remained clenched, his face hard as he dropped from the stirrups. Ser Daemon faltered, confused, at the slight, but he stepped back while one of Aegon's Dornish squires escorted Jon's palfrey to the nearby commander's stables. Obara and Daemon Sand walked inside, following Jon's flanks.

He nodded at Black Balaq standing by the entrance, while Lysono Marr lingered around the corner. Pykewood Peake, Brendel Byrne, Denys Strong, Lorimas Mudd and Humfrey Stone were all present – along with a few of their new allies; Lord Clement Piper, Ser Ronald Vance, Lord Casper Wylde, and Tristan Ryger. The riverlords stood uneasily at the tent's rear, grouped together and slightly apart from the mercenaries.

The raven's tents reeked of bird shit, and Haldon Halfmaester scurried in the background to see to the letters. Princess Arianne was not visible, for which Jon was pleasantly surprised. He didn't like the way she tried to cling on around the king.

He almost didn't see the Company's commander, but Harry Strickland was sitting atop of a low crate, shouting loudly as he rested his aching red feet upwards. "Too dangerous, I say!" The captain-general called to the men in the tent, not noticing Jon yet. "We must still gather more allies to our cause before risking the city!" the Golden Company's captain-general proclaimed. "Let more flock to the Targaryen banner, let the rose lord come to us."

"We must strike while the fires are hot," protested Ser Lymond Pease. "We have a proven and battle-tested force, our soldiers eager fo--"

"My Lord Hand," a loud and clear voice called, and all others stopped. Jon saw silver gold hair glinting even in the faint light of the tent, and a bright smile looking at him. King Aegon sat at the far end of the tent, cross-legged. "You made it. It seems that an impromptu war council has formed. Do you have update from the roads north?"
The king had let his shining hair grow out into a mane, reaching to his shoulders; sometimes he kept his hair tied back in a ponytail, but today it hung behind his ears. He wore a long and loose gold-trimmed satin shirt of Lysene cut, with a shawl bearing his house's colours wrapped around his shoulders.

By the gods... he looks like Rhaegar. The likeness still made Jon's stomach lurch every time.

"Your Grace." Jon bowed in his saddle, digging his spurs into urge the palfrey forward through the large tent. "Lord Tristan and his party have returned. They report no more support from the riverlords, and between two and twenty or thirty thousand men across the Blackwater. I favour five and twenty."

There were no surprised glances, just nods. "Five and twenty..." Ser Denys Strong muttered. "Even after his losses, Mace Tyrell commands a sizeable host."

"Mace Tyrell and Ser Kevan both," Jon said with a nod.

"We will not be able to defeat those numbers," Lord Clement Piper warned, a short, fat, bowlegged man with bushy and wild red hair. House Piper was one of the few that had joined them against the Lannisters, to resume the riverland's war, but Jon still had his doubt over the man's commitment to Aegon. "There could well be more flocking to them too."

"But Mace Tyrell will be desperate," Harry Strickland insisted. "And his bannermen must be growing unruly. After what happened to Oldtown, they need to return to their own lands."

"He will not leave his son and daughter behind." Lord Connington shook his head. "He cannot move until the crown is secured, he is trapped in King's Landing no matter the pressure."

Behind him Lord Tristan Darry stepped into the tent. "What happened to Oldtown, my lord?" Tristan looked confused, turning for clarification. "I have been travelling, I received no word." He paused. "The ironborn assault?"

The mood shifted slightly, Jon saw eyes become a bit more sombre, and hesitant. "A hurricane, by the tell of it." Pykewood Peake explained gravely. "A great storm from the Redwyne Straits – they saw the clouds from Bitterbridge."

"Yes, a hurricane or a great wave. I heard once of a tremor that sunk an entire island of the Basilisk Isles," Lysono Marr, the spymaster, reported in his soft, silky voice. "The reports I read now tell tales of similar destruction. The first word arrived not four days ago, and the second two days later. Refugees are swarming towards Highgarden itself, but I have lost touch with many of my usual contacts."

"The Hightower," Lorimas Mudd said lowly, looking to the spymaster for confirmation. "That is the only thing the reports seem to agree on. They say that the Hightower has collapsed."

By the Gods...! Lord Tristan gaped, and the others nodded with a quiet grimace. Every man in the realm knew of the Hightower, the tallest structure in the Seven Kingdoms. Jon had never even been to Oldtown before, never seen the Hightower with his own eyes, and now it seemed he never would.

"The Gods indeed," Lysono agreed. "We are all ants before them, are we not? In any case, Allyria Dayne of Starfall writes of refugees fleeing the city in droves, and claims that every ship between Brightwater Port and the Torentine has been wrecked in the winds. The city flooded, and hundreds of thousands are said to be dead in the streets."
"What of the ironborn?" Lord Tristan asked in horror.

"Their fleet was scattered in the same storm, it seems, though reports are conflicting. The ironborn assault either happened during the storm, or shortly before it. Insanity, by all accounts." The spymaster smiled apologetically, tapping his painted fingernails against the table. "I'm afraid there are few more details than that which I can make sense of. In the storm's wake, all letters and responses I've seen have been patchy and panicked. It should be noted, however, that – as far as I can tell – there have been no ravens from House Hightower or from the Citadel, at all."

"The Citadel has the largest rookery in the world," that was Haldon Halfmaester, frowning deeply as he listened from the far corner.

"Not anymore it doesn't." Ser Brendel Byrne, a broad and scarred man, stomped his foot and guffawed. "Aye, divine justice, I call it. The Tyrells support an illegitimate ruler, and the Father Himself opened the heavens to smite them."

"That is a cruel jab, ser," King Aegon said harshly, speaking up for the first time. The whole tent went quiet. "Many innocent smallfolk died and suffered, I will not have that in my name."

Brendel Byrne stammered, but Aegon only shook his head. "Regardless of their lord's loyalties, the people of Oldtown did not deserve a hurricane. Compassion is a virtue of the Father, ser, not cruelty."

The tent stiffened. Lord Connington stepped forward. "Others are calling it the Drowned God's will, or sea gods, or blaming it upon demons summoned by the Mad Maid's witchcraft. My favourite was one blaming the winds and waves on the Bastard King's dragon, flapping its wings," Lord Connington said harshly. "But I put no trust in storms, nor the hedge tales of smallfolk. Nevertheless, the fact remains that it was a disaster and that Lord Tyrell must return to his lands. Focus on what matters."

Aegon nodded, his voice solemn. "I do not envy Lord Tyrell's position. And I have no wish to obstruct the man from returning to help his people. I will happily allow his forces to pass." He paused. "As soon as he bends the knee to me, he will have my full support in helping the people of Oldtown."

Lord Connington allowed himself a small smile. "That is an offer we should make over raven, Your Grace. And we will offer it to his bannermen too. His eyes glanced towards Lysono, and the Lyseni only smiled softly.

"All the more reason for us to stay put," Harry Strickland declared. "Mace Tyrell needs to get through us, and we need to get through him. He is bleeding power right now, so we might as well let him bleed."

"You have a point," Aegon admitted, rubbing his chin.

Obara Sand shook her head, stepping from the eaves into the tent's centre. Her very presence caused many of the knights and serjeants to bristle. "I cannot claim to be upset to hear of Oldtown's destruction. It was a damnable city. But we do not know how much of Highgarden's strength may remain. They could well rally and march on us from the west," Obara Sand said, her sharp eyes fixed on Aegon. "We stay here, and we may end up trapped by larger forces from both sides, Your Grace. Now is the time to push the spear."

"Then we should turn west, for Highgarden itself!" Pykewood Peake insisted. "A cripple holds Highgarden; the forces of the Reach lie scattered. We take Mace Tyrell's seat, and the strongest force left loyal to the throne is destroyed. The crown will have zero out of seven kingdoms left."

"It is not Highgarden that concerns me," Lord Connington warned. "What of the knights of the Vale that are coming to the Lannister's defence?"

The room grimaced. They had all seen the spymaster's reports, they had read the ravens; the Lords Declarant of the Vale had rallied for defence of the crown. "There may well be fifty thousand soldiers from the Vale of Arryn coming to support the capital," Black Balaq agreed, in his deep and low voice. The Summer Islander was a man of few words, but they were always heeded. "When the Valemen arrive, we will be crushed by the might of Tyrell, Lannister and Arryn."

"Then we attack before they arrive," Obara insisted.

"How do we know they're not already mustered?" Pykewood Peake demanded. Lord Peake and his brothers would far rather attack Highgarden than King's Landing, Jon noted; the Peakes had been pushing for revenge against Tyrell since the first day. "If they've already arrived to reinforce the city…"

"They have not," Aegon said, sounding certain. "I have been assured that their armies have only just passed through the Bloody Gate, and are moving slowly south."

Lord Connington gave the king a glance, but he didn't press him. Not here. "The Vale…" Harry Strickland rubbed his whiskers. "They have avoided the war for this long. Can we buy them off, or offer a different alliance? I hear this Lord Arryn is a frail and sickly boy."

Again, eyes glanced to Lysono Marr for confirmation. Jon hated the need, but their spymaster was a capable man. "Robert Arryn is indeed," Lysono nodded. "But the Lords Declarant stand strong, despite their squabbles. It is Yohn Royce, Anya Waynwood, Horton Redfort, Harlan Hunter and Benedar Belmore leading their armies."

Lord Connington recognised those names. He didn't know Harlan Hunter, and Benedar Belmore was a fat and weak man who didn't belong in the group, but the others were not names to be taken lightly. "What of the coincounter, Petyr… whatever his name was?" Harry Strickland demanded.

"The Lord of Harrenhal," Lysono said smoothly, to the sound of a few guffaws. Jon Lothston and the Company had taken Harrenhal with negligible resistance, many weeks past. "Petyr Baelish, Lord Protector of the Eyrie. As I understand it, Lord Baelish has managed to cling onto his title too. He still stands as regent through Robert Arryn, but only under the Lords Declarant now. The Valemen expect Robert Arryn to die young, and there's a succession crisis already brewing in preparation for that day." A crease lined the spymaster's brow. "Ever since the Vale's heir-apparent was murdered, the politics of the Eyrie have become somewhat… messy."

_The Vale's heir. I killed the last heir to the Vale myself_, Jon thought. Ser Denys Arryn, Lord Arryn's nephew and the Darling of the Vale, had fallen to Jon's blade at the Battle of the Bells. There would be no love lost between him and the noble houses of the Eyrie.

"I was informed the same; I was told that the Vale may well be the kingmaker in this war," Aegon said quietly. "The Vale has bad memories of the Targaryen regime, and we have little sway over these Lords Declarant. Is that the sum of it?"

"It is indeed, Your Grace." The spymaster nodded. _Informed_. Somebody else had the king's ear, and Jon had a sickening suspicious who.

"We cannot allow fifty thousand soldiers to take the field against us."
"There will likely less than fifty thousand though," Humfrey Stone commented. "The Vale will not commit itself entirely. Twenty thousand is a better bet."

"However many they muster will crush us," Lord Tristan warned. "The Vale's armies are now second to none – they are the greatest power left in the realm. Every other realm was wounded in the war, but the Vale is untouched."

"Dorne is untouched too," Ser Daemon said surely. "Our spearmen will beat their knights. And Dorne has forty thousand spears to field."

"And how long will they take to muster?" Tristan argued. "And who will arrive first?"

"Dorne is ready to fight now," Obara insisted. "Five thousand spearmen stand with you now. Push on the assault."

"We stand between Mace and his own lands," Lorimas Mudd protested. "We have the prime position, why should we abandon that?"

"We need ships to take the city. We need a fleet–"

"What of the High Septon?" insisted Harry. "Give him time, convince the Faith to declare for the rightful king. Increase our offer to him – we will coat the Great Sept in gold if he brings the Faith Militant over to us."

"The High Septon has so far refused to acknowledge us." Jon cast a disdainful eye towards Obara, his voice foul. "And I am not so certain that will change. The attempts at bribery have been very poorly received."

There was no easy answer. Fourteen thousand men, pushing to take a city against far greater numbers. The campaign had been going well, but their enemies weren't folding either. They were caught in a war of attrition, both sides trying to break the other. How long will it be before they break?

Jon's eyes flickered downwards to his gloved hand. He tried to twitch his fingers, but couldn't. How long do I have?

King Aegon sat quietly for the most part, musing as he listened to the commanders' debate. His legs were crossed, his fingers fiddling as he leafed a small slip of parchment. He looked contemplative, but sure and confident. There were times when it was hard to even recognise him as the boy – Young Griff – that Jon used to know. The boy he raised. War has a way of changing people, he thought.

"There is another concern, my lords," Aegon said finally. He kept his voice low and the room quieted, all heads lowering respectfully. "The news that I summoned you here to share. I have received word from Casterly Rock."

He held up the slip of parchment. Urgent news, Daemon Sand had said. Jon caught the glances around the tent, eyes flickering towards him. "Casterly Rock?" Lord Connington said slowly. "The Imp?"

Aegon nodded, biting his lip, and Jon saw that the young king was trying to stop himself from grinning. "Aye. The letter arrived on the morn, but it had to be relayed through Bitterbridge and Storm's End." The smile finally broke out over his face, unable to hold it back. "Casterly Rock has fallen, my lords."
There was a moment of stunned silence. Harry gaped, while Jon's face just turned rigid. How? How's that even…?

Jon glanced at the parchment, and he recognized the seal instantly. Tyrion Lannister had taken to using the Lannister's coat of arms with the colours inverted – a red lion on gold – as his personal sigil. A bloody demon lion on a field of gold, Jon thought, but he also noted the similarities to the red lion of House Reyne. Another act of spite against his father.

Confused eyes glanced to the spymaster, and Lysono Marr nodded. "I am still waiting on further confirmation," Lysono admitted. "But yes, it does appear to be true. Lord Lannister is successful, and the Rock has fallen."

Jon's stiff hands curled as far as they were able, trying to clench into fists. I sent the blasted Imp west expecting him to die.

The words caused excited murmurs around the crowd. "You mean the Imp succeeded?" Ser Harys gasped. Jon could practically see him salivating with the thought of the gold of the Rock. "With three thousand men?"

"Impossible," Lymond Pease shook his head. "The Rock cannot be conquered. It has never once been taken, not since Lann the Clever in the Age of Heroes. How? How could he take it?"

"It was won with cunning rather than might, my lords," Aegon explained, grinning. "Lord Tyrion writes of a sly scheme."

"With trickery." Jon's voice was foul.

"The last I heard," Lord Tristan said slowly, looking around the room for confirmation. "The Imp and Ser Flowers had won victories at Ashemark and the Crags. They were heading towards Lannisport to raid the city, were they not?"

Minor victories, Jon thought with a scoff. The Imp hadn't the forces to take many castles, but he had focused on the towns and villages, and blockading the roads and bridges. Using harrying tactics rather than conquering. He had taken his cavalry through the minor roads and trails around headwaters of the Tumblestone, avoiding the Golden Tooth altogether. He then pushed south into the westerlands, and starting by easily conquering the poorly-held castle of the Crags.

As he pushed his way into the west, the Imp had turned raider. Burning bridges, robbing stables, and sacking grain houses – following in the Young Wolf's footsteps, even. Whenever the western lords mustered a larger force to meet him, the Imp would split off a portion of his own and leave the men behind to distract and delay their enemy. Not trying to win, all just to allow the Imp's main force to push forward. The 'battles' had been relatively bloodless, but the troop divisions and garrisons had still hacked away at the Imp's numbers. The Imp had lost at least a thousand men pushing through Ashemark alone, but the majority of those men had been lost to desertion or surrender rather than as casualties. How many men did the Imp even have left to him?

Lord Connington had been openly scorning Tyrion's efforts for weeks, although secretly he had been pleased. Those men had all been sacrificial, in any case. He had hoped that the Imp would be killed in a foolhardy but damaging raid against Lannisport, if not elsewhere on the campaign trail. But Casterly Rock?!

King Aegon nodded. "Aye, but Lord Tyrion went for the Rock itself. The castle had a strong garrison led by one Ser Benedict Broom, ready to oppose him, while Lannisport itself was mustering a far greater host than any he could beat. But Lord Tyrion still set up camp outside the castle. He offered them a deal."

"A deal," Ser Denys Strong said incredulously. "A deal. He bought the Rock off them?"

"Quite the opposite," Aegon said, grinning, as he passed the letter to Lord Connington. It was filled with curled writing so small Jon had to squint to make the words. "Instead, Lord Tyrion approached under a truce and approached the castellan at Casterly Rock, a cousin of his named Damion Lannister. Lord Tyrion explained how he had been taken been forced to take shelter with the Golden Company, and he had no choice but to support them. He begged for mercy, and explained that he had no loyalty to this 'fake king'." The others looked shocked, but Aegon just laughed. He glanced around their faces, and continued. "Lord Tyrion said that he wanted to leave, but he had been indebted to their service. 'However', the Imp said," Aegon's voice shifted slightly in impersonation, "'there need not be a battle. The sellswords care only for gold – they will far rather accept the gold price rather than the iron, and for enough coin I could persuade their commanders to simply walk away from this war'."

"What?" Ser Brendel Byrne said, outraged. "He thinks so little of our banners?"

"'Persuade their commanders'?" Ser Harys guffawed. "He is the commander."

"It seems the castellan was more inclined to think of Tyrion as a glorified hostage that we were exploiting," Aegon was still chuckling. Jon only glowered. In the Free Cities, large sellswords companies accepted bribes all the time, but the Golden Company had never indulged in such practices. Our word is as good as gold. "And this castellan seemed inclined to accept the deal. After all, the westerlands was in no state to fight another war, and the whole succession of House Lannister is in question regardless. Tyrion tells me in this letter that his cousin Damion had his own ambitions for the Rock.

"In return for the Imp abandoning his claim to lordship and abandoning his rebellion, Damion Lannister was willing to open the vaults. Lord Tyrion was invited through the gates to negotiate – with a small escort under heavy guard – and he was offered two thousand golden dragons, to pay off the Company's commanders if they relented."

There were a few mutters of 'insulting'. Aegon was amused, and seemed to be enjoying drawing out the tale. Jon's eyes glanced over the letter, laid flat on the table in front of his prince. Judging from the small and dense prose, the Imp had written it all out in excruciating and smug detail.

"And so Tyrion left to bring this offer to these 'commanders' of the Golden Company, and then returned the next day to bring a counter-offer. Ten thousand golden dragons. Ser Damion hemmed and hawed, but the Rock's vaults were replete with gold, and so the castellan agreed to pay. The next morn, though, Lord Tyrion came back with a new term to their deal; his serjeants also wanted to ships for transport as well. And so back and forth Tyrion came and went in this increasingly fruitless negotiation, until I imagine this Ser Damion started to feel quite annoyed. But Ser Damion went along with it, because Lord Tyrion was so very desperate, and it also gave the Lannisport army more time to muster.

"However." Aegon's grin widened a bit further, and he took a breath. "All the while that the castellan and his garrison were counting gold, they didn't count the men so well. Each time Tyrion came through the Rock's gates he brought an escort of a hundred men who were forced to wait in the courtyard. And yet each time he returned to his camp, he only had ninety-five." There was a brief stunned silence. Jon read the letter himself, clenched his jaw, and passed the parchment on to Harry Strickland.

The captain-general blinked. "He left them behind? In the castle? How, surely someone would have Aegon burst into laughter. "His men hid in the drains, my lord. Lord Tyrion ordered his soldiers to hide down the latrines with all the filth, and then wait. Tyrion tells me that he was once in charge of managing the Rock's drains, and more than familiar with the sewage systems and how often they were checked." Aegon's smile widened. "Within a week, he writes that there was enough of a force to climb out under the cover of dark and ambush the Rock's outer patrols."

"And so his men raised the gates from the inside!" Harry guffawed, looking at the parchment himself. "Before the storming the castle with his full force before anyone had a chance to resist. In the middle of the night! What gall!"

There was a stunned silence in the tent. "And that worked?" Lord Tristan asked.

"Even the largest castle is left helpless against enemies from within," Aegon explained, grinning. "The captain-general started to laugh first. "Nobody noticed five men in a hundred, not when it was done so slowly, and nobody thought to check the great drains of the Rock, I imagine."

Damn the dwarf. "A castle won by treachery," Jon said fouly. "I'm not surprised a creature like the Imp knew of all the nooks and crannies in which to hide."

"A battle won by cunning," Aegon insisted. "Lord Tyrion proves himself Lann the Clever's heir. The founder of his house himself would be proud."

"If Lord Tyrion truly holds the Rock..." Harry Strickland muttered in awe. "There's not a force in Westeros that could throw him out of it now. Even dragons would struggle to take that castle."

"And the gold!" Ser Denys Strong exclaimed, shaking his head. "The vaults are legendary, how much gold does he have?"

"Lord Tyrion doesn't say. But I have no doubt he will be counting."

"The Imp overreaches himself," Jon warned. "He sits in a large castle, without the men to hold it properly. His campaign in the westerlands was a wasteful one. He must have less than a thousand men left under him?"

"Near on a thousand exact," Aegon admitted. "It was not won without cost. But the reward is great."

I sent the dwarf west with three thousand. "Without the men to secure the surrounding area," Jon growled, "taking the Rock is pointless. You can expect that the Lannisport branch of House Lannister will have already set up siege lines. The Feastfires, the Sarsfields, the Lantells, the Kayces, the Lannys, the Lannetts, a score of other houses of the westerlands. They will all rally against the Imp, he's trapped himself in the Rock. A waste of a victory."

Jon could feel the attention of those in the tent shift to him. "My lord!" Aegon seemed confused. "He holds the most prominent castle in the west, perhaps the greatest fortress in the realm. Let them siege."

Harry Strickland leaned forward. "You should read the letter for yourself, Lord Connington," the captain-general explained mirthfully. "Lord Tyrion is sitting atop a full larder, and the Rock has its own wells. He can hold that castle for years. We sent him west to harry and distract our enemy, and that's exactly what he is doing."

Jon's eyes tightened. I am quite able to read. "And yet now we have truly lost three thousand cavalry, for the remainder of the war,” Lord Connington said harshly. Mixed muttering answered him in the tent.

Jon knew that that the complaint was moot; he had been the one to order those men west. All to get the Imp away from my king. But he saw no reason to explain himself to the captain-general. Strickland was merely one step above from a common coward; a moneychanger, a dealmaker, not a warrior.

If only the Blackheart were still here. His mentor, Myles Toyne, the former captain-general, had been a different sort of man from the glorified banker standing before him. Strickland doesn't have the Blackheart's steel.

"When the news reaches King's Landing, Kevan Lannister will suffer," Ser Denys Strong said, leaning in from the tent's eaves. He was a veteran of two decades with the Company, with a lord's fortune of gold on his arms, but he sounded awed. "The 'Warden of the West' already has so little support from the western lords. And I imagine the Queen Whore of a regent will be tearing her own hair out."

Kevan Lannister... by all reports, Tywin's brother is having difficulty rallying his banners. Even the Lannister petty lords choose to ride out the winter.

It had been a blessing for the Golden Company's invasion. With Jaime Lannister's disappearance and the destruction of the Twins, the greater part of Lannister martial strength in the field had melted away, and returned to their hearths and homes in the westerlands. Such men would be difficult to rally again, especially as the Imp hindered any attempts to head east.

"So Lord Tyrion plans to sit tight in the Rock until the war's end, then?" Harry asked, and Aegon nodded. "It makes sense – the Imp's contribution to the campaign is effectively over. But what a contribution it was."

"And afterwards he will expect us to march west to rescue him," Jon said, but he knew he was being unreasonable. If any of his men had won such a victory, Jon would have sung their praises. But it's not one of my men. It's the Imp.

"No doubt there will be volunteers to do so, men who will be eager to claim the gold that Lord Tyrion prepares for us," Aegon declared, still smiling. "Casterly Rock will last at least a year in siege. If the besiegers do not bend the knee when King's Landing falls, then I will happily move to reinforce my Warden of West."

Lord Connington couldn't object, but his face hardened. I should have left the dwarf to drown. I pulled him out of the river, and the gods continue to curse me for it.

Aegon believed that Imp was helping him – and it was true, he was. But the Imp was helping himself more. Tyrion Lannister had squirmed his way into a place of command in the Golden Company, squirmed his way into the king's trust.

The Rock was more of a small mountain than a castle, Jon knew. Hundreds of nobles lived in the Rock – a structure that stretched for nearly two leagues, worming all through the mountainous crag overlooking Lannisport. Casterly Rock was one of the realm's greatest castles; what had once begun as a gold mine in the ages of the First Men had been quarried for thousands of years, growing and sprawling into something wholly different. Tunnels and mineshafts had slowly morphed into hallways and corridors, and eventually, a mountain-carved citadel-city, an impenetrable fortress, the home of the Lannisters and their closest branch families. If the Imp took it all, then he's taken the beating heart of the westerlands for himself.
Meanwhile, Lord Jon Connington's greatest contribution so far was a costly victory taking Storm's End from Stannis' skeletal garrison, and a few minor skirmishes through the stormlands. When history was being written, they would write instead of Tyrion Lannister and his daring campaign through the westerlands to take his rightful seat. The thought galled him.

Harry Strickland wanted to call for a toast, to a raise a glass for the little lord Lannister. Others were cheering the Imp's name. All the while Lord Connington stood stiff, and silent.

"Tyrion Lannister proves himself every bit the commander his father was!" Ser Denys Strong proclaimed.

Yes, the Imp is Tywin Lannister's son, Jon agreed. For that alone, Aegon will rue him.

"Princess Arianne was with me when news arrived, she has gone to inform Sunspear," Aegon said to the room, his voice clear and silencing the ruckus. "The lords of the west have so far refused to acknowledge Lord Tyrion's right, but this could change matters. Lord Tyrion gives us a victory that will embolden many – I hope that we can draw more support from the stormlands, riverlands and westerlands.

"And there is more," Aegon continued happily, "Tyrion took numerous hostages; several Lannister cousins of his, many prominent nobles of the west, many Lannister branch families. And, most notably, Lord Tyrion now holds Lord Edmure Tully, and Jeyne Westerling."

"Jeyne Westerling?" Lord Darry frowned. "The woman that the Young Wolf married?"

Aegon nodded, but it was Edmure Tully's name that seemed to cause the most stir. "Lord Tully?" Tristan Ryger demanded, the first thing he had said since Lord Connington arrived. Tristan Ryger had been a good friend to Edmure, Jon recalled. The riverlords looked shocked at the mention of their lord paramount's name. "Edmure truly survives?"

"He does indeed," Aegon said, nodding. "Lord Tyrion writes that Edmure was freed from his chains, and is in good health. I wish to spread that word as soon as possible."

Tristan Ryger blinked, but nodded. Lord Clement Piper seemed shocked. Lysono Marr grinned a sly smile. "I would reassert your efforts in the riverlands, Lord Hand," the spymaster purred. "I feel like we may be able to draw more support yet."

"If Lord Tully still lives…" Lord Clement Piper hesitated. "I would see him as soon as possible, Your Grace."

"Of course, I mean to ensure that House Tully retakes its rightful seat, my lord," Aegon said earnestly. "We will move Edmure as soon as we can ensure his safety from Casterly Rock."

And as soon as Lord Tully agrees to bend the knee to Aegon, Jon knew. Another achievement that the dwarf would take credit for.

"We hold Storm's End, Harrenhal, and Casterly Rock, Your Grace," Harry Strickland laughed. He's celebrating like it were his merits that brought us here, "Four out of nine realms are as good as ours. Aye, I feel a shift in the wind."

This should have been my victory, my redemption. The Imp is stealing it from beneath me.

"And what of the Lannister murderess still on the throne?" Obara demanded. She wasn't cheering, at least. "There are still five and twenty thousand men standing between us and the Iron Throne that aren't shifting."
"I will consider it," Aegon said. "Thank you for your wise counsel, my lords, but we must adjourn." There were nods and respectful bows as the men turned for the door. "Lord Connington, a moment?"

Jon stopped. Harry Strickland was still laughing, staggering on swollen feet. Aegon remained sitting, his shoulders stiff as the man thanked him and marched away. Overconfidence is a curse in any army, Jon told himself. It was when the battle seemed to be sure that you needed to be most careful. My king still needs me now more than ever.

How many lives could have been saved, if only someone had pushed a young Tywin Lannister away from Aerys' ear?

Jon looked at his liege, and he thought of the young boy he helped raise, and the handsome and gallant prince he had sworn himself to follow. He holds himself so strong now.

Jon could feel the gazes of several of the commanders linger on his back, until they stepped from the tent's threshold. It was only when they filed away that Aegon finally seemed to relax. The young man sagged slightly, moving to cradle his thigh. Jon knew the real reason the boy had been sitting down all through the meeting.

"Does it still hurt?" Jon asked, and his voice grew softer.

"A bit," Aegon admitted. He had to wear saggy, long-length shirts to hide the bundle of bandages around his waist. It was unhealthy for a king to show blood. "But Haldon says it will heal nicely."

I should never have let you get hurt. Still, that was a foolish thought; Aegon had insisted on leading the charge against Storm's End personally – and Jon had even been proud of him for it. Proud, but terrified. Jon had urged his king to stay away from the frontlines, to lead from the rear.

That battle had been the most costly one the Golden Company had fought yet, against the starved garrison left by Stannis Baratheon. They had been victorious, but the great walls of Storm's End hadn't fallen easily.

All it had taken was a single arrow, fired by some common soldier, and all had been nearly lost. The arrow came far too close for comfort. The shaft pierced straight through Aegon's hauberk, and into his upper leg. A few inches to the side, it could have punctured a major vein.

The rightful king, the conqueror returned – my whole purpose, my redemption – could have died by a single stray arrow. There could be a thousand more random, unpredictable arrows just like it, and yet the whole kingdom would be ruined if even one found its mark. It was a terrifying, sobering thought.

There was a moment's quiet, Jon's eyes lingering at Aegon's thigh. To be a king was to be vulnerable, but no king could allow others to realise that too.

"You look concerned, my lord," Aegon said finally. "I was wondering if there was something you couldn't say in front of the others?"

Jon pulled his eyes away from the bandaged wound. "It concerns the Imp," Jon said. "You should not encourage the dwarf so."

Aegon blinked. "Has Tyrion Lannister not proven himself? He has been our steadfast ally since before the landing."

"He has," Jon admitted, unwillingly. "But only as it serves himself. He could turn against us just as easily. I would strongly recommend distancing yourself, to restrict his influence."

"I have already promised him Master of Coin, and Warden of the West."

"There are others who could take those roles, Your Grace." Let Harry Strickland take over coin-counting, just keep him out of my army. "Warden of the West might suit the Imp, but neither position will sate him for long. I know his type, he will constantly want more." Aegon looked unconvinced. "Lord Tyrion Lannister taints our cause, Your Grace. He is a kingslayer and a kinslayer."

"Kingslayer? Hardly – Joffrey Hill was no king." Aegon shook his head. "And, in any case, Lord Tyrion was convicted of his nephew's death in a court of shams. The only murder Lord Tyrion committed – one that he happily admits – is of Tywin Lannister, and that is a crime I am more than willing to pardon." A pause. "Do you deny that Tywin didn't deserve his fate?"

"Tywin Lannister deserved that and more," Jon admitted, but he pressed on, gritting his teeth. "But the Imp's reputation is a blight upon us." The smallfolk say the Imp controls you, that you are his puppet. "Men with that foul a reputation drive others away. The High Septon could have supported us, if not for the Imp. Regardless of his actions or justifications, think of how it looks."

"I will not let slander and rumour rob me of a good ally," Aegon replied firmly. "Tyrion Lannister has suffered such from birth. He has given me nothing but wise counsel and leal service – as much as you have."

Gods curse it, how much has the Imp already squirmed his way into his head?

I should have let the dwarf drown, he thought, as he had many, many times. If he had any feeling left in his fingers, Jon's hand would have hurt from how hard he clenched his fist. "And what of Myrcella, Your Grace?" He lowered his voice. "They say the Imp planned it, and that the Martells–"

"Tyrion Lannister wasn't even aware of his niece's death." Aegon's voice turned sharp. "And House Martell had naught to do with the murder – Arianne swears by it. Myrcella Hill was murdered by Gerold Dayne, the Darkstar, acting alone. Gerold Dayne is a wanted criminal and nobody has condemned his crimes more than Prince Doran has. I will not tolerate such lies against my loyal allies. Our enemies try to slander me, and I refuse to allow them."

I remember a time when I would have clipped 'Young Griff' across the ear for such a tone. Still, that had been before Aegon become a king, and Lord Connington wouldn't cross his liege. Even despite the anger flushing through him, Jon felt a flush of pride too.

Jon nodded curtly and unhappily, but he let the matter drop.

There was no choice. I gave Ser Franklyn Flowers very specific orders before sending him as the Imp's second in command, Lord Connington thought. Should the Imp prove untrustworthy, should I send word, Ser Franklyn is prepared – and now is time to put the knight into actions.

Jon knew that when he was gone, the Imp would want to replace him as Hand of the King. The Imp would be a worse fiend than Tywin, Jon had no doubt, and he would not allow that to happen. I may be dying of greyscale, but I swear it – by Rhaegar's memory – the dwarf will not outlive me.

He didn't say a word to Aegon of the thoughts and emotions writhing inside of him. Jon kept his face completely passive, allowing absolutely nothing to show.
"Walk with me, my lord. Let us talk privately," Aegon said after a pause, smiling again. "Let us go see the elephants."

Jon frowned, but he nodded. "As you will, Your Grace."

He stepped out of the tent, and the guards bowed as they left. Ser Daemon trailed behind them from a distance, while Jon kept close to his prince. Aegon couldn't quite hide the slight stagger in his steps from the wound.

The elephants were kept to pens at the very centre of the camp, the pride of the Golden Company. In battle they would be clad in steel plate and golden drapes, carrying canopies from which archers could perch. They had been a nightmare to transport across the sea, but there wasn't a warhorse in the realm that could stand against them. They were walking siege towers, trained and bred for battle.

From the distance, they were great shapes of grey muscle, each one standing taller than many houses. They were kept to large pens made of wooden spikes, half a dozen to each pen. Once, the Golden Company had three hundred of the beasts, but now there were only fifty-six remaining.

The Golden Company had first purchased the beasts from New Ghis, Jon recalled. Born and bred for war, and the Company had taken them to them quickly. Most of them had their tusks shortened into snubs, but for battles there were metal elephant blades to be attached to their tusks. War elephants were a fairly common sight around eastern Essos, but even now many of the Westerosi men could be found gaping at them.

The master of elephantry, a tattooed Volentene man named Talek Vhaeros, bowed deeply as he saw Aegon approach. A few of the elephants were bellowing, while keepers marched the beasts in formation around the camp, one pair at a time. Jon had given orders that the elephants were to be drilled alongside their cavalry, so that both elephant and horse would become accustomed to each other.

"Talek," Aegon called to the man. "I wish to see mine again."

"Of course, Your Majesty." Talek bowed. "Will you need your harness?"

"Not today."

Most of the elephants were kept in pens of five or six, but Aegon headed straight towards a single pen kept separate. Jon saw Ser Rolly Duckfield, standing outside the pen with his white cloak draped into the mud. The large man bowed as his king approached.

The king's young face lit up as he saw a group of elephants marching past – the keepers pushing them into formation as horsed men rode circles around them. "Magnificent, aren't they?" Aegon grinned. "They are such huge, gentle beasts."

"They are not so gentle in battle, Your Grace," Jon warned. Aegon walked forward towards the pen, while Jon lingered back slightly. "You have never seen a man crushed beneath them as they charge."

"Not in battle," Aegon allowed. "But in battle they follow orders, and they charge when they are commanded to. Outside of battle, they are remarkably intelligent. That old matriarch, she is called Shaela." Aegon pointed to a large grey beast, resting on the grass in the opposite pen. "Talek was telling me that she learned how to stamp her foot come feeding time, to make sure the keepers never forget. No one taught her that; she just learned by herself, and she taught all her children too."
Now, every elephant stomps their feet on the hour, so precise the keepers set their rounds by it."

There were times when Jon was still reminded of the boy he helped raise, the insatiably curious and bold boy. Jon didn't reply, but his heart fluttered. "Shaela is the oldest elephant we keep," Aegon continued, as he stepped by Ser Duckfield. "She's sixty-seven years old, with twelve children and grandchildren. Nearly as old as the Golden Company itself. She's too old to ride in battle anymore, but they keep her because she helps train the others. They didn't think she'd survive the ship journey, but Shaela is a stubborn old bitch."

Aegon opened the gate, and stepped inside the pen. Jon saw a massive grey beast shake its head, blowing a trumpet horn from its snout. "Your Grace," Jon warned.

"It's quite alright," Aegon reassured. "Come, Lord Hand."

The keepers all bowed to let Aegon pass. The elephant snorted and shifted to attention, its snout flapping and ears wafting. Up close, the beast was a mammoth standing near fifteen foot tall. So large it could lift my king in its trunk, or crush a man with a single foot. "He thinks I want to ride," Aegon laughed. "Very intelligent beasts. Telak trains them well."

The elephant dropped to his knees, waiting for Aegon to mount a saddle over its back. Aegon didn't, instead he just walked around to it, to scratch the beast behind the ears. The great ear flaps swatted at him. "He's a bull. The bulls are bolder and fiercer on the front lines, but most of the men still trust the females more. Typically, it's the males used for charging, and the females for bowmen. I counted; we have twenty-four cows, and thirty-two bulls." Aegon looked back to the grey beast, the snout sniffing up around Aegon curiously. The king grinned, but he didn't flinch away. "And this is the very biggest elephant that we keep. Telak swears by him, he's the best we have to offer. His name is Toyne."

The Golden Company names their elephants after distinguished fallen soldiers, Jon remembered slowly. Jon glanced up to the grey beast, thinking back to Myles Toyne, the Blackheart, the man who once mentored him. Aegon gingery walked alongside it, running his hands along its hide. "Come closer, Lord Hand," Aegon insisted. "It's alright, he's well-used to me."

Jon wasn't comfortable near any animal that might kill him by rolling. The bigger it was, the more distance he wanted between them. Still, Jon stepped forward further into the pen, right next to the wall of grey flesh. Telak and the elephant handlers kept a close eye on them, but they didn't object. Ser Rolly Duckfield was standing by the gate, his arms folded.

"You are very interested in elephants, Your Grace."

"I was told it was good to familiarise myself with them. I mean to ride him into battle, actually, from his back where I can stand high and clear for the whole army to see me," Aegon explained. "I think that Toyne will deliver me to the Iron Throne."

"I…" Jon's instinctive reaction was to object, but then he hesitated. On an elephant's back, you'd be an easy target for bowmen, he almost protested. Still, the elephants were also large enough to heavily armour, and strong enough to carry a carriage where a shield wall could be mounted. Aegon was right; it would be a good rallying point for their men, and a well-trained elephant could carry the king more safely than any horse could. "I think that's a good idea, Your Grace."

The Blackheart would want to see his namesake carry the king.

He nodded. "Toyne is Shaela's son, did you know?" Aegon continued, absently. "He also had three sisters, but only one remains. The other two were lost during the voyage." He paused. "They are intelligent creatures. Talek tells me of how they still mourn their family sometimes, of how Shaela's raises her trunk to cry for her missing girls…"

Jon didn't reply, and there was a stretch of silence. They were alone now, both of them in the elephant's pen with no ears around. Aegon's voice lowered, turning low and solemn. "What happened to Myrcella was undeserved," Aegon said finally. "It doesn't matter if she was Myrcella Hill, Myrcella Baratheon or Myrcella Lannister – she was a little girl and she did not deserve to die like that."

"She was a threat to your crown, Your Grace." Jon's voice turned low too. "She was a bastard born by incest and usurpers."

"She was." Aegon nodded. "And I doubt Tywin Lannister would have thought twice about her death, if our roles were reversed. But I resolved myself to be better than those who came before me. I want to do right by this realm, my lord."

His voice was so earnest, so honest. "You will, Your Grace."

Aegon grimaced. "It still feels so strange to hear you calling me that. I keep on expecting that it'll become normal, but it never is." He paused. "And it feels even queerer for me to call you 'my lord'. When... When we're alone, is it ok if I call you Griff again?"

"It... it is." Jon nearly choked. He wanted to wrap his arm around the boy, but he wouldn't; not while the plague crawled up his wrist. Jon wasn't an emotional person, but Aegon brought out the best in him. He's the son I never had. "Aegon."

He smiled sadly, with that sad melancholic look in his eyes that reminded Jon so much of his father. "I know that there is little sympathy for Myrcella in my camp," Aegon admitted. "I know that they even cheer her death. But I trust Arianne when she says her family didn't do it, and I trust Tyrion when he writes that he didn't orchestrate it. Tyrion spoke well of Myrcella, and of Tommen, he always has. They were innocent children. Others might try to pardon the deed, but I will push to see the Darkstar punished for what he's done – it was murder, and that must have a price." Aegon sighed. "And neither will I allow any harm to come to Tommen when I take the Red Keep."

That caused Jon's eyes to widen. "Your... Aegon." Jon grimaced. "If Tommen lives, there will always be those who would declare for him." He pressed his lips together, trying to control his disapproval. "All it takes is one rebellion. Your realm will not be at peace so long as a potential usurper lives."

"I know."

"This realm has suffered many times because of false claims to the throne," Jon warned. "Do not allow a challenger to live, do not allow a challenger to grow. Tommen may be a boy, but he will grow into a man, a man who could seek revenge. Mercy is a fine ideal, but it is not worth the risk."

"There we must disagree." Aegon's eyes flashed. "Mercy is worth it. I told you; I want to be better than those who came before me. It may not be easy, but I want prove that I deserve this realm." He shook his head. "Cersei Lannister made her choices and deserves the axe, but the children do not."

Jon opened his mouth to object, but then closed it again. This is what I taught him, he thought. I raised him to be just and honourable, I taught him of a king's rights and his duty. I taught him what it means to wear the crown, to sit on the throne. I wanted him to be a good king. It was such a strange feeling to see the boy he raised standing so strong, to look upon a man he helped mould. He learnt the lessons I gave him. It felt prideful and terrifying at the same time.
He is not my son, but I will be a father to him.

Aegon was still running his hands down Toyne's side, scratching behind his ears. The great elephant's snout wrapped playfully around Aegon. "It is the Mother's Day in seven days' time, is it not?" the king asked finally.

"It is," Jon said finally. He didn't know what else to say. "A day of judgement."

"The Mother's Day. And the queen's trial," the young king mused solemnly. "I cannot remember my mother. They say that my mother was raped and murdered, but I…" He shook his head. "I was too young, I cannot place her."

There was no reply. They both just stood quietly, just the two of them and the elephant. "I do dream of her, though," Aegon added, with a glance to Jon. "Occasionally I have dreams… I remember her hair – she had the most lovely silky silver hair." His hand moved to fiddle with his own curls, absentmindedly.

"You are mistaken," Jon said lowly. "Elia Martell had dark hair."

"She did?" Aegon frowned. "Well, I suppose they were just dreams."

There was nothing but silence, and the elephant's snorting.

"I cannot remember my mother," Aegon said finally. "But I do mean to avenge her."

"Yes. Your mother and your father both. We have all gathered here to right those wrongs." Jon nodded, his eyes hard. "And I will put the realm to order for you, I swear it on Rhaegar's memory."

"I believe it." Aegon finally turned away from Toyne, holding himself straight. "In seven days' time, Cersei Lannister will be judged, and King's Landing may well schism. Mace Tyrell will want to be there for the trial, but I would rather take advantage of the distraction. Let us attack while their attention is divided.

"In seven days," Aegon said firmly. "I want to attack. For fire and blood, for the Mother's judgement."

There were so many doubts. The numbers, the odds against them… but still, then Jon looked into Aegon's eyes and he felt his resolve stiffen. "Yes," he agreed. "I think I could make that work."

Aegon grinned, violet eyes shining mischievously. "Good. Because there's another reason that I come so often to see the elephants," he shuffled backwards, further into the elephant's pen. The great saddlebags of supplies for Toyne were piled at the very back; the war elephant's armour all draped across the ground. "There's something else I wanted to show you."

It stunk of elephant dung. Jon frowned, stepping after him. Inside the pen, there was a corner shielded from view, the whole stable hidden behind the thick wooden fencing. "Your Grace?"

"I was told to keep it a secret until the right time came," Aegon admitted, as he bent down, "and it could not be stolen if nobody knows it is here. I set my Kingsguard and the men-at-arms to guard this pen not just because it houses the royal mount, but I could think of no better hiding place than trusting Toyne to watch over it."

From underneath a pile of drapes and plate mail, Aegon pulled out a long oak box, with a fine polished finish and a heavy iron lock on the clasp. Aegon grunting slightly as he yanked it out, and then he shuffled to pull out a small key hanging on a chain around his neck. Jon just blinked in
"It arrived three days ago," Aegon explained, clicking the latch open. "Ser Rolly Duckfield went to pick it up himself – very discreetly to not raise attention. Only a few people know of it, and I want to keep it that way for now. I would have told have you at the time, but, well, you were just so busy. There was never a chance for us to speak privately."

Jon stepped closer, frowning. The heavy oak led creaked open, revealing a box lined in felt and silk. "A gift from our friends in Pentos," Aegon admitted, his voice flushed with pride.

The silk unravelled, and a jewelled black sheath, gilded in enamel of dark crimson, gleamed in the dusky air. Aegon grasped it, and drew forth the finest blade that Jon had ever seen. A hand-and-a-half sword, Jon realised, taking in the long hilt, suited for a grip with either hand, or both at once. A bastard sword.

The metal was black, with the faintest traces of red that seemed to glow in the faint light. Its edge was as smooth as rippling shadows, and whispered in the air. There was a cross-guard, fashioned into the shape of two dragons, and, embedded into the pommel, was a ruby larger and brighter than any Jon had ever seen…

When the blade shifted in the light, he saw the carvings of flying dragons etched across the metal; the pattern beautifully intricate, but nigh-invisible unless he squinted. Easier seen in motion, in glimpses, rather than lying still – the etchings seemed to ripple, like the shadow of fire.

It was all flawless Valyrian steel, of such a quality Jon had never seen. A blade fit for an emperor.

"Is that…?"

"Yes, the weapon of my ancestors. My history." Aegon gingerly raised the weapon upwards, clasping his arms around it tightly. "The sword Blackfyre, to be wielded by Targaryen hands once more. With this I shall unite the realm, as Aegon did before me."

The Stranger

"Craster," a hard man grunted to him as they passed on the stairs. The guard wore a Lannister surcoat, but his armour was rusted and mismatched. "You on duty?"

He didn't reply, only glared. Craster wasn't a talkative man. He was a gruff, scarred and pock-faced sellsword that kept his face hidden under a rusted iron halfhelm. Even among the hardened sellswords and soldiers holding the Red Keep, they gave Craster a wide berth.

The other guard peered back at Craster as he walked towards the Royal Quarters, but he chose not to object. Craster was known for being unstable, and ever since the queen's siege began the Red Keep had devolved into a more… primal place.

Craster kept on walking up the staircase, heavy iron boots stomping against marble, and then onto Myrish carpets stained with mud. There were three other men standing at the top on the landing, leaning on pikes. The men wore Lannister armour, but their shoulders were slouched and they looked bored. Guards who had been standing on duty for hours on end in a deserted keep.

"Craster," one of them called, cautiously. Yellow Cock Tom, Craster knew. After months being trapped inside the Red Keep, they all knew each other's names. "What the fuck are you here for? It should be Wilkin, not you."

"Wilkin is on the wall," Craster said gruffly. "It's me now."

"Says who?" Yellow Cock Tom demanded. "Wilkin was supposed to bring booze up."

"Take it up with the White Lord," Craster snapped. "He told me to guard the little bugger, so here I am. Standing guard."

The White Lord was the name the men gave for Lord Qyburn, the ruling lord of the Red Keep. The very mention caused the men to shuffle. Qyburn was the one who truly held power in the Red Keep now – the right-hand man of the queen. Qyburn was white-robed, softly-spoken with gentle features, but there was a ruthlessness in him that would put tyrants and warlords to shame. Not even the hardest, most brutal killer would ever object to the White Lord's orders.

All of the guards had heard the screams and sounds that came from Qyburn's Black Cells. Most knew only the broad strokes of what was happening beneath the Red Keep, but Craster had more of an inkling than most. The few remaining guards were given a loose leash, but it was well-known that any man who stepped out of line would join the 'studies' happening in the dungeons.

Lord Qyburn was the only reason that half the men hadn't deserted Queen Cersei yet.

Craster had been one of the ones to help move the bodies into the cells. All of the serving girls, the washerwomen, and the handmaids had slowly been funnelled into the Black Cells. Not a one had come out again.

It was already dusk outside, the light fading behind the barred and shuttered windows. On some nights you could hear the mobs and protests from outside the gates, but tonight it was quiet. Yellow Cock Tom moved to light a torch, illuminating the wide staircase in eerie torchlight.

"It's no fun without Wilkin's booze," Yellow Cock Tom moaned. "Fuck night duty – we have stand here till dawn and not a drop of booze." He cast a foul look at Craster. "Wilkin always brings the booze."

Craster didn't reply. He just folded his arms. Another man, Ben Rabbithole, scratched his bushy beard. "We could always borrow it from the other lot," Ben suggested, pointing up the stairs to the next landing. "I hear they got some ale."

There was another set of guards further up the stairs, and more guards still based at the bottom of the stairwell. Three groups of guards, all groups positioned to watch the others. The queen didn't have many men to spare, but she was still feeling paranoid. "Who's on duty up there?" Yellow Cock Tom asked.

"John the Hammer, I think."

"Fuck no, I'm not getting anything off him," Yellow Cock Tom shook his head, and sighed. "We'll go without booze."

They were all settling in for the night, lounging around with spears close to hand. Craster leant against the wall, a safe distance out of the way.

"It's better than being out on the walls, at least," the other guard, Little Pewty, noted. Little Pewty was a scrawny man with mousy eyes, who clutched his halberd a little too tightly. He had been one of the Mountain's Men. "You got thirty men to patrol every single foot of wall? In the cold and dark? I hear the sparrows are trying to clamber over more and more now, and you can bet the Bitch Queen will have the head of any man who lets one of them slip through."

"At least on the walls we can keep moving," Yellow Cock Tom complained, scratching uncomfortably at his groin. Craster knew that Tom got his name after developing an infection on his member, from raping so many serving girls in the Red Keep. He was a short and fat, bloated man with a red face. "Here we're just standing. I can never fucking stand just standing."

The four guards were all resting around the landing of the Royal Quarters, surrounded by Myrish carpet and ancient tapestries. The chamber right there used to belong to Aemon the Dragonknight himself, Craster thought silently. Some of the greatest heroes the realm had ever known had walked over this floor. Little Pewty spat on the floor, a lump of yellow phlegm. "Hells, this is privilege, ain't it?" Ben Rabbithole laughed. "Being here makes us Kingsguard, right? We should all be knighted."

"Bugger that," Tom moaned. "I'd prefer to take Alyn's place in the highborn chambers. Did you know he gets to take one of those Tyrell girls every night? That's proper highborn cunt – he swears her scunny smells like roses."

Pewty's eyes widened, and then he laughed. "No shit? I thought those noble bitches were off-limits. Which Tyrell girl?"

"Maggy or Alla or something. The little queen's cousin, I hear. And the White Lord said it was fine to have a go, so long as you don't leave marks."

Megga Tyrell, he thought, a maiden of fourteen. Megga, Alla and Elinor, the queen's ladies-in-waiting, were all hostages too. But there was no reaction from Craster. A civilized man would be appalled, but there were none here.

He knew that another of the reasons the queen kept the loyalty of her guards was by allowing them their 'liberties' with the hostages. They had turned the Red Keep into a cage, and now the animals ruled. How quickly civilization reverts to barbarity.

Yellow Cock Tom, Ben Rabbithole and Little Pewty were still talking, laughing about the women they raped. Craster just stood stiffly and didn't participate. Craster looked bored, lazy, but he was listening to every word. "Well, if you really want to have a go," Little Pewty said eventually, motioning to the chamber doors. "How do you feel about little boys?"

Tom guffawed. "Bugger off," he laughed. "I'm not that horny."

There was something in Pewty's manner that suggested he had only been half-jesting.

Craster said nothing, and just waited.

Maegor's Holdfast was deserted. Skeletal guard duty, guarding an empty corridor all night. Nobody was around with them; the halls were ghostly quiet. It was the hour of ghosts when Yellow Cock Tom finally shifted. "Fuck," he grunted. "I need a piss. Back soon."

"Hells, the Queen Bitch will have your cock if she hears you abandon your post." Cersei's orders had been quite clear; she wanted a constant force of men watching the approach to the king's chambers at all hours. There were twelve men in total; a set of four on each landing.

"I need a piss," Tom whined, already stomping down the stairs. "Cover for me."

"You and your damn leaky cock," Ben Rabbithole groaned. Still, it was unlikely that anyone would come this time of night.
The queen's men are brutal and they are killers, he thought, but they're not well-disciplined. They were men that Qyburn had assembled, as well as the remnants of the Mountain's Men and the Brave Companions. In a battlefield they'd be formidable, maybe they'd be spectacular when set to razing and pillaging villages, but in a castle they just caused problems. Queen Cersei had overlooked all their flaws because they were 'loyal'.

Craster had done his part too. He had done what he needed to do, to fit in, to prove himself loyal too.

Craster counted the steps as Yellow Cock Tom stomped towards the privy. Little Pewty was pacing, while Ben Rabbithole sighed and turned to Craster. "So," he said, bored. "You're a quiet one, ain't you, Craster?"

Craster didn't reply.

They are poor guards. It took a very special type of man to be an effective guard – the type that could sit patiently for hours yet still respond in a heartbeat. The type that wouldn't falter, or pace, or grow distracted. It was a special sort of man that could stand in a deserted corridor for hours and still react to minor disturbances. Good guards are a rare breed.

King Tommen will be asleep right now, he thought. The only ones allowed into the room was Queen Cersei, Lord Qyburn, or the remaining Kingsguard. Ser Meryn Trant, the last Kingsguard still serving, would be sleeping in the antechamber outside the nine-year-old liege's bedchamber. The Red Keep was so short-manned that they could only dedicate a handful of men to stand outside the Royal Chambers during the skeleton hours.

Rather, Cersei had sealed Tommen's chambers with a very big lock, and also locked every door approaching his chambers. She kept her son locked in cage.

"I heard that you guarded the Maidenvault, Craster," Ben Rabbithole continued despite the man's silence, "Did you see the little queen? I got to ask – Raff the Sweetling was saying that Margaery had the tightest little pussy you've ever seen. Is that true?"

Craster paused. For a while, he wasn't going to reply. Then, he turned, and smiled softly. "You've got no idea," he said.

Ben Rabbithole barked in laughter. Little Pewty burst out into giggles.

Then, in a smooth motion, Craster drew a knife from his belt. In a single, practiced lunge, he covered the distance and slit open Little Pewty's throat. For a big man, he was very light-footed. Craster's fist shoved into Pewty's mouth so he could not scream.

Little Pewty died first. He was younger, more alert, and he held his weapon close. Ben Rabbithole was older and more tired, he didn't react as quickly.

Bodies tumbled together in the dark. Ben opened his mouth to scream, but Craster already drew another knife. He threw it in a single, smooth motion and the blade pierced straight through Ben Rabbithole's throat.

The man gurgled, gasping. Craster was already lunging, jumping to grab him before he hit the floor. Even with heavy boots, Craster's footsteps were strangely light. He lowered Ben Rabbithole to the ground gently, without noise, and held his mouth to stop him screaming or gasping as he choked on his own blood. Calm as still water, he thought, quiet as a shadow.

Two men dead. Yellow Cock Tom was infamous for taking long pisses, but he would still return.
I must act fast. Pewty dropped limply to the ground, and Ben's trembling faded away.

He walked up the steps cautiously, and he heard nothing. John the Hammer and his group of guards were already unconscious – a bit of sleeping draught in their ale had took them straight out. It would have been easier if they had shared their ale, he cursed silently. But no matter.

The stranger took a deep breath, as he removed the set of slender lockpicks hidden in his breeches. The door to the Royal Chamber bore a huge iron lock, but it took very little time for him to shimmy the latch. He had broken far more difficult locks than this. He felt the bolt thud open, and he opened the door so slowly it didn't creak. Even despite the iron boots of his disguise, he barely made a sound as he stepped onto the thick Myrish carpets.

The chambers were large, but they felt dusty and stuffy. The windows were sealed and barricaded. Cersei had become so paranoid that she restricted the servants to the quarters – even cleaners and housewives. They had sealed all entry, and kept the little boy Tommen trapped in his room.

As if that could save him. The stranger knew better than anyone; if an assassin really wanted you dead, they would find a way to kill you. There was no lock strong enough, no guards skilled enough, that could stop a well-motivated professional killer.

The stranger felt his heart race, but his hands were steel. He knew what he must do.

There was a bloated figure in shining armour strewn out over the antechamber. Ser Meryn Trant was sleeping in the antechamber of the king's room. The stranger heard the snoring, and stopped to inspect him curiously. Earlier in the morn, he had poisoned Ser Meryn's meal in the kitchens with a very slow-acting sleeping drug, slow enough to get through the food tasters. Ser Meryn was dead to the world asleep.

He considered killing the Kingsguard – it would be easy enough – but then decided against it. It would be more effective if Ser Meryn survived, and then had to explain to the queen that he had slept through it all. He would leave the guards outside unconscious, but alive as well – the more people who slept through the deed, the more allies Cersei would suspect. Her paranoia would grow all the more.

For a creature so cruel, Cersei was rather predictable. The more horrifying the crime, the more baffling the situation, the more she would blame her little brother.

Madness was like a weed. It was a prickly vine that could infest the gardens of the mind and choke any other thought. Madness thrived in confusion and darkness; in fear and suspicion.

Perhaps that is what I am, the man mused. He had been called a mummer, a magician, a juggler, a spider, a whisperer, but calling himself a gardener seemed the most apropos term. Someone who cultivates the landscape with a soft touch, to make sure the world became how he willed it. He had spent a long time and a great deal of effort cultivating and nurturing Cersei's madness, just as he had done in the past.

He thought back to the first bodies. Lady Taena Merryweather and Lord Orton Merryweather – they were how it all began. Grand Maester Pycelle had just been a bonus. Killing Cersei's lover and blaming it on both the Tyrells and the Imp had been a masterstroke.

Varys had killed more people since then; he had picked his targets with extreme care. For months he had stalked Cersei from the shadows, with actions and plots so subtle that no one even noticed them. Cersei had felt them, though – his constant schemes and unending shadowing were what truly convinced Cersei that there was a conspiracy afoot.
His little birds – children who could get close without suspicion and stab the knife upwards – inflicted a wound that was very easily blamed on a dwarf.

Perhaps they wondered how Varys had managed to escape the Red Keep, after freeing Tyrion all of those months ago. The truth, as it so often did, had been hiding in plain sight all along. 'Lord Varys the Spider' hadn't escaped anywhere – instead he just took another face and another name, blended in with the background. First he had been a serving woman, and then he became Craster, the silent and brutal sellsword.

Right now, he was no one. No one but a stranger working through the door. He heard a cat – a kitten – mewl in the darkness, and the feline shape brushed up against his ankles. There were three black cats in the room, all of them stirring around his feet as the stranger opened the door carefully.

In the huge four-poster bed, a small and frail figure stirred. "Mother?" King Tommen asked sleepily. "Mother, is that you?"

"No child," the stranger replied sadly. "I am not."

Tommen was awake. Varys saw a pale face in the dark, shuffling in fear. Tommen had grown since Varys had last seen him, but, somehow, he looked so frail and scared in the gloom. There was less baby fat around the nine-year old's face, his white blond hair was darker. How long has the boy been trapped in his chambers? he lamented silently. Why is it always the most innocent ones that must suffer the most?

He had no wish to scare the boy. He took off his helm slowly, and placed it on the floor. He raised his hands upwards, and crouched slightly to make himself seem smaller. It wouldn't matter much – 'Craster's' scars and pockmarks were but a mummer's mask, pigments and paints. His beard and wig were both filthy things, made for stage performers. It all added up to make him look fearsome.

"It's alright," Varys reassured. His accent disappeared and his voice turned soft. "It's alright. These are lovely kittens, Tommen. What are they called?"

"Ser Pounce," the boy whispered, shivering and wide-eyed. "Boots and Lady Whiskers."

"They're beautiful." Varys scooped up Ser Pounce in his arms, feeling the little cat stir. He gently ran his gloved fingers over the cat's slender form, caressing soft black fur. The kitten purred. "What gorgeous cats. They remind me of another kitten I once knew."

The boy seemed to relax slightly. Varys took another step forward. "That's Ser Pounce," Tommen admitted. "He used to chase mice outside, but now mother doesn't let us leave the apartment."

"I'm so sorry, Tommen," Varys said honestly. "You don't deserve this." In this world, the weak are always the victims of the strong, he thought bitterly.

Tommen frowned. "Who are you?"

"I'm a friend, Tommen." He extended his hands. "Here, I want you to hold Ser Pounce. Hold your cat, Tommen."

The boy was shaking. He looked ready to run, but he extended his hands to scoop up Ser Pounce from the stranger's hands. The black kitten was mewing, squirming. Varys so painfully remembered Princess Rhaenys' little kitten, Balerion. That cat had even tried to claw the hands of the man who choked her.

Tommen would have run, but he was trembling too badly. Varys placed a hand on the boy's shoulder to try and comfort him.

"I want my mother," Tommen's voice cracked, quietly. There were tears in his wide eyes.

"I know you do, my child." Vary's other hand slowly curled around the sheathed handle in his belt. This is necessary, Varys knew. It had to happen – one more deed and the war was as good as won. Still, it wasn't easy for him.

He had done many evil acts over the years – evil acts in the name of a righteous cause – but this…

"I want you to something for me," Varys said softly. "I want you to close your eyes. Can you do that for me, Tommen? Just close your eyes.

The boy was trembling. "Close your eyes," Varys insisted. Tommen complied. He was such a meek little boy. "Close your eyes and think of your kittens."

In his arms, Ser Pounce meowed and squirmed as Tommen hugged him so tightly. There was a trickle down the boy's smallclothes. King Tommen Baratheon, First of his Name, stood shivering in the dark room, hugging his cat fearfully as he pissed himself in quiet fear.

"Are you doing that, Tommen? Are you thinking of your kittens? Just think of your cats. Name them for me – Ser Pounce, Boots, and…?"

"… Lady Whiskers…" the boy whispered.

His hand blurred, and a blade suddenly materialised in his grip. The knife flashed. One quick plunge to the heart with a sharp blade. Varys held the boy's shoulders tightly, and the child collapsed with barely a sound. There was no scream, only a weak, strained gasp.

Varys felt the sharp edge slice through a small, fragile ribcage. Blood spluttered, and he hugged the child until the spasms stopped.

He needed to take a strained breath to calm himself. Still like water, he repeated to himself. He was no stranger to murder – he wasn't even a stranger to murdering children. Then why does this one hurt me so much?

He thought of little Aegon Targaryen, brains smashed out on the floor.

It will be more effective if it looks brutal, Varys thought. He stabbed the little boy's corpse several dozen more times – long slices splattering guts and gore. Then Varys grabbed the corpse by the legs and dragged him around the room, to make it look like Tommen had tried to run.

He wanted Cersei to think her little boy saw a violent, grizzly end. Let her think that her child had died screaming and in agony.

He didn't mutilate the child's face, though – he wanted to be sure the corpse was clearly identifiable. Let there be no doubt that King Tommen is dead.

All around him, the kittens meowed and scrambled, pawing the dead body. Ser Pounce sniffed a lump of bloody guts.

I must be getting weak, Varys cursed. This is only one more death. Why does it affect me so much? There were many children in this war – Tommen was but one more causality, and a necessary one at that.
He dipped the knife in the blood, and walked up to the nearby wall. In slow, careful strokes, he started to write the letters, taking care to make sure he mimicked Tyrion Lannister's handwriting.

"I WARNED YOU, DEAR SISTER", Varys wrote on the wall, in big, bold letters painted by the king's blood.

King Tommen's death would win the entire war. With Tommen dead, the Lannisters lost all claim to the Iron Throne. The Lannister-Tyrell alliance was doomed, their armies would collapse. He supposed Stannis was now undoubtedly next in line for succession, but nobody would ever take Stannis for king. Not now – the Baratheon ship had sunk.

The realm would look further back, back to a Targaryen.

When the sleeping draught wore off, when the alarm was raised and when Cersei came upon her son, the queen would be left crazed in madness. Good; he wanted her mad. A queen so mad that she'd make Aerys look sane, and she would make everyone remember the good times under Targaryen regime instead. Varys knew exactly what Qyburn and Cersei were planning from the Black Cells, and he had resolved to let it happen. He would let Lannister and Tyrell destroy each other.

No matter how successful Cersei's retaliation was, it would all be pointless with Tommen dead.

One death, and Aegon's path to the Iron Throne was clear. The Seven Kingdoms would finally get the rightful and honourable liege – a boy raised from birth to take on the duty. A good and rightful king. This is what we have been working towards for decades.

He closed the door behind him. One of the kittens tried to slip out, but Varys caught it. He cradled the little creature in his hand softly as he placed the kitten back into the bloody room. It tried to claw at his wrist.

He passed the sleeping Kingsguard, and locked the door behind him again. He stepped over the unconscious men, and walked back down the stairs. He hid in the shadows as he waited for Yellow Cock Tom to walk back up, with his knife ready to slit that man's throat too. There would be several witnesses who would swear that 'Craster' had been in the Maidenvault all night, should anybody ask.

He thought of Serra's face as he walked away. He remembered his sister's soft smile, and bright violet eyes. Even as the fever tore through her body and her silver hair turned grey, she had such soft features. "Promise me, Viserys," Serra had begged, weeping. "Promise me you'll care for him."

Viserys. His sister had been the last person to ever call him by that name. There had been a hundred different names since then, but never the one his mother had given him. It was a name of a different life; before their family had been forced into another exile, before the children had been sold into slavery, and before the sorcerer had bought him and mutilated him for his blood.

Still, he had made the promise. Ever since then, he and his friend had spent decades working and toiling to fulfil his promise to Serra, and to right a century old wrong. I will see Aegon Targaryen on the Iron Throne, Varys thought, as it should be.

History would remember Cersei as the Mad Queen that brought down a dynasty, heralding the return of the dragonlords, and his would be the untold tale in the shadows – exactly as it had been in the past. His own role in it all would never be known. Some histories were better left forgotten. I have had a dozen names; I will be the murderer, the spymaster, the whisperer, the spider, and the stranger – all and more, to put that child on the Iron Throne.

And I will spill the guts of a thousand children to make it so.

The Warrior

“Father Above, forgive my sins,” Lancel muttered, lowering his head before the clay tablet. “Forgive my pride, and forgive my weakness.”

The High Septon said that a holy man had to learn to accept his own flaws; that sins were carved into men’s bodies at birth, and could only be purged by a lifetime of humility and prayer. Lancel had seen sermons before filled with pomp and glamour, septons wearing silk and crystals that would call upon the blessings of the Seven, and used words like ‘glory’, ‘duty’ and ‘divine right’. He had seen septons as fat as cows that lived as extravagantly as kings. That type of Faith was being crushed under the High Septon’s new regime.

The holy were expected to give charity, the septons were expected to serve the needy. Only through humility and service could they find divinity.

“I bow before your mercy, wisdom and judgement. I am but mortal clay – I have made mistakes, I have been weak – but I offer myself before you, humble and bare, and beg for your hand to shape me, that I may walk the path of righteousness.”

The High Septon’s sermons were quiet, holy affairs, where every man, woman and child was expected to kneel on the stone floor and bow so deeply that their heads touched the ground. The High Septon would speak softly about weakness and wickedness, and afterwards he would join each man and woman in private prayer. He would listen to their confessions. He would hold their hands.

“Warrior, give me strength to follow the path,” Lancel intoned. “I raise my sword in your service, and beg for the fortitude to overcome wickedness.”

He thought back to all the times he wished that he had been stronger; the actions that he should have done, the vows he should have upheld…

Once, Lancel had asked why the gods would create the world so, why they would let such evil into men’s hearts. The High Septon had taken Lancel’s hands and quietly explained that this world was a trial, a proving ground, to split the saints from the sinners and to see which men could rise up above the hurdles of the flesh. All men have same weaknesses, and it is for the worthy to overcome them, he had said. The Seven offered their light and redemption, but it was for all men to reach for it.

_We were all born wicked_, the High Septon had said, _but it is only through the Light of the Seven can we be redeemed._

_The High Septon is a pious man, a man sent by the Father to show us the way_, Lancel thought. It was so very telling of the arrogance, blindness and corruption of the nobility, that it had been the smallfolk – the sparrows – who recognised his wisdom and righteousness first. The High Septon was one of the precious few men that Lancel had ever known that was truly trying to forge the world into a better place, one sinner at a time.

“Crone, grant me wisdom,” he said softly. “For the path is dark, and I beg your wisdom to light the Lancel thought of his own many, many sins. I bedded the queen, he thought blankly. A memory of horror. The highest perversion. I made love to a married woman, my own cousin... the queen. And I kept it silent. At the time... Father help me, I had even been... proud? But now there is nothing in me but shame. She used me to switch Robert’s tankards, so that the king was drunk and insensate when he faced the boar.

Maybe that was murder, maybe it was an accident, but it was still Lancel’s fault. The Father would know the truth of the matter. Everything that has happened, it's all my fault.

How many treasons had he even committed? He honestly didn’t even know anymore. By rights, he should be whipped, hung and condemned for what he had done. Perhaps he still would be, when the Stranger took him. But the High Septon had offered him a chance for redemption, and Lancel had vowed himself to the cause. A lifetime of pious service to make up for his mistakes. Lancel the Repentant.

As he stood up, his back still ached from where they had lashed the wickedness out of him. It was a good pain.

His chambers were bare, humble. A hard wooden cot, and a small carving of the Father by his bedside to pray to every morning and every night.

It was still very early, before dawn. As he did every morning, he stood up and scratched a chalk mark onto the wall. Then, he stopped to count the row of marks, just to be sure he wasn’t fooling himself. It’s today, he thought. For so long they had all been waiting for it. But here it is – day seventy-seven; the Mother’s Day.

He had donated the gaudy armour of his family to the Faith, to be sold for coin for the needy. Today, Lancel garbed himself in the bare and unadorned armour of the new Faith Militant. Rather than full metal, he wore only a simple steel plate and hard leather breeches and shoulder guards. He pulled a hemp surcoat showing the seven-pointed star over the top, with a longsword on his leather belt, and a rainbow cloak over his shoulders.

Rather than his boots, he chose thick sandals. Lancel preferred to dress himself closer to the Poor Fellows than the Warrior’s Sons. Lancel the Repentant.

In times past, the Warrior’s Sons had clad themselves in inlaid silver armour, swords with star-shaped crystals, but the High Septon said that such extravagance was unbecoming for pious soldiers. Instead, each Warrior’s Son was encouraged to dress more humbly, and sell their fine armour for food, blankets and iron for the smallfolk. Why should one man have a fine engraved silver sword, when two dozen could have cheap iron swords for the same worth?

It was a doctrine that had quickly spread. The smallfolk – the sparrows – in this war-torn land had been neglected for too long, but their High Septon had given them their voice.

The only thing that remained from the old traditions was the hair shirt that Lancel wore – rough, hoarse and uncomfortable, a sign of penitence that itched against his skin.

Three Warrior’s Sons stood outside of his door, all similarly garbed with shaved heads. Lancel nodded to his brothers in arms.

As he stepped out of his quarters, the Great Sept of Baelor looked so different from what it had been. It had once been a temple of wealth and lavish corruption. A temple to the gods, supposedly, but designed more for the arrogance of kings. A white marble domed castle, with seven crystal towers, mosaics and tapestries, and domes of glass, gold and crystal. Those were mostly gone now.

The Poor Fellows had stripped the lavish, wasteful expense of the wall, chiselling out mosaics and leaving bare chipped walls in their place. It took dozens of men to remove the marble statues from the doorways, to tear off the crystals. The Myrish carpets pulled from the floors and the stained windows pulled out. Men with knives even cut off the gold furnishing from the parchments in prayer books. The images of the Seven remained untouched, of course, but the High Septon had been especially ruthless towards the monuments of Baelor and all the other tributes to human vanity.

They had found traders from Braavos that had bought most of it for a decent price. The sparrows ransacked the sept for every penny, and all of the profits went to helping the starving and hungry of the city, or to arm the Poor Fellows taking up swords once again.

It had taken funding to re-establish the Faith Militant, the Swords and Stars of the Faith, and the High Septon had financed it by stripping away the rotting lavish wealth. Like a butterfly emerging for a dead husk.

This sept is a different place, Lancel thought proudly. Its halls were now used to house the hungry and homeless, rather than useless extravagance. Lancel’s father had been appalled to see what the High Septon had done, but he didn’t understand. Few of the highborn understood.

The concept of helping people was just so baffling to them.

In the marble plaza outside the sept, crowds and camps of sparrows still lingered. That horrible, vain statue of Baelor was covered in the bones of holy men, given tribute so none could forget their sacrifices. There were cloth tents raised, banners of seven-sided stars raised over the plaza.
Hundreds, thousands of smallfolk lingered around Visenya’s Hill. The High Septon had turned the sept to what it should have always been; a congregation for the holy.

The cobbled roads leading up to the sept had been sealed, however. There were Poor Fellows lining the paths, and they had raised gates and fortifications along the streets to defend Visenya’s Hill and the sept. For a time, there had been a fear that the Great Sept might come under attack by wicked men serving the queen. That fear had mostly passed, but the fortifications remained.

“Ser Lancel,” a sweet voice called behind him. “His Holiness calls for you.”

He smiled softly as he saw Sister Tyene waiting for him. Lancel’s time of pious service and hard penance had left his face haggard, but Sister Tyene looked just as fresh and as beautiful as ever. A test of my wicked desires, Lancel mused, but that was an unfair thought. Tyene was a soft, innocent and meek lady; as lovely as the Maiden in plain wool robes. “Thank you, sister,” Lancel said with a bow. “But please, do not call me ‘ser’.”

“Begging your pardon.” Sister Tyene looked surprised. “I thought you were an anointed knight?”

“I am. But I do not deserve to be,” Lancel admitted. “I was anointed simply because of my father and my house, not for any act of great valour or worth. The title ‘ser’ should be reserved be for true and just knights – I do not wish to shame the rank any more than it already is.”

She lowered her head, smiling reassuringly. “I understand, brother,” Tyene replied. “Come, the High Septon awaits you.”

Lancel followed. Tyene Sand had arrived from Dorne months ago – the bastard daughter of Oberyn
Martell – but she came humbled and wishing to repent for her sins. She joined the High Septon’s new breed of Faith with open arms. Lancel had seen of her frequently enough at sermons, but they rarely had chance to interact; Tyene spent most of her time praying with the High Septon and the Most Devout, or giving aid to the smallfolk. A truly pious maiden, the High Septon had proclaimed of her, and welcomed her into the inner circle. The sept had offered thanks for her family’s contribution to the Faith.

Outside, in the courtyard, he heard chanting. The crowds were chanting the Prayer of the Seven.

“They have been congregating all morning,” Sister Tyene noted, her arms folded in the high sleeves of her robes as they walked. “We will have to clear them soon enough, but the people want to be here for the trial.”

“And is it confirmed?” Lancel still felt on-edge. “Is she truly coming?”

“The message two days ago said she would,” Sister Tyene replied. “Ser Bonifer will be escorting her from the keep. But if she does not, well, then the Father’s patience will run out and the Warrior’s duty will begin.”

Lancel only nodded. The raven they had received from Ser Bonifer said only that Cersei had surrendered, and that he would ensure that she arrived for her trial. Myrcella’s death has sucked the will to defy from her, Lancel thought, and his heart still ached with the thought of the little princess’ fate.

He glanced back to Tyene. The sister’s skin was milky pale rather than the typical Dornish brown, but her surname was still Sand. Tyene had been more appalled than anybody with news of Myrcella’s fate in Dorne, so much so she broke down into tears before the High Septon. Tyene is not responsible for her family’s actions, Lancel thought to himself. Tyene had come to King’s Landing and into the clergy to escape from her family – and Lancel of all people could sympathise with that.

Ser Gerold Dayne of High Hermitage was most certainly responsible for the heinous crime, but it was a matter of rumour and debate whether Obara Sand, House Martell or Tyrion Lannister had supported him. There had been ravens both confirming and denying it. Dark wings, doubtful words.

Yet today is day seventy-seven. If Cersei did not leave the Red Keep today, she would be tried in absentia, and on day seventy-eight the Warrior’s Sons would break down the gates and take her. To do so will put all of the hostage’s lives, Queen Margaery and even King Tommen included, in great peril, Lancel thought with a grimace. The only thing that Mace Tyrell, Kevan Lannister and the High Septon agreed upon was that was an option to avoid.

Maybe Sister Tyene saw the nervousness on his face. “Be brave, brother,” the sister said sweetly, placing a hand on his shoulder. “The Father’s justice will be done, and there is no doubt in my mind that the wicked will be brought to account.”

She led him to the High Septon’s chambers, at the heart of the sept. At one time, there had been silk and velvet tapestries on the walls, but without them the bare corridor felt more sublime, holier.

They passed a dozen Warrior’s Sons standing guard near doors to the conclave where the Most Devout were gathering, and more Poor Fellows beyond that. Lancel glimpsed three bruised and haggard black-haired figures standing in chains – the Kettleblack brothers, being prepared for their testimony too. All three of the ‘knights’ had dark gazes and red eyes.

He half-expected to join them as another witness, but Sister Tyene led him away from them, towards a huge set of bronze and oak doors at the end of the corridor. The wood was scratched from where they had peeled the silver and gold decorations from it.

Lancel was twitching with nerves. Sister Tyene knocked on the door, and then bowed her head as she opened it for him. She didn’t follow.

Inside, Lancel was completely unsurprised to see that the High Septon’s quarters were bare. The wiry old man was on his knees, praying before a carved wooden statue of the Father, as Lancel stepped in. He didn’t say a word until the High Septon finished the prayer.

Then, Lancel bowed low. “Your Holiness.”

“Brother Lancel,” the High Septon replied. His voice was hard, gnarly, and he stood stiff like wood. He was not a royal figure; he stood tall with round shoulders, and a mop of a greying beard from his cheeks. “Today is the day. The Most Devout are already assembled and the trial will happen, with or without the queen’s presence. You will be called upon to give testimony.”

“I am prepared, Your Holiness,” Lancel replied. He didn’t stand up. “Let the Seven’s will be done. I shall speak the truth, the truth of both Cersei’s sins and my own.” As I should have done from the beginning.

There was a pause. The High Septon stood stiffly. “I know my duty, Your Holiness,” Lancel said, grimacing. “Cersei has avoided judgement for too long, and it is my part of my atonement to see her brought to justice. I will do so with my testimony, or with my sword if it need be.”

“Lancel, my son.” His Holiness’ voice turned soft. “There is no penance required from you today. I only wish to see if you are alright.”

Lancel would not lie to the High Septon. Small lies could lead to bigger lies. “I am nervous, Your Holiness.”

“That is understandable,” he soothed, speaking calmly and slowly. “The Warrior gave us all fear for a reason, my son, in the same way he granted us pain. Of all the weaknesses of the flesh, fear is not one to be ashamed of.”

Lancel’s felt his shoulders relax, but there was still a knot in his stomach. The High Septon took a step forward, and Lancel raised his head. The High Septon’s eyes were kind and understanding, in a way that they rarely were in public. Towards the sinners the High Septon was as hard as oak, but towards his followers the man turned gentle as a leaf. He was a man who would take the time to talk to those in need, to reassure them. Kindness is the Seven’s greatest blessing, he once said.

The quiet pause felt comforting, tender. The High Septon placed his hand on Lancel’s shoulder and pulled him up from his knees.

“When you came to me, you were lost. Tormented,” His Holiness said soothingly. “I showed you the path, but you are the one that walked down it. We all confront our sins and we pay the penance. You may be scared, but I believe you will do your duty, my son.”

My own father had never been so understanding towards me. “Will there be fighting, Your Holiness?”

“I pray not. But I will not dismiss the possibility, and the queen has proved herself willing to resort to any depravity. If it comes to it – no matter whom raises their blades against us – I have no doubt that loyal and pious men will fight for the Faith.”
“My brothers and I stand ready to, Your Holiness,” Lancel raised his hand to his breastplate, his fist over the seven-pointed star. “In the name of the Warrior.”

“At ease, my son.” Dark brown eyes inspected him coolly. “You stand so rigid I fear your shoulders might break. You keep your eyes forward and your gaze low, but you are blinking twice a heartbeat.” Lancel twitched. “Take a deep breath, and calm yourself.”

Lancel complied, but even standing in His Holiness’ presence made him nervous. He forced his fists to unfurl, and his body slouched slightly. “I received word from Kevan Lannister,” the High Septon continued, “begging me once again to release you from your vows. Your father worries for you.”

His jaw tightened somewhat, but Lancel was trying to keep himself calm. “I have made my choice, Your Holiness.”

“You have. And are you aware that you are now the rightful heir to Casterly Rock?”

Lancel didn’t react. “Jaime Lannister is missing and thought dead, but a sworn brother regardless.” the High Septon continued. “Tyrion Lannister is a convicted murderer sentenced to death.” Something in the High Septon’s gaze flickered. “Cersei Lannister may be as well, shortly enough. By rights, lordship of House Lannister would revert to your father, and you are Ser Kevan’s only heir.”

That was a painful thought. Memories flashed through him, and he stayed silent for a passing of breaths. Once, my family was so large, so full of life, but now… Lancel’s little brother Willem had been butchered by Rickard Karstark at Riverrun, while his other siblings Janei and Martyn had died along with their mother, in the westerlands at the hands of outlaws. All of them hung from a tree outside of Cornfield.

Janei had only been a babe, one that Lancel had never even had a chance to meet.

His cousins were falling like leaves from a tree in autumn. Between the hangwoman in the riverlands, the white dragon, assassins, the Imp… Once his family had been plentiful, but now the pride was being shredded. We Lannisters are falling like flies.

He focused on the High Septon’s eyes. “I took a vow, Your Worship.”

“You did.” He nodded. “And have you actually spoken to your father, since that vow?”

I have not. His silence was the only answer. The High Septon nodded.

“Ser Kevan fears that I am forcing you to stay here,” the High Septon said softly. “That you are my hostage against him.”

“That is not–!” Lancel’s jaw clenched. “I have made my choice, Your Holiness, and I have nothing more to say to him.”

“Ser Kevan loves you. It is a sacred bond between father and son, not so easily forsaken,” the High Septon intoned. “I have clashed heads with Ser Kevan many, many times recently, but I cannot fault his concern for you.”

You have been more of a father to me than he ever has. “My father…” Lancel hesitated. “My father is what is wrong with this world, Your Holiness.” The High Septon raised an eyebrow. “My father is a follower of the faithless; he considers himself noble, even, but he is a man who maintains and enables wicked desires and ambitions. He would have had me forced into a dreary castle, with a wife I care nothing for, into a life where I have no fulfilment… just so he can help maintain the status of his family. A wicked status of pride and avarice.” Lancel shook his head. “I cannot forgive him for that.”

He was met by silence, and a contemplative gaze. The heir to Casterly Rock, Lancel thought vaguely. I never wanted to be Lord of Darry, let alone Lord of the Rock. A younger, more foolish Lancel would have killed for that position, but now it just all seemed… hollow.

“I pray and mourn for my brothers, my sister, my mother…” Lancel said. And my grandfather, both of them, my cousins, my friends… there are so many I have lost. “And I would seek justice against the fiends that murdered them, but, now, my place is here.”

“Are you steadfast in that resolution?”

“I am. I do not want to be released from my vows, Your Holiness,” Lancel said firmly. “I wish to honour them faithfully.” I want to be Lancel the Repentant, the holy warrior. I want to be strong.

The High Septon nodded slowly. “Very well. I will not force anything of you.” He paused. “Although, for the love that the Father Above honours us with, I would advise you to speak to Ser Kevan.”

“I have said all that I wish to say to him, Your Holiness.”

“You truly care so little of your family?”

I care. It’s my care that is the problem. “My family is a family of wickedness. I can only strive to separate and redeem myself from them.”

The High Septon didn’t reply, but there was a relaxing cast to his features, a kind look in his eyes. Like he agreed and approved. There was silence for several heartbeats. Every moment felt so tender, so intimate. The High Septon is the god’s voice on earth, Lancel, thought, I am speaking to the closest aspect of the Seven I’ll ever reach.

“Then tell me,” the High Septon said gravely, “how would you judge Cersei Lannister’s actions?”

Lancel hesitated, biting his lip. “I would think of the Mother’s mercy, Your Holiness. For all her flaws and her sins, I believe that Cersei deserves compassion.”

“Is that so? You had strong feelings towards her, if I recall.”

“I did. Once I longed for her, then I was shamed by her, and then I hated her. I hated myself too,” Lancel admitted. “But as I walk down a pious path, my hate fades and I start to pity her instead.”

“Pity her, really? She murdered the previous High Septon. She had her man try to murder me,” the High Septon said, with a slight scoff. “That fiend of a knight tried to suffocate me with a pillow in these quarters. She stands accused of crimes of the highest order; murder, conspiracy, treason, incest, infidelity. Violence against the gods themselves. Do you truly believe her deserving of pity?”

“I do,” Lancel said earnestly. “I believe there is no sinner so foul that they do not deserve pity.”

The High Septon stood silently and didn’t reply. “She is a mother, Your Worship. She is a weak woman consumed by desire, avarice and pride, but she loves her children, and I believe the loss of her son unhinged her. Grief and weakness drove her down a dark path, but I believe that even she could be brought to the Light of the Seven. In your judgement, I ask only that you consider the Mother’s mercy, Your Holiness.”

The man’s gnarled features looked cast from stone. There was no reaction for a while, but then he nodded. “You grow wiser every day, Lancel. The path to true piousness is a long and arduous one, but I can see you walking it.” He nodded again. “Thank you for your words, my son, I shall consider them.”

“Thank you, Your Holiness.” He hesitated. “What of King Tommen, Your Holiness?”

The man raised an eyebrow. “Rumours have been spreading for years,” Lancel admitted. “And, well…”

His voice trailed away uncertainly. “It is ill-befitting to concern yourself with baseless rumours,” the High Septon chided. “Trust in the Crone’s wisdom.”

“I do. I try.” Lancel grimaced. “But one of the charges placed against Cersei is that of incest.” The charge that I bring. “And then with the rumours concerning her children…”

“Yes,” His Holiness sighed. “Of all the charges, that is perhaps the most troubling, and most difficult to judge. We know that she defiled her body shamelessly with men after her husband’s death, but did she during the marriage as well? From whose seed were her children born, and how can we make that judgement?” He paused. “Do you have opinion on that, my son?”

Lancel didn’t reply. There was a faint and grim, humourless smile across the High Septon’s lips. “Yes. I pray for clarity on the matter, but the Seven rarely make such matters obvious. You can be sure many others are asking the same; is King Tommen truly illegitimate?” Another pause. “The evidence to suggest so… it is not insignificant. Stannis Baratheon may be apostate, but the words in his letters cannot be so easily dismissed. Then, Eddard Stark’s strange execution.” The High Septon grimaced, shaking his head. “On the steps of this very sept. A transgression that never should have passed without punishment.”

Lancel didn’t know what to feel. He didn’t want to believe it true, but Cersei had already proven herself capable of anything… Nobody could deny that Cersei’s children looked more like Jaime than Robert. “And if he is illegitimate?” he asked cautiously. Then who is the true king? Will you renounce King Tommen? “… Then this Aegon?”

“Aegon Targaryen,” the High Septon tutted. “Did you know a ship arrived from Pentos loaded with gold, gems and silk as a ‘donation’ to the Faith in King Aegon’s name? I accepted the wealth, sure enough, and then dedicated it to our efforts, but they are fooling themselves if they think coin will affect my judgement.”

“I do not trust him, Your Holiness,” Lancel warned. Perhaps he was speaking out of turn, but the Father compelled him to speak his mind. “This Aegon is trying to take advantage of us.”

“There are many who speak highly of him. This young king is said to be bold and kind.”

“A mummer will always strive to appear fair to the eye,” Lancel warned. “But it is by the company he keeps that you should look for a judge of his character. He surrounds himself with mercenaries and rebels and worse. The Imp follows him.”

The High Septon stood quietly. Over the past months, it seemed like the clergy in the Great Sept was still split on the matter, and yet more and more were starting to cry out for Aegon Targaryen as the rightful ruler. Even many of the Warrior’s Sons were starting to speak out in favour of the returned dragon. Lancel had heard Sister Tyene speak fondly of him to the other septas once; when our hour is darkest, the sister had said, and our kings prove themselves false, by the Seven’s blessings we are returned with the rightful liege. There were many in the sept saying the same.

“Cersei may be mad, but she is right concerning one matter; Tyrion Lannister is not to be trusted,” Lancel pressed on. The thought of that grinning, scheming dwarf flashed before his eyes. How he exploited me for his own ends, manipulated me… “The Imp drove Cersei to her depravity, and now he seeks to take advantage of it.”

“Yes; Tyrion Lannister is a kinslayer and a kingslayer, two crimes that the Seven will not forgive. I have not forgotten, my son.” The High Septon shook his head. “No, every time this ‘Aegon’ and his envoys beseech me for my blessing, I have replied with silence. I do not intend to change that answer, either.”

He paused for a long time, several heart beats passing as the High Septon mused. “You speak honestly, Brother Lancel, and my own feelings on the matter are similar.” he said finally. “Cersei Lannister committed grave crimes and for that there must be punishment. However, the weakness of women is well-noted, and I have no wish to be cruel. Whatever crimes his mother committed, the young King Tommen Baratheon is innocent of them – I will not punish the boy for his mother’s mistakes.” The High Septon nodded. “Very well. The Queen Regent has surrendered, and if King Tommen and Queen Margaery emerge unharmed then the Father can be just.”

There is no evidence that Tommen was illegitimate beyond rumour and speculation, Lancel told himself. “You would pardon her?” Lancel asked.

“Pardon? No. There must be a trial, and it must be open and fair, but I shall recommend mercy to the Most Devout.”

Mercy. Lancel’s heart raced with the word. Stripped of status, certainly, and likely exile too. Perhaps a walk of shame or some other penance. But Cersei will keep her head, keep her life, keep her son.

“Thank you for your consideration, Your Holiness.” Lancel bowed his head deeply.

“And thank you for your input. I am only mortal, these matters been troubling me greatly too. And yet I feel the Father’s wisdom in your words.” He placed his hands on Lancel’s shoulders. “Rise, my son. It is nearly noon, and I must pray before the congregation begins.”

“What will you have of me, Your Holiness?”

“I would like you in the courtyard, to greet the queen as she steps out.” Lancel blinked, looking shocked. The High Septon just nodded. “She is your family still. Whatever amends you must make to her, whatever you must say, say your piece as you escort her through.”

“I…” The thought of facing Cersei again – of looking into her beautiful, cruel green eyes – scared him, but he nodded. “I will, Your Grace.”

Lancel the Repentant. That is the title I must work towards. I must be brave, just and pious.

He exited the sept through the Warrior’s Door, nodding to the other knights already waiting. There were already septons coming out the Father’s Door and septas the Mother’s Door, taking position on the upper steps. Lancel hesitated, but he walked down the steps towards the great statue of Baelor.

A small force of Warrior’s Sons were already herding the crowds back, and Lancel made to join them. He saw Ser Wylard the Pious, a brown-haired, broad and stocky knight nodding to him.
“Brother Lancel,” greeted Ser Wylard.

“Brother Wylard,” Lancel returned.

The Warrior’s Sons stood in groups of seven, lining the road and the streets. From atop of the steps, the commander of the Warrior’s Sons, Ser Theodan the True, standing tall and strong over the courtyard.

In the distance, he could see the shadow of the Red Keep looming at the far end of the city. The air was cool and crisp, but the sun was bright. There was nothing to do but stand in formation, to wait and pray. Please, Cersei, Lancel begged silently.

The crowds started to sing hymns to the Seven as they stirred. The hours felt so tense, so nerve wracking.

“The queen’s carriage approaches!” the cry came finally, splitting through the verse of the Warrior.

From the top of the hill, Lancel finally saw the royal wheelhouse rumbling up the Street of Sisters. It was a huge, rumbling carriage clattering over the cobblestones, painted lime green and the lined with gilded leaf. The wheels were iron-rimmed, so loud that Lancel could hear the rumble even over the din of the crowds. The windows were covered in velvet drapes, and doorway marked with the crown of the Iron Throne.

The banners proudly bore both the lion of Lannister and the stag of Baratheon – four flags on the front and back hanging limply in the windless morn. It normally took a dozen horses to pull a wheelhouse that size, but now it was being driven by only eight palfreys. None of the horses looked particularly healthy, either.

He saw the gleaming armour of Ser Bonifer the Good and his knights, riding at the front of the column. Ser Bonifer has returned, Lancel thought with a sigh, and his heart eased at the sight.

There had a been a fear of riots on the streets, so the High Septon allowed Cersei twenty guards as well as the Kingsguard to escort her. To her credit, she had complied. The score of mounted riders all wore Lannister red cloaks, escorting the wheelhouse closely. The escort looked tense, tight, even from a distance. The mounted men carried swords instead of lances. Lancel could only see a single white cloak leading the escort – perhaps Cersei only had a single Kingsguard left – but he couldn’t recognise which man it was from a distance. They were all helmed and wearing face-guards.

From Visenya’s Hill, Lancel could watch as the procession moved down the Hook, past the Plaza of the Guards, and slowly cobbled towards Sept Road. As they reached the far end of the street, the palfreys neighed and strained to pull the carriage up the incline.

Watching it creep through the city towards them felt painfully slow. “Justice for Queen Margaery!” the cries came. “Cersei the Wicked!” another shouted. “Queen Whore!”

From the minute the Holy Gate opened, there were Poor Fellows lining the street. The crowds stirred. Streets lined with people – men, women and children. Behind the procession, the Poor Fellows walked in sandals with iron swords, ringing bells and chanting. The sparrows lined the road, and the crowd broke and followed as soon as the carriage cobbled past.

The sound of those iron wheels clattering up the stones slowly sounded agonising, echoing and tense.

Lancel was thankful that crowds let the procession mostly unhindered. He saw some hurling spoiled fruit and stones, or insults, but most seemed more restrained. It was by the Mother’s mercy that were no mobs. Lancel didn’t wish to see Cersei shamed or tortured any more than necessary.

Many were jeering, but Lancel felt only sorrow. This is a good thing, he thought, taking a deep breath. The queen has relented – as bitter and as forced as it may have been – but she has come to face judgement. She would face penance, but this is the only way she may ever be redeemed before men and gods.

Judgement before a trial of seven of the Most Devout. The High Septon would not accept a trial by combat, he knew.

“Brother Wylard,” Lancel called, keeping his voice low. The other Warrior Son looked to him. “When she reaches the courtyard, could you please have your men keep your distance? I wish to greet the queen alone.”

Ser Wylard paused, and then nodded. “As you wish, brother.”

“Seven bless you.”

The carriage reached the plaza of the Great Sept, where the procession was greeted by Ser Theodan the True. The knights took over the escort, calling out to Ser Bonifer the Good and exchanging brief words and nods. For a while, the only sound were horses neighing uneasily. Lancel could see the horses of the Lannister men skitting restlessly. Those horses must have been starved and tortured, trapped in the Red Keep for over two months, Lancel thought.

Finally, Ser Theodan nodded. “Clear the way!” his strong and clear voice called. “Clear the way for the queen!”

The crowds rushed forward eagerly. Lancel heard the cry of “whore, whore, whore!” starting to rise, but the Warrior’s Sons weren’t gentle as they pushed the smallfolk away. The bells started to ring, and more and more started to pour down the marbles stairs of the Great Sept. Lines of septons and septa filled the left and ride of the stairs, robed figures standing solemn. The whole realm will be watching this trial, Lancel thought, and the High Septon wants to make the judgement clear and transparent for all to see.

There were no smiles or nods from the guardsmen as they passed. They all sat tense, grim and dark faces under their helms. Lancel recognised the Kingsguard at the front by his stout body shape – Ser Boros Blount sat stiffly on his horse, while the mare beneath him tottered uneasily. Ser Boros Blount, the last and least of the Kingsguard, Lancel thought foully. A once noble order ruined one by one and dragged into shame – so very representative of the Seven Kingdoms themselves.

“Queen Cersei of House Lannister!” A crier announced. “Accused of murder, conspiracy and infidelity! Coming before the High Septon and the Most Devout, to face judgement in the Light of Seven and by all laws of man! Let it be known that no man, of any standing, may escape divine justice!”

“Whore, whore, whore!” a small group of determined men in the crowd were still chanting, despite the Poor Fellows trying to extinguish the cry.

The creaking of that wheelhouse seemed sad as it came to a halt. A lavish coffin. Cersei, I’m sorry.

The driver – a hooded man in a dark cloak – lashed the palfreys four times to get them to stop. The carriage was still. Nobody said a word. Even despite the jeers and chants from the crowd all around him, the air seemed still. Lancel took a deep breath, and stepped forward to the steps.
The door didn’t open. She’s scared, Lancel thought. Scared to show herself so vulnerable. Underneath it all – beneath all the pride, avarice and the paranoia – Cersei’s true weakness was that she had always been so scared to leave herself exposed.

Lancel kept his voice low. He stepped forward, and knocked on the door. His knuckles rasped three times against the wood. “Cersei,” he called, not unkindly. “My Queen. His Holiness is waiting for you, you must come out now.”

There was no response, but Lancel could hear footsteps inside the wheelhouse. Pacing. None of the guards twitched.

Lancel grimaced, feeling his heart flutter. He couldn’t help but think back to the beautiful, confident woman who had once taken him to bed, or the proud and fierce cousin he had once known. Why did it have to come to this?

After twenty long heartbeats, Ser Wylard stepped forward. “Cersei Lannister!” the knight shouted impatiently. “Step forward!”

Do not make this more difficult than it needs to be, Lancel begged. But still, there was no reply.

Brief moment of hesitation, before glances turned to the commander of the Warrior’s Sons. Ser Theodan’s hand went to his sword cautiously, looking around at the wheelhouse. The men were standing like statues. “Queen Cersei!” he bellowed. “You are under arrest by the Faith of the Seven, and to be brought to trial. You must remove yourself from the carriage!”

No response. Lancel could have groaned. Ser Theodan turned to give the order men to break down the door, when suddenly the handle lurched. The door creaked open, and there was a figure swaying in the doorway.

She was wearing a red dress and a golden shawl.

The crowd cheered too early. None of the knights cheered, they just stared.

It was Cersei’s dress. Lancel recognised the dress instantly. But it wasn’t Cersei.

His mouth was agape. Cersei’s dress… One of her finest – red velvet and gold trimming, long sleeves and a sleek collar, with a golden silk shawl and lavish pearl-tipped shoes. Lancel remembered the dress so, so clearly; a dress that Cersei had worn at her prime, in all her glorious beauty, a dress so expensive it was worth a lord’s ransom in itself. The dress Cersei wore for Joffrey’s wedding.

At first, Lancel thought that he was staring at some beggar woman, taken from the streets and dressed as a queen.

The woman wearing the dress was a hag. She was the ugliest woman Lancel had ever seen. Her skin was sickly pale, with purple veins bulging over her body and face as white as milk. She was scarred – long, bloody wounds all over her face and shoulders like a butchered pig, and discoloured red skin across her neck. Her throat looked crushed, her skin oozing. She was short and thin, but her body was so bloated and limp it seemed the tight corset was straining to keep her upright. She had dark hair, rough like straw and crudely netted in a bundle with rubies sewn into it. There was expensive Myrish perfume oozing off her, but it couldn’t cover the foul, torpid odour wafting from her, like rotting flesh.

A corpse dressed in finery.
Slowly, the hag took uneven, jerky steps down the stairs. She was limping, staggering with every step, gasping. Twitching in ways that no person ever should. Her mouth stammered, but no words came out. Her hands were trembling, fingers flailing at empty air.

The Warrior’s Sons stared. The silence fell slowly, and nobody seemed to know how to react. He saw the knights gaping, shuffling backwards.

Lancel felt the terror creep up his spine. Slowly, very slowly, he started to recognise her features. Even underneath all the wounds and mutilated skin, Lancel recognised her cheeks, the dainty nose, the curve of her chin…

“Queen Margaery?!”

And just like that, the world broke.

She lunged. The creature that looked like Margaery Tyrell dived at him, bloody fingernails clawing.

She was stumbling, but Lancel was left so shocked he couldn’t react as she dragged him to the ground. Her mouth was gasping, trying to speak. Her bloodshot blue eyes were so, so wide – crazed, panicked, terrified.

The world dissolved into nothing but horror.

Lancel heard Ser Theodan scream something. He couldn’t make out the words over his frantic heartbeat. He felt the thing’s nails scrape against his breastplate, clawing murderously. Her fingernails snapped, leaving a trail of black, gooey ooze across steel.

The impact still knocked Lancel back, but Ser Wylard jumped to restrain her. Queen Margaery thrashed and squirmed against the big and broad man trying to hold her down. People were screaming, shouting…

Something twinged in the air, like a signal. At once, all of the Lannister guards moved at once. Their horses were screaming as the men thrust themselves forward.

The fools, Lancel thought vaguely. We outnumber them fifty to one. Still, these men didn’t seem to care.

Bodies clashed together around him, the Warrior’s Sons were caught off-guard by the sudden ferocity. It was like they went from passive to murderous without even a warning. He heard swords clanging together, men thrashing. Lancel was still on the cobbled ground, staring upwards at the abomination that looked so little like Margaery.

She was a small and lithe figure, and yet it still took four strong knights to hold her down. Lancel gaped, but the Warrior’s Sons were being pushed backwards, their voices breaking in panic…

There was a crunch of flesh and bone. Lancel blinked, and then suddenly the Margaery-creature’s hands were crushing Ser Wylard’s neck. Blood splattered against the red dress, and then she yanked with a strangled hissing sound.

The knight’s body went limp, blood gushed, and then his head bounced off the ground. His head, he thought with pure horror. She tore off his head with her bare hands.

It was such insane strength for a small woman. Unnatural strength, the men couldn’t even hold her…
All around him, it was all chaos. He glimpsed a white-cloak stained with blood. Ser Boros Blount’s sword flashed, hacking forward with a strength and ferocity the man had never had before.

“Surrender!” Ser Theodan’s voice bellowed. “Surrender! Restrain them! Restrain them!”

Lancel was skittering backwards on the ground, unable to pull himself away. He tried to shamble to his feet, but his rainbow cloak tangled around his heels. Two knights drew their swords and charged forward, almost jumping over Lancel to charge at Margaery.

The first blade plunged through Margaery’s chest, sending a necklace of pearls clattering to the stones. The second blade severed her left arm at the shoulder in a smooth, clean stroke.

There was no blood, there was nothing but black gunk dripping from the wounds. Margaery didn’t even seem to feel it. She didn’t stagger. Her other arm lashed out, so viciously that it took a knight off his feet.

They didn’t fight like men, they didn’t fight like humans – they felt like more animals, like monsters of pure bloodlust and anger erupting from wheelhouse, surging through the crowds. Men running, screaming, howling, fighting…

“Hold them!” someone was bellowing. “HOLD THEM!”

Her lips, Lancel thought vaguely. Margaery’s lips were black and cracked, smeared in makeup, but he could see her mouth moving up and down. She was trying to speak, trying to say something, but she couldn’t. She couldn’t breathe, her throat had collapsed, her mouth could only flop…

The same words. Her lips moved in the same pattern, trying to scream the same words.

Men were hacking at her with swords, but they couldn’t put her down. A sword through her breastbone, sticking out her back. Another sliced against her shoulder, and then into her stomach. Yet she kept flailing and tearing. She wouldn’t die, she wouldn’t fall…

A sword plunged through her wrist and hand, and then it jammed against bone. Even with the blade skewered through her arm, Margaery yanked it from the knight’s hand. She lashed the sword around, clubbing a knight over the head with the crossguard. His skull caved inwards like a crushed melon, and he twitched on the cobbles.

Lancel saw another knight hack the head off a Lannister guardsman in a smooth strike, and yet the headless man still lunged at the knight with his blade. Not even decapitation could stop them, even severed arms were still wriggling on the cobbles.

Margaery was on the ground, her body hacked to oblivion. One arm was missing, the other hand a black ruin, but she was still moving, still trying to fight. A spear plunged through her leg, but she was still trying to crawl.

She was crawling towards Lancel.

Her eyes were fixed on his, her mouth still gaping. He lay across the ground. He couldn’t run, he could barely breathe, but Margaery was crawling on top on him – black ooze dripping from the hundred wounds across her body…

Lancel would have screamed, but his throat jammed. The creature thrashed and squirmed, trying to wrap her ruined hand around his neck. She was trying to strangle him, even without fingers. Trying to squeeze his throat. The knights were trying to pull her off him, but the abomination wrapped her remaining limbs around him, squeezing so hard it hurt.
It was as if murdering him was the only thing she wanted to do, the last thing she needed to accomplish with her existence. As if killing was the only thing she could do.

Lancel could see her lips, he could see the words she was trying to scream. Her voice was a whisper, so low and so wheezy he could barely even make it out…

“… Kill…” Queen Margaery croaked. “… Kill me…”

He was so close that he could see the whites of her crazed eyes, the bloody tears weeping down her cheeks…

And then a Warrior’s Son finally managed to slice her neck apart with a desperate slash.

Even as her head dropped and bounced, her body didn’t stop thrashing. Lancel’s eyes were still on Margaery’s mouth, watching with horror as the head rolled over the stones.

“Kill me,” the decapitated head mouthed. “Kill me.”

Lancel screamed.

All around him, there was a stampede of footsteps. The Warrior’s Sons were forcing the creatures backwards, but the bodies spewed over the white stones. They were each unstoppable; they didn’t feel pain, they couldn’t be wounded, they had no restraint. It took half a dozen men to overpower even one, and the pure panic was like a nightmare.

For every one that they managed to bring to the ground, it took ten Warrior’s Sons with it. They were attacking indiscriminately, without remorse, without hesitation.

There were screams, as another creature was finally brought low and a dozen knights hacked it apart with desperate frenzy. Even the hunks of flesh that were sent scattered were still wriggling.

He saw one of them fall without its helmet, and Lancel couldn’t even tell if the creature was male or female. It was nothing but a zig-zagging mess of scars and bloated skin.

He saw Ser Bonifer the Good – his shining armour stained red as he cut a bloody path through the scores of men. Through fellow knights. He is a good man, why is Ser Bonifer betraying his order? They could not be reasoned with, they could not be stopped…

“Bring them down!” Ser Theodan the True bellowed. “Bring them down!”

They were pushing up the steps… so much blood that the world looked red…

Even Ser Theodan himself had drawn his blade, to fight back a bloody grotesque that used to be Ser Boros Blount. The knight of the Kingsguard had half his helm hacked open and a sword embedded through his skull, but he was still swinging his blade in sharp, vicious lunges. The creature looked blind, its movements shambling, but its lunges were still so, so powerful…

Another Warrior’s Son blocked Blount’s strike, drawing the fallen Kingsguard’s attention away from Theodan. Once, twice, they clashed, and then the creature that used to be Boros Blount stepped forward into a powerful overhand. The Warrior’s Son screamed. His sword clattered on the stones, his arm hanging limp and broken.

The next strike hacked straight through the chainmail hauberk protecting the Warrior’s Son’s arm, tearing it off at his shoulder.
Lancel could only stare. It was less a fight, more a butcher’s block.

Blount’s last strike carved through Warrior’s Son’s steel breastplate, nearly cleaving the man in two. The blade shattered into shards, but the shambling Kingsguard fought with the broken sword and didn’t seem to realise. Grey substance of Ser Boros’ brain dribbled down his cheeks, one eye a collapsed gelatinous ruin.

There was nothing Lancel could do but lie on his back – the wriggling, headless body of the queen still on top of him – screaming at the tops of his lungs.

The Poor Fellows were trying to surge forward to help, but there were more who were fleeing senseless. Bodies were churning, stampeding into each other, men being trampled. The whole courtyard erupted into pure, mindless pandemonium.

There was nothing but madness, pure unending…

“The Stranger’s Gate!” a voice called, breaking in fear. “They’re coming through the Stranger’s Gate!”

The Stranger’s Gate – the empty and hollow gate to the back of the sept, through which the silent sisters would cart dead bodies for their last rites. Other people were screaming the same thing, but in the chaos… it was impossible to make sense of it all.

People were shouting, the direction of the crowd was starting to shift. Lancel felt the swell of footsteps from the west, men running in panic. Running away from something – there was more fighting towards the edge of the courtyard.

How? How could Cersei do this? How could she recruit such soldiers? How did she get them through the siege on the Red Keep? How could she…?

Then, Lancel saw more bodies; large, shambling shapes that were pushing in through the Stranger’s Gate. They bore no banners, they were clad in mismatched armour, but the way they moved, the way they fought…

They were not human. They were monsters wearing human skin, each of them was an abomination of the flesh.

It was a distraction, Lancel realised dumbly. Cersei sent that Margaery-monster and the wheelhouse as a distraction, to draw attention, to scatter the crowds and cause panic. There was another force of… of creatures attacking from the Stranger’s gate simultaneously.

Lancel wanted to be brave, and yet in that moment there was nothing he could do but scream. The black ooze of Queen Margaery’s blood still lathered his body. There were black shapes, shambling over the walls, swords hacking indiscriminately. No discipline to them, nothing but raw fury and bloodlust.

To his credit, Ser Theodan the True didn’t falter. The knight’s voice was strong and loud, even despite the black blood coating his silver breastplate. “Form up!” he bellowed. “Form up! Stand fast!”

Many were running, but the other knights were pushing into formation. The Poor Fellows were trying to stop the creatures, but they were being slaughtered. Lancel couldn’t even count the numbers, not through the avalanche of stampeding bodies and trampling boots.

Lancel caught a glimpse of one of them; it was a fat and bloated creature, its body dripping black ooze from purplish skin that looked like rotten meat. It had an iron axe in its hand, but there was a large wooden barrel lashed onto its back. Some of them were carrying barrels as large as their bodies – great wooden kegs fastened to them like pack mules.

The Warrior’s sons were trying to form up, a wall of shields and swords across the steps of the Great Sept. Ser Theodan’s voice managed to cut through the orchestra of screams. “Form up!” the commander bellowed. “Bowmen! Ready! Archers!”

Knights were hoisting up longbows, notching arrows. Lancel saw the creature shamble forward, its back lurching over the weight of the huge barrel on his back.

“Fire!” Ser Theodan screamed. “Fire!”

Arrows arced through the air. Lancel heard the squelching of shafts through the flesh, and then…

Boom. Air flashed green, and a wave of heat roared. The explosion felt like the roar of a great lion, a whoosh of hot wind…

Lancel was on the ground, but he saw the knights all around him scorched in their armour. He felt the pulse of power, the smoke, the heat. He could smell burning flesh, he felt the heat sear against his skin.

He gagged, unable to breathe. In that moment, Lancel was back in the Battle of Blackwater, watching the whole world burn green.

Wildfire, Lancel thought with horror. The creatures are crying casks of wildfire on their backs.

The courtyard was burning. Burning bodies, burning flesh, even burning stones. Wildfire burnt through it all, making the air haze green and black smoke. All discipline collapsed as the green flames flashed.

The creature carrying the barrel had been obliterated into a crisp, but there were more. There were more pushing through the fire, more of them with barrels on their backs.

Lancel couldn’t breathe. He was flailing on the ground, in a trench of corpses. All around him, flaming bodies were burning screaming, their skin melting in their armour. He saw other bodies – some of the creatures were burning too, but they didn’t stop. Even as the flames scouring their flesh, the monsters were still charging, still hacking through bodies. Burning undead creatures that never halted, never flinched. Not even fire could stop them.

All around him, bodies were burning and smoking. He heard the sound of wailing, he could taste the pang of blood and tears on his tongue. All around him, he saw the seven-pointed stars of the Faith, smeared red and falling to the ground.

There were still more creatures pushing through the Stranger’s Gate, more monsters carrying casks of wildfire across their back.

“Stand fast!” Ser Theodan was screaming. Somehow, the knight was still managing to stand even despite the blistering burns across his body and face. “In the name of the Warri–”

Boom.

Another flash, even larger than the first. The shockwave sent Lancel sprawling, sending his ears numb. It came from behind them. Burning debris scattered through the air, burning men howling. The world was screaming. The wheelhouse, Lancel realised. The wheelhouse exploded.
Cersei didn’t just fill the wheelhouse with monsters, she must have filled it with wildfire as well. She prepared this moment for maximum confusion, maximum panic.

The whole courtyard was burning. There was nothing but fire – fire so hot that even the marble steps were melting. Nothing but fire and corpses.

Hell. Hell is here. Cersei has released hell itself.

They were still coming, still pushing their way into the Great Sept itself. The Warrior’s Sons were burning, the crowds trampling over each other trying to flee.

I am Lancel the Repentant, he thought foggily, through the blur of terror and pain. Lancel the Warrior’s Son…

Lancel turned and ran. He ran as fast as his trembling legs could take him, pushing through the smoke and flames. He didn’t know where he was running, he just needed to run anywhere that wasn’t here. Lancel the cowardly lion.

Behind him, the Great Sept blazed in green flames. The great bell of the Father’s Spire was sounding unendingly, like a thing howling in an endless frenzy even as the flames consumed it. Lancel could hear the explosions – the whoosh of air and fire as the barrels of wildfire burst open. He hear the seven marble towers collapsing as he ran, falling into the fire along with everything that was good and holy in the world.

The smoke hissed over the city like a black dragon coiling and thrashing in the air, spitting burning debris.

The streets were in pure chaos. The crowds were in a turmoil, mobs of sparrows and Poor Fellows surging around him and breaking into hysteria. A breaking tide of flesh, the stronger trampling the weaker to death. An animal frenzy shoving and trampling each other to escape…

Lancel’s rainbow cloak had been torn off sometime in the panic, he didn’t even know when. His breastplate was smeared in ash and blood, his whole body shuddering. His hands were still gripping his sword, through – his fingers so tight that he couldn’t even dislodge them. His arms weren’t working, his mind was spinning and all he could do was run and scream.

Visenya’s Hill was burning. The immense structure was blazing from a hundred different explosions, green flashes filling the air.

Everything was seething, he heard wordless cries of pain and anger, he heard sounds of a mob clashing against soldiers. He saw a mindless mob colliding against swords and spears – against soldiers wearing Lannister red.

Lancel didn’t even know who, how or what. He just ran.

The fires were spreading, the debris bursting from the blaze and spreading over the thatch houses. Green and red flames were spitting and hissing, the whole city starting to light ablaze.

Only vaguely, he was aware of passing the cobbled Street of Sisters, and he turned and he stared up at the looming Red Keep. The castle looked as red as blood in the smoke and ash. He saw the banners of the seven-pointed star, and he ran towards.

There were Poor Fellows on the streets, the force holding siege against the gates. He saw scared faces, heard the muffled voices of men demanding for answers. Panic, confusion everywhere.
“What happened?” a man screamed – a knight on top of a horse. A Warrior’s Son, his face contorted in fear. “The Great Sept, the Most Devout – what happened?”

“Monsters!” Lancel shrieked, his voice breaking. “MONSTERS!”

There was more fighting. Lancel could feel the fighting all around him, rippling from Visenya’s Hill and throughout the city. It was all heaving, screaming…

The knight was running up to him, demanding answers, but Lancel could barely even speak. He was too busy trembling, head darting back and forth as the world howled.

The screams. Lancel focused on the screams, and they were close. he heard the sound of an agonising wail from the parallel street. The Faith Militant looked horrified listening to the cries. Cries that were being silenced one by one, every shriek coming to an abrupt halt…

“Form up!” the Warrior’s Son cried, shouting to the Poor Fellows. “Form up in the name of the Seven!”

The Seven, Lancel thought, wheezing and sputtering hysterically. Cersei had chosen seven hells instead.

The earth rumbled. There wasn’t even a moment to react as the street exploded into splinters. A force more powerful than a bull burst out of the wall of a nearby house with blinding speed, sending broken wood and debris showering over the street.

He didn’t see the blow, but he felt it. He felt the collision of solid metal against a man’s skull; Lancel felt the squelch as a man was smeared over the cobbles.

Lancel could only stare as the giant loomed, armour so heavy that the cobbles cracked with every step. The figure was huge – nearly nine-foot-tall and armoured in metal heavier than any Lancel had ever seen.

It was a giant clad in white steel, wearing a white cloak dyed red in blood. Lancel caught sight of a faceless helm, and eyes as black as dread.

And there was a steel greatsword in its hands; it swung the blade’s mass like a storm, each of the giant’s steps like an earthquake. The greatsword was huge – the largest Lancel had ever seen, more like slab of solid steel, an anvil with a sharpened edge. The giant swung the sword more like a warhammer than a sword.

The blade screamed through the air, and a man was cut into two in a single stroke.

It was too much. Too much terror – it overwhelmed him and sent Lancel’s head blank. Lancel fell to his knees as if prayer, all the while the Faith Militant collided against nine foot of solid steel and fury.

A Poor Fellow’s body crunched beneath an immense boot. That sword swung, and suddenly two screams went silent at once. One man lunged at its back with an iron sword, but the blade just snapped against the giant’s armour.

They tried to charge it, they tried to flee. The giant was relentless, immovable, unstoppable…

Lancel couldn’t even process anything but the screams. Panicked cries and abrupt silences.

The Warrior’s Son, the knight, he was the only man ahorsted atop a great destrier. The knight tried to charge against the giant, lance lunging, his horse rearing up and hooves trampling, but the steel giant didn’t even stagger. Massive hands gripped the horse’s neck, and suddenly the giant was slinging the horse and rider around like they were ragdolls.

Lancel could hear the horse’s screams, right up until it went silent with a crack. The giant swung the warhorse off the ground, so easily it was like swinging a child’s toy. It sent the horse’s corpse into a nearby cluster of men, who scattered under its mass.

First two men, then five, then ten. Over two dozen men, all fell before the giant’s sword, boots and fists. An entire street of Faith Militant, and the giant cleaved through them all so brutally it seemed casual.

It was a massacre right before his eyes – holy men dying by the dozens.

Lancel was left on his knees, face smeared with blood, staring upwards as the giant loomed. A blank helm stared back at him, totally emotionless. Lancel’s body stopped working, he could only tremble and quiver as the giant raised its steel boot upwards…

“Stop!” a voice called, and the steel giant froze, one foot in the air. “Not that one. Take him back whole.”

The giant lowered its foot. No hesitation, no pause. Lancel felt his bowels soiling himself in raw fear.

There was a man lingering at the edge of the alleyway, keeping his distance and out of sight, but his eyes sharp as he monitored. He was an old man wearing brilliant white robes, and a gentle smile on his lips as he looked out over the streaks of blood and gore.

“It is time to return,” Lord Qyburn, master of whisperers, ordered, hobbling forward across the bloody cobbles in slow, careful steps. “Spectacular job, ser, but carry this one with back you.” He turned to Lancel, and he could see Qyburn’s dark eyes gleaming. No remorse, no pity, nothing but pure fascination and zeal. “I feel like we may have a use for you yet, Ser Lancel.”

_The hells are empty_, Lancel thought hollowly. _All the demons are here._

The great gauntleted hand reached for him, and everything went black.

The Smith

Qyburn liked to hum as he worked. Despite his best efforts to lighten up the area, the black cells were still a dark and dreary place. Qyburn had taken some lavish, brightly coloured tapestries of greens and reds from Maegor’s Holdfast, in an attempt to brighten it all up. He had picked the happy cheerful, triumphant tapestries – ones celebrating great hunts or victories – and he placed dozens of candles across the walls and floor. Bright light and bright colours surrounded him as he worked.

Perhaps it was just personal preference, but he did remember Maester Ebrose once propositioning that men would suffer anxiety and seasonal disorder from being removed from the sun for long lengths of time. Qyburn had spent a very long time in the dungeons, perhaps unhealthily so, and he theorised that maybe the bright colours could offset the effects.

Lancel Lannister was left shivering, curled up in one of the cells before a great yellow tapestry depicting the sun. The cell door was left open, and yet Ser Robert Strong stood on the other side of it. Lancel didn’t even try to run. The boy looked too shaken to even speak.

He had barely said a word, only whimpers, as Ser Robert dropped him into the dungeons.

Qyburn had made himself at home in the dungeons over his time here, even. It had been a daunting task, but slowly Qyburn had turned the sprawling maze of grimy cells into a decent workshop. He had run the dungeons of the Red Keep – from the upper floors filled with common stock, to the sealed black cells on the third level, to the torture chambers on the fourth. It had been difficult to even keep it all maintained, but, well, Qyburn was hardly the type of person to back away from a challenge.

Qyburn was humming as he shuffled around, gathering his tools. The workshop had already been stripped bare, but Qyburn could make do for now. “I hope you can pardon the quarters,” Qyburn said apologetically. “I usually have better apparatus than this, but, alas, I’ve already packed away most of my equipment.”

There was no reply. Qyburn cast an inquisitive eye over Lancel’s body, tutting quietly as he saw the faint lash marks across the boy’s back. Lancel had been stripped bare, his skin shivering in the chill of the dungeons. Young adult male, Qyburn thought to himself. Healthy, early-twenties. Subject is in good shape; a few mild burns, perhaps some head trauma. Signs of severe weight loss.

“Normally I do try to treat my patients with milk of the poppy too, to ease the process,” Qyburn continued, talking mostly to himself, “but I’m afraid I must offer my apologies there too – my last stores of the milk depleted some weeks ago.”

Strangely, though, that had been a mixed blessing. Qyburn had discovered that the procedure became slightly more effective the more pain the subject suffered, although he had yet to form a solid hypothesis why.

Lancel’s eyes were unfocused, his head drooping, mouth groaning nonsensically. A concussion, Qyburn mused. Unfortunate. Still, Qyburn tapped Lancel’s shoulder through the bars. “Can you hear me, Ser Lancel?” Qyburn asked. “I have no desire to be cruel, ser. If there are any steps I can take for your convenience, please do indicate. I am well aware that it can all be rather… unsettling.”

Behind him, Ser Robert Strong loomed before the cell door. Qyburn liked having the voiceless knight nearby, in case the patients became unruly. Ser Robert might well be the last of my creatures still walking, Qyburn mused. Months of work, and they are all gone in a single day. So many miracles of science, all sent to the Great Sept to burn or be hacked apart by fanatics. What a depressing thought.

Still, there was no doubt in Qyburn’s mind that Ser Robert Strong was also the finest of his works. Ser Robert Strong had been the first – the experimental subject, the one on which Qyburn perfected his craft. None of the others could even match Ser Robert’s… vitality.

Ser Gregor Clegane had been an exceptionally strong man. Even in death, that didn’t change.

“Well then, Robert, if you wouldn’t mind?” Qyburn said with a smile, and giant of a knight lurched into motion. Ser Robert’s armour creaked, as he bent down to grab Lancel. The boy tried to squirm, tried to wriggle away, but it was useless. “On to the bench now, Robert,” Qyburn ordered. “Place him and hold him steady.”

“No!” Lancel wailed, weeping, as the great knight levered him up. “No!”
“Now, now,” Qyburn tutted. “It will be easier if you don’t struggle. I understand this must be unpleasant, and I have no wish to make it more so.”

“You—” Lancel tried to scream, but his voice was cut off as Ser Robert dropped him onto the wooden board. A great metal hand slammed over Lancel’s chest, pinning him down. Qyburn was already bringing the leather straps, to fasten Lancel’s wrists and ankles onto the workbench. Lancel tried to squirm, but Qyburn had practice in tying patients down smoothly.

“To me, the most important thing in the world,” Qyburn said soothingly, as he tightened the straps, “is explanation. I am a great believer in awareness, in understanding – that is how we shape and comprehend the world around us. I do not wish to rob you of that, Lancel.” Qyburn motioned for Ser Robert to step backwards. “I want you to understand why you are here. I’m not a ruthless murderer – I want you to die with answers.”

Lancel’s eyes were dazed and his throat gulping. Qyburn cupped his cheek, trying to calm him. “I do hope you hear my words. I want you to listen to me, to make peace with what is happening to you.”

Qyburn picked up another strap of leather, and placed it into Lancel’s mouth and tightened it around his neck. The man tried to gag, but Qyburn’s grip was firm. Previous patients had bitten their own tongue off during the convulsions, and that had been unfortunate.

“I made a promise to your cousin, the queen,” Qyburn continued with a sigh, “that I would resurrect her family. I promised that I could bring back those lost to her. That I could change the world for her.” Qyburn thinned his lips. “And, oh, it would be spectacular if I had the chance as well. The greatest discovery in modern history – developed right here, and I was perfectly willing to share it with all.”

To think of all the good I could have done... we came so close. His voice was wistful, but then he shook his head. “Nevertheless,” Qyburn continued, “circumstances being what they are – I feel like that it is prudent for me to make my hasty departure. I shall be leaving both this city and the queen very quickly, I think, and Ser Robert will be escorting me. I do wish Queen Cersei the very best, but right now it seems… hmm, what’s the word? … unhealthy to stay by the queen’s side much longer.”

Queen Cersei would be furious to learn that Ser Robert – ‘her’ champion – had abandoned her, but no matter. Ser Robert had always belonged to Qyburn, not the queen. “And yet I am very grateful for the queen’s patronage,” Qyburn said honestly. “I very much doubt that I ever could have achieved my successes without the resources and finances she has provided me. It would be simply uncouth for me to walk away and leave her empty-handed, so I decided to apply my skills one last time, for her benefit.” He smiled at Lancel. “I wish to leave Cersei with one last example of my research – an example that she could demonstrate to the great lords of this realm, so she might still convince them of the possibilities.”

Lancel’s eyes were bulging, while Qyburn tottered around towards a plate of knives, scalpels and metal tools. “If Queen Cersei does manage to recover, despite her… difficulties, then I will be more than happy to return to her service,” Qyburn said, with a smile. “But, otherwise, I intend to be a very long distance away from King’s Landing. I hope you will be able to pass that message on for me, Lancel.”

After the grey sheep had taken away his chain, he had still been a young man, full of vigour and curiosity, so he had travelled the world, studying and researching all by himself. As he became older, his joints had started to ache, and he became less capable physically on his own. He realised that he needed the protection and funding that others could give him. Qyburn had worked for many tyrants, mad men and fanatics – he did not care about their ambitions or the services they required from him, so long as they funded his work and gave him the freedom that he required. Qyburn happily rode with Vargo Hoat and the Brave Companions, because they had been willing to indulge the requirements of his research, where more squeamish men would not.

But still, whenever one of his employers fell, Qyburn simply moved onto the next. It was only practical, after all.

Qyburn had spent over half his life in Essos; from working as a scholar to magisters in Myr or as a healer in Qohor, he had travelled half the continent in his pilgrimage, his search for knowledge. And yet he had achieved more in the last year alone than in his other sixty. This last year under Cersei, it had been… revitalising.

Perhaps it was fate that he had achieved his life’s work back in the city he was born. Two years ago, Qyburn had harboured his own reservations when they received the offer from Dorne, but now he was so, so thankful that Brave Companions had agreed to return to Westeros on behalf of House Martell.

Qyburn himself had zero regrets about what he had done for Cersei, but he could understand that others might feel rather more… angry about it.

Qyburn had been right standing next to the queen, as they stood on the balcony of the Red Keep and watched the Great Sept of Baelor burn. They could hear the city screaming even from Aegon’s High Hill. Neither Qyburn nor Cersei had said a word.

As they saw the smoke, Cersei had just nodded, and Qyburn had left with Ser Robert to clear the sparrows outside the gates.

Lancel tried to scream through the gag in his mouth. Qyburn selected his instrument like an artist choosing his brush, slowly picking out a sharpened, fine length of metal.

That was what it is, really, he mused, an art. Qyburn was a man of science – a maester, a scholar – and yet still the actual practice felt more like art. It was an art he had spent decades trying to perfect.

His entire life had been coursed over forty years ago now, back when he had been a naive and ambitious maester studying at the Citadel. He had absorbed everything they had to teach about the healing arts, but the more he learnt, the more aware he became of how very much was still unknown. He had so many questions, that none of them could answer. It had been frustrating – the steps they refused to take, the questions they refused to ask. He must have dissected half the cadavers in the Citadel in pursuit of answers, but it hadn’t been enough. The first time he had truly realised what was lacking had been when he opened up a living body, a sickly man – a man on death’s door – and Qyburn realised the one organ that no disciple of the anatomy could find.

The soul. No matter how deep Qyburn cut, he had not been able to find the soul.

All of his life had been coursed around that single purpose. He had spent decades, all across Essos and beyond, trying to find a means of cutting deeper. It had become something of an obsession, truth be told; forty years and hundreds, thousands, of bodies – all just to uncover the key to it all.

I am but a blind man shambling around in the dark, Qyburn mused, trying to sketch out the shape of something far bigger than myself. How could a man understand something he could neither see, feel nor touch?
As a young man, he had been bold and fuelled by passion. As he grew older and greyer, his thoughts started to turn towards his legacy. His life’s work. As... undesirable as some of the necessities may have been, history would remember his work as one of the greatest advancements of the modern age. His discovery could save the world.

The tool he held was a long and straight length of iron, about two feet long, specially forged by a skilled blacksmith on the queen’s gold. Very light, very delicate, but strong. The edge was not sharp, but the point was. It was a needle, long and fine, engraven with a runnel for the capture of fluids.

At the sight of the metal, Lancel’s disorientated eyes focused and bulged. His limbs started to thrash, struggling against the restraints. He was gasping with muffled shouts, trying to scream through the gag in his mouth.

Qyburn paused. “Are you trying to speak, ser?” It didn’t really matter, but Qyburn removed the gag. He was simply curious as to what words Lancel had to say in this situation. The man sputtered. “What do you wish to say, ser?"

The poor boy was as white as a ghost, his eyes bulging so hard they could burst. “The Seven save me…” Lancel gasped, trembling. “In the name of the Father Above…”

“The Seven?” Qyburn chuckled. “Oh no, my dear boy.” Your soul is not going to the Seven.

Qyburn shoved the gag back in, wrestling with it as the young man squirmed. Then, Qyburn picked up the needle, and gingerly placed it over Qyburn’s stomach with surgical care. There was a special spot – to push the upwards the metal through the bowels straight into the liver.

Blood swelled, and Lancel thrashed. The ‘Seven’, Qyburn thought as he hummed. Honestly!

What a useless, primitive concept. Faith was the antithesis to understanding, to progress. Qyburn had absolutely zero regrets about blowing that temple up.

Qyburn moved with experienced care, every movement slow and purposeful. He went to pick up another needle. “The first stages are uncomfortable,” Qyburn admitted. “I must drain your body of its blood, bile, phlegm and fluid.”

He was already pressing in another metal spike, this time into the lungs. It took care, made all the more difficult by Lancel’s unfortunate spasms. He inserted another needle into Lancel’s back, near the vertebrate, and suddenly the convulsions stopped. Lancel’s pupils were still twitching, but his body was left paralyzed, unable to move. Pale ooze leaked from the boy’s spine.

The secret to success, Qyburn had found, was to keep the patient alive for as long as physically possible. A period of fermentation added to the quality of the final result. With enough precision and care, Qyburn had found that a living body could last weeks despite the harvesting of the humours, the needles in the essential organs.

There is no time to spend weeks with this one, however, Qyburn thought with a sigh. This time, he would have to push the task somewhat. Qyburn selected more needles, more blades.

Qyburn had larger and hollow needles for major arteries, as well as very, very fine needles that would pierce the cranium. All of Lancel’s fluids – his life – were dribbling down towards the jars on the floor. The sight was... well, it felt magical, actually. Somehow, all of those fluids mixed together to keep a body running – the complexity was wondrous. Every man is just a sack of water, really, Qyburn mused, the blood and bile and ooze is the key to it all.
Qyburn brought ceramic jugs to help collect the fluids as they dribbled down, but he stood ready to block the flows should Lancel lose too much. It was all a balancing act; he wanted Lancel to be on the brink of death, but not quite falling over the precipice.

“Your body is paralyzed,” Qyburn said, his voice a whisper, “and I know it must hurt, but your mind can still comprehend. Please, try to comprehend.”

Lancel’s eyes twitched, but his throat could only gasp. There were seventeen metal spikes, stabbed through his body, neck and skull at different angles. The fluids all leaked down the metal needles, and into the ceramic pots. Tubes of pig intestines ensured that waste was minimised.

Qyburn picked out another needle – finer than all the others. “I’m sorry,” Qyburn said with a sigh. “I leave this one for last, it is the most unpleasant.”

Very carefully, Qyburn brought the metal spike up towards Lancel’s face, and slowly placed it into the eyeball. It took a small hammer, a fair amount force, and extreme precision to push the needle upwards, straight into the frontal lobe of the brain. Lancel made gagging noise, blood sputtering down his cheek.

When he extracted enough, the fluids would be mixed together with Qyburn’s formula – transmuted and processed using hard metals, sulphur and salt. The blood had to be boiled, the spinal fluid had to be concentrated. Afterwards, it would be pressed back into Lancel’s body. After it was given time to settle in his bloodstream, more fluid would be extracted again. Ideally, the subject would be given food and water, kept alive for as long as possible, that the body might continue producing its humours. Regrettably, he could not afford that luxury in this case. With sufficient care, Qyburn could keep the process happening for a long time – constantly recycling and drawing out more and more of the person’s being. Draining them, piece by piece.

The flesh would incubate the substance, it would absorb the properties of the body, ready to be harvested and applied.

Eventually, after enough refinement, it would come together form a black ooze; a miraculous substance Qyburn called the Essence.

That was the secret that Qyburn had discovered years ago – that the soul was in the flesh. A person’s soul was attached to their body, the soul was dispersed through the blood, the bones, the muscle tissue and the brain tissue. There was no secret ephemeral force, there was only blood and bone. The secret to harvesting the soul was simply a matter of draining the body in the right way.

Lancel Lannister would have screamed, but he couldn’t with a needle in his throat. There was no practical reason for that one, but Qyburn simply preferred the quiet. The boy’s face was contorted in pain, unable to move, all the while his skin turned as pale as milk.

Qyburn patted Lancel on the shoulder sympathetically, and then placed a funnel into his mouth, and poured a special mixture down his throat.

There was power in the Essence. A concentrated and impregnated distillate of the humours. Something of the subject’s soul – their strength, their characteristics, their pain – would be absorbed into the black gloop. The Essence was life itself, the primal building block. The fuel of being.

“This is the first phase,” Qyburn soothed. “I know it hurts, but you just have to hold on. I promise – in the second, you won’t feel a thing.”
Qyburn left, to go boil himself a pot of tea. Time was limited; Qyburn had his secret escape tunnel already planned, already had set aside a pack filled with currency and reagents, and his research notes and materials. Nevertheless, he could only guess how long it would take the forces in the city to break through the Red Keep. King’s Landing had been suffering several dozen riots all at once, last he checked the windows.

Queen Cersei had refused to submit herself to trial, and the Faith Militant refused to yield. The only way the queen could retake control of the situation was if the Faith Militant and the High Septon were removed from the equation.

Cersei still had great influence among the Wisdoms of the Alchemists’ Guild, and Lord Hallyne had been all too happy to resume their efforts on the queen’s orders. Qyburn himself had inspected the alchemist’s formulas and the processes they used to develop their substance, and he found himself pleasantly impressed. At the Citadel, they derided the pyromancers and their practices, and yet what Qyburn saw was far more effective than the maesters knew. Qyburn had actually copied many of their secrets, and he later applied the same techniques to help develop his Essence.

Wildfire was capable of destroying the Great Sept, no doubt, but the difficulty had simply been how to apply it—how to move such large quantities of the substance into position? Qyburn had heard that Aerys had spent months positioning caches of wildfire throughout the city in underground cellars, but Cersei simply didn’t have that sort of time or freedom of movement. In any case, all of the caches that Aerys had left behind had already been recovered by the alchemists.

No, the only way to move sufficient quantities of wildfire into the Great Sept was if there were men to carry it. They required many large barrels of the substance to be carried through the several thousand Faith Militant and up Visenya’s Hill, to burn the Most Devout and the High Septon. It had to be quick; every enemy of Cersei’s would be gathered together for her trial.

Of course, no sellsword in the world would be willing to walk into certain doom with a cask of wildfire on his back, so Cersei had needed another breed of soldier. The queen needed a soldier without fear, without restraint, that could achieve the impossible. Qyburn had supplied. They had both excelled at their tasks.

The Alchemists’ Guild had developed the explosive, and it was left to Qyburn to develop the delivery mechanism.

It had surprised Qyburn how similar the alchemist’s practices were to his own. Where he worked with flesh, the alchemists worked with oils and pitches, which the alchemists theorised to be a distillate of ancient life. Qyburn had, out of curiosity, started mixing in wildfire along with his Essence, and it had produced fairly tremendous results. His first creations had been fairly frail things, but later he had created ones of remarkable durability. He created soldiers with burning blood.

He had resided in the city for but a single year, and yet the processes involved had become more effective, more powerful over that year, for reasons Qyburn couldn’t yet explain. Formulas and ‘spells’ that the Alchemists’ Guild had long dismissed were starting to become effective again, while Qyburn’s own art had one breakthrough after another. Everything had only recently become stronger, much more efficient.

Cersei had ordered one hundred of Qyburn’s creations, but Qyburn had overachieved.

He had managed to produce two hundred and twenty-six. Over two hundred unkillable, unfeeling and relentless constructs.
The Faith Militant never stood a chance.

Lancel’s blood was seeping out his body, his gentle spasms fading. “Are you still conscious, Lancel?” Qyburn asked. “I want you to be aware. I have never been certain how much intelligence can be retained after the transition, but I have high hopes for you. Look down Lancel, if you can – that is your body and soul, dripping out into these pots. That is your everything.

“I will not lie to you, ser. You are going to die,” Qyburn whispered sympathetically. “But it will not be for long. I will perform my process – I shall transmute your substances and your fluids into something eternal, and I will give you your life back. I will place your Essence back into your body, and it will reanimate your flesh.”

There wasn’t even a twitch. “You will be freshly dead, your body hardly decayed,” Qyburn continued. “Ser Robert Strong here was cobbled together from many damaged sources, he’s hardly the most… whole person. The other creations were formed in this workshop were also developed to be fragmented – I did not need intelligence for their purpose. They were designed to be crude things.

“But you… you will be nearly whole, I doubt I’ll need to supplement your body with any additional pieces at all,” Qyburn explained gently. “And so corruption will be minimised. I do hope that you that you will be able to retain your thought, your memories, your personality, even. I hope that, afterwards, you will still have the presence of mind to describe what it felt like.”

Qyburn was especially curious on that front; he was an insatiably curious man, but he had always wanted to know – what did it feel like to die?

Qyburn had made studious notes on all his experiments and studies. Occasionally, his creations would retain bits and pieces from their past lives. Some words or phrases, the infrequent twitch or mannerism – it was like they held echoes of the person or persons they once were. Sometimes, his creations would constantly repeat the last words that they said on death, reliving their over and over again.

Ser Robert had mostly certainly inherited the same violence and love of brutality from Ser Gregor, but the lack of intelligence also made him very compliant.

The simple soldiers were useful enough, but the true goal for Qyburn was defeat death itself. To resurrect a person entirely, their mind intact.

Through the Essence, Qyburn could achieve miracles. Dead flesh could be reanimated, even a tattered, stitched-together corpse could be given life again. He could give life to the dead. The bodies would move, possessed by the souls of those from which the Essence were extracted from.

Thanks to Cersei’s patronage, Qyburn had been able to drain dozens – hundreds – of bodies for their Essence. It had been trial by error in many ways, science by research. Qyburn preferred women – pregnant, if possible – for his work. Their parts produced an especially potent Essence. The serving ladies of the castle had proved useful and manageable, but more had been needed still.

The process had become more efficient over time. At first, it had required the draining of ten bodies for a single reanimation. There was little hope of the retention of the personality or mind in such cases. Ten bodies dead, for one resurrection – it was wasteful. But, still, over time, with practice and greater efficiency, he had narrowed it down to eight, six, three…

He theorised that, in time, as he came closer to reviving a body with only the Essence extracted from itself, he would be able to minimise the fragmentation and preserve the mind. His formulas were constantly being re-evaluated and improved, especially as extracted and applied the insights that the Alchemists’ Guild offered him.

In the second stage, after their bodies finally died and every drip of Essence was extracted, their bodies were put to use. Their corpses stitched back together, and their bodies were prepared for reanimation.

In the third stage, when the Essence was returned to them, the dead and maimed flesh would be given life again. Even stitched-together and rotten skin would move again when the black ooze was pumped back through their veins. It was almost instinctive; like the flesh itself knew how to use the Essence. Or perhaps it was the other way around. He had yet to form a hypothesis.

The creatures Qyburn had produced in the dungeons for Cersei were tormented and basic things, each one possessed by the tortured souls of dozens of scattered people. They had been primitive creatures, incapable of rational thought, and very often violent and yet they still proved… simple enough to be instructable. Perhaps it was the one thing that every human shared; the desire to be commanded, to follow orders.

That, and the desire to kill. Every one of his constructs had reverted to primal, animalistic aggression.

But Qyburn was their master, their maker. They followed his will; perhaps his creations imprinted upon Qyburn in the same way new-born babe imprinted on their mother, the instinctive bond between progeny and creator. Or perhaps something of the residue of his own soul coloured his creations, a product of the hands-on process of animation. My creations had always belonged to me, he thought with a flash of pride, not to Cersei.

Qyburn picked up another knife, slowly rehearsing what he had to do to prepare Lancel for the second stage. The heart will have to be removed, soaked in Essence, and then reinserted, he decided. I need surgical cuts to the bowels to squeeze the Essence into the bloodstream, and certain organs must be removed. Much of the spine and gut will be damaged after the draining, they need to be scoured. Qyburn sighed. There had been so many breakthroughs, and yet his process still felt so… crude. These were still the early days of his research, all told.

“There have been others who developed similar practices to mine, you know?” Qyburn said conversationally. “Variations in places, yet similar ingredients, similar processes. I am not the first to walk down this path. The Alchemists’ Guild still possesses a formula for ‘eternal life’,” he scoffed, “that they thought defunct. I strongly suspect the Bloodstone Emperor applied very similar methodology to mine, and to say nothing of the blood mages in Gogossos. The Ancient Valyrians dabbled from time to time. I’ve traced many of the older practices to originate from Asshai, but in truth, I suspect that Stygai was the source of it all.

“Different applications, different usages, yes… but at the core…” Qyburn sighed. “They were all men who tried to walk in the same field. To defeat the Stranger.”

There was a pause. “I travelled the world in my youth, once. From Oldtown to Qarth, even to the edge of the Basilisk Isles. Just to try to make sense of all those lost histories, the legends and the curses,” Qyburn explained. “But it is that not the way of things? A man grasps for greatness, and all others try to pull them down. Revolutionaries discover breakthroughs, yet superstition and fear rules instead. History is written, and then foolish men try to unwrite it.

“Yet I am not a ‘magician’, Lancel. Those fools that rode with Vargo named me a necromancer, yet I scoffed at the term.” Qyburn shook his head. “No, I am a man of the sciences. I strive not only to perform miracles, but to explain them.”
There was no reply. Qyburn did not need one. He had grown used to talking and humming and singing to himself, in the darkest levels of the dungeons surrounded by his work.

Ten thousand years ago, Qyburn mused, Westeros was changed forever when the Rhoynish brought the art of metal forging and smithing to the Andals. A new technology that redefined everything. Qyburn aimed for something similar; a new revolution, as he reinvented the art of smithing flesh.

Fleshsmith. That was a term that the blood mages of Gogossos had used, back when they filled Old Valyrian prison colonies with mutilated half-human creations. Qyburn intended on reinventing the term.

Of all the things they’ve called these practices… yes, I like ‘smith’ the best. A workman who extracted and refined natural resources, who reshaped them into something new, something useful. A man who turned the elements into tools, a man who laboured to put the world to right, to purpose. A man who smithed metal could transform rocks into steel, into swords, and yet Qyburn could transform corpses into moving bodies, into soldiers. What is that, if not revolutionary?

The superstitious, the unimaginative and fearful – the grey sheep of the world – they would not squash Qyburn’s discovery. Not this time.

Fleshsmith. *Yes, I can work with that."

Tis a new world.

There was nothing but quiet in the dark cells, as Lancel’s blood and fluids dripped into the pots. Qyburn was already preparing his mixture.

“It will not be long now, Lancel,” Qyburn placed his hand on the man’s bloody shoulders, to try and soothe him into his passing. “When your heartbeat stops, your next life will begin. You will become just like Ser Robert here – strong and indestructible. You are among the first of a new form of life, redefining the natural order.”

Ser Robert twitched at the sound of his name. Even in his paralysed agony, Lancel managed to gasp harder, trying to squirm. His eyes were rolling in their sockets, like crazed things. Ser Robert still loomed at the base of the workbench, totally unmoving.

“Robert here?” Qyburn chuckled. “Do not be frightened of the silent knight, ser. He is… loyal.”

Qyburn paused, glancing between Lancel and up at Ser Robert’s faceless white helm. “Ah,” Qyburn said finally. “You know him, do you not? I believe you have a history?”

There was no response. Qyburn smiled softly. “Ser Robert,” he said in a low whisper. “Please remove your helm.”

The knight did so without complaint. Even in the gloom, Qyburn could see the greying necrotic flesh and tinge of green rot against the man’s skin. The knight was bald and hairless, and there was a thick and ugly scar across his neck where the head had been attached.

Still, even despite the scars and the damaged skin, even through all flesh that Qyburn had replaced and patched, the shape of features was still recognisable. Green speckled irises glinted in the dark.

Lancel choked. His pupils dilated, eyes twitching – they were the eyes of a man staring straight at his demons.
They were the eyes of a man who suddenly knew he was in hell. Lancel Lannister couldn’t even scream.

Qyburn only chuckled. “Why did you think I named him ‘Robert’, ser?”

The mutilated head of King Robert Baratheon loomed down at them, the man’s face totally emotionless.

The body of Ser Gregor Clegane, afflicted by the magical poison from the Red Viper’s spear, had been a fantastic test subject to work upon. The manticore venom had proven to be one of the components needed for his Essence; working with Ser Gregor had been a ground-breaking experience. Nevertheless, Queen Cersei had insisted that the Mountain’s head must go to Dorne. Qyburn complied, but he had been left with a headless corpse of a giant that needed a replacement.

Robert Baratheon’s head had been chosen as a matter of both practicality and convenience.

Qyburn had used his position to ransack the crypts of Great Sept for components – surprisingly, the tombs fit for kings had fewer guards than most common graveyards. Perhaps no other graverobber had ever dared to attempt those tombs, so they had never felt the need to secure them.

Gregor Clegane had been a man of incredible stature, most other skulls simply wouldn’t fit on his neck. Qyburn had needed another large man, and there could be no doubt that the former king had been a very big man too.

King Robert had been dead for some three years, but Qyburn found that the very high quality royal ointments and dressings that the silent sisters dressed the king in had done a remarkable job at preventing decay. There had still been a large degree of degradation, of course, but overall the head had been workable enough to use. He had sealed the crypt back up again, and nobody had even noticed that the king’s tomb had been robbed.

Qyburn had constructed Ser Robert to be a warrior. Qyburn had wanted a famed warrior’s head on his creation’s shoulders. King Robert’s skull met all of the requirements.

Plus, there was the symmetry that Qyburn had appreciated. Who could be a better champion for Cersei, than her former husband?

Ser Gregor Clegane’s body may have provided the base, but there were at least a dozen different other corpses that contributed body parts or organs to repair the various damage. Robert Baratheon’s own eyeballs had been rotted out of his skull, so Qyburn replaced them with the eyes of Tywin Lannister – for no other reason than he thought it was funny.

Still, for all that there had been other contributors, it was still very much Ser Gregor’s Essence that remained dominant. It was still the Mountain’s soul that powered Qyburn’s own personal soldier.

Lancel’s spasms were becoming jerkier, more desperate. Qyburn had seen it before; the man was falling over the precipice. Alive one moment, dead the next. “I will see you soon, Ser Lancel,” Qyburn promised. “Give my regards to Cersei. And to the Seven, if you happen to see them too.”

Afterwards, Qyburn went to pick out a knife to cut open the chest, and a crowbar to break through the ribcage. He handled both the tools with practiced ease.

The Seven, Qyburn thought as he chuckled. The gods are dead. The new era will be an age of man.

Still, he couldn’t help but think back to his youth, and the songs that mothers would sing in the orphanage. Qyburn was chuckling under his breath, and he couldn’t get the hymns out of the head.
Slowly, as he worked and hacked and laboured, he started to sing quietly in the dusty air.

“The Father’s face is stern and strong, he sits and judges right from wrong.
He weighs our lives, the short and long,
and loves the little children!

The Mother gives the gift of life, and watches over every wife.
Her gentle smile ends all strife, and she loves her little children!

The Warrior stands before the foe, protecting us where e’er we go.
With sword and shield and spear and bow,
he guards the little children!

The Crone is very wise and old, and sees our fates as they unfold.
She lifts her lamp of shining gold,
to lead the little children!

The Smith, he labours day and night, to put the world of men to right.
With hammer, plough, and fire bright, he builds the little children!”

Qyburn chuckled with the last line, but he wiped the scraps of flesh and gore off his hands and continued.
“The Maiden dances through the sky, she lives in every lover’s sigh.

Her smiles teach the birds to fly, and gives dreams to little children!

The Seven Gods who made us all,
are listening if we should call.

So close your eyes, you shall not fall,
they see you, little children!”

His voice was so, so soft, singing in the musky air. He thought of Cersei, of her dead babes, and the city that was roiling and burning above him. The mobs were likely already at the gates, the bodies slamming to tear the doors off their hinges…

“So close your eyes, you shall not fall,
they see you, little children.”

Chapter End Notes

Well, this chapter marks the one year anniversary of Dragons of Ice and Fire. Plus, I think it's a fairly fitting chapter for Halloween, so there's that. Coming up to the end of the King's Landing arc with the next one.

Thanks to Diablo Snowblind for his help with this one.

The Crone

It was a pleasant evening beneath the shade of the kingswood, in a clearing by the elm trees overlooking the sandy dunes of the coast. A faint chill blew out from the Blackwater, but the sun was bright and warm. They sat around a small pavilion at the edge of the woods, the horses and ponies trotting freely on around the green grass between the wheelhouses, while the Tyrell rose wafted in the wind.

It was hardly the most luxurious place to spend so many weeks, but it was quiet and serene. More comfortable than that bloated keep in King’s Landing, to Olenna’s mind. They sat together around the table, sitting on barrels, eating lemoncakes and sipping juice.

“Where is the cheese?” Olenna demanded to her steward. She couldn’t recall the man’s name, or didn’t care to. “I specifically asked for there to be cheese on the platter.”

“Forgive me, my lady, but our stocks–”

“Should have been restocked the last supply run, if I recall.”

His face was pained. “My lady, the supplies–”

“I am seventy-two years old, son, but I can distinctly remember telling you to order more cheese,” Olenna said sharply. “Now what is your excuse for being deaf?”

The man grimaced. “I shall make inquiries, my lady.”

Across the table Margaery giggled, trying to catch the crumbs falling from her mouth as she laughed. “I swear, the way that they say ‘my lady’…” Olenna mused with a sigh as the servant shuffled away. “I would prefer it if they just addressed me as ‘you bitter old cunt’ – at least that would be more honest.”

“Grandmother!” the girl exclaimed, both laughing and sounding appalled. “It’s quite alright.”

“It’s quite not,” Olenna retorted, picking up a crystal goblet filled with wine. “First it was the crackers, now the cheese. I swear, another week here and I will have to forage berries and beetles. Living in the wilderness.”

The Queen of the Seven Kingdoms raised an embroidered napkin to her mouth, pecking at the platter of pastries. She was so young and delicate; cascading soft brown hair and golden eyes, red lips and bright cheeks. Margaery’s smile was the most beautiful, though; when she laughed she lit up the world.
Olenna felt like a withered old prune sitting across from her granddaughter. All of Margaery’s companions were young, bright and vibrant, while Olenna was a toothless and wrinkled crone, with a hunched back and pain in her hips that ached terribly. They were the future of the realm, while Olenna was a fossil from the past. Camping in the kingswood had been harsh for a woman of her age; the wind could grow something fierce and her mattress was like a wooden board.

And yet, still, there was no place Olenna would rather be than next to her precious little girl.

“I could always bring you food from the capital,” Margaery offered. Behind her, Megga and Elinor Tyrell were giggling as they picked flowers and knitted daisy chains in the grass. Margaery’s ladies-in-waiting were pecking from platters of food, and walking barefoot in the grass.

“Oh yes, wouldn’t that be glorious?” Olenna said, a smirk passing over wrinkled dry lips. “The Queen of the Seven Kingdoms, stealing food from the kitchens to feed her grandmother hiding in the woods. No, my dear, I think not.”

“Please, grandmother, if it’s uncomfortable you not need to linger,” Margaery said gently. “You always truly could return to Highgarden.”

She was a sweet girl. Every single time they had these little feasts, Margaery always showed quiet concern for her old grandmother’s health. “I am not dead yet, my dear.”

“Just do not feel obligated to stay on my behalf.”

“And leave you all alone in that viper’s nest of a city?” Olenna shook her head. “No, I shall eat the berries and beetles before that happens.”

Olenna had been camped by the kingswood for nearly two months now, ever since Tommen’s wedding. The official word was that the Queen of Thorns had returned to Highgarden, but rather her and a small retinue had lingered a few leagues away from the city. They kept away from the roads, hidden in the trees on the countryside. The Queen Regent has us all walking on eggshells, Olenna mused.

Still, needs must. Margaery was a strong young woman, and yet she still needed her grandmother’s advice on occasion. Olenna would not let Cersei steal that away from her so easily.

“Are you sure you are quite alright?” Margaery insisted. “I do worry for you, out here by yourself.”

Olenna snorted. “My child, I assure you I am alright. Left and Right keep me well secure, and it’s hardly as if I’m leagues away from civilisation.”

Left and Right were Olenna’s two personal guards – big burly twins called Erryk and Arryk, yet Olenna could never differentiate them. She had referred to them interchangeably as Left and Right for years. They were nice enough chaps; both standing over seven foot tall, broad-shouldered, strong-jawed and with thick moustaches. They were both very capable, but had a limited sense of humour.

Olenna was just a defenceless old lady, after all. She liked to have men like Left and Right around to keep her company. It was a fairly small camp, but she had fifty guardsmen and half as many stewards surrounding her, with six wheelhouses overloaded with supplies and cages filled with ravens. All of them trusted Tyrell men, very loyal and discreet.

Any fool could have seen that Cersei had been chalking with Olenna’s presence, while Olenna had wanted a quick wedding for her granddaughter. It could have been troublesome if Cersei had delayed the wedding indefinitely, but all it took was a few barbed comments and then there was a ceremony happening for no other reason than to rid King’s Landing of Olenna Tyrell. Once Tommen and Margaery were husband and wife, king and queen, Olenna had quite happily backed off.

Still, Olenna had too much invested in the capital to truly leave Margaery alone. It was a better solution to stay close, and stay discreet. Margaery and her escort quite regularly took long horse rides out of the city, and she visited her grandmother at least twice a week without anybody but her most trusted companions knowing.

“I swear,” Margaery said with a sigh. “I treat Cersei with nothing but kindness, and she still glares at me like she wants to claw my eyes out.” She reached for another lemoncake. “I have been naught but polite–”

“Careful with those cakes, dear,” Olenna warned. “Do think of your hips.”

“Oh hush.” Margaery rolled her eyes, and picked up the sweet. “After the week I’ve had, I think I need these cakes.”

“Cersei is a prickly woman. I feel sorry for her sometimes; she was raised to lust for power, but she doesn’t know what to do with it when she has it. Like a housecat trying drag the body of a boar; it’s not going anywhere, but it is still for the best not to provoke her.” Olenna sighed wearily. “Oh, and Ser Osney Kettleblack is going to try to fuck you.”

“He is? How quaint.” Margaery laughed. “I’m sure that will go well for him.”

“Cersei has started scheming again,” Olenna explained. “We knew she would. She wants to shame you, she has ordered her little knight to get into your smallclothes. Ser Osney will want to take your dress off, and then a bunch of great lords might ‘happen’ to find you two in the act. Cersei means to see you charged with infidelity.”

“She means to accuse me of infidelity?” Margaery asked in quiet disbelief.

“Yes,” Olenna agreed dryly. “And to think I thought Cersei had no sense of humour.”

Margaery leant backwards on her seat, folding her arms. “Well, I assure you that Ser Osney will be disappointed.”

Olnna shook her head. “Don’t disappoint him too quickly.”

“Grandmother!”

“Humour the poor boy, Margaery,” Olenna insisted. “Flirt with him a bit, let him think he has a chance. Remember, he’s not very bright, the poor soul. Let us draw out Cersei’s scheme for a while, give us a bit of time.”

The girl scoffed unhappily, but she didn’t protest. “I take it this comes from Lady Taena?”

“Oh of course.” Olenna nodded. Lord Orton Merryweather was loyal to Tyrell over Lannister, but it was Lady Taena that truly had her eyes on the future. Taena of Myr was ambitious, intelligent and sultry – all traits that Olenna had learnt to appreciate, respect, and fear.

Every move that Cersei made, Taena dutifully passed back to Olenna. While Taena flirted her way into the queen’s trust, Olenna could read Cersei like a book.

Olenna knew that Lady Taena was also selling information to Doran Martell in Sunspear, but Olenna allowed that so long as she was informed exactly what was being passed. Like any good prostitute, Lady Taena Merryweather was looking for more customers, more protection. Olenna didn’t judge.

Cersei believed that she had weeded out all the catspaws, but that was laughably untrue. On her small council alone, the master of laws Orton Merryweather belonged to House Tyrell, and the Hand of the King Harys Swyft answered to whoever ordered him in a firm enough voice. Even the master of coin – old, sickly Gyles Rosby – harboured his own disloyalties against the crown, while Olenna strongly suspected that the master of ships, Aurane Waters, was Littlefinger's creature.

The only truly concerning one of the bunch was ‘Lord’ Qyburn – the gods alone knew who Cersei’s spymaster answered to. Olenna suspected the Spider, but that may have been just an instinctive response.

Between myself, Littlefinger, and Doran Martell, Olenna mused. I’m not sure if there’s anybody in King’s Landing who doesn’t have their fingers in at least one pot. Still, that was simply the way the game was played.

“Let’s allow Cersei’s scheme to go forward, we don’t want squash it too quickly,” Olenna said firmly. “String Ser Osney along for now. You are playing your part beautifully, my dear.”

“It is becoming tiring,” Margaery admitted with a quiet grimace.

“I know.” Margaery was a saint for lasting this long; if Olenna had been the one alone with Cersei, the bitch likely would have been slapped already. “And yet so long as Cersei is on the throne and your father is sitting outside Storm’s End, there is not much we can do. Truly, is there any man in all the realm who has more experience sitting outside a castle?”

“My pa is doing his best,” Margaery said defensively.

“I know, dear,” Olenna waved her hand dismissively. “Yet it is not Mace that I’m worried about. Garlan is strong, Willas has his wits to him, yet I fear it is Loras who is in the most danger. If Cersei cannot target you, she will want to remove your brother from the picture, and a knight of the Kingsguard cannot disobey the Queen Regent’s orders.” Her nails tapped against the wooden table. “I knew that him taking that white cloak was a bloody fool’s thing to do.”

_Honestly, Olenna thought with a sigh, it feels like half my life has been spent trying to clean up after my family._ Her days were spent trying to look after the fools.

Margaery stiffened. “Cersei wouldn’t dare hurt Loras.”

“Those are dangerous words. Never assume that.” She shook her head. “No, we need to be safe. We need to find a way to take Loras out of commission, safely and without suspicion. An injury, perhaps.”

“Grandmother, you can’t–”

“It doesn’t have to be his injury,” Olenna said sharply. Some battle wound that could knock Loras out of Cersei’s view, perhaps? There were those that would be willing to play along with it. She would have to make arrangements. “I just want to make sure that Cersei thinks she has us where she wants us.”

Margaery opened her mouth to protest, and then slumped. Clever girl. “I do not understand why Cersei is so against us,” Margaery said with a sigh. “Is it truly just avarice?”
“Avarice, and a good dollop of paranoia,” Olenna said with scoff. “Ever since her brother escaped the Red Keep’s dungeons, the whole realm has been watching her spiralling. Her father was the one who always curbed her excesses, and Tywin is dead.” I never thought I would actually miss Tywin Lannister. “Did you know that they found golden coins of the old Kingdom of Reach underneath the gaoler’s pillow?”

“Truly?” Margaery frowned. “I mean… why?”

“Because I imagine that a signed confession with the Tyrell seal would have been a tad too suspicious,” Olenna said humourlessly. “No, somebody wants to frame House Tyrell for her brother’s crimes, and Cersei is all too eager to believe it.”

Even after all the preparations I took, the deals I made, Olenna thought bitterly, it comes back to Joffrey’s murder. Even in the most roundabout way possible, House Tyrell still ended up suffering Cersei’s ire for that deed. Framing Tyrion for the strangler in Joffrey’s cup had been so very convenient at the time, but it still came back to bite her.

Olenna mused on it for a while, and a thought came to her. “But perhaps we should encourage that idea. Let us spread the rumour that I keep a chest of old Gardener King gold coins in my possession, that I use to short-change tradesmen.”

“But you don’t.” Margaery frowned.

“Of course I don’t. I’m not a cunt. And what sort of fool would pay easily traceable, ancient coins for a murder?” Olenna could have laughed, but the situation really wasn’t funny. “Yet… nevertheless… Cersei is going to blame us no matter what we do or don’t do, so we might as well roll with it. Go on; let her think that this ridiculously incriminating evidence truly does lead back to me.”

“Grandmother,” Margaery bit her lip in worry. “We should not provoke Cersei. She is already suspicious enough as is.”

“My dear, it’s impossible not to provoke Cersei. Your very marriage to her son is provocation enough,” Olenna replied dryly. “But Cersei insists on playing this game, so very well, let us play.”

There was one lemoncake left on the platter. Olenna scratched her chin, listening to the wind rustling the trees, and the sound of the girls’ merriment ringing over the clearing. It was a soft, gentle moment. How many decades has it been since I’ve ran around barefoot in the grass? Olenna mused. Gods, to be young again…

“I know Cersei’s type,” Olenna continued after a pause. “She is incompetent so long as she’s comfortably in power, but she’s fire and fury while she’s fighting for power.” Much like her deceased husband, actually. “We want her to believe that she’s winning right up until the moment she loses.”

The War of Five Kings had been bloody and violent, but it looked like the War of Three Queens would be fought in the shadows.

The Faith Militant was growing in power, and King’s Landing was transforming into a pit of knives. Olenna knew that Littlefinger was scheming, Prince Doran Martell was shifting, and Varys would be weaving his web from whatever rock he had skittered under. The reports that Olenna had received from the east and north were causing her worry as well.

And yet nothing could be done until the power struggle around the capital was resolved. Cersei would try to shame Margaery; to paint the young queen as a slut and an adulteress, to strip the crown away from her. Cersei was simple-minded in many ways; power and shame was the only way Cersei could think. So long as Olenna knew that, she could make sure that Cersei’s own trap would backfire.

Olenna looked at her granddaughter – her beautiful, sweet and intelligent granddaughter. Margaery was kind and good-hearted, strong and sharp. She would make a good queen, a better queen than Cersei ever could be. Even as a little girl, Margaery had learnt everything Olenna had to teach and more. Margaery had been born to be queen.

The only thing standing in Margaery’s way was one spiteful stepmother.

“She needs to think she’s in control. So long as Cersei is feeling confident then I’m not too concerned,” Olenna said softly.

“What concerns me, my dear, is what Cersei might do when she’s about to lose.”

They spent the whole day taking under the shade of the elm trees, taking about the news in the capital and discussing rumours and gossip. By the time dusk started to creep over the trees, the air was chilly but Margaery insisted on staying up until the last possible moment. Margaery hugged her grandmother tightly, and promised to return by the end of the week.

She never did.

The news of Stannis Baratheon’s return to Dragonstone made it difficult for Queen Margaery to leave the city after that. The alert increased, their movements were restricted. For a long time, Olenna was left stewing in her camp in the kingswood, quietly monitoring the situation in the capital.

Somehow, from that pleasant day under the elm trees, from those quiet words and playful laughter, everything turned sour.

…”

“My daughter!” Lord Mace Tyrell boomed. Her son was red in the face, trying to puff himself up with every gulp of air. Like so many men, Mace had grown to believe that louder equals stronger. “Where is my daughter, ser?”

Ser Mark Mullendore’s face was pale. He was a young man, with chiselled cheeks and a jaw that could have been handsome, if not for his face that was gaunt with fear. “The Red Keep was stormed early morn, my lord,” Ser Mark replied, his voice a fearful mumble. “They forced all Reach guardsmen and half the Lannister guardsmen to leave…”

Ser Mark was missing half of his left arm at the elbow – a cripple from an old wound. Still, Ser Mark had been the only man from the Tyrell household to escape the sack of the Red Keep. They had received the news patchily, all word coming from the city had been frantic and strained.

Olenna stood in the corner of the tent, scowling as she rested upon her cane. If looks could kill, Ser Mark Mullendore would be incinerated.

“Leave?” Mace shouted, pacing and stomping. “Leave?? You surrendered Queen Margaery?”
“We did not! The men tried to fight, but they… they surrounded us…”

They slaughtered the Tyrell guards and scoured the keep clean, taking hostages of the highborn, Olenna thought numbly. The exact same thing that Cersei had done to Stark, she did again to Tyrell. Olenna was trembling, gnarly fingers tightening around her cane.

Ser Mark’s voice was a whimper. The pavilion was dark and muddy, rain was splashing down outside and the whole field had been trampled in slush by thousands of boots and hooves. The camp had only been very hastily established, and the mud was so thick that Olenna’s bodyguards had to carry her through the slush. Both Left and Right stood by her side, cautiously trying to keep Olenna away from the rising chaos.

She was the only woman in the tent, her silk dress and shawl splattered with mud. All the men were wearing armour. Her son’s breastplate was squeezed so tightly over his gut that Mace Tyrell looked like a grape ready to burst.

Ser Mark Mullendore was left facing the great lords of the Reach; staring up at the furious faces of Lord Mace Tyrell, Lord Randyll Tarly, Lord Mathis Rowan, Ser Desmond Redwyne, Lord Arthur Ambrose, Lord Jowan Appleton, Lord Lorent Caswell, Ser Roger Bulwer, Lord Alester Crane, and Lord Ivor Vyrwel. Some of the most powerful men in all the Reach were gathered in the room, and they were seething with fury.

“How many were there?” Lord Tyrell bellowed. “How many?”

“I could not count… it was so quick, they stormed…” Ser Mark gulped. “At least five hundred.”

There were more still rushing into tent. Ser Bryan Graceford and Ser Jon Fossoway pushed their way through, more voices echoing in the din. “What happened?” Ser Bryan demanded. “Was it the queen?”

“It was,” Ser Desmond Redwyne muttered darkly, while others were still demanding answer of Ser Mark Mullendore. Voices were talking over each other, each demanding answers in angry voices. “How many escaped?”, the chorus of cries chirped, “Who was it?”, “What of my daughter, my sons?” …

“What of Ser Wythers?” Mace shouted, louder than the others. “What of Ser Willam Wythers?”

“Ser Willam fought valiantly, my lord.” Ser Mark was quivering, Olenna noticed. “The captain was standing side by side with Ser Loras, trying to hold them off at the Maidenvault. They were fighting, right up until that… that monster of a man… the giant in white armour… it came and it just… just…”

The faces staring down at him looked disgusted, Ser Mark trembling like a craven. “The other guests,” Ser Desmond Redwyne demanded. He had two cousins in the Red Keep, the twin sons of his liege lord. “What of the other guests?”

The man gulped. “They locked the doors, my lord, and trapped the guests in their rooms. By orders of the Queen Regent.”

The room was stirring. How many highborn daughters, sons and retainers had been in the Red Keep? Olenna couldn’t even count them all. Nearly everyone in the tent had family in the capital, there were so many sons and daughters working serving as retainers or attendants. Damn you, Cersei.

Mace was beetroot red. “This is an act of war!”
“Ser Kevan is coming to the city with all haste–” Lord Mattis Rowan reported.

“On whose side?” Lord Arthur Ambrose demanded. “House Lannister has betrayed us!”

“This craven,“ Lord Randyll Tarly said lowly, speaking up for the first time. The Lord of Horn Hill’s voice was dark and quiet as he looked down upon Ser Mark. He was clad in full battle armour, his steel dark and worn. “This cripple must be executed. He abandoned his sworn duty, and he ran.”

Ser Mark turned so white it was like his blood froze. “I did not,” he said, gasping. “I would never… I ran to warn you, to bring ai–!”

Ser Desmond had to place his hand to calm the lord down, while Ser Mark was dragged kicking and wailing and pissing through the mud. Olenna didn’t react. She just stood in the corner glowering.

Damn you Cersei. How could she even…?

No, that was a fool’s question. How could I not see it coming?

Cersei had been falling towards the cliff’s edge ever since the news of Tyrion Lannister’s return had arrived. Olenna had known Cersei had been crazed, but she never expected her to be so desperate. Not so quickly.

The deaths of Lady Taena and Orton Merryweather had caught them all off-guard. Olenna had lost her spy in the queen’s trust before any of Olenna’s plans could come to fruition. There had been no warning, nothing Olenna could prepare for. Cersei had lashed out with all the might she still had.

“Do we have the forces to take the Red Keep?” Mace asked finally, taking deep breaths, looking to Lord Tarly.

“Not yet,” Lord Tarly replied in a low and calm voice. “But we will have within a week. Our men are moving up the kingsroad as we speak.”

Mace Tyrell and his army had abandoned the siege of Storm’s End as soon as the news from King’s Landing reached him. The cavalry rode ahead at all haste while the bulk of their forces were still following.

Lord Tarly and his host from Maidenpool had been waiting outside the gates when Mace’s army arrived, and he met Lady Olenna by the King’s Gate. Olenna had been the closest, the first to the gates, but she hadn’t the men to do anything. There had been nothing Olenna could do but wait.

The Tyrell army was amassing in the tourney grounds outside the city. Nobody knew who they’d be fighting against, but the mood was grim.

The city was in a frenzy, there were mobs in the streets. The Faith Militant had seized the roads and declared the city under martial law.

An assassination attempt, against the High Sparrow himself. Cersei, you fool.

“Lord Redwyne is returning as well,” Lord Rowan reported. “His fleet was through the Stepstones, but the ravens caught up with him. Our ships are turning around, coming back to the city.”
“The ships of Royal Fleet have deserted,” said Ser Desmond Redwyne. “I hear that the bastard – Aurane Waters – has stolen the crown’s vessels.” His voice was foul. “Along with several of our own.”

“Aurane Waters could be going to fetch reinforcements, my lord,” Lord Ambrose warned. “Cersei must be planning to bring her might against ours.”

“We have the forces to crush the lion, my lord.” Lord Tarly had a low, hard voice like iron. “This is an act of war. We will destroy House Lannister for this.”

“Ser Daven is mustering their forces in the riverlands,” Ser Jon Fossoway reminded. “And Ser Kevan is riding back from the west. If they must, how many men might there be?”

Lord Tarly shook his head. “Impossible to say.” He paused. “But the lion is already broken, and Cersei Lannister breached the laws of hospitality. No realm will stand for this.”

“We could storm the keep,” Lord Lorent Caswell said firmly. “Say the word, and we will break down the gates and force her to answer for it.”

“And how will that safeguard the Queen Margaery’s life, my lord?” the Queen of Thorns said lowly, speaking up for the first time. Her voice was as low as a whisper. “How will that keep our families safe?”

The room hesitated, nobody meeting her gaze. Why are men so quick to attack, Olenna thought, but so slow to think?

“The city is only being fed from our grain,” Lord Ambrose said finally. “It is by our coin, our trade, our men that King’s Landing has survived. We need only stop our caravans and this city starves.”

Fools. “You have not answered the question,” Olenna challenged, hobbling forward. “How does that return our sons and daughters? Focus on that question.” Her eyes turned around the room. “We have already fought and bled and paid to earn the favour of the city, we have no need to besiege or starve it now. No, to do so would only serve to make us as unpopular as Cersei is.”

They squirmed uncomfortably, but none of them protested her. Lord Tarly was the only who met her eyes, giving a quiet nod. “Lady Olenna is correct,” he said simply. “A battle is very risky, it does not seem prudent while the hostages and the sanctity of the crown linger in the balance. Yet the troubling question remains.”

The air did become quieter with Lord Tarly’s words. Randyll Tarly was a sensible man. Her foolish boy seemed to deflate slightly, Mace’s expression pained.

“We own this city,” voices muttered from the tent, “if Ser Kevan Lannister tries to stop us we could crush him.”

“What of the High Septon?”

“Damn the blasted sparrow, he has no right to meddle in our affairs…”

“Have you been in the city? The smallfolk are marching through the streets in droves. Thousands of peasants with pitchforks, riled up into a fury.”
“It cannot be allowed, cannot be allo–”

The voices were talking over each other, each one shouting for attention. Why do all men think louder equals stronger?

The squabble reached fever pitch. Olenna ignored the words, and tried to measure their eyes. The words were noise, but it was the expressions that she needed to know.

This is pointless. “Let me have the room with my son, lords,” the Queen of Thorns said sharply.

All eyes turned to her surprise. “This is a war council, my la–” Lord Caswell tried to protest.

“And I am but a frail old woman, I fear my heart cannot take such talk,” Lady Olenna interrupted, with a heavy sigh. “Alas, concern for my grandchildren has left me so distraught, I need the comfort of my son. Please, my lords, let me have some time alone with my boy.”

There were a few glances, but none could protest. Olenna shot a motherly look at Mace, ordering him to stay put, while the great lords all trekked outside into the rain.

There was silence. Olenna and Mace were left alone, her son’s face still red and furious. Olenna knelt on her cane, motioning for Left and Right to guard the tent’s door.

“I will not allow Queen Cersei to have her way,” Mace protested finally. “This is an act of war!”

“It is indeed,” Olenna agreed. “But do you believe that escalation will turn out well for any of us? Do not dare the mad woman to do the unthinkable.”

His voice was so pained, so distraught, Olenna wanted to hug him. And yet she couldn’t; he was not her son, not right now – he was the Lord of Highgarden. There could be no coddling today. “It’s my daughter–”

“And it’s my granddaughter,” she said sharply. “Do not think that I’m any less furious about this than you are. But cooler heads, my boy.”

His great beefy hands clenched, but he nodded. His jaw was so clenched that the sags of fat on his face were trembling.

“Let us be sure that we’re fighting the same enemy.” Olenna took a deep breath, forcing her voice to stay steady. “Send your soldiers away, we want only the elite of our troops around us now. We want the veterans and the knights only.” The cooler heads.

“What?” Mace flustered. “I cannot–”

“The rest of the army is needed in Oldtown, to stop the ironborn,” she said sharply. “Do not let Cersei distract us from that. And the act would placate her – try to defuse the situation rather than intensifying it.”

His jaw dropped, trying to protest. “And belay that order to Lord Paxter; his need hasn’t changed, the Redwyne fleet is required desperately in the Arbor. The ironborn must be stopped.” And pray that we’re not too late. The situation in King’s Landing had already severely delayed the Redwyne fleet. Their ships had been trapped them between two different crises on opposites sides of the continent – unable to respond properly to either of them. For all Olenna knew, the Crow’s Eye might be readying to attack any day now.

“Those ships…” Mace shook his head. “If it turns into a siege on the city, if the Golden Company attacks… we will need that fleet here.”

“We might,” Olenna admitted. Damn you Cersei. “But Oldtown needs the fleet now. Your son and daughter may be in the Red Keep, but your other bannermen have sons and daughters in the Reach. Do not lose sight of the greater war.”

The reports from the Arbor and the Redwyne Straits were worrying. Euron Greyjoy had been burning towns and villages by the dozens, and capturing thralls by the thousands. Matters were volatile, and they had to pull together rather than be tattered apart.

This is what Cersei is counting on, Olenna knew. Taking hostages was a stalling tactic – the Queen Regent intended on playing her enemies against each other.

Mace didn’t reply. Olenna was pacing, rocking on her cane as she stepped through the mud. “War is not fought without a purpose. A victory here is pointless if we lose everything else.” She shook her head. “No, we must walk carefully; the lords of the Reach will become unruly if we do not rush to protect their homelands from being ravaged, and then we will become unable to achieve anything. Remember the Florents.” If we stumble now… “First and foremost, we need to keep our bannermen on our side.”

She paused, considering it. “Yet the same applies to House Lannister,” Olenna said finally. “Do not engage the Golden Company. Let them put pressure on the westerland lords for us – Tyrion Lannister is not our priority right now.”

Tyrian Lannister, Olenna cursed silently. How in seven hells did Tyrian Lannister find the coin to purchase the Golden Company?

By all rights, Tyrian Lannister should be dead, and yet he continued to curse her. “The dwarf will be the ideal scapegoat, my lady”, that slimy toad had convinced Olenna, “I will ensure there will be no doubt that Tyron is the poisoner. The dwarf loses his head, and Sansa Stark becomes free to marry your Willas.”

That was a deal that had turned so bitter. More and more, Olenna was coming to regret the arrangement she made.

Mace bit his lip and shook his head, but he sagged. “Aye. Tyrian Lannister is but a dwarf,” he said with a nod. “And this Jon Connington a failure. You are right, they are not the threat; they will fail just as the Golden Company has always failed.”

I would not dismiss them so quickly, my boy, Olenna thought quietly. The news of Tyron Lannister and Jon Connington, returned from the dead and exile, leading the Golden Company… just the very ‘circumstances’ of it set alarm bells ringing in Olenna’s head. Still, now was not the time.

“For now, let us be sure that we’re fighting the same enemy. Let us try a softer approach,” Olenna insisted. “Firstly, we must come to agreement with Ser Kevan and the High Septon. Cersei wants us at each other’s throats, so do not indulge her. The High Septon must be handled with care.”

“Agreement?” Mace looked confused. Distraught and out of his depth. “Ser Kevan will support his niece. If he reinforces her…”

“I don’t think Ser Kevan will. He most certainly won’t if he has to fight us and the Faith Militant.” Ser Kevan was a sensible man, she didn’t think Ser Kevan had anything to do with this desperate scheme of Cersei’s. Ser Kevan was reacting to it as much as everyone else was. Olenna was pacing, back and forth, her cane tapping against mud as she thought. “We must back off from the Red Keep. All of those ultimatums you keep sending to her are not productive.” She shook her head. “No, the time for threats is over.”

“But… but how does this return my son and daughter to me?” Mace protested. “All the peace in the world isn’t going to convince Cersei to release them.”

“The fast solution will not turn out well for. We need the slower one. We rob Cersei of her allies. We undercut her support, but we don’t give her a reason to do anything drastic.” Treat her like a feral cat, and pull the meat away slowly. Olenna paused, deliberating in a calm and slow voice. “She is a mother. She will protect her son. That is the leverage we must exploit.”

When she realised that her gambit had failed, that there was no future for Tommen, would Cersei concede? A sensible woman would, but Olenna had her doubts about the Queen Regent.

The thought of Margaery’s laughing, glowing face and golden eyes flashed before her. Olenna would not allow her darling granddaughter to suffer.

The army of the Reach was the strongest of the Seven Kingdoms, but no one realm could rule six. Reavers to the west, wildlings to the north, and mercenaries to the south, Olenna thought with a quiet curse, how long can our armies last when stretched so thin?

No, this required a different solution.

“And we need a fast ship, a few men that we can trust, and a very large pile of gold,” Olenna decided finally. “We shall send an envoy to Braavos, to the House of Black and White, and we will pay whatever price they require.”

“Wait, ho—”

“Let us hire a Faceless Man to solve this situation for us,” Olenna said, lowering her voice somewhat. “Until then, we do whatever we need to do to keep Cersei Lannister distracted and Margaery alive.”

No other assassin could be so certain. Olenna needed an assassination without risk of failure, without risk to the hostages.

If the Queen Regent died by some shadow in the night, then her sellswords would surrender and Margaery would be unharmed. The Many-Faced God would charge a steep price for the life of a queen. It would be insanely steep, so steep it might ruin them. Still, Cersei would ruin them, and the Faceless Men might be the only solution to the problem she posed.

Cersei, the Bastard King, the Crow’s Eye… Perhaps the House of Black and White could deal with them all. Perhaps we could get a three for one discount.

But it didn’t happen. First it was weeks, then months, as the deadline ticked away and her granddaughter remained locked in the castle. Olenna was left stewing in her tents, writing and rewriting letters, obsessively reading and scheming, but there was naught she could do.

She was an old woman, her back crooked, her hips aching, and her jaw toothless. Olenna could only watch as the city around her deteriorated beyond hope of control.

So much happened. The Bastard King razed the Twins, the High Sparrow made his deadline, and Aegon Targaryen, the ‘Young Dragon’, declared himself back from the dead. The Golden Company was not heading for Casterly Rock as was first believed; it was coming for the Iron Throne. It was a crisis every day, the ripples spreading outwards.

Stannis Baratheon held the Blackwater like a stubborn weed that refused to shift, while the banners of the Targaryen dragon were growing over the stormlands like a cancer.

The news of the ice dragon set the riverlands and the crownlands to panic. Riots were sparking across the city, and the Tyrell army was left trying to juggle multiple enemies on different fronts.

Her carriage tottered away from yet another unproductive meeting with that blasted High Sparrow, down streets that were filled with refugees and peasants still flooding into the city.

“The end of times!” Olenna heard a preacher screaming from a street corner. “The ice dragon heralds the end of times! Pray to the Seven, for the hells have been unleashed!”

More and more were echoing the same cry. As Stannis blockaded the ships and Aegon Targaryen now held the roseroad, King’s Landing was set to starve. Again. Barely over a year after the last siege, and now the city was bracing to suffer a worse one. There would be deaths by the tens of thousands as the cold and the famine clawed in. Winter is coming, those annoying words the Starks loved to repeat.

“We are all facing the end!” the preacher screamed. “Repent! Repent before the end of times!”

Under the regime of the new Faith, the fanatics were ruling the city. Olenna did nothing but stare forward at the blank wall of her carriage, trying to think.

Garlan wrote that they had mustered nearly sixty thousand men in Oldtown, ready to crush Euron Greyjoy’s fleet, but Olenna still spent countless sleepless nights trying to prepare for it. Whispers said that Dorne was supporting Aegon, and that left enemies on every front. Even the greatest army in the world could be spread too thin.

And with an ice dragon, Olenna thought, an ice dragon of all things…!

Her son was walking around looking more frayed than she had ever seen him. There had not been a word concerning either Loras nor Margaery. Olenna’s precious flowers were both trapped in the dungeons of the Red Keep – with thick walls, armed men and an unstable woman keeping them from freedom.

The last envoy she sent to Braavos had promised to build churches to the Many-Faced God itself in both King’s Landing and Oldtown, and yet the Faceless Men still hadn’t responded. They refused to accept the contract, leaving Olenna increasingly unnerved.

Somebody is blocking me, she thought with growing suspicion, but she couldn’t pinpoint the source of her problems. The war, the siege, the stalemate… it all felt manufactured. Olenna had weaved enough schemes to be able to recognise when she was caught in the middle of a larger one. But how to break free, how to escape when I can’t see the hands?

Too many problems were stacking, and Olenna needed to remove them one by one. Time was running out, she needed a solution.

It was dusk, when she met the grim-faced knight in her pavilion. He was a tall and lanky man, with a bald head and a hard jaw. He stood almost as tall as Left and Right, but half the width of their solution. His sigil bore a black tower against red on his shield. He walked before the Queen of Thorns escorted by her two guardsmen on either side.
“My lady,” the knight bowed.

She didn’t bother with courtesy. “You are Ser Humfrey Flowers, correct?”

“I am,” Ser Humfrey replied.

“Bastard son of Gerold Hightower, half-brother to Lord Leyton Hightower, I hear.”

“I am,” the Bastard of the Tower replied coolly.

What is the smallfolk saying? Send a knight to slay a knight, and an archer to slay an archer. With a bastard terrorising the realm, perhaps there was only one choice.

“Good.” Olenna judged his expression; a hard man, of noble birth but subtle disposition. He knew the game, he had the upbringing, but those without the pomp of status tended to be more effective. Olenna quite liked bastards. Mostly. “And I have a task for you, ser. A duty that you must fulfil. You will answer to me and only me regarding it.”

He paused. “And what duty is this?”

No wasted questions. Good man. “You are to go north, to Winterfell.” She held up a letter from her desk, one sealed in pink ink. “Lord Bolton requests aid, and we will oblige him. Discreetly.”

Ser Humfrey Flowers’ lips curled. “The ice dragon.”

“What else?”

“From how I hear it,” Ser Humfrey said cautiously, “House Bolton is facing certain defeat.”

“Perhaps.” Likely. “But the Boltons need not win, they only need to delay,” Olenna said sharply. “We cannot fight enemies on two fronts, ser, and we cannot let the Bastard King and his wildlings come south easily. If House Bolton can delay the invaders until the start of winter proper, then that may be enough. We need more time. We will offer Roose Bolton whatever aid we can spare towards that end.”

His expression did flicker, his face guarded. “I need you to represent our interests up north. You must go to Winterfell, rendezvous with Lord Bolton, and to inform me of his efforts against the Bastard King.”

The knight mused on it for several long heartbeats. “And you are choosing me because I am expendable.”

“I am.” She didn’t insult him by denying it. “You are a bastard, nobody will miss your presence. Do not pretend to be insulted by that.” His face remained impassive. “But expendable is useful. You are a disciplined soldier of unquestionable loyalty, and you know what you are fighting towards. That is valuable. I would choose you over an army of a hundred, ser.”

“I’m flattered,” he muttered dryly.

“Don’t be. This must be discrete. A soft hand.” Her eyes were sharp, meeting his gaze. “Hightower could suffer the same fate as the Twins, if we draw the Bastard King’s ire. The Reach must not be implicated in the Bastard King’s war. Can I trust on your subtlety, Ser Flowers?”

King Jon Snow had already proven himself a man who would take vengeance. There was a long pause. Ser Humfrey’s eyes were grim, but he nodded. “I know my duty, my lady.”
“Good man,” Olenna said approvingly. “Pick a fast horse to take you north, and there will be cogs from Hightower. You must coordinate on my behalf with Roose Bolton.”

“With how many men?”

“As many as you can count on your hand, your choice of them,” Olenna replied. “But choose wisely. We can afford to offer coin and influence to House Bolton, not soldiers.”

He nodded. The talk continued for a while, and Olenna shared news of Walder Rivers mustering men in the riverlands. The north was a barbaric wasteland, but there were still some strings that Olenna could pull. There was only one goal; to delay and hinder the Bastard King. “And I will send word to the Conclave of the Citadel,” Olenna promised. “If any means exists to defeat a dragon, then you will have it.”

“I do not care to die against a dragon, my lady,” Ser Humfrey warned. “If the north is as grim as I hear, there may be little I can do there.”

“Perhaps is naught that can be done. Or perhaps is something we can achieve. You must find out.”

It was the dark of night when Ser Humfrey finally left. She would not be able to deal with the Bastard King and his dragon so long as their position was so weak and his so strong. A dragon could demand whatever it wanted of the Seven Kingdoms, Olenna thought, and right now we would not be able to resist. They needed to weaken the wildling army and regain the strength of the Iron Throne before any fruitful negotiation would be possible.

She could wait no longer for the Faceless Men. Cersei was still the most awkward hindrance that Olenna must deal with. Desperate measures are required. Olenna gave a set of orders to Left and Right, and they set about their tasks.

Within days they were marching back to her with a squirming shape hoisted over Left’s shoulders, and three figures trailing behind Right.

They met in a darkened alleyway at the edge of the King’s Gate. There was nobody around but drunkards and whores around a nearby tavern over a street away, and the edge of the Tyrell encampment to the west. “Did you find one?” Olenna demanded to Left.

“We did.”

The large man dropped a figure the size of a child onto the cobbles, but it was stockier than any boy. The man was a dwarf; a small but heavyset figure with a round head and a jutting forehead, dark blonde hair and dressed in clothes of muddy hemp and hair. Common brown eyes, and missing two of his front teeth. He was trying to scream through the gag in his mouth. Olenna just watched impassively.

“Desperate measures.”

“A group of hunters looking to collect the queen’s bounty brought him to King’s Landing,” Left reported in his low, burly voice, “but we intercepted them. He was a cobbler near Oldstones, he’s called—”

“No.” Olenna said firmly. “I do not want to know his name.” The name would only complicate matters.

Left paused, and then nodded. “As you wish.”

The dwarf was terrified, pale-faced and scared out of his wits. “Bring the dwarf here,” Olenna ordered, peering closer to inspect. The dwarf looked little like Tyrion Lannister, and yet… “Yes, he will pass,” she decided. “Enough similarities are there.”

The dwarf tried to scream, but all that came out was a gagged noise.

She nodded to Left, and turned to where Right was waiting. There were three figures behind him; grizzled and hardened men with grey in their beards and dark shadows under their eyes. Olenna inspected each of them in turn. While Left had been searching out a dwarf, Right had selected the men. The best Flea Bottom has to offer, she thought dryly, and she could have laughed at the motley trio.

“If Cersei wants her brother,” Olenna said finally, looking at the men, “then we will give him to her. I will admit what Cersei already knows – that I have been working with Tyrion Lannister from the beginning. And yet, alas, the Queen Regent is too perceptive for me, my scheme is foiled, and I must surrender myself and the Imp. Do you understand?”

There were quiet nods. “You will escort me into the Red Keep, with this gentleman here,” Olenna motioned to the dwarf, “and I have no doubt that Cersei will come herself to gloat and inspect her brother. As soon as she steps within six yards, you are to put three quarrels into her heart.” Her eyes were hard. “No matter anything else, you put them through that bitch’s heart. Right into her heart.”

“Not quarrels, my lady,” Right said, bowing his head. “I figured they wouldn’t be able to sneak crossbows through so easily. I expect your men will be searched at the gates.”

Olenna nodded, and Right turned between the three men. “But this man here was the fastest knife-thrower in Oldtown.” He was an aging man with heavily bagged eyes, a bald head and grey beard. “His name’s Lightning Garth; he used to work as blade juggler for a mummer’s troupe once, then signed on to Lord Tyrell’s army. A bit more grey in his beard now, but he can still sling a dagger faster than an eye can follow.”

“Jolly good,” Olenna said in approval. ‘Lightning’ Garth looked more of an old geezer with a bloated gut than the young man the name would suggest, but he would do.

The man next to him was short and scrawny, with eyes like a rat. “Ferret here is from King’s Landing. A cutthroat by trade, but he’s magic with a dagger,” Right explained. The final man was a big, very fat man with huge hands like gnarly scarred hams. “While Jerry is from the fighting pits – he can wrestle bear his own hands, he doesn’t even feel pain anymore. Jerry will charge, and if he gets his hands on her, then Cersei is dead in a heartbeat.” Right turned back to her with a solemn nod. “All three of them can keep blades hidden where no man will find them, and as soon as Cersei steps close they will end her.”

“My lady,” Right said solemnly. “I must ask… are you sure want to do this?”

“I’ve made my choice, son,” Olenna replied curtly. “Get these three armour, get a rose on their chests, dress them like guardsmen. Three guards will do. They’ll pass and Cersei won’t look twice.”

I am an old lady; even Cersei would allow a few men to assist me walking the steps. She faced the three men. Not a hint of uncertainty in any of them, but Olenna had to be sure. There would only be one chance at this.

“Now, I will not lie to you,” Olenna said, her voice a croak, “you will not walk away from this. We catch Cersei by surprise, you will kill her, but the guards around her will almost certainly kill you afterwards. They will not expect such a suicidal attack. If by some fluke, you do manage to escape – you will be hung for the murder of a queen, no matter how justified it may have been. The law is a bitch like that.” Nobody reacted. “However, I can promise that all of your families will be taken care of, and your sons will be fostered alongside knights. They will serve as squires to knights good and true, and perhaps they will hold lands of their own in time. Gold dragons to your loved ones, in return for your own sacrifice. Do you accept?”

“I do, my lady,” Lightning Garth said quietly, and the others nodded too.

“Good. I want you have the choice. I want you to know what you are dying for.”

And I will die as well, Olenna thought grimly, but there was no alternative. She was needed to walk the guards into the Red Keep. Olenna was old, but her granddaughter was young. Cersei will die, I will die, but Margaery will walk free – a fair trade.

She turned to the bound dwarf, the man still begging and weeping on the floor. She motioned for Left to remove the gag. “I apologise for this, my man,” Olenna said with a sigh. “And I’m sorry that I cannot offer you the same choice. Your role in this ruse is non-negotiable.” She paused, wrinkly cheeks grimacing. “I know that these are desperate measures, but this war has had many casualties already. Know that lives the of an innocent little girl and a gallant boy are on the line.”

“Please don’t… I didn’t do anything…!” the dwarf wept. “I’m not him, I’m not…”

“I know,” Olenna said with a nod. “But think of it like an act. A mummer’s role that needs to be filed. You likely don’t deserve this, you may be a good man, but I will never know. You are a dwarf, and I need a dwarf.”

“Are you sure he will pass?” Left said uncertainly. “If the queen recognises it’s not really her brother…”

“It doesn’t need to pass, the queen just needs to get close enough to inspect. He’s similar enough,” Olenna said firmly. “A bit of oil and dirt will obscure the hair, and fear will excuse his wrinkles. The eyes are not the right colour and jaw the wrong shape, but once we cut the nose off he will pass from a distance.”

The dwarf flustered. “Wait, you’re going to cut off my nose?”

Olenna sighed, her voice apologetic. “Not just the nose, I’m afraid.”

She nodded to Left and Right. Left drew his sword. The dwarf screamed.

Right held the little man down against the stone, hand clamped over the dwarf’s mouth, while Left readied his sword to cut off the head. Olenna turned away, stepping back so the blood wouldn’t splatter over her dress.

She turned to her three killers. “We’re going to kill Cersei, do you understand?” Olenna said with quiet determination. “Whatever you need to do, whatever is required, we’re going to kill that bitch.”

The dwarf was screaming right up until the end, but Olenna would have happily killed a dozen dwarves to save the lives of her little girl.
And yet it was useless. Olenna sent off a tear-stained, pleading confession to the Red Keep, yet there was never a response. Olenna waited and waited for Cersei to reply, but she never did. Olenna sent off letter after letter, she tried to approach the gates, she tried to lure Cersei into her trap, yet no reply came.

All Olenna wanted was an audience with the queen. All she needed was to get her three killers close, but her ravens never returned. She could get no word over the walls. The dwarf’s head rotted and sneered at her from the corner of her tent, uselessly, and nobody came to collect it.

Cersei would not have ignored her offer. She would want to gloat – Cersei would want to be spiteful.

_Cersei never found out about my offer._ There could be no other explanation. Somewhere in between Olenna and the Mad Queen, her words were going missing. _Somebody inside doesn’t want this stalemate to end._

Olenna had promised Cersei her brother’s head, to out herself as the Imp’s ally, but she could get no word through the Red Keep’s walls. She never received a response.

_Someone is playing me._

She thought of Lord Qyburn’s sickeningly sweet smile, and a twisting suspicion churned in her gut. The new masters of whisperers handled everything coming to and from the queen.

It felt… it was infuriating. All of Olenna’s plans, her schemes – they all died before they could bear fruit. She felt useless, so useless she could tear out her own grey hair.

The day of Cersei’s trial approached, and there wasn’t even _time_. There was never enough time.

Mace was stomping, pacing around the pavilion. They had only just received word that army on the roseroad was moving. The ‘Young Dragon’ was finally launching his assault against the city. “The Golden Company—” Mace protested.

“–has to be stopped,” Olenna snapped. Her patience was gone, her voice was sharp. Her eyes were hard but frazzled, and there was no decorum left in her. “This city is already half-starving, we cannot retake any control at all if the city goes up in arms against us.”

Mace bristled. “Our armies will not run from a haggle of peasants!”

“Armies are not the deciding factor, boy.” Olenna could have screamed. “We cannot keep the population calmed by _force_ – we need food from the Reach. The Golden Company has bled us too much already, they must be routed.”

“You expect me to leave on the eve of the trial?” Mace yelled, outraged. “My place is here; my daughter is here!”

“He shook his head, his flabby cheeks wriggling. “No, Mother,” Mace said firmly. “I must be here for Cersei’s trial – I must be here when they take the Red Keep. Lord Tarly can lead our men against these mercenaries.”

“No,” Olenna snapped. “Do _not_ leave your army in command of Randyll Tarly. This must be your victory, you must be the one to retake control.” Grow a spine and lead your men.

He only looked confused. Olenna wished he was small enough so she could still slap him over the ear. Can he not see the stakes that we are playing for?

Randyll Tarly would do a fine job as commander in the battle, Olenna had no doubt. In fact, that was exactly what she was concerned about.

Lord Tyrell’s control and influence was being frayed from every edge. The lords under him were restless and agitated, whispers were spreading. They were talking of his incompetence in low murmurs, and fearful uncertainty was turning towards anger. Mace had command of twenty thousand men in the city – all of them were being forced to wait while their homes in the Reach were being pillaged. Nobody was sure what had happened at Oldtown, but the only thing certain was that it had been a disaster.

There hadn’t been a word from Garlan leading their army, or from Lord Redwyne leading their fleet. Lords Hightower, Costayne, Beesbury, Shermer, Fossoway… so many lords had rallied to Oldtown, and even the lords in the capital had sent their heirs and second sons. None had returned so much as a whisper. The closest ravens had been from Highgarden, and her eldest grandchild Willas sent letters that had grown more and more desperate.

‘It is total devastation,’ Willas had written, in a shaking hand. ‘The city is flooded, the Hightower is collapsed and ironborn haunt the ruins. I have seen tens of thousands of bodies forced up the river. Corpses and debris dam the waters, and the Honeywine itself has overflown with blood. The refugees have been crazed, and the tales that they tell… I do not know what to do.’

Olenna had never known her grandson to sound so scared.

They had received only a single letter from Oldtown itself – a letter delivered by one of the white ravens of the Citadel, but bearing the Greyjoy seal. ‘Your city belongs to me, your army destroyed.’

the short letter read. ‘Surrender and bow before me, or suffer the same.’

It had been signed, “Euron Greyjoy, God-King of the Seven Kingdoms, the Drowned God Reborn.”

Such a ridiculous title might have been funny, but when the letter had been shared with their bannermen, there was no laughter.

Olenna couldn’t explain how it happened. Nobody could. So many garbled reports. The hurricane had destroyed Oldtown and the army of the Reach, but the ironborn survived. Even now, there was word of fighting in the flooded streets of the city.

Mace’s wife Alerie was a daughter of House Hightower. Olenna herself had been born in the Arbor; she had been there for her nephew Paxter’s birth, and had watched him grow into one of the greatest captains Westeros had known. And now Houses Redwyne and Hightower might well be lost.

The Hightower itself was said to be destroyed. Olenna had disbelieved the first raven, but then the fourth and fifth gave the same details, as did the fiftieth. It was one of the only things that the letters agreed on and all the rest was garbled and conflicting; reports of hundreds of thousands dead, their ships wrecked in the winds, and floods across the coast.

Half the tales had been crazed, the stories embellished and exaggerated. Nothing short of a natural disaster could account for the chaos they heard. Slowly, most sensible men were coming to accept that it had been a storm without equal.

And yet some letters spoke of demons, or of a monster larger than an island. Most dismissed such talk as witless exaggeration born from panic, but Olenna had to wonder… the only monster around that she knew of was the Bastard King’s dragon. It was said to be even larger than Balerion the Black Dread. But was an ice dragon large enough to destroy an entire city?

Had the wildling king learnt of the aid the Reach provided House Bolton? Had Ser Humfrey been captured, and was this the Bastard’s King’s bloody reprisal? Or had the kraken and the white dragon come to an alliance?

So many doubts, and yet only thing that could be certain were the corpses washing up by the thousands, from Blackcrown to the Three Towers. All communication was in shambles, she could find no word of Garlan’s fate. Her heart wept for him, and the uncertainty of it left her body trembling at night.

The Citadel had the largest rookery in Westeros. For no ravens to have been sent at all… perhaps the maesters in the city had been put to the sword by that barbarian. The Crow’s Eye.

More and more, Olenna thought of that preacher in the streets. ‘The ice dragon heralds the end of times!’ he had screamed. ‘Repent!’

There were likely a thousand more like him now, screaming the same. The whole world was going mad.

Olenna took a deep breath, trying to focus. Priorities, she insisted to herself. “You will not be able to contribute in the city, Mace,” she said finally. “The High Septon is taking control of the queen’s trial. You are needed in the field – to fight the battle on the roseroad. You need to prove your power again.”

“We need a victory. Any victory would do.”

“You want me to waste time with this mummer’s dragon?” he said, aghast. “I do not care for this ‘Aegon’ – he is a fraud, the Imp’s puppet. But my daughter, my son, are in that castle on the hill.”

He pointed to the east, through the cloth of the pavilion and towards where Aegon’s High Hill loomed at the other side of the city. “That castle right there!”

“Aegon Targaryen will destroy us before we breach that castle!” Olenna snapped. “He has fifteen thousand men to destroy us, even before the queen can. Let the High Sparrow retake control of civil affairs, Ser Kevan will handle Cersei – you must prove your military might against the invaders. The defence of the realm falls firmly to you.”

Mace only stared at her, his face pale. “I am trying to recover a dire situation, boy,” she insisted. “Matters are grim, but we can still pull through this.”

And yet Olenna had heard the criers in the streets, the voices that were declaring Aegon Targaryen the rightful king. There were whispers spreading that their situation was divine punishment against the realm for supporting an illegitimate ruler. There were whispers in taverns that named the Baratheon regime false, and that a Targaryen was the only rightful king. Those whispers were like spark to kindling. Words are wind, but this wind is fanning the flames.

There had even been mummer troupes by the docks that had been performing plays where a dragon rose from the ashes to put the realm to order, and the false tyrants were brought to justice by a young champion of the people. Olenna herself had sat in the crowd of one such performance, and the smallfolk had cheered as the red cloth dragon emerged from the stands. Olenna could feel the dissent stewing in the streets, she could feel it simmering.
Olenna didn't believe in coincidence. Other lords had shrugged with such talk, but Olenna didn’t underestimate it. She put a stop to the mummer troupes and she had rounded up the criers. Her men gave them all the same question, and slowly a money trail started to appear.

Somebody had been paying those men to spread certain words.

Left and Right spent a week tracing the coin back to a money lender working by the flea markets, and eventually found a banker that admitted that he had been handing out coin to those who helped spread a certain message. The mummer troupes had been hired, their scripts written for them. An anonymous benefactor from the Free Cities had been paying a great deal of money towards mummers and criers that helped portray Aegon Targaryen as the saviour of the Seven Kingdoms. It had been confirmation of what Olenna could feel in her bones; somebody is playing us.

This was a war that Mace was not equipped to handle.

There were crises on every front. The news, the siege, the stalemate had sent King’s Landing into a frenzy. The Faith was growing restless, and riots were being sparked as the food ran out. People were starving, angry and scared.

Their men could barely even walk the streets safely any more. There had been a string of brutal murders and disappearances in the city; women and prostitutes that disappeared from around Flea Bottom and a gaggle of Reach guardsmen had been held responsible. Mace had tried and executed the men, but the tensions didn’t fade. King’s Landing was a boiling pot ready to burst, and all that rage was turning towards House Tyrell.

Lannister and Tyrell caused this mess, the whispers said.

If hadn’t been so grim, Olenna might have laughed. It was a jape – a bitter, humourless jape. Once, not long ago, the city had heralded House Tyrell as their saviours, but how quickly things changed. Perhaps it is a learning experience, she thought bitterly; the crowd that sings at your wedding and claps at your coronation is the exact same crowd that will jeer at your execution. People just love a show.

There was a long moment of silence, Olenna and Mace looking at each other. Their relationship had never been so strained. “I do not have the men for a secure victory against the Golden Company,” Mace said finally.

“Then have an insecure victory, for gods’ sake,” Olenna replied curtly. “We will move the men out of the city, perhaps we can encourage Cersei to finally leave her hidey-hole.”

“The numbers—”

“The numbers are as good as now as we’re going to get.” Olenna shook her head. “We will not survive a siege, not like this. We cannot allow Aegon Targaryen to reach the walls of the city. There is no more time, we must play the hand we have.”

“Aegon Targaryen,” he repeated, looking at her as if she was mad. “Oldtown is a ruin, and you worry about Aegon Targaryen? Forget the mummer’s dragon, Lord Tarly tells me repeatedly; our lands are at risk, we must return—”

“If you take your men away to Oldtown, then that the mummer’s dragon will have seized the Iron Throne long before you return,” Olenna chided. “No, the only thing that will save the Reach now is a united Seven Kingdoms – we need the force of the other realms behind us. We need to destroy Aegon Targaryen before that can happen.”
Priorities, she insisted to herself. One goal leads to another – remove Cersei, free Margaery, defeat Aegon, and we rally the forces needed to secure the Reach. And yet no matter how she tried to justify it, her heart pained with the thought of her family, her grandsons lost in the Reach.

Mace tried to protest, but his throat seemed to jam. “After the queen’s trial,” Olenna continued. “After you repel the Golden Company… only then we can gather the full force of the westerlands and the Vale to support us. We can still save Highgarden.”

“The Vale,” Mace repeated. The knights of the Vale were the strongest straw they still had to cling on to. “We’re certain?”

“Yes.” Olenna nodded. “The Vale lords are bringing thirty thousand men to support us. Their armies are marching as we speak; they’ve already passed the Bloody Gate.”

“The Bloody Gate?” he exclaimed, aghast. “That far? When are they to arrive?”

“The snows in the riverlands blocked the High Road,” Olenna admitted with a grimace. “Their armies have already been delayed. But they are coming.”

The Vale was the only army that could still save them, and they were coming in force. “With the Vale’s assistance,” she said firmly. “We’ll have the men to secure the capital, and our armies will be free to leave. And afterwards Queen Regent Margaery will appoint Petyr Baelish as Warden of the East.”

“I… wha…” Mace’s voice was stunned. “The coincounter.”

“It’s how the game works,” Olenna snapped, toothless gums sucking at her lips. Curses for having to turn to that slimy worm again. Matters were so dire that she had to resort to Littlefinger again. “Petyr Baelish was the one who rallied the Lords Declarant to support us, and for that service he expects a reward. Of all that he could have asked for…” Olenna shook her head. “Warden of the East is a military command, not a hereditary title or a lordship. Baelish will be kicked off that rank as soon as Robert Arryn comes of age in any case, but right now Littlefinger seeks a position to secure himself. Giving him that in return for support is a good bargain.”

She had spent weeks trying to hammer out that deal – trying to balance a hundred concerns and clashing interests. It had been like juggling knives or trading with vipers. Olenna had managed to forge an alliance between Kevan Lannister, the High Septon, Petyr Baelish – an alliance that might still save the realm.

The numbers are still in our favour, Olenna told herself. Even despite their losses, despite all the bannermen that had broken ranks, the Tyrell army still stood at over twenty thousand strong. With the Vale joining them, they would be over fifty thousand. With the Faith Militant by their side, there was an army that could match anything.

The Faith was on their side. All of their challengers – the Crow’s Eye, the Bastard King, Stannis Baratheon – were heretics to the followers of the Seven. The High Septon would oppose the false religions, and the Seven Kingdoms would fight against the mad men trying to destroy them.

Mace didn’t know how to react. For a big man, he looked stunned, lost. “We will save our family, my son,” Olenna insisted. “But we must focus on the priorities.”

His shoulders were shaking, staring at her with an expression she had never seen. A chuckle broke his throat, but there was no laughter in it. “The priorities!” Her son’s voice morphed into a shout.
“Of course, we cannot forget the priorities, Mother! Clearly, my son and daughter aren’t priority enough!”

Olenna almost groaned. Not now... please, don’t... “Watch your tone.”

“The priorities!” he snapped, stepping forward. “I could have broken through those damn walls months ago!” Mace boomed. “You were the one that told me to wait.”

“I told you how to protect our family,” she bristled.

His face was red, booming and shivering with sudden rage. “You said to send Garlan to the Reach! You said to let the Golden Company pass! It was you!” Her jaw clenched, but she didn’t reply. “You were the one that made this alliance, you were the one that brought us here!”

She didn’t reply, but her shoulders were stiff. He’s angry and lost, Olenna told herself. He wants someone he can blame.

“You were the one that pushed Cersei to this, you were the one who provoked her!” There were tears in his eyes. “This was all you! You did this, you ruined me, you spiteful bitch!”

I only ever tried to protect my family. And yet so many of her intentions had withered and died.

Olenna’s hands tightened on her cane. Mace stared at her as if he wanted her to scream at him, to argue back, but Olenna gave him nothing but a hard and silent glare.

Mace shook his head slowly. “You ruined me,” her son muttered, before turning around and storming out of the tent.

Olenna stood perfectly still for several long moments. She took a deep breath, and then she went about her business. She spent the rest of the day calming her son down, writing letters and making preparations, and ensuring that the Tyrell army would be there to oppose the Golden Company’s march.

And then, she retired to her quarters, she closed the door, and she broke down into tears.

Ash rained from the sky, and the world stank of burnt flesh and fear.

The city was on fire around her, and all of those thoughts echoed around in her head. Everything was burning, everything had fallen apart, and now there were only the ruins. All of the memories rattled around in her head, reliving it before her eyes. It was all she could think of, those months flashing before her eyes. Where did it all go wrong?

Great clouds of toxic black smoke gushed through the streets, and the smallfolk fled as though the hounds of the seven burning hells tore through the streets. She could see the marble spires of the Great Sept being devoured by green flames, chewing through stone and spitting blazing debris.

Even despite everything, she felt numb.

Her thoughts felt slow and fragmented in the clamour of the bloody moment. She couldn’t feel the pain, she couldn’t feel the burning in her throat. The smoke twisted and roared around them, spiralling into the air as if an immense black dragon had taken flight over the city. A dragon of black smoke and green flames, sending ash gushing with every flap of inhuman wings.
People were screaming, howling, writhing in frenzied panic. And yet Olenna just felt numb. She could barely feel at all, she couldn’t make sense of it. All of those plans, all of those ambitions… the hopes for her family…

The gods are cunts.

The Great Sept of Baelor was burning. The seven-sided stars of the gods were raining to the ground as ash. As she watched, timbers split and stone cracked, and the belltower of the Father’s Spire collapsed – setting the world to a ringing clanging chaos.

A strong hand was shaking her shoulders, a voice bellowing into her ear. Olenna could hear the words, but she couldn’t make sense of them. She saw a frightened face of Right – Arryk, his name is Arryk – above her, trying to rouse her from her daze. He was a big, strong man, and yet in that moment he looked as terrified as a little boy.

Her whole body was numb and pale, trembling in the guardsman’s arms as he fled for his life.

Olenna had been standing in the courtyard, watching from the crowd, as the queen’s carriage came through. The image of that thing – the thing that looked like her granddaughter – stepping out wearing Cersei’s dress… the memory of it seared Olenna’s eyes. Her beautiful darling granddaughter… her lovely sweet and clever child… dressed up as Cersei and sent in the queen’s place…

That wasn’t Margaery. It wasn’t, it wasn’t… it couldn’t…

The howling of the flames sounded like Cersei’s laughter. The fires were spreading. Visenya's Hill was lit up like a pyre – green flames and black smoke writhing around her.

And those monsters… the burning monsters thrashing and writhing and slashing like beasts from the darkest of the seven hells. Even as they burnt to cinders, they attacked and raged and burst down into the streets – indiscriminately tearing the smallfolk and the Faith Militant and the guardsmen apart.

Erryk and Arryk were the only things that saved her. When the fighting broke out before the sept, her two guardsmen carried Olenna away. In the explosion, Erryk had fallen somewhere to the flames, and Arryk was left so scared that he never knew what to do but run. The man just kept on running, sprinting towards the Gate of the Gods, trying to reach towards the Tyrell compound at the eastern edge of the city.

Everything was so hazy, the world was roiling. Between the smoke and her spinning head. Olenna could feel the ground rumbling, the stampede of panicked and fleeing feet. She could only vaguely make out the shape of Cobbler’s Square, hoisted over Arryk’s shoulder as he ran.

There were bodies trampling around her. Olenna could feel the swell of the mobs bubbling around her, the riots surging towards the Red Keep.

Across the plaza of the Street of Sisters, she saw the mobs barrelling against the black marble structure of the Guildhall of the Alchemists. She saw crazed men slamming against the doors, bodies trying to clamber up the stone parapets of the building, and mobs throwing stones through the shuttered windows, prying them open with their bodies. The Great Sept was blazing over the city, and men were shouting and stomping their feet in fury. The mobs were rallying, all their outrage focused against the Alchemists’ Guild – tides of bodies trying to push their way through the doors. It was pure chaos; the alchemists trying to bar the door, to barricade against the riot, but they were breaking and black smoke was rising across the rows of thatch houses.
Flea Bottom was on fire. The debris was spitting and flying far, and the wood and straw of Pisswater Bend didn’t stand a chance. The green fires were spreading out of control.

_Boom._ She heard the thud of great wooden arms, like drumbeats in the distance. In the skies, she saw black shapes soaring, shapes flying like birds.

She couldn’t… she didn’t understand what she was seeing at first. Then the first body smeared itself across the cobbles like a red berry, and she knew. _The hostages._

Flailing bodies soared through the smoky sky, flying from the direction of Aegon’s High Hill. Wooden limbs atop the Red Keep’s blood-red walls snapped out and then curled back, again and again.

The trebuchets of the Red Keep were launching the hostages from the walls.

The queen had kept her word; with the mobs at the gates, Cersei launched her hostages over the walls by trebuchet. Olenna could see the bodies crashing down from the sky, bloody and unrecognisable pulps smearing against burning stone.

_The Whores._ Olenna wasn’t sure where that thought came from, but it struck inside her head. _Those trebuchets were called the Three Whores._

It wasn’t logical, it wasn’t any sort of scheme. This felt like nothing but pure spite. _Madness._ Cersei had to know that, but she did so anyway. That could only mean she had nothing to lose.

_Loras. Loras, my boy…_ Was he flying through the sky, even now…?

A vision filled flashed before her gaze, of purple drapes and scores of lords and ladies across the throne room. The sound of a dozen singers chiming in the air, all the noises mixing with laughter. Olenna saw her granddaughter, dressed radiantly in purple and green with diamonds in her hair, holding onto the arm of her new husband, the boy king. For a brief moment, they did make the image of a good couple; Margaery was beautiful, Joffrey youthful and handsome.

Olenna remembered feeling that one moment of doubt. Perhaps Margaery could temper Joffrey’s violent inclinations. Joffrey was young, perhaps he would calm as he matured. Perhaps assassination wasn’t required. And yet, deep in her old bones, Joffrey had only ever reminded Olenna of the worst of the Targaryens – and such a creature could never be allowed to touch her granddaughter. While the rest were distracted by the foolishness with the Imp, Olenna’s gaze turned towards the great goblet of wine before the king’s chair, and she had the fake amethysts in her hand.

_This was it, this was the moment it all went wrong_ , Olenna thought numbly. Her eyes turned away from the young King Joffrey, towards Queen Cersei’s hard, wooden smile. Olenna so clearly remembered Cersei’s expression when her child wed. The queen had sat stiffly in her chair; her expression like stone, but the raw hate still seeping from the cracks. She had tried to hide it under the smiles and courtesies, but Olenna could tell; Cersei had despised their family from the very beginning.

_I dropped the poison into the wrong glass._

The man carrying her shuddered, tearing Olenna from the memory. The earth quaked, and then…

_Whoosh._

Everything went pitch black as cloud of dust and ash swept through the street, and a plume of crackling green and red fire snapped behind her. The Alchemist’s Guild. Somewhere in the distance behind her, the hall of the Alchemist’s Guild detonated, and the world trembled. The flames burst upwards, the unnatural fire hissing like the crackling of demons. She felt the impact… the windows shattered, the air was sucked from the sky, and the people screamed – tens of thousands of frenzied voices blending into madness.

Burning horses were running mad through the streets, and men screamed in fear and fury. Flaming debris tumbled through the sky, igniting new conflagrations over the city. It was pure chaos, and Olenna just stared numbly.

Even amidst it all, the image of her beautiful little girl stepping out of that carriage couldn’t leave her gaze – the bloated corpse of Margaery haunted her vision.

Ash fell from the sky, and her guardsman heaved and grunted and coughed as he ran through the city, following the Street of Gods to the west. All around them, the rioting crowds of smallfolk tore the city apart. She saw a score of crazed, filthy men with knives and hammers fall on a patrol of frightened Lannister guardsmen and tear them apart. There was no law, there was no order, nothing but an animal panic in the tides of human flesh. Women wailed, babes screams, and riots of smallfolk on every street.

The Gates of the Gods were wide open, and mounted men poured through, riding into the city, trampling and bellowing through the streets. The rose banners of Tyrell flew high, but they were smeared with mud and dirt. All of the knights looked worn and bloody, their faces pale with fear as they stared out over the city. Olenna saw the banners; the wilted green rose, the squashed purple grapes, the fallen tower, the bloody huntsman…

The Tyrell cavalry was galloping back into the burning city, but they came broken and distraught, and defeat was writ across their features.

_The battle,* Olenna thought vaguely. _What happened to the battle?_

The knights were stampeding, fumbling, trying to take control of the chaos. The riots raged, the fires burning out of control.

In the ash and the smoke, there was no ‘us’ and ‘them’. There was naught but mindless panic and anger, tensions over-boiled and red cloaks clashing against gold against green against rainbow. The colours were smothered by ash, and there was nothing but black.

They were screaming, all of the men bellowing for order. Olenna tried to focus, but her head was spinning. She was coughing against the smoke. The old woman was a quivering wreck, barely able to breathe as Arryk finally collapsed to the cobbles from exhaustion.

Tyrell knights were riding around her, struggling to control their horses in the black smog. Olenna could only stagger through it, feeling dazed and hollow.

Her senses were blurring, Olenna felt like she was being torn away from her own body. The shock and the smoke, the pain and the grief… _Is this what dying feels like?_ she wondered faintly.

“My daughter!” a voice cried. “Where is my daughter?”

Her son. That was her son’s voice. She saw the heavy shape of her son, covering his mouth against the smoke and his gasping face red. He was clad in green armour, the metal plate chiming with every staggering step. So many shapes and so much noise blurred around her, Olenna struggling to make any sense of it at all. She focused on her son’s shape, her boy’s voice.
Around her, the city convulsed like a giant’s death-rattle. The shrieks of the smallfolk, the screams of the innocent, the crackling of the wildfire falling from the sky, it blended together into the howling screams of mad gods.

She heard their cries, men were screaming. The screams wrapped around her – cries of “Fire!”, “Help us!”, “Must retreat!”, “What do we do?” “My lord, the castle…!”, “They’re at the gates!”, “My lord, my lord!” …

So many men, running around like little children.

Strong hands grasped Olenna’s shoulders, meaty fingers clutched the frail woman so tightly it hurt. “Mother!” Mace shouted at her, his eyes wide and frightened. “Mother! Mother! What happened? What happened?”

Olenna couldn’t respond. Focus, must focus. I need to…

There was a heart-wrenching crack the collapse of wood and stone as a building shattered in the flames, sending black ash whooshing through the streets. Men screamed and horses bolted, her son yanked her by the wrist and tried to shelter her from the ash.

“Where is my daughter?” Mace cried, his eyes weeping. He was coughing and crying, trying to pull his mother away. “Where is Margaery? Where is Loras?”

“My son,” Olenna croaked, her vision blurring. “My boy, my boy…”

Focus. Need to focus.

It was all so black and smoky she could hardly see, but she felt his arms around her shoulders, hugging her so tightly. Her boy was trembling, crying into her shoulders the same way he did when he was boy.

And then the blade sliced through the air.

It started with a scream, and then two. There were short and sharp screams around them, and daggers plunging through backs. In the haze, they were just shadows writhing in smoke. The Tyrell men fell, blades slicing through the roses on their chest.

Olenna saw a bright red two-handed greatsword flashing in a downwards arc, cleaving through steel as if it were paper. There wasn’t a chance to stop them, there wasn’t even a pause. Shadows stepped out of the smoke, and red roses were dropping.

The red sword. That was the only thing Olenna could focus on in the moment. The red sword dripping blood.

Olenna would have screamed, but her throat jammed. Mace tried to twist, but it was too quick. Swift and efficient.

“My—” her son croaked, right before that red blade stabbed straight through his back and out of his chest.

His legs gave way and he collapsed. Mace was so big, so heavy, he fell to the floor and pushing Olenna down with him as he toppled. They both fell to the cobbled stones together, both gasping for breath as the blood oozed from his body. Olenna’s eyes watched her son’s red face gulp and gasp, his hands flailing like a baby as the red oozed from his stomach.
The assassins didn’t wait. There was no warning, no bargaining, no talk. They simply saw their chance in the chaos, and they took it.

Heavy steel bootsteps walked towards Olenna, but the man paused as the mother cradled her boy. He stood and he waited as she hugged her loaf of a son for the last time. Olenna’s head was spinning, all of the moments… the faces of her family flashing before her eyes. Near sixty years of protecting and caring for her family, so much laughter and ambition and hope for the future…

This is how it ends. Mewling and crying and in flames.

She might have laughed. To die on the Mother’s Day, in the arms of her son… along with her family…

The man was waiting, standing stiff like a statue above her. The red greatsword was slick with blood, the blade hungry in the smoke and his dull grey armour smeared with greasy ash. Olenna took a deep breath and raised her head, meeting the hard eyes looking down. The expression under the helm was unreadable.

If the man was expecting outrage, or desperate pleas for mercy, or senseless begging, then Olenna refused to indulge him. She focused on cold grey eyes with all the scorn she could muster.

“Well…” Olenna wheezed finally. “Get it over with, then.”

The red sword swung down.

The Mad Queen

Darkness, the vague crackle of fire, the trickle of blood in her lap.

The memories… as sweet and as painful as a blade…

“… mother, mother! Aren’t they so beautiful?”

It was time for her to break her fast with her son. And yet when she’d walked into the solar, her little king was holding three… kittens. She stared for a moment. Where had he gotten them? She crouched down and smiled, as her son broke his fast on warm black bread, fresh from the ovens and dribbled with honey. “They most certainly are. Where did you get them, my sweet?”

“Margaery gave them to me!” Her son was smiling with the wild exuberance of one who didn’t yet know that happiness wasn’t something everlasting. “She said that I could name them!”

Cersei’s smile turned, just a little, but she controlled her expression. Her baby’s excitement was almost infectious. She refused to let the Tyrell whore take away from her son’s happiness. “What are you going to name them?” she asked.

“Hmmmm.” Her son seemed to think as hard as she’d ever seen. He rubbed his cheek into the ears of the largest of the three kittens. “I’ll name him Ser Pounce. This one will be Boots. This one will be Ser Whiskers.”

“That’s a girl kitten,” Cersei said.

“Oh!” His eyes widened, and he gave the cat a firm rub between the ears. The kitten mewled contentedly. “I’m so sorry, Lady Whiskers!”
Cersei couldn’t help but smile. Just seeing her baby like this… restored her. Made her whole again. Made her remember what she was fighting for.

“A king’s kitten needs to be cared for. A kitten needs food, safety, and the protection that only a strong ruler can give,” Cersei said gravely. “The kittens are your newest subjects. Are you able to protect your subjects?”

The king considered that, licking honey off his fingers. “I will protect them all. I can do that, I’m the king.”

But who will protect you, save for me? Her smile wavered. This cruel, cruel world would surely devour him, just like his older brother, if she didn’t save him. Already, the Imp was no doubt plotting somewhere. Already, the Tyrells grasped so, and kept grasping for so much more...

She could not be his sword, but she could be his shield. She would protect him from the darkness.

All I do, I do for him.

The vision twisted, the scene turning away into something dark and sour...

She saw herself stepping into the king’s chambers, raising up her lantern as she unlocked the door. She was pale and scarred, and the blood of the dead dragged at the hems of her dress, as she stepped over the threshold.

The barricaded windows left the whole room in a shadowy gloom, and she heard the mewling of cats stirring from inside. Cersei’s heart was pounding in her chest as she stepped forward, and then her nostrils twitched at the sharp tang of blood in the darkness.

She raised the lantern, and moved like a ghost into her child’s room.

The chamber was a ruin, and black fluid stained the rugs. Chunks of meat and organs were strewn across the Myrish carpet. In the centre of the bedchamber lay a slight blond form, staring ever upwards. Around it, kittens mewed.

Those sweet little kittens were nibbling on her dead son’s flesh. Ser Pounce purred as he played with a lump of Tommen’s guts.

Cersei didn’t scream. Her throat clenched and her heart stopped, but she just stood and stared, the tower crumbling into rubble all around her...

‘I warned you, dear sister,” the bloody words loomed over the sky.

She didn’t scream, but her ears still popped from the howling of the world, the roar of fire and immense crackle of the flames...

Cersei saw a twisted old man with scabby skin and overgrown white hair sitting on the throne, and he was laughing as around him the world burst into green. She felt the heat on her skin, she heard the sundering of the earth, the blaze of stone and the hiss of metal bubbling – but the man didn’t burn. Even as the whole world was torched around him, the king rose anew. She saw him rising up from the smoke, his shadow growing and twisting into something larger, something fearsome...

Great wings of black stretched over the sky, and an immense body rose, reborn from the earth and the sea of fire.

It all blurred and faded away.
Cersei dreamt that she was sitting upon the Iron Throne, staring out over the cavernous and empty throne room that she had come to know so well. She heard the footsteps walking towards her, emanating from the shadows.

“I never wanted this for you…” a soft voice mourned from the pillars of the great hall. “I never wanted any of it – not this legacy, not for you to follow your father’s footsteps.”

She stared at the figure in hooded grey. “Who are you?” Her last word echoed up and down the throne room, youyoyoyouyou… “Are you the Stranger?”

The figure stood before the throne, and glanced over Cersei’s bloated form, the weight in her lap, the red sword by her knees, and the creature mumbling besides the throne’s foot.

“I am not the Stranger, Cersei.” The figure raised a pale soft hand, and pushed the hood back. “Have you forgotten me?”

No, I don’t… The words caught in her throat. A woman, with features that could have been anything from fifteen to fifty. A strange agelessness to her features. Cersei stared into eyes that were of molten emerald. She did know this woman, but it had been so long…

“Have you forgotten your father, your brother too?”

“Jaime is dead.”

“Is he?” the figure whispered.

“This is a dream,” Cersei said.

Cersei’s hand clasped a lock, almost unwillingly. Her hair was a dull blonde, almost grey, and as rough as straw. My hair…

In all of her dreams, her hair was as golden as the dawn.

“You were so beautiful, once,” the figure said, her words as soft as the grave. Cersei stared uncomprehending at the figure. Desperate. Who are you? But her voice locked in her throat.

“Your father was a hard man,” the figure whispered, “and tortured by his dreams. To dream of the things he could not have… always too afraid to let down his walls, to live his own dreams. So he pushed his dreams onto his children…”

There was a pause, a brief, quiet grimace. “And Tywin…” the voice said softly. “Tywin dreamt that his son would be a great knight, that his daughter would be a queen. That his grandchildren would rule, and turn the Seven Kingdoms into one. He dreamt his children would be so strong and brave and beautiful that no one would ever laugh at them.”

“I am a queen,” she told the figure, “I have a beautiful son.”

A tear rolled down the figure’s cheek. The woman raised her hood again and turned her back on her. “Goodbye,” she whispered. “I’m sorry – I’m so, so sorry.”

Cersei reached after her, but already the figure was moving away, her skirt whispering lullabies as it brushed across the floor. Don’t leave me, she wanted to call. Not again… but the figure vanished into the air as though she’d never been.
Cersei woke. She could feel the blood.

There was always that heartbeat after she woke – that moment of brief delirium before she realised where she was. That moment of blissful unawareness where everything still seemed right with the world.

And then she blinked, and reality dawned. The memories stabbed back into her heart.

“… Father’s face is stern and strong…” her cousin mumbled, his scarred and lanky body slumped over the stairs to the Iron Throne. “… sits and judges right from wrong… weighs our lives… right from wrong…”

Lancel Lannister had been repeating those words for so, so long. Cersei didn’t know how much time had passed, she had been falling in and out of consciousness. The ruin that had once been her cousin stood at the foot of the throne, dumbly reciting the Song of the Seven – saying the verses over and over again for what felt like an eternity. His voice was a quiet mumble in the background, blurring with the sounds of battle in the distance as he stuttered over the words.

“… right from wrong... the short and long... loves the little children…” The song, the lullaby, the only things he could say.

Cersei stared at him quietly. She had ordered him to stop, but the verses kept spilling from his mouth. He could hardly control his limbs, he couldn’t control his mouth. Ser Lancel Lannister was half-naked and dressed in rags coated in dried blood; covered in red scars of stitched skin, with bloated milky flesh and black veins running down through his body. His expression was blank, his bloodshot eyes vacant, and a faint line of drool dribbling from his mouth as he murmured.

It wasn’t Lancel anymore, it was just a mindless creature repeating the same words. Nothing but a broken shell, dissected by a surgeon’s knife and stitched back together like a rag doll.

“… Mother gives the gift of life…” his voice droned. “… watches over every wife... loves little children…”

His shoulders were slumped, his head drooped and his feet scraping across the ground. Sometimes Lancel would stagger and pace in circles, other times he would just stop and stand still, but he kept on repeating the words. The words of the Seven felt like nails over chalk, torturing Cersei in the gloomy din.

Of all the power she once had, of all the armies that once marched for her… the only thing left under her command was her useless little cousin. He was the very last one that still listened to her.

Qyburn had left, walking away through one of the secret tunnels. Qyburn had been her very last hope, and he just walked away. The only thing her master of whisperers left behind was Lancel. Useless, meaningless Lancel had been left standing in the dungeons, reciting those words. Perhaps that had been Qyburn’s jest.

Cersei sat stiffly on the Iron Throne, her eyes peeled on the door, with her little baby boy in her arms. She sat and waited, stroking Tommen’s hair, all the while Lancel lurched around the base of the throne.

The image of the cats devouring her son’s corpse replayed over and over before her eyes. ‘I warned you, dear sister.’

“… sees our fates as they unfold…” Lancel mumbled. “She lifts her lamp of shining gold... lead the little children.”
A crone. She was not a mother any more, she had no children. She was just an ugly, hideous crone waiting for death.

Tommen was still in her arms, so still he might have been sleeping. If not for the jagged knife wounds across his body, and his bloody guts staining her dress, Cersei might have been able to pretend he was asleep. Yet he wasn’t. My children are dead.

She knew that he was dead, but she still cradled Tommen and rocked him gently in her arms. He’s still my son, my precious baby. All that I have left. How long has it been since I ever hugged him? Maybe if she closed her eyes, she could pretend he might hug her back.

From outside, she heard the distant crackle of flames, and the thud of battering rams beating against the Red Keep’s gate.

Tommen was cradled across her lap, while a red longsword rested against the base of the Iron Throne, the sword’s pommel lying between Cersei’s knees. The blade was Valyrian steel with red and black ripples running down the smooth metal, and the crossguard forged into two golden lions’ heads with ruby eyes staring upwards. The sword was all gold and red and black, garnished in her family’s wealth. Widow’s Wail, Cersei thought hollowly, staring down at her son’s blade. A sword that Joffrey had named hours before making a widow wail.

Cersei had taken to sleeping with Widow’s Wail beside her, clutching it for protection and carrying it with her at all times. She had always wanted to carry a sword, but not like this. Nobody else could be relied upon, Cersei had nothing but the blade. It was the very last weapon with which to defend herself. Widow’s Wail. Joffrey had wielded it for an hour, Tommen never touched it at all.

Father should have gifted the other sword to me, Cersei thought, not to Jaime.

Cersei raised her head, to stare at where her father was looking at her from across the throne room. Tywin Lannister stood strong and proud, his arms folded and a disapproving gaze lingering in his eyes. Her father stood and stared at her with that cold, quiet judgement she knew so well.

It was not my fault, Cersei could have screamed at her father. It was Tyrion. It was always Tyrion.

Her brother was by her side, strong and handsome with golden hair and both hands, clad in golden armour. Jaime – her lover, her warrior – had stood beside her throne for so long, but now he was walking away. Jaime had abandoned her. Cersei could have called out to him, but she knew he wouldn’t reply.

Her mother was standing by the columns, a blurred image. Joanna Lannister was faded; her features obscured by a haze and Cersei couldn't even focus on her. Cersei could have screamed for her mother, but there would be no response.

All of the ghosts were silent.

She saw Margaery Tyrell and Sansa Stark – two sweet and beautiful maidens, giggling behind their hands and glancing back to the queen with silent derision. They were eating lemoncakes along with Melara Hetherspoon, and shunning Cersei from their huddle.

She could see Robert standing by the wings of the hall. Robert stood as he had been in his prime; a tall giant, armoured and muscled like maid’s fantasy, clutching his warhammer with both hands. He was standing next to Rhaegar Targaryen – beautiful and proud in black silk and rubies – and they were both looking to Cersei with open scorn.

The great hall was empty, but they were surrounding her. Her family, her past, her sins. They were standing around her, staring and quietly mocking.

The crone. Cersei could see the Crone herself, the source of it all, standing at the very far corner of the hall and looming in the shadows. The other ghosts were blurred, but Cersei could so clearly make the twisted shape of Maggy the Frog.

The squat and warty woman was built like a warthog with crusty yellow eyes, no teeth, and pale green jowls. She was a hideous, ugly figure – the monster from a fairy-tale, her wrinkled face twisted in a quiet sneer and the faintest of smirks across her warty lips.

And that was the jape, a jest that had taken two decades for Cersei to realise. At the end, at the realisation of Maggy’s prophecy, Cersei was most hideous one of them all.

“... Maidens dances through the sky... in every lover’s sigh... smiles teach the birds to fly.... fly... fly...”

She stared down at her son’s wide, dead and empty eyes, and she could see her own bloody reflection in his irises. A monster from the fairy-tales.

She was a hag. Margaery’s fingernails had torn open Cersei’s cheeks, leaving gashes from her forehead down to her chin. Her face was clawed open, bloody and mutilated. Qyburn had attended to her, he had smeared foul poultries and bandages across her cheeks, but the scars were deep and ugly.

Cersei could not even look into her own reflection; the very image made her flinch.

It was more than just the face. Her whole body was fat and bloated. She could feel the dead baby inside of her, an unborn child killed when Margaery knocked her to the floor. Cersei could feel the pain in her gut, and there was blood dripping down the inside of her legs. Her hair was haggard like straw, her golden locks turning grey with stress and fear.

Her dress was stained red with gore, yet Cersei could not let go of Tommen’s bloody body. He still wore the nightclothes he had died in. She clung to her baby’s corpse so tightly it hurt, stroking his hair. Gold stained with red.

“... Seven Gods who made all...” Lancel’s voice sputtered. “... listening we should call... they see little children...”

The gods were all around her. The ghosts, the sins, the judgement... Cersei could see them surrounding her, as clear as the mockery in their eyes.

She was only waiting on the Stranger. She stared at the doors, and she waited for death. She waited for her little brother.

Tyrion is coming. She knew he was.

The prophecy had come true. Her children were dead, and the younger queen had struck her down. They only thing missing was her murderer, to wrap his hands around Cersei’s throat and finally finish it. Any second now, she expected to see Tyrion strutting through the door, his twisted face gloating as he swaggered in to claim her throne and her neck.

Her whole life was draped around her, vulnerable and exposed. So much effort and heartbreak spent trying to hold onto this jagged chunk of metal, and the sliver of gold atop her head.

She despised the blasted chair. Her hands and legs were nicked and bloody, covered in scabs and blistering wounds from where had pricked and cut herself on the iron barbs. For so long she had coveted this seat, and yet the blades slashed and pained her.

Where did it all go wrong? Cersei thought quietly. Why did I fight for this? Maybe I could have surrendered, maybe I could have run. I might have taken Tommen and fled. I might have just left.

She could have left any time. Cersei could have taken Ned Stark’s offer; she might have fled to the Free Cities with her children and never looked back. Stark had given her that chance, and at that time Cersei had laughed at how foolish the offer of his was. Now that was the jest – that at the end of it, Ned Stark had been the wisest one of them all.

Widow’s Wail. It was a sword that her father had forged from Ned Stark’s own sword. A blade that symbolised their victory over the Starks. Widow’s Wail.

When Myrcella had died, Cersei had thrashed and raged and screamed. She had wept and wailed and fell to the floor. But then when Tommen died… she just felt nothing. She couldn’t remember even shedding a tear. She had already been dead inside. Cersei had known then that it was all fated. Nothing she’d ever done had mattered; the prophecy was real, and all that remained now was the coming of the valonqar.

In the shadows, Maggy the Frog was laughing at her.

She wondered how long Tyrion would make her wait. She wondered what cruel jests he would say before he killed her. “My dear sister, you look stunning!” the Imp’s phantom voice mocked in her ears. “Have you done something with your face? The blood and guts is a bold look, I must say. My, how you will revolutionise fashion in the capital!”

Maybe I should just let him. Maybe I should just sit and wait for death.

Tommen’s face was contorted in death, the edge of his lips raising upwards like a sneer. They were sneering. Even her father’s unsmiling face had sneered at her.

“… Smith labours day and night… Day and night… day and night… builds little children…”

The Imp’s words haunted her eyes – the words he had written in her little baby’s blood. “I warned you, dear sister,” his voice crackled in her ear, over and over again.

I warned you. If Cersei had any tears left, she would have cried. Instead, all that came out was a harsh cackle of laughter. She was laughing so hard each breath was like a sob. I warned you!

They should place those words upon my tomb, she thought, struggling to breathe through the chuckles. ‘Here lies Queen Cersei Lannister – I warned you’.

It was always the Imp.

“… stands before the foe…” the thing that was once Lancel muttered. “… us where e’er we go… sword and shield and spear and bow…”

She could hear the sound of screams and shouts, of loud crashes against hard wood. They were through the gates, they were charging against the Holdfast. Her men had tried to barricade the doors, but it wasn’t enough. Half of the queen’s men had already deserted, and the other half were only fighting because they missed their chance to run.

It could have worked. Maybe, if Tommen were still alive… maybe if Qyburn hadn’t deserted her… maybe if she even had a few more of his constructs still serving her. Maybe if the ghosts hadn’t been so spiteful. Maybe she could have risen from the ashes.

‘Maybe’. Are there any words more haunting than ‘maybe’? The scheme that she had spent months working towards had succeeded – she had successfully destroyed the Great Sept and burned the High Sparrow alive. The Kettleblacks, the nobility, the septons and septas – all slain. She had judged those who would presume to judge her. And yet it was still useless, because Tyrion had still butchered her babes. She hadn’t broken free of the trap quick enough.

“Tyrion,” Cersei said quietly to the empty hall. “Are you there, Tyrion? I know you’re listening.”

But, still, the trebuchets had been primed and loaded, and the men had been given their final orders from the queen. If she lost, Cersei wanted to make sure everyone else lost too. All those hostages, all of those pretty little girls… they would fly rather than walk free.

She could feel the mobs at the gates, she could feel the boots charging down the corridor…

Any moment now. The Imp was going to strangle her, just as he did that whore. Perhaps he’d use her corpse as a bedwarmer, or he’d have her naked torso body mounted on a spike. There were no limits to an Imp’s depravity…

She had the sword. She refused to die so easily. She would skewer the little brother before she fell, one last act of spite. Widow’s Wail.

“Where are you, Tyrion?” Cersei demanded to the cavernous, gloomy hall. “I know you’re here. I know you are!”

There was no reply, nothing but Lancel’s incessant mumbling.

Cersei sat on the throne, staring at the door.

She could hear the heavy footsteps of boots, her whole body freezing with the sound. She remembered the tale Jaime had told her once – of Ned Stark being the first into the throne room, the first to find Jaime sitting on the Mad King’s throne with the king’s blood staining his blade.

Who will be the first this time?

And finally the great oak doors were pushed apart, armoured men storming through the doorway, blades in hand. The wood crashed against the stone walls, and Cersei heard the sound of fighting from the hall, the echoes of blades cracking together, the screams and grunts of the dying. The soldiers shambling through the doors were bloodied and worn, and they glared around the throne room suspiciously.

They wear red. Their swords swept side to side, men staring over the empty hall filled with ghosts. They looked wary and exhausted, wheezing for breath, but pale-faced under their helms and clutching their swords and shields tightly. They wore cloth-of-red tabards over plate and mail, marked with the roaring lion but the fabric stained with mud and dust. Lannister men.

There were fifteen soldiers – all of them bloodied men-at-arms who pushed their way through the heaviest fighting, Cersei’s dead heart pounded in surprise. Not the Imp.

The man at the front wore a lion’s head helm, one of the teeth of the gaping steel maw cracked from a blade that must have very nearly cut open his skull. Even from across the distance of the Great Hall, Cersei recognised the man instantly.

“Uncle,” Cersei called coldly, and she clutched her boy a little closer.
Ser Kevan’s eyes widened in horror as he looked upon the scene. The bloodied, pregnant and disfigured hag of a queen, cradling the dead king in her arms. “By the Gods…!”

The gods had nothing to do with this. The men looked at her with horror, stepping forward like boys approaching a demon. The ghosts faded away around them, the tapping of cautious steel boots filling the cavernous. None of them lowered their steel, a faint mumble of fear rising from the gaggle of soldiers.

“Cersei…” Ser Kevan growled lowly, his eyes turning to Tommen’s corpse. “What did you do? What did you do??”

“You refused to act, ser,” Cersei replied. There was no emotion. She was dead inside, as dead as the babe in her stomach. “So I acted instead. I destroyed our enemies.”

I did what was needed.

Ser Kevan’s gaze turned towards the lurching figure of Lancel, and his whole body froze. The men were mummuling, looking around the hall with quiet fear. The ghosts were staring at them.

“It is forbidden to bare steel in the presence of your king.” Cersei ordered, still cradling Tommen’s head. “Lower your weapons, your liege commands you. Bow before your king.”

“You… you…” Ser Kevan gasped, his throat choking. Lancel was still lurching by the side of the Iron Throne, his feet scraping slowly across the stone. “Lancel?” Ser Kevan shouted finally. “Lancel, is that you?”

Most others of Qyburn’s work had ended up scarred and disfigured beyond all recognition, but Lancel looked almost whole. The boy was recognisable even through the twisting scars and black veins. He looked almost fresh. Almost alive, if not for his blank expression.

Lancel didn’t reply. He didn’t even twitch. “Lancel, my boy!” Ser Kevan begged. “Lancel!”

“… close your eyes, you shall not fall… close your eyes not fall… close eyes shall fall not…”

Lancel mumbled. “… they see you… see you… little children…”

Kevan’s mouth dropped, his face bone pale. He looked like he might have screamed, but he could not breathe.

“Ser Lancel,” Cersei ordered. “Step forward.”

Lancel’s waist sagged, and his torso drooped against the stone. No hesitation, not doubt or disobedience. Nothing but perfect compliance to her commands. The perfect soldier. The perfect Lannister.

“Ser Lancel is a loyal subject, uncle,” Cersei said lowly. “He obeys me, learn from his example. Now lower your weapons. It is good you are here; your men must secure the Red Keep against the peasant mobs.”

“What did you… what did you…?” Kevan gasped. He looked scared to even approach. Lancel was bowed so deeply he was nearly doubled over.

“I did what I had to do,” Cersei growled. “They took everything from me, but I will take it back.
We must secure the Red Keep. We must find Lord Qyburn again – he has the skills that we need. You are still sworn to Tommen Baratheon, ser.” She clutched his body a bit tighter. “And your king still commands you.”

Ser Kevan didn’t reply. His mouth was wide, his eyes fixed on his son, and his gaze slowly turned towards Cersei, and then to the dead king.

“The proof stands before your very eyes. The proof of what we can accomplish,” Cersei said, motioning at Lancel. “The proof that the dead can be returned, that we can bring them back.” Cersei’s voice waivered slightly, and she grit her teeth. “I dreamt of it. I dreamt of them all returning to me.”

Her dreams… she could see the ghosts singing sometimes, she could hear the songs of screams. She had seen the skies turning black, and the dead returning. Her brother, her father, her children… House Lannister would rise again, she knew it would.

Lord Qyburn had promised it.

“Now your king commands you,” Cersei said finally, propping up Tommen’s head up to face them. “Do your duty.”

There was a long moment of silence in the cavernous hall. The only noise was Lancel’s muttering, and the distant howl of the fires.

“Arrest her.” Ser Kevan’s voice was queerly quiet, but then it waivered and broke into booming fury. “Arrest her! SEIZE HER!”

The Lannister men raised their swords and stepped forward. Cersei’s eyes widened. “No, you can’t – the king–” Another step – their eyes were so, so angry. Pale and furious gazes glowered at her from under helms. Can’t let them take my son, I won’t— “Stop them!”

I cannot, I will never surrender my son, never surrender him, never, ever, ever…

Lancel jerked into motion and staggered upright, his whole body convulsing. “See you… see you...!” Lancel mumbled, raising his hands to protect his queen. “… see you…”

The men-at-arms moved backwards, frightened and uncertain cries coming from them. “Lancel!” his father begged. “Lanc–”

Lancel didn’t have a sword. He didn’t need one. He shambled forward with sudden speed, slamming into a man and swinging his hands like clubs. The thud of bone against metal crunched through the cavernous hall, but Lancel didn’t even flinch. Bodies crashed, and bones cracked.

“See you!” Lancel howled. “See you little children!”

Crash. Lancel was surrounded by a dozen armed men, but there was no fear. No pause. He barged into a man so hard that the man toppled to the floor, his limbs flailing and raging. Fifteen against one, yet it was the fifteen that looked scared.

“LANCEL!” Ser Kevan screamed, and yet Lancel just lunged at another man-at-arms. His hands wrapped around the man’s neck, and Cersei heard the crack of a spine snapping.

Blades were slashing, screams of panic. Bodies charged forward, blades hacking down like axes. “No!” Kevan bellowed at his men. “Don’t hurt him! Don’t hurt him!”
“The Father’s face is stern and strong!” Lancel cried as he clawed out a man’s guts. “He sits! And judges right from wrong!”

Blood splattered, swords slashed. Cersei clutched her little boy to her chest with one arm, and with the other she fumbled for her sword, grasping for the handle. Her hands were trembling, hands jerking so hard that she nicked her own ankle against the black edge. Widow’s Wail…

“Little children!” Lancel cried between the spears and swords. “Little children!”

There was violence before her, and all Cersei could think of was protecting her baby. Her fingers wrapped around the pommel of the sword. I’m not ready to die, she realised suddenly. I’m not. I thought I was, but I’m not.

I must protect my babe.

It was pure shambling chaos; frantic bodies trying to wrestle Lancel’s relentless shape to the ground. Lancel’s arm snapped against a heavy shield, the bone splintering, but he didn’t even care. The men were panicking, forced backwards against Lancel’s fury and flailing limbs.

Cersei clutched Tommen tightly in her arms, heaved him upwards with all the strength she had, and she ran.

She skipped down from the Iron Throne, she turned and she sprinted as fast as her bloated and broken body could take her. Widow’s Wail was in her hand, but she couldn’t grip it firmly, she couldn’t swing it properly with her child’s weight over her shoulder. She gasped against the writhing agony in her stomach, but she didn’t pause. She just ran for her life, her heart racing in panic.

Can’t let the Imp take me. Kevan is working for the Imp, why didn’t I see it?

The longsword nearly fell out of her fingers as she staggered, but she didn’t stop. Widow’s Wail was a heavy blade to carry in a single hand, a cumbersome weapon for trembling fingers. She tried to cling onto both her baby and the sword, but they were sliding out of her bloody hands with every jagged step. She could barely even keep a hold of the sword, she couldn’t swing it…

“Cersei!” Ser Kevan boomed behind her. “Cersei!”

Her heels tapped against the stone, staggering and nearly falling with every step. Tommen’s limp weight was hanging over her shoulders, a dead weight that caused her to sway like a pendulum, but she didn’t stop sprinting. She pushed through the door and shambled up the stairs, nearly falling to her knees as she staggered.

Blood dripped across the stones with every step.

Cersei past the burst out onto the balcony of the Red Keep, son and sword in her arms, and she was already sprinting towards the top of the walls. She felt the smoke in the air and she saw King’s Landing burning in black and green.

She felt the sound of fighting throughout the city. She felt the earth rumble with sound of mobs. In the fury and outrage, the smallfolk turned out the Lannister soldiers – she could feel the drum of fighting all the way between Aegon’s High Hill and the Dragonpit atop Rhaenys’. Mobs of smallfolk were writhing, even as half the city blazed.

There was no escape, no way out of the Red Keep through the angry hordes. She could only hide, find a place for her and her babe to hide. Hide from the Imp.
The White Sword Tower loomed over the bay – a sharp and slim tower of four stories jutting from the walls of the inner keep. The pale white banners of the Kingsguard flapped limply in the wind, but the tower was deserted. It wasn’t even a conscious decision, but she was running towards it. She thought of all those times she had snuck into her brother’s quarters in the dead of night, those nights she ran to Jaime’s arms for comfort…

There were heavy boots behind her. Cersei just ran.

She could see the ghosts all around her, following her, wafting in the smoke. She saw Jaime shaking his head as he turned his back, she saw Tyrion’s evil sneer haunting from the shadows, and above them all she saw her father’s face glaring downward from the heavens.

The howl of the fires sounded like laughter. Tyrion and Maggy the Frog were laughing together.

…and the valonqar shall wrap his hands around your pale little white throat and choke the life from you…

There were bloody tears in her eyes, the red staining her vision and she could barely see.

Cersei shambled through the door towards the spiral stairs. She made it up half a dozen steps before she finally toppled. Tommen’s weight dragged her down, and she cracked against the hard marble stones. The pain in her gut caused her to writhe – tears stinging against the bloody cuts on her face as she tried to squirm.

The Valyrian steel clattered against the stone as she tripped, but her flailing fingers groped for it. Widow’s Wail.

She clung to her baby boy’s shoulders, trying to lift him off the ground but she couldn’t find the strength. She needed to run, needed to flee, but she couldn’t leave her son behind. She couldn’t let go, she couldn’t unhook her hands…

She heard footsteps stepping up the stairs to the White Sword Tower, a man panting for breath. Ser Kevan was following, her uncle staring at her with wide, white eyes as she crawled on the ground.

She wheezed for breath through the sobs, trying to pull her baby up from the floor, trying to shake him back to life. “We can save him!” Cersei cried. “We can bring my boy back! We must bring him back!”

Ser Kevan didn’t reply. He just stepped closer. “Don’t you understand?” she screamed through the bloody tears. “He’s coming to kill me… Tyrion is going to destroy me!”

There was a pause, and then Ser Kevan shook his head. “He already has,” her uncle said quietly.

That was the last thing she managed to hear, and then Ser Kevan lunged. Cersei could only gasp as fingers of lobstered steel wrapped around her neck. Her fingers curled, grasping against the hilt of Widow’s Wail, but it slid straight out of her grip. She tried to swing it feebly, but Kevan swatted the blade away with an elbow. Her family’s sword knocked out of Cersei hands, useless.

The longsword clattered against the stone and fell clunking down the spiral staircase, the steel chiming while Cersei squirmed. The widow wailed.

She couldn’t breathe, she couldn’t…

No. Cersei refused to die. She could not die, not before she saw the Imp for a final time. She would drag him into the dark with her.
A strangled cry broke her throat, and Cersei pummelled at Kevan. She beat and scratched and tore, but her uncle grimaced and pushed her down, redoubling the force, grunting from behind two hands. Cersei could feel her neck screaming, her vision darkening at the edges, but she refused…

Her fingernails scratched at Kevan’s helm, into his face, clawing desperately. Trying to find leverage, trying to draw blood…

Couldn’t breathe, couldn’t…

Her eyes veered over Kevan’s shoulder, and they bulged.

She could see him.

The Imp stood there, grinning saucily with mismatched eyes, standing beside a hole in the wall. He cocked his head, like some grotesque demon. “Now the debt is paid,” he cackled. He lunged at her, and her brother’s hands clenched over her uncle’s, and they squeezed.

Maggy the Frog stood above Cersei, screeching with laughter, as the crone’s gnarly, warty hands groped for her neck. “You were warned,” Maggy the Frog hissed, as she tightened her grip.

More came. More shadows – they were coming from the hallway, from the windows, from the walls. Her eyes swelled fit to burst.

She could see them. She could see them all.

The Tyrell whore, black-faced and ruined. She laid her fingers atop her uncle’s, clenched her fingers about Cersei’s throat, and squeezed. Eddard Stark, grim-faced and grey-eyed, with a weeping seam about his neck. Robert, fat and milky-pale, with entrails hanging from his gut. Her father, scowling and judging and decomposing. Her brother, blank and distant, with fingers pink and gold…

So many more. They were all strangling her… all of those hands around her throat…

Her struggles weakened. Ser Kevan grunted, and slammed her backwards onto the stone floor.

The smallfolk, the soldiers, those killed in the wars, those burnt in the cities. Hundreds, thousands of them. They were nameless shadows writhing around her – smoky hands gripping at her neck.

The dead had returned, but not her family, not her babes. All those she had killed, all those she had hated, all those she had feared. They had risen from the hells. They had come for her, all of them, together. They all sought her neck, laid their hands atop Kevan’s, and they squeezed.

Their eyes met hers, and they hated.

Strangled by a sea of ghosts, couldn’t breathe… couldn’t…

“Thank you for the crown, dear sister!” The Imp howled above it all. “I shall put it to the finest use.”

Cersei’s clutching fingers went limp, her lips stammered, and she stared in a wordless, choking horror.
Something cracked, and the world went dark.

The Little Brother

“Raise your shield!” the master-of-arms ordered, shouting above the sound of whacking wooden swords whacking together. “Step forward! Strike! Shield! Strike! Shield!”

Kevan complied, trading blows with Tygett on command. He followed the steps, just as the man commanded. Even as a young and fierce boy of nine, his little brother nearly got the better of him. “Keep your shield high, boy,” their mentor warned, as Tygett’s blade nearly broke his defence.

Kevan did so, but he blocked twice as often as he attacked. In the benches near the practice yard, Genna whooped and cheered with every clash.

“Kevan!” a hard voice ordered. “To me. I want to talk.”

At once, the fight stopped. The voice was firm and sure, and not even the master-at-arms protested it. The tone was so strong that there was absolutely no doubt it would be followed.

He saw Tywin looking to him, his brother’s speckled green eyes fixed in an unyielding glare. Even as a young man of six and ten, Tywin had a presence, a power, to him that none could match.

Kevan dropped his sword and he followed. Behind him, Tygett bristled. “How come you never spar in the yards, brother?” the boy demanded.

“How come you never spar in the yards, brother?” the boy demanded. “Because I deal with sharper edges,” Tywin replied smoothly, already walking away. “Go back to your wooden sword.”

Kevan couldn’t remember Tywin ever training with a sword, barely even picking up a blade. And yet, still, there could no doubt that Tywin was the best of them.

There was a fire inside his elder brother, Kevan remembered, a will that reshaped the world around him. Tywin seemed to simply wish it, and then he would see it done. Even Father struggled to challenge his eldest son.

“Father is planning on having you sent to Tarbeck Hall, to squire for Lord Walderan,” Tywin explained dourly, as they stepped towards the Stone Garden of the Rock. “Walderan offered for you to earn spurs next to Tion.”

“He… he did?”

“Aye, and I will not allow it.” His voice was grim. “Lord Walderan overreaches himself, he wants a son of Lannister as a hostage, not a squire. No, brother – I will not permit you to be taken to Tarbeck Hall.”

It would likely be another argument against Father again, another shouting match until Lord Tytos was red in the face. “I…” Kevan’s throat choked, trying to think of an alternative. “What of Lord Roger Reyne? He was looking to take a squire.”

Lord Roger was one of the finest warriors of the west. Ser Kevan would have been proud to squire for him, but Tywin’s gaze just darkened at the very suggestion.

“The Red Lion?” Tywin’s lips thinned, and the shadows of Casterly Rock cast a sharp scowl over his features as they walked into the castle proper. “I think not. House Reyne is too grasping by far, and Ellyn Reyne made a mummer’s stage of Casterly Rock. They make japes of us, and laugh behind our backs. She and her house have much to answer for – they will get naught more than what they deserve from Lannister.”

Kevan’s mouth flapped slightly, but he didn’t know how to reply. Tywin spoke with such hostility towards a slight decades past, but who was Kevan to advise his brother on such a matter?

“No, I say that Ser Humfrey Swyft would be better for your knighthood,” Tywin continued without pause. “He is young and bold, not an old man. Ser Humfrey will see you trained with steel, while you’d only be serving wine for Lord Walderan. You should earn your spurs quickly, Kevan; this realm is changing and we must be ready for it.” Tywin turned to look at him, raising a doubtful eyebrow. “And you are too old to be playing with wooden swords, brother.”

“I…” I enjoy sparring with Tygett. “You are right.” Kevan nodded. “I will be more mindful.”

Tywin nodded. “Come, there is much to discuss,” Tywin ordered, turning around and striding away. “I hear news from Tyrosh that the Black Dragon is stirring again. An alliance has said to have formed in the Disputed Lands, and this Maelys the Monstrous,” Tywin said with a quiet scoff, “has murdered his cousin Daemon for control of the Golden Company, and chased his sisters into exile. There could be war in less than a year, and House Lannister will be ready for it.”

Even as a boy, Tywin had been strong. Tygett had grown to be a fury with a blade, Gerion had been taller and bolder, and yet Tywin was always the strongest. House Lannister had been in decline under Father’s rule, but Tywin brought their family to strength after strength.

The scene blurred, the memory fading. His entire life, all that time following. He had fought in over a half a dozen wars in his lifetime, seen dozens of battles, commanded thousands of men, and he had been behind Tywin every step of the way.

Kevan had always been the little brother.

Perhaps if Tywin were still here, none of this would have happened. Tywin had been the great lion, the protector of the pride. Tywin wouldn’t have lingered for so long outside the Red Keep’s gates, begging with Tyrells, torn in indecision. In cowardice.

Tywin had been the one born to rule, to lead; not him.

Ser Kevan just felt numb. He couldn’t even feel his hands as they squeezed around Cersei’s throat. His heart was drumming, his body was trembling, and there was just so much rage… he could do nothing but squeeze.

All of that frustration, the anger, the despair… it was like he could squeeze it all into Cersei through his fingers.

He couldn’t hear Cersei gag through the pounding of his blood. He couldn’t hear a thing. He squeezed until her bloody face turned purple, and he watched her eyes bulge. They felt like somebody else’s hands.

Kevan’s entire life flashed before his eyes in that moment. He remembered the best times in his life; the first time he saw his wife, the first time he held his son, the moment he felt his daughter’s fingers curled upon his. Cornfield wasn’t a grand castle like Casterly Rock, it didn’t have vaults of gold or great tunnels, but it was warm and homely, surrounded by fields of grain overlooking Red Lake. Kevan would have been happy settling down in his little keep with his family, with his wife and his twin boys, and his sweet little baby girl…
His brother had wanted the world, but Kevan had only ever wanted his family.

Tywin had loved his family too, but it had been a different sort of love. Tywin had idolised Joanna since the first moment he saw her as children. Their cousin had been beautiful and intelligent and radiant, the only woman in the world that could match Tywin’s strength of will. Tywin had gone nose to nose with his liege over Joanna, drawing the ire of his king as he courted her. Joanna was the only woman Tywin had ever had to chase, the only woman who could defy him.

Even after that incident with Aerys, Tywin had still loved her beyond all measure.

There had been a series of whores after Joanna’s death – most of them Kevan had provided, all under the utmost discretion – but Tywin had never married again, because no other woman could replace the void that Joanna had left behind.

Tywin had always judged Jaime as a younger version of himself, no matter the boy’s balking. In a manner alike, Tywin had only ever compared Cersei to Joanna. For so many years, Tywin had educated, empowered, and moulded them both that they might carry on his family’s legacy…

Both of the twins fell lacking to their father’s expectations.

“She drives me to despair, that girl,” Tywin had admitted to Kevan once; in a rare, rare moment that his brother lowered his guard. Tywin looked exhausted, slumping his shoulders in a way he never did except in the most trusted of company. “She challenges me on every front, and it seems half my life is spent trying to clean up her messes. There are times I wish I could just throttle that child.”

_They always said that I never had a thought that Tywin did not have first._

His hands finally slackened and Cersei dropped to the ground. Kevan stared in numb, quiet horror, and then stepped over the corpse.

_All I ever wanted was that small keep by the cornfields, with my flat-chested and homely wife, and my mewling children, _he thought hollowly. _All I ever…_

Yet his wife was dead, hung outside the cornfields along with his son and his baby girl. His brothers were dead, his cousins and his nephews…

The thought of his eldest son… his pride, his love… the thought of that scarred creature flailing before the Iron Throne…

He walked numbly up the stairs towards the top of the tower, to the chamber of the Lord Commander of the Kingsguard. He shambled into the Round Room and the weirwood shield table, not even glancing at the central podium on which rested the White Book.

His hands were red with queen’s blood, red dripping over white. He ambled through the empty rooms as quickly as he could, wheezing with every step. To think that, once, Kevan had dreamt of serving here… dreamt of taking a white cloak of his own…

He stepped out onto the balcony, and looked down over the world. The city was a sea of smoke and fire, roiling in the distance so far beneath him. His eyes flickered, from one horror to the next.

Nothing remained of the Great Sept of Baelor. Flea Bottom, the Muddy Way, Merchant’s Circle, the Street of Steel, Cobbler’s Square… it was all incinerated. An ocean of viridian fire and a storm of smoke.
The Street of Sisters was consumed by a pit of fire, glowing like something bursting from the seventh hell. All around the former hall of the Alchemist’s Guild, there was nothing but an inferno, a hell of flames reaching for the sky.

The city is destroyed. Wildfire rained from above, and even from here he could taste the ash on his tongue. There was no sun, there was no sky. There was only a thick and greasy cloud of ash, looming over the pyre of the world.

In the distance, through the smoke and over the Blackwater, he could see the shadow of the army. Aegon Targaryen was already at the walls. The dragon reborn, and the lions slaughtered before its claws.

His family’s legacy began at the Sack of King’s Landing. Perhaps it was only fitting it should end the same way.

Everything that Tywin had ever built, everything he had ever worked for… it was all going up in flames. I’m sorry, brother, Kevan thought numbly. I’m sorry!

The thick black smoke blocking out the sun felt like Tywin’s shadow above him, looming over them all. Ser Kevan stood atop the tower, staring across the burning cityscape.

We’re all going to one of seven hells anyways. Might as well as choose this one.

He closed his eyes, and took a step forward off the balcony of the White Tower. The wind screamed in his ears, and the smoke and fire rushed up to meet him.

I’m sorry, Tywin. I’m so sorry.

Chapter End Notes

Author Notes:

Well, I tried to get this out for Halloween, but I'm a bit late. Happy Halloween anyway.

Quick note about the timeframe: the story started its divergence at around 20/10 299 AC. We are now on the 1/3 301 AC. There's been a few places where I've fiddled with travel distances and synchronicity, but overall I think I've kept the story fairly in-line. It also means that a large chunk of events around Winterfell and around King's Landing have been running pretty much simultaneous with each other. I'm planning on jumping back to Jon where we left him before the southern interlude, for the last arc of the story.

Overall, I intended on this book taking about 400,000 words (roughly the size of canon books), but it looks like I'm way over and it will be around 800,000. I'm not happy about that, but, in my defence, I can safely say that I have fulfilled the promise I gave on chapter 1 - this story has most certainly been written faster than the Winds of Winter.

I'm also planning on going backwards in time slightly at the very start of the next book, to resolve events happening in Meereen.

The Hand of the King

It was a cool and grim day when the two armies met on the battlefield. The fields were green and the grass slick with dew, and the rosroad was left a muddy squelch by the stomping of boots. The sun was bright but a cold, sharp wind cut through the plains, and the oak and elm trees of the kingswood rippled in the faint wind.

The banners stretched out around Jon, and regiments of men partitioned into strips like a farmer’s fields. It was only very early morn, but they were all restless. Jon had forced himself to get some sleep the night before, but all around him he saw red and weary eyes.

It was the preparation, the wait for the battle, that was half as gruelling as the battle itself. The anticipation was like a bowstring shivering under the pressure, the arrow begging for release.

There was already some fighting on the fields and in the treelines – but only skirmishes really. Jon could hear bowstrings snapping in the distance, like the chirping of insects. The enemy’s scouts were clashing in the treelines against Black Balaq’s scouts; maybe a few dozen men testing the other’s bow range. The rose lord is probing us, and us them. Both sides were searching for weaknesses while they scouted out the fields and woods, but the bulk of the men just stood and waited on the road. Watching.

Jon Connington was on the rear ranks surrounded by the reserves, as he stood upon a platform to stare out over the field, built from barrels and wooden crates stacked on top of each other. Many of the company’s commanders stood with him; Harry Strickland, Lord Clement Piper, Lord Caspor Wylde, Lord Lester Morrigen, Lord Tristan Darry, Lysono Maar, Ser Ronald Vance, Ser Duncan Strong and Ser Pykewood Peake waiting in various states of unease. Squires and pages served wine and smoked mutton, but there was little talk and more silence.

“Watkyn!” Harry Strickland called to his squire. “Bring some of those pastries we have in the pantry. I feel the need for something sweet.” He looked to Lord Clement Piper, standing next to him. “Would you care for a treat, my lord?”

“I think not,” Lord Clement replied chilly. Connington glanced at Harry, but he didn’t speak.

“I can never stand going into battle on an empty stomach,” Harry tutted, as he swallowed a great gulp of wine. “I find that a bit of a feast beforehand helps it go a lot faster.”

There was no reply. The squire, Watkyn, tottered up a few seconds later, bringing a platter of pastries. Watkyn moved to offer Jon one, but then he met the lord’s gaze and quickly retreated.

“How long is the rose lord going to make us wait?” Ser Pykewood Peake complained, as he paced.
“As long as he chooses to,” Lord Connington replied, standing firm and stoic. “I am in no rush.”

He remembered Myles Toyne once japed that every battle was like a woman. Jon had bristled with the comment at the time, but there was some truth to it; every battle did have its own taste, its own experience. Some were quick and dirty in backstreets, but others were glorious, passionate affairs that defined a man’s life. Jon Connington had seen a dozen wars and as many conflicts, but only five true battles. This was his sixth.

His first, the Battle of the Bells, had been frantic, rushed and hectic – so crazed that it felt like the world was on fire. His men had charged through the Stony Sept to the panicked chiming of the bells, as loud as his heartbeat. They had kicked down the doors and ravaged every building in the town, and then wrestled and heaved with the rebels in the town square. Jon had been young then; full of youth and arrogance.

And, like any affair, the Battle of the Bells had left Jon shamed and bitter by the end of it. The battle that ruined me.

The Battle of the Roseroad had yet to begin, but it already had a different taste to it. It felt slow, careful, and more forceful. The two armies had spent days preparing, and they came together gradually. Jon was more experienced now; he led from the rear, surveyed the whole of the battlefield with his own eyes, and commanded from afar. Even with the first boom of horns and the stomping feet of men, Jon’s passions were cold and muted. His heartbeat barely even twitched.

It was slow and measured. The Reachmen wanted to get to Oldtown, and the Golden Company wanted to reach King’s Landing. There was no uncertainty; just two hosts of men blocking the other’s way.

They had been creeping towards each other slowly, barely half a mile between them. The army that abandoned their defensive formations to attack first would lose an advantage. So, instead, they both waited. Who will blink first?

“Lord Connington,” a squire called, running up the steps and bowing. “Lord Connington!”

The boy was young, with bright silver blond hair that was distinctive in any light. Oshio, Jon recalled as he turned and frowned. “Your armour is ready, Lord Hand,” Oshio explained, bowing deeply again.

Jon only nodded. He stepped down from the platform, and went to go get dressed. He forced himself to keep his gait smooth and calm. No rush, he ordered to his body with pure force of will.

He walked straight towards a large pavilion, marked by the red dragon of the king. All around him he heard the drumbeat of hammers; their blacksmiths had been working day and night. Even on the eve of the battle, there were still countless swords to be sharpened and platemail to be battered. Camp followers and washerwomen fletched arrows, and the last-minute whores would be walking bow-legged. The grounds were filled with knights strapping on metal, and squires rushing around frantically.

Lord Connington had been quite prepared to go into battle wearing chainmail and boiled leathers, but King Aegon insisted on having full plate commissioned for his Hand. Jon had conceded that full armour was prudent, he could not object.

There was a crowd as he approached the pavilion, and he saw the four white cloaks standing stiffly outside. Aegon’s Kingsguard had grown recently, with two solid additions named; Ser Tristan Ryger and Ser Olyvar Yronwood. Ser Tristan was young, but newly knighted and a close friend to Lord Tully – an ideal companion to appease the riverlords. Ser Olyvar was the grandson of Lord Anders Yronwood, and a large and well-built man with a stocky frame. Both of noble blood, both of good standing – far better than the first two that Aegon chose.

There was a crowd around the pavilion, with Ser Lymond Pease and Ser Torman Peake both petitioning king’s attention. The white cloaks kept them all others back, but nobody dared to stop the Hand of the King as Lord Connington stepped through.

As he stepped into the royal pavilion, he saw the king being strapped for war, and Jon’s breath froze.

“My Lord Hand,” Aegon called, and Jon momentarily faltered.

King Aegon Targaryen looked like the Conqueror reborn. His armour was stunning; a masterpiece from a dozen smiths. King Aegon wore black steel with a golden trim, and his gauntlets, greaves and pauldrons bore jagged barbs stretching outwards; the metal so smooth the points rippled like fire and making his armour horned and jagged like a dragon’s scales.

The black was highlighted by a striking exuberance of gold, and the king wore a red cape and surcoat bearing his family’s colours. There were even ridges protruding from the back of the breastplate, steel shaped like stubby wings from his shoulderblades.

“Well,” Aegon said softly, a smile spreading over his lips. “What do you think?”

Jon blinked. His gaze flickered towards the helm lying by a stool – a black full helm shaped like a dragon’s maw – with great white diamond eyes. He had expected rubies, but instead Aegon’s armour was decorated in diamonds and dark sapphires. White and violet against black and gold.

It took five of the king’s squires to mount the armour upon him, struggling with the clasps and intricate fastenings. There were more cutlets, gorgets, spaulders, gardbraces and couters than Jon had ever seen – so much gilded steel fitting together seamlessly.

You could buy a castle for that armour’s worth. The king looked twice the size with it all strapped on to him. “It is… the steel will be too heavy, Your Grace.”

“The metal is very light,” Aegon reassured. “Cumbersome, yes, but I’m told that nothing will grant me better protection.”

Jon paused. “Is that another gift from our friends in Pentos?” he asked.

“Yes, Myrish workmanship, none finer,” Aegon nodded. Those magisters are paying a king’s ransom towards our campaign.

Aegon waved his squires away, and stepped forward. The plate armour was so expertly sized that all the metal didn’t even rattle. It looked more ceremonial over practical for what Jon was comfortable with, but on pure extravagance alone…

Aegon grinned, and he looked stunning. Young and handsome and bold. By the Gods, Rhaegar.

“You should get dressed quickly, my lord,” Aegon advised. “It seems restless outside.”

“More bluster than threat, I think, Your Grace.” He was still looking at the armour, trying to imagine Rhaegar wearing it. “It is a common technique; antagonise your foe by constantly threatening the attack. They are sending out scouts, they are moving their horses through their camp, but no charge comes. Nothing but bloodless skirmishes so far, but they hope to torture us with anticipation."

“It is working,” Aegon said, quietly grimacing. “I have not slept soundly for near two nights.”

“And yet they are hurting too,” Jon said firmly. “They have the larger army, so why do they waste time with such games? No, let them taunt – I will not be the one to attack first.”

“The queen’s trial?” Aegon asked.

“Either today or tomorrow, I believe. I assure you that the rose lord will be distracted.”

“Very well,” Aegon said, taking a deep breath. “It is… I have never been this close to the Iron Throne in eighteen years. And many in the Golden Company have been waiting their entire lives. This moment, it’s just so…”

Jon paused. “Are you prepared, Your Grace?”

“I am.”

“We are still at a disadvantage in numbers,” Lord Connington warned. “We must counter that with patience and calm.”

“And do you fear I might charge against the enemy single-handedly?” Aegon retorted. His hand instinctively moved closer to his hip, hovering over the injury on his thigh. “Worry not, I learn from my mistakes. I shall by sticking firmly to the formation and the battle-plan. I know my place in this battle.”

Aegon’s gaze turned towards the far side of the tent, where Blackfyre sat upon a satin cushion, still sealed in its pine box. As many guards had been assigned to that blade as there were protecting the king. Aegon had yet to wield Blackfyre in public, but the moment was soon.

“Already the rumours of my sword have started to spread,” Aegon explained, a smile on his lips. “I have shown it to my commanders, and the talk is spreading through camp. When I ride out holding my family’s blade, the men will cheer and the enemy will falter.”

_They will indeed._ Yet Jon still couldn’t relax. “And where will you be riding?” he pressed.

The king chuckled. “You worry worse than an old hen, Lord Hand,” he teased. “Perhaps we should reconsider your sigil.”

He ignored the jest. “Your presence on the battlefield will help rally the troops, but do not lose sight of the risks. We must consider the stakes.”

Jon did not trust the gods. It would be the ultimate cruelty for them to come so far, but for the king to die in battle outside the gates of the capital. Jon had nightmares imagining that moment – Aegon’s death in some freak accident on the battlefield. Perhaps an arrow to the back of the head. _I must stop that from happening._

“Oh, I have,” Aegon said, turning solemn. “I know what we are fighting for, believe me. I have rehearsed the route with the Kingsguard, the commanders are all aware; I shall ride in formation from across the archers to the reserves, and then I shall do rounds of our camp with the royal regiment behind me. I shall reinforce the reserves, and ensure that every man can see my presence. When it comes time to charge, I shall swap my horse for an elephant and ride out with the second rank.”
“The fourth rank,” Jon argued. “The second rank will be too close to the arrow rain.” I do not want you within fifty yards of danger.

The king shook his head, long silver hair wafting. “There we must disagree,” Aegon said firmly. “I promised not to seek out danger, but you are fooling yourself, Lord Hand, if you think I will run from it either. I shall be in my proper place in the battle.”

“Your Grace—”

“No, Lord Hand,” Aegon said firmly. “I will not let the men view me as a cowardly king. There are times when I think you would prefer if I was sent off to the fall-back camp along with Arianne and the women.”

I would, actually. They had left their previous extremely well-fortified camp several leagues down the roseroad, and any not involved in the battle had retreated there. The Princess of Dorne tried to protest, but Jon had refused to allow Arianne or her companions on the battlefield. If the battle went badly, then the Golden Company would be retreating back to that camp too.

Jon could have argued, but he knew it was useless. The king was as stubborn as his father.

Aegon Targaryen is a good man, strong and decent, he thought. Sometimes, though, it seemed like decency was the bane for any king or commander. A leader couldn’t care about what was right or moral – a leader could focus only on what was necessary.

He heard shouts calling for the king. Aegon stood in his glorious armour, and moved to pick up his sword. He held up Blackfyre in both hands as if it were a holy relic. His lips were pursed, his eyes narrowed. “I shall see you on the battlefield, Griff,” Aegon whispered, trembling slightly in quiet apprehension, and then stepped out of the tent.

Jon was left standing alone in the pavilion, and he took a deep breath.

“You are more important than all others,” Lord Connington had told Aegon once, after the siege of Storm’s End, while the king lay pale and bloody in the infirmary bed. “Anybody else, myself included, is expendable and replaceable. But if you die, then this whole war is lost. The kingdom will be doomed, and your family will end. You risk more than just your own life.”

“I cannot expect men to fight for me if I won’t fight myself,” Aegon had protested, puffing his chest out even while smeared in bloody bandages. “I have a duty to them! The men under me deserve better than a craven of a king!”

“They deserve nothing!” Jon had almost screamed. “Your first duty is to the realm, not to a battle. And for that you must stay alive, my king.” His voice had flickered. “Every boy wants to be a hero, but a king must learn sacrifice. Sometimes we must sacrifice the boy too.”

Aegon opened his mouth to yell, but Jon cut him off. “Your own mother knew that,” Jon insisted, “when she swapped you for the pisswater prince. She took another babe into her bedchamber and left you with someone else, but Elia knew that you needed to survive.” The act had been greatest thing that Elia had ever done for Rhaegar.

Aegon’s face had twisted, his jaw clenched in agony, but he didn’t object. Then the maester had arrived to bleed and cauterise Aegon’s messy arrow wound, using leeches and a burning poker.

He will be a grand king, Jon thought solemnly. A king that will triumph over monsters. And I must see him on the path.
Lord Connington’s own armour was sitting upon a mannequin at the far side of the pavilion. It was good steel, fit for any lord on the battlefield, but shabby and bare compared to the king’s. The metal was painted white and red, with two dancing griffins on the breastplate and a full-helm fashioned with wings protruding from the sides. It looked bright and colourful – in his youth, Jon would have happily ridden in such armour.

It is armour for a younger man, he thought with a suppressed sigh.

Two of Aegon’s squires came through the tent. They were both boys of twelve or thirteen; one was Dornish, the other from some riverlord. One from House Fowler, the other from Mooton, Jon recalled vaguely. “His Grace instructed us to help you dress, Lord Hand,” the Dornish squire said.

Jon didn’t even turn around, still staring at his armour. “Leave,” he ordered.

“My lord, you will need aid to fasten–”

“Leave.”

The squires faltered, but turned and walked away. It was only when he was alone in the pavilion that Jon’s posture slackened.

Lord Connington had insisted on dressing himself in isolation – he had claimed it was his mediation before the battle, even. Plate armour was a bitch to fasten with only a single pair of hands, but Jon had managed so far with a great deal of struggle. The truth was that Jon couldn’t allow anyone to lay eyes on him without his gloves and his long-sleeved tunic.

As Jon pulled off his left glove, his skin crackled like stone, grey and black. He even couldn’t curl his fingers properly. He barely had any dexterity at all in his left hand – and even his right was turning stiff at as well. On his left arm, the dead, necrotic skin had reached all the way up to his shoulder, and now black veins were spreading over his chest.

Jon had kept the greyscale secret as best had he could, but it became more difficult with every passing day. Jon couldn’t hold a quill properly; he had to start dictating all of his letters to a maester to write. He had kept to a certain routine and kept himself aloof, such that nobody would notice that he could hardly grip.

Septa Lemore had been started to get suspicious, Jon knew, as he winced every time he dismounted a horse. Lord Connington had been forced to isolate himself, so none could recognise it like the Imp had.

I might be able to hold a sword in the battle, Jon considered, as he tried to flex his hands. But only if I force my fingers around the hilt. He most certainly wouldn’t be able to let go of the sword again. His fingers were as good as locked in position whenever they were moved. My muscles are stiff and dead.

It had been a year since the incident at the Bridge of Dreams now. Jon always knew that the greyscale would catch up to him, but he had prayed for more time than this. Some stonemen had ten years, but it looked like he would only have a few more months.

He cast another look at the armour. One more battle, he told himself. Just a bit longer.

It was a long and difficult exercise in frustration to force himself into the platemail despite one arm that was like stone. Jon had to squirm against the wall to push the hauberk on, and the gods alone knew how he was going to take it off.
He wore the armour, but he left the winged helmet behind on the stool.

Jon knew that he needed to start thinking about how it would happen. There could be a panic if the soldiers knew that an infected man was walking around their camp. Jon had taken care to wear thick gloves and keep himself isolated – but the Golden Company were veterans from Essos, and any world-worn man knew the threat that greyscale posed. They had all seen ships overcome by the plague, or the accursed villages of stonemen that haunted the Rhoyne. Greyscale and the grey plague occurred everywhere – from the damp Iron Islands to the jungles of Sothoros – but the waters of the Rhoyne were plagued by it more than most, and Volantis had struggled against its scourge for centuries. Mercenary companies were constantly offered coin by the Triarchs to cleanse the diseased lands with fire, but all but the most desperate sellswords refused such contracts. If the Lord Hand is revealed to be plagued, then the men will start to wonder if the king is as well.

Jon could not let that happen. Perhaps Lord Connington might fall in the battlefield, become a martyr to Aegon’s cause – except then his corpse would be collected and the silent sisters would recognise the disease, and the same problem would occur even after death. A better solution might be to just disappear, to walk off into the night and into the ocean – except then Aegon would suffer the eternal uncertainty over his fate.

Just a bit longer, he begged quietly to the gods. I just need a bit longer, and then I’ll find a solution.

As he finally stepped out the pavilion, he heard warhorns were blowing. It was past noon, the kingswood was tense, and he could feel the rousing of men.

“Lord Hand!” the Dornish page called, running through the sudden frenzy. “Your–”

“On my way,” Jon replied, breaking off into a jog as he rushed to the commander’s platform. The whole camp was rippling. The blacksmiths and farriers were finally packing up their trade, and rushing to retreat.

There were men flocking around the commander’s platform, but Jon forced his way through. “Is it time?” Jon demanded sharply.

“Black Balaq raised a flare,” Lord Tristan Darry replied. “The enemy is readying for a push.”

“Is it a feint?”

“I do not believe so,” Ser Pykewood said, peering through a Myrish glass as he shook his head. They could hear horns blasting across the field. Then it is time.

The men nodded, and rushed off without another word. Jon took his position on the commander’s platform, grimacing slightly as he folded his arms. Next to him, Harry Strickland had his boots off to massage his feet one last time, while his squire fumbled to clear the platform.

The sun was high, and Jon focused on the battlefield as the enemy lines started to shift. They were stepping forward, thousands of men moving into position. It was a slow charge, a careful one.

Twenty-three thousand men stood against them – an ocean of bodies rumbling closer.

Ser Denys Strong, Ser Lymond Pease, Humfrey Stone, and Ser Lorimas Mudd led the van, Jon told himself. Between his commanders, the seasoned officers had a lord’s fortune of gold on their arms. The Golden Company had fought more wars than most. They would not break.

Black Balaq commanded their archers and their bulwarks, and Jon had no fears concerning him. Black Balaq was meticulous in his duty, and had trained their bowmen to perfection. Already, the finest of their archers took their positions – launching arrows from great bows of goldenheart that had twice the range of any Westerosi bow.

The first wave of arrows rained from the sky as flickering shadows in the distance. Scores of bodies would be falling. And yet still, the flood of Reachmen never ceased.

Slowly, agonisingly slowly, the tides of men started to crash together. Lord Connington heard the bowstrings snap, like the rustling of a thousand leaves. The screams and war cries sounded like whispers on the wind.

They are all chanting different ballads, he realised. From the north, they were crying a Tyroshi marching song. From the south, they were chanting ‘Fire and Blood’. The Reachmen were shouting their own song – a sharp and rousing cry between the drumbeat of boots that Jon couldn’t recognise.

All of the noises blurred together, into one shapeless din.

Watching the battle from afar seemed so… distant. Subdued.

The first crash of men sent ripples through the camp, but Jon forced himself not to overreact. A battle wasn’t decided by the first wave or even the second. Wait, watch, he ordered himself, consider and then react.

“Signal the left flank,” Jon said to his frantic squire. “Move Ser Mudd’s command forward to assist the van.”

His hand felt numb. He couldn’t feel his grip; his fingers were stone. Still, he forced his hands around the hilt, and he didn’t let go.

“I see Rowan and Fossoway banners leading a cavalry charge on the north!” Lord Clement Piper called, looking through the spyglass. “Signal our horses to meet them.”

“Belay that!” Jon shouted sharply, causing Lord Clement to fluster. “We will not let them draw us into heavy battle. We have our battle lines and we will keep to them.”

“My lord, those cavalry could hurt our flanks unless we rout them!”

“Lord Yronwood is prepared to meet horses with spears,” Jon said firmly. “We hold the ranks and do not let them scatter us.”

He could see the Dornishmen shaping up to the west. Jon referred to Lord Yronwood, but he knew that, frustratingly, it was Obara Sand leading their front ranks of the spearmen. The bastard might be the only woman on the field today.

Even when the horrible woman fails me – and she will – Lord Anders Yronwood and Lord Franklyn Fowler will be more than capable of taking command, Lord Connington reminded himself.

“Unbowed, Unconquered!” the Dornishmen were booming, as their spears raised upwards. “For Elia, for Oberyn, for Dorne!”
On the front lines, the first charge seemed hesitant, careful. There was no great stampede of bodies, instead there were only two sides holding a wall of lances and daring the other to rush into them. The vanguard moved closer together step by step – long spears against long spears – all the while arrows rushed backwards and forwards overhead.

The bodies broke apart quickly, and it was less a great clash and more a frantic shuffle of spears and shield walls.

The conflict pressed against the centre hard initially, but then slowly spread outwards towards the left and right. Perhaps Lord Tarly was expecting the sellswords men to buckle in order to help the resist at the centre, but they didn’t. The Golden Company held position and waited for the fighting to reach them.

Lord Connington could see the battle formations writhe, but the lines bent and did not break. It was a dance of a thousand boots to the beat of warhorns.

The Tyrell forces tried to suffocate them, but the Golden Company held their formation. My officers are iron, Jon thought proudly, we will not lose in a contest of experience.

The first press was all on foot, a tightly pitched battle. The Fossoway cavalry harried them from the north, and then Crakehall cavalry circled from the southeast. The Tyrell forces have the numbers, it made sense for them to try to hold and encircle. This is a battle that will be decided from the fringes, not from the centre, Lord Connington decided.

Men were shouting to brace, but the enemy's cavalry didn’t charge. Instead they hovered just out of bow range – daring the Golden Company to follow – but no reply came. The Golden Company held their ground, and the mounted men didn’t dare to charge against such tight spears. Rather, their horses held position and waited for infantry to reinforce them.

From the hill, it looked as though the Tyrell were forming a glove to fit around the Company’s elliptical bulwark.

Lord Connington considered it, counting to ten heartbeats. Never react instantly in battle, Myles Toyne had told him, always count to ten before any decision.

Then, Jon shook his head. “No. A charge could be effective, but it would leave us too exposed afterwards. Signal a slow retreat instead,” he ordered. “The centre falls back, the left and right supports them. Let us straighten the ranks.”

Ser Pykewood looked aghast. “Fall back? Why sacrifice position–”

“I’m in no rush,” Jon replied coolly. “Let us be patient, and let them charge against us.”

The orders were passed to the squires, who ran to the drummers and signallers. Fires were set up, and the warhorns echoed over the field to pass the instructions.

The Tyrells outnumber us by over nine thousand men, Jon thought. And yet Lord Tyrell must be eager to see us off – he is desperate to return to both the Reach and to resolve the situation in King’s Landing. The longer I delay him here, the more dire he will become.

The Golden Company knew the risks, but they would not give the rose lord the quick battle he needed. Instead, his men fell back, step by step, keeping their lances high and holding the Tyrell
The arrow shafts littered the fields like twigs around them – a field of wooden grass protruding upwards from the soil.

Lord Connington held no concerns on the skill of the Golden Company – they were four thousand six hundred of the most experienced mercenaries in the world, at the very heart of the army. They knew what they fought for, they had been working towards for this campaign for decades. Jon’s greatest worries were the other allies; there were five thousand Dornish spearmen, some three thousand men from riverlords and stormlords combined, plus another one thousand five hundred assembled sellswords from both Westeros and the Free Cities were being kept in reserve.

Jon felt confident in the Dornish, somewhat confident in the riverlords, but the sellswords were the greatest worry. They were unproven, unreliable and possibly even disloyal – as lesser sellswords were wont to be. Lord Connington had taken care to structure the ranks accordingly.

The Reachmen kept on their push, but they didn’t commit themselves either. Their charges felt hesitant; restrained, testing the response. Black Balaq and his archers did their jobs fantastically – his men with goldenheart great bows firing shafts twice as far any others, while crossbowmen worked with such synchronicity it was beautiful. Their bowmen were wildly superior, and already Lord Connington could see the enemy bleeding for it.

Lord Tarly will be trying to find the cracks in our ranks before he forces the spear, Jon thought. But can we find the cracks in his instead?

All before him, there were a thousand clashes happening at once. The battle was twisting before his eyes – a courante of a thousand boots, horses and swords.

The battle didn’t stop. It turned towards a slow battle fought with arrows rather than tides of men, occasionally some slipping forward. Lances and shields held the enemy back, and the bowmen’s strings never stopped snapping. Jon could hear the commands of the serjeants, chanting instruction to a drumbeat. “Notch, draw, loose! Notch, draw, loose!”

The commands themselves were completely useless, but they still had to be chanted. The serjeants needed to give the bowmen their pace, to maintain discipline and ward off fear.

Force the Tyrell men back, keeping them hesitating, Jon thought. The Reachmen could charge the Golden Company, but the iron-tight front ranks promised that they would suffer for it.

Even despite their numbers, the Reachmen were not feeling so confident that they could risk committing fully to a push.

The hours passed slowly, every man tense. They huddled into their formations, crouching behind shields and sticking to their ground. The fighting was soft and the casualties were very light – perhaps a hundred or so – but the battle never ceased. A squire brought Jon a lunch of dried meat, and he broke his fast standing upright.

Approaching sunset, he glimpsed the enemy ranks rippling. Jon recognised what was happening as soon as he saw the banners in the distance fluttering. Black Balaq’s horn came a heartbeat later.

“They’re preparing a charge!” Lord Connington shouted, victoriously. “Ready the ranks to brace, move the reserves forward!”

The commanders broke apart quickly and abandoned their platform. Lord Connington rushed to mount up a horse, in case the reserves needed to charge. Harry Strickland went to reinforce the rear lines. There was no doubt, no panic; just experienced men going about their task.

So Lord Tarly grows tired of this dance first, Jon thought. His intention was a good one – a solid half a day fighting to wear out their defence, and then a heavy attack to exploit superior numbers. And yet still, a cheer broke through the Golden Company’s ranks as the horns blew – a great cry that seemed taunting in the still air.

Come on, the cheers mocked. Come and fight us.

Jon mounted up his destrier, and his three personal guards raised a griffin banner behind him. Dick Cole, Malo Jayn, and Caspor Hill were all ready and waiting to ride next to the Lord Hand, to relay his orders and to keep him from harm.

Men were banging against shields, and a great call roared. “A griffin!” the men bellowed. “A griffin! A griffin!”

Despite himself, Lord Connington felt his lips curl into a smile.

As the lines surged, the war cry of House Connington merged with the boom of a Tyroshi war ballad. It was a loud and rousing chant broken by stomping of feet, but Lord Connington could barely make out the words.

He glimpsed green and red banners as the Tyrell men charged forward as a single, unstoppable tide. Lord Connington almost – almost – could have laughed. You blinked first, he wanted to scream, you could have kept with the slow battle and tried to grind us down, but you prove that you are the most desperate.

Even despite himself, his heart was pounding furiously in the moment. Jon was bellowing orders, shouting the same words over and over again. “Hold the line!” he was bellowing. “Hold the line.”

The charge came in two parts; a pincer movement of mounted men tried to ride around their bulwark at the same time the infantry charged at their centre. Trying to split our attention, Jon saw the red huntsman at the centre, while the Tyrell rose flew over the cavalry. So Lord Tarly himself is leading the infantry push. That told Jon that the infantry was the true threat, while the cavalry was just a distraction.

Quite often, inexperienced commanders zealously over-defended against cavalry while dismissing the threat of infantry. A more foolish general might have fallen for the ruse.

Boom. The lines crashed together, and it was hardly possible to make sense of anything.

The warhorns reached a fever pitch. Men were surging forward, locking shields and wrestling. The frenzy was being pushed backwards, until even the first of the reserves looked ready to join the fray.

His personal guards were struggling to keep order around him. One of them – Caspor Hill – took a stray arrow that whizzed straight into his skull. The man collapsed without a word, and there wasn’t even time to look twice.

Horses stampeded, while behind him he heard the trumpets as the war elephants prepared to charge. Not yet, Jon cursed. It’s too early to commit ourselves fully.

The bulwarks needed to hold until the Reachmen faltered, and only then the counterattack could begin. “Hold the line!” Jon boomed. “Hold the line!”
“Fire and Blood!” a cry came, cutting through the orchestra of chaos. “For justice! For the realm!”

A new tone of warhorns droned through with the rattle of drumbeats and hooves. Jon turned, and he saw King Aegon’s light blazing.

Even in the fading sun, the young king shone like a beacon as he rode through the field astride a great white destrier. Blackfyre was in his hands, the blade shining spectacularly. The sword was like fire itself, burning through the battlefield.

Everywhere Aegon rode, their ranks bolstered and cheered. “Hold the line!” Aegon cried, sweeping through the ranks. “Hold the lines and push them back!”

This time, Jon really did grin. The men were cheering and stomping, every single one of them crying the same thing.

“Fire and Blood! Fire and Blood! Fire and Blood!”

Jon could see his cavalry sweeping over the battlefield, side to side. The infantry were pushing harder, coming together. Morale was everything in a battle like this.

The force of knights that Aegon led was the reserve horse – they bolstered and rode back and forth across the left and right, very visible from his own side, but it was only rarely that they collided with enemy lines. The emergency force, to respond wherever they were needed the most.

That is how much the king has grown, Jon thought with a stab of pure pride. Although the smallfolk often thought differently, it was not a king’s place to lead from the front. True kings contributed best from the rear; bolstering their forces forward, but keeping themselves safe from harm at all costs.

The push didn’t stop, but Jon could feel the tide waning. It was all so frantic and loud – Lord Connington couldn’t make sense of anything he saw or heard – but he could feel the flow of the battle around him.

Time and time again, the armies crashed against each other. Aegon swept back and forth, while Lord Connington watched as the arrows rained and rained, while the tides of men waxed and waned backwards and forward. Losing ground and holding it, charging and bracing.

It was a dance of tens of thousands of men scattered across the plains. A gruelling allemande that lasted hours, with footsteps dancing to the beat of war drums and bellowing orders.

He could feel the weariness in the air, the perfume of sweat and fatigue staining the ground. After a full day of fighting it became less a fight and more a dogged, weary brawl – the two forces grinding against each other hour after hour. Patrols and commands had to switch – men taking turns retreating to the reserves to rest and recover while the other ranks stepped forward to take their place.

It transformed into a battle fought by attrition. The Golden Company was falling backwards and losing ground, but the Tyrell army was bleeding more for every step.

And yet Aegon never stopped. He swapped horses three times and made a hundred laps of the battlefield, yet the king was relentless. It was exhausting work, but Aegon refused to break. So long as the king is riding, then the men have heart.

As night fell, the Golden Company’s counterattack finally began. Jon felt the change in the air. “Forward!” Jon bellowed, and others took up the cry. “Forward, forward!”
It was a dark night, a new moon black in the starless sky. There were great torches alit, filling the air with flickering smoky flames. The Tyrell forces had pushed too far, their men were left exhausted and weary. Perhaps they had expecting a lull after such a long day of fighting, but the Golden Company replied with force and renewed vigour.

Great horns blew over the field. He heard the trumpeting split the sky as the war elephants finally stepped into the field. They were giant shadows, strong and armoured. The grey beasts were clad in red and gold plate armour draping off their bodies and skulls, their eyes covered by steel plate. Metal elephant swords were fastened to their tusk – thick blades like a farmer's plough through a field of bodies.

The whole army rippled. They all knew the signal – as soon as the elephants stepped forward, it was time for the defence to fall back and the charge to begin.

Fifty-six war elephants entered the field, in such tight rank it was like a solid wall rumbling forward. Two Tyroshi crossbowmen stood atop each beast, protected by armored howdahs, unleashing one deadly salvo after another. The mercenaries moved with such perfect synchronization, switching between pairs to reload and fire as the iron rain fell.

And Jon saw him again. Aegon balanced standing proud and upright atop one of the elephants, with Blackfyre in one hand and a blazing torch in the other.

“For the realm!” Aegon Targaryen cried. “For justice! For fire and blood!”

The army’s cheer shook the ground. Jon’s head spun. Now is the time. “Push forward!” Lord Connington ordered. “Bring the reserves into battle! We flank the elephants from the west, force our way through!”

His destrier stirred and neighed amidst all the noise, but Jon forced the horse forward through the stampeding bodies. Both of his gauntleted hands were on his sword, his spurs digging into the horse’s side.

He couldn’t see anything in the wave of bodies, but he could feel the change in the flow. His men were pushing forward, the Reach soldiers were falling backwards. Even the bravest spearman would falter trying to fight back the wall of elephants.

All it took was a single crack, to shatter a shield.

He felt the moment their men crashed together, and the elephants didn’t stop. Company soldiers were pushing through the lances and shields, charging into their lines around giant stomping feet. Jon was mounted while most of his soldiers were afoot, keeping to the back. He never came within fifty feet of an enemy soldier, but he saw the corpses lying on the ground.

The soldiers had to stampeded over the bodies, mutilated every corpse into a bloody pulp under thousands of boots. The grassy fields were turned to red and brown mush.

He heard the Reach’s warhorns change tone. The drumbeats became quicker, more desperate, trying to recover. Jon watched as Ser Will Cole and Ser Torman Peake ordered hundreds of men to rush forward with sharpened stakes to recover their battelines. Swords were used as axes and shields as hammers as the beat the logs into the earth and sharpened them to points.

With a blast of the horn, Black Balaq and his archers set up a new position, while Talek halted the elephants. The great beasts were trembling and snorting, while men hacked all around them. The elephants were movable fortifications – better than towers when it came to securing the battlefield.
In the last hour, there had been more casualties than during the entire day.

The battle waxed and waned like the ocean. The Golden Company had fallen backwards during the day, but recovered ground and then some in the night.

All through the battle, Jon never even once swung his sword at the enemy.

The night blurred. Men might have collapsed from fatigue, but others were screaming warsongs to keep them awake. There were no more great pushes; instead there was nothing but frenzied skirmishes in the dark. It was a night of screaming and chaotic movement.

Come the first light of morning, Jon saw the Tyrell host retreat backwards towards the kingsroad. Jon abandoned his mount to lead from the ground and near the front. The stink of weariness filled the air – every face he saw was sweaty, muddy and bloody.

And yet men were grinning too, Jon noticed. Even when they were bloody and fatigued, the Company men grinned.

Their horses had to retire, and the backline moved to the front. Most of their men would need to rest, but more than a few of their veteran commanders would fight for days straight. Now can Lord Tyrell’s commanders say the same?

Harry Strickland took command of the battlefield, and he held himself capably. For all Jon disliked the coincounter, Harry did a commendable job of recovering the perimeter, fortifying the field and organising their ranks again.

Lord Connington only met Aegon again towards noon, near the rebuilt spike wall. “Lord Hand!” his king called. The young man’s eyes were bloodshot, and his black armour was shivering through nerves. “What of our losses?”

“I’d guess near three thousand, Your Grace, maybe five hundred of those as casualties,” Jon replied. Most losses would be from wounds or from panic, rather than death. “And perhaps four thousand of theirs.”

Aegon blinked, caught off-guard. “Then we are eleven thousand against nineteen.”

“Do not worry over the numbers, Your Grace. War is not arithmetic,” Lord Connington warned. “They cannot afford those sort of losses, and neither can we. Their men will be disheartened, while ours are vigorous. They have fled, and ours are standing strong.”

“We did not break,” Aegon said, the smile drifting over his face. “We held them off.”

“We did. We did not break during the day, and we hurt them in the night,” Lord Connington said. “They will hope to beat us by attrition, but I wager they’ll lose first.”

“Then let us go collect your winnings,” Aegon said, still grinning.

Later that very morning, the Golden Company set out again. The bulk of their men had to be left behind to rest and recover with the wounded, but Lord Connington and King Aegon took the most well-rested men to give chase to the Reach army. The enemy’s host had scattered – Hightower and Redwyne men had been left behind in the kingswood, and Black Balaq led the forces to hold them.

After the big clash, their armies split apart into half a dozen smaller skirmishes. It was not organised, it turned messy and chaotic.

Lord Connington rode to join another battle at the crossroads between the roseroad and the kingswood; against Lannister and Tyrell men trying to hold their fall-back position and muster their men. Dornish soldiers were already in battle by the time they arrived, but then the king’s banners rose over the road.

Obara Sand would be leading the vanguard, along with Fowler, Yronwood and Vanth. Jon saw the flimsy few arrows shooting over the trees.

King Aegon rode with a heavy force of seasoned knights galloping through the woods. The red and black dragon flapped in the wind, and the resistance broke around it. The battle ended swiftly, with more frantic surrenders and deserters fleeing through the woods, rather than death.

As he passed, Lord Connington made note of a serjeant, Ser Brendel Byrne, rallying the spearmen, but Aegon was already pushing onto the next skirmish.

The whole morning was a frenzy of activity. A small village sat by the kingsroad, the whole place scattered with boots and discarded tents. The villagers had already fled, but it looked like Lord Tyrell had been using the village inn for his command. There was a futilely small garrison of Ambrose men still holding it, but the soldiers lay down their arms and surrendered as the knights charged through. Their commander – some knight bearing the red ants of House Ambrose – yielded and was forced onto the muddy ground at spearpoint.

“The rose lord is fleeing to the Blackwater!” Ser Pykewood Peake shouted, and a cheer rose from their men. Knights were riding circles, wafting the Targaryen banner around the king. “He runs!”

“Secure the ground!” Jon Connington boomed, cutting off all cheer. “No man rests until the area is secure! The rose lord could turn around just as easily, and I do not want to hear a single cheer or laughter until our position is secure.” He glared at Ser Pykewood. “There will be no merriment until our victory is guaranteed, do you understand?”

Some of the men faltered, but beside him King Aegon rode through the activity. “The Lord Hand gave you an order,” the king commanded, and his voice was stern too. Clever boy. Never start cheering too early.

Jon had once thought his victory at the Battle of the Bells was guaranteed, only for Ned Stark and Jon Arryn to snatch it from him. He would not make the same mistake twice.

They passed through the three small villages that morning, and they saw wide eyes of smallfolk staring upwards at the mounted men galloping through the woods. “The dragon has returned!” their criers screamed. “The dragon has returned!”

“The King That Holds the Sword!” another yelled. “Targaryen legacy returned – the Conqueror’s Heir!”

Aegon was wielding Blackfyre for all to see, and they were chanting his name. He could feel the energy in the air, the power that radiated from the sword. The sword was important – it made Aegon stronger and surer just by holding it. It shone and rippled like a blazing torch of shadow-fire in his hands. The smallfolk would be chanting Aegon’s name, Lord Connington knew they would.

Even despite Lord Connington’s warnings, their men felt elated. They were so pumped with vigour and victory that they rode long and hard through the kingswood. If it hadn’t been for the greyscale, Jon’s hands would have been trembling too. His fingers were locked into fists around the horse’s Towards noon, their scouts reported the retreating shape of Mace Tyrell’s host over the horizon, but Jon knew that those men must be worn ragged; the Tyrell men had been fleeing all night after a long battle.

Despite his caution, many of their men wanted to ride out quickly to harry the retreating host. Jon had been deliberating it, but then Lorimas Mudd brought news of the Reach’s rearguard trying to hold a position on the kingsroad. Two and a half thousand men had been left behind to blockade the road and cover their army’s escape, and King Aegon mustered to meet them with strength.

Lord Connington saw the banners of Tyrell, Rowan and Redwyne stabbed into the earth. Now why those houses specifically? Jon wondered vaguely. It was strange to see the lord paramount’s own soldiers and strongest allies left behind in such a sacrificial position.

The Golden Company was scattered too, but King Aegon still managed to gather together five hundred knights, thirty elephants and over two thousand men to ride against them. The first day of fighting had been crazed and intense, but the second day was dogged and sprawled.

The fighting on the roads was hectic in the wake of the retreating army. Arrows snapped, soldiers marched, and horses screamed.

Aegon held himself beautifully. Thrice, Lord Connington raised his voice to shout orders, only for the king to beat himself to it. This time, Lord Connington took position at the rear, for King Aegon to lead from the front.

The Hand of the King could only stare as Aegon mounted upon Toyne – to lead a fury of knights against the blockade. Black Balaq was already in position; his goldenheart bowmen and Myrish crossbowmen holding themselves with supreme discipline to support the charge.

Jon watched from the rear as the Reachmen scattered under the fury of their elephants. It was a frantic brawl and a clash of spears and shields, but the Golden Company had the momentum from the very first push. Aegon himself led the front rank against the blockade, but the Reachmen had already scattered.

The Reach’s knights led their resistance valiantly, but the courage of men-at-arms broke down before their charge. The battle was short and sweet; and Lord Tarly sacrificed near two thousand men to ensure his escape.

Jon received news that that Harry Strickland, Ser Marq Mandrake, and Lord Anders Yronwood had all won their own victories throughout the kingswood.

The first day had been more or less equal, but on the second day it was a clear victory for Aegon Targaryen.

“Why does he retreat?” Aegon demanded, jumping off his horse. His brilliantly polished armour was now grimy with mud and blood. “They run for the Blackwater, why did they abandon the road so quickly?”

Jon was about to reply, but a shout beat him to it. “Your Grace!” a knight boomed from across the clearing. “Your Grace, you must see this!”

Lord Connington could have reprimanded the man for such a tone, but then his eyes turned to the horizon. They were clear of the trees of the kingswood, and they could finally see into the distance.
He felt the men ripple, and Aegon’s mouth parted open as he stared.

In the distance, over the shadow of the Blackwater, green and black smoke was rising into the sky. It was a pillar of greasy black climbing towards the heavens, blowing away from them over the coast. A solid mass of smoke, more than Jon had ever seen even from such a distance.

King’s Landing, Jon realised in shock. King’s Landing is burning.

There was a stunned quiet, but then the murmurs started to stir. The king looked to Jon. “What is that?” Aegon muttered in shock. “That smoke…?”

Jon’s jaw clenched. “I do not know,” he muttered lowly, before raising his voice. “But we have our priorities. We must secure the countryside and bar the rose lord from the kingsroad. Muster our forces, and approach slowly.”

Despite his words, Jon felt shaken. The city was in flames, and smoke gushed like the fires of hell. The smoke over the city kept on pluming for the entire day – greasy black and green, coiled like a dragon in the air. When the wind changed, a foul odour hovered over the lands, an unnatural stench like sulphur and salt that polluted the world for leagues around.

Jon had never known such a strong smell to travel so far. Even come nightfall, their scouts reported seeing blazes from over the walls. The fires blazed for an entire day and night.

King’s Landing burns. Even when they should have been celebrating their victory, the sight of that smoke set a dour mood over their camp. A blaze from the seven hells, one of the scouts muttered.

King Aegon wanted to ride forward to the city at all haste, but Lord Connington remained firm. “We hold position,” Lord Connington ordered. “And we let the city burn.”

The Great Sept was demolished in the flames, one of their outriders reported, and battles raged in the streets. Some said that the queen summoned demons to destroy the Faith. Others said that Stannis Baratheon attacked the city during the trial, and sacrificed the city to his Red God. One man was convinced that it was the Bastard King – that the dragon had brought fire and fury against the city.

Nobody knew for sure, they could only speculate.

Lord Casper Wylde, a man who had fought for Stannis on the Blackwater, was one who recognised the smoke. “Wildfire,” the lord said grimly, as he muttered out a prayer. “That’s wildfire right there.”

Aegon frowned. “Wildfire. The alchemist’s substance?” the king asked, and Lord Connington only nodded. “You can recognise it from only the smoke?”

“Oh aye,” Lord Wylde muttered. “I seen that smoke in my nightmares, Your Grace.”

Lord Connington himself had bad memories of wildfire, from Aerys’ reign. The Mad King had been obsessed with the cursed stuff.

The words caused the camp to darken. The alchemists and their cursed wildfire. If Great Sept burns, Jon thought slowly, then the queen is surely dead. Is that why Lord Tyrell retreated so quickly?

It took two days for Aegon’s forces to re-muster after the Battle of the Roseroad. Two frantic days as the Golden Company crept cautiously through the countryside and farmland, towards the rush of the Blackwater over the horizon. Nearly every scattered remnant from Lord Tarly’s army began to surrender rather than resist after the second day, while Harry Strickland brought up supplies from the rear.

They saw columns of refugees fleeing the city. The smallfolk were fleeing in droves, while the Golden Company marched out of the kingswood.

Jon himself rode to the cliffs of the Blackwater Rush, to look upon the shadow of the city. It all looked black. From a distance, even the stones of the castle upon Aegon’s Hill were dark – the red was stained black from soot and ash. Tis the Black Keep now, Jon thought.

There was talk of besieging the city that night, but Jon demanded caution. They could not attack until they knew the situation in the capital, Lord Connington insisted. He would muster his army and move slowly, rather than rash action into the unknown.

The Golden Company was filled with seasoned officers, and yet still… the sight of that smoke had disturbed many sitting around the campfire. The smells seemed to linger in the air, a pungent odour more unnatural than anything he had ever tasted.

But on the third day, they saw seven riders trotting down the kingsroad towards them. Horns blasted, but it wasn’t an attack. The riders wore the armour of knights, but, instead of banners, these men flew a white flag. These knights had no lances, Jon noticed. Their eyes were grim, while Black Balaq met the arrivals on their perimeter and forced them to dismount.

“They say their names are Lord Mattis Rowan, Lord Arthur Ambrose, Ser Desmond Redwyne, Ser Roger Bulwer, Ser Bryan Graceford, Ser Lambert Turnberry and Ser Jon Fossoway, Your Grace,” Black Balaq reported, in his low and deep voice.

Harry Strickland frowned. “Those are quite some names.”

“What do they want?” Lord Connington demanded, as a gathering of serjeants and knights huddled around them.

Across the clearing, the Company men were binding the men’s wrists, just in case. “They were sent as envoys to bring a message,” Black Balaq explained. “Lord Tarly wishes to treat.”

Jon’s eyes narrowed. “Lord Tarly,” he repeated. Not the rose lord. “His terms?”

“To meet in person, at first light on the morn.” The knight’s gaze turned to the king. “Lord Tarly wishes to meet you, Your Grace. He wishes to parley away from his army and ours – only six escorts to both him and you, he says, no more.”

Aegon’s eyes narrowed. “Is it trap?”

“Those men,” Black Balaq motioned to the highborn, “are to stay with us, until the parley is complete.”

Jon turned to look. Lord Mattis Rowan had a very sour look upon his face.

“If it is trap, it is a poor one,” Lord Connington noted. “He just gave us seven highborn hostages, and announced exactly where he will be. We could bring two dozen men, if we choose, and then we might capture or slay Lord Tarly.”

The king frowned. “But we won’t.”
“We won’t,” Lord Connington agreed. “Lord Tarly is desperate. His army was beaten, and his city burns. No, I feel this parley could be useful.”

There were mutters of agreement around them. “I agree,” Aegon said with a nod. “I will meet the Lord of Horn Hill. Where does he wish to meet us?”

Black Balaq repeated the message, and Lord Connington’s eyes narrowed.

Is this Lord Tarly’s jape? he wondered.

Early the next morn, King Aegon, Lord Connington, Ser Rolly Duckfield, Ser Daemon Sand, Ser Tristan Ryger, Ser Olyvar Yronwood, Lord Tristan Darry and Lord Clement Piper left to meet for the truce. Four of the Kingsguard and three noble lords – as requested, Aegon only brought seven men.

It left Harry Strickland in command, unfortunately, but Lord Connington ordered Black Balaq to take position with fifty of his best archers – just in case Lord Tarly’s intentions were duplicitous.

They set off before dawn, and followed the Blackwater north. As morning light rose, Jon recognised the fields overlooking King’s Landing.

“This is an insult,” Lord Tristan Darry muttered lowly as they rode. “To meet us here…”

“Perhaps,” Lord Connington admitted. “But perhaps it was just a matter of convenience. Lord Tarly needed a wide-open space away from the city – one with clear visibility and yet a distinctive enough landmark. It is a good a place as any.”

Lord Tristan didn’t reply, but his gaze was stiff.

In the distance, Jon recognised the hill of the Redgrass Field – the very site where the Black Dragon had fallen a hundred years ago.

The was where the First Blackfyre Rebellion ended, Jon thought quietly. The site of the Hammer and Anvil, where the Great Bastards had clashed, and where Daemon Blackfyre had fallen to Bloodraven’s arrows. This was where Aegor Rivers had picked up his half-brother’s sword, and where the Blackfyre crusade had begun.

The air was quiet as they saw the field. It felt solemn, even, riding through the long grass.

Despite its name, Redgrass Field was green now. Ten thousand men died here once, and they said that the field had been stained red with blood a hundred years ago. Maybe that was true, but after a century the field had turned back to green.

There had been pilgrims to this site, once, Jon had heard; pilgrims who paid homage to the Black Dragon. But now, it was nothing but a barren and downtrodden field approaching King’s Landing. They were a dozen leagues outside the city, but nobody had ever built upon this field.

Jon knew his history. He stared along the countryside, wondering if on this ground Daemon Blackfyre had clashed with Wyl Waynwood, and then the Knight of Ninestars, or the legendary fight with Ser Gwayne Corbray of the Kingsguard. He wondered where Bittersteel had fought Bloodraven, or where the Breakspear and the Anvil had launched their charge.

Jon saw the red huntsman of Tarly rising over a small group of men waiting for them. Lord Randyll Tarly was waiting upon a hill – perhaps that was the Weeping Ridge, the very same hill that Brynden Rivers and his Raven’s Teeth stood upon, as they showered the field in arrows and delivered the fateful blow.

This is a site of history, Lord Connington thought quietly. He had no love for the Black Dragon, but he could not deny the legacy Daemon had left behind.

Despite his words, Tarly met them with only five guards around him. None of them were mounted.

The field was flat and open, but the riders still approached cautiously. Aegon was kept to the centre of their number, covered from sight and with his dragon helm to cover his silver hair. It was too much an opportunity to pass, but Jon hadn’t been able to shake the suspicion that this could be a trap, and the last thing he wanted was to expose his king to any bowman lying in wait.

Still, Lord Connington’s fears eased as he saw the lean and balding figure standing at the front of the bridge, grey-bearded and stern face, wearing boiled leather and a breastplate of grey steel. It had been nearly two decades since he had last seen the man, but Lord Randyll Tarly looked exactly the same.

If Lord Tarly himself is here, then it is not a trap. The lord would have sent a double rather than come himself.

His heavy-lined face was ageless, dark circles under his eyes and a jaw like an anvil. The Lord of Horn Hill wasn’t a big man – he was lean and short – but the lord held himself like one much taller.

“Lord Tarly,” Jon called coolly. This is the man who has led the battle against me for the last week, killing thousands of my men.

Doubtless Lord Tarly was thinking the same thing. “Lord Connington,” he greeted with an iron nod. “It has been a long time.”

“It has indeed,” Jon replied, pulling his horse to a stop and raising a curled hand. All hands were on weapons, but nobody moved. The dark red greatsword, Heartsbane, hung across Lord Tarly’s back, but the man didn’t reach for it. “Once we fought side by side.”

“I don’t recall ever fighting side by side,” Lord Tarly scoffed. “I recall a foolish young boy at Stony Sept, his army defeated. I crushed Robert Baratheon at Ashford and sent him fleeing, but you failed to capture Robert, and then Ned Stark tore your forces apart. If not for my reinforcements, I doubt you would have lived passed that day, Lord Connington.”

A younger man might have protested. Jon just nodded. “Yes,” Jon agreed. “I doubt I would have either.”

The vanguard from the Reach had most certainly helped the royalists retreat from the battle of Stony Sept in good order, although Lord Tarly himself had never attempted to take credit for that success. Lord Tarly sought victory, not glory – for that alone the Lord of Horn Hill had Jon’s respect.

There was a pause. Lord Tarly cocked his head. Jon met his iron gaze and did not flinch. “Yet you are no longer that foolish boy without a clue how to fight a war,” the lord conceded. “Time changes everything.”

“Truer words have not been spoken. Once you were a Targaryen loyalist, now you fight against their return.”

“I’ll be the judge of that.” Lord Tarly gaze turned, passing over the men. “Let me see your Cautious eyes were peeled on the horizon, looking for the bowmen. Then, with a nod, Ser Rolly and Ser Daemon stepped aside. King Aegon pushed his stallion forward, and pulled off his dragon helm. The silver flowed from his crown, his violet eyes hard. “Lord Randyll Tarly,” the king said in a strong voice. “I am Aegon Targaryen, Sixth of my Name, the Dragon Returned, King of the Andals, the Rhoynar and the First Men – the Rightful King of the Iron Throne.”

“A big name for a little boy,” Lord Tarly said, tutting.

“Mind your tone,” Jon warned. “You address your king.”

“Any boy can name himself a dragon. Why should I believe it?”

Jon opened his mouth to reprimand him, but Aegon cut in. “Enough. I care not for what you believe,” Aegon replied firmly. “I am the son of Rhaegar, born from Elia, descendant of the Conqueror himself. You forget your courtesies, Lord of Horn Hill, and battles have been fought over less.”

Aegon drew Blackfyre slowly, raising the brilliant black metal from its sheathe. “I wield the blade of the Conqueror, the sword of my forbearers. Look upon it, and do you still think to doubt me?”

The second time that the glory of Blackfyre has graced Redgrass Field, Jon thought. The sight of Blackfyre rippled in the morning sun. For a second, he was sure he saw Lord Tarly twitch. After a pause, the lord lowered his head. “My apologies, Your Grace.”

“Spare them, my lord, we both know they are bitter,” Aegon said. “You called us here to treat, did you not?”

“And what does your liege lord think of this meeting?” Jon demanded, looking over the men surrounding him. They were all Tarly soldiers, not Tyrell; and men-at-arms rather than lords or knights. “I half-expected to see Mace Tyrell here, or is the rose lord too soft?”

Lord Tarly paused. “The rose lord is too dead, my lord,” he replied after a moment. “Mace Tyrell perished in the riots of the city.”

This time, Lord Tarly scoffed. “Spare them. He was your enemy.”

“He was,” Aegon nodded. “But Lord Tyrell once fought loyally for my grandfather too. He was misguided, but I had hope I could have convinced him of the err of his ways. He was wrong, but he fought for his family, and for a king he believed to be legitimate – I respect that, at least.”

“Misguided.” Lord Tarly’s lips curled. “Misguided doesn’t come close, Your Grace.”

Jon looked to him with narrow eyes. “How did Mace Tyrell die?”

“His horse panicked in the fires,” Lord Tarly replied, without a hint of emotion. He was iron. “The smallfolk ambushed him, and ripped him apart. The mobs were incited by the burning of the Great Sept, and in its shadow they saw Tyrell as the enemy.”

“Oh.” Aegon paused. “What of Lord Tyrell’s family?”

“His mother, Olenna Tyrell, fell with the lord during the mobs. Queen Margaery died by Cersei... hands, her body mutilated and unrecoverable. Loras Tyrell did survive – my men rescued him from the keep before he could be strapped to a trebuchet – but he was left crippled from his captivity. Both his legs broken months ago, Loras will never walk again.” Lord Tarly paused, turning between Aegon and Jon. “Mace Tyrell was grieving over the horror inflicted upon his daughter, mayhaps death was a kindness for him.”

“You do not sound too upset for Lord Tyrell’s fate,” the king commented.

“Lord Tyrell,” Lord Tarly said sourly. “Lord Tyrell may well have damned the Reach by his own incompetence. He failed to secure the city, he failed to find victory on the battlefield.” His head shook. “My lord neglected to heed my advice so many times, and not even my best efforts could save him from his failure.”

Ah, Jon thought quietly. Lord Tyrell lost the trust of his bannermen. He would not have lasted long after that. “And the mob tore him apart?” Jon pressed.

Lord Randyll Tarly just nodded. “The mob tore him apart.”

There was a moment of silence. All eyes were focused on the king, facing off against the Lord of Horn Hill. Aegon’s gaze looked solemn.

“Are you aware that Tommen Baratheon is also dead?” Lord Tarly said finally.

Aegon glanced to Jon. “We heard the rumours,” he admitted. “They say that the queen killed him?”

“The how of it is blurry. Perhaps it was Tommen’s own mother, or perhaps it was the mobs. I’ve yet to find a witness to attest to his death. Personally, my suspicion is that some of Cersei’s guards tried to abandon her, and they killed Tommen in their desertion,” Lord Tarly explained. “Likely, Tommen’s death sent Cersei over the edge, and she burnt the city down in grief. We found the boy king dead when we secured the Red Keep, and the queen dead as well.”

“Who killed her?” Jon demanded.

“I will tell you when I find out,” Lord Tarly said simply. “Her corpse was found in the White Sword Tower, though none recognised it at first. Cersei tried to run – running while carrying her son’s corpse – but some assailant chased her down. I have few answers to give, no witnesses have been found. Those moments were… crazed.”

“I have no sympathy to give for Cersei Lannister,” Aegon said, his tone turning solemn. “But Tommen’s loss was unfortunate.”

“Really?” Lord Tarly raised his eyebrows. “Let us talk frankly – Tommen sat in the seat you claim.”

“He did. And yet he was but a boy, and I do not hurt children,” Aegon argued. “The crimes were his parent’s doing, not his. I would have seen Tommen Waters deposed, but never murdered.”

“So you say,” Lord Tarly retorted. “Perhaps I’d be more inclined to believe that, if you weren’t allied with the man who murdered his siblings.”

“You insult our king in our presence?” Ser Daemon glowered, stepping forward. Jon grimaced, and shunned the man backwards.

“They say it was the Imp that killed Joffrey, and Myrcella, and Tywin,” Lord Tarly pressed, looking firmly at Aegon. “How I am to trust a man whose closest ally is a kinslayer?”
Curse the Imp. Aegon bristled. “My lord, Tyrion Lannister confesses to have killed his father in self-defence, but the children? He had no hand in those crimes. It was the queen’s madness that murdered her children, all the while Lord Tyrion is and has long been five hundred leagues away.” The boy’s jaw tightened. “Cersei Lannister would have blamed every crime in the seven hells upon her brother; those accusations are the ravings of a mad woman. And I consider such slanderous lies against a friend insulting, my lord.”

It was cleanly spoken. Lord Tarly looked unconvinced, eyes turning between Jon and Aegon. “Let us note, my lord,” Lord Connington said quietly. “That all of those were traitors to the realm, and such accusations are baseless.”

Jon’s gaze spoke volumes. Lord Tarly looked for a moment like he might have pushed the issue, but he held his tongue. The man is a pragmatist. “If His Grace says he was uninvolved,” Lord Tarly said finally. “Though the court of public opinion may yield a different verdict.”

Lord Connington shook his head. “If you planned this parley for naught reason but to trade barbs and veiled insults,” he said, “then I see no point in this discussion.”

“I planned to meet you,” Lord Tarly warned slowly, “because I have ten thousand men standing behind me on the Blackwater.”

“As do I, my lord,” the king retorted.

“Then we appear to be on equal footing.”

“Except your men seem to be losing against smaller numbers,” Lord Connington cut in. “We do not need to be here – we hold the kingsroad, your forces are bleeding. You could not defeat us in the field and your strength has fallen further. Your allies are lost and this war is as good as ours.”

“If you thought so,” Lord Tarly said through gritted teeth, “then you would not be here either.”

Jon was about to object, but with a slight shake of his head Aegon told him to let the comment drop.

“Do not hope to cow me, my lord,” Lord Tarly warned. “Have the respect to talk to me honestly. I do not deny it – your victory on the roseroad was a strong one, but do not pretend to be vastly superior. Your forces are weary too, if I opposed you from the city, rallied my men, then perhaps I could yet turn this campaign around. I could most certainly make you bleed for whatever victory you sought.”

Lord Connington was about to object, when Aegon raised his hand. “Aye,” the king agreed. “You most certainly could.” There was a quiet pause. “But if you believe you could truly do so, my lord, then why did you invite us to treat?”

Lord Tarly paused, and a bit of the aggression in his voice vanished slightly. His tone turned calmer, more resigned. “Because it has become increasingly clear to me that any victory won will be a bitter one. I do not care to fight a battle and sacrifice the war.”

“Indeed.” A smile crept over Aegon’s lips. “So let us assume you do manage to beat us. It will cost you ten thousand of your remaining men.”

“At least,” Jon added.

“Yes. And they are forces that I cannot afford to sacrifice,” Lord Tarly agreed. “This is not the final battle. The ironborn savage Oldtown, the entire Reach is at risk. My own son and heir was at Oldtown, I have heard no word of him.”

There was a flicker in his voice, the first sign of emotion that Jon had seen. A father concerned for his son. “I will need my men to secure my lands,” Lord Tarly said finally. “I cannot afford to waste them here – that was something that Mace Tyrell never seemed to grasp.”

He is a pragmatist, Jon thought to himself. “I completely agree,” Aegon said, nodding. “Men’s lives should not be wasted in a pointless conflict. May I ask, my lord, what are you fighting for? Which king do you support now?”

“That… is a difficult question,” Lord Tarly replied carefully. “Let’s consider my options. By rights, after the death of the Robert’s children, the throne belongs to Stannis Baratheon.” Aegon looked ready to object. “His parentage is not in doubt, Your Grace.”

“Except that does not seem a sensible decision,” Jon noted.

“You are right. It does not,” Lord Tarly agreed. “Stannis is a traitor, a pirate, an apostate. House Tyrell attempted to reach out to him, and heard nothing but fanatical lunacy. The Faith would never support a follower of the Red God on the throne, and I cannot ignore the power that the Faith Militant still holds. To crown Stannis would be a wholly different manner of doomed cause.”

“So then let us assume Stannis has been disqualified for his crimes.” Jon paused. “Succession becomes very murky indeed.”

“Yes. Under normal circumstances, it would be a case for a Great Council,” Lord Tarly continued. “I would rally the greatest houses of the realm together, and the lords would deliberate the rightful succession. Perhaps it would be one of Robert’s many bastards that would be risen up, or perhaps some distant cousin. I imagine the maesters would have a field day tracing back whatever lineage or whatnot.”

“Or perhaps it would be some grasping great lord,” Jon said pointedly, “that’d try to steal the throne themselves.”

Lord Tarly turned to him. “Yes,” he accepted. “Perhaps.”

Aegon tutted. “And you would ignore the blood of the dragon, standing right before you?”

“I am not doubting your word that you are Rhaegar’s son,” Lord Tarly replied coolly. “What I question, is whether you can prove it to the lords?”

“Call your Great Council, my lord,” Aegon challenged. His hand went to Blackfyre. “I can guarantee you that I will prove it to the realm.”

You do not need to prove a thing, Jon almost objected. You can take it by might. Still, he held his tongue. Lord Tarly was looking to Aegon, and Lord Connington wouldn’t undercut his king’s position.

A humourless smile twitched over Lord Tarly’s lips. “And what a sham that would be?” Lord Tarly scoffed. “Any Great Council now would be a mummer’s court. Half the great lords are either dead or traitor, and we are facing invasions on every front. Some days, I wonder whether it will be the kraken or the ice dragon to reach King’s Landing first?” He shook his head. “No, even if I could assemble a suitable Great Council, how long would such a thing take? The Seven Kingdoms have no time to spare. We need a strong king now.”

Ah. Jon only nodded in agreement and Aegon’s eyes narrowed, but they both stayed quiet.
“Now then.” Randyll Tarly cleared his throat. “Perhaps I could still oppose you. Perhaps I could determine the next in-line; some bastard or cousin of Robert’s and raise him as king. Perhaps my armies could rout yours, and perhaps I could yet salvage something from this horrible situation.”

“There are many ‘perhaps’ in those statements,” Aegon noted.

“There are, indeed. And it will do little to unite the realm, and this war between us becoming more and more pointless.” Lord Tarly’s jaw tightened, eyes flickering. “No, I must look to the future.”

“More and more, we appear to be in agreement, my lord.”

“Then can we agree that the realm needs a king – one that can restore justice and order, make peace and right wrongs. If you could be that king, then I am prepared to bend the knee to you, Aegon Targaryen.” Jon could have sagged in relief. Yes! Lord Tarly’s eyes were hard. “And let us be clear, Your Grace; if you are not that king, then I will oppose you to my very last.”

“I understand perfectly, Lord Tarly,” Aegon’s voice was cautious, but Jon dared himself to hope. Lord Tarly was not a man to make such statements lightly. “What do you want?”

“I expect my lands put to rights. I want protection for my family, to recover my son,” Lord Tarly said firmly. “The Reach must be saved from the ironborn, the Iron Islands must suffer for their sins.”

“Yes, I swear to you that they will,” Aegon promised. “Piece by piece, I am reuniting this broken kingdom. Dorne supports us. The stormlands have fallen to us. The riverlands call for us. The westerlands concede to us. Swear to me, my lord, ensure the loyalty of the Reach and its houses, then I will name you Lord Paramount of the Mander.”

“And House Tyrell?” There was an edge to Lord Tarly’s voice.

“House Tyrell have proven themselves undeserving.” Aegon nodded. “Highgarden must bend the knee as well.”

“And I expect amnesty for all houses that fought against you under House Tyrell,” Lord Tarly insisted. “Amnesty for every soldier that fought the roseroad who concedes.”

“Of course,” Aegon replied. “They followed their lord’s order, the fault is not with them.”

“Aye.” Slowly and non-threateningly, Lord Tarly pulled Heartsbane from its sheathe. His chainmail clanged as he lowered himself to the green grass, clasping his hands about Heartsbane’s hilt in something resembling a prayer as it stabbed into the grass. “Then I swear fealty to you, on my honour and my house, King Aegon Targaryen.”

Aegon Targaryen stood upon Redgrass Field, and drew Blackfyre slowly. The rising sun was behind him, while he gingerly placed the black blade onto Lord Tarly’s shoulders. “Then rise in the name of the rightful king,” King Aegon commanded. “Randyll Tarly, Lord of Horn Hill, Lord of the Reach.”

Jon took a deep breath. Lord Tarly held the city, and the last of the Reach’s armies. Lord Connington appreciated Lord Tarly’s sort; the pragmatists that understood the greater game, and were willing to sacrifice.

Jon had absolutely no doubt that his oath would last too, for as long Aegon remained the best option for a pragmatic man. Every loyal right hand only stayed so loyal so long as the lord remained strong. Mace Tyrell likely learnt that lesson too late.
His heart was pounding. Jon could not allow himself to relax, but he could feel his shoulders twitching. After so, so long…

_The path to the Iron Throne is clear._

The talk lasted for another hour; it was mostly formality, agreeing to the terms. Afterwards, they barely said a word as they rode back to their camp, but Jon could see Aegon’s eyes widening. The smile played at his lips. “Griff,” the king whispered quietly. “Does this mean…?”

“Do not let your guard down, Your Grace,” Lord Connington warned. “Do not grow complacent now. This may yet be a trap.”

“Do you believe it is?”

“No,” Jon admitted. “I don’t think it is at all.” _But I dare not allow myself to hope._

He turned to stare out over the blackened and charred city. Even as they rode over the hills, Lord Tarly was already giving orders to open the gates and raise the red dragon of Targaryen back over the gates.

As the news that the Reach army had surrendered spread, the cheers rose from the men.

The soldiers were thundering, stomping on the ground with heavy boots. “The Young Dragon!” Ser Rolly Duckfield bellowed in triumph. “The Young Dragon!”

Jon’s hands would be shaking, if he could feel them at all. _I will see Rhaegar’s son on the throne, for so long…_

The men were breaking open their scant supplies of ale. They were cheering, but Aegon didn’t relax, even when they retired to their tent. The young man was pacing, frantically.

“Send the word to gather my procession, I expect every blade and helm to gleaming as we enter the city,” Aegon ordered. “And then bring parchment, and my seal. I must write my first royal declarations.” A grin broke across his features. “My _royal declarations_. Gods…”

“Can we trust Randyll Tarly?” Lord Tristan Darry said, more cautiously. “He surrenders too easily.”

“He doesn’t have a choice.” Lord Connington shook his head. “The only way he stands a chance of recovering the Reach is if there is a strong king on the Iron Throne. Aegon is the only option he has.” _The only option standing outside the city with an army._

“I do not trust a man who surrenders from practicality more than loyalty,” Ser Tristan Ryger said darkly.

“Better than a man who does not surrender at all.”

“And in return he will expect to be Lord of the Reach?” Ser Pykewood Peake asked. _His brother, Jon recalled, Lord Laswell Peake, had been vying for that position._

“Lord Tarly is a good option for the title, Your Grace,” Jon said with approval. “He is perhaps the greatest soldier in the realm, of unquestioned nobility. House Tyrell has lost its armies and respect, and none will oppose Tarly now. The cripple in Highgarden will either concede or resist, but he cannot win.”
“See it done. I shall write out the decree.” Aegon blinked, a sudden thought coming to him. “And the city. King’s Landing – my city – has burnt. We must move out quickly help the people – we must to bring supplies and aid to the smallfolk!”

Jon hid a smile. “Aye,” he agreed. “We must.”

King’s Landing had been starving for weeks, and the Golden Company had supplies to spare. They had confiscated all of caravans from the roseroad, and then Jon Connington needed to pen a letter to Rosby and Stokeworth for them to release the supplies they had hoarded.

The smallfolk would cheer for the dragon when they brought caravans of grain and bread to the hungry masses. None would remember that the Golden Company were the ones who had been starving them.

So much to do, so much to prepare…

Aegon seemed overwhelmed in the moment, but Lord Connington needed to ground him. The Lord Hand refused to act, though, until each of the surviving Reach lords gave their own public fealty to Aegon Targaryen. The very next morning, they met on the bridge over the Blackwater as the horses rode out of the city.

Lord Connington recognised the names: Lord Mathis Rowan, Ser Desmond Redwyne, Lord Arthur Ambrose, Lord Jowan Appleton, Lord Martyn Mullendore, Lord Lorent Caswell, Ser Roger Bulwer, Lord Erren Wythers, Lord Alester Crane, Lord Ivor Vyrwel, Ser Bryan Graceford, Ser Matthew Middlebury and Ser Jon Fossoway. Some came stiffly, others bitterly, most resigned – but they all came before his king.

From the surviving western lords, Jon noted Lord Quenten Banefort, Lord Tytos Brax and his son Ser Flement Brax, Lord Roland Crakehall, Ser Forley Prester and young Lord Steffon Swyft.

The Warden of the West, Kevan Lannister, had vanished during the battle, Connington was told, and the Lannister men suffered badly from the Faith’s retaliation. They had been blamed by the riots, and the fury of the mobs had been something to behold. None of the Lannister loyalists had the will nor the strength to fight, not after the atrocity of the Mad Queen’s reign.

They all gathered in the fields outside the Blackwater, to bend their heads before the king. King Aegon met them all by name, greeted them warmly, and told them to rise.

Jon kept on fearing that this could be some dream – some weird hallucination brought on by his disease. He had spent so long imagining the moment, he could scarcely believe it was true.

But it was. They were calling for him name. Aegon Targaryen, King of the Seven Kingdoms.

This was real – the red dragon was soaring, and the realm was bowing before King’s Landing.

The first time Jon approached the River Gate of the city, he saw crowds flocking around the harbour, while wide and fearful eyes stared up at the knights. Then, the Company unveiled caravans of supplies; grain, bread, mutton and fish, and suddenly the whole crowd started to stir.

“By order of the king,” the men said, as they handed out food to the starving masses on the portside.

By the time King Aegon arrived along with Harry Strickland and even more supply caravans, the smallfolk were chanting Aegon’s name.
Jon wanted to relish in the moment, to savour the sound, but he couldn't allow himself to falter. There is too much to do, Jon thought firmly. I cannot slacken now.

The king made his will clear, and the Hand set to work. Lord Connington ordered the Company to provide aid for the devastated smallfolk. They felled wood from the kingswood to work together to rebuild the burnt city, the soldiers sacrificed their own tents for the refugees. Several of the Company veterans even donated gold off their own arms to the people. “We must repair trust in the king,” Jon had ordered, and the mercenaries set about their tasks with a fervour.

The Golden Company has been fighting for near a century for this moment, Jon thought. He had never seen Homeless Harry Strickland march with such enthusiasm.

We came prepared to lay siege to King’s Landing, Jon thought, but now we are here to save it.

“We will fix this,” Aegon declared to refugees. “We will repair the damage together.”

The crowds had loved him for it. He was earnest and heartfelt, and not even more the cynical lord could question the passion that Aegon brought to the people.

The city itself looked like a charred wreck, but Lords Darry, Piper and Fowler were sent forward to build overflow camps for the refugees on the Blackwater. Even the remaining ships on the harbour had burnt from the ash spitting from the sky.

The kingsroad was heaving as the line of the Targaryen forces moved into the city. Jon glimpsed Septa Lemore riding to meet the king. Aegon stood tall and proud, but Jon noticed how the septa held the young man’s hand reassuringly as he faced all the people.

His people, Jon thought. Aegon had been raised for this – raised to care about the kingdom.

The Golden Company would help with the reconstruction simply because they wanted to be rewarded for it, but Aegon was doing this because he truly believed in it. Jon felt like a bitter, crusty old man when staring up at his young and idealistic king.

The king lingered at the docks with the crowds, but Jon took a few of the Company commanders forward to inspect the damage to the city. Seven of Lord Tarly’s men acted as an escort, and Haldon Halfmaester rode with them, in case of injuries that needed urgent care.

The gates were lined with Reachmen – the same men that they had just fought against – but they all lowered their heads.

The fires had burnt out, but the stink of ash and death still lingered over King’s Landing.

“Magister Illyrio has donated much already,” Halfmaester Haldon noted as trotted through the Mud Gates. “If we sent word, I have no doubt that the magister would happily donate more for a cause such as this.”

He nodded, but didn’t reply out loud. I suspect that the ships are already on their way, Lord Connington thought grimly. This was, after all, a perfect opportunity for Aegon to earn the trust of the people. Perhaps the aid ships left Pentos before the fires even began.

As they stepped forward, the city looked black. The first time Jon rode through streets of Fishmonger’s Square, he saw charred houses spreading over the horizon. Everything between the collapsed ruin of the Great Sept to the copper Dragonpit was a sea of ruins. The cheaper houses – the ones of thatch and wood around Flea Bottom – had suffered the worst.
Suddenly, all cheer vanished as the rode through the blackened streets. The mood turned grim.

“The Others take the Mad Queen…” Lord Tristan muttered, as he stared upon the charred husks of houses. They saw scattered black bones littering the streets.

Of the Alchemist’s Guildhall at the centre of the city, there was naught left but a ruin of scorched black – the fires had been so hot that even the stone had melted.

The Street of Sisters and Flea Bottom had taken the worst of the fires, many thousands burnt, more left homeless. The city’s heart had been burnt out, and the smell of ash of death soaked the ruins. Jon had never smelt such a thing before – he knew the rancid odour of battlefields, but he barely even imagined the pungent stink of flesh scalded by unnatural flames.

Both Harry Strickland and Ser Lorimas Mudd looked ready to puke as they rode through the black streets. Haldon Halfmaester was pale.

The last time he had been here, the Street of Sisters had been thriving with life. Now, it felt like a mausoleum of corpses. Not even the crows would feast upon the corpses left in the city.

They had piled bodies every hundred yards across the Muddy Way, and Jon noticed just how many of the bodies wore red cloaks. House Lannister had suffered badly in the outrage of the mobs.

Most of the corpses from Visenya’s Hill were nothing but ash – the wildfire had scorched even the bones of every soul in the Great Sept of Baelor.

Above them, the ruins loomed like a tombstone. Where once it had been bright marble and crystal towers, now it was nothing but scorched, melted rock. The entire hill was black.

“By the Gods,” Harry Strickland muttered, staring upwards at the wreck of the Great Sept. “What sort of blaze could melt stone? Have you ever imagined a fire so hot?”

He had not. Jon was not a superstitious man, but even to stand before the ashes of such a fire… it sent shivers down his spine. No fire he had ever imagined could produce such a smell.

The streets were deserted, like a ghost town. Near a good third of the city had been torched into ash.

There was a moment of silence, as the gazed around the Street of Sisters.

“In the Citadel,” Haldon Halfmaester said slowly, “I remember that an archmaester – a crazy man with a fondness for the occult – he once theorised that wildfire had supernatural properties.” The man paused. “He claimed that the Substance the alchemists produced would burn hotter when fed living bodies.”

“What?” Harry looked confused.

“It was as if the wildfire could be fuelled by burning souls more than solid matter, the archmaester claimed. Wildfire hungered for flesh, not wood, and it grew hotter the more lives it took. Very unique properties, he said. We laughed at him at the time, I thought it nonsense. We thought the pyromancers were blithering fools.” Haldon’s eyes glanced to the ruins of the Great Sept. “I may have to revise that view.”

There was no reply from the men. Thousands of men and women died upon Visenya’s Hill, in a great gush of green flames.
He remembered the last great fire of King’s Landing; in the Great Spring Sickness, when Lord Bloodraven ordered the pyromancers to burn the corpses piled in the Dragonpit. The flames had suddenly gone out of control, and a quarter of King’s Landing was said to have burnt in the aftermath. That blaze must have been barely half as bad as this one.

Jon couldn’t help but wonder… Mad King Aerys had been obsessed with wildfire. Even the Tragedy at Summerhall was said to have been linked to alchemist’s meddling. Aerys was said to have thought wildfire could save him, and many Targaryens in the past had been fascinated with it.

Jon clearly remembered being in the city on the early days of 282 AC, when King Aerys had ordered the wildfire to burn along the Red Keep’s walls to drive off winter. King’s Landing had been illuminated by green fire for a moon’s turn. The command had come from one of the Mad King’s dreams, Rhaegar had told Jon once; Aerys had dreamt that wildfire could burn away the seasons themselves.

_I must speak to any surviving pyromancers_, Jon decided. He mentioned as much to one of the Tarly serjeants, and the man replied only that very few alchemists had survived.

“We must prepare a procession,” Lord Connington ordered. “We will have a parade to escort King Aegon to the Red Keep. Set the men to work – clear all corpses from the Hook to the gates of the Red Keep. Wipe the throne room of blood, as quickly as possible. Make it presentable for Aegon to hold his first court.”

“My lord, there is a lot of blood—”

“See it done. It may not be much, but we must ensure this is a celebration,” Lord Connington commanded. “Give the smallfolk something to cheer for.”

The Young Dragon, to rescue them from the tyrant kings and the Mad Queen. The champion of the smallfolk, the true king come again. Like something out of a fairy tale. Jon did not want the sight of corpses damping that.

He cast one looked around the charred stone and cobbles, wondering how long such scars would take to heal. _King’s Landing has been rebuilt before_, Jon told himself.

But he couldn’t imagine it ever being so bad as this.

It was hectic day, but they had to move fast. By the time Aegon Targaryen finally entered the city, it was to the sound of cheering crowds, in front of a procession of knights riding down the street.

The Golden Company unfurled the largest, most glorious and colourful banners they had. They could not clear the stink, but the roar of trumpets blanketed out the noise.

Even amidst the destruction, the smallfolk gathered and gaped to see the armoured elephants moving in formation down the streets.

Trumpets every hundred yards, Jon had ordered. Banners of gold and red and black. It was all a blur.

After suffering for so long at the hands of Baratheon, Lannister or Stark, the realm accepted the dragon returned to the sound of jubilation.

_The Young Dragon_, Jon thought hollowly. He had not heard a crowd cheer so gleefully since Rhaegar.
And Aegon himself looked stunning, a dragon of gold and red, marched down the streets upon a carriage atop on an elephant's back. He held Blackfyre high and waved to the smallfolk. Great elephants trumpeted either side of him, and the whole realm cheered for the Targaryen reign reborn.

Knights held an immense banner of a red dragon on wooden poles – so large that it took seven riders just to carry it aloft. Their horses zig-zagged behind the king, and the banner swayed down the streets like a red dragon of cloth wafting in the air.

Jon’s heart was beating, as he rode his horse through the streets, standing stiff in the saddle and trotting in the shadow of the king.

The last time he had seen the Mud Gate, he had been exiled from it and frogmarched to a ship on the waterfront. Now, Jon Connington returned through it alongside the king to jubilee crowds chanting his name.

My king. My redemption.

It was a short journey from the Mud Gate, through the Hook and up to the Red Keep, but the journey had never seemed so long. Jon’s heart was pounding, trying to take in every moment.

Gold was marching through blackened streets, brightness in dark again…

It was all so much, Jon could barely breathe….

His eyes fogged up with tears, but he blinked and twisted his head away before anyone would notice. It felt like Rhaegar was riding besides him, his prince’s arms wrapped around Jon’s shoulders.

I did it, Rhaegar, he thought hollowly. I did it.

It had been eighteen long years, but it felt like his heart was finally beating again.

Even despite everything – despite the charred streets and the pungent smell, and the mummer’s parade of procession – in that moment, in that brief moment… it felt like bliss. Fulfilment.

The streets were charred, the gates of the Red Keep broken open, and dark blood stained the stones of the courtyard. They had dragged the corpses away, but the mess of battle still remained. It was not the glorious crowning that Jon had imagined, but it would do. The people were still cheering regardless.

And the Iron Throne. The Iron Throne loomed larger and more glorious than Jon had even imagined. Somehow, in his dreams, the throne had shrunken – but there it was, larger than life.

When Aegon stepped before the Iron Throne, the whole world went quiet. The boy gingerly walked up the steps, running his hand over the iron barbs…

And the boom of cheers from the Great Hall was so loud it was deafening. As loud as Jon’s heartbeat.

They had no crown to place upon Aegon’s head. That was an oversight, Jon admitted, but there was no High Septon to place it either. Instead, to represent the Seven, Septa Lemore stood by the king’s side and escorted him up the iron steps.

The true coronation would be later, once they found a crown, but instead Aegon had the almighty cheers of the people, and he was grinning from ear to ear. The great doors to the throne room were wide open, and the crowd of knights and lords were chanting for their king as he took his seat.

“My people!” Aegon cheered from atop the throne. “My friends, my allies! My heart bleeds at the sight of this city, for how you have suffered at the hands of usurpers. I have no words to express my regrets, my sympathies, so instead I give you only a vow.” He took a deep breath. “I will repair this kingdom. I will prove myself worthy of the trust you give me, of the seat I sit upon!”

The crowd boomed, the ground trembling… “My family has suffered,” Aegon continued, booming, “there have been monsters and atrocities – believe me, I know. I know what it is to have everything stripped from you, to be left helpless in the face of injustice! But we are here – to fight for what is right and just, to preserve and to…”

Lord Connington had to leave the hall before Aegon’s speech finished, for fear he might actually break down in tears. His shoulders were trembling, his vision blurring. I cannot cry, Jon cursed himself, crying is weakness. It took deep breaths to force himself to keep his posture straight and his eyes hard.

Aegon looked so much like Rhaegar.

Young, handsome and chivalrous. No mummer in the world could match the sight that Aegon made upon the throne. He is truly Rhaegar’s son, Jon thought with awe.

_I am so close. Can you see me, Rhaegar, are you proud?_

In that moment, if Jon had just dropped dead, he would have died content.

Aegon was still speaking to the crowds in the throne room, but Jon excused himself. Jon lingered outside of the doors, staring up at the black walls of the Red Keep, when Jon saw a young squire and a procession of Company men running through the hallway towards him.

“My lord,” the squire gulped. “Lord Petyr Baelish has arrived in the city.”

Jon forced himself to stay steady. He took a deep breath, recovering himself. _I cannot die yet_, Jon thought firmly. _Not yet._

“The king is predisposed,” Lord Connington ordered. “I will meet with Lord Baelish.”

He nodded. Lord Connington gathered up his personal guards and a small escort of men, just in case. The squire pointed to the north of the keep – to where a gate had once stood, before the mobs broke through the portcullis and battered it down during the riot. The splinters still littered the courtyard, the portcullis was still leaning off its hinges in the archway.

That must be fixed. With the Red Keep in such disrepair, it seemed like any catspaw could just crawl in.

_Littlefinger_. Jon had never met the man, but he had heard much of the ‘Lord Protector’ of the Eyrie.

He saw the man himself waiting by the northern gate, escorted by ten men. All of Littlefinger’s escort were hardened men in boiled leather and grey chainmail and plate, and none of them had the look of knights. Littlefinger himself looked more a merchant than a high lord – he dressed himself in black velvet with a fine pale blue cloak, with a silver pin showing the falcon of House Arryn securing his garb. His collar was high, his hair combed backwards, with a pointed goatee immaculately trimmed. The man was well-groomed – infuriatingly so. Jon himself was still wearing grimy armour that had gone unwashed since the battle, while Littlefinger kept himself more pristine than a noblewoman.

He is more of a woman than a man, Jon thought. I doubt if Baelish has ever gripped a sword. He dressed himself with silk and perfume rather than steel.

Littlefinger’s hands were crossed behind his back, standing straight as he turned to meet Lord
Connington. He wears his late wife’s colours, Jon noted, but black as well. As sign of mourning, perhaps?

There was no sign of any grief on Littlefinger’s face, though. There was nothing but a soft smirk as he looked upon the Hand of the King.

“Ah,” the coincounter greeted, stepping through the gateway. “Lord Connington, I presume?
Congratulations are in order, it seems, for such a victory. I heard the cheers from here.”

“Lord Petyr Baelish,” Jon replied darkly. “What good timing you have.”

His smile didn’t fade. “I came at all haste.”

“I’m sure you did.” After the battle was already over, that is. “And should I presume that the knights of Vale rode with you?”

There are eight thousand mounted men readied at Brindlewood behind me, and another five and twenty following from the Trident.”

Jon stiffened somewhat, but he forced his voice level. “What do you presume do with such men?”

“Well… That is the question, isn’t it?” The smirk turned waxy. “The Vale lords are sworn to Baratheon regime. Why, the late Lord Arryn was Robert Baratheon’s most loyal supporter.”

“The Baratheon regime,” Jon said warningly, “is over, my late Lord.”

“So I hear. My heart bleeds for the fates of such children.”

“Look around the city, Lord Baelish,” Jon offered. “Does your heart bleed for the victims of the queen’s insanity?”

“But of course,” the coincounter said with a nod. “We are the same, you and I. We both want what is best for the realm.”

“I very much doubt that.” Littlefinger just smirked. Around him, the Company men shifted closer slightly, but Littlefinger’s guards remained stoic.

“But it is a new age, is it not? King’s Landing burns – why I imagine this city must be so desperate to accept any liege.” Littlefinger chuckled softly. “I heard of Tyrell’s unfortunate fate, and of Tarly’s arrangement… it seems that line of succession matters little when circumstances are so dire. You have risen your dragon up to the Iron Throne.”

‘Your dragon’, Jon noted. His voice turned to a growl. “King Aegon,” Jon said lowly, “is the rightful king of the Iron Throne.”

“Oh, I would never argue that. But this coronation is all of… what? A few hours old?” His voice was doubtful. “Can you understand why many of the lord of the Vale might feel rather upset over that, Lord Hand? Why such proud lords might feel somewhat cheated by a king with such a dubious claim of parentage?”

So that was his game. “Should I consider that a threat?”

“Merely an observation,” Littlefinger lied.

“I would warn you to watch your tone.”

“My deepest apologises, my Lord Hand.” Littlefinger lowered his head shamelessly. There was no pride in this one – or a different type of pride, at least. “Tell me, may we talk in private?”

“I feel this is a good a place to talk as any.” Around him, the Company men stood ready. They stood in the battered archway of the gate, standing atop the steps and looking out over the blackened city.

“Very well.” Littlefinger nodded. “Then shall we talk bluntly? I feel like you are a man who appreciates bluntness. It is quite refreshing, actually.” There was no reply from Jon. “I have over thirty thousand fresh and readied men heading to this city, Lord Hand. Your men are weary and the city is unstable. House Tarly may have declared for you, but, well, I suspect that allegiance might shift again if one were to give the Reach lords a better option. Can you see how this conflict has the potential that it might not go so well for you?”

His jaw clenched. “You come here to threaten war to me, in the gates of this castle?” Lord
Connington bristled. “I could take your head.”

Petyr Baelish only laughed, chuckling loud and clear. “You are welcome to my head, Lord Hand.
Its loss would be very unfortunate for me, but I very much doubt that any of the Lords Declarant will mourn my poor skull. Perhaps Yohn Royce may even clap when he hears that I’m missing it.”

Lord Connington never replied, but his eyes narrowed. “However,” Littlefinger continued, “if I do end up lacking a head… then, pray tell, who else will be able to convince the Vale lords to declare for Aegon?”

There was a pause. “I fear you misunderstand my intentions, Lord Hand,” Littlefinger explained. “I am not leading an army, I am not in command – the Lords Declarant are. I have no great houses under my command, I have no soldiers. Truth be told, my titles and my regency are more a formality than a status of power. The Lords Declarant will not miss my death, they will continue without me.” He smiled. “The only things that I do have, however, is some scant modicum of influence in the Vale, and custodianship of Lord Robert Arryn. Custodianship that I might deliver to His Grace.

“So the question becomes… would you deal with me – a prideless man willing to negotiate and compromise – or would you prefer to deal with five prideful and squabbling great lords of the Vale?”

Lord Connington growled. “You mean to extort us?”

“Heavens no.” Littlefinger even managed to look insulted. “I just want to make sure that you’re aware how much more useful my head could be for your king, if it were still attached to my shoulders instead.”
Damn the coincounter. Lord Connington glared, but Littlefinger’s eyes glinted.

He spent the next half a day discussing terms with Lord Baelish. They sat in a cheap table of a guardhouse near the walls. Jon could not bring the man into the Red Keep, not when so many corpses had yet to be cleared. Instead, they sat in some guardsmen’s den, with scattered mugs and mouldy foodstuff littered along the floor. There was only one dried bloodstain upon the wall – a dark blotch nearly invisible on the dark stone.

Littlefinger offered wine to toast their new king, but Lord Connington refused it. It left a foul taste in his mouth, but Littlefinger had enough of a bargaining position to extract good terms.

Lord Baelish was willing to cut a deal; to convince the Lord Declarants to bend the knee, to bring Robert Arryn to Aegon’s court, in return for power and influence.

He was already the Lord of Harrenhal and Lord Paramount of the Trident – two completely hollow honours, and yet Littlefinger now wanted the influence to go with the status. He knew exactly what he was asking for; he wanted very specific lands and incomes, certain trading rights from the Vale. The entire conversation galled Jon. And yet Aegon needed the Vale’s support.

Littlefinger made sure that the Vale’s army deliberately moved slowly, didn’t he? Jon thought foully. Lord Baelish waited until the battle was over before picking a side to declare for. No matter who won King’s Landing, Littlefinger would have extracted the same concessions from them.

“You made a deal, didn’t you?” Jon said finally, his suspicion growing to certainty. Littlefinger had his terms all perfectly prepared.

“I merely want what is best for the realm, Your Grace,” Littlefinger said, softly. “I have been in such a difficult position recently; many of my investments have been spoiled, the Lords Declarant have been restless, Robert Arryn has been sickly, and the situation in King’s Landing seemed so…” he paused for a few heartbeats, finding the right word, “volatile. I merely wanted to ensure the best option occurred for the realm – and I am so glad that it has.”

Liar. “And what did the Vale lords think of you playing both sides?”

“And in return for keeping the Lord Lannister informed of the Vale’s politics, well, I just wanted to ensure there was a friendly face awaiting me in King’s Landing.” He motioned to Jon with a smile. The Hand of the King glowered.

Tyrion Lannister informed Aegon of the deal, Jon Connington realised, but Aegon didn’t tell me. At the Imp’s behest, no doubt. Aegon had been repeatedly unconcerned about the Vale’s reinforcements heading towards the capital – because the king had known that the Regent of the Vale had his own agenda.

“And what did the Imp offer you in return?” Jon demanded.

Baelish smiled. “Well, it was a trivial matter, really. A personal favour,” he admitted, trying to sound dismissive.

“It regards Lord Lannister’s unfortunate marriage to Sansa Stark,” Littlefinger explained, with a small shrug. “An unwilling betrothal, to be sure. Tyrion offered to have that marriage annulled, such that Sansa Stark might return from exile. He also promised that the next High Septon – whoever Aegon supports as such – would be more than happy to perform the annulment.”

Lord Connington’s eyes narrowed. Petyr Baelish just smiled sweetly. “Lady Sansa’s mother – Catelyn Tully – was a very close childhood friend of mine,” he explained. “I simply want what is best for her daughter.”

“And you negotiated to free her from marriage with the dwarf?”

“What can I say?” Littlefinger shrugged. “I care deeply for the girl.”

When Jon eventually left, he made no arrangements for Littlefinger’s accommodation for the night. There were no rooms for guests prepared, and no stewards with the duty to see to them. Petyr Baelish could sleep on the streets for all Jon cared.

_We would have lost, if the knights of Vale had been on the roseroad as well._ Even in Jon’s triumph, the Imp still found a way to steal his glory. Being forced to deal with the smug coincounter made Jon’s shoulders stiff.

The blissful, delirious feeling of this morning evaporated quickly. _This is still my victory_, Jon told himself, _mine_. The Imp will be forgotten soon enough.

He returned to Red Keep, and found a serjeant to direct him to the king. Aegon was entertaining Lord Tarly and Princess Arianne. The lords’ solar had been ransacked, so Aegon had set up a meeting room in a steward’s quarters on the lower floors.

As Jon stepped into the corridor, he saw a short and curvy woman with dark hair and teary eyes, rushing out from one of the doors. Princess Arianne was dressed in flowing silk, jewels around her neck, and a low-cut bosom, but she was crying into her hands. The princess rushed by the guards and strode away from Jon without even meeting his gaze.

Lord Connington paused for a heartbeat, and then straightened his shoulders and stepped into the room.

The mood inside was grim as Jon stepped in. He saw King Aegon, Lord Tarly, Harry Strickland, the Kingsguard and an assortment of Company serjeants standing around the room. One of the serjeants, Ser Brendel Byrne, stood stiffly before his king with his head raised.

“What happened?” Jon asked, although he already knew. His eyes flickered to Ser Brendel Byrne, but then turned his gaze.

“We had to inform the princess,” Harry explained. “I fear the loss of kin is always difficult.”

“Oh.” Jon kept his voice measured. “How did it happen?”

Aegon nodded at Ser Brendel to speak. “It was at the crossroads, my lord, against Rowan holdouts from the main force. It was not much of a battle; perhaps two hundred men against our five hundred – but there were still bodies. Our forces were caught by surprise from bowmen hidden in the trees,” Ser Brendel recounted, and then shook his head. “It was battle, it was chaotic. Obara was leading from the front – she died with an arrow through the back of her head.”

There was a tut from Ser Lymond Pease in the corner. “All too easily done. Obara must have went too forward, left herself exposed.”
“She was brave,” Ser Brendel said. “She always led the charge.”

“A mistake.” Aegon sounded bitter. “A stupid mistake even when we had already won.”

“That is war, Your Grace.” Lord Tarly’s voice was cautious, stepping slightly towards the king’s side. “Too often it is but a roll of the dice.”

“Arianne was in tears.” Aegon took a deep breath. “I had not even realised Obara had fallen, and yet I gave a victory speech… I was celebrating…”

Jon might have said something cutting, but it would have been out of place in this room. “Obara Sand did her duty, Your Grace,” he soothed. “I was not on the best of terms with her, but none could doubt her bravery. Obara died fighting for what she believed, for the good of the realm.”

He glanced at the serjeant. “Aye.” Ser Brendel nodded. “I saw her fall, she was very brave.”

“I will give Arianne time to grieve,” Aegon nodded. “It is just so…”

“I am sorry, Your Grace,” Ser Brendel said, bowing deeply again. “If there was anything I could have done…”

“No, ser,” Aegon sighed. The young king was disturbed, even for that hideous bastard woman. “There is no blame upon you.”

“Leave us for now, ser.” Jon told the serjeant. “Rest yourself for the night.”

Jon escorted Ser Brendel to the door. Neither of them said a word, but Lord Connington patted the serjeant on the back. Ser Brendel didn’t reply, but he nodded to the Lord Hand.

I will not grieve the bastard’s death, Lord Connington decided. Obara Sand had been, would have been, a liability in Aegon’s court.

The room was still quiet as Lord Connington stepped back inside. Jon noticed Ser Daemon Sand’s glare, fixed firmly upon him. Thankfully, Lord Tarly moved the discussion along.

“We have matters to discuss, Your Grace.” Tarly’s words were careful – he had not settled in to how to act around his new liege.

“Yes.” Aegon nodded, taking a deep breath to focus himself. “Yes, of course. Continue, my lord.”

It was already late, and Jon knew it had been a long day. There had been many long days in a row. “Perhaps this would be best on the morn, Your Grace?” Jon suggested.

“The city does not get to sleep, Lord Hand,” Aegon replied. “And neither do I. Continue, Lord Tarly.”

“Half the city has been burnt to cinders – particularly from the Street of Sisters to the Dragonpit. The west and south edge are somewhat untouched, but fires spread quickly to the north,” Lord Tarly explained. “Flea Bottom suffered badly, but that area was no great loss. Still, the Street of Sisters, the Street of Seeds, the Street of Flour, the Street of Steel… so much of the infrastructure is torched. Cobbler’s Square itself was nearly lost. There are refugees by the tens of thousands, and the people mourn the deaths of the High Sparrow and the Most Devout.” No mourning here.

“Devastated, but some several thousand sparrows and Poor Fellows survive. There are fewer of the Warrior’s Sons remaining, but the Faith is missing most of its central structure.” Tarly explained.

“An army without commanders in no army at all,” Ser Rolly commented.

“Indeed,” Lord Tarly agreed. “I fear the angry militia leftover is naught but a mob.”

“Then we must restore structure,” Jon said firmly. “We reinforce order by establishing the Most Devout again.” And we will establish our own septons and septas in their place, to elect the High Septon that we choose. We make sure the Faith finds its place again.

The fanatical Faith Militant could have been a threat to Aegon’s reign as well – and Jon actually felt grateful towards the Mad Queen for dealing with it for them.

Aegon nodded. “I spoke to many of the surviving Faith – they are angry, and rightfully so. They demand justice, and I will give it. What of the Mad Queen’s allies and conspirators?”

“She had few allies, at least few that I know of,” Lord Tarly replied harshly. “The pyromancers supported her, and most others were mercenaries. All Lannister loyalists surrendered quickly, and the Alchemist’s Guild was destroyed by the mobs. I have placed a bounty of ten gold dragons upon every surviving alchemist and loyalist to the Mad Queen – anybody involved with her will face a swift end, I promise it.”

“Good. I will not forgive such an atrocity,” Aegon declared. “From this moment onwards, the Order of Alchemists and all their practices are outlawed in Westeros. Have any surviving tomes or resources of the order thrown into the sea.” Haldon Halfmaester jotted a note of it – there was a long list of royal proclamations that were forming.

“And what of this spymaster?” Jon pressed. “What of this Lord Qyburn?”

“He survives,” Lord Tarly admitted. “He was said to have fled the city with the giant iron monstrosity of his.”

“Ser Gregor Clegane.” Aegon’s voice was venomous, furious.

Lord Tarly nodded, and there were murmurs in the room. “Yes. I know not how much has been embellished, but they say that the giant knight slaughtered over a hundred men singlehandedly.”

The Mountain. They had all believed him dead by the Red Viper’s blade, and yet apparently the Mad Queen had harboured him in secret. Jon didn’t know whose skull they had in Sunspear, and ‘Robert Strong’s’ face was said to have been covered, but no other man could be so large, or so murderous.

The thought of a man like the Mountain roaming the countryside was somewhat terrifying.

Aegon’s face was as angry as Jon had ever seen it. The Mountain, the man who killed and raped Aegon’s mother and sister. “Place a hundred gold on them both,” Aegon ordered. “And have hunting parties chase them down. They will be brought to justice.”

“Yes, Your Grace.”

The king was pacing the solar, and he kept on pressing Lord Tarly on every detail regarding the siege, the queen’s trial, and the fire. Several times, the Lord of Horn Hill was forced to admit he was unsure – that so much had been clouded by doubt and panic. They weren’t sure about anything, least of all how Cersei had accomplished what she did.
Nobody wanted to say it, but the word ‘necromancy’ hovered over the conversation.

“The black cells were a butcher’s block, Your Grace,” Lord Tarly said grimly. “I would not recommend walking down there, it is a charnel-pit. Hardly a soul who entered them survived, we can only guess what that fiend did beneath this castle.”

The king paced. “What of the survivors from the keep?” Aegon demanded, eventually.

“Your Grace,” Jon warned. “It is late… it has been a trying day.”

“I wish to see the survivors now, my lord.”

Lord Tarly complied. He sent orders to escort the king to the guest chambers in the keep. The corridors were pillaged; tapestries stolen off the walls, even Myrish carpet torn upwards – many of the queen’s sellswords had tried to loot the Red Keep before fleeing.

The only two survivors from the black cells – Ser Lancel Lannister and Ser Loras Tyrell – were both kept in the haunted bedchambers that once housed highborn ladies.

Ser Loras was a wreck. He was unconscious and pale, lying atop a coverless bed with no pillows. The young man was ghostly white and frighteningly frail – his bones were knobbly bumps over under his skin, stretched taut over starved flesh. His hair might have been a different colour, but now it was grey. He was unwashed and stank of dust and dried blood.

Once, this man was said to have been a strong and valiant knight, a Kingsguard. In the last two months, it looked like Loras Tyrell had aged ten years.

Even when he lay down, they could see his legs were twisted and deformed. Broken bones that never healed properly. The king was silent as he hovered over his bed.

“From what we can tell, he fought against Gregor Clegane, Your Grace,” Lord Tarly explained. “And then the Mountain threw him against a wall. Loras’ legs snapped like twigs, and they were never given treatment during his imprisonment. Ser Loras was set to be thrown from a trebuchet too, but the queen’s men either changed their minds or never had the chance.”

Lord Tarly shook his head grimly. “Ser Loras is sickly and may not live much longer, but he was somewhat conscious earlier. Shall I try to rouse him for your questions, Your Grace?”

Aegon pursed his lips, and then shook his head. They left the broken knight on his bed alone.

The other one, Ser Lancel Lannister, also yielded nothing. Jon honestly wasn’t sure if they could even name Ser Lancel a ‘survivor’.

“Do not get close,” one of the men standing guard warned, as they unbarred the door. The guards were all holding swords or axes. “And do not try to reason with it, Your Grace. There is nothing in it but bloodlust.”

They heard Ser Lancel thrashing, the chains rattling furiously. They said that the chains had been rattling like that for days on end, never quieting. Aegon flinched as the door creaked open. Nobody said a word.

If not for the chains, Ser Lancel would have lunged at Aegon on the first sight. The irons rattled.

Lannister men had managed to restrain him first, but then the red cloaks fell to the mobs, and afterwards the Tarly men had recaptured Lancel. There were more chains that Jon had ever seen on a prisoner before — but Lancel Lannister still writhed. He was a frail figure covered in scars and wounds, but there was no blood. The soldiers had hacked off both his arms at the elbows, and yet still, he thrashed.

An armless, insane creature. The stumps hadn’t been cauterised, Jon realised slowly, but they didn’t bleed.

“The Others take…” Aegon gasped in horror. “What is he?”

“I haven’t the foggiest,” Lord Tarly said darkly. “It is Lancel Lannister, we found men enough to identify him.”

“Is it…” The king paused. “Is he human?”

“That… that is a loaded question, Your Grace. I know he has been stabbed through the chest, but he does not die. We haven’t given him water or food either, and yet nevertheless he’s been fighting with all his might for hours on end. He does not tire, does not sleep. One of my men tried to inspect him more closely, and Ser Lancel tore that man’s face off. With his teeth.”

Jon’s eyes stared with horror. \textit{Just what did the queen do? What horror is this?}

“You… you restrained him?” Aegon asked quietly.

“With great difficulty.” Lord Tarly nodded. “He is the last of the queen’s monsters, the only one to be taken – mostly – whole. I mean to have a maester examine him, to discover just what it is we’re dealing with.”

“Yes,” Jon agreed. “Find out what \textit{this} is, and how to kill it.”

It was hideous. Whatever witchcraft this Qyburn had unleashed, Jon meant to find all knowledge of it and burn it out of existence.

Lancel Lannister was trying to mumble something, Jon noted, but it looked like the man’s jaw was broken and he couldn’t speak. Something in Lancel’s eyes looked like he was trying to scream.

They were silent as they walked away. “Increase the bounty to a thousand dragons for Lord Qyburn,” Aegon said finally. “He \textit{will} be brought to justice for the atrocities he unleashed.”

“Very well, Your Grace.”

The king looked pale and numb from the very sight. Even Jon felt shaken.

“It is very late, Your Grace,” Jon insisted. “We must retire.”

Finally, Aegon relented. The royal apartments were said to be too… messy, but there was still a pristine room for the king in the east wing of the castle.

Jon and Aegon walked together, footsteps echoing on stone. The Kingsguard escorted their liege diligently, but kept their distance as Aegon walked with Jon.

“I never…” Aegon muttered, keeping his voice low. For the first all day, his posture threatened to crack. “I never imagined such horrors.”

“That is Cersei’s doing,” Jon insisted. “Not yours.”

“And yet I must deal with them.” The king took a deep breath. “You were right, Griff. This is \textit{my} duty. I must be king, I must fight against the monsters.”

Jon’s lips pursed. “Then we must see your coronation as soon as possible. The people need something to cheer for.”

“Yes. Very well.”

“Within the week.”

Aegon blinked. “So soon?”

“Aye. There can be no delay.” Your authority is still too fragile. “The realm must know you as king.”

“You… yes, you are right.” Aegon glanced at Jon, taking a deep breath and straightening. “And I heard that Lord Baelish has arrived in the city?”

“He has.”

“I apologise for not telling you of the arrangement, Lord Hand,” Aegon admitted. “Tyrion warned me to treat Lord Baelish cautiously, I did not wish to rely on anything he promised. The arrangement we made together was one best played close to my chest.”

That left a foul taste in Jon’s mouth. The Imp and the king, making secret plans together. “And I take it that Lord Petyr Baelish shall be named Warden of the East?”

“He will.” The king nodded. “If he can get the Vale lords to bow, it will be a title well-placed. Lord Baelish shall lose the title anyways, when Robert Arryn comes of age.”

Reluctantly, Jon conceded. From the deal they made, Littlefinger agreed that Robert Arryn was to be warded in King’s Landing, by the king’s side. They would expect the Lord of the Vale in the capital within the week, before any of the Lords Declarant could object. Once Aegon had Lord Arryn, the Vale would be forced to heel.

“Although I do mean to remove Lord Paramount of the Trident from Baelish’s name – that is a title that should return to House Tully, after Edmure swears fealty,” Aegon continued. “While Lord Tyrion Lannister shall be my Warden of the West.” Jon’s jaw tensed somewhat. “And Lord Randyll Tarly shall be Warden of the South.”

He could not protest those either. “And Warden of the North?” Jon asked.

“I would consider keeping Lord Bolton on as Warden of the North, if he succeeds in vanquishing the Bastard King,” Aegon sighed. “But that’s a fool’s hope. I’ve heard no news from the north, I can only presume that it has fallen to the wildling invaders.”

“It likely has,” Jon admitted, before adding, “But it is winter now, and the north shall suffer in winter more than we will.”

The mood turned even more sombre. They were approaching the king’s quarters, the Kingsguard leading the way. “Tomorrow will be a busy day, Your Grace,” Jon warned.

Aegon only barked a humourless chuckle of laughter. “It always is.”

They said farewell. Jon retired for the night himself, but he slept little. For too much of the night he sat on his bed, staring at his hands.
Aegon was to hold his first open court on the morn, to receive vows of fealty from whatever lords had yet to give them. Some lords would give fealty again, just to ensure their vows were witnessed in public. Already the petitioners were flocking — it was all frantic and chaotic, but it was the start of a new regime.

Jon looked down from the balcony, and the courtyard of the Red Keep was heaving. They filled the grounds like sheep overflowing into a pen, neighing and crying for attention.

There would be far more rewards and congratulations — the Golden Company was filled with exiled lords or bastard sons that expected to see their titles restored or lands granted to them. Bastards to be legitimised, inheritances to be claimed. Rosby, Stokeworth, Lothston, Peake, Strickland, Mudd, Strong, Darry, Massey…

An entire dynasty to re-establish. A thousand knighthoods to award, and a hundred lands and titles to reassign.

And the gallows. There would be no shortage of traitors to hang, Jon had no doubt.

Lord Connington met Aegon again in the king’s solar behind the throne room. His squires were running wild trying to keep up with a thousand demands, while the king was being dressed in velvet with gold trim. Septa Lemore stood over him, and the king fidgeted as she straightened his collar.

“How goes it out there?” the septa asked.

“Thriving,” Lord Connington muttered dryly. “The people want sight of the king, and we must give it to them.”

Aegon grimaced as the septa twiddled with his shirt. “They want more than just to see me. They want order again.” He sighed. “And they will want titles and lands from me. So many expect due reward.”

“And a few will try to take undue reward,” Lord Connington warned. “They will petition you, and you must appear firm, but take care not to make hasty decisions. Do not make any proclamations without consideration. There are many who might take to think advantage of a young king.”

“I know,” Aegon said finally, finally pulling free of the septa. His collar was high and tight. “Arianne warned me the same thing herself — she said that I appear an outsider, that I was vulnerable.”

Jon grimaced. Arianne was actually the one Jon had been warning him of. The Halfmaester stepped through the doorway. “Your Grace,” Haldon called, “we have ravens from houses—”

“Later, Halfmaester,” Jon ordered, dismissing the man as he kept his eyes on Aegon. There would be a scant few moments to talk privately. “Regarding Arianne,” Lord Connington warned, lowering his voice. “Lords Yronwood and Fowler are at the front of the procession. The Dornish mean to pressure you, Your Grace, and Arianne still has intentions of marrying you.”

“I am aware,” Aegon admitted, while the septa tightened his waistband. “And do not worry, my lord, I know the need hasn’t changed. When my aunt arrives from Meereen, I shall greet Daenerys warmly from the Iron Throne and offer both my hand and the kingdom on a silver platter. I will give her a dutiful husband and a kingdom, and she will give me children and dragons.”

There was quiet pause. “But until Daenerys arrives, I must remain unbetrothed.” Aegon shook his head. “My duty must be to preserve the Targaryen dynasty, not to the Dornish.”
Jon blinked, caught off-guard by the strength in his voice. “Yes,” he said approvingly. “That is exactly right.”

“Your Grace,” a squire called. “The Kingsguard shall be ready to escort you out in shortly.”

“Thank you, Martyn,” Aegon called, and then turned back to Jon. “Actually, my lord,” the king mused, “I was debating on arranging a match between Lord Tyrion and Princess Arianne. A union between Dorne and the west, to heal rifts and strength the realm.”

Jon blinked in surprise. “Arianne and the Imp?” he said, aghast. “Your Grace, you cannot…”

“For what not?” Aegon paused. The Halfmaester tried to call them again, but they dismissed him. “Tyrion and Arianne are of an age, both of noble birth and unquestionable status. A reward for two of my strongest allies – a very strong alliance between Dorne and the west just when we need it the most.”

For a second, Jon’s mouth hung open as he tried to speak. “Aegon, you cannot give a Lannister rights to Dorne…”

Before the king could reply, there were other shouts calling for them. Aegon grimaced. “Go see to them, my lord,” he ordered. “I must see to court, but we will talk later.”

Yes, we will, Jon thought aghast. Tyrion Lannister betrothal to Arianne Martell? It’d be…

Haldon Halfmaester was waiting outside with a large stack of parchments. The Halfmaester looked tired and frayed. “They came during the night,” he explained. “The rookery is… in disrepair, my lord.”

Jon’s jaw clenched, flickering through the pile dismissively. He did not have time right now for any letters from Rosby, Acorn Hall, Crow’s Nest, Maidenpool, Bitterbridge, Saltpans…

He stopped. There was a parchment marked with the red lion, a letter from Casterly Rock. That letter, Jon tore open hungrily.

The letter was short and succinct. It wasn’t written in the Imp’s hand.

‘The cat is in the bag,’ the letter read, ‘the bag is in the ocean’.

It was written in Ser Franklyn Flowers’ big, unwieldy handwriting.

Jon burst into a grin. Jon reread it three times, the better to savour the letter. His smile was so bright and gleeful that the Halfmaester looked unnerved. “My… my lord?” he asked confused.

“Good news, Haldon,” Lord Connington replied, recovering his posture. He quickly scrunched up the letter and pocketed it before anyone else could read it. “Just some good news.”

Tyrion Lannister is dead.

‘The cat’ was code that Ser Franklyn and Jon had agreed upon, to refer to the Imp. When the time came, Ser Franklyn had been set to kill the cat.

The Imp is dead! It felt like a weight off Jon’s shoulders, finally he could breathe.

There was little doubt it would have been over quickly. Ser Franklyn Flowers – the Bad Apple of Cider Hall – was the biggest, meanest sellsword that Jon had ever known. The Company men would follow Ser Franklyn, not the Imp. I hope the Imp screamed when Franklyn turned on him.
Why not announce it? Lord Connington wondered, before realising himself. No, there’s no point. The Imp’s sellswords were locked up in Casterly Rock – news in or out was very restricted. Until the siege dropped, nobody would even know that the Imp was dead.

It was a better option for Ser Franklyn to do the deed, and then pretend otherwise. For now, it benefitted Aegon if the realm believed Tyrion Lannister was alive in Casterly Rock. When the siege was dropped and the Rock opened, then Tyrion Lannister would be revealed to have died in very uncertain circumstances – a perfect inglorious end to the creature.

The dwarf deserved to be drowned.

Jon was feeling so elated he might have skipped. Another of Aegon’s enemies, removed from the king’s path.

The king was sitting upon the throne as the petitioners were prepared. Jon approached him carefully, and whispered in his ear.

“I have had time to reconsider the betrothal, Your Grace,” Jon said with a faint smile. “And I think it a splendid idea. Lannister and Martell together will be a strong match, Your Grace.”

Tis exactly what the grasping Dornish deserve, to put Arianne in her place. Betrothed to a dead drowned dwarf.

Aegon grinned, looking down at Lord Connington with surprise. “I’m glad you think so, my lord,” Aegon said. “The war may not be over, but we must secure our allies. And, considering it, there is one well-deserved reward that we have not yet discussed.”

They were opening the doors to the hall, guards taking position. “Whose, Your Grace?”

“Your own,” Aegon said, grinning. “One of my first decrees that I can be certain of; I mean to return to Griffin’s Roost their rightful lands and titles, and I shall name you as the Lord Paramount of the Stormlands.”

Jon froze. “My lord, you should not…”

“It is well-deserved,” Aegon said firmly. “And House Baratheon is as good as extinct, but who can question House Connington’s heritage or right? This is your king’s command, my lord; take Storm’s End as your own, my lord, I will need you to bring order to the stormlords.”

“There is no scion of my house, my lord,” Lord Connington protested quietly. Nothing but a branch of traitorous second cousins, nearly all now held captive at his reclaimed seat.

“Yet you are still young,” Aegon insisted. “I promise to arrange a suitable betrothal; but I can think of no better man for the task. My grandfather took most of your lands, but I mean to see them restored. Is Griffin’s Roost not adjacent to Storm’s End? You may claim both castles, you deserve no less.”

Jon didn’t reply. His eyes flickered towards his gloved hands. “Very well, Your Grace,” he said, somewhat reluctantly. It would be a moot point.

They opened the doors for the petitioners in the king’s court, but Lords Baelish and Tarly were at the very front of the queue. Both of them came before Aegon with their heads held high, to bend the knee before the new dynasty.

Littlefinger was first. He was grinning from ear to ear as Aegon appointed him Warden of the East before the whole court.

Afterwards, Littlefinger motioned for a man of his to stand forward, carrying a small chest before the throne. “A gift for you, Your Grace,” Lord Baelish’s voice was smooth. “A gift in honour of your accomplishments, and the justice you’ve achieved for your family.”

The chest opened slowly, and six dull red stones shone inside the box sitting upon velvet lining. They were large rocks, some of them cracked with age. Not rocks, Jon realised slowly, gems.

“Six rubies, Your Grace,” Littlefinger said pridefully. “Recovered from your own father’s armour, and washed down the Trident. It is my honour to return Rhaegar’s rubies to you.”

The whole court stirred. Aegon was left momentarily speechless, looking genuinely flattered. He thanked Littlefinger sincerely, shaking the man’s hand and then handing the rubies to Lord Connington.

“Six rubies, for the six realms that declare for you,” said Littlefinger, grinning. “The seventh will be had soon enough, I’m sure.”

Jon couldn’t protest, but he didn’t like the smirk on Baelish’s lips. He glanced down at the stones, and they were most certainly as large as the ones Rhaegar had worn. Still, where once the rubies had been bright crimson, the time and grime had turned the gems more black than red.

Lord Tarly came next, to repeat his own fealty before the Iron Throne. Perhaps not to be outdone, Lord Tarly brought a gift of his own – a long and slender red sword, with a rippling crimson blade and two lions with ruby eyes carved into the crossguard.

“A Valyrian steel sword, Your Grace,” Lord Tarly announced. “Once belonging to the falseborn Joffrey, but presented to you so that its legacy might be redeemed.”

Aegon stepped down from the throne, to accept the blade graciously. “Widow’s Wail, the sword was named,” Lord Tarly added. “It was forged by Tywin and gifted to Joffrey, but never wielded by either.”

It was a fine and rich blade, Jon admitted. Widow’s Wail rippled gloriously – gold and rubies shimmering in the light. The Tarly men must have recovered the sword when the castle fell, Jon thought. Widow’s Wail.

“Many thanks, my lord – tis a grand gift,” Aegon said, before pausing. “And yet it would be presumptuous of me to hold two Valyrian swords,” he mused, glancing down to Blackfyre on his hip. There were a few chuckles in the court. “No, this is still a Lannister family sword, and it is not for me to redeem it. I feel that this sword is a just reward to pass on to Lord Tyrion Lannister, to congratulate him on his contribution to our victory.”

Lord Tarly bowed. “As you say, Your Grace.”

I doubt that the dwarf has any need for a blade under the sea, Jon thought, but he held his tongue. He could not deny the impact it had upon Aegon’s image; it made the king look benevolent and fair to donate such a treasure to another for good service done. It would encourage loyalty in a way that not easily matched. Look upon the king – for he is kind, chivalrous and charitable.

There were more petitions, more vows and more gifts – but none as notable as the first two. Still, the mood in the court felt increasingly content and optimistic. It was like Jon could feel the realm knitting together with every easy smile and heartfelt laugh from Aegon.
This is what I wanted, Jon thought. All my life, this is what I wanted. The realm would rally behind him, and his king would be in good stead.

Jon had only the briefest of moments between petitioner to talk to his king. “My small council needs to be named,” Aegon said to Jon. Ser Roger Hogg, young Lady Ermesande Hayford and her retinue had just left the hall, after giving fealty and a tribute of fine wolf pelts to the king. “And I have three positions on the Kingsguard to fill, let alone Lord Commander.”

The Hand hesitated. “Lord Tarly would be a good choice for master of laws,” Lord Connington said. “And Lysono Maar could fill in the duties of master of whisperers.”

“I agree,” Aegon nodded. “And Lord Baelish has petitioned me to name him master of ships, I do not see how I can deny him.” The king’s hand was still cradling the chest of his father’s rubies. Six rubies to buy a seat at the table.

Jon’s jaw tightened. Damn the man. And yet it was hard to deny Littlefinger the position; with the royal fleet stolen and Redwyne fleet crushed, the Vale now had one of the largest fleets left to them. Littlefinger was rich and had a strong hand in trade – he would be capable as master of ships, Jon had no doubt. But the coincounter deliberately circumvented me and went straight to the king to gain it. Is there no end to his gall?

“Very well,” Lord Connington conceded, after a long moment’s pause. Littlefinger was another one who would have to be taken care of. “Lord Baelish can be master of ships.”

“And Haldon Halfmaester can serve as Grand Maester,” Aegon mused. Lord Connington open his mouth to object. “At least temporarily, my lord,” Aegon soothed, and Lord Connington relented. As far as he knew, all the Citadel’s archmaesters were dead or captured. “But what of master of coin?” Aegon asked. “I know that Lord Tyrion seeks the position again, but the Golden Company also promised it to our magister friend in Pentos? Both have served me exceptionally, it is hard to disappoint either.”

“Neither of those men are ideal,” Jon said foully. The Imp is a depraved fiend, he thought, and a dead fiend at that – while Magister Illyrio is a fat, opportunistic cheesemonger, and a foreigner to boot. “I would prefer Harry Strickland as master of coin, Your Grace, but you cannot–”

His voice was cut off, as Ser Willis Wode entered the throne room to give fealty. There were a hundred different matters to attend to – lands to be redistributed, pardons to be granted and positions to be named – it was hard to even keep track of them all.

Come afternoon, the court was finally closed without even a tenth of the petitioners seen. The king stepped out onto the steps and vowed to see them all within the week, but for now he had to retire. The king was pestered even as they walked up the steps to the rookery, voices calling constantly for Aegon’s judgment or notice, and then they stepped into the maester’s quarters where dozens of scribes were combing and sorting through letters and parchments scattered throughout the chambers. Cages of squawking ravens were being brought up the steps from their camps, and the stewards and servants were still working to establish their stations in the Red Keep.

The rookery was in disrepair. The tower had been pillaged by the mobs, and the Red Keep’s own ravens had died in the siege. There were raven corpses still rotting in cages. Haldon Halfmaester was there, trying to sort through all the mess and activity.

The first of Aegon’s decrees were already being sketched out, while the rest of the stewards, squires and scribes were trying to re-establish order.
Jon had to raise his voice to dismiss the petitioners from the room, while Septa Lemore brought Aegon a plate of roasted potatoes, meaty gravy with parsnips and salted beef. The septa handled the meal herself; until they established which servants were trustworthy, all of the king’s meals had to be prepared personally by someone in his inner circle.

“I have perhaps an hour before I must meet with my council,” Aegon said a sigh, picking up the plate. “And I mean to break my fast while I can. Is there news, Haldon, and can you talk while I eat?”

They’d caught the Halfmaester at a less than ideal time, but he nodded, the sweat of exertion beading at his brow.

“There’s more news than I care to guess at, and less than I care to believe, Your Grace. We’ve gathered what remains of Cersei and Qyburn’s correspondence and placed them there.” The Halfmaester nodded to a corner of the rookery filled with crates. “I will have the scribes peruse them, but the letters have taken much damage.”

“Do it as soon as possible, Haldon,” Aegon addressed his once-tutor. “I want to know who that fiend was working with, and where he went.”

“And how he did what he did,” Jon added. “Learn whatever you can of the arts that Qyburn employed.”

Haldon nodded, and then explained the news. The news.

Illyrio had set sail from Pentos, and would arrive within days. Allies from Lys were expected within weeks. The Iron Bank had representative in the city, calling for the king’s attention. Surviving maesters scattered across the realm were calling a gathering of their numbers; they were demanding to know what remained of their Conclave.

Lysono Maar entered the room with his own reports, filling in details where he could. Frustratingly, there was so much uncertainty around both Oldtown and Winterfell.

Instead, there were tales of refugees from the north, fleeing the winter and the wildlings, all along the kingsroad from the ruins of the Twins down to Darry. Dark rumours spread of the brotherhood without banners. Jon Lothston wrote of a pack of wolves a thousand strong haunting the lands around Harrenhal, preying on man and beast alike. Tales of some mad crone under a hill at High Heart proclaiming the end of the world, while a cloud of crows fit to darken the sky was said to have gathered at the Isle of Faces. More words flying on dark wings than Jon knew of, or cared to believe.

Aegon read what he could, and listened to the rest while chewing on salted beef. They had so many scrawled reports and writings from a realm distraught with war.

From there it got vaguer. There were letters from lands distant. There were rumours of a fleet emerging from Slaver’s Bay, and some eruption or explosion in the Smoking Sea. An outbreak of the Sailor’s Bane had been reported in the Stepstones. A Ghiscari attempt to resettle Gogossos had been ended by some unknown Sothoryi horror. Volantis was said to have dispatched its fleet to Meereen, with the city itself on the brink of civil war. A trader from the Saffron Straits had reported a cloud akin to a thousand shadows in the black lands north of Ulos. The very furthest letter they received said that the Golden Empire of Yi Ti had declared a state of emergency, and the Azure Emperor had sealed his borders against some sort of plague. There were so many mutterings of smallfolk and fearmongers.
Haldon was halfway through reading out a letter reporting of two Ibbenese whalers that had vanished in the Narrow Sea in queer conditions, when Strickland’s squire rushed through the door to alert them that the council room was ready.

The king gulped down the last of his meal, and rushed down the stairs with his Hand of the King. The Wardens of the South and the East were already waiting in the informal council. Harry Strickland joined them, reporting on coin and supplies as they walked. Armies needed mustering, alliances needed to be brokered…

“What of the Reach, Your Grace?” Lord Tarly insisted, as they stepped inside. “This pageantry is all well and good, but what of my son in Oldtown, and the kraken to the west?”

“I’d be more concerned with the actual dragon to the north,” Littlefinger retorted, folding his arms. “Of the two threats, the Bastard King poses the direst one.”

“The Bastard King has been reserved mostly to the north and his own concerns,” Lord Tarly argued. “But the Crow’s Eye threatens the entire realm. The Bastard King seems to care little for anything outside his crusade, while the Crow’s Eye terrorises our lands with impunity. No, the ironborn cannot be ignored.”

“I would say they are both threats that we cannot ignore,” Harry Strickland noted.

Aegon stepped between them surely, his knuckles tapping on wood. “These are all threats that we will deal with, one by one, my lords,” Aegon insisted. “Lord Tarly, you will have every aid to put the Reach in order. Your army must prepare to march south. You shall join with the forces of the Golden Company at Bitterbridge, then move on wards to Highgarden. I shall send Lord Peake to treat with Highgarden to see that the way is prepared, but Ser Loras will remain in King’s Landing under care.”

Under care, Jon considered, and as a hostage, should Willas Tyrell attempt to resist. The two last sons of Mace Tyrell were both crippled.

“What is to be done concerning the Tyrells, Your Grace?” Harry Strickland asked.

“When Willas Tyrell bends the knee, I will happily take him as an ally,” Aegon said surely. “And the longer it takes Lord Willas to do so, the more House Tyrell will forfeit in land and rank.”

Jon noticed that Lord Tarly’s jaw tensed somewhat. “And I shall write to Doran Martell, to have Dorne muster their forces from Starfall. There will be no priority wasted, my lord,” Aegon promised. Lord Tarly only nodded, keeping his expression guarded.

“The Golden Company will march west, towards Casterly Rock,” Aegon continued, nodding to Harry Strickland. “I trust the good captain-general to recover the west, and to relieve the siege at Lord Tyrion’s seat.”

“That campaign is half-won already,” said the captain-general, chuckling. “I expect Lord Tyrion to welcome me with a feast.” Not unless you happen to fish the Imp from the ocean, Jon thought quietly, but it’ll be a rotten feast. Jon might have chuckled himself, but he kept the spiteful jape hidden from his face.

“Aye. And when Lord Tyrion and captain-general rally the western forces,” Aegon said, looking back to Lord Tarly, “the armies of the west, the stormlands, the Reach and Dorne shall converge to stop the ironborn from all sides. There will be justice for the carnage the Crow’s Eye has wrought.”

He speaks surely now, Jon noted. The Hand of the King had nothing to contribute. The Lord of Horn only nodded.

"I notice that you did not mention yourself in that plan, Your Grace," Lord Baelish said, keeping his hands folded behind his back.

"It is my duty to sit on the throne, and to salve wounds of the realm," Aegon replied firmly, "I must rebuild the capital, recover the riverlands and crownlands, and help the Faith heal from the atrocities it has suffered. The riverlands is a land fractured, but under Lord Tully they will come together again." The king nodded, and then straightened his shoulders. "And I shall lead the resistance against the Bastard King myself."

"Perhaps I may be of assistance in that effort," Lord Baelish spoke quietly. All eyes turned to him. "I have close ties to House Stark – I was a strong friend to Lord Eddard, and a close confidant to his wife. I have been keeping closely informed of the situation in the north, the Vale has close ties. I might assist in reaching out to this Jon Snow."

"Of course." Aegon nodded. "And the knights of Vale will be critical in defeating the wildlings and retaking the north."

"I would advise... negotiation," There was something of an emphasis in the way Littlefinger said that word, "as a first resort, Your Grace. Perhaps a political solution may yet yield fruit." He looked around the room. "Perhaps even brokering an alliance."

Lord Tarly shook his head. "So long as the Bastard King sits upon a dragon," he said, with a hint of foulness, "then there can be no political solution."

"I must disagree," Littlefinger insisted. "And negotiation seems like a prudent first step to attempt. I am willing to go to Winterfell as an envoy myself."

Jon’s instinctive reaction was to object, but then he paused. If matters with the Bastard King devolve, he reasoned, then the Eyrie should be the very first disintegrated in dragonfire. "I agree," Lord Connington said surely. "Lord Baelish should take point on that matter."

Aegon paused, looking between Tarly and Baelish. The king nodded. "Very well then," Aegon said. "I shall trust in the expertise of my wardens."

Lord Tarly didn’t look so convinced, a frown creasing his features. "Negotiation is hesitation. It will only serve to project weakness on our part, and it will grant the Bastard King more time to secure his invasion."

"I have to argue that point, my lord." The coincounter seemed to smirk. "The north is in the grip of winter, and wracked by storms. Jon Snow commands tens of thousands of wildlings, all with empty bellies which I expect will remain empty."

"White Harbour has been left sacked in a recent pirate raid; they have no trade, few resources left to them. It may be that for but a few food shipments, the white dragon can be kept tame until spring. More than enough time to secure peace by other means, should he prove intractable."

Other means. Jon noted that, stony-faced. Baelish cannot be trusted.

Aegon frowned, then nodded. "Do it. Treat with the Bastard King, ensure that we do not face an invasion from the north. I will leave it in your hands." He turned to the captain-general. "We have our tasks, then. Lord Strickland, the Golden Company will recover Edmure Tully and rally the armies from Riverrun to Lannisport." The king turned to the Lord of Horn Hill. "Lord Tarly, you shall have the command of the campaign in the Reach, to throw the Crow’s Eye back into the sea."
“What then?” he asked. “The Iron Islands must the pay for their crimes.”

Aegon hesitated, then nodded. “There will be no negotiation with Euron Greyjoy, he has made his madness quite clear. We will storm the Iron Islands, and put the butcher and all his allies to the sword.”

Lord Connington had nothing to comment. Lord Tarly is a capable man, Jon told himself. And Baelish is a viper, but even he has his uses. Aegon had passed the halfway mark – the majority of the Seven Kingdoms were his. Capable men would flock around him. Perhaps the king doesn’t need me anymore.

Jon tried to flex his right hand, but he couldn’t. What use was a Hand of the King that couldn’t move his hands?

Lord Connington stayed fairly quiet during the meeting, as Harry Strickland and Lord Tarly discussed logistics and troops with their king. The discussion went outwards – affairs in the Reach, the north, in the stormlands and riverlands, and then the crownlands…

The conversations continued onwards, even as the shadows lengthened and the sun darkened from yellow to red. At a certain point, Lysono Maar entered the chamber to give his own insights. There was talk of negotiating with the Iron Bank, of hiring sellswords and sellsails, and of purchasing supplies from Free Cities to feed the city come the dark of winter.

The talk slowly turned towards Stannis Baratheon on Dragonstone. The man was a pirate in the Narrow Sea, and sitting on the mouth of the Blackwater.

“Stannis Baratheon is not to be neglected,” Lord Tarly warned. “He has been crippled several times, but he has remained defiant regardless.”

“I have heard of Stannis,” Harry Strickland noted. “Defeated on the Blackwater, defeated in the north, and now turned raider.”

“And he has been targeting the Faith of the Seven in particular,” Lysono added. “Stannis has clashed with both Tyrell and Lannister, yet the Red God he brings has been growing... violently. The man has been enforcing his power over the houses sworn to Dragonstone – Celtigar, Bar Emmon, Massey and Velaryon have all suffered from him.”

“He has proven himself difficult,” Lord Tarly confessed. “Stannis does not lack for stubbornness.”

“How many men does he have?” Aegon asked.

“Not many men, but he has no shortage of good fortune,” Tarly explained dryly. “And fanaticism. Not the Redwyne fleet nor the royal fleet was able to shift him – in every naval battle, Stannis has the wind in his sails while the enemy fights a headwind. Demon’s luck, they say, and the fires on Dragonstone have been burning non-stop.”

Aegon shook his head. “We cannot allow such a knife at the throat of the capital…”

The Golden Company had been allowing it for months, while Stannis has been useful to them. They had happily taken advantage of Stannis so long as he was hurting Lannisters too. Now, Stannis was a nuisance to them as well.

“We will need ships to siege Dragonstone,” Harry warned. “And we are lacking such warships. An assault could be costly.”
Aegon grimaced. There was talk of building ships, or hiring sellsails, but he could feel the uncertainty in the room. “Stannis is a now more than ever a threat,” Lord Tarly warned. “To anybody who sticks to the Baratheon regime, Stannis is now undoubtedly the rightful king. He may yet find support from any who would still oppose a Targaryen.”

Harry flustered at that statement, but the Lord of Horn Hill spoke the truth. He was right, Lord Connington considered, perhaps some stubborn stormlord may yet declare for King Stannis…

Lord Connington stood silently, as slowly a plan took shape. I must see Aegon in good stead.

“Perhaps a softer approach is required,” Lord Connington said suddenly. “Perhaps we might negotiate with Stannis Baratheon instead.”

The room froze, all eyes turning to him. “I don’t think that would be useful, my lord,” said Harry, frowning. “Stannis has made his intentions quite clear.”

“I insist,” the Lord Hand said firmly, looking at Aegon. “Your Grace, let me go to Stannis Baratheon myself, as an envoy in your stead. I will go under a banner of truce, and negotiate an armistice with Stannis.”

There were a few objections, but Lord Connington remained firm. Harry Strickland looked confused, and Lord Tarly’s gaze narrowed. Aegon’s eyes widened. “My lord…!”

“Stannis is a fanatic, Lord Hand,” Harry warned. “He is not like to respect a truce – he’d be more inclined to burn you alive.”

Yes, he would. “I must insist, Your Grace.” Jon said firmly, looking at Aegon. “Let me do this. Let me be your Hand.”

Aegon hesitated. His lips pursed, but the young man trusted Jon more than any other. “Very well, my lord,” the king said finally. “You shall go to Dragonstone as my envoy.”

Lord Connington just nodded. I am so, so proud of you, he thought silently.

The meeting ended fairly quickly afterwards, and Jon said little else.

The capital had been taken, and now the realm had to be secured. East, west, north, south – they would be dispersing to every direction, and he had his own role to play. He strained his fingers slightly, and grimaced. His hands were turning to stone.

His shoulders were stiff, but he was resigned. It had to happen sooner or later. Still, Jon might be able to benefit King Aegon even in death.

He would be able to give Rhaegar’s son this final service.

As they exited the solar, they went their separate ways. Aegon had another hundred kingly duties to attend to, and Jon had a few final preparations to make. Lord Tarly waited for Lord Connington in the corridor. The lord’s eyes were narrowed, suspicious.

“What are you intending, Lord Hand?” Lord Tarly demanded of him, looking to Jon cautiously. “What do you hope to achieve negotiating with Stannis Baratheon?”

“Achieve? Nothing.” Jon’s gaze flickered down to his right glove. “I merely intend to approach Stannis, and to shake his hand.”

Majority of the Warrior’s Sons upon Visenya’s Hill, Near all the Lannister men,
The Alchemist’s Guild,
Uncountable number of civilians within the city.

The ‘Battle’:

The death of Tommen Baratheon drives the Queen Dowager to insanity. Lord Qyburn and Lord Hallyne the pyromancer support the plot,
The desecrated body of Queen Margaery Tyrell is sent forward as a distraction, while Lord Qyburn’s undead creations storm the Great Sept with casks of wildfire,
The queen’s ambush burns and devastates the Great Sept on Visenya’s Hill,
The necromantic creatures terrify the defenders, sparking mass hysteria,
Fires spread throughout the city, extreme riots are triggered,
The crazed mobs target Lannister and Tyrell men under the immediate presumption that the crown had declared war against the Faith,
The Alchemist’s Guild is stormed by the mobs and the casks of stored wildfire ignite, devastating the Street of Sisters,
The Red Keep is stormed by both Kevan Lannister and the mobs. The commanders lose control of the situation,
The queen’s garrison slaughters hostages before they fall,
Ser Robert Strong singlehandedly routs the Faith’s blockades, captures Lancel Lannister, Mace Tyrell and his forces return from the Battle of Roseroad, to be ambushed in the panic.

Aftermath:

A third of King’s Landing is destroyed,
Refugees line the edge of the Blackwater in droves,
Queen Cersei and King Tommen are both discovered dead,
Kevan Lannister’s body discovered after several days, Mace Tyrell and his mother are found dead in the streets,
Lord Qyburn and Ser Robert Strong escape through hidden tunnels, to destinations unknown,
Alchemy and pyromancy is decried and outlawed, and a standing bounty placed upon all of the Mad Queen’s supporters,
Lancel Lannister is captured, as the last of Qyburn’s creations,
Lord Randyll Tarly surrenders to Aegon Targaryen in order to restore the city,
The Golden Company brings aid and King Aegon is hailed as their saviour, Magister Illyrio of Pentos wholeheartedly supports such efforts. The relief ships arrive very quickly.

Chapter End Notes

Author Notes:
Well, this chapter was my longest yet. I feel fairly disgusted with myself for writing something so long.
Just to clarify; Jon has been pretty much uninvolved with the war around King's Landing simply because he wasn't present. The whole realm knows about the ice dragon, there was a whole lot of panic about it, but then Jon simply chose not to get involved with anything south of the Neck. He had his priorities in the north.

Let's say that, after the Twins, if Jon and his dragon had stayed south and started a campaign in the riverlands - he likely would have drummed up some support, Sonagon would force and frighten others into bowing, and then Jon might have ended up in the running for the Iron Throne. When Cersei went into her explosive spiral, it might have been Jon with an army and a dragon outside of King's Landing to pick up the pieces. Military-wise, Jon and his dragon could have done it easily - it would be all the political problems likely to threaten him.

Instead, Jon wasn't there, and so Aegon was the one with the army and the opportunity to take the Iron Throne (exactly how Varys and Illyrio planned for him). Aegon has been specially designed to be the young and likeable king by Varys and Illyrio - Aegon has a devoted PR team that's been working wonders. It has literally been Varys' and Illyrio's whole plan from the beginning - to raze hell and discord in the kingdom (originally intended by means of a Dothraki horde, but that part failed), to then push the Baratheon regime to collapse, and then to introduce Aegon as the better alternative.

Meanwhile, Jon decided to focus all his attention on securing the north, at the same time as Euron has been (literally) raising waves in the Reach and Aegon has been marching up the kingsroad. For Jon's part, that was probably a good decision - if he had really been so distracted with a simultaneous campaign in the riverlands, then the Boltons would have had even more of an opportunity to backstab him. Not to mention, there would have then been even more set against Jon, with sabotage coming from the likes of Varys, Illyrio and all the vipers around the capital.

Right now, they are the three big players in Westeros; Euron, Aegon, and Jon - sitting at Oldtown, King's Landing and Winterfell respectively. Three kings, and one queen on her way.

Also, there will be a hiatus over Christmas. I'm looking to get one or two chapters out before then, but then I'll be stopping for a while.

The Onion

“You’re free to go,” the white-haired, dour-faced castellan said, stepping into Davos’ narrow chambers. “Pack up your belongings and exit by the dusk.”

“I do not have any belongings, my lord,” Davos replied. He had lived as a ‘guest’ at New Castle for so long; he didn’t even own the clothes on his back. The salt-crusted furs that he had arrived in had likely been burnt by the washerwomen.

“Then I’d expect you to exit sooner,” the man said curtly. “Just be ready to leave.”

Davos blinked. “Leave,” he repeated. He kept his voice low. “Leave to where?”

“Wherever you choose. Your rights of hospitality have expired, and once you leave these gates you are no concern of ours.”

“Just like that?”

“Just like that,” he agreed, before walking off. The castellan likely had better things to do.

Davos sat on the edge of his bed, staring after the castellan’s back. He never moved. Ser Wylan Whitwick was a sharp-spoken man with a sagging gut, one who seemed to enjoy enforcing his order on everyone around him. Davos knew his type well; the sort who would boss others around just so they could hear the sound of their own voice. The servants never liked him; they sniggered behind his back. Ser Wylan was the son of some petty lord in the city, who had been raised to knighthood for some favour his father provided.

Davos had tried to learn about the state of affairs in White Harbour, he had talked to the serving folk to find out all he could. He had heard that House Whitwick was a family of candle-makers in the city, who had bought a lordship after illuminating the New Castle in high-quality tallow candles. Ser Wylan became castellan of the New Castle itself more for his supreme organisational skills, rather than any act of great valour or bravery.

Perhaps that is where I went wrong, Davos mused. I might have become an onion farmer rather than a smuggler. Perhaps I’d have become the onion lord through that means.

His eyes glanced down to the stumps of his fingers – pale white skin over gaunt hands. More and more, he was missing his bag of fingerbones, likely long-buried on some sandy strand or another of the Blackwater Bay.

Even down in his cells, he’d been able to hear the commotion from above. The New Castle had been in an uproar ever since the battle, the servants frantic, rushing to a dozen tasks all at once every day.

The fighting hadn’t reached inside the castle itself, but every man and woman of the castle had still heard the clashing outside the gates. The riots as the green cloaks, the smallfolk, and the wildlings turned on one another.

The battle had been over a week ago now, yet some embers took a while to cool. Even now, he could hear the echoes of shouts, coming from the higher levels of the New Castle.

A servant came by his door shortly later, looking at him with confusion. “Whitwick said that you were leaving,” the young serving woman stared at him.

“It appears so.” Davos grimaced. “Tell me, Sera, what’s happening in the castle? I hear the commotion.”

“The ram is butting heads with the merman, milord,” the serving woman frowned. “I hear Lord Malcolm Woolfield of Ramsgate is up in arms over the sentencing of his sister Leona. They say that Woolfield betrayed the dragon for the flayed man, that they’re all traitors. The lord is to bring the house to court, I hear the wildlings are set to raze Ramsgate to the ground.”

“I… I see.” Davos recalled, House Woolfield, had mustered men very quickly, to support White Harbour as soon as the news of the attack reached them. There were many Ramsgate men in New Castle presently. Davos had thought Ramsgate a close ally to the Manderlys. It was a turbulent time for northern politics, it seemed.

Sera looked nervous. “The Candle Knight said that I was to change your linens, milord.”

Davos shook his head. “I’m not leaving, Sera.”

“Whitwick–”

“I will talk to Ser Whitwick,” he replied. The girl grimaced and walked away, while Davos stayed perfectly still as he quietly considered his options.

There were very few of them.

Ser Wylan returned about an hour later, walking briskly to Davos’ room. Davos was still sitting upright on his bed. “Are you ready? I shall find you an escort to the gates.”

“I want to speak to the lord,” Davos demanded.

Ser Wylan sneered. “The lord,” he said haughtily, “has more important matters occupying his time.”

Lord Manderly was grieving, the whispers said. The lord of White Harbour was said to be locked in his chambers, weeping and pigging out on pies, left distraught over the death of his son. His son and heir had fallen in battle, the rumours said, his own daughter-in-law a conspirator against their family.

“What of King Snow?” Davos asked. “Where is the king?”

“None of your business. Now stand up, Onion Lord.”

Once, Davos had even plotted on how he might escape. He had rehearsed possibilities; how he might sneak away, or stowaway on a ship. He had longed to leave. Still, to leave like this… “I have no coin on my person,” Davos said carefully. “I have no rations, no horse, no shelter – I am in a foreign land, and I am like to starve by the roadside if you expel me like this.”

Ser Wylan scoffed. That ugly cast to his expression; the curl of his lips spoke volumes. Why is that my problem? his gaze asked.

“Stand up from your bed,” Ser Wylan ordered, “or I shall have the guards remove you.”

Davos’ lips pursed. Davos had honestly lost count of how long it had been since Hardhome. First, he had been captive at Eastwatch, then White Harbour. “I have been here for months. Why are you removing me now?”

“Why would we keep you?” Ser Wylan replied, his voice foul. “You arrived as the king’s hostage, but there is no use to you. There is no one to pay your ransom, no one who cares to retrieve you.”

“I have a family,” Davos replied. Three sons and a wife, the last time I checked. “My wife keeps lands on Cape Wrath. I am the Lord of the Rainwood.”

Ser Wylan scoffed. “And I could be the King of the Seven Kingdoms by the same token. Having a madman name me such does not make it so.” Ser Wylan shook his head. “We would place your ransom at a cart full of onions, but your family couldn’t even afford the trip to deliver them.”

Davos grimaced. “I am the Hand of the King.”

“Aye, and your king refuses to even return our ravens, and we have no more birds to send. Stannis has no power, not anymore, and to keep you is pointless. No, ‘Lord Hand’, whatever value we thought you might have, you have none – and the Lord Manderly is no longer inclined to wait for your ‘king’ to respond. Frankly, we need to free up your room, more than we need whatever copper your wife might offer. You are not worth the meals we feed you.”

His voice was so scathing that Davos might have recoiled. Still, he kept his gaze level. “I see.”
Perhaps a more glib lord might have been able to convince House Manderly of his own worth by now, but Davos had too blunt a tongue. “I would like to speak to Lord Manderly again.”

“I think not. Stand.”

There would be no ship to take him, Davos knew. Lord Manderly meant to discard him, like a piece of garbage. Or a rotten onion. To expel me out into the wilderness now, in winter, is certain death. “Does the king know that you are doing this?”

“The king has more important matters to attend to,” Ser Wylan replied curtly. “Now will you leave or will you have to be thrown out?”

Davos bit his lip. Wouldn’t that just be typical? he thought. I might be the first hostage in history to refuse his release. “I will need salted fish and water,” Davos decided finally. “I’m not much of a huntsman. Surely the good Lord Manderly would allow me supplies for the road, as a parting gift?”

Ser Wylan rolled his eyes, like he was unwilling to part with any scrap of tuna. “We gave you too much already. A less merciful lord would let you leave by the gallows, ser.” Still, Ser Wylan nodded, and allowed Davos a knapsack of rations from the castle’s kitchens.

Davos stood up and followed the castellan down the corridor, brushing past a pair of women bumbling under a huge pile of bloody clothes. Nearly a year of captivity, Davos thought, but at least I get a set of laundered clothes and a free knapsack at the end of it. If he could convince Ser Wylan to part with a blanket as well, Davos would consider that a victory.

Ser Wylan barked orders at a serving woman – Wylda – to prepare a small bag of supplies. Ser Wylan didn’t know the woman’s name. At this point, Davos was more familiar with the serving staff than the castellan was.

“What of the others I came with?” Davos asked, as they walked. “What of Ser Justin Massey, of Stonedance?”

“The one-armed boy?” the castellan frowned, nose wrinkling. Ser Justin had lost his arm, from an infection from the wound he had taken beyond the Wall. “He is due on the gallows on morn.”

Davos stopped. “What?”

Ser Wylan glared at him to keep walking. “House Massey did reply to us,” the castellan explained. “And the Lord of Stonedance – Lord Gormon – informed us of the boy’s crimes. They would not pay a ransom, instead they paid to see justice fulfilled.”

Lord Gormon? Davos paused, and then frowned. “Gormon Waters,” Davos said, aghast. “Ser Justin’s bastard cousin. He is no lord, ser, he would have you kill the rightful heir to his house! He steals Ser Justin’s seat!”

“Aye? Then he’s a legitimised bastard now.” Ser Wylan shrugged. “And we hear differently. Ser Justin was accomplice to Stannis’ crimes – he supported kinslaying, treason, and murder. They say ‘Ser’ Justin burnt innocent men alive himself.”

“He lies! Check with any other—”

“We did,” Ser Wylan replied. “And they say the same. His family would prefer retribution over return – ever since Stannis Baratheon himself turned on Stonedance; he raided Massey’s Hook and put its inhabitants to the sword. There is no love for any supporter of Stannis, not among the remaining members of House Massey.”

Davos’ face was pale. Justin Massey had been a young man with pink cheeks, blue eyes and a mop of pale white-blond hair. He had been bold, always smiling, and glib tongued. They need to free up rooms, Ser Wylan had said. “Be advised, ser,” Ser Wylan continued, “that the same crimes could be attributed to you too. Be grateful that you are not gracing the gallows as well.”

Davos’ jaw tightened. He didn’t know how to reply, so instead he just nodded.

Wylda returned with a few cooked and salted salmon slices, wrapped in leaves, a canteen of water, and half a loaf of bread. Ser Wylan gave a few sharp orders, and a man-at-arms stepped forward to escort Davos down the Castle Stair. Davos did not ask for a blanket.

“Farewell, Onion Lord,” the castellan mocked behind him. “Get out and don’t return.”

Has there ever been a more shameful dismissal? Davos thought with a quiet grimace. They didn’t even care enough to spit on him.

As they walked outside, there was snow in the air, and frost coated the white steps underneath. The whole castle was writhing with guards and men-at-arms, and a layer of white frost coated everything. Davos saw the lumps of stone and charred outhouses – the damage from the attack was still sorely visible.

This was only the second time he had ever seen the grounds of the New Castle. Throughout his captivity, he had been confined to the keep. His legs pained from lack of exercise, his whole body felt so rough that even a brisk walk caused him to ache. His hand moved to his torso, hovering over the scar he had received from a blade of ice, at the ill-fated Battle of Hardhome.

He saw a scuffle happening between green cloaks carrying tridents and two knights bearing the white wool sacks of Woolfield. The guard pushed Davos’ away, and towards the gates.

Davos’ gaze turned to the horizon – towards the pale cliffs of White Harbour. They were capped with cornices of snow, and icicles like swords hang heavily from them. He did not know these lands, he had never walked through them. He didn’t even know which direction to start. He’d be more confident on a ship, but there were no traders in this port. There was nothing but warships on the harbour.

Davos took a deep breath, trying to think of a solution. His breath puffed coldly into the air. There was only one he could think of, but it was a bitter one. “I could man a ship’s sails,” he said finally, looking to the guard escorting him. “Or as an oarsman. Surely one of your captains need experienced hands? Could you take me to the harbour?” Davos could work on a northern ship – even just to get as far as Sisterton.

The guard only shook his head. “The castellan says no,” he replied simply. “Orders are that you leave the city and don’t come back.”

“Where I am supposed to go?”

“Wherever you choose. You’re free.”

_Free to die._ Perhaps the hangman was too expensive, but expelling him be eaten by wolves would cost little. Davos wanted to head south to his family, but his wife was a thousand leagues away. With a boat, Davos would risk the journey – but on foot?

The man was holding his trident tightly. If Davos tried to run, the three metal prongs would cut him down.

“I have no livelihood in these lands,” Davos said numbly. “You force me out of those gates and I’m like to freeze to death out there.”

Davos had seen the northern snows. He was under no illusions – he would die by himself. Hardier men than him would freeze in this weather.

The guard shook his head again. “I have orders.”

_Of course you do._ The men who would wrap the noose around Ser Justin’s neck would have orders as well.

As they approached the postern gate down the Castle Stair, the guard seemed to take pity on Davos. “Every season, you get refugees that leave the fields and travel south come winter. There are wayhouses open for any man,” the guard explained. “Head west, keep to the cliffs and follow the path to Acorn’s Field. Follow the cut across the trail towards the woods – you’ll see a holdfast at Argos’ Crossing by the stream less than a day from the city. House Oakham always has its doors open for any traveller, they’ll be others there as well. The lord will give you food and hearth for the night, maybe in return for some chores.”

Davos blinked, but nodded gratefully. Any advice was welcome – even just the thought of walking through a land such as the north made him nervous. “And after that? What if I were to head south?”
“There’s the Mud Path that runs down the coasts of Neck, across the cliffs over the marshland,” the guard explained as they walked. “Plenty refugees leave the north altogether for the snows – there are winter huts every league down that way. The swamp-dwellers, Houses Cray and Fenn man the roads, but they let travellers pass, so long as you don’t make trouble. Follow the stream once you pass Toothen Tower, and it’ll take you towards the kingsroad, but I wager that they’ll be plenty other refugees making the same trip.”

The guardsmen signalled for the men on the walls to raise the portcullis. Davos heard groaning of the winch. “This winter,” the guardsmen continued. “I hear that all the refugees are taking shelter in the ruins of the Twins. They say that there are three thousand vagrants massing at the Broken Crossing.”

Refugees. From what Davos had seen, there would be no shortage of men and women fleeing the north. It was a far cry from a lordly journey, but a refugee column was still safer than travelling alone. Davos would take whatever he could get. Maybe it could get him back to his wife. “Thank you, friend.”

“Don’t,” the man-at-arms replied curtly. “I would just rather not have to kill you if you try to return. Consider yourself banned from the north; leave and don’t come back.”

They stepped through the gate and across the archway, and Davos stared out over the city. Even over a week after the battle, so many were still homeless, and they slept huddled together in the ruins of Fishfoot Yard. The harbour looked white and clean from the snows now, but Davos knew that beneath it half the buildings by the wharves were still charred black from where the fires had blazed.

The shipyards and the Inner Harbour had been near-demolished. The flotsam from the broken ships had been washed up against the beaches, and men had even dragged the broken husks of ships out of the water, to build shelter from the wrecked wood. The whole city felt raw, tender. It reminded Davos of a beach full of crabs, scuttling and scavenging between wreckage to find shelter.

They had not enough dry wood to burn the bodies, and perhaps nobody cared to dig a charnel pit deep enough. Instead, all of the corpses were carted together by the wharves, weighed down with stones and old fishing nets, and thrown overboard to the seas. Davos remembered seeing similar practices in the aftermath of the siege of Storm’s End when they were piling up the bodies. “Looks dirty now,” an old fisherman had explained at the time, “but pretty soon, all those bodies in the water are going to be attracting fish aplenty. You’ll get the waters teeming with everything from pike to sharks, coming to take a bite. There’s no better bait for big game. A good fisherman waits for a bit, gets his harpoon ready, and we’ll eat yet because of the dead.”

It was impressive, perhaps, how there were always some who managed to take advantage of even the most morbid situations.

Davos was still staring out over the ocean, when he saw one of the sharks swaggering up to him, flanked by a swarthy-skinned retinue. Davos’ shoulders tensed, as Salladhor Saan opened his arms wide and grinned toothily. “Old friend!” the pirate called. “It is good to see you again, Davos. I hoped I might meet you.”

He did not reply. Salladhor Saan. Davos had heard he was in the city, but…

The Pirate Prince of the Narrow Sea was not wearing silk or gossamer, but Salladhor’s attire had still improved considerably than the last time they had seen each other at Eastwatch. Salladhor was wearing a thick sealskin cloak and a hard leather shirt, but his cloak was pinned with silver and he had oyster earrings hanging from his lobes. He wore a wide-brimmed hat that sagged off his head, ornamented with what looked like shark’s teeth cresting the hat. He wore it with such swagger, such confidence.

Salladhor was still smiling. He walked with three men escorting him – large, tanned men with a foreign look to them, and heavy muscles like sailors. Davos pinned them as pirates without any introductions needed.

“My good man,” Salladhor said to the guard, grinning and lowering his hat. “Allow me a chance to catch up to my old friend here?”

The man-at-arms hesitated. “Ser Wylan told me to walk him out the gates.”

Idly, Salladhor flicked something sliver through the air. The guard caught it. “As you say, m’lord.” The man-at-arms bowed, and then turned to walk away.

Davos was left standing next to Salladhor, while the three pirates surrounded him. He had seen the coin. Silver, he noted. I’m not even worth gold.

“Davos! Old friend!” Salladhor said happily, stepping forward to hug him. “It is so good to see you again.”

Davos’ voice was rather less enthusiastic. “Salladhor,” he greeted carefully. “Good tidings, my friend.”

The last time they had seen each other, it had been at Eastwatch – while they both wore rags. There had been barely restrained fury in the pirate’s gaze. Salladhor had wanted to kill him, for convincing him to join Stannis.

Somehow, smiling and cheerful Salladhor felt even more terrifying than glaring, furious Salladhor.

“Good indeed!” Salladhor laughed, wrapping his arm around Davos’ back. For an aging man, Salladhor was still fit and spry. “I never realised how cheerful the white snows could be before, but this northern weather is really growing on me. Come, let us walk together.”

It was not a question. Salladhor led the way down the steps. “Where are we heading?”

“To the docks,” the pirate replied. “I hoped to show you my new ships.”

His ships. Salladhor had left Eastwatch at the king’s leave, on a single salvaged cog coursed for Braavos. Salladhor had returned to rescue White Harbour. He had named himself the city’s saviour, and perhaps duly; by the tell of it, the pirate’s intervention had most certainly been critical during the battle.

They said that the invaders might have breached the New Castle itself, if not for the pirate taking a bite out of their backs. Davos hadn’t witnessed the battle himself – he had been locked in his cell, but during the battle the jail’s corridors had overflowed with all the guests and infirm lords seeking shelter.

There was a swagger in Salladhor’s step. Davos was tense, half-expecting a dagger between his ribs at any moment. “That guard,” Davos said cautiously, “he named you a lord.”

“That I am,” Salladhor said with good cheer. “I am Salladhor of House Saan, the first of my house. A northerly house, a house of noble footing, sworn to Manderly – I have the piece of paper and all. My liege lord was too distracted to sign it, but his cousin signed it for me. A nice paper, very crisp.”
“I… I see.” After a pause, Davos risked, “Lord of what, exactly?”

“Lord of the Bite, Protector of White Harbour – and admiral, in His Grace’s service.” Salladhor’s grin could have scared fish. “As for my actual holdings, well, that is still to be negotiated upon – but I feel like I could raise a modest keep on the beach somewhere. Perhaps an isle off the coast.”

Once you were lord of the Narrow Sea, under Stannis. “A northern house. You are not a northman.”

Salladhor laughed, loud and clear. “Why, I have adopted their ways, old friend! I feel a surge of patriotism towards my new king. Loyalty, even charity!” Salladhor shook his head. “No, I have invested myself into this land, there shall be no greater ally than I! I feel like making a coat of arms of my own is in order – a banner of my own to fly above my ships.” He bit his lip, musing as he walked. “Perhaps my sigil should be a silver fork on black, for my grandmother? Perhaps a marble spire, in honour of my birth city of Lys? Or perhaps a broken heart on blue, for the losses I have suffered? Or maybe even a headless stag in the water, for the vengeance I will take against the king that tried to ruin me?”

There was laughter in his voice, but his eyes were sharp. “Or a shark,” Davos suggested lowly. “You could take a shark for your sigil.”

“A shark…!” Salladhor mused, and then chuckled. “Yes, I do like that, actually! A blue shark on black! You do get some monstrous beasts in the waters of the Bite, after all.”

Yes, Davos agreed quietly. You do.

There was no dragon on the bay today. The Seal Rock was empty, and nobody in the city had seen the dragon for over a week.

They were approaching the stone harbours of the piers, where guards were patrolling to keep the smallfolk back. There were still lumps of rubble littering the streets, and broken chunks of buildings where the stonethrowers had demolished the wharves. The Manderly guards lowered their heads to Salladhor as he walked past. The pirate walked surely, and all the men knew him. For all Davos knew, Salladhor was leading him to his ship to drown him in the icy water.

“And how did you earn such recognition?” Davos asked after a pause, not breaking step.

“For leal service, of course! For brave action in battle, for initiative, and for the donation of twelve vessels to His Grace’s navy. I captured twelve cogs and dromonds from the enemy during the battle, all of which I was happy to surrender, in return for deserved reward.” Salladhor caught his glance. “I was docked in Lys, you see, when I caught word of a fleet of ships that were heading north. They were recruiting mercenaries and allies – all for some seahorse bastard who considered himself a Targaryen, who thought that he could capture a dragon. And I thought to myself – Salladhor, you old dog, this might be an opportunity! No risk, no reward, yes? A chance to prove my intentions to the king.”

Davos considered his words carefully. “You already have family and lands of your own – in Lys,” Davos noted. “Why would you care about a lordship in the north?”

“Why?” He even seemed confused. “Because the north seems a land of opportunity, my friend. My family has agreed, they are quite interested in new alliances and enterprises in this cold land. I even have a pack of bastard nephews and a thick chest of Saan silver to watch over now, can you believe it?” Salladhor laughed. “I like to get in early behind the winning horse. Or dragon, as it may be. It is an honour, to lead the Dragon King’s navy.” He tipped his huge, flamboyant hat to Davos, with a long, satisfied smile. “There is great profit to be had here, I think.”

And a chance for revenge, Davos thought. Salladhor was as cold-blooded as they came. The pirate thought that a conflict between King Snow and Stannis was inevitable – and Salladhor wanted the chance to hurt Stannis.

When King Snow led an invasion on the south, there was no doubt that Salladhor truly would be his most merciless admiral.

There was a certain type of person, Davos considered, that, no matter the circumstances, will always find a way to rise to the top. Some men would float rather than drown in an ocean of bodies.

“I have Valyrian blood myself, you know,” Salladhor continued conversationally. “My grandfather — magnificent man – was a prince in his own right. ‘The Last Valyrian’, he named himself, when he fought alongside Maelys Blackfyre on the Stepstones. Samarro Saan was one of the Band of Nine, the man who crushed the Tyroshi fleets and captured the city walls. I consider it a privilege to serve myself beneath the rightful king, the last dragonlord, King Snow.”

“Oh, he makes no comment himself as such,” Salladhor cocked his head. “But it is, well, fairly obvious. I know a rumour going around that the king was born from an exiled Targaryen princess that Ned Stark rescued during the war. A rather less romantic tale is that there was a fling with a daughter of Velaryon at Harrenhal, or some Dayne lady who jumped from a tower. Now, myself, I have never really heard of House Dayne sharing ancestry to the dragonlords, and yet I’m told that they did have a drop or two of Valyrian blood. Most curious. Others insist that the Lord Stark birthed King Snow on a fisherwoman from the Sisters, a woman who must have been a dragonseed, but my personal favourite is a theory that I heard in Lys — that Ned Stark harboured a lost Blackfyre princess.” Davos glanced at him. Salladhor shrugged. “It explains why his lord father kept the mother so tight a secret, and the timelines do fit. Although I must admit a personal bias — to me, House Blackfyre has always been the most deserved claimant to the throne.”

Yes, Davos thought. The Saan family has a history of supporting pretenders.

On the water, Davos saw a small vessel returning to port with a dead whale in tow, and blinked when he saw a seal sitting inside the open-hulled boat. The furs that the whalers were wearing were heavy and roughly cut. Wildlings? Do wildlings keep pet seals?

They stepped on to the docks, walking across the Lord’s Port towards the waterfront. Two huge vessels sat at the very front of the wharves — they were immense three-decked dromonds, as large as any Davos had ever seen. The biggest had at least four hundred oars, so huge that hardly even fit on the pier. Paintwork chipped and hacked, it looked like it had taken some damage, but it was still a grand vessel.

Salladhor had captured it from the invaders, but how did any sellsail get a ship like that?

Davos could still see the chipping out engraving on the hull, but the letters that had been scratched away were still readable. Davos needed to squint, silently mouthing out the words. ‘Sweet Cersei’, the markings had read, before the name had been crudely scratched through.

The flagships of the royal fleet.
On deck, there were men climbing the rigging and furling the ropes, preparing to set sail. They were flying a flag showing a white dragon from its masts.

“Oh, but I blabber on about royal lines and bloodlines… although it reminds me of a question that I must ask you. What is your view on the matter?” Davos stood quietly. “Tell me honestly, Onion Lord,” Salladhor continued. “You can see my own loyalties clear, but who are you still loyal to?”

They stopped walking, standing on the wooden pier. Salladhor’s guards shadowed Davos closely. Davos hesitated, heartbeats passing uneasily. “No lying, now,” Salladhor chided. “You’re a poor liar, Davos, and I will react very poorly to the attempt. Tell me honestly; in your heart, who do you still serve?”

He took a deep breath. I am still Hand of the King. I still have my duty.

There was a brief pause, and then Salladhor laughter, loud and clear. “Of course you do! Even after all this time, even after so long in a prison cell… You know fine well that I could gut you right now, but you still claim for the man!”

The guards picked up on Salladhor’s cue, and then the other pirates started chuckling too. “You are one in a million, Davos Seaworth – I might push you off this pier right now, except then I would feel as if I’m losing something precious. The world would be a darker place for it, I think.”

Davos didn’t know how to reply to that. Salladhor motioned to his men. “Come, bring him to my cabin. Let us share wine, old friend – it could be the last time we do.”

“What do you want from me, Salladhor?” Davos demanded. “And should I take it that it was a coincidence that you were waiting outside the gates when I left?”

“Oh, I may have bribed the good castellan a few gold pieces, to release you early,” Salladhor admitted. “But yes, I have an offer for you, Onion Lord. We have a history together, do we not?”

The memory of Hardhome flashed before his eyes; shipwrecked and bleeding on the black ice, as Salladhor gutted a Baratheon guardsman with a bloody knife, vowing revenge against Stannis, vowing to rape Stannis’ daughter and queen…

Perhaps Salladhor was remembering the same moment. “I do regret the words we shared at Eastwatch, old friend,” the pirate said, as they walked swiftly up the gangway. The slight rocking of the dromond in the waves caused Davos’ stiff legs to stumble, but Salladhor moved gracefully. “That was a… dark time for me, but I did not want to leave matters between us on that note. Every day, I grow older and greyer, and it seems that I have fewer and fewer old friends left.”

He led the way into the captain’s cabin. Davos followed quietly, unsure of what to say. The cabin of dromond was wide and lavish – filled with silver baubles and thick black and red drapes. The wooden planks were still fresh, new from the shipyards, but books and torn parchments littered the floor. There was the image of a roaring dragon painted red on the wall, smeared in what looked like blood.

“Forgive the decorum,” Salladhor said foully, moving behind the oak desk. “I have yet to redecorate from the previous captain. He grew somewhat obsessed with dragons. No elegance.

“And speaking of the previous ‘Lord of Waters’,” Salladhor continued, with a slight scoff, “I have spent the last week offering deals to the mercenaries that joined under his fleet – I tracked down the men left stranded across the coasts and the Sisters. They were all mercenaries who came here for war, men who took me for an ally, and who I stabbed in the back – but I offered them all the same deal. Join me, in my fleet, I said, and I will convince the northmen and the wildlings not to eat you alive. They all have a reason to hate my guts, for sure, and yet they accepted eagerly. It is almost funny, is it not? They came here to attack this city, and for a few words and a drop of silver, now they are the ones helping to rebuild this city. They have the most to prove as well, so they work the hardest.”

“Men are rats,” Davos muttered, remembering what Salladhor once said.

“Men are rats,” Salladhor agreed. “But what do old loyalties matter, when there is work to be done? Times change, my friend.”

A tall and dour-faced man knocked on the door, and a sailor stepped in wearing sweat and salt stained leathers. “I have your wine, Admiral,” the man said, holding a large bottle.

“Thank you, Humfrey,” Salladhor nodded. He brought out two crystal goblets, offering one to Davos. “When we were on deck, Onion Lord, did you perchance notice the domed building, with the charred roof, to the north of the city?”

“I did.” Davos cautiously took the glass of wine.

“That was the Sept of Snows, once a church to the Seven – the largest in the north,” Salladhor explained. “But then the mercenaries set it alight, and now it is the Sept of Snow. The wildlings own that building, they’ve anointed it to the Ice Dragon.”

Davos blinked, and his eyes widened. “Wait… what?”

“In the aftermath of the attack, the wildlings overpowered the city guard. House Manderly tried to force the wildlings out, but then this Mother Mole and her spearwives returned that order. They took control of half the city – seizing the Wolf’s Den, the Old Mint, and the Sept of Snows for their own numbers. Since then, tempers have cooled somewhat, but the wildlings still refuse to leave and the merman dares not force them. Mother Mole has torn down the statues of the Seven, and replaced them with a totem raised to the ice dragon, the god of winter.”

“Lord Manderly allowed such?” His voice was appalled. “That – that is heresy!”

As soon the words blurted out of his mouth, he realised why Salladhor looked so smug. “You think so? Even though your own king did the same at Dragonstone? When the Red Woman burnt your precious Seven?” he said, half-mockingly. “That very same fanaticism is running rampant in this city.” The old pirate’s smile widened. “You should spend some time among the smallfolk, ask what the wildlings did with their prisoners. Or, should you feel adventurous, you may visit any of those white trees these northmen like to worship. Such simple justice has an elegance of its own, I feel.”

Davos grimaced. The pirate chuckled, and took a large gulp of wine. “If there is one thing that I have learnt, Onion Lord,” Salladhor chuckled, “it’s that people are exactly the same. Fire and ice, snow and ash – what’s the difference?”

Davos didn’t believe that. There was a difference, there had to be. “But now nobody dares to poke the wildlings any further,” Salladhor continued, “and so it is the wildlings that take the lion’s share of the rations. It is the cityfolk who have had their houses burnt, and so it is now they who must turn to the wildlings for aid. Every night, Mother Mole holds a sermon to thousands in the Sept of Snow, and for a few bundles of fish the crowd grows bigger every time.”
Salladhor’s smile widened. “More and more of the city is converting, Onion Lord. Even those who used to pray to the Seven now turn to the dragon for salvation.”

His voice was mocking, like it was a victory over Davos. He didn’t quite know why, but it made Davos uneasy to think of the wildling’s faith spreading like that. The smuggler’s fists tightened. “You lie.”

“I do nothing of the sort, old friend.” Salladhor took another drink of wine. “What can I say? When the nights turn dark, people need faith, I suppose. Perhaps I, myself, should go with the tide and take a white stone on my chest.”

Salladhor was no believer. The pirate was to the faithful what a barracuda was to a shoal of herring. “Where are you going with this, Salladhor?”

“I just want to show you how things change, my friend. We are both old men now – the pirate and the smuggler; criminals, lowborn and vagabonds, the fiends to the ‘civilised’ world.” He chuckled. “My knees grow stiff and my joint aches, my hair is more grey than blond – but even I know that I must adapt. That is how I survive.

“Can you adapt too, Onion Lord?” he asked. “I spent much time thinking of it, and I realised – you have more a reason to hate Stannis and his Red Woman than anyone. He stole your sons from you, he abandoned you in the cold water. Do we not have a common goal together?”

No, we very much do not. Davos held his tongue, but his feelings were written on his face. “I have heard word from the stormlands, old friend,” Salladhor said softly. “Do you remember that small wooden hut on the Cape Wrath where you left your wife and young boys? The carpenter’s daughter that you married, and your two youngest sons?”

Davos very much did. His wife Marya. Steffon and Stannis Seaworth, two children of nine and six that he had not seen in over two years. Salladhor shook his head. “King Stannis abandoned the stormlands, and he made no move to protect any of the lands he had granted,” the pirate explained. “The holdings of House Seaworth have been seized by this ‘Aegon Targaryen’ and his sellswords, and your king most certainly made no move to protect them. The lands of Cape Wrath were the very first to fall in the Golden Company’s landing.”

Davos’ heart pounded, unable to speak. He had feared, and yet… “If you went south, you would find your home held by some petty mercenary granted lands by the Young Dragon. Perhaps your wife is sitting beggared in a village somewhere, or perhaps she is dead in a gibbet.” Salladhor’s voice was even sad, sympathetic. “But there is no home for you there, Onion Lord, not anymore.”

He lies, Davos thought. He lies, he lies, he must. And yet those thoughts had been haunting him for months, and it was confirmation of everything he feared likely. Davos knew that the Golden Company truly had landed across his own lands, and he knew that Stannis had been restricted to Dragonstone. Marya would have been defenceless. Any loyalist of Stannis would not have been treated kindly by the pretender dragon.

Davos couldn’t breathe, he froze. He tried to picture his wife’s face, tried to imagine her – but it had been so long. Davos had hardly had a chance to know his youngest son, Stannis.

I named my youngest son for my king. Surely King Stannis would have protected his supporter’s families?

And then Davos remembered the letters White Harbour had received, concerning Claw Island,
Salladhor reached across the table, to pat Davos’ hand. “So, in honour of our friendship and past we have shared, I offer you a deal,” Salladhor continued. “You would find only ruin in the south, but there is an opportunity right here. Serve me as one of my captains, Davos.”

The smuggler was left speechless for a moment. His whole body tensed. Salladhor gave him a soft smile. “The past is a tragic thing, my friend. But any good seaman must look to the future. None know the oceans better than you,” Salladhor explained. “Any navy would be lucky to have you, and I will convince the merman lord of that. I would take you, Ser Davos, into my own house myself – provided that you bend the knee before King Snow, and you pledge your undying loyalty before his crown.”

Pledge my loyalty. Even despite a year’s worth of captivity, his loyalty was the one thing that Davos had refused to concede.

“I have already made that vow once,” Davos said hollowly. “And I am not dead.” Not quite yet.

“You have, and you are not. But I hope you are not so old that you cannot change,” Salladhor replied, leaning back in his chair. “Consider your options. Serve the King Snow the same as you served Stannis, and he will reward you for it. You too could make House Seaworth a noble house on the northern coast – take some pretty wildling wife for your new bride. Take several, even, I hear the wildlings are more flexible about such things.” Salladhor raised his glass with a laugh. “And when the ice dragon flies south and a new regime begins, we shall begin again with it.”

“Come, Onion Lord. Why not walk a new path with me?”

There was long, long stretch of silence. Davos stared down at his missing fingers, and then at the bloody dragon painted on the wall. I made a vow.

A heartbeat of silence. The pirate lowered his glass. “That you are,” Salladhor conceded. “That you are.”

Neither of them spoke. Salladhor drained the last of his glass. “What a pity,” he mused. “Such loyalty is valuable, I would reward it well if it was in my service. You might reach greatness, Davos, if only you could walk away from the one you have latched to. You say that my sigil should be a shark? Well, yours should be a clam.”

The good cheer in his voice was evaporating, and his tone turned sharp and cold. “I can see it in your eyes,” the pirate said sharply, “you still intend to return to your king, don’t you?”

I do. Stannis needs me, on Dragonstone. The thought of his king all alone, with only that Red Witch whispering in his ear…

Melisandre would lead Stannis into doom. Davos knew that she would.

Davos grimaced. “Please… Salladhor… in honour of the friendship we once shared,” Davos begged. “Let me travel south. I need only a small ship.”

“You would rejoin your king?” Salladhor snapped. “You want me to help you return you to the man I have vowed to ruin?”

“I do.” Davos slipped off the chair, and down onto his knees. He had no pride. He knew what was at stake. He would beg and plead for one last charity from the old pirate. “We were friends for so many years, just give me a chance. I’d only need a small dinghy – just something that I might sail south on.”

“In honour of our friendship, you say?” Salladhor mused on it for several heartbeats, and then shook his head. “In honour of our friendship, Davos, I think I will grant you a raft and a paddle instead. And then I shall follow behind you on my dromond, while watching you row.”

The Sand Snake

They met on the sandy wastes underneath the starry sky – which felt quite appropriate, actually. The sands of Dorne shone eerily under the gloomy light of the stars, beneath the mountains pointing towards the sea star leading the way. She walked through the dunes stretching out to the coast, and the ground was littered with ferns and brambly weeds clinging to rough stones and sand. There was a sharp breeze cutting in from the ocean and whistling over the rocks, but Nymeria pulled her shawl close to her chest as she walked.

Planky Town was far to the south, and the mountains of Ghost Hill to the north, but there was nothing around but dead wastelands for leagues around.

Nymeria would have brought guards, but the man she was meeting was feeling skittish. He had demanded to meet alone, unarmed, and there likely wouldn't be another chance. She kept her two daggers close to her chest, hidden beneath her robes, but she hoped she wouldn’t need the blades. She stepped out over the expanse and sighed at the spectacular view.

Nym was prepared to wait all night, but it wasn’t long waiting until she saw the lone figure riding down from the hilly outcrop.

Ser Gerold Dayne looked haggard. The last time she had seen him, it had been at a feast at Nightsong; Ser Gerold had been dressed in rich velvet and gossamer, and he had tried to slip his hand down Nymeria’s dress.

Now, the Darkstar was wearing sweat-stained boiled leather, and Nym was the one who had just fucked him.

“Ser Gerold,” Nym called, with a soft smile. “It’s good to see you well.”

In the faint silver light of the moon, his purple eyes were dark, narrowed and angry. The veins were throbbing on his forehead, his jaw tense. Underneath his hood, he had shaved his head. Once, the Darkstar had a mane of long, silver locks fit to equal any crown, reaching to his shoulders. Now, Ser Gerold had shaved his scalp bald, the better to travel unrecognised. He looked less a prince and more a vagabond.

“You dare??” the Darkstar growled, not dismounting his horse. “That is how you greet me? You lied to me, whore!”

Nym tutted. “I had hope we could discuss this civilly, ser.”

“Civilly?” he snapped. “I’ve been hunted from one end of Dorne to the next. From Starfall to Tor they’ve hunted me across the red dunes. Dorne screams for my head!”

“You did kill a girl, ser,” she reminded, gently.

“On your orders!” Ser Gerold snapped. “For the good of our land!”
“Nevertheless,” she sighed. “You were the one to swing the sword.”

Nym had heard that he had done rather more than that, actually. Obara had been present at Starfall too, but Nym’s sister had only stood and watched while the Darkstar did the deed. He dragged Princess Myrcella out of her chambers and through the castle’s hallway by her hair. The girl was said to have screamed and thrashed, tearing her fingernails against the stones as she was pulled along the floor by her beautiful, bloody gold curls. Prince Trystane had tried to rescue her, but Darkstar kicked the boy to the ground. He dragged the princess into the courtyard, and then beheaded her for all the world to see.

The princess’ retinue had tried to object, but Darkstar killed them all. The battle at Starfall had been quick and bloody. Overly bloody, for Nym’s tastes.

The Darkstar served his purpose, she thought, but did he really have to be so dramatic over it?

Ser Gerold had expected Dorne to cheer. Sunspear had replied with condemnation instead.

“I was supposed to lead a revolution!” the man growled. “You promised me – you and your sisters. You said that I would swing the sword, and Dorne would cheer for me! We were meant to lead a rebellion together!”

“The plan needed to adapt.”

“The plan.” Ser Gerold spat, a thick glob landing at Nym’s sandals. “You promised that I would lead a crusade, whore. Instead you left me with the blame!”

Nym had been quite prepared to kill Myrcella Lannister, and to rally a rebellion around the deed. The Lannister murderess in the capital would be outraged, Dorne would go to war, and Prince’s Pass and the Boneway would be standing ready to repel all invaders. They had wanted a rebellion, and having the Prince of Dorne order the death of the lion princess would be a good way to start one.

Originally, Nym intended for House Martell to claim responsibility for Myrcella’s death, and Cersei would have been convinced that ‘Tyrion Lannister’ persuaded them to rebel.

But, alas, circumstances made mockery of all their planning. They had not accounted for Aegon Targaryen, and, as it happened, the young king was rather more squeamish than they had anticipated. Aegon had been clear; someone needed to be convicted for the young princess’ death, and Nymeria could not risk Arianne’s standing with the king. Ser Gerold had simply been a convenient pawn to lay the blame on.

As far as the official narrative was concerned, it was the Darkstar who killed Princess Myrcella, acting alone. The unofficial narrative was that the Darkstar had been working for the Imp. The Sand Snakes and Dorne as a whole had rid their hands of any involvement and left Ser Gerold, quite literally, holding the sword.

Admittedly, perhaps he’s feeling rather upset with that, Nym conceded.

“They were hunting me!” the Darkstar boomed. “My family has disowned me, Starfall has condemned me! Sunspear has put a bounty upon my head – I had to flee on foot with riders from Godsgrave were chasing me down.” His jaw clenched, his hand moving to the sword at his side. “I knew those men – Ser Harmen Drinkwater and Ser Marren Briar. I trained with them, rode with them, matched them in tourneys.
“And then I had to slew them, and steal their horses. They were good men, soldiers of Dorne, and I killed them.”

Nym didn't reply. She had heard about that. Lord Alhyrion had been furious over the deaths. Ten riders had been sent to bring the Darkstar to justice, but only eight had returned.

He took a deep breath. Something in his eyes seemed crazed. “What I did, I did the deed for the good of this land.” His voice was venomous. “You needed someone to swing the sword, so I stepped forward. I took that girl’s head for you.”

“You did what needed to be done,” Nym agreed.

“And you abandoned me for it,” he spat again. “Nobody else was brave enough to do it, but I was. I did. And your sister left me in the red sands to die.”

“It was a sensitive matter,” Nym soothed. “Dorne rejoices, and yet appearances must be preserved. Princess Arianne’s standing with Aegon could not be threatened.”

“Arianne.” The horse shifted beneath him. “Twice now, I have betrayed Arianne for you.”

Yes, Nym thought with a nod. You have been very useful.

During Arianne’s aborted rebellion, it had been Darkstar that revealed the princess’s intentions to the Sand Snakes, and the Sand Snakes who pressed Darkstar into sharing it with Doran too. The idea had been simple; Arianne attempted her coup, Doran would stop it, but – in the fray – a sword would have sliced open Myrcella’s skull regardless. It would have been a mess, and both Doran and Arianne would have been implicated in the murder of a royal princess and a knight of the Kingsguard.

If only Darkstar’s sword that day had been a few inches deeper, Nym lamented. It all could have gone much smoother.

Still, the Sand Snakes had informed Doran of Arianne’s intentions, and afterwards Nym, Obara and Tyene had been restored in the prince’s good graces. Doran invited them all into his solar and revealed his own plan. Fire and blood, he had promised.

And here we are. There has been fire and blood aplenty, I suppose.

“I am sorry, ser,” Nym said sadly. “But the official story must stand, to pardon you would jeopardize that. Not all heroes can stand in the sun; I hoped you would understand.”

His face was murderous. She saw flicker of rage pass through his features.

That was all Gerold had wanted, Nym knew. The Darkstar wanted to wield Dawn, he wanted to be the next Sword of the Morning. He wanted to hold the most brilliant blade in the world, to be the hero who married the princess. That was the hook that had led Nym manipulate him.

But Ser Gerold was from the branch family of House Dayne; he would never have been permitted the sword Dawn, even if he was worthy enough. Instead, Nym had flirted with him, seduced him; ‘if you are the one who leads us to independence again,’ she purred into his ear, ‘the champion to avenge Dorne… then they will grant you the sword’.

“I understand fine,” Gerold growled. His hand went to the hilt of his blade. “You lied. I should take your head for this betrayal, whore.”
She shook his head. “Why, Gerold… I’m the last friend you have left,” she lied. “Who else will support you now?”

He hesitated, but his eyes lost none of their fire. “We have all sacrificed to be here, ser. We have lost so much, we have all taken risks.” The image of the Great Sept exploding into flames… “But my sisters and I will still support you,” Nym continued. “We just must do so more subtly. There must be… a pretence.”

She paused, cautiously stepping closer. “Tell me, ser,” she asked, “would you be willing to take the black?”

From atop his horse. The Darkstar’s eyes were aghast. “What?”

“Consider it,” Nym insisted. “Surrender yourself, and there will be a sham of a trial. None will admit it, but Dorne is sympathetic to your deed. If you confess to the murder, then I guarantee that the prince will allow you to take the black.”

“Confess?” Darkstar snapped. “It was not a crime, that Lannister whelp deserved to die!”

“Nevertheless,” she sighed. “You could go to the Wall, but it wouldn’t be for long. There’s much happening in the north, and Dorne could use an agent up there. I hear that there are many opportunities on the Wall; opportunities that a man of your skills might exploit.”

Darkstar looked appalled at the very suggestion. “And the Bastard King,” she continued. She had the offer rehearsed, a sales pitch. One last use that the Darkstar could provide her. “I hear that Jon Snow is kin to you; he is the son of Ashara Dayne. You could approach him, with blood and history to share with him – while you’d be an exile who killed a Lannister. You might earn the Bastard King’s trust. You might bond with Jon Snow, get close to him.”

There was still no reply. “And then you might put a dagger in his back,” Nym said softly. “If you kill the Bastard King, then I guarantee Aegon and Doran will grant you a full pardon. You’d be returned from the north with honours. Just imagine it – Ser Gerold Dayne, the Darkstar, the Sword of the Night, the Dragonslayer.”

Nym had very high hopes that Gerold might be taken with the idea. It would have been the perfect way to tie up loose ends, a perfect opportunity. Nym had even been willing to sleep with him again, to ensure the lovestruck man-child would be compliant and entranced with the opportunity.

But there was no awe on his face this time; the anger and suspicion on Ser Gerold’s face didn’t fade. “Once bitten, you snake of a whore.” He shook his head. “No, I am done dancing on your strings.”

Nym could have sighed. What a shame. “And Jon Snow is no kin of mine,” Ser Gerold continued. “He is not Ashara’s babe. That is just a ridiculous rumour – I have no idea why the late Lord Dayne even allowed such talk to spread.”

Nym paused, frowning. “Truly? He’s not?” she mused. “The common consensus is that Stark got Ashara with child at Harrenhal, and hid the child to hide his dishonour.”

The Darkstar scoffed. “His brother, Brandon, did,” the knight said. “But that babe was stillborn, and female. My father was captain of the guard at the time, and I was a page at Starfall – I saw Ashara’s dead baby with my own eyes. Jon Snow is no Dayne; Stark already had his bastard with him when he arrived at Starfall, along with a wetnurse and Ser Arthur’s bloody sword.”

Is that right? How queer, the rest of the realm seemed to believe that Jon Snow was Ashara’s lost son, born from dishonour. Then again, there had been a few differing reports. Nym shrugged. “Very well. But there are still opportunities in the north for you.”

“Never,” the Darkstar growled. “I will pave my own path from now on, and all of Dorne shall rue my fury! You should not have lied to me, whore.”

Nym could have rolled her eyes. “And how do you expect to do that with one tired horse, and every knight in the realm chasing you?”

He hesitated. “The realm is at peace Darkstar, or soon will be,” Nym continued. “There is no need for more blood. You simply need to step aside now.”

“I will never surrender,” he snapped. “Unbowed, unconquered – I am Dorne.”

“Then you jeopardise everything you’ve already sacrificed for,” Nym retorted. “I thought you loved your country.”

That caused his eyes to flicker. “Instead, let us take a moment to consider your options,” Nym argued. “You could keep running and fighting this quest of yours, for… whatever reason again?” She frowned. “Or, why not just leave? Sail across the sea, for a very comfortable retirement in Lys.”

“Retire,” he snarled.

“Or join a mercenary company, if you wish for excitement. Form a mercenary company, if it pleases you. Find glory, or riches, or love. There’s a whole world out there.” She raised her hands. “Are you sure you want to keep biting away at this corner of it? What’s the point?”

His face was hard, but Nym caught the flicker in his gaze. “You served Dorne well, Gerold,” she continued. “And this ending is unfortunate, but I don’t wish for anymore bad blood between us. Too many good Dornishmen have bled already – and how many more Dornish sons will you have to kill if you stay?”

“Then retract the bounty on me!” he snapped. “Grant me a pardon!”

“I cannot do that,” she shook her head sadly. “Doran is firm, he overruled me. I’m sorry, but there is naught I can do.”

There was no sound but the wind hissing over the sands. The Darkstar howled – a sharp, scream of fury – and then drew his sword. His horse shifted as he raised the blade, threatening to bring the sword down upon her.

Nym’s eyes were soft, and she meekly raised her hands. “Kill me if you wish,” she whispered. “But it will bring you no joy.”

He screamed, a wordless cry of fury. She stood calm. He won’t do it, Nym knew. She could play Darkstar like a lute. He was nothing more than an overdramatic man-child obsessed with living up to the Sword of the Morning. She knew all his strings.

“Fix this, Nymeria!” he bellowed.

“I cannot.” Nym shook her head. “I have but one deal to offer you; there is a ship waiting in Planky Town, the captain is very discreet. He will take you anywhere in the world. There is a chest of gold waiting for you, and none will follow. You need only disappear, Darkstar. Vanish into the night’s sky.”
His eyes flickered. “My family, my legacy…!”

“Please,” Nym begged. “Hasn’t enough Dornish blood been spilled?”

It took a while, but eventually she managed to talk Darkstar down. Ser Gerold’s shoulders slumped, but he accepted. Lys was beautiful this time a year, Nym told him. She also said that he need only lay low until the tempers cooled, but that he would be nearby for whenever Dorne needed him. She implied that this exile might only be temporary, that he might yet return.

Reluctantly, Darkstar agreed. He rode away and agreed to be in Planky Town by the morn.

Nym watched him leave for a time, before turning and walked away, her sandals brushing over the sand.

She met Captain Ryden half a mile away, waiting for her with two sand steeds. Nym took her time strolling back. “How did it go?” Ryden asked her.

“He refused to take the black,” Nym said, sighing. A pity, but not unexpected. “So we go to the next plan.”

“Oh,” Ryden said, and then nodded. “The ship to Lys?”

“Yes. He’ll be in Planky Town on the morn,” Nym confirmed. “Are you prepared?”

The man straightened, one fist slamming against his breastplate while the other one went to his sword. “I am, my lady. I will not allow the murderer to walk free.”

Father always told me to be prepared. She walked closer to her guard, swinging her hips with every step. “Be careful, Ryden,” she said softly, her voice thick with concern. “The Darkstar killed the last Captain of the Guard, do not underestimate him. Areo Hotah had been as formidable as any, but Darkstar killed him.”

“He will not take me by surprise, my lady.”

“Just be wary. Ser Gerold may not be the brightest, but none can deny his skill with a blade. Instead, keep your distance, wait for him to board the ship – use a bow, and a poisoned arrow.”

Ryden was young, but bold and handsome. He had served Nym so well these last few months. “I understand. For Dorne.” He stepped closer to her, his hands moving to her waist. “And for luck?”

Nymeria giggled. “Why, of course.”

They kissed passionately under the night sky. Captain Ryden wrapped his hands around her, and she stroked the sun and spear on his breastplate.

They bid farewell, and promised to meet up shortly. They would elope and leave Dorne together, on the ship to Lys and, from there, the east. Ryden went to Planky Town, while Nym rode back to the Water Gardens.

Only a little bit more blood, Nym thought to herself. A few more bodies to drop in the Sea of Dorne, and a few loose ends to be tied.

There would be no sympathy for Gerold Dayne – after all, the fiend had beheaded a little girl.

The gates were quiet as she rode back into the Water Gardens. Spearmen hoisted the portcullis open on her approach. There was only a skeletal guard duty still operating; all others had already
There was little activity in the terraces. The pools had never felt so dead. A bad case of the pox, or so the realm believed, had driven the locals away. A few young girls were sickly, and the prince had sealed the Water Gardens to quarantine the sickness.

The lie had served its purpose, and care had been taken to preserve their isolation.

The palm trees swayed in the cold breeze, and howl of wind rippled through the blood orange trees as she stepped through the terraces, beneath the fluted pillar gallery.

The waxing moon shone in the sky, a faint sliver like a bloody dagger reflecting from the pools. She heard the whisper of torches in the moonlight, but otherwise the Water Gardens was as still as the grave.

Most had already evacuated, there were but a few final touches to be made.

Nym’s men would be burning letters, but otherwise leaving everything intact. She felt fairly proud of what she had accomplished here, actually. There had been no bodies, no bloodshed – all of Doran’s loyalists had simply spent a bit of time locked in their quarters.

My nuncle insists on call this a ‘coup’, Nym mused. But no coup in history has ever been so polite. And now it is over.

She stepped up the limestone steps towards the apartments, and a man was standing upright outside the prince’s chambers. “My lady.” The guard bowed.

He was a young man with sandy hair and dimples on his cheeks, and Nym always rocked her hips and smiled when she spoke to him. A sultry smile was better than gold when it came to ensuring the loyalty of young men.

“At ease, Liam,” Nym soothed. “Is the prince awake?”

“He has been restless,” the guard, Liam, replied, “and reading. The prince requested more books from the library, my lady.”

“Oh really? Which books?”

“Septon Barth’s Genealogy of Dragons, my lady,” Liam said. “And Archmaester Gyldayn’s History of the Seven-Pointed Star.”

Hmm. Light reading, for my nuncle, Nym mused. Her uncle always had kept an impressive library. “You are dismissed,” she ordered. “Go gather your belongings, Liam, we leave on the morn.”

“Should I call for another man for the door, my lady?”

“What’s the point?” Nym chuckled humourlessly as she stepped into the chambers. “He cannot walk anywhere.”

A bedridden old man. Has there ever been an easier ‘prisoner’ to keep?

The candles were burning low inside the room, a strained flicker of shadows filling the silent room. His chambers were filled with warm drapes and thick rugs.

“Good evening, nuncle,” Nym called. “May I come in?”
There was no reply but silence. Nym entered regardless, and her smile faded.

Doran was awake and lying atop his bed, the exact same place he been for weeks.

Nym had never seen her nuncle so haggard. There had been no servants to dress him in silk or wash him; instead Doran wore the same crusty robe, pale yellow like piss. The room stunk of old sweat and sealed windows, while Doran had gone unshaved and was growing a bush of ragged hair. He was propped up by cushions, with piles of books and old tomes littered around him.

Doran's gout had flared up, and was causing him agony. The guards had needed to carry him to the latrine twice a day, but there had still been times he had soiled the bed.

There was a moment of silence as Nym walked in. The Prince of Dorne never looked up from his page.

Nym had tried to make it comfortable for him, she truly had. Any comfort we can give, give to him, she had ordered. They had given him every book he requested, but they had still needed to restrict his information and contact with the outside world.

Neither of them spoke. The sight of him so dishevelled sent shivers down her spine. He was an old man, locked in his room. A cruelty that shouldn’t have been necessary. Perhaps I should have visited more often, she conceded.

She walked gingerly towards his bedside, glancing over the sprawled pages and scattered pillows. She didn't know what to say. “Good evening, nuncle,” she greeted. “Are you well?”

There was no reply. One thing that did catch her eye, though, was a wooden figurine in his fingers. It was small, smooth and worn dark wood, fiddling in his grasp as he stared blankly at the pages.

“Is that a raven?” Nym asked finally, hoping to make smalltalk.

For a while, she thought he would not respond. “A crow,” Doran replied quietly. “A crow. It was my sister's.”

“Oh.”

The little wooden doll could fit in the palm of his hand. “My mother herself carved this for Elia,” Doran muttered, filling the uneasy silence with a quiet voice. “When she was a girl, Elia used to have these night terrors of a giant crow, she used to wake during the night, scared and confused. She told me of the same nightmare over and over again; of a giant bird dropping her from a tower, and crowing at her to fly…

“Many nights, mother was away, so Elia would run shaken into my room for comfort. When Mother returned, she carved Elia a totem of a crow for her bedside, so that she might look upon it and never be scared…”

His voice trembled. Her heart bled for her uncle, it truly did. He was an old man, with nothing but his memories, his books, and the ghosts of his past. “When Elia left for King's Landing, she left this behind… said that was she done with the bad dreams…” Doran muttered, still not even looking up. “And for ten years I buried this crow behind my cabinet. I could not bring myself to look upon it…”

He took a deep breath, wrinkled hands grasping around it. A toy carved for a little girl’s fingers.

The moment was so painfully silent. Nym didn’t know how to reply. “I wish I could have met
“Do you?” he said bitterly, fiddling with his crow. “You don’t know the first thing about her. And perhaps neither did I. Elia was a kind soul, an innocent. She would smile when nobody else understood. My mother spent half her life at court, and Elia wanted to follow in her footsteps. She grew up on tales from the capital, she longed to go to King’s Landing herself… My mother encouraged her; she wanted her sons and daughter to travel…”

His voice trailed off, barely a whisper in the dark. His face looked pained. “Your mother,” Nym said carefully. “You barely talk about her.”

“They are bitter memories,” Doran replied quietly. “I think about her often, I think about what she would have done. Mother arranged the match between Rhaegar and Elia, but died before she could hold her granddaughter. She loved to travel, she loved to explore… she was near twenty years the elder, but she served as Queen Rhaella’s lady-in-waiting, along with Joanna Lannister. The three of them were the closest of friends.”

And how things change. Perhaps if the mothers had still been around, Robert’s Rebellion might never have happened. “You obsess over the past too much, nuncle,” Nym said. “These memories are tormenting you.”

“What do I have left?” Doran retorted. “All I have are these books, and my memories.”

Nym did not reply. She bit her lip, struggling to think how to soothe him. She did not like to see the man so distraught – he had been like a grandfather to her.

The silence reigned for a few heartbeats, the candles whispering in the darkness. “There were always rumours that the queen and her companions used to dabble in the occult,” Doran continued in a mumble. Nym’s eyes widened in surprise. “Some said they read alchemist tomes together, that they experimented with magic, even. Rhaella and Joanna were both willful, curious minds bound by duty, and Mother… well, the gossip-mongers liked to whisper that Mother was the one who taught them; that the Princess of Dorne stayed in court at the queen’s insistence, despite the king’s protests, to spread dark arts she learnt in Essos.”

“Truly?” Nym said with a scoff. Her father had taught Nym bits and pieces, but Oberyn had a low opinion of the magic preserved by the alchemists. She had heard that the Targaryens oft liked to dabble in alchemy, but she had not known about the others. The Queen, the Princess of Dorne, and the Lady Lannister were quite a trio of names to be so close to each other.

“Aye.” Doran nodded, still staring at the wooden crow. “I even asked once if she knew any magic, but Mother only laughed. But the three of them were like sisters – they wanted their sons and daughters to marry – Jaime and Cersei were offered to Elia and Oberyn first, before Rhaegar to Elia. Rhaella had to spend years pressuring Aerys into accepting the betrothal with Elia, but Joanna and Mother were both eager to see their sons and daughters joined.” Doran looked at her. “Tywin refused, but if only Joanna had lived… Do you ever think about how your own father might have ended up married to the woman you despise such?”

“I do not,” Nym’s voice was chilly. “But thank the heavens that lunacy was stopped. House Lannister deserves all it has wrought.”

“Quite,” Doran muttered darkly. “You should reflect on the past more, Nymeria.”

“And you should think on the future, my prince.”
There was a humourless chuckle of laughter, like a sob. “You have no…” He took a deep breath, regathering himself. “Then did you know that Joanna Lannister served as King Aerys paramour while she was the queen’s lady-in-waiting?”

That caused Nym to blink. “What?”

“It was a rabid rumour at court,” the prince explained. “The whole realm knew that Tywin and Aerys clashed over Joanna, and even in the years before her marriage… It was the height of scandal, but few people ever knew. The queen most certainly did, but I hear Tywin willfully blinded himself to it. Joanna was an ambitious woman; she enjoyed playing Tywin and Aerys off each other, and making both men seek her.” Doran shook his head. “Tywin and Aerys were the best of friends at one point – Tywin was even the one who knighted Aerys during the war of the Ninepenny Kings – but then their competition over Joanna…”

Slowly, the smirk grew over Nym’s lips. That was how the feud between them began, she realised. “And then Tywin won,” she noted, “and the king was forever slighted.”

She knew that Aerys had been insistent that Rhaegar would never marry Tywin’s daughter. The king had been insistent that Tywin would never have another victory over him, and the relationship between king and Hand would have devolved from there.

“It was never much of a victory,” Doran explained. “Aerys was already married. But Aerys’ and Rhaella’s marriage was an unhappy one, forced onto them by their father Jaehaerys. Tywin tried to squash such talk, but still the rumours flew – they whispered that Aerys was the one who took Joanna’s maidenhood.”

Doran didn’t seem to share her amusement. “Perhaps. And Joanna certainly made an influential position for herself, even after being dismissed from Rhaella’s service. But Aerys never lost his attraction to her, Tywin grew ever colder, more prideful, and then the game that Joanna began to play… it became dangerous, very quickly. Ruinous, even. The two most powerful men in the realm started butting heads over her, each trying to claim her as their own.” He paused, and whispered. “It set the stage for more than you can know. Had Joanna not died when she did, we may have had a wholly different manner of rebellion.” He cocked his head. “Do you still think it is so funny, Nymeria?”

Her smirk didn’t fade, but her expression turned somewhat stiffer. “Why are you telling me this, nuncle?”

“Because my mother… your grandmother… she was the one who helped keep Joanna’s indiscretions a secret,” Doran said softly. “The Princess of Dorne protected Joanna when no one else would. All your life, you have been raised knowing Lannister and Martell as mortal enemies, but I… I still remember a time when things were different.”

Nym bristled slightly. “Does that excuse Elia’s murder?” she object. “Or her babes? Does that make it all better?”

“No,” Doran admitted, his shoulders slumping into the pillows. “Nothing does.”

In the bedchambers, the candles whispered. A few of the books scattered to the floor as Doran slunk further into his bed.
“We are avenging her,” Nym said finally, as the silence stretched painfully long. “We are avenging Elia.”

“Are you?” Doran’s voice was a quiet scoff.

The heartbeats were slow and stiff. The candles flickered.

“Yes. We have won, nuncle. Cersei Lannister died ruined and grieving, her family finished. A new king sits upon the Iron Throne, and Arianne by his side.”

“I heard.” He said nothing more than that.

So the maester already informed him. It had been a tense time. The losses were painful, and the Great Fire of King’s Landing was said to have wreaked devastation, but Aegon was victorious.

Doran should thank me, even.

I did this for my family, Nym thought sadly. Doran hadn't been strong enough, so Nymeria took over. She had made all of the plans, and she kept so much of the news away from him, for fear of causing her nuncle more distress.

And yet I always knew this day would come. She took a deep breath.

“So it is over, nuncle,” Nym said finally. “You are free to go.”

There was no reply.

“All of my men are leaving,” Nym continued, “and your guards will be given their posts back. Maester Caleotte will be here in the morning to escort you again. There will be no more locked doors. You are in command of the Water Gardens again.”

Still, he stayed quiet – but Nym saw his hands clench. “You are, of course, free to imprison anyone you choose,” she said. “But all of the ‘conspirators’ will simply be gone.” Doran had no names, he had seen few faces. Besides Nym, her nuncle wouldn't even know who had been responsible for his incarceration. “I, myself, feel like a trip across the Narrow Sea is in order. Volantis seems like a good destination. It has been a long time since I saw the city of my birth. “You are the Prince of Dorne again.”

“Just like that?”

“Just like that.” Nym nodded. “I told you that I would never harm you, nuncle.”

The silence reigned. Doran's grim eyes finally turned to look at her, his gaze meeting hers. “You mean to pretend like none of this even happened.”

“That was the intention,” she confessed.

His wrinkled face tightened. “And you think you can commit treason so easily?”

Nym scoffed, leaning back on her chair. “Treason!” she tutted. “Very well, if that's how you name it. And I admit it; I have kept you prisoner in your own home for the last two months, while I sent out commands in your stead.”

There was a cold, dead fury glowing in her a nuncle's eyes.

“But,” Nym continued, stressing the word, “nobody else has even realised. Things have been going quite smoothly without you, actually.”

That caused him to flicker slightly. She saw the twitch even despite how Doran tried to keep himself composed.

“As far as the realm is concerned, your health took a turn for the worst, and you have been sickly,” Nym explained. “All visitors have been turned away, and all letters have been forged. There’s been a few close calls, I confess – I think Lady Rykker is growing suspicious, and Lord Allyrion was insulted – but between my men and friends in the Old Palace we’ve kept the realm turning.

“And it worked too. It was… successful, even.” The words came with a bitter scoff. “Arianne joined with Aegon, Dorne declared support, and the Young Dragon now sits upon the Iron Throne – and Dorne was his strongest ally.” Nym forced a smile. “Congratulations, the regime you wanted to topple.”

Again, it was met by only silence. Doran was staring at her, his pale eyes on hers.

“Now, I did have… contingency plans in case things went sour,” Nym confessed. “But it seems none are needed. We won, so I shall be going.”

She stopped, and waited for a reply. Doran spoke slowly. “I do not believe that you are a fool, Nymeria,” he said finally. “But do you think I’m so soft that I’ll forgive you for this, niece?” He shook his head, and his case was dark. “You deserve to hang, for what you've done.”

“I expect you to think of your position, nuncle.” I expect you to stop and deliberate, like you always do. “Half of Dorne already believes you are weak, and the lords beneath you are vipers, my prince. Can you imagine the loss of influence if news got out that you were held hostage in your own home for months, by a bastard woman?” Nym tutted, and shook her head. “They would laugh at you, rather than weep for you. You’d lose all respect, all trust in the strength you wield.”

Their prince had been detained, but nobody noticed nor cared. “If you ever admit how I took control of your own house so easily, your rule would be as good as over.”

Doran’s face was guarded, his eyes so hard that no emotion crept through. “And I expect you to think of your daughter, Arianne, in the king’s court,” Nym continued. “Would you really sacrifice the position your daughter is in, all for your own petty pride?”

He turned, stiffening at her name. “Arianne?”

“I am working for Arianne, nuncle. We came to an agreement together. She needed you to act, and we could not trust you to make the right decision. I love my cousin dearly; while your hesitation put everything at risk. So Arianne told my sisters and I to act, and we did.” That was a lie. “I did this for my family.” That was not.

It was a falsehood – Arianne had no knowledge of their plans – but it was not one that Doran could easily confirm. His daughter was five hundred leagues away, and Doran would not trust such sensitive words to raven wings. Even Doran did hear the truth from Arianne, the doubt would constantly nag at him.

Still, Doran seemed more shaken by that than anything. His posture cracked. “You lie…” he gasped. “She would not…”

“She would not what?” Nym challenged, with a bark of laughter. “Betray you? Start a war?”

The memory of Arianne’s last coup flickered between them. Doran was shaking.
“You were a liability, nuncle,” Nym said sharply. “You and your waiting.” Her jaw tightened. “My father tried to force you to act. Oberyn walked into that trial by combat to draw a confession, to try to force you to act. You own hesitance killed Oberyn, but even your own brother's death wasn't enough!”

She took a deep breath, to calm herself. “I hope you enjoy the Water Gardens until the end of your days, I truly do,” Nym said finally. “You said once that the Water Gardens were your favorite place in this world. I do not expect you to forgive, I just want you to understand.” You belong here, rather than in the Old Palace.

To be honest, Nym would have had more respect if Doran really did burst into anger or rage against her. Instead, there was only a slow nod. Show some passion, nuncle, Nym begged, or is it all dead?

“What of my son?” Doran asked eventually, and Nym tensed. How did he hear, who told– “Did Trystane witness the murder of his betrothed?”

Oh. He was speaking of Trystane. “Trystane is still at Starfall, nuncle. I’m told that Trystane did not see the execution, but he was in vicinity of it. He is upset, but he cannot be a child forever.”

“No.” The single word lingered in the air for several heartbeats. “The girl's murder is just something he'll have to live with. He was close to Myrcella, Nym.”

“Then he must learn the truth,” Nym said firmly. “She was the enemy, and her death was as necessary as Cersei’s.”

His jaw clenched. Angry but resigned. “We have achieved everything that you wanted, nuncle,” Nym insisted. “The Lannisters are ruined, their reign collapsed. Arianne will yet be queen, Dorne is secure.”

Doran just stared blankly at the wall. Why is the death of Myrcella so hard for him to accept? It was necessary.

“I had hoped you'd have more respect for the care I've taken, nuncle,” Nym pressed. “I assure you; no Dornish blood had been spilt by us.” That was a lie, but only a small one. There had been a very few mishaps that had needed taking care of.

“Only the blood of children instead,” Doran said foully.

“For vengeance,” Nym insisted.

“And is this vengeance?” Doran demanded. “Are you satisfied now?”

Nym paused. “Almost,” she admitted. “Only a few more bodies to make sure.”

Doran spat onto the rug, frowning at her. “Who else is left?”

“The queen’s conspirators.” Nym said carefully. “Her supporters, the last allies.” And a few loose ends, she thought, thinking of the Imp. “But, most of all… Gregor Clegane.”

With that, her nuncle stiffened. “Ser Gregor Clegane is dead. We have his skull.”

“I thought so too,” she admitted. “But we were fooled. I know not whose skull graces the mantelpiece of the Old Palace, and I don't how he survived my father's poison, but the giant knight was sighted at King's Landing. Cersei harboured him, and he lives, nuncle. Hundreds saw him fighting through the streets of the city.”

Her voice turned dark. “And Ser Gregor is the first on the list of who I must still kill,” she continued. “Along with the man who preserved him; Lord Qyburn the spymaster. He must burn too.”

There was anger in her voice. It was rare for Nym to show any real emotion, but the rage crept through.

“Why?” Doran asked, keeping his voice low and his eyes guarded.

Her hands trembled. Nym hadn't wanted to tell him, but…

“Because Obara and Tyene are both dead, nuncle,” she admitted. “And I must have vengeance for them too.”

The news had archived only recently, but it hadn't quite sunk in yet. Nym expected to cry and wail with the deaths of her sisters, but she had yet to shed a tear.

They both died in King's Landing. Arianne had written to her with news of Obara’s fate in battle. Tyene had been at the Great Sept, one of many. Nym had been hoping that Tyene might have survived, but Tyene had never missed sending regular reports south. Silence could only mean death. Both of Nym's sisters died in their quest for justice.

There was moment of silence after her admittance. Then Doran burst out into laughter.

Nym looked with horror. Doran was laughing; loud, choked chuckles…

“You dare??” Nym screamed.

“Of course you need revenge!” Doran choked. “You must avenge your sisters! Against Qyburn and all his allies, yes? Brutal destruction for them all?”

She had never heard her nuncle's voice break like that. Her hands clenched so sharply it hurt.

“Yes.” Her voice was a snarl. “I must kill their murderers.”

“But why stop there?” he challenged, through great sobs of chuckles. “Surely there are more you can blame?

“And perhaps you will fall in your own vengeance, but Elia or Sarella will be there to pick up the spear for you!” His voice nearly broke, the books falling of his lap with his shudders. “Perhaps in another eighteen years, when Trystane is prince of Dorne, even young Loreza shall be sitting before him and declaring vengeance.

“Be sure to have children of your own, Nymeria. Perhaps you could stretch this crusade out to last a whole century.”

Nym stared in horror. Sarella… “My sisters are dead. This is no jape, nuncle.”

“Oh, but it is.” He shook his head, taking a deep breath. “Ellaria spoke the truth; she was the only sane one of us…” Doran was shaking, his voice barely a whisper. “Do you know who is truly responsible for your sisters’ deaths?” Doran challenged. “He is lying right before you.”

Her face twisted. “What are talking about, nuncle?”

“It was me,” Doran muttered. “I killed Obara and Tyene.”
Nym scoffed. “You did not light the fire—”

“They chose to go.”

“For my revenge. You never even met Elia, Nym, you never knew her – neither did your sisters. It was my crusade that you adopted.”

“You insult us, nuncle,” Nym growled. “Tis our family, and our choice. My sisters and I chose this.”

“No, I did.” His voice quaked. “I am more responsible than Qyburn Rogare is. Look at me.”

“You are not…” Her voice trailed away. Nym blinked. What did he just say?

There was a silent heartbeat. Nym met his gaze. “… How do you know that man's name, nuncle?”

Nym asked lowly.

Not even I was aware of his family name. I never knew he had one; none of the letters contained it.

What did Doran know?

“Because Qyburn worked for me,” Doran replied.

My nuncle was delirious, he couldn't truly be saying…

Nym's instinctive reaction was to reach for her daggers. “What??”

She met his gaze, and his eyes were wide and dead. The candles flickered and whispered in the silence.

Doran took a deep breath, trying to stop his body shivering. “Everything,” Doran repeated. “Everything.”

The word lingered in the still air.

“Did you know that once… seventeen years ago… I once harboured Viserys and Daenerys Targaryen in Dorne?” Doran said finally. “Once, after the rebellion, I was deliberating declaring for them. Oberyn went to Braavos to meet the exiles. We made a betrothal with Willem Darry, we negotiated a deal with the Sealord… it came so close… Jon Arryn himself even came to Dorne to talk us down. He brought Lewyn’s bones to us, to try to talk us down.

“Oberyn had wanted an immediate rebellion,” Doran muttered. “We had a plan in place – to rally the Free Cities in support of the exiled Targaryen, just as Maelys did with the Ninepenny kings. We had alliances with Tyrosh, Braavos, Pentos, even Myr… Oberyn urged me to declare for them, but, in the end, it was something that Jon Arryn said convinced me to wait. ‘Viserys is just a boy’ he said, ‘no boy can be a conqueror’. I told Oberyn the same; that Viserys must grow to a man before he can lead a war.

“For a long, long time, I waited for that end. Oberyn made the preparations for war, but I pretended to be weak and submissive. I harboured the two Targaryen children myself in secrecy, on an isle on the Broken Arm, for many years. They were smuggled from Braavos and sheltered in Dorne with “none knowing.”

You did what? Nym thought with surprise, but she didn’t dare to interrupt.

“They thought I was weak, but I called it patient. Waiting for my king to come of age.” He breathed brittle. “Later, I intended for Viserys to move through the Free Cities, to rally support. I meant for Arianne to go to Tyrosh, to meet with her betrothed. I meant for a war.” Doran’s voice was pained, like a confession. “If not for that Pentoshi cheesemonger outbidding my efforts, things might have been so, so different.”

Nym blinked. She had not known that. Another failed plan, from two decades spent planning. Her heart was beating, but she just sat and stared with sharp eyes.

“The plan changed over the years. Gods, how many different scenarios did we go through? Oberyn became impatient, but I wanted perfection. Support from the Free Cities was stolen away from me, and eventually I decided that there was only one thing that could overthrow a crown, the one force that not even the Conqueror dared to challenge; the Faith.”

“Where are you going with this, Doran?” Nym pressed, keeping her voice low.

“I know of the one you call Qyburn,” Doran admitted. “He came recommended to me from the advice of the Archon of Tyrosh. The Brave Companions distinguished themselves fighting in the Disputed Lands, and I decided that I needed similar skills in Westeros.

“The Brave Companions came to Westeros on my orders, Nymeria. They were one of many that did.” Maybe he saw the surprise flash over her face. “They collected coin from Tywin Lannister, and then from Roose Bolton, but also from me. I simply paid a bit more gold to give additional orders on top.

“And I spoke many times with Qyburn. I knew of his reputation, I knew of his penchant for necromancy, but he was a capable man. I had use of him. He helped coordinate so many of my efforts.” He turned to her. “Did you think I was idle for eighteen years?”

Nym’s hands tightened. “And towards what end?”

“Towards countless torched septs and murdered holy men,” Doran whispered. “Towards destruction across the riverlands and beyond, the butchery of septs and smallfolk. I paid mercenaries to do it. Very few ever where their orders were coming from, there was to be nothing to link back to me – I needed intermediaries like Qyburn to arrange matters. I needed to provoke an outrage without compare, and the War of Five Kings was the perfect opportunity. I financed the mercenaries, I financed the sparrows who rose to oppose them. I set the fire, and fanned the flames.”

Nym’s eyes widened in shock. “That was you??”

“What did you think my plan was, all these years?” Doran challenged. “I wanted the Faith to declare the Baratheon rule illegitimate. I wanted Tywin Lannister to die trying to hold on to his crown against an uprising. I wanted the Faith to devour him. And once the Baratheon rule was condemned, the rightful crown would revert back to a Targaryen. Back to Viserys – who would be married to Arianne. I only needed to destabilise the realm and wait.

“And I never spoke word of it to my children…” Doran whispered. “Because I was ashamed of the steps that I took. Ashamed of how many needed to die for my war.”

“How many?” she asked.
Doran only shook his head. “More than I ever cared to count,” he said hollowly.

He planned it. Suddenly, so many details came into focus, so much made sense.

Doran had sent Tyene to the capital, and she had been welcomed by the Faith with open arms – because House Martell had already been a benefactor of the sparrows.

It had only been as the New Faith grew that Doran realised that he needed a Targaryen in Westeros at all haste. At the same time as the sparrows flocked to King’s Landing, Quentyn had left for Daenerys. He planned it.

Her head spun. Nym took a breath to gather herself. “Qyburn,” she said firmly. “Tell me of Qyburn.”

“I was the man behind Qyburn. I thought business with him was concluded when the Brave Companions did their task, but he wrote to me from Harrenhal and offered a new deal. A new arrangement. He told me that he had found a position after treating Jaime's wound, that he could earn a place in the queen's trust. That it was a new opportunity for us both.

“I did not know what he was planning, I did not expect the offer – but I was pleased when it came. I severed ties with all the other mercenaries once their tasks were done, but… Qyburn. He was different. I thought he was good fortune.

“So I gave him use of my contacts, I fed him intelligence to give to Cersei – it was because of me that Qyburn earned his position as master of whisperers.”

“He was your spy on the Red Keep,” Nym realised breathlessly. For so long, Doran had alluded to having friends in the capital, men who passed information concerning the queen. Her nuncle had refused to share any names, but it was information that could only come from someone close to the queen.

Doran nodded. “Yes.” There was pause. “Qyburn was the one who warned me of Cersei’s plot to assassinate Trystane.”

Nym didn't reply. She remembered that; Cersei planned to kill Trystane, and to blame it on the Imp. The gods had a dark sense of humour.

Heartbeats passed in silence. “Qyburn gave me much from the queen's private circle,” Doran said. “And I gave him information that made him useful. My contacts became his contacts. It was a mutual relationship. I thought that I was exploiting him.”

There was no reply. Lord Qyburn had caused the greatest disaster King's Landing had ever seen. Tens of thousands had died upon Visenya’s Hill.

And it benefitted us spectacularly.

“And it worked.” Doran sounded numb. “It worked. This is what our revenge tastes like.”

Slowly, painfully, Doran started to chuckle again. He was laughing, gasping with deep, strained breaths.

“All those bodies, all this time…” Doran laughs. “And it was me. Do you wish your revenge against me?”

Nym only stared with shock. The silence reigned in the gloomy room.
He started the Faith uprising. If not for the High Sparrow’s crusade, Aegon would never had won.

If not for Qyburn and his atrocities, House Martell would never have had its revenge.

And my sisters would never have died.

Nym's fingers roamed across the hilt of the dagger under her cloak. Her throat jammed, she didn't even know how to reply.

“Go on,” Doran challenged. “Take your revenge. That is you want, isn't it?”

There was another long silence. Nym's eyes narrowed. Very well then.

“There was news from Meereen as well, my prince,” Nym said suddenly. Her voice was cold.

“Quentyn is dead. He died in Queen Daenerys' court.”

Another failed plan.

There was no shock in Doran's eyes, not really. The prince had been preparing for Quentyn's death for months.

And yet still, the confirmation felt like a dagger to the heart.

“No…” he muttered. “No…”

Her eyes turned cold. There was nothing more to say. Sometimes the truth was the greatest cruelty in the world.

She stood up to walk away. Behind her, Doran was shaking; his posture collapsing. There had been no news from Meereen for months, but then Sunspear received a message from a trader from Lys relaying word. They had received news of a Dornish prince who arrived in the queen's court, and died trying to steal dragons.

I wanted to avoid telling him, Nym thought. I wanted to spare his feelings.

“My... my boy...” Doran gasped. “My boy. How... how did he...?”

“Quentyn died painfully, and unfulfilled. He died trying to make you proud. Another failed plan of yours.”

The prince of Doran had never looked so old, so frail...

She walked away slowly to the doors, keeping her shoulders stiff.

“There will be no more locked doors, no more men banning you. You in charge again.” As she exited, she left the door open wide, just to make him suffer. “Enjoy your pools, nuncle.”

Even she walked out onto the terraces, she heard Doran crying bring her. “It was my fault...” he sobbed. “I sent Quentyn to die...”

“Have a pleasant evening, nuncle.” Nym's voice was cold. “Sweet dreams.”

She left him in the flickering candles, surrounded by the ghosts of all his memories and all his family.

Nym spend the night in her own chambers, pacing restlessly. Once, she stabbed her blades against the stone wall, hissing and spitting, just to try and relieve some of the frustration bubbling in her chest.

When she finally went to sleep, the memories of Tyene and Obara haunted her dreams.

Early the next morning, she was shaken awake by the sound of alarms. Footsteps were running outside, men banging on her door. Nym slept with the daggers under her pillow, her whole body clenching as she shot awake, seizing them by reflex.

“What happens?” Nym demanded, rushing out the door. “What happens?”

Two guardsmen breading the sun and spear of Martell were standing outside, their faces pale under the helm. “It's the prince, my lady,” a man, Liam, reported. “He's vanished.”

The man shook his head. “None. We think he walked away.”

Walked away? Nym almost gasped. How could he...?

Doran was crippled with gout. Every step her nuncle took was agonizing to him. How could he escape?

She looked around their faces, and they were all nervous. “His quarters are empty,” the guard said with a gulp.

Nym clutched her daggers tightly, and stepped quickly onto the terraces. “Search the grounds!” she snapped. “Find him!”

How could Doran escape? she thought, feeling the panic seep through. Even if the prince could stagger out his room – he was an old, crippled man. Where could he go? The gates had been sealed, the walls patrolled, and the Water Gardens isolated.

The door to the prince’s chambers was open, exactly how Nym had left it. There was no way, Nym cursed. How could he possibly run...?

Men were shouting, panicking. There was confused frenzy, men bellowing as the morning sun rose over the archways.

Nym felt her heartbeat started to rise, and then she saw the scrap of pale yellow cloth, torn and snagged on the terrace balcony.

She felt her heart stop as she turned to stare down at the waters beneath the blood orange trees.

They found Doran, Prince of Dorne, lying face first in the shallow pools of the Water Gardens, his body floating among the lilies.

The Squire

They said that the Battle of Rosby wasn't much of a battle, but it felt like one to Olyvar. It felt like the end of the world. He felt the screaming of his blood, the horse's hooves thundering beneath him, the steel shivering in his hands...

He saw the whites of his enemies’ eyes, he saw the red pluming from bodies around him, and the arrows whizzing from the sky. The shafts seeming to fall in slow motion before frantic eyes, moving so sluggishly he could watch the tail feathers rippling in the wind. Olyvar had been in bigger battles before, true enough, but the battle beneath the gates of Rosby felt… more personal, more frenzied, more intimate.

Nothing but a few hundred men, stomping and rolling around in the mud.

In his previous battles, there had been thousands standing beside him; there had been walls of battle-hardened swords and spears and floods of armoured warhorses and lances. The Battle of Rosby was different; Olyvar had never charged against so many with so few. He had never led the charge.

After all that blood, that adrenaline, that fury…

It felt unreal to be standing in the mud, mere hours later, watching the village kids scavenging arrow shafts and broken blades up from the ground. All of the bodies had already been carted away.

It was dusk over Rosby, a village barely more than a waystop in the road with a small limestone keep crouching over the crossroads. Less than half a day ago, there had been battle here. There had been so many boots that the ground turned into a muddy slush.

Olyvar remembered the mud. Already his memories were blurring from the pure frenzy of it all, but he remembered the mud. That was what stuck out in his mind through the blur; the squelching of wet and trodden earth beneath him. The mud and blood.

“Come on,” the Bloody Lord Stokeworth said, tapping him on the back. “Let's get you a drink.”

Olyvar only nodded. There was a scratch over his forehead where an arrow had whizzed past his skull. Olyvar honestly couldn't remember it happening. The whole castle felt… numb. Shaken.

He let the Bloody Lord Stokeworth pull him up from the mud, wrapping his arm around Olyvar’s shoulders. The tall, grim-faced man stank of sweat and blood. “Cheer up, kid,” Ser Bronn of the Blackwater laughed. “Take my advice; forget about the bodies, start thinking of the payday.”

How could the man be so cheerful, so merry? Ser Bronn of the Blackwater, the Lord Protector of Stokeworth, earned his nickname. He was called the ‘Bloody Lord’, presumably because of all the men who had cursed ‘that bloody Lord Stokeworth!’. Most men would have chafed under a nickname like that, but Ser Bronn embraced it.

“Wish I had a whore,” Ser Bronn said wistfully, as they stepped through the gates. Olyvar could still see the marks and splinters where the battering ram had collided. “Need a whore to celebrate. Still, the only whore around these parts that I know is Old Mildred down by the river, and I ain't that horny.”

Olyvar didn't reply. They passed bloody stone corridors, mud trekked through the hallway, and the sounds of injured men screaming. Rosby Keep didn't have an infirmary, so instead they used the main dining hall. They didn't have a maester anymore either, but there was a barber who knew how to dress a wound and an old woodsman who knew his poultices. Twenty-two men had taken arrows during the battle, and four were on death's door.

“Besides, I reckon Mildred will have a queue tonight, judging from how many of the boys were heading in her direction,” Ser Bronn mused, despite Olyvar’s silence. “With silver, though, maybe we’d get some farmer's daughter to open up her legs. Should definitely get you a whore.” Olyvar glared. “You need a woman after your first battle.”
Olyvar would have bristled, if he had the energy. “It wasn't my first battle.”

“Really?” Lord Stokeworth looked surprised. “It seemed like it was.”

Olyvar's jaw clenched. “I killed five men, ser,” he objected. “More men fell to my blade than to anybody else's.” Olyvar had been all fury during the fight, charging harder than he had ever done before. That red helm shaking, swords sparking, horses screaming…

“Heh, don't get me wrong, you did well, kid,” Ser Bronn said with a nod. “You definitely fought better than most. But I could see you trembling like a first-timer as you were doing it.”

There was no reply, but Lord Stokeworth didn't seem to need one. They trekked into the lord's solar – Gyles' old solar – and the Bloody Lord Stokeworth was already shuffling through the old oak cabinets looking for a drink.

“I reckon it's the first-timers who fight the hardest, actually,” Bronn continued regardless. “The newbies are the ones trying to prove themselves, the ones so drunk on fear that they'll charge with everything they've got. Trust me, by the fourth or fifth battle they're going to be far more cautious, far more likely to hang around the fringes rather than join the push.”

Ser Bronn found a decanter of Dornish red wine, half-hidden under the desk. Olyvar never knew that Gyles drank. Even months after Lord Rosby's death, this was still more Gyles' castle than Olyvar's.

“Enough of this,” Olyvar growled. “We need to discuss strategy, we need to get ready to move out.”

“Kid, those men out there are exhausted, they ain't going anywhere,” Ser Bronn scoffed. “They got a bit of blood on their swords, they're going to want to whore and rest.”

“There's a battle happening at King's Landing right now, we need to—”

“Right now,” Ser Bronn insisted, slamming two glasses down onto the table, “we need to drink.”

Olyvar stared. There was crackle of a fire in the background, but otherwise the room was quiet. Just him and the Bloody Lord Stokeworth, and a decanter of Dornish red.

“You saw the smoke,” Olyvar said finally. “There was a lot of smoke coming from the capital.”

There had all seen the black and green tower of smoke rising from the capital, staining the sky like an oilstain. Even in the middle of the battle, the men had stopped to gape. King’s Landing was leagues away, yet even across all that distance Olyvar had never seen so much smoke in his life. The night was dark now and the wind had shifted, but Olyvar couldn’t shake the sight of that pillar of smoke.

“I saw it,” Bronn said, his eyes narrowing. “And I recognised it too – that was wildfire. My guess is that Cersei is up to her old tricks again, same as she did on the Blackwater. Bloody alchemists keep on making more of the stuff. You're right; likely Aegon is at the city gates right now. Cersei probably started launching barrels of wildfire from the walls, but my guess is the soldiers lost control of the stuff and the fires spread into the city. I bloody warned Tyrion that was like to happen; you can't trust most men to stay calm and level-headed in a battlefield, you certainly can't trust them to handle the alchemist's green piss.” Ser Bronn soon his head, tutting. “But maybe Aegon has breached the walls, or maybe they've been routed. Fucked if I can tell.

“Yet if we head off ourselves, now, we’re not going to help. We’d just get in the way, cause a bit more confusion. Quite possible that our own allies would mistake us for enemy reinforcements, or maybe we’d just upset whatever battle plan is happening.” Bronn shook his own head. “No, rushing off like fools ain’t going to help anybody. I’m going to sit tight in Rosby, and I’m going to wait for word. I’m going to be sure I'm doing the right thing before I do the stupid thing.”

Olyvar opened his mouth to object, and then closed it.

“Seriously, kid, your hands are trembling,” Bronn insisted. “No use to anyone like that. Drink until the tremors stop.”

Olyvar almost didn't reply. He bit his lip. His hands were still trembling. After a long moment, his shoulders sagged in resignation. “How can you be so calm?” Olyvar asked lowly.

Ser Bronn dropped into the opposite chair. “Done this before, kid.”

Kid. Olyvar was twenty years old, but he looked younger. It seemed like he had always been the kid. Olyvar had squired for a king three years his younger, but Robb Stark had still seemed the eldest. I am still the kid, Olyvar thought numbly.

Part of it was his plump cheeks and clean-shaven chin, another part due to his inexperience with arms. Olyvar's father, Lord Walder Frey, had been extremely old even when Olyvar had been born, and his mother had died in childbirth with his sister. For most of his childhood, Olyvar had been warded and raised by his mother's cousin, Lord Gyles Rosby. There were just too many Freys around the Twins, he thought sourly, my family constantly looking for places to shove the extras.

Gyles had been more a father to Olyvar than anyone at the Twins; Gyles had been so kind and understanding, never pressuring him or expecting anything of him, but the Lord of Rosby had also been very sickly for decades. Gyles had been better with a quill than a sword, and there had never been anybody to train Olyvar at the martial arts. Olyvar had been a man grown and he hadn't ever picked up a sword proper. His brothers, half-brothers and nephews were all knights or squires, they would mock him relentlessly.

Benfrey and Willamen had been the banes of Olyvar's life. Ever since the incident with the stableboy, his older brothers had been far too busy mocking him to spar with him, or to teach him.

And Olyvar Frey had been so, so happy when his father negotiated for him to squire for the Lord of Winterfell, and then the King in the North. Lord Walder Frey had wanted his problem son to finally have a knighthood, and arranged for Robb Stark to give him one. ‘No other knight would take you’, Willamen had sneered, ‘I hear Robb Stark isn't even a proper knight’.

No, Robb Stark hadn't been a knight. Robb had been a king.

Robb never mocked me. Despite how Lord Frey twisted his arm, Robb Stark never treated Olyvar with anything other than kindness. Robb had been young and bold and handsome, with dimples in his chin and beautiful curly red-brown hair…

Olyvar had been more loyal than anyone, he had chanted Robb’s name first and loudest, whenever he’d had the chance. Never had Olyvar felt more driven, more whole, than he had when he was by Robb's side, fighting Robb's war. All Olyvar ever wanted to do was keep on polishing Robb's armour, to stay close to his king.

And here I am. Olyvar thought, staring at the Dornish red, fighting my own rebellion against the crown. How did it go from there to here?

Olyvar would have followed Robb anywhere. I should have followed Robb that final time.
“For all we know,” Olyvar said slowly, “Aegon Targaryen might be dead already. He might have lost.” And then my fight is doomed.

“Might have done,” Bloody Lord Stokeworth admitted, taking a large gulp from his glass. “In which case, we're buggered.”

Olyvar glared at him darkly. “Maybe they need reinforcements. They could need help, even a few more men might turn the tide.” Even a single squire might have saved the king…

“If Aegon and his ten thousand plus men have already been beaten,” Ser Bronn scoffed. “I don't think that the two hundred and twenty-seven men out there are going to make much difference.”

“Two hundred and twenty-six,” Olyvar said reluctantly. “Big Tom from Ram’s Bend died from his gut wound.”

“Two hundred and twenty-six,” Bronn repeated dryly. “Well, no offence against Big Tom, but I don't think his contribution would have made the difference.”

Olyvar just grimaced. Earlier today, he had been fighting for his life. Now he was left feeling helpless and unsure. The phantom adrenaline through his veins was still causing his hands to shake, fingers clutching at an imaginary sword.

“Take my advice, kid,” Lord Stokeworth insisted. “Settle down, get drunk, stop yourself from shaking. We ain’t going to hear anything about what's happening at the capital, not today. Maybe not tomorrow either. We'll find out either when the runners come through here, or until someone thinks to pen a letter.” He held the glass up, a dark smile spreading across his scarred face. “We’ll talk war in the morning, when the blood has cooled down a little bit.”

Reluctantly, Olyvar took the glass. How, by all that is holy, did I ever end up in rebellion alongside a man like him?

Olyvar thought back to their first ever meeting, when Ser Bronn of the Blackwater had stomped into Rosby, escorted by grizzled sellswords. “So,” Ser Bronn had cried, swaggering through the castle’s hall. “You're the ward of Rosby? I hear you don't like Lannisters.”

Barron had been the one to bring Olyvar the offer from the Imp; the offer of revenge for the Red Wedding and his liege against the throne that orchestrated it. Stokeworth offered to stand side by side with Rosby, under the banner of the Young Dragon returned. Bronn promised rebellion to the crown, and a big bag of gold when Aegon took the throne. The Imp had provided names of everybody who had been involved in the Red Wedding, and promised Olyvar that none of them would avoid justice under King Aegon.

Olyvar had been motivated by a single thought; what would Robb Stark do? Olyvar had wanted to be brave like Robb, wanted to do right by his king's memory.

Olyvar took a deep gulp of Dornish red.

Barron downed the glass quickly, and then jumped to his feet. “Shit, I nearly forgot,” he sighed, walking to the door. “Hold on, be back soon.”

Olyvar stared. Barron shuffled out the door, but he was back quickly. The sound of mewling and wailing caused Olyvar to jump.

Ser Barron returned carrying a restless babe, bundled in his arms and pressing up against mud and blood-stained chainmail. It was a fat, pudgy baby of one or two years old, with bright pink skin and a wispy crop of light blond hair on its nearly bald head. It was snivelling, wiggling in the Bloody Lord's grasp.

“You brought your baby here?” Olyvar demanded incredulously. “To a battle?”

“Well, I could hardly leave him with his mother, now could I?” Bronn scoffed. “The dumb cow keeps on forgetting to feed him. Say hello to little Tyrion Tanner.”

Tyrion Tanner was a plump and squirming babe, very fat for a baby. Olyvar had heard of him; the babe born from half a hundred men, Olyvar thought, and his mother's rape behind a tanner's shop. “Tyrion,” Olyvar said slowly, “Tanner.”

“Lollys wanted to call him Tywin,” Ser Bronn said, as if that explained everything.

The Bloody Stokeworth sat down across the table, with a baby bouncing on his knee and a bottle of Dornish red in his hand. “Come on, kid,” Ser Bronn insisted. “This is a celebration, and I want to finish this bottle. Dornish red shouldn’t go to waste.”

Little Tyrion Tanner didn't stop mewling, stubby fingers groping for attention. Bronn just swatted the babe over the head, playfully, as he refilled the glasses.

“To the new king,” Ser Bronn toasted. “May this one last at least a year, this time.”

Olyvar didn't reply. House Stokeworth and House Rosby, joined together in defiance against the rest of the crownlands.

Olyvar liked to think his contribution had been significant, but he had no idea. He had little sense of the greater war, he was in charge of nothing but his little corner of rebellion. He had spent most of the war trying to overcome petty squabbles, trying to convince men to follow him, and trying to keep control of Rosby against the many who, perhaps rightfully, tried to evict him.

Trying to train the enlisted smallfolk how to wield their spears and shield had been an exercise in futility by itself.

Olyvar had only had two dozen or so men-at-arms willing to follow him, and then they raised a militia of local boys. A militia that was good at holding pitchforks and polearms and trying to look fearsome, but less reliable at using them. Olyvar's greatest contribution to the war effort was the toll and barricade on the Rosby Road, where his men had been confiscating caravans for whatever pretence the serjeants could come up with.

They had demanded imaginary paperwork as an excuse for stopping goods going to the city, and many, many disgruntled merchants and peddlers had to be forced away.

No supplies or reinforcements had been allowed to King's Landing through the Rosby Road. We help keep pressure on them, Ser Bronn had explained, we want to make sure the capital is simmering. It had been a quiet rebellion, so slow that it took a while before anyone even realised they were rebelling.

Lord Stokeworth had more soldiers than Olyvar did. Ser Bronn of the Blackwater had been gathering his militia for much longer, and he recruited and commanded them with far more skill and experience. All the while Olyvar had been fortifying and defending the road, the Bloody Lord Stokeworth had been leading raids and ambushes across the countryside all the way up to Duskendale.

Olyvar went through the numbers in his head. He was good at counting, Gyles had taught him stock-keeping more than fighting. Over three months of rebellion, ninety-seven caravans seized, a hundred and fourteen members of the Rosby militia and two hundred and eighty-two soldiers of House Stokeworth. Of those combined; eighty-seven had deserted them over time, forty-two had suffered wounds to various degrees, and eight were dead.

He would have to recount those numbers again, after the most recent battle.

Big Tom, Wyl, Andrew, Jon from Ass’ Stop and Jon from West Hook, Turnip, Pate and Watt… Olyvar could name absolutely everybody who had died in his little war. I tried to do my part, Olyvar thought. I wanted to help avenge a wrong.

I wanted to do what Robb would have done.

Olyvar had tried to give his personal condolences to the loved ones of everybody who died, but then he realised how tortuously useless and meaningless his apologies were. Apologies changed nothing. There would likely be more deaths yet from injuries in the coming weeks, and how many more would die in the months and years as their livelihoods and professions were left destroyed?

He didn't know how many men there had been on the enemy’s side, but he suspected similar numbers. Perhaps a few more desertions, a few more deaths. Olyvar had discovered that men were far more likely to desert in battle rather than die. Battles were decided more by the morale of their soldiers rather than their lives.

It's easier when they're all just numbers.

Olyvar took a deep gulp of Dornish red, drinking it down so quickly he nearly choked. Tyrion Tanner was chewing on the wooden desk, while Bronn was already refilling the glasses.

The Dornish red was thick and rich, causing Olyvar's head to spin…

It was hard. Even when dealing with tens to hundreds of men, it was difficult. Robb Stark had to deal with thousands to tens of thousands of men, and Olyvar had never appreciated truly just how difficult that must have been.

“That's right, kid.” Ser Bronn even sounded sympathetic. “Drink until you stop the tremors. Now you know why soldiers need lots of ale.”

The commanders need it even more, Olyvar thought. “How many battles have you seen, my lord?”

“No clue.” The Bloody Lord Stokeworth shrugged. “Can’t remember. They all blur together after the first dozen or so.”

Olyvar took another drink. I fought at the Battle in the Whispering Wood, my first, he told himself, and the Battle of the Camps. I fought at Oxcross, and then the Battle of Ashemark, and then the Storming of the Crag. “I fought through nearly all of the Young Wolf's campaign,” he said slowly. “This was my sixth battle.”

“Good for you.” Ser Bronn seemed amused. “But there's a difference between fighting in a battle and fighting a battle, kid.”

The image of muddy earth, of bodies wrestling, of pushing and shoving, stabbing and screaming… The red helm, and the roar of horses…

There had been a few notable skirmishes in the Rosby-Stokeworth rebellion. The Bloody Lord Stokeworth clashed with House Ryker men from Duskendale heading south; technically House Stokeworth lost that battle, but the Duskendale men had been forced to retreat too as their supplies burnt. There had been another force of House Tarly and House Mooton reinforcements heading south from Maidenpool, but they had been too large to stop so Lord Stokeworth let them pass.

One time, a troop of gold cloaks and some Crakehall men had come from the capital to Rosby to demand they release the caravans, but Olyvar and the militia had seen them off. There had also been bandits razing farmhouses to the east for which Olyvar had mustered men to chase away. Those bandits had worn red hearts on their chests, and a family of six had burnt to death in their cottage before the Rosby men found them. Olyvar later found out that those men were sworn to the Broken King, Stannis Baratheon. Two fisherman’s daughters were kidnapped and taken back to Dragonstone, while another six burnt.

Today had been the biggest battle, by far. Nobody had expected it, not when word had arrived that Mace Tyrell was finally marching on the Golden Company. There had been no warning, there had just been hundreds of men appearing on the road one dreary morning. Lannister, Tyrell men and City Watch – red, green and gold cloaks.

They had come not to negotiate, not to squabble, but just to storm Rosby Keep. No talk, no warning.

Memories of that moment were repeating over and over again. They were outside, slamming against the gates. Men screaming, panicking, and Olyvar's voice bellowing. “Ready the horses!” he had screamed. “We charge out against them!”

He tried to be brave, but every man in the keep thought they were going to die.

If not for the Bloody Lord Stokeworth coming to Rosby's aid, then Olyvar would have lost. If not for the sight of reinforcements, the Rosby men would have thrown down their blades and abandoned the fight. Instead, it had been the gold cloaks who had ran as their courage broke.

Olyvar remembered mud underfoot, and the red-helmed knight charging against him. He remembered the lance in his hand, his arm lunging, pushing his palfrey to meet the destrier. The knight with the red helm had fought bravely, lunging and parrying, but Olyvar had been raw emotion and desperation…

King Robb may not have knighted me, he thought, but he taught me how to fight.

“That knight in the red helm,” Olyvar said finally. “The man I killed. He was leading them, wasn't he?”

“Well, he had the fanciest armour, and the best warhorse.” Ser Bronn nodded. “So aye, I'd say he was in command. Nice job with that one, by the way. It looked like quite a fight.”

“I don't even know his name,” Olyvar muttered. The knight had been strong, fierce, and a fury with his rapier. “Who was he?”

“Not a clue.” The Bloody Lord Stokeworth looked at his expression, and then sighed. “Hold on, kid, I'll go find out for you.”

He pushed up from one his chair, and stomped out the door, leaving Olyvar sitting to stew in silence. Tyrion Tanner was on the floor, squirming and trying to find something to chew. The baby nearly reached Olyvar's boot, but he pulled his legs away.

Not long later, Ser Bronn returned and scooped the babe back up. “Spoke to one of my guys,” he explained, “and he said they were being led by one Red Ronnet, the Knight of Griffin's Roost. Ser Ronnet Connington.”

Olyvar stared in horror. “Connington?!”

“Aye,” Ser Bronn said with a grin, dropping back into his chair. “The cousin to the Hand of the True King. Or second cousin or whatever. He used to be the head of his house, before Jon Connington came back from the dead. Good job.”

“I killed his kin!”

“No, you killed the claimant to his seat,” Ser Bronn said, stressing the words. “Plus, you killed him, which means Lord Jon isn't going to be labelled as a kinslayer. That's important, and this is a victory for you.”

Olyvar didn't know how to reply to that. Ser Bronn was already pouring another glass.

“Red Ronnet stayed loyal to the Iron Throne despite his cousin's return,” Bronn mused. “But I reckon that Mace Tyrell still didn't trust Ronnet in their army just because it was his family they were fighting against. While the rest went south to face a dragon, they must have sent Ronnet north to take Rosby. You take Red Ronnet's armour and warhorse, you take the Lord Hand’s gratitude… hells, I've seen men made for life for much less.”

"Only if the Golden Company wins.”

“Only if,” he agreed, as he bounced the babe up and down absentmindedly. “But I've gambled on worse odds.”

“They say that King Aegon has fifteen thousand men,” Olyvar's voice was low, his head starting to buzz. He took another drink. “And that Mace Tyrell has thirty.”

“Damn, what is with you and trying to count everything?” Ser Bronn chuckled. “There ain't nothing more useless than counting. War ain’t maths, soldiers aren't numbers.”

I'm well aware. The image of the red blade and muddy ground… “And what happens if they do lose?” Olyvar said slowly. “What will you do if the worst happens?”

Ser Bronn mused over it, and took a gulp of Dornish red. “Depends,” he said finally. “But I'll do whatever it takes to survive.” He poured another two glasses. “If I need to, I'll throw myself on the floor and weep like a little babe before the queen or anybody else. I'll beg and I'll sob and I'll say that they held my wife and child hostage, that I never had a choice.” He smiled faintly, bopping Tyrion Tanner on the head. Olyvar couldn't imagine the Bloody Lord ever crying. “Or maybe I'll go out and I'll take the head of every traitor I can find. I'll go for Stannis, I'll go for the Imp, I'll kill as many as physically possible and I'll drop all their heads before the queen as an apology. She'll probably appreciate that more than tears.”

Olyvar hesitated. “Will my head be one that you drop?”

“Don't obsess over it,” Bronn said dryly. “Worst comes to it, I'm ransacking Stokeworth for all its worth, and I'm getting on the first ship out of here. You'll find me and little Tyrion in the Summer Islands somewhere, with a pretty girl by my side and a tan.”

Olyvar didn't have anywhere to run. His entire life had been between Rosby and the Twins. “What of your lady wife?” Lady Lollys Stokeworth, the dimwit woman raped a hundred times behind a Tanner’s shop.
“Meh.” Bronn shrugged. “Tyrion’s easy to carry, but there’s no point bringing her.”

“You… you like the baby,” Olyvar said uncertainty.

“I do actually,” Ser Bronn said, sounding surprised himself, still bouncing the child on his knee. “I like the little bastard, the bugger.”

Olyvar remembered one of the guards betting coin that the Lord Stokeworth would ‘drop’ the babe of his horse somewhere. ‘What sort of man would let a bastard of his wife's rape grow up under his roof?’ the guard had said, ‘from what I hear, the Lord Stokeworth ain't the sort to let a child like that live for long. That babe is going to take a fall on its head soon enough, mark my words’. Apparently, that man lost his bet.

Across the table, Bronn took another gulp. “Your hands are still shaking. Take another drink. It helps, trust me.”

Olyvar did. “I must be going soft,” Ser Bronn mused. There was still blood smeared across his grey armour. “I suppose this is what being a proper nob does to you, it makes you soft.” A smile cracked over his dark features. “And I like you, kid – soft load of heartbroken mud that you are. You're decent on a horse, and honest enough that I don't have to worry about you stabbing me in the back. Take my advice; don't think of the bad, think of what might happen if we win. I told you; we could be in a real good place here. Proper lordships and all.”

Both of us stole our houses, Olyvar thought, feeling a bit woozy. Neither of us have any right to our seats. The Bloody Lord Stokeworth had killed the former lord, his brother-in-law, in a joust.

Meanwhile, Olyvar wasn't even a member of House Rosby, he had no right to the castle, but he had still been raised here. Gyles Rosby had never taken a wife either – he had never had an interest in fathering a child – but it was well-known that the former lord had wanted Olyvar to be his heir. With Lord Stokeworth's help, Olyvar had seized control of Rosby Keep and its lands.

“We both allied with Aegon real early,” Bronn continued. “The king will have to reward that well. I'm looking to move up from Stokeworth myself, but you could easily be made the rightful lord of Rosby. Or more, if you push it. You’re young and loyal, Aegon will do well keeping you sweet.” Bronn nodded, yet his tone turned serious. “But just take my advice, kid; take a new name. Make a new house. If word spreads that a Frey is sitting comfortably, then the brotherhood without banners is going to be knocking on Rosby's door any day now.”

Olyvar's hands tightened. “Not every Frey deserves to die.” He thought of his brothers, his sisters, his family that tried to protest the Red Wedding…

“Deserve got nothing to do with it,” Bronn said, shaking his head. “It's real unhealthy to be a Frey in these parts right now. The hangwoman has seen to that.”

“Almost as unhealthy as it is to be a Lannister,” the words splurted out of Olyvar’s mouth.

“Aye. Almost,” Bronn chuckled, his eyes glancing to Little Tyrion.

Ever since the Red Wedding, the hangwoman and the brotherhood without banners had inflicted brutal redemption upon House Frey, one by one. And then the Bastard King had inflicted retribution on them all at once.

Olyvar felt drunk, his head woozy. “I never stopped thinking about that night,” he admitted, his voice pained. “The Red Wedding. I was there. My half-brothers locked me in the tower during my sister’s – Roslin’s – wedding. Walder Rivers threatened to kill me unless Roslin went along with it,
I was a hostage to force Roslin into the plan.” There was no reply. “And I spent that night screaming and banging on the door, and I…”

A single night that defined everything after. The night that had damned the Freys.

His voice trailed off. Ser Bronn didn’t push him. Roslin, his sister – his pregnant little sister… Olyvar hadn't even been able to save her.

“A week after it was over, Black Walder gave me a horse,” Olyvar said finally, “and told me not to come back. I rode for Rosby and disavowed my family. Gyles took me in.”

For a few months after, he’d recuperated in silence at Rosby. And then the Bastard King had entirely obliterated the Twins, innocents and guilty alike. The Bastard King clearly wasn't one to be dissuaded by hostages. If there was any moral to that story, Olyvar couldn't see it.

He took another drink. His head was starting to buzz. Nothing but two men and a baby sitting in a poorly lit room, getting drunk on Dornish red.

“Why are you doing this?” Olyvar asked after a while, slamming his glass down on the table. “Fighting. Why did you start this rebellion, what for?”

Bronn shrugged. He seemed drunk too. “A castle, vaults of gold, a pretty wife… the usual.”

“You've got a castle.”

“Aye, a small one though. I got silver too, but not much gold.” He glanced at little Tyrion Tanner. “And I got a wife, I suppose, but she's hardly pretty. I want more.”

My lord father wanted more too. Olyvar had never wanted anything except to be at Robb Stark’s side. “You want another wife?”

“Well, I was promised double,” Bronn chuckled, “but probably best to get rid of the wife I've got first. I think that after I'm named lord of my new castle, I'm going to see how much of a bribe it takes to annul a marriage. I've never fucked Lollys, could never stomach it, and I hear that's all it takes for annulment. Maybe I'll get a Summer Islands woman with long legs as my second wife, but I'll be lord of my own rights.” He moved the glass to his lips, and then paused. “And I suppose that’d leave Lollys up for grabs, if you're interested. You could have both Rosby and Stokeworth.”

Olyvar didn't dignify that last bit with a response. “But why?” he demanded, voice cracking. “It'll never be enough. Why do you need more, and why did so many have to die for it? Is it really just for power, is that all you care about?” Is that all my father cared about…?

The Bloody Lord Stokeworth smiled hollowly. He paused, absentmindedly letting Tyrion sip from his glass.

“I was born in Gulltown, you know that?” Bronn explained after a while. “Well, outside of Gulltown, really. I'm told that my mother was pregnant when they put the noose around her neck. Never knew what she did – but it was probably whoring, thieving, the usual. Anyways, they dropped her from the gallows, and then I dropped out of her.”

Olyvar gaped. “Are you… is that a jest?”

“Not a clue,” Bronn admitted. “That was the story I got told, but I never did find out whether or not the bugger telling it was messing with me or not. Could be horseshit for all I know. Still, they called me ‘the Unlucky’ in the orphanage until I was twelve, right up until I beat another boy to death with a broom handle because I was starving and the boy stole my turnip.” Bronn chuckled. “You think dying for a lordship is bad? Imagine dying for a turnip.

“But after that, I ran, and I stowawayed on a ship coursed for Oldtown. Never got there, though; the crew found me and threw me overboard. That was the day I learned how to swim.”

Olyvar stared speechless. Tyrion started to cry again, and the Bloody Lord rocked him absentmindedly. “Anyways... the point is that I had nothing,” Ser Bronn explained. “I had less than nothing; I owed everything I got. So I picked up a dead man’s sword, I started traveling, and I just wanted something. I want to be one of the guys that folk owe things to, for once.”

“And... and that's it?” Olyvar demanded, slurring his words slightly. “No other reason, you just want to have lots of stuff?”

“Pretty much,” Ser Bronn nodded. “It’s that ‘want’ that’s kept me alive. I’m not that good of a swordsman, not really, but I can still kill much better men just because I want it.

“You see, that's the bit about war that nobody understands. It doesn't matter about numbers, doesn't even matter about skill – it's all about want.” He barked out a dry chuckle. “Does that make any sense, or am I just drunk?”

A bit of both, Olyvar thought, staring at his glass. The bottle was nearly empty.

“Your turn, kid,” Ser Bronn said, draining the last of the wine into two more glasses. “Why did you declare for our glorious King Aegon?”

“You know why,” Olyvar muttered.

“I know you're pissed at Lannisters, don't like your old family either,” Bronn said. “But seems to me, if you really want to stay loyal to your Young Wolf, then why not go north and join the mess his half-brother is making up there?”

Olyvar shook his head. “Jon Snow is no king of mine.” The thought of Roslin, pregnant and dead in the ruins of the Twins, haunted his vision. “Robb Stark would have cursed what his bastard brother has done.”

Olyvar had seen the Bastard King’s letter. At this point, most of the highborn in the realm had, like as not. The kingdoms had been set to panic after the Scouring of the Twins, and the letters from White Harbour that had come not long after had been copied and passed between every maester in the realms.

Some had declared vengeance against the dragon, others had retreated and cowered in fear. Some had even cheered for the obliteration of the Twins, but more had panicked with thought of who might be next. Olyvar heard that Lord Jonos Bracken had evacuated Stone Hedge entirely for a time, certain that the dragon would target House Bracken next. Olyvar lost count of the number of lords convinced that it was doom upon them all.

White Harbour had declared rebellion in alliance with the Bastard King and his dragon, and the rumours had sprouted like mushrooms in the rain. Even high lords spoke of the north in hushed whispers, they said that there were dragons, giants and monsters, wargs and witches in the Bastard King’s army – wildlings that practiced cannibalism and blood sacrifices before heart trees, or savages that would cut off their own faces, or make necklaces of human eyes.

As the months passed, the fears eased somewhat, but it all felt so fragile. The realm was left tense, watching the north in apprehension for the ice dragon passing the Neck again.
It had all left him numb. Olyvar had loved his family almost as much as he had hated them. To burn the guilty with the innocent, to burn hostages...

The thought of Roslin, his own sister...

His fingers fiddled with the glass. Bronn was looking at him intently. A different world, a different choice, and maybe I would have ended up fighting this man, Olyvar thought. Maybe Robb might have attacked King’s Landing, and Ser Bronn would have fought against us for the Lannisters.

“And it's all my fault,” Olyvar admitted. “Everything that happened. My fault.”

Bonn stayed quiet. Olyvar took a deep breath. “I alone could have stopped the Red Wedding.”
The Dornish red was making Olyvar’s head spin. “I was there when Black Walder first suggested the idea to my lord father. I was in the room, I was there. I tried to protest it, but they dismissed me to my chambers. That was my chance.” His voice nearly cracked. “If I had ran away that night, I could have stolen a horse and rode to Robb to warn him. I could have prevented it right there, but I…” He grimaced. “But I thought that I could dissuade them. I didn't think they would actually do it, but… but… after that night, they started locking me in my room. They realised I wasn't going to along with the plan, they didn't give me another chance to stop it. I was there, I was kicking and screaming and useless all through the night…”

That memory… even after all this time, it still hurt. I was locked in my room, all the while my king was being murdered.

Bonn sat quietly. Olyvar's voice was breaking, but he couldn't stop talking. “I had my chance,” Olyvar gulped. “I could have saved him. I never should have left him. I was his squire, I… the Frey alliance fell apart, Steffon was demanding that we leave, but I could have…”

I could have stayed, Olyvar thought, I could have fought. But instead I let them take me away because I was angry. Robb had married Jeyne Westerling, and Olyvar had been furious.

Everyone had expected Robb to choose Roslin. Olyvar had been unhappy with that thought too, but then he had grown to accept his king marrying his sister. Olyvar and Robb could have been brothers, it meant Olyvar would have stayed by Robb's side.

But then when he married Jeyne…

Robb was delirious on milk of the poppy, Olyvar told himself. Robb hadn't been in his right mind. He had been recovering from an arrow wound, and grieving from the news of his brothers. Jeyne Westerling took advantage of him, and Olyvar could never forgive her for that. It had been Jeyne Westerling’s fault, not Robb’s.

No, it was my fault. If only I warned Robb of my family's plot, Olyvar thought. If only I had stayed by his side. If I only I had taken that arrow for him at the Crags, if only I had been his squire…

He was my king and I would have walked through the hells for him. But, somehow, I couldn't disobey my family for him.

There was a moment of silence, as the drunken memories overwhelmed him. Olyvar had to blink through the haze. “It was my fault,” Olyvar said finally. “I had my chance and I did nothing. So I joined with Aegon because I didn't want to lose another chance. I didn't want to do nothing.”

Bonn sat in silence, dark eyes lingering on him. “Take a deep drink, kid,” he said, his voice strangely soft. “If it still hurts tomorrow, drink again then too.”
Olyvar did. The Bloody Lord emptied the last of the decanter into Olyvar’s glass.

The wine was thick and rich, overwhelming his senses and making his thoughts blur. In the quiet, whispering room, he could feel himself slipping away… His mind wandered. He remembered. The memories, as sweet and sharp as a blade… the moment where it all went wrong…

“Jon… Jon…”

Olyvar could only stare, caught in endless self-recriminations, while the faint light dappled through the narrow windows of the stone keep. His king was moaning, insensate in his bed, wracked by nightmares. They had cleared out the entire infirmary for the king, but Robb’s personal guard stood stiffly and quietly around the room. The only noise was their king’s pained murmurs.

Behind him, the door opened quietly, and two women walked in. One older, the other younger, but both were carrying metal plates of water, poultices and fresh bandages.

“He has been muttering senseless for half a day,” Ser Wendel Manderly warned, his arms folded and his beefy face creased with concern. “He’s half-delirious.”

Lady Sybell Spicer nodded. “The wound won’t kill him,” the aging Lady of the Crag replied. Olyvar didn’t even turn to look at her. “But his fever runs hot. Milk of the poppy for the pain, plenty of water, and a calming salve his humours. Be certain that he drinks every night.” She laid out tankards of milk and water on the bedside, along with something pungent he couldn’t recognize. She saw Olyvar’s gaze rest on it. “It’s a purgative,” she explained. “A family speciality – my grandmother was something of a healer herself.”

From across the bed, the Smalljon Umber peered down at the concoction, his gaze suspicious. This recently after the battle, tensions were still high. The sworn guard of the king were all staring at Lady Sybell and her daughter.

She just met his gaze, and scoffed. “Do you think I’m a fool, ser?” Lady Sybell replied, rolling her eyes. She snatched up the tankards, and took a small sip from each of them herself. She pointed to her purgative. “It is calendula, chasteberry, ginger and garlic, no more. It’ll calm his stomach and help ease the fever. Have your maester confirm there is no poison, or use a food-taster if you wish – but I would not put my family’s life at risk. I want your king to recover swiftly more than anybody, so that you all might move on.”

The Smalljon muttered that he would test the concoction, but most seemed happy enough. House Westerling was resigned; the Crags had put up a decent fight, but now the small castle was occupied by Robb’s own soldiers. Lady Sybell was a sharp, severe woman with a matronly air to her, brushing past the armed men in the infirmary. “Jeyne,” the lady ordered. “You see to his wound, replace the bandages.”

“Yes, Mother,” she replied meekly, stepping towards the bed. Olyvar stepped forward too, to help twist Robb onto his side. Robb was so pale, a cold sweat sticking to his skin.

The arrow had pierced through Robb’s gauntlets, straight through his forearm. It had seemed a minor wound at the time – Robb had screamed in pain, but he had been able to keep fighting with his other arm, like some hero of legend. Robb had made it all the way to the main hall of the Crags – standing strong and firm to accept the castellan’s surrender even despite the arrow in his arm.

It was only after an entire day when the blood loss made Robb woozy, he collapsed and the infection took hold.
We should have treated it earlier, Olyvar cursed. They should never have let the fever grow so bad – they all knew the stress that Robb was under. His gut wrenched at the sight of his king like this. No, I should never have let Robb get hurt.

His king was still mumbling in his sleep, eyelids twitching in some dream. “Jon…” Robb was muttering. “I don’t… I can’t….”

They were silent, as Jeyne Westerling wrapped fresh wool around his forearm, tightening it with straps of leather. Olyvar’s hands were on Robb’s shoulder, holding him steady as gently as he dared.

“Who is Jon?” Jeyne asked quietly.

“Jon. Jon Snow. That’s his bastard brother,” Olyvar eventually said. His only brother, now. Word from Winterfell had arrived scant days ago. The news of Bran and Rickon had hurt Robb as much as the arrow.

“Ah.” Jeyne was quiet for a bit. Robb mumbled something insensately. “Is Jon with the army?”

“No, he’s serving at the Wall,” Olyvar shook his head. “Robb doesn’t speak of him very often, but…”

His voice trailed off. She only nodded understandingly. Jeyne was a shy and slim girl, her eyes constantly darting towards to the ground when she spoke. She wore a leather apron over her dress, dressed more like a serving girl than a highborn lady. She was meek and pretty, though; with chestnut curls, a heart-shaped face, and doe brown eyes. Not especially beautiful, but she had wide hips and good curves.

Olyvar remembered thinking well of her, at the time. Jeyne helped to care for Robb whenever he could not. Sometimes they would even take shifts by his bedside. Often Grey Wind would stay with Robb too, but other times the wolf needed to roam. One time, when Olyvar fell asleep in the chair next to the bed, he woke up with his head propped by a pillow.

All Olyvar had wanted was for Robb to recover, so he could it make it all better.

“Run…” his king muttered in his sleep. “Must… come…”

Jeyne finished re-bandaging the wound, gingerly resting the king’s arm across his chest. The old bandages were foul, red and black – the arrow wound had been weeping again.

“What the ironborn did to his brothers…” Jeyne whispered, soft and hesitant. “I am so… I shall light a candle to the Father for them.”

Olyvar nodded. “Aye,” he whispered. The north prayed to the Old Gods, not to the Seven. Olyvar wondered if that was better or worse.

He supposed that the campaign would soon be returning to Winterfell. Olyvar felt scared of what that might mean. Robb needed to return to his own lands, but how would the riverlords react to their new king abandoning them? The north was defended by the Neck, but the riverlands were exposed on all sides.

They might curse Robb if he leaves now. And my father, Olyvar thought with dread. How will Lord Frey react if King Robb chose to abandon the war and go home? The riverlands had risked much when they hailed Robb as their king.
Olyvar felt helpless. He felt useless. So useless. His king was in pain…

“The cold… Gods, the cold…” Robb was mumbling. “… Sword… Sword in the darkness… the watcher…”

Jeyne leaned in, and laid a wet towel over Robb’s forehead, stroking it down flat. “Mother’s medicine works well,” she said. “His fever should break soon.”

“Aye,” Olyvar nodded, but his jaw was still stiff.

She glanced at him. “You care for him, don’t you?” Jeyne said gently, and Olyvar almost flinched. “You’ve stood vigil by his side constantly. You are good to treat your king so.”

“I’m his squire,” Olyvar said simply, hiding his grimace. “It’s my duty.”

She smiled, her hand gently touching Olyvar’s shoulder. “He must be a good man to deserve such loyalty.”

“He is,” Olyvar agreed. “The best.”

Jeyne tended to his linens. Olyvar dropped into the chair by the bedside. The moments ticked by slowly, but Robb’s mummers never ceased. His king was shivering, slightly, and then jolted in his bed. His king was awake. “My Grace!” Olyvar straightened to attention instantly. “What do you—?”

“Jon…” Robb muttered, eyes unfocused. “Blue eyes… they’re after them… Jon…”

No. His king was still… not asleep, but not awake either. The mummers were growing. Why were Robb’s thoughts circling around a brother a thousand leagues away? Jeyne looked down at him, her lips pursed.

“What are you seeing, Your Grace?” she asked gently, holding Robb’s hand to calm him. Olyvar blinked.

In the distance, Olyvar could hear Grey Wind howling in the courtyard of the Crags below. Robb was delirious from the milk of the poppy, but he was still moving and talking, squirming in his bed. “I see… ice. I see wings. I see wings, and ice… endless ice… and Gods…” Robb braced his arms against the bed, as he tried to stand. “I… I can’t be – I can’t stay here.” Robb coughed, trembled, and fell back into the bed. “My family, need to help my family.” His strength gave out, and he sagged back into the bed, panting. “The north… my family needs me…”

He’s delirious, Olyvar thought with a grimace. Jeyne rested her hand on his cheek, whispering sweet nothings in his ear and trying to calm him. Olyvar remembered wishing that he had been brave enough to cradle Robb like that.

“Dragons…” Robb murmured in his sleep. “Dragons, gods… the dragons…!”

Every eye in the room was on the king, but nobody said a word. They felt uncomfortable, like they were eavesdropping on their king’s private dreams. Olyvar helped Ser Wendel Manderly and Robin Flint as they gingerly poured the concoction down Robb’s parched throat. True to Lady Spicer’s word, the purgative seemed to soothe him, and he fell into a more content lull.

It was nearing dusk, the shadows through the windows growing long. They all stood guard around their king, but Olyvar could feel the weariness filling the room.
Eventually, after a long quiet, Jeyne stood up, and bowed to the men. “It is late, good sers,” Jeyne said. She smiled softly at Olyvar, and her hand gently rested on his shoulder. “You should retire for the night as well.”

“King Robb—” Olyvar tried to protest, but the Smalljon Umber nodded as he yawned.

“You are no good to him running ragged,” Jeyne protested, shaking her head. “I will see to it that His Grace is cared for.”

...

Olyvar blinked repeatedly, jerking to consciousness again. He shook himself out of his memory, trying to focus through the fog in his head. He knew that dream, he had relived it frequently. How much suffering might have been prevented, if only I kept Jeyne Westerling away from my king?

He was back in the solar at Rosby – leant over the desk in the gloomy stone room. The only sound were the sweet whispers of candles, and the faint gargles of the baby beneath the table.

Bronn took a long gulp, and then stared forlornly at the empty glass. Little Tyrion was mewing again, groping for attention. “Well shit.” Ser Bronn sighed. “I knew I should have packed more wine myself. My own bloody fault for taking milk for this bugger instead.”

Olyvar only nodded, still trying to focus through the whispers and memories hissing around him.

The baby seemed to perk up, a wail splitting from his little mouth and his face turning red. “He’s a greedy little sod,” Ser Bronn explained, pulling his chair back. “But I suppose I better go. It’ll be a headache all night if I don’t put this bastard to sleep.”

“What, I don’t seem like the sort to carry a baby around with me?” His mouth twisted, and then his lips burst into a smirk. “Hells, you’re right. I was quite prepared to leave him in a farmer’s field a year ago. But, well, the bastard has grown on me.”

Olyvar didn’t know how to respond to that. The Bloody Lord Stokeworth was a tall, grim and dark man with eyes like a killer and scars across his cheeks, and Olyvar still blinked to see such a man pampering a pink and mewling baby.

“Mind, if I wanted the bastard dead, I could have just left him with his mother,” Bronn commented as he stood up. “The cow doesn’t feed him, she cries even more than he does. It was his grandmother that forced Lollys to have him, but Lollys would have smothered him with a pillow if she had her way.”

“Lollys…” Olyvar muttered. He was too drunk, he couldn't stop himself… “Raped by half a hundred men behind a tanner’s shop?”

Bronn pursed his lips, like biting back a smirk, but he just nodded. “You’re awfully interested in my boy?”

“No, it’s just…” Olyvar floundered, head spinning. “… It’s just that my father had two dozen children and half a hundred grandchildren… and yet Walder Frey never gave any of them half the attention you give him…” Why is the thought of a caring father so alien to me? “He’s not even your blood.”
Ser Bronn paused, scratching his whiskers. “Have you ever had a bastard?” he asked finally. “Ever thought about one of the buggers yourself?”

Olyvar shook his head. “Never liked the process.”

“Probably for the best – they ain’t worth the hassle.” Bronn chuckled dryly. “I’ve had enough whores that maybe I’ve got some bastards running around, but I’ve never met them. Babies are queer things. Little Tyrion here is the first I’ve ever had to deal with.”

“Tyrion,” Olyvar repeated. “Tyrion Tanner. The Queen Regent must have hated you for naming him that.”

“It did get me in a bit of trouble,” Bronn conceded, but his smile widened. “And maybe I poked the lioness. But I just couldn’t resist, it was too…”

His voice trailed off. Bronn grimaced, and Olyvar frowned. “Too what?”

“Too funny,” Bronn admitted. “That was the jest, you see, it’s… well, Lollys wanted to name the bugger Tywin.”

Olyvar stared uncomprehendingly. The Bloody Lord Stokeworth seemed torn, for one drunken moment. “Alright, bugger it,” Bronn said finally, dropping back down on his chair again. “Can you keep a secret, kid?”

Olyvar only blinked. “Suppose it’s not really a secret, anyways,” Bronn continued. “Useless, really, but if you want a laugh…”

“You’re talking about the baby?” Olyvar said, confused.

“Aye. Born from rape during the riots of King’s Landing,” Bronn said, the smile still playing at his lips. “Except it wasn’t half a hundred men, that bit was bullshit.”

Wait, what? That was the tale parroted around constantly – in taverns men spoke of Lollys’ rape. Many even laughed and chuckled over it. The dimwitted girl, and the bastard by a mob of smallfolk. Olyvar blinked, trying to understand. He met Bronn’s gaze. “Wait, then… it was just one man?”

“Aye, that’s what she says,” Bronn nodded, pinching Tyrion’s chubby cheek. “And I named this baby after his father’s uncle.”

The room went silent. The fires crackled in the backdrop, and Olyvar only stared. He was too drunk to understand, too slow to grasp it. Ser Bronn burst out in a bark of laughter.

“It was the riots of King’s Landing, you see,” Ser Bronn explained. “Hell of a time. Stannis was approaching the city with half the armies in the realm, but city turned in a battle before he even got there. The queen and the Hand were tormenting each other, the city was starving, and the whole place was a boiling pot of shit, simmering fit to burst. You had loaves of bread being sold for a gold dragon, and manhoods being fed to goats. Then the day of riot, well, the princess was shipped off to Dorne, the queen was fuming, and some bright fool started slingning manure at the king on the way back. That was the moment it all went to shit, actually – moment it all went wrong. When the cracks started to show. We probably wouldn’t be here right now, if it weren’t for that fool throwing manure, and the prick of a king setting his dog onto the crowds.”

Olyvar didn’t understand, but he listened raptly. “You had some Lannister cousin vanishing without a trace in the riots, and the High Septon ripped apart by the mob. We all thought that the Stark girl was dead too, and Tyrion… well… the Hand of the King pulled young King Joffrey down to his knee and slapped the bloody shit out of him. Beaten by a dwarf right in front of the whole court – gods, Joffrey turned red.

“Lollys was there too, she vanished in the mob. Her mother was screaming bloody fury, but everyone else was more distracted with Sansa Stark.” Bronn shook his head. “Hells, I was there – and I didn’t even think to wonder about whereabouts Joffrey sulked off to afterwards.”

Olyvar’s mouth slowly dropped open.

“The way I understand it,” Bronn explained slowly. “Lollys managed to slip away all by herself – but with her clothes ripped she looked like just another lowborn woman. Lollys ran to the Red Keep, but it was Joffrey that found her first. Little shit was on his way down to the gates with that crossbow of his, wanted to try it out on some smallfolk. Just happens to see Lollys and comes up with a more interesting idea, catches her before anyone else. Him and two Kingsguard – I figure it was Boros Blount and Mandon Moore. Bunch of thugs.”

“Are you…?” Olyvar’s head was spinning, just trying to understand. “… Why?”

“Buggered if I know.” Bronn shrugged. “But Joffrey was a prick. He enjoyed stripping and beating women when he was angry, and he was really angry. Tyrion had already taken his last plaything away from him; Joffrey must have wanted to lash out, and Lollys was the weakest target around. There were even talk going around that Lady Stokeworth was trying to set up Tyrion to Lollys – so maybe Joffrey thought that it would be revenge against his uncle’s future wife.”

Olyvar’s back straightened upright, eyes widening. Was this a joke, some jape he didn’t understand…?

“A lion taking a lamb’ is what Lollys repeated to me,” Ser Bronn said softly. “Apparently, that was Joffrey kept saying, the cunt, while the Kingsguard pinned Lollys down and stripped her clothes off. Afterwards, Lollys was so distraught every single time she had to step into that keep again, but everybody just thought the girl was a dimwit.” A chuckle rose from Bronn’s throat. “Fuck, I heard that she was so terrified to even leave her room after that, but I never wondered why. No one realised what was really traumatising her.”

Across the table, Olyvar sat speechless. Little Tyrion was still crying, squirming in Bronn’s grip.

There was long moment of silent. Bronn stared down at his cup. “Really wish we had more wine,” he lamented.

There were shivers down his spine. “How…?” Olyvar exclaimed finally, stammering. “I never heard… who knew about it, did they…?”

“Very few knew. I don’t think the queen ever found out; neither Lollys nor Joffrey were like to tell her. The two Kingsguard dropped Lollys off barenaked behind the tanner shop afterwards, and then she was picked up by the gold cloaks. She was too stupid and shaken to speak.” Bronn shook his head. “Tyrion definitely never found out – it wouldn’t gone down well if he had. Joffrey had only done it to spite his uncle.

“It was Lady Tanda, Lollys’ mother, that kept it all hush-hush,” Bronn explained. “At first, she tried to deny any rape altogether, tried to claim that Lollys was just unwell – all the while Lollys was weeping hysterically in her chambers. Lollys was forbidden from drinking moon tea, though, because this was a royal bastard.”
Lollys would have smothered the baby, Olyvar remembered Bronn saying. Lollys was raped, and then forced to curtsy before her raper. She watched while Joffrey was heralded as being young, bold and noble – a king.

Lollys wanted to name the babe Tywin.

“But Littlefinger, Petyr Baelish,” Bronn continued, leaning backwards and raising the wriggling child up, “he definitely knew. Lady Tanda ran to him for help, and Littlefinger was the one to convince House Stokeworth to keep quiet. I think he was where that ‘half a hundred men’ tale came from too, the bugger. Littlefinger insisted that nobody could know, but the gods alone know what he was playing at. I don’t have a clue what he was planning.”

Bryn smirked faintly, looking at the babe. “Hells, I only found out after I married Lollys, and after her mother’s death. I would have dropped the baby off in a field somewhere, if not for that little nugget spilling out.”

“Is this…” Olyvar paused, shivering. Is this real? Is there any proof?”

“None,” Bronn chuckled. “Just the word of a dimwit cow of a woman. That’s what makes it funny.”

“She could have lied,” Olyvar said disbelievingly. “She might have made it up, or was mistaken, or…”

“Could be,” Bronn nodded.

“How old was Joffrey, even? The king could have only been around thirteen.”

“Old enough. He was the same age his uncle was, the first time Tyrion married a whore,” Bronn laughed. “Lannisters grow up fast, I suppose. I told you it was funny.”

‘Funny’ was not the word Olyvar would use. The ward of Rosby looked shocked, his mouth stammering drunkenly. “And I guess that answers your other question too, about why I decided to keep little Tyrion around. At first, I thought he might be useful – a little bargaining chip just in case I did have to suck up to Cersei.” He sighed wistfully. “And, I mean, it’s a bit disappointing, you reckon? The Bitch Queen never even had the chance to meet her grandson.”

Olyvar gaze turned slowly towards Little Tyrion Tanner, bouncing on his adopted father’s knee. Olyvar stared intently at the baby’s features; pale wispy blond hair, the chubby cheeks, and the dark blue eyes…

“But, like I said, he’s grown on me, the bastard,” Ser Bronn said fondly, pinching the babe’s cheeks. “My own little prince.”

The baby started to wail again, demanding food. “Prince Tyrion Tanner.”

Chapter End Notes

Well, there's a bit of a history behind this chapter.

The Davos POV was originally intended to go in chapter 41 next to Jon Con, so I could show the two Hands of the King next to each other. Of course, the last Jon Con chapter already became way too big, so Davos got cut from it.

The Nym POV was originally planned to include in book 2, but I had it written early and moved it forward.

The Olyvar POV was one that I planned and wrote a long time in advance, when I intended it more as a bubble episode; not much plot development, just a POV closer to the ground with limited characters and a different perspective, so I could focus more on the impact and aftermath of all these wars. If you've seen the Breaking Bad episode, "Fly", then that's more what I was going for with Olyvar's POV.

All of three POVs have been grouped together to focus on aftermaths, actually. A much slower chapter rather than the crazy ones that we've had recently.

Mind, I did want to this to be Winterfell chapter with Sansa, Jon and Bran POVs instead - but that hasn't been finished yet. It's taken a bit longer than I had hoped to get it done, and I'm not sure if I'll have a chance to finish the Winterfell chapter before Christmas now.

Basically, the chapter that I wanted to upload isn't done yet, so I pulled this together just so I would have something to give. Scream at me for that, if you wish.
Chapter 43

Chapter Summary

Rebuilding Winterfell, and restoring House Stark.

Sansa

It was very early morn, and Sansa heard the commotion spreading through the castle. The snowstorms were still stirring outside and the walls were vibrating from the winds buffeting against the keep, but she still felt the heavy footsteps and the cries of alarm.

My brother. What a strange thought. Is it truly him? Sansa had faintly expected that she’d be always able to recognise her family on first glance, but she couldn’t – Bran was a stranger to her, a ghost from her past. Sansa could only stare at his face, trying to link it to the boy who haunted her memories.

It had been over three years since she last seen him. She remembered a plump little boy, lying unconscious in a bed on the edge of death. Now, he was less a little boy; his face was gaunter, his auburn hair was greyer.

And he was so, so pale; she had never seen a child so frail. He looked little like a prince or a lordling, he was more a frail rag doll that had been left in exposed in the elements.

“Severe exposure. He is starved, with many cuts and bruises,” the maester was rambling. “I must urge caution in feeding him, for the shock that it might do to his organs. And his ankle is broken and unhealed – the flesh is swollen, and I fear his tumours may be congealed. His legs are non-responsive, but I hear that is an old injury?”

Yes, he is a cripple. Bran. My brother.

The maester was talking nervously in the background, but Sansa’s eyes were peeled on Summer and Bran on the four-poster bed. The men all gave Summer a wide berth, but the wolf was reserved. Jon had been hugging Bran as he carried him in, but Sansa couldn’t let herself embrace her brother. She couldn’t feel such emotions. She needed to stay detached, stay focused.

“I want to talk to the girl,” she demanded suddenly. “Meera Reed. Where is she?”

Bran lay unconscious, Meera was the only one who could give them answers. One of Jon’s men – Toregg the Tall, they called him – stood stiffly by the adjoining door with his arms folded. “The king is speaking with the lass. Said not to be disturbed.”

“I’m his sister,” Sansa bristled.

“Said not to be disturbed,” the wildling repeated bluntly, arms still folded.

He would not let her pass, and Sansa did not know enough leverage to force him. Is Jon deliberately keeping me away, or is it an oversight?

Outside, the hallway was roiling, and Sansa heard a score of lords each trying to press their own questions, shouting over the another. She heard the footsteps and hissed whispers from all the way down the stone staircase. There were dozens of men, most of them either petty or minor lords that Sansa couldn’t even name.

From inside the other room, she heard the Greatjon’s boom even through the walls. The shouts were hectic. “How did he get here??” his voice boomed. “What happened at Last Hearth??”

Sansa had seen the girl as they brought her in; Meera had looked little like a highborn lady either;
she was short and skinny for her age, with mud brown hair and a flat face. She would have passed more for a common girl – perhaps a huntsman’s daughter. She had been frail and trembling too.

Is this a trap? Sansa kept thinking. Was it some sort of scheme, trying to put an imposter in Winterfell? Was this Meera feeding them false information, trying to make herself seem distressed and helpless? Sansa couldn’t see how, but just the timing of it… she couldn't shake the suspicion that it was all a ruse.

Outside, voices were calling for witnesses from the assorted lords, for any who might testify to Meera’s and Bran’s identities. Her head was spinning. Sansa knew that rumours and whispers had named the wildlings responsible for Last Hearth. The testimony otherwise was valuable. If Meera confirmed that the Bastard’s Boys who sacked Last Hearth and Winterfell, not wildlings and ironborn, then those were two crimes that might do wonders to dissuade any who still harboured Bolton sympathies. If Bran could attest the same thing, then …

As soon as Sansa stepped outside of Bran’s chambers, there was a gaggle of lords and highborn waiting for her with uneasy expressions. A dozen of eyes peeled on her, the murmurs growing.
Perhaps they thought she had more answers than they did, but Sansa could not admit to being out of the loop.

“Is it true?” a lord demanded, a broad-chested man with a shaggy beard. He spoke with a very thick accent like one of the northern mountain clans.

“That depends on what you’ve heard, my lord,” Sansa replied, keeping her voice cool.

“Forgive us, my lady,” Lord Gregor Forrester said carefully. He was a big man and tall man himself, but his voice was much more hesitant. “But there has been talk – we need answers. Is it truly Bran Stark?”

She bit her lip fractionally. “Yes,” Sansa said. “It is. My brother lives.”

The group stirred. Sansa recognised Lord Gregor Forrester of Ironrath, she also knew Ser Ian Poole, the heir to Laketon, and she suspected another to be Lord Rickon Holt of Westwood, but there were others around her she could not place. Minor lords, all, she thought, but notable enough.

“The boy was on death’s door,” an old man said. “They say he will not live much longer.”

“Are you sure it is truly him?” another pressed, talk loudly over the others. He was a short and stocky figure under furs. “I heard it was a ruse, a Bolton decoy.”

“The maester says he will live, and it is my brother,” Sansa confirmed, looking between them.
“And I can recognise him surely.” Sansa forced a smile, but her heart was beating too fast to really feel it. Her brother. The thought didn't feel real. “By the grace of the Old Gods, Bran Stark has returned to us.”

“He has a direwolf, I saw it!” Ser Ian Poole proclaimed. “Only Stark children have such a beast.
Summer, its name was.”
Sansa recognised Ian Poole more clearly than the others – he was Jeyne Poole’s cousin, and had been a frequent enough face around Winterfell in Sansa’s youth. He had the same dark hair and brown eyes as his cousin, but he had grown and earned a knighthood in the time Sansa had been away. Jeyne disappeared in the capital, she thought, likely dead in an unmarked grave along with the rest of Father’s household, right next to my childhood. Not everyone came back from the dead.

“His direwolf is indeed proof,” Sansa said, nodding.

“Praise the Old Gods,” a voice muttered, but Sansa did not catch who.

“You do not have a wolf,” an aging lord noted suspiciously, his mouth nearly toothless. “And neither does King Snow.”

“My direwolf is dead, my lords,” Sansa replied smoothly. “Yet the king’s wolf is very much alive – Jon’s wolf simply not present at the moment.” Where is Ghost? she wondered. She hadn’t thought to ask.

“Robb Stark took his direwolf everywhere,” the broad-chested lord noted.

“Jon is not Robb.”

“He is not.” Those words lingered in the air.

Sansa’s smile turned wooden. “Forgive me, I’ve been away some time,” she said carefully. “Lord…?”

“Mollen,” the broad-chested lord said, his voice a rough drawl. “Lord Norvel Mollen of Brandon’s Crossing.”

An Umber bannerman, but otherwise Sansa knew little. I know that some of House Mollen were betrayers in the Battle of the Snows, she recalled. Half a dozen Mollen men had lost their heads recently, but the lord of the house had remained unconvicted.

“It is my pleasure, my lord,” Sansa said sweetly, giving a poised and practiced curtsy. Politeness is armour.

“Our apologies,” Lord Gregor Forrester said, lowering his head too and stepping back fractionally. “We forget our manners. I am Lord Gregor of House Forrester, with Lords Rickon Holt, Anders Overton,” he motioned to the aging man, “Alger Bole,” the short and stocky man, “and Ser Ian Poole.”

“It is an honour.” Take care to remember them – Sansa couldn’t afford to be a foreigner here. Her eyes turned to the seventh man; a long-faced, middle-aged figure who stood on the fringe of the group and said no words. He was dressed as a lord, but he had not been introduced. “And may I have a name?” she asked to the final man.

There was a hesitation, but the man forced a smile. “Lord Edric Ryder of Rillswater, if it pleases you.”

She heard a quiet scoff. It sounded like Lord Holt scoffed ‘for now’ under his breath. Lord Edric Ryder stood like a black sheep among the group, his face guarded and his shoulders stiff.

Ah, but House Ryder is sworn to House Ryswell, who fought alongside the Boltons, Sansa realised. Lord Edric Ryder must have fought against them, but he bent the knee when Winterfell was taken. One of relatively few who did, from what Sansa heard.
She looked between their expressions, and there was no celebration. These men were feeling too nervous and uncertain to cheer for the prince’s return. Nobody could cheer, not when so many questions and doubts hung over their heads.

“Pray, how may I help you, my lords?”

Lord Forrester stepped forward, glancing around the others. “We have… concerns, my la—” He paused. “Forgive me, but should I address you as ‘my lady’ or ‘my princess’?”

Nobody spoke for a long heartbeat. There was a barb to the question, the implications… Was House Stark still King in the North, or was it Snow? Nobody was certain, everything was doubtful.

That is to be decided. And quickly, but Sansa couldn’t give a wrong answer now. She needed to deflect the question rather than answer it. “Surely there is no need for such formalities among friends, is there?” she said sweetly.

“I’m afraid there is,” Lord Forrester said gravelly, and eyes glanced around at one another. “Allow me to be blunt, because I fear many others will be asking the same. Who is the King in the North, my lady?”

“In his declaration,” Lord Anders Overton noted lowly. “Jon Snow declared for House Stark – for the rescue of Arya.”

“He did,” Sansa replied, locking eyes with the man. “And what happened to my sister was a tragedy.”

“It was indeed,” Lord Holt quickly said.

“And realm cheers for the victory over the Boltons,” Ser Ian Poole added, “and for the return of yourself and your brother to Winterfell.” Gazes flickered towards Lord Ryder, who said nothing.

“But the question,” insisted Lord Mollen, “remains. What does King Snow intend now?”

“I do not presume to know the king’s intentions, my lords.”

“And that is the problem, my lady,” Lord Forrester replied. “Because neither do we.”

There was a pause.

“I serve Stark, as my family has done for millennia,” said Lord Rickon Holt in a low voice. “If the boy is alive, then he should be the King in the North.”

Sansa’s smile was waxy, but her voice didn’t waver. “Forgive me, but, if I recall, Jon Snow is the rightful king, as legitimised by King Robb.” She had heard of that letter in White Harbour, but the subject was murky.

“That was a letter of arguable credibility, based on the presumption that his brothers were dead,” Lord Mollen insisted. “And a proclamation I hear that he did not accept.”

“A Snow is not a Stark,” Lord Overton argued. “By all rights of succession, Brandon Stark should be king before Jon Snow.”

Lord Bole opened his voice to object, but the talk was turning too heated. “Please my lords,” Sansa soothed. “It is too early days to make such statements.”

“Excuse us, my lady,” Lord Forrester said firmly, shooting the others a sharp glance. “I fear patience is frayed and we are all tense. And yet…” He grimaced. “Please could we speak in private for a moment, my lady?”

Sansa paused, and then nodded. “As you wish, my lord.” She and Lord Forrester stepped aside towards a corner by the stone staircase, to talk privately. The others were left stewing on the centre of the landing, muttering and glancing back towards her.

For a big man, Lord Forrester’s voice and tone was surprisingly gentle. “Thank you, my lady. I hoped you could put doubts at ease.”

“Whatever I can do,” she tilted her head. “Your companions seem unsettled.”

“Winterfell is unsettled,” Lord Forrester replied. “Every house in the north is unsettled – we have been ever since the dragon started to fly over our lands. And the Battles of the Snows… well, the storm has yet to calm, the bodies still lie thick on the ground, and every living man is left stewing and doubtful.” He paused, and shook his head. “If Brandon Stark is truly returned…”

Sansa nodded, keeping her eyes soft. “You worry for your lands and kingdom. But I fear this talk could sow discord when we need to harvest unity, my lord.”

“There are… issues that need to be addressed,” Lord Forrester admitted. “Bran Stark’s appearance – and your own – has only brought to the surface what was already simmering.”

“Indeed.” Sansa met his gaze, choosing her words carefully. “I love my younger brother dearly, but he is a cripple and a young boy. Jon is a proven battle commander and a warrior.”

“That is true. And you would hear few objections if Jon were to take the crown himself.”

There was an edge to that phrase, Sansa considered. A quiet warning, perhaps. The unspoken objections were always the most dangerous. “And do you feel such dissent?”

“I… the north is a land divided, my lady.” There was a quiet grimace. He nodded his head to the group of lords standing on the landing. “Lord Mollen over there lost family at Last Hearth, but many of his kin blamed the wildlings not Boltons. He did not know who was responsible, there was only fear and doubt.” She did not speak. There was quiet for a few heartbeats before Lord Forrester nodded at the other lords. “And Lord Holt was so terrified of the dragon that he agreed to take a wildling bride from Snow, but he did not do so happily. Lord Overton did not even support Robb Stark as king, and then he thought his liege lord mad when Manderly made an alliance with the King-Beyond-the-Wall. Many wanted vengeance for the Red Wedding, but there were also many who were torn between fear of the invaders. Many who wanted to rebel, but many who did not ally easily behind a figure such as Jon Snow.”

“A figure such as Jon Snow,” Sansa repeated. “Could you explain that comment, my lord?”

For a second, his face looked pained. “The king… he is not the easiest figure to approach, my lady,” Lord Forrester admitted. “Nobody knew him, nobody expected him. He came south of the Wall leading an invasion and a dragon. He brought with him armies of savages, a pagan religion of fanatics, his very name is a harbinger of ghost stories from beyond the Wall made real. He is a bastard, an oathbreaker, a sorcerer. He controls animals, he has unearthly powers – the tales they tell of him…!” The lord shook his head. “What sort of man could trust in such a figure? I will not excuse the crimes of House Bolton, but to many the Boltons were the devil we knew versus the devil we did not. The Boltons were a familiar evil, and the ‘Bastard King’ a terrifying unfamiliar one.”
House Forrester, Sansa thought slowly, is a prominent sworn house to House Glover. Men from Forrester had served as scouts and outriders during the Battle of the Snows.

“I… I see,” she said carefully. “Do you harbour grievances against King Snow, my lord?”

He hesitated. “I will not do you the disservice of falsehoods, my lady. My lands have been plagued by wildlings since time immemorial. When Jon Snow came south of the Wall leading an army of them, there was not a lord in the realm who didn’t feel dread.”

“Jon Snow has fought for the north, not against it,” Sansa argued. “And the wildlings have kept to his peace.”

“So he claims,” Lord Forrester agreed, nodding. “But we still need to know for sure.”

She measured his gaze. He had a blunt face and honest features. For a tall and powerful man, there was a flicker of fear and uncertainty in his expression. The uncertainty was the most dangerous.

“And do you feel that that there could be dissent should my brother and half-brother clash over the crown?” Sansa asked after a heartbeat.

“I feel that this is indicative of the question that the realm has been asking from the beginning,” Lord Forrester said. “For what does Jon Snow fight – his own power, or the north?”

Sansa had no reply to give. She just nodded. “Thank you for your words, my lord.”

There were others who tried to approach her, asking the same questions, raising similar concerns. Sansa could only give them hollow platitudes, all the while trying to read their mood. She had to excuse herself, and she walked woodenly to find her half-brother.

Her head spinning with the possibilities. Jon could remove Bran from the legitimacy easy enough. Perhaps a few would try to raise a fuss, but it didn’t really matter – the wildlings controlled Winterfell, not the northern lords. A cripple and a child would get little support regardless, but the question was whether or not Jon would…

What if Rickon was still alive too? There were rumours… would Jon Snow depose both his half-brothers? Sansa couldn’t say for certain.

As for as the laws of north went, the matter was so tangled that every man could come to their own conclusion. It was arguable whether or not Robb had even been a true king – Robb had never even stepped foot in the north with his crown, he had never sat on the throne of Winterfell, had never been crowned a King of Winter. It was arguable whether Robb’s decree was valid, or if he had the right to legitimise, or even whether Stark was a house of lords or of kings.

The law is useless, Sansa thought slowly. The law will be rewritten to suit whatever Jon Snow decides. All that mattered was power and perception. What the realm would accept, and what they must be forced to accept.

But are Jon and I on the same side?

A guard pointed her towards the lord’s solar, and she entered hesitantly. Sansa straightened her dress and brushed her hair back behind the door, but there was no time to be properly dressed in finery. She straightened her shoulders, rehearsed her lines silently, and knocked thrice on the door. “Enter,” a voice called.

Sansa stepped through, and curtsied deeply. King Snow was sitting behind an oak desk – her father’s desk – while he drummed his fingers against something resting on his lap. “Your Grace,” Sansa greeted. “My heart skips to see my brother again, thank you so much for bringing—”

“Spare it.” King Snow’s voice was short and sharp. He looked tired, worn; his eyes red and his shoulders slumped. “You came with purpose.”

It was not a question. Sansa straightened up, and bit her lip. They were not friends, Sansa considered. They were close, perhaps, but even all through their childhood they had never been friendly. She met his gaze, and she decided that they were both far too emotionally-exhausted for the pretence.

“Winterfell is asking about Bran,” she said simply. “Wondering what happens now.”

There was no reply. King Snow’s grey eyes were focused on her, his expression guarded.

“I can see two ways how this can go,” Sansa said, after a good few heartbeats of silence. “Option one, you crown yourself King in the North, and you make a new house. House Snow, if you desire. You set yourself king of this new kingdom of yours, and Bran Stark is the rightful Stark and Lord of Winterfell.” She paused. “You must leave a rank and inheritance for Stark, to appease the northern lords.”

Jon scratched his whiskers, a fuzz of white hair growing from his cheeks. “And what of this second option?” he asked in quiet voice.

“That you legitimise yourself as King Stark, you take Winterfell and Robb’s crown.” Sansa’s voice was low. “And then you’d suffer whispers that you are an usurper for the rest of your reign.”

He will take the kingship himself, Sansa thought. She knew he would. There was nothing standing in his way, and few to object when he did. There was a thin smile on his lips.

King Snow raised the item in his lap carefully. He was holding a silver and white crown in his hands, showing it to her.

It was a slender and smoothly crafted coronet, carved from white wood lined with silver inlaid, the tips of the prongs shaped into growling wolf heads. Or perhaps they were supposed to be dragon maws – the carved wood was so fine and smooth it was hard to make out details.

Sansa blinked. “Ah,” she said, nodding.

He shook his head. “No. There is a third option,” King Snow said softly. “This is for Bran. He should be king, not me.”

She held herself from reacting, but she nearly flinched with surprise. “I’ve already made the decision,” he continued. “I have already had my chance to accept Robb’s will, but I denied it then and I do again. Bran would be better to unify the north than I would be. The northmen will accept him more than they would me.”

“I… I…” For a heartbeat, Sansa was left speechless. “And the wildlings?”

“The free folk follow me, and I will follow Bran,” Jon said. “The law is clear – the trueborn son comes before the bastard. He is the King in the North, and I the King-Beyond-the-Wall; so I will swear fealty and secede my ‘crown’ to his. You are right; it’d be the most efficient way of unifying the factions.”

But you’d still be the most significant commander in King Bran’s realm. As Regent? Hand of the King? Sansa’s eyes narrowed suspiciously. “And you just happened to have a crown prepared for “The crown is from White Harbour,” he explained, as he slid the coronet over the desk. “Lord Manderly had it forged for me, but I never wore it.”

She stepped closer, peering down at the crown. “Why did you never wear it?”

He smiled softly. “It never seemed prudent,” he admitted. “I thought about it, but the crown is meaningless to the free folk and it would have been divisive to the northmen. If I had worn it, then the northern lords might have bristled at the sight, and… well, it just didn’t seem wise. Why create one more issue to dispute?” He paused. “Lord Manderly and I argued that point in length, but we decided… we resolved to wait until Winterfell was taken to decide the matter.”

Her gaze flickered. “So you’ve decided?”

“I’ve decided.” King Snow… Jon… was staring down at the crown too. “It may be too large for Bran now, but he will grow into it.”

Just like that? Sansa thought with confusion. You’d surrender so much power just like that? The throne of Winterfell is there for the taking. You’ve sat on it already, the crown is on your lap. “Robb’s will–”

“–was written under false assumptions.” Jon shook his head. “I… I indulged the idea, but I said from the beginning that I am not King in the North. No – this is Bran’s inheritance, not mine, and I would crown him king.”

Jon

He saw an expanse of ice, a frozen hellscape that stretched to the ends of the earth. There was nothing around him but darkness and jagged ice.

The world was frozen. Jon stood upon a frozen lake, staring across at the abyss. In the starless night sky, he heard the flapping of great wings somewhere in the black. There was movement in the dark, but he couldn’t make it out.

Jon looked at his hands. On his left hand, he had five fingers again, and no pale cauterised stump of a little finger. This is a dream. Just a dream.

A ghostly blue light surrounded him, but Jon could not see the source of it. He could see nothing but shadows, until he caught the pinpricks of light – the reflection from eyes staring back at him.

Jon took a step forward, walking across the crackling ice. The shadows parted around him.

He could see them. First they were shapeless, then they took form. He saw the face looking back at him; a hard grey gaze like stone, and a smooth face like carved from bark. Qhorin Halfhand stood silently before him, regarding him with calm, expectant eyes. Jon walked past him, and neither of them said a word.

Standing behind Qhorin, Lord Mormont had his arms folded and his lips pursed; his gaze was more judging. The old Lord Commander disappeared into mist as soon as Jon stepped close.

There were other shades, all surrounding him. Jon saw the figures wearing black cloaks; Dalbridge, Ebben, Stonesnake, Pyp, Bowen Marsh, Sweet Donnel Hill, Jeren, Hake, Rast, Donal Noye…

He saw Maester Aemon, walking blindly in the dark. Ser Alliser Thorne stood with a sneer on his lips, and blood seeping down from the cut across his neck.

He knew why they were here. He knew it in his bones. Jon kept walking, and the field of dead men walked around him.

There were more figures than just sworn brothers; he saw Alvin Whaletooth, Harma Dogshead, Hunting Seal and all those at Hardhome. Half of them wore white stones, pleading for Jon to protect them.

He saw Furs, standing with a smirk across his cold lips – besides Hatch, Ewan Bole, Black Maris, Rolf, Urwen, Stiga, Gregg and all the Dragonguard who had died on the ice.

He saw Wylis Manderly, Hugo Wull, Alysane Mormont, Jeremy Locke…

Brandon Norrey, Robett Glover, Ethan Whitehill, Mandon Slate, Hoster Moss, Torghen Flint…

There were more. He saw Harlow – Ramsay Snow – doubled over as he laughed in hysterics, his face twisted in rage and fury, but no sound from his throat. Jon saw Lord Bolton standing tall, a doubtful expression in his pale eyes. He saw a hundred knights with crimson hearts on their chest, and swords that were all burnt out. He saw the blue-eyed king – Stannis Baratheon – clutching his bloody stump of a hand and staring with scorn. Jon saw the young, nameless squire who had looked so much like Bran, still clutching that dagger and staring upwards with fearful eyes.

Most of the shadows were nameless. Most were faceless too. There were more men surrounding him that he couldn’t even keep track of, more faces looking at him than he could ever recognise. More names than I could ever know.

Friends, enemies and bystanders, all standing together, looking at him.

Some of them Jon had killed with his own hands, some had died around him, but they had all died because of him.

He saw Ygritte, broken and smeared at the bottom of the abyss he had pushed her down. She was still trying to climb up despite her broken body.

He saw Val, bleeding out in the snow beneath him and clutching her chest. Jon knew that it was wrong – he knew that Val wasn’t dead yet – but she was still here. He stared at her but there was nothing he could say or do to make it right.

He saw the scorched ruins of the tower, and the charred and unrecognisable, faceless little girl that had died inside of it.

He saw women and children in the ruins of Mole’s Town. He saw families dead in the forests and the snows. He saw all of those wearing white stones on their chests, praying for salvation. He saw piles of corpses from all the battles – the Battle of Hardhome, the Battle of Weeping Water, the Battle of the Snows, from all the wars he had waged.

Jon saw a mountain of frozen bodies, piled in the ruins of the Twins.

Thousands, tens of thousands, maybe hundreds of thousands… More names than he could ever learn.
By the gods, Jon thought, staring around the dreamscape. Did I really kill so many?

Somewhere behind him, Roose Bolton was laughing silently.

The scene blurred, the ice cracking beneath him and the darkness...

Jon didn’t gasp as he woke up. There was a cold sweat across his brow, but he didn’t tremble. The first time he had those dreams he had been shaking, but now Jon just blinked, took a deep breath, and pulled himself off his bed.

He did not know the time, but it felt like the hour of the ghost. Jon did what he did every time the nightmares came; he pulled on his cloak, he picked up his walking stick, and he limped out of the door and kept on walking. The only sound in the gloomy corridors was the deathly whispering of the fading candles, and the tap of his stick against stone with every step.

He walked aimlessly, but Jon found himself moving towards the West Tower. The roof of the entire wing had collapsed, and snow scattered across black and charred timbers. They had barricaded off the wreckage, but Jon could feel the wind hissing through the burnt-out walls of the keep.

Winterfell barely looked the same. Jon walked over the scorched floor, gazing around the castle and hardly even recognising it. The fires had been so hot that even the stones had warped. Winterfell had been one of the most magnificent castles in the realm; old, majestic, and as strong as they came. Jon could think of very few castles – Casterly Rock, Storm’s End, the Eyrie, possibly the Red Keep – that could match the scale of Winterfell.

Now, the castle was twisted, stained by fire, snow and blood. The corpses had been dragged away, but Jon could still see the dried bloodstains across the corridors down to the Great Hall. They had cleared the keep of bodies, but there were still dead men littering the rest of the grounds in Winterfell. The North had known more than its fair share of bloody battles, but by Jon’s reckoning the Battle of the Snows would go down as one of the bloodiest.

Thousands of men had died in the ambush. Thousands more had died in the fields, caught by storms. More still died breaking the gate. The Boltons had stained the ground with blood for every inch that they fell.

All of those deaths, Jon thought restlessly. Perhaps in my dreams I’ll eventually count them all.

He wondered how many bodies that truly was. If we piled them, how high would the tower rise? If we continued, would we be able to make a brand new Wall out of corpses?

Sometimes it felt like every death was a little bit of a stain on the soul.

Come dawn, Jon found himself standing in the frozen inner courtyard of the Great Keep, great icicles dangling from the arches around him. The walls sheltered him from the wind, but Jon could still hear the distant howl of the snows.

“King Snow,” a voice called from behind. Jon turned, to see a short, scrawny man limping through over the steps.

The wildling looked at him with guarded eyes, staring out from beneath the giant skull helm. “Lord Rattleshirt now, I think,” Rattleshirt said with a scoff. “Lord of House Bone, perhaps. What do you reckon – you see me in a keep drinking mulled wine in furs coats like you southerners?”
All wildlings that followed Jon would receive citizenship in the north. Jon finally had the great lords of the realm to accept it; the gates would stay open for all refugees and none would stop them from coming south. There would be lordships and titles to the most notable of the free folk leaders. Many would scowl and spit – but that was the price for peace.

Some northern houses still opposed him – most notably House Ryswell and House Dustin. Lord Ryswell had died in the snows and Lady Dustin was a prisoner, but Barrowtown and the Rills still stood defiant. Yet they wouldn't stand for long, and the Bolton loyalists had been crushed at Winterfell. There would be no more great hosts of men to defy him.

Jon turned at the soon-to-be Lord of House Bone, keeping his posture guarded. The thought of the two Norrey girls lingered at the forefront on his mind.

Lord Bone’s shirt barely even rattled anymore. His armour of bones were coated in metal – Rattleshirt had found a metalsmith to coat his bone suit in molten bronze. The metal giant’s skull helm glinted slightly in the faint sunlight through the clouds. His armour was now lined with wool and cotton to stop the rattling, and furs that made Rattleshirt look more lordly and heavyset than he ever had before.

“I’m thinking of taking the name Lord Vaast Bone,” the wildling continued, rambling as he paced. “Vaast – after my father. I know, I’m the sentimental sort. Maybe some little castle by the coast would suit me well. I heard that the Weeper has his eye on claiming Karhold, I don’t see why I can’t get a similar castle. Why not that Dreadfort for me? Surely there’s got to be a bunch of castles empty with all this lot dead.”

Jon paused. There was something of an edge in the man’s voice. “What do you want, Rattleshirt?” Jon asked after a heartbeat.

The man’s gaze met Jon, the shadows of the giant skull glaring at him. “More wondering what you want, myself,” Rattleshirt said. “I see no reason why you shouldn’t get a castle too, Snow. The biggest castle, even.”

Jon did not reply. “I gave you my vow, and I’ve upheld it. I’ve followed your law, I’ve respected your peace – but you tell me right now, Snow,” Rattleshirt said, his voice turning dark. “I swore that I’d kill you when you broke your promise to the free folk.”

“And I haven’t.”

“Not yet. But if you give away my fealty – give away your kingship – to a crippled fucking boy then I’d call a betrayal.”

“Careful now.” Jon’s hand curled tighter around his walking staff. “That’s my brother you’re talking about.”

“Your crippled brother,” Rattleshirt snorted. “Crippled half-brother. You can’t seriously expect us to bow to a broken kid like that, can you?”

You've never bowed to me once. “You chose to give your fealty to me. I get to choose who I give my fealty to. Brandon Stark is the rightful king.”

“Not of us!” he growled. “Not of the free folk! Fuck Snow, why would you even want to bow? You’re the power here. You have the army, you have the dragon. Nobody would go against you. If you bow to someone as weak as that, then just think of how weak that makes you look.”

Jon’s hands clenched. “That kid doesn’t deserve a throne – you do,” Rattleshirt snapped. “So take your bloody castle, Snow. This is your castle.’’

He could have snapped, could have recoiled, but Jon kept his voice and gaze cool. “You expect me to steal my brother’s inheritance?”

“Steal? I call it claim. I doubt you’d even need to fight over it. Just say the words – ‘I am King in the North’ and you really think he’s going to object to you? That anyone is going to object to you?”

He shook his head. Jon turned, already starting to walk away. “I’d have no right.”

“Fuck right. How about deserve?” Rattleshirt called behind him. “Don’t we deserve to have a strong king instead of a crippled boy? Nobody will thank you for bowing, Snow.”

“If you want your castle, then you’ll bow,” Jon said simply as he walked. “That is the price for peace.”

“Whose price?” Rattleshirt demanded.

“Mine.” He paused, and then turned around. “Oh, and Rattleshirt?” The wildling glared. Jon kept his voice slow and calm. “If I ever hear you speaking such of my brother again, I will kill you.”

And I would enjoy killing you too. Perhaps the world will be better off when I do.

The wildling didn’t reply as Jon walked away. He didn’t care about what Rattleshirt thought, but how many of the other free folk would be thinking the same thing?

No, it has to be Bran, Jon decided. Crowning Bran would appease the northern lords, while Jon would still keep power with the free folk. The northmen could not object to Bran, and most of the free folk wouldn’t care either way. Jon had to think of the long-run, of the future of the realm. There must be a Stark in Winterfell.

Power came with its own costs. Lord Bolton had taught him that.

His brother had been back in Winterfell for barely a day, and yet Jon was already planning the coronation. The news could unite the realm, and there could be no delay.

Jon took a deep breath and flexed his neck, feeling the flecks of snow drifting down on his hair. Morning light was faint through the stormy clouds. The sun was rising, and it was time. They’d be waiting for him in the Winter Suite.

Jon’s leg felt stiff as he headed up the granite steps towards the Great Keep. He saw servants bow towards him deeply, fear and awe in their gazes. Even just walking up the stairs attracted so much attention that Jon’s hand stayed on Dark Sister.

He stepped into the hallway, and then up the spiral staircase. He knew these corridors. He knew them well, but it had been so long since he was last here. He spent his childhood growing up in the keep, playing with Robb and other children. He could pick out Arya’s old room, Robb’s, Sansa’s. His father’s. Mine. The bastard’s room had been the smallest, on the far side of the wing.

The Winter Suite was at the other end of the Lord’s Household, the highest wing of the Great Keep. The wing held two dozen rooms, four noble guest rooms, the king’s room, the lord’s chambers, and the lord’s solar. King Robert had stayed in these rooms, Jon remembered, in the king’s room almost as large as Lord Stark’s quarters. The lord’s solar stood adjoined to the lord’s chamber, a great study of oak and stone dominated by a huge circular table.
His father would meet Winterfell’s guests in his solar, Jon remembered, but the Winter Suite was reserved for only the most noble of gatherings. It was a high-ceiling, large granite chamber, with doors leading out onto the west balcony overlooking the courtyard. It was filled by a heavy stone table built like a slab, with seats that could sit three dozen men. The doors were solid oak reinforced with steel, but the chamber itself was rarely used as it had no fireplace or heated pipes through the walls.

The Winter Suite, where the Kings of Winter had held their councils.

Jon had heard that Theon the Hungry Wolf commissioned the Winter Suite during the Hundred Year War. Chimneys, hearths and piping were vulnerabilities, and King Theon had wanted a war chamber which no spy could ever infiltrate. It was a room of solid granite, built like a siege bunker in the middle of the Great Keep. A secure chamber, but with no heating. Theon’s paranoia meant it was the coldest room in the castle.

Now, for the first time in three hundred years, there would be a Court of Winter under the name of the King in the North.

The guards lined the corridor, bowing to him. Jon had been in the Winter Suite before, but he never been allowed in during his father’s formal meetings.

He heard the voices, he heard the mutters as the doors opened. Every man in the Winter Suite wore furs tightly, standing stiffly over the slab of a stone table. They had gathered every notable northern lord and lady in Winterfell; some who had arrived with Jon, others who had bent the knee when the castle fell.

Lord Greatjon Umber towered at the far side of the table, his arms folded stiffly. Surrounding the table, there was Lord Gregor Forrester, Ser Mardrick Manderly, Lord Cregan Karstark, Lord Rickon Holt, Lord Anders Overton, Lord Alger Bole, Ser Ian Poole, Ser Garth Woolfield, Eric Burley, Bennard Waterman, and a dozen other petty lords that Jon couldn’t even name. There were even those who had fought alongside House Bolton; like Lord Edric Ryder, Lord Harwood Stout, Kyle Cordon, Barthogan Rose, Lord Errold Stonehull and others that Jon couldn’t recall being introduced to.

Ten days ago, perhaps they might have met on the battlefield. Now, they were standing uneasily in the chamber before him. The air was stiff.

It was so cold that a fine layer of mist hovered with every breath. Galbart Glover isn’t present, Jon noted quietly. Despite Jon’s explicit orders, the Master of Deepwood Motte had still excused himself from the assembly. Lady Leona Manderly wasn’t present either, but her eldest daughter – Wynafryd – was standing meekly towards the edge of the room next to her cousin, Ser Mardrick.

There were quiet mutters that silenced as Jon stepped in. The guardsmen stamped their spears three times to announce him, and the chamber went stiff. “Jon Snow!” a man boomed. “King Beyond the Wall!”

He almost missed her, but Jon caught sight of Sansa, huddled in a white fur cloak at the end of the table. Her red hair shone like fire in the room of grey and white, her face stiff and poised. Sansa was the youngest one in the room; the fairest, the most beautiful. Even while most others wore boiled leather and chainmail, she was clad in furs.

The sight of her caused Jon to freeze fractionally. His sister looked at him quietly, giving a curt nod. Jon’s eyes were wary, looking between all the faces surrounding him.
Lady Maege Mormont stood beside the doorway, still wearing her ringmail. Lady Mormont and the reinforcements from Bear Island and the northwest had arrived just last night, and had barely had time to settle yet. The Lady of Bear Island nodded to Jon as he stepped through, and scanned the room.

“Lady Mormont,” Jon greeted, turning away from the rest of the room. “Thank you for being here. I’m glad you could make it.”

“Of course.” She nodded, stiffly. “I am sorry to have missed the battle, Your Grace.”

_The battle where your daughter died._ “We will discuss that later, my lady.”

The stone table could sit three dozen, but there were still too many in the room to each take a chair. _They’ve left my father’s seat vacant – the big, pronged oak seat at the back_, Jon noticed. _The seat for a king_. Jon didn’t take it, instead he stepped behind the one nearest the door.

“King Snow,” Lord Umber replied, grizzled eyes narrowing. Was it just him, or was there a question in there?

“My noble lords,” Jon said, turning to the gathering “I am glad we could finally have this assembly. You all know me by reputation if naught else, I’m sure. Many of you I have fought besides, some of you I have fought against.” His gaze turned towards Lord Stout, Lord Ryder and Lord Rose, before flickering away. “But you have all bent the knee to the peace I offered you, and so you are all here.”

“Lady Barbrey Dustin is not present, Your Grace,” Lord Harwood Stout noted, his voice foul. He was a haggard and one-armed man, with grim eyes. All of the former Bolton-loyalists had dark expressions, huddled together quietly.

“Lady Dustin,” Jon replied, “has not bent the knee. And so she has no place being here.”

There was no reply but silence. Lady Dustin would stay in her cell until she conceded, or until Jon named a new lord of House Dustin. Every highborn captive had been forced to surrender the Bolton cause and pledge loyalty before they were released, and even then under heavy supervision. There were only a few diehard loyalists like Lady Dustin that had so far refused to surrender.

“What is to happen with us who followed House Bolton?” Barthogan Rose asked grimly. The Master of the Red Knife was a Bolton bannerman, a tall and grim man with a fresh scar across his cheek. He looked more like a grizzled sellsword than noble lord. “And our lands and holdings. Has a judgement been made?”

“That depends.” Jon cocked his head. “Are you guilty of any crimes, ser?”

No reply came. Barthogan Rose kept his eyes guarded, and Lord Edric Ryder shuffled backwards slightly. Jon just scoffed under his breath. “Your ranks and holdings will be judged on a case by case basis. I expect each of you to make some concession – as retribution for your poor choice of loyalty.” Jon said stiffly. “But until a decision can be made, you will keep the peace – and your cooperation will be noted. I have accepted your surrender, but any further defiance from you now will not be well-received, my lords.”

Jon looked between the gaggle of men standing in the corner. “Do you understand?” Jon pressed. “I require confirmation.”
There were nods, and mutters of “Yes, Your Grace” from the men. Jon just nodded.

Truth be told, Jon bore little hatred towards most of the Bolton’s supporters. They would all lose lands and ranks, but they would keep their heads if they pledged their loyalty now. He had, however, sentenced all traitors in his own camp mercilessly, and he had set a standing judgement of execution towards any man who had participated in the Red Wedding – but the others had committed no crimes.

Most of the men who followed House Bolton had stuck to their liege lords and their vows; most of them did not participate or conspire towards the Red Wedding, but in its aftermath they had followed the Warden of the North – whose son was married to the heir apparent and rightful liege lady, Arya Stark. As damnable as their lord paramount had been, Jon could not fault them for loyalty.

Unless they participated in the Red Wedding, he added silently. In that case, I very much can damn them.

His eyes lingered on Barthogan Rose; Jon would have to find enough witnesses to identify who exactly had been at the Red Wedding, and who gave the orders. Some present would have been oblivious, but others were not.

Heartbeats passed in uneasy silence. The memories of the battle were still fresh, and enemies on the battlefield were now standing in the same room. “We are all busy and it is cold,” Jon said finally, breaking the silence. “I mean this court to take stock, but I will not keep you long.”

“What is the meaning of this, Your Grace?” Lord Cregan Karstark said loudly, with a slight sneer on the honorific. Lord Karstark stood to the front of the table, his arms resting on the stone. “And will your savages be joining us?”

Jon didn’t react, but his eyes narrowed. “The free folk will not be. This assembly is for only the northern lords for now, to share matters of state.” He looked around the room, measuring reactions. “We are, after all,” he continued, “an independent Kingdom of the North again.”

There were no reactions, but they all stiffened somewhat. Jon turned towards Sansa, looking at her for confirmation. “As – you have no doubt heard – Bran Stark has been returned to Winterfell. My brother, the son of Eddard Stark, is alive,” he said. No mutters, only nods. “There have been rumours that he is on death’s door. I mean to dispel such talk; Bran Stark is healthy, and safe, within this very keep.”

Lord Mollen raised his voice cautiously. “Yet he is a cripple.”

“My brother is strong,” Sansa spoke up. “Legs or no, Bran is strong to survive the ordeal he has been through.”

“Aye, I do not doubt that,” Ser Mardrick Manderly commented. “And will Prince Bran be joining us?”

“I’m afraid not,” Sansa replied, nodding to Jon. “Prince Bran is weakened, he needs his bedrest.”

He saw everyone in the room glance towards him, looking at him half-warily and half-expectantly. Jon paused.

I could do it, Jon thought, one last time. I could declare myself king. King Snow. Or even King Stark. I doubt Bran would object if I chose to legitimise myself. He would probably even support me.
… No, Jon thought after a second thought. It just didn’t feel right. I am a Snow, not a Stark. There was no joy down that other route.

A half-smile flickering across his lips. “You are mistaken, Princess Sansa. King Brandon will not be present,” Jon said finally. “But Bran shall be crowned as King in the North before the week’s end. Let the realm raise the direwolf banner again.”

At that, the room did stir. There were a few mutters of surprise that rose around the table. Jon saw Lord Karstark’s face twist unpleasantly, while Lord Umber seemed to hesitate.

“And what of you?” Lord Forrester asked quietly; a tall man standing next to Sansa.

“I was King-Beyond-the-Wall, never King in the North,” Jon reminded. King-Beyond-the-Wall for all of a year, he thought silently. “And I will relinquish that title to King Brandon as well. I will renounce my claim to kingship in favour of his.”

There was a moment of silence in the room. “… I see.” Lady Maege hesitated. “What does that leave you, then?”

“I do not know. Perhaps I will take a new holding, a new house. Something Beyond-the-Wall – Lord of Hardhome, perhaps.” A position I could use to bring order, to unite the realm even if it’s not under me.

“Such as Lord Paramount Beyond-the-Wall?” Lady Maege pressed.

Jon nodded. “If King Brandon wishes it.”

Some of their gazes looked confused, flickering between him and the others. Voiceless mutters raised around the chamber, but Jon didn’t react to them. He stood stiff. Let the whole realm know that I am no usurper.

The Greatjon grunted. Jon thought he saw the man’s expression relax slightly. “You are not what I expected, Snow,” the Greatjon said after a pause. “Or should I call you Lord Snow, now?”

Lord Snow. Once Ser Thorne mocked me with that name. “Nothing is official until the king proclaims it. I shall give my fealty to Bran at his coronation,” Jon said, before allowing himself a smile. “Although I suppose I will need to think of a new name for my house.”

“Indeed.” Was it him, or did the air in the solar seem to soften more comfortably? There was something of a grudging approval in the Greatjon’s eyes.

“Hear, hear!” Ser Mardrick called, slamming his hands together. “Brandon Stark, King in the North!”

There were mumbles. Sansa picked up the cry, her voice clear and firm. “King in the North!”

Besides her, Lord Forrester repeated the cry, and then Lady Wynafryd, then Eric Burley and Ser Ian. Others were still mumbling, or stood quiet.

A few lords, like Lord Stout, looked guarded and suspicious. “The king is only eleven years old,” the one-armed lord said stiffly. “He will need a regent. And do you intend to suggest yourself, Lord Snow?”

Is that accusation in his voice? Does he think me duplicitous, that I intend to seize power through the regency? Stubborn fool. Still, Jon hesitated. He couldn’t give an outright denial, when in fact he might make a very good choice for regent.

“If I felt I could serve the realm by acting as regent,” Jon said carefully, “then I would take on the duty. But that decision is for king’s choice to make or the high lords of the north to approve. I would never force myself into the role.”

Lord Stout stayed guarded, but he seemed to accept the answer. The Greatjon nodded approvingly, while Lord Karstark looked quietly fuming.

“This realm must be put to order at all haste,” Jon continued. “We are standing in what King Robb fought for, we have what the realm lost for three hundred years; an independent Kingdom of the North. I mean to ensure the safety and prosperity of this land, and I will do whatever is required to see the King in North, the Stark on the Winter Throne.”

“As your puppet king?” Lord Cregan muttered under his breath, not quite a sneer. His voice was low, but the room was quiet and the words clearly audible.

A few lords bristled. “While the king is indisposed, I mean to appoint a council of great lords to speak for him,” Jon replied stiffly, refusing to even look at the man. “We shall fill a council to sit in this very chamber.”

“And who will decide them?” Lord Karstark pressed, and the room shifted. “Your Grace?”

“Careful with your tongue, Cregan,” the Greatjon warned.

“I shall make the nominations, my lord.” Do not rise to his barbs, do not let any emotion show. Lord Bolton had been calm even as he died. “As shall the high lords of the realm. And it shall be for the king to approve them.”

“An intermediary council,” Sansa spoke up suddenly. “As Brandon’s sister and next of kin, it is well within my right to approve such. King Snow and I are in full agreement in this matter.”

“As am I,” Lady Maege said firmly. “And as are Lords Umber, Manderly and Glover.”

For a moment, it looked like Lord Cregan was about to say something scathing, but he held his tongue. The men standing around Lord Cregan kept their distance, leaving him isolated in the corner of the room. Lord Karstark was speaking too boldly, even the men who might agree with him looked nervous.

“And… if that is agreed… there is another matter that I must have of you, my lords,” Jon said, moving away Karstark. He slowly pulled out a curl of parchment from his furs, unfurling it on the table. “This room represents perhaps the greatest gathering of aristocracy in the north. I vowed to bring the Boltons to justice and deliver House Stark to its rightful place, and I have. And now I mean to fulfil another of the promises that I declared.”

The parchment was crisp and pale yellow, with slightly blotted squiggles across the page. The few scribes with their host had worked very quickly to sketch something up with all haste; it was hardly a thorough document, but it would do.

“This parchment,” Jon explained, “is a decree to allow all refugees north of the Wall citizenship into our lands. They will each receive amnesty for all crimes committed before they crossed the Wall, to be accepted under the trust of King Brandon Stark. An unconditional pardon, for every free folk who accepts the king's trust.” A few bristled. “I wish for every lord and lady currently present to put their seal and signature to parchment, to show your own acceptance and sign it into law.”
There were no reactions, but a few stiffened. “From now on,” Jon continued, “there is no excuse. No more will the free folk be driven from our lands, and no more will they thieve and pillage.”

“Aye,” Ser Mardrick Manderly said. “My liege lord has contacted as many highborn as possible. They agreed, some more willingly than others.”

The Greatjon grunted. “I lost two daughters to wildlings, and here I am agreeing to let them settle on my land,” he said in fuming growl.

“If it is the price for peace, I will sacrifice land myself.” Lady Mormont glared at Lord Umber. “Provided, of course, that they are held to the same laws as the rest of us.”

“They will be.” Jon nodded. It would be a tough sell, but the only way it could work. “There will be no more raiding. No more stealing women. The free folk will bend, and we will appoint lords from them that will enforce the law.”

Jon met the Greatjon’s eyes. His mouth tightened, but he nodded stiffly. The Umber lands were the furthest north of them all — in all likelihood the Umbers would suffer the most from the free folk settlements.

Others hesitated, but he still saw the reluctance in their eyes. “Surely such a decree requires a king’s approval?” Lord Ryder said cautiously.

“It does, it has been written in the name of Brandon Stark, King in the North. I shall present this petition to the king — with the seals of the northern lords attached,” Jon said coolly. “But the king is indisposed, and I mean for this to be immediate law. I wish for every lord here to understand, so that none can claim ignorance; there will be no conflicts on your lands.”

“You speak of our responsibilities,” Lord Cregan simmered. “But what of the wildlings? What of when they steal wives and daughters, are we not allowed to act?”

I could expel him from the room for such a tone. Still, Jon wouldn’t allow Cregan to disrupt them such — to force him out would only make Jon appear the tyrant. “Rest assured, I shall be having a similar conversation with the free folk leaders too,” Jon replied. His gaze was level, unflinching. “But I mean for the law to be clear; any crime that a free folk commits must be dealt with as it would be for any citizen of the north. Trial and prosecution, that is your duty as lords.

“This parchment — this is but a formality, a written record to show that you accept such. And to outline the consequences of what will happen if you breach this accord.” His eyes searched the room. “I do hope there is no uncertainty here.”

The room hesitated. “And this paper,” Cregan dared, grinding his teeth. “You are forcing us to put our names to it? We have no choice in the matter?”

“You always have a choice, my lord. Walk out of here if you wish.” Jon’s voice made that option clear. “But what you must ask yourself — ‘is this a choice that I want to make?’”

Defy me, Jon vowed silently, and the pile of bodies will have to get a little bit larger. This was the easy way, but other way would be far more unpleasant.

How many men would be willing to die for their principles? How many lords would refuse to put aside their grudge against the wildlings?

And how free folk would insist on their grudge against the kneelers? Jon had no illusions, both sides were as bad as each other.
But there would be peace, even if Jon had to kill every single lord in the room to achieve it.

Gazes flickered to Lord Karstark, but nobody said a word. Finally, Sansa stepped forward, and she was the first to put her name to the parchment – Lady Sansa of House Stark, along with a blob of wax squeezed by a wooden stamp of the direwolf’s head.

Next, it was Lady Maege and then the Greatjon. All protests fizzled and died as those two lords stepped forward. Lord Karstark looked like he had been force-fed a lemon, but he grit his jaw and signed the parchment.

“Thank you for your cooperation, my lords,” Jon said finally. “I will not detain you. Lady Stark, Lord Umber, Lady Mormont and Ser Manderly – a moment of your time?”

The other lords started to file away, but those five lingered. Lady Wynafryd looked between Sansa and Ser Mardrick, but then reluctantly moved out of the room. Lord Umber had his arms folded, peering down at the parchment spotted by signatures. “Just like that,” the Greatjon muttered, in a voice that was quiet for him. “Amnesty. We sign a piece of paper, and you think a thousand year old grudge will disappear just like that?”

“I think it’s a start,” Jon retorted.

“Aye. And we have been discussing it,” Lady Mormont said. “I suggest that we extend our kingdom Beyond-the-Wall, to formally recognise those lands as our own.”

“I agree.” Ser Mardrick nodded. “Come spring, we can see about resettling the wildlings in their former lands – with defined territories, and protection and fealty paid to Winterfell. Our kingdom might double in size.”

Come spring, Jon thought dryly. And how long will that be?

And yet still, the optimism from him was impressive. Perhaps the thought of possibly rich, untouched northern lands might sweeten the alliance. There could even be benefactors willing to invest towards such a thing, if Jon sold it right.

“Yes,” Jon agreed. “Beyond-the-Wall is a rich, vast and untapped land. It would take time to settle them again, but it will be worthwhile.” There was a pause. “However, we cannot do so in winter, and we certainly cannot do so while the threat of the Others looms.”

“The Others,” Sansa repeated, her eyes flickering.

That caused the room to glance. No one said it out loud, but Jon caught the whiff of hesitation. Do they still not believe me about the Others? It was frustrating, but expected; so few northmen had witnessed the Others, and Malvern was keeping a very low profile.

Ser Mardrick looked ready to question or object to the assertion, but Lady Mormont interrupted. “The Wall must be defended. That is certain,” she said, raising her voice. “We can see about sending soldiers from the north to the Wall, to reinforce the men of the Night’s Watch and the free folk. For now, we must simply hold the Wall, while we prepare for the campaign.”

“And what campaign is that?” said the Greatjon. “If what the wildlings claim is true, then we have enemies on all sides. We are in rebellion to the Iron Throne, they will come to take back the north. We have ironborn ravaging the coast. We are to expect bloody white walkers to attack from the north as well?”

Forget the rest, Jon might have cursed, the Others are the true threat. Sansa met his gaze, measuring his expression. “Lord Umber is right,” she added. “The north is still in turmoil. We are in no state to begin any campaign in the north amidst so many other problems.”

“Winter has barely begun,” Lady Mormont agreed. “Yet strife has already left our granaries and treasury depleted when they should be full. Even without the Others, the winter itself threatens to destroy us.”

Jon grimaced. Their situation was precarious enough as it was. “The Wall is the only thing defending us, but the Others are already testing its boundary.” Jon sighed. “But you are correct, my lords; we must put the north to rights before we can do anything.”

How long does it take for a kingdom like the north to recover? he cursed. How long do we have?

Sonagon was still sickly, and until he was recovered Jon could not rely on the dragon. Perhaps Jon never could.

“We must address multiple problems on the multiple fronts,” Sansa muttered.

“My liege lord must deal with the Woolfields and the traitors in White Harbour,” Ser Mardrick said, “but I will arrange for men take and hold Moat Cailin from the Bolton garrison.”

“Lord Reed and Greywater Watch will assist in that, no doubt. The crannogmen have proved their worth.” Lady Mormont nodded. “Lord Umber, can you rally the men to support the Wall?”

“Aye,” the Greatjon grumbled. “I don’t know where I’ll rally them from, but I’ll get them.”

“The last message from Lord Steward Sam Tarly said that the Wall is being supported by free folk fighters,” said Jon. “Mance Rayder is in command from Castle Black – but I’m told that over half the castles are now garrisoned and the sworn brothers stand at three thousand strong. More, with the allied free folk clans and the forces under Sigorn of Thenn.” Jon's voice was still grim. “But I will rest happier the more men that we have to the north, as soon as possible.”

He looked around the room, eyes hard. “I want ships from Bear Island on the Frozen Coast, and I want every northern lord ready at all haste. We must mandate conscription, my lords.” Ser Mardrick's eyes widened. “For men and women both. Every person in the north must be readied to fight throughout a long winter.”

There were a few feeble protests but Jon allowed no arguments. He had already made his decision.

After that, conversation turned towards logistics. When they were to set out, their food stores, how long until they could hold the coronation. Everything was urgent, there could be no delay…

The conversation was long, and tiring. It was evening when they retired. Too much was in flux, too much had to be nailed down. There was a certain type of insidious panic that seeped in when everything seemed urgent.

Without a strong command, any action could be plagued by indecision, he thought. Jon could not do it all by himself, he needed the ranks beneath him, and he needed the order. Perhaps Lord Manderly would be a good regent – he had proven himself loyal. The Greatjon would be a stronger military leader, but Lord Manderly had more of a head for politics.

“We have our duties,” Jon remembered saying. “See them done.”

There were bows and shuffling talks towards as Jon’s tone turned final. While the others stepped out of the Winter Suite, Lady Sansa lingered by Jon side, tilting her head.
There was a moment of silence. The cold chambers felt so empty without the bodies and muttering.

“Do you care for drink, Your Grace?” Sansa offered finally. “Or is it my lord?”

“Technically it’s still ‘Your Grace’, I suppose,” Jon said with a sigh, “until I bend the knee and swear to Bran, and afterwards then I will be ‘my lord’.”

“I shall have a servant fetch a decanter, and some glasses,” Sansa said, walking towards the door. “You look stiff.”

“Dealing with these lords makes me appreciate the wilderness more, my lady,” Jon replied, finally dropping down onto a chair. His leg was aching.

“Indeed.” Sansa’s lips twitched. They were warmer in each other's company, less stiff than they had been the night before.

As Sansa returned, Jon looked at her curiously. “Well then,” he said awkwardly. “Do you think the northern lords will be a problem?”

“Perhaps. I find that anyone can be problematic, if they put their mind to it,” she replied. Jon made note of the deflection. “Galbart Glover was absent. Where is he?”

“Mourning his brother’s death, I believe.” Robett Glover had died stiffly, holding his head up high as Dark Sister came down.

“Ah.”

There was a stiff, forced silence.

“Lord Cregan Karstark is a problem,” Sansa said finally. “He was deliberately disrespecting your rule in front of the other lords.”

“I am aware,” Jon admitted. “But he has no power. House Karstark is on a leash.”

“Then he was testing the leash; trying to see how far he could question you.” Sansa shook her head. “Appearances are everything, Jon. Perhaps you were right not to force the point then and there – that could have made you look insecure. But you cannot do nothing, either.”

Yes, Jon agreed, isn’t that the dilemma which every ruler faces – to find some balance between grasping and brittle, or between merciless and hard? “Do you remember how Father used to handle disrespectful bannermen?” Jon asked. “Can you recall when Father’s power was challenged?”

“I…” Sansa hesitated, and then frowned. “I cannot.”

“Neither can I,” he admitted. “I cannot recall that it ever happened. It must have, surely, but I can’t remember Lord Stark ever even raising his voice.”

“He always seemed quiet,” Sansa agreed.

“Yes. He was always honourable, kind and well-liked. He must have been pushed at some point – surely some bannermen found something to object to in his decisions? – but I can only assume that Father handled it quietly; that he took care of such unruliness in private.”

“He used to take his children aside, one by one,” said Sansa, and she nodded. We have such different memories of our childhoods, Jon noted. “Very well, then.”
The servants brought wine, in a small sealed barrel. Jon noticed how every serving woman was escorted by a wildling guard with a white stone on his chest. The serving woman bowed hesitantly to both him and Sansa.

“Karstark was right about one thing, mind,” his sister continued. “What do you intend to be? Regent? Hand of the King?”

“I…” I have not even come close to figuring that out. “It doesn’t matter, so long as I’m in a position to secure the north. The free folk don’t care for ranks.”

He frowned. “You mean a small council?”

“The Kings in the North called theirs the Court of Winter. It gathered in this very room.” Sansa hesitated, bending down to fumble with a satchel that rested beneath the table. “And if we are truly returning to the old kingdom again…”

She lifted out of her satchel a book, a dusty tome. It was a chunky book filled with yellowing parchments bound by leather. The ink was old and faded, every page well-thumbed. “The Ranks and Government of the Northern Court,” Jon read the title, squinting to make it the faded words.

“Yes. I’ve already made a list.” There was a bookmark in the tome – a slip of folded parchment filled with scrawled, jotted notes written in Sansa's smooth hand. “And I suggest we go through it.”

It was a long list of notes and tightly curled writing – with certain points highlighted in intricate care. Jon raised an eyebrow. “You did all of this?”

“You are not the only one,” Sansa said dryly, “who does not have time for sleep.”

He looked over the notes, with scribbled names and dates. It detailed the composition of the ranks in the Winter King’s court, and how they had evolved over the eons. Jon had to squint to make out the words. A thousand years of northern parliament, summarised in a sharp list.

The very first positions listed were the ancient ranks of thanes and jarls – from the old culture of the First Men, but the Court of Winter had evolved over time. The North may not have been conquered in the Andal Invasion, but the Andal culture had still seeped across over the eons. The jarls and thanes had slowly been replaced by lords and masters.

Jon inspected the list closely, his lips moving silently as he scrolled down the words. “There are more positions here than the seven of a small council,” he noted.

“The small council was a Targaryen invention,” Sansa explained. “They restricted their court into only seven members; the Targaryens liked to consolidate power heavily between only very few trusted members. The Kings of Winter kept their own court and government and, historically, the Starks have been more decentralised.”

Jon nodded, still looking over the list. “So then a position like the Hand of the King?”

“It would vary between king to king,” she explained. “But there were typically two roles that fill in the same function to a King in the North.” She pointed on the page. “The King’s Claw, and the King’s Mercy.”

“The King’s Claw,” Jon mused. The emblem illustrated on the parchment was that of wolf’s claw, hanging as a chain around a man neck. “Dragons have claws too.”
“They do. The King’s Claw was designated to represent the king on the battlefield, and the King’s Mercy represents him in civil matters,” she explained. “The Mercy stood for the king during judgements, while the Claw led his armies at war. Two different ranks, and occasionally there could multiple of each – whereas the Targaryens kept only a single position.”

“They’re historical; they have never been used since the days of the Old King, when Jaehaerys the Councillor successfully forced the Winter Court to disband,” Sansa explained. “It was part of the common law that Jaehaerys introduced. Ever since, the Targaryen regime has not allowed their sovereign kingdoms to keep local government, and the governing positions that they did introduce were bastardised versions of those used by the previous Seven Kingdoms.” She paused, her eyes widening at the choice of words. “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean…”

“You don’t have to avoid the word ‘bastard’ with me, Sansa,” Jon said gently, before returning to the parchment. “So on here… to name a Minister of War and Minister of Seas…” They were made with the respective jotted notes ‘to ensure the king’s forces stand ready, armed and strong at all times’ and ‘to ensure that the king’s royal navy is maintained and strong’. Jon deliberated for a few heartbeats. “The Greatjon would be a good choice for Minister of War, and Lord Wyman for Minister of Seas.”

“They would,” Sansa paused. “And should I assume that you intend to take the rank King’s Claw?”

“And I take it you intend to be the King’s Mercy?” Jon retorted. Sansa blinked, opening her mouth to object. “Come on, Sansa, you had those two choices circled up front for a reason.”

There was a quiet grimace. “Well, I was going to make the suggestion with rather more tact than that…” she chided softly. “But yes, it would be good for the eldest child of Lord Stark to take a position of prominence. Even if it is only ceremonial.”

Jon could have snorted. He had no doubt that Sansa wouldn’t allow the rank to be ceremonial. “Alright very well. To be approved by the king, I take it?” he said dryly, and Sansa narrowed her eyes but nodded. “Then what of regency? Bran is underage, he will need a regent. You are the eldest living member of his house, Sansa.”

Sansa shook her head. “I am only fifteen myself. Technically I am below age as well. And regardless, I am merely a young girl who knows little of the ways of politics, of unproven status – they still call me Lady Lannister,” she replied with a gentle scoff. “What of yourself, Jon – you are Bran’s eldest family member?”

“And the Bastard King, wildling and deserter,” he retorted, shaking his head as well. “To take regency myself would be seen as presumptuous – and it would leave Bran exposed to all the Cregan Karstarks of the north that would name Bran a puppet king.”

Sansa didn’t protest it. “Then that means regency must go to a great lord of the realm. A unifying figure.”

No one that anybody could object to, you mean? Still, Jon nodded. “Then that would be Lord Umber or Lord Manderly,” he said, “they are the two strongest and oldest lords of the realm.”

“No,” she said firmly. “It would be unhealthy to raise either one of them so far above the other.”
“Sansa!”

“Don’t act like you weren’t thinking it, Jon,” she replied stiffly, but there was a flicker of smile on her face. There was a pause. “What of Howland Reed?”

“The Lord of Greywater Watch…” The suggestion caught Jon off-guard. “Father spoke highly of him…”

“He did,” Sansa agreed. “Lord Reed is experienced, and has served your war well from how I hear it. Lord Reed has singlehandedly defended the Neck against all foes, leading the resistance for House Stark. Surely he would take the duty of regent?” Jon didn’t look convinced. “Howland Reed is a loyalist, Jon, but he’s also something of an outsider. Someone who might bring balance.”

Jon shook his head. “I have never even met the man, Sansa.” The Lord of Greywater Watch was famously reclusive; Jon heard that very few convoys through the Neck were even allowed to know Greywater Watch's location.

“Nor me. But we could invite him to Winterfell to change that, surely?” she pressed. “Bran likely would not be alive if not for his daughter, we owe him a debt. Lord Reed must come to Winterfell.”

Jon grimaced, but he could not dispute the point. “I make no promises, not until I meet him,” Jon said. “But I will consider it.”

“Very well, yet the other nominations must come quickly.” Sansa pulled out a new sheet of parchment, and an inkpot. “There are royal declarations to pen, Jon.”

Jon didn't twitch, but perhaps she saw the hesitation flicker in his eyes. He reached for one of the wine glasses. “Shall we call a maester?” she asked.

“I feel we can fumble our way through without one.” Jon replied, taking a deep gulp of wine.

They went through the points one by one, and a list of lords, lands and ranks. There were about two dozen houses that had been allied with the coalition, two dozen that were against them, and another four dozen or so were left somewhere in between, to various degrees.

Jon had already picked out the worst of the traitors – Norrey, Slate and Woolfield – and he intended to make an example of them. Sansa quietly scratched those houses of her list.

They sat huddled together over the scraps of parchments. Somehow, it felt like the quiet talk with his sister was more productive than every great assembly of lords he had ever sat through.

One of King Bran’s very first proclamations would have to be to pardon Jon for deserting the Night’s Watch, Sansa insisted. And then Bran must accept Jon’s fealty, grant citizenship, and to grant lands and status to all the deserving free folk leaders. There were around fifty thousand free folk that needed to settle, and maybe four dozen leaders to be given status.

Sansa made notes as he listed them; House Giantsbane, House Rayder, House Thenn, House Sixskins, House Sealskinner, House Bone… She paused fractionally as Jon said House Weeper, but didn't object. The Weeper would recover from the infirmary bed and Jon intended to keep the Weeper by his side.

My brother has only just woken up. Jon wouldn’t dump all of this on him, not now.

“Most of the titles will be ceremonial for now,” Sansa explained. “But there are lands enough we can give as rewards. Lands belonging to Bolton will have to be completely reassigned, they should be the first granted to your free folk."

“To keep them separate from the northmen?” Jon asked, and Sansa nodded. “So we grant the free folk lordships from the Bolton former bannermen.”

“Perhaps naming them as masterly houses, rather than lordships, even,” Sansa suggested. “Many free folk have little experience in governing – naming a Master of the Dreadfort, for example, not a lord, would be less objectionable.”

Jon considered it. Masterly houses were similar to the southern practice of landed knights, but the difference between a master and a lord was not so great in the north. Houses like Glover or Tallhart were as powerful as any lordly house, but there was a slight difference in rank.

“A lord owns land in his own right,” Jon mused, “but technically a master is only a custodian who manages the land for Winterfell.”

“Yes,” she agreed. “Both muster men and dispense justice, but a master has no right to local law and taxation. Historically, masters would have a seat on the Winter Court, while lords only stood in the interior.”

She already had half the governing bodies sketched out, Jon noted. Sansa had given it much thought. He looked through the list, slowly understanding her reasoning. “You mean to consolidate power to Winterfell.”

She nodded. “As the Conciliator did during his reign, and I saw similar moves made in the Vale. Piece by piece, force them to answer Winterfell.”

He pursed his lips. “I cannot have a political dispute tying us down, Sansa. This country must prepare for war.”

“Yes, but politics and war must go hand in hand.”

Jon mused over it. “I agree with filling the council in Winterfell,” he said finally. “But we cannot rob commanders from our armies either. We need trusted commanders in the field.”

They pondered over it. There was a flicker through the parchment, and quiet jotting of notes. Sansa read quickly; she barely even moved her lips. “What of reintroducing the wardens, then?” Sansa suggested after a moment. “The Winter Court acts as central government, the wardens after the unifying commander in their area.”

“Wardens? Like Warden of the North?”

“The Iron Throne reduced the wardens to only four – of the East, West, North and South – but it was based on an existing practice.” She flickered through the book. “The King in the North named more than that…”

She turned towards a thumbed page, a crude map of the north designated into territories. There was a list of names; Warden of the Southern Marches, Warden of the Eastern Hills, Warden of the Bite, Warden of the Western Coast, Warden of the Northern Mountains, Warden of the Wolfswood, Warden of the Stone Isle…

“The unifying commander in their field,” Jon mused. “Men we can appoint to protect their own territory.”
“And wardens are appointed at the discretion of the king, from any rank,” Sansa explained. “A warden is as great as any lord, but they can be named as required.”

Jon saw the reasoning; remove petty squabbles by reinforcing a hard chain of command. “We could remove the power from potentially troublesome local lords. Force them to Winterfell’s command by appointing wardens instead.”

“Exactly. Then what of martial law, if we could appoint an emergency command…?”

The talk continued. There was an order forming from the mess of chaos, a structure that Jon could agree with. Sansa wanted noble and influential council, but Jon wanted to see a strong command of generals.

It was all about power. They had to ensure that the power was in the right positions and moved in the right direction.

The servants came with another decanter of wine, and the pile of parchments increased from two into dozens. There was a mess of papers spilled out over the stone table, some even scattering onto the cold floor.

Jon looked at the list, reading through the tiles; Minister of War, Minister of Justice, Minister of Seas, Minister of Commerce, Minister of Harvests, Minister of Tithes. Then there was Master of the Interior, Lord Treasurer, Lord Marshal, Lord of the Guards…

“There is another position,” Sansa said finally, as she looked through the book. “What of Warden of Winter? Read this…”

He bent over the page, and he saw a sketch of two men standing before the dais of the throne of Winterfell. They were bowing to a king in an iron throne; one man holding a branch of oak and the other a branch of holly. ‘Warden of Winter and Spring’, the heading below read. ‘Wardens named on a seasonal basis. Where other wardens are assigned to territories, these wardens are appointed to fight the elements. Warden of Spring to rebuild in springtime, to ensure food and grain throughout the kingdom, and to keep the kingdom strong. Warden of Winter to protect refugees during wintertime, and to ensure safety and shelter from the cold, to drive away all threats.’

“It makes sense.” Sansa nodded. “For the north, fear of winter has defined our culture more than anything. The Winterfell might have been a city in its own right, but the north could never sustain such a population,” she explained. “And Warden of Winter would largely be a ceremonial title, but then during the darkest nights of winter there is none more important.”

She was staring at him pointedly. It is all pretence, Jon thought. All of those ranks and titles – nothing more than to empty ways to flatter yourself.

“What does it matter what I call myself?” Jon retorted. “Lord… King's Claw… Warden of Winter… I will do the exact same job regardless.”

“The titles have a power of their own. This is the history of our kingdom; men will respect that.”

“It has been archaic for hundreds of years, Sansa.”

“But it helps justify your role, Jon. It will make the realm more comfortable with the position you give yourself,” Sansa insisted. “Sell it in a different light; we are not losing to a wildling invasion, we are returning to our own realm. Our culture. It’s important.”
Jon hesitated. The list of positions that she was filling was becoming long. “The realm fears that wildling and the dragon will destroy us, so show them the opposite,” Sansa mused. “Rebuild the north instead.”

She made jotted notes as they talked. There was a structure to be built, an entire system to be evaluated and established.

White Harbour would mint their own currency, silver coins that would pay for their kingdom. They would send an envoy to the Iron Bank to beseech a loan, reinitialise trade with Braavos. They needed admirals and captains for their fledgling navy. Sansa wanted to reach out to Lord Borrell of Sweettisister, and to establish tithes to raise coin that could hire sellswords.

There were other decrees that Jon insisted on. He wanted to designate reservations in the north for the giant clans to roam, and a king’s law to forbid the hunting of the old races. “There are so few of them left,” Jon argued, “we must to offer protection to giants, mammoths and the children of the forest.”

Jon also wanted decrees to extend the king's protection and tutelage to any with the potential of skinchanging. They would invite all wargs to Winterfell, and strictly outlaw the prosecution of any with abilities. That made Sansa bite her lip somewhat, but she did not protest as she made the note.

By the time they were finished, there were two dozen or so fledgling laws and proclamations scattered over the cold stone table. Jon could only assume that a scribe would rewrite them into a more official format later.

“Are we done?” he asked with a sigh.

“I… I think so. For now.” She took a deep breath. “I must return to Bran. Yourself?”

Jon sighed, and shook his head as he stood up. “I must see to Sonagon.”

“Ah.”

_I have no time to sit by Bran’s bed._ Still, Jon needed to protect his brother. He could not relax, not yet. Jon had not been able to sit by either Bran’s or Val's bedside. Not because of lack of love, just lack of time.

He staggered slightly pushing the heavy chair backwards. The cold in the Winter Suite had left Jon's leg stiff. He fumbled slightly reaching for his staff, and Sansa glanced at him.

“Hold on, let me…”

“I've got it,” he replied sharply, clutching his staff. The oak clattered against the granite floor. “It's quite alright.”

Sansa hesitated, but she stayed back. Her gaze glanced down to his walking stick. “That reminds me,” she said finally. “Hold on, I'll be right back.”

She left the chamber swiftly. He heard her pacing down the corridor briskly, but then she returned shortly after. When she stepped back in to the Winter Suite, Sansa was carrying a long and slim white cane.

“A gift,” Sansa offered. “I had a man cut it from the branches of the heart tree.”
Jon took the cane. It was smooth carved white wood, about four foot in length. At first, he thought it white oak, but then he recognised the distinctive texture of the wood. “Weirwood?”

“Call it a symbol of your status,” she explained, with knowing eyes. “None could fault you for carrying a sceptre – a mark of the office.”

His eyes glance down to his leg. Ah, a mark of the office. A sceptre, rather than a walking stick. Appearances are everything.

He took the cane gratefully. Jon smiled softly. “I’m really glad you’re home, Sansa.”

She smiled too. There was a pause, an uncertain hesitation, but then she reached in closer for an embrace. They hugged for the very first time that Jon could remember.

Sansa left to go see Bran, but Jon had another task. He had dragon to tend to.

Still, he glanced down at the list they had made, and there was a large question mark left hovering over House Karstark. He thought of his brother, and he made the decision quickly.

Jon steadied himself, and left the Winter Suite. He walked down the stairwell and out into the courtyard of the Great Keep. Snow was falling, and the steps were made treacherous by a fine layer of black ice. He walked slowly, his weirwood cane tapping with every step.

The courtyard was heaving with bodies. They cleared the snow every hour, but the drifts of white were still piling up.

Jon heard the distant thunder of giants gathered around the godswood to the north. The giants were camped around the dragon, with the Cult of the Ice Dragon patrolling the godswood. To his mild surprise, the giant matriarchs had proved extremely capable herbalists, providing mixtures and poultices that seemed to help even a dragon’s stomach.

Jon glanced around, and then headed east towards the castle’s outbuildings.

He found Lord Cregan Karstark by the stables, as the lord prepared his bay horse. There were two of Karstark’s sons and more free folk watching him at every turn. “My lord,” Jon called to Karstark. “I hoped that we could clear the air between us.”

The lord looked startled by Jon’s presence, flinching with the sight of him. Jon only smiled, stepping in towards the stables. “At ease, my lord. I only wish to talk.”

Cregan’s face twisted, his eyes glancing down to the cane Jon walked with. Jon approached slowly, pausing to pick up a saddle for the lord’s horse. “Do you mind, my lord?”

“What do you want, Your Grace?” Cregan said stiffly.

“I wish to offer you the chance to make peace with each other, to reach common ground.” Jon paused, extending the saddle for Cregan to take.

The guards stood at the entrance, but there was nobody else around by the horse’s stall. “Common ground,” Karstark repeated. “I have been nothing but loyal to you.”

“Well, you’ve never disobeyed,” Jon conceded. “But that is not quite loyalty. I’ve been thinking much on the traitors that stood within my army. For instance, Brandon Norrey and his clan. And it occurs to me that the Norrey did have valid reason to be resentful, but he never shared such with anyone. If only the Norrey had aired his grievances, I might have resolved them, and how much loss could have been prevented?” Jon shook his head sadly. “We are alone, my lord, we might speak privately. Let me hear your grievances.”

There was a long silence. Lord Karstark kept his face guarded, but Jon could see the rage in his eyes. “You may speak without consequence, my lord. I only wish to talk.”

“My grievances?” Cregan choked. “My father died outside these very walls.”

“Yes,” Jon sighed. “I lost my father too.”

“It is not the same. Arnolf Karstark will go down as traitor’s death, but he did naught but was best for his family.” His face twisted. “I’ve yet to even recover his body. My family is ruined thanks to you, and I lost two sons at the Battle of Last River. I lost them to wildlings — wildlings who held me and my family hostage for months, wildlings that sit in my keep. Wildlings that tortured me and my kin.”

“Yes.” Jon nodded. He idly reached out to stroke Karstark’s horse. “And can you see any resolution to our problems?”

“That depends. Can you bring the dead back to life? Can you restore Lord Rickard’s head?”

“I cannot,” Jon said simply.

“Then there is naught to say.” Karstark’s eyes narrowed. “I am your loyal subject, Your Grace. I have committed no treason against you, I’ve upheld the oath I gave you.”

The oath the Weeper forced out of you. “Yes,” Jon admitted. “You have.”

“Then you have nothing to reprimand me for.” His jaw tensed. “I apologise if my tongue was too blunt during the assembly.”

Has there ever been a more hollow apology? “You are right,” Jon said with a sigh. “But do you know what I think? I think you were just trying to disagree with me in the assembly. I think you know that you cannot defy me, but you make things as awkward for me as possible. You won’t defy, but you can still sow dissent in subtler ways. You can still wait for an opportunity.

“And I feel like you are determined to oppose me, my lord. You are ‘loyal’, I cannot fault you there — but I think you’ve resolved yourself to simply make my life difficult.”

Lord Karstark bristled, glaring. “I have done naught wrong.” He growled, backing down cautiously. “I have broken no oaths, and I will do not anything to risk my family. Or my wife.”

“Very well, my lord,” Jon said with a sigh. “I am sorry that we came to such ends.”

Cregan stiffly lowered his head. “Are we done, Your Grace?” Cregan growled. “I have my duties — there is a charnel trench waiting for me outside. Perhaps I’ll yet find my father’s body there.”

Jon just nodded. “As you will. Do not let me detain you.” He cast one final look at the lord and his horse, and then walked away.

As he left back towards the keep, Jon heard Lord Karstark mount up his horse and ride away out into the snows. Jon did not turn, and he waited until Cregan was at the centre of the courtyard, trotting towards the walls.

Then Jon closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and reached out. He extended his mind straight into Cregan Karstark's horse.

The bay mare twitched. Jon pressed in sharply, and then the mare recoiled. He felt the pain, like a dagger through the flesh. The horse screamed. He heard the shouting, he felt Karstark thrash with the reins, and then…

Even on the other side of the yard, Jon heard the scream as Karstark fell to the stones. He felt the painful oomph from the horse's hooves clattering.

Footsteps were running. Jon opened his eyes and kept on walking, without even breaking stride.

On the other side of the castle, Cregan Karstark fell from his horse and died.

There would be over three dozen witnesses to say that Cregan Karstark's horse slid on the ice, and the lord broke his neck. Jon very visibly hadn’t even been present, there was nothing to implicit him in such a death. It was an accident, nothing more. Alys Karstark was now left a young widow, and another dissenter had been removed from Bran’s court.

_I should have done that months ago_, Jon mused. Perhaps there were others who needed a fall off their horses. He thought of Rattleshirt, and he wondered how much use the Lord of Bones still had.

Perhaps Cregan Karstark would be another figure to haunt Jon’s dreams but, at this point, he just didn’t care.

Bran

It seemed as though he had been falling for years.

_Fly_, a voice whispered in the darkness, but Bran did not open his wings. Instead, he let himself fall, soaring down towards the earth. He thought of a little boy made of clay, baked until he was hard and brittle, dressed up in a lordling’s clothes and then pushed out into cold storms. Bran could have abandoned that little clay boy, he could have flown away, but he didn’t want to. He did not want to leave the broken boy behind.

The ground was so far below him he could barely make it out through the grey mists that whirled around him, but he knew how fast he was falling and he knew what was waiting for him down there. Even in dreams, you could not fall forever. He would wake up the instant before he hit the ground, he knew. You always woke up in the instant before you hit the ground.

The world was twisting, roiling all round him in a vague darkness. Fragmented thoughts and visions, flitting past the edges of his sight. Unconscious, and yet not wholly unaware. A sensation he’d nearly forgotten, that of warmth. Scattered mumbles, a susurrus of half-formed mutters; a few familiar, most not. And then there was a caw, and the hazy sensation of falling.

He was tumbling through the void between the stars, falling into an ocean of light that wreathed a roiling nothingness of pure black, drawing in the light forever. He was drowning in a circle of stars, staring out over a horizon of white roots weaving through a blood red sky.

_The only difference between flight and falling is where you want to land_, Bran thought with a breathless gasp. He opened his eyes wide and let himself drop.

Bran gasped, found himself standing in a grey waste, the corpse-light of a guttered dawn dimly washing over the world. Snow like ash, greasy and foul was falling from the sky. He saw five walls of pure black stone a thousand feet high, guarding the way north from the shores of a sea that flowed like blood. Banners of blue and sapphire wafted limply in the wind, falling and burning.

Bran found his eyes pulled to the east, and through the filthy snow, across the reach of the world, he found blue eyes staring back at him. Too many to count, too many to comprehend. He saw a creature like a mountain, a glacier…

And somewhere beneath it all, he sensed something pounding like a drum, the black heartbeat of the world. He sensed a lidless eye larger than the sky open beneath the land, stare into him, a power beyond mortality roiling and tensing, setting to flense his soul from his bones.

A harsh sound cut through the air, and the world went dark.

He was standing at the bottom of the ocean, standing at the bottom of a scar in between continents. He saw the earth silently hiss and crack and seethe as the world’s hot orange blood poured forth. He sensed power wafting forth from that burning blood, more power than any man could ever wield. It was coming forth in torrents, like the breaking of an ancient dam releasing an endless flood.

He saw a black mountain shrug itself free from the sand, shaking off the ghost of sleep as it rose into the vast ocean above. Bran looked up and saw a hundred more; a hundred twisting black shadows with eyes. They were swimming, exulting in the power, soaking it in.

A burning red eye the size of a rowing boat focused on him with sudden ferocity. It started to swim a little closer, reaching out with tentacles as long as rivers, inquisitive and grasping.

Bran didn’t flinch. He didn’t look away. Another cawing noise rang out, and the world faded to an alien scene. He just stared mutely, as the visions swam past him one after the other.

He saw a red city resting at the foot of a mountain that reached for the sky. The statues of a thousand dead gods loomed over the plains as a great battle raged between swarthy riders with bells in their hair and the legions of the dead. He saw the horselords break, he saw the city fall. He saw silent figures with blue eyes walking over the grassy plains.

He saw a titan guarding the way to a city of fog and lagoons, falling as a man in black armour laughed, and laughed…

He saw cities of harpies and tigers and elephants and slaves, all burning and screaming together.

He saw legions of men with skin scorched into stone, rising up from the waters.

He saw a lifeless city of red sands, of shattered walls and collapsed pyramids. A city of ashes, left frozen and barren.

He saw a stone man standing stiffly as the world broke apart into flames and darkness, and great black clouds of ash spewed over the waters.

He saw a burning eye in the middle of a smoking sea, all the while the shadows danced.

He saw flames and frost circling around each other, destroying everything in their wake. It was dance; a dance of the elements, of the seasons…

A dance of destruction.
Heartbeats became eternities and eternities became instants, and then he was rising upwards again. Great wings of black consumed him – the three-eyed crow was there, lifting him up into the skies.

He saw glaciers as high as mountains cover all the land, paving the world in a blanket of ice. Bran looked north, to the curtain of light at the end of the world, and then beyond that curtain. There was nothing below him now but snow and cold and death, a frozen wasteland where jagged blue-white spires of ice waited to embrace him. They flew up at him like spears.

"Don’t you see?" the three-eyed crow boomed, air whooshing beneath giant wings. "See why you need to fly!"

“Yes,” Bran agreed. “I see.” But it is only a dream. It cannot hurt me.

“Then choose. Fly or die.”

He saw the rising spikes rising up to meet him. There were bodies skewered over the frozen spikes, impaled on the edges – the bones of a thousand other dreams. He remembered this; it was the first ever vision the three-eyed crow had ever shown him.

This time, Bran knew why they were here. The three-eyed crow had done this before. The crow had dropped other dreamers onto the spikes, to test whether or not they would soar. How many other dreamers had the three-eyed crow dropped to their deaths? How many had there been before me?

Bran didn’t let himself fall. He had a choice. This time, he just pulled himself away.

The world blurred, and the wings of shadow disappeared around him.

It was like a veil had been dropped, like Bran could sense a little more of the nature of the three-eyed crow. As though it no longer kept up the effort to maintain the pretence of mortality. He saw the world around the bird roil like a black mirror.

He saw a thousand eyes floating in the space around the bird, each a window into some far off, incomprehensible scene. He saw a pale lord with a birthmark like a bloodstain, kissing a girl with silvery hair and blue and green eyes even as she laughed at him. He saw them studying over moth-bitten tomes, and he saw the girl slit a peasant’s throat and dab the blood over her skin. The pale lord gaped in horror at first, until slowly, his eyes began to glitter with curiosity. He saw the pale lord, decades older, wearing furs of black. The man waited in silent regard at the foot of a glacier, watching, still and silent as a child of the forest emerged from a tunnel, beckoning him forth.

Bran saw a black-haired boy with blue eyes in a bed of salt and rock, writhing as a bird whispered to him and told him how to fly.

He saw a mutated, merciless being of bark and blood with a thousand and one bloody eyes staring back at him. There was no mortality left in it, no compassion, no mercy. Bran didn’t want to go with such a creature.

“Pity,” the three-eyed crow whispered hoarsely, and then suddenly everything swept away. Only a dream.

All of the visions, all of the mists, shuddered and swirled around him and ripped away like a veil. Everything faded, and Bran felt the real world again. He felt light, and sound, and movement, warmth and cold.

Bran tried to call for help, and the sound of a wolf’s bark filled the air.
He was on four legs, and covered in fur. His nose twitched the unfamiliar air, and then he saw the body of a little boy before him. He was looking upon a little child, left unconscious and wrapped up in thick blankets.

Oh, Bran realised. His memories returned sluggishly. He remembered what it had been like to feel the cold spreading over his skin, and everything turning stiff and dead. Bran remembered his body freezing over.

He saw the world through a wolf’s eyes. All the sights were blurred and faded, but the world was alight from all the sounds and scents burning around him. It was hard to truly comprehend anything from an animal’s perspective; everything was defined more by instinct than sense.

The direwolf was anxious, twitching. Guarding the foot of a great bed, glaring at the unfamiliar faces. At one point the direwolf even had to growl to keep the strangers away as too many of them gathered in a tense huddle.

And yet, in another way, everything was so, so familiar. This was home, and he could still feel all of the memories coated through the chambers.

Bran saw his own body, lying in his bed. This is my bed, Bran thought numbly, my bed.

He remembered the last time he had laid in this bed, in this room, looking down at his own body from the outside. It had been after the fall, as he lay on death’s door. That had been a lifetime ago – when he first saw the three-eyed crow in his dreams. Fly, the crow had croaked to him, you must fly.

Bran didn’t want to fly anymore. He wanted to be home.

The direwolf mewled, and twitched. It hadn’t been a conscious decision, but when his own vision had gone black amidst the snows, Bran had instinctively retreated into Summer’s skin. Now, life was returning to his own body, and he had to return. You must wake up, Bran. You must wake up.

Bran slowly extended himself, reaching out back to his own body. His heart started to race as he felt his own skin creep back to him. He felt his consciousness oozing back towards his body, filling up his skin like honey dripping into a container.

The little boy’s eyes flickered, and his body started to rouse itself. His body was trembling; even despite the warmth Bran felt numb. Everything was so sluggish, so hard to think…

His eyes twitched open slowly, and he saw a face framed by red hair sitting over. She was sitting by his bedside, curled over her lap. She was stitching, stitching for him.

Mother, Bran thought. Mother?

Mother hadn’t been present the last time he had woken up. Bran had looked for her, but his Mother had already left before he awoke from his coma. She went south to chase after Father, and Bran never saw either of them again. He wanted to see his mother again.

His head pounded, his blurred vision spinning. He tried to call out to her, but all that came were the slurred words.

“… ‘Othur…”

At once, she twitched. It looked like she had been falling asleep by his bedside, but at the sound of his voice, Mother jumped. “Bran!” she called. “By the Gods, Bran…”!!
It wasn’t Mother. Her voice was different, her face younger and her hair darker. Bran had to blink, trying to recognise the young woman draped over his bed. It was another ghost.

Sansa. Is that Sansa…?

Bran would have called out, but his throat croaked. His arms trembled, trying to grip something. “Don’t move, Bran…” she soothed, placing a warm hand over his cold head. “I’ll fetch you some water, but you must drink it slowly. Stay still, Bran, stay still…”

He felt Summer resting on his bed, curled up protectively like a great grey guardian.

Even when he was lying down, the world wobbled. *It wasn’t a dream, Bran realised. This is Winterfell, this is home.

His stomach lurched so violently he could have puked. His throat was rough like leather, everything was spinning. He couldn’t feel his arms, or his legs. *My legs, Bran thought with a blink. I haven’t felt my legs in three years. And yet, somehow, he still tried to move them every time he woke up.

This is Winterfell. How? What of the Boltons, and the wildlings, and what about…?

Meera. Where is Meera?

Bran felt almost delirious, but he could feel Summer lying next to him – the great wolf’s snout nuzzling at Bran’s fingertips, his wet nose against Bran’s palm. Summer wouldn’t let anything happen to Meera. Summer thought that they were safe.

He felt soft hands wrap around his shoulders. Sansa looked older than he remembered – like a woman grown. He remembered a young girl with red hair bobbed over her head and wide eyes, but the woman over him was lean with hair worn downwards – dressed curtly and looking as mature as any lady. She hugged him so tightly, gripping his shoulders and Bran could barely breathe.

He tried to squirm, to ask a hundred questions all at once, but all that came out was a strained gurgle. “It’s alright, Bran…” Sansa whispered. Her eyes glistened with tears, her voice nearly breaking. “It’s alright.”

There was nothing Bran could do but lie on his bed, staring up the stone ceiling and feeling his heart pounding in his chest.

“How…?” Bran croaked finally. “… Where…?”

“It’s Jon, Bran,” Sansa whispered, slowly raising a goblet of water to his lips. “Jon took our home back.”

Jon. Jon is here too?

He had never expected to see his family again. Somewhere, after all those months wandering the wilderness, or all the time trapped in that dungeon by the Bastard’s Boys, Bran had lost all hope that he would ever see his family. He had lost all hope that he might ever wake up in Winterfell again.

To be here, to be in this room again, with his sister… his sister!… hugging him and crying into his shoulder…

It was all too much. Bran blacked out again.
When he woke up again, his sister was still by his side. She had a pile of parchment on her lap, and a book propped open on the tableside by an inkpot – it looked like she was writing something, her quill blotting over the page.

Bran took deep breaths, trying to focus. Sansa held his hand, and promised to fetch him so toasted bread and jam. Small meals, she kept on insisting. Bran was so hungry that his stomach didn’t even have the strength to growl.

There were other figures – other men that stepped through the doorway. They were all foreign figures wearing worn boiled leather and worn chainmail, with gruff expressions. Bran didn’t recognise any of them, but he focused on the one person he did feel. He focused on his sister.

Through his third eye, Winterfell felt heaving all around him. There were hundreds – thousands – of pinpricks of consciousness, all of them bustling with activity as dusk fell.

Slowly, awkwardly, Bran managed to croak out questions, and then were answers. The Boltons are defeated, Sansa told him. There had been a battle, a very recent battle, but the Boltons lost. The Starks were in exile no longer, they had justice for Robb’s death. Jon managed to recover Winterfell for them – his half-brother made an alliance with free folk beyond the Wall, he formed a coalition with northern lords and defeated House Bolton. They were safe, Sansa insisted. Meera was safe, she was just fatigued as well.

“What of Arya?” Bran heard himself ask. “Where is Arya?”

Sansa didn’t reply, she just turned quiet. Oh.

As nightfall stretched, there were more visitors. They came cautiously, and as the door flapped open and close Bran glimpsed armed guards standing very stiffly outside his chambers. There were sounds like men were being searched for hidden weapons before they were allowed to enter; everything sharper than a matchstick was confiscated before any were allowed to even stand outside his room.

Then, Bran heard a dozen footsteps marching up through the corridor. Bran felt a man with a large retinue walking towards his doorway.

He heard the distinctive, uneven beat of a lurched gait – of a wooden staff tapping against the stones. Sansa stood up, she stood to attention, even. Bran blinked, and he was staring straight at the door as a stranger with white hair stepped through the doorway.

Bran’s body shivered, a tremor ran down his neck. Bran stared at the man through his third eye, and the man stared back. He is a skinchanger too.

The whole room turned hush. The man was dressed like some warrior king – a man with bone white hair and thick black furs wrapped over chainmail. None others were allowed swords, but he had a black blade hanging from a scabbard on his waist. His expression was gaunt, his jaw stiff and his eyes hard. Bran stared, and then looked between the hard and ragged men that he walked with. Wildlings from beyond the Wall, Bran thought, King Snow.

It was only when the white-haired man’s gaze softened that the recognition clicked. His eyes were grey.

“Jon?” Bran gasped in the silent room.

Sansa looked different, but Jon… he looked like a different person. White hair. They both looked at each other. It was like neither of them even knew how to act.
“Bran,” his half-brother replied, in a whisper. There was a long, pregnant pause, and then Jon turned to his retinue. “Do not crowd him,” King Snow ordered in a hard voice, and the men stepped backwards. “Give my brother his space; none are to see him until either I or my sister allows it. Keep all others back.”

There were mumbles. “Aye, King Snow,” Bran heard one wildling mutter, bowing his head. Jon forced them to clear the landing, and then stepped into Bran’s chambers and shut the door. It was only when the door slammed shut that Jon’s posture finally slackened, his shoulders slumping. “Bran…” Jon whispered. He didn’t seem to know what else to say than that, but he crossed the distance and hugged the boy tightly.

Bran was left speechless, struggling to understand. King Snow, they called him. The King-Beyond-the-Wall.

“I wanted to see you when you woke up,” his brother whispered. “I tried… I tried to see you before I left…”

Bran didn’t reply. “I’m sorry that you had to go through everything by yourself,” Jon admitted. “I’m sorry that I wasn’t there.”

Four years, Bran realised. It was closer to four years than three now. We waited four years to see each other again.

There were tears swelling in his eyes. Bran took a deep breath, head spinning. He opened his mouth to speak, and he just choked.

Slowly, Sansa reached out to hold Bran’s hand reassuringly. Jon stepped forward, bending down to hug his brother. He knelt by Bran’s bedside, and Bran was shivering as his arms reached around him. Jon’s hand moved to his scalp – to russ up Bran’s hair, just like he used to do when they were small.

It felt different; Bran’s hair was overgrown now – his hair was ragged and unkempt, reaching down to his shoulders. Jon’s fingers were stiffer, and when he raised his hand Bran suddenly realised that he was missing his little finger to a pale stump.

Bran was crying. He didn’t know when the tears began, but even the casual movement like touching his hair caused him to breakdown in tears. “Meera,” Bran said, gulping, “can I see Meera again?”

“Of course you can,” Jon replied, and he stepped up to pass on the order. The men outside jumped to fulfil Jon’s commands.

Meera arrived not long later, escorted by two wildling men. Meera looked pale, dishevelled and skinny without her thick, mouldy cloak. She had swapped her crusty worn leathers – leathers she had been wearing for months – for a hair tunic and hide breeches; they were clothes more fit for a young stableboy, and she wore them awkwardly. Her shoulders were tense, her eyes guarded, but her mouth opened when she saw Bran.

Meera was cautious, she looked between Sansa and Jon hesitantly as she stepped in the room, but quickly walked to Bran’s side. She held his hand too, and Summer whimpered as he sniffed at Meera.

“Thank you for keeping my brother safe, Lady Reed,” Sansa said, lowering her head. “Winterfell owes you a debt.”
Meera didn’t reply right away. Her eyes flickered towards the wildling king. Meera asked Jon about Jojen, asked whether anyone had found her brother, and Jon replied that he had not, but he promised to make inquiries. Meera’s eyes looked at Bran as if there was something else she wanted to say, but she held her tongue.

It was very late, the hour of the bat or later. Bran could hardly speak, and the room was just so… Bran couldn’t even describe it. His heart was beating so fast.

The room was warm, stuffily so. After being in the cold got so long, Bran half-forgotten what warmth felt like.

Sansa finally suggested that they should retire, and Jon offered Meera the room next to Bran’s. Rickon’s old room. Bran never wanted to let go of Meera’s hand.

Everything was spinning. Bran needed to sleep, needed to collapse, but for a moment he was scared that if he closed his eyes, he might wake up from this weird, surreal dream.

As soon as his eyelids flickered shut, the world dissolved. Bran fell into unconsciousness without even remembering snoozing off.

The world shifted, and lurched.

Bran gasped, suddenly finding standing upright himself on his two feet. Standing upright on two good legs. His legs.

He was in the ruins of a great castle – a castle larger than any he had ever seen, in the middle of a great stone courtyard, rimmed by walls of white and rose flowstone crusted in hoarfrost. The towers were great pillars rising up to the sky, and he could see the runestones of the First Men etched onto the stone. Bran stared at the ghostly, frozen ruins of the abandoned structure, sensing a hidden power beneath.

“This is not where you should be, Bran.”

This is another dream. Bran didn’t even need to turn around, to know that the three-eyed crow was perched behind him. Why is the crow doing this, why is he so desperate to pull me away?

“I don’t even know where this is,” Bran replied.

Some ancient castle, frozen over and decayed? He was in the green somewhere, beyond time and memory.

“Not here,” the three-eyed crow cawed, its voice disapproving. “Where your actual body is at. You do not belong there.”

I do. “There must always be a Stark in Winterfell.”

“Not you,” the three-eyed crow replied. “You have a different fate, Brandon Stark.”

His fists clenched into balls. There was so much Bran wanted to shout, wanted to scream. Why did you lead me away? Why did you to lie to me? Why did you let me get trapped? Why am I so important to you? Instead, the only thing that he said, “I’m home now. I’m with my brother and my sister.”

The crow cawed, and the cry echoed over the frozen ruins. “You should have come to me. There was a place waiting for you. I could have shown you a power more than anything you can possibly dream of.”

“I only ever dreamt of going home.” Bran shook his head. “All I wanted was to be with them. You wanted to hide me away.”

The crow tilted its beak. “They are beyond help, Bran.”

“Why?” Bran had to force himself not to scream it. “You’re powerful, so powerful, you saved me from the Other. You could have saved my father, you could have saved Robb. You could have helped Jon. The Starks protect the north. Isn’t that what you want? Who is going to stop them, if not us?”

The crow was silent for a time. “I have oft wondered at the folly of man,” it said quietly, yet the yard seemed to churn, unseen roots writhing like snakes beneath the soil. “I have struggled to understand why they each seem to believe that their story is the world’s most important – it is a matter of perspective. The perspective to see that your family’s wars are of less importance than you can possibly imagine. I would have saved you from it all, given you the wings with which you could fly away.

“From the moment of your birth, Bran,” the crow cawed harshly, “From the moment of your birth, you were marked with the potential to become more. To fly on the currents of the storm of time, to see all that ever has been or will ever be. To become more. I did not want you to waste that potential in such petty squabbles.”

“Petty squabbles?” Bran said, aghast. “It’s my family, my home!”

“A bird only needs the sky for his home. And what sort of bird,” the crow flapped its wings agitatedly, “doesn’t dream of flying?”

Bran’s lips curled. “You lied to me!” Bran snapped. “You hid the truth from me, you tried to keep me in the dark.”

“I told you everything you needed to know, Bran. I showed the path you must walk, and I never wanted you to be side-tracked.” For a brief moment, the crow’s voice blurred. The harsh crowing dissolved – and it turned into Eddard Stark’s voice. “The cold winds rise. I told you that you were a winged wolf, bound to the earth by chains.”

Bran tensed. The air was shifting – a phantom mist hovering around him. The mist was writhing, forming ghostly shades standing like statues encircling him. Bran saw Mother, Father, Robb, Jon, Sansa, Arya, Rickon... all the figures from his childhood; Ser Rodrik, Old Nan, Hodor, Hullen, Jory, Theon...

All the ghosts of Winterfell, dozens of them, were surrounding Bran. The crow’s voice became louder, booming. “Those that you cling to... your friends, your family. Your history, your home, your attachments. They are the chains, Bran,” the greenseer’s voice boomed. “They are the tethers that bind you to this earth, that leave you the winged wolf unable to leave the ground. You must cut them off.”

All of their faces were stiff and solemn. Bran stared at his mother and father, at their faces he had nearly forgotten. “Cut them off,” Bran replied. “Like you did?”

“Yes,” the greenseer agreed. “Like I did. Power requires sacrifice.”

That was why you did it, Bran thought quietly. The crow didn’t care, he was just trying to isolate me. He wanted to sever me from my family, from my friends, one by one.
“You could fly, Bran.” The three-eyed crow was growing larger – shadows shifting around its feathers as it expanded to as large as a vulture. “You might soar, if not for the chains that you bind yourself with.”

Bran paused, and bit his lip. After a heartbeat, he shook his head. “Then I am happy being chained.”

“Broken legs and all?” the crow challenged.

“Broken legs and all,” Bran agreed. He could still feel Meera’s touch on his hand, her phantom grip around his fingers.

“Are you steadfast in that resolution?” it cawed. Bran nodded, and the crow shook its beak. “Then you are useless to me,” it croaked. “A pity, I had such high hopes.”

The crow was growing large still – wrapping the shadows around its body. It was as large as a dragon now. A great dragon of dark wings and shadows. Bran felt the gusts of wind sweeping through the yards, so powerful he could barely even stand. The crow was monstrously large, sweeping away the castle with every flap of immense wings.

And then the crow seemed to breath, ruffling its wings as roots writhed and power poured. The flowstone towers stabilised, and the visions disappeared. The crow opened its beak, staring into Bran even as he gasped and trembled.

“The old powers are rising,” the crow cawed, eyes glittering darkly. “And with their return tremble the foundations of the world. The realms of man will not survive. Let alone your family.” The crow’s voice seemed to lower, no longer sounding from its beak, but echoing from everywhere, a thrum coming from all the land, like the commandment of a forgotten god. “All that I do, I do to ensure that man survives, no matter the dark pit or remote isle or high range to which we must flee until that rising tide wanes.

“When the chains break and die – and they will,” the three-eyed crow’s deafening, deep voice intoned. “When you feel them snap… perhaps you may yet call out to me again.”

Wings flapped, and the stone brushed away.

Bran’s dreams went black.

The next morning, when his eyes flickered open again, he was still in his room. Bran took a deep breath, unable to shake the phantom shiver of unease that clung to his skin.

“It was a dream, he thought, only a dream.

Sansa was still by his bedside. She had slept on that chair all night. He only saw her briefly, though, because she had to leave shortly after he woke. They held each other’s hands, and she kissed him on the forehead, but she then grimaced and apologised. She had to go, Sansa explained, there was some assembly or meeting happening, something that Sansa had to be present for. Bran didn’t want her to leave, he tried to grip her fingers, but she still pulled away from her hand.

Sansa left him, but Meera returned to sit vigil by his bed. Meera seemed to relax more; just her, him and Summer in the room together. There was colour in Meera’s cheeks again, Bran noticed, she seemed stronger.

“Is this…?” Bran muttered, voice trailing off.

“It is.” Meera nodded. “The Boltons lost.”
“My brother beat them,” Bran said dumbly. “They’re gone. My family won.”

Meera shook his head. “No. The wildlings won.”

“No, it’s not,” Meera warned. He saw the same expression she had worn last night. “It has been a long time since you’ve seen your brother, and I’ve never met him. I don’t know him, and I don’t trust him. Maybe you shouldn’t either.”

“He’s my brother…”

“They’re wildlings, Bran,” she warned darkly, and Bran realised why she was so unnerved. Wildlings – the same as we killed in the Nightfort. “Be careful. I don’t like the look of the company that King Snow keeps.”

Bran didn't reply. He remembered the Nightfort painfully clearly. He knew why Meera couldn't relax. It felt like they were all on edge, trying to pick up the pieces.

They stood awkwardly in his chambers, feeling so out of place. Meera was pacing, her hands twitching for her missing spear. Summer nuzzled against Bran; the great wolf’s snout resting against his side, trying to keep him calm.

It was evening by the time Sansa returned. She walked briskly, carrying a bundle of parchments under her arms. “What's going on?” Meera demanded to his sister. “What's happening?”

Sansa hesitated, biting her lip. “You should come with me,” she said after a pause. “There's something that you must see. Both of you.”

“My legs…” There was no Hodor to carry him.

“I shall find a platter, and men to carry it,” Sansa promised. “Hold on, I won't be long.”

A platter. Bran was too used to being carried on someone's back.

In the end, they used one of the chairs from the dining hall to seat him, and two crisscrossing lengths of a timber braced underneath it for men to carry him. Bran wasn't that heavy, but it still took four men to lift him and his seat upwards.

It was awkward and jerky, and the men cursed quietly under their breaths as they tried to balance him. Bran didn't understand why they wouldn't just lift him piggyback, but Sansa wouldn't hear it.

She wrapped him tightly up in a wolfhide cloak, and promised that it would be a short trip. Bran had to focus to keep Summer calm, as the men struggled and heaved to carry him down the narrow spiral staircase.

Winterfell looked so different, and by the time they reached the main hallway there was a crowd of people gathered to watch him. The stone corridor was filled with an ocean of shaggy, unkempt faces. Wildlings.

Sansa walked closely to his left, while Meera clung on to his right, with Summer prowling in front. It turned into a procession of bodies coming out of the doors, so many staring at him that Bran's breath froze.

He saw all the men carrying weapons. There were four men carrying his seat, and another thirty plus clutching axes as they pushed the crowd back. They were rough with their movements, snapping orders in harsh voices.

It was all so loud, so hectic, so frantic… Bran remembered stories that Old Nan told him – stories of cannibals that would carry their guests through parades, on their way to the cooking pot.

It was snowing outside, with tents and bonfires littering the courtyard. Bran wrapped himself up tightly against the cold, while heavy boots stomped through the muddy slush.

He saw the godswood up ahead, and then he felt the ground tremble. Summer barked and snarled at the sight of enormous bodies, looming by the gates. Meera gasped, and Bran might have screamed.

They were massive beasts of fur and muscle, standing upright with knuckles that traipsed across the ground. They were so large they could lift a man in a single hand.

Giants. Bran’s head went blank staring in pure horror…

One of the giants roared – a booming cry revealing a toothy mouth that might swallow him whole. Summer was snarling, and the great wolf had never looked so small.

Sansa was still holding his hand. “It's alright,” she soothed.

There were giants in Winterfell, camped around the godswood. Is this what Sansa wanted to show me?

With a shout of words he did not recognise, the immense humanoids parted before his escort. Bran was left shaken, trying to understand…

The platter was carried through the iron gates and into the trees. Bran glimpsed the white hair of Jon, clearing the way, and dozens of wildlings lining the path. They all wore white stones on their chests.

He saw the godswood he once knew, the trees half-buried under a flurry of snow. They had to push their way through the snow, and Bran was left trying to match the broken trees and tattered branches with the forest he remembered. He heard the crackling of ice against the hot springs, and the rumble of all the men milling around them.

Everything was white, buried in snow. Summer howled, an uncertain sound ringing in the frozen air. Bran heard the whoosh of the geysers, like a great breath from the earth.

He felt Meera gasp, and her hands grip his so tightly it hurt, but Bran couldn't see anything. He stared ahead, uncomprehendingly.

Then, the earth shuddered.

At first, Bran mistook it for the landscape; like a giant rocky outcrop as large as a small mountain strewn through the woods. It was only when the rocks shivered that he saw its form. It was buried in snow and obscured by the trees, but then Bran made out the size of it.

It was moving, panting in deep, rhythmic breaths, shivering slightly in the snowfall.
The pure scale made Bran's head go blank. It was a wall, a mountain, of flesh. He saw white and pale red, curled around the frosty weirwood.

Slowly, Bran managed to make out details. He saw scales etched like steel, huge horns, and a snout as large as a building. It was resting with its head half-submerged in the warm pools, its jaws parted slightly and cool mist hissing between giant teeth. It bathed with its mouth open, water from the pools gurgling between its teeth.

Bubbles foamed around its scales, while ice flowered across its curled, hulking body.

Bran could only stare. Summer was still howling and yelping, the direwolf panicked. Bran's could feel it in the air, he could feel the air charged by the very presence of that monster.

It was like the monster felt him too. It shifted and stirred as Bran approached, the trees and earth cracking. Jon had to rush forward to calm it down, to keep it still. Jon's hands moved to its jaw, whispering gently.

A dragon, Bran realised with horror. A dragon!

Sansa held Bran's hand a bit tighter. “I wanted to show you…” she whispered. “This is how Jon united the wildlings. This is how he retook Winterfell.”

A dragon. Bran had barely ever imagined something so big.

There was a silence in the ruins of the godswood. A thousand questions flickered through his head, but Bran couldn't even speak. He could only stare upwards and gape.

A hundred eyes were on him, an entire procession focused on him. Bran blinked, and slowly shifted in his seat. He felt the ripple pass through the crowd, and one by one he saw men moving.

He watched as the men started to lower themselves to their knees.

Finally, the first question formed on Bran's lips. “Why… why are they bowing?” he gasped.

“Because you are Robb's heir,” Sansa whispered. “You're the King in the North, Bran.”

His head went blank.

...

After that, presumably they took him back to the castle. He faintly remembered people speaking to him, but Bran couldn't recall what anyone said.

They called him 'Your Grace’. The words seemed so weird.

Sansa was fussing over him, straightening his collar, calling for water and kindling for the fire, but Bran just felt numb.

There were stuttered questions and uncertain answers, but Bran could barely even concentrate. His head was spinning, fixated on the presence, the feeling, that the dragon had radiated. It had felt like pure power.

“Your coronation, Bran,” Sansa was saying. “You should be crowned quickly.”

Coronation. It was such a strange word. Bran heard everyone saying it, but it was like he didn’t quite know what it meant.
It was nightfall by the time he saw Jon again. Even when Bran left, Jon had still been tending to the dragon. Come dusk, Bran was exhausted, and his room felt so tense and quiet as Jon knocked on the door.

“Bran,” his half-brother called. “May I... can we talk?”

Bran only nodded. There were still a dozen men standing guard outside, while Jon limped into the room. His brother lurched with every step, balancing on a white weirwood cane.

The only sound in the room was the cackle of the fires, and the soft snoring from Summer curled up at the foot of his bed.

“Your leg,” Bran muttered, not sure what to say.

“It's recovering,” Jon replied. “It's an old wound that was nearly gone, but then I took a blade in the recent battle.” His hand traced across his upper thigh. “Yet it will heal too. It just needs time.”

Bran's eyes glanced to his own legs. “Not all wounds do.”

“Not all,” Jon agreed. “But we still learn to live with them.”

Gods, Jon looked so different with white hair. His face was different too; cheeks gaunter, eyes older. It was so hard to match this gaunt and white-haired man with the raven-haired boy Bran once knew.

King Jon Snow – King-Beyond-The-Wall, the Bastard King, and the dragonlord of winter.

Bran didn't even know what to say, and silence reigned in the room for several long heartbeats.

“They say that I'm going to be king,” the boy said finally.

“You are.”

“They will call me King Bran the Broken.”

“Why not Brandon the Immortal?” Jon countered. “You've survived so much, Bran; you've come back from the dead more times than I have. You will survive a crown too.”

There was no reply but silence. Bran had been through a lot, but why did the thought of a crown scare him as much as anything had?

“You are the eldest living trueborn son of Eddard Stark, brother and heir to King Robb Stark,” Jon said softly, moving to sit by the bed. “Robb declared himself King in the North, and that passes to you.”

“Robb was never in the north as king.”

“Robb wasn't. But you are.”

I am next in line to a newly resurrected, unstable throne. Half of the lords hadn't even agreed to northern independence, and the other half had died for it.

Bran knew all that, but still the thought of someone placing that crown on his head made him shiver. I don’t want to be king. No one ever prepared me to be king. Robb chose to be king, not me.

But what could he do? Deny the kingship? Go back to being lords of Winterfell instead of King in the North. He could do that. I am going to be king, he thought, I could do whatever I want.

But that would mean bending to the Iron Throne, he knew. It would be surrendering to the people who murdered his father, his brother, his mother. Half the lords of the north would revolt if he tried to do that. Again.

Jon was sitting on the edge of his bed, waiting for a reply. Bran sat on silence, stewing over it.

I might be the first King in the North crowned to Winterfell in over three hundred years, he realised. The first king to sit on the throne of Winterfell again.

He would have to stay sitting too, because he could never stand.

“I don’t want to do this,” Bran said, fingers twitching.

Jon looked down at him, his pale eyes softening somewhat.

“You don’t have to do anything you don’t want to do,” Jon said, but he was lying. “We can discuss this later if you want.”

“I don’t want to do it at all,” Bran said.

Jon hesitated. “That’s your right too,” he said. “But please think carefully about such.”

“I am. What if I pass the crown to you?”

“Bran…”

“You should be king, not me. You retook Winterfell, not me. You have the army, you have the dragon, I’m…” I’m broken. “I can do that too, right? I could name you my heir, and forfeit the crown to you.”

Jon twitched. “You could.” His fingers fidgeted at with his hand, somewhat uncomfortable. “But please don’t. I’m not a Stark. You could bring the realm together, but I would drive it apart. I shouldn’t be king.”

“You called yourself king.”

“Not of Winterfell.”

“Robb named you his heir.”

“Only when he thought you were dead.”

“Nobody wants me to be king.”

“Who told you that?”

“Nobody,” Bran replied. “But I can still tell. Everyone wants you to be it.” They want Jon the Conqueror. The first Dragon King of Winter. Not Bran the Broken.

“Everyone.” There was a hollow smile on Jon's lips. “Everyone but me, Bran. I don't want to be king, I never did.”

The room turned silent again. Bran didn't know how to reply. Jon said the words like an admission. “I took my crown because there was no other choice. I never enjoyed it, I never wanted it, perhaps
I was never even suited for it,” Jon explained softly. “But there's a choice now, and I…”

His voice trailed off into the quiet. Jon grimaced, reaching out to cradle Bran's hand. “…I know it’s scary, Bran. Believe me, I know. But you’ll grow into that crown, and you’ll be a much better king than I ever could.”

His hands were so rough. Bran looked down, and saw Jon's cauterized stump of a missing little finger.

“So what are you going to do?” Bran asked, keeping his voice low.

“I'm going to protect the north,” Jon replied. “I think that's what I'm meant to do.”

Bran sat quietly for a long time, simmering in the gloom. He spent a long time thinking on it, remembered all that time he has spent trapped…

“I could just force you to be king,” Bran said finally. “I could hand the crown over to you and order you to take it.”

“And I could just hand it back.”

Bran blinked. “You could do that?”

“Course I could. I’d be king.” A smile split Jon's dark features. “And a king can do anything. I’d then order you to take the crown.”

“Well, I could order you to take it right back.”

“It’d be the most confusing coronation in history, I suppose,” Jon chuckled. “Seeing who could pass the crown between us the longest. The guests would get very upset.”

Despite himself, Bran laughed too. Jon looked ten years younger when he grinned, more his real age. When was the last time I laughed?

Jon's arms moved downwards, to wrap around Bran's shoulders. “You’ll be a good king, Bran. A great king,” Jon said softly. “I promise it. You're wiser and stronger than I was at your age.”

“I…” he muttered after a pause. “…I won’t even be able to stand to be crowned…”

“You don’t need to stand. You’ll be seated. In father’s chair. Someone – perhaps the Greatjon – will place the crown on your head, and all the lords will come and bow before you. That’s all.”

“And they’ll have to carry me.” Lift me like a child in front of everyone.

“You’ll be seated before the ceremony begins,” Jon explained. “You’ll stay seated, and they’ll come into the hall.”

“To pretend that I’m not cripple.”

“Just to make it easier. You’ll have Summer by your side, and Sansa and I will be there too.”

The thought of the direwolf being next to him did make him feel better. Summer would keep Bran strong. Bran didn't know when the coronation would be happening, but they were talking as if it was soon.

Bran nodded. “What of Meera?”
“She will be there too, of course.” Jon paused. “Meera Reed saved your life, didn't she?”

Bran nodded. “Then I will reward her well for her service,” Jon promised. “Her and her family. I shall have scouts search down her brother, whatever happened to him, and I think Lord Reed himself will be coming to Winterfell.”

“Father said that Howland Reed saved his life from Arthur Dayne,” Bran recalled, and then nodded firmly. “Yes. I want to meet him.”

Jon chuckled. “Why the interest in the Reeds?”

Bran’s mouth tightened. He didn't even realise the decision he made before the words came out of his mouth… “I want to ask Meera to marry me.”

Jon bit his lip, but he didn’t seem surprised. “You’re sure? You’re very young. She is six years older than you.”

Bran nodded, trying to be as firm as possible.

“Meera Reed is the daughter of a very old and loyal house. I doubt anyone has reason to object.” Jon mused, before looking at him seriously. “… But, let us wait, before making the betrothal. I’ll brooch the possibility with Lord Reed, but there's no reason for an immediate marriage. Wait for at least four years.”

Bran squirmed. He loved Meera. Her smile, her brown eyes. Some days it was all he could think about. Meera had carried him, stood by his side, even when there had been no one else.

“Why?” Bran said stubbornly. “I love her, why wait?”

“Because you’re very young.” Bran opened his mouth to object, but Jon continued. “And it will be a few years before you’re able to consummate a marriage in any case. And because Meera is the only girl that you know – how do you know it's really love, or is it just fondness towards your female friend?”

Bran hesitated, but then fell silent. “You’re king now,” Jon said. “You’re going to have plenty of marriage proposals.”

“Nobody is going to want to marry a cripple.”

“Hardly. And it’s their fault if they don’t. I know that Lady Maege was talking about bringing her daughter Lyanna to Winterfell – she’s about your age. And Lord Wyman has a young daughter too.” He seemed to hesitate. “But you’re too young to be wondering about marriage. It’s not something you should do lightly, and, for a king, personal feelings are so rarely involved. We all have to do what is best for the kingdom.”

Bran stewed on that for a while. “Do you have someone you love?”

At that, Jon seemed caught off-guard. Bran saw a flicker in his gaze, something he could not recognise. “Yes,” Jon replied, somewhat stiffly. “I think I do.”

There was sadness in his voice. Bran remembered the three-eyed crow’s warning, he remembered the crow’s promise that the chains would snap. The vision of ice and darkness flickered before Bran's eyes. He remembered all those months trapped in the dungeon at Thistle Hall.

This is what I chose. I chose her.
“Yes,” Bran said finally. “I will be king. I want to protect my home, and I want do it for Meera.”

“As you say, Your Grace.”

Your Grace. They will all call me that now. “And you’re a prince,” Bran said after a moment’s thought. “You’re my brother, you should be Prince Jon Snow, the next in line to the throne.”

Jon’s face flickered. “Bran, I’m a bastard, not—”

“Nope.” Bran shook his head. “You’re a prince, and you can’t argue with me because I’m king.”

Jon sighed, but there was a smile lingering on his lips. “Very well Bran,” he relented. “Prince Jon Snow.”

They pulled in for another hug, and Bran sloped into Jon’s arms. He smells like father, Bran realised. For that moment, Bran never wanted to let go.

“But Rickon must be next in line before me,” Jon said after a pause. “We’ll bring Rickon back.”

“Rickon is alive? With Osha?”

“He's on Skagos,” Jon explained. “Lord Manderly found a boy who tracked them. I've sent men to recover Rickon, but there's fighting against the Skagosi and they have been delayed by the storms.”

The very thought of seeing his brother again… Bran wanted his family back. “You could fly to Skagos,” Bran said. “On your dragon.”

“I could. As soon as Sonagon recovers.” Jon nodded. “But Ghost will find Rickon first, and the men are sailing around Skane as we speak. They will find him, and I will go to collect him.”

He knows exactly where his direwolf is. Jon is like me. Bran took a long, deep breath, struggling to even speak for one moment. There was so much he wanted to say, or ask, but the one thing that came to his lips…

“Promise me that we won't have to run again,” Bran said finally, twitching with nerves. “I just don't want to have to run anymore.”

Jon leant over and kissed him softly on the forehead. Just like father used to do when he was very had been very little. Bran had grown out of being kissed like that years ago, but suddenly he didn’t mind.

“Yes,” Jon whispered. “I’ll keep our family safe. I promise.”

It was pitch black outside and Bran could hear the howl of the wind, but they sat and cradled next to each other. They talked softly, with the sound of the crackling fire hissing in the backdrop.

Bran wanted to close his eyes and pretend that the last three years were a long, bad dream. He wanted to forget all those nights he had been hungry in the cold, all those nights trapped in the dungeon. He didn't want this moment to end.

It was only the sound of stomping boots up the staircase that broke the moment in his room.

“King Snow!” an urgent voice called. “King Snow!”

The sound caused Bran to flinch. Jon's voice turned sharp. “I said that I wasn't to be disturbed, Toregg.”
The man looked flustered, as he stepped through the door. “It's from the scouts, Your Grace.”

Jon was already on his feet. “Attack?”

“No, it's a… a disturbance on the perimeter.”

Bran pulled himself upright, trying to see out the door. He saw men rushing up the staircase; they wore soaked wet furs, out of breath like they had been running up the stairs. There was a frantic bustle, shouts rising from the guards in the corridor.

Jon was already marching out, leaving the door ajar. Bran caught snatches of the cries from the men.

“The corpses, your Grace, we found–”

“Missing–”

Jon's voice turned sharp, cutting through the noise. “I gave you strict orders to dispose of all bodies; your task was to see it done quickly!”

They reached the top of the stairs, the voice were more audible. “The snows are over six foot deep out there, Snow,” a wildling protested; a great, heavyset man with a white beard. “And the corpses buried at the bottom of the snow drifts, and scattered across a lake! We couldn’t even find half of them.”

“And how were we supposed to burn so many?” another man complained. “The trees are frozen solid.”

Jon glared. “I told you to burn them or hack them – that was your priority. Destroy the bodies.”

“We did our job. We made progress; like you said, hack the bodies apart,” the wildling retorted. “But there were a lot of bodies and it was bloody hard work. We couldn't get through them quickly, not in this bloody weather.”

The bodies? Bran thought with confusion. The men looked on edge, uneasy. The battle was said to have been ten days ago, and the snows hadn't ceased. The battlefield was strewn all across the lake two leagues away, all the way up to Winterfell's gates, Sansa had told him.

“It was our patrols that found them missing,” the scout explained, voice quivering. “We had charnel trenches that we were filling up, and then they just vanished. Along with every man on guard duty.”

The bodies vanished? The men looked nervous, and Bran caught the glances between them. He saw Jon suddenly turn stiff, his hands clenching.

“We had fifteen thousand or so corpses to burn,” the other wildling said. “We were doing hundreds a day, but we never got through a quarter of them.”

He took a deep breath. “How many?” Jon demanded. “How many corpses are missing?”

They looked hesitant, glancing at each other. “All of them, Your Grace. They’re all gone.”

Author Notes:

Well, hope everyone had a nice Christmas. I'm planning to upload these next few chapters
Also, because I’ve seen a few reviews that have spectacularly missed the point, so just to make it clear; the reason that Jon has faced all of these problems is because of all the wildlings beneath him. More broadly, it's because of the circumstances of this war.

Let's suppose that all the way back in chapter 10 or something, what if Jon decided not to approach the free folk, and he chose not to unite all of the clans around the dragon. Rather, he could have headed straight for the Wall. In that situation, maybe Jon found his own way to get back south of the Wall with Sonagon - and after that Jon would have received a much less suspicious welcome from the north. Jon might have set about the exact same actions - fighting against the Boltons, declaring for House Stark, bringing the dragon into the war - and in that case he wouldn't have been treated the same way.

Even with a dragon, the politics of war is important - and politics is all image. Jon might have been viewed as a lost son fighting for justice, people might have cheered for the dragon instead of cowered, he could have built a nobler reputation, and then it wouldn't have been so easy for the Boltons to work their smear campaign.

But instead, he came south with the free folk behind him, and Jon became viewed as the Bastard King. That is not a good reputation.

To the realm, Jon wasn't fighting for northern interests, he was leading an invasion against them. He wasn’t a saviour, he was a huge threat. The north responded in the exact same way that they have always done to King-Beyond-the-Walls and wildling invasions; fear, then anger, followed by a determined campaign to break the invaders.

To be honest, that's not even an unreasonable response. The free folk are full of people like the Weeper or the Lord of Bones that have ensured they deserve their reputation. They come south and their first instincts, the instincts of their culture, is to start pillaging. Jon may have been trying to change the wildling traditions of raping and raiding, but he hasn't completely succeeded. It's not possible to completely succeed, there's too much cultural inertia behind it. Asking wildlings to stop raiding is like asking British people to abandon their cups of tea, or Americans to give up their guns - even in the face of literal doomsday, they didn't want to do it.

The northmen were very much justified in wanting all of these savage killers off their lands, and Jon soaked up all of that bad reputation himself.

But, thanks to the presence of the dragon, many of those disgruntled and angry northmen cowered to Jon - but loyalty through fear is not the same as loyalty.

People were too scared to oppose him, yet instead you had a large portion of 'allies' who started half-assing their contributions to Jon's campaign, and another wave that set about trying to discreetly sabotage him. Allies were only alongside the wildlings because they didn’t feel they had a choice, the saboteurs had a field day. The Battle of the Snows was the culmination of all of those efforts.

Roose Bolton saw the weakness in Jon's army that Jon never noticed, and he shoved a dagger in. Just like Jon did in canon regarding the Castle Black assassination that was brewing, Jon became too distracted with what was ahead of him that he didn't look behind.

So then, was Jon wrong in allying with the free folk the way that he did? Did he waste his time with the wildlings? Well, perhaps. It has certainly made a lot of trouble for him - but on the other hand, if Jon hadn't have brought the wildlings south, then the Other's army would have become that much larger. The Wall would be less secure, and there would have been a whole other set of problems for him to face.

That's part of the point that I wanted to emphasize - there's no 'ideal' solution. The situation was far too complex and too messy for there to be a perfect way through it.

Take the Scouring of the Twins, for example. That was a very good military move by Jon, it has had huge benefits. After Jon destroyed the Twins, he scared off every other realm from intervening directly in the north's war. All of those people that would have otherwise moved to stop the dragon suddenly backed off and tried to keep their distance. The Boltons lost their strongest ally; the south tried to cut ties. It was only because Jon destroyed Twins that he managed to form the north collation, and make the alliance with White Harbour.

But the disadvantages to it were the moral repercussions. Tactically, destroying the Twins was a good move, but Jon is not a sociopath; he can't watch a whole bunch of people dying and not feel guilt. Jon saw a lot of collateral at the Twins, and that seriously disturbed him - and afterwards he started taking steps to avoid doing such again. If it had been Tywin Lannister in the same situation, then there wouldn't have been the freakout afterwards; Tywin would have destroyed the Twins and a whole bunch of other castles and not felt a thing.

Unfortunately, there's a reason why all of the Tywin Lannisters and Roose Boltons of the world tend to be successful; men without restraint have a distinct advantage over men that do (at least in the short term).

That's the lesson that Roose Bolton taught Jon. Whether or not it's a good lesson is very debatable.

There's no 'good' choice there, no flawless leader whose actions lead to the best result every single time. You can compare and contrast to Aegon in this story, who has done pretty well for himself - but that's only because Aegon has made absolutely zero actual decisions of his own. Aegon has relied very much on all of the people around him dealing with stuff for him, while Aegon's hands and conscience remain clean - even despite all of the heinous acts that have unknowingly been done in his name, all those murders and atrocities which were very much required to get Aegon to where he is.

And, at the other side of the spectrum, there's Euron, who has no conscience whatsoever. Jon's smoothest and easiest victory would have been if Jon had followed suit and copied Euron's approach to war. That has been explicitly laid out in the story.

There's no perfect action; there are only different consequences and how to deal with them.

Also, very, very special thanks to reader Achrmy, who commissioned this amazing piece of fanart for the story. Kudos as well to artist Ed Mattinian; there's been a few reviews asking for more descriptions of Sonagon and the size of the dragon, and I think this piece of art really nails it. Much appreciated.

It's been placed as the image on the first chapter of this story, and on the TvTropes page for Dragons of Ice and Fire.
Chapter 44

Chapter Summary

The prelude to the Battle of Ice and Fire...

Ramsay

The butcher’s blade hacked down through her furs, straight through the bitch’s shoulder and down into her chest. He felt the squelch of flesh and skin splitting jar his grip. Like skinning the fur off a dog. She didn’t scream, there was no sound except a strained gasp.

And then, a heartbeat away from ripping open her ribcage, Ramsay froze. His lunge stopped, his sword embedded in her chest, and bloody grin flashed over his face. It would be too quick, Ramsay thought suddenly, hands jolting to a halt. Cutting out her heart would be too quick.

Ramsay wanted her to die slowly. He wanted to watch the metal edge slicing into her chest, he wanted to hear the blood hissing, wanted to see the red pluming over white. The wildling bitch was wide-eyed and fearful, her body squirming beneath his, his sword piercing downwards…

There was that beautiful moment when she was falling, and she realised she was going to die. He wanted that moment to last forever. Ramsay loved that moment; he loved savouring the look in their eyes.

And then her knuckles tightened around her blade. Even before Ramsay could retract his lunge, the wildling’s sword slashed upwards, straight into Ramsay’s stomach.

The world went dead.

There was no pain, not at first. There was nothing but faint confusion, a blunt shock. It didn’t feel like a knife, it felt more like a hard punch to his gut. Huh, Ramsay thought dumbly. They’ve never done that before.

His eyes looked downwards, and he saw his own intestines pouring out of his stomach. He saw the short blade skewering straight through him.

“Oh.”

That was when he felt the pain. He tried to thrash, but all his blood and guts were splashing out of him. Ramsay could only spasm, his limbs thrashing…

Ramsay fell backwards in the snow, feeling all warmth fizzle away. Faintly, in the distance, someone was yelling. He felt the pain, he felt his body howling and spasming and dying.

It’s not fair! Ramsay could have screamed. It’s not fair – I was so close. I was so close to seeing her die! He really, really wanted to see her eyes as she died.

His vision went black. No, I can’t die like this. The Bastard King… I was so close…

It was so hard to think. His thoughts were blurry, turning numb and fading away. He couldn’t concentrate, he couldn’t…

All feeling bled out of him, his life draining away along with his guts. Ramsay felt himself hitting the ice. Ramsay felt himself bleeding out of his own body, and into the abyss.

It was all dark, and empty.

And he kept on falling. Falling all the way, breaking through the earth. There was no light, no sound, only the numbest of feelings – a tingling on a phantom limb.

He tumbled into the nothingness, and then he landed. Landed in dark water. Everything went cold and black. So cold he couldn’t even feel it. All light vanished and there was nothing. He felt the splash as he broke through the veil.

He was naked. No, not only naked, he was nothing.

He had no arms or legs, he had no body to squirm with. He couldn’t fight, he couldn’t resist. He felt like nothing but a blob, a lump of nothingness oozing away in the current.

He had no limbs, no skin, no eyes. He felt exposed, turned inside out. Like a flayed man drowning in ice cold water.

Oh, Ramsay thought dumbly. I’m dead.

It was so… so… unfortunate. He hadn’t expected the wildling bitch to stab upwards like that. Ramsay wanted to scream, wanted to rage, but everything felt stiff. Cold. So hard to feel anything. Is this what death is like?

He had heard that in the south they preached of seven hells, but Ramsay had never given the afterlife much thought. Ramsay had never really believed that death was possible, not for him. It didn’t make any sense; how could he just die?

He was in a river. It felt like a river, at least – but with no eyes and no skin it was hard to tell. He felt submerged. He could feel the current around him, he could feel the sensation of movement of dragging him away. It felt like he was bobbing along on a slow and steady stream, drifting away into nothingness.

There were other presences around him. Ramsay could sense them, even without eyes or ears. He couldn’t explain it, but he knew they were there. All of them were dead people – friends and foes alike – slipping away down the river.

He felt the shiver in the water each time another person splashed down. Up above, they were still dying, so many dead men tumbling downwards in a great gush of death.

He tried to thrash, but he could do nothing. If he had a body, his heart would have been racing and his limbs thrashing, he would have been screaming and cursing. But Ramsay had nothing, he was nothing.

Nothing but blind and hollow beings, floating away. A river of dead souls, oozing at a snail’s pace. It was a slow current, painfully slow. Perhaps the river was jammed by the blockage of all those dead people.

This is how I die? Ramsay thought, with the phantom sensation of panic. Just… disappear into the Ramsay had stared down a dragon without fear. He had laughed as he stood against an army. Ramsay didn’t feel fear, fear was for other people – but that thought… the thought of just disappearing was the first truly terrifying thing that he ever encountered.

_I was so close, so close…_

He wanted to cling on, he wanted to rage and thrash…

_I can’t die. I can’t…_

That moment of helplessness… it felt like he was back in the cottage, watching his mother pick up a knife. Ramsay was reliving those memories, those moments of utter helplessness. He had been helpless once, and he vowed never to be helpless again. Never to be trapped, never to be weak…

_Fight. Need to fight. Need to scream. Need to claw my way back, need to claw out their throats._

_Can’t die yet. I’ve got so many left to kill._

He couldn't fight it. It was too big to fight. He was nothing but an ant caught in a flood.

Then, he felt the current shudder. He felt cold. He felt a tingle down his phantom spine. He felt the cold pluming over the river, sharp thorns of ice spreading outwards. The river of death was being frozen, dammed by the ice.

It was freezing. The river was being frozen, and all the souls around him were left hovering in icy stasis.

He could feel the souls all around him, coming to a halt as the icy tendrils took hold. The cold seized him, dragging him backwards…

His whole being trembled, frosty daggers piercing phantom skin, like it was pulling him inside out. There was an agony that pierced down to his very core.

The image of a bright, blue sun seared against his soul. He shuddered, and the fire was so cold it burned.

Light. He saw light again. Ramsay might have gagged, but he couldn’t feel his throat.

Everything was dazed, blurred. The wind howled around him, he could hear ice crackling. He saw the faint blaze of torches, clouded through the slurry of snow. He heard hissing wind, and there was sounds, movement. Sounds of lumbering shapes, of bodies breaking through the ice.

Ramsay's numb body jerked into motion, his limbs scrambling to pull himself from the bottom of a deep drift of snow. He saw the moon above, like a bulbous, bloody dagger hovering in the sky.

His body was convulsing, he couldn’t control it. He couldn’t even feel it. The pain was agonising, an inhuman pain like nothing he had ever imagined.

Ramsay shuddered, and then suddenly he saw the light.
There were two pinpricks of light, gleaming in the dark. Two blue eyes were staring down at him. Ramsay felt the cold reach his soul.

The world changed. Everything turned blue. His vision shot into focus, all the colours blending into a bluish tint. There was no more pain, no more panic.

Ramsay's body lurched upwards, clawing itself out the snow, but Ramsay could hardly feel it. Everything felt… muted. Everything that was once so bright and so sharp now felt numb.

He could see in the night, as clearly as if it were the bright of day. Everything was glowing blue, shining so bright it was stunning. The whole world looked surreal, frozen and picturesque in the snows.

Above him, the sky was on fire – blue shimmering lights flashing before the stars. The northern lights flowed and glimmered in the night’s sky above him. Ramsay would have gaped, but he couldn’t move his jaw.

All around him, he saw the bodies climbing out of the snow.

Ramsay's stomach was wide open, his guts spilling out, but he couldn't feel pain. Curls of frozen intestines were left dangling from his stomach. His body was frozen so solid that his joints creaked every time his limbs moved. It should have hurt, but Ramsay couldn't feel it. He felt like a passenger in his own skin. He couldn't move, he couldn't even twitch, he couldn't scream.

The snow was so thick that he had to scramble to get on top of it. His limbs felt stiff and cumbersome, his arms and legs starting as if they a mind of their own.

He couldn't feel anything; there was nothing in the world but cold and eerie invisible blue light.

What happened to me? Ramsay thought with numb horror. I was dying, I felt it. But then... it was like something scooped me out of the abyss and forced me into my skin.

Hoarfrost clung to his skin, he could see ice creeping over his eyes. My body is dead, but I’m still here. He didn’t know how, he didn’t understand why.

He saw them. He saw the other body moving upwards, their skin slick with frost. There were dozens of them, hundreds, thousands, staggering up from the snow, one by one. Some had missing limbs, even missing heads, but they still moved. It was the dead of night, but the frozen lake was squirming.

And Ramsay could see their souls; he could see the souls of the dead, trapped in their frozen prisons of flesh.

He stared forward numbly, and two of them he recognised. He saw Watt and Lems – two of his own Bastard’s Boys, staggering up from the ice. They were dead, one from the wildling king’s blade, the other from the dragon. Ramsay tried to call out to them, but he couldn't. They both staggered past him, their eyes unfocused.

It was like all of the others were blind, but Ramsay could still see. He didn't know how, but he wasn't looking through his normal eyes. Ramsay couldn’t explain it, but it was like he could see more than just the physical, like he was looking out of another eye.

He didn't understand anything; he felt weak, useless.

The thought of the Bastard King flashed before his eyes. He remembered his mother, his father, his brother… everybody who made him…

I need to move. Need to move. Need to hunt. Hounds and sheep. Remember what you are. Remember the rage.

He could feel the fire, the emotion, burning against the cold. He could feel the flames trying to ignite even in the dead, cold husk of his body. He was trapped in his skin, feeling his memories rage all around him. It was torture; like burning to death in ice.

If Ramsay had a mouth, he would have screamed.

Move. I need to move. This is my body, mine, I need to….

Ramsay focused with every fibre of his being, every ounce of rage he could muster… and he felt his own dead fingers twitch.

The raw exhaustion required almost sent him to his knees. It took everything he had to fight the cold, just to move his dead muscles. Just to make his fingers twitch of his own volition.

‘You are aware,’ a voice said suddenly, cutting down to his soul. ‘How strange.’

The voice wasn't speaking the Common Tongue, but Ramsay could still understand it. Ramsay shuddered.

He saw it. Ramsay’s necked twisted up robotically, his body bowing unwillingly. He stood before a god. A being of pure, brilliant blue light.

It stood like a statue, perhaps some sculpture made by a master carver. Its skin was as slick as ice, but it was shining – it was radiating energy, so much power than the air seemed to crackle around it. When it moved, the world twisted, it’s every motion unnaturally graceful. It was glorious and terrifying, cruel and beautiful. A god of ice.

And there was something of mild amusement on its shining face. Beneath all the ice, Ramsay saw a figure like a young boy with bright white hair staring back at him. He could have been a young man, but he was frozen in body of ice. Immortalised.

The Other cocked its head, and Ramsay’s body lurched upwards to face it. It prowled, pacing around him. It walked across the snow without leaving a footprint, but there was a slight lurch in its step.

It’s doing something, Ramsay realised with a flush of rage. It’s controlling my body.

‘You can see, can’t you?’ the Other mused. ‘All of these,’ with a lazy motion, it flickered at all of the other shambling bodies, ‘they are all as good as blind, but you’ve still got some vision. You can see me.’

It stepped closer, inspecting him like one would a curious insect. Its voice was so soft, almost singsong. ‘And you are angry. Angry, is that the right word?’ the Other noted curiously, cocking its head to the other side. ‘That’s rare, but it happens occasionally. For some, the emotions don’t quite die, they try to hang on to them.’

Ramsay couldn't move his mouth, couldn’t respond.

‘Tell me,’ it sounded genuinely puzzled, ‘why do you refuse to let go of that hate?’
Because it's all I am. The hate is all I have.

‘Ah.’ The Other nodded. ‘But isn’t that miserable? That’s what confuses me, you see – wouldn’t you be more content without it all?’

Ramsay stared in horror. His jaw was frozen shut, but the Other still responded. It can read my head. It's in my head. His whole body might have recoiled, but the Other was controlling him, inside and out. No, no, no! Ramsay wanted to scream. They’re my thoughts, my body, my hate! You don’t get to touch them!

‘I see.’ The Other paused, and then seemed to shrug. It makes no difference, regardless. Believe whatever you wish. The fire will die, sooner or later. Come now, thrall, your new life awaits.

Ramsay’s body lurched. His legs jolted into motion, every step jerking. The Other moved so gracefully, but Ramsay’s body was jerking.

You are now immortal, free from pain and time. In return, we expect only your skin,’ The Other stepped forward, turning to stare around frozen lake. ‘A small price to pay for eternity – this is a gift.’

The only gift I want is a dagger. You can’t do this, you can't control me like this…

The air was alive. He saw the bright blue light shimmering in the sky – waves of energy pulsating through the night. The storm was howling, but Ramsay couldn’t feel it. The only thing he could feel was the energy vibrating from the Other, a power that seemed to chime in the air.

Like singing. It felt like the cold was singing, a song for the snows.

‘Come now,’ it ordered, and the corpses started to trundle forward through the snow. ‘Our task awaits. My brothers are calling for me.’

Visions flashed before Ramsay’s eyes. Commands, orders pushed straight into his head. Ramsay saw a vision of the Wall, and of the cold simmering on the other side of it. Why? What? How?

The dead were already moving, but the Other lingered. The dead men were heading north. The Other only paced idly across the lake, looking around as more and more rose from the snow. Its every movement was graceful and smooth, like a cat.

The air was so cold that pine trees cracked open. The winds were howling, the snows so fierce they could cleave skin. It was weather that no living man could survive in. And yet, still, Ramsay barely even noticed. He felt nothing.

‘You,’ the Other said, looking towards Ramsay again. He felt icy fingers pushing through his mind. ‘You know the route. Tell me of it.’

I don’t… I don’t want to help you, I don’t want to do this…

The Other only tutted, and invisible hands reached into Ramsay’s skull.

Images flashed. He visualised forests, roads, the goat tracks. All of the paths that Ramsay used to roam, all of the hunting trails. The Other was looking through his memories, stealing it. It’s stealing my memories, Ramsay realised in horror. Stealing my body. No… you can’t… stop…

The Other didn’t even seem to notice his struggles.
At an unspoken command, the wights changed direction slightly. Ramsay had hunted through the wolfswood and the northern mountains all his life. Ramsay knew the wilderness better than most, he knew all the secret roads. The Other was using that information to command his soldiers via unspoken orders.

The Other need only will it, and the dead obeyed. They couldn’t do anything but.

And all the while it pushed deeper into Ramsay’s head.

The memory of the dragon flashed before his eyes. The great white monster were memories of awe and envy in Ramsay’s head, but the Other seemed to scoff. ‘The beast is but a relic,’ the Other said, ‘it is a fragment of fire tempered by the ice. The ‘dragon’ is no threat, merely an inconvenience.’

No, the dragon can hurt you, Ramsay thought. It might torch your army from the air. The dead cannot stop it in the skies.

The Other seemed to agree. With an unspoken command, the wights started to scatter into smaller groups – taking shelter in the snowstorm and the trees. They were staying dispersed and spread out, so the dragon wouldn’t be so effective. ‘Like I said, an inconvenience. Show me more.’

More images flashed. Everything that Ramsay had learnt of the dragon’s hunting patterns, its behaviour, its flight. The memories of the greyscale poison Ramsay had used floated before the Other’s cold gaze. The Other seemed interested.

And then Ramsay remembered Jon Snow. The Bastard King. Those were memories of pure hatred and jealousy. I wanted to own him, Ramsay thought, I wanted to destroy him. I nearly did.

‘I know of that one,’ the Other noted, lingering on the memory of the Bastard. ‘He slew one of my brothers with a cursed blade. But it matters not, we are more than our bodies.’ Its voice was patronising. ‘And Death is naught but an illusion.’

Tactics, numbers, routes. Everything that Ramsay knew of Snow’s army, its strengths and its weaknesses. The garrison at Castle Black, their fortifications, their watchtowers. Ramsay had spent so long inspecting them himself, plotting his own campaign. The Other seemed to have use for that intelligence too.

You’re heading north, Ramsay realised. You are heading for the Wall.

‘We are. The ‘Wall’ has stood for too long – it is another inconvenience. It must fall.’

The Other took it all from Ramsay's head. Ramsay didn't want to help it, but there was no choice. He couldn’t fight back, he had nothing to fight. It was like the Other was a part of him now. It’s in my skin, Ramsay realised. It's possessing my dead flesh.

All of the old legends that Ramsay was once told came back to him. The white walkers. The Long Night. The cold winds rising, and the Last Hero.

After a few long moments, the Other stepped backwards and nodded. ‘Thank you, you have been most useful,’ the Other said. ‘Still, I wonder, can you answer a question of my own…’

Ramsay’s body just stared, unable to twitch. The Other cocked its head again. ‘Why do you fight? Even now, I feel you trying to resist, and I just don’t understand…’ Even beneath its inhuman gaze, the frozen young boy looked confused. ‘Why struggle? I have been so wondering about that myself, unable to make sense of it. Just… why?’
You want to destroy us. We fight for what we are. Hounds and sheep.

‘Destroy?’ It even seemed appalled by the suggestion. ‘Never. Ice is preservation, fire is destruction. We do not wish to destroy.’

You’re going to kill us. Turn us into slaves. That is destroy.

‘No. It is not. Kill. Why would we bother ‘killing’ you?’ Its aura shimmered and crackled, and Ramsay slowly realised that was laughter. That was how it laughed. ‘You are brief, you would kill yourselves. We do not care – what does the winter care for the candle?’

Ramsay could see its intentions, clear as day. It was focusing on Castle Black, and the Shadow Tower, and there were thousands of dead men under its command. It was going to march north and kill everyone on the Wall. It wanted to open the gates, to let them all through. How many Others are there?

He saw blurred shadows, visions of an army. This Other was the vanguard, the forward unit, the one that managed to slip south before all the rest. It had pushed its way through the Wall, in an attempt to clear the path for its brothers. It has done the same that I did. The Other had lingered behind enemy lines, as it waited for an opportunity. It saw a chance and it took it.

A tremble past down his phantom spine. For so long, Ramsay had believed himself to be the ultimate predator, the most dangerous of them all. Ramsay had wanted to be the hound, not the meat.

The Other stepped forward, looking at him quizzically. ‘If we wished to ‘kill’ you,’ it explained, ‘we would have done so eons ago. Instead, we even built a wall so you might live and die all by yourselves.’

There was nothing but confusion. Ramsay froze, trying to understand. Built a… Built a wall? You built the Wall.

‘Of course.’ Its voice was confused, as it looked through his memories once more. Images of the Wall flashed before his dead eyes. ‘Did you really think that mortals built something like that yourselves?’

That didn’t make sense. Bran the Builder raised the Wall, or so the legends said. Why would you build something and then step behind it?

‘You mortals became… irritable to us.’ It shrugged. ‘So we built a wall to keep you out.’

Keep us out? Keep us out? All around him, the dead were still walking and the storm howled, but Ramsay was frozen in the spot. The Other kept him still, trying to fulfil its own idle curiosity.

‘I was mortal once,’ it said conversationally. ‘All my brothers were too. I regard that time as the most unfortunate of my existence, I am glad that my briefness is over. I am content with the form they gave me, and I do wish to spread it. But we are moulded from human flesh, there can be no… what do you call us? There is a name you apply?’ Icy fingers pressed downwards. ‘Ah, there can be no ‘white walker’ without human. We have no reason to want to end all mortals – why would we destroy what we’re created from?’

It was human once? As if to demonstrate, the white walker pushed a memory before Ramsay’s eyes. The scene was vivid and yet blurred. He saw a vision of a little babe, left out in a snowy forest. The baby was sacrificed, and then shadows emerged from the dark trees to collect it. A ceremony, a payment, a tithe. Then why… why destroy the Wall now?
'It's time has passed.' The Other shook its head. ‘We were quite comfortable with the agreement we came to, but our king is insistent. There can be no pact this time.’

I don’t understand.

‘I told you,’ it chided, ‘Ice is preservation, immortality, and fire is destruction. The fires are rising again, and soon this whole world may be set ablaze. You broke the balance, and so we must set forth to counter it. We must bring order again.’

Fires. Ramsay felt visions… no, more like feelings. He felt the Other showing him something; he felt blistering heart and scalding cold. A heart of fire and a heart of cold, resting and simmering at opposite ends of the world.

‘If not for us, this earth might be set aflame,’ the Other said softly. ‘Our king has set us forth to preserve all before it turns to ash. We are here to save the world.’

Ramsay could only stare blankly.

The Other looked down upon at him sympathetically. ‘Do not worry if you do not understand, thrall. Your understanding is not required. For now, I require only your flesh. It is time to move.’

With a dismissive shake of its head, the Other turned and glided away. Ramsay felt the commands pierce into his skin, his legs pushed into motion.

Ramsay tried to object. He tried to fight. But his body lurched, his limbs moving without his control. He could not scream, could not curse, could not howl. He could do nothing but stare outwards through blue, frozen eyes. His body was dead, his flesh milky pale.

He started to march through the snows; another dead man in an army of thousands.

A prisoner in his own skin, while his own body shambled like a puppet on strings.

Melisandre

The sunrise was beautiful from the towers of High Tide. It was a glorious sight, to see the great flames burning over the horizon. The narrow sea itself glowed red like blood. The winds hissed with the waves, the smell of salt thick in the air, and sky shone such vibrant, passionate crimson. It was a moment of power, that brief time in the morn where the whole world could witness the glory of R'hllor.

Her red dress rippled, her hair flew free behind her, and the Red Woman shone like a torch in the morning.

_Melony, Lot Seven_, a faint voice echoed to her. Her hand twitched, moving to touch the ruby on her neck. The ruby was already overfilled, but even now it was soaking up a bit more power from the sunrise. It was burning so hot it might have scorched her flesh, but the pain helped to focus her. Even now, even as she stood in the light, she could feel those dark memories of her time beneath the shadow. “Never again,” she whispered to the wind.

All around her, the isle of Driftmark was alive and frantic in the morn.

The steps of the castle were rough and warped, stained black from dragonfire over a hundred years ago. Once, High Tide had been the crowning jewel of House Velaryon, the castle raised by the Sea Snake himself, a monument to house all of the treasures that Corlys Velaryon recovered from the far east. Then, much like House Velaryon itself, a once proud structure had been destroyed and fell into ruin.

During the Dance of the Dragons, House Velaryon supported the blacks, and the greens had torched High Tide from dragonback. The towers had melted, the keep was set ablaze, and the treasures ransacked or destroyed – and the Driftwood Throne itself burnt into ash. Still, at the war’s end, enough of the castle survived to be habitable, and other parts were repaired piece by piece, but the wealth was well and truly lost. High Tide was left mutilated and scarred, and House Velaryon never had the coin again to restore it. The Velaryons had instead retreated back to their old and damp ancient castle of Driftmark, and they carved a replica throne to try and replace the seat that was lost.

All around her, the ancient ruins were being looted and pillaged for all they were worth once more. This will be the end of House Velaryon, Melisandre thought with a sigh. It was a pity that she had to finish what the dragons started, a century and a half ago.

So far as she knew, the only scion of House Velaryon remaining was a single bastard turned pirate, last seen haunting the inlets of Lorath.

Beneath her, the castle of High Tide was screaming. Melisandre took a deep breath, glancing downwards at the scuffle breaking out on the grounds.

“All your father did was serve Stannis,” Ser Narbert Grandison growled, dragging the boy away. “You betrayed your House!”

“Don’t do this!” a young boy wept, his silver hair patchy with blood. The men were not gentle as they dragged him away, his fingers clawing at the sand. “You can’t do this… you can’t… I serve Stannis… my father died for Stannis!”

Monterys Velaryon was a young boy of eight, and the last scion of his house. He was a slender child with wide eyes and fair cheeks, and the distinctive silver hair of his ancestors. Melisandre’s eyes narrowed as she watched Ser Narbert Grandison and Malegorn of Redpool drag the boy away. She might have cursed.

“Gentle. I ordered them to be gentle.”

Young Lord Monterys was still screaming, while Ser Narbert grabbed him by heels and dragged. “My father fought for Stannis,” Monterys wept. “… he died for Stannis!”

“‘Aye,’” Ser Malegorn agreed. “Lord Monford was a good and true man. And then you betrayed his memory.”

With that, the knight’s boot slammed into the child’s stomach. Melisandre winced quietly, pacing faster down the steps. “You bent the knee to the usurpers!” the knight growled, kicking the boy again. “Your father gave his life on the Blackwater, and then you surrendered to wicked–”

“Ser Malegorn!” Melisandre snapped, as she swept across the courtyard. “Restrain yourself, ser.”

Monterys was gagging, unable to speak. The knight looked abashed. “My lady…!”

“I gave you a task, did I not?” Melisandre barked, feeling a spark of anger flare. “Such brutality is not what I commanded.”

Ser Malegorn lowered his head, dropping to a knee. On the floor, Monterys Velaryon was wheezing, coughing blood. “Forgive me, my lady,” the knight said, pale-faced. “But… the boy’s weakness, his dishonour… it makes me sick.”
“He is but a boy. He does not see the path.”

Others were being dragged out of ruins as well. Melisandre saw serving women, boys and grey-haired men struggling against the king’s men. Some tried to resist, but the knights were ruthless. Imprison all that you can, their king had ordered, and put any who defy to the sword.

House Velaryon had tried to resist their duty. After the Blackwater, young Lord Monterys and his shrew of a mother had bent the knee to King’s Landing. Even when Stannis returned to Dragonstone, they did not embrace their former lord and true king. Stannis had given them a chance to return to his trust, but they chose treachery and cowardice instead.

The king’s men had torched Driftmark Castle. As the battle around King’s Landing distracted the crown, the Redwyne fleet and their blockade retreated, and Stannis’ navy was left free to start the offensive once more.

Driftmark Castle had been the first to fall – their depleted guard did not stand a chance against Stannis’ hardened forces. The king ordered that the castle would be given to the flame, set alight as funeral pyre for all those traitors. It had been a beautiful sight.

As Driftmark fell, the young lord tried to flee and hide in the ruins of High Tide, but Melisandre had tracked him through the fires. Ser Rolland Storm had led the king’s men, but Red Woman herself came herself to ensure there could be no failure.

She knew there would be no danger to her person. There were no fighting men left here, just women, children and old men trying to hide.

Lord Monterys was weeping, crying into the sand and muttering deliriously. Ser Narbert moved to pulled him up, but Melisandre motioned him back. The Red Woman knelt into the sands next to him, one hand on the boy’s shoulders and moving her other hand to her ruby. Calm yourself, child, she willed, and she felt the small flicker of power from her ruby. Not a lot, just the lightest of touch. It bled away a bit of the excess heat from the ruby.

The child’s sobs choked. His eyes widened, his body stiffened. No noise came from him, Monterys did naught but stare and gape.

Melisandre reached across, and cradled his face. “You have a purpose, my child,” she whispered. “A glorious purpose. Go towards that light, do not resist.”

There was no reply. The knights pulled him to his feet – gently – and then clamped him in chains. The boy did not even squirm. Melony, Lot Seven.

Melisandre might have taken a deep breath, but she kept herself stoic. Sometimes, she thought, even such distasteful practices must be employed.

Heavy boots stomped around her. They had brought chains for a hundred prisoners, and every knight carried a set of manacles on their waist. Many were screaming and wailing as they tried to resist, and there wasn’t a fire in the world with enough power for Melisandre to calm them all.

A knight wearing a pure red cloak stepped towards her, scared cheeks showing underneath a grey helm. Ser Rolland Storm, the Bastard of Nightsong, bowed his head to her. “High Tide is subdued, my lady.”

“Good,” Melisandre said with a nod. “Put them all in chains, ensure that no harm to come for them.”
“All of them, my lady?” Ser Rolland hesitated. “We were only after the lord.”

“Valyrian blood must be strong on this island, ser. There are likely distant relations, cousins and bastard sons among them – we need any with the right ancestry,” she countered. “Take them all to Dragonstone, and we will sort out which are useful ones there.”

His scarred face darkened. Many of the other knights were devoted without, but Rolland Storm was more suspicious. He was a loyal soldier to his king, but he had been left at Dragonstone during the campaign north. Ser Rolland had not witnessed the ice dragon. “You said that only one was required to wake the stone dragons,” he noted. “One sacrifice, one boy with king’s blood. Originally, Edric Storm was only one who was to burn.”

“I did,” Melisandre replied coolly, as she brushed her hair backwards and stepped forward, “but the king requires a large dragon, ser. There can be no chance of failure this time, so the sacrifice must be substantial.” She cocked her head, measuring his expression. “It is like any trade – the more you pay, the higher quality the result.”

“And yet one thousand people?” he demanded.

“Yes. One thousand persons of king’s blood, sacrificed together,” Melisandre explained with a light smile, as she turned and walked away. “It is called the Great Rite, ser; a ceremony to raise the Red God and his chosen.”

Ser Rolland didn’t reply, dark eyes staring at her back. The knight had tried to cling onto his seven false idols, but he had recently converted to the True Faith. His loyalty to the Red God was still tenuous, and many of those who lacked conviction still doubted the Great Rite. But it is happening nonetheless, Melisandre told herself, I saw it in my fires.

The very thought put a tremor down her spine with excitement. It will be glorious.

Stannis Baratheon knew now what he must do to forge Lightbringer. He would awaken a weapon of fire through blood. One thousand men and women, all of them with the blood of kings, to be sacrificed to the Dragonmont together.

With one sacrifice I can perform miracles, Melisandre had told her king, but with a thousand I might reshape the world.

Melisandre knew it was the right path. Ever since the king had set his course, her powers had increased dramatically. The Red God rewarded her, granted her the gifts needed to see it done. The Great Rite had come to her in a dream, and she knew now what must be done to ensure the Battle of the Dawn.

One thousand men and women was a steep price, but it was nothing compared to the fate of the world.

Every man under Stannis had sacrificed to see it done. Every night since returning from the north, Melisandre had held a bonfire in the courtyard of Dragonstone, where she showed them all the glory of R’hllor. She showed them the path to divinity, and they gave her devotion.

The Great Rite was the culmination of the goal that they had been working towards for a long time.

One thousand places. They had filled their numbers up quickly, but there was still a long way to go. Many of the houses sworn to Dragonstone – Houses Celtigar, Bar Emmon, Massey and now Velaryon – all had Valyrian ancestry and so their blood was viable. Stannis had set out to reinforce his power over the narrow sea, to rebuild his force and fleet, and to fill Dragonstone’s dungeons Stannis had even sent seven men to Lys, to search out Edric Storm and the men that Lord Seaworth had squirreled him away with.

Many are not the purest bloodlines, Mel admitted. Not the finest sources of king’s blood – some of them only linked way back to the days of a thousand kings in Westeros. For the numbers required, they had to look towards the more tenuous claims to royalty, even searching out smallfolk of dubious ancestry. Still, there were a thousand sacrifices needed, and they were getting closer to that number with every raid, every conversion, every hunting party scouring the land.

The cells of Dragonstone were already overfilled.

Melisandre lingered at High Tide to watch the sunrise a bit longer. The Great Rite will be glorious.

Ser Rolland was left in charge of escorting the prisoners back, but Melisandre rode away with her personal guard, riding over the cliffs of Driftmark across the sandy coast shaggy with ferns and thistles. A cold breeze blew from the west, bringing with it the tang of salt and sulphur. She saw the large galleons docked on the coastline, and the crowned fiery heart on their sails rippling in the wind.

Five ships were waiting for her, their hulls open as the loaded up cargo gathered from towns on Driftmark. So many from the island were being forced onto the ships in lines – their pale blonde hairs glinted in the sunlight, like the links of freshly forged chains snaking into the ship’s holds.

Melisandre saw Lord Axell Florent, the Hand of the King, standing on the beach. The lord was clad in fox fur and heavy russet over his chain mail, sweating in the sunlight. Lord Axell bowed deeply to Melisandre’s approach, his nose nearly touching the sands.

“May His light bless you,” Melisandre nodded. “You came with purpose?”

“I am instructed to escort you back to Dragonstone, Your Eminence.”

Ah. She looked around the ships curiously. “Something has happened.”

“His Grace wishes your council,” Lord Axell explained, before grimacing. “Forgive me, but the king, well, he is… perturbed.”

Stannis wanted to see her, and he was not happy. Melisandre hadn’t known about it, but she just gave a knowing nod as if was all expected. A prophet was not allowed to be surprised. She allowed Lord Axell to take her arm as he escorted her up the gangway.

The other ships lingered on the beach, but Lord Florent’s flagship, the Bountiful Harvest, pulled up its sails, lowered its oars, and set off as soon as she stepped onboard. She watched the sandy beaches and sharp cliffs of Driftmark disappear as the boat rocked with the wind.

Most of their ships were formerly of the Redwyne fleet, Melisandre knew, but they had been captured by Stannis. There had been many frequent skirmishes in the mouth of the Blackwater and the coasts of Dragonstone recently. Stannis had fought half a dozen battles at Dragonstone in as many months.

In their fifth battle at sea, Melisandre had used fire to cloud the Redwyne officer’s minds, to make them unable to respond properly. Their enemy’s command floundered, their discipline broke, and it allowed for Stannis’ weaker forces to capture their galleons with ease.

So much of Stannis’ strength had been rebuilt through Melisandre’s renewed powers. With her aid, they had captured ships, made more and more and conversions. Not even the Redwyne fleet or the Tyrell army had been able to stand against the Red God’s gifts, and in return Stannis gifted more and more to the Red God.

A fair trade. That was all R’hllor asked.

The galleon creaked and groaned in the waves, men scuttling over the rigging and a slow, uncertain drumbeat from the rowers below. The ship lurched, and Lord Axell grimaced.

“Forgive the journey, Your Eminence,” the lord said finally. “Our navigator has been having difficulty… well, the weather throughout the bay has been unstable. Even the tides have been off.”

Melisandre didn’t reply. She stood at the rear of the ship, and her eyes turned to stare towards the west. Usually there would be gulls gliding over these coasts, but all the birds had fled. Melisandre was too far to see the blackened ruins of the city, but dark clouds lingered over the distant horizon. On good days, you could see the blackened walls of the Red Keep.

Occasionally, there were rains of ash sweeping the Blackwater, or localised storms through the bay. Ever since the night of fires in King’s Landing, there had been queer weather for leagues around.

Melisandre’s power was stronger now. After the great fire, she had grown even further. Sometimes, it was so powerful it was suffocating.

She remembered that night with such vivid detail; they had all watched the glow of the fires of the horizon, but Melisandre had felt it. She had felt the roar of the flames, the howl of fires unleashed. It had been like glorious beast coming to life, laughing and trembling with joy and hunger. Fires more glorious than anything she had ever imagined.

_Thousands of men and women burnt in holy flames._ Even from so far away, Melisandre had felt the power searing upwards.

That had been the night when the last of the believers of the Seven on Dragonstone had conceded, and everyone who remained had converted to the Red God. One more time that Melisandre’s powers and prophecies had been proven true.

_We prayed for divine aid, and R’hllor smited the unbelievers with cleansing fire. How could anybody question His will after that?_

Even now, she could feel it on her skin, her body shivering. Even near a fortnight later, that energy lingered; it had left the entire bay charged with power. Mel’s ruby was hot to the touch even when idle, but she barely felt the heat anymore.

It covered her skin like a shadow, a layer of invisible ash across her body. Whenever she closed her eyes, she could feel it, touch it, even hear it crackling around towards her…

“We are here, Your Eminence,” Lord Axell reported suddenly, and the spires of Dragonstone loomed above her. Melisandre blinked, wiping her skin, trying to focus. _How long did I faze out?_

She didn’t let her perturbation show, but the ruby at her throat hummed gently.

_I am growing in strength_, she told herself. It felt like it had during her apprentice years, and she had yet to fully embrace and control it. Sometimes the power felt overwhelming.

It was dusk as she rode up to the grim and great gates of Dragonstone, the twisted black stone shaped like a dragon’s maw. Stakewalls and trenches of old siege lines littered the approach, but the spiked black stone was as impenetrable as ever. A thousand gargoyles glared and sneered at her, while her horse trotted to the gates.

Men from the watchtowers let loose a smoky flare, and she heard the rumble as soldiers started to winch the portcullis and the gates open. The dragon’s throat was growling.

The setting sun felt almost as holy as the rising sun, Melisandre considered. The sunset glowed red behind her, making the black stone of the castle gleam like blood. The carved eyes of dragons glared down at her, their maws open in an unyielding growl. Their eyes were hungry, starving.

“All hail Her Eminence!” Lord Florent boomed. “The Prophet of Light, Lady to our King, High Priestess of the Dawn!”

She held her head high, and rode into the great dragon’s maw. The darkness under the archway loomed.

The shadows bristled before her, a faint susurrus of whispers on the wind. Melisandre pulled up her cloak, and swept forward through the spiked portcullis. The castle was a powerful place, she could feel its energy. It left her skin tingling, tremors running down her spine.

Melony, Lot Seven, the shadows whispered. Melony…

… Please magister, she’s just a girl… Don’t hurt her, don’t hurt…

Melony… Don’t cry Melony… You’re not allowed to cry…

Melisandre tensed. Sometimes, the shadows were quiet and other times they were restless. They could be generous, kind, teasing, mocking or cruel. Sometimes they even liked to remind her from where she came.

They are just shadows. They serve the light. The shadows were the Lord of Light’s imprint, his will upon the earth.

The courtyard was filled with bodies. The men all halted their duties to bow before the red woman, and she shone like a torch before the great castle of grey and black. Each one bore the red heart on their chests.

Ser Richard Horpe was waiting at the front; a hard-faced man bearing a black moth on his red shield. He was clad in black and red armour, with a pure red cloak draping from his shoulders down across the stones. “Your Eminence,” Ser Richard bowed. “May I escort you?”

“You may, Lord Commander.” Melisandre took his arm, with a sweet smile. She could still feel the whisper of the shadows behind her, but she ignored them. Not now.

The knight nodded, tensing. Melisandre could feel the whirling emotions within him when she touched his skin, but he kept his face stoic.

“Tell me, ser,” Melisandre asked. “You spend much time with His Grace. How is he recovering?”

“The king is… restless, Your Eminence,” the knight replied carefully. “Learning to fight with your off-hand is no easy feat; I have spent much time sparring with him. His Grace wishes to hone himself for battle once more.”

“Yet he is devoted?”

“Sleepless, Your Eminence.”

Good. Sleep was for the dead. “And what of his daughter?” She lowered her voice somewhat. “How does the princess fare?”

At that, Ser Richard hesitated. “Princess Shireen is confined to the Sea Dragon Tower,” he replied. “None but that fool of hers are allowed near. I feel that the king has become overly protective of the young princess.”

Now that is not so good. For a few heartbeats, the only sound was the chime of boots on the stone steps. “But he is certain, ser?” Melisandre insisted. “You have seen no doubt within His Grace?”

“None, Your Eminence. King Stannis longs for another battle, to see justice done.” The knight’s hand moved over the burning heart on his chest. “As do I. I failed my king once, but I will never fail him again. When His Grace goes to battle again, I shall be his shield.”

She believed him. Many of Ser Richard’s friends had fallen in battle against the Bastard King, but Ser Richard himself never had the chance to cross swords with the man on the ice. They said that the Champion of Night’s swordsman ship had been flawless, and Ser Richard had pushed himself hard to match.

Lord Commander Richard Horpe was a strong and lean figure with a chiseled jaw and a hooked nose. Once, he might have been a member of the Kingsguard, but the fat king had passed him over to please his traitorous lion queen. Instead, it had been Queen Selyse that named Ser Richard as the first of the Godsguard.

Loyal and devoted soldiers of R’hllor, the Queen Selyse had insisted to the king. Where all others have lost their path, the Godsguard will light the way. They could be your sworn soldiers, Your Grace; faithful warriors sworn to protect the True Faith, and their Champion of the Dawn. The white cloaks have been tainted, their order disgraced, so we must form a new one. Let the Godsguard wear red cloaks instead.

Stannis had taken slowly to the idea, but Melisandre encouraged it. The Godsguard were named as the protectors of both the Lord of Light and the King.

They had chosen Stannis’ Godsguard from only the most devout of their knights. There were ten places on the Godsguard to fill – ten was a holy number to Red God, as opposed to the seven of false idols. Ser Richard had fought vehemently for the honour of being the first. Ser Richard had even killed one opponent, Ser Morgarth Follard, in the mock trials that they hosted in the castle; while besting Ser Lambert, Ser Perkin, Ser Malegorn, Ser Narbert and Ser Corliss, and then fighting Ser Rolland Storm to a standstill in the finals.

Ser Richard was a man of longing, Melisandre thought. He longed for glory, he longed for blood, and he longed for another chance to fight the Bastard King. The battle at Hardhome had set off a fire within him, a fire that she had been sure to cultivate.

They walked towards the sharp black spire of the Stone Drum, and into the great black cavern of stone. The tower rumbled slightly in the wind, she could feel the black stone vibrating, and wind whistled through all the twisted statues and archaic corridors. He led her by the arm towards a great spiral staircase shaped into a twisted wyrm, an immense serpent coiled through the keep.
The walls were so thick that they might have been underground. She felt candles flicker around her as she passed, and she felt the hiss of the flames. The fires were hungry today, demanding; the invisible shadows were trying to call her attention.

There was a crackle of flames behind them, and Ser Richard flinched.

“Are you scared, ser?” Melisandre asked curiously, and the knight’s jaw clenched. “Do you ever feel scared at the thought of the wars to come?”

“The night is dark and full of terrors, Your Eminence,” Richard replied dutifully. “But none can daunt me as I carry the fire of R'hllor. I will not freeze.”

She smiled softly.

They arrived at the Chamber of Painted Table, on the top floor of the tower. It was a great round room filled with four tall windows overlooking north, south, east and west, and bare black walls. The ceiling was high and spired, with gargoyles lingering in the edges of the archways. From the chamber, they could see the bonfires across Dragonstone; alight like glorious stars in a black sky.

Queen Selyse was waiting for her at the top of the staircase. The queen nodded to Ser Richard, and then bowed deeply before Melisandre. Selyse wore rubies in her hair, and a great ermine cloak shaped like a heart around her shoulders.

“Your Eminence,” the queen gushed. “May His light shine upon you.”

“Your Grace. May His will clear the path.”

The painted table filled the centre of the room, sitting before the raised throne at the centre of Dragonstone. The map of Westeros was filthy; smeared and painted to mark the different factions. Stannis had wanted to visualise their progress. They had spread salt and grit to mark Euron Greyjoy’s territory, rust and metal cuttings to mark Aegon Targaryen’s conquest, and then sheep’s blood across the Bastard’s King campaign. The north was smeared red from the Neck upwards; the Reach, Oldtown and western coast was doused in salt; and across King’s Landing and the east there was a trail of metal scrap.

Westeros had been conquered by three kings, all the while Stannis was trapped on an island off the edge of the map.

Melisandre walked before the throne, lowering her head. The chamber turned quiet. The king had taken to staring at the painted table constantly, to remind himself of the kingdom that he had lost. Stannis didn’t sleep, he hardly ate; his face was so gaunt that it looked like skin draped across a skull.

And yet he hadn’t been idle. Stannis had spent every waking moment exercising, training or plotting. He had taken to sparring with his Godsguard, or marching his troops in regular drills through the castle. No weakness, no slack.

Stannis looked like a harder man, darker features like carved from iron. A Valyrian steel axe hung on his hip, and he had taken a curved steel hook on the stump of his right wrist. The smith had offered to forge him a fake hand, but Stannis refused. I will not pretend, Stannis had commanded. Give me a hook, not a hand.

The Valyrian axe was Harridan’s Claw, the ancestral weapon of House Celtigar that had been looted from Claw Island. It was a hooked blade of Valyrian steel, extravagantly forged like a crab’s hook with a wide pommel.
It was the weapon that had supposedly slayed the giant sea crab Harridan that had terrorised the narrow sea in the Age of Heroes. The founder of House Celtigar, Celt the Wanderer, was said to have been a Valyrian exile swallowed whole by the monster, who used the axe to hack through the giant crab’s shell from the inside. The tale went that Celt was raised as a king for his feat; he built his castle upon the crab’s corpse, a land that later became Claw Island. In other tales, Harridan had been a foul-tempered dragon, or a giant fish, but they all agreed that Harridan’s Claw had been its bane.

Stannis might have sold Harridan’s Claw away as he had the other treasures of Claw Island, but Melisandre encouraged that he take it from himself. A king needs a weapon, she had said. Ser Richard had agreed; _an axe is a good weapon to learn to use in your off-hand_, the knight had argued, _it requires only simple movements, and yet strong enough to break a man’s defence_. A good weapon for a one-handed man, and Valyrian steel had no equal.

So far, the only enemy that Stannis had used it on had been one Desmond Redwyne, the captain of a captured galley who had been executed on deck during the third battle of Dragonstone.

Melisandre looked discreetly through the room. The chambers were still and empty. The king sat tense, and quiet, shoulders slumped in his throne. “What happens, Your Grace?” she asked finally.

“You once foretold that fate comes in threes, Your Eminence,” Queen Selyse intoned. “We have received three letters.”

There were a bundle of parchments lying on Stannis’ lap. In his gauntleted hand, the king was re-reading a gilded pale parchment with a red seal. “Ah,” Melisandre said cautiously. “The mummer’s dragon?”

The king held up a golden letter, his hand clenching into a fist. “The fake king sends an envoy,” Stannis growled. “Expects me to bow.”

“Lord Jon Connington,” Selyse explained softly. “The Hand of the False King. He is to arrive on Dragonstone to negotiate, and he expects hospitality.”

“I knew the man in my youth. Jon Connington. Arrogant fool, more of a deviant than Renly ever was.” Stannis looked fuming, his voice dark and dangerous. “Negotiate! He comes under a traitor’s flag, and he expects hospitality?”

“I’d be more inclined to give him a stake, and a bonfire, Your Grace,” Richard Horpe said darkly. “A traitor deserves no hospitality.”

“He is a stormlord, a man sworn to Baratheon.” Stannis shook his head. “It is an insult.”

Now that was curious. Melisandre recalled seeing a stone griffin in her flames, but the vision was foggy. Why would the Hand of the King come himself, why did Aegon send someone so prominent? Surely any negotiation would be a mummer’s court – or did Aegon Targaryen truly wish to forge an accord? “Perhaps this Jon Connington could be converted, Your Grace?” Melisandre suggested softly. “If he comes, perhaps it is opportunity, a chance to show him the light. We are all blind until we see the light.”

“They are all traitors.” Stannis shook his head, scraping his hook into the armrest of black stone throne. “And they grow more treacherous every day. While the abominations sat on the throne, well – _that_ was dubious. I could understand that; a good man might have followed Joffrey and his ilk, under the delusion that the boy was rightful. Perhaps those men had been misguided and not mutinous. But now the Lannisters are dead, my brother’s fake sons are dead, and _none_ have an “excuse. How can they still delude themselves?” His eyes flashed, and his hook slammed into stone. Metal rang. “They chose a mummer’s dragon over me?”

“Dishonourable men would choose any option but the righteous one.” Melisandre shook her head. “They follow false idols, Your Grace.”

“They claim he is Aegon Targaryen.” That news had left Stannis as infuriated as anything. “What is next; will a vagrant walk barefoot off the street, and be hailed as Baelor the Blessed? There is no proof, no evidence to his claim – but he is still raised as king!”

The hook was grinding against the dark granite armrest.

“Fear and greed, Your Grace,” she said sadly. “The boy’s sponsors have paid enough gold for men not to object, the name he takes is only pretence enough. Meanwhile, you speak the truth, and they fear you for it.”

“They follow false idols, Your Grace,” she said sadly. “The boy’s sponsors have paid enough gold for men not to object, the name he takes is only pretence enough. Meanwhile, you speak the truth, and they fear you for it.”

“Then every man of his realm is dishonourable,” Stannis said darkly. “By every right, that throne is mine – but once again it is stolen from me by this mummer’s game.”

Stannis crunched the letter up, throwing it the painted table. It bounced off the Fingers and landed in the peaks of the Vale somewhere.

“It will all be irrelevant in the end,” Selyse soothed. “The Lord of Light–”

“The Lord of Light.” Stannis’ eyes narrowed, focusing on her. Queen Selyse shifted slightly. “The Lord of Light continues to disappoint. I burnt the leeches, and named them. I cleared the path – I gave the sacrifices and still you ask more.”

“Have I not fulfilled my promises?” Melisandre challenged. “Has any of the events I have foretold not came to pass?”

It had been their first act when they arrived back on Dragonstone once more; they burnt leeches again. The last time they had performed such, it had been during the height of the War of Five Kings, and Stannis had named Joffrey Baratheon, Balon Greyjoy and Robb Stark to the fire. Stannis had commanded that she perform the same ceremony again, and Melisandre had obliged.

They had burnt the leeches filled with king’s blood. Stannis had wanted to clear out all the pretenders from his path to the Iron Throne, and their supporters as well. This time, they burnt six leeches; Tommen Baratheon, Myrcella Baratheon, Cersei Lannister, Jaime Lannister, Margaery Tyrell, Mace Tyrell had all been named to the fires.

Melisandre had promised their deaths, and true enough it had happened. The Red God’s will provided.

“Yet it’s not enough.” His vision darkened. “Will I have to name half the realm to the fire? Do I have enough blood in me?”

Melisandre shook her head sadly. “It cannot be overused,” she admitted. “This war must be won by you, not by leeches.”

Stannis had wanted all of them to die, thinking that the realm would be forced to name Stannis as king when all pretenders were dead. Of course, at the time, they hadn’t known of Aegon Targaryen.

After the night of the fires, Stannis had been overjoyed to high of Cersei’s and her son’s deaths. He had believed that they would have no choice but to turn to him. That elation turned into fury with word of Aegon Targaryen’s coronation instead.

In truth, the leeches had caused very little. Melisandre had simply foretold their deaths beforehand, and then allowed the king to burn the leeches so that it seemed like the Red God was directly responsible. It was a deception, but only a minor one; the Lord of Light had still been responsible, even if it wasn’t direct.

Stannis fell quiet, his eyes narrowing as he stared at the painted table. The great map of Westeros was smeared in every colour but his. Queen Selyse and Ser Richard stayed quiet, lingering at the edge of the dais. The Red Woman stepped forward, cautiously stepping up towards the throne.

“You need only forge your sword. The leeches, the power I offer – they are assistance, nothing more,” Melisandre insisted, “Lightbringer will be the saviour.”

“The Great Rite.” His voice was hollow. “There is no other choice.”

“It will be glorious,” Selyse harped.

She saw the doubt in his eyes. Even now, Stannis hadn’t fully accepted the option. It was a necessity, she knew, but even after seeing the Champion of Night he still hesitated. She had seen that it would come to pass in her flames, but that flicker of lingering uncertainty caused Melisandre worry. The champion must be convicted.

“Your Grace, the Champion of Night – the Bastard King – he is likely sacrificing men by the thousands,” Ser Richard said darkly. “I can only imagine how many he has already slain for his master. You cannot win a battle if you do not swing the sword.”

Stannis gaze turned to glare at him stiffly. “Yet you say I am supposed to be the saviour, and you expect me to burn a thousand innocents?” Stannis shook his head. “No, what of my duty?”

_Those are the Onion Lord’s words_, Melisandre cursed. Lord Seaworth may have vanished, but his influence still lingered. “It is not supposed to be easy, Your Grace,” Melisandre insisted. “We all must sacrifice towards it – that is the purpose.”

Queen Selyse nodded in agreement, carefully walking towards Stannis’ other side. It was a position once held by the Onion Lord. “Every soldier in this keep shares the same fears,” Selyse said, but she was parroting what Melisandre had said to her. “Some will have to sacrifice blood relations, sons or daughters or cousins and others may even walk themselves willingly. We are all expected to perform the distasteful deeds necessary to obtain sacrifices.” The Red Woman’s eyes inspected the queen, searching for doubt. She saw none. “Every believer in this castle must contribute something, and it will all go into the Great Rite. The hardships we face now only makes the fires stronger.”

Stannis took a deep breath. He looked between the three of them – his knight, his sorceress and his queen – and they were all convicted. Stannis’ court was filled with holy men. Melisandre stepped forward, bowing and going to her knees before his throne. She lowered her head at his feet, her red dress spilling over the stones.

“Have I led you wrong, my king?” Melisandre whispered. “Have I not fulfilled everything I promised?”

_You would not be here without me. The powers I wield have served your interests many, many times._ In return, they all must serve the Lord of Light.
“You have.” Stannis’ gaze darkened. “And yet your promises remain frustratingly vague, Witch.”

“You Grace…”

“And there has been too much you have not told me,” Stannis argued. “For all your claims of divine wisdom and light, too often you leave me in the dark.”

“I am but a servant.” Melisandre shook her head. “Only the Lord of Light knows all.”

“Then serve me by explaining your god’s will in this.” Stannis through down another letter before her – a red letter. The words were High Valyrian, written on crimson parchment.

Melisandre flickered. The Red Temple of Volantis, she recalled, used such a parchment. Melisandre would have picked it up, but she did not want to admit that she couldn’t read Valyrian. She could speak it, but nobody had ever taught her to read it.

Thankfully, Selyse stepped forward. “That is the second letter, it is from Volantis,” the queen explained, “and it is as troubling as the first. It came by courier from Pentos; it was forwarded by a magister and intended for the fake Aegon’s eyes. Our blockade intercepted the vessel instead.”

“I see.” Melisandre nodded, eyes flickering between the queen and the king.

“Daenerys Targaryen has invaded Volantis,” Selyse said grimly, “and has set half the city ablaze.”

The statement was met by silence. Daenerys Targaryen…? What, how? Melisandre had to struggle to hide the uncertainty from her face. Never appear surprised.

Still, she had to know… “Why Volantis?” she asked finally.

Stannis scoffed gruffly. “Your fires did not tell you that?”

“Not clearly, Your Grace,” Melisandre admitted. “Events further away are harder to focus upon. Why invade Volantis?”

“Ships,” Stannis replied. “Daenerys Targaryen is coming to Westeros, she needs a fleet. Volantis has ships.”

Oh. Melisandre remembered the frequent visions she had seen – the visions of snow and ash. She had not been able to interpret such sights.

“She requires many ships, I hear,” Stannis continued. “It is said she has legions of slave soldiers that she freed, the slaves that worship her. She brings Dothraki, Lhazareen, Volantene and Ghiscari and many more. Volantis sided against her in the war of Slaver’s Bay, and so Daenerys’ first port of call was to break them. She razed their city, freed their slaves, and took their armada for her own.”

For a heartbeat, Melisandre’s composure might have cracked. She so clearly remembered her own time in Volantis, before she fled further west. It was a cursed city. “And now,” Stannis growled, his tone growing darker. “She is coming for her homeland with countless ships and legions of barbarian supporters,” the king’s voice flickered, “and three dragons.”

Melisandre didn’t speak, she couldn’t. There had been rumours, many rumours, but the fires had been so frustratingly vague…

It is the distance, Melisandre cursed. The art of far-scrying had been one that had eluded her during her own informal apprenticeship. Some seers could see to the other end of the world, but Melisandre’s magics had always been more localised. Her strength. Her weakness.

“'It has been confirmed,’” Ser Richard said sourly, “'Three dragons. Young dragons, I hear - they were said to have hatched only three years ago.’”

“Every pretender has dragons, it seems,” Stannis said, growing angrier with her silence. “Everyone but me. Read the letter. They say that her landing will be Nymeria’s thousand ships come again. They say that she is Aegon the Conqueror reborn. How am I supposed to survive against such opposition?’”

“'Lightbringer must be forged.’”

“'Lightbringer,’” Stannis repeated, rolling the word over his tongue like an ill-tasting morsel. The last Lightbringer you gave me shattered in my hand.” His face twitched, his fingers curling. “'You promised me stone dragons. First it was one sacrifice required, and now a thousand?’” The stone hook was trembling, rattling against the black stone. “'Explain this to me, Red Woman.’”

The queen tried to intervene. “Your Grace, surely—” Selyse tried, but Stannis just waved his wife away.

“'Quiet,’ he snapped, and then turned back to Melisandre. “'This is for her. There is more. The Red Temple of Volantis – Red Priests of your own order – have declared for Daenerys Targaryen. They declare her Azor Ahai.’” Melisandre winced.

“'Read the letter,’ Stannis commanded. “'The High Priest Benerro was the one who penned it. They raise banners in Daenerys Targaryen’s name, they declare her their saviour.’”

She remembered Benerro. They met once, back when Melisandre approached the Temple of the Lord of Light in Volantis on her way west. She had never met a more terrifying spellbinder; his flames had scorched her skin, he had nearly killed her. The Fiery Hand that served Benerro had tried to hunt her down, and Melisandre had been forced to flee the city.

She had chosen Dragonstone, the furthest place she could find free from the reach of the rest of her order.

“'Tell me again of the wisdom the Lord of Light gives his servants. Why do these servants come to a different conclusion than you?’”

“'Even the Red Priests can err,’ Melisandre replied quietly. “'And the temple of Volantis lost its way long ago. Benerro is deranged and delusional. They are mistaken.’”

Stannis eyes narrowed. He leant back in his seat, and then stood up slowly. His footsteps down the dais were slow, measured.

“'You said that I was the Champion of Dawn and him, the Champion of Night. Mortal enemies, you named us,’’ Stannis said lowly. His gaze turned over the painted table, leaning across the Blackwater Bay. “'But what does that make Daenerys Targaryen, then? Is she his ally? Is she mine? What am I to make with this, how does this fit into your prophecy?’”

“I know not.” Melisandre was forced to admit. “I know only my purpose, I know what the fires have told me.’”
“Then have the damn fires speaking louder!” he snapped. “First wildlings and an ice dragon, and now legions of slaves and three dragons. I am caught in the middle with nothing!” His hook slammed against the table, taking a notch out of the cliffs of Durran’s Point.

Selyse hesitated. “Your Grace, the night is dark and full of—” she started, but she was silenced by Stannis’ glare.

Melisandre kept her voice measured and soothing. “You are the rightful king, Your Grace. You are the champion. You saw it in the fires yourself, with your own eyes. You know it to be true.”

“All that I know,” Stannis replied stiffly, “is that there are apparently two people in this world with dragons under their command – and I am not one of them.”

There was a long quiet.

“Have I ever told you,” the king muttered eventually, “how much I despise your bloody prophecies?”

Selyse’s face paled. “My king, that’s blasphemy—”

“Enough, woman!” Stannis barked, and the queen flustered. He recomposed himself, taking a deep breath, and turning to stare at the map of Westeros. “Good odds say that Daenerys Targaryen will be stopping at Dragonstone first,” the king said finally. “Or she will be passing through nearby. Aegon Targaryen will be rallying against me now. While the war in King’s Landing waged, while my enemies were distracted, I stood a chance…” Stannis shook his head. “But I do not have the ships, do not have numbers, do not have the support.”

It was met by silence. Melisandre heard the pained quiver in his voice, the iron trembling. “Nobody said that path would be easy,” she said, walking behind him and placing her hand on his shoulder. He felt tense.

“Spare me such drivel,” Stannis said curtly. “Give me counsel of use.”

“They are distractions, Your Grace. The Champion of Night is still the greatest threat. The Bastard King. Jon Snow.”

Jon Snow. The very name made Stannis’ scowl deepen, his eyes twitch. The king’s shoulders were so tense he was trembling. Silence reigned in the chamber, a long, uncertain quiet.

“Jon Snow… Jon Snow… Is it fate, perhaps, that I must fight against Ned Stark’s legacy?” he muttered. “A bastard born from the tourney at Harrenhal, a cursed place and a cursed event if there ever was one.”

Selyse nodded, her lips curling in distaste. “All bastards are born from wickedness and betrayal,” she agreed. “And Jon Snow was sinful at birth. Even his own mother, Ashara Dayne, jumped from a door rather than carry him.”

Stannis paused, and then shook his head. “No,” the king said grimly. “The more I hear of Jon Snow’s birth, the more convinced I become that he was birthed from the rape of Lyanna Stark, by Rhaegar Targaryen. He is a dragonseed.”

Melisandre didn’t react, but she saw Ser Richard’s eyes widen in shock. Queen Selyse flinched. “What?” the queen cawed. “How could that, how… how…”

“Your Grace, are you…?” Ser Richard began, but then trailed off. Are you serious? he was going to ask, but Stannis was always serious.

The king turned to look at them through the corner of his eye, still leaning over the table. “I was there, when Ned Stark returned to King’s Landing from Dorne bringing news of Lyanna’s death. He had the babe with him at the time, but he tried to keep it out of sight. Robert and Ned reconciled after the Stark girl’s death, and Stark admitted that he birthed the bastard on some camp follower – Wylla, I think her name was – but even then the rumours swirled that he was actually Ashara’s babe. I recall thinking that the newborn Jon Snow appeared the wrong age – he seemed too young to have been conceived at Harrenhal, and too old to be born during the war as Ned Stark claimed. But it was a… a busy period, I thought little of it at the time.” The room was left speechless.

“Now? I am sure that Jon Snow was born from Stark’s sister instead, and that his uncle lied to protect the baby.”

Stannis looked at Melisandre. “It was the visions that you told me of last week that made me realise,” he explained. “Do you recall?”

She did. Stannis had asked her for more information on the Bastard King, and she consulted the fires. “The woman in the bloody bed,” Melisandre said quietly, “surrounded by blue roses?”

“Aye. The brown-haired woman. You thought that she could be his mistress, but she was his mother.” Stannis’ eyes were hard. “Lyanna Stark. Rhaegar once gave her a crown of blue roses.”

_Was that so?_ The visions had been foggy, yes, but it was troubling that Melisandre could have misinterpreted one to such an extent.

Queen Selyse stammered. She tried to speak, but her mouth flapped open. Stannis pulled himself up, and nodded solemnly. “So aye, Jon Snow _was_ born from wickedness – a wickedness even more foul than any. He is a bastard born from rape, the grandchild of the Mad King, and the son of zealot. Born by his mother’s death and his uncle’s folly. It is little wonder that Ned Stark tried to get rid of him by banishing him to the black.” Stannis shook his head. “If only the man had gone one step more and drowned the babe in the sea.”

The history and bloodlines of this country were all foreign to Melisandre, but even she had heard of Rhaegar Targaryen. The dragon that stole a wolf, and ignited a war. Westerosi spoke about Rhaegar Targaryen in hushed tones.

_It makes sense_, she realised. A child of king’s blood from the most exceptional line had travelled beyond the Wall – the Great Other must have found Jon Snow, and recruited him to be its champion. Jon Snow’s blood could have awoke the dragon he rides.

“And so Daenerys Targaryen is his aunt,” Melisandre said quietly.

Stannis nodded. “If blood runs true – and I can only assume it must – then she will come to support her nephew. Is she my enemy too?”

“She is.” Melisandre nodded. _Ash and snow_, she remembered. _Did the Great Other have a second champion?_ She would not be surprised if it did.

The king paused, pacing. Selyse still looked speechless, struggling to gather herself. “Show her the third letter,” Stannis commanded. “Read it.”

Richard Horpe picked up another parchment from the throne. This parchment was white, with a grey seal. Melisandre hardly even needed to look at it to know what it contained. “The Champion of Night,” she said. “He is on the rise.”
“It is from White Harbour,” Ser Richard read. “It announces that Winterfell has fallen.”

“We must gather more pig’s blood,” Stannis said grimly, nodding to the table. “Paint the whole north in blood. Half the realm has already fallen to him.”

“Your Grace, the Battle of Ice and Fire approaches,” Melisandre warned. “You will face him again soon enough.”

“And the north declares for him!” Stannis scoffed. “He is evil incarnate, and yet he still has more support than I?”

“Malignance so often portrays itself as benign,” she replied smoothly. “And evil is talented at acting an ally. They will rue it in the end.”

“He must be the priority,” Richard Horpe agreed. “Even more so if the Dragon Queen comes to him too. This battle is more than just mortal men, that has been proven.”

“The Red God’s will shall be–!” Selyse harped, and Stannis lost his patience.

Selyse flinched like she had been slapped. The queen hesitated, but Melisandre gave a soft nod. Selyse curtsied, spun on her heels, and strode away. Ser Richard walked with her, and Stannis glared at them both as they left.

They were left alone in the chamber of the painted table. Melisandre bowed. Stannis’ left hand twitched to the axe, running his fingers along the engraving. Harridan’s Axe. The axe that killed a sea monster.

Melisandre remembered what happened the last time they had been alone in this chamber together. “How may I serve, Your Grace?”

“Hmph.” Stannis turned and stared at the dirty map. There was a long moment of quiet contemplation. “The fake dragon on the throne… a kraken in the west… and a mad queen to the east.” Stannis tapped his fingers against the edge of Cape Wrath. “I cannot survive against such opposition. I need to remove enemies again.”

“The Great Rite remains the only solution,” she insisted.

Stannis pursed his lips, and hesitated. For a brief heartbeat, doubt roamed across his features. “I will not be able to gather a thousand sacrifices, if this is the opposition I must face,” he declared finally. Melisandre noted the slight avoidance. “No, I require more immediate aid from your Red God.”

“As you wish.” Curses. “But the leeches are not–”

“Forget the leeches, other means.” His eyes were dark. “Perhaps there is only one way to deal with false kings. I need a soldier to take care of it.”

Melisandre paused, but she did not react. She kept her features stoic, even as Stannis glared. “You can provide one?” he demanded. “Like you did before?”

“…” Melisandre steadied herself. “I can.”

Like I did before. A tremor went down Mel’s spine, but she hid it from her face. Stannis stared firmly. “I was too weak after the Blackwater,” Stannis said firmly. “But my strength has recovered. Of all the aids you given me, the one you provided with Renly remains the greatest. I need such again.”

I can. But the very thought… “Who?”

“Jon Snow. The Bastard King. You say he is my greatest threat? Then let us deal with him.”

“You cannot kill him.” Melisandre shook his head, her long hair wafting. “It has been fated that you must face him again, so therefore any assassination attempt is already doomed for failure. It would be a waste of power.”

“Damnable prophecies,” the king cursed, his face twisting. Stannis frowned, musing over it for several heartbeats. “Then what of the allies he surrounds himself with?” the king said finally. “Is there any prophecy concerning them?”

That caught her off-guard slightly. “There… there is not?”

“Good. If we cannot kill the Bastard King, we can weaken him, yes?” he challenged, and Melisandre could not object. “If we could kill his supporters, his allies – that would slow him down. Give me time.” Stannis pointed to the white letter, and the list of names that were written beneath it. “Umber, Manderly, Mormont, Glover, Reed – all those houses that have been deceived by him, the lords of such must die.”

That… that was a steep request. “All of them, Your Grace?”

“Yes. It should be no trouble for one of your creations, yes?” Stannis demanded. His eyes were still suspicious, keeping himself guarded. “If the lords die, that would dissuade any others from joining with him. It could cripple the alliance he has made. Can you do this?”

Melisandre bit her lip. Her king was already growing sceptical of her. If I refuse, the Great Rite itself may be in peril. If Stannis’ conviction failed, the entire world could be doomed.

And yet what he was asking… “I think I can.”

“Then I am ready.” Stannis straightened, his hand moving to his belt. “My chambers…”

Melisandre shook her head. “No, save your strength, Your Grace.” Melisandre curtsied again, lowering her head and hiding her eyes. “I… I have other means.”

A flicker of confusion past his face, but Stannis just nodded. “Very well,” the king said with a nod. “Just see it done, High Priestess.”

There was no lust in her king’s eyes. The last master had that had used her this way had done so as much for pleasure as he had for magic – that had been the whole reason the master kept her in his household, to exploit her body, her gifts. Stannis was far more focused on the practicalities.

Queen Selyse knew, of course. The queen had been quite encouraging between the mating. There is no greater honour, Melisandre had said, than giving our bodies to the Lord of Light.

Melisandre took a dozen steps down the staircase, and took a deep breath. She had to pause on the stairs to recover herself, to focus. She hadn’t wanted to do this again, the strain it took…

All around her the torches flickered and hissed, as soft as a dream of half-forgotten places. They were hungry tonight. Melisandre could feel them, she could feel them hovering around her.
There had been two sons Melisandre had birthed for Stannis. One for Renly, one for Conrose Penrose. The first had been essential, but its success had left Melisandre overconfident. The second had been a mistake, however; it had strained her severely and left her weak. Melisandre had been forced to make excuses, reasons why she didn’t dare it again...

Opening up your own body to such a force was a perilous thing. The risks were… immense.

But I am stronger now, Melisandre thought. I can risk it again, surely?

All throughout the castle, the Stone Drum rumbled in the wind. She could hear Stannis above her, pacing around the painted table. There was much relying on her gifts, Melisandre didn’t have the luxury of choice.

It is dark night; there is power in the air, magic in the stones, she thought. Such crafts were almost as easy in Dragonstone as they had been in Asshai. It is an ideal time, a night of power…

The torches flickered, and Melisandre gasped. She felt the tingle on her skin. She felt the invisible hands fluttering over her, stroking up her thigh.

Melony, Lot Seven, a phantom voice whispered. They wanted to remind her, a quiet barb in the words. Wanted to remind her where she came from, and what she owed.

It had been the very first bargain she made. Back when she had been Melony, so, so long ago. She had needed an escape, a means to slay the cruel masters that owned her. A way to escape. She had been trapped in the darkness, and the fires had offered a bargain. They offered her power in return for her womb.

Melisandre stood still as a statue for long time, preparing herself. She touched her ruby. I will do it. One more time.

The ruby sparked slightly. The shadows hissed and fluttered, circling around her in excitement. They were invisible to all others, but Melisandre knew – she could feel – that they were there.

She stepped stiffly down the spiral staircase, and she could feel all the voices around her…

You promised…

We gave you strength…

Power…

You promised…!

The shadows must have their due. The fires needed to be fed.

Melisandre steeled herself, trying to block out the whispers. She tried to ignore the tingling across her skin. The candles flickered, every shadow stirring of the gloomy corridor. Every stone gargoyle and dragon leered at her. The ruby on her throat was throbbing and burning, and sometimes it clenched as tightly as the slave collar she used to wear.

One son, she thought quietly. One more servant, to fulfil the Lord of Light’s will.

A man in red was waiting at the lower level of the steps. The Lord Commander of the Godsguard stood stiffly, oblivious to all the invisible shadows that were writhing around him. Ser Richard Horpe was young, strong and devoted. He will suffice.

“Ser Richard,” Melisandre called. “I require your assistance.”

The knight seemed confused, and Melisandre stepped closer. “My lady…?”

Unbeckoned, she wrapped her arm around his, standing closely beside him. She cocked her head, and Ser Richard blinked.

She raised her hand, and slender fingers caressed across the heart on his chest. “Your god needs your assistance.”

“Escort me to my chambers, ser.”

“Aye,” he said again. The ruby around her neck started to hum, singing in unhearable chimes.

The shadows were restless, impatient. She could feel them around her, hovering over her shoulder as she and Ser Richard walked through the gloomy corridor. They followed her so closely, whispering on her skin. You promised…

The deal… you made a promise…

Melony, Lot Seven…

We gave you power… now give us life.

Melisandre’s chambers were next door to the royal quarters. Once, Visenya Targaryen had slept in the very same room she now kept. Melisandre slept closer to the king than the queen did. Ser Richard hesitated at the sight of her bedchamber, the great dragon’s heard engraving looming on the stone door. “Your Eminence,” the knight choked. “I know not—”

“Hush, ser.” She placed a finger on his lips. “You do not need to know a thing.”

The shadows were already curling around Ser Richard. She could see shady tendrils wrapping around him.

They entered the chambers. Melisandre stepped forward, and carefully started to unfasten her dress. The knight stared, entranced.

She had a fine body, she knew she had. Her buttocks were firm and round, her breasts full and plump, her legs smooth and long and her hips wide and soft. Her beauty glowed like fire, and Ser Richard stared and gaped. Like a moth to a flame.

Her silk gown shrugged off her shoulders. Melisandre didn’t turn around, but she wrapped her hair backwards. For the briefest of moments, her skin looked scarred, haggard and worn like leather, but then she blinked and her flesh was pale, soft and unblemished. Melony, a cruel shadow hissed, Lot Seven.

Melisandre hesitated, but she did not try to resist. The light was the master and the shadows the servants, but even the servants needed their due. That was the deal she made.

“Quench the torches, ser,” she ordered.

“E…Excuse me, Your Eminence?”
“Quench the torches.” She raised a hand, pointing to the brazier. Each candle holder was shaped like a dragon’s skull, their eyes glinting. “This must be done in the darkness.”

“As it pleases you, Your Eminence.” Ser Richard used his gauntleted hand to squash the flames. There was a hiss, and the candles fizzed out one by one.

Suddenly, darkness reigned. Melisandre grit her jaw, as she felt so many hands roaming, groping and pinching her skin. They were fierce, painful, dominating…

In her more youthful days, Melony would have screamed.

Ser Richard was there too. She heard his fumbling fingers unclamp his breeches, shrugging his shoulders. He stepped forward and tried to kiss her, but Melisandre raised her hand to block his lips. She could not see anything, but she felt his warm breath. She did not care enough about him to kiss him.

“Your Eminence…” he gasped, as her hands gripped downwards to his manhood. Her fingers were hard and uncaring, wrapping tightly and pulling. She wanted to see this done quickly.

She was completely naked, he was half-armoured. Hands grabbed her breasts, and fingers squirmed beneath her thighs. Melisandre didn’t grimace, didn’t moan, but her fingers tightened and her breaths turned hoarse.

The shadows were all around her, tendrils writhing in the black. What once was a whisper turned into an immense, voiceless roar. A howl in the dark, a power that caused the bed to tremble.

Ser Richard gagged, his body spasming…

The darkness was squeezing him, invisible hands clenching around him, wringing him dry like a damp cloth.

_It has to be in the dark._ “Let us light a flame together,” Melisandre breathed, gripping the knight by the waist and dragging him backwards into the bed. The tendrils were writhing. Her hands were like hooked claws, his skin tender flesh. Darkness fell with them.

The shadows danced.

Jon

The panic spread slowly, oozing through the castle like a gelatinous blob, filing the corridors with loud uncertain shouts. At first there was disbelief, confusion, and then doubt, but slowly it settled towards fear. _Fifteen thousand corpses, gone._

The horns were blowing, calling men to arms, but it was the silences that were most worrying. They were all on edge listening for the blasts of scouts returning, but none came. They had sent out outriders and received no responses. The perimeter parties and guards in the field had all fallen quiet.

In previous battles, the threat had been immediate and the chaos instant. This felt different; it was a slower, more looming danger. It took time before they started to realise.

Jon broke into a loping gait, half-sprinting down the stone corridors as fast as his weirwood cane would take him.

All around him, Jon could feel the snow and winds buffeting against the castle, and rumble of footsteps pounding within. The walls were quivering, so furiously that even the torches on their brackets were shivering.

The fires hissed and flickered, shadows dancing around the rumbling bodies of the great hall.

They were ringing the bells of Winterfell, the great clapper chiming three times. Jon moved quickly towards the great hall of Winterfell, and he heard the ruckus spreading within.

“Find me those bloody horses!” a lord boomed. “Where are our mounted men?”

“The walls, we need to reinforce—”

“What of Cerwyn?” that was Ser Mardrick’s voice. “We have men at Cerwyn!”

“How many?” another voice called. “How many are there?”

Jon’s guards pushed a path for him through the hall, he saw the shadows heaving in the gloomy room. It would be morning soon, but the world was still dark through the thick clouds churning in the sky. The very tension on the air made it hard to breathe, like it was all suffocating. Jon felt the tremble down his spine, he felt his skin curl.

It’s the fear. Very few of these men had fought the dead before. Some of the free folk reacted better, but the others were left struggling to keep up.

“To arms!” Jon boomed, racing through to the centre. “Gather all men to arms, and have criers through the camp. We need torches and fire. Call your banners!”

“Where is my daughter?” Jon heard a woman voice, high-pitch enough to cut through the other noise. He saw a blonde-haired woman, Leona Manderly, standing in the chaos and looking lost. “Wylla? Wynafryd?”

“It’s not the bloody Boltons!” Tormund snapped, his face red from shouting so hard. “There’s a fucking white walker out there!”

Even now, Jon heard the squeaks and gasps of scared protests. They didn’t understand, they hadn’t seen. “White walkers?” Galbart Glover exclaimed, his voice strangely high-pitched, as he looked around from the corner of the room. “Why are all these people saying white walkers??”

“Enough!” Jon roared, loping up to stand from a top of the dais, next to the throne of Winterfell. “Listen to me.” The hall quieted slightly, and guardsman banged spears against the stone. “There is a white walker outside our gates, and it has just resurrected thousands of corpses. We need fire and obsidian – fire for the wights, obsidian for the white walker.”

The hall exploded into protests and questions. Jon struggled to stay calm, even as looked like scuffles were breaking out. Hundreds of men were crowded into the hall, all demanding answers. “Where are they?” a voice called. “Where~”

“The dead don’t feel pain!” Jon shouted, calling for order. “They don’t feel cold, they never get lost. They follow orders instantly. We must assume that every dead body on the lake has been raised, we must ready ourselves to fight.”

“What of the villages?” that was thick voice – Edric Burley, from the northern mountains. “Our lands are undefended!”

“We killed these bastards once,” the Greatjon growled, pushing his way forward. “Now we have to kill them again??”

“Quiet down, you sods!” Tormund shouted, but it did little. The great hall was roiling with fear.

Curses. “We have reserves of obsidian arrows and spears – find them,” Jon hissed at his guards. A cart of assorted obsidian had been with them from Eastwatch, to White Harbour, to Winterfell – part of a very limited supply. Dragonglass was in very high demand. “Toregg, I place you on arming our best. We do not have many arrows – they must be spread around and used with care.”

A few had already pre-empted him, they were already moving. He saw Toregg the Tall raise a spear with a jagged tip of dragonglass as example, and Tormund had an obsidian dagger on his belt. At the rear of the hall, Rattleshirt was lurking with another dragonglass spear in his hands.

All eyes were on Jon as he stepped over the sea of faces. His eyes lingered on Leona Manderly in the crowd, while men were pushing backwards and forwards. His hand lingered on Dark Sister, feeling his hairs stick on end.

These men had never fought the dead before. Wights were a different sort of enemy; even the most experienced soldier could be caught off-guard by them. Ours need to learn fast.

“The white walkers surround themselves with their soldiers – walking dead, the wights!” Jon shouted over all the noise. “If we want to kill it, we must push through the wights. We must surround it, do not allow it another chance to escape. This only ends when we kill the Other itself.”

So many voices were shouting all around him. The Greatjon was booming, Lady Maege calling for his attention, while Galbart Glover hesitated at the far side of the hall, looking stunned. The lords were flocking around the dais, and all the while the hall rippled.

The hunting parties had been tracking Malvern to the north, Jon cursed. Malvern had been out of sight for so long. When did he come this far south?

Towards the wings of the hall, Jon glimpsed brown hair and green eyes peering at him. Meera Reed had crept down the stairs after him, eavesdropping on the commotion. Sansa was with Bran, and many of the non-fighters had already fled to the dungeons and crypts for fear an assault could be coming, but Meera had a spear in her hands. Jon never knew where she got the spear from.

“This can't be happening.” Ser Mardrick Manderly exclaimed, pale-faced. “White walkers? White walkers?”

“Snow, are you sure–” the Greatjon growled.

“Listen,” Lady Maege hissed at him, a thick gauntleted hand gripping Jon’s shoulder. “I do not hear the horns from our walls. If they were going to attack, wouldn't they have done it by now?”

His eyes were dark. Jon shook his head. “They're not attacking us.”

Winterfell had strong walls and it was full of seasoned soldiers. The castle wouldn't break easily, and Jon's army was fortifying it. The Others were intelligent and calculating; to attack Winterfell would be wasteful. No, there was a far more strategic target for them.

Jon knew it even before the scouts came back. Several dozen men had left, but only five had made it back. The snows were too thick, the winds too strong, and the army of the dead ghosted around them. The five scouts were huddled before the throne, trembling with every step and nearly falling to their knees as they dropped. “We saw them,” a white-faced scout reported, shivering to the bone. “We saw them in the trees, they were… I don't what they were. They were heading north.”

“They are heading for Castle Black,” Jon said, gritting his jaw. “Call the banners, urgently. We must give chase.”

At once, the hall exploded into objections. Outside, the snows were roaring, and inside the fires were hissing.

“Give chase?” Ser Mardrick said, aghast.

“The weather…” Lady Maege protested, her voice cut off by half a dozen others. “The snows!”

“The dead may be able to march through the cold, but the living can't,” the Greatjon warned, lowering his voice. “We'll lose half our men to the weather alone if we set off through these snows.”

He is right. A march would be a disaster, Jon knew that it would.

The snows were at least five foot deep out there. It would grow deeper, the further north they went. Horses would be useless, entire armies could be buried. Only the hardiest man could move in that sort of weather, but every step was perilous. It drained your strength, bit by bit. When the flurries hit, even a dozen yards outside the gates and you’d be lost and blind, while the winds could cleave flesh off as surely as a blade.

Up in the hills, Jon recalled, they say that autumn kisses you, but winter fucks you hard. If we leave this castle now, exposed to the elements, we'll surely be fucked.

But what choice is there?

“How many are there?” Jon demanded, looking to Tormund. “How many corpses have walked away?”

He saw the grimace around the group. “Up to ten thousand, maybe less.” Tormund shook his head. “A lot. I don’t know.”

After the Battle of the Snows, the garrison at Winterfell stood at eight thousand. More people were dead than not.

“The Night’s Watch won’t be able to withstand such numbers,” Jon warned. “These are dead creatures – they don’t feel pain, they don’t feel restraint. Whatever weaknesses they once had, now they have none. They are the perfect soldiers.”

“If there are ten thousand of them, how can we…?” Lord Forrester protested.

“How strong are they?” the Greatjon demanded. “These dead men, what are they like? Are they stronger, weaker, dumber, what?”

“A wight is strong enough to tear a man’s head clean off,” Tormund warned. “Stronger than they once were, and surprisingly fast too. Their only weakness is in their joints – they’re clumsy when they move. And they’ve no regard for their own skin, it makes them sacrificial.”

“And fire,” Rattleshirt added. “They burn with only a spark.”

The Greatjon scoffed. “How the bloody blazes is any flame going to survive out there?”

“The snows will hinder them too, surely?” Ser Mardrick suggested. “What of raids and ambushes – we might whittle them down, take advantage of our terrain.”

“You don't understand!” Jon almost screamed. “Every time you fight them, they could gain numbers. Every corpse, every man that dies – that’s another body for them. Their army is slow, but it is unstoppable.

“But they won't be targeting just the armies.” Jon’s gaze turned, picking out the northern mountain clansmen, the Umber lords, and the wildling chieftains. “They follow none of our laws, they have none of our sentiments. They'll go for the villages first – for the old, the women, the children. They'll target the settlements and the refugees and their numbers will keep growing!” He saw wide eyes staring at him. “A few of them are manageable, but a horde??”

The memory of the Frostfangs haunted his eyes.

The northern lords looked unnerved. Barthogan Rose’s face twisted, and Eric Burley gulped.

“Your Grace…” Leona Manderly muttered, looking across the hall. Lady Maege and the Greatjon shared glances.

Jon took a deep breath, trying to calm himself. Focus. “There are refugees flooding the Gift. There are villages and holdfasts scattered from here to Castle Black – they are the ones in the most danger. We must move and stop it quickly.”

Jon could feel it on his skin. He could feel the presence of the Other permeating the air, and eerie and unnatural energy that said the world on edge. Was Malvern still close? It felt like it was.

The white walkers were like a rolling snowball. So long as it was kept restricted, it was manageable – but once it gained in momentum, it avalanched. We never managed to hunt Malvern, Jon cursed, and this is his revenge.

With Sonagon it wouldn't have been so much a problem, but now the dragon disabled…

“Dragonglass!” Toregg was shouting. “Get your dragonglass – two arrows and a spear to every commander, pass it between your best men.”

“The roads are blocked, our horses won’t make it…” the Greatjon warned. “We might not even be able to catch up.”

So many thoughts swam through his head. Jon felt a tingle down the back of his neck, and he turned to see a great wolf lingering at the edge of the halls. The crowd murmured and stepped back at the sight of Summer, and Jon stared straight into bright golden eyes. The direwolf held a knowing gaze, and its hackles were raised.

“It is the living, versus the dead,” Jon said finally. “We have stop them quickly, or the dead will win in the long run. We have to slay Malvern before his army grows any bigger.”

“Aye,” the Lord of Bones spoke up suddenly, standing across the hall. “But armies ain’t going to work out there, we need a raid. We need to push through the fodder and go straight for the Other itself. We need only the best and the strongest.”

“He’s right,” Tormund admitted. “We got mammoths that can push through any weather, and we got arrows enough for a few dozen damn good archers. Men might be trapped out there, but the giants could push through. We finally know where Malvern is heading, we finally got a chance to stop him.”

“And if it doesn’t work,” Maege warned, “we’ll lose whatever chance we have.”

Murmurs filled the air. Jon nodded at Rattleshirt. “See it done,” he ordered. “Ready the warbands and the giant clans.”

“If you truly need fire to kill these things,” the Greatjon muttered, “then they’ve got one hell of an advantage in this weather.”

Jon didn’t reply, but his eyes turned to the shuttered windows. The keep was shivering right now. An open flame wouldn’t survive long in the snows, and yet they needed an army of torches to fight wights.

Rattleshirt and a few others left the hall quickly, but then the doors blew open as another wildling scouting party barged through. A cold wind shrieked into the hall, every torch rippled, every shadow dancing and rippling. “We got numbers!” a man declared. “Two thousand figures on the bucket trail, another thousand on the kingsroad, and more in the woods. They’re spread real good, but all moving north.”

Tormund gripped his maul a bit tighter, spitting curse words in the Old Tongue. “They're heading to the Wall, it’s going to–!”

With all the torches and gloom, for a second it looked like a the Greatjon had two shadows looming from him. “The bloody Wall needs to survive on its own,” the Greatjon snapped. “We can't help them, we can't even–”

Jon’s head was spinning, trying to decide. The only options he saw were bloody ones, but whose blood…?

“What of the dragon?” a voice growled. Jon recognised a man with a smiling scar across his cheeks – Barthagon Rose. “The dragon – why can’t the dragon–?”

“Your fucking master poisoned the damn dragon, you cunts!” a rough voice snapped, and bodies rolled while shadows stirred.

It was hard to concentrate. Jon’s instincts were screaming, it felt like… it felt like the power the white walkers had exuded, the aura that put every living man on edge.

Summer started howling and barking, great yelps of panic from the direwolf. The hall was in an uproar. “Enough!” Jon snapped. “Gather our forces, we move out–”

Jon saw the black shape moving, but his eyes past over it. In the moment, it looked nothing more like a trick of the light. A flickering shape in a crowded hall so brief he could barely focus on it.

The torches hissed and sputtered.

And suddenly a black arm materialised from behind the throne. It seemed to pull itself from the shadows and into the foreground, and suddenly took form. A shadow without a body. “Order!” Ser Mardrick was protesting, oblivious, “Order, I sa–!”
Before anyone could even react, the shadow flourished a blade.

And a sharp wispy edge skewered through Ser Mardrick Manderly's chest.

Jon saw the knight’s platemail cleave open, he heard the hiss of blood. It was naught but a rippling shadow, its body as fluid as black ooze. Ser Mardrick only managed to make a brief gurgling noise, as the near-invisible edge cut through him.

The knight crumbled to the floor and the shadow… it was standing there, in the centre of the crowd.

It was a man, a naked figure standing tall. A man’s shadow given form. The hall froze in shock, and then exploded.

He heard a woman’s shrill voice scream.

The shock, the surprise, the stab of fear… it all raced past him in an instant. Jon didn’t understand, he didn’t know what was happening, but his body was moving and every instinct he had was screaming. Jon hands went for Dark Sister, but others already had weapons drawn. Even before Ser Mardrick fell to the stones, the Greatjon tried to tackle it, but the shadow blurred.

It moved so fast Jon couldn't even keep track. One heartbeat it was standing still, and then next it hands lunged. Lunged straight for Galbart Glover.

The Master of Deepwood Motte had his mouth hung open, unable to react in time.

Jon heard the splatter of blood, and the hiss of smoke.

“Run!” Jon screamed, the first voice breaking the frantic hush. The shadow didn’t even need its blade – its fingers just plunged into Galbart’s chest, like scooping out his heart.

Galbart was collapsing to the stones, and footsteps raced.

Two men dead in a matter of moments. Jon tried to lunge, but Toregg grabbed his shoulder, yanking him back. Soldiers lunged, blades struck out. The shadow flourished its own sword and lashed.

The sword was a wispy thing, so faint it could have been a water dancer’s edge. Every time it swiped, Jon heard the hissing of smoke through the air. The sword cut left and right, cleaving through solid plate like a hot knife through butter, and another two bodies fell.

Tormund Giantsbane dived at it, swinging his maul with a single hand, trying to push it down. The maul hissed through the shadow’s chest and met no resistance. Its body was wispy like smoke, reforming around the attack. Its hand struck out, but Tormund toppled downwards and ghosty fingers lashed against his shoulder.

And then the Greatjon attacked from behind. The lord never had time to draw his sword, he didn’t need one. Instead, great arms struck forward, as if scooping up the shapeless attacker in a massive bearhug.

The shadow twisted. Suddenly, it was solid again – and black hands grabbed a hold of the Greatjon’s arms. There was a brief clash, but the huge lord was held in place, so easily. It was strong. Inhumanely strong, powerful enough to halt the Greatjon with a single hand.

It paused, seeming to enjoy the moment. Jon couldn’t see a face, but he could imagine a little smirk passing through it. The body posture, its stance… the shadow was mocking. Black hands tightened, and the Greatjon screamed in pain.

A man as large as the Greatjon shouldn’t have made a sound like that.

Jon gave it no chance to turn around. He darted forward and swung Dark Sister. The sword swiped straight through, hitting nothing but air.

Its hand lashed out, a dismissive backhanded swipe – more powerful than any had the right to be. Jon felt the impact on his shoulder, knocking him off his feet. Jon clattered down the steps, his staff sliding across the stones.

He felt heat. Even just from its very touch, the hand… the black hand itself was burning.

He saw it as it turned. It was a man. A figure with a hooked nose and a sharp chin. The face was unfamiliar, but all the details were obscured through the wispy smoke. With every movement, its body twisted and reformed like smoke.

It raised his blade and hacked at the bodies around it. Jon flinched, feeling the sword sweep towards him, but a hand gripped Jon’s collar and yanked him backwards. Jon scattered over the stones, toppling down the dais, while a figure with a scar across his cheek charged at the shape. The men held a shield instead of a sword, trying to bash it, but then with a single strike the wooden shield snapped in half.

Bodies were running, clashing, stirring. Men were trying to flee, others were trying to help. Men were screaming, dogs barking. It was chaos, all the while it hissed with every move it made.

Toregg intervened from behind, stabbing an obsidian spear through its chest. The shadow never even seemed to notice. Instead, its hand hooked down, and Toregg’s blood splattered.

The Greatjon tried to recover, tried to lash out. His face was twisted, screaming in rage. The shadow blurred around his body, and then suddenly it was holding a blade again. The edge skewered straight through the great lord’s stomach.

The Greatjon gasped – a queerly weak noise from such a large man. From its body language, the shadow could have scoffed as it kicked the Greatjon to the ground.

Jon was left lying on the floor, staring upwards with shock. It was strong, fast, and weapons didn’t hurt it. Its grip burnt. The shadow was standing next to the throne of Winterfell, every stone splattered in blood.

In few dozen heartbeats, eleven men were already dead.

Footsteps were running. Jon heard a direwolf howling. The shadow turned fractionally, to stare down at Jon, and it paused. Jon was left defenceless, but it didn’t target him.

Instead, it turned and went straight for Maege Mormont. The lady swung her mace upwards to meet it. Jon heard the hiss.

The shadow blade cut straight through the iron mace, and then onwards through the Maege’s neck. A lump of metal and a decapitated head fell to the ground at the same time. The metal was glowing red where the edge had cut through it. Maege Mormont died with a look of absolute shock on her face.

It turned, looking for the next victim. He saw a blonde-haired woman on her knees, trying to shake a fallen knight with a gouged-out chest, and the shadow turned too. Leona Manderly gulped, with tears smearing down her face.

“In the name of the Seven,” she whispered. “By the Mother, I–”

The shadow slashed lazily. Lady Leona’s head cut open into smoke and gore. Footsteps were pounding; men racing from the hall, blockading the entrance. Everything spinning. Jon heard growling – Summer was standing off against the shadow, distracting it, but the direwolf seemed afraid to even go near. Run, Jon begged, gasping too hard to speak. Run.

Hands gripped his shoulders, someone was trying to drag him away. It was the girl, Meera Reed – she had her arms on him, trying to pull him up to his feet. “Move,” Meera hissed in his ear. “Move!”

The shadow figure paused, looking idly around the bloody scene. Searching for more targets. After a long moment, its gaze settled on Jon.

He had Dark Sister in his hands. Jon was on his knees, but there was no time to stand up. The shadow blurred, he heard the hissing of a burning blade.

Summer lunged it at from behind, but the shadow knocked the direwolf down with a single hand. There was a pained yelp, and Meera shot forward her spear, but the shadow swept around her. The girl was knocked to the floor, and Jon lunged with Dark Sister…

The Valyrian steel hit nothing but smoke. Jon’s leg gave out, and he clattered downwards. Already, the shadow was reforming, raising its sword high in an executioner’s slash. It never made a noise, but its face – on its wispy face, it looked like the man was roaring with silent laughter.

The blade came down.

Jon heard the hiss.

He gasped, but no cut came. Suddenly the room was filled with black smoke. He heard crackling flames, smoke howling, and shadowfire screaming. The shadow was above him, face contorted, body shivering. A white spike protruded from its chest, cleaving through its body…

It exploded. A cloud of black plumed everywhere, smearing the bodies and the stones. There was nothing solid left of it, only black dust. A foul taste hit Jon’s mouth. Ash, he realised dumbly. It’s ash.

Meera was standing in its wake, her face coated black and her eyes wide. In her hands, she was gripping half a white wooden cane, splintered at the edge. The weirwood cane, Jon realised. My cane. The wood had snapped in half when Jon fell down the steps, but the edge broke into a point. Meera recovered faster than he had. She must have snatched up the broken cane to stab it with.

There was a shock silence. All around him, everything was black and red.

He heard sounds. People were screaming. Wounded men were croaking, bodies were gurgling with blood. Tormund was staggering, while the Greatjon was on his back, gurgling as he grasped at the wound through his stomach. Jon saw dead bodies littering the throne of Winterfell.

Everybody he had been talking to; alive one moment, and dead the next. Snuffed out like a candle. Fires were hissing, the wind shrieking…
“What was that?” Meera screamed, her hands trembling. The weirwood clattered from her hands, and the edge was left charred and smoking. “What was that?”

Jon stared at the weirwood on the ground, and then down at the smear of ash over the granite stones. It was a shadow. It was an assassin. It was…

“It was fire,” Jon gasped finally. “And it could only be killed by weirwood.”
The God-King

The Starry Sept was a grand, ancient structure. It was forged of black marble walls and high arches, gleaming with painted glass windows on seven-sided spires and a great dome housing the gilded effigies of the Seven. It was an ancient building, a millennium older than the Great Sept of Baelor, and its mosaics showed images of the heroes that had been ancient since long before the Targaryens stepped foot on Westeros. The Great Sept had been made to honour the dragons, but this sept remembered the ‘heroes’ like Hugor of the Hill, Argos Sevenstar, the Falcon Knight, Qarlon the Great, Ser Gerold Grafton, and the Hammer of the Hills. The men who had first brought their seven-sided god onto foreign shores.

They said that the Starry Sept was the finest temple in the realm, perhaps only second to Great Sept of Baelor or the Temple of Highgarden. Now, the Great Sept was a cremated crater, and Euron intended that Highgarden would soon become a mausoleum of the damned.

To his surprise, Euron discovered that he actually quite liked the Starry Sept – once he had removed all of the septons, of course. The Heavenly Dome was indeed a structure fit for a god, thousands of years old and securely built, extravagant in its wealth. He had taken the Starry Sept as his palace, and any god needed a temple.

Euron stood barefoot and bare-chested on the marble floor, staring up to the mosaic of the night’s sky painted onto the dome, as a smile played about his lips. Euron wore only a set of leather breeches, naked from the waist upwards except for his eyepatch. His hair was still slick with salt, and the smell of dampness lingered around him.

“Do you not think it is amazing, brother?” Euron mused as he walked. “How quickly everything changes?”

Across the pews, Aeron Greyjoy, High Priest of the Drowned King, moved to his knees. His brother’s eyes were on the floor constantly; Aeron never dared to meet Euron’s gaze. His voice was deep, solemn, and afraid. “As you say, Your Worship,” Aeron intoned.

“Hm. Take Qarlon the Great over there.” Euron pointed to the painted marble engraving of faded colours, showing a muscular man on his knees, raising a seven-pointed star to a hilly sky. “In his day, he was called Qarlon the Butcher, Qarlon the Fool, Qarlon the Dragonfeed. He was a would-be conqueror that brought his empire to ruin after challenging the dragons. And yet, now, two thousand years later – Qarlon the Great is honoured as the last defender of the Faith on Andalos.” Euron shook his head, still smiling. “The septons proclaimed that he was great, so there he is – Qarlon the Great. Their seven gods wanted their hero, and history was rewritten at their will.”

“False gods, all, Your Worship,” Aeron said stiffly. “They were deluded by false idols.”

Euron pitied Aeron sometimes; his brother was such an… unimaginative man. It was a curse that so many in his family had shared.

On his brother’s forehead, the brand of the kraken was still raw. It had been a crude metal brand – a lump of circular steel and prongs twisted into tentacles, heated over the flames until the kraken glowed red like blood. Euron had offered his disbelievers forgiveness, but only if they branded themselves with his mark.

Aeron had been the very first to press the burning metal against his own skin.

His brother was a tall and gaunt man, still struggling to recover from his captivity onboard the Silence. Aeron’s bones protruded from his skin, like veiny parchment stretched over a skeleton, and his legs were so frail he needed two walking sticks to move. Without his beard and with his head shaved bald, Aeron looked like a different man. He looked two decades older than he actually was. The mutilated, scorched skin on his forehead was prone to weeping, often oozing blood and pus down his features.

Yet Aeron wore now silk and gossamer rather than rags – long white robes that were too loose for his body, garments that flowed across the marble like tentacles. The old priests of the Drowned God had roamed the beaches and lived like hermits, but Euron insisted that wealth should be taken by the holy. The Damphair had seen the err of his ways; he had witnessed Euron’s godliness, and Euron had rewarded him. He is to be the prophet to my god, Euron mused, and it feels good to have a brother again.

One by one, the Drowned Men had all converted to the new religion that Euron offered. The Cult of the Kraken, some named it. The Acolytes of the Drowned God Reborn.

Every night now, faithful and the converts ate like lords – but the unfaithful of the city were left to hunger. Converting the hearts of an entire city became surprisingly quick once he controlled the stomachs.

Euron grinned, swaggering forward to place his hand across Aeron’s shoulders. Despite everything, his brother still flinched slightly with his touch.

“History is malleable, brother,” Euron chucked. “Do not linger in it. We shall destroy the past, and seize control of the future.”

Across the dome, both brothers watched as the workers stepped forward with large hammers to demolish the priceless marble engraving of the Qarlon the Great. Men who had once prayed in this temple were now destroying it with hammers and chisels. All around him, the Starry Sept was being transformed.

The sounds of stone chipping and clanking filled the great dome. They were rebuilding the Starry Sept in Euron’s image. They had roped workers from across Oldtown, pressed them into the sept – his followers had captured masons and stoneworkers by the dozen. Euron had ordered that all signs of the Seven should be struck from these walls, but he saw no reason why what remained couldn’t be reappropriated to his new image.

Seven-sided stars had become seven-sided tentacles. The statue of the Warrior, of course, had been reshaped and carved to Euron’s own likeness. The statue of the Maiden had been reshaped to look like Daenerys Targaryen, the woman who would become his queen. Now, the statues of Euron and Daenerys stood at the front of pillars, both of them wearing metal crowns fastened with mortar onto marble. The other statues had required a bit more of creativity.

The Father became Balon Greyjoy – the brother who had set him on the path – and the Smith became Victarion Greyjoy – the brother who would bring his bride to him – but they were both put at the far back behind Euron’s statue. He was debating getting rid of those two altogether, actually. The Mother was recarved into a topless, weeping wanton with no mouth – to glorify Euron’s ship, the Silence. The masons had done a grand job in shaping the hooded figure of the Stranger into that of a faceless man bearing tentacles wrapped around its body, and a bulbous eye on his chest.

The difficulty had been with the Crone, however. Euron had been torn as to what he should honour with it, but eventually he had decided when he noticed how easily the Crone’s hooked nose could become a beak. He ordered the masons to carve the hunched back woman into a bird. Make it into a statue of a crow, he had commanded. Even now the workmen were still chipping away, refashioning the woman’s face into a stubby beak. Euron was the Crow’s Eye, after all.

A few of the masons had resisted, and others had tried to incite rebellion. Once, a group of workers had started plotting assassination, and sharpening chisels to be used as daggers. The glass candles quickly saw such things brewing, and their punishments had provided the proper incentive for the rest.

Those who wept too much had their eyes pulled out, for what use did a man that wouldn’t see god’s work done have for eyes? Still, Euron wouldn’t refuse any the chance to see the glory of the new faith rising in this hall; hanged men had been be left to stare from the rafters above, and disembodied eyes left in rows atop tables to gaze unblinkingly upon the holy.

Euron’s gaze lingered on the statues. Even sacred objects – especially sacred objects – could be transformed. In another thousand years, perhaps nobody would even remember the Seven. Euron would see it so.

The city of Oldtown wasn’t so old anymore. That city was dead. It had been devastated, aye, but now it was rising again, harder and stronger. The old reign fell with the tower, and Euron’s command was growing. The whole city had witnessed his power.

He had decided to follow the example of the dragon conqueror, and to rename the site of his arrival. Euron had commanded that the city of Oldtown would now be called God’s Arising.

“What do you think, brother?” Euron demanded, nodding at the statue that used to the be the Warrior, but now had a kraken carved onto its chest. “Does it fit my likeliness, or should I have the stonemason executed?” Euron cocked his head, staring at his brother curiously. “As a holy man,” there was a quiet sneer on the words, “surely you must have an opinion on my temple?”

Aeron hesitated, biting his lip but trying not to squirm. “I have seen the Drowned God’s will,” the High Priest intoned. “I do naught but serve.”

Only months ago, he was trying to incite a rebellion against me, Euron considered. Now, he leads my sermons. By the gods, faithful men are such fascinating creatures. “The last priests that walked these walls,” Euron teased, “they thought they knew their god’s will too.”

Every septon that had been in the sept had been executed when it fell. Euron had beheaded the septons and built a monument in the courtyard of their skulls, and then he had stripped the septas and gave them to his men as whores. “They were blind to the true divinity lying beneath them.”

“Aren’t we all?” Euron chuckled. “Blind men scuffling around in the dark, as a man I knew once phrased it. The light itself is meaningless, but what matters is the will to see more.”

Aeron stood straighter, old bones creaking. Euron turned around, and cupped his brother’s gaunt cheeks with both hands. “What of you, brother?” Euron demanded. “Will you be my prophet, or are you but another blind man that doesn’t deserve to keep his eyes?”

“I will serve,” Aeron whispered.

Euron’s grin widened. “Then will you see with me?”
The Drowned Man gulped and then nodded. Euron laughed, as he motioned at a nearby slave to pour them two cups of shade of the evening. Wonderfully, the Citadel had possessed its own stocks imported from Qarth, enough to sate him for months. Him and his chosen few.

Aeron had been forced to see divinity on that night, and now he didn’t try to resist. His brother wouldn’t admit it, but the shade gave him an insight, a clarity into the divine workings of the world that ordinary mortals could scarce comprehend. They both gulped the blue wine down together.

“Glory to Sh’Caegloth,” Aeron intoned, his eyes widening and his body sagging as the shade of the evening took hold.

Sh’Caegloth. Euron had chosen to name the kraken after a Stygian word – it meant ‘The Awakened’. The first of the Old Ones to emerge from a millennia-long sleep.

As the shade of the evening flooded his body, Euron could feel it. Even now, he could feel the power of the ancient kraken looming in the waters. Ever since the ceremony at Oldtown, there had been storms circling the bay and high tides across the coast – the weather itself distorted with the ancient’s presence.

He could feel it. He could feel it stirring; a massive, inhuman power, bubbling with rage like a simmering volcano…

Aeron nearly sagged with the pressure, the blue wine staining his lips. Euron just laughed, stumbling over the marble floors like a drunkard. All around him, the sept was filled with ghosts. Ghosts of drowned men, a hundred thousand eyes twisted in terror.

Mere weeks ago the waves had swept through the city. The bridges had all collapsed, leaving those on the inlet isles stranded while all others ran for cover. The Starry Sept was one of the few buildings sturdy enough to hold against the floods. The smallfolk had taken shelter within the sept, and they had been huddling like sheep when Euron’s reavers broke through the doors.

The entire city was still trembling, trying to come terms with its new fate. The city of God’s Arising was only just being born and, like all births, it was a messy, bloody thing. Destruction always preceded creation.

Euron sat on the crystal throne of the Starry Sept, grinning from eye to eye as he stared into the domed heavens. This city is but the first, he told himself. Only the first to fall.

Across the horizon, he felt Sh’Caegloth stir. Controlling the kraken had proven more difficult than anticipated, but he was getting there. The ancient beast was well and truly bound, and slowly, piece by piece, it was falling to Euron’s will. The ancient magicks of Krakenbinder were powerful, irresistible.

The proof of my divinity.

The God-King’s good mood lasted right up until he saw a slave escorted through the hall of his temple. It was a squirrely man formerly a steward of the Citadel, but now he had kraken brands across his neck and arms. He walked with a limp before Euron, his hooked nose black and oozing. The slave was trembling, and Euron could see failure written across his face.

“Your Worship,” the slave muttered. “I bring news from the commander of the guard.”

“Speak,” Euron ordered.

“The…” The slave had to gulp. “The lord is unsuccessful, Your Worship.” The slave gritted his teeth, body spasming with raw fear. “Lord Goodbrother returns from Citadel’s vaults empty-handed. He and his men are yet making their way through the city.”

There was no immediate reaction. Euron paused, turning to look at the rubble that once was the statue of Qarlon the Great. “Did you know that in older times,” Euron said slowly, “the Andal warlords would execute any messenger that brought them bad news? It was a means of deterrence, you see – they wished to discourage any from sending bad news.”

“Your Worship…” The slave might have pissed himself in terror.

Euron pointed to the brazier hanging from the walls, and the flames flickering away. “Brand yourself once more,” Euron ordered, “and pray that my rage dissipates once you do.”

The slave did as well. He staggered over to the brazier, trembling, but squeezed the burning metal against his skin once more without obvious hesitation, screaming as flesh bubbled and boiled. At this point, Euron had ensured that every man and woman feared him more than they feared death itself. He had made his wrath known. Once you hold their fear and their lives, Euron mused, their hearts and minds follow.

There were other supplicants that came to see him. Ironborn reavers came to claim rewards or settle disputes, and lords and merchants came to beg for food or favours. To the former he gave nearly whatever they wished, but to the latter he gave nothing – not until they branded themselves with the sigil of the kraken. After an hour, the sept reeked of char. It smelled like victory.

Yet none of it could expunge the foul taste of Lord Goodbrother’s failure.

By the time the lord himself arrived up the seventy-seven steps into the temple, Euron went to fetch his sword. The God-King was still bare-chested, laying Red Rain across his legs, softly stroking the blade while Lord Gorold Goodbrother walked in with his head hung, his shoulder slumped. Euron’s face twisted with the sight. Failure, is there anything more revolting?

“Your Worship,” Lord Goodbrother said, lowering himself to the stones.

“Where is my book, Lord Goodbrother?” the God-King of Westeros demanded, pacing over the marble floor. “Have you disappointed me once more?”

Lord Gorold twitched nervously, bowing his head to the marble steps. “Forgive me, Your Worship…”

“Forgive you?” Euron turned around, glaring down from atop the steps. “So then it is your fault?”

“No, I… I tried…” His head sagged, sweat dripping down his brow. “I failed you, Your Worship. I worked to the best of my ability, but it was not enough.”

Clearly not. “Ah.” Euron nodded, stepping down the steps slowly. “Then the problem is simply incompetence, not insolence?”

Lord Goodbrother’s face was pale. He bowed his head further, but he didn’t dare protest. Euron allowed his lips to curl into a blue smile. At the base of the steps, Aeron lowered his head. “Lord Goodbrother is a loyal subject, Your Worship.”

“I’m sure,” Euron mocked. “Loyal.”

Loyal only because I hold his entire fate in the palm of my hand. With a single thought from Euron, Hammerhorn might be literally wiped off the map, and everyone knew it. Sh’Caegloth had ensured “Tell me what happened, Lord Goodbrother,” Euron commanded.

The lord gulped. “We tracked the vaults as you commanded. The dungeons under the Citadel – where the old scrolls are located. We interrogated the archmaesters for the tome’s location, forced them to surrender their keys,” Lord Gorold explained. “Except the door was barricaded from the inside, Your Worship. They tried to set fire to the chambers as we were breaking through.”

“Who tried?” Euron demanded.

“I do not know,” Lord Gorold admitted. “Whoever they were, they killed themselves in the blaze. Their corpses are unrecognisable.”

Euron paused. Perhaps one of the inner members of the Conclave had committed suicide, and attempted to burn the evidence with them? It was possible, and Euron had been wondering how many of the old guard of maesters still existed. Most maesters didn’t know the history of their own order, but relics of the past still lingered. The knights of the mind, he mused.

One of Euron’s first acts after taking the city had been to drown near all of them in the saltwater; from the archmaesters down to the chainless acolytes. Every man of the Citadel they could gather had been executed, save for a useful captured few.

“But we believed it likely that the lower levels remained untouched from the fire,” Lord Goodbrother continued. “The walls were stone and the fire did not spread down to the private vaults. But the lock was left warped, its mechanism jammed, and the stairs collapsed. We had to excavate the route downwards, it took near a fortnight to break through. And the stone, the black stone didn’t cleave easily…”

Yes, it wouldn’t, Euron agreed. The lowest vaults of the Citadel were made out of fused black stone, the same sort that the foundations of the Hightower were built from. It was unnaturally hard stone, a remnant of an era long past. “And that is where you failed,” Euron said sadly, shaking his head. “You assured me there wasn’t a problem.”

“I didn’t believe there…” Lord Gorold hesitated. “I didn’t think there was. But the vaults were empty when we got there, Your Worship. Somebody had already taken the book from the pedestal.”

Now isn’t that a problem? Euron’s smiling eye lingered on the lord, but all the while his other eye was glaring. His fingers slowly played with Red Rain, his hands running over the razor-sharp edge. The lord was staring at Euron’s feet, pale pink toes spread over the marble.

Perhaps I should kill him, Euron considered, judging the lord quietly. How useful will his death be?

“We found other books,” Lord Goodbrother pleaded. “The rest of the archives, old manuscripts, they were intact…”

“I do not care for other books,” Euron snapped. “I gave you command to bring that one to me – Blood and Fire is the only tome that interests me.”

“Forgive me, Your Worship.” Once, Gorold Goodbrother had been a strong lord, but now he was cowering in Euron’s presence. “Forgive me… The book was already gone…”

“Who stole it?” Aeron asked, with an unsteady step forward. “The maesters?”
“They plead ignorance,” Lord Goodbrother confessed. “We ask questions sharply, they say they knew nothing of those vaults. Even the surviving archmaesters claim they were archaic.”

Unfortunately, that was likely true. Euron was quiet, contemplating silently. “What of your glass candles?” Aeron asked uncertainly, looking between Euron and the lord. Slowly, the High Priest limped up the steps. “Your Worship, could your powers track it…?”

“The glass candles see naught but darkness,” Euron said with annoyance. “It seems that our thief has blocked the candle’s vision.”

That was yet another source of irritation, made all the more frustrating that he had sacrificed the man who used to scry for him. Euron himself wasn’t so skilled with the glass candles. He had tried to pinpoint the book, but it was lost in shadows.

“Blocked?” Aeron asked, blinking. “Is that… Is that possible?”

“There is a technique to it. It is an uncommon skill, but not a particularly difficult one,” Euron replied with a shrug. “To hide from light, you need only cloak yourself in darkness.”

Still, there were only a limited number of people who knew of the art of cloaking from scryers, Euron considered. Unfortunately, all of the people on that list could be troubling in one way or another.

Lord Gorold and Aeron glanced to one another, their gazes filled with uncertainty. Euron paced, staring between the marble statues as he thought. “The gates are sealed, the walls patrolled. We secure the surrounding area,” Euron decided. “So perhaps the thief is still in the city. Search the town. Find that book, Lord Goodbrother. I named you Lord of God’s Arising, are you not?”

“You did. But our forces…” The lord gulped. “Forgive me, but the militia – I have doubts over their loyalty. We have not rebuilt our numbers, too many of our men are untested.”

Another frustration, something else that Euron had sacrificed. His position in the city was made all the more tenuous ever since he had been forced to kill near eight thousand of his own men. The ironborn had tried to bolster their numbers from converts in the city, but it wasn’t the same. Not yet.

“I… I shall strive to do so, Your Worship.” Lord Goodbrother kept his eyes low.

Euron’s smiling eye narrowed. “Strive,” he repeated. “Perhaps the issue here is motivation, rather the capability?”

“Your Worship, I –”

“You have twelve daughters, do you not?”

“Eleven. Pity.” The eldest was a mother herself, he recalled, the youngest barely a girl. Euron cocked his head, stepping forward to embrace the lord. His arms wrapped around the man’s shoulders, but Lord Gorold did not react.

“Every day that you disappoint me,” Euron whispered finally, “I will rape one of your daughters.”
Lord Goodbrother’s face paled.

“Starting from the eldest, working down. I will have one of them every night until that book is mine,” Euron promised. “I will leave the girls alive, but each of them will take my seed and raise my bastard. For every night that you fail me, you will raise a living, breathing reminder of that time you disappointed, Lord Goodbrother. Do you understand?”

The old lord couldn’t speak, but he managed a scared nod. “And then, on the twelfth night, I will begin to rape your sons. Your proud boys, I will leave them broken and ruined.” Euron’s gaze turned slightly towards Aeron, who kept his head on the floor. “You have three sons – triplets, I believe? They will take me to night fourteen.”

Just the look in Lord Goodbrother’s eyes, that dread… it was glorious. He knew exactly what would happen if Euron was challenged. He knew the devastation that the God-King could summon.

“And so on the fifteenth night?” Euron mused. “On that night, I will have to rape you.” Euron chuckled, patting the man on the back. “It will not be a pleasant experience for you, my lord. Do you understand?” There was no reply. His eyes narrowed. “I require a response, Lord Goodbrother.”

His voice was weak. “I understand,” he whispered.

“Then you have a fortnight, to fix your mistake. The earlier the better, for your family’s sake.” Euron turned to walk away. “I want that book, Lord Goodbrother.”

It was the same threat that Euron had given to the survivors from House Hightower, and the other great houses of the city. Everyone who had been in the Hightower itself had perished, including Lord Leyton, but many of the highborn – women and children especially – had taken refuge in the city itself before the battle.

One time, Ser Baelor Hightower had thought to challenge him, attempting to incite a rebellion as the eldest surviving heir to Hightower. But then Euron had taken his sister, the Mad Maid Malora, in the middle of the Starry Sept itself. While her family watched. Euron had promised that it would happen again and again for as long as Ser Baelor tried to resist.

He was told that she was now showing the first signs of pregnancy.

Euron watched as Lord Gorold walked away, shoulders sloped and hands shivering. The lord might try to run, but Euron would see his intentions as soon as he made that decision. The threat of the glass candles was one of Euron’s greatest weapons; as far as his ‘allies’ were concerned, Euron was considered omniscient. The illusion was important.

Which makes it all the more troubling that someone capable of blocking the sight is in the city, Euron considered.

“Walk with me, Aeron,” he ordered. “Come.”

His brother picked up his canes and hobbled after him. Euron walked straight towards the balcony, staring out over the moonless night sky, and the bonfires burning in the city below.

At dark night, in the gloom, it looked almost… peaceful. Like a black ocean at rest. There were torches and camps in the middle of the plazas, and stone strewn over the streets. Smallfolk and soldiers were left scavenging through wreckage, and buildings flooded streets. The canals had been flooded and damned by all the debris, the cobbled streets were left wrecked, and scores of cityfolk homeless.

Even now, they were still finding masses of bloated, unrecognisable corpses washing up on the coasts.

Closer to the waterfront, barely any building larger than a hut still stood. The harbour had collapsed, the centuries-old wharves had been scoured away by a single lash of a gargantuan tentacle. Any ships that could potentially be repaired had been dragged to shore, and wreckage was being salvaged into crude hulls. Even now, men were scurrying over makeshift piers. Soon, Euron would have something of a fleet again – a poor fleet, but it would serve.

The city of God’s Arising was being born anew.

“It’s beautiful, isn’t it?” Euron whispered quietly. “Remove the safety and the wealth, remove the civilisation, and you see something else. Something raw.” Something pure.

Aeron didn’t reply, his eyes were fixed at Euron’s feet. In the ruins of the city, merchants who had once lived like kings were scouring beaches for scraps of rotten food.

To the south, he could see the ugly ruin of the Hightower still staining the horizon. A great skeletal structure that stretched across the water, a stony corpse lying horizontal. The debris was so thick that it had jammed in the bay. Euron’s men had taken to using the ruins of the Hightower as a makeshift bridge from the Battle Isle to the mainland. The Tower Bridge, they called it.

On the Battle Isle itself, all that remained of the tower was a jagged stump of stone. Half the cliffs of the isle had collapsed with the tower, and what remained at was stumpy chunk of rock jutting upwards. The foundations of the Hightower were surprisingly still largely intact – a labyrinthine black stone structure that the ironborn were rebuilding as a fortress, and a prison.

After the Drowning of Oldtown, they had captured so many survivors. Highborn soldiers, sons and daughters, wives and fathers – hundreds, perhaps thousands, were being held in the Hightower’s primordial foundations.

The threat remained; obey my rule, Euron had offered, otherwise the kraken will return.

First he had started with the highborn, and then the city watch itself had been forced to serve Euron’s interests. After that, many of the cityfolk had been conscripted or enslaved. He held enough hostages and enough fear to ensure compliance.

“Lord Goodbrother spoke truly, Your Worship,” Aeron said after long quiet. “Your Worship, our forces are depleted, our men stretched thin.”

“Then we must recover them. Look down at the plaza, what do you see?” Euron pointed to the bonfires, the refugee camps. “There are our men. And women, and children. They will be our army.”

“They are greenlanders. They are our enemies, we destroyed their home, stole their riches.” Aeron frowned. “They cower, Your Worship, but they will not comply. They will never follow you, not willingly.”

Oh, you poor simple-minded fool, Aeron. Have you no imagination? Euron turned and sneered. “Then is that not your purpose, High Priest? To show them godliness. This a city of lost sheep, give them faith again. Convert them, as you yourself converted.”

His brother looked nervous. “My sermons are growing, there have been believers…” Aeron grimaced. “But there is dissent as well. They are waiting for a sign of weakness, for a chance to spark a rebellion.”

“Let them wait.”

“Your Worship…” He sounded pained, his tongue stuttering. “And what of the dragon’s forces assembling at Highgarden? We hold Three Towers by a thread, Blackcrown is burned… and Brightwater Keep is manned by only a token force. We haven’t the men.”

A dragon. Euron only laughed, which made Aeron all the more worried. “We do not have the ships, we do not have a fleet anymore. The garrisons left behind on the Arbor have surely fallen.”

The High Priest gulped. “Forgive me, Your Worship, but even the Iron Islands lacks the king’s presence, Pyke surely notices your absence. We have no grip on the land we hold…!”

“I don’t care about land.” Euron’s voice turned sharp. “And ships could not interest me less. Are you still so narrow-minded, Aeron? Has the shade of the evening done nothing for you?”

Aeron faltered, scared. Euron turned, pointing again at the glimmer of the bonfires in the below the temple. “What I want… they only thing that I need… is out there. The people.”

“Those people are starved and terrified.” His voice was weak.

“Good,” Euron laughed. “I want their hearts and minds. I want their love, I want their hate, I want their devotion. I am their God first, their king second.”

He had always known this would be the difficult stage. The Battle of Oldtown had been so worthwhile, but it had also left Euron’s own fleet crippled. Where once he had a fleet of legions, now there were only a handful of ships remaining to him. It would take time to rebuild his forces and to enforce his new rule over the area.

The kraken helped, but it had to be used sparingly. Euron had allowed Sh’Caegloth to stew and simmer unseen in the depths, while he quietly tested and practiced his control. The danger was familiarity. Men became accustomed to what they could see. The more they witnessed divinity, the more they were capable of preparing for it. Uncertainty and fear were two of his greatest weapons; two advantages that could be lost by overuse.

And so Euron had kept his kraken out of sight, and he had blocked all contact out of the city. All the witnesses were left crazed by panic, and it became harder for anyone outside to verify the truth. Euron wanted there to be doubt – scepticism was a god’s best friend. It gave him impact. It gave him time.

So much to do, Euron thought with a sigh, as he watched the flickering lights. So little time.

It was working, piece by piece. His ironborn ruled the city, near every maester and septon had been given to the ocean, and the Cult of the Kraken was steadily growing. After every disaster, fanatics were born.

More and more men of Oldtown were carving the sigil of the kraken onto their foreheads.

Euron stared out over the city, and wondered how long it would take. My queen, he thought quietly. Wait for me. I am coming.

A cold chill blew in from the bay, and finally Euron chose to go inside. Aeron was stammering, his body sagging with every step as he tried to keep pace. Euron walked confidently, listening to the rattle of chisels around him.
He walked straight past the stonemasons, and the men all stopped and bowed. Euron stared over the mutilated effigies of the Seven, where the workers were carving the Stranger’s cloak into a kraken’s tentacles and reshaping the Crone’s face into a beak. Euron stared at their progress, and then frowned. “What is that?” he demanded.

The mason stammered at his presence. “A crow, Your Worship. Tis a crow.”

“I told you to give it three eyes,” Euron scoffed. “An eye on the forehead too. It should have three eyes.”

The men nodded, and promised that they would. The misshapen crow stared back at him blankly. I'll put that statue in the corner, Euron decided. He deserves to watch.

There was the sound of a cane as his brother caught up. Aeron was already wheezing, out of breath. Euron reached a decision.

“Put your sermons to use, Aeron,” Euron ordered. “Rile up the militia and the believers, let them know to search for this missing book themselves.”

“Your Worship, that might cause…” His voice trailed off. What were you going to say? Riots? Panic?

“Good. Let us use the resources we have, let’s find a use for their fear. Let the city know that the book is important to me.”

His brother stiffened, and then nodded. “As you say, Your Worship.”

Euron turned, and strolled away. Aeron looked pained for a long time, but finally his brother had to ask.

“Forgive me, Your Worship,” Aeron called with a gulp. “But why is the Targaryen book so important? There are many books. Surely this one is not worth the difficulty…?”

“This book is special.” Euron turned, raising an eyebrow and shaking his head. “It is… call it something of an instruction manual.”

“Is there not a duplicate?” Aeron asked. “The maesters… surely they would have made copies?”

“Not of this one.” He scoffed. “This is a blood-soaked tome that the maesters have kept for over two hundred years, only a single copy was allowed to exist in the deepest vaults.”

His brother hesitated, but the confusion was still thick in his eyes. “And this… this was why you invaded Oldtown?” the Drowned Priest said dumbfounded. “For a book?”

“Well, it wasn’t the only reason,” Euron admitted. “But yes, it was one of the motivations.”

Aeron still looked confused. Poor man. “The book is titled Blood and Fire.” Euron said slowly. “More oft, though, the tome is known as the ‘Death of Dragons’.”

It was a field of study that many, many people would be interested in nowadays, and this tome was perhaps the most notable work on the matter. Euron laughed, and turned around. “Yeah, I’m going to need that book quickly.”

He left Aeron standing on the marble mosaics, blinking and looking lost.

Euron spent the rest of the evening staring out over the city from his quarters, hypnotised by the sleeping fires of the city. When he went to bed, there were two weeping highborn maidens, both barely past womanhood, waiting for him manacled to his bedpost. When he eventually fell asleep, he dreamt of a great smoking abyss beneath the ocean, and tentacles writhing in the dark.

He was awakened early by the faintest rays of dawn, and by the singing of the candles. Euron grinned.

It is now. My friend arrives. Euron took a deep gulp of shade of the evening.

Euron threw a cloak over his shoulders, leaving it unfastened, as he stepped down towards the temple hall. He walked straight outside through the oak and silver doors, blinking against the morn’s sunlight.

The world was beating, ribbons of power like veins bleeding into the sky from the charnel-pits. The Starry Square was filled with supplicants come for their morning bread, and he saw the world in shades of blue and red.

At the sight of their God-King, the crowds writhed. Some of the people were cheering, others screaming.

From Euron’s personal guard, Mall the Monstrous looked shocked to see him out in the open. All of Euron’s Grotesques were out in force, securing the temple grounds. And yet among them, he saw ghosts. Men with cloven shoulders, men with shorn ghostly arms, and Mall standing with shards of spectral bone jutting from his ear. They were standing atop the steps, oblivious to their own brutally mutilated corpses. Euron grinned, standing amidst the ghosts only he could see.

“Your Worship,” the great, deformed man asked. Mall was a fearsome man clad in mismatched armour. “What happens, why are you–”

His voice was cut off by a cry of alarm from the Holy Gate. Euron only laughed, the shade burning in his blood. The dead are walking, Euron thought, grinning from the ear to ear as the crowds below roiled.

Bells were ringing from gatehouse. At first it was confusion, and then panic. Euron heard the thud of metal, followed by a painful squelch. There were the twangs of bowstrings, but they didn’t seem effectual. Suddenly, the cries were cut off by a solid crush, of something big and heavy against wood. Euron heard the gates splintering under tremendous force.

“Under attack!” an ironborn cried. “Under attack from the plaza!”

Even in the sleepy hour, the noise and clamour started to spread. “What’s happening?” Aeron demanded, hobbling from the temple. “What is happening? How many?”

“Stay back, Your Worship!” Mall the Monstrous boomed, clutching his warhammer as he tried to push Euron to safety. Euron just shooed him away, too busy laughing.

“How many?” Aeron demanded, as another crack of a battering ram against wood filled the air.

“One!” the cry came, as guards surged. “There’s one, it’s… it’s… oh God…”

Thud. The sound of a steel boot crashing through solid wood. He heard the chiming of arrows bouncing uselessly off thick metal plate.

It sounded like a battle spreading up the Steps of the Gods. A very one-sided battle. “One??” Aeron gasped.
“No,” Euron chuckled, folding his arms. “There’s actually two.”

He saw an ugly grey steel helm rising up the stairs. A faceless titan wearing a tattered grey cloak, a stained and torn rag that might have once been white. Guards surged forward, soldiers raising weapons. They shouted for the figure to halt, but received naught but silence. Euron could have stopped them, but he didn’t. He wanted to watch.

A giant blade swept outwards, cleaving straight through a pike, and then iron chainmail and through flesh beneath. Two ironborn fell, flesh and gore smearing over the seventy-seven steps. The figure didn’t even break stride. Euron’s men tried to fight it – one of them stabbed a spear into the creature’s back, but it didn’t pierce the steel. Euron only chuckled as the golem crushed the man’s skull with a single hand.

“Stay back, Your Worship!” Mall the Monstrous roared, his warhammer swinging, uneven legs loping. “Stay bac–”

Clang. The warhammer chimed against the creature’s head. The steel armour was beyond thick, it was like a walking castle of iron. There was a shallow dent in its skull, but the golem didn’t even stagger. Its fist lashed out, and suddenly Mall the Monstrous had never looked so small. Bone crunched, the warhammer fell.

A man like that could put Victarion to shame, Euron mused, as he started to walk down the stairs, brushing past bodies and ghosts.

“Your Worship!” Aeron screamed behind. “Your Worship!”

They tried to pull him back, but Euron just stepped out, half-naked, into the fray.

Up close, it was huge. It stood nine-foot tall; it had the body of a man, but such a thing couldn’t be called human. The steel sword raised high, like an executioner strike above Euron’s head. The God-King just opened his arms wide, and laughed.

The golem froze like a statue, mid-lunge. The whole courtyard turned still.

Eleven bodies and a shattered gate littered the approach. There had been no warning, no alert – nothing but a beast of man suddenly stepping out of the plaza and breaking through the gate. Euron could hear the ramble from outside – of the crowds of smallfolk staring at the bloody path the golem had carved. The mob was stirring at the broken gates and the God-King was exposed, but Euron wasn’t concerned.

“Well?” Euron shouted beyond the frozen golem. “You have my attention. Come on out now.”

“Your Worship…!” a guard intervened, but Euron waved him back. The golem wasn’t here to kill him, rather somebody was trying to make a sales pitch. ‘Look at how poor your current men are’, Euron mused, ‘look at easily my man pushes through them’.

There were a few heartbeats of uncertain silence, and then finally a single, unremarkable figure stepped forth from the crowd; a balding old man with slumped shoulders in a cheap brown cloak. A man that had been waiting in the Starry Plaza; he likely snuck in while his golem provided the distraction.

He looked like a scholar or a septon, perhaps; a grandfatherly figure with kind, aged eyes. He walked carefully, stepping through the splinters of the gate, brushing over the broken shafts of arrows. The golem lowered its sword.

Lord Qyburn paused, looking between the armed men and the bloody stairs. He lifted up the hem of his robes, and he bowed his head deeply before Euron. The golem waited, still and silent as a grave.

“Your Grace,” he said smoothly. “Forgive the intrusion, but I feel like an audience is deserved. I wished to make myself known, and I hoped that you might respect an entrance of strength.” He took another step. His voice was cautious, careful. “I hoped we might come to terms with each other. Perhaps we each have abilities and resources that the other might benefit from?” The old man took another step. “Perhaps a partnership between us might prove… fruitful?”

Nobody spoke, all eyes were fixed on the mountainous golem. The answer to so many problems. Lord Qyburn the Necromancer had finally arrived in the city. Euron smiled, still feeling delirious from the shade of the evening.

“I knew you would be coming to me,” Euron giggled. “I dreamt it.”

Sarella

This city is going mad, she thought. Sarella ran through the ragged cobbled streets, hearing the clatter of iron boots behind her.

“Stop!” a voice cried. “Halt!”

Sarella didn’t stop. She darted through the maze of alleys, jumping over the debris and flotsam littering the path. Wrecked houses and shops were smeared across the streets; many of the stones walls had survived, but the roofs had been torn off by the water. It left the streets and alleyways feeling haunted, surrounded by the broken husks of buildings. She could scarcely even recognise the city anymore.

Ahead of her, a wall had been half-collapsed in the flood, and Sarella jumped over it so smoothly her cloak barely touched the stone. Behind her, bells were ringing.

“Halt!” the watchmen cried. “Stop in the name of the God-King!”

The voices bore Reachmen accents. The men wore the uniforms of the City Watch of Oldtown, but the rose on their breastplates had been scratched off. It wasn’t ironborn chasing her; these men had likely fought against the ironborn. Two months ago, these men would have arrested anybody who proclaimed loyalty to the Crow’s Eye.

But that was two months ago. Two months. It felt like a lifetime.

Heavy boots scattered through grimy puddles. The stones were slick with rain, a light drizzle filling the air. Sarella was panting deeply, but she didn’t stop. Two months ago, she had been an acolyte at the Citadel. Now, she was being hunted. They were all being hunted.

Euron Greyjoy had given every man woman and child in Oldtown only a single choice; concede or suffer.

The bells were ringing. She was light and lean, she was a good sprinter. Not even Nym had been able to outrace Sarella over the red sands when they were young, and Obara had joked that she was half a horse. Her fondest memories were running over the beaches with her father and her sisters, roaming through caves in search of lost treasure. Sarella could outrun any guard in the City Watch, but the difficulty was if they surrounded her. The guards were ringing heavy bells, were calling for more support. Sarella would not be able to run forever.

But what choice do I have? she cursed. Find a place to hide? Take shelter in some winesink? It all depended on whether they had recognised her as a girl, or if they thought they were chasing a boy.

Her heart was racing, feet pounding. She didn’t understand why they were chasing her, not really, but these men seemed desperate to catch her. It was as though all of the guardsmen had just turned fanatic, nearly overnight, amidst the ironborn occupation. The whole city was crazed under the kraken’s shadow.

Maester Yandel named Euron Greyjoy as the Bloodstone Emperor come again, she recalled. She hadn’t understood what that meant at the time. But then she saw men carving krakens into their own flesh.

Boots clattered, bells chiming mad. This whole city is mad.

Sarella didn’t stop running.

She had seen Pate again. Pate the pig boy. She had taken refuge with the resistance, a ragtag group secluding themselves in a rundown tavern in the slums of the broken city – as they waited for news. Sarella had heard whispers that Brightwater Keep had surrendered to the ironborn, but they were truly waiting on word from Highgarden. Waiting for help from their lord paramount. Sarella was with the resistance of Oldtown; she had been keeping her head down and disguised as just another homeless wench – a thieving Summer Isles beggar – when she saw Pate the pig boy step through the door.

Pate hadn’t changed. She didn’t know how he was still alive. He was pale, soft and pasty, with a spotted face and wide, droopy eyes. Sarella was on the search to gather more support, and Pate was hardly the fighter that the resistance needed. Still, she had known Pate from their time as novices. Pate was sweet, gormless and innocent. She remembered a scared boy from her first days at the Citadel, and Sarella wanted to help him.

She didn’t understand what happened. The memory flashed before her.

Pate had walked into the tavern, and he had paid twenty golden coins for the last remaining horse. Twenty. That should have been Sarella’s first clue, but she assumed he must have stolen the money from somewhere. The horse was a ragged old mare, but the barkeep was still scared to give it up. Pate hadn’t recognised her at first, not until she stepped out of the crowd and grabbed his wrist. Her dark hand was shaded like teak against his pasty skin.

“Forget the horse,” Sarella whispered into his ear. The boy stiffened. “It’s useless, the gates are sealed.”

He hadn’t replied. Sarella tried to pull him into a corner, but he held steady. “Pate,” she hissed. “It’s me, Alleras—”

Pate hadn’t even hesitated. He had moved so fast her eyes could barely follow. She had seen the flash of a blade.

And then everything went mad.

He tried to stab me, Sarella realised only later. She felt the cut on her shoulder where his knife had nearly cut open her jugular. She had never imagined that Pate could move that fast. If not for the stranger suddenly tackling him to the ground, she knew that she would likely be dead.

The tavern had been cramped and overfilled with restless refuges, it had been a mob. Sarella had seen the cloaked figure hacking at Pate with a short sword but Pate – Pate! – moved too fast. Pate parried the blade, stopping the larger man with only a knife. Two of the patrons had tried to intervene, but then Pate’s blade flashed and two bodies were falling downwards. Sweet, innocent Pate had killed two men with such ease it was unreal.

It had been a scuffle. Sarella fell to the rotten floorboards and scampered away, but she had seen Pate screaming after her. Pate had his mouth open, but it wasn’t Pate’s voice.

“Thieves!” Pate had shrieked, but it was a high-pitched, scared female voice. A distressed, helpless voice, even as Pate slit open a man’s throat. If she hadn’t have seen him, Sarella would never have believed that such a voice could come from him. “Sneakthieves! Treason! It’s the resistance! Guards! Guards!”

Sarella had sprinted out of the door, and Pate gave chase. Pate’s legs were short and his stomach podgy, but he ran faster than she could have ever expected. Not quite as fast as her, but almost.

The guards had arrived quickly from all the screaming. Suddenly Sarella was running for her life, and she didn’t even understand why.

She had lost sight of Pate in two streets back – he had disappeared into the shadows somewhere – but the guards were still chasing her. She was still running.

She was running towards a city square. Sarella saw the seaweed-coated statue of Leo Longthorn standing stiffly at the edge of an abandoned bakery and a ransacked forge. Once, this was a plaza filled with trader’s stalls, but now it may as well have been a mausoleum. The ironborn had hacked off the head of Leo Longthorn, and hung the corpses of dissenters from his arms instead. The windows were all shuttered, the shops were dead.

She knew where she was; Thorn Square. The guards were running after her, but Sarella couldn’t keep running. There was no choice.

She slid across the slick stones and into the brambles, her hands snatching up the bow and quiver. A weapon was too dangerous to carry on her person, but she had hidden the goldenheart longbow here weeks ago. As soon as her hands gripped the smooth, sleek wood, it felt like she was whole.

Her father had taught her how to shoot, but her mother had gifted her the goldenheart bow on her very first visit to Oldtown. It felt like the bow was as part of her. Sarella moved so fluidly it was like water; an arrow notched onto her bow, the string quivering…

The bowstring snapped.

And suddenly one of the guards fell, with a wooden shaft straight through his eye. Like coring an apple. It was pure muscle memory.

The other guard didn’t stop running. Sarella fired again, but in the moment her aim was off. The bowstring was damp and her fingers slipped. The second arrow pierced into his shoulder, but his other hand was swinging a sword upwards. He didn’t stop running. She saw wild, fanatical eyes screaming at her.

“The God-King!” the man screamed. “For the God-Kin–!”
Then, the guard’s body shuddered as a slender blade slipped straight through his neck. Blood gushed, flesh ripped.

It was a bravo’s blade. The guard thumped to the cobblestones, rain drizzling around him.

Sarella took a deep breath, body shuddering. Her hands were shaking, but her fingers notched another arrow without hesitation.

“At ease,” a voice drawled from across the square. “Easy, Sphinx.”

She might have sagged. She knew that voice. “Leo.” She took a deep breath, staring at the two dead bodies. “Lazy Leo.”

The young man’s eyes gleamed in the dark. He moved swiftly, stepping out of the shadows and walking to pick up his blade. The former acolyte of Marwyn the Mage looked like he always did; handsome and pale, with ash-blond hair across his brow. Leo was dressed in satin that might have once been green and gold, but it was hard to see any colours though the layers of mud and grime.

“You’re a woman now,” he noted, nodding at the cheap and worn dress she wore.

“I was always a woman.”

“I always knew.”

“Is that why you kept staring at my breasts?” she retorted.

“Don’t flatter yourself,” Leo scoffed, as he pulled his blade out of the guard’s neck. “There’s hardly anything there to stare at.”

She scowled, holding her bow close. “Move. We need to run.”

She turned and ran, a light jog down the wharfside. Leo frowned in irritation, but then scattered after her. Already, Sarella was missing wearing breeches. At the Citadel, she had worn doeskin breeches and a snug brigandine, but she had been forced to wear a dress again when she needed to disappear. The dress just made everything so cumbersome.

They left the bodies of the watchmen where they fell, in the middle of the square. She turned to stare backwards, looking at the man with a wooden shaft protruding from his skull. “Was he the first you ever killed?” Leo asked as they ran.

“Aye.” Sarella took a deep breath. She had killed a man with barely a second thought.

“Don’t worry. It gets easier.”

“Apparently true.” Her eyes lingered on him. “That was damn good throw with your blade.”

“Truthfully, I was aiming at his knee,” Leo admitted. Sarella turned, trying to gauge whether or not he was japing. She couldn’t tell. “I knew that man. Morren – his name was. Or Mullen or Morrey or something like. I did not want to kill him.”

“He was a guardsman?”

“He once arrested me for drunken nudity,” said Leo, winking, but she ignored the jibe.

“And he betrayed his city.” She didn’t stop running. There were still bells ringing behind her, but the sound was moving in the other direction. “What is the City Watch doing?”
“The best that they can.” A rare crease of unease lined Leo’s features. “They are forced into servitude. The ironborn have been moving hostages – women and children – to the ruins of the Tower. They all have families that will be the first to suffer if they disobey.”

“So they surrender instead?” Her eyes narrowed.

“They do what they must.” Leo shook his head. “If there is any unruliness in the city, any riots, any protests to his rule – the Crow’s Eye has threatened to bring his monster back. They must keep the peace or else.”

She didn’t reply for a while. The gates were sealed, she considered, the people trapped in the city. Too many ironborn had survived the disaster that night, while that monster had devastated the Reach army and the city.

Sarella had seen the battle herself. She had nearly drowned in the waves as the mountainous black mass rose from the bay. She couldn’t explain what it was, she had scarcely even been able to process it at the time. It had been a monster of the sea – a beast of such scale that it beggared mythology. And it was still out there. Somewhere.

Any fleet that comes to save us is doomed for defeat. There wasn’t a ship on earth that could challenge something that big. No city could hold against it. It had devastated the army of the Reach, massacring the tens of thousands who’d been manning the walls, the beaches, the ships. Sarella couldn’t even say how many had survived, but she doubted if any near the front lines stood a chance.

In the aftermath, the city was left splintered. The bridges collapsed and one half of the city was left isolated from the other. The chain of command had been annihilated, and the city had fallen into bedlam instead. Oldtown had been so shaken that the ironborn seized what remained with ease. They stormed the Starry Sept, and it had been a bloodbath.

The resistance had formed in the days after, from the remnants of the Reach’s army and the city’s highborn – but then it was promptly shattered the very first night it met, and then the second, and then the third. Any attempt to plan a coup, no matter how hidden, was met with merciless brutality until the people of Oldtown dared not to even speak his name, terrified it might draw his wroth.

The message had been made clear; no assembly of defiance could happen in the city without the Crow’s Eye somehow knowing of it. The smallfolk whispered of demons, while the highborn muttered of turncloaks, but Sarella knew. He must be able to use glass candles. The resistance scarcely stood a chance if that were true, but some few still tried. The rest had caved to an unholy fear of the Crow’s Eye.

Originally, it had been Baelor Hightower, the Brightsmile, that led the Oldtown resistance, but then he conceded and surrendered in despair. A knight of Redwyne had taken up the banner of defiance for a week, but then he had ended up swinging from the spires of the sept, alive and screaming as hungry crows pecked him to death. Then a fisherman on the wharves had tried to lead a mass escape, but the Crow’s Eye had been waiting for him. Sarella heard now that Garlan Tyrell was still alive and still fighting, but whether that was fact or fantasy she could not say.

Sarella and Leo kept on running, until they finally stopped for breath in a grimy alleyway. Her eyes narrowed on Leo, a hint of suspicion in her eyes. Can he be trusted? They had grown somewhat close under the tutelage of Archmaester Marwyn, but the Leo she knew had been arrogant and malicious.

Sarella took care to keep several paces away from him, with her goldenheart bow held tightly and her eyes peeled on the bravo’s blade on his belt. Too many friends had betrayed her today.

“Your father,” she said after a time. “Morwyn Tyrell. He commands the guard.”

“My father does,” he replied, his voice chilly. “My father is more trapped than anyone.”

“Disputable.” She cocked her head. “The City Watch has gone mad.”

“They’re scared.”

“Then they’ve gone mad from fear.”

Leo did not object the point. “My mother, my sisters,” he said grimly, “are all locked in the ruins of the tower. And my father was forced to brand his flesh.”

“And yourself?” There was a lingering suspicion in her voice. “You are not trapped.”

“You think this is the first time I’ve run away from home?” he scoffed. Moryn Tyrell was the uncle of Lord Mace Tyrell, an old and influential figure in Oldtown. Leo was his youngest and unruly son. Leo and his father had oft been at odds with each other; Lord Morwyn had banished Leo to the Citadel years ago, but even then Leo hadn’t stopped whoring, drinking and gambling.

“I looked for you that night,” Sarella said stiffly, keeping her bow close. “You vanished before the battle.”

“Aye,” Leo nodded, taking a step forward. She took a step back. “And be thankful that I did. Else I wouldn’t have been able to save your life.”

She scoffed, forcing all weakness from her voice. “I had that man handled.” Morren or Mullen or Morrey or whatever his name was.

“I do not doubt it.” Lazy Leo took another step towards her. “But I was not speaking of him. I was speaking of before. In the tavern.”

She paused. Her eyes flickered to his cloak, a black cloak. It had been so fast she hadn’t seen the face of the man in the tavern. She had only seen the black cloak as a figure tackled Pate to the ground. “That was you?”

“It was.”

Her father had always warned her not to believe in coincidences. She stiffened. “Were you following me?”

“No. I was following him, the pig boy.”

“Pate.” He used to hate being called the pig boy. “Explain yourself, Leo. Why did Pate try to stab me?”

“That wasn’t Pate.”

“It looked like him.” Leo nodded, and Sarella bit her lip. “Then who was he?”

“I don’t know, but it was wearing Pate’s face,” Leo retorted. “Not a him. I thought there was something different about the pig boy, I had my suspicions that night.”

“Why?”
“Because Pate the pig boy was always scared,” Leo said foully. “The pig boy was a trembling craven, but then – months ago – he stopped trembling. Stopped being scared at all. Oh, Pate acted the same, but he would smile a bit longer and his eyes were a bit sharper. That was what got my attention.”

Sarella didn’t reply, but her dark gaze flickered. “And then, on that night,” Leo continued, “Pate disappeared as well. I tried to scry him, but he vanished from the glass candle’s sight. So I followed him the old-fashioned way, and I saw the pig boy sneaking around the lower levels – it was going to the vaults.”

Sarella was quiet, digesting it in. The snideness in Leo’s tongue had faded from what she had once known. He was less aggressive, less cruel in his barbs. “You call Pate an ‘it’,” she noted slowly. “Why?”

Leo pointed to his bravo’s blade. “Because it doesn’t feel. I stabbed it straight through the chest, twice, and it didn’t even seem to feel a thing. Two clean cuts to the gut, and yet there is no blood on my blade. It was stronger, faster, and the way it moved… you saw it too.”

She had. It hadn’t moved like a human. “And I’ve been following it,” Leo continued. “It didn’t eat, didn’t drink, didn’t sleep. It has been hiding out in a slum for a while, waiting for a chance to leave the city. I followed it, waiting for it to get out in the open. Thanks to you, I saw my chance in the tavern. I took it.”

That was a lot of work just for a suspicion. The city was in chaos, yet Leo had fixated on Pate above everything else. “Why?”

“Because I could only assume that the vanishing pig boy must be related to the Crow’s Eye,” Leo explained dourly. “And I wanted to find out what it was after. I wanted the chance to cut that satchel off its shoulder.”

He swept his cloak to one side. Beneath his arm, there was a hefty leather satchel rest under his shoulder. The straps had been cut clean off – that was an old purse-snatcher’s technique. Cut the straps, grab and run.

Suddenly, a bit more of that moment made sense. Pate had screamed ‘thief’ as she ran away.

Sarella raised an eyebrow. “You stole this?”

“It was already stolen. Why else would one creep into the vaults, and emerge carrying this bag?” Leo shook his head. “No, our stranger had been waiting for the right moment to steal it. It disguised itself as Pate, lingered around the Citadel, and waited until everyone else had evacuated. It used the battle as a distraction.”

Sarella frowned. “If that’s true… it implies that this ‘stranger’ knew the Crow’s Eye was coming.”

“Yes,” Leo agreed. “Now isn’t that curious?”

The only sound was the rain dribbling into the flooded streets. After a moment’s pause, Sarella lowered her bow, and extended her hand for the satchel. Leo handed it over, and unfastened the clasps.

The bag had a hefty weight to it. As soon it opened, she a dark brown cover; a ragged and aged surface, and pages of brownish parchment. “It is a book.”

“Aye. Stolen from the Citadel’s vaults.”
Her head spun. “The guards are looking for books,” she said slowly. “The Crow’s Eye ordered the militia to find one for him.”

He nodded. ‘The Drowned God commands you to action’, the so-called High Priest had proclaimed less than a week before. ‘Prove your devotion; return the lost book to the temple, and His Worship shall extend His benevolence’. With only few words, they had set the city to chaos.

Leo pulled his cloak over the satchel, protecting the dusty pages from the light rain. The tome had once been sealed with an iron clasp, but someone must have broken the lock. Sarella gingerly pulled it out, inspecting at the unmarked leather cover. “Do you know what it is?” she asked.

“No the foggiest. But if they want it, I’m inclined to keep it from them.” Leo’s gaze was dark. “The Crow’s Eye destroyed half the city for this book.”

The light was faint, so she roamed her fingers over the cover. There was a symbol etched onto the leather, Sarella noticed. At one time, it might have been painted, but the cover was faded and the paint flecked away. Still, she could feel the seal of House Targaryen imprinted on the cover, she could feel the dragon within its circle.

It took her a while to realise what was different on the sigil, but this three-headed dragon was headless. There were only three stumps on the dragon’s necks. A headless Targaryen dragon.

“I looked at it myself, and I could make no sense of it,” Leo noted. “But riddles are your specialty, aren’t they, Sphinx?”

She ignored the jibe. Sarella opened the tome gingerly, noticing the brownish stain that lined the edge of the parchment. The faded ink had been written in a careful hand, pages filled with characters that were still legible. There were no pictures that she could see, each page was filled with a solid wall of text. Sarella stared blankly.

Sarella could read High Valyrian, Old Ghiscari and Dothraki. She knew the bastard forms of Valyrian, was vaguely familiar with Lhazareen, and she could recognise several of the variants of the Asshai spelltongues. She had studied the runes of the First Men, though there wasn’t a person alive who could properly translate those. Sarella even knew something of the Summer Tongue that her mother taught her. Still, she couldn’t even make sense of the runes that filled the book. Some of the characters looked vaguely similar to High Valyrian, but it was more like gibberish.

“I cannot read it,” she said finally. “This is either a language that I do not know, or it has been coded in a cypher.” Or maybe both, she suspected.

“Can it be translated?”

“Perhaps.” With great difficulty. “But it would take time and I do not know where to begin. I do not know what this is, or why it is of interest.”

Leo’s lips curled. “Do you want to go back and ask the pig boy?” he sneered. “Or would you rather see if the Crow’s Eye cares to explain it to us?”

“I think not.” Sarella’s eyes were still fixed on the book, her brows frowning. “Do you have any glass candles left?” she asked after a pause.

“If only. I lost the last of them when the Citadel fell.”

Then what other options are available to us? She could run to her uncle, perhaps, but how would Doran even be able to help? How could anybody help against the powers Euron held? Half of the major cities in the world would be nothing more than fodder for Euron’s monster. Perhaps refugees could flee inland, but how could anybody truly threaten him when a beast like that roamed the seas?

I came to the Citadel in search of knowledge, she thought slowly. My father always told me to know my foe. You cannot beat something unless you know it. Perhaps this mysterious tome was the only chance she had to get ahead of Euron Greyjoy’s power.

Leo was right. This was a riddle.

“You said that the stranger stole this from the vaults, yes?” Sarella said eventually.

“Aye.”

There were vaults littered beneath the Citadel’s grounds; it was often said that it was a labyrinth of libraries built into old quarry shafts webbing beneath the earth. Many areas were restricted, and every acolyte had been heavily regulated. Each archmaester carried a unique key that granted them access to private vaults, and the key of the seneschal had been passed down over eons. Maesters were keepers of knowledge; Sarella could easily believe that they might have locked something away.

“Then logically someone must have put it in the vaults. The maesters must have catalogued it at some point – someone in the Conclave must know its significance.”

“Perhaps. Perhaps none but the archmaesters do.” His voice was doubtful. “And any surviving archmaesters will now be under Euron’s care.”

She shook her head. “Not all of them.” Sarella pulled her gaze up from the pages, to the shadow of the fallen tower in the distance. “We must get this book to Marwyn.”

Sam

“Dead!” the crow cawed, as it fluttered down the tunnels to match his pace. “Dead, dead, dead!”

Sam grimaced, then let out a sigh as he hoisted the kettle of water down the steps. The crow had overheard him breaking the news to a distraught mother, and now the damnable bird kept on chanting that word. Mormont’s crow, Sam considered. Lord Commander Mormont was long dead in the wilderness somewhere, but his crow still lingered. Uneasy refugees flinched as the black wings fluttered passed in the wormwalks, screeching death.

“Tend to the bloody wounds first, Dalla,” Sam said. “And keep the hearth burning, these people need their strength.”

“As you say, Lord Steward,” Dalla replied with a soft hand on his shoulder. Her touch still caused Sam’s heart to flutter, but the thought of the task ahead quickly dampened it.

The infirmary was overfilled; the weak, the frail and wounded flooding out into the lower tunnels. Castle Black felt crowded fit to burst, and everywhere the Lord Steward looked, he saw suspicious eyes, gaunt and guarded faces. Last week, two giants had brawled over a bushel of onions. Three days ago, a woman had killed a man fighting for the last loaf of bread. The food in the ice tunnels was running low, and for weeks Mance had them all on half-rations. The snows had cut them off from supplies from Eastwatch, just as it had prevented the refugees from moving southwards.
Sam passed Red Jack Crabb, Rusty Flowers and Garse standing guard, as Brown Bernarr helped him carry the poultices and medicinal supplies and Small Paul carried the pots and pans, while four washerwomen carried bundles of blankets.

Thousands of people were left trapped in the castle, but it still felt eerily quiet as Sam traipsed through the wards. It was like people were afraid to speak.

“Dead, dead, dead!” Mormont’s crow echoed, and for a moment Sam wished he could strangle the bird.

The only sound breaking the gloom was the wailing of babes, or the haggard, throaty breaths of dying men. The very last of the free folk refugees, and they were a sorry and haunted lot.

Sam, Dalla and the others were only just starting their daily rounds, but it was all grim. Sam knew that two of the wildling chiefs, Two-Toed Dirk and Marv the Red Hand, were running a betting pool on who would die next.

From above, Sam could feel the ground throbbing with the storms, and the hissing of wind through the twisting tunnels.

Castle Black was well and truly snowed under. The snows above were so high they reached halfway up the maester’s keep. Over fifteen foot of snow, the last Sam checked. More than enough to bury a man, and to make travel impossible for all but the hardiest. Any exposed would be dead in minutes, not even the castle’s courtyard was safe to walk across.

Instead, all of the sworn brothers and all the refugees had to scuttle about beneath the wormwalks, like snow rabbits hiding below ground. Some days, the tunnels felt like crypts.

Sam clattered through with a pile of blankets on his back, a kettle full of lukewarm water sloshing in his hands. He trekked through the wards like a rag-and-bone man going about his duty. Sam went along the right, Dalla took the left.

It was the Lord Steward’s duty to see to these people, but Dalla… nobody expected her to be here, yet she here she was. Sam bore so much respect for her, the Lady of Castle Black, for helping him with these tasks. Dalla was a new mother herself, but she still found time to change bandages and empty bedpans.

“Dress the wound twice a day,” Sam told a free folk woman, as she cradled a hand with three fingers sheared off by frostbite. Her eyes were haggard, her cheeks sunken and grim. “Here, use this poultice, rub the ointment in to the joints. It’s ginger and honeyleaf, it’ll ease the sting.”

Sam forced a smile, but the woman didn’t react. “Three of the fingers are gone, but we might still save the rest of the hand,” Sam said, trying to be reassuring.

She didn’t thank him, but she took the medicine. She was an older woman with a face like leather, likely a spearwife in her youth. Sam didn’t know her name, he didn’t know anyone’s name.

He moved on, to inspect the splint on a man’s broken leg. Sam was no maester, but Castle Black didn’t have anyone else.

More and more, his eyes drifted towards Dalla, as she sponged down an ugly wound. Dalla is far too pretty to belong in a place like this, Sam decided. They said that her sister Val was the more beautiful one, but Dalla’s hair was soft brown instead of gold, and Dalla was sweet and tender where Val had been cold.
The air was quiet as rewrapped the wildling’s leg. Thankfully, Mormont’s crow flew off to screech elsewhere. The man grimaced in pain, but Sam pulled the bandages tight. The bone felt knobbly, and he could see where the flesh had congealed.

“I have your bandages for you, m’lord,” a washwoman said dutifully, approaching with a basket of grimy sheets. She was a mousy woman, with a bright white stone on grimy furs.

“Thank you, Gilly,” Sam sighed. “Here, take these bandages too and give them a wash. We’ll need to reuse them.”

“Yes, m’lord.” Gilly bowed clumsily, grabbing the rags and turning to walk away.

Sam gave the wildling a nervous smile that the man didn’t return. “The leg is healing well,” Sam lied. “Do you have a blanket, something to keep it off the ground?”

“Got one for my back,” the wildling croaked. “Only got one.”

Blankets were in short supply. Everything was in short supply. Sam had been forced to set a limit, one blanket per person. “Well, I’ll see about requisitioning you another,” Sam offered. “Just keep the leg rested.”

The man was clearly in pain. Sam could have offered milk of the poppy, but he didn’t. Medicine had become more valuable than gold.

Sam made a note on a parchment, breathing deeply as he waddled on to the next. There were hundreds, thousands, with some injury or another, and Sam doubted if there were enough bandages in the north for them all. He had to prioritise.

Of all the people he tried to help in a day, he doubted if one in ten of them would survive the year. For the rest, Sam was just attending to the dead.

“Lord Steward,” another woman begged of him, a scrawny woman missing her front teeth. “It’s my boy… the coughing hasn’t stopped. Do you have more of that ointment?”

The boy was four years old, but the mother looked younger than Sam was. The child’s face was white, each breath like a frog’s croak, and the mother looked on the brink of tears.

Sam hesitated. An infection of the lungs. He had hoped the illness would clear, but it had become obvious that it wouldn’t. “I can’t afford to give you any more, he almost said, there’s too little medicine left, and he is passed the point of recovery. “Of course I can. Honey, chamomile and thyme, to ease the swelling,” Sam lied.

Instead, he gave the woman a pouch of mushed nettles mixed with water. That ‘medicine’ was as good as useless, but the boy would be dead before the mother realised the difference. Sam didn’t want to admit that he had to ration supplies, and that her son was a lost cause.

The boy wheezed and croaked, cradled in his mother’s arms. She sung to him softly, but Sam forced himself to walk away. Dalla hugged the woman tightly and whispered comforts, but Sam turned away so they wouldn’t see the lie on his face.

There were times when this job felt like it was tearing away his soul.

Maybe Dalla noticed. “You gave that boy the best chance that anyone could have,” she whispered later. Sam didn’t reply.
Later, one starved spearwife offered to have sex with Sam in return for a turnip. He didn’t know what was more depressing; that the spearwife was desperate enough to make such an offer, or that other sworn brothers had apparently been taking her up on it. Sam told Dalla of it, who promised to take the matter up with Mance.

“I have the broth,” Owen announced, stepping down the steps, struggling to carry a hefty iron cauldron. It banged against every step, weak gravy spluttering against the wood. “They said I should bring the broth.”

Sam sighed. A rumour had spread that there were people sick with greyscale in the tunnels, and now all of the stewards passed on the job of feeding them to Owen the Oaf alone. “I’ll help you with that, Owen,” Sam offered, rushing to grab the other end of the cauldron. Owen only grinned dimly.

“Food is here, folk,” Dalla called, banging a pan. “Grab your dish and line up.”

They were already stirring. Every day there were more hungry stomachs and not enough broth. It was already more water than meat. “Praise to the Dragon,” a free folk croaked, and the cry was echoed around others wearing white stones. “Praise the Dragon.”

“Praise the Dragon,” Owen the Oaf repeated, just because he likely thought it a grand thing to say. Sam grimaced as he saw northmen glare at those words.

There were more than just free folk taking shelter in Castle Black now. Sam saw northerners from villages in the Gift that had been forced into Castle Black because they had nowhere else to go. Greybeards and children, free folk and northmen were all huddled into the wormwalks because there was no choice.

The cold winds were blowing, and the snows were the common enemy.

“I’d like to see the dragon again,” Owen the Oaf said idly, a goofy grin on his lips as they spooned out broth. “Do you think I could touch it this time?”

“I expect Jon would not object,” Sam replied. “But I don’t know when it’ll be back.”

“I dreamt it coming back,” Owen noted. “I dreamt it coming over the Wall.”

“That’s the wrong direction, I’m afraid. The dragon is already over.”

“No,” Owen wailed. “They were coming over.”

Sam was about to reply when he saw Dalla striding towards with four dishes in her arms. “Those at the back can’t walk too well,” she motioned with her head. “Grab a few plates, will you?”

Sam quickly filled a few extra dishes, balancing them on his arms. “I’m on it.”

As he trekked through the infirmary handing out dishes, he came upon a small and wounded boy – about thirteen years old – who was shivering uncontrollably and running a fever. Sam stopped, pausing to dab a damp cloth over his forehead and dribbling stew down his throat. The child sputtered awake, stirring, and shaking on the edge of delirium.

Sam recognised the boy; the patrols had found him in the woods weeks ago, with half a speartip embedded in his torso. The wound hadn’t killed him, but the fever threatened to finish the job.

The boy was trembling, so frail and weak.
“Easy,” Sam soothed, holding the child’s hand. “Do you have any family? Is there anyone I can find for you?”

It seemed like the boy was trying to speak; his eyes twitching unfocused, lips mumbling nonsensically. “What’s your name, child?” Sam asked. “Do you have a name?”

“… I… It’s…” the boy whispered. Sam leaned in, straining to hear. Even in the cold, the child was sweating and burning. “… fall… going to fall…”

Delirious, Sam thought sadly. He saw the child’s eyes; bright green pupils dilated. He was muttered incoherently. “It’s going to fall… fall…

Sam straightened, and sighed. If the boy had any parents, they were likely dead. Just another lost orphan of this war – there were a thousand more just like him.

Still, Sam hesitated, looking solemnly at the delirious child with the bright green eyes.

Behind him, Sam heard the first of the angry shouts as the stew ran out.

“Lord Steward!” a voice boomed suddenly, causing Sam to jump. “The Mance wants you!”

He heard the howl of wind as the latches swung open, footsteps thundering down the steps. A few of refugees jumped as the flurry of snow swept through the tunnels. Sam flinched, floundering to his feet and wheezing.

He pushed the pile of bandages into Gilly’s hands. “See to the rest, please?” Sam begged of her. “Keep them warm, make sure the sickly have plenty of water.”

The washwoman nodded. Heavy boots were striding quickly through the wormwalks, moving with urgent purpose. He tried to run for Dalla, but the woman just nodded.

“Go to my husband,” she said with a nod. “I’ll finish up here.”

Husband. Sam knew it was naught but a foolish crush, but he couldn’t help feel a surge of emotions when he thought of Mance and Dalla. She is sweet lady, that’s all. She reminds me of my sister.

Sam was pulling his cloak on, and tightening his belt. There was a steel dagger on his waist – not that Sam was any good at using it, but there were so many unfamiliar faces around that he felt more comfortable with it. On his other side, he had an old horn fastened by his buckle, and his small book of notes kept safe in a pouch. At Mance’s bequest, Sam had even taken to wearing a necklace of boar tusks wrapped around his neck, because apparently the free folk respected men who clad themselves in totems of their rank. Sam felt so silly wearing such a thing, but he did so anyways.

The man that met him was a tall and broad figure, with wolf’s teeth pierced through his ears and trophies of a hundred hunts on his person. A fearsome figure with tattoos across his cheeks and forehead, wearing a black cloak. “Lord Steward,” Wulf said gruffly. “The watchtowers lit a beacon, there’s movement in the woods. It might be more refugees.”

He approached along with Garth Greenspear, as well as two wildling men; Jax and Two-Toed Dirk. They were all wearing black cloaks crusted in snow.

Sam was already moving. He had to waddle quickly to keep pace with Wulf’s long legs. “Do we know how many?”
“Not yet.” They twisted down the corridor, stomping up towards the main buildings. All around him, there were wildlings wearing black cloaks.

Mance had found three thousand men who took the oaths and wore the black – three thousand free folk. There were only four hundred of the old guard remaining, and it seemed like that number was getting smaller every day.

As they stomped up through the barracks, Sam noticed Edd rushing around with pans of boiled water, while Grenn was instructing some of the new recruits on how to sharpen iron blades. Ser Endrew Tarth had been appointed as master-at-arms, and Duncan Liddle had been named as castellan, but all the other positions were being filled by wildlings with names like Marv the Red Hand, Andrik Bonestew, Brogg Big-Chin, Thundering Mammoth, or Marthe of the Antlers. Former chieftains that had chosen the black instead.

The rest were all unfamiliar faces.

“Varamyr!” Wulf boomed into the barracks. “Orders from The Mance. Get your bloody eagle in the skies, we need it over the wall!”

A bearded, skinny man in a ragged shadowskin cloak sneered at him. Varamyr Sixskins – or Varamyr Sevenskins as he now tried to insist – was a gaunt figure with a sunken face, hunched over in his furs and pelts.

“Do you think any eagle can fly in this weather?” Varamyr retorted, motioning at the howling winds outside.

“Then where are your wolves, dammit? Mance wants eyes in the forest.”

It looked like Varamyr muttered something scathing about what Mance wants, but Sam couldn’t make out the words.

There were twenty-two wargs in Castle Black, with Varamyr named as the unofficial leader of them – although Sam had quickly learnt that skinchangers squabbled worse than cats. Varamyr had one eagle, four wolves, a hunting dog, and a horse as his skins, but there was also a giant boar, a shadowcat, a snow rabbit, an owl, an auroch, and more wolves scattered around. At Eastwatch, more wargs were stationed, led by a woman who could skinchange into the body of an ice shark.

The wargs are useful, Sam considered. Troublesome in their own way, but none could deny their use. King Snow had named Varamyr and two dozen other free folk as Wardens of the Exodus, and they had succeeded in bringing many refugees south even in the most difficult conditions.

Still, the flow of refugees through the gates was now barely a trickle. Any remaining settlements north of the Wall had either been evacuated already, or they were beyond the reach of the Wardens and had gone silent. The last refugees they recovered had been brought through the gates three days ago, when two wounded raiders limped through the tunnel. Before that, the last had been a week ago when crazed men from the Valley of Thenn staggered through, raving of fathers eating sons and endless skirmishes with the dead. Before that, it had been a clan of cave dwellers muttering of even worse down in the Gorne’s Way, jabbering of monsters rising in the depths.

Mance persisted in the search, but hope was running low. Are there still people out there?

“Have Erik Bearclaw ready the gates,” Sam ordered. Keep your voice firm, he tried to tell himself. “And have Bedwyck prepare the horses in case we need to ride out to them through.”

“Aye,” Wulf nodded, stepping forward and bellowing commands. Sam saw Marthe of the Antlers – a tall and grim man with sunken eyes – stand stiffly to attention as they swept past.

“Is it man?” a voice demanded of him, and Sam turned to see Henrik the Hog, a shout and stout man with a broken nose and dark eyes. Sam could barely make out the words through the wildling’s guttural accent. “Or worse?”

“We don’t know yet,” Sam replied meekly.

Sam tried to walk past, but Henrik grabbed a hold of his collar. Sam nearly squealed. “I know what I saw out there!” Henrik snapped. “I felt the ground rumbling out there, it was shaking… there was something…!”

“Get back, Henrik,” Wulf growled, with a hard shove. “Mance is calling us.”

“I know what I saw! I heard it!” Henrik wailed, his shoulders trembling. “There was something under the ground, they were digging something up!”

Sam grimaced, but did not reply as he walked away. A fortnight ago, Henrik the Hog had been the only survivor of a search party tasked to scout out the Frostfangs. It had not gone well. Henrik had returned to Castle Black raving and half-crazed. His jabbering report that the Others might be digging had caused Mance to send parties out across the entire length of the Wall, but they had found no sign of a tunnel. Mance had wanted to investigate further, but then the snows had cut off all efforts.

_We know that the Others are at the Frostfangs, Sam thought, but little else._ Reports from the Thenns at the Shadow Tower said that the white walkers were scouring the mountain – especially around the old free folk camp. The place where the Others had ambushed Mance’s army. None could get close enough to learn more, but it was a safe bet that the Others were resurrecting whatever corpses were left behind.

The winds caused the door to rattle. Sam buried his head under his hood and braced himself. The stepped outside of the building, and he was blinded by the flurry. The wood had been freezing over, so cold that even oak could snap. The steps had become treacherous, and Sam had no choice but to grab a hold Wulf’s shoulder to keep himself steady.

In the courtyard, a towering figure roared – a creature of shaggy fur pushing easily through the snow. The giant gripped a huge makeshift snow plough, shoving through the snow drifts with goliath force.

“Keep the tunnel clear, Wun Wun!” Wulf ordered. Sam’s throat froze every time with the sight of such a monster. “We might have men coming though!”

Wun Wun; the very first giant to take the black and join the Night’s Watch. Wun Wun was fifteen-foot-tall, so powerful he could singlehandedly man the lift’s winch. Sam was told the giant was friendly, yet truthfully Sam had always kept his distance. Wun Wun roared over the wind, shoving the snow plough forward – wooden stokes clattering over stones. A great gush of snow geysered into the air behind him.

All around him, Castle Black was stirring. The alert had gone up, the sworn brothers were on the move.

Mance’s command had reformed the castle. The gates had not been shut for months, but they were still patrolled while sworn brothers escorted every last refugee through. Mance had ordered fortifications to be built on the other side of the Wall, with watchtowers monitoring the northern forest. A line of sentries was established to relay alerts, with every vulnerability patched. The wildlings proved very good at identifying the Watch’s weaknesses.

Every castle on the Wall was manned and garrisoned again, with the exception of the Nightfort which was still under reconstruction. Mance had even ordered ships to be built at Westwatch-by-the-Bridge again, and then he had introduced new siege defences and garrisons of men that were stationed upon the Wall itself.

It had been long and bloody, but it felt like the Night’s Watch was being rebuilt. It felt like it was helping people again.

The courtyard was rustling, figures in black staggering through the snows. Sam heard the creaking as the lift was levered downwards, and billows of snow swept over the cornices atop the Wall, howling over the towers of the castle below.

Wun Wun was still manning the winch. Everything in the yards was flooded white, but black cloaks were powering through. Sam drew his cloak in tighter, readying himself for the frigid ascent up the lift. “Prepare the winch!” Fulk the Flea yelled. “Get ready to–”

UUUUUoooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo. Suddenly, the boom of a warhorn split through the air, long and slow and echoing across the Wall. That was Rory’s horn, Sam knew, the signal relayed from the other side of the Wall. The whole courtyard stopped, every man tensing to listen.
Waiting to see if there would be another one. There are two parties of rangers out there – both Tom Barleycorn and Harle the Handsome are in the field, Sam thought, are they returning, or are there more refugees?

UUUUUoooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo. The second blast blared. Sam sighed. It was a symbol of the times that wildlings approaching was no longer something to be feared. “We have more coming, prepare blankets and hearths!” Sam announced. “They’ll likely be weak and col–”

UUUUUUUoooooooooooooooooooooooooo. The horn boomed again, long and terrible, splitting through the snows.

The world froze.

At once, Varamyr was running. Sam heard wolves howling. Wulf’s eyes widened, and instantly they were all rushing. “Seal the gates!” Wulf boomed. “Seal them! Seal the gates!”

“Get the people to the lower levels!” a wildling, Leathers, shouted. “Ain’t a practice, get them to the vaults!”

Three horns. They had tried to make sure the men would be prepared; Sam and Mance had devised a drill routine together. They had given every man their emergency stations, they had assigned duties, and there had been regular practice runs. Sam heard the bell tower clattering, he saw sworn brothers calling for fire.

This was no practice run. Best case, one of their scouts had overreacted, but in the worst case…

They all knew their duties. Sam saw Grenn rushing to meet with Mo and Haldur Two-Notch, grabbing the banner of the King’s Dragonguard stationed at Castle Black. When the alert went up, the first priority was for the Dragonguard to signal Jon Snow, so they could call upon Sonagon to help them.

Everyone else was assigned either to the Wall, or to the gates. They had practiced it a hundred times; all bowmen kept bows close to hand, spears and lances at the front lines, and the rest were needed to run supplies and fortify buildings. The stewards, Sam’s command, were assigned as rearguard to protect the refugees. \textit{We have prepared for this}, Sam tried to tell himself above the pounding of his heart, \textit{we prepared for this}.

Sam’s breath was short in his throat. He was running, shoving his way through the snow. “Where’s Mance?” Sam called, and his voice turned to a squeak as the eyes of a score of wildlings fell on him. “Where’s Mance?”

One of the men – Tim Stone – pointed upwards to the vast heights the Wall. There was so much snow that Sam couldn’t even see the top.

“Wargs on me!” Varamyr shouted. “Get your beasts in position, get on the Wall!!”

He heard one of the wildlings – Leathers – shouting in the Old Tongue as hulking shapes rose from the snow. Most of the giants had left with Jon’s and the Weeper’s armies, but there were eight forest giants, including Wun Wun, that had lingered at Castle Black. All eight were best employed on the rear lines, Mance had commanded, to reinforce the gates and carry supplies. Wun Wun was by far the biggest of the bunch.

“Bowmen!” Wulf roared. “Bowmen on me! Dragonglass and fire, get your arrows!!”

They had assigned every archer to either shafts doused in oil or flames, or obsidian arrows. One dragonglass Bowman to every ten burning ones, with strict regiments in place. \textit{We prepared for this. We’re prepared.}

Still, his skin was crawling with fear. All it took was three horn blasts, and everyone was rushing.

Two dozen men with bows were running into the platform. Sam saw Garth Greyfather, Ulmer, Mathar, Dornish Dilly, Hairy Hal and Bearded Ben – the best archers in the Watch – pushing for their positions, but Wulf shoved the others out of the way as he herded Varamyr and Sam through. The Lord Steward belonged with the command atop the Wall, and Varamyr would be critical for relaying information that his many eyes and ears saw. The rest were all bowmen, but the lift wasn’t big enough for them all; any who couldn’t fit would have to run up the steps.

“Get them up there!” Fulk the Flea barked. “Wun Wun!”

Wun Wun roared as he winched the lift upwards. Sam heard frozen ropes straining, and icicles clattering around the frame. The great platform shuddered upwards, groaning and cracking with every movement. The lift was heavy and overloaded, but Wun Wun tightened the pulley hard and relentlessly. The journey up didn’t take long, but his heart was beating so fast it felt like a lifetime.

To the south, everything was blanketed white. Sam could barely even see the trees under all that snow.

“I feel them,” Varamyr gasped as the wind howled, his eyes glazed over as he walked in separate skins. “I feel them, they’re out there…”

Nobody spoke. Looking down, Castle Black seemed so small and frail.

“How many are we looking at?” Sam whispered with a gulp. “Got many could there be?”

“Not a clue,” Wulf replied. “But we’ve been overdue an attack for a long time now.”

Yes, the white walkers had been staying away from the Wall. Sam had heard of clashes with raiding parties, but there had been few signs of the Others moving in strength. \textit{But we’re prepared}
And finally the lift cracked into place, shuddering as the counterweight hit the ground. The platform was swaying in the wind, but the men were already rushing off onto the top of the Wall.

“What happens?” Sam called. “What’s happening?”

Atop the Wall, everything was heaving. Half-constructed wooden structures littered the ice, and skeletal towers were protruding outwards atop supports. It had been another of Mance’s strategies; to fortify the Wall itself with siege platforms stretching out over the northern edge. Bowmen would have a better position, dropping oil and barrels would become easier. For months, they had put the refugees to work chopping trees and cutting timber.

Still, the snows had delayed all those efforts. The new defences were only half-made, and now there were men trying to scramble over patchy platforms buried in snow and makeshift catapult perches.

Voices were lost amidst the howling wind, while men sprinted back and forth. Seven hundred foot off the ground, the winds were so fierce they could have swept a man straight off the wall. It was howling deafeningly through the wooden palisades, scouring over the ice.

“What happens?” Sam called again, but there was no reply. Instead, Wulf had to grab him by the arm and drag him across treacherous ice. The Wall was lined by trenches dug through the snow, forming makeshift barriers against the wind.

Sam saw Mance himself at the far end of the battlements, perched on a lookout point at the edge of the Wall. Flurries of shouting were all around him, desperate voices trying to make themselves heard over each other.

“To the west!” a man bellowed. “We got three watchtowers lighting flares now.”

“They’re coming fast, Mance,” a wildling warned. “From north and west.”

Mance’s eyes were grim. Sam saw his jaw tighten as he stared out over the wasteland of snow. “Get our people back,” he ordered. “Signal the retreat! Get them through the gates and close the damn doors.”

They wouldn’t make it, Sam knew. Maybe a few would get lucky, but the far lookouts never stood a chance. The watchtowers were temporary positions; a crucial measure to give the Wall warning, but those positions had always been undefendable. Mance had chosen to appoint sacrificial sentries to secure the refugee path.

“The dragon will be coming,” a wildling muttered, staring downwards as his hand moved over his white stone. “Salvation will arrive.”

“He will,” Sam whispered, but without the same conviction. One of their skinchangers could warg into a bat – as soon as the three horns blasted, the bat would be flying to alert the dragon. All the defenders had to do was hold until the flying reinforcement arrived.

Still, Sam couldn’t shake the doubt. The castle had heard that Winterfell had fallen, but little else. The silence was worrying.

To the north, across the snowy wastelands, Sam saw the dark tendrils of smoke fading in the forest. Perhaps the view was just being obscured by the flurry, but it looked like the forest was rippling.
“Varamyr!” Mance ordered. “Give me numbers. How many, where?”

Varamyr nodded, clenching his eyes shut to focus. The air was tense, all eyes fixed to the north.

“We all know the battle plan!” Mance boomed, his voice like iron. “We all knew they would be coming again. We will not fall!”

The sworn brothers roared, stomping feet. “Prepare the torches, and oil,” Mance ordered, pointing to the barrels hanging off edge of the Wall. “We will burn whatever wights they throw at us, but wait for my command! We will not show our hand too quickly, wait for maximum effect.”

He glared around the platform, sharp eyes looking for weakness. “But the wights are distractions. The true threat is the white walkers. Varamyr and his wargs will pick our targets for us, and then we will strike with dragonglass and flame.” Mance strolled between the files of men, of the archers preparing bows. “What do we fight for?!”

“The living!” the men chanted.

“Damn straight,” Mance growled. “And we must endure. For now and for a hundred years. They have all the patience in the world, and we will meet them in kind! Every arrow, every flame, every man must be rationed – not a single one wasted, not a single advantage lost.” He took a deep breath. “When will the Wall fall??”

“No today!” they stomped. Sam tried to shout as well, but it seemed like he was always too slow to join the chant.

Mance nodded, a thin smile on his lips. He was a tall and gaunt figure, the only man on the Wall without a weapon. The Lord of Castle Black wore a red cloak, even when all of his men wore black. Mance had not taken his vows, but he was still in command of the sworn brothers. Sam couldn’t imagine a better leader.

Sam stuck close to Mance’s side, keeping his head low to hide the fear. “And if any of our brothers are trapped down there,” Mance ordered quietly to Wulf, “if any sworn brothers have been taken captive – shoot them first.”

The raider nodded. Sam grimaced, but he understood the order. They had discovered that watchmen could allow the white walkers through, and that was something they couldn’t allow. Not again. Nobody else can repeat my mistake.

It was sobering thought. I wish that somebody had put an arrow through my own skull, Sam thought quietly, before I allowed Malvern to pass.

“Tarly.” Mance nodded at Sam. “You keep close to me throughout. You must be my hands.”

“Yes, my lord.”

His hands. Mance’s own hands were wrapped in wool gloves, but his fingers had never recovered from his torture and captivity. Nobody could doubt Mance’s strength, but his hands were crippled and the Lord of Castle Black could not hold a sword, or even open a door. On a few nights, Sam heard had Mance fumbling clumsily with a harp, cursing and groaning. Apparently the Lord of Castle Black had once been a master of it. I must be his hands, his steward. Sam had no qualms about such a task.

The weak noon sun shone behind them, and to the north the shadow of the Wall loomed across the world.
Below, they saw figures running to the tunnel, abandoning their posts north of the Wall. There was a long, tense hush, but then they heard a wolf’s howl split the through the wind.

“There!” One-Eyed Wulf screamed. “I see them!”

I can’t, Sam almost replied, but then he saw the shadows through the tree line. First it was one body, and then another, and then…

He recognised them from the way they moved. No living army could be so disciplined, could keep such tight ranks. There was a solid line of shadows emerging from the trees, bodies pushing over the snow.

The dead walked in perfect formation.

“By the gods…” Sam whispered.

“Sonagon save us,” a wildling muttered. Marthe of the Antlers was gaping downwards with horror.

The line of bodies did not stop. It was single rank that seemed to stretch for leagues – thousands of corpses emerging to face off against the Wall.

Sam gasped. They stretched for as far as the eye could see. An army that stretched to the horizon. Sam couldn’t even count them. A thousand, ten thousand, a hundred thousand?

“Do not be daunted,” Mance shouted stiffly. “This Wall was built to stand against their numbers. The dead might stack a million high, but they will not get over.”

They’re finally here. The white walkers were done picking off refugees, they were moving in strength. The Watch had been preparing for this. And yet the solid tide of bodies moving through the no-man’s land still caused a ripple of fear.

“Ready!” Wulf bellowed, and the bowmen jerked into motion. “Hold!”

“Do not fire!” Mance boomed into the wind. “Arrows themselves are useless, and there’s too much snow for flames to survive that distance. We will fight them when they get closer, be ready for a charge.”

A charge. But why would they charge? The wights were fearsome, but they still couldn’t cross the Wall. Sam frowned. Surely the white walkers would just be wasting bodies if they tried?

His heart was racing, but slowly, rational thought started to push in through the fog of fear. In fact, he thought suspiciously, eyes roaming over the army of the dead, their whole approach doesn’t make sense. The number of wights was terrifying, yes, but what sort of army used only a single rank? Were the white walkers intending on assaulting the entire length of the Wall simultaneously? Surely a better means would be to concentrate their soldiers against the actual castles?

“Something’s wrong,” Sam whispered.

“Aye,” Mance agreed quietly, his brow furrowing. “I see it too. Keep your eyes peeled, Tarly.”

All around them, men rushed into position. Suddenly, a sharp scream spilt the platform, and they all flinched. Varamyr gasped suddenly, clutching at his chest.

“My wolves,” the skinchanger wheezed, a sweat on his brow. “They caught two of my wolves.”

“How many are there?” Mance demanded.
Varamyr shook his head. “Lots. That’s only the first rank, there’s more dead in the trees. Not only men either; there’s dead animals there too – everything from wolves to mammoths to worse.”

_Worse?_ Sam thought foggily. _What could be worse?_ “What else?” Mance insisted.

Varamyr grimaced. “I don’t know. But I can smell them. You can’t smell that? It’s like… like…”

His voice trailed off, his face pale. “What are we dealing with?” Ronnel Harclay pressed, his voice breaking. “A hundred thousand? _Two hundred_?”

“Where are the white walkers?” Mance demanded, and Varamyr only shook his head again. He was pawing at his chest. The skinchanger looked as though he were struggling to breathe. “Find _them_, Varamyr. They must be with their army somewhere, locate them. It doesn’t end until we kill the Others themselves.”

Sam had no idea how Mance could stay so focused. The skinchanger looked pained, but he closed his eyes and entered his remaining bodies. Varamyr’s body slumped once more.

To the north, the line of wights came to a halt.

The wait was agonising. The rank of wights moved with purpose, but only at a snail’s pace, Sam watched the wights stepping closer. The distance, the height, the wind, the snow all obscured the details, but the black line was shuffling forward. Coming closer and closer…

If this was an attack, it was a slow one.

“What are they doing?” Sam whispered.

“They’re testing us,” Mance replied. “They’re scouting out to see what distance we fire at them, and searching for where our arrows are the most sparse. They’re keeping a long rank so that we can’t sneak out and flank them.”

That… that made a disturbing amount of sense. “So this isn’t an attack?” Sam whispered.

Mance hesitated. “This is a first wave. _They’ve_ got no reason to hurry.”

To the north, all eyes were on the line of the wights moving slowly. More and more sworn brothers were rushing in to the Wall, trying to fill up the empty positions.

“They’re within bowrange now,” Wulf suggested. “We could fire.”

Mance shook his head. “Not reliable enough range, and the wind is too strong. We’d hit less than one in a hundred. Hold your arrows.”

Kettles of oil were being propped atop the fires and empty barrels were being unloaded. The perches were being readied, and archers were wrapping rags around shafts in preparation for lighting their arrows. Mance huddled with his officers, discussing how to proceed.

“At three hundred feet,” Mance decided. “Do not let them any closer than that. We light arrows and fire down at three hundred feet.”

They weren’t that far off already. The whole air was tense, counting down every step. A thousand bowstrings were taut, watching and waiting.

Not then, the wights stopped at four hundred paces. Every bowstring was taut, but not a single shaft was loosed. The wights stood still like statues.
Slowly, agonisingly, hours passed.

This was not how Sam expected the invasion to happen. Do they mean to torture us? Sam wondered. To kill us with anticipation?

The wights were just standing there, at the edge of their range, taunting them. “When will the dragon arrive,” Sam heard a man whisper. “The dragon is coming, yes?”

After a while, Mance gave the order for the kitchens to bring some broth and stew up the lifts. “Nobody leaves their stations,” Mance ordered, “but let’s get these men warmed up. They must keep their strength.”

We could be here a while. The wind was still howling, drifts of snow blowing over the plains, but the dead didn’t move.

Sam stared north, eyes slowly roaming over the army of the dead, trying to understand. Around him, men were passing out metal dishes and readying campfires, but Sam scarcely paid attention.

“What would you do?” Sam eventually asked, looking to Mance. The man raised an eyebrow. “Let’s say that you were in the white walker’s position. You need to get across the Wall, how would you do it?”

Mance laughed humourlessly. “That depends what sort of timeframe I had. I could send climbers over the Wall, or I could build barges and cross at the coasts.”

“Let’s say the Wall was more than just physical. What if it was an actual barrier stopping you from crossing?” Sam argued. “You can’t go over, you can’t go around. You could only go through if invited.”

“Aye, that would have made it more troublesome for any raider.” Mance scratched his whiskers. “If it’s a spell, I’d need to find a counterspell. If it’s a barrier I’d search for a way to break it.”

“Like the Horn of Joramun?”

“Aye. Like the Horn of Joramun.” Mance’s eyes were grim. “Or a dragon.”

If the white walkers have either, we are already doomed. Sam shook his head, trying to dispel such grim thoughts. “What if you didn’t have a such a means?”

“In that case, I would have to bluff. I’d need to threaten my way through, to force the other side to surrender.” Mance’s eyes looked thoughtful. “Do you think this is an intimidation tactic, Tarly?”

No, I don’t actually. That was how Mance thought, but it wouldn’t be how a white walker thinks. Sam suspected that the white walkers didn’t even know the meaning of intimidation. Fear was alien to them. Still, Sam hesitated. “Perhaps it is.” His voice was doubtful. “Perhaps they are just–”

“White walkers!” a voice squealed. Varamyr lurched up suddenly, his eyes wide and crazed. “I see them, I see them!”

“Where?” Mance demanded, at the exact same time that Sam asked, “How many of them?”

“In the woods, coming south!” The skinchanger was spasmig, wheezing with every breath. “Seven! Seven of them!”

The air buzzed. Metal dishes dropped to the ice as men eased raced to grab their bows again. All eyes were peered downwards, every man standing on the edge of a great icy gulf.

Varamyr was shaking, his eyes glazed over. “They’re… They’re…” the skinchanger spasmed. “…Oh by the gods… The gods…!”

“Varamyr!” Mance snapped, while two men grabbed a hold of the skinchanger. Varamyr looked so gaunt and small, screaming and shaking. “Varamyr! What do you see?”

He gave no reply. He was too busy sputtering and screaming with agony, shuddering with every pained gasp.

From the haunted forest, a wolf’s howl broke through the wind, but then it was abruptly silenced. Far below, the last of Varamyr’s skins had just died.

The skinchanger looked crazed, screaming incoherently. The men tried to shake sense into him, but he could only twitch and howl. His eyes are still glazed over, Sam noticed. Maybe one of his wolves is not quite dead. Mance tried to shake answers from the man, but there were none to be had. Mance cursed.

“Get him out of here!” Mance ordered, before turning back to the north. “Stay sharp! Find them!”

Three men had to carry the writhing skinchanger away. All eyes were pinned on the snowy wasteland, every arrow drawn and itching to be fired…

In the distance, across the horizon and the blanketed forest, a flurry of snow writhed and twisted above the trees. Great geysers of white plumed upwards, snaking their way south. Sam saw the frosted forest shaking. He could feel footsteps marching through the forest.

His eyes were fixed on the tree line, at the edge of the no-man’s land…

A faint mist was blowing from in the north, bringing with it the scent of cold and rot.

Sam couldn’t see anything, it was all too foggy. The white walkers are nearly invisible in the snow, he recalled. Something about their armour, something about their very forms let them almost become one with the world, indistinguishable from a distance.

But then he saw the trees shift. He saw the shadows of another line of dead, and then there were white shapes moving across the snow.

All around him, he felt the men squirm. Sam couldn’t see their bodies, but he made out the movements. Spiders, Sam thought with horror. There were ice spiders scuttling across the snows, unnatural insects of every size. The largest ones looked as big as aurochs, but Sam couldn’t even see the smallest. They blanketed the snow like a layer of cotton, uncountable and nearly indistinguishable. And then he saw the snowdrifts moving.

They are beneath the snow, Sam realised. They were more of them scuttling beneath the snowdrifts, so that all that could be seen was the wake of their movements. It left streaks of mounds across the snow, burrows slithering like snakes.

“The dead ones are weak to fire and the walkers are weak to dragonglass,” Garth Greyfeather muttered, his greybeard lined with hoarfrost. He pulled back on his longbow, fingers twitching. “But what are the spiders weak to?”

“Fucked if know,” Wulf growled. “Just shoot them. Just shoot them enough times until they stop moving.”
“The spiders are ice,” Mance said grimly, so quietly that Sam could barely hear. “Living ice. The spiders don’t leave corpses – their bodies melt after they die.”

Melt into water. Maesters had searched for evidence of ice spiders for decades, but they found none but tales and folklore. Even the farthest rangings had only found whispers of them. Sam thought of the stories he once heard as a child of ice dragons – great elemental monsters with blue eyes and translucent wings, that would melt into entire lakes when slain…

“Ice,” muttered Garth Greyfeather. “Then would dragonglass…?”

Sam breaths were hoarse, the air freezing in his lungs like a dagger in his chest. It was so, so cold.

Then he saw bigger shapes. Black figures on white. The bodies of giants rustling in the trees, taking formation…

“Fetch the spyglass!” Mance ordered. “The spyglass!”

Sam took a deep breath, trying to focus. The spyglass – Lord Mormont’s old spyglass, the one with the Myrish lens. It was a rarity on the Wall.

A runner fetched the gilded wood cylinder from the command tent and handed it to Mance, but the lord’s face creased in irritation. Mance’s fingers couldn’t hold it. “Tarly,” Mance ordered, and Sam hurried to grab it.

Sam unfolded the telescopic tube, and Mance motioned at him to have a look. Other men were using chunks of amber, or even just squinting through their hands to try to see.

Everything was white. It took a while to make out anything, the scope brushing over blurry shapes.

But eventually he made out the figure of a white shadow, gliding across the snows. It walked with impossible softness, like the wind given flesh. Its body rippled near invisibly, blurring into the world. Sam could only make it out by the outline it left in the falling snows.

“I see it,“ Sam gasped. “There! Through the trees!”

The other men clamoured to look. Sam’s breath was hushed as he made out its shape, and then there was a second white shadow, and then a third…

His breath froze as he saw the seven beings striding through the snow. Sam stammered, his head going blank with fear.

He remembered their shapes, he remembered the Other snapping Dareon’s neck like a twig…

“Dragonglass!” voices boomed. “Ready your dragonglass!”

The Others were coming closer, seven exposed figures stepping across the snows, closer towards the forward line of wights. The dead stood in a wall before them, but the Others were standing, exposed in the no-man’s land. “What are they doing?” Sam gasped. “Why…?”

The spyglass was snatched from him, but the white walkers were coming so close that the keenest eyes were starting to make them out. They were not quite in conventional bowrange, but the best archer might just be able to make that distance. It was borderline.

“Mance?” Marv the Red Hand shouted, pulling back on an obsidian arrow.

Mance hesitated, biting his lip. “Hold fire!” he shouted after a long moment of indecision. “We do not have enough dragonglass to waste. If your arrows miss here, we’d have nothing else to shoot them with.”

Unwillingly, the bows were lowered. “Is that the plan?” Aki the Wroth growled. He was a short and mean man, almost a dwarf, but Sam was told there was none finer with a spear. “Wait until they are at our gates?”

“If that’s what it takes, Aki.”

The winds were too strong, the snow flurried. They were all uneasy with the sight.

“What are they doing?” Sam muttered dumbly. Seven white walkers. “Why risk exposing themselves?”

“They’re taunting us,” Mance said surely. “Trying to make us waste ourselves.”

“We could charge them,” Wulf suggested. “Charge out the gates and rout them.”

“We’d be fools if we tried,” Mance shook his head. “No let’s see what their game is. In the meantime, ready the scorpions and the stonethrowers, I want them all loaded and primed.”

In the fields below, the lines of wights started to ripple. Bodies trekked out of the trees, and the confusion spread across the Wall. The Others were standing still, while wights started to move around them.

Suddenly a dead giant stomped out of the trees, carrying a huge wooden log over its head. The sworn brothers could only stare.

A battering ram? Or a siege tortoise?

Yet it was neither. The giant wight dropped the log in the middle of the dead man’s land, and it crunched into the snow. Other wights were shambling, dragging more chunks of wood from the trees.

“What’s going on?” a voice demanded. “What are they doing?”

They are building something? Sam thought. A siege tower, maybe? But that didn’t make sense, why built it there?

Sam could only guess, staring in dumb shock as he made out the shapes. Wights were propping the log upwards, while other chunks of stone and wood were crudely placed into shape. Seven shapes.
Slowly, the Others stepped across the snow, and they each took a seat.

It is a table, Sam realised startled. Dumbfounded, a man handed the spyglass back to Sam.

“What do you see, Tarly?” Mance asked quietly, like he was hesitant to break the hush.

Sam didn’t know how to reply. The seven white walkers were all sitting around a crudely fashioned table, propped up by wights acting as table legs.

Is this a parley? Are the Others inviting us to treat?

And then there were more wights surging forward, trekking across the snow. They all came to the table, placing objects – twigs and stones, it looked like – before each white walker. And then Sam made out the shape of a rotten boar, a dead animal with its skull exposed and its flesh peeling off.
He saw it stagger forth from the trees; the boar walked straight to the table, where it was dropped on atop of it, and then walked to the very centre and lay dead.
Other creatures followed suit, filling up the table. Dead dogs and goats, even blurry shapes that looked like rabbits and squirrels. The boar lay at the very centre, unmov ing with its mouth agape.

_The pig at a centre of a feast_, Sam realised. The white walkers all raised stones as if they were goblets, like they were having a toast.

Sam’s mouth gaped, dumbfounded. Without a word, he held the spyglass out for Mance to see.

The Lord of Castle Black didn’t say anything, but his lips curled. “What are they doing?” a confused sworn brother asked.

“They’re… they’re having a tea party,” Sam said dumbly.

For a long moment, the only sound was the shrill scream of the wind.

The Others were sitting around a makeshift table in the middle of the dead man’s land, feasting on imaginary meals, raising stones like glasses, all the while the wights shuffled around them like stewards. A great noble feast, where every guest was tended to by a flock of servants. The wights were walking in circles, carrying gunk like it was food.

The Others weren’t eating it, Sam noticed, but they would lift each one up and wave it through the air like they were admiring it, before placing it back down for the wights to bring the next course. A pantomime, a mockery.

And several hundred feet away, a top the Wall, the sworn brothers could only gape and stare.

“They’re taunting us,” Mance said finally. “They mean to mock us.”

The murmurs filled the air. “Let’s shoot them already,” Marv the Red Hand muttered, “chase them off already.”

“I do not want to shoot to miss.” Mance hesitated, biting his lip. “It is better for us if they feel overconfident. Let them taunt, let them get comfortable.”

“Mance…!”

“If they want this to be a standoff, let them,” he said firmly. “It gives us more time for the dragon to arrive.”

That caused a few bodies to stir. Sam bit his lip, trying to size them. Why would the white walkers sit down before the enemy? They weren’t stupid, so what were they…?

“Look at them!” Wulf hissed. “There’s seven of them, and you say that each one controls thousands of wights? We might end this battle with only seven obsidian arrows.”

“Only if those arrows hit their mark,” Sam spoke up suddenly. “Mance is right, it’s still too far. We only have ninety-seven dragonglass shards. Ninety-seven – that’s only enough for a single decent volley.”

The words were met by mutters. Wulf looked back across the no man’s land, measuring the distance. “They are sitting down,” Ulmer said suddenly. “They’re overconfident. Could we sneak an assassin closer?”

“Stonethrowers, we need stonethrowers…”

Behind him, there was urgent talk about how to respond, but Sam was left staring at the Others, struggling to understand. Mockery, Mance had said.

On their table, the white walkers continued to make a scene. All eyes were on them, and Sam stared, entranced. The Others were raising plates, pretending to eat, and making constant motions. Toasting, nodding, even rubbing their bellies. It was a parody; a man who had never stepped foot in a noble castle might think that highborn ate their meals like such. Why are they mocking us? Why bother?

No, it wasn’t mocking, Sam thought slowly. It felt more… humorous, even. Through the spyglass, all of their movements were exaggerated, every motion emphasised to the extreme. The scene reminded Sam of when his sisters had been young, and they had hosted imaginary feasts with their dolls…

A shiver ran down his spine. It was a game to them. An entertainment.

All across the Wall, men were growing uneasy. Mance was talking about sneaking up on them, but Sam was still staring through the spyglass, trying to glimpse the white walker’s expressions.

Laughter. From their body language, Sam could imagine them laughing.

“What are they doing there?” a bowman muttered uneasily. “They’re just… sitting there.”

“Maybe they’re stupid,” Matthar said. It might have jest, but there was no humour. “Or might just be bored.”

Bored. “Waiting,” Sam muttered suddenly, and then the realisation clicked him. “They’re waiting.”

Sam’s eyes widened in shock and horror. If they’re waiting, then that implies… “Mance!” Sam screamed. “They’re waiting!”

Mance frowned. “Tarly, what are you–?”

All eyes were on the white walkers to the north. Sam felt like a fool watching the pantomime. Every sworn brother was alert, but only focused on a single direction. “They’re waiting!” Sam gasped. “It’s a distraction, they’re distracting us–”

Suddenly the wind shrieked. We were all looking north, Sam cursed. Nobody was staring south.

Beyond the Wall, the seven white walkers raised their stones in a merry toast. Sam was already sprinting, darting into the trenches and pushing through the wind. He was running south, to the other side of the Wall.

And, to the south, he saw a black cloud burst growing against the endless white. It looked wispy, like smoke through the snow. He had never seen a cloud quite like it. There was no time to think, no time to understand, there was only…

Sworn brothers were stirring, but it was too late, not enough…

“Run!” Sam screamed, as the world exploded into chaos.

Pecking, angry bodies. They fell from the sky like arrows. Sam dropped in the snow and curled into himself. He threw his hands up to protect his face, but he still felt sharp claws tear into his scalp. His mind was going blank, the world was drowning out around him into chaos…
All around him, the Wall was screaming and squawking.

Sam heard Garth Greyfeather scream a curse as a black shade lunged at his eyes. They were struggling, blood spurting, and then black bodies were falling off the edge of the Wall…

“Get to shelter!” Mance boomed somewhere amidst the chaos. “Get to shelter, get to–”

The air hissed as a shape lobbed at Mance’s head. Sam saw white wings pitched black, and blue eyes. An owl, Sam realised. A dead rotten owl with blue eyes.

Malvern.

Ravens and crows cawed at him, rotten beaks pecking through furs.

Sam saw Ulmer swat a dove from the air, its bones crunching, but even its mangled body was still trying to move. Then, a hawk whooshed down, clawing at the bowman’s eyes.

An attack of undead birds. There were hundreds and thousands of dead ravens, crows, owls, falcons, hawks, robins, sparrows, magpies, pigeons and gulls – even bats and eagles. Most of the creatures were frail and poor fliers with patchy wings; all it took was a single good swat and they went down, but there were just so many of them. They were all pecking, clawing and scratching with fury of the dead.

I knew that the white walkers could raise and control any animal. Why did I never worry about birds as well? How did the Other even manage to kill so many birds?

“Fire!” Wulf howled. “Fire! Grab fire!”

Men were diving under their cloaks, trying to protect themselves from the onslaught of beaks and talons. It was all screaming, howling…

Some were trying to fight, but they were just slashing swords uselessly at a cloud of bodies. There were too many, they were everywhere. Sam didn’t fight, he just ran straight for the outbuilding, diving until the shelter even as he tried to pull a rotten raven off his scalp. Blood oozed down his forehead. His heart was like a panicked drumming in his ears. Sam felt a cry well up in a throat that didn’t even feel like his. The evil thing crunched in his hand and he threw it, where it collided against the wood, still squawking.

“Shelter!” Sam heard himself screaming. “Take shelter!”

It was useless. His voice wasn’t loud enough to break through the clamour.

He heard the shriek as the flock of crows caused a man to stagger. Sam could only stare as the black brother stumbled straight off the edge of the Wall. A murder, Sam thought suddenly, a murder of crows.

Fluttering shapes dived at him, and Sam had to slam the door of the outhouse shut. He heard rotten birds trying to peck through the wood, he could hear the scratching of dead talons.

Through the gaps in the wood, he saw fragments of the chaos outside. Flailing figures were writhing in the snow and ice trenches. Some men had grabbed burning sticks and torches, whirling with them and sending smoking bodies dropping. Others had abandoned swords and were swatting at the air with planks of wood. The birds were falling by the hundreds, but there were thousands.

“Hold the line!” Mance screamed, even as he wrestled with an owl. “Protect the refugees, hold
The birds shifted as one. Sam’s eyes widened in horror, but black shapes had already converged.

“No!” Sam shrieked. “No, don’t–!”

It was too late. There was a white walker controlling these birds. The Other recognised the man who held command purely by voice, and suddenly all of the birds focused their efforts. Mance barely managed to gasp as hundreds of shapes targeted him, their bodies buffeting against him, grabbing hold of his furs with sharp talons and flapping wings.

Sam saw his eyes widen in terror, he tried to run, tried to do something, but he…

And suddenly all of those wings swept him straight off his feet.

“Mance!” Wulf roared, lunging to catch the former King-Beyond-the-Wall.

Dalla. It was useless. There were too many, and then the wind howled and Mance was sent flying…

Wulf managed to grab Mance’s wrist, but the snow swept around them and suddenly both men were falling off the edge of the Wall.

Crash. Mance landed on to the stokes of the lift, a fifteen-foot drop onto solid timber. Sam didn’t see the fall, but he could hear something crack even across the distance. He crashed with such an oomph that Sam knew Mance wasn’t moving.

All around him, the birds hissed and screeched, but the flock was thinning. The wight birds were too fragile, their wings too weak. They were terrifying and there were swarms of them, but they were easily knocked out of sky. One solid hit was enough to cripple them. All across the ice, grounded blue-eyed shapes still squawking and squirming.

Sam’s heart was racing as he darted out of the outbuilding. Sam found himself staring down at where Mance had fallen. Mance was left strewn over the timbers of a lower battlement of the Wall, where the lift supports joined the ice. Mance’s skin and clothes were left shredded by a hundred talons. He may not have hit the bottom, but even from this height Sam could see the blood seeping from his skull and dripping down seven hundred feet.

Wulf had been even unluckier. Wulf had bounced off the lift’s frame, and tumbled all the way down to the Broken Tower below.

Mance. Mance! Sam might have screamed, but his throat jammed.

And then Sam’s eyes turned upwards, staring south. He could see the dark shadow over the horizon, he could see bodies pushing through the snows. They were already passed the ruins of Mole’s Town. A shadow of an army in the distance, rapidly getting closer. If this was the first wave…

Malvern. Malvern was coming.

The birds had fallen, but all around him he could hear shrieking and wailing.

“We got bodies to the north!” another howled. “They’re moving, they’re climbing…!”

“All around him, the sworn brothers were shocked and scattered. Perhaps not many had died, but many, many more were left clutching ugly wounds across the skull, or blind men with gouged out eyes. The panic was the worst; the sudden aftermath where all you could see was blood and terror.

We were not prepared for this, Sam thought suddenly. We were not prepared.

“Who’s in command?” a man cried. “Who has the Wall?”

Command. The command. Without Mance, they needed a leader. They needed someone to rally the defence. Normally that would be the First Ranger, but Harle the Handsome was leading a scouting party and they had yet to refill the positions beneath him. The most senior brother was technically Ser Wynton Stout, but he was infirm and witless. Perhaps Soren Shieldbreaker, the Lord of Oakenshield, or Morna White Mask of Queensgate could take command, but they were too far away. Mance had been acting Lord Commander, the one who brought them together.

The Lord Commander has fallen, Sam thought numbly, who is second in command?

Sam stared at the shadow of the undead army, and he remembered.

Oh fuck, Sam realised. It’s me.

There was a hiss of steam from the ice beneath him, as the piss streamed out from between his legs.

Chapter End Notes

I'm replying to a common review from last chapter here because it's annoying me slightly now; the idea that Winterfell has magical wards the same as Storm's End does, that's fanon. There is absolutely no evidence to support it, and direct evidence to the contrary.

In canon, it was specified that the oldest building in Winterfell, the First Keep, was built after the Andal Invasion, so Winterfell as a whole was most certainly not built by Bran the Builder. If there was a structure built at that time, 8000 - 6000 years ago, it has crumbled. Which makes more sense; most castles do not last several thousand years, so you can safely say that whatever hypothetical wards that could have been there at the Age of Heroes are gone.

Meanwhile, the idea that Winterfell and Storm's End were both built by Bran the Builder comes from an old, unsupported legend - it's basically hearsay about a mythical and dubious figure. GRRM has made it quite clear that rumours and the things 'smallfolk say' are not to be trusted.

And I've got no doubt that people will still try to argue the point (maesters can't be trusted, seems to be a common one) but you are arguing fanon. You are making up your own version of the story with no leg to stand on. Which would be fine in your story, but I'm the only one who gets to decide which fanon goes in my story.

So yes, there are no wards in Winterfell, shadow assassins can waltz right in - the same way they can in near every other place.

Sansa

Her feet tapped across the stones, heels clattering as she tried to run. It is this cursed dress, Sansa thought with a grimace. She lifted the hem and bundled it up in her hands, but somehow the fabric still caught against her legs. Arya used to hate wearing dresses, but Sansa had never been able to understand why.

Now, she was awkwardly running towards the sound of screaming, trying to shove her way through crowded corridors, and Sansa understood why.

Wailing. Shouts. Screams. As she burst into the Great Hall all she heard was the panic, all she saw was frantic movement. She pushed through the screaming and the distraught sobs. Then, she saw red and black.

Her breath froze, eyes widening in horror. Corpses smeared in ash littered the dais of the throne, and blood was trickling down the steps. Scattered black bodies were lying twisted across the steps, like some brutal mural across ash-coated stone.

There was crying, sharp yells of anguish. “No!” a girl's voice wailed, “No, get off me, no…!”

She saw Wylla Manderly, thrashing against her sister’s arms. Wynafryd was embracing her, hugging her sister tight as she wept, but the younger girl was squirming red-faced and howling. “Don’t look…” Wynafryd gasped between the sobs, trying to pull her sister away. “Don’t look, don’t…”

Their mother. The thought sent all sorts of emotions writhing through Sansa. All around her, men were running. She heard guards shouting for weapons – but it was the panicked shouts of men that didn't know what was happening. More chaos than sense.

Sansa couldn’t see Leona Manderly, not at first. But then she made out a woman’s corpse collapsed at the throne, a body with its head half decapitated through the cheek. Sansa could see gore and blood, skull and brains…

The sight caused puke to rise in her throat. She could have gagged, but she swallowed it down.

Sansa had been with the other highborn women and children as they prepared to take shelter for possible battle. Sansa hadn't stayed long, but even by the time she reached the Great Hall the massacre was over. A bloodbath.

The world was spinning. Sansa was speechless, trying to understand. How could this happen? How could it happen so quickly?
Corpses. Thirteen corpses. What sort of assassin could kill so many, right in the middle of Winterfell’s Great Hall? Sansa could feel the tingling in the air – it was like the world was crackling with unnatural power, distorting the air and twisting it all…

“The white walkers,” Sansa gasped. “Did they do this? Where are they, where…?”

She didn’t even know who she was speaking to. Everyone around her was too busy rushing, or carrying bodies away. Wounded men were screaming. A great wordless roar filled the hall – a broad-chested, white-haired man was gripping his wounded shoulder, while he knelt over an unmoving body. A father crying over his son, screaming with anguish and rage.

The wound. Sansa stared at the wound on the white-haired man’s shoulder, but it looked like no wound Sansa had ever seen. It was a sword’s slash, but it was wrong; like he had been burnt rather than cut. The edges of his furs were scorched, the skin and flesh underneath blackened.

She saw a man staggering, clutching his arm. In his hands, he held a wooden shield that had been snapped in two. “What happened?” Sansa snapped at the lord. “What happened?”

The lord faltered. He was a tall and grim man with a scar across his cheek and an emblem of a rose on his chest. He looked stunned, and scared. “It was…” he gulped. “It was a shadow. It was smoke and ash.”

What?

“Maester!” a voice screamed. “Maester, we need a maester over here…!”

Bodies were stirring, footsteps rippling. Sansa turned and rushed, but she had to shove her way through the front to see. The Greatjon – Sansa saw him still moving, still roiling even as he held in his own stomach. The great lord was gagging, red-faced, while they tried to lift him up to the infirmary. It took four men just to hoist the Greatjon up off the floor.

Sansa didn’t even know how he was still alive. There were a few that were left alive with ugly wounds, but most seemed to have been killed instantly. Galbart Glover had his torso ripped open, Ser Mardrick Manderly looked dissected from behind, through plate armour and all. Maege Mormont was decapitated, Eric Burley mutilated, the Greatjon’s chest was sliced wide open…

A shadow. A shadow killed them?

The room was spinning. Focus, Sansa ordered herself. I can’t help them, but where do I need to be?

“Bran,” Sansa whispered after a single frantic heartbeat. “Bran…!”

She turned and ran without a second thought. If there was an assassin about, it was targeting lords. If there was a second assassin, then the King in the North could well be the next target…

But others clearly had the same thought. By the time Sansa reached Bran, he was locked in his chambers with fifty alert and nervous guards standing uneasily outside. Sansa was nearly not allowed through – they drew weapons at her approach – but thankfully a few of the men recognised her.

The door to Bran’s chambers was barred, but inside the room there were twenty more men standing guard around the little figure on the bed. All of them were holding crude white spears, Sansa noticed, or clutching white wooden stakes with uncertain expressions on their faces.

Sansa saw the girl, Meera Reed, standing over Bran with a half a broken wooden stick in her hands.
It was a makeshift weapon, but Meera was holding it like a spear. Weirwood, Sansa realised. Sansa would have asked why, but then her heart pounded as she saw the frail little boy lying still as the grave atop the mattress.

“Bran!” Sansa shouted, rushing to her brother’s side.

The boy wasn’t moving. For a heartbeat, so many fears surged through her… “Bran! What happe…”

Her voice trailed off as she noticed the pink in his cheeks. He was still breathing, she realised, but she had never seen a sleeping figure so still. Sansa blinked. How is he asleep like this?

“He’s fine,” Meera said stiffly. “He is out of his skin at the moment.”

Out of his skin? What does that even mean? Sansa felt so lost, her head spinning. So many questions whirled, but the one that came to the forefront… “You’re wielding weirwood,” she noticed, nodding at the crude spear.

The guards around her shifted. All of their weapons were crude; it was like they had hacked off branches of the heart tree as quickly as possible. Armed guards holding sticks.

“It kills them.” Meera composed herself well, but her hands were twitching. “Steel couldn’t hurt it, but then weirwood… that killed it.”

“What was it?” Sansa insisted. “Was that… was that a white walker?”

The girl shook her head. “I don’t… I don’t know.”

The girl. Meera was a couple of years older than Sansa, she was told, but Meera looked the younger due to her slight build and height. But she had the same thought that I did, Sansa realised, she thought that Bran might be in danger, she ran to protect him.

“Is there more of them?” Sansa pressed. “How did it get in, how…?”

Meera just shook her head, clutching her stake tightly. None of the guards knew what was happening. They were all just as lost as she was.

Everything felt crazed and confused. Is this what the Others are capable of? She had no idea why Jon had seemed so unnerved while talking about the Others – she hadn’t pressed him on it, but a part of her hadn’t truly believed it. Sansa had thought it fantasy, one of Old Nan’s tales. But this? This wasn’t the work of humans and it felt like the whole castle was left shaking.

It was dead. Whatever ‘it’ was, they said that Meera killed it. But if there was one, a voice whispered, surely there has to be more?

Her hands were trembling. She looked down at Bran, and the thought of that red and black floor…

Focus, Sansa ordered herself. There was no time to break down, not now. Perhaps come nightfall she would break down into tears and wail in fear and grief, but for now she had to focus. What needs to be done?

“Jon,” Sansa said after a pause. “Where’s Jon?”

“To the dragon,” Meera explained. “He ordered guards with weirwood and dragonglass to protect Bran, and then he ran to the dragon.”
If Jon didn’t linger, he couldn’t afford to, Sansa thought. Did he fear the dragon was in danger, or was he running for the heart tree for more weirwood? Sansa looked around the room, her eyes lingering on the guards. All of them were wildlings with white stones on their chest. All of the guards were holding weirwood, and some were clutching rough shards of black glass as daggers. Obsidian, she thought. The smartest among them had fastened obsidian shards to weirwood sticks, to form crude spears.

The sight made her think back to the tales that Maester Luwin had told. The children of the forest had supposedly hunted using both obsidian and weirwood as weapons, she recalled.

Sansa looked around the chambers, and she hesitated. Bran had several dozen guards surrounding him, and Sansa was useless waiting by his side. She refused to be another weeping woman. Jon hadn’t been able to linger, and neither could she. I must go to where I can be useful.

She gave one last look at Bran, before striding out of the room. Even despite herself, she twitched at every flickering shadow, every crackle of flame, every rustle of footsteps.

First comes panic, then fear, Sansa thought, but soon it will become anger, and then blame. Suspicion and accusations would not be far behind. How many would claim that this was murder, that the wildlings massacred a dozen northern lords? She needed to get out ahead of it, to stop it reaching that stage.

How much have we lost, how can we recover…?

Testimonies, Sansa decided. I need testimonies from the witnesses, I need to piece together what happened. I need men who can swear to what they saw. Bias worked best when it came quickly; the first explanation that was offered was the most well-established. She needed to paint the narrative, Sansa needed to be the first to pen letters to White Harbour, Deepwood Motte, Last Hearth and Bear Island.

The white walkers did this. How did they do it, what did they do…?

The Greatjon, she thought suddenly. He is still alive.

Sansa broke out into an uneven sprint, her heels clapping across the stones.

She heard the bustle from the infirmary, the sound of strangled screams breaking the clamour. Sansa pushed her way through, staring in shock. The Greatjon was on a stone slab, with blood swelling from his stomach. Two men tried to hold in his guts, but the blood was oozing out between their fingers.

“Maester!” a voice snapped. Sansa recognised Lord Norvel Mollen, an Umber bannerman, standing frantically by his liege lord’s side. They had to hold him down with leather belts to stop him thrashing, screaming in agony. “Maester! Do something!”

The young maester was fumbling, pale-faced. He was a young, clean-shaven man, with only half the number of rings on his chain that Luwin had. He looked lost. “I never…” the maester gasped. “I’ve never…”

He stared down at all the blood, and looked fit to faint. “Cauterise the cut!” a man shouted. “We need to cauterise the bleeding – heat a sword’s edge, quickly…!”

The maester stammered. “No, no, that’ll kill him, it’s too deep it’s…”

His was a weak voice amidst so much screaming. The lord lunged, grabbing the maester by the collar. “Do something!”

“I…!” the young maester wailed. “I’m an apprentice, I’ve never…!”

Lord Norvel looked ready to burst. Sansa had to step in. “Anger does naught to help your liege lord,” Sansa said sharply, striding into the room. She glared at Lord Norvel, pushing the lord away. “Leave the room, if you cannot keep a cool head.”

Lord Norvel floundered. Sansa was as lost as anyone, but the secret to command was to not let that show. The illusion was everything.

“You two, keep pressure on the wound. Keep his blood in,” Sansa ordered to the two men. “And you two, hold him down tightly, do not let him tear the wound.” After that, she was at a loss for what to do next, but she blinked and recovered quickly. She turned to the maester. “And for his mouth… the…” Curses, I can’t remember what it’s called. “… the wooden stick that goes between his teeth?”

“The bit.” The maester nodded dumbly. “Stop him biting his tongue.”

“Get something for his mouth,” Sansa ordered, “and fetch rags, and boiling water.” She didn’t know why, they just seemed like a reasonable thing to have. The maester blinked in shock, but men were already running. “Take a deep breath, maester. Deep breath. What must be done?”

“Cauterise it,” a man-at-arms insisted. “A burning poker would stop–”

“That will not help!” the maester wailed. “It’s too deep! We… we must stitch it, give the flesh a chance to heal.”

“Needle and thread!” Sansa shouted, and a memory returned to her. She remembered when little Arya had sliced her hand open playing with a crossbow. “Maester Luwin kept a sewing bag – on top that vanity!”

They found it quickly, all the while the Greatjon thrashed on the top. There was a small leather bag of maester’s supplies for stitching flesh; wool bandages, a spool of fine cotton thread, and an iron needle slimmer than what Sansa used to work with, and a vial of rubbing alcohol.

Outside the room, Sansa heard endless stomping, men readying for war. The maester twitched. His hands were shaking so badly he could not even thread the needle.

The maester fumbled, and the Greatjon howled in pain. Sansa could have screamed in frustration. “Give it here!” she snapped. She licked the end and threaded the string through the needle, just as Septa Mordane had taught her a thousand times. “Just… just tell me what needs to be done.”

The maester breathed in relief as she took over, sagging slightly. “Clamp the skin. We must bleed the wound, keep it clean…”

She couldn’t even see the cut under the men’s hands, and the bloody furs. Lord Norvel shredded the Greatjon’s clothes with a sharp knife, and Sansa saw the cut. The edge had sliced open the man’s stomach from thigh to hip, like gutting a pig. She could see throbbing veins, she could see his guts pulsing in grotesque colours. Her resolve nearly failed with the sight of it.

“Wine,” the maester ordered. “Bitter wine.”

Sansa wasn’t sure if that was for him or the wound. The blood spurted over her dress, and the Greatjon didn’t stop thrashing.

_It’s just like stitching cloth_, she ordered to herself.

“The peritoneum,” the maester instructed. “The inner stomach layer, you must stitch that first. It is under the outer tissue, you can see…”

She could see it. The flesh was different shades, layers of skin going inwards. Raw meat. Gods, she could see his guts, she could make out the coils of intestines. The skin was tender, torn muscles. Men were holding rags to squeeze up the blood, while Sansa’s hands pushed through the flesh and gore…

The Greatjon howled. He thrashed so hard the leather belts they held him with could have snapped.

The men had to heave the skin together, and Sansa was left with her hands inside someone’s stomach. “Do you have something for the pain?” she demanded, her voice nearly breaking. “Milk of the poppy?”

The maester looked lost. “The stores… there’s naught left.”

_Curses_. The Greatjon was thrashing so much, muffled screams whistling through his bit, and Sansa didn’t even know how to push the needle through. “The needle,” Sansa said finally. “I cannot get a clean stitch, it’s all ripped…”

“You may have to cut it open further,” the maester admitted. “Peel back the outer flesh, and pull the flesh together. Give the inner organs a chance to heal.”

Sansa stared in shock. Lord Norvel hesitated, and then passed his hunting knife to her. Too many people were crowded around the Greatjon’s stomach, nobody else could get their hands in. Sansa would have to slice his skin herself.

_Just like stitching cloth_, she insisted. _Just like cloth. Living, breathing, bleeding cloth._

“The cut… it’s into his intestines, maester,” she reported. Blood everywhere, chunks of flesh… “I cannot… I cannot stitch it all…”

“It will clot, my lady. And we will have to cut him open again to remove the threads.” The maester shook his head. “But for now the internal bleeding will kill him faster than anything. We can only stitch what we can, bandage the rest, and give him a chance.”

The doubt was thick in his voice. The maesters claimed to be able to reattach limbs and stitch internal wounds, but Sansa doubted if such things had high success rates. _He does not expect the Greatjon to survive_, Sansa realised, _and he is scared of what might happen if the lord doesn’t._

_Lord Umber is strong_, she told herself. _He is strong, he is strong._

Sansa squeezed the needle through red, tender meat. Bile and blood bubbled out around her fingers. The Greatjon’s movements spasmed, like a dying fish.

“Stitch outwards. Cross-stitch,” the maester added, and Sansa could have slapped him.

The first knot of cotton tightened, blood swelling up through the rip. She couldn’t even see what she was stitching through all the gore, she had to do it blind. _Septa Mordane always said my needlework was the finest she had ever seen._
The Greatjon’s skin was so pale, the flesh was squelchy. How much blood did he even have left? Even for a big man, he had bled a lot.

We are all just bags of water. Cut the sack and the water dribbles out until there’s none left. Sansa didn’t know where that thought came from.

The lord was gasping, wheezing to breathe. The wooden bit fell out of his mouth, and nobody thought to replace it.

“Lad… Lady Stark,” the Greatjon wheezed, his eyes bulging like he had seen a ghost.

His eyes were rolling backwards in his skull, his throat jamming. Like a fish flopping and choking…

“Awake, Lord Umber!” she shouted. Faster, stitch faster. She didn’t know why, but if he closed his eyes she didn’t think he’d open them again… “You do not have permission to die!”

He was trembling, his motions growing jerky. Sansa was hands deep in a pile of guts, and she just didn’t…

“Think of your sons!” Sansa ordered suddenly. “Your boys, your daughters. Think of them.”

He didn’t respond, but Sansa could only hope he was listening. Could only… “You have family. You have children. Think of them.”

It sounded like he tried to say something but the words choked in his throat. A man that big shouldn’t have sounded so small.

He had children, Sansa remembered suddenly. Lord Umber’s two daughters by his first wife had been lost to wildlings. His eldest son, the Smalljon, had died at the Red Wedding. His youngest son had been butchered at Last Hearth, and his two middle boys were missing. Once, House Umber had been a large family.

“Would they want you to die like this?” Sansa pressed hard, twisting in the needle as far as it could go. The needle was slender, but it still felt like pressing a four-inch knife through his guts. “We keep fighting for them, my lord; the ones that we’ve lost and the ones that still remain.

“Think of them, remember them.”

“My boys…” Lord Umber gasped. “Jon, Steffon, Kol, Mikael…” There were tears in the Greatjon’s eyes. “… Rebekah… Valerie…”

The maester was dabbing at the wound with a wine-soaked rag. “Pull the flesh together, Lady Stark,” the maester whispered. “Must be forceful, pull…”

Sansa pulled. Flesh clenched, the muscles throbbing in her hands. She could feel him trembling. The Greatjon was still mumbling his children’s names through pained breaths.

The maester grabbed another clay pot of wine, splattering dark ale over a new rag to wipe down the wound. “Bring that bloody wine over here, you dolt,” the lord growled through the pain.

The maester floundered, but the Greatjon’s arms were still bound. Lord Mollen grabbed the pot off him, and then poured it straight down the Greatjon’s throat. Sansa tightened another knot on the thread, and it finally seemed like the flow of blood was stemming. “A second stitch, my lady,” the maester instructed. “Stitch the inner flesh and outer flesh separately.”

I might have well just stitched up a corpse. His stomach was thick and hairy, but it was all sorts of colours – black and red blood smeared over his chest, and his skin was swollen and jagged. It was as ugly a wound as any Sansa had ever seen.

The Greatjon is strong, Sansa told herself. If anyone could survive a blade to the guts, it was him.

“We must restore his fluids,” the maester ordered. “Water and salt. Keep him lying down, keep him still… he will not survive a rupture.” His face twisted. “Curses, if only we had leeches to drain the humours…”

The Greatjon was ghostly pale, wheezing with every breath. “He cannot breathe!” Lord Mollen protested.

“Blood in the lung.” The man raised his hands helplessly. “I cannot… his stomach…”

“La… dy Stark,” the Greatjon was gasping, straining with every word. “Lady Stark…”

Sansa’s head was spinning in delirium. Her hands were coated in blood, like butcher’s hands. It was so hard to think, the sight of all that blood…

“Will he survive?” Sansa demanded. “Will he survive? How can we help him?”

The maester just raised his shoulders and shook his head cluelessly. Sansa cradled her head in her hands to her forehead, blood smearing across her hair. He looked like a man on his deathbed – a bone white husk struggling with every tremor. Lord Umber was still staring at her with bulging eyes, struggling to speak. “… La…” he wheezed. “Star…”

Behind her, she heard footsteps approaching. There was a figure in dark furs – a wildling – lifting a burning torch from the brazier and working towards them.

“He said no cauterising,” Sansa snapped at him.

“I’m not.” The wildling shook his head grimly. “I’m waiting until he dies.” The man raised the torch, standing vigil. “We’re going to have to burn that body straight away. You don’t want him coming back.”

It was met by silence. Sansa blinked, unable to respond. The wildling stood stiffly, holding his torch patiently before the infirmary slab. The maester tried to shuffle backwards. “Burn him?” Lord Mollen gaped.

“Lad…” Lord Umber croaked suddenly. “… Catelyn Stark…”

Sansa tensed, and froze. Mother? The Greatjon was looking at her, wheezing, as he tried to speak. What…?

She knelt downwards, straining to hear through his haggard breaths. Lord Umber was conscious, trying to force the words out with his dying breaths.

“Catelyn… told us…” he groaned, whimpering softly. “… told us… Stannis…” His bearded jaw clench, trying to squeeze the words out of hoarse half-breaths. “Told us Stannis killed Renly… A shadow… She said a shadow…”
“My lord?” Sansa whispered, struggling to understand. Lord Umber seemed desperate to force the words out. Maybe his dying words.

“Stannis… Stannis’ shadow… Lady Stark told us so she said…” he wheezed, and his body convulsed in pain. Lord Mollen had to press to hold him down, but Sansa leaned in closer to hear the words… “A shadow with Stannis’ face, she said it was him…!”

“Stannis,” Sansa repeated blankly. “Stannis Baratheon?”

“… We didn’t… not even Robb believed her, but…” Lord Umber groaned, red eyes fit to bulge from his skull. “Same shadow… assassin…”

His whole body was twitching, but his hands clenched. Blood was swelling in his mouth, splattering from his lips as he coughed out the words. “Stannis!” he screamed. “Stannis did this!”

Stannis?

Sansa didn’t even know how to reply. The Greatjon seemed to sag, still sputtering blood with every breath. “Do not let him fall unconscious,” the maester warned. “Poke him, scratch him, slap him if you need to. Do not let him fall asleep.”

He groaned in wordless agony. Sansa pulled herself up from the floor, blinking with confusion. Stannis??

Outside, Sansa could still hear women wailing. The Manderly daughters were broken down in tears as their mother’s body was dragged away. The wildling stood with the torch, staring at the Greatjon with suspicious eyes. They were fighting, but the wound was too deep. Nobody expected that the lord would live. Not even her, truth be told.

The killer targeted the most prominent highborn in the hall, Sansa thought. Mormont, Manderly, Umber and Glover – they were strategic targets, Jon’s strongest allies. A shadow assassin.

“He has lost much blood, my lady,” the maester said to her. “His words were likely delirium.”

No, Sansa thought, I don’t think they were.

Stannis Baratheon. Sansa had heard that Stannis had fought and lost against Jon beyond the Wall months ago, but she knew no more details than that. Sansa’s most vivid memories of Stannis were of being locked in the Red Keep during the Battle of the Blackwater, watching the gushing green flames over the water. At the time, she had been both sure that Stannis would save her, and convinced that he would kill them all.

They said that Stannis had a Red Witch under his command. They said that he consorted with demons, and sacrificed men to the flames. A tremor ran down her spine as she looked towards the great hall. Smoke and ash, the man had named it.

Stannis did this.

Sansa felt numb. She could still hear the boots stomping and roiling, men preparing for battle.

Is Stannis aligned with the white walkers? she thought quietly. Is that why he had attacked Jon beyond the Wall?

A flush of anger rushed through her. If Stannis did this, then I will… Sansa thought with a gasp, unable to finish the thought.
Sansa was pale like a ghost as she staggered out of the infirmary. The thought of all those blackened corpses haunted her gaze… the two daughters wailing for their mother… the Greatjon’s blood as she uselessly tried to stitch up the wound…

It was all roiling around her. She wanted to collapse to the ground in a bloody mess. Instead, Sansa screamed – thrashing against the wall and leaving bloody handprints upon it. She screamed with such frustration, trying to force it all out…

“What the bloody hell is happening?” a voice croaked. She turned to see a short and wild-haired man staggering out of the infirmary on crutches. He was a haggard and beaten figure, with raw bruised face and bloody tears dripping down his cheeks.

The Weeper was glaring at her with beady eyes, but Sansa didn’t even know where to begin answering that question.

Instead, Sansa just recomposed herself, wiped the blood off her face, and walked away.

As she passed, she saw the other infirmary bed – where a greying blonde-haired figure lay. Lady Val of Whitetree had pale blue eyes, heavily shadowed, with a gaunt and haunted look to her. Her hair might have once been golden, but it was withering grey. Val’s right arm was left cauterised; nothing more than a stump at the shoulder. The scar that ran across her upper torso and through her breast was hidden by a snow bear’s fur cloak.

She and Sansa locked eyes with each other as she walked past, but Sansa couldn’t even tell what the wildling woman was thinking.

Sansa strode towards the main door, where the howl of the snows was deafening. The gates were propped up, and a bitter cold wind shrieked through the castle. She shouldn’t be out here, it wasn’t safe to move without an escort, but she needed to see.

It was past dusk already, the hour of the eel. Darkness was falling over Winterfell and the only light was the blurred torches writhing against the snow.

All across Winterfell, their army was stirring. All the while Sansa had been stitching flesh, Jon had been mustering for battle. Thousands of men were assembling in the snow-locked courtyard, all the while the snows howled around them like ice giants screaming in the sky.

She didn’t know what was happening, but she saw men armed with obsidian and weirwood running out towards the gates. Jon has called his warriors, she realised. Sansa stood and watched from across the snowbound castle.

“What happens?” a voice behind her called. She saw Lord Forrester standing there dumbly, looking lost. His eyes widened at the sight of the blood on her dress. “What…?”

A shriek of wind hissed, bringing with it the distant stomping of men and the gruff roar of giants. Lord Forrester looked so shaken he jumped with the noise. “Where is the king going?” the lord asked finally. “Where has he…?”

From the distance, she felt thunder shake the ground – a long, forlorn roar echoing out from the godswood. The dragon was roaring.

Sansa stared and then looked up to the writhing heavens above. “He has gone to slay a demon.”
The mammoth boomed beneath him, its great snout trumpeting as it charged forward. Every snowdrift, every great lope sent Jon’s bones rattling. For their size, the mammoths had short and stumpy legs, but the snowdrifts were no obstacle. It powered through wave after wave of snow without even seeming to notice, and it was all Jon could do just to hold on.

It was Jon’s first time riding upon such a creature. There was no saddle to hold, no harness. He could only grip tightly onto shaggy fur like rope, feeling the mammoth’s shoulderblades ripple beneath him. There was nothing but fifteen feet of solid fur and muscle under him, stampeding through the snow.

He heard the long cry of a wolf echoing through the snow. “Forward!” Jon shouted, struggling to be heard. “Follow the howl! Follow the howl!”

“Yun Yar is falling behind!” a voice behind him cried. “Yun Yar and his clan!”

“Keep together!” Jon yelled, signalling at Lun Leg Dar. The huge figures rumbled all around him. “Keep them together!”

All around, giants boomed as they bellowed orders, but they sounded more like animalistic grunts than any commands Jon could understand. The giants ran alongside their mammoths, struggling to keep pace with long, loping gaits. They moved through the snow using the mammoths to clear the way forward, each clan huddled together.

The snows could be over ten-foot-deep, but the giants would still be able to push through them. Lun Leg Dar – an immense, broad-chested giant clutching a maul – stormed besides them, occasionally grabbing the mammoth’s ears to steer it.

They had mustered in the black of night and set off before first light. It was past noon the next day now, but it was hard to see the sun at all through the thick, grey clouds.

They had to move fast. They had to stick to the tops of ridgelines and high places, where the snows were thinnest. As often as not they followed the tracks of the army of the dead. They stopped only when absolutely necessary, keeping a hard pace. They were heading north, but Jon couldn’t even recognise where the kingsroad lay. There was nothing but never-ending fields of white ahead of him.

Yet the wights have over a day’s headstart, and the snows are slowing us down, Jon thought with a grimace. They couldn’t keep this pace up for long. The Wall might have already fallen by the time they arrived. Across on the next mammoth, Jon heard Rattleshirt howling in the Old Tongue, smacking his spear across the mammoth’s hide to urge it forward.

Men on foot could never keep pace with the mammoths, but a few of them still tried. Free folk warbands and northern scouts were following in the giants’ wake, but the distance between the two groups was growing larger and larger.

At the front of the raiding party, Jon had ordered nothing but their best – armed with fire, dragonglass and weirwood. They had four hundred and fifty giants from two dozen different clans, with near three hundred mammoths. There were soldiers sitting seven abreast on each mammoth readying spears and bows.

There were perhaps a thousand plus more men trailing behind that could maybe catch up to them.
when the battle began. If we make it in time.

There was a structure to it, even despite the chaos. The male giant warriors led from the front, while the matriarchs trailed behind and kept the herd together.

The mountain giants were the only ones with experience herding mammoths, while the smaller forest giants huddled together more cautiously. Still, most of the mountain giants clutched crude clubs or giant spears, but the forest giants held immense bows of oak, like scorpions in their huge hand. The mountain giants were clad in strips of furs or leathers, but the forest giants had been more accepting of patchwork chainmail and modified iron helmets. It wasn’t the plate armour he had asked Lord Manderly to commission, but it would do.

The forest giants were the better equipped, more organised, with a harder mindset to battle. They were ready for war – great beasts stomping around the ground.

A few of the giants even dropped to four legs – loping forward on their long arms as they ran.

The men all kept dragonglass primed and ready, but Jon had ordered them to hastily ready weirwood too. Weirwood arrows and weirwood spears. Jon kept Dark Sister in his grip, but there was a burning torch in his other hand and a weirwood stake on his belt.

Malvern had likely summoned that shadow. That could have been the one of the Other’s powers. Nobody knew what the walkers were really capable of, but Jon refused to be unprepared. If weirwood gave them an advantage, then he needed as much weirwood as possible. They had hacked off near all of the heart tree’s branches in a matter of hours.

A shadow. Perhaps there were more shadows still stalking in Winterfell, maybe targeting his family. Maybe one had assaulted Bran as soon as he left. But Jon refused to cower and falling back was not an option – he would find the source of them and he would slay it.

Perhaps Malvern had wished to disrupt the pursuit, but Jon refused to allow the Others to win. He had been forced to set off from Winterfell’s gates even while the bodies in the Great Hall were still warm.

But we’ve lost time, Jon cursed. They’ve already gained ground, and now we must play catch up.

Rattleshirt had the right of it; they needed a raid – a fast and strong force to break through the enemy lines. They needed to slay Malvern itself as quickly as possible, and then hurry to reinforce the Night’s Watch. The mammoths could push through the snows, giants had the might to break the wights, and there were archers mounted upon mammoths prepared to pump Malvern full of dragonglass.

In the distance, Jon saw the grey wolf bounding through the snow. Summer had gone ahead of them, but the direwolf was leading the way.

Bran, Jon knew. He could see his brother in the wolf’s eyes. The direwolf was leading them straight to Malvern.

“Follow the direwolf!” Rattleshirt shrieked, and hollering a war cry that Jon couldn't recognise. “Eyes peeled, stay sharp!”

Jon would have much, much preferred to have Tormund by his side, or Val, or even the Weeper. But Tormund was senseless in grief over Toregg’s death, Val was in no shape to move, the Weeper could hardly walk, and it seemed like Rattleshirt would have to do.
Snow flurried into his face; even in the bright of day, it was still dark. Jon could see shimmer of light through the haze, but it was hard for any flame to survive. “Protect the flames!” Jon shouted. “Conserve your torches!”

Every man had a torch in their hand and a sealed lantern on their belts, but the fires were still struggling to survive.

A giant’s cry split the air. Leg Lun Dar was staggering, the giant’s great nostrils sniffing the air. Beneath Jon, the mammoth shivered. They were close; the giants could smell them.

Through the flurry of snow, they finally saw the black shapes shuffling through the fields. Summer howled, but Jon could recognise them by the way they walked. Wights – not many, but more and more were taking shape through the billows of white.

“Push through!” Jon boomed. “Push through!”

The lines crashed, and the mammoths didn't stop.

Mammoths trumpeted, the giants roared. Malvern's rearguard, Jon thought as he led the way through, wights left behind to watch for pursuers.

The bulk of Malvern’s forces must still be ahead, and now the white walker must surely know they were coming. The giants roared with some war cry in the Old Tongue, but the wights were silent as the grave as they collided.

Jon felt the mammoth stagger as a corpse was stampeded under trampling feet. There was nothing Jon could do but hold on.

Boom. With a single immense swing of a giant’s club, a wight was sent flying. Another tried to charge at the mammoth, but with a single lash of scything tusks it went underneath. The mammoth’s thickly-matted hide was almost armour against the wight’s awkward blows. A wight managed to jump onto the side of another mammoth, but then a wildling’s spear knocked it backwards.

Ahead of them, more and more dark shapes littered the horizon, contrasting against white. We’re getting closer. “Forward!” Jon screamed, to the boom of a hundred war cries. “Form up! Form up!”

“We push through hard and fast!” Rattleshirt howled, to the chanting of war cries. “You see the white walker, you kill it. Don’t hold back, just kill it!”

“Lordship and riches to the man who slays Malvern!” Jon shouted. “Whatever reward, whatever boon you wish, earn it by putting a dragonglass arrow through the white walker!”

The men were hollering. Giants were bellowing orders, pulling their mammoths into line. The mammoths were strong and they had immense stamina, but even they could not last forever. Already, Jon felt the beast below breathing deeply, its snout trumpeting. They had left with all the supplies they could grab, but they had been pushing their mounts and their men as hard as possible for hours.

It was a fearsome pace. Men had already died trying to keep it.

Giants and mammoths, free folk and northmen pushing through the snow. Already, Jon could see the shadow of the Wall looming in the distance.

Ahead of them, another howl filled the air – but it had shifted direction. The mammoths turned slightly, and Jon made out the shadows in the distance.

A solid wall of fir trees lay ahead, their branches blanketed in white. Summer was ahead, darting into the forest. The white walker was there, Summer was tracking it.

It is taking shelter in the trees. Jon could have cursed – Malvern had taken a detour. The Other was a crafty bastard; it knew that the large mammoths would be at a disadvantage in the forest, and the white walker preferred to fight in the woods. It wants to limit our options, wants to set the battlefield.

But what choice is there except to follow? Jon thought. We have Malvern trapped, and his wights are scattered. The only way to win was to break through.

“Forward!” Jon boomed, raising Dark Sister high. Men were screaming and chanting in half a dozen different tongues.

There were bodies in the trees, more wights spilling forward to meet the charge.

All around him, he heard more and more giants clashing with the dead. They collided with booming roars that drowned out the wind. The first of their bowmen were setting arrows alight, flaming arrows spewing from the backs of charging mammoths.

It was all Jon could do to hold on, let alone fire a bow.

“Keep together!” Jon screamed. Do not let them scatter us. “Keep together!”

The trees were getting closer. The mammoth trumpeted, yet Jon could feel its uncertainty. It didn't want to charge into such tight-ranked fir trees.

Push through, Jon willed. He closed his eyes, taking a deep breath, and extended himself into the mammoth.

The world blurred. The mammoth's mind was like none he had known before. It was vaguely similar to a goat, but so much bigger. Its skin felt blunt, heavy and long. Its senses were numb and focused; a half-domesticated animal well used to following orders. Its huge heart was drumming, its focus fixed on the herd. Jon pressed deeper into the beast’s skin, but it was just so thick that Jon wasn't sure if it even noticed. Its presence wrapped around Jon like a cloak that was far, far too big.

He pressed into the mammoth’s body. He could feel the snow beneath him, could feel the rumbling in his trunk…

Forward, Jon willed. Forward.

The mammoth increased its pace, causing the whole herd to trumpet. They were herd animals, they followed the one at the front. They were stampeding in a fury, each one so powerful the earth rumbled…

Crash. They broke through the trees, charging forward.

Sharp branches and twigs scraped against thick hide, causing every man to cover themselves with cloaks. Snow from the treetops splattered down on them, but the giants and mammoths pushed through.

He heard the groan of trees toppling, bark crunching in the tide. Jon had never felt, never imagined, a cavalry charge so chaotic…
The line of wights didn't stand a chance.

A giant roared. There were more and more dead bodies in the woods, wights waiting by the trees. Jon saw bodies bursting up through the snow, undead creatures falling from the branches.

He heard Rattleshirt’s cry, his mammoth rampaging as a wight jumped at the great creature’s head. Spears and burning arrows were snapping.

Fighting was all around him. Jon heard Leg Lun Dar roar as he snatched a dead man out of the snow and tore its arms clean off. The limbs were still squirming even as Leg Lun threw them at another wight.

The direwolf howled, closer and more urgent than ever. Malvern. Malvern is close.

In his own skin, Jon could feel it. He could feel the ache in his chest, the blade through his heart.

“Push through!” Jon boomed, but his voice could never be loud enough. “Push th–!”

The mammoth’s snout twisted, instincts causing its huge body to jerk. Alarm. Great footsteps were thumping across snow, a huge black body shoving through the trees. He heard the cries from the men behind him, he saw the scattering of arrows, but then…

Bear! It was a large black bear, its hide slick with hoarfrost and rot. Half its skull had been cleaved open, its frozen brain spilling out – it had no eyes, but it was still charging. The wight bear lunged out of the trees, lumbering straight at the mammoth.

Jon was in the mammoth's skin, ordering it to respond. The great beast’s instincts were to flee, but Jon forced it to fight. The mammoth roared, its tusks thrashing…

The bear was smaller than the mammoth, but it lunged with no hesitation. No self-regard, no restraint. Boom. The mammoth crashed into it, slamming the creature backwards with its tusks, but the bear was still clawing. Sharp, frozen claws snapped at the mammoth’s forehead, blood hissing.

Men shouting, trying to throw burning torches. The mammoth’s mind flooded with raw panic, and not even Jon could keep it under control. Its instincts were fighting him, thrashing against Jon’s control.

“Brace!” a voice cried. “BRAC–!”

The great mammoth reared upwards, kicking and stomping out. The bear staggered, but the mammoth couldn’t shake it off. Even as the wight bear was lifted physically upwards, it was clawing and snapping. Men were screaming, losing their grips and tumbling…

He fell. Jon gasped, snapping back to his own skin as he landed backwards into the thick, white snow. Five feet of snow cushioned his fall, but it was so deep it felt suffocating.

Jon's ears burst from the deafening roar of the mammoth slamming the bear against a tree, despite the cuts on its forehead. The whole world was quaking.

Jon's torch was left extinguished in the fall, and he could not light another one. Everything was too cold and wet. Their fires were failing. Curse the snow.

And all around him more and more dead were converging. They poured from the shadows, surging forward. Dark Sister swooped out, cleaving through a wight’s neck. The dead man was still moving, still trying to fight.
“Form up!” Jon screamed. “Form up!”

His voice was lost in the chaos. The noise was drowned out by a giant roaring as a dozen wights tried to jump on it. Leg Lun Dar thrashed like a bear fighting against an onslaught of rats. Crazed, relentless rats.

Hundreds of blue eyes shone through the dark. The woods were howling. Jon’s skin prickled, and he knew Malvern was close. He could feel the Other’s gaze on him, he could feel it staring through all those eyes.

There was biting pain in Jon's chest, a painful ache over his heart, but he pressed on.

Behind him, one of the giants fell, toppling to the ground. Another giant slammed its maul through the back of his fallen brother’s head, with no regard. They knew their foe; they knew to leave no corpses whole that could rise again. If they couldn't burn the bodies, they could smash and desecrate them. The men were dropping spears and swords in favour of axes and mauls.

Jon was at the forefront, fighting through the tide. Dark Sister slashed outwards, left and right, cleaving through frozen flesh…

Men were behind him, but Jon could only think on the wave of enemies in front. “Form up!” he screamed. “On me! Form up!”

The men were chanting. “Snow!” they cried. “Snow! Snow! Snow!”

Three dead bodies lunged at Jon, but Dark Sister slashed them down in a flurry of black steel. Half of the wights weren't even armed, Jon realised, and others were clutching sticks as makeshift weapons. They hadn’t been able to burn so many bodies, but scavengers had still picked much of the iron and steel from the battlefield. Malvern had raised his troops too quickly to arm them properly.

He saw many that were wearing Bolton crests, and others dressed as wildlings. Still, they all charged with no restraint, with nothing held back…

The snow was so thick that Jon could hardly walk. He could only shamble through the cold, blade lashing, while the wights were stumbling through as well.

It was less a battle, and more one giant chaotic brawl in the trees. He heard trees falling as the mammoths stormed forward. In weather like this, the bark on trees froze so cold they could snap and explode, even a solid push could topple an old pine.

“Push through!” Jon screamed, through pained, breathless wheezes. “Push through!”

Behind him, a mammoth finally collapsed to the swarms of wights, sending giants around it roaring in berserk rage. Bodies were crushed under clubs and feet, wildlings were heaving with mauls and spears. It would have been easier using fire, but their torches were being extinguished one by one by the snow and cold.

They couldn't kill the wights swiftly without fire, they could only crush the bodies till they couldn't move.

A flock of birds screamed death through the trees – crows flushed from the woods. Ahead of him, Summer howled.

Jon felt it coming by his hair tickling on end. He felt the way the air became colder by its very
And suddenly a wave of wights lunged from the snowdrift. Footsteps shoving through snows, staggering over tree roots. Jon didn’t stumble backwards, but a few of the men behind him did. Dark Sister sung through the snow, cleaving down rampaging bodies. Jon had a blade in one hand, and he wielded his extinguished torch in the other — swinging the wood like a club to knock back wights.

They were everywhere, blue-eyed creatures swarming. But where is Malvern? Jon cursed. Has the white walker already fled the trees?

Then he felt the air go dead. Jon didn’t realise what was missing, not until he realised that he couldn’t hear the men behind him. The sounds of their war cries and bellows went dead. The hairs on the back of Jon’s neck stood on end, and he turned around.

He saw the black and white figure standing like a statue in the snow.

Malvern wasn’t running anywhere. The white walker had doubled back to meet him. The Other slipped from the trees like a ghost, and half a dozen men fell with barely a sound.

The world hushed with its presence. For a moment, the only noise was the deafening beat of his heart. Malvern paused.

It was so cold it hurt to breathe. It was like Jon’s blood froze in his lungs. Giants were still roaring in the distance, but in that moment there was naught but silence. Its wights were charging onwards to push back the mammoths, but Malvern was there — standing in the middle of corpses — staring at him.

The white walker cocked its head. A single burning blue eye inspected him. Its body was half crystal ice, and half scorched black. Its outline rippled, frost crackling around its body. The world was distorted by its presence; all of the colours blurring together.

Camouflaged armour of ice. Even despite the blackened burns across its body, the Other’s armour caused it to blur. Jon took a deep breath, summoning every ounce of strength he had left.

The Other raised an icy sword, so cold that mist swirled around the edge with every lazy movement. So thin and sharp that it whistled through the snow. Jon gripped Dark Sister so tightly it hurt.

It took a step forward. It walked with a limp, Jon noted. They stood and faced each other, white blade against black.

Focus. Kill it. “MALVERN!” Jon screamed at the top of his burning lungs. “MALV–!”

The Other made a noise, a sound like the rustling of ice. Its blade swiped outwards so quick it blurred, and Jon staggered backwards. The slash was light, teasing. War horns were blowing, a direwolf was howling, but they were lost in the swirl of snows and swords.

Jon raised his blade. Every instinct he had was screaming at him.

One cut, Jon thought. I wield Valyrian steel. One cut is all I need.

“You,” the Other croaked suddenly. “I know you.”
Jon lunged. Blades cracked like glass chimming together. The icy sword parried Dark Sister so fast it was lazy. Jon tried to break the lock, but even with only one hand the Other was strong. Impossibly strong.

Clash. The blade of ice lashed out, and Jon’s instincts barely kept up. Dark Sister only just caught the edge, metal scraping against ice, but the blow still knocked him backwards.

Ser Rodrik always said it was poor form to parry edge on edge, Jon thought suddenly. But against a sword like that, what choice was there? The white walker’s blade could cleave through any shield. The icy sword was sharper and colder than anything Jon could even imagine.

The blade of ice left a crisscrossing trail of mist hovering in the air.

It moves as fast as the shadow did. The shadow assassin at Winterfell had been blindingly quick, but the white walker felt stiff and sharp where the shadow had been fluid.

The sword whooshed. It was fast, too fast. Jon only just managed to stumble away, but the razor edge came so close it sliced through the edge of his furs.

The Other made a sound like a tut. “You,” it repeated. Sounds from a throat that wasn’t built for human words. “You. Felt this blade before, haven’t you?”

The sword swung in slow circles, leaving a trail of mist with every movement. The scar on Jon’s chest had been aching for hours, the pain in his heart intensifying with every step the Other took.

He remembered the scene. He remembered fighting atop the ice, screaming his vows and lashing out with everything he had. He remembered Ygritte’s eyes, remembered the Other plunging its sword through his chest.

It was this one. This was the one who stabbed me, all of those months ago. This was the one who left me dead on that glacier.

“You were the one that killed me,” Jon gasped.

The bright blue eye gleamed. Its frozen throat made a crackling noise.

Vaguely, Jon wondered if he would see a shadow attacking him from the corner of his eye. Perhaps there were more shadow assassins lurking in the tree. The weirwood stake was on his belt, but he couldn’t reach for it. Jon didn’t understand; had the shadow worked for the Other? Had it been a different type of white walker? They had both exuded the same unnatural power, but the feeling was different somehow. It had been smoke and ash where the white walker was ice and snow.

The shadow assassin had caught him off-guard, but this time Jon was ready. Malvern wasn’t hiding anymore. Wights were running, snows were flurrying, but Jon’s attention was focused solely on the Other. He could do nothing less.

It lunged. Jon was ready for it. Dark Sister clashed.

The first blow nearly took Jon down, but he was ready for the second. It was strong, fast, but it had poor form. The blade hacked again and again – each strike was blindingly fast, but they were also clumsy. Immensely powerful, but a poor swordsman.

It had never been trained. It had never learnt how to fight, it had never needed to. It had never spent months scrambling through the snow, it had never hardened itself against a hundred foes, it had never fought life-or-death, with the rush of blood screaming in its ears…
Its movements were too fast, too strong – no human could compare. Jon could only match it with skill.

Clash. Jon parried, but the white walker blurred. It spun so swiftly its feet hardly touched the snow.

Jon nearly stumbled, but he kept his footing. Dark Sister never paused, not for a heartbeat. He barely even thought about it, it was like he was dancing on a tightrope. If I trip, I’m dead.

Dark Sister lashed out, but the white walker glided around the blade. Too fast. Jon remembered that moment on the glacier, uselessly slashing and hacking out. Compensate. Anticipate.

I will not die. Not again.

Clash. Clash. Clash. They danced over the snow, the sound of metal chiming like a bell. Faster than any human, more dangerous than any fight he had ever known. Jon’s muscles were screaming, just trying to keep up.

“Will not die,” Jon gasped, his words a growl. “I will not die!”

The Other made a crackling sound. “Mortal,” it mocked. “Brief.”

The white blade arced. Jon heard the hiss of the air, raising Dark Sister to block it. The metal chimed, vibrating so hard that it jarred his wrist. It hurt, but he couldn’t slacken his grip.

Keep fighting, Jon ordered himself. Stay alive, keep Malvern distracted. There were warbands behind him, Jon could only hope that they’d push through the wights. All he needed to do was keep Malvern in place, give someone a chance to fire a dragonglass arrow…

No matter what happened, Jon had to keep fighting.

Never stop fighting. Never stop swinging the sword.

“I will not die!” Jon screamed, kicking forward. “You will not…!”

The Other took the blow and didn’t even twitch. It was like kicking a statue. Jon ducked under a slash, slid in the snow, tried to swipe forward and lunge, but the Other swept backwards. It darted forward in the blink of an eye, and Dark Sister parried. Incredibly agile; just like fighting one of the children of the forest, but with a strength wholly beyond them.

Malvern didn’t make a noise – it was as cold and as uncaring as death. Jon was roaring, screaming, panting and fighting with everything he had. He was alive, howling like fire against the ice.

“You.” Clash. “Will not!” Clash. “Kill me again!” Clash.

Their blades locked. Valyrian steel screeched against ice, and his pounding breath was frosting in the air. Jon roared, pushing forward against Malvern’s blade, yet the white walker didn’t budge. Jon had two hands on the hilt, but Malvern was holding him back with only one.

“You,” the Other said suddenly, cocking its head. “Your purpose is over.”

What? The words were so strange, caught him off-guard. There was no time to think on them, the white blade arced again…

Jon stumbled backwards, but the Other didn’t lunge forward. It held backwards, rotating its sword in lazy circles. Playing with him.
Just like it had done before, Jon realised. When they fought on top of the glacier, the Others had teased him there as well. It had focused on me. “What do you want with me? Why?”

“Needed to bleed,” Malvern said. “You were the one that needed to bleed.”

His jaw clenched, eyes narrowing. The Other was pacing, and Jon kept his sword ready. “You tried to kill me.”

“We did not… did not wish to ‘kill’ you. We looked for you. Searched for a time,” Malvern said slowly, cocking its head. It took a careful, lurched step forward. “We needed your blood. Needed to awaken it.”

Awaken it? What is it…? Jon’s head was spinning, but those words… At the Frostfangs, did the Others target me specifically? Malvern’s voice was rough and inhuman, but it was trying to say something.

“Supposed to bleed out,” Malvern said stiffly, “not supposed to come back. We needed the blood, they said. King’s blood.”

King’s blood? My blood? Jon blinked, trying to understand. “Awaken it,” he repeated. “Were you trying to wake the dragon?”

Malvern made a sound like a tut. “Not supposed to come back.”

Jon heard movement. Behind him. He heard the crunch of snow, the patter of uneven footsteps. Wights, charging at him from the trees behind.

He twirled, swinging Dark Sister in a wide arc as a rusty axe slung at his head. Three wights, each dressed as Manderly men-at-arms. The Valyrian steel blocked the axe, but as soon as Jon turned, Malvern lunged.

The air whooshed. Jon dropped backwards to avoid the blade, and then the wights… The wights were on him. He saw the blue eyes gleaming as the blades hacked downwards…

And a grey shape pounced over him, knocking the dead man straight to the snow in a flurry of claws and teeth. Summer. Summer was there, the wolf tearing through the wights. There was no time to think, no time to react, the icy blade was swinging again. Jon heard it hissing through the air, he moved on instinct.

He barely reacted in time. Dark Sister sung, chiming against ice. Malvern made another tutting noise.

The direwolf was growling. There were wights charging from the trees, but Summer was behind him, protecting Jon’s rear. Malvern lunged again, but Jon lashed out and the white walker twisted backwards.

It tried to distract me, Jon realised. Malvern had stopped to talk while its wights took position behind him. It knew that Jon’s blade was fatal to it, it was trying to be cautious. Even despite its speed, it gave Dark Sister a wide berth.

Perhaps Jon imagined it, but for a heartbeat there was something akin to annoyance passing over the white walker’s icy features.

Clash. Their blades rang again, dancing together across the snow. Will not die, Jon thought. Just stay alive, just stay in the fight. Stay alive and wait for one opportunity.
He felt Summer swoosh by him. The direwolf twisted, lunging at Malvern’s back with fangs snapping. Malvern twisted with shock, and Jon darted forward. Dark Sister glinted through the air, swinging so close… so close! … even if his blade was just an inch longer…

For a moment, the white walker was pressed backwards onto the losing foot.

Then pain. The blue eye was screaming, and suddenly a solid impact landed into Jon’s chest. Its fist. Malvern’s fist collided with his chest, a blow so powerful it swept him up off his feet. Its hand was so cold Jon couldn’t even breathe.

Jon crashed backwards into a pile of snow, thudding against a tree, but Dark Sister was still held upwards. He heard Summer yowling in pain, and then the white walker was lunging, blade sweeping down. Jon was on his back, but he still swung Dark Sister to parry.

The air snapped. An arrow whooshed over his head, and suddenly Malvern blurred. The Other moved faster than Jon could blink.

The next instant, there was an arrow in its grip. A black-tipped arrow. The white walker moved so fast that it caught the obsidian arrow out of the air.

Voices were howling. Men screaming war cries. The raiders and giants were pushing through, and through the corner of his eye Jon saw Rattleshirt notching a second arrow into his bow.

Another arrow snapped. Malvern’s sword lashed outwards, deflecting the arrow on its blade. That was all the chance Jon needed to recover. It is nervous, Jon realised. The Other was inhumanly strong and powerful, but not even it could survive men armed with dragonglass from all sides. It was backing off suddenly, trying to retreat.

“Surround it!” Jon screamed. “Surround it!”

Malvern glared, but the wights were already rushing. Dead men lunged to defend their master. Jon was on his feet, panting for breath, but swinging Dark Sister as swiftly as he ever had.

Their blades chimed once more, but this time Malvern was losing ground.

Force it into a corner. Surround it. Kill it. Kill it.

With barely a thought, Jon reached out and grabbed a hold of his mammoth’s skin. The great mammoth was bleeding from a dozen bear scratches across its head, but it was berserk with rage. Come to me, Jon ordered. Now!

Men were running forward, trees toppling…

He heard the blare of the mammoth trumpeting, stampeding through wights.

Malvern cast a bright blue eye at Jon, darting backwards with inhuman agility. Wildlings were shooting arrows, but then a dozen wights stepped in to act as human shields. Blocking dragonglass arrows with their bodies. The wights were going mad – flinging themselves forward just to hold the raiders back. Sacrificing themselves to cover the Other’s escape.

The mammoth charged through, great billows of snow gushing around immense feet.

The white walker had been betting on their ranks falling apart. It did not expect the living men to force through.
“Do not let it escape!” Jon screamed. “Do not let it—”

It was too late. Jon saw the Other raise its hands upwards, and suddenly the wind itself responded. A great gust of wind whooshed through the woods, sending a flurry of snow hissing against Jon’s eyes. A cold mist was rising, a white cloud pluming from the ground. It’s controlling the weather, Jon realised.

The world was screaming as the cold mist rose. Everything was blanketed white. Malvern had cut his losses and ran.

The wights didn’t stop. Bodies were shuffling blindly through the trees, but Jon couldn’t see a thing. He was panting for breath; the exhaustion nearly took him to his knees. He could feel frozen blood sticking to his furs on his hip; he must have torn his wound open again. Jon couldn’t even feel the pain – his heart was pounding too fast.

A hand lunged at his shoulder, and Jon very nearly sliced the man’s head open on instinct. It was only as he saw the dull glint of the giant’s skull that he froze.

“Need to run, need to fall back!” Rattleshirt was screaming. “Fall back!”

Jon bit his lip, glancing to where Malvern had disappeared. The white walker left no tracks.

Summer was growling, the direwolf’s mouth was left blistered from where he had bitten Malvern. The Other’s flesh was cold that it had torn the fur off the direwolf’s snout. Everywhere he looked, the living were tiring, mammoths were going mad, but the dead never stopped…

A tide of dead bodies was rushing through the trees, the wind roaring all around him…

We will not win in the long fight, Jon thought with a grimace. Dusk was falling and they were already exhausted. Through the thick clouds, the sky was hazy pink like grey splattered with blood. They needed to fall back, needed to rest, but the dead were relentless. They could not survive like this, they could not pursue any longer; they needed to fall back and recuperate.

But the white walker would only grow more powerful. Every hour that Malvern roamed was an hour that the whole world was at risk. Jon cast one final look through the trees, before turning and running.

Sonagon, Jon willed, I need you Sonagon.

Ramsay

‘Quickly now! Move, move!’ the white walker called happily, as the dead shambled through the fields. ‘Our brothers are waiting.’

It is eager, Ramsay thought faintly. The Other seemed excited, even. Thoughts and visions flickered across Ramsay’s blue gaze, and his body could do naught but obey. Unspoken orders surged through him, and Ramsay’s limbs moved automatically. The white walker was in his skin, but Ramsay could see something of its senses too. The Other felt alien; its thoughts were inhuman, its vision coloured in shades of white and blue.

Above him, veins of ephemeral blue light flowed through the sky. The song of winter buzzed in the air and the clouds churn; like invisible hands were wringing the sky until snow and hail spurted
The white walker’s attention was focused on the Wall, on the sworn brothers. ‘Every man wearing a black cloak must die,’ the Other ordered. ‘And quickly. We must be the first. We must break the barrier before my brothers do.’

Visions flickered through him. The Others have a wager going to see which one could break the Wall first, Ramsay realised. They were competing to see which one could clear the way first. Malvern was giddy like a little child; he wanted to see his brothers again, he wanted to win their little bet. This is all a game to him.

It was already past dusk; the skies were black. He could see the flicker of torches in the distance, he could even make out the gleam of steel in the night. Ramsay’s body lurched forward into the battle, his cleaver in his grip.

‘This is the start of a new age. Our age come again!’ Malvern cheered. ‘And I shall be the first.’

All around him, men were fighting and screaming. Howling and dying. Ramsay watched dispassionately as men fought and died. Ramsay’s own arms were swinging, his cleaver hacking down and down like a butcher’s blade, but he could not feel a thing.

He saw men with painted faces and bronze disk armour trying to hold the way, but the wights pushed through them. The dead didn’t stop, even as scores of their number were torched into cinders by burning arrows. The wildlings were tough, but the wights attacked from all sides and showed no mercy.

An arrow thudded straight into Ramsay’s shoulder, but he didn’t even feel it. The blood in his veins was frozen.

Ramsay used to howl when he fought. He used to feel the flush of rage and bloodlust. Now he just felt nothing but the ghostly tingle of phantom limbs.

He saw a man screaming something in a tongue he did not know, swinging two short swords furiously. A wight fell against the wildling, but then Ramsay lunged with his cleaver. Right into the back of the man’s neck. Normally he would have loved such a death, but Ramsay felt nothing. Warm blood splattered, hissing against his frozen face.

Thenns, he remembered faintly. These wildlings were Thenns – Ramsay recognised them from his time with the Bastard King’s army. The wildlings had been camped on the kingsroad south of the hills when the wights ambushed them from all sides.

‘Do not let any warning reach the black castle,’ the white walker commanded. ‘Target the riders first, bring down any birds. Quickly now; our brothers are waiting for us.’

All around him, Ramsay saw black birds with blue eyes mustering in the fields. Malvern had been planning this assault for a long time, and now all of those dead creatures were converging against Castle Black.

I must stop this! Ramsay screamed. This is my body, mine, it can’t use me like this, it can’t!

If he had control, Ramsay would have torn his own blue eyes out of his skull in pure, seething rage. His soul was fighting and thrashing every single moment, but his body didn’t react in the slightest.

From atop the hills, Ramsay saw the shadow of the Wall looming like a mountain. The wights had been marching for nearly two days straight without even stopping, and they were already over halfway to Castle Black. Even a man on horseback would struggle to make such a time, but the dead were relentless.

The Wall looked different. He had never seen it like this before, had never seen anything like it. The world was smothered by the pitch black of night, yet Ramsay could still the sky shimmering blue and the Wall was glowing red and green. The Wall itself was alight, illuminated in scintillating colours.

Above him, veins of magic threaded and weaved through the sky, but to the north they were cauterised by the Wall. The colours mixed together – green like rot and red like blood. It was as if someone had brought a jagged cleaver to the earth and hacked the land apart.

A barrier that reshaped the earth itself. Ramsay stared with amazement, struggling to understand.

Around him, the Thenns were scattered and falling backwards. The army of wights was dispersed out over leagues, but each one was perfectly coordinated. Ramsay saw visions of wights tearing through small villages, staggering through woods, or flapping through the air. I can glimpse everything that the Other sees.

To their rear, Ramsay saw images of mammoths and giants tearing through the snow. The bulk of their forces were ordered north, but the white walker itself lingered to their rear to harry their pursuers. The Bastard King, Ramsay realised. Snow is trying to stop it. Stop us.

Ramsay didn’t know what to do. The thought of being useless was even worse than dying.

The Other was… Ramsay sensed emotions that he could hardly even decipher. Frustration, perhaps, or something like irritation. The image of Jon Snow, fighting desperately amidst the snow drifts, flickered through Ramsay’s gaze.

Ramsay saw wight after wight being cut down by the Bastard King’s blade.

‘That one is troublesome,’ the Other grumbled. ‘His task is done, but he has the gall to linger. We should not have preserved him on the ice.’

For a moment, it felt like the white walker was in trouble. It was trying to kill Snow, but it couldn't. Ramsay didn't even think it was possible for a human to hold a white walker off in single combat.

Malvern had to retreat, but he bloodied the Bastard King’s force enough for them to fall back as well.

‘This is the tree-fiend’s doing, no doubt,’ Malvern thought irritably. ‘The cursed greenseer was likely the one to bring him back. Another inconvenience to our side.’

Ramsay didn't know what that meant, but he caught snippets of thought. The tree-fiend; a watcher inside a tree who had resisted them for a hundred years. The last of a legacy – the Others thought of him with scorn.

How could anyone resist such power?

To the south, a cold flurry churned over the northern edge of Long Lake. Ramsay saw the veins in the sky contract, the weather itself distorting to the white walker’s will. But its presence, Ramsay realised, it feels different.

The burning sense of the Other in Ramsay’s head felt softer – the blue light felt strained. It is exhausted, its strength is running low.
The Other wanted to kill Jon Snow, but the use of its powers left it weaker. It was even moving slower; its legs heavier and its movements more sluggish.

The white walker was monstrously strong, but even it had a limit. Ramsay could feel the exertion in its aura; the strain of manipulating the weather and so many bodies was mounting on it. It wouldn’t be able to keep it up for long. No wonder it was pushing so hard for a swift victory. But what if it grows weaker still? Ramsay thought, will I be able to retake control?

‘No,’ Malvern’s voice chided in his skull. ‘You won’t. Your flesh is mine, thrall.’

Ramsay couldn’t even think about ways to escape without the Other being aware of them. The white walker felt all of Ramsay's desperate thoughts of resistance, and it seemed vaguely amused by them. It was a special type of hell, darker than any he had ever imagined. To be trapped, useless, a puppet… he couldn’t even scream.

Behind him, Ramsay sensed the Other limping up the hills, its blue eye staring across the moonless night sky. Its gaze was focused on the Wall, staring out over the veins of the world. The air was singing, and the Other seemed to brace itself.

‘BROTHERS!’ it boomed, so intense that Ramsay nearly flinched. ‘BROTHERS! I AM READY!’

The words were unspoken, but they were so loud they pulsed through the world. For a long time there was naught but silence, but then Ramsay felt a twinge of a reply. It was faint, barely a whisper, but Ramsay could feel the echo coming from beyond the Wall.

‘You took your time,’ the wind whispered, the faintest susurrus on the storm. ‘We grow impatient, brother.’

‘Begin your attack now,’ Malvern returned. ‘I am ready.’

All around Ramsay, flocks of blue-eyed birds started to gather, flapping and circling on the wind. It was the dead of night, but Ramsay knew that dawn was coming soon. They were already nearing the Gift, approaching Castle Black. Up above, the barrier of red and green glimmered in the sky.

‘How long will it take?’ Malvern asked, shouting beyond the Wall.

‘Not long. But we will not suffer another failure.’ The voice was scolding. ‘You have your plan, and we have ours.’

Malvern only laughed. ‘I shall do my part. For the king.’

The Other pffted as it stepped down from the hill and strode towards Castle Black. The fields were littered with bodies. This is coordinated, Ramsay thought numbly. The white walkers were ready and waiting, assaulting the Wall from the north and south together.

The bastards. They don't get to do this, they can't… Can't let them, I must…

‘My brothers mean to break through themselves;’ the white walker said. In his mind’s eye, Ramsay imagined a young boy jumping up and down with anticipation. ‘But I shall clear the way first, and prove my worth to the king. That is to be your task, thralls.’

I'm not your thrall, Ramsay wanted to scream. I'm not. And yet his lips were sealed and his legs didn’t stop walking.

The closer he came, the brighter the colours of the Wall shone in the night.
Had his jaw still been his, just the sight of the Wall would have made Ramsay gape. He had seen the Wall before, but never like this. He could see the light, shining like a barrier in the sky.

The Other’s army pressed forward through the ice and snow, while Malvern itself lingered at the rear.

‘We cannot cross ourselves. Foolish magicks – they are old but still formidable,’ the white walker said distastefully. ‘But the enchantments themselves are fixed onto the foundations; once those break, the barrier collapses.’

Across from him, the wights collided against the first of the perimeter parties. The dead men flushed through the guards, hacking them down before a single horn could be blown. Ramsay felt one man try to run, but the Other chased him down using the body of a dead boar.

‘We end the sworn brothers,’ Malvern ordered, ‘and then tear it down brick by brick.’

Bodies were trekking through the snow. Ramsay could see the lights of Castle Black, but they approached under the cover of dark. The wight birds were in the air, flapping through the trees ready to tear down any ravens that passed.

The bastards. They don't get to do this, they can't… Can't let them, I must…

Still, the Other’s attention slowly turned back to Ramsay. The thrall was just one more wight in an army of them, but on the inside Ramsay was screaming. ‘Aren’t you a curious one?’ Malvern mused. ‘You are still trying to resist.’

YOU BASTARDS! YOU BASTARDS! YOU DON’T CONTROL ME, YOU DON’T…!

Malvern made a noise like laughter. ‘It will be over quickly. I have waited my whole… what is your word? … ah, I waited my whole ‘life’ to see the Wall fall.’

The Wall loomed above them, so huge the height of it was obscured by the clouds. On the other side of the ice and magic, Ramsay felt the faint echoes of white walkers ordering their troops into formation.

Behind him, Ramsay sensed the Bastard King’s army trying to regroup, but it wouldn’t work. They were too far away, they wouldn’t reach the Wall in time. The living needed to rest, but the dead did not.

‘If not for that one mortal, our victory might have been so much smoother. He is the tree-fiend’s weapon, a thorn against us,’ the white walker mused. Icy hands roamed through Ramsay’s memories curiously. ‘Perhaps that is something I share with you, thrall – you had a chance to kill that one too.’

The Bastard King. The thought of the man helped focus Ramsay’s hatred. He remembered the moment on the ice, with his blade at the Bastard King’s throat. Fight, Ramsay willed. Fight!

It didn’t work. Malvern’s grip was too tight, still looking through Ramsay’s memories. It paused with visions of the dragon, trapped on the ice. ‘Yes,’ Malvern agreed. ‘That was my mistake too. I was tasked with slaying the dragon, you see, and yet I allowed that ‘Snow’ to steal it from me. My brothers were quite unhappy.’

‘Then, we decided that one of us needed to be on the other side; one of us had to cross first to clear the way. That became my punishment – my penance for allowing the dragon to escape. I had to be the first to walk through the barrier. It was…’ The white walker’s hands lingered on the burns across the side of its face, the black scorch marks that cut across its eye. The barrier had set Malvern on fire. ‘… it was an unpleasant experience.’

Up above, the green and red light swirled in the air. Malvern stared thoughtfully. ‘I do not quite understand your concept of emotions,’ the Other said finally. ‘But I think… yes, I think I will ‘enjoy’ watching the wall crumble.’

_It will not work_, Ramsay thought furiously. _It can’t. The Wall is too big, too immense._ The Bastard King had reinforced the Night’s Watch, and the relief force from Winterfell was on its way. They might be able to break the castle, but they could never dint the Wall. Even for an army of the dead, it would take an age to tear it down.

Malvern tutted. ‘Not so.’

Images flashed before Ramsay’s eyes. The white walker was showing him memories. He saw a battle – a slaughter – of thousands of men in jagged mountain peaks. He saw a snowy field, and a bleeding figure clutching his chest. He saw a buried giant’s tomb beneath the ice, with ancient coffins torn open.

He saw a great white horn, a horn carved of ancient pale wood.

And he saw an immense beast, buried underground. The Others had dug it up from the mountains. They had needed blood to awaken it.

Ramsay stared in shock. The reply felt smug. ‘For we have the weapon that the builder himself used.’

More visions flashed. They were creatures that had been extinct for millennia, but that was hardly a limitation to the white walkers. Their corpses had been buried in the north, and that was all the Others needed to raise them once more. Immense, frozen bodies sealed in the ice – monsters lost to history.

Night was falling. The first of their numbers were beginning their attack. Black shapes were flapping in the air, but Ramsay’s eyes were drawn to the other side of the Wall.

_‘They were the ones to build the Wall in the first place.’_ Malvern was gazing to the north, staring out over Castle Black. _‘It is only fitting that they be the ones to destroy it.’_

The roar rumbled from north of the Wall like thunder, a sound so immense that the earth itself quaked.

Sam

Darkness was crashing down across the Wall.

Sam felt the panic surging and the air screaming all across the Wall. It felt like the sky itself was pounding, racing like his heartbeat. The world blurred with the flurry of snows, all the while the sound of horns blared. There were more than three horns – it felt like hundreds of blasts, echoing and reverberating with the wind.

Sam was left quivering in a ball on the floor, clutching his bleeding scalp. All around him, blue-eyed bodies were still squawking, still trying to flap and claw.
He heard the sound of battle, but it was everywhere. The Others were pressing against the gates from the north, and to the south they saw the shadow of an army on the kingsroad, obscured by the faint setting sun.

To the north, it was already pitch blackness. The shadow of the Wall was so dark that they couldn’t even see the bottom of it. There were no torches in the army of the dead, nothing but vague shadows in the black.

The Wall could resist any force from the north, Sam thought, but there are no walls on the southern side. Two-Toed Dirk and Bedwyck were both leading men, already rushing down the steps.

His heart was racing as he huddled in the trenches. How long do we have? How long before they break the garrison? He thought of Dalla, her babe, all of the refugees… all of the men and women that couldn’t fight…

“Swords! Swords and spears, get to the castle!”

“Defenders!” Garth Greyfeather shouted. “Defenders to the south!”

“Stone-throwers!” Aki the Wroth screamed. “Men on me! Lift the stone-throwers up, we need them on the other side of the Wall!”

Men were rushing to hoist the wooden beams of the hefty mangonels. The northern edge of the Wall was littered with siege weapons hunched like wooden birds, each perched at the precipice and angled downwards. They were trying to lift them to the southern side; it took a dozen men just to lift a single catapult, and more to carry it through the narrow trenches. Sam was scattered on his knees, staring in horror. “… No…!” Sam squealed. “Don’t bother, it’s not worth it!”

It would take too long to move all their siege weapons across, too many were frozen in place in the ice, and they wouldn’t be useful enough. Heavy rocks didn’t have the range, and they’d become useless after the wights broke into Castle Black. Moving the mangonels was a waste of precious time.

The men didn’t hear him. They were still trying to lift the heavy weapons. “Don’t!” Sam tried to shout, his voice quivering. “Ignore the stone-throwers, we need to build barricades! We need archers and we need spears!”

They weren’t listening to him. Why aren’t they listening to me? Mance could have boomed orders and every man would just obey. Men were still fumbling with the siege weapons, but they didn’t have the time. Forget the bloody catapults! Sam tried to scream. Get down there with axes and swords!

Sam’s breaths were strained, hyperventilating. He couldn’t focus, he couldn’t…

There was no command on the Wall. The men weren’t responding properly, there was too much clamour. A chorus of panicked voices shouting over each other.

“They’re at the gates! They’re at the gates!”

“Drop the scythe! Bury all the bastards!”

“Spiders! Spiders!”

“Evacuate the castle!” Marv the Red Hand bellowed. “Everyone on me. Light the flare and signal the evacuation! Get those people out of there!"

Evacuate. The thought of Dalla, Gilly, the babes, the children… No! Don’t evacuate, don’t…
“Don’t evacuate!” Sam squealed, as he shuffled to his feet. “Don’t light the flare, don’t–”

He made it half a dozen steps before he felt something sharp peck at his ankle. He felt pain, a sharp beak lunging into his heel. Sam scattered straight to the snow.

It was a hawk – a nasty rotten blue-eyed beast with a crushed wing. It couldn’t fly, but it could still waddle and lunge. It was on him, squawking and slashing, trying to claw through Sam’s boots. He tried to kick, tried to squirm…

Half-crazed, Sam kicked it into a snowdrift and then scampered away.

Don’t evacuate the castle, Sam thought, through the craze of panic. There was nowhere to evacuate them to except up the Wall, and the Wall wasn’t safe. To flood the steps with panicked men and women trying to flee would be disastrous; they’d be easy targets and access from the top to bottom of the Wall would be hopelessly jammed. The lift couldn’t carry that many, and the stairs up the ice were treacherous by night.

And every death was another soldier for the Others. The refugees were wights waiting to be raised.

Don’t evacuate. But what else could be done if Castle Black was lost? The ice cells, Sam realised.
The best solution would be to barricade the refugees in the ice cells, to even lock them in the prisons. That way even if they did die and come back as wights, they’d be trapped.

Sam tried to scream orders, but his voice wasn’t strong enough. He was nothing but one more panicked voice in a chorus in them. “Don’t light the flare! Wait–!”

He wasn’t loud enough. Men lit the flare and blew the horn, signalling for the castle below to evacuate. No, Sam thought in dismay. No…!

Disorganisation was the true bane in any disaster. Bad commands were worse than the enemy. The men below would see the flare and assume that somebody had a plan. They would try to evacuate, it would be a slaughter, and it was all Sam’s fault…

Sam’s head was spinning struggling to think. Noise all around him, he couldn’t concentrate. What would Mance do? What would Jon–

Boom. The crash of a heavy object caused him to shudder. Sam could have screamed as the object soared overhead.

“Catapults!” a man screamed. “They’ve got catapults–”

Crash. A heavy object crashed through the snow. It was all so dark, so chaotic, Sam couldn’t even…

There were no lights to the north of the Wall. The dead were the only army that didn’t need light.
The Others were hidden by the shadows and the snows, but in the gloom Sam made out large shadows pushing out of the tree line. Massive trebuchets, being carried and loaded by giant wights.
There was another boom, and something solid collided against the Wall.

More and more trebuchets were launching from across the dead man’s land.

At first, Sam thought they were firing boulders, but then he saw arms and legs soaring through the sky. He heard men screaming, swords clashing against flailing bodies. Wights. The Others were launching dead bodies seven hundred feet in the air. Some of them missed, others soared too high and were sent shooting through the air to the south. Most of them shot too low and crashed against the Wall, but the white walkers had no shortage of bodies to fire.

The barrier stopped wights from walking through, Sam realised, but it didn’t stop physics. Flying objects still worked, and even when the bodies collided, crushed to pieces, the wights would still flail. It wasn’t the perfect attack, but it was a means to fire more soldiers south. A means to spread panic.

The white walkers had prepared this assault; those trebuchets had been built in advance. They knew the difficulties, they had devised solutions.

But how to stop it, how to fight back…?

Sam saw a blue-eyed corpse with its spine shattered and its limbs broken to pieces, but it was still trying to claw, trying to attack. The air was thick with the echoes of screams, the twanging of arrows and the thuds of siege weapons.

All around him, the panic was spreading. Too many men were abandoning their posts, running for cover, or rushing down to the castle. The ambush left them in disarray, trying and failing to react to threats on multiple sides.

Sam knew what had to be done. He knew what they must do. But the men weren’t responding to him, he was left squealing orders uselessly in the dark. “On me!” Sam cried. “On… on me! Defenders gather on me!”

It didn’t work. His voice wasn’t powerful enough to split the chaos.

“Mance!” a man screamed suddenly. Bearded Ben – an aging sworn brother clutching a pike in both hands. “Mance! He’s alive!”

Sam stared in shock, but the cry was spreading. At once, Sam was running, bleeding feet pounding through the trenches of ice. “Mance!”

Bodies were already gathering. Dornish Dilly risked the climb downwards, trying to hook a rope around Mance’s waist. The Lord of Castle Black was left spilled precariously over the wooden beams of the lower rampart, blood oozing from his skull. Sam had thought the fall killed him, but he was stirring.

There were too many men huddled around the Wall’s edge, Sam couldn’t push his way to the front. “Get back, all of you get back…!”

He heard the grunts. They were dragging Mance up from the wreckage. “Mance…! Mance!”

“He’s alive… is he alive…?”

“Wake up! Mance wake up!”

To the south, Sam saw the battle unfolding in the gloom, watching helplessly from seven hundred feet in the air. He saw the flurry of torches fighting against the snow. Malvern’s army was clashing with men over the horizon, a battle on the kingsroad. Sigorn’s host? Sam thought, heart in his mouth. It could be the force of Thenns from the Shadow Tower, or perhaps the northern clans had mustered men against the wights. Could the Thenns hold them back? Could reinforcements—
Crash. Another flying corpse thudded down, crashing so close it shattered through one of the wooden structures. The wight was left splintered on a broken wooden beam, pinned above them, its shattered body uselessly squirming.

Sam could see Mance sprawled out over the ice, with men trying to rouse him. He was alive, he was writhing incoherently, but he wasn’t awake. Blood was oozing from his skull, his eyes wide and mouth flapping open.

Sam prayed that Mance might recover, but the man was not fit to command. He might not ever recover. The Wall was without command, and the dead were pressing closer.

They were caught in an attack from both sides, and the dead had a supreme advantage in the dark and the snow.

But where is Sonagon? Sam thought frantically, like a drowning man clutching at the last straw of hope. It was a long way to Winterfell, but a dragon could cross it in a matter of hours. Surely the message would have reached Jon by now, surely the dragon should be coming any moment now…?

We need to last until dawn, Sam thought. We only need to last until dawn.

“Bodies!” a voice cried suddenly, splitting through the air. Ulmer was running, a bow in his hands and his quiver already empty. “Bodies climbing the Wall!”

“Drop the scythe, drop the–”

Another three wights crashed atop the Wall, while a score more tumbled through the southern air behind him. Two broke where they landed in the ice, spines snapping and still thrashing, but the third crashed through a snowdrift, and within moments it was up and raging amongst the men. More soared too low, and swatted like flies against the Wall itself.

Another wight bounced off a watchtower and scattered into the trenches in a hail of broken limbs. Sam saw its severed, rotten arm dragging itself by its fingers, still groping blindly as it tried to find a sworn brother to maul.

The boom of the trebuchets pounded through the world again and again, beating like endless war drums in the background.

It felt like the world was shaking. The ground was shaking, Sam could feel the vibrations in the ice.

“Mance!” Bearded Ben screamed. “Wake up!”

A concussion. Perhaps worse. Mance wouldn’t wake up, and Sam couldn’t wait for him. What would Jon do? he thought with crazed panic. What would Jon do, what needs to be done…?

Sam was already running. Too many men were running backwards and forwards, north and south, like a flock of headless chickens…

“Climbers!” a man from a watchtower screamed, his horn echoing. “There’s hundreds of them, they’re climbing–”

The voice was cut off as a heavy object ripped through the watchtower. Sam only heard the screams. He felt the quaking; the Wall itself was trembling and Sam didn’t know why.

Climbers. That was impossible, Sam nearly protested. The wights couldn’t climb the Wall, there was a barrier. Yet more and more men were shouting alarms from up and down the length of the garrison. The sky was so dark, the battle had been raging for hours; Sam had no idea how many might have climbed.

He needed a weapon. They needed bowmen. Sam stopped to grab the bow and quiver from a fallen man; Marthe of the Antlers had died in a bloody mess after a dead hawk half-tore out his skull.

Beyond the Wall, darkness loomed. Men were throwing torches down off the precipice, but the light wasn’t strong enough. All Sam could see was black, writhing shapes. In the black abyss, Sam saw the shapes of ice spiders as large as mammoths, and glistening arms of huge trebuchets.

The Other’s army was assaulting in full force; they had archers and artillery barraging the Wall from the ground below. Covering fire, Sam realised. They were launching wights to keep the sworn brothers off-guard. They were providing cover for the bodies climbing their way upwards.

The ground trembled, like an earthquake rising… Men screaming all around him.

An icy arrow as large as a spear snapped upwards, so fast and powerful it tore straight through a scorpion and sent wood shattering. Sam had to duck as it sent splinters flying overhead. The Others had prepared the type of scorpions and stonethrowers that might threaten a dragon, he realised.

It was all coordinated. First the Others acted as a distraction for Malvern’s army coming from the south, and then they took advantage of the assault on the castle to attack in earnest from the north. They were attacking with everything they had.

And the climbers… Sam could see hundreds of rustling figures, moving upwards. Grapnels were firing upwards, ropes of icy chains. Men were rushing to cut them down, but the climbers were making progress.

It doesn’t make sense, Sam could have screamed. The wights couldn’t cross of their own volition. They could be dragged or carried or thrown, but they couldn’t cross any more than regular corpses could. How are these dead climbing?

Trembling hands fumbled with his bow, shaking too badly to notch an arrow. The first of the black bodies broke over the precipice, spears stabbing upwards. Dozens of them were falling, but the black brothers couldn’t stop them all.

Sam recognised it from the way they moved, he heard the scream of war cries. He understood how they managed to climb.

They aren’t wights, Sam thought with shock. Living men, fighting on behalf of the Others.

They were wildlings. They were screaming. He saw men clinging desperately to the fortifications, trying to lever their way up, thrashing and stabbing out madly with spears. Garth Greyfeather put an arrow straight through the eye of one wildling, but then there was another climbing over his corpse.

Living men. Had the wildlings aligned with the white walkers? Breathing, bleeding men who could have built siege weapons, ropes and weapons…

All around him, the fighting was spreading. They were climbing across a huge length of the Wall, the outer edges slipping past the fringes of where the sworn brothers were concentrated. Attacking us from all sides…

Crash. Another flying wight splattered in a hail of rotten flesh and bones. The earth was shaking…
A sudden boom echoed from the ground, a howl like the earth itself was roaring. A great gust of snow geysered upwards, pluming up from the edge. A dozen torches hissed out at once, white darkness dropped, and Sam felt the ice shivering…

The wind picked up, battering the defenders with a flurry of hail as hard as stones. An errant brother took a blow to the head and tumbled screaming over the side, while the others covered their heads with arms and shields and cloaks.

And then the climbers crested the edge.

He saw spears lunging at bowmen. They couldn’t stop all the grapnels in time. The battle had reached atop the Wall.

All around them, the storm raged and the earth quaked.

Sam saw a figure in an ice-covered cloak, slipping a spear straight through a black brother’s chest with a savage scream. The bow was in his hands, shaking in Sam’s grip.

“Stop!” Sam screamed, his muscles staining as he pulled back the bowstring. The wildling was panting for breath, doubled over in wheezed breaths.

The battle atop the Wall was all around him. Bodies crashing from the sky, wind howling...

The wildling pulled the spear closer to their chest, staggering upwards. Sam was about to fire, but then he caught sight of face under the hood. He saw the curve of the jaw, the cheekbones… it was a woman. Sam faltered at the sight. “Stop!” Sam howled, the arrow shaking.

A woman, clutching a bloody spear. Sam didn’t understand, too much panic, couldn’t think. Why are living men and women working with the Others, why help the dead…?

She howled at him, screaming bloody murders that were lost in the wind. Her eyes were crazed, Sam’s bow twitched. “STOP!” Sam screamed. “I don’t want to—!”

Twang. He fumbled his grip and the bowstring snapped. The wildling fell backwards with the shaft through her torso, red hair spilling out of her hood. Someone screamed.

Sam could have collapsed in shock. These were living men and women. “Fall back!” a man was yelling. Kedge Whiteye, howling at the top of his lungs. “Fall back to the trenches!”

A man’s voice roared in fury, charging with a spear and an ice-pick. Strong hands were dragging Sam backwards, and all he could do was stare. All around him, people were fighting and dying…

Sam didn’t know what was happening. All he knew was that this battle was being lost, and he couldn’t… he couldn’t…

Living men. I can’t fight, Sam thought numbly. I’m sorry Jon, but I’m not a fighter. I can’t fight.

The dead always win in the long run. Perhaps the Others were laughing right now. Sam turned and looked at the men spilling out, screaming bloodthirsty howls as they charged. Sworn brothers were holding the trenches, meeting them with shield against spear, swords against axes.
Sam knew what he had to do.

The bow dropped out of his hands and into the snow. He shoved himself from the grip of the men trying to pull him back. He ran forward. Sam opened his arms wide, his eyes fearful, and he stared straight at the man with the bloodthirsty spear.

All that panic… it was like it all just overflowed He had gone from fear, to panic, to a sort of animal horror, and now Sam just felt numb.

He was defenceless, exposed. The wildling was screaming, his spear flashing. Sam didn’t twitch, he didn’t fight, he just fell to his knees in the snow.

His eyes were wide, waiting for the spear tip through his skull…

And the wildling’s spear stopped, moments away from plunging through his gut. Sam caught the flicker of hesitation, the surprise, the doubt.

These were living men. A living man was different from wights; even the most blood-crazed wildling probably wouldn’t immediately slaughter a defenceless, fat man on his knees. Sam’s only defence was his helplessness.

“Move out the way,” the wildling growled, and Sam could have collapsed face first with relief.

Sam gulped. “No.”

“Move or I’ll gut you, you fucking crow!” the wildling screamed.

“No.” His head was spinning. He was closer now; he could see the wildlings’ eyes. They all had the same desperate, crazed look to them, the same pale faces. All scared and angry. “Why are you doing this? Why are you fighting for the Others?”

The wildling’s spear went to his throat, the tip pushing so hard it hurt. There was blood trickling down his neck. “You fucking dare–”

“Lower your weapons!” Sam squealed suddenly. The wildlings looked off-guard, but Sam was shouting at the sworn brothers behind him. “I am Lord Steward of the Night’s Watch, and I order you! All sworn brothers lower your weapons!”

And just like that the air faltered. There was the murmur of uncertainty and doubt. That moment was good, anything to stop the panic – even just for a heartbeat. To give us a chance to think.

Why are we fighting? Sam couldn’t understand it – why are living men working for the Others?

There was a breath’s pause. Attackers and defenders standing against each other, all weapons raised and hungry for blood, with Sam on his knees in the middle.

It was the look in their eyes, Sam realised. All the wildlings climbing the Wall shared the same look. They were scared men fighting for their lives. “Why are you doing this?” Sam screamed, looking between the gaunt and bloody figures. “What did the Others offer you? What did they promise?”

The wildling’s jaw twitched, but his spear didn’t waver. There was a brief moment, a gulp of doubt, a flicker of his eyes. “They said that they’d let us go. Let us go south,” the man admitted finally, “if we captured the Wall for them.”
Sam could have sagged. They were prisoners! The Others sent prisoners to attack as the first wave. Sam shook his head. “We’re not your enemy,” Sam pleaded. “Help me stop the fighting, you must. Help me recover this.”

The wildling at the front looked hesitant. Men behind him were pulling back bowstrings, but Sam held his arms out wide as if he could block the arrows. The air was screaming, the trembling didn’t cease, but the two groups were left standing off against each other on the frozen Wall.

“What are you doing?” a wildling demanded, a bald-headed man with a missing eye. “We’ve got to do this—”

“Don’t you bloody—” the first man snapped, but Sam saw the conflict in his eyes.

“We have to kill them!” another howled.

“They’ve got our families, Ryk!” the bald wildling snapped. “My family! It’s us or them.” The wildling glared around the sworn brother with pure, desperate hatred. “And they’re crows!”

The man made to lunge at Sam, and the sworn brother squealed like a pig. “We’re not!” Sam shouted, scrambling backwards and looking around the faces. “We’re not crows!” Sam was panting, head whirling… “Marv! Marv the Red Hand! What clan are you from?”

Behind him, the gazes flickered behind. Marv the Red Hand, a tattooed figure wearing the black cloak, blinked in shock. “Nightrunner,” the man grunted. “I’m a Nightrunner.”

“And Wulf!” Sam shouted. “What of you?”

One-Eyed Wulf hesitated, but he answered. “East coast. Antler man.”

“Look around you!” Sam screamed at the wildlings. “You face free folk! You face Thenns and Hornfoots, cave dwellers and river clans! Free folk who stand against the Others! Free folk wearing black, but they are free!”

Gazes flickered uncertainly. These men had been prisoners of the Others, maybe for months, Sam realised through desperate breaths. Had they been captured after the first battle of the Frostfangs? They all looked tortured and starved. They didn’t know of the pact between free folk and sworn brother, they never knew of the peace that Jon had built.

The white walkers held their families captive, forcing these men to assault the Wall.

Sam saw the wildlings falter. The man at the front – Ryk – they were looking to him. He was a tall and strong figure, Sam focused on him too. “You have families down there, families the white walkers are holding over you,” Sam pleaded. “But there are families on the other side too. There are women, children and babes. You have a choice, Ryk.”

Please, Sam begged. This is what the Others, they’re using you as shock troopers. “Now lower your bloody weapons!” he wailed. “We’re not your enemy – the only enemy here is the cold!”

Ryk looked torn. Other wildlings were screaming, voices rising. Men were calling for blood. “They ambushed us. They’re fucking crows!”

“We’re going to die if we don’t…!”

“They’re crows, Ryk, we have to—!”
“Ryk,” a voice called, splitting through the clamour. “Longspear Ryk.”

Sam turned, and voices went hush. Behind him, he saw two men walking forward, with a limp figure draped between them. Mance. He was awake; his eyes unfocused, his head sagging, but he was awake. “Longspear Ryk,” Mance repeated, with wheezy breaths.

The wildling jammed. His spear finally lowered. “Mance?!?” Longspear Ryk gasped, eyes widening in utter shock. “You’re alive? We thought the crows…”

The murmurs spread. The sight of Mance Rayder, former King Beyond the Wall, supported by black brothers…

Mance didn’t reply, only nodded. His head was sagging, like it took everything he had just to stay conscious. Mance was trying to stand, but his head was dazed. Sam took a great sigh of relief.

“Help us!” Sam shouted to the wildlings. Mutters were rising, but the fighting was stopping. The tide of the battle was withering away. Sam’s voice grew louder, more confident. “Help us defend the Wall, help us push them back. We’re all dead if the Wall falls.”

Sam didn’t understand why all of their gazes were still so dark. Sam was begging with everything he had, but he didn’t understand why they were so hesitant,

Ryk shook his head grimly. His spear clattered to the ice. “We’re already dead.” The wildling pulled down his furs, and Sam saw white veins snaking up the man’s neck. “They didn’t… they never trusted us. They didn’t let us go free without making sure…”

Sam blinked, peering closer at the skin. There was a wound in Ryk’s shoulder, two frozen bite marks in his skin. An ugly wound coated in frost. Oh.

He recognised those marks; Sam remembered when he saw them last. Poison – ice spider venom.

“They said that they’d give us the antidote if we took the Wall for them,” Ryk explained with a gulp. “The Others promised us the antidote, promised to let our families go – so long as we captured the Wall for them.”

Sam looked around the wildlings, and each of the wildlings had the same skin all similarly marked with white. Men with slow-acting venom seeping through in their veins. Slow enough that they could climb the Wall, but then die after they crossed. Oh, those bastards, he cursed. The cunning evil bastards. The white walkers had sent poisoned prisoners over the Wall as shock troopers.

“They lied.” Sam gulped and shook his head sadly. “There is no antidote. They just wanted you to cross the Wall and then die so you can be raised as wights.”

Sam took a step forward. These were tortured and captured, crazed and poisoned men. Sam saw mad eyes, and tears frozen across their cheeks. The bald wildling flustered, trying to object. “They said–”

“They’re lying!” Sam took a deep breath, mustering all the courage he had. “But you’re not dead yet. You can fight!” Nobody met his gaze. “How do you want to die? Do you want to fall as slaves of the Others? Or do you want to go down as free folk until the very end?”

Nobody replied. He saw men breaking down into tears. “You are free folk!” Sam pressed, turning between them. “Fight like it! Die like it!” He gulped. “All men must die, but we must fight too.”

He felt the change in the air. He felt their gazes on him, he felt the bloodlust start to die out. The relief could have dropped Sam to his knees again. “Lower your weapons,” Ryk said finally. “Lower your weapons!”

“Our families—!” the bald wildling wailed.

“Lower your bloody weapons!” Ryk screamed. “Grab as many as you can, stop the fighting.”

“Help them!” Sam ordered to the sworn brothers. “Quickly now, help as many as you can up onto the Wall! Now! Before the white walkers realise we’re not fighting anymore. We’re not playing their game, we’re working together.”

Men were running. They were moving across the Wall, and the skirmishes were withering. Sam’s hands were still trembling, his heart was still racing, but he knew what had to be done. The men were staring at him for orders, rather than shouting over him. The white walkers had set the battlefield, but it wasn’t over. Not yet. I must turn this battle around.

The ground shuddered. The booming of the trebuchets never ceased, and Sam could feel the quaking growing louder.

Longspear Ryk turned and ran towards the woman with the arrow in her shoulder, kneeling over her. The red-haired woman. She was alive, Sam realised. Gasping and straining to breath, with ice spider venom in her veins, but she was alive. Ryk seemed distraught as he looked down at her.

“How long do you have?” Sam asked finally. “The poison… how long?”

Ryk shook his head, anger and grief roiling over his face. “I don’t know. Hours, maybe? I don’t know. I can feel it – my hands are growing numb, everything’s so cold.” He took a deep breath. “The Others… they kept thousands of prisoners – fuck, they were working us, farming us…” His hands clenched into ball, looking down at the woman beneath him. “There’s no antidote? You sure?”

“None.” That might have been a lie; for all Sam knew, the Others truly did have a cure, but he couldn’t risk spreading that thought around. He needed to focus, keep them focused. “How many are there?” Sam pressed. “The white walkers – how many do they have?”

“Too many.” Ryk was wheezing, still weeping as he wrapped the bleeding girl in his arms. “There’s no fighting them, we can’t…” Sam stepped closer. “I saw them. They dug up the Frostfangs, they found… it was the horn…”

“What?” Sam breathed.

“The Horn of Joramun. They have the Horn of Winter, they found it,” Ryk muttered. For a gaunt and grim man, he looked so scared. “There’s no fighting them, you can’t…”

The earth quaked, the rumbles growing louder. It had been trembling for hours. Sam stared out over the black precipice, and he heard the cracking from below, the ground churning. Like giants thrashing in the earth, writhing in the black.

Men were gathering around him, looking at Sam. It was the darkest hour of the night, and there were legions of dead pressing against the Wall. He could feel the earth vibrating – were the Others digging beneath the Wall? Or was this truly the Horn of Joramun?

The Others were holding nothing back – they intended to crush the Wall from both sides.

“The castle is overwhelmed!” a man yelled. “They’re pushing through–!”
Another crash of the trebuchets, bodies shattering against the ice. “We must take the fight to them!” Aki the Wroth shouted. “Break through their armies, scatter them!”

“Don’t be a damn fool!” Ulmer snapped. “There’s too many, we don’t stand a chance!”

“You can’t beat them!” a wildling wailed, tears in his eyes. “You can’t, you just can’t…”

“We must run! Retreat!”

Sam’s head was spinning, lost in the panicked shouts, the screams. The world was falling into madness, and he didn’t know what to do.

A sworn brother – Bearded Ben – grabbed Sam’s shoulder tightly. “We have to evacuate,” he hissed. “We’re ducks frozen in the ice up here. We’ve got to get off the Wall, retreat and rally our forces. We can launch a counterattack in the light of the morn.”

Sam hesitated, counting the frenzied beats of his heart before replying. “We can’t,” he muttered numbly. “The barrier is powered by us – by our vows, by our loyalty. That is the only thing stopping them from crossing. If we abandon our post then that’s as good as dropping our black cloaks. The barrier will fall and the wights will just climb across.”

Eyes stared at him in shock. “We’ll be bloody dead if we stay here and then they’ll climb across!” a man screamed. “They’re already through the castle, we can’t hold them back!”

He’s right, Sam thought. We can’t. There were too many wights, the walkers were too strong. They didn’t stand a chance against such forces.

What would Jon do? Sam wondered. Jon would rally their forces, he would bellow orders to their men. Jon would bring the fight against the Others, he would lead the push on the front lines and he would seize a victory from the jaws of defeat. Jon would be able to turn the battle around.

But Jon wasn’t here, and Mance’s brains had been scattered in the fall. It was all on Sam, they were all staring at Sam. I’m sorry, Jon, Sam thought. But I can’t be like you.

We can’t retreat, we can’t fight – what other choice was there? There was only one last thing that could be done…

“We need to surrender,” Sam gulped. “We must surrender.”

Chapter End Notes

There's been a delay due to work stuff popping up. Chapter 47 will likely be at the end of the month, unfortunately.
Chapter 47

Chapter Summary

The cold winds are blowing...

Seventeen months ago...

The wind howled over the white world, and the silence crept slowly through the jagged mountain peaks. The children of the moon stepped through the cold and ice, overcast by stormclouds fat with snow.

The cold winds were blowing, and the sounds of battle echoed with the snowstorm.

'Forty-seven!' the white walker laughed. 'I have forty-seven!'

'And I’m on sixty-three – no, sixty-four,' another Other said smugly. Behind it, there was a thud of an arrow through flesh. 'And now sixty-five.'

'No fair!' it whined. 'You took all the best thralls...!'

'It’s the archers you need,' the Other returned. ‘Look at how they fall – the poisoned arrows work wonders against mortals.’

'How many do you have, brother?' It turned to the brother striding besides it, casually slashing its sword through the frenzied crowds.

It snorted. ‘As if I could count.’

It walked with nine of its brothers, all of them clad in frost and ice. They walked together as the winds roared and the blizzard seared through the frosty fangs of the mountains, directed by their will. The white walkers were figures of bright white and ephemeral beauty, wearing rippling armour with eerily sharp blades swinging in their hands. They strode over the battlefield like ghosts, bringing cold and silence with every step they took.

The white walkers had no identities, not really. They had no names, no sense of self – such things were alien to them.

It had heard of the naming practices of mortals, but it had never really understood such. What was the point in designating everything like that? Why bother naming something that was so, so brief?

They had been granted so many names that they all blurred together with the ages of the world. They had been called the white walkers, the children of the moon, the lost sons, the new gods, the soldiers of the woods, the Sh’Gargar, the pale plague, the guardians of the sleeping heart and the frost demons. Names were useless – there were only those who were brief, and those who were Other.

The mortals were like flickering candles, while they were eternal.
The battle was well underway as they came. Their creatures cut through the camp with ease, flanked by thralls of all shapes and sizes. There were undead wolves, hogs, bears, shadowcats, each of them decaying animals with bright blue eyes. Then, there were dark shadows looming over the rocks – the resurrected rotten giants lumbering into the battle.

The army of the wildlings – the greatest, largest gathering these mortals had ever known – was being torn to pieces from all sides. They watched the battle through a thousand eyes, and the white walkers giggled and pointed.

The white walkers glided over the frozen rocks, as the mortals screamed and shrieked. All around them, men were fighting and fleeing for their tiny little lives – but the clamour of noises might as well have been the chirping of insects.

‘They run!’ a brother laughed. ‘Look at how they run!’

‘Why do they have to be so noisy about everything?’ a brother whined. ‘It’s irritating.’

‘I bet you I can shoot down three at once with one arrow,’ a white walker challenged, as one of its thralls raised a large bow of crystal ice. ‘Three mortals, one arrow.’

‘I’ll take that bet. They’re not standing in a straight line, you can’t.’

The bowstring creaked, tensed by inhuman strength. The arrow was pure crystal ice. ‘Just watch…’

Twang. The arrow snapped. It pierced straight through the skull of one man, and into the neck of the one in front. The Others laughed. ‘Oh! So close but so far away.’

‘Hold on, best two out of three…’

‘Quit your foolery,’ another Other chided. ‘We have our task.’

‘Eighty-seven,’ its brother counted, as the bodies fell faster and faster. ‘Eighty-eight, eighty-nine…’

The mortals were running down the frozen river valley, the water oozing across the ice like milk, but the white walkers already had their trap in place. They attacked from over the mountains; firing arrows from the cliffs, and assaulting the camp with wights and ice spiders, but they had already larger bodies marching up the river valley to cut off all escape.

Across the writhing ocean of fighting shapes, there was a sharp roar. The boom of a large creature writhing in the flurry of snow. ‘The giant!’ the white walker called eagerly. ‘The giant is mine!’

‘It still only counts as one, you know.’

‘Nuh uh, something that big should be at least ten.’

The white-furred giant howled in fury, but the thralls didn’t stop. The Other only needed to will it, and a tide of dead bodies surged against the beast.

A mortal tried to charge at the Others themselves from behind, swinging his axe in raw desperation. The Others hardly even bothered to react; one of their brothers just waved their hands and an ice spider intercepted the would-be attacker. The man dropped, but the white walker caught him before he hit the ground.

The Other held the man tightly in icy hands, cocking its head as the mortal screamed. ‘Look at this “one!” the Other laughed. ‘It has such a queer face – what are all those marks on its skin?’

‘Tattoos, I think they are called. The mortals paint themselves.’

Beneath it, the man’s flesh begun to blister from the cold of the Other’s grip. ‘Really?’ It frowned. ‘Why?’

‘There’s quite a lot of them like that here. Painted faces – perhaps different families?’ its brother noted. ‘I like to collect the thralls that look interesting.’

The white walker considered the words and then squeezed, dropping the pile of motleyed flesh into the snow. A brief thrust of thought, and another thrall was raised.

‘I prefer the animals myself. The men are so clumsy – the beasts and birds are better.’

‘Just watch for any with the Sight,’ its brother warned. ‘They use the bodies of beasts too. They are not worth the hassle.’

‘The Sight,’ one repeated. ‘If they have the Sight, then could we convert them instead?’

‘Perhaps. But only if they are young enough – only the fledglings, the children. The king does not like converting the adults, that causes too many problems.’

Yes, that had been the mistake of the old regime. The old king had converted hundreds, thousands, of mortals into ice, but sometimes that had brought queer ideas into their fold. They had created white walkers with leftover memories of being brief littered in their heads. There had been Others that had even… mingled. That had been their downfall – the last king had been prone to foolish mortal thoughts that had led the old reign to ruin.

‘See to your task, but just be mindful,’ responded a distant brother. ‘Capture the fledglings, perhaps, but if you find any adults with the Sight, end them and do not raise them after.’

It was more recently that they had started to only convert the fledglings. The children were converted, and they matured free from the taint of mortality. Blank slates, as the king called it. The king had begun to harvest from specific bloodlines, cultivating certain families, to form a better breed of Other. Fewer white walkers as well, but each one more powerful. The old reign had toppled, and their current king had taken the crown.

We are the master race. It was the fate of mortals to be thralls.

The white walkers stood and made idle chatter, as the battle of the mountains raged around them.

The white-furred giant finally fell, leaving a trail of crushed bodies behind it. The Other felt the spark of life extinguish in the giant’s body. The white walker reached out to seize its skin, but one of his brothers pushed ahead of him. The power of another walker surged through the corpse – stealing the thrall before it had a chance. ‘That body was mine!’ the Other wailed.

‘Too slow,’ its brother laughed, as the giant rose again with bright blue eyes. The dead giant surged with blue energy; the magic of the Others filled the vessel, moving its limbs as its own. ‘I am on two hundred now.’

‘This is not fair. You are stealing all the good bodies, leaving me with only the useless thralls.’

The tide of the battle was falling backwards, a stampede of bodies retreating down the Milkwater. ‘Should we start taking captives?’ a brother asked. ‘It would be nice to have some to breed.’
'Not quite yet. We need more thralls first. We’ll capture whatever is left alive at the end of the night, for now just end them.'

They kept on playing their counting game. After a long debate, they settled onto the rules; common mortals were only a single point, but the giants were worth five points and mammoths were worth ten. Any mortal that possessed the Sight was worth fifty. It was very doubtful there’d be one present, but if by happenstance they did see a child of the forest – then that would be worth two hundred points.

Even as they talked and laughed, their scores quickly started to reach thousands.

‘What of our target?’ it asked. ‘What is that one worth?’

‘A million. If you find it, that wins the game.’

‘But where is it?’ the Other asked, looking around its brothers. ‘Have we found any with the blood?’

All of these new thralls were useful, but they were truly on the hunt for their prize. It was here, somewhere, they knew it was – one of these mortals was important. Their king had given them their task, and they were all eager to see it done.

A thousand blue eyes scoured through the ramble of mortals. They were watching through every thrall. Frustratingly, they only had its likeness to search for; a young one, with dark hair and grey eyes.

‘I found it,’ a white walker said suddenly. ‘One of my spiders has found it.’

‘Are you sure? We’ve been mistaken before.’

‘I’m sure. The spider bit its leg, I can taste it. It has the right blood.’

Its brother shared a vision; of a dark-haired man in a sheepskin cloak trying to climb up a rocky cliff face, clutching onto the arm of a red-haired mortal. The spider had pressed its fangs into the man’s leg, and they could feel the power of its blood on their tongues. All of their thralls shifted direction at once.

‘Finally.’ Despite itself, there was a twinge of anticipation in its chest. The white walkers all set off, stepping gracefully across the frosted rocks. They had their target in their sights, and this time it could not get away.

It had been a long journey to get here. The king had ordered that they find the blood required, but it hadn’t been easy. They had gone south to search down specific members of an exclusive bloodline. They had not found enough traces of the blood in their own territories, and then they had no choice but to turn towards the watchers on the wall itself.

One of their mortal servants had helped point them towards their target. Firstly, the Others had set a trap, and they caught three helpless crows – three rangers scouting north. None of those had been suitable, but the white walkers had allowed one of them to escape. They let one run free, so it might run for help, so that the Others could then trap the search party that came next. They had needed to whittle the watchers down, and draw out their target.

The group that came next had been more promising. They had killed all but one; a single one that could have been suitable. And yet that mortal had irritatingly fled, eluding them and disappearing into the forest. The white walkers had searched, but had not been able to find it again. They suspected the tree-fiend’s involvement.

Thankfully, after a bit of poking, a much larger force had come north next – four hundred mortals wearing black, camping on the ruins of the Last Stand. The Others had readied to assault the party of sworn brothers in search of their target, but then they realised otherwise.

They realised that the mortal they were after wasn’t with the sworn brothers anymore – that one had joined the larger gathering of the natives. The white walkers had changed targets, focusing their attention on the great host of mortals camped in the mountains instead. The Others refused to let the blood slip away one more time.

And now finally, they had their target in their sights. ‘It is running,’ the Other reported.

‘Will it escape?’

‘No. It has venom in its blood, it grows weaker.’ There was a pause. ‘But we should take no chances.’

The brothers agreed. The ten white walkers split up – with four of them continuing to harry the fleeing wildlings, another three circling around to cut off the target’s escape, and the last three following it directly.

They gave chase, but they didn’t rush. Why bother? They would move slow and steady, they would surround it from all sides, and this time the mortal would not escape.

The king commands, we obey.

‘It is heading up the valley wall.’

‘Then herd it in the right direction. Push it north. We need it up onto the glacier.’

With a thought, their thralls took position. Undead corpses turned to block off all escape, all the while the two mortals were still trying to run and slip away. They forced the mortals to turn around; forced them to try to head back north and circle around. The Others were already one step ahead.

Through the snowstorm, the Others saw them. They felt their warmth, the heat of their bodies. The two figures were running and panting, stumbling with every step, and the three Others followed from a distance. The white walkers glided across the snow.

The female was useless, but they were drawn to the male. It – he – was limping, growing weaker and weaker with the ice venom in his blood.

It drew its sword eagerly. ‘Shall we?’

‘Not yet.’ Its brother shook its head. ‘Wait for it to collapse first, it doesn’t have long.’

They watched from a distance, following with slow, careful steps. The mortals had nowhere else to run, as the ice fell away into a cliff of sharp blades. They heard the female scream something, there was a brief scuffle. And then the two mortals embraced, their lips mushing together. The white walker cocked its head, watching curiously.

Then the male pushed the female off the cliff.

‘What curious creatures these mortals are,’ the Other mused. The white walkers looked at each other, and stepped forward.

The mortal had his sword in his hand, staggering to meet them with weak steps. The Others considered him like one would a queer insect beneath their foot.

It had dark hair that looked white with snow, grey desperate eyes, and gaunt cheekbones. Its lips were twisted, its jaw clenched, and its blade shaking in its hand. Young, scarcely more than a fledgling.

‘How queer. It wants to fight us.’

‘Is it the right one?’ the white walker asked, casually dodging a frenzied stroke.

‘I think so,’ it replied, blade in its hand. The mortal was screaming something – uneven, crude human words. ‘How can we be sure?’

‘Cut it open and see, I suppose,’ the Other said, as it idly swung its sword. The blow wasn’t even meant to hit, but the mortal nearly stumbled backwards. They waited for it to stand up again patiently, surrounding it. ‘We need its blood, yes?’

‘That is what we were told. Only certain blood can awaken the weapon.’

‘It’s not just the blood,’ another white walker called, pushing its thoughts across the mountain. ‘It’s the… the ceremony of it. Part of an old mortal ritual, the sacrifice that must be paid. Death and life.’

It inspected the man curiously. The venom was thick in its blood, draining its strength, but the man was still trying to fight. Its lunges were desperate and raw, but the white walkers glided smoothly around the frenzied attacks. ‘Are we ready?’

‘Yes. We are in position. Do it.’

The steel blade lashed out, yet the white walker dodged easily. ‘Aww… look! He’s trying to fight!’

‘Stop fooling around. Let’s just get this over with.’

‘But it’s funny!’ the Other protested, staring at the mortal with fascination. ‘Look at its face – is this ‘anger’? ‘Fear’? Are these the emotions that the king speaks about?’

‘Enough of this.’ The Other stepped forward, raising its sword. ‘Just end it alrea–’

The blade of ice swung downwards. It chimed.

The whole air froze. The mortal’s iron should have shattered, they expected the steel sword to break. But instead it was the blade of ice that rebounded. The white walker blinked in surprise.

And then the mortal’s blade lashed outwards. Straight through its brother’s chest.

The white walker shattered, breaking into a thousand shards of ice. Suddenly, its brother’s aura vanished, and across the mountainside a thousand corpses dropped still.

‘Cursed steel!’ the white walker cried. ‘It wields cursed steel.’

There was no grief for their fallen brother, only mild irritation. ‘Look at what you’ve done now,’ its remaining brother chided, pointing down to the broken remains. ‘We told you to stop fooling.’
‘How was I supposed to know the sword was cursed?’ the Other grumbled, suddenly taking the mortal much more seriously. ‘We have not seen cursed steel in eons.’

‘Just deal with it.’

The white walker obliged. With a flurry of speed, its blade plunged straight through the mortal’s chest, skewering straight through. Warm blood hissed, steam rising across the snow.

The mortal whispered some words, his eyes bulged, and then he fell backwards to the snow. There were tears in his eyes, salty water down his cheeks.

Red blood soaked into the snow, gushing from the wound.

The white walkers had no concept of ‘death’; they neither feared nor mourned it. Death was only an annoyance to them – much like the concept of life itself. And yet the king will be irritated that one of us has fallen.

‘It is bleeding on the ice. Start the ritual.’

The white walker raised its blade, to cut off the mortal’s head. ‘Do not,’ one of its brothers said suddenly. ‘Keep it warm, we may yet need it to bleed more.’

That caused it to grimace, but it complied. The white walker knelt down, gently moving its hand across the mortal’s chest. With a light brush of its fingers, the wound was instantly cauterised by frost, the skin turning pale. Its aura shimmered, fire against ice.

‘What delicate things these mortals are.’

The white walker exerted a touch of power, just to preserve the mortal on the edge over the abyss. It could not die, not yet.

‘Just like that? Is that what is needed?’

‘Take the cursed blade too. That has blood on it.’

It picked up the bloody sword gingerly, staring down at it in distaste. Even just being close to such a metal caused its icy skin to tingle – it could feel the aura of fire, blood and screaming clinging to the metal. The steel still carried the memories of burning torture. An evil weapon.

The white walkers jumped down off the edge of the glacier, easily gliding to the snow. It saw the red-haired girl, squirming out of the snow, still trying to crawl away. The mortal was screaming, tears freezing on its cheeks.

‘What shall we do with the other one – the female?’ another white walker asked as they walked. ‘It is still breathing.’

‘You said you wanted captives? She might have use.’

‘Bring whatever mortals you can capture,’ the white walker ordered, reaching out to all its brothers. ‘The weapon may not respond to our kind. Meet us in the tomb.’

They moved quickly. It wasn’t far; they had ensured the mortal had been in running in the right direction. There were caves under the glacier, old tunnels buried and forgotten.

There was a tingle in the air, a ripple of power. They had already spilled enough blood to fill a lake, and the old powers were responding.
Magic was death – magic was sourced from the energy leftover when mortals died, from the spark of power as they burnt out. If you killed enough of them, you could achieve wonders. Just as our creators did.

Behind them, ranks of thralls were marching, as they dragged screaming and wailing mortals into the caves.

‘Is it working?’ the Other asked.

‘I think it is,’ another said slowly, placing its hand on the ice. ‘Can you feel it in the air? The blood pours, and the weapon responds.’

They could feel it. There was a shimmer of power, a rustle in the ice. Old, old magicks – coming to life once more.

They saw the tunnels; their thralls were already in position. The white walker noticed the marks across the jagged ice flows, the ruins of old campfires and the littering of crude pickaxes. Once, these caves had been completely collapsed, but recently the natives had evacuated them.

The wildlings had been searching for the weapon too. Once, there had been a city built here – an ancient city of giants that was now left buried beneath ice and earth. The wildlings had tried to dig the ruins up, to search through the ancient tombs, but the Others had noticed too.

The mortals didn’t share their memories. The wildlings had been working using only folklore and hearsay, but their king had been there when it was buried.

The white walkers stepped through the great caves, into a cavern of ice and white stone. Wind echoed through the tunnels, screeching through winding passageways of ice. There was no light, no fire, but the white walkers needed none. They walked lower and lower, deeper through twisted frozen buildings collapsed under the ice. This had once been a tomb for ancient giants; but the foundations had sunk, the stone pillars collapsed and frozen.

They walked beneath a great stone archway, large enough for a mammoth. There were faded runes etched on the stone that were lost to time and frost.

They saw signs of the mortals’ search. All of the crypts had already been broken open and ransacked, but the wildlings hadn’t searched deep enough.

Great spiders scuttled across the tunnel walls, mandibles clicking as they searched through the ruins. With spindly legs and threads of frozen ice, the spiders pulled against a collapsed wall. The rubble cracked open in a cloud of dust, and the white walkers stepped through.

They could hear the humming, the vibrations through the ice. It was working – the weapon was awakening.

‘Be ready,’ the Other ordered. There were nine brothers – four of them armed with spears of ice, the rest readied and aimed huge greatbows. They used weapons of ice, forged the same way as their swords and armour. They had sung and twisted the ice into form.

They could feel it – the power in the air was old as the children themselves. The white walkers could see the magic in the air. Like all of the old magicks of its time, the weapon had been bound with blood. Blood was what controlled it, blood was what forged it. Blood was the lock and the key.

They stepped deeper into the ancient tomb, and they saw it. They saw the horn lying on its
It was a great white horn carved of ancient, petrified wood that was as smooth as bone. It was twelve feet long and wider than a man, with old runes etched along the rim, barely noticeable. It was bounded in dull iron, but showed no wear.

Completely smooth, completely untouched by time. The weapon that reshaped the world.

The Horn of Winter. The horn first crafted by the Builder. The Icebinder.

‘So this is it,’ the white walker whispered, running its cold fingers across the white wood. ‘This was the weapon that turned the war against us.’

‘The mortals rallied behind their magic and attempted resistance,’ it said distastefully. ‘But it was not the weapon that won. It was the old king’s folly that ended the night.’

‘Mortals could never beat us,’ its brother agreed. Their liege had told them so many times. ‘But they made their deal and forced us into their pact.’

The old king had been plagued by human thoughts. Plagued by fear, compassion and weakness. The Others could have won, but then the old king chose not to fight. Instead, the white walkers had been duped. It was a foul thought, a mistake they made long ago. It left a bitter taste in the white walker’s mouth – but it was a mistake that their new king sought to correct now.

The white walker held the cursed sword carefully, its edge still slick with the mortal’s blood. The pommel was carved into a wolf. Gingerly, the Other stepped forward and extended the metal, letting blood drip down onto the horn. Red splattered against white.

The room shuddered. They felt the ice crack.

Only the blood of the Winter Kings could activate it.

‘We have it,’ the Other whispered eagerly. ‘It is responding. This is what awakens them.’

‘And the beast?’

‘Buried above us.’ The Other stared upwards at the hundreds of years old mass of ice. ‘I can feel it stirring too. Is it enough?’

‘Not quite. We must awaken it fully.’

‘Then bring the prisoners through.’

The room was shuddering, every thrall stood alert. They were abandoning the fight against the natives – the battle was useless to them now. Instead, their thralls were shifting direction, and gathering across the glacier. They felt the ice above straining. ‘Should it not have awakened by now?’

‘Tis a horn. It must be blown.’

Their prisoners were being marched through, screaming as the ceiling rumbled. Men and women in dirty rags, screaming and sobbing against the dead bodies that held them. The white walker pointed at one man, and the thrall dropped him before the horn.

The mortal was wearing a black cloak. ‘That one first.’ it decided. ‘It’s a sworn watcher – we found it creeping over the rocks. The horn may or not require the black oaths, I’m not sure.’
The mortal was mumbling. Praying, it noted. ‘I do not speak their filthy language,’ one of the Others said distastefully.

‘I do,’ it offered. ‘I find their tongue… curious.’

There was a sound like a scoff, but the Other let it pass. Its brothers thought that curiosity concerning the mortals was queer, it knew. The white walker looked downwards and cocked its head. There was a long pause, struggling to push the cumbersome words out of its throat.

“Blow the horn,” the Other said, the words a croak. “Blow it and go free.”

The mortal was incoherent; frantic mumbled words it could not make sense of. Around it, its brothers were preparing weapons. ‘Ready the spears!’ they ordered.

“Blow the horn,” the white walker repeated, easily hoisting the man upwards with a single hand. The mortal screamed in pain from its grip. “Blow it.”

The Other had to force the mortal’s lips onto the mouthpiece. “Blow it. Go free.”

It was weeping, but it complied. As soon as the sobbing man breathed into the great horn, a thunderous cry echoed from beneath the ground.

It was a wail like the echo of a thousand souls, so loud that the earth itself shivered.

The horn that wakes the sleepers. That was the line in the oath the watchers themselves took, but they had all but forgotten what it meant.

The hornblower died quickly, with his body frozen solid from the the inside out. The man was gasping and sputtering; white veins snaking across his skin, his lips frozen to pale blue. The price that Icebinder required. The white walker let the body drop. “As promised,’ it said quietly. “You are free.”

At once, the white walkers were running. The air was alive with power, the horn was shaking.

The Horn of Winter. The ice dragon horn.

Eons ago, the ancient ice dragons had been used to build the Wall. The great beasts had been bound by the horn, used as weapons in the Long Night. The Others had hunted and controlled the dragons once, and then with the Horn of Winter they had been commanded by the mortals.

The old king grew scared, tricked into believing the mortal’s power was greater than it was. After the ceasefire, they built the wall to keep the two forces separate – the Others had allowed the barrier to be forged. The fool of the king had even surrendered the horn so that the wall could be raised.

And afterwards, the ice dragons could neither be allowed to live nor die. That was one of the terms of the peace. If they lived, the mortals would have used them, and if they died they would have belonged to the Others. Instead, the Horn of Winter was used to bind them – to put them into an endless sleep, to turn their skin to stone. The creatures had been bound and then buried, but they were not dead so they could not be raised as thralls.

The Horn of Winter remained as the last safeguard to protect the foolish pact.

The weapon had a history to it. At first, the horn had been built for the Winter Kings, and then it was entrusted to the care of the Night’s Watch, but later the king Joramun stole it on behalf of the wildlings. It became the Horn of Joramun for a time; the weapon that kept the balance between north and south.

For a long time, the Others had believed the horn was in the possession of the last children of the forest, and the line of greenseers and tree-fiends that maintained the balance. They thought it hidden for a long time, beyond their reach.

But then, four hundred years ago, the horn had been unearthed once more – to bind yet another dragon. Afterwards they had buried the horn again, but then the wildlings and the white walkers tracked it down.

Finally, they had everything they needed; the horn, the blood, the sacrifice and the beast.

It was working. The dragon was stirring; the beast writhing against the prison of ice. It was pushing upwards. The Others could feel it, could feel the tide of magic erupting…

Boulders of ice were flying. They heard the roar – and then the blast of white icefire scorched through the earth.

This time, their king had promised, this time the dragons would be chained by the dead.

‘Slay it!’ the white walkers shouted. ‘Slay it and raise it anew!’

‘Let us play a new game!’ the Other laughed. ‘A thousand points to the one that seizes it!’

Thralls and spiders were pushing forward, ice crunching with a tremendous noise. The whole earth was bulging – the beast was trying to force its way free from the entire glacier of ice.

The white walkers stood ready with great spears, ready to finish the beast as soon as it emerged.

The image of the mortal flickered through its gaze – the mortal with king’s blood was still preserved on the edge of death in a pool of red snow. Its hair had turned white from the white walker’s power. ‘We are done with its blood,’ the white walker ordered. ‘Finish that one for good.’

At its command, thralls pushed over the snow, frozen blades ready. There was no rush; the mortal was still – not quite dead but not quite alive. The dragon was the Other’s priority.

The ice cracked, a surge of dragonfire exploded through the tunnels. The beast was alive again, thrashing with almighty fury.

A hundred thralls were disintegrated in a second, and the beast was still breaking through. They saw its snout – great white teeth snapping, horns crashing through the ice. Frozen greatbows took aim.

‘Finish it!’ the Other hissed. ‘Finish–’

Around them, they felt the wind whirl, they felt the power on the air. There was another aura – a foul, perverse aura that felt like rot and mould. It was in the air, possessing the storm and wind.

The world hissed, the weather itself fighting back against the white walker’s control.

‘It is the death-stealer!’ they cursed. ‘The greenseer, do not let it–’

It was too late. A fierce wind hissed across the ice, scattering their own forces. It was all around them, protecting the dragon. The tree-fiend was interfering, and the Others were hissing.
The age of the greenseers was over, but the last remaining one still had a few teeth left.

Their thralls were being cut down. The Other saw a vision of a black-cloaked figure pushing through the bodies, ravens cawing in the snow. It was going for the unconscious mortal, trying to carry him away. The cloaked figure wasn’t mortal, it was another remnant. A leftover that had no place in the new world.

Bodies were stampeding. The white walker saw an elk possessed by the greenseer, storming through the thralls. It was trying to run; a dead man carrying the half-dead man. The ground was rumbling…

What is the tree-fiend doing? What is he trying to achieve–

Crack. The ice snapped, and suddenly an immense body was storming upwards.

Arrows of ice loosed, and the beast roared, but it was still rising. They felt the whoosh of wind, great limbs extending outwards.

For a moment, the Other was left stunned by the sight.

‘It has wings!’ the Other laughed. ‘Is it supposed to have wings?’

‘Bring it low, bring it low!’

Fighting on the glacier. There were servants of the tree-fiend, pushing through their thralls. The greenseer was in the storm, trying to shield the dragon. Great arrows of ice fired like spears, so sharp they cleaved through scales, but it wasn’t falling. It thrashed and screamed, but it didn’t collapse.

The dragon pulled back its head, and suddenly the white walkers had to run for cover as white light scoured across the ice.

The remnant was still running onwards. The dragon roared, huge wings pounding and struggling to fly after four centuries of being buried.

Thralls were charging. The greenseer was all around them; wrestling against the Other’s powers, trying to control the dragon. The beast could not be restrained.

The white walker was on its feet, a frozen spear in hand. It ran, and it threw the spear so fast it was blinding. The Other missed the skull, but the dragon howled as the spear pierced straight through its huge wing. There was no time for a second throw, as the dragonfire scoured the snow in a furious blaze. Blades of ice stabbed through the air.

The beast’s snout dropped, growling and tensing. It was glaring down at the black-cloaked figure with pure fury. Across its horns, crows were flapping.

“Save him!” the black-cloaked revenant was shouting, hoisting the man over his shoulder. “It was his blood, you have to save him!”

The dragon boomed. Its tail whipped so fiercely a hail of ice scattered across the cliffs. The air thundered.

The bleeding man. The white walker didn’t have a thrall near enough to see exactly what happened, but it saw the dragon grab the mortal in its claws.
The Others were rushing, but the dragon was already flying away. With great whooshes of wind, the beast rushed into the sky.

Blue eyes watched it fly.

‘It has wings!’ the white walker laughed. ‘I did not know that the old beasts had wings.’

‘That one does. It is a relic of fire, a beast of a later generation,’ another said, shaking its head. ‘But it was too powerful. It was supposed to be weak after its slumber.’

‘I blame the death-stealer. That one has been a nuisance for far too long.’

The remnant was fleeing too, galloping away on a large stag. Their thralls tried to follow, but the greenseer was shielding its retreat. As quickly as it came, the power of the tree-fiend disappeared.

The Others gathered slowly, staring out over the devastated field of ice with their arms folded.

‘It must have been waiting, ready to interrupt us,’ the Other said foully. ‘What is the tree-fiend planning?’

There was a moment of quiet consideration. ‘It stole the mortal,’ it said finally. ‘Could it be trying to steal the horn back as well? It wants to use the weapon itself.’

‘Possibly.’ The white walker paused, and then made a decision. ‘We cannot allow that to happen.’

‘We cannot,’ another agreed, and it drew its sword.

The Other flicked its wrist, pushing orders to the thralls. It took four thralls to carry the Horn of Winter out of the caves, even as the tunnels were collapsing behind them. The beast had left a great jagged crevice through the ice from where it had dragged its way up, sending avalanches tumbling across the mountainside.

Above them, the northern lights glimmered in the night’s sky.

‘We are done with the horn, are we not?’ it asked, as it walked back towards the horn.

‘We are. The binding has already been undone.’

It raised the icy blade. ‘Then it is too dangerous to risk the mortals using this again.’

With a smooth slash of its sword, the Horn of Winter was cleaved into two. The white wood crackled and sparked, but the Other did not stop hacking until it was broken into jagged splinters. It felt like the aura of the horn was screaming as it snapped, all of those ancient enchantments coming undone under the frenzied strikes.

With a dismissive kick, it swept the wreckage of the horn away. It paused to pick up a single shard of the weapon, a single broken rune, before turning away.

‘Take the pieces,’ the Other ordered to its thralls, ‘and bury them in the deepest hole. Let none ever find them again.’

The thralls obeyed. ‘What of this cursed sword?’ it asked, motioning to the blade that the mortal had carried.

‘Bury that as well. Shatter it, if you can. Such magic has no place in the new age.’ The Other paused to stare between its brothers, and the devastation that littered the glacier. There were thousands of captives after the battle of the Frostfangs, and even more dead bodies. ‘Our age.’

‘Tonight was a failure,’ another said foully. ‘We lost one of us, and our king will be upset that the beast got away.’

Yes, that was disturbing. Their king’s fury was something to behold. Their liege was coming south from the Eternal City, and the brothers had been given their task in this war. They had been charged with clearing the way before the king arrived, yet problems were stacking up.

‘It is a minor setback, naught more,’ the Other decided after a pause. ‘You four, chase after the flying beast. Hunt it, bring it low, and raise it again.’

‘Very well, we will see it so.’

‘Do not allow the tree-fiend to interrupt again,’ it said darkly, turning between them. ‘No more mistakes, do you understand?’

They paused, but then nodded. ‘And what of your task?’

‘We must dig. Dig deep.’ The Others turned to stare out across the jagged mountains, the broken shard of the weapon still in its grip. ‘Gather your thralls, we will need them all. That one was the closest to the surface – it was buried hundreds of years ago, but the others were buried millennia ago.’

‘The originals sleep too, and the binding is undone. The rest must be awakened as well, before they can die.’

Now...

Ramsay

He saw them. He saw their shapes in the visions that the white walkers shared. He could feel them in the rumble of the ground. They were huge, so large that the earth itself quaked with their roar.

In his mind’s eye, Ramsay saw immense serpentine bodies coiling, he saw great beasts clawing through the earth. He saw huge creatures of rotten flesh and scales, as large as castles, with blue fire burning in their throats and ice clinging to their skin. He saw dragons.

If Ramsay had any breath, it would have frozen in his lungs.

These were the creatures that built the Wall, the Other had said. It had taken the breath of ice dragons to raise the Wall. Once, perhaps they could have been magnificent creatures, but now they were mutilated, half-rotten, undead gargantuans.

Wyrms. Ice wyrms.

Ramsay remembered all the tales that he had once been told. Ever since the news of the wildling dragon arrived, Ramsay had even researched dragons and the old lore. Ramsay knew of the tales of ice dragons haunting Cannibal’s Bay, of the ancient sea serpents of the west, of the giant bones of Nagga that stood on Old Wyk.

He thought of the great fire wyrms of Valyria that had lived in the Fourteen Flames, from which the dragonlords had first learnt their magic.

He knew that such beasts had existed, but the world had thought them long extinct. No, Ramsay thought with quiet horror, they were extinct – the Others had found their corpses.

The Others had dug up their bodies and raised them again. They were giant wights – great beasts powered by the white walker’s touch. Their bodies were missing chunks of flesh, with scales hanging off and bare ribs showing through flesh. Ramsay saw blue fire burning inside their bodies, unnatural light blazing from underneath rotten scales.

There were cold flames running through their whole bodies, enough power to make the world tingle.

Boom. He felt the tremble as one of the wyrms breathed. It was the biggest one, as huge as the world serpent pushing against the Wall. They breathed blue fire – breath ice cold and as foul as rot. A blue-tinged dragonfire that cleaved through the ice and earth. Every time it breathed, the earth shuddered.

Five of them, Ramsay thought numbly. There were five of them – one for each white walker.

The wyrms had no wings, but they were large. Larger than Sonagon, perhaps, but it was hard to tell. There was no sense of scale, only flashing visions and feelings. They coiled and moved like snakes, with long and muscular bodies and huge powerful tails that rose into fins. They had tiny, stubby little legs, and gaping mouths filled with more teeth than Ramsay had ever known.

Their scales might have once been white, but now they seemed a grimy grey.

Their backs were covered in spines – crests of yellow and black running down to their tails. Some of them had half a dozen horns jutting backwards from their heads, and others were hornless. When they moved, it was with earth and frost grinding across their scales, slithering and squirming.

_They are all different sizes_, Ramsay realised. The smallest wyrm felt around forty feet long, but the largest seemed over four times its size. He could feel them churning backwards and forth, grinding against the Wall. Carving their way through with their breath.

How old must something be to reach that size? Before it died, it must have been hundreds of years old.

The wyrms were burrowing, pushing under the ground, using their powerful tails and their ice breath to force themselves forward. They couldn’t even be seen from the surface; each swoosh of huge tails threw up immense billows of snow, and the tremors rumbled all up the Wall.

There were undead leviathans. They were on the other side of the barrier, but Ramsay could feel them through Malvern’s thoughts.

Malvern seemed entranced. Ramsay could feel the Other’s gaze fixated on the beasts, its mind swimming with images of them.

The Other watched them and laughed. ‘It was before my time,’ the white walker said through giggles of laughter, ‘but the king told us of the old days – back when the great beings used to roam. Back in the first days of our birth, in the Age of Giants.’

Beasts that once roamed thousands of years ago – during the time of the First Men. Maybe the ice wyrms had gone extinct during the Long Night.
Ramsay could only stare.

Suddenly, Ramsay understood the Others endgame. They were attacking the Wall from all sides; from the north and south, from above and below. The wights were needed to subjugate the Watch, but then they had larger creatures to break the Wall itself.

_The Others intend for the wyrms to undercut the Wall’s foundations_, he thought, stunned. _They are truly planning on collapsing it and walking through._

One of the wyrms shifted, and Ramsay felt the earth tremble. The Wall was rumbling, with shards of ice as large as boulders scattering to the ground. The Wall was a two-hundred-foot-thick block, a mountain of ice but Ramsay could still feel it shaking.

‘Quickly, thralls,’ Malvern ordered eagerly. ‘My brothers are going to break through, but I want to beat them to it. I want to open the gate first.’

The white walkers weren’t even bothering to attack the tunnel. Instead, they intended to carve a new one straight through the ice.

All around him, legions of wights were storming against Castle Black. It was very early morn; the first glimmers of dawn rising through the clouds. Even as the sun rose, the swirling snows left everything grey. Rotten bodies coated in hoarfrost pushed through.

Sounds of battle surrounded him. The Night’s Watch was still trying to cling on to the castle; there were crude barricades of tables, beds and doors blocking the road, with spears sticking out of the snowdrifts. Ramsay saw men still holding the line, dug into trenches in the snow.

But the men had been fighting for an entire night. The living were exhausted, but the dead didn’t know the meaning of the word.

_They’re going to win_, Ramsay realised. The Others had this in the bag. Perhaps they always had.

Ramsay could see the red and green barrier glowing over the Wall, and it was flickering. Weakening with every rumble of the ground and with every sworn brother that fell.

_How long will it take for the wyrms to break through? How long do the defenders have?_

With a jolt, Ramsay realised that he was rooting for the Night’s Watch. He didn’t care for the Bastard King’s army, but if Malvern _won_… Ramsay would be a thrall for all eternity. _Cannot let that happen, cannot let them control me._

Malvern pulled back its soldiers slightly, allowing more and more wights to gather for the second wave. A thousand undead bodies shuffled through the drifts, while the winds were so fierce that the snow was near horizontal. Hail and snow lashed against his skin, splattering against blue eyes. A flurry of arrows shot downwards from the towers, but they were scattered in the wind.

The wights had already broken through one barricade, but the sworn brothers had held them back with another. There were trenches in the snow filled with bodies where the defensive lines had collapsed, only to be rebuilt a few yards back. The sworn brothers were losing ground – wights were slipping through, and they were struggling to hold their line across the road from the Tower of Guards.

_Castle Black was perhaps the only castle in the realm without outer walls. It was simply not defendable from the south._
Ramsay saw remnants of the Thenns among the defenders. The host on the kingsroad had scattered, but survivors had run for Castle Black. There were men that had been running and fighting for an entire day and night, still trying to cling on despite severe fatigue. Their eyes were dark and bloodshot against the wights’ blue.

This was a losing fight from the very beginning. The Others waged war the only way they knew how; with overwhelming strength, the utmost methodology, and absolutely no remorse. Ramsay could even have been impressed by the brutality, if he had not been so furious.

I am not a puppet, Ramsay resisted. I am not. Still, it was growing harder and harder to gather those same feelings – his emotions were being quenched by the ice. The longer he spent under the Other’s influence, the more Ramsay could feel himself withering away. Becoming a drone. The fire will die, the Other had said.

Behind him, he could see a haze of light creep over the world. Dawn was rising, and in the morning light Ramsay could see more and more chunks of ice raining down from the Wall. His legs kept on shuffling, completely removed from Ramsay’s control.

There was a cleaver in his hands. The wight raised it high and charged against Castle Black.

Torches were flickering, voices shouting. The sworn brothers were swinging burning torches, and throwing flaming debris from the towers. Even in the cold, the wights burnt into ash with barely a spark. In front of Ramsay, wight after wight fell against the barricades, but they never faltered. They just kept on coming.

I still have intestines dangling from my stomach, Ramsay noticed faintly. The frozen coils of flesh dragged behind him through the snow.

A sharp scream filled the air, followed by a thud. In the tremors, a sworn brother lost his footing on the Tower of Guards, and then he fell from the height of it. He bounced off the ramparts and landed on the snow banks with a painful crack – his back broken, his spine twisted, but somehow he was still alive.

The man was screaming nonsensically as Ramsay reached him, and brought the blade down.

Another sworn brother – a wildling – threw an axe at Ramsay’s face. The weapon sliced straight across the side of his skull and cleaved off Ramsay’s cheek and ear, but the wight hardly even noticed. Ramsay knew that half his face was hanging from his skull, but he couldn’t feel it. The cheekbones of his skull were showing, but there was no blood except congealed mucus – his flesh was frozen solid, and his fluids were a rotten gloop.

Ramsay’s hands lunged, and he threw his cleaver at the wildling. It jammed straight through the man’s neck.

My muscles remember, Ramsay thought. Even as a wight, his body knew how to hurl a blade. Not all of the wights moved the same way – some of the dead bodies were more capable than others. Some of them knew how to fight, others could only flail. Even if Malvern pulled their strings, there was something of the former person left in each wight.

Ramsay pulled the cleaver out and charged forward. Arrows and stones were dropping around him, but there was no fear. The defence felt like it was floundering – maybe they were running out of arrows, or maybe just running out of will.

Ramsay reached the barricades just as they broke. Malvern ordered a dozen undead horses, oxen, goats and cattle to charge straight through, and they splattered through the defences in a flurry of flailing hooves.

The Other had raised more creatures than just men. Malvern had scoured the forests and settlements for as many bodies as possible, resurrecting everything from horses to pigs to goats. Any living being that the white walker could catch. Ramsay could have gaped as he saw a chicken – a rotten chicken with bright blue eyes – struggling to flap its way through the snow drifts as it tried to peck and attack. A chicken was a near useless thrall for such a thing, but perhaps that was Malvern’s idea of a jape.

Next to Ramsay, wights were shambling in formation, blankly staring ahead. The wight next to him never had a weapon, so instead it was wielding a severed arm like a club. The arm was flailing too, fingers groping, even as it was being swung.

The solid line of wights pushed forward. Ramsay thought of ants – mindless drones following unspoken commands, soldiers serving the hive.

The sworn brothers fought like desperate men, but the wights were already pushing through.

The earth trembled with the wyrm’s writhing, and suddenly a great blanket of snow shook free from the Wall. Ramsay heard the screams as a dozen sworn brothers upon the keep were smothered by it.

A horn blasted, men shouting. The barricades had fallen, and sworn brothers were falling backwards to the castle. They had no walls to hide behind, instead the defence was broken and they had to try to hold each tower and courtyard separately. Ramsay saw men sealing up in the lower tunnels, trying to keep the dead out.

Above him, there was a solid line of bodies – a stampede – of men and women trying to flee up the stairs of the Wall. Every now and then, as the earth trembled and the snow avalanched, a scattering of refugees fell straight off the steps. The steps upwards were so jammed that no one could move up or down.

Whoever is in command is doing a poor job of it, Ramsay thought. The sworn brothers had only survived this long out of pure desperation, but now it was falling apart.

Castle Black was in a frenzy, but the wights pressed onwards. Dead men were scaling the towers, climbing up the stones themselves. Lines of wights were charging against the towers, forming human ladders of grasping bodies to hoist themselves up. Even as they toppled, the wights didn’t stop clawing.

“Retreat!” a man boomed. “Retreat to the keep!”

The dead were through to the courtyard, with Ramsay pushing on the front lines. The ones holding the battlements weren’t sworn brothers anymore; Ramsay saw women and children, old men and infirm warriors struggling to notch arrows or hold spears. Refugees armed with weapons, fighting as a last resort.

They were through the strongest of the fighting men, and now the wights had pierced into the refugees trying to hold the final line.

They were dropping like flies.

The earth quaked again, so fiercely that every man staggered. Ramsay heard the creaking of stone – the Lance, the tallest tower in the castle, was creeping and starting to lean dangerously, threatening to topple in the tremors.

Ramsay’s blade hacked into a free folk’s head so hard that the skull cracked like an egg. If he had been alive, Ramsay might have loved this fight. Malvern had drained all the joy out of battle.

Ramsay was still trying to resist, but it was growing a more and more futile effort. Malvern was everywhere, controlling everything.

Like a god. The white walkers were near gods.

“We surrender! We surrender!” a voice called suddenly, high-pitched shrieking through the clamour. “Lower your weapons, we surrender!”

Ramsay saw him. There was a figure, swinging a grey sheet like a flag. It was the fat one, squealing like a pig at the top of his lungs. Ramsay recognised the figure from his time with the Bastard King’s army – Samwell Tarly. The Lord Steward of Castle Black was standing on the upper level of the courtyard, shrieking at the top of his lungs.

“We surrender!” the fat boy screamed, tears running down his cheeks. “Drop your weapons and surrender!”

And just like that the very last slivers of defence broke apart. Sworn brothers were shouting, calling for orders, but Tarly just shouted the same word over and over again, louder than anything else. “We yield!” he squealed. “We yield! We yield!”

The dead poured through, hacking and slashing. They gave no quarter.

Castle Black was done. It felt like Malvern was giggling. If Ramsay had control of his throat, he would have screamed. The craven! The fucking fat craven!

Ramsay’s body was shambling up the steps, breaking through to the upper level of the courtyard. The gates to the tunnel were in sight. Four men wearing black cloaks tried to bar the stairs, but then they threw down their weapons and fled. “Yield!” the cry wailed. “Yield! Yield!”

It was not a battle anymore. It was a slaughter. A murder of crows.

The wight heard voices – the sound of men squabbling. Two men were arguing, shrieking at each other in hysteria. Ramsay saw the fat steward, standing next to a scrawny wildling with a white beard and a black cloak. Other sworn brothers were milling around, screaming objections or just breaking down into tears.

Suddenly, Ramsay felt Malvern’s presence inside him. The white walker was instantly interested, looking out through the wight’s blue eyes.

“I don’t want to do this, I don’t…” the skinny one cried, trying to squirm. He was trembling in his shadowskin cloak, and then his eyes widened in horror as he stared up at Ramsay. Wights marching up the steps. “Don’t let them…!”

“We have to… we have to surrender!” the fat one wept. “We surrender, surrender!”

The scrawny man tried to run away, but then the fat man grabbed his cloak and yanked him backwards. Tarly had to tackle the other sworn brother to the snow. The fat boy was weeping incoherently, even as he stopped the other man from fleeing.

The fear… they stunk of it. Scared like pigs before the butcher. All around the courtyard, Ramsay saw other sworn brothers raise their hands, and collapse in the snow.

“We surrender,” Tarly whimpered. “We surrender.”

Ramsay recognised them. They were the ‘leaders’ of Castle Black. The scrawny man that Tarly was sitting on was a wildling – ‘Varamyr Sixskins’ – and then Ramsay knew the Dragonguard Grenn, Eddison Tollett, Ser Wynton Stout, Ser Endrew Tarth, Henrik the Hog, and Duncan Liddle, plus a dozen more Ramsay could not recall.

They all had their hands in the air. They were all cravens. Is this the best that the Night’s Watch has to offer? Ramsay cursed. His father could have resisted better than this.

They were all begging, voices whimpering like pigs to be slaughtered. The wights were still staggering forward, raising their cleavers high. Ramsay’s legs surged, charging to attack.

“Please!” Tarly squealed. “We surrender, we surren–”

Ramsay’s arm raised, ready to bring the cleaver down…

‘Stop.’

Ramsay’s body froze like a statue. The white walker locked the wights’ limbs, and every body came to a sudden halt. Malvern was peering through Ramsay’s eyes, staring down at the Lord Steward on his knees. There was a cruel, vengeful emotion swirling through Malvern’s mind.

They paused. Lord Steward Tarly was three feet away, quivering as he stared up at Ramsay’s still body.

“We surrender,” Tarly pleaded through the sobs. “Just let the brothers live – we will help you cross the Wall. You could use us, we could help you… We surrender, take us prisoner, just let us live…”

For a long heartbeat, the only sound was the flurry of the snow and the rumble of the earth.

Malvern paused, considering it. ‘Kill everyone not wearing a black cloak.’

Ramsay didn’t move, but around him the other wights did. Half the wights were fixed in position in the courtyard, but the rest were surging forward, moving ahead through the keep. Dead bodies were slamming through the doors – crashing into the wormwalks where all the refugees were hiding.

“I said we surrender, we surrender!” Tarly was screaming. “You don’t have to, don’t have to…!”

The screams of women and children filled the air. The fat boy looked crazed, and all around him they heard the hacking of blunt blades.

A few of the sworn brothers tried to grab blades, but the Lord Steward still stopped them. “NOO!” the craven howled. “Don’t resist, don’t resist!”

Men were hissing insults, spitting curses at the Lord Steward that Ramsay couldn’t even decipher. The scrawny man beneath Tarly was sobbing. “You’re going to kill us all,” Varamyr hissed. “You’ve killed us all!”

They heard a newborn baby’s wailing, as a wight picked it up by the leg and swung the babe against a wall. The wights had no mercy.

True to Malvern’s word, they spared every sworn brother who surrendered.
Tarly broke down into tears, but he didn’t resist.

All around him, the wights hacked through women and children, but the fat one was still saying those words. “We surrender… We surrender…” he sobbed into the snow.

Ramsay was still poised with blade in the air, snow swirling around him. There was no emotion on Ramsay’s frostbitten face, but on the inside he was screaming. The craven, Ramsay cursed. The fucking pathetic craven.

“Open the gate,” the words suddenly came from Ramsay’s throat, a guttural sound. Ramsay had no control over them. Tarly stared up at the wight with shock. “Surrender. Open the gate.”

The Lord Steward gaped, gulped, and then nodded. “Open the gate,” he repeated, and then turned to the other brothers behind him. “Open the gate now! Do it!”

“Sam –” a man – Dolorous Edd, Ramsay recalled – tried to protest.

“Just do it!” Tarly shrieked. “We surrender, open the gate!”

Bodies hesitated, but they ran towards the gatehouse. Ramsay heard the sounds of shuffling, and then the groan of a heavy winch.

All around him, the fighting was dying. Castle Black was falling silent as the grave.

The gate creaked open, and the long and dark tunnel opened. Icicles were scattering off the roof, but the tunnel was pitch black. There were desperate men trying to hide and barricade themselves in the tunnel. Ramsay heard that same infuriating word, over and over – “Surrender,” they said. “Surrender.”

Slowly, the men dropped their weapons to the ground.

The wights stepped forward, grabbing the spears off the sworn brothers and forcing them into the wall with their own weapons. Nobody resisted; the men were either weeping, or they bore dead, haunted expressions.

It is over, Ramsay thought numbly. The Night’s Watch had lost. Castle Black was Malvern’s, the Wall was in disarray, and the tunnel was clear. Ramsay could feel Malvern’s eagerness; the white walker had just won its bet.

Perhaps the Bastard King’s relief force would still reach Castle Black in time, but that hope was fading faster and faster.

‘Search them,’ Malvern ordered suddenly. ‘Restrain them. Ensure compliance.’

Ramsay’s body lurched, stepping forward and dragging the fat boy backwards with a single hand. Tarly sagged under his frozen grip, and then Ramsay’s body bent over. The wight’s hands roughly groped, searching through the fat boy’s cloak for weapons. He had none.

“We’ll help you,” Sam repeated, his voice a fearful murmur. He was looking straight up at Ramsay. “We’ll help you, just don’t kill us.”

Behind Ramsay’s eyes, the white walker seemed amused by the very suggestion.

He felt the ripple in the air as the Other stepped closer. The wights were walking through the castle, and nobody resisted them. There were hundreds – thousands – marching from the kingsroad.
The white walker itself walked at the very rear, limping over the snow but barely leaving a footprint. The Other raised its hands and held them out, and Ramsay felt its aura flex. He felt the power ooze out of it, he felt its eye spark.

One by one, the dead bodies started to rise again.

There was movement through the keep. Mutilated corpses were standing up once more. Suddenly, bright blue eyes were glaring down from every rampart and window. The eyes of the dead were open – looking down at the courtyard from the towers and battlements.

The fat craven whimpered.

Malvern was walking closer. Its gaze was focused on Tarly too. Malvern had his sword in its hand, and the Lord Steward was on his hands and knees, face first in the snow. Bowing, praying.

The white walker wanted revenge, Ramsay realised. Memories flickered by him – the memory of walking through the Wall and being set on fire. Malvern remembered the fat boy; he wanted to hurt him for that.

From the Other, there was nothing but waves of satisfaction as more and more wights rose. Thousands of them, all of the fallen defenders and refugees. Too many to beat.

Death stood before the sworn brother, and the Lord Steward was on his knees. The wights stood in formation, pushing the other brothers back. Malvern slowly circled his sword, dragging out every moment.

“Look,” the Other said suddenly, staring down at Tarly. The craven only whimpered. “Look at me.”

Tarly didn’t move, and then the Other nodded. Suddenly, Ramsay’s body lurched – his boot slamming into the fat boy’s stomach at the white walker’s command. Tarly squealed, rolling in pain.

Finally, he looked up. The craven was crawling backwards, and the white walker took a step forward. It felt like Malvern was grinning, even despite the burns across half its body.

“I know you,” Malvern mocked, walking closer. It raised its blade. “Scared.”

The fat boy wiped the snot from his nose, and then nodded. “Yes,” Tarly agreed. “Terrified.”

Then, without warning, the fat boy kicked out to stamp on the skinny man’s foot. He kicked so hard that Ramsay heard the ankle crack, but Varamyr didn’t flinch.

From up above, they heard the cry of an eagle.

Malvern frowned, and then turned to look upwards.

They saw the shadows only for half a heartbeat. Suddenly, three shapes were tumbling down from atop the Wall. Catapults? Ramsay thought with brief confusion.

They saw it fall.

And then crash. Wood shattered. The three barrels hit the courtyard together, and exploded in a hail of splinters.

Without warning, the Other exploded. Ramsay heard it screaming as black rubble cleaved through its body.

The blue in Ramsay’s eyes disappeared. The wight sagged.

All at once, every corpse dropped to the ground.

There was a brief howl of agony – a scream of pure pain, like fire itself piercing through tender flesh – and then Malvern shattered into a thousand shards of ice. A brief scream of inhuman agony, like burning to death a hundred times over in a single instant…

Everything went black.

There was shock, no feeling, only numbness. It was there one instant, and gone the next. The white walker shattered, and suddenly the ice that kept Ramsay anchored in place slipped away.

It’s dead, he thought numbly. Malvern is dead.

The world faded, Ramsay’s soul slipping away.

The river of death thawed, and the current took hold of him again.

He felt himself sag, threatening to fall back into the void. The ice had been holding Ramsay into his dead flesh, but suddenly it all evaporated and Ramsay felt himself draining away. Like piercing a hole in a bucket. It was all spilling out…

NO! NOT AGAIN! I CANNOT DIE AGAIN!

Ramsay grabbed a hold of his broken husk of flesh with everything he had. He thought of his family, his father, his mother… he thought of the rage, the anger, the hate. He clung on and he screamed with everything he had…

The world shattered, and flooded away – but Ramsay was holding on. His life, his body, his memories were an anchor and he couldn’t let go…

It was his hate. That was the only strength he had.

The corpse’s eyes opened. The world felt hushed and still.

He was lying in the snow, unbreathing. He couldn’t feel a thing, but he was aware. He was staring at the scene – but the blue light from behind his eyes had vanished. I am free.

It took everything he had – every fibre of his being, every ounce of hatred – just to make his arms twitch. It was difficult – so, so difficult – but Malvern wasn’t blocking him anymore. Ramsay forced his own dead flesh to move by himself.

His head lurched, mouth sagging open. Frozen eyeballs ground against their sockets. It was hard to focus without feeling. Hoarfrost covered his gaze, smearing everything. Unblinking eyes rolled, but slowly Ramsay managed to focus on the patch of frozen ground where the white walker fell.
Malvern had shattered without a trace.

All around him, the snow was littered in black shards of glass. Dragonglass, Ramsay realised. It was dragonglass. The splinters littered everywhere – even stabbing into Ramsay’s own skin. A splinter of glass about two inches thick was stabbing into his chest, and another into his arm. He couldn’t feel them, but they were there.

They had fired three barrels down from the Wall. Three barrels filled with dragonglass.

The barrels had landed straight into the courtyard; one barrel bounced off the gatehouse, another crashed through the keep, and the third broke off the steps. The barrels exploded on impact and rained rubble everywhere – not even a white walker could dodge.

It had been a trap, he thought. They had waited for Malvern to get close. The sworn brothers had surrendered – luring the white walker itself into the courtyard so they could kill it.

All around him, there was screaming. The sworn brothers had been in the courtyard too, they had been in range as the barrels shattered. There were men howling with pain with splinters of wood, rubble and obsidian sticking through their bodies. The tiny shards of glass went everywhere.

The keep was devastated. Ramsay saw corpses – all of those wights were still there, but they weren’t moving. The blue eyes had vanished. Where once they had moved with purpose and direction, now they were just... there.

Many of them slumped to the ground, a few of them were just milling around, one or two were walking aimlessly. The wights were puppets, but all their strings had been cut.

Bits and pieces of the person they used to be still remained. The wights were left as fragmented, hollow bodies.

Ramsay heard the sound of a man hurl, vomiting blood and bile on the snow. The fat boy – Samwell Tarly – he was still alive, but with a shard of glass in his side, and a cut across his brow where a chunk of rubble bounced off his head. Tarly had been huddled into a ball on the ground, but he was still lucky to survive.

Others weren’t so lucky. A few feet away from him, the scrawny man – Varamyr – had died with a wooden splinter jammed through his skull.

They had been standing in the scatter range too, Ramsay thought slowly. They had been bait. The catapults fired straight at them. The sworn brothers must have known that they weren’t like to survive.

Even despite the noise, everything felt hushed. Ramsay swayed, and then toppled backwards. He felt like a babe to trying to walk for the first time.

Across the Wall, the earth quaked. Without Malvern, Ramsay couldn’t sense the wyrms any more, but he knew they were still there.

Move, Ramsay willed. I must move. I can’t lie here.

The fat boy – Tarly. He was clutched over the snow, staring at the corpses surrounding him. The disintegrated pieces of the Other lay before him. Slowly, Tarly reached outwards, gingerly reaching for Malvern’s white sword that lay on the snow. Tarly yelped in pain as soon as he touched the ice-cold hilt.
Ramsay focused himself, and then dragged himself forward. Dead arms lurched, dragging the wight forward.

The fat boy screamed like a little girl as the wight suddenly grabbed his leg. Tarly’s eyes widen in horror – staring at Ramsay’s mutilated, frost-coated face. “How…?” Tarly gasped in fear. He tried to run, but Ramsay yanked him down. “Help! Don’t –!”

The wight grit its teeth. “Stop,” the wight croaked. Its voice was hoarse and throaty, the word barely decipherable. It was so hard to even force the air out of his dead throat. “Stop them.”

Tarly’s eyes widened, and Ramsay pushed the fat boy backwards with an oomph. Ramsay’s body was numb, but his arms were strong.

Ramsay knew what he needed to do. “They have the Horn of Joramun,” Ramsay croaked. “They have dragons – ice wyrms. Five of them.”

Tarly’s jaw dropped open. Ramsay wanted to slap him.

“The Others are using them, burrowing through the foundations. Undercutting it,” Ramsay pressed onwards. “You feel it, the tremors – that’s them. They mean to collapse the Wall. Stop them. Break them.”

The fat boy’s mouth trembled. “Wait…” he gasped. “You’re helping us?”

Ramsay could have screamed. Any other day, any other time, Ramsay would have cheerfully gutted the pig himself, but today it seemed like they were on the same side. Today, he needed all the help he could get to stop them.

It turned out that Ramsay hated the Others even more than he hated the Bastard King. He didn’t think such a thing was possible, but it was that hate that kept his limbs moving. “Stop them,” Ramsay hissed. “Break the wyrms. Hold the Wall. Kill the white walkers and their army falls.”

Tarly didn’t reply, his mouth was flapping. Ramsay groaned, but staggered upwards. His body was swaying, his balance gone, but he had to move.

All around him, most of the unchained wights had collapsed – though there were some few that were still moving. They didn’t have blue eyes anymore, yet they were still wights.

Ramsay was already running. The remaining brothers were stirring, and Ramsay didn’t want to explain himself. He grabbed a black cloak from a sworn brother, wrapping it tightly around himself to hide his dead features, and then staggered as quickly as his limp legs would take him.

He was already breaking into a fast, lurching stride – heading straight up the Wall. There was a splinter of obsidian sticking out of his arm. Ramsay knew what he had to do. The white walkers had to die.

He could feel the rage simmering in his chest, and it gave him strength. Cannot let them control me, Ramsay thought. I will not be a puppet! I will not be a puppet!

Sam

That moment flashed before his eyes, over and over again. He felt the whoosh of air, the wood shattering open, and then the rain of rubble scattering over his head. Sam’s heart was beating so fast he couldn’t feel it, and his head so hysterical that words were nonsensical wails.

He had seen the white walker standing over him, in all its terrible beauty. He had seen that brief moment of surprise, just as the barrels crashed to the ground and the obsidian exploded.

I’m alive. Sam had set the trap, he had set himself as bait. I’m alive, he finally realised in surprise.

He had never expected to survive the trap.

Now, the Lord Steward was heaving, bile spewing from his throat. A chunk of rubble had embedded itself into his side, so painful he could barely breathe.

All around him, there were so, so many bodies. Castle Black was flooded with corpses.

Sam had gambled everything on the wights collapsing or disappearing – but instead they were just standing there, staring blankly. The wights were milling around, occasionally twitching or shuffling.

A few wights were walking, one of them had even talked, but the rest just seemed dazed and confused. Their eyes weren’t blue anymore, their gazes looked black.

All around him, the castle was devastated. Sam thought of those women and children that were hiding in the wormwalks as the wights stormed through. I sacrificed them, Sam thought numbly, I just sacrificed every refugee in the castle as bait. Potentially thousands – Sam couldn’t even begin to count.

The only easy way to kill an Other was to catch it by surprise.

The battle had been lost, Sam told himself, surrendering had been their only hope. One final chance to draw it in, one final resort to let them target the white walker itself. The wights were distractions, Sam had argued; the dead were an unending foe. The battle for Castle Black could only truly end when Malvern itself fell.

The Other had no reason to enter the castle personally during the fighting, but in the battle’s aftermath Malvern would choose to come closer to raise its army. So long as it had been hiding, it had been effectively unkillable – it needed to be lured closer before it could be slain. He had known that Malvern would need to raise its wights.

Sam had gambled that it would want the sworn brothers alive as prisoners to open the way. Sam had suspected that Malvern would want to gloat.

The plan had almost failed before it began when Varamyr lost his courage. They had readied the catapults atop the Wall and they had placed every chunk of dragonglass into three barrels. Still, there had only been one chance to kill Malvern, they had to be sure it was in position. There was no good line of sight in this weather – they had needed to rely on the skinchanger and his eagle to pass on the signal of exactly when to fire.

But Varamyr had turned craven, and tried to run. Sam had to tackle the skinchanger down and hold him in place, forcing him to do his duty.

Across from him, Varamyr was lying in the snow with a bloody splinter through his eye.

It worked, Sam realised, slowly becoming aware of the world around him again. It worked.
The courtyard was stirring, stunned gazes rising to stare at Sam.

The other sworn brothers had not known of the plan. Sam hadn’t been able to risk telling them – the panic and the loss needed to be real, that was the only way Malvern would believe it. Only a precious few had known of his intention, the rest had thought that Sam truly betrayed them.

How many were killed? How many have just been lost?

Edd, Grenn, Halder, Albett, Goady, Duncan, Tim, Arron – they had all dropped their weapons and raised their hands because they trusted Sam.

How many did my plan kill?

The air felt strangely still. Empty, as though the world had stopped. The frenzy of activity had vanished. Even the snows seemed calmer; the winds felt less vicious after the white walker’s death. All around him, wide eyes were staring at Sam, or looking at the lingering wights.

“They’re not moving,” a large man said dumbly. Small Paul was on his knees, staring up at the wights with a blank expression. “Not moving.”

Sam saw one wight – an old dead woman – that was left staggering repeatedly into a wall, over and over again.

The white walker had burnt away into nothingness. All that was left of the Other was a steaming outline in the snow, and a clump of shattered obsidian.

Before him, Malvern’s sword lay on the ground, a white-frosted blade so fine that it could have been a water dancer’s edge. The rest of the white walker had dissolved into burning ice, but the sword had fallen out of its grip. The sword was freezing, so cold that even the snow beneath it was crackling.

It radiated frost even from the handle, no human could hold it. Even through his gloves, Sam had lost a patch of skin from his hand just trying to touch it. If he had tried to grip it, he would have lost his hand.

A remnant of the white walker’s magic, lying before him – a blade so cold that iron would shatter beneath it. Sam could only stare, before pulling off his cloak and gingerly trying to wrap the sword up.

“The Father raise us above the turmoil o’ flesh, to hath and to hold in your light…” Sam heard the words in the background – a voice mumbling from the Seven-Pointed Star. Ser Aladale Wynch was on the ground gasping through sobs, reciting broken scripture. ‘… how art we lost, see us to the path… for the dark descent and up to reascend, give us the dawning light…”

The earth rumbled, causing him to stumble. His head reeled, and Sam felt dazed.

We’re still under attack. Wyrms, that wight had said, but Sam could barely process the words. Wyrms?

Sam heard a cry – an inhuman voice echoing. A great, furred giant was bustling around, roaring guttural words that Sam couldn’t decipher. It is calling for someone, he realised slowly. Sam counted another four giants that had taken shelter in the tunnel when the castle fell. There were the bodies of another two buried in the snow when barricades fell.

The giants seemed distraught, searching for their fallen clansmen. They barrelled through the snow, kicking down corpses with frenzied blows. The wights never even twitched.

“Sam!” a voice said suddenly, a hand shaking his shoulder. Sam saw Edd standing above him, the steward’s face lined in worry. “Bloody hells, Sam, how did you…?”

Sam couldn’t reply.

“What happened?” another was shouting, staggering out of the tunnel. “What happened, where did it…?”

“Father judge us true, for in the Light of the Seven we are guided…”

“Halder…!” that was Grenn’s voice, shaking a body on the ground. “Halder, get up… get up…”

It was dead. Malvern was dead.

But there are more. There are more Others just like that one.

“Sam!” Dolorous Edd snapped. “What is happening here? The ground is bloody shaking and what is going on?”

Edd tried to shake him from his shock, but it was all spinning. The brothers, Sam thought. The Wall.

“Rollo!” a sworn brother was shouting, pulling up a dead body. “Rollo! Rollo, he’s alive – he’s moving!”

Sam turned to stare. The man’s friend – Rollo – had his stomach gouged open. He was a wight; his gaze was vacant and his breath was still, but his arms were still twitching and his mouth flapped open as if he was trying to speak. Sam didn’t even know the man, but Rollo wore a black cloak. He must have died and been raised as a wight, and then Malvern died moments later. His friend was still calling for aid, insisting desperately that Rollo was alive. The dead man’s mouth was flapping.

An echoing cry filled the air, and a giant’s footsteps rumbled. Wun Wun looked dazed as he stepped out from the gates, his head lowered to crouch underneath the beam. The giant didn’t know what was happening. “Dead,” Wun Wun cried. “Dead?”

Sam took a deep breath. More and more men were staggering up from the stunned castle. Voices were rising in pitch – cries for aid or screams of anguish. The earth rumbled with hysterical sobs.

It wasn’t over. The attack from the south had been stopped at great cost, but there were even more pressing against them from the north.

We have breathing room now, that’s all I have won. Room to breathe, to rally. Maybe that was enough.

The Others had the Horn of Winter. They have the weapon that destroys the Wall.

“Gather whatever survivors you can,” Sam said finally, his voice hoarse. “Get them out of here – evacuate the castle. Any that we don’t need must start running.”

Edd started at him in shock. Behind him, the sworn brothers were gathering, men creeping out of hiding places. “Find any survivors, get them on their feet,” Sam insisted, pulling himself up. “Get them out of here as quickly as possible.”
There was a cry of protest, but Sam’s voice broke into a scream. “Any man or woman that can still fight, form up!” he shouted. “But anyone who can’t – get out. Quickly, just run!”

Others were stirring; Sam saw Grenn clutching a blade, and Halder doubled over in the snow, and Ser Wynton Stout wailing nonsensically. Men were coated in frost and chunks of rotten blood. The shrieks filled the air.

There was a great roar – Wun Wun was staggering, confused and scared. It trampled through the snow, kicking down wights with immense feet. Men cowered, but Wun Wun was going berserk. The giant never understood what was happening; Malvern had disappeared so suddenly, leaving shock and pain in its wake.

“You fucking craven!” a voice screamed. Sam saw Ser Endrew Tarth, blood across his brow and his gaze crazed. The knight was drawing steel, staring at Sam. “You did this! You surrendered!”

The air rippled. Ser Endre screamed, and suddenly attention turned towards Sam. He saw Ser Byam Flint grip a sword, and then Duncan Liddle was shouting at him. “What happened?” the large man called. “The Other… you told us to surrender, you said surrender…”

Aye, I did. Ser Endrew’s eyes were furious, but Sam just felt numb. “Hey now, this doesn’t–” Dolorous Edd tried to stop him, but the knight shoved him out of the way.

“Our brothers, those people!” Ser Endrew’s blade pointed at Sam, threatening to skewer him. “They died because this craven gave the order to run!”

More eyes were turning to focus on Sam. Angry eyes, scared eyes, crazed eyes. Sam cowered, barely even able to…

“You’re right.” Sam could hardly breathe, his voice a whisper. “They did die because of me.” His head turned, looking between the other men. “And you’re alive because of me too.”

Others were shouting too, there were more creeping up through the keep. “You used us as bait!” a man shouted from the balcony. “You bloody used us!”

“They’re dead, they’re all…” a voice was wailing.

“Rollo!” a sworn brother cried. “Rollo, it’s me… it’s me…”

“You bloody dar–!” Ser Byam Flint looked ready to lunge at Sam, if not for Grenn yanking him back.

“Order!” Duncan Liddle shouted – the castellan was a broad, fierce man, pushing his way through. “Get back you sods…!”

“It was him, it was him…!”

I did what I had to do. I sacrificed the battle for a chance to win. Sam knew that it had been the right move, but still… the sight of all those dead bodies…

Without warning, Sam’s legs took a step forward. He stepped forward into Ser Tarth’s sword, so that the tip of the blade pressed against his chest. Sam could barely feel it. The knight looked shocked.

“If you’re going to kill me, just do it quickly,” Sam whispered. “Cut off my head and limbs so I cannot be raised again. And then afterwards you must promise to lead the defence.”
Ser Tarth was a strong figure, a fighter. Perhaps he’d be a better leader too. Still, the knight seemed to falter at Sam’s expression. “But if you’re not going to kill me, then back away.” Sam gulped. “It’s not over, not yet.”

All eyes were on Sam. “Not over,” Ser Endrew repeated, eyes wide.

“They’re coming from the north too. You can feel them. They’re going to break through the Wall and we must hold them back.”

“Break through?” Grenn said incredulously. “You can’t break through the Wall – it’s the Wall.”

“We need to retreat! We must retreat—”

“Seven save us, grant us your light…” Ser Aladale Wynch wept.

Behind them, the giant roared. Sam heard wildlings squabbling – voices in the Old Tongue rising around him.

“Run into the mountains,” Duncan Liddle said suddenly. “We run to the mountains, take shelter with the clans.”

Ser Endrew seemed to hesitate. Sam turned, staring at the brothers. Sam grimaced and shook his head. “No,” he said sadly. “Nobody can run.”

All the corpses and wights were watching them. A dozen voices split the air – cries of panic. The sworn brothers were all breaking down into hysteria. Sam saw hardened men, warriors, that were left shaken to the bone.

Weirdly, Sam felt like he was the most level-headed one there. Or perhaps Sam had already broken down so badly that he couldn’t break any more.

“How can we stand against—”

“We can’t stop them, we can’t…” a free folk wept.

“Defence?” Edd demanded suddenly, looking to Sam. “What in blazes are we defending against? What is out there?”

“Everything. Anything,” Sam replied, gulping. “We are the shield that guards the realms of men. The shield is cracked, but it’s not broken.” Not yet. “We must defend. We must hold.”

Wun Wun cried something – so fiercely that men around him scattered. “Dead!” the giant boomed. “Dead!”

_The giant doesn’t speak Common well enough_, Sam realised. Wun Wun never knew what was happening, never knew why people were shrieking – the giant just lashed out like a child.

They were scared. They were all tired, stressed and terrified out of their minds. They needed order. And it’s on me, he thought numbly, _I’m the one who has to give it_. Sam felt so scared he couldn’t even feel it, like the fear had soaked straight through him.

“Stop…!” Sam protested, but his voice wasn’t loud enough. “Stop, don’t…”

“Retreat, we need to…!”
Sam saw three men – Clubfoot Karl, Luke of Longtown and Grubbs – that were already pushing through the snow to run. Another man, Leathers, tried to stop them, but voices were raising, and weapons being swung madly…

Sam saw a shaggy-haired wildling – Thundering Mammoth – screaming bloody murder in words that were hardly coherent. Some were falling apart, others were howling…

“Bugger you, crows!” an old free folk woman screeched. “Bugger you all, you let us die–!”

Wun Wun stepped forward threateningly, raising great meaty hands. Scared bodies fumbling for spears. It was all breaking apart, tumbling around him.

Sam never even knew what he was doing. He was just moving.

And suddenly Sam was shoulder-barging straight into the giant. He didn’t even reach Wun Wun’s thigh, but he was running and shoving the giant’s leg, slamming into thick fur. For Wun Wun, it was like being charged by a witless midget, but it caused him to stumble slightly. The giant seemed more surprised than hurt.

“STOP!” Sam screamed, and finally it seemed like his voice was loud enough.

The air faltered, just briefly, and Sam took a deep breath. They were staring at him, all eyes on him…

“If you want to run, then I will not stop you! I cannot stop you!” Sam shouted, a quiver in his voice. “But if there is anyone in the south who you love, anyone, anyone at all who you want to protect, then we must stand until the very end!

“You fucking surrendered…!” Ser Endrew Tarth screamed, viciously swinging his sword into the air.

Sam didn’t even twitch. “I did what I had to do. Do the same.” All of those corpses, it felt like there was judgement in their eyes… “Perhaps we are already lost, but we must keep on fighting for them.”

Nobody replied, but their eyes were white. Wun Wun was looking down at him, grunting uncertainly.

“Tarly!” a sound cawed, black wings rustling. “Tarly! Tarly!”

It was the crow. Mormont’s crow, flapping around him. Half the castle had been slaughtered, but the crow had still survived. Dark wings flapped through the hush, causing every man to flinch. The crow was circling around the courtyard in panic, cawing in high pitched shrieks. Mormont’s crow.

They were all looking at him. Sam wanted to curl up into a ball and collapse – he wanted to block it all out and run to the library, to cuddle up behind some book. But he couldn’t. Instead, Sam found himself stepping forward, staring at them all. “What are our vows?” he said with a gulp. “We shall live and die at our posts. We are the swords in the darkness, we are the watchers on the walls.”

There was a brief pause. “We are the fire that burns against the cold,” Edd said suddenly, his voice joining Sam’s. “The light that brings the dawn.”
Grenn spoke up next, and others were mumbling. “The horns that wake the sleepers,” they chanted. The words were spreading. “The shields that guard the realms of men.”

Other people were still screaming, but more were joining in the chant. Even free folk were chanting the oath. Wun Wun recognised those words too, they seemed to calm him. Sam could have sagged, but he had to stay upright.

The crow finally stopped to settle on Sam’s shoulder. Its talons dug into his furs, beak pecking painfully at his earlobe. Searching for corn, no doubt.

Sam looked straight at Ser Tarth. “Do your duty, ser,” he whispered. “But I must do mine.”

After a pause, Ser Endrew finally lowered his blade. Sam almost collapsed.

“You can’t… you can’t let him get away with…!” Ser Byam Flint tried to protest, but Ser Endrew just shoved him out of the way.

Sam turned to stare at the north, at the pale light reflecting off the Wall.

It was morning, there was finally daylight. Sam could see the weak sunlight through the clouds, cold and crystalline, and the fog of the storm was clearing. The Others had always seemed slightly weaker in the light of day – the hunting parties all reported that Malvern shunned the sunlight. The dead lost a bit of their advantage in the light, now was the time to push back. We must move quickly.

“I want two teams!” Sam shouted to the stunned courtyard. “One team to secure the castle, and the other to start preparing the defence. Edd – you’re in charge of the castle, Grenn – you lead the defence.”

“They’re trying to run!” a voice – the wildling Leathers – shouted suddenly. He was at the front of a gaggle of men, trying to restrain a group of would-be deserters. “They’re trying to–!”

“Let them!” Sam snapped, looking down at the men from the upper courtyard. Clubfoot Karl looked like he had the fear of the gods pressed into him – men that scared were useless. “Run if you want, but you’ll never run fast enough.”

Voices murmured, but they obeyed. A few were still chanting the oath of the Night’s Watch to calm themselves. Sam groped down at the chunk of debris sticking through his furs, and he winced as he pulled the splinter out. It was a shallow wound, blood frozen against his furs. The wound would scar, but for now he could only bandage it.

A benefit of being fat, Sam thought woozily as he stared at the bloody shard of obsidian. Shards of dark rubble littered everywhere across the courtyard, along with the fallen wights.

“Edd,” Sam gasped. “The dragonglass. Pick up all the pieces of dragonglass you can find, we need it all.”

“Aye.” Edd nodded, pale-faced. He was already rushing off. “Aye, milord.”

Sam turned and stared. Swords, arrows and debris sprawled through the grounds. The castle was filled with thousands of wights, about half of them still standing and a few of them stirring. Sam tried to look for that wight with the severed face – the wight that had talked – but he had been too dazed to see where it had run off too.

Sam thought of the stranger – Coldhands – that had saved his life. Is that how Coldhands was The wights. Do the freed wights have intelligence? Could they be recruited to fight the Others?

Across the courtyard, the wildling was still bent over the moving body of his dead friend, refusing to let anyone burn him.

Sam saw another sworn brother hack off a wight’s head, but it never even reacted. Its limbs were still twitching even as its head slashed open. Most seemed just mindless corpses now. But might another white walker retake control of the wights? They couldn’t risk it.

“Grenn!” Sam shouted. “Assign men, start disposing of these wights. Burn them if you can, cut off limbs if you can’t. Clear the castle of any bodies that the Others might raise.”

Across from him, men started to hack through the unchained wights. The wights didn’t resist, most hardly even seemed to notice. It was only a few that seemed show any traces of the men they once were.

“Who here speaks the Old Tongue?” a man cried. “Get those bloody giants under control.”

The giants seemed crazed. They were stomping through the courtyard, bellowing words that Sam couldn’t even recognise. For one horrible moment Sam thought that they might turn aggressive too, but then the noise spooked the crow from his shoulder – and Mormont’s bird burst into the sky. The raven shrieked some indecipherable caw, flapping circles around a giant’s face. The great furred creatures gaped at it.

Behind him, the earth shuddered.

Sam turned to look up the Wall, at the shower of ice and snow that was still scattering from the precipice. The defenders on the Wall had been trapped up there for an entire day and night, trying to withstand the Other’s siege.

How many? he wondered. There had been two thousand sworn brothers stationed in Castle Black, plus several times that number of refugees. At least half their men were trapped on the Wall, and yet in the castle it seemed like there were ten corpses for every survivor. How many have fled, how many can still fight?

What has to be done? Where do I need to be?

Supplies. They needed supplies. Sam stared around him, looking for the biggest men he could see. Need men that can carry things.

“Small Paul!” Sam ordered. “There is a crate of emergency rations in the kitchens, get it up the Wall.” Small Paul blinked, but he nodded. “Rusty, we need bandages up there, fetch them. And Halder…” Sam faltered as he turned – Halder was on the ground, with an arrow in his gut. He was in no state to carry anything. Halder was his friend, they had been recruits together, but Sam couldn’t even tend to him. “Arrows. Somebody else, carry the arrows.”

He heard the indecipherable grunt of the giants, the stomping. He needed men who could speak the Old Tongue, bring them into line… “Thundering Mammoth!” Sam ordered to a wildling. “Tend to the giants, get them into order!”

Behind him, Wun Wun wailed, showing a mouth of tombstone teeth. The other giants were huddled together, but Wun Wun was an outcast from them. Like a child, Sam thought. The giant was lost – it followed the man that seemed to be in control. An immensely big, lost little child.
“Barrels,” Sam said after a brief pause, shoving his way through the men. “We have barrels of nails and tools, get them to Wun Wun to carry.”

Sam had seen it on his way down – the platform and the stairs had been groaning under the strain. They needed supplies to have a chance to fix them.

Men were turning towards him, looking for tasks. More and more were shouting orders, bringing people into formation. “We need a supply chain, we need to move support up the Wall!” Sam shouted. “We need siege weapons. And oil – all the lamp oil that we have. Get it up the Wall.”

Men were already running. Sam saw Elron and Garse hesitate, a few gazes flickering to Ser Endrew. “What the bloody hell are you waiting around for?” Grenn snapped. “Get moving.”

“And rope,” Sam ordered suddenly. “Lots and lots of rope.”

They didn’t argue. They just ran.

A dozen men led by Ser Byam Flint were already abandoning post and sprinting away to the south, and more would likely follow them. Yet the Watch didn’t even have the manpower to hold the perimeter against deserters too, nor the time to try.

The men had been awake for over a day straight – a long and tiring day and a frantic and desperate night – but they couldn’t stop now.

Fighting men and women were gathering in the courtyard, while others were already fleeing out of Castle Black. The weather had faded somewhat, but the snows were still thick – Sam didn’t fancy their chances trying to flee on foot.

Still, they had just had to leave. The fewer dead bodies in Castle Black the better.

“We should send runners to Queensgate and Deep Down,” Duncan Liddle suggested. “I’ve had no word from them.”

“None…” Edd grimaced. “The storm, the attack… Malvern was trying to cut us off. What about the other castles?”

Sam looked around them. “If they have not arrived by now, they must be facing assaults of their own.” Sam hesitated. The quakes were nearby, they felt close. “But they’re focusing on us here. Who else is nearby – what of the Shadow Tower forces?”

Gazes flickered, and then slowly turned towards a man, a Thenn. His face was painted, he wore salvaged iron armour – one of Sigorn’s men. There were a few Thenns in the castle, all of them dark-eyed, fatigued and grim. “Lord Sigorn led us down kingsroad,” the Thenn grunted, in broken Common Tongue. “Wights attacked at night. Scattered – some of us ran to Castle Black, don’t know of rest.”

“What of Winterfell?” Sam pressed. What of the dragon? He didn’t dare to say the words out loud, but they were all thinking it.

Nobody could reply. Faces were scared, eyes flickering back to the Wall. “How many are there?” Duncan Liddle asked Sam, looking towards the north. “How many do they have; how many are they bringing–”
“The tunnel!” a man cried suddenly. “The tun–!”

Sam turned, and then suddenly the shudder rippled through the earth. Everything was shaking, so badly he couldn’t even stand straight. The world was being ripped into two, and the deafening creak of stone.

All eyes turned upwards as the tower – the Lance – finally collapsed. The great stone structure wobbled inch by inch, until the tower was toppling in an avalanche. Men were running. Sam heard the crunch – the tearing – of solid granite ripping apart.

When it crashed, the whole world boomed. A cloud of dust and snow whooshed.

Men were screaming. Sam heard the crackling, a great thurrump of ice scraping together. Men were running out of the tunnel, shouting.

The tunnel under the Wall had collapsed. A cave-in, the ice quaking apart.

All around him, it was like Castle Black was toppling like dominoes. The earthquakes were coming closer, the shaking growing fiercer “Get up the Wall,” Sam breathed.

“Sam…” Edd warned.

“Get up the Wall, they need support.” Sam looked between them. “Edd, get this castle in order – Grenn, up the Wall with me.”

Grenn, the last of the Dragonguard still fighting in Castle Black. Grenn wore King Snow’s white dragon on his furs – Sam could only hope that the sight of him would help inspire any of Sonagon’s believers on the Wall. The dragon was coming, they had to believe that it was.

The whole Wall was quivering like it might collapse. If the Wall did fall… there would be so much falling ice it could smother whole cities. It would be the greatest avalanche the world had ever known.

He entrusted the white walker’s blade to Edd, but Sam was already pushing his way through. Voices were shouting – calling for order, for search teams, for evacuation. Sam was in the middle of it all, watching the world turn around him.

Sam started to run. Two dozen men followed him, with Small Paul hoisting up a large crate while Wun Wun carried two hefty barrels under each arm. Grenn was at the front, with a sword in one hand and a standard of the dragon in the other – waving the flag of the Dragonguard to signal men to follow. Sam wrapped a large coil of rope around his torso, all the while men struggled to clear the path.

A hail of ice blew off the top of the Wall, turning the world a hazy white.

He was running up the Wall, pounding up the broken steps coated in frost and snow. The stairs were treacherous even in the best of times, and now there was scattering snow across them and so many people choking the steps that even the wood was groaning. Men needed to fasten lengths of ropes to the timbers as guide ropes, but clearing the way upwards was a battle in itself. Panic was all around him; scared bodies clotting up the stairs.

He heard the creak of the platform, the lift moving once more. They could winch the barrels of lamp oil and weapons upwards, but the men had to climb up the steps.
With every tremble, it felt like the world might collapse.

Sam’s heart was pounding with every step. The Wall rumbled so badly that Sam almost fell. It took Small Paul to lift Sam up the broken stairs – the larger man had to throw Sam over his shoulder as he lost his footing. Wun Wun balanced so unsteadily that eight men needed to tie ropes around the giant’s hands to guide him up.

“Clear the way!” the men cried up the steps. “Clear the way!”

The white walkers had set a time limit. The sworn brothers were already playing catch up.

_We must rebuild. We must defend, we must fight._

Sam could hear the noise vibrating through the ice. It sounded like roars.

By the time they reached the top, the sun was climbing higher in the sky and moving south. Weak sunlight was spilling through, and the clouds to the north were churning. The trenches were thick with bodies, and with every rumble Sam saw geysers of snow billowing off the edge. Men were sharing cloaks, trying to hide and find warmth around weak fires. The rest had been left to the cold.

Even as he ran, Sam past wildlings with white veins snaking up their cheeks and frost in their hair. Men had collapsed weakly into hoarse breaths. _The poison_, Sam thought. The first of the poisoned prisoners were starting to fall, and the rest didn’t seem healthy either.

“Clear the way!” Grenn ordered in front of him. “Anybody who can’t fight, make way for people who can.”

Wun Wun stomped at the very front, the giant forcing people to push backwards with every huge step. The other giants were coming up the Wall as well.

“Get to the winch!” Sam shouted, looking around the crowd of wide eyes littering the wood. “They’re bringing supplies up on the lift, and taking wounded down. Keep the stairs clear for people coming up!”

Men were running, bodies scattering over the ice. Sam could still hear those booms – the crash of the white walker’s trebuchets across the Wall. _No, the trebuchets are useless_, Sam thought. The launching wights were terrifying, but the Other’s trebuchets had only ever been a means to keep the defenders off-guard. The siege weapons hardly even had the range, and they could not fire enough bodies fast enough to make a difference. _We can survive the trebuchets, we can fight back._

The sworn brothers were already setting to work– slinging ropes downwards to build a supply train. People were moving, Sam just had to make sure they were moving in the right direction. He pushed his way forward into the trenches, but all he could see was a field of black shapes buried in white.

“Where’s Mance?” Sam called, looking between the unfamiliar faces atop the Wall. “Where’s Mance, where is–”

“Here, Tarly,” a voice croaked, and Sam nearly collapsed with relief. Mance Rayder was swaying with every step and his head was wrapped up in bandages. His eyes were still dazed, but he seemed more focused. Mance had spent most of the night unconscious. _He’s alive_, Sam thought. He had half-expected to come up the Wall to find Mance dead.

“Mance,” Sam gushed, rushing to the lord’s side. “You’re alive… the castle is clear, let’s get you down –”
“I ain’t dead yet, Tarly,” he replied with a grimace, shaking Sam off. The man looked dazed and desperate. “Get the rest down before me. What happened? Dalla… my boy… are they…”

Dalla. Sam didn’t even know. Maybe she hid in the tunnels, maybe she died with the rest. It could be days before they sorted through the bodies. Still, Sam could not say that now, he could not risk it.

“She is safe,” Sam lied. “And the babe. Safe. It worked, we stopped the wights.”

Mance’s body sagged in relief, the anxiety draining from his face. By all the gods, Sam thought numbly, I am surely going to hell. Or maybe hell is coming for me.

“Malvern is dead, my lord,” Sam pressed, taking a deep breath. “We caught him. We can rebuild the defence, we can hold from the north.”

There was no relief. Mance’s gaze looked haunted. “Tarly… have you seen them?”

Sam faltered slightly. All around him, there were grim mumbles. Sam’s eyes flickered across to the northern edge of the Wall. Men were running or clinging on to the wooden beams. Everywhere he looked, Sam saw men scared out of their wits. Fresh reinforcements were pushing up from the stairs, yet there were crowds of people desperate to get down again.

The wildlings, Sam realised. The poisoned wildlings had broken down. There was no fighting; everyone seemed too grim and fatigued. Crowds of men were huddled together in the trenches, taking shelter from the wind.

The ground rumbled, and Sam heard the movement below. It was shaking like the beasts of seven hells, like the monsters that the Seven-Pointed Star spoke of – the unholy behemoths that would feast upon the souls of sinners.

Sam needed to see. He ran straight towards the great precipice at the edge of the Wall, panting for breath with every strained step. The rumbling was so fierce that his bones quaked, the wind stripping through his furs.

The view took his breath away. In the dark it had been naught but an abyss, but in the morning light it was all pure white. To the north, it was like he was gazing down upon a snowstorm.

At first, he could see nothing but great billows of snow from the ground. Then, he made out the shapes.

In the light of day, he could see them – he saw the earth coiling. Sam’s knees turned so weak he could have fallen off the edge. He suddenly understood why the world had been rumbling so fiercely.

The wight had spoken the truth. Wyrms.

Even from this distance looking down, they were huge. Immense beasts churning in the earth, husks of flesh that were twisting. A cold mist rose from the earth, and with every slight twitch great geysers of snows gushed. It was so hard to make out their shapes, but Sam could see the grey moving through the white.

Sam stared downwards, his jaw hanging off the Wall.

They moved like snakes, but their bodies were shorter and stockier than any serpent. They reminded him more of fish – eels, perhaps, writhing through the snow.
The clouds were too dark to make out any details, but Sam saw the blast of bluish light as great jaws opened. Something ignited in the clouds of steam wreathing the Wall’s base, the illumination of flames pulsing through so many teeth. Dragonfire swelled outwards. Frostfire.

The roar was like thunder. Every time the wyrms breathed, the Wall quaked.

Sam was shaking, vision blurring. The tremors were only getting worse, and Sam could see the damage that they had made. They had carved a great notch out of the Wall, working their way deeper and deeper.

“What are those things?” a voice broke. “What are they?”

Some creatures from a long-past age of the world. The maesters had theorised for a long time that ice dragons lived to the far north, across the Shivering Sea. The fire wyrms of the Fourteen Flames had been the first dragons of Valyria, and the sea serpents of the Sunset Sea were a part of ancient history. The white walkers had raised things that could not, should not, still exist.

They're burrowing, he thought in horror. Burrowing into the Wall. The Others still meant to break through.

Sam saw men on their knees. “Ice dragon save us… ice dragon save us…” a wildling muttered, clutching his white stone. “We pray for salvation, for deliverance…”

There were more than just wildlings praying now. Sam saw Dornish Dilly, Alf of Runnymund, Ulmer and Jake also on their knees – even men who had always resisted the Cult of the Ice Dragon were praying for it.

“It’s the horn,” a wildling muttered – Sam recognised Longspear Ryk, cradling a red-haired woman in his arms. He looked pale, his dark hair streaked in white. “That’s the Horn of Joramun right there.”

He could see them. The beasts were coiled at the base of the wall, churning and pushing forward with every fierce breath. Backwards and forth, rhythmically, working their way through.

Sam couldn’t focus. His breaths were hoarse, the sight left him shaken. “… Must defend, must ready…” he gasped. “We need reinforcements, reinforcements…”

“They ain’t coming,” Ryk snapped. “Don’t you understand? Nobody’s coming, you can’t fight them… you can’t…”

“They’re attacking the Wall exactly how Mance planned it,” the girl croaked suddenly. She was alive, but her eyes were fluttering. There was a bandaged wound across her upper arm, with an arrow shaft still jammed into her shoulder. “They attacked everywhere at once to keep you spinning, and they sent a group in advance to circle around. But they’re focusing on Castle Black – they want to crush you where you’re strongest. Bastards copied our plan.”

Sam understood. The whole Wall was going to tumble down.

But how long? How long have they been digging, how long until it cracks?

The Wall was over three-hundred-foot-thick, and ice wyrms were fighting against the barrier. Even for creatures that size, it wasn’t easy. They must have started after dusk, and they had been going a whole night. The tremors were only growing worse.
Another distraction, he thought. They had brought the wyrms in under cover of darkness, so that they’d have a whole night to dig through before anyone could even notice.

“…Hold the Wall…” Sam muttered, stumbling as he backed away. “We must…”

“We can’t!” Ryk snapped. “We can’t fight them, look at them! We have to run. Can’t stop them, we can’t…!”

Others were crying the same, shouts calling for retreat. Half their number had already fled – trying to run west or east along the Wall. Sam blinked, and took a deep breath. Focus… think… think of a plan…

“But if that’s true,” Sam asked slowly, “then why did they bother sending you across first?”

Ryk didn’t reply. Sam’s head was whirling, struggling to think… “Ready the defence!” Sam shouted suddenly, “Get the siege weapons! Bring them in positions! We need firing teams, we need…”

More were rushing – pushing their way to the precipice to see. A few of them were still cradling bows. “Forget the arrows!” Sam called, trying to raise his voice over the clamour. “We need rocks. Or big chunks of ice, anything that we can drop. And fire – we need lots and lots of fire.”

Men were staring at him, eyes wide. “They’re still wights,” he insisted. Big, big wights. “They will still burn.” Sam looked at them desperately. “We got barrels of oil – we need ropes and pulleys to hang them off the edge. We hold them in position, we drop them and fire when we’ve got a chance.”

“Barrels of oil?” Marv of the Red said, looking at Sam like he was a fool. “Look at the size of them – what are barrels going to do?”

“Maybe nothing,” Sam gulped. “Maybe everything. But we have to try. We have to fight back, we have to resist. Now move, we need to move.”

They were stirring, but not fast enough. Give them order, give them direction. “I need those mangonels over there,” Sam shouted, his voice a squeal. Sam turned and he pointed to random men specifically. “You, you, you and you start preparing rocks. Four men to loading and firing… and pulleys. We need pulleys.”

At the other side of the trenches, Sam heard the growls as the giants stepped upwards. The platform was wobbling, every rope vibrating.

“Tarly!” Duncan Liddle was running for him, with Grenn and the others close behind. “What’s happening, where–?”

Then, they heard the rumble. The Wall vibrated. A great roar blasted, long and solemn like a whale.

Sam nearly lost his balance. In the moment he didn’t know what was happening, but every instinct he had told him to run for cover. Suddenly a screech of cold wind hissed up the precipice.

A blast of cold scoured upwards, white fire breaking over the edge.

Sam collapsed. His mind went blank. Behind him, he saw an entire mangonel disintegrate into splinters, the whole edge of the Wall being shredded away. There was that rumble, an immense body crashing.
Dragonbreath – the same as Sonagon’s. But while Sonagon’s icefire was brilliant and white, the breath of the undead wyrms was bluish and foul, filling the air with the noxious stink of cold rot. It was everywhere, Sam could hardly breathe. Men were choking in it – foul air filling their lungs.

Anybody caught in that cold died before they could scream. It filled the air with putrid mist.

Sam felt the quaking, he felt the great shape rising…

An ice wyrm was pushing upwards. Its body was vertical, clinging against the Wall. It breathed straight up, polluted ice smearing into the sky. Sam felt it crash onto the Wall, its great jaws open wide. It was huge – longer and bulkier than Sonagon. It had no wings, but it was still rising. Its body was recoiling, using its tail to push itself upwards all the way from the ground.

Sam saw it. He saw teeth breaking through the snows, he saw blue light swelling in its throat.

Its scales were grey, and half its snout looked like it had been torn off. Sam could see its bones – black jawbones, with frozen greyish flesh patched with rot. Sheaves of scales were hanging from its body, four great horns tapering backwards from its skull.

Sam could see its exposed ribcage, he could see the blue fire burning inside of it. The ice wyrm looked like it had been mauled before it died. A dead, mutilated corpse of an immense, ancient beast.

And its jaws were open, its eyes bright blue. It was jumping. Sam imagined a snake springing upwards…

Strong hands grabbed him, yanking Sam away from the edge. “Fall back!” a man screamed. “Fall back, away from the–”

Everything quaked.

The wyrm breathed again, scouring the cliff’s edge of the Wall clean. Sam saw a brother lose both his arms in a heartbeat, his limbs bitten clean off by the cold. There was a straight line across the ice where everything just cleaved away.

The edge of the Wall was breaking apart. A hail of ice shattered downward.

There was a groan of wood – their wooden mangonels were straining, half of their fortifications were demolished. Large timbers were threatening to fall.

“There!” a voice cried. It was Sam’s voice, he was screaming. “We need rope, we need–”

There was another roar. The thump of immense bodies were coming closer.

He could see the wyrms moving upwards – they were clawing on the surface of the Wall. Sam had thought them as giant snakes, but suddenly Sam realised that they had legs. Tiny, stubby little legs, but they were clawed and strong. Sam didn’t know how legs that small managed to grip anything, but they were clinging to the ice.

Even despite their bulk, the wyrms were weirdly agile. Their bodies coiled, and they used their tails to move. They pushed themselves straight upwards, their mouths open wide. They seemed like creatures built for swimming or burrowing, but they were clamouring up the vertical surface all the same.

There were two of them climbing. The big one looked three times the size of the small one, but the smaller one was climbing so much faster.

The ice, Sam realised in horror, the surface of the ice is sagging. At the bottom, the wyrmss had already gouged a great chunk out of the Wall.

Behind them, Sam saw the army of wights was waiting. They had been hidden in the dark, but he could see them now. The wyrmss would break the Wall, and then the wights would flood through.

Four hundred feet down the length of the Wall, another wyrm breathed. Even from this height, the cold flames smelt putrid like a rotten whale.

Sam was running, stumbling backwards for cover. Men were mad with panic, taking shelter in the trenches. Sam heard two dozen prayers; two dozen desperate pleas to whatever god might save them. The men were nothing but ants against dragons that size.

Sam fell backwards, stumbling through the snow to take shelter with Mance. He dropped into the trenches, all the while the rain of hail scattered around them. Men were huddling, trying to take cover.

All around them, men were scared witless – but they were looking towards Sam and Mance for hope. Grenn and the others from the castle pushed through towards him, while Mance hung close to Longspear Ryk and the woman.

It looked like Mance was having difficulty just keeping his eyes open, the concussion left his eyes dilated.

“How many are there?” Mance gasped.

“At least two, maybe three.” Ryk shook his head. “We heard them burrowing, never got a good look.”

Five. Two of them were climbing, a third was waiting towards the back. They were big. The biggest looked over two hundred and fifty feet long, but it was hard to tell from above as they churned. Outstretched, the big one reached up at least a good quarter of the way up the Wall.

Sam heard the boom of frostfire at the base of the Wall. Even the ice itself was being scoured away by the force of their breath, and the earth shook with each clash. That was what collapsed the tunnels, Sam thought numbly. The beasts were carving a large gash across the base of the Wall – meaning to undercut the structure.

Each one is a puppet, being used by the white walker for different tasks, Sam thought. The small one was climbing – trying to take potshots at the defenders atop the Wall. The bigger one coiled before the gate of Castle Black, but its breath was so much more powerful. Sam couldn’t even see the northern gate anymore – the other end of the tunnel had been buried under heaps of debris.

The very biggest was the one at the back, but it was coiled so still it was hard to even make it out through the billows of snow. It was being kept in reserve.

Sam couldn’t even see the other two, but they must be there. Underground.

The men heard – they felt – the ice grinding. They could feel it all shaking beneath them. The wyrm dug on with stubby claws, heaving itself upwards.
The weapon that breaks the Wall. Only a dragon was powerful enough for something like that.

“How long do we have?” Sam said finally. “How long until…?”

Men hesitated. “I don’t know…” a voice replied, a free folk Sam never recognised. “They’ve been going for hours. Have you seen the gash they’ve made at the bottom? The Wall is chipping away.”

“Run,” Ryk croaked. “Just run.”

“We can’t defend against those,” another free folk. “We can’t save the Wall. We’ve already lost.”

“We must evacuate the Wall,” Duncan insisted. “Run to the hills, take shelter there.”

Sam turned to stare at him. “How are the hills going to save us when the Wall can’t?”

Nobody could reply. Run, he thought. They could run. But what happens next if we do?

“If we run here,” Sam continued with a gulp, “then the world is as good as lost. The Wall is the only thing that can even slow them down. We abandon it, and what do we hide behind next?”

“We’re dead if we stay up here!” Marv the Red Hand snapped.

“And we’re dead if we run back down too!” We’re dead no matter what. “The Wall falls, the white walkers break through, what happens? Their army – their army doesn’t stop growing, Malvern proved that. They break the Wall, winter comes, and the Others become unstoppable.” Sam’s voice was desperate. “We cannot fall back now, we must hold the line.”

“Hold the line?” a man choked. “We’re done.”

“Not yet.” Sam took a deep breath. “The Others – we have to target the Others themselves. We attack.”

Eyes stared at him incredulously. “The wyrms will collapse so long as we kill the white walkers controlling them,” Sam insisted. “That is what happened with the wights. They are giant puppets, we must go for the masters. Where are the Others?”

Sam looked around for any that could answer. “Anybody? Where were they spotted last?”

“They were waiting towards the rear,” Garth Greyfeather said after a pause. “Standing by the treeline.”

Yes, hiding out of sight. That was how the white walkers preferred to fight. “Then what if we send men down?” Sam insisted. “Their attention is distracted, so we send parties to climb down and circle around. Ambush the Others instead, catch them from behind with an obsidian arrow.”

“They’ll never get through the line of wights.” Hairy Hal shook his head.

“They will. We need to distract them.” Sam turned to Mance. “We need a bonfire. As large a fire as we can make. Anything we have to burn – we need it here.”

“And the men that need to go down there?” Grenn asked after pause.

“It’d be suicide, it’s…!”

“We need to run, we need to…”
Sam looked around them desperately. Nobody met his gaze, but then the red-haired girl gulped. “I’ll do it,” she croaked.

A few men muttered. She had half an arrow in her arm, but the wound was wrapped up. It’s lucky I’m a terrible shot. Ryk’s face paled. “Ygritte, you can’t…”

“We’re dead men anyways, ain’t we Ryk?” she snapped. Sam saw the white veins crawling up her neck. “I ain’t dying like this.”

“We have enough arrows for several parties,” Sam pressed, looking around for more. Volunteers to die, Sam knew. “It’s the only option.”

“I’ll go,” Garth Greyfeather said. “Fuck it, got nothing bloody else to lose.”

“You think you can climb down the Wall, old man?” the girl chided.

“Better than you can, aye.” Garth snorted.

There were mumbles. Others were stepping forward, and Sam could have sagged. “All men must die,” grey-bearded Ulmer said, shivering. “But all men must fight too.”

Ryk looked between them, and then nodded. Other wildlings – any who were strong enough. “I’ll go too.” He looked to Sam. “Give us a way down, and we’ll get down. I can make the climb one last time.”

“It’s a slow poison. I still got strength left,” Ryk said firmly. “Hells, I can’t even feel the cold anymore, I can’t feel my arms, and my skin… I’m colder than the snow already.” His breaths were strained. “But dammit, I don’t want to die like this, I want to die fighting something.”

Sam looked at them, glancing between them. Whatever the ice spider venom did, it was turning their hair bone white. The girl’s hair was half red, half streaked white. Everyone else was shivering with cold in the freezing air, but they seemed immune to the frost. Perhaps the white walkers got the dosage wrong, the men weren’t dying as fast as expected?

Others were stepping forward – Sam knew only a tenth of their names. Fulk the Flea, Spare Boot, Bannen, Alan of Rosby, Deaf Dick Follard, Black Bernarr and Kedge Whiteye. Toe-Toed Dirk, Leathers and Lemmy, One-Eyed Wulf, Bone Erik, Stuttering Andrík and Left-Handed Yoldo. Many of them were dying men or old men, either men with families or men with nothing to lose. Sam took care that they weren’t relying solely on the poisoned wildlings.

“Two teams – one go west, the other east. As many that are strong enough. Head half a league, make the climb down, and then circle around!” Sam ordered. All eyes were on him. “The rest of us will hold the Wall. We’ll keep the Others distracted, give you a chance.”

Eyes flickered to Mance too. He just nodded numbly. “You heard the commander,” Mance croaked. “See it done.”

They were running. They didn’t need many supplies, this was a last-ditch effort. Even hardened men were shivering with fear. They formed several parties of a dozen entrusted with only a single obsidian arrow. Sam watched men saying their goodbyes – shaking Mance’s hand, or hugging brothers that they had served with for decades. All around him, the air boomed.

“I always wondered what it was like climbing the Wall,” he heard a ranger – Spare Boot – murmur.
The man had been a sworn brother for near four decades, even with only a single leg. Sam never even knew his real name. “Might as well find out now.”

Sam watched Longspear Ryk hug the red-haired girl. They held each other close, whispering sweet mumbles in each other’s ears. Sam saw them share a brief, tender kiss.

Behind him, another chunk of ice cracked away. A boulder as large as a mammoth tumbled down to the ground.

_I just sent those men to their deaths_. The thought left him feeling hollow. Even in the best case, they would not return. But it didn’t matter, they needed the hope.

Sam took a deep breath. A distraction. They needed a distraction. They needed their jobs and they needed to focus on them. “Catapults!” Sam shouted. “If it can be repaired, get it firing. If not, hack it apart for kindling.”

“A bonfire?” Mance asked, reaching for Sam’s hand. The Lord Steward pulled him up wobbly.

“A big bonfire.” Sam nodded, and then turned. “Whatever we have that burns. Wood, oil, coal, furs – _anything_. Get it burning.”

They were already rushing. Men filled one of the wooden huts with kindling, and then set it ablaze. The flames started low and dim, flickering against the cold, but then the light started to grow. The fire was blazing into life, a red flower burning against the snow.

_We are clutching at straws_, Sam knew. Still – maybe if there are enough straws, and enough people holding on to them?

Men were running up from the castle, stacking up kindling. It needed to be organised, needed to move with purpose. They needed teams, they needed regiments, they needed purpose…

All around him, the fire was roaring, heat radiating off it. The whole hut was alight.

Sam saw two giants, straining to lift a stonethrower off the ground. “Form up!” Grenn was shouting, slamming his standard into the snow. “On me! Form up! Form up!”

The black, hissing smoke was rising upwards, fighting against the wind. Behind them, another breath of dragonfire scoured against the edge.

Sam’s head was spinning. Probability and numbers, odds and failures. His imagination was torturing him; _how long do we have, how long until the ambush parties reach the bottom? How long can we hold, how long until we collapse?_

All the while, the flames kept on growing higher and higher. The sworn brothers were throwing coals from the forge onto the fire, feeding it with everything they had. A great bonfire, right in the middle of the Wall.

Sam was giving orders, pushing them into the direction. One by one, turn a swarm into a shoal. Sam was shouting orders easier and easier, stuttering less with every shout. It was all about direction; get them moving in the same way. Drag the catapults, ready the defences, build a fire – men with a task were less prone to panic.

“Pots and pans!” a voice cried. “We need pots and pans, boil the oil.”

Sam heard the shaking, heard the scraping of ice. The wyrm was climbing. It was trying to reach higher, trying to torch the top of the Wall itself. It was coming up again for another attack, its great tail thrashing against the ice.

The brothers dragged a metal cauldron up from the kitchens – a big iron pot that could feed a hundred. Sam saw thick tar bubbling in it like stews, while ropes were dragged across to the edge.

We need pulleys to dangle the metal pot over the edge, Sam realised. We need hammers and saws more than swords or shields.

Hemp ropes were being tightened – men were climbing over treacherous timbers to fasten them down. Brave men were dangling over a seven-hundred-foot drop, clinging to debris with their legs as they tried to wrap the ropes through thick gloves.

Around him, men were already dropping rubble off the edge, chunks of ice and stone bouncing into the white below. Perhaps it was clattering over the wyrm’s snout, but Sam couldn’t see it.

“Forget the small chunks!” Sam ordered. “Get away from the edge, help pull the stonethrowers–!”

Crash. He felt the ice tearing apart, and a great sheet calved from the Wall. Two hundred feet away, a blast of dragonfire seared upwards. The wyrm s are moving backwards and forth, Sam realised through the chaos. They’re trying to target the defenders across the length of the Wall.

The height was their only saving grace – if the wyrm s had a clear shot, the sworn brothers would already be dead.

“It’s coming back around,” Sam breathed, and then screamed. “Fire! We need fire! More fire!”

“Flaming arrows!” Hairy Hal shouted. “Flaming arrows on me!”

All around him, the fires were crackling like the howling of a demon, devouring more and more. Sam was stumbling, the smoke thick in the air. Archers were running, men dragging burning metal cauldrons across the ice.

Even now, he saw men clutching onto white stones. The hope was the only thing that kept them going, the only thing that made them fight. The only thing that kept them sane. “For salvation!” a man screamed in the smoke. “For the dragon!”

“For the living!” another voice boomed.

Sam was staggering through towards the siegemaster. The catapults were perched like birds, half of them already scrap. He heard the winching of ropes, hammering of nails. Sam’s gaze flickered around, siege for the siegemaster.

“Where’s Lothar?” Sam called. “Who is in command?”

“Lothar’s dead. A wight landed on him,” a voice grunted. Sam turned, and a small man was pushing his way towards him. “Don’t know who’s in command, but I’m doing what I can.”

Sam knew him – Bedwyck the Giant, a man so small he was almost a dwarf. Even as he talked, he didn’t stop hammering in nails. “Then you’re the siegemaster now,” Sam pressed. “Get these catapults forward, get the firing squads ready.”

Bedwyck shook his head. “Our big throwers can’t hit those beasts, they can’t angle that far down.”

“Can we prop them up, push them into position?” Sam pressed. “Stack them up, hang them over the edge if we have to.” Behind him, he heard the screams as half a dozen men in the distance got caught by the ice breath. “What of the scythe? The metal scythe?”

The scythe was a great metal hook that was fastened onto a giant iron chain. It was designed to stop climbers; when it fell, it would sear across the front of the ice as it swung. Once upon a time, the scythe had been the anchor of a ship that had wrecked at Eastwatch, sharpened like a blade’s edge. In the history of the Wall, there had been but three times that the scythe had been dropped.

“We dropped it,” Bedwyck shouted at back at him. “Dropped it early last night.”

“How long would it take to pull it up again?” Sam demanded over the ramparts. “No, how long to rig up more just like it?”

All around him, there Wall was a frenzy of activity, but they weren’t running. It wasn’t mindless chaos. Even as the wyrms writhed and roared somewhere so far below, the Wall’s upper levels were filled with the clamour of tools, of men running with packs on their backs, men fighting the ice with axes. Sam saw regiments of donkeys dragging supplies across the ice, and giants winching ropes.

Bedwyck finally dropped off the catapult, looking at Sam with narrowed eyes. “What’s the plan here?” he demanded.

“Those wyrms. We’re going to drop absolutely everything we have onto them.”

Crack. Sam saw the flash of dragonfire two hundred feet away. To the west, this time. The wyrms were moving across the Wall, taking potshots upwards. They went east to west, and now they were coming back around.

More and more men and women were pushing up the stairs – a supply chain to ferry up manpower. Coils of rope were taut as they pulled heavy objects up the Wall.

“Axes on the ground,” Bedwyck ordered after the briefest thought. “We break apart the ice across there, we push it off with spears. Wait until they are underneath us, we drop a big chunk of the Wall onto them.”

“Do it.” The ice was already sagging, the Wall was already falling apart from the bottom upwards. We need ropes and we need pickaxes, need bridges to hold the platforms together. The Others think us helpless against the wyrms, we must prove them wrong…

Three men managed to carry up the anvil from Donal Noye’s old forge, strapping it to a heavy chunk of timber to form a giant pickaxe. They hacked an entire watchtower apart for it to be swung from. A second scythe, a makeshift one.

Another great crash – a breath of dragonfire that sent an entire mangonel flying upwards. Sam’s head turned blank, visions blurring…

Anything that could be dropped, swung, or launched, Sam ordered.

The scythe. The chain was hanging off the Wall, but then it was anchored into a big chunk of ice at the back of the Wall. Crack the ice apart, Sam remembered shouting. On the signal – break it apart at the anchor, get ready to drop it again.

Drop the entire Wall on them, if we have to.

Beneath them, they heard the wyrms roar, coming close with every rumble. The great bonfire was hissing, oil bubbling in dozens of uneven pots.

His head spun in the moment.

At some point, several of Soren Shieldbreaker’s sons arrived from Oakenshield, but everything was moving too fast for Sam to even process it. He couldn’t even order them with his voice, only point them to where it seemed the men needed the most help. Sam remembered gulping down a mouthful of cold rations, while men passed around tankards of ale to keep them brave. The defenders were pulling themselves into formation, more and more arriving up the Wall.

More were rallying around them, screams echoing.

Spurts of dragonfire erupted against the Wall, and all eyes were peeled for the great beasts creeping forward. Like ants trying to dam a flood, but they were still building.

It was past noon, but Sam lost all sense of time. The panic was so thick he felt crazed.

Crack. He felt the shake as it hit the ice. The wyrm was getting closer, climbing up again. The bonfire was like a challenge to them, a beacon. Here we are – come on, try to put us out.

Sam could feel it. He could feel the rumble as it clambered upwards. The sputtering of arrows bounced off its scales, uselessly. There was crash of stonethrowers, of ballista being loaded. Desperate men were grabbing burning chunks out of the bonfire with their bare hands, to hurl the fire downwards.

Behind him, there was the rumble of a huge drum, groaning against the ice. It took three dozen men to push a huge wooden drum filled with ice across the ice. Sam hadn’t ordered them to do it, but it was a good idea. He recognised it; it was the huge wooden barrel that once held the latrine overflow atop the Wall.

Crunch. The wyrm was coming closer. Sam was running. Men were rushing, still trying to load up the drum with stones, ice and rubble as it groaned across the trenches.

“Ready! Ready!” Bedwyck bellowed. “Hold… hold!”

It was nearly up. The wyrm was fifty feet from the top of the Wall, squirming with every push. The men were heaving, struggling to drag the drum over the shattered ice drifts. “Hold! Hold!”

It took teams of men to yank the drum across the ice, desperately trying to roll it over the uneven ground.

Is it going to miss? Are we in position? There was no time to check, no time for anything. The wyrm was nearly up, the precipice cleaving away. The roar filled the sky.

Sam watched with his heart in his mouth as men poured oil over the drum, and lit it on fire.

Beneath them, the blue swelled, ready to burst… “Now, now! Drop!” Sam screamed. “Release!”

Axes hacked the ropes apart, and the burning drum shuttered. It groaned against the ice, starting to role…

Sam was already running. The blast of cold was bursting up, the drum was falling.

The flaming drum toppled straight off the precipice. It bounced off the Wall and crashed downwards with a solid thump. Straight into the wyrm’s head.
Ice groaned, the beast staggering. Sam didn’t dare enough look, but he heard the impact. The wyrm roared as it finally lost its grip. It seemed to fall downwards in slow motion, its long body peeling backwards off the Wall.

It dropped several hundred feet and landed with an earth-shattering crash. Even from atop, Sam felt the impact.

Men screamed. We hit it, we hit it.

“Is it down?” Macne demanded. “Is it down?”

Sam risked a glance downwards. The drum had bounced off its skull, but he couldn’t see any real damage. It was flailing in the snow, but it was whole. It’s a wight, he thought numbly. It’s already dead – it’s as hard to kill as any other wight.

The other wyrm twisted upwards, trying to breathe. Men were running for cover, trying to flee from the edge.

“Prepare the next drum!” a man ordered. “Ready the next one!”

“More flames!” Sam shouted. “More weight and more flames!”

Sam could see yet another wyrm breaking from the ground. The fourth wyrm – it was smaller too, with only two stubby horns.

He suddenly thought of a family unit. A family of ice dragons; was that a pack, a drove? A den? A mother and a father, and three children; there were two big wyrm, and three smaller ones. When they had been alive, this might have been a family. These beasts might have been magnificent, before the Others touched them.

But now they were just rotting monsters, siege weapons against the Wall.

The defence atop the Wall was attracting more attention. The monsters had already gouged out a giant gash through the base, but still the Night’s Watch were dropping stones and debris. The bonfire was attracting attention.

That’s right, Sam could have screamed. That’s right, focus on us.

The Others didn’t like defiance, and yet the flames were growing like a burning beacon.

He saw them shuffling. Arrows and burning hunks of rock were launching off the edge, splashing into the snow against the regiments of wights. Smoke and steam hissed beneath him, the fire raging against the snow.

Suddenly, the big one lunged upwards. It crashed against the Wall, shoving its way up. It had horns – five great horns protruding backwards from its skull, and one horn snapped off. The males perhaps? Sam wondered vaguely. The males had horns, but the females didn’t?

And then icefire blazed, and Sam’s head went blank.

There were three of them, all attacking upwards all at once. The big one was going straight for the bonfire.

Men were already dropping lumps of flaming rubble. Flaming arrows scattered off its hide.

A wave of ice swallowed the cry. The stink of rotting flesh was noxious.

Scorpions thunked, but he heard iron bolts bouncing off its thick scales. Its mouth was outstretched, jaws wide enough to swallow a mammoth. Like staring down into the darkest pits of the seven hells. “Ready the scythe, ready the–”

Men scattered. Sam was running, and then the edge of the Wall seared back another twenty feet under an immense breath.

“Where’s the scythe, the scythe?” someone screamed. “Drop it, drop it!”

It wasn’t working, Sam realised in horror. The chain of the scythe had jammed with ice, they couldn’t hack it free. Sam saw men with axes and swords, slashing frantically to break the ice off the solid metal links.

The giant tumbled through the trenches. Three hundred foot away one of the smaller wyrms slid off the ice, but the big one was still coming for them. The wyrm was climbing, roaring…

Boom. A geyser of frost nearly swallowed them all, and the world went white.

He heard the hoarse gasp of its breath, like a whale with sore throat. The ice beneath him was shivering, straining…

The great rotten snout was breaking over the precipice. Sam could only stare with horrified eyes. His mind was overwhelmed by horror.

It was barely twenty feet away from him, an immense wall of flesh rising upwards. As large as a castle. Dead muscles were writhing. It was trying to twist its gigantic head around the edge, trying to breathe outwards.

Men tried to lunge at scales with spears, but they might as well have been fleas against a beast that big. A littering of arrows were jammed in between ice and mouldy flesh. Coarse scales were shredding against the Wall, grinding the ice away.

Black wings rustled around him. Birds, Sam realised dumbly. Birds were flapping, trying to peck at the wyrm’s bright blue eyes. Even its pupils were as large as cauldrons.

Its mouth opened. Sam saw blue light rising to swallow them…

“Wun Wun!” a cry screamed, and suddenly the giant was there, slamming forward. The giant had a barrel in its hands, throwing it straight into outstretched jaws. “WUN WUN!”

Wood snapped apart. Lamp oil splattered. Sam saw another man throw a burning torch, fire hissing through the air Flames gushed. The wyrm staggered, twisting, and the giant roared. Wun Wun was tackling the wyrm, trying to push it backwards. Fire was hissing from rotten jaws, burning through dead flesh. The wyrm’s grip was slipping, tearing apart the ice beneath it.

“Now!” a man screamed. “Now!”

An iron chain chunked. A solid chunk of iron clattered around him, snapping against the wyrm. Ice torn upwards, swinging like the world’s largest sledgehammer.

Sam could only stare, mouth agape.

Red and blue fire wrestled against each other, and the ice was breaking away.

The wyrm was falling backwards.

“Drop the flames! Drop the flames!”

Men were surging forwards, pushing blazing chunks of the bonfire. They used shields like rams, shoving the bonfire forward. Even as men were set alight and screamed in agony, they pushed the fire back…

Brave men, sacrificing themselves for a single push.

Burning debris scattered over the edge and into the ice. Great plumes of smoke and steam, ice and fire dancing.

The world was burning, freezing.

Sam couldn’t, couldn’t…

Its head, he thought numbly. The wyrm’s head was alight. They were weak to fire, but their ice breath simply made it so much harder for them to burn.

Sam heard the resounding crack as it fell. It was so loud, so much force, it felt like his was skull was going to split…

“It’s down!” a voice was screaming. That is my voice, Sam realised vaguely. “Drop everything, drop everything!”

It was on fire. The big one had lost half its head when it fell.

The men howled in pure, desperate emotion.

Wyrms thrashing below. More and more were breaking out of the ground, their bodies churning. The big one was ablaze, writhing as if in its death throws. Icefire sputtered from its jaws, but it could not extinguish the flames crawling up its head. The fire was chewing away through dead flesh.

It writhed, and crashed. Headbutting the ice.

Sam felt the crunch. Felt the Wall shudder, and tear…

He was running, and the cracks were spreading beneath his feet. Behind him, a dozen men wearing black cloaks were swallowed by white.

The ice was cleaving – a chunk of ice the size of a castle falling backwards. The Wall was tumbling apart.

---

Jon
He could see the Wall. The weak sun was rising over the horizon, fragile rays of lights spilling through the snows in the sky. Jon pushed across the frozen banks of the Last River and into the Gift, and they saw the shadows of Castle Black splopping against the white of the Wall.

Ahead of him, their vanguard was clashing with wights on the snowdrift. Sigorn of Thenn was leading the vanguard, five hundred warriors pushing through the blockade on the kingsroad, yet there were wights in every corner. Even in the very early hours of the dawn, Malvern’s forces were still trying to push them back.

And the ground is shaking, Jon thought grimly. Most of the men hadn’t noticed it yet, but the mammoths had. At first it had only been faint rumbles through the earth, but they kept growing stronger as his army marched further north. The tremors were rising in pitch, growing louder and louder.

Jon felt the clenching in his gut. The strangely repetitive booms had the feel of war. The trembles made him think of Sonagon. The dragon could shake the earth when he grew angry enough. It felt like there was something larger than Sonagon on the far side of the Wall, looming in the distance.

The mammoth was pacing through the snow, shaggy ears flapping. Jon was in his mammoth’s skin, and every instinct the beast had was screaming at him to run. To run south. To run anywhere but where they were heading. Somewhere in the mammoth’s mind, alarm bells were ringing – an ancient instinct. It felt like there was a natural disaster coming.

We must reach Castle Black, he thought, and quickly. The wights were doing everything they could to stop them.

He saw the shapes of bodies across the fields, blocking off the kingsroad. The wights were nearly buried in the white, but they were moving with purpose.

Jon raised his sword, crying a wordless war cry to signal the charge.

The horns of a thousand soldiers echoed behind him. The army was surging across the snows, with a line of mammoths and giants ploughing the way forward. Clansmen and northern lords, wildlings, wargs and giants.

“Push through!” Jon screamed. “Push through!”

He was met by a tremendous boom, the war cries of half a dozen languages melding together. The shouts of a thousand men, the cries of hundreds of giants, the booms of mammoths – a legion of boots thumping.

Sigorn was leading their front and Rattleshirt commanded the flank, but Jon sat towards the rear. Malvern was all too fond of ambushes and surprise assaults, and Jon had to be constantly ready to respond in any direction.

The fields of snow were blanketed in men and beasts. It was less a battle and more a prolonged skirmish. The relief force had made steady progress hacking down every wight they found.

Still, Jon heard the horns blowing, he saw the front ranks rippling. Thenns were screaming, auroch horns echoing across the field, as they had half a hundred times in the battle up the kingsroad. And then, without warning, the tide of the battle changed.

Jon was already urging his mammoth forward towards the thick of the fighting. A guard of Thenn warriors surrounded him, each one wielding bone longbows and obsidian arrows.
“Your Grace!” a short, heavyset man in hauberk cried to him. Jon recognised him; Andrik Knott, the eldest son of Clan Knott. “It’s the dead, they’re…”

The words were swallowed by the blast of a horn, but Jon could see. The blockades across the road were breaking apart. They’re retreating, Jon almost thought, but then he frowned. The wights weren’t retreating at all. They were just… dropping.

All around him, the battle was withering away. The sounds of frenzied fighting were falling away into confusion. Bodies were falling like rag dolls being dropped.

Jon needed to climb down from his mammoth to see; all around him men were huddled or gaping. There were wights in the snow, but they were just standing still. Weapons dropped out of their hands. Where once they had moved with purpose and coordination, now it was like they were broken. Jon saw dead bodies shuffling aimlessly, even as free folk brought axes to their heads.

“What happened?” Sigorn shouted to Jon. There was blood across the Lord of Thenn’s tattoos, and four gashes over his cheek where rotting fingernails had clawed at him. “What happened to them?”

Jon couldn’t reply. The giant Leg Lun snatched a wight up from the snow, holding it in the air and bellowing at it, but the dead body just sagged.

Their eyes, Jon realised. The blue had disappeared from their gazes.

He saw one body that was still walking – an old man with grey eyes was shuffling through the snow in circles. It looked like the wight was trying to say something, but half his jaw was dangling from his skull.

Jon couldn’t feel the tingling on his skin. Normally, he could sense the white walkers from the chill in the air that caused his hairs to stand on end, but now he felt nothing from the wights. Their gazes were empty. Malvern, he thought. Malvern is gone.

“Somebody killed the white walker,” Jon muttered, before turning to the men. “Where is it? Where?”

All around him, the soldiers looked uncertain. Nobody had seen it – Malvern must have died somewhere else on the battlefield. Perhaps there should have been a victory cry, but it was all so sudden and so abrupt.

Jon’s gaze turned towards Castle Black. Another tremor sent birds exploding from the nearby trees. Men were starting to mutter now. Jon saw one bat that seemed to be going mad, flapping and shrieking across the snowy plains.

“Castle Black,” he ordered lowly. “We must reach Castle Black. Now.”

“We are still half a day’s march away, Your Grace,” a Mollen bannerman warned him.

“Then march faster.” Jon was already kicking the mammoth into motion, the beast trumpeting to call attention. “Get the men into formation, we need to reach the Wall!”

All around him, all the eyes were grim and fatigued. They had slept for barely hours last night, only forced to stop when exhaustion made the mammoths collapse. The wights had been harrying them for the last day and a half, successfully delaying the relief force from reaching the Wall. And now they just stop?

The men were exhausted; they had been fighting tooth and nail for every step they took. The dead had been assaulting them at every corner, holding Jon’s forces back along the kingsroad. Jon’s host had passed through the village of Creston, which had been slaughtered in the white walker’s wake. Every single man, woman and child had been massacred with frightening speed, but not a single body left behind.

In a matter of days, the dead had ransacked half a hundred villages from Winterfell to the Wall.

The horde of wights had been merciless.

The relief force now stood at several thousand strong, but there was no time to count them. More were joining up every hour – from petty lords pursuing the wights, to smallfolk seeking aid with the host of men. Jon had met up with mountain clan forces from the hills and also with Shadow Tower forces on the kingsroad, as well as dozens of petty lords that rallied quickly to stop the slaughter. Jon’s banner was flying high, rallying all the forces for leagues around them. Malvern’s army forced them all to flock towards him.

The dead had already devastated these lands, they were all left shaken and scared. Malvern had caught them all off-guard. Within three days, Jon thought. A single white walker can do so much damage within three days?

Perhaps it was ironic; clans Knott, Liddle and Harclay had all abandoned Jon’s cause, but now they were fighting beside him. Their lands had been terrorised by the plague of bodies, and right now Stark, Bolton or Snow didn’t matter. They were all against the dead.

“Snow!” Rattleshirt called to him, eyes scowling beneath the bloody giant skull helm. “Now, maybe my eyes are just playing tricks, but do you see that castle over there?”

He was pointing towards Castle Black. “What is it, Rattleshirt?”

“I’m pretty sure that it used to have more towers than that, Snow.”

Jon turned and started. It was distant, but they could see the shadows of the castle’s spires. He’s right, Jon realised. Castle Black was missing towers; entire structures must have collapsed. The Lance, Jon realised after a pause. The Lance had been the tallest and slimmest tower, standing at a third the height of the Wall, but now it had vanished from Castle Black’s silhouette.

Jon urged his mammoth to go a little bit faster.

Wights were still littering the snowdrifts aimlessly, and men hacked them down by the hundreds. They were left as mindless, lurking bodies – a few of them still moving, most dropping still. Still, Jon’s focus was on the Wall, and what lay behind it. There was a sinking feeling in his gut.

“Forget the wights!” Jon snapped. “Push through! Push through!”

All around him, the giants were staggering, the mammoths were tiring too. Jon didn’t dare push them into another fast march, but he couldn’t slow either.

The other mammoths were shaking, but Jon warged into his mount and he used him to keep the herd together. His was a great, heavy bull mammoth, with thick blackish fur and a single broken tusk that had snapped off against the wight bear. The giant that used to own him had fallen in the woods, but now the mammoth responded to Jon’s presence easily. Scratches and shallow wounds littered its hide, but it was strong. Jon needed to think of a name.

“Get the ranks into line,” Jon ordered to his haggle of war chiefs and warriors after a while. “Gather the freshest of our men, and the horses. Anyone that can make good time.”
“Fuck, Snow,” Rattleshirt grumbled. “Nobody in this lot is fresh. What the fuck are we facing at the Wall?”

“I do not know,” Jon admitted grimly. “But we must reach the Wall before nightfall.”

 Thankfully, the snows were calming, and visibility improved. In the distance, they saw a thick plume of smoke rising from atop the Wall. A large fire was burning. A signal fire? Jon wondered. A flare?

 They were marching through the Gift when they felt the Wall shudder. No mistaking it this time. Horses were neighing, giants crying. The tremors in the earth were growing louder, threatening to crack.

 And then he heard the howl of a direwolf in the distance, and moments later their spotters were shouting. The Wall was ahead of them; a mountain that seemed as white as a mirror in the south sun.

 And they saw the mirror crack. Every man was gaping upwards in absolute horror.

 A great chunk of ice was falling down from the Wall, slowly creaking its way onto the fields outside Castle Black.

 Crash. Even leagues away, they felt the shudder as the ice collided. Mammoths screamed.

 “… Bugger me…” Jon heard Rattleshirt whisper, his face bone white. Warriors were shouting, panicked cries in the Old Tongue.

 He could see the crack. There was a chink in the Wall. It looked small, but this was from a distance of leagues. Jon could hardly imagine how many thousands of tons of ice had just fallen apart.

 It was like someone had brought a hammer to it.

 He could feel the blows in the earth, growing in pitch, as a sledgehammer tore the Wall apart from the other side.

 “Faster,” Jon whispered, before raising his voice. “Fast march, now.”

 “What the hells did that—” the Lord of Bones snapped.

 “Do you think Malvern was bad?” Jon challenged, shouting down from his mammoth. “If that Wall falls, we must deal with worse. A lot worse. We stop it. Now.”

 Men were charging, northern cavalry pushing through the snowdrifts. Jon’s hands were shaking, but he couldn’t let anyone see how badly. His breaths were hoarse, and the sight of that notch across the Wall…

 He thought of Sam, Mance, Grenn, Edd, Pyp, Halder, Albett, Jake. Everyone he had once called brother. Castle Black… that was where it had all begun. Jon couldn’t let it end there too.

 They were marching towards the Wall. Jon was at the very front, with Sigorn of Thenn to his right and Rattleshirt to his left. Ahead of them, they came upon fields of women and children trying to push through the snowdrifts, trying to flee. Likely there were deserters among them too. They screamed and cowered as the relief force came storming through, but Jon’s focus was on Castle Black.
Above him, the smoke was growing thicker and thicker. An immense fire was blazing atop the Wall.

The castle was in an uproar. There were more corpses – more mindless wights being unceremoniously hacked down. He saw signs of a battle that were already being smothered by the snows. The white made everything look clean, but there were abandoned barricades in disarray, and frozen bloody smears across the white.

There were only very few archers poised on the Tower of the Guards as they approached, but horns echoed on Jon’s arrival. He urged his mammoth through the shattered gates, and then he was amidst a field of corpses.

Castle Black. In his gut, looking around the devastated castle, it felt like they were too late.

Jon was already shouting orders. “Support the black brothers!” he ordered to his men. “Hold the Wall!”

The Wall, Jon noticed. It looked like the thick of the fighting was happening atop the Wall. Black cloaks were crawling across the stairs like ants, even despite the cracks that were spreading downwards. The Wall was tearing itself apart, crushing the stairs and the wooden structures around it.

With a single thought, Jon’s mammoth lowered himself to his knees so that Jon could leap down from it. He had sword drawn, frantically looking around the courtyard for who was in charge. Men were rushing around him, but if there was an order then Jon couldn’t see it. There were unfamiliar scared faces, and black cloaks rushing frantically.

Where is Sam? Where is Mance?

Then, Jon saw Edd trying to shuffle the refugees away to safety. There was a wounded boy in the steward’s hands, a child with green eyes mumbling incoherently. “Get the barracks clear!” Edd shouted. “Get them out of here!”

“Edd!” Jon called, as his warriors filled the yards. “Where are they attacking from, how many do they have?”

Edd’s eyes stared at Jon with utter shock. There wasn’t relief on his face, Jon noticed, just fear. “The dragon,” Edd stammered, looking around. “Where’s the dragon?”

Not here. Sonagon is too weak to fly. Jon just grimaced, pushing Edd to one side. Another man gruffly took the wounded boy from his arms. “How many are there,” Jon demanded. “What do they have?”

“I don’t know!” Edd snapped. Above him, another immense block of ice was slipping down, groaning as it shattered. Like nails grinding against bone. “If there was ever a bloody time that we need the dragon, Jon!”

“Take cover!” a voice shrieked. “Take cover!”

A great lump of ice collided and shattered into a thousand crystals – lumps of debris bouncing off the stone towers. The whole world was swallowed by white. A cloud of snow and dust hissed over Castle Black.

“What is happening?” Jon screamed. “How are the Others doing this, what weapon do they have?”
“It’s… I don’t know – I don’t – but something Sam said, a wight talked…” Edd spurted through wheezy breaths. “Wyrms. Wyrms, digging up…”

There was a rumble, louder and closer than ever before. It sounded like a roar.

Coming from inside the Wall. It was under the ground, Jon realised. Wyrms. Wyrms?

Another block of ice fell, as large as a horse. It crashed straight through the Grey Keep, tearing apart the Wall. Around him, ravens were growing mad; their cages broken apart and the birds left squawking madly.

“This castle is lost!” the Lord of Bones shouted, grabbing Jon’s shoulder. “If another big chunk falls, this whole place is squashed.”

He was right, Jon knew. They needed to evacuate, to get clear, and yet…

“The Wall – how many are up there?” Jon demanded, but Edd could only shake his head. The steward was struggling to breathe, coughing through the icy mist filling the air.

Jon turned and stared up. There were still sworn brothers holding the Wall. They are brave men, Jon thought, still standing strong, even atop the quaking Wall.

There were monsters tunnelling, tearing up the foundations. Bit by bit, the Wall was collapsing.

All around him, men were caught by panic. Jon hesitated for barely a heartbeat. “Get in formation!” Jon boomed. “Hold the castle, reinforce the –”

The Wall shuddered, a great block of ice was toppling, groaning. It sounded like the ice itself was screaming.

Crash. The King’s Tower was shattered by a boulder of ice the size of a farmhouse. Debris rained – over the gates, rubble falling across the wooden stair up the Wall. Jon saw one man cut down as a lump of stone crashed through his head.

“Take cover!” Sigorn was howling. “Take cover!”

There were bodies pouring out of the lower levels, still trying to flee. All around him, the earth was quaking – they could feel it tearing apart. Scared men, running mad in the rumbling snow. Jon’s relief force was swarming across the fields, trying to pull the refugees to safety.

Jon ordered runners to make for Queensgate and Oakenshield, while the rest needed to get into formation, to prepare defensive lines. They needed formation, they needed to hold against the seven hells themselves.

They were staring up at the staircase up the Wall, watching it crack apart. Glacial blocks of ice grated against each other, the stairs torn away into splinters. In all likelihood, the men set to climb the Wall wouldn’t even make it halfway. The men atop the Wall are trapped up there.

Even if we drive the Others back, how long will it take to rebuild, to refortify here? Jon wondered. He was watching the greatest wonder built by man collapse in on itself. The work of millennia, crumbling.

“We need help,” Edd sputtered, through a coughing fit. “We need more than this… we need…”

“You got me,” Jon replied stiffly.
“Well, nothing against you, Jon,” the steward replied. “But we’ve been kinda holding out for the flying, ice-breathing kind of help.”

Yes, Jon did not doubt it. Jon had been calling out for Sonagon constantly, but the dragon was too weak to even move. It felt like there was tar clotting up the dragon’s limbs, sickness infusing every muscle. He could not even guess if or when Sonagon would recover. Jon had no more time to spare waiting on a saviour that wasn’t coming.

“Snow!” Rattleshirt barked at him. “What’s the plan here, what the hell are we supposed to fight?”

“Hold the castle, get those people to safety!” Jon snapped. “We push back against whatever they throw at us!”

“Snow, the Wall – THE WALL! – is falling –!”

“Prepare for a controlled retreat, Rattleshirt!” Jon nearly shrieked. “But get the people clear!” He took a deep breath and turned towards Sigorn. “Sigorn, ready our elite. We take the fight to them,” Jon said finally. “Ready any that are strong enough, we’re going through the Wall.”

“Fight against what?” Sigorn cried.

“The Others. It’s the only way to beat them – they want us to fall back, we push forward.” Jon turned around them. There was no time for fear, no moment for doubt… “Only the best of our forces, each armed with obsidian – form up, follow me. We push north and we hurt them. We target the walkers.”

Around him, Edd gaped. The Wall shuddered again. Vaguely, Jon wondered how many would be brave enough to charge through something like that. I will have to lead from the front – it’s the only way that anyone will follow.

“You can’t,” Edd gasped suddenly, hand on Jon’s shoulder. “The tunnel… the tunnel is collapsed.”

What? Jon might have cursed. “Is there another way through?”

“Well not right now!” Edd squealed, flailing in panic towards the collapsing Wall. “But wait another hour and you might have more luck!”

Jon looked frantically to the far end of Castle Black’s training yard, where the portcullis to the ice tunnel lay twisted and broken. The tunnel was collapsed. It was too dangerous to climb the stairs, and there was no way to get across the Wall. We are sitting ducks like this.

The stairs. Jon could see the stairs up the Wall – and they were falling to pieces. The platform of the lift had snapped off, the timbers splintering apart. Chunks of wood were falling down. There was no way up or down, no way through…

Whatever weapon was coming, it was big. Jon’s head was swimming with possibilities, trying to imagine a battleplan. They needed to push through – to rally and turn the Other’s strengths against them. Push a dagger into the Other’s forces, maybe buy some time…

If there was an army of wights waiting on the other side of the Wall, Jon knew how to handle that. He didn’t know how to handle whatever was breaking through. He felt lost, frantic in apprehension.

Jon pushed his way through the frantic bodies, and into the courtyard. The tunnel was collapsed, and the Wall cracking.
Behind him, what remained of the King’s Tower was collapsing in on itself, falling into rumble. Jon heard Sigorn howling some war cry, he heard giants struggling to control mammoths that were going mad. Horses were galloping, lost in mindless panic.

Another roar. Coming closer and closer, breaking through the earth.

Above him, smoke and fire hissed against snow. Jon could feel the chill in the air, the cold creeping through.

Jon was screaming orders, but his voice was drowned out by the earth-shattering groan of ice slicing against ice. The Wall was screaming, huge chunks grating together.

He gasped as he felt the dying howl of the Wall.

A tingle ran down his spine, Jon could feel it. He could feel the presence of the white walker’s oozing into the world. Unnatural power was seeping through the cracks, like water pushing through a dam. The Others were pushing through, faster and faster.

The barrier. The Wall was broken, the barrier was torn.

All around him, it felt like men were going mad.

Jon had never imagined the feeling – to be staring upwards as the whole world was tumbling down.

“Hold the line!” Jon screamed. “We hold the line!

A thud rocked the earth, and it was coming from beneath his feet. Men had already broken ranks, sprinting away as fast as scared legs could take them.

Jon was left frozen in the spot, in the middle of a devastated castle, watching the world end around him…

His heart was beating so fast he couldn’t feel it.

Thud. Another dull thump, of earth being torn apart. It was beneath him. It’s in the wormwalks, Jon realised. It’s through the Wall…

Crash.

Jon remembered that moment he had first seen Sonagon, that moment where his whole sense of scale had been crushed.

The earth was screaming, shrieking apart. A flash of blue flames, and a wave of cold…

The Shieldhall exploded.

Dark stone shattered everywhere, the old feast hall broke apart from the ground up. The oldest building on the castle, collapsing into splinters.

Old rotten timbers ripped apart like wet parchment – and Jon even saw the colours flashing through the air. Hundreds of shields of ancient knights, a fountain of heraldry and chipped paint. There were hawks and eagles, dragons and griffins, suns and stags, wolves and wyverns, manticores, bulls, trees and flowers, harps, spears, crabs and krakens, red lions and golden lions and chequy lions, owls, lambs, maids and mermen, stallions, stars, buckets and buckles, flayed men and hanged men and burning men, axes, longswords, turtles, unicorns, bears, quills, spiders and snakes and scorpions, and a hundred other heraldic charges that had adorned the Shieldhall walls, blazoned in more colours than any rainbow ever dreamed of. They were all scattered and raining down across Castle Black.

Jon was nearly beheaded by a broken red and black shield that bounced off the wall by his head. Every man nearly fell to their knees.

He saw the light. Blue light flashed, and a wave of cold and mist–

Jon was running. He heard the crackle of debris as an immense body broke out of the earth, but he couldn’t see it. There was only dust and snow, panic and death…

It roared, and then Jon saw it.

Jon was staring upwards. A dragon. A dragon.

A dead dragon.

A monster was snaking out of the wreckage of the Shieldhall; its jaws open wide, black teeth snapping. Teeth like daggers, a gape that could swallow a man whole.

Grey flesh and a long, muscular body – swaying side to side as it pushed itself forward. It had scales and a dragon’s jaw, but it moved like some worm or snake. It was hornless, wingless, but with a crest of jagged spines running down its back.

It was long – long enough to stretch across the broken building, with its tail still trapped from where it had emerged. The beast was snapping, struggling to pull itself upwards.

It had a long, thick and flat tail like an eel’s that sent a wave of debris flying with a casual swipe.

Another dozen men died, just like that. Jon’s head was blank, struggling to understand…

A wyrm. He was staring up at a wyrm.

Its jaws, he realised. Its neck was gouged open, like its throat had been mauled. It must have died when huge teeth tore it apart. Jon could see the flesh hanging off its skull, he could see blue fire pulsing inside its throat.

The air was deafening. Jon couldn’t even make out the screams, they were swallowed in the moment. His head was spinning, sword trembling so madly it could have fallen out of his hand…

Bowstrings snapped. Arrows flickered overhead, shafts stabbing into rotten scales, and the beast’s head twisted. Jon recognised the movement; it reminded him of how Sonagon would pull back its head just before…

“Scatter!” Jon screamed, already running. “Scatter, take cover!”

The wyrm breathed.

He dived face first to the snow, but he still felt the cold scour against his back. Icy breath and a noxious stink of rot.
Jon saw a giant raise its club, only to be flash-frozen, scoured into icy shards under the force of its breath. The smell – the blast of cold air was so noxious that Jon could barely breathe. A smell so heavy that it coated his tongue, tasting of death.

There was a groan behind him, as the frostfire tore away the stones of the Tower of the Guard. The whole structure was screaming, falling apart with a bone-rattling crunch. Tower after tower, building after building was collapsing around him, being knocked down like dominoes.

Castle Black was being torn apart.

The wyrm was snaking away, coiling through the ruins of the castle. There was nothing but mad, frenzied panic. Jon had Dark Sister in his hand, pushing himself to his feet. He was already running, loping unevenly through the snows.

There was only one choice, only one thought that Jon allowed himself to think. Fight, resist.

“Avoid its breath!” Jon bellowed. “Surround it! Scatter, assault from all sides!

“Snow, we mus–!” Rattleshirt tried to protest.

“Surround it!” Jon snapped. “We need fire, we need torches. There’s a delay between breaths – wait until it recoils, then go for eyes and the throat.”

Men looked dazed, but Jon could give them no chance to panic. They needed to fight, needed to resist. “On me!” he screamed at the top of his lungs, raising Dark Sister. “On me!”

The wyrm was twisting around the keep, lashing out with sharp jaws and lightning fast lunges. The lack of wings was a disadvantage, but the wyrm was strong and agile. It was very different from Sonagon, but Jon could still recognise the similarities. There was something in how it moved – it was reptilian, fierce and aggressive.

A single breath could kill him in an instant. Will not die, Jon thought. He repeated the words like a mantra, thinking them over and over until he believed them. Will not die.

Another breath of blue cold scoured through the edge of the keep, but Jon was ready for it this time. It was twisting, spinning in a semi-circle to scour the courtyard white.

Two dozen men died, but then there were more readying flaming arrows, taking position in between lumps of the rubble. He heard Sigorn rallying his Thenns, warriors charging like zealots. Jon saw men wielding flaming torches, swinging them like slingshots.

“Now!” Jon screamed. “Fire!”

Flames hissed through the snow; a barrage of arrows that was weak at first, then strengthened as more men rallied.

Flaming arrows thudded into scales. It doesn’t notice, Jon observed, as he followed the battle. The wyrm had the same weakness as any wight; it was unfeeling, which meant its reflexes were very poor. Sonagon would have reacted to the pain with berserk rage, but this wyrm just twisted away.

Around him, a giant garbed in patchwork leathers roared through the snow, swinging a hefty wooden log as a club. The giant was crazed, swinging the log like a beast, but then the wyrm snapped the giant apart in a flash of teeth.

A single sharp lunge, then it jerked its head to send half the giant’s body soaring through the air. A single bite spilt the giant into two – the lower half dropping to the ground, and the upper torso splattering off the Flint Barracks.

Spearmen were rushing up the burnt top of the Lord Commander’s Tower, hurling spears down at the wyrm’s body. Not sharp enough, Jon cursed. It was too big, its scales too tough – spears couldn’t pierce it deep enough. We need heavy scorpions, we need more…

Flames flashed – men were swinging lanterns like slingshots.

More fire. The fire was working – even a small flame would set a wight alight.

Jon could see the flames flickering and hissing across its rotten hide, but then there was a breath of cold air from its throat. The wyrm twisted around in a strangely circular motion, like it was trying to swallow its own tail, as it spat out jets of icefire across its grey scales. Polluted ice smeared across its own body, snuffing out the flames.

It can use its own ice breath to stop itself from burning, Jon realised. Its long body was crackling with ice.

The wyrm’s tail rippled, muscles tensing. Jon saw the way it recoiled, he knew that movement well…

“Take cover!” Jon screamed, a heartbeat before anyone else.

Crash. Rubble scattered overhead, the beast’s tail whipping straight through an outhouse. Jon dived downwards, but the men behind him were too slow.

The debris scattered like it had been launched from a catapult – stones fast enough to split skulls, splinters like swords. Jon was on the ground, feeling the death raining above him. Against a monster like this, there was no space for error. To be in the wrong position was to die in a heartbeat. How many times can I dodge death? Jon wondered faintly.

He stared upwards, watching the wyrm thrash. Just a few more, he decided. A few more.

“Surround it!” Jon boomed. “More fire, more fire!”

Jon couldn’t pause, he had to get closer. The bigger the beast, the more vulnerable they were up close. A dragon needed space to turn, distance over which to breathe.

We can handle it. It was a monster, but they could harry it, hunt it. They could surround it with archers, exploit its weak spots. Jon was familiar enough with dragons to know their vulnerabilities.

It’s not as big as Sonagon, Jon thought. It seemed barely a third of Sonagon’s size – around fifty feet from head to tail. We can kill it, we can burn it. We can beat it.

It would likely cost him hundreds, perhaps thousands, of men to bring the wyrm low, but that was nothing compared to the damage it would wreak otherwise.

And then he heard another rumble, and Jon realised that the Others had more than one. This was the first wave.

The wyrm was snaking away – taking shelter behind the timbered keep to avoid the bowmen. Men were running for shelter into the vaults, or taking cover in the armoury. Jon was already pounding up the stairs, chasing after it. Even despite its size it was surprisingly swift, hardly even using its stubby legs to move. It moved with its tail and its stomach instead.
“Bowmen on me!” he screamed. “On me, on m–”

His voice was cut off by the tingling on his neck. He knew that feeling, he knew the Other’s touch. Behind me.

Jon spun around, Dark Sister flashing – just as the white shape lunged upwards at him.

His blade cut straight through an ice spider’s abdomen, but the force of the creature still knocked him backwards. Jon stumbled, but he still managed to hold Dark Sister straight.

Around him, the shadows were stirring, and the air was clicking. Blue-eyed beasts were skittering across the ruins.

Ice spiders. Where did they, how did they–?

Across the keep, the wyrm breathed again. The undead monster was scouring through them, but ice spiders lunged from behind.

“Snow!” Sigorn was crying for him, blades flashing. Ice spiders were swarming against them. “Snow!”

The tunnel, Jon realised in horror. The ice spiders followed in the wyrm’s wake, they passed the Wall the same way the wyrm did. They were surging through the rubble of the Shieldhall – crawling out of the tunnel that the wyrm had carved.

Dozens of men were falling, but Jon couldn’t let them run away. It would be slaughter if they turned and ran.

“Single file, swords and spears!” Jon screamed. “Don’t let them surround you, force them back!”

They were everywhere. Some the size of dogs, others the size of horses. Beasts with eight spindly legs, sharp fangs, and blue beady eyes.

Jon was lunging, cutting straight through a spider’s limb. The wound wept white bile, but the spider didn’t even seem to notice. It was hissing, clicking, scuttling forward.

Dark Sister moved on instinct, slicing straight through fangs.

Ice spiders. The wyrms had torn the barrier, there was nothing stopping the Other’s anymore. The ice spiders were flooding through.

First it was ice spiders, soon it would be wights. The more tunnels the Other’s had, the faster they could move their troops across.

“Retreat!” Rattleshirt shrieked. “Retr–”

Jon’s fist took the scrawny man straight to the ground. Rattleshirt spurted as he hit the snow, but Jon could not allow that word to spread. Retreat – was there any word more deadly?

“Belay that!” Jon boomed. “Form up, hold them back, hold position! *Form up!

Men were running. He saw Rattleshirt staring up at him with wide, disbelieving eyes. “Spears on me!” Jon shouted. “They have no armour, no defence – they attack fast but they die fast too. You want to live, you want to survive the night? Then *form up.

Men were reacting, falling back to the lower courtyard. Jon saw men grabbing the scattered shields off the ground, using them to block the lunging ice spiders. Against unarmoured and unarmed men, the ice spiders were pure death – yet a single warrior could hold back a dozen of them so long as he didn’t let them get behind him. The spiders preferred to attack from behind.

Jon was everywhere, Dark Sister flashing through the snows. He had done this before; he had experience fighting these monsters. It was the men around him that had to learn quickly.

The spiders are the white walker’s hounds – they deploy them against fleeing foes, Jon considered. The Others are expecting us to flee.

An ice spider jumped at him, fangs bared. His blade whirled, slicing straight through two legs, but it was still lunging at him. Dark Sister sliced through another leg, and it toppled. It was still trying to claw, even as the black blade pierced straight through its chitinous shell. White ooze gushed from the wound.

Around him, Sigorn of Thenn nearly fell back, but Jon was there to reinforce him. The Lord of Thenn was on the snow, staring up in amazement as Jon roared, cleaving through another spider.

“Single file, do not let them surround us!” Jon boomed. “Hold the courtyard, push them back.”

Across the keep, the wyrm roared. It was twisting back around. It was agile on the snow, but less manoeuvrable through the rubble. In the scattered rubble and debris, there were a hundred nooks and crannies to hide from its breath. The spiders were precision and the wyrm was mass devastation, and the Others were using them both in tandem. Jon had to react to both threats at once, else the other would overwhelm them.

“Archers to the bulwarks!” Jon screamed. “Ready the flames, set it alight!”

Rattleshirt was on his feet – his bone helmet lost somewhere in the battle. The scrawny man looked crazed, clutching his spear with both hands. “Snow!” he howled. “We have to run, we have to –!”

Dark Sister swung at him. Rattleshirt’s eyes widened in horror, his spear trying to lunge, but Jon was faster.

In a single lunge, Jon barrelled through Rattleshirt and sliced down the ice spider less than three feet away from him. The spider hissed in pain, its blue beady eyes were sliced apart, but it was still trying to bite right until a spear from a Thenn pierced straight through it.

Rattleshirt was on the ground, staring up in utter shock at the spider’s corpse. The spider had been less than a heartbeat away from killing him from behind. Jon saved his life.

Jon pulled the man up gruffly, and he had never seen the Lord of Bones so shaken. “Protect your damn flanks,” Jon hissed. “And get these men into formation.”

Cannot run. Cannot die. Not now.

“Hold the line!” he screamed, raising Dark Sister high.

It was mass panic, but others were repeating the cry. They were rallying around Jon. “Hold the line!” Sigorn shouted. “Hold the line!”

Jon heard the cry of a giant roaring the same, crude words bellowing in the Old Tongue. The whole castle was chanting, howling madly.
“Hold the line! Hold the line! Hold the line!”

Across the yards, they felt the roar. The wyrm was twisting around, rumbling closer…

Jon was already running, while clicking spiders scuttled through the snow. “Torches on me! On me!” he screamed. “Burn the Shieldhall down!”

Flames were being thrown – Leg Lun picked up an entire brazier and hurled it into the wreckage. Fires hissed from the demolished building, even as the ice spiders were still scuttling out of it.

It is the tunnel, Jon thought. The wyrm’s tunnel was a chokepoint, the only way through for the spiders. The soldiers quickly caught on to his plan and set the debris alight.

All around the castle, soldiers and sworn brothers were mustering.

_The Others expected us to run_, Jon thought. _They have not fought like this before, not against entrenched men who will not break._

Jon heard another shudder, another building falling apart under the dragon’s breath. It was the Silent Tower this time, collapsing over the infirmary. The wyrm was to the east, breaking through the lichyards and crushing the gravestones of the watch – the wyrm had nearly completed a full circle of the castle. The wyrm was tearing closer and closer, even despite the arrows and spears scattering out the flesh of its head.

It was turning, mist pouring from its jaws, trying to torch the entire army…

Yet the men weren’t backing down, they were fighting tooth and nail. They were clinging on, resisting with everything they had. Every arrow, every spear, every last ounce of desperation.

“Go for the eyes. The eyes!” Jon screamed, but the wyrm could not be stopped. The flaming arrows weren’t strong enough, they couldn’t close. They needed more flames – they needed to hack it apart.

Before he even realised what he was doing, Jon was running. He was running across the bulwarks of the keep, hurdling over the rubble across the merlons, sprinting as fast as his leg could take him up the steps.

Below him, he saw the gaggle of men – still chanting that cry. Giants were hurling chunks of rubble, bouncing off scales. The wyrm’s head lowered, trailing across the snow, preparing to breathe…

“Hold the line! Hold the line! Hold the–”

Blue light swelled in the wyrm’s throat, its throat gagging…

It was below him. There was no thought involved, no conscious decision. Jon just leapt.

He kicked off the battlements with his good leg, and the world spun. He was jumping, falling, straight towards the rotten husk of the wyrm’s skull. For that one moment, the whole world seemed to freeze. It felt so slow that he could count every broken arrow shaft jutting from its flesh, every giant tooth jutting from its jaws…

And then _crash_. Jon landed.

He felt his leg crack, but there was no pain. His heart was beating too fast for pain. His blood was on fire, Jon could feel no pain.

He bounced off sharp, serrated scales, feeling them grind against his chainmail. They didn’t pierce, but they hurt. It felt like colliding against solid, jagged rock.

For one frantic moment, he threatened to tumble – but then groping hands found leverage against the wyrm’s crest. His leg pushed off the wyrm’s spines, holding himself in place.

He remembered the first time he had rode Sonagon; trying to hang on for dear life as the enormous beast thrashed beneath him. The wyrm was smaller than Sonagon, it was easier to grip. Sonagon could swallow a mammoth, this wyrm would struggle to swallow a horse.

And Dark Sister was in his hand. There was no thought involved, Jon just plunged the sword downwards with all his might.

And the black blade stabbed straight through the wyrm’s skin, piercing into its cranium. Valyrian steel – not even dragonbone could stop it.

All around him, people were screaming, and Jon was cutting its head apart. The wyrm didn’t react, like it couldn’t even feel him. Dark Sister was jutting out of its skull – but there was nothing but black, rotten blood oozing out of the wound.

The head is the wrong target, Jon realised too late. Wights didn’t need their skull – the undead could even move headless.

The spine, I need to sever the spine.

The wyrm jerked, and Jon threatened to fall. He was holding onto Dark Sister for leverage, but his legs lost their perch. He was dangling, swinging across the wyrm’s skull.

Finally, the blue reptilian eyes noticed that he was up there.

The head twisted. The world spun. Jaws snapped, trying to bite Jon’s feet off. He was writhing, clambering for leverage against jagged scales.

All around him, birds were flapping. Black wings were everywhere, clawing at blue eyes.

The wyrm was rising, rearing its head. Jon flailed like a rag doll, but that was all he needed for his legs to find a perch. Jon was gripping its scales and lunging backwards.

He heard the arrows twang around him. The men – taking advantage of the distraction, launching flaming shafts through the air. Jon twisted around, and stabbed downwards.

The black blade spilt through rotten flesh.

The wyrm was thrashing blindly, with Dark Sister piercing through the nape of its neck and Jon holding on with everything he had. He felt his sword jar, jamming straight through its spine. Dragonbones grating against Valyrian steel, thrashing as it tried to move.

The wyrm spasmed as if in its death throws. It was still moving, still thrashing, still sputtering frostdire, but it lost all coordination. Its motions were more desperate, more crazed. Even an undead body could not function with a sword in the spine.

He was dimly aware of fires raging all around, both blue and red. Smoking red from the blazing ruins, rotten blue from the wyrm’s maw. Jon could feel the hot and cold ash against his skin. Fire and ice hissed and bubbled, writhing and wrestling.

It was working – the fires from the wreckage of the Shieldhall were spreading. Just a bit more, Jon willed, just a bit more.

Men firing arrows, the wyrm spewing dragonfire madly. It was all Jon could do to hold on.

All around him, the wyrm was going berserk. It didn’t die easy. Jon would have been obliterated into a frozen corpse, yet the wyrm couldn’t reach around far enough with its breath to target him. The wyrm was twisting, trying to bite its own neck. He could feel the wafts of frozen air, the backlash of fiercely cold dragonfire, the shards of ice crystals against his face.

And then he felt the pause, the moment that it ran out of dragonfire.

Now, Jon thought – reaching out to grab the skin of his mammoth. Now! Without even a pause, he seized the mammoth’s skin, and it reared. The great beast reacted beautifully, and Jon seized control without a pause. Men were running, jumping out the way, but the mammoth was suddenly rearing through. Come to me, Jon willed. Charge.

Suddenly, Jon was fifteen-foot-tall, stampeding on four powerful legs, trumpeting through the courtyard. The mammoth’s single tusk was lashing out like a scythe, tearing through the billowing snow.

The mammoth felt nothing but fear – yet Jon channelled all of that into berserk rage instead.

The mammoth charged, ramming the wyrm backwards into the flaming wreckage of the Shieldhall. Scales seared against its fur, but the mammoth was roaring. Even for a forty-foot-long dragon, the mammoth was strong. Knocking its backwards, its serpentine body flailing.

And Jon felt the flames bite against the wyrm’s dead flesh. It was burning, the fire spreading outwards.

The tail snapped, crashing through the wreckage and sending flaming debris showering over the grounds. It was on fire, burning from the tail upwards. Nearly the entire beast was in flames, but it was still thrashing. Jon felt his own body lose its grip, falling backwards…

It was spilling frostfire madly, teeth snapping…

Jon jumped straight off its neck. He couldn’t pull Dark Sister out in time, so he left the sword wedged into the wyrm’s neck. Instead he jumped off the blade and threw himself to the ground. He landed face-first against shaggy hide. The mammoth was there to catch him, already stampeding away.

Giant teeth snapped desperately, but the fires were burning through it.

The wyrm screeched so loud that everything went numb. It echoed through his bones, rattling his skull.

Jon’s ears popped, and suddenly he couldn’t hear a thing.

He saw soldiers tearing forward with axes and swords, hacking the wyrm’s flaming ruin into little pieces. The wyrm was down, being shredded by axe and flame. It was dead.

Jon’s head was spinning, his ears screaming, but he willed himself to drag his body upright. The world had turned eerily silent, everything was shaking.

“Collapse the hole! Block it, anything!” Jon had to force himself to scream, but he couldn’t even hear his own voice. He could feel cold blood trailing down from his ears. People were shouting things – cheering – at him, but he couldn’t hear them. They were all screaming mutely.

“Formation! Get in formation!”

Through his mammoth, he heard the sudden increase in intensity, the rumbles pushing forward faster. One wyrm was dead, but there were more – there must be.

Another crack split across the Wall, he could see the ice creeping backward. Another wyrm was already pushing straight through it.

It was already evening, and the shadows of dusk were creasing across the white. It was a bloody red sky shining through the grey. Reinforcements, he thought. Where are our reinforcements?

The day had nearly passed, the bloody red sun was only a sliver on the grey horizon. Night was swiftly coming, and he could feel a deeper chill coming with it.

Above him, he was staring at Wall wobbling and groaning. They were coming through.

Jon’s hands groped for a weapon, but he had no sword – Dark Sister was somewhere in the flames, still jammed into the dragon’s burning corpse.

All around him, Castle Black was a ruin, consumed in soundless uproar. Jon couldn’t even focus, he had to cling onto the mammoth else he would have collapsed. The world was twisting, like his sense of balance had been set to madness.

Sonagon, he thought, for what felt like the countless time, Sonagon!

In his mind’s eye, he saw the dragon struggling to fly. Sonagon was howling in pain, long wings trying to flap…

Bran

He was in a hundred skins, and his heart was racing in each one. He was the sparrow flying across the Wall, he was the wolf sprinting up the kingsroad. He was a dozen mules clattering atop the Wall’s stairs, he was a score of mammoths charging through the snow. He was the fox and the hare in the woods, the bats and the bats shrieking from the trees – he was watching the battle through a hundred disparate eyes.

The air around him was bleeding, torn, like a great crack had been rent into the fabric of the world. Cold suffocating power was leaking through, making his warg-sense tighter, more desperate. The white walkers distorted the world by their very presence – turning nature to fear, to madness.

It was like the world was being smeared black and white.

Bran watched the battle from high above. He was a stone on the tide, another body in clamour. He felt billows of smoke and ash under his wings, steam and ice crackling in his eyes, and the bluish bursts of icefire scouring his skin…

Bran saw everything, felt everything, he was everywhere. He flickered between skins faster and faster, trying to force a hundred frantic bodies into line. At one point, Bran had even possessed a giant, managing to throw a barrel of oil into the monster’s jaws. He was in ravens and crows, gouging out a hundred eyes.

But it wasn’t enough. Bran was watching the men fight in raw desperation, clinging on with everything they had, but it just wasn’t enough.

He could feel it. Bran could feel the barrier across the Wall – like a curtain of red and green shimmering from the sky. It was being torn, being shredded along with thousands of tons of ice.
The ice crackled as it shattered into a spectrum of bloody colours, but the monsters were tearing deeper and deeper through straits of ice that had been buried for millennia.

He could feel them. The white walkers were seeping through, their power pulsing through the cracks. They were reaching for him, icy tendrils spreading across the land…

The cold felt like a dagger in his chest, the frost like needles piercing into his skin. A hundred thousand blue eyes were staring at him in the black…

Bran screamed. In the distance, a wolf howled.

The boy fell out of the sky, tumbling through consciousness until…

Darkness, thrashing, Bran was struggling. His vision was spinning, he couldn’t breathe, could only claw and squirm. Rough hands were trying to hold him down, trying to suffocate him, choking the life out of him…

And suddenly a soft hand took his. There was a hand on his cheek, fingers cradling his…

“Bran!” Meera gasped. “Bran, it’s alright, it’s alright!”

He could barely focus, but he heard Meera’s voice. His breath stiffened, heart calming…

He did. Bran’s vision started to focus, blurry images taking shape. His body was so stiff and heavy, so many aches and pains. After spending so long flickering through a hundred skins, his own flesh felt like a stranger’s.

But Meera was by his bedside, holding his hand. That thought helped to centre him, to give him focus.

Her hand was still cradling his cheek, fingertips on pale skin. Around him, there were a dozen unfamiliar men standing awkwardly in his room, all of them clutching weapons. Two of the guards had been trying to hold Bran down as the boy started writhing. They were all staring at him in tense expectation.

It took half a dozen deep breaths just to focus himself, slowly coming to terms with his surroundings. He was in his room, and the waning sun was rippling through the shuttered windows. Bran’s bed stunk of old sweat, and there was mucus clinging in his throat. Someone must have poured fluids into my mouth as I slept, he realised. There was a moment of quiet horror as he realised that his smallclothes had been fouled.

He stared at Meera, eyes widened. There were dark circles under her eyes, a slight tremble to her hands. I spent too long out of my skin, Bran thought. She looked stressed and tense, like she had stood vigil for days on end.

It took a long time to collect his head, to even make sense of the spinning, patchy images in his mind. His senses failed him, but he remembered the feelings. “It’s the Wall,” Bran said numbly. “The Others are attacking the Wall. They’re winning, Meera. They’re winning.”

“Fetch the princess,” Meera snapped at one of the guards. “Now. Tell me everything, Bran – how many were there, how far away are they?”

Bran could only shake his head, mumbling half-incoherently. How could you even count? They had been legion, endless hordes. “What of your brother?” Meera insisted. “How is the battle going?”

“He’s fighting. He’s fighting, but it’s not…” Bran took a deep breath. “Meera, they have monsters. Huge monsters. This… This is…”

She didn’t understand. Bran could barely even put it into words – how could you describe something like that? He was shaking with the very thought, trembling in stunned fear.

“Jon is fighting. He’s doing everything he can.” Flashes of blue fire and coiling bodies haunted his gaze. “But it’s not enough, it’s just not…”

There was a long, frightened pause. Bran’s eyes were wide and haunted. Meera bit her lip. “Reinforcements,” she said. “We can muster reserves, we can send aid.”

“They won’t reach him in time.” Bran shook his head. He looked to the window, and it was already nearing dusk. The skies were red, and night was falling. “He won’t survive the night, the Wall… the Wall is broken.”

He spoke too loudly. All around Bran, the guards were staring down at the boy as if he were mad. The Wall was a mountain – how could a mountain break? The thought was impossible. But it had; Bran remembered the screams of a thousand souls as it crumbled. Meera’s eyes were wide, her face pale, but she nodded. Meera believed him without even a pause.

“Hold still, Bran,” Meera said finally. “We’ll fetch Sansa, we’ll sort this out.”

“Sort it out?” Bran choked. ‘How can we sort it out?”

“I don’t know, we’ll think of something.” Her voice was curt. Meera looked worried. She never looked worried. “We’ll find a way, we’ll fight back!”

“The Wall is falling!” His voice was a shriek, and Bran hated how it made him feel. He felt weak, helpless – like a child. “It’s falling, it’s falling…” His hands were shivering. “We can’t stop it…!”

He could see everything, watch everything, but he couldn’t change it. The Others were just so powerful, so immense, and Bran…

This is the Long Night, he realised. This is the end of the world. You sweet summer child.

Meera was holding his hand. Her grip tightened.

“Look at me, Bran. There’ll be time for panic later, but right now – what needs to be done?” she pressed. Bran couldn’t reply. “What can we do?”
“I don’t… I don’t…”

“Do they have a weakness? Is there anyone we can call upon?” she pressed. She stared at him, bright green eyes on his. “Will the three-eyed crow help?”

The three-eyed crow. The boy shook his head, trembles running down his spine. “No. No, he’s… he’s resigned for this to happen, Meera.” Bran gulped. “The greenseer warned me that the Others cannot be stopped. And he was right.”

“Bran!”

“That is what he said! This is what he wants! The chains…” His voice quivered. “My family, my friends… he wants them to die so that I will go to him. He wants the chains to break.”

The three-eyed crow had given Bran a prophecy; everything that held him down would snap. The world would break away.

Everything is going to be destroyed. The greenseer still expected Bran would go to him, but only once he lost everything. The Others are going to destroy my family.

The thought of the Wall falling down, breaking apart…

His breath stifled, his shoulders shaking. “I… I…” Bran took a hoarse breath, wheezing, as he held back tears. “I’m scared, Meera.”

The words were a whimper, a quiet confession. He didn’t know what to do, how to do it, or even if he could do anything at all. He was a child, a useless broken child…

And yet Meera was holding his hand. She was holding his hand so, so tight. “I know,” the girl whispered. “I’m scared too.”

Bran didn’t know Meera even felt fear – she had always seemed so strong. No matter what; whether trekking through the wilderness, escaping from a dungeon, or dragging his limp body through a snowstorm, Meera could do it…

Can a man still be brave if he’s afraid? a distant voice from his memory asked.

That is the only time a man can be brave.

Bran’s heartbeat soothed slowly, and he forced his lungs to take a deep breath.

There was a long pause. A long and tender moment, and Meera never let go of his hand. “Do something, Bran,” she whispered.

“What can I do?” All of his powers, all of his strength… the Others outmatched it all. They outmatched the three-eyed crow too.

“Anything.” Meera’s voice was firm. “Everything. Do whatever you can do, and then do some more.”

My brother is still fighting, Bran thought. Jon must know how the battle was going. Those men on the Wall knew it too. There were thousands of men who knew their odds, but they were fighting regardless. Bran had been at the Wall in mind only, but those men had been fighting body and spirit, tooth and nail.

Bran stared at the window, where the fading red light of the sunset was leaking through the shutters. It hurt, it was frightening, but he would be brave.

He thought of the tales that Old Nan used to tell him – those frightening stories of horrible terrors, tragic deaths and evil demons in the night. He had heard them all a hundred times, but he had never really understood them. The stories weren’t about the terror, weren’t about the misery; they were about how the nightmares could be beaten. They were about surviving.

Meera was still holding his hand.

The three-eyed crow said that I had to save the world.

He took another deep breath. There is only one thing that I can think of that might save it now.

“The dragon,” Bran said after a long, long silence. “Meera, you have to take me to the dragon.”

She stared down at him, blinking in surprise. “Bran, what of those shadows? There could be more of them,” Meera warned. “It’s not safe out there.”

He looked straight at her. “It’s not safe in here.”

She hesitated. “I need to go,” Bran insisted. “Can you get me to the godswood?”

For a moment, it looked like she wanted to argue, but she complied. The guards tried to object, but Meera forced them to let them out. They tried to argue her down, but Meera held a broken shaft of wood like a spear, and had to all but threaten violence before they conceded. There was no time for a platter, instead Meera was ready to carry Bran herself.

“King Snow told us to keep you safe,” a bearded guard protested.

“Then keep me safe. But do it in the godswod,” Bran retorted, trying to sound stronger than he felt. “I order you to take me to the godswod.”

Meera hoisted Bran to the door herself, until finally one of the guards volunteered to lift him instead. They were large and strong men, but they were still hesitating with every flicker of the shadows in the stairwell.

The man was broad and gruff, and he carried the boy bridal style out of his chambers. It might have been embarrassing, but Bran had far larger worries.

Daylight was fading fast, and he could feel it in the wind. The night would be a hard one.

They met Sansa as she was rushing up the stair. His sister’s hair was dishevelled, her clothes stained. She was wearing a leather apron over her dress – Bran had never even imagined Sansa in an apron before. “Princess,” a man called to her. “We didn’t want to, but he insisted…”

Her heels were clattering up the stones, looking between him and Meera. Sansa looked worried. “Bran, what is going on?”

“The dragon.” He gulped. “You’ve got to take me to the dragon.”

She looked like she wanted to argue, but Meera was already pushing her way through. They carried him down to the staircase and towards the great hall. Bran could feel the tension in every corner, the anxiety flooding the corridors. The doors were sealed as if men were afraid to walk outside.

He passed the window, and he saw the skies. The snows had faded, but the hissing winds lingered. It was unnatural weather, the skies were distorted. The clouds weren’t sailing across the sky, instead it seemed like they were spiralling and churning. There was a power in the air – twisting the weather itself.

Bran looked down upon Winterfell, and the snows appeared black and red in the dark sunset. There were long and deep shadows drooping over the spires and merlons, and wicked gargoyles were sneering in the faded light.

Bran heard a roar – an immense, strangled boom shaking the trees from the godswood. The guards were nervous, fidgeting with their dragonglass daggers or weirwood spears.

“Bran, what are you doing?” Sansa whispered in his ear.

I haven’t the foggiest, Bran could have replied. He just knew he needed to try. “Do you remember the histories that Maester Luwin told us?” he asked Sansa. “About the children, about greenseers?”

“Yes.” She frowned. “Yes, of course I do.”

“Do you believe in them?”

At that Sansa hesitated. She paused for a few long heartbeats. “I don’t know what I believe. I’ll believe what I can see.”

That’s probably for the best, Bran considered, but he stifled before replying.

They were walking through the main hallway, and it took four to remove the barricades from the great doors. The whole castle had been sealed up tightly; every door barred and locked. Around them, footsteps were pattering – eyes were peering out of the gloom to see what was happening.

Sansa was staring at Bran queerly, something in her eyes. “The children of the forest,” Sansa said slowly. “Maester Luwin said supposedly they could see through the trees, they control birds and beasts.”

“And more,” Bran gulped. “They could do more too. They could dream of the future, they could travel through dreams. They could move themselves to distant shores, even travel through time too. It’s not just birds and beasts either, not at first… it’s like everything. There’s a man who can control the trees, Sansa, or possess the weather. The Others – they’re using the same powers. And I’ve had these dreams; I see men singing to the earth, and the world shifts. It’s all power, magic it’s like this spark, this fire, inside of people. I’ve felt it.” Bran was rambling. It sounded insane when he said it out loud, but it was true. “Everybody has a little bit of it, but I think that some people have more than a bit.”

The doors shoved open with a grunt. The snows had faded, but a thick blanket of white still smothered the world. Icicles like spears were drooping from a top the doorway, like the teeth of some monster’s throat. Sansa was staring at Bran, her expression guarded. She thinks I’m insane, Bran thought with a quiet grimace. Perhaps I am. “And I feel…” Bran continued hesitantly. “I feel like there’s more that I can do, I just… I just…”

“Bran, what are you…?” Sansa’s voice trailed off.

“I don’t know,” he admitted. “I just have to try.”

They stepped out into the courtyard, shuffling through a muddy slush of thick snow. In the distance, they heard another rustle of trees, of the agitated beast trembling.

Winterfell felt dead. All of the men had left with Jon, and the grounds were littered with tents and campsites left barren and still. The yards felt weirdly empty without the giants stomping through.

It felt like a procession was forming as they stepped out of the keep. People were creeping out of the hiding holes, staring down at him. Some few were bustling forward, trying to find out what was happening. Murmurs were spreading. The broken king being carried in a stranger’s arms. All those eyes were on him.

Focus. Deep breaths. I can do this, I can do this…

There were a gaggle of men shouting angrily, the guards were already trying to push them back. Winterfell felt unnerved. Meera was twitching, holding her spear closely. Sansa walked close to Bran’s side, shoving off her apron into the snows and keeping her hand on her brother’s shoulder.

“Do you remember the other stories as well?” Bran’s voice was low. “The stories that Old Nan told us?”

“Those were just stories,” Sansa replied. “She was trying to scare us.”

Perhaps, but Bran remembered Old Nan’s tales clearer than he did Maester Luwin’s were. The maester always started his stories with ‘it was told’ or ‘supposedly’, but Old Nan’s tales had been certain. Bran remembered the story of the last hero – he had been thinking about that one a lot. Oh my sweet summer child… the ghostly voice echoed. What do you know of fear? Fear is for the winter, my little lord, when the snows fall a hundred feet deep and the ice wind comes howling out of the north, when the sun hides its face for years at a time, and little children are born and live and die all in darkness while the direwolves grow gaunt and hungry, and the white walkers move through the woods.

The last hero. He remembered the tale; it had been a band of heroes that had journeyed north to stop the Others, as Old Nan told it. He had set out into the dead lands with a sword, a horse, a dog, and a dozen companions, but the white walkers hounded them at every turn. One by one his friends died, and then his horse, and finally even his dog, and his sword froze so hard the blade snapped when he tried to use it. And the Others smelled the hot blood in him and came silent on his trail, stalking him with nightmarish beasts of death and ice. His companions all sacrificed themselves, one by one, so he could keep on moving forward.

Until finally the last remaining one – the last hero – came upon the hidden city of the children of the forest.

The children took him in. They sang to him, Old Nan said, they gave him life again. The children healed him, made him strong again. They reforged his sword and bandaged his wounds, and with the children’s help the last hero grew strong enough to finish the journey. The last hero finished his quest; he travelled to the furthest north to slay the Other’s king with his burning sword. The king died and his minions all vanished, and then summer returned to the world.

Bran never knew how much of it had just been a children’s tale, but if there was even a chance…

“Maybe,” Bran replied. “But Old Nan told me that greenseers could be healers.”

They saw the godswood, where a line of men barricaded the gates with spears and white stones on their chest. Men were unnerved, shouting words in a tongue that Bran couldn’t understand. They were all tense, and anxious.

For a while, it seemed like they wouldn’t let Bran pass, but then he heard his brother’s name being shouted. “Snow,” they were saying, amidst the mumble of gibberish. “Snow… Snow…”
Sonagon was sickly and unsettled, Bran understood. The dragon was shaking the trees, crashing through the godsdowood. Several times it had tried to take flight, but its wings were not strong enough to lift itself. Instead, it had grown more and more agitated ever since Jon left. Nobody was allowed near, but Bran needed to get closer.

He needed to touch the heart tree. That was the only way he could be sure.

Voices tried to protest. The dragon had become growing vicious and aggressive; it was not safe without Jon’s presence. Sonagon had killed one man already while they were trying to pray to it.

And yet it was already dusk. Night was falling across the world, and the shadows of the godsdowood had never seemed so black.

Meera and Sansa were arguing with each other, their voices tense with worry. Sansa wanted to take him back, but Meera insisted that he needed to try. Bran could barely hear the words – his heart was beating too fast.

Finally, the man dropped him in the snow, and Bran dragged his limp body over the snows. He was shambling on his arms, dragging himself with a pained gasp. Behind him, Sansa shouted something, but Bran never heard the words.

He felt the rumbling growl, as loud as an avalanche and rising in pitch. The clamour of the procession was waking the dragon to stir, snapping entire trees as it shifted.

At first, there was nothing but blackness in the dusk, the whisper of crackling ice around him. And then he saw it.

He saw the dragon’s bulk in the gloom, he saw icy white scales reflecting in the shimmers of the torches through the trees. He felt the rumble, he felt the world shaking – the dragon was trembling. It was sickly, with blackish lines running through its scales, and hoarse, fierce pants.

He could hear the bubbling of the hot springs, the splashing of the pools. The dragon was flexing, great nostrils sniffing the air. He saw its eyes; black eyes that shone in the gloom.

It was curled before the heart tree. Bran kept on dragging himself, twigs snapping and snow crunching beneath him. His heart was beating, wheezing with every strained breath.

The dragon was staring straight at him, he could feel its gaze on him.

Broken trees and logs were strewn across the woods, as well as lumps of twisted, jagged ice carved by the dragon’s breath. Bran was staring, and then he noticed the lumps of white, yellow and black bile littering the ponds. Puke, he realised dumbly. The dragon had been throwing up barely digested food. Hunks of meat and frozen bile splattered across the snow.

Bran was staring, and then he noticed saliva-coated fingers sticking out from the pile. He saw human limbs sticking out through the gunk.

His breath stifled, his mind flooding with panic. People. The dragon had been eating people.

They were sacrifices, Bran realised in horror. The worshippers had been sacrificing men to the dragon.

He felt the ice crunch under huge claws, he saw the shadow rising upwards. Waters were gushing around the beast, the springs bubbling off its scales. He could see its eyes in the dark.

The dragon was staring straight at him, saliva dripping from huge jaws.

It snorted, a mist of cold bursting from its nose. Bran was left frozen, a crippled little child staring up at a man-eating mountain.

When can a man be brave? he repeated to himself. When can a man be brave?

He didn’t move, he didn’t panic. No quick movements; that would mark him as prey. Instead, the boy just slowly tried to wriggle closer towards the heart tree. He could feel the mammoth snout inching closer, he could feel the cold, hoarse pants against his neck.

I need to help, he thought desperately. I need to do something.

The heart tree was above him. Even when every other tree was wrecked, the dragon had avoided the heart tree. Bran was crawling, pulling himself over the roots.

The dragon growled, a low rumble breaking through its throat as immense teeth parted. It watched him crawl.

Bran’s hand touched the white bark and reached outwards. He reached into the wood, into the roots, into the soil. The bloody face was staring down at him. Its expression seemed expectant, solemn, cruel – like a merciless judge holding court, looming down over the damned crawling before the stand.

Take me to beyond the green, Bran willed. Let me see. Tell me what to do.

The roots reached out to grab him, like bloody white hands dragging him down into unfathomable depths. Bran was spinning, falling, flying and drowning.

The world twisted around him. He saw the inexorable march of the seasons, he saw the ages of the earth rise and fall. He watched mountains sprout upwards from the ground, he watched continents split apart, and oceans swallow islands. He saw two moons spinning through the sky.

He saw a king in a frozen crown, bright blue eyes staring out over a city of crystal white spires.

He saw two men, one white and the other black, standing against each other with swords in hand. Bright blue clashed against burning red.

He saw a wounded man in a ragged black cloak, crawling through the snows. All around him, spiders prowled – white fangs tearing at his cloak, trying to tear him down.

The vision turned, but Bran was fighting against the current. Bran could not be swept away by the tide anymore, he needed to control it. He needed to focus it. He needed to see.

The dragon, Bran insisted of the void. How do I save the dragon?

It felt like trying to control a storm – a writhing whirlwind of thoughts and memories, dreams and visions, pasts and futures. Bran pushed further and further, clawing his way up the roots.

A thousand mouthless red eyes stared down upon him. He could feel them all around him, silent sentinels trapped in prisons of white and red. They never said a word, but they were watching, judgemental and cruel.

Show me, Bran demanded. Show me!
Everything blurred, the roots caving in.

Chanting. Jeering. He heard laughter – the sound of a celebration.

The boy was suddenly standing in the middle of a gilded marble square; standing on a marble plaza overlooking gushing white waters. He stared at architectures he had never seen before, and great structures that he had never imagined. The buildings were covered in statues of horses, manticores, sphinxes, sirens and turtles, while dragon banners of a hundred different colours draped from the spires. Bran could only gape, watching the crowd of pale, ashen-haired men and women milling around him.

They were chanting something, but Bran couldn’t understand the words. He stepped forward, looking blankly around the plaza.

Above him, cloth dragons were wobbling down the cobbled streets, a whole drove of lords and ladies in silk and jewels were pointing and clapping. Fools and mummers were dancing around in turtle-shell hats. The smell of rich spices was thick in the air. It was a parade, he realised. Some kind of parade over marble terraces overlooking a great river.

In the distance, he saw a blackened palace, and there were fresh stains in the marble that might have been blood. Frescoes of water spirits had been shattered by hammers and covered by the banners of dragons.

Bran stepped onto the road, and he saw the centre of it. He stared at a man of rag and bones withering away in a cage of solid gold. He was a corpse in tattered finery, a broken prince, being carted down the middle of the street while silver-haired lords and ladies laughed and cheered.

The vision shifted. Bran saw the other side of the street. He saw children dragged out of their houses and slave collars clamped around their necks. He saw refugees hiding in the river’s shallows, living in swamps, or swimming through furious currents to try to escape. He saw men and women cowering in blackened ruins as death flew overhead.

He saw dragons feasting upon great turtles, tearing them up from the waters and ripping them apart.

He saw the ruins of a thousand massacres.

The sound of sobbing filled the air. There was a woman – a dying, disfigured woman, weeping for her lost love. Bran could hear the woman’s cries; sobbing cackles desperate for revenge. She pleaded and begged and cursed and wept. She staggered across a tattered bridge, watching a great city burn and the waters turning black with soot.

Bran saw the woman kiss the cold lips of a grey statue, and then the stone man came to life. Shadows danced, and a shrouded man took her hand and cradled her cheek with cold fingers.

She wanted revenge. They had granted her wish, Bran thought, but at a cost. A hundred thousand men died horrible deaths – a plague that spread outwards from the ruins and never stopped. Bran saw love turn into sorrow. He saw a shining bridge turn grey. A city of dreams, broken and ruined.

He saw legions of stone men shambling through the fog.

Greyscale, Bran realised. Garin’s curse, as Maester Luwin once named it. It originated in the waters of the Rhoyne, and it spread across the world. Bran saw it with his own eyes; it had been a Rhoynish curse – they poisoned the water, unleashing a plague that would punish the dragonlords for a thousand years. There were dead bodies under the water that still remembered, shapeless phantoms haunting the fog.

Bran gasped as the visions broke away. The scene shattered apart, tumbling through a thousand fragmented lives. The survivors had fled, some of them took shelter in the west. The trees remembered, the trees stored their memories.

The boy was back in Winterfell, staring at the dragon writhing in the woods. The dragon roared – the sound sending a billow of snow sweeping across Bran’s face. Through the trees, voices were shouting for him; shrill cries breaking in worry.

Bran was still clutching the heart tree, trying to make sense of all those images. They showed me what I asked, Bran realised. It showed me the curse that plagues the dragon.

The dragon was pacing. Sonagon could sense the magic in the air too, yet the dragon wasn’t sure if Bran was a friend or foe. It felt like a roar of warning; the dragon was sniffing him, shuffling closer to inspect.

Bran’s hand was still on the tree, still channelling a wave of green visions. It felt like he was falling into the green, but the green was swelling up through him at the same time. Everything was distorted into colours – reds and blues more vivid than he had ever seen it before.

Bran could see it; he could see the foul tumours – the black – that was plaguing the dragon’s aura. It was caking like stone inside its body, stiffening its muscles and draining the dragon’s strength. Making it weak.

But if this is a magic curse, could magic also cure it?

Bran needed to reach deeper. He needed more power. Deeper into the earth, deeper towards the source of it.

Bran focused on the dragon, and he reached out towards the beast.

The dragon’s tail thrashed like a whip, recoiling suddenly. Bran felt flames – pure fire – swelling up inside the dragon’s mind.

The boy grabbed hold of the weirwood, and clung on for dear life.

Around him, Sonagon roared again, jaws snapping furiously. The godswood whispering around him, the dragon facing off against the tree.

He could feel the dragon’s pain, the poison congealing in its guts. Like tar filling its body.

Voices were shouting, footsteps crunching through the snow. They were running for him. Meera was screaming for him, but Bran couldn’t let go.

If magic has a cost, I’ll pay it, Bran prayed. Help me. Help him.

Save Jon. Save the Wall.

His world twisted away. Bran was in the tree, following the roots downwards. He was going deeper and deeper, feeling warm water sprouting up through the crevices of the earth. He could feel the grass and the snow, the ice and the soil, the water and the rocks. He could trace the roots and stone, ancient layers and currents that none could see.

He could see the power pulsing through the earth – ley lines of energy flowing towards a hub. Like branches on a tree.

More power. Give me more.

Around him, invisible roots were twisting through the air, coiling around the dragon.

Sonagon roared, suddenly jerking. The dragon thrashed, sending a hail of stones scattering from the pool. An entire tree tore from the ground with a single whip of its tail. The beast was going berserk, claws raging, white fire swelling in its throat.

And then Meera was around him, hugging him, but Bran never let go.

Bran was following the ley lines deeper. Deeper through the earth, deeper into the past. He was channelling it, bringing it upwards. Bran felt it, felt it surging through him…

Something buried under Winterfell. Something powerful.

His awareness stretched. It felt like a simmering volcano resting beneath the castle. It felt untouched for so, so long but Bran pushed through the veil. He popped the cork, and suddenly it was all flooding up through the earth.

He felt it reacting to him, it was surging at his will. It was… he could hardly describe it. Words failed him, thoughts were useless. It was instinctive – as natural as every time he had ever slipped out of his skin.

“Heal,” Bran gasped, grabbing at that power. “I need you to heal.”

The magic rose upwards. It was swelling straight through him. He was channelling something ancient, something immense.

He couldn’t even process it. It was nothing but power.

A heart. A living, beating heart. Bran touched it, and it responded.

“Heal. The dragon…” The boy’s eyes were rolling, his breaths a hoarse gasp. “You have to…”

Sonagon stiffened, great nostrils sniffing. All around him, Bran felt the swell of heat burst from the ground. It was suddenly warm – as warm as the height of summer. A great bubble of heat rising from the earth.

Men were screaming, shouting in panic. They couldn’t know what was happening, but all around them they heard the hissing of ice. They could sense danger. They could sense the lightning in the air.

Bran didn’t understand either. He was touching something that was beyond him, but he was desperate enough to push through it. Like an apprentice working the forge for the first time, or a child climbing an unscaled mountain.

Bran didn’t know what he was doing, but he had to keep doing it.

Burn the poison out, Bran willed. Cleanse him… Heal him…

The water was boiling, the pools bursting into crackling steam.

The hot springs gushed, ice fizzing.
Men were on their knees, crying, yelling – and then a woman’s cry broke through the clamour. His sister was shouting something, but Bran couldn’t even…

Sonagon roared, and the earth shuddered. Steam rising upwards into the night, blanketing the dragon in pure, brilliant white…

“Heal!” the boy screamed. “Heal!”
Chapter 48

Chapter Summary

For the dawn.

Mance

He remembered his childhood well. He remembered days spent whacking wooden sticks in the black training yards, or nights listening rapt to drunken tales in the mess hall. He had learnt a hundred curse words before the age of ten, and a thousand stories of the world beyond. As a boy, he used to sneak up the icy steps of the Wall and spend his evenings staring out over the edge of the world.

Beyond the Wall had fascinated Mance. Every faraway, forbidden place had. He had listened to every tale and song and dreamt of the world that lay beyond the horizon. For a long time, Mance had been so entranced by the wandering crows that he wanted to become one – to travel between every corner of the realm wearing a black cloak.

Mance had been born to the Watch, he had taken his vows as a child. His father had been the oath, his mother was the Wall, and his brothers were a thousand men in black.

The Wall has been my life. My purpose and my bane.

And now it was all falling down.

His head was still ringing even as the world quaked atop the Wall. The ice was fracturing beneath him, immense cracks splitting the Wall and widening by the heartbeat. The Wall was collapsing, the sound was like the crackling of a glacier at its limit. Mance was on his hands and knees, gripping a wooden post while the ice tilted beneath him. Enormous slabs of ice ground against each other; another section cleaved off, taking yet more men into the great white abyss.

He could hear their screams as they fell, their frantic scrambling for purchase.

It was madness all around him, but Mance could only feel dizziness, hunger, a vague sickness. He felt detached from the world, like his mind had already gone beyond.

Thud. Another slice of ice cleaved away, and the Wall lurched downwards.

The men were screaming, shouting, but Mance couldn’t. He was just watching, remembering. His whole life flashed by before his eyes.

This is where I’m going to die, he knew. He had always known. The Wall was his life.

He heard the groan – the shriek – as yet another wyrm broke through the ice in a hail of rubble. In its wake, avalanches fell from the Wall’s ruin. A thousand men were crying in helpless agony before the titanic beast. It felt like the ghosts of the Night’s Watch were wailing through the black air.

There was no stopping them now. The dam was punctured and the dead were flooding south.
“They’re coming up!” a man’s voice screamed. “Spiders! Spiders, they’re climbing up!”

Mance could hear the roars to the south – the first of the wyrms had already burrowed through, it was already tearing through the ruins of Castle Black while the rest were pushing their way forward. They had opened the way; there were uncountable swarms of dead bodies following in the wyrms’ wake, and fighting to both the north and south.

The Others didn’t stop. Even as the Wall was collapsing, the fighting never ceased.

He saw white shapes darting up the avalanche – the ice spiders surging up the broken Wall. They were climbing and there was nothing to stop them.

The Wall wasn’t a block of ice anymore – it felt more like a heap of icy debris collapsing in on itself. It was falling down, piece by piece, while the legions of the dead pushed against it. And the men of the Night’s Watch were still standing atop of it.

Mance’s head was dazed. His head had been spinning for hours, ever since his fall. The bandages around his skull were slick with frozen blood. His vision was blurry, he couldn’t focus properly, he could hardly keep track of anything – but he heard the noises. He heard apocalyptic screams echoing around him.

He was starved, fatigued and frantic, and it felt like the end of the world.

Mance heard the screeching as the icy monsters broke over the rim, sharp fangs tearing through men. It was a swarm of them – the spiders clambering upwards on spindly legs, dragging men down. The wyrms were burrowing under, while the spiders were climbing over.

It felt like a nightmare. The night was dark and the terrors were all around him.

The ice was sagging, threatening to drop. Tides of ice were falling northwards, collapsing from where the monsters had gouged the base away. They were seven hundred feet in the air and clinging on by their fingernails.

Men were running, clambering upwards to escape the precipice chasing them. Spiders were jumping up the waterfall of ice, fangs tearing them downwards…

“Formation!” Samwell was screaming. The fat Lord Steward was in a frenzy, skittering awkwardly as the cracks spread beneath his feet. Mance saw the men huddling at the southern edge clinging to the very last chunks of stable ice, trying to hold a semblance of order. “Formation!”

The Wall was leaning. It was broken into glacial chunks grinding against each other. It was an earthquake. All around him, the ice rippled like the waves of a turbulent ocean.

Mance could only stare.

It was the dark of night, but the stars above were bright. He could see the shimmer of the northern lights over the mountains. The view from atop the Wall always took my breath away, Mance considered. Every single time. He loved that view.

Beneath him, a spider as large as a cart snatched a man off the ice and crushed his skull under monstrous fangs. Sworn brothers were still trying to fight, but they didn’t have enough missiles left. There were no spears or catapults, no arrows, not even any stones left. The men had resorted to the Wall itself, hurling chunks of ice at the tide of spiders scuttling towards them. Like throwing snowballs at monsters.
Every man that was willing to run had abandoned their posts already. The ones that remained were prepared to die up here.

Mance remembered his own friends – Qhorin, Dalbridge, Qorgyle, Mallister, Old Henly, Dywen, Hobb. They were the figures from his past, lost to time. They had been recruits together, they took their vows together. His brothers. Few even remembered the old guard of the Night’s Watch now, but they had held the Wall.

We held the Wall.

In his delirium, Mance saw the Halfhand reaching down for him, helping him to his feet. Qhorin was staring down at him, judging. He knew what needed to be done.

Mance took a deep breath, before forcing himself up off his knees. He nearly toppled, but he could not let himself fall. Not yet.

The Wall was holding on, straining to stay upright. Mance took another uneven step.

Another crack, another mammoth chunk of ice…

“Get clear!” Tarly was shrieking. “Get cle–”

Boom. The thump of ice sent the whole world deaf.

Memories scattered through Mance’s head – broken shards left scrambled along with his brain. His life was fractured all around him. He remembered taking his vows, his red cloak, the first time he saw Dalla…

“Samwell!” Mance screamed. “Samwell!”

“Mance!” the cry came through the cloud of white. “Mance, where are y–”

Five feet away from him, the ice shattered apart. The precipice was falling backwards. Mance tumbled downwards, but then there were arms clutching him. Yanking him up from the edge.

Strong hands were pulling him up, and Mance took deep, frantic breaths.

Samwell was dragging him backwards, shambling away from the edge. His body used to be so strong, so hard, but now all he had left was a ruin. Ever since his imprisonment, Mance had been left gaunt and weakly, with fingers that couldn’t even play a harp. Or hold his own wife’s hand.

“We have to run!” Samwell hissed into his ear. “There’s nothing more we can do, the Wall…!”

Mance could barely hear the words. All around him, he saw free folk and sworn brothers. He saw them wearing black, he saw them pushing through the snow, clinging to the ice.

He saw his family; both the family he was born to, and the family he chose.

Beneath him, he felt the rumble of another wyrm quaking forward. The big one, the one the Others kept at the rear. The final monster was coming through, and it was huge.

He could see grey scales rippling in the white, wading through the army of the dead like an elephant through a sea of ants. Its body was crisscrossed in injuries eons old. It was long and lean, its body swaying backwards and forth, but so large that it might reach half the way up the Wall. Its jaws were open – revealing teeth that could swallow a ship. Blue fire was sputtering in its black throat, and its dead beady eyes gleamed like dull blue moons.
The Others fought strategically – they had sent the smaller wyrms in first to clear the way, and then kept the largest one to come through last. It is the end of the world, Mance thought numbly, staring. There was no fear, only realisation.

Mance knew what he needed to do.

“Go,” Mance croaked, pulling himself upright and forcing himself to talk through the vague dizziness he felt. His eyes were unfocused, but his voice was strong. “You go, Samwell. Run, Eastwatch.” Samwell looked ready to object, but Mance pushed the boy out of the way.

Qhorin, give me strength. I must be as strong as you were. I must be oak. “Brothers!” Mance boomed. “On me! On me!”

Eyes stared at him, men mad with fear. “Mance…!”

“Get another fire burning, that’s an order!” the lord snapped, his voice stronger than he felt. “Now, pickaxes on me, any man that can still break some ice.” Mance was pointing, hands flailing with wild movements. “From the stairs and outwards, start hacking away. Whatever rope we still have, we need it!”

There were frighteningly few men left. Most had already fallen away when the Wall shattered, but some were still clinging to the broken ice. Crows are stubborn birds. We can still peck.

“On me!” Mance cried. “On me!”

Samwell clutched at his shoulder, hissing in a high-pitched squeal. “Mance, you have to run!” he snapped. “The Wall is falling!”

I know it is. That doesn’t mean it has to fall quietly. “What I have to do?” Mance motioned backwards, looking at the snowstorm writhing to the north. “Any moment now, Tarly, that big wyrm is going to jump up at us again, they’re going to try to finish us off. And when it does, I’m going to be here ready to hit it in the face with the biggest fucking chunk of ice in the history of chunks of ice.”

Samwell gaped at him. Mance raised his voice higher, shouting at the black cloaks around him. “Get pickaxes and fire, start hacking. We need hammers to break those supports!” he yelled, motioning to the wooden structures that lined the southern side, and the broken lines of timber that still clung to the Wall’s structure. “We need those ropes – fasten them to the heaviest object you can find and prepare to push. On my signal, when that beast is beneath us! We drop the bloody Wall on it!”

Men didn’t know how to reply, they were jammed in stunned fear. Samwell’s mouth was still stammering. “Who are we?” Mance shrieked. “Who do we fight for?”

“The living,” Hairy Hal gulped, but it wasn’t loud enough.

Who do we fight for?

“The living!” they shouted, and more were turning towards Mance.

Just a bit longer, Mance begged of his body. Just a bit. He could not end like this, he needed to stay upright just a bit longer. Who do we fight for?!

“The living!”
“Then get to work!” Mance bellowed, and his voice left no room for doubt. “We’ll rest when we’re dead, but our Watch ain’t over yet.”

Bodies started to move. They were scrambling, men racing across the treacherous ice. Seven hundred feet in the air on an unstable structure, but they knew their duty. Mance was screaming with everything he had, summoning every ounce of strength they had.

They had to work quickly. Any moment might be their last, but they had to be ready for it. Mance’s heart had never pounded so fast.

“Axes on me! Axes, axes!”

“Spears!” Bearded Ben shouted, as the ice spiders hissed. “Spears, keep those beasts off us!”

Mance heard the clicking of ice spiders scuttling up the shrieking ice straits, and beneath him the darkness was writhing. Battles above and below, but even in the dark of night they were still fighting. We are still fighting, against all odds.

Mance had never felt prouder of his people. Both his people – the sworn brothers and the free folk. Samwell tried to cling on to him, but Mance pulled himself out of the Lord Steward’s grip. “You go Tarly,” Mance insisted, lowering his voice. “I can do this.”

“Mance, I can’t…” Samwell gulped.

“Head to Eastwatch. Get as many clear as you can, rally what you can,” Mance hissed. “Lead them. That’s an order. Quickly now – while you still can.”

For a heartbeat, it looked like Samwell wanted to say something. Maybe the boy wanted to protest or apologize or argue. His mouth flapped, the way it always did when Tarly never knew what to do. Mance saw the unspoken dilemma squirm across the boy’s face.

Then, the fat boy just turned and ran. He never made a noise, he never drew any attention to himself. Samwell just turned tail and ran away.

They needed working bodies to break the ice, but there was no place for Samwell here, Mance knew. They would all die in the collapse, but Samwell’s sacrifice would contribute nothing. Right now, they needed Samwell’s cowardice more than they needed bravery. There have been enough sacrifices already, Mance thought, as he took a deep breath. Perhaps there was none better than a craven at spiting death.

Mance couldn’t run. Mance needed to stay to keep the last dredges of the black brothers in line. If Mance ran, the rest would run too and they’d lose their final chance. This is where I must be.

They chose to follow Mance. That was his duty.

Dalla and his boy were down there, somewhere. His wife and his son were relying on him. Most likely they had already fled, but the Others would catch up to them if nothing was done. There was a trail of refugees that would be crushed by those monsters. Mance would happily give his life just to improve his son’s odds.

All around him, the groan of breaking ice was deafening.

“Light the fires!” Mance boomed over the unholy pandemonium. “Get the torches burning – I want hammers and pickaxes, and lots of fire!”
The air was crazed. Smoke and steam, screaming and slashing. The stairs were broken and tattered – the men could not climb down – but the wooden structures were still fastened precariously onto the flat of the Wall. Huge joints of oaken timbers, hammered into the Wall centuries ago and fastened by thick hemp ropes anchored into ice.

They were screaming at him, but Mance knew how to keep command. He was staggering, half-blind, shouting through the panic.

“Get those supports loose!” Mance ordered. “Tie those ropes to something heavy. On the signal, we drop them and we break the ice.”

Behind him, Bedwyck the Giant clenched his jaw. “We’re standing on the ice.”

“Aye.” Grim eyes stared at him, but Mance just nodded. “Aim for the monster’s head.”

Mance half-expected someone to challenge him, but they didn’t. Weary faces just nodded, and set to work.

They were scared, but they were fighting. They were moving quickly, hacking and lashing ropes.

He felt the shiver beneath him as a warhammer cracked through a wooden support. “Hold!” a man cried. “Not yet, not yet…!”

Mance stared out into the endless white, and he wondered what it would feel like to fall.

“Is this how you want to end?” Hairy Hal muttered to him. He was a shaggy, bearded man with a face lined like stone. Mance had known Hairy Hal for over thirty years, both alongside and against on the battlefield.

“Aye.” Mance nodded. “It is.”

Mance knew the men around him; Hairy Hal, Bearded Ben, Rory, Young Henly, Mawney, Ketter, Garth Greyfeather, Garth of Oldtown. Quort Harlesson, Wulf, Ivar the Restless, Red Rox, Kyleg of the Wooden Ear, Yvon of Whitetree and Big Asta. He saw men that he had known back when wore a black cloak. They were men that Mance had abandoned and fought against, men that he had shared cups with and laughed beside. Men he had betrayed or joined with. Men he had trusted or hated, bickered and conciliated with.

They were his brothers.

Across the Wall, the wyrm roared like thunder.

Suddenly, there were tears in his eyes, salt blurring his vision. Without warning, Mance was laughing – and the sound broke over the storm. The drumming of the howling wind felt like the chuckles of the laughter. Mance’s laughter was so sudden that they all jumped and stared at him.

Mance was watching the end of the world, and he was laughing.

“You see a jape?” Bearded Ben shouted at him.

“Perhaps.” It wasn’t really funny, but Mance was laughing regardless. It was all he could do to laugh. “All my life, I hated this damnable Wall. I wanted to tear it down. I became ‘king’ to break through it.” He took a deep breath through the wheezy chuckles. “And now it seems that I must die fighting to protect it.”
To the north, the wyrm was coming closer. It was moving slow and unstoppable, like a looming storm. They saw the blue thunder of its breath, the dragonfire thrashing through the Wall.

The Others were nearly through, the Wall was wobbling beneath them.

“Why not die for your people instead?” Bearded Ben asked finally.

He had a long life. A good one, all things considered. Mance had loved a beautiful woman and he had fathered a gorgeous son. He had worn his red cloak, he had tasted the Dornishman’s wife.

All around him, he heard the sounds of hacking and burning. Mance clutched a torch in his ruined fingers, holding it tightly. His fingers couldn’t grip properly, but he squeezed the wood with both hands like paws. The fire blazed in front of him, and Mance held it like a club.

Mance heard the echo of the monster’s roar, vibrating through his bones.

Behind him, he heard the hammers and axes breaking into a frenzy. Mance stood like a sentinel, burning torch in his hands, looking down at his death below.

“Get those ropes fastened, get them–”

“Hammers! Hammers on me!” Bedwyck boomed, his voice like a giant’s. “Torches to the edge!”

Mance stepped towards the cracking edge. It was coming closer, an impossibly large beast snaking forward. The other wyrms had borne large crests of horns, but this one was hornless. It had grey scales spotted in yellow streaks, a giant gaping mouth filled with teeth as large as trees. It had to be at least a fifty-foot-wide at the shoulder, and easily over four-hundred-foot long. Before it, men were less than insects.

Mance was standing above it, with his pathetically small torch in his hand, standing side by side with his brothers.

The roar of the world was drowned out by his own heartbeat.

“Push! Push!”

“We need more, we need more–”

“Ready! Ready!” There was hacking, frantic tearing. Hammers bashing wood, pickaxes against ice. Like insects tearing away, termites eating through a structure.

The wyrm was slithering up over the mount of ice, rearing its head backwards. It was coming upwards. And we are going down.

The sight of that beast looming in the dark sent his heart fluttering. It was beyond huge, it was mountainous. That one moment seemed to last forever – the fire before him, staring down at the unending black hellscape of ice…

“Make peace with your gods!” a shaggy voice boomed – Mance never knew who it was. “For we will dine with them soon!”

The Wall was already hanging by a thread, it wouldn’t take much. “Push!” Bedwyck was screaming, while teams of men rolled immense chunks of ice over the sagging slope. “Push!”

They were chanting all around him, stomping feet and beating weapons as they pushed. Men were heaving anchors off the edge, snapping supports, or hurling fire down into the abyss. He could feel the trembling beneath him, could feel the ice straining…

Just a bit more, Mance begged. Just a bit more.

The wyrm was rearing upwards, coiling and ready to lunge. Mance saw his whole life flash before his eyes.

“For the Watch?” Bearded Ben asked with a deep sigh.

Mance shook his head, his gaze flickering upwards. The clouds were thick, but the stars were there. The night was dark, but it would be morn soon enough. Mance knew it would. “For the dawn,” Mance muttered. “For the dawn.”

Around him, men echoed the cry. The tears froze in his eyes, but Mance never let go of his torch.

“For the dawn!” they screamed. “For the dawn!”

Mance saw the blue light, its immense jaws were opening.

Hammers swinging madly, then crash. Huge chunks of ice fastened to ropes, tumbling down the slope. The ice beneath him lurched. It groaned, shuddering…

“For the dawn! FOR THE DAWN!”

The whole world collapsed beneath him.

Mance had his torch in his hand, and he was running forward. Even as it all came crashing down, the Lord of Castle Black was jumping off the precipice, swinging his torch like a madman. Two dozen pinpricks of light were falling through the black, and the monster was rising up to meet him.

He felt cold air rushing around him, he felt the roar of the earth. Aim for the head.

The Wall fell with him, an iceberg dropping from above.

There had never been a greater avalanche.

In that brief, timeless moment, Mance wished he had his harp. Mance had always dreamt of playing a song as the Wall collapsed.

Jon

“Stand fast!” Jon howled over the shriek of falling ice, yelling at the top of his lungs in the dying of the light. “Stand fast!”

Fighting was everywhere. Their ranks were scattered and the battle was spread across the ruins of the castle, as the Wall tumbled around them. Great slabs of ice were twisting and falling, and dead bodies were sprinting through the gaps.

Jon’s voice was lost in the chorus – the cries of a thousand men trapped in pure, primal panic.
He saw a swell of flailing, grasping bodies clawing its way over the rubble. The wights were met by swinging torches and axes, and a flimsy wall of shields bashing like rams. The soldiers embedded themselves with their backs towards a broken stone wall, trying to fight off the dead.

The flames were sputtering around him, smoke searing his face as torches swung…

“Stand fa–” Jon boomed, but then his voice was cut off by a sharp horn. Behind him.

There was no thought involved, only instinctive reaction. The horn blared and men dropped everything to run. Jon felt the rumble of the huge shape behind him, and he was already dropping behind broken rubble. He huddled for cover in the debris that used to be the Lord Commander’s Tower.

Behind him, the world exploded into tainted ice.

The wyrm. Jon couldn’t even see the beast through the white mist hissing around him, but he felt it. Everything was blanketed white, but he felt the rumbling above him; it was slithering over the tatters of the Grey Keep.

Jon’s heart was beating so, so fast – staring upwards at the shadow of the dragon.

There were two of them now, both larger than the first. The wyrms were dragging themselves over the ruins, and there was naught that the men could do but run for shelter. They couldn’t fight them, they could only hide. The battle was changing and the men had to adapt. They had to follow both monsters’ every move, and every time the horn blared it meant that somebody saw blue dragonfire swelling in their throats. Each time, they had mere heartbeats to scramble for cover before the ice fire obliterated them.

For many men, the horn was the last thing they heard. Each breath of dragonfire threatened to destroy them all.

Frozen broken bodies littered the grounds, like grotesque ice sculptures sticking through the snow.

Jon’s hearing had returned slowly, but the sounds were still distorted. Muted, somewhat. The sounds made everything feel weirdly numb, like he was watching all of the visions pass him by in a dream. A nightmare.

Even as the stones were still crackling with cold, the dead were pushing on the assault. Dozens of men were slaughtered before they even had time to stagger upwards. The ground was so cold it was hissing – even just walking across it would bite off a man’s feet.

Half the wights weren’t even armed – but Jon saw a shrivelled, blue-eyed corpse tear off a man’s limbs with its bare hands.

Jon was crawling, struggling to stand. He needed to pull himself up with his arms from the enclave of rubble, hobbling on one foot. His ankle was broken. They had rapidly made a splint from a broken table leg and wrapped it with torn wool. He could see flesh bruised black, the joint knobbly.

Two wyrms. His relief force couldn’t hold them. They had fought with the fierceness of dying men, but Castle Black was already overwhelmed. They had been overwhelmed from the moment the Wall broke.

Jon was panting for breath, barely able to scream as strong hands pulled him upwards. A bearded man – Jon didn’t know his name – was lifting Jon backwards towards shelter. It was a man with frost on his beard, his ears lost to frostbite. A gaggle of defenders were still grouped around Jon, still trying to fight.

The slabs of ice were as large as buildings, while the men huddled for shelter in the valleys of white.

The wights were everywhere, and growing thicker with every moment.

These were wights were different to the earlier ones. They were so old and decayed they seemed mummified. Their clothes had rotted off them, their skin was browning and tattered like parchment. They were frozen like hunks of meat that had been buried under ice. Most of them, Jon couldn’t even tell if they had been man or woman. Their fluids had drained away, their hair and skin was lost to frostbite – they seemed more like skeletons with padding than corpses.

Still, they were shockingly fast and ferocious, and they moved with no restraint. Blue eyes and mutilated bodies were everywhere – they were pouring out of the cracks in the Wall like an unending tide.

Vaguely, Jon wondered just how long these wights had been serving the Others. Centuries, at least.

He didn’t have Dark Sister, instead Jon clutched a chipped, iron axe he had snatched up from a frozen corpse. In his other hand, he cradled a wooden staff under his elbow, using it to hobble on a single foot. Jon’s leg screamed with every loping step, but he was moving. The adrenaline hadn’t worn off; he was so high with frenzy that he could barely even feel pain.

The dead were flooding through. They were coming through half a dozen tunnels, clawing up out of the ice. Half the wights must have been crushed crawling through the collapsing tunnels, but the Others had no shortage of soldiers to spare.

Once, there had been defensive lines – but the wyrms had shattered those in a single breath.

“To me!” a voice cried over the jagged rocks. “To me, to–”

“It’s turning, it’s turning–!”

“Breach!” a man screamed, so high-pitched it could have been a girl’s shriek. “BREA–!”

The sound disappeared under another flash of blue. Jon couldn’t even think as the wave of cold washed over him. Rational thought failed him.

Yet still the soldiers were clinging to the ruins, still fighting. There was nothing they could do but fight. They were ants hiding in the broken slabs of rubble, digging deep into the trenches.

Yet they were fighting. Every man had to fight or die.

“More coming through!” another cry came – a voice nearby. “To the east, east! It’s another one, another–”

Crash.

Across from them, an iceberg collapsed downwards onto the fields outside Castle Black. The white snow whooshed.

Jon was gaping upwards through the swirling mist, and he saw the bulge against the Wall. Another monster, a large one, coming straight through.

The Wall had fallen.
The other two wyrms were already pushing on ahead, leaving the castle behind them and heading towards the kingsroad. They are hunting down the fleeing men, Jon realised. Any soldier that tried to run was massacred in blasts of dragonfire. The Others didn’t want any to survive. Jon’s army was scattered with the snows.

Strong arms were grabbing him, heaving him towards shelter in the debris of the underground wormwalks.

“How many?” Jon screamed, barely audible over all the noise. “How many?”

“Another breach to the east, a third one!” that was Rattleshirt’s voice. The scrawny man looked crazed with fear as he ran towards them. The wildling had lost his plated giant’s skull helm somewhere in the battle. “Coming through! It’s coming—”

Jon saw it. He saw the flash of its icefire, he felt the quaking of its tail. Three of them, Jon thought with panic. There are three wyrms now. Their odds were falling with every heartbeat.

Then, Jon saw the smoke from men standing atop the Wall, he saw the ice rippling. There were men up there – standing seven-hundred feet off the ground, as the wyrm came rumbling through.

And then crash.

The whole world washed away as a tsunami of white dust flooded outwards.

The ground quaked so fiercely it was like the earth was jumping.

Standing next to him, three men were splattered under a chunk of falling ice. Another had his skull crushed by icy hail the size of boulders. Jon heard the sickening squish as red blood and gore spurted.

Jon’s mind went blank.

The mountainous heights of the Wall were collapsing. Even the deafening roar of the wyrms was being drowned out by the earth-shattering boom of the Wall.

He felt it. He felt an impossibly large chunk of ice falling against the great wyrm’s skull. It crunched.

Most of the ice was toppling northwards, but even the backwash of rubble threatened to swallow them all. They were caught on the very fringes of the collapse and it was still immense beyond words.

Jon was staring upwards, and suddenly he could see sky. Where once the Wall had blocked out the sky, suddenly Jon could see the horizon.

He couldn’t think. He couldn’t breathe. He could barely even describe it… the dread, the awe, the panic. The moment when even something as huge as the Wall fell apart.

All around him, ice was avalanching. Maybe men were screaming, but Jon couldn’t hear them.

Above him, half the wyrm’s body had been crushed by the falling Wall. The gargantuan beast had been left buried beneath a glacier’s worth of ice.

They didn’t run, Jon realised numbly. The thought was so sudden it stunned him. They didn’t run. Jon had been watching from below; the standing men on the Wall hadn’t ran away. There had been time to flee, but they didn’t. It had been deliberate; they saw the wyrm coming, and they had chosen to drop everything on it. The men of the Night’s Watch had been standing atop the Wall to the very end.

They didn’t run.

Jon’s hands clenched.

“Blow the horns,” Jon said suddenly. Nobody heard him, so his voice broke into a scream. “Blow the horns! Rally the survivors! Find the breaches and block them!”

Frantic eyes, his feet hobbling. Men tried to grip him, but his voice… “Now! Stop the breaches, ignore the wyrms!” Jon screeched. “Hold the line! Hold the line!”

Men banging on drums, a chorus of frenzied screams and war cries.

He heard a cry – a Thenn warcry in the Old Tongue. Sigorn of Thenn must be nearby with his warband, Jon had to rally them. He was already hobbling as fast as his broken ankle could take him. The ruins of ice and stone felt like a maze around them, a labyrinth of haphazardly fallen rubble. “To me!” Jon screamed. “To me! To me!”

“Snow!” Rattleshirt was staring at him in disbelief, voice wheezing through frantic sputters. “We have to retreat, we have to–!”

“Retreat?” Jon snapped around to glare at the man. “How? If we leave these ruins, we’re easy targets for those monsters. They’d cut us down running.” Wide eyes were fixed on him, even seasoned warriors were scared out of their minds. “No, maybe we are going to die, but I’m not dying easy.”

Nobody replied, but they were all looking at him. Pupils were dilated, their faces gaunt. Jon had never known, never imagined, so much raw terror soaking through the air.

Jon could barely walk, he had no sword, but he knew what he had to. The broken ankle didn’t matter, he still had to be strong.

The Lord of Bones hesitated, but Jon gave him no chance to object. “Go left,” Jon ordered. “Go block that hole. Avoid the wyrms, just focus on stopping the wights.” His voice rose, turning into a cry. “Collapse the tunnels! Block the breaches!”

The cry was spreading, even as the waterfall of ice cascaded down around them. “Hold the line,” they cried, a chant of desperate voice. “Hold the line, hold the line…!”

Jon met Sigorn of Thenn as he was digging up survivors from the wreckage. Three dozen wounded men were trapped in the barracks where a slab of ice had fallen on top of them, but there was no way to get them out. Undead corpses were everywhere, fighting across the ruins. It was all they could do just to stick together.

“Rally the men!” Jon boomed to the Magnar. “As many as we can. On me, on me!”

The wyrms were large and powerful, but slow. They could retreat from the wyrms and take shelter from the dragonfire. It was the wights that were everywhere; swarming through the holes in the Walls, clawing over the ice. Jon’s forces needed to choke them, needed to pull together a defence.

His mind was reeling, trying to think of a plan.
There are only two wyrms, he realised. Maybe the Others had more, but he couldn’t feel them. Perhaps those two were the only ones left. Jon’s men were scared out of their minds, but he could only hope that fear would channel into desperation. Two wyrms – and they could be killed.

As soon as the Other’s army came through and became fortified, they would lose all hope. Still, right now the dead were vulnerable. This was the only chance to maybe cull the tide. There was no choice – Jon had to hold on, he had to keep fighting.

“Hold the line! Hold the line!”

All around him, snow swirled on the wind, the shrieking blowing out from the north.

They had to fortify. They had to hold for every single hour they could. They had to pray that a miracle would come with the dawn.

Jon had seen battle before, but around him… it was like witnessing the end of the world from the front lines.

The wyrms were already over five hundred yards away from the castle, moving in unison through the snows. They were swimming through the snowdrifts, already at the base of the kingsroad. Each beast was huge – as large as Sonagon, well over a hundred foot from head to tail. One of them bore four jagged horns, the other hornless, but they were both husks of frozen flesh and immense dragonfire. A single one could torch an army.

Two. Just two.

Jon could only scream for order, trying to pull the frenzied lines together.

A giant’s club knocked the skulls of three wights straight off, but the headless corpses were still crawling, still groping blindly through the snow. Jon’s axe whacked downwards into their spines, limping on his splinted ankle.

The wights are clumsy, Jon thought through gasped breaths. More clumsy than usual, even – they seemed to lack the dexterity to even clutch a weapon. Perhaps the Others were having trouble controlling their puppets? Perhaps some shredded remnant of the barrier was interfering with them? Whatever it was, it was the only reason the defenders had a chance.

Jon pulled himself out of his skin, using his mammoth to clear a chunk of ice out of the way. He was headbutting the debris with huge tusks, trying to clear the way. The mammoth trumpeted and reared back, rallying the rest of the herd towards him. Giants and mammoths were going mad with panic, he had to recover them.

He heard the screams in the Old Tongue, as Sigorn of Thenn jumped off the rubble straight down onto a huge spider’s back. All around him, the Thenns were rallying around their Magnar – hacking at the spider’s limbs.

“Hold the line!” the voices screeched through the wind. “Hold the line!”

“They’re coming over!” Rattleshirt screamed to him. “They’re coming over the Wall!”

Jon could see the shadows moving in the dark. A two-hundred-foot stretch of the Wall had collapsed in on itself, leaving only a pile of debris standing a hundred-foot high. The first of the wights were already climbing over it, coming down upon the defenders from above.

Endless legions were pouring out from the crack.
Defenders were running. They were piling rubble up to form makeshift walls, pushing broken ice as barricades. A dozen brave men stood on the turrets of the Silent Tower – the only structure still upright – shooting flaming arrows upwards. The lights flew overhead like shooting stars in the black, but they were men blowing against a hurricane.

Then, Jon felt something in the air. He felt his mammoth shiver, he felt the tremble down his spine. A sickly cold mist was oozing over the battlefield. Jon could feel it, he could feel it growing stronger.

He gasped, shaking himself back to his own body. The hairs on the back of his neck were tingling, he could feel the shift in the battlefield.

Instinctively, Jon’s head turned across the devastated courtyard, and the ruins of the keep. He could feel it coming.

“The tunnel breach?” Jon called to Rattleshirt. “To the centre?”

The Lord of Bones shook his head. “I got fifty men holding it.”

Jon was already starting to run, limping on his splinted foot. His leg screamed with every staggered step, but he didn’t stop. “Your men are already dead.”

He could feel it, he could feel its power. The cold, eerie power was forcing its way through the last tatters of the barrier.

Jon didn’t have Dark Sister – there had been no chance to recover the sword from the wreckage – but he held a stubby obsidian blade under his furs. The dragonglass was a short, stubby blade attached to a crude wooden pommel, slightly larger than a dagger.

Rattleshirt was cradling a dragonglass-tipped spear, and Jon saw another man holding a mere dragonglass arrow like a stake. All of his elite had carried obsidian weapons with them once, but Jon couldn’t even guess how many of them were still alive.

Obsidian. We need more obsidian.

The cold was coming closer, Jon could feel it oozing from the ruins of the castle. From the half-collapsed tunnel, he heard screams.

He saw what used to be the main gates of Castle Black. There was naught left of them but the debris of a gatehouse crushed under a frozen slab. The nine-inch-thick oak gate had been torn to splinters. The tunnel had collapsed earlier in the battle, but the wights had dug their way through with inhuman efficiency.

The crevice was as wide and as dark as the throat of a beast, a cold wind like an ice dragon’s breath sweeping through it. The debris had collapsed over the old entrance, and now they could only squeeze through a gap towards the ice, skittering down into a cave.

Jon heard shouting from the tunnel. “Fire!” a man screeched. “More fire!”

The inner gates had fallen, but the soldiers had set rows of sharpened spears as barricades. They had rolled heavy barrels to use as barriers, they had set flaming torches to burn the tide of the wights. The fifty men had been trying to collapse the ice, even as the tide of dead surged through.
The half-collapsed tunnel was a choke point. Jon was staggering around the corner, wheezing, staring through the flickering firelight reflecting across the ice. Ten good men might have held back a thousand wights from here.

But then he saw blue eyes shining in the dark, and his breath froze in his lungs. A white walker itself had entered the battlefield.

The defenders didn’t stand a chance.

“Retreat!” voices screamed. “Retreat!”

The battle was already over. It moved faster than any wight, Jon could barely keep track of it. They launched arrows, but the walker parried them with lazy strikes. It was coming through; it bounded over the barricade in a single leap, and then its white sword was flashing…

Jon saw them die. A dozen men, two dozen, three… it made no difference to the white walker.

It was fifty feet away, casually carving a bloody path through the defenders. They were screaming for reinforcements, but the Other was stepping closer. It was flanked by half a hundred dead shapes, following it through the long tunnel.

Men tried to pull Jon backwards to safety, but he shook them off. His eyes were wide, taking in the scene. They couldn’t stop the white walker; it was too strong, too fast, too…

If we lose this tunnel…

Jon turned, focusing on the Lord of Bone’s weapon. He kept his own dragonglass blade hidden under his furs. “Give me your spear,” Jon ordered to Rattleshirt.

The man bristled. “I need this—”

“Give it!”

With the briefest of grimaces, Rattleshirt threw Jon the spear. Jon snatched the obsidian speartip from the top of the weapon and broke it from the shaft. The jagged edge bit against his skin through his gloves, but Jon didn’t care. He was already crushing the chunk of dragonglass against the wall, grinding speartip into dust. Behind him, Rattleshirt groaned.

The tunnel was filled with fleeing men trying to run away, Jon had to shove his way through. Jon dropped his walking stick, and scooped up a handful of broken glass shards instead.

In the tunnel, the last defender died weeping, his head parted by a casual slash of the white blade. The white walker turned around and stepped down the tunnel.

Ahead of him, Jon saw light crackling in the black tunnel. They had broken a barrel of oil and lit a wall of flames as a last resort. Not even fire could stop it; the flames were being extinguished beneath the white walker’s footsteps. Cold mist crept through the tunnel, suffocating all warmth.

Jon hobbled on his broken leg, taking another step. Men tried to follow, but he turned and snapped. “Stay back!” he growled. “Stay back!”

The white walker was coming through, flanked by the dark shapes of wights. It walked slowly, tauntingly. It swung its sword with one hand, weaving slow circles through the air. This is a game to it, he thought. They play games. Like children.
He remembered the games that he and Robb used to play when they were young. The thought flashed before his eyes.

Jon took a deep breath. So let’s play.

“Snow!” a man shouted. “Snow, don’t—”

“Stand back,” Jon ordered. “Everybody keep back! Stay back!”

Jon was staring straight into the Other’s eyes. Those eyes were like the heart of winter itself.

He limped forward into the shattered tunnel. The white walker was watching him, while the rest huddled at the mouth of the tunnel, watching in shock.

The cold… it was so cold it hurt to breathe. Every gulp of air felt like it was searing his lungs. It took everything that Jon had not to fall to his knees.

If I’m wrong, I’m dead. He kept on limping forward, forcing himself to meet the Other’s blue gaze.

The Other cocked its head, looking at him curiously. Jon’s hand gripped his axe so tight it hurt. He held a useless iron axe in his left hand, and a chunk of broken glass cradled in his right. The obsidian blade was hidden beneath his furs.

His head was spinning, trying to count the steps. The Other walked slowly, prowling like a shadowcat.

They stopped ten feet away. Jon knew that the Other could cover the distance before he could even blink. His heart was beating so fast he felt delirious. If I’m wrong…

And then Jon bowed. He lowered his head and swung his leg forward. His splinted left foot moved forward, pivoting on his right heel. He pulled his right arm to his chest, his left swinging wide. A full regal bow, every motion exaggerated.

The silence was deafening. He held the position so long it hurt, heartbeat raising…

And then Jon straightened and flourished his axe, challenging it to a duel.

The Other stared, and then a strange crackling sound emanated from it. It seemed to laugh. It was laughing. Somewhere behind him, he could feel the stares of his men from the edge of the tunnel, watching with bated breath.

The white walker could have cut him down without a second glance. Jon was in no state to parry it – neither his body nor weapon would hold against it. The Other stepped forward, teasingly.

Come on, he begged. Come on.

Two knights meeting for a duel on the battlefield, bowing before each other. A duel; like when Aemon Targaryen met Cregan Stark in trial by combat – Jon and Robb had re-enacted that duel a hundred times. The white walker didn’t react. Jon took a deep gasp of air, and then lowered his head, bowing again.

Blue eyes inspected him. They were eight feet away. Every heartbeat felt like a lifetime…

Then, after the briefest pause, the Other bowed too. The white figure was smooth and graceful; left leg forward, right arm to chest, head bowed low. They were bowing to each other. It copied his actions, like a child mimicking the acts of a monkey.
And as soon as its head lowered, Jon threw a cloud of dragonglass shards into its face.

Tiny pieces of broken glass shimmering in the air, each one sparking against the walker’s icy skin. The white walker’s crystalline armour hissed, then it thrashed. The sound shrieking through the tunnel, resonating through his bones. The axe dropped out of Jon’s hand, and his fingers were groping for the obsidian dagger.

Burning. Its white flesh was smoking. Even the tiniest shard of dragonglass burnt them.

It was howling, thrashing, and Jon lunged like a madman. His dagger slashed upwards in a wild arc, and Jon lunged himself forward on his good leg.

The dragonglass shattered in his hands, and hissed in a billow of steam…

The Other fell and suddenly a thousand wights stopped.

Jon crashed to the ground, landing face first in the steaming pool of melted Other. He was wheezing for air, whole body trembling.

Take them by surprise. Their arrogance was their greatest flaw. Children. The thought bounced around his skull. They’re like children.

Footsteps running for him. It took three men to pull Jon up off the floor. He was a shaking wreck, and the Other was a smoking outline on the ice. He couldn’t even stand, they had to hoist him over their shoulders.

“Block this tunnel,” Jon wheezed. “Block the tunnel!”

All around him, the wights were shambling, their coordination lost. The men could hack them down, and they didn’t resist.

Rattleshirt was staring between Jon and the dead white walker, eyes wide with shock. “How did you…?” he stammered. “How did you know…?”

It was hard to breathe, he couldn’t stop shaking. “Saw it… saw their weakness…” His words were slurred through his breaths. Jon had seen their vulnerability at the Frostfangs; the very first time he had killed an Other. “… They like… they like to play…”

Behind him, men were burning wights by the droves, while they carried Jon backwards. His vision was blurred, feeling the rumbles shaking through the earth.

The battle was changing. Jon could feel it in the air, he could feel the wights shifting at once. It happened nigh-simultaneously; the legions of the dead were rippling.

The white walkers. Jon felt it in the storm, he felt the wind shuddering. They felt their comrade die.

He heard a screech.

They didn’t like that. They didn’t like it when one of their own died. The legion of wights seemed to falter, but then the moment passed. Something in the air shifted. As one, they seemed to change direction. Pushing forwards straight into the defenders. Then the ground shook.

Jon knew what was happening from the rumble in the earth, he knew it even before the scream split the battlefield.

“The wyrms!” a voice cried. “The wyrms are coming back around!”
“Take cover!” Rattleshirt shouted. “Take–”

The world tremored. They noticed, Jon thought with a gulp. The white walkers controlling the wyrms finally took note of the defenders holding the ruins.

The monsters were returning. The great wyrms jerked with startling speed, lunging backwards like snakes. Jon couldn’t make sense of it, but he felt the crash of the beast’s tail, he heard the geyser of snow spurting as they hissed.

As soon as the Other fell, the wyrms turned back around to avenge it.

His mind blurred. There was no thought, nothing in the moment but panic. He swivelled, trying to limp, and then there were men pushing him backwards into the corner of the tunnel.

He fell downwards, and cold air whooshed around him. It flooded through the tunnel and seared against the walls. The broken gatehouse shattered under a gale of cold fire. Right behind him, one of the men carrying him was swept off his feet by the surge of frost.

Jon’s body collapsed behind a chunk of rock, and suddenly he heard the hissing of impossibly cold breath. Breath so cold it was like fire.

They were all running, scrambling for cover like mice in a hole.

He couldn’t breathe. Noxious fumes choked his throat, the world swimming in the stink of cold rot.

Screaming around him, men with blistering flesh…

The dragon’s breath reached a crescendo of fury. Jon heard fighting, men collapsing under the surge of the dead. The wyrms were right outside, they were scorching against the mouth of the tunnel.

He couldn’t keep track of the battle, he could only crawl, face first on the cold ground.

It felt like there was ice in his lungs. He was screaming for air, but his throat could only sputter. His vision faded, his body going limp.

The first breath faded away, but then there was a second. And a third. He felt the crunch of ice, the shattering of stone. Frostfire danced around him, putrid mist billowing and ice twisting into jagged spires.

The two wyrms were above him, taking turns to pulverise the castle’s ruins into ice.

There was nothing Jon could do but huddle beneath his broken chunk of stone, cowering for cover against the dragonfire spilling around him. Jon felt mammoths going mad, men screaming in agony, winds howling…

The ice above him cracked.

The air was so cold, like a knife in his chest. He couldn’t breathe, couldn’t…

The wyrms roared, crashing through for another assault.

His vision turned black.

And Jon felt air. He felt cool air whooshing around him, he felt power soaking through his bones. He felt… revitalised, like he was soaked in pure energy.

Jon felt wings. He felt white wings pounding furiously, he felt flying.

The sky roared.

Jon couldn’t even breathe. His body was a broken husk clinging to the wreck of Castle Black, but his mind was soaring through the sky. He screamed out mentally, and a familiar presence answered. It felt like an old friend rushing to his cry.

Sonagon flapped even harder, breaking through the clouds in a fury of wings.

The dragon was flying again. It was soaring on a wave of power, like a swell of energy crackling in the air. Sonagon felt… overwhelmed. Rejuvenated. Images, memories, of steam rising through red leaves flickered before Jon’s gaze, but he couldn’t make sense of them.

Jon’s vision blurred, and suddenly he was staring down through the dragon’s eyes. He was breaking through the clouds, and he saw the broken Wall. He saw entire legions of wights trying to squeeze their way over the broken rubble, and monstrous wooden trebuchets lurched like the skeletons of giant birds. The wights were as small as ants, the castle was buried under lumps of debris. He saw all the things he hadn’t noticed – like the watchmen still clinging to the Wall either side of the breach, and the line of dead bodies pushing their way through. The Others had abandoned all formation to attack.

He saw the scene from above, and suddenly it all seemed so small.

Sonagon! he screamed. Sonagon!

Sonagon was flying in fast, thundering a challenge. The sound of the dragon’s roar echoed through the Wall.

Just like that, Jon’s lips finally caught a gasp of air, sputtering through the mist. The barrage of dragonfire broke off. The wyrms were turning away, he could feel them abandoning their assault. Jon felt such unbelievable relief surge through his bones as he wheezed deep, deep breaths.

Three quarters of the men in the tunnel were already dead, but the ones that remained were staring upwards with wide, fearful eyes. Like rats cowering in corners.

“What’s going on?” Rattleshirt’s voice trembled. “What’s happening, what is that…?”

Jon did not reply, he could not. He was shaking too fiercely. He closed his eyes, trying to reach out towards the dragon.

The wyrms were turning to meet the dragon. The army of the dead was shifting, abandoning the assault on the defenders without a moment’s pause. The wights all changed direction at once, and the wyrms were rearing upwards. They were changing battle plans, converging to meet the dragon.

Wings swooped down, Jon could barely…

Jon didn’t know what happened. He couldn’t explain it, he couldn’t make sense of the flurry of memories from the dragon. Hours ago, Sonagon had felt half-dead with sickness, but now the dragon seemed… revitalised. The dragon’s muscles were screaming, its body was trembling, its presence was burning. The white dragon felt more powerful than ever.
Jon saw the battle from the sky. He saw the shadow of a cold army, pushing its way through the Wall. Sonagon’s wings swooped downwards, surging.

And white fire scoured over the rubble. Wights exploded into icy shards, corpses shattering in the cold.

One pass. Sonagon was swooping down over the breach – and searing through thousands, tens of thousands of the army of the dead. A few flimsy arrows tried to shoot the dragon down, but they were lost in the flap of Sonagon’s wings.

It felt like an explosion rocketing above Jon’s head. Around him, men were too afraid to even crawl out of their hole.

He saw shadows moving, he saw the Others willing their soldiers to react. The white walkers had planned this assault; they must have prepared for the possibility of the dragon. Sonagon could not allow them to surround him.

Take cover, Jon willed. The Others have ballista that might hurt you.

The dragon obeyed. Claws scrapped against ice, wings folded. Sonagon was gripping the southern face of the broken Wall like a bat, looming above them. The dragon burst out a roar, and then white dragonfire blazed. Sonagon was attacking from above, using the broken Wall itself to shield it from siege weapons at the rear.

Block the breach. Stop them climbing through.

Sonagon was all ice and fury. White breath arced, scouring spikes of ice across the debris.

Around Jon, men were screaming. Cheering. Jon was collapsed onto the floor, but he was struggling to breathe. His head was swimming – his sight switching between his blurry eyes and a dragon’s chaotic vision.

He heard the rumbles. The wyrms were moving, and Sonagon met them with a roar.

The sound echoed through the ruins, and the dragon saw pinpricks of heat crawling upwards. There were living men, still fighting, still holding the ruins.

Lure them away from the castle, Jon thought through ragged gasps. Lure them clear of the survivors.

Sonagon responded. The dragon clung to the wall as it clawed backwards, forcing the wyrms to follow on the ground. Sonagon had wings, he had the advantage in manoeuvrability. Set the battlefield, control the flow of the fight…

Vaguely, Jon was aware of hands lifting his body off the ground, carrying him limply up out of the tunnel.

There had been five wyrms originally. Sonagon could see the corpses; one of them a burnt husk beneath the castle, another obliterated by siege at the base of the Wall, and the titanic third crushed halfway through the Wall.

There were only two left now. They weren’t half the size of the largest one, but they were both big. One the monsters seemed about two-thirds of Sonagon’s size, and the other was maybe the same size as the dragon. They were built differently; the wyrms were big and bulky – they were thick and stocky like engorged snakes – while Sonagon was light and lean. But Sonagon had wings, while they could only crawl.

The dragon perched on the broken edge of the Wall, its wings pulled in tight and its neck outstretched. The dragon roared, and mist burst from its throat. A challenge. The wyrms replied in kind.

One wyrm twisted left, the other turned right. They mean to surround you, to drag you down.

The smaller wyrm charged forward first. Its jaws opened, blue light swelling through greying flesh. Sonagon was dropping downwards, teeth snapping.

White fire blazed against blue. The wyrm was uncoiling, lunging upwards from the ground…

Jon couldn’t see the impact, but he felt the crash as they collided.

Sonagon dropped out of the sky and straight on to the wyrm’s back. Wrestling, wings flapping, claws gouging through dead meat, and its breath scouring against scales.

Men carried Jon into the courtyard of Castle Black, staring upwards. All faces were pale, eyes wide. Jon could feel the backwash of the cold breath even from here.

The second wyrm screeched as it jumped into the fray. Sonagon’s hind legs were still perched on top of one wyrm, but it turned to meet the second with a flap of wings and lunge of claws. Great bodies wrestled and squirmed, tails whipping around to drag the dragon down.

Even two against one, Sonagon never gave an inch.

Crash. The wyrm tried to wrestle, but Sonagon’s teeth clamped around the wyrms’ throat. They were locked in a frenzy of teeth and claws, of tails and wings, rolling over the ice…

Bodies wrestling, but neither dragon backed away. Jon watched with his heart in his mouth.

There were two of them, he thought. Only two.

Then Jon heard the rumble, he heard crushing of ice. An avalanche shattered through the mount of the Wall, he heard the crash of a tail whacking against the ground.

Behind him, a wave of white soared down over the scene, blanketing the world of white. Another body was moving again.

Through the clouds, Jon saw the greying flesh streaked with yellow. It was writhing and clawing. Stubby claws shuddered, heaving itself free of the ice.

It was huge, a gargantuan.

No, Jon thought with dread. Two and a half left. The wyrm that had been crushed by the Wall was not quite dead.

The monster’s skull was near gone, its neck and shoulders a splattered ruin, but its body was wriggling. The Others could animate even the headless corpse. Suddenly, the big one was thrashing again. The top half of its skull had been cleaved straight off, leaving only a useless bottom jaw hanging off its neck.

It had no eyes, no snout, no teeth, but it was massive – a hunk of mutilated flesh writhing blindly. The wyrms screeched.
Sonagon was fighting two against one, while the headless third writhed its way clear of the ice.

The dragon tried to pull itself away, but it couldn’t. Dead jaws clamped down onto Sonagon’s leg, holding it in place. Sonagon lashed outwards in fury, but the wyrms gave no quarter. Behind him, the ice avalanched as the huge dead wyrm wriggled free.

Sonagon met them tooth for tooth, but they were heavier, then were overpowering him. They leapt at the dragon, trying to tear him down.

With no head, the big wyrm couldn’t breathe dragonfire – instead there was only cold mist and eerie blue light pulsing from its open neck. It didn’t need even dragonfire, it was big. Too big for Sonagon to manage, the dragon couldn’t claw free under the hunk of dead flesh.

Bodies crashing, spurts of dragonfire against scales and claws and teeth slashing outwards. And then the big one was wriggling forward, its tail coiling around the dragon.

He felt the wave of panic from the dragon, its movements becoming more desperate…

Jon’s eyes shot open.

Suddenly, he was thrashing, pulling himself free of the men carrying him. Fighting all around him – they were trying to resist the wights, at the same time taking shelter from the dragon’s fight. The immense beasts wrestling felt like a storm given flesh.

“The siege!” Jon screamed. “The siege – we need flaming arrows, now!”

Men stared agape, but Jon was lifting himself up with his hands. His feet hobbled, his eyes crazed, but his voice… “Now, while they are distracted!” he boomed. “Support the dragon, support Sonagon!”

They didn’t react properly, not until Sigorn of Thenn repeated the screams in the Old Tongue.

Jon was already rushing – hobbling to the east where the dragon was trying to flap.

Sonagon didn’t go down easy. The big one was clamped over Sonagon’s lower body, while the dragon tried to claw its way free. Another wyrm lunged at its wings, but then Sonagon’s teeth snapped at its neck, and icefire shredded through half its skull. Even with half its head cleaved open, the wyrm didn’t stop.

They were wrestling, rolling over the rubble. The large wyrm had no jaws, it could not bite or breath, but it was so, so big. The headless wyrm was over twice Sonagon’s size, its body coiling around the smaller dragon. Choking the life out of the dragon.

“Support the dragon!” Jon screamed to the men. “The dragon!”

It was so frantic Jon could barely even make sense of it. All he saw were images flashing around him – teeth snapping, men running, voices screaming…

They nearly overpowered Sonagon, but then there were archers scrambling over the ice. Flaming arrows, falling like stars in the dark. They were firing, burning arrows sparking against the wyrms hulk.

Defenders atop the Wall – the remnants of the Night’s Watch. They had the same thought he did. Jon saw the slithers of defence still holding.
“Support the dragon! Support the dragon!”

All around him, it felt like the Others’ assault was faltering. Wights were staggering, their coordination lost. The men were rallying, pushing them back.

Men were rushing for spears or arrows, screaming for fire…

And then Sigorn of Thenn led two giants to hoist up a great length of broken timber from the wreckage like a spear, and men set it alight. The giants were loping forward with the timber raised, the men howling, and then they jammed it straight into the dead monster’s scales. Both giants were crushed as the monster wriggled, but the burning wood was jammed into its hide.

The big wyrm was burning. Pinpricks of fire were scattered across its hide, eating away at its muscles. It was burning.

Sonagon was roaring, clawing its way clear…

One of the smaller wyrms was trying to hold the dragon down, the other was coming back around. Jon was screaming, wordless cries breaking over the wind.

Thud. The crash of boulders launching down seven hundred feet. The defenders from the Wall – to the east of the breach. They had salvaged catapults; they were launching rocks, throwing torches.

The flames hissed against the frost, and then the dragon was breaking free.

All around him, Jon heard chanting. He saw men falling to their knees, a euphoria of voices washing over the ruins. “Sonagon! Sonagon!” they screamed, beating swords and stomping feet. “Sonagon!”

The great wyrm was a desecrated, mutilated corpse that was still wriggling. Sonagon ripped away from it, and then lunged down upon the smaller wyrm. It tried to breathe, but the dragon was faster.

The wyrm was shredded under a flurry of claws and white flames. In quick, clean and furious lunges, Sonagon tore its spine straight out.

The final one left tried to run. The Others were calling it back, trying to flee. With a single flap of his wings, Sonagon launched into the air… and then came crashing down on top of the undead wyrm.

The dragon roared so loud that the world shivered. A primal, victorious boom that would have sent a thousand lions running. The undead corpse was shredded by the icy blades of a single long breath.

“SONAGON! SONAGON!”

Even hardened warriors were on their knees, frozen tears trailing down bloody cheeks.

Jon felt his strength fail him, and then he was toppling face first into the snow.

The dragon was clambering upwards over the mount of ice, casually swiping through dead wights. It was wheezing for breath, but it was angrier than Jon had ever felt it. Sonagon was overflowing with fury, like a volcano erupting in its chest…

It was atop the ice staring down at the legions of dead soldiers trying to clamber upwards…

Sonagon breathed.
The world was consumed by ice.

Ramsay

Dead legs staggered through snow, and the snowdrifts were so deep his feet couldn’t even touch solid ground. He was half-walking, half-swimming, with the snow swallowing his body below his waist and the bloody black cloak sweeping behind him. A normal man would have collapsed from exhaustion by now, but Ramsay couldn’t even feel fatigue anymore. He couldn’t feel cold, he couldn’t feel a thing.

His tattered body just kept on going, pushing deeper into the wilderness beyond the Wall. The treeline of the Haunted Forest was before him.

Over the horizon, he saw the very first twinges of light, threatening dawn’s arrival. He saw the battle amidst the white haze, and howling wind buffeting against the ice.

Behind him, a trail of black cloaks were forcing their way north. The Night’s Watch’s counterattack was already underway.

Ramsay had stolen a black cloak from a dead body, and in the storm nobody had even looked twice at him. He had torn the dangling intestines out from his own stomach and wrapped a heavy wolfskin shawl around his cheeks to cover his mutilated face. Ramsay could not disguise the loping, uneven stagger of a wight, but that was easily mistaken for just another injured man among a crowd of them. There had been many in the motley bunch climbing down the Wall bearing battle wounds, frostbite, or even missing limbs.

Ramsay had snuck amongst the ranks of sworn brothers, and they had been too panicked to even notice the dead man amongst them.

It had been the fat one who gave the order – Tarly had ordered a raid party to climb down the Wall and target the Others. Ramsay had seen his chance and he took it.

It had been the dark of night, and they had all been unfamiliar, hooded figures atop the Wall. Ramsay had seen the parties as they assembled to head down the Wall. There had been two groups; one going east and the other west – Ramsay never knew the names of the wildlings that led either. Ramsay had chosen to go west.

The Wall had been in a state of utter devastation. They had trekked halfway towards Queensgate before making the descent, and Ramsay had seen the Other’s army looming against the castle. The white walkers had launched simultaneous assaults against every castle on the Wall, but the bulk of their forces were concentrated against Castle Black.

Nobody had spoken. The men around him had been deathly silent. Ramsay had felt the hopelessness in the air; he felt it in the silence. They all knew that the raid was a feeble counterattack, a last desperate resort. Absolutely everybody climbing down the Wall had been prepared to die. Everybody but Ramsay.

There had been well over four hundred in the party of watchmen and wildlings that climbed down the wall, but only one in ten made it to the bottom alive. The winds and the quakes had shaken them off, and their bodies had bounced off the ice like ragdolls as they tumbled.

Ramsay himself had fallen over fifty feet as his numb fingers lost their grip. The wight landed roughly in the snowdrifts – he might have broken every bone in his body, but Ramsay never felt a thing. He never felt pain, he never felt fear – there was naught but dull, persistent rage.

The first chance Ramsay saw, he broke away from the rest of the men and set off by himself.

Behind him, the party of wildlings and sworn brothers were huddled against the snows, slowly trekking towards the forest. Even despite himself, there was something… impressive about their desperation. There was no hope for tomorrow, no future – there was nothing but a singular desire to kill before they died.

Ramsay could understand the feeling. The only thing that kept him going was the hatred pounding through his dying veins.

They were revenants fixated on a single purpose, a final assault.

_Do not let them control me, do not let them win._

The first clashes against the line of wights echoed around him. There were no torches, there was only a frenzied scrambling of clubs and spears in the dark snows. The men were as ravenous as wolves during the worst winds of winter. The dead were rallying, staggering to stop them as they broke through the trees.

He saw rushing blue eyes in the dark, but they passed him by. _They're targeting the living_, he thought. The Other’s soldiers didn’t look twice at a fellow wight, they didn’t even notice. The wildlings were naught but distractions; meaningless pawns to allow Ramsay to slip through the perimeter.

Ramsay was trekking onwards through the trees, his unbeating heart screaming for Other’s blood. Cold, dead fingers tightened on his axe.

The wight could feel them. They were growing closer, more vivid. He could sense their power in his air, he could feel their touch. The wight was unchained, but Malvern had left its mark. He could still _feel_ them.

Above him, blueish tendrils of the Other’s power wafted through the night. It was vibrating; their concentration was focused entirely on the battle for the Wall.

In the distance, he saw the lights of Castle Black through the breach in the Wall – the entire structure had collapsed, leaving a jagged V-shape carved through the thick of it. There was nothing being held back; the legions of the dead were flowing through.

A phantom shiver went down his spine as he felt the white walker’s power. The world around them was distorted by the rippling blue, they were radiating winter.

Ramsay could feel them, could feel their ice spreading over his skin…

_Don’t let them control me, can’t let them…_

’Why aren’t they falling yet?’ the Other’s thoughts past through the air, brushing Ramsay’s mind. ‘They should be falling.’

Ramsay was so close he could feel them, much in the same way he had done with Malvern. It was fainter now, but it grew stronger the closer he came.

’Any moment now,’ another replied, ‘surely they cannot last much longer.’
‘You said that hours ago,’ it whined. ‘They were supposed to fall already, why aren’t they?’

Ramsay focused on it, following it to the source. The wight was staggering woodenly, limping with crazed determination. His legs increased in pace, moving as fast as the snows and his stiff joints would allow.

Memories flashed through his dead eyes. Mother, Ramsay thought. Mother, give me strength…

He felt it becoming sharper. The white walkers were dispersed throughout the treeline, but they communicated via thought. He felt their auras rippling, their thoughts rising in pitch. He felt irritation. The white walkers were annoyed, he realised, they were squabbling like children. ‘This battle is ours, their resistance means nothing.’

‘Perhaps we should fall back.’

‘Fall back? We’re already through; they cannot last much longer.’

‘What of the beasts? Too many have been lost already, we cannot risk –’

‘Any moment now,’ the Other insisted. ‘They’ll collapse any moment now.’

‘Do not fall back. Press forward.’

Fighting. Fighting all around him, the raid party were pushing through wights. He could hear the warcries rising in pitch, breaking through the night. The men were worn ragged, they were exhausted to the point of collapse, but they weren’t stopping…

‘Brothers, be warned,’ an Other said suddenly, from the east. ‘The mortals are attacking; small parties of them coming north.

‘Attacking? You said that they would fall!’

An aura shimmered; it felt like the Other sighed in irritation. The white walker was stepping through the woods, and casually drawing its blade. ‘How bothersome. Why must mortals always make matters difficult?’

He could feel it. A skeletal wight moved to block Ramsay’s path, but Ramsay just barged straight through. Uneven legs broke into a loping sprint through the snow.

The wights were thick around him, but Ramsay was running. They were moving in the opposite direction, and Ramsay slipping by. Ignore the puppets, go for the source.

There was a battle behind him – the wildlings were being overwhelmed – but Ramsay didn’t even care. His focus was ahead of him, his hatred fixated on the otherworldly aura of blue and white.

Do not let them… Do not let them…

He saw it. It materialised out of the gloom, obscured by an armour of shifting colours. He saw it in all its ethereal beauty and terror. It was shaped like a man, but it felt like a snowstorm given flesh. The white walker’s eyes shone in the dark, focusing upon him. It felt like pure, raw winter – concentrated into a man’s form. It was so bright it seemed translucent; a young man in crystal armour, clutching a blade of ice.

Ramsay nearly staggered, feeling icy needles pierce his skin. It was trying to seize control, trying to take his body.
Burning blue eyes focused on him. It saw him trying to approach it, and the white walker laughed.

The Other cocked its head and it stepped forward lazily. ‘Thrall,’ it mocked. ‘What do you think you are doing?’

The wight nearly collapsed. It was all over him; the Other was trying to seize his body. Icy tendrils like needles pierced into his flesh, tearing him down.

Mother, Ramsay screamed. MOTHER!

The axe fell from Ramsay’s spasming hands. The Other stepped closer to inspect him. The white walker’s hand extended towards him, in the same manner one would reach out to grab a curious butterfly.

It tried to take control of him, but Ramsay was ready. The rage was burning through him, and his arm was lashing outwards…

The Other never even had time to be surprised. Ramsay’s fist struck it, and there were shards of dragonglass embedded into his wrist.

It was from the fat boy’s trap. The splinters of broken dragonglass had scattered everywhere, and Ramsay had been right in the middle of the shatter range. Ramsay still hadn’t removed the shards from his skin.

Suddenly, the Other’s arm was burning, and Ramsay screeched like a banshee.

The wight lunged forward, like he could tackle it to the ground. The Other tried to dart backwards, but the dragonglass…

Their bodies collided in the black.

He felt it screaming. It felt like winter itself was set alight, the shrieking filled the air. Ramsay’s broken hand punched straight between the Other’s blue eyes, and the dragonglasss smoked.

White icy flesh was bubbling around him, the broken dragonglass was hissing. It was burning and freezing all at once, but Ramsay couldn’t even feel it.

It underestimated him – it did not expect a ‘thrall’ to challenge it. The Others believed themselves superior, and that was their weakness.

Ramsay howled like a demon.

“You don’t control me!” he screeched. “Nobody controls me!”

The white walker was melting away beneath him. It evaporated into a smoking puddle, but Ramsay didn’t stop punching downwards. Thrall, it had said. It called him a thrall.

“I am Ramsay!” he screamed. “I am Ramsay!”

All around him, the wights sagged to the ground. Their master was lost, the blue in their eyes faded away. He heard the victory cry from the raid party, and then the men were storming forwards through the dropping wights. At their very front, Ramsay saw a girl with red and white hair – screaming bloody murder with a spear in her hands.

The wildlings were pushing forward on a suicide charge.
All around him, the storm hissed. The other white walkers were screeching, recoiling. There are more of them. More to kill.

Ramsay staggered, staring down at the scorched patch of snow that used to be a white walker. There was nothing but furious relief through his body. If there had been any fluid left in him, he would have pissed on its corpse. You do not get to control me.

His body swayed, he forced his limp torso off the ground.

He heard a crack. He looked downwards just as his own right arm broke off with a frigid snap. His flesh had frozen and cracked apart from where he touched the white walker.

There was no pain, only surprise. He stared down at his own severed stump, cauterised by cold at the elbow. Oh.

He tried once more to stand, and then wobbled. He heard his own ankle crack — it felt like he had ripped off half his foot when he tried to move it. The leather hide boots that he had died wearing were frozen tatters. His own joints were groaning, his dead flesh was cracking under him.

Regardless, the one-armed wight set off again, hobbling so badly he could barely walk straight. He still had one more obsidian shard, a small dagger-like splinter he had pulled out of his own chest. One more.

Throughout the trees, the white walkers’ thoughts reached a fever pitch.

‘What is happening?’ one demanded. ‘Where did our brothers…?’

‘Finish them!’

‘The tree-fiend, the tree-fiend –!?’

They didn’t understand what was happening. The Others were losing control of the battlefield, and they didn’t know why.

‘Free folk!’ a girl’s voice shrieked, clutching a spear as they charged through the dead woods. ‘Free folk!’

Ramsay only watched. Men were fighting tooth and nail, as the dead man dragged himself through the battlefield.

The Others had overcommitted themselves to the assault, he realised. They had ordered their troops forward too zealously, sending them to attack before the Wall had even collapsed properly. Now, their assault was being repelled, and the rear lines were pierced.

All around him, the screeching of Others filled the storm. The wind was trembling, the clouds reverberating with their will. They were caught off-guard, trying to react.

Suddenly, a wall of wights stormed out from the black trees. There were hundreds of them, so many the snow crunched under loping feet. The blue eyes were flooded outwards. Ramsay screamed wordlessly, and ran to meet them.

His fingers clawed, his fist lashed outwards and pushed through one wight, but then another knocked him down.

Undead hands pinned him to the snow. Tearing and clawing at him. Ramsay kicked and screamed.
He howled and thrashed with everything he had, squirming on his back in the snow.

Ramsay tried to hold on, but the obsidian splinter was ripped out of his hand. He was flailing, fighting…

“Free folk!” the girl’s voice cried. “Free folk!”

There were hundreds, thousands, an unending stampede…

And then the world quaked.

Even from the other side of the Wall, Ramsay recognised the sound. He heard the roar break over the wind, he heard the whoosh of wings.

The dragon had arrived.

For the briefest of moments, the wights seemed to freeze. Ramsay took the moment, his legs kicking out, clawing his way upwards.

In the distance, white wings flashed through the breach. It was too dark to see any details, only the brilliant flash of white light. The dragon swooped over the breach, scouring the world in icy fire.

The dragon. Ramsay didn’t know how or why, but there was no time to pause, no moment to even think…

The wights were frantic, rushing around him. It wasn’t a battle; it was a huge, crazed scramble in the dark.

The wildlings were howling, storming madly…

Ramsay couldn’t make out any details, but he felt the Others’ auras bubbling and writhing through the night’s sky. It felt like the scramble was changing direction; the wights couldn’t react fast enough, they weren’t responding properly…

Around him, the white walkers were screaming so loud that Ramsay couldn’t even make sense of them. Their voices were the shrill scream of the storm.

The wights were losing coordination, they were stumbling with each Other killed. They were faltering.

He saw fires burning through the breach – smoke and steam hissing against the snow. A haze of orange light was burning over the horizon. He could feel the rumbles in the ground; it sounded like the dragon was razing unholy pandemonium on the other side of the Wall.

Wights all around him, trying to drag him down. Ramsay writhed and wiggled through the snow, pushing through rotten hands and grasping fingers…

The wildlings fought fiercely, but they were being overwhelmed. Another white walker was coming closer, carving through the battle with every step.

Behind him, the shadow of wings rose over the haze of the fire. The dragon was atop the rubble, climbing up over the breach.

Ramsay could only stare as the white light hissed over the battlefield. The dragon’s breath scorched over the no-man’s land, tearing undead bodies into frozen husks.
All around him, there was screaming. Howling. Cheering.

The hooded man told us that greyscale would kill a dragon. Ramsay and that Humfrey man had spent months plotting for the dragon’s death, they had been assured that the poison would work. How is it still alive?

There was no time to wonder. The Other’s push was broken, and the hordes of wights were flooding backwards into the woods. Rushing for cover against the dragon’s rage.

He saw the red-and-white-haired girl finally collapse to her knees into the snow. She dropped with a man’s arms around her, holding her tightly. There were frozen tears dribbling down her cheeks.

The last of the wildlings fell against the swarms of the dead.

Across the no-man’s land, entire legions of wights were being scorched into ice. Not even wights could survive the ice dragon’s breath.

Ramsay was finally overwhelmed by dead bodies piling on top of him and pinning him to the ground. A living man would have died a hundred times over already. His clothes were tattered, his skin was ripped bloody, the only thing left was the shredded black cloak draping off his shoulder across the snow.

All around him, the wights were retreating. The sun was rising, and they were falling back from the dragon. The white walkers were running away.

The battle in the trees was lost, but it had done its job. The Wall had resisted.

I killed them. I killed them...

The memory of the look in the Other’s eyes before it burnt made him giddy.

He felt the Other before he saw it. He felt it stepping closer, he felt its power bubbling. Finally, he saw the white walker materialising between the trees, easily cutting through the last tatters of wildlings. The white sword was hissing with blood, the Other’s eyes were blazing.

It surveyed the field, and paused slightly before turning to stride towards Ramsay. The undead corpse was pinned to the ground, staring upwards at scorching blue eyes. Its movements were purposeful, vengeful.

Anger, Ramsay thought, this is what anger looks like.

The Others were losing. Ramsay’s mutilated face twisted into a mad grin.

There was no mockery this time. The white walker just raised its sword to sever Ramsay’s head.

And a spear plunged straight through its back.

Black smoke hissed, the white walker’s white body was burning into nothingness. All of the wights around Ramsay suddenly turned limp.

One amazing speartoss – Ramsay never even saw the thrower, but it was a master’s strike in the dark. The spear was white wood with a black tip; it pierced straight through the Other’s spine and jammed into the snow. The white walker had disintegrated into smoke and steam before it hit the ground.

Suddenly, there were ravens cawing madly, black wings sweeping overhead. From the trees, the woods were rippling. Shapes moving, materialising out of the trees. The sound of birds echoed around him, and hidden fighters were appearing from the shadows.

_They are cutting down the Other’s retreat_, Ramsay realised. The wights were scattered, and without warning inhuman shapes were attacking from the woods.

To the south, the dragon was raging – burning its way through the fields of wights left behind.

Hooves crunched over snow, the sound of a beast panting in the cold. An elk, Ramsay realised dumbly. A great antlered elk pushing through the trees, with ravens flapping madly around it.

Ramsay saw the black-cloaked figure knocking through the wights, and then pulling its spear out from the Other’s charred outline. At first, Ramsay thought that the men of the Night’s Watch were pushing on the offensive.

_That speerthrow_, Ramsay thought, _no human could make a throw like that_. It wasn’t human, Ramsay could just tell. There was no breath from under its shawl, its face was hidden by a dark hood. All Ramsay could see were emotionless black eyes looming downwards.

There was fighting and dead men all around them, but the mounted man turned to focus on Ramsay. It paused, before dropping off its elk. It kicked a wight away with a heavy boot, pushing through the snow.

“Come with me, brother,” the stranger said hoarsely, extending a cold hand downwards.

Sansa

The steam was still rising upwards in the air as the morning sun rose. The sluggish light shimmered through the white, smothering the godswood into a dreamlike haze. Sansa could only stare in shock and wonder.

It was suddenly so _warm_. It felt like a sauna – so swelteringly hot that she had to throw off her furs else she might cook. The steam caused her head to swim. The earth was drumming with heat, and all the snow was evaporating away before her eyes.

Sansa was running, heels squelching through the tepid, mushy earth of the godswood as she stared through the mists. The hot springs were bubbling so fiercely they were like geysers in the pools.

She wanted to call out, but the words jammed in her throat.

Her brother was lying by the roots of the weirwood. Meera had her arms around him, struggling to carry him upwards. Bran was unconscious, his eyes closed and his skin pale and sweaty. Sansa was running.

“Bran!” she shouted, but the boy didn’t reply. “Bran!”

“He’s breathing,” Meera said with a gulp, “he’s breathing, he’s just…”

Meera didn’t seem to know how to finish that. Above her, the red leaves of the heart tree were rippling in the billows of steam. The white bark of the weirwood was coated with dew – it seemed like the tree itself was glowing. The red had never seemed so crimson, the white had never seemed so eerie. The tree’s normally melancholic, twisted face looked like it was weeping with emotion.
So many questions spun through her head, but she could only... “What happened?” Sansa gasped. “What just happened?”

Meera couldn’t reply. She carried Bran out of the steaming trees, and three of the guards gingerly picked up the king between them.

All of Winterfell was stirring. The entire castle was filling the courtyards, stirring with shock and awe at the billowing steam. The castle was bathed in heat.

The sun rising from the east, spilling light over the white stone walls. Sansa was suddenly so warm she was suffocating – she had to pull off her jacket and strip down to her undervestments just to keep herself from burning. Sweat and moisture was slathered over her skin.

The dragon was gone. It had felt like an explosion – a huge burst of warmth. Sonagon had flapped away with an almighty roar, leaving the entire castle stunned in its wake.

The dragon flew north, she realised. It hadn’t even paused; it had just flown north with fury.

In the morning light, the godswood seemed like a totally different place.

Above her, she could see the blue sky. Where once the skies had been dark grey with stormcast clouds, now it was like something had punched a hole straight through to the heavens. There was no wind; the air was still and stifling.

Even as she stood and watched, the snows were disappearing. The trees of the godswood were already completely free of frost, burnt away by the heat swelling from the earth. The leaves were cracking, brownish earth and humus appearing from under the snow. The weather was different – the winds were gone, the clouds swept away.

It felt like a dream. It feels like spring, she thought. It felt like the warmth of spring had been unleashed all at once.

Sansa could only gape. All around her, she saw men trekking into the godswood and dropping to their knees.

As the sun rose higher, the mist started to clear but the heat didn’t fade. The whole castle seemed to be glistening in the morning light. The air was so warm, the skies were clear. It felt like the trees were rippling around her.

The flowers, she realised with shock. The flowers in the godswood were blooming. Mere hours ago they had been buried under snow, and now they were blooming?

Her head was searching for some rational explanation – some way to make sense of it – but she found none.

What did Bran do? How?

Leagues away, the fields were still buried by snow, and yet Winterfell seemed to be caught in its own micro-climate. A little bubble of summer. Sansa even climbed the walls so she could stare out at the snowstorms on the horizon, but those winds didn’t come near the castle. Winter was all around them, but it didn’t pass the castle’s walls.

As morning stretched onwards, it was so warm that men were walking across the courtyard barechested and barefoot. Every face she saw seemed stunned, confused and struck by awe. The murmurs were so loud she could hear the entire castle whispering.
There were whole crowds of wildlings and northmen milling outside Bran’s chamber, vying for a sight of the young king. Sansa ordered the doors sealed and the staircase patrolled, but the crowds weren’t aggressive, they were just… stunned. Sansa couldn’t even imagine what the rumours must be saying.

She didn’t understand what was happening. She felt as lost as a little girl.

Her brother was unconscious, but Bran’s eyelids were flickering. He was whispering in his sleep, but she couldn’t make out the words. Sansa kept by his bedside, but she couldn’t manage to calm herself. She found herself pacing uncertainly, glancing out the window much too often.

It should have been winter, but outside the skies above Winterfell were as clear as summer.

I cannot panic, she thought with a deep breath. I must act. She had to wipe the sweat from her forehead and dress herself in the lightest cloth she could find, before summoning a few of the lords and captains in Winterfell.

“What is the state of the castle?” she asked Lord Forrester eventually, as the lord bowed before Bran’s bedside.

“Out of its damn mind.” The large man sounded so lost. “They want to know what’s happening… by the Others, I want to know what’s happening.

“Any unrest?” Sansa insisted. “Any violence?”

“Not as such, no.” Lord Forrester grimaced, then added, “There’s a big bunch of wildlings that looks too much like a mob to me. They’re flocking to the godswood, chanting gods know what.” The lord shook his head, wiping his forehead. Even inside the castle, the heat felt suffocating. “I don’t know, they’re all…”

“There’s smoke rising from the crypts, my princess,” Lord Gregor admitted. “It smells like burning coming from the lower levels.”

“Smoke?” That caused her shoulders to stiffen. “Where?”

“I don’t know – the heat is coming from underground, and the crypts…” He shook his head. “It’s so hot down there that you can’t even get into the tunnels. Might be the stone itself is burning.”

“Put together a guard,” she ordered. “Assign patrols through every inch of the castle and grounds. Clear away anything that might catch light, and move our stores away from the lower levels. I need you to search the area for flames, and I want a full report concerning any risk of fire.”

Lord Gregor blinked. “Is that… is that likely, Your Grace?”

I haven’t the foggiest, she thought silently. “Due diligence, my lord. I hereby appoint you as Commander of the Guard.” She paused. “And stay alert for any discord in the castle. Any violence, any tempers flaring – watch and defuse whatever you can. Report to me directly.”

The lord bowed and then left, still blinking repeatedly. Sansa could not shake the fear that there might be a mob outside the door at any moment. How long will it take men to start sharpening pitchforks and muttering of witchcraft?
This weather… it wasn’t natural. It was unreal, it was…

She remembered those rambling words that Bran had told her, she was replaying them in her mind… They could do more too. They could dream of the future, they could travel through dreams. They could move themselves to distant shores, even travel through time too. It’s not just the birds and beasts either, not at first… it’s like everything. There’s a man who can control the trees, Sansa, or possess the weather. The Others – they’re using the same powers. And I’ve had these dreams; I see men singing to the earth and the world shifts. It’s all power, magic…

It was impossible, she had thought to herself at the time. And yet now spring was all around her and the castle was swollen with heat. How could she ignore what she saw with her own eyes?

There were ice creatures that could raise the dead. There were shadows that could travel through walls and kill people. Beings that could control the weather or possess animals. Her half-brother could command dragons, and her younger brother could summon spring. It was wondrous, it was terrifying, it was nerve-wracking, it was beautiful. Sansa’s hands couldn’t stop trembling.

It was magic, she thought with a deep breath. Actual magic.

The Battle for the Wall, the Battle of Ice and Fire

Conflict: The Long Night, the War for the Dawn

Date: 301 AC

Place: Castle Black, the Wall, the Gift

Result: Draw?

Combatants:

The Others

The living:

- The northern coalition,
- The Night’s Watch,
- Free folk,
- Northern houses,
- Northern mountain clans.

Strength:

The Others:

- Roughly a dozen white walkers,
- Over a million wights?
- Several thousand ice spiders,
- Five undead ice wyrms; Jormungandr, Nighogg, Fafnir, Ragnar, Norfi.
Approximately five thousand imprisoned wildling slaves.

Exact numbers impossible to discern.

Malvern’s minions:
- 8,000 wights.

The Night’s Watch:
- 3500 sworn brothers,
- Some thousand allied free folk clans.

Several thousand refugees sheltering at the Wall.

Prince Jon Snow’s forces:
- 3000 men,
- 500 giants and fewer mammoths,
- Allied clansmen and northern houses,
- Sonagon.

Over twenty thousand living men and women total.

Prelude:

The white walker Malvern forced its way south several months previously, and spent its time recovering strength and waiting for an opportunity. Meanwhile, a lull appeared in the conflict beyond the Wall as the Others halted their assaults and mustered their forces at the Frostfangs.

As the free folk exodus made its way south, the white walkers used their slaves to unearth the bodies of several ice wyrms left buried underground in a fossilized state. The wyrms were unearthed, and then raised one by one.

After a tumultuous civil war in the north, Prince Jon Snow retook Winterfell in the name of House Stark, but many corpses were left behind from the Battle of the Snows. Tensions in the north remained high, and the land was ravaged by severe snowstorms that originated from the northern mountains.

The dragon Sonagon was left in a critically ill state after Bolton sabotage and poison.

As roads and holdfasts became trapped by the heavy snows, Malvern emerged from its hiding place. The white walker travelled south, to resurrect several thousand bodies of northern soldiers left behind in the battlefields outside of Winterfell.

Alerted, Prince Jon Snow hastily gathered a relief force to give pursuit, but his efforts were delayed by an unknown magical assailant. The being of uncertain origin appeared in the throne room, and targeted the prominent lords of the northern coalition. Many grew to suspect Stannis Baratheon.

Battles in the South:

The first conflicts emerged across the kingsroad and the Gift. Malvern’s army rapidly targeted holdfasts and villages to build up its numbers. Severe fatalities, especially among smallfolk, were inflicted across the north. The white walker headed northwards, focused upon Castle Black.

The defenders were severely hampered by the heavy snows. The wights grew in strength quickly, and cut a bloody trail.

Sigorn, Magnar of Thenn and Lord of the Shadow Tower, collided with wights on the kingsroad. The Thenn forces were defeated and forced to scatter.

Jon Snow led his relief force north from Winterfell, headed by giant clans and free folk warbands. However, the northern coalition forces were delayed by Malvern’s, and forced to retreat.

As the trail of destruction left by the wights widened, Jon Snow rallied more allies from the mountain clans and the northern houses.

Assault from the North:

While Malvern was heading north, the white walkers beyond the Wall marched their own forces south. Black rangers provided warning of the dead’s coming, but the Others emerged with a vast army against the Wall.

The northern assault happened slowly, with a show of intimidation from the Others. The defenders under Mance Rayder, Lord of Castle Black, mustered to resist.

However, due to the weather and Malvern’s own presence, Castle Black received insufficient warning of the second host approaching from the kingsroad. The ravens carrying such warning had been torn from the sky. The sworn brothers were caught off-guard by the large host of wights attacking their rear.

As Malvern’s forces assaulted the castle and made to capture the gates, the main bulk of the Other’s forces besieged the entirety of the Wall. They deployed heavy trebuchets and enslaved wildling captives to bypass the Wall’s barrier.

The Others launched attacks on every castle simultaneously to distract the defenders, but the brunt of their forces was targeted against the centre of the Wall and the sworn brothers’ stronghold, at Castle Black.

The commander of Castle Black, Mance Rayder, took a fall early in the battle and was knocked senseless, leaving command of the Wall to the Lord Steward, Samwell Tarly.

The initial assault provided opportunity for the Others to safely move their trump cards – five undead wyrm – against the Wall.

Assault on Castle Black:

The refugees sheltering at the Wall were hastily recruited to help defend Castle Black from the south. Nevertheless, the wights overwhelmed the defence and pushed through the castle.

Castle Black resisted for near an entire day, but the defenders grew weary and the wights remained relentless.

With no other choice, Samwell Tarly chose to surrender instead. The wights captured the castle and the gate, and the white walker itself was lured into the courtyard. However, Malvern was then ambushed by a barrage of dragonglass, and the Other was slain from siege weapons atop the Wall.

This marked the first confirmed death of a white walker.
With Malvern slain, the battle for the castle was won and its minions lost all control. Despite severe casualties, the sworn brothers withstood.

Counterattack:

The white walkers released thousands of poisoned slaves captured beyond the Wall to climb the Wall for them. However, due to the efforts of Samwell Tarly, and the presence of Mance Rayder, the slaves were persuaded to defy their masters.

These slaves were recruited into the defence instead, and forces were rallied to climb down the Wall and ambush the Other’s attack. Many free folk and sworn brothers chose to sacrifice themselves in this counterattack.

The Night’s Watch rallied the defence atop the Wall, resisting the Others. Siege weapons opposed the Others’ attack.

After Malvern’s defeat, the relief force under Jon Snow arrived at the Wall and reinforced the castle in good time. Castle Black was resecured amidst the battle.

However, despite this unexpected resistance against the Others, the undead wyrms could not be stopped.

The Battle:

The battle reached its culmination as the wyrms broke through the protective barrier of the Wall, and the forces of the dead flooded through.

The Wall’s structural stability was undermined, leading towards its collapse. The ice fractured and fell northwards, leading towards a wide breach and a great deal of debris.

Emboldened by the break in the Wall, the white walkers committed their forces into an unreserved assault.

The undead wyrms burrowed through the Wall, allowing the dead soldiers to follow. The defenders under Jon Snow rallied to hold the line at the base of the Wall, while sworn brothers commanded by Samwell Tarly struggled to hold the top of the Wall.

The defenders successfully destroyed two of the undead wyrms. The remaining three overwhelmed them, and the battle appeared lost. Castle Black was reduced to ruins in the Wall’s collapse.

It is the author’s firm belief that never, in the entire recorded history of man, has there been a more climatic and pivotal battle.

Despite the defender’s greatest efforts, the battle was only won due to the appearance of the ice dragon Sonagon at the brink. The King in the North, Brandon Stark, performed a magical ceremony before the heart tree of Winterfell to restore the dragon’s strength. Revitalised, the dragon flew north to its rider’s aid.

As the raid parties ambushed the Others’ rear, discord spread through the Others’ assault. The white walkers grew overconfident in their success, and they were caught off-guard by the defenders’ stubborn resistance.

With the death of multiple white walkers, the command of their minions was lost and their attack faltered.
The dragon, with the support of defending armies, successfully defeated the remaining wyrms. With their trump cards lost, the battle turned against the white walkers. The ice dragon’s breath helped to seal the breach through the Wall.

Unopposed, Sonagon took to the skies north of the Wall, reigning devastation against the army of the dead. Bloodied, the white walkers chose to withdraw.

As they retreated, the Others were harried by minions serving the ‘three-eyed crow’ of the far north. The ambushes were quite successful, inflicting further losses against the Others.

Casualties:

- At least three white walkers.
- Uncountable number of wights.
- Extreme fatalities among the Night’s Watch, including Mance Rayder and the majority of the Wall’s command.
- Extreme fatalities among the refugees.
- Severe fatalities among the relief force.
- Trail of devastation across the north. The north will not recover.

Aftermath:

- Samwell Tarly takes command of the Night’s Watch.
- Several hundred unchained wights are captured south of the Wall, some of them still moving.
- Winterfell experiences a freak weather anomaly.
- Marks the beginning of the evacuation of the north.
- The Wall is breached.

Picking up the corpses, and the coming of the envoys...

Jon

The long, jagged shadow of the Wall loomed over him.

Jon stood in the wreckage, staring out over a field of devastation while horses and donkeys toiled through the Breach. Axes and hammers chimed to clear the path, while the bone-carts were sluggishly labouring back and forth. Huge chunks of ice littered the horizon, and the corpses were strewn out over the snow as far as he could see.

The air was still, cold and musky. After the heart-crushing anxiety of the battle, after all the screaming and the desperate chaos, after all the fighting and dying… it felt unreal to be standing here mere days later amidst the desolate battlefield.

_I will grant a knighthood to every single man and woman who fought through that battle_, Jon remembered thinking. There was no doubt in his mind that absolutely everyone who lasted in the battle of Castle Black until morn deserved a title.

Jon had known more than a few battles now, but none of them even compared to the fight for the Wall.

The charred black skeleton of a giant wyrm loomed over him, skull half-crushed under a block of ice the size of a farmhouse. Its vacant eye sockets were staring right at him. Nobody had figured out what to do with the wyrms’ corpses, or how to even clear them.

Men worked in regiments to clear the no-man’s land. The sound of bells filled the air – every man kept ringing bells to stay in constant contact. No group dared to move away from earshot of the rest – the fear that the Others were lurking in the woods hung over them all. Instead, there were teams of mules and donkeys, and they had to refit ploughs into platters to drag the corpses clear.

Occasionally, buried amidst the snow and the ruins, they would find bodies that were still moving – dead men with pale eyes, left behind. Even days later, the undead were still lingering in the snows, or shambling aimlessly through the woods. When convenient, the unchained wights would be clamped in irons and taken away for study – but otherwise the wights were just beheaded and hacked apart out on the field. Gruesome frozen gore filled the bone carts, some of it still wriggling.

The bells clattered around him, as the teams moved methodically through the no-man’s land. Despite the clamour, the air still felt grim and quiet.

They were gathering bodies, and throwing them on a giant pile to burn. The pile already stood twenty-foot-high and near fifty-foot-long – a veritable hill of tangled limbs and cold faces. Jon had seen many horrific sights, but that pile of corpses was one of the most stomach-curdling.
Jon just stared hollowly at it all.

The world was grey and bleak. The snow had been stomped into a muddy slush that reached his ankles. His walking stick sloshed through the frozen mud as he staggered painfully on a broken ankle. Every step hurt.

Behind him, they needed giants to pile the bodies upwards, while chain gangs of mammoths were trying to drag the larger chunks of ice away. Someone was talking to him, asking orders or giving reports, but Jon couldn’t even hear the words.

He wondered vaguely how many had been crushed when the ice came down. In the castle, they were still searching for survivors in the rubble.

It was all so numb. There was nothing to be done but clear the wreckage and burn the bodies. It was bloody, gruelling and vaguely soul-destroying work.

Another cart rattled back, the mule straining to drag the overloaded cart of bodies. The men just worked in detached silence as they started dropping corpses onto the ever-growing charnel pile.

Then, Jon saw a flash of red amidst the white and grey. The hair of another corpse freshly dropped on the pile. He didn’t quite know why, but suddenly he was stepping forward and calling out to the men. “Wait, wait…”

His steps were staggered, limping heavily on a spear he held as a walking stick. The men looked shocked at Jon’s presence, wiping the frozen gore from their gloves onto their chainmail. “Your Grace?” a man gasped.

Jon didn’t have the time for them. His eyes were drawn to that coil of pale red hair, barely visible under the frost. Jon pushed forward to see it.

The body was unceremoniously dropped behind the mules. He saw her, half-buried under the pile of bodies. Her pale eyes were staring absently at the sky.

It had been so long that Jon’s memories of her had faded. He hadn’t been sure if he would, but he still recognised her in an instant. Her hair was much paler than he remembered, streaked by white, and her face was gaunter and grimmer. She looked older.

Her mouth was parted slightly, and he could still see the familiar crooked teeth. Her smile used to make her beautiful, but she wasn't smiling now.

His hand tightened around his cane. I didn't even…

Ygritte’s eyes were open, her face slack and pale in death. Jon couldn’t even see the wound that killed her.

Men were staring at him. “Your Grace…” a distant voice said nervously. “Do… did you know her?”

Jon did not reply. Words fell short, they felt so wholly inadequate and hollow. There was only a silence, and then Jon turned and limped away.

He never said a word as they dragged Ygritte's body away, dumping it onto the charnel-hill.

He stood and watched as they finally set the fires, making a funeral pyre out of the hill of corpses. He saw the flames hissing over the flesh, rotten meat bubbling and sizzling. It was a slow fire, a difficult one – there was too much flesh and not enough kindling. As dusk fell, the men needed to constantly throw sticks over the fire just to encourage the weak flames to spread. The stink of charred meat stained the air.

Through the pyre, it felt like Ygritte's eyes were staring straight at him. He saw her hair in the whispers of the flames.

Kissed by fire, he thought with a silent prayer, closing his eyes.

The memories hurt him. He could not stay.

As the morning rose, Jon found himself naked in his room, staring at his scars. The dappled light of dawn filtered through the shuttered windows. His quarters had formerly been a groundskeeper’s hut for the lichyard of Castle Black and now it was one of the few buildings still standing. It was cold and cluttered, and filled with the musky smell of damp and cold rot.

The men were camping amongst the broken gravestones, still trying to salvage what little remained of the castle. Jon knew that he needed to get up, but he struggled to stand.

He ran his fingers over his body, inspecting his pale skin. The lines of old and new scars were strewn across his skin.

He felt the old scars from when he had first ridden Sonagon, the cut from the Weeper’s fists, and the knife wound from the Battle of the Snows. There was the ugly wound from an ice spider’s teeth, like two curved hooks that had jammed into his upper leg, and the muscles on his thigh still felt knobbly. He saw the burns on his palm, from a lifetime ago where he had once thrown a lantern at a wight to save the Lord Commander. On his wrists, he could feel the blistered flesh where the cold winds of the far north had swept past his gloves and seared his skin.

Around his neck, he could still trace the razor thin scar where the assassin’s garrotte had nearly choked him to death.

Other scars were smaller. A scratch from where he had cut himself making fire in the north. A thin line where a wight’s blade had grazed him. A scarred rash from where his riding leathers had cut into his flesh.

His skin was crisscrossed in wounds. He traced them all, and then stopped to pause over a faded cut on his shoulder. He couldn’t even remember that one – it was either from Hardhome or from the Frostfangs. There had been so many battles and so many wounds that he struggled to remember them all.

Scars on top of scars, Jon thought with a sigh, as he stared down at his feet. His seven pale toes were spread out over the wood. The stumps were smooth and pale.

There were more injuries that were more recent. His left torso was left bruised black and yellow from where he had fallen against the wyrm, and his ankle was swollen and knobbly at the break. It hurt to breathe, it hurt to stand. His right shoulder had dislocated when he fell, and it still ached painfully. His left arm was numb and swollen – he didn't have the same feeling in his hands.

Then, his fingers touched the misshapen wound over his chest from Malvern’s blade. The Other’s sword had been so cold that the flesh sealed quickly, but the wound itself had never faded.

Jon sighed. It felt like he had aged ten years in the last one.

It wasn’t healthy, he knew. A long year of hard living, travelling and fighting had stripped away every inch of fat. He could see every tendon and vein running down his neck and limbs, like craggy rope bulging out of a scarecrow. His bones creaked when he moved, his joints ached. His flesh felt dangerously gaunt, like muscles wrapped around bare bones and withered skin dragged across them.

>You're a fighter, Jon Snow. Those words echoed back to him. Jon sat on his bed in silence for what felt like a lifetime, and did not move.

His only company was the great direwolf curled at the other side of the cabin. From time to time, it reminded him of Ghost, but Summer had different eyes and different fur. The direwolf felt like Bran; Jon could see something of his brother in its amber eyes. Summer had taken to spending the nights curled up next to Jon in the cabin, for protection and companionship. Jon couldn't say who was protecting who.

He wondered how many fights he had left in him.

Morning stretched onwards. He could hear the bustle outside, but he didn’t move. Eventually, there was a cautious knock at his door. “Your Grace?” a voice called nervously.

They would be wondering where their commander was, he knew. His duties never stopped.
“Enter,” Jon replied curtly.

Two free folk in chainmail entered nervously, keeping their heads bowed. Jon did not recognise either of them. If not for their tattoos, they could have passed for northern men-at-arms. They kept their gaze lowered, while Jon sat naked on the dusty mattress.

“They are calling for you, Your Grace,” the man said with a grimace.

>Of course they are. It was a hard thing to finally admit, but there was no choice… “I cannot dress myself,” Jon said stiffly. “Help me stand.”

Jon didn’t even try to hide his nakedness. It took two soldiers to dress him, and to support him on his broken ankle. They tried to be respectful and hesitant, but Jon still had to sit bare-buttocked on the bed while the man pulled his breeches up his leg, yanking them over his swollen ankle. Jon grimaced as another man jerked the straps of the hauberk tight over his chest.

They also had to pick up Dark Sister from where it lay. Jon strapped the sword onto his belt, but the leather grip had burnt away, the sheathing had been lost, and the pommel’s great ruby was gone. The blade itself was intact, but everything else was burnt and filthy from the fire. He still hadn’t even managed to wipe away all the stained ash and gore. All the ornament and decoration was gone; nothing remained but dirty grey and black steel.

It had taken two days to recover Dark Sister from the wyrm’s corpse, and the sword didn’t feel the same.

With his thick furs and armour around him, he didn’t look so gaunt or vulnerable, at least. Still, even after they dressed him, Jon needed a man to half-support, half-carry him out of the cabin.

The injuries had stacked up, and Jon couldn’t even walk by himself. Still, Jon refused to feel any shame.

Outside, all heads bowed deeply as he hobbled out of his quarters. Amidst the graves stood scores of grim-eyed men, all camping on the snows and the rubble of the lichyard. They flocked around him; many were bowing, a few were praying. Summer followed him, the great direwolf’s snout nuzzling at his back.
Even at the battle’s end, there had been no celebration. This didn’t feel like a victory.

In the morning light, the sight of the Breach through the Wall never ceased to take his breath away. It was a jagged groove straight through the collapse – entire layered strata of ice were glinting in the light. Ice that had not been seen for millennia; Jon could see the different shades of ice going back in time, gleaming blue and white.

The gale from the north buffeted against the Wall, and the northern winds were forced and concentrated through the gap. The wind through the Breach was so cold that it could bite flesh clean off. It sounded like the Breach was constantly wailing. The army of men was camped in the ruins of the castle, and they were still trying to clear the mountain of debris.

It felt less like a war camp, more like a refugee site.

Jon remembered talking to Othell Yarwyck of the Builders a few days ago, one of the very last survivors of the old guard. Even the most optimistic estimates said that it would be the work of lifetimes to repair the Breach. How many lifetimes do we have left? Jon wondered.

The battle was over, but it felt like the strife was just beginning. Jon hobbled precariously through the muddy slush, looking over the makeshift fortifications.

Behind him, he heard a voice calling for him. A warhorse was forcing its way through the crowd, heavy hooves trotting through the snows. “Your Grace!” a voice called for him. “Your Grace!”

Jon didn’t turn around.

“News from the Shadow Tower, Your Grace!” Andrik Knott called, as he pushed his horse towards Jon’s side. “The messengers from the west arrived during the night – Soren of Thenn is in command at the Tower.”

Jon didn’t break step, or even look at the man. “Its status?”

“They came under attack; white walkers used captured wild– free folk –” The man gulped “– to attack the Shadow Tower. They claim that giant ladders were used to bridge the Gorge at night, while the dead were pulled across the Bridge of Skulls. They report significant casualties, but the castle held.”

His eyes flickered. “‘Held’?” Jon repeated. He could scarcely see how those ruins could have endured for so long.

“The Others abandoned the assault,” Andrik admitted.

At the same time they abandoned the attack on Castle Black too, Jon suspected. As soon as one assault was broken, the white walkers abandoned the attacks on all the other castles. They had been trying to capture the entire Wall all at once. “What of Eastwatch?” Jon asked.

“No word yet, Your Grace.”

That was the more concerning. Everyone was disorganised, but they still hadn’t heard from Eastwatch or any castle east of Rimegate. Jon gave orders to send scouts to find out, and Andrik bustled off. I must travel to Eastwatch soon.

There were too many urgent issues. Rattleshirt had already gone south into the Gift, leading his warbands to hunt down the lingering undead and to search for survivors. Every day, more weary men were returning to the ruins of Castle Black, but they numbered too few. Jon suspected that that hundreds, if not thousands, of deserters had succumbed to the elements. It felt like half of Jon’s army had broken and fled somewhere amidst that horrible battle, and now he had to rally whatever was left of them.

He had also sent out scouts both west and east to search for other breaks in the Wall – Jon prayed that no other wyrms, no other white walkers had made it through, but he had to be sure. The Wall was still in a state of confused chaos.

Castle Black’s underground food stores, already critically low levels, had been collapsed by the wyrms. He’d sent out a hundred hunters to secure game, but only one in thirty had returned with any success at all. The Others had sent every bird and beast in the forest fleeing for the hills.

At Castle Black, their focus was on the Breach, and what could be done concerning the great notch through the barrier.

More were demanding his attention. Jon was already being pulled into discussions on how to defend the Breach, or how many forces they could recover. He had already sent Duncan Liddle to the northern mountains to secure food and aid, while Red Jack wanted to collapse and blockade the Breach, despite Sigorn’s insistence that they should push forward and hunt down the Others.

Sigorn Spiderslayer, he was styled now – in the battle, Sigorn had slain the largest ice spider in the Other’s army, a white spider so large that it brought down a mammoth. Sigorn had pulled out its fangs and now held them as daggers.

Jon knew that they wouldn’t be able to march anywhere. They had too few supplies, and far too many wounded; the men were starving, near all the dragonglass had been lost, and the losses to wounds and desertions were uncountable. It was all they could do to try and pick up the pieces.

Ser Endrew Tarth was leading the recovery efforts and searching for surviving watchmen – but frighteningly few were left.

Jon had once known everyone on Castle Black by name, but now there were barely a handful that he even recognised.

Above him, he heard the flutter of Sonagon’s wings across the castle, and then a crash as the dragon landed on top of the Wall. Sonagon wasn’t hungry, at least. The dragon had been gorging itself eating the dead, wights and all. After the battle, Sonagon had developed quite an appetite. After the battle, the dragon had been ravenous. Any corpse they didn’t burn, Sonagon had devoured.

Most of the time the dragon roosted up on the broken edge of the Wall, but it came down frequently enough to feast on the charnel pits.

Sonagon had taken its own battle wounds – bite marks from the wyrms’ jaws trailed across the dragon’s legs and wings, but they seemed shallow and Sonagon was recovering well. Jon still didn’t understand how Sonagon had recovered, but there had been little chance to investigate. He was surrounded by wounded and hungry men, and the threat of a second attack hung over them all like a headsman’s axe, waiting to fall…

Then, he was shaken out of his reverie by a bugler’s horn, and of footsteps pattering towards him.

“The party from Oakenshield has arrived, Your Grace!” a voice called, and Jon saw Dolorous Edd running through the muddy slush. “Lord Shieldbreaker and the Lord Steward have arrived!”

Jon stopped in an instant, and turned to the east.
“Take me to Lord Tarly,” he ordered. He kept his hand on the charred hilt of Dark Sister.

The ruins of Castle Black were jutting out of the avalanche of white. There was not a tower still whole, instead there were only lumps of stone broken by ice. They were still trying to excavate the wreckage and wormwalks; the last survivor had been two days ago, but the men still held to the hope of finding more.

Eddison led the way east, across the castle through a twisting pathway in the wreckage. Above them, a falling slab of ice had formed a precarious archway leaning over the collapsed Guard Tower – they had to crouch to make their way through the icy debris hanging overhead.

Even as they approached the shattered keep, men were still trying to break apart the huge slabs of ice into moveable chunks. He saw the trail of black cloaks walking forward.

Jon was surrounded by weary men trekking into Castle Black, their black cloaks stained white with hoarfrost. The ice stairs at Castle Black had been destroyed, and there had been no way for the men stationed atop the Wall to descend. Instead, the surviving garrison had to travel to Oakenshield to use the stairs to descend again.

A familiar broad-shouldered figure was walking with them. “Grenn!” Jon shouted, allowing himself a quiet sigh of relief.

There was no joy in Grenn’s gaze. There was nothing but silent horror as he gazed upon what little remained of the castle. “Jon. By the Gods, Jon…”

He glanced around the figures. There were so few left – all that remained of the men that held the Wall. But one is missing.

“Where’s Sam?” Jon demanded. Grenn met the eyes of one of the others, then grimaced.

Grenn pointed towards the broken Grey Keep, and the vaults beneath the shattered rookery. They had only just cleared the stairs to the lower levels. And the library, Jon thought. He should have known that Sam would retreat to the library.

Jon saw Lord Shieldbreaker calling for his attention, but Jon brushed past Grenn and the others. Shieldbreaker could wait. He limped down towards the vaults, grimacing with every step of the stairs. He had to be supported by two men-at-arms, else he would have collapsed.

These chambers once belonged to Maester Aemon, Jon thought with a twinge of sadness. There was barely anything left of them; the upper levels had collapsed, and only the vaults were mostly intact. Even the library was dark and half-collapsed, with chunks of ice scattered from the ceiling and books strewn over the floors. There was still no sign of Sam.

Jon passed an old, charred desk and collapsed shelves. This was where the assassins tried to kill me, he thought, as his fingers moved to his neck. Even months later, they had not cleaned up the mess.

A few steps later, he noted Mormont’s raven, silently perched atop a broken shelf. Somehow, despite it all, the bird yet lived. It stared at him through one eye as he passed, head slightly tilted.

They eventually found the Lord Steward at the far side of the vaults, over a chamber pot and puking his guts out.

Jon limped into the gloom, clutching the wall to support himself. He heard the heaving before his eyes focused in the dim light. Sam looked a weeping, broken mess. It had been a long time since Jon had seen his friend, they had parted ways months ago. Sam was still a big person, but he could no longer quite be called fat. He looked starved and sleep-deprived. His eyes were red and lined with tired shadows.

The sound of quiet, choked sobs echoed in the air of the ruined library. In the light of day, Jon realised, this was the first time Sam had seen the ruins of Castle Black. The sight had caused Sam to vomit. His friend looked ill – physically ill with grief.

Jon was not surprised. The air between them was tense as Jon stepped into the underground room. There was no greeting between them, Sam didn't even turn around. “Leave us,” Jon ordered to his guards, and the men who had been helping him walk.

With a nod, the guards turned and marched out of the room. Jon clung to a shelf for support, and then shut and barred the door behind them.

The chamber was left silent.

“I killed them,” Sam muttered finally. “All of those men and women, I killed them.”

Jon took a deep breath. There was nothing he could say that would reassure his last friend, so he didn’t even try. Jon had heard about what happened in the castle – it had been a gamble, a gamble that paid off.

He hobbled on one leg towards a dresser, to pour a mug of water. Then, he realised that the water in the jug was frozen solid. “You did what you had to do, Sam,” Jon said simply.

Sam only choked. “All those people…”

“If not for you,” Jon said slowly, “the Others would have broken through the castle long before the relief arrived to help.”

“Maybe. Or maybe we would have held,” Sam gulped, dropping backwards onto the ground away from the pot. “Maybe they could have taken shelter in the vaults, maybe we could have blockaded the tunnel. If I had known how close you were, I could have done something, maybe I could have even bought more time…”

Jon hesitated. “Maybe,” he admitted.

Sam would spend his entire life thinking ‘maybe’. Maybe if I had been faster, maybe if I hadn’t been scared, maybe if I had known…

Jon knew those thoughts. He’d been thinking them ever since he’d first left Winterfell nearly four years ago. They were the surest way to damn yourself.

Sam finally turned around. He was sitting sprawled out on the floor, staring up at Jon. His eyes were desperate, half-crazed. His mouth stammered, trying to force out the words. “Dalla…?” Sam croaked. “Mance’s son…? What of…?”

He spoke like a man on the edge. He seemed afraid to even ask the question. Jon didn’t know how Sam would have reacted if he had to give the bad answer. For that moment, Jon whispered a silent thanks to all the gods that there was no need to lie. “They're safe, Sam,” Jon said softly. “They're safe.”

They had found Dalla and her unnamed son hiding in the treeline, taking shelter beneath an old oak near the castle. The child had a bad cough from the cold, but he was healthy. She had spent the battle screaming and weeping, clutching her wailing babe as the ice wyrms writhed through the trees.

Dalla had been red-eyed and trembling as they brought her in – but nobody had even needed to tell her what happened to Mance. She had just known.

At that, his friend broke down into tears. Sam scrambled up off the floor and lunged for Jon in a mad, weeping bearing hug. Sam hugged him so tight it hurt, sobbing madly into Jon’s chest.

Jon didn’t cry, but he didn’t resist the hug either. His hands rose slightly out of reflex, then stilled. He was unsure if he should put them over Sam’s shoulders or not. After a pause, he chose not.

For a long time, they just stood there. He waited until Sam’s sobs slowly started to fade. Then, Jon cleared his throat.

“Tell me everything, Sam.”

Sam did. They dropped onto old, wooden chairs and started to talk. Sam started at the beginning of the battle and the first sightings of the Others beyond the Wall. They spoke in hushed voices, occasionally broken by a strained sob.

At the mention of the wyrms, Jon’s gaze darkened.

“Where did those wyrms come from?” Jon asked finally.

“The Frostfangs, I think. We knew that the Others were active there, we just never knew what they were doing…” Sam shook his head. “Those beasts might have been, what? Eight thousand years old…? Did the white walkers dig up their bodies?”

“They woke the dragons up, and they raised them,” Jon’s hand absentmindedly ran down the scar on his chest. “Sonagon was not the only one slumbering.”

“They were…” Sam muttered. “They were like something out of the stories. Ice wyrms. But I’ve heard of no records of them, I never knew such things could truly…”

His friend’s voice trailed off, while Jon’s mutter was low and quiet. “We forgot. Somewhere in the thousands of years, we just… forgot about them,” Jon continued distantly, as he thought of the stories Furs had once told him. “But there were tales, the free folk remembered.”

Sam didn’t know how to reply. His friend seemed lost for words. Jon hesitated for a time, then spoke. “That wight you mentioned?” Jon asked eventually. “The one that talked? Are you sure it said the Horn of Joramun?”

Sam nodded. “It did. It told me of the wyrms, that there were five of them.”

A wight that could talk was unusual. They had captured plenty of unchained wights, but only a very few showed signs of remnant intelligence. “What happened to that wight?”

Sam could only shrug. “I lost sight of it, I don’t know.”

Jon paused in quiet consideration. The Horn of Joramun – the Horn of Winter – was a dragon horn. Jon had suspected so for a long time. Bran the Builder must have blown the horn, and used the breath of the ice dragons to first build the Wall. Somewhere amidst the passing of the ages, the Watch had forgotten its own history.
Jon glanced around at the wreckage of Aemon’s library. Eight thousand years, Jon considered. Just how many times had the records and libraries burned, how many books had rotted in all that time?

The Others must have the horn of Winter. That was what they had been doing at the Frostfangs. How many more monsters could be buried up there? Why were they buried there? How much more history from the first Long Night had been lost to the ages?

Jon wanted to curse out loud, but he couldn’t. Damn it all.

The silence stretched outwards. “We beat them, though? The wyrams?” Sam eventually said. It wasn’t a statement, more a question. “Those monsters? We won?”

“And how do you know they were the only ones?” Jon replied darkly.

Sam didn’t reply. He only fidgeted uncomfortably, looking away from Jon.

We don’t know enough, Jon considered. We don’t know anything about the Others, or what they’re capable of. That uncertainty felt tormenting.

The memories of that night raced between them. That sheer, utter desperation. They had fought on a cliff’s edge, but they had clung on…

Jon sat with his head in his hands, replaying it all over and over again.

“What are you thinking?” Sam asked finally, with a gulp.

Jon was slow to reply. “I’m thinking that this winter might last for years, Sam. Half a decade, maybe more.” Easily more. The stories said that the Long Night lasted a hundred years. “Can you imagine trying to fight this battle for years? I’m thinking that the north is already starved and strained, and that we’re not going to last.

“I’m thinking that the white walkers are still out there, and that they’ll try again. They haven’t been rushing, their invasion has been planned. They’re overconfident, but with good reason.” Jon shook his head. “They have all the time in the world. The Wall nearly fell today, but tomorrow? How long can we keep this up?”

“Jon…”

“I cannot pretend that we have a chance. We’re fucked.”

Sam did not dispute it. The air turned heavy and silent, surrounded by the gloom of frozen books.

We must prepare, Jon thought. This cannot happen again.

“We must begin evacuating the Gift,” Jon said finally. “We start from the north downwards, and we move them all south. Evacuate everyone.”

Sam didn’t look convinced. “Evacuate?” Sam repeated. “Where?”

“Anywhere that isn’t here. Look at what happened with Malvern – that was one white walker. One. We cannot risk that happening again. All of the smallfolk, all of these people, they’re just more bodies for the Others’ army. We need to clear the battlefield. Maybe then we might hold them.”

“You mean to evacuate the entire realm?”

He nodded. “If that’s what it takes. I will do everything in my power to hold this Wall. But we have to start thinking of what might happen if we can’t.”

First the free folk had to flee south, and now the northmen had to flee further south. But what happens when we run out of south? How long can we run?

Sam looked like he was about to object. He opened his mouth, and then closed it again. There was a pause. “You don’t think we’ll be able to stop them, do you?”

“They hurt us. I think that we barely held them with the Wall,” Jon said grimly, “yet the Wall is now broken. The next time? They’ll walk up, and they’ll only need to knock.”

Sam sagged in his chair. “We need…” Sam muttered. “We need a new Wall.”

“We need allies. We need all the allies in the world.”

There was a long, long silence. The only sound was the whisper of the torches, and the scuttling of distant rats in the dark.

“Wipe your eyes,” Jon eventually said, but softly. His friend had withdrawn into himself, like he was thinking, or remembering something. “Clean yourself up before stepping outside. It doesn't do to let them see weakness.”

Sam sniffled. “I know… I know…” He took a deep breath, and then rubbed his tired eyes. “So what happens next? If we can't rely on the Wall, then what else is there?”

“We need an army,” Jon said, and then hesitated. “The Others can keep on throwing dead bodies at us until the end of the days – the only way to really beat them is to destroy them. Find out where they’re vulnerable, and crush it.”

Sam nodded. He looked like he wanted to say something, but then hesitated. “In the stories…” Sam muttered, glancing around the shelves of books and tomes. “Some of the stories say that the last hero ended the Long Night by challenging their king to single combat?”

Jon only snorted, a humourless bark of laughter. “I wouldn't stand a chance.”

There was a quiet. With a pained grimace, Jon gripped the bookshelf and then pulled himself up. Sam dragged himself to his feet as well, extending a hand to support him. The Lord Steward took a deep breath, trying to centre himself.

Sam doesn't look like the same boy I once knew either, Jon thought quietly. Sam was scared, but he wasn’t freezing with fear.

“Start the evacuation, Jon,” Sam muttered, his voice so low and numb that Jon could barely hear it. “Broken or not, the Night's Watch will hold the Wall for you. Whatever we have left, we'll hold.”

Jon believed him. “You have your duty, Sam. And I have mine.” Jon wrapped his arm around Sam’s shoulder, as he staggered back towards the door. “Lord Commander.”

There was no immediate response, but Jon knew that he heard him. Perhaps in normal circumstances, there should be an election, but there was hardly a moment to spare and it felt pointless regardless. A choice needed to be made, and Jon felt comfortable making it.

His friend only grimaced. He didn’t ask for this, Jon knew, and he probably didn’t want it. But still it was not a choice, it was a duty – Lord Commander Samwell Tarly.
Sansa

“Are you sure that this is suitable, Your Grace?” Wynafryd asked, her hands fumbling slightly as she pulled the laces as tight as they would go.

“It’s quite alright, Wynafryd,” Sansa replied. Princess Sansa Stark of Winterfell, she mused as she looked out the tower window. What a queer name. They all called her ‘Your Grace’ now, but the honorific brought no pleasure.

Once upon a time, she had dreamed of that title. Back when she’d been but a girl, when she dreamt of being the wife of the prince, or even dared to dream of being the queen. But now I am the sister to a king instead – the Lady of Winterfell, of the Kingdom in the North, Sansa mused, silently weighing the heavy words on her tongue. They still didn’t feel natural.

The dress had come from White Harbour, but her handmaid had to knot the laces twice just to get it to fit. The silk dress had been tailored for a woman stockier than Sansa – a woman more like Wynafryd’s build; not fat, just with a rounder figure. It was far too loose on Sansa. Or more likely I am underweight, Sansa considered. The recent stress had caused havoc with her diet, and Sansa’s ribs felt reduced to the bare bones. She made a mental note to request more fatty foods at the table – it felt like she had been living off bread and turnips for far too long.

“You look do gorgeous, Your Grace.” Wynafryd Manderly said, stepping backwards and tilting her head slightly. “Silk looks good on you.”

“That’s very kind, Wynafryd,” Sansa said with a smile. To her, the dress was a horrid thing – silk and pearl and silver lace, with far more curls and loops than she preferred. Their kingdom was war-torn and poor; Sansa couldn’t shake the feeling that it sent a foul message for the princess to be dressed so richly.

And yet the dress had come as a gift from Lord Manderly, when he sent his daughters to Winterfell, and there had been no polite way to deny it. Still, the dress was suitable today. She would just try not to lift her legs.

“Please, could you prepare some wine in the solar?” Sansa asked. “I feel it would be good to share a drink with our guest.”

Wynafryd frowned. She was years older than Sansa, the image of a highborn woman, polite and respectful to a fault. “Forgive me, princess, is that appropriate?” she replied. “I thought the Council wished to speak with the envoy?”

“Oh, I have no doubt the great lords will talk at length to this banker. But before they do, I would like to offer Winterfell’s hospitality.” Sansa smiled. “I only mean to share cups with the man, Wynafryd.”

“But should we not wait for Prince Snow?” Wynafryd said. “Or my lord grandfather… I just feel it is presumptuous to make arrangements without…”

Her voice trailed off. Without permission? Sansa wondered. She tapped Wynafryd on the shoulder gently. “It is only a casual meeting, Wyna.”

She curtsied. “As you say, Your Grace.”

Wynafryd quietly finished Sansa’s dress, and then went to fetch her shoes – dainty, satin heels tipped with pearls. Wynafryd wore blue and green wool with the symbol of her house on her overcoat, while Sansa chose lighter white silk. After a few attempts, she wore her hair upwards in a widow’s knot, but left it unadorned. It would not do to appear a young girl today, she decided.

“I shall not need you during the meal,” Sansa said gently. “You are excused for the rest of the day.”

“Are you sure? I do not mind –”

“Go to your grandfather,” Sansa insisted, placing a hand on her shoulder. “He comes to mourn your father and mother, you must be there for him. Your sister needs you too.”

Wynafryd hesitated, but nodded. Wynafryd had rarely let her grief show, though there had been times when the lady had emerged red-eyed in the morn, as if crying all night. In all the frenzy of Winterfell it had been hard to arrange proper funeral for any of the dead, even the hightborn. Sansa was sympathetic, but the Manderly girls had been left to mourn their mother alone.

The youngest sister, Wylla, had taken their mother’s death even worse. Wylla had locked herself into Arya’s old chambers and scarcely ever left. By contrast, Wynafryd seemed to be trying to stay busy, to keep herself distracted.

She is several years older than me, Sansa considered. Wynafryd was nearing her twentieth nameday. Once, Sansa had looked up to her, but so much had changed. More recently, it felt as if Wynafryd was the younger of them.

As Sansa stepped out onto the balcony, she saw the column of horses and carriages on the horizon, trodding up the muddy slush of the kingsroad. The banners of White Harbour and half a dozen other houses fluttered in the distance. Lord Wyman and company had finally arrived in Winterfell for the coronation of King Brandon Stark.

Wynafryd held the door open as Sansa walked out, holding herself stiff, stoic and composed. The silk lace drifted against the stone as her dainty shoes clipped over the corridor. She wouldn’t be able to walk outside in this garb, but it would do. A dress was to a woman what armour was to a knight.

I have to play the part now. The Royal Family of Winterfell; the lost princess, the crippled king, and the dragonlord bastard. Prince Jon Snow had not yet returned from the Wall, but Sansa had no intention of being window dressing as the rest of the kingdom fought for their lives.

In the distance, behind the banners and the wagons, she could see a column of downtrodden figures stretching over the horizon. The smallfolk were left to walk on foot, she observed. The Manderly knights were at the head of the line, being followed by uncountable figures – a mob of unorganized bodies, all of them flocking towards Winterfell, towards shelter. From so high above, it reminded her of cattle; dirty and brown and bedraggled,

They had been receiving more and more refugees recently. Even a week later, the warm weather around the castle was only just starting to fade – the air was still hotter than it had any right to be. It was no longer as swelteringly hot, and the geysers of steam billowing from the godswood had faded, but the frost was only just starting to creep back in. The scouts reported a bubble of heat spreading two leagues, and gradually fading away.

As the smallfolk flocked back towards the winter town, Sansa knew that they whispered of magic and the old gods.
From the north, Winterfell was still receiving more and more refugees flooding downwards along the kingsroad – all of them with haunted looks and whispering of cursed things. By the tell of it, the white walker had mauled half the villages between Winterfell and the ruins of Last Hearth, and now thousands – tens of thousands, even – of the refugees were making the long trek to Winterfell.

Sansa had wasted little time in summoning as many as possible to Winterfell, where they might protect them. The smallfolk in the fields were too vulnerable to the roaming dead.

So many petty lords and militias had been mustered to fight the white walker’s forces, and yet they had still had scarcely any word from the Wall itself. The battles to the north had lasted for near a week, amidst a fierce snowstorm that was only just settling. Winter is here.

Vaguely, Sansa wondered what Jon was doing right now. Any moment now, they expected to see the dragon flying over the horizon. Sansa prayed to all the gods that he would bring good news from the Wall, but she could not allow herself to hope. No, I must prepare for the worst.

The Winter Suite felt unusually warm and stuffy as Sansa trotted through the doorway, and plopped herself behind the stone table. The men-at-arms – each wearing white stones over direwolf sigils – bowed to her. The men were sweating under their boiled leather and chainmail. The whole castle was sweating.

A personal guard of the most seasoned and well-disciplined soldiers remaining had been assigned to both Sansa and Bran, to follow them at every moment. Tensions remained too high; they rarely left her side. Even when she slept, she had to leave the door open and two guards stationed by her bedside, to raise the alarm at any assassin in the night. She had not slept comfortably for weeks.

Sansa took a deep breath, gathered herself, and looked over the mess of parchments and letters strewn over the table.

Lord Forrester arrived before Sansa could even pour herself a glass of wine. Lord Gregor was wearing riding leathers under a thick white cloak, sweat beading over his forehead. It was barely dawn, but he must have just returned from meeting the party on the kingsroad. “Report, Your Grace.” The Captain of the Guard bowed. “Lord Wyman arrives with four score mounted men and knights, and a full baggage train.”

“Thank you, my lord. Who comes with him?”

“The lords of the White Knife. The envoy too, and various merchants. They also bring the prisoners and hostages you requested, as well as that pirate admiral.” Lord Gregor’s face twisted slightly. “And one ‘Mother Mole’ – she supposedly leads the column of wildlings of free folk and converts.”

Yes, Sansa mused. The Cult was growing drastically, and it was little surprise they were flocking to Winterfell. Many lords were already becoming uneasy with their numbers.

“And riders from the east come with Lord Manderly’s party,” Lord Gregor continued. “I met with them this morn. They claim that the Dreadfort has surrendered.”

Sansa raised an eyebrow. “Truly?” She poured a goblet of wine. “Surrendered?”

He nodded, passing her a grubby yellow letter from his pouch. It was written on charcoal by a rough hand, and stained by the elements. “Ser Marlon Manderly writes that the castle is in good order, it fell to a successful siege,” Lord Gregor explained. “He negotiated a surrender with a serjeant named Steelshanks. I’m told that the Bolton loyalists lost all will to resist after news of Winterfell’s fall reached them. The Dreadfort is ours, with very few casualties.”

Ser Marlon? Sansa mused, before recalling. Ser Marlon was of the Manderly branch family from White Harbour, and the new heir to Lordsport after the death of his brother Ser Mardrick. Jon had spoken briefly but favorably of him.

“Capital. Have Ser Marlon garrison the castle, and then move his men west.”

“As you will, Your Grace.” If he bore any disdain towards being ordered by a fifteen year old girl, Lord Gregor did not show it.

“And arrange word to Castle Black at all haste,” she added, “a rider, alas; we have no ravens to the Wall remaining.”

“I will, Your Grace.”

Jon would want to be told quickly, she thought, but the snows will delay any movement. And yet still…the fall of the Dreadfort? They had received word only a few days ago that Moat Cailin had fallen to the crannogmen under Lord Reed, and now the Dreadfort followed. Its fall marked the total defeat of Bolton loyalists in the north. “Any word on the hostages in the Dreadfort?” she asked after a pause.

“None so far, I shall enquire.”

“Do so, but you must see to Lord Wyman’s party foremost, and clear rooms in the castle for his men,” Lord Gregor nodded. “Offer Lord Wyman our hospitality, and alert me as soon as this emissary arrives.”

“He already has, Your Grace,” Lord Gregor admitted. “He rode back with me, ahead of the lord’s wheelhouse.”

Sansa blinked in surprise, but perhaps it was to be expected. Lord Wyman’s convoy moved at a snail’s pace, and from what she had heard the envoy from the Iron Bank was an eager man. “Then invite him up.”

Lord Gregor bowed and then left. Sansa paused, taking a deep breath to collect herself. There were two dozen letters and tasks that lay before her, but the envoy felt like one of the most urgent. They were planning for Bran’s coronation within the week, as soon as the great lords arrived, but theirs would be a short-lived kingdom unless they secured the Iron Bank’s patronage.

Enemies on all fronts, she thought. What would Littlefinger do?

She had heard of the battles to the north, and the swell of refugees brought word Prince Snow’s victory and little else. The snows had subsided somewhat, but they were still struggling to even take stock of the dead and the damaged. They needed allies and they needed support.

But the Dreadfort has fallen, Sansa told herself. The last of the Bolton sympathisers had withered away or bent the knee, and finally House Stark was unchallenged in the north. If ever there was a time that the Iron Bank could make a deal, it was now.

She met the Bank’s envoy at the entrance to the Winter Suite, his head low and waiting by the stone doors. The guards were all suspicious and watched him closely, but the tall and gaunt man kept his eyes downwards, almost like a servant. Still, he was a servant wearing as much wealth as she was – he wore high-collared purple robes trimmed with ermine, and a brimless three-tiered hat. His tunic was gossamer with gold trim, and his beard was so long it almost reached his waist.
With her approach, the representative of the Iron Bank of Braavos bowed so deeply that his hat could have touched the floor.

“Princess Sansa,” Tycho Nestoris swooned. “The word of your beauty was not exaggerated – you look radiant.”

“That’s very kind, my lord.” Sansa smiled, extending her hand. “May I thank you for coming to Winterfell to talk, I am sure it couldn’t have been an easy journey.”

“Oh, not at all. The sights I have seen alone have made this journey worthwhile.” His face didn’t flicker. His voice was kind, but his eyes were calculating. Sansa recognised that look. “And I am not a lord, Your Grace. I am but a humble servant of the Iron Bank.”

“Nevertheless,” Sansa said, “Winterfell is glad to have you here. Please, do you care for a drink?”

“It would be appalling of me to refuse, Your Grace.” The guards opened the door for them, but nevertheless they stopped to search his robes for hidden weapons. Sansa smiled apologetically, and yet not a hint of affront reached Tycho’s features. For all he must have spent the last several days riding through heavy weather, the banker looked absolutely immaculate and composed.

Sansa nodded to a servant, who produced two glasses of wine forthwith, while Tycho stood back to let her sit down. “I do believe the Lords Manderly and Umber invited me to discuss terms at their council?” he noted. “It was Prince Snow that reached out to the Iron Bank.”

And you refused him for months. “Indeed they have. I was just hoping we could have a talk beforehand.”

“But of course.” He sat down opposite her across the heavy stone desk. “Should I consider this a personal talk, or a negotiation of state?”

She raised an eyebrow. “It cannot be both?”

“Forgive me, Your Grace, but I prefer to be clear,” the banker replied smoothly. “In many lands, it would be a grave offence to discuss such matters with someone outside of governance. You are the young king’s sister, but I am not aware that you hold a rank within his court?”

Perhaps that was meant to be a slight barb. It didn’t feel malicious, though, more probing. There had been no official rank assigned to Sansa – not yet, at least. “Then you may consider me the king’s advisor,” Sansa replied, without a flicker. “After all, what boy does not heed the suggestions of his elder sister?”

“But of course. I apologise. I must admit, though, I am uncertain of the hierarchy and customs within your kingdom. It is such a newly-declared country, after all.” Tycho smiled.

“We all serve my brother, King Brandon Stark of the North,” Sansa said, with a sweet smile of her own.

“As you say, Your Grace.” He dipped his head. “And what of your half-brother? What position does he hold?”

There was the briefest of pauses. “Prince Jon Snow leads His Grace’s armies. He is the commander of their ranks, the champion of the North.”

“And outside of the field? What role does the Prince Jon hold in your politics?”
“You are very curious about Jon Snow, my lord.”

“Well, it is curious, is it not?” He took a sip of the wine from the goblet, but Sansa didn’t touch hers. “Jon Snow; proven commander, famed warrior, eldest child of Eddard Stark, dragonrider and perhaps the most famous man in the north, if not the whole of Westeros. The White Dragon – the country has been aflame with whispers of him, such talk has reached even the Free Cities.” Tycho Nestoris glanced around the empty Winter Suite. “Why, if he had taken the throne for himself, I do not believe many would have objected, or that any would have been surprised. And yet, Jon Snow decides to raise his younger brother up instead – a crippled boy, no less. Now that is surprising.”

“Jon is not a trueborn son.”

“Nevertheless.” That single word hung in the air.

Sansa reached for her wine, holding the goblet but not drinking it. “Jon cares deeply about the customs and laws of the north, my lord. It would have been improper for him to be king, and he loves his family so. Brandon Stark is my brother Robb’s heir, and Jon would never take that from him.” She took a small sip of wine. Thick mulled wine – strong and sour. “There is no conflict within my family, my lord. We have naught but the best interests of House Stark at heart, and Jon was appointed the Protector of the North.”

“And the heir apparent to the throne?” Tycho pressed. “Forgive me, Your Grace, but I do hear rumours that Bran Stark’s injury will leave him childless.”

“King Bran is still a child.” Her voice turned slightly icy. She would not mention the possibility of Rickon, not here. “And we have nothing but love towards our brother.”

“But of course.” He lowered his head again, in quiet apology. “I only wish to understand the lay of the land, so to speak. This investment from the Iron Bank requires due diligence, after all.”

“How much has Lord Manderly petitioned your bank for, my lord?” Sansa asked, feigning ignorance. She already knew, but she wished to gauge his reaction.

“A loan equivalent to seven million gold dragons, Your Grace, or the value equivalent in gold or other hard specie.” Tycho took a sip from his wine. “The sum of the principal is to be paid across two years, but the majority must arrive quickly in time for winter. Lord Wyman was quite adamant on that point. All assuming that an agreement is forged, of course.”

“That is a lot of money.” Sansa agreed. More coin than Winterfell could take in twenty years of summer taxes, even without sending the Iron Throne its own dues. “And your terms?”

“The Iron Bank does not accept devalued coinage, nor any alternate payments outside the breadth of the contract. The loan comes with a grace period of five years or until the first harvest of spring –whichever comes sooner – with interest of seven percent per year adjustable with winters. The bank is to be granted a designated portage in White Harbour to which quarterly repayments will be made; we shall manage its transport towards Braavos ourselves. Too many previous customers have blamed their failure to pay on delivery, you understand.” He gave a soft smile. “And in addition, until the next state contract is officiated, there is a designated point five percent rate to be made in perpetuity.”

She raised her eyebrow. “Perpetuity?” she repeated.

“Forever.” He nodded.

Yes, Sansa considered, the Iron Bank was not one to slacken the noose. The rate of interest… it was hideous, almost double the rate at which the Bank had lent to the Targaryen dynasties.

If the Others don’t destroy us all, she mused humourlessly, the interest rates from the Iron Bank just might.

But the north needed a lot of money right now. The Boltons had left Winterfell’s treasury barren, and to try to gather levies in the middle of winter was the height of folly. The land was devastated, there was already so few resources to spare. All the wars and the poor preparations for winter had left the north in dire straits. And perhaps the biggest war is yet to come, she thought with an internal grimace. A war in the winter.

Still, the joke was on Braavos – it appeared that they would be facing an endless winter, and so the North might never have to make a repayment at all. Vaguely, Sansa mused on just how much ‘ice demons’ would affect their premiums.

“I understand the Iron Bank has made no commitments,” she said coolly, without letting her expression change. Perhaps we can use the Dreadfort’s treasury, if there’s anything left.

“The matter is still under review, Your Grace.”

“By yourself?”

He shook his head. “By the archons of the Iron Bank, and in consultation with the Sealord of Braavos. The Iron Bank deals with countries, it is beyond any one person. My assessment of the north has only a minor rule to play in the proceedings, truth be told.”

Sansa didn’t believe that. You did not send a representative through a war-torn land with all haste for a ‘minor assessment’. “But you are here to review?”

“Simply to take stock of the situation – my superiors expect a first-hand account of the state before any commitment can be made. I am trusted to represent the Iron Bank in such… delicate matters.”

“I understand. We all have parts to play, do we not?”

“Of course.” Tycho nodded. “And you must understand the irregularities we are dealing with here. In any other circumstances, I do not believe we would have even reviewed your case as far as we have.”

“I see no reason why you wouldn’t. Ours is an old and strong kingdom.”

“But not rich. You have no great wealth of gems, or minerals, or metal. No vast farms, orchards or groves. If we were to lend the north such a vast amount, well, we must ask… how would you ever be able to repay it?”

“We export timber, stone and furs.”

“Very true,” Tycho said. “The north does have many trees with strong wood, and such fine furs and hides too. Your waters are bountiful with fish and lobster, and your silver and iron mines have been productive for a thousand years. But even in summer half your kingdom lies empty and fallow, and too much of your springs and summers are spent simply recovering from the winters. Yours is not a strong economy. You lack the gold to even mint your own coinage.” He shook his head. “It would take you a hundred years to repay the Iron Bank’s loan.”

“Is that not good for you? From what I understand, the Iron Throne is still paying off the debts made in Maegor’s time, but who cares? We need not pay the debt, we need only pay the interest on them. A long debt is only more profitable for the banker.”

“Only if your kingdom lasts a hundred years,” he said grimly.

“Ours is the oldest kingdom in the realm, my lord. The Kingdom of the North was ancient long before there even were seven kingdoms. Winterfell has survived the last eight thousand years.”

“Perhaps.” A single non-committal perhaps, the man could have shrugged. “But the matter goes beyond finances. To say nothing of the contractual difficulties… understand that it is a great taboo for me to even be here. The Iron Bank is in contract with your enemy – we do support King Aegon Targaryen, after all.”

She had expected this. “And how many dragons does King Aegon have?”

For once, a grin split the banker’s face. “Indeed,” he conceded. “But nevertheless, a deal was made, and King Aegon is fulfilling his end of the bargain admirably. The revived Targaryen regime has accepted the debt of their predecessor, they have restored political and fiscal order, and they have already paid their first instalments towards Braavos. There is no reason for us to break our contract with them. For us to ally with their enemy is a severe breach of trust.”

“I feel like that is a short-sighted approach, my lord. Or perhaps it is too long-sighted.” She took another sip of wine, and then leaned over the table. “You are aware that my brother’s dragon is well over a hundred feet long, yes? Larger than Balerion the Black Dread.”

“So I hear. I would very much like to see it myself.”

“You will,” Sansa promised. “Tell me, if my brother flew south and demolished King’s Landing in dragonfire, then would Aegon still be making his interest payments?”

Tycho didn’t immediately react. His eyes did not widen, but his lips thinned. There was a long silence as the atmosphere turned icy. Sansa kept her gaze steady. “Is that…?” Tycho paused, then spoke lowly. “Should I consider that as a threat, Your Grace?”

“Not at all. I’m merely speculating on hypotheticals,” Sansa said smoothly. “For instance… consider this version of events; winter comes, the north is poor, and the north starves. All men need to eat, and I imagine that my countrymen will become quite desperate. And, of course, with no other choice available… the only place where we could survive is the south, is it not? Thus – if matters continue without aid – I fear that a conflict with King Aegon may become inevitable.

“It makes me think of rats in a pit, actually,” she mused, as Tycho stayed quiet, “so long as the rats are well-fed and safe, then they’ll be content. But if you starve and rile the pit, then those rats will tear each other apart.”

The representative of the Iron Bank didn’t reply, but his eyes were sharp. Sansa’s lips curled up at the edges, but it wasn’t a smile. “Let us work through that scenario,” she continued. “I think that a winter’s war against the south might become quite likely. Nigh unavoidable, alas. And perhaps we would struggle to conquer the south, but I rather think that we could do a good job in destroying it. I mean, could you imagine the devastation if my brother were to set his dragon loose? Like he did at the Twins, perhaps?” She said the words like they were a little jape, but there was no humour in them.

Tycho turned very stiff. He was looking in her eyes, and she was smiling like she’d just made a girl’s jape, but she really, really wasn’t jesting. “I was hoping this would be a calm, rational and civilised negotiation, Your Grace.”
“So was I, my lord – believe me, so was I,” Sansa replied, letting her smile drop slightly. “But I’m a realist.”

“Tell me, how old are you, my lady?”

“Oh no. It’s impolite for a lady to discuss her age,” Sansa chuckled. “But besides, you already know, don’t you? You just want to weaken my position by pointing out my youth. Would you rather dismiss me as a pretty face in a low-cut dress, rather than taking my threats seriously?”

“You said that they weren’t threats.”

“Forgive me. I slipped,” Sansa lied. “I am just trying to make sure you are aware that the north could really use the Iron Bank’s patronage. Elsewise, can you imagine the steps that we might be forced to take without it?”

“Spare me the doubletalk.” The banker’s voice stayed calm, low, but his tone turned cold. “What are you suggesting?”

“Keep the pit well-fed, my lord.” Do not fuck with the rats. “The Iron Bank has a vested interest in Westeros staying secure. Now, whether this King Aegon likes it or not, the north is part of Westeros. We do desperately need your patronage, lest the alternatives we might resort to are grim.”

Make a contract with us, or we might destroy your contract with the Iron Throne. She could think of no clearer way to say it.

“Now then,” Sansa said, as she leaned back in her seat. “Later today, I am sure Lord Manderly will invite you to his solar, where, along with many other great and noble lords, they will present an attractive offer in return for the Iron Banks patronage. The North is the closest neighbour to Braavos after all – I know that Prince Jon is even willing to vow that his dragon will be readied to protect the Free City, should you call upon it.

“We want your trade and your bank; Winterfell is very eager for an alliance with Braavos, and I am sure Lord Manderly will try to convince you of the benefits. Still, I know that you will be sceptical.” She gave another smile. “And so, I would like you to remember this conversation as well. Consider what might happen if the Bank refuses to support us.”

There was silence. Their wine cups were left near untouched; Sansa had been drinking only the smallest sips. Sansa counted the heartbeats. After a dozen, Tycho spoke. “You should know,” he said grimly, “the Iron Bank of Braavos does not respond well to threats.”

“It’s not a threat,” Sansa lied. “Just a hypothetical. Please, listen to Lord Manderly – I’m sure he will make a better case than a silly little girl like me.”

“I’ve been looking at her like she was a silly little girl. The Iron Bank understands war, Your Grace. We have a motto; war is business, and yet peace is profit.”

A loan can only be repaid if a country is at peace, Sansa mused. “I understand.”

“And perhaps we could convince the archons to support the independent Kingdom of the North,” Tycho said slowly. “But, if there was another condition added to the negotiations, well, I feel confident that that could improve the outlook.”

She leant forward over the table. “What do you have in mind?”

Sansa paused. “Do you expect the north to cede its new independence?”

“That is between you and the Iron Throne. But if you were to make peace between your state and the Seven Kingdoms, then the Iron Bank will happily support both. I would then stake my life that your loan and alliance would then be approved. The full market of Braavos will become available to you.”

“Ah.”

There was nothing more to be said for a while. Sansa set her lips into a line and considered it. Yes, she decided, it makes sense from their perspective. The Iron Bank could only support both the North and the Seven Kingdoms if there was no conflict of interest between them. King Aegon would have to acknowledge the north as an independent state, to agree to their respective borders at the Neck.

It was… something to consider. The North would not kneel to the Iron Throne again, not now. The entire north had wanted to separate itself with Robb, and even now it held the same desire. Too many lines had been crossed by the southerners, too much bad blood had simmered.

Perhaps that left only two options; the Seven Kingdoms would have to conquer the North again, or the North would have to conquer the Seven Kingdoms. Or mayhaps there could be peace.

The silence in the suite stretched for near too long, as they both silently considered the future. “How much do you know of King Aegon, Your Grace?” Tycho eventually offered, tilting his head in a slight curious motion.

Sansa had to think for a moment. Events in the south had been hectic, and Winterfell was too removed from most ravens. There was too much she did not know – which she would never admit here. She pursed her lips, then spoke. “I have been kept up to date on his exploits. I know that Aegon is young, supposedly brave, and seemingly fair. He leads an army of mercenaries, he is very well-supported, and he claims to have come back from the dead. He has conquered the realm – well, a third of it.” Not including the bits that Euron Greyjoy and Jon Snow had conquered first, she added to herself. “And yet they also say he’s a pretender, a mummer’s dragon.”

“Words are wind. What is undoubted, however, is that King Aegon has achieved vengeance for your family by toppling the Lannisters.”

“That is true,” she admitted. And I pray thanks to the gods every night for that. Cersei Lannister was most certainly dead – and for that Sansa was grateful to Aegon. The Lannisters were ruined, and the whole realm was thankful. “But from what I understand of this Aegon, the Young Dragon,” Sansa continued after a while, “he is a man who considers himself the Conqueror come again. He will not be happy to accept only two thirds of his kingdom.”

“That may be so, Your Grace. But even Aegon the Conqueror was forced to concede Dorne’s independence during his lifetime. It is my hope that this Aegon may be practical himself.”

“And I trust that – in order to accommodate such a deal – the Iron Bank will throw their weight in approval of peace as well?”
Tycho nodded. “I believe that many of his colleagues will be very open to the idea. There are representatives in King’s Landing that will be urging the same. With all the difficulties that Aegon is dealing with on other fronts, yes, I think that peace between you could be very viable.”

Sansa scratched her chin in thought. She held nothing against King Aegon Targaryen, although she had no real vested interest in him one way or another. Some called him brave, but his alliance with the Imp and all those rumours of assassinations gave Sansa pause.

_Tyrion Lannister – my technical husband._ Just the thought of him dredged up too many memories, too many things she’d rather forget. Sansa was loath to even see him again.

_Yet the north has no real reason not to ally with Aegon,_ she considered, _so long as he’s willing to tolerate our independence._ The more she deliberated the notion, the more attractive it seemed.

Still, she let none of her thoughts show on her expression. Across the table, Tycho cleared his throat. “I can think of many reasons why the interests of the north and south align. For instance, there is the matter of the ironborn.”

Sansa raised an eyebrow. “Euron Greyjoy has proven himself a very dangerous man,” Tycho continued. “A man without conscience or restraint. The ironborn invade both your realms.”

“No, ours,” Sansa replied. “The reavers have been cleared from our western shores, there are none left but a few rogue bands on the Stony Shore.” _Which they are welcome to reave,_ Sansa thought in silent bitterness, _they might even find a couple of sheep left._

“Nevertheless,” he insisted, “the Iron Islands are a common enemy to Winterfell and King’s Landing both. They speak of the Crow’s Eye in hushed breath – they whisper of unholy powers at his command.”

Sansa allowed a smile. “Words are wind, are they not?”

“That is hard to say. Too few witnesses survive even to tell tales about him.” Tycho shook his head, beard swaying, his eyes grim. “But there have been far too many disasters to Euron’s name for me to dismiss them. Most certainly, the fate of Oldtown is the greatest calamity to befall Westeros in millennia.”

Sansa paused, carefully inspecting the banker’s gaze. He showed no sign of exaggeration; he was not taking the talk surrounding the kraken king lightly, no matter how fanciful. Tycho slowly cleared his throat. “Now, if the North were to assist the Seven Kingdoms against the ironborn, then that would go a long way to secure a happy resolution for all. It is to both your interests to see justice done against the ironborn, is it not?”

_Ah, how all the pieces fall._ Dragon or not, there was little doubt that Aegon would be far more concerned about Euron than he would be about Jon. Euron was expanding aggressively against Aegon, while Jon had made a point to leave the south alone, the Freys aside. And peace was profitable for the Iron Bank.

Sansa spent a long time in consideration, her mind racing through the possibilities. They couldn’t survive with enemies on all fronts. If they made peace with the south, destroyed the enemies in the west, and allied themselves with the east… yes, then they’d be able to focus solely on the true threat to the north. That could work.

_Still, what will be the best deal for us?_

“Tell me about Stannis Baratheon, my lord,” Sansa said suddenly.
Tycho blinked in surprise. “Excuse me?”

“You suggest to make peace with Aegon,” she said innocently. “But wouldn’t Stannis Baratheon be the true heir to the Iron Throne?”

“I would… I would not recommend such. The Iron Bank reached out to Stannis at one point, and we found him to be wholly unsuitable. A fanatic.” Tycho shook his head. “He is not a man that could bring peace to a troubled realm. And this realm is extremely troubled.”

“And yet Stannis sits on Dragonstone, does he not?” she asked, and Tycho nodded. “And how long will it take King Aegon to remove him from that seat?”

He shrugged. “A year, maybe more.”

“A year,” Sansa repeated.

“That is about how long it took Dragonstone to fall the last time,” During her father’s rebellion, she recalled, Stannis had been the one to capture the isle. How things come around again. “King Aegon will have to raise a fleet to besiege it.”

A year. The thought of those bloody bodies strewn before the Winter Throne flashed before her vision. The great hall stained black by ash. Sewing the Greatjon’s guts back together. A year isn’t fast enough. A day might not be fast enough.

Sansa pursed her lips, and leaned across the table. “Well…” Sansa mused. “I admit, that the offer you make is attractive, but Stannis stands as a severe concern for us.”

The banker looked off-guard; he hadn’t been expecting this turn in the conversation. “Perhaps you could relay a suggestion to Aegon’s ears?” Sansa suggested. “The north will be much more willing to negotiate, so long as Stannis Baratheon falls faster.”

Tycho blinked. “Yes…” he said with uncertainty. “That could be arranged.” He paused. “May I ask, what is Stannis Baratheon to you?”

Corpses before the Winter Throne… “A disturbance, my lord,” she replied simply.

“I had heard rumours that Stannis collided with Jon Snow beyond the Wall, but I was unsure of their credibility.”

“Stannis is simply an obstruction that I would see removed.” Her face gave nothing away. “Quickly, preferably.”

“I am sure that King Aegon shares your concern.” He smiled, slightly wooden. “Another common interest between north and south, it seems.”

There was a silence over the stone table.

“Thank you for your offer,” Sansa said finally, with a smile as she stood up. “I will have to speak with my brothers about it. In the meantime, I do hope you enjoy the feast Lord Manderly will throw.”

“I’m sure I will.” Tycho stood up as well, and then bowed. “This was… most helpful, Your Grace.”

“Likewise.” Sansa gave a sweet curtsying. “Oh, one more matter, my lord,” she said, as if she forgot, “what have you heard concerning Daenerys Targaryen?”

“Daenerys?” Tycho frowned. “She has set herself up in Slaver’s Bay, I believe, she is ruling from Meereen as queen. Her intentions regarding Westeros are unknown, but presently she is not a concern.”

The banker had a very good poker face, Sansa noted, but he wasn’t perfect. “I understand.” She nodded. “But do keep me informed. And please give my regards to your colleagues.”

“As you will, Your Grace.” He gave another bow, and Sansa sat back down in her seat.

The representative of the Iron Bank turned towards the door. Sansa paused at the table. “Oh, and Tycho?” she called suddenly, just before he left. The banker froze. “The loan required from the Iron Bank has just gone up to a straight eight million. That is the cost of adding a peace agreement into the terms, and peace is profit, after all.”

Tycho Nestoris paused, but then left without another word.

Once he was gone, Sansa took a deep breath. There was much to consider.

Stannis Baratheon. If they were right, and if it had been Stannis who summoned that shadow, then presumably he might do so again. What if another shadow assassin appears during Bran’s coronation? she wondered. Or during the council? The guards in the castle all held weirwood stakes, but that might not be enough. They might not survive another one.

No, they could not risk another shadow like it – both Stannis and the witch that served him had to be destroyed with all haste.

A servant came into the suite to clean up. Sansa eyed the neglected wine on the table, then raised a hand to halt him. She drank her cup in a single gulp. Jumping at shadows, she thought distastefully as she swallowed and then took her leave. Her eyes flickered over all the hectic activity happening outside in the courtyard, but her mind was elsewhere.

Personally, she couldn’t shake the suspicion that Stannis had allied with the white walkers. The thought of all those unholy powers apparently at his call had caused her many sleepless nights.

Magic, she thought as she rubbed her eyes. Cursed magic. The armies she could understand, the people she could deal with, but the magic caused her head to spin. Magic made Sansa feel scared; it felt like a whole different game, one which she didn’t know the rules of.

What has the world come to – that I must try to plan for living shadows and ice demons?

Stannis had to be removed. The easiest way would be if Jon and his dragon razed Dragonstone from the air, with the support of Aegon and his army, Sansa considered. It would even be a good way to secure a peace between them, and to remove a threat. So long as King Aegon agrees to such.

“Tell me,” Sansa asked Lord Gregor Forrester curiously, some time after the banker had left. The former Glover bannerman was now serving as the captain of Winterfell’s guard, and had been reporting to her on the refugees outside Winterfell’s gates. “What is your opinion concerning Aegon Targaryen?”

The lord frowned. “The most recent one? Good for him, I say. I lost family and good men fighting the Lannisters alongside Robb, and this Aegon has naught but my thanks for avenging them.”

Sansa was not so easily convinced.
She would have to write some letters, put some wheels in motion. Sansa looked down at the pile of parchments before her. Another sleepless night, it seemed.

There were more who wanted her attention. The knights from White Harbour were pouring through the gates, to say nothing about the ‘dragon cultists’ filling up Winterfell. There was news of Lyra and Lyanna Mormont heading from Bear Island for the coronation, but Sansa was more concerned of Lord Reed’s journey north from the Moat. From the dungeons, Sansa was also told that Barbrey Dustin had demanded to see her, but Sansa had far more pressing concerns.

Outside in the yards, a short and leathery woman in furs, almost a dwarf, was preaching before the castle. Sansa could not make out the words, only the shrill, fanatic screams. The sound of the pagan sermon was an unpleasant backdrop to her morning.

Sansa was halfway through drafting a letter for King’s Landing when she heard the voices from outside. At once, her guards jumped.

“I wish to speak to the king, he is…”

“No entry,” a man-at-arm’s voice commanded. “Step back now.”

“It is I, Admiral in His Grace's service, you do not…! Keep your hands off me, you grunt, I demand…!”

“Move away from the –”

“I insist on seeing… Salladhor! Salladhor Saan!”

It sounded like a scuffle rising in the corridor. Sansa looked upwards, just as her guard stepped into the room. The belligerent guest was not leaving, it seemed.

“Let him through, ser,” she ordered.

The man relayed the order, and she heard an indignant scoff from outside. There was the beat of heavy guards’ boots, and the tapping of leather high heels.

Lord Salladhor of House Saan stepped before her. Sansa had seen the man before only briefly, but there could be no mistaking him. The former pirate was eccentrically dressed; he wore sealskin pantaloons, a thick cotton shawl, and a wide-brimmed floppy hat with a ludicrously colourful feather sticking from the tip. He dressed himself in bright purples and greens. He was a blustering figure, with a swagger in his steps. He was an older man with sun-tanned skin, white hair and laughter lines creasing his skin, but still spry and lean.

A pirate. Sansa had heard much concerning the man. Her hands were folded across her waist as he stepped into the suite.

He grinned brightly, showing teeth. The guards kept close to his side, watching every movement.

“Princess Sansa, I believe?” He bowed in Lyseni style, sweeping his hands low. “It is an honour to make your acquaintance. Why, you are as beautiful as the tales tell.”

“So I’m told, but I’m also very busy, my lord,” she replied curtly. “You have business?”

“Alas, I have travelled many leagues to be here, I come with urgent news for the crown. I wish to speak to the King Snow?”
“Prince Snow, rather,” Sansa said, and a frown flickered across Salladhor’s face. “And the prince is not present.”

Salladhor froze, with a waxy smile. “He assigned me my task, I must discuss matters with him…”

“Prince Snow is fighting a war,” she replied. “His task is to defend the kingdom, and it is mine to keep the kingdom running.”

The lord paused, and measured her eyes, before his gaze flickered around the empty chamber. Then, Salladhor smiled, and bowed again. “Forgive the intrusion, princess. It is a pleasure to make your acquaintance, I am but your humble servant.”

There was no shortage of ‘humble’ servants, it seemed. She didn't return the smile. “I know of you – Lord of the Bite, I hear.”

“Aye, and I serve as an admiral in His Grace’s fleet. Whatever the need, I am at your disposal.”

“Really? Did you offer Stannis Baratheon the same service?”

At that, his eyes darkened. His lips pursed, the fake joviality draining from his voice. “I assure you, there are none who will wreak worse vengeance against Stannis than I.”

“So I've heard.” She was cautious, inspecting him. “Tell me something, my lord – why did my brother spare your life after you fought against him?”

“So I could travel the Free Cities in his name. From Braavos to Lys, I have represented his interests. I have flown the flag of the northern coalition most proudly, oh yes.” He smiled again. “Have I not been a devoted servant to King Snow?”

“That remains to be seen.” Still, with a nod, she motioned at Lord Saan to take a seat. “But I find it hard to trust a man who earns his position through betrayal.”

“Betrayal?” He even looked confused. “Why, who has known the sting of betrayal more than I? I have not betrayed, I have suffered betrayals – Stannis betrayed me and stole my ships. He lied to me with false promises, tricking me into supporting his folly. It was Jon Snow that offered me a chance for justice, and which I eagerly accepted. I have given him naught but grateful loyalty ever since.”

“You backstabbed the fleet that attacked White Harbour, did you not?”

“Never! I was loyal to the north all along! I was docked in Braavos when I heard of Aurane Waters and his plan. I wanted to stop them – but alas I had only one ship against their half a hundred, how could I?” He shook his head dramatically. “So I had to join up with them – as a means to forewarn the north. I joined their ranks and I waited for an opportunity to cripple them.”

_That he did_, Sansa admitted. The attack on White Harbour had failed and the north had captured several large dromonds thanks to the pirate’s actions. Salladhor had ransomed his deeds to earn his new title. Still, that didn't mean she had to trust him.

He leaned back confidently in his seat, with a smug smile. “You were the one that arranged the deal with the Iron Bank?” she asked.

He nodded. “That and more. I spent many months scouting out opportunities for the north. My family in Lys is most prepared to do trade with the White Dragon.” He reached out and extended a scrap of parchment over the table. “And I think the most promising of my efforts…”
Sansa slowly looked at the parchment. It was marked by a blue rose on white. A winter rose.

“That is a writ securing the services of the Company of the Rose,” Salladhor said proudly. “I met with their representative in Braavos, I made the necessary arrangements on your behalf.”

She frowned and unfolded the parchment. “The Company of the Rose?”

“One of the most formidable in the Free Cities – the Company of the Rose dates back to the days of Torrhen Stark and the Conquest. They were founded by northern lords who chose exile over kneeling, and yet now they are quite eager to return to their homeland. Upon reaching Braavos, my first instinct was to seek them out.”

She inspected the writ, marked with small letters transcribed in a smooth hand. The ink was faded slightly, but it was still legible. It was a list of names and numbers. “They’re sellswords?” Her voice was doubtful.

“Old sellswords,” he clarified. “Sellswords with history and honour to them. They still bear the names of northern houses,” he added after a pause. “Their commander bears the family name Frost, and his second-in-command is a woman named Greystark.”

Sansa raised an eyebrow. Those were old houses that had reigned large in the north’s history, but it was doubtful that the exiles had any real lineage of note; in the Free Cities, any could pick their own name. Little doubt they had simply chosen a name with meaning. She looked over the parchment. “How many?”

“Four thousand, a fourth of those mounted cavalry. They have made their name in northern Esoss, as far as Ib. The Company of the Rose have spent many years fighting territory disputes between Lorath and Norvos, but – for the right coin – the sellswords are ready to abandon their contracts and return to their homeland.”

“For the right coin’?”

He shrugged. “Exiles they may be, but they are still mercenaries. They are interested in a free north, but they still need coin to move. Yet I promise you, there are none finer. I made the same offer to Lord Wyman; if the north can front the bill, my ships shall bring them to your shores.”

She worked over the writ, at the offer made. The Company of the Rose put a high price on their services, it seemed. It was a lot of coin, and they had also demanded their noble houses restored as well. The sellswords had supposedly quoted them a discounted price, at least, but Winterfell would still struggle to pay such.

And yet four thousand capable men could do much good. Winterfell had already introduced enlistment, but the north was still feeling the strain to fill their ranks. Too many good soldiers had been lost recently. Sansa was of the opinion that they should be looking for as many more as possible.

But it all comes down to coin, she thought with a quiet grimace. We need the Iron Bank.

Lord Salladhor was looking at her expectantly. There was a sigil of a shark on his cloak clasp, she noted.

“Four thousand,” she said finally. “Tell me, how many more mercenaries and sellswords could be hired?”

Salladhor scratched his whiskers. “That depends on how much you will pay for them,” he said. “If the coin is right, then Braavos has a thousand captains that might sail for us. I could easily recruit pirates from the Stepstones, and Lorath has no shortage of mercenaries, warbands and cultists. We could reach out to the bearded priests of Norvos and the sworn axes that they train, or even to the Hairy Men of Ib. In the past, we might have sailed to Slaver’s Bay and bought soldiers in bulk, but alas that is no longer an option. If we were to buy every possible cutthroat and mercenary from Essos? Easily tens of thousands."

“Provided we have the coin.”

“Provided you have the coin,” Salladhor agreed, with a large grin.

If what Jon said of the Others was true, then the north would need all the manpower it could get. Eight million gold dragons might buy a lot of men, however. “You speak of the northern Free Cities,” Sansa noted. “What of the southern ones?”

Salladhor hesitated. “Many sellsword companies from Lys, Tyrosh and Pentos have already signed on with ‘Aegon’, and he is recruiting more every day. This Young Dragon has no shortage of coin, it seems.” He shook his head. “Still, there are many who have not been signed, and I have connections with most. If you are looking to bolster your numbers, then the Company of the Rose is a very good place to start.”

“And the matter of finance arises,” Sansa said after a moment. Her eyes narrowed, inspecting the pirate. “Tell me, what do you know of King Aegon Targaryen?”

The pirate snorted distastefully with the name. “I am likely more Targaryen than he.” He shook his head. “He is a fraud.” Salladhor paused, with a gleam in his eyes. “Are you looking to wage war against the fake dragon?”

“No. We must come to accords with the Iron Bank,” she said simply. “And the Iron Bank demands peace between north and south.”

“Ah. I would not trust Aegon Targaryen.” The pirate shook his head. “And peace will be difficult, princess – for there is a fleet mustering in the Bite. The ships of the Vale are moving north.”

Sansa straightened in her seat. “Excuse me?”

“I heard of it from a fisherman as I passed the Sisters, it was what prompted my return. Your friend, Lord Borrel, sends word.” He gave her a sly wink. “The lords of the Vale have been mustering their sails, and the Sistermen were forewarned. The first of their ships are likely already in the Bite by now – I believe the Vale means to establish a blockade over White Harbour.”

She had not been aware. Her first thought was; can this pirate be trusted?

Lord Salladhor met her glance. “Another thing that this Lord Borrel relayed for you – did you know that one Petyr Baelish has been named the king’s master of ships?”

She did not. Sansa could have cursed; Winterfell didn't have enough ravens left, they had been painfully removed from such news. They were relying on riders and messengers, but the snows hindered such. The north was always the last to know, it seemed.

“Is it not obvious? He wants you to be weak, and trade might make you strong. Aegon will not be so keen to allow you to deal with the Iron Bank, I think.”
Has Baelish allied with Aegon? Sansa could believe it. Still, Littlefinger didn't make alliances – he made stepping stones. What will Littlefinger do next?

“This blockade,” Sansa asked quietly, “how keen will they be on dragonfire?”

He chuckled. “Oh, they mean to harry the dragon, not oppose it.” Salladhor shook his head. “If pressed, Aegon will make peace, I have no doubt – but only as long as he intends to marry Daenerys Targaryen. He means to join his forces with hers, to take her dragons, and then to reconquer the north with her during spring. In the meantime, it is to his benefit if the north suffers a long and poor winter.”

We will see about that. “You speak poorly of him, my lord.”

Salladhor Saan shrugged. “I hear things. The tides rise and fall, the moon rises over the western sea, the captains conspire against the sealords, and the Free Cities scheme.” He paused, tilting the feather in his hat slightly before continuing. “There are whispers of Aegon’s backers; men of the highest wealth and power donating heavily to his cause. Many magisters in Pentos, Lys, and Tyrosh – some of the most dangerous and well-connected men in the east.” The pirate grinned broadly. “The king might as well be a cloth doll; it is his puppetmasters that are his true power. The Imp among them – the Lannisters were felled by conspiracy and assassination, not by might. They say the Imp used some Dayne bastard to kill his own maiden niece, to secure Casterly Rock for himself.” He leaned across the table conspiratorially. Sansa’s eyes flickered again to the sigil that Saan had taken; a shark stamped into the silver of his clasp.

“Did you hear that Nymeria Sand is to be executed for Prince Doran Martell’s murder?” Salladhor Saan continued loquaciously. “There was a coup in Dorne, all for the benefit of this king. They whisper that the Prince of Dorne was murdered at Aegon’s orders, that the Dornish lords were fooled. Oh, Aegon denies all knowledge – but that is the nature of Aegon’s reign. He is fool’s gold layered over bitter steel.”

Sansa let a few seconds pass in silence. Sansa clasped her fingers together, keeping her own thoughts hidden. She had heard of Nymeria Sand, but the reports were vague. Too many whispers and rumours, not enough facts.

And yes, the Imp was troublesome. The dwarf she had known had not been as obviously evil as Joffrey, but Sansa of all people knew how men could conceal their wickedness. Tyrion had killed his own father, and then most of his own family afterwards. If we ally with Aegon, Sansa couldn’t help but wonder, might Tyrion Lannister insist on upholding our ‘marriage’?

Aegon Targaryen seemed attractive, but her thoughts kept returning to those by his side; the Imp and Littlefinger.

Salladhor was leaning across the desk, looking at her intently. Despicable though he may be, the pirate had staked his status to the north, that was certain. And despicable men had their uses. Sansa considered him again, in more detail. Hmm, perhaps this man might be useful.

“What do you know of Daenerys Targaryen?” Sansa asked after a long pause.

Salladhor did not seem surprised by the change in topic. “Ah, yes. The ‘Queen of Ash’, they name her – after what she did to Yunkai. The war in Slaver’s Bay was a violent one, and this Daenerys is reportedly not one for mercy against masters. Afterwards, she flew against Volantis, raising a slave uprising in the city. The Triarchy promised her that the city would be ash before they let her ‘conquer’ it, and she took them up on that offer.” He smiled, with a light chuckle. “In Braavos and the northern markets, they hail Daenerys as a champion of the oppressed – but to the south and the slave markets they curse her name and shiver in their boots. The Breaker of Chains, the Stormborn, the ‘Azor Ahai’.” He tutted. “The slave trade may never recover.”

“Really?” Sansa cocked her head. “Tell me, does your family keep slaves?”

“Not anymore,” he laughed. “With news of Daenerys’ coming, the head of House Saan, my cousin, chose to be proactive. He released all of their slaves early. I feel like many in Lys will be doing the same.

“Not that it’s done much good,” Lord Salladhor added after a moment’s thought. “The slaves in Lys were well-treated and cared for. But now instead of shelter, warm meals and soft collars, they have disease-ridden slums outside the city, filled with freedmen begging to be taken back by their masters. This campaign against slavery seems baffling.” The pirate shrugged, and shook his head. “But it is no matter to me; I am a northman now, after all.”

“Indeed.” Sansa mused for a while. “And this is the woman that Aegon intends to marry?”

“Yes, but only because he thinks that three dragons will be her dowry. He has made no secret of his intentions – Aegon wants word of his offer to reach her.”

Yes, that was Aegon's weapon. His publicity. He wanted to be known as the brave and just king, back from the dead, while Jon would be seen as the evil bastard and the savage invading the realm. He wanted to be Daenerys’ ally, while making Jon out to be her enemy. Sansa thought of all those romantic songs and heroic tales she had once loved. Vaguely, she wondered whether Daenerys loved such songs as well.

All Sansa knew was that Ser Jorah had believed Daenerys to be a good person. Jorah had thought that she would consider an alliance.

What would Littlefinger do in this situation?

“A thought occurs to me,” Sansa said after a long pause, “that surely Daenerys would rather marry with a dragon than against one? Why would Queen Daenerys choose a mummer's dragon to wed, when King Snow the dragonrider would be a much better option?”

It was met by silence. Then, a long and slow smile crept over the pirate's features.

It was the start of a long talk with Lord Salladhor. Sansa could feel the makings of a plan falling into place.

Yes, she felt like Salladhor would be useful. The pirate gave her honest counsel when too many held their tongues. So long as she knew what Salladhor wanted, she could use him.

Sansa lingered and quizzed him on the state of the Free Cities and his travels. In turn, he suggested that she travel them for herself; he even volunteered to introduce her to the magisters of Lys, to which she gave a polite refusal. Towards the end, Lord Salladhor asked her of her intentions regarding Stannis. She replied that Winterfell had vested interest in ridding the realm of him. The pirate seemed quite pleased by her answer.

Even as she stepped out of the chamber, her head was still whirling. She was sizing up alliances with every step down the corridor.

Daenerys Targaryen was perhaps the greatest, most influential figure in the world. The Mother of Dragons, the Breaker of Chains, proclaimed to be Azor Ahai. If Daenerys Targaryen chose to refuse Aegon, then the Young Dragon would be left utterly toothless.
Sansa didn’t know Jon’s feelings on the matter, but they were irrelevant. She knew that Jon had refused to marry Wynafryd Manderly – but Daenerys Targaryen would be a more powerful betrothal than a hundred Wynafryds. There could be no stronger ally to secure the north against the white walkers.

But how to make Daenerys see that?

And if Jon steals his queen, then what does Aegon have left? Sansa considered. They could destroy him, but Sansa was loath to create yet another enemy. Could Aegon be pushed to accept a different bride, another alliance instead?

Her head spun trying to think of daughters that the north might offer, of which northern brides might be a suitable match for King Aegon. She considered Wynafryd only briefly, and then dismissed the notion. After a moment, she realised there was only really one.

Shit, Sansa cursed, it's me.

It was an unwelcome thought, but something to consider.

A plan was forming. She didn't have all the steps worked out, but she could feel it taking shape as she stepped out through the warm doorway. Across Winterfell, the great wheelhouse of White Harbour was rumbling through the gates, flanked by knights and followed by scores of hungry refugees.

Sansa could still vaguely hear the shrill cries of the witch woman, but the congregation of dragon-worshippers had moved towards the godswood. Sansa was grateful for the temporary quiet in the yards.

The princess met Lord Manderly in the courtyard, but only briefly. There was little ceremony; they only exchanged a few courtesies and fewer words. Somehow, the Lord of White Harbour appeared even fatter and redder than what she remembered; the travel had left Lord Wyman looking sickly. He was here to bury his son and his good-daughter, and Sansa did not wish to distract him from that.

Behind her, both Wylla and Wynafryd rushed to hug their grandfather. Sansa couldn’t look, she had to turn away.

All around her, Winterfell was hectic. Everything had to be prepared for Bran’s coronation, and Sansa had to see it done. Where am I most useful, what is most urgent?

Her decision was made for her when she saw a line of chained men being escorted towards Winterfell’s dungeons. Despite herself, Sansa hesitated.

There was one task that Sansa still needed to do, but it was not one she looked forward to. Something she had been meaning to do for a while, but she had always put it off, like she would anything so unpleasant.

As the convoy unpacked, Sansa pulled up her dress and strode down towards the guardhouse of the lower levels. Her guards kept close by her with every step. Lord Salladhor of House Saan seemed to sense who was the most influential figure in Winterfell. The pirate kept close to Sansa, following behind her guards.

She met Ser Ian Poole and several White Harbour knights by the steps to the vaults, and they all bowed to her while the prisoners were escorted through. “Your Grace,” the knight greeted, and Sansa just nodded.
As she walked down towards the dungeons, the stone still felt warm to the touch. The air was filled with a stale earthy musk, warm and thick. Ser Ian noticed her fingers lingering against the warm stone slabs. “We are still searching for the source of the heat,” the knight said, with a hint of wonder in his voice. “It appears to be coming from below even the crypts – it is warmer the lower you go.”

Sansa nodded absently. “And the prison cells?”

“Serviceable, but swelteringly uncomfortable inside.”

Good, Sansa thought.

The rows of dank dungeon cells seemed quiet. Once these dungeons had been filled to the brim, but slowly, all of the prisoners taken from the Battle of the Snows had been dealt with, one way or another. Some went to the gallows, some had bent the knee, and some would be forced to take the black. Others had just been dismissed as unimportant. Only the most stubborn or suspicious remained. There were well over a hundred cells in the immense labyrinth of dungeons; but now there were less than a dozen still occupied.

Sansa stopped before a cell at the far end of the first level, and there she saw a tall and crooked old woman hunched on a stone slab behind iron bars. It was a large cell, but still rough and bare. The lady’s face was creased with wrinkles around her mouth and eyes, and her hair was brown and grey. Once, the lady had dressed in cloth-of-black trimmed in silver and kept her hair tied in a widow’s knot, the very image of a highborn widow, but after a month of captivity her hair was unkempt and her clothes were grey.

The Lady of Barrowton, Barbrey Dustin. She had once been a handsome woman despite her years, but now she was filthy and unkempt, every single one of her years plainly writ into the wrinkles of her face.

Sansa stared, and folded her arms. “Lady Dustin.”

In reply, the old widow spat on the floor at Sansa's feet. A guard made to whack the prisoner through the bars, but Sansa held him back with a nod.

“Lady Dustin,” Sansa said again after a moment, weighing her words. There was no point in smalltalk, she decided. “You were a Bolton supporter, you have been held as an accomplice to their treason. My brother offered a pardon if you bent the knee and pledge fealty. You refused such.”

Lady Barbrey only scoffed, keeping her voice dark. “I will not bow to that bastard.”

“My brother,” Sansa said haughtily, “Brandon Stark.”

Her lips twisted. “The little crippled puppet?”

Bitter old hag. Barrowton had lowered its banners, but its lady still remained defiant. Other Bolton lords had made concessions and returned to the fealty of House Stark, but House Dustin had been House Bolton’s most prominent ally. An example had to be made and, by all appearances, Lady Dustin simply did not care. Sansa’s eyes narrowed, letting the silence stretch out. “I have but one last offer to make you,” Sansa said. “You will renounce all titles and lands, and you will stay in Winterfell. In return for an indefinite stay of execution, we will allow you an honorary status and comfortable stay until your end of days. If trust is restored, we may allow you to return to your family in the Rills.”

Lady Dustin only sneered at her. “What family do I have left?” The woman pulled herself up, scowling as she towered over Sansa. “Do you believe yourself in charge, little girl?”

“I believe that you’re behind bars and I’m outside of them,” Sansa retorted.

“That can quickly change.” The lady shook her head. “I will not surrender to the likes of you.”

“You do not have to. You have no children, no progeny, and we have already have selected the new heir to Barrowton – a cousin of your late husband, I believe. One Arnold? Arno? Arnolf?”

Sansa honestly couldn't remember – all the names had blurred. The man was of petty Barrowton nobility – to call him a Dustin branch member would be gross exaggeration. Still, it met their purposes; a probably-loyal man with any link at all to the main line of the Dustins was enough.

At that, Lady Dustin scowled. Her fingernails clenched. “Arnold Sparrow. A household knight, one of petty birth.”

Sansa only shrugged. The grand-nephew of the third son of a bastard, or some such. “Regardless, he secured Barrowton’s surrender. He will be raised to become the next Lord Dustin. He was very eager to accept such.”

Lady Dustin twitched. “Predictable,” she spat. “Never did like that boy.”

Sansa smiled thinly, but said nothing.

“So you have your next Lord of Barrowton,” Lady Dustin growled. “So what now? Will you kill me in this cell too? Claim that I took my own life?”

Sansa smiled, but there was no humour in it. “Do you know what I think, my lady? I believe you've decided to become a martyr.” She stepped closer to the bars, lowering her voice. “You still think that your own death might provoke House Ryswell into rebellion, so you've resolved to challenge us to kill you.”

She met her eyes. The older woman was defiant. Sansa respected that, if nothing else. “You’re wrong, of course,” Sansa continued. “The late Lord Ryswell, your father, is dead, and your remaining brothers have already accepted Jon’s deal. House Ryswell has had its rights and lands slashed – your family is a great house no longer. And you are useless to us.”

Sansa’s words were curt and cold, but Sansa had far too many other concerns over being kind. All she cared about was removing the last of her family’s defectors.

Lady Dustin’s gaze was murderous, she glared with quiet fury. “You cannot kill me,” she growled. “You need me. You need me to keep Barrowton. And I know too much, I know about your sister.”

“I need nothing from you.” Sansa’s voice turned frosty. The very mention of Arya made Sansa angry. This bitch stood by and let my sister be married to that monster. “You are a woman and a widow, my lady, and for that Jon might have spared your life. But I am not so kind. You will either bend the knee tonight or face the gallows on the morn. Goodbye.”

Lady Dustin looked like she might have screamed as Sansa turned and walked away. The princess of Winterfell didn’t look back. As he passed, Salladhor Saan gave the lady a lewd sneer.

Only two dozen steps down the corridor did Sansa take a deep breath. She was already counting up the cells, wondering at how many prisoners still remained. Sansa wanted as many as possible at Bran’s coronation, and the rest would be either set free, sent to the Wall, or executed.
This end of the dungeons was filled with new arrivals – the prisoners that had come from White Harbour. Sansa saw a heavyset man dressed as a lord being herded roughly into a cell. He was a fat, ponderous figure with a bright red face and dark blond hair. He wore a fine wool jerkin that was now grimy with dirt and mud. Sansa recognised the only lord from the ram’s head sigil on his surcoat; Lord Malcolm Woolfield of Ramsgate. Another to face trial.

Sansa stepped forward, and the heavy footsteps of her guards followed her. The lord’s eyes widened as he saw her. She wasted no time on greetings. “Are you a traitor, my lord?” Sansa asked.

“The only traitor here is you. You…” Lord Woolfield slammed in the bars, his voice breaking in rage. The guards around her flinched. “You murdered my sister! You and your bastard brother, Lady Lannister!”

“Your Grace, leave this fool…” Ser Ian Poole muttered.

Sansa ignored him. “Lady Leona’s death was no choice of ours, my lord. And your treason is more than that. You are to be tried before the Winter Court and the regent.”

“Tried? You dare to judge me, on puffed up charges?” His eyes bulged. “I have done naught, but every man who follows you ends up dead! Your brother is an oathbreaker and a bastard, you are Lady Lannister! Did you scheme it together? I pity the ‘King’ Brandon Stark, to be under the care of you—”

His voice was cut off as a man-at-arms slammed a gauntleted fist into Lord Woolfield’s nose. Blood spurted, bone crunched. Sansa scowled, but didn’t object. With a nod, she turned and walked away.

“Damn you and your brood!” Lord Woolfield brayed after her. “Damn you to—”

The guard hit him again, and the lord collapsed.

Sansa wondered briefly what Wynafryd would think to see her uncle treated so, but she didn’t dwell on that thought long. I must be heartless.

There were other highborn that she visited in the prisons, to bring the same offer. Each one looked ready to curse, whimper or weep. There was Mors Crowfood, Kyle Cordon, Lyessa Flint, Harold Slate, Ondrew Locke…

Sansa walked deeper into the stuffy dungeons, feeling the sweat on her brow. The further down she walked, the smaller the prisons and the hotter and wetter the air. The lowest levels of Winterfell felt more like a smoking cave than a dungeon, like walking down the throat of a sleeping dragon.

She looked around the cells, at the pale faces hiding behind the bars. Lords, ladies and highborn sons of White Harbour accused of treason, as well as merchants and captains with ties to the south accused of conspiracy. They all believed themselves innocent, they all thought they had been justified. They felt victimised, even, and perhaps some truly were. But how to discern the true traitors from the unfortunate fools?

Some had plotted against them, while others had just been manipulated. Sansa had to steel herself; this was no time for pity or mercy. House Stark had suffered many betrayals, and Sansa wanted to put a close to them.

She turned a corner, strolling to another wing of the dungeons. The stone was earthy and pitch black, the corridor filled with flickering torchlight. It was so warm it felt like an oven. She heard the scurrying of rats in the gloom, scattering away from her guards’ boots. The prisoners here were all wearing grey robes, with chains around their necks. Most of them were old, fat or balding. They were all scared, staring at her with pure terror.

Staring at me, like I’m a monster. Like I ruined their lives. Perhaps I did.

There were times when Sansa could understand how Cersei became the way she did. It was an uncomfortable thought. Why, in the name of all the gods, did I ever want to be queen?

“The prisoners from White Harbour.” Lord Salladhor motioned to the cells as he stepped to her side. “Your will is my command – all maesters were removed from their duties and brought to Winterfell.”

She frowned as she counted them. There were too few. “Are these all? Where are the other maesters that we restrained?”

Salladhor could not answer. After a brief search, they found a gaoler who could. “The last maesters were removed a week ago, Princess,” the man said gruffly. “Executed. The Circle took them to the yards.”

Sansa paused, staring at the gaoler. The Circle, she recalled vaguely, what the dragon-worshippers are calling themselves now. The gaoler himself was a wildling, she noticed. He bore a white stone on his chest, and tattoos of swirling lines up his neck. A tall and gaunt, grey-haired man, with only a single hand. “Who gave that order?”

The man shrugged. “King Snow, I suppose.”

Jon had not made mention of that to Sansa, although it had been a busy time and he left hurriedly. Why did they execute the maesters, did the men confess? She had not been told such, and she never knew what had been done with them.

Sansa also made note of ‘King Snow’ – even despite Jon’s decree, there were many who had not dropped that title.

She looked around the gloomy cells. There weren’t many of them. Hovering besides her, Ser Ian Poole looked nervous. “Your Grace, what do you want to do with these men?”

“I’m told that I must make peace with King Aegon,” Sansa replied stiffly. “But before I can do that, I need to know exactly who tried to sabotage us and how. These maesters have answers that I want.”

Behind her, an old robed man wailed. “Please… you are mistaken… I never–”

The gaoler slammed his boot against the door, and the maester squealed. Sansa turned back to the gaoler. “We will question them again, right here,” she ordered. A few faces flickered. “I want there to be no misunderstandings, I will ask the questions myself.”

The man nodded, but some of her guard looked uncomfortable. “Aye. But Princess, you do not have to be here yourself for…”

“I do.” She wanted to know first-hand. Behind her, the gaoler was already preparing a set of sharpened knives. An iron poker glowed red in the nearby fireplace, she noticed.

Sansa walked closer to the cells. Somewhere further down the hall, she could hear a man’s weeping. This must be done, she knew. I must be heartless, she repeated to herself, I must be stone. The thought reminded her of being Alayne Stone.

“You will tell me of all letters and ravens you relayed,” Sansa ordered to the cells. “Of all liberties you took without your lord’s knowledge, of all instructions that you received from the south.”

The doors groaned as the man forced the rusted lock apart. The sound of whimpers filled the cell. On a hunch, Sansa started with the maester who once served Ramsgate. He was a youngish man with auburn hair, a weeping mess, but Sansa made a point of not learning his name. She did not want to remember his name.

At one point, amidst the screaming, Ser Ian Poole excused himself from the dungeons, but Sansa could not leave. She did not trust the interrogators to ask the right questions.

Even under torture, the previous maesters had given them frustratingly little. The most they had admitted to was receiving a letter from Oldtown – a letter ‘encouraging’ them to think of the realm. The torturers had achieved little, Sansa noted; they had only extracted garbled messes from the prisoners.

And yet too many ravens had gone missing, too many letters had been misplaced. The maesters had sabotaged them. But which ones? And who guided their hand?

Ramsgate’s maester gave more of the same. He admitted that a rider with an Oldtown accent had once visited Ramsgate at night to speak with the lord, but he gave nothing more useful than that. When the one-handed gaoler finally drew his knife, the maester only wailed louder. “I don't know, I don’t!” he screamed. “If I knew I would tell you, but I don’t know his name – he never gave it! I never knew his purpose! I don’t know!”

Sansa’s lips pursed. Eventually, she had to leave and move onto the next. The maester of Lordsport had fully retreated into the farthest corner of his cell, managing to knock over his chamber pot in his gibbering fear. Sansa’s nose curled, and she hesitated. The dungeons were warm and swollen with fear and despair. It took deep breaths to focus herself. It was so hard to focus here. The air around her felt so desperate as the other maesters in the hall quivered and begged.

“You are wasting your time,” a voice said suddenly, from somewhere to her right. “The grey sheep know nothing.”

Sansa turned, looking at a prisoner in the opposing cell; a stocky, balding man. He was staring right at her with eyes that reminded her of a bulldog. He was wearing worn grey robes with an unkempt beard. His voice was rough and throaty.

She frowned. “And how can you say what they know or not?”

“Because most maesters are blind,” he replied with a croak. “They are trained not to ask. The Citadel looks unfavourably on true curiosity, most maesters are taught to forge their links, do their purpose, and no more.”

Sansa’s eyes narrowed, and then turned to her escort. “I know this one,” Salladhor said smugly, looking at the prisoner. “My men found him snooping around White Harbour, he had that chain hidden in his bag. Winterfell ordered the maesters to be clasped in irons, so I obeyed.

Sansa stepped closer to the man. “Do you know more than they do?”

“I do.” There was a slight quiver in his voice, but he held himself strong. He was short, but beefy. “I am not most maesters.”
“Then interrogate him next,” Sansa ordered to her guards. “And bring me his belongings, I want to see everything he was carrying.”

The maester grunted as the men-at-arms stomped through. He looked little like a scholar; he was thick-necked with a strong jaw, a heavy chest and a hard ale-belly. The man had huge, meaty hands, and fingers that looked more suited to breaking bones than gripping quills. And scabs and bruises on his knuckles, Sansa noted. It looked like this maester had been punching someone quite aggressively.

The guards did not let Sansa step too close. They were all being extra cautious, and the maester was clamped in heavy irons. After a quick search, they brought her the prisoner’s bag; a worn leather satchel caked in mud. She quickly rummaged through it.

Sansa saw the man’s chain on top of a pile of dirty clothes and travel gear. It was a long chain of many different metals, obviously how they had identified him as a maester. The air was quiet as she searched deeper through the bag; he had some blank parchments, a notebook filled with scribbles in some unfamiliar language, a pouch of silver, but then near the bottom she came upon a short metal rod wrapped up in an old blanket, along with a strange, plain mask. Then she found a ring as well; smooth and black, unadorned metal. Sansa held the ring in her fingers.

The others must have found the items too, but they hadn't realised their significance. It took a moment to click. The rod, the ring, and the mask – three pieces of artifice granted by the Conclave upon ascension. They were all smooth metal, and dark like polished iron.

“You are not most maesters,” Sansa agreed finally, holding up the ring. “You hold the iron ring, sceptre and mask – you are the archmaester of warcraft.”

The maester shook his head. “No, look closer. That is the Valyrian ring, that of the higher mysteries. I am the archmaester of magic. My name is Marwyn.”

Valyrian? At that, there were mutters around her. From an adjoining cell, Sansa overheard a gasp of shock. Her fingers wrapped tightly around the Valyrian steel ring. She could see the ripples in the metal now, dimly washed in the faint light of the dungeons.

“Indeed.” Her voice was a mutter. She stepped closer, inspecting the man.

The archmaester lowered his head, as if humble. There was a tremor of fear on his chin, and sweat down his forehead, but he kept his voice strong. All of Sansa’s guards stood poised and ready.

“And why is an archmaester of the Citadel in Winterfell?” she asked finally. She could think of many possible reasons, and all of them suspicious.

“I am seeker of truth, of knowledge, Your Grace,” he replied. “I came searching for truth.”

“And why is an archmaester of the Citadel in Winterfell?” she asked finally. She could think of many possible reasons, and all of them suspicious.

“I am seeker of truth, of knowledge, Your Grace,” he replied. “I came searching for truth.”

“Such as?”

“The dragon. Whispers of the white dragon reached Oldtown, and I headed north to see it for myself,” he explained lowly. “That was many months ago. I wanted to reach the Wall, except at the time the ironborn were on the warpath – I could not travel up the western coast so near the Iron Isles. Instead, I believed that it would be faster to sail across the cape of Dorne and up the narrow sea, to Braavos and then to White Harbour.” There was something in his eyes, he bore a haunted and fatigued look. “The journey north has proven… gruelling.”

She did not reply, and in her silence he continued. “Alas, I arrived north during the blockade, and remained trapped thereafter. No ship would take me from Braavos to White Harbour. It was only after the battle that I finally found a smuggler to take me through. I arrived but a moon ago, where your… admiral found me.”

“He claims you were snooping,” Sansa said, glancing back to Salladhor.

“I was not. I wanted to come to Winterfell regardless,” he retorted. “I would have preferred the journey without the chains, but I always intended to introduce myself. You are Princess Sansa Stark, yes? May I please speak to King Snow?”

“I think not.” She stepped closer. “My brother believes that the maesters were part of an organised plot against him.”

“I do not doubt it, Your Grace. If they received instructions from the Conclave, they would have obeyed and not questioned why. But I am not like most who wear the chain, my lady.”

“We shall see.” She kept her voice impassive.

Archmaester Marwyn grimaced. “I can be useful to you, my lady. I will answer any question you have, I have knowledge to share.”

She looked down at his chain. Archmaester Marwyn had far more links in his chain than any maester she had ever known – Pycelle and Luwin included. She couldn’t even identify the materials in half of the links; there were many strange and obscure metals, including some that looked like wood or stone, or even bone. But why would an archmaester travel so far into hostile lands?

“Yes,” Sansa mused. “But that is the issue – how do I know you will answer truthfully?”

“I would not lie to you. I can…” His face was pained. “If only I could speak to King Snow? I would very much appreciate his company, I believe he will want to see me.”

Sansa did not reply, but she tilted her head. “I have studied much on dragons, and on dragon lore and tendering,” Marwyn continued. “I have read all the greatest scholars in the field – from Munkun and Vaegon, to Barth and Thomax. If King Snow requires guidance or aid with his dragon, I could assist….”

The last thing my brother wants is a maester near his dragon.

At that, Marwyn grimaced. For a brief moment, he appeared flabbergasted. “When will they return? If you could allow me…”

“I think not.” Sansa reached a decision, and stepped backwards. She turned towards the gaoler. “Ser, please interrogate this man. Compare his answers to the ones the previous maesters gave, search for discrepancies.” She looked back at Marwyn. “Once we are confident he is telling the truth about his purpose, then we may talk further.”

The guard frowned. “It was Rattleshirt that tortured the last ones, and he left with Snow.”

Marwyn’s face paled. “Then find another to do the task,” she ordered.

“Please, Your Grace, you do need…” the archmaester begged.

I cannot afford to have a heart. What would Littlefinger do? Sansa turned and walked away. The guards slammed the cell door shut with an iron clank.
Behind her, Marwyn flustered. “Wait! Wait, don’t…” He gulped. “You saw one of them – a shadow? A creature of smoke and ash?”

Suddenly, Sansa stopped.

What did he say? She never said a word, and she kept the shock off her face, but she turned around slowly.

The archmaester had a pained look. “I made the deduction,” the man admitted. “There were rumours of such in White Harbour, and I overheard the men muttering of demons. And your guards each have weirwood stakes on their belts.” He motioned at the men, at the white wooden weapons they kept close. “There is but one reason I can think of why you would need such weapons.”

She didn’t react, but she didn’t walk away either. “I am right, aren’t I?” Marwyn grinned, revealing reddish teeth stained from chewing sourleaf. “You saw one of them? Did it kill somebody?”

Sansa took a deep breath, and then stepped back towards the cell. “Explain.”

“No.” She shook her head. That was a tactic; asking questions to probe what the interrogator was already expecting. A way to discover what they did and didn’t know already. “You tell me everything you know first.”

“That would take a long time.”

Sansa frowned. Marwyn hesitated, then took a deep breath. “Throughout history, there have been mentions of such. Beings of darkness, they come and go without a trace,” Marwyn explained. “The very first texts named them As’ahad – the Dark Folk. Each culture afterwards has given them a new name; they are the Red Envoys, the Servants of the Goat, the Doomborn, the Sh’Ragnar, and the Moonless Children. In the Common, perhaps they are best described as wraiths.”

He looked at the look on Sansa’s face. “Others might call them shades. Some old legends refer to them as the spirits of the cursed or the restless dead, but I cannot verify that as the truth. Some sources they take the appearance of the deceased or dying; they are like… reflections. Creatures of smoke shaped like men.”

“And you just happen to know so much about these creatures? Should I take that as a coincidence that you arrive at the same time they do?” Sansa did not believe in coincidence.

“I am the archmaester of magic, I have studied everything unworldly. I have written books on lost books,” he replied indignantly. “One very old text – a lost book transcribing the songs of the children – mentioned a weakness to weirwood. The wraiths supposedly could not pass through a weirwood seal. When I saw your weirwood weapons, I made the connection.”

“Wraiths,” Sansa repeated. “And where do they come from?”

“It varies. But in most texts? They are creatures born from a sorcerer – they are elementals given purpose. The Maeligor Aracana describes a pact created by the summoner, a bargain of sorts. As far as any can discern, it is a ritual of blood magic from a sacrifice. In return for being brought into our world and granted life, they are said to fulfil a boon for the sorcerer.”

A boon. Sansa seized on the word, as Marwyn rambled onwards. Somebody had sent that thing to Winterfell.
“The ancient Asshai’i spoke of them with dread, but so few of the texts from that period... The Bloodstone Emperor supposedly had an elite guard of ‘warriors of shadow’, and one cryptic tome mentions that they fell to earth on a falling star. The lore is not limited to the Shadow Lands either, such mentions crop up from Sothoryos to Valyria to the Jogos Nhai. Wherever men have walked, so have the whispers surrounding these beings. The lore has survived among the moonsingers, the first refugees of Braavos, the Church of the Starry Sky...” Marwyn took a deep breath, like to calm himself. “Forgive me, I am rambling, I... I did not believe that any still possessed the ability to summon the Dark Folk, I thought that the power was lost to the ages. But then again, with the ephemeralic convergence...”

Sansa frowned, struggling to keep up. “The what?”

“The Great Change – the ephemeralic convergence is a term I coined,” Marwyn explained, while Sansa looked baffled. “I believe it to be an alignment of the seasons, a movement of the world. The red comet was not the beginning, merely a symptom. I do not know how or why – I’m but an astronomer looking at the heavens. I believe it to be a global phenomenon, a resurgence.”

She didn’t understand. Marwyn needed another deep breath after talking so fast. “The magic is returning to the world,” he said. “Suddenly, things are possible that have not been seen for at least centuries. Or millennia. We are in the middle of a great shift, like the movement of continents.”

Is the man mad? She wondered. He spoke with the passion of a mad man. Around her, the guards looked confused.

“Consider it, Your Grace,” Marwyn insisted. “The Drowning of Oldtown, the Great Fire of King’s Landing. The Doom of Slaver’s Bay. You have seen it yourself; the dragons returning, the wraiths stirring, the cold winds blowing. Even look at this warmth in Winterfell.” He shook his head.

“These are not localised events – the alchemists of Qohor have once again begun to whet their steel with human blood, in Yi Ti they suffer plagues without precedent, across the Rhoyne the stonemen are mustering, and even as far as Qarth the warlocks are rising to power. Glass candles are burning again.” The man looked like he could have laughed. “I have seen such things – things that never would have been possible even a few years ago. The magic is returning to the entire world, and with it comes destruction. The convergence.”

Sansa blinked. Part of her would have dismissed such as nonsense, but the other part... “And these wraiths?” she asked quietly.

“They are born of powerful magic. Very, very powerful magic – and thus have not been seen for centuries. They are something I have only read about in the oldest stories. The shadows live in their own realm – the Dark – but a sorcerer of sufficient power might grant them access into ours. Supposedly the Asshai’i shadowbinders once opened up a portal into the Dark itself, but...” Marwyn shook his head. His eyes gleamed, seeming entranced by the very thought. “I have studied such beings, but I never imagined I might see one.”

He sounded excited. Sansa didn’t speak, but she was measuring his expression. “The wraiths...” he continued, clearing his throat. “The moonlight makes them visible, and weirwood can harm them. They can fly during the blackest nights, and can move with great speed. They are unearthly deities granted human shape, capable of expressing themselves as shadow and flame. Such things are not easily controlled, or contained.”

She still did not speak. He looked up towards her. “But I know of some wards – ancient spells that I traced from the foundations of Storm’s End in my youth. Wards that supposedly grant protection against incorporeal beings. I might reproduce such, Your Grace; they can protect a location from malignant magic.” The archmaester nodded. “If you have an enemy that summons wraiths against you, I have spells that might offer protection.”

Sansa was suspicious. Marwyn quickly lowered his head, bowing as far as his shackles would allow. “Really?” She raised an eyebrow. “And what would you want in return for such aid?”

“Nothing, Your Grace. I only wish to help.”

At that, Sansa snorted. She shook her head, and stepped backwards. “And that is the point where I know you're full of bullshit.” The archmaester blinked. “Are you really such a saint, acting purely out of kindness? I was willing to entertain such talk of magic, archmaester, but do you really expect me to believe that you came all this way just to help? Goodbye.”

She stepped backwards, threatening to leave. At once, the archmaester jumped upwards. Guards flinched, pushing him back. “No… no!” He grimaced, frantic eyes looking around his cell. “I came for the dragon,” he admitted. “I came to study it, I wish to harness its power. Such a thing has not been possible for centuries, and I will do whatever I must for that chance.”

_He wants power_, Sansa thought quietly. She recognised that… that _fervour_ in his voice. Power in knowledge, perhaps. And yet that was understandable, and so long as she understood him then perhaps he could be used. Perhaps he was manipulable, as long as she bore his own ambition in mind.

_What would Littlefinger do?_

The archmaester probed her face, seeming to search for any kind of a cue. She gave him none, and he grimaced, desperate.

Sansa let a few moments pass, counting to ten silently. “Indeed,” she eventually said. Sansa paused curiously, letting her eyes see the man in more detail. He didn't look much like a maester, that was true. He looked like a village butcher or a portside dockworker. The way he talked, it reminded her of the Cult’s fanatics.

Still, her instincts were warning her, suspicions tingling on the back of her neck. She didn’t trust this man – she didn’t trust any stranger that came into her home – but…

If the last week had proven anything, it was that they needed to know more of magic. They needed to know how to fight it. If this man truly had answers… Sansa couldn't afford to ignore such an advantage.

Still, it wouldn’t do to agree too quickly.

“I will consider it,” she said finally, and then turned to leave. “In the meantime, enjoy your cell. I will see about having you moved in due time.”

As she left, her head was spinning. Marwyn shouted after her, but Sansa did not turn around again.

_Magic_, she thought. _Magic!_

There were so many thoughts scattered around her head, her feet paced over the dark stone. She was sweating – sweat patches stained down her back and under the arms of her silk dress.

Outside, the sun was so bright it was blinding. The whole courtyard was stirring, the gates churning with new entries; Winterfell was filling up with the convoy from White Harbour. Nearly all of them were wearing white stones. Sansa wondered vaguely just how many would be praying in the godswood tonight.
She would have gone to see Bran, but her brother was with Meera and Sansa didn’t want to interrupt him.

Mere months ago, she would have dismissed such talk of magic as lunacy, but she couldn’t anymore. She had seen a dragon in flight. An army of corpses had risen outside Winterfell’s gates. There was warmth rising from the ground beneath her, and nobody could explain why. My half-brother is a dragonrider, and my younger brother is apparently a wizard.

Vaguely, she thought of all those tales she had heard in court about Robb – of the wolf king that could transform into a beast, the man who commanded wolves in the riverlands. Sansa remembered the time she had spent with Lady, and the thought of her murdered direwolf still caused a pain in her heart. For a time, her direwolf had been part of her.

The ephemeralic convergence, Sansa wondered.

It was a long day, spent stewing over a hundred different concerns. Time was short and there was too much to be done. Sansa eventually found herself back in her father’s solar, studying a list of marriages between the wildlings and northerners that Jon and Lord Wyman had arranged some months ago. Soon she would have to determine who would sit in the Winter Court, who would be lords in the new north. She sighed and leaned back in her chair, eyeing the wine at her father’s desk. She wanted to gulp down the entire bottle just to calm herself, but she refrained. There was much she needed to talk to Jon about.

The coronation, she thought. As soon as Jon returned, they would hold Bran’s coronation. If Jon was not back shortly, they might have to crown Bran without him.

My brother will be crowned king. I will crown him king. It was a scary thought in so many ways.

In the distance, the swollen red sun drooped over the western horizon. Sansa stared out over the corridors and rooms that she once knew, and she thought of the days of lemoncakes and songs. The days of summer children.

It was only towards dusk when she heard the bells ringing. The sound was faint at first – a soft ringing from the gates. The noise started to spread, and down below people were running. Then, she heard a boom as the great bell of tower picked up the alert.

Sansa was already halfway down the stairs. She saw Lord Mollen running up to warn her. “It is from Cerwyn, my lady,” the lord panted. “A score of men approach.”

She was already moving. Cerwyn had been captured easily by free folk soldiers and the Bolton garrison surrendered, but they had received no warning. A few of her guards wanted her to stay in the keep, but Sansa refused. As soon as she stepped out into main hall, their outriders gave word.

A host of men were marching up the kingsroad, they reported. There were few cavalry among them, the majority were on foot but marching quickly. They were flying a lizard lion on their banner.

At once, Sansa breathed a sigh of relief. House Reed?

Sansa stood on the walls as the procession approached Winterfell’s gates. Just in case, there were archers readied. She saw the banners fluttering in the wind, showing lizard lions and snakes, toads and frogs, lilies and reeds, herons and fish, wildcats and aurochs. Houses Blackmyre, Boggs, Cray, Fenn, Greengood, Peat and Quagg, Sansa recognised. All of them petty houses of the Neck, many that she had never seen before in person – though the lords of the Neck were sworn to Winterfell, they so rarely emerged from their marshes. Most houses made their banners out of wool or hemp, but the crannogmen painted their banners on weave and twine.

The crannogmen were all lightly armed, with three-pronged spears and half-helms. To a man their clothes were painted with dun shades of brown and grey and green. It was rare for them to leave the Neck in such numbers, but House Reed had answered Winterfell’s call.

At the front of the column of men, a carriage rattled through the soft mud. The carriage was more like a farmer’s cart, light and beaten. It was pulled by horses so small they might have been ponies, but the steeds were stout and steady over the ground.

At the very back of the convoy, Sansa noted a single wagon surrounded by a troop of guards, every man flying a faded Stark direwolf.

The column came to a halt at Winterfell’s gates, and a small procession broke off to approach first. The cart came with them. Even when looking down, Sansa reckoned she could see the shock in their posture at the heat surrounding the castle.

Sansa stepped down to meet them as the hefty gates creaked open. Two dozen men and the cart were waiting behind the portcullis, Sansa saw, led by a tall and grim figure at the very front. The man held a dark iron helm under his arm, revealing a head of grey hair, as he held a banner of a black lizard lion in his other hand. Suddenly, she noticed Meera Reed rushing out of the castle, running through the courtyard.

The portcullis opened, and slowly spearmen parted to allow Sansa to step through. The man at the front had the look of a lord, albeit a worn and weathered one. His grey hair verged towards auburn near the back, but he was not balding. He bore a shaggy beard and cragged, windburnt features, but most noticeable was his scar. A blade had gouged across his cheek and scalp, cutting through an eye. The worst of the wound was hidden under an eyepatch, but the injury was still raw.

Lord Howland Reed has finally reached Winterfell.

At the sight of Sansa, the lord stopped. His eye widened in shock, his face paled. Blue eyes, she noticed. She only just heard the gasp; “Cat?” he whispered in shock.

Sansa forced a smile and stepped forward. “Lord Reed, I presume?”

The lord just stammered. “By the Gods, I…” He shook his head, off-guard. “Forgive me… Sansa, you’re… you look so much like your mother.”

She did not reply. He stepped forward cautiously. “I heard that you were in Winterfell, but I did not…” He looked as if he had seen a ghost. Behind her, Meera Reed was pushing through the guards, but her gaze flickered right past the man at the front. “I am not… I am Ser Brynden Tully, the Blackfish to most. Brother to Lord Hoster, your mother was my niece.”

Sansa blinked.

After a pause, Brynden Tully drew his sword, and lowered himself to his knee. He took a deep breath.

The stranger – the Blackfish – was looking up at her expectantly. “Your mother, she made me vow to…” her great-uncle started and then grimaced. “I fought alongside Robb, my lady, I held Riverrun for him during the Red Wedding. When the Lannisters came, I fled north to search for you, my lady. Lord Reed sheltered and healed me at Greywater Watch, and we captured Moat Cailin together. As I did with Robb, I serve House Stark. I swear to you the same vow I gave your Ser Brynden Tully? She hesitated, trying to recompose herself, and the tall man – my greatuncle? – turned and motioned to the cart at the back of the procession. “And we come bringing your father’s bones,” he said with a solemn nod, meeting her eyes. “Lord Reed held Eddard’s bones at Greywater, awaiting safe passageway. We can finally bring him home.”

Sansa suddenly wasn’t sure what to say.

Her eyes lingered on the cart flying the direwolf. There was a box in the middle of the wagon. A small box. Father?

Meera was rushing straight by Sansa, towards the carriage at the back of the group. “Father!” the girl called. “Father, what you are doing here, it is not…”

Lord Reed. Sansa’s gaze flickered for the man, but then her eyes turned towards the cart at the back. She didn’t know how to reply to Ser Brynden, so instead her feet stepped forward to see Lord Howland. There was no crack in her posture. The other spearmen stepped aside, and Sansa realised that all the men were shorter than her.

There was a figure in the cart, she saw suddenly. A gaunt man in the back of the cart under a pile of furs, being pulled by horses. He could not stand, and Sansa saw only his outline.

Meera pulled herself up to the cart’s edge, and suddenly there were tears in her eyes. “Father!” Meera cried, cradling a skeletal hand. “Father, what are you doing here… your health…?”

“My health shall last, my darling,” a breathy voice croaked. “I am where I must be.”

Sansa walked forward to see a sickly old man with green eyes, holding Meera tightly. He was whispering reassuringly in her ear, but there was a stutter in his voice and a tremble in his grip. He tried to pull himself up, but he hadn’t the strength and his throat broke down into wheezy coughs filled with phlegm and blood.

Then, Sansa saw the wound on his body. In the heat, the furs were loose on him, and she saw his figure. An ugly, crescent moon-shaped scar stretched from shoulder to thigh, as if he had been half-gutted. The wound was old and faded, the flesh had sealed with time, but the skin was still sickly pale and yellowish. A blow that had never healed properly, and the lord looked like he had been living on death’s door ever since.

Lord Reed followed her gaze to his scar. “It has been eighteen years,” he croaked softly, with an utterly humourless smile, “but Ser Arthur’s blade continues to torment me. I survived the blow at the time, but then days later the wound began to fester in the red sands. Your father had to carry me to Starfall. I have not been the same since.”

Lord Reed hugged his daughter tightly, cradling her in his arms. “I owe Ned so much,” he spoke in quiet, uneven breaths, meeting Sansa’s eyes from over Meera’s shoulder. “Without him, I would not be here, would not have even known my children. I could do naught for him but escort his bones, but I must do more for his children. House Reed is at your service.”

Sansa didn’t even know what to say.

He made a motion as if trying to bow while sitting down, but then winced in pain and gripped his stomach. Meera grimaced, then stepped aside. “Forgive him, Your Grace.” Meera looked to her, biting her lip. “Travel is very difficult for my father, he has relied much on Greywater to keep him…”
Meera’s voice trailed off. Sansa did not reply. The famously reclusive Lord Reed. He was struggling to even pull himself upright, and he needed Ser Brynden to help support him up in the cart.

Very sick, very wheezy, and very frail. He wasn’t even that old, Sansa realised suddenly. The lord might have only been middle-aged, but his sickness made him as gaunt as a corpse.

His eyes were lined with hollow shadows, but the orbs within glinted bright green. Even for a man so sickly, he had a cool, knowing gaze. Sansa was left speechless, but Lord Howland Reed finally managed to pull his head down into a pained bow.

“Princess Stark,” he wheezed. “I am here to see the king.”

The Mother

Near a week had passed, and yet she could still see the faint wispy haze of smoke over the horizon. Even after all this time, this strange southron city still smouldered. White Harbour – even burnt and half-broken, this was her new home, her people’s new home.

The charred silhouette of the harbour was visible through the open doors, as a thousand men and women filled the stone hall. “Salvation!” they chanted, feet stomping against the stone. “Salvation!”

In the distance, a fresh plume of smoke was breaking into the pallid sky.

Mother Mole stood on a podium made from the stump of a large oak tree and shouted at the top of her lungs. Her weirwood staff drummed off the marble to the beat of the chant. “For too long have we huddled in fear against the cold winds!” she screeched, above the jubilant cries. “For too long have we cowered before the creeping frost, for too long have we felt the frozen knives in our chests!”

The only reply was a voiceless roar. “For too long have we burnt our dead, in fear of the day that they would rise again!”

There were more people in her congregation than ever before, and every day it seemed like a few more. They all came before her.

“Who here has lost loved ones, friends and family to the white? Who here has suffered known loss?” she cried, and the crowd howled. “For the cold winds are rising, and the Old Gods make us but one promise! What do they promise?”

“Salvation!” they cried. “Salvation!”

The crowd filled the Church of Snows, stomping and screaming. They had stripped the temple of its pews, but there were still more men and women than could even fit in the temple. They were flooding from the doors and out onto the cobbles of Fishfoot Yard.

Once, this had been the ‘Sept of the Snows’, a place of worship dedicated to seven false idols. Now though, there were far more followers of the true faith in White Harbour than there were of the ‘Seven’. Those seven effigies had been ripped from the walls, their statues had toppled, and in their place stood a single white totem. They all stood before the image of a coiled white dragon carved from the trunk of a huge weirwood tree.
The dragon’s eyes and horns had been shaded red with blood, the white wood was stained with bloody handprints from where the worshippers had cut their palms to give tribute.

The sight of such a congregation still took her breath away. Even after all this time, even after all that the dreams had shown her, even after the bloody battles, she could still scarce believe it. As she hobbled down from the podium, there were dozens – hundreds – queuing to touch the dragon totem. Each one had a white stone on their chest.

Such a gathering would never have been possible beyond the Wall, and there would have been no way to feed them all. The free folk had never had anything even close to a city. But perhaps that is the reason the southerners always won, Mother Mole mused. For all their flaws and short-sightedness, she appreciated the… structures that the southerners had built around themselves.

This is a city of true believers now.

In her youth, cities had been a tale to tell the children at night, a dream for when the little ones were being tucked in. Castles and dragons, lords and ladies and cities. They had been things for dreams, fantasies for fools and children.

Aside from a small few like the Thenns or the cave-folk, the free folk had been wanderers. They had been nomads, a people of a thousand clans following the rule of their chieftains and warlords, their thanes and wise-men. Never before, not even under Mance, had the free folk united under a single banner. But now they were south of the cursed Wall, staring at horizons she had never imagined.

It is all changing.

The world’s nature was changing far beyond what men could merely see. The dragon had been like a stone thrown into a still pool, and where it walked the world rippled. Bloomed. Magic was returning to the world, revitalising it, and despite her old bones and rough skin she felt stronger than she had in decades. The aches in her bones had gone, the vague cloudiness of her visions had grown to a girl’s clarity. She felt like she had in her youth, when she had still been slim and strong.

“Salvation,” the believers chanted as they prayed. “Salvation.”

And while King Snow led the battle against the cold with sword and fire, it was to her to lead a different type of battle. Hers was a war of faith.

The witch hobbled down the steps, enveloped instantly by an escort. Most of her inner circle were female – spearwives or wise women – but there were a few men scattered about them.

Her gaze turned towards a brown-haired youth waiting by the stone columns, his face twisted with anxiety. She stepped towards the enclave to meet the youth. His hands were blackened, Mother Mole noted, as her leathery face twisted to a scowl.

“Is it done?” Mother Mole asked quietly.

“It is done.” The boy was young, she doubted if he was passed his fourteenth nameday. “As you say, Your Holiness, the false gods burn.”

“Your Holiness,” Mother Mole snorted, and she swatted the boy’s head with her staff. “Such kneeler’s titles, I have no use for them. Do not address me such again.”

He gulped. “Yes, um... Yes, Mother.”
“And your hands are stained with soot. That is foolish,” she chided. “Did anyone see you?”

The child shook his head. “No. Me and the boys stuffed straw through the windows, then threw burning rocks to light it. The whole building went up. We were out of there before they knew what hit them.”

That would be the sept by Lordsport, Mother Mole thought with approval. An unholy building now cleansed by fire. “And how many remain?”

“Oh, there’s the sept in Silver Street, and the other sept out in the city slums?”

She nodded. “Good child. We will not suffer such false gods here.” He extended his hand, and she kissed it with wrinkled lips. “May the Dragon bless you.”

He gulped, before backing away. The ones that she chose were all young, all loyal, and all converts. They were boys and girls that had grown up in White Harbour, and now she had tasked them to burning the city’s septs.

To use converts was important. Tensions with the fat lord were already high, and it seemed too risky if free folk were caught burning the southern gods. But for kneelers to be torching their own temples? That sent a wholly different message, one that would not be so easily linked back to her, or linked back to the Circle. If the men she sent were discovered – and they probably would be – then they would have the honour of being martyrs to the cause.

It had been a difficult effort. Mother Mole had arranged for the torching of septs – but it had to be done discreetly enough that there was no outcry. She did not want to risk the relationship with the mermen any more than she must.

It had been a slow cleansing. One by one, the septons and septas had been chased out of White Harbour.

King Snow would disapprove of what she was doing, she knew, but never mind. Jon Snow was oft distracted, and Mother Mole took care that he would not find out. For all his service, their prophet was still very young. Time would harden him, she did not doubt, and in the future he would come to understand – but for now it was for her to act in his stead. She would serve the gods.

She had seen it. Only true believers would survive the upcoming storm.

After the sermon, night was falling and Mother Mole and her Circle retreated out of the church. There were still lines of homeless clinging to city streets, but shelter was being built and Mother Mole had ensured that they were well-fed.

The Circle was finding ever more converts in the city. They had protected White Harbour where the Manderly’s own guards had failed.

She could walk near any street in the city now, and she would see a good proportion of people with white stones on their chests. Even the southerner merchants and traders were beginning to convert, and even the powerful Oarsman’s Guild had accepted the dragon. And every day, more snow fell on the city.

The wargs-chiefs Boroqq the Boar and the Owl Lord had returned to the city. With the Circle’s aid, they were now teaching the next generation of wargs from within the Church of Snows itself. Even some southerners had been found to have the Gift, and more and more powers were rising.

At Mother’s Moles bequest, the Circle’s wargs aided the city’s fishermen, whalers and patrols.
Now, by seal and shark, albatross and orca, the skinchangers were helping to guard and feed the city.

In the battle’s wake, White Harbour was being rebuilt. Not as it once was, but into something new.

The priestess headed back towards the ancient black castle clinging to the outskirts of the city. The Wolf’s Den was an old fortress nestled against the cliffs overlooking the bay – the battlements were sheeted in frost, the stone cobbles of the yard were cracking apart, and the keep was in the disrepair of generations. It had stopped being a castle a long time ago, and had been turned into a prison by the mermen, but now it had been taken over by the Circle in the days after the attack. The castle was heaving with the faithful and the desperate, refugees all.

During the battle of White Harbour, the refugees had taken shelter in the Wolf’s Den. Even a week afterwards, the free folk refused to leave. Mother Mole found that for the free folk to have their own castle in the city was… useful.

It was approaching the dark of night, and she could feel the power in the air. She found herself drawn towards the overgrown weirwood cradled at the heart of the castle. The weirwood’s branches had grown even through the crumbling walls and windows, and every red leaf seemed to be rustling in the still air.

She could feel the aura of the Old Gods surrounding her as Mother Mole stepped before the tree.

This was the very last heart tree left in White Harbour. She might have held her sermon in that ‘church’ of stone and timber, but this felt like the truly holy place.

“Mother,” Sigrid bowed before her, a long and lean girl with red hair. “We are ready for you.”

She only nodded. The others knew what was happening too. Around her, acolytes and apprentices were gathering around them. Her gaze moved to her apprentices, flickering from one to the next. Sigrid, Gunhilde, Arsi, Heltha, Solvi. There were almost two dozen girls who had the Gift, the fruit of her months of searching amongst the refugees.

They were the Circle.

All the while the warg-chiefs were training more skinchangers, it fell to Mother Mole to train more witches.

No – no longer was she just a witch. The world had changed, and so had she. Now she was the Gods’ priestess, an apostle for the Old God of Ice. And now, as she led the way to the godswood, as her fingers clenched about her carved weirwood spear, she knew that she had to show her apprentices the way.

There were three dozen women in total, ranging from girls barely past maidenhood to the grey-haired. They all stood silently around the tree, listening to the beat of Mother Mole’s cane as she hobbled over the cobblestone. There were a few men among them too, but she found that women tended to be more in tune with the elements. Males were inherently selfish when it came to power, but women shared more naturally. Men tried to seize power themselves, but women could act as conduits to the gods.

The moonless night was dark, and the heart tree was radiating. She could see the hunger in its twisted red face.

It was time.
“Bring another from the cell,” the Mother ordered.

They already had. Heartbeats later, she heard the sound of a scuffle, and three hardened spearwives dragging a bloodied young man over the broken cobbles. “Stop!” a voice begged. “Don’t do this… you can’t…”

He was shouting, squirming, even as her apprentices dragged him by his chains.

“The Lord of Waters will ransom me!” the fair-skinned sellsail moaned, struggling against his fetters. “I’m the son of Lorane Nermantes. I am the fleet’s Lord Navigator, my father will ransom me! You don’t need to do this, I have friends in Lys. Family! Gold, silver!”

“Pirate’s gold, murderer’s silver,” grunted Sigrid, pushing the young man to his knees before the heart tree. “Filth.” Her flame-haired apprentice looked to Mother Mole, eyes questioning. “Is he enough, priestess?”

“It is,” Mother Mole agreed softly, her eyes flickering over the young pirate’s form. “One more tribute to the gods.”

She looked around the room, and they were all tense with apprehension. You are ready, my apprentices.

The pirate was a fine-looking man, he couldn’t have been older than twenty. Fair of skin and blond of hair, with large blue eyes and even, smooth features. He might have been a woman but for the short hair.

There were many that had been left from the assault on the city. The remainder of the pirate fleet had fled, but many other mercenaries had been trapped without ships. Most had been captured in the city, but some few had forced their way out of the city and fled out into the countryside. The free folk quickly hunted those down.

They had all been sentenced to death, but Mother Mole saw no reason to waste their bodies on the gallows. She drew a bone sickle, as sharp as any knife, as the prisoner was forced to kneel.

Something in the pirate’s eyes widened in realisation, in fear. “No, no, you can’t–!”

“Bring him to the heart tree,” Mother Mole said, sickened by the kneeler’s begging. “And bind his mouth.”

Mother Mole took a deep breath, as she walked towards the weirwood. She muttered a quiet prayer in the Old Tongue, before turning to face her coven. “Tonight we give tribute to the Gods,” she proclaimed to the breathless air. “We are the Circle. We stand apart and above clan and tribe, family and chief. We are the shepherds who will guide our people into this new world. Where the God goes, it is our task to follow and clear the way.”

The old woman gripped her spear tighter, thinking of those that had been lost. They had given much to be here, and she would give more still.

“It is to us that the sacred duty falls. Fear not, for we are not alone. The Old Gods have returned, taking form and flesh to stand with us against the night without end. The God of Ice was the first, and there may yet be more. It is our role to show the people to the true path – that we may yet live to see the dawn. To see spring!”

There was no reply but a quiet, wordless murmur. Mother Mole turned to the pirate, bound by rope and held at the shoulder by her spearwives. His struggles were like a frenzied animal. His eyes were wild, and blood wept from where the ropes bound him to the heart tree.

She studied him for a long moment before speaking. “This wretch, and all those that sailed with him tried to take that from us. They who have shed the blood of free folk must give their blood in turn. To the God.”

“To the God,” the girls intoned.

“To the God,” the spearwives agreed.

The man’s moans reached a fever pitch, screams hissing through teeth, through the rope in his mouth.

The acolytes stripped the man, smallclothes and all, while the spearwives bound him to the tree. At some point he took a blow to the head, and after that his resistance lessened. A small vat of weirwood sap was taken out, to prepare him in the Old Way. Her apprentices, let by Sigrid, painted him heart and lung, throat and leg, phallus and skull with the runes of the First Men.

She raised the blade and then paused. Slowly, Mother Mole handed the sickle to Sigrid, wrapped the young woman’s hands around the blade. The girl looked shocked, but she nodded and gulped.

“Sigrid, you are ready,” the old woman instructed. “This is your night.”

Sigrid approached the heart tree slowly. The night was tense, expectant. The apprentice took a deep breath, and gave a silent prayer.

Finally, Sigrid gutted the man with her bone knife, slicing the blade through tender flesh.

There was an art to it – cut below the stomach but above the intestines. The lesser apprentices collected the blood with a cured sheep’s bladder, then offered it to the heart tree’s mouth. The gagged screams reached fever pitch.

Slowly, Sigrid’s knife cut through skin, tracing the path of the runes. The air was deathly quiet besides the man’s muffled cries, hissing from between teeth.

The moment of death had to be prolonged, so the heart tree would better take in the essence of the sacrifice. First it was the chest, the intestines, the lungs, then the heart and finally the neck. The blood spilled onto the roots, and it took a long time before it began to still.

They watched the blood seep forth in tune with the crazed beat. It was like music. It reminded Mother Mole of a spring fawn, fiercely uncomprehending of what was happening. Like a spark that was about to burst forth into a fire. The kindling always resisted in the moment before it blazed.

She met the pirate’s eyes, and gave her silent thanks to his service. Not enough were so blessed as he.

After the blood was totally emptied, the knife cut deeper. The sickle flayed open the skin, they used a hammer to crack ribs. Now, the organs were to be stripped, so that each one could be given to the tree in turn. Astrid uncoiled the intestine, first the small, then the large, and placed them into the waiting hands of gentle Arsi.

Everything that the man was, offered and fed to the Old Gods.

Around them, the red leaves rippled in the dark. Nobody said a word, they just dropped to their knees before the bloody tree.
It was blooming. The weirwood was almost glowing in the evening dark, the bark shining like the moon, the leaves like the reddest star. Its branches rustled though there was no wind.

Something had changed in the year since the God’s awakening. Once, these hallowed traditions had gone all but extinct amongst the free folk, practiced only by the most isolated and savage of all the clans. But now, the rituals had more effect than ever. Mother Mole had been the first to rediscover them, as she sacrificed squirrels and rabbits to the tree in which she used to live.

The times were changing. The gods were rising, and they hungered.

“It is your time, Sigrid,” Mother Mole nodded to the flame-haired girl. “Lead the coven. Let us all meditate.”

Her apprentice gulped, then nodded. The rest lowered herself to their knees. One by one, Sigrid walked around the Circle, and dabbed their foreheads with the sacrifice’s blood.

The world went still. The heart tree was screaming, spinning…

It is happening, Mother Mole eventually realised. They are Seeing.

The circle of acolytes knelt in place, their heads lowered to the heart tree. Twitching. Sometimes as though in pain, but never quite recoiling.

And as Mother Mole closed her eyes, she saw the storm of souls.

It felt like the heart tree was burning. She felt the invisible fires lick at her face, but the flames felt cold…

Visions flashed before her. They saw an icy figure limping over the snows, they saw black shadows stirring. They saw the snows given flesh, a snowstorm whirling away at a great barrier of red and green.

Mother Mole saw a boy – a young boy – crying before a heart tree. On his head, he wore a bloody crown of white thorns.

She saw another dark-haired child with red eyes, screaming and thrashing as a black figure lifted him up off the ground and carried him away into the night.

She saw a black, frozen ocean under a bulbous moon, as a swell of waves threatened to break through the surface. The ice was cracking, breaking in the night. Something large was moving just under the surface of the oily water, it was like the whole ocean was churning.

And then she saw a shadow. A shadow of black and red walking through a hall of white, leaving black and red footsteps with every step it took. It was burning so hot that she could feel the heat against her skin, it was like the bonfire of a thousand souls surrounding her. The burning creature stepped closer, painting the hallway black…

All around her, acolytes gasped. A young girl lost the connection first, and scrambled backwards. The circle was breaking apart as the trance was shattered. Mother Mole felt the visions fading, but she tried to hold on…

She saw a group of faceless figures lowering themselves before a white throne. She saw a man with the heart of a tree inspecting a black tarnished crown in his hands…

The air split, and suddenly the vision broke.
Her eyes shot open, taking deep breaths. All around her, the acolytes shivered.

Before her, the red and white tree loomed. The bloody entrails across the branches were already shivering. The face carved into the weirwood looked like it was giggling.

There was a long hush, as the acolytes took deep breaths to focus themselves.

“You have done well, Sigrid,” Mother Mole said finally, her voice a gasp.

Her apprentice blinked, looking lost. “Mother… what was that?” she whispered, unwilling to raise her voice. “What did it mean?”

Mother Mole hesitated. That was always the most difficult question. The Old Gods granted them sight. Visions of the past, shades of the future, but to find clarity… to find meaning was another trial entirely.

The memory of that black shadow hovered over her, it was like she could still feel it against her skin. She remembered those visions; of that child, and of the throne…

“It means that we must go to Winterfell.”

Days past, and then weeks, Winterfell beckoned them, but the snows made travel impossible. Instead, the Circle had to wait for the Manderly convoy heading north.

She was followed by a host of true believers flocking to Winterfell. To have so many refugees in tow made progress on the road slow, but a mother could not abandon her children.

The road was long and hard. Despite the efforts of the Manderlys and the rearguard of the coalition forces, the snows had grown so deep that no wheeled carriage could pass and the wheelhouses and carts had to be refit for sleighs. There were not enough available horses left for the caravans, so it was pulled by a motley of gargons, oxen and mules. The progress was slow, while more and more refugees flocked around her and a supply train stretched for near half a league from White Harbour up along the frozen White Knife.

All around her, the north’s heartlands were in torment. Every village that they passed was in a panic, being mustered by the local lord, or failing that, a coalition commander. There were thousands of men and women that were being gathered to reinforce the dragon even in the depth of winter.

‘Conscription’, the southrons called it. To her, it looked more like farmers and cattleherds being forced to hold swords.

At the village of Blackpool, at a lesser crossroads near half the way to Winterfell, she arrived just as coalition forces were sacking the castle, to put Lord Slate into chains. The merman forces met little resistance as they demanded that the traitor be surrendered, House Slate’s own men abandoned their lord. Mother Mole watched as the lord and his family were frogmarched from their keep.

The supply train was trapped by the snows in Blackpool for close to a week, when word reached them of a rider coming south. The merman guards were the first to know, but Mother Mole heard not long afterwards. A knight – one ‘Ser Alek of White Harbour’ – had set off south to meet up with his lord.
From what Mother Mole gathered, this Ser Alek had once been part of King Snow’s Dragonguard, but he had abandoned the Dragon and resigned. Mother Mole would have had the man executed for such weakness, but Lord Manderly’s men took the knight away too quickly.

The rumours from Winterfell trickled south slowly. King Snow had captured Winterfell, and both his brother and his sister had been found alive. There was news of a coronation. They whispered of a great battle, and an army of the dead.

By the tell of it, the white walkers raised an uncountable number of dead as wights, and then marched north for the Wall. The North’s heartlands were a roiling chaos in the wake of the news, with word of uncountable slaughters having been committed by the Others further north along the kingsroad.

The men also told other darker stories. They told stories of a slaughter at Winterfell, with many dead. A creature of shadow and flame. The demons of fire and demons of ice.

Around the campfire, her apprentices chattered eagerly about such things, but Mother Mole sat quiet and unnerved, edging nearer to the fire than usual. It was far away, but she could still feel it in the distance. It felt like there was something powerful burning over the horizon, coming closer with every step.

As they made their way north, the stories they heard from travellers grew ever more queer. The column of refugees grew larger. It was not long after they passed Cerwyn that Mother Mole finally saw it.

Winterfell.

In the distance, the castle came into view as she crested the peak of a hill. The castle looked different from what it had been in her dreams, but that was oft the way of visions.

While all its surrounding fields were smothered white, Winterfell itself looked brown and green, surrounded by so many tents plopped amid the muddy soil that it made her think of a field of mushrooms after the rain. Her followers gaped and stared, but Mother Mole only pursed her lips. Freak weather indeed, she thought. She had to strip off the outer layer of her furs – within the span of mere leagues, the world had gone from winter to summer.

The snows around the castle had melted. The rest of the North was covered by over six feet of snow, but here at the castle the snow was simply gone. In its place was muddy, brown earth, but she could see patches of green – the grass was sprouting, flowers were even blooming. Her apprentices babbled excited questions all round her, but the Mother found herself devoid of answers.

It was like the stories her own mother had once told her, the stories of the children of the forest. They had told her once that the children could hold ceremonies to bring back spring. Stories she hadn’t heard since the days of King Redbeard…

The youngest son of Stark did this, she thought. Mother Mole could hardly imagine the power that such a feat would require. It was tremendous. What sacrifice did he give?

The dragon was not here, she could feel that instinctively. Still, there was some other magic sparkling in the air, radiating from the earth beneath the castle.

The wide gates loomed over her, as the Manderly carriages clattered through over the muddy cobblestones. There was such a crowd that the smallfolk were queuing outside of the gates to come in, all the while they bustled around the roadside. The guards were trying to keep the smallfolk out – pointing them towards the winter town instead – but Mother Mole’s spearwives forced them to let her pass. The old woman hobbled forward, staring around this unfamiliar place.

The castle was huge, but it was stained by battle and unease. The yards past the outer gate were filled with hundreds of roaming figures as the Manderlys supply convoy was unloaded. She met Dormund, son of Tormund Giantsbane directing the refugees, but of his father or his brother Toregg she saw nothing. The free folk and the northerners in the yard largely separated into their own camps, casting one another distrustful glances. She could feel the hunger, the tension hovering in the air.

She could not see the giants, or any of the army’s commanders. Jon Snow and the dragon had already left, but more and more Mother Mole’s thoughts were turning towards Brandon Stark. King Brandon, apparently.

She was already through the yards. As soon as she stepped through the gates, she was drawn to the castle’s godwood, a bit further to the northwest. It was here it had happened. She could feel it. The traces of a magic more powerful than any she’d known. She took a deep breath amidst the godwood’s muddy soil, soaking it in.

Her followers mingled with a few of the castle's worshippers. They spoke of Bran Stark in hushed tones. A child that came back from the dead. A child that summoned spring, a boy who Jon Snow declared king…

“Take me to this young king,” Mother Mole ordered to her followers.

By her side, a spearwife hesitated. “Where is he?”

“Find someone who knows. I want to meet this boy.”

It did not take long before they found a man. Many of the southrons tried to dismiss them, but there were enough free folk around who bore Mother Mole in high regard. They found one of the king’s personal guards, a free folk bearing a white stone on his chest. He spoke hesitantly, and dipped his head before Mother Mole and her Circle.

“King Bran is in the keep, Mother,” he told her. The man spoke the Common Tongue in the gruff tones of one who had only recently learned. “He does not leave. The Princess Stark won’t let any near.”

Mother Mole scowled. She tried to arrange a meeting with this princess next, but the Mother wasn’t even allowed into the keep. Very few were, apparently. The thought was frustrating.

“What are we to do, Mother?” Arsi asked her nervously. Many of her followers seemed ill at ease in the shadow of such a huge castle.

“I must meditate. See to yourselves.”

She found herself stepping through the trees, drawn to the heart tree at Winterfell. Around her, the hot springs still bubbled and crackled, while a rustling of birds had taken refuge in the branches around her. She could still feel the lingering aura of their God – the woods themselves remembered the dragon.

Judging by the broken trees and the strewn earth, the dragon had roosted in these trees. She could feel it; the magic was still thick in the air from its presence.
It had been sickly, she realised. There was pain in its aura that poisoned the ground. Mother Mole could still feel a taint like rot hovering over the grass and trees. Something had happened, some dark power had poisoned it, but then…

Mother Mole lowered herself before the heart tree, and she suddenly saw the memory of a young child on the ground by the roots, as the world bathed in steam. She took a deep breath.

A young child. Brandon Stark. Young and crippled, powerful but untaught…

The old woman’s bony fingers clenched her staff tighter. Yes, she now knew why the Old Gods had directed her here.

She was here to teach this boy.

There was no time to waste, so much to do…

She knew that she must meet with him, but infuriatingly none were permitted. The castle's keep was locked down and kept on high-alert.

Mother Mole held her congregation in the yards below the great keep that night – to try and draw someone’s attention – but she received little. They set up their sermon in full view of the keep, and the grounds were filled with chanting and crying. There were well over a thousand of her followers filling up Winterfell, and yet many kneelers gave them naught but angry glares. None approached, but the southrons huddled in their little groups while the yards were filled by a mob of believers.

The southrons would be whispering in this young king’s ear, but Mother Mole wanted to make sure that Bran Stark heard her words instead.

Mine is a war of faith, she thought to herself. It was not a war she intended to lose.

As dusk fell, she was escorted back to a tent set up by the godswood, where the Circle made its camp. It had been a long day and her old bones were aching, she could feel the strain on her joints as she hobbled unevenly over the stones.

A figure was waiting for her, half-hidden in the corner behind an outbuilding.

“Witch,” a voice growled to her, and the Mother could have scoffed. Her spearwives instantly drew their weapons, but Mother Mole just shook her head.

“Weeper,” she replied in a croak, and she paused before she turned around.

The man was glaring at her with bloodshot eyes. He was an ugly, squash-faced man with beady eyes. The raider bore the appearance of a rabid dog even on his best days, but this seemed to be one of his worst. The Weeper’s face was bloody and black, and he had a new gap in his front teeth. He stood bare-chested in the warmth, revealing a chest of shaggy hair over old crisscrossing scars, with large bloody welts across his body.

The man tottered on two half-spears he used as crutches, while his feet shuffled stiffly. She glanced curiously to his legs, and then his face. The raider and warlord had been beaten to within an inch of his life, by the look of it.

“You always were a hard man to kill, Weeper,” Mother Mole noted, with a nod at his wounds. “I hope you killed the man who did that to you.”

The Weeper’s scowl deepened, feet awkwardly moving forward. “What are you doing in Winterfell, witch?”

Call me a witch again, and I will have your tongue. Against any other man, Mother Mole would have made the threat out loud, but the Weeper was like to take such as a challenge. “I am here where the Gods want me to be.”

“Fuck the gods. What are you really here for?”

Mother Mole cocked her head, sizing him up. He was a short man, but he still stood head and shoulders above her. “I want to see the king.”

“He’s gone. Flew off on a dragon.”

“The new king.” Her voice was cool. “The boy, I hear.” At that, the raider grunted. “The ‘king’. A bloody boy.” The Weeper’s voice was foul. “I thought that was a joke at first – Snow surrendered to a cripple.”

“The Old Gods have a plan for us all.” In the distance, a horn from the wall drowned out her voice. She took a half-step forward, to hear him better. “Jon Snow serves their purpose, and he chose his brother as his successor. A brother likewise Gifted by the Gods. Look around you, Weeper, I feel the touch of the Gods in the air.”

The Weeper snarled. “Spare me the talk of gods and magic, I don’t give a crap.”

“Your blindness is your own.” Mother Mole snorted. “Would that you had taken a few more eyes from the crows, they might have even given you wisdom.”

The warlord’s snarl deepened as he approached her. She could sense her apprentices bristling behind her, alarmed. Even alone, half-naked and wounded, the Weeper cut an intimidating figure. Mother Mole glared her apprentices down, then considered the man as he paused a few strides away.

The Weeper was an aggressive man, but she could sense there was something different in his manner. Mother Mole had not seen the warlord this… talkative before.

“It is your turn, Weeper. Do you command in the castle? Where is your warband?”

His crutches fumbled as he tried to move, and the Weeper spat on the stones. “Fucking Snow took my fucking warband north with him,” he cursed. “I command nothing. It’s Tormund that leads the raiders in the castle.”

Ah. Mother Mole began to understand why the man was in such a mood. There was a pair of thin red trails running down his cheeks, coming from the corners of his eyes. “Worst part of it all?” the Weeper growled. “I hear that there was one hell of a battle up north, and I missed that. I’m left here twiddling my thumbs with these bloody things.” He waved his makeshift crutches, face twisted in a grimace.

“The Old Gods give us all a purpose,” the Mother replied softly.

“Spare me, witch. I’m not here for your ‘wisdom’.”

“No – you come to me because I’m a healer,” she retorted. “Isn’t that right, dearie?” He did not deny it, but his mouth curled. Back in the day, when she had been but a woods witch,
Mother Mole had made her living tending to wounds and fevers. She had lost count of all the limbs she had cauterised, the cuts she had bound, or the poultices she had mixed. Mother Mole had once lived in the roots of a tree, and all the surrounding clans had left her alone, in return for her tending to their wounded.

There were many a raider that were only able to grip an axe thanks to her. Or to walk without supports, perhaps. She eyed the Weeper’s legs critically. “Does it hurt?” she asked, pointing to his legs. “The bones look twisted.”

“Fuck off.”

“They might never heal properly, you know that?” she challenged. “But I could set them, aye. I could help a recovery. Better than any of these southrons could, that’s for sure.”

“Witch, you give nothing for free.” The Weeper scowled. But still, he hadn’t spat on her, and he wasn’t walking away. He was interested. “What do you want?”

“I assume you still have friends, Weeper,” she mused. “Old raider comrades, most like. Perhaps you have friends in the dungeons? I hear talk that there are prisoners in this castle.”

His bloody eyes narrowed suspiciously. “Why?”

“If I cannot go near the king, then he must be drawn to me. I shall hold a ceremony in the godswood tomorrow night.” She took another step forward. “And for that I need sacrifices.”

“The dungeons?” the Weeper mused, and the old woman nodded. “Aye, that can be arranged.”

“Grand. But one other matter…” In a smooth motion, her bony fingers reached for the necklace of white stones around her neck. She yanked at it with a small tut, and then extended her open hand to the Weeper. In her palm rested a single, small white stone. “If you want my healing, then you will wear a white stone.”

The warlord looked like he could have strangled her, but then he glanced down at his crutches, and he took the white stone without another word. Mother Mole felt a plan forming.

Winterfell was still filled with unbelievers, and it was her task to make them believe.

Mother Mole spent the night making preparations, gathering her Circle, and sharpening her ritual knives.

By the first of light of the morn, the Circle stood ready. They waited until late eve, as the sun started to droop over the walls, and then lighting great bonfires at the edge of the godswood. The smoke rose into the air, and already the worshippers were starting to flock before the godswood.

It will be a full moon, Mother Mole thought. That was good.

As the first shadows of nightfall stretched across them, she was ready.

The Weeper rounded up a few men with access to the dungeons, but Mother Mole ordered two dozen spearwives with them, to be sure. It had to be done quickly – they must take the prisoners from the dungeons before any managed to object.

Dusk was falling slowly, all while they rang drums and gongs to gather the congregation. The sound rang through the trees, and the godswood flooded with bodies as the sun fell.
Several of the Circle stripped naked and painted themselves white with ash, as they called the sermon to the forest. The acolytes of the Circle dressed all in white, standing before the heart tree. A bulbous white moon lingered behind the clouds, blessing their efforts.

The noise of drumming – savage and primal – filled the air. All around her, Winterfell was stirring.

“Mother, there are kneelers at the gates,” a spearwife reported.

“Do not let them stop us,” she ordered. “But do not draw blood. There will be no violence tonight.”

The kneelers would have little sleep tonight, she expected. The godswood was ringing with noise. The air was beating to the tune of barbaric drums, the sound of cries in the Old Tongue filling the dark, stuffy air. The music of the Gods.

We are the Circle, Mother Mole thought fiercely, staring at it all. Only a mere two years ago, half the free folk here would have sooner fought than mingle.

She found herself lingering by the gates, watching out over the rippling courtyard. For a moment she feared that they might have been unsuccessful, but then she saw a huddle of figures pushing their way through the courtyard.

True to his word, the Weeper provided the guests of honour for the sermon. The warlord was limping on crutches, cursing with every step as his raiders dragged a line of figures behind them. They were all dressed in rags and fetters – mostly men, but with a few women amongst them.

“Stop!” a southron knight shouted, chasing after the Weeper. “Stop! You can’t take them, Princess Sansa said that none—”

His voice was cut off, as the Weeper slammed his knuckles into the young man’s face. Blood splattered, the knight dropped, and the raider was already hobbling off on his crutches.

“I will tell the Princess!” he shouted, voice muffled by the blood. “You can’t take the prisoners, you can’t…”

The Circle’s followers were already grabbing the sacrifices, dragging them physically through the woods. They tried to scream, tried to thrash, but they were overwhelmed by the mass of bodies.

Seventeen, Mother Mole counted. Seventeen sacrifices will do. “Prepare them,” she ordered to her acolytes.

The air was crazed. The prisoners were so scared they were white as bone. One prisoner – an aging woman with dark hair – tried to thrash, only for the spearwives to force her to her knees on the carpet of humus before the heart tree. Some tried to plea, some tried to fight, others wept, but their cries were lost in the chorus.

Mother Mole stood upon a log, standing over the hot springs. “These men have been sentenced to die!” she declared to the crowd. “The southrons would give them to a headsman! But I will give them to the gods!”

The godswood roared. The face of the heart tree was illuminated by a hundred glowing torches.

It did not take long for the kneelers to react. Armoured men were stomping through the trees, moments later, each one bearing the sigil of House Stark. Under their helms, their features were dark and grim.
There were two dozen or so guards, but they were surrounded by spearwives lining the trees. The guards went straight for Mother Mole, standing by the heart tree.

“Stop this, woman,” the guard ordered. “These prisoners are not yours to execute.”

“Look around you,” Mother Mole challenged. “Do you really wish to defy the Gods?”

His eyes flickered to the scores of believers filling the trees, crowding around the hot springs. She saw the twitch. “If you want to bear witness, feel free,” a spearwife offered. “But tonight we will pay tribute.”

The guards all bore swords, but they would be fools to draw them here. In the godswood, the free folk of the Circle numbered at least a thousand. There were more women than men, but they all clutched spears. The guard paused in doubt, and his courage wavered in the darkness.

“I will alert the princess of this,” the captain of the guard warned.

“Please,” Mother Mole snorted. “Do.”

She turned her back, facing the prisoners. Seventeen in total. Nine were old men, three had the look of thugs, two were portly and fat – kneeler lords, perhaps. The other two were women, but Mother Mole knew none of their names. She had simply told the Weeper to take as many as would not be missed.

They were all conspirators, from what Mother Mole understood. They were maesters, conspirators, and Bolton loyalists awaiting judgement. Now, they would be tried by the Gods.

The sacrifices were stripped naked, pale flesh on the grass, and they were shrieking right up until their mouths were gagged. The beat of the drums never ceased.

“Arsi, Heltha,” Mother Mole ordered. “Fulfil the ritual. I shall see to the southrons.”

The northmen were already mustering outside of the godswood, looking tense and nervous. There were many weapons being readied, but none dared to enter the woods. A line of believers, men and women both, stood around the perimeter, each with white stones on their chest.

“Mother, the lords approach,” a boy called as he rushed to her, while Mother Mole hobbled along the path. “They demand we surrender.”

“Allow them through,” she ordered. “But no violence, not tonight.”

She could see them gathering outside the rustic iron gates, staring down into the path. The shadow of the heart tree was in the distance, the sacrifices were taking position.

Mother Mole did not know their names, but clearly they considered themselves important. She could have snorted. “My lords,” Mother Mole greeted, her voice sardonic as she hunched over her staff.

“Surrender the prisoners,” a broad-chested man demanded, his thick moustache squirming as he scowled. “These people will disperse.”

She snorted. “Is it not a rule of this land? That them who pass judgement should do the deed?” Mother Mole challenged, looking around them. “These prisoners committed crimes against the Gods, and so the Gods will take their lives.” The priestess then turned to the free folk, and her voice rose into a screech. “That is law on which this coalition was founded – justice for atrocities.
Blood for blood. These men committed grave crimes, and I am ensuring they are properly punished.”

The biting edge in her voice caused a few of the kneelers to flicker. She glared at them in turn, daring any to disagree.

Lowly, a quiet voice spoke up. “What do you hope to achieve?” a man muttered in a wheezy breath.

Mother Mole turned towards the speaker; a lord with a black lizard lion on his chest, barely supporting himself on a cane. One hand was across his chest, the other arm slumped over the cane. He was slight of figure with sickly features, a gaunt face, unkempt stubble, but sharp bright green eyes. He was staring straight through her, his gaze on the heart tree behind her.

“I serve the Gods. I feel their will,” Mother Mole retorted. “If Brandon Stark is what I believe he is, then he’ll feel it too.”

Behind her, the sacrifice was beginning. The night screamed. A line of spearwives stood against the guards at the gates of the godswood.

The northmen huddled, unsure of what to do. Mother Mole looked between them, searching for weakness. Most averted their gaze, but the sickly lord with green eyes stared straight at her.

Finally, she saw a flash of red hair, of figures striding quickly through the courtyard. Princess Sansa Stark walked briskly towards her, wearing a thick white cloak as her dress trailed over the cobblestones. The princess was young, but her eyes were narrowed and her lips pursed.

By her side, walked a tall and grim man, with his sword drawn. There was a sigil of a black fish upon his chest, and a scowl on his features.

“What is going on here?” the princess demanded, turning her eyes towards the old woman with the staff.

“A pagan ceremony,” another man muttered darkly, keeping close to the princess’ side. He was a heavyset figure, robed in dark brown hemp robes, with bulldog eyes and curled lips. “This is blood sacrifice. Crude magic, unlearnt.”

Mother Mole only tutted.

They stood facing each other – two dozen men against one old woman. Mother Mole’s eyes were fixed on the Princess Stark. Every hand hovered around weapons.

“You have no right to execute those men,” the princess said finally, her voice loud and clear.

“I serve the Gods, and I serve Jon Snow, my princess,” Mother Mole announced. “I mean no harm to you and yours, quite the opposite. It is my duty to show you the way, to serve you like I do your half-brother.”

Before the heart tree, Sigrid slit open the stomach of the first sacrifice. Blood gushed into the night.

The princess held herself well, but Mother Mole saw the girl grimace, averting her eyes from the heart tree.

Seventeen sacrifices. The Gods would feast tonight.
“Your Grace, give the word,” the man with the black fish muttered darkly. Under his helm, he bore only a single eye, glaring at the followers. “Give the word and we will end this farce.”

Farce. She might have spat. The first wave of energy was already swelling outwards, flooding through the trees. She felt it. Mother Mole shivered with its power, and she saw the sickly lord twitch where he stood.

“Can you not see it?” the old woman cackled. “In their death, they cut through the veil. For the cost of their lives – of traitor’s lives – they grant the touch of gods.”

It was all around her, spinning through the air. Show me, Mother mole begged of the Old Gods. Show them.

By his princess’ side, the captain of the guard drew his blade. He huddled close to the princess, as if Mother Mole might leap at her. “This woman is mad.”

Mother Mole only chuckled. One of her apprentices quietly handed her a bowl of fresh blood. Mother Mole slowly let the fluid drip over her forehead, but never looked away from the princess. “Your half-brother could testify to my Gifts, princess. Life is the currency of the Gods.” Her gaze turned, looking towards the man in the robes with the bulldog eyes. “Through sacrifice, I can achieve many things, many wonders. I can bring sight to dark night, the blessings of the gods – that of prophecy, and truth. I can see distant shores, I can see into the past, I can see a man’s sins. I can heal the wounded, I can promise protection in battle. The Circle offers you much and more.”

“But I do not like your price,” the sickly lord scowled, audibly wheezing between breaths. The short lord glanced back at the princess, fingers clenching about his cane. “Stop her.”

The man with the sigil of the fish obeyed, pushing forward. The spears of a dozen spearwives snapped to attention, but Mother Mole held them back with a glance. Suddenly, the tall man stepped closer, and the world came into focus around him… “I see your niece, black fish,” Mother Mole said suddenly, and the man hesitated. “She was dropped into the water with a hole in her throat and a sickness in her soul. A flame touched her and it burnt her heart black.” The man’s face flickered, suddenly freezing. All the while the visions swam in his shadow and took form… Mother Mole could see them. “But you saw her again, didn’t you? You thought it was a dream, but you saw your niece standing on the banks of the river – you saw her. It was why you lingered in those lands, you were searching for her.”

The visions kept coming. The fish-lord’s entire history and fate was painted in the shadows before her, Mother Mole could see it all.

The man’s eyes widened and his body stopped, teeth seeming to grit beneath his helm. Mother Mole smirked. “You did not dream it, ser. Your niece was walking that night.”

Behind her, Astrid cut open another stomach, and the world was spinning in power. Sansa was looking at the tall knight, and suddenly the girl seemed uncertain. The knight of the black fish seemed perturbed by her words, caught off-guard. Behind her, all of the Circle had their hands raised, opening themselves up to the power.

“Marwyn,” the princess demanded a pause, looking to her retinue. “What are they doing?”

“Blood rituals.” The robed man glared at the Mother, as he said the words like a curse.

It was swirling all around her, magic distorting the air. It was flooding outwards, the world soaked in power. Visions were swirling…
“I can see, Princess Stark.” Mother Mole extended her hand. “Do you not wish to see too?”

Her mouth tightened. “We are done here.”

The soldiers stepped forward, but the old woman raised her staff. Give me more, give me… “And what of your brother?” Mother Mole challenged, and then Sansa stopped. “I see a child, dark haired. Five or six, perhaps? He was thought lost, but he lives still. The Old Gods show him to me.”

A troubled frown creased Sansa’s face. They were looking at her for orders, but the princess hesitated.

Mother Mole took a deep breath, closing her eyes and trying to make sense of the spinning visions. “I see him, a boy with a beast’s heart. He has a black wolf by his side, growing more feral everyday. Your youngest brother is alive and well – he has been taken to a new home, I see him sheltered by a lobster’s claw. Your brother forgets, he has settled into a new life, a new family, a new home.” Her voice was rambling, struggling to breathe… “I see the boy standing before a heart tree upon a stony mountain, with bloody teeth. He hides in a land of rock.” Show me more, show me. “He holds a unicorn horn in his hand, he is staring out over the ocean.”

“Your Grace…” the captain of the guard looked to her. “Do not listen to this lunacy.”

The princess did not reply. Behind them, another sacrifice dropped before the tree. The woman died clutching her own guts.

Mother Mole met Sansa’s eyes. She could see images of her past – dark and stained by tragedy. The princess wanted to – longed to – know more of her family. Show me more.

Behind her, the acolyte slit yet another throat, and let the blood gush outwards.

Show me the Starks. Show me her blood.

“And your sister…” Mother Mole said, and suddenly Sansa froze like a statue. A vague vision flashed before Mother Mole, but this one was harder to make sense of. It was obscured, blurred. The Mother saw a girl with no face, a shadow. “The sister you knew is gone. You mourn her loss, but she cannot remember you. The dark-haired girl faded away slowly, lost in an unfamiliar place, surrounded by unfamiliar people.” Mother Mole took a deep breath. “Hers was a slow death, she faded away piece by piece.”

Her eyes narrowed. “You’re wrong, Arya did not die like that.”

“The Old Gods are never wrong,” Mother Mole snapped. “I offer wisdom.”

“Do not trust the wisdom of prophecy,” the sickly lord muttered, a dark look in his eyes. “There is none.”

“Then you are a fool.” Mother Mole’s gaze focused, and she saw something of the lord with the black lizard on his chest. She saw an image of red sands, and a sword of sunlight slicing through flesh, and a woman’s dying wail. Ten men fought to the death below as a woman screamed for them to stop… “I can see you too, squire. I see a pact made in starlight, you made a promise in blood. You never believed it, but you promised anyways, you swore by ice and fire to—”

Enough!” the lord snapped, pushing forward with surprising strength. “Do not let them –”

The night snapped, voices rising….
At the heart tree, another body fell against the roots.

The world was spinning, it was hard to even hold on….

“What’s going on?” a high-pitched voice cried over the din, a child’s voice. Mother Mole sensed him instantly.

Mother Mole saw Brandon Stark. Finally, she saw him. The boy was being carried on a platter lifted by two men, sitting head and shoulders above the crowd. He was young, with pale auburn hair, and wide eyes and gaunt cheeks.

As soon as their eyes met, she felt the tingle down her spine. There was immense power in the boy, beyond anyone she’d ever seen before. This was no mere Gift. His aura was glowing brighter than all others, like the sun in a sea of candles.

He could feel it too, she knew. He had been drawn by the ceremony – I knew he would be.

The princess’ face paled. “Bran, you should not be here.”

Mother Mole saw her chance. “I am here to show you the Old Gods, the true gods!” The Mother declared, raising her arms wide. “I am but a channel for them, a servant of higher powers. It is my duty to show them to life. Can you not feel them around you, Your Grace?”

She had been right. The king could feel it too, she could see it on his face. The powers were swirling through the trees – they were so thick in the air that Mother Mole reckoned even the ungifted must be able to sense them.

The wind was hissing, the night stirring…

“My powers are at your command, Your Grace,” she offered, lowering her head. “I can find the traitors for you; the Old Gods will reveal to me their sins. My powers are yours. For the glory of the Ice Dragon, for the promise of salvation, I serve. We serve!”

“Salvation!” the crowd behind her intoned. “Salvation!”

Yet another prisoner dropped to the heart tree.

She saw the hesitation, that flicker of doubt. Sansa Stark was glaring at her, sizing the old woman up. Perhaps trying to decide if she were friend or foe.

The robed man was the only one who dared to break the hush. “Do not trust this woman,” the fool, Marwyn, warned. He spoke with scorn. “I know her sort – soothsayers and wood witches. Parlour tricks trumped up by the ceremony. She offers naught but false prophecies and folly. She tells you vague whispers that sound like wisdom, but there’s no power to any of her acts.”

“No power?” The Mother’s eyes narrowed, glaring at the robed man. “You remain a fool.”

The very last sacrifice, a woman, died before the tree. A swell of power flooded outwards. King Brandon flinched.

So much energy…

Give me strength, she prayed. Let them see…

All around her, she felt the Old Gods replying, she felt them in the wind.
“Say the word and I will kill this hag,” a knight muttered to the princess, glaring angrily as he levelled his sword.

Mother Mole shook her head. “You stand before the Gods,” she spat. “Do you doubt what is before your very eyes?”

Mother Mole took a deep breath, summoned all the power she could, and willed the magic to life.

Show them, she begged. They must see.

There was much power in the air – both from the godswood and the dragon, she could feel it responding to her prayers.

The old woman pointed towards the tree, and suddenly a gasp spread throughout the crowd.

A thousand breaths inhaled, as the sound of wood creaking broke through the air.

Red leaves rippled in the torchlight, all eyes were fixed upwards.

The witch could have cackled.

The heart tree was moving. Its branches were twisting, the bark itself was rippling. The mouth of the red face contorted, opening its jaws wide. It was churning like a giant thrashing against its chains.

Red leaves scattered from its writhing branches, raining down in the night.

The godswood was frozen, all eyes staring up at the bloody tree churning in the ground. The roots themselves were snaking through the soggy earth, they were grinding beneath their feet. She could feel it rumbling in the ground below.

It was alive.

In an instant, the air went silent. All of that frenzied energy of the mob withered away. They were left staring up at the moving heart tree with bated breaths. How could any object when they see the Gods themselves?

Mother Mole took a deep breath. The act had taken much from her; exhaustion that nearly caused her to drop, but she couldn’t fall yet. She felt weak and elated at the same time, but she couldn’t fall.

King Brandon was stared from his platter, mouth agape at the sight. Mother Mole started to walk forward, hobbled straight before him.

“Your Grace,” she said and, with a creak of her joints, she lowered herself to her knees.

Slowly, the movements of the white tree started to fade, slowly settling back into position. They were staring at it, and nobody dared to approach. They were looking up at the weirwood as if it might uproot itself at any moment, like it might crawl from the ground.

The crimson face on the heart tree looked like it was grinning. They saw it.

Mother Mole’s focus was on the young king, and his reaction. The princess looked to her brother, blinking in shock.

“I’ve seen something like that before,” Bran finally whispered finally, so low she could barely hear him. “There was a… a man, he could control the trees too. He controlled a forest.”

“I am but a vessel,” the Mother croaked. “The Old Gods merely work through me.”

Nobody spoke. One by one, the spearwives and acolytes followed Mother Mole’s example, and lowered themselves to their knees.

King Brandon blinked.

“Why are you here?” the princess asked finally.

“I have come to serve, King Brandon Stark. The Circle has come to serve. For the Gods.”

The Priestess

The darkness consumed her. It was everywhere; it was twisting around her, burning through her, raging before her eyes. They were swirling through the flickering shadows of her chambers, howling in the whisper of the flames. Smoke writhed over the four-poster bed, sweeping across the bookshelves and the mantelpiece. They were everywhere – shadowy tendrils contracting around her, squeezing the life from her body.

The dragon’s-head brazier was burning bright, but the light didn’t reach her. She was standing in the middle of an abyss, while the shadows screamed in fury. The Lord of Light had always sheltered her before, but now his light went dark.

She could feel it. She could feel the magic scratching across her skin, burning through her flesh.

The world blurred. She saw it in the dark, rippling like the shimmer on a pool of oil, the black blurring into shape. She couldn’t breathe, couldn’t scream, couldn’t do anything but watch the world burn away…

Suddenly, she was seven years old again. She was a girl with dirty red hair, and heavy iron manacles rattling from her scrawny wrists. Her body was frail and bruised, with old scabs across her neck, hands and ankles from where the metal chafed against skin.

She was starved and skinny, her wide eyes staring numbly around the surreal and unfamiliar place.

The sky was grey. The sky was always grey here – the city stood in an endless dusk beneath the Shadow. Everything was dreary and cold; the waters were foul with ash, and the smog lingered over the harbour at night. In the light of high noon, the waters would glint black, but under the moonlight the river would shimmer green with phosphorus. The buildings around her were all ancient; they were large and heavy like tombstones, every structure carved from oily black stone.

Only one in ten houses were even occupied, she learnt later. Most were left over from the days of tattered glory. This place was like a mausoleum, a city of the dead. The girl had been crying every single day since they first carried her into that rickety hull filled with chains.

All around her, foreign men in purple robes crowded and heckled, their shouts slurred. They were all unnatural figures with pale skin and bluish teeth, their faces hidden beneath elaborate lacquered masks and cowls. At the time, she never understood what was happening – she just knew she was surrounded by monsters.
Her heart was beating, her blood screaming…

“Melony, Lot Seven!” the auctioneer cried. “Young and beautiful – hailing all the way from the Sunset Kingdoms! Look at her hair! She’s good for whatever you want from her, and young enough to learn! Melony, Lot Seven – starting the bid at two hundred cronas!”

Men were screaming. There were tears in her eyes, her body cowering behind the flimsy rags. Grasping fingers poked and groped at her, hungry hands trying to yank off her remaining clothes. The girl tried to run and hide, but then men grabbed the chains and dragged her backwards over the rough cobblestones of the plaza.

The bidding war was all around her. Hooded men were raising their hands eagerly, shouting in a tongue she could barely understand. She was the prize piece of the auction – it was her hair, she had realised later. Red hair was rare in these eastern lands, and every warlock, cultist and shadowbinder wanted her as the prize of their slave collection.

Melony, Lot 7.

Yet the girl’s gaze was drawn towards the man in grey, squatting in the tide of faceless bodies. He was exactly as he appeared in her nightmares; with black, lecherous eyes and bloated cheeks, running his slimy tongue over purple lips. The sorcerer’s gaze was fixated on her, staring straight through her as he outbid anyone else. She could see it in his eyes, he was determined to have her.

All around her, the world was drumming. The world was mad, swollen with fear. The only words that she could focus on… over and over above the howl of the crowd… “Melony, Lot Seven…”

Melony screamed.

In the chamber at Dragonstone, Melisandre could not breathe. The shadows wrapped their tendrils around her throat, all the while the memories flashed in the darkness. The images were as vivid as a nightmare.

They were angry, angrier than she had ever known them. The shadows writhed in fury.

All around her, her childhood flashed before her eyes. They were inflicting onto her the worst torture imaginable – her past.

She was a wreck. They had stripped the glamours away, and lashed the illusion from her. The hissing ruby around her neck was burning her, choking her. The woman could do nothing but crawl on the cold stone and scream silently with pain.

She wanted to howl so loud that she might topple the whole tower down, but their hands clamped at her throat.

She was on her hands and knees, and in the gloom her fingers were that of a rotten corpse. Old, bony and decrepit fingers.

“I’m sorry,” Melisandre gasped, her voice a hoarse choke. “I’m sorry, I didn’t…”

‘Sorry?’ the shadows hissed. ‘Our brother is dead!’

‘You promised, you promised…!’
‘Melony, Lot Seven…’

“I didn’t… I didn’t…” She might have wept, but her pupils were bone dry. She needed to take deep breaths, trying to focus herself through the torrent of memories. The vow, remember my vow…

‘Melony, Lot Seven…’

‘You did this! You betrayed us!’

Deep breaths, struggling to focus through all the pain. “I serve the Lord of Light,” the red woman prayed. “I am His servant, I am His vessel. His will be done, His name be hallowed – in His glory we find justice, and in His light we fin–”

Crack. Their tendrils lashed against her back like phantom whips, retracing scars of decades ago.
Old wounds were suddenly raw again, searing against her. Melisandre would have yowled, but her throat jammed.

‘You made a deal!’ the envoys hissed. ‘You grant us life, but our brother is gone! GONE!’

She flinched. Melisandre hadn’t even known that a servant could die, she hadn’t thought such a thing possible. The shadows were the envoys of her god, the will of R’hllor. She had never seen them this angry before, this raw. “It wasn’t my fault, I didn’t –”

‘He perished in his task. he perished for you.’

‘You promised him life, you promised, you promised!’

They could not be reasoned with. They were burning around her with rage, screaming in torment for their fallen kin.

An envoy had travelled north, but it had not returned. The Champion of Night must have slain it, but how Melisandre did not. All she knew was that they were furious.

It had gone north on her wishes, and now its brothers were blaming her.

They wanted to hurt her for failure, they wanted her pain to appease their fury.

The darkness blurred again, another nightmare coming into focus…

‘Melony, lot 7…’

“Priestess! Priestess, where are you?”

Vaguely, in the distance, she heard the sound of rasping against the hard-wooden door. They were outside her chambers, irritated voices shouting into the barred chamber.

There was another voice, a woman’s. “Your Grace, you must not disturb Her Eminence so…”

“Disturb?” the voice said indignantly, as knuckles rasped again. “At this hour? I require the Red Woman by my side.”

Suddenly, the shadows seemed to freeze.

There were more footsteps, those of heavy boots marching up and down the corridor. A haggle of bodies was outside of her chambers, demanding her. Melisandre could see the glimmer of light through the crack beneath the door. There was faint sunlight outside.

She hadn’t even realised the hour, but apparently it was at least morn.

“Priestess!” the king’s voice demanded. “Damnation, what are you doing in there?”

Stannis and the queen were standing outside of her door. They stood in irritation, shouting for her.

Melisandre heard the mutters, like it was breaking through the trance. She didn’t know what hour it was, but her absence was already noted. Her chambers were sealed and it was rare for Melisandre to remove herself so. She rarely slept, and usually she was the first to be up and about on a morning.

For her to bar her chamber door was very unusual indeed, and it was all but unheard for Melisandre to refuse the king’s summons. Outside, the murmurs seemed perturbed.

They had no idea the scene on the other side of the doorway. The red woman was lying naked and unconcealed on the stone floor, while the shadows stood around her in warning.

A wave of panic flooded through her. They could not come in – not while the shadows roamed, not while she was so exposed. If they opened the door and saw her like this…

Another hand knocked, this time more nervous. “Your Eminence?” the queen called hesitantly. Selyse seemed scared to even disturb the High Priestess. “Your Eminence, are you there…?”

Melisandre couldn’t reply, didn’t dare to breathe.

In the distance, broken by the mutters, she heard a singsong voice. The fool must be in the corridor too, she could hear his bells chiming gently. “The shadows come to dance, the shadows come to play,” Patchface giggled. “Oh I know, I know, I know.”

Around her, the darkness shifted. Melisandre stared breathlessly at the outline of the door.

Then, a wispy hand wrapped itself around her throat. It didn’t squeeze, but she could feel it against her jugular.

‘Tell them to leave,’ the darkness warned.

Melisandre gulped, taking a deep breath to compose herself… “Leave me,” Melisandre called, her voice a wheeze. “Leave me, I must meditate.”

It was met by silence. Everything froze, as the darkness poised and waited….

She heard Stannis step closer. “Meditate?” His voice was incredulous. “Jon Connington arrives now, I need you now.” Clang, clang, clang – his iron hook rasped against the wood. “What are you even doing in there-”

They were stirring, tensing… “Leave me!” Melisandre snapped, her voice breaking. “Leave!”

Outside, King Stannis flustered. The crowd was murmuring. None of them had ever known Melisandre to speak to him such.

Connington, she remembered vaguely. Jon Connington – the Hand of the False King, coming as an emissary for the mummer’s dragon. Stannis had been expecting his arrival for weeks. Normally Melisandre would stand at her king’s side for such, but now she didn’t dare leave her chambers.
The Lord of Light was too angry at her.

Please don’t come in, she begged desperately. Please, just don’t come in. She couldn’t allow anyone to see her like this, she would lose everything…

Then, Stannis’ hook hacked against the hard oak so hard it chimed. “Sorceress!” the king snapped. “I order you to open this door!”

Melisandre might have wept. She was in near hysterics as the murmurs outside rose to a fever pitch….

“Your Grace, Her Eminence must have her reasons…” Selyse pleaded, but Stannis could not be persuaded.

Heavy boots whacked against stone. “Ser Richard, Ser Rolland!” the king boomed, stepping backwards. “Break the damn door down!”

There were mutters, hesitation. The Godsguard would be standing by his side, but they were slow to obey.

“Your Grace, if the High Priestess needs peace…” came Ser Richard Horpe’s hoarse, fearful voice. “Perhaps we should not intrude…”

The knight was scared to even enter her chambers again. He should be.

Outside, the voices blurred as they rose in pitch, Mel could only listen intently. An argument was rising outside her door, broken by the king’s firm voice. Stannis was bristling, but the queen’s men in his court were loath to defy their priestess.

Please don’t, Melisandre begged the Lord of Light. Please don’t let them see me like this…

In the backdrop, she heard the jester’s nonsensical song, as Patchface skipped obliviously through the argument. “The shadows play, the shadows play,” the fool was giggling. “They come to play, they come to stay!”

“I need my High Priestess, she must be by my side…”

“Please, Your Grace, the Lord of Light talks to her… let us not disturb…”

“This Connington…”

All around her, R’hllor’s envoys were staring down at her with unseen eyes. They were faceless and formless, invisible in the black. Their voices were the lightest whisper of the candle, their touch was as soft as smoke.

There were more of them than she could even count – they were in every crook and cranny, every corner, every shadow of the grand chamber. They were everywhere.

Outside, the voices were fading. She could practically hear her king grinding his teeth together, while his queen and her supporters urged him to respect the god.

“Damn your nattering,” Stannis fumed finally, as his heavy boots finally tapped away. “Have it your own way. I want guards outside of this door – and if she is not out of there by noon, I will be back with a battering ram.”

He was walking away. She could have breathed a sigh of relief, but there was also a stab of fear.
Melisandre could only listen in hushed breath, but she didn’t dare to even open her mouth. They were leaving. They were leaving…

“Bring this Lord Connington to the Painted Chamber,” the king’s voice ordered, growing fainter and fainter. “Let us see what this fool has to say…”

The king’s voice faded over as he turned the corner. The darkness relaxed fractionally, but Melisandre was still trembling. Her heart was beating so fast she couldn’t feel it. Despite everything, some part of her had wanted the king to barge through, she had wanted the shadows to leave her alone…

In the broken light under the crack of the door, she could see the silhouette of boots standing outside – two knights of the Godsguard were still standing less than a dozen yards away, on the other side of the barrier. Help me, she begged silently.

‘There is no helping you now,’ the darkness replied. ‘You must be punished.’

The lull was over. They were writhing again. ‘You belong to us…’

‘You made a deal.’

‘Melony, Lot Seven.’

‘This is your failure.’

The shadows contorted around her. Melisandre might have howled in pain, but her throat couldn’t make the slightest motion, shadowy fingers clenching at her neck.

Punishment. This was punishment. The fire would always take as much as it gave.

“I will do better,” she begged. “I will birth more sons, I will serve His will. I will perform the Grand Rite, I swear to it.”

‘You will perform it faster. There will be no mistakes, not again.’

“I swear it,” she whispered, lowering her head. Her wispy grey hair scraped over the stones. “I serve for the Glory of R’hallor, I shall do my duty. In His light I find purpose.”

The formless figure was staring down at her. It never replied, but she could feel its fingers stroking her skin.

I displeased the Lord of Light, she thought with a gulp. I deserve this.

‘You do.’

Invisible tendrils lashed against her back.

Her vision went black, her crooked body slumped to the floor.

She saw another scene, another memory. The girl was delirious and in chains, starving in the sorcerer’s basement. Melony’s body was covered in wounds that no person should ever suffer – the sorcerer had taken her blood, her flesh and her soul for use in his twisted rituals.

She was left wasting away in the dungeon, with only the light of a flickering candle to keep her company.

Then a noxious smog blew in from the Shadow one night, and the candle went out.

The girl was starving. There was no sunlight in the dungeon, there was no food or company. The only thing to drink was the putrid waters of the Ash, as it slowly trickled down from the sewers above. The river through Asshai was slow and black; it had long since overflowed from its banks and it now oozed through the streets like treacle, or foul blood.

It was foul water. The Ash was polluted by all sorts of unnatural powers, and in it swam blind and deformed fish. The black waters were not fit for any mortal.

She didn’t weep, though. The sorcerer had grown drunk one night, and became tired of her weeping. He had carved out her tear ducts. Blood still dripped from her scabs on her eyes, red tears down a disfigured face.

Melony, Lot Seven.

She would have screamed, but her throat sealed shut. She would die in this dark, she knew.

It had been in the blackness of the shadow when she had felt Lord of Light.

R’hllor came to her in the form of a glimmer of light, a red heart that pulsed with her touch. She had held the wisp in her hands, and suddenly the shadows took form around her. Shapeless, intangible bodies filled her cell.

The child wasn’t scared, she had no fear left to give.

‘… Melony, Lot Seven…’ that unearthly voice croaked. She would never forget the very first time she heard them, when they first found her.

“Who’s there?” the little girl whimpered. “Who’s there…?”

She hadn’t been able to see it, but she felt its hands on her skin, she felt its whisper in her ear. She didn’t resist, she couldn’t. ‘Melony… Lot Seven…’

“Where are you?” The only thing she could see was black, even despite the red light clamped between her fingers.

‘Here.’

“Do you have a name?”

‘Many.’

The child gulped. “What do you want?”

There was a long silence. ‘What do you want?’

There was shifting, pulsating in the blackness of the room. The wisp of red light flickered, but it didn’t fade.

Slowly, her eyes managed to focus. She saw the outline of a figure before her. A featureless, translucent man on his knees, holding her hand through the chains.

Melony snivelled. “What are you…?” she whispered.
There was a long pause before the voice spoke.

‘Once I was like you. Once I was lost. Once I was trapped in darkness and weakness. Once I was called Alexys.’ Its hands wrapped around hers, but she could barely feel them. ‘But now we offer you the same salvation. Now we serve the light.’

That had been the night that the Red God found her. Rh’hlor’s envoys had offered her a deal.

She remembered that moment well. The first time they appeared. They had given her the power to escape the sorcerer’s chains, and in return she served the Red God. Melisandre couldn’t even count – how many decades ago had that been?

The Lord of Light freed her from the sorcerer, and they had granted her the power she so desperately desired. But He gave nothing without cost. She had always known the price.

No salvation without sacrifice. No faith without pain.

_I failed Him. I must do better._

Her head was spinning in agony, all the while the shadows clenched tighter and tighter. She could have gagged, could have wept, could have screamed…

…and then she saw them. In her delirium, suddenly they came into focus. It was like she was staring through the dark, looking at the shadows more clearly than she ever had seen them before.

They were beautiful lords cloaked in black. Each one was more beautiful than any prince, more noble than a king. They were dressed in flame-red finery under cloaks of black shadow. Their bodies rippled as they moved, swirling through the air. They were His servants, the envoys for her lord.

And then they stopped, and turned. Without warning, Melisandre slumped to the ground, their interest in her instantly vanished.

Something else had caught their attention. As one, the shadows shifted, they turned towards a single direction. They were staring out through the mortal barricades and out over the horizon. They were staring north.

‘Is that…?’

There was something different in the wind, something blowing in from the north. The room chilled slightly. Melisandre didn’t understand, but she felt the change in the room. The shadows stirred amongst themselves, tensing.

‘Do you feel it?’ a shadow whispered. ‘I feel them.’

Somewhere in the distance, it felt like a breaking in the world, as though a great lock had given way.

‘Is it them?’

‘Yes. They are here. The barrier is broken?’

‘The cold comes for us.’
Sorry about the long delay with this one, but real life has been difficult and it happens. Special thanks to Diablo Snowblind and Herraidous for their help with the chapter.
Val

The air of the infirmary was still and lifeless, pungent with the scent of lye and old blood. The only sounds were the faint pattering and thumping of boots outside, and the uneven breaths of a man on death’s door as he wheezed out strained words. They lay on opposite sides of the stone room, but she could hear every gasping word.

“I spy with my little eye…” the Greatjon muttered dozily, his eyelids flickering on the edge of sleep, “something beginning with ‘k’.”

In the opposing bed, Val stared up at the ceiling as she considered the puzzle. Normally she quite enjoyed riddles, but this one was a bitch.

“‘Keg’,” Val said finally, without even lifting her head from the goose down pillows, stained black with old blood.

The lord shook his head. “No.”

“‘King’, ” she offered.

“You see the king here?” The Greatjon harrumphed.

“He might have been carried past the door. Or maybe you’re just hallucinating again,” Val said with a shrug, and the movement sent a jolt of pain down her spine. The Greatjon only snorted.

It was just the two of them in the infirmary of Winterfell, both of them lying on blackened and bloodstained sheets. It was a chamber reserved for wounded lords and men of status, with only six beds in the room. Val wondered vaguely if all the other wounded men went elsewhere, in some smaller and more cramped room. Most likely there were others sleeping on the floor while the beds here went to spare. Previously, there had been some fat lord with an arrow in his gut sharing the room, but he had died and they had cleared his body quickly. After that, there had been a Manderly knight who broke his wrist in a spar, but he had recovered and left. The other beds had stayed empty.

Val knew that the Weeper had spent time in the adjoining chamber with some broken bones, but he was already limping about with crutches. Neither Val nor Lord Umber were fit to walk anywhere.

The Greatjon’s gut had been sliced open, while the left side of Val’s body had been hacked apart. Supposedly, both of them were lucky to be alive, but she sure as hells didn’t feel lucky.

There was naught to do but lie in the infirmary, the silence broken only by the occasional guessing “Is it ‘crate’?” she said finally, as she lay in bed with eyes half-closed.

“That doesn’t begin with a k.”

“Well how the fuck am I meant to know that?” Val snapped, but without any real irritation. “I can’t spell, you know.”

Across from her, Lord Umber scoffed. “It was ‘knife’.”

Val rolled her eyes. “Fuck you and your letters.”

The time passed in silence. Neither of them wanted to be here – she didn’t choose him, and he didn’t choose her. Still, they were trapped in this room, and they had nothing but each other’s company.

His voice was a hoarse whisper, and hers was a throaty choke. Each night, she could hear the Greatjon unable to breathe – he would start wheezing for air as he struggled to stay alive. Every night was a strain. Sooner or later, Val imagined that she would have to listen to him choking to death. She had started to anticipate the moment when he would finally suffocate.

Val was better, fractionally. It felt like she had been through the worst of it and was slowly starting to heal. She was more coherent in the mornings, she was passing out less and less. She was moving on to eat solid foods, even. If not for the fever and the dizziness, she might even have been able to stand.

Those first days after the Battle of the Snows were blanked out from her mind, and the first weeks after that had been a blur of sickness and pain. When she had finally awoken, it had been in an unfamiliar place gripped by chaos, but slowly she was starting to feel whole again.

Feel whole, she repeated silently, adding a quiet scoff.

“Fine. My game, now,” Val said eventually, after a long moment’s thought. “I am alive without breath, and as cold as death. I am clad in mail but never chinking, and never thirsty but ever drinking. What am I?”

The Greatjon’s face twisted into a scowl. “Is that one of those white walkers you keep talking about?”

“Not this time.” Val shook her head. “Try again.”

There was a long silence as he contemplated. Val had to repeat the riddle twice, but the Greatjon just looked more and more confused. “Oh, bugger this game,” the lord groaned, and he sagged backwards into his bed.

Val allowed herself a smirk. Her skin was sweaty and clammy, her fever was burning high, but she had to savour the small victories. “A fish,” she said slowly. “The answer was a fish.”

“How does that even...?” he muttered, but then he realised the answer and gave a low groan. “Dammit.”

She could have laughed, but her throat was choked by a series of hoarse coughs filled with phlegm. A layer of sweat clung to her pale skin, and her once golden hair was turning stiff and grey.
“Alright, easy one this time,” Val wheezed, clearing her throat. “I move without legs, I push without arms, I whisper without words and I howl without a mouth. What am I?”

The lord looked baffled. He wasn’t good at this game. She let him stew for a while, before finally having mercy. “Wind,” she said. “I’m the wind.”

“Bugger it.” From across the room, the Greatjon rustled in his bed. He tried to move slightly, and then groaned in pain.

“The princess will be furious if you burst your stitches again,” Val warned.

His only reply was a low, angry growl.

There was a certain pattern to the days in the infirmary. Val didn’t know how long it had been – she had lost track of time. The servants came in with porridge or stew three times a day, followed usually by one of them puking shortly afterwards. The men outside rotated four times a day, but there was always at least two of them standing guard. That useless dolt of a maester visited once a day, mostly to change bandages. There was very little smalltalk.

Occasionally, after one of his spasms, the Greatjon would beg for milk of the poppy – only to be told each time that they had none.

The washerwomen changed the sheets once every two days, and they emptied the bedpans twice a day. Val, at least, was well enough to use a bucket, but the Greatjon couldn’t even pull himself upright without rupturing his stomach. The huge lord of Umber was left to soil his own sheets.

The air stunk of waste, foul blood, and despair. With all the heat, it felt like the stench was cooking.

There were times when it felt like death would be the easier option. Occasionally, Val wondered why she held on.

“So is this what you do beyond the Wall?” the Greatjon asked finally. “Sit around with these little word games?”

“Well, we never had all those fancy letters like you do. We didn’t have big castles to hide in, either,” Val retorted softly. “When winter comes and the forests freeze over, we find our own distractions.”

She remembered so many cold nights spent clinging to the fire and listening to a hundred tales and stories, playing a thousand little games. As a girl, they had been buried by snows twenty-foot-deep, and they could only huddle together for warmth and dream of spring. They would tell tales, trade lewd jokes or come up with riddles just to pass the frozen nights.

“Like raping and stealing?” Lord Umber’s voice was bitter, but Val didn’t rise to it.

“Sometimes,” she sighed. “Or sometimes we’d just make snowmen.”

“Snowmen?”

“Aye. Back when I was a lass, we used to make hundreds of snowmen in winter. Real big snowmen too, we’d build them all around the village.” Her voice turned wistful. “We used to use them to scare hungry giants away.”

From the other bed, the Greatjon lifted his head and stared at her as if she was japing. “Giants?”
“Oh aye.”

“Snow told me that those giants ate fruits and nuts.”

“They do. Mostly.” Val nodded. “But in winter? They’ll eat absolutely anything they can grab.”

The Greatjon’s head dropped back onto his pillow. He took a deep, strained breath. “How many winters have you seen?” the lord wheezed finally.

Val shrugged. “Eight, I think.”

“I’ve seen thirty. The longest lasted three years. That one damn near killed me.”

“I remember that one.” She frowned. “Well, I remember folk talking about it. I was just a babe, I think.”

“It was bad.” His voice was low, his breaths uneven. He muttered the words like a confession. “The hearth froze over, we had no food. That was when my father went out hunting. Left me with my uncles.”

“Aye, ‘went hunting’, ” Val repeated, with a sad grimace. “The same happens in the north too. They go hunting and they know they’re not coming back.”

The Greatjon gave a weak nod. “Long summer means a long winter,” he murmured. “Few years back, I started thinking if maybe this would be the winter when I’d go hunting. Oh, I thought about it – walking off and having to leave my boys…”

His voice trailed off into an uneasy silence. There was a long pause, before finally he managed to shiver and focus himself.

“Can’t even imagine what winter would be like further north,” the lord admitted. “You’d freeze your bloody asses off in the snow.”

Val just shrugged a shoulder, hiding her discomfort. She kept her eyes closed. “Well, Snow never seemed to mind my ass.”

The Greatjon blinked, and glanced at her. There was a pause, then he chuckled. Then his breaths were wheezes, and he clutched his bloody bandages as he choked.

They talked occasionally – mumbling in the hush of the ward. They were mostly talking to themselves, just as a means to stay sane. He told her of Last Hearth, and of the north. She told him of life beyond the Wall, of the clans, the hunts and the forests. Occasionally, the Greatjon would mention his sons, but his voice would always fall quiet afterwards. She knew that his sons were dead.

There were long stretches of silence broken only by the occasional murmur.

It was still in the room. Not peaceful, just… fatigued. It was like the bed and the wound had stripped away her strength to move. Val lingered with her eyes closed – not asleep, but on the edge of unconsciousness.

She had been sleeping too much, but she still felt constantly tired.

Sometimes sleep was her only refuge, but other times the waking was the worst. Every time she woke up, she would try to stretch her limbs.
There were times during the day that she never even thought about her arm, but each time she awoke was like seeing the wound for the first time all over again. The sight of the jutted stump still made her feel nauseous, it still made her head spin.

Val took a deep breath, as her fingers traced the scar running down from her shoulder and her breast. She was covered in bandages, but she knew that underneath it all, the wound was vivid red, raw and weeping. In her dreams she saw that cleaver coming down over and over again…

She could still feel her left hand, sometimes. Occasionally as she dreamt she would curl it.
Sometimes she would reach for something, and for half a moment she felt her fingertips.
Sometimes she could trick herself. She knew that it wasn’t there, and all that remained was an ugly stump at her shoulder.

Val never regretted what she did, not even for a moment. If not for her, Jon would likely be dead or worse. Still, there were times when she did regret surviving it.

Through the shuttered windows, she saw reddish sunlight. Val didn’t even know whether it was dusk or dawn – she had lost all sense of time.

“Your turn,” she said finally. ‘Give a riddle.”

The large man was silent for a time. “I know one. Got told it as a child,” he muttered. “If you break me, I do not stop working. If you touch me, I may be snared. If you lose me, nothing else matters.
What am I?”

Val thought on it for only a moment. “A heart,” Val said finally.

He grunted. “Close enough.”

Her fingers slowly traced the jagged scar over her breast.

Vaguely, Val looked for Jon. She wondered if he would ever come to her bedside, or visit her in the infirmary. There had been a few other guests – Tormund, old free folk friends, and even Snow’s sister had visited her once. Val had talked with Sansa Stark briefly, though the meeting had been stiff. Lord Umber had been visited by plenty of other lords and men she never knew. But Jon himself never came.

Val hadn’t even seen him since she woke up.

She could understand why, she knew he was busy. They had told her of the disaster at the Wall, of the massacre in the great hall, and Val knew that Others wouldn’t wait. There was a war to fight, and Val wasn’t one to pine over a man.

But still, deep down, his absence pained.

Instead, she could only lie in bed and think of riddles. She slept most of the day and lay awake at night. During the hour of the ghost, she occasionally crept out of bed and tried to walk.

Over a fortnight of fever and lethargy had left her muscles numb. Her joints creaked as she walked, and her scar pained. With only a single arm, she could not seem to find her balance. Even a few steps left her woozy and pained.

As she slept, she would dream of falling backwards into the snow, as an icy blade sliced open her heart. Other times, she dreamt of a great stone dragon, buried underground with white roots wrapped around it. Once, she dreamt of an avalanche of snow tumbling down over the world.
The very next morning, she had a visitor. Val half-expected to see the young maester again, but instead she heard the tap-tap of a walking stick against stone. Uneven feet lurched slowly through the doorway.

Val perked upwards, just as a short, wrinkled crone stepped into the chamber.

“Lady Val of Whitetree, I hear,” the rustic voice grated. “They speak highly of you.”

For a heartbeat, Val wanted to throw something. Her phantom fist clenched. “Mother Mole.”

“That’ll be Mother Reverend to you, dearie.” Her voice was sharp, hoarse and throaty. “Prioress, if you feel so inclined. These southerners do like their little titles.”

The old woman was so short she could have been a dwarf, and she seemed shorter still as she stood over her weirwood staff. Mother Mole was a wrinkled prune with a mouthful of rotten teeth, with skin as weathered as a willow’s bark. The woman reminded Val vaguely of a rotting tree; the crone was hunch-backed and crooked, wearing hemp robes and a chain of white stones that rattled with every step.

Val’s eyes narrowed. The woods witch was followed by two spearwives, each one with a face like old leather. They were all wearing white; white robes, white staffs and white spears, with a necklace of white stones.

“What are you doing here, witch?” Val snapped.

“What I must. They told me to see to you.” Narrowed eyes peered down at Val’s bandaged shoulder, and the witch tutted. “Now what sort of fool bandaged that?”

There was something about the old woman that sent shivers down her spine. They might call her “priestess” now, but Val remembered when Mother Mole was a mad old crone who lived in a tree. No, this hag is still mad – the only difference is where she lives.

And yet still… “Are you here to heal me?” Val muttered, eying the old woman as Mother Mole creaked closer.

“I cannot bring the arm back,” the witch snorted. “But I can cleanse the wound, and ease the flesh. I have poultices that might stop the swelling and herbs that will fade the scar.”

“If needed,” one of the spearwives said suddenly, “we could sacrifice a goat to your well-being.”

Val shrugged, or tried to. “Bring the goat.”

Mother Mole stopped by her bedside and didn’t move. “How queer,” the crone chortled. “The last time we met, you told me to – what was it? Oh yes – ‘stay away from me and family, witch’.”

Val only glared. The last time I saw you, you were trying to bully me and my sister into converting.

Mother Mole had been pressuring Dalla to take a white stone, and Val feared what might happen if she persisted. Still, now, Val held her tongue.

“Have you changed your mind, dearie?” Mother Mole asked, a slow smile creasing her craggy skin. “Do you now want my aid?”

Her jaw clenched. “Yes.”

“I did not hear you.”
“Yes,” Val growled. “Please, help me.”

Mother Mole hobbled closer. “Healing is for the devoted only,” she chided. “If you want salvation, you must first embrace the god and the dragon.”

Slowly, one of the women placed a smooth white stone by Val’s hand. She only glared hatefully.

Across the room, the Greatjon watched without a word.

She knew it was expected, but Val couldn’t bring herself to reach for the stone. Mother Mole paused, and then tutted. The sound was like nails over bone. “You did provide pleasure of the flesh to the prophet,” the witch mused. “And perhaps he will be grateful if you survive. I suppose concessions could be made.”

_Bitter twisted hag._

Mother Mole dropped her staff against the wall, and then limped forward to croon over Val’s wound. With a click of leathery fingers, she pointed to her followers.

“Hold her down,” the woods witch ordered.

The women obeyed, and their hands were rough.

Despite herself, Val couldn’t stop the scream of pain as the older woman squeezed her flesh tightly. Gnarly fingers clawed at the sensitive wound, while they stripped off the wool bandages.

Across the ward, the Greatjon shouted something, but Val couldn’t make out the words. The witch ignored his protest.

Mother Mole squeezed her scar so tightly it hurt. The fingers were like claws. “After this,” the witch croaked, “I expect to see you in my congregation.”

Val could only grit her teeth and close her eyes.

The woman had all the warmth of a torturer. Val felt a mucus-like mixture smeared over the wound, followed by pain as a fine twine stitch pressed through the wound. A thorn-like needle poked and pierced into her. Those gnarly hands were all over Val’s shoulder, her torso, her breast.

First, they applied poultices and herbs, before being washed off with warm water and leaves. Then, Mother Mole mixed some foul-smelling gunk – like red and white ooze.

As soon as the substance hit Val’s skin, it burnt like poison ivy scraping over the scar. It was pure, burning agony, but heartbeats later it faded away. Val gasped as the pain disappeared, to be replaced by a pleasant tingling sensation over her skin. She could feel a soothing liquid wash over her phantom arm.

The two spearwives held her downwards, while Mother Mole wrapped Val in fresh bandages so tight Val struggled to breathe. “Give it time to settle,” Mother Mole ordered. “I shall be back in two days to rinse and repeat.”

Val’s head was spinning in so much pain she could barely think. Mother Mole then ordered her to drink something from a bowl, but the substance was foul and horrid. With a click of her fingers, the spearwives plied open Val’s mouth and forced the mucus down her throat. She gagged, sputtering out greenish substance that tasted like bile.
“What was that?” Val gasped.

“It will help, dearie,” the witch chuckled. “But I never claimed that healing was nice.”

They left the white stone by her bed as they walked away. Val wanted to throw it, but she couldn’t find the strength.

After she was done with Val, Mother Mole limped towards the Greatjon. “As for you, Lord Umber,” the witch croaked, “do you embrace the ice dragon as your saviour and salvation?”

The Greatjon muttered out a curse that Val couldn’t hear, but Mother Mole just seemed amused. “You are dying, lord,” the witch continued. “You know that you are. Can you feel the bleeding inside your gut, the haemorrhaging in your chest? Your lungs are clogging, and you will rot from the inside out. But I can cleanse the wound, I might save you.”

There was no reply but wheezy, unstable breaths. Mother Mole frowned, and one of the spearwives looked to her for confirmation. “Mother?”

“The man is weak,” the witch decided, “but perhaps he will make a better decision when he’s whole. Hold him down – I shall need warm water and fine twine. And a sharp knife.”

The women had to fasten belts around the Greatjon’s thick wrists and stamp on them. Mother Mole wielded the slender knife like a butcher.

Val couldn’t see, but she heard the squelch as the witch pulled out the stitches. She was cleaning and then refastening the wound with twine. For a large man, the Greatjon suddenly seemed so small. He was screaming in pain.

It looked like there was frighteningly little blood left in the man’s body, and the blood that oozed out seemed a darker shade.

They came and went all day, hovering around the Greatjon. At one point, Mother Mole pricked the Greatjon’s finger and then dropped a fleck of his blood into her mouth. Then, Mother Mole pricked the finger of one of her followers and tasted her blood, and then again on the second woman. The witch tasted her blood, and then nodded.

Afterwards, to Val’s shock, one of the spearwives extended her hand, and Mother Mole reached over and gingerly slit the woman’s wrist. A small needle pulled open the cut, and they used what looked like a rabbit’s intestine to funnel the blood – transferring the blood from the woman into the Greatjon. After a while, the spearwife looked faint and had to be carried away, with thick bandages held tightly around her wrist.

Val didn’t know what was happening, or what sort of unholy sacrifice this was. The lord himself had fallen unconscious. Still, the spearwives rebandaged the Greatjon’s wound and removed his sheets. The man was left naked, pale and bloody atop the rough mattress. The raw scar across his stomach made him look like a corpse.

Finally, Mother Mole limped away. “The great war comes, dearie,” Mother Mole croaked as she left, “it will be the living against the dead, and the holy against the unholy. You must pick a side.”

She did not reply. Val noticed that the guards outside had been replaced by spearwives wearing white stones.

Her shoulder was throbbing so painfully she could barely think. She collapsed into a restless sleep.
That night was the most painful she had felt in a while. The poultices on the bandages made the wound feel raw again, and every nerve was screaming in pain. Val didn’t know what medicines Mother Mole had forced into her, but it felt like they were burning through her body.

The next morning, Val was woken by yet another spearwife with a white stone, bringing a bowl of soup. “Ice dragon bless you,” the woman said, placing the pot next to her.

It was only when she spoke that Val realised she wasn’t a spearwife at all. The woman had the accent of a northerner, from south of the Wall. Yet she wore a white stone and twine necklace – a convert.

With eerie realisation, she suddenly saw that the white stones were everywhere.

Val half-expected the Greatjon to be dead after the witch’s butchery, but he was still breathing. He seemed weaker though, his breaths even more uncertain.

The following day, Mother Mole returned and sacrificed a goat before the Greatjon’s bed. They cut out the beast’s heart and nailed it to the wall above him.

The days passed in pain. Despite herself, the fever did begin to break. The phantom pain in her arm didn’t fade, but it became easier to breathe through the scar on her breast. The infirmary was still swelteringly hot, but the sweat and the fever faded.

All the while Val started to heal, the Greatjon only seemed to grow worse. He was a big, muscled man, but he looked like he was withering away on the bed. His black beard was shaggy like rope, greying at the edges. Mother Mole visited him thrice, but each time the witch seemed disappointed in the results. Every night, Val was mildly surprised that the man was still alive, but he was clinging onto life like a drowning man to a shipwreck.

By the second day, Val started to walk more often, even despite hobbling with every step.

She needed to escape that torturous bed – she stumbled down the corridors of Winterfell and headed outside.

The sight of the pale, one-armed woman stumbling around drew a few stares. Occasionally, Val would meet some that she had been introduced to in New Castle. Some few knew her as Lady Whitetree, but to most she was the king’s wounded paramour. Guards followed her, and she would hear the whispers as she passed.

They told her not to leave the keep, but Val wanted to know what had happened at the Wall – with Jon, Mance and Dalla. It seemed like nobody had answers to share.

Eventually, Val grew restless enough to step out of the gates, and she saw the yards of Winterfell overfilled with refugees.

The grounds were covered in tents so thick it felt like a slum. A carpet of hide tents and bonfires stretched out over the yards, even in the courtyard right outside of the keep. The earth was still warm, but the lightest frosting of snow was starting to creep back across the walls. Val knew of the Winter Town outside the castle, but it seemed like most of these people were cramming to take shelter within the castle’s walls instead.

Val saw men and women, northerners and free folk, with gaunt cheeks, carrying everything they owned in the sacks over their shoulders.

A guard tried to urge her to step back inside, but Val had been cooped up for far too long. She heard a commotion by the gates, and she followed. The crowd was so thick that Val struggled to push her way through.

Every time a man bumped into her, she could have howled in pain. Her raw scar burnt like scolding coals on her skin.

She arrived just as an ox-driven cart rumbled through the gates. It was dragging three limp figures behind it, their bodies sliding over the stones. At first, Val thought they were corpses, but then she saw them move.

The crowd gasped at the sight, mutters rising.

Wights. The cart was dragging wights. Each one was grey-skinned, staring with empty pale eyes. Their legs were wriggling, even while they were dragged across the stones by a rope wrapped around their necks and waists. The ox seemed unnerved with their very presence, all while the crowd gaped and jeered.

The wights had no arms, Val realised. The men must have chopped off the creature’s limbs, just to be safe. The captured wights were being paraded through the crowds of Winterfell for all to see.

She watched as they hammered six foot tall wooden stakes into the ground, right at the very front of the gates. Each wight was hoisted upwards by a gaggle of men, and then their chests were dragged over the sharpened spikes – impaling the dead bodies up off the ground. Val heard the crunch of the rib cages as their chests were forced straight through the points. The spikes were lining the roadside, rotten bodies still being mounted. The wights were left to twitch as helplessly as pinned insects, their legs still flailing. Crucified but undying.

All around her, Val heard ringing bells, and voices chanting. “Look upon the creatures of the dead, look at what awaits you!” a woman’s cry screamed over the mob. “These are what we face. Only the Dragon may grant salvation, and only the Circle shows the way!”

“Salvation!” the worshippers chanted. “Salvation! Salvation!”

She saw people in the yards sickened by the mere sight of it. The rotten bodies made for horrifying sights – like living scarecrows, slaughtered bodies still kicking. The wights thrashed blindly, but to Val, something in their pale, lifeless eyes seemed lost or confused.

More and more carts were coming south, bringing with them hundreds of pale-eyed wights that had been captured in the battle. Along with them came a tide of refugees from the battles, all hungry and worn.

A free folk raider even dragged two of the wights through the Great Keep itself, so that all of the lords and ladies could stare at them in horror.

Val just watched it all unfold around her.

She still didn’t know what happened in the battle at the Wall, but she saw its grim aftermath trek through Winterfell’s gates.

A band of cavalry were trotting through the crowds, announcing conscription and calling upon both men and women to enlist. A ragtag militia was forming in the outer yards filled with weak bodies clutching pitchforks and scythes. The castle had announced that all men and women who enlisted would receive double rations, and suddenly there were more in the militia than there were swords or shields.
They looked like they might have press-ganged Val too, even despite the missing arm – if not for a guard recognising her.

She saw white stones everywhere, even on northern knights. The southerners would gape at the undead during the day, and then flock towards the congregation in the godswood at night.

It felt like Winterfell was changing. She could feel it in the air; it was as clear as the unnatural heat that burned from the ground. The people were scared, and everything they had once known was falling apart.

It was all overwhelming. There were dozens, hundreds, crowded around her, shambling and knocking into one another. Val staggered, but then a large woman shoved into her from behind. The pain seared over her wound, and suddenly she lost her footing. Val was tumbling, crashing down to the stones.

A scream broke her throat, but it was like no one even noticed.

They were all pressing forward to see the undead wights, and she was trapped in the middle of the mob.

Val tried to pull herself upwards, but she couldn’t manage it with only one hand. The mob around her was like a stampede, threatening to crush her. Bodies jostling into each other, stamping feet everywhere. Val tried to stagger to her knees, but then the flow of the crowd threatened to crush her…

“It’s alright, I’ve got you…” muttered a voice suddenly next to her, and then there was a hand wrapping around her shoulder. In his other hand, the figure held a three-pronged spear, spinning it to force the people backwards. “I’ve got you.”

Val was in too much pain to focus, but she felt the man’s grip. He lifted the one-armed woman up off the ground, pushing their way clear.

Val took deep breaths, trying to focus. The man wrapped her one arm over his neck, half-guiding her and half-carrying her back to the keep.

At first, in her delirium, she thought he was one of Winterfell’s guards, but then slowly she realised he was dressed differently. Instead of a spear, he held a pronged trident. He was short too; an entire foot shorter than her.

Instead of a grey wolf on his chest, he bore a black frog. His armour was dull grey leathers instead of chainmail.

Val blinked, and suddenly realised that she didn’t recognise the corridor they were walking down.

“Where are you taking me?” she muttered. Instinctively, she tried to reach for her weapons, only to realise that she had no blade on her belt. And no hand to grab one with.

The man didn’t reply. Val couldn’t struggle. He didn’t slacken his grip on her as he walked towards a door at the edge of the corridor. With the butt of his trident, he knocked twice.

“Enter,” a wheezy voice called, and the short man pulled her through.

“I have the woman, Lord Reed,” the man muttered, as Val stumbled through the doorway. Her head was spinning, she couldn’t focus…
“Thank you, Edwyle,” the wheezy voice replied. “Lady Val, is it?”

Firm hands guided her to a seat, and Val nearly collapsed. She was gasping for air, the pain itching over her joint…

“Deep breaths, my lady,” that breathless voice croaked, almost soothingly. “Edwyle, please fetch our guest some water.”

She felt a goblet wrapped into her hand, cool liquid dribbling over the brim. Her fingers couldn’t hold it, and it dropped out of her grip. Water spilled over her onto the floor and carpet.

Finally, Val managed to refocus herself and take stock of her surroundings.

She was sitting on a cushioned chair, staring across at an old man sitting opposite.

The man’s face was pale, his back hunched and his shoulders drooping. He had vivid moss green eyes set above gaunt cheeks – his skin looked discoloured and sickly. He was dressed in the pale leather and fine hides of a lord, and in his hands he cradled a walking stick.

There was a whistling in the room, rising and falling. The sound of his strained breathing, in and out.

“Who are you?” she croaked, tensing.

“At ease, Lady Val, I mean you no harm.”

His voice was soft, very soft – so low it was like a whisper, slurred slightly by his wheezes. He didn’t have the breath to speak loudly, instead she had to strain to hear.

“Edwyle, you may leave us,” he ordered.

“My lord, are you…?”

“Please, Edwyle.” With a great deal of effort, the sickly lord dragged himself to his feet, supported on his cane. Wheezy breaths followed every movement. “I am much better, thank you. You can wait outside.”

The man with the trident left. There was another set of eyes in the room, Val realised suddenly; a figure sitting so still she hadn’t even noticed him at first. Her gaze turned to the corner of the room, where a youth – looking around thirteen, fourteen years old – sat on a worn armchair.

The boy looked unwell too. He was not ragged and worn like the old man, but he had bandages around his shoulder. Both the boy and the old man shared a look to them – both with discerningly deep green eyes. Their pupils were the very darkest green she had ever seen.

Val didn’t know what was happening. The old man followed her gaze and smiled.

“Lady Val, I believe introductions are in order.” He finished tottering upwards, staggering to fetch her another cup of water. “I am Lord Howland Reed, and this is my son, Jojen.”

“Pleased to meet you, my lady,” the boy said stiffly, in a voice that sounded older than his years.

Val looked between them, staring with confusion. Lord Howland offered her another cup of water, but Val didn’t take it.

There was no hostility in his gaze – or at least none that Val could sense – but she was still on edge.
She was in pain, and the aggression slipped into her voice.

“Who?”

“Lord Reed,” the sickly man repeated, “Lord of Greywater Watch?” If he was looking for recognition, he found none. “Ah, never mind. I am a friend of House Stark.”

She scoffed. “That sounds like something an enemy would say.”

“Very true,” he admitted, with another smile. “But I suppose I can’t prove or disprove that, so I’ll leave it there. You do not have to sit so stiffly, my lady – I just wish to talk.”

You had your man drag me here. There were guards standing outside. She did not trust these southerners. Her pale blue eyes met his dark green, and her lips curled backwards.

“About?”

He paused, taking a sip from the cup himself. “About Jon Snow.”

“Why?”

“I would like to know more of him.”

Her eyes narrowed. “Why me?”

“I’ve spoken to many around here, and they say that you know him best. You were his…” The lord’s voice flickered with uncertainty. “…His lover, yes?”

‘Were’. Is that past tense? she wondered.

She didn’t reply, but she glared like an angry cat. The boy – Jojen – he was staring straight at her missing arm, and that put Val on edge.

For a moment, Lord Howland seemed flustered. “Forgive me, this isn’t how I wanted to start this discussion,” he admitted. “Can I get you a drink? Something to eat?”

“I’m fine.” Val’s voice was a snap.

His gaze turned towards her stump. She tried to cradle it as she sat, but she could place no pressure on the wound.

“Does it hurt?” Lord Howland asked softly.

“They cut off my fucking arm,” she growled. “Of course it bloody hurts.”

“Language, please!” Lord Reed protested. “There are children present.” He shook his head, but slowly, as though he was tired.

Val’s eyes could have bulged. She stared at him as if this were some jape. The pain and confusion of being so out of control put her on edge. Something about Lord Howland’s soft wheeze caused her to growl.

The sickly man met her gaze, and then sighed. “Jojen, may you give us a moment?”

“Yes, father,” the boy said. He had the voice of a loyal son, and stood up from the armchair. Jojen Reed moved with a wince as he stumbled out of the room.
“I’m leaving too,” Val said curtly, nails digging into the chair as she dragged herself up.

“Please, my lady, don’t leave.”

“You going to have your little man stop me?” she spat.

“I don’t want to. But I might.” She glared at him. “What would happen if you fell down again, my lady?”

_Is that a threat?_ she wondered.

The man staggered on his cane, and Lord Howland carefully stepped around the table. “Hold on, allow me to show you something…”

There was a cabinet in the corner of the room, made out of old oak like everything else that wasn’t stone in the castle. The doors creaked as Lord Howland pulled them open, and then, with a long wheeze, he hoisted up a heavy clay pot.

“Here, consider this a gift,” the lord offered, panting. “A token of friendship.”

She did not step any closer. The man popped the cork from the pot, and a thick earthy smell wafted out.

“It will help,” he explained, despite her silence. “Smear this over the wound and it will help the rawness.”

She stepped forward and stared at the clay pot. It was full of brown mucus. “Mud.”

“Mud from Greywater Watch. I brought several containers of the stuff with me.” He stepped backwards, and the cabinet was filled with clay pots. “It won’t heal anything, but it will ease some of the discomfort. Please…” He motioned at her, as if he expected her to try some.

Val didn’t move, her eyes narrowed. Was this a jape?

“It will help,” he repeated. “I know how much the scar will chafe.”

“You don’t know a thing,” her voice growled.

“Is that so?” He raised an eyebrow.

“Aye. Don’t bother with this whole act.” _Bloody mud._ She stepped backwards. “How many arms have you ever lost, lord?”

“Oh, I think I know what it’s like more than most,” he retorted. “I’m not unsympathetic, Val.”

Without a pause, he unfastened the clasp of his belt, and then his tunic. Val glared, then the man pulled up his tunic, raising it over his torso. She saw pale flesh, a hairless skinny stomach.

And then there was a vivid red scar cutting across his torso.

The sight caused some of her anger to fade away. The wound was old and faded, the skin knotted together and long sealed, but the redness still lingered.

“You lost an arm. I lost a lung.” Lord Howland smiled humourlessly. “The blade that got me broke open half my ribs. I can feel it every time that I breathe. Eighteen years I’ve suffered with it.”
Her gaze flickered. She wasn’t sure how to reply.

“Take the mud,” he insisted. “It will help, if you have it in you to trust me.”

He let out a breath after a momentary silence, then tottered backwards, easing himself down into his seat again. Val quietly inspected the mud.

Moments passed. There was something about the man’s tone that seemed to fill the room with silence.

“My wound will never heal,” he said finally. “Neither will yours. You will never sleep comfortably again. Tis a cruel thing, but it happens. I’ve known some men that would rather choose death than debility, and there’s been times when I’ve understood why. I’ve found ways to live with it, but I will be short of breath until the day I die.”

Val didn’t speak. Her jaw was clenched, staring down at the mud. It was strange, thick with a reddish, syrupy liquid. It reminded her of blood.

Lord Howland leaned forward on his seat, closer towards her. “Still, let me tell you something that I wish somebody had told me eighteen years ago,” he continued. “That scar does not define you.

“I’ve lived with this half my life, but I still married a beautiful woman and fathered two gorgeous children. Oh, I will never hold a spear again, but it hasn’t stopped anything that’s truly important. I’ve had a good life regardless of this scar, and perhaps a longer one than I deserve.”

Lord Howland extended his hand, and gently took her hand. Normally Val would have flinched from a stranger’s touch, but his bony fingers were gentle and comforting. His grip was ginger – cradling her hand.

“The wounds we take do not decide who we are, my lady,” he said softly. “What matters is how we choose to recover from them.”

Val’s gaze dipped, and her aggression bled away. Lord Howland didn’t seem irritated at her, just… patient. Those green orbs were somehow both piercing and soft. He sat over the table, gently holding her hand, waiting for a reply.

“Thank you.” she mumbled as she finally pulled her hand away. “For the mud.”

He gave a weak smile. “Think nothing of it. Are you sure you don’t want a drink?”

“I’m fine.”

“Then may I ask a few questions?”

“On Jon Snow?” she muttered.

“Yes.”

She shook his head. “I can tell you nothing more than anyone could. There are plenty who can talk about him.”

“I do not trust most talk. I’ve already heard about what he’s done, but perhaps you could tell me what he’s like,” Lord Howland pressed. “Is he kind? Merciful?”

What strange questions. Val had to frown as she thought about them. “He tries to be kind, perhaps,” she said finally. “Doesn’t always succeed. And he can be plenty merciful until you cross “Until you cross him,” the man repeated. “Then is he violent, does he lose his temper? Or does he enjoying hurting people?”

Val frowned. “Jon is one of the best fighters I’ve ever known. He’s not the best, but there ain’t many better than him.” She nodded. “And he does love a good fight. And, aye, he’s got a temper too. But he doesn’t enjoy hurting people.”

“I see,” the lord mused for a while, bright eyes unblinking. “Then is he fair in his judgements? Is he patient? Does he encourage free-thinking or does he enforce only his will?”

She hesitated. “Jon gets stressed more than anyone else I know. Sometimes I think it tears him up inside.”

“Aye, I know the type.” He nodded. “What about outside of kingship? How does he treat his servants, how does he talk to the people beneath him?”

Val could only shrug one shoulder. She looked up, feeling perplexment spreading across her face.
Lord Howland sounded genuinely invested. “What is your interest in him?”

“I… I am a friend of the family.”

“What does that even mean?”

“I was there at Jon’s birth,” he admitted. “I knew him as a babe.”

“Then shouldn’t you know more about him than I do?” she challenged. “He grew up in this castle – closer to you than to me.”

“The last time I saw him, he was around three, maybe four?” Lord Howland’s eyes looked distant for a moment. “I had to stay away from Winterfell for most of his childhood, and travelling is difficult for me,” he explained. “That doesn’t mean I stopped thinking about him, though. I’ve always wondered about the man that Jon Snow would grow to become.”

There was a pause. The lord cradled his chin in his hands, and took a deep breath. “But not even I ever imagined him as King-beyond-the-Wall, let alone riding an ice dragon.” He sighed. “It is a funny old world, isn’t it?”

That was one way to phrase, Val supposed. “Guess so.”

Why did Jon abandon his vows, why did he choose to become King-beyond-the-Wall?”

“What do you mean?”

“Surely another option would have been to bring the dragon to the Night’s Watch, not to the free folk? He didn’t need to stay north at all.” Lord Howland scratched his whiskers. “So why did he?
Was it for power, ambition, love…?”

She hesitated. The memory of those days north still haunted her – the days when the cold had stalked in the darkness and Mance’s host had been left scattered in the forest. Val and her sister might well have died at Whitetree, if it hadn’t been for the refuge at Hardhome.
“He did it because there were people who needed him to,” she said finally, with a shake of her head. “We – the free folk, me, my sister, her babe – we probably would have all died if he hadn’t. But he never enjoyed being king.”

Lord Reed just nodded, his eyes thoughtful.

It was the start of a long talk. There was something in the lord’s demeanor that encouraged her to speak more, and Howland was a good listener. She told him about the first time she met Jon – all the way back in Mance’s tent – and afterwards when he had reappeared with white hair and a dragon. She told him of the uniting of the free folk, about the exodus south, about the campaign in the north from the Wall. For most of it, the lord sat and listened intently.

Val asked questions of her own too. Lord Howland could share more details of the events to the north. He told her that Jon had survived the assault on the Wall and that the dragon had been victorious, but Mance Rayder had fallen in battle. There was no news of Dalla in any of their reports, but Howland promised to secure word of her sister. Val just nodded.

Mance… she wasn’t surprised. He had never been one to run.

As dusk fell, Lord Howland had her escorted back to the infirmary. He also offered to arrange a private room for her in the castle, but she refused.

Val limped back to her sickbed. She was so weary from her talk that she fell asleep before she hit the pillows.

She dreamt of a battle to the north, but in her mind they were fighting water instead of men. The Wall was creaking like a dam fit to burst, with punctures piercing through the ice and great torrents of black water flooding out over the land…

When she awoke, she realised that they had left a jar of mud by her bedside. She drifted for a time, half-lucid, dreaming of braiding her sister’s hair with two good hands.

As morn drifted over her, she found herself listening to the Greatjon’s phlegmy snores, thinking of the strange conversation of the day before. She kept on replaying the questions that Howland had asked, trying to understand what his interest. The broken lord’s curiosity with Jon had not seemed hostile, and yet his questions had not felt normal.

The sound of Lord Umber’s breaths reminded her of Lord Reed’s gentle wheeze, but they were hoarse and rougher.

It was hours before the Greatjon woke, well into the early noon. For him, waking was not pleasant, Val suspected that he had soiled himself in his sleep again. The lord was still too weak to stand. He was barely strong enough to breathe – to move him would have killed him.

On the morn, either Mother Mole or one of her acolytes would visit, followed by a haggle of worshippers to change bandages or serve stew. Today, it was three women. As they worked, they would always chatter about the dragon and the faith. The women spoke with glossy gazes and hushed breaths, whispering of salvation and prophecy.

They even spoke proudly of King Brandon – the young boy chosen and blessed to lead them.

Once, Val knew that many had been upset with Snow kneeling to a boy, but then the miracle at Winterfell happened. That had caused plenty to change their opinions of the crippled king.

Most of the time, Val sat quietly and listened to the chatter. Something in their voices made her feel like it was dangerous to object.

“What of the Old Gods?” Val asked a woman finally, more from curiosity. “Do you still pray to them?”

“But of course.” She even seemed shocked by the very suggestion otherwise. “But the ice dragon is an Old God. It is a god given flesh, a sign of deliverance. The Mother says that the weirwoods heard our prayers and sent forth a dragon to save us all.”

From his bed, the Greatjon made a noise. “What does that make the other dragons, then?” the lord asked in a quiet wheeze. “There have been dragons in the past. None from north of the Wall, aye, but plenty of the fire-breathing sort in the south. Most of them never looked kindly on heart trees. Were those gods too?”

“Evil ones.” The woman shrugged. “There are plenty of gods. I know naught of these other dragons, but I know our God Sonagon was sent to save us.” The washerwoman’s voice was certain. “It was foretold.”

The Greatjon only scowled, causing another woman to glare at him. “The dragon rescued us. His coming marks the end of days – you’ve seen it yourself,” she chided. “The proof of his miracle is all around you, how can you doubt?”

The lord chose not to reply, or perhaps he was too weak to argue. The women kept on jabbering, talking more and more of the dragon and its prophet. Some said that the battle at the Wall had been a victory, and others muttered it had been a devastating loss. They whispered that Prince Snow had singlehandedly defeated legions of dead at the Wall, that he had fought the Other’s king to a standstill in a duel. They said that dragon’s breath had repaired the Wall and raised it to a hundred feet higher. They also said that King Brandon would be coronated soon, and that Mother Mole would be the one to crown him in the name of the Dragon.

Val knew that at least the last one was false. No doubt Mother Mole would want to be the one to crown the king, but the lords of the north would likely revolt at such a sight. Instead, it would likely be the boy’s sister, the princess, to place the crown on his little head.

Nevertheless, Mother Mole would be standing nearby, Val did not doubt. The force of the Circle was quickly becoming too strong to disregard.

She had never met the child, but she felt sorry for the young King Bran, sometimes. Val had watched the kingship wear away Jon down to the bone, she had seen how gaunt and stressed it made him. Regent or not, a crown felt like a cruel thing to place upon a boy.

The spearwives left after changing their bedpans. The room was left in silence for a long time, as dusk drooped over the castle outside and inside the room.

In the infirmary, the only sound was the Greatjon’s wheezy gasps.

“Long live the king,” she whispered grimly to the empty air. Val wondered where Snow was now.

The Greatjon only took a shallow breath. “Damn this all to hell.”

“Problem?” she muttered.

“Where do I even begin?” He tried to pull himself upwards, but he couldn’t meet her eyes. “Do you believe that talk of gods and dragons?”
She hesitated. “They believe it. But if you’re going to pray to something, I suppose a dragon is as good as anything.”

He made a scoffing noise. “They say this will be the Long Night. The Long Night. I didn’t believe it, but we got dragons and demons, dead men and living shadows. If they say that’s a god, how can I object?”

Val paused. “If it is a god,” she decided, “it’s a shit one.”

“Maybe all the gods are shit. Gods damn them all, how am I meant to…?” His voice was a broken murmur. “I ain’t strong enough for this shit.”

“You got your gut slashed wide open and you’re still breathing. You ain’t weak.”

“I’m old.” His voice was barely even audible between his breaths. “Not enough strength left in me, these bones can’t fight another war. Not another winter.”

It was strange to hear the Greatjon sound so tired, so small. His tone made Val feel uncomfortable.
“You ain’t that old.”

“I ain’t that young. Fuck it… I saw that… that thing, and I could do nothing.” He sounded pained.
“It cut right through me, right through my friends… and I can’t…”

His voice trailed off, the pants only growing deeper. The Lord of Last Hearth was lying breathless in his bed, staring up at the greying pig’s heart nailed to the wall. “I can’t handle this… this magic,
I just can’t…”

He sounded lost. Lost, wounded and weak, all of that boisterous strength had bled away with his guts. It was easy to be strong, but harder to stay strong after weeks of wasting away…

“I know,” Val muttered. She didn’t even know if he heard her, but there was nothing else to say.

“There are days when I wonder why,” he uttered the words like a confession. “Why even fight, why even…?”

Why even stay alive, Val knew. Why bother fighting the pain, when it will only cause more pain.
She let the words slip away unspoken into the gloom.

Silence reigned in the dark room.

“Do what I do. Think of the people who are still relying on me,” Val whispered. “I think of my people, my family, my sister.”

“And who’s that then?” the Greatjon wheezed. “My family are dead. I’ve outlived two wives and six children. There are days when I wish I had died at the Twins, I didn’t even want…”

There was a strained sniffle between the gasps of air. Val couldn’t see in the dark, but she suspected that the Greatjon was crying. He didn’t seem like a warrior anymore, he was just a large, broken man weeping through choked breaths in his bed.

Strangely, she wondered about Jon. She wondered if he ever cried when no one was looking.

“What were their names?” she muttered.

“My wives… Shella… Rose…” He slurred the words, broken by rough breaths. “My boys… Jon…
Steffon, Kol… Mikael…” His throat froze, like he could barely even speak the words. The only thing that came out were hoarse gasps.

He is dying, Val thought. Worse, it felt like the man had resigned himself to die. Suddenly, Val’s voice turned harsh. “Would they want you to die like this?”

There was no reply from the dark.

“Dying is a craven’s choice, Lord Umber,” Val said lowly. “If you love them, then stay alive and remember them.”

The air went still. It was the hour of the eel, as time slowly dripped away. The room was pitch black and uneasily silent, but she knew he wasn’t sleeping.

Instead, the only thing she heard were his strained, staggered breaths. She counted the breaths, each one threatening to gag and seal his throat.

“But it’s a riddle for you,” Val said finally. “Every morn I shall appear at your feet, every day I will follow you no matter how fast you run, and every dusk I will almost perish. What am I?”

There was long silence, and Val counted the breaths.

“A shadow,” he said finally.

“Aye, I knew you’d get one eventually, old man. Next one – the seas stand dry, the rivers do not run, these towns have no people, and these forests are still. Where are we?”

There was a pause. “Beyond the Wall.”

“Nope. Try again.”

She heard his gasp. “The Dothraki Sea.”

“I don’t even know where that is. Try again.”

He did not reply. Val counted to fifty, and then her voice chided. “Come on, old man. You haven’t answered the riddle yet. Where are we?”

The Greatjon made an indignant sound. He tried to shake her off, but Val kept on pressing for an answer. He growled in frustration, but Val just raised her voice and repeated the riddle. “We’re on a map,” he managed finally.

“Aye, that’s right.” She winced as she straightened up in her bed. “Come on now, I have more riddles.”

They sat awake all night, from the hour of the eel to the hour of the nightingale. Every time Val heard his breaths growing hoarse, she demanded another riddle from him. She did whatever she could to distract him from the soul-crushing hopelessness all around him.

The Greatjon didn’t die that night. She forced him to stay awake, to keep on talking, to keep on breathing just a bit longer. Whatever it took to survive one more night.

When morn came, he seemed to ease fractionally. The servants brought a great jug of water for him to gulp down, and when dawn came they both seemed to pretend the night before had never happened. The lord of Umber managed to move, barely.

She brought over the jar of mud, for his wound. Mother Mole’s foul ointments hadn’t worked, but perhaps Lord Reed’s precious mud would serve better.

“You should try to stand up,” she offered. “It does no good to lie on your back. Try to stand.”

“Fuck, I can’t…”

“Then move your arms.” Val winced as she staggered off to her own bed. “Move your legs. Just try to build up your strength.”

Bloodshot eyes glared in anger at her, while Val limped over to his side. For a moment, it seemed like there was something he wanted to say, but then his mouth clenched. Val scoffed, and slapped him on the shoulder so hard that he groaned.

“Come on,” she ordered. “You’ve survived this long. You’d be a bloody fool if you die now.”

The man grimaced, but he didn’t object as she settled down next to his bed. There was more silence, as Val rested her back against the wall and looked at him expectantly. The lord grit his teeth and stared stubbornly up at the ceiling.

“… I spy with my little eye,” the Greatjon murmured finally, through a pained grimace as he started to flex his legs, “something beginning with ‘b’.”

Val rolled her eyes, but she smirked too.

They sat together for a long time. Most of it was spent in quiet, but it was a comfortable quiet. They shared riddles together – even the infuriating ones where the letters sounded nothing like the words. Gradually, the lord’s breaths became fuller, a little bit more even and a bit less strained.

Val closed her eyes and rested her head back against the stone wall. Absentmindedly, she flexed her phantom arm.

On the bed, the Greatjon seemed to reach a decision. He had spent a while with his eyes closed, the occasional flicker back to her. When he finally spoke, his voice was strangely low. “You said that you had a sister,” he said. “Before, you mentioned a sister.”

It had been several months since she had last seen Dalla, or her nephew. Dalla was now a widow, her son fatherless. The thought pained.

“Older or younger?”

“Three years younger.” Val paused. “Well, roughly.”

The man paused for a time. A frown creased his pale face. “You’re not sure how old?”

“Nope. My father never kept count.”

“And what about your mother?”

She just shook her head. “A woman, likely older.”

“You never knew her?”

There was something in his voice she didn’t recognise. At once, Val’s voice turned sharp. “Is this an interrogation?”
“Just answer the bloody question,” he growled.

She rolled her eyes. “No, I never knew my mother,” she said with a snort. “My pa would go through a woman a week. He went raiding once, got a lass and brought back me and Dalla.”

The Greatjon frowned. Val turned to glance at him. “My pa was the strongest chieftain around in his time,” she explained. “He was a named man – all the other clans knew of him, even the crows up in their nests. Oh, me and Dalla likely weren’t his only children, but we’re the only ones he decided to keep. I never much knew my father – he died to a Thenn’s axe back when I had pimples. What’s it to you?”

At that, he went silent. The man seemed to be contemplating something, but Val couldn’t even read his expression.

“Do you remember your mother’s name?” he said finally. “Or what she looked like?”

Val snorted. “No, of course not. I was a babe.”

She saw his eyes flickering. He didn’t speak, but she caught his gaze inspecting her through the corner of his eye. The man seemed strangely nervous, and for whatever reason it unnerved her and she looked away.

There was a long hush that felt almost expectant. Curiously, Val noted that his breaths had turned silent.

Eventually, Val turned back to him with a frown. “Your turn, old man.” Her eyes narrowed. “Why are you so interested in my family?”

The Greatjon never replied.

Jon

The wind roared in his ears as he looked down on the white world from the dragon’s back.

He was flying east, tracing the solid white line of the Wall over the arc of the horizon. The white land below blurred with every swoosh of Sonagon’s wings, and fine icy clouds traced the tips of the dragon’s wings. The dragon’s world was a tapestry of shades of blue, with the rare speckles of orange or red where men or game were walking the land below.

Sonagon loved to fly – the dragon seemed incandescent with the joy of flight, inhuman emotions roiling at the edge of his mind. He felt the dragon’s joy, exhilaration, fury. Sonagon felt like an ocean in a storm, it was all Jon could do not to lose himself. The dragon felt like it was compensating for the weeks spent grounded, pushing its monumentally powerful body as hard as it would go and revelling in the feeling.

Sonagon somehow felt stronger than ever before, the connection was so strong now that if Jon hadn’t been so accustomed to the feel of the dragon’s mind, he didn’t know what might have happened.

As far east as the horizon went, Jon could see signs of yet more battles along the Wall, all illuminated by the morning sun. The castles-along-the-Wall were all blanketed white under drifts of snow, but smoking with remnant fires or strewn with corpses and wreckage. Woodwatch looked like it had half-collapsed, and Sable Hall had somehow ignited, with little left but cinders and a forlorn-looking field of tents outside the ruins.

At Jon’s urging, Sonagon flew over it all.

Sonagon had come to him with no saddle, so Jon could only fasten himself to the dragon’s horn and hold on for dear life. The wind swept around him, bitingly cold even through layers on layers of furs.

In the distance, the horizon curved around the Wall. Even through the dragon’s sight, he had to squint to see through the clouds, but he could make out the outline of the mountains of Skagos. He could smell the ocean, the salt wafting on the wind, along with the pang of something foul.

Eastwatch lay in the distance, and stink of death was thick in the air. The dragon was uneasy with the smell, and Jon urged Sonagon to fly high and safe through the cold clouds. Even if there were no heavy catapults atop the Wall, Jon took care to stay out of range.

Jon wasn’t quite sure what he was expecting – a horde of wights, perhaps, or perhaps a trap set by the Others. In his worst fears, he imagined seeing a second Breach through the Wall at Eastwatch. He could take no chances.

The scouts he had sent from Castle Black had not returned yet, but he could not wait for them. Jon had little idea what awaited them at Eastwatch, but he needed to find out. The dragon soared slow and steady, nostrils sniffing the howling wind for anything that seemed out of place.

Still, the Wall was standing strong. Jon could see the Wall’s edge as it broke into the water, and the castle of Eastwatch squatting unevenly on the cliff’s edge. As the dragon flew, the black water of the Bay of Seals came into sight, and upon its shores the sprawling landscape of the refugee camp by the Wall.

Sonagon descended, and suddenly Jon gasped as a familiar presence shot into focus.

Instantly, Jon felt paws rushing over snow, he felt thick white fur wrapped around him. His breath was hoarse against the cold, the world shaded in scents, smells and faded colours. He had eyes on the ground, staring up at the Wall. Jon breathed a sigh of relief, and he knew instantly that it was safe.

Sonagon roared, and flapped downwards to the shadow of the Wall. From the ground, he heard a howl echoing against the Wall.

There had been many battles here, Jon knew, but the fighting had ceased.

The last time Jon visited Eastwatch had been months ago – back when he had arrived along with the Manderly’s galleys, bringing hulls filled with supplies for the free folk. Then, Eastwatch had been an overcrowded camp flooding out from a fishing village, and the castle had seemed alive with excitement. A trail of refugees had been making their way south, and the future had seemed bright with promise. There had been a celebration then upon Jon’s return, but Jon had crept away from the festivities towards Val’s tent. They had made love that night, stealing kisses until morn hidden away from the world… He remembered her touch, her laugh, her breath…

The very memory caused him to tremble. That felt like a lifetime ago.

Now, Eastwatch looked dark and dreary under the shadow of the Wall. The first thing Jon saw was the sprawling settlement; the refugee camp at Eastwatch had tripled in size since the last he had visited. From high in the air it looked as large as any town, but as Sonagon descended it seemed more like a slum buried in the snow. Where once it had been only cloth and hide tents, now there were sheds and huts built onto the grounds outside the castle. Makeshifts docks had expanded out over the coast; the bay was filled with all sizes of rafts, barges and ships.

In the black ocean, icebergs floated in the straits of Skagos, while the coast was blanketed in frost and shadows. To the north, half the sea looked like it had been frozen solid, but the turbulent waves still crashed against the rocks of the Bay of Seals. Still, Sonagon could sense the stink of smoke and death lingering in the air.

The dragon circled the castle first, and then out beyond the Wall, and circled then over the bay towards the shadow of Skagos. He was cautious as he slowly descended. There was no signs of the Others, and yet there were no ships in the water. Every fishing vessel was docked, and the gates at Eastwatch were sealed, he noted. There was no movement in the north – the refugee trail from Hardhome to Eastwatch looked dead. The roadhouses and beacons leading towards Hardhome had been abandoned.

By the time Sonagon finally landed in the castle’s courtyard there was already a crowd of refugees waiting for him. The men and women were staring up at the sky and chanting in awe. Sonagon had to roar and swipe its tail to clear the yard of people.

As soon as Jon touched solid ground, he felt a bounding shape rushing towards him. Despite everything, a grin split his features – the first time he had smiled in over a week.

The white direwolf showed no hesitation in running towards the dragon. Ghost felt elated to see him again, the direwolf was panting and barking. Ghost rushed to Jon like a puppy, nuzzling his palm with his nose, while Jon’s hand brushed through the wolf’s mane. The wolf was so excited he nearly took Jon off his feet, and his coarse tongue lapped at Jon’s cheek. Jon could have gasped – being reunited with the direwolf again felt like finding a part of himself.

Ghost was larger than ever, as large as a pony. The white direwolf was whining in eagerness at seeing Jon again, almost like the puppy he had once been. I should not have sent Ghost away, he thought with a pang of regret. He should have kept his friend close.

All around him, the crowd gaped and murmured as Jon hugged his direwolf tightly.

But why is Ghost in Eastwatch? He had entrusted his direwolf to three of his Dragonguard, all of them coursed for Skagos. Through their connection, Jon could tell that no harm had come to his direwolf, but they hadn’t found Rickon and he knew little of the progress they made. Poor progress, obviously.

All around him, the yard was filling with even more people. Wide-eyed refugees kept creeping out of the castle, and their eyes were as much on him as they were on the dragon. Murmurs were rising in the air. Sonagon stirred, nostrils sniffing.

“Who is in command here?” Jon demanded to the crowd, still clutching Ghost’s fur. Nobody stepped forward.

“That would be me, I suppose,” a woman’s voice said eventually, moving out of the huddle. “Well met, King Snow. They call me Torvi Icetooth.”

The name was unfamiliar, but Jon had long since stopped being able to keep track of all the commanders in the coalition. Still, as soon as he looked towards her, he felt his skin crawl.
Sonagon recoiled suddenly, a dark growl emerging from its huge throat. She is a skinchanger, Jon knew. He could tell instinctively.
“And you are?”

“Torvi,” she drawled. She showed no fear at the dragon’s growl. “Daughter of Porunn, sister to Jawi, and priestess of the Circle.”

Torvi Icetooth was a short and pale-skinned woman. At first glance, she looked stout and heavy, but she was wearing several layers of furs. Her eyes were a hollow grey, and her lips were tight and thin. Jon couldn’t even tell her age; her features were timeless, she might have seen anywhere between thirty or fifty namedays.

“Indeed.” Jon glanced around, searching for a familiar face. He found none. “Where is Cotter Pyke, Halleck, Gurn, or the Admiral of Seals?”

“Dead, dead, dead and turned craven,” she replied simply. “That leaves me in command.”

There wasn’t even a hint of care. There was no warmth in her gaze, just an emptiness like that of a dead ocean. Her posture instinctively put Jon on edge.

Still, with a mental push, Jon held Sonagon back slightly, and walked towards the woman. All around, people were gaping at him. These people are scared. The stink of hunger and desperation filled the air.

“What happened here?” he demanded.

Torvi just shook her head fractionally, and motioned for him to follow. “The dead happened. You come too late, King Snow.”

After a pause, Jon followed. With a mental urging, Ghost walked loyally by Jon’s side. With one hand, Jon clutched a spear as a walking stick, and with the other hand he held onto the direwolf for support. The free folk shuffled around him hesitantly, and all heads bowed as he limped passed.

Jon still saw a weirwood carving of a white dragon, sitting in a shrine at the edge of Eastwatch’s walls. Everything else in the castle was falling into disrepair, but the shrine had been kept immaculate.

From the ground, Jon suddenly noticed the shapes in the water. Misshapen lumps of wood were bumping off the docks and the frozen coast. The flotsam of a hundred shipwrecks was still bobbing between the crests of the waves.

There was a fine layer of ice creeping over the water, crackling against the waves.

The attack came from the sea, Torvi told him as they walked towards the castle’s harbour. The white walkers apparently never even tried to attack the Wall itself, but instead had targeted the refugee ships and the fishing vessels across the northern waters nigh-simultaneously. The attack stretched from Eastwatch to the shores off the isle of Skane to the northern coasts of Skagos, all the way to Hardhome. The Admiral of Seals lost many ships north of the Wall, their remaining forces had scattered to the four winds, and the dead were uncountable. They were targeting the refugees, Jon thought grimly.

“Attacked?” Jon asked. “Attacked how?”

“Dead things in the water,” Torvi replied, without any hint of emotion. The woman’s eyes were empty.

She took him towards the docks, and he saw what was left of the Eastwatch fleet. Even the surviving ships looked torn half-apart. Torn apart from below, he noticed. Their hulls had been ripped open, leaving most of the ships as scrap.

“They came from the depths and gave no warning,” she explained. “Our ships were sailing from Eastwatch to Skane, and then we were ambushed by stoneborn longships on the water. There was a battle between men off the coast, the Admiral of Seals mustered the fleet to defend. And then the dead ambushed both us and stoneborn together from below. Not even one in ten survived.”

She kept her voice low, but the way she described it… “You were there?” Jon asked.

“Through my partner.” Torvi Icetooth nodded. “My sister swam through the battle, while I raised the signal to pull back.”

Jon was about to ask what she meant, when suddenly he saw movement in the waters off the harbour. A white fin emerged from the water, and the crest of a huge white creature cutting the waves. Jon’s eyes widened, but the woman just nodded faintly. “My sister,” she explained.

She is a skinchanger, he thought, and her second skin is a shark. The huge ice shark was circling through the shallows of the castle, at least fifteen feet long from nose to tail.

“And Hardhome?” Jon asked.

“Hardhome is lost, Snow.” For all the passion in her voice, she could have been talking about the weather. “They completely destroyed our defences. Anybody who remained there has been slaughtered.”

Jon stared out over the waves, at shadow of Skagos on the horizon. The Bay of Seals had never seemed so cold. “How many?”

“We evacuated most. But not all.”

We always knew that Hardhome would be the first to fall, Jon thought. The garrison on the peninsula had been too isolated, too far from the Wall to be defended. Still, its loss left a bitter taste in his mouth.

There were more answers he needed, but then suddenly he heard footsteps crunching over the frost and pushing through the following of refugees. Ghost reacted first; the wolf’s ears twitched at the movement.

“Snow!” a voice cried suddenly, and there were men running towards him. “Snow! Thank the gods you’re finally here.”

There were three figures, and two of them bore a pattern of white stones on their surcoats shaped into a dragon. Jon blinked as he recognised the two – they were from his Dragonguard; Eryn Whaletooth and Dark Gerrick. Jon’s eyes widened slightly in surprise, but perhaps he shouldn’t have been. So this is how Ghost came to Eastwatch.

It felt like a lifetime ago that he had sent Eryn, Gerrick and Bullden Horn north to search out Rickon.

The two men were tall and weary figures, and they walked with a dark-haired boy Jon didn’t recognise. Their chainmail clanked with every step. Besides Grenn, these are the last remaining members of my Dragonguard, Jon realised. Everybody else in his newfound order had perished at the Battle of the Snows or at Castle Black. Toregg had been killed by the shadow at Winterfell, and Ser Alek had resigned and returned to White Harbour not long after the confrontation with the
He inspected them; both young and lean men, but their eyes were shadowed and they looked weary. Eryn was panting for breath after running so fast to meet him. Jon extended a gloved hand.

“Eryn,” Jon greeted. “Gerrick.”

Suddenly, Ghost bounded up from Jon’s side, rushing to meet the dark-haired youth next to the men. The boy grinned brightly, eagerly rubbing Ghost’s neck like an old friend. For a moment, Jon looked shocked; he had never known Ghost to be so friendly with anyone but him.

Eryn noticed Jon’s expression. “Aye, we’ve been looking after your dog for you.”

“Who are you?” Jon demanded of the youth, but the boy gave no reply. Jon frowned, but the boy kept on playing with the wolf, fearlessly teasing Ghost with a chunk of dried meat. The direwolf snapped it straight out of his fingers.

“That’s Wex. The boy ain’t a talker, yet the wolf seems to like him,” Gerrick grunted. Dark Gerrick bore a deep, fresh scar on his cheek that Jon couldn’t remember. It looked like both men had seen battles. “Run along now, lad, we need to talk to Snow.”

Jon limped forward. Eryn shook his hand tightly, but Gerrick didn’t. “My brother?” Jon demanded, lowering his voice somewhat. “Did you find him?”

“No.” Eryn shook his head. “But we do know where he is.”

Jon looked between them, measuring their gazes. Neither man seemed successful in their task, that was true. Jon paused, eyes searching for the third man. “Where is Bullden Horn?”

“Dead,” Gerrick scoffed. “He died months ago. Damn stupid death too; we passed through a village filled with hicks that chose to object to the white dragon we wore. We fought them off, aye, but then some farmer’s boy slit Bullden’s throat and stole his horn. Bastard bled out before we could do a damn thing.

“I see.” Jon looked between them, then noted the quiet boy that had walked with them. Eryn averted his eyes uncomfortably, but Gerrick met his gaze. “It’s been months,” Jon said lowly. “I expected you to make better progress.”

“Yes, well, we lost the one guy who actually knew the lay of land on Skagos,” he said fouly. “After that, me and Eryn had to stumble around ourselves, with no idea what we were getting ourselves into.” He shook his head. “And this place is a fucking warzone – you have any idea how hard it is to find a single child in the middle of it?” Behind him, Ghost yelped as he played with the mute boy. “While caring for a wolf?”

His eyes narrowed. If I hadn’t sent you away, he considered, you’d have likely died on that lake. “Come with us, King,” Eryn offered. “We have much to show you.”

Jon followed, though his gaze flickered back to Gerrick. His steps were uneven lurches, but his hands stayed close to Dark Sister. Ghost seemed easy among the men, though, and Jon trusted the direwolf’s instincts.

Behind him, Torvi Icetooth hovered silently and followed.

“The Skagosi?” Jon asked, looking around the castle.
“Aye. They’ve been tormenting us for months.” Gerrick grunted. “The damn Skaggs have sent constant raids against Eastwatch, they turned this strait into a bloodbath.”

Yes, the Skagossons had refused to even consider the northern coalition, and their people held an ancestral grudge against wildlings. Throughout the civil war Skagos had remained neutral, but with a bias against wildlings. The stoneborn had long separated themselves from the mainland.

Lord Manderly had believed them to be irrelevant – Skagos had only hundreds of men to field, and brought far more trouble than they were worth – but the stoneborn tribes were tough, hardy, and fiercely independent. Skagos was nearly a nation unto itself. Any attempt from Eastwatch to negotiate with the stonelords had ended with decapitated heads on pikes being sent back with the next tide.

_I could have forced the stoneborn using Sonagon_, Jon thought, _but I didn’t want to distract the dragon with such a petty conflict_. Sonagon could only be in one place at a time, and they had needed the dragon against the threat of the Boltons and the south. Added on to that, Jon also never wanted to risk Rickon’s life by flying Sonagon into Skagos.

Instead, it had been the Lord of Bones who had volunteered to lead the efforts in bringing Skagos to heel, while their search parties discreetly tried to track down Rickon Stark. Under Rattleshirt, the fleets of Eastwatch had easily overpowered the Skagosi ships – there had seemed little reason for Jon to get involved until after they secured Rickon.

All around him, a procession was forming as Jon limped through the castle. Everything was grey, and Jon could feel the hunger and desperation in the air. _Too many mouths, too little food._

“The war against Skagos had been going well under Rattleshirt,” Eryn explained as they walked. “It was barely even a war, really. Our warbands set up camp on Skane and then we captured Driftwood Hall. We were set to bring the Skagosi to heel, just like you commanded.”

Jon did not reply, but his gaze flickered. “But then Rattleshirt left for Winterfell and the battle on Skagos really went to hell,” Eryn continued. “The ‘Admiral of Seals’ took command and _he_ bloody botched the invasion. The Admiral was too scared to risk any of his bloody ships, and our warbands got hit hard. We lost our camp on Skane, and they threw us off their isle.”

“We’ve been fighting against the stoneborn every other day for months,” Gerrick added. “They rallied against Eastwatch in strength when your dragon wasn’t around.”

_Perhaps that was Sonagon’s greatest weakness_, Jon considered. _The dragon couldn’t be everywhere._

“And then the Others came,” Jon noted.

“Aye. And then the Others came.” Gerrick’s voice was grim. “Both us and the Skaggs lost our entire fleets in an hour that night. We lost Hardhome in two.”

From the sound of what he was being told, the battle had been utter pandemonium. A slaughter. The type of battle that still haunted the air, Jon could feel the tension around him. They told him that Cotter Pyke had tried to hold the line and rally the fleet, but the ships of the Night’s Watch had been the very first to fall.

As their ships scattered, the Admiral of Seals had abandoned Eastwatch altogether. The admiral had taken the very last seaworthy ships and fled south, leaving the rest of the refugees to fend for themselves. Dark Gerrick spat at his name.
Hardhome hadn’t stood a chance, but Eastwatch never even came under direct attack. The very worst of the battle had been fought at sea and on the coasts of Skagos.

The Night of the Dead, they named it.

As the battle broke, the two Dragonguard had taken Ghost and fled from Skagos that night, stealing a ship and seeking shelter behind the Wall at Eastwatch. Gerrick had taken his scar fighting through four crazed stoneborn, all the while wights crawled out from the sea.

We nearly lost the Wall here, Jon thought with a curse, adding it all up. That the Others had pulled back from a victorious battlefield alarmed Jon nearly as much as the sight of a second Breach would have. Do the Others truly care that little about winning?

No, he realised, the Others pulled back because they had already achieved their goals.

Jon could feel the weight of the droves of hungry eyes staring right at him. They all wore white stones, every single one. They prayed for salvation, Jon thought. These people have seen too much of war.

Finally, Jon had to ask, “What of Rickon? I sent you north to find Rickon.”

“Oh, we found your brother,” Gerrick scoffed. “He’s safe, but we couldn’t even get close to him.”

With a bark of orders, Gerrick shouted something at a man inside the castle. Jon still could not understand the Old Tongue, but moments later he saw a naked body being dragged out over the stones. A prisoner, being dragged by two hefty wildlings.

The man wasn’t chained, but he was beaten and bloody as he was dragged from both arms. He was a hairy figure with a beard down his neck and chest hair so thick that it could have been fur. The man was short-legged and barrel-chested, but extremely broad and well-built.

Jon recognised the thick brow and craggy build instantly; the prisoner was stoneborn. Those of Skagosi blood were not built like other men – some claimed that they were from Ibbenese lineage, others argued that they descended from giants. They were shorter and broader than any normal man, with thicker brows and wider jaws. A queer folk of cannibals and raiders.

Even despite his bloody state, he was still trying to fight. The captive Skagosson was thrashing against the men who held him, snarling guttural, hoarse curses that Jon could not make out.

Jon’s eyes narrowed at the sight. The stoneborn was wrestling right up until Dark Gerrick kicked him in the chest.

“This is Arago Stane, the heir to Driftwood,” Gerrick introduced to Jon, as the man sputtered blood. “We captured him on Skane.”

“Captured him?” Arago Stane bore wounds over his shaggy body; some of them scarred over, others fresh.

“We took Driftwood Hall from them, along with this one. A few moons later his father took it back from us, but we still kept this Skagg.” Gerrick turned to the prisoner, looming over him. “You want to tell the king what you told us?”

It didn’t seem like Arago heard, but then the stoneborn spat a bloody gloop at Gerrick’s feet. The man muttered some curse word in the Old Tongue, and Gerrick kicked him again. “Bloody Skagg,” Gerrick cursed.
“Arago told us of a boy,” Eryn explained, looking at Jon. “A boy – two years back now. They found him wandering the stonelands, and he had a wolf with him. A large wolf too, and they say it was as feral as the boy.”

“Rickon,” Jon breathed. Lord Manderly had been right – Rickon truly had fled to Skagos. “Who found him?”

“Lord Magnar’s men. The wolf preyed on their peasant’s herds, the shepherds warned their Lord Magnar, and his men went tracking it. And then they discovered that the wolf had killed a unicorn too.”

From the floor, Arago Stane was glaring up at Jon viciously. There was raw hate in the stoneborn’s eyes, but Jon’s gaze was ice. “Not many unicorns left on Skagos,” Gerrick added. “But they’re damn tough creatures, bred for war. They don’t go down easy.”

“Aye. The unicorns are sacred to the stoneborn,” Eryn continued. “The Skagossions are vowed to protect them, their tribes shelter the last of the unicorn herds. For the crime of killing a unicorn, it should have been certain death for the boy and the wolf.” Jon raised his eyebrows in alarm. “But in this case Lord Bjarg Magnar chose mercy instead.”

“Why?” Jon kept his voice low.

All eyes turned towards Arago Stane. The stoneborn was on the ground, but listening intently.

Dark Gerrick drew a knife, and held it to the man’s throat. “Answer the question or I cut off your hand,” he warned.

There was a long pause. Arago glared hatefully. “The boy had potential.” The man’s voice was throaty and gruff with accent, his Common barely decipherable. “Had the Gift. Lord Magnar. Believed Gift more valuable than unicorn.”

The Gift, Jon wondered. Skinchanging?

“Aye.” Eryn nodded. “The rest say the same. Apparently Lord Magnar chose to adopt the boy as his own. The lord married his mother and took the child onto his own house.”

Jon blinked in shock. He looked down towards Arago, and the prisoner just nodded sourly.

“Married his mother?” Jon muttered with a frown. Rickon’s mother is dead, he almost said.

For half a moment, he wondered if maybe it was a different child. But then he remembered that spearwife Bran had told him of. The captured wildling from Winterfell’s kitchens who had smuggled Rickon away – Osha. She must be pretending to be Rickon’s mother.

Eyes were looking at him. Jon hesitated. “And Rickon is alive?”

“Alive and well,” Eryn replied. “He’s in Kingshouse, under the care of Lord Magnar. Mayhaps there’s no safer place on Skagos.”

“And we can’t reach him,” Gerrick added.

Jon knew of House Magnar. Theirs was the most prominent house on the isle, descended from the ancient Stone Kings. They were the de facto rulers of Skagos. A house of cannibals and ill rumours, he added quietly.
Kingshouse was the seat of House Magnar. That was both good and bad news. It was good because Rickon was presumably safe and defended, but bad because House Magnar was a sworn enemy. The stoneborn forgot nothing and did not bend from their ways. The Skagossons held grudges like none other; they despised wildlings, mainlanders, and Starks. Jon didn’t imagine that they’d be too fond of dragons, either.

But Rickon is alive, Jon thought. I promised Bran that I would protect my family.

All eyes were on him, but Jon needed to stop and think.

“How many other Skagosi prisoners do we have?” Jon asked finally.

“A few,” Gerrick replied. “Arago here is the most important, but we got about two dozen others in the cells. We also got Lord Crowl’s daughter, and two of Lord Stane’s wives.”

None of them in good condition, Jon expected. His eyes narrowed. “In what health?”

“Hell of a lot better than any of us would be on Skagos,” Gerrick retorted. “The stoneborn haven’t been half as kind to the ones that they’ve captured.”

He didn’t dispute the point, but Jon shifted slightly. “But have the Others attacked Skagos?”

It was Torvi that replied. “They have.”

“Then we must convince the Skagossons that they have greater threats than us.” He turned back to Arago Stane. “Get him up,” Jon ordered. “Wash his wounds, feed and clothe him.”

The men pulled Arago to his feet. The Skagosson was short – half a foot smaller than Jon, but he was wider and just as heavy. Jon stepped closer to inspect him. Arago’s jaw tensed, his gaze flickered, he looked up at Jon… and then violently lunged, jaws opened wide to tear out Jon’s throat.

Jon was ready for it. In a smooth motion, his fist collided with Arago’s throat. The stoneborn dropped and gagged.

“I’m trying to release you, ser,” Jon warned. “Do not be so fool to convince me otherwise.”

The guards looked shocked. “Release him?” a free folk gasped.

“Aye. He is to bring my message to Kingshouse, I will meet with this Lord Magnar,” Jon commanded.

The Skagosson was choking in pain, but still sputtering out curse words. Jon bent down slowly, and gripped the man’s neck. “It seems that Lord Magnar and I now share common interests,” Jon said lowly in the man’s ear. The soon to be freed prisoner stank of sweat and fish. “We both want to stop the Others, and we both want no harm to come to that boy. You will relay that message.”

“Snow, he’s killed four men trying to escape,” Gerrick warned, glaring at Arago. “I would not trust this one.”

I am not trusting anybody. “Lord Magnar will meet with me, else he will meet with Sonagon.”

Arago panted deep, hoarse breaths. Jon didn’t slacken his grip. Jon paused, curious to see if the stoneborn would try to attack him again. Arago chose not to.

“For every day that Lord Magnar refuses to treat with me,” Jon promised, “I will execute a hostage.
After I run out of hostages, my dragon will start destroying his settlements one by one. He will meet me alone and in a place of my choosing, or Skagos will suffer for it.”

The man’s eyes were black, and full of hate. Jon dropped him to the stones and limped away.

The crowd parted around him as he stepped back towards the keep. Ghost bounded towards Jon’s side, and the wolf bared its teeth fractionally at any who stepped too close. Fearlessly, Torvi Icetooth stepped next to Jon, easily keeping pace.

The woman was staring straight at him. “The Skaggs are not our problem, Snow,” she said in a low voice.

“I’m aware.”

“No, you’re not.” The skinchanger shook her head, and motioned towards the docks. “The problem is what our nets caught this morn, Snow.”

Jon frowned. “Bali, Tor,” she ordered. “Show him.”

Torvi motioned into the crowd, and moments later he saw two men carrying a hefty barrel over the stones. The figures were both broad, bearded and grim, and clad in sealskin and walrus hide. The air stank of salt and rot.

With a nod from Tovi, the two men dropped the barrel, spilling its slimy content out over the cobblestones. At first, the only thing Jon sensed was the noxious stink of decay. Water flushed from the barrel, along with dozens of squirming, slithery shapes.

They were all grey. The barrel was full of dead, rotten fish soaking in saltwater. Jon saw exposed fish skulls and rib cages, like the flesh had been scraped off. Salmon, tuna, anchovies, even a small shark. There were hundreds of them, all flapping and wriggling before him.

Round, blue fishbowl eyes stared blankly before him.

Jon didn’t blink. He only stared back.

Fish. Undead fish.

Around him, Ghost yelped and jumped backwards. Jon nearly recoiled as a mutilated salmon flapped towards him, biting at the sole of his boot. They were writhing like they were suffocating, flapping over the stones.

Jon blinked, and then looked at Torvi. She nodded.

“This is the reason why so many around here are going hungry, Snow,” she said simply. “We’ve still got a few boats trawling in these waters, but this is the only thing that they’re picking up. We’ve had net after net of this.”

He didn’t reply. Slowly, he lifted his walking stick upwards and swatted one of the creatures. It splattered in squishy gore, but the flesh was still wriggling under the spear.

“Aye. My sister is in the water, and there are more dead things like this.” For the first time, Torvi’s voice carried emotion and it was grim. “Not even my sister dares to venture deeper out to sea anymore. They’re everywhere, Your Grace.”

Fish. The Others were resurrecting fish now?
His hairs were standing on end. No, Jon thought slowly. The Others were looking for more ways to expand.

They mean to kill the entire ocean.

“Fish,” he repeated. “You mean fish south of the Wall?”

She nodded. The barrier, Jon almost protested. Even over the ocean, surely the barrier should have stopped them from crossing?

Then, he felt a tingling down his spine and a sinking in his gut. But the barrier is already breached. They broke the barrier at Castle Black, so now it’s broken here too?

He did not like this, and his thoughts were starting to twist in circles. One thought in particular was gnawing at the back of his mind. Are the Others starting to look beyond Westeros?

The more he considered it, the more it alarmed him.

Finally, Jon pulled his gaze away from the pile of rotten fish. “They’re only fish,” Jon said after a pause. “They cannot hurt us.”

He knew it was a lie as soon as he said it. Torvi just stared at him. She didn’t say anything, but he felt her gaze on his neck.

Jon limped up the stairs into the keep, where they could talk privately. Too many eyes were on him. “Where are the Others now?” he demanded. “Where did they retreat to?”

“To Hardhome,” she replied simply.

His frown only deepened.

Jon stayed the night at the keep at Eastwatch, although Ghost never left his side. Sonagon roosted uneasily in the yards outside, while a flock of believers surrounded the castle. Jon questioned Torvi on absolutely everything her sister had seen in the water, and the answers she gave only made him more and more uneasy.

“How many ships do you still have?” he demanded eventually, during the dead of night. The cold air outside was still but the flames were whispering around him. Jon had taken off his furs, but he kept Dark Sister close to hand.

“Very few. Only the ones that we managed to repair.”

“Prepare the largest ship we have,” Jon ordered. “We set sail at first light, Sonagon will escort.”

He slept for maybe an hour at most. The rest of the night was spent making preparations, counting heads and discussing options.

By the first shimmer of morn, Jon was already forcing his sore and battered body into motion. He was climbing onto his dragon again before the sun had even properly risen. Sonagon growled with agitation; the dragon was hungry too, but there was nothing for it to eat, not even corpses.

With a single beat of powerful wings, the air whooshed as the dragon took flight. As the sun rose over the east, the mountains of Skagos loomed on the horizon’s edge. Ghost howled as Jon flew away yet again, but Sonagon circled low around the Wall.

He would see Ghost again soon, he knew. The direwolf would come by sea, along with all the best of the fighting men.

Down below, Jon heard the commotion as the warband gathered on the castle’s pier. About five dozen fighting men, all of them armed to the teeth with axes and spears. Torvi Icetooth captained the very last seaworthy vessel as it took to the water. It was a striped galley with its figurehead crudely recarved into jagged demon teeth. Once, the ship might have been painted yellow and purple, but now the paint was flecking off and the hull creaked like something from a ship’s graveyard.

Still, it was seaworthy, and the free folk had captained worse. He could see Torvi’s band stocking up the galley’s deck with arrows and harpoons, and every man on the ship was tense with fear.

From the sky, Jon watched his two Dragonguard bring Ghost with them on the ship. The direwolf had grown surprisingly comfortable among the men, and the black-haired mute helped urge the wolf on to the deck.

There was a good south-westerly wind blowing over the bay as they set forth, and the galley chopped through the waters. Jon led the way atop Sonagon, occasionally circling round to watch the black waters. As the ship broke through the swell of the waves, Jon saw a white fin circling the vessel.

The icebergs were thick in the water, and occasionally Jon heard crackling as the ship had to force its way through the ice.

The great expanse of the north stretched outwards before him. The coasts and the shallows were smothered white, but the waters of the Shivering Sea had never seemed so black. The ice was creeping outwards, Jon realised. In some places he saw ice stretching as far as a mile offshore, further north along the coast.

Even the northern ocean was starting to freeze, he realised, as Sonagon soared over the Wall with long, powerful flaps.

_Slowly now,_ Jon urged to the dragon. They had to be careful not to go too far ahead. _We must search, search for the dead._

The white walkers were out there somewhere, and they needed to find out where and how many.

Sonagon flew a long and slow arc over the Bay of Seals, and eventually the mainland was reduced to a sliver on the western horizon. He saw the mountains of Skagos come into focus, and then the jagged coasts. The rocks jutting upwards from the waters looked like stone teeth.

The wind hissed around him as the dragon flew over the coasts of Skagos and then northwards towards the isle of Skane. An icy sea mist was blowing over the island, so thick that Jon couldn’t see, but the dragon’s eyes had no issue in making out of the land below.

Jon closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and melded himself deeper into the warg-sense. He couldn’t see anything of the Others, but the dead were just as cold as the black waters and black beaches of Skagos, and Sonagon’s sight was poor at picking them out, no better than a hawk’s. _Lower,_ he urged the dragon.

Behind them, the galley crept through the waves in sluggish motion. The dragon flew so much faster than the ship, but Jon took care to circle around often. Jon could feel the progress of the vessel through Ghost. If the ship came under attack, Sonagon would be the only chance the men had.
The dragon flew as low as Jon dared, searching the battlefields. He didn’t see any wights, but there were signs of battle everywhere. There were broken ships washing up against the rocks, and flotsam sweeping over the desolate beaches. There was wreckage bobbing along with the ice in the ocean. As he flew inland, he saw abandoned settlements on the isle without any trace of life. There were small fishing huts of thatch and packed earth scattered across the coast, each one as still as the grave.

Across one beach, he even saw tracks through the sand and rocks leading up the cliffs. A trail of long, dragged footsteps coming out of the cold ocean.

Dead things in the water, Jon thought darkly.

Sonagon flew outwards, searching for life. The smell of old ash and smoke reached him, and the dragon followed. Jon saw an old earth and timber keep that must have been Driftwood Hall, but it had been burnt down. The fort was blackened in the spots not already smothered by white snow, it stunk of ash and charred wood. The surrounding villages on Skagos were all dead. Sonagon could see only shades of blue; all the heat of life had been snuffed out from the coasts.

Jon could only stare at the devastation. The Others are expanding. Their campaign is only growing.

The only signs of life were further inland, towards the mountains of Skagos. He saw a hustle of bodies over an old earthen fort, a slum of men and women taking shelter around the keep. The fort of Deep Down, Jon guessed, as Sonagon flapped closer. Upon sighting the dragon, Jon heard horns blowing from the keep and men panicking. Sonagon circled, and the stoneborn below scattered and screamed. A few of them fired arrows, but the shafts never even came close. Sonagon was hungry enough to want to engage, but Jon managed to pull the dragon back.

On the water, the galley from Eastwatch was halfway across the strait. Jon circled back, just to search the area for threats.

Then, Sonagon flew north towards the peninsula, towards Hardhome.

He knew this coast; he and Sonagon had flown over it many times before. And yet now the landscape looked so different caught in the throes of winter.

The first things Jon saw were the towers and defences he had spent so long maintaining. The stakewall around the settlement was still intact, and there were still rough wooden watchtowers pointing out from the cliffs. Sonagon sensed movement from the harbour, and for half a moment Jon thought that maybe they had been wrong – that maybe Hardhome had resisted after all.

But then Sonagon flew closer, and all the dragon smelled was death.

In the waters below, there was movement. In the shallows, there were black shapes lurking under the waves. Jon thought they might have been sardines or salmon, but the way they moved… he had never seen fish swimming in formation before.

Shoals of unnatural fish were swimming around the cape.

The Others were gathering their wights at Hardhome. They were raising as many dead as possible, on land and in the sea.

Jon didn’t dare attack – it was too dangerous to test the Other’s forces alone – but he circled in the sky and approached with caution. The dragon crept closer and closer, until finally he saw black shapes like insects scattering over the snow and cliffs.
There were thousands, hundreds of thousands.

The settlement at Hardhome – the wooden huts, the caves, the makeshift docks and the crude fortifications, the Others had stolen it all for themselves.

There was movement towards the coast. Why were they moving? The dead didn’t move without purpose. Were they building something? There were no vessels on the ocean that Jon could see.

And then Sonagon flapped over the cliffs and came into view from the cape. Even despite the wind, Jon heard a desperate scream break through the whooshing air.

The sound caused a shiver down his spine. The dead didn’t scream.

The dragon saw flecks of heat by the tunnels, grouped by the cliffside. Warm bodies surrounded by nothing but cold.

At first, he thought they might be survivors. They were screaming at the sight of the dragon. He saw them trying to run, but cold figures instantly pounced on them.

Jon’s hands clenched. Sonagon felt his rage and growled too. Slaves. The Others had taken slaves, Jon realised. There were living slaves in cages by the crags, guarded by dead men. The Others had taken captives and forced them into the howling caves of Hardhome.

At the sight of the dragon, the slaves were screaming and falling to their knees. Begging for him to save them.

All around them, the cape was filled with more dead bodies than Jon could count. It was difficult to even sense them; most stood still, more were buried by snow, and the dead blurred into the surroundings through Sonagon’s eyes. An entire line of corpses stood as sentinels upon the cliffs. It was only when they moved that he could make them out.

Sonagon flapped further inland, crossing over the cape. Suddenly there was movement everywhere below him. Beneath him, Hardhome was stirring like a hornet’s nest with the dragon’s approach. The stench was overpowering.

How many? Jon wondered. A few hundred slaves, and a few hundred thousand of the dead? It was hard to tell how many more living people could be in the winding cliffs. Caves that the free folk had carved as shelter were now being used as cages.

I can’t save them, Jon knew. It would be foolish to even try – even the dragon would be at risk attacking the Others where they were most fortified.

But what are the Others doing with slaves? Why do they even need living men?

The Others had taken Hardhome as their own camp. Mustering their forces, raising them and arming them. They needed living men to do what their wights could not; somebody needed to craft weapons and arrows for the dead, and the wights just didn’t have the skill for that type of work.

They are preparing for invasion.

Beneath him, the army of the dead stretched across the snow and rocks.

Then, Jon saw black shapes in the shallow harbour at Hardhome, looming under the water. At first, he thought that they were rocks.
Then, a rock moved. It shuddered, and rose towards the surface, breaking through the waves and crested the surface. All the dragon sensed was the rank stench of rot and salt, but Jon saw swollen raw flesh and protruding bone.

There were more of them. Jon saw dozens, perhaps even hundreds, of black shadows in the water.

Beneath him, the Others were already reacting to his approach. Sonagon stayed high in the sky, but down below the dead were taking formation. Jon’s gaze was drawn to the black shapes in the ocean, each one causing a tremendous swell as it rose.

The smallest seemed about thirty feet from head to tail, and the largest was four times that size.

At first, Jon thought of the wyrms, but these were different shapes. The wyrms had been elongated and serpentine, while these creatures were thick and stout.

He saw a finned tail rise from the waves, before it descended again. The shapes were moving out to sea.

Sonagon was about to follow when a rustling sounded below him, a wispy line of smoke breaking into the pallid sky. Rotting wings were hissing towards the dragon.

Jon could have cursed. Undead birds. Everything from swallows to eagles to owls. They probably couldn’t hurt the dragon, but there were lots of them, and they could most certainly hurt him.

Now was not the time to fight, he decided. He had come here to scout, not to attack. The Others were entrenched and Sonagon was at a disadvantage. Jon had wanted to know what the white walkers were doing at Hardhome, and now he had.

Jon took a deep breath, and willed Sonagon to turn around.

Still, a swarm of birds came too close, and the dragon scorched their little bodies with a sharp breath of icefire. A rain of tattered corpses fell from the sky.

The rest of the wispy cloud of birds followed them over the cliffs, but they didn’t chase the dragon out to sea.

Flying out over the water, Jon could still sense those black shapes moving under the waves. Occasionally one of them would crest, and he saw a crown of jagged bones and discoloured flesh. Sonagon wanted to fight, to kill, but Jon veered the dragon away.

They are ships, he thought breathlessly, but they were like no ships he had ever seen before. They had been stationed at Hardhome like a fleet at port, but then they fled to open before the dragon. They were bone ships without sails or oars.

The dragon flew straight to the north-western coast of Skagos, where he saw the galley dock onto the stony beach. He felt Ghost on the ground, pacing frantically. Jon was gasping for breath, both from the cold and the sight of Hardhome. The memory of all those cold shadows…

Sonagon landed on the hard, black beach with an immense crunch of rocks, just as the wildlings were dropping off Arago Stane. They gave the stoneborn a pig’s bladder of supplies and told him to run for Kingshouse. The Skagosi gave one final hateful glare, before running off at spearpoint.

Jon’s gaze was dark as he clambered down Sonagon’s neck. His legs were so weary and cramped from riding the dragon so long that he botched dismounting and toppled backwards straight onto his behind on the beach.
Two men rushed to help him, but Jon brushed them away with a grimace. He grunted as he pulled himself up, but his gaze was focused on Torvi Icetooth. “Did you see those things?” he demanded.

She nodded. “My sister did.”

He looked out to sea. He couldn’t see them now, but he knew they were there. Numerous black shapes, hidden under the water.

With a brief roar, Sonagon flapped into the sky without him. The dragon began prowling over the waves and growling, occasionally spitting bursts of icefire. But it was useless – the ships of bone and flesh had already disappeared from view.

Jon felt the sinking feeling in his gut, he knew it as soon as he asked…

“What are they?”

“They’re ships,” she replied. “But once they were whales.”

Whales. That was how the Others were killing fish. They had expanded into the ocean – they were raising fish by the bucket load. First, they kill one fish, they raise it and release it – then that fish kills another and drags its body back to Hardhome. All of those bodies in the water, creating more and more corpses and expanding ever outwards like a plague…

The largest were the skeletal bodies of whales, hunted down and hollowed out. Mutilated creatures with their skin and organs removed, large enough to carry more of the Other’s soldiers. That was what they were doing at Hardhome.

The Others didn’t care for wood or metal. There were only two resources that the white walkers used to construct anything; death and ice.

The Others were building their navy out of corpses. A fleet of bone ships.

Next to him, Dark Gerrick glanced between Jon and Torvi, trying to measure their expressions. Ghost was growling as he sniffed the ocean. The silence stretched outwards.

“What the fuck does that mean?” the man demanded.

Jon’s jaw clenched, but he didn’t reply straight away. Through his dragon sense, he saw them again. He saw the swells in the water, he saw them creeping under the black water.

Sonagon breathed downwards over the ocean in a shower of ice, but the creatures were already escaping down into the depths. The dragon might have dived down after them, but Jon warned the dragon not to swim in these waters.

The white walkers were already preparing for their next assault.

“It means that the next invasion will come from the sea.”

The White Wolf

Paws loped over barren rocks, as the direwolf bounded through the frosted crags.

It was a vicious landscape, bare and brown, devoid of greenery. The layers of the land were slanted and haphazard, creased and folded, like the earth itself had been tilted on the wrong side. It felt like the ground had been cleaved apart, then crudely forced together. Spiny knives of rock ran over the hills, and cliffs as sharp as swords protruded from the mountains.

It was a land of ice and rock, illuminated by a bulbous half-moon lingering over the jagged snow-coated hills.

Red eyes gleamed through the darkness, nostrils sniffing this unfamiliar place. The wolf took a deep breath of fresh, wild air drifting off from the sea. It was a harsh, unfamiliar land – only black mosses and thorny weeds grew underfoot between the pebbles and snow. The trees were stunted and wind-battered things, barely bigger than saplings, scattered sparsely across the land. Only the gnarliest and most weathered soldier pines and black spruces managed to take root between the earthen crevices.

The stench of dead things wafted everywhere.

In the distance, he heard men moving, shouting. There was a frenzy by the coastline, the sound of hacking and chopping. Dead creatures coated in seaweed with barnacles sticking to their skin, staggering up the cliffs. They were foul things, each one putrid with rot and salt as they crawled out from the waves. The very smell caused the wolf’s haunches to tense, white hair standing on end.

Across the frozen water, there was a flash of bright light under the half-moon, and of immense white wings flapping.

The wolf’s bonded brother was in the sky, he knew. His brother was flying on the monster, soaring over the coastline and spitting ice down at the beaches.

The battle was all along the isle’s coasts, and slowly oozing inwards. The wolf saw a group of men and women, encamped on a hilltop ringed by spears and torches, while all the dead things staggered upwards from the black beach. The cold, moving corpses were dripping wet and swollen with seawater, so deformed they barely looked like men.

The wolf wanted nothing to do with such a fight. It avoided the dead things wherever possible. The direwolf was large and fierce enough to tear down one or two of the creatures, but against a horde?
Tooth and claws were poor weapons against the dead. This was a battle for men with axes and torches, or for dragons with wings and icy breath.

Instead, the white wolf roamed outwards, scouting over the rocks. The wolf paced near the rocks of the beach, and then he heard the many pattering of legs through the shallows. Sloshing sea ice crackled and broke, and dead shapes emerged from the black water.

In the poor light, at first they looked like rocks. Moving rocks. They were scuttling upwards from the sea.

The wolf sat on his haunches atop the hill, staring at the scene under the moonlight. The largest of them were as big as boulders, the smallest were the size of pebbles. Their pocked shells were coated in seaweed and barnacles, and they stank of salty rot. Their joints crackled stiffly with every jagged movement.

As they scuttled, the wolf saw a multitude of pale blue eyes, and clicking claws.

The wolf stared downwards at the shoal of monstrous crabs scuttling from the waves. The direwolf watched for only an instant, before turning and sprinting away as fast as it could.
Somewhere behind him, he sensed the dragon swooping low, scorching the entire beach into blazing white ice. The crabs made a bone-clenching shriek as they died.

Run, Ghost, his bonded brother willed. Get away from the coast, just avoid them.

The wolf was already fleeing, loping over the dunes and running inland. He could feel his brother’s anxiety, the unease that lingered through the night. The dead things had followed them – his brother’s pack had landed on the isle as darkness fell, and the dead had come not long after. The direwolf kept on running until it was a safe distance from the ocean, but the smell still lingered everywhere.

The stink of the dead was nearly overpowering, but then keen nostrils picked up a different scent hovering on the cold wind. The smell of something else fleeing the dead.

Another hunter, it knew. It could tell instinctively by the subtle scents in the air. The wolf searched, and then it found the site of an old kill. A dead thing shaped like a man had strayed too close, and a predator had ripped it apart. Every ounce of meat was gone, even the bones had been cracked open and the marrow lapped out.

The white wolf’s nose twiched. A beast had torn through the creature with great viciousness. This was another wolf’s territory.

Not long later, it found pawprints over the hard snow, and the wolf followed. He darted into a snowbound valley, and the smell was getting clearer. Powerful paws bounded up a stony ridge, and then he saw it.

There was a black wolf prowling on the canyon, overlooking the battle that spread across the dunes.

It didn’t smell his approach. The black wolf was too distracted by the dead, while the white wolf moved too quietly.

It was a large wolf, every bit the white wolf’s equal. Its fur was pitch black like oil, and its eyes shone dark green in the night. The smell of dried blood lingered around it, of a recent kill still on its fur. A hare, most like.

Then, snow crunched under paws, and the black wolf flinched. The two direwolves turned to stare straight at each other.

Their eyes met, burning red against dark green. Nostrils sniffed the cold air.

The scent was familiar, even despite how long it had been. They had known each other as pups. The white wolf still remembered the days living in the castle beside each other, of rolling around in the stables and being fed from cloths dripping milk.

Brother, the white wolf knew. He raised his tail and stepped forward.

Then the black wolf’s jaws parted, baring teeth. A vicious growl rumbled from the black wolf’s throat, it spun around, poised. Frozen blood clung to its mane.

The white wolf recognised him, but the black wolf saw only an intruder in its territory. A challenger.

I am not a challenger, the white wolf’s posture said, but the other direwolf didn’t relax. The white wolf approached carefully, but the black one was aggressive.
As it kept baring its fangs, the white wolf started to growl too. Both their hackles raised.

Perhaps both wolves were waiting for the other to back down, but neither did. Neither of them would submit, they both considered themselves to be the dominant.

The two wolves circled each other, claws sliding over the frost and snow. They were both growling, pacing with teeth bared and claws drawn. Sizing the other wolf up.

Once, the white wolf had been the runt of the litter, but time had made him large and vicious. The white wolf was the taller and longer of the two now, while the black one was broader at the shoulder, thick and stocky. The black wolf was feral – it had hunted in these lands, it had grown rough and fierce.

It had been too long since the white wolf hunted for himself. The white wolf had grown too used to the men feeding it. It had been a long time since he had faced a challenge for dominance.

All around them, the night writhed.

The two direwolves met in an instant, in a flurry of claws and a snapping of teeth. Black against white.

The clash was as furious as it was sudden. They both pounced as one.

Claws scraped across the white wolf’s hide, the black wolf’s teeth tried to clamp around its neck. The white wolf shook it off, leaping at the beast.

Too feral, too overeager. The white wolf was the more reserved. The black wolf was snapping and clawing, but the white wolf lingered backwards, waiting for the moment…

They parted backwards, and growled as they spun. The black wolf barked and yelped, but the white was quiet and vicious. Then, as sudden as the last, the wolves collided again.

They wrestled over the ice and rocks, their claws scrambling against each other. After the first clash the white one had been scratched, but in the second clash its teeth mauled at the black wolf’s rump. The beast yelped, but tried to twist, until they were rolling over each other. Thud – their bodies crashed against a jutting rock, but the white wolf was the first on its feet. The white wolf took the leverage and kicked the black wolf onto its back.

Its teeth snapped at the black wolf’s rear leg, gripping a hold tightly and dragging it backwards. The black wolf yowled in pain, but it still didn’t stop thrashing.

Yield, the white wolf ordered with a growl. The black wolf didn’t reply, it only snarled.

The black brother was wounded, limping, but it went berserk with rage. Teeth snapped ferociously, so fast the white wolf had to dart backwards.

Then, the white wolf’s paw clawed over its snout. Blood hissed over snow.

Yield!

Still, the black brother attacked. It was angry, more furious than any beast the white wolf had ever known.

It nearly caught him off-guard, but then the white wolf grabbed it by the hackles and dragged it down, like a deer. If it had been prey, the wolf’s teeth would have ripped out its jugular and torn
The black wolf cried in pain. The white wolf was mere moments away from tearing out its throat, when suddenly he saw it.

In those green eyes, he saw a young child. A boy, scared and angry.

The wolves were both panting, both bloodied. The white wolf felt his bonded brother staring through his own eyes.

Brother, his bonded brother thought. Rickon.

The white wolf didn’t slacken the grip of his jaws as he pinned his brother down, but he didn’t bite deeper either. Through its eyes, he saw the young boy thrashing and screaming.

Don’t hurt him, his bond brother asked of him. Don’t hurt Shaggydog.

The white wolf obeyed. He released his jaws from the black wolf’s throat.

In an instant, the other wolf scrambled to its feet. The black wolf turned and ran, sprinting over the plains. There was a stagger in its gait, limping as it scurried away.

The white wolf sprinted after it. The black wolf was running towards its other half, and the white wolf followed.

Behind them, on the coast, he felt the dragon change direction. Both wolves were running and the dragon followed in the distance.

The dragon roared like a crack of thunder, sweeping low. The dragon would often roar before a hunt, the wolf had noticed, to terrify its prey into running. Perhaps it was instinctual, or perhaps the dragon just enjoyed the chase.

The black wolf was running east, towards a peninsula on the coast. There, nestled into the cliffs, the smell of smoke and woodstock wafted over the dunes.

The fort stunk of earth and smoke. It was a crude structure sheltered by piles of boulders forming barriers, with the haphazard look of past rockslides. It was large and long, surrounded by rings of stakewalls and mounds of dirt and rock, but with no stone walls. At its very centre nestled a long timber hall, and few other large buildings. The squat buildings all had had only a single level, but they were long and low, surrounded by trenches buried in the mud. The whole keep was sunk into the ground – like a castle that had been half-buried into mud.

The wolf saw the mouths of grease-stained chimneys, sprouting straight out of the hillside and spewing smoke into the cold air. There was a sprawling an encampment of tents, tanner’s stations, firepits and watchtowers, all built around the main keep, sheltered by scattered wooden towers poking from around the fort.

It wasn’t the largest fort that the wolf had ever seen, and far from the grandest, but it looked hardy and well-fortified. A fort that had seen many battles.

The keep was so old that black and green lichen was crawling over the weathered stones, like they were slowly being absorbed back into the landscape. Above the wooden shieldhall, a great green lobster was painted onto the thatch roof.

Kingshouse, his brother thought. The name was meaningless to a wolf, but it meant something to his human brother. The wolf panned its vision to take in the castle’s details, knowing that his brother was watching.

The black wolf was sprinting straight towards the fort. There were no gates or high walls, but it would still be suicide trying to charge over the rows and rows of trenches, embankments and spiked palisades. The wolf saw men with bows and spears waiting for them between the defences, dark figures almost invisible in the earth.

Soon, the white wolf saw movement. There was a group of men over the hills, another pack of two-legs clutching axes and spears. The white wolf heard hooves, and the scent of strange beasts. There were four-legged creatures galloping over the rocks like goats, each one bearing riders carrying halberds.

The four-legged creatures were bulky and powerful, larger than a direwolf. They were shorter than the other four-legs that men often rode, but they were much thicker and stouter. From their mount’s skulls, a single horn curved outwards like a sword. From the hill, the white wolf watched as the black wolf scurried behind them and kept running into the main keep proper.

His black brother had found a new pack, it seemed.

There were four of those mounted one-horns, but they moved swiftly and surely over the uneven rocks. More like goats than horses. They moved like creatures trained for battle, keeping their horns low and ready to charge.

The white wolf’s own other half knew as well. His bonded brother was watching everything from the wolf’s own eyes. In the distant sky, the white dragon roared again.

The white wolf couldn’t chase his brother any further, instead he had to lope away from the one-horned creatures. Those goat-like things looked fearsome and dangerous, being ridden by men clutching spears. The mounts were armoured – large leather hides draped across their bodies, making them seem even more bulky and formidable.

There were villages and settlements around the cliffs of the fort, but they were all deserted. There were rough harbours and fishing houses by the beach, but those buildings were abandoned and the ships were wrecked.

In the black of the night, the wolf saw a line of bodies snaking up the road, and towards the mountain valleys.

_Fleeing_, the wolf realised, _they are fleeing from the dead._

Like any predator, the dead things were hunting the herd of the living while it was vulnerable.

Over the hills and the fort, the black wolf howled.

There were half a hundred men on foot following the refugees up the road, all of them short and hairy with a queer smell to them. They smelt distinctly different to the other men the wolf had known. It was more earthy, sharp like flint. Each of these stony men looked broader too – they seemed twice as broad across the shoulders than most men.

They wore rock as armour, the wolf realised. The soldiers were each clad in a bulky cascade of leather pouches stuffed with rubble, while a few wore threaded armour of stone sheets bound in hemp. It looked like there was a rock shell around every man, as if each one of them was packed in stone.
All through the night, the battle raged. The dead were everywhere, hunting anything that moved.

The way that the dead things moved reminded the wolf of the termite hills he had once seen – so many insects spilling outwards, each moving seemingly randomly, but there was a purpose to them. The dead things were drones following higher orders.

By the coast, the dragon was burning through scores of dead, but the night was dark and the dragon could not be everywhere. The dead things were still slipping through from the water and onto the land.

The fighting was dispersed, muted sounds of battle ringing out over the hills.

The wolf crept closer to see the column of fleeing humans – females and pups – as they ran towards the mountains. They were hiding in caves that littered the pass, trying to take refuge from the night. The soldiers and the mounted one-horns were trying to hold the dead things back, but they were still pushing through.

The dead were targeting the weak and the defenceless, while avoiding the fighting men.

The sound of wailing babes echoed over the canyons. They all stank of fear.

The wolf knew these tactics. A wolf pack would use similar methods against a herd of elk. The dead things weren’t trying to overwhelm the living, they were trying to weaken them. They were targeting the most vulnerable, to chip the herd down piece by piece. These were continuous attacks, wearing them down and draining their fight.

And it was working. Already the coasts were littered with abandoned settlements, and the people were fleeing either to the fort of Kingshouse or to the mountain caves.

All around the earthen fort, smoke billowed in the night. There was a barricade of bonfires and torches surrounding the wooden structure, but the dead things were stalking the edges. They are predators, the wolf knew. Predators to all life.

The white wolf lurked in the darkness, staying away from the fighting, watching it all in silence.

Finally, as a pale dawn began to creep upwards over the horizon, the dead started to wither away.

The tide of the fighting changed. The dead creatures were sinking back towards the coast and into the waves, dragging with them the bodies of their prey. They had taken their meat in their night and now they were retreating to their lairs.

In the black, half-frozen ocean, huge shapes stirred under the waves.

It was a grim and cold morning as the weak sun rose.

Finally, the men in the stone roads started to pull back, retreating on sluggish feet towards their fort. The white wolf saw them trekking over the plains, stinking of sweat and fatigue.

The white dragon circled in the sky, a huge shape looming in the faint rays of morn. The sunlight could barely break through the clouds.

Then, the wolf felt his human brother approaching. He came over the horizon, followed by a mustering of humans with spears. The wolf recognised their smell; they were the humans that had travelled with it by boat.
Both camps of men had spent the entire night fighting off the dead things, and it was only in the first light of morn that their attention turned towards each other.

The wolf saw figures running. Short, stout men with clad in hide and stone.

Horns were blowing from the fort, alarms were raising. The stocky men looked panicked as they gazed up at the sky. The wolf heard a voice from the mounds echoing over the dunes.

“Wildlings!” a man boomed. “Wildli–”

The cry was drowned out by the beating of the dragon’s wings. Men were screaming, shouting as the dragon soared above them.

The dragon roared as it dropped downwards. The whole earth trembled. Two earthen watchtowers were demolished with a single swipe of the dragon’s tail. The air filled with white mist, and then a large chunk of the palisades blazed in dragonfire.

That was a warning shot, sent deliberately wide to scatter them. Their fort had survived the dead, but it was useless against a dragon.

The humans were panting for breath as they charged down the dunes, fumbling through the weeds with spears in hand, swords and chainmail clanging.

A stone-tipped spear whizzed through the air again, but the dragon was already circling back around.

A wildling stepped forward from the group on the road, bellowing words to the men holed up in their keep. An uneasy silence spread over the fort as every eye stared upwards in fatigued horror.

Eventually, after a long pause and plenty of muted panic from within the fort, the wolf saw something happen. There were short and grimy men with flinty axes and stone armour funnelling out of the fort. They were all broad shouldered and with far more hair than normal men, clad in so many layers of bulky armour that they appeared almost round. They were headed towards the raid party of wildlings.

The wolf saw them; two different packs meeting on the craggy field. They huddled in formation, back to back, as the dragon circled above them.

The wolf smelled fear. Something about that fear reminded the white wolf of prey that wanted to run but knew it wouldn’t escape. The men knew they were defenceless in their fort, so they were walking out to meet the intruders on the road, under the light of the weak noon sun.

The white wolf had no delusions; the dragon was the ultimate predator, not the direwolf.

The packs were facing off against each other on the rough road; leather, hide and spear against stone and axe. Those one-horned mounts shimmied, but they didn’t charge. Neither came close to the other, there was over a hundred yards between them.

And then the dragon dropped from the sky with a huge crunch, sending up a rain of rubble as it landed.

The white wolf had no fear of the dragon, but the roar was so loud that every hare for miles would have scattered. Testing them, the wolf thought, as the lines of stony men rippled and wavered, but didn’t break.
The humans were facing off against each other, huddling in a tight group while the dragon stirred and paced with irritation. With every lurching step, the ground quaked. The fear was so thick in the air.

The white wolf knew that scores of females and pups were hiding in the fort behind them. The fighting men were standing in formation, trying to protect their fort.

The dragon roared, delivering a challenge.

Finally, after what felt like an age, the four one-horns trotted forward. Four riders were approaching the dragon, all wearing threaded armour of grey stone plates, and then they were followed by the black wolf sulking at their rear.

Something was happening, a meeting of alphas. The white wolf lingered, watching from a safe distance.

Ghost, come to me, the wolf’s bonded brother asked suddenly. Come closer, I need your nose.

Obediently, the white wolf broke from his hiding place atop the hills. He loped down the plains, paws crunching over frost.

He saw his bonded brother standing on the dragon’s head, staring down over the road of snow and mud. The white wolf wanted to be closer to its other half.

“Lord Magnar, I presume?” his bonded brother called, voice loud enough to reach the ground even from the huge dragon’s head. It was looking down upon the group of four one-horns.

The reply was a guttural boom that the wolf could not understand, but his brother frowned. “Look around you, lord,” his brother replied harshly, white hair rustling in the winds. “I am not your enemy.”

The wolf crept closer, keeping behind the dragon’s bulk. On the other side of the dragon, the four one-horns were snorting and neighing, frightened before the dragon. Their riders had to wrestle to push them closer.

“Say that to my kin killed by your savages,” a hoarse, barely decipherable voice growled. “My ancestors will eat your bones, Snow, for unleashing this plague upon us.”

The wolf saw them. Four riders, all of them rough figures clad in stone armour. They were all hairy and unkempt, they stank of sweat, fish and beast. They were all staring up at the dragonrider, their eyes wide, their faces twisted.

They tried to hold themselves strong, but the wolf could still smell the fear wafting off them.

It was the man at the front that was doing the talking – he was a heavily bearded man, his beard so long it reached his waist, and with hair on his arms and hands so thick it was almost fur. He was short-statured, but extremely fat and stocky, barrel-chested with bow legs. The man bore a lobster on his stone breastplate, painted as green as lichen.

The wolf snuck closer still, close enough to make out his features. He had a thick brow, a bloated red face, and a necklace of teeth around his neck. They looked like human teeth. Then, a shiver passed down the wolf’s spine as he made out the eyes – deep, dark brown eyes.

The wolf knew it instinctively; this man was a skinchanger too.
Above him, the dragon began to snarl. His brother had to calm the beast, muttering quiet reassurances.

There was an uneasy silence as the four one-horns trotted closer.

“Look around you, Lord Magnar,” the wolf’s brother shouted. “Your villages are desolate, your ships are wrecked and your people hide in caves. It was not my army that did that – it is the dead that haunt your lands.”

“Monsters that have followed you.” The man’s voice was foul. “You and your wildlings brought those things to our shores.”

“Fool.” The dragon’s head snaked closer, long neck outstretching. The dragon might have swallowed them all, riders and mounts together. “If I wanted you dead, I would not be talking right now. I come to offer an alliance, Lord Magnar.”

The wolf hovered closer still, nostrils sniffing the cold air, and then it caught another scent. It was a different scent from the distinctive pang of the stoneborn. The wolf’s attention turned towards the one-horn at the rear of the four, the one being sheltered from view by the other three riders. There were more figures upon it, it noticed.

Every other one-horn carried only a single rider, but there were three bodies riding that mount. Behind the armoured rider, there was a woman sitting on the rear of the saddle, and a child was cradled in her lap.

The black wolf was keeping close to that mount, the wolf noticed. They were all surrounding the child.

The child was young, barely a pup, with dark hair and bright blue eyes. The child’s eyes were wide and staring, flickering between the dragon and the white wolf’s brother. His fear was wafting in the air, raw and pungent. Ghost sniffed again, and started to recognise the child’s scent.

The dragon followed the white wolf’s gaze. As soon as the wolf smelled him, his human brother knew it too.

“Rickon,” he called, pointing at the one-horn at the rear.

The child squirmed. The hairy man seemed to fluster. “His name ain’t Rickon.” The voice was gruff and throaty. “He is Stiv Magnar. My son.”

“He is Rickon Stark,” his brother replied with a snort, “and I would return him to Winterfell.”

“You think to steal my boy?”

The dragon stirred, breathing a cloud of mist. The child had his head buried in the woman’s furs, her arms wrapped tightly around him.

“I hoped we could be reasonable, Lord Magnar. I have no desire to fight.” His brother’s voice was loud and clear, but he didn’t descend from the dragon. “I swear to protect him. But this place isn’t safe for him, I will take him to Winterfell.”

“That den of wolves?” The man’s voice was foul. “Invaders, scum and mainlanders.”

“Look around you,” his brother challenged. “The dead are in your waters.”
“Skagos will survive as it always has. Your sort ain’t welcome here.”

The wolf could smell the hostility in the air. They were scared, but that fear didn’t break them. It made them straighten their backs, it made them jumpy. His brother’s eyes narrowed, and the wolf kept low to the ground, poised ready for a fight.

“This does not have to be a conflict between us, Lord Magnar,” he said finally. “I invite you to come to Winterfell, I offer you a seat on the Winter Court. You have done Rickon a kindness, I would repay that.”

“His name ain’t Rickon!” the man snapped. “You think I would go with you savages and monsters?”

“Come to the capital, represent your people. Together Stark and Magnar might find a new partnership. Winterfell is your ally.” His brother grimaced, let out a breath. “This is the Long Night, my lord. Have you not seen the dead dragging your people’s corpses into the water? All men must stand together against the cold.”

“Fuck you.” He spat on the ground. “And fuck the Starks. Skagos breaks to no one.”

“You are sworn to Winterfell, my lord.”

He shook his head. “Never. You lot waged war against us, but we never bent. Never in a thousand years has a Stark took tithe or blood price from Skagos.” He raised his voice louder. “This is my son now – I claimed him before the Old Gods, he took the rite and he became my blood. I will not surrender my boy.”

The wolf noticed how the bearded man was creeping closer, carefully urging his one-horn closer and closer towards the dragon.

“The dead are your enemy, not me.”

“From where I’m looking,” the fat, bearded man snapped, glaring up at the dragon, “you’re just as much of a monster as those rotten things.”

The wolf could feel his brother’s patience running low. His voice turned cold. His human half was gradually losing his temper.

“Look around. Consider your position.”

On the field, the stoneborn outnumbered the wildlings; there were near two hundred armoured men surrounding the fort, against the fifty men that had come by boat. Still, that hardly mattered at all while the dragon stood between them. There were two hundred of them, but the dragon would be able to slaughter them all in a single breath.

A unicorn might be a tasty morsel for the dragon.

The white wolf took care not to step too close. Any creature with any sense kept its distance from the dragon. Apparently, the bearded man had no sense, though – he was creeping closer and closer.

“Only a fool makes more enemies when you are already facing the greatest, Lord Magnar,” his brother continued. “The white walkers are out there, you have already suffered at their hands. We both have. I offer an alliance against them. Are you really so foolish to think me the greater threat?”

“You are all threats,” the other man growled. “None are welcome on Skagos. We will handle our own land.”

His brother paused, jaw clenching. He seemed to reach a decision. “Very well. If that is your will,” he said finally. “Then give me Rickon Stark and I will leave.”

The man’s eyes bulged. “Steal my son?”

“I will take my brother home. His family – his real family – is waiting for him. That is not negotiable.”

The crowd of men rippled. The wolf saw weapons being drawn, arrows tensing. It looked like the child was snivelling, weeping into the woman’s shoulder.

The dragon took another step forward, and the one-horns nearly reared in panic. They were thrashing, struggling against their rider’s reigns.

“If any harm comes to that child,” his brother warned, loudly, “then I will destroy Skagos. All of it. I will destroy every keep, every village, and every house. I will wipe your people out of history from now and evermore. You will surrender him now or I swear by the Old Gods that you will all suffer for it.”

They were rippling, shaking with fear but ready for battle. The bearded man started trembling, his nostrils flaring. His face was reddening, filling with rage. “You are a fool, Bjarg Magnar,” the dragonrider shouted downwards. “I offer you protection and you choose lunacy?”

“You offer death!”

His brother paused, and then turned to the huddle of stony men behind the four riders. His voice rose, and cut through the air. “If any of you have any sense,” he boomed, “you will abandon your lord’s folly. I will spare any man who surrenders. You have families on this isle, I offer a chance to save them from the Others.” He focused on the child, and then on the woman holding him. “Osha, is it? I will protect Rickon, and that means removing him from this isle. If you care for his safety – and your own – come to me.”

The woman didn’t reply, but she was holding onto Rickon tightly, and stunk of nerves. The other riders stuck to a close formation around her, all of them struggling to control their panicking mounts.

The dragon loomed, and the wolf could smell the hesitation. Behind them, the wildlings were gripping weapons too.

“You dare?” the bearded man choked.

“If you will not see sense, then we are done talking.”

“Aye.” The man grit his teeth, hands tightening around his stone axe. “We are.”

Without warning, the man snapped.

He threw his weapon upwards, and his brother ducked backwards. The throw was far too weak; the crude stone axe clattered harmlessly off the dragon’s jaw. The dragon’s teeth parted, but the man was already shoving his one-horn into a charge. Its horn lowered, its hooves clattering.

He was roaring, as if he could single-handedly charge against a dragon. An aging, fat and bloated man, charging against a gargantuan monster. Behind them, arrows clattered off hard scales, while the other riders were scattering.

The dragon opened its mouth. “Stop!” his brother boomed. “Stop!”

The bearded man didn’t seem to care. “We are the sons of stone!” he bellowed. He was screaming madly, riding against the dragon alone. “Never break!” he cried. “Never break!”

The wolf felt the air tingle, he felt something change…

The stoneborn screamed and charged. The wolf was only vaguely aware of Lord Magnar roaring, facing the dragon with furious, bloody eyes. He’s bleeding, the wolf realised suddenly. The man’s eyes were weeping thin trails of blood.

Then, a phantom pain ripped open its skull. The wolf barked, but the pain wasn’t his. It was his brother’s, he was clutching his head as the burning seared through his skull.

Shivers ran down the wolf’s spine, something invisible pulsated through the air.

An aura was reaching outwards, stabbing forward like a lance.

It was the bloated man, the wolf realised. He was a skinchanger. He felt swollen with power and rage, forcing forward with all the strength he had. For a heartbeat, blood spurted from his eyes, running down his cheeks.

The human tried to possess the dragon, the wolf realised. He tried to forcibly subdue it.

The dragon twitched backwards, growled, and then immense muscles twisted. The earth under the dragon broke.

It was over before the wolf could even blink.

There was no restraint. In an instant, the dragon went berserk.

Slam. Claws lashed forward and crushed the man into pulp. He was instantly smeared, mount and all, all across the stones. The earth thudded. The wolf heard a child wail.

Then the dragon roared so loud the world went deaf.

Suddenly, the dragon was crashing forward – its tail lashing, jaws snapping. A jet of white fire blazed, bursting through the earthen fort. The monster roared in pure, berserk rage.

The white wolf was already sprinting away, running for cover so fast his paws kicked up billows of snow. He heard many men doing the same. He could hear a few arrows and spears whistling through the air, but the dragon could not be stopped.

A single whip of its tail and two dozen men were crushed against the stakewall.

A claw slammed downwards and tore out half the side of the hill. Another twenty men went flying.

A cold light was glowing from between the dragon’s teeth.

It all exploded into chaos.

Men were screaming, voices howling…

With a single beat of its wings, the dragon jumped forward over all the fort’s defences, crashing down onto the shieldhall atop the hill. Men and women ran like insects, they were all writhing and screaming as the dragon bit downwards. The dragon was tearing the roof straight off the fort, crushing through the wood and earth as bright white light glowed from its jaws.

“Stop!” a woman’s voice shrieked. “Stop!”

The voice screamed at the top of her lungs, but the woman could still barely break through the sheer pandemonium. The black wolf was barking, frantic…

“We surrender!” she bellowed. “We surrender!”

The white wolf was already a safe distance away, hiding in the ferns. It looked like his bonded brother was struggling to even restrain the enraged dragon.

The fighting gone on barely a moment, but already the ground was covered in corpses. The icy breath had torn through a corner of the fort, and the dragon’s weight had nearly collapsed the rest. The whole structure was shivering, about to give way.

The ‘battle’ was over before the bowmen even had time to notch a second arrow.

The woman was holding the child in her arms. The boy seemed hysterical with panic.

“We surrender!” she screamed again. “His name is Rickon! Rickon Stark!”

Eventually, his brother managed to soothe the dragon. The woman was shrieking at the men, “Lower your weapons!” she screamed at them. “Lower them! I am Lady Magnar, I order you! We surrender!”

The wildlings were trekking into Kingshouse, unopposed. They pointed spears at the survivors, all the while distraught cries and sobs filled the air.

A cold mist lingered over the fort, broken palisades and frozen corpses scattered everywhere. The wolf stayed hidden in the ferns, eyeing the dragon carefully.

The hardest part was convincing the dragon not to slaughter them all.

By the time his brother finally dismounted, the place was a wreck. His brother stood in the courtyard, as his soldiers pushed through the scattered barricades and seized the keep with ease. As the violence seemed to calm, the wolf crept back to his brother’s side, tail drooped low.

The woman lowered herself to her knees, face first in the mud before him. She was an older woman, long and lean with a face like beaten leather. The woman stood taller than most of the men around her.

“King Snow.” She did not raise her head, she kept her face pressed against the ground. The white wolf saw her gulp, heard her voice quaver. “Kingshouse is yours. House Magnar is yours.”

His brother’s voice was stiff. “Rise,” he said curtly. “You are Osha, are you not?”

“I am.” She was shaking. She still hadn’t risen. “Lord Magnar took me as his third wife, and he took Stiv – Rickon – into his house.”

“Why?”

Hesitantly, the woman raised her head, then shambled to her feet. “The lord was childless, he saw a Gift inside Rickon. He named Rickon as his heir.”
“I see.” His brother’s cold gaze turned to stare at the maimed body smeared over the road. There was barely anything recognisable of the fat man – half of his body was still stuck in the dragon’s claws, along with bloody pieces of his mount. “Did he know Rickon’s identity?”

“No. I claimed him as my own son, and told no one.” Her voice was throaty, eyes downward. “My husband only found out less than two months ago. Only after Stiv underwent the rite of clan, and he became named as Magnar’s blood.”

“The rite of clan?” his brother asked with a frown.

“A stoneborn ceremony,” she mumbled. “My boy gave blood to the tree and ate meat. Human meat.”

His brother turned to look at the boy, but the child was trembling as he tried to cover his face and hide his eyes. The boy was red-faced, sweating and sickly as he clutched the woman’s furs. He was breathing so fast he might choke.

The white wolf trotted closer, looking around the shattered shieldhall. Spears were pointed at the squat men, forcing them to stand against the walls, or kneel in the mud.

His brother’s expression was unreadable, but the wolf felt the unease slipping through their bond.

“Why did you bring my brother to Skagos, Osha?” his brother asked finally.

“I needed a place to hide, Your Grace. Winterfell was taken. It was a mad time. It seemed like nowhere was safe and everyone was hunting Rickon Stark.” The woman grimaced, still not meeting her brother’s eyes. “So I called him Stiv instead, and pretended to be a fisherwoman. I figured that Skagos was the one place no one would ever look.” There was a flicker in her voice. “I did not expect Lord Magnar to take such an interest in the boy, did not expect…”

There was a long silence. His brother looked at the child, as if waiting for him to say something. The boy made no sound but strangled sobs.

“I cared for him as if he were mine own boy,” the woman said finally, stroking his hair. “I swear I did, Your Grace. By the Old Gods, I looked after him. I thought his family were all lost, so I gave him a new one.”

There was no reply.

Finally, his brother lowered himself to his knee, with a pained grimace, and outstretched his hand to the child. “Rickon,” he called, voice softening. “It is me. Jon.”

The boy didn’t even look at him.

“It’s been a long time, Rickon. Four years. You were just a babe the last I saw you, but look at you now.” His voice was low, soothing, but the child still stank of fear, confusion and distraught anger. “But I’m here to bring you home. Bran, Sansa, they’re waiting for you.”

There was a long pause. His brother’s outstretched hand remained empty.

The woman shook the child’s shoulder, stroking his hair. “You must go with him, child.”

“Mother…” the boy croaked.

“Go.” she whispered. “You have to. He’ll take you home.”
“This is my home. Please, he… he hurt father, you can’t…” She tried to shake him away, but he clung on with tiny, pink fingers. He was sobbing. “Don’t let him…!”

His brother finally stepped forward, and then hoisted the boy up off the ground. The child screeched madly. He tried to cling onto the woman, but she pulled away. She was crying too.

“Mother! Father!” the boy wailed, thrashing against the grip. “No! Get off me, get off…!”

His brother grit his teeth, and didn’t listen as he carried his brother away. The child was screaming, kicking and hitting, tears pouring from red eyes.

From the yards, the black wolf started howling, thrashing. The wolf was loping forward, and suddenly the men had to try and restrain the beast. Spears were raised, men were shouting.

The white wolf bared its fangs and growled, protecting his brother against all who would do him harm. There were flusterling emotions hovering in the air, sparks of violence and cries of alarm.

Around him, the black wolf tore into a man, crazed with blood. The white wolf jumped, while others were rallying.

For a moment, his brother was distracted. The boy managed to squirm out of his grip and tried to run, but then his brother caught him and dragged him back. The child was kicking and screaming with every step, right up until another man clamped his fingers over the child’s mouth.

The boy bit down hard against the hand gagging him, drawing blood. The sound of curses filled the air.

“Torvi, keep Rickon safe!” his brother ordered. “Restrain that direwolf – do not hurt it! Get these people under control.”

Finally, they managed to force the crazed black wolf to the ground, by using large shields to pin it down. It took a dozen men to force it backwards into a corner and overpower it. The wolf was scratching and clawing, even as they finally gathered enough rope to hogtie its limbs. The men used the butt of a spear to press between its jaws, but then screams echoed as the great wolf managed to bite down into a man’s neck and shake his entire body in its jaws. Blood splattered over stone.

Even as one man was being mauled to death, the others took the opportunity to wrap a rope around the wolf’s neck.

The white wolf hovered besides his brother, poised and alert against any threat. The aggression was thick in the air.

As the boy was dragged away by a cold-skinned woman, the black wolf was finally brought under control. The black beast was yowling, moaning.

“Get Rickon out of here. I shall be flying back with him at all haste. But first…” His gaze turned around the yards, and then the ruins of Kingshouse. His gaze turned to settle on the weeping woman. “Osha,” he said finally, lowering his voice. “I want to know all of the leaders on Skagos, and where they are.”

“They are all here, or further down the valley, King Snow.” The woman finally stood, but kept her eyes low. “After Driftwood Hall fell, the Stanes and the Crowls flocked to Kingshouse. They took refuge in the Magnar’s lands, along with most of their folk.”
“And further afield?”

The woman frowned. “The Harstanes and Horgyrs were no friends of the Magnar’s, they cling to the eastern isle. The Grawls keep docks and shipyards to the south, but I haven’t heard none word of them since the dead appeared. Clan Steinn keep to their herds in the hills, but Magnar sent his cousin to call on them.”

His brother nodded. “I want to know exactly which of them supported Lord Magnar.”

The woman lowered her voice as she muttered a reply, occasionally pointing towards figures. As the evening stretched outwards, a frenzy of activity began.

The black direwolf was so agitated that they had to force it, still roped up, into a caged pen. It took five men just to drag it. The white wolf sniffed around the strange new place, occasionally pawing at its brother’s cage. The smell of his black brother’s pain and grief put the white wolf on edge.

The little child was locked up in an outhouse, guarded by two dozen men, all of them holding spears. The squat men and women were herded into separate tents, their axes and spears taken away from them. His brother walked between them, sorting through their scattered fort.

The direwolf saw a huddle of children cowering in the corner of the fort. They all seemed to be crying.

The smell of those one-horns was everywhere in the fort. His brother ordered his pack to confiscate all of the stoneborn’s mounts.

Meanwhile, the dragon made its roost atop the broken shieldhall, which was collapsing under the dragon’s weight. From the centre of the shieldhall, the dragon could stretch out over the entire fort.

The wolf could feel the anger and fear thick in the air. Its hackles were raised, senses peeled for any who intended harm. His brother still needed help to walk, so the direwolf kept close, hovering beside his brother’s every limped step. Sometimes, his brother would clutch his fur for support.

They all gave the wolf a wide berth, mostly as the white wolf followed his brother around.

Towards dusk, there was a congregation gathering in the yard. One by one, a collection of hairy and squat men were forced to stand forward. They picked them out of the huddle, dragging them to the front of the fort.

His brother was there, surrounded by a barricade of spears. The white wolf followed to heel.

“These are them?” he asked, looking between the angry glares. About two dozen of them.

“Aye, these are them,” the woman Osha replied, keeping a hard voice. “These were Lord Magnar’s top lieutenants and supporters.” She looked towards two sniffling bodies at the very edges. “And his other wives.”

They were both very thick-waisted women standing on the end of the line, weeping quietly. The women seemed as hairy as the men; their hair was rough, matted black like seaweed, their jaws were thick, and their eyes were red and fierce.

More and more were forced to stand in a line before him. Some were angry, some grieving, but they were all terrified. More than a few had soiled their furs.

“I see,” his brother said slowly. “And these are the ones that resisted my forces?”
“They are.”

“They defended our homes!” a man shouted defiantly, but his voice was trembling.

“You did.” He nodded. “And you also murdered my envoys. You denied all negotiation, all chance at resolution. You forced me to this.”

Nobody dared to object. Above them, the dragon’s neck arched downwards, curious to see what was happening. The shadow of the dragon loomed over them all, and a few whimpered. “Are you going to judge them, Your Grace?” the woman asked.

His brother shook his head. “No.” There was a pause for a moment. Then, he seemed to reach a decision. “Dracarys,” he said finally.

In an instant, the dragon breathed. The wolf felt the swash of cold air wash over its fur. Ice blasted, voices screamed, and furious teeth snapped downwards.

In a flurry of quick bites, the dragon swallowed them all whole.

Sansa

It was past the hour of ghosts when she heard the bell tower ringing, when she heard the air above Winterfell twist like a storm.

The moon was obscured by clouds, the darkness thick and complete. The watchmen didn’t notice the immense figure in the sky until the very moment it whooshed over Winterfell’s spires. And then all of Winterfell and the surrounding refugee camps started to fill with panicked shouts.

Sansa was instantly shaken awake by the roar of the wind. At first she thought it was a winter gale causing the keep to tremble, but then she felt the air shift as an immense mass dropped from the sky. She was instantly out of bed, grabbing her cloak from where it lay and pulling the furs over her as she rushed to the balcony.

She saw white wings flapping as the beast circled over the castle, coming in for a landing. The sight took her breath away.

The dragon had returned.

The keep was already stirring as the bells clattered, even despite the unholy hour. It felt like she was half-asleep, but she still had to rush. Her head was woozy and tired, but Sansa quickly pulled on her shoes, and wrapped her hair up in a crude knot.

There was an urgent knock at the door. It was her guard’s voice, a man named Wilhelm. “Your Grace!”

“I heard it!” she snapped. “I’m coming.”

Sansa had ordered the guards to warn her the moment that Jon returned, but in retrospect that had been a foolish order. Of course the dragon would alert everyone all at once by itself. She was still in her sleeping clothes, but Sansa simply pulled her cloak and dress over the top. Sansa dressed herself in record time, and then paced quickly out of her chambers.
Wilhelm, Boderick, Watt, Keg and Duncan were already waiting, their faces anxious under their helms and each one gripping their spear tightly.

She heard the sound of the dragon’s roar. The dragon was roaring as it circled lower and lower, wings beating harder as it descended, trying to clear the godswood of all the foolish worshippers who flocked there. If the dragon had landed in a rush, all of those people beneath would have been squashed.

As Sansa stepped outside, the yards were already awake and stirring. It was impossible for a dragon to do anything discreetly – it was like a parade with every step it took.

There were more guards and men-at-arms rushing to her side, until she was being trailed by two dozen of them.

“Your Grace…” an urgent voice called, and Sansa saw a portly man rushing over the stones. Archmaester Marwyn was fully dressed, and his eyes were practically glowing in excitement. Her guard’s spears crossed to block his way. “Your Grace, the dragon–”

“Step back inside, maester,” Sansa ordered curtly.

Marwyn flustered. “Princess, the dragon…!”

“Step back inside.”

Her voice left no room for argument. With a nod, one of Sansa’s guards broke off and escorted the maester away. Marwyn looked like he wanted to resist, but Sansa allowed no argument and the guard roughly forced him back into the keep.

Marwyn had proved himself very useful recently, but Sansa still would not trust the archmaester next to the dragon. She had taken care to keep him at a distance. No, Sansa would have to wait to clear the matter with Jon first, before she even allowed Marwyn anywhere near the beast.

Across Winterfell, the beat of the dragon’s wings was like a hurricane circling above.

Sansa and her guards arrived at the godswood just as the beast finally landed with a great thump. Her guards had to push her through the crowds, while the surrounding voices reached a frenzy. It was a queer type of panic; some were trying to run away urgently, and others were trying to push closer. The godswood felt like a cattle pen; filled with bodies cramming and squirming through the trees.

All around the heart tree, Sansa saw pale faces with their heads lowered in prayer.

By the time her guards managed to clear the path, Sonagon had dropped its head to rest in the hot springs, its tail curling around the heart tree. She saw that Jon was already climbing down the crest of the scales. He moved with a great deal of care and difficulty – gingerly trying to lever his way down a makeshift saddle of hemp ropes.

It was only Sansa’s fifth time or so seeing the dragon up close, but the sight never ceased to take her breath away.

She couldn’t help a quiet shiver as she stared up at the dragon’s immense bulk. She felt like a mouse approaching a wolf as she nervously inched closer.

The princess hovered gingerly, nervous to come any closer. The dragon was breathing deeply, and it collapsed almost instantly – perhaps the beast was exhausted from its flight.
The crowd was thick, but they still granted Sonagon a wide berth. Everything felt hushed – the loudest sound was the dragon’s breath, while all others were muttering. The dragon would need only to roll over onto its side and it might crush over a half a hundred men.

It was a frightening feeling to approach a creature large enough to squash you without even noticing.

Jon seemed to be having trouble descending the thirty or so feet from Sonagon’s crown to the ground. It was only as Sansa came closer that she realised why. There was a squirming shape fastened to Jon’s chest; he was trying to hold onto a large bundle with one hand and to clutch a rope with the other. His legs were struggling to find a grip on the scales as he rappelled downwards. Sansa heard Jon cursing and grimacing with every step downwards, but the people around him seemed too nervous to step forward to help.

In his grip, Sansa noticed, he was holding a young, pale-faced boy. It was only as Jon’s feet squelched into the mud that Sansa got a closer look.

The boy was around six years old, she realised. There was a momentary confusion, but then she met Jon’s gaze, and her breath froze in the humid air.

He never even needed to tell her; she just could tell from his expression. Sansa was already pulling up her dress and jogging forward to meet him.

“Rickon?” she gasped.

She barely recognised him. As a toddler, Rickon’s hair had been a bright auburn, almost like copper, but age had darkened his hair to near black. His bright blue eyes were red from tears, and he was kicking and wriggling in weak thrashes. The boy looked little like a prince; he was wearing grimy hides and dirty furs. His shoulder-length hair was filthy and unkempt, his face sickly pale.

Rickon? Is it truly…?

Jon was staggering forward with a wince of pain, but Sansa had eyes only for her baby brother.

“Rickon, it’s me, Sansa…” she cried. “Oh gods, Rickon…”

The child replied only by pulling back his lips and spitting at her. Sansa had been reaching to embrace him, but his lips curled and he reared like a vicious rat. Sansa was left dumbfounded as the glob of phlegm landed on her dress.

Jon grimaced, but he didn’t slacken his grip on the boy. Jon was holding him almost in a chokehold. Rickon’s eyes were raw and red, but there were no tears. The child was swaying senselessly, writhing with dazed eyes. Jon met Sansa’s gaze briefly, and then turned away.

“Guards!” Jon shouted, while the men saluted around. “Have the captain escort Prince Rickon. He needs a clean change of clothes, and plenty of water.”

There was no reply from Rickon except a torrent of words that Sansa could not recognise. They are curse words, she thought. She did not need to understand them to recognise the meaning behind them. Her baby brother was spitting curses at her. The boy seemed hysterical, still struggling against his half-brother’s grip.

Sansa stared, trying to match the feral wild boy before her with the baby brother she had once known. Has Jon brought the wrong child?
Jon paused wearily, his eyes were grim. He was likely thinking the same thing. Sansa could see something of a resemblance in the boy’s features, but it was hard to tell through the twisted face and red eyes.

_The child is angry_, Sansa realised. There was no joy in the boy’s expression, there was only raw hate.

Sansa didn’t know what to do.

Rickon was carried away from the dragon, but he still resisted with every step. Sansa tried to approach him, but her little brother cursed and spat wildly. Sansa couldn’t even understand the slurred words, but the viciousness behind them was clear.

“Take Prince Rickon to a secure chamber,” Jon ordered to the surrounding guards, then glanced to her. “Forgive him, Sansa, it’s been… an unpleasant journey.”

She wasn’t sure how to reply for a moment. “What happened?” Sansa said finally with a deep breath, keeping her voice low.

“It is near a full day’s flight from Skagos to Winterfell. I didn’t risk making a waystop,” he said grimly, in between shouting orders to the worshippers. “But Rickon was so restless, he never stopped struggling all the way from Skagos. I had to drag him onto Sonagon to begin with, and then I had to tie him down to keep him there. I still feared he might fall – he nearly wriggled free during the flight. It was bad from the start, and it got so much worse once we broke through the clouds. I think he’s afraid of heights.” Jon sighed wearily, and shook his head. “As Sonagon broke the clouds he was out of his mind with fear.”

Sansa frowned, inspecting Jon more closely. Her half-brother looked like hell; every inch of him was battered and grimy, his face was gaunt and thinner than she remembered from mere weeks ago, and his limp was worse than ever before. His face was pale, and his eyes shadowed, and he was wincing heavily with each limp. He looked fit to collapse, and beneath his riding furs, his armour looked half-ruined; like he had just walked off a battlefield.

Sansa glanced back at Rickon – the boy was left dehydrated, terrified and delirious. The journey must have been pure torture.

“And he puked on me,” Jon admitted, glancing down to his ruined furs. “Several times, in fact.”

Jon finally released Rickon onto the carpet of humus and ferns. It looked like he might have ran away, but he couldn’t even stand straight. He just dropped to the ground. Rickon was a wild thing. Sansa hovered around him, but the boy was crazed; stumbling, spitting and cursing. “Did you have to put Rickon through that?” Sansa asked with a grimace. “He’s a child.”

“It’s either a several week’s journey on land, or one long day by dragonback,” Jon replied simply. “Sonagon may not be the most pleasant option, but the dragon is still the fastest and safest. I needed to get Rickon off Skagos with all haste. It was not safe there, Sansa.”

She couldn’t argue the point, but the sight of her little brother like this, crazed like some tortured animal… it was a disturbing sight. The guard Duncan rushed back with a bucket of water and a fresh cloak, but Rickon hissed at the man when he tried to take him.

“Here, let me…” Sansa reached downwards, to try and take the ruined fur cloak off her brother. Sansa couldn’t even tell what hide his clothes were made from, it was a rough and unfamiliar material. Rickon only shrieked, trying to claw at her with podgy fingers. “No, Rickon, don’t…!”
The child screamed. The crowd was left staring at the scene, but none approached. I cannot do this here, not in front of everybody, Sansa cursed.

Finally, Wilhelm had to reach down and pin the young child still to get him to stay.

“Get him to the keep,” Sansa ordered.

The prince tried to bite him as he grabbed him. Rickon brought his teeth down hard, even despite the man’s thick leather gloves. The guards seemed nervous to approach the wild prince.

Rickon’s shriek broke the air, like the cry of a distraught animal.

Sansa wanted to hold her little brother, but Jon met her gaze, and then shook his head. “Not tonight, Sansa, let him rest,” Jon said lowly. “I’m fit to collapse after that journey, Rickon must be crazed.” Sansa hesitated. “Lock him in a room, let him sleep for now, and let none disturb him. Have a maester check up on him, maybe. We might make a better introduction in the morn.”

Reluctantly, Sansa agreed. It was good that Bran wasn’t here; she didn’t want her brother to see Rickon like this, so raw and wild. Rickon doesn’t remember me, Sansa thought, staring at the boy as he was dragged away. There had been no recollection in his eyes. Perhaps it wasn’t surprising; Rickon had only been three years old when she had left Winterfell. He was six now, almost seven.

Sansa entrusted Wilhelm and Andric to carry Rickon, all the while she trailed close behind. The boy was still trying to bite the men who pulled him away, still cursing in the Old Tongue. His eyes looked dazed. Sansa followed, and Jon limped beside her.

Just what happened at the Wall? At Skagos? She had heard reports of the former, unbelievable as they were, but nothing at all of the latter.

Behind them, it seemed like the dragon was already asleep.

All around them, the gaggle of faithful lined the godswood’s path, but her guards kept them back. The onlookers weren’t aggressive, but they were murmuring with their hands outstretched towards Jon. A few of the more daring tried to touch Sonagon’s scales. Her half-brother didn’t even meet their gazes.

They walked slowly out of the woods, letting the guards clear the way. Jon was staggering heavily with every step, fatigued and weak.

It looks like a severe case of cramps, Sansa noticed. And Jon’s legs weren’t very strong even on the best of days. Sansa had never seen her half-brother in such a state.

Still, she couldn’t let him rest without answering… “How did it fare on Skagos?” she asked finally.

“Poorly.” Jon’s jaw was tense. “Rickon was adopted by Lord Magnar, Sansa. The lord had no idea of his identity, but he took Rickon into his house. A rite of clan, Lord Magnar called it – he was claimed as the lord’s own blood.”

“What?” That caught her off-guard. The statement was baffling to her, she wasn’t sure if she had misheard. “Why?”

“The Lord Magnar was old and childless, even despite multiple marriages. So he chose his heir instead,” Jon explained, keeping his voice low so none would overhear. Sansa had to walk very closely next to him. “Lord Magnar wanted a warg to carry on his line, and Rickon is a powerful one.” Sansa’s gaze flickered. “By Skagosi law, Rickon is now the new lord of the House Magnar.”
The Lord of House Magnar? That was a lot to take in, Sansa had to pause to digest the words. “And then this Lord Magnar?”

“A fool. A stubborn old man.” Jon’s voice turned foul. “I offered Magnar peace, but the stoneborn were too set in their ways. That isle has been isolated for far too long.” He shook his head. “I gave Lord Magnar no chance to resist, I wanted him to surrender without blood, but he instead tried to possess Sonagon – he tried to seize control of the dragon himself.”

Sansa’s eyes widened slightly. Seize control? Is that a risk we must consider? “Is that possible?”

“Not for him.” Jon kept his head lowered as they walked over the cobbles of the courtyard. “I can barely control Sonagon myself some days, and the dragon quite likes me. A dragon is not a wolf, its skin cannot be worn so easily. Lord Magnar was a powerful skinchanger, more powerful than most, but it did him no good.”

Sansa wasn’t sure how to reply to that. Archmaester Marwyn had been teaching her something of skinchangers and wargs – an archaic magic of the First Men, Marwyn had said. While other magic required spells or rituals, skinchanging was a primal, natural magic. Skinchanging is to spellcraft what swimming in the ocean is to sailing, as Marwyn phrased it. It felt surreal to hear Jon talk about such things so matter-of-factly.

Still, Sansa could not dwell on it for long. “And what of the other stonelords?” she asked as they walked.

“I brought them to heel.”

“How?”

His voice didn’t even flicker. “I lined up the loudest of the objecters, and I fed them all to Sonagon.”

He did what? Sansa didn’t speak, but her lips tightened and her brow knotted in concern. Jon must have caught her gaze.

“The Others have a fleet, Sansa,” Jon said sharply. “The white walkers are building bone ships on the eastern coast, they plan to sail south. Skagos will shortly become the very front line of that war.” They what? Sansa hadn’t heard such things; the dragon moved faster than a raven. “I needed to secure that isle quickly to stand against the Others, and I could not allow any petty disputes by the Skagossons to weaken that effort. I offered them a chance, they refused it – and then afterwards I did not offer a second.”

She didn’t reply, there was too much to process. The Others have a fleet? That news caused tremors down her spine. They didn’t break step as they crossed over the courtyard, keeping their voices low as they mumbled to each other. Guardsmen led and trailed behind them, clearing a path through the crowds. Sansa did not want such uneasy talk to spread around the castle.

Ahead of them, it looked like Rickon had finally fallen unconscious as he was carried through the yards.

“A woman named Osha is now one of the strongest voices on Skagos,” Jon continued. “She is Lord Magnar’s widow. She was pretending to be Rickon’s mother, and I believe her loyalty is to him. I left her in a position of power, and promised Winterfell’s gratitude for keeping order.”

“I see.”
She walked quietly for a good while as Jon told her of the state of the north. The Breach and the ruins of Castle Black, the battle at Eastwatch and the siege of the Wall. The evacuation of the Gift. Some of it Sansa had already known, but much was new to her – like the news of the Others assembling a fleet of bone ships at Hardhome. Jon spoke in a grim and tired voice. Such things might have once beggared belief, but Sansa did not dare to doubt them now.

Jon described an army of legions, an unending horde. Millions of wights, both human and beast. Even fish and whales, she heard him say, scarcely believing it. Skagos sounded like it had already been devastated by the Other’s attacks, Jon described the isle in language akin to that of an apocalypse.

Sansa felt a cold sweat on her skin. A more foolish girl would have tried to dismiss the words, but Sansa just listened solemnly.

Sansa’s eyes lingered on Rickon, wondering if he had seen such things too. Rickon had found a new family, but then Jon had been forced to take him from it. No wonder the child was so distraught.

_All the while I lived as Alayne Stone, she realised, Rickon was Stiv Magnar._

They approached the steps of the keep, and Sansa extended her arm to help support Jon up the stairs. It was the cold of night, and a fine layer of frost was already creeping back over the stone. Jon took her arm without a word, ascending the stone steps with staggered limps.

“What happened to Rickon’s wolf?” Sansa asked finally. The wolf wasn’t the most pressing concern, but it was a nagging concern in the back of her mind.

“Shaggydog was feral,” Jon explained lowly. “He killed two of my men trying to chain him, but they managed to muzzle him. Shaggydog is with Ghost now, at Eastwatch. I have assigned men to escort both wolves to Winterfell, but Shaggydog will stay chained and muzzled, at least for now.”

“Why?” she asked. “Why go to such lengths to save a feral wolf?”

Jon hesitated for a moment before he replied, as he limped up the steps. “Because I know that Rickon would never forgive me if Shaggydog died.”

Sansa paused, as her thoughts drifted back to Lady. She had been thinking about her former pet a lot recently. _If my direwolf was still alive, she wondered, then would I be one of these ‘wargs’ too?_

There was a quiet, as they stepped through the gates to the keep. Jon was dragging his feet, as if fit to collapse from fatigue at any moment. Sansa’s eyes lingered on the dead shape of Rickon hanging limp in the guard’s arms. He had managed to cry and shriek himself into unconsciousness, apparently.

“The coronation will be soon.” Sansa said finally. “Will Rickon be fit to attend?”

“I don’t know,” he admitted, and then paused. “I expected to miss the coronation – I thought you would have crowned Bran already.”

“I delayed it for you.” He turned to look at her. “It was too dangerous to hold it in your absence,” Sansa argued. “Too many still consider you King Snow. There can be no doubt – the whole realm must see you cede your crown, Jon.”

“Ack, fine.” His jaw clenched. “As soon as possible.”
She measured his expression, noting the dark circles under his eyes. “When was the last time you slept?”

He shrugged. “What day is it?”

“You’re burning the candle at both ends, Jon,” Sansa warned. “Even your dragon is exhausted. You are fighting battles back to back in every corner of the realm, it is too much for any man.”

His eyes narrowed. “There’s an invasion happening, Sansa.”

“Aye, there is. But how long do you think you can keep this up?”

“As long as I must.” Jon paused. “You must have heard of the Breach?”

“I have,” Sansa admitted. “Bran told me of it first, and then we received refugees saying the same. Many here are still in disbelief.”

“Tis true. The Wall is broken – there’s a hundred foot gap straight through at Castle Black. The Others resurrected monsters, wingless dragons even larger than Sonagon to tear through it,” Jon said, his voice curt. Sansa twitched slightly. “The Others are pressing forward hard with their invasion. They are already renewing their assault, and it will only get worse from here.”

Yes, Sansa did not doubt how critical it was. Winterfell was far from the warfront, but they had still seen the streams of refugees heading south. The coalition had captured several hundred unchained wights after the battles to the north, and no man could question the damage the realm had taken.

Even with enforced conscription, Winterfell was struggling to fill its garrisons. Their soldiers had suffered too many losses, they were forced to recruit semi-trained militia. They needed every farmer and cowherd holding spears in their ranks, but they made for extremely poor soldiers.

Sansa knew the mood in the castle – it was like there was a time limit hanging over everybody’s heads. How long do we have?

Jon and Sansa stopped walking in the hallway of the castle, turning to look at each other as the guards walked ahead. The shadows of the torches danced around them, and a hundred eyes were watching from the corridors. Their voices dropped further. “I cannot linger here for long, Sansa,” Jon whispered. “I must fly back north at all haste.”

Sansa shook her head. “You cannot. You must go south instead.”

He stared at her, his eyes narrowing. “Sansa…”

There was no surprise, only indignation. So he did receive my letter. Sansa hadn’t been sure if the missive she had penned would catch him in time. Sansa could see the raw emotions across his face – he was too fatigued to hide them.

He looked ready to object, but she cut him off. “Daenerys Targaryen is coming. She brings what might be the largest army in the world,” she said sharply. “She is an undisputed Targaryen – the rightful heir to the Iron Throne to many. She comes with a fleet as large as Nymeria’s, and legions of followers. And she has dragons, Jon – three dragons.” Jon’s gaze flickered, but he nodded. “Aegon means to unite with Daenerys against us. You must stop that.”

He bristled. “You want me to marry this woman?”
“I do.” She nodded. “There must be an alliance, and a betrothal is the best means. If Daenerys has any sense, she will consider it.”

“Sense? She is the Mad King’s daughter!” Jon shook his head. “And there are battles to be fought here.”

“There will always be battles to be fought,” she retorted. “But there is only one dragon and the front line must hold without you.”

“You don’t know what you’re talking about,” he said sharply. “Do you have any idea of the size of the Other’s army?”

“Oh, I can see it in your eyes.” Sansa nodded. “But still, you must go south. Firstly, there is a Vale fleet sailing in the Bite that only a dragon can clear. And then our envoys must reach southwards – there is Daenerys, and Aegon. We must ensure an alliance with at least one of them.”

His eyes narrowed, hands clenched. A flash of anger flickered over his features. “I am not asking you to do anything I wouldn’t,” Sansa added. “I am prepared to betroth myself to Aegon Targaryen to secure an alliance with him as well.”

He scoffed. “You remember what happened the last time a Targaryen took a northern daughter?”

“Jon, that’s unfair…”

“There is bad blood between us and House Targaryen, and yet your plan is to marry two of them?”

“My plan is to secure aid,” she argued. “We cannot last like this.”

“But how long will that take?” he snapped. “The longer the Others roam, the larger their army becomes. I have seen their army, you have not.”

His voice was growing too loud, too agitated. Perhaps this was a bad time to have this discussion, Sansa admitted. Still, she stepped forward, glaring up at him and lowered her voice to a breathy whisper.

“Think of Robb, Jon,” she hissed. “Robb fought all of his battles too.”

His gaze darkened. They were attracting too much attention standing in the middle of the hall, Sansa could see people staring. With a grimace, Sansa wrapped her arm around Jon’s and urged him to keep on walking, side by side.

“Robb was too focused on the battle in front of him as well,” Sansa whispered. “Robb never sought out alliances either. Just think, where might we be now if he had reached out – not only to his aunt, but to all the Vale houses, or to Highgarden, or even Dorne?”

“Sansa, it is not the same…”

“Oh, it is. Robb lost because he was too busy fighting those battles. Robb was too focused on the battle today; he did not prepare for the war tomorrow.” Jon did not reply. They turned a corner, walking towards the lord’s wing of the castle. “You said it yourself, Jon – the Others are unending. Their armies don’t eat, but ours do. They hardly even need to fight us; they could just sit outside our castles and wait until we starve. An alliance is the only thing that might stop that from happening.”

The very mention of Robb seemed to drain all the protest from him. He didn’t look happy with the thought, but he didn’t object either. The only sound was their footsteps as they walked down the gloomy corridor.

“We cannot make the same mistake,” Sansa said finally. “We cannot be like Robb.”

The sound of another pair of footsteps caused them both to twitch. Someone else was walking towards them, with slow and quiet steps. A shadow loomed in the flickering torchlight; a figure coming into focus. Sansa saw pale blond hair and blue eyes.

Lady Val of Whitetree was standing at the other end of the corridor, watching them without a word. Both Sansa and Jon froze under her gaze. Lady Val was a beautiful woman in the dark, Sansa considered, but it was only on a closer look that she saw the shadowed circles under her eyes and the gauntness to her cheeks. She wore a thick cloak wrapped around her even despite the warmth, and then Sansa saw the empty sleeve hanging from her shoulder.

Jon stopped instantly, meeting Val’s gaze. Sansa hadn’t known that the woman was walking about already.

Sansa looked between the both of them, reading the silence. Neither of them spoke, and the moment stretched outwards.

“I will leave you two alone,” Sansa offered, stepping backwards.

Jon nodded. His gaze lingered on Val’s missing arm.

Still, Sansa hesitated before she left. “The coronation will be soon, Jon,” Sansa added. “And then we are putting father’s bones to rest.”

He only nodded.

She turned and walked away, and then Jon stepped forward. Sansa left him alone on the corridor with Val, but just before she turned the corner Sansa saw him stepping forward to embrace her.

The hallways were stiff and uneasy. Sansa took a deep breath as she walked.

There was so much to do, so much to worry about but still… Rickon, Sansa thought. I have my baby brother again.

The entire castle was already awake – she doubted anyone could sleep through the dragon’s arrival. Sansa stepped out the way she came, and there was already a crowd milling in the hallway.

They were waiting for Jon, she knew. A few of them gazed at her, but the rest were waiting on word from the prince and dragonrider.

Lords, knights and envoys were pushing their way forward, a mumbling rising through the hall.

Sansa’s attention turned towards a tall and grey-haired man, with a slight frown on his face. Half of Ser Brynden’s face was hidden beneath his eyepatch, the other half looked concerned.

The Blackfish was staring at where Jon had disappeared. Sansa was curious about his reaction – the old knight must have seen them walking together. “So that is Jon Snow, is it?” Ser Brynden said finally, his voice a murmur.

“Yes.” She nodded as she stepped closer. “It is.”

“He looks little like his father.”
“The likeness has faded,” she admitted. “I will introduce you to him, ser, but that would be best saved for the morn.”

“Aye.” Ser Brynden paused distractedly. “This is my first time seeing Jon Snow in person. Oh, I’ve heard about him aplenty – south of the Neck, they whisper of him as if he were king of all Seven Hells. I expected someone taller.”

“I put little trust in talk, ser.”

“I do not trust him, Sansa.” The Blackfish shook his head warningly. “Your mother never trusted him.”

_Trust him?_ Sansa mused on that for a moment. It was a curious thought. “I know him, ser. I trust Jon’s intentions.”

“Cat told me once that Jon Snow threatened to steal Robb’s seat,” Ser Brynden said, with foulness in his voice. “Your mother had poor words concerning the bastard. When I heard of his ‘northern coalition’, I was certain that Cat had been proven right.”

“I am here now only because of him.” Sansa reminded. “Bran and Rickon are only here because of Jon too.”

The Blackfish didn’t object the point, but his eye didn’t relax either.

Yes, Sansa had heard similar things before. Ser Brynden had known of King Snow for months, but he had refused to travel north to serve him. Lord Reed had confided to Sansa that the Blackfish had once considered Jon Snow to be worse than the Boltons – it had only been news of Sansa and Bran that convinced Ser Brynden to change his mind and come to Winterfell.

Sansa paid no mind; she did not doubt her great-uncle’s commitment, and a little bit of suspicion was oft a healthy thing.

Ser Brynden had proven himself, regardless. Lord Reed was too infirm for battle, and in his stead the Blackfish was the one who led House Reed’s forces against Moat Cailin. The battle for Moat Cailin had been the final conflict in the Bolton war, against the last remnants of their Bolton supporters. The Blackfish had lost an eye to a Dustin bowman, as he scaled the Moat’s wall along with crannogmen under cover of darkness.

The princess stepped away, and then she noticed another familiar figure hovering by the staircase. Lord Reed was halfway up the stairs, clutching the bannister tightly.

The lord’s eyes were fixed on the lower level, on where Jon had disappeared. _He watched us arrive_, she realised, _he must have been staring at Jon._ Still, Sansa couldn’t even guess Lord Reed’s thoughts; his gaunt face was guarded, his green eyes were indecipherable to her.

Something about his gaze made Sansa look at him more closely. “My lord?” the princess called. “You look like you’ve seen a ghost.”

Lord Reed didn’t reply for some time. “I think I might have,” he muttered, so low she could barely hear.

Sansa paused, then chose to walk away.

She settled in for a long night. She didn’t even try to go back to sleep again; she knew she wouldn’t be able to.
Instead, she walked up to the royal tower, where Bran was left stirring anxiously in his quarters. Bran would have wanted to see Jon arrive too, Sansa knew, but the little king was trapped in his chamber without his litter and the escorts to carry him.

Bran’s face lit up when Sansa told him of Rickon. “It’s true,” she remembered saying, “Rickon is home.”

Bran wanted to see Rickon straight away, but Sansa had to urge him to wait until the morning. She could only hope Rickon would be in a more approachable mood after some rest.

During the final hours of the night, Sansa found herself dropped behind the chair in her study. There was a nearly complete missive addressed to King Aegon that Sansa had spent days writing with painstaking care. She was so tired she could have just dropped, but instead she settled over the parchment with her quill, determined to see the letter finished.

She would write the peace offer for King Aegon, and then Jon could fly south on his dragon to deliver it.

Across the castle, the morning light rose sluggishly.

As soon as she left, she saw Archmaester Marwyn waiting outside of the hallway of her chamber. The archmaester looked anxious. “Your Grace, concerning the dragon,” he said urgently, with no greetings, “You promised that I could further my research – if only I could have your permission to run a few tests on the dragon?”

“It is Prince Snow’s permission you need, not mine,” she replied curtly. “And the prince is distracted.”

“Your Grace, those cultists are allowed near the dragon.”

The cultists are the ones guarding it, Sansa thought to herself. Mother Mole and her Circle had all but fortified the godswood around the dragon’s roost and the heart tree. “It is Prince Snow’s right to decide who accesses his dragon.” Sansa’s eyes narrowed. “But you have other matters to attend to, archmaester. You promised that you could establish spells to protect against wraiths, did you not?”

“I did.” The man grimaced. “But such wards take time, it is not—”

“Well, you have a day,” Sansa ordered. “It will be Bran’s coronation shortly, and I would see the Great Hall secured against such beings. Then we may talk about Prince Snow’s dragon.”

Marwyn looked like he might have protested, but he chose to swallow the objection instead. He promised that he could draw runes on the walls that might help, and she watched as the stocky man shuffled away.

As he left, it occurred to Sansa that she was left with the quandary of how to test such a thing. How could they know if these ‘wards’ worked or not? Should they hope for a shadow to appear just to prove the archmaester’s words? It was a headache no matter how she viewed it. The uncertainty was torturous. Damnable magic.

Underneath her dress, Sansa kept two daggers strapped to her thigh. As a child, she would never have dreamt of keeping a concealed weapon, but recently she had realised the need. It was not ladylike to carry a blade, but it was comforting. The weight of the blades reminded her of her sister, sometimes.
The first weapon was the Valyrian steel dagger she had stolen from Littlefinger, and the second was a small weirwood stake. Protection against both white walkers and shadow assassins, she reasoned. In truth, she knew that both weapons would likely be useless against such threats – the shadow assassin had moved faster than a man could blink, she had been told – but it made her feel better to have some degree of control.

She left it until near noon before she went to go see Rickon. Sansa dressed herself properly, and approached hesitantly towards Rickon’s quarters. They had assigned him his former room, but Sansa knew the smell of other occupants still stained the bed. The guards kept the door locked; none but family were allowed to approach.

As she stepped through the chamber, she saw the mattress and sheets were torn and crumpled into a ball, but they hadn’t been slept on. The chamber was empty. For an instant, her heart leapt into her throat, and then she heard sniffling coming from somewhere. Rickon had crawled underneath the bed, she realised. The boy was hiding beneath it like a wolf in its den.

She took a deep breath as she lowered herself to her knees and bent onto the stone floor.

“Rickon?” she called gingerly. “Rickon, it’s me… Sansa. I’m your sister, do you not remember…?”

As she lowered herself down, she saw red, weeping eyes from the shadows. The boy seemed half-feral. She tried to urge him out from the bed, but then he snapped into shrieking curse words.

“Never break!” Rickon barked, writhing away from her. “Never break!”

He snapped the words like a curse, chanting them as he spat at her from the shadows under the bed. Never break. They are the words of House Magnar, Sansa realised slowly.

Sansa heard from the staff that they had tried to serve him a morning meal, but the prince had thrown the bowl of porridge into a serving girl’s face. As she lingered in his room, Sansa could hear quiet sobbing from underneath the bed frame.

By the time she finally stepped out of Rickon’s room, she was in a grim mood. She felt exhausted and lost. Sansa was left wondering how her mother would deal with such a tantrum. As a girl, she had seen Mother growing distraught over Arya’s rebellious behaviour, but she had never really understood what it felt like.

My mother. My family. Seeing Rickon again brought back so many raw feelings.

In the hallway, Ser Brynden was waiting anxiously. The tall knight gave a grimace as he saw her expression. “Your brother,” the Blackfish said finally. “Is he well?”

“He is… healthy.” Her voice was faint. Sansa cradled a circular scratch on her knuckles, where Rickon had bit her hand. His gummy teeth had even drawn a dribble of blood.

“I heard that the boy was distraught,” Ser Brynden admitted. “He has been through a lot.”

We all have, Sansa could have replied. She kept silent instead.

The Blackfish hesitated. “If you want, perhaps I could try to reach him?” he offered. “Mayhaps a man’s voice might–?”

“No.” Sansa shook her head, and then reached a decision. “Allow my brother space for now. Forgive me, ser, but we must hold Bran’s coronation soon. This afternoon, if we can manage it.
May you inform Lord Reed?"

The knight paused, and then bowed. Sansa was already striding forward. She forced herself to focus on matters she could deal with.

With a few words, the preparations for the coronation were in full swing. The crowning ceremony had been planned days ago, but placed on indefinite hold until Jon returned. Sansa knew that Jon was intent on flying off quickly, and she could not miss this chance again.

There was no time to waste.

The guests were already in Winterfell, she needed to gather them. She needed to ensure the guards were alert and the keep was secured. She could not allow the cultists to make another mess of the proceedings, she had to make sure everyone had their role.

Originally, she had intended for it to be Lord Manderly who would place the crown on Bran’s head, but Sansa was more inclined to grant the honour to Lord Reed. The Greatjon was still not well-enough to stand, but he was at least stable enough to be carried to the hall. The Lords Manderly, Umber and Reed represented the strongest of House Stark’s supporters, they all needed to be present.

Meanwhile, Tormund Giantsbane, the Weeper, and that insufferable witch woman would head up the free folk clans. It was a headache just to imagine the northern lords on one side and the wildlings on the other.

And the guards, she mentally added. The last time there had been a congregation of important figures, that shadow assassin had appeared. Sansa couldn’t allow the same to happen again. She ordered that every guard in the hall would be readied with both weirwood and obsidian weapons.

Quickly, the entire afternoon was consumed by activity and preparations. They could not hold a coronation today, but Sansa was determined to see it next morning.

She wanted Rickon to attend, but it seemed certain that the child would only make a scene. He would be left to his room.

In her chambers, the crown of white silver and weirwood rested atop her cabinet. She held it for a time, tracing her fingers along the patterns. It wasn’t Robb’s crown, regrettably – as far as anyone knew, that crown of bronze and black iron had been lost at the Red Wedding – but this would serve, she supposed. It certainly looked the part. Previously, Sansa had kept the crown hidden in an old dress at the back of her closet so that none would steal it.

As night fell, Sansa and Wynafryd were left sorting out clothes to wear. A velvet dress with a white bear fur shawl for her, while Wynafryd preferred to wear wool and silk, with a sealskin cloak. She even spent time picking out Jon’s and Bran’s clothes; a shadowskin cloak and a fine mink tunic for Jon to make him seem civilised, while Bran would wear a thick wolfhide cloak to make the boy look larger and older on the throne.

It was easier to distract herself with such things, rather than obsess over problems she never knew how to solve.

Her guards relayed messages to and from her ear. Jon had removed himself to his quarters along with Val, and many who wanted the prince’s attention were instead trying to go through her. Marwyn continually pestered her about the dragon, while Lord Manderly insisted on having Jon address an assembly. Salladhor Saan vehemently wanted a meeting with the dragonlord, the emissary from the Iron Bank knocked thrice looking for Prince Snow, and even Lord Reed sought a meeting. Sansa ordered her guards to tell all comers that Jon was preoccupied.

It was only at dusk that Sansa realised she hadn’t even seen Jon all day. Sansa herself kept uneven sleeping patterns – she half-expected him to find her during the night, but he didn’t.

As the next morning approached, she was shaken from a short snooze by the sound of bells ringing. It was official; the coronation of Brandon Stark would be held today.

Sansa could stand on the balcony and watch the crowd of guests all milling towards the great hall. She idly paused, trying to recognise the highborn from their outlines. She saw Lord Wyman Manderly struggling up the steps, his granddaughters by his side, and then she saw the litter as men-at-arms carried the Greatjon Umber into the hall. Lord Salladhor Saan was unmistakable – the pirate was still wearing his wide brimmed hat. Then there was Ser Ian Poole, Lyra Mormont, Lord Rickon Holt, Lord Bennard Waterman, Lord Norvel Mollen, Lord Alger Bole, Lord Werrick Cray and his wife…

Others walked hesitantly, Sansa could almost see their nerves even from balcony. Sansa watched as she recognised saw Robin Flint escorting his portly and grey-haired mother Lady Lyessa through the doors. Lady Sybelle Glover walked with her two sons, Garen Glover, the six year old Master of Deepwood Motte, and her babe Erena Glover. Young and dark-haired Lady Alys Karstark walked alone. The two Tallhart boys, Beren and Brandon, had no family left – they had to be escorted by a man-at-arms.

_Widows and orphans_, Sansa considered. This war had left a lot of each.

There was much to do, but Sansa’s head had been aching all morning. She distracted herself for a time, trying to name the figures and which loyalty they had held. A good bunch of the guests had previously supported House Bolton, before they bent the knee; there was Arthur Karstark, Barthogan Rose, Lord Harwood Stout, Ser Kyle Condon, Lord Edric Ryder, Rickard and Roose Ryswell…

Sansa sighed, rubbing her brow. She could feel the stress of a hundred different concerns wearing to her. She needed to drink half a goblet of wine, just to calm herself…

In the distance, Sansa saw the dragon bursting from the godswood, to soar over the fields of Winterfell.

She took a deep breath.

Sansa ordered the serving staff to bring the prince his outfit for the ceremony, but then they reported that his chamber was empty. She frowned. “Where has Prince Snow gone?” the princess demanded.

The woman couldn’t reply. Sansa assigned her guards to find him.

It was the early hours of the morn, there were a thousand things she had to see to, and her guards were already rushing to find the prince.

Then, Lord Gregor reported that Prince Snow had been spotted heading to the First Keep, and Sansa understood. The Captain of the Guard offered to summon him for her, but Sansa shook her head and instead walked to meet him.

He had gone to see their father’s tomb.
All around her, the yards were hectic as Sansa paced over the grounds towards the oldest section of the castle. The worn gargoyles of the First Keep loomed at her.

Even despite herself, she felt uneasy – the large ironwood door heading downwards from the lichyard had always made Sansa twitch. As children, Arya and Jon had once played games around the crypts, but Sansa had never joined in. She ordered her escorts to wait outside, and she took a lantern from the wall. The stone staircase winding downwards felt confined and stuffy, she was already sweating.

Most of the unnatural heat had faded away on the surface, but underground it still felt warm. The hot air wafting up from the tunnels made her think of a dragon’s breath.

It was dark, but she heard her footsteps echoing. They had always told her that the vaults below were larger than Winterfell itself, but Sansa had never explored them. The lowest levels were partially collapsed, and other corridors had never been walked in decades. Two stone direwolves stood guard as the passageway opened up into a great cavern – the darkness so thick it threatened to snuff out her torchlight.

A shiver went down her spine as she walked between the rows of stone columns. She could barely name half of them. The stone eyes of Kings Jon Stark, Rickard, Eyron, Theon the Hungry Wolf, Edric Snowbeard, Brandon the Shipwright, Brandon the Burner, Rodrik, Jorah and Jonos, Benjen the Sweet, Benjen the Bitter, Walton the Moon King, Brandon the Bad, and Edwyn the Spring King lingered on her as she passed. Whether aged or younger, the statues were all grim and silent, with stony clothes and armour that made them seemed dressed for war. Their crowns were stone, and their eyes were cold.

The Lords of Winterfell had a different look to them than the Winter Kings, she noticed. Their faces seemed sterner, more focused. Lords Torrhen, Cregan, Brandon, Barth, Jonnel, Rodwell, Beron, Donnor, William and his brother Artos the Implacable, and Edwyle. Their statues stood sentinel, some gripping iron swords tightly, others whose hands marred red with rust.

There was torchlight ahead, where the passageway branched. The final tombs in the crypt – those of Rickard, Lyanna, Brandon and Eddard Stark.

Then, Sansa saw the statue of Lyanna Stark standing in her enclave. The moisture in the warm air glistened over the surface, as if her stone face was weeping. Father had always averted his eyes when walking down here, Sansa remembered.

Ahead of her, there were only empty tunnels reserved for future generations of her family. That was an uneasy thought.

Jon was standing before their father’s bones, his head lowered. He heard her footsteps, but didn’t turn around. She walked slowly and quietly, but even a pin’s drop would echo in these tunnels.

Eddard Stark did not have a proper tomb yet. They had carved her father’s likeness into a statue years ago – but there had been no bones to bury back then. Father had nothing but a statue and a place reserved, while his bones were still lying in a steel box tucked into a corner. Years late, but maybe we might finally put him to rest.

Sansa hadn’t opened the box that Howland Reed brought with him. After so long, a part of her wondered if the bones might have just withered away into dust.

Sansa’s gaze lingered on their father’s statue. A stonemason must have carved it during the brief time Bran sat in Winterfell, before the sack. It didn’t look like Father to her, but for the life of her she could not even remember what he had looked like. She could visualise his smile, his warmth, his eyes, his smell, but not him.

Jon’s gaze was on the box of bones. She stepped forward.

“Sansa,” Jon called, without turning around. “I heard the bells. Am I late?”

“No.” She spoke low in the crypts, keeping her voice to a murmur. It seemed sacrilegious to raise her voice in this place. “The guests are still gathering.”

“Forgive me, I lost track of time.”

“I understand.” She looked at the box, sealed with a lock and an iron direwolf. “I come here often myself.”

There was a long silence. Sansa took her place next to her half-brother, facing the unbuilt tomb. Her brother’s eyes were only on the craggy features of the statue looming over them. Sansa looked away, she found herself staring at that box.

It was a small box. Hard to imagine a fully-grown man fitting in there.

But then Sansa remembered the sound of the sword swinging downwards, the roar of the crowd before the Sept of Baelor. She hadn’t seen the cut at the time – she had closed her eyes and turned away – but in her mind’s eye there had been a vivid gush of blood spurting out from the open wound.

The thought made her twitch. Vaguely, she wondered what Jon thought of when he looked at the box. Just what were his last memories of their father?

“What do you think he would say if he saw us now?” Jon whispered finally, his voice barely breaking the silence.

“I… I honestly can’t even imagine,” she admitted honestly. So much time had passed since they’d left Winterfell all those years ago, they were both like different people now. Her father would be a stranger to her. She paused, glanced at him. “How do you think he’d react?”

Jon shrugged. “Angrily, most like.”

That answer gave her pause. “At you?”

He hesitated. Her brother opened his mouth, looked like he was about to say something, and then he paused, closing his mouth. It was a while before he finally spoke.

“I did what I needed to do,” he eventually said, speaking lowly. “There’s much that I wish I could have done better, but wishing won’t change a thing.”

That didn’t quite answer the question, Sansa noted, but she made silent note of it, letting the comment pass.

Neither of them spoke after. Sansa hesitated, and her fingers twitched. Then after a timeless moment, Sansa reached out her hand, and Jon took it without a word. Their fingers wrapped together. His skin felt callused and rough, but warm.

They stood together, side by side, holding hands before their father’s grave.

Suddenly, she heard footsteps. Uneven feet pattered over the stone floor, broken by the tap of a walking stick. Jon flinched with the sound and turned around, breaking the grip with her hand, but Sansa recognised the sound, the familiar gait. The sound of wheezy breaths snorted through the air.

“Lord Reed?” Sansa called, and her voice echoed – “Reed, reed, reed…”

The short lord was approaching, limping on his cane. Even the walk down the staircase had left him panting for breath, struggling to breathe in the musty air. He looked between the both of them, and then hesitated. “Your Grace,” he gasped. “Am I intruding?”

The sight of the lord surprised her, and Jon’s gaze flickered back to her. “No,” she replied after a pause, “you were father’s friend, you deserve to be here too.”

Jon took a slow step forward, extending a hand. “Lord Howland Reed, I hear?”

The lord nodded. “It is good to finally meet you, Prince Snow.”

“Likewise.” They shared a somewhat uncertain handshake. There was a pause, as if both were sizing the other’s grip. “I have heard of much of you, my lord. Bran speaks fondly of your daughter.”

“As does Meera of him.” Lord Reed’s eyes lingered over Jon, his face guarded.

“And I hear that you are to be named as Bran’s regent?”

“So I’m told.” Lord Reed gave a humourless smile. “I shall say the same thing I told your sister; I will do what I must. If I can aid by serving as regent, then I will.”

Sansa found that she quite liked Lord Reed. They had spoken at length with each other over the last few days, especially about dealing with the south. The lord had been reluctant to be regent, which made Sansa all the more convinced he would be a decent one. Lord Reed had a calm demeanour, and a thoughtful presence.

“I understand,” Jon said with a nod. His gaze flickered back to their father’s stone face. “You have my thanks for bringing my father’s bones home.”

“None required. I owe Ned much and more. I always will.” Lord Reed kept himself composed, but Sansa noted something queer in his voice. He was staring at Jon, his eyes unusually intent.

Lord Reed cleared his throat, and the musty air was broken by coughing. “I owe a debt to you as well, Prince Snow.” Lord Reed said after a long moment, turning back to Jon. “My son, Jojen.”

“Ah.” Jon looked momentarily perturbed. “I heard of him. Bran told me that he was missing.”

“Missing, but not lost.” Lord Reed nodded. “Jojen was found by the Night’s Watch, although none knew who he was,” he explained. “My son was there at the Battle of the Wall, and then he fled among the refugees. He remembers seeing you, in fact. He was among the refugees fleeing to Winterfell, my guards found him coming through the gates.”

Jon blinked. “I did not know that.”

“I understand,” Lord Reed wheezed, his voice dry, almost a rasp. “But you have my gratitude nonetheless. The refugees only escaped the battle thanks to your actions. If not for your relief force, I very much doubt that my son would be alive right now.”

“That battle… it was a hard one.”
“Oh, I’m well aware. I’ve spoken to men who followed you, and they all say the same – they say that you were the very first into battle and the last to fall. There were a thousand men behind you, but none fought harder.” He lowered his head fractionally, in a slight bow. “I know of the threat to the realm, Your Grace – and I know that you are fighting against it.”

The prince seemed taken back at the comment. “That… that is good to hear.”

Lord Reed’s voice was quiet and solemn. He stood with his arms crossed, leaving a respectful distance between himself and Jon and Sansa.

Her gaze passed between the two of them. Lord Reed broke away from Jon and limped forward into the crypts. He turned in the chamber, looking between Brandon’s and Lyanna’s tombs. “The last time I stood here,” Lord Reed mused, “was when they put Lyanna’s bones to rest. Gods, eighteen years ago.”

“Has it changed much?” Sansa asked.

“Unfortunately, yes.” He gave a hoarse sigh, and his deep green eyes turned to linger over their father’s statue. “I never wanted to come back here.”

Neither of them spoke. The crypts were entirely silent, and yet it still felt too loud.

Finally, Sansa felt the need to say something, to fill the gloom of the crypts. “He would have wanted to be here.” Her voice was low. “Next to his father, his brother and sister.”

“And Robb,” Jon added. “We must build a tomb for Robb too.”

Sansa paused. She hadn’t thought of that, she hadn’t wanted to. “Do we have Robb’s bones?”

“No,” Jon replied darkly. “I don’t know what Walder Frey did with them. Robb’s remains are lost.” For a moment, Jon paused, his eyes going distant. She noticed his fist clenching. “As are Benjen’s, and Arya’s.”

Her lips pursed. “And my mother’s.” Sansa’s voice was a whisper. They would need to carve an empty tomb for Catelyn Stark too.

“There are no bones in Brandon’s or Rickard’s crypts either,” Lord Reed said suddenly, pointing towards the two tombs. “Those coffins are empty.”

Sansa glanced at him. “Truly?”

“Oh yes. Ned had them commissioned in remembrance. The Mad King never surrendered their remains, but the wildfire would have left little behind regardless.” Sansa noticed Lord Reed’s eyes flicker. “Lyanna was the only one we managed to return after the Rebellion.”

“I did not know that,” she admitted. Father never told me.

“It happens.” Lord Reed nodded. “We do not always get to say our goodbyes so properly. This place,” he nodded towards the shadows, “it’s more for remembrance. So many Starks have died in battle through the ages, I’d be surprised if half these tombs were filled.”

Moments passed. Jon looked to Lord Reed curiously. “You fought against the Targaryens once,” Jon noted finally. “Did you ever imagine that my father’s children would be considering a betrothal to them?”
Lord Reed went silent for a long time. “I have long since stopped being able to guess the future, Your Grace,” he said finally.

The only sound was the whisper of the flames. The silence grew agonising.

“Jon, we should go,” Sansa said eventually. “The ceremony awaits, there is still preparation to be done. We do not want to be late.” We have lingered long enough.

“Aye.” Jon nodded, and turned. “It was good to meet you, Lord Reed.”

Sansa turned to leave, and Jon followed, but then Lord Reed grimaced. He kept on glancing back towards Jon. “Your Grace, if you have a moment…”

“My lord?” Jon frowned. They both stopped.

“I have wanted a chance…” Lord Reed sounded hesitant, unsure.

“What is it, my lord?”

“Well, you mentioned the Targaryens, and I know of your intentions towards Daenerys Targaryen. It feels important to ask…” Lord Reed said with the utmost caution. “May I ask, how much do you know of the Rebellion?”

“Enough,” Jon said with a nod. “I’ve heard of it all my life – I was born during it.”

“How much did your father tell you?” His voice was probing, uncertain. Sansa frowned. What is he asking? Sansa wondered. Lord Reed had been acting strangely around Jon this whole time.

“He told me what happened, how it started. The Mad King demanded father’s head, and Arryn, Stark and Baratheon replied with defiance. Father went to war to avenge his brother and father, and to rescue his sister.”

“Lyanna.” Lord Reed nodded. “Did he ever tell you of her?”

“Little,” Jon admitted. “Father did not like to speak of her.”

“He told us some.” Sansa nodded. “He said that she was very beautiful, strong-willed, kind.” They said she was like Arya.

“That she was,” Lord Reed agreed. “Lyanna was fierce and determined, none could deny that. I met her at Harrenhal, a lifetime ago. She was the one to introduce me to your father.” He took a deep, wheezy breath. His strained breaths slurred his words as he spoke. “I had a fancy for her once. Oh, it was but a foolish child’s admiration, but Lyanna often had that effect. I think that half of Harrenhal was smitten on her, the other half on Ashara. Robert went through a woman a week, but with Lyanna he was smitten and speechless – not that she ever gave him a second glance.” He sighed. “If Lyanna had asked me to run off with her, well, I doubt that I could have refused.”

Run off. That was a queer thing to say, the choice of phrase made Sansa frown. “‘Run off’?” Sansa repeated. “She was kidnapped?”

Howland Reed pursed his lips. “That… that is not wholly accurate, Your Grace,” he admitted. “It was a simplification, a convenient half-truth to tell after the rebellion. Tempers were still high, and to call it kidnap allowed blame to be assigned more easily.”

Sansa had to stop to process that statement. Next to her, Jon had a slight frown on his face.
“Rhaegar did not steal her?”

“Not at first.” Lord Reed shook his head. “It was very hard to prove anything, but I strongly suspect that Rhaegar and Lyanna eloped together. Many others suspected the same.”

“That…” Sansa hesitated, processing the statement. “I did not know that.”

“It was not oft spoken. Some things were best left forgotten after the war,” Lord Reed admitted. “But as you now intend to ally, even betroth with the Targaryens, I feel it is important to tell you this.”

“Please.” Sansa crossed her arms. “Do.”

The lord seemed uncharacteristically on-edge. He wanted to say something, Sansa realised. Lord Reed’s eyes lingered on her, but he kept glancing to Jon.

“Lyanna was young and defiant, Rhaegar dashing and charming,” he explained uneasily. “They collided at the tourney at Harrenhal. I suppose it could be called love at first sight. Or perhaps Lyanna just wanted to escape her betrothal, perhaps Rhaegar just wanted to leave his wife – but they abandoned the world and left the riverlands together. Lyanna chose not to return north, Rhaegar did not go back to the capital. I know of no evidence of duress.” There was a pause. “They were… they were in love.”

Truly? Sansa thought. That surprised her, but she did not think Lord Reed was one to lie. Next to her, Jon’s frown deepened. “I heard that Rhaegar was a monster,” he said. “That he raped and stole Lyanna – the Targaryen’s madness.”

“The Targaryen’s madness.” Lord Reed’s eyes lingered on her. “Some matters are too easily obscured, Your Grace. At the war’s end, there was a…. bias to paint history a certain colour.”

Sansa turned towards Lyanna’s statue, cold and still. The air in the crypts felt suffocating. “It was only afterwards,” Lord Reed continued, “that matters grew more dire.”

“When Rhaegar’s father murdered Lyanna’s father and brother,” Jon noted.

“Quite,” he explained. “After that deed, Lyanna wanted to leave. She wanted to return home. But Rhaegar did not allow her, he instead had her confined and removed in secret.”

“Why did he do that?” Sansa asked lowly. A slow feeling of despair washed over her. She had not known any of this.

“As a hostage? To keep her protected?” Lord Reed shook his head. “To Rhaegar’s mind, Lyanna’s entire family were rebels, and she was important. He secluded her and kept her in secret, even from his own family. Perhaps he feared that Aerys would execute her himself? I cannot speak to Rhaegar’s motives, but to Lyanna it was imprisonment. Lyanna always hated being controlled.”

“When Ned and I arrived at the Tower of Joy,” he continued dourly, “we met the last of the Targaryen Kingsguard. Ser Arthur, Oswell, Gerold… they were always more loyal to Rhaegar than to their liege. He ordered them to keep Lyanna under lock and key. When we finally reached her, her fingernails were torn and bloody – she had been scratching and screaming at the door, trying to escape.” His voice grew sad and silent. “Lyanna’s tale was a whirlwind love with a bitter ending.”

The statement was met by a hush.

Sansa was the first to speak. “I… I did not know that.”
“Tis a painful memory. I understand why Ned did not wish to speak of it.” He hesitated, still looking at Jon. “But are you sure your father never mentioned this? What happened at Harrenhal or afterwards?”

“He did not,” Jon replied.

“I see.” Lord Reed’s mouth curled.

There was more silence. Sansa inspected the lord, trying to read his expression. He kept himself too guarded, but he still seemed conflicted. Why is he bringing this up? Sansa wondered. Is this due to our offer of alliance?

“You talk about Rhaegar almost kindly, my lord.” Sansa noted. “He was Daenerys’ brother, supposedly this Aegon’s father? I heard that Robert used to curse his name.”

“Rhaegar… he was complicated.” Howland Reed sighed. “I have had eighteen years to find peace with what happened, and yet I have found little.” He leaned backwards, resting fractionally atop the dusty tomb of Rickard. “The tourney at Harrenhal was where it all began.”

In his quiet, wheezy voice, Howland Reed started to speak of Harrenhal. He described a great feast and festivity, of a thousand banners and knights stretching as far as the eye could see. It had been the greatest tourney of its time. There was a sense of wonder in his voice as he described it.

The lord had a presence that seemed to fill the crypts with quiet. Sansa and Jon only listened.

“I first met Lyanna as she chased off three attackers with a wooden sword,” he explained softly. “I was attacked by three squires that targeted me for my queer dress as I travelled. She took me to her tent to bandage my wounds, and introduced me to her brothers. Brandon had to restrain her from hunting down the miscreants that assaulted me. I was but a crannogman so far out of my element, but Lyanna still danced with me during the feast. Every highborn son and daughter of the realm, lords and princes alike, they were all in attendance in the feast. Your father was too nervous to ask – Brandon had to convince Ashara Dayne to dance with Ned, but your father was a shy man in those days. Brandon took the next dance. I remember Prince Oberyn playing knife games over the table, Robert drank three great lords under the table, and then Prince Rhaegar sang a song so beautiful that Lyanna wept.

“The day afterwards, your uncle offered me a spare suit of armour and a horse for the tourney, to avenge myself on my attackers. I would have only made a fool of myself, but Lyanna overheard.” He shook his head. “She chose to join the jousts herself, as a mystery knight – ‘the Knight of the Laughing Tree’, she called herself. She muffled her voice with a scarf, and challenged the knights of the squires that attacked me.”

Sansa raised her eyebrow. Despite himself, a fond smile lingered on Lord Reed’s lips with the memory. A childish fancy, he had phrased it.

“Lyanna bested three different knights in her guise, and then disappeared mid-tourney,” the lord continued. “It was quite a stir. Aerys likely believed it to be part of some conspiracy or another – he ordered the crown prince to chase the mystery knight.”

Lord Reed took a deep breath. “And that was how Rhaegar and Lyanna met,” he explained, with a twitch in his weedy voice. “Rhaegar was going to tell the king of her, but Lyanna challenged him to a duel for his silence. They sparred with each other, Lyanna still clad in her mismatched armour. Lyanna won. Rhaegar lied to his father and told the king he never found her. They were both entranced with each other after that.”
“And then Rhaegar won the tourney,” Sansa muttered, “and crowned her queen of love and beauty.”

“He did.” His voice turned sad.

Sansa had never heard the way he described it before… in her mind’s eye, she saw two young and vibrant youths entranced with each other. Romantic, even. Like a story from a song.

That made it all the more painful to look back at Lyanna’s statue – to see that lifeless stone standing so cold and stiff. Sansa wished she could have met her.

The memories seemed to weigh heavily on Lord Reed’s words. Perhaps it was the crypts and the tombs, making them all feel overly melancholic.

Next to her, Jon had his arms folded. “Why are you telling us this, my lord?” Jon said, with something of suspicion in his voice.

“Because I feel like you should know,” the lord replied.

In the distance, they heard a muted chime echoing through the ground. The bells of Winterfell. The coronation. The sound shook Sansa from her reverie – they were going to be late. “Jon,” Sansa said finally. “We must leave.”

“All right,” Lord Reed mumbled, but still he seemed reluctant to leave things like that. “But… Jon, may I have a word?” Lord Reed asked, with an uncomfortable look towards Sansa. “In private?”

There was an unspoken flicker between them. Jon hesitated, glancing at Sansa standing by the exit. “Anything you can say to me,” Jon replied coolly, “you can say before my sister too, my lord.”

“We’re going to be late,” Sansa warned.

“This will only take a moment, I think I need to…” Lord Reed grimaced. “It is… personal.”

Jon smiled humourlessly. “Is this about my mother?”

Lord Reed looked shocked. Sansa blinked.

“I guessed from all the talk of Harrenhal,” Jon admitted. “You were my father’s companion in Dorne, you must have been with him at Starfall.” Lord Reed hesitated. “You were there when he brought me north?”

“I… I was.” He seemed put off-guard by this sudden turn of the conversation.

“I understand why you are so cautious, my lord.” Jon nodded. “But I already know of the rumours. My mother was Ashara Dayne.”

Lord Reed paused, and blinked. “… Ah.”

Sansa frowned. “Truly?”

He nodded again. “They met at Harrenhal, out of wedlock,” Jon explained simply. “He must have been taken with Ashara. And I was born later in the middle of the war.” Jon looked at Lord Reed, who fell silent. “And I am guessing that House Dayne has some distant Valyrian blood somewhere? I have heard the Daynes oft bear silver hair.”
Sansa was left confused, but Jon said it so straightforwardly. “I never heard that.” I heard of the fisherman’s daughter. Was Lord Borrell mistaken?

Jon only shrugged. “My mother is unimportant. I’ve long since stopped caring for her. It does not change who I am, or what must be done.”

Lord Reed only hesitated. For one painful moment, he looked torn.

“Your mother…” Lord Reed cleared his throat. “Ashara Dayne was pregnant, but it was not with Ned’s child. Ned only danced with Ashara, as did a dozen others. It was Brandon who took her to bed after the feast.”

There was no reply. Jon frowned.

“But after the fall of King’s Landing,” Howland Reed continued, “we met with Ashara again. We found her hiding amongst those taking shelter from the sack. Ned promised her safe passage to Dorne. Robert was on the warpath hunting down the last of the loyalists. She was scared for her family’s life.” His quiet voice grew pained. “Ashara revealed to us in confidence where Lyanna and the last of the Kingsguard were hiding – she was the one to point us to the Tower of Joy. Ashara trusted Ned, you see – she believed that we could reason with her brother Arthur before Robert found them, that perhaps we could convince Ser Arthur to surrender.

“But instead, we arrived at the Tower of Joy and there was no reasoning with them. We were forced to kill him.” Howland sighed grimly. “Ashara blamed herself for her brother’s death. In grief, Ashara Dayne jumped from the tower at Starfall, with her baby in her arms.”

Jon blinked. Sansa looked to her half-brother. Perhaps Lord Reed was waiting for Jon to ask the question, but he didn’t. Jon didn’t speak, he just went quiet.

“It was Ned who carried you to Starfall, Jon. You were born at the Tower of Joy.”

“That doesn’t make sense,” Jon’s voice was a mumble. “How could…?”

The air went still.

The moments in the crypts turned tense. In the distance, they heard the bells ringing. Lord Reed’s soft voice sounded like a confession.

“Ned swore me to secrecy,” the lord admitted. “That is a vow I have just broken. Ned loved you like a father and he only ever wanted you to be happy. He believed that the truth would only bring you pain.”

It took a few seconds for the realisation to drip over her. For her to finally connect the dots. She stared in dumb shock as she realised what he was saying.

Jon was born at the Tower of Joy. But that means…

“Your mother, Jon,” Lord Reed continued, “was not Ashara Dayne. That was simply a convenient lie that your father and Lord Dayne let spread, one that neither of them denied or acknowledged. The whole realm knew she was pregnant, most simply assumed. Your true mother lies in the tomb over there.”

He was pointing behind them. At the frozen statue of Lyanna. The statue’s arms were crossed. The stone woman had never looked so mournful.
Silence reigned. Perhaps Lord Reed was waiting for a reply. Jon gave none.

“I am telling you this now because of the words of that woods witch,” Lord Reed admitted, as the silence stretched uncomfortably long. “I swore that I would take this secret to my grave, but Ned could not have known these circumstances. I feel you need to know.”

“The woods witch?” Sansa muttered mutely.

He nodded. “That night… the things she said. That woman knew of the vow that I made. I can only assume that whatever magics she used revealed it.” Lord Reed grimaced. “And I did not want you to learn of your parentage from a biased source, Jon. I want you to know the full truth, and nothing less.”

Sansa remembered that night. The witch – Mother Mole – had been covered in blood, raving in the dark. She had mentioned something of an oath, of red sands? Sansa hadn’t understood what it had meant at the time, but Lord Reed clearly had been disturbed by the words. Secrets she could not have known, Sansa realised.

Unsure, Sansa glanced to Jon, but his face was like stone. He didn’t look at her, he didn’t respond. All around them, the stone statues and direwolves loomed in the torchlight.

Lord Reed took a deep, uneven breath. “Jon, you are the son of Rhaegar Targaryen and Lyanna Stark.”

Chapter End Notes

The next chapter will be an epilogue and an appendix.

After that (chapter 52), will be the start of Book 2: Fire…

There are three kings in Westeros, and one queen. Queen Daenerys Targaryen sails her fleet west to reclaim her birthright and to liberate her people. The enemies she expected to face are vanquished, and Aegon Targaryen, Jon Snow and Euron Greyjoy each have intentions of their own concerning her. She arrives with a legion of former slaves and a horde of savages, all following Daenerys on the promise of safety and freedom - but there is little of either to be had in the west.

This kingdom has been broken by war, and dark forces plague on the living. The old magics are returning, ancient powers are awakened, and the Seven Kingdoms faces a Doom like nothing they have ever seen before.

Prince Jon Snow must fight to secure desperately needed aid for his newfound kingdom, yet the God-King Euron Greyjoy stands in his path.

Meanwhile, Lord Commander Samwell Tarly must try to hold a broken barrier against an unbeatable and never-ending enemy. The Wall is breached, and winter is here.

The battle of ice and fire looms ever closer.
The cage was forged from gold and magic, the chains from silver and blood. Rubies glinted in the metal of the slave collar, and the chains were fastened securely to the granite of the mountain. Great claws clenched, scraping over the mosaic tiles lining the gilded cage. The red dragon growled, stirring uselessly against its bonds.

The cage was as large as a castle, but it still barely fit the dragon. There was no space to move, no slack to struggle or even squirm against. Leg and claw, snout and wing, neck and tail – the great beast’s every muscle was bound in chains of spellforged silver. It was barely even able to breathe through its gilded muzzle. The dragon was bound like a worm, given not even the slightest chance to struggle. All it could do was slowly scrape its horns against the golden bars, while the shining metal hissed against its scales. The dragon was bound by enchantment after enchantment of blood and fire, each one foul and horrible.

The dragon’s scales shone crimson in the morning light. It could feel nothing but pure rage. Its black eyes stared unblinking over at the fine marble plaza housing its cage, built into the side of a mountain so high that it loomed over the lowermost clouds. A ‘stable’, the slavers called it. In the distance, other dragons were soaring over the surrounding mountains, and it could see black stone buildings and archways scattered over the jagged landscape. Down in the valleys below there were overcrowded slums filled with humans, but the mountain peaks were dominated by huge palaces, built from solid black or crystal white stone.

It had been trapped here for what felt like a lifetime. A low hatred drummed unending in its chest as the dragon stared at the world beyond the golden bars.

“A beautiful beast, don’t you think?” a smooth, almost liquid voice laughed. Footsteps tapped over the courtyard, coming ever closer. “My finest.”

Beady black eyes flicked, and the dragon saw them. They were silver-haired men with pale skin and violet eyes, looking down from the terrace above. They scuttled around like insects that the dragon longed to crush. They were walking along the shaped marble pavilion, laughing as they talked, sipping wine from golden goblets. The stink of their perfume burned the dragon’s nostrils.

“He’s a wild dragon, is he not?”

“Oh yes, my father was the one to capture him,” the voice replied, in that infuriating high-pitched human chirping. “Older now, but he’s never lost his fire.”

“I have never trusted the wild stock.” The other man turned his nose up. “They are too unstable.”

“Unstable?” His partner laughed. “Try ferocious. In the last championship games, he brought down Prince Aeragon’s mount – and that dragon was nigh twice his size. I’ve never known a beast with half as much fury as this one.”

The pale man stepped closer, fearlessly staring over the mountainous red dragon, so close that his hand hovered over the dragon’s red scales. He was a weedy, tall figure – with a slim build, slicked back silver hair, and a hooked nose, wearing white and red robes. His purple eyes were narrowed and shadowed.

The dragon’s blood boiled with hatred. A small gust of smoke billowed from its nostrils, but the silver-haired man only smiled.

“Ivaryx,” the slaver whispered.

The red dragon wanted to roar, to flame, but then there was pain burning across its scales. The enchantments upon its ruby collar started to burn. The metal contracted, clenching around its throat. The beast tensed, but it wasn’t even allowed to twitch in pain. It could not crush these bugs, even though every instinct in its body was screaming to destroy.

The other man only laughed. “You named your dragon after the god of war?”

“If you saw its rage, you would too.”

“You’re as bad as Gaemon, Alexys,” the other silvery man said snidely. “He has no creativity in his names, either. I mean, Balerion? What a clichéd name – I swear that half the dragons on the lists are named after some god or another.”

“It is often done.” The slaver shrugged. “Our gods are defunct, but their names are still decent.”

“I for one would never buy a dragon named such.”

“As if you could ever afford to purchase a dragon such as this,” the man snorted with derision. “This cage alone is more than you could ever hope to own. Ivaryx requires more bindings than any other dragon in this realm.”

Dragonlords, these fools called themselves. Dragon slavers. The red dragon despised them with a fury like none it had ever known. It hated even the unnatural stink of their blood, the sound of their voices.

And yet still they were standing before it, pointing and chattering.

Its slavemaster placed a hand on its snout. The red dragon longed to bite it off.

The two men were laughing, teasing each other as they paced idly around the dragon’s cage. Their tiny yet shrill voices ached the red dragon’s ears. It wanted to fly, wanted to hunt, wanted to soar. Instead, it was trapped in a cage.

But most of all, it wanted to kill. The vision of burning these insects into ash flickered before its gaze, over and over.

It wanted to shatter these bonds, to explode in an inferno of flame and fury…

But each time it even thought of such, it felt the pain under its scales. The enchantments were woven by that accursed horn, they caused agonising pain with every spark of defiance.

What should have been a roar of fury only emerged as a low, strained snarl. The slavers looked up at the dragon, and then laughed.

The beast was bound as much by foul sorcery as it was by gilded steel.

“Wild dragons are too unpredictable,” the man said. “Ferocious, maybe, but what use is fury without control? You would lose against any bonded rider in the games.”

“I do not care for games,” the slaver sneered. He flicked his fingers, and a hooded figure rushed to serve more wine. “These jousts bore me. Ivaryx was not meant for the games, he was meant for war.”

“You may well have your chance soon enough. I hear that the Consul is summoning riders to stop these eastern barbarians.”

“The horse scum?” he scoffed. “Look at how far we have fallen – the greatest concern to us are some invaders from over the mountains? No, these Dothraki are distractions.”

“There’s a horde of them, from what I hear, and more coming west. Already they threaten our outer colonies.”

“You fear their horses?” he sneered. “No, these invaders only show how lax we have become. Unchallenged. Whatever happened to the days of true Valyria, where we could bring conquest from the skies?”

They both took a long sip of wine. “You always were ambitious.”

“I am not alone.” There was something in the way he said those words, the other man’s eyes narrowed. “Our dragons were not meant for this – this peace is suffocating us.” His arms waved, motioning over the wide courtyard and intricate statues. “What happened to the days of expansion?”

His partner’s voice was guarded. “The Senate says otherwise.”

“The Senate.” The words were twisted with anger. “A bunch of scared old fools, rotting atop the bones of their ancestor’s glories. Cowards all. They have no right to rule the Freehold.”

“The Forty Families each have their say—”

The silver-haired man slammed his hand onto the cage’s bars, his golden rings chiming against the metal. All around him, the hooded slaves flinched. “Yes, there is no shortage of saying! The Senate twists and turns, debates and holds motions – and all the while Valyria rots from the inside.”

The other man did not reply. The slaver took a step backwards, anger wafting from him. His hooked nose peered down at his wine. “I want an expansion,” he said finally. ‘Is it not our right to rule the world? How can the Senate be satisfied with what little we have?”

There was a long pause of consideration. The two men both turned tense.

“The grey plague has left the Senate scared,” his partner said after a time. “That damnable curse still hangs over us all.”

“Fear,” the slaver scoffed. “Fear makes Valyria weak. These ‘Dothraki’ are just the latest in a line of plebs trying to topple us.”

His partner paused, the silence stretching a bit longer. “I do not disagree, Alexys,” he said finally. “But expand where? The eastern lands? The jungle?

“Qarth prefers to pay us off in spices, there is no war there,” he continued. They were both looking intently at each other, as they stepped back over the terraces. “After Qarth? Those monkey men are a quagmire on their own, and further east still no dragon is welcome under the Shadow. The southern forests, that is a cursed land, disease in every breath. No,” he shook his head. “Sothoryos is folly, the Belaerys girl proved that. What does that leave us with? The lands beyond, a scattering of desolate tribes and primitives? Savages incapable of even paying tribute, scarcely even worth the effort of ruling.”

“And the sunset kingdoms?”

“The Senate will never step forward in those lands, they fear the old lore… The trees…”

“Soothsayers and foolish prophecy!” the slaver cursed loudly, violet eyes flashing. His goblet chimed off the ground, he had thrown it over his shoulder. “The Senate is made of old men clutching their withered dicks…”

They were walking away from the dragon, it was hard to hear the words. The human tongues were nigh-incomprehensible to the dragon.

As they walked, the man clicked his fingers, and a faceless slave hurried over with another goblet. “This Freehold has grown stagnant, brother. Thanks to the Senate, we cannot act – ours is the greatest might in all the world, but we are not allowed to use it? Allowed?”

His partner shrugged. “Your family is the same. As is mine. The Forty Families have long since grown comfortable with the cities and colonies they already own. No Lord Freeholder will beseech themselves to move for more, our fathers are too preoccupied with their little power struggles.”

“They have forgotten themselves. They have grown fat and lazy. They have lost their way, they have forgotten the ideal from which we were born!” His voice was louder, sharper than his partner’s. “The only gods are the ones that we have created.”

“Brother, this talk…”

“It is not just talk.” His voice grew low, the dragon could barely make out the sound. “Others are thinking the same. The red comet heralds the era of change, it is written in the stars.

“No, what Valyria is truly lacking, brother,” the slaver muttered, “is an emperor.”

The dragon could smell them – its slaver was oozing eagerness and ambition, but the other man wafted fear and hesitance. “Those are dangerous words.”

“I told you – these are not just words. There is one among us who could make this realm great again. One who would have been Consul, if not for the Senate’s lack of spine.” The other figure stiffened, and the dragonslaver peered through the corner of his eyes, inspecting his partner with suspicion. “I have already pledged my support to him, and if you were to pledge yours… well, I wonder… how many of our comrades among the Forty might be thinking the same as us?”

They were muttering in low voices as they walked away. The dragonslavers supped on fruit and wine as they talked eagerly amongst themselves. The red dragon heard the words, but it could not understand or care for half of what they said.

They were the princes of Valyria, being served on hand and foot by hooded slaves. The slaves were each wearing blindfolds – it was forbidden for such to even look upon the sons of the blood. They hid themselves under cloaks, their eyes blind under their hoods, and scuttled around the terrace by touch alone. The slaves kept their heads low, so that the dragonslavers need not even see their faces.

If the slaves ever disappointed, they were simply fed to their master’s dragons.
The days passed slowly. The red dragon was left trapped in its cage, watching other dragons – the ones that embraced their slavery – fly over the mountains. The red dragon hated them too. It hated them for their weakness, it hated them for their freedom. Its hate for them was no less than it was for their masters.

Something was happening in the palace. There were more dragons coming and going, more discussions happening in the palace and on the terrace. Steadily those conversations grew larger, louder, and more frenzied.

The red dragon could smell it in the air. The stink of fear, apprehension and ambition. The stench of conspiracy, brewing thicker and thicker.

Its slaver was fond of holding his meetings out on the terrace overlooking the ocean, where he could show off his collection of dragons to his guests. The red dragon watched as more and more were summoned – a collection of foul-blooded men and women filling up the manse. Each one of them rode dragons of their own, and each one was followed by chained and branded slaves wearing hoods.

The silver-haired youths sat out on the terraces, underneath the glittering night sky. At dusk, the comet shimmered above and cast its own shadows.

They were all young, all wealthy, and all eager for change.

“Why should we fear the nattering of lesser men?” the slaver announced. “What does the dragon care for the insect? We are the sons of Valyria, the future is ours to seize!”

“It is dangerous to defy prophecy,” a voice protested. “The warnings…”

“You sound as bad as that ‘Targaryen’ bitch,” another sneered. “Should we fear the raving of some mad girl?”

“Their family is the weakest of the Forty, their prince a superstitious coward. Targaryen is unimportant,” a man argued. “But the Houses Germantes, Belaerys, Vestaeron, or Camaegor… if we can subdue the traditionalists among the Lords Freeholder…”

“The Consul will not allow it!” another voice protested. “You are talking of an uprising – we do not have the support.”

“We have the dragons,” another prince argued. “Others are mustering for us – Aurion has already left for the colonies, to gather support in our liege’s name. This must be done quickly; we burn the Senate, kill the Consul, and the rest will bend.”

Others sounded aghast at the thought. “You expect sons to murder fathers, for kin to overthrow the heads of their houses?”

“This is for the future of Valyria, not the future of your houses!” a voice cried, from one of those who stood near the slaver. “It is because of the Senate that our families are left divided!”

Voices rose in protest, a scramble of cries and objections. The red dragon’s slaver stepped forward, raising his hands high. “Look around you! The Lords Freeholder sitting in the Senate grow old and hold ceaseless votes, but we are the youth who fly our dragons into battle! Everyone here has been scorned by the freeholders – scorned by those who expect blind obedience and give nothing in return! Our fathers scheme by day and assassinate by night, and our empire rots!”

There was a murmur of agreement. “There have been too many weak Consuls!” one called over the din. “It is conspiracy, clear for all to see. This last election – a farce by any account.”

“The Senate is done! The Senate withers away, while we defend Valyria, not they! Their dragons have grown fat, weak and lazy, but ours?” The slaver motioned dramatically, pointing towards the red dragon’s cage. “Our dragons are fighting strong and battle-hardened!”

“Hear, hear!” a prince clapped from the crowd.

His voice raised higher. “We are the might of Valyria!” the slaver boomed, to the stomping of feet. “We are its future!”

“We are Valyrians!” another shouted, picking up the cry. “We shall forge our own future!”

The slaver stood up at the centre of the feast and raised his crystal goblet high. The wine glinted in the comet’s light, red liquid sloshing out from the goblet’s brim.

“We shall perform the Grand Rite!” he declared. “And we shall ensure Valyria’s greatness for the next thousand years!”

From its cage, the red dragon just watched. The dissenters were falling quiet, one by one. There were still some objectors to the plan, but those were quickly silenced with promises or threats. One silver-haired youth continued to object – he threatened to tell the Senate – and then the slaver drew a blade of black steel. The youth’s corpse dropped to the stones, his throat cloven in two.

The dragonlords only laughed and cheered as their comrade bled out. “Long live the emperor!” they cried. “Long live Valyria!”

Out on the terrace, it was a celebration. The youths were getting drunk on wine and dreams, chanting their support. The corpse was left in the centre of the feast for all to see.

When they finally walked away, they absentmindedly left the body for their slaves to clear up. Without a word, the slaves bowed and blindly obeyed. The faceless slaves dragged the silver-haired corpse over the stones towards the dragon’s feeding trough.

But as soon as their masters left, the red dragon saw the slaves starting to huddle. They spoke in low mutters, but they moved with purpose. All the while the princes had been plotting and scheming, they never even gave a second thought to all the hooded slaves waiting around them. Waiting and listening.

To the dragon’s nostrils, the slaves stank of death. Underneath their hoods, their faces were false. The dragon could feel their malice in the air, the stink of their illusions, but the silvery-haired men were blind. They couldn’t see the ill intent hovering through the manse, hidden in the shadows beneath their slaves’ hoods.

The red dragon growled, and it felt the whisper of shadows dance around him.

…”

It was a night of fire, battle and blood.

The dragon sensed when it began. It had been building like a storm hovering over the mountains, the skies growing tense and stuffy with expectation. It was slow to build, but quick to unravel. It unleashed like a thunderstorm, a hurricane of wings and fire. The dragon could feel the death in the air as the civil war cut through the heart of Valyria.
It was a bloody red night as the teams of slaves unfastened the silver chains. On the orders of their master, the hooded slaves prepared the red dragon for war, and its great body shivered.

The dragon was clad in an outer shell of black steel, armoured by a spiked helm with sheathes of chainmail over its wings. The steel breastplate alone was as large as a ship’s hull. In full battle dress, the red dragon looked even larger and more formidable, its joints clanging with every movement.

The slaver himself was saddled onto the red dragon’s back, with burning whip in hand as it forced the red dragon into the fray.

Red wings blocked out the moon. The dark skies shone crimson with the comet’s light, illuminating the city in a bloody glow. The dragon was let loose to burn, but the one who truly deserved to die – its ‘master’ – stood in command. The accursed sorcery forced the beast to obey.

A blue dragon lunged at it from a nearby mountain, but the red dragon was larger and fiercer. The red beast tore it out of the sky, but there was another, then another. Most were fledglings only a third or less its size – and they were barely even fodder against the crimson dragon.

All around it, the waves of dragons roiled and collided in the sky.

The slaver’s whip cracked. The man was laughing. “Burn, Ivaryx, burn!”

The Red Death obeyed. Flames exploded from its jaws, and instantly a crystal palace was consumed by the fire. Black smoke plumed everywhere like a storm, even the ground was burning.

As far as the eye could see, dragons were being ripped out of the sky, the battle spreading outwards over the golden city. Towers of smoke littered over the horizon, and the battle was growing over all the mountains.

The red dragon roared in the dusk. The humans had turned on each other. A civil war raged in the sky.

The youth of Valyria didn’t want a Freehold anymore, they wanted an Empire. They wanted an Emperor.

Over the horizon, pale grey wings unfolded, and an immense beast took to the sky. A gargantuan, one of the very few dragons even larger than the red. It was so large that it crushed a smaller beast in its jaws, easily shaking a yellow dragon apart. The air was burning as the grey beast lumbered into the fray, its wings straining just to lift its own weight.

It was a dragon of a Lord Freeholder, one of the largest on the opposing side. One of the largest dragons in the world, over twice the red’s size. The flaming whip cracked, and the red dragon was pushed into battle.

All the other dragons avoided the grey behemoth, but the red dragon swooped downwards and engaged.

The grey dragon was massive, but it was also old and heavy. It hadn’t seen battle in a long, long time, it had been centuries since it last hunted or was challenged. The grey dragon might have overwhelmed the red with pure size and strength, but the red was armoured and faster. The grey struggled to maneuver, while the red swept above it. Burning jaws went straight for the nape of its wings.

Atop of the red dragon, the slaver was laughing. “Kill, Ivaryx!”
The old man riding the grey dragon died in a fiery blaze, scorched straight off his mount’s back. The dragon’s teeth bit straight into the grey wings.

The dragon screeched so loud that the earth trembled, they both collided in a fiery blaze in mid-air.

The grey dragon was tumbling downwards, but it was still fighting. It didn’t fall easily. Huge claws twisted around and scraped at the red dragon’s armour, tearing through the metal breastplate and dragging the red dragon down with it. They were both tumbling downwards.

It was too heavy, the red dragon couldn’t shake it loose. For one fearful moment, it looked like they would both hit the ground together.

Then a black dragon swept downwards, claws outstretched. Great talons ripped straight through the old grey, and burning blood splattered. The grey dragon went limp.

It crashed onto the earth with a dull thud, flattening two dozen buildings beneath it.

The red dragon was panting as it tried to gain height again. The grey dragon’s talons had torn off its breastplate and half its armour, but it didn’t care. Its blood was singing with the thrill of battle.

Above it, the black dragon soared. An immense black dragon with bright red eyes, and old scars across its scales. A war dragon. A crowd below was cheering.

The Emperor of Valyria had taken to the skies. The man himself was a strong and broad figure for a human, every bit a warrior. His hair was shining silver, and one eye was vivid purple, and the other burning red. He wore pitch black armour that shimmered with magic, and held a blindingly bright, glowing sword in his hand.

There was fighting in the streets, while crowds of men and women chanted his name with frenzy.

The red dragon flew right next to the black as they devoured the Lords Freeholder in flames.

Most of their enemies never even had time to release their dragons from the cages they were kept, only a few of the opposing dragonriders managed to take to the skies. A dozen great dragons were slain in their cages, burnt to death and crushed as the structures collapsed down onto them.

The battle was quick, devastating and bloody. The red dragon watched from the skies as the imperialists stormed the white crystal structure of the Senate and put all dissenters to the sword. Old men with silver hair – the former lords of their houses – were dragged out in chains.

The slaver’s schemes had come to fruition; he had rallied the princes of the Freehold to declare one of their own Emperor. The dragon’s slaver expected to be the right hand of the Emperor, the strongest supporter of the new dynasty.

The coronation happened upon the tallest of the fourteen peaks, on the mouth of the greatest mountain above a maw of bubbling magma. The dragon watched as the first Emperor of Valyria was crowned in blood and ash, at the heart of fire, all the while a thousand dragons soared in the sky.

“This is the start of a new era!” they proclaimed. “Long live Valyria!”

The red dragon roared, but even its sound was drowned out by the boom of the shrieking crowd. The mouth of the volcano was surrounded by countless bodies, as dragons soared above on the warm updrafts.
The very first act of the new Emperor was to drop all of the old guard into the fire. The prisoners of war were clamped in a line of chains, and forced to walk one by one over the edge and into the magma. Pale-haired, wrinkled old men and women fell screaming into magma.

The fires were bubbling hotter and hotter with every body that fell into the volcano’s maw.

The red comet blazed in the sky as dusk crept over the world. The dragons were dancing, but the red dragon was in agony. Its ‘master’ was away, so the red took the chance to struggle against its bonds. Blinding pain seared through it with every motion. Flaming whips lashed against its skin.

All of Valyria was in attendance around the mountain’s heart – some willingly, others in chains.

The crowd was chanting, some sort of ceremony was happening. Beneath the red dragon, the flames gushed hungrily, devouring everything that was thrown.

“Valyria forever!” the crowds chanted. “Valyria forever!”

The whole crowd was staring at a podium of black stone, awaiting their new Emperor. The dragons were left to soar as the men prepared for the ceremony. The frenzy in the air reached fever pitch.

And then something changed.

The red dragon knew it before anyone else. The red dragon felt the very moment its ‘master’ perished. The enchantments bound over the dragon’s scales suddenly shattered.

Freedom. It felt like freedom.

Its huge heart was pounding, blood rushing, and suddenly the red dragon’s wings clapped like thunder. A triumphant boom exploded from its mouth, and the whole mountain quaked.

Its master was dead. The dragon didn’t know how, but its tormentor was finally dead.

Above, the black dragon with red eyes roared too. Other dragons were reacting, they could feel it as well. Some were confused, some were angry, some were scared. The red dragon was exhilarated.

It had happened with no warning. No one witnessed it. The first Emperor of Valyria died along with the elite of his supporters as they were getting dressed for the ceremony. One moment the red dragon was struggling against invisible bonds, and in the next the magical chains snapped apart.

Already, the dragon was writhing. Roaring, clawing, going berserk. The surrounding enslaved dragons tried to stop it, but the red dragon powered through. They collided in mid-air in a flurry of colours and glittering scales.

Below them, the crowd was still chanting. They hadn’t realised what happened, they never knew…

The sky was filled with roars, the ground was shaking…

… and the man who stepped out to perform the ceremony was not the same man. It was a figure that looked like him and was wearing his clothes, but it was someone else. Something else. It had no smell, no shadow and no warmth.

It was a figure wearing the dead man’s face, stepping out onto the screaming podium.

The ‘emperor’ raised his arms high, and the Grand Rite began. Sorcerers and dragonlords had formed a circle around the mountain’s bubbling maw, chanting unearthly words. Their voices raised, echoing across the world as more prisoners, hundreds, thousands were dropped into the flames.

The red dragon raged in the sky, flapping furiously to escape as a half dozen other dragons struggled against it. The black dragon was roaring, sweeping down and forcing it backwards.

The two dragons collided in a clap of fury, spinning around each other as they wrestled. The red was being forced downwards, the black was pushing him back…

Beneath them, the flames bubbled and roared.

It felt growing power in the air, spouting forth from the mountain’s mouth in an endless flood. The sorcerers were chanting, unearthly cries echoing across the mountain, hands raised towards the flaming circle in the magma. A burning circle that was glowing, like a hole in the world.

The dragon hadn’t felt fear – not true fear – since that night in the mountains when it had first been enslaved. But it felt fear now, the other dragons could feel it too. The red dragon could see it in their eyes, could smell it in the air.

Something was coming.

The red dragon finally managed to escape the black’s grip, slipping past and shaking its claws free. It didn’t even try to fight, the red dragon only wanted to flee. The black one was slower to react – it roared, still roaring for its master.

There was power all around the sorcerers, reverberating upwards from the earth.

The entire world was quaking.

The night fell, and it felt the magic rising from the ground…

The red comet in the sky shone brighter than ever as it fell towards the earth…

For the briefest of moments, it looked as though the faceless man smiled.

Then the flames burst upwards, a tower of fire roaring through the crowds.

Boom.

The sky went black. The ground ruptured, flames everywhere. Fires so hot they burnt even through a dragon’s scales.

The sound was deafening, the earth itself cracked open.

It felt the mountains shatter.

Dragons were falling from the sky. Some were being burnt by the flames, but most were overwhelmed by scorching clouds of darkness. It saw immense flying chunks of rubble launching into the air, pasting dragons on impact against crumbling mountainside.

A wave of ash rippled outwards, painting the whole world in darkness.
Multicoloured wings glistened in the air, before they were swallowed by the black.

It was an explosion that even a dragon couldn’t survive. The beasts were left like insects before the storm.

The red was flapping with all its might, out of its mind with panic. The black dragon was right behind it, and then it was consumed by an explosion of ash. Even the immense black beast was crushed like a bug by the raw power.

Behind it, the mountains were being swallowed by the earth.

They had summoned a miracle, and the gods had answered.

The red dragon didn’t drop, it was flying onwards with all its unchained fury. The flames seared against its scales, but it didn’t fall. The pain was agonizing, yet it clung to the air with every ounce of strength it had left.

It was riding the shockwave, even as dust and burning debris whooshed around it.

Behind it, the cataclysm split open the land, the entire earth cracking apart, almost as though an unearthly sword had stabbed through the continent. It saw the earth’s molten blood pour forth in floods out from the gaps, the crust itself was flowing like turbulent water. Smoke and steam howled everywhere.

A solid pillar of smoke was rising upwards, an immense tower of pure darkness larger than a mountain. It was reaching up, spewing outwards and extending over the heavens. Columns of smoke branching apart like the roots of a tree. Or like a hand. It was like a giant hand reaching upwards – a hand so large it might have crushed the sun in its grip. The dragon felt its aura begin to flood over the world like the beating of a crazed heart.

The red dragon just flew, faster and more desperate than ever before. Its body was stained black from the rain of ash clattering around it, its hide was seared by burns.

Everywhere it looked, shadows were gushing out of the blackness, men dissolving into wispy figures going mad…

All was being devoured, it was like a storm concentrated from a single point. Everything was consumed by a single maw of endless hunger, as the shadowy fingers reached for the sky…

The dragon flew. It flew longer and harder than it had ever flown before. It flew over black waves and howling storms, even as it grew delirious with panic and pain.

It flew to the very edge of the earth, but the black skies followed. The black clouds were growing and growing in its wake.

The whole world was trembling, and the red dragon flew, and flew, and flew.

Time became meaningless. The dragon pushed itself to the very brink of collapse. It was crazed in pain and confusion, black burns seared across its scales. It flew for what felt like several days straight, but it never saw sunlight. The skies above had been smothered black.

The ash and clouds covered half the world. It could still smell the death and smoke on the wind, and the echoes of a million dying cries.
The dragon could feel it in its bones. This was the end of days.

Other dragons had also fled the cataclysm, but the red dragon had watched them all fall one by one. Only the red dragon managed to hold on. Its wings were strained, its breaths hoarse, its fire was flickering. Its strength was bleeding away.

Beneath it, the oceans were black with soot, and for a while the dragon feared it might never see land again.

The traces of those cursed enchantments – the slaver’s bindings – still burnt against its skin, searing into its muscles. The black magic was polluting the world, the burns from the fires were tainted with darkness.

The pain was beyond agony.

But then there was land. In the falling light, the dragon saw land at the horizon’s edge. It could smell it wafting over the seas; earthy and foreign.

The dragon didn’t know why it had come here. It followed some engrained instinct. An aura of magic still lingered here, the dragon could feel it. The power was like a memory embedded into the bones of this land, ancient and enduring. A refuge from the cursed flames devouring the world.

The dragon’s strength had long since given out. For too long it had been flying on but the memory of strength. It couldn’t even feel its wings anymore, exhaustion had long since given way to pain, to agony, to pure numbness. But the time had come – it could flap no more.

Finally, the dragon began to fall from the sky. It tried to beat its wings one last time, but it did not have the strength. It could only watch as it fell downwards into the ocean.

It wasn’t even strong enough to reach the coast. The wounded beast crashed into the salty waves, letting loose a strangled cry as the cold water swallowed it whole.

The dragon had to drag itself onto the beach, panting for breath. All around it, the land was desolate and barren. It dragged itself up onto the peninsula, a stony coast surrounded by rocks and desolate cliffs. Old ash still coated the ground, the rocks were twisted and deformed by ancient fires. The caves were screaming in the wind, and the feeling of death clung to the coast.

The red dragon felt cold. It had never felt cold before.

For a time, the dragon just curled up on the beach, half-in and half-out of the water, shivering in pain. Then the beast tried to take flight, but collapsed downwards onto the black rocks.

It was wheezing, strewn out and shivering on the brink of death.

Black flecks dusted against its snout. Wispy dark flakes, falling from the sky.

Snow. The snow was stained black from the ashen clouds.

The dragon limped onwards, searching desperately for refuge against the pain.

Around him, it was a new world. A strange world, cold and harsh. It had never flown this far before. The dragon didn’t know what it was doing, but it knew it had to escape. The cold offered shelter, and the dragon ran for it.

The days blurred in agony.

At first, it couldn’t see the sun, it couldn’t see the moon. The red comet had vanished. The clouds of ash were so heavy in the sky, thick and black and unending. The black clouds continued to twist overhead for what might have been months, but eventually, the snows began to push them back. Gradually, a weak sun began to emerge from behind the ash in the sky, grey and cold.

The dragon was starving, it was maddened, ferocious. The days passed in unending pain. Its wounds were festering, lingering black burns that were slowly killing it.

The red dragon went on the warpath over the wasteland.

It burnt. Everything burnt. The touch of those deathly flames still hissed across its scales. Its once crimson hide had been stained black.

The dragon roared in mad pain, dying spurts of fire shooting from bloody teeth. Even its flames were failing – what used to be a brilliant jet of power had guttered into a smoky hiss.

Strange men in furs and queer voices were screaming, scuttling around the snow like so many insects. They tried to flee, but they couldn’t escape.

All around, a village of tents and furs was broken and burning. The dragon howled as it stormed through, shattering a totem of tusks.

The dragon roared, shivering at the agony arcing up and down its hide. Blood dripped from its maw, black blood hissing against the snow. There were so many skeletons crushed in its jaws, broken beneath its teeth that its gums were bleeding. It devoured them all, it devoured everything. It kept eating until it vomited, but the hunger never ended.

The dragon took its rage out on absolutely everything that it could find. It left a trail of devastation in its wake as it moved west over the forests, mountains and icy plains.

It was harder and harder to fly; the festering wounds had grown worse and worse. Instead the beast was left limping on the ground, dragging itself by its claws, hobbling over the snow and rocks. A lesser beast would have long since fallen, but the red dragon refused to die. The hatred kept it alive.

Where it had ended up was a land of jagged mountains and frozen valleys, heavy with snow and white glaciers. In the sky, heavy black clouds writhed over the mountains.

Nostrils sniffed the air, taking it all in. It could feel it. It could feel something in the air, something that had drawn the dragon here. It wasn’t sure what, but the aura of forgotten power lingered over this place, in the heart of the mountains.

The dragon felt like there was something calling it, just over the horizon. In the distance, the snows danced over the peaks.

Then there was a cry from somewhere to its right. A bone spear bounced over its scales. The dragon stiffened, a growl bursting from its throat.

There were men scuttling about the frozen ruins, trying to surround it. They were figures clad in shaggy furs, armed with wood and bone. They were following the dragon, trying to hunt it.

“Kill the demon!” their indecipherable voices cried. “Kill the demon!”

It roared, hoping to scatter them, but they did not stop coming. Spears and arrows whistled from the cliffs. They were like insect bites, but they hurt. Most clattered harmlessly off thick scales, but some were thrown at its eyes and snout. The dragon didn’t have the strength left to burn them, but it refused to fall.

Its tail whooshed outwards, whipping through frozen ruins. Shards of rubble and ice scattered through the air, cratering into the drifts, shattering the men’s bodies.

A dozen died, but still there were more coming.

The cries of battle echoed over the hills, and a pained mewl burst from the dragon’s throat.

Its wounds were killing it. The cold was draining its strength. These creatures would pester it until it dropped, the dragon knew.

It had killed droves of them, but it could feel still more coming over the mountains.

The beast limped onwards into the mountains, but then the ice and ground under its feet gave way. The dragon lost its footing amidst the avalanche. It was sent tumbling hopelessly down the mountainside, helpless against the thousands of tons of snow.

\textit{Crash.} Its huge body thudded into the rocks, and a monstrous whine of pain echoed over the desolate landscape. It was thrashing, trying to claw its way free, but more and more snow was tumbling down the mountain.

It was being buried, consumed by the avalanche of white.

“Enough of this. Dragon, you are not welcome here.”

A voice, loud and clear. The dragon’s teeth bared as it saw human figures heading towards it from the valley path. Enemies. They just kept coming.

There were five of them, all wearing white. Two were as tall as men, two others were short like children, and one was thrice the size of any man – an inhumanly large, hairy figure dragging a sleigh. They had strange smells to them. They were clambering over the rocky footpath, the sleigh groaning behind them.

The dragon roared with all the strength it had left, but still they kept on coming. Around it, another avalanche scattered down the mountains.

The giant hoisted the sleigh upwards, while one of the men broke off from the group, crawling on his hands and knees over the snow closer to the writhing dragon.

“I see you, I see you,” the man’s voice called, as he cautiously clambered over the snows. “I know you’re scared, I know…”

They were all terrified, but they were still approaching. The dragon growled, sniffing the air. The man at the front had his hands raised, his eyes lowered. His voice was slow, reassuring. The dragon could not understand the words, but it felt the meaning behind them.

“I know…” he muttered, the man in white. He had dark hair, and weather worn features. “I know…”

The dragon bared its teeth. \textit{Men.} Men had been its slavers, its tormenters. The men had tortured it, hunted it.
The dragon dragged its body upwards, its neck outstretcing, its teeth screaming. It tore free from the snow.

“Greenseer!” one of the companions shouted in alarm.

“It’s alright! Stay back, stay back!” His voice was loud and grim, his full attention on the massive dragon before him. “I mean you no harm! I know you’re wounded, I know you’re lost. I cannot save you, but I can help you.”

The dragon could feel it. It could feel the human trying to touch it, it could feel the human’s mind extending towards its own. The touch was soft, even comforting, but the dragon reacted with only blind rage.

_Humans._ It growled and lunged.

The dragon’s jaws opened to swallow them all whole. It shot forward like a snake, but then the snow gave way beneath it. It collapsed down the slope, claws losing leverage. Its jaws slammed wide into the rocks, while the man scrambled for cover.

A sudden wind swept through the valley – a gale of snow pummelling against the dragon’s eyes. Its vision was obscured, the wind was writhing around it. The dragon roared, angry and confused. They were doing something. It could smell the strange magic on the wind. The two small ones were singing. In front of them, the man stood tall, glaring down the slope.

It could sense the man’s presence. He was extending his mind, still trying to connect with the dragon, trying to reach it. The dragon only let loose an enraged snarl.

The humans were hastily trying to unwrap something from the sleigh they pulled. There was something cradled between them, a long shape that even the giant struggled to lift.

It was a horn, the dragon realised. A white horn. The dragon could suddenly feel the magic radiating from it.

The last time the red dragon had seen such a horn, the cursed thing had been the slaver’s tool. A horn of binding. The dragon could not be bound again, it could not fall. The beast growled and scrambled, trying to claw at the cursed thing.

The man set his hands on the horn, slowly closing his eyes and letting out a breath. The dragon couldn’t stop him, it wasn’t strong enough to pull itself free. The beast could only hiss in fury.

The man in white held himself strong atop the slope, despite the gargantuan clawing and raging below. His companions were already scattering, but the black-haired man stood ready by the mouthpiece.

“I dare not kill you, but I can give you peace.” He took a deep breath. “I can stop the pain.”

The white horn sounded, long and slow, and the boom of a thousand souls echoed over the world. It was so loud that it smothered even the wind. The dragon roared in anguish, suddenly feeling the magic reach out, and resonate…

The last horn had caused immense pain, but this one was different. It felt like a different type of magic. Similar in a way, and yet so different.

The last horn had been sharp and agonizing, but this… it was numb and cold. The dragon felt the chill soothing through its muscles, the agony of its fiery shackles freezing away. The burns from the slaver’s enchantments were fading, the pain of all its wounds replaced by numbness.

The dragon roared, but its power was fading. Fire was pain, but the ice drained its strength. Its wings sagged, its body slumped.

It tried to fight, but the power of the horn could not be resisted.

The dragon’s head dropped, its breaths turned low. The will to resist was bleeding away. It felt heavy, like its body was turning to stone.

Ice was creeping over its scales, thin hoarfrost started to crawl over its body.

For a moment, there was nothing the dragon wanted more. It just wanted the pain to end.

The hills turned silent, the only sound the whisper of the wind and the soft wheeze of the dragon’s fading breaths.

Across from him, the man slumped beside the horn. They were staring at each other, man and dragon. His pale grey eyes against the dragon’s black.

“It’s alright. It’s alright,” the man whispered, soothing the dragon. “You are hurting. Let me end your torment.”

There was frost spreading around the man’s mouth as well, hoarfrost creeping over his skin. The touch of the horn was affecting him too, the dragon realised. The man must have known the cost – he had given his life to bring the dragon peace. A binding of ice.

In those moments, there was no pain or anger. All feeling drained away. There was naught but emptiness.

After being in pain for so long, the numbness felt almost like relief. The dragon felt itself begin to sag.

Is this what dying feels like?

With his final breath, the man reached out with his mind. This time, the dragon didn’t resist. Even as its consciousness faded, it felt the human’s presence wrap around the dragon’s soul, soft and reassuring.

The ice continued to spread, growing thicker and thicker. Veins of white crept across scales of red.

For that final moment, the dragon just felt lost and scared. The man’s aura reached out to touch it, to cradle it in those final moments. The dragon felt a vague confusion, before realising. The man was comforting it, even as they both died.

The dragon had never known a human to be comforting before.

There was nothing but silence, their minds linked and their thoughts passing between them. They were both scared.

I know… I know, the man thought softly, as the ice enveloped them both. Be at peace. In the name of House Stark, I bind you.
The mountains were quiet. The northern winds softly sang over the drifts, and the last of the avalanches scattered downwards. The only movement in the valley was snows lightly dusting over the body of the frozen white gargantuan, slow but unending.

The dragon, the greenseer, and the horn were all buried together.

In 114 BC, there was a civil war in Valyria. The old guard of the Freehold, versus the new blood following an Emperor. The culmination of centuries of political bickering and partisan assassination, the one-night coup d’etat turned Valyria from an oligarchy of Lords Freeholder into an Empire. The new Emperor meant to launch a new age of expansion.

The civil war was obliterated from history by the Doom. No one capable of recording it survived that night. The first and nameless Emperor of Valyria reigned for only six hours before his empire was destroyed by fire and blood.

The blood magic ceremony that was supposed to ensure Valyria’s future instead summoned its Doom.

The only surviving witness to the ceremony was a single red dragon, who fled around the world to the northern wilds, before eventually succumbing to the cold.

APPENDIX

LORDS AND KINGS OF WESTEROS

THE KING OF THE NORTH

KING OF THE WINTER THRONE

The Starks trace their descent from Brandon the Builder and the Kings of Winter. For thousands of years, they ruled from Winterfell as Kings in the North, until Torrhen Stark, the King Who Knelt, chose to swear fealty to Aegon the Dragon rather than give battle. When Lord Eddard Stark of Winterfell was executed by King Joffrey, the northmen foreswore their loyalty to the Iron Throne and proclaimed Lord Eddard's son Robb as King in the North. During the War of the Five Kings, Robb won every battle, but was betrayed and murdered by the Freys and Boltons at the Twins during his uncle's wedding.

In the Red Wedding’s aftermath, its perturbator, Roose Bolton, was raised as Warden of the North. House Bolton held Winterfell, but then a northern coalition formed around Stark loyalists, led by Jon Snow, Robb Stark’s bastard brother. After a bloody civil war, the northern coalition retook Winterfell and raised Brandon Stark as Robb’s heir and as King in the North.

The words of House Stark are “Winter is Coming”.

ACORN, LEAF, ASH, SCALES, BLACK KNIFE, SNOWYLOCKS, COALS.

THE OTHERS

The Others, also known as white walkers, cold gods, white shadows and children of the moon, are beings of ice that exist the north far beyond the Wall. They had not been seen for many thousand years and were considered extinct, but in modern times they are leading an invasion south, already conquering all lands north of the Wall. It is feared to be the second Long Night.

The Others are described as beautiful, ethereal creatures with bright blue eyes, that are prone to playing with mortals before they kill them. They seek to conquer the world, and to turn every mortal creature ‘immortal’.

THE WHITE WALKER KING, the Dread, an immortal and mysterious figure leading the Others’ invasion. Said to be the most dangerous creature in the world, and said to be half-human, half-Other,

{THE NIGHT’S KING}, a legendary figure from the Age of Heroes, a fearless warrior named as the thirteenth Lord Commander of the Night’s Watch. He attempted to make peace between humans and Others by marrying one of them, but ended up declaring himself king and her his queen, and ruling from the Nightfort for thirteen dark years. They still tell tales of the atrocities of his reign, though all records of him were destroyed and his very name was forbidden,

THE CORPSE QUEEN, a name given to the Night’s King’s bride, a woman with skin as cold as ice and eyes like blue stars. Supposedly she took his soul as well as his seed, {MALVERN}, the name given to an ambitious white walker who tricked his way through the Wall. Was wounded in the crossing, but remained strong enough to raise a host of corpses after the Battle of the Snows, and was critical in assaulting the Wall. Later slain after being lured into a trap by Samwell Tarly.

CLAIMANTS TO THE IRON THRONE, LORD OF SEVEN KINGDOMS

{THE QUEEN REGENT}

House Lannister and House Baratheon loyalists once held the Iron Throne as the sons of King Robert Baratheon, under the regency of Queen Cersei of House Lannister. After the deaths of several key figures, Cersei Lannister was accused of crimes of infidelity and murder by the Faith, leading towards a stand-off between crown and faith around the Red Keep that lasted for 77 days. Her reign ended in spectacular collapse during attack on the Great Sept and the Great Fire of King’s Landing, after crimes against men and gods, and the Iron Throne was conquered by King Aegon Targaryen.

The Queen Regent and her children were declared as illegitimate, stripped of all right, land and deed.

King Tommen's banner once showed the crowned stag of Baratheon, black on gold, and the lion of Lannister, gold on crimson, combatant.

____ {CERSEI LANNISTER}, the First of Her Name, widow of {King Robert I Baratheon}, Queen Dowager, former Protector of the Realm, former Lady of Casterly Rock, and former Queen Regent. Also called the MAD QUEEN; accused of infidelity and high treason, held siege inside the Red Keep for 77 days, dabbled in sorcery and set fire to King’s Landing in madness, and then slain in circumstances unknown, ______ her children;

_______________ her eldest son, {JOFFREY HILL}, also called KING JOFFREY I BARATHEON poisoned during his wedding feast by his uncle Tyrion, _______________ her daughter, {MYRCELLA HILL}, also called PRINCESS MYRCELLA BARATHEON, a girl of ten, a ward of Prince Doran Martell at Sunspear, betrothed to his son Trystane. Murdered at Starfall by Ser Gerold Dayne, the Darkstar, at the behest of her uncle Tyrion, _______________ her youngest son, {TOMMEN I HILL}, also called KING TOMMEN I BARATHEON. Once the First of His Name, King of the Andals, the Rhoynar, and the First Men, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms. A boy of eight years, supposedly murdered by his uncle Tyrion.

___________________________ his kittens, SER POUNCE, {LADY WHISKERS}, {BOOTS}, his wife, {QUEEN MARGAERY} of House Tyrell, thrice wed, twice widowed, once murdered. Accused of high treason, held captive in the Red Keep by Cersei Lannister, murdered by Cersei Lannister and ‘resurrected’, Margaery’s lady companions and cousins, {MEGGA}, {ALLA}, and {ELINOR TYRELL}, accused of treachery, all held hostage and slain in the Red Keep,

THE DRAGON REBORN, THE KING OF THE SEVEN KINGDOMS

The Targaryens are the blood of the dragon, descended from the high lords of the ancient Freehold of Valyria, their heritage marked by lilac, indigo, and violet eyes and hair of silver-gold. To preserve their blood and keep it pure, House Targaryen has oft wed brother to sister, cousin to cousin, uncle to niece. The founder of the dynasty, Aegon the Conqueror, took both his sisters to wife and fathered sons on each. The Targaryen banner is a three-headed dragon, red on black, the three heads representing Aegon and his sisters. The Targaryen words are Fire and Blood.

After Robert’s Rebellion, House Targaryen was deposed and usurped, but the campaign by King Aegon VI Targaryen reclaimed the Iron Throne for his family. King Aegon currently sits in King’s Landing, laying claim to all Seven Kingdoms but only owning a third of them.

To some, Aegon VI Targaryen is called the Mummer’s Dragon, named such by those who do not believe his right or his identity.

AEGON VI TARGARYEN, Sixth of His Name, called the Dragon Reborn, the Young Dragon, King of the Andals, the Rhoynar and the First Men, King of the Iron Throne, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms. A young man thought lost as a babe, but returned from exile across the sea. He vanquished the Mad Queen Cersei, and restored the dynasty of House Targaryen to the Iron Throne. Wielder of the sword Blackfyre,

THE BROKEN KING

The brother of King Robert and Lord of Dragonstone, Stannis Baratheon pursued his right to the Iron Throne after decrying the children of Cersei Lannister as illegitimate. Spurred by the Red Woman Melisandre of Asshai, Stannis has taken for his banner the fiery heart of the Lord of Light—a red heart surrounded by orange flames upon a yellow field. Within the heart is the crowned stag of House Baratheon, in black.

Although once a serious contender for the Iron Throne, Stannis Baratheon has continually dwindled in strength and influence. Presently he holds only his seat of Dragonstone, and King Stannis’ campaign has devolved into skirmishes and raids against first Lannister, and later Targaryen.

As converts to the Red God, King Stannis and his men have grown convinced the Jon Snow is the harbinger of the Great Other, and that Stannis is the champion fated to defeat him. They are fixated on the prophecy of the ‘Battle for the Dawn’, and they are working towards a Grand Rite, a ceremony to summon a weapon that can defeat the Champion of Night.

King Stannis Baratheon, the First of His Name, second son of Lord Steffon Baratheon and Lady Cassana of House Estermont, Lord of Dragonstone, styling himself Azor Ahai, Champion of the Dawn, and Rightful King of the Iron Throne, the king’s squires, DEVAN SEAWORTH and BRYEN FARRING,

The Greyjoys of Pyke claim descent from the Grey King of the Age of Heroes. Legend says the Grey King ruled the sea itself and took a mermaid to wife. Aegon the Dragon ended the line of the last King of the Iron Islands, but allowed the ironborn to revive their ancient custom and choose who should have the primacy among them. They chose Lord Vickon Greyjoy of Pyke. The Greyjoy sigil is a golden kraken upon a black field. Their words are We Do Not Sow.

Under Balon Greyjoy, the ironborn declared independence from the Iron Throne and set about a new conquest. Balon Greyjoy perished, and his brother Euron Greyjoy was chosen from the Kingsmoot. Although Balon attempted to conquer the north, Euron abandoned the northern campaign to focus on the Reach instead. His campaign has been marked by devastating casualties.

Euron Greyjoy led the Drowning of Oldtown, a cataclysmic battle fought amidst a storm. In its wake, the ironborn claimed Oldtown as their new seat of power, renaming it Gods Arising and converting its citizens to their new religion.

___ EURON GREYJOY, the Third of His Name Since the Grey King, King of the Iron Islands and the Reach. THE DRAGON QUEEN

Although Aegon Targaryen claims to have restored the line of House Targaryen, there are many who doubt Aegon’s lineage. Aegon Targaryen sits as the de facto Targaryen king, there is another from the same bloodline with unquestioned heritage. Daenerys Targaryen, the daughter of King Aerys, has also made her interest in retaking the Iron Throne clear.

She is regarded as the most beautiful and powerful woman in the world. Aegon Targaryen attempts to resolve the disputing claim through marriage, but Daenerys Targaryen’s interests in such are unknown.

HOUSE BARATHEON

The youngest of the Great Houses, House Baratheon was born during the Wars of Conquest when Orys Baratheon, rumored to be a bastard brother of Aegon the Conqueror, defeated and slew Argilac the Arrogant, the last Storm King. Aegon rewarded him with Argilac’s castle, lands, and daughter. Orys took the girl to bride, and adopted the banner, honors, and words of her line. The Baratheon sigil is a crowned stag, black, on a golden field. Their words are Ours is the Fury.

In the 283rd year after Aegon's Conquest, Robert of House Baratheon, Lord of Storm’s End, overthrew the Mad King, Aerys II Targaryen, to win the Iron Throne. His claim to the crown derived from his grandmother, a daughter of King Aegon V Targaryen, though Robert preferred to say his warhammer was his claim.

After Robert’s death, his sons Joffrey, and later Tommen, held the Iron Throne through a tumultuous period known as the War of Five Kings. Under the regency of his wife, Queen Cersei, his reign collapsed, his children declared illegitimate, and the Baratheon line left near extinct.
{ROBERT BARATHEON}, the First of His Name, King of the Andals, the Rhoyne, and the First Men, Lord of the Seven Kingdoms and Protector of the Realm, killed by a boar,

RALPH BUCKLER, Lord of Bronzegate, his cousin, [SER BRUS BUCKLER], slain by Jon Snow, HOUSE FREY

The Freys are bannermen to House Tully, but have not always been diligent in their duty. At the outset of the War of the Five Kings, Robb Stark won Lord Walder's allegiance by pledging to marry one of his daughters or granddaughters. When he wed Lady Jeyne Westerling instead, the Freys conspired with Roose Bolton and murdered the Young Wolf and his followers at what became known as the Red Wedding.

In the Red Wedding’s aftermath, House Frey suffered extreme condemnation from many. After suffering greatly from prosecution from outlaws and embittered houses, House Frey was all but destroyed during the Scouring of the Twins by Jon Snow.

JEYNE RIVERS, MARTYN RIVERS, RYGER RIVERS, RONEL RIVERS, MELLARA RIVERS, and others.

HOUSE LANNISTER

The Lannisters of Casterly Rock remain the principal support of King Tommen's claim to the Iron Throne. They boast of descent from Lann the Clever, the legendary trickster of the Age of Heroes. The gold of Casterly Rock and the Golden Tooth has made them the wealthiest of the Great Houses. The Lannister sigil is a golden lion upon a crimson field. Their words are Hear Me Roar!

Under Lord Tywin Lannister, House Lannister reached great heights of power. Their house rose triumphant from the War of the Five Kings, with Tywin’s grandson sitting on the Iron Throne, and Tywin Lannister ruling the realm as Hand of the King. The Lannister downfall was heralded by Tywin’s Bane, his deformed son Tyrion. Tyrion murdered his father and allied behind Aegon Targaryen, bringing forth doom upon the rest of his family.

Presently, Tyrion Lannister, with multiple counts of kinslaying to his name, remains the last surviving member of the main line, having captured Casterly Rock and ruling as Warden of the West under King Aegon.

{TYWIN LANNISTER}, Lord of Casterly Rock, Shield of Lannisport, Warden of the West, and Hand of the King. Murdered by his dwarf son in his privy,

HOUSE MARTELL

Dorne was the last of the Seven Kingdoms to swear fealty to the Iron Throne. Blood, custom, geography, and history all helped to set the Dornishmen apart from the other kingdoms. The Martell banner is a red sun pierced by a golden spear. Their words are Unbowed, Unbent, Unbroken.

At the outbreak of the War of the Five Kings Dorne took no part, but when Myrcella Baratheon was betrothed to Prince Trystane, Sunspear declared its support for King Joffrey. However, elements within Dorne conspired against the Baratheon rule, leading to the murder of Myrcella Baratheon at Starfall. Dorne later declared its support to King Aegon Targaryen and helped to overthrow the Baratheon and Lannisters.

HOUSE TULLY

Lord Edmyn Tully of Riverrun was one of the first of the river lords to swear fealty to Aegon the Conqueror. King Aegon rewarded him by raising House Tully to dominion over all the lands of the Trident. The Tully sigil is a leaping trout, silver, on a field of rippling blue and red. The Tully words are Family, Duty, Honor.

House Tully allied with King Robb Stark at the outbreak of the War of Five Kings, but they were defeated after the Red Wedding. House Tully was removed as Lord Paramounts of the Trident and their lands dissolved in the aftermath. Later, under King Aegon, many riverlords supported his cause to find vengeance against House Lannister, Lord Edmure Tully was recovered from Casterly Rock, and House Tully was restored as Lords of Riverrun, on the condition that the riverlands bend the knee to the new Targaryen regime.

____ EDMURE TULLY, Lord of Riverrun, Lord Paramount of the Trident. Taken captive at his wedding and held prisoner by the Freys and then Lannisters, and then recovered during the taking Casterly Rock by Tyrion Lannister. Currently under the care of Lord Tyrion, having pledged his support to King Aegon,

HOUSE TYRELL

The Tyrells rose to power as stewards to the Kings of the Reach, though they claim descent from Garth Greenhand, gardener king of the First Men. When the last king of House Gardener was slain on the Field of Fire, his steward Harlen Tyrell surrendered Highgarden to Aegon the Conqueror. Aegon granted him the castle and dominion over the Reach. The Tyrell sigil is a golden rose on a green-grass field. Their words are Growing Strong.

Mace Tyrell declared his support for Renly Baratheon at the onset of the War of the Five Kings, and gave him the hand of his daughter Margaery. Upon Renly’s death, Highgarden made alliance with House Lannister, and Margaery was betrothed to King Joffrey. With Joffrey’s death, Margaery was betrothed to King Tommen.

After the Landing of the Golden Company, House Tyrell suffered a costly defeat on the roseroad and the Lannister alliance fell apart. When King Aegon took the throne, House Tyrell was removed as Wardens of the South and replaced by House Tarly, who bent the knee. House Tyrell and the Reach have suffered great defeats from both Aegon and Euron.

Chapter End Notes

Goddamn, this was a pain to write. The epilogue was fairly easy, but the appendix was absolutely hellish.

Still, this officially marks the end of book 1. Next chapter will be with Daenerys in Slaver's Bay, but I'm taking a hiatus before I start writing it.

Till next time.
