Dragons of Ice and Fire

by serpentguy

Summary

There are things hidden in the far north, secrets buried under ice. Jon Snow faces the white walkers early, and stumbles upon a power that could change the world. It forges a new path for him and everyone around him - and a new journey south, a journey as a dragon.

The world begins to change - with steel and snow, fire and blood...
Chapter 1

Chapter Notes

Ok, new fic. I've been thinking about this one for a while, actually, finally had a chance to write it.

I do not own ASOIAF/Game of Thrones. Not even slightly.

Rated M because, well, come on - it's Game of Thrones.

Haven't decided on any release schedule yet, but it will still likely be written faster than Winds of Winter, haha... ha... ha... you know, I'm laughing but crying a bit too...

Story starts around Jon I and Jon II during a Storm of Swords - when Jon is with Mance's wildlings camped at the Frostfangs, alongside Ygritte, after Qhorin ordered him to join them as a spy. Bit of a divergence that led to Mance delaying moving the wildings south...

BOOK ONE: ICE
Table of Contents:

Part 1 - Beyond the Wall, chapters 1 - 20,

Part 2 - The North, chapters 21 - 36,

Part 3 - The Convergence, chapters 37 - 50,

Epilogue and Appendix, chapter 51.

Book 2: Fire starts chapter 52.
Chapter 1

Jon

The world was frozen. A land of eternal winter stretched outwards as the white wolf ran across the frozen tundra.

This was a different world. These northern lands were wild and untamed. They were thick and rich, but also cold and barren at the same time. There were no trees, no foliage – nothing but rocks, ice and snow.

For a heartbeat, it felt like this was where he belonged.

Here, he was a hunter, a predator. Game was sparse and life was hard, but that just made the struggle all the more rewarding. Here, the direwolf reigned supreme.

The wolf was alone at the edge of the world. For the last few weeks he had consistently ventured further and further north, past the mountains. Few other predators would ever be able to survive this far north. It was as exhilarating as it was dangerous. He had grown lean, skinny but strong by the constant hunt.

The white wolf prowled the wasteland, nigh invisible in the frozen dusk. The sun was only just setting, and it was a good time for the lone wolf to hunt.

There had been a pack once. Briefly, at least. The white wolf remembered his brothers and sisters well. They had been a pack once. Someday, maybe they could be a pack once more - but the runt had never really been part of the group. The others used to howl and hunt together, but there had always been some distance between the runt and the rest of the litter.

The wolf didn't mind. Sometimes, solitude was what made the lone wolf strong. The wolf was strong now. He was a runt no more. His body was wiry and fast, his muscles were strong, and his teeth were sharp.

There were smells in the distance. He could pick up the thick, musky scent of humans - along with their horses, beasts and livestock. The gathering was so large and so thick that even miles away the smell was pungent on the cold wind. The wolf was comfortable among men, he had been raised amidst men, but being among thousands upon thousands huddled together was too pungent for the beast.

Still, the wolf's other half lived amongst those men. The white wolf couldn't ever leave his human brother behind. He made a note of their progress as the men slowly travelled south.

There was another smell, fainter, barely discernible. The smell of an elk that had been scared north by the human host. It was faint, but fresh. The wolf's stomach growled hungrily as it set off to hunt.

The wolf bounded across the thick snow with practiced ease. The scent was getting thicker now. It was heading further north, further up through the mountains and towards a large glacier. He could see the white icy spikes in the distance. The air was cold even under thick fur, but the wolf hungered. It would be a large elk - probably weakened and hungry itself. It would be good prey, worth the hunt.

The landscape cracked into rolling valleys and frozen rivers across the rocky, snow covered ground. The glacier was thick in the distance, looming over the world like a blue and black wall of solid, serrated ice. Only the toughest soldier pines trees stood amidst this mountainous ground. The elk’s smell became sharper, more vivid on the fierce wind. The scent was stronger than expected. It wasn't a weakened elk; it smelt more like a young buck. A strong beast, one hardy enough to survive the cold. It would be a more difficult hunt, then, but still a worthwhile one.

The wolf approached the glacier slowly. The temperature dropped further. That caused the wolf to pause. The air was thick with an unnatural cold. The wolf hesitated. His every hair was suddenly on edge.

The wolf felt the warning in the wind. The wind howled through the canyons, a low shriek emanating through the world.

The wolf felt the darkness in the air before it smelt the scent. The scent of death. Without warning, the wolf turned and ran.

The direwolf wasn't easily scared, but he felt fear now.

The cold was creeping over the mountains. It was heading south.

The smell of death followed.

The sound of howling whistled in the wind, echoing over the mountains…

…

Jon's eyes opened suddenly. A wolf was howling in the distance.

His heart was beating furiously. His blood felt cold. I'm scared, Jon realised in shock. He had only just woken up.

No. It's not my fear.

The thought of his direwolf shot into his mind. Ghost.

He could feel his wolf. He could feel the phantom sensation of snow under his paws as he ran through a biting wind. Ghost was more than just a companion, Ghost was part of him.

And right now, the Ghost was scared. The direwolf didn't scare easily.

It was night, but the wildling camp was never really quiet. All around him, sleeping bodies littered the clearing under heavy cloaks, but across the distance there were sounds of people moving and livestock moving freely over the sprawling camp. The large campfires dotted the rocky hills.

Next to him, Ygritte moaned quietly, her eyes flickering as she slept. They had been huddled together as they slept, with Ygritte's ginger hair brushing against Jon's face.

A hundred thousand wildlings camped together. They were peaceful, protected. Jon was in the centre of a great army. They were camped at the edge of the Frostfangs, following the Milkwater. The wildling army had been camped for weeks now, pulling in more and more free folk from across the Thenns and Frozen Shore – preparing to march south.
It is safe, he tried to tell himself. But Jon knew it wouldn't last.

Somehow, he wasn't quite sure how, he could feel the cold. He knew in his bones that it was no ordinary cold. His heart was beating furiously. \textit{I can feel them coming.}

“… Wake up,” Jon whispered, dragging himself to his feet. It was so cold that he had been sleeping still dressed in furs. He kept Longclaw at his side constantly. “We've got to wake.”

Ygritte stirred as he lumbered up rough, yanking up his cloak. “Ygritte!” Jon hissed, as he stared around urgently. \textit{Tormund}, he thought with panic. \textit{I've got to warn Tormund.}

“What's going on?” Ygritte murmured with a tired yawn.

Jon grimaced, instantly uncertain. He recognised Tormund Giantsbane snoozing by the dying campfire, under thick bearskin furs. \textit{We need all the fighters right now.}

“Tormund!” Jon bellowed, causing the other sleeping raiders to stir. “Tormund!”

“What in blazes is going on?” Tormund stammered in irritation, pulling himself up. Other raiders were doing the same. Tormund was already clutching a heavy stone maul, growling angrily.

“Tormund… Everyone…” Jon stammered. They were staring at him. “We need to ready our men, right now! They're coming for the camp!”

“Crows?” Tormund growled.

Jon shook his head. He could still feel the cold. “No. Worse.”

“By the gods, what are you talking about, lad?” A free folk grumbled. He was already attracting attention. It was the middle of the night, things had been so quiet, but Jon just knew…

\textit{They're coming!} He hissed. “We need to get the people to safety.” Some of them were staring at him like he was mad. Jon flinched, flexing his burnt hand. “Don't ask me how I know, I just…”

In the distance, there was another howl. It was barely even audible over the backdrop of the wind whooshing through mountains.

Ygritte stared at him. She had her dagger in hand. “… Jon…” She said slowly. “… Where's your wolf at?”

There was a pause. Jon stared at Tormund, his eyes pleading. The raider looked back at him, frowning. He made the decision quickly.

“Find me Mance!” Tormund bellowed. In an instant, people were moving. “Now!”

There were more grumbles as people started to move. Free folk didn't follow orders easily. Still, they were quickly armed. All around, there were men clutching spears or notching bows.

\textit{They need more discipline}, Jon swore. \textit{They need defensive locations, battlements, better positions.} It would be on them soon, he could feel it.

“What is going on here?” A loud voice cursed. The commotion was gaining attention. The camps were starting to move. There was a rattle of bones as a man pushed his way through the crowd, flanking by two large dogs.

“The turncoat says we're under attack,” a wildling sneered, staring at Jon.
Underneath his skull helm, the Lord of Bones' mouth twisted into a vicious sneer. “Aww, did the little crow have a bad dream?” He mocked.

“They're coming for us!” Jon snapped. His body was trembling, and not just from the cold. Somewhere, somehow, Ghost was panicked. The direwolf was running for its life. “I felt them coming from north. We need to get the women and children out of here!”

“Quiet, boy!” Rattleshirt grunted. “Who is coming?”

“They!” Jon hissed. He floundered slightly. He felt scared to even say the words 'white walkers', in case that might make them real. “… I don't know, they're just… they're coming.”

There were a few taunting laughs from the growing crowd. The wildling were sneering at him. Next to him, Tormund wasn't laughing.

“The boy is a warg, Rattleshirt,” Tormund warned, clutching his maul tightly.

“The boy is fool. And a craven,” said Rattleshirt. “I've had enough of this nonsense. Get out of here.”

The stubborn bastard, Jon thought with a growl. By the time they knew he was right it would be too late. “Everybody!” Jon shouted, turning from Rattleshirt to the gathered wildlings. “Grab your weapons! They're coming from the glacier, we must–”

“Will somebody just shut him up already?” Rattleshirt ordered. His dogs were barking. “Or maybe I'll just let the hounds–”

Heavy footsteps approached. “What the hell is this ruckus?!” A stern voice demanded. “Stand down or I'll put you down.”

Jon could have sighed as he saw Mance Rayder approaching, flanked by three men with Styr, Magnar of Thenn, approaching from behind. Even despite the quiet night, more and more were gathering. Jon could even see Varamyr Sixskins prowling from the distance, on the edge of the camp. The scene looked like a brawl was breaking out, and the King-Beyond-the-Wall dealt with brawls and riots in his camp on a daily basis.

Still, Mance isn't a fool like Rattleshirt, Jon thought. He could feel his heart pounding in frantic fear. Mance would listen.

“The turncoat is crazed,” Rattleshirt scoffed, but lowering his spear as the King-Beyond-the-Wall looked between him and Jon. “He's rambling nonsense.”

“Your Gra – Mance,” Jon stammered. “We've got to get the women and children to safety. They're coming for us.”

Mance stared at him darkly. “You know what is out there,” Jon begged. He could feel it getting closer. It was like his direwolf was howling in his mind for Jon to move. Ghost was begging Jon to run as well. “Please.”

The King-Beyond-the-Wall paused. The sound of the wind was still humming in the distance, but the night was quiet. It was a chilly night. Perhaps Mance noticed the cold too – it was a cold that had an edge to it.

Mance's brow flickered. “Lord of Bones,” Mance said after a brief pause. “Go check on our watchers.”

“What?” Rattleshirt exclaimed. “We have scouts all along the valleys, there's naught out there.”

“Then check on them,” Mance ordered. The king's voice was firm. He paused for the briefest of moments, before turning.

“Varamyr!” Mance shouted, calling to the skinchanger watching in the distance. “Get your eagle into the air! Let's see if what the boy is saying is true.”

There were mutters around the camp. Rattleshirt glowered and stomped off, cursing turncoats and bastards as he bellowed orders around. Jon was clutching Longclaw tightly. If he was wrong, they would see him as a fool.

But no, he thought with a quiet sinking feeling, I'm not wrong.

The Lord of Bones snatched up a large horn, blowing it deeply three times. The whole camp was stirring now. There was a long, moment of silence as they waited for the scouts to return the call. That was the signal – when the scouts heard three horn blows from the camp, they were supposed to reply one by one.

No reply came. “They're not replying,” Rattleshirt said with a frown. He sounded confused. The watchers around the camp should have returned the horn blast. “… How could four dozen men not reply?”

There was a long moment of quiet. Mance's expression turned dark. Tormund clutched his maul to his chest. For one heartbeat, there was absolutely nothing except the wind. And the cold.

Jon could feel the dread in the air. The others started to feel it too. It rippled through the camp…

“Gather the fighters!” Mance bellowed suddenly. “All clans, now! Get Mag the Mighty here now!” He stared up at the surrounding valleys. “And light those fires! I want as many fires lit as soon as possible!”

Tormund took up the roar. “You heard the man, you lazy geezers!” He roared. “Get moving and grab a weapon already! What the hell are you doing standing around, move!”

Jon's breathing was deep. He could feel the panic spreading around him, the whole camp rippling around him. More people were shouting, screaming, or running.

He saw the fires being lit, but somehow it couldn't stop the cold.

Around him, every raider and spearwife were riled into a frenzy. The Thenns shouted for blood, followed by the dull roars of giants even from the other side of camp. The whole camp became an orchestra of clanging and shouting.

And then, the air was split by the screams. The bloodcurdling screams of dying men.

They were cradled in the Frostfang Mountains; it was a defendable valley around the Milkwater. Any army would have to march up Skirling Pass to meet them, where the free folk could fight them on equal ground. It was hard to defend such a large, sprawling camp, but Mance had done his best. Their position was as good as it could ever be.
But these foes weren’t living men. The dead weren’t funnelled into the valley; instead the dead could simply clamber over the mountains themselves. The dead could attack from all sides.

Jon felt his breath freeze as he watched the dark shapes lumber over the black rocky hills. It was a perilous route – even a sure climber would struggle to traverse the icy, rocky cliffs, but the wights didn’t care.

The dead were falling from the cliffs. They must have clambered over the peaks to charge suicidally down onto the camp. Jon glimpsed the falling bodies raining in the dark.

They were everywhere, from all sides. For a moment, Jon thought that the fall must have surely killed them, but then he heard the shouts.

The sound of hacking blades filled the air.

In the distance, a lone wolf howled.

“Jon!” Ygritte screamed. There was so much panic from all sides that Jon could barely even hear her. “Jon!”

The world blurred as Jon grabbed pulled his sword and followed the fighting. Yet the fighting was everywhere, Jon didn't even knew where to go.

Jon saw Tormund roar as he swung two mauls at once. He saw burning arrows lighting up the air. He saw shadows of raging giants as scrambling bodies threw themselves in berserk rages. He saw Mance at the centre of the camp, desperately trying to set up barricades while tents caught fire.

They needed more fires and there was no time to clamber for firewood. They were just setting the tents on fire for more heat as quickly as possible.

Something cold hit Jon's nose. One by one, he watched snowflakes fall to the ground.

It's snowing.

The snows fell softly at first, but then all at once. The sight of fighting and battle was obscured by the thick whirling flakes. Bodies were falling, and then the snow was falling too. Ygritte grabbed his arm, trying to pull him to one side. Jon had his sword in his hand, but in the dark and in the snow all of the thrashing bodies looked the same…

The shouting and screaming filled the air.

Too disorderly, not enough discipline, Jon thought with panic. Every raider fought by himself, every clan kept to their own. They were all running blind while the enemy attacked from all sides.

“Fight you cravens!” Tormund howled through the storm. “Fight!”

Ygritte was in front of him, with Longspear Ryk firmly by her side. Ygritte cursed in the storm and dropped her bow, pulling out a short bronze sword instead. Between the snow, the dark and the chaos, any bowmen were useless – no free folk could get a clean shot.

But the wights had no such hesitation. There were dull thuds as arrows cut down three men around Jon. A barbed arrow bit into the ground next to his foot. Longspear cursed violently as another arrow clipped his arm.

There are undead archers on the cliffs, Jon realised with a jolt. They shot arrows randomly into the camp and probably hit their own forces as much as they hit the free folk, but that didn't matter. A wight could easily walk off an arrow, even one through the brain, while a living man couldn't.

Jon reacted on pure instinct as he glimpsed a blue-eyed creature come shambling at him. Longclaw cleaved straight through its skull, but the thing kept on trying to claw at him. He wrestled with the creature, frantically trying to push it away, until raider dragged the wight away and split it in two.

He saw another wight – one missing the lower half of its body – clawing on the ground desperately towards them. Jon kicked it in the head and its neck cracked, but it still kept on coming.

The wights were vicious creatures. The more recently deceased, the nearly intact ones, they wielded swords or mauls and fought with berserk rage. Still, even the decaying wights – the creatures with rotting bones and flesh – they would still charge in with bare hands.

There was no self-preservation instinct. No restraint.

We can still win this, Jon thought with a gulp. They needed to rally the clans, get people fighting together. We take a stand at the edge of the Milkwater, and fight together…

The free folk outnumbered the wights. The wights fought hard, but they fell quickly too. If only they could stop the chaos then this would be a short fight…

“Come…!” Ygritte shouted. “… We need to run!”

Jon grimaced, and shook his head. “No! We can beat them!” He shouted. “Gather whoever you can and stick together! We can win this, I know it!”

Her eyes were wide. Her face was pale. “You know nothing, Jon Snow.”

Jon felt the shiver go down his spine. She must have realised before he did. The wights were charging in madly. This is only the first wave of an assault.

The temperature dropped.

It was the like the quiet oozed slowly over the battlefield. In the darkness, men were screaming, and then the screaming stopped. The breath froze in their lungs, their shrieks failed to carry through the air, and something shivered in the world itself.

It was them.

They moved with an unnatural grace, gliding over the snows, leaving no footprints in their wake and clutching blades that shimmered with an icy luminescence – swords so cold that the air crackled around them. The white walkers were deadly ghosts amongst the chaos of battlefield. With every step they took, men died.

Jon saw bright blue eyes glittering in the dark, while the snows swirled and danced around them.

First, they sent in the dead first to create panic. Now, the masters themselves take to the field.

Jon watched the campfires flicker and die as they passed. The air was so cold it hurt to breathe. Every breath felt like a knife in his chest.

They were coming from the north. The creatures cut through the camp with ease, flanked by wights off all shapes and sizes. Jon saw undead wolves, hogs, bears, and shadowcats – decaying animals with bright blue eyes. There were dark shadows looming over the rocks – resurrected rotten giants lumbering into the battle.

The army of the free folk – the greatest, largest gathering the far north had ever known – was being torn to pieces from all sides.

Ygritte was dragging him, pleading desperately. The air was so cold that her tears froze on her cheek. She was shouting something, but Jon couldn't hear over the sound of the screams.

Jon had no choice. He turned and ran.

Skill meant nothing when life or death was just a gamble. Arrows were flying randomly through the air, swords were hacking. Every moment more men were dying, and it was pure chance whether or not Jon would be one of them.

Dark, spindly shapes broke off of the group. They moved so fast and so graceful that Jon could barely make them out, but then there were men falling to the ground screaming.

The spiders were as large as hounds, ice-white with long, gangly legs. The ice spiders tore into men as they tried to flee, clicking and biting as they dragged men bodily across the ground.

The white walkers turned and watched their spiders, as a harsh crackling sound filled the air.

Laughter. They're laughing.

Even in the middle of the battle, they laughed at their spiders like huntsmen watching hounds bring down their quarry.

This isn't a battle, it's a slaughter. Like it's all just a sport to the Others.

Jon's hands were trembling so badly that he could barely hold his sword.

There were more people screaming in terror than shouting in defiance now. The host was being broken into pieces, with men scattered to the mountains. The clans broke, each one fighting or running by himself.

The wildling army – the one that the sworn brothers had come to fight – was sent running for the hills.

I'm a fool, he thought quietly. He didn't stop running. Ygritte was still holding his hand. Lord Commander Mormont was a fool. Qhorin Halfhand had been a fool. The Night's Watch was comprised of fools.

All of this time, they had been fighting against wildlings, trying to stop wildlings.

The Night's Watch. The shield that guards the realm of men. They had been trying to shield against the wrong foe.

And now the Others had come for them all.

…

“Run,” Ygritte hissed in his ear, panting for breath. It was the only word she had said for so many desperate hours. “Run!”

The word echoed in Jon's head until it lost all meaning, echoing like the cawing of a raven. Run, run, run…
Jon could barely run any longer. He could feel himself weakening with every step, each breath getting hoarser than the last. With every frantic step, he stumbled a bit more. Sooner or later, he would fall, and he didn’t... he couldn’t imagine how he would be able to stand again.

The mountains were harsh and uneven. The Frostfangs earned their name. Between the snows and the rocks, it was hard travelling.

Still, they couldn't stop. Jon couldn't see those that pursued them, but he knew they were out there. He could feel them, like the ice in his lungs.

When the wildling horde broke, the free folk scattered in every direction. Most of them tried to flee by following the Milkwater down the pass, but it proved a folly. The Others had come prepared – they had barely made it a mile before they saw the lumbering shadows blockading the pass. A group of wight giants brought up the rear – cutting off any escape through the valley.

The fleeing free folk had been trapped between the giants, all the while those ice spiders hounded their rear relentlessly. There could be no fighting either foe – the giants were so large, strong and resilient that they seemed indestructible, while the ice spiders were even worse. The spiders were silent and ruthless assassins, invisible in the snowstorm as they cut down men one by one, from all directions. Perhaps an organised defence and formation could have beaten them, but there was no hope in the panicked chaos of the fleeing wildlings.

Instead, there had been no choice except to escape over the valley cliffs, trying to climb the rocky outcrop through the Frostfangs to escape the undead.

It hadn't been an honourable retreat or an easy escape. The thought left a bitter taste in Jon's mouth. He knew fine well that the only reason they had survived was because the ice spiders had been too busy killing all other runners like him. They had been one of the few lucky enough to make it out of the valley, simply because the Others couldn't kill them all quickly enough.

Like rolling the dice. Nothing but chance that separated living men from the dead.

It had been a close thing too. Ygritte was a swift climber, but Jon had been struggling clambering up after her up a cliff wall when an ice spider had skittered up after him. He had barely even seen it before suddenly vicious, hooked fangs bit into his leg.

The spider had been as big as a small dog, but its bite was deadly cold and sharp, and it had very nearly pulled Jon straight off the cliff. If it hadn't have been for Longspear Ryk catching the beast with an arrow, then it probably would have killed Jon too.

He didn't know where Ryk was now. They had lost sight of each other somewhere in the chaos, the screaming and the running.

It was just him and Ygritte now, running through ice cold barren terrain.

There had been others who had escaped the cliffs like they had, but no one stuck together. All of the free folk had ran their individual ways, running blindly into the mountains. A large group was a bigger target. Right now, their only hope was to run and pray that the Others picked somebody else to chase.

It was instinctive. There had been no hesitation in that moment, just pure, life-or-death survival.

"Jon," Ygritte gasped, half-dragging him over the snow. Her arm was wrapped around their shoulder. "Run, Jon, run."
He was getting slower with every step. He couldn't feel his leg anymore. It just felt cold. Somehow, that numbness felt more terrifying than the pain had. The blood felt frozen in his leg.

Did the spiders have venom in their fangs? He thought with a panic. Or maybe it was just blood loss, or cold. Either way, his leg was becoming more and more stiff. It was a wonder he had lasted this long, but he wouldn't be able to run much longer.

All around them, the snows didn't stop.

The Frostfangs were perilous. The wildling host had been camped by the Milkwater for weeks, but they still hadn't mapped the mountains fully. Right now, Jon's and Ygritte's only chance was to keep on running along whatever route they could and hope that they might stumble onto some pass out of the mountains.

He had no idea where he was going. It was only when he glimpsed a shape in the distance – the silhouette of a looming mound over horizon – that Jon recognised the landscape.

“… Ygritte…” he gasped, his throat raw. That was the glacier over in that direction. “We're heading north.”

“What choice do we have?” She grunted, staggering over the rocks. “There's no pass through the mountains here, and they'll kill us if we turn back. They're blocking the south. We have to just keep going, maybe we can slip by them. Maybe some of the other clans survived.”

Jon gasped weakly as he struggled over an outcrop. “We can slip around to the Frozen Shore,” Ygritte continued. “… Maybe find a crossing over the Bay of Ice. We cross the sea and we go south – as far south as south goes. It's our only chance.”

No, Jon almost argued. They should be trying to make through Skirling Pass or down the Giant's Stairs. If they could get to the Fist of the First Men, then maybe they had a chance. The Night's Watch might be their only hope.

Still, Jon hadn't told anybody about the ranging camped at the Fist of the First Men. He had kept that secret from Mance and all of the others. Just like Qhorin ordered him too – Jon had been a good, little, dumb soldier.

“We've got to head towards the glacier. There are passages there we could slip through,” Ygritte muttered, her whole body shivering. “I know those rocks – there are tunnels all under the ice. Old tombs buried for a thousand years. Hells, we must have opened half a hundred of those tombs under there searching for a bloody legend…”

She was mumbling under her breath. “Dammit Mance,” she cursed, ranting through panic. “We should have left the mountains weeks ago. He was the one that insisted in lingering a few weeks longer, searching for that bloody horn…”

The Horn of Winter. Mance had believed it was in the Frostfangs, and Qhorin had ordered Jon to join the wildlings searching for it. All of this time in the wildling host, and Jon had only ever heard mutterings. All Jon knew was that the free folk had been searching for the horn, and that Mance had held off the journey south as they searched…

Jon staggered, stopping for breath. Ygritte had to pull him to stop him collapsing. “Come on, Jon Snow,” she ordered. “Now is no time to kneel.”

“… Can't keep on running…” He wheezed.
“Course we can. We can always run. We can run all the way south.” Her voice was as hard as iron.
“We go south and you got to show me all those fancy, stone castles of yours. Let's go and drink southern wine and see the blooming forests, and search for the lands of eternal summer. We'll cross the sea and keep on going until the end of the world, just you and me.”

Despite the pain, he smiled softly. “I promised you I'd show you a proper castle,” he muttered. His head felt woozy.

“Aye. You did. You still owe me a castle. Don't go making a liar out of yourself now.”

_Not a liar. A fool._

The cliffs of ice stretched out in front of them. It was a labyrinth of winding sheets of ice – like a world of ice surrounding. The path became thinner, more perilous. They were walking on a shelf of ice that was cracking apart.

Even despite the danger, the snows, the pain, it was still beautiful. A weird, unearthly beauty. They were on top of a glacier, staring out at the very edge of the world. The Lands of Always Winter stretched out before them.

It looked as beautiful as it did cold.

“… I really wanted to show you a castle,” Jon admitted weakly. The route was getting harder now. The cracks in the ice were deeper – large crevasses surrounding them like the ice had been shredded by a giant knife. Icy cliffs like serrated thorns.

Ahead of them, the path cracked away into nothingness. They were at the very edge of the glacier, where the ice fell away in a sharp vertical cliff. Ygritte cursed silently, trying to find another route down. Maybe it was climbable, but the ice was as sharp as blades and as tall as a castle wall.

There was no route down, not easily.

Around them, the snow churned. Jon could feel the cold and death approaching them. He felt their presence chill his bones.

He saw the ghostly outlines moving towards them in the snow.

_They must have been following for a while now_, he realised slowly. They hunted with unnatural patience. The Others could have attacked any time that they wanted, but they didn't. Instead, they just waited and followed.

_The cold and the dead never hurried. They know there's never any escape._

He heard Ygritte curse in the Old Tongue. She had lost her spear as they ran, she only had a bone dagger. Jon kept Longclaw at his side. He could barely make out the figures, but there were a few of them. They were shapes gliding over the snow towards them.

The cliffs of ice stretched out behind them. The ranger and the spearwife huddled together facing demons of ice atop of a frozen glacier.

The white walkers took their time. They always took their time. They were as patient as ice.

Ygritte clutched her dagger tightly. Jon kept both hands on the pommel of his sword. _I can't run_, he thought quietly. His leg felt lame. Even if he could scale the cliff, he wouldn't be able to outrun them.
Jon stared at Ygritte. If he died, she would die with him.

“… Go find those castles, Ygritte,” Jon muttered, taking a deep breath. “Run. I'll hold them off.”

Her eyes blazed with fear. “Like hell you will. They'll kill you. They'll kill you and then they'll raise you again.”

“Yes,” said Jon. “But you might be able to survive. You can still run, I can't.”

She gulped, but shook her head. “I'll never run fast enough. All men must die, Snow, but I'm not leaving you to face those things alone.”

“Ygritte, you have to run!” he snapped.

“Bugger that.” Her face was pale, but her eyes were pure defiance. “I'm a free folk, I don't follow orders.”

Jon's hands clenched. It took the last slivers of strength he had left to pull himself up straight.

Ygritte looked ready to charge against those things armed with only a dagger. “I won't let you die here.”

The Others were coming. He saw three figures approach from the storm; they were gliding over the snow towards them, but slowly. So slow it was mocking.

“You don't get to choose how I die!” Ygritte snapped. Her free arm wrapped around his, huddled together. “And I'm not leaving. There is absolutely no way that I will leave you to face these things alone, Jon Snow, you know that.”

“No,” he growled, feeling his heart pounding. With a deep breath, he grabbed Ygritte by the back of the head, pulling her towards him. Their lips slammed together in a sudden kiss. She tasted like fire. She tasted warm.

The last thing he saw was her eyes widen in surprise, her red hair flickering over his face. The kiss was fleeting, but deep, intense and passionate.

“… I know nothing.”

Without out another word, his hands pushed against her chest. The shove took her completely by surprise.

One second they were kissing, and then the next Jon was pushing her backwards straight over the cliff.

There wasn't enough time for her to even curse him before she fell.

It was maybe a twelve-foot drop, he thought, feeling hollow. Maybe more, but hopefully the snow would cushion the landing. Hopefully she would miss the blades ice. Hopefully.

For all he knew, he might have just pushed Ygritte to her death.

Still, maybe down there she had a small chance of survival. If she had stayed up here, she would have had none.

He drew Longclaw, clutching the sword with both hands. The Valyrian steel blade hummed in the night. Jon glared at the white walkers.
“Come!” Jon shouted, holding his sword firmly. His hands weren't shivering anymore. It was too cold to shiver. He charged with all the speed his lame leg would give him, limping furiously at the Others, swinging the bastard sword with all the strength he could muster. “Come!”

One final charge. Outnumbered, outmatched, and wounded.

He knew he was going to die.

Still, I'm not going to make it easy for them.

Every second that I'm still breathing is another second that Ygritte has to live.

The Other jumped backwards with all the grace of a cat. Up close, it was tall and gaunt with flesh pale as milk, with cold eyes as bright as blue stars. It had weird, graceful beauty – a frozen elegance like a statue. Its skin rippled with every shade of ice – somewhere between icy blue and brilliant white, rippling so softly it was hard to even create track of its movements, even when it was less than three feet away.

Its speed was unnatural. It wielded a white blade finer than steel, but sharper and colder than any Jon had ever seen. Jon slashed again, but it dodged without even parrying. There was a sound like the crackling of ice.

Laughter, he realised. They are laughing at me.

The three white walkers surrounded him. Jon swung wide and fast in wild arcs, but they danced around his blade. They seemed to take turns to swipe at him with fine blades of their own, causing him to stumble, but none of them pressed on with the attack.

Instead, it was more like an eerie, childlike fascination. They swiped at him only to watch him stumble, and laughed at him as they danced around his strokes.

Toying with me. Like a game to them.

Jon's jaw clenched. The blades glittered and sparkled in the storm like moonlight.

“… I am the sword in the darkness…” Jon growled, slashing upwards as he charged forward.

Blue eyes shone at him tauntingly. “I am the watcher on the walls…”

Their blades buzzed with cold. He felt the edge graze against his back softly, but the pain still shot through his body. He knew that even a single cut would cause frostbite. Ice so cold it burned.

“… I am the fire that burns against the cold!” he snarled, grunting against the burning pain in his back.

Their blades flashed together, time and time again. Jon met them stroke for stroke, right up until the moment the one behind him idly kicked out his remaining leg.

Jon collapsed to the ground. The Other's gaze was taunting as it brought its sword down in an executioner's arc.

His sword-hand worked on instinct. Longclaw shot through the air.

The icy blade struck firmly against with Valyrian steel. The sound rung out like delicate glass chiming
For a moment, the Other even seemed surprised.

“… the light that brings the dawn!” Jon bellowed, striking upwards with renewed strength. He felt a blade strike against his back, but the Other in front was wide open. The creature didn't react in time as Longclaw plunged firmly into its chest.

Suddenly, the figure cracked and splintered into a thousand glittering specks of ice. The Other disintegrated under his sword.

Jon howled triumphantly, swinging at the Other behind him.

“The horn that wakes the sleepers!” Jon screamed. Their swords clashed together, each stroke ringing like a crystal chiming.

Briefly, he thought he might, somehow, be able to overpower the white walker.

That lasted right up until the third Other swung his blade at the same time.

Jon saw the attack coming. He knew he couldn't dodge it. His body didn't even twitch.

The icy blade plunged straight into Jon's chest.

The cold made the wound feel more numb more than painful.

Jon's body sagged but he didn't drop. The sword was still sticking out of his chest, with the white walker holding the blade. His fingers groped weakly at the Other's cold hand.

“… The shield that guards the realm of man…” he whispered.

He could feel his body turning cold. He looked down, staring at the blood weeping out of his chest. The white walkers were above him, staring down, watching him in unnatural silence.

I took one down, he thought. I killed one of them.

In the distance, a lone wolf howled.

For some reason he couldn't quiet explain, Jon felt a small smile come to his lips. He was smiling softly. He felt his body deaden slowly, like ice was flowing through his veins. It didn't hurt, it just felt so… numb.

So cold I can't even feel it.

The Other pulled its blade out of his chest. Jon Snow dropped to his knees.

“… And now my watch has ended.” The words were as soft as the snow falling on his face.

With that, he collapsed.

The white walkers paused, picking up Jon's sword off the ground, holding it gingerly, before turning and walking away.

Jon was left lying on the snow, staring upwards into the glowing night's sky. He had never seen the stars so close.

There was something cold on his face, running down his cheeks. Tears.
I'm crying, he thought softly. Such a strange thought.

The last thing he saw was his own blood pouring out around him. The red wept out of the hole in his chest, soaking into the white around him. As his warm blood hit the cold snow, the snow evaporated in a quiet hiss of steam around him. Jon could see the faint tendrils of steam dance around his fading eyes like the smoke from a fire.

And then everything went black.

…

He had a weird dream. It was a dream as vivid as a forgotten memory.

He dreamt of giant roots weaving through the ground beneath of them, threading through the earth, but slowly forgotten by time.

He dreamt of river frozen solid, of bodies trapped in the still current, unable to move on.

He dreamt of grand structure of white stone so fine that it glittered, but abandoned and decaying; a castle so ancient that slowly, like the movement of the world, it was swallowed by a creeping wall of ice.

He dreamt of mountains rising and falling. Of summers and winters so fast that they flickered in the blink of eye. So many cycles that the earth itself rose, fell, and froze.

He dreamt of blistering heat and scalding cold. A heart of fire and a heart of cold, at opposite sides of the world. The heart of fire had burnt, raged and smoked for hundreds of years – an inferno that sucked the life and the magic out of the world – all the while the heart of cold slept and waited under the ground.

He dreamt of ice and fire, dancing around each other to the sound of harps.

He dreamt of a woman with dark brown hair and grey eyes, sleeping as soundly as the dead on a bed of pale blue roses.

And he dreamt of enormous white wings, smashing through ice and snow with a crack like thunder…
Chapter 2

Chapter Summary

Waking up, and coming back to life.

Chapter 2

The Ice Dragon

He had been asleep for so long.

No, asleep is the wrong word. Rather, imprisoned.

Imprisoned by a cage of ice. A mountain of ice and snow pressing onto him, so heavy he couldn't even move. The weight of a mountain pressed above him. A mountain accumulated over centuries, the ice becoming heavier and stronger with each decade.

It had become so hard to breathe, so hard to move. He had fled north to escape the doom – to escape the fires that had sucked the sorcery out of the world. He tried to take refuge in the lands as far north as north would go, the lands so thick with old power that not even the doom itself could burn through them.

Still, the ice and the cold had proved just as perilous as the fire.

The cold crept up on him, sucking his strength. One day, he had stopped to land and then, the next, the ice was so thick he couldn't get up again.

He had already been weakened after flying for so long. His body had grown large and heavy, too large to easily support itself. He needed to feed on more than just meat – he needed the magic, but he could feel the magic in the world slowly draining away. It starved him.

It felt like the magic of the world was dying.

He had turned to the cold as his salvation, and then the cold had become his prison.

He had once been so strong, but the cold had sapped that strength bit by bit. Slowly, he had felt the ice start to blanket him until he couldn't move. Before long, the ice became a cage. It froze him to the bone.

As his eyes closed, he felt himself dying.

The last of a dying breed.

Frozen. Buried. Turned to stone.

He had been dead to the world for so, so long.

…

That was until he felt the blood drip slowly against his brow. It was first thing that had touched him in over four hundred years.

This blood was special. This blood could melt the snow and remain warm. This blood refused to freeze.

This blood had power in it.

This blood caused frozen eyes to flicker. The earth began to rumble.

It wasn't much blood, but it was enough. Enough to cause a frozen heart to beat again. Enough for muscles to tremble and to stir. It was enough for him to take a long, deep frozen breath. It was enough for him to wake, and to remember when he had been strong.

His body twitched, and stirred.

He wasn't just cold anymore. He had become the cold.

Slowly, carefully – like the glacial shift of continents – powerful wings began to unfurl.

The prison of ice protested. The weight of the mountain tried to keep him buried. The struggle was hard, but he thrashed and persevered. He longed to be free.

He roared with all the force of four hundred years of caged fury.

The mountain cracked.

The sky broke.

When his wings broke through the surface, they pounded with all the force of a storm. The air cracked with the sound of thunder. Boulders of ice the size of mammoths shattered everywhere.

And suddenly he was lifting upwards again. He was flying. He was rising up and up into the sky…

…

Jon gasped suddenly, clutching his chest. His lungs felt frozen. It took him a while to realise that his heart was beating – slowly, uncertainly.

His head was spinning, struggling to move. He felt cold. So, so cold. Colder than any living man had a right to be.

I should be dead, he thought, still gasping breath. I felt myself die.

Am I dead?

He clutched at his chest in shock. His fingers could feel the wound in the very centre of his chest, just under his ribcage. The white walker's blade had gone straight through his chest and out of the other side. The freezing cold had cauterised the wound, leaving nothing but an ugly scar two inches thick.

Briefly, Jon wondered whether or not his eyes had turned blue. He remembered the white walker's blade plunging into his chest. He shouldn't have survived a stab like that.

But I can feel my heart beating, he told himself. It was slow, laborious, but it was beating. I can’t be a wight. Can I?
What is going on?

Every breath felt sore, laboured. He was struggling to breathe. He couldn't see anything. It took him a while to realise that he was buried under a few inches of snow.

He tried weakly to pull himself up. The pain in his chest was so intense he couldn't even scream.

I can't be dead. Dead people surely couldn't feel this much pain?

Strangely, he heard the voice of Dolorous Edd echoing in his head at that moment. "The dead are likely dull fellows," Edd's ghostly voice mused. "Full of tedious complaints—the ground is too cold, my gravestone should be larger, why does he get more worms than I do?"

The sudden thought was so surreal it made him laugh. His chuckle turned to pain, his scar throbbing. He could only moan, rolling weakly in the snow as he prayed for the pain to go away.

What happened? Jon eventually thought with confusion. The last I remember, I was bleeding out in the snow…

He paused, struggling as a weirder memory hit him. No, he thought slowly. That's not true. I remember something else…

Jon remembered the sensation of waking up. He remembered a centuries-long sleep coming to an end. He remembered moving limbs that had long since been frozen. He remembered thrashing and dragging himself out of the earth in a tremendous crash of power.

Jon remembered the feeling of beating wings, and flying through the night's sky.

Those aren't my memories, he realised. Normally, when Jon had dreams that weren't his own, they were dreams of being a wolf. He had never had a dream like that before.

Jon stared at his hands. He was still wearing his furs and cloak, but they were stained in blood and shredded. He was lying in the snow, and the wind was so far below freezing. By rights, he should have frozen to death a thousand times by now.

His skin was pale, but he wasn't trembling. There was hoarfrost clinging to his skin.

Why didn't the cold kill me?

It was hard to focus. His eyes were struggling to process anything but the snow and the dark. Something pale whipped across his eyes. At first, he thought it was more snow, until he wiped at his head.

“My hair,” he realised with shock. The light was faint, but his dark black, overgrown locks were gone. Instead, he was left clutching at hair as white as bone. The cold had frozen his hair to a white the color of ash or bone.

His heart pounded. His senses started to return through the fog of disorientation, panic and pain. I need a fire, he thought. I'm suffering severe shock, hypothermia, and probably frostbite. I'm in shock and I can't feel it. I need heat. I need a fire.

Where the hell am I?

Jon managed to prop himself up. He wasn't on the glacier anymore. He had no idea where he was. He could see absolutely nothing but snow-swept plains illuminated in the dark. The only light was from the dancing aurora borealis weaving in the moonlit sky above him – a shimmering green and red that illuminated the sky. It took his eyes a while to adjust. He had never seen the northern lights so bright before.

He wasn’t in the Frostfangs before. He could see the constellations above him – but the Stallion had never been so high in the sky, nor had the Sword in the Morning ever seemed so low. He couldn’t even see the Galley or the Sow, and the Moonmaid had never seemed so lost.

He was in the frozen wastes far north of the mountains. He was so far north that the very stars in the sky had changed.

Realisation twanged. I'm north, he realised. I'm further north than I've ever been before. I must be far off the edge of the maps – no ranging has ever gone this far north.

How?

Why didn't the cold kill me?

His heart started to pound. The white walkers. Did the white walkers bring me with them after they stabbed me? Am I their captive, or worse…?

Slowly, more memories started to return. Surreal, weird visions. Visions of breaking free. Visions of blue eyes. Visions of flying. He tried to drag himself upwards, still staring entranced by the aurora above him.

No… Jon thought, still clutching at his chest. The white walkers didn't do this…

He felt the impact before he heard it. It was a dull beat like the banging of a drum that reverberated into his heart, dull and consistent. The beat of wings.

Jon was still staring upwards as he watched the dark shadow pass over the northern lights. The shadow was so large it could have blocked out the sun.

Jon stared dumbfounded as the ice dragon roared.

…

Panic.

Confusion.

Those moments were a blur.

The dragon was beyond enormous. It was at least a hundred foot long from tail to shout, and then wider from each wingtip. Its whole body was deep white but with red veins tracing down its side and across its wings. The wings were sinewy, but with powerful, muscular upper arms and clawed legs that hung backwards as it weaved through the sky.

Its body itself was scaled and spiked, with spiny red crests running all the way down its back to its tail. The tail whipped around the air, while each beat of powerful wings caused the air to shudder slightly.

The roar was like the howl of a hurricane. Jon's ears were still ringing, his head splitting open in pain.

He watched as the dragon circled around him three times, before disappearing into the night with two beats of its powerful wings.

Jon was already running. He didn't know where to. His leg felt stiff and lame, but he was still limping over the heavy snowdrifts.

A dragon.

A dragon.

They were supposed to be extinct.

Do dragons still live Beyond-the-Wall? Could that dragon have lived all this time up at the furthest north?

No… Jon thought slowly. His memories were still jumbled and blurred, but they slowly came into focus. He remembered a sleep of eons, he remembered waking up. He remembered flying.

I woke it up. He didn't… he didn't know how he knew that, but he knew it was true. He had been bleeding out on the glacier and the dragon had been buried beneath him. My blood woke the dragon.

Is that how I'm still alive?

The dragon must have carried him here, to this place so far away from the Frostfangs. Why? How? Why didn't the cold kill me?

Jon's body shivered. There was no sign of life on the frozen plains. His body was still deathly weak. The adrenaline kept him moving, but his strength was failing quickly.

His leg was lame. His chest hurt to breathe. He was in the middle of the uncharted wilderness and there was a dragon stalking above him.

And how the hell am I going to survive?

There was no shelter, no way to light a fire.

Jon managed five steps, before finally collapsing face first into the snow.

...

He felt himself falling through the world.

He saw snapshots of a different life. A different perspective, he was staring down through reptilian eyes as he hovered over a frozen wasteland.

His body was weak. Hungry. Everything was different. He was lost, and his muscles screamed in pain. He needed to eat. He needed to heal.

After being caged for so long he was left scrawny, weak and hungry.

And all around him, he could feel the demons. The creatures of dark ice and death. He could feel their eyes on him, stalking him hungrily from the ground.

The cold and death longed to hunt him.
Let them come. He had been dead to the world for so long.

He would never die again.

He roared in fury, and the sound of his cry splitting through the storm.

…

Jon woke up woozily. He felt heat. He felt the cold draining away slowly.

His eyes flickered. There was a fire. He was in front of a fire. A campfire. Jon blinked, trying to process what was happening. They were in a cave. There was a figure dragging him, dropping him over into a small hollow as a fire crackled in front of him.

He felt his ruined furs being stripped off him, he felt warm rags being pressed against his wounds. Strangely, the feeling of warmth felt almost alien.

Jon groaned weakly. “Easy,” a hoarse voice muttered. The voice was as dry and as rough as sandpaper, almost a rasp. “You are very weak.”

Jon didn't object. He could feel cold hands tending to his wounds, pressing poultice up against his injuries. Somebody was tending to him. He didn't know who and he didn't know why, but they were trying to heal him.

For the life of him, Jon wasn't even strong enough to focus on the figure. He could see nothing but blurry outlines and flickering light.

Still, I'm alive.

He hadn't expected to ever be alive again. Jon groaned as he slowly dropped back into a wounded slumber. The world went black.

He woke later as he felt someone press a skin of water to his lips. His throat was painfully dry. When the water hit his throat he nearly gagged.

The cold and numbness was fading away. Instead, Jon just felt pain.

“Drink,” the hoarse voice said. “You must drink.”

Jon's eyes slowly managed to focus. He was in a small cave, with a campfire burning less than a few feet away from him. The air smelled of rot and old humus, and the walls of the cavern were coated in ice. A man in black was standing over him, features inscrutable under a dark hood. The figure was wearing nothing but black; black furs, black boots, black hood. Was this man a brother of the Night's Watch?

There was a rustle of feathers and cawing. All around the cave, Jon saw half a dozen ravens rustling around him. They flapped everywhere, one even landing on the figure’s shoulder. He did nothing to brush the bird off.

Jon could smell something else too, a pungent tone to the cave’s air. Dried meat and blood.

Jon tried to speak. His throat was so weak he could barely even breathe.
“Easy. You are lucky to be alive,” the stranger said. “There are not many strong enough to resist the power of the Others. There are even fewer who can drag themselves back to life afterwards.”

“… What?” Jon gasped. His voice was so weak.

“You were touched by the Others. Their power freezes the living but doesn't quite kill; it creates a stasis between life and death. An undeath. Once frozen, their power will consume you until you are nothing more than a thrall.” The voice was low. “But their influence can be shattered. Before you fully lose yourself, it's possible to break free. If you are very recently dead, resuscitation can even be possible. You were in the hold of the white walkers yet swiped out of their grip.”

Jon blinked, struggling to understand. The pain in his chest was agonising. The stranger's face was still hidden in the depths of his hood, obscured under a thick scarf. “… In a sense,” the man continued, in his deep, sombre voice. “Their power may have even saved your life. It was only while you were frozen on the brink of undeath that the cold couldn't kill you, and your injuries didn’t cause you to bleed out. Their power preserved your body despite the cold, it sealed your wounds and gave you time – long enough for me to find you.”

Jon could only stare. The hooded figure’s head tilted slightly, examining him. “… But be careful…” he continued. “Those who have felt the white walker's touch can never truly be free of it. You will feel their chill on your soul for the rest of your days.”

Jon coughed slowly. His body felt so weak. “… How do you know?” he muttered after a long silence.

For a while, there was no reply. Then, the stranger leaned in closely and placed his hand on Jon's shoulder. “Because I feel it on mine.”

His hands were cold. Jon stared down and realised suddenly the stranger wasn't wearing gloves. His hands were black. Black and cold.

Jon flinched suddenly. He jerked so hard that the pain shot through his chest, and he erupted into a coughing fit. There was blood in his mouth.

“Easy,” the stranger warned. Around him, the ravens echoed the word, cawing “Easy, easy, easy,” into the distance.

“You're a wight,” Jon gasped weakly.

His head tilted. “Yes.”

Jon's stared. He had no sword, and he was in no condition to fight, but his body still flinched. He was in a cave being healed by a dead man.

The wight slowly lowered his hood back, only slightly, but enough to reveal his upper face. His skin was deathly pale, clung to the bones of his face like something desiccated. His eyes were pitch black, though, not blue. “I was in the grip of the Others as well, once. Like you, I broke free... but not before my body was well and truly dead. My heart stopped beating a long time ago, and it will never beat again.”

Jon’s eyes were wide. “If I wanted you dead, I would have left you where I found you. You were very close to dying again before I found you, Jon Snow.”

He knows my name. “How did you find me? Why?”
“I have a companion that directed me to you.” The ravens fluttered around him. “And I saved you for the same reason that I myself was saved a long time ago…”

He threw another log onto the fire. It crackled. “…Because our war is not done with us yet,” muttered the stranger. “Sleep now and heal, brother, your fight has only begun.”

Jon stayed in that cave for days, cradled by the fire. The cave was hidden in a hill of the frozen wastes, and every so often he could hear the howl of the winds outside, a thin shriek in the tunnels. For days Jon could only slip in and out of a vague consciousness as he recovered. Aside from him and the stranger, and the many ravens, they were alone.

“…Why didn't the cold kill me?” Jon eventually asked, staring at the stranger. “And how did my blood wake the dragon?”

The stranger simply shook his head. “I have no answers to give you, brother. You ask things that are beyond me.”

“Then who can I ask?” Jon demanded.

“I will bring you to him, when you are well,” the stranger promised, and said no more.

It took four more days before Jon was strong enough to stand. Another four before he could walk. The stranger watched and guarded him with all the patience of the dead. Sometimes, the dead man went out and to hunt for food, riding on an enormous elk that inexplicably seemed to obey. Otherwise the dead man guarded Jon in silence, and continued to guard Jon as his strength slowly returned.

Even when the stranger was away, the ravens would always linger in the cave. The birds would caw and flutter – some would leave and others would arrive, but they would always watch him. The ravens were guarding him too. Nothing about them felt natural.

Every time the stranger came back, Jon would always ask more questions. Trying to find answers.

“That dragon… was it buried underneath the glacier?” Jon asked one day.

The stranger nodded. “Yes, buried for a long time.”

Jon paused, gave it a long moment’s thought. “There are old tombs in the mountains. Tombs beneath that glacier,” he muttered, almost to himself. “Mance was searching for the Horn of Joramun. He said it could break the Wall. Mance kept saying there was forgotten power in the Frostfangs…”

The stranger glanced at him. “…Sometimes old legends get muddled up.”

The stranger didn't speak any more after that, and Jon had too much to think on.

All that time Mance was searching for the Horn of Winter, could he have actually been searching for a buried ice dragon?

The Horn of Winter was supposed to be a power that could destroy the Wall and wake the giants. Jon wondered just how much a giant dragon would qualify.

Jon's strength returned slowly. His body still felt frail and weak. He had trouble breathing, and the pain in his chest was nothing short of agony. His hands felt numb, and he felt like he had lost some of the movement in his fingers.
His left leg was the worst, though. It was stiff and weak. Jon struggled to move it below the knee. There were ugly gouges on his leg of where the ice spider's fangs had stripped the muscles near his upper thigh.

Jon had also lost three toes; two on his left foot, and one on the right. The frostbite had bit them clean off. On his left hand, he had also lost his little finger.

Jon spent hours lying in the cave, staring at his mutilated hand. He saw the burns on pale flesh, the scars from where he had once thrown the lantern to save the Lord Commander. With only four fingers, he scarcely could recognise his own hand any more.

He remembered that when he’d first left Winterfell so long ago, he had scarcely had any scars at all.

Still more days passed. Slowly, Jon started to walk again.

The stranger had done all he could. He had proven a talented healer; treating Jon with herbs and poultices that Jon couldn't even recognise. He had tended to Jon's wounds diligently; slowly easing the ice out of the wounds made by Other's sword. He had smeared strange white paste onto the wounds; a paste that dripped red sap, a paste that had stung so badly that it made Jon gasp, but would eventually cause his skin to tingle strangely. Whatever it was, it worked – it helped to heal wounds that should have been debilitating.

Jon felt his face with his hand. He had no mirror, but his features felt pale and gaunt, like his skin was stretched tight over the bones of his face. It felt rougher, like it had been burned by the cold. He had lost weight, he had lost muscle. He had seen men who had been exposed to the winter before; they always had carried with them that haunted look in their eyes.

The cold would always leave its mark. Now, Jon knew what that mark felt like. Between his gauntness and his hair that been frozen white, Jon doubted if he was even recognisable anymore.

The stranger returned late one night. This far north, there were barely any days or nights – instead the world just lingered in a state of perpetual dusk.

"Are you strong enough to move?" the dead man asked. Jon glanced to the stranger. His clothes were a bit more ragged, and there was dried, rotten blood on his sword.

Jon nodded. “Yes,” he said firmly, wishing that he believed it.

“Good. We must leave now. They have been looking for us for some time now.”

Jon didn't need to ask who 'they' were. “I heard that dragon again when you were out,” said Jon. “I heard it roaring in the distance.”

“Yes. The beast has been circling the northern wastes. I saw it bring down a mammoth the other day.” The dead man’s voice was emotionless. “But the dragon is being hunted too.”

“The Others.” Jon frowned. “What do they want with the dragon?”

“Perhaps they seek to kill it and raise it as part of their army. Perhaps worse.”

Jon couldn't think of many things that would be worse than that, but he stayed quiet. The stranger was slowly carefully packing up the camp. “When do we leave?” Jon asked with a gulp.

“Now. We must hurry.”
Jon nodded, grimacing as he tried to stand up. “Where are we heading?”

“South, through the mountains. To the Haunted Forest.” The stranger summoned his elk. The ravens perched across the elk’s horns. “There is a man there that has been waiting to speak to you.”

Jon frowned, but he knew better than to ask. The stranger had always been elusive about the one he worked for. “Is the route safe?”

“No.” He helped pull Jon to his feet. Jon limped in pain, wrapping his arm around the stranger's shoulder to support him. “But it is perhaps safer than it might be. The enemy has been chasing after the dragon in strength. Its presence is perhaps the only reason we have been able to linger here for so long.”

Jon had dreamt about the dragon sometimes. They were weird, surreal dreams. He had dreamt of being larger than mountains, but everywhere he went the storm followed. He dreamt about the dead rising and pursuing him at every turn, all the while creatures with cold blue eyes stalked from the shadows.

They were frightening dreams. The dragon was in danger too. Jon knew that the beast was still too weak to fly for sustained periods, and the storms would threaten it too. Every time it was on the ground – and it had to land frequently – it was in peril. The Others were harrying it constantly.

Sometimes, Jon had other dreams too. The wolf dreams were calm and reassuring compared to the chaos of the dragon dreams. Jon dreamt that Ghost was caught to the south, trapped on the other side of the Frostfangs. He dreamt of the wolf prowling restlessly over the mountains, avoiding the lingering dead that still roamed.

Occasionally, Ghost glimpsed free folk running as well. There had been some that had survived the collapse of Mance Rayder's army. The wildlings were scattered and broken, but Ghost frequently saw them. None of them had fire-kissed hair or a smell like summer, though.

“Did you see a girl when you found me?” Jon had asked the stranger one day. “She had bright red hair, short, skinny. She was wearing grey furs.”

The stranger shook his head. “I saw no one. It was the dragon that carried you to the northern wasteland after it shattered the glacier. I followed, and I found you.”

Jon's stomach had twisted at the thought. He had no idea if Ygritte had survived or not. For all he knew, the white walkers might have cut her down as soon as they had him. It was a bitter thought, one that brought only pain.

They set off within the hour. Jon was carried on the elk, while the stranger walked alongside. The elk stood two metres tall with huge antlers nearly as wide – it had no saddle but it was big enough for Jon to be draped across its back. The stranger didn't stopped or paused, he walked tirelessly and matched the giant elk's pace. The elk was a strong and hardy beast – it didn't gallop, but it made good progress through rough snows and rarely stopped.

The elk was a strange mount. It wore no harness and it waited for no instructions. Instead, Jon collapsed onto its back while it carried him.

The ravens circled above. Occasionally, the stranger would change direction to follow the birds with no warning given. It took Jon a while to realise that the birds were somehow acting as scouts, or as guides. He didn't understand how.

The landscape was totally foreign. Jon knew their location only broadly – he knew that the Valley of Thenn must be somewhere to the southeast, while the Frozen Shores were to the far south and west. They were deep in the Lands of Always Winter, deeper than he had ever heard of a man to go. These bleak lands were a frozen wasteland that stretched for as far as the eye could see.

Still, they made good time. Jon was unconscious for most of it, but the elk moved constantly even as Jon slept on its back. During the nights, the stranger would set up a warm campfire for Jon alone. Slowly, Jon began to make out the craggy heights of the Frostfang Mountains in the furthest distance south.

Jon stared from atop the elk. The perilous mountains weren't that much more of an improvement, but it was in the right direction. He was watching the mountains take shape, right up until he heard a bellowing cry from the west.

Jon turned. In the distance, he could see the outline of a storm swirling over the horizon. The dragon was trapped in another storm, and the dead would attack at night. The beast raged and thrashed, but Jon knew that it couldn't fight forever.

The Others are hunting it, Jon thought with a twinge of sadness. It is fighting the cold and the dead.

“That dragon is going to die up here,” he said slowly.

“Perhaps.” That was the only reply the stranger gave.

It took them a week to reach the mountains. It took another to cross through a mountainous pass, and finally reach a frozen stream, a headwater that would later run into the Milkwater. The stranger moved confidently and surely through the lands, and the elk was a sturdy mount. The surrounding rocks slowly became speckled by dead pine trees; broken trunks jutting out of the ground like jagged spikes.

They passed a few abandoned Thenn camps throughout the journey, but they were cold and deserted. There were some signs of battle, but no corpses.

All of the surviving free folk had run south. Even the Thenns and the mountain clans had fled.

The Others are creeping over the world from the north, Jon found himself thinking, as they passed through another abandoned mountain camp. The Others were heading south piece by piece, and they left no survivors. Their armies weren't fast, but they were very thorough.

How long until they reached the Wall? Jon knew that however it would it take, it wouldn't be long enough. Winter is coming, and we are all so, so unprepared.

The ravens cawed around, flocking upwards from the elk's horns. The stranger didn't say a word, but the elk changed direction slightly.

Jon thought that they would be heading through the forest, but they didn't. Instead, the stranger led them west, to a small hilly outcrop overlooking the frozen river. There was a towering tree hanging over the rocks, its roots dangling downwards over the rock.

A dead weirwood, Jon realised. It took him a while to recognise it; the tree was leafless, and the bark had decayed into black like stone.

Jon stared at the rocks and the hill. Once, thousands of years ago, this might have been a place of worship to the Old Gods – a sprawling heart tree atop a hill. It was hard to see it now; the weirwood was dead and the hill was just a barren cluster of frozen rocks.
Still, the stranger stopped just short of the hill. The dark man paused at the boundary. “This is where I must leave you. You must go on alone.”

“What?” Jon gasped weakly, clutching at his chest. He was stronger now, but two weeks of being carried had left his muscles feeling like mush.

“I cannot pass the boundary. There are old spells woven into this land. Dead songs, but their echo remains.”

“Where am I going? There's naught but a dead tree on that hill.”

“Look in the roots,” said the stranger. “There is a cave hidden under the tree. There are tunnels crisscrossing beneath the forests throughout the north. Enter the tunnel and follow the path. It will be a long journey, but there will be somebody there to meet you.”

Jon stared. “What will I find in there?”

The stranger looked at him. “What are you looking for?”

“A way home. A way to stop the Others.”

“Then go.” The stranger paused. “I wish you luck, brother.”

Jon's face flickered, uncertainly, but he had nowhere else to go. The stranger had saved his life, and he had no choice except to trust him. He wouldn't survive a week out in the wilderness by himself, much less make it back to the Wall.

It took the stranger's help to dismount the elk, but Jon still nearly collapsed when he tried to make the first step. His legs felt like jelly, and the snow was treacherous.

It was barely fifty feet up a gentle incline, but each step still felt gruelling. Jon was gasping weakly before he was even halfway up. Behind him, the stranger watched solemnly. The elk pawed at the snow.

Finally, Jon reached the top. He could see the rotten weirwood roots dangling over the outcrop above. He didn't see the cave at first, but then slowly he made out the gloom hidden behind the roots. It was a cave barely big enough for a child. Jon cursed, but limped forward.

He barely even saw the figure until he was three metres away. The figure seemed to blend into the mud and routes. It was slight outline; at first he thought it was a child.

Then, Jon's eyes made out nut-brown skin, dappled like a deer's with paler spots, along with large ears and large gold and green eyes. Those strange eyes were slit like those of a cat, glowing softly in the darkness.

He stared in stunned amazement. The child of the forest cocked its head. Jon nearly collapsed in exhaustion, but it made no move to help him. They both looked at each for a long, painful moment.

“The hour is late, King Snow,” it said finally. “The last greenseer awaits.”
Chapter 3

Chapter Summary

Battles fought, and those left behind.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter 3

Samwell

It was a glum grey day spent staring from the top of the Wall. The wind was nothing to speak of, yet it still felt bitingly cold as Sam stared down from the ledge in anticipation.

From so high up, the ground looked like a blanket of white. The men were black dots like a swarm of ants skittering over the snow. There were a lot of men. Almost more than Sam had expected to return, he thought with a gulp. The weeks of fearful panicking had made him half-convinced that they were all doomed.

Sam watched intently, listening as the single long horn blew triumphantly. The rangers returning. A single blast that sounded more like a victory call than anything – they had seen them coming for miles. Two hundred and fifty men of the Night’s Watch heading back to the Wall.

They had been three hundred when they left, and yet the Night’s Watch had still lost more to desertion than they had to battle.

“Oi,” Pyp called cheerfully. “Looks like the Old Bear is finally back.”

“Do you think they won?” Sam asked, his voice nervous.

“I doubt there’d be so many of them left if they didn’t,” Pyp noted. The young man looked ready to skip for joy. “I was half-fearing I’d never see any of them again.”

I was the same. But everything’s alright now, isn’t it? They’re all coming back?

The few ravens they had received had been vague. They only mentioned a battle, that the ranging would be returning soon. “Do you think Jon’s alright?” Sam asked nervously.

“Let’s go and find out. Come on, now, we can leave the patrol for a moment. It’ll be an half an hour before they get to the gate.”

Sam shook his head. Technically, Sam should still be excused from the rotas due to his injury, but Thorne had still assigned him patrol duty. Short numbers, Sam remembered the knight insisting. More likely, Thorne simply enjoyed sending Sam up here to freeze. “We can’t,” Sam muttered. “Ser Alliser will scream at us if we leave our posts.”

“It’s a bright day, there are two hundred men down there and clearly no wildlings around.” Pyp grinned. “Come on, Killer, let Thorne scream for once.”
Sam grimaced. Every man in black received a nickname eventually, and Sam supposed that ‘Killer’ was better than ‘Lady Piggy’, but it still made him squirm. His feet shuffled, glancing down at bandages covering his chest up to his shoulder. His left arm was still in a sling over his chest.

Killer. They had started calling Sam ‘Killer’ ever since he killed a man.

It was at the Fist of the First Men that the deserters struck. It had been a cold night when fourteen men of the black murdered the men on watch, tried to kill the Lord Commander, and tried to burn down the camp before running off. Sam had also been one of the traitor’s targets.

Sam still didn’t understand it. All of the others targets made some sense, at least. The deserters killed the men standing watch, they tried to kill the officers too, they released the dogs and set fire to the tents. They did whatever they could to ensure they would be able to run away, and that the rangers would be too disorganised to give chase.

And then they also tried to kill Sam. Sam had just been minding his own business with the ravens when an ugly man with boils named Chett came out of nowhere and tried to gut him with a knife. The only reason Sam could think of was maybe the man just hated him that much.

The memory sent shivers down. He could still feel the knife as it sliced downward, cutting across his arm as he tried to block and then into his chest. He felt his skin split open. It was so sudden there hadn’t even been much pain, just… shock. The pain came later.

And then Chett had stopped, pausing with the knife. He could have killed Sam quickly, but he didn’t. Sam still remembered the way Chett had grinned, savouring the moment.

Honestly, Sam had been as surprised as anyone when he threw a birdcage at Chett’s head. It hadn’t been a deliberate move, his hand had just flinched, and then suddenly there was squawking, frantic raven flying into Chett’s face.

They scrambled. Sam screamed. Chett pushed him to the ground, bloody knife in hand, and Sam’s arms had just thrashed. Sam vaguely remembered grabbing the closest object he could find in desperation.

And then there was a knife sticking out of Chett’s eye. Sam wasn’t sure how it happened. The same knife Sam used for sharpening quills. The man gagged, blood pouring down his face and over his boils. Chett had hovered upright for a good ten heartbeats before he finally dropped. Chett died with a look of absolute amazement on his face.

I still hear it sometimes. I still hear how his eyeball splattered…

That was how Sam earned his ‘Killer’ moniker. The sworn brothers had found Sam, bloodied, standing over a corpse with a knife in his eye, repeating over and over to himself ‘I killed him, I killed him’.

The deserters died quickly that night. There was confusion and panic, and twelve good men had died when the fighting broke out, but the uprising had failed. Lord Commander Mormont overpowered the three men sent to assassinate him. Four of the deserters managed to run, but they were chased down and killed.

After that, Sam had been left bloody and injured from Chett’s knife. Some thought he would lose the use of his arm altogether. Mormont sent Sam back to the Wall along with Grenn and a few other wounded. Sam had been unconscious for most of the journey. It took Maester Aemon’s skill to stitch him up, but he was still in bandages.
Now, the rest of the Great Ranging had returned too. Sam, along with Pyp, Grenn and Toad, watched with bated breath as the men finally returned and the gate was hoisted up.

When they came through the gate, Sam saw weary, rugged men, but there were also grins in the crowd.

“We killed them!” Thoren Smallwood announced proudly, riding through the gate. “Savages never knew what hit them. They ran straight into our trap.”

Sam’s heart leapt. He looked for familiar faces in the crowd. He recognised Dolorous Edd’s grey hair among those funnelling through the gate.

“There was a battle?” Sam asked eagerly. Edd looked even wearier than most, walking alongside Dywen.

“Oh aye, several in fact.” Edd paused. “Although I’m not sure if you can technically call it a battle it the other side didn’t have a chance to fight back. The wildlings barely had any fight left in them.”

The story came out quickly. After the desertion, the Old Bear proceeded with their plan to ambush the wildlings. The rangers had split into multiple commands, and headed deeper into the mountains to wait for their opportunity. The man mass of their forces under the Lord Commander had went ahead to break the wildlings ranks, all the while smaller groups stationed themselves across the valley and lay in wait. The ambush had turned out to be more successful than anybody had ever imagined.

They had expected to face a horde - a massive, yet disorganized and brittle tide of wildlings. Instead, they had encountered nothing but scattered groups already fleeing from battle, weakened and panicked.

Most of the wildlings had been running, fleeing. Infighting, Edd had called it. Most likely there had been some schism or disagreement in their camp – some challenge to Mance Rayder’s rule, perhaps – and mass fighting must have broken out. The wildlings had scattered, and those fleeing down the Milkwater had been met by well-prepared, fortified, and well-hidden men of the Night’s Watch.

It had been a slaughter. “Well, several slaughters, in fact,” Edd explained dourly. “One after another, in very short procession, actually.”

The Night’s Watch had ambushed the wildlings. Then they had chased them through the mountains, circled around the pass, and ambushed them again. The wildlings had been so disorganised that they hadn’t stood a chance.

There had even been giants riding mammoths scattered in the battle, as Sam listened with bated breath. He could barely believe the tales of giants, but there were too many brothers telling them to lie. Soon, there was a group formed of rangers reciting the tale eagerly. The rangers killed the giants with arrows fired from the cliffs, and then fired burning arrows at the mammoths, sending the beasts wild and stampeding through the wildlings’ own men.

There were some casualties, but far, far fewer than expected considering the numbers faced. Ottyn Wythers and ten other men were torn apart by a giant with white fur, but that was the only one of the raid groups that had been totally lost.

“What about Jon?” Sam asked, eager. “How did he fare?”

The mood went quiet. Edd’s expression darkened grimly. “We never saw him. Qhorin Halfhand’s scouting party didn’t make it back.” He grimaced. “Nobody has seen him since he left.”

Sam blinked, mouth dropping open. There was a long moment of dead silence. Jon, the first and best friend who had really looked after him. Sam hadn’t truly believed that Jon would die. Couldn’t die. Jon had always seemed so strong, so sure, so in control…

_He can’t be dead_, Sam thought, ignoring the sinking feeling in his gut. _Jon’s with the Halfhand, he can’t be dead._

The mood went dark. There were brothers glancing at him, but Sam didn’t say a word. “Why are you back then?” Pyp demanded. “Why not wait for the rangers to return? What about Benjen Stark, or Royce’s group? The Old Bear said he was going to find them—”

“We couldn’t wait. Buckwell’s group barely arrived back in time, but there was no word from the Halfhand,” Dywen protested, his wooden teeth clattering as he spoke. “We could have killed three thousand wildlings, but there were still plenty more. We caught them unprepared at the Milkwater, but let’s not push our luck.”

Sam’s hand trembled. The wound over his chest ached. “… We did it though?” Grenn said after a long pause. “We won. We broke the wildling army.”

It sounded a lot like the wildling army had already been broken and the Night’s Watch just swept up the pieces, but Sam stayed quiet. The face of Jon lingered in his mind.

“Oh aye, we won,” Edd glanced behind him. “And we brought prisoners.”

Sam turned. Everyone in Castle Black was watching as the last of the rangers filtered through the gate. They walked double file through the tunnel, but then there were men wearing chains. There were ragged men wearing bloody furs, with haunted expressions and their hands bound.

A mutterer spread through the crowd. Everyone was watching, like it was a procession. Behind Sam, Donal Noye grunted as he watched.

“Well, I’ll be damned,” the one-armed armourer announced. “Now _that’s_ Mance Rayder. King-Beyond-the-Wall himself.”

Sam heard the ripples go through the crowd. The men’s chains rattled in the cold air as they walked.

There were two dozen captured wildlings in total. The men pointed as Mance Rayder walked at the front of the prisoner’s line like some prize. He was a broad-shouldered, but lean man, middle-aged with a worn face. His face was bruised and bloody, but his features were otherwise unremarkable and plain. He looked beaten and weak, but Sam noticed his sharp eyes.

Mance Rayder might have once called himself a king, but now he was nothing but a beaten and injured prisoner.

Still, the oathbreaker and wildling king glared at all them with a sharpness that made Sam pause. The other wildlings looked beaten, or resigned, or loudly and defiantly angry. Mance Rayder was different; he was silent and observant, there was something in his eyes that put Sam on edge.

Sam looked past the former King-Beyond-the-Wall, eyes flickering over all the other wildlings.

“Well, I’ll be damned,” the one-armed armourer announced. “Now _that’s_ Mance Rayder. King-Beyond-the-Wall himself.”

Sam heard the ripples go through the crowd. The men’s chains rattled in the cold air as they walked.

There were two dozen captured wildlings in total. The men pointed as Mance Rayder walked at the front of the prisoner’s line like some prize. He was a broad-shouldered, but lean man, middle-aged with a worn face. His face was bruised and bloody, but his features were otherwise unremarkable and plain. He looked beaten and weak, but Sam noticed his sharp eyes.

Mance Rayder might have once called himself a king, but now he was nothing but a beaten and injured prisoner.

Still, the oathbreaker and wildling king glared at all them with a sharpness that made Sam pause. The other wildlings looked beaten, or resigned, or loudly and defiantly angry. Mance Rayder was different; he was silent and observant, there was something in his eyes that put Sam on edge.

Sam looked past the former King-Beyond-the-Wall, eyes flickering over all the other wildlings.

“Who are the rest?” Sam asked, lowering his voice.

“Raiders. Wildling leaders. Clan chiefs. Chieftain’s sons.” There were three women in chains too – spearwives who looked every bit as tough as the men. “And a couple of daughters of clan chiefs.”

Dywen pointed to a broad man with scruffy white hair. He was snarling as a sworn brother stabbed at him to walk. “And that’s Tormund Giantsbane. We lost three men trying to take him down. We got his daughter, too.”

Most of the wildlings were injured in some way or the other. One of the men looked so bloody he could barely walk. He was a tall, earless man, with a thick bandage around his eye. He limped so badly that the brother escorting him had half-drag him. His face was deathly pale.

“And that’s Styr, Magnar of Thenn,” Dywen explained. “I tracked that bastard myself. He took four arrows, one of them in his eye. We thought he was a corpse, but he still jumped up and tore Garth’s ear off.”

The group was still muttering, but Sam barely heard it. It was still Mance Rayder who Sam stared at. The King-Beyond-the-Wall was infamous to the black brothers. Sam hadn’t expected the dreaded leader of the wildlings to let himself be taken alive. “… How did you even catch the King-Beyond-the-Wall?”

“We didn’t,” Dywen admitted. “Mance surrendered himself. He made the Lord Commander promise to let his pregnant wife walk free in return for his surrender.”

“Pregnant wife?” Sam’s face paled. “There were women and children there too?”

“We let most of the women and children walk.” That word ‘most’ hung in the air. It made Sam’s skin crawl. “If we had tried to take them all, there would have been more prisoners than we had chains. We only brought back the ones of value.”

“Why not just kill them?” asked Grenn, still staring entranced at the wildlings. The one called Tormund struggled like a chained bear, as if he could snap his restraints.

Dywen shook his head. “Most likely will do, eventually.” The ranger paused, then glanced at Mance Rayder. Sam knew that the King-Beyond-the-Wall was a Night’s Watch deserter, and that meant certain death. “But first the Old Bear wants to question them. He wants to know the wildling’s numbers, the biggest clans, their leaders. He wants to know what Rayder did with our missing scouts.”

“You think he was the one that took them?”

“He does seem the likely suspect, doesn’t he?” Edd sniffed. “We’ll ask the other wildlings the same questions too, I expect. Some we could use as hostages against their clans, but I imagine most of them will end up hanging beside Mance.”

Sam squirmed as the sworn brothers talked amongst themselves. By the tell of it, the Watch would hang the wildling chieftains over the edge of the Wall – just like the old glory days of the Night’s Watch. Sam expected that the Lord Commander would be pleased. Not so long ago, some had said the Great Ranging was folly, and yet now the Old Bear had returned triumphant.

The rest of the day was hectic. It was like every man had a story to tell and a wound to patch up. Sam had never known Castle Black to be such a bustle. Thorne was so busy tending to the arrivals that he didn’t even have time to berate Sam.

The steward watched as a few of the younger recruits threw stones at Mance and the other wildlings as they were dragged into the ice cells.
This is a victory, Sam told himself. They defeated the wildling army and came back victorious. The King-Beyond-the-Wall is beaten, we have won. They protected the realm.

If that army had hit the Wall, then they all might have been in trouble. The Watch didn’t have the men to defend against a coordinated force like that, and the wildlings had a whole culture based around raping and murdering. The Old Bear did the right thing – hit them by surprise and break them before they had a chance to hit the Wall.

So why am I still so scared?

And why isn’t Jon here?

Sam tried to distract himself by returning to his duties. There were letters to write and ravens to send. Clydas helped Sam with most of them while Maester Aemon tended to the wounded. Sam caught glimpses of information from the ravens that came in and out.

Ser Denys Mallister reported extremely fierce storms north of the Frozen Shore, and put out a warning in case the storms were to move south. Jarmen Buckwell and Blane were still out Beyond-the-Wall, tracking the movements of stragglers from the wilding host. There had been raiders that had attacked and hounded the rangers as they retreated, so Ser Mallador Locke and some men lingered behind as a rearguard.

The most interesting ones were the ravens from the south. News came in patchily to the Wall, but Sam still clung to every mention from the War of the Five Kings. A raven from White Harbour reported Stannis Baratheon’s defeat at the Blackwater, and that King Joffrey ruled in King’s Landing. Those letters went straight to the Lord Commander. It was a hectic day.

It was nearly dusk by the time the ravens started to clear. Clydas retreated to his quarters, but Sam was still too worried to rest. Instead, Sam returned to the rookery, to Maester Aemon’s quarters and the pile of unsorted books resting on a desk.

There were old tomes that Sam had brought from the library that needed cataloguing and sorting. The books were his solace, his refuge. He tried to distract himself into his task, but he couldn’t help feel a nagging sensation in the back of his mind that something was wrong. That they had made a mistake.

Sam remembered the look in Mance Rayder’s eyes as they marched him through the courtyard. It hadn’t been angry, or vengeful, more… pitying.

Sam heard footsteps marching into the tower. He jumped up quickly, causing his wounds to sting. Sam’s heart skipped as he saw Ser Alliser Thorne stomp into the rookery. The knight’s face was dark as he looked at Sam.

“Maester Aemon is asleep,” Sam said, his voice almost a squeal. “Hold on, ser, I’ll go wake him—”

“Don’t bother, piggy.” The others might call him Killer now, but to Thorne he would always be piggy. “I’m here for you.”

Sam’s eyes were nervous. “Me, ser? I don’t… I haven’t…”

Thorne stepped closer, a vicious sneer on his face. He stared at Sam’s bandages.

“I guess the piggy had some meat cut out of him,” he grunted. “Did that hurt, boy?”

Sam gulped, nodding. He was always scared around Thorne. The knight reminded him of Sam’s
You got one taste of real battle and you came back squealing to the Wall,” Thorne spat. “Even the Lord Commander is too soft on your wimpy behind. Make no mistake, they might laugh and call you ‘Killer’ now, but they’re not laughing with you.”

Sam quivered and shrunk into himself. Thorne turned and walked away. “Now come on,” he ordered. “With me, now. The Lord Commander wants to see you. Bring quills, ink and parchment.”

Hesitantly, Sam followed. It was already dusk. Thorne didn’t even glance back at him. Sam thought he would take him to the King’s Tower, but instead he headed straight towards the tunnels, down into the wormwalks that led under the castle, and towards the ice cells. Sam was shivering, and not just from the cold.

For a fearful moment, he thought Thorne was planning on ambushing him in the tunnels or worse, but then Sam saw figures standing ahead. Mormont was ahead, waiting with four brothers standing outside of the ice cells.

Along with the Lord Commander, there was another new arrival. Janos Slynt, formerly of the City Watch – Janos had been close to Thorne ever since his arrival at Castle Black a week ago, helping to fill in the vacuum left by Mormont’s absence. Gone from the gold cloak to the black, he had heard the man jape.

Before the Great Ranging had returned, there had been whispers floating about that the Lord Commander might have fallen. It had seemed ludicrous at first, but Janos Slynt had even been pushing to be the next Lord Commander. Janos had been totting around telling everyone that the king himself recommended him for the position.

But now that the Lord Commander Mormont was back, both Janos and Thorne looked unhappy. A stopper had been put on Janos’ ambitions, and Thorne lost the power he had been wielding in Mormont’s absence. What Sam knew for a certainty was that he was glad that Lord Commander Mormont had returned; Janos looked at Sam with nearly just as much disdain as Thorne did.

“Tarly.” Lord Mormont just nodded at Sam distractedly. “Good. Come.”

On his shoulder, Mormont’s raven cawed, “Come, come.”

Sam blinked, confusedly, glancing between Thorne and Mormont. Thorne’s face was bitter. “Um… why am I here, my lord?”

“We’re questioning Mance Rayder. I think he’s finally ready to talk,” he said curtly. “You are to act as our scribe. Write down everything that Mance says – take note of any numbers and names he gives us – but sit in the corner and be quiet.”

An interrogation. Sam felt his heart pound, but he managed a nervous nod, clutching at his parchment. Even with a wounded arm, Sam could still read and write better than most; he was Maester Aemon’s steward and the maester was old. Of course they would ask for him to scribe.

Fortunately, Mormont and the other men went in first. The door opened with a large crunch. Sam hesitated at the boundary, but Thorne was behind him, shoving him forward.

The ice cell was freezing, even under Sam’s furs. Mance Rayder wasn’t wearing any furs. He wore only his smallclothes, which did little against the cold of the tunnels. The King-Beyond-the-Wall was shivering badly. Rayder looked frail, pale and gaunt, with painful welts and bruises across his body. His arms were chained to the ice walls. He stared upwards with dark, bitter eyes.

His fingers, Sam noticed with a gulp. Mance’s fingers were all twisted and mangled. They must have broken his fingers one by one. Sam wondered briefly what they had broken when he ran out of fingers.

He’s ready to talk, the Lord Commander had said.

Sam’s hands were trembling so much he struggled to hold the quill. Mormont watched him fumble with the paper with a heavy, disapproving frown, before turning back to Mance.

“Understand this, Mance,” Mormont said firmly. “You are a dead man. We will kill you for forsaking your vows. The only question is the manner of your passing. You can either face an executioner’s axe with dignity.” He paused, stepping closer. “… Or we can hang you off the Wall, alive, and let the cold do its job.”

There was a long pause. The oathbreaker’s voice was quiet. A broken man. “I’ll talk…” he wheezed, body shivering.

“Good. You will tell us everything we want to know, and we will give you a clean death.” Mormont glanced at Thorne. “Firstly, troops. How many clans united under you? How many leaders remain —”

“You are a fool, Mormont,” he said quietly. There was a gasping sound. Mance Rayder was laughing, chuckling – or trying to, at least. “An old fool.”

Sam was left suddenly unsure whether he should write that down. Mormont only frowned. “Fool,” cried his raven. “Fool, fool.”

“You haven’t won.” Mance gasped, glaring. “You haven’t won a goddamn thing. That ‘battle’ was just crows picking up after the dead.”

“Enough. Tell me about your troops.”

“Gone. Dead. Worse. I don’t know.” Mance’s eyes were vicious. “You killed a lot of men, women and children, Old Bear.”

Thorne scoffed. “We killed murderers, rapists and savages.”

“I let your women and children walk free,” Mormont said curtly, ignoring Thorne.

Mance’s chuckle was bitter. “Oh aye. You left them to die, alone, hungry on a deserted mountainside. How noble.”

“Would you have preferred I had put them to death along with your warriors?”

“At the very least, I would have preferred you had burnt the bodies.” Mance Rayder spat blood. “The only thing you’ve done is made our true enemy even stronger.”

No one replied. Sam blinked. “Do you know why they attacked us?” the wildling king challenged. “For them, that was a recruitment drive. Forty thousand dead free folk – forty thousand more corpses for their army. When you killed us, you just did their work for them – made their army a little bit bigger. That’s your victory right there, Mormont.”

“Enough of this,” Mormont growled in warning.
Mance stared at him critically. “You know, don’t you?” There was a pause. “I think you know. I think you’ve seen the dead walk too.” Mance’s grinned, causing Sam to shiver. “You are a fool, Mormont. I almost pity you when you have to face all of the dead you killed, walking again.”

There was a moment of silence. Mormont and Thorne shared an uneasy glance. The memory of the undead corpses with blue eyes that they brought over the Wall lingered in the room. Sam remembered with a gulp the bodies of Othor and Jafer, who had started moving again when they were brought across the Wall, and tried to murder living men. Janos Slynt just scoffed. “Savage superstition!” Janos proclaimed. “The man is a fool and a craven.”

“And you are a tw–”

“Enough!” Mormont bellowed. He glared at Mance Rayder. “There are things that I need from you, turncoat. What did you do to our rangers?”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about, Mormont.”

“Willem Royce led a party of four six moons ago. They vanished. What happened to them?”

Mance shook his head. “Never even heard of them.”

“Benjen Stark and a party of six three moons ago. Where are they?”

“Now Benjen I did hear about.” Mance nodded. “Last I heard was from the free folk in the forest, Benjen was heading out past the Antler. He was asking about some nearby heart tree, I believe.”

Mormont frowned. Sam nervously made notes.

“What did you do to him?” Thorne demanded.

“I never touched him. We both know Benjen was far too good to fall to wildlings.”

This time, Mance smiled. “Oh, I know about Qhorin. He was caught up the Skirling Pass.”

Mormont’s gaze turned dark. “You killed him.”

“Well, not me.” Mance’s face twisted. “It was Rattleshirt’s band that caught him. Mind, even the Lord of Bones would have brought Qhorin in alive – Qhorin was an old friend of mine, I would have rather traded or ransomed him than killed him.” Mance paused, glancing at the Lord Commander. “It was actually one of his own men that turned on him. Jon Snow killed the Halfhand.”

Sam dropped his quill. Mormont’s eyes flashed. “You lie.”

“I do no such thing. Rattleshirt trapped Qhorin in a cave, and then Jon Snow turned on the man. That wolf of his tore Qhorin’s leg open, while Jon took the Halfhand’s head. I met Jon afterwards - the boy dropped his black coat. He was with us at the Milkwater.”

Mormont’s face was stone. Thorne’s eyes gleamed. Sam stared in horror. “No,” Sam exclaimed. He knew he was supposed to stay quiet, but he couldn’t. “He’s lying. He’s lying. Jon would never betray the Night’s Watch, he wouldn’t.”

“Tarly, be quiet,” Mormont snapped. From over the Lord Commander’s shoulder, Thorne just looked at Sam, smirking sickly-sweet.

“But he’s lying!” Sam shouted. “Jon isn’t a turncoat, he’s lying!”

“Lying,” Mormont’s raven echoed from the Lord’s Commander’s shoulder. “Lying, lying.”

“Like hell I am,” Mance scoffed. “Last I saw, Jon stole a spearwife for himself and he was getting real comfortable – cute girl, red hair, hell of a fire in her too.” Mance stared at Mormont with a smirk. It was a little victory for him that one of the crows had deserted the Watch. “What’s the matter, Old Bear? Maybe your rangers just aren’t as dedicated as you would like to believe.”

“Where is Jon now?” Mormont growled. Sam could barely believe his ears. They were actually listening to the oathbreaker.

Mance Rayder shrugged. “Dead, most like. I don’t think he escaped the Frostfangs.”

Sam gaped at the former king, dropping his paper onto the ice. “He’s lying,” Sam shouted. “Jon would never betray the Watch, he’s not dead – it’s not – he can’t be –!”

“Alliser, get rid of the boy,” Mormont ordered.

Thorne grunted, grabbing Sam by the collar and dragging him out. For once, Thorne didn’t say a word, but his eyes spoke volumes. Sam struggled weakly, even as Thorne pushed him roughly out of the cell.

“Get rid of the piggy,” Thorne ordered to the guards, slamming the cell door shut behind him. The two guards grabbed Sam roughly, manhandling him as he shambled away.

Sam’s head was in a daze. He wanted to go back and protest, he even squirmed against their grip. Why is the Lord Commander even listening to that man?

He was pushed out into the courtyard, stumbling over the stairs. One of the guards said something, but Sam didn’t hear it.

Jon isn’t dead. Jon couldn’t be dead. He couldn’t be a traitor and he couldn’t be dead.

Sam didn’t even know what he would do with himself without Jon. The thought of Jon lying in a ditch somewhere made his knees weak.

Mance Rayder is lying, Sam thought firmly. He is a liar and he is lying. That oathbreaker is just trying to spread discord in the Night’s Watch with a petty little lie.

… Still, another part of Sam whispered treacherously. It is an awfully specific lie to tell…

Sam spent four hours standing in that courtyard, waiting for the Lord Commander to come out of the wormwalks. It was pitch black by the time he did, but Sam knew he wouldn’t be able to sleep.

“My lord!” Sam called, as soon as the door opened again. Jeor Mormont’s face was grim. Thorne was next to him, his eyes widening as soon as he saw Sam. “I’m sorry, my lord, I’m sorry for how I acted, but Jon is my friend and I couldn’t let…”

His voice trailed off. Thorne had that look in his eye when he was ready to explode. Mormont raised a hand.

Sam gulped, and nodded.

Mormont’s eyes flickered. “We spoke to the other prisoners, Tarly,” he said after a brief pause. “They all said exactly the same thing. That Jon Snow came to the camp as Qhorin Halfhand’s killer, looking to defect.”

Sam blinked. “Then they’re lying! They –”

“What, all of them?” Thorne sneered. “You think they all got together beforehand and fabricated the exact same lie to tell, in case they were captured? Why would they even bother?”

Sam couldn’t answer that. They had questioned each prisoner separately. Even if Mance Rayder had made up the story for some reason, then how could the others know the same story?

Sam looked up at Mormont pleadingly. The Old Bear’s face was hard, but he still looked disturbed. Mormont had been grooming Jon for command one day.

“Face it, piggy,” Thorne continued. “Lord Snow was a weak, spoilt, little bastard. The first time things got difficult, he took the coward’s way out and killed a good ranger just so he could turn tail and defect.” Thorne smirked triumphantly. “I knew it from the first time I saw him. He was an arrogant puffed up little snot from the beginning.”

“Bastards are treacherous by nature,” Janos agreed. “And treason runs in his blood. Even his lord father was a traitor and liar of the highest order, and clearly his bastard child was no better.”

Mormont looked fuming. Mormont entrusted Jon with his family’s sword, Sam pleaded quietly. Mormont couldn’t give up on Jon now…

“If he should return, he will be given a fair trial. We will listen to his side of events and we will make judgement accordingly,” Mormont said in a growl. Thorne scoffed, not quite under his breath. The Lord Commander stared at Sam, his voice hard. “But send a raven to Eastwatch and the Shadow Tower. From now on, the Night’s Watch has no choice but to consider Jon Snow a traitor and a deserter.”

“… But…” Sam stammered. “… But… you can’t…”

“Tarly,” Mormont said, his voice firm as steel. “Enough.”

“Enough,” the raven crowed. “Enough, enough.”

Chapter End Notes

Just a note about the timeline: you know, I’ve never realized how horribly difficult it was to chronically order of events in ASOIAF until I started writing this fic. The chapters in the books are organized by PoV, not time, which is fine for the novels, but when writing a divergence story it makes it very awkward to actually figure out what happened when and who knew what at what moment.

So, this is just a shoutout to a really precise timeline that I have found on the internet - a really impressively detailed Google doc where a group of fans have tried to chronologically place every PoV chapter by date. So, cheers - the chronology of this fic is based on that excel sheet.
I have a copy of that sheet on my computer and I'm using it to match the timing of my divergence story against the timing in canon, because, yes, I really am that pedantic...
Chapter 4

Jon

A year ago, Jon would have listened to Old Nan’s stories and laughed. He would have laughed at all the fanciful tales of grumpkins and snarks, giants and children, Others and ice dragons. As a child, he would have listened entranced, but he was adult now. He knew that tales of magic and monsters were nothing more than just bits of superstition, clouded by forgotten history.

Not for the first time, Jon realised that he knew nothing.

In the last month alone, everything had changed.

He had ridden with wildlings. He had seen giants and mammoths. He had seen the dead rise again. He had seen the army of the dead, and the ice spiders that hounded the living. He had seen the Others themselves, and even killed one with his own blade.

He had seen an ice dragon burst from a glacier. He had seen the children of the forest in the flesh, and he had seen a tunnel so old and deep it felt like they were walking in the bones of the earth itself.

_The Old Gods are heavy here_, Jon thought, staring around the roots of the weirwood trees. It was like he could feel the history in the air – an ancient power that made his skin tingle.

The tunnels twisted everywhere, for miles and miles. It had taken two days to cross through them, running alongside underground streams. It was dark, but his guide led the way. The child of the forest was swift and soft of foot, while Jon limped, gasped and struggled. He made slow progress. The child of the forest was quiet, but never impatient. She brought nuts, herbs, milk and occasionally chewy meat to eat as they journeyed. The food was bitter, but it was healthy and the exercise was good. Jon grew stronger every day.

He occasionally saw others of her ilk in the tunnels. They were scrawny things, ragged and wild, wearing dappled brown rags with vines, twigs and withered flowers woven in their hair. They talked in a tongue that Jon couldn’t even recognise. Their voices were high-pitched, fluid and almost singsong.

Sometimes, the child of the forest that led him would talk as they walked, telling him stories of their history. “We have been down here for millennia, and we have still not explored all of the tunnels,” she explained in her high and sweet voice. “They have been our sanctuary and our home, for longer than men have walked these shores.”

“How could you have possibly mined something this large?” Jon gasped, stumbling over another rock. The tunnels were beyond anything he’d ever imagined. _They must be all under all the_
“We did not. We sung. We sung to the earth and the earth danced for us. Over generations, these tunnels were formed.”

The tunnels were not always the same. The way he had arrived was scarcely large enough for a child, and sometimes the path narrowed further. But at other times, the caverns expanded. He had seen tunnels as high as castles, vestibules under the earth as large as Winterfell itself. A giant could have walked comfortably through most of the passageway.

“And the man you’re taking me to see?“ Jon demanded. “This greenseer.”

“The greenseer came later. He was a man once, like you, but he took shelter alongside us and he joined with our song. He is the last of the humans that cared to learn our song – the last greenseer for centuries.”

Jon frowned. “I don’t understand.”

The child of the forest gave him a sidelong glance. “Yes, King Snow,” she agreed.

There was a pause. She didn’t stop walking, and Jon didn’t stop limping after her. The silence was deafening for a few steps.

“Why do you call me that?” Jon asked. She had said the same when they first met at the mouth of cave. “Why do you call me King Snow?”

“That is your name.”

Jon shook his head. “No, my name is Jon Snow,” said Jon. “I’m no king.”

“Then perhaps it is a mistranslation on our part,” she replied. “Your tongue is so rough and cumbersome compared to the True Tongue.”

It took Jon a good long time before he frowned, and realised that that was not quite an answer.

He had to watch his footing. They were heading for another junction in the tunnels, a cavern as large as large as the great hall of Winterfell, with stone teeth hanging from the ceiling.

There were bones underfoot of every size; animal bones, human bones, bones that he had never seen before. He was starting to see the children more frequently, all flitting about and staring at him unblinkingly.

Eventually he made it to the centre of the tunnels, where the weirwood roots were thickest. The white roots were threaded all through the earth around him, denser and thicker than anywhere else. Then the route descended, and descended. Eventually he started to hear the rippling flow of water, the low roar of a distant waterfall.

The path brought them a great cavernous opening over a black abyss, with rushing water echoing below in the darkness. The river looked at least six hundred feet below them, swift and black, flowing down to a sunless sea. It made Jon gape just staring at it.

Near a natural bridge across the abyss there was a throne of woven roots. The man waiting in it looked so decayed that, at first, Jon thought it was a corpse. The corpse of a pale lord in ebony finery. Then, the corpse shuddered. Slowly, one eye opened.
It was alive. A pale, skeletal man in rotted black clothing on a weirwood throne of tangled roots. What little skin remained was white and gaunt, stretched like white leather over old bone, aside from a scarred red blotch on the side of his neck and cheek. There were leaves sprouting from his skull, mushrooms growing across his body, and dirt and dust thick in his hair. An ancient lord that had half-morphed into the weirwood roots that surrounded him.

The old man had withered, white hair long enough to reach the earthen floor. He was missing one eye, while the other was blood red. Weirwood roots surrounded the man, twisting around and through him, snaking out of his leg and his empty eye socket.

When he spoke, his voice was slow and dry, as if he had forgotten how to speak.

“… And so it seems that even after a hundred years and with a thousand eyes, a man can still be surprised…” The pale lord murmured through a dry, hoarse throat. Jon could only stare in stunned horror. “Welcome, Jon Snow. The hour is late and you were not expected.”

Jon felt his breath grow shallow. The children of the forest flickered away into the darkness. The cavern was eerily quiet. “You know who I am?”

The single red eye was unfocused, but somehow Jon knew the man was staring intently.

“Yes.”

“How?” Jon demanded.

“The weirwood’s roots run deep. The greensight runs deeper. I watched you with a thousand eyes and one. I saw you in my dreams; your place, your past, maybe even your future. Who knows?”

“You are the last greenseer,” Jon said breathlessly. Everything he had ever heard Maester Luwin say on greensight came rushing back. Those tales, they had always seemed nothing more than legends.

“I am. I had a name once, and I’ve had many names since. For now, call me…” he seemed to pause, thoughtful. “…the three-eyed crow.”

“You don’t look like a crow to me.”

Was there a flicker of smile on sunken lips? “I can look like many things.”

Jon took a deep breath. His was head was spinning. “It was you. You were the one controlling the ravens, you were the one who guided the stranger to me.”

There was a soft nod. “Why? How?” Jon demanded. “I don’t understand…”

“Yes,” the three-eyed crow said, sounding sympathetic. “Ask your questions, Jon Snow. I will answer what I can.”

For a moment, Jon struggled to speak. “… The dragon,” he said finally. “Tell me about the dragon.”

“The dragon is a remnant of an age long gone. One of the dragons of Old Valyria. A different time, before the Doom.”

The statement didn’t make sense. “What was it doing here? It was buried under the glacier!”

“Yes. Buried for over four hundred years. Four hundred years ago, the dragon fled the Valyrian...
Doom. There were many that did, but that dragon escaped further than most.” His red eye focused on Jon. “You must understand, after the Doom, after the great cataclysm, the whole world changed. It was more than just an explosion; ever since the Doom, the old ways of sorcery and magic began to dwindle. It was a slow decline, but gradually the magic started to fade from the world.

“Dragons are creatures of magic. They live and breathe it. Their existence is tied to the movement of the world. Once the magic started to fade, the dragons did too. It was gradual, and it was inexorable.” The three-eyed crow’s voice was a dry rasp, the laboured voice of an old man. A voice that hadn’t been used in many years. “But this dragon attempted to take refuge, long ago. It fled from the fire into the ice.”

Jon must have looked confused. “The Wall is more than a mere physical barrier, far more. It was built to keep magic out, but it also served to keep magic in,” the three-eyed crow explained. “After the Doom, the lands Beyond-the-Wall became one of the few remaining havens of magic in this world. That was why the dragon took shelter here, that was how it survived the bane that would eventually kill every other dragon in the world.”

“But it was buried.”

“Yes. The ice proved just as dangerous as the fire. The dragon was weakened and it collapsed, to be buried underneath the ice for four hundred years.”

The old man paused, taking a wheezy breath. His voice was a low rasp. “I knew of the dragon that was buried there. I saw it occasionally in my dreams. A thing of faded power, such things tend to attract the sight. I thought it was dead, though – its body may as well have turned to stone,” the greenseer mused. “I did not believe that anything could wake it, yet I suppose that dragons have always had a way of defying the normal laws.”

“Yet it’s alive now.” Jon’s hand touched the scar under his furs gingerly. “It was my blood, wasn’t it? I was bleeding. My blood woke it?”

The greenseer gave a quiet nod. “But it was buried there for four hundred years?” Jon demanded. “Surely someone else must have bled on that glacier in all that time? Why did my blood cause the dragon to wake?”

“Now isn’t that the question?” The three-eyed crow said. “I’ve been musing on that myself for a while now. Tell me, Jon Snow, do you have Targaryen blood running through your veins?”

“Targaryen?!” The thought was so outlandish he could barely process it. He knew his history. The Starks were descended from the blood of the First Men, about the furthest lineage from Targaryens possible. “Of course not – my father was Eddard Stark of Winterfell.”

Was he imagining it, or did a faint expression of doubt pass over the old man’s face? “And your mother?” the greenseer asked.

“You have the blood of Old Valyria inside of you, Jon Snow. Powerful blood, too – from a thick line. The dragon responded to it.”

He didn’t know how to respond to that. Targaryen? Could Ned Stark have birthed me on a Targaryen? It hardly seemed possible – his father had been fighting Targaryens at the time. Who could possibly have…?

Enough. This is meaningless. Jon had spent his childhood guessing at his mother, and didn’t care to continue now.

“The Others,” Jon demanded, changing the subject. They were the enemy that he was sworn to fight. “Can you help me stop the white walkers?”

“Help? I can do what I can.” The voice was solemn. “But that is not enough.”

Jon’s hands clenched. “The children have magic that can keep the Others out!” he said. “You can free wights from the Other’s control! We need that power, you could–”

“The power is dead, Jon,” the greenseer said in sadness. “The children that you see here are the last of their kind – barely threescore left. They no longer have the strength to match the cold. Make no mistake – this place, this refuge is where the children have come to die. They are the last of the last. The only songs they can sing now are songs of mourning.”

“You’re not dead yet!” Jon nearly shouted. “If the Others hit the Wall then everyone will die!”

“Yes,” he agreed. “It might be in one year or a hundred years, but sooner or later the Wall will fail. The Long Night will return to the world, and winter will rule. And this time there will be no children left to fight against it.”

Arya. Robb. Bran. Sansa. Rickon. His mind swam with the faces of all the people he had to protect. “Then why are you sitting there?” Jon shouted angrily. “We need to fight! How do we stop it?”

The three-eyed crow didn’t reply. Jon could have shouted all he wanted, but the silence seemed to reign in the large cavern. It was so cavernous and ancient that Jon could have shouted at the top of his lungs, but he would never be able to fill it.

There was a long moment of quiet. Jon shuffled slightly. “…Can it be stopped?” Jon asked.

“It was stopped once before,” the three-eyed crow said with a soft sigh. “Perhaps it can be stopped again. And you are right; we all must do our part.”

Jon stared, his eyes hopeful. “The only role that I have left to provide is guidance,” the three-eyed crow said. “I am old, older than any man has a right to be, but I will stay and I will teach. I can spread my teachings and maybe I can give the next generation a chance.”

“A chance is all that we need,” said Jon, wishing that he believed it.

The old man shook his head. Dirt sprinkled from the roots in his hair. “No. We need dragons.”

Jon stared. “You can feel it, can’t you?” the greenseer rasped. “You are no greenseer, but you have a power in your own right. You can feel the ice dragon.”

Jon hesitated. “Yes,” he said after a pause. Jon didn’t understand how, but he knew what he felt. “The dragon is in trouble. The Others are going to kill it.”

“Worse. The Others are going to enslave it. They’re going to harness its power for themselves,” said the crow. “With the might of the dragon at their side, they could destroy the Wall so much faster. You may well have doomed the world when you woke that beast.”

Jon was about to object, but his protests fell short. Some part of him knew that the greenseer spoke the truth.

“We can’t allow that to happen.”
“No. We cannot,” said the crow. “And you must stop it from happening.”

Jon could only stare. “You want me to kill the dragon?”

“No. I need you to save it.”

“I don’t understand.”

“I have been trying to connect to the dragon,” the three-eyed crow explained. “But it is beyond me. The dragon is lost, angry, and frightened. It will not respond to my power.” His head tilted. “But it may listen to you. Your blood woke it; perhaps you have power over it. You must free it from the Other’s grasp and bring it to safety.”

Bring it to safety? Jon felt more and more lost every moment. It’s a dragon.

There was a whole army of dead and worse hunting it. Jon wouldn’t be able to get close, and in all likelihood the dragon itself would kill him if he did.

The three-eyed crow stared at him as if he was reading his mind. “The dragon saved your life once,” he said. “It carried you from the glacier. Now, it is time for you to return the debt.”

“But how?” Jon gasped, a stammer. “How am I supposed to…?”

His voice trailed off. Supposed to what? Supposed to fight through an army of white walkers? Carry a dragon to safety? Not get eaten?

“I can teach you some, the rest you must figure out on your own,” said the three-eyed crow. “We have little time and much to do.”

He hesitated. “I don’t know if I can.” Jon let out a breath, silently remembering his vows. “I should head back to Castle Black. I need to warn the brothers. We could mount a ranging, maybe make peace with the wildlings.”

“No.” The hoarse voice was firm. “Your warnings will only fall on deaf ears, you know they will. This task is more important.”

The three-eyed crows face was as stern as stone. “This is your task now. You must rescue the dragon. You must learn to control it. You must keep it out of the Others’ grasp at all costs, and then the dragon will become your route home,” the crow ordered. “Only then can you go south – to warn the people and unite them against a common foe. If all goes well then maybe, maybe, there is chance to throw back the Long Night once more.”

Jon’s eyes flickered. “The people will not follow a man of the Night’s Watch, Jon Snow,” said the greenseer, stressing his surname. “But they will follow a dragon. A dragon might unite the realm.”

The silence surrounded them. Jon knew that the children of the forest were watching from the shadows, silent as ghosts.

He took a deep breath, struggling to process it all. His hand instinctively went to the scar on his chest.

I gave up my life for duty once, he thought, clenching his fists. There was no choice but to do it again, it seemed.

His throat was suddenly dry. “This dragon,” Jon croaked. “Does it have a name?”
“Once, perhaps. The name has been lost to time.”

He didn’t reply. It needs to have a name, he thought quietly.

Jon knew that he was weak and injured. His leg was half-lame and his body struggled to move, let alone fight. He knew fine and well that it would be suicide to go back out there even if he were healthy.

Still, I must go. There is nobody else who can.

“I’ll do it,” Jon said, closing his eyes and taking a deep, painful breath.

The three-eyed crow simply nodded. Jon glanced around the cavern. “How does this work then?” Jon asked after a long quiet. “I just walk out there to meet a dragon?”

“Not yet,” said the crow. “A warrior needs a sword.”

Jon blinked. “I have no sword. They took my sword.” His heart pained slightly with the thought of the Others walking away with Longclaw.

“Hm,” the greenseer grunted. “Well then, take mine instead. I have long since had no use for it.”

The crow motioned at the shadows weakly, and a child of the forest disappeared into the darkness.

“I don’t know if any other sword would be as good as my old one,” Jon admitted. The Valyrian blade of House Mormont had been the finest sword Jon had ever wielded, and it had been lost in the white walker’s grasp.

“Really?” The old man snorted, with a harsh, throaty sound. A laugh, Jon realised a heartbeat later. The greenseer’s laugh was so dry and quiet that he didn’t realise what it was at first. “I’ll let you be the judge of that.”

Jon was about to ask, when the child of the forest reappeared, unnervingly quickly. The child was carrying a blade almost as long as a longsword, but half as wide. It was a long, slender, black sword, the edge of which glimmered even in the faint light of the tunnels. There was a ruby embedded into the pommel, with dark swirls in the metal of the blade, lapping across the sharp edge.

The sword was all black metal, unadorned but elegant, perfectly crafted and balanced, with a wicked gleam to the blade that seemed to ripple like dark water. The tunnels were gloomy, but when the blade hit the light, the edge shimmered like nothing he’d ever seen before.

It was a sword of Valyrian steel.

Jon’s breath had caught in his throat. He couldn’t look away from the sword. The greenseer’s lips twisted upwards slightly.

“… Her name is Dark Sister,” said the three-eyed crow softly. “I believe she’s been waiting for you.”
Chapter 5

Chapter Summary

Learning how to swing a sword.

Chapter 5

Jon

“You move slow,” the child said in her strangely singsong voice. “Too slow.”

You are too fast, Jon almost replied, but it was taking all of his concentration just to follow her movements. The child of the forest, Acorn, moved so fluidly that Jon could scarcely believe she was a creature of flesh and blood. Her footwork was beyond perfect, it was like she was flowing through the air.

In Jon’s hand, Dark Sister slashed outwards, cutting low and then high with wicked grace, yet Acorn flowed between his slashes with inhuman ease. Dark Sister was easily the best blade that Jon had ever held. It was a weirdly long and thin sword, as light and as fluid as Arya’s Needle, but somehow stronger than it had any right to be. A normal blade that size should have shattered at the first impact, but somehow Jon didn’t think he could have broken Dark Sister even if he tried.

Dark Sister, the greenseer had said. Jon knew the name – Dark Sister was a blade that had shaped Westeros. The blade of Visenya Targaryen herself, the sister-wife and right hand of Aegon the Conqueror. From her it had passed to Maegor the Cruel, then Daemon Targaryen, and from him to Aemon Targaryen, the Dragonknight himself. No sword save for Blackfyre itself had done more to build the Seven Kingdoms.

For days, Jon had been left wondering on how the greenseer could have such a weapon.

The blade was all Valyrian steel, swirling grey and black metal and a leather-wrapped grip that seemed strangely unadorned despite the sword’s grace. It was an ancient, formidable blade, with an edge sharper and more bloodthirsty than any he’d known – something about the sword sang for blood.

Despite his sword though, Jon was still horribly outmatched.

At first, he thought the child of the forest had been jesting when she had offered him a duel. As it happened, Acorn was easily the best fighter Jon had ever seen.

She might be over a thousand years old, Jon thought, as he slashed downwards in a long arc. Acorn could have had more battle experience than every man in the Night’s Watch combined.

The children of the forest were short, scrawny and skinny, long of limb with a strangely deerlike aspect to their features, but they were most certainly not weak. They moved with a cat-like grace that no human could match, and their reflexes easily put Jon’s to shame. Acorn’s natural speed, combined with a flawless style and talent, meant that Jon was not even able to catch her.

Jon had no doubt he could have beaten easily her in an arm wrestle. Still, he knew as well that Acorn could have sliced open his guts just as easily if she had really tried.

The child of the forest wielded a long spear instead of a sword. A weirwood spear tipped with an obsidian blade. It was a brittle weapon, but sharp enough to cleave through any armour. Right now, Acorn was barely using it as she dodged around Jon’s sword. When she did attack, she used the butt of her spear, and her jabs would always hit despite his defence.

_They might be no bigger than children, but they’re still predators_, he thought. He was suddenly reminded that the children of the forest had claws instead of fingers.

“Keep your legs apart, and your shoulders down,” said Acorn. “Your trunk is still too weak. You topple too easily if you try to stand up straight.”

Jon grimaced. _Keep your centre low_, he told himself, facing off against her. His left leg was better, but still sore and limp. He was going to have trouble riding a horse, let alone fighting. He had needed a walking stick even to move around recently.

Jon slashed down, but he overreached himself. Almost chidingly, the blunt end of Acorn’s spear tapped against his thigh. “You slow as giant, but with none of the strength.”

Jon gasped before lowering his weapon. He felt exhausted. The last time anybody had beaten him so soundly in a duel, he had been seven. “Enough. I yield.”

“Yield?” Acorn shook her head, but she still lowered her spear. “We practice fighting, you shouldn’t practice yielding. Yield against the cold and the cold will take you. Nature doesn’t fight until yield, King Snow.”

_King Snow_, Jon noted. All of the children of the forest called him that. Jon still hadn’t figured out why.

Jon sighed, trying to catch his breath. “Where did you learn to fight like that?”

“We call it the wood dance. Once we used it to hunt, then we had use it to fight. I practiced my dance fighting men centuries ago, but it still was never enough.”

“I can’t imagine anybody could have beaten you in a battle.”

“They couldn’t.” Despite her delicate features, Acorn’s eyes were hard. “But they killed my brother when he slept. They couldn’t kill me, so they poisoned the ground against us instead. They couldn’t fight us, so they burned our forests. They killed babes, my children, and then killed fighters before they ever had a chance to fight. You men don’t fight fair; you lack the giant’s strength, but you could always make up for it with cunning and viciousness.”

Jon blinked. “Um… I see.” There was a moment of silence. Jon felt the need to say something. “I am sorry about your loss.”

“Don’t be,” Acorn said simply. “That song is over. I dance the wood dance now in tribute to cycles long past, as I will be soon.”

She turned and walked away without another word. Jon blinked. They were queer creatures, the children of the forest. They hadn’t treated Jon with anything other than kindness, but there was a strange sadness to them as well.

They talked about everything they had lost, and they lived in sadness. _Men wouldn’t be sad_, Jon thought to himself, _men would be angry_. Men would hate and swear vengeance, while the children...
The children sang for their losses, while men would fight and kill for them. Jon took a deep breath, limping as he returned to the throne room. The greenseer was in one of his sleeps, still as the dead. “You return,” he muttered, his eye slowly opening as Jon approached. “How goes your practice?” “Sorely. The children are strong fighters,” Jon said with a quiet grimace. “No,” the greenseer said sadly. “The children of the forest were never fighters. There were some that were forced to fight, some that even became consumed by the fighting, but in their hearts the children were never meant to wield a weapon.” Jon’s eyes narrowed. He paused, holding out his blade. “Dark Sister,” he said. “Where did you get this sword?” “I had a life before I came here, once. Dark Sister was entrusted to me long ago.” Jon hesitated, struggling to recall his history lessons. “Dark Sister is the ancestral sword of House Targaryen. The same one that Queen Visenya wielded.” The gaunt man gave a slight nod. “She has a history too. She has long been a bloodthirsty blade, and truthfully I have neglected her for too long.” A blade that dated back to Aegon the Conqueror. How did he ever get such a thing? “Are you a Targaryen?” Jon demanded. There was the faintest wisp of a smile. “No. I was never a Targaryen.” “Then who were you?” “I wore many names when I was quick, but name my mother gave me was Brynden,” the greenseer said in a quiet voice. “But that name is dead now. I gave up the name when I gave my vows.” There were so many things that Jon wanted to ask. Brynden, he thought, struggling to remember Maester Luwin’s lessons. There was something nagging at him in the back of his mind. “You were a sworn brother?” “Once.” Realisation clicked. “Bloodraven,” Jon said, breathlessly. Brynden Rivers. Bastard son of Aegon the Unworthy. Former Hand of the King. A former Lord Commander. One of the Great Targaryen Bastards. “… You’re Bloodraven.” “Once.” That was all he said. Jon’s head spun, staring at the greenseer in the weirwood tree. “Then you must be over a hundred years old. You were Lord Commander.” The blood red eye just looked at him passively. Bloodraven was the bastard son of Aegon the Fourth, he recalled. A legitimised bastard. Jon averted his gaze, staring down at Dark Sister. So many questions spun through Jon’s head, but there was one above all others that demanded answers. “Why did you give this sword to me?” “Because I hope you can use it.” The voice was so quiet Jon had to strain to listen. “I swore to return it to my family when my watch was ended, but now, my watch will never end. Enough questions for now. We have much to do and little time.”

“The ice dragon,” he said.

“The Frostfangs are wracked by storms,” the greenseer rasped. Jon didn’t know how Bloodraven knew, but he didn’t doubt the greenseer’s words. “As soon as they clear you will have to move out, and quickly. You have less than a week here, and much to learn in that time.”

Jon shook his head. “I can barely walk, I’m not strong enough…”

“This place will heal you quickly. The children sing their songs well.”

“And when I find the dragon?” Jon demanded. “It’s a dragon. How am I ever supposed to control it?”

“In centuries past, the Valyrians used their magics of blood and fire to bind dragons to their will. Those arts have been lost, but perhaps they can be relearnt.” There was a pause. “I know little of the ancient Valyrian sorceries, but I can teach what I do know. I must teach you how to open your third eye, Jon.”

“… You want me to warg with the dragon?”

“Yes. That is one word for it.”

Warging, the free folk had called it. Tormund had placed the title on him, but Jon hadn’t been comfortable with it. He hadn’t accepted that power easily. He knew that he could dream through Ghost’s eyes, and he knew that he sometimes it felt like he and Ghost were bonded in a way he couldn’t explain.

The three-eyed crow could explain it to him. He called it skinchanging, the power to wear the bodies of other creatures and see through their eyes. It was a weird power that Jon was hesitant to accept, but he had no choice.

Jon took a deep breath, but there was no choice. The world needed a dragon, and Jon needed to provide one.

Whatever it takes, Jon thought. He thought of his family, his brothers, his sisters, his friends. His sworn brothers, the men he fought with. Ygritte. Tormund. Even Mance. For the living.

“How do I learn?”

“Close your eyes,” the greenseer said softly. “Breathe deep… Take in the scent of the roots… Listen to the river… Listen to the trees…. It is less a matter of learning, and more a matter of feeling…”

The three-eyed crow was a patient teacher. He spent hours sitting over Jon, slowly instructing him how to focus. “Your wolf,” the three-eyed crow instructed. “Think of your wolf – focus on him. The distance is meaningless, focus…”

Jon spent all day in their trying to meditate. Jon had to meditate to connect with Ghost. Apparently the power of the weirwoods made skinchanging easier in the cave, but it had still taken nearly a full day of concentration. Then, Jon felt his vision fade. At first he thought he was falling asleep from exhaustion, feeling himself fall…

And then he felt himself fall into another skin. Suddenly, Jon was running over snowy outcrops, sniffing through the cold. He saw wolf’s paws underfoot. Ghost. Staring through Ghost’s eyes, feeling the cold frost on Ghost’s fur.

The feeling was overwhelming. The wolf dreams had never been so vivid – it was like he was in control of the wolf’s body.

No, it was more like direwolf and man were sharing the same body, side by side. His mind blurred, overwhelmed by the sharps scents and feelings of a wolf.

If it hadn’t been for the greenseer next to him, pulling Jon out and returning him to his body, then Jon might have forgotten himself in his second skin.

Jon gasped, dropping back to the cave. The children of the forest brought him fresh goat’s milk and pale fish baked in butter. “Careful,” the greenseer instructed. “It is a dangerous power, even when moving to a comfortable skin. Go too long and you lose yourself.”

“Then how can I use it?” Jon gasped.

“With practice. Rest and eat, Jon, you have much to learn.”

There was nothing else for it. He had to use whatever time he had in this place. The three-eyed crow said that normally it would take years to learn the skills Jon needed. He had a week.

The greenseer taught him how to focus himself – a chant that he could repeat to keep himself grounded. Jon could repeat the names of his brothers and sisters, even the vows of the Night’s Watch, to keep himself focused.

Go too deep into the mind of another and you may lose yourself, the three-eyed crow had warned, but he had to press on anyways.

“Ghost is your familiar. You are bonded. Your wolf will accept you, and you will accept him. That helps greatly,” the greenseer said. “With other creatures, it will not be so easy.”

“You mean… possessing them?” Jon asked. Possessing a dragon.

“You can dominate another skin. if you choose. If you are strong enough can forcefully bend another body to your will,” he replied. “But that is a crude and dangerous power. The best partnerships are forged when the two minds can come to terms, to a share a body.” His voice became hard. “Not every creature will accept a partner willingly. If you cannot share, you will need to overpower with brute will.”

…I really don’t like the idea of trying to fight a dragon in a battle of wills, Jon thought with a gulp.

The next day, the three-eyed crow instructed him to shift into the body of a raven. It was a raven that was well-used to taking passengers and been warged into many times – like a well-worn shoe, the crow had even said. Still, it had been one of the hardest things that Jon ever had to do.

The bird’s mind was totally different from a wolf’s. A wolf was focused and intense, a predator with a mind not so dissimilar from a man’s. The raven’s mind felt fluttery and fleeting. It felt like prey. Even when Jon finally managed to feel its presence, he still couldn’t slip into its body. It was like trying to balance on a coin, or squeeze his entire body into a hand glove.

He could feel the three-eyed crow’s disappointment, but the lessons continued nevertheless. Jon’s progress was slow.
“As a warg, you are fairly powerful,” the crow murmured one day. “But you are no greenseer. You will never fly, you will not feel the greensight, or embrace the trees. I had hoped to introduce you to the weirwood paste, but I fear that power would consume you.”

Jon gasped. Somehow, the lessons meditating with greenseer were more exhausting than any spar. “Then what can I do?”

“Keep practicing. Learn. Learn how to use your gifts.”

It gave his body time to heal, though. Between the lessons sitting at the weirwood throne, Jon found time to exercise and spar. He practiced with Acorn as regularly as he could, forcing himself to recover. He tried to learn how to mimic her movements, desperately trying to keep up with her speed.

_The Others moved that fast too_, Jon recalled. The thought drove him harder and harder to heal and train.

The children of the forest sustained themselves on mushrooms, nuts and berries, milk and cheese from the goats they kept in their caverns, even blind white fish from the underground river. It was a healthy diet that gave him strength.

One time, Jon woke to find a child of the forest standing over him, singing a slow, tender song to nurse his wounds. Jon’s leg would never be the same, but it had been getting better every day. The songs of children seemed to help heal, they give him strength.

The dreams were stronger too. Down here, by the roots of the weirwood, the dreams felt stronger than they had ever been. Ever since the greenseer had started the lessons, Jon’s dreams had fully become warg-dreams, visions from other bodies.

Sometimes, Jon dreamt he was a direwolf. Those dreams were cool, focused and reassuring, like dreaming of an old friend. He dreamt of running through the woods, of hunting, of pacing over worlds of snow and ice.

Other times, the dreams were chaotic and intense. Dreams of fury – dreams of fire and ice, dreams of flight and storms. They were dreams that caused him to wake up panting and sweating. The dreams were so blurred and ferocious that he could remember nothing but shadows and chaos.

The wolf dreams were calm and sound. The dragon dreams felt like a force of nature.

After one such dream, Jon panted as he shot awake. He had been clutching Dark Sister as he slept on the uncomfortable roots near the throne. The greenseer was looking down at him, almost curiously. Jon rubbed his eyes, trying to focus. Jon kept on clutching Dark Sister, the sword just felt so comfortable in his grasp.

Jon hesitated, staring at the ruby on the pommel. There had been something that had been nagging at him for a while. “You believe that I am a Targaryen, don’t you?” Jon said suddenly, his voice quiet in the constant gloom.

The three-eyed crow just nodded. “I believe you have Targaryen blood.”

Jon took a deep breath, trying to process it. _He gave me a priceless Targaryen sword_, Jon thought to himself. Jon’s hand instinctively went to his overgrown hair – now shoulder length. He was growing a white beard too. White was not his natural hair colour, but still, just that colour…

“How’s that possible?” Jon said. “That means that Ned Stark must have birthed me on a Targaryen – he was at war with the Targaryens when I was born.”

“I do not know,” the old man replied in his low voice, but strangely Jon didn’t quite believe him. Sometimes, it seemed like the greenseer knew everything.

Jon was quiet as he thought of his mother. There was no Targaryen blood in the Starks, that meant his mother must have given him it.

Could my father really have had an affair with some Targaryen princess? How many Targaryen women were even alive during the Rebellion?

Jon spent the rest of the day practicing with Acorn, trying to distract himself from those infuriating thoughts of his parentage. Acorn was a good teacher. Jon could feel his movements getting sharper, learning how to follow the wood dance.

“It is time,” the three-eyed crow said after the seventh day, when he awoke from one of his many slumbers. His voice was grim. “You are not ready, but there is no choice. A darkness approaches. The dragon does not have long left.”

Jon’s hands clenched. “And the storm?”

“It is waning, but the journey will still be perilous.”

“I will need a mount.”

“That has been arranged. There is a great elk in the forest waiting for you. I will direct it for as long as I can. My ravens will join you also,” the three-eyed crow said in his dry, laboured voice.

The thought of going back out there scared him. He still remembered the feeling of the icy blade cutting through his chest.

Fear cuts deeper than swords, Jon tried to tell himself, but it was hard to imagine anything cutting deeper than the White Walker’s sword had.

“Am I to go alone?” Jon asked after a pause.

“Yes. I have no more aid to give you,” the three-eyed crow said with a gentle sigh.

“What about the stranger – the dead man that works for you?” He tried to stop himself from sounding craven, but the thought of travelling to such lands without any company…

“He has gone south to the Wall. There is an urgent errand he must see to there.”

“And the children?”

“They cannot leave the caverns. The lingering magic that protects this place relies on it.” He sounded sad.

Jon took a deep breath, trying to steady himself. He knew that Ghost was getting closer to him every day; they would probably meet up again during the journey.

Still, only one man and a direwolf, off to face a dragon.

“Then there is something that I want of you,” Jon said. “I left a woman behind. Her name is Ygritte – she has red hair, round face, blue grey eyes. She’s around eighteen years of age. I… I don’t know what happened to her when I left her.” His eyes were hard. “I want you to find her for me. I want you to look after her, guide her south.”

The greenseer sounded disapproving. “You cannot afford to distract yourself with such things, Jon,” he warned. “The journey you are on leaves no space for love – you have a duty.”

“I have a duty to her too. Protect her.”

He paused. “Then I would take a vow from you too, Jon,” the three-eyed crow said, keeping his voice slow. “You must do anything and everything in your power to fight against the Long Night. No matter how distasteful, no matter the cost – you will do what you must to fight for the dawn. I want you to swear it, Jon Snow. In return for my aid, you must swear it.”

Jon took a deep breath. “Yes,” he said. “I promise it.”

“Good. You are a warg,” the three-eyed crow said softly. “Use that power. You must embrace it. Embrace who you are and use it.”

Jon’s face twitched slightly. “I was once told that that sorcery is like a sword without a hilt. There is no safe way to grasp it.”

“Would you rather have no sword at all?” the greenseer replied. “Yes, it will hurt. Men like us must endure the pain so that nobody else will have to. And if you don’t swing it, if you don’t feel its grip, then it becomes all the more painful when you finally have to.”

The single red eye focused on him. “Swing the sword, Jon Snow,” he whispered. “Swing the sword and swing it true.”

Jon left very early morning. The sun was barely a reddish sliver over the horizon. He wanted a full day of travelling before nightfall.

When he limped out of the cave, he saw the sun for the first time in a week. He felt almost like a different person to the one that had staggered into there.

The children stitched up his ruined leathers with earthy fibres woven from trees. They gave him furs made from a hide that Jon could not place, but he half-suspected it was giant hide. He wore riding leathers, leather boots and belt that still had the musky smell of the cave, with saddle bags filled with rations and supplies for a long journey. Everything from his leathers to his furs felt strange and alien – well-built and sturdy, but also queer and inhuman, crafted in a way he hadn’t seen before, from materials that men rarely used.

Jon spent a long time staring at his cloak. They gave him a black cloak that might have belonged to a ranger of the Night’s Watch, once, but it had been patched and stitched up with brown threads made from roots. Black with motley brown patches.

He carried a wooden staff in one arm, to help him walk with his bad leg. Jon kept Dark Sister on his hip. The children of the forest had also provided a small weirwood short bow, more a hunting bow than a longbow, as well as twenty arrows fletched with dragonglass tips.

“Use dragonglass or dragonsteel on the Others,” he remembered three eyed crow had instructed. “And fire on the wights. Follow the ravens for as long as you can – I will guide you through them.”

True to the greenseer’s word, there was a great elk grazing in the snow at the foot of the hill when Jon left. The elk stared at him with black eyes, and a knowing gaze. As he approached, the elk even lowered its body to help Jon pull himself onto its broad back, lifting him two metres off the ground. There was something of the greenseer in the elk, Jon realised. The greenseer used his own warg to guide the creature.

The sound of cawing burst from the dead weirwood tree. A flock of ravens flew into the air, circling around in the sky. Some of them stopped to perch on the elk’s antlers, while the others flew off into the distance.

It took two weeks for the stranger to carry me to the cave from the northern wastes, he thought with a sigh. This time, I’m going to have to make better time.

He kicked in his heels gently, and the elk set off in a quick trot. Back towards the mountains, and beyond.

Jon met up with Ghost on the second day. Watching the giant direwolf lumber towards him from over the horizon was like seeing his best friend again. Ghost was a powerful predator, but for a moment he panted and whined and jumped towards Jon like he was a pup again.

They rode hard through the forests and they were already heading through the mountain pass – in what used to be Thenn territory. Jon rode constantly through the first night, but on the second night he had to stop to give the elk time to rest.

He camped at an old ruin half-buried into the mountain. The stones looked ancient, slabs of rock that had been smoothed by age, similar to the structures he had seen at the Fist of the First Men. An old ruin from the Dawn Age, Jon eventually decided, although it was hard to imagine any structure ever being built this far north.

There is much history Beyond-The-Wall, Jon thought with something almost approaching sorrow. It was a hard land, but rich in its own ways. There was a history here going back thousands of years, history that that the rest of the world had never known.

And, if the Others had their way, all these lands would be lost, and their people forgotten.

The evening was a time of quiet. The sky was obscured by thin, icy clouds, but he could still see the glimmer of the northern lights, bright and translucent in the darkness. Jon cradled into the ruins, staring out over the mountains as he kept watch. He knew that he needed to sleep, but it was hard to even close his eyes. His mind, his body, it all felt so tense. Alone in a forsaken, abandoned wilderness that only the dead now walked.

Ghost slumbered quietly, draped across his legs. Jon was half an hour into his watch when he felt the hairs on the back of his head prickle. Above him, one of the ravens cawed in the sky.

His hand instinctively went to Dark Sister, but it was a different type of threat. Not the Others. Ghost woke quickly, the direwolf growling as he paced in the snows.

Another growl answered the direwolf. A deep, low, throaty growl, almost a snarl that cut through the air.

Jon stared upwards at the rocks above him. There were yellow eyes in the dark, reflecting in the black. Unblinkingly, they stared at him from the darkness.

The shadowcat prowled on the rocks above him. It must have been trying to ambush them before the ravens cawed in alarm. It moved without a sound, flowing down the mountainside like liquid smoke.

The cat was lean, dark and muscled. Its fur was pitch-black, with white stripes that seemed to blend into the shadows easily. Its bright yellow eyes stared at Jon, and they hungered.
Most shadowcats tended to avoid men, but Jon supposed that a lone human and an elk must have seemed a tempting prize. Ghost snarled at the cat, which paused its descent from the rocks. Perhaps the shadowcat was starving, Jon wondered, or maybe it was just braver than most.

Jon stared at the beast for a few heartbeats, slowly moving his hand away from Dark Sister.

Swing the sword, the three-eyed crow had said.

Jon needed to learn how to use that power. He had seen the army of the undead, and he knew that he would need every weapon he could find to beat them. With barely a moment of doubt, Jon closed his eyes, focused on the shadowcat, and extended his mind.

He felt himself touch the shadowcat’s presence. At once, it recoiled and yelped.

Pain hit Jon, shooting through his head. Like he had just tried grab a cat and the cat had clawed him. Jon grunted, but he tried to focus and kept pushing.

The shadowcat yowled in pain and shock, its eyes suddenly crazed. It was back on its haunches, twitching and yowling. It took all of Jon’s concentration while it protested, thrashed and snarled.

The shadowcat felt so different than Ghost. It felt sharp and barbed like a wicked dagger. It felt cruel, proud and vain. It felt angry. Hateful.

It felt like Jon was stepping on the cat’s most precious territory. The shadowcat didn’t want to share its body, it felt too fiercely independent. Instead, it scratched and it fought with every fibre of its being.

Jon grimaced. Maybe he should have retreated, but instead he needed to push onwards. It was like sparring; it hurt, but he needed to overcome it. If I can’t warg with a cat, then how am I ever supposed to handle a dragon?

The shadowcat almost howled with rage. It body tensed and it was about to lunge at Jon physically, but then suddenly the ravens darted from the sky. The birds pecked at its eyes, disorientating it enough that Jon could push just a bit harder.

Jon felt the shadowcat’s will snap. Suddenly, his world changed.

He was inside the shadowcat’s skin, looking down at himself through the cat’s eyes. Through its night vision, there was no colour, but the shadows were gone and everything was a distinct, sharply contrasting white and black. Jon could feel the pain on its face as the ravens pecked at him, but then, as Jon’s control strengthened, they scattered. The ravens flew away, retreating to the nearby trees.

The shadowcat stared at Jon. He could see, even smell his own body through the cat’s senses. He looked like a human – weak, pungent, vulnerable, and yet, dangerous.

Kill, attack, run. Jon could feel its instincts screaming orders – so intense that its body twitched – but Jon squashed those orders. Instead, almost hesitantly, Jon raised a paw, feeling his new body. He had to rule the shadowcat’s body with an iron will – anything less than complete control and the cat would squirm free.

The shadowcat felt lean and strong. Smaller than Ghost, but so much faster. Sharp claws dug into the rock. Her, Jon realised suddenly. The shadowcat is female.

With an easy flex, the shadowcat jumped down to the ground. Ghost was still growling. The shadowcat wanted to run, to hide, but instead Jon ordered her body to sit. The shadowcat fought him every step of the way. He could feel her anger, her fear, all her emotions through the warg-sense. It was so intense that it hurt.

To be here – on the ground, exposed in front of a human and a wolf – it caused every instinct she had to scream. It was so totally against her nature that she was trembling, yellow eyes wide.

Slowly, gingerly, Jon pulled himself back into his own body. He nearly collapsed as he felt himself standing on two legs. Still, Jon couldn’t afford to totally let go off the connection to the shadowcat. He wasn’t staring directly through her eyes, but it was like he still had her on a leash. As if I’m in two bodies at the same time, Jon thought with a pained breath.

It was exhausting. Jon remembered Varamyr Sixskins, with his six different bodies. Damn, how did Varamyr ever manage them all?

Varamyr must have been very skilled and powerful enough to warg with six bodies at once. Still, from what Jon could tell, the three-eyed crow was capable of wraging with at least two dozen creatures over a scale of distant miles. Jon was starting to realise that the three-eyed crow had a power on a totally different scale to anything he could imagine.

Ghost was still growling and snapping. “Down, Ghost,” Jon soothed, all the while keeping his eyes firmly on the shadowcat. Her yellow eyes looked absolutely hateful.

Ghost backed down uncertainly. Jon approached the shadowcat, hand extended.

“Easy girl, easy,” he muttered, reaching out to touch her fur. Instinctively, she wanted to bite, but Jon squashed that response. “I’m not going to hurt you, I’m not going to hurt you…”

Her whole body recoiled at the feel of his touch. It took all of Jon’s strength to force her to stay still. The shadowcat’s black and white fur was thick and soft.

For a while, Jon paused. The shadowcat was still trying to fight and snap back, but Jon was well and truly under her skin. The cat won’t be as easy to control as the wolf, he decided. Ghost could accept him, but he knew instinctively that the shadowcat would always have to be forced.

Jon stared into the shining yellow eyes, wondering what to do next. For a long moment, he debated walking the cat away and releasing her. He had no doubt that she would flee as soon as she could.

No, Jon decided. That’s useless.

He needed to learn control, and the shadowcat was good practice. She forced Jon to exert his powers, and Jon needed to learn more about warging. He needed to learn how long he could maintain his powers, how long the connection lasted. There was too much he needed to learn, and he could only learn through practice.

Jon wouldn’t be able to practice like this on Ghost. The direwolf was a part of him, just as he was for Ghost; they were so close that there was no difficulty, no need for restraint or struggle.

Besides, Jon thought quietly, the shadowcat is useful. He couldn’t think of any animal that could scout out the rocky mountain path half so well.

“I’m sorry, girl,” he whispered. “I’m going to have to use you a bit longer…”

Slowly, Jon moved into position. He leaned down onto the ground, resting against the rocks, but he kept eye contact with the shadowcat at all times. He made sure to not break the link, as if there was an invisible, fragile connection running between them.

There was one thing that bugged him. The cat doesn’t have a name, Jon thought. If I’m going to use her, she deserves a name.

He spent barely a moment thinking about it before one came to him. Black fur, nearly invisible in the night. “Ghost,” Jon announced in a whisper. “… Meet Phantom.”

With that, Jon’s body slumped as he finally let himself sleep. Phantom pulled herself off the ground and quickly leapt away. Jon spent the rest of the night sleeping, while his mind roamed the mountainside in the body of a shadowcat.
Chapter 6

Chapter Summary

Trapped in places of death, with dreams and dark omens...

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bran

“We shouldn’t be here,” Bran whispered, tentative, afraid to break the silence.

The Nightfort was an abandoned, silent ruin of a castle. The silence was a darkness of its own, as thick and calm and heavy as any fog. A horrible place, thick with the residue of old, forgotten crimes.

“We don’t have anywhere else to go,” Jojen replied, his legs crossed and his eyes closed.

“That doesn’t mean we should stay here,” Bran hissed. The ten-year-old lay on the cold kitchen floor, covered in rags of blankets. “This isn’t where we’re supposed to be.”

“I’m not so sure about that,” Jojen replied in his solemn voice, as if that was the end of it.

Bran grimaced, but it was impossible to argue with Jojen. The other boy didn’t argue at all really; Jojen just always knew he was right. Bran wished Meera was here, not that it would really help. Meera would probably agree with Bran, but she wouldn’t argue with Jojen.

They had been at the Nightfort for four days now, and Bran hadn’t yet gotten a good night’s sleep. For a deserted castle, it was never truly quiet. The walls had a way of creaking, the wind would sometimes groan, whispering through the corridors.

More than once, Bran had been scared awake by the sound of footsteps moving just around the corner. Meera didn’t believe him, but Bran knew he had heard them.

There were ghosts in this place. Old, long forgotten ghosts that lingered in the shadows. Bran could feel them.

They made camp in the kitchen, sleeping on the floor near the bottomless well. The kitchens were huge, looming rooms of stone and decaying fireplaces that once might have served a small army. It was one of the few rooms that hadn’t completely broken into complete disrepair, and could still give some shelter from the wind. A weirwood tree grew through a hole in the kitchen’s ceiling, breaking through the stones. They had set up camp in a corner of the room, taking shelter in the cavernous indent of what used to be a giant stone fireplace.

They weren’t meant to stay here so long. The three-eyed crow was waiting for Bran beyond the Wall, but they couldn’t even get through it. Jojen had promised them a way through – he said he saw it in his dreams – but the gate was sealed and the Wall loomed over them.

Meera could have probably climbed down the Wall by now, he thought. Meera was agile and strong, and resourceful enough to do so. Maybe Bran could have joined her, once, back when he had been whole.

As it was, there was no way that Bran the cripple or Hodor the simple-minded stable boy could survive that descent.

Meera was gone now – she left the previous morning to scout out the surroundings, and to hunt for game. Bran already missed her. Jojen was poor company, while Hodor seemed uneasy and terrified in the looming, constant gloom of the Nightfort.

The made an odd company. One crippled lord, one swamp boy, one dim-witted giant, and a direwolf all camping in the ruins of a haunted castle.

It was a long, miserable night. They slept on the floor of the kitchen, alongside the rats. Bran thought constantly about the Rat’s Cook, Mad Axe, and all the other stories Old Nan had ever told him.

Later that night, Bran glimpsed faint torchlight at the top of Wall. Men of the Night’s Watch patrolling the Wall. For a moment, Bran was severely tempted to signal them. He remembered the men hunting them after Winterfell, though, and he didn’t.

Finally, Bran did fall asleep. He dreamt of snow storms, raging winds and howling, and flickering shadows. The dreams caused him to wake up, gasping.

“How much longer do we have to stay here?” Bran asked later, in the morning. The dawn was still cold, and the shadows always lingered.

The crannogman paused. “I don’t know,” Jojen admitted. “I had a green dream last night. A vivid one. I saw a black figure waiting for us on the other side of the Wall, but he couldn’t reach us and we can’t reach him. I think the three-eyed crow knows that we are here, but he’s searching for someone to let us pass.”

“How?”

“I don’t know,” Jojen said again. It was rare for him to ever sound so unsure. “All we can do is wait. The three-eyed crow will open the way for us as soon as he can.”

It was a miserable answer. Bran was left lying on the kitchen floor, a cripple. It was only Summer that stopped him from going insane.

The direwolf barely even reacted as Bran reached out and slipped into his skin. It was so easy now, like pulling on a well-worn, comfortable cloak. Summer was soft and warm and calming. Bran could feel the direwolf around him, even as his vision blurred and reshaped until he was staring out at the world from the wolf’s eyes.

Jojen had his green dreams, yet Bran had Summer. Bran knew which he preferred.

Summer didn’t like the Nightfort either. Still, lately the direwolf had started staying by Bran’s side at night, standing over him protectively. A fierce wolf by his side to protect against the ghosts. Bran had never loved Summer more than he did then.

Through Summer, Bran roamed the castle. Through Summer, Bran felt whole.

The Nightfort was full of broken towers and a maze of tunnels connecting its vaults and dungeons. Bran spent the days searching it – sometimes on Hodor’s back, sometimes in Summer – yet he could still constantly find new nooks and crannies. The tunnels, the wormwalks underneath the courtyard, all leading down to the dungeons were sprawling mazes twisting around each other.

Bran had once heard from Maester Aemon, or maybe from Benjen, that the Nightfort had been rebuilt many times over the passing of thousands of years. Only the stone vaults and lower levels remained from its original form.

Many of the entrances had collapsed with age. The walls were crumbling, but the foundations were solid. Tree roots twisted through the stone. Summer chased rats down through the decaying stone passages, but the direwolf had to squeeze through an overgrown root to fit into a breaking tunnel.

The wolf’s nose sniffed at the air. It was dark place, but Bran pushed him onwards carefully. There was the smell of rats in the air, so Summer followed.

In the tunnel, the roots from the forest that had taken over the yard twisted down from the ceiling.
The rocks were dusty – the entire tunnel untouched by man since whenever the castle was abandoned.

The wolf sniffed, shaking through cobwebs and dirt. Perhaps this was once a well-used tunnel under the main keep, before it collapsed into disrepair. Most of the doors had collapsed, but one of them stood ajar, the wooden door broken and rotten off its hinges. The large direwolf struggled to squeeze through. The smell of rot and age was thick.

Inside the room, there were broken objects and decayed furniture. It was probably a steward’s quarters at once point – mostly likely an important steward, considering the size of the room. There was an old bed with a broken leg against the corner of the wall, the mattress long since devoured by bugs. There was a mirror turned black with time over a rotten vanity.

The strangest object was one sitting in the centre of the far wall, surrounded by decayed drapes.
Summer sniffed at a wooden frame, and blackened fabric.

A cot, Bran realised suddenly. A baby’s cot.

For some reason Bran couldn’t quite explain, the thought sent shivers down his spine. Bran slipped out of Summer’s skin and returned to his own.

Jojen was cooking breakfast. Hodor helped carry Bran towards the campfire while the crannogman gently sizzled fish.

“You were in Summer again,” Jojen said. It wasn’t a question.

Bran nodded. “Yes. We were exploring the lower tunnels.”

Jojen just nodded, thoughtfully. “This castle is a strange place,” he said. “It’s not a place I’d be comfortable staying for a long time, but… there’s a strange fascination here too. I see the shadows in my dreams, but I can’t figure out what they mean.”

“What do you see?”

“Very little in focus. Mostly just shadows; I see shadowy figures moving in the darkness, but they can say nothing because they have no tongues. I don’t think they’re hostile, though, they’re just…”
His voice trailed off. Jojen frowned and shook his head. “Sometimes I feel like they’re trying to tell me something, but… I can’t figure out what they want. The green dreams haven’t been making much sense recently.”
“How many green dreams do you have?” Bran asked.

“More than ever, actually.” Jojen looked at him curiously. “Can you feel it? It’s like everything is so much stronger? The greensight has never felt so vivid.”

Bran didn’t reply. Jojen had been sleeping or meditating a lot recently – withdrawing back into himself. The little grandfather leaned forward, cradling his head on his hands, looking so much older than he truly was.

“Perhaps it’s just this place,” Jojen murmured, so quiet Bran could barely understand him. “But I can feel the trees rippling, and the wind… Can’t you feel it? There’s something in the wind that wasn’t there a week ago… It’s like the world is waking up, something has changed.”

Bran didn’t know how to reply to that. Later that night, Bran was wide awake, staring upwards at the weirwood tree growing through the floor.

He spent a long time staring upwards, listening to the leaves rustle. The sound of distant cawing of ravens echoed around the castle.

Jojen has always been sensitive to far more than anyone else, Bran thought. He hadn’t seen the crannogman look so… distant, thoughtful before.

The next morning, Bran explored more of the castle through Summer’s eyes. The Nightfort was a great lumbering castle, as large as Winterfell itself, but with so many more dark corners and crumbling ruins.

Summer paced through the bell tower, skirting over the collapsed floor to the library. The library was old, damp and rotten – the bookcases had long since rotten away, and any books had been removed. Summer sniffed at the wood, watching bugs and beetles skitter across the blackened wood. Summer caught one of them – a large black beetle – and ate it curiously. Bran felt the way the insect crunched beneath Summer’s teeth.

In the library, though, there was a passageway leading downwards into the tunnels. Summer followed curiously. The direwolf’s nose twitched, detecting a scent that he couldn’t quite place.

The tunnels were a maze. During winter, when the snow was thick on the surface, and the courtyard became impassable, then these tunnels would have been the only way between the Nightfort’s buildings. The walls were crumbling, but Summer sniffed across the floor, tracing stones that hadn’t been stepped on for hundreds of years.

The passageway was eerie quiet and dark. The wolf headed downwards, towards the lower levels, where even more and more tunnels and vaults stretched outwards.

Layers upon layers, Bran thought. As big as the Nightfort was on the surface, there was even more in the vaults underneath.

Summer passed vaults and rotten storerooms, locked doors, broken walls, even what looked like rusted prison cells. Hundreds upon hundreds of rooms, scattered in the maze of tunnels underneath the Nightfort. Enough to store supplies for five thousand men to last all winter, or to imprison thousands of men.

The deeper down he went, the fewer storerooms and the more prison cells that appeared. The stone floors were half-flooded, breaking down into the sewers. There was water seeping down the sides from the nearby well. Summer was not afraid of the dark, but some of the tunnels were so black that even the wolf had to step gingerly through the gloom and damp.
The direwolf tried to avoid those tunnels, sticking to the ones where faint cracks let through small tendrils of light. Still the shadows were so thick at every turn.

Summer wouldn’t be done here, if it weren’t for Bran’s gentle presence in his skin. Go forward, Bran pushed softly. Please. I want to see what’s down here.

The direwolf whined, but obeyed. Bran was in Summer’s body, moving the wolf’s legs himself…

Near the flooded tunnels, Summer saw a row of cells with thick metal bars over them. Rows upon rows of iron cells; a prison wing. On one of cells, the metal had been bent out of shape – as if someone had bent the bars apart. Summer sniffed at the metal curiously, taking in the thick tang of rust and age.

The metal bars were three inches thick. No human could have ever bent metal apart like that.

Bran hesitated, feeling Summer whine uncomfortably in the dark. There were a lot of prisons cells. The floor was blackened, and the old stone felt rough, charred. The edges of the stone bricks were deformed. It was as if hundreds, if not thousands, of years ago, somebody had tried to set this prison on fire. Perhaps they had poured oil over the floor, and tried to set the cells alight…

Something about the place sent shivers down the direwolf’s spine, in a way Bran couldn’t quite explain.

Like there were some acts that could stain a place for all time.

Bran’s grip softened. Summer turned and sprinted out of the tunnels, soft paws racing over stone. The tunnels were so winding that Summer emerged out of a different tunnel from the one he entered, up a blackened stairway and out through a rotten stairwell. It took the direwolf a while to find his bearings.

Summer emerged into the dungeons underneath one of the collapsed broken towers of the Nightfort. There was barely a tower left, just the ruins of decaying stone foundations. The entire dungeon was tilted to one side, collapsing and slowly drooping into the ground.

Summer had to scramble through the cracks in broken stones walls to get free. The direwolf was light and agile on his paws, but the stones still groaned slightly underfoot.

Still, the direwolf paused as his fur started to rise. Bran stared through the wolf’s eyes as he saw an old rusted metal door, built into the far side of the room. The direwolf moaned quietly, but Bran was in its body, gently pushing his wolf forward.

Shadows in the darkness, Jojen had said. Bran was done being scared of this place; he wanted to see.

The door was locked, and rusted shut besides, but the stone walls were crumbling. Even when the tower above had been pulled down, this dungeon remained, nestled in to the broken foundations. Summer had to squeeze through a gap in the bricks. Yellow eyes blinked, trying to adjust for the darkness.

The shadows fluttered. Summer jumped, a sharp growl bursting from his throat. Bats, Bran thought softly, trying to reassure his friend. There must be bats nesting in ruins.

It was so dark in the room – a darkness that might not have seen the light in hundreds of years.
Summer stepped forward cautiously. The direwolf could smell metal, dust, and so, so much age.

In the centre of the room, there was a figure. At first glance, Summer jumped so hard that Bran nearly lost his grip, but the figure wasn’t moving. It stood as still as stone, standing upright. The figure was wearing metal.

An armour stand, Bran realised with quiet awe. Summer sniffed at black metal breastplate. It was a fine set, and Bran stared between the pauldrons and vambraces, stiff barbed gauntlets and greeves, a solid thick cuirass, complete with rondels, couters, tassets and gorget. All of it dull black metal; unadorned but with a presence that made him shiver.

A full suit of armour, so old that it was probably fused to stand by now.

Bran stared with quiet fascination – he had rarely seen armour like it, not even when the king came to Winterfell. The finest knights would wear sparkling sets designed for jousting more than war, so extravagant they bordered on impractical, but this armour had a simple, dull sleekness and quality to it that seemed to belong on battlefield.

Even his father only used to have a coat of a chainmail and steel cuirass, but Lord Stark preferred light mail and hard leathers rather than full steel. His father had always said that wearing full plate armour was too easily like wearing a coffin into battle.

But still… solid plate armour. That was something that a knight would wear…

Full plate armour is very expensive, Bran thought quietly. High quality plate armour even more so. Why would anyone ever leave a suit of armour like this behind?

Summer glanced upwards, at the full metal greathelm atop the armour. The black helm was pronged, like a crown.

In darkness, the shadows were still rustling. Summer barked, turning to leave.

Bran gasped as he returned to his body. With a jolt, he realised that he it was already nearly dusk.

I’ve been in Summer the whole day. Bran blinked, staring at his hands like they were unfamiliar. For a moment, he expected to see paws.

There were footsteps approaching him. Jojen sat down on the floor, handing Bran a dish of fish-leftover stew.

“Eat,” Jojen insisted. “You missed dinner. I didn’t want to wake you.”

Bran took a deep breath. His hands were shaking. He hadn’t spent so long in the warg before. Warging was always difficult – it felt merging yourself with something else.

Still, this time had felt different. It felt like there had been more of Bran in the wolf. Perhaps I am getting stronger? The warg is stronger, I’m keeping more of my identity.

“Why not?” Bran asked, his hands still shaking. “Why didn’t you wake me?”

“You looked like you were in too deep,” Jojen admitted. “I wasn’t sure what would happen if I tried to force you out of it.”

He stared. “Is that a danger?”

“Maybe. I don’t know. Sometimes in the green dreams – the really, really intense green dreams – I become… disconnected. My father always said it was better to let the dreams run their course, and that trying to force someone awake can sever the link even more. I suspect that your warg works a similar way.”

Bran didn’t reply. His stomach was rumbling. The fish stew was cold, but the fire had already burnt out. “Be careful with this power of yours,” Jojen warned. “Your third eye is wide open, but I fear you might fall through it. Do not get lost in another body, Bran.”

What if I like my other body more than I like this one? Bran thought quietly, but he didn’t reply, staring at the floor. His broken legs were wrapped up in old socks and worn boots. It had been weeks since he washed. His toes might be rotting on his feet, for all Bran knew. They were nothing more than dead weights hanging from his hip.

“If I learn to control it,” Bran said. “Then what will happen? What will I be able to do?”

Jojen paused, sitting down opposite him. The dusty kitchen was quiet. “I don’t know,” he replied. “I have the green dreams, but I’m not a skinchanger, Bran. That is why we need the three-eyed crow.”

The three-eyed crow promised that I could fly. “But will I be ever able stand again?”

“There are different ways of standing, Bran,” Jojen said softly.

Bran scowled dejectedly. “You mean no.” For so long Bran had been clinging onto the hope that he might be healed, but being in this place seemed to suck the hope away… “I’m going to be a cripple for life.”

“You are more capable than most full-bodied men,” Jojen said. He was trying to be sympathetic, but the crannogman wasn’t very good at it. Jojen’s hands hovered, as if unsure if he should approach to comfort Bran or not.

Bran felt miserable. The only time he felt whole was when he was in someone else’s body. Every day was making him more and more depressed – trapped behind a Wall he couldn’t climb.

“I found a suit of armour today…” Bran said. “It was an old suit of armour buried in the dungeon of a broken tower.”

“Hee, I thought the Night’s Watch cleared the castle out.”

He nodded. “It was in a collapsed dungeon. They must have missed it. It looked really old. Probably not even wearable anymore.”

“Huh.”

“It was full plate armour too; really good armour.” The type a knight would wear. “And I’m never going to be able to wear armour like that, am I?”

“Bran, you can’t torture yourself like this…”

“Why not?” Bran muttered sourly, his arms folded. “I’m never going to be able to wear armour, or mount a horse, or climb a horse, or… or…” Or kiss a girl.

“You can do more than that,” Jojen insisted. “The greenseers are said to have many gifts. They could see through trees, possess bodies of the beasts, even power over the land itself.”
Bran didn’t reply. “You could learn how to wear the skins of any animal. You could have a freedom that no man could match.”

He shook his head. “No… I can’t even control it.” Bran murmured. “It only happens easily in my dreams, and I can’t take any other body but Summer’s…”

“Well, skinchanging is like any other skill,” Jojen said with a gentle smile. “It will get easier with practice.”

There was a long silence. Bran frowned, but didn’t reply. Jojen hesitated, but he didn’t push the issue.

They ate their fish in silence. Bran winced slightly, trying to twist himself over while dragging his useless legs. It was impossible to find a comfortable position on the floor. Strangely, his legs bothered him the most when he was doing nothing except trying to get comfortable. It felt like they were numb, dead weights hanging off his hip.

Bran sat awake for a long time. Could I really take the body of any creature? Summer was the only body that felt comfortable too him, but…

I’ve never really practiced before, Bran thought, staring up the broken ceiling. Not really practiced.

Curiously, Bran glanced at Hodor.

Later that evening, after thinking a long time, Bran closed his eyes and reached out to Hodor. He felt the giant tremble and convulse.

Slipping into Hodor’s skin was not like Summer. Bran could slide into the wolf’s skin so smoothly it felt natural, but pushing into Hodor felt like trying to squeeze into something that didn’t fit.

It felt like trying to drag Hodor open, as if Bran had to stretch him apart. The stable boy would always tremble and panic fearfully. He didn’t know what was happening.

The first time Bran had done it, he had reached out instinctively into Hodor during the lightning storms – just to get Hodor to calm down. It had been almost accidental. Now, Bran had time to practice – time to experiment.

He felt Hodor twitch. The stable boy didn’t make a noise except for a faint gagging, but Bran could feel the convulsions. Bran took a deep breath, pushing in gently. It felt violent, painful; so bad that Bran’s stomach clenched with the thought.

He could feel Hodor shivering and trembling. He was a large, grown man, but he felt like a boy. Bran didn’t want to hurt him, he stretched the warg outwards as gently as he could.

Jojen was right. It did get easier with practice.

It’s alright, Bran soothed. He could feel Hodor whimpering as he touched him. I’m not going to hurt you. It’s alright.

Later that night, Bran dropped the warg. Hodor clutched to the far corner of the room. He seemed shaken, keeping his distance from Bran. “Hodor,” the large man whimpered uncertainly. “Hodor…”

Bran took a deep breath, trying to concentrate. He had never felt a warg like it.
It felt wrong to try and steal Hodor’s body. It made him twinge in guilt, but at the same time…

Sooner or later, Bran would probably have to take Hodor’s skin. It would be the only way to control Hodor sometimes, or the only way to force Hodor to fight. It would be easier for both of them if they were comfortable warging with each other. Their lives might depend on Bran controlling Hodor’s body at some point, so surely that was worth it?

Maybe Hodor could come to accept Bran in the same way Summer did?

Maybe I need to try again, Bran thought. Maybe it’s just a matter of practice. Maybe Hodor can learn to accept me…

Bran was wide awake by the time morning came, staring at the ceiling. Hodor was awake too, pacing restlessly outside of the kitchens.

Jojen was sleeping quietly. He slept most of the day, trying to search in his green dreams. Bran watched as the boy shivered silently, as if a bad dream.

“What’s wrong?” Bran asked, as the boy opened his eyes. Jojen’s deep green eyes blinked repeatedly. “What did you dream of?”

Jojen took deep breath. “I dreamt of pigs,” he said.

“Pigs?”

He simply nodded. “Yes. I saw small pigs, large hogs, dead pigs and butchered pigs. I saw a butcher that was a pig, a huntsman that wanted to be a pig, a large hog that thought himself wounded piglet. I heard the oinking.” Jojen voice was tired. “I think I even saw a flying pig.”

Bran looked confused. “Are all of your green dreams that confusing?”

Jojen smiled wearily. “Some more than others. The greensight is thicker here, close to the Wall. The green dreams have been more frequent than ever.”

There was a moment of pause. Jojen rarely shared half of the things he saw, but they were alone here. The air was quiet and soft; it made Jojen talk more than he normally would. “What else have you seen?”

“More than I can understand. It’s not easy, it’s always… vivid. Like feeling something rather than seeing it. You can hardly make sense of the images, but you always know what it feels like,” he said. “… One of the most frequent dreams is of the earth. I dream of things buried – sometimes buried under stone, sometimes ice, occasionally in the water and sometimes in the roots of ancient trees.

“I dream of things stirring underneath them, and slowly realising they are becoming strong enough to leave. It feels like ancients things are waking up again.” He paused. “No… it feels like changing of seasons.”

Bran listened raptly. Jojen’s voice sounded distant. “Last night, I dreamt of a frozen ocean. I saw coins and swords spilling over the ice. I saw a man made of stone trying and failing to hack against the ice, but only breaking himself apart more and more with every swing. Eventually, he hacked so hard that his own hand broke clean off.”

In his mind’s eye, Bran imagined trying to hack through the Wall itself. “Is that about us?”
Jojen shook his head. “I don’t think so. Normally the dreams feel different when I’m dreaming about myself, or someone I’m close to.”

There was a pause. Jojen glanced around the room. Hodor was missing. The stable boy was outside, still disturbed. Hodor was muttering wordlessly under his breath, like a scared boy. Jojen blinked, realising what was different.

“You warged with Hodor again, didn’t you? Just like you did at Queenscrown.”

“Not enough, it appears.” Jojen frowned disapprovingly. “Did it hurt Hodor?”

“He was so scared. I don’t think he understood.”

“Then why did you do it?”

Bran hesitated for a while. The cold floor felt numb on his dead legs. He looked at the embers of the campfire burning in the middle of the old kitchen. “Because pretty soon we’re going to run out of firewood,” Bran muttered. “Somebody will need to chop some more, but look at Hodor. He’s a baby, he struggles to even swing an axe.” Bran frowned. “What if we come under attack? We might need Hodor to fight, but he won’t be able to fight by himself – he’s as gentle as a kitten.”

“And also because you wanted to feel what it’s like to walk again.”

Bran grimaced. He couldn’t deny it. “Yes. That too.”

“Take care, Bran,” Jojen said solemnly. “It’s a dangerous power that you have there, and you use it recklessly. Be careful, treat it with more respect.”

“I want to learn how to use it.”

“I know.” Jojen sighed. “The three-eyed crow will come for us soon.”

“Are you sure about that?”

Jojen didn’t reply. His green eyes flickered.

It was a cold night. Bran could hear the ghosts stirring around him as he finally dozed off on the stone kitchen floors.

Before he fell asleep, Bran thought of that suit of armour. That old black armour lingering down there in the dungeons.

_I want to be able to wear armour. I want to be a knight, he thought. I want to stand, to walk…

…

The night was howling.

Summer could feel the howl in the air. The sound was lonely, echoing through the Nightfort.

In Bran’s dreams, he dreamt of sad singing and flashing blades. Of a woman wailing, of an old man’s laughter. He dreamt of a man so young he could still be called a boy, falling to the stones.

The wolves were howling. Crying in the night.
When he woke up, there were tears dripping from Bran’s eyes. He stared at the darkness quietly, feeling the tears drip onto the floor.

He caught one of them in his hand. The teardrop glistened on his palm.

“… Oh,” Bran muttered, listening to Summer howling. The direwolf was scratching and whining, pacing across the empty kitchens restlessly.

Bran pulled himself up to stare at Jojen. The quiet boy was wide awake too, his green eyes bright. There was a long moment of silence. Bran could feel the quiet in the air. They could all feel it.

Summer knew it before any of them. The wolf was still howling. Bran felt it like a dagger to his heart.

Far to the south, his litter-mate had just died. Summer could feel the mourning echoing through the world like a howl.

Jojen’s solemn face looked at him. “I’m sorry, Bran.”

It was a long time before Bran replied. “I think my brother has just died.”

It was a grim and gloomy day. When morning came, it wasn’t much better.

Bran spent most of his time asleep.

He could feel the sadness in Summer too. Bran still hid inside Summer because then he didn’t need to face his own pain. When he was inside the direwolf, he felt strong, powerful and brave, but in his own body Bran was nothing but a weak and crippled little boy.

The direwolf could feel the death in the way that Bran couldn’t quite understand or even explain.

Once there had been six in the litter. Now, there were only four – four wolves scattered in the wind.

His black brother was growing angry and vicious, heading further and further west every day. He was alone and lost, and that loneliness made him angrier and angrier every passing day. He was growing large and savage.

The wild sister was to the south, lost in unfamiliar lands. She was hunted and challenged every day, out of her element and away from her pack, but she learned how to survive and adapt. Those lands were making her sharp and vicious.

The final brother, the quiet one, the one that didn’t howl – he was north; further north than anyone else. Summer could barely feel his quiet brother anymore, but the only glimpses he received were of a predator growing lean and strong.

Bran stayed in Summer’s skin for most of the day. He lost sense of himself as Summer explored the lower levels of the Nightfort. He sniffed through the darkness, following the mould and dust. The Nightfort seemed solemn, gloomy. The whole place felt like a castle for the dead, an immense crypt for ghosts.

Only the scent of Meera finally returning to the castle brought Bran back to his own body. Summer scuffled through the overgrown yards, and Bran’s heart skipped softly as he heard the girl’s voice.

She was outside the kitchen, talking to Jojen in the broken corridor, but it was quiet enough that Bran could make out the words.

“You sure?” Meera said with a breathless gasp.

“I dreamt it,” Jojen replied. “I dreamt of a pack of rodents chewing on a wolf’s body. An old weasel took the wolf’s head as a crown, while a skeletal rat stripped the wolf’s skin and paraded around in its furs. I’ve had that dream before, but I never said anything. But, last night…” Jojen grimaced. “Bran saw it at the same time I did. I think his brother Robb died yesterday.”

“But that means…”

“That the north isn’t safe for any Stark anymore,” said Jojen. “We need to take shelter somewhere quickly.”

“I don’t think we can cross the Wall,” Meera said. “I know you said that the three-eyed crow is waiting for him on the other side, but we can’t get there. I went as far as Deep Lake – all the gates are sealed. The nearest way through would be Castle Black –”

“No,” Jojen said. “Castle Black is not a safe place to be for anyone.”

“Then we’ve got nowhere else to go.”

The words made him miserable. Bran escaped into Summer again without a second thought. The direwolf prowled towards the lower vaults, stalking through tunnels that had been abandoned for centuries. The blackness was so dark that even the wolf’s eyes were useless.

Summer could hear movement deeper down the tunnels. Fluttering. _Bats_, Bran tried to tell himself, but Summer turned and bolted. The direwolf ran straight back out towards the surface.

By the time Bran returned to his own body again, it was already getting dark. The shadows seemed to be whispering.

Meera and Jojen had left to gather firewood, and probably to talk without him, leaving Bran alone in the deserted stone ruins. Just a broken little boy in a place haunted by nightmares, with nowhere else to go.

Bran took a deep breath, staring upwards at the weirwood tree bursting out of the kitchen floor. _The prince of the Nightfort_, he thought bitterly.

He couldn’t go any further north, and there was nothing left for him in the south. The three-eyed crow had promised him that he would fly, but he wouldn’t be able to fly over the Wall. Why wasn’t the crow helping them?

_Robb is dead_, Bran thought. _That makes me the heir to Winterfell. They’re going to be hunting me now, the eldest son of Eddard Stark._

_I didn’t want to be heir and I didn’t ask for any of this._

_But there’s nothing I can do, nothing but be carried around. Like a useless, broken toy…_

Off in the distance somewhere, a raven cawed. Bran paused.

When the Reeds came back, Bran was still staring upwards at the weirwood tree. The red leaves were rippling in the gentle wind.
“Jojen,” he said slowly. “I think I might know how we could reach the three-eyed crow.”

The green-eyed boy looked at him quietly. “I think I know how I could stop being a cripple,” he muttered. “People are looking for Bran Stark the Broken – the cripple – but maybe I don’t have to be that anymore…”

Maybe I could be something else. Someone else. I don’t want to be me anymore…

“Bran…”

Bran kept his voice low, so quiet that Meera couldn’t hear. “… Do you think it would be possible for me to take another body?”

---

Daenerys

She gasped. She woke up gasping for breath, clutching at her chest frantically. The halls outside her bedchamber exploded with noise.

_That was a mistake_, Dany realised in an instant.

Dany was alone in her apartments except for her handmaidens, but it was still so soon after the sack. Her reign over Meereen was mere days old, and her guards were on high alert. Her captains had all been paranoid about the possibility of assassination, and the Unsullied took their guard duty as seriously as they took everything else. They didn’t let any citizens of Meereen into Dany’s chambers, not even servants; not without an armed guard present.

Even at night, there were Unsullied guards right outside her door at all times, and even more guards down the corridor.

All it had taken was one bad dream, one strangled gasp as she shot awake, and then suddenly those guards were bursting through her doors.

Grey Worm. He was the first inside, it had taken him only heartbeats. Perhaps he hadn’t slept. A part of Dany wondered if he slept at all.

It was the middle of the night, and now her chambers were filled with wary-eyed guards, looking over every nook and corner and shadow in search of some presumed attacker.

Missandei – sweet, poor, little Missandei – screamed when they broke through. Which, of course, had only attracted more and more guards. Daenerys already wished that she just could go back to sleep.

It took nearly half an hour for Dany to explain, for some reason explaining just once wasn’t enough for her guardsmen. “I’m quite alright. I’m all right. I just had a bad dream, that’s all.”

It was about midnight, Dany guessed. She knew the guards were only being protective, and Grey Worm apologised so profusely that she couldn’t remain angry. Something about the general of her Unsullied suggested that he still half-expected to be whipped for his mistake. Dany didn’t doubt his loyalty, or his dedication, and it was understandable for him to be so cautious in a pyramid that they had only just captured.

Still, Dany was only a queen when she was wearing silks and gems, astride a horse or flanked by her children. Right now, in the middle of the night with her hair a mess and in her bedclothes in disarray, she felt like nothing but a very irritated and sleep-deprived girl.

The guardsmen returned to their duties. Missandei still looked shaken. Dany invited the girl to share her bed for the rest of the night. The girl’s eyes lit up, snuggling up next to Dany on the thick cushions, as the queen sighed and stroked the girl’s hair softly.

Dany didn’t like sleeping alone. Occasionally Irri or Jhiqui would share the bed with her, but none of them of them were as good company at night as Missandei. The girl was so soft and fragile, sweet and innocent, and Dany still loved the way the former slave had relaxed and softened around her queen.

“Your Grace? You said you had a bad dream,” Missandei purred, closing her eyes while Dany stayed wide awake. “What did you dream about?”

Her eyes flickered. Missandei was always a considerate girl. “… I dreamt of the funeral pyre,” Dany said, although the dream had been so blurred she could barely make it out. She rubbed the centre of her chest absentmindedly. “It felt like it was the funeral pyre. It felt like I walking into the fire again.”

The memory was still the most intense she had ever had. Dany would never, ever forget how it felt to walk into the flames. The vision was lost to the haze of the emotions, but the memory of the feelings felt razor sharp.

“The pyre?” Missandei asked. “That’s how you got your name? The Unburnt?”

“Yes. The fire didn’t hurt me.” Dany had felt the heat, but it didn’t burn. She paused, thinking back to the dream. “Except in my dream, this fire felt cold. It still didn’t freeze, though… it just…”

Her voice trailed off. She didn’t quite know how to explain it. “It sounds scary,” Missandei muttered, while Dany tightened her arms around the girl softly.

No, she thought. Not the word I would use.

In her arms, Missandei fell asleep quickly. Dany didn’t sleep, she barely closed her eyes. She doubted she would be able to sleep soundly again. I can’t sleep easily in this place.

The Great Pyramid of Meereen was awash with wealth, filled with silk tapestries, marble floors, gems and imported curiosities both from east and west. The wealth she was surrounded by was old as the city itself, the legacy of past empires and faded glories. Her chambers were at the apex of the pyramid, almost a three thousand feet above the city’s streets – a set of lavish apartments and terraces filled with greenery and fragrant pools, brick parapets and mosaics, fine sculptures and thick drapes. The air was always warm and humid, and but the smell of gentle perfumes and scented candles tingled in the rooms, and the continuous gentle wind kept it all clean and crisp.

Still, somehow, all the perfumes and breezes in the world couldn’t mask that pungent, coppery undertone still lingering in the air. The smell of blood.

She lay on the bed wide awake, swaddled in pillows with Missandei curled into her side sound asleep. And yet still, Daenerys felt cold. She found herself staring through the moonlit dark at her large, emperor-sized four poster bed. It was a bed fit for a king, built of finely carved mahogany and set with the fullest mattress Dany had ever seen. It had so many drapes and cushions that she thought she might be smothered in it all. Everything about the bed screamed luxury, wealth, and decadent comfort.
And yet, less than a week ago, the previous occupant of this bed, a corpulent and obese figure without peer, had used it to fuck half a dozen little slave girls. At once. That knowledge alone was enough to make Dany want to sleep on the floor.

She had stripped as much of the apartments bare as she could, but somehow its past occupants still lingered, almost as though the stones themselves remembered them. The memories and feelings lingered like ghosts.

Maybe I shouldn’t be here, she thought, biting her lip. Everything about these apartments reminded her of what Meereen had once been.

Dany knew that if the apartments seemed empty now, that was because of how large they truly were. Once they had been filled with at least two dozen slaves that would fan the master to keep him cool as he slept. Slaves to pour him wine, slaves to wash his back, slaves to feed him, slaves be ordered about at a thousand different tasks. And always, always, bed-slaves kept near at hand, exotic beauties from every corner of the world worth naming.

She knew that the terraces were overgrowing and the fragrant pools were stewing because they suddenly lacked the slaves that used to maintain them constantly. And she knew that that everything in the luxury apartments had been bought with several hundred lifetimes’ worth of slave money.

She also knew that the foul smell in the air was the stench of rotting bodies that still littered the plaza of Meereen. Somehow, that stench could find her even up here, atop the Great Pyramid.
Some days, it seemed like that stench followed her around.

The man that used to take residence in her apartment had been the master of slaves to Meereen’s richest families, commander of the corrupt city guard – a man that owned seemingly half of the city, an aging man so fat it he could hardly walk. Apparently, the master, in all his life, had rarely ever left the Great Pyramid.

And now, that master was rotting on a spike in Meereen’s central plaza, right beneath the golden statue of the harpy itself. One of the many, many masters that Dany had crucified as her price for peace.

For the life her, she couldn’t even remember the master’s name. After a while, the strange names of these strange lands all tended to blur together.

Right outside, just down the corridor, there had been fighting during the sack. A group of slaves in the Great Pyramid had revolted while Dany’s soldiers stormed the plaza. The master had been dragged naked out of his luxury apartment, and then the master’s daughters had all been raped and murdered by their former slaves. By the time the Unsullied had actually taken the Great Pyramid of Meereen, the corpses had already lain thick on the pyramid’s marble floors.

Dany kept on replaying the sack in her mind, just trying to make some sense out of it. She wanted to find some meaning to such acts of death. She hadn’t seen the battle, but she had seen the aftermath. She had seen hundreds upon hundreds of corpses, and it still disturbed her how many of them had been young, old or innocent.

Four days ago, she had taken Meereen and freed its people. Already, she was starting to question that decision more and more.

Breaking Meereen had been easy. It hadn’t seemed an easy the time, but in hindsight it had been nice and simple. Slavery bad, freedom good. She had the forces, she knew the enemy, she knew the objective.

Ruling Meereen wasn’t easy, though. She had only just declared herself queen, and already it seemed like the city was crumbling around her. She had freed a lot of people, she had broken the old order, but for some reason the fighting and the heartache didn’t end when the battle did. Riots in the streets, murders, rapes, and so many more savageries. Starvation, disease, war. Some days, she could stare out over the city and watch the problems pile up with her naked eye. And yet still, Dany had taken it upon herself to rule this place. It would have been so easy to pillage and burn this place and keep moving west…

Why is it so much easier to break something than build something new?

A part of her wondered why her ancestors had chosen those words. Blood and Fire. You could not build out of blood, you could not preserve with fire. Blood and Fire. Was that really all that her family was good for, all that they could bring to the world?

Dany sighed. She had taken the finest and highest apartments in Meereen for her own, she was not so naive as to neglect the importance of symbols. Her new monarchy demanded nothing less, and from here, the entire city knew that she was in charge now.

And yet now, staring at this monstrous bed of hers, she was starting to regret that decision.

I could order them to bring me a new bed, Dany thought quietly, but her gut wrenched at the thought. All of the servants had been too busy washing up blood and clearing corpses for what seemed like such a petty demand.

Outside, the moon shone bright in the sky. She faintly heard a cry in the distance. Drogon, she guessed. Her black dragon was probably hunting by moonlight over the bay, as was his habit.

Missandei was already dozing off. Dany’s arm was starting to cramp, so she gingerly pulled it out from the girl’s grasp. Missandei stirred, but didn’t awake.

Slowly, the feel of the pillows and sheets weighed ever more on her. Eventually it all seemed strangling to Daenerys, so she sighed and delicately pulled herself out of the bed, taking care not to wake Missandei. She walked barefoot over the stone floor, out onto the terrace. She breathed of the night air, and found staring upwards at the black sky and stars.

She could see shapes stirring, flying before the stars. For a heartbeat, one made a shadow of the moon. My children are restless too, she thought. All three dragons were flying tonight. That was rare – Drogon enjoyed his evening hunts, but normally Viserion and Rhaegal preferred to slumber.

Dany leaned over a stone parapet, staring upwards idly. Behind the clouds, the moon was fat and luminous, spilling moonlight out over the terrace.

There was a soft rustle behind, and Daenerys turned. She could see nothing in the darkness of her apartments. “Missandei?” she softly called. “Irri? Jhiqui?”

“They sleep,” came the answer.

A woman stood under the persimmon tree, clad in a hooded robe that brushed the grass. Beneath the hood, her face seemed hard and shiny. She is wearing a mask, Dany realized, a wooden mask. She recognized that dark red lacquer. The last time she’d seen this woman had been on the Balerion, when they had first come to Astapor. “Quaithe? Am I still dreaming?”

The shadowbinder’s head turned, stepping through the moonlight. “You do not dream.”
“How are you here? How did you get past my guards?”

“I came another way. Your guards never saw me.”

“If I call out, they will kill you.”

“They will swear to you that I’m not here.”

“Are you here?”

“No.” The word was simple, definite. “Hear me, Daenerys Targaryen. The cold winds are blowing. A new song has been sung, and the Old Ones are stirring. Remember the Undying. The stone men will be breaking soon, and then the earthen beast will rise. The kraken will take flight soon after. The kneeling man will stand. Beware the mummer’s charade, and trust none of them. Beware the five horns.”

Dany blinked. Her skin was tingling from the cool air. “If you have some warning, then speak plainly. For once, no riddles. What are you talking about?”

“There will be two of them,” Quaithe replied. “One dark, one bright – one true, and one false. They will both come to you for aid against the other. Both of them will claim your love. Choose wisely, Daenerys. Remember the Undying. Remember who you are.”

Far above, the dragon’s cries were like wind echoing over sand. Dany’s gaze flickered. “I know who I am, but who are you talking about, I don’t understa–”

“Him. He needs your help. You must save the boy, Daenerys. Save the boy.” There was an edge to her voice. Daenerys barely caught the words. “The doom has been awakened, winter is moving again.”

“Winter? How could winter be…?”

There was a cry in the distance. Drogon roared, closer than Dany expected. She flinched, and then Quaithe was gone. The masked woman seemed to disappear into darkness like a rippling shadow fading out of existence. It was like someone just extinguished a candle, and then Quaithe was gone.

The night was dark. Strangely, there was a chill in the air. Dany stood for a long time, staring around the terrace.

In the skies, her children soared and cried. They weren’t normally this agitated at night. All of the dragons were restless.

Dany didn’t have a wink of sleep afterwards. She spent the night obsessing over what had just happened, replaying every word in her head. Prophecies, she thought. I hate prophecies.

She was in a foul, tired mood come morning. The day didn’t help either.

The next morning, Dany toured Meereen with her armed guards. She wanted to see the city that so many had died for. She wanted to see the markets, the homes, the trader’s stalls and the places of business. She wanted to see the people she had saved. Instead, all she saw were corpses. The hundred and sixty-three corpses in the plaza were all ripe and rotting from where Dany had hung them. The flies were everywhere.

By noon, an envoy arrived that made her mood drop even further. An envoy from the so-called ‘King Cleon the Great’ – the butcher king of Astapor. The envoy brought her some dainty little shoes and an offer of marriage, and somehow Dany was expected to smile and nod when she heard that Astapor had fallen to a bloody dictator not days after she left it, that the council of wise men she’d left behind had been butchered by this very ‘Cleon.’ A butcher. Part of her wanted to kill the weasel of an envoy and be done with it, while the rest of her despaired.

The city that she had tried to save had ended up worse than before.

All my victories turn to dross in my hands. Whatever I do, all I make is death and horror.

Dany sat uncomfortably when she talked to a captain of trader’s ships. A merchant of some renown, who had once had dozens of captains in his employ under the old regime. The merchant-captain wept as he described the slaughter and needless bloodshed in Astapor. Dany shifted in her seat as she realised that the same thing would probably happen in Meereen when she left.

Then Daario stood forward and admitted that many of the Meereenese citizens were begging to be taken back at slaves. I gave them freedom, and they beg for slavery again. Dany ordered that only willing men could sell themselves, but it still irritated her to no end.

By evening, she half-wanted to just walk away, but she couldn’t. A queen could never quit, and there was one more judgement to carry out. Two more prisoners waiting in the lower pyramid – not quite imprisoned, but kept close all the same – and Dany needed them.

“Tell Belwas to bring my knights,” Dany commanded, before she could change her mind. “My good knights.”

Strong Belwas was panting as he marched them through the door. Ser Barristan walked with his head held high, while Ser Jorah stared at the marble floor as his feet traipsed across the ground. One proud, one guilty.

They had both risked their lives to help win the city. They had each saved her on multiple occasions. Dany so longed for her knights, but she forced herself to be stern.

Still, when Jorah muttered “… Khaleesi…” so forlornly, Dany’s posture nearly cracked.

“You helped win this city,” she said loudly, her voice filling the great hall. “And you served me well in the past. Ser Barristan saved me from the Titan’s Bastard, and from the Sorrowful Man in Qarth. Ser Jorah saved me from the poisoner in Vaes Dothrak and again from Drogo’s blood-riders after my sun-and-stars died.” So many people wanted her dead that she couldn’t even remember them all, there had been so many close calls. “And yet you lied. Deceived me. Betrayed me.”

She turned to them one by one. Ser Barristan held his head up high, he met her gaze, and Dany found herself believing the old knight when he spoke. He admitted to serving the Usurper after her father’s death, he admitted everything – but he was a good knight who had served her family for generations. Most importantly of all, he freely admitted that he’d been wrong, and asked only for a chance to redeem himself.

He served on my grandfather’s kingsguard, Dany thought, feeling her heart soften. Barristan the Bold. Even across the narrow sea, she’d heard tales of the greatest of the living kingsguard, the knight without peer.

Dany pardoned Ser Barristan easily. He refused to accept a sword except for one that was offered by her, which surprised her, but after it was done, Dany found herself liking the old knight even more than before.

And yet… and yet while Ser Barristan the Bold had been the very image of grace and humility, Ser Jorah Mormont was the opposite. His was a visage of stubbornness and insolence. Her bear was a harder one to forgive.

Jorah Mormont’s face was red, whether from anger or shame she wasn’t sure. He didn’t back down, he argued everything. He excused everyone else, stayed defensive, insistent that he had committed no crime.

Their voices became more and more heated. Nobody in the hall met her gaze. Jorah squirmed and dodged her questions.

“No… no … You have to forgive me,” Jorah snapped eventually, shaking his head. Those words caused her to bristle.

“Have to?” Dany saw Jorah’s eyes. They were proud, stubborn and possessive. It’s too late, she realised quietly. She had wanted to pardon him, oh, how she had wanted to forgive him – she had been all ready to forgive him and welcome him back into her service – but just like that she realised that she couldn’t.

He sees me as his, she thought hollowly. Like I belong to him. Like I should belong to him. Like I am still that lost little girl, and he’s the big knight who must protect me from everyone but himself…

Dany couldn’t rule a man like that. She would rather take hatred, greed or evil any day, rather than that sort of love.

She shook her head. “I can’t forgive you,” she said. “I can’t.”

“You forgave the old man…” Jorah snapped.

“He lied to me about his name. You sold my secrets to the men who killed my father and stole my brother’s throne.”

“I protected you. I fought for you. Killed for you,” Jorah’s voice was heated. “I went down into the sewers like a rat. For you.” His hands clenched. His face was so pained. Dany couldn’t help but think, it might have been kinder for them both if he had died down in those sewers. “… Daenerys… I have loved you.”

Right then, it felt like her heart turned to stone. Her face lost all expression, and in the moment, she couldn’t say if she felt more angry, or more disappointed. Seconds stretched into minutes, and there was nothing but silence in the throne room as she stared at Ser Jorah.

I can’t keep him by my side, she thought. He can’t stay next to me, not like this. Her heart twisted at the thought of him dying, but she couldn’t keep him…

She hesitated. Ser Jorah stepped forward, and then the whole room seemed to tense. Her advisors, her guards, her commanders. They were all waiting on her command…

“The good queen struggles to say the words,” Daario purred, stepping forward from the hall. His hands caressed the hilts of his two blades, but his eyes sharp. “But you need not say them, my radiance. Only give the tiniest nod, and your Daario can do the rest.”

Jorah’s eyes glared furiously, his face red. Any moment now, he might snap, or her guards might overreact. I don’t want him to die, Dany realised. He shouldn’t die for loving me…

And suddenly Quaithe’s words came back to her. Two will claim your love, the shadowbinder had Dany found her voice quickly. The idea formed even as she started speaking.

“Enough,” Dany said sharply. “The gods do nothing without a purpose, they say. You did not die in battle, so you will not die here. But you will not stay near me.”

“No…” His eyes were wide. Jorah reached for her, yet her guards intervened. Both Strong Belwas and Ser Barristan moved to stop him. “Daenerys, please, hear me…”

“I have made my decision. You are banished, ser.” I must be iron. The words looked like they hit Jorah like a punch to the gut. There was a pause. “… However, in light of your service, I will give you one chance to redeem your queen’s trust.”

The room froze. His eyes were pleading. She forced herself to meet his gaze and did not flinch. “You betrayed and informed on me to my enemies.” She held up her hand as he tried to object. “If you want my forgiveness, then you must balance the scales.”

“Anything,” Ser Jorah choked.

“Then return to Westeros, ser,” she said coolly. Ser Barristan looked surprised. Ser Jorah blinked. “You know the lands, you know the customs, and you have friends and family there. I need information on the Seven Kingdoms, and you must give it to me. To prepare for my arrival.”

He twitched. “I am exiled.”

“I declare your exile over. You must be my scout, my spy – my envoy even. Whatever it takes.”

He can still fight for me, I just can’t have him next to me.

“They will kill me if I return.”

“I will kill you if you stay. Believe that. If you choose not to, then fine – you must still leave by daybreak. You will not stay by my side.”

It was a chance, it was a choice. Daenerys felt guilty hanging such a cruel choice in front of him, but she already knew he would take it, and in truth she didn’t know what else to do with him. In any case, she needed information he could provide. She needed someone in Westeros, someone who could stay informed about events to the west. Somebody who she could trust, who would be driven to serve her even across great distances. She needed allies, ready for the day her homecoming eventually arrived.

It felt wrong to use him, to manipulate a man who loved her, but… No, Dany thought. I am a queen; love can have naught to do it with it. He is a knight and this is his duty.

The thought of Quaithe lingered, of all those riddles and vague statements. Danys hated being in the dark, she hated not knowing.

Exiling Jorah brought her nothing, and killing him would give her only heartbreak; offering him a chance to redeem himself in her cause felt like the right thing to do.

He stared down at the marble steps. “If I do so…” he choked. “How long, and when can I…?”

Her eyes narrowed. Too insolent, even when he was a hair’s breadth away from being banished from her side for good. “Until I take the Iron Throne, ser,” she replied. “And until I choose to welcome you again to my court.”

Jorah’s form trembled, and his hands clenched. He let out a breath, and closed his eyes. When they opened, his eyes were harder, his former anger and panic chilled to ice. “I would go to the ends of the earth for you, Daenerys. I swear it,” he promised. “I would sail off the edge of the Sunset Sea, or walk through the darkness of Sothoryos alone in your name. I will even return home for you.”

Chapter End Notes

Just to clarify, the story will probably be leading towards a Jon/Dany pairing - yet, well, it's not going to happen instantly, since they're on opposite sides of the planet and all. Other pairings could appear, though; right now I've got a lot of the main ideas fixed, but a lot of the story is fairly fluid.

I'm planning divergences for a lot of the story, but for now anything that isn't otherwise stated you can assume to be happening the exact same way as canon. Any other POVs not related to stuff happening at the Wall are mostly going the same way for now, they'll be coming in later. How I've been writing it is that at the beginning the story focuses mainly on the far north, because that's where the main ripples are happening, but then it travels south as more of the realm starts to get involved. After all, giant dragons do generally cause a pretty big splash...
Chapter 7

Chapter Summary

How to rescue a dragon...

Jon

Phantom prowled down the rocky ledge. She could smell the scent of death in the air. Dead flesh, dried blood and the tang of rot.

There were four of them. Four wights shambling through the rocks, their limbs and ragged pelts sheeted with frost. Their movements were cumbersome and the terrain was rough, but such obstacles were nothing to the dead. Every time one of the wights stumbled over a rock, it just pulled itself up again and kept on shambling forwards.

They all had pale skin, black hands, and cold blue eyes. Three of them were male – formerly Thenn warriors, the other was female. One of the males was completely naked, while all the others were clad in ragged furs. Another of the males had a severely broken leg, and it was falling behind the others as it limped on regardless.

No, Jon pushed. Stay. Watch.

The shadowcat fought him every step of the way, but he was the one in control of her body. She could feel him inside of her skin.

The wights were heading west. There had been others heading in the same direction earlier. Something was calling them to the west. All of the ones the shadowcat had encountered were stragglers – wights that had been left behind by the main mass of their army, left to flounder in the snow.

She dropped down onto a lower ledge, her lean body prowling in the dark. Previously, she had tried to avoid the wights, but these ones were in their path. They had to be taken care of.

Kill, Jon ordered, moving her legs. Kill, hunt.

No. Dangerous, she protested. Flee.

Kill, Jon insisted, squashing her response so forcefully the shadowcat could do nothing but keep prowling forward. It was like he was gripping her by the spine, so tightly she couldn’t even twitch in a direction he did not allow.

There were some periods when she had more control than others. Sometimes Phantom was left to move freely, with nothing but the faint voice of the human in her head. Then, the other times, like now, Jon took total control, moving her limbs as if they were his own.

The shadowcat dropped down a bit further, stalking slightly in the night. She went for the crippled one first.
The wight didn’t react at first as she leapt on it from behind, her teeth biting into the back of its neck. The flesh tasted cold and foul. It thrashed and struggled weakly, but then she was cleaving open the spine. The wight dropped to the ground. Its limbs were still twitching and moving, but with the spine and the back of the head ripped open, it could barely do anything but thrash disjointedly in the snow. It lost all muscle control and fell, dead limbs twisting madly. She felt her teeth cleave through cold bone.

It was bad meat, but still, normally she would have stopped to eat, or to drag the body away to a safer place before eating. There was no time for that now. Instead, she just let the ruined wight to thrash while the shadowcat leapt away.

The other three, Jon ordered. Kill.

Phantom suppressed a growl as her body moved after the others.

The first one, the biggest, was the only one clutching a weapon. A long stone axe. It had once been a man wearing thick leathers. This one would be the most difficult, she knew. Normally, Phantom would have fled from such a foe, perhaps tried to strike later from a better place or while the prey slept. Still, her body moved into position. This time, these three were closer together – she wouldn’t be able to take out one without alerting the others.

Wights were difficult prey to ambush. They didn’t feel pain, and you had to disable them quickly to stop them. It required very precise strikes at the areas they were most vulnerable.

She lunged at the wight from the side. It had slow reflexes – that was the only saving grace. The shadowcat slammed onto it, paws wrapping around its body, forcing it to the ground while sharp teeth tore at its head. It struggled, but Phantom was ripping off its face before it could even use that axe.

The other wight, the naked one, charged towards her with outstretched hands. Phantom reacted smoothly, lunging with a vicious claw under its swing. Sharp claws scratched across its eyes, splitting that blue gaze straight out. The wound oozed black blood slowly.

After a single swipe, Phantom darted away. Both of those wights were still moving – one of them with a mutilated face, and the other one with its eyes clawed out. Still, they were both blind, and that meant they were shambling around helplessly now. She would let them shamble around blindly, and the steep mountain cliffs would do the rest. One bad step and legs would shatter. Blind foes could be taken down at will.

It wasn’t a shadowcat way of killing, but it was an effective one. Phantom had killed more frequently and more brazenly under the control of Jon than she had ever done by herself.

There was only one left now. The girl. She stared at the shadowcat with an empty impassive face and blue eyes glowing softly. She used to be young, slender, with dark raven hair that was now white with frost. For a moment, an image flashed in her eyes; of another girl with dark hair, about the same age as the wight had been. A long face and wild eyes.

The shadowcat paused. It wasn’t her memory, but it still made her hesitate. The wight stared at the shadowcat with bright blue eyes. Jon felt himself shiver.

She can see me, Jon knew instinctively. She’s not looking just at the shadowcat, she can see me. Jon never knew how, but he suddenly could tell that the wight could see more than just a shadowcat in front of it.
Kill, Jon ordered after a heartbeat.

Phantom growled. She lunged.

Jon sighed, as he slowly pulled himself back to his own body. He was slumped over the great elk, still riding through the mountains. They had made good progress.

I can handle, at most, two bodies at once, he thought quietly. The hard part about warging was being present in multiple skins at once. Ghost was easy – Ghost would follow his commands even without him, but Phantom required near constant supervision. Whenever Jon had to control Phantom’s body directly, his own body would collapse as if unconscious. It most certainly made things dangerous. He could only do it now because he trusted the great elk to carry him, but he became vulnerable each time he warged. It was hard enough controlling the shadowcat and keeping himself on the elk at the same time.

Still, it did feel like it was getting easier. Phantom placated noticeably after feeding, and she been eating well with the wights that they had been picking off.

Jon was learning how to fight wights, picking them off one by one with Phantom. The normal rules were useless against wights; if you severed an arm, that arm would still move. Jon had always been taught to strike for the throat or the chest in battle, but those were the worst place to strike against wights. Instead, the best targets were at the eyes, or the joints; not to try and kill them, instead just disable them.

Jon closed his eyes, focusing on Ghost this time. His direwolf accepted him smoothly, without hesitation. He gave the order for Ghost to head towards Phantom – they could both share in eating the bodies of the wights. Both animals needed to eat. After that, he pushed Phantom again. His command was softer this time, ordering the shadowcat to head further north. Jon used Phantom as his forward scout, while he generally kept Ghost closer to him for immediate protection.

He sighed. His head was already pounding. Warging and constantly split his attention like this was exhausting.

Occasionally, Jon mused about taking more bodies. It was definitely tempting, in any case. Maybe a hawk or an owl to scout out from the air? Jon mused. Or even just a horse would be so useful – some mount that could carry me, that I control with my mind. If I really wanted to, I could even pick a snow bear – a great beast that could fight for me. Not for the first time, Jon remembered Varamyr’s six different bodies. It was a moot point, however; right now Jon wasn’t skilled enough to handle much more than he had.

Jon stared at the ravens circling around him, and at the elk carrying him. The elk trundled on through the clifffy path with sure footing. He knew that the three-eyed crow must be warged into, at the very least, a dozen ravens and an elk all at the same time. He had no idea how the greenseer managed it.

Jon paused slightly as he remembered the wight Phantom killed. The dead girl had looked straight at him with blue eyes. It knew.

… I think the Others are using the same skill as well, Jon thought. I think that’s how the white walkers control their wights; they warg into them.

He had been thinking about it for a while now. Perhaps it wasn’t the exact same as skinchanging, but Jon suspected that was the same power used in different ways. Jon used it to possess animals, while the white walkers used it to possess dead bodies. The wight saw me. Wargs can always recognise other wargs. That wight saw me because there was an Other inside of it, controlling that body. It saw me through its third eye.

It made sense. Jon had never seen the Others give any verbal orders or visible instructions, but the wights still moved like perfect soldiers. It also explained why the Others needed touch (or at least close proximity) to create wights from corpses – they would possess them.

Jon thought of the stranger, the resurrected person who didn’t follow the Others. The greenseer is a skinchanger too; if the greenseer had somehow blocked the white walkers from possessing the stranger, then that might explain how the stranger retained his sentience when all other wights do not.

Jon never knew what to do with the theory, but it did make him feel slightly better about the foe. It meant for every wight there was an Other controlling it. Perhaps the Others also have a limit on the number of bodies each one could control? Perhaps the number of wights is limited by the number of white walkers to command them? And maybe if I kill a white walker, I also stop all of the wights that it is controlling.

Of course, it also meant that everything a wight saw or heard, then a white walker sees too. They were commanders that could control their army perfectly across any distance, through mental instructions. If the white walkers weren’t limited in range when raising wights, then perhaps they never needed to approach the front lines at all.

It’s quite possibly the perfect army, he thought with a twinge of dread. Cheap, perfectly controlled and infinitely replaceable soldiers.

It means they might already know that I am here. It would make surprise difficult. The number of wights had been getting thicker lately. Jon suspected that the Others were summoning reinforcements from the wights that they had left behind in Thenn territory. Still, the thought was reassuring; it was a bit more that he could infer about the tactics of his enemy. If you had soldiers that could stay preserved indefinitely and act autonomously, then it made sense to leave some scattered behind, maybe buried under snow, just so you had bodies everywhere in case something happened. In many ways, the wights made both perfect soldiers and perfect scouts.

Yet it meant that Jon would have to fight through more and more wights answering their master’s call the closer he got.

They were already nearly out of the Frostfangs now, and heading towards the frozen wastes. He knew the ice dragon was getting close, and he knew he had to hurry. Jon was pushing the elk as hard as he dared to go.

Jon closed his eyes and tried to focus. In his mind’s eye, he could still visualise the scene. Not in details, more feeling. He felt the sensation of being surrounded, of being trapped and hounded, weakened and injured. Jon’s dreams had become more vivid than ever. The ice dragon was in trouble.

After weeks of being hounded and fleeing, the Others had finally had it trapped. The dragon had been starving, and the Others had come at it with great bows and arrows made of ice. The icy arrows had pierced straight through one of dragon’s leathery wings. They were targeting the wings. Wights had dropped onto its wings with blades and axes, creating gashes across its wings that had stopped the dragon from flying. As soon the dragon became grounded, it became vulnerable.

It was trapped now. It had finally stopped moving, staying stationary. It had taken refuge on a small hilly outcrop at the northern end of the Frostfangs. A dragon perched on a hilltop – a last resort for a beast that couldn’t fly. The Others assaulted it constantly with wights, but so far the dragon’s breath had made short work of them all.

Still, the Others were patient and the dragon was starving. It couldn’t hold out forever. Sooner or later the dragon would fall. The dragon was a great beast. Hundreds of years old and perhaps as large as Balerion the Black Dread, if not larger, but it wasn’t invincible.

Jon had seen all of this in his dreams. In his dreams, the dragon was panicked and frenzied; furious but also desperate.

He had to hurry. He was close enough that he could hear the dragon’s roars in the distance sometimes. They sounded like thunder rolls. Underneath the aurora, he could make out the outline of the hill where he knew that dragon was entrapped. And the wights kept getting thicker.

He felt the alert coming from Phantom. A stab of fear. Jon instantly slunk into her skin, staring out of her eyes. She was watching the path ahead of him, where the mountains disappeared into rock and snowy drifts.

There was a bear at the mouth of pass. A great snow bear – one that could stand thirteen feet tall, with a thick, muscled body. Its fur must have been white once, but now it was rotten with huge chunks of meat missing from its body. The animal had been savaged before it died, with half of its head sloughed away to reveal the skull beneath. The undead bear was a lumbering, massive beast.
It was heading towards the dragon too.

{}Phantom won’t be able to bring down a bear,{} Jon cursed. He didn’t like Ghost’s chances either.
Perhaps together they might have a chance, but it would be dangerous and more likely to draw the attention of the Others.

Above him, the ravens cawed. The flock flickered around him. There are more wights heading towards him from the east, Jon realised from the warning, must be a group of wights. With a rustle of wings, the ravens parted – the birds would distract the wights, try to lead them away.

So far, his only shot was remaining unnoticed. There was a whole army that he had to get through.
The Others were here in force and Jon was trying to sneak between them. If even a single wight sees me…

The dragon was close. Another day’s ride, if that. He slipped into Phantom’s skin, creeping around the cliffs to get a better view. He slipped past the bear and onwards. He could see there were more figures in the snow, all lumbering towards the hill. There were at least three hundred wights spread across the plains, with scattered shapes that weren’t all human. Phantom could smell the scent of undead wolves, bears, even a couple of bulking shapes of giants.

He knew that the undead were just the pawns, though, scattered around the field. The Others themselves would be at the hill, overseeing the siege against the dragon. It was only just dusk. Jon knew that the assault against the dragon would be starting soon. They always attacked at night.

Jon set up camp early that night. He found a hidden enclave on the cliffs that gave him view of the hill, carefully out of sight from the wights. Ghost prowled next to him, on guard, while Jon’s body slumped as he crept into Phantom’s skin once more.

The shadowcat was scared. Terrified, in fact. So many dead littered across the snow plains. Still, Jon forced her forward, creeping dangerously into the midst of the wights. Close enough to get a view.
He felt the world tremble suddenly. The roar was so loud it shook the earth.

He saw the dragon. It was every bit as brilliant as he remembered, even if this time its hide was littered with wounds. The dragon was gloriously white and crested with red, with dark eyes that shone in the night. Its body was crouched, wrapped around itself and tight while its long neck coiled almost serpentine. Its claws dug into the stone. It looked like pure fury given flesh. Its tall whipping furiously as its head snapped back to front. Sharp teeth flashed in its mouth.

The sense of scale sent tremors down Jon’s back. It was hard to imagine a creature that big, even when staring from a distance. The whole hill itself looked like some tiny mount with the dragon perched on top of it. The hill wasn’t so high, but it was wide and littered in rocky, snow covered outcrops. Even a good climber would have difficulty getting up there.

Phantom crept closer, and she saw wights charging in from all directions, shambling up the rocky incline. The dragon was alert, coiled into the rocks as it saw the wights climbing upwards. The dragons took a deep breath, and Jon could see the surrounding air hazing.

Brilliant white fire scorched from the dragon’s mouth in a pure, magnificent stream. It was so powerful it scorched the rocks clean, tearing the wights into pieces.

The dragon roared in a continuous stream for a several heartbeats, twisting around itself to burn the hill clear. The wights burnt into nothing under its power, like ants disintegrating in a fire. The white fire burned the rocks clean. But then more and more wights started broke out of the plains. Another wave attacked as soon as the first was vaporised. The dragon roared in fury.

It can’t breathe dragonfire continuously, Jon realised. With every break in its breath, it became vulnerable. The wights were pushing the dragon constantly, hounding it until it weakened.

The dragon’s scales were solid like armour. Jon saw wights clutching bows trying to take shots, but the dragon was well and truly fortified. It took shelter clutching to the large rocks of its perched, keeping its head down, and the few arrows that did hit bounced off its scales uselessly.

The wights charged up towards it, shambling with surprising speed. The dragon’s tail swiped powerful wicked swings, but more and more wights filled in the gaps. The wights leapt physically at the dragon, clutching onto hard scales and striking with whatever weapons they had, or even just uselessly trying to attack with bare hands. The dragon was over a hundred-foot-long, and the wights were like insects to it. The beast roared and tried to thrash them off, but they never stopped. They came from every side relentlessly, even as they squashed by the dozens. Dozens of wights crushed or mutilated with every swipe of teeth and claws.

No, Jon thought, watching the battle. The Others didn’t waste troops like this. There was always a calculated intelligence behind their attacks.

Then, Phantom saw it. The wights were just distractions. The true threat came from the ice spiders.

The ice spiders were subtle. While the wights charged blindly in numbers, the ice spiders crept in between them, nearly invisible in the snow. While the dragon was trying to brush the wights off, the ice spiders were skittering up the rocks. These ice spiders were big. Bigger than the ones Jon saw at the battle in the Frostfangs – these spiders looked as large as small ponies. Their beady eyes were frighteningly remorseless as they skittered to the dragon.

The ice dragon roared. The ice spiders made it right up to the dragon’s feet before they lunged, diving at the dragon’s soft underbelly. The dragon’s claws tore a dozen of them to pieces, but the other spiders grappled and clicked and bit. Their fangs were sharp enough to bite between the dragon’s scales and into its skin. The dragon howled, but this time in pain.

The ice spiders clutched onto its hide and jabbed their fangs into its huge body. The spiders were like ticks on a horse, and the dragon couldn’t shake them off fast enough.

The ice spider venom, Jon thought with quiet dread. He rubbed the thigh of his bad leg instinctively. He had been bitten by a small one, but the venom still froze the blood in his leg. The dragon was very large, but enough venom would still weaken it consistently. Jon guessed that this wasn’t the first time they had done such an attack. All the Others would have to do was keep on the pressure and wait for the venom to do its job.

The dragon howled again, breathing white fire once more to clear the ice spiders from around it. It’s wasting dragonfire, Jon thought. It’s panicking, and wasting its fire breath indiscriminately.

The dragonfire was the only thing holding the Others back from attacking with their full army. Instead, the Others had deliberately placed their undead sparsely around the surrounding field, so that the dragon would never be able to scorch all their troops at once. It was a deliberate, effective tactic.

Normally, it might take thousands of men to bring down a dragon that size, but the Others were doing it with a few hundred wights and ice spiders. The Others are good at hunting dragons. They know what tactics to use. It made Jon think that maybe they’ve had practice doing it before.

As soon as the dragon’s breath ran out, the next wave of wights shambled to attack. A larger force this time – the Others were free to commit more troops because the risk of the dragon’s breath had run out. There were even three undead giants in this wave; large, muscular shapes armed with huge clubs and spikes that could even do damage to the dragon’s thick hide. These wights weren’t attacking blindly either, these were more capable, less decayed wights armed with arrows and lances. First, they sent in shock troops to draw its fire. Then, they sent in ice spiders to poison it. Now, they were committing a much stronger force that could maybe subdue the dragon all together.

Jon watched in stunned silence as the dragon fought and wrath. Arrows bounced off its hide. It tore the undead giants apart in its teeth. The dragon didn’t go down easily. But the Others would never stop.

Slowly, Jon directed Phantom closer to the hill. He felt the shadowcat’s breath grow hoarse and cold as he saw the glittering cold shapes on the field of snow.

If they see me, I’m dead, Jon thought with a quiet stab of panic. He could feel Phantom almost roaring at him in fear.

He could pick out the shapes of the white walkers themselves, standing in a circle around the hill, but a safe distance away. The commanders directing their army. Their shapes seemed to glitter in the dusk.

There were five white walkers in total. Two of them were mounted on undead rotten horses, one of them was on a giant spider just as big. The other two were on foot. All of them had sharp, glittering swords, one clutched a white lance. They stared upwards at the dragon with unblinking blue eyes, as still as a statue.

They took positions all around the hill, like an army directing a siege. Fortunately, their attention was raptured on the dragon, Jon didn’t think they noticed the shadowcat creeping around in the shadows. Their wights were positioned sparsely enough that Phantom could creep in between them in the darkness, as silent as a shadow. Jon watched for as long as he dared. Then, he had to pull Phantom back.

He sighed as dropped back into his skin, rubbing his head in pain. The longer he forced the warg the harder it became. Jon took a deep breath, trying to take stock of his foes.

There were about four or five hundred wights surrounding the hill, all of them positioned sparsely, but more arriving every day. There was no tight rank and file of wights – which was good because it made easier to sneak through – but also bad because it meant they spread over a much greater area.

There were also five white walkers, plus however many ice spiders. Maybe three or four undead giants.

And one dragon.

The dragon had to run. It was poisoned, starving and weakening quickly. It couldn’t fly, and it couldn’t survive a siege.

The dragon’s only chance would be if it tried to break through the Other’s forces and run. Jon supposed that moving across the ground on foot must be completely against the nature of a dragon; which was why it had holed up on its perch instead. Trying to convince a dragon to fight on the ground, where was most vulnerable, would be like trying to convince an eagle to hunt on foot. Completely against the animal’s nature and the white walkers were exploiting that. The dragon didn’t know these lands. It wouldn’t run blindly into potentially even more danger. Instead, the dragon chose to stay and fight.

The Others were summoning more and more wights to assault the dragon, they were filing through the mountains. In a few days, there could be twice as many undead.

I need to warg with it, Jon thought. The only chance he had was if he could warg with the dragon, and push it into doing something that no dragon would normally do.

Even on foot, the dragon was still big. Jon reckoned it could move quickly, and the Others wouldn’t be expecting a sudden change in behaviour. The dragon could push through the undead lines, used dragonfire to clear a path, to break through into the mountains. They could reach the mountain path, and they could run down the Milkwater and take shelter in the haunted forest. The Others move slowly. You can outrun them, at least for a while.

And, above all, he needed to do it quickly. While the dragon still had strength to fight. Jon closed his eyes and tried to concentrate. I need to warg with the dragon…

He tried to remember what the dragon dreams felt like. He tried to focus on the great white dragon, pushing out his mind to meet it. He sat there for a long time, his body shivering with cold, and he felt absolutely nothing.

Jon cursed. Around him, the ravens cawed quietly. He spent a long time staying at the knowing gaze of one of the ravens as it cawed. The three-eyed crow must have known what he would face.

…”It’s easier to warg with animals when up close, Jon told himself. I might just be too far away. If I could touch it, or if I can look into its eyes, I would possibly have a better chance.

There were so many problems with that statement he never even knew where to begin. The army of undead. The white walkers. The dragon.
While Jon had a sword, a wolf, a cat, and an elk.

He could feel the fear so intense his body trembled. Part of him wanted to just turn and run, but he knew that he couldn’t do that. He had a chance to potentially win this war, and he could never live with himself if he let that slip by.

Still, that didn’t stop his heart from pounding and his hand from trembling.

There is no shame in fear, his father had told him. What matters is how we face it.

Jon gulped, took a deep breath, and started to plan.

I’m not going to die here, he thought quietly. I was ready to die once, but not this time.

He thought of Ygritte, of his family, his sister, of his brothers and his home and he steeled himself to live. This time, he was going to absolutely everything and anything he could to live.

“… I’m going to save a dragon,” Jon whispered, staring out over the hills for a long time. In the distance, the white dragon thrashed.

The dream was vivid and intense. Jon stood atop a great mountain of ice, staring at the glowing northern lights. All around him, as far as the eye could see, there was nothing but snow and ice.

Jon blinked, staring at the dreamscape. He knew it was a dream, which was strange. He stretched his hands, inspecting his body. I have five fingers again, he realised suddenly as he looked at his left hand. The mutilated hand was gone. His little finger, severed by frostbite, was back on his knuckles. This is just a dream.

Then a bird flapped from the sky and perched on an icy outcrop. Jon turned to stare at the black crow. This crow had a third, black eye in the middle of its forehead.

“… You can communicate through dreams?” Jon asked.

“Of course,” the crow cawed. “We see more in our dreams than most realise.”

Jon smiled, but the smile was grim. “The dragon is under siege. I can’t reach it, and I’m not close enough to warg.”

“I know. There are four hundred wights surrounding it, and more coming each day. There is a larger force heading from the north, but for now there is very brief window where they might be vulnerable.”

Jon frowned. “I can’t fight through four hundred. Unless I fly to the dragon. Can you fly me?”

“I’m afraid not. But I can help even the odds. There is a clan of giants to the southeast. I have directed them towards you.”

Giants? Jon knew that giant clans were usually small family units and migratory, but… “You can control giants?!”

“No,” the crow cawed. “But I can control their mammoths. The giants will follow their mammoths.”

“How many giants?”

“Five giants, and three mammoths.”
Jon shook his head. “... That won’t be enough. They’ll get slaughtered.”

“Yes,” the crow agreed. “But the Others like raising giants and mammoths – they make good prizes for their army. The white walkers will split their forces and head south to kill the giant clan. That is less for you to deal with.”

He stared. “You’re going to use them as bait.”

“Distractions, rather. They will expect the dragon to be subdued after the night, right now they are simply waiting for the poison to weaken it further. They will not underestimate a giant clan, however, so they will send wights in force to deal with them. That gives you an opportunity. You will not get a better one.”

“And the giants themselves?” he said, aghast. “You’re pulling them into a battle unprepared and they’ll be killed.”

“Yes.”

The thought made him feel sick, but there was no choice but to swallow it. “How many do I have to face?”

“I suspect less than two hundred will be left behind.”

“Still too many. I’m alone here.”

The bird rustled. “No. You’re not alone. We can help with those odds.”

Jon didn’t reply. His hands clenched, glaring suspiciously. “Take the dragon and run. Warg with it. Command it,” the bird ordered. “Run east over the Frostfangs and keep going, I can distract them from following you. Get the dragon to safety.”

“And if I can’t warg with it?”

“Then you die. So do many,” the bird cawed. “Get close to the dragon, look into its eyes, and you have the best chance that anyone has.”

Jon’s jaw clenched. He paused to stare at his hands. Around him, there was a crack like thunder. The crow just rustled, wings outstrecthing. “This is your duty, Jon Snow,” the crow cawed. “And, say, do you have any corn?”

The world disappeared with a flash. Jon jolted awake suddenly. He was lying on a rocky cliff, with the elk grazing next to him. The elk stared at him knowingly.

It was barely dawn. Compared to the frenzy of last night, the plains seemed quiet. The dragon was resting from the Other’s assault, while the wights had backed off for the day to wait for reinforcements. Jon could still here the dark shapes littering the snows – the wights spread out and waiting patiently around the hill.

I’ll charge at noon, Jon thought with a clenched jaw. There was no other way to do this.

At dawn, the Others would have to retreat. They didn’t come out during the day. Likewise, Jon suspected that the ice spiders were nocturnal too. That left only the wights. Their forces were still depleted after attacking the dragon during the night, and they would be further depleted with the greenseer’s giant distraction. There could only be about two hundred undead wights standing between Jon and the dragon.
Well, not true actually. The wights were spread around the entire hill, like in a siege formation. The ones on the other side of the side probably wouldn’t be able to react in time. As soon as Jon broke cover and tried to approach the hill, he would likely only face roughly fifty or so.

That was still far too many for one person to face, but it was a better number. It was a number he could he could work to cut down further. If Jon moved quickly, he could possibly slip through most of them.

_I need a distraction_, he decided. _I need to lure them away to one side to give me a clear chance at making it. I need to use Ghost and Phantom._

The plan was simple. Jon could warg into Ghost and Phantom and direct them to the western edge of the field. The two animals would attack whatever wights they could for however long they could hold them, which would clear an opening for Jon to ride up from the southeast. The elk was fully rested, and if he timed it right they wouldn’t be expecting it. They would have slow reaction times.

With a clear field, the elk could probably make the journey to the hill in about an hour. With a good gallop, the wights might not be able to stop him. They wouldn’t see Jon coming, and they wouldn’t be expecting anyone to run into the middle of their siege.

There would still be the undead directly around the hill to deal with. There was no choice but to cut through them. There was no way to tell how many would he would have to face.

Jon’s big concern (well, bigger) was the undead giant positioned by the hill. It was a huge, rotting beast, twelve feet tall with an exposed ribcage and old spears still sticking out of its dead body. Hopefully Ghost and Phantom could lure the giant away as well. If not, Jon would have to just try to avoid it. Giants were slow, he remembered one of the children of the forest saying. An undead giant must be even slower.

Jon didn’t need to _beat_ them, he just needed to get past them.

The dragon would be weak and injured from fighting the night before. Hopefully, it would be subdued. It would make it easier for Jon to get close enough to warg.

There was no escape plan. Or, rather, the dragon was the escape plan.

Jon’s arms were twitching. He dropped anything that he didn’t desperately need. His spare furs, his blankets, even his emergency rations. The elk needed to be able to run fast.

“_I am the watcher on the wall._” Jon muttered to himself, trying to calm his nerves. A quiet chant to focus the warg, to reinforce his identity. “_I am the shield the guards the realm of men._”

The dawn was cold and hard, the sun barely visible this far north. Still, Jon just had to hope it was enough to drive the Others away.

“_I am the watcher on the wall…_” he repeated, closing his eyes as he slipped into Phantom’s skin.

The shadowcat growled and fought, but there was no gentleness from Jon this time. He pushed firmly, forcing her to obey. His body slumped as suddenly he was staring through the sharp, black and white vision of a cat. She didn’t like operating in the day, and she liked the undead even less. Jon had to force her every step of the way.

Thankfully, Ghost followed smoothly. The direwolf reacted to Jon instinctively. Every moment waiting felt agonising. Jon let the noon sun spread high into the air, before pushing the animals to Jon stayed in Phantom’s skin. She was the one who needed the most control, while Ghost could handle himself. If need be, Jon would even sacrifice Phantom to let Ghost escape. He wasn’t about to let his best friend die.

_Run_, the shadowcat urged in panic. _Run, danger, run._

_No_, Jon pushed. _Fight._

The shadowcat was used to fighting stealthily, one on one. Jon was forcing her to do the exact opposite. He needed the distraction.

_The snow bear_, Jon thought. The undead snow bear was close to the edge. The biggest threat. A bear like that could maybe run down an elk. He needed to take the bear down first. _Attack._

She was so panicked she nearly escaped from his control. Instead, Jon pushed her harder, driving her to lunge.

The snow bear didn’t see it coming. Suddenly, the shadowcat was leaping out from the snowy rocks, straight into the snow bear’s hide. Sharp claws bit into thick muscle and hide. The snow bear didn’t even feel it. Suddenly, everything devolved into frenzied growling, and tooth and fang. The bear straightened up on two legs, trying to knock Phantom off. Jon saw a single blue eye glowing in the faint sun. She barely clung onto its back, still tearing through any flesh she could reach.

The bear twisted, large paws swinging at her. Phantom felt its claws brush at her hind legs, and then Ghost barrelled at the bear. The direwolf was smaller than the snow bear, but he was still powerful. Sharp fangs tore at its hide, barrelling into the bear and snapping at the throat.

Ghost in front and Phantom on its back. The snow bear was scrambling, but it attacked with undead fury. _Go for the eyes_, Jon pushed. He could feel the shadowcat’s panic as if were his own. The eyes, the nose, the skull. _Take down the senses first._

Ghost twisted to one side to avoid a lunge, tearing at its back. Phantom clambered up the bear’s back, hissing and growling as she dug sharp claws into the bear’s face. The bear’s movements were wild and powerful. Ghost pulled one of its hind legs out from under it, and the creature collapsed. Phantom had to pounce off before she was crushed as it fell. The bear was mad and blind, but it still swiped and raged.

Phantom’s instincts pushed her to go for the throat, to kill it by tearing out the jugular. Jon had to override them. Wights were difficult opponents to beat; the throats were useless since they didn’t breathe. If you couldn’t sever the spine, then you needed to cut it down piece by piece. _The arms._ _The legs_, Jon ordered. Strip the muscles away from the limbs. _Stop it from moving._

The bear charged. Ghost darted away, and then pounced on it from the side, meeting it with ferocity and strength. Phantom hesitated, waiting for the opportunity before lunging at the bears hind legs. Her sharp teeth gouged rotten flesh away from bone. Ghost handled the top. Phantom cut away at it from the bottom. Normally, the direwolf didn’t like the shadowcat, but at that moment their coordination was flawless.

The snow bear was struggling. Its body was being shredded. Normally, the animals would finish the job and tear it apart, but Jon intervened. _The bear is crippled. Leave it._

Phantom broke apart. Ghost snarled and retreated; a long, ringing howl breaking out of his throat.
The howl rang across the field.

The other wights were already moving. They were shambling towards the animals – at least two dozen of them. Jon knew it would happen, but he also knew that the pair were massively surrounded. It’s alright. I don’t have to beat them, just keep them busy. If need be, the animals could lead the wights around in a chase through the mountains. Aim to cripple, don’t bother trying to kill.

The snow bear was still moving. It tried to stagger after Ghost, but it didn’t have enough limbs left to even move properly.

The first wight charged, swinging a stone axe. Phantom pounced on it, claws tearing through its back while the sharp teeth gouged at its shoulder. The wight was still scratching and biting even as Phantom bit its arm clean off. There’s barely even blood, he noticed, only rotten ooze.

A second wight tried to charge at the shadowcat. Ghost barrelled into it, tearing it to pieces savagely, biting and snarling. The other wights were closing in fast. Jon forced himself to take control of Phantom’s body and his own at the same time. Trying to move and warg at the same time felt excruciatingly painful, but at the moment Jon didn’t care.

“Move!” Jon snapped, kicking at the elk. The three-eyed crow knew the plan as well. “Move! Run! Move!”

The beast broke into a gallop. Strong hooves kicked up the snow. The path was rocky, but the great elk was surefooted. Around him, the ravens erupted into the air.

It was maybe ten miles to the hill, on mostly open ground. The wights were gathered around in about a three-mile perimeter, with a few outliers. Normally they would see Jon coming straight away, but with Phantom and Ghost serving as distractions, there might be a chance. Jon’s heart was in his mouth as the elk galloped. He could only hope he had timed it properly.

Through Jon’s third eye, he saw a dozen wights charge at Ghost. They were all armed, but the direwolf met them ferociously. The direwolf fought them with strength and fury, while the shadowcat picked them off with precision and stealth.

Tooth and claw couldn’t compare to steel. The beasts would die very quickly in any straight fight against metal blades. Their only saving grace was their manoeuvrability and speed. Despite his size, Ghost darted and weaved agilely, avoiding the blades but striking fierce, powerful blows.

Still, speed could always be beaten by numbers. The more wights came after them, the worse it became.

If they had been fighting men, Jon doubted if they would have had a chance. The wights were hard to kill and powerful, but they also lacked the coordination and the reflexes of living men. It took a different type of tactic to beat them. Ghost and Phantom could exploit that.

Jon’s heart was pounding as the elk galloped. It was a strong beast, but even it would tire quickly running quickly.

Ghost and Phantom were slowly retreating backwards. Phantom had taken a graze to its rump, and it was taking all of Jon’s concentration to force the shadowcat not to turn and flee all together. As soon as I start fighting, I’m going to lose control of Phantom completely, he thought with a grimace. Still, there was nothing for it. Jon wouldn’t be able to fight properly in two bodies at once.
The animals were being forced backwards, but circling around the wights. So many wights had had their legs torn out that the dead bodies tried to drag themselves across the snow. The wights shambled over themselves to chase after the direwolf. Careful, Jon pushed, just keep them busy.

Jon was approaching the hill. He could see with his own eyes the fields that he had only previously seen through Phantom’s. There were black spots dotted across the snowfields ahead. More wights, Jon thought angrily. Not all of them had been distracted by Ghost and Phantom.

Dark shapes fluttered around him. The ravens shot through the air either side of him, swarming on the nearest wights. The ravens went for the eyes, pecking and scratching viciously. The ravens kept the closest wights distracted, while the elk ran straight by.

He was nearly halfway there. He could feel the elk panting for breath, but it was still galloping hard. Jon charged straight into the perimeter that the Others had set up. A dark shadow loomed in the distance. The undead giant was still in its position. Jon cursed, but there was no choice to turn back. He would have to just try and slip by the giant.

It was open fields now. He could see the enemy coming and they could see him. Jon counted at least two dozen shambling corpses rushing to meet him.

My father had always said that one mounted man was worth a dozen infantry, Jon thought, kicking the elk a bit harder. He saw undead raiders and clansmen with bronze axes shambling to meet him.

Jon’s whole body was burning as the elk rode straight into their midst.

Battle fury, he thought. It was a term he once heard the Greatjon use. The drive, the anger, that kicked in during battle. Jon had been in fights before, but he had never once charged against a foe like this.

Jon didn’t feel his wounds then, or the cold on his hands, or the sweat down his brow. He wasn’t thinking, he wasn’t feeling, it was like time just stopped around him. There was only the fight, the enemy in front of him, and the next, and the next and then next…

Dark Sister was in his hand.

The first wight fell as Dark Sister cleaved his skull clean open. The second stroke took down another, and then the elk’s antlers knocked two of them straight to the ground. One of the elk’s antlers cracked and its whole body jerked with the impact, but it didn’t stop. He saw another wight slash with a heavy maul, but suddenly it was like everything was moving so slowly.

It's like dancing, he thought strangely. Dancing with a sword in his hand. It seemed so slow that Jon could have danced through them laughing.

These men are dead, but I'm not.

The wights fell under him. Dark Sister slashed left and right, the fine blade knowing no equal.

Arrows flew through the arrow, stabbing the ground around him. There were undead bowmen at the foot of the hill. He felt the arrows hiss by him. The elk took an arrow to the rump, but it kept on galloping and Jon kept on slashing. The elk whinnied in pain, while a wordless battle cry tore through Jon’s throat.

The giant, Jon glared. The undead giant had a heavy club, and it was stomping forward to block Jon’s path. The wights were falling and the bowmen were reloading, but the giant was still in his path. I can slip around him; it's slow I can slip by…
Then, Jon’s eyes picked up movement. Movement on the white snow. His heart nearly skipped a beat.

The ice spiders, he cursed. There were ice spiders skittering towards him. The spiders were in all different shapes; the smallest the size of hounds while the largest the size of ponies.

“Run!” Jon roared. The giant raised its club. The ice spiders skittered at him, long legs twitching. “Run, run, run!”

The elk responded beautifully. It darted to the side just as the giant’s club smashed downwards. The impact was so heavy it caused the ground to shudder. An ice spider lunged, but then Jon’s sword sliced through two of its legs. The spider crunched around his blade. The spider bled cold, unnatural pale blood.

Another spider, one of the largest, charged into the elk. The elk neighed in panic and nearly fell, but then Jon’s sword cut downwards. His stroke was true, piercing straight in the centre of all the spider’s black beady eyes. The creature clicked and screeched in pain; a high-pitched cry like nails scraping against bone. The spider was still lunging at the elk with fingers and twitching legs, even while the great elk charged straight through it.

Jon barely reacted in time as the giant twisted around, extending a black hand larger than Jon’s torso. Trying to grab him, to crush him in a huge fist. Dark Sister flashed in the dim sunlight, and then three of the giant’s beefy fingers were falling severed to the ground.

The giant tried to lunge again with its other hand, but then the air turned black with rustling shapes and cawing. The ravens rallied together and swarmed out of the sky, all of them pecking and scratching at the giant’s eyes. It was enough of distraction for Jon to get clear of the giant.

Enemies all around me. There were ice spiders circling, and more wights charging in towards him. Every moment the odds stacked up against him a bit further. Don’t give the enemy time to rally.

“Forward!” Jon roared, kicking the elk. “Charge, forward!”

The elk was suffering badly. It had an arrow in its rump, and the ice spider’s fangs had scraped its sides open. The poor beast was nearly frantic with panic. Still, it charged. It charged beautifully.

The hill was getting closer. Barely ten metres away. If Jon could reach it, he could maybe lose the wights by climbing the rocks…

The wight bowmen knocked another shot. This time, Jon was so close that not even the dead could miss. The elk took two black arrows to the chest. Jon screamed as the beast shattered to the ground. Antlers cracked as it toppled headfirst.

There was no saddle; Jon slid straight to the ground. He gasped in pain. The snow helped cushion the landing, but the fall still hurt. His whole body trembled from the impact, but the adrenaline overpowered any shock.

Still, Dark Sister never left his grasp. He was too angry to feel any injuries at that moment. His heart was beating so fast it was like the world was moving in slow motion.

Anger, rage – that is what keeps me alive, Jon thought furiously. It felt like there was fire in his blood. That’s what keeps me fighting.

The dead and the cold could never understand that rage, that drive.
An ice spider lunged at him on the ground. He saw its fangs dripping over a grotesque mouth. Dark Sister slashed upwards, biting into the creature’s head and its hairy body slumped to the ground. Its legs were still twitching even as it died under Dark Sister.

Jon roared as he dragged himself up, limping backwards as fast his bad leg could carry him. The soft snow was a foot deep, and each effort was painful. Still, Jon could barely feel pain.

Another ice spider lunged at him – a smaller one the size of a hound. Jon’s sword cut it in half.

The ice spiders were terrifying foes against the fleeing and the unprepared. Still, fangs couldn’t match good steel. A strong soldier could fight them off.

I count three ice spiders, four wights, and one undead giant left, Jon counted, gasping for breath. He had to take them all down quickly, before any more arrived.

The ice spiders clicked and hissed, trying to circle around him. The wights attacked first, charging at him with axes and swords. Dark Sister parried a bronze blade, and then split open a wight’s skull. The wight was still thrashing even when Jon pulled his sword out of its skull.

The dead are poor swordsmen, he thought viciously, twisting to meet another wight. A second tried to ambush him from behind, but Jon spun. They hacked and slashed with axes, but their movements were so clumsy that Jon could take two of them at once.

Then the third one ambushed him from behind. Jon howled in pain as a stone maul slammed against his back. He felt something crack. The pain in his side was agony.

“… I will not die…” Jon snarled, grabbing the wight behind him and throwing him forward into the other two. “… I will not die…!”

They were strong and tough, but slow. Jon’s blade sliced the top of one’s head clean off, causing rotten brains to spill over the ground, but he still had to stagger backwards to avoid the creature’s thrashing. Even with half a head, it still didn’t fall down.

The other wight charged him. The stone axe grazed Jon’s shoulder but then Dark Sister sliced off its head. Jon had never known a blade as slender as Dark Sister capable of beheading a man before.

Three spiders, one wight and one giant, Jon thought with a gasp as the head bounced off the ground. The decapitated head was still blinking, blue eyes staring at him.

Jon was still staggering when one of the ice spiders lunged at him. Jon caught it with sword, but then a second ice spider lunged from the other side. Spiny legs wrapped around Jon’s shoulder, and then suddenly there were sharp fangs biting into his back.

Jon howled, struggling to throw the ice spider off. He could feel its legs wrapping around his shoulder, its teeth in his back. Jon was still thrashing while the final wight tried to split his skull open with a sword. Jon had to drop to avoid it, while the ice spider clinging to his shoulder tried to lunge at his head.

There was no time to swing his sword, so instead Jon just punched the spider with all his might. The spider crumpled around his fist.

Jon was gasping for breath. He could still feel the ice spider’s fangs in his back. The wight tried to swing another stroke, but Jon shoulder-barged into him. The wight thrashed, but then Dark Sister pierced straight through its chest, severing his spine and cutting half its torso open. The wight didn’t stop moving, but it crumpled.
He nearly collapsed. The ground was littered with bodies and black blood. One spider and one giant left. “… I will not die…” he muttered, blinking woozily.

The giant was struggling to pick up its club, lacking the fingers on its hand. The final ice spider, a big one the size of a pony, hissed and crackled as Jon staggered towards it.

Dark Sister was in his hand. The ice spider lunged. Jon plunged Dark Sister straight down its throat. He felt its fangs scrape against the pommel of his sword.

“… You killed me once…” he growled. “… I will not die…”

The giant finally swung its club, even despite the ravens still pecking at its face. It was a large, laborious swing. The giant was almost three times as tall as Jon. Every instinct Jon had told him to run, but instead Jon’s legs staggered forward. He clutched Dark Sister in both hands, swinging it wide as he dived between the giant’s legs.

Dark Sister slashed at the giant’s knee. The blade shimmered, but cut straight through a leg as thick as a tree trunk.

It was a hell of a blade.

The giant shuddered, suddenly missing its right leg. The monster seemed to freeze for a tense heartbeat, before toppling backwards.

The undead giant was still moving, as were many of the mutilated corpses, but Jon didn’t care to stay to finish the job. Its leg was severed and it couldn’t follow. Bulky flesh struggled to pull itself up. So long as they couldn’t follow him he didn’t care. More were already coming. Against the dead, it was more effective to try and cripple them then destroy them.

His breathing was hoarse and pained. His ribs ached and his muscles were sore. He could still feel the spider’s fangs sticking into his back, but there was no time to remove them.

The venom, dammit, Jon cursed. He could already feel the numbness spreading, like his blood was running cold. Soon, the ice spider venom might incapacitate him completely. He needed to move before that happened.

His leg jarred as he tried to clamber over the rocks. His body was stiff and the adrenaline was running low. It was a painful climb, trying to pull himself up the cliffs with a bad shoulder. He could hear the wights moving below him. The undead were bad climbers too, but Jon still didn’t have long. He was hobbling with his bad leg as he staggered upwards.

All around him, he saw the rocks that had been scorched clean and misshapen by the ice dragon’s breath. The air was cold.

He clambered up another rock. He could hear the dragon’s breathing now, deep and steady. One more ledge, and he could see it…

Jon felt his breath freeze as he stared upwards at the shadow that was suddenly looming above him.

Its head was outstretched from its perch, staring down at him. Jon had known how big it was, but still… to see the dragon up close… the sheer scale made his knees weak.

It was like staring at a wall of flesh. The scales were glittered in the sun as if they were made from polished marble, with red streaks like blood running through them.
The dragon’s head alone was massive. When it opened its mouth, you could have rode a horse into jaws and not been able to touch its teeth. Wicked curved horns spread backwards from its skull, with a crest of scales tipped in red along its neck. Its eyes were pitch black –they seemed so small compared to its massive head. Its mouth parted slightly, revealing white teeth like swords. Its upper jaw was curved upwards slightly, like there was grin of teeth on that wicked snout.

A deep, low growl broke forth from its jaws. That growl reminded Jon of distant thunder. It was staring at him. It was staring straight at him, perched on the rocks above and looking down. There was steam billowing from between its teeth, spilling from its mouth in sheets.

“… Holy…” Jon muttered, stepping back. He couldn’t help but gulp. He slowly raised his hands, trying to lower his body and his gaze. Hullen had once told him to never to look a predator in the eye. They took it as a challenge. “… I’m not here to hurt you… it’s alright… it’s alright…”

His breath was thin in his throat. His voice was weak. His hands were trembling. He was staring upwards at a beast that could eat him whole without even chewing, and absolutely every bit of its attention was straight on him.

It’s injured, Jon realised suddenly. The dragon didn’t look so good either. Arrows and wounds scattered across its hide. Deep, laborious breath. Everything about it seemed weary, sluggish. It’s running out of fight too…

There was movement behind him. Dead climbing.

“… Alright… easy now…” Jon gasped, slowly closing his eyes. “… I’m here to help you…”

He stretched out his mind. He had to focus on the animal in his mind, concentrate, try to slip into its skin…

Jon gasped. Suddenly, he could feel the dragon. The feeling was so intense it hurt. It felt like his mind was on fire.

The dragon shifted, and then roared. The force knocked Jon to the ground and caused his ears to ring. The world went deaf.

The dragon was like no other animal he had ever warged with. It was so powerful it felt like a lightning storm. Trying to control it felt like trying to chain a meteorite. Jon clutched his head in pain.

The dragon snarled dangerously. It felt Jon try to warg with it. It wasn’t happy. It didn’t like anyone trying to control its body.

“Easy! Easy now!” Jon gasped, dropping to his knees and averting his gaze. The dragon growled. Focus. Focus. “I’m not here to hurt you! I’m here to help! I’m here to help!”

His heart was beating harder than it ever had before. Jon gulped and tried to reach out again. Softer, this time. Don’t try to force it, just… touch it…

Jon could feel the dragon. He could see it in his third eye. It wasn’t warging, but Jon just lightly touched the dragon’s presence, trying to express himself. The very sliver of a connection sent shivers down Jon’s spine. He was gasped for breath, trying to think soothing thoughts and pass them on to the dragon. Desperately trying to gently calm it down…

The dragon didn’t stopped growling. “… I’ve seen you in my dreams!” Jon shouted. He had no idea if it could understand him, but it seemed like it was worth a shot. “You remember? I think you’ve felt me as well. Do you remember the ice? You were trapped under the ice!”

Unblinking eyes stared at him. “I was the one that released you,” said Jon, struggling to breathe. “My blood woke you up!”

There was movement below. The wights were scrambling up after him. Jon’s attention was fixed firmly on the dragon towering over him. “… We’re going to die here,” Jon said after pause. “Both of us. We’ll both die here. They’re going to keep on coming for you, and sooner or later they’ll get you.” He raised his voice. “You’ll die if you stay here!”

The dragon didn’t even twitch. “Do you understand?” Jon shouted. “We need to run! We need to fight, and we need get away from here! They want to kill you! They want to kill you and raise you as one of theirs!”

Jon could hear the wights clambering after him. They were right below him, and nearly at the top. “We need to go!” Jon screamed, pushing the warg as far as he dared. “Come with me if you want to live!”

The dragon’s massive head cocked. There was a low, deep growl in its throat.

Jon saw the wights scramble up the ridge, swords in hand. There were four of them at the front, and far more coming from below. They were charging at him, not the dragon. Jon grasped Dark Sister tightly, raising his sword to meet them.

And then the air blurred. The dragon moved so fast it was like lightning. Instantly, the dragon’s tail snaked around and flickered. The tail whipped so close to Jon that he could feel the wind brush overhead. All four wights were flying bodily into the distance. Jon stared in shock.

Around him, the dragon was moving. The great beast was lifting itself up, supported on its coiled wings like a giant bat. Great billows of steam were wafting from its mouth, it was hissing in the cold air.

And then Jon could feel it. He could feel the dragon pressing up against his mind in a way he couldn’t quite explain.

Jon wasn’t warging with the dragon. It felt like the dragon was trying to warg with him.

“Oh,” Jon muttered, as he accepted the connection. Instantly, almost easily, Jon felt himself rising up out of his body…

The dragon’s eyes were like nothing he had ever experienced. It wasn’t normal vision. The vision was all vivid reds and blues, like the dragon was seeing a whole different world. The scents and smells were overpowering – a nose that put even Ghost’s to shame.

It felt like there was a power in his chest, just bubbling and waiting to explode…

Jon gasped, trying to process it. He wasn’t controlling the dragon, it felt like the dragon and him were standing side by side.

We need to leave, Jon thought desperately. The mountain pass. I know an escape route.

The ice dragon was clambering to life. Its claws were so large they scraped the rocks as it moved. Jon darted to one side as the dragon lowered itself down, its body coiling itself low. Its head lowered itself down…
It’s going to move, Jon realised suddenly, dropping back to his own body, and I need to go with it.

Jon stared at the dragon’s head, at the horns and the spiky frills running down its long neck. There was only one way he could keep pace with the dragon…

Jon’s heart was in his mouth as he rushed towards the dragon head and climbed up its neck so quickly he half-jumped. The dragon’s neck was coiled so low to the rocks that he could reach it easily. The scales on its crest were pointy and sharp, but they protruded enough to make good handholds.

The problem was the movement, the rocking of the dragon’s head and the shivering of its breathing threatened to shake him off, but Jon persevered in pure desperation. The adrenaline pushed him forward, ignoring all pain or weakness, as Jon pulled himself upwards.

The scales nearer the top were easier to reach, and when he reached the top he could wrap his arms around one of the dragon’s horns and hold on for dear life. The horns were like polished white ivory, as thick as large tree trunks. Jon could barely cling onto the horn. The first time the dragon tilted its head, it nearly crushed Jon. He gasped, feeling the scales dig into his back.

The dragon barely waited for him. Jon had only just got a grip on a horn when the dragon leapt from the hill. It spread its damaged wings out wide, flapping furiously as it tried to glide through the air.

When it landed, it landed with the force of an earthquake, throwing up clouds of snow.

Jon was very nearly sent flying. The impact took his breath away. He hung onto the horn with both arms, and then propped his legs up and squeezed into the space between its frills. The sharp pointy scales dug painfully into Jon’s back, but at the moment there was absolutely nothing he could do except hold on desperately.

All around him, the Others were attacking. The wights abandoned everything and charging madly at the dragon. The dragon was finally on open ground. It was more vulnerable than it had ever been. But not vulnerable enough.

Its tail cut down a dozen wights at once. Its body twisted and it breathed, and white fire scorched straight through crowds of wights. Arrows littered the air and wights hacked at its feet, but then sharp claws crushed them underfoot. Jon couldn’t see a thing, but he heard the thrashing bodies and crunching corpses.

The dragon felt clumsy and cumbersome on the ground, it didn’t have the grace that it had in the air. It moved like a bat walking on its folded wings, but it was so large that even a single awkward bound could cover great distances, moving faster than any horse.

The wights were attacking. There were ice spiders skittering up its hind legs. Beneath it, the ground was an ocean of dead, thrashing bodies all attacking and hacking, but the dragon tore through them as easily as a force of nature.

Jon could barely even process it, not when every movement caused his to jerk like a rag doll. He saw the dead bodies trying to clamber up the dragon’s legs, as if they could tear it down, but the beast shook them off. It nearly shook Jon off as well.

Jon felt its body clench, and then suddenly it was jumping. The dragon’s wings were flapping weakly to try and propel itself, and for a brief moment the great beast was flying.

And then it crashed into the rocky mountainside. The world went deaf with the impact. The dragon snaked its head back towards the dead, unleashed a final roar, and then they were bounding away.
Jon

The ground quaked as the dragon finally came to a halt. Each step would knock the snow from the rocks and cause avalanches over the slopes. The noise of its every movement was so loud it dominated his entire world. Jon’s head was spinning, his body was trembling. He was gripping the dragon’s horn so tightly he couldn’t even feel his hands any more. There was absolutely nothing he could do but hold on for dear life as the dragon finally came to a stop.

Even through his furs, the mountain winds were bitterly cold. They were about three hundred feet off the ground, halfway up one of the smaller peaks in the Frostfangs. The beast finally stopped at a small plateau on the snow-covered mountainside.

Jon gagged, feeling the vomit burst from his mouth. The disorientation was mind-wracking. In the air, when its wings had been whole, the dragon had been graceful, but on the ground it moved with all the grace of a mammoth trying to hop.

The dragon shuddered, let out a breath, and slowly lowered itself down. The dragon was breathing deeply.

It’s injured, Jon realised. His eyes roamed over the dragon’s immense form. Badly injured.

When the dragon had left its hilltop and waded through the army of the dead, it had been vulnerable. They had escaped the legion of wights and ice spiders, but now there were even more bloody wounds along the dragon’s legs and lower hide. Its scales were tough, but not indestructible.

The scales seemed thinner along the back of the joints, along the side of the belly, he noticed. The dead had somehow known where to target.

If they catch us again, the dragon will be in trouble, Jon realised. A thousand pinpricks could eventually even kill a dragon.

Jon’s finally let go of the dragon’s horn. He had to shake his arms to work circulation back into them, and then he was wincing. He didn’t think that he had ever held onto anything that tightly in his entire life before. His whole body felt sore and ready to collapse into the snow, but Jon knew that he couldn’t.

If the Others ambush us when we’re recovering…

Jon did nothing but wince and curse as he shuffled down from the dragon’s neck. His body still screamed from the injuries he took during the fight. They were light wounds, but still painful. Jon nearly lost his grip trying to clamber down. Even through his gloves, the dragon’s white scales were so sharp his hands were scratched and bloody. He fell downwards three feet from the ground, crumbling to the snow painfully.

The dragon curled up with a low growl while Jon limped over the snowy ground. Its eyes were focused on Jon, though.

Up close, the dragon was larger than anything Jon had ever seen before. The dragon put mammoths to shame, so large that even when coiled its body draped over the mountainside.

It made him feel weak just staring at the wall of muscle and flesh. His head was still spinning, struggling to think…

First things first. Fire. I need fire, and I need to tend my wounds. Qhorin Halfhand had always said that any wound that wasn’t treated quickly could fester.

Normally, Jon would have hesitated lighting a fire with so many looking for him, but he figured that the giant dragon was already enough of a giveaway. He needed the heat.

He stared around him, but there were no trees on the barren mountainside. He had no kindling.

His shoulder was still bleeding slightly, and Jon gasped as he pulled the ice spider’s fangs out of back. The fangs were wicked curved and white, but fortunately they hadn’t gone deep through his thick furs and leathers. Still, the venom was making him feel numb, and woozy.

Fire. I need fire.

There was no kindling in sight. He didn’t even have a flint.

Jon paused, considering it. He turned to stare at the dragon.

“Fire,” he muttered. “You can breathe fire. I need warmth. Fire.”

The dragon’s unblinking black eyes stared at him. Jon cursed. His furs were thick, but the air atop this mountain was colder than sin, and the lingering venom caused a cold sweat on his brow. Jon tried to close his eyes and concentrate on warging, like he’d done before, but it was harder. He couldn’t concentrate deeply enough; his head was aching.

The dragon is from Old Valyria, he remembered the three-eyed crow mentioning. It must have encountered humans before. The Valyrians had been dragon-tamers.

Jon struggled to think. What was the Valyrian word for fire? The only Valyrian he had ever learnt was from Maester Luwin had been the occasional word or phrase that popped up during his lessons.

“Umm… dracatrik!” Jon shouted, slurring his words. He knew the herb ‘dragonthorn’, which had Valyrian roots as ‘dracatrik’. Targaryen names, he thought, Targaryen names were based on Valyrian words. “Draclarion… Dracagar… um… Dracaerys–”

Suddenly, the dragon inhaled. Great plumes of steam billowed from its mouth. Dracarys, Jon realised. It meant dragonfire. The name ‘Aerys’ had roots from the word ‘fire’, and ‘draca’ was a bastard form of ‘dragon’. Dragonfire.

Jon saw white flames grow from the dragon’s mouth. He jumped backwards instinctively, but the dragon wasn’t aiming for him. The white stream of fire scoured over the rocks, causing evaporation to fill the air.

No; not fire. The air hazed white and it was so intense that it looked like fire, but it wasn’t hot.

It was the first time Jon felt the dragon’s breath up close, and Jon suddenly felt the temperature plummet even further. The backdraft was so cold it scalded his skin.

The dragonfire was colder than anything he had ever imagined. It was so cold that the rocks cracked and snapped, while the frost scoured everything clean. The cold steam billowed like smoke – white mist scorching over the rocks and snow. It was so cold that the stones were still crackling.

The dragon’s breath was so cold it burnt. If he had been unwise enough to put his hand in it, he had no doubt his hand would have snapped off. The dragon’s breath was icefire, he realised, and it was beyond freezing.

Its breath had left spikes of ice as sharp as needles scattered around it, pointing away from the dragon’s jaws like sharp daggers. In an instant, it froze the moisture in the air into spikes. The rocks were still hissing and crackling from the intense, concentrated cold while the icy mist caused him to shiver.

“… You breathe cold.” The statement felt so dumb. He was trembling even more. “You breathe cold… Of course you do. Ice dragon, breathes cold.”

Despite himself, Jon felt a chuckle hit his throat. The venom was making him woozy. He was chuckling even as his hands trembled. “… You breathe cold…”

His body was trembling. Slowly, Jon moved to put his hand against the dragon’s scale, on its torso. The dragon didn’t twitch. He could feel its quiet, steady breathing.

Even through his glove, the dragon’s body felt cool. Not freezing cold, just cool.

No fire then. Not today.

Jon took a deep breath, pulling his furs up further and cocooning himself in his cloak. It would be a cold night, but there was nothing for it. He needed to rest; the adrenaline and battle fury bled away so quickly he felt ready to collapse on the spot.

The dragon needed to rest too. It was exhausted and tired – it had been fighting for days. It needed to rest and it needed to heal.

Jon stared upwards at the dragon’s wings. Its left wing was still injured. It couldn’t fly. It needed time to heal, and that meant that it needed a place of safety. There was little safety around in the north these days.

For a heartbeat, Jon debated trying to bring it to the three-eyed crow. Still, the greenseer would not want him to, and the dragon most certainly could not fit in the tunnels. Jon needed a safe place, a place where the dragon could be protected.

The Wall was an attractive option. South of it, he would not need to worry about the Others. Still – the Wall was seven hundred feet high and the dragon couldn’t fly. They would be trapped at the foot of Wall, unable to fit through the tunnels. Then there was the issue of the sworn brothers; he had no idea how to even explain all that had happened since he had first left with Qhorin. They must think I’m dead, Jon quietly thought. It had been months.
How will the Night’s Watch react if I tried to bring an injured ice dragon into the realm? Jon wasn’t too keen to find out, and he wasn’t even sure if he could stop the dragon from terrorising innocent citizens. This dragon was immense, as large as any from the stories and histories that Luwin had taught him. If it chose to hunt humans it could not be stopped. Until Jon was sure he could control it, it would be too dangerous to bring it into the north.

No, he decided. I need somewhere secluded, but safe. Somewhere I can learn how to tame the dragon. Somewhere the dragon has time to heal. Somewhere we can protect ourselves from the Others.

He could only think of one place; the most easily defendable location in the North. A place surrounded by a natural harbour, with enough seals and walruses off the coast it could even feed a dragon. It was even close enough to the Wall that they could cross around it if they had to.

“Hardhome,” Jon decided finally. “We must go to Hardhome.”

So far as he knew, the peninsula was deserted. Once, it had been the closest thing the wildlings had ever had to a true town, but then Hardhome had been razed and all its people slain. Nobody was quite sure what happened. The wildlings avoided the place now – they considered the peninsula cursed.

But Hardhome would be secluded, defendable, and close to the Wall.

They could outrun the Others through the Haunted Forest towards the coast. The wildlings had whispered that the Others’ forces came from the Lands of Always Winter, towards the northwest. Heading southeast as far as possible seemed like a plan.

The Others still hadn’t moved their forces in bulk. Even at the battle of the Frostfangs, Jon doubted if there had been any more than five hundred wights, and far fewer Others. The Haunted Forest had seen white walkers, but there couldn’t be many of them. Perhaps those were only scouts or outriders, in fact.

From Hardhome, I could go to Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. Maybe I could even cross over to Skagos…

He took a deep breath, trying to focus himself. There was no shelter on the mountainside, instead he had to press up against the dragon to escape from the wind. He crawled under its wing, pressing near its chest. He was a bit scared that the dragon might shift and crush him, but the ice dragon seemed to be sound asleep. Its breaths were deep and even, sonorous in a way that reminded him of a blacksmith’s bellows.

Jon propped his head up against the dragon’s scales, letting his eyes drift out over the mountain. The sun was foggy behind the clouds, but it felt late. The dragon wasn’t warm, but it was welcome shelter.

Strangely, Jon felt better the longer he touched the dragon’s hide. He could still feel the cold, but it didn’t have the same edge to it. Like the cold didn’t hurt him in the same way.

Jon took a deep breath. He knew he should stay awake, but his eyes felt so heavy and it was hard to even concentrate.

The dragon’s snoring was a low rumble, so deep it felt like a shiver running down Jon’s spine.

“… You should have a name,” Jon said, mostly to himself. It felt like the dragon needed a name. “I don’t know what your old name was, but I suppose you need a new one.”
His head tilted backwards, thinking quietly. A great dragon of white and red, one that could breathe ice colder than any storm…

“Winter,” Jon said after a pause. Winter is coming, his family’s words. It was the only word that seemed appropriate. “… You are winter.”

It took him a while to remember the Valyrian word for winter. The time passed by in drowsy silence, until he eventually figured it out.

“Sonagon,” Jon said, just as his eyelids began to close. “Your name is Sonagon…”

…

Jon was woken early by a stinging pain. His eyelids flickered, he winced. After a moment, he realised that there was a raven on his shoulder, it was pecking his face.

The greenseer, Jon realised, slowly coming awake. He had to shake away some of his exhaustion, and then he heard the noise in the air.

The air was filled with the sounds of ravens fluttering around him. The birds cawed noisily, pecking at his cheek and Jon could only stare weakly as he gathered up the strength to move. The greenseer said that he would try to hold the Others back from giving chasing, but Jon doubted he would be able to do so for long. We need to move.

He closed his eyes and tried to concentrate. He found Ghost again quickly. His direwolf had survived the battle with little but a mildly injured rump, but had been forced to take a different path. The direwolf was circling around these mountains to avoid the wights, and Jon guessed they would see one another soon.

Phantom was harder to find. The shadowcat had almost managed to slip away from him whilst he slept, it had fled further than Ghost. Jon had to struggle to pull Phantom in again, but then ordered both animals to come towards him.

Jon clenched a fist, testing his chilled fingers. He let out a breath, and his body was shivering. The ravens were still cawing around him. The dead must be close, Jon realised, eyeing the birds. He would have to hurry.

He tried to stand, and then staggered over himself. He felt stiff, and weak. I’m cold. His furs were good, but not so good to last exposed to the elements. His wounds had barely swollen shut, but he still had bruises and any injuries could easily fester.

And I’m starving, Jon realised, listening to his stomach growl. He hadn’t eaten since the battle, and he had no rations with him. God, so hungry…

A raven popped onto his knee, absolutely fearlessly, staring with knowing eyes.

Jon paused. He stared at the raven. “… Sorry about this, crow,” Jon said with a sigh, before reaching out to grab the bird. The raven trembled as Jon snapped its neck. The other ravens around him didn’t seemed to mind. Jon had never eaten raw raven before, but he was hungry enough to make do. It was a bad taste, but in the moment the warmth of its blood made him gasp.

He handled his injuries as best as he could, before staggering upwards and wondering what he was supposed to do now.

Above Sonagon’s deep, throaty breath caused a mist of cold air evaporate across the ground. *The dragon is hungry too, Jon knew. Starving, actually. Sonagon’s breath became hoarser when it was hungry.

“Easy,” Jon said cautiously, approaching Sonagon. “We’ve got to move. This direction. Come on, we can’t rest now, we’ve got to go that way.”

The dragon didn’t move. For such a large animal, it stopped to rest frequently and often. It spent most of the day coiled and resting. Jon cursed quietly.

“The Others could catch up to us any day now!” Jon ordered. “The Others. The wights. The dead. They nearly killed you once, you can’t let them catch us again. We’ve got to move now! Before nightfall – move!”

Black beady eyes stared at him. The dragon didn’t twitch. For a moment, Jon debated whether he should try to force another warg with it to get it moving, but then he heard a long, slow growl rumble in the dragon’s throat.

Jon hesitated for a brief moment, before cursing and limping away. There was a dangerous tone to the dragon’s growl.

The dragon isn’t the most vulnerable one here, Jon thought, struggling to move. I’m far more likely to die before the dragon does. Jon needed shelter and warmth more than the dragon did. There was so little of either to be had on the mountainside.

His bad leg felt stiff, causing him to stumble. Think, Jon cursed. I need to find a place to set up camp, to make a fire, to tend to my wounds. I’m not going to last long like this…

The thought of the dead elk caused him to stir. I’m not going to last on foot, he decided. Not when I’m bleeding strength. I need a mount, something to carry me.

Around him, the ravens cawed. His hands clenched, trying to focus, staring at the ravens as they circled around him. Jon half collapsed into the snow, gasping for breath as he focused on one of the birds.

The raven was well-used to warging, like a well-worn glove, but it was still difficult for Jon to pull himself into him. The bird’s senses were fluttery and wild, so flickering and Jon could barely make sense of it. The raven wasn’t grounded; it threatened to pull Jon away, as if the connection between them might snap and his consciousness could get lost.

Still, Jon was desperate enough to risk it. He used the raven’s eyes to scout out around the mountainside, sweeping over rocky cliffs, trying to find movement. Jon wasn’t so sure what he was looking for, but then he saw a shape clambering easily over the rocks. Through a raven’s blurry vision, Jon barely recognised the goat hobbling over the cliffs.

A goat. A mountain goat, Jon thought. A goat would do.

He gasped as he pulled himself back to his body. It took all of his strength to pull himself up urgently, rushing in the direction he had seen the animal moving. He left Sonagon behind him, the dragon still snoozing on the rocks.

Jon found the goat fairly quickly. It was a large mountain goat; a slightly aging male with white fur tinged with black around the neck, snow brushed into its woolly fur, and large, curved horns protruding backwards from its head. The goat stood perhaps up to his shoulder, yet it was bulky and hardy enough to survive the harsh climate. Jon saw the goat hobbling easily over the rocks, moving across the mountains. It must have seen the dragon pass, he realised. It’s fleeing from the dragon.

He stared, feeling his legs threaten to give out. I need a mount.

Jon got close enough to hear it bleat as Jon reached out towards it with his mind. The goat protested, trembled and tried to instinctively run. Phantom had tried to lash out, the goat just galloped away. Jon’s hold nearly broke, but he was desperate enough to force onwards, pulling himself further into the animal’s skin.

The goat felt different. It was prey; its skin felt long and hollow. Jon was so used to the sharpness and focus of predators like Ghost and Phantom; but the goat saw the world in terms of fear and threats, as if there could be hunters hiding behind every corner. It was a way of viewing the world that was totally alien; like being scared was in its nature. Jon sagged, struggling to wrap himself around the goat’s body. The goat didn’t try to fight back, it just ran from him – making the goat’s presence feel so soft and mushy that Jon could barely hold onto it.

With Phantom, the shadowcat had fought violently, but as soon as Jon had defeated it he was in control. With the goat, it was harder, it took longer. Instead, Jon had to take the goat’s body slowly, piece by piece until there was nowhere to run. First, he worked on just holding on to it, keeping the goat in his third eye, and then slowly pulling himself into its senses, and into the animal’s limbs.

By the time Jon was finally in control, his human body had already collapsed. The goat felt easier to control than a shadowcat, but also far, far more exhausting. Still, Jon turned the goat around and back towards him, feeling the way he bounded over sharp rocks on nimble hooves. His legs were strong, his hooves flexible enough to easily clutch onto the narrowest ledge, while the goat bounded over the rocks as if it was the most natural thing in the world.

Jon was gasping for breath by the time he was finally able to touch the goat. He could feel its thick, rough fur in his fingers. Through great force of will, he managed to hold the animal still as Jon levered his body over his back, clutching onto the goat’s horns to steady himself. The goat was the size of a pony, but nowhere near as docile. The goat wasn’t a trained mount; instead Jon had to constantly force the goat to behave when every instinct the goat had ordered him to throw the human off and run.

Jon felt the goat internally scream in panic as Jon’s weight dropped onto it. The goat isn’t as strong as a horse or an elk either, Jon thought with a gulp. The goat struggled to carry a human’s weight. Still, there was no choice.

What little consciousness he had left, Jon struggled to think of a name for the goat. For some reason he couldn’t quite explain, it felt like the goat deserved a name.

“… Hullen,” Jon decided. The hard, rugged old goat reminded him of the old master of horses back at Winterfell. Jon had good memories of Hullen – the old man had always treat him fairly, and taught him to ride his first ever steed. “I’m going to call you Hullen.”

Jon nearly collapsed on the animal’s back, still clutching the horns, while his mind took over the goat’s body and carried him through the mountainside. The goat proved unmatched at clambering over harsh terrain, even where there was no path, and Jon made good time he finally found a clearing of pines and brambles over a frozen mountain stream.

It was dusk by the time Jon finally got a fire going, nestling himself into the clearing while Hullen foraged in the hills and Jon loaded up his satchel with as much kindling, berries and fresh water he could carry. He washed his wounds out, cleaning the injuries and then cauterising the deepest of the cuts by heating Dark Sister up over the fire, and scolding the burning blade against injured skin. It wasn’t the nicest way to treat injuries, but Jon had no time for anything else.

He spent the rest of the night sleeping, while he pulled his mind into Hullen to scout out the surroundings.

In the distance, at night, he heard Sonagon roar.

The next morning, weary but feeling stronger, Jon mounted up the goat again and he returned back along the mountain to the dragon’s side.

The giant beast had barely moved down the mountain from where Jon had left it the previous day. Sonagon’s body was still lumbering and weak. The dragon glared at Jon hungrily as he approached on his goat, those dark eyes feral and vicious.

_The dragon had been attacked by wights during the night_, Jon realised. _Not many, but a few – probably scouts sent searching the mountainside for them._ The wights must have ambushed Sonagon as it slept; and then climbed onto the dragon’s head where Sonagon struggled to shake them off.

_The wights went for Sonagon's eyes_, Jon thought, staring at the new scratches across the dragon’s snout; _the wights must have tried to gouge out its eyes._ They hadn’t succeeded, but they came close. Jon wondered what it would be like to wake up to find tiny undead, clawing monsters scrambling on your face.

_If those were scouts, then the Others know where the dragon is_, Jon thought with a grimace. _If the Others really did warg into their wights, then there is a white walker right now directing even more wights to Sonagon’s location. Anything one wight sees, they all see._

Jon stumbled as he dismounted Hullen. “Dragon!” Jon shouted, staring into its beady eyes. “We need to move! There will be more coming!”

It was watching him, but it wasn’t moving. Jon raised his voice, but it still barely echoed over the mountainside. “Do you understand?!” he shouted. “We’re both in danger here! We have to move!”

There was nothing but steady breathing. Jon cursed quietly, wondering what he was supposed to do now. For a while, Jon milled around the dragon, trying to find some way of moving it.

_I need to control it_, he decided finally. He closed his eyes and tried to warg with it, but then he heard the dragon’s breathing freeze. Jon stared at the dragon’s eye. Those eyes were sharp, threatening. _It’s alert, and angry._

After a long moment, Jon hesitated, retreated backwards and mounted Hullen to move a safe distance away.

Sonagon didn’t like it when Jon forced a warg with it. The dragon wasn’t a goat; it could quite easily kill him if Jon pushed it too far.

The rest of the day was spent in awkward uncertainty. Jon mounted Hullen, while he uncertainly reached out to Ghost and Phantom to watch for wights, but most of his time was spent struggling to figure out what to do.

Jon learnt quickly the subtle signs that kept him alive. The way the dragon would growl and snap, warning Jon to keep his distance. When the dragon was resting or tired Jon could come close, but it was safe to be cautious. The dragon was not a tame creature; even if it could be friendly – on occasion – but it would never obey. Jon had to treat it like he would an injured bear or wolf; respect it, but always be on guard.

Sonagon moved at its own pace. It didn’t wait for Jon, and it didn’t ask permission. Ghost would stay by Jon’s side, while Sonagon always just expected Jon to stay by its.

The first time the dragon started moving again, Jon jumped as it nearly crushed him when it stood up. The dragon staggered of the ground and moved with great, earth-rumbling stamps each time it moved its legs. It didn’t even walk quickly, but its gait was so long that Jon still fell behind.

Without Hullen, Jon would never have kept up with it. The dragon was large enough to clamber over rocks and cliffs that even Hullen had to try and gingerly traverse, particularly when carrying a human. It was only because the dragon stopped to rest or sniff that Jon could keep up.

The first two days Jon was afraid he was going to lose it again – that it would go off its own way and get trapped once more. Jon tried shouting and ordering it, but Sonagon would always just dismiss him.

Only when they warged did Jon feel like he had any measure of control over the creature. Still, Sonagon wasn’t like Ghost. Jon could slip into Ghost’s skin anytime at will, but the dragon was much more selective. Sonagon would choose when and where Jon was allowed to warg with it.

It was hard work. Dangerous work. Sometimes, when Sonagon started snarling and growling, Jon would be forced to back away a safe distance. The more irritable Sonagon became, the more care Jon had to take.

Jon stuck to the goat’s back across most of the mountainside, but it was difficult. When he had to control Hullen nearly constantly, he had so little concentration left to keep the leash on Phantom. He left Phantom patrolling across a ravine in the distance, but the shadowcat was constantly slipping away and Jon struggled to bring her back.

He left Hullen to forage to regain some strength, while Jon lingered on the snow, wondering what to do. The wights will be on us soon, he thought. Sonagon is getting weaker every day, I can’t control him, and I won’t be able to fight the wights off.

Suddenly, there was cawing in distance. Ravens. Jon saw four birds circling over the cliffs, cawing to attract attention. The ravens would come and go, but Jon knew that the three-eyed crow was always working with him in the background. Jon hesitated for a long time, but he followed the ravens.

He summoned Hullen to carry him through the snow. The goat was tiring as well. They reached the bottom of the cliffside, when slowly Jon heard the trumpeting echo through the air. Behind him, Jon noticed Sonagon perk up at that sound.

The sound of a mammoth’s cry, Jon realised. Jon kept on heading in the direction, and behind him the ground shuddered as the dragon pulled himself up to follow. It was the first time Sonagon followed Jon.

They reached at a snowy basin between the mountains, where the rocks met the plains, when he saw the mammoth marching weakly across the snow. A great beast larger than any horse – standing fifteen feet off the ground, with shaggy moulted brown fur and huge, hooked tusks that draped over the snow. Compared to Sonagon the mammoth was tiny, but it was still a huge lumbering beast. Jon stared in awe at the great woolly mammoth, noticing how the mammoth limped. It was injured too – Jon saw old, rusted arrows and blades jutting out of the mammoth’s
A giant clan, Jon recalled the greenseer mentioning. The three-eyed crow took control of the giant’s mammoths to sacrifice them as a distraction against the Others.

From the looks of things, this must have been one of the mammoths that had managed to survive. It escaped the Others, but it was struggling to move. The mammoth was weak, injured, and dying.

But the three-eyed crow is still inside it, he realised. The greenseer must have directed it towards me for some reason, maybe as a mount or a–

Without warning, Sonagon snapped. Jon could barely even fall to the snow in time as the dragon bounded over him. He gasped as the great mass of white scales shot overhead. Hullen bleated in pure panic, breaking free of Jon’s control briefly. The mammoth only managed to give out a short, strangled cry.

Oh. The dragon needs feeding, he thought dumbly. The greenseer must have directed the wounded mammoth to Jon because he knew the dragon was starving.

Jon stared in shock as the dragon’s breath burst in a concentrated white blast before the mammoth could even run. Sonagon dropped onto the beast without hesitation, even as the dragonfire turned the mammoth into cracking ice. In an instant, the mammoth turned into a cracking frozen statue, and then Sonagon’s claws and teeth were crunching through it. Sharp teeth snapped through the frozen meat, swallowing chunks in huge, galloping breath.

It eats its meat frozen, Jon realised. The ice dragon uses its breath to freeze its prey before eating it. There was barely anything left of the mammoth by the time Sonagon was done. The dragon had a large appetite; a fully-grown mammoth was a good-sized meal for it.

Jon was still staring in dumb shock and faint awe at the patch of scorched ground that used to be a mammoth. The dragon growled lowly with a final gulp, before turning to lumber away.

He wondered briefly how quickly Sonagon could eat a human on a goat, but there was nothing for it except to follow.

Later that night, Sonagon was content. It still lumbered and panted, but the much needed meal helped a lot. The dragon didn’t growl as much, and Jon spent a long time inspecting the dragon closer.

It’s an animal, he thought. A huge, magnificent animal, but still just an animal. All animals need the same things; they need to be fed, they need to be kept safe, and they needed to be kept well.

That night, Jon stared upwards at the ravens cawing around him, and he started to plan. He looked at the snow-covered mountain goat, thinking about the horses at Winterfell.

Jon remembered how Hullen used had to act each time they brought in a new, temperamental stallion. Hullen used to brag that he could handle even the foulest stallion, but there was no secret to it except patience and experience. Hullen had never been forceful with his charges, but he would always be present. Hullen could wait and sit by a horse’s side for hours, calming and reassuring it with his presence. The trick to horsemanship is patience, Hullen had always said. I’ve got to be patient, Jon thought.

He gathered up all his determination, even as he was still limping on his bad leg. By morning, Jon had a plan.
He stuck by the dragon’s side for as long as he could, trying to keep pace on his goat. Every time the dragon relaxed, Jon attempted to warg with it again. Jon wasn’t forceful, always soothing. Whenever the dragon had its moods, Jon would go a safe distance and try to meditate to reach it.

Jon had no idea how the Targaryens of old would tame dragons. He had heard that Valyrians used to use sorcery, fire and whips to bind them. Jon was forced to try and tame a dragon with nothing but patience, and a power that he didn’t even understand.

The only thing that kept Jon alive was Ghost and Hullen. Without the goat, Jon would have been left behind on the mountainside to freeze, and without the direwolf Jon wouldn’t be able to survive.

He met up with Ghost four days after the fight with the wights. Jon kept Phantom away from him to watch for pursuers over the mountain and to take care of any wight strugglers, but it was Ghost that took care of Jon.

Jon started warging into the direwolf more than ever now, relying on Ghost more and more. He used Ghost to alert him about the route, even to bring Jon meat enough to eat while Jon was busy chasing after Sonagon. Ghost could catch snow hares, one a time a fox, and bring the meat back to Jon in his jaws. Still, Jon knew it couldn’t last; Ghost was getting weary too, and not even Ghost could take care of a human as well as himself forever in the harsh terrain.

On the sixth day, Sonagon stopped to rest by an icy canyon and didn’t move again for nearly ten hours. Its breathing was deep and thick, but also faster than normal. Weaker. Its strength was fading.

It was only when Jon saw the wounds across its hide and legs that he realised why. The dragon’s injuries were sapping its strength.

Sonagon needed treatment, and Jon so added dragon care onto the list of things he knew nothing about, but would have to figure out.

The first time Jon touched one of Sonagon’s wounds – an arrow embedded between its scales on its right hind leg – Sonagon hissed and flinched. It took three hours of reassurance before Jon was allowed to come near it again.

Jon pulled the arrow out as gingerly as possible, causing the dragon to hiss and snap dangerously. He was vaguely surprised to see that Sonagon’s blood was thick and coloured white like milk – so white it was barely visible on its scales and snow – and that the blood ran so cold that the wound would freeze shut. Still, Jon pulled out four more arrows, as well as the broken blade of an axe, and slowly he was allowed near the other injuries.

Many of the injuries were so high up on the dragon’s massive body that Jon had climb up the dragon’s scales to reach them. It was perilous work, particularly given Sonagon’s temperament. Jon pulled out everything from broken sword tips to ice spider fangs, and he cleaned and tended the wounds as best he could. Bandages were nearly impossible due to the dragon’s size, so Jon just had to make do.

It was long, tiring and awkward work because of Sonagon’s size. Jon spent all day working on it.

Eventually, Sonagon even unfurled its wings slightly, and Jon saw the painful gashes on its right wing that stopped the dragon from flying. There were cuts straight through leathery skin, even arrows sticking through its wings. Those were much more difficult and awkward to treat. Jon cut out the arrows and even tried to bandage what he could, but there was little he could do for the gashes through its wings.
Maybe if I had a very large needle and rope strong enough, and I was feeling very, very brave, I could try to stitch them shut, Jon thought despondently. Would the wing wounds ever heal? If a bird’s wings were clipped badly enough, then it could be grounded for life.

Still, Sonagon wasn’t a bird. Its wings were far too big to be bare skin and bone – occasionally Jon saw the wounds on the wings bleed, and there were long muscles all the way across the wing that could clench the leathery skin together. If there was blood flowing through the wings, it made Jon think that eventually the wound might close and the wings would heal.

The wings are a huge vulnerability for a dragon, Jon realised. They were big, hard to protect, and if they were damaged they would ground the dragon. Jon supposed it made sense that dragons would have some way of eventually healing from wing injuries – otherwise even slight holes on a wing could be fatal for large dragons. The muscles in the wings could contract, and the wounds would eventually close as the skin regrew. Perhaps I could find some way of clamping the skin together to help it heal? Jon mused. Some sort of bandage to help the dragon fly again?

There were exactly ninety-seven wounds scattered across the dragon’s huge body. Jon knew because he counted and inspected every single one.

He spent a long time inspecting the dragon and its injuries. Trying to learn everything about, trying to think how he could help it heal. Even as the dragon slept, Jon was still inspecting it, his head whirring.

Jon reminded how hard it had been looking after Ghost when he was pup. He remembered his father warning him how much care any animal required. Jon supposed that a fully-grown dragon would require a thousand times more care than a wolf. Jon knew in his bones how difficult that would be.

I’ve doing it wrong, Jon sighed. I’ve been trying to take control of him with skinchanging, just expecting the dragon to follow my commands.

Sonagon expected differently; you had to look after it before it would allow you to control it.

“My duty,” Jon said, to the icy silence. “My responsibility. It’s my duty to look after him.”

Firstly, food. The mammoth had helped, but the dragon had still gone hungry far too long. Jon closed his eyes and slipped into Ghost’s skin as he started to hunt.

He knew Sonagon had trouble feeding himself. Dragons simply weren’t meant to hunt on the ground – Sonagon was too large; he would scare away prey before he could hunt them. Previously, Jon suspected that Sonagon had been surviving by eating the wights, but he needed good food. The dragon was out of his element. Sonagon’s sense of smell was impressive, but he was also unfamiliar with the environment. Sonagon’s nose could smell the ocean a hundred miles away, but it couldn’t pick out the scent of prey in the trees.

However, Ghost could. Ghost was a natural tracker and hunter in the cold. Jon prowled in Ghost’s skin all night, searching for food. By morning, Jon opened his eyes again.

“This way!” Jon ordered, half-swatting Sonagon on the neck to wake him. The dragon stirred slowly. “Food. Let’s go eat. Food.”

There was a low growl from Sonagon, and Jon grimaced but retreated a safe distance. He kept on trying to stir Sonagon by reaching out with the warg. It took three hours to finally convince the dragon to stand up, and another three hours to convince him to follow Jon. Jon mounted Hullen, careful to keep the dragon behind him.

Still, even the dragon picked up slightly when they got close enough to recognise the smell. They headed down to a snowy valley, and eventually even Jon saw the tracks leading towards a small cave hidden in the rocks.

The snow bear was a large, impressive beast. It stood thirteen feet tall when reared up, as large as the one Varamyr used to ride on. The bear should have been the top predator – it wasn’t used to ever having to hide or cower – but it had never met a dragon before.

The bear tried to take shelter in its cave as Sonagon approached, but it was useless. Sonagon didn’t even need to claw it out, the dragon just took a deep breath and breathing sub-zero air straight in to the cave. The cold breath left the rocks cracking, and the bear broke into a frozen statue while the dragon dragged it out. Jon watched in quiet amazement. The scene made Jon shiver.

It was over quickly. The snow bear was a large creature, a good meal even for Sonagon, but the dragon still gulped it quickly, crunching through icy meat. The dragon growled in satisfaction.

After that, Jon thought that maybe Sonagon started to follow him more easily. Between the mammoth and then the bear, the dragon started to realise that Jon could lead him to food.

They kept on moving, heading east over the Frostfangs for as long as Hullen could manage. Jon took care to change direction regularly, trying to throw off any pursuers.

The next day, Jon left Sonagon alone and followed a trail on his own. Ghost led him straight to a large deer foraging in the woods. Jon shot at it with his bow and wounded the deer, and Ghost eagerly chased it down. Afterwards, Jon used his sword to carve the deer, cutting off two legs – one for Jon to roast and the other for Ghost to eat – while Jon skinned the kill but left the rest of the meat alone.

This time, Sonagon came eagerly. The dragon happily responded to Jon’s warg, and then gobbled up the remainder of the deer in a single bite. Later, Sonagon rested peacefully, allowing Jon to stay close while he slept. Jon stitched the deer’s hide to create a makeshift bandage, for the deepest and worst of Sonagon’s wounds.

Later that night, the wights finally tracked them down again. Jon saw them coming through Phantom’s eyes, and he moved to ambush them. Four wights.

His sword sliced the first one’s skull open. After that, he jumped down onto the wights in the pitch black of night, with a torch in one hand and Dark Sister swinging in the other.

“My dragon is sleeping,” Jon growled. Rotten blood splashed through the air. “Please don’t disturb him.”

It was getting easier to kill the wights. Jon was learning how to fight them. They could easily take you off guard with their strength and endurance, but the trick was to go for the limbs first. Completely kill them wasn’t necessary – a good sword could sever their legs and then they would be left useless. Generally, the wights were so unguarded that they left themselves wide open for attack. The only difficulty was standing strong against their unhuman strength.

Jon tried to take out their eyes first, so the white walkers would have trouble tracking him through them.

He took care of the creatures quickly – cutting off their arms and legs and leaving their possessed bodies to squirm. Two of them were rotten black, but one of the bodies was good enough for Phantom stripped the cold meat of the bones. The wights were foul meat that Jon refused to touch, but when hungry enough Phantom had no such qualms. The meat still wriggled slightly even as the shadowcat chewed it.

A pattern emerged. Jon could control Hullen by day to carry him, and he controlled Phantom by night to hunt down wights. The challenge was keeping the shadowcat and the goat separate. Ghost tended to Jon’s call constantly.

By day, Jon waited for Sonagon to walk, trying to learn the dragon’s habits. It was slow going out of the mountains, but they made do. The ravens still guided the way, saving Jon’s life more than once. Jon changed routes constantly, trying to throw off the wights that would be following them.

Jon scouted out the path ahead, and when the dragon was ready Jon would simply gently push him – like Jon was simply extending out an invitation for the dragon to follow.

The route of the mountains was slow, and exhausting. Jon was working on less than two hours sleep most days, with little time to rest. He was too busy tending to the dragon’s wounds, following the dragon, tracking down prey for the dragon, even protecting it from wights that tried to pursue the dragon.

“… You wouldn’t be able to survive out here by yourself, would you?” Jon muttered, glancing to the dragon. “You’re big and strong, but you wouldn’t be able to hunt or avoid the wights without me. I don’t think you would have lasted this long without me.” He took deep pants, feeling the cold ache in his bones. “… I think you need me, and I think you’re starting to realise that too.”

He took a few labouring steps, before sighing. “… Then again,” Jon conceded. “… I wouldn’t have survived out here by myself either.”

Nothing changed for the next four days. For the most part Sonagon acted as if he didn’t even notice Jon’s efforts. Like the dragon simply expected Jon to serve it.

_Dragons are worse than cats_, he thought with a grimace. _They expect servitude instinctively_.

Then, one day, when Hullen was out foraging and Jon was too exhausted to walk over the rough terrain proved too hard for his bad leg, Sonagon halted suddenly. Jon stared, but the dragon stopped moving hundred feet ahead.

_He’s waiting for me to catch up_, Jon realised. It was the very first sign that maybe the dragon appreciated his efforts too.

Later, Sonagon didn’t even object when Jon tried to climb up its neck again. It was the first time Jon tried to mount Sonagon since they escaped from the Others. The ice dragon was almost (not quite, but almost) patient as Jon clambered upwards to grip its horn. Jon’s heart was in mouth, clutching onto Sonagon’s horn as the great dragon lumbered.

That day, Jon left Hullen behind. The goat could forage for longer by the mountainside while Jon rode on Sonagon’s head.

The journey was easier, too. Sonagon walked slowly for a beast his size, and thrashed his head less. Jon’s mouth hung agape as he watched the rocky landscape drift by from the top of the dragon’s head.

He could see the mountains and rock breaking more and more into pine forests as they headed out of the Frostfangs.
The days became easier. Still rough, but more regular. Jon would scout, hunt and plan ahead as the dragon was resting, but while when they were moving Jon was allowed to climb on as Sonagon would carry him. He rotated between Ghost, Phantom and Hullen, using each animal whenever he was indisposed.

I’ve survived in the wilderness with no human contact for over a month and a half now, Jon mused.
It was a feat that even Qhorin Halfhand would have been proud of.

The Frostfangs was not an easy terrain, and it took a direwolf, a goat and a shadowcat, and supernatural assistance from a flock of ravens to keep Jon alive.

The days ticked by in slow, rough living and constant movement. The Others might be scouring the land for them, but the Frostfangs were big enough to even hide a dragon.

Every time he could, at every free moment, Jon closed his eyes and tried to connect to the dragon.
Sonagon was constantly suspicious each time that Jon extended the warg, but he forced himself to stay patient, non-threatening.

And slowly, very slowly, Sonagon let Jon slip under his skin.

Every time he did, it took his breath away.

Sonagon sees the world on a different scale, Jon realised. He sees colours in terms of hot and cold, he can smell wind currents and storms miles away. The dragon was like no other beast Jon had ever encountered.

During the dreams, they connected more and more. Jon saw visions, vague, blurry old memories, of flying over cold seas and unfamiliar lands. One time, he even felt his skin tingle with the feeling of immense noise, the ground rumbling and great plumes of fire rising upwards from the earth…

He shivered. Sonagon’s memories. I can see the dragon’s memories.

“The Doom,” Jon said aloud, to the empty night. “You were there, at the Doom of Valyria.”

There was no reply. The darkness was nearly pitch black. Jon stared at the dragon’s great hide.
White on red. His scales are white with red veins. Jon thought about the memories, and the visions from Sonagon’s dreams.

“The greenseer said that dragons are creatures of magic,” he muttered. “The Valyrian dragons were creatures of fire, and they burnt in the Doom…”

He stared at Sonagon, inspecting it. “But you weren’t always an ice dragon, were you? That’s how you survived. You turned from fire to ice.”

He thought about it for a while. The greenseer had said that dragons feed on magic, yet they were also shaped by it. Jon pictured Sonagon’s white dragonfire and he wondered if it had always cold.

“Red. You used to be a red dragon,” Jon said. He tried to picture what Sonagon would have looked like with red scales instead of white. Absentmindedly, he touched his hair. “And then you turned to feed of cold instead of fire – you froze, your scales became white, your fire became cold, and you became an ice dragon.”

There was no reply. Sonagon’s eyes were like saucers of pure blackness. Jon kept on thinking about the dragon’s memories.
Occasionally, Jon just started to talk himself. He would just talk to his dragon about his own memories.

First, Jon would talk about Winterfell, about his family and his childhood. He could describe his brothers and sisters, although it had felt like so long that he wondered if they even looked the same. He described Robb, Bran, little Rickon, and wild Arya most of all. Then, he started to talk about Ghost and proudly tell stories about the direwolf. Then, he started to talk about his black brothers and the Night’s Watch, even mentioning Ygritte and Tormund once or twice.

Later, when they camped for the night, the stories wouldn’t stop. Sonagon wouldn’t make a noise, but his black eyes were staring at Jon intently.

He’s listening, Jon thought, and the realisation sent shivers down his spine. He’s listening to what I’m saying.

Jon didn’t know how he was so sure, but he was. Sonagon was intelligent – the dragon was listening to the words. It wasn’t a human intelligence, Jon didn’t think the dragon could actually understand the stories, but something about him made Jon suspect that the dragon understood more than he might think.

The thought made him smile softly. The air was quiet and still. No campfire, no noise, nothing except a cold night. Jon bundled up in furs as he stared into the great dragon’s eyes.

Jon struggled to think of more stories to tell. Strangely, the only one that came to mind were Old Nan’s tales.

“One time, thousands and thousands of years ago,” Jon said slowly, his voice feeling strangely frail in the quiet. “A winter fell that was cold and hard and lasted beyond all memory of man. Winter came, the snows fell a hundred feet deep, and then in the Long Nights the sun hid for years. Children were born, lived, and died in darkness. That was when the white walkers moved through the woods…”

Jon had heard the tale before as a child. He had never imagined, not even in his wildest nightmares, that he would end up living it.

“… that was when the last hero set out to seek the children. He set out into the dead lands with a sword, a horse, a dog and a dozen companions, searching for the children of the forest in their secret cities…” Jon paused in a moment of quiet reflection. “… One by one his friends died, and his horse, and finally even his dog, and his sword froze so hard the blade snapped when he tried to use it. And the Others smelled the hot blood in him and came silent on his trail, stalking him with packs of pale white spiders big as hounds…”

The story had always frightened him as a child. Now, he recited Old Nan’s tale word for word, and he felt nothing. The words faded into the air like wind. Sonagon didn’t make a sound.

Jon finished the tale. The fight against the Others – of the duel between the last hero and the Other’s King, with the fate of the world in the balance. How the last hero won, how the Night’s Watch was founded, and how they defeated the night in the Battle for the Dawn. For some reason, Jon didn’t quite believe that part of the story.

Old legends get muddled up, the stranger had said.

“The last hero ended the generation-long winter and sent the Others into retreat,” Jon finished. “And then Bran the Builder raised the Wall, seven hundred feet tall, to forever protect against the cold and the Long Night.” Jon cocked his head at Sonagon in the dark. “And that’s the part where I think history has forgotten a bit or two. Because I think I know how Bran the Builder actually built the Wall.”

Jon smiled softly, thinking about the great Wall. A wall three hundred miles long and seven hundred fight tall. It was one of the greatest mysteries of the world how any man, even a legendary one, could have ever moved enough ice to build a wall that size.

“I think that Bran the Builder must have used ice dragons to build the Wall,” he said. “I think that it must have taken the breath of an ice dragon – hell, maybe several – to make a Wall of ice that big. So, I think that for thousands of years something built by ice dragons has protected the realm of man.”

Sonagon stared unblinking with dark eyes. He has black eyes, Jon noted. In the fanciful tales Old Nan used to tell about ice dragons, the ice dragons would always have blue eyes. “… and I can’t help thinking…” Jon continued, his voice barely a whisper. “… that thousands of years ago the ice dragons might have stopped the Long Night, and, now, when the cold and the dead are rising again, the final ice dragon appears too.”

Jon stared at the dragon with a gentle smile. Sonagon is winter, he decided.

Sometimes the dragon was as fierce and as vicious as the worst winter storm, but then other times he was a soft and as mellow as the crisp winter days, where the cold and snow wrapped around you like a cloak and the air was so clear that it was like the world paused. Jon was reminded of his old memories of winter – of epic snowball battles with Robb and long treks through the snow…

Jon closed his eyes and tried to share those memories with Sonagon too.

“… I think you’re going to save the world, Sonagon,” Jon whispered.

They sat, Jon talked and Sonagon listened, for a long time before they both finally fell asleep. They both dreamt of flying.

Chapter End Notes

Author Notes:

This chapter was an absolute pain to write. I’m still not sure if I got it right, but it's been written and rewritten a few times now. Let me know what you think.

Also, in case you're wondering, I did go through a Valyrian dictionary (and yep, there really are Valyrian dictionaries!) to find a name for the ice dragon. Jon decided to name the dragon the Valyrian word for ‘winter’, and ended up calling it Sonagon.

Well, bit of a tangent; but the exact word for ‘winter’ in High Valyrian is actually 'sōnar'. The suffix ‘-gon’ is typically 'to do something' (e.g. sōvegon is 'to fly'). It means that, really, 'Sonagon' would mean more 'to winter'; which, I know, doesn't really make sense - but, well, Jon doesn't actually speak Valyrian. The way I view it, Jon tried to figure out Valyrian with only a few phrases (imagine knowing some vague Latin terms and trying to make sense of the language), so yes, he ended up mistranslating because Jon doesn't know the lexicon. That's how I justify him naming the dragon Sonagon.
And Sonagon just sounds much better as a name anyways...

Also, fair warning, my update schedule is going to become a bit more irregular towards Christmas.
At night...

The Prince of the Nightfort

It was a cold night. In the distance, they could hear the rumbling of storms, coming from the north. When the stormy winds buffered against the Wall, sometimes it felt like the whole earth was trembling. They could hear the wind howling over the Wall, a constant, dull shriek above them. The sound made Bran shiver.

“You should eat your stew, Bran,” said Jojen.

“I’m not hungry,” Bran replied.

“You’re lying,” Jojen said. “We might not have rabbit again for a while. You should eat.”

Bran stared at the bowl of rabbit stew. Bran had watched Jojen cook it. After they stripped the good meat off the bones, everything that was leftover went into a stew. Everything from bones to brain to organs, all mashed into the same stew with turnip and a sprinkling of herbs. A beggar’s stew, Meera called it – for the times when food was so scarce that absolutely nothing could go to waste.

They were all wearing thin. The days and nights trapped at the Nightfort had not been kind. Bran had spent three days solid on the same patch of cold stone, staring upwards at the weirwood tree above him.

Meera kept busy hunting and scouting. Jojen meditated, or cooked. Even Hodor helped to clear the abandoned buildings, searching for old chunks of metal that could make ice picks, or stripping hemp that could be woven into rope. Meera had been talking for a while about crafting enough rope and a cradle to carry Bran up the Wall, and carry him down. Like he was some sort of infant that needed a crib.

Everyone kept busy, except for Bran – the useless little prince lying on the floor.

And, slowly, the thought that had turned from an idle curiosity began to loom larger and larger in his mind. He was obsessing over it, and he couldn’t stop. Maybe I don’t have to be Bran Stark anymore…

Jojen looked at him, as if he was reading his mind. “You can’t take another body, Bran,” he said.

“Why not?” Bran demanded. “I take Summer’s.”

“You borrow Summer’s body. What you’re talking about is stealing.”

Bran didn’t reply. “… I’ve been practising, you know,” he said slowly. “On rats and crows. It’s getting easier. It takes a while, but…”
“You think you could cross the Wall if you had another body.”

Bran nodded.

“And what about your current body?”

“It’s broken, isn’t it?” he snapped. He remembered how Sansa used to throw out her old dolls when they cracked.

“If you take a new body,” Jojen said slowly. “Then you wouldn’t be Bran Stark anymore.”

Maybe I don’t want to be Bran Stark anymore, he almost said.

“Please Bran,” Jojen continued. “You are a Stark, and that’s important. You are important. Leave these thoughts behind.”

Bran never did. The storm lasted for two more days. The rain scattered over the Wall, leaking through the broken roof of the Nightfort. The weather was so treacherous that they all huddled together in the dark kitchen, taking what little shelter the cracked ceiling offered.

In a way, Bran was the only one who was free. Bran could move into Summer whenever he wanted. He could even manage the rats or birds, if he really focused; but only to an extent. Those animals were difficult – they had to be forced. Squeezing himself into a rat’s skin felt almost like crushing the animal in his palm.

One night, Bran found a rat – an old grey rat that lingered by his feet long enough for him to grab its skin. For the next day and a half, almost continuously, Bran skittered around rubble and dark passages of the ruined castle. He stared through the rat’s beady, half-blind eyes, from a perspective that he hadn’t even been able to imagine.

By the time Bran finally pulled himself out of the rat, he felt the creature just keel over as soon as he left. The rat gasped for breath, twitched, and then died. It was like whatever mind it had had been crushed when Bran entered it, and when Bran left its body died too. Bran might as well have stepped on that rat when he pushed himself into its body.

Bran didn’t stop thinking about what that might be like. Whenever he went into a new body, there was always that link to his old one – the connection that pulled him back to his original skin, like a ship’s anchor. He didn’t truly become a creature; he was just partway squeezing his head and shoulders into its skin, while his feet remained grounded. What would it be like to break that connection, to dive completely into another skin?

It made him think of what the three-eyed crow had said about flying. Was that what it meant to fly? Bran supposed it would be like being reborn. It would be like dying and coming back to life again.

Some days, Bran wondered what else he might be able to do. One day, he spent twelve hours continuously staring at a spider creeping over the stones, wondering if he might be able to take the spider’s body too. He couldn’t sense the spider in his third eye, but then again, he hadn’t been able to sense the rats and the birds at first either.

Jojen noticed him, and frowned. “… I think it might be best if you try to avoid skinchanging for a while, Bran. Try to avoid using it,” Jojen said carefully, as if expecting an argument. “Until we find the three-eyed crow.”

Bran didn’t reply.
Later that day, Meera came to him, with a soft smile. “How are you, Bran?” Meera said in a low voice. “… I know things haven’t been comfortable lately, but…”

Her voice trailed off slowly. Did Jojen tell her to check on him?

“We’ve reached a decision,” Meera said. “Jojen doesn’t want to stay here any longer, he thinks this place might have a bad influence. We’ve decided to head east, to Castle Black.”

Bran’s eyes widened. “Jon…”

Meera nodded. “Yes, your brother. We’re going to try and reach him. Just Jon, though – we can’t trust the other rangers, Jojen thinks Castle Black might also be dangerous.” Of course, she would follow Jojen. “But we can try to draw out Jon individually. We’re going to try and convince Jon to escort us north to the three-eyed crow.”

Bran took a deep breath. “When?” Bran asked. The thought of seeing Jon again…

“As soon as the storm clears,” Meera promised, clutching his hand with a smile. “Couple of days.”

His skin felt warm where she touched. Bran felt his heart flutter, staring into her eyes. She was older than he was, but so pretty with brown hair and green eyes. He hadn’t thought she was that pretty at first, but she was…

… Maybe if I had legs, he thought suddenly. I could stand up and kiss her.

His eyes drooped down towards the floor.

Even after dusk, when everyone else went to sleep for the night, sheltered from the scattering rain, Bran was wide awake and thinking about how he might take a new body. A body that could stand up, that could climb. To take a brand new body… it would have to be human. Bran could borrow other skins for a time, but he couldn’t imagine living fully as anything else but human.

Not for the first time, Bran found himself staring at Hodor, and wondering.

Just like the rat, Bran strongly suspected that if he went all the way in, he would have to kill the current occupant. Hodor doesn’t deserve that, Bran thought. Hodor was kind, gentle and innocent – he protected Bran, carried him…

Still, at night, sometimes, Bran dreamt about being a large knight, standing tall and armoured in black on a battlefield…

In the distance, Bran heard the thunder roll from the north.

Everyone else was asleep, huddled by the wall against the rain. Hodor sat by the opposite side, snoring against the wall. Meera slept coiled next to him. Jojen lay in the centre, shifting and muttering restlessly in his sleep, like he was having a bad dream.

Bran was wide awake. He closed his eyes and concentrated reaching out around. In the lower floors, he found a rat – a young rat picking apart one of the rotted wooden beams of the old keep. Its body trembled and convulsed as Bran caught it. Despite the rat’s struggles, he didn’t let go. He pushed his way in furiously, squeezing forcefully into the rat’s skin.

Rats were worse than birds. They would constantly try to slip and struggle away from Bran, like it thought it could escape his grip. Bran had to hold tightly, so tightly the rat might strangle itself by struggling.
As soon as the rat’s resistance shattered, Bran was skittering down the beam on tiny, fast paws. The rat’s vision was blurry and nearly useless, but its nose was so sharp and sensitive. Bran wanted to keep on searching the deep vaults, the places so buried that only a rat could really reach them.

He spent hours crawling in the rat’s skin, through buried passageways so black that there was no light at all. The rat’s whiskers twitched, paws tracing across a chunk of metal buried in a half-collapsed tunnel.

There was no warning as suddenly sharp teeth bit into the rat’s hide, tearing through skin. The rat squealed. Bran screamed – gasping upwards as the pain hit him.

The warg shattered. Bran jumped awake, yanking himself back to his own body as he felt the rat’s life extinguish. Bran was left gasping for breath, clutching his waist and half-expecting to feel bite marks.

Around him, the others still slept soundly. Jojen squirmed restlessly in his sleep.

It was another rat, Bran thought, replaying that brief moment. Another rat – a larger, older rat – ambushed his rat from behind. It tore the younger rat apart and ate it. He hadn’t been able to see it, but Bran wondered if that cannibal rat might have had white fur, like the Rat Cook that Old Nan always used to tell him about.

Perhaps that is all the Rat Cook was, Bran wondered, maybe he was just a man that died and warged a second life in the body of a rat? What would it be like to totally become another creature? Could the Rat Cook have then warged into another rat when the first one died? Maybe the Rat Cook became immortal, constantly switching and possessing the body of the biggest rat in the castle for five hundred years, until nothing remained of the man more than a desire for cannibalism…?

Around him, the weirwood tree rippled in the wind and rain. The sound of the rain and the distant howl of the storm was a constant drone in the backdrop. The night was restless, and Bran’s eyes were heavy, right up until the moment he heard a voice echo in the distance.

Bran’s heart skipped. His whole body jerked. At first, he thought the shadows were speaking to him.

And then he heard a second voice. It was distant, indistinct, like the first, but it was getting closer. For a moment, there was nothing but pure panic. And then slowly, the rational part of his brain took over. There are people in the Nightfort.

He saw ravens burst into the sky from a nearby tower. They had been disturbed, by figures moving closer through the keep, from the north.

Who? How? Are they after me, how could they find us, why are they here…?

“Wake up!” Bran hissed, at Jojen and Meera. “Wake up, there’s someone here…”

They didn’t even twitch. It was late, the Nightfort had been deserted for so long, they had long since stopped keeping sentries at night. Bran dared not raise his voice. If he had legs, he would have stood up to reach Jojen, to shake him awake. Instead, Bran had to crawl over the ground awkwardly to reach the boy.

Jojen mumbled incoherently. Bran practically had to clutch his mouth, causing the crannogman to jolt awake. Bran could suddenly hear footsteps, behind the hum of the storm. Summer shot up suddenly. The direwolf would have pounced and attacked, if Bran hadn’t have held him back.
Jojen’s eyes were wide. Meera looked awake too, suddenly, while Hodor was still sleeping. None dared to make a noise, frozen solid. Meera slowly reached for her three-pronged frog spear by her bags. Bran could hear footsteps just outside of the kitchens, splashing through the puddles on the broken stones.

“… This place is a ruin,” a voice growled from outside.

“It’s a big ruin,” another replied with a snort. “The crows won’t search it. We can hide here for a while.”

“Fuck hiding,” a man snapped, stepping closer. The shadows looked like he was struggling to light a torch through in the faint rain. “We should have stuck to Mance’s old plan. Kill every fucking crow in their castle and open the gates.”

Wildlings, Bran thought with a gasp. They are wildlings…!

There was a gasp as the torch finally let, sizzling in the rain. “Oh aye? Tough guy with an ice-pick, ain’t you Sven?” A hoarse voice laughed. A woman’s voice. “You reckon you can take on a hundred crows all by yourself?”

“We lost thirty men climbing that bloody Wall,” the man snapped. He sounded like a big man. “If you had only waited for better weather—”

“We climbed during the storm because then we’re sure there won’t be any crows on the Wall, during the storm!” Another snapped. “Any other time, and maybe we would have been spotted, and none of us would have made it.”

Bran tried to count the footsteps. At least a dozen. He saw more torches being lit. A dozen men and women strong enough to climb the Wall. “You bloody…!”

“Enough!” a man snapped. He stepped into the flickering light, Jojen pulled Bran further into the shadows of the enclave of the Wall. Bran caught a glimpse of the wildling – tall, lean, with dark hair and fierce eyes. He wore boiled leather and sheepskin furs. “You say another bloody word Sven, I gut you. I don’t give a damn for your whining.”

There was a pause. “We stick to the plan,” the man continued. “We hide out here. We lower ropes for the others when they come. Maybe if we get the men we assault Castle Black, but if not we just go south ourselves.”

“If we want to get more, then we need to send people back north to fetch them, Jarl,” another complained, a woman. She clutched a spear.

“Bugger that,” the large man cursed. “I ain’t ever stepping north of that Wall again. I’ll face the sword before I face the dead again. We southerners, now.”

Bran’s heart was pounding madly. In the shadows, behind the wall, Meera had her frog spear and net, Summer’s teeth were bared, but Bran counted thirteen figures in the torch light. His lungs froze, but slowly the footsteps started to move away. They were walking away from the kitchens, towards the keep. Probably looking for shelter.

Meera met Jojen’s eyes, and then shook her head. Nobody dared make a noise, instead just listening to the free folk bicker. They are walking away, Bran realised. Maybe just a bit further, and we could slip out without them noticing.

In the clouds, the lightning cracked. Moments later, he heard the thunder rumble loudly. Suddenly, Hodor shot awake. Meera couldn’t restrain him in time.

“Hodor!” The stable boy cried, jolting awake in fear. “Hodor!”

The single word echoed behind the thunder. Bran heard the footsteps stop. “What the hell was that?”

“Move!” Meera hissed, half-dragging Bran across the ground. “Quickly, run, move…!”

Summer was growling. Feet were racing. “Hodor!” Hodor shouted in panic. “Hodor, hodor!”

“Grab Bran!” Meera cursed, as Bran tried weakly to crawl. Meera had her hunting trident and net, even Jojen clutched a dagger, but Bran had never felt as useless as when Hodor frantically hoisted him upwards from the arms. In an instant, Bran was being thrown over Hodor’s shoulders like a sack.

There was shouting. Bran saw Summer dash forward. Hodor was cluttering across the ground, carrying Bran like a bale of hay, while Jojen ran next to him. With barely a conscience thought, Bran felt himself slip away into Summer’s skin.

The direwolf was snarling, angry, feeling the danger in the air. Bran could smell the danger, enemies clutching torches and spears running towards them. He saw flickering shadows and weapons being drawn through the light drizzle of the rain.

The first wildling barreled through the doorway, but Meera’s frog spear was ready and waiting for him. He was big man, but Meera jabbed upwards, catching him off-guard and her three-pronged spear plunged straight into his neck. The man tried to catch the lunge instinctively, but he was too slow and blood spurted everywhere. He thrashed in pain sharply, slamming physically into Meera. Even with a spear half-jutting out of his throat, however, the wildling didn’t fall down, and instead twisted around and tried desperately to yank the spear out of Meera’s hands.

Meera was skilled and fast, but the wildling was much bigger, tougher and stronger.

She shouted, half in pain and half in anger, as the man grabbed her, but Meera reacted fluidly. With her other hand, her hunting net swung forward, tangling into the next wildling through the doorway and sending him crashing to the ground. Then, Meera twisted out with both hands on the spear, trying to wrestle the man down and plunge the spear deep into his throat. He was gargling in pain, but even as he choked on his own blood he still wrestled against Meera.

More men were charging through the doorway. The chaos was immediate. Meera forced the man’s thrashing body backwards with her spear, trying to block the doorway, but then he managed to rip the weapon out of her grasp. Meera swiftly drew her hunting knife, abandoning the trident without a second thought, and screamed wordlessly as she plunged the knife into the man’s chest repeatedly. The narrow blade cut through leather and into flesh with a horrible spurting sound.

The wildlings behind him slammed forward. A wildling woman plunged at Meera with a spear, ready to skewer her like a boar, but at that moment Summer lunged into the fray of thrashing bodies.

“Direwolf!” A wildling screamed, clutching his bronze sword. Everything dissolved into tooth and claw, panic and chaos. “Bloody direwolf!”

The first man fell quickly under Summer’s teeth. The spearwife clattered to the ground with the wolf’s claws scraped across her shoulder. The man Meera wrestled with was still thrashing, but weakly as he fell to the ground and dragged her with him. Meera panted, smeared in blood, clutching her hunting knife with trembling hands.

Two down, one injured, and one trying to disentangle himself from a net. Still, there were nine more wildlings, all ready and armed, and the element of surprise had vanished.

“Kill the bloody wolf!” The wildling – Jarl – snapped, stabbing forward with his spear. They were big men, experienced, they all knew how to hold their weapons. “Kill it!”

The first spear nearly gutted Summer. The direwolf barely managed to lunge beside the thrust, his jaws snapping, but the spears kept him back. Meera gasped as another wildling slammed forward at her, swinging a bronze sword. She barely ducked under the blow and managed to graze his shoulder with her knife, but then the man’s other arm twisted and smashed her to the ground. The blow hit Meera squarely on the nose. Bran, through Summer’s eyes, saw her blood spurt as she dropped to the floor.

Bran howled in shock. He barely avoided the lunge of another spear. Ten against two, Bran thought. Too many, even for Summer. We need Hodor.

Bran dropped himself out of Summer, and back into his own body. Hodor was carrying him over his shoulder as they ran through the ruined keep, towards the old library. Bran saw Jojen cry out, “Bran, don’t–!”

Bran didn’t even pause. Suddenly, he was jumping straight into Hodor’s skin, so quickly the stable boy couldn’t even protest. The struggle for control was swift and decisive. He crushed Hodor’s protests easily, seizing control of Hodor’s limbs. Bran’s own body fell out of Hodor’s arms, splashing limply onto the wet stone, yet Bran didn’t even feel himself fall. He was already in Hodor.

Suddenly, Bran felt big and strong. Hodor growled as he turned and stamped back towards the kitchen.

“Hodor!” he shouted. He had tried to shout ‘Meera!’

Hodor picked up a large stone, heaving it upwards in both hands like a club. Gods, Bran almost forgot what it felt like to have legs, to feel so strong…

Both Meera and Summer were running. Meera was gasping for breath, clutching her nose as she fled while Summer turned to try and lead them away from her, to split their forces. Three men chased after Meera, four men and a spearwife tried to corner Summer at the far end of the kitchens. That left another two wildlings running after Bran and Jojen.

Both of them had spears and swords. Hodor would have cowered and whimpered, but Bran ran straight through.

“Who the fuck are you people?!” One of the wildlings shouted at Hodor, raising his spear.

“Hodor!” Hodor bellowed, swinging the stone like a hammer. “Hodor!”

The bronze spear tip plunged into Hodor’s shoulder. Bran felt the pain cut through him, but his arms were still swinging.

The rock collided against the wildling’s head. Bran felt his skull crack like an egg.

Bran had never a killed a man before, but in Hodor’s body it just felt so easy.
The other man swung his sword. Hodor barrelled into him, but his sword still scraped against Hodor’s thigh. They both tumbled to the ground, Hodor roared in pain. Bran hadn’t felt pain like it; he felt the skin tear under the blunt metal edge, taking out Hodor’s leg from underneath him.

The raider tried to clamber upwards. Hodor’s arms seemed to work on pure instinct. Hodor grabbed the man by the collar, and dragged him to the ground with him. He thrashed and he kicked, but Hodor barely even felt the pain. Then, Hodor’s big, strong hands were wrapping around the man’s throat and choking the life out of him. Hodor had such strong hands.

Bran felt the adrenaline tear through him. He watched the man’s face turned bloated purple. He heard the man gagging, felt him thrashing, but slowly becoming weaker and weaker.

At the far side of the room, Summer tore off a man’s arm with his teeth. Still the other four wildlings plunged forward, fighting the feral wolf back desperately. Bran could see the plumes of blood scattered across Summer’s hide from where the spears had caught him. The direwolf was limping on its left hind leg, weakening with every blow. Summer was strong and vicious, but teeth and claws couldn’t compete with spears.

They’re going to kill Summer, he realised with shock. They’re going to kill Summer, and Jojen, and Meera….

Hodor tried to move, but the stable boy couldn’t stand. Hodor’s leg was oozing blood, his body shivering.

I’ve got to protect Summer.

Suddenly, Bran pushed himself outwards. He wasn’t quite sure if he’d be able to bring himself back in again, but he didn’t care anymore. He could feel the ravens flocking in the sky, the rats skittering on the ground.

The desperation forced him forward. Through his third eye, he focused on a raven and he pushed with all of his might. The raven’s will folded like paper as Bran powered through, seizing control of its body…

In an instant, there was a squawking bundle of feathers and claws bursting through a hole in the ceiling, straight for the raider’s eyes. Bran felt sharp talons and beak tearing through screaming flesh…

Bran gasped, struggling to process it. The distraction was enough for Summer to snap forward between the spears, throwing the wildlings back. Without even pausing, Bran reached out to grab another bird.

Can I control two bodies at once? He hadn’t even realised he might be able to, but in that moment he just was. He could feel both the birds pecking and squealing madly under his grip, but Bran just threw them both to attack in a suicidal charge.

The thought made him tremble. One of the birds died as a raider snapped its neck. Bran felt the crack as the bird’s life was snuffed out. It hurt – he could feel the spike of pain as its neck jolted – but there was no time to focus on it. Bran was already grabbing a third bird, and then a fourth, and then a fifth…

And then, in an instant, the kitchens were roaring with black, flapping, scratching shapes…

The feeling was incredible. It felt indescribable. It felt like Bran was everywhere. He was in a dozen bodies at once, driving them all to attack as one.
He could feel the man screaming and bleeding. He could feel their eyeballs popping under talons. He could feel the weirwood tree rippling, and the rain pounding against the stones.

And then he felt Summer’s teeth tear through the men one by one. The birds scratched out their eyes, and then the direwolf tore out their throats. The men were sent flailing in panic, and then Summer’s jaws lunged onto them. The wildlings in the kitchen were falling quickly. They died screaming and thrashing.

Meera, Bran thought. I need to save Meera.

Meera had ran off further into the castle, chased by four men. The swarm of birds twisted, flapping after them. Bran felt eleven bodies under his control, but they moved so fluidly it was like he only controlling one.

Bran could smell smoke. He could hear the sound of fighting, and rain hissing against flames.

Bran gasped as he dropped back into his own body. Painfully. His head spinning. He heard screaming, and squawking in the distance. Bran was on the ground, with Jojen stood over him protectively clutching a dagger.

Meera. Meera is screaming. He had never heard Meera scream before.

Meera must have to circle back around to Bran and Jojen, but the wildlings chased her down. They were in the old library, across from the keep, surrounded by rotten wood and dust. The wildlings dragged Meera into the corner of the room, kicked and forced her to the ground….

“Leave her alone!” Jojen bellowed, clutching his dagger with both hands. “Leave her –”

A backhanded slap took him to the ground. Bran gasped, trying desperately to concentrate as his head swam with panic.

Four wildlings. There are four wildlings left, while Summer tore through the last of the group back in the kitchen. Meera must have knocked a torch out of a man’s hand, sending one of the wooden rafters up in flames. Even despite the rain, the rotten wood was burning and crackling around them, gushing smoke and hissing sparks. Bran could feel the thick smoke sting in his throat and eyes, his head rushing madly, so madly he could barely think…

The moment froze. Bran could see Meera screaming, the ruined library burning, the black sky still spattering rain.

“The girl has fight in her!” A raider laughed, grabbing Meera’s wrists as he pinned her to the ground. “I like the fighters!”

“The boys do not,” another growled. Bran could barely gasp as suddenly the raider’s foot crunched into his chest. His head swam, struggling to concentrate. “What do you reckon? Orphans squatting out?”

Bran saw Jojen try to clamber up, but then the big man downwards smacked him. Bran wheezed weakly, struggling for breath, staring upwards the billows of smoke, the birds cawing madly…

“That little bitch killed Sven!” A wildling growled, glaring at Meera.

“Sven was a fool,” the wildling growled, still wrestling with Meera. She was a good fighter, but he was still just so much bigger and stronger than her. Bran saw her eyes wide and pale. “… But this girl is mine! I’m taking her.”
Bran could barely breathe as he watched the man tear open Meera’s tunic with his bare hands. He saw pale skin, turned red from where he gripped her. Meera tried to struggle, but the man was on top of her, pinning her to the ground while his hands…

He’s going to rape her. He’s going to rape her right here and now, in the pouring rain with half the building on fire.

Bran’s heart pounded. He felt something snap. It sounded like a chain breaking in his mind.

He heard the fire crackling. He heard screaming.

And he heard Summer snarling furiously, like some monster out of Old Nan’s tales, as the wolf lunged out of the darkness straight at the wildling standing over Bran. The raider went down quickly under the massive direwolf’s snapping jaws.

Two wildlings tried to raise axes, but then there were ravens and crows squawking madly down through the smoke, clawing at eyes. Tearing their faces off. Bran couldn’t even remember consciously giving the order, but the birds just followed his unconscious commands almost instinctively…

And the burning library dissolved into pure panic. All sanity disappeared and the world seemed consumed by tooth and claw, smoke and screaming, and so, so much blood.

The wildlings fell quickly. Bran had never felt Summer so bloodthirsty before.

He could hear Meera screaming. The sound was like fire in Bran’s blood.

The wildling clutching Meera was the last one standing. Meera’s shirt was torn and hanging off, revealing pale delicate flesh, skinny ribs and a flat exposed breast, her entire chest was covered in bruises and painful whelps. The wildling’s breeches were half off, but he clutched a dagger to Meera’s throat.

His eyes were wide, horrified. The birds cawed while the direwolf tore through his colleagues in an instant. His face turned pale, staring at the snarling giant wolf with blood dripping from its maw…

“Stay back!” the wildling screamed, clutching his dagger. His words were barely audible over the burning and the cawing. “Get that wolf away from me or I tear open the girl’s throat.”

Summer approached, one paw in front of the other slowly. The direwolf’s eyes shone in the darkness. The raider was screaming something, but Bran couldn’t hear it. The sound of Meera’s screams echoed in his head.

And then their eyes met. There was no thought involved, just pure rage and panic. Bran lunged. He lunged outwards like a wolf.

Bran concentrated on the raider and he pushed. He pushed harder than he had ever pushed before, with anger he hadn’t even imagined…

Bran felt the man’s mind. He felt the pain, the fear, so thick it was like smoke, but Bran didn’t care. He wrapped his power around the wildling and he squeezed.

He felt the man convulse, scream and thrash. It hurt, but Bran didn’t stop. Gods, Bran felt so strong. Like he was tearing the life out of him. It felt like he was smothering the man’s mind, crushing him in his grip…
The wildling was screaming as he dropped backwards, convulsing and shaking, fingers tearing at his own face. Bran refused to stop, he forced himself harder and further, tighter and tighter…

He felt the man’s mind scream, Bran felt it snuff out beneath his grip. The man’s spirit had burned like a raging flame, but Bran just felt him… extinguish, like squeezing a candle’s flame in his hands. Instantly, all resistance disappeared, and then Bran felt himself falling inwards….

The world blurred.

Everything changed.

All around him, the birds were cawing and flapping madly. The smoke was hissing.

Meera was gasping as she clambered to her feet, her hands clutching a broken brick from the ground. Her clothes were still torn, half her chest bare. Her face was bloody. There were tears in her eyes.

“You bastard!” Meera shrieked, smashing the stone downwards onto the wildling’s head. The man gaped in shock. “… You bastard! You bastard!”

The first blow sent the wildling’s head spinning. The second caused his vision to blur. By the third, he barely managed to raise his arms to block Meera, while the girl pushed herself on top of him, kicking and slamming into the wildling with berserk strength.

“…No… don’t…” the man gasped, struggling to stand. His legs trembled.

“You bastard!” Meera roared, trying to crack him again. “You…!”

“… No… Meera…” The wildling wheezed, collapsing to the ground, as blood dripped down from his cheeks. “… Don’t… It’s me… Bran…”
Chapter 10

Chapter Summary

Friends and enemies surrounding two kings; one king heading north, and the other going south...

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Davos

The air was foul. Everything about their journey left a bad taste in Davos' mouth.

The weather was cold, and getting colder every minute. In front of them, the great Wall of ice loomed like a giant shadow, as tall as a mountain. It was like the horizon cut off into a solid looming blackness.

Salladhor Saan's fleet cut across the ocean. The colourful Lysene hulls were a sharp contrast against the bleak landscape. The wind was firm – a constant gust that had followed them all the way from Dragonstone. Melisandre had promised them a good wind, and she delivered on that promise. Sometimes, though, when the wind cut across the bay it sounded like Alester Florent's ghostly screams.

Davos shuddered to think of it. He would never forget the way Alester screamed and begged when his own brother tired him to the stake. The price for their wind – a man's horrifying death.

But they were here now. The Wall.

Davos could only hope he made the right decision.

Eastwatch-by-the-Sea loomed ahead. It was an old, squatting black castle against the towering shape of the Wall, cradled by the harbour and a small fishing village. There were no walls, only watch towers, and thatch cottages scattered right up towards the stone keep itself. It was a large dock, but also empty and almost decrepit. There were only six boats larger than a dinghy at the Watch's harbour. Mostly fishing vessels alongside the black brothers' patrol boats.

The twenty nine ships of Lysene fleet cut through the water. Davos sat at the prow of the Valyrian, watching the fleet closely. The Valyrian was the Salla's prized galleas flagship, five masts and three hundreds oars, but it was flanked on either side by the Bird of a Thousand Colours and the Shayala's Dance. They had sailed in tight formation towards the Fingers, but then the treacherous waters and currents towards Skagos forced the fleet into nearly single file. Hardly ideal formation should we come under attack, Davos thought with a grimace, but there's nothing for it in these waters. As it was, Davos was concerned that the ships towards the rear, the cogs Saathos Saan and Bountiful Harvest, were consistently falling behind, but to turn around and wait for them could be more dangerous.

A fleet of this size in waters like these, Davos thought. Not a situation any sailor envied. It was lucky they had such a steady wind behind them. The north was not a place for easy sailing.
Still, the men of Salladhor's Saan ships were experienced enough. Davos was more worried about Stannis' men at arms who were assisting amongst the sailors. Davos inspected the crew carefully, talked to Khorane Sathamantas, a captain, briefly about making harbour, inspected the rowers, measured the wind, depth and currents, and then checked the charts three times almost obsessively. He passed on messages to the spotters on the other ships, coordinating movements through the signaller on the crow's nest. He was the King's Hand now; he didn't have to do such grunt tasks himself, but a lifetime of sailing had ingrained them into his bones.

And Davos was panicking slightly. Focusing on the ships always help him concentrate when he was nervous.

From the coast, the bells were ringing from Eastwatch. Davos glimpsed figures moving on the harbour. Doubtless their arrival would make quite a stir.

A figure walked across the deck, while the sailors rushed ready to make port. King Stannis Baratheon's face was hard. His Grace had left his last seat of power at Dragonstone behind him to venture to the Wall, at Davos' insistence. Davos liked to think it was wise counsel; answering the plea of the Night's Watch, defending the realm, but part of him was wondering how much of the things he said had just been a last ditch attempt to save his own life.

By rights, Stannis should have executed him when Davos stole Edric Storm to safety. Maybe he still would.

They had four thousand men, twenty nine ships belonging to the Lyseni pirate, and a rapidly failing claim to the Iron Throne.

Stannis and Davos sat on Saan's flagship as it approached the dock, while he kept the Queen and his daughter on the Oledo at the rear of the fleet until he knew it was safe. Melisandre stayed by the King's side, though, her long robe sweeping over her deck as she walked easily across the boat. For a second, her red hair seemed to be the only light in the bleak world.

"I feel it…" Melisandre said breathlessly, staring at the torches on deck. "The power is thick here…"

The ship was heading into the harbour. There were already a group of men waiting on the docks.

"We left an incestuous bastard sitting on my throne to be here," Stannis said, his voice low.

"The letter from Bowen Marsh said that wildlings have amassed in the hundred thousand. That the Lord Commander may be dead and the wildlings were preparing an assault on the Wall," Davos said, trying to sound more confident he felt. "The realm must be protected. We must save the kingdom to win the throne."

Stannis said nothing. For once, Melisandre was in agreement with Davos. "Your Hand is right, Your Grace. We have both seen it in the fires. A great battle in the snow."

"Yes. Your prophecies," Stannis said. "I trust in armies and men more than I do prophecies to win my kingdom. The north is divided. The northern lords must rise up to rightful King, and the Wall will be a good place to start."

I will take my kingdom again piece by piece from the north, Stannis had said as they left, Davos recalled. There had been much dissent from the knights and lords as they left – many called it 'fleeing' to the north – but Davos had made his case well. Melisandre had been practically eager with the idea, calling it fulfilment of the prophecy – that cold and death would come from the north, and the servants of R'hllor must stop it.

"Who commands here?" Stannis asked after a pause.

"Cotter Pyke, I believe, Your Grace."

The ironborn bastard name caused Stannis' gaze to darken. "Go ahead in my stead, Lord Seaworth," Stannis ordered. "Explain our presence here and inquire about the state of the wildling invasion."

"Yes, your grace." He bowed and turned.

Melisandre nodded towards him. "Walk with me, Onion Lord," she offered, holding out her arm as Davos stepped aware. "A word?"

"M'lady?" He hesitated as she wrapped her arm around his, walking down the deck. She felt warm.

"You seem nervous."

Davos felt nervous, terribly so. "The start of a new campaign, m'lady."

"No. This campaign has been coming for a thousand years," said Melisandre, with a gentle smile. Davos had seen few women as beautiful as she was. His wife, Marya, had been a fair woman, but Melisandre put her to shame. Sometimes Melisandre looked as beautiful as she was wicked. "Your King's conquest has been ordained long ago, by the Lord of Light."

"As you say, m'lady."

"You are a sceptic, Onion Lord?" She sounded almost amused by that. Davos never replied. "The world turns in cycles. Like winter and summer dancing around each other. Fire and ice. History repeats itself. Azor Ahai Reborn." Her hand touched her ruby gently. "There must always be a champion of the Lord of Light, to fight in the Battle for the Dawn."

"You are very sure."

"But of course. Since setting out on this path, the fires have burnt all the brighter. My visions have been sharper, my powers stronger. The further north we go, the clearer my prophecies become. Proof from R'hllor himself that we are on the right path."

Davos hesitated, glancing at the shadow of the Wall in the distance. He didn't believe in prophecy, but... "And what do your visions show you?"

"They show the great battle. Not this one, but a one fast approaching. The battle of ice and fire. And they show me the other champion as well."

He glanced at her questioningly. "Yes," Melisandre continued. "You see, the Lord of Light has his champion – Stannis Baratheon, Azor Ahai – and yet the Great Other, the enemy, he must have his champion too. The champion of cold. When they collide, the fate of the world will hang in the balance."

Davos never replied. He wasn't quite sure how to. Melisandre just smiled gently, like he was some dumb child who didn't understand the obvious.

"You don't have to believe," she said soothingly. "Not yet. You will, though. The visions have been very clear."
"Forgive me if I do not convert, m'lady," he said, keeping his face impassive.

Melisandre laughed – a loud, clear laugh that rang out over the deck. A few sailors glanced towards them.

"I have heard men say curse words in the same way you say 'm'lady'," she said, amused. "But you're a curious man, Onion Lord. I am not sure what to make of you sometimes."

"I thought you saw everything in your fires."

"Only the Lord of Light sees all. I am but his servant. He shows me what I need to know." She paused, thinking quietly. "Truth be told, I did not foresee your survival in the flames. It surprised me when you strolled back into Dragonstone after the Blackwater."

Davos stiffened. When I came to kill you. I had the dirk in my hands, ready to cut out your throat. I thought that you had my sons burned in those infernal fires. I'm still not convinced that you didn't. He didn't dare speak.

"I have seen very little of you in the fire, Onion Lord, and yet I feel like you have a role to play. I feel power from you," Melisandre's voice was low. She slowly unhooked her arm from his, sliding across him when she turned. She felt like silk and velvet. The ruby on her throat seemed to shimmer. "… Come to my chambers one night," she whispered. "Let us see if you can become a believer."

Davos froze. Her hair brushed against him as she passed. Red, so red, impossibly red. For a second, he was left staring entranced as she walked down the steps. Davos had to take a deep breath just to focus himself.

Melisandre is fire, he thought. It felt like she burned with every touch.

It took well over an hour for the Lysene ships to dock. They approached slowly, non-threateningly. Three ships came in with the Valyrian, but the rest of the fleet lingered in the bay. Bells were still ringing, but it would be obvious to the Night's Watch that they were coming in slowly – to dock rather than attack. Davos hoped it would be obvious, at least.

The Hand of King kept himself busy. Organising the men, the ropes, the anchor – seeing to every possible task to keep his mind occupied.

Davos was inspecting the rowers on the lower decks, while the helmsman started guiding the large ship in carefully, when Davos saw a man approach him with a goblet of wine in a wrinkled hand, walking easily over the gently rocking ship.

"… So this is the north, I take it?" Salladhor Saan exclaimed raising his hand. "I hear that the Wall is one of the nine great wonders built by man. But I see little wonder, I admit – it's far too dreary and cold for wonder."

Davos smiled, slightly woodenly. Salla wore white samite robes with wide dagged sleeves, sashed in green and gold. A sapphire pendant hung from his neck, with gold rings on his fingers. Even on a vessel, walking among sweaty sailors in rags, Salladhor Saan dressed like a prince. The pirate prince was smiling, almost friendlily, yet Davos recognised the sharp glint in his eye.

"His Grace means to win the war from the north," Davos said, repeating words he had told himself a thousand times. "The north is a land divided, it will rally for its rightful King."

"Oh, I'm sure!" Salla laughed cheerfully. "This land must be full of strong, loyal men eager to supporter his grace. And who has been a more loyal supporter to King Stannis' than Salladhor Saan – His Grace's reasonable and dedicated friend through such trying times? Why, I even abandoned ripe pickings in the Narrow Sea to venture on this voyage with his grace, as his humble servant." He laughed again. "Why, so humble."

Ah. "The rewards when his grace retakes the Iron Throne will be great, my lord."

"I'm sure," Salla agreed. "I have been promised so. Many times. In fact, if promises were gold I could buy the world."

Salla was smiling, but the laughter didn't reach his eyes. He had been pushing more and more frequently for gold promised, and each additional risk made Salladhor all the more uncomfortable. Stannis is asking much of him to risk so many of his ships venturing this far north, Davos thought quietly. But there is nothing for it – Stannis needs his fleet.

"His Grace much appreciates your loyalty," Davos said with forced politeness, struggling to say anything else.

"But of course!" Salladhor exclaimed, holding his arms wide. His tone was jovial, but his eyes were sharp. "Why, I'd have to be loyal to venture this far, risking cold and ice, for nothing but promise after promise."

Davos smiled, but his shoulders were tense as he walked away. He had known Salladhor Saan for many years – they were even friends, to a degree, but there had always been a pit of fear in his stomach towards the flamboyant prince. Salla was the type man that could hug you as easily as he could cut your throat. It took a special type of pirate who was capable of growing old as well as successful.

Add that onto the list to worry about, Davos thought with a gulp. Salla will expect his due.

It took another scrambled forty minutes to set down the gangway and fasten the ropes. Finally, Davos walked with Ser Ormund Wylde and Ser Harys Cobb, both king's men. They flanked him either side, making an impressive and dignified pair in full armour, with the stag of Stannis emblazoned on their surcoats.

They were met by five men of the Night's Watch. Compared to the knights, the black brothers were wearing worn leathers and wool, with pitch black cloaks and hoods.

The man at front hailed them first. "Greetings, we were not expecting you." His voice was low, dour, almost even sardonic. "I am Cotter Pyke, Commander at Eastwatch, and you are…?"

"Lord Davos Seaworth, Hand to the King Stannis Baratheon, First of His Name, Rightful King of the Iron Throne," Davos announced loudly, looking at the men. They all seemed cautious. "We have come answering the plea for aid sent by the Night's Watch."

"Much obliged," Cotter Pyke replied, lowering his head fractionally. He was a tall, broad and rugged man, but lean, hard and wiry. He had small, close-set eyes, a broken nose and a pox ravaged face, as well as a widow's peak and a sparse, rough beard. His eyes were sharp, guarded.

"Stannis Baratheon…" Cotter said. "… Which king is that again?"

There was a small ripple from the knights next to him. "The Rightful King, brother of Robert Baratheon, Lord of Dragonstone, King of the Seven Kingdoms," said Davos, all the while taking in their eyes. This is wrong, he thought slowly, they're on guard, cautious of us. From the urgency in the letters, Davos had half-expected the Wall to be falling by the time they got here.
Cotter nodded, but his eyes were still sharp. "You know that Night's Watch takes no part in the affairs of the realm, right?"

There was a mutter next to him, an old maester tugged Cotter's arm warningly. He's being too bold, Davos thought. "We've come to protect the realm," Davos replied, cautiously. Something is wrong.

"Forgive me, m'lord, I just tend to get cautious when a fleet of warships turns up at my door," Cotter said dryly. "How many men do you have?"

Davos was almost reluctant to answer. "Four thousand," said Davos, before adding, "We have come answering your own request – I understand that the Night's Watch is in dire need of men."

Cotter nodded. "Well, you are all more than welcome to take the black," he said, causing the men next to him to ripple. The maester standing beside him looked nervous. This is going wrong, Davos thought, he's too hostile. We should be here as saviours, not threats.

"The last letter we received had said that the Lord Commander was presumed dead, along with the majority of the Watch's fighting men, and that a horde of wildlings was descending on the Wall," Davos said. "Your chief steward, Bowen Marsh, seemed quite desperate."

Cotter's eyes flashed. He looked angry for a second. "... I fear Bowen Marsh may have written in haste, m'lord," he said. "Lord Commander Mormont and his expedition did return safely. He broke the wildling host at the Frostfangs and returned victorious. There is no attack against the Wall."

There was a long moment of quiet. Davos blinked.

Oh, he thought dumbly.

Oh.

Heading north had been Davos' last gamble. It was a gamble that he had just lost.

Cotter Pyke appeared to reach a decision. "We thank King Stannis very much for his support, m'lord," he said. "And we are happy to feed and shelter him for the night, but I'm afraid I must await the Lord Commander's orders before I am able to make any decisions on behalf of the Night's Watch."

The words were polite, but also guarded. Davos wasn't sure how else to respond except to nod. "However..." Cotter continued. "And I'm terribly sorry, but we won't have enough room at Eastwatch for all of your men." His head tilted. "...Would you mind if the rest of your men waited on their ships? Hope you understand, m'lord."

Davos forced a smile. "Of course."

Cotter Pyke forced a smile as well.

The rest of the exchange was awkward pleasantries, and inquiries to how many rooms they would need. Cotter left early with the maester, saying that he needed to send an urgent raven. The other men of the Night's Watch stayed to help Stannis' forces disembark. None of them smiled.

Davos' heart was pounding as he returned to the ship.

Stannis was wroth.

"Excuse me?" The King said in a hard, cold voice. "They don't want me here?"
Davos hadn't used those words, but Stannis picked up on the meaning pretty quickly. "I think they fear that sheltering you will make them a target."

"Remind them of their duty," Stannis growled.

"I think they already know," Davos admitted. "The Night's Watch must take no side in the affairs of the realm – they are neutral, Your Grace. They fear that harbouring you threatens that neutrality."

"We came to help them." Stannis' voice was a snarl.

_Apparently they don't need us_, Davos thought, but he stayed quiet.

The King paced his cabin - a mostly bare cabin, Stannis had never been one for luxury. "… Lord Davos," he said, his voice turning as cold as steel. "May I remind you that if we are turned away here, that we have no seat to return to?" He glared. "I need a position on which to retake the north!"

Davos took a deep breath. His heart was pounding. _My fault_. "I am sorry, Your Grace," he muttered.

Stannis looked furious. Davos stared at the ground, words failing him.

We have four thousand men, Davos almost said. If they wanted Eastwatch, they could take it easy enough. Still, they couldn't fight against the Night's Watch – that would be unforgivable. _But if the sworn brothers turned us away, where else could we go?_

White Harbour, perhaps? What if they received no warmer a welcome there? White Harbour was a strong and thriving town; it wouldn't fall easily, and Stannis would earn himself no friends trying to take it. The north was supposed to be their chance to launch a new campaign, but with nowhere to base it from…

Davos watched Stannis' jaw clenched as he stared out from the captain's cabin. He could tell Stannis was thinking the same things. If the Night's Watch asked them to leave – and they might, if they thought Stannis was a threat to them – then Stannis would have no choice to either fight and stay, or leave without any place to return to. Davos wasn't sure which one would be the worst option.

At this rate, they would either have to hope that the northern houses declared for them quickly, or they might end up on a camped on a coast somewhere, with no shelter and no protection when the Boltons came for them…

_Leaving Dragonstone might have been a grave mistake_, Davos cursed to himself. His finger stumps grasped at his neck where his luck used to be. _I hinged Stannis' only hope on nothing but an old letter and a hunch…_

"… I will not let the Night's Watch leave my men vagrant, Lord Seaworth," Stannis said after a long pause. "I need a base of operations, and Eastwatch will do. Make sure you they are aware that we are here to help them."

_Or else_. "Yes, Your Grace," Davos said, lowering his head.

"It is no fault of your Onion Lord, Your Grace," Melisandre said. Her voice was as smooth as silk as she stepped into the cabin. "He gave you good counsel. We have merely arrived too early."
Stannis glared at her. "Too early for what?" His voice was low.

"The great battle, of course." Her red lips smiled. She seemed pleased with herself. "The fires burn strong here. R'hllor has gifted me a vision clearer than any I've had before."

Her silk robes draped across the ground. The ruby on her throat seemed to glow in the flickering torchlight. "I have seen the enemy that we must defeat – the champion of the Great Other himself. He readies himself now, clad in snow and ice and darkness. When he comes for us, I've seen the sun blocked out and the seas frozen solid. He is the enemy that we are he to defeat."

"What is this enemy?" Stannis said bitterly. "Another one of your riddles?"

"No, Your Grace." Melisandre's smile widened. "The enemy appears as a young boy – about seventeen years of age. He has a solemn face, grey eyes, and bone white hair. He is the champion of winter and darkness, and the foe that you must defeat."

---

Jon

Eleven days later and Jon was walking through the cold pine forest. The cold never stopped, but Jon could barely feel it anymore.

Jon had heard that only the best rangers could survive beyond the Wall by themselves. It had been nearly three months since the Others attacked the wildling camp now. Jon had already travelled to the frozen wastes and back twice now.

Then again, he had never really been by himself.

He could feel Ghost prowling in the distance. He was hunting a boar over by the river, and hopefully there would be enough meat for Jon too. Game was sparse in these woods, but it was much easier than it had been in the mountains. Phantom was behind Jon, hunting near the rear and watching for pursuers.

The Haunted Forest had been a welcome sight. The forest provided cover from the white walkers, and it shelter from the storms. The Others had never stopped following them, but they could lose them more easily in the trees.

The air was cool and crisp in the morning sun. Jon walked over the fresh snow, staring at the stream dripping through the frosty woods. In a few miles, the stream would feed into the Antler River and lead towards the coast. It was the first sign that Jon was getting close.

His bad leg felt stiff. It always did in the cold mornings. He tried flexing it weakly to work up strength, but he was still limping badly as he moved over to the stream to fill up his canteen.

Jon's goat, Hullen, died five days ago. That had been unfortunate – but a goat, even a large goat, was a poor mount and unfit for carrying a man. Jon had rode him too far and too hard; pushing Hullen to the point of exhaustion and beyond until eventually the goat finally lost his footing, fell and cracked his leg. In the end, there had been little choice but to cut the animal's throat to end his misery, and then burn his body. Jon still shuddered with the thought of feeling the goat's pain like that.

It had been a week of hard travel on foot since. In the water, Jon stared at his reflection and he barely recognised himself. He was unshaven, and rapidly growing a shaggy beard of white hair. The white hair made him look ten years older. His face was still pale and gaunt. Too many restless nights on the move.
Jon took a deep breath, slowing staring at his hand. He stared at the missing little finger on his left hand often. I'll reach Hardhome soon. There will be a chance to rest at the peninsula.

He had been taking shelter every night at a different heart tree. The heart trees were littered all over the Beyond-the-Wall, and something about them kept the Others away. The presence of the Old Gods must still have some power to deter white walkers. It didn't block them, but they still seemed reluctant to approach the weirwoods.

Often, there had been ravens leading him to the heart trees too. There had also been ravens alerting him to any danger approaching. The ravens were always following, giving aid and guidance however they could. The three-eyed crow's assistance was one of the reasons Jon had managed to make it so far.

Jon's hands clenched. It would be the new year soon, if it hadn't already passed. Months with barely any human contact. He could only imagine how Sam, Grenn, Edd and the others were doing. Robb, Sansa, Bran, Rickon, Arya.

And Ygritte…

There was rustling in the bushes. Jon's hand instinctively went to his sword. Something approached.

Not the Others. They never made so much sound.

"I'm telling ya, I saw it," a voice growled. "Biggest wolf tracks I ever saw, right this way…"

He heard footsteps. Jon counted at least four. Wildlings. Free folk.

There was nowhere to hide. Jon never moved. He saw a man's face twist in surprise as he walked through the trees. They stared at each other.

"Oi," the wildling called. "Company."

I've been in the wild for a month. My cloak is more grey than black. I don't look like a crow.

Other wildlings walked out of the bushes. Six of them. They were all armed, but they gripped their weapons loosely. Jon saw axes and mauls as well as spears and bows. Raiders. A warband, maybe.

"Hail," one of the wildlings called to Jon. A broad man with a bushy brown beard, in a sewn sheepskin cloak, clutching a stone axe in one hand a wicker round shield in the other. "Where you coming from?"

Jon paused. His voice felt gruff. "North." That was the truth, at least.

"How far north?" He demanded.

"Too far."

Another wildling scoffed. "You look like you've seen the dead, mate."

Jon met his gaze. "Aye."

They shared glances, a dark ripple going through the group. I need to learn what happened to the wildling army. Last he saw the Others were tearing them apart. The clans must have scattered, but he had no idea had happened to Mance, Longspear or Tormund. Or Ygritte. Ygritte. The three-eyed crow said he'd look after you, but…
"… I rode with Mance Rayder's host," Jon announced after a pause.

The man nodded. "Thought so. A lot of men with empty eyes came back from there. You fled by yourself?"

Jon nodded, and then asked. "What happened to Mance?"

"Dead," he said gruffly, before shrugging. "Most likely, anyways. The host scattered. Mance ran. Last I heard, he got ambushed by the crows after the dead sent them fleeing. The 'king's' head is probably on a spike by now."

"Is there a camp nearby?" Jon asked, trying to sound desperate. He wanted to appear to be just another fleeing wildling. He didn't have to try too hard.

"Yeah, the Weeper leads a force of five hundred of us down by the Antler. We're building ships to cross the Bay of Seals," the man explained, looking at Jon critically. "You know anything about shipbuilding, mate?"

The other wildling, the one with the rough beard, held out his hand. "Hold on now," he growled. "We've already got five hundred and that's a lot of mouths to feed and a lot of boats to craft. I'm not too keen on adding an extra one, myself." He stared at Jon. "Why exactly should we take you with us?"

"I can fight."

"So can a lot of men. You got anything to pay your wage?"

"Leave it, Sten," the other wildling warned.

"Like hell I will," the wildling, Sten, snapped, before turning back to Jon. "If we're going to be the ones to recruit this traveller…” He said the word in mocking. "…into our venture, then I think it's only fair that we get a recruitment fee."

The mood turned dark. Sten hoisted up his axe dangerously. A few of the others did the same. Jon glanced around the group. Some looked more unwilling about the ransom, but none looked ready to object. "… I have nothing to pay," said Jon.

"That's a nice sword you got," Sten challenged, glancing at Dark Sister. It was too far for him to really tell how nice his sword actually was. "Good steel always rare. Nice furs, too."

"Then if I don't want to pay?"

"Mayhaps we just leave you here then." His eyes narrowed. "Or mayhaps we take payment from your corpse."

They were all clutching their weapons tightly. Six against one.

"Let's just leave it," the free folk objected, weakly. "The Weeper wanted as many men as possible."

Jon took a deep breath, and closed his eyes. His body never even twitched. It was getting easier and easier. "The sword is not for sale."

"And what's to stop me from just killing you and taking it, then?" Sten snarled. He had his axe. It was a big axe.

Jon slowly opened his eyes. He carefully adjusted his stance. "... Well... for starters..." he said, drawing out the words. All weapons were readied. "... I think my friend would object."

"And what friend is that?"

Jon smiled.

They all heard the crash. The sound of splintering trees. The wildlings shouted, flinching backwards. The growl was so low and so deep it rolled over the clearing.

Jon never moved. He felt the cold breath on the back of his head as Sonagon's head emerged from the trees. The dragon growled, with sharp white teeth as long as swords. There was a cool mist steaming from his jaws.

The tall pine trees were barely tall enough to fit Sonagon's body. The forest's trees had reduced the dragon's manoeuvrability significantly, yet the dragon had still made good progress. The white dragon towered over them all.

The wildlings eyes widened in pure terror. He heard curses from the Old Tongue. The wildling called Sten looked ready to collapse.

There was a faint hiss of steam as one of the men pissed themselves.

"Like I said," Jon announced, drawing Dark a smooth arc. "My friend."

"By the gods..." Sten gasped, staggering backwards. His axe wasn't big enough.

A wildling turned to run. "Nobody move!" Jon ordered. At that moment, Sonagon roared. The roar caused snowflakes to fly off the ground. A couple of men whimpered.

*They are big strong men, Jon thought. They all look like veterans of many hunts, many raids and battles... and they are whimpering.

Jon stared at Sten. Wildlings generally didn't scare easily. These men were terrified. "Now then..." Jon said. "Tell me about this camp."

Ten minutes later, when they were done babbling, Jon let the men run away. He didn't care to kill them, and in all likelihood there were others that would have heard Sonagon's roar in any case.

*I have to be careful. *Five hundred men led by Weeper. The Weeper was a sadistic bastard who never liked Jon from the beginning. Jon doubted anything would have changed there.

Sonagon watched the men run through curious, beady eyes. They were the first living men besides Jon that the dragon had seen. Jon glanced at the dragon with concern.

Right now, Sonagon was more vulnerable than he had ever been. In the Haunted Forest, on the ground, Sonagon was severely restricted. The trees were proving severe obstacles to a dragon of Sonagon's size. They stopped him moving, like a wooden bars of a cage on all sides. The dragon's size became so much more of a hindrance moving through the forest.

If Sonagon was ever attacked from all directions – by strong men who knew the terrain – then the forest could prove the dragon's doom. The dragon needed open areas to fight properly.

A grounded dragon was a vulnerable dragon. A caged dragon even more so.
The Weeper could prove a serious threat if he was so inclined to go dragon hunting. If five hundred strong wildlings attacked the dragon from all sides, using the trees to stop Sonagon from turning or moving properly, then that could be very, very dangerous.

There was no choice; Jon had to keep Sonagon safe at all costs.

But still, Jon thought with a grimace, to backtrack further through the forest could put us in even more danger. Jon had been aiming for the clear path offered by the river for some time now. He needed to get to the coast quickly.

There were five hundred free folk. They were wildlings that might endanger Sonagon, but they could also help protect him. The wights had been getting more frequently. The Others were on his trail already, likely preparing for a large assault.

Jon bit his lip. If I could convince the Weeper that he needs the dragon's aid, if I could turn a potentially dangerous enemy into a friend instead…

There were only two things that any free folk would accept: protection from the Others, and a way to cross the Wall. Sonagon could potentially offer both.

It had been something that Jon had been thinking about for some time now. The free folk might be the best chance the North had to stop the Others – but only if they worked with the Night's Watch on the right side of the Wall.

The Watch needed men to hold the Wall, and the wildlings were the largest army around that might help.

It was nigh-treason, Jon knew. Many of his sworn brothers would curse him for even suggesting it. They had fought against the wildlings for centuries, and now Jon was thinking about ways he could bring them south of the Wall.

"I took a vow," he said aloud, musing to himself. The sworn brothers might insist that he eliminate all wildlings now. The Weeper most definitely deserved death – the Weeper had killed as many rangers as Alfyn Crowkiller ever did. The Weeping Man was said to collect crow's eyes.

And yet I promised the three-eyed crow that I would do whatever it takes to stop the Others. Both the free folk and the sworn brothers are fighting the same enemy.

The true enemy are the white walkers, he thought. The enemy of all living. The problem is just getting everyone else to accept that.

There was choice between either facing wildlings or facing the Others, and that wasn't really a choice at all.

That settled it. Jon motioned to Sonagon, and the dragon was getting better and better and following his commands.

"Come on," Jon motioned, waving wildly with his arms. He knew that the dragon had fairly poor vision at short distances – any hand directions had to be greatly exaggerated.

The dragon's limbs staggered forward. For such a large creature, Sonagon's body was surprisingly serpentine and flexible, but he still had to squeeze through the narrow tree trunks.

The wood cracked and splintered as the dragon lumbered between them, hissing quietly. Jon waved his hands, motioning towards him. Sonagon hissed as he lowered his head and neck down towards the ground. Jon grabbed a rope dangling off Sonagon's horn with both hands, placing his foot against Sonagon's scales as he heaved himself upwards.

He had to make an appearance here. Jon didn't want to be on foot when facing the Weeper. Jon had found that the top of the dragon's head, between the horns and above the crest was one of the better places to sit. It was awkward climbing and an uncomfortable seat, but Jon had even fastened an old hemp rope around one of Sonagon's horns to help him climb up. He had fastened another rope between the horns to give him something to hold on to.

Sonagon was large enough to lift Jon on his head with ease, but it was still a dangerous and uncomfortable position. Sonagon would often sway and lash his head violently, making the seat unstable and dangerous – particularly when Sonagon would bite and snap in battle. The dragon's neck was very flexible and he could move it like a whip. A safer seat place to mount was on the dragon's back, between the dragon's wings, but that was even more difficult to climb onto. It could still be difficult just to get the dragon to stay motionless for long enough to climb up.

Still, Jon suspected that Sonagon was warming too him. By nature, the dragon wasn't kind or soft, but the dragon was snapping at him less and warging more easily. Mostly, it was because Jon had saved his life several times. The dragon likely would have starved if Jon hadn't have used Ghost to find meals for him, or warned him about the Others. Jon had spent long, difficult days treating the wounds on Sonagon's body, or pulling broken arrows out of its hide.

It had been hard, long work caring for the dragon. Looking after a large, injured and starving dragon while an army wanted it dead had proved no easy feat.

Time to for Sonagon to return the favour, Jon thought, clutching on tightly as Sonagon started to move. The dragon's nostrils sniffed at the air. He was hungry again. Hopefully he wouldn't think of humans as food, but it still made Jon a bit more nervous.

There was no choice. He gripped on to the rope tightly as the dragon lumbered and started to move, crunching through the pine trees in the direction that the men ran. It wasn't long before Sonagon picked up on the trail of the camp.

They saw Jon long before he them. He heard the shouting first through the trees – the cries and alarms, both in the Common and Old Tongues – and then later he saw the figures moving through the trees.

The wildling camp had been built into a notch in the Antler, cradled by the river where the two fork met. The current was slow, but the river was wide. Around the camp, there were the stumps of trees and gashes through the forest. The free folk had been lumbering trees by the hundreds.

He saw movement through the trees. Jon grimaced, while Sonagon staggered forward. The great white dragon kept its head low, long neck slithering over the ground, while its legs struggled to squeeze through the foliage. There was the sound of wood crunching all around him as the smaller trees snapped and cracked under Sonagon's size. Each step was long, slow and lumbering.

It was the men Jon was more concerned about, though. The wildlings had set up sharpened spikes stabbed into the ground as palisades to defend the camp. Scattered through them, he glimpsed figures in mottled furs pulling back arrows notched on large bows.

Jon jumped up instantly. If even a single person fired, it could prompt an instant battle. If Sonagon went a wild not even Jon was sure he could stop him – the dragon had a temper. Let's not make this bloody.
"The first person to fire an arrow dies!" shouted Jon at the top of his lungs. He had spent enough time pulling arrows out of Sonagon, he never wanted to remove any more.

There was a ripple of hesitation. All eyes were fixed on the ice dragon prowling through the trees. "Bring me your leader!" Jon demanded. Stay strong. The free folk will only ever respect strength. "I wish to talk!"

Jon kept himself as straight at his awkward footing would allow, urging Sonagon to stay still. The dragon growled softly, but he didn't move. He could smell the hostility from the men.

There were a few minutes of frantic movement. Jon's hands were twitching as he gripped the rope tightly. Jon needed to negotiate from a position of strength, but he was also wide open. On top of Sonagon's head, he was a clear target for bowmen. A single arrow could take Jon down right now…

_They shoot me and Sonagon goes berserk_, Jon thought firmly. He just had to hope the wildlings realised that too.

After nearly three minutes, Jon saw the figures walking out of the camp. Seven figures, all of them clutching bronze swords or axes. The man at the front had a wicked curved iron scythe that swept backwards. Jon would have recognised him anywhere.

The Weeper looked exactly how Jon remembered; a short, but heavyset man with fair blond hair and a face permanently fixed into a heavy frown. He was constantly scowling, as if his face was fixed that way. He was an ugly man nearing middle-aged, with filthy hair and whiskers. He wore blackened leathers and motley animals skins piled over him, with bronze disks sewn into the tunic. His cloak bore a grotesque of a face painted red; a demonic face with a mouth of fangs and empty, weeping eyes.

The Weeper himself had weak, watery eyes that were constantly crying. The Weeper had been born crying, apparently - some kind of affliction or eye infection. He even occasionally wept blood. There had been many that had mocked him for his eyes, but a life of mocking had turned the Weeper cruel, hard and vicious. There were few raiders as feared – the Weeper kept a chain of human eyeballs from the men he had mutilated.

A favourite game for the Weeper used to be to capture rangers, Jon recalled. The Weeper would cut out the ranger's eyes, and sent them back blind. Watchers on the Wall that couldn't watch, the Weeper was said to have chuckled.

Now, the Weeper's eyes were wide and stunned as he stared upwards at Sonagon with a mixture of disbelief and horror. Even the other free folk next to him, all battle hardened warriors, looked scared.

The Weeper was at the front, clutching his scythe in both hands. ". . . What is this beast?" He demanded, his voice a roar. "And who are you?"

"This is Sonagon. A dragon," Jon shouted. There was about fifty feet between them, while Jon was twenty feet off the ground atop the dragon's head. "And he will not hurt anyone unless I tell him to."

"You control that thing?" There was just a slight quiver of uncertainty in his voice.

"He listens to me," Jon replied.

A few glances. "What is your name, boy?"
"I'm looking for refuge," Jon shouted, not answering the question. "We've come from far north; we're heading to the coast. I want to discuss terms!"

Watery eyes narrowed. "Terms of what?"

"The cost of our assistance!" Jon hesitated, the words almost catching in his throat. "... If you ever want to cross the Wall, then you will listen to what I say."

That got his attention. Those words made the whole conversation shift. The Weeper gripped his scythe a bit tighter, twisting on the wrapped leather handle. He paused, watery eyes flickering.

"... Then let's talk. Face to face," The Weeper demanded. "You leave that monster behind. Come into our camp alone. And if that monster makes a move, I will put it down!"

Jon hesitated, but there was no choice. The discussion would go poorly unless Jon treated with him face to face. Jon would have to go down there himself. Let the Weeper save face by threatening Sonagon, I need his help here, not his ire.

"Alright," Jon called. "Let's do this reasonably – I want your word on your honour that I will be granted safe passage to your camp unmolested."

"Fine, you have it."

"Good." The Old Ways were strong in the north; the free folk lived and died by their word. Still, Jon added, "... Sonagon will keep you to that promise if the Old Gods do not."

Jon scrambled awkwardly to the rope hanging off the dragon's horn. Sonagon shifted and growled slightly.

"... Easy, Sonagon," Jon soothed, clutching the rope as he started to climb down. "Just stay here. I won't be long and I'll be back soon. Stay here."

It took a few awkward minutes to clamber down. Jon's leg felt suddenly sore, limping worse than usual as he approached. The Weeper's eyes narrowed; taking in Jon's white hair and gaunt face, his bad leg.

Up close, the men were so much bigger than him. Still, they all kept their distance cautiously, staring at Jon if he were some legendary snark or grumpkin. "How do you control that thing?" Weeper demanded.

"I'm a warg," Jon said simply, his hand near his sword cautiously.

"Bah!" The Weeper grunted, spitting on forest floor. He acted as if that word explained everything.

He let Jon walk in front, while the Weeper walked behind. Two of his men stayed behind to watch the dragon, while the others flanked behind and around Jon. They all had to wait as Jon limped slowly with his poor leg.

In the camp, he was met with dozens more warriors clutching weapons, but also many women and children. They were all staring at Sonagon, and at Jon, with hushed voices and panicked eyes. The dragon was a huge white shape looming between the pine trees.

Jon saw free folk from a dozen different clans – there were hornfoots, nightrunners, cave dwellers, men from frozen shore, the lakes. Men from a hundred random clans. They had all just ended up together when Mance's army broke – all refugees who had fled with the Weeper's warband.
The boats that they were building hung by the river's edge. The free folk were poor shipwrights. The boats were barely more than barges built of large logs roped together — eight large barges and a ninth still under construction. Five hundred men, would they try to fit fifty per barge?

Jon supposed the ships were the best chance they had left to get so many people across the Wall now. With Mance's army broken, they lacked the men to take the Wall, and risking the Bay of Seals was the only choice. They had camped by the Antler to chop wood from the Haunted Forest, and when the boats were done they could float them down the river and out to sea, around the coast and to the south. It wasn’t even a bad plan — the sea patrols from Eastwatch were very poor of late — but Jon would still be surprised if even half of the people here made it across.

"You avoided giving me a name," Weeper noted, lowering his scythe fractionally as they ended camp. "Who are you loyal to? What clan are you from?"

"I have no clan," Jon replied, stopping in the centre of the camp. There were men gathered around him. "I am loyal to Sonagon, and he's loyal to me. As for the name... My name is Jon Snow."

The Weeper paused. Jon saw the recognition dawn in his eyes. With Jon's changed appearance, he wasn't surprised it took the Weeper so long to recognise him.

He cursed in the Old Tongue. "I know you," the Weeper growled. "You're that crow."

The very word made the men around them hoist up their weapons a little higher. "That deserter crow that Mance Rayder brought in," said the Weeper. "I should have taken your eyes when I had a chance — fucking Mance was always soft on you."

"If you had done that, you'd have nothing but a pair of eyes," said Jon. "Whereas right now I'm offering a chance to get your people across the Wall."

"And why the fuck would I trust a turncoat crow?"

"What choice do you have? You're going to sail across the Bay of Ice on barges. If you meet a storm, you'll all die. Even you don't, I imagine the cold water and wind will still take most of you. You're gambling with the patrols either way. I'm offering another choice."

The Weeper stormed forward. He wasn't a very tall man, but something about him could still tower. His eyes were wide and wild, with tears leaking down his face.

"... No, no, no..." The Weeper snarled. "I don't buy it. I never bought your fucking story. I never trusted you the minute you came into Mance's camp."

Suddenly, he gripped Jon's collar roughly, pulling Jon's face close. Every weapon twitched. Jon was suddenly staring into the man's grizzled face, noses so close they might touch.

"It's in the eyes, boy. I can see who you are in the eyes, and you've always looked like a crow to me."

Jon forced himself to stay still. The Weeper looked crazy. Jon could struggle, but that would only give the Weeper an excuse to cut his throat. "You should let go off me right now," Jon said quietly, forcing himself to stay calm. *Can't let this become a fight, stay calm..."

"Oh aye?" He growled. "Why should I?"

Sonagon chose that moment to growl — a long, dangerous growl that rumbled the earth. Jon could feel the rumble as the dragon stepped forward slowly. The Weeper's gaze flickered, but he still didn't let go.

"... I knew you were bullshit the minute I saw you," the Weeper continued in a dangerously low voice. "I knew you weren't one of us, not really. I just never said anything cause I always figured Mance would be the one to get burned by you, not me. I don't trust any fucking crow." He nearly spat the word. "Give me one good reason why I should trust you?"

"You need me."

"No. Not even close." He looked insane. "It's that... that dragon that I could use, not you. You're totally useless to me."

"I'm the only one who can control the dragon," Jon gasped, feeling the Weeper's hands tighten, so tight he could barely breathe. Jon could go for his sword, but he would be dead before he drew it. Maybe he could have taken the Weeper alone, but the Weeper had a dozen men around him. Jon had Sonagon, but the dragon was further away.

"Maybe. Maybe not. You're not the only warg around, boy. Did you know that Varamyr Sixskins still lives? He's supposed to be the greatest skinchanger alive. Now I don't really trust him either, but I'll pick him over you any day." The Weeper's face twisted. "Now maybe I just kill you right here. Maybe I reach out to Varamyr and get him to control your dragon for me. Maybe you're totally unnecessary right now."

Sonagon was still growling, taking a few warning steps closer. Men were panicking slightly, rushing the defences with bows and spears, while the Weeper kept on gripping Jon tightly.

"Kill me and you'd be dead before I hit the ground," Jon warned. Sonagon was still rumbling closer. Men were shouting, notching bows and running with spears, but with each step the dragon took the earth rumbled...

"I think I'll be dead anyways if I listen to you," the Weeper snarled. "I think you're just trying to use us. Now why would I ever believe a crow when he says he says he's going to help us across the Wall?"

Jon hesitated. Wrong one move and the Weeper really was mad enough to kill him, dragon be damned.

"... I'm looking at your eyes, boy," the Weeper warned. "If you give me any fucking bullshit that you've abandoned your brothers, I kill you right now. Tell me, why the fuck should I trust you?"

Jon met his gaze, gasping slightly. One wrong word...

"... Because I've seen the real enemy. I've fought the real enemy." Jon's hands scrambled, pulling up his furs over his chest. The Weeper stopped, staring at the ugly red scar on Jon's chest, under his clearly visible ribcage. "... And I've felt the real enemy's blade. You're not my enemy, not anymore..." Jon shook his head. "All men must stand together against the cold."

The Weeper was silent for a long time, staring into Jon's eyes. Then, with a grunt, the Weeper let go of Jon and stepped backwards two paces.

Through the trees, Sonagon stopped growling. Jon felt himself release a breath he never even realised he was holding.

"Alright then," the Weeper said finally, dropping his scythe and folding his arms. "Let's talk. Tell us, crow, how are you going to get us across the Wall?"
"I have a dragon. My dragon has wings. Sonagon could fly us south, straight over the Wall."

The Weeper shook his head. "I can't see it fly. I don't think you'd be walking through the woods if it could fly, in fact. I do see wings – but chickens have wings too and they can't fly. Come on, let's see the dragon fly!"

"He can't," Jon admitted. "Not right now. His wings are wounded, but he's healing. As soon as his wings are healed then he could fly us across the Wall."

"Bah!" The Weeper spat. "So that's your game? You want us to wait and take care of your little dragon while its wings heal. No, I don't buy it. You approached us, crow. You want something from us."

Jon hesitated. "... We're being hunted. The white walkers have been chasing us for a while now, and sooner or later they'll catch up. I got lucky rescuing Sonagon once, but they won't make the same mistake again. We need protection." He paused. "And we need food. Sonagon is hungry – he can't fly, he can't hunt, and I can't feed him by myself. We need help."

Slowly, Weeper's face twisted into an evil sneer. "Oh yeah. That's more like it. That's perfect." He stared angrily. "Let me get this straight, crow; you want us to lay down our lives keeping you and your dragon protected and well-fed. You want free folk to bleed protecting you and your pet. And you want us to do all that on nothing more than the promise that later you will eventually fly us south of the Wall?"

"You followed Mance on the promise that he would lead you south."

"You are not Mance!" The Weeper's voice was a snarl. Around him, the wildlings shifted. The air was tense.

Don't let him control flow of the conversation, Jon thought with a grimace. Every free folk would make their own decision who to follow, and they would follow whoever looked the strongest.

"I can protect you!" Jon shouted, turning slightly to face the crowd of surrounding wildlings. Everyone else was silent. "We all know that the cold winds are rising! You were there at the Frostfangs when the army broke! They cut through you and their army became larger for it. A hundred thousand free folk couldn't stand up against the dead!" His eyes were hard. "... But the dragon can! The ice dragon might be the only creature left in the world the Others are afraid of! They spent weeks hunting it because they are afraid. Stand with me, and maybe we can stop the cold winds together!"

There were a few nervous glances. The free folk would not bend easily – they would only follow the man. Jon's heart was pounding as he turned, looking at each one in turn. "Follow me and I will get everyone across the Wall!" He promised, wishing that it would be so easy. "Follow me and we can leave the Others behind! Every person we save, that's one less person the Others can kill and raise. Once less body for their army! Let the Others waste their strength against the Wall, and together lets hold back the Long Night for another ten thousand years!"

Every face he stared at was hard, but Jon could feel the mummer going through the crowd. The Weeper scowled.

"Is that right?" The Weeper growled. "We both want to stop the Others, crow – aye, I believe that. That might be the only thing we've got in common. That might be the only reason I haven't killed you yet."
The Weeper took a step forward. "But let's say that I trust you," he said slowly. "Let's say you that keep your promise. Let's say that you don't just fly away and discard us as soon as you can." His face twisted. "Let me tell you, crow, as soon as me and my men arrive south, let me tell you the very first thing that I'm going to do…" His voice turned dangerously low. "… I'm going to murder every fucking crow I can find."

The statement was met by a few cheers from the crowd. Jon's stomach clenched. There was pure bloodlust in the words. Am I making a huge mistake here? Trying to ally with wildlings…

The Weeper was pacing, growling. "In fact, I'm going to storm Castle Black with every man, woman and child I can find. I'm going to butcher every crow in that castle, and I'm going to hoist those gates wide open. And I'm going to fight to my last fucking breath to keep them open for as long as I fucking can." Some of the free folk banged approvingly on their shields. "I'm going to open those gates and I'm going to let every living person in the north go through them. Every single free folk – I'll open the door to bring them south and I'll fight every bloody kneeler that tries to stop me!"

The crowd erupted into cheers. The free folk were banging weapons against the ground approvingly. The Weeper's grin was all teeth as he approached Jon.

"… So my question to you, crow…" The Weeper continued. "… Are you happy with that?"

There was a deathly edge to the question. Jon knew that telling the truth could likely cost him his life. Still, he did it anyways.

"No," Jon admitted. "If you tried to kill the sworn brothers of the Night's Watch, I would be forced to fight against you."

The Weeper's watery eyes flashed victoriously. "… However," said Jon, carefully. "If the men of the Night's Watch led an attack against you, then I would fight against them as well."

The Weeper shook his head. "No. You can't have it both ways, boy. It's us or them. Pick a side."

"I'm on the side of the living. Always the living," said Jon. "Never the dead."

"Bold words. Stupid, but bold."

"… I took a vow," said Jon. The three-eyed crow would hold him to that vow. "I vowed to do whatever it takes to stop the Others. To stop them, we need more south of the Wall, not north of it. When the free folk are south, the white walkers will run out of corpses for their army. Less bodies for them, more bodies to fight against them. To stop the Others, I must save the free folk." He nodded. "The sworn brothers must see that too."

He met the Weeper's gaze. "And we need the Night's Watch," he said firmly. "When Others try to go south, the Night's Watch must hold the Wall. If you are to live in the south, then you will need the Night's Watch too."

"And when the Night's Watch try to kill us?"

"I'll convince them not to," Jon said. Disbelieving silence met the statement. "We make peace with the Night's Watch. We convince them to let the free folk pass, and then together can we face back the Long Night." If Jon said it firmly enough, he might almost believe it. "There are lands south of the Wall. The Gift – they are rich lands that belong to the Night's Watch. They will let you settle on the Gift, and in return we will stand together against the Others."
His face flashed dark. "You want us to kneel?"

"I want you to survive," Jon countered. "You don't have to bend the knee, but I expect the free folk to fight. To fight against the cold that threatens us all." He met the Weeper's eyes. "You were at the Frostfangs. No army can stand against the Others alone. Only together do we have any chance."

The silence felt deadly. It was the type of silence where Jon half-expected an axe flying through the air at any moment.

Jon focused on the Weeper. The Weeper was the meanest, crueller raider around. Maybe Tormund was stronger, and Mance had been more cunning, but the Weeper was nasty. Few people ever stood against the Weeper; there were plenty of men that could kill you, but the Weeper was vicious enough to do things worse than death. The Weeper wouldn't cut your throat; he would cut out your eyes, rape your skull, and then leave you to starve.

If Jon could convince him, then the other free folk would follow.

The men of the Night's Watch had always said that the Weeper was an insane, sadistic bastard – but the man wasn't a stupid, insane, sadistic bastard…

"Where are you heading?" The Weeper demanded, his ugly face twisting in thought.

"Hardhome," Jon replied. "The peninsula is one of the most defendable locations around."

The Weeper's eyes flickered uncertainly. There was a quiet pause. Something went through the air at the mention of the place. "... I thought Hardhome was deserted," said Jon, with a frown.

"It was." The Weeper nodded. "Up until about a moon ago. Some bloody wood witch - name of Mother Mole -" He spat. "- she's been harping on about the place. She's been ranting on about some prophecy that the free folk would find their salvation there. Men have been flocking to Hardhome for weeks. Crazy, desperate bastards, following a blithering little hag."

Still, there was just a flicker in his voice at that last comment, as if maybe he wasn't so sure anymore.

"Find their salvation?" Jon said slowly. "How?"

"Who knows? Bloody wood witch."

They faced each other for a long time. In the distance, there was a long, slow growl from Sonagon. A gentle reminder that the dragon wouldn't wait forever.

The Weeper paused for a long time, before finally making a decision. "Alright then, crow," he said after a while. "Let's see how much your word is worth." The Weeper turned to the free folk. "We move out, lads! Gather up as much food as you can carry! I want those barges in the water as soon as possible!"

"But the last one isn't finished yet!" A wildling protested, pointing at the ninth, half-complete barge.

"Then you've got six hours to get it done, or you'll stay behind finish it!" The Weeper snapped. "Everyone else, move it scunners! Strike up the tents! As much food as we can carry, and everything else goes on the barges! We move out before dark!"

His voice left no room for argument, and the wildlings already rushing into movement. Jon could feel the frenzied activity spreading around him. "Snow!" The Weeper ordered. "You bring that beast into camp, and I swear by all the gods that if you can't control that thing I'll kill you myself."

"You're going to help me, then?" said Jon.

"I help me and my own," the Weeper snapped. "But let's see how far our interests align, Snow."

The words were echoed by other free folk surrounding them. Grizzled warriors staring firmly at Jon. "I followed a former crow once," an old wildling growled. "But Mance was the best of us. The worst, too. You've got one chance to prove yourself, Snow. Only one."

The mutters of 'Snow' echoed in quiet agreement. Every face was suspicious and distrustful, staring at Jon, but they were moving, packing up camp. "... We were planning out heading out soon, anyways," The Weeper said after a pause. "We'll follow the Antler to the coast alongside the barges, and we can take you to Hardhome. After that... we'll see." His watery eyes narrowed. "If you are nothing more than the piece of dirt I suspect you might be, than I can always just kill you there and continue on to sail across the Bay of Seals like planned."

I'll take it, Jon thought. It meant that he had until they reached Hardhome to prove to the free folk that they should follow him and Sonagon, and not the Weeper.

Around him, Sonagon started moving slowly, sniffing at every object. The men in the camp stared at the dragon with either open astonishment or scrard distance. The dragon was lumbering towards the river, brushing snow off the pine trees with every step.

All of the free folk were staring. Some looked ready to leave the camp altogether. There was muttering in every corner. Jon had no doubt that the word would move quickly across the north. The news of the ice dragon would spread quickly.

Jon was on his way south now. First the free folk would hear of Sonagon, and then the rangers of the Night's Watch shortly afterwards. How long would it be before all the realm was talking about Jon's ice dragon?

The thought sent shivers down his spine.

"To Hardhome, then," Jon said.

"Aye," the Weeper agreed. "To Hardhome."

The free folk were rushing around, gathering everything from firewood, to furs and rope. Sonagon lingered at the edge of the camp, staring at the men scuttling around him like mice. The Weeper hesitated, before pulling up close to Jon and whispering gruffly in his ear.

"If you do mean what you say you do," the Weeper muttered, in a voice for him that was almost gentle. "Then these are your people now. Do right by them."

He stared, turning to face the raider. There was a vicious smile playing at the Weeper's lips. "... And congratulations," he hissed. "You're a wildling now."

Jon knew that the Weeper was mocking him, but still... just that phrase... it still caused knots to squirm in his stomach.

Chapter End Notes
Well, I consider this chapter to be the first of what I'm calling the second arc of the story. First arc was a lot of divergence - setting up the story, introducing the dragon, establishing some pieces - but a lot of it was also Jon lost in the wilderness somewhere, knowing nothing. Now he's heading toward civilisation, and things are going to start changing more. The dragon is heading towards the seven kingdoms, and that means people are going to take notice...

Probably means a lot of screaming, too.
Chapter 11

Chapter Summary

To Hardhome.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Jon

"You ever seen a mammoth fuck before, Snow?" The man asked with a toothy grin, as they walked.

Jon blinked, stopping to stare. The snow was light underfoot, but the muddy terrain still made movement slow. "What?"

"A mammoth. Ever seen mammoths in heat?" The wildling asked, as others around them snickered dryly. Furs was a short, stocky man clad in a cloak of mottled fox fur, with rugged whiskers, narrow-set eyes and two missing front teeth. "You ever watched two mammoths rut?"

Jon wasn't quite sure how to reply, or if the man was mocking him. "Amazing thing, really," Furs continued. "Bull mammoths get really feisty certain times of the year. My mum always used to say - when the mountains are a-rocking, don't go mammoth knocking." The wildlings next to him snorted. "I never understood how it worked, really."

"Your mum never told you that one, eh Furs?" Another snorted. Two-Notch Haldur, Jon recalled.

"Fuck off. I just mean, well, mammoths got those tiny little legs and great bodies," Furs continued. "And great tusks too. Those are bound to get in the way. So when the bull has to mount the cow, well… how does it even reach? How does it work?"

The men sniggered. Furs looked at Jon as if expecting an answer. He never replied. "The reason I ask, is well, mammoths I can kinda picture," Furs continued, with exaggerated hand motions. "But I was just looking at that dragon of yours, and well… how does that one work?"

In the distance Sonagon snorted, blowing cool mist as the dragon waded through the river. The look on Furs face made Jon's mouth drop. The large man next to him – Hatch – was on his knees in boisterous laughter. Furs seemed genuinely curious. Furs was vicious looking man carrying a sharpened stone battle axe, with a look of confusion on his face.

"I'm serious," Furs protested, motioning at the dragon. "I mean, you've got the tail, the wings, the bloody spikes on its back… ! How does he even… you know…" He demonstrated with a series of rough actions. The wildlings howled. "So when that monster of yours meets a she-monster – there must be she-dragons, right? – What, does one have to lie on its back or something? They've got wings – do they fuck in the air you think? Maybe flying upside down or what?"

"Oh hells, now wouldn't that one be a sight!" Another roared, banging a hide shield.

Furs paused. "Wait, is your dragon a him-dragon or a she-dragon?" Furs had a perplexed look on his face. "I never thought to check."

Jon recovered his tongue. "Umm, him-dragon," he said, still staring dumb. Jon had come to refer to Sonagon as a male, but in truth Jon wasn't sure. The genders always seemed so… alien as far Sonagon was concerned.

"Really?" Furs muttered, suspiciously. "I ain't seen no cock…"

Furs had the look of a man on a quest as he walked away. "Furs, everyone!" Hatch guffawed - a great bulk of a man clutching a bone spear. "The seeker of dragon cocks!"

Hatch the Halfgiant and Two-Notch Haldur howled. Jon pushed himself to learn the names. The Weeper's warband were all hardened fighters and raiders. He had been with them for less than two days, but he took care to try and memorise every name he heard. Someday, knowing their names might save my life.

The first night, two men tried to kill Jon. They weren't even subtle about it. Two raiders from the northern ice rivers - men with painted purple skin, bone piercings and sharpened teeth - tried to gut him open right in the middle of the camp. Jon still had no idea why they attacked him, because neither of them spoke the Common. Every other wildling just watched quietly as those men attacked him by the campfire.

After that, Jon took care to keep Ghost close, and Jon forced himself to memorise as many names as possible. He figured it would be harder for men to kill you if you knew their names.

There was Hatch the Hatchgiant, Rolf, Bone Erik, Sten, Haldur Halfwit, Rags, Mharka, Lewie, Stump, Crab Mors, Two-Notch Haldur, Furs, Left-Handed Yoldo, Shieldface, and Ulf Three Blades to name only a few. Some names were so queer that Jon wasn't sure he heard them right, and others he couldn't even pronounce. Hatch the Halfgiant was a man so great he could rival any son of Umber, while Rags walked so quiet with a bone dagger that Jon could never even hear him. Left-Handed Yoldo had only one arm (his right) but was still said to be vicious with a throwing axe, and Rolf had walked the length and width of the Haunted Forest a thousand times, while Two-Notch Haldur was a terrible marksman with a bow, yet Haldur could still notch and fire arrows faster and more continuously than any Jon had ever seen. They made a rough company, but the Weeper had plenty of seasoned and experienced warriors in his band.

They were making good time. The wildling warband spread out across the river valley, pushing along the trails running along either side of the Antler. Five hundred men and women. Running down the river, the nine barges floated in the current – laden with supplies and tents, animal hides as well as lumber, hemp rope and salted meat, berries and winter fruits.

The sails on the barges had yet to be built, so instead they let the current take them. The free folk shuffled along the wooden rafts with great poles to push them down the rocky stream. The Antlers was a wide river - not as deep as the Mander or as fast as the Trident, but long and winding as it snaked through the forest, and filled with river trout moving downstream. Chunks of ice still floated downstream from the mountains, and in the shallows the free folk would wallow in the freezing river, dragging fishing nets or pulling their barges on foot.

The wildlings had used the Antler for centuries. Apparently there were - or at least used to be - at least two dozen wildling clans across the same two mile stretch of river. The river clans had spent decades warring amongst themselves for the same short stretches of river.

Even despite the thick willow trees and rocky groves, the wildlings made good time. The men walking along the riverbank would wait for the barges to catch up the stream. The river was so cold that Jon didn't know how they could stand it, but he still saw wildlings easily jump into the water to swim to and from the rafts, or across the width of the water.

They had no horses or mounts and few livestock. They wildlings relied on the huge barges to carry the bulk of their supplies. A few floated on the rafts, while the rest of the number – men, women, couple of children - trekked alongside in the forests.

Even when they were floating, the wildlings were still constructing their 'ships', Jon saw. The barges were crude chunks of wood, but even on the move men were tying hemp ropes or hacking on pine trees. The barges had no sails – those would have to be built before they reached the sea.

It was such a crude form of shipbuilding Jon half-expected it would cause a southern shipwright to squirm. Yet apparently the wildlings have been building boats this way for centuries, Jon thought to himself, they've even become experienced at it.

Still, no one was concerned about the barges. Not when Sonagon splashed in the water, causing great waves against the riverbanks with every swing of its tail.

Jon was a bit surprised to find the dragon quite enjoyed the river. In places, it was wide enough for the dragon to stretch out its wings, basking in the current. The dragon would waddle in the centre of the stream behind the free folk barges, occasionally snapping playfully at fish. The water was rarely deep enough for the dragon to swim, but he would splash and waddle down the centre of the river, enjoying the space away from the trees.

One night, when Sonagon wanted to rest, the dragon simply took a deep breath and exhumed a gust of cold dragonfire - freezing the water beneath him solid to create a nest of ice to curl up on. That had caused quite a stir; the ice plumed outwards so quickly that it nearly dammed the Antler, causing the water to flood outwards over the banks where the free folk were marching. Then, one of their barges had ended up caught in the fringes of the ice, and had to be hacked out with ice picks.

The Weeper had been furious. He hadn't appreciated the delay, and the ice continuously caused no end of trouble in bringing the barges downstream.

By the third day, they reached a joint where the Antlers pulled in one of its branches, and the river ran thicker and faster with more currents and gushing rapids across the stream. The barges needed ropes to the men on the riverbank to hold them steady to stop the rafts rushing off, while Sonagon seemed to enjoy either lazing on the riverbank or splashing in the rapids.

Jon might have been happy for the dragon, if not for the attitude in the warband. For every man that stared at the dragon with awe, there were another three staring with fear, suspicious or anger.

A few wildlings, like Furs, seemed happy to approach Jon, but most others glared at him from the distance.

Jon had seen the Weeper mutter quietly to his men in huddles, and Jon couldn't help but notice how the Weeper kept men with long sharp spears positioned around Sonagon at all times.

They don't trust me, he thought. I don't trust them. They wouldn't survive to Hardhome at this rate.

On the fourth day, hunters caught a boar in the forest - a great fat one. They set up camp for the night while the men skinned, cut, smoked the game with ruthless efficiency. The prime meat was salted and left aside, while the hide was stripped, the tusks and bones claimed for carving, and absolutely nothing was set aside. The wildlings served smoked boar brain and eyeballs that night.
Jon swallowed his hesitation and ate the meal, staring at the men hunched over the smokeless campfire. Even at night, the wildlings were never still. Some were trekking forward, while the ones camping now would catch up the next day.

"We'll be meeting up with Marthe of Antlers the next day, at this rate," an aging one-eyed wildling next to him commented. Rolf, Jon recalled. He forced himself to try and learn the names. "That cunt."

"Marthe of the Antlers?"

"The river lord, as he likes to call himself," Rolf explained. "Fucking bastard. Him and his clan claimed Stag's Peak for years now. He's got himself a keep and everything."

"Will he be a problem?"

Rolf just grunted. "As if," another wildling - Erik - retorted from Jon's other side. "Marthe's got thirty or so with him, and maybe half a dozen boats. The biggest clan around here, sure, but not enough to stop us. The Weeper will see him off and take his boats, I expect."

"Probably take his daughters, too," Rolf laughed. "I recall Marthe had a couple of pretty ones."

Jon never replied. It was the first he had heard about meeting a rival river clan, but from the looks of things a warband had already been assembled against Marthe. The Weeper is intentionally keeping me in the dark about the journey.

Suddenly, the sound of angry shouts and yells filled the camp, coming from the river. The wildlings were on their feet in a second. Every man and women kept a weapon by their hand at all times.

"No!" A man roared from the riverbank, shaking a stone maul. "Get back! Get away!"

There was the sound of a low growl. Jon's eyes widened as he saw Sonagon looming out of the water, his snout sniffing at one of the barges.

"Fuck off!" A wildling snapped. "That's our bloody meat!"

Dammit. The supply barges. They loaded up the carcass of the boar, along with the other salted fish and game they kept in the barges. Sonagon must have noticed. Jon tried to stop the dragon, but Sonagon was hungry and in no mood to listen. The dragon never did learn the definition of 'other people's property'.

A few men tried to fight Sonagon off, but then the dragon lunged and they all had to leap away into the river. In an instant, Sonagon's claws were tearing the barge off the water, and his great teeth were gnashing through the meat stored within. There was a snap of wood as the barge tore into chunks under enormous teeth.

Men were screaming. He saw torches and spears and arrows. Fuck.

About two weeks worth of rations, as well as a whole barge, gone in a moment.

Jon tried to run, but he couldn't reach the riverbank in time. He saw a wildling throw a spear through the cold air. Sonagon snarled as the barbed tip caught his snort.

"No!" Jon shouted, but he could barely shout loud enough over din. "Don't…!"
More people were throwing spears, even a few arrows, trying to drive the dragon away from the broken barge. Sonagon snapped - the dragon really didn't like spears or arrows. Jon saw the dragon's head pull backwards, and great gushes of cold mist rise from his throat…

"Don't!" Jon shouted, dragging the first man back, jumping into the shallows of the water and raising his arms protectively in front of the wildlings. "Don't!"

Sonagon looked about two seconds away from demolishing the riverbank in dragonfire. Only the presence of Jon caused the dragon to pause. Jon tried to ease the dragon down, but Sonagon felt too angry to listen.

A few of the wildlings behind him tried to run. "Don't move!" Jon shouted, his voice raw. Don't do it Sonagon, please don't. "Stick close to me, or the dragon will kill you!"

And he might kill us all anyways, Jon thought in panic. The mist didn't stop streaming from the dragon's throat, causing the night air to crackle.

"The dragon ate our meat!" A man roared, still clutching a spear, as if ready to throw.

"And now he's about to eat you!" Jon bellowed, striking the man down with a sharp fist. Strong arms grabbed at him. "Are you ready to die over a boar?"

The whole camp was in turmoil, but Jon had eyes only for Sonagon. The dragon was prickly. Sonagon didn't understand mercy, or restraint. Hurt a dragon and you die. The image of the riverbank frozen in icy spikes flashed before his mind. Please Sonagon, Jon begged, don't do it.

After a long pause, Sonagon snarled, lowered his head and splashed away to the water. Jon could have sighed in relief, but then the wildling was up again, on his feet, and slamming the butt of his spear into Jon's stomach.

The brawl lasted a few minutes, splashing in the cold water in the dark. It was so chaotic he couldn't even tell who he was fighting, or how many. By the time it was finally broken up, Jon had a few more bruises.

The Weeper was furious. Nobody died, but a man broke his leg against the rocks jumping into the water. The loss of a good chunk of their supplies meant that the host would be even more hurt for food.

"You said you'd keep that dragon under control!" The Weeper spat, dragging Jon against a tree trunk. His breath was foul. "You said you'd control it!"

"I can't stop him from being hungry!" Jon said with groan, struggling to move.

"And I can barely feed my own men!" The Weeper roared, his sharp fingers digging into Jon's shoulder like knives. "I got a lot of hungry mouths, and a hundred leagues to go! And your dragon eats more than the lot of them!"

Jon groaned, gasping for breath. He grit his teeth, trying to throw the man off. "I can't control Sonagon when he's hungry…" Jon growled. "And we're not feeding Sonagon enough."

Sonagon hadn't been fed enough for a long time, Jon thought with a grimace. The dragon had a lot of mass to feed, and could be very gluttonous at times. The Weeper's eyes were mad and wide. "And what do you suggest?" He growled. "You expect me to let good men starve to feed that thing? Hells, why not feed people to it direct?"
The Weeper glared, spat, and then stormed, his men casting foul stares at Jon. He was left clutching his bruises. Jon froze, and then cursed. He felt like hitting something.

What did I expect in the north? Food is scarce enough as it is, without expecting them to feed a dragon too.

The next morning, everyone kept their distance from the dragon. There were far fouler stares. The Weeper apparently sent out three times the number of hunting parties, and he gave the order that half needed to go to the dragon. Jon still wasn't sure if it would be enough to keep Sonagon placated.

Still, the Weeper also confiscated bronze and iron weapons from two dozen men in the night. There were raiders with hammers crudely smithing metal over campfires. They are crafting long metal spears or bolts, Jon realised. Weapons that may be sharp and long enough to pierce a dragon's scales and cause some damage. They are starting to think about what might happen if they need to go dragon-hunting.

It was a grim day. They set up camp early and made little progress as they waited for the hunting parties.

After dusk, the night turned frighteningly cold. They kept the camp fires and torches burning continuously, but four watchers on the edges of the camp died when their campfires froze over. Other scouts reported movement in the night. Dark shapes and rustling bodies, the smell of death and cold.

They're testing us. The Weeper was careful and kept a tight perimeter, but the Others wielded cold like a weapon. Maybe the white walkers didn't have the forces for an assault, but they still surrounded the camp at night, like a fog of deadly cold. The fires kept them at bay, but Jon knew the Others were out there. How long before they launch a full-scale assault?

Jon spent the night in Phantom's skin, stalking across the night. Jon could taste the fear, tension and distrust simmering in the camp. That sort of fear had a way of boiling over.

Towards the centre, a brawl broke out in the camp – some dispute or old grudge from the Hornfoots against the Lake Clans – and it ended up sucking half the camp into the chaos. Phantom heard the shouting. The brawl only ended when the Weeper stepped in personally.

The Weeper had little patience. The Weeper executed the man who threw the first punch by cutting off both arms with his scythe. That man lasted half an hour, screaming in the centre of the camp, before he finally bled out. Then, the Weeper picked up a severed limb and beat the second man half to death it. The Weeper was gnashing his teeth as he stormed away. The camp turned very quiet after that.

Jon could only watch in quiet horror. There were no more brawls.

Later that night, towards morning, the Weeper's men – discreetly – gathered the corpses and floated the dead bodies of all the men who had died down the river, for Sonagon to swallow. When Jon stared at him, the Weeper only grunted and said it was easier than burning corpses.

Five hundred wildlings, Jon thought. Five hundred raiders each with their own grudges and hatreds. The far north had been at war for so long.

"Furs," Jon called as they stopped the next day. His leg felt stiff. "How many clans are left in the north? How many warbands, how many villages?"
"Well what happened after Mance's collapse?" Jon pressed. "How many survived?"

"They said there were a hundred thousand with Mance," Furs mused. "Personally, I don't know who counted them. I reckon at least a third ended up dead on those mountains."

"A third?" Another grunted - a man with a long shaggy white beard. Jon suspected his name was Ulf or Wulf or something. "Try half, I'd say. Place was a slaughter."

Fifty thousand dead in single night, Jon thought. That number was mind-boggling.

"Not so many," an old spearwife argued. Her name is Mo, Jon remembered. "Lots of corpses, but the camp was large enough that the vast majority could get away. Maybe ten thousand died - the rest scattered either west or east. I reckon most survived."

"Ten thousand the first night, possibly," the other said grimly. "But how many died in the snow and cold in the weeks afterwards?"

Jon tried to remember that night. The fear and the panic. Eventually, there were just so many bodies you couldn't keep count. How many wildlings had been in the north anyway? He wondered. He had thought that Mance's host was huge, but it suddenly occurred to him that that might have been nearly the entire population of the far north. Every single man and woman. How many still remained?

It set a foul mood over the group. As they started moving again, Furs mentioned to Jon, "It ain't so grim," he said with a grunt. "The Frozen Shore always had a good number of tribes, and not even Mance could rally the ice lakes to him. They'll be clans in the mountains buried so deep not even the Others could touch them. The gorge clans will be the last to fall, too. I hear some Thenns still hold out in the north, and who knows how many men could be even further north than that?"

Jon looked at him. Furs just shrugged. "You wondering how many the Others haven't killed, aren't you?"

That and how many they were still yet to kill. "Where are you from, Furs?" Jon asked after a pause. It was weird to think of 'Beyond-the-Wall' as a single place, when in fact it must be as big as the north itself.

"Old Mother's Crock," he replied, and then noticed Jon's confusion. "Up by the north-eastern shores. Bunch of rocks in the coast, call them the Old Mother. Good fishing. Five bigs rocks, five different clans on each one. Did you know that my father spent fifty years fighting for that rock? The folk from Old Mother's Bale used to come down demanding our salmon. My family fought those buggers for fifty years - they lived barely a hundred yards away."

Jon blinked. "...I see."

"Meh, you put a hundred free folk in the room, and they'll be a hundred different wars in a week. Maybe that's why most don't keep to the same place, you know," Furs continued. He motioned up towards Hatch, walking in front. "You see Hatch over there? I don't think he ever lived longer than a couple of weeks in one place. Most are constantly moving – you get clans that trek halfway around the north following the elk each year. And don't ever get me started on the riverfolk; when the trout come, you get a village of three hundred pop up overnight. That village will be gone in two weeks."

"There were villages around the Wall, in the Haunted Forest," Jon said slowly. To call them villages was an overstatement, admittedly. More like hamlets of a few old shacks in the forest.

"Oh, aye some do," Furs agreed. "You also get some clans that lock down so tight - I know folks that I doubt will ever leave a hundred yards from where they were born. But most keep moving all their lives. What's the word? Migratory. We roam like the giants."

Jon never replied. "You ever seen giants roam, Snow? The giants tribes used to herd their mammoths across the whole world. They would go as far as north goes, to hear the tales. No one ever knew how far they went because none could follow them. My grandfather used to tell me about giants and mammoth herds so big that the ground would rumble with their footsteps." There was a soft sigh. "Doubt we'll ever see the like again. Giants don't roam no more."

Jon stayed quiet. He thought back to that moment, so long ago, in the camp next to Ygritte. I am the last of the giants, they had sung at night. You know nothing, Jon Snow.

He thought about thirty thousand, or fifty thousand, or however many wildlings dead in the mountains. He tried to imagine corpses that thick in the snow. More people than I have ever met, more names than I could memorise in a lifetime. It was a scary thought.

The free folk had no government, no organisation. The south had a chance again the Others, but the wildlings had practically none. It would take strong castles and walls to defend against the Others. Fortifications and organised military. The only thing that the free folk had was Mance, and even he failed.

I might be watching the extinction of every single man, woman, and child north of the Wall, Jon thought. That was a mountain of corpses. That's scary.

In the evening, Jon watched the Weeper gather fifty men to scout ahead, to go raid Marthe of the Antlers and steal his boats. It was probably deserved as well; to hear the tales, Marthe had a nasty reputation. Besides, the Weeper did need Marthe's ships. The raiders were almost eager for the battle, for the chance of plunder.

Tens of thousands have died already, Jon thought after a long pause. I can't let anymore die.

He made the decision in a moment. Jon waddled down to Sonagon by the bank, reaching out to the dragon gently. He clambered up onto Sonagon's horn, shivering slightly from the cold water. The Weeper has to cross the bend in the Antlers to reach Marthe, Jon thought, but Sonagon can just go through the river itself.

The water crashed as Sonagon lumbered upwards, rearing to his stubby legs as his forearms reached out. The river splashed with every flick of its tail, but the dragon powered through the river with ease. Jon heard shouts from the riverbank, but Sonagon was already moving, leaving the camp behind.

In an instant, they were charging ahead. They made good time. Jon heard the shouts before he saw the small isle carved into a joint in the river. Stag's Peak 'Keep' was barely a keep at all – Jon would have called it more a cottage of thatch and pine, with river fishing sloops moored onto the muddy bank, skins covering the walls and great firepits dug into the ground. And at the sight of Sonagon lumbering down the river, Jon heard panic.

An arrow whizzed past his head and bounced into Sonagon's shoulder. The dragon roared.

He saw men running around Stag's Peak. River raiders clutching long harpoons and nets, or willow shortbows and barbed arrows. Jon saw a man who must be Marthe himself – a tall, skinny man wearing the great skull of a stag as a helm, elk furs over his shoulders, standing barefoot in the mud. Jon never even gave them a chance.

Sonagon would have killed them all in frozen fire, but, thankfully, Jon convinced the dragon otherwise. Sonagon's tail whipped around, striking like thunder. The thatch roof of the keep crashed open, sending splinters flying. Men crashed to the ground. Jon heard a babe wailing.

Don't give them a chance to protest. Take advantage of the confusion. In an instant, Jon dropped off the dragon's head onto the muddy beach, Dark Sister in his hand. One wildling tried to stop him, but Jon knocked the man to the ground and swept by.

The fight was as sudden as it was decisive. Half a dozen men against one, but Jon was powering through in a furious arc. Valyrian steel slashed through wooden spears. Two men crashed to the ground, and then Jon saw the stag's skull helm in front of him.

Marthe of the Antlers was staggering to his feet when Jon grabbed onto him and pressed Dark Sister into the man's throat. Marthe garbled something sounding almost gibberish.

"There are raiders coming to take everything you own," Jon said, keeping his voice hard. He dragged Marthe down, holding his blade to his skull. An antler cracked. Other raiders were holding weapons, surrounding him, but Jon held their leader hostage and gave no quarter. "You are going to surrender your ships peacefully, along with half of your rations. In return, I will let you walk away with your lives."

"You surrender now!" Jon shouted. "The raiders will not give you this chance."

The wildlings stared at him with the fear of god in their eyes. Marthe looked at him almost babbling in terror. Jon counted twenty-six wildlings; twelve raiders, seven spearwives, two old wives, four children and one babe.

If the Weeper had attacked, the river clan would have tried to fight back and gotten killed in useless defiance. They didn't fight back against the dragon.

Jon met the Weeper's men clambering into Stag's Peak half an hour later. Jon met the man with Dark Sister in his hand. "They surrender," Jon said. "They'll give you safe passage through the river."

The Weeper's eyes looked furious. "Bugger that, you think I'll trust a stinking river scum? Marthe's a slimehole, Snow. These fuckers die."

You're not one to judge. "I said, they surrender. Take their boats, not their lives."

"So they can ambush us again when our backs are turned?" The Weeper snarled. "I know how these river scum work. I'll give them the same mercy they'd give me."

Jon raised his sword, pointing Dark Sister at the man. The Weeper glared, clutching his scythe as he stomped forward. "... Oh Snow..." He hissed. "If you raise your sword against me you'd better be damn sure you know how to use it."

I could take the Weeper. Jon was a better fighter now than he had ever been. Months in the wilderness had left him strong and lean, and he had fought more life and deaths battles in the last weeks than he had all his life. Jon's leg was still weaker, but he had learned how to compensate for it in a fight. I could beat the Weeper. Probably.
But do I want to take that chance?

"They surrender," Jon said. "And you don't have to trust them, because Marthe's coming with us. He's joining the warband."

Nostrils flared. "You let stinking Marthe into my warband!"

"Aye. Marthe wants to see Hardhome too." The man was terrified to be on the wrong side of the dragon. Jon promised him protection if he joined, and vaguely implied that he'd demolish Stag's Peak Keep if he didn't. "You need men and boats; Marthe's got boats, and men who know how to use them. They're coming with us."

The look on the Weeper's face was somewhere between fury and horror. The man's scythe twitched. Jon stepped forward, so close he could whisper. "Pick your battles, Weeper," Jon muttered, meeting the man's eyes. "He's coming with us."

The Weeper growled. "You think you know Marthe, Snow?" He lowered his voice. "You don't know a goddamn thing. You want to know how Marthe got Stag's Peak? He never built it, he took it. Previous men who used to live here was a family of fishermen."

The Weeper almost whispered in Jon's ear, snarling. "Years ago, see, Marthe was a huntsman. He came along these parts, and traded a stag's corpse in return for shelter for night, and passage across the river. Marthe feasted in those fisherman's home, shared their hearth." His voice was venomous. "… Except that stag that he sold was diseased, boy. Marthe was a huntsman – he knew it. The fisherfolk did not. He sold it anyway. Have you ever seen what greyscale does to a man?"

Jon never said a word. He stared across the isle, looking at the tall man with the stag's head crown. "… A week later, when the disease really started to kick in, old Marthe came back," the Weeper whispered. "The men were half-dead when he cut their throats. The women… well… they weren't dead enough for what Marthe did them."

The Weeper's voice turned into a growl. "Now why don't you have a real good look at the type of man you're protecting here, boy?"

Jon paused for a long moment, staring at the hatred in the Weeper's eyes. Guest right. Some things were sacred even to the free folk.

"… Doesn't matter," Jon said after a while, and hating himself slightly for it. "We need more living men, not more corpses."

"And you really think I would suffer scum like that still breathing?"

I suffer you, Jon almost said. "He lives," Jon said. "He comes with us. If he tries anything I cut his throat; but if you try anything now I cut yours."

The Weeper snarled, with a feral grunt, before lowering his scythe and shoving past Jon. "… Next time you raise your sword to me, boy, you better be damn well prepared to bleed for it."

His voice was angry. The other raiders looked uncertain. "Get these bloody boats already!" The Weeper snapped. "Move! If Marthe even looks at me, I take his bloody eyes!"

Jon took a deep breath, sheathing his blade. He turn back to stare at Stag's Peak Keep. I risked my life for half a dozen rafts, a pantry of dried fish, and two dozen wildlings.

They started moving later that day. They were about three days march from the mouth of the Antlers, but they said that it would get faster once they left the forest and onto the coast.

They feasted at Stag's Peak that night, crammed around the firepits. Jon kept well away from the Weeper, trying to ignore the way the men from Marthe's clan stared at him. The gurgle of the rapids of the Antler was a drone in the background.

"How many river clans are still around here?" Jon asked, keeping his voice low as he thought.

Rolf shrugged, looking at him suspiciously with his single grizzled eye. "A dozen, maybe, that haven't ran yet? Marthe was the biggest of them, but you get clans of ten folk each."

"So a hundred men? Maybe more?" Jon pressed, thinking intently. Probably more.

"What you thinking Snow?"

_I'm thinking that there are free folk who are going to die if they stay, but too stubborn to run._ "I'm thinking that we could get more men to us if we try to rally the clans," Jon said. "Has the Weeper thought about recruiting them?"

Rolf snorted. "Snow, the Weeper doesn't _want_ more men," he scoffed, crunching on an old bone with grizzled teeth. "Especially not those scum."

Furs sat across the fire, sharpening a bone dagger. "You heard about Val, Snow? Mance's... what do you call it...? Sister to Mance's woman? Goodsister?" Jon shook his head. "After the host broke, that Val tried to regather it. I hear she even got quite a number to her. Maybe ten thousand or more. You want to know what they're doing now? They're starving."

"More men ain't an advantage. Only fools think that," Rolf agreed. "The more men you have, the more injuries, the more weak, the more cripples, the more delays - the slower you go and the faster you starve. That's why Mance failed – he had too many men, the host was so big it couldn't fight properly when they got hit." He shook his head. "The Weeper don't want no more, even five hundred is bigger than he normally takes."

Jon grimaced. The Weeper had been so angry when Jon offered Marthe's clan a place in the warband. "So instead the Weeper will just leave behind any who can't keep up?"

"Leave behind? Hell, the Weeper will _cut the legs off_ any who can't keep up." Furs nodded Jon's expression. "Oh aye, I know. None of us like the Weeper either. Doesn't matter – the Weeping Man doesn't care. He don't ask to be liked. At the end of the day, we're with the Weeper because the Weeper gets results."

"I used to march with Tormund, myself," said Rolf. Tormund and the Weeper had been at war for decades, Jon remembered. Their rivalry was almost as bad as Harma and Rattleshirt. "I'd still say that Tormund was the better leader, personally. Still, the crows took Tormund and the Weeper is the second best."

_That is it came down to, at the end of the day: the free folk will follow those they believe can save them._

Jon's hands clenched at the thought, tracing this misshapen stump of his little finger on hand. _The Weeper is wrong. He'd leave people behind to face the white walkers, and that's wrong._ The Weeper would keep his warband alive, rescue the strong warriors only, and leave the rest to die. It just felt wrong.

Jon looked at the firepit thoughtfully. The smoke seemed to twist and turn in the air, reminding him of how the Antlers traced through the forest. Later, Jon stood up without another word.

He found Marthe of the Antlers quickly. The river raider stood at that back of his keep, staring at Sonagon in the water. His eyes widened as he saw Jon approach. "Marthe. You know every clan around these parts, don't you?" The man looked too speechless to do anything but nod dumbly.

"Good, gather your men, we're taking some of your boats. Quietly." Jon ordered. They were the Weeper's boats now and Jon doubted the Weeper would be keen to part with them. "We're going to rally the other clans. However many there are, they need to come with us."

I'm not leaving any behind. Marthe just hesitated, but Jon didn't feel like giving him a choice. "And take that blood stag off your head!" Jon snapped. "You don't deserve a crown."

He gathered as many free folk who might come with him. It was lucky the camp was busy and distracted as he moved. Jon gathered Furs, Hatch, Haldur, Rolf, Mo, Lewie and a dozen others and made the proposal in the middle of the night.

"I'm going to go on ahead," Jon said. "Quickly. We're going to go rally the river clans, bring more men to us. The Weeper would leave them all behind or kill them if they try to slow us down, but I won't do that."

"You want us to go against the Weeper?" A man said incredulously.

"It's the Weeper or the dragon. Which one would you rather have with you?"

Furs and Hatch agreed in an instant. Rolf and many others spat in his face. They left the camp very quickly that night – Jon, around fifty men, Ghost and Sonagon – before anyone really had time to stop them.

By morning, they were already on their way in the detour. Jon split the group up – sending Furs south and Hatch the Halfgiant north with a dozen men, while Marthe took his boats down the river. Jon rode Sonagon, crashing through the forest early dawn with a groundbreaking roar.

All of the wildlings would spread the word. I want everyone to know. Come west to Hardhome with me if you want to live. If you want the dragon to protect you.

Jon visited half a dozen river clans that day alone, touring Sonagon down the valley. He saw tiny villages of old men and women or green boys. He saw river reavers so savage they never even spoke the Common. Every single one, no matter how tough or savage, reacted the same way in front of Sonagon; fear, shock, even awe.

The wildlings spread out. The message spread like wildfire; come to Hardhome with the host. Nobody gets left behind.

On the first day, it was maybe thirty or so. The second, it was seventy. Then more men they met the faster the word spread.

The Weeper would be beyond furious. Jon stole his men and ran off by himself, but Jon didn't care. The free folk needed a dragon more than they needed another raider.

It was exhilarating. That look on their faces as they gazed upon the dragon… It sent shivers down his spine. Jon barely even needed to say anything, not when Sonagon's roar did all the work.

Marthe sent his boats ahead down the river, to meet up with the wildling raiders on the coast. Jon tried to learn the names of the wildling leaders; men with names like Alvin Whaletooth, Gavin the
By the fourth night, they had two hundred people to them. After talking to a dozen men, Jon expected he could have over five hundred in week. They might well have over a thousand by the time they reached Hardhome.

_There are a lot of elderly, starved and frail_, Jon admitted. Men and women that refused Mance's call as he gathered his host, instead clinging to their own little territories around the river. The Weeper's force had been seasoned warriors, but this force was frail, old and weak.

"You sure about this one, Snow?" Hatch asked him one night. "We march with this lot, a lot of people are going to end up dying on the way."

Jon had to grimace, but agree. "Yet they'll die anyways if they don't run. They need to move."

"And you're going to lead them all west to Hardhome, and then south to the Wall?"

"Somebody has to."

In the distance, Sonagon splashed with his tail into the water, and then used his breath to freeze the water into a twisted ice shape. There were gasps and screams from the ground.

"They look at that thing like he's some sort of god, you know that?" Furs commented.

Hatch just stared at him. "Are you sure it's not?"

The Weeper caught up with them by the end of the fourth day. Jon hadn't been sure if the man would keep on going without them, but apparently he turned back to search for Jon. Jon saw watery eyes so wide they looked mad, flanked by a dozen men stamping out of the forest. By Jon's side, Ghost growled.

"Snow!" The Weeper snarled. "What the fuck are you doing?"

"Making my own warband," Jon replied, folding his arms.

"Your warband?" The Weeper scoffed, staring around the shambles of a camp. "You call this a warband? I call it fodder."

"I'm not leaving any behind. We can escort them to Hardhome with us."

"So I bloody hear," he snarled. "… Snow, if you really want to help these… people, then get to the Wall, and open the gates _as quickly as possible_."

Jon shook his head. "The Others are on our tail, and everyone we leave behind is another corpse for their army. We clear the river, spread the word – we assemble another host."

"And leave us open targets? Leave us to starve in the meantime?" He stepped forward. "Snow, we could get to Hardhome in a _week_ – if you stop to pick up every bloody stray on the way there, how the long is that fucking going to take?"

"However long it needs to take." He kept his voice hard. His fingers stayed close to Dark Sister, staring at the Weeper's eyes. "I am not leaving them."

The Weeper turned to stare at the men next to him. Furs and Hatch shifted uncomfortably. "And you're going along with this?" The Weeper spat. "Snow is green. He doesn't know these folk, he doesn't know how slow they will move or the disease they will spread. I thought you raiders would have more sense."

Hatch squirmed. Furs just nodded. "My vote's on the dragon, mate."

The raider's face twisted, growling at Jon. "You're a bloody fool, Snow."

"And you're a savage."

"You say that as if it's a bad thing," the man scoffed, clutching his scythe. "... How many do you have already? Three hundred?"

Two, though more are coming constantly. Jon just nodded. "I don't think your dragon is going to be able to protect them. Not all of them, not from all sides," said the Weeper. "I think you need me and my warband."

"I think we both need each other," said Jon. Unfortunately.

"Now that's what I'm wondering about. How useful are you really?" He snarled. "Why the fuck shouldn't I just kill you and be on my way?"

The Weeper had both hands on his scythe, the wicked long blade twitching.

Draw my sword, he thought quietly, fingers twitching. One quick swing. Take the Weeper's head. The Weeper only rules by fear; kill him and take them...

The other free folk were watching, but none would interfere. Wildlings wouldn't step in on another man's fight. The free folk would follow whoever survived.

I do need the men. And the Weeper is a monster...

Jon met the Weeper's eyes. The Weeper's fingers were twitching too.

Jon hesitated for a long moment. Then, he shook his head. "No," he said slowly. "I think you want me to try and fight you."

"I want you to give me a reason, Snow," the Weeper growled. He was a short man, but stocky, muscled and strong. "Give me a reason to finally take your fool's head."

That's how he solves all his problems, isn't it? Jon shook his head again. "No," he said quietly. "We're not doing it your way. Either stay here or go on by yourself, but we are not doing this butting heads anymore."

He turned and slowly walked away. Ghost hesitated, but then followed. "I'm on the side of the living, Weeper," Jon said. "Not the dead."

The Weeper looked frothing-at-the-mouth angry, his face twisted until he looked almost inhuman. Jon half-expected to hear the scythe swinging at any moment, to hear Ghost pouncing at the man, but nothing happened.

About an hour later, Jon saw the Weeper's men filing into the camp. The raiders set up perimeter and patrols, secured the area, all of the things that Jon didn't have the manpower to do.

Towards the evening, was it Jon's imagination or were the gazes staring at him just slightly less hostile?

By the time Jon finally retired for the night, his head was swimming with logistics. He had spent hours trying to figure out food rations, the best route along the coast, how to gather enough people. All of the fastest ways to gather the host, the men they could recruit. Sonagon would have to travel – the free folk clans would need to see the dragon before they agreed to join them – but how to move them so many people together?

Right now, they were dealing with hundreds of people. By the time they reached the coast, when they brought in the fishing villages, the forest clans, all the way up to the ice raiders, they could quite easily be dealing with thousands.

But they'll come, Jon thought to himself, of course they will. They'll follow a dragon.

As he settled down for the campfire, he found something wrapped up in his furs. A gift from Furs, Jon guessed, but he honestly wasn't sure whether it was a jest or not. Jon spent a long time staring at the old, slightly shredded black cloak, woven and patched with red fibres.

It took three weeks to get to Hardhome, or at least for the vanguard. By that time the trail of free folk was spread so far that they were days apart. Less a warband and more a column of refugees.

The coast was barren, icy and rocky. Jon stood on the cold, grey sand, staring out at Storrold's Point over the horizon. There was a faint sea mist from the coast, and a bitterly cold salty breeze cut over the beach. Walking over the soft sand was murder on his poor leg.

There are three thousand free folk behind me, Jon thought with a soft sigh. Probably. Everyone who he had asked had always said 'around three thousand'. Too many they couldn't easily count them, and more were coming every day.

They had boats that were sailing to Storrold's Point right now, but a poor southeasterly wind meant that the vanguard of the column on the coast would mostly likely reach there before the ships did. Jon's first impression of Hardhome, from a distance, was that of frozen sand dunes, rocky cliffs, and barren, skeletal trees.

Three weeks of slow marching and backtracking had left him feeling worn, exhausted and weak. He could see the hunger in the eyes of everyone around him. They were relying primarily on fishing boats from the coast for food now, but it was always a coin's flip on whether they would bring back their haul in time.

Jon had spent the journey learning names – so many he couldn't even count. The names of the leaders and warriors that followed him. The word was still spreading, and more clans would be gathering to him.

Jon had seen hunters clad only in bearskins and painted with tree sap, or short coastal clansmen who carved single-man crafts out of tree trunks. There were clans so queer the warriors would cut their own ears in half, decorate their skin with piercings, and drip poison into their eyes to turn them blue. Jon had even heard there had been contact with the giants tribes of the forests – giants very territorial and suspicious, who kept to close-knit families in caves rather than the mammoth-herding giants of the mountains and plains.

They all gathered to him. The sound of the dragon howling over the plains stirred every free folk, even the ones that had refused to follow Mance.

"You know about gods, Snow?" A raider next to him, Bulilden Horn, asked. He was a tall, lean man with a scarred face, clad in horsehide furs with a long, spiral horn hanging in a pendant around his neck, and a mammoth tusk spear in his arms. Bulilden Horn is a seasoned raider, Jon recalled. A man of note. "Do you worship any gods?"
"Why do you ask?" Jon said, cursing sliently as he struggled over the sandy dunes.

"I hear southrons forsake the gods. You cut down heart trees and bow in temples of stone instead," Bullden commented, pausing as the man around him clambered upwards.

He shook his head. "That's further south than I come from. The Starks of Winterfell keep to the Old Gods."

"Old Gods?" Hatch snorted, lumbering past. "They ain't so old up here."

"Oh aye, many up here pray before a heart tree," Bullden agreed. "But how do you worship them? Do you stick to the old ways – have you ever gave blood to the gods?"

Jon frowned. "Do they demand it?"

"Gods demand a lot of things, even the quiet ones," Furs said, listening in as the band walked. "There are still some that stick to the old Old Ways – the ones that spill human entrails over the heart trees, the ones that water their weirwoods with blood."

"The nameless gods are quiet, but each man interprets their voice differently," said Bullden. "They are the gods of the roots, the earth, and the sky. There are clans in the north that give bodies to the frozen lakes to appease them. The Skagosi would bleed the corpses of their enemies to their heart trees, and consume the flesh themselves. The Nightrunners used to bind children to the weirwood roots in their caves, to leave them to starve in the dark - so that only the children the gods guide out will survive. The Rockhearts in the west stitch weirwood sinews and rocks under their skin, so that each man may be closer to the gods. The elders of Shadowsprigs clans in the eastern forest carve their own faces in the likeness of the gods."

"I didn't know the Old Gods had any faces."

"They don't," Bullden agreed. "They'd cut off their own ears, nose, and lips – to leave themselves faceless."

Jon grimaced. He had seen a few wildlings with mutilated faces, but had never known why. "That doesn't sound like the Old Gods I know."

Bullden laughed hollowly. "What, did you think those faces on the trees were nice?"

"Gods can make men do queer things," Furs said. "Whether the gods ask them to do so or not."

Jon never replied. The Old Gods were a folk religion; in the far north, there were so many different corners that each tribe could interpret what that meant. Jon stared outwards, looking out over the grey ocean. You would get fanatics in any group.

Hardhome was close. They were walking over the dunes towards on the peninsula, staring out over the great cliffs that loomed over head. A solid wall of sandy cliffs, pocked with holes. When the wind hit the peninsula, it soured over through the cliffs as if the earth itself was screaming shrilly. Skeletal trees hung around them, barren and frozen. It was a hard trek over uneven terrain - along the coast, around the rocks, and towards the settlement cradled by the cliff.

_The wind is deadly_, Jon thought with a grimace. There was no wind break - when the wind swept across the peninsula it felt so cold it could scour the rocks the clean.

Their outriders had reported a colony of thousands of starving free folk in the ruins of Hardhome, with barely a single shelter between them. Refugees taking harbour in the cliffs of Hardhome, cradling around the ruins of the single weirwood tree that clung to the rocks.

Jon walked with fifty experienced free folk, a vanguard to secure the camp. Sonagon was out in the ocean - the dragon often went on far ahead, and enjoyed swimming and hunting fish. From the reports, Jon didn't expect any trouble from the free folk in Hardhome, but he called Sonagon back towards him in any case.

The group paused at the base of the cliffs for a moment. The screaming cliffs, the Night's Watch called them, Jon remembered.

"I ask," Bullden Horn continued, "because Mother Mole very much keeps to the old ways of worship. She has… followers."

"I thought she was a woods witch."

"Oh she is," said Bullden. "But a better term for you southerners, might be… hmm… priestess? A priestess of the Old Gods."

Jon shook his head. "The Old Gods don't have priests or priestesses."

"I heard about her," said Furs. "Loony old hag that used to live under a weirwood tree, eating dirt and roots."

"And she keeps to blood sacrifices to the heart trees," Bullden said as they walked. "Animals, mostly. Rabbits, goats and dogs. She would live in her hole, making prophecies, sacrifices, occasionally treating wounds with poultices and herbs. She had been there long enough that she had a few followers."

"Aye. And then the dead started to rise," another wildling said bitterly. "… and more and more started coming to Mother Mole. And after her sacrifices, wights would stay away from her heart tree, to hear the tales. Her few followers turned to hundreds."

After Mance's collapse, even more people came desperate enough to turn to her, Jon thought quietly. By the time she reached Hardhome, she had thousands. Thousands of men, women and children following an ancient wood witch. "So these prophecies of hers…?"

"She's made a few. Some of them have even been right."

Mother Mole promised salvation at Hardhome, Jon remembered. Looking around the peninsula, he wondered exactly what salvation she had to offer.

Jon could see the clearing that used to be Hardhome. His first impression was more of a ruin; the ancient wreckage of an old settlement, scattered across the rocks and sand. He could see people huddled by the caves; free folk wearing dirty furs, trying take cover from the wind. The stink of crowded bodies, rot and starvation seemed to linger in the air.

The air turned quiet, and grim. Jon saw eyes glaring at them as the group walked into the clearing, but no one said a word.

In the distance, he saw the spindly frame of a white tree; barren, twisted, and curled over itself like a broken man. The face carved into the heart tree was distorted and wide, like screaming in pain. Jon heard a voice speaking to a large crowd huddled around the roots of the old weirwood.
"… and the cold and the wind will burn!" An old voice croned, and the air was so quiet they strained to listen. "… The living will stiffen, and demons will walk the world again. Demons that freeze, demons that burn…!"

Jon saw an old, wizened women, bent over a gnarly staff. A short woman, so old and so pale it looked like her wrinkles were carved from bark. Mother Mole's quavering voice seemed to echo. "… Yet there will be salvation…!" She crowed. "… All holy men – all who bow, and suffer, and bleed for the gods – shall be lead to glory. The devotees shall conquer the world, and the gods will rise again! Those who deny, those who forget, those will die! The Old Ones are rising, and the gods have teeth!"

There was a murmur around the crowd. Jon walked forward, hesitantly. Red lines weaved over the branches of the weirwood. Entrails, Jon realised. They scattered bloody entrails over the heart tree. Various animal skulls were grouped around the trunk and the roots, white bone blending into bark.

"… The winter storm takes form! The white bark of gods is given flesh! It has been foretold!" Mother Mole preached. "The fury of the Old Ones will rise again, and we will be led! It is coming…"

Her voice quaked. The old woman's body trembled, turning up to stare at Jon. He saw wrinkled gums split in a grin. "... The cold will swallow the fire - the fire that would devour us..." Mother Mole muttered, limbs clicking as she shambled upwards. She was staring straight at Jon. "... Salvation comes…!"

The crowd was stirring. Jon hesitated, staring around the misty field. There was a long moment of quiet. The bloody branches stirred gently in the whirring wind.

Then, Jon heard the sound of scraping stone. The sound of something large clambering out of the water, wings flapping as heavy footsteps thudded up the coast. The sound of the footsteps sent ravens flocking upwards into the sky.

Jon called, and Sonagon came.

He heard the gasps. Mother Mole was crackling. They didn't scream or run, but instead they just clambered around, mouths open and eyes gaping. The dragon seemed to shadow over them all.

Jon was left frozen by the look on their faces. Desperate, hungry faces, with that look of pure awe, amazement, hope and devotion.

Around them, the cliffs were howling.

"Salvation…!" Mother Mole crackled, nigh hysterical. "Salvation comes…!"

The other wildlings took up the cry, hands outstretched to Jon and Sonagon. "Salvation…" They chanted. "… Salvation… Salvation…"

Jon's eyes widened as he saw the mood change. Outstretched hands groped towards him. The raiders clutched together, while the followers of Mother Mole roared around them like a tide. One by one, he saw the free folk drop to the ground.

All around him, Jon watched as the wildlings bent, bowed and kneeled.
Special thanks to Doublehex for beta'ing this chapter!
Chapter 12

Chapter Summary

Returning home and setting out on quests...

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bran

The world roared around him, as he soared over valleys and mountains, through great gorges carved through the earth.

The earth floated above him, great hunks of rock, moss and trees levitating and twisting in a rainbow haze. There was no sky; just layers upon layers of rock, stone, and trees stacked up above him. He saw giant roots twisting and weaving through the heights like the veins of the world, and streams and rivers gushing into the clouds.

Bran gaped upwards, watching the colours thread through the sky. In the distance he could see shadows like enormous beasts flying between the stars… monsters as large as mountains…

"… Bran… where… wake…" A voice hissed in the distance.

It felt like Bran was floating upwards, like there was nothing tying him to the earth anymore. I'm flying…

He heard wings around him. Shadows twisting into a bird flying beside him. The three-eyed crow was as large as a cloud for a moment, before rustling into the shape of a small bird by Bran's shoulder.

"Too high, Bran," the three-eyed crow said. "Fly too high and you will never touch the ground again."

He could only gasp as he saw the earth around him shift. He stared, watching figures shimmer around him, days and nights flashing by. He saw a monster with rotting blood and stony skin, crumbling and weeping black. He saw a man with a black crown dancing with a white lady. He saw huge figures heaving stones, immense giants laying siege to a wall of ice…

In the distance, he felt something shake his shoulder. It was like a tingle in the back of his mind. "… Wake… don't… Bran…"

"Head downwards, Bran," the crow pressed. "Find your anchor."

"Am I dreaming?"

"You are beyond the dreams. Beyond the green."

Bran shifted. A tiny movement, and he saw the world blur. He saw a different time, one of thick forests and endless grassy plains. He saw small children clutching glassy spears; they would constantly war against huge hairy giants wielding clubs, skittering everywhere. How long ago was this, when the children of the forest walked freely in tribes and the giants roamed all the way from glaciers down to red sandy mountains?

Bran soared over the fragmented world. Everything from blazing sands to scorching snows flickered beneath him. He could see rocky coasts and underwater cities. He saw scaly humanoid creatures with webbed feet and hands, giant fishbowl eyes, and large mouths filled with green, needle-like teeth; hunting the children of the forest by the coasts with coral blades and seaweed nets. He saw children kidnapped, dragged away to the deep or chained and bound as slaves by the fish-creatures.

Bran saw beasts that he couldn't even name; great-toothed lions as large as horses, monster lizards with mouths dripping venom, or immense serpent-like creatures that skittered on dozens of tiny legs with gaping fangs. He saw great earthen monsters clambering out of gorges in the ground, and living trees with bristling branches and giant wooden maws.

Bran gasped. It was all too overwhelming. He fell downwards, dropping out of the air and into a different time. He landed in a black grass, surrounded by stone monoliths in a black night. Men in motley robes and animal furs, all men circled around a stone altar stained in blood. He saw the shapes of wolves and bears in the forest, standing side by side with the men.

"Bran, we must leave," the crow warned. Around him, the cloaked figures were chanting. Sacrifices. The bloody bones of a small humanoid figure draped over the altar. "Find your own time. I can only guide you so far."

Bran stared in quiet amazement. They were rough men with bronze swords and leather shields. He glimpsed grey wolves in the forest, walking beside them like dogs. The cloaked figures were speaking a language he didn't understand. They shouted angrily, arguing with each other as they motioned to altar. Bran caught only a single word, 'Stark'.

The First Men. "Stark?" Bran called.

The scene froze. All the cloaked men turned to stare at him. It was like they looked straight through him, but they all turned. They heard me.

_Yet this is just a vision, isn't it? How could they hear me?*_ The crow flapped, clutching him with talons. Dragging him away, pulling him into a different time.

"Where… where am I?"

"Everywhere."

"How…?" He gasped.

"You leapt off too high. Even birds must return to the earth," the crow cawed. "Your body is an anchor. You abandoned it, and lost sight of the ground."

Above him, the layers of earth churned. It was like the whole world was an onion; layers upon layers infinitely detailed and floating on top of each other, extending outwards.

"I knew a maester once that described time as a river, flowing endlessly forward," the crow said. "But in the green, time is more like the earth itself – layers of moments in time stacked on top of each other."

Bran gasped. "How far does it go?"
"Who knows? None have ever come back from reaching the bottom. You must find yourself again, Bran, lest you become one of many lost for all time."

"You can be trapped in this place?"

"Where do you think the faces on the weirwoods come from?"

The thought made his heart pound. None of the faces on the heart tree had ever looked happy. It felt like he was falling. Tumbling through endless summers and winters, spinning around him like the world was dancing. "How do I get back?"

"Focus on the roots. Let them lead you."

The weirwoods roots. Bran could see the roots threading through time. Return to my body. The Nightfort. To Meera and Jojen.

The world blurred. He saw a great black keep, shaded by a wall of ice. He didn't recognise it at first. This wall was roughly only a hundred foot tall. The fort had strong walls and towers, fresh and strong. Bran could see some of the towers still under construction, being defended and readied for war.

The Nightfort, he thought, stunned. How long ago must this be? The Wall looked weirdly small – not as mountainous as it was in his time – and the castle was fresh and well-manned. He saw thousands of black cloaked men marching through stone courtyards. Legions of sworn brothers.

The scene blurred, like watching through a dream. He saw a tall man clad in black, staggering through the forest, clutching an icy sword. The man froze as he stared downwards at a white woman quivering beneath him. The woman had skin and hair as white as snow, eyes like blue stars in the bloody dusk, frozen in inhuman beauty. She looked inhuman… eerie… and the man stood as if about to strike her down but he paused, hesitantly.

A storm raged around the scene. It looked like a battle. Bran focused at the living man, trying to judge his expression as he stared at the inhuman woman beneath him. The warrior looked young, strong and weary, but he wasn't scared… more entranced.

A man without fear, Bran thought. "… The Night's King."

"Yes," the three-eyed crow said. "During the Cold Spring after the Long Night, many of the Others lingered. The cleanup after the battle lasted decades. The Night's Watch lead the drive to push them north."

Bran looked in quiet shock. He felt himself raise upwards, to stare down at the world. The land was broken, war ravaged, and starving. The white walkers had been defeated, but they didn't fall easily. The wars were bitter and vicious. For so long the Others had reigned as overlords and terrors, but even as the winter faded and they were forced backwards they stained the waning snows with blood.

Bran saw the Night's King. He was a young Lord Commander; very young – but a proven soldier who had been elected to finally win the war. He was a warrior. Instead, the Night's King tried to make peace with the white walkers, by marrying the cold as a symbol of truce.

"Yet he didn't," the crow said as the scene shifted. "Whatever intentions the man had, the king failed."

Bran saw the Nightfort at its terrible prime. Frosted in cold, with heads on spikes around the walls, and legions marching through the gate. Living men and dead standing side by side.

Under the king, the Night's Watch scoured beyond the Wall, dragging wildlings into the cells beneath the Nightfort. Men, giants, even children – they were all captured to be jailed under the castle. Thousands and thousands placed in manacles; the Night's King terrorised the north.

"Why? Why imprison so many?"

"The queen promised them all immortality."

"Did she make them immortal?"

"In a sense."

He saw legions of dead soldiers flowing out of the gate. Rotting bodies walking, men with dead expressions, even slave soldiers wearing chains.

Bran saw the siege of Nightfort, the final battle against the Night's King after a long and gruelling war. Two armies from both sides, the King of Winter joined with the King-Beyond-the-Wall against the Night's Fort. Brandon the Breaker and Joramun, fighting from opposite sides of the Wall.

The Nightfort burned. Flying casks of flaming oil launched over the walls into the castle, lighting it up like a funeral pyre to backdrop of chaos. The sky thundered, and the Wall trembled.

And Bran saw a man in black armour, with a crowned helm, bent over on the top of the burning castle, as his queen melted away in his arms.

The scenes blurred by so quickly he could barely even make sense of them.

"… What happened to him?" Bran asked breathlessly.

"The Night's King died. He burned as the tower fell."

It felt like the crow was trying to drag him away, but he squirmed and resisted. Bran wanted to see more, and the scene shifted at his thought.

He glimpsed pale, tiny fingers clutching at a cradle in a dark room.

"There was a child?!"

"Enough." Bran jerked, as the three-eyed crow dragged him away. Bran saw the world dissolve into shadows. "We cannot linger here, Bran."

Bran fell. He tumbled downwards, dissipating through the earth.

Images flashed. He saw a hooded man surrounding by lurching, rotten bodies staggering over grassy knolls. He saw a man with bright golden hair, laughing raucously as he was thrown into a dark prison cell. He saw a man with a bright smile wearing a wreath of roses, mixing petals and fruits into a violet potion before dripping it onto a sleeping maiden's lips. He saw a broad-shouldered figure, clad in direwolf furs, blowing a long ornate bone horn over a desolate icescape and feeling the sky crack...

It was so much he could barely even process it all. Bran felt his head spin.

"… Bran… Bran…" a voice whispered. "… Wake…"
He saw a blood-soaked baby crying in a bed of winter roses. A dark-haired weeping woman begging from a high window for them to stop, screaming and weeping as men in white cloaks charged at the base of the tower. He saw a hunched white-haired figure in black armour, swinging a dark sword against a wave of blackness. Bran felt himself shiver, as a wave of cold dropped downwards from the sky, so cold he could barely breathe, like it sucked all the warmth from the world…

"Focus," the crow pressed. "Focus on who you are, pull yourself back. Your family, your home…”

My family. Home.

Winterfell.

The world hazed. He was staring downwards, at clouds of smoke and mist rising upwards. The castle burned in great gusts of flame, while snow and wind howled around him. Bran heard sounds of fighting, a battle, while the air boomed like strikes of thunder one after another…

"Bran…” a voice whispered. "… Bran, don't go…”

Meera.

He felt his body lurch, reaching out towards the sound.

It was all feeling. The feeling of Meera's voice, the rain dripping onto him. Summer's fur. Summer's howl. Bran gripped onto the feeling of the direwolf and dragged himself through the earth…

…

He gasped as the air hit him. He felt blood and rain dripping down his forehead. He throbbing pain in his skull. Suddenly he was back in the Nightfort, in the soaking rain and blood.

All around him, the night steamed and hissed, the flames scorching through the wet wood of the library. Bran only briefly saw a man in front of him lurching bloodily to the floor, gripping his skull. Bran recognised the dark-haired wildling dropping downwards limply – with blood pouring down his cheeks. He's bleeding, Bran thought in shock. He's bleeding from the eyes.

And then everything went black.

He heard the sound of pained moaning. Bran woke up feeling groggy, sore and weak. The morning was bitter and grey, the weak sun stinging his eyes. His whole body felt numb, yet at the same time just so alive. It was like he could feel everything from the birds in the sky, to the whisper of the trees.

The events of last night came rushing back to him, so intense he could barely process them.

Bran sputtered and wheezed, feeling his hands shake.

Jojen was suddenly leaning over him, placing a damp cloth to his forehead. "Bran," the crannogman whispered. "Easy, just relax."

Instinctively, Bran tried to move. He couldn't feel his legs. I was walking last night, he thought suddenly. I was standing. I possessed that wildling's body, even just for a moment.

The memory hit him. It had been over so fast. Bran had jumped into the man's body, and then the wildling had screamed and dropped to the floor, eyes exploding and blood pouring in rivers down his cheeks. I killed him. I forced my way into his skin and I killed him.

Bran had possessed him, and it caused the man's mind to explode, and sent Bran flailing wildly into… that place. Beyond the green, the crow had called it.

To be back in his own broken skin after something like that… Bran's hands couldn't stop trembling.

Jojen looked at him with concern. "Where did you go, Bran?"

"I don't know…" So many visions flashed before his eyes. There was a hint of knowing in Jojen's gaze. "… That… Have you felt that too?"

Jojen shook his head. "I've only ever dreamt the greendreams. You've been there."

Across the stable, Hodor was moaning weakly as Meera tried to patch up his wounded leg. They all looked worn, injured and tired. Bran could feel Summer too – the direwolf was in the kitchens, feasting ravenously on the corpses that littered the corridors. Thirteen corpses of wildlings that had tried to cross the Wall.

I killed them, Bran thought with shock. The visions of last night flashed bloodily in front of his mind. I killed them with Hodor, or with Summer, or with the ravens.

And the last one… He would never forget the last dark-haired wildling. The way the man's head popped as I crushed him with my mind.

Thirteen strong raiders and they never stood a chance.

Bran's vision blurred and blackened. He was still trembling and gasping weakly even as he blacked out.

As he slept, he looked down upon the lands, ice and trees from a dozen ravens flying above him.

He awoke with someone tugging urgently on his collar. Bran's lurched, to watch Meera grunt with difficulty as she tried to lever his limp body onto a satchel. Her face was bruised and sore.

"We've got to go," Meera shouted as they tried to stumble down and out of the courtyard. Hodor could barely walk let alone carry Bran. "The rangers must have seen the fire last night. We've got to go."

They shambled out of the Nightfort, taking refuge in the pine forests outside the keep. They were too weak to go very far. Bran glimpsed torches on the Wall, heading down to the ice steps towards the keep. Through Summer's skin, he smelled men approaching. None of Bran's party were in any state to move quickly – they could only hope to hide in the treeline and pray that the rangers didn't search very hard for them.

"If we run now we're not going be able to cross the Wall," Meera warned, grunting as she tried to drag Bran out over the rough cold grass. His body felt like a useless sack of potatoes.

Jojen just shook his head. "We're not going to be able to cross the Wall anyway."

They set up camp in the forest that night. No campfire, in case anyone was searching for them. Bran noticed how Meera was trembling too. Meera's broken nose left her eyes bloodshot and her face bruised. The painful image of her beaten and stripped flashed before his eyes. They all huddled together against the cold, quiet and strained.

That was the first fight I've ever been in, Bran thought to himself. The vision replayed in his mind. He had used to daydream about being a knight on a battlefield too. Nothing could have ever prepared him for just… the pure gore, screaming and chaos.

The night was tensely quiet. No one slept. "... What did you see, Bran?" Jojen asked quietly after a long silence, resting his head on his hands. "I saw you; you were out of your body. What did you see?"

Meera looked at him. Bran hesitated for a long time. So many visions, where could he even begin. Half of them hardly even made sense. "... I saw the past. It was like I was there, watching everything..." he said. The thought alone caused him to gulp. He hesitated, remembering one sight that struck out to him. "... And... I think saw the future too..."

"What did you see?"

"I saw Winterfell." The image of his home covered in smoke and mist. "I saw Winterfell being destroyed. I think we've got to go back."

Meera shook her head. "We can't; it's too dangerous, they'll be hunting us."

"We have to," Bran insisted. That scene, why was it so hard to focus on it?

"What about the three-eyed crow?"

"I don't think I need him... I..." His hands were still trembling. "... I need to think."

Nobody pushed him. Hodor started crying when his stitches split, and Meera moved over to try and help the stable boy and reapply rags for bandages.

The night was quiet. A bloated half-moon hung above in the frosted sky.

I killed men last night, Bran thought for the hundredth time. I did it, I killed them. Is this how it's supposed to feel?

I am ten years old, yet I overpowered them. He couldn't even twitch his legs. His body was useless, but he had been so strong last night. I killed them...

Slowly, Jojen shuffled over towards him. The crannogman kept his voice low. "Bran," he said in a low voice. "How are you? What are you thinking about?"

"Last night." He had been thinking about it constantly on repeat. The way the wildling had choked under Hodor's hands, or torn under Summer's claws, or burst under Bran's presence. How are you supposed to feel after killing thirteen people? "... Those wildlings..."

"We survived. That's what important."

He pictured the pile of thirteen corpses. Thirteen dead bodies. "... Meera killed one. She's so good with her spear but she could only kill one of them," Bran said after a long pause. "Hodor's big and strong, but he could only kill two. It was me – I killed them. I killed them in Hodor's skin, or in Summer's, or in the ravens, but I killed them."

Jojen never replied. His green eyes stared through him.

"... Old Nan always used to tell me stories about... about the Warg King. Or the Horned Lord.
Them that could use sorcery and skinchanging. "Bran remembered those stories well. The Warg King was a skinchanger who ruled Sea Dragon's Point, allied with the children of the forest, who fought against the ancient Kings of Winter. The Horned Lord had been an ancient King-Beyond-the-Wall thousands of years ago, who supposedly used magic to pass the Wall. Bran had seen figures of legend themselves in his vision, legends in the flesh. Magic and monsters, they were real. "… And I just realised… I'm like them. I'm a skinchanger too, I'm as powerful as they were."

Bran turned to face the crannogman. "If I had only known about that six months ago…" He shook his head. "I never needed to flee Winterfell. When Theon Greyjoy invaded, I could have chased him out… I never needed to hide when they… they burned down my home…"

I'm a wolf. A winged wolf. I had been chained, helpless. So helpless and weak when they chased after me…

"I should never have left Winterfell." He thought back to a frozen wasteland, and the builder clutching a giant horn.

His throat jammed. The tears stung his eyes, but Bran refused to cry. Crying was for little boys. He couldn't cry.

"... You're a Stark, Bran," Jojen said in his soft voice. "You did everything you could do."

There must always be a Stark in Winterfell. "And now I can do more." He shook his head. "I'm done running, Jojen. I don't to run, to hide to be… trapped anymore. I want to… I want to do something, I want to…" His eyes twitched. "… I killed those men and that was me. That was me fighting back."

The crannogman's voice flickered. "What do you want to do?"

"I need to go home," Bran admitted. "I need to see my family again."

Jojen stared at him for a long time, piercing green eyes looking straight through him. Bran never met his gaze. He can tell I'm holding something back, Bran thought to himself. "… Bran…" Jojen said in a slow voice. "What aren't you telling me?"

He hesitated for a long time. It was hard to even find the words. How do you vocalise something as intense and as vivid as a dream? It was more like feelings than images. "… I saw something…" he said, struggling quietly to remember it. "In my vision. I never understood it, and I still don't, but… I think I saw Winterfell when it was being made. I think I saw the Bran the Builder."

Jojen blinked. He looked like he was about to say something, but he didn't. "… And I've been obsessing over it in my head and…" Bran stammered. "And it's a like a feeling. We were in the crypts, remember? I know what Winterfell feels like, and it felt like… so much of Winterfell is underground. The reason Bran the Builder built the castle there…"

He was rambling. His breaths were still sharp and jagged. It sounded crazy even as he said it, but he couldn't shaking the sense of foreboding and warning that vision gave him. Winterfell had been built on top of hot springs, Bran recalled, they used it to pump warm water through the castle. There must always be a Stark in Winterfell.

His hands clenched slowly. "I think there's something buried beneath Winterfell," Bran said finally. It was the only thing that made his visions make sense. "I think he left something buried there."

Jojen never replied. He retired early for the night to dream.
The whole camp was barely a clearing in the forest. They had lost their supplies and half their equipment when they were chased out of the Nightfort. They were hungry, injured and weak. Bran could see the wariness and concern when he looked into Meera's eyes. She didn't think they would last long like this. She was probably right.

At one point, near dawn, Meera and Jojen left to one side and argued about where they should go next, keeping out of earshot from Bran. Neither of them knew what to do. Bran eavesdropped through a bird on the trees.

It was pale and early morning. In the first morning rays, he felt the forest twitch. Summer heard a party of men walking through the forest. Bran could have warned Jojen and Meera, they could have tried to run, but he didn't. Instead, he stayed still, staring at the trees as he heard a party of thirty armed men crunch through the snow.

I'm done running, he thought as he steeled himself. I'm done hiding.

He remembered that feeling of cold and endless winter descending over the world. There was no time for hiding. There must always be a Stark in Winterfell.

Bran expected to see rangers in black cloaks coming out of the forest. Instead, he saw gruff men in plate mail with spears. There was shouting and bellows as they came onto their camp. Summer snarled and snapped, Meera clutched her spear, but Bran didn't even twitch. Many of the men had brown giants stitched onto their surcoats, Bran noticed.

The shouting and screaming lasted a while, as the men dragged Meera's spear away and forced Summer backwards. Apparently the men had been hunting wildlings that had slipped over the Wall. Considering all the dirt and grime over them, Bran wasn't surprised that his party could be mistaken for wildlings. A man bellowed at Bran to stand up and come with them, to which Bran could only reply that he couldn't stand. That caused some of the men to stir.

Shortly afterwards, he was dragged before the old warrior leading the expedition – a stiff and gaunt man in boiled leather and chainmail, with flinty eyes, a long white beard and a face as hard as winter frost.

It took a while for Bran to recognise the man. Hother Umber. Castellan of Last Hearth. The Whoresbane.

---

The Bear Knight

"Take me," Dany purred, slipping towards him under the silken sheets. Her kiss was soft, teasing, mischievous, biting gently at his lower lip. "I command you to fuck me, ser."

"Yes, your grace," Jorah whispered huskily. His body convulsed as her slender, nubile legs wrapped around his waist.

"Take me, ser," his queen whispered in his ear. "Love me, protect me. I need you so, so much…"

"Yes, your grace," he gasped, feeling her delicate fingers move downwards, her fingertips tracing through thick chest hair and towards his–

"Land ahoy, you cunts! Get a move on already!"

Jorah shot upwards. The dream vanished in an instant. Instead of silk sheets and playful caresses, he was suddenly lying on bed-ridden, sea worn, cotton, staring at dirty, almost rotten, floorboards.
He had his knife in his hand instinctively. He very nearly fell out of the hammock.

He cursed as he thrashed. The stiffness between his legs made movement unbearable. The wooden supports creaked and groaned as he struggled to pull himself upwards. The sailor's bunkbeds were not made for a man of his size.

The floor was rocking. He could hear waves and gulls. Jorah cursed, dragging his stiff and cramped body upwards. He had slept in his armour for fear of someone stealing it, but it left his back and shoulders aching. He grabbed his longsword, fastened his belt and staggered upwards.

"You were moaning in your sleep, Westerosi," a rotten-toothed man with a wicked grin said. "Pleasant dreams?"

"Well, you are home now," the sailor said. "I'm sure she is waiting for you, yes?"

She is. But she's waiting for me half a world away. For now, I will wait for her.

He staggered out onto the deck. The cold, salty wind hit him, along with the shouts of men and movement. The galley creaked in the waves as it sailed through the Bite. He could see the misty outline of the Three Sister to starboard, the beacon's absent in the pale light, and the grey, cluttered cliffs and rocks of the coast as they headed down into the White Knife. The river was drab and meagre compared to the Rhoyne in Volantis, or grey and cold compared to the Skahazadhan of Meereen, but the entrance to the bay still had a certain misty, ancient splendor that no other could match.

Jorah could see the whitewashed stone of White Harbour coming into view, a drab sight under grey clouds. Steepily pitched roofs of dark grey hung to the coast, speckled with towers and the frames of ships. It was more than just a harbour city, it felt like the north. It had been so long Jorah half-forgotten what it looked like. Seeing it again, though, it felt like he had never left.

Years ago, he had ran to White Harbour to escape Lord Stark's justice. His last sight of the town had been crammed into a cargo hold of a stinking cog heading to Lys, trying to reassure his frantic wife.

It was funny how things changed.

"We will be docking in a few hours," the man said, shambling over creaky stairs. The men were rushing to the oars, bringing the sails in. "You'll help unload, hmm?"

He nodded, absentminded. "I'll help with your cargo."

"Good worker," he said approvingly, in broken Common. "Big, strong. You want work on ships, see the captain now. We always need strong swords in these waters."

It might be good pay, too. Working as hired goon, a sword, on some rotten ship was stable work if nothing else. Jorah shook his head. "I can't. I have business in White Harbour."

"Yes, your wife." He nodded before shambling off. "Still, offer is there. I find that woman are poor at waiting. If she is not waiting for you, then we'll be in port for three days."

Jorah's eyes were focused on White Harbour. For so long, Jorah had been the Spider's creature. He followed orders; he went where Lord Varys instructed him, he watched, he wrote reports back to the King's Landing – all in the hope of someday securing a pardon and being able to go back home.
Now, he was coming back himself to do the exact thing, but this time to send reports to Meereen, and to his queen.

Queen Daenerys Targaryen shall have no more devoted subject, Jorah promised himself. I wronged her, but I will prove myself. I shall do whatever it takes to earn my place at her side. Someday, however long it may take, we will be together; her on the Iron Throne and I by her side.

Perhaps it was impossible. Many would say it was. Jorah had no delusions; he was an aging, exiled knight from a minor house in the far north, and she was a stunningly beautiful young woman, the heir of the Targaryen legacy and destined for greatness. Still, many would have said it was impossible for him to win the tourney at Lannisport, to win Lynesse Hightower's hand in marriage. Jorah had defied the odds then, and he was prepared to do it again.

He lingered outside for as long as possible, before redrawing to his bunk. He kept a quill and sheets of goatskin parchment hidden, wrapped in his spare blanket. After a long moment, Jorah frowned and wrote in large, awkward letters:

'Nineteen war galleys in inner harbour of White Harbour. Outer harbour is crowded. Fresh construction. City preparing for war?'

An hour later, he saw the looming stone of Seal Rock over the approach to the outer harbour. The ancient, weathered ringfort stood fifty feet over the waters, grey-green in colour. Last time he passed, the ruins had been abandoned, but now he saw ships docked around the rocks, and man working and fortifying the ruins. He glimpsed scorpions and spitfires being hammered into position, and new defensive towers on the harbour that looked recent.

With a pause, he returned to his parchment and crossed out the question mark on the previous line. He added: 'Seal Rock fortified. Planning to defend harbour.'

He was here as a spy. Parchment was expensive and his penmanship was poor, but Jorah had resolved to record absolutely everything he saw that could be of use to Dany.

Jorah had abandoned his mail and surcoat – it was far too obvious. Likewise, he had sold his plate armour for worn boiled leather; worn, moulded and dressed in oil to retain flexibility around joints. He had even shaved his beard. His story was that of a sellsword returning home after fighting for mercenaries companies. A knight drew attention, but a common sellsword less so.

The trip from Meereen had been as fast as possible. The Shavepate gave him a pouchful of gold, some brief instructions to report back in vague terms, and a horse. First, Jorah had rode to Volantis, and then booked a ship back to Westeros. Volantis had been difficult – the whole city had been heaving between the Triarch elections, the Yunkai recruiting for war on Meereen and Astapor, and the Golden Company camped outside of the city.

Jorah had lingered long enough to learn as much as possible, and that was the very first report he went sent back to Meereen. Everyone had been talking about how Tyrion Lannister, the queen's deformed younger brother, had apparently hired the Golden Company in Volantis to sail back to Westeros to claim Casterly Rock for himself.

Jorah gathered as much information as he could gather and wrote three letters about the Golden Company and the mercenary companies the Yunkai hired. He didn't know how useful they'd be to Daenerys, but he wasn't about to skimp on his task.

All three of the letters ended up with the widow of the waterfront in western Volantis, who promised to see them to Meereen, and Jorah had little choice but to trust her. Jorah might have been tempted to wait and try to sail back to Westeros along with Golden Company, but instead the widow of the waterfront recommended him passage on the smuggler ship the Adventure – coursed towards White Harbour and then Braavos to sell Volantis silks, lace and spices. As old and foul as the Adventure was, it was a lean and fast ship and they made good time.

Jorah had debated the wisdom of heading towards King's Landing instead. King's Landing would be the centre of activity; if he wanted to learn about the movements of the Usurper's ilk then the capital was the place to be. Still, King's Landing was also treacherous, unfamiliar territory for him. There would be spies everywhere, the risks were so much greater.

Instead, Jorah knew White Harbour. He knew the north. His status as the (former) Lord of Bear Island had more weight here. It had been a long decision, but the north was where he wanted to be.

He forced himself to stay calm, but he was trembling anxiously. He lingered to help the captain unload boxes down onto the pier as the portmaster approached, mostly so he could scout discreetly about the rumours in the city among the dockworkers.

Then, he was walking through the narrow cobbled streets of White Harbour, feeling his heart pound. The whole city stunk of fish.

He remembered Dany's words. He had been practicality reciting them. I declare your exile over, his queen had proclaimed. You must be my scout, my spy – my envoy even. Whatever it takes.

Not for the first time, the enormity of that task dawned on him. Dany was possibly years away from invading Westeros. She would wait until her dragons were fully grown and under control and she had a stable backing in Meereen. Jorah's service now could be the difference between success and failure when she finally did come west.

Scouting and letters are only half my duty, he thought. I must rally the kingdom to their rightful queen. I must pave her way. I must convince the Seven Kingdoms of Daenerys' worth, and prove my own.

His hands clenched into fists. What I wouldn't give to even be twenty years younger again? I feel like an old man.

His heart pounded. My father. My father probably still lives, as the Lord Commander of the Night's Watch. He knew it would be folly to go see Jeor Mormont again, but still…

Jorah's settled in early and hired a room, in a stinking winesink called the Lazy Eel. The whole city was overrun with refugees, and more coming every day. He retreated sullenly, to think and to plan. He tried to stay inconspicuous, but the innkeeper still called him "m'lord" when he rented a whole room for himself.

So much to do… Even trying to imagine his task made him quiver. He waved the serving girl away so he could think. I need to gather information. I need rumours and witnesses. They said that Eddard Stark is dead, and his sons murdered, but how much of that is true I can't say.

I need to find some ships heading to Volantis. Set up some sort of organisation that could get my reports safely back to Meereen. That alone was a daunting task – how to send messages half a world away in secret?

And I will have to approach familiar noble lords, carefully. Lords that might raise the Targaryen banner. That made him squirm with the thought. Try to convince them that the Starks were dead and the Lannisters were crazy. It would take tact, and negotiation that Jorah had little experience with. He needed to move a kingdom with nothing more than words and promises of a distant queen. How much are the words of an exiled knight worth? Where can I even start?

… It's been so long and I am finally home…

Before long, it was nightfall and he still hadn't decided on the best course of action. He felt like a bear that had been tasked with learning to dance. He sat hunched over the writing desk, staring at the parchment and all his crude notes.

Then, the sound of heavy footsteps up the wooden stairs caused him to jump. The clang of heavy plate boots. His hand went instinctively to his longsword.

Bang, bang, bang. A heavy fist collided against the door. Jorah jumped. "Who is it?" He demanded, tensing.

"Open the door and lower the steel, otherwise we'll bring the door down and take you," the voice on the other side said grimly. "You can either walk out of here with us, or we can drag you out. I'm not too bothered which, to be honest."

Jorah growled. He fastened on his belt, his dagger, his longsword firmly in his hands. His fingers were frantic as he fastened the clasps on his armour. How could they know? Why are they here for me, I never drew any attention…

Still, there was little choice but to unlatch the bolt and open the door. If they wanted a fight, he would give them one. I clearly make a poor spy, but I'm a better fighter, I promise you.

Jorah pushed the door open and stood back. Five burly guardsmen in half-helm and iron tridents painted silver were standing in the corridor. They wore woollen blue-green dyed cloaks - the uniform of the guards of House Manderly. Big men, armoured, but in the narrow corridor Jorah would have an advantage.

The man at the front wasn't a guardsman, though; he was a tall, aging man with a deep-lined face and long brown grey hair. He wore a red surcoat, his hands on the sword on his belt. His expression was tense, dark and glowering.

Jorah stared, not lowering his sword. The last time he saw that face it had been at his wedding. It took him a while to recognise the man with a decade's worth of aging, stress and wrinkles.

"Robett?" Jorah gasped. "Robett Glover?"

"Ser Jorah." Robett Glover nodded. "So it's true. I barely believed it myself. The previous offer still stands; come with us now or we'll drag you out."

Jorah shook his head, stepping backwards. "I do not want any trouble."

"Then lower your sword."

It had been so long since Jorah saw the man. The younger brother of the Lord of Deepwater Motte. They had even been friendly, once upon a time, but the relationship soured after the death of Jorah's first wife. Jorah had heard some whispers that Robett Glover came to White Harbour recently; he had been captured and then exchanged after Robb Stark's failed conquest. The men on the docks said that Manderly had refused to rally for him, and turned Robett away. What is he doing with the city guards?
The man's face was hard as stone. "We were family, once," Jorah growled. "You would really march me to the hangman's noose like this?"

"Aye, we were family," Robett said darkly. "You married my niece. And then you spat on her memory when her body was barely cold."

He flustered. "I would never… Sigfryd was a lovely girl. I cared deeply for her…"

Sigfryd Glover. My first wife. The longest wife too; Jorah had been only seventeen when they married. Seventeen years old. As my father instructed me to, I married her. Sigfryd had been a plain, maybe homely girl, but polite and sweet. Their marriage had been very… respectful. Dutiful. Jorah had been fond of her.

Not for the first time, he wondered how different his life might have been if Sigfryd had given him a child instead of dying in her third miscarriage.

"Yes, I remember how much you cared for her," Robett said, his eyes still tense. "You waited a month after the funeral before going off and marrying that bitch with a pretty face."

I was twenty-seven. The first woman I ever fell in love with. "Lynesse." Jorah's voice was a growl.

Robett nodded. "That was her. The Hightower girl. The bitch with a pretty face. How well did that marriage work out for you?"

Jorah never replied.

At twenty-seven years old, Jorah had been a fierce fighter, a warrior proven, the Lord of Bear Island, and already widowed. Renowned as one of the best fighters in the north. Respected. He had been a man grown, but it had only just felt like he was starting to really live his life. My father even took the black so that I could become lord. How did things go from there to here?

"You know, if my son ever becomes entranced by a comely lass, I'll tell him about you as a warning."

"Don't," Jorah warned, raising his sword slightly.

"You sold slaves, Jorah." Robett glowered. "Any goodwill the north had for you evaporated with that crime. When you tried to fill your purse with blood money. But you could have stood with honour. Could have stood trial. You could have pleaded. Instead you ran like a craven."

"I will not stand here to be insulted," Jorah said. "Either move aside or I'll show you how much of a craven I am."

"I told you, you will be coming with us."

"You expect me to walk willingly to my own execution?"

"Perhaps you should be executed. Perhaps you deserve it." Robett nodded, folding his arms. "But it won't be tonight. I come on behalf of Lord Manderly of White Harbour. He wishes to talk."

Jorah's eyes narrowed. "Talk?"

"Lord Wyman Manderly will offer you guest right, if you accept it. If not, you'll be coming anyways. I have no interest in an execution, but don't push me."

Jorah glanced at the guardsmen standing in the corridor. All of them were armed and armoured. He paused for a long time, before lowering his sword. Robett just nodded, and motioning for him to follow. The soldiers flanked him from either side, clearing the path out of the Lazy Eel. Jorah glimpsed patrons part quietly as they marched him out. Nobody said a word.

They walked quickly, almost frogmarched him out into the street and into Fishfoot Yard. It was midnight, the city felt suppressed and cloudy. Robett never looked back at him. The proud and pale silhouette of New Castle hovered over the city. Without a word, the guards were heading to the Castle Stair. Marble mermaids shimmered in the street. They're taking me to the keep.

"How did you find me?" Jorah asked. "How did you know I was here?"

"You were less inconspicuous than you might think," Robett replied. "White Harbour has been expecting spies for a long time. We've been well-prepared for the Iron Throne sending their catspaw."

"I am no catspaw." Jorah glared at him defiantly. "And I don't work for the Iron Throne."

"And yet we had men on the docks looking for any new arrivals lingering around. The guardsmen keep in touch with the innkeepers, particularly the darker hovels. We look specifically for any trying to hide. When you arrived – a mystery stranger renting a room with no meals, paying well and spotted writing messages at their desk all night – it raised flags in a city that is on high alert."

Jorah never replied. High alert indeed, to react so quickly.

They headed through the plaza, up the Castle Stair towards the New Castle. He expected them to go for the main entrance to the hall, but instead Robett took them around the back, to a servant's entrance on the far side of the keep. They were waved through by the guards without a word.

"Few people know that you came to White Harbour," Robett said. "It is better if we keep that number a few as possible."

Better for who? Jorah wondered. His body was tensed as Robett led them into a poorly lit servant's quarters. They walked into a servant's dining hall; filled with long, cramped wooden tables and stools, with cheap candles flickering in the corner of the room. Two of the guards waited outside. Another went to guard the door.

He saw two figures waiting for him. One of them was a hulking man squatting on a stool, biting into a thick fisherman's pie in a ceramic bowl. Lord Wyman Manderly had been a fat man the last time Jorah saw him, but now he looked even more bloated and obese. Dark, gaunt circles hung under Wyman's red eyes. Lord Manderly was over sixty years old now but seemed older – clad in sweaty wool and velvet, with a massive belly hanging out from an embroidered green overcoat.

"Ser Jorah," Lord Manderly greeted loudly, chunks of pastry clung to his greying whiskers. "Forgive me if I don't stand."

"Lord Manderly," Jorah said cautiously, before asking, "How did you know I was in the city?"

"You underestimate your fame. When you chose exile all those years ago, you caused quite a stir. The north remembers, ser," the lord said, scoffing down a great gulp of pie. "My cousin, Ser Marlon Manderly—" The tall man in silver-coloured armour by Lord Manderly's side. "commander of the garrison. You were identified as a likely spy entering the city, we watched, and then Marlon here recognised you from the search eight years ago. If you really were Ser Jorah Mormont of Bear Island, then I wanted to speak to hear and now, quietly, rather than throwing you in a cell."
"And what do you want?"

Lord Manderly paused. "That, ser, is a loaded question," the lord said. "Please – sit, eat. I have pie and wine." He motioned to Ser Marlon. "Although the first let the commander here relieve you of your sword and dagger, ser. Allow a fat old man his reassurances."

Jorah hesitated, but he didn't resist as Ser Marlon and the two guards took his longsword and belt away from him. He sat down woodenly opposite Lord Manderly. The guards, and Robett, all had hands near their swords.

"Robett here advised me to drive you out of my city," Lord Manderly explained. "He said that you are dishonourable, and not to be trusted. Is he correct?"

Jorah never said a word.

"… Well…" Lord Manderly continued. "… My opinion is that I have far too many enemies to be able to afford to turn away potential allies. Care for some pie, Ser Jorah?"

He paused. The room was quiet as he dragged back the oak chair and sat down. Lord Manderly cut him a large slice of pie. Ser Jorah wasn't hungry, but he ate it gingerly in any case. Eel pie; it was dry and stale but thick and meaty. Guest right required him to accept the host's food.

"Did you know that a month ago I swore myself off food?" Lord Manderly said, crunching into another slice. "I swore to starve myself until I had vengeance for my son. My poor Wendel. I wailed and I cried in grief, refused all visitors, refused to come to dinner… Two days later, and I realised that my vow was… made in haste."

No one said a word. The silence in the long hall felt as cold as ice. "Have you ever felt hatred, Ser Jorah?" He asked, almost curiously. "Have you ever felt raw, pure hatred?"

_When I saw my love with another man._ "… Aye."

The lord paused to stare down at the pie. Almost absentmindedly, Lord Manderly wiped the gravy off his whiskers. "They murdered my son, ser," he growled. "And, aye, I am fat. I am fat, and perhaps I am craven too. And because I am fat, I will eat and I will feast, and I will fill my great, fat mouth." Sausage fingers clenched into fists. Lord Manderly's eyes seemed to blaze in the gloom. "… And then, eventually, I will gorge myself on their hearts until I choke."

He took another bite of the pastry. "So… to answer your question… _that_ is what I want," Lord Manderly explained, keeping his voice level. "Perhaps Robett Glover is right and you are not to be trusted. However, no matter what ill-will or misgivings I may bear towards you – that animosity _pales_ in comparison to the hatred I bear towards the men who murdered my family. My kin. My _liege_. That is why I am hoping that we may dine together and find common ground, Ser Jorah." Blue eyes stared at him. "So, I think, a more valid question is… what do _you_ want, ser?"

Jorah took a deep breath. He hesitated, pausing for a few seconds before answering. "I want to return home."

"You have been in exile for most of a decade," Robett spoke up, glaring at him. "Why return now?"

"Because I've missed my home for years, and because I want to see my family again," Jorah replied. "Because I heard that Eddard Stark is dead."
"You think that because our liege was murdered that his judgement no longer applies?" Robett said sharply. "You were sentenced to death for your crimes of slavery, ser."

"Aye." His heart pounded. Jorah forced himself to meet their eyes. "But I have been exile for too long. Too much wandering. I wanted to see my family again, to hopefully…"

He let his voice trail off. It was mostly true, as well. He had been lost for a long, long time. Jorah just wasn't going to mention his loyalty to Queen Daenerys to them, not yet. That would only confuse matters.

"… I see," Lord Manderly mused. He and Robett shared a glance. "You have been away from Westeros for a some time. How much have you heard of the affairs in the north?"

"Bits and pieces. Rumours in Essos."

"Rumours. Words. Wind." Lord Manderly grunted. "Perhaps I should start by bringing you up to date." Beefy fingers groped under his cloak, picking out a bundle of faded yellow letters and putting them onto the table. "Words are wind, it is known," he mused. "Spoken words are fleeting and meaningless. But I've always been of the opinion that words written down become more substantial yet no less meaningful. Some letters are nothing but ink. Words are wind, yet writing is water – does that sound right to you?"

Jorah stayed quiet. When in doubt, hold your tongue; his father had always told him. "… If so," Lord Manderly grumbled, "then the writing in these letters is surely nothing more than pisswater."

"What are they?" Jorah asked. Lord Manderly unwrapped the bundle and laid them out in front of him. Some of the letters were long and cursive, filled with titles and honorifics, while others were short and direct. Several of them were written on pink paper. The Bolton's signature.

"Letters from the Iron Throne. From King's Landing. From the Twins. From the Warden of the North, Roose Bolton," Robett said in a dark tone. "First they executed Eddard Stark on a forced confession. Then they colluded against and murdered his son, Robb Stark. Now they seek to defile the Stark's legacy – they send ravens demanding that White Harbour, and all other houses in the north, bend the knee. They even blame the Red Wedding on the the Starks, and expect us all to pretend or die."

"Yet it is pisswater that I have no choice but to drink," Lord Manderly growled. "They send a galley towards me even now. To bring back the bones of my son. Can you imagine it? The murderers returning his body to me? I will have no choice but to feast and dine with those vermin – they talk even about taking my beloved granddaughter – to marry her to Frey weasels! – they expect me to bend the knee to Bolton. The men that murdered King Robb, who sacked Winterfell, who butchered my son!" His fist bounced off the wooden table. Iron cutlery rattled. "… And I have no choice but to nod and go along with it – for they still hold my other son, Wylis, captive."

Jorah blinked. "I see."

"Do you care, ser?" Robett grunted. "Or are you laughing at the fate of Eddard Stark's sons on the inside? You hated Lord Stark for driving you out, I expect."

"Yes," Jorah agreed. "I despised Eddard Stark for sentencing me, almost as much I despised myself for committing the crime." He shook his head. "Yet Eddard Stark's children did me no wrong. I am sorry."

"Indeed." He and Robett shared a long glance. It felt like Ser Marlon was staring daggers into him.
Lord Manderly took a deep breath. "Excuse us, ser, allow us a moment to confer. Enjoy the pie."

It took Robett and Ser Marlon to heave Lord Manderly to his feet. The fat lord panted and wheezed as he left the room with Robett Glover. Ser Marlon stood guard over Jorah. He could hear the faint whispers as Robett and Lord Manderly whispered between themselves outside the room.

Minutes passed. Jorah caught only a single sentence among the hushed whispers, growled in anger. "... We don't have another option!"

The discussion ended quickly. Jorah's shoulders were stiff as Lord Manderly and Robett returned to the room. "We have a proposition for you, ser," Lord Manderly said eventually, wheezing. "A means to help each other."

Jorah never replied. He kept his body still. "You are seeking a way to redeem yourself to the north. To reclaim your lordship of House Mormont," Lord Manderly continued. "A pardon. I have a means in which you may do so."

"You want to return home," Robett said. "House Mormont have been House Stark's most steadfast supporters. Bear Island – your cousins – are the only noble house still openly flying the direwolf. Under the rule of Lord Bolton as Warden of North, the Mormonts of Bear Island will surely be destroyed."

_Jorah realised. He didn't know what, but it was the only reason they were having this conversation. They're offering something, like a sale's pitch._ He held his tongue, to force them to explain. He didn't dare speak.

"I suggest that we make common cause against the Boltons. Against the murderous usurpers. You may not like House Stark, but at least respect them," Lord Manderly continued. "Respect that they are the better option."

"... I am not Lord of Bear Island anymore, my lords," Jorah said carefully. "I have no men-at-arms to raise. If you are looking to form a rebellion, I have no men or coin to offer."

"It is not men or coin that we require," Lord Manderly replied. "We can rally those ourselves. Instead, I require _you_ – you are strong warrior with nothing to lose and everything to gain. I need a single man willing to face great odds and immense peril, to bring back something that might well win this war for us."

"What?"

"Who," Lord Manderly corrected. "Right now, Lord Bolton intends to marry his bastard to Arya Stark, the youngest daughter of Eddard Stark, to verify his claim to Winterfell. If we could provide another trueborn child – one with a better claim to Winterfell – then we could rally the north behind them."

"I heard that the Stark boys are all dead." Jorah frowned. "Are you saying that they still live?"

The lord paused. Jorah noted how he didn't answer the question. "I am speaking of _Sansa Stark_," Lord Manderly said. "The eldest daughter. I want you to rescue her for us, and bring her home."

Jorah blinked in surprise.

"Sansa Stark was married to Tyrion Lannister, the Imp, but rumours say the marriage was never consummated. It could be annulled," Lord Manderly explained. "Sansa vanished in King's Landing after the death of Joffrey. She was held responsible for his murder."
"And I heard that there has been no trace of her since." The rumours of the eldest Stark girl, who had apparently poisoned the king, had been going wild through the Lazy Eel.

"That is correct," Lord Manderly admitted. "Her location is a mystery. And yet recently I have come across a curious testimony that… suggests a possibility."

Robett unravelled an old, weathered map onto the table. A sailor's map of the Bite and the Fingers. "I have been reading the letters from King's Landing with great detail," Lord Manderly said. "… And recently a fisherman off the coast of the Pebble…" He pointed on the map, tracing the route. "… he spotted a Braavosi trading galley with a crowned merman figurehead heading to a small keep on the Fingers – the seat of House Baelish in the Fingers, southwest of the Pabs. That galley is familiar enough in White Harbour to identify it as the Merling King – a ship hired from King's Landing by Petyr Baelish to return him to the Vale."

Jorah hesitated, not understanding. "Why is that significant?"

"Because it should have arrived weeks ago, ser." Lord Manderly explained. "The ravens were very clear: Petyr Baelish left for the Vale, to wed Lysa Arryn, before the wedding of King Joffrey. Why, then, did it take his ship so long to reach his family keep?"

"We checked as much as we could," Robett added. "The fisherman had no reason to lie about the date. It should have been smooth sailing."

"That is not much of a lead," Jorah said.

"It is not. Not much at all, really," Lord Manderly admitted. "But in desperate times, everyone becomes much more… attentive to minor details. I would like to present a theory, ser; that the Merling King was delayed because they lingered in King's Landing and must have only left after the Purple Wedding. Baelish – Littlefinger – lied about his location and departure to the crown to stay unbeknownst to all until roughly shortly after the wedding. The same wedding at which Sansa Stark was last sighted."

Jorah frowned, struggling to keep up. "… You think this… Littlefinger… smuggled Sansa Stark to safety?" He knew of the man Littlefinger only very broadly, by reputation. The Master of Coin, he recalled.

"I do." His arms folded. "Did you know that Petyr Baelish was a childhood friend of Sansa's mother, Catelyn Tully? Rumours say that they were very close."

Ok, Jorah admitted with a quiet nod. That's suspicious. He could see why Lord Manderly might be intrigued.

"Since leaving for the Eyrie, Littlefinger married Lysa Arryn, established himself as the Lord Protector of the Eyrie and the Vale, and then his dear wife died mere weeks after their marriage," Lord Manderly continued. "Petyr Baelish has risen himself up to remarkable heights during this war."

He was feeling more and more lost. The bloody game of thrones, Jorah cursed. Too many players and too many pieces. "… But how does… if he does have Sansa Stark, then how is she involved?"

"I received a message from Yohn Royce, in Runestone. White Harbour deals greatly with the Vale, and Lord Royce wanted to confirm our support as he established his Lords Declarant. He also mentioned something curious. He noted briefly that Petyr Baelish brought with him his natural daughter to the Eyrie. A single passing line that I found very interesting indeed."
"So?"

"I spoke to every man in White Harbour that has ever docked at King's Landing, ser. None of them knew anything about Petyr Baelish ever having a natural daughter."

Jorah paused. "... You're suggesting...?"

"Let us follow the conjecture through to its conclusion. I suspect that this natural daughter of Littlefinger may actually be Sansa Stark, sheltered at the Eyrie. If so, then Petyr Baelish took her after the murder of Joffrey, most presumably so that she could be used as some political piece to further his schemes. Whether or not she is his willing accomplice in this is unclear. The fact that he is keeping Sansa Stark, presumptive heir to Winterfell, in his pocket suggests that Baelish has intents in taking power in the north as well as the Vale, somehow."

"You've got absolute nothing to support that other than some suspicious timings and coincidences."

"I am aware."

"And what do you suggest to do about it?"

"We need Sansa Stark here – in the north – not as some piece in Littlefinger's games. If I am correct, then there's only one option available to us."

"... Which is?"

Lord Manderly looked at him in all seriousness. "I want you to kidnap Petyr Baelish's daughter."

He stared, looking for some hint that this was a joke. There was none. Jorah cursed in Bastard Valyrian. And then he swore again in Dothraki. Dothraki had some great swear words.

"If it was easy, we wouldn't need you," Robett said grimly.

"You expect me to assault the Eyrie singlehanded? You have an army of knights under you."

"An army is meaningless, ser. Littlefinger is no fool, and my knights will be outmatched by the knights of Vale. Any knight of House Manderly will not get near to Sansa Stark." Lord Manderly nodded. "... However, I suspect Littlefinger is trying to consolidate power in the north. If the exiled lord of House Mormont were to approach him, for example, why – I'd expect that Littlefinger is going to be all too eager to recruit such a man into his service. Petyr Baelish would see you as a useful man to keep beside him, another piece that he could exploit."

"You want me to get close enough to kidnap his daughter?" Jorah said in stunned disbelief. The candles flickered. They think that I have no loyalties, and therefore no reason for Baelish to distrust me.

"It is not kidnap if she's already been kidnapped," Robett noted, folding his arms. He's not happy with this plan either.

"Consider the benefits," Lord Manderly pressed. "Rescue Eddard Stark's daughter, and redeem yourself from Eddard Stark's punishment. Save the girl, bring her home, and the whole north will be cheering your name. You could be Lord of Bear Island again."

Jorah had to take a deep breath to steady himself. He could barely believe it. It was pure suicide. It was folly. And yet...
Robett and Lord Manderly shared a glance. Jorah's eyes narrowed. There's something else going on here…

"Why me?" He said finally. "You need the Stark girl. Why are you trusting me to bring her to you?"

"I told you, there's little choice."

"That's not what I asked. Why would they entrust a man who hates the father to save the daughter?

Lord Manderly paused, staring at him intently. "… I am choosing to trust you, ser, because I have no alternative in the matter." Robett nodded, and his face was just as stern. "I have no knights that stand a better chance of getting close to Petyr Baelish. You are my best option in this case, and so I am choosing to believe that your honour and desire to redeem yourself is earnest."

"And if I fail?"

"Then this conversation never happened. There will be nothing but the word of an exiled knight claiming I sent him after Petyr Baelish's daughter."

Ah. "Win and you gain everything; fail and you keep nothing," Robett said. "Those are the stakes. Those have always been the stakes."

"And I'm struggling to believe that you would bet everything on me," Jorah noted. "The Stark girl is important to you."

"She is," Lord Manderly nodded, his eyes narrowing. "But there are… options. Forgive me, ser, if I do not share my alternative plans with you. I will tell you everything that you need to know to rescue the Stark child and nothing more."

He has a backup plan? In case Jorah didn't succeed. In case he couldn't get the Stark girl for the north. Hells, it was quite possible, perhaps even likely, that Manderly was wrong and Baelish didn't have Sansa Stark at all. No wonder he is committing so little.

Jorah took a deep breath. The Eyrie was the most secure castle in the realm. Even if I could be invited in, to try and escape out of the Vale with their ruler's daughter…

He looked between at Robett's and Wyman's guarded eyes, drifting over to Ser Marlon's quiet gaze. Can I trust them? Probably not, but they don't expect to trust me either.

And yet what choice do I have?

The image of his beautiful, gorgeous queen flashed before his eyes. If Daenerys had commanded this of him, then he wouldn't even hesitate. I am doing this for her.

Sansa Stark is the rightful Lady of Winterfell. If I rescue her in Queen Daenerys' name… it could be my best chance at rallying the north for Daenerys Targaryen.

Even the thought of his queen caused his pulse to steady. His eyes hardened in resolution. "I'll do it."

"Excellent," Lord Manderly said, though there was little joy in his voice. "Ser Marlon will put you on a fast galley heading to Gulltown. You'll have your own cabin. Littlefinger has strong ties to Gulltown, I suspect his presence there will notice you. If not, seek out Ser Osney Kettleback – he is..."
Littlefinger's creature, he will be eager to take you to his lord."

"And remember," Robett said darkly, "should you fail--"

"None of this happened," Jorah agreed. Lord Manderly was risking absolutely nothing by sending him on the task.

"Time is short and morning comes. No others in this castle must know of this meeting. Do you have any other questions?"

"One," Jorah said. "Why are you doing this? Why go so far for the Stark girl?"

"Why? Because House Stark shall never have a more loyal ally than I. Bring back my liege lady, ser."

They nodded as he stood up. Jorah asked a few more questions about the journey and the travel, and received curt responses. Lord Manderly stayed sitting down. "Excuse me," the fat lord said, reaching out for the dish of eel pie. "I would like to finish this pie. A good pie should not go to waste."

Ser Marlon returned Jorah's weapons and belt, and led him out of the room. Leaving by a different exit, Jorah noted. The morning was coming, and doubtless nobody would be seen with him come dawn. He would likely leave very early. Another sea voyage ahead of him.

I've never been to the Vale before. I've never even seen the Eyrie. And yet, if all goes well, I'll have to flee, with a captive, through the Mountains of Moon and back to White Harbour, despite pursuers.

Dany, he thought. I am doing this for you. I will prove myself to you. I will prove myself to the realm.

As Jorah walked out down the corridor, he caught the mutter of a conversation behind him. "Are you sure about this?" Robett muttered to Lord Manderly. "… The girl…"

"Yes," the fat lord replied. Lord Manderly's voice was louder, a quiet boom in the dim. "We need the Starks. I do not believe that the time of the wolves is over, not yet. We must gather the pack."

Chapter End Notes

Happy new year :)
Chapter 13

Chapter Summary

The north moves, and news spreads...

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Val

More people arrived every day. The camp was already eight thousand strong and growing, so large that was spilling out of the village, flooding into the forest in a sea of huddling bodies and shifting furs against the cold.

Above her, the wind caused the weirwood leaves to ripple, casting flickering shade over the centre of the camp. The small village of Whitetree, with only three shacks and a handful of goat pens, had become their camp. It had started when survivors flocked to the heart tree to find shelter with the Old Gods, running south from the Milkwater, and then more survivors flocked towards the others.

Now, the camp was already flooding far, far beyond the limits of the small village. Many refugees from the Frostfangs scattered in small group, and eventually word spread across the forest that there was aid and protection to be found at Whitetree, all underneath the looming, haunting gaze of the face carved into the heart tree.

Any protection the camp offered was flimsy at best. They had too many people to easily maintain the perimeter, too many mouths to feed, too few to keep order. Sometimes, it seemed to Val that the face of the heart tree was sneering at them.

They hadn’t had any attacks – only really scuffles between clans – but they would be easy prey when the attacks did come. Nobody was sure whether it would be the dead or the crows attacking them first. That uncertainty made a lot of people scared, and the anticipation could send men crazed.

We’ve got too many women, children, sick and elderly, Val thought with a flash of anger. Not enough fighting men or spearwives left.

Sometimes it seemed like the camp was trying to tear itself apart. For a lot of people, any hope they had of ever going south was destroyed at the Frostfangs, along with Mance's host.

The battle at the Frostfangs. It had been less a battle, and more an exercise in panic and chaos. The memory still sent a shiver down her spine. Even now, three months later and it felt like she was still trying to pick up the pieces.

Now, her sister was eight months pregnant, missing her husband, and starving and freezing in the woods.
Val thought about Dalla a lot. Dalla was the reason Val was still going. Val had to be strong for her little sister.

It was what kept her going through situations like this. The air was thick with the sound of cursing, and Val knew that one wrong move could see her killed. Another day, another petty squabble.

“You fucking bitch!” A man roared, gripping his maul as if to charge at her. “That meat is mine!”

“The meat belongs to the camp, not just to your fat ass,” Val growled. “Everyone gets a share. We feed them all.”

“I brought that elk down,” the wildling snarled, motioning to the large buck elk lying dead in the snow. He was a broad rugged man from the northern river clans. Val never even knew his name. “Me. You telling me that I can’t eat my own quarry?”

“Go out and kill another one then,” she snapped. Men around them readied weapons. “I’ve got starving bodies that need to eat. We share the meat.”

“Fuck them all,” he said. “I look after me and my own, not some weak, fucking little–”

Val’s dagger slipped out of her furs. A sharp bronze dirk that fit easily in her hand. “My camp. My rules.”

“Fuck your rules and fuck you. I came to go to war with Mance, not to get bossed around by his little lay.” His face twisted into a sneer. “I think I’ll just take my meat and leave. I’ll take my men, as well. In fact, I'll take you too – and then I'll see if you're still so bossy with my cock–”

Val snapped. The man hoisted his axe – a brutal weapon with a sharpened stone head that was almost a maul. It was so big Val doubted she would even been able to lift it. It was also totally useless.

By the time the man even raised his axe, Val's dirk was already embedded deep into his chest. The sharpened bronze blade cut straight through his furs. The blood oozed, steaming gently in the cold. The fool. Only a fool brings a maul to a knife fight, she thought with a vicious grunt. She could have stabbed him twice by the time he managed to swing a weapon that size.

She kicked the man to the ground. He was still gargling weakly on the snowy ground. All around her, she saw furred men clutching weapons. His clansmen. They looked angry.

One of them was about to charge with a spear, but then an iron blade was at his throat. “I’d think twice about that,” Garth warned in a low voice.

Val saw spearwives and fighters slip out of the treeline, surrounding the clansman without a word. Val had more allies to support her than the hunter did. Still, she thought furiously, examples must be made.

The hunter gurgled helplessly as Val twisted him over onto his back, and cut the hemline of his hide trousers. With a smooth motion, before anyone could object, she was pulling his pants down with one hand and hacking downwards with her dirk with the other.

The man spluttered something, spitting blood, that might have been some kind of plea, just as Val’s blade cut into soft flesh. She grit her teeth at the side of his shrunken and hairy member, and then her dirk hacked in short, sharp motions. Blood splattered.

Within seconds, she was ripping his bloody member upwards. Just like skinning an elk, she thought, before clutching the man’s beard, dragging his jaw open, and thrusting the severed organ down his throat.

He was probably dead by that point, but Val hoped he lingered just long enough to taste his own bloody cock in his mouth.

Her hands were bloody as she turned, marching towards the man that Garth held a sword point. “You One-Eyed Wulf?” Val demanded. “You’re that man’s chieftain?”

The chieftain stared in shock, and then his eye narrowed. “... That man was Marv,” One-Eyed Wulf spat. “My cousin.”

“I don’t give a shit.” Val grunted. “You keep your bloody men under control. Otherwise, next time it’ll be you eating cock.”

The blood on her hands stung. The thought of blood splattering flashed before her eyes. “And get that elk skinned and cut!” Val shouted at the clansmen. They all stared with anger, but she didn’t care. She turned to look at the crowd gathered around the firepit.

“We share the food!” Val shouted at everyone watching. “We share the weapons, and we share the work! Only together can we survive!” Her eyes flashed, her blond hair blowing around her hood. “Anyone else have a problem with that?”

There were a lot of angry stares, but no outright challenges. One-Eyed Wulf backed down and glared at the snow. His clan would simmer and stew, but they wouldn’t go against her. Still, Val knew it was only a matter of time. That hunter was the fifth she had had to kill in the last seven days. It would only get worse as it got colder.

Mance had been the one who held the host together, and Mance was gone. Now, even the warbands, the raiders and clans that survived were breaking apart and going their own ways. That left Val primarily with the non-fighters; the ones that were all relying on her for support because she was the only one who still offered it. The weak, the sickly and the old.

And the pregnant, Val thought with a scared flash towards her sister.

“You shouldn’t have done that,” Garth muttered to her quietly, as they walked away.

“That man had it coming,” Val growled.

“And you shoved his own dick into his mouth.”

“It shut him up, didn’t it?”

“And One-Eyed Wulf has a dozen angry clansmen under him,” Garth warned.

She didn’t reply. Val knew she had lost her temper, but she was irritated enough that she didn’t care. Four spearwives flanked her, meeting her glance. The women’s eyes were all hard.
The free folk were all fighters. She had more women than men in her camp, they all could be trusted to hold a spear and fight with the best of them. Still, she was also lacking experienced warbands, clans and leaders, and Val couldn’t afford to lose any more of them.

Every time somebody argued about the sharing policy, or the need to look after the non-fighters, or even just objected to taking orders from a woman, then it could fracture the whole camp. Val couldn’t afford to let it stand.

All men are the same, Val thought with an angry glare. No man liked taking orders from a woman, especially not the dumb ones.

There was a figure waiting for her towards the camp, a squat woman that looked even thicker under the furs. She held a spear with the dry, rotting decapitating skull of hound on it like a totem.

“Harma,” Garth said with a curt nod. “I’ll need to borrow a few of your raiders. Watch Wulf’s men a bit more closely.”

She just nodded. Harma Dogshead was an ugly woman, no question about it. She had a squashed face, a thick jaw, and beady eyes like one of her dogs, but with a toughness that could only come from a lifetime of fighting. She was a heavyset woman, renowned as one of the fiercest raiders around – Val had always respected that much.

And Harma was also one of the very few raiders that stuck with Val after the battle. Val owed Harma more than she could possibly give for that. Even now, it still made Val breathe a breath of relief to see Harma by her side.

“We’ve got two hundred Marakks coming down through the pass,” Harma reported. “Heading towards us.”

Val swore. “Marakks.” Garth frowned. “Are those them buggers that eat human flesh?”

Harma nodded. Everyone hated the Marakks – one of the ice river clans from the north of the Frozen Shore. Even Mance had been hesitant recruit the ice river clans to bring them into his army. They barely spoke even the Old Tongue. The Marakks had their own language, unique to that corner of the north. They were violent, savage with strange customs, and it was even said that they ate human flesh.

“Are they hostile?” Val asked.

“No, they’re starving,” Harma replied.

Starving for what? Val wondered. Val hesitated briefly. “Then bring them in. They get to join the camp, same as everyone.”

"You sure?"

No. "Yes." Val nodded. "We bring in everyone in. Old grudges don’t matter. We all stand together here, just like we did with Mance."

"Alright," Harma said. She was a woman of few words. They walked together through the mush of snow. Harma walked with a limp, one leg staggering so badly she walked lopsided, but it never seemed to slow her down. It was said that a hound had attacked Harma when she was a girl – chewing on her leg and dragging her away. Ever since then, Harma had murdered, skinned and beheaded every dog she'd encountered.

'Just like we did with Mance', Val thought with a mental grimace. It unnerved her how many times she had to use that phrase. Well, look at me – taking over Mance's place. Somewhere, the bastard was probably laughing.

Val would never forget on that moment in the mountains when Mance had walked away. The free folk had been scattered and exhausted when the crows the ambushed them, cutting them down from horseback and arrows. What little remained of Mance's host had been cornered by the Night's Watch, and Mance surrendered himself to the crows, on the condition that they would let the rest of his people walk freely. Dalla had screamed and begged Mance not to go, while Mance had only smiled softly and kissed her before slipping out of her grip. Mance hummed the ‘The Dornishman’s Wife’ as he walked out of their ranks and towards the crows.

The crows walked away with an easy victory, Mance went with them to give the survivors a chance, and Dalla had wailed herself to sleep every night for weeks.

For such a large camp, the air seemed strangely hushed as they walked through it. “Food supplies are fading,” Garth said, shaking his head. "I've got people foraging the forest clean, but it won't last. Too many people. We're going to starve soon."

Starve more, you mean. "I know," Val said with a grimace. "We'll have to move out soon."

"There are too many people to move quickly. We're over eight thousand now." Mance had stored food, livestock and supplies for months to prepare for his great host, but it still had barely been enough. And then they had had to abandon most of their food stores in the mountains.

"I know," Val paused, calling to Harma. "What about Craster? How much food does he have?"

The name caused Harma to scowl. Craster had always been a blight even among the free folk. Craster had only survived for years in his keep by making friends with Night's Watch, using them to protect him from any chieftain that might take issue with his presence. More recently, Craster had made a darker sort of deal – allying himself with more evil creatures.

Even the free folk gave Craster's Keep a wide berth. Still, Craster has hoarded food, livestock and supplies for years...

Harma met her gaze, asking clearly 'are you sure?' in her eyes. Val just nodded. "Take whatever men you need and clear Craster's keep out," Val ordered. "That monster has been asking to be short a head for a long time now."

"And Craster's daughters?" Harma asked, before adding. "And wives?"

"Every free folk has gets a place here. Bring them to camp if they want to join."

They were approaching Val's tent. Harma walked in first, staring at Dalla sleeping soundly wrapped up in furs. Garth hovered by the boundary. Val's sister was heavy with child, and sleeping and weakening more with every day. The healers said that it would be a difficult childbirth.

Dalla's pregnancy had worsened ever since they took Mance. The cold and the long walk certainly hadn't helped, either. Val knew that unless Dalla recovered soon, she wouldn't survive the childbirth.

_I will not let my sister die_, Val thought with cold determination. The whole reason Val had took command after Mance had been taken was to protect her sister.

Harma's eyes flickered with concern looking at Dalla, before back to Val. "So what's the next move?" Garth asked, lowering his voice as he stepped inside the tent. "We gather up the people, and we go where?

Val's face crinkled. "There's no next move," she admitted. "Mance was the one who promised to get everyone across the Wall, not me. I only ever promised to try and keep them alive, and I'm not even sure if I can keep that one."

"We stay here, we die," Harma said bluntly.

"Where else can we go?" Garth asked.

"South." Harma's eyes were hard. "We gather up however many fighters and climbers we can get, and we take the Wall. We take Castle Black. Just like Mance planned."

Val had been thinking the same thing, but she shook her head. "Mance had a hundred thousand men and we were still destroyed. I've got a tenth of that left. We won't survive an assault."

"Don't have a choice. Attack or die. We need to attack."

"Mance knew even with a hundred thousand it was folly. And since we couldn't even find the Horn of Joramun--"

"Fuck that bloody horn," Harma grumbled. "We wasted ourselves searching for the bloody fucking horn. We need to attack now, with what we've got left, before we give the Others another shot."

Val shook her head. "No. We need to rally to something. We need to gather up however many more we can get, enough to actually have a chance. We've got eight thousand, but how many of those could actually survive climbing the Wall? Or sieging the gate? We need to gather up what's left of the free folk."

There was a long moment of quiet consideration. Dalla shifted in her sleep.

"The Thenns are marching towards the Shadow Tower," Garth said after a pause. "Last seen at Kipler Pass. Five hundred men, I hear. Good warriors."

Val shook her head. The Bridge of Skulls at the Shadow Tower was a death-trap. Larger armies than five hundred men had failed to break it before. "They still won't stand a chance alone."

"I know. They've made Sigorn the new Magnar," said Harma. "Young boy. Fierce. He's going to try and avenge his father."

"He'll die young avenging him, it seems."

"Give him another reason to fight, then." There was an edge in Harma's voice. Val glanced at her, realising what she meant.
"Oh." Val sighed. "You mean fuck him."

Garth shifted uncomfortably. Harma shrugged. "If it gets us five hundred good men. The Thenns are always loyal to their Magnar, vicious buggers too."

"And he just decides to take me?"

"Bite his balls off," Harma suggested.

Despite herself, Val chuckled. She wondered briefly if any man had ever tried to steal Harma. She almost pitied them if they did. Harma was as hard as they came; as ugly and as fierce as a bulldog, while Val was tall, long legged and nubile with blonde hair. More men had tried to steal Val than she could even remember – it was one of the reasons Val had learned to be real good with a dagger.

Still, Val wondered what it would be like to be able to walk through a camp and have men bow their heads in fear and respect rather than lecherous stares.

Val was beautiful. She knew she was – everyone said so, ever since she was a child. She was a talented tracker, a better fighter, and beautiful enough to get attention. Even when her father had died when they were young, Val had grown up strong enough to take care of her little sister too. Many men tried to take her, and sometimes she even let them – until enough fought over her to gain a reputation for her little boy 'pets'. Eventually, she had enough of a fame that they would say she stole men, rather than other way round.

She thought of Jarl, the man that had died trying to protect her at the Frostfangs. Jarl had been sweet, young and passionate; a fierce young raider that had scaled the Wall eight times, and Val had been taken with him when they travelled together under Mance. They had never been in love, not really, but he had been good enough to her that she missed him. He hadn't deserved to die like that.

"You really think the Thenns will agree?" said Garth. "Mance had to defeat Styr three times before he agreed to support him."

Harma shook her head. "Sigorn is not his father. Val could treat with him."

"The Thenns respect warriors more than a… anything," he said, with a slightly uncomfortable glance to Val. Heh, is he worried about me? Val thought with a bemused stare. How sweet. And stupid. "… It should be Harma – or another raider – to reach out to the Thenns."

"Val leads, I fight." Harma shrugged, nodding at Val. "She needs to be the one to lead because she actually still cares. I stopped a giving a shit about the world years ago."

Val snorted. Harma's voice was so deadpan it made her laugh. "I care?" She teased. "If you don't care about anyone else, then why have you been sticking around?"

Harma shrugged. "Just because I don't give a damn doesn't mean I can't appreciate the trait in others."

"Sure," Val said with a smile. She suspected that Harma was a lot sweeter than she wanted anyone else to know. Words are wind, but actions spoke louder than anything. There had been a lot of people who wanted to leave the old and the sickly to die, and when Val had spoken out against it, Val took a deep breath, pacing around the tent. "... So this new Magnar of Thenn?" she said after a long pause. "You say he's young? Young enough to fall for a pretty face?"

Harma nodded. Garth hesitated, before asking, "You okay with that?"

"I would fuck every single man in this camp if it meant keeping my sister safe," Val said with a shrug, casting a loving glance towards Dalla. "I would kill every single man, too. Dalla is all that's important to me to."

"Then I'll send some outriders towards the Thenns," Garth agreed, with some reluctance. "Let's see if they're interested in an alliance."

"Good." Val nodded. "Do you want to make a picture of my tits just to make sure Sigorn knows what I'm offering?"

Garth squirmed. Val just snorted in laughter. From what she heard, Val would be able to wrap this Magnar of Thenn around her little finger. Young warriors were always so easy. She already turned, pacing slightly. "Any others we might be able to rally?"

There was a flicker across Harma's face. "The Lord of Bones is to the southeast, near Deep Lake. He's been gathering up raiders too," she said distastefully. Harma Dogshead had spent a long time warring with the Lord of Bones even before Mance brought them both together for his army.

Val shuddered. Everyone hated Rattleshirt – he was almost as bad as the Weeper. "Well, him I can't fuck," Val muttered with a shiver. The Rattleshirt's disgusting fascination with corpses was well-known. "... Would he be interested in joining forces?"

Harma hesitated. Val raised an eyebrow. "Right now, working together is more important than old grudges."

"... I'll send Halleck over to treat him," said Harma, with just a touch of unwillingness. "I hear that Varamyr has joined with the Lord of Bones too. My guess is they'll have about a thousand men."

Val nodded, trying to think any who might have survived the Frostfangs. They needed all the strength they could get. It had taken Mance years to unite the clans, and now she had to do it again in a matter of months.

"What about Howd the Wanderer?" Val asked finally, sitting down cross legged around the firepit to think. "Or Morna White Mask?"

"Howd hasn't been seen after the Frostfangs," Garth said with a nod. "Morna is raising men by the East Coast, but I wouldn't trust that witch as far as I could throw her."

The free folk had no lords or kings, they would only follow the strong. Their 'leaders' were men of note; warriors strong enough to gain fame or raiders that had spilled enough blood that others would follow them. If Val could gather enough big names to ally with her, then eventually the free folk would flock to her, just like they did with Mance. It was the only hope of reforming Mance's army.

It took hours to scrape through any who might want to join forces, to gather as many as possible.
Harma had been one of the most feared wildling raiders for years, she knew every clan leader and raider in the north, and had battled and spilled blood against most of them. There were grudges in the north as old as oak trees.

Garth left to summon outriders and hunters for information, to find out where people were last spotted. Harma sent her brother, Halleck, to scout out new arrivals, while Garth brought half a dozen seasoned raiders or travellers, one after another. Men and spearwives with names like Jax, Quort, Ryk and Willow. Val promised them all guaranteed rations if they could name names and locations.

Harma had spent her life fighting them, after all, Val mused.

"It might work," Garth admitted. "We could recruit as many as possible, and they might be eager to join. The Nightrunners and Cave Dwellers have been forced from their lands, they'll be eager to join. Some of the others… maybe, but they'll expect bribes or show of strength, yet it's possible…"

"I'm sense a 'but' coming," Val said.

Garth stared at her. "But the men won't follow a Queen-Beyond-the-Wall."

She snorted. "I don't give a fuck what they'll follow," Val said with a shrug. "I've got no interest in that title – it was that title that killed Mance."

"You don't know he's dead."

"He's as good as dead." Val stared miserably at Dalla. "There are plenty of fools that will fight for that bloody title, let them."

The 'King-Beyond-the-Wall', Val thought to herself, what an empty honour – a mockery of a title, really. Many previous Kings-Beyond-the-Wall had only been named that post-mortem. There were only really two requirements for the title; you had to unite the free folk, and you had to promise to bring them south of the Wall.

No King-Beyond-the-Wall had ever truly fulfilled that promise yet, Val thought. Stupid bloody title.

Still, would the free folk even listen to her? How many would dismiss her and laugh at the pretty little 'girl' trying to play queen? Mance's legacy would only take her so far.

Her hands twiddled, playing with her dagger. "Right now, I've got the biggest host left in the north." All that remains of Mance's army, she thought. "And they'll be desperate too. They'll need something to rally at, so they'll rally here."

Harma nodded, but paused. "Second biggest, actually."

Val frowned. Harma continued. "You heard of Mother Mole? That old wood witch that used to live under the weirwood tree?"
"The crazy one?" Val snorted. "She once promised Dalla that she'd be stolen by a giant badger, unless she ate an acorn every day."

There were plenty of woods witches in the north, but Mother Mole was one of the more queer ones – a short little dwarf that never left her cave. Nobody was quite sure how old she was. Apparently Mother Mole survived by eating weirwood roots, and sacrificing rodents. "Aye. She's given a prophecy that the free folk will find their salvation at Hardhome. They've been gathering there for a month."

"How many?" Val said sharply.

Harma shrugged. "Around ten thousand, I reckon. I heard from my brother that more and more people are moving east. Everyone who never marched with Mance is fleeing to Hardhome."

Val's face twisted. The entire north was being forced to migrate one way or another. "Hardhome is a cursed place," Val mused. "But it can be defended… the cliffs alone could stop an army…"

"That might work against us too," Harma's brother, Halleck, noted. "If the Others or the Night's Watch attack, then they're all going to be trapped on the cape."

"More of a reason for us stop that from happening, then."

"So what do you want to do about it?"

"I don't know," Val admitted. "Right now, we've got gather up those in the west, not the east. Everything that was left of Mance's arm—"

There was a stir from Dalla's bedside. She was waking. Val dropped everything to rush to her, holding her hand and wiping her brow. Harma watched stoically across the tent.

"… Val?" Dalla murmured. She was sweating even in the cold.

"Easy, Dal," Val whispered, wiping her brow. "Just build your strength."

Dalla had always been a sweet little thing. Dalla was calm and level-headed while Val was fiery and tempered, but Val had worked so hard to keep her safe. When Mance first stole Dalla, it had taken two weeks for him to convince Val not to geld him for it. Mance always had been a charmer, Val cursed.

Dalla loved Mance. Her sister loved Mance more than Val had ever loved anyone but her.

"The baby, Val," her sister muttered. "I can feel him kicking…"

Val's hand moved to her sister's swollen chest. She couldn't feel anything. "… I had a dream," Dalla said weakly. Her voice was dazed. "I dreamed I saw a great white bird, like a mountain taking flight…"

"Save your strength," Val said softly, kissing her sister on the cheek. "I'll bring you something to eat soon. We're having smoked elk. I'll fetch you water, and a wood witch to treat your fever…"

Dalla groaned softly, and Val's eyes flashed with worry. The pregnancy was draining her strength. and the fever was burning through her quickly. Val sat by her sister's side, even after her eyes had clickered shut.

I'm doing this for her. Val thought quietly. Her and the babe.

I'll kill every crow on that Wall to give my sister a chance to get to safety. To find warmth again.

"Come," Val whispered to Harma and the others. "My sister needs her rest. Let's talk outside."

The walked out of the tent, and Val nodded to two spearwives, Rowan and Mo, who had offered to guard her sister's tent. The camp wasn't so safe that Val trusted to leave Dalla unprotected. The camp was always busy and crowded – with eight thousand wildlings cramped into an area so small that even livestock would be cramped. They all tried to huddle together for protection for the cold.

As far as the eye could see, there was a sea of furs with smoke rising over the camp. The sight of so many people cramped together still took Val's breath away.

They're relying on me, Val thought, and Dalla would want me to keep them all safe as well.

It should be Mance here, right now, uniting the free folk. Mance could have charmed a bear into joining their army. Instead, Val was left desperately trying to pick up the pieces, and look after her sister.

Val took a deep breath, taking in the thick scent of smoke and sweat in the air.
"... Send Gerrick to treat with Sigorn," Val said after a long pause. "Offer him reinforcements to avenge Styr's death.
Tell him that we wish to avenge Mance's too. The Thenns understand blood debts, they'll come.
Meanwhile, I need you to deal with Craster. Kill the bugger and take everything he has."

"With pleasure," Harma said in a low growl.

"I'll send Maris, Jax, Lenn and Gragg to treat with the Lord of Bones and Varamyr. I can offer them a mammoth tusk bow, a white bearskin cloak, golden engraved bracelets and a sapphire amulet if they came to parley," Val said with a sigh. She still had some of the treasures that various clans had gifted to Mance in tribute – they were valuable enough to be used to bargain with the free folk leaders. "Rattleshirt and Varamyr are both proud men. If they think I'm begging them, then they'll come just to gloat over me."

"And when they come?"

"I'll offer them a chance to become the next King-Beyond-the-Wall," said Val. "I'll offer it to all of the raider leaders, actually. Every one of them. In private."

"Of course." There was a small smile on Harma's lips. Proud men could be easily manipulated.

By her other side, Garth blinked. "If they think they can take the title of King-Beyond-the-Wall, then they'll fight for it."

"Let them. So long as they wait until we're across the Wall, they can fight all they want about who gets bragging rights."

"And then are we moving east?"
"We'll have to." Both the Shadow Tower and Castle Black were too strong; Eastwatch might be the least defensible one out of the bunch. "If there are ten thousand free folk at Hardhome, we can't leave them there to die." Val scratched bit her lip, trying to imagine the numbers. How many people survived the Frostfangs? How many would still be able to rally to her? The longer she waited, the more that number would drop. She couldn't afford to linger any longer. "... If all goes well, if we could meet up with the forces at Hardhome, we might be able to gather... hmmm... thirty thousand free folk?"

Thirty thousand free folk. Even if only a third of those were fighting bodies, then that was still a force ten thousand strong. That could be enough to take the Wall. Possibly.

"Possibly," Harma nodded. She paused, frowning slightly. "Although if we are to head towards Hardhome..."

"What is it?"

"There's another raider leader that we haven't mentioned," said Harma. "The Weeper."

Val shuddered. "Fuck that creep."

There are a lot of nasty wildlings, Val admitted. Both Rattleshirt and Varamyr are cruel, evil men. Still, the Weeper is just a whole other level of bad.

"Last I heard, the Weeper took five hundred strong men east. He was planning on building boats to cross the Bay of Seals, to come around from the south to take Eastwatch."

Val nodded. "Good. That type of fighting and raiding is what the Weeper is best at. He can bleed the Night's Watch for us."

I just don't want him in my camp, she added.

"Except it seems the Weeper's plans have changed. He's at Hardhome now."

"What?" Val blinked. "The Weeper is listening to prophecies now?"

"I was talking to two new arrivals this morning," Harma explained. Sometimes Val thought that Harma or her brother must talk to every single person in the camp. Few things happened in the north that she wasn't soon aware of. "They heard it from a hunter they met around Storrold's Point, who heard from a man fleeing Hardhome as fast as he could run. The story was... jumbled..."

Harma sounded cautious, like she wasn't quite sure about the rumours. "They say that the Weeper has joined forces – allying himself with a Jon Snow."

It took a while for the name to ring. Val frowned, before slowly remembering the young, solemn-faced boy that had been presented to Mance at the Frostfangs. The crow that killed the Halfhand, and walked around with a white direwolf. It had been quite a stir at Mance's camp.

Val blinked. The Jon Snow she remembered had been a quiet, broody man barely more than a boy, who had been desperately afraid yet trying to act like he wasn't. She tried to picture him with the Weeper, of all people, and the image just didn't seem to work.

"The crow?" Val exclaimed. Jon Snow hadn't been anywhere on her list of priorities, but she had thought he died at the Frostfangs. "Does he still have eyes or not?"
Harma grunted. "I hear strange things about that one. I met a man who spotted a white direwolf with red eyes weeks ago, but then when he tried to shoot it…" Harma paused. "The man said he heard a sound like giants marching, and he ran away. Other cave dwellers from the north have said they've heard sounds like thunder in clear skies too. I thought nothing of the tales, until they mentioned Jon Snow again, and I remembered his wolf…"

"Aye, a warg, I think," Val frowned. "But why would the Weeper ever work with him…?"

"Not with." Harma shook her head. "Work for. The men were quite clear. They say the Weeper is working for Jon Snow."

Now that was too far. The Weeper would never work for anyone but himself. "Then that tale has been jumbled into nonsense."

"Most likely," Harma agreed, but her eyes still flickered. "Yet even jumbled tales generally start somewhere. Like I said, I've been hearing strange things."

"Like?"

"I hear that the Alvin Whaletooth has joined with the Weeper too. As has Marthe of the Antler, Old Man Harwick and Bullden Horn. Even the Lord of Seals. Every clan or raider they meet seem to have flocked to him."

Val blinked, trying to link the names. Alvin Whaletooth was one of the few men who still fished around Storrold's Point, while Marthe of the Antler was a reaver from a river clan, and Old Man Harwick was the patriarch of his own clan. Bullden Horn's claim of fame was that he had ventured onto Skagos, fought the cannibals and killed a unicorn, while the Lord of Seals was a famed raider who had crossed the Bay of Seals more times than any other raider alive. All of them were respected raid leaders and clan chiefs around the peninsula and east coast.

And I know for a fact that the Lord of Seals hates the Weeper's guts. They would never, ever work together…

Harma shared her glance. "Like I said, strange things," Harma admitted. "The men said that this Jon Snow has unearthly powers, even that he has…"

Val frowned. "What?"

Harma shook her head. "… No. Like you said, the tale has been jumbled into nonsense."

"And yet you sound concerned."

"Concerning times," Harma said with a shrug. "But just something to bear in mind that Jon Snow may have ten thousand men surrounding him at Hardhome."

Val turned to stare at Harma, heads on her hip. "Wait," she said after a long pause. "You're saying that in this tale that the men told, Jon Snow is leading the free folk at Hardhome?"

"No." Harma shook her head. "In this tale, they're worshipping him."

---

Sam
The castle was panicked. It seemed that Sam couldn't even walk through the courtyard without getting in somebody's way. The Night's Watch became more and more panicked as more news kept on coming through.

Sam tried to his best to stay helpful. Ravens kept on coming and going through the rookery, and the officers never stopped marching through the tower, demanding news faster than Aemon or Clydas could provide it. Sam would bumble around fetching paper or trying to sort out the cages, but then Sam walked and crashed into Thorne, and the knight turned red as he screamed at Sam to leave.

Eddison grabbed Sam by the arm and slowly pulled him out of the way. "Let's leave the officers to their work and stay clear," Edd had soothed. "It's stressful work, I imagine, preparing for a king."

Nearby, Dareon had laughed at that, in his clear high voice – totally ignoring or perhaps not caring about the expression on Sam's face. "Which king, exactly?" Dareon laughed. "We've got a king coming from the south, a king coming from the north, and a king beneath us. It looks like kings are a dime a dozen these days!"

Thankfully, Grenn was there to shove Dareon to the ground, but Sam still felt hollow as the brothers pulled him away. The castle felt grim – had been ever since the news three days ago.

It started with a raven from Eastwatch, followed by several more. All of the letters were written in Maester Harmune's scribbled hand, but signed with Cotter Pyke's name. The letters were in quick succession; the first sent upon spotting ships on the horizon, the second upon ships approaching Eastwatch, then of recognising the banners on those ships, and then when the ships had docked at Eastwatch.

By the time the confirmation came through, the whispers were already going mad. It was official; Stannis Baratheon had arrived at the Wall. Lord Commander Mormont announced it in the meeting hall, but the news had already spread through gossip.

"King Stannis Baratheon docked at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea early this morning," Mormont had announced. "He brought with him four thousand men-at-arms and landed knights, along with his wife and court, claiming to be here to defend the Wall."

"Stannis Baratheon is no king!" Janos Slynt exclaimed in a loud voice. Next to him, Ser Glendon Hewett and Ser Alliser Thorne murmured in agreement. "The man is a traitor to the realm! We cannot have him here, the crown–!"

Janos had blustered at that. "Stannis Baratheon set siege to King's Landing! He fought against the rightful king! If we harbour him here, the crown will bring great ruin upon us!"

More murmurs of agreement. Bowen Marsh nodded. "Stannis brings men to defend us," Ser Mallador Locke objected. "We are massively undermanned, who are we to deny aid?"

"Stannis brings us no aid, only ruin!" Someone else shouted.

"We sent pleas to all five kings, and Stannis is the only one who answered," Thoren Smallwood protested. "Stannis comes ready to face off a wildling attack."
"What a shame we're not under attack, then," Thorne said with a grunt, to the sound of a few sniggers.

"And what of the wildlings amassing Beyond-the-Wall? We've seen them at Whitetree! At Hardhome?!" Thoren demanded, glaring at Thorne. "How long before they attack and we're left with only one man to defend every three miles of Wall?"

"I fear my sworn brothers may be overestimating Stannis' motivations," Othell Yarwyck spoke up, from his position at the table. The First Builder's voice was slow and lumbering. "Stannis comes under the pretence of aid, but he has no such intentions."

The room fell silent slightly at his voice. The Lord Commander still hadn't spoke, but instead watched the room with a hard face. "Stannis was defeated at the Blackwater," Othell continued. "He lost his army and his men, but he hasn't given up his rebellion. In fact, I wager that he has come here to start a new one."

"What are you talking about?" Jarmen Buckwell demanded.

"We have all heard about the events in the North. Robb Stark's defiance. The invasion of ironborn. The Sack of Winterfell. The Red Wedding." A quiet murmur went through the room. "Roose Bolton has been named Warden of the North now, but the North is still in much discontent. I expect that Stannis Baratheon has come here to take advantage of that."

There were dark whispers and mutters. Sam had stood at the back of the room, listening intently. "Stannis is here to try and incite the northern lords into rebellion against the crown. He has come to us to take advantage of our hospitality and our castles, to drag us into an affair that we should have no part in!" Othell said, slamming his hand against the table. "Mark my words, he will stay in our towers while he plots his rebellion, using us as his own shield, and then he will march south to wage war and leaving us his unwilling accomplices!"

"Stannis Baratheon threatens our neutrality," Bowen Marsh agreed. "Our future is at risk."

Septon Cellador slammed his hand on to the table too. "Stannis has declared for false gods! He consorts with witches and burns sacred objects!" Cellador preached. His voice sounded slurred by alcohol. "He will lead us all into damnation!"

"Stannis is just as much of an enemy as the wildlings!"

The conversation shifted in tone as more brothers took up the cry. Some looked unhappy, but the protesters slowly fell silent. Sam distinctly remembered how little the Lord Commander had spoken during that meeting.

After that, things started to change. Every day it was like the castle became a little bit more hectic. Mormont ordered a hundred men to go to Eastwatch, but discreetly. Around every corner there were hushed whispers and discussions. There were orders for all men, stewards and builders too, to triple archery practice.

The entire castle was preparing for a battle, and a battle on the wrong side of the Wall this time. Everyone was talking about how they were going to get rid of Stannis.

"Stannis holds Eastwatch," Jarmen Buckwell was heard saying one night. "Maybe not officially, but his troops outnumbers Cotter Pyke's men fifteen to one. If we demand that Stannis leaves, what's to stop him giving us the demand instead?"

Donal Noye shook his head. The one-armed blacksmith didn't look happy. "I knew Stannis before the Wall," said Donal. "He's a hard man, sure, but always just. I struggle to imagine that man going against the Night's Watch." His eyes flashed. "Not unless we provoke him."

"You knew Stannis," Jarmen argued. "This Stannis is a different man. The battle of Blackwater left him bloodied, and he's desperate enough to try anything. Half-mad too – I hear he brings with him a red witch that rants about flying storms and an evil monster of cold."

Sam was quiet as he overheard the conversation, before Thorne shouted at him to rush to archery practice. Things were moving quickly. Apparently there had been some sort of disagreement at Eastwatch, and then during the night Iron Emmett had ridden to Castle Black to gather forces. During archery practice, the air was cold, but it gave Sam a chance to talk with Edd, Pyp, Grenn, Toad, Owen and Haldur.

"Are we really going to fight against Stannis Baratheon?" Sam had hissed nervously. "Isn't that taking part in the affairs of the realm?"

"Well, yes," Dolorous Edd admitted. "But if we don't get rid of him and he stays here, then that would also be taking part in affairs of man. Harbouring a rebellion and whatnot. Damned if we do, damned if don't."

"But he's king!"

"Arguable, that one," Edd mused. "But then again, what kingship isn't? Kings seem to attract argument, I've found."

"Weren't you saying that the king died?" Owen the Oaf exclaimed, a confused expression on his face as he gathered up arrows. He didn't put the arrows back in the quiver, instead just cradled them.

"No, that was Robert Baratheon, the king, who died," Toad corrected. "Stannis is his brother."

"I was sure you said…"

"So what we do we do?" said Grenn, looking to Edd.

"The Lord Commander will ask him to leave," Pyp offered.

"And if he doesn't?"

"That's why we're practicing archery, isn't it?"

The thought made Sam shiver. Against wildlings, the men of the Night's Watch tended to have an advantage, but against knights? Stannis had four thousand battle-hardened men – they could cut through the sworn brothers if they chose to.

"I heard Smallwood ranting about that the other day," Toad admitted. "He's says there's ten thousand wildlings are massing at Whitetree, walking distance from the Wall. Turning away help right now is folly."
Edd nodded. "He may have a point."

"It'll be a lot more folly when the Warden of the North march up to kill us for working with Stannis," Pyp argued.

Edd nodded again. "Also a good point."

"I thought Starks were Wardens of the North," Owen questioned, still cradling his arrows.

"Nope, they're all dead too," Toad said with a sigh, while everyone else ignored Owen. "Boltons are the Wardens now."

"We handled the wildlings ourselves once," said Pyp.

Grenn shook his head, lowering his bow. "We got lucky against the wildlings once," he said. "… and they still bloody reformed ten days later."

Normally, when a wildling host was smashed, the clans and raiders would dissolve, maybe for decades, until the next king united them. Beyond the Wall was not a united place; one defeat and the old grudges and feuds would return and the wildlings would break – that had been the Night's Watch go-to method for centuries.

This time, though, it seemed that the wildlings were desperate enough to stay together even without their king. Either that or a new King-Beyond-the-Wall has already been crowned, Sam thought nervously. The rumours about a new King-Beyond-the-Wall had been going spreading quickly. Lots of whispers and speculations.

They had all seen the ranging reports. Even in the wake of Mance's host breaking, an army had regathered at Whitetree nearly ten thousand strong, and pulling in more wildlings every day.

"We'll never be able to ambush them this time," Grenn said. "They're too close to the Wall – they've got bloody scouts watching the gate from the treeline right now. If we open up to send any rangers out, they know about it."

It's a good plan, Sam admitted. They camped right outside on our doorstep to make sure we could never ambush them again.

"What about Hardhome?" Sam asked. He had heard the place being mentioned regularly.

Edd glanced at him. "Nobody's really sure," Edd admitted. "A second wildling host, maybe. All we've got are second-hand reports."

"Smallwood is protesting, Donal Noye is deadset against it," Edd mused. "But Bowen Marsh, Othel Yarwyck and Thorne are all calling to be rid off him. At this rate, the Lord Commander will have no choice."

"Jarmen Buckwell seems to be more in the middle," Sam said.

"Still not enough."

"What about Wythers?" Owen asked, with a goofy grin. "He's second in command, right?"
Toad frowned. "Wythers? Ottyn Wythers? He's dead, Owen – he died at the Frostfangs."

"Really?" Owen definitely seemed confused. "No – but he was knocking on the gate the other day."

Edd loosed the last arrow. "Well, that's enough for me, I think," he said. "The king will be getting hungry."

"Mance?" Grenn frowned. Edd was the steward placed in charge of taking care of Mance and the other prisoners. "How is Mance?"

"Alive, not so healthy, I'm afraid." Edd admitted. "I'm not allowed to touch him except to put food into his cell."

"We should have just killed him already," said Toad.

"Hm, Lord Commander wants him alive," said Edd. "Dead, he's useless. Alive, somebody might try something stupid like rescuing him."

"Deaths kinder than spending three months in those ice cells."

"I can't say about that; I've never met death to say how nice it is. Don't really care to find out, either."

"Come on, Owen," Grenn said with a sigh. "We've got patrol duty on the Wall."

"But what about the storm?" Owen protested.

"What storm? Last storm flew by a week ago."

Owen shook his head. "No no no; I heard the storm."

"So long, Killer." Toad waved to Sam, as the group started to leave.

Sam stayed out long after everyone else had left, continuing to fire arrows at the targets. His arm was healing, but it still hurt every time he pulled back on the bowstring. I'm still terrible at archery, he thought grimly.

The very next day, though, things became a bit more hectic. Cotter Pyke arrived from Eastwatch with fifty men, and then Denys Mallister arrived with another hundred men from the Shadow Tower. It put the total number at Castle Black to seven hundred, still including the men that had lingered after the Great Ranging.

The whispers went wild. They must have left Eastwatch and Shadow Tower with less than a hundred men each, Sam realised. Everyone was talking about how the Old Bear must be putting together a force to drive Stannis out of Eastwatch.

Later, towards dusk, Thorne came and grabbed Edd and Dywen from the quarters. He paused as he stared at Sam, though, with a soft smirk. "Come with me, Tarly," Thorne ordered, the smile playing on his lips. "You should hear this too."
Those words made Sam tremble with nerves, and somehow it didn't help that Thorne was totally quiet as he led them to the King's Tower.

Inside, there were over two dozen men, all cramped into the solar before the king's quarters. A great fireplace roared while the men huddled by the front. Old, moth-eaten tapestries hung down the stone walls. Mormont was at the front, along with Denys Mallister and Cotter Pyke. The mood was grim. Most of the senior officers and rangers are here, Sam realised as he shuffled along the very back.

At the far end of the room, and it was hard to see between all the bodies, there were two figures lying on the ground. They were men with shaggy faces, bruised and bloody skin, and chains on their wrists. Wildling prisoners, Sam realised, they must have come in with the new arrivals. A Shadow Tower man, Blane, stood guard.

"What's going on?" Othell Yarwyck demanded, glancing around the room.

"Brothers," Mormont said in a grim voice. "I thought you should all hear this now. Blane?"

The ranger nodded. "I found these men along Long Barrow. A small raiding party from the east. Six of them originally, the others died during capture." Blane glared at the wildlings. "Now then, tell us what you know. Exactly what you told me."

One of the wildlings stared at the ground firmly. The other one, younger, gulped. "… An army gathering at Hardhome," he mumbled, his voice raw. "… Fifteen thousand free folk…"

There were quiet murmurs in the room. They had only heard faint whispers of Hardhome before now, but fifteen thousand wildling? Sam thought, trying to stay hidden.

"… She told us we would find salvation…" The wildling murmured, his voice delirious. "She promised us salvation at Hardhome, and there was…"

"How many boats?" Blane demanded.

"Half a hundred." A flicker of smile across the wildling's face. "He's going to bring us all south…"

"Are you sure about this?" Mormont asked Blane.

"It fits with other things that we've heard," said Blane with a nod. "We've known there have been wildlings have been heading to Hardhome for some time now."

"There still are," Thoren Smallwood said darkly. "We've seen the fires moving across the forest. The wildling host at Whitetree is moving. They're heading east. Another ten thousand."

"You think they're planning on joining together?"

"Possibly." Smallwood nodded. "Might be a conjoined assault. The wildlings at Hardhome travel by sea, across the bay, and attack Eastwatch from the south. The remainder attacks Eastwatch from the north. They break the castle and open the gates."

There were dark glances around the room. "A mass raid across the Bay of Seals…" Mormont growled.
"May I remind everyone that Eastwatch only has three ships to patrol the entire bay?" said Cotter Pyke, his arms folded. "If the wildlings try to cross, we might not even see them coming."

"Fifteen thousand wildlings…” Mormont shook his head. "It would be a gamble how many make it across. And how many we could stop…”

"There's more," Blane glanced at the Lord Commander, before turning to prisoner. "Tell us who leads at Hardhome."

"… The Weeper… Alvin Whaletooth… The Lord of Seals…” The wildling hesitated, a small defiant smirk appearing on his lips. "… And Jon Snow."

The silence dropped over the room over the room like a stone.

Sam's mouth slowly fell open. It took a long time to for the words to work their way into his head. It seemed so outlandish, so unbelievable it barely made sense.

Sam turned, and saw Alliser Thorne grinning. Blane's eyes were dark, and so were a few others. They already knew, but Mormont and the others seemed stunned. They must have talked about this beforehand, Sam thought foggily. Before coming to the Lord Commander.

Sam saw Lord Commander's eyes widen in shock. "… You lie!" Mormont snarled, pressing his dagger against the prisoner's throat.

"… Jon Snow…” the wildling gasped. "… He said he's going to lead us south… the King-Beyond-the-Wall… Jon Snow… the wood witch promised us salvation, and there he was…”

The mutters were louder now, filling the room with frenzied whispers and murmurs. On Mormont's shoulder, his raven cawed, "Snow, snow, snow." The words echoed as the torchlight flickered.

"That's ridiculous!" Mormont snarled. "You expect us to believe…?!!"

"I've heard the name Jon Snow before," Blane said, looking at Mormont. "From other wildlings. The name is spreading throughout the north. I never knew the significance of the name until I spoke with Ser Alliser here. I understand he was a ranger of yours?"

Mormont's face flinched. "A steward," he said after a pause. "My personal steward. He went missing during the ranging."

"He deserted," Thorne said coldly. "He deserted and joined Mance. Now it looks like he's trying to take Mance's place."

What are they talking about? Sam thought confusedly. Jon? King-Beyond-the-Wall?

"It's absurd," Mormont shook his head. "The boy is seventeen years old. It took Mance decades to unite the wildlings."

"Aye, I could see Jon as a traitor," Bowen Marsh said with a nod. "He was a young boy, easily led astray. But to be leading wildlings against the Wall? After being missing only four months? I have trouble accepting it."
Cotter Pyke spoke up in a gruff voice. "Aye," he agreed. "But this man is not the only one saying it. My rangers have found several with the same name on their lips. From Shadow Tower to Eastwatch, they are talking about him. One wildling was even screaming 'Jon Snow will come for you all', just before we shot three arrows into him."

Thorne laughed at that. "Let the boy come," he sneered. "Weak little thing wouldn't last a second in a real fight. I'll slice that bastard's head off."

"Perhaps you will, ser." Iron Emmett regarded Alliser coolly. "But he's a bastard with fifteen thousand wildlings gathered around him."

Mormont shook his head. "It's ridiculous," he said in a firm voice. "I cannot believe it possible. Could it be a different Jon Snow?"

"It might be," Blane admitted. "It is a fairly… common name in the north. But north of the Wall, though? Not so much."

"Everything we hear about him seems to corroborate three basic details," said Denys Mallister. The elderly commander of the Shadow Tower had a calm, lumbering voice. "One; that a man named Jon Snow is vying to be the new King-Beyond-the-Wall. Two; that Jon Snow is leading at Hardhome with fifteen thousand wildlings. And three…" He looked at Mormont. "…that this Jon Snow used to be a former crow. I believe it must be the same Jon Snow."

Mormont's face was pale, his mouth drawn. Sam just stared. What are they even talking about? He thought. It's madness. Any second now Sam expected someone to burst out laughing.

This is clearly some kind of strange, delirious joke, Sam thought.

The wildling on the floor was staring upwards at the scene with bloodshot eyes. There was a hoarse chuckle from him. "… Jon Snow will take us south…" he laughed. "… Jon Snow controls winter, he brings with him a great white beast that will destroy the Wall… I've seen it with my own eyes, larger than any ship, as big as a mountain…!"

Blane kicked him sharply in the chest. "What is that fool talking about?" Bowen asked confusedly.

"Bah! Foolish nonsense. The wildlings make up tall tales about their leaders," Thorne said with a grunt. "I've heard it before. Back when Mance was just getting started, there were wildlings that would swear on their lives that Mance could transform into a giant crow and fly over the Wall, and that he could charm any man, woman or beast with his magic lute. Like I said, nonsense."

The wildling was still laughing, coughing up blood at the same time. "Take them away," Blane ordered. "We've heard enough."

Mormont's stared at the fire for a low few seconds. "How dire is the threat beyond the Wall?" He asked finally.

"Getting more dire every day," Iron Emmett said. "We had hoped that Mance's defeat would scatter the wildlings, but… if we do nothing, we could have a horde of maybe twenty five thousand attacking any day now."

"Larger, I expect. Once the wildlings rally, more will flock to them. The whole north is desperate – every man, woman and child is stirring."
"Then we cannot allow the wildlings to organise," Thoren Smallwood said. "Let's take the fight to them. We did it once, we do it again. We break the wildlings separately before they have a chance to gather."

"We do not have any mountains to ambush them in this time, ser," Blane objected. "The force at Hardhome is fortified and secure."

"And what of the second host, the one currently moving through the Haunted Forest towards Hardhome?" Mormont demanded.

"Less secure," Blane admitted. "They're a large force and they're moving slowly. They're spread out wide."

"They're still ten thousand strong," Bowen said, his voice nervous.

"We fought similar numbers at the Frostfangs," Thoren Smallwood insisted, his chest sticking out in pride.

"We have hostages," Othell Yarwyck suggested. "Their king, Mance Rayder is still alive. We have many of their clan leaders. We could force the wildlings to disperse by ransoming them."

Iron Emmett just shook his head. "The wildlings won't care. I expect any position of power they might have held has already dissolved."

The bickering continued. Sam just stared from the back of the room, wondering quietly why nobody was freaking out over Jon. The wildlings seemed to think he is their king, for goodness sake!

Mormont never spoke. The Old Bear was silent for half a minute, staring at the wall. Sam had never see the old man look so worn and grim. "... Thoren is correct," the Lord Commander said, his low voice causing the room to fall silent. "We must break the wildlings before they have a chance to assemble. We landed a critical hit against the wildlings at the Frostfangs, and now we must finish the task."

He turned to face the room. All eyes stared warily. "We will attack both wildling hosts," Mormont announced. "We will bring a fighting force of four hundred men out from Castle Black. We will ambush the host in the forest, and we will break them again. They will be slow, vulnerable and tired, and we will cut through them."

At once, there were cries of objection coming from half a dozen men. "We can't – we just got back from one ranging – we can't risk another!" Bowen Marsh objected.

"Four hundred men, that's nearly half our strength...!"

"We don't have enough rangers, we would have to bring in the stewards and builders," Denys Mallister said.

"It's too risky!" Othel growled, shaking his head, his long beard swaying.

The Old Bear looked unmoved. "At the same time, we will strike at Hardhome by sea," Mormont continued. "We will attack Hardhome, destroy their boats, and we will kill this King-Beyond-the-Wall."

Cotter Pyke scoffed, folding his arms. "And what fleet do you want me to do that with?"

"Stannis Baratheon's."

There was a moment of quiet. "What?" Thorne demanded.

"Stannis claims to be here to aid the Wall," said Mormont. "We will give him a chance to prove it. Stannis has brought with him a fleet of twenty-nine ships, is that correct?"

"Aye, belonging to a Lyseni pirate in Stannis' service," Cotter said with a nod.

"Good, you will assist Stannis' forces as he takes his men to Hardhome," the Old Bear ordered. "You will attack the peninsula; the wildlings will not be expecting such an attack, and we let Stannis' forces lead the assault."

Cotter blinked. "That… could work. I imagine that Stannis' knights would make quick work of the wildlings." He frowned. "But why would Stannis commit to such attack – he risks losing many men either from storm or battle."

"He claims to be here to help us. We will see how true his cause is," Mormont said.

"And if he says no?"

"Then we will take action." There was an edge in the Old Bear's voice like iron. There's cunning in the plan, Sam realised slowly. If Stannis did prove an enemy, then they could weaken him against the wildlings. If Stannis refused to go, then he lost any justification for being here.

There was an uneasy murmur in the room. Mormont turned to the group. "If it goes well, then it will be a blow that the wildlings will not recover from. They will be unable to rally against us," he said firmly. "We will ambush the group in the Haunted Forest, and then, when Stannis assaults Hardhome, our men will be waiting around the peninsula to block survivors."

There were murmurs of objections, but they seemed to die under the iron in Mormont's voice. "Cotter Pyke, return to Eastwatch at once. I must write a letter to Stannis informing him of our decision," Mormont ordered. He paused. "Ser Alliser, make arrangements to assemble the men. We will let Stannis set sail at the turn of the moon, and our ranging shall leave shortly afterwards."

Sam couldn't stay quiet any longer. "What about Jon Snow?!" Sam shouted, his voice cracking. All eyes turned to stare at him. Why the hells is no one else freaking out about this?! They are saying that Jon is leading wildlings!

The smirk on Thorne's face was vicious. Mormont's eyes were hard. "… As far as I am concerned," Mormont said after a pause. "The brother of the Night's Watch that I knew as Jon Snow died at the Frostfangs. The man at Hardhome is either a traitor or an imposter, but he is no sworn brother."
Well, I wasn't planning on posting this chapter so soon, but it was done and I'm safely ahead, so I figured I might as well. Enjoy :)

Chapter 14

Chapter Summary

The court of Hardhome.

Jon

“You blithering craven!” Old Man Harwick roared, slobber dripping down his mane. “I’ll gut you like a pig!”

“Come on then, you geezer!” Sweety Tyk taunted, spinning his blades in his hands. “You want to dance–!”

He arrived just in time to stop the fighting. “Enough!” Jon bellowed, glaring at the scene. “What is going on here?”

His presence caused some stirs, but nobody backed down. There was already a crowd gathering. The free folk loved a fight.

Harwick gave a wary gaze at Jon, but he didn’t lower his weapon. “This craven stole my daughter!” Old Man Harwick shouted, revealing a toothless mouth as he jabbed his staff at Tyk. “My daughter Holly, and this little thief–!”

“I took her fair and square, Old Man,” Sweety Tyk mocked. He was a lean man, slender but quick, with a bronze dirk in each hand. “Maybe if you weren’t so busy sticking your dusty little wiener into your wives you could have stopped me!”

“You little–”

Jon moved as fast as his leg would take him. His bad leg always ached and locked in the very cold mornings. Jon drew Dark Sister in a swift flourish, flashing it between the wildlings. “Enough!” Jon repeated, his eyes hard. Harwick snarled at him, while Tyk glared.

Old Man Harwick was something of a legend – he had had twenty-four wives over his life and currently still had nine (the youngest being eighteen), along with thirty-three sons, and more daughters than anyone could count. The man was a walking fossil, but even at seventy he was every bit the lecherous warmonger he’d been at twenty. The man was old, sure, but he was still in good shape and he clutched a solid oak staff supported with bronze, which he could swing as hard as any mace.

Sweety Tyk was the opposite – a cocky raider that had made his name raiding over the bay and stealing women. They laughed at him for his clean shaven and effeminate appearance, but he was lightning fast with his dirks and one of the best seamen the free folk had.

Personally, Jon didn’t really care if the two men wanted to fight it out, except it likely wouldn’t end in a single fight. Harwick had a whole clan of sons and grandsons surrounding him, all clutching weapons, while Tyk was very popular among the shipbuilders and bay raiders. If it came to blood, Tyk’s friends would fight against Harwick’s sons, and things could turn very bloody very quickly.

Jon had seen similar situations before. Every blow, scuffle or disagreement constantly threatened to escalate.

Jon clutched Dark Sister tightly, well aware that he was standing between two groups each a few dozen strong. His sword flickered between Harwick and Tyk, trying to judge which one was the angriest, which one would back down first.

Now which one do I need in my camp the most?

Eventually, Jon turned to Tyk. “Sweety,” Jon said coldly, pointing Dark Sister at Tyk. “Where’s Harwick’s daughter now?”

Tyk shrugged. He glanced at a couple of his friends. “I don’t know,” he said, nonchalant. “Maybe we aren’t done with her.”

Yep, that did it. Jon approached Tyk with care, pointing his blade straight at the man. “Sweety,” Jon said in a low voice. “You are going to bring Harwick’s daughter back to him, and then you are going to stay well away from him and his family for the rest of your life.”

His face twisted. “And what if I don’t?”

Jon’s eyes narrowed. “You don’t really want me to answer that question, do you?” He whispered. A moment of doubt passed over his face. Tyk glared, but then relented. He nodded curtly before lowering his dirks and stepping backwards.

Jon half-breathed a sigh of relief. Jon almost thought they could all walk away from it too, right up until the moment that somebody in the crowd laughed. The sound of raucous, taunting laughter filled the air.

Tyk’s eyes widened, and froze. Damn, Jon cursed. Tyk is an arrogant boy. He couldn’t stand the thought of someone laughing at him.

Just like that Tyk changed his mind. Tyk wasn’t prepared to back down any more. Instead, he snatched up his dirks, twirling them as he charged, stabbing wildly at Jon.

Jon darted backward from the strikes. Harwick roared and clutched his staff to join the fight, but Jon held up his hand to stop him. Dark Sister was in his other hand, but Jon waited to attack. He needed to see how many would side with Tyk.

Three of the other bay raiders clutched weapons and charged at him. Good. If Jon hadn't been here, if they had been fighting Harwick instead, then Jon imagined more would have joined with Tyk. Only four against one – not the worst odds I’ve faced. Take them down fast.

Tyk swiped downwards. Bronze blades sparked against Valyrian steel. Tyk cursed as one of the blades shattered in his hand, and Jon twirled to slam him from the side. Tyk plummeted as Jon shoulder barged him downwards roughly.

Another man tried to charge him, swinging a blade. Jon parried each blow. Low, high, left, right.
He could hear Dark Sister singing as it cut through the air. A second one tried to attack from the same side, yet Jon turned, deflecting the blow and letting the two men crash into each other.

Tyk was already up again, growling as he plunged forward with only remaining dirk. Another man tried to charge Jon with a heavy axe, but Jon caught the blow even as he parried Tyk, twisting the blade around.

Dark Sister struck – sudden slashes one after another. The first man dropped with his shoulder cut open. Tyk narrowly avoided the second swing, trying to aim for Jon’s weak leg in retaliation, yet Jon was already sidestepping. The two other men lunged, but one took Dark Sister across the hip, while Jon shoulder barged the second onto the ground.

Behind him, Harwick cheered in a bout of laughter, while Tyk screamed as he lunged at Jon madly. He was too slow – the back of Jon’s hand was already whacking into his throat, and Tyk went flailing backwards and stumbling down. Dark Sister plunged after him.

For a second, Jon was ready to plunge his sword into Tyk’s chest. Then, at the last moment, Jon’s blade darted to the side.

The blade bit into the snow right between Tyk’s legs. A fine tendril of blood splurted over the ground. Tyk’s scream of pain cut the air open.

“I could have killed you,” Jon muttered. “You may wish I had.”

The man’s face was ghostly pale, contorted in pain, as Jon pulled himself straight. He looked at the three other men lying across the floor, and that at the other bay raiders clutching weapons.

“Anybody else?” Jon demanded.

Nobody met his eyes. “Then take this fool to the wood witch to get him stitched up,” Jon ordered, taking a deep breath as he sheathed Dark Sister. He turned to the three men that had fought besides Tyk. “And you three – you will bring Harwick’s daughter back to him.”

Behind him, the men were laughing furiously, staring as a couple pulled Tyk away. “Har!” Harwick roared. “You are a damn good fighter Jon Snow!”

Jon panted, still trying to catch his breath. He been in more fights at Hardhome than he ever had before. Harwick seemed in good spirits. “I should curse you, I suppose, for stealing a battle from me and letting that bastard live,” Old Man Harwick mused. “But hells, it was so much fun watching you geld the son of a bitch! Ha! You have my thanks!”

Jon nodded, his mouth tight. I had to intervene, he told himself. If Harwick and Tyk had fought, it might have triggered a feud that could tear the camp apart.

Still, tomorrow it would be a different argument, different people, and Jon would have to intervene then. Damn, was this what Mance had to handle every single day? I have fifteen thousand and it’s torturous – what would it be like with a horde of a hundred thousand?

Harwick was still laughing, watching the bay raiders run. “Tell me, Snow, do you like women?” Harwick asked.

Jon blinked. “Excuse me?”
“Well, I’ve never see you with a girl.” Harwick shrugged. “No harm, of course – each to their own I always say. I dabbled a bit, but I can’t say I’m too much keen on the other side myself.”

Jon blinked, struggling how to respond to that. “If you were interested, though, I’ve got many fine young daughters,” the old man offered. “I wouldn’t object if you were inclined to steal one or two of them.”

Jon forced a smile. “Many thanks, but I have another,” he said, the image of Ygritte on his mind.

Harwick nodded knowingly. “Ah, a true love?”

“Yes.” There was a silent pain in his chest at the thought. The last he saw of Ygritte, he had been pushing her off a cliff.

“Well, take care of her, then. You only get a few of those sorts.”

“I will, ser.” Jon paused. “Although, if you’re willing to help, the stakewalls on the west side are crumbling. Do you have the men to fetch lumber to repair them?”

Jon nodded, turning to walk away. The crowd was already dispersing, but there was one figure waiting for him. The Weeper stood with his arms folded and a sneer on his lips. Hatch and Yoldo were standing behind him, and another two raiders on his right.

Jon glared. “You were the one that laughed,” he said to the Weeper, after everyone had left.

“Excuse me?” The Weeper replied with a grin.

“You laughed. When Sweety Tyk was walking away, you laughed at him from the crowd.”

“Well, it was pretty funny,” the Weeper said, his smirk widening.

“You provoked Tyk by laughing,” Jon said darkly. “I could have resolved it without bloodshed.”

The Weeper nodded. “You’re right. You could have. That’s why I laughed.”

He glowered at him. The Weeper just smirked, keeping his voice low. “If you let them walk away, Tyk would have brought back Harwick’s daughter peacefully, and they would have all hated you for it. Tyk would have resented you, Harwick would have cursed you. You would have created two dangerous enemies, both with friends who they can share their hatred with. Instead, Harwick is cheering your name, and all of Tyk’s friends now have a healthy dose of respect and fear for you.”

Jon didn't reply. “I did you a favour, Snow,” the Weeper continued. “Never let them walk away with a grudge – if you let bitterness sow, hatred grows like a weed.”

There was a moment of quiet. Jon hesitated a few seconds, but then turned and walked away. The Weeper just smirked once more and followed him.

“You should just have killed Tyk, you know,” the Weeper said. “Do you think he’ll thank you for letting him live like that?”
Jon shook his head. “I don’t care,” he said bitterly, thinking of the way Tyk had screamed. “Nobody needs to die.”

The Weeper grunted. “It’s with statements like that you prove yourself still a fool.”

Jon stopped on to of a small crest, staring out over Hardhome. Fifteen thousand wildlings, Jon thought with a deep breath.

The came sat on a sheltered bay by the cape, a natural harbour. The waters were thick with fish, and there were colonies of seals and sea cows around the coast. A great cliff loomed above the settlement, pocked with cave mouths, at the back of the settlement. A solid wall of rough stone, and the whole settlement was scattered around the beach and rocks leading down to the coast. The whole camp slanted slightly towards the coast, rolling from the cliffs. It was an easily defendable location, at least; the only way through was either around the coast in the west, over the rocks and cliffs, or up from the southeast.

When Jon first arrived, the wildlings had been taking shelter in the caves – named the screaming caves. Many still were, but now there were more huts and shelters to be made for all free folk. The wood was a problem; at one time Hardhome had been once rich with forests, but those trees were dead and instead they needed teams to drag lumber up from the south.

It had been a long, hard struggle with many cold nights. The settlement was plentiful, but it still received viciously cold winds sweeping across the cape from the sea.

There was virtually nothing left of the old settlement that once resided here, except for burnt out husks of decaying buildings, and the occasional rusted weapon. It had been over six hundred years since the destruction of Hardhome, but it was said that so much blood was spilled that it stained the ground, leaving it hard and barren. Before the migration, Hardhome had been a cursed place that most avoided.

Occasionally, Jon could still feel it. He felt his skin tingle at the sound of the wind blowing through the caves. There was something about the place that put him on edge. The only heart tree they had was an ancient, knotted and blackened tree, kneeling over itself like a dying man.

Jon had ordered stakewalls and fencing built across the cape, and defensive perimeters and patrols around the settlement. He even arranged night patrols, fishing boats and hunting parties, while raiders built boats and barges to take them across the sea. There were fifty-four barges now, and more coming along every day.

It was exhausting work. Managing the free folk was the most tiring task of all. Every single time Jon gave an order, he was met ‘why should I listen to you?’ After that, Jon either had to convince each one, or they would walk away. Sometimes they just had to be convinced it was worthwhile, or bribed, coerced, or threatened. Even worse were the squabbles – constant disagreements and feuds at every moment that threatened to escalate.

Still, it felt like he was making progress, as grim as it was. The camp was being slowly being fortified, and fishermen bringing in hauls to feed the people. There were still a lot of starving mouths, but not so many as there once were.

The annoying part, though, was that Jon knew he could never have done it without the Weeper.
The Weeper kept order as much as he did. There were very few that dared to challenge him. The Weeper arranged the patrols when nobody else did, he led the defensive parties. The Weeper knew everybody’s names – who was dangerous, who was influential, and who wasn’t.

Jon had never liked the man – he despised him at times, even– but he still needed the Weeper. It was even a good partnership, occasionally. Any conflict that Jon couldn’t resolve easily, the Weeper would step in. It made people all the more willing to let Jon resolve it easily. And he knew the Weeper knew it too.

“How were the attacks last night?” Jon asked finally.

The Weeper shrugged. “Probing, mostly. A dozen wights spotted from near the cliffs. Me, my men and some Hornfoots took care of it.”

“We got a couple on the east coast,” Hatch reported, motioning at Yoldo. “Shambling things, damp with seaweed. They almost slipped by us, too.”

“They are testing our defences.” Phantom had spotted those wights as well. Jon kept the shadowcat away from the camp, but didn’t let her run away either. The Others had been attacking every night for the past week, always in a different place.

“Aye,” the Weeper agreed. “We can expect a big assault any day now.”

Jon bit his lip, staring across the men. They had many good warriors, but it wasn’t strength that concerned him. It was discipline. “… We need to start training men into organised groups,” said Jon. Right now, every time they needed a force the Weeper just bellowed at the closest men to follow him. “Set up proper divisions – give each one a shield and a spear and train them how to hold the line. Otherwise, if we are attacked each men is just going to run wildly.”

The Weeper scoffed. “Boy, these men have fought more battles than you’ve had shits. You try to ‘train’ them anything, you know how that’s going go down?”

“You were at the Frostfangs,” Jon said darkly. “You know how lack of discipline could hurt us.”

For once, the Weeper didn't replied. Jon thought about it. “Let’s try the younger men, then. Not the old warriors, the green boys – the ones that will be less stubborn. Hatch, could you gather up as many untested men as possible? We build up a rank and file from them – they need the training the most, and it gives an excuse to invite more seasoned men to support them.”

“You want an army of green boys standing in a line?” Hatch asked.

“I want an army of men standing in a line. Teach them well and they won’t stay green for long.”

Hatch nodded and stomped away. Jon’s head was spinning with the thought of everything he would need. He would need commanders to support them, officers to drill them, and somebody would have to provide their shields, spears and swords. The wildlings had few enough armaments as it was; anything more than wooden spears was a luxury. More importantly, he would have to organise them – the free folk changed warbands at whim, but proper divisions would need numbers and names.

* I could offer extra rations to join up, Jon thought. Maybe if I get enough of the clan leaders sold on the idea…
He would have to talk to each one in turn. Why do the free folk insist on making it all so complicated?

The Weeper snorted. “‘Rank and file’ ain’t going to mean nothing with those fortifications the way they are,” he said with a grunt. “Those fences on the west are so weak that my granny could break through them.”

“Your granny was the scariest hag I’ve ever met,” a raider muttered.

“I’ve got Harwick getting the lumber for them,” Jon said, although even Harwick’s extended family would have trouble. “Could you assist?”

“Course I could. You want me to stop the patrols to do that, then?” The Weeper rolled his eyes.

“I’ll find someone else.”

“And those fucking Frozen Shore tribes have been stirring trouble again by the caves,” the Weeper growled, as he stomped off. “Keep them in the line or I’ll slaughter the lot of them.”

Jon headed towards his tent. There were already a group of people waiting to talk to him. After this, I’ve got to find men to fix the stakewall, inspect the barges, convince the fishing parties to go out for another catch, before walking around the camp to make sure the patrols are doing their jobs. Doubtless there would be another crisis along the way.

He held up his hand at the people waiting as he limped quickly into the tent. The wizened woman, not quite as short as a dwarf but close, with a gaunt, leathery face hovered over Sweet Tyk’s body.

“What did you do with this one, then?” Mother Mole asked, glancing at Tyk. The raider was unconscious and pale.

“He was a rapist,” Jon replied.

The old woman chuckled, mushing up herbs and seaweed into a bucket. The wood witch was a good healer and the people listened to her, so Jon tried to keep her close. Every time Jon had been in a fight, Mother Mole had been waiting in his tent with poultices to treat bruised knuckles and small scrapes. She has a chain of small white stones hanging around her neck, Jon noted. She wove a necklace out of weirwood roots, with white stones picked up by the beach.

Mother Mole was as much of a leader as anyone in the camp – not so much to the raiders, but many followed her loyally and even the clan leaders respected her. Mother Mole’s followers spread across many clans, they clung to her for wisdom. And she was one of the only ones who followed Jon without any complaints.

She lowers her head when she talks to me, Jon noted, she never looks at me in the eye. Always respectful, always obedient. Mother Mole never used any honorifics, but she still gave him the same sort of respect.

“Every man out there is a rapist, by your southron terms,” Mother Mole chuckled.

Jon grimaced. The wildling tradition of ‘taking’ women had never sat right with him. “Disrespect, then.”
“Are you sure you don’t want me to let him die? Might be kinder.”

“He doesn’t deserve to die for being an arrogant fool.”

‘Deserve’ got nothing to do with it.” Mother Mole shook her head sadly. “You should’ve killed him.”

Jon shook his head. “No, he’s a good raider and a better seaman. We need him.”

“As you wish.” Mother Mole’s wizened hands pulled a knife out of the fire – a blade so hot it was glowing. The wood witch headed towards Sweety’s bloody groin, glancing at Jon. “I would do your business outside, if I were you.”

Jon agreed. He quickly left the tent, looking around the group waiting to talk to him. Most of them looked unhappy. Jon suppressed a sigh. The court of Hardhome wanted to talk to him.

The first man stomped up to him, and Jon stared into the scowling face of the Lord of Seals. He was a large man with a beefy face, tangled beard knotted together, broad shoulders and strong arms, clad in a heavy, patchwork sealskin cloak that draped across the ground. In his youth, he had been an accomplished raider across the bay, but then he ‘retired’ to build boats for other raiders instead. He had made quite a name for himself as the closest thing the wildlings had to a shipwright; every raider who used his boats in a successful raid paid the Lord tribute.

“I hear you’ve given two of my ships away to those filthy cave dwellers,” the Lord of Seals said, double-chins wobbling. He was the best boat-builder they had; Jon had put him in charge of the construction for the camp.

He sighed. “The cave dwellers need boats too; we’re all crossing the bay together.”

“Then those bastards can build their own, they’re not touching—”

Jon turned and glared. “Those boats are mine,” he snapped. “The men that brought the wood did it for me, the men that cut it did for me, and you, who oversaw construction, did it for me.” Jon’s eyes flashed. “I brought you in for your help and I paid you very well for your help, but stop your whining otherwise I’m going to ship you out on the same boat as the cave dwellers.”

The Lord of Seals growled, his face red, but he turned and stomped away. I shouldn’t have done that, Jon thought, he is a prickly man. Still, right now Jon was too irritated to care.

The second one waiting for him was a group of scouts and outriders, staring at Jon nervously. Furs was standing behind the scout with a frown. “This scout just returned from the west,” Furs said, shoving the man forward. “Figured you should know.”

The man looked nervous. He has a white stone pinned to his furs like a brooch, Jon noticed. The scout didn’t meet Jon’s eyes, instead staring at his feet. “… We’ve got the host heading towards us now. Maybe two days away, but they’re making good time?”

Jon frowned. He had heard of the other remnants of Mance’s army gathering in the west a week ago. Now, that host was heading to Hardhome too. “How many?”

The scout shook his head. “Thousands of free folk. Too many to count. I talked with one of their scouts, one of Rattleshirt’s men, he said they had ten thousand.”

“Then who’s leading them?”

“Who’s not leading them?” Furs laughed. “I hear they’ve got everyone from Magnar of Thenn, Lord of Bones, Varamyr and Harma vying for control.”

All of the lords and ladies of the north, then, Jon thought quietly. When they arrived, nearly every wildling leader and perhaps most of the population Beyond-the-Wall could be at Hardhome.

... I wonder if any of them have red hair, cute crooked teeth and a beautiful smile. Most of the remnants of Mance Rayder’s army were with them now; the host might be Jon’s best chance at seeing Ygritte again. If she didn’t end up with them, she must have headed to the Frozen Shore. If she had survived at all.

“Don't forget the one who brought them all together - Val,” another scout continued.

Jon remembered Val – a tall beauty who had been in Mance’s tent. He nodded. “Do you think they’re coming to fight?”

“I think they want to go south, like the rest of us,” said Furs. “Might be good to boost the perimeter guards, though. Just in case.”

Jon nodded. Now, how the hells am I meant to organise them all?

“Alright, then we’ll bring some men to meet them tomorrow,” Jon decided. “Let’s gather three hundred strong fighters – and I’m bringing Sonagon too.”

Furs grinned broadly, showing missing teeth. The wildling liked watching the dragon at work. Shock and awe, Jon decided. Sonagon is good at that. If he could get them to his side, then that could be over twenty-five thousand to take south. It was a lot of bodies.

And I've got try and do it bloodlessly, Jon thought. He wanted the Night’s Watch to open the gate and close them behind them. It was a tall order, but he knew his dragon would be there to convince them.

Jon looked at the scouts. “Rest up, gather what rations you need, and go back out there,” Jon ordered. “Make sure you watch them as they come up, see if any are readying warbands.”

The scout nodded, clutching the white stone. “O–of course,” he stammered, lowering his head as he turned quickly to walk away. Jon paused, watching him run. He bowed to me, Jon thought, the boy bowed hesitantly, jerkily, like he wasn’t sure whether he should bow or not.

The other men dispersed slowly, all with gripes and complaints of their own. A small man with pointed teeth and a painted face, from one of the cave dwellers, who only spoke broken Common, came to Jon to threaten him about his clan’s lack of food. Furs needed to translate. It could have been another fight right there when another of the free folk was there to accuse the cave dwellers of stealing chickens.

Jon very nearly lost his temper as he had to remind everyone that food was to be shared. He promised to look into the stores, even though Jon knew there wasn’t enough food to end the complaints.
Then, there was a feud between Bullden Horn and Marthe of the Antlers that came to Jon to settle. Buleden wanted vengeance after Marthe stole two of his nieces years ago, but if Jon punished for every stolen girl then he would have to punish every single man in his camp.

Instead, Jon had to press Buleden into excusing Marthe, and gave Buleden command of one of the patrols as compensation. Marthe was one of the best sailors they had, Jon couldn’t afford to lose him either. Jon would just have to try and keep the men away from each other, positioning them both at opposite sides of the camp. My camp is not big enough if I need to place everyone with a grudge away from each other, Jon thought sourly.

The others were easier. A Hornfoot chieftain tried to bribe Jon with a pair of bronze gauntlets to get a bigger barge, which Jon accepted – mostly because they needed another barge anyways and it made the Hornfoots more willing to work with him. There were another two tributes from clan leaders – which Jon learned to accept graciously. Tributes and gifts were the currency of the north.

The worst was an elderly man, a tanner, dragged before Jon bloody and beaten. His wife had died in the cold, but the tanner had refused to burn her body and instead tried to drag her corpse outside the perimeter so she might be resurrected as a wight. The man was in hysterics. Jon ordered the corpse burnt, but he had to fight to convince the free folk not to kill the man for his ‘treason’. The man screamed, howled and looked so heartbroken in grief that Jon wasn’t sure even sure it was a good decision. If Jon’s men hadn’t held him back, the tanner would have killed himself trying to stop them from burning his wife’s body.

Death might be kinder, he thought. There were days that he was just left feeling numb, and worn. Most days, in fact.

He had gone through half of those wanting to see him all when he heard the commotion from the caves. The free folk seemed to flock towards every fight. Jon cursed, grabbing Furs and half a dozen other men and rushing after them. His bad leg pained him limping over the snow.

The caves were still full of men and women huddled into the brown rock. He saw firepits and makeshift wind barriers of furs. Hundreds of men and women, mostly unarmed, trying to take shelter in the water-logged caves.

Jon recognised the Frozen Shore men; clad in wolf and reindeer furs, with walrus tusks stitched on their helms, and bone spears in their hands. There was lots of yelling. It looked like a scuffle between half a dozen men of the Frozen Shore and three times as many refugees. The refugees were in rags, and mostly unarmed, but the tribesmen looked angry.

“What’s going on here?” Jon bellowed, trying to break apart the fight. Suddenly, Ghost was by his side, snarling as the direwolf leapt into the fray. The sound of the direwolf's snapping jaws caused the men to jump backwards. “Back down!”

An elderly man gasped, clutching at a bone dagger in his waist. “… They attacked me…” The man gasped. “… These… these heathens attacked us!”

Heathens? He turned to the Frozen Shore men, Dark Sister ready. Jon saw a man shouting a rough, guttural language. The men of Frozen Shore didn’t speak the Common, Jon thought with a grimace.

He turned to Furs. The wildling blinked. “… Seems here that we have a… um… misunderstanding,” Furs translated, listening to the shouting. “… This man… Hunting Seal…”
seems to have taken offence by this crafter’s work.”

The man – Hunting Seal – looked like he was screaming bloody fury, glaring at Jon. The men of the Frozen Shore name themselves after beasts of the region, he recalled. “Offence? How?”

Furs motioned. The old man was begging incoherently, clutching at his wounded side. He had a white stone pinned to his furs. Jon turned, and saw a statuette carved crudely into a large white boulder sitting in the middle of the cave, shaped and cut into the likeness of a dragon, its maw open and roaring.

Sonagon, Jon realised. The old man had been carving a statue of Sonagon. A crude carving, but the boulder was so large that it must have taken three men to lift something that size. It was placed in the centre of the cave, a place of honour. Jon didn’t even know how they’d carve something like that with nothing but chunks of stone as chisels.

He stared around the scene. The Frozen Shore men must have attacked, but at least twenty free folk seemed to have stepped in against them. Not to protect the old man – they were trying to protect the carving. Why would so many weak, unarmed men and women pit themselves against well-armed raiders for the sake of a carving?

Furs translated. Hunting Seal screamed. “They call it heresy,” Furs translated. Jon guessed he was paraphrasing. “… To worship something like that monster is heresy.”

Worship? “I do not care what they worship,” Jon said. “They do not attack anyone in my camp. If they have a problem, they leave.”

Jon’s men slowly forced the Frozen Shore men backwards. Ghost kept by his side, still snarling quietly. Jon would hate to lose them, though – the Frozen Shore men were good warriors and he had few of them at Hardhome.

“Hunting Seal here says he needs to avenge his ancestors. They are Walrus Men, Snow.”

“Walrus Men?”

“They follow the Great Walrus. One of the Frozen Shore’s biggest tribes.” Furs explained. “Other tribes follow the Noble Elk, or the Strong Bear. These guys basically see walruses as their spirit animals, holy animals to their tribes.”

“… I see.” Hunting Seal growled a string of words, glared at Jon with hatred.

“They tell a story their tribe passed down from generations,” Furs translated. “Bladdy, blah, blah… Something about a dark night, a storm with teeth, the demons of ice and snow that slaughtered their ancestors years ago. It brought ruin to two dozen clans. Some viewed it as the wrath of the gods, but the Great Walrus declared unending vengeance on the blight.”

Now did this happen four hundred years ago, I wonder? Before Sonagon was frozen, Jon had little doubt that the dragon could have terrorised the north. Some grudges were old. Jon remembered the ice-river clansmen who tried to kill him his first night with the Weeper’s warband.

“Basically, he’s saying that your beast is a demon, and curses and whatnot upon all it’s followers.”
Furs sighed. Most of the Frozen Shore men looked nervous, but Hunting Seal was still screaming and spitting.

“… Well, make sure he knows that if they have that much issue with Sonagon, then they have to leave.”

It took a while for them to get the point. The Walrus Men were outnumbered and against the entire camp. Eventually, the Walrus Men backed down. Unending vengeance is all well and good, Jon mused, but having shelter and food was far more important in the short term.

Hunting Seal’s eyes widened in shock as the other Walrus Men lowered their weapons with reluctance. Jon half-hoped that Hunting Seal would have lowered his weapon too, but instead he lunged at Jon with his spear. Ghost was on him before the raiders had a chance.

The man could barely even scream as the direwolf ripped out his throat. The other Walrus Men averted their gaze. Jon’s stomach twisted. Another totally needless death.

“Make sure that they keep well away from Sonagon,” Jon ordered, standing over them as they dispersed. “… Give them patrols by the southeast.”

“Aye, will do,” said Furs. “You know, the Walrus Men might follow orders, but without the Great Walrus there’s no one to really command them.”

He frowned. “The Great Walrus is a person?”

“Oh aye, it’s the name given to their chieftain, you know. Leader of the Walrus Men is the Great Walrus, like their… holy person or whatnot,” Furs explained. “The Great Walrus agreed to join Mance’s army, but then his tribe scattered after he went missing at the Frostfangs. The Strong Bear and the Noble Elk both refused Mance; the Noble Elk chose to run from the Others, the Strong Bear resolved to fight by themselves.”

Jon nodded, mentally trying to make note of the information. The lands beyond the Wall had a wealth of different cultures and history that he was still struggling to learn. Not even the maesters knew much about the wildlings – the knowledge of most learned men ended at the Wall.

“You know there are others that worship similar tales,” Furs chatted. “Gods of snow and ice. I heard of one tribe up north that believe in ice monsters – the great beasts that formed winter. There are some that say their ice gods came from the moon. Some say they still linger in the far, far north, at the top of the world.” Furs scratched his beard. “… And that’s not to mention the old tales I once heard as a child – them of living storms, giants that carved the gorge, the beasts that once roamed…”

Jon didn’t reply. He stood over the carving of the white dragon. It was a crude carving, no doubt about it, but also a painstakingly detailed one. Jon had no idea how long it would have took to carve all the details like Sonagon’s teeth without proper tools. He had men take the old man to Mother Mole for treatment, but Jon lingered in the cave.

Now why does that carving of Sonagon, or the look in their eyes, make me so uncomfortable?

“… The dragon does not need carvings or statues,” Jon said after a long pause, turning to the crowd of refugees and speaking loud over the whistle of the wind. “Carvings and statues will not help anyone!”
Do I refuse their worship or try to exploit it? He looked around them. None met his gaze. “If you want to help, then the dragon needs protection. We need stakewalls and fortifications. The fencing on the west side of the camp is falling apart and we need men and women to repair it.”

The ground rustled with movement. A lot of them had white stones pinned as brooches on their chests.

In the end, Jon ended up with more men and women than he knew how to co-ordinate. He assigned them to taskmasters, and sent them to chase Old Man Harwick about the lumber. Jon saw free folk, even weak, starved or elderly free folk, rushing over themselves to try follow his command.

They’re not doing this for me, Jon thought, they’re doing it for Sonagon. For their salvation. Jon knew that every night Mother Mole still preached by the heart tree, and every night it seemed like she had more and more of a congregation. Mostly among the refugees, though – not the raiders and fighters.

He spent a long time staring at the white stone carving of the dragon. Despite what he said, the followers didn't abandon it. Jon thought about it, but he had no reason to demand that they got rid of it, either.

By the time he had finally managed assigning the work crews into some form of organisation, it was nearly evening. His leg felt numb. Mother Mole had some poultices that seemed to help, but it was relaxation and rest that helped the most.

As he limped back to his tent, Jon saw a man waiting patiently. He was a lean, clean-shaven man with toned arms. Alvin Whaletooth looked past middle-aged, around forty or fifty, but still hard and muscled from a life of manual labour.

“We’ve spotted a grey whale off the coast of the harbour,” Alvin said simply. No greetings, no introduction. None needed for a man like Alvin. “Big bastard too, it could feed a lot of mouths for a lot of days. I’d hunt it myself but I don’t have the men free – do you think your dragon could help us out?”

“A grey whale?” Jon asked, blinking in surprise.

“Aye. Big enough for a lot of meat. That dragon of yours could help take it down.”

Jon hesitated. “I could do it myself,” Alvin continued. “Except my boats are out. The whale could be long gone by the time I gather them. If I’ve got a dragon hunting it, mind, then maybe we could kill it quick. Figured it was worth a shot.”

Using a dragon to hunt whale, Jon thought. He wasn’t even sure if Sonagon would share the meat. “Sonagon freezes his meat before he eats it.”

Alvin shrugged. “Let him. So long as there’s enough left over for us, I’m happy thawing it.”

“I’m not sure it’d work.” He had never gone whale-hunting before, most certainly not with a dragon.

“You think it’s worth a try?”
There was a moment of indecision. On one hand, there were many tasks that Jon still had to do, but on the other hand whale would be enough meat to severely help their struggling stores. If Sonagon could be used to feed people, then Jon wanted to find out. “Alright, let’s do it.” Jon nodded. “I’ll have to come myself to direct Sonagon.”

“I’ve got a ship waiting for you, one of my fastest.” A smile flickered across his weathered face. “Heh, whale-hunting with a dragon. First time for everything.”

Jon paused to change; switching his thick giant’s fur cloak for a walrus hide skin, and leaving his heavy leathers and bronze disk plate for lighter riding leathers and wool overcoat. Not as thick, but lighter and safer at sea. He kept his iron-toe capped leather boots since they were the only ones he had, though, and he forced Furs to promise to guard his tent.

The route down to the coast was treacherous, but they had cleared crude roads to move lumber down to the icy coast. The beach was rough stone, sand and ice, but covered in men working and logs scattered across the coast. The sound of hacking lumber echoed all day and night. The shipbuilding had never stopped for days.

There had been no choice. Jon offered Sonagon to fly the wildlings south, but that just wouldn’t work. Even if Sonagon could carry a hundred people (and that was a big if), Jon had no idea how to even mount them all. Then their numbers had swollen up with so many that not even a dragon could carry them. Instead, they came with a plan; boats and barges were the only thing that could move so many people south. They would be able to sail south over the bay with Sonagon flying protection overhead. If the patrols of the Night’s Watch tried to stop them, Sonagon could convince any ships that they met that it would be a bad idea.

Already they had fifty-four large barges of timber and hemp – great, lumbering barges that might carry over fifty people each. It would be a veritable wildling fleet.

Smaller boats scattered over the crude harbour. Fishermen boats and raid vessels donated by the free folk of the coast, of all shapes and sizes from canoes to dinghies. The coast was wide, but it was still cramped along the stony beach. Alvin Whaletooth owned four boats himself – all lean fishing vessels crewed by his family. Alvin had made his name chasing down whales.

Across the coast, atop rocks protruding from the sea near the other side of the harbour, a large white shape rested over the rocks, tail hanging into the ocean. Jon saw the salt water spray against the rocks, splashing over scales. Sonagon slept most of the day, barely visible from the beach.

The coast was good for the dragon. The dragon was healthier than ever, between the protection of the free folk and the game in the ocean.

Sonagon perched on the rocks and hunted along the beaches. Jon wasn’t even sure if the dragon could even feel cold. Sonagon still couldn’t fly yet, but the dragon proved a surprisingly graceful swimmer. He would keep his wings furled while his body would slither through the ocean, using powerful legs to propel him forward.

There were schools of sea cows and walruses across the coast – all large animals that weren’t used to any predator large enough to hunt them. Sonagon had eaten well.

“The whale was spotted off the cape,” Alvin said. “We’ll take a five man crew on a small boat – get you close enough to direct your dragon. We’ll have the wind on our back dragging the carcass back – let’s see how quick we can make it. I don’t want to be out long after nightfall.”
“Good,” Jon agreed. It wouldn’t do to keep Sonagon away after nightfall. He would leave Ghost behind in the camp to watch matters, while Phantom could spy on the perimeter.

Their boat was a small fir wooden dinghy with a large sail of stitched animal hide. It wasn’t a large or fancy vessel but it was smoothed from age and well-built, oiled with whale blubber, with harpoons and rope all along the hull, and bladders of water or supplies hanging from the craft.

They were met by other hardened fishermen from Alvin’s crew. Jon nodded at them, but stopped as he stared at a tall, thin man with weathered eyes and a wispy beard. Jon felt his skin crawl as he looked at him.

He stopped. “Who are you?” Jon demanded, feeling suddenly uneasy. His hand went to Dark Sister.

The other man had stoic face. Alvin looked surprised for a moment, before realising. “Ah.” He nodded understandingly. “Snow, this is Byrn – he’ll be on the crew too.”

“He’s a skinchanger,” said Jon. Jon could feel the man as a skinchanger instinctively. Byrn just nodded.

“Aye,” Alvin explained. “Byrn wargs into a seal off the coast. I’ve used him before. He’ll help us track the whale.’’

Byrn never responded. He was a quiet man with narrow eyes. For some reason, he put Jon on edge, but Byrn walked away without a word. “Is he trustworthy?” Jon asked.

“As much as a warg can be, sure,” Alvin nodded, before hesitating. “No offence meant, of course.”

Jon didn’t reply. He was attracting a crowd on the beach. Workers dropped logs of timber to stare at him. He could see men on the ships staring at him. Many of them with white stones on their chest were gathering from the camp. Sometimes, it seemed like no matter where Jon went he attracted a crowd.

“Get that ship into the water!” Alvin roared, over the sound of wind roaring around them. “Snow, get your dragon ready.”

Jon nodded, turning towards the Sonagon in the distance. They were already drawing a crowd as Alvin readied the boat.

Even when the dragon was simply sleeping on the rocks in the distance, Jon saw the awe in the gaze of the wildlings staring. Sonagon came into the Hardhome rarely – the last time had been at Jon’s command when he had put together teams of free folk with skins to try and patch up the dragon’s wings. There had been so many free folk staring in awe, too afraid to even approach the beast.

More and more, Jon saw free folk with smooth white stones pinned to their furs like some kind of brooch, like some sort of religion, or cult. Men lowered their heads as he passed. There were many that regarded Jon with distrust, but there were also those who viewed him as a nearly-religious figure. Jon wasn’t sure which group was the majority any more. And he wasn’t sure which one disturbed him the most.
Do they see Sonagon as a god, and myself as a king? Jon wondered. The raiders and fighters were much slower to trust or follow, but some of Mother Mole’s followers… they unnerved him. Devotees, she called them.

There were men wearing white stones on the beach all around him now. They stared at him with wide eyes as Alvin Whaletooth ordered his men to push the dinghy into the water. Jon tried to block out the people staring as he closed his eyes and reached out to Sonagon.

He felt Sonagon stir. The dragon raised his head, clambering to his feet. Jon saw his wings stretch out, balancing the dragon as he reared upwards.

The free folk on the beach cheered and gaped as the dragon dived into the water with an almighty splash.

“Come on!” Alvin ordered, pushing the dinghy forward. Jon could barely keep up, yet the men dragged him upwards between the waves. The seawater was numbingly cold, but Alvin pulled Jon into the boat while two other men expertly dropped the sails. Jon fell headfirst into the cramped boat, while the seamen laughed and jumped in easily. At once, the wind hit them and they were being pushed off the beach and into the waves.

The salt water hit him, causing Jon to squint as they shot over the waves. Up ahead, there were shrill shouts as Sonagon broke through the water, twisting like some sea dragon of old. Alvin was shouting orders, but Jon’s vision blurred as he felt himself falling into Sonagon’s skin.

Suddenly, he was in the water, the cold sea as mild as bathwater, staring out through a vivid vision as his tail thrust him forward. Sonagon trusted Jon more and more, letting him warg easier than ever. Jon could feel the dragon’s presence next to him – powerful and vibrant, but it felt like an old friend the way it wrapped itself around Jon.

Follow us, Jon pushed. Food for everyone.

The dragon roared, twisting itself around with a deep breath to dive down again. The dinghy was already tacking, turning through the ocean.

“Keep your dragon back for now, Snow, we don’t want to spook it!” Alvin ordered. Jon nodded. “Byrn, you’re up. Get your seal to lead us to the whale!”

Byrn nodded and closed his eyes. Jon watched his body sag unconscious as he drifted into another skin. He’s not as gifted as I am, Jon realised. Most skinchangers fell unconscious as they warged, but Jon was able to stay in two bodies at once. Jon could even control multiple familiars, much like Varamyr Sixskins.

Twenty minutes later, a dark shape broke the surface. A large, graceful seal swam ahead, barely visible in the waves, leading the boat straight down the coast. The crew pulled the animal hide sail in and followed the shape.

It was shivering cold under wet furs, but none of the other men even seemed to feel it. Jon could only try to stay out of the way as Alvin’s crew sailed with practiced ease. It wasn’t a big boat, but the men would step over each other fluidly even as the ship shuddered. Each man clutched a rope in one hand and a harpoon in the other.
“So how big is this whale?” Jon shouted – he had to talk loudly over the waves.

“About fifty feet, forty tons, I reckon,” Alvin replied. “Good eating all around.”

Jon blinked. “Fifty feet? And you’re hunting it in a boat like this?”

There was a burst of laughter from the crew. “Our boat not big enough for you, Snow?” Alvin laughed. “We’re not some craven whalers that need a huge ass ship. I’ve been hunting off the coast for twenty years.”

Jon grinned. Alvin was a grim, rough man on land, but he came alive when he was at sea. The type of man who lived for the waves in his face. “So how would you take down a whale like that if Sonagon wasn’t here?”

“Easy, follow it close, harpoon it when it surfaces,” Alvin explained. “You tie logs or buoys to the harpoons to mark the position, and to stop it diving so easily. You need at least three boats to follow it no matter where it goes, and you keep on harpooning with more buoys until it can’t swim. Kill it, drag it back to shore.”

“You make it sound easy.”

“Oh, it takes a while, I grant you. You’ve got to bleed the whale’s strength and stay close. I’ve been out at sea for two weeks before while chasing a young bull,” Alvin chuckled. “But I was a green lad, then. I can throw a harpoon harder now.”

The waves rocked the boat. Jon held on tightly, but the sailors barely noticed.

Alvin kept a sharp eye on the sea, even as he shouted, “Grey whales aren’t even the biggest things you get around here, ain’t that right?”

“Oh aye,” one of the other sailors shouted. “You get some monsters in these waters.”

“The only monster I’ve seen is a dragon.”

“Ha! Those landlubbers in camp might stare at your dragon with awe, but I’ve seen bigger monsters,” Alvin said confidently.

“Really?”

“Oh yep. Grey whales aren’t the biggest out here, plenty of others as well – we get sperm whales about twice the size some seasons too,” Alvin said. “And that’s to say nothing about the sharks. Have you ever seen a great ice water shark? Bigger than this bloody boat!”

Jon listened intently. Alvin talked even while wrapping up rope. “But the biggest – the absolute biggest – creature you’ll ever see,” Alvin continued. “A bloody leviathan.”

There were a few murmurs of agreement. “Those monsters can grow over two hundred feet long,” Alvin explained. “They cause tidal waves when they surface. Now those are too big for any of my boats, I hear you need Ibbenese whalers to bring those down. They don’t come in close to the coast, either, but I’ve seen a few before when I’ve taken my boat too far out to sea. Bloody monsters, believe me.”
The only thing Jon knew about leviathans were from Old Nan’s tales, that the first sea dragon Nagga used to be so large it could hunt leviathans out of the ocean.

Sea dragons, Jon thought to himself, thinking about Maester Luwin’s lessons. Nobody was sure if sea dragons existed or not, but then again they thought the same thing about ice dragons. Sea dragons were dragons of the deep, the dragons that couldn’t fly but would grew larger than any other creature. Grey King’s Hall on Pyke was apparently made from the bones of a sea dragon.

Jon tried to visualise a dragon so big it put Sonagon to shame, and his imagination failed him.

“But do you want to know the scariest thing I’ve ever seen, Snow?” Alvin continued. “A kraken.”

“Krakens?” Jon exclaimed. Krakens were another semi-mythical creature right there. “You’ve actually seen one?”

He nodded for emphasis. “Oh yes,” Alvin explained. “Nine years ago now – I was hunting way off the coast, much further than I should have been, truthfully. There was a fierce storm, but I was riding through. There is no weather in the world that can sink one of Alvin’s ships,” he added with pride. “But right then, I saw bloody giant wave hit me from the side, and I was washing upwards on the wake as a monster rose up beside me! A kraken! It was almost as big as a leviathan, but with a lot more tentacles and a lot angrier.” Alvin shuddered. “I’ll tell you, I ruined a good pair of pants that day!”

The stories continued as the boat rocked on. Alvin Whaletooth had a story for every day he had been at sea. Jon listened raptly, all the while watching the coast drift by.

“Over there!” A man shouted eventually, spotting something large break through the waves. Jon had no idea how he spotted it through the tumbling waves. The grey whale looked just like a large stone breaking the surface for a brief second. “There she is!”

“Alright, Snow,” Alvin ordered, clutching his harpoon. “You’re up.”

Jon nodded, reaching out to Sonagon again as he visualised the grey whale. The dragon was following from behind. Over here. Food. Hunt.

The dragon swam in fast, darting through the sea so quickly Jon could only see the ripples. When Sonagon was less than three hundred feet away, the whale started to panic. The whale broke the surface, its tail splashing down furiously as it tried to dive, but it was too late. Sonagon was already on it.

Jon felt a stab of pride. Soon, it would be even easier for him to hunt, Jon thought. Soon, Sonagon would be able to fly.

The gashes on Sonagon’s wing had closed a while ago. Jon had even enlisted the help of every wood witch and healer he could find to try and help them heal. The wings were getter better, but they were still too tender for Sonagon to fly. Jon had seen the dragon practicing recently, extending and flexing his wings wide experimentally.

Even under the water, Jon heard the whale howl as Sonagon closed in. The whale must be fifty feet long from tail to snout, but the dragon was still bigger. Mind, the whale was bulky and muscled while Sonagon was leaner, and it didn’t go down easily. The whale tried to dive, and Sonagon had to wrestle to drag it out off the water.

They collided with an almighty splash. Tails and wings splashed out of the water. On the boat, the men cheered and hollered. The boat crashed with the waves. It made one hell of a show.

Jon felt Sonagon close in and bite down hard onto the whale’s rump. The whale shuddered and thrashed madly, but then Sonagon breathed ice cold fire into its body and the struggle ended quickly.

Jon watched as the water around them froze suddenly, tendrils of ice spreading around them, only for the ice to crack as Sonagon dragged the whale upwards in an iceberg. Half of the whale’s body had been frozen solid, killing it instantly. Sonagon roared triumphantly as he snapped the frozen tail straight off the whale.

Bobs of ice floated on the waves. Sonagon still thrashed, chewing huge frozen chunks off the whale’s tail happily with sharp teeth.

_Ours?_ Jon asked, reaching out to Sonagon. _Share?_ He knew the dragon would be protective of the kill, but Jon asked cautiously, half-begging. Jon had learned he needed to be constantly respectful when reaching out to the dragon. Jon could ask Ghost to do nearly anything, while the dragon had more pride.

Sonagon paused, but then roared like thunder and swam away. He still clutched the frozen whale’s tail, dragging it away in his jaws. The rest of the carcass was left floating on the waves, steaming gently from evaporation amongst the semi-frozen sea.

Alvin was laughing. “Easiest whale hunt I’ve ever done, boys!” He exclaimed happily. “Let’s harpoon her in and drag her, we’ll be back before nightfall.”

Jon was laughing too as they gingerly approached the carcass. That was the hardest part right there, trying to attach their ropes to the carcass firmly despite the wind, waves and ice. One of the men even dived into the water to wrap a rope around the whale, and Jon had no idea how the man could even survive the cold. Jon himself tried twice to harpoon the carcass from the prow; missing both times, but the men were all in good cheer.

It took careful sailing as they tacked around to head back. That proved difficult, like trying to drag a hundred ton iceberg behind them in a fairly small boat, but Alvin was clearly experienced. From the size of the corpse, Jon had been sceptical it would even be possible, but Alvin had laughed and said that he had dragged in much harder kills than this.

The sun was only just about as they were to heading back. “Let’s get back quickly!” Jon shouted. “We’re expecting raids tonight and I want be there before dark.”

“Aye aye!” Alvin replied, still laughing. Jon couldn’t help but laugh as well.

The only man that wasn’t in good spirits was Byrn. The skinchanger was still draped half over the edge, clearly away somewhere else in his seal’s skin. Then, Byrn’s body jerked as he returned to the boat with a loud gasp. “We’ve got a problem!” Byrn shouted.

“What?” Alvin said, his voice sharp, glaring at the skinchanger.

“Around the coast!” Byrn shouted. “Ships from the south, coming this way! Big ships, lots of All cheer evaporated in a second. Alvin instantly fumbled for a spyglass; a carved, hollowed auroch horn with a dark amber stone inside, wrapped protectively in Alvin’s furs. The man cursed after staring for a moment, handing the spyglass to Jon.

It took a while for Jon to see anything through the dark water and distorted view. Then, he slowly made out outlines in the water. The shape of sails.

Ships, Jon thought, his heart racing. He counted over a dozen. Big ones. A fleet.

The Night’s Watch? No, there are too many. Eastwatch didn’t have that sort of fleet.

“Cut the harpoons,” Jon ordered.

Alvin looked aghast. “What?”

“Cut the harpoons, forget about the whale!” Jon shouted. “We’ve got to get back to Hardhome right now!”

Those are war galleys, Jon thought. They looked like the sort you’d find in the Free Cities. A fleet of ships heading to Hardhome. We’re under attack.
Chapter 15

Chapter Summary

The battle of night, and the battle of ice

Val

Her screams echoed through the camp, making Val’s blood run cold. She stood by her sister’s side, holding her hand. The sound of Dalla’s shrieks never stopped. Val had never seen her in so much pain.

“Keep breathing,” the old woman ordered, crouching between Dalla’s legs. “The babe's coming, but it’s in the wrong position. Don't push yet.”

“… It hurts…!” Dalla screamed in gaspy breaths, sweat dripping down her brow. Val clutched her hand, stroking her hair and whispering sweet nothings into her ear.

“Is the baby alright?” Val demanded, looking up to the three midwives.

“It'll be a difficult birth,” the old woman replied, as a bucket of water was placed next to her. “First times always are.”

“But is the baby alright?” she insisted, noticing how the old woman never answered the question.

“Stay calm, girl, I've seen worse births.” Again, that never answered the question. From the dark glances the women gave her colleagues, Val guessed they couldn't have seen many worse.

The women were from Craster’s keep. The oldest was over sixty, while the youngest looked barely fifteen, yet she still had a young babe at her chest. Craster’s wives had joined them after Harma raided the keep, and Craster himself took an axe to the head. None of his wives had been particularly upset to see the old man go.

Still, they proved capable midwives, and as hardy as any free folk. Val had offered them protection in the camp if they cared for Dalla.

Her sister’s screaming put her on edge. Val would rather face down a pack of hungry wolves than listen to her sister scream.

The baby was coming now, and there was nothing anyone could do.

Dammit, Val cursed. Of all the nights…

It was a moonless night, cold and bitter. They were less than two days away from Hardhome, so close that their few mounted men had already went ahead and came back, reporting a large settlement with fortifications and protection, building ships and offering food. A place where the free folk could finally find shelter out of the forest.
They were at the final leg of their journey. Everyone in Val’s camp had grown weary and hungry, and right now they were so close they could feel it.

Just one more day’s march, Val thought. We were only one more good day’s walk…

That was part of the problem, though. They were so close that many of the free folk had decided to walk on through the night. There were maybe five thousand in the camp and another eight walking on ahead. That was a lot of people trekking through the forest at the dead of night, desperate to reach the peninsula by daybreak.

This is wrong, she thought. They had been careful all through the journey, setting up camp diligently, only to slip up on the final leg. Any other time, Val might have been tempted to join them in a night’s march, to try and keep the host together as much as possible, but then her sister went into labour and there was no choice for her but to stop.

Garth and two dozen mounted men had went on to try to secure passage into Hardhome. Sigorn and his Thenns had left as well, to protect the host as much as possible, but they were already scattered.

Too many tales, Val thought. They had all heard mad tales about salvation and protective gods, tales that only seemed to get stronger the closer to Hardhome. It had left so, so many free folk desperate to finally reach the settlement.

Her sister was crying. One of Craster’s wives rubbed Dalla’s stomach, trying to massage the baby into position.

“It's alright, it's alright,” Val whispered, frantic. “It's alright, it's alright…”

It wasn't alright. Not even slightly. The tent seemed freezing cold. The fire in the centre of the room flickered.

“We need more logs for the fire,” the old woman ordered. “Gilly!”

The young woman, a mousy girl clutching a baby, stood up flustered. Gilly is a new mother herself, Val realised. The last of Craster’s babies. “It's alright,” said Val, motioning for Gilly to sit down. “I’ll get them.”

Val needed to get out of the tent, and Dalla looked delirious. Val’s hands trembled. She pushed her way out, taking a deep breath. The night seemed dark even despite the many fires burning around the camp.

My little sister is going to survive, Val thought. She’s going to hold her son. She has to.

“Will you shut that bitch’s whining up?” A dark voice growled. “Some of us are trying to sleep.”

Val glared, turning around to see the Lord of Bones at the tent, frowning at her. “You talk about my sister again and I’ll see to it you never have children of your own, Rattleshirt,” Val warned.

The man scoffed. “I just want some fucking quiet. Dammit, is she whelping a cow in there?”

There was another strangled scream from the tent. Val’s gaze flickered. “Firewood,” she said. “I need firewood.”

There should have been a surplus of chopped wood by the main camp fire. Val had been insistent – always keep enough more than enough wood to keep the fires going. Now, the wood stack was nearly empty.

The sight made her growl. “Who the fuck has been skimping on wood chopping?” She shouted, glaring at the men watching the fire.

“What the hells are you talking about?” Rattleshirt snapped. “There was a full stack.”

Val hesitated, suddenly staring at the surrounding fires. She could see the flicker of the torches through the trees. All of their fires were flickering, starving. Why are we burning so much wood?

She breathed outwards, and watched the mist shiver in the air in front of her. It’s cold, she realised slowly. Very cold. Val’s skin tingled. The cold had a way of creeping up on you.

Val staggered backwards slowly. The air was very quiet.

“… Oh no…” She muttered. Every instinct she had was screaming at her. Her breaths were shallow.

She rushed back into the tent. The women shared a dark look. Suddenly, all of the shadows seemed deeper.

Val never even needed to say anything. “… Aye,” the old woman murmured, still tending to Dalla’s side. “They’re coming. I can feel it in my bones.”

Val could feel it too. It felt like cold creeping under her skin, a cold as sharp as fear. Val’s heart pounded.

“… Look after my sister,” she said after a long pause. “Look after Dalla.”

“We’re not going anywhere,” the old woman promised. Her voice was sad, resigned. “… Always knew we’d see them again… Craster’s boys…”

“Gilly,” another of the wives hissed at the young woman. “Take your boy and run. Don’t let them take yours as well.”

Gilly looked wide eyed and frantic. Val hesitated momentarily, before clutching the sword on her belt and rushing back outside.

She knew it almost before she heard the cry. The long sharp sound of a war horn cut through the night. It was strangled prematurely by a short scream.

“Form up!” Val bellowed, charging out clutching her sword. “Form up! We’re under attack!”

There were more sounds all around her. The dark trees had never seemed so terrifying. Val could see figures rushing around the flickering flames, but it was too dark to see who or what. All around her, wildlings clutching weapons rallied themselves, but the air was thick with panic.

“Who is it?” Rattleshirt demanded. He gripped a long and sharp spear, tipped with a mammoth’s tusk blade. His dogs barked furiously, so loudly Val could hardly hear him. “Where are they?”

There was a moment of absolute panic. Man ran grabbing weapons, shouting for formations. Somewhere in the distance, a wolf howled.

A small figure in a shadowskin cloak scrambled towards them, flanked by a towering shadow. The great white bear reared up and roared, while Varamyr Sixskins burst into the towards them. Three wolves scattered around his feet.

“They're here!” Varamyr shouted. The skinchanger was a small, scrawny figure clad in long, fine clothes and flanked by his beasts. “Attacking from the west!”

“No.” His voice was grim. “The crows.”

Val turned. For a moment, there was darkness. Then, she saw figures in black riding through the trees. The sound of galloping horses charging through snow was deafening. Mounted riders charging through the camp.

The Night’s Watch was attacking.

“Form up!” She shouted, clutching her sword tightly. “Form up!”

She saw arrows rain from the tree line. Men fell, and then horses were charging.

Rattleshirt released his hounds. Varamyr’s wolves charged too, and then his snow bear lumbered forward as well. The wildlings had axes and spears, charging to meet the riders. Some of the horses reared and fell, but the rest just charged through.

The horses were strong and powerful. They barrelled straight through the men. Val saw lances lunging towards her.

That was the last thing Val knew before the world was consumed by panic and chaos.

The rider was just a shadow in black looming over her. Val tried to get close enough to cut at the horse, but then she glimpsed the tip of a lance zooming towards her head. She ducked, but the edge came so close she felt the tip scrape against her hood.

The body of the horse barrelled into her, knocking her into the snow. Val gasped, feeling her head spin. She was suddenly on the ground, staring wide-eyed at the bodies dropping around her.

Flaming arrows rained out of the darkness. Tents caught fire. After the charge came men on foot – rangers clutching iron swords as they rushed to meet the wildlings.

Everywhere she looked, there was fighting or burning.

A bloodthirsty roar broke through the daze. Val saw Varamyr’s bear pouncing on a mounted man, dragging the horse physically to the ground. The horse neighed, kicking and screaming under the bear’s claws, while more riders circled around it, furiously stabbing at the bear with spears.

An eagle screeched downwards from the sky, flying and clawing into a rider’s face and knocking him straight off his horse, screaming. Wolves pounced on the screaming man in a second.

Val saw the Lord of Bones howling and screaming barely decipherable insults as he met two rangers at once, meeting their swords with his spear. “Come on you kneelers!” The Lord of Bones snarled, swinging his spear madly. “I’ll skin your bones and fuck your corpses!”

The two crows tried to overpower him, but Rattleshirt spat in one’s face and kicked the other in the groin. They stumbled, and one of the crows fell quickly under Rattleshirt’s spear. The other crow tried to skewer the Lord of Bones before he pulled his spear back, but then one of Rattleshirt’s dogs grabbed the crow by the leg and dragged the man down screaming. Rattleshirt’s spear plunged through his skull.

“Free folk!” Rattleshirt screamed, dragging his bloody spear upwards. “On me! Every fighting man on me!”

_The Lord of Bones is a scrawny, nasty bugger, Val thought, but he knows how to kill._

Val tried to stagger upwards off the ground. She glimpsed a man trying to charge towards her, but then a shape, as strong as a bear, tackled him to the ground and a heavy maul broke his skull. Harma Dogshead was standing over Val, her clothes dripping with blood. Her friend helped her to her feet.

“Protect the tent…” Val gasped. “Dalla…”

She could still hear her sister’s screams. _My sister is giving birth and the Night’s Watch is attacking…_

The crows had a good start – their riders tore through their camp and did huge damage, but the battle was slowly changing. Harma’s men joined the fray, around the tent, while the Lord of Bones and his men were fighting through the crows up ahead. Varamyr’s bear died from the rider’s spears, and, like a craven, he had sacrificed his wolves to clear him a path to flee.

Still, the majority of the wildlings had scattered, fleeing from the camp. The fighting men and spearwives were still dispersed, helpless as the crows cut through them from all directions. The riders were still running ahead, charging through the rest of the camp, but more and more of them were toppling off their horses.

The second rain of arrows came splattering down, and another dozen men fell.

Val saw the dark shadows of the crows on foot heading towards them. There were maybe fifty crows left in the clearing, against the eighty free folk that had managed to rally. All others were running.

_Protect the tent_, Val thought furiously, clutching her sword. _Protect Dalla._

A wordless war cry tore from her throat as she charged.

The free folk collided with the crows in a dull clash, splitting the air with grunts and sharp screams of pain. Val saw men wrestling with each other like bears, trying to drag each other to the ground.

For once, Harma and the Lord of Bones fought side by side. The Lord of Bones was like a viper with his spear; precise, quick and deadly. The sound of his bone shirt clanging filled the air. Next to him, Harma was a natural brawler, swinging her maul hard and fast and sending men tumbling backwards.

Val saw a free folk fall to a crow’s sword across the fire. He was heading towards the tent. Val was already charging, her bronze short sword in hand as she slashed hard.

She hoped to catch him by surprise, but the man was swift. Bronze clashed against steel as he parried.

Val saw his eyes widen in surprise. He was a young man, thirtyish, with dark brown hair, wispy beard and a weak chin. He wore a heavy breastplate and a sable-trimmed cloak. Val's blonde hair was unraveled, whipping across her face as she hacked at him.

He backed away, blocking her sword on a dark oak shield. There was a flicker of doubt in his eyes as he circled. Near the tent, Gilly was crouching, hiding from the fighting with her baby in her arms. Gilly was crying. The sound of Dalla’s screams could still be heard.

“There's no honour in fighting women!” The crow shouted. “All women and children surrender and you will not be harmed! On my honour!”

“Fuck that!” Val hissed. “Fuck you!”

They collided. The crow was bigger than her, stronger too. He had a long steel sword as well as a reinforced wood shield, while Val only had a bronze short sword not much more than a large dagger. A single blow from him could overpower her.

Still, Val was faster. She could swing twice before he could manage once. His sword was much heavier, more cumbersome than hers. That shield of his protected him, but it also restricted his movements. Val's vision blurred as she slashed furiously, each blow hacking off his shield.

Never stay in one place, Val thought. Circle around him, keep on moving. Don't let it turn into a brawl, force him to turn to meet you.

His legs were staggering slightly as Val twisted around him, still hacking with every step. He had good reflexes, blocking each blow, but struggling to swing his sword. Val didn't dare try to parry, instead she darted backwards.

She was hoping he would try and give chase, and maybe leave himself open. He didn't, instead he stood his ground to hide behind his shield.

Val could see the sweat dripping off his brow. Val was gasping for breath. I'm going to tire faster than he will, she thought angrily. Still, she couldn't even feel the exhaustion over the sound of her heart pounding.

My sister. Protect my sister.

Val charged, screaming bloody fury. “Free folk!” She howled, swinging so hard she thought her sword might snap. “Free folk! Free folk!”

They collided. All around them, the night was screaming.

Val slammed against his shield with all her strength, so hard she could feel the bruises forming on her shoulder. Finally, the crow staggered, losing his footing.

His sword flailed wildly. Val slashed upwards. Blood steamed in the cold air.

The crow’s eyes widened in horror as his sword dropped to the ground, along with three of the fingers on right hand. The blood oozed from his mutilated hand, half of his palm slashed wide open.

To his credit, he didn't fall back or yield. The crow gripped his shield tightly and tried to charge her, bludgeoning her with the solid wood. Val staggered, gripping his shield tightly with one hand as she struggled to bring her sword around with the other.

“For House Smallwood,” he said, so softly Val barely heard it. “For the realm.”

Val’s blade broke through his defence, stabbing him straight under the arm. It was an awkward cut – Val couldn't get any leverage – but it caused him to stagger. The second stab was much better.

She wrestled his shield away as he dropped to the ground, on his knees. Val plunged her sword forward, his time straight into his chest, above his breastplate and into his sternum.

"For my sister!” She hissed, stabbing repeatedly with the sword.

His body was tough and her blade felt blunt. She must have ruined the edge hitting it against his shield. It took multiple strikes before he finally stopped moving. His blood splattered, so warm it stung.

Val gasped for breath, struggling to breathe. All around her, the crows were retreating. The Night’s Watch were falling back, but none of the free folk were celebrating. It wasn't a victory.

The crows had already done their damage, now they were just retreating before their body count started to stack up as well.

Crows are evil, cunning birds. They would never fight to the death, and they would retreat in any battle they began to lose. Still, they'll never retreat too far; they would just fall back to their next position and await their next chance to gouge out your eyes.

She stared around the trashed camp, feeling her stomach squirm. The camp was ruined – most of the free folk had already fled into the forest. They would be running scared, alone, and at night.

By morning, the wilderness would have killed more people than the crows ever could.

Val had seen these tactics before. They had proved so devastating at the Frostfangs. Small groups of crows would be assaulting them all along the camp, bloodying them and then retreating. The crows would let them bleed out, before returning to finish the job.

Val looked around her, meeting Harma’s eyes. The raider’s gaze was dark. Across the camp, the Lord of Bones was cursing, clutching his side where a weapon had grazed his hip, shattering his armour of bone. Some of the raiders tried to pursue the crows, but both Harma and Rattleshirt had held back, cautiously.

The smell of blood hung in the air, as sharp as a blade. Val could still hear the sounds of fighting in the distance. It was cold, so very cold.
Next to her, Gilly was weeping as she clutched her child. Val stared at her, but the girl never met her eyes. Gilly held her baby so close to her chest.

A new sound broke through the ground. The sound of wailing. A baby’s wailing.

Val’s heart pounded. The sound was coming from the tent. Her nephew. Dalla’s babe. Her sister’s babe was born, and he was wailing. I have a nephew. A boy’s screaming.

Dalla…

There were screams in the distance. Even as Val listened, she could hear those screams falling silent. The newborn was still wailing. The air was so cold.

In the distance, a horn blew sharply. Not a wildling horn, but a horn of Night’s Watch. The horn sounded three times.

Val listened to the screaming. So many men, women and children were left running blindly in the forest, and they were here. The dead are here…

The Others were intelligent too. They must have been waiting for their opportunity, watching the sworn brothers and the free folk fight. Weakening them both until the moment the Others swept in…

“Fucking crows…” Val cursed. Fucking crows…!

Between the trees, the shadows whispered and hissed. It was so cold it felt like a knife in her chest. The dead are coming.

---

Jon

“Evacuate to the caves!” Jon bellowed, shoving his way through the crowd. Men and women were running around him madly. He had to scream just to be heard over the sound of so much chaos. “All refugees to the caves!”

Everyone on the peninsula could see the sails coming quickly now. It was already dusk, and the lights on the prow of the ships on horizon shone in the gloom. Jon had only just got off Alvin’s boat, yet there was no time. He was still dripping wet and he could feel the chill in his bones, but his heart was beating so fast. Alvin had sailed as fast as he could, but the fleet was still right behind them. They were already sailing across their perimeter.

How long before they got here? An hour? Maybe less?

“Snow!” A voice bellowed. Jon saw the Weeper marching towards him, slamming people out of the way roughly. The Weeper had his scythe over his back and two short swords on his hip. “Your bloody friends are here!”

Jon shook his head. “They can’t be the Night’s Watch, I’ve never seen those ships before…”

There are twenty-four ships, Jon thought. Alvin had counted. Eastwatch kept an active fleet of three ships; the Talon, the Storm Crow, and the Blackbird. There were maybe half a dozen more ships that they could man in emergencies. Now where did all the others come from?

“Who the bloody hell are they, then?”

“They look like Free City galleys. Pirates? Slavers? I don’t know, I…”

“I recognised one of them,” Alvin called, jumping out of the boat. “That ship in the middle, near the left – she’s the Blackbird, from Eastwatch. The other twenty-three I’ve never seen, but I know the Blackbird well enough.”

Jon stammered, struggling to react. Then the Night’s Watch is taking part in this attack? What did that make the other ships? Sellsails? Reinforcements? That was bad. He saw the men’s gazes flicker too. Jon knew that Night’s Watch only had a thousand men. How many more men might this fleet bring?

The Weeper was glaring at him, eyes twitching. Jon bit his lip. Dammit, he cursed. I knew the Night’s Watch would try to stop us sooner or later. They still think the wildlings are the threat, not the Others. They’re coming to stop a wildling horde before it has time to form. I just thought I had more time…

Jon knew that the Weeper had agreed to work with him, but there was always that shadow hanging over their heads of what Jon would do when he had to raise swords against his sworn brothers.

The very thought of fighting against Grenn, Pyp, Toad or, gods forbid, Sam, made Jon feel physically ill.

Pick a side, the Weeper’s voice echoed.

I’m on the side of the living, he thought. Never the dead.

“Get archers on that ridge!” Jon ordered, glaring back at the Weeper. “They’re vulnerable as they come into the beach; we need bowmen on cliffs to fire at them. All warriors, along the bay! We hold position by the beach, and we fight with the high ground.”

“We kill them all!” The Weeper roared, to the sound of cheers.

Jon’s stomach twisted. No, we just hold them back. Force them to retreat…

The fear was so thick it felt like a knife in his chest.

“What about our ships?” The Lord of Seals demanded angrily. He clutched a bone spear tightly, beefy body covered in a seal hide cloak. “Our ships are on the beach!”

Jon shook his head. The boats and barges on the beach would be unprotected. “Forget about them. We can’t defend them, and we’d lose too many people trying. We defend the camp.”

Jon saw the flicker of uncertainty passing through the crowd. The Lord of Seals looked furious. They had spent weeks constructing their fleet, and now it might be for nothing. I always expected an attack from the land, not from the sea, Jon cursed. They had built their defences along the mainland, and they were vulnerable on the coast.

There was a moment of hesitation. The Weeper filled the silence. “You heard him!” The Weeper roared, cutting in for Jon. “Get moving, you chicken-shits, or I’ll peel your eyes out!”

The men scrambled. Jon saw spearwives sprinting into position. Jon’s heart pounded, and he could only hope he was doing the right thing. The Old Bear won’t waste men, he told himself, the Night’s Watch has too few of them. If they see a strong and unified defence, they’d retreat.

I need to force them to retreat - it's the only way to save lives.

Everyone’s lives. Theirs and ours.

The whole battle was unnecessary, Jon cursed. They should be fighting against the white walkers, not the wildlings.

The Weeper was staring at him, with narrow eyes. “… We going to have a problem here, Snow?” He asked quietly. The way he pronounced ‘snow’ – it sounded so similar to ‘crow’.

“… No,” Jon replied. “No problem.”

The Weeper glared at him. I can use Sonagon. I can scare them – end the battle before it begins.

Please, please, let them scare easily.

Jon’s gaze flickered. He moved to step by the Weeper, when the man’s hands clutched Jon’s by the collar and dragged him to one side. All around them, there were people shouting and running. “… Snow,” the Weeper snarled. “… Answer me properly this time. Do we have a problem here?”

Jon gulped, trying to stare at the man’s crazed eyes, inches away. I can’t fight against my sworn brothers. Jon knew he couldn’t. And the Weeper could see it in his eyes.

“… Same rules apply,” Jon said, taking a deep breath. “Just like I said when we first met. If they don’t surrender, if they insist on attacking us, then we attack back.”

“I’d feel more confident about that if you met my eyes, Snow,” he snarled. “Your face is pale, and your hands can’t stop trembling. Now what am I looking at? Just another boy scared of his first battle? Or do we have a problem?”

Damn, is it really so obvious? If I look like a craven then half the men here will abandon me on the spot. Jon had to force himself to pull himself together.

I’ve fought wights plenty of times, but going into a battle against living men... Good men...

His hands were trembling and he couldn’t get them to stop. But what was the choice? Order the free folk to flee? That was just foolish. But which one will end up killing the most people? Fighting a battle or trying to run from it?

No, the only way that everyone survives this is if that fleet is the one that is forced to flee.

Jon forced himself to meet the Weeper’s gaze. Faint streams of blood trickled down from man’s eyes. It’s the cold, Jon realised. The Weeper cries blood on cold nights. “I’ll do my duty, Weeper,” said Jon. “You just do yours.”

Men were running everywhere, clutching weapons. The sun had fallen and it was already dark. The clouds were thick and cold. It’s a moonless sky, Jon noted. A good night for an ambush.

“Furs! Haldur!” Jon ordered, pushing through the crowds and picking out the men. “Grab as many bowmen as you can find and get them up onto that ridge. We need burning arrows – aim for their sails. Hatch, Rolf, Erik, Yoldo – on me!”

“Aye, aye.”

The Weeper would have to lead the main body of men; he was the only one who could. The man was already assembling his warband, his screaming bellowing over the chaos. Still, the Weeper wouldn’t think about protecting the refugees, so Jon had to support him. “Find Bullden Horn, have him lead the flank,” Jon ordered to a nearby group of men. “And Old Man Harwick, have him form up near the caves at the rear.”

There were men running wild. Can’t let them lose control. “All shipbuilders!” Jon bellowed, so loud his lungs hurt. “On me! Any lumber or logs, drag them to that ridge as quickly as possible!”

“We won’t have time to build any decent wall, Snow,” Hatch warned.

He shook his head. “Not going to build a wall, we’re going to burn them.” A lot of effort had been put into gathering that much lumber, but there was nothing for it. “Burn the logs and roll them down the beach when ready. You think you can handle that?”

“Damn right I can.”

It was so hard to even think clearly in the noise of the camp. Jon hesitated, staring out over the horizon. They were getting closer. Jon could make out the striped hulls in the distance. What sort of ships had striped hulls?

He saw Alvin Whaletooth dragging up from the beach with his men. The sailor held a barbed spear and a thick leather shield, gathering his clan from the camp. “Alvin, can you make out their banners?” Jon shouted. "What flag are they flying?"

There was a long pause. “A stag,” Alvin said eventually, looking through his spyglass. “A stag in a red heart.”

“Well, they're sure not here to say hello,” Rolf growled, clutching two throwing axes. “Who the fuck are they?”

“I don’t know,” he admitted. A stag in a red heart? The coat of arms was unfamiliar. Still, the stag was the sigil of the Baratheons – some division of House Baratheon maybe? Was this a part of the Royal Fleet? “… The Night's Watch sent out requests for aid,” Jon said finally. “I guess somebody else answered.”

How many? Twenty-four ships, with three hundred men in each one? They could easily be dealing with an army of seven thousand. A force of seven thousand knights could beat twice that number of barely organised wildlings.

The wildling’s boats would be useless against war galleys like those. They couldn't fight at sea; they would have to fight on land. The ships would have scorpions, spitfires and maybe even heavy catapults. Their bows would outrange the wildlings. From a range, they’d beat the wildlings.
And these are soldiers from the Seven Kingdoms, Jon thought. Maybe there are men from the north among them too. Maybe men from Winterfell. Good soldiers, answering a call to protect the realm. Men that don’t deserve to die…

A stag – that must mean Baratheon. Maybe the king himself, whoever that was now. Robert Baratheon had been a good friend of Winterfell. My father would curse me if I fought against the realm. To fight against the men my father lived, fought and died for…

He couldn’t stop his hands from trembling.

“Snow!” Someone shouted, rushing to him. “We’ve got Mother Mole and her bunch by the heart tree! They refuse to go to the caves.”

Damn, the heart tree is far too exposed, the refugees need to get to the caves. If the soldiers broke the beach, then they needed to keep all the refugees safe and out of the way, otherwise the battlefield could become too chaotic to fight. Jon was limping badly as he rushed. He had to strip off his soaking furs and cloak even as he walked. His leathers were still damp from the sea, and the cold wind felt like it stripped straight through him.

In the firelight, the shadows rippling, it looked like the heart tree was alive again. He could feel the crowd of people part around him as he walked.

Jon saw Mother Mole. The old woman was a shadowy figure as she clutched a bloody dagger in her hand. Jon heard squealing - the sound of goat crying in pain as the wood witch plunged a sharpened bone dagger into its chest. He heard the animal’s skin tear as Mother Mole ripped it open brutally, spreading its entrails over the roots as she chanted. The goat’s heart was placed in the heart tree’s mouth.

All around him, the crowd was chanting almost wordlessly as they huddled together. Between the darkness, the blood and the frenzy, it felt… savage… surreal. The weirwood’s bloody branches rustled in the darkness and the wind.

“… You need to retreat to the caves,” Jon said, his voice strangely turning quiet. “In case they breach the shore, you need to get to the caves.”

She didn’t reply for a long moment. Her eyes seemed distant, staring at the goat’s blood. In times of trouble, they sacrificed an animal, a goat or a sheep. Perhaps I’m lucky that it’s just an animal, Jon thought, there had been rumours.

There was the sound of frantic neighing. A sheep being dragged by another two followers to be sacrificed. Jon hesitated, staring upwards at the shadows and white branches rippling.

“They’ll come for you,” her wheezy old voice said, breaking the silence. Jon stared at Mother Mole, limping forward on a gnarly cane. “I’ve seen it. They’ll fight you with fire and false light, and they will not fall back easily. There is a power of their own on that ship. I’ve seen it – a witch as false and as bitter as smoking ash.”

Jon’s face flickered. The old woman spoke quietly, but every ear strained to listen. For a second, the old woman’s eyes seemed black in the torchlight. “But I promised salvation would be found in this place, and that is still true,” Mother Mole continued. “You will lead us away from the Long Night.”
“Get them to the caves,” Jon said. “They follow you, take them to the caves.”

“... We will. If it puts your mind at ease, then we shall retreat...” She muttered. “Yet the Old Gods shall fight with you, King Snow, I promise it. Let the darkness be your armour and your cloak... Let the shadows protect you...”

Jon froze, glancing around. He could hear the thump of footsteps, of free folk banging against their shields. There was no time, he had to go grab his heavy leathers, bronze disk chainmail and his shield before the battle.

Up on the cliff, he saw burning arrows and firepits being lit. The ships were still out of range, but not far now. The best of their bowmen were firing the first arrows, testing the distance.

“Snow!” A wildling shouted, running forward. “We got outriders at the perimeter! There are people in the forest!”

“Our?”

“Aye, refugees!”

“Then get them to help or keep the bloody bastards back!” The Weeper cut in, surrounded by armed men clutching torches and axes. “We got ships nearing the beach right now!”

Outriders. Val’s host. Jon had known they had been nearby, they must be climbing up Storrold’s Point right now. Was there enough time to get them in as reinforcements? No, probably not. There was barely enough time for Jon to strap his leathers on him. It would be freezing, but Jon did without his cloak. He saw men rushing around him in frenzy.

“We got a problem!” Hatch bellowed. “That bloody fool - the Lord of Seals is trying to save his damned boats.”

“What?!” Jon and the Weeper shouted together. The chaos felt overwhelming. So many running, so much happening at once.

Hatch pointed. “Him and his men have gone to the boats, to try and get them to safety!” he shouted. “They’re taking them out to sea!”

Jon could have pulled his hair out. The fool. He could see the Lord of Seals and his men on the coast, stealing quite a few shipbuilders as well. Ordering people he had no right to order. Maybe two hundred men, trying to get the half-constructed boats and barges out of the way. They would be easy targets for the fleet. The Lord of Seals had taken two hundred men and left them totally exposed.

What to do? Try to pull them back? No, half of them are already pushing the boats into the water. I need to get them out of the way faster. Jon cursed, but the Lord of Seals left him no choice.

“Alvin!” Jon bellowed, looking for Alvin Whaletooth. “Devyn! Byrd! Take your men and get down there and help that fool. Get them out of the way as quickly as possible.”

“Aye,” Alvin replied, grabbing his sailors and starting to run, but there was a hint of relief in his voice too. Alvin had ships at risk on the beach too.

There still won’t be time, Jon realised. He could see the shadows of the galleys rolling along the dark waves. He could see the torches and the movement on their decks. The barges would be crushed by proper war galleys that size. I’ve got to push them back, give us more time to organise a proper defence…

“We need your dragon, Snow,” the Weeper growled, echoing Jon's thoughts. “Get that bloody beast in the fight – time for the monster to earn its stay.”

Could Sonagon fly? Probably, but his wings are still tender. The dragon might not be able to fly for very long.

And one dragon against twenty-four ships. A fleet armed with men with longbows and heavy scorpions. Sonagon was powerful, but he would have no protection in the air. Yet what other advantage do we have?

Jon could feel Sonagon now. The dragon was on his perch on the rocks off the coast, prowling softly but invisible in the darkness. Sonagon could smell the panic, his body tightening and a low growl in his throat.

Still, Jon hesitated. Something about this moment just felt wrong. The hairs on the back of his neck were tingling. The scar on his chest started to ache slightly.

Jon hadn't moved in several seconds. “Snow!” The Weeper snarled. “The dragon! Now!”

Jon blinked, staring up at the moonless sky. A dark night. A good night for an ambush. "Snow!"

For a second, amidst all the chaos and panic, it felt like everyone was running blind.

We were expecting raids tonight, he remembered with a chill running down his spine. “… The Others,” Jon said suddenly. “We know that the Others are in the forest right now. They’ve been building up for an attack for a long time. Think about it; if the white walkers see a battle happening here, what are they going to do?”

The Weeper paused, his face twisting. The Weeper was no fool. He must have felt something was off as well.

“… You think they’ll be attacking too?” The Weeper said after a pause.

“I think they’ll take advantage of the distraction. We might be dealing with an attack from the forest too,” said Jon. “We can’t leave ourselves exposed to them, not even slightly.”

His hands clenched. His weeping eyes narrowed. “We’ve got to split,” he said with only the briefest pause. “I’ll take four hundred men and hold the camp perimeter. You and your dragon lead the rest and deal with them in the boats. Hardhome is defendable, we’ll hold them back.”

Jon shook his head. “It’s not us that I’m worried about,” he said, lowering his voice and stepping closer. “… What about those in the forest?”

The Weeper’s face twitched. “You mean the host Val leads?”

“Along with Rattleshirt, Harma, and Varamyr.” Jon nodded. “We’ve got fortifications. They’ve got nothing. They’re vulnerable.”
He caught Jon’s meaning. The Weeper growled throatily and shook his head. “Fuck ‘em,” he snarled. “Protect us and our own. We can’t help them.”

“They want to separate us,” Jon hissed, squaring up to the bigger man. The Weeper was twice his age and twice his size, but Jon knew he couldn’t back down. “The Others won’t let us organise; they’ve been waiting for the worst possible moment to ambush us – before we can join together. They ambush us in the forest too, they beat us on both sides and they break us again. We can’t let that happen. We fight together.”

The Weeper was glaring down at him, mad eyes wide. “You want me to abandon a nice, safe camp and run after those fools in the woods?”

“Protect them, Weeper,” Jon ordered, his voice as firm as he could make it. The Weeper was a maniac and a murderer, but right now they were on the same side. “All of them. Protect them.”

The man’s face twitched. “Take a thousand men. As many as you can gather,” said Jon. “Stop the ambush. Get as many people back to camp as you can.”

For a second, the Weeper looked ready to cut him. “… You know, I rea-llly…” The Weeper stretched out the word over his tongue. “… don’t like it when you give me orders like that, crow,” he warned.

“Pick a side,” Jon said darkly. “Are you with the living or the dead? You let them die or you save their lives.”

In this distance, a lone wolf howled. The sound rang out over the night. Ghost, Jon knew instinctively. The direwolf could smell the upcoming battle too.

The Weeper paused, scowling darkly. “I’ll go,” he said, his voice a whisper as he pushed up close to Jon. “… And when I get back, we’re going to have a long discussion about how you talk to me.”

“Happily.”

The Weeper stomped away, drawing his scythe into both hands. “Aggis! Marthe! Bullden!” The Weeper roared at the wildlings around him. “With me, now! Come on, you bastards, we’re going hunting! As many men as you’ve got! Harle! Devyn! Howd! Move it already, sheep-fuckers, we’ve got cunts to kill!”

Few things could get the free folk moving like the sound of the Weeper screaming. The Weeper knew every man he was bringing by name as he tore through the crowd, selecting his warband man by man.

“Keep them alive!” Jon shouted. “Val, Harma, Rattleshirt, Varamyr – protect them. We need as many free folk leaders as we can get.”

“Aye,” the Weeper snapped. “You just worry about those ships and that dragon!”

That I can do, Jon thought with a gulp. Plenty of worry here. He turned to stare at the sails in the distance, but coming closer quickly. The Weeper would have to take the best of their fighting men. If they breach the shore, then the whole camp is in trouble, Jon thought. I stop them from reaching the camp.
He closed his eyes, feeling the presence of Sonagon, Ghost and Phantom in his third eye.

Phantom would be too hard to control, and too flighty with all the panic. Instead, Jon just left the shadowcat to cower by the cliffs, watching over the perimeter. Phantom could smell blood in the air.

Ghost could handle himself. The direwolf was familiar enough with the raiders to follow the warband, and maybe Jon could observe the battle in the forest through Ghost’s eyes. The direwolf was nervous, tense, but right now Jon needed the dragon more.

Jon could feel Sonagon growling, perched onto the rocks as he stared out over the harbour with inhuman vision. The dragon was invisible in the darkness, but Jon knew he was there.

The free folk were all scared. The last time ships had attacked Hardhome, it had been a massacre that stained the ground for six hundred years.

Everywhere Jon looked, he saw pale faces staring at him. Looking at him for protection. So many of those people were wearing white stones on their cloaks, Jon noted.

Be strong, Jon told himself, taking a deep breath. Fight for them. Fight for the living.

“Free folk!” Jon shouted, drawing Dark Sister in a smooth motion. “Everyone stand together! This is our home, and this our future! We fight so that our children can see the next summer, we fight for spring!” He met their eyes, still limping forward towards the cliffs. Dammit, my leg feels so stiff. “We stay together! We fight together!”

There were no cheers. Jon didn’t know what he was expecting. Instead, he just saw hard faces illuminated by the torchlight. He just walked forward to the cliffs, willing himself to move.

The ships were close now. So close that the first of the bowmen started to fire on them from the cliffs around the beach. The free folk archers could help distract the soldiers on the fleet from the dragon.

He felt his dragon stir, accepting Jon so easily. Jon gasped, and suddenly he was staring out through a dragon’s eyes.

An image flickered through his head. The image of Jon sitting on top the dragon’s back. It had only ever been in his imagination before. I need to direct the battlefield, he thought. I need to fly. The thought alone made his knees weak.

The roar was so loud it shook the earth. It felt like the howl of a storm rushing over him. The free folk all gasped. For a second, Jon could even swear that the rowers on the ships faltered.

Sonagon roared as he lumbered forward. His wings outstretched slowly, gingerly, flapping in the breeze. Jon could feel the dragon’s pain from trying to fly on tender wings, but the urgency soaked through to the dragon too.

It’s time to fly again, Jon thought, unconsciously holding his breath.

Sonagon crashed downwards, wings outstretcing wide to catch himself before he hit the water.
With an immense boom, the wind hit him and the dragon was soaring over the waves.

Jon felt the jolt of pain from Sonagon as the air collided with wounded wings, but that was overwhelmed by the pure exhilaration. The dragon’s muscles felt weak, weary after recovering from his injury, but he was still so, so strong. With a single flap, the dragon pounded towards the coast.

Jon was moving forward even before he quite knew what he was about to do. His heart was beating in his chest harder than ever before as he stepped towards the cliffs. For a second, Jon was staring out of two sets of eyes.

The dragon slammed into the beach so hard that the ground shuddered. There were screams of shocks, curses, or prayers from the wildlings, but there was no time. The men on the ship would see the dragon too now, and Jon wanted to use all the element of surprise.

Sonagon twisted his head towards Jon, coming so close his horn scraped against the beach and caused rifts of sand and rock to scatter. Jon saw the rope flapping off the dragon’s horn, and he grabbed a hold with both hands. He had to drop his shield to climb up. The hemp rope was soaking wet; cold, worn, but strong. He had to wrap his hand around it, and then suddenly the jerk of Sonagon’s head took him off the ground. The earth seemed to just fall away from him with a slight movement of the dragon’s long neck.

The world blurred. Jon was left flapping as the dragon twisted on the beach, swinging against hard, pointy scales. Jon’s muscles strained as he dragged himself upwards, levering against the rope to pull himself onto Sonagon’s head. All around him there were shouts and cheers, but Jon could only focus on the dragon in front of him, struggling to cling on tightly as he wrapped himself between the horns. The wind felt like a hurricane.

Even before Jon got a grip, Sonagon was already extending his wings again, flapping upwards with great, powerful strikes. Jon was left half-flailing, hanging on for dear life as the world dropped away before him.

The whole world seemed to blur. The force of that first beat of wings was beyond intense, so powerful it felt like the sky itself dropped down onto him.

Suddenly, they were rising up off the ground. Jon could see the entire camp, the entire peninsula, taking shape beneath him. The fires dotted around, like pinpricks of light in a sea of shadow. Jon gaped, struggling to breathe as the cold air hit him.

Jon focused on the ships through Sonagon’s gaze. The men inside were screaming more than anyone. They were all looking upwards, at the behemoth of a dragon rising above them. Jon gasped and sputtered, staring down at the fleet from atop Sonagon’s head.

Even the living, he thought. Always the living.

“Dracarys!” Jon screamed, clinging to Sonagon’s horn with one arm and Dark Sister in the other. “Dracarys!”

Sonagon roared, pulling his head backwards before shooting forward and exhaling. Powerful wings cracked like thunder. The white flames shone as bright as a shooting star in the night.

The ocean froze.
The world was trembling.

Davos could feel the fear in his gut, like a frozen lump of lead pressing on his spine. The shouts and screams from the boat, mixed with the steady beat of the drums for the rowers were slowly reaching fever pitch.

“Row!” The helmsman shouted, as the coxswain pounded his drums. “Row! Row!”

The smell of sweat stuck over every surface. The ships were chanting, trying to stay in formation. The rowers hoisted as one, while every soldier held shields and swords tightly. They had built a shieldwall over the rigging to cover the deck, but even at the very last moments men were running to smear planks with tar, or reinforce their cover.

They were on Salladhor Saan’s flagship, a great galleas, the Valyrian, at the head of the fleet. Twenty-two ships flanking around them, sailing in as close formation as they dared in the uncharted waters. The other six from Salla’s fleet had been left behind along with the queen at Eastwatch. Three hundred rowers on the Valyrian alone, all rowers pounding furiously at they picked up speed preparing for the tack around the cape. Davos could feel the rowers from every ship in the fleet causing the ocean to vibrate.

The sky was pitch black and the waters were dark and swirling. The sailor in Davos felt himself curse; he didn’t envy the captain’s job right now. Any hidden rock off the coast could threaten them all.

The Night’s Watch had offered a ship of their own, the Blackbird, for the fleet, but as a token gesture more than anything. They simply didn’t have the numbers for a meaningful contribution to the naval assault. The sworn brothers were most familiar with the waters than anyone, though, and so a dozen sailors from Eastwatch had been scattered to assist their navigators on other vessels, while Cotter Pyke captained the Blackbird on the rear rank.

They were close enough that they could see the campfires now. The entire peninsula was lit. The shadows of the fires highlighted the flickering shapes of men. It was already past dusk, and they had to light the torches at the prows. They always knew that the wildlings would see them coming, but by timing it correctly then hopefully the camp would have less than two hours to prepare for their arrival.

The fleet was in good formation. They moved in four ranks of either five or six vessels, although slightly skewed trapezoidally so that when they turned they could beach at once. The Valyrian, the flagship, took the second rank flanked by the Bird of a Thousand Colours, Old Mother’s Son and the Shayala’s Dance. It would have been too dangerous to take the Valyrian on the front row, Davos had argued, yet the flagship still needed to be towards the front and centre.

Davos commanded on the Valyrian, under Stannis himself, while Ser Justin Massey, Ser Ormund Wylde, and Lord Sweet commanded the other ships on their rank. Lord Axell Florent commanded the rear two ranks from the Bountiful Harvest - larger cog, not a war galley - much to the lord’s chagrin, yet it gave Stannis an excuse to respect the lord’s status while keeping him out of the thick of the fighting. Justin Massey, commander of the Old Mother’s Son, also gave Davos some pause – he considered the young knight to be too inexperienced for such a charge – yet Ser Justin was loyal and of high birth, and Stannis needed to reward him for his service.
Still, everyone knew that it would be the front rank that would face the hardest charge. The four ships at the very front would need to establish the beachhead. Nobody said it, but it was no coincidence that the majority of the knights and mounted men were travelling in the second rank while mostly enlisted soldiers and men-at-arms took the front rank. The front rank could take the brunt of the casualties and leave the beach open for the second. The ships at the front were the Saathos Saan, the Oledo, the West Allure and the Ariel Gail – they were all cogs or older vessels, still seaworthy and strong, but also ultimately expendable. The man in command of the forward vanguard was a landed knight Ser Clayton Suggs. Personally, Davos found Ser Clayton to be a despicable man, but there was no doubting his bravery to lead front line assault like that.

Even the sight of the horizon of campfires made Davos’ knees weak.

“How many?” Stannis demanded.

“Hard to say,” Davos replied, forcing his voice to stay level. “The Lord Commander guessed fifteen thousand.” It looks like more, he added silently.

Davos was no tactician, but he could see a hard battle. The wildlings were well fortified. To attack from the coast will leave us vulnerable from the cliffs, he thought. The landing will be an uphill struggle.

The problem with any naval assault was always the landing. The difficulty was getting the ships onto the beach and as many men out of those ships as quickly as possible. Once a proper beachhead had been established it could be a more even fight, but until then it was perilous. Charging into unknown terrain at a disadvantage.

“Ser Richard will lead the charge,” Stannis said. “I shall command the rear. Lord Davos, you will command the reserve.”

“Yes, your grace.” Davos knew little about leading men in battle. His first battle had technically been at the Blackwater, as disastrous as that was, but even then Davos had fell quickly. Even if the Hand of the King was technically leading the reserve, Davos had little choice but to leave leading the men to the knights Ser Patrek or Ser Godry Farring.

The reserve is important too. Should the battle turn sour, then the ships had to be ready to grab men and flee. Davos had spent hours obsessing over the possibilities; how to direct their ships, their formation. So much depended on the terrain and the weather, so much that could go wrong. Even a single unlucky rock or stray current could cripple galleys of this size in waters like these. Let alone trying to navigate and control them all in darkness…

“Milord, the Bountiful Harvest is falling behind,”’ Davos’ son, Devan, reported as he stared through his spyglass. “They’re trailing towards the port rear.”

His boy looked so tall and handsome clad in his squire’s raiment and surcoat, standing by the king. No, Davos thought, right now Devan isn’t my son – he’s acting as the king’s squire. Focus on my duty.

Damn, the Bountiful Harvest always struggled on the upwind turns. Too much bulk and not enough masts, Davos thought with a grimace, but Lord Florent should still be keeping it more in line.

“Signal the Ghiscari Prince to take up the slack,” Davos ordered. “Keep the formation close to starboard.”
They’d be dealing with arrows from the coast on the portside shortly, Davos needed to keep their defence tight on that side. He signalled to the spotted to pass the orders across. The whole deck was tense, anxious.

Still, Davos couldn’t help remember the last time he had been part of an assault like this. They had a much larger fleet at the Blackwater, but the memory of that ‘battle’ still sent shivers down his spine. I lost four sons in that fire, and now my fifth sails with me for the next one.

“This is folly!” A loud voice shouted. Salladhor Saan looked furious. His hands, clad in precious gemstone rings, shook angrily. “Folly!” He pointed a shaking hand at Stannis. “You promised me the wealth of King's Landing! Not to lose my ships in the godforsaken barbarian north.”

Stannis glared at the man. The pirate prince’s face twisted. There was a nervous ripple through the crew. Even pirates avoided wildlings.

Stannis never replied. His gaze was focused on the fires in the distance. He kept one hand on his sword, Lightbringer, clad and covered in its sheathe.

Three of Stannis’ guards, Ser Godry Farring, Ser Patrek of King’s Mountain and Ser Richard Horpe, stepped into block Salla. The knights made a formidable barrier - all broad-shouldered, well-armoured, with hard, stern faces. The pirate prince was not so easily dissuaded.

“Are you listening to me, Stannis?” Salladhor demanded. “You promised gold but give nothing but cold! Now you take my ships to war?” His eyes narrowed. “You promised that this would be an easy battle against savages. That does not look like an easy battle to me, Stannis!”

There were nervous glances around the crew. Everyone was on edge, but Davos’ stomach churned as he saw the ripple move through the pirates and sailors. The king’s men outnumbered the pirates ten to one, but somehow that didn’t make him feel better. This was still Salladhor’s ship, and they were all relying on the pirates and the sailors to man the ship.

“Be quiet,” Stannis said, his body and voice stiff. “You will have your due.”

“Oh aye?” Salladhor demanded. “Are there mountains of gold up in the frozen north that I cannot see? Will these savages have hordes of treasure after the battle? Or am I just risking my ships on another wasted cause?” He glared at him. “You promise. You make promises spew from your mouth in the same way I piss!”

Finally, Stannis turned. His eyes were angry. “Now is not the time,” he growled, turning to Ser Godry. “Take Salladhor here below deck and keep him there.”

The knight tried to grip him. Salla twisted with surprising grace. “No no no no,” the pirate lord muttered dangerously, eyes glinting. “You will not force me around, Stannis. Not here. Not on my ship.”

His hand raised. Suddenly, the sound of drums halted. The rowers all stopped with the coxswain. The Lysene men looked tense, nervous. Stannis’ men clung to the centre of the deck, around their king. They were all armed. Every pirate had a weapon close to hand too.

Stannis’ eyes burned. “Get your men moving,” he ordered.
Salladhor shook his head. “No. I am done with this folly. We either turn around right now or my men will not make another step. My men. My ship.”

The Valyrian was gliding over the waters. Davos gulped. Without sailors to keep her steady, the ship could easily wash onto the coast. To say nothing about the wildlings on the coast.

The other ships were watching the Valyrian too. As soon as the flagship stopped moving, the others stopped as well. If Salladhor started a rebellion, it could claim all of their lives.

“… Your grace…” Davos warned, still watching Salladhor’s men. The pirates are all trained killers. All eyes were alert on the rocking deck.

The king paused. “What are you trying to do here, pirate?” Stannis said, his voice low. Salladhor swaggered closer.

“I told you, I deserve payment.”

“You will get it. But not now, not in battle.”

“You would leave me Salladhor the Beggar? I could have left you to die on Dragonstone, or to die on the Blackwater. Payment is owed.” All laughter was gone from his face. He motioned to the wildling camp. “Slaves. Good slaves will fetch high value in the Free Cities. Fill my ships with slaves after the battle, and you will hire my services for this night.”

There was a dangerous glint in the pirate’s eye. Davos had known Salla for a long time, but that glint still scared him. The pirate lord was not a man to cross, and for a second Davos might have considered agreeing.

Still, Stannis never considered it for a second. “No,” he said. “There are no slaves in Westeros.”

“We’re not in Westeros, there is no law here–”

“I am here. I am the law.”

The pirate’s eyes flashed. “So that is that, then?” Salladhor muttered. “I get no reward for my loyal service. Oh, poor Salladhor. You say there are no slaves, but clearly you expect me to labour and serve like one. I will have it no longer.”

Stannis stepped forward, towering over the man. Everyone on deck was clutching weapons. “…
Salladhor Saan…” Stannis growled. “I promised you payment for your services, and payment will be received – but treachery will only ever have one reward. Do not push me in this, pirate.”

The Lysene glared at him. “Turn my ships away from battle.” He didn’t back down.

Stannis never even hesitated. “Ser Godry, Ser Patrek, take this man to the brig,” he ordered, clutching his sword. Salladhor tried to struggle, he opened his mouth to object. The two men overwhelmed Salla easily, clutching him and dragging him with gauntleted hands. “Gag him,” Stannis ordered, and Godry clamped the pirate’s mouth. The knight grunted as the Lysene tried to bite him, but they both dragged him away.

The other pirates were drawing weapons, standing off against the king’s men. Stannis’ eyes were solid as iron. Davos tensed. He expected a fight, a brawl, but instead the soldiers moved like clockwork. Stannis’ soldiers were dispersed among the sailors, and they all had swords. They moved so quickly like they knew exactly what to do.

Davos was about to shout for men to stop the spotter from signalling the other ships in the fleet, but someone was already on it. Without even pausing, Ser Harys Cobb went straight to the drums and coxswain. Salla must have been counting on more of his men fighting for him in the confusion, but Stannis’ men gave them no chance.

“Any man that refuses to follow orders will be thrown overboard,” Stannis ordered, as his knights held swords to the pirate’s throats. “Lord Davos, you are now captain of this vessel. You are in command.”

Davos blinked. “… Yes, your grace.” The Valyrian was larger than any ship he had ever captained before. “Pull up the rear sails!” Davos ordered, stepping to the rudder. “Starboard from the coast!”

A few pirates tried to object, but the king’s men were on them quickly. “Get those drums beating!”

The coxswain refused to cooperate, but then two knights overpowered him and another man took his place at the drums.

Stannis’ men must been have shadowing the officers on Salla’s ship, waiting for the signal. The officers and captains might try to side with Salla, but the common sailors and rowers were mostly press-ganged in any case. Without anyone to signal, the other ships in the fleet wouldn’t even know about the coup. Davos had never seen a mutiny so smooth or well-executed.

It took five minutes before they were moving again. In total, ten men had to be forcefully removed, but the rest complied with the new command. Stannis’ men were ruthless, while Davos struggled to simply get his bearings.

They were approaching Hardhome quickly. They were on the other side of the cape, but tacking with the wind around the bend. Davos could see the wildlings getting rushing, fires and torches rushing. The wildlings have no siege weapons or ballistae, Davos realised. They would shortly encounter arrows from the cliffs, but otherwise the wildlings would have try and repel their landing on the ground.

Stannis walked up to Davos, eyes fixed ahead. Davos frowned, glancing at the king. Across the boat, Lady Melisandre slowly walked up onto the deck, staring in the distance. Even in the dark night, the priestess seemed to glow. The men rippled slightly with her presence. Her eyes were distant as she stared at the fires on the coast. Lord Florent had offered to keep her with him at the rear flank, but Lady Melisandre had insisted on travelling on the flagship by the king.

“… Once again, the Red Woman proves her worth,” the king said, after a long pause, to Davos. “Lady Melisandre warned me of the pirate’s betrayal. She saw it in her fires.”

Davos blinked. “You knew he would object?”

Stannis nodded. “I made preparations.”

No wonder it had been over so fast. The knights must have been forewarned. Salladhor had clearly been betting on more confusion and hesitation when he tried to take control. Davos blinked. Stannis must have warned two dozen knights and petty lords, but not him. “… I was not aware.”
“You have always been sceptical of the Red Woman’s prophecies, Lord Davos,” Stannis replied. “And I was advised that your friendship with the pirate may cloud your judgement. If it did not come to pass, then I saw no reason to concern you.”

‘Advised’, Davos thought. Advised by Axell Florent and his cohorts, no doubt. Still, there was nothing to do but not and accept it. “What do you want me to do, your grace?” Davos asked.

“Keep the crew in order,” Stannis ordered. “Nothing has changed. None of the other ships need to know about Salladhor’s mutiny until after the battle.”

“Yes, your grace.” Davos wondered briefly if it was really mutiny if the man mutinying actually owned the ship, before shaking the thought out of his head.

Stannis stormed into the middle of the deck. “We’ll be in bow range shortly!” he shouted. “Get shields up and bowmen ready to return fire! Send the signal to man the scorpions and spitfires. All others off the deck.” The king looked at Melisandre, lowering his voice. “My lady, you should return below deck.”

“I am quite safe here, your grace,” she replied with a faint smile.

“Are you sure? There will be arrows.”

“The will of R’hllor is powerful here, your grace. He will protect me.”

All around them, knights swarmed with more large shields, holding them in position on the rigging to cover bowmen on the deck. Sailors raced to cover the ship in wet pelts and position buckets of water to stop fires. The sails had been smeared with tar and vinegar to prevent burning arrows from spreading.

Melisandre smiled at Davos. “Come, Onion Lord,” Melisandre offered. “Come take shelter under the grace of the Lord of Light.”

Davos approached with hesitation, staring at the priestess in suspicion. She seemed happy, as if excited, and something about her knowing smirk put Davos on edge. He couldn’t help but remember the last time he had led a fleet into battle, at the cursed Blackwater. Had Melisandre been smiling then too?

Still, he went to her. I’m standing by my king, he thought to himself. Not her.

Davos couldn’t help but notice that he felt warmer just by being next to her. The air was bitingly cold, but it was like the closer he stepped to Melisandre the less he could feel the chill. The ruby around her throat shimmered in the torchlight.

They stood by the masts, watching the cliffs of Hardhome come into focus. The first arrow twanged in the air, but it was fired far too early. The arrow splashed into the water two hundred feet away from them.

“Prepare to beach, Lord Davos,” the king ordered. “Ser Harys, ready the siege weapons. I will ready the knights.”

They carried horses in the lower hull, but it would be too cumbersome to easily dismount them, and even worse to ride the horses up the steep slope. Instead, the king had resolved to win the battle using siege weapons and ballistae to clear the beach to establish a proper footing, and long catapults to devastate the camp.

The front rank contained mostly infantry, yet the larger vessels of the second had been outfitted with heavy weaponry. Most of their time at Eastwatch had been preparation and building siege engines.

The Valyrian had a dozen large, powerful scorpions mounted on the deck with much further range than a longbow, capable of firing bolts that that could skewer a man. Personally, though, Davos thought so many scorpions were a mistake – the bolt launchers were fantastic at naval combat, but not so good for firing upwards from a rocking boat against infantry.

Their spitfires were far better. The spitfires on the Ghiscari Prince, Shayala’s Dance and the prow of the Valyrian could hurl pots of burning oil nearly as far, and the flames could be devastating against any beach force trying to repel them.

The Old Mother’s Son and the Bird of a Thousand Colours, though, had been outfitted with lumbering catapults on the prow – rock launchers so heavy that Davos could see the ships struggling with the weight of them during the turns. The catapults were nightmarish to aim and they had limited ammo, but also the most powerful weapons they had; they could fire casks of burning oil, large stones, or barrels of jagged iron shards. The men on had even been hoarding the contents of their chamber pots during the journey; so they could launch foul waste during the first testing shots.

“Raise the flare!” Davos ordered to one of the men. “Ready the ballistae. Those cliffs. Now.”

Ever since Eastwatch, everyday, the crew had been rehearsing the actions. The scorpions had the most ammo and the longest range – they could be fired first for covering bolts, along with longbows as soon as they came in range. While the first rank prepared to beach, the second would sit it in the bay and fire heavy weapons, and the third would support from the side. The men all looked pale and scared, but they moved through the practiced motions – clear, twist, hoist – like clockwork.

“Hold,” Davos ordered, as they loaded up long bolts covered in oil-soaked rags. Flaming bolts longer than a sword. “Steady and hold. Wait for a clean shot.”

The fleet was rocking on the waves. The beach came into view from their torchlight. It was rocky, leading up a sharp incline.

“Signal the Oledo to ready for landing,” Davos instructed the signaller hunched in the crow’s nest.
“We land second, but fast. The third line can flank us, tell the Bountiful Harvest that the fourth stays in reserve.”

“There are boats on the shore!” Their spotter called, ducking low and carrying a shield.

“Prepare the spitfires.” The firmness of Stannis’ voice was like a rock amidst the growing panic.
“Burn the ships first. All commanders to their divisions.”

More arrows were firing from the cliffs. He saw the burning tips flashing through the air. The furthest of them stabbed into the ship’s hull. The wood was hard and soaked with salt. It wouldn’t burn easily, but there was always a chance. Davos shuffled slightly further behind the shieldwall, but Melisandre wrapped her arm around his, holding him still with a sweet smile.
“Have faith, Onion Lord,” she said softly.

“I’d prefer to have a shield, m’lady,” he replied, wriggling free to take a pre-emptive cover behind the shield wall built up on the port side of the deck. The arrows were getting closer. The sailors had to be on deck to main the rigging, and the captain had to be here to instruct them, but with every arrow it became just a little bit more dangerous.

Almost there. Right now they were just giving covering fire, to conserve their ammo. As soon as the Oledo was ready, the bombardment and assault would begin. Ahead, he could hear the sound of shouts as they engaged with the boats in the bay.

The front rank had already engaged the boats. With every wave, the second rank got closer. Our turn soon.

It had been so simple when they planned and rehearsed the movements. Who would fire first, who would follow, all of the actions and plans. Stannis had been through the battle plan and so many variants tirelessly. Now, in the middle of it, the fear in the night felt so thick that Davos was struggling to even remember his role.

Davos’ hands were shivering. He had never known such cold before.

“It is not too late to embrace the Lord of Light,” Melisandre said, her voice ringing through the shouts of sailors and soldiers.

“I’m sure it’s not, m’lady.” Davos’ eyes narrowed. There were arrows coming towards them. He had never known Melisandre to walk into danger before. “… Why are you on deck, m’lady?”

“I want to watch.”

“It’s dangerous.”

“I’m sure it is.” She seemed vaguely amused by his concern. Davos hesitated, but they were still a good distance away from the beach. They would have to go around the peninsula and turn into the shore to position.

Damn, it is the waiting for the battle that is agonising. The moments spent just frantically watching the coast come into view. Davos wished he could just push the ship to make it go faster.

“You say you’ve seen how this battle will go?” Davos said finally. “In your fires?”

She smiled softly. “You’re an interesting man, Lord Davos. A cynical man with the uttermost faith in his king. I wonder, why are you so reluctant to accept the Lord of Light?”

Because your god burns people alive, he thought. “I’m no believer.”

“Like I said, it’s not too late to embrace the one true god.” She smiled, staring out over the horizon.

There were two snaps of wire behind him. Davos raised a hand, and the scorpions fired flaming bolts into the cliff. One of them went high, and the other one missed in the darkness. The other galleys were firing too. Men with longbows supported the heavy weapons, firing arrows upwards into the cliffs. If they were lucky, the burning bolts could set tents and structures alight.
They’re nearly around now. Coming into the bay at any moment.

“How did you see this battle going?” Davos asked, glancing at the rippling shadows. More arrows were whizzing past them, or thudding into the shields covering the deck.

She smiled wistfully. “I saw a great battle of ice. A battle of darkness. A battle of where all true believers must rally against the cold.” She looked at Davos. “Like I said, it’s not too late. Not yet.”

“I see a camp of disorganised wildlings,” said Davos. “A large camp, sure, but Stannis seems to think a well-disciplined force can rout them.”

“Really? Because I see a dark night.” Her ruby glittered softly. “This dark night is full of terrors. I have seen them. I have told Stannis about them too. You will see the terrors too.”

Davos frowned. They would need to tack soon, lest the current sweep the ships into disarray, but Davos hesitated. Something about Melisandre’s voice made him pause.

“I wonder if you will still be a non-believer after you’ve seen the terrors for yourself,” Melisandre mused. “Fear does have a way of bringing out the believer, after all. Are you scared, Lord Davos?”

“Very much so, m’lady,” he replied.

“Not yet.” Her words were soft. She turned to stare out over the black sea, slowly walking towards the prow.

“M’lady, take cover! The arro–” Davos shouted warningly, but then the world trembled. The noise hit them so hard that the water rippled, like a crack of thunder. All around him, the Lysene sailors shouted warnings that Davos couldn’t recognise.

“A storm?” Davos exclaimed, staring over the horizon. It was so dark he couldn't see much beyond the lights of the camp. The wind had been so smooth.

“Yes, a storm.” Melisandre opened up her arms wide, shimmering like a burning figurehead of the ship. Davos was suddenly reminded of the burning carving of the Maiden, flaming brightly on Dragonstone. “A cold storm. Look to your sins, Lord Davos, for the night is dark and full of terr–”

The roar shattered the earth.

Davos could feel the impact even from the sea. He could feel the air pound like the beat of the greatest drum ever built. There was no sense in it, no thought – he could just feel it like an ant felt an hurricane.

The sky split open. Davos was staring upwards, watching as the stars disappeared under an enormous shadow. He felt his legs give way and his body topple backwards.

White wings burst into the sky. The black shadow cast over the ship even in the darkness, and a whoosh of wind above them.

The Red Woman stared upwards, her arms wide. “… For the night is dark and full of terrors…” She muttered, so quiet it was only audible in that moment of stunned silence.
A gaping mouth opened, and cold, white light broke through the sky.

The world turned into ice and blackness.

…

Davos heard screaming. It might have been him. He suspected that he screamed Devan’s name.

…

… Davos couldn’t breathe through all the panic. It felt like his heart was about to collapse. His hands were trembling. He had never trembled like this before.

The Valyrian jerked furiously, as it had just collided with a rock. He felt the wood groan and snap, and then up above him the whole sail was cracking against the wind. The men working the masts toppled out of the sky.

The deceleration was instant. The entire ship stopped moving with a tremendous crash. Davos felt himself flung bodily backwards, with men rolling like marbles. Only Melisandre, somehow, impossibly, managed to stay standing at the prow of the ship.

All around him, Davos was vaguely away of the temperature dropping like a stone. Cold steam billowed everywhere, blowing over the deck. The ship wasn’t moving, wasn’t even rocking, only creaking.

The sea, he realised dumbly. *The ocean is frozen solid."

In a single instant, the hull of the Valyrian was consumed by ice.

It was so cold Davos choked for breath. The condensation so thick that Davos couldn’t see a thing.

Screaming. He heard screaming. And roaring.

The white beast flew overhead, tearing over the fleet. Each pound of wings caused the thick, cold mist to billow. Davos glimpsed that white fire again, and then suddenly he saw the clouds of condensation explode over the ocean. Everywhere it touched, the ocean turned cold and froze. It didn’t freeze smoothly – the white fire caused the water to explode, and then froze it into jagged spikes of ice pluming outwards.

Where once there had been lightly rocking waves, Davos could see a huge, snaking path of jagged ice twisting between the ship. The whole ocean was freezing as the beast shot between them.

First, the front rank shuddered. He saw the Oledo collapse into an iceberg, frozen as it was about to capsize. Then, the dragon twisted and shot diagonally, cutting through the second and third ranks. The frozen fire went everywhere.

The Valyrian shuddered. They were caught between wind and waves and ice. The whole ship was twisting dangerous, grinding against jagged ice. He could hear wooden planks snapping.

The whole ship was pure panic. Davos had never known panic like it. It was like all rational thought stopped working and every man was reduced to primal instinct. Like rats running mad.
“For the night is dark and full of terrors!” Melisandre shouted suddenly, her voice cutting through all other sounds. With the clouds billowing around her, but her body illuminated by an alien red glow, she looked like some figure out of a story. Like she had walked straight out of scripture. “The Great Other arises and brings ice, darkness and death, but all believers must unite and fight against the night! Lightbringer, our saviour, will stand for the dawn!”

It shouldn’t have been possible for her voice to be that loud. Her voice suddenly overpowered every other sound, even the mammoth beating of wings, but it reached every corner of the bay. Unnaturally loud.

Davos was still trying to make sense of the world when he heard the chant.

“For the night is dark and full of terrors! For the night is dark and full of terrors!”

From across the deck, he couldn’t hear the men shouting. The queen’s men started the cry, but even the king’s men were joining in. Even the rowers and sailors were chanting and gasping.

Davos gasped, clutching at the rigging and trying to stop himself from trembling. Vaguely, he saw Ser Harys Cobb, a king’s man, stare upwards with frantic eyes. “… My god…” Ser Harys gasped. “… Lord of Light… The Red Woman is right… it’s real…”

In the distance, the monster flew away down the coast, but Davos could glimpse it twisting in the air. Turning around for another pass. In a single sweep half the ships had been crippled. The cold mist hissed around them, cold enough to strip wood.

Davos saw Stannis charge from below deck. The king clambered over the rocking ship, his face pale and his eyes wide, but he was clutching Lightbringer tightly. The sword had never shone so brightly before. It was so bright it was blinding.

“Rally the men!” Stannis bellowed at the top of his lungs. “Archers! Ballistae! Bring that monster down!”

They were all chanting. Even as the men looked half-scared to death, and clattering over the shuddering ship, they were chanting, “For the night is dark and full of terrors! For the night is dark and full of—”

The sound of the roar overhead caused every man to shudder. The beast was circling around, directly over them.

Davos gasped for breath, staring upwards as he felt the rush of air from beating wings hit him. A dragon, he realised dumbly. A white dragon.

Melisandre had called it the champion of the Great Other. The night is dark and full of terrors. Davos had never felt terror like it.

The ship shuddered. The sound of wood snapping broke everything back to focus. The deck was tilting around him. We’re against the ice – we’re going to capsize.

“Pull the sails in!” Davos shouted suddenly, trying to be heard. The sailors were running scared, while the soldiers were flanking around Stannis with sudden fervent faith. “Sails to port, sails to port – the ice, the ice!” Davos screamed.
But it was too late; the whole ship was creaking, tilting and taking on water. The wind pushed it against the jagged ice and the hull spilt. The world twisted and the ship crunched.

Still, the soldiers never stopped. As the dragon came around again, even as their ships were falling to pieces, Stannis held Lightbringer high and the arrows loosed from every bowmen in the fleet. They were mere minutes away from plunging into ice and water, but they all stopped to fire. Even the catapults were launched and the great limbs slung forward, even though there was no chance they’d actually hit. Davos saw men so mad with faith that they let go off their handholds to notch a bow and fire upwards.

Even arrows that weren’t covered in oil or burning rags suddenly seemed to catch alight. Every single arrow was on fire as they shot upwards like hundreds of shooting stars. The Red Woman was glowing.

Davos saw Lightbringer flash as burning arrows shot through the sky. Melisandre had her arms raised, and suddenly the sword in Stannis’ hands flashed like red lightning.

The dragon roared as the red flash hit it. The arrows and bolts pierced into its body, and into its wings. The roar shook the ocean and white fire burst madly. Davos saw spikes of ice and cold shoot everywhere; freezing tidal waves into jagged icebergs, immense clouds of cold mist billowing.

The dragon was crashing – diving towards the ocean as its wings folded inwards. The ship was capsizing and cracking against the ice, tilting so furiously the men tipped off as shards of wooden splinters broke into the air.

A cask of burning oil exploded against the dragon, highlighting the scene in glowing flames. Davos only briefly glimpsed a figure on the dragon, riding on its head, clutching its horn. He remembered Melisandre’s words. That moment seemed to freeze just before he fell. It’s true, he thought. A young boy, with white hair and grey eyes. The champion of winter.

That was the last thing he remembered before he fell downwards, crashing onto jagged ice along with the rest of the king’s men.
Chapter 16

Chapter Summary

The battle for Hardhome, on the bay and in the forest.

Val

The world was screaming.

Val ran blindly, clutching the baby in one hand and her sword in the other. All around her, the bodies thrashed and flailed between the trees, but it was so dark she couldn’t even see who was attacking who.

The babe never stopped screaming. He was a pale, fragile thing, with delicate bones and pale skin. Skin that had never seen the sunlight, and maybe never would. The babe had been born screaming, and could possibly die screaming too.

Only an hour old, and already fighting for his life.

The child was still bloodied and naked, bundled in as many cloaks and furs as Val dared lest he suffocate. Dalla was unconscious, but she was carried between two men staggering with her between them. Her sister was still bleeding, blood staining her breeches. Harma ran at the front, clutching a maul in one hand and a torch in the other.

Her sister was alive, but left so weak from childbirth that she had to be carried. The midwives had done their job, Dalla survived, but so, so fragilely. Craster’s wives ran with them, huddled and cold, along with Gilly and her babe. Gilly was young and wild eyed, keeping next to Val for support, while Harma’s warband flanked them from the sides.

They had gathered maybe three dozen free folk to them. Val kept on calling for more to rally to them, yet more would fall away every second as well. They had women and children running in the centre, while their few remaining warriors tried desperately to cover them.

“Keep together!” Val bellowed, trying to shout over the screaming. “Keep together!”

She knew it was useless. Her voice was just one more in the orchestra of chaos. She was trying to get men to rally, while all around her others were bellowing to attack, or screaming for them to run for their lives.

In the darkness, it was difficult to tell the crows from the free folk, or the dead from the living. Only their eyes gave them away. The blue eyes shining in the blackness.

She saw a body lunge out of the shadows, shambling towards them. A wight, a large man covered in ragged furs and hoarfrost, staggering on a broken leg. Harma bellowed, shouting for Val to get back. Harma’s maul was fierce, the stone head shattering the wight’s skull open in a single blow. Val heard the sound of bone cracking as its brains splattered over.
Still, the wight barely even staggered. Even with half of its head collapsed, it still tried to lunge at Harma with black, powerful hands. It clawed at her face, right until another free folk slammed a torch into the wight. Even as it burnt, the thing was still attacking, trying crawl over the ground as its body burnt to cinders.

There were more wights all over the forest. It was less a battle and more just a constant brawl scattered through the trees. A moonless sky – a good night for an ambush. The white walkers waited for the perfect time to launch their attack.

Val watched as she saw two crows trying desperately to hack apart a wight before it reached them. They were still hacking even as an ice spider, as large as a hound, dropped from the treetops and plunged its fangs through their head.

Everywhere Val looked, she saw blood and death. It's like the Frostfangs again, she realised, her blood turning cold. There’s inhuman intelligence behind the attack.

They used the wights as their main force – lumbering, but also strong and durable. The wights were scattered across the forest, chasing down the living, but it was the ice spiders that were the real danger. The ice spiders were precise, deadly and stealthy – stalking between the trees and always attacking from behind.

Val could feel her heart pounding furiously. The Others only had one goal here; kill as many living as possible. Each man or woman that died was another body for their army.

Val staggered through the woods, clutching the babe tightly. So much screaming. Her hands were trembling so madly, and it wasn’t just from the cold.

Behind her, two men at the rear of their group were dragged down by ice spiders the size of ponies. There was no time to go back to help them. Val kept on running.

“Hold! Hold!” A voice ahead of them shouted, through the darkness. “Fire! Steady! Hold! Fire!”

Val stared at the figures up ahead. Crows, she realised. The men of the Night’s Watch had gathered ahead – huddled defensively back to back on a small hill, surrounding a heart tree. The bloody face on the white bark looked like it was crying.

The crows had rallied better than the free folk. The crows had come to ambush the wildlings, but now they were being ambushed by the dead. There were barely a hundred crows gathered around the heart tree, fighting back wights from all sides using lances and torches.

One voice bellowed above the rest – a strong old voice from a man standing in the centre. “Burning arrows!” The old man bellowed. Even the crows looked terrified. “Light burning arrows! Set torches in the ground, hold the hill!”

“That’s the Lord Commander,” Gilly whispered beside her, wide eyed, clutching her babe tightly. The Night’s Watch were making their stand less than a hundred feet away, fighting for their lives.

They were screaming, Val saw. The crows looked absolutely terrified as the dead shambled towards them.

… Good, Val thought viciously. Let them scream.
“They’re distracting the white walkers for us,” Val said after a pause. “Let’s go.”

She saw Gilly hesitate, walking towards the crows slightly.

“Where?” Harma said. Her brow was dripping blood from where the wight scratched her.

“East, meet up with Rattleshirt – find the Magnar and his men,” Val ordered. “We need to stay together and move.”

Harma cast her a nervous glance. Sticking together wasn’t in their nature. They had too many weak, elderly and children with them. Dalla was so weak she could barely stand – it took two strong men to carry her. Val knew that by herself she could probably survive – she knew the forests better than most – but with a baby and her sister to slow her down? How long would it be before the fighters abandoned the weak to try and save themselves?

Panic and confusion were the worst foes imaginable.

_I’m not letting my sister die. Never. I’m going to give her a chance to hold her baby._

“Stay together,” Val repeated, looking at Harma. “No matter what, we stay together.”

Behind her, two of the crows tried to flee their formation, breaking into the woods. The Lord Commander shouted ‘craven’ at them, but they never lasted long before three ice spiders lunged at them from the trees.

“Nobody run!” The Lord Commander bellowed. He had a strong voice for one so old. “We stand together! We fight together! For the Watch! For the realm!”

It could have been inspiring, if not for one for the sound of agonising screams that howled in the backdrop. There were more shadows converging on them from the trees. The heart tree rippled around them.

Gilly hesitated, staring at the crows. “Come on, Gilly, move!” Val hissed.

She paused, glancing fearfully at the Night’s Watch. “… There’s a man I want to see again…” Gilly said under her breath, before rushing after Val.

They ran. Harma led the way, but there were more wights coming from every side. Men and women running blindly through the forest, stalked by lumbering shapes. Wolves would panic a herd, so the pack could pick them off one by one.

_It’s a hunt, she thought as a shiver ran down her back. They sent in their puppets first to scatter them. They know how to hunt the living._

Val felt them coming before she saw them. She felt the cold chill her bones.

Val turned, and the ghostly shapes glowed in the dusk. They walked over the snow and never left a mark, stepping gracefully between the bodies. An inhuman grace to every movement. Their swords were as delicate as glittering ice. Even in the dark, their bodies shimmered and their eyes shone like blue stars.
Val felt the world freeze with every step the Others took.

Three of Craster’s wives, both old women, dropped to the ground as they saw the Others. They didn’t stand up again. Val couldn’t go back for them.

The Night’s Watch was screaming for order as the Others approached. Their officers were bellowing for the men to stand firm, but the fear was thick in the air. The Others approaching the west, slowly, cutting down every living creature they saw as they walked through the forest.

The Others looked so bright, beautiful and terrifying that it took a long time for Val to see the hulking shapes flanking them. The shapes of beasts with rotting flesh and frozen blood

The undead giants walked with heavy, powerful steps, their bloody, rotten fur covered in hoarfrost. One of the giants was missing a head, but it still moved even with arrows sticking out of its fur. The army of the white walkers came in all shapes and sizes; from hulking giants to bears, boars, elks and wolves – all with glowing blue eyes.

The crows are fools, Val thought, staring at the force coming towards them. Standing firm might work against a few wights, but there was no barricade in the world that could stop the force the Others brought with them.

“Stand steady!” The Lord Commander bellowed, his voice hoarse. “Archers! Archers fi–”

The words were cut off as three giants shambled out of the gloom, charging into the formation of spears and shields. They each grabbed three flailing bodies, and flung them at the Night’s Watch with inhuman force. They launched wights like a siege engine launches boulders. Screaming, clawing boulders.

The flailing bodies were still moving even as they clattered into the centre of the crows. The impact was devastating. One wight was cut to pieces as it landed, but it still scrambled at the men.

The ranks broke. All discipline was lost. Confusion reigned supreme.

“Stay together! Stay together!” The Lord Commander bellowed, as the men ran to escape the flying dead. “Fold up, fall back, fold up–”

That was the last thing he said before another flailing body flung towards them. The Lord Commander raised his shield, but the solid impact of the thrashing corpse still sent him scattering to the ground. Two of his men tried to pull him upwards, but the corpse was biting and scratching even with limbs bent out of shape.

The Night’s Watch fell. Dozens of wights pouring out of the darkness, chasing them down. Val saw the undead giants pounding towards them, along with lumbering bears and rotting wolves. Ice spiders so large they could be used as mounts littered backwards, clicking and hissing next to their masters.

The Others just watched, occasionally speaking a language like cracking ice. This is just a game to them. They watch and laugh.

Val ran. They all ran. Everyone who could still run was running for their lives. All of them running east, away from the Others. They ran as fast as tired, sprinting legs could take them through the thick trees, darkness and uneven ground.
In the distance, a wolf howled.

Val heard shapes charging after them, cutting through the darkness. Inhuman shapes, on four legs, running faster than any man could. Val saw three wolves, a shadowcat, a boar and even a giant elk, all with eyes of blue, rotting skin and hoarfrost on their fur, chasing them down.

We won’t make it to Hardhome, Val realised. Not all of us.

Her grip tightened. For my sister.

“Take the babe!” Val ordered, pushing Dalla’s child towards Gilly. The girl looked startled, trying to clutch two howling children at once. “Take the babe and run! All fighters form up!”

Harma nodded, turning around with her. Val forced the men carrying her sister to keep on going, but there were about a dozen warriors and spearwives stopping with them. All eyes were grim. They knew they wouldn’t be able to outrun the dead.

The wight animals didn’t howl or snarl, they just charged and galloped with unnatural bloodlust. “Free folk!” Harma roared, swinging maul and torch together. “Free fol–”

The wolf pounced on her. She met it with fire, but sharp claws and fangs still snapped at her even as it burned.

Val swung her blade at another wolf as it lunged at a man next to her, and then a spear pierced a dead shadowcat that tried to take her from the side. Val couldn’t even keep track of it; undead creatures all around her charging against the free folk.

The great elk charged into them, taking three men down with its antlers as it barrelled through them. Its left antler cracked and snapped smashing against a man, but the beast was still trying to gouge another using its right. A blade cut off the creature’s left foreleg at the knees, but it was still squirming forward in a chaotic crash of bodies and muscle.

The wildlings fought furiously, but the dead never stopped. They never paused, they gave no quarter. The tide was relentless. More coming.

Val saw the shape of a frozen, rotting snow bear lumber above them, roaring furiously, and flanked by half a dozen wights. The snow bear’s fur was peeling off, its skin black with frozen rot, but the creature was large and powerful.

Val’s sword was trembling so badly she had to clutch it with both hands. She stood her ground, side to side with Harma against the beast. “… Dalla…” Val whispered. “… For Dalla… For Dalla…”

The bear charged. Harma met it straight on. She slammed her torch into its mouth and swung her maul into its skull, but the pure force of muscle still took her off her feet. Val heard Harma scream as sharp teeth mauled at her.

Val lunged, trying to save her friend. The bear’s fur was alight, but it was enough large enough it could still thrash as it burnt. Val’s sword bit into the bear’s neck, through frozen fur and dry flesh, but its paw swung. The paw hit her with bone-shattering force. Val heard the crack from her ribs, but she didn’t feel the pain. She felt too numb, too much adrenaline, for pain.
The massive bulk of muscle crashed downwards. Val watched it all with open eyes. She saw the paw swing to crack open her skull.

“… Dalla…” She whispered, watching the burning bear crash downwards. “… Dalla… Dalla…”

Sharp black claws glinted in the torchlight. For a second, her heart stopped.

All she heard was the growl as sharp teeth lunged.

A shape pounced over her. A white shape that burst out of the trees. Val could barely breathe.

A wolf, she realised suddenly. A white wolf – the largest wolf she had ever seen. So large it could knock the bear backwards.

The direwolf crashed into the bear, tooth and claw. Red eyes flashed against bright blue. The snow bear was still on fire, but the direwolf gnarled away at its legs until it crashed to the ground to burn into cinders.

Val was still lying on her back, staring with wide eyes. There were barely four of the wildlings still standing, but then that direwolf was there, pouncing into the wights. A wight wolf tried to snap at him, but the direwolf tore out its spine with a vicious growl and shook it like a rat.

That direwolf, Val thought with a frantic gasp. Her body was still shivering. I’ve seen it before.

Shouting behind her. More men were rushing out of the forest. Living men – clutching weapons and screaming furious war cries. Men charging to meet the dead, clutching torches and swords. Burning arrows fired from behind them.

A wight tried to shamble at Val. A burning torch and an axe tore it to pieces before Val could even stand.

“You alive, girl?” A voice snarled above her, glaring down. Val stared with wild eyes.

She recognised the scythe and watery gaze instantly. “Weeper?”

“Aye,” The man snarled, glaring at the shadows. “You done lying on your back, bitch, or are you ready to fight?”

“Go fuck yourself,” Val snapped, wincing as she clambered upwards, struggling to hold her sword through jagged breaths. The Weeper only grinned.

Harma, Val thought urgently, turning to stare at the bodies littering the ground. She saw her friend lying in bloody snow. She could see the deep scratches across her body where the bear mauled at her, its teeth in her shoulder. For a second, she looked like a corpse. Then, Harma gasped – choked, pained gasps of air.

“She’s alive,” Val gasped, clutching her friend tightly. Gods, Harma was a tough old bitch – she would survive. She would have to. She motioned to the Weeper. “Harma – Harma Dogshead. She’s alive.”

Val could see the Weeper growl. The Weeper had spent years fighting against Harma in the past, for a frightening second Val thought he would leave her to die. “… Get her out of here!” The Weeper snapped, pointing two men. “Get her onto one of the horses, get her back! And hurry, you cunts!”

The men obeyed – most followed the Weeper’s orders promptly, else they could lose a limb if they didn’t. Val snatched a torch of one of them, dropping her short sword into her belt.

In front of them, the direwolf howled as the wildlings slashed and burnt through the wights.

“What are you doing here?” Val demanded, still glaring at Weeper.

“Call me a saviour, bitch, I’m here to rescue you,” the Weeper barked with laughter.

_The Weeper saving my life_, Val thought. _It must really be the end of days._

“How did you find us?”

He shrugged, nodding at the wolf. “Follow the wolf.” He readied his scythe. “Can you fight?”

“Who the fuck do you think you’re talking to?” Val retorted, brandishing her torch like a club. She needed fire more than the steel here.

All around them, the raiders were spiralling out of the trees. The Weeper’s war band – at least a few hundred strong. A few hundred good free folk warriors that had come prepared to face their foe.

“Set the trees on fire!” The Weeper ordered, screaming at his men.

“What?”

“The trees! Set the bloody trees alight!” He snapped. “We burn this fucking forest down if we have to! I want a line of burning trees across here!”

The trees were pine – cold and covered in snow. They wouldn’t burn easily. A man started to protest, when the Weeper grabbed his cloak and held his scythe to the man’s face. “You either get those trees burning, or we’ll see if cravens will burn any easier!” The Weeper warned.

The panic was everywhere. _Burning the trees is a good idea_, Val realised. Use the fire to keep the wights away, and a large burning bonfire to rally anyone running blind, a signal to bring people towards them. The Weeper wanted a flaming wall.

Men ran around in a mad frantic rush. She heard fighting ahead. The Weeper glared at Val. “How many are we dealing with?” He demanded.

She shook her head. “I don’t know,” Val replied. There had never been a chance to count. “A few hundred, a thousand, five thousand?” Her gaze darkened. “I saw five white walkers approaching from behind.”

The Weeper’s scowl darkened. “Get those fire burning!” He roared, screaming at his men as they hacked at the trees. There were still wights up ahead, but the raiders cleared through the forest, setting up a perimeter in the snow. Val glimpsed the direwolf pounding along the forest, disappearing into the dark like an apparition.
The Weeper’s men were trying to secure the perimeter gather the survivors from the camp and bring them to safety, but Val knew the Others wouldn’t be far behind. They needed to hold the ground while they gave the survivors a chance to make it to Hardhome. The forest was buzzing with figures running, and great fires catching light. The shadows danced with the flickering flames and suddenly the forest seemed alive.

Five hundred men, maybe, Val thought, plus however many survived the ambush and could still fight. It was enough to give the Others pause, but they were still spread out wide.

There were shouts up ahead. Five wildlings forced three men in black cloaks down to the ground. “We’ve got three crows!” A man in bloody furs howled to the Weeper. “We caught them running!”

The three crows all looked terrified as the wildlings forced them down, blades to their throats. Their faces were ghostly pale. The Weeper smirked cruelly as he looked at the men. “Kill them and dump them on the fires!”

The man was just about to swing his axe at the crow, when a sudden snarl interrupted him. The direwolf was there, teeth bared as the wolf snapped at the man about to execute the crow.

One of the crows, a large man with thick arms and a dull face, stared in shock. “… Ghost?” The crow exclaimed, looking at the direwolf.

The Weeper cursed in the Old Tongue. He appeared to hesitate for a moment. “… Don’t kill them,” The Weeper ordered, sounding reluctant. Val had never known the Weeper change his mind before, much less spare a crow’s life. “… Take all crows prisoner!” He spat the words in disgust. “Tie them up and march them back to Hardhome for questioning.”

Val looked at him in surprise. This wasn’t the Weeper that Val knew – the Weeper Val remembered would never have risked his life for anyone, let alone spare an enemy. He’s working for Jon Snow, Harma had said. Val could still scarcely believe it. Just what sort of hold did Jon Snow have over the man?

The direwolf – Ghost – was everywhere, running around the perimeter. It took Val a few seconds to realise that the Weeper kept one eye on the wolf, following his lead. All of the men were following the wolf.

Those red eyes look more intelligent than any animal I’ve ever seen, Val thought. Warg.

Around them, the fires were burning bright. More people were taking shelter through the forest, while the raiders covered their retreat. How many people could they save? Val wondered. How many from her host were still alive? Until they stopped to count however many were still standing, there was no way to know. They could only hold the line.

There was a sound up ahead. The direwolf howled again, splitting the night. Every man tensed at the sound.

Then, there were figures rushing back from the trees, banging furiously on their shields. “They’re coming!” A man screamed. “They’re coming!”

“Get behind the fires!” The Weeper ordered, retreating backwards. “Hold the line, force them into the flames!”
The smoke and fear were so thick in the air that Val could hardly breathe. She saw the shadows ripple, and shapes taking form. The lumbering bulk of the undead giants towered into view, flanked by creatures of all shapes and sizes. Val saw ice spiders as large as horses skitter in the gloom.

The shimmering bodies of the Others hovered, barely visible, letting their puppets charge in front. The Weeper screamed bloody curses, threatening to flay any man that turned craven, all the while the raiders took cover.

Val could hear the screaming and fighting all around her, even if it was too chaotic to see a thing. She was charging forward, swinging the torch like a club as the dead shambled at her. Bodies, alive and dead, thrashed around her.

The confusion and panic felt as thick as the smoke and darkness around her. How long until daybreak? She thought with panic. How many dead, how many to follow?

An undead giant charged straight through one of the bonfires, sending wood and cinders flying everything. Even as the creature burnt and thrashed, the Weeper hacked at its legs viciously with his scythe. Val roared as she threw her burning torch straight at the giant’s rotting skull.

And in front of them, the darkness rippled. The dead charged out of the trees towards them like a tidal wave.

---

Jon

Everywhere Jon looked, he saw ice. The ice plumed and roared across the bay like fire. The blades of ice sprouting upwards were as sharp as knives. Cold steam hissed from the jagged chunks of ice littering the bay. He could see the ice cracking, with waves rolling over the serrated spikes as the whole bay was consumed by chaos.

Sonagon roared, flapping powerfully through the air. The dragon was big, but strong enough to fly with natural grace. With outstretched wings, the dragon could smother any ships. The white, cold fire exploded from Sonagon’s throat in constant bursts, each stream scorching the ocean into solid ice. From above, Jon could see the icy tendrils spiralling out with surprising beauty. For a moment, it seemed surreal how the ice twined and spiralled outwards in sharp jagged strikes, cutting through the great galleys.

Run away, Jon thought, his heart pounding as the scene below dissolved into absolute panic. Please, just run away. I don’t want to kill any of you.

The dragon roared, another breath causing the ice to crack and sharp icicles scraped against the hull of the ships.

Below him, he could hear the screaming. Men scattered around the ships like ants running wild. Each breath turned the sea to ice.

The dragonfire was so cold that Sonagon could have easily destroyed the ships, if Jon had given the order. The wooden vessels would have cracked and splattered, the men on them would never have stood a chance. If Jon had wanted to, Sonagon could have turned each ship to frozen splinters with a single pass.
Instead, he didn’t. Instead, Jon focused Sonagon’s breath only the ocean, zigzagging around the ships. He froze the sea in front of the ships, weaving white streaks between the ships.

Jon was in the dragon's skin, controlling the dragon's jaw and wings as if they were his own. He could feel the pounding wind under leathery wings, and the power exploding from his throat.

Freeze the ocean, block their path, force them to turn around, Jon thought, gasping as he tried to breathe through the cold air rushing by him.

By the first sweep, the ice was so thick it was tearing against their hulls. Some of the men tried to fire arrows upwards at the dragon, but it was useless as the dragon was already streaming past.

Still, the men never broke. He could see running and screaming, but none of the ships were turning around. Jon was giving them as much leeway as he dared – directing Sonagon to pass wide. Trying to give them a chance. Jon cursed. Why aren’t they running?

Realisation struck. They couldn’t run, not easily at least. The dragonfire was colder even than Jon had expected – the ice spread outwards. It froze into sheets of ice stretching out from the spiked strokes, ice freezing their hulls.

The wind and waves pushed the ships further and further against the ice. Maybe if they had an organised crew they could have escaped through, but the sailors were going mad with panic. Too many running wild, and letting their ships get trapped even further in the fleet.

Sonagon broke off the attack, flying wide and soaring further out off the coast before twisting around. The dragon’s wings were aching, still very sore. Jon had to concentrate to keep Sonagon steady, pushing him forward.

This far from the mainland, looking down from a dragon’s eye view, Hardhome just looked like a cluster of lights in the darkness. The fleet was a scattered flicker of lights in absolute disarray.

One more pass. I’ll make one more pass, one more line of ice – enough to a form barricade to make sure they can’t pass around and continue the attack. After that, I’ll back off – give the ships time to run away…

They would run. They had to.

Sonagon howled. His wings pounded so hard they caused depressions in the water below. The dragon twisted and started to fly back towards the coast, building speed with every flap.

Then, he saw the light. There was something on-board one of the ships at the front - a larger ship, the flagship - dazzling like nothing Jon had ever seen before. A rippling light cutting through the darkness.

Jon had to squint to see through it. It was blinding white. Jon could only just make out a figure clutching a glowing sword, standing on the deck, thrusting upwards.

Men cheered around the glowing sword. The soldiers rallying.

That was the last warning Jon had before he saw the arrows shooting upwards.

The dragon roared in pain as the arrows from the boats below hit him. The arrows were like pinpricks, but the bolts from the ballista were dangerous even to the dragon. Jon felt his pain as the soldier’s fired. Sonagon convulsed, wings thrashing–

Damn! Jon cursed. It was the very first time riding the dragon into battle, and he already knew he had just made a stupid mistake. Too confident – too stupid – flying too low. It left the dragon an easy target for the archers. He thought they’d be too panicked to fire back–

The light flashed. The fire hit him like a flash of lightning.

Through Sonagon’s eyes, Jon glimpsed a woman in red on the deck of the ship. She smelled like shadows and burning flesh. While everything around her was cold, she blazed impossibly hot.

Jon screamed – his mind going blank. It felt like the fire scorched his brain. It felt like his skull was about to explode. He felt fire flash in the air. They weren’t real flames – like shadow fires, an illusion that burned his mind rather than his body. The fires hit Sonagon, but it was like they were transferred through to him. Illusionary pain that still burned.

His connection to Sonagon vanished under the pain. The warg disappeared – like Jon had been scorched out of Sonagon’s skin.

The dragon roared in pain, body convulsing. Wings folded inwards. Air rushed past.

Magic, Jon realised dumbly. That red woman did something. He never knew what, but he could the feel the pain. He could barely even blink, trying to process the air howling…

Sonagon was crashing downwards into the icy sea. The dragon wasn’t following Jon’s orders anymore; their link was burnt. The wind howled so loud Jon couldn’t even scream.

Barely a second before Jon saw the frozen sea zoom into focus. His legs worked on instinct, dropping off the dragon’s horn and then Jon was half-jumping, half-falling.

The fall felt like an avalanche. The cold hit like a warhammer. Sonagon dived into the water, with so much force he broke straight through the ice. Chunks of ice flew everywhere on the waves.

Jon splashed into water, breaking through a fine layer of ice coating the surface. The force made him gasp. He could already feel the bruises forming. He could see icy water filling his vision, the blackness choking him.

There was no moment of hesitation, he just thrashed. The water threatened to pull him down, but then Jon shrugged off his cloak and splashed upwards. His boots very nearly drowned him. He felt his hands slide against solid ice, finding handhelds in the coarse surface, barely enough to pull him upwards. There was hardly any leverage but he kicked and thrashed, trying to clamber upwards onto the icy surface.

The cold pierced him to the core. Jon gasped, staring around him a jungle of icy blades.

I’m on the ice, he thought through wheezy breaths of shock. His body was dripping wet. He knew he was cold, but he could barely feel the chill through the fire in his blood and his heart beating so hard. He could hear the ice crackling all around him. The mist rising everywhere obscured everything, the ice so cold that it hissed.

He saw a ship in the distance burst into flames. Pots of oil and flaming arrows from their own sailors set the ship alight as the crew started to panic. Arrows were still falling from the cliffs at the trapped vessels closer to the shore.

He heard the sea rumble. Sonagon dived beneath the water, while Jon was left lying on the frozen sheets of ice. The water rolled over the ice, the waves pushing it up to his ankles. Jon clutched his furs and leathers tightly, but there was no warmth against the wet cold. All around him, he saw jagged icicles from where Sonagon’s breath had frozen the water as it splashed. If Jon had landed even a dozen feet to one side, the ice could have skewered him.

Jon stared in shock. Around him, there was a tremendous crack. One of the ships nearby was being torn apart against the ice, capsizing and splintering over the frozen spikes. Jon stared in shock, gasping as he tried to pull himself off the ground. The ice wasn’t smooth – it felt rough and coarse. Even the small frozen blades were sharp enough to cut into his palms.

All around him, there were screams and shouts. It was dark Jon could barely see – but then he saw a light split the sky. A shimmering, unnatural light. One voice rose above them all.

“One king! One god! One realm!” A man bellowed. “Forward! For the realm!”

He could see dozens of men drowning in armour in the cold sea or falling overboard to be skewered on jagged ice spikes – but there were more clambering overboard from the cracked ship. Men in chainmail and clutching swords were trying to traverse across the ice, escaping their ships. The screams and noise was deafening. From above, from the dragon’s back, it had seemed distant and almost surreal, but on the ice there was just pure chaos. The whole bay had been thrown into pure, frantic chaos.

They charged. The soldiers were staggering across the uneven ice, trying to get towards the shore. The ice was sharp, cracking and barely stable, but they were still risking it.

“Brave men…” Jon gasped. Only the brave or suicidal would dare to try and charge across ice this treacherous.

The soldiers were rallying. He saw men abandoning ship – rallying across the frozen bay. His heart pounded in horror, but they weren’t stopping. They weren’t running away. There was no retreat, just a horrified, desperate charge.

All Jon had been trying to do was stop the battle from happening, but these men were insistent on fighting to the end. Fighting in panic rather than running in fear.

“… No no no…” Jon wheezed, clutching Dark Sister as he staggered forward. He could barely breathe. It was all going wrong; that Red Woman had done something, Jon couldn't feel Sonagon, and they were still going to attack the camp.

He could feel the ice swaying gently in the waves. He could hear the war cries and rallying calls.

Five hundred feet away, Jon felt Sonagon bursting from the ocean like a sea monster of old. The ice dragon had abandoned the sky, and attacked the ships from the sea instead. The dragon was furious, and not even Jon could restrain him anymore. Jon’s mind was spinning, he couldn’t warg. Sonagon tore the ship apart from underneath with claws and icy breath.
The sight sent tremors down his spine. Sonagon barely looked recognisable. It lunged out of the water looked like some wrathful god. The dragon was all coated in glistening spikes, looking bigger, bulkier than ever. Ice, Jon saw. That’s why it dived instinctively.

Sonagon used his own breath to freeze the water to its body – using its own dragonfire to form a second skin of hard, crystalline armour around its scales. Maybe the frost and rime slowed the dragon down too, but from the water the visage was horrifying. As if it was made out of ice itself. An ice dragon, glittering white and black.

Jon heard men’s screaming as the ship was shredded underneath them. He saw men die from breath so cold it ruptured their bodies, splattering them into gruesome frozen shards.

Twenty-four ships. One ship had just been completely pulverised. About another half a dozen had been destroyed – shipwrecked against the ice. There were more ships frozen in place in the bay, and that left only maybe two or three ships that might be able escape the ice altogether and sail away.

Jon spun, staring between the darkness and icy spikes. There was no coordinating this battle, there was no organisation, nothing but chaos and terror. Jon could never have imagined anything like. The panic so thick it was suffocating. How could everything go so mad so quickly?

All around him, men were dying. Loyal men. Brave men. Men fighting for the realm.

Dammit! Jon felt like screaming. Why did you have to attack? Why didn’t you just run?

Around him, people were shouting. How many men could still rally from the wrecked vessels to assault Hardhome? It was impossible to tell – but the best of Hardhome’s fighters would have left with the Weeper. Even if there were still a hundred soldiers left alive to attack the camp, they could be assaulting women and children…

He glimpsed arrows in the air. Screams. The men from the front ships had reached the coast, the sound of battle rang in his ear.

Jon clambered up over the ice. His head twisted and spun, struggling to keep track of the surroundings. The ice had formed a twisting labyrinth from the swirling strips that Sonagon had cut across the ocean…

“There he is!” Jon heard the voice behind him. “It’s him! It’s him!”

There were soldiers behind him, struggling to clamber up an ice cliff. Jon stared at men in heavy armour, his gaze turning to a bright light behind him.

Jon saw the man with the glowing sword. He was an older man, bald with a hard face. He had gaunt cheeks, high cheekbones and a close-cropped beard. He wore heavy armour, fine armour, clutching his flaming sword and a steel shield, but there was a crown on his head. Jon stared – was this man a king?

The king with the flaming sword was flanked by two dozen men – knights, all of them. At the sight of Jon, the whole crowd rippled.

“By the God…” He heard man bellow, staring at Jon in awe. “It’s him. The champion!”
“Seven save us…!”

“For the Red God! For the Lord of Light!”

More and more men were gathering out of the wreckage of their ships, clinging onto treacherous ice paths.

The icy path between Jon and the knights was sharp, twisting and perilous. The ice was dangerously thin in parts and frightening sharp at other places. The ice was rocking, creeping and cracking from the waves. It was perilous, and any men that fell into the black water would easily be swallowed by it.

Still, these men didn’t even hesitate. “Attack!” The king with the flaming sword bellowed, charging forward fearlessly. His glowing blade shone and blazed. “For the realm! Attack!”

No time for hesitation. No rational thought, just pure instinct. His blade was in his hands. His heart pounded furiously – Jon’s blood rushed so fast he never even felt the cold.

Jon saw men with bows. He jumped forward and dropped down, running towards the soldiers so there’d be no clear shot.

The knights charged like fanatics. At least twenty of them – so many Jon couldn’t even count. They were all bigger, older, with heavy steel. Jon wore furs and leather armour, but these men were clad in plate and chainmail, with helmets, boots, and gauntlets. Dark Sister was a fairly lean and light sword, while these men had broadswords, heavy weapons and shields.

Jon’s heart pounded, but there was no choice. He knew with one glance that they wouldn’t listen to reason, his blood was burning, and he wasn’t prepared to run.

_The man in the crown_, Jon thought. Their leader, their commander. If Jon could take him down, put a sword to his throat, force his men to retreat. Best way to save lives would be to end this battle quickly, try to regain control as quick as possible. _Capture the king._

Jon swung Dark Sister to meet them, his whole body rushing.

A man swung a broadsword at him, but Jon was already shoving his palm into the man’s breastplate, knocking him backwards. On the rocking ice, there was no saving himself as the knight toppled and crashed into icy spikes. The ice cracked and blood splattered. The warm liquid hissed against cold frost. Another knight tried to jump at him from behind, but he tripped and dropped before Jon could even raise his sword to meet him. He fell into the water and disappeared.

In a fair fight, Jon would have been overwhelmed by them in a second. Still, right now, their heavy armour was their biggest weaknesses. The ice underfoot was cracking and unstable, and Jon saw heavy steel boots fail to get a footing.

These were all southron knights – totally unsuited to the cold or frost. On a level, grassy plain they would be fearsome, but they had never fought on icy terrains like this. But Jon had walked across icy mountains and rough terrain for so long that his body balanced instinctively. He kept his mass low and his feet balanced, swinging and snapping like a wolf on the ice.

These men were angry, and aggressive. Jon was small, lean and fast. He stayed defensive; his posture stiff and secure to compensate for his bad leg, while his foes were left shambling around him.

The treacherous path between them was so narrow they had to fight Jon almost one by one. They had to clamber upwards, over cracking and jagged shards to reach him, and in their numbers they were slipping and bumping against each other. Jon had every advantage; he could control the fight, while they were all dazed and weak.

Jon’s sword slashed faster and swifter than it had ever moved before. The men fell in front of him, one by one. His swordsmanship was so good that Ser Rodrik would have been proud. It took only the slightest slash before the knights lost their footing and fell.

And still, Jon’s blade slashed faster and faster.

A man swinging a mace tried to crack his head open, but then Jon ducked and Dark Sister severed the man’s foot at the ankle and he toppled backwards. He was still screaming even as he fell in almost slow motion. The man managed to grip the ice to save himself from the ocean, but left dangling uselessly in freezing water, unable to pull himself up, as he bled out with a missing foot.

In the distance, Sonagon surged out of the ocean again. The roar echoed across the bay as he tore his way through another ship. Even as Jon fought, the dragon was in the sea destroying the ships one by one.

“Kill the champion!” The man with the burning sword bellowed. His blade illuminated the battlefield with eerie white, reflecting on glittering spikes. “He controls the dragon, kill him! Kill the boy!”

There was no time for Jon to even reply. He was too busy trying desperately to fight against two heavyset men at once. It was less a fight and more a gamble to see who would lose their footing first.

A man with a cloak of white and blue stars fell first. He toppled, and Jon pushed him into his colleague and then they were both falling together.

You trip you die, Jon thought, panting for breath. His lungs felt raw, but his sword was singing.

Five men dead. Then seven, then eight, then nine. They dropped one after another, some in bone-rattling cries of pain, others cut down before they could speak. The ice cracked beside them, and at least four men fell into the ocean before Jon could even touch them. He was light enough to dance across the thinner ice, while the shambling knights stood no chance.

Arrows shot over him. Then screams. Jon glimpsed other figures – men in furs with spears. The wildlings. They were charging over the ice to meet the soldiers. They were all roaring, vicious. It was a scene so savage it made his hands twitch – wild men tearing over the bay, illuminated by the flickering flames and glittering ice.

But Jon could barely even look at them. He couldn’t look at anything except the man in front, and then the next, and the next…

Before long, Jon had lost count of how many men had fallen beneath his blade. He knew men were dying, but he wasn’t – his blood was pumping, his sword was swinging and he just suddenly felt so alive. A single misstep would have killed him, but he was dancing between them so lightly it felt like his feet barely touched the ground.

He felt alive. It felt like his body was trembling.

“For R’hllor!” A man roared, gasping for breath as he barely parried Dark Sister. “R’hllor! R’hllor!”

The knight swung wide, completely abandoning any defence just on the hope of hitting Jon. Perhaps the man was counting on his chainmail to protect him. It didn’t. Dark Sister cut straight through his chest.

The black blade seemed almost hungry in the moonless night as the blood splattereded. Two more men followed him down in short succession.

"Boy!" A heavyset man tried to barrel at Jon. A burning red heart blazed on his surcoat. He was growling in rage as their blades clashed. He was too big, too strong, Jon scurried backwards. “… You are nothing but a boy!” The man roared, his face red. He slashed forward. Left, right, left. “I will kill you boy! Ser Godry the Dragonslayer; give the name to your evil master, boy!”

Jon remembered his lessons, eyes following every blow. Wait. Patience. Pause, and wait for the right moment.

He saw it. The knight overreached himself in a long cut. Dark Sister slashed. To his credit, Ser Godry managed to parry the strike, but barely. The knight was forced onto the backfoot, struggling to keep up as Dark Sister hissed at him time and time again.

“This boy is about to kill you, ser,” Jon whispered coldly. He saw fear in the man’s eyes, right up until he took one step backwards too far. The ice cracked underfoot and the man crashed straight into the ocean.

Around him, Sonagon was busy destroying the fourth ship in the fleet. Jon couldn’t see it, but he heard the screams and roars.

There were men rushing around Jon. There was fighting everywhere. The free folk had rushed onto the ice too, and they were clashing furiously even as more ships crashed and more and more men fell into the water at every second.

Dark Sister isn’t killing them, Jon thought between gasps and swings. They’re killing themselves. Their own fanaticism is murdering them faster than I ever could.

It was like no battle Jon had ever imagined. Like a giant brawl scattered on a jagged, frozen hellscape. Whether by bravery, fear, or fanaticism, Jon couldn’t say, but the soldiers never backed down. They fought with fury right up until their cold deaths. A battle of ice.

Bodies littered around him. Jon cut a bloody path straight through the men. Not all of the men were dead, but they were all left bleeding out. One man was still alive, gurgling for breath despite falling straight onto an icicle that pierced straight through his chest. Their blood steamed against the cold, causing Dark Sister to smoke softly.

There were free folk behind him, hollering and shouting as they covered Jon’s back. He just gripped Dark Sister with both hands as he limped forward with small, careful steps.
The king with the burning sword glared at Jon with hard, cold and furious eyes as he approached. There were other soldiers, but they were all holding back. The ice was now so thin that only one man could approach at a time, and now it was the king’s turn.

He was a big man – tall, broad shouldered and sinewy, with a hard jaw and angry eyes. There was a flaming heart inlaid on his breastplate. Well-crafted armour.

Under the helm, his expression was hard, dark, like chiselled out of stone. The king dropped his shield so he could fight sword on sword easily. It was a smart move – anything that restricted mobility was deadly in a battle like this.

“Stannis!” A voice shouted from the soldiers. The chant rose among them. “Stannis! Stannis! Stannis!”

Jon’s eyes flickered. The crowned man charged forward fearlessly. Jon swung Dark Sister to parry. Their blades clashed. Black metal scraped against the glowing sword.

For a second, it was like the world was watching as their weapons clashed.

Jon glared at the man. Stannis. He wore a crown. The stag. Jon put it together. “… You are Stannis Baratheon,” Jon said, parrying his blade. The resemblance to the great fat king they had feasted at Winterfell wasn’t immediately obvious, but Jon started to recognise the hard jaw, thick brow and dark whiskers.

The man growled the words, gasping as his glowing sword spun. Jon never knew what they meant. Stannis was a good fighter; practiced, experienced, good balance. He didn’t give ground and he knew how to use his size. He was stronger than Jon and his form was solid, but Jon was still fast enough that the king struggled to keep up.

That glowing sword was dangerous; up close it was so bright it was blinding. Jon could barely focus with how the sword blazed in front of him, and the light scolded his eyes.

The man glared at Jon with pure hate and fury. “I will defeat you, ‘Champion of Night’!” He snarled, teeth gnashing. “It was promised!”

His sword swung wide, a heavy blow that Jon could barely block. The sound rang out shrilly. “… I will not let you take what is mine!” He spat. “Dragonspawn. Savage. Usurper!”

Jon had never heard a man speak with as much hate as Stannis put into the next word.

“Targaryen.” The word was like a curse from Stannis’ throat.

Dark Sister parried. Stannis gripped his glowing sword with both hands, trying to force it to Jon’s skull. There’s no heat, Jon realised suddenly. The blade was cool. Nothing but phantom fire. Jon had been trying to keep his distance from the fire, yet there was nothing but light.

Jon’s fist slammed into the Stannis’ stomach. The blow against the hard chainmail bruised his knuckles, but it knocked Stannis backwards and broke the grapple.

“You talk a lot about titles and names,” said Jon. Stannis tried to attack, but Jon was swifter. His blade forced Stannis backwards. “… And not enough about your men dying.”

Stannis roared, striking hard. His attacks were vicious, but he was also tiring faster. Jon had spent months fighting and living hard, growing lean, strong and restless. He towered over Jon, but Jon had fought larger and stronger opponents. Jon could strike twice for each blow of his. Jon knew he would not fall first, not like this.

Jon was angry too. He felt so, so angry. He was angry at Stannis for forcing this fight, he was angry at himself for fighting. He was angry at having to kill so many men when all was trying to do was save as many as possible from the dead.

In the background, there were howls as Sonagon demolished a fifth ship. Over half of Stannis’ fleet was already gone.

“These men,” Jon growled, meeting the king’s blue eyes, “they died because of you. They followed you here, and you killed them. No one had to die, but you and all your names killed them.” Dark Sister scraped against Stannis’ shoulder, but didn’t quite pierce the plate. “Yield, ‘king’.”

“Never,” Stannis growled, but he was falling backwards. He was still strong, but slowing, while Jon was only getting faster. The soldiers were still chanting his name, but every eye was focused on the glowing sword flashing in the night.

“Yield,” Jon pushed, striking harder. Stannis crumpled, and then Jon’s good leg kicked him in the chest. He fell backwards on the ice.

Nobody was chanting anymore. Two of Stannis’ soldiers tried to rush into their king’s aid, but Jon’s blade cut one of them down without a second glance and then the other backed away. It gave Stannis enough time to clamber to his feet, but he was still struggling.

Jon gave him no time to recover. He struck forward, knocking Stannis backwards with a ferocity and speed that the king could not match. More and more of Jon’s strikes were going through, glinting against his armour.

Behind him, another ship fell to Sonagon.

Jon could feel the air shift. It was like the fanaticism that drove the men was being hacked with every blow that Jon landed to the red heart on Stannis’ chest. “Yield!”

The man was losing ground, but there was still that power in his gaze – an iron ferocity that said he would never, ever back down.

Jon remembered what Donal Noye once said. Stannis was pure iron; hard and strong, but also brittle. He’ll break before he bends.

His army was being broken now. Sonagon was massacring his ships on the sea, and the free folk were massacring his men on the ice.

Vaguely, between the blows, Jon was aware of movement among Stannis’ soldiers. Screams and shouts. Men were turning to run, and other men were stabbing soldiers in the back. There were barely any soldiers left, and it looked like a mutiny. There were foreigners – brightly dressed and from the Free Cities most like – stabbing at the soldiers with cutlasses and rushing to pull lifeboats from the wreckage.

Too many of Stannis’ loyal men had died rushing to their deaths, Jon thought. There would be bodies littered in the bay for a long time. That left all of the disloyal ones to break free.

Perhaps Stannis could feel it too. There was no one left to charge against Jon anymore. He saw his posture crack.

Still, he never wavered, not even for a second. Stannis screamed a wordless cry of fury as he swung his glowing sword with both hands, as hard as he possibly could. Dark Sister met the blow. The blades clashed for a final time, the sound ringing out like a bell.

Jon felt the metal crumble. Stannis’ magic sword exploded into shards under Dark Sister. The light disappeared without a trace.

Stannis’ eyes widened in shock as the shards of metal sprinkled across the ice. Dark Sister was still swinging.

“You should have yielded,” Jon whispered, as Dark Sister slashed through Stannis’ wrist.

The gauntleted hand disappeared in a splatter of blood, leaving only a bloody stump on Stannis’ hand.

The king never screamed. He never even flinched. He just stared at his missing hand in quiet horror as his body fell backwards.

There was a moment of stunned silence. Then, someone started screaming. Jon heard a man howling “Stannis!” and the noise echoed in the bay.

The very last of the king’s men rushed to their liege’s side – maybe five or six men desperate enough to risk the thin ice. Jon’s body was still trembling, his sword hand swinging – he cut down the first figure that tried to charge him without a second thought. Dark Sister was already swinging at the second before his eyes managed to catch up.

There was a boy before him – clutching a dagger that was trembling so hard that he could barely even hold it. A boy younger than Jon; maybe eleven or twelve. He wore a leather squire’s raiment, and there was a black onion stitched into his surcoat. He had dark hair, pointy ears, and wide eyes that were staring up a Jon fearfully.

Jon’s blade stopped. The squire looked so much like Bran.

Bran had wanted to be a knight, Jon thought suddenly. He thought back to all the knights that he had just killed.

Jon met the boy’s eyes and lowered Dark Sister, watching quietly as the king’s men dragged their liege away. Maybe they could still a reach a lifeboat. If they were good sailors, and lucky enough, maybe they could even get away. Jon should have stopped him, but the squire stood in his way. The boy’s eyes...
Jon lost all interest in fighting. He let them escape. After a moment of stunned silence, the squire stared at the dagger in his hand, before turning to chase after the group dragging the king away.

The sounds of violence never stopped. Whatever soldiers had escaped the ice on to the coast, the wildlings were there to hack them to pieces. They fought well for a moment, but this was less a battle and more of a massacre now.

All of the fury, the pain, the fear and the adrenaline… it was like Jon could feel it bubbling inside of him. He paced restlessly among the bodies. He screamed wordlessly into the darkness, just to try and release the pressure in his chest.

Sonagon roared from ocean, still tearing through the ships. There were some boats in the open water, but few, and the other ships were left trapped in the ice.

And Jon suddenly felt so, so tired. It was like all the adrenaline and the fire suddenly dropped out of his blood.

_I need to take prisoners_, he thought. _I need to stop them_. The free folk would just kill any survivors, and Sonagon wasn’t like to leave any survivors at all. _The free folk won’t listen easily – I have to stay strong to convince them to take hostages instead._

He wasn’t quite sure if there was anything that could convince Sonagon not to destroy everyone remaining though. That witch had hurt it, and the dragon would demand its due.

Jon turned, staring at the bodies scattered across the ice. Anyone had been left alive was dead now – the cold and blood loss had just drained their lives away.

The ice would be breaking up soon, Jon would have to find a way off it quickly before it cracked or drifted off in the waves. Jon staggered, limping as he tried clambered across the icy paths as quickly as possible, his sword clenched tight in hand. The smell of blood and fear in the air left a foul taste in his mouth.

All around him, there were bodies littered on swords of ice.

_I’m on the side of the living_, Jon thought with pained gasps. _All I want to do is save people_.

_Now why the hells is so hard to stop everyone from killing each other?_

___

Davos

Davos gagged, feeling the pain in his chest. Everything felt cold, colder than it had ever been.

All around him, the world roared. The sounds were like nothing he had ever heard before – the sounds of pure panic and chaos. Everything was black, except for the torchlight reflecting off glistening spikes of black ice.

His heart was pounding. Davos’ felt an involuntary, harsh scream break from his throat as he tried to pull himself upwards. He felt blood oozing out of his chest, the slick liquid freezing against the ice.

His shoulder ached. _I broke my shoulder_, he realised. _Maybe a couple of ribs too_. He fell out of the ship when it capsized, landing on hard ice…

The ice wasn’t smooth – it felt sharp and jagged. Davos gulped and staggered as he felt a spike of ice protruding into his stomach. It was so numb he could barely feel it. He had landed half-skewered onto one of the frozen spikes.

My jerkin. The reinforced leather jerkin was the only thing that had stopped the spike, but the ice still pierced through. It pierced at least an inch into his chest.

Davos stared upwards. Barely five feet away there was a man lying with a spike of ice jabbing through his skull.

It could have been worse. The ice was barbed and jagged like frozen thorns, but Davos had been lucky to land on one of the more mostly flat surfaces.

His whole body ached as he tried desperately to stand up. he could feel the ice shifting in the waves, the ice cracking underfoot…

All around him, there were people screaming. Davos saw men jumping from the flotsam of the shipwreck, trying to clamber onto the ice. The waters swirled and thrashed around him. The wreck of the Valyrian was alight with flames – the wood burning and crackling even as it capsized and the wind shredded the ship into splinters against the ice.

Davos stared, wide eyed. The ship was burning. Davos saw men – men he recognised – clinging uselessly onto the broken mast, even as it snapped into the black water. The only ones who survived would be the ones that jumped off onto the ice.

Devan. My son. My son was on that ship.

His head pounded so fast his vision blurred. I can’t lose any more sons…

Stannis. The king, Devan squired for the king. The knights. The soldiers. How many men made it off…?

There was almighty crash from the water. A chorus of screams drowned out by a bone-rattling roar. Davos’ brain shut down, reverting to pure, instinctive panic.

He watched as the beast – the dragon – burst from the ocean like a sea monster. The beast bigger than ever, made out of jagged ice. White fire exploded from its jaws, and then suddenly the dragon was ripping apart another frozen ship with claws and teeth.

Men jumped overboard like ants fleeing a storm. The waters would be suicide, but they still jumped.

The entire bay was dotted with streaks of ice – jagged flames frozen on the water’s surface. The ships were trapped in the bay, and any men that wanted to survive were fleeing overboard on the ice.

It was chaos.

Move, Davos ordered himself, groaning as he staggered upwards. Find the king, find my son…
Davos saw the light. He gasped as he recognised the light beaming in the distance, over the jagged icebergs. Lightbringer – Stannis’ sword. The king must be alive; he must have escaped the shipwreck. Stannis could use the light of his burning sword to rally the men…

There was tremendous splash as the dragon dived into the water again. Another ship destroyed. At this point, the dragon was just demolishing the crippled fleet one by one.

Ice cracked. Davos gasped, clutching at his side. He could feel blood oozing over his fingers. Stannis was there, on the other side of the ice – along with the soldiers. All around him, there was fighting, burning and freezing.

The wildlings are on the ice too. The savages broke onto the ice from the coast, hacking down the fleeing soldiers. There was no great battle, just skirmishes at every corner. Davos saw clashing shapes highlighted by the fires and men fighting desperately for their lives.

Still, the water killed more men than swords ever would. The ice was treacherous, sharp and unstable.

Davos glimpsed three men ahead, clutching to the ice with their swords, trying to lever a bulky shape out of the water with ropes. A lifeboat – four soldiers were trying desperately to recover one of the lifeboats thrown from the Valyrian. Not a big boat, but large enough for maybe a dozen cramped men.

Then a figure walked up behind one of the soldiers and gutted him from the back with a sharp knife.

Davos could do nothing but stagger, staring in horror as the bodies fell.

“My ships!” The figure screamed furiously. “My men! Mine! Your king thinks he can wreck me? Me!”

One of the soldiers tried to fight back. The attacked lunged at him, stabbing him savagely with his knife. “… I am Salladhor Saan!” the man hissed, letting the body drop. “I will see your king ruined for this! I will gouge out his eyes and fuck his wife until she screams my name!”

The Prince of Narrow Sea looked almost feral. Salladhor had always been a flamboyant, perhaps charming man, but that was gone. Now, his silks were drenched in seawater and blood, and his eyes were crazed.

Of course Salladhor Saan survived too. Underneath his silks, his flamboyance and his smile, the pirate prince was as hard as they came.

More men clambered behind him. The pirate’s words were sharp. “Grab the boat!” Salladhor ordered to his men. “Quickly now, drag the boat over the ice!”

They’re cutting down Stannis’ men, Davos realised in horror. Pirates had escaped the wreck too. While the soldiers were trying to charge forward, the pirates were cutting them down from behind. Fighting was everywhere. Not just against wildlings, against the other shipwreck survivors too.

Davos watched as Salladhor’s men dragged the boat out of the ocean. The Lysene pirates fought with cutlasses and more experienced skill than the panicking soldiers.
The pirate lord saw him, still clutching his knife. “… Oh Davos…” Salladhor growled. Davos staggered, still holding his chest. The men hoisted the lifeboat upwards, onto the ice unsteadily.

*“… My old friend… By rights, I should kill you too.”

Davos gulped. There was pure murder in the pirate’s eyes. “… Stannis…” Davos wheezed weakly. “… Stannis…”

“Your king is done,” Salladhor spat. “You cost me my fleet. You cost me my livelihood, my legacy. All for your bloody words.”

His eyes narrowed, staring at the wound on Davos’ torso. Davos had never been a fighter, and he most certainly couldn’t fight now. “… Congratulations, old friend. You finally get to do what you’ve always wanted. You get to die in the service of your king. Are you happy now? Does this make you fulfilled?”

Davos could barely even stand upright. “… Stannis…” he gasped. “… Where is Stannis?”

Salladhor just grunted. “Of course…” He hesitated with his knife. “Your loyalty is wasted on him, smuggler. Stannis is doomed to nothing but despair – the more fool I for not realising it sooner.”

Davos nearly staggered. The pirate caught him. Salladhor paused to tearing off his jerkin and forming a very crude binding around his wound. “… Consider this a final kindness, old friend,” Salladhor whispered. “… If you want to survive, come with me now. I have no intention of letting him steal my life too.”

He took a deep breath. His hands clenched. “Stannis,” Davos rasped.

“But of course,” Salladhor snorted, already moving away. “… You’re doomed to despair too.”

Davos watched wide-eyed as the pirates staggered away from him the ice, half-carrying, half-dragging the lifeboat. He means to carry the lifeboat to the edge of the ice, to open water so he can sail away, Davos realised. It would be perilous – a boat like that would be unlikely to survive waters like these for long.

Then again, it might be better odds for survival than anybody left here. The bay was a slaughter.

Davos knew that the king’s men might need that boat too, but there was nothing he could do to stop the pirates. Salladhor had the right idea – they needed an escape route.

Perhaps one of the ships could get free of the ice before the dragon destroyed them? Was it too late to run away?

He took a deep breath and staggered forward. He paused to pick up an iron dirk from the one of the corpses, holding it with one hand as he cradled his wounded side with the other.

Every step felt like it would be his last. Davos struggled to make sense of it, gasping and wheezing weakly as his feet almost slid off the ice. The whole iceberg was rocking in the waves, and the sound of screaming never stopped.

His eyes darted around the ships that remained. It was hard to recognise them, half-swallowed by ice. The Saathos Saan, the Oledo, the Bountiful Harvest… Which one of those could still escape? Which one was most likely to get away? Which one would the king flee too?
The Bountiful Harvest had been at the rear rank, Davos thought. Where the ice was thinnest. If any could break free, it would be the ships that had been at the rear.

It was the speck of red that caught his attention. Red so bright it shimmered in the gloom. Davos tightened his grip on his blade.

The dragon was at the other end of the bay, demolishing another ship. Davos could still see the light of Stannis’ sword nearby, flashing through the darkness. Davos was wheezing as he limped unsteadily. Even underfoot, he could feel the ice cracking. The cold water swashed over the ice, with freezing sea water washing up to his ankles with every wave.

It was so, so cold. And yet, somehow, the Red Woman burned as bright as ever.

Melisandre’s dress was impossibly pristine. It was like the cold and water never even touched her. The ruby on her throat glimmered brightly. Melisandre stood on the ice, watching as the Bountiful Harvest groaned against the waves.

They were at the edge of the fighting. The Bountiful Harvest was an old cog – a strong, sturdy ship tough enough to survive the ice. The ice was thinner here too, the dragon was distracted from the edge of the fighting. The Bountiful Harvest was still trapped, but now there were men dragging ropes, shouting and screaming as they tried to recover the ship.

She’s preparing the ship to leave, Davos thought with a gulp. Every other man had been caught in the chaos, but Melisandre… she had been prepared.

She must have known what would happen. She positioned herself next to the king to flee the shipwreck of the Valyrian easily. After that, Melisandre must have gathered enough queen’s men around her, enough to recover the Bountiful Harvest from the ice.

Davos glimpsed the shape of Lord Axell Florent from the deck, bellowing orders. He was following Melisandre too. They were pulling at the rigging, using axes and swords to chop at the ice, trying to hold the ship against the wind and waves.

Davos stared. All around the ship, the ice was cracking and slipping. It’s melting, he realised. Impossibly, only around that single ship, the ice was melting enough to free the vessel. Ice so thick and cold should have lasted for weeks, if not months, yet Davos could see it dripping away unnaturally fast in a matter of minutes. As if the heat of an invisible fire was scorching it.

Behind him, ships that had been set alight during the panic. Vessels burning, the men on board trapped between fire and ice, scorching like funeral pyres for all of the men on board. Even amidst the screams, he could hear the fires howl. She’s using their deaths, Davos realised. The deaths of the men trapped in the fires. She’s using them to keep herself unarmed, and to prepare her own escape route.

Melisandre turned. “… Ah, Onion Lord,” she called with a smile. In the distance, the dragon sent another ship crashing down. “You survived. Good. The flames were ambiguous whether or not you would or not.”

Davos staggered forward. “… You knew…” he gasped. “… You knew what… you led all of these men to their deaths…”
She raised a perfect eyebrow. “… I warned you that the night was dark and full of terrors.”

His hand trembled, still clutching the dirk. She has doomed us all. “… You let this happen! You knew…!”

She must have seen her own survival in the flames. She knew everyone else would die, but she would survive, so she let it happened. Even when thousands of men perished, Melisandre took steps to prepare an escape route just for her.

“… I know that some battles must be lost for the war to be won,” Melisandre replied coolly. “Some defeats are necessary.”

“Necessary!” Davos croaked. “What could be necessary about this?”

“It is necessary that Azor Ahai sees the threat he must face,” Melisandre said. “And he has. This is battle that will define him. It will drive him to do what he must, without hesitation, without pause, to save the world.”

“You promised –”

“I promised a great battle of ice and fire in which all true believers would rally,” Melisandre said, with a touch of sadness. “I did not promise that the battle would be won.”

The sound of swords clashing caused Davos to turn. Two hundred feet away, across the jagged paths of ice and rolling waves, he gasped as he saw the burning blade flash.

Stannis. He could see King Stannis – clad in all his armoured glory – as he swung Lightbringer. The sword had never shone so bright. So bright it was a like a star.

Davos saw the figures charge. He heard clashing blades and thrashing bodies in the gloom. They were too far away for Davos to reach, instead all he could do was watch.

He watched as the shadow cut through them all.

His lungs froze. The scene sent tremors down his spine. Davos watched a battle on jagged thorns of ice, absolute destruction all around, highlighted by the glowing sword as men fell one by one.

“… You see it,” Melisandre whispered next to him. “You see the champion of night.”

It’s him, Davos realised. The white-haired boy who rode the dragon. He was on the ice too; clad in black and grey furs, sword in hand as Stannis’ knights charged at him.

And Davos had never seen sword-work like it. It was like watching the boy paint in colours of red amidst white and black.

The boy held a fine black blade faster and sharper than any Davos had ever seen before. It cleaved through armour like a burning knife through butter. There were knights charging at him, trying to overpower him, yet the white-haired boy cut through them all with wicked grace.

It was the best swordsmanship Davos had ever seen, and they fell before him one by one. He was a blur of slashing black. The bodies dropped faster than Davos could recognise them. Ser Patrek, Ser Brus Buckler, Ser Benethon Scales, Ser Dorden and Ser Godry Farring…
Davos’ throat jammed as all of those corpses littered the ice. The boy was outnumbered twenty to one, yet he was cutting down Stannis’ men faster than they could reach him.

And then suddenly the boy was on Stannis. Davos watched as his king slashed his glowing blade downwards – fighting against one on one against the white-haired boy who had just slaughtered a dozen knights.

The king was all fire and fury as he locked blades. In the light of the glowing sword, the boy’s face was solemn, focused and unyielding. There was no rage, no anger… just a persistent ice-cold determination…

For a half a second, Davos thought his king might be able to beat him. Then he saw Stannis being forced backwards.

The men were shambling, but they couldn’t even get there in time.

Stannis is going to lose, Davos thought with trembling hands. Hells, Stannis has already lost. The dragon demolished his fleet, and then the boy cut through his knights. Any that survived wouldn’t last long against the wildlings.

“You did this…” Davos wheezed, turning to stare at Melisandre. “You did this.”

The images of Blackwater Bay rippled before his eyes. First Dale, Allard, Mathos and Maric… all burnt at the Blackwater, and now Devan was out there, caught on the ice. How many men have to die in the Red Woman’s machinations?

How many sons must I lose?

He glared at her. In the shimmering light, she looked more like some beautiful demon than a woman. His hands were trembling, his fingers numb as he clutched the blade.

She met his gaze. “… Careful, Onion Lord,” Melisandre warned. She didn't breathe, Davos realised suddenly. The air was so cold that a faint mist scattered in the air from Davos’ haggard breaths, but there was nothing but lies from Melisandre’s lips.

“Why?” Davos demanded, feeling his heart scream. “Why would you lead so many men to their deaths?”

“Their sacrifices are needed for the Lord of Light,” she replied.

He shook his head, suddenly not caring about the pain. He was wounded, but she was unarmed. He had the right idea after Blackwater – he should have killed the Red Woman then.

“No…” Davos growled. “Too much has been sacrificed for your god already.”

He raised the blade and charged. He saw Melisandre’s ruby flash.

And suddenly the ice underfoot cracked. One second Davos was staring at her beautiful, horrible face, and then, the next, he was plunging downwards into dark, cold, black water.
Val

“Fight, you cunts!” The Weeper roared. “Fight!”

Val barely heard him. The wight lunged at her, and she caught its attack wielding her torch like a club. The creature flailed and scratched even as it burnt.

Then, a second wight launched from the darkness. Val had to drop to floor to barely escape its lunge.

It did that on purpose, she thought. The first wight charged deliberately into my torch just to disarm me. It sacrificed itself to leave an opening for the second. Val had been watching, there was no communication between them, but the wights still moved with perfect synchronicity. How?

All around her, the battle raged. The wights would charge into their blades and torches madly. They thought nothing of sacrificing themselves, they only cared about killing. The wights died quickly, but there was that inhuman intelligence directing them.

“All around her, Val could see their line breaking. The wights slipping through either side of them, but there was no option to run. She could only fight for her patch of ground in the forest and hope everyone else did the same.

She dragged herself up, coughing and spluttering. Her ribs ached. Her head was spinning and her hands trembling.

All around her, she could see fighting. She could see men of the Night's Watch, free folk and wights all shambling together in the dark.

The Weeper's line is breaking, she thought. They're pushing through.

The giant the Weeper was fighting finally died. It took half a dozen men to hack off its legs, and then its arms, and then its torso. The Weeper himself hacked off its head with three swings from his scythe. All of the limbs were still squirming.

Val almost stumbled as she tried to walk. She felt an arm grab her, lifting her upwards.

“Val,” the woman croaked into her ear. “Stand up, Val.”

“Harma?” Val stared, as Harma dragged her upwards. The older woman was bleeding and staggering, still clutching at her shoulder where the bear mauled her. Her body lurched, unsteady but strong.

“Come on,” Harma wheezed, holding a stone axe with both hands.

“Dalla... the babe...”

“They're fine. We ran into Garth. He took them both and rode them into camp.”
“You should have left…” Harma was injured. She could barely stand. Why did she come back for me?

“Bugger off,” Harma growled. “You don't tell me what to do.”

They staggered upwards. The lines of wights were fading. A shambling creature tried to attack her, but Harma crushed its head with three short strikes of her maul.

Val took a deep breath, trying to recover. It was so, so cold, even despite the fires burning in the forest. The flames hissed and crackled, starving against the cold.

And then, the fires went out. She felt the cold mist creep through the trees.

It didn't make any sound, but Val heard it coming from the way the ground shivered with frost.

Val saw the pale glittering figure walk towards them, over the bodies.

She felt her breath freeze in her throat. Her blood had never felt so cold. The Other stood before clad in crystal ice armour, as still as a sculpture. Its armour flickered and reflected softly in the firelight, as if it could fit into the gloom, with flesh as pale as moonlight. Its eyes blazed like blue fire, mist drifting around its body. With every step, she felt the world go cold. Impossibly cold.

It took everything she had to keep her grip on her sword through trembling hands. Her skin felt numb. The Other stared straight at her, as if it’s gaze could pierce her body.

Slowly, challengingly, the white walker drew its blade – a slender, almost delicate sword, but so cold and so sharp it crackled in the air.

“Stand up you fuckers…” The Weeper whispered, gasping for breath as he paced. “Anyone who is still alive, you stand up and you fight right now…”

The Other waited. It stood and it waited as the free folk surrounded it.

Val stood in front of it. Even amidst the screaming, the air felt so cold and quiet. The Weeper paced from behind, as the free folk surrounded the white walker.

Val had her short sword. The Weeper his scythe. Harma staggered up next to her, clutching her maul with weak, strained breaths. Five other free folk clambered around them, circling the Other, armed with axes and spears.

Eight against one, Val thought. She could feel the fear like tar in her blood. We outnumber the monster eight against one - eight good warriors.

Still, the Other didn’t look concerned. It’s movements were slow, lazy, taunting. Eight against one, Val repeated, her hands trembling.

There was a long moment of still. The Other stood as still as the dead.

The Weeper charged first. He hacked from behind with his scythe, without warning, without restraint. Strong, fierce strikes so fast the air hummed.

And the Other blurred. It moved in a haze of cold mist, so fast her eyes couldn’t keep up.
She saw the Weeper knocked backwards. Harma roared a loud battle roar, all injuries forgotten charging in with her maul. The white walker just seemed to flow around her. The stone maul of Harma’s cracked under its blade, cleaving straight through like a burning knife through snow.

They all attacked at once, attacking from all sides. Val ducked downwards and lunged, swiping her blade and its legs. The Other blocked two men at once, and then spun. Val couldn’t even blink as she felt a foot collide with the centre of her chest.

She gagged. Its boot felt so cold it burned. She could see her furs crackling and hissing with ice from where it touched.

She dropped to the ground. Two others fell as well. Two men dead in a matter of seconds.

To his credit, the Weeper didn’t fall. He remained fighting, barely – and Val had never seen so much rage in a person’s eyes. Harma kept fighting as well, swinging her broken maul like a club. Another fighter - a man with a spear, tried to jab at the Other while the Weeper and Harma distracted it from the front and the back, but it flowed deftly between them all.

Too fast. Val gasped, but staggered up to her feet. It moved too fast to even touch; faster than she could swing a blade.

The Weeper fought stubbornly, but then he tried parrying the sword of ice, and his scythe split into frozen shards. The Weeper barely dived backwards in time, narrowly avoiding the Other’s sword splitting his skull.

Two men tried to catch the Other from behind. It cut them both down. A stone axe shattered against the Other's armour.

Four dead. Even eight against one and we don't stand a chance.

The Other paused, waiting for the free folk to stand up again. Mocking. Like a game to it.

“… Val,” Harma growled. “Run.”

Val's hands shivered as she clutched her blade.

“Run,” Harma snarled. “Now. I'll hold it, you run.”

The Weeper dropped his scythe and drew his two bronze swords, screaming a challenge. The Other raised its blade, staring around the clearing. Slowly, those bright blue eyes turned to focus on Val and Harma.

Harma attacked first. Even with a broken maul, a wounded shoulder and a limp, Harma was as fearless and as strong as ever. Harma threw herself like a bear, and the Weeper lunged from behind.

The Other’s blade arced.

The Weeper's sword shattered against the Others neck. Val heard ice crack as well. It bleeds cold, she realised. The Other’s wound wept like ice. It didn't flinch, but for a brief second the Other seemed almost irritated.
Harma dropped to the snow. The wound across her chest steamed.

She grabbed its hand, Val realised. Harma threw herself on its sword, just to grab its hand, to stop it from blocking the Weeper.

Val's heart pounded as Harma collapsed limply.

The Other took a sword to the neck and seemed to shrug it off. The Weeper gasped as the Other’s hand lunged and grabbed him around the throat. The man screamed from the cold of the creature's grip.

Val was on her feet and sprinting, swinging her sword. The Other blocked her with an idle swing with its blade, and her sword shattered into icy shards.

The Weeper croaked, facing turning purple. The Other’s hand on his throat steamed with cold.

Then, the other free folk, the only one still standing, struck from behind without warning and brought down his axe against the Other’s wrist in a vicious strike. Both the axe and its arm shattered like ice.

The Other gave something that almost sounded like a tut as it looked at its severed stump, before turning and skewering the man in a swift motion.

The Weeper dropped to the ground, croaking with an ice hand still clutching his throat. The Other rubbed its missing wrist, looked around, and slowly walked away. Like the battle had lost all interest now.

Six dead bodies littered the ground. The Other walked away.

“Harma!” Val shouted, rushing to her friend. Across from her, the Weeper struggled to pry the hand off his throat. “Harma!”

She didn't move. The wound wasn't bleeding, but the blade stroke went deep. Harma’s strong. Strongest person I know. She can survive…

Val felt Harma lurch slightly. Val gasped in hope, but then she opened her eyes. Harma’s eyes were suddenly bright blue.

“No no no…” Val muttered. Her eyes stung. Around her, all of the bodies were starting to tremble and lurch. Corpses twitching like puppets, their strings being jerked.

Harma's arms started rise. Val gripped them tightly, holding the corpse in a hug as tightly as she could.

“You bastard…” Val cursed, her voice nearly choking. “You utter bastard, I'll… Damn you Harma…”

The corpse started to squirm. Val gripped tightly, hugging the body as she pulled out a dagger from Harma's furs.

“Why did you come back, Harma?” Val snapped. The cold froze the tears on her eyes. “You could have run, you should have run… Why the bloody hells did you come back!”

“Get a fucking move on, girl!” The Weeper spat.

The body thrashed, so hard Val gasped. “Damn you Harma!” Val growled, as she stabbed the dagger into her friend’s cold throat. “Why the did you come back for me?”

The flesh tore roughly. Val stabbed and stabbed and Harma’s corpse never even flinched. She was still freshly dead enough to bleed. Harma kept her dagger sharp, but Val still had to hack to cut the corpse's head off.

“You should have bloody run…” Val cursed. Harma’s headless body was still squirming.

The Weeper grabbed her and dragged Val upwards. “Move, girl!” He growled, his throat still raw.

“We need to burn her.” The last thing Val saw was Harma's empty blue eyes staring upwards from her decapitated head, still blinking.

“Fuck that. Move.”

The other wights were standing upwards, still clutching weapons. We fight them, and their army becomes bigger by the end of it. Val took a deep breath, and turned to run.

The line was collapsing. The free folk were fleeing. The night was screaming, and howling.

“Through the forest!” The Weeper bellowed. “The gates of Hardhome ain't far.”

Behind her, there were only pale blue eyes. She ran.

She heard the dead pound behind her. Only the Others could fight a battle and come out with more soldiers than they started with. Every single man, woman or child that fell were on their feet again; charging through the forest like a tidal wave. A pure mass of bodies shambling behind her, gaining ground.

She heard men holler, horns ringing. Their line had fallen, the wights were everywhere. Thousands of them, a horde of bodies charging blindly.

She heard a howl around her.

And suddenly the sky started drumming.

Val gasped. It sounded like the greatest war drum she could ever imagine, pounding above her. Like a hurricane blasting in heavy, consistent bursts.

Her legs collapsed. She felt the whoosh of air as something very, very large flew above her. Trees cracked.

Val might have screamed. It was hard to hear or think anything at all under something that big.

Behind her, the fires hissed and extinguished under the rush of air.

“About bloody time!” She vaguely heard the Weeper bellow.
She saw white light flash. Instantly, the monster whooshed forward, and a line of burning white scorched through the forest.

White mist billowed. Pine trees exploded. Val dropped backwards. At first, she thought it was fire, but then she saw the spikes of ice pluming, and the cold draft knocking her off her feet. The saw rime cracking the trees with every icy gust.

The wights splattered into pieces. They didn't scream, didn't make a noise, as they were obliterated in the cold fire.

The first streak left a white scar through the forest. Then, the storm twisted, and another flash of white light carved through the forest, a gash along their perimeter. Val glimpsed wights left with limbs so frozen they couldn't move, flesh scoured do brittle that it collapsed.

Her heart was pounding. She saw it. Even though the trees and the darkness, she saw it in the flash of white light. A monster with white flesh and immense wings.

“… What is that thing?” Val bellowed. She couldn't stop the quiver in her voice.

“… That…” The Weeper shouted. “That's our new god.”

She could hear the free folk shouting, cheering. The monster scorched the forest in brief, broad and destructive strokes, tearing through the wights. Its keeping its distance, attacking the rear. It's trying to avoid catching any of the free folk too, Val realised, but lighting up a perimeter better than any of the Weeper's bonfires. A wall of jagged ice.

She saw wights through darkness, but they weren't attacking, they simply turned to run without hesitation. Every wight moved as one.

The wights didn't even try to recover the battle, they just folded, Val saw. It was a totally emotionless decision for them; with that monster in the air the Others were now more likely to lose more bodies than they could kill.

Her mouth was hanging open as she stared at the monster above. With every breath, a hundred foot of forest disappeared into cold, white light. It was a sight so immense, so incredible, so terrifying that she couldn't even breathe.

The great dragon roared, and the world trembled.
Chapter 17

Chapter Summary

The little piggy at the Wall...

Samwell

He watched from atop the Wall. On a dark night, you could see for miles and miles over the Haunted Forest. Right now, the fires in the Haunted Forest was a haze of red obscured by the trees. It was a faintly surreal sight; to watch the wilderness from so far away and knowing that all of his friends were going to be fighting for their lives shortly.

Sam had never felt so helpless, or so useless.

Four hundred men of the Night’s Watch – the second Great Ranging in as many months – were in the forest right now. Sam knew the plan, he had been over it obsessively in his head. Stannis and Mormont would rout both camps at once, to stop them assembling and launching a coordinated assault on the Wall.

Mormont said they had to take advantage of their victory at the Frostfangs, repeat their success. The other officers agreed – particularly with Stannis taking the far more dangerous job of assaulting Hardhome. It was a good plan.

So why do I feel so scared? Sam thought to himself, twitching as he stared over the Wall. This high up, the ground was nothing but black.

Maybe I’m just a craven, Sam thought. Maybe I’m just scared, and maybe Thorne is right to laugh at me every time I whimper. Still, he couldn’t shake the feeling that this was a different type of fear.

Sam stared upwards at the sky. A moonless night, Thoren Smallwood had insisted. A moonless night was the best night for an ambush. There was something about that statement that kept on bugging him.

Castle Black was nearly deserted. There were barely a hundred and fifty left in Castle Black now; mostly stewards, new recruits or old men.

Or cowards, like me, Sam thought, twitching his sore arm. His wound was mostly healed, but the Lord Commander still hadn’t asked for him. Perhaps he really did make such a mess of the last ranging that nobody wanted him. Bowen Marsh had left for Eastwatch, and Ser Alliser had command of Castle Black. Sam did his best to stay out of the knight’s way.

Sam shouldn’t even be on patrol right now, but he had come to the Wall anyway. He needed to see. Ten thousand wildlings, he thought quietly, against four hundred sworn brothers. Twenty-five to one, he supposed, but there would be old, young and weak with the wildlings, while the Night’s Watch would be all seasoned rangers and disciplined fighters. The sworn brothers would have mounted formations and bowmen. The odds were far better than the numbers might suggest.
Sam shivered slightly. He couldn’t help but wonder about Jon. The rangers were insistent that Jon Snow had turned deserter, but Sam could still barely believe it.

_This is wrong_, Sam thought. He could feel it in his bones. _It just feels wrong._

But there was absolutely nothing Sam could do to stop it. Whatever happened was happening miles away, and Sam could only watch from afar.

The minutes ticked by in shivering silence. Sam had no torch so he could see clearer in the darkness, but even under the furs it was freezing cold.

He knew he should be going back soon – maybe Aemon would need him for the ravens – but he still hesitated, watching the blur of fire in the distance. It’s definitely getting smaller, he thought. Smaller specks of light scattering into the woods.

Sam stood on the Wall for hours, just watching and thinking.

Sam watched, wondering what would happen now. The wildlings scattered again, would they try to rally once more? What about Jon – would Mormont bring him in as a prisoner, or could he escape and come back, maybe to explain that this is all just some horrible misundersta–

_There are torches approaching the Wall._

The sight caused him to pause. He could see the torchlight coming south out of the forest – a dozen pinpricks of light coming out of the Haunted Forest. Heading for Castle Black.

_Rangers returning?_ Sam thought, his heart heavy. No – that didn’t make sense. It was both too late and too early. If they had decided not to go through with the attack, then they should have been back hours ago. If they did attack, then the plan was to fortify a position in the forest and return back early the next morning. _Why would rangers be coming back now?_

Maybe wildlings then? It was too dark to recognise anyone. Still, there were only a dozen torches – it wasn’t a wildling horde. They would have to get to the gate to see who they were.

Sam’s heart pounded. He could see the first of the figures break through the treeline. They were all running fast, desperately. It took a long time for him to figure out what to do.

He agonised over whether to blow one horn blast, or two. Eventually, Sam started running, while he struggled to puff a single long, uncertain blow that hovered over the Wall. Sam sprinted, heading for the stairs down to ground. There was nobody to operate the winch elevator. At night, the wooden steps were winding, icy and treacherous, and very long. Sam wheezed, struggling to skitter down them.

_Some watcher I am_, Sam thought with a flash of bitterness._They’re going to reach the gates before I do._

The Castle Black was already awake. Nobody really slept. Sam could see the people moving through the courtyard even as he descended. A much louder, more confident horn blast rang through the castle.

He could see men rushing through the barricades, into the tunnel. Sam followed the crowd, gasping for breath in the long and narrow passageway under the Wall. The cold air howled through the icy tunnel like the breath of a giant beast.

The wildlings had been known to disguise themselves as men of the Night’s Watch on occasion.
Whenever a horn was blown and there was doubt, available men were to head towards the tunnel. The sworn brothers could look down through the murder holes at anyone outside, and the three iron gates on the inner passage would only be opened one by one. If it was a deception, then they had to trick their way through four different checkpoints and the patrols on each one. Sam wasn’t on guard duty, but he rushed ahead because he desperately wanted to see who was coming through.

“Seven hells, let us in!” He heard a voice scream desperately, banging on the solid oak gate at the far end. The wood was nine inches thick and reinforced, so tough that a man could through his entire weight against it and it would barely knock. Sworn brothers rushed to the gate. “By the gods, let us in!”

Sam saw Donal Noye and Ser Thorne at the front of the crowd. Everyone was gathering, but Ser Thorne pushed his way through. “Who’s there?” Thorne demanded.

“Wyck from Shadow Tower,” the man stammered. “With thirty others! Please, gods, you’ve got to let us in!”

A man moved to the winch, but Thorne stopped him. “Where’s your commanding officer, Wyck?” He thinks they’re deserters, Sam realised, as he panted up towards the gate to see.

“He thinks they’re deserters,” Sam recalled. Deserters in large groups was a very real risk. Instead, they would have to wait between the inner gates until someone made a decision, or an officer came to vouch for them.

A man moved to the winch, but Thorne stopped him. “Where’s your commanding officer, Wyck?”

“He thinks they’re deserters,” Sam realised, as he panted up towards the gate to see.

“Dead! I don’t know! I think they’re all dead!” He pleaded. “Please gods, they’re after us! We’ve got wounded, they were following us…!”

Protocol said they couldn’t allow any men through without their commander officer, Sam recalled. Deserters in large groups was a very real risk. Instead, they would have to wait between the inner gates until someone made a decision, or an officer came to vouch for them.

Sam glimpsed through the narrow steel bars of the grating above. There were barely a dozen still walking, but they were dragging more figures with them. They all had torches in their hands, staring out behind them fearfully. Like they expected the shadows to attack any moment.

“… Please, ser…!” A man begged. “There are injured… We need medical attention!”

“Let them in,” Donal Noye ordered, his voice a growl.

That caused Thorne to relent. He stepped back, ordering the brothers to hoist the gate up. There was a moment of shambling confusion, and then he saw the man collapse weakly inside of the tunnels. Everyone had swords drawn, but the men were so weak most of them couldn’t even stand.

“… They were chasing us,” Janos murmured. Sam had never seen him look so fearful. He had been full of bravado and ego when the Lord Commander assigned him to the ranging. “… The monsters… Following us…”

The wind howled through the door. The brothers stared out into the dark plains, but there was nothing there.

“Get the gate closed. Increase guards on the outer gate, post some men at the north side to watch for others coming!” Thorne snapped, before turning to Janos. “Janos! Janos! Tell me what happened. The Lord Commander?”

The man had already collapsed. “He’s cold,” Donal said, touching his skin. “They’re all cold.”
“… It was them,” The man called Wyck stammered, shivering. His furs were covered in snow. “I saw them. The Others…”

Thorne frowned. “Stop talking nonsense, man.”

“… Following us…” Wyck stammered, teeth shattering. It looked like he had frostbite on his ears. “They kept following us…”

_He’s clutching his side_, Sam realised. “He’s wounded.”

Donal dragged the man’s furs upwards, looking at his wound. There was no blood, only ice. Sam stared. On the man’s lower waist, near the hip, his skin was gouged and peeling off, but frozen. As if he had been maulled by a giant animal, but then the wound froze.

_Teeth_, Sam thought, but like no teeth he had ever seen before.

Wyck stared at his own body in horror, like he couldn’t even feel it anymore. The cold left him numb. “The infirmary!” Donal ordered, pointing at men to carry them. “Get them to the infirmary.”

Most of them were conscious, but barely. They were all murmuring and shivering. Sam stared in shock, wondering what to do. “Tarly,” Thorne snarled. “The maester, fool. Fetch Maester Aemon.”

Sam gulped, and turned to run away. He heard the whimpers of the wounded men all the while they were carried out of the tunnel, into the guardhouse, and then upwards into the castle proper.

The maester was already awake. For an old, blind man, Aemon reacted quickly.

Aemon had Sam act as his eyes as he inspected the men. All fireplaces were to be lit warmly, for the men to be stripped of their dirty furs, and heavy cloaks to be placed over them to conserve heat. They were still so cold, so Aemon ordered boiling water pans for under the hard infirmary slabs.

Anybody with experience treating injuries was called to help. Sam saw Septon Cellador, swaying slightly from drink, trying to undress a man. Sam glimpsed Edd, Toad, Jeren, Dareon and Albett rush around them. The castle was so undermanned that they even had to get some of the new recruits to help carry the injured to the infirmary.

The master never rushed, but he moved quickly with a practiced calm and efficiency. “Samwell,” Aemon ordered, running his hands over an unconscious man’s shoulder. Garreth, a builder from Eastwatch, Sam recalled. “Describe him.”

Sam gulped, staring at the nearly naked man. He looked so very pale, his breathing haggard. “…Um…ah…he’s very pale,” Sam stammered. The maester’s fingers traced the man’s skin. “Um…And there’s a wound on the back of his shoulder. Several wounds, actually…”

“The same as the others?” Aemon demanded.

“Yes,” Sam nodded. He felt squeamish just looking at him. He nearly fainted as Aemon’s bony fingers ran over the wounds. “…No, a bit different. They’re smaller, but more of them. He looks like he was… attacked from behind repeatedly.”

_They were following us_, the man had said. Sam’s hand twitched. “They look like… bite marks, maester,” Sam added nervously.

The old man shook his head, but he didn’t seem so sure. “No animal has teeth in that shape.”
“What happened to them?” Thorne demanded, barging into the room.

“Still to be determined,” Aemon replied. “They all bear signs of injury from battle, but…” A pause. “There are stranger injuries as well.”

Thorne hesitated. The men were all struggling to breathe, and they all seemed so pale and cold. “What?”

“I believe it to be a form of poison,” Aemon said, and Sam looked at him in shock. “Something that robs the blood of its heat. I will need my herbs and medicines. Samwell, accompany me.”

“We need to question these men,” said Thorne.

“Right now, they are too weak.” Aemon replied. “Have you men refill hot water bottles, keep the fires burning, and poke and talk to them constantly to keep them awake. Samwell, now – I need your help to devise a treatment.”

Sam skittered past Thorne nervously. The knight glared, but he looked worried too. Aemon moved with surprising speed for an old man through the courtyard, towards the rookery. “Double the patrols on the Wall!” He heard Thorne shouting. “Ser Wynton will act as castellan of the castle. All fighting men take positions on the Wall. Get Clydas to watch for ravens. If we do not receive any reports within two hours, I will be leading a sortie into the forest to look for survivors!”

Thorne’s worried, Sam thought. It was strange for a single group to make it back to the Wall when there were four hundred that did not. Thorne must be very nervous indeed if he was willing to give control of the castle to Ser Wynton Stout, old man who lost his wits years ago, to lead a sortie himself.

“What happened to them?” Sam asked, jogging to keep up.

“I do not know,” Aemon admitted. The maester had always seemed so calm, so knowledgeable, but he was worried now. “… The wounds are severe, but they are not what are killing them. This poison… hmm… there was a book in the archives I recall, but… curses, it’s been so long since I read it…”

He was muttering to himself quietly as they raced up the steps to the rookery, to the maester’s quarters on the bottom level. “Samwell, I will collect the herbs,” the maester said. He knew every neatly organised jar in his quarters by touch. “You search for that book. Look in my office – on the top shelf of my cabinet, a journal. Leather covered, I recall, bound in a velvet sash.”

Sam blinked rushing to the maester’s private collection. Books of note from the Castle Black libraries that the maester had always wanted to copy and archive, even after he lost his sight. Some of the books at the very top looked like they had never been touched in years.

It took a few minutes of scrambling amongst the dusty tomes for Sam to find it. A leather book as small as a pocket diary, with pages of goatskin parchment so old they might have cracked. There was no title on the front, but Sam opened to the first page.

“An Account of Lord Commander Ryder – the Expedition to the Lands of Far Winter,” Sam read, squinting to make out the faded ink.

Maester nodded. “A journey to scout out the Lands of Always Winter – one of the very, very few to ever be documented. From eight hundred years ago, I believe. Bennard Ryder proved a very adventurous but short-lived Lord Commander.” The maester was still picking out vials from his cupboards, with the same care a knight might select his weapons. “I read it myself once, but my memory fails me. There was something in there about an injury in the Frostfangs?"

Sam flipped through the delicate pages, trying to decipher the old, curly handwriting. “… ‘A company of men left Shadow Tower’… ‘travelled north’…” Sam skimmed. “… Oh! Their expedition stopped at the Fist of the First Men too!”

“Focus, Samwell.” The maester’s voice was quiet, but firm.

“… Um… ‘Found giant tracks in the valley’… ‘avoided a tribe of giants towards the mountains’…” Sam skipped the pages. “Oh! I think this might be it: ‘On the eighth month I learned how the Frostfangs earned their name. After moving north along the edges of Frozen Wastes, one scout was attacked by an unknown creature in the dark. Something that attacked from behind and disappeared into the mountains. Our best trackers found no trails, but we came across various bones – of bears, wolves and elk as well as some suspiciously human – at the mouth along a cave that lead into tunnels deep under the mountains. It looked like a lair, but for what I do not know. None dared pursue the strange beast any further into the tunnels’…”

He read quickly. “… I spoke to two wildling trackers from nearby mountain clans who told me tales of a terror that attacked at night, and had haunted their territory for generations. They described it as ‘pure ice, with teeth’…”

“… ‘As for the scout, we found him with a fang pierced into his back – the queerest fang I have ever seen. The fang dripped what I firmly believe to be venom, injected into his blood. My assertion has been met with doubt even from my own men, but I am confident that this evidence of an attack from an ice spider – the kind described in the stories’…” Sam gaped. “An ice spider? Really?”

“… Ah yes, I recall it now,” the maester sighed, leaning backwards. “The last time I read that line I was a young fool – I dismissed the Lord Commander’s claims as well. I thought he mistook a shadowcat’s tooth for a spider’s fang, and the effects of hypothermia as signs of a venom. Go on, Samwell.”

“… ‘From the size of the fang and the wound, I estimate the ice spider as at least eight foot tall’…” Sam gulped. There was a rough sketch of the tooth. The wounds on the men in the infirmary weren’t that big. “… ‘The scout himself died from the venom. From my observations, the venom appears to be almost pure ice. It is more of a paralytic than a poison. In smaller dosages it may be survivable, but in large doses it freezes the blood, and then the muscles. Eventually, the organs freeze too. It is a slow death, but the victim is consistently weakened and numbed until they finally die’…” Sam gulped. “… ‘The venom is unnatural. It is cold and it doesn’t appear to ever warm. I have never seen the sort before’ … um… it doesn’t say anything about a cure for the venom, maester.”

He didn’t reply. There was a long moment of quiet. Sam’s hand was trembling.

_Ice spiders_, Sam thought in shock. _Ice spiders!

_In the stories, the Others used to ride giant ice spiders_, Sam recollected with a stab of fear. He thought of the men in the infirmary, and his body squirmed. He was about to say something, but his mouth closed nervously.

“I can hear your mouth flapping open and shut, Samwell,” Maester Aemon said, with a frown. “If you have something to say, then speak.”

Sam twitched. “… Well, it doesn’t make any sense,” he said. “… Those men… they were weak.
They said they were being chased, but how did they get away?"

Aemon never replied, staring thoughtfully upwards with blank eyes. “I mean,” Sam said nervously. “You saw those wounds back then – oh, sorry, I don’t mean you saw them–”

“Samwell.”

“Right, um, I mean that man had been bitten repeatedly – over and over again. If they could do that, why not just kill them? Why let them escape?” Sam gulped. “There’s no way men that weak could have escaped by themselves. Instead, it’s like… whoever… were following the men, hounding them, but never killing them – letting them reach the gate.”

“You think they were allowed to reach here?” Aemon murmured. “Deliberately kept barely alive?”

“But it doesn’t make any sense!” Sam said, unable to shake the feeling that he was being a fool. “Why bother? Why would anyone–”

He stopped. His mouth hung open.

Strangely, he heard Lord Commander Mormont’s words come back to haunt him, from so long ago; Tarly, my lady mother told me that if I stood about with my mouth open, a weasel was like to mistake it for his lair and run down my throat. If you have something to say, say it. Otherwise, beware of weasels. Beware of weasels, Tarly.

One of the old stories that Sam heard came back to him. That the Wall was built to keep the Others out. “… They needed to be alive…” Sam muttered. “… Because the dead can’t cross the Wall….”

The vision of a blue-eyed corpse walking, attacking the Lord Commander’s tower, flashed in front of Sam’s eyes.

His knees were trembling. Barely alive, Maester Aemon had said. About to die.

The wights couldn’t cross the Wall – the old stories were firm about that. But that wight that Jon killed, they had been across the Wall. Because we carried them across, Sam remembered. They had been dead when the Night’s Watch found them, dead when they carried them through the tunnel, and then they had been resurrected on this side of the Wall.

“… The infirmary…” Sam gasped, his hands shaking. “… Oh no, the infirmary…”

Sam was already rushing out of the door, dropping everything as he ran.

Sam burst out into the cold. Sam had never been much of a runner, but he was running now. He heard a man shout some cruel jest – probably about a piggy running – but Sam never even processed it. The infirmary – across from the Flint Barracks, beneath the Silent Tower. It was barely five minutes away from the rookery and the maester’s quarters, but suddenly that distance seemed so, so far.

Sam sprinted as he clattered up the stairs and burst through the door so hard that his wounded arm stung. Sam panted, staring around the stone room – filled with rows of hard beds.

“Dammit Sam, close the bloody door after you, will you?” A voice snapped. Sam saw Hake looking at him irritably. “We’re supposed to be keeping this room warm.”

Sam blinked. There were seven stewards in the room, caring for the wounded men. Sam saw Edd, Hake, Tim Tangletongue, Jeren, Dareon and Toad scattered around the room filling up hot water bottles and running between the men, while Three-Finger Hobb scattered around filling up cups of boiled onion stew.

“What is it, Sam?” Edd asked, frowning. “You look like you’ve seen a ghost. Surely Hake’s not that hideous.”

Sam’s throat jammed, struggling to get the words out. He jammed, still blinking repeatedly.

Everyone was staring at him like he was a fool. They stared at him right until the moment when Janos Slynt pulled himself up from his bed.

“Easy,” Jeren said, rushing to the man’s side. “Don’t move; you’re injur—”

Janos’ hand struck, grabbing Jeren by the throat. Eyes opened, and they were suddenly blue. Janos’ face was pale and blank.

Run, Sam thought stupidly. Five seconds later and it was far too late, and those five seconds Sam hesitated. I should have just screamed run.

Janos Slynt died on the bed and nobody noticed in time. Edd and Tim rushed to Jeren’s side quickly, trying to pull Janos off, but he was suddenly strong – much stronger than the man had any right to be. Edd was thrown to the ground, but while Tim was thrown backwards into another bed.

Sam finally found his voice. “Help!” Sam screamed. “Somebody! Help!”

The wight Janos dropped Jeren on the floor. The brother was gasping weakly, clutching his throat, but the wight was already heading to the nearest bed. The wight wrapped his hands around one of the wounded men’s throat, even as he lay dying, and he squeezed tightly.

First thing he does is try to kill the other wounded men too, Sam realised in the back of his brain, still screaming as he shambled backwards. If the others die, they’ll come back as wights too.

Another man pulled himself off his bed, pale blue eyes staring into the distance. Dareon was running for his life, while Edd struggled off the ground. Toad and Hake were trying to stop the wight Janos, but they were weaponless and the wight was very tough and strong. Three-Finger Hobb poured his tankard of steaming stew over the wight’s face, causing skin to blister and burn, but Janos never even flinched.

The man being strangled gasped his last breath, and then another wight sat upwards. Without a word, the new wight slammed himself at Three-Finger Hobb, dragging the man to the ground.

More and more wights were being raised every second.

Eddison stared in horror around the room, before diving out the door. “We’re under attack!” He shouted into the courtyard. “Wights! They’re bloody wights!”

Edd clutched tightly at the horn on his belt, blowing it deeply. Three times, Sam noticed as he stammered backwards.

Fire, he thought suddenly. Jon killed the last one with fire.

Sam never had a sword, so he ran backwards to grab a torch from the walkway, clutching it awkwardly with his one good arm. The flames burnt so hot he nearly scolding himself just holding the wooden torch, with a tip wrapped in oil-soaked rags.
Sam saw the men moving around him. The wights were all naked after being stripped, but they were didn’t seem to care. Sam saw Toad still trying to wrestle with Janos uselessly, right up until Janos gripped Toad’s neck.

“Toad!” Sam shouted, as his friend gagged. Sam tried to run, but more wights blocked the door. “Toad!”

Suddenly, Janos ripped Toad’s throat straight out of his neck. The sight nearly took Sam to his knees as he watched his friend gag and collapse. Sam staggered backwards, wielding his torch uselessly, while the wights spilled out into the room.

“What’s going on there?” Donal Noye shouted from below, running out from his forge. The one-armed smith never had a sword, only one of his hammers. “What’s happening–”

The man barely even had time to flinch as a wight leapt down at him from the top of the walkway out of the infirmary. Sam recognised the wight. He used to be Cuger, a heavyset young man, formerly a steward, a newer recruit. Cuger had always been slightly clueless in the training yard, but Cuger had been so excited when Mormont had picked him to come on the ranging to tend to the horses.

Now, Cuger was naked, frost sticking to his skin, as he tried to rip Donal apart with strength he never had in life.

Even with one arm, Donal fought off the wight. Around him, more wights were spilling from the infirmary. Sworn brothers were running, or being assaulted by the blue-eyed creatures.

Every monster Sam saw, he recognised. They were faces he used to know, men he had once called brothers.

_They planned this_, Sam thought. _Oh gods – the Others, the white walkers – they did this_.

Any man the white walkers touched came back, and the white walkers must have touched them all before letting them reach the gate. They let thirty men in through the gate. Now there were thirty wights in Castle Black trying to kill them all.

Sam’s head spun, frozen in the spot with fear. Thirty wights, against a hundred and fifty men left in Castle Black. But most of those men were either young recruits or old men – and they were fighting murderous undead creatures that felt no pain. Too many of their able men would be posted on the Wall or on patrol, not in the castle.

Sam watched as the whole castle spun out of control. The wights were shambling outwards – still stripped of clothes. Sam backed away, almost tripping down the steps.

Thorne screamed for men to rally, but wights were everywhere. To his credit, Thorne never backed down – he was at front of the cluster of men fighting back. He stabbed and swung at the creature, and it was still freshly dead enough to bleed.

Thorne’s sword chopped a wight’s arm off, and then slashed across its torso hard enough for it to shamble backwards. On his next strike, though, his sword jammed in the wight’s ribcage, so stiffly he couldn’t even pull the blade out in time, and then the wight grabbed at him with one arm.

Sam saw Thorne scream as the wight’s jammed its fingers into his eye, clutching at Thorne’s skull. He kicked and thrashed, but Sam saw Thorne’s eyeball pop as the wight dug in.

All around him, there were wrestling bodies and ragged screams.
Donal managed to fight off the wight, but then more leapt down at him and attacked. The one-armed smith was relentless, but the hammer was a poor weapon against them. The wights took each blow and barely even stumbled. Five wights charging at him, and the smith was staggering as he backed away.

He saw Septon Cellador stumble out of the Silent Tower, robes dishevelled and clutching a bottle in his hand. He was blinking, perhaps wondering what was happening with all the screaming. Then, the wight, formerly known as Wyck from the Shadow Tower, was on him, ripping the old man down with bare hands. A builder – a bulky man named Kegs – tried to save the septon, but then Wyck ripped off Keg’s head. Cellador was coughing, scrambling as the old man tried to crawl away.

The sound of a crossbow bolt pinging through the air. One of the younger recruits – a fresh-faced boy named Satin – had a crossbow. The bolt hit the wight in the eye, but the creature didn’t stop moving.

He glimpsed Hairy Hal shouting, charging bravely against the wight Janos Slynt with a spear. The spear plunged through the creature’s chest, but then the wight still crushed Hal’s skull against the wall with a single hand, pulling out the spear with his other hand.

Sam’s heart was pounding, so scared his body froze. Two wights closing in on him. Sam gulped, staring at the faces of Left Hand Lew and Muttering Bill. Lew had always been a good friend to him – a loyal brother, strong and dependable. Now, Lew’s face was blank as he tried to murder Sam with his bare hands.

“Oh no no…” Sam begged, hand shaking as he clutched the torch tightly. Their faces were so blank it looked like they looked carefree. Muttering Bill attacked first, staggering towards him. On pure instinct, Sam slammed the torch into Bill’s chin.

The wight caught fire, but it was still moving, still clutching Sam painfully as its body burned. Sam smelt burning flesh. He was so close he could see the skin strip off the creature’s bone.

Sam screamed. He screamed and fell backwards, with the burning wight still on top of him.

The flames burned unnaturally fast. It was trying to squeeze the life out of Sam. Sam’s face turned purple, gagging from the flames. His eyes were wide as he watched the wight sear into scorched flesh and then finally turned still.

Sam was so scared he couldn’t even move. The smouldering, charred body was still on top of him.

Stay still, Sam thought with pure fear. Play dead. Make them thick that Muttering Bill killed you before it burnt.

Sam was lying on his back in snow, a charred corpse on top of him, as the dead walked around him. He didn’t dare open his eyes to look.

There were shouts around him, mixed in with some screams of pain. People were dying, other people were running away. The men of the Night’s Watch were too slow to react. The wights kept to small groups, hunting through the castle. They are familiar with the layout too, he realised, they are intelligent.

Through a crack in his eyelid, Sam saw Thorne – bleeding from one eye – and Donal Noye – gasping for breath – struggling to gather survivors. Most people were running scared in fear. The wights were arming themselves, picking up weapons. Sam glimpsed Janos Slynt chasing after them.
– along with ten other wights. They marched naked through the snow.

Footsteps were over him. Sam tried so hard to stop himself from trembling, but then he felt the body over him. He opened his eyes, and he knew instantly that pretending was useless. The wight was standing over him, and it knew that he was still alive. Sam could see it in the eyes.

Sam screamed. The creature that was Left Hand Lew grabbed him.

The snow hissed. Sam wet himself in fear. He fully expected those hands to crush the life out from him.

Instead, there was nothing but pain as the wight grabbed his shoulder and dragged him physically across the ground. Sam thrashed and screamed in a high-pitched wail. Gods, it was so strong.

There was absolutely nothing but panic and terror. With a single motion, the wight lifted Sam upwards and slung him over its shoulder.

It kicked the door open as it lumbered forward. The wight half-threw him down the stairs. Sam gasped, rolling in pain, but then it was dragging him again like a sack of meat. It’s taking me downwards, he realised. It’s carrying me into the wormwalks, towards the tunnel.

Why hasn’t it killed me?

They reached the guardhouse at the front of the tunnel. More bodies around them – a dozen wights, but the shambling, screaming shape of living men too. There were four others being carried by the wights – Sam saw Dareon, Septon Cellador, Three-Finger Hobb and the boy Satin all being similarly dragged. Dareon was weeping, Cellador looked like he had soiled himself and rambling nonsensically, Hobb gasping for breath, while Satin seemed the most composed out of them all.

Why would they kill everyone else but leave us five alive?

The wights slammed the door shut behind them. They broke the lock and blocked the door with a heavy oak table, sealing themselves guardhouse. There was no hesitation or questions asked – every wight just moved with purpose. They all clutched a weapon and set about their task. Sam stared at the eyes, and realised that they all had the exact same eyes.

Those eyes were bright blue, but they weren’t stupid. They were sharp. There’s intelligence behind them.

Sam gulped as he recognised Janos Slynt. The wight was barely recognizable anymore. The man’s face and skull was bubbling and peeling from where Hobb’s stew poured over him, and bleeding from a dozen wounds, as well as a gaping hole in his chest were the spear went straight through. Like a butchered pig.

Sam could only squeal as Janos kicked him, marching the prisoners forward.

“They are heading into the tunnels, Sam realised. Fortifying the guardhouse and sealing the tunnel behind them. Heading back north of the Wall?

There would be guards manning the inner gates, but a group of wights went ahead and the guards never lasted long. Sam heard the screams. The tunnel was only really defendable against the north, not the south. They reached the first inner gate, and the wight of Left Hand Lew moved to winch the metal gate open. They moved synchronously.
There’s twelve of them down here with us, Sam realised suddenly. There had been twenty-nine in total. The other seventeen stayed in Castle Black to hunt down the living. But why go back through the Wall? If they wanted to take the castle, then they would need as many as possible. Why would these twelve barricade themselves in the tunnels with five prisoners?

And why keep us alive?

Seven wights stood in formation around them. Two of them clutched bows, notching arrows with unblinking eyes. Satin looked ready to try and charge them, but Sam clutched the recruit and shook his head. They were one fat steward, a drunken septon, a crying singer, a three-fingered old chef and a young recruit against seven armed, unfeeling monsters. They wouldn’t stand a chance in a fight.

But what was the alternative? Wait until Thorne or Donal assembled the men to throw the wights out? How long until they broke the fortifications, and the wights holding the guardhouse against them? The tunnel was meant to be defended from the south, not the north, but the gates were thick either way.

Janos pointed his spear, forcing the hostages backwards. Those eerie eyes shone. Its mouth opened.

Dareon was weeping madly. Satin had to pull him backwards, Three-Finger Hobb had to half-drag Cellador away. Sam almost stumbled.

Janos point its spear. “Walk,” it repeated, but didn’t follow. The wights with the bows pulled back their arrows.

Slowly, the group shambled backwards down the tunnel. The tunnel had never seen so dark, or so cold.

“What do they want?” Satin gasped. “Why are they…?”

“They’re walking us to our doom!” Cellador wailed, with skittering steps. “Demons that would drag us from the light of the Seven, to march us to eternal damnation…”

No… “They want us to walk down the tunnel,” Sam muttered. “But they can’t follow us. The dead can’t cross the Wall, not even walking beneath it.”

Did the barrier work both ways? Did it stop the wights from crossing from the south as well as from the north of the Wall? Or maybe they could cross from the south, but they didn’t because then they would be trapped on the wrong side of the Wall again?

But it didn’t matter. The tunnel was long and straight towards the outer gate, the wights had bows, and there was nowhere to take cover. A hundred feet long through solid ice.

“Walk,” Janos repeated, his voice louder. It pointed with the spear. It wants to us to head for the oak gate to the north. Does it want us to open it for them?

The group took nervous steps, like walking to be butchered. I need a plan, he thought. What would Jon do in this situation? “Keep walking…” Sam said, his voice quivering. “… We reach the gate… we open it, we run through it, and then we close it behind us quickly… They can’t shoot us when we’re on the other side of the gate…”
“But then we’ll be on the wrong side of the Wall!” Dareon wailed.

“So?” Satin countered. “It’s better than being here. We could run along the Wall, maybe meet up with the ranging, or head to Eastwatch if we have to.”

_with no supplies or proper equipment_, Sam thought, but he didn’t say anything. The gate was less than fifty feet away. Every step felt like an eternity.

“They’ll follow us,” Three-Finger Hobb muttered. “Chase us down.”

“They can’t. Look at them, they can’t cross the Wall.” _I hope_, Sam added to himself. “That’s why they’re marching us with bows.”

The gate loomed less than thirty feet away. Nine inches of solid reinforced oak.

_But it still doesn’t make sense_, Sam thought slowly. If there was an intelligence coordinating the wights (and Sam had to believe there was) then why would they let them get away? If they still couldn’t cross the Wall even with a tunnel, then why did matter if the gate was open or not?

Unless…

There was a sudden screech. They all froze. The sound caused them all to jump. The sound of wood groaning, metal creaking.

Sam stared in quiet horror at the gate in front of them. The huge iron hinges trembled.

With a tremendous crack, the wood shattered. Sam dropped as splinters like knives shot overhead. Metal bolts tore out of steel.

His heart almost stopped as suddenly the gate dropped in front of them. The wind howled through the tunnel, and suddenly they were left staring at the night beyond the wall.

Cold blue eyes shone back at them. The nine inch thick gate trembled and cracked as it was torn away. Dareon was screaming.

Sam glimpsed black, hulking shapes – larger than any he had ever seen – stomping outside over the thick snow drifts. He saw the outlines of mammoths and giants, massive beasts, all working to rip the gate straight off its hinges with unbelievable strength. Sam fell to his knees as he looked up at the monstrous giant, and it had glowing blue eyes.

There was no gate anymore. Standing out the front was an army of blue-eyed creatures, as still as the dead.

But his attention was fixed firmly on the creature in front. Even in the darkness, it seemed to glow. It was shimmering, colder, more beautiful and more inhuman than anything he had ever imagined. It stood like a beautiful sculpture carved out of crystalline ice. A sculpture with bright blue eyes.

An Other. A white walker. It stood tall at the mouth of the tunnel, wind and snow swirling around it.

The white walker stared through them. Like they were nothing but some sort of curious insects.

Cellador was on his knees, weeping and praying.

Sam felt his blood freeze. It was like he was looking into the eyes of death, barely fifteen feet away.
But it can’t reach us, some part of Sam thought. The tiny rational part that was still working amidst the pure panic. Even if the gate is open, it can’t come through. Otherwise they would be through already. The Wall is more than stone or ice – it’s a barrier. The ancient spells from the children of the forest. The Others can’t come through it.

So then why…?

Still, the white walker took a step forward. It raised a delicate, slender icy hand, stretching towards the mouth of the tunnel.

Its voice was alien, like the cracking of ice. It sounded like it was trying to form syllables that were unnatural for its tongue. “Walk,” the Other said, before motioning towards it again.

It wants to get through, Sam realised with quiet horror. Only living men could walk freely underneath the Wall.

Around it, he saw blue-eyed corpses step forward. Dozens of bows being notched. Arrows pointed at them. Even if wights couldn’t reach him, arrows certainly could. It’s going to kill us if we don’t do what it says.

Sam froze, staring out into the blackness. Standing at the mouth of the tunnel, staring at an army of hundreds upon hundreds of monsters waiting in the snow.

He couldn’t breathe. It felt like his lungs just jammed. It felt like he was literally about to choke from the fear contracting in his chest.

Very slowly, the creature stepped forward its hand still outstretched. It walked two steps, before Sam saw the very edges of its cold fingers begin to sizzle and burn. Its hands stiffened at an invisible barrier towards the mouth of the tunnel. A flash of something like annoyance crossed the Other’s gaze.

They burn. The Wall burns them. So the wights can be pulled across but the Others themselves can’t? Sam thought. Sam was struggling to understand how the boundary of the Wall worked, but he didn’t think the Other understood it either. This moment it felt experimental – investigative. Like the white walker itself was trying to figure out how to pass.

Castle Black had been short-manned. It must have seen an opportunity to try and get through the Wall.

Next to him, it sounded like Septon Cellador soiled himself again.

The Other paused, before motioning again at the five men. “Walk,” it repeated, in its gravelly voice. The wights around it moved like puppets. “Walk.”

Sam whimpered. Three rotting corpses dropped a bundle of stitched hemp rope at the mouth of the tunnel. The white walker pointed again down into the tunnel. Cellador clutched the seven-pointed star around his neck, mumbling scripture with his eyes focused downwards at the snow.

Behind it, the dark shapes of so many bodies stood like statues across the snow. “What are we going to do?” Satin hissed.

“It wants us to carry the rope under the Wall,” said Sam. There was a lot of rope – easily two hundred feet’s worth, the braid so thick a normal human could never lift it all.

“We do it and they'll kill us.”
“We don’t move and they’ll kill us!” Dareon snapped. “We need to run!”

Three-Finger Hobb shook his head. The old man was trembling. “We ain't getting through all them,” he muttered. Easily a hundred dark shapes standing in the snow, in the dead man’s land beyond the Wall and before the treeline.

The Other was looking straight at them. They picked us deliberately, Sam thought. The fat, the boy, the old, the cowardly and the drunk – the weakest out of the bunch. Anyone stronger might try to be a hero.

Either side, he looked at bowmen. The blue eyes were emotionless.

Sam twitched. “Pick up the rope,” he said. “Let's do what they say.”

“You craven!” Satin snapped.

Sam cringed, but he stepped forward. That moment as he stepped out onto the snow it felt like his body was about to collapse. The Other stared at him, and then stepped back to let him touch the rope. The Other was tall – easily seven feet, and long limbed.

His body shuffled as he bent down to heave up the rope. The cold, woven hemp was so heavy he gagged trying to pick it. The Other kept its distance, staring at him with unblinking blue eyes.

Dareon followed. Then, hesitantly, Satin did too. Septon Cellador stumbled forward, muttering and trembling. Three-Finger Hobb cursed, the old man's back stiff as he tried to lift too. The white walker watched them go.

The rope hung over his shoulder, trailing behind him. Each slow, laborious step back through the tunnel felt like marching to their execution. There’s an army of them across the Wall, and only seven in the tunnel, on this side of the gate. How long would it take the Night’s Watch to recover and retake the gatehouse? How long do we have?

“Why a rope?” Dareon murmured behind him.

“They want to pull more wights across the Wall,” Sam whispered. The wights couldn't cross freely but they could be carried, or pulled. Yet the Others couldn't cross at all, could they? The Others would burn trying to cross the Wall. The wights were just puppets, and the Other's strings burned across the Wall. “They can't walk through.”

“We can’t do this, if they… if they get across…”

The rope won’t make a difference, Sam thought. They could still only get soldiers through a couple at a time, and very slowly. The Night’s Watch would retake the tunnel before they pulled across enough wights to make a difference. I hope.

Or maybe I’m just being a coward.

“… So they can’t cross beneath Wall…” Satin said in a hushed breath, walking very, very slowly through the dank tunnel. “They can’t follow us?”

“Then what happens if we just stop walking?” Hobb mumbled. “In the middle of the tunnel, where none can reach us.”

“Then they’ll shoot us with arrows!” Dareon hissed. Enemies on both sides of the tunnel, with bows. It would be a long shot, but they’d be sitting ducks trying to dodge arrows. Cellador moaned.
“I don't want to die… I can't…”

“How many were back there?” Satin asked.

“Hundreds? Thousands?”

“If we help them get through then Castle Black doesn't stand a chance,” Satin hissed. Young boy, but brave. “We can’t do this.”

“We can't…” Sam murmured. “We can't stop them…”

“Let's just do what they say,” Dareon hissed. “They could have killed us, they didn't. They need us.”

“For now,” said Satin. “We can't beat them on the other side, but we might beat the ones in the tunnel.”

They were trundling closer, as slowly as they dared to move. Sam could see the rotting, naked body of Janos Slynt waiting for them. “There are seven of them,” Sam warned. Two with spears, two with bows. “They're armed, we're not.”

“If we do nothing they'll be more than seven!” Satin shouted. They were walking as slowly as they dared, feet trundling as the rope dragged behind them. “We charge them. Steal their spears. Just run for cover.”

Sam could feel himself shaking. “The boy's right,” Three-Finger Hobb said. He was an old, crooked fat man. The cook had once been a tall man, but now his spine was crooked, with a pot belly and blistered skin. The man walked with a limp and squinty eyes, but his voice still seemed strong. Scared, but strong. “We got to do something now.”

“Don't, it's suicide,” Sam begged.

“Take a deep breath, grow some spine,” Hobb ordered. “I take the one at the back with the bow. Sam and Satin charge Janos – steal his spear. Dareon and the septon go for Lew. As soon as we get close. Just take their weapons and ambush them.”

“We can't…” Sam muttered. Yet what choice do we have?

Cellador was wailing, unable to speak properly. Dareon never said a word, but he was crying too. Hobb and Satin seemed to tense themselves.

“Ready?” Hobb mumbled under his breath. Less than fifteen feet away. “Now or never. On three. One.”

“We can't…”

“Two.”

“… Let's not…”

“Three.”

Hobb dropped the rope and barreled forward. Satin dived, jumping to try to knock Janos to the ground. Sam tried to follow, but his knees failed him and he collapsed.

Dareon and Cellador didn't move at all. They were too busy crying.
Sam only vaguely was aware of Janos knocking Satin easily down with the butt of the spear. A bowstring thumped. Hobb fell too with an arrow embedded through his chest.

Sam gagged and whimpered with the sight. Hobb died quickly. No no no... Hobb had been a member of the Night's Watch for over fifty years. The cook was one of the longest serving members. He couldn't just die, not like that...

None of the wights even blinked. No surprise. Two of them picked up the end of the rope and dragged. Dareon wept and wailed.

The wight Janos raised his arm and pointed. “Walk,” the wight said again, while the other wights took the end of the rope and started pulling.

Sam collapsed, head spinning. The wight kicked him upwards with cold, purpling feet. “Walk,” it repeated.

That’s our job, Sam thought. The only reason they kept us alive. To walk backwards and forward under the Wall because they couldn’t.

The other wights were wrapping the end of the rope to the gate. The wight Janos used his spear like a cattle prod to push them forward. The mutilated flesh caused Sam to squirm, hyperventilating in panic. Their every step was unwilling, frightened.

They were all weeping, sniffling or crying. The wight never said a word, but the movements made it very clear that if they did not walk, they’d be killed. There was absolutely no emotion there.

At the other side of the rope, they had made a cradle. The wights in the tunnel were pulling the rope, dragging another three bodies—corpses clad in sheepskin or wool—through the tunnel. Sam’s heart pounded as he saw the blue-eyed bodies being lurched across the ice, heading towards the Wall. Three bodies formerly wildlings or sworn brothers.

All they needed was a rope long enough and wights in the tunnel, and they could pull more and more troops across by themselves. It was a slow, clumsy and awkward method, but the Others had found a way to get their soldiers south of the Wall. A crude way to circumvent the barrier.

The Night’s Watch will stop them, Sam told himself. As soon as the sworn brothers rallied, they could break the gates in the tunnel down to clear the wights. They’d throw rocks and arrows from atop Wall to clear those at the gate. The Night’s Watch could recover.

But if the Others start slipping through the Wall now, how long will it take them to break the Wall altogether?

The snow howled through the tunnel. Sam thought he might have heard sounds of battle in the distance, but the Other looked totally unconcerned. He watched it pace at the invisible boundary by the broken gate, swiping with graceful movements, as if trying to push through.

“They’re going to kill us...” Dareon wailed, as Janos prodded him to keep walking. “They’re going to kill us... Seven save me...”

Sam wanted to break down and cry, but he couldn’t. What would Jon do in this situation?

Jon would save the day. Jon would do something brave and heroic to stop them. Jon wouldn’t have let Hobb die like that. But how can I do anything like that?

“Remember your vows,” Sam hissed, trying to reassure himself too. “We’re men of the Night’s...
Watch, we can’t break apart now.”

“Men of the Night’s Watch?” Dareon laughed hollowly. There was a crazed look in his eyes. “My vows?”

“Whenever I’m scared, remember our vows.” Sam gulped. “We have to stay strong.”

“Vows?” Dareon snorted, shivering. “… I am the sword in the darkness. I am the watcher on the walls… fire that burns against the cold…?”

“Dareon…”

The Other stopped suddenly. Its head jerked at the sound of Dareon’s voice.

“… I am the sword in the darkness… I am the watcher on the walls…” Dareon mumbled. “They’re just words, I can’t do this, I can’t…”

The Other’s gaze focused on Dareon. Suddenly, a wight pointed a spear closer to the singer. “Say them,” the wight croaked.

Dareon gasped. The spear inched closer. “Vows,” the wight said. “Say.”

Sam stumbled, nearly tripping into the snowdrifts. The wight lunged to grab Dareon roughly, dragging him to the Other. It jerked as it stepped past the mouth of the tunnel, but it managed to push through to grab the singer’s neck. Satin rushed to intervene, but then the wights with bows pulled back on their arrows. Satin was grabbed too. Sam tried to stop them from pulling the boy, and then he felt a rotten, skeletal hand grab at his cloak.

He landed face first into freezing snow. Wind howled. They pulled us across the boundary, Sam realised. The Other couldn’t step through the boundary at all, but the wights could move at least part way through the mouth of the gate. The barrier affected the Other more than it did the wights.

Dareon screamed, high-pitched, girly. The wight dragged him by the collar through the snow.

The white walker grabbed Dareon with hands like ice. The singer gasped in pain. The words out of the white walker’s mouth sounded sharp, crackling, alien. “Say vows,” the Other crackled. “Say them.”

Dareon whimpered. “… Night gathers, and now my watch begins…” He gasped. “It shall not end until my death… I shall take no wife, hold no lands, father no children…”

His voice broke. “Say them,” it hissed.

“… I shall wear no crowns and win no glory. I shall live and die at my post. I am the sword in the darkness…” He shivered “… I am the watcher on the walls…”

The Other’s eyes flashed. It forced Dareon to repeat the words three times, all the while gripping the singer’s wrist. Sam could only stare and shiver.

Then, the Other took a step forward, pushing Dareon forward too. There was no crackling. The ice of the Other’s skin did not sizzle.

Sam’s heart pounded. He realised. “Stop talking, Dareon!” He screamed. “Don’t say the words, don’t–”

A wight slammed his spear onto Sam’s head. The world blurred. He heard sounds of struggle.
Dareon tried to squirm. The Other held his wrist like an iron vice. “Repeat,” the Other ordered. “Walk. Walk, and repeat.”

The singer was gasping, screaming. Satin was screaming too. Cellador was on his knees, praying nonsensically. “… I am the fire that burns against the cold…” Dareon whimpered. “… the light that brings the dawn…”

The Other took another step. Sam could only watch in terror. Whatever barrier stopped the Others, it could be nullified by a brother of the Night’s Watch granting them passage.

I’ve got to stop them. The wights are bad enough, but if a white walker itself crosses the Wall…?

What would Jon do?

Sam shambled, half-running, half-crawling across the floor. He caught the wight by surprise, slipping through him. Charging at the Other.

The Other reacted fluidly. It’s hand slammed Sam to the ground, so fast he could barely even process it. Sam gagged as he felt the stinging cold from where its fist collided with his chest.

Still, it was the distraction Dareon needed to slip free of its grip. The singer squirmed, and as soon as he broke from the Other’s touch Sam heard the sizzling. The white walker flinched, starting to burn before it jumped backwards away from the Wall.

Dareon was weeping. The singer just turned and ran – sprinting back down into the tunnel as fast he could possibly run. The Other flinched, hissed and crackled, and then the wight archers fired. Sam had his face in the snow as he heard the bowstrings. Dareon barely made it a dozen steps before the arrows cut him down.

Sam wailed. He tried to struggle, but two wights were on him, holding him down. He heard Septon Cellador wail, and Satin thrash.

Behind him, there was the lurching of bodies as another three wights were dragged down the tunnel by the rope. The Other paced at the invisible line in the dark tunnel. It’s irritated, Sam realised. It’s found a way to get its troops through, but it can’t follow.

The white walker turned, to stare between the prisoners. It paused, and then walked towards Satin with long, graceful steps. There was no gentleness. The Other grabbed Satin by the throat and lifted him physically into the air with a single hand. It’s strong, Sam thought. Very fast, graceful, and strong.

“Vows,” the Other’s sharp voice crackled. It sounded like iron grating against bone. “Say them.”

Satin gagged. The grip was beyond cold. “Don’t!” Sam choked. If I’m right… “He’s a recruit, not a sworn brother – he hasn’t taken any vows! He can’t let you through!”

The Other paused, cocking its head. Then, without another word, its hand jerked, and Satin’s neck snapped. The boy went limp, spasming weakly like a dead fish.

Sam screamed.

Septon Cellador was still on his knees, praying with his eyes closed. Perhaps the septon had the right idea. Perhaps this was just some horrible nightmare, and if Sam closed his eyes hard enough it would all just stop happening.
The Other’s voice was growing impatient. It dragged the old man upwards, hand on his throat. “Vows,” it repeated. “Say them.”

“Seven help me… demons have no power in the light of the Seven…”

The Other grabbed his shoulder and squeezed. Its fingers must be like cold daggers. Cellador screamed. “Vows,” it said again.

Cellador was crying. Don’t, Sam begged silently, too scared to even speak.

The septon said the words. The Other took a step forward, before stopping. “Those vows have been broken,” it hissed, staring at Cellador. “Useless.”

A wight stabbed its spear straight through the septon’s back. The man crumpled in a hiss of blood.

Sam couldn’t stop trembling. He could barely even think. There had been five of them. Four were dead. I’m next.

The white walker reached out to grab him. Sam felt like his bones were shaking.

“Vows,” it said. “Say them. Say them and walk.”

Sam felt his body being hoisted up. “… I can’t…” he wailed, gasping for air.

“Say them.”

Sam couldn't even speak through the gasps of breath. It squeezed with fingers like frostbite, but the pain just made Sam mutter even more nonsensically. There was no thought, just fear. The Other snapped something in a sharp, crackling tongue. Irritated.

“Say them,” it hissed.

Sam was too busy crying, struggling even to breathe.

The wights shifted around them. Even if it could walk through, the Other could only pass so long as the wights held the tunnel. A dozen wights wouldn't be able to hold out long once the Night's Watch rallied. The white walker had a time limit too.

“… You want to live?” Its voice crackled, straining to speak. “Say the words and you live. You stay warm.”

Sam shook his head. “… I can't, my brothers they…”

“They go cold. All warmth goes cold. Warmth is abomination. Warmth is brief. Fire is chaos. We are the only balance. We bring order, peace.”

Its hands on Sam’s furs were cold, colder than anything Sam had ever felt. So cold it burnt even through his furs. “Say the words, and walk,” the Other crackled. “Then you walk away. Live out your warmth, live out your briefness.”

“You'll kill everyone.”

“Kill.” It spat the word with something that seemed like disdain. “No. You kill yourself. Your warmth would bleed without us. You are brief. We bring eternity.”

It pulled itself closer. Gods, those blue eyes were so bright. “When we conquer, the world will be at peace. There will be order.”

There was something in its posture, its voice. It didn't seem like anger, it felt more like urgency. “Now say the words.”

Sam’s hands were shivering. What would Jon do?

Jon would fight. He would fight to his last breath, as hopeless as it was. Jon would be a true sworn brother, right up until his last breath.

…”I can’t be Jon. I’m sorry, I just can’t…”

“Night gathers, and now my watch begins. It shall not end until my death…” Sam recited between gaspy breaths. “I shall take no wife, hold no lands, father no children… shall wear no crowns and win no glory. I shall live and die at my post…”

Sam said the words, still barely able to breathe. The Other held his shoulder tightly. The white walker pushed him to keep walking, into the black, cold tunnel.

How did it work? Were the vows like some sort of key, a way to unlock the barrier of the Wall? Certain phrases that could disable the spells?

The wind and snow had blown the torches out. The tunnel turned pitch black. The Other’s blue eyes shone in the dark. Every step felt torturous.

How far did the barrier stretch? At least halfway through the Wall? The Wall was two hundred and fifty feet thick at the base.

“I am the fire that burns against the cold, the light that brings the dawn, the horn that wakes the sleepers, the shield that guards the realms of men…”

Sam’s body was squirming. He could feel the cold walking next to him. He could have cried as they walked, one step after another.

“… I am the watcher on the walls… I am the fire that burns against the cold…” he mumbled the words.

Count the steps. One step. Two steps. A dozen. Just say the words and walk. That’s all they want me to do. If I want to survive that’s all I have to do…

Sam could see the first gate in the gloom. They were about halfway under the Wall. He must have repeated his vows a dozen times. It was amazing how fifty feet could seem like fifty miles. The Other kept on pushing him forward.

He could see a figure waiting for him in the gloom. The wight Janos Slynt, with skin covered in rime and blisters, standing halfway through the tunnel with his spear. Ready to greet his master.

“… I am the watcher on the walls…” Sam repeated. “… I am the watcher on the walls…” He took a deep breath, and then stopped. Would this work?

The Other’s grip tightened, so tight it felt like his arm would snap. “Walk,” it growled in his ear.

Halfway through the Wall. “I am the watcher on the walls,” Sam wheezed, gathering every sliver of resolve he could muster. “… and you do not have my permission to pass!”

The world seemed to pause.
For a second, it felt like the ice itself shivered. The barrier returned. Slam the door with it inside of it. Please work. He heard the Other howl – a soul-piercing shriek that seemed to reverberate in the tunnel.

Sam heard ice sizzle. The white walker’s body shuddered. Fire, he realised. The Other is being lit on fire.

The Other shrieked. Halfway through the Wall. It was too far for it to run back out. Sam had seen how the Other had flinched and jumped after Dareon stopped saying the words. He could only hope it also would work if the Other was too far under the Wall to run back.

Its hands clenched. For a second, it felt like it about to ripped Sam’s shoulder off, but then Sam shrugged off his cloak, dropped to the ground, and slipped out of its grip.

The white walker thrashed and staggered. Its white body burned. He saw milky cold flesh sizzle and blacken. Sam’s heart had never pounded so hard as he shambled upwards and started running as fast as his tired, short legs could take him.

He saw blue eyes shoot at him. The Other hissed and thrashed. The wight formerly Janos Slynt shivered in surprise, but then staggered after Sam.

All of the wights are trembling, Sam noticed vaguely. The Other was in pain, and the wights trembled.

It was too fast. The wight dived into him, knocking him to the ground, his spear in hand.

Sam fell. He wasn’t quite sure how he managed to, but he barely rolled out the way as the spear bounced off the ice beneath him. Sam screamed. His hands flinched, grabbing a hold of the spear’s shaft as the wight tried to pull the weapon backwards.

The wood stung. He felt the metal spear tip scrape his shoulder, but Sam couldn’t even feel the pain. Instead, Sam just pulled back, and the wight stumbled and fell into him.

The body crashed into him. He felt cold, sick, mutilated flesh. They rolled and stumbled, wrestling. Sam made a sound like a squeal.

The rest of the world disappeared. There was nothing but that black tunnel, and the two figures rolling, thrashing and squealing in the dark.

Sam could feel the wight trying to rip him in half. Even without the spear, Janos was strong, with powerful hands and an unbreakable grip. Sam could only roll and squirm, trying to stop those black hands from wrapping around him.

The ice underneath stung. Sam crawled backwards, feeling the wight clamber at him. Sam felt something bounce off his leg. The spear, he realised. The wooden spear he pulled from the wight’s grip.

Janos grabbed his ankles and dragged. Sam screamed in pain. His flailing hands wrapped around the spear’s shaft.

Sam was still screaming and wailing as he grabbed the spear and slammed the butt into the wight’s chest. The creature never even flinched, but it knocked him backwards slightly. Janos’ hand gripped at the spear, but Sam pushed forward. Using the leverage to knock Janos backwards.

The wight shambled. Sam felt tears in his eyes and piss in his breeches as he barely managed to drag the spear upwards. The wight shambled, readying to lunge. Sam was grasping a spear he could barely even hold, against a monster that he couldn’t kill with it. Blue eyes gleamed in the dark.

_The eyes. Go for the eyes._

Sam squealed as he thrust the spear upwards against the wight’s head. The spear tip collided against the ridge of its nose, and then scraped off across his right eye and into the wight’s skull. The wight kept on pushing, charging into the spear.

Sam twisted, swinging the creature around. Using its momentum against it. It recovered quickly, and then Sam stabbed with the spear again. Straight at its remaining eye. Congealed blood splattered.

The wight thrashed blindly. Sam clutched the spear with both hands as he stabbed downwards again. The first stab grazed its upper arm. The second pierced its thigh. The third missed altogether. The fourth stabbed and jammed in its shoulder.

The wight was thrashing, struggling to move with torn ligaments. Sam panted for breath, eyes wide. In front of him, the Other was burning and sizzling. Its perfect, crystal skin was being scorched black with every step it made. Wounded and in agony, but pushing through the remaining distance. _It’s trying to force its way through. It’s still trying to cross the Wall._

Sam had no choice. He turned and ran. North, back down the tunnel, away from the white walker.

The wights at the mouth of the tunnel were crazed. Their master was in trouble, and they couldn’t help it. They couldn’t follow through the tunnel.

They were caught off-guard as Sam came tumbling out, gasping for breath and running harder than he ever had. There were hundreds of them, but they had slow reaction times and they struggled to respond. Sam turned left, scrambling out of the mouth of tunnel and over the snowdrifts as he ran.

_Beware the bowmen. Can’t die like Dareon did._ He had to run forward, not back. Use their own troops as cover from the bowmen’s fire.

Sam shoved his way through a rotten corpse. The creatures looked crazed. Some started to run after him, but they were sluggish, disorganised. They stumbled into each other – none of the eerily perfect coordination that Sam saw before. _The white walker is in pain,_ Sam realised. _It’s not controlling its puppets properly._

_Go for the treeline. Take cover._

There were bodies squirming behind him. Sam heard the lumbering footsteps of a rotting giant, chasing him. The monster was nearly twelve feet tall, so big it was nothing but a looming shadow glistening in hoarfrost. Sam screamed as he dived into the trees, but the wights were right behind him.

He stumbled. A branch. Sam’s body shut down as he tripped over a root and fell into the snow. He heard footsteps.

Then, another figure loomed over him. A wight charged, but the shadow in a black cloak cut out of the trees. The rotting wight was sliced in two with an easy stroke of a black sword. More wights attacked, but the cloaked figure held them back.

Trees cracked as the giant tried to barrel through. Sam heard flapping. He saw black wings – ravens – flocking in the air as the birds launched themselves at the giant’s eyes.

Sam screamed. Everything felt so crazed he could barely see.

A hand was on his shoulder, pulling him upwards. “Run, brother,” a hoarse voice – the stranger’s voice – said. “We must run.”

“… Can’t… the Wall…”

The stranger shook his head. He pointed to the mass of wights.

Vaguely, Sam had wondered why so few of all those wights had chased him. He had been too distracted to realise. The rest of the wights let him run because they were busy crowding around the tunnel. The wights were moving in unison again, with perfect coordination. It took Sam a few panicked seconds to realise what that meant.

The Other survived. It had crossed the Wall. Sam took it halfway, and it managed to push through the other half by itself. His heart pounded. No no no… I didn’t mean to… I didn’t want to actually let it through…

Sam felt his body convulse. “We’ve got to help them, the Watch…”

A white walker was through the Wall. The Others had actually made it south.

The black-cloaked stranger just grabbed and pulled him backwards. His hands were cold. “We cannot. It is too late, brother,” the stranger said in his deep, solemn voice. “The Wall has already fallen.”
Chapter 18

Chapter Summary

After the battle. The rise of a king, and the fall of one too.

Samwell

He was shivering. Shivering constantly as the stranger pulled him through the snow. Sam named the black cloaked ranger as Coldhands, but the man hadn’t introduced himself. No, he’s not a man. No man would ever be able to walk so far and so long without tiring or stopping for breath. Sam was exhausted, but Coldhands never seemed to tire.

Sam had walked for as long as he could, until his legs seized up and Coldhands had to drag him through the snow. The man’s grip was like iron. Sometimes Sam managed to shamble to his feet, but every time he fell the stranger would start dragging him with barely a break in his gait.

Coldhands was a hard, black shape marching through the waist-deep snow, clad in old, mottled black furs, his body thin and gaunt but so strong. The black sword – old, rusted and caked in rotten blood, with a blade like a sharpened chunk of iron – was always in his tight grip. A flock of ravens cawed around them, fluttering overhead through the trees.

“Hurry now,” said Coldhands, his voice rattling. “They are still behind us.”

“Where are we going?” Sam whined. It was very early dawn, but still gloomy as the light hovered barely visible through the trees. They had left the shadow of the Wall behind them and kept walking through the forest.

“Not much further now.”

It took another six hours to reach their destination. Sam was left panting, shivering and exhausted, barely able to focus. He saw a knotted weirwood tree clinging to a twisted rocky outcrop. The weeping red face was distorted and hidden by moss. He saw dead bodies littering the ground, dark shapes mostly buried by snow.

“Oh no…” Sam gasped at the sight of the corpses. They wore hide and sheepskin. It looked like they had died trying to huddle together, unable to even put up a fight. There was no blood.

“These ones are truly dead,” Coldhands said. “The power of the weirwood keeps their bodies from being easily possessed.”

“Who are… were they?” Sam said, as he struggled to breath. Even hours later after the night, it felt like the panic was the only thing keeping him conscious.

“Free folk,” Coldhands replied, shuffling quickly. “They came to take refuge at the heart tree, and the Others killed them. Quickly now, there is a passage beneath the weirwood that they did not know about. A safe spot.”

He called them free folk, Sam noted. Coldhands dressed like a ranger, but most men of the Night’s Watch would refer to them as wildlings.
Sam hesitated, but he had no choice but to follow. He was hungry and cold and all alone. If Coldhands had wanted to do him harm he would have done, and Sam never stood a chance all alone in any case.

Sam trekked forward, trying to see any tunnel in the dirt. Coldhands had to dig out the snow and hack at the roots to uncover it. The passage was a tunnel so tight that Sam couldn't even see it for a long while. How old is this safe spot, if the tree has grown over it?

Eventually, he made out the tunnel. Sam hesitated, but Coldhands was very clear that he had to go through. He scrambled on his stomach in the snow, earth and roots, crawling forward. The gap was so very dark and tight, and at one point Coldhands had to give him a shove.

“What is this place?” Sam cried.

“A safe haven, a waypoint. Once used by the children of the forest to hide from men. There is no barrier around it, but there are old wards that will prevent detection. We must hide here until the Others move on.”

It was so dark Sam couldn't see at all. He clambered by feel through the small, cramped cave. It was a tunnel dug for figures much smaller than him. The roots were everywhere, dangling across the passageway. The dusty stench of old roots and earth made him wheeze.

“What happens when they’re gone?” Sam squealed. He reached a clearing; a cramped cave nestled in the roots. The blackness made him shiver.

“Then I take you back to the Wall once it's safe,” Coldhands promised, as he climbed into the tunnel after him. He crawled quickly. Sam could only hear the roots rustling. “But for now, you must go to sleep.”

“What?”

“Weirwoods like this one link up to the whole. The children used them for meditation. Sleep here and you will be under the blanket of the Old Gods.”

It was dark and quiet. Coldhands never breathed, nor made any sound except when he spoke. “It’s too dark. Can we light a fire?”

“No. No fire, not here. Take shelter in the darkness.”

Sam gulped. He didn't understand what was happening, he was scared, hungry, and so tired.

After that Coldhands didn’t say a word. The stranger sat still like a sentry by the tunnel, his sword in hand. It felt like Sam sat in the darkness for hours, until eventually the panic and fear bled away and the weariness caught up. He didn't even realise he was falling asleep until he felt himself drifting…

He heard water. Sam gasped as the blackness blurred, until he was staring upwards at a huge cavern of white roots cutting through the black. He didn’t know where the light came from, but he could still make out the details. I'm dreaming, Sam thought, but it didn't feel like a dream.

He was standing on a bridge of woven roots, above an abyss of darkness. He heard a river gushing deep, deep below him.

“Welcome brother,” a slow, hoarse voice said. “You are not the one I sent the ranger to bring.”
Sam stared. His eyes had passed over the figure because of how it blended into the roots. It was a man made out of wood, with skin like white bark that matched the weirwood roots. No, Sam thought in quiet horror. A corpse. A pale corpse dressed in tattered finery, buried in weirwood roots for so long that roots had consumed him. A skeletal lord with white skin like bark.

The man could have been dead, if not for the single red eye that focused on Sam.

Sam’s mouth hung open. “This is a dream.”

“Of course it is,” the pale lord said, dust shaking from long hair like straw. He sat in a throne of weirwood roots that had overgrown to consume him. “The children would dream to talk to each other. They would link their dreams together, and use the heart trees as waypoints so that they wouldn’t lose themselves in the dreamscape. It is not the easiest, nor the safest, means of communicating to one such as yourself, yet it will be suitable.”

Sam stammered. He stepped forward, trying to make sense of the cavern. The dark heights made him woozy. “One such as myself?” He parroted, feeling like a fool.

“Indeed. I had tasked the ranger with bringing me a child of great promise, a child who could reshape the world with his will.” There was a soft smile on dry, shrunken lips. “Instead, he has brought me you. And yet we must make do with what we are given, it seems.”

Sam shook his head. His limbs froze. He couldn’t move, only stare. “Who are you?” What are you?

“I am a greenseer. The last greenseer according to some, but I have hope.”

“I don’t understand,” Sam said with a stutter. “What is happening?”

“You have been pulled into the middle of a war that is beyond you. I will explain, but I must hope that you are a fast learner.”

“The Others.”

“Yes.” A quiet, solemn nod.

Sam quivered. He took a deep breath. “The Other… it… it crossed the Wall.” I let it cross.

“It did indeed. Very unfortunately as well, which makes my task all the more urgent.” That red eye focused on him critically. “We are lucky in that the Other was injured in the crossing. It was injured enough that it could not quite slaughter every man in the castle. The Others are also not strong enough to survive under the light of the sun – not yet – and so come morning it was forced to flee and hide. If we are very lucky, the men of the Night’s Watch will find it and manage to kill it while it is vulnerable. But I think not – white walkers are not so easily hounded and defeated.”

Sam blinked. “The men of the Night’s Watch? They survived?”

“Some. Enough to retake the tunnel after the Other fled. The Wall quivers, but it holds.”

How does he know that? Sam thought. How could this man know something had happened leagues away? Still, there was no question that the greenseer just knew. Is this even real? Or am I going mad?

No, if I am going mad then I am already gone. Sam’s heart pounded. “So… so then only a single Other managed to make it through?” He asked with a twinge of hope.
“The barrier shivered, but it was not broken.” The pale lord nodded again. Another sprinkling of dust. “And yet even a single Other might still raise an army of thousands. So long as it is on that side of the Wall, the destruction it could cause is immense.”

Sam gulped. I did that. My fault. “And the Night’s Watch? Castle Black?”

“There were great casualties during the night, but the order is not dead. Not yet. That may in fact be our only hope.”

“I don’t understand.”

“You saw the barrier for yourself,” the greenseer said, looking at him curiously. “Where do you think it comes from?”

Sam floundered. “It was a spell.”

Magic, actual magic. The thought made him shiver. Magic is real. And monsters. Monsters are real too.

“I don’t…”

“The children of the forest assigned the task of upkeep to an order of men, who were weaved into the song. It fell to humans to keep order in the world, not children.”

Sam stared, struggling to understand. “The Night’s Watch.”

“Yes. The vows that you say are a part of a larger ritual. Every man who takes the black contributes to it, and so the barrier is slightly stronger for each man standing on the Wall. So long as there are loyal men manning the Wall and upholding their duty, the barrier will burn any Other that tries to cross.”

Loyal men? Loyal men are few enough even without anything murdering them. “But… but the Night’s Watch is in decline.” It had been for hundreds of years.

There was a slight grimace on the greenseer’s face. “And so the barrier withers too. The shield has cracks in it, and thus the Others returned.”

“They returned because of us,” Sam said breathlessly. A scared look passed over his face. The last Long Night happened eight thousand years ago, and it is only now that the Night’s Watch has decayed that it is happening again. “Because the Night’s Watch is falling. But what would happen if all the sworn brothers were to die?”

“Then the barrier would disappear in its entirety.”

“Oh gods.”

The greenseer’s face was hard and wooden. “And that is why the white walker in the south is very much a problem. I expect the first thing that the creature is going to do is raise a force to exterminate every sworn brother on the Wall.”

“We have to… we have to stop it.”

“I will do what I can. You must do the rest.”

“Me?”

“I have a plan to raise an army to fight them back, but it will take time to reach fruition. Until then, the Wall must hold.”

“I can’t… I…” The very thought of that thing made his knees quiver. The Other had been something else entirely – strong enough to snap a man’s neck with a single hand.

It must have fought its way through a hundred men in Castle Black, Sam realised. It had been wounded, burned, yet even a hundred men couldn’t stop it. A hundred against one, and they weren’t enough. “How many of those things are there?”

“Presently? A few dozen or so.”

“A few dozen?” Sam said with a flicker of hope. A few dozen was surely manageable. “That few?”

“For now.”

“What does that mean?”

“The Others that are currently hounding the forest are, hmm, I suppose one word would be outriders. A vanguard,” the greenseer explained, his voice so low that Sam had to strain to hear it. “Savages, is a better term – those Others that have lingered in southern lands for thousands of years. They are only the brutes that have lost their culture, instead preying and relying on humans. White walkers that have been exiled from the main host.”

Sam gulped. “The main host,” he repeated.

“Yes. Those are the warriors that retreated to their ancestral home, to hibernate for thousands of years until their next cycle. They are a different breed altogether. The construction of the Wall interrupted their cycle – it blocked them arising again for millennia – and so their armies are retired in the City of Ice, led by their king.”

Sam felt lost. The world felt woozy. His voice stammered. The greenseer’s head cocked. “Ask your questions now, brother,” the pale lord said, his voice still a croak, but something about the tone turned gentle. “You must learn quickly. You must be prepared.”

He had to take a deep breath to calm himself. “They have a king. The White Walker King?”

The greenseer nodded. “That is correct. Though their king is half-human,” he said gravelly. “The child of a man best forgotten. That might well make him the most dangerous creature in the world.”

“What do you mean, half-human? How… Why… would…?”

“The Others stand apart from mortal men. They despise the living, but hatred and anger is not in their nature. They are too cold for such passions, any passion. They don’t even have a fear of death. But the one that calls himself their king is something different entirely,” the pale lord explained. “He has both an Other’s powers and a man’s anger, fear and pride. The strength of a white walker and the viciousness of a human. He is king because he has been teaching the white walkers how to hate.”

He remembered the Other who gripped his throat. Those blues eyes had burned with such cold intensity. The very memory made Sam shudder. It had referred to warmth with disdain.

Sam’s hand went to his throat. There were no injuries on his throat now, but he knew that there were on his real body. The cold of its grip had burned. “They want to exterminate all life.”

“They do.” The old man’s voice was grim. “When the king comes south you shall know that the Long Night has truly begun.”

Sam shook his head. “We must stop them.”

“We must,” he agreed.

“How? How can we? If each of them is that powerful, if they have that many corpses behind them, if there’s army of them, then we can’t, it’s…” It’s hopeless. The words jammed.

“It has been done before. Protect the Night’s Watch,” he said quietly. “Protect your brothers. We need as many sworn brothers as possible. Do however much you can do, and hope that others do the same. Keep the shield intact.”

Sam shook his head, unable to speak. How? How could I ever?

“And then, when it is done, I believe that a record of the original spell that the children of the forest used to build the Wall must still exist somewhere. The children keep no archives except in their songs, and those have faded, but men would likely have copied such a thing onto parchment or stone,” the greenseer continued. “If we had such a copy, then perhaps we could see about repairing the shield altogether. Perhaps even build a new shield.”

He looked at the greenseer incredulously. “You want me to find a spell.”

“I do.”

Sam gulped. “A spell,” he repeated dumbly. “What does this spell even look like? Where would it be?”

“I do not know. But it must be found.”

Sam had never felt so lost before. How could he? Where could he even begin? Why did he have to do it?

I can’t. I can’t do it, I can’t do anything. I’m fat and I’m useless, I should have died in that tunnel.

Every time he closed his eyes he saw that icy sculpture with bright eyes, or the wight lunging at him. The voice in his head sounded like his father’s.

“Now is not the time for doubts. You have a task to do,” the greenseer said stiffly. His voice was low but hard. “This is a duty of the utmost importance and I need someone to fulfil it.”

“Why me?” Sam's voice quivered. “Why choose me?”

There was a long pause. The pale lord’s brow raised slightly. “Do you see anyone else around here?”
They stood talking for what felt like hours. Then, very slowly, Sam felt the light fade and his body being pulled away. The scene blurred into darkness. The last thing he saw was that red eye blazing in the black.

Sam gasped as he felt himself jolt awake, and he saw nothing but black. He felt the roots and cold dirt around him again.

A cold hand touched his wrist. Sam almost screamed.

“At ease, brother,” Coldhands muttered in the dark. Sam trembled and gasped, his stomach rumbling. Coldhands handed him a meal of roots and bugs for him to break his fast. “Prepare your strength. I will take you back to the Wall.”

Jon

He dreamt of a woman crying, begging for them to stop fighting. She screamed from atop a tower, watching the earth churn beneath her and great beasts rise out of the ground…

“Wake up, King Snow,” a voice called. “You are needed.”

Jon's eyes shot open with a groan. He saw Mother Mole standing over him. “You are needed,” the old women repeated. “They are calling for you.”

He shuddered. He could see the weak noon sun outside, but he had managed to sleep after dawn. He had finally fallen over of pure exhaustion with the sunrise. Maybe a few hours’ sleep, but he felt so raw it seemed longer. “They are waiting outside,” she said. “I will prepare your meal.”

His body felt so weary. He could feel the bruises. He had fallen asleep by a fire pit near the coast, but his furs still felt wet and cold. “Of course,” Jon blinked, as violent memories of last night returned to him.

Jon panted and staggered, his leg feeling so stiff he could barely even walk. The exhaustion was so thick in the air that morning itself felt heavy with low clouds and heavy smog.

_The worst part about a battle_ , Jon thought, _isn’t the battle itself_. During the fight, he had been so high of adrenaline and emotion he could barely feel a thing. At the time, he had danced over jagged ice and slashing blades without a hint of fear, hesitation, or weakness.

No, the worst part was afterwards, during the fallout. When the fighting was mostly over, but the exhaustion caught up with you and the tiredness kicked you like a horse. It was a time when the pain started to come back, and Jon had just wanted to collapse – but he couldn’t collapse. Not when there was so, so much still do.

He met Furs and several others waiting outside the tent. The mist from all the ice in the bay lingered thick in the air.

From the beach, Jon felt Sonagon slumbering on the rocks, closer to the camp than he had ever slept before. Ice bobbed around him, washing onto the sand with the wreckage. The dragon had been roaring fury last night – destroying ships and crushing men by the dozen, if not hundreds. The dragon chewed on so many men that his gums bled from the wrecks of armour and weapon caught between his teeth.
Jon knew that the dragon could eat just about anything – metal, wood, flesh or stone. He needed meat to survive, but occasionally the dragon would chew on stone and rocks as well. Swallowing swords and metal armour was just a delicacy for a beast Sonagon’s size.

“How is it?” Jon asked, pulling his cloak tighter. Last night it had been far too hectic to take stock. “How many died?”

In this distance, through the mist, he could see the skeletal wrecks of the ships still littering the frozen bay. A frozen expanse of icebergs and bodies. It was an unnerving sight in the light of day.

“Prisoners?”

“We got a few. I don't, fifty maybe? There were probably a few hundred that tried to surrender, but the raiders killed most of them.”

“I ordered them not to.”

Furs shrugged. “They mustn't have heard you.”

Jon looked around their eyes. They were all battle-worn and still on-edge.

That had been the hardest trial of the night – trying to take prisoners. It was hard, thankless work, and the wildlings hadn’t made it easy. Jon had heard that three dozen men had been captured by one of the ice river clans – but in the two hours it took him to find them he realised that half of those prisoners had already been captured and butchered for meat. It had taken two brawls and a very heated discussion before he got the clans to release the living men, but Jon had no choice but to leave the cannibals their meal.

All in all, out of the thousands they’d been fighting on the coast, less than fifty had been taken captive – and most of those wounded. The Weeper took two dozen crows too, but Jon had yet to see them. Even now, the wounded were tied up on the middle of the camp. Jon hadn’t the time to question them, and there were those who wanted to skin the men alive.

Bodies would litter the bay for a long time. He could see swollen corpses trapped in the ice, or floating on the waves.

“Alvin Whaletooth didn't make it back, by the way,” Furs said.

Jon's hands tightened. “Alvin is dead?”

“Yes. Him and his sons got caught by the ships. Dead at sea.”

Or did they die because of my ice? “What about Lord of Seals?”

“Oh, he survived.” Furs nodded. “He was further ahead. A lot of people behind him weren't so fine.”

The anger made his jaw clench. Alvin had been a good man, who went out to save the shipbuilders’ lives. Lots of people died so the Lord of Seals could rescue a few boats, he thought fouly. And I ordered Alvin to his death. Uselessly.

Jon looked around the camp. The smoke from the fires on the coast still hissed and the camp was in disarray, but it was still heaving with more people than ever. Crowds shambled trying to squeeze into shelter. More people than ever. “How many do we have? How many survived the forest?”

“Buggered if I know. I pity the poor sod who tries to count them all too.”

“Try and count them, Furs,” said Jon, walking past. The man grumbled.

He looked around the group. “Rolf,” Jon called. “How is the Weeper? Casualties in his warband?”

“The Weeper is too stubborn to die,” the man replied. “The rest? A few hundred lost. A few thousand died in the forest.”

Even now – nearly noon on the morning after – they were getting refugees spilling into the camp by the hundreds. Hardhome had never been more crowded, or more dire. The camp was overflowing past the cliffs, and everywhere Jon looked he saw more hungry faces.

How many? Jon could only guess. At first he thought twenty thousand, but slowly that estimate was rising to nearly thirty. Thirty thousand free folk that all need food, warmth and safety.

Everywhere he looked, he could see new problems. Finding food, finding shelter. More boats to carry them. Arguments between rival clans. Organising patrols, sharing food. They had barely been surviving before, and now their camp had nearly doubled in size.

One problem at a time. “The Others in the forest,” said Jon. “They retreated, but we can't let them rally. We need to march against them, stop them hitting us again.”

“You can't march against wights, Snow,” Rolf warned. “They're dead. They don't have camps, they don't have fires. You can barely track the corpses and you can’t ambush them.”

“Then we clear the forest of many we can find. We won't catch the Others themselves, but we can cut down their wights.” Jon bit his lip, thinking of all the corpses hiding in the snow. “We need to press the advantage and scour the forest clear of corpses. Erik, Rolf, Haldur, Hatch – I want as many free folk raiders to me as we can get. We get them organised today, now – before the dust settles.”

He saw flickers in their eyes. Press the advantage. “Now. Spread the word. Have as many as you can get meet me by the heart tree in an hour.”

The men scattered. “… You know that they’re not going to be so eager to listen to you?” Furs muttered to him. “They won’t appreciate you bossing them around.”

“I'm aware.”

One problem at a time, he repeated to himself. One by one.

It was chaotic how much was happening. The refugees needed food, there were injured to take care of, and any fishing boats were blocked by the ice. Jon still had to arrange for teams to traverse the wreckage of the ships to salvage weapons, supplies or prisoners. The floating wreckage of a dozen ships littering all across the coast. Out of the twenty-four ships that had attacked, sixteen were destroyed, two were crippled and wrecked on the coast, three of them had actually been captured whole, while only three escaped the bay.

The three recovered vessels – two galleons and a cog – were now docked hazardously on the bay. The ships had been trapped in shallow ice and then abandoned by their crew as Sonagon crushed the ships around them.
It was little comfort, considering the boats that had been lost in the battle. They lost four dozen boats and barges as the fleet approached, and the soldiers on the front ships assaulted the beach while Jon was fighting on the ice. The soldiers set flame to remaining free folk barges along the beach, fighting stubbornly until they were routed by the wildlings. In a single night, Jon reckoned they had lost at least three quarters of boats that the free folk had spent so long constructing.

Still, by far, the worst casualties had occurred in the Haunted Forest. Thousands must have been lost, only miles outside of Hardhome’s boundaries. If the Weeper hadn’t led the rescue force, then it could have easily been much worse. The free folk might not have made it back at all if Jon hadn’t been able to eventually convince Sonagon to intervene.

And everywhere Jon looked, he saw more and more people wearing white stones as brooches and staring at him in awe and shock. He heard the whispers as he passed. There had been thousands who had seen Sonagon tearing through the fleet on the coast, or heard about Jon fighting off Stannis on the ice. The thought of all those eyes and whispers made Jon’s skin squirm.

He had seen Mother Mole in the morning. Her early sermon had been… fanatical. In a single night, her congregation must have at least doubled.

Jon saw a white shape bound towards him. He grinned as he saw Ghost, nuzzling up to Jon’s coat affectionately. The direwolf’s mouth was covered in dried blood. Ghost seemed weary too – they had both had their share of battle.

“Long night, wasn’t it, boy?” Jon whispered, stroking the direwolf’s ear like he was a pup again.

“Snow,” a voice called. Jon turned to see a woman, her posture guarded, as she stared from under a white bearskin hood. “We need to talk.”

Val, Jon recognised. She looked different from the last time he saw her in Mance’s tent – skinnier, gaunter, more worn. Still fair, but with darker circles under her eyes. He nodded. “How is your sister?”

“Weak,” Val said. “But alive. Dalla is holding her babe.”

He nodded. “I’m glad,” he replied, but he was too tired to put much enthusiasm into it. He stepped towards her, wincing slightly with his leg and bruised chest. “You wanted to talk?”

Her gaze flickered at his bad leg, but she didn’t say anything. “I hear you been calling us, Snow,” said Val. “You want a gathering?”

“Aye.”

“Careful now. If I didn’t know better I’d say you were trying to summon us. You expect the free folk to jump when you shout?”

“I saved a lot of lives last night. There’s a war to be discussed. They’ll gather. I hope you’ll be there too.”

She didn’t reply. She stood back, very cautious of him. Inspecting him critically. Jon met her eyes, and then kept walking.

“Snow,” Val said after a pause. “I hear you been taking prisoners too.”

“You hear a lot. What of it?”
Jon caught Val gaze, wondering what she wanted. “Unless you’re going to feed them to your beast tonight,” she said. “I’d be careful. Lots of men lost wives, lots of women lost husbands. They’ll want someone to blame – and those bastards attacked us. Don’t do anything stupid like trying to protect them.”

“I want to interrogate them.”

“And then?” Val demanded.

Jon met her gaze. “I don’t kill prisoners.”

She grunted, a single non-committal grunt. “They would have killed us.”

“And you would kill them,” Jon said with a shrug. “But I’ve had enough of death.”

Along the beach, Jon heard Sonagon growl sleepily, shuffling along the water’s edge sniffing at the ice. There was a crowd gathered around the dragon constantly. Val’s gaze flickered. “I heard stories about that monster of yours,” Val said darkly. “I didn’t believe them.”

“I barely believe it myself, sometimes,” Jon replied, limping again. Val walked slowly to keep pace. “That monster saved your life last night.”

“Yes, it did. That doesn’t mean I have to trust it for it,” Val retorted. “… I certainly don’t have to kneel.”

She cast a foul look at a nervous boy scattering around them, and the white stone brooch on his furs. “If you told me a month ago that the free folk would ever kneel to some young crow boy I’d have spat in your face.”

“They kneel to Sonagon, not to me.”

“Kneeling is for you southrons. We’re free folk, we ought not to be kneeling at all.”

Jon’s tent came to view, along the craggy, cold rocks. There was already a group crowded around his tent, waiting. The crowd parted. “Then maybe there’s just not as much difference as you’d like to believe.”

Her eyes were hard. “You expect me to kneel to you, Snow? You expect me to follow?”

“I expect nothing,” he said with a shrug. “I’m going south of the Wall. If you want to go as well then you should come along too. You’re welcome to stay behind if you’d prefer.”

“I remember when you were nothing but a boy kneeling in front of Mance,” Val called after him. “You were a scared little boy with not a clue of how things worked.”

He brushed into his tent to change his cloak and leathers, swapping to the giant fur cloak the children gave him, and bronze disk armour mail over boiled leather. He kept Dark Sister on his hip, but he placed another two daggers in his belt. There was dried salted meat – seal, Jon guessed – with bread and a deep flash of rich goat’s milk and honey waiting for him. A tribute from Mother Mole. He wolfed it down to break his fast as he dressed.

He saw the crowd gathering. It was early, but the free folk gathered fast. Jon clad himself with all the grace he could muster, and set out to walk towards the crowd of stony-eyed men and women waiting for him.

Ghost stuck by his side. Furs, Hatch, Ulf, Rolf, Haldur, Erik and a dozen more walked behind him. The crowd parted for him as he headed to the heart tree.

It looked like the whole camp had gathered for him. The raider leaders and chieftains stood at the front – maybe eighty of them. All wildlings leaders, some of him that he recognised, many he did not. The Weeper stood more forward than any of them, standing with his arms forward and a new scythe on his back. After the battle, the Weeper’s throat was red and scarred and his breathing was haggard, but the raider still stood stiff and fearsome as ever. He’s a strong man.

The leaders were surrounded by their men – the raiders, warriors and spearwives, all clutching weapons. Circling around them all, there were crowds of refugees and free folk, all trying to see like this was some sort of ceremony. Jon glimpsed many – thousands – with white stones standing as far to the front as they could push their way through. The sight of so many people sent his breath away.

Thirty thousand. There were large towns with far fewer numbers than that.

There was a deep rumble, and heavy footsteps. Jon heard the shadows large creatures, rumbling forward. In the crowd, the giants stood hip and torso over the top of every other men. Giants, at least dozen of them. Jon knew the giant clans had been lingering around the cape – they tended to be antisocial towards humans – but he guessed that the Other’s assault had finally forced them into the camp itself.

One lumbered ahead towards the weirwood. Thirteen foot tall and with a grey shaggy pelt, staring downwards at the Jon. The giant’s broad, hairy face was indecipherable. The giant wore nothing but a necklace of bones.

Ghost pressed as close to Jon’s leg as he could. Jon was the centre of attention.

“Well, looky here,” the Lord of Bones shouted mockingly from the back, but even his voice was cautious. “The King Snow himself.”

“Rattleshirt,” Jon said with a nod, causing the man to glare. He looked around the group. “Garth. Harle. Morna. Gerrick. Varamyr.” Jon felt Ghost’s hackles raise at the sight of the other skinchanger. Varamyr Sixskins had lost his familiars except for his eagle and a single wolf, looking dishevelled, worn and bitter. That eagle glared at Jon with pure hatred. Some of the wildlings were so distinct he recognised them from their reputations alone. He gave them all passing glances. “Gurn. Ygon. Agnes. Soren.”

Jon turned to stare at a young man – broadly built, arms folded, with blue warpaint over his face. He had a strong jaw, and bronze piercings in his ears and brow. It took a couple of seconds for Jon to place him.

“… Sigorn, Magnar of Thenn,” Jon said finally. “I knew your father only briefly.”

“The crows ambushed my father and took him for dead.” Sigorn’s voice was rough. Unused to the Common. “Cowards ambushing a retreating foe. I will see all crows dead for that.”

Jon didn’t reply. He kept his gaze steady as he stared around the group, glancing around. They all clutched weapons, all with hard, disheveled appearances. The lords and ladies of the north.

“The crows are fools,” Jon said after a long pause. Now wasn’t the time for sentimentality. “They’ve been fighting free folk and you’ve been fighting them. I don’t care.”
Some rippled. “The real enemy isn’t the Night’s Watch,” Jon continued, meeting Sigorn’s eyes. “The real enemy is the same one that forced you from your lands. The Others that bring the cold. That’s only enemy that matters now. The crows will realise that soon enough.”

Rattleshirt spat. “I think you are a crow,” he said angrily. “I think you haven’t turned your back on them at all. I think in your heart of hearts you’re still black.”

“I won’t deny it,” Jon replied. “But I’m not fighting for them now. I’m fighting for the living.”

“Why should we trust the word of a crow?” A voice demanded. Jon noted how the Weeper stayed quiet. “We should kill you right now for what your lot done.”

“Go ahead and try.” Jon kept his hand close to Dark Sister. “But do you really think you’re more likely to survive without me?”

No one replied. All eyes gazed suspiciously.

“You lead a monster,” a large man bellowed, in a voice so gruff Jon could barely understand him. “A demon. I name you demon too.”

A man stomped forward, clutching a bone spear. He wasn’t that tall, but he was the broadest man Jon had ever seen. So broad-shouldered and stocky that he looked like a pillar of leather of flesh. The wildling wore layers of seal skin and furs, with a shaggy beard spilling over his mouth and tusks sewn into his hood. A Walrus man from the Frozen Shore.

“We haven’t been introduced.”

“I am Great Walrus.” Ah. “Chief of my people. You are demon. Vengeance must have blood.”

“It would not be wise to try.”

“You think our history is joke? Our ancestors?”

He stepped forward, but kept his voice low. “I think most here would be dead in the forest if it weren’t for Sonagon.”

He put enough of a barb into the words to cut through the air. I’ve played this game before. They’ll try to put you on the defensive. Don’t lose control.

“And why should let you lord over us?” Another man cut in for Great Walrus indignantly. A man with a bushy red beard. Gerrick Kingsblood. “You want us to kneel? To beg?”

“No. You should follow me because I control Sonagon.”

“Yes,” a voice muttered. “Now isn’t that a trick?

Jon turned towards Varamyr. The small scrawny man was sitting cross-legged. His wolf, a large grey shaggy animal, bared its teeth. His gaze was dark. “You have something to say?”

There were other people glancing at Varamyr too, looking between skinchangers. “You ain’t the only warg, boy. I’ve been a skinchanger for for years longer than you,” Varamyr said, his voice low. “You’re still learning. I reckon I could steal that dragon off you.”

Jon’s eyes narrowed. Ghost’s hackles were raised, staring at Varamyr. “Try it,” Jon challenged, keeping his voice stiff. Show no weakness. Not here. How confident are you feeling, Varamyr?
There was a moment of quiet. For a minute, Jon was scared. Varamyr was supposed by the greatest skinchanger, after all. Jon couldn’t imagine Sonagon ever surrendering easily, but what if Varamyr really was that powerful? Varamyr could wear six skins at once, while Jon struggled with only two.

Still, then Jon saw the flicker in Varamyr’s eyes. That doubt, uncertainty. Varamyr might be powerful, but he was also a craven. He wasn’t going to risk it. Not now.

The moment stretched on. Varamyr averted his gaze slightly, a slight gesture of submission. Jon turned to face the free folk, his gaze solid – challenging. One problem at a time.

“You want to go south,” Jon said. “I can take you south. The Wall will stop your armies, but it can’t stop my dragon.”

“And in return?” The Lord of Bones demanded. “You want us to kneel?”

Jon tensed. This was the moment he had been dreaded, but there was no choice.

“No,” Jon replied. “In return, I want vows of fealty from each of you. They can be given standing up.”

The free folk rippled, muttering dangerously. Kneeling or not, Jon knew what he was asking them. He was asking the free folk to take him as their lord. Their king. No, Jon corrected, I’m demanding it.

“You what?” An older man demanded, among the chorus of angry voices. Soren Shieldbreaker. “You expect fealty?”

“You are no king of mine, Snow,” Val muttered, her arms crossed. There were mutters of agreement. In front of him, Sigorn spat curses in the Old Tongue.

Jon forced himself to say firm. He remembered how Ned Stark’s voice would cut through the air each time he addressed his vassals. “Who here was in the forest when the crows attacked?” Jon demanded, causing the voices to turn silent. “Who here was at the Frostfangs? Three hundred crows attacked us – three hundred against thousands. And they still slaughtered us.”

He heard the angry mutters. The Weeper stared strangely quiet, Jon noted. “The free folk are warriors,” Jon continued. “But no warrior can win a battle by himself. Not when every warrior is fighting by himself. If we want to survive – not just in the south, but against the Long Night – then we must fight together.”

“And you think you can lead us?” Rattleshirt growled. “You’re a boy.”

There were other murmurs. For the first time, the Weeper spoke up. “I never swore fealty to Mance,” he said gruffly. “I followed Mance, I fought for Mance, but I swore no fealty. And Mance never asked either. Mance knew how it worked; the free folk don’t kneel.”

There was warning in his voice. I have to push on, Jon thought, my position will not be stronger. They all owe their victory to me. Sonagon won the battle and they all know it. The camp is calling my name, I have influence that Mance never had. Press the advantage.

The free folk lived by their word. Every man lived and died by their honour. If enough swore fealty – publically – then that was a bound of honour as good as anything Jon could hope for.

Jon shook his head. “I will not take a haggle of clans south to be slaughtered,” he said. I will not lead an army of raiders and murderers to attack the north, he thought to himself. The free folk were dangerous; they would try to raid and pillage and Jon could not let that happen. “We will not last unless we can stand together and trust each other. To do that, I need your fealty.” His eyes narrowed. “If you can’t give me that, then you can stay behind.”

“Bah!” Soren Shieldbreaker snapped. “And what would you like us to swear? Promise to wipe your bloody ass? I have breeches older than you, boy.”

“You will swear to fight together – to follow my commands, to fight those I say are our enemies, and to make peace with those I say are our allies,” Jon said. “On your honour, to follow the truce I set out – and to seek retribution against any who break the peace we make today.”

“That sounds like a kneeler’s prayer to me,” Rattleshirt snarled, clutching his spear tightly.

The air was so tense that Jon could barely breathe. They are desperate, though, more desperate now than they had ever been with Mance. “And in return,” Jon continued, with barely a gulp. “I will swear fealty to all of you. I swear to protect those that follow me, to work for the best interest of us all. You fight for me and I’ll fight for you – I swear it. I swear it on my honour.”

Swearing myself to wildlings, Jon thought. He couldn’t help feel a tremble down his spine. Still, he met the Weeper’s gaze and looked him straight in the eyes. Jon prayed silently that there was no hesitation there. This is what I must do.

Rattleshirt and a few others looked defiant, but there were more whose gazes were flickering.
Nobody wanted to be the first to accept, Jon thought with a curse. Sigorn stepped forward threateningly. The man was a whole foot taller than Jon.

“I am Magnar of Thenn,” Sigorn growled roughly. “Leader of my people. My blood is of the old lords. I swear to no man – my people follow no Magnar but me.”

Sigorn’s eyes were furious. His father had been cold and intimidating, his son was more headstrong. “You would destroy the Thenns? Erase our culture? Our history?”

“No. Let every man follow their gods, their culture, their clans,” Jon said. “I will take none of that away from you. But you will follow me as well.”

Sigorn muttered a curse word that Jon didn’t understand, but he could easily translate. “Like hells I will.”

The Thenns are one of the strongest of the free folk tribes, Jon thought. The most advanced, most disciplined. I need them.

“Then leave,” said Jon, his voice dangerously low. “Leave my camp.”

Sigorn’s eyes flashed. The air felt so dangerous it might snap. Jon glanced around, before pulling out Dark Sister from his belt. The black blade glittered in the grey sunlight.

“It’s either that, or we settle this the Old Way,” said Jon. “If you want to rule, then prove you deserve it. Fight, and if I win you swear fealty to me.”

The Magnar of Thenn growled, before drawing two broad bronze blades from his waist, swinging them in strong strikes. Of course this would be the only way to settle the matter. The free folk will only ever follow strength. Give them a reason to follow me, not Sonagon.

But I don’t have to beat them all – just the first two or three.
Sigorn was about ten years older than Jon, and a warrior proven. Taller, broader, more muscled; he had probably killed his first man before twelve. The Magnar’s son and heir would have to be strong.

He remembered that Mance had to defeat the Styr three times before he agreed to follow Mance. Jon wondered how many defeats it would take Sigorn before he agreed to swear to Jon.

The raiders parted wordlessly. Jon saw Val watching intently. He was exhausted and worn from fighting all night, but the others would be too and there was no choice. There wouldn’t be a better time than now; when the memories of the Others and the dragon were still fresh and raw in everyone’s minds.

Sigorn held his two short bronze blades, broad like the scimitars of the Free Cities. Jon clutched Dark Sister in one hand, staying light and keeping his leg bent. His left leg was stiff, but Jon had learnt how to compensate for it.

\textit{Sigorn is bigger and stronger than I am, but I’m probably faster with better form. End this quickly.}

A raspy war cry burst from Sigorn’s throat as he charged. The Magnar was powerful like a bull, both blades swinging in brutal slashes. Jon stepped forward to meet him, bringing down Dark Sister so fast the air whooshed.

He saw Sigorn flinch and prepare to lock blades, yet then, at the very last moment, Jon twisted to one side to avoid the clash. He dodged, spinning around. Sigorn overreached himself trying to turn, while his blade swept downwards at Sigorn’s heel.

The flat of Dark Sister collided with his ankle sharply. Sigorn crashed downwards. \textit{Too aggressive and too wild}, he thought. \textit{Ser Rodrik would have smacked me if I had ever tried to charge like that. Skill and speed beats size and strength every single time.}

“Yield,” Jon said, stepping back. Sigorn growled and spat on the floor, recovering quickly. The young warrior jumped up, swinging both blades as he charged again.

This time, Sigorn was more cautious, he didn’t extend himself as much. Still, Sigorn was too used to fighting with strength; he would always go for the quick and brutal kill. Jon feigned an opening and Sigorn took it, and then Sigorn was crashing to the ground again, this time with a bloody cut along his hip.

He cursed violently in the Old Tongue. Jon kept himself calm, composed. “Yield,” Jon repeated more forcefully, drawing Dark Sister again. Sigorn recovered, but he was limping too.

Ghost growled and yelped as Sigorn charged again, but Jon held him back. Dark Sister danced between both of Sigorn’s blades for half a dozen strokes, before it slashed against Sigorn’s shoulder.

The man screamed in pain, thrashing powerfully with his sword in anger, but Jon ducked under the blade, and came up into Sigorn’s chest. Jon’s knuckles rang as his fist collided firmly with Sigorn’s jaw.

His knuckles stung. It felt like he cut himself on Sigorn’s tooth, but his leather gloves were thick. The blow knocked the Thenn backwards in shock, spitting blood.

Sigorn roared and tried to recover, but Dark Sister was already pointing at his chest. The blade poked lightly into his furs.
“I will not kill you, Magnar,” Jon said. “But I have no problem maiming you. If you fight me again, you will lose a body part.”

He glared, but Jon caught the flicker in his eyes too. Why is it that so many young men are willing to fight to the death, yet the thought of being crippled scares them?

Jon lowered his blade. Sigorn hesitated for a good few seconds, meeting Jon’s eyes. He knew if there had been any doubt in him then Sigorn wouldn’t have backed down.

Still, the man’s face twisted, but he took a step backwards. Young, Jon decided, but not stupid.

Jon turned to the other free folk. The air felt tense. “Anybody else?” He demanded. “Step forward now or hold your peace.”

Jon’s gaze searched around the raiders and warriors. He saw them rippling, glancing around to see who would go forward first. His gaze lingered on Rattleshirt, who stiffened as if he was about to step forward. He cradled Dark Sister, staring as the Lord of the Bones glared and moved—

“Aye,” a hoarse voice said suddenly, before Rattleshirt had a chance. “Snow, I’ll take that challenge.”

Jon blinked as the Weeper stepped forward, rolling his shoulders slowly. The crowd muttered. The Weeper’s watery eyes narrowed.

“Weeper,” Jon muttered, cursing himself. The Weeper lifted his scythe slowly. He had been standing so quiet.

“I warned you that we were going to have words,” the Weeper growled. “If you want my fealty, Snow, then I want you to bleed for it.”

Damn. Jon had come to rely on the Weeper – even trust the man – but Jon had let himself forget. The Weeper was a brutal raider, exceptionally cruel even by wildling standards. Maybe I finally pushed him too far.

Still, Jon couldn’t back down. He refused to show any hesitation here. He just nodded curtly, his body tensing. “Then draw your—”

His voice was cut off as the Weeper’s scythe blurred. He barely raised Dark Sister in time. He didn’t roar as he attacked, there was no warning. Jon grunted as the scythe blade hacked against Valyrian steel.

“You are a boy, Snow,” the Weeper snarled, not pausing for a second. “You presume too much. I’ve been killing and raiding since before your father ever got horny – you want me to swear to you?”

His scythe swirled. It was a wicked blade. Jon couldn’t dodge in time, he had to parry, but the scythe was so large and powerful he could barely stop it. Each time Dark Sister collided it took notches out of the bronze scythe head, but the Weeper didn’t seem to care.

Jon gasped as the blows forced him backwards. His hands could barely keep up.

“If you want to be king,” the Weeper roared, “then fight for it.”

Dark Sister slashed. The Weeper sidestepped the blow and then swung his scythe around from the side. Jon barely darted backwards in time, stumbling over his bad leg. The Weeper was still swinging – every blow he made swept wide and viciously fast.

A scythe was a cumbersome weapon – it looked fearsome but usually it was more useful for cutting corn than battle. The wooden shaft was too vulnerable and it needed too much space to swing. Still, the Weeper wielded it expertly, swinging faster and faster and using its length to force Jon backwards.

My sword is lighter, I should be able to strike three times for every one of his, Jon thought. Yet he struggled to even keep up. The Weeper matched him blow for blow.

The air was deathly quiet except for the ringing of blades. The whole camp watched.

Jon grunted as he charged forward, swinging between swipes. The Weeper darted to one side, bringing his scythe up at Jon’s leg. It came so close that Jon felt the edge brush past his knee.

Another inch and Jon would have lost a leg. The Weeper isn’t holding back. Jon felt his hands shaking as the fear hit him. That fear of death you felt when you realised your opponent was stronger.

The Weeper is better than Sigorn. Much, much better. Sigorn had been young, strong but untrained – so full of openings that Jon could run circles around him. The Weeper was different; his stance was fluid and perfect, a seamless confidence from a life of fighting. He had an obscure weapon, but he swung it as if the hooked scythe was an extension of his arm. If there was any weakness in his style, Jon couldn’t see it. Not when the Weeper was trying to hack him to shreds.

“Fight, Snow!” The Weeper growled. Can’t dodge him forever, need to get in close, Jon cursed. Every step forward risked losing a limb. “Fight!”

He barely deflected the scythe with his blade, the hooked end coming so close it could have cut his fur open. Jon grunted. His arms struggled to even stop the hold the scythe back, and then–

He gasped with a dull ‘oomph’, feeling the butt of the scythe collide into his chest. He nearly doubled over. The Weeper struck out again, but by pure instinct he managed to dodge. He narrowly avoided the first blow, and then the Weeper’s fist slammed into Jon’s jaw.

He could feel his teeth rattle. Blood in his mouth. His head spun so badly he couldn’t even feel the pain.

Still, Jon didn’t hold back. A wordless cry burst from his lips as he slammed forward. As the scythe deflected, he charged up close swinging Dark Sister. The Weeper caught his sword hand with one arm, leaving Jon open to slam his other fist into the man’s nose.

There was a solid thud. Jon had instinctively been expecting the man to flinch or roll backwards.

Instead, the Weeper headbutted Jon’s knuckles.

His knuckles cracked, he screamed in pain through clenched teeth. Blood spurted from the Weeper’s nose, but the man didn’t even seem to feel it.

The Weeper slammed his knee into his chest. Jon slammed his shoulder into the Weeper’s chest. The older man staggered, before headbutting him straight in the forehead.

Jon stumbled. His sword slashed upwards, catching Weeper by surprise. He drew blood along the Weeper’s arm, but the raider didn’t even flinched. Does the man even feel pain?
Then the Weeper’s scythe slashed, clipping Jon across the thigh. He couldn’t help it – it hurt, and Jon screamed.

All eyes were on him. He could feel the pain, but he still staggered upwards.

“You call that a fight, Snow?” The Weeper grunted, despite his nose pouring with blood. “I’ve wrestled giants. I’ve seen more wars than you have years. I’ve murdered more people than you’ve ever met. You got to do more than that if you want to beat me.”

Jon’s teeth clenched, feeling his head pound. There was blood from his forehead, dripping over his brow. His hands clenched his sword so tightly it hurt.

He heard snapping split the air. Ghost was there – fangs bared as the direwolf approached the Weeper dangerously.

“No!” Jon shouted, throwing up his hand. His sword was raised even as his leg trembled weakly.

“Ghost! Stay back!”

The Weeper only grunted. Nobody said a word.

All skill was gone. Jon held nothing back – he didn’t dare. He wouldn’t win in a fight, and the battle dissolved into a brawl.

Jon growled as he limped forward, Dark Sister slashing. The scythe cut against his shoulder, but Jon took the cut to get closer to the Weeper and didn’t stop.

They clashed, trying to overpower each over. Jon met fury with fury.

“Weak!” The Weeper howled, kneeling him in the chest, even as Jon’s elbow smashed against his jaw. “Useless! Weak!”

Jon gasped breathlessly. He was bloody, but the Weeper was bloody too. The wildlings watching weren’t staring at him as if he were weak though.

Jon felt the butt of the scythe crack against his head. He staggered, but didn’t pause as he swung Dark Sister upwards.

The Weeper was winning, but that didn’t mean Jon had to let him win easily. Don’t back down, not for a second, he thought. Never back down.

Across from him, he glimpsed Rattleshirt’s eyes flicker.

“You’re a green summer boy!” The Weeper spat. “You know nothing of our ways, and you expect to lead us!”

“… Yes,” Jon gasped, spinning out with Dark Sister. The Weeper was driven backwards for a second, before Jon’s strength failed and the Weeper scythe nearly cut his chest open.

Jon fell backwards, but he still groaned as the Weeper’s scythe grazed across his chest. His bronze plate armour blocked the edge, but the strike still hit bruised ribs. “Then you’re a fool,” the Weeper snarled.

Jon staggered. A young free folk with a white stone on his furs and an axe in hand rushed to Jon’s aid, but Jon glared at the boy.

“Keep back!” Jon snapped through gritted teeth, gasping as he straightened up to face the Weeper.
again. The boy looked confused. Ghost paced restlessly. Jon glimpsed Val folding her arms. Jon forced himself to straighten up, wielding Dark Sister with both hands.

The scythe clashed. Jon took a few blows, before the scythe took his sword straight out of his trembling hands. Jon nearly stumbled over his feet as he fell, gasping weakly.

Dark Sister landed on the snow ten feet away. Jon panted, casting a glance at his sword, before taking a deep breath, straightening up, and raising his fists.

There was a pause. The Weeper grunted, dropped his scythe and stepped forward, swinging a heavy blow. Jon took the punch and replied with a blow of his own. The Weeper’s punches were more powerful, devastating like hammer strikes, yet Jon still met each one with a dull consistency.

They wrestled. Jon didn’t give an inch, even as the Weeper tried to grab him by the collar and pummel him in the chest. “… You… Fucking…” The Weeper panted through grunts of exertion. “… Bloody… Boy!”

The final blow hit him. A rough punch collided with Jon’s jaw, sending him backwards into the snow. His face was bruised, bloody and gashed.

The Weeper stood over him. There was a moment of pause, then the Weeper finally winced and rubbed his knuckles in pain.

Jon gasped, spitting out a bloody gulp between the pants of breath. I’ve lost a tooth, Jon realised dumbly. He felt one of his bottom molars crack. Still, he sighed and staggered up to his feet again.

The moment paused. All eyes stared at him unblinkingly as Jon raised trembling fists.

“You’re a soft summer boy, Jon Snow,” The Weeper declared. The blood dripped off his whiskers. “You’re as pretty as a girl, you’ve got no heart for war, you’re as naïve as a fool, and there are days when I think you’ve got nothing but snow between your ears.”

Jon didn’t object to any of that, mostly because his jaw was still trembling. He didn’t dare open his mouth.

“… Still,” the Weeper continued with an resigned grunt. “You say what you believe and you fight for what you say. You’re not a liar and you’re not a craven.”

Jon stared incredulously, or tried to, at least. One of his eyes was bruised shut, and there was blood stinging against the other. His hands were still shaking. The Weeper’s head cocked as he looked at him.

“I asked you to bleed for me, and you did.” The Weeper nodded. His face was bruised and bloody too. He cracked his knuckles with a quiet wince, admitting, “… You’re a hell of a fighter, Jon Snow.”

Slowly, the Weeper pulled a dagger from his belt. They all watched as the Weeper lifted the dagger upwards, and cut the blade across the palm of his other hand deeply. The blood dripped against the snow.

“You want my fealty? My vow, and my scythe – it’s yours,” the Weeper promised, still cutting the blade into his palm. “I’ll fight for you.”

The statement was loud enough that everyone heard it. It wasn’t a long vow, but enough to cause the free folk to ripple. The Weeper nodded at Jon, still staggering for breath, before picking up his scythe and turning away.

“Next person who challenges King Snow…!” The Weeper shouted, glaring at the other raiders. “Fights me in his stead.”

The Weeper cast wary eyes at Rattleshirt. The Lord of Bones glared but didn’t stand forward.

“Aye,” A voice called. Jon saw Old Man Harwick walk forward, hands open. “I watched Jon Snow fighting on the ice last night. Never saw a man fight so hard. He fought for us then, and he fights for us now. I’ll give him fealty. I don’t care if he used to be a crow.” Following the Weeper’s lead, Harwick took a bone dagger and cut it roughly against his palm. “… He looks like a king to me.”

There was a pause. Slowly, Sigorn stood up again, still clutching his wounded arm. The warrior looked at Jon, who was barely standing up, with a bit less anger in his eyes. Sigorn shouted something in the Old Tongue, before reluctantly cutting the palm of his hand and letting the blood drip in front of Jon.

Jon didn’t understand the words, but he caught the meaning. There was a strange mixture of anger and begrudging respect in the Magnar’s eyes.

After that, more and more men started to stand forward. Starting with the free folk Jon knew from Hardhome, but even the newer arrivals were coming forward, one after another. Some came hesitantly, some came proudly, but they came. The Great Walrus spat and screamed at the men, but Jon could feel the tide shifting.

Even as Furs helped carry Jon to his tent, around him the whole camp was rippling.

Mother Mole was waiting for him, a pot of warm water already pre-boiled. Jon collapsed onto a stool, while the old, wizened wood witch prepared a bowl of herbs.

“You fight too hard,” Mother Mole warned. Jon winced as the poultice touched the gash on his face. “This will scar.”

“Yes,” Jon agreed, thinking about the Weeper. “I expect it will.”

Mother Mole didn’t say another word as she tended to his wounds. She was a skilled healer; she tended to his wounds and bruises with salts and poultices. Jon cast a glance at the chain of white stones around the wood witch’s neck.

There were still men crowding around his tent. Jon’s body was sore and bloody, but he forced himself to stay upright. He could feel the words spreading through the camp. The free folk were a proud people. They would give their fealties in person, and Jon needed to be upright for them.

Old Man Harwick swore fealty and gifted Jon a large horn, eight foot long banded in gold and graven in runes of the First Men. It was a fine gift, and he also offered Jon one of his daughters, to which Jon had to politely smile and refuse. Big Agnes tributed a shadowskin fur coat, Gurn offered a steel engraved longsword, Ygon Oldfather presented a massive mammoth’s tusk, and Harle the Huntsman gave a huge oak longbow. He got seven more offers of daughters and sisters from the free folk clan leaders, as well as many more tributes. The weirdest was Morna White Mask, a warrior witch, who swore loyalty and offered to bear him exactly six sons.

Some gave gifts, others brought terms. Gavin the Trader haggled like a fishwife – demanding new swords and horses for his sons, positions in the warbands before offering an iron cuirass and mail in tribute. Bullden Horn demanded a new ship for his raiders. Soren Shieldbreaker forced a promise to match his son with a daughter from a rival clan. Gerrick Kingsblood had to be bribed with engraved silver bands before he swore fealty.

“I’m not sure about you, Snow,” the Lord of Seals said grudgingly, his fat chin wobbling. He hesitated squeamishly before bringing the knife to his hand. “But you’re the only one who seems to have a chance to save us, so aye – I’ll kneel. In return for my fealty, I want you to give me command of the ships. Any boat that my men built belongs to me – promise that.”

The terms tasted bitter, but Jon had no choice there. The Lord of Seals was the closest thing they had to an admiral in any case, unfortunately. Jon agreed, wincing as Mother Mole applied ointment to his wounds. He gave the Lord of Seals the one of captured galleons under the promise to get it manned. He gave the other two ships to other bay raiders, Devyn Sealskinner and Bloodtooth.

Outside, Jon heard the sound of fighting and arguing. There was screaming and brawls in the camp between free folk who refused to give fealty against Jon’s supporters. By late evening the word had spread; either give fealty or leave. Jon forced himself to stay in his tent, taking deep breaths as he listened to the camp rippling. Judging from the shouting, Jon had more supporters than he had opponents.

Eventually, Val came before him. She came between an aging raider called Garth and Harma’s brother Halleck. The wildling woman’s arms were folded, her eyes dark. “You put a good fight,” she said.

“Thank you, my lady,” Jon said with a nod, his body wincing.

Her lips twisted. “I’m no southron lady, Snow.”

“Yes, my lady.”

She rolled her eyes softly. “Tell me something,” Val said, “was that a mummer’s act? You knew they were threatened by you, so you arranged with the Weeper to fight to prove yourself.”

“No. There was no act.”

“So then…?”

“The Weeper legitimately tried to kill me.”

“Huh. And what do you intend to do about that?”

“I suspect he’s going to act very smug.” One problem at a time.

Jon suspected that it could have easily gone either way for the Weeper. Somewhere during the fight the Weeper must have made the decision. If Jon hadn’t have fought back well enough, the Weeper would have killed him – and he would have gambled on Varanyr maybe controlling the dragon. I was wrong, the Weeper had the right of it. Dragon or not, the free folk only follow the man.

Val scratched her chin. “I think you got lucky, Snow,” she said. “If the Lord of Bones had been the one to step forward, then you would have lost.”

“I could have beat Rattleshirt.”

“Doubtful. You ain’t ever seen him fight.” She cocked her head. “But if you had, you would have had to kill him and that wouldn’t made you no friends either.”

“Perhaps.” Jon looked at her, wincing again as Mother Mole applied a wet, soft stone to an ugly bruise on his back. “What do you want, my lady?”

“I care for my sister,” Val said. “If you want my fealty – then that’s my price. You protect my sister and her babe. Promise that.”

“Good. Then take my vow as well.” She took a knife and cut her palm without a second’s pause. There was already a dark stain of blood on the ground. The drips of blood dripped slowly. “For you, Snow.”

With that, Val turned to leave, sweeping out of the tent. She paused at the door. “Now what is your southron term again…?” She mused, sarcastically. “… ‘Your Grace’?”

Jon sighed, leaning back after she left. “… I promise,” he repeated to himself. He could barely protect himself some days.

He heard the brawls escalate outside. Jon’s presence would only inflame things so he left it for his supporters to handle. There were a few free folk that protested, but they were in the minority. Furs and Hatch went to negotiate with the giants, and then Haldur reported that the Great Walrus was dead – he died in a mob and stomped to death by Jon’s followers. Apparently the Walrus Men would elect a new chieftain. The next Great Walrus would probably be much more diplomatic.

Only two clans were actually defiant enough to let themselves be chased out of Hardhome rather than give fealty. Through Ghost’s eyes, in the camp Jon saw mobs form of his supporters.

Towards the very back of the crowd, the Lord of Bones stomped in. The scrawny man looked in a foul mood, his shirt crackling. “I don’t trust you Snow.” Rattleshirt spat, a thick glob splattering on the ground. “I think you’re a fucking boy that couldn’t give a damn about anything north of your precious Wall. But you’ve forced the others to bend, so I’ll do the same. I give you my fealty, and I’ll honour it. I’m a man of my word.”

His eyes were dark as he drew a knife. “But just know this – the moment you break your vow, I’ll do the same. The moment you stop acting for the free folk, I swear it, at that moment my spear is going to be the first through your back.”

Jon watched as the blood dripped onto the ground. Rattleshirt didn’t even winced. “Thank you for your fealty, Lord of Bones, I will honour it,” said Jon, lowering his head.

Rattleshirt just scoffed, already bandaging up his hand as he stormed out of the tent.

Vaguely, Jon wondered where the gesture of cutting your hand and bleeding as sign of fealty came from. He was in no position to complain, but there would be a lot of people with bandaged hands and trouble clutching their swords come tomorrow.

It was dusk before Mother Mole left, Jon’s wounds safely patched up and body stinking of foul ointment. The camp was still in an uproar, but Jon was so woozy he could barely sit upright. Ghost nuzzled up to him protectively, and finally it became late enough that Jon figured it was safe to go to sleep.

At unspoken command, Ghost stood guard over him – just in case any of the unhappy wildlings tried to take out their new king.

King. No more avoiding that title. This is my responsibility.
Some coronation, Jon thought with a sigh. I became king by fighting a battle, then being beaten bloody in a duel, and the bleeding out in a tent while they haggled over fealty. The free folk most definitely made you work for it.

Still, Jon knew that Rattleshirt spoke the truth. Even if they gave him fealty now, as soon as Jon broke his own promises, all wagers were off.

My promises, he thought. Oh, so, so many promises.

He had promised the Night’s Watch he would commit himself to the black. He promised Qhorin that he would do whatever it took to infiltrate the wildlings. He had promised Mance that he would fight for him. Jon had even promised himself to Ygritte, and he didn’t even knew where she was.

He had promised the three-eyed crow that he would do anything to fight against the Others. He had promised Sonagon that he could keep the dragon safe. Every leader forced their own promises, their demands. And Jon had promised all of the wildlings that he would take them south.

‘Promise you’ll protect my sister’. ‘Promise to protect our sons’. ‘Promise us food, promise us victory’. ‘Promise you’ll save our culture, our families, our traditions’. ‘Promise me ships, promise me war, promise me loyalty’…

It was starting to feel like every promise was just another chain around his neck, and there were so, so many promises. He had bought his ‘crown’, as absent as it was, with promises.

Sooner or later, Jon thought as his vision started to fade, one of my promises is going to finally kill me.

Perhaps that is what they will write on my tomb, he mused sleepily. The king who promised.

Melisandre

The ship creaked dangerously, low in the water and unstable. They had left sight of the coast hours ago, and no sailing on open water. It made navigation treacherous, but there had been no choice. Nobody had wanted to risk the monster that could be chasing them.

There had been another ship to escape the bay with them; the Bountiful Harvest and the Ghiscari Prince. The ice had wrecked the Ghiscari Prince’s rudder, however, and she had consistently fell behind ever since they made their escape. Axell Florent had refused to wait or turn to help her, and so they left the cog and all two hundred men on-board behind. Likely those men were already dead.

The Bountiful Harvest was a big ship, but it was still filled to the brim far over capacity. They had rescued five hundred men, yet still had to leave hundreds of soldiers behind to die on the ice. Melisandre had never walked through a ship so cramped.

The decks were as sombre as the ones she had known as a child, but those ships had been filled with weeping and chains.

Five hundred men. Out of the four thousand they had brought, it was a sobering and miserable defeat and a treacherous journey back. Still, they were five hundred of the most devout men Melisandre had ever seen – grasping to a level of faith that could rival any Red Priest.
“We’ve got a strong north east wind,” the captain reported, a hefty man. Formerly the navigator, but there had been many changes in command recently. “We’re not getting back to Eastwatch without a westerly wind.”

Lord Axell Florent bristled. His fat ruffled under his fox fur cloak. “And what of the queen? What of our ships? We must return to Eastwatch with all haste.”

“I’m sorry, m’lord, but the headwind is wrong and we’re overburdened. We would have to tack, but we’re in open waters now.” The man looked nervous. “Perhaps if we kept heading southeast to Braavos, for supplies and repairs before…”

“Armies of savagery and darkness are about to descend on Westeros!” Lord Florent snapped, eyes bulging. “And the Queen and the Princess are right in their path! Eastwatch will be the first to fall. Do your duty, captain, and take us to Eastwatch.”

The man squirmed. “But the wind…!”

“The Lord of Light shall provide in our hour of need,” Melisandre said, cutting in smoothly. “Rest assured, captain, you shall have your westerly wind.”

She still had some power stored from the battle in her ruby. It was shame to waste it on something as petty as a steady gale, but needs must.

The captain gulped, but nodded and turned. Lord Florent staggered, but then bowed to her. He bowed. She had to keep the amusement off her face.

Did I ever imagine as a child that great lords would bow to me?

“My lady,” his voice was choked. “… Many of the men… many are disheartened… we were hoping for a sermon, to pray for the Lord…”

“But of course,” said Melisandre. “We shall pray together at dawn, in the glory of the rising sun. Yet forgive me, I must see to our king.”

“Oh. Oh but of course.” The lord gulped. “How is His Grace? His injury…?”

“Not well. But he shall be better.”

The king's quarters were the only deserted cabin on the ship. The knights and lords were cramped into corridors, but they had still reserved a cabin for her and the king. My king.

They all heard Stannis scream and gasp as his wound had been boiled and cauterized. The sound was almost as disheartening as their disastrous defeat.

Despite everything, though, Melisandre couldn't help but feel… elevated. Excited, even. It is grim, but we face the darkest hour. I know that dawn is coming.

For so long, she had been questioning, sometimes even doubting, but no more. She had seen the enemy. She knew her purpose, she knew her foe. It had been powerful and immense, but the thought of that cold night still caused her to smile.

It was one thing to believe, but to see it in the flesh… the memory still made her shiver.

Just as it was in my fires, it came true. I have never been more powerful.

The king's cabin was sparse, empty and quiet. Stannis Baratheon looked paler and more gaunt than she had ever seen. The flames had seared his wrist, leaving only a bloody stump bandaged in cotton. He looked like a skeleton of the proud lord she had first lay eyes upon.

“Your Grace,” Melisandre said with a deep curtsy.

He didn't reply. “We are three days from Eastwatch. We will have a good wind,” she continued.
“We cannot stay at Eastwatch, of course, not with the Champion’s army so close.”

Stannis's eyes stared at the wall. She walked forward. “Many of the men are scared, your grace,” she said. “The sight of you, their champion, would do much to–”

“How many?” The question was quiet and sharp.

She stopped. He didn’t look at her.

“How many men do we have?”

Melisandre’s eyes flickered. “Five hundred on this ship. We left another five hundred behind at Eastwatch, with six ships.”

“A thousand,” Stannis said, sounding hollow. “Less, even. I have just suffered the greatest defeat of my life.”

“Your Grace…”

“Davos…” he said, almost croaking. “Lord Davos. Where…?”

“He did not survive, Your Grace.” That was a lie. One of the very few lies she had ever told him, actually. “He died on the ice.”

She was sorry about the Onion Lord. Lord Davos had been a good man; she bore him no ill will.
But his refusal to accept the True God was his downfall. He had been wounded and delirious when they met on the ice, but Melisandre had felt the intent from him. Davos had been misguided enough to blame her for what happened.

Still, Melisandre did not kill him. She cracked the ice under his feet with the Lord’s heat, but she took precautions so that he would survive. During the battle, Melisandre had been so swollen with power at the time it had been easy. She had seen in her fires that Lord Davos would always be loyal to Stannis, and so Melisandre ensured his survival such that the Onion Lord might recover and find his way to his king's side once more.

Stannis’ jaw clenched. “His… son… the boy…” he muttered, sounding half-delirious. “My squire.
He was brave, very brave. Devan Seaworth deserves a knighthood, and his father's lands.”

“I think that is a grand idea, Your Grace.” It would please her to see the Lord Davos’ family in good stead, the man deserved that much.

His eyes seemed to focus, and darken. “You knew.” The words were a growl. “You let it happen.”

“I gave you every warning, Your Grace.”

“It was a dragon.”

“The dragon is just a beast. The true threat is the Champion of Night – the man that controls the beast.”
“The champion… I watched him cut down thirty knights. Thirty. What sort of man could do that? It’s…” His hand went towards his stump gingerly. There was a quiver in his voice. “The way he moved… I’ve never seen a sword move that fast…”

Melisandre stayed quiet. “He let me live,” Stannis murmured, “to mock me. I could see it in his eyes. He taunted me by watching me run…”

He was sweating despite the cold. A fever. “It was a defeat, Your Grace.”

“A defeat.” His eyes glared. “You promised me victory. You said the words, you gave me the glowing sword. You said I was promised.”

“Your Grace forgets his scripture,” Melisandre said, keeping her voice smooth. “Remember that Azor Ahai knew failure twice before he achieved success. Should I retell the tale?”

His body tensed, but he didn’t reply. She swept around him, dress brushing against the floor as she kneeled by his chair. “Azor Ahai tried thrice to forge Lightbringer. He slaved and he laboured for each blade, and each failure cut away at him, breaking part of him. But after each defeat, he stood up again, collected up the pieces, to forge something new. A weapon.” Her hand softly caressed Stannis’ cheekbones. “First, Azor Ahai laboured for thirty days and nights to forge a great blade of fine metal – a sword adorned with discipline and honour – and he stabbed it into the heart of a great lion to test the steel, yet the blade proved too weak and broke.”

There was no response. “And, so, Azor Ahai laboured for fifty days and nights, to forge a new weapon. He hammered his blade, his second sword, and went to temper it in icy water. The ice proved too cold, and the blade shattered. His second defeat.” Her hand stroked his shoulders gently. “Two defeats, Your Grace; one by lion and the other by ice. Do you remember what was required for the third attempt?”

She saw his eyes flicker. His shoulders were trembling slightly. “… Answer me now,” he muttered. “No more riddles, no more prophecies. Tell me everything you know.”

“If you are ready to hear it, then of course I will. I have never lied about your destiny, Your Grace.” That was true; she had never lied. Occasionally Melisandre kept some details to herself, but there were no lies.

“That… boy… he will lead his army and his dragon onto the realm.”

“He will.” The visions had been unmistakable – the boy would be Stannis Baratheon’s greatest enemy.

“And the realm will fall.”

“Yes, Your Grace,” she said sadly. “But you must stop him.”

“I will face him again?” His voice quivered. She had him.

“You will. The fires told me that you will face him three times.” It had been very clear, the number three constantly reoccurring. “The first has just happened. The first battle was always to be a defeat, but in the second battle you will draw to a standstill.”

“And in the third?”

“In the final battle, the fate of the world will hang in the balance. You must win.”
He took a deep breath, still trembling. Stannis looked so pale. “… I cannot…” he said. “You saw that monster… the size of it… It would take an army of hundreds of thousands to defeat something like that…”

“It will take a sacrifice. Are you willing to do whatever is necessary for the fate of the world?”

He stared at her with wide eyes. “Your stories…” Stannis muttered. “In your stories, Azor Ahai sacrificed his wife.”

“No. Azor Ahai sacrificed his heart.” Her fingers traced across his chest. “Nissa Nissa… the person who he loved the most in the world.”

He caught her gaze. Softly now, she told herself. Gently. “We must return to Eastwatch, Your Grace,” she said. “Your men wait for you there. As does your daughter.”

Stannis shook his head, breathing heavily. “No, I cannot… you cannot…”

“You must do what you need to do, Your Grace,” she said sadly, wrapping her arms around him. He sat tense like a statue, but she felt him crumbling.

He took deep breaths as if to calm himself, but then his shoulders shuddered. The sob broke his lips, and he seemed to collapse all together. Stannis fell weeping into her shoulder. He’s crying, Melisandre realised in shock. She hadn’t known him to ever cry before, but the pain, the grief, and the fever took its toll.

“… It’s alright,” she whispered. “… It’s alright. The battle does not decide the war, it is not over…”

Stannis wept and sobbed. Breaking down around her. The armour of pride shattered, and it felt like he was left bare in her arms. She cradled and hugged him, softly whispering in his ear. It’s alright, she thought, it’s alright. Cry and weep and wail. Collapse and break down, my king. It is not the end.

Let yourself shatter for now, but you will be reforged. You will be remade.

Melisandre had seen it in the flames: King Stannis Baratheon would be renewed and reborn from stone and fire.
Chapter 19

Davos

Davos gasped, sputtering water. His vision was blurry grey, which was surprising. He had never expected to ever see anything again.

Around him, people were yelling. He felt strong hands drag him out of cold water and roughly over hard ground. He was shivering, struggling to see, struggling to even breathe, only vaguely aware of his hands being bound to a post in the middle of the camp.

For a while, he felt like he would die any moment now, suffocated by the cold. It felt like there was ice in his blood.

There were other figures next to him, all similarly bound. Some were shouting or fighting, others just shivering weakly. Davos was one of the quiet injured ones. One by one, Davos watched through weak, painful vision as the cold killed others around him. Davos felt sure that he would be next.

There wasn’t even any fear with that thought. Davos felt like all of his emotion had drained out of the wound in his chest. He could feel nothing but cold.

Slowly, painfully, his breath came back. His body started to warm by the fire. It took a while before he realised he wasn’t going to die. It seems like I’m cursed to live.

_This is the second battle in a bay where I’ve survived the water_, he thought with bitterness, his head still woozy. *First the fire in the Blackwater, and then ice in Hardhome._

He blacked out a lot. His consciousness faded in and out. When Davos woke up one time, there was an old wizened woman tending to his wounds, and then pouring rough milk down his throat and almost force-feeding him a thick paste.

“… Why are you looking after me?” Davos gasped.

“King Snow wants all prisoners alive,” the old woman replied simply.

Prisoners. Davos couldn’t allow himself to panic. *I am Lord Davos Seaworth_, he told himself, his jaw clenching. _The Hand of the King. Lord of Cape Wrath. I cannot die, I have a duty._ In his bones, he couldn’t help but feel like it would have been so much easier if he had just died.

_My son, Devan, is with the king_, Davos thought. He had to believe that both of them must have survived. Stannis still had some men garrisoned at Eastwatch along with the Queen and the Princess. He could have escaped, met up with the remainder of the fleet.

_And the Red Witch…_ Davos thought. Melisandre had been on the ice too, yet somehow Davos couldn’t imagine her ever being taken captive. She had expected the defeat, but she must have been confident that she herself wouldn’t fall with it.

The words she said came back to haunt Davos. ‘Some battles must be lost before the war can be won’. The Red Witch had led them all to their doom. I should have killed her after the Blackwater.

The camp was heaving. He saw ragged warriors glaring at the prisoners, occasionally spitting words in a language he didn’t understand. Davos saw men with painted faces and sharpened teeth, or savages clad in armour of bones. It was a huge camp – at least forty thousand men.

And then, one night, Davos heard pounding footsteps. He felt his heart tremble as he saw giant humanoids, at least thirteen feet tall, with shaggy fur and inhuman proportions. Giants, Davos gasped. In the distance, he once made out the shape of mammoths, great hairy beasts with terrible tusks.

It would have been the most incredible creature Davos had ever seen, if not for that monstrous white dragon. Occasionally, he heard the beating of huge wings, and he looked up to see the beast flying overhead. The dragon that had slaughtered so many of Stannis’ men.

I’m in the land of monsters now, he thought with a gulp. And all the monsters are readying to head south.

The other prisoners were tied to stakes in the centre of the camp too. Davos looked between them, sizing them up. Maybe seventy prisoners in total. Davos recognised three Lysene officers, one of Salladhor’s eunuch servants, as well as a beefy rower who was missing an arm. There were a dozen men-at-arms from Stannis’ army, a bowman that seemed on the verge of death, and a grizzled veteran who looked quietly murderous with both arms behind his back.

As far as valuable hostages went, Davos could recognise few. Ser Clayton Suggs – the commander of the vanguard from the Oleod – had survived; the man was snapping and shouting at the men who passed his post. He saw a young landed knight whose name escaped him, a soldier called Axell Flowers – a bastard from one of the queen’s cousins – and Ser Patrek’s old squire who appeared to be pissing himself. The most valuable hostage there was perhaps Ser Justin Massey, but the young knight had taken an arrow in the battle and appeared sickly ill.

After that, there were two dozen men of the Night’s Watch wearing black cloaks and haunted expressions. From the sworn brothers’ presence, Davos could only guess that the Lord Commander’s assault from the forest had failed as well.

Most of these prisoners are lowborn, Davos thought with a gulp. That was not reassuring. Maybe some could be tortured for information, but in all likelihood the sailors and soldiers would have nothing of value. Their presence implied that the wildlings had no intention of ransoming anyone, which made Davos all the more nervous about why they had been kept alive.

From the fragments of chatter, Davos heard that some of the prisoners had been eaten by cannibals.

Every day was cold and frightening. A woman came around to feed the prisoners daily, the fire was kept burning, but all other wildlings would spit on the prisoners whenever they came near.

Occasionally, more captives would arrive. The wildlings must be searching the coast, still taking captives of the men that had tried to run. Davos watched as new men were bound. He kept quiet, watching, but still trying to gather his strength, trying to think of a plan to escape.

On the fourth day, seven more captives were brought in. Davos stared as he saw a thrashing man dragged into camp by two burly savages. Davos had never seen Salladhor Saan so dishevelled, his fine silks filthy and ruined. The pirate prince shouted bloody fury as his fine gold rings and chains were taken from him.

“Unhand me!” Salladhor spat. “I am Salladhor Saan, merchant prince of Lys. I have family that will pay for me, I will not be treat like this! Do you hear me? Salladhor Saan. Take me to your king, I demand terms!”

Davos guessed that Salladhor’s stolen lifeboat couldn’t have gotten very far. He could only hope the King had better luck. The pirate prince shouted indignantly, but he got only a backhanded slap for his efforts as he was tied to a post.

Salla was chained at the other end of the clearing, such that Davos could barely even see him.

“What are you planning on doing to us?” Davos demanded. The wildlings only grunted.

It was another horribly cold night. All of the ice floating in the bay created a constant fog. In the distance, Davos could see camps being unfurled. The wildlings are preparing to move. Davos saw that white dragon flying to and from camp repeatedly, over the hill. Davos found his eyes constantly on the sky, looking for any sign of the beast, and each time he glimpsed its shape it would take his breath away.

Near dusk, Davos saw a white wolf, a wolf larger than any he had ever seen before, bounding between the tents. A direwolf, he realised. It moved at ease among the men, the wildlings even parted to let it pass. Some of them stared at the wolf with a mixture of awe and respect.

“That’s Ghost,” one of the captive sworn brothers hissed. He was a big man with a blunt face. “I knew it, that’s Ghost.”

“Quiet!” Another Night’s Watch man snapped. Not unreasonably; one of the guards sent to watch over them – a mean little man who wore an armour of crackling bones – would beat any prisoner he saw talking.

“But that means Jon’s here,” he muttered, so quiet Davos could barely hear. “Jon is really here…”

“Jon is one of them,” the partner growled. “Fuck, Jon leads them.”

Davos eyed the men quietly. The big one bit his lip, uncertainly. “Jon…” Davos called, his voice low. “You mean Jon Snow?”

The black brother nodded. Davos had heard Cotter Pyke’s report about Jon Snow. The bastard of Winterfell, Ned Stark’s illegitimate son. The report had said Jon killed his commander and turned wildling.

The woman said ‘King Snow’, Davos recalled. “You know him?” Davos asked.

“Aye. We were recruits together.” The man gulped. “I never believed the reports, never believed he would defect…” He looked shaken. “Jon was my friend. He helped practice in the yard. He taught me how to ride…”

“Your friend is holding you prisoner,” Davos noted. All of the other prisoners were listening intently.

“I knew Jon as well, Grenn,” another brother spoke suddenly. A stout boy with mean eyes. “I remember Jon setting his direwolf on me when I slept – to look after his little henchmen Tarly. Jon had a nasty streak in him too.” The man’s voice was dark. “The bastard would have defected months ago, to go join his half-brother’s rebellion, if you lot hadn’t have stopped him. Hells, I’m not surprised he made a rebellion of his own, I’m just surprised he did it so quickly.”

Davos listened quietly. “The dragon,” he asked in a low voice. “Where did that dragon come from?”

Grenn’s head shook. “I’ve got no idea.” He paused. “But I heard them say that Jon controls it.”

“How?” Davos pressed.

Grenn shook his head again.

“I never knew how Jon controlled that giant wolf of his, either,” the other black brother added darkly.

“Enough of this,” another man snapped. One of Stannis’ men, the grizzled veteran with the sharp eyes. “We must focus on escaping. If we could escape these binds, how many men here would be strong enough to fight?”

There were no replies. “There are forty thousand wildlings in this camp,” Davos warned.

“And they’re confused and spread wide,” the veteran growled. “We break the binds, we cut through them while they’re asleep. We get to the coast, steal a ship, and sail away.”

“Fuck running,” Ser Clayton Suggs said. “Let’s wait until it’s dark and free ourselves. We steal a blade and go straight for their ‘king’s’ tent.”

Davos could only stare at him. Ser Clayton was a vicious man. The veteran just shook his head.

“We’ll never get far with that dragon in the sky,” a man muttered fearfully.

“Then we’ll run into the forest, and head south.”

“Hells no,” Grenn said darkly. “There are more monsters in that forest than there are in this camp.”

All of the men of the Night’s Watch shared a haunted look. Davos’ eyes narrowed. “Craven,” Ser Clayton snapped. “I’m not going to sit here and die, if–”

“Quiet,” Davos hissed. He saw a figure approaching. The man with the bone shirt was heading towards them; the rattle of his mail gave him away. Any man that even looked like he was plotting an escape would be beaten. That man wearing bones is a cruel one. The night was spent in fearful silence.

The next morning, Davos knew he had to do something. He was the King’s Hand. He could not die like this. He had a duty.

“I am Lord Davos Seaworth,” Davos said, to the woman who came to feed them. “Hand of the King. I would like to treat with King Snow.”

The old woman said nothing. “King Stannis has appointed me to act in his stead,” Davos pressed. “I can negotiate terms.”

No response. “Please,” Davos hissed. If they thought he was useless, they would get rid of him like he was useless. Davos needed to show worth if he wanted to survive, to hopefully return to his king’s side. “Let me speak to your leader.”
For a long time, Davos thought she wasn’t going to reply. “King Snow will speak to you when he chooses to,” the woman said, moving away.

Later that night, the veteran man broke his own hand to escape the ropes. He nearly got free too, if not for the guard spotting him. The veteran looked half crazed as he charged at their jailor, but the man with bones simply released his dogs and watched.

All of the prisoners looked in quiet horror as the man screamed and thrashed while the hounds pounced and chewed on him, dragging the man across the ground. The veteran survived, actually, as he was tied back and restrained, but the dogs took a hand and half of his face. The man suffered a cruel death as he bled to death on his post.

Nobody else, not even Ser Clayton, tried to escape after that.

The next day, Davos finally met the wildling king.

He saw Jon Snow first by the procession he brought. He walked clad in thick grey and black furs wearing dull iron and bronze, a mismatch of armour well-worn and aged. He was flanked by fighters each much bulkier than himself, but Davos still felt his eyes drawn to the boy. The first thing Davos realised, was that Jon Snow was young. Very young, in fact, barely more than a teenager. He could have even been comely if not for his gaunt cheekbones.

Second thing Davos saw was his eyes. Pale grey eyes. Jon Snow’s face was young, but he had the eyes of someone much older.

He wore a dark shadowskin cloak, thick and rich, but everything else about him seemed ragged, hard and worn. His face was long and narrow, a gaunt face that was bruised and still bloody. His forehead was gashed with dark bruises under his eyes, but he wore the look well. He walked with a bad limp, but it seemed an old injury and well-compensated for in his gait. His hair was as white as bone, almost startling compared to his dark expression and clothes.

Davos had seen the boy fight on the ice. Davos had seen him cut through a dozen men. Davos looked at Jon Snow’s expression now and he felt shivers run down his spine.

“That’s him. That’s Jon,” Grenn muttered in shock. “Holy… what happened to his hair?”

The prisoners rippled as the wildling king approached. He made a formidable sight, escorted by wildlings with that giant white wolf by his side. There was a long moment of quiet.

“You bloody bastard,” the man named Rast snarled. “It’s true. You fucking lead wildlings now?”

“You watch your tone, crow,” a wildling with a gruff voice growled.

“You’re a turncoat, Snow,” he snapped. “A bloody traitor.”

Snow’s eyes were cool. “You would be dead in the woods if not for me,” he said. “You saw the dead. You saw the Others.” His voice was dangerously low. “You’re not my enemy, Rast. And I’m not yours – not unless you want me to be. I fight against the Others.”

Davos’ eyes narrowed. What is the man talking about? The Others? Still, Davos saw the black brothers shift uncomfortably.
Snow turned around, staring around the posts. “You can’t keep us here,” the man named Grenn begged. “Please Jon, we were friends. You can’t do this to us.”

“Yes,” he nodded. His voice sounded stiff. Something about the man’s tone reminded Davos of Stannis, and that made him uncomfortable. “And there are a lot of people in this camp that would like to kill you, Grenn. Hatred between the Night’s Watch and the free folk runs deep, and if I left you walk around the camp I don’t imagine you would survive long. It is because we were friends that I’m keeping you here, safe.”

“But—” Grenn gulped, before one of the wildlings growled at him dangerously.

“Please, Grenn,” Snow said, his voice turning very slightly softer. “Stay here, and don’t try anything. It won’t be long.”

Snow’s eyes glanced over the dead corpse of the man that tried to escape, still tied to the post. “I said none of them were to be harmed, Rattleshirt,” he snapped sharply.

The man in bones – Rattleshirt – simply shrugged. “He escaped. Tried to attack me. What was I supposed to do?”

_Not feed him to your dogs_, Davos thought, but he held his tongue. Snow’s gaze darkened, but he didn't say anything either.

There was a pause. Snow glanced around the prisoners. Inspecting them one by one. “You,” he said eventually, looking at Salla. “I hear your name is Salladhor Saan. You were asking of me?”

Salla’s eyes narrowed. He was a proud, vain man, but not a stupid one. The pirate knew when to be respectful. “I am. Pirate prince of Lys, Prince of the Narrow Sea. I have much wealth where I'm from, many sons that will avenge me.” His eyes darkened. “You cannot try me like this.”

“We are a long way from Lys, my lord.” The words ‘my lord’ came almost automatically from him, rather with deference. “But if we come to terms I will see you in better care,” Snow promised, before turning to Davos. “And you claim to be the Hand of the King.”

“That is correct,” Davos growled. His whiskers were unkempt, he was unshaven. Davos knew that he looked little like a lord. “I serve as Stannis Baratheon’s right hand man.”

“Indeed. Bring both of them to my tent.”

“Wait!” A haggard voice gasped. Ser Justin’s voice was pained. “I am Ser Justin Massey, eldest heir. I have lands and titles… um… Your Grace.”

He paused, thoughtfully. “House Massey. Of Stonedance, correct? Your father is Triston Massey.”

The man blinked. It was strange to hear of the lands so far south this far up north. _Jon Snow is no wildling_, Davos noted. “Yes,” Ser Justin replied. “My father died on the Blackwater. My cousin claims my seat, but I am the rightful heir of my house.”

“I see. We will talk later, perhaps.”

Snow nodded, walking away without another word. Ser Justin stared in horror, while Salladhor and Davos were dragged off the ground, after the King-Beyond-the-Wall.

There were some weak curses and shouts at Snow as he walked. The king stopped at another Night Watch’s man, a short wiry man with dark eyes, and then ordered the wildlings to bring that man as well.

The wildling who escorted Davos was a stout but bulky wildling with a shaggy beard and missing front teeth. The air was so cold that Davos could only tremble, and his shoulder and stomach wound still pained him. The tent that they headed to was nearby; a wide circular tent shelter of hides and furs, with a large fireplace through the centre. Inside, the stifling warmth caused Davos to stagger. He had been left in the cold for days.

The first thing he saw was the shape curled by the fire. At first Davos mistook it for a shadow. The shadow had bright yellow eyes. The shadowcat stared at them with a low snarl, but none of the wildlings paid any attention to the unrestrained animal.

It was a large tent, but cluttered. There were armour, weapons, even what looked like a mammoth’s tusk littering the floor and stacked along the side. Sacks of bulky shapes and objects buried under furs, were piled up the walls to keep the warmth around the centre. The back of the tent was dominated by a huge ornate horn, six feet long. There were eight men inside, all armed, but Davos’ attention was fixed firmly on Jon Snow.

Behind them, Rattleshirt clanked into the tent, on guard, with a spear in his hand and a frown on his face. Davos looked around, meeting the eyes of a bulky, ugly looking man with a twisted face and bulbous, watery eyes.

There was only one woman in the room, sitting in the corner on a fur over the ground, so far back that Davos almost didn’t notice her. If not for her wildling furs, she would have looked out of place. She was a fair lady; young, golden haired, buxom and beautiful. Jon Snow’s woman maybe? Davos wondered. He guessed not, judging from the distance between the pair.

Davos, Salladhor and the man of the Night’s Watch all stood at the front of the fire pit, hands bound and caked in dried blood. Jon Snow kept the direwolf to his right and the shadowcat to his left.

An interrogation, Davos thought.

“Salladhor Saan, you said your name was?” Snow said finally. “I’m not familiar. You wear silk and I heard you had golden rings. Are you the captain of a ship?”

“I am the lord of a fleet,” Salladhor growled, his voice venomous. “Prince of the Narrow Sea. Lord of Blackwater Bay, as the fool-King Stannis named me. The dread of the Narrow Sea, as my enemies call me.”

“A pirate. Sellsail.”

“An old pirate. A pirate with many friends and many sons. The Saans are an old and venerable family from Lys. It is not wise to be my enemy, Snow.” His eyes narrowed. “There will be an answer for this disgrace, the theft of my belongings.”

“You attacked us, remember?” Snow replied. “All men have a right to defend themselves. They have a right to vengeance, too – as my allies keep on advising me.”

Salla looked ready to reply. “You would do well to watch your tone,” the woman with golden hair advised coolly. “Please remember your position here.”

Davos could recognise barely restrained bloodlust. Jon Snow’s eyes were guarded, but the other wildlings looked ready to kill without a second thought.
“It was Stannis that attacked you, not I. The fool I was, I took his promises of gold and committed my ships to his cause. It was Stannis and that mad witch that wanted you dead, we have no grudge with each other.”

“Then perhaps we could still come to agreement,” said Snow, but his eyes were hard. Something about his voice reminded Davos of when Stannis’ tone when he was forced to deal with someone unsavoury. He doesn’t want any more enemies, Davos thought. It was Salladhor’s threat of retribution from the Saan family that put Snow on edge more than anything. “We will talk later, my lord. For now, I will see to it that you have more comfortable quarters.”

The King-Beyond-the-Wall turned towards Davos. His hand was on his sword. He only has four fingers on his left hand, Davos noted. “Lord Seaworth, was it? I am not familiar with the house.”

“It is a new house… Your Grace,” Davos said guardedly. He forced himself to say the title. He knew fine well that kings were usually the prickly sort. “King Stannis knighted me and lorded me for my service. He appointed me his Hand.”

“I see.” Snow’s eyes were sizing up Davos just as much as Davos was inspecting him. “Let’s start with the obvious question, my lord. How many men does Stannis have behind him?”

There was a pause. “Seven thousand,” Davos replied. “Waiting in reserve at Eastwatch with the main force of his fleet.”

Snow paused, and turned to Salladhor. “How many men does Stannis have behind him?” Snow repeated.

“Less than a thousand,” Salladhor replied promptly. “Seven hundred, at most – largely the men he left in reserve with his queen and princess at Eastwatch. They have six ships left at Eastwatch. My ships, to my shame, but I expect that mutinous dog would have seized them.”

Davos’ face didn’t twitch, but he cursed quietly.

“How many houses support Stannis? How much backing does he have from the northern lords?” Jon Snow demanded, turning back to Davos.

“The entire realm will fight for its rightful King.”

Wordlessly, Snow turned to Salladhor.

“ Barely any. Most certainly none in the north.”

Snow nodded, facing Davos again. “And why did Stannis attack us?”

“Because you are a traitor to the realm. You are massing a wildling army to ravage the kingdom, and it is the King’s duty to protect it.”

Snow motioned to Salladhor. “Because that Red Witch told him to,” Salladhor said bluntly. “She has the King wrapped around her finger, obsessed with some fool prophecy of a great saviour. She has him convinced that you are some great champion of doom who will bring endless night upon the world.”

Davos wasn’t so sure that the last statement was untrue. Still, for a second, Snow blinked in surprise, looking amused at the accusation.

“You are going to destroy what little peace we have left in the Seven Kingdoms,” Davos said.
“Stannis sailed to stop you.”

“Then Stannis really is a fool. It seems like many men are fools, nowadays,” he said with cold venom. “He attacked us with no clue about the real enemy. Because he decided to attack first and talk later, I had no choice but to destroy his ships and kill his men. I cut off Stannis’ hand for that folly.”

Davos bristled. “You lie.”

There was a quiet snigger from one of the men. Jon quietly snatched up an object off the ground, holding it to Davos. It was the hilt of a sword; a metal pommel wrapped in black leather. The blade had been snapped clean off. There was ruby embedded into the fine metalwork.

“This is all that I could find of that glowing sword after I broke it,” said Snow. “An impressive blade that – very bright, but useless. The king’s hand itself was lost in the bay… and unlike you the hand didn’t wash up again.”

Lightbringer. Melisandre had said it was the sword that could save world. The king is missing a hand. Davos took a deep breath. “…Does Stannis still live?” He asked, almost afraid of the answer.

Snow shrugged. “Perhaps. His knights rallied to pull him away. They escaped on a ship that slipped away. If there was a skilled enough healer among them, they might have saved the king’s life.”

Davos’s thumb traced the severed tips of his fingers almost cautiously. The wounds had healed years ago, but the cold had still left them feeling raw. “Now,” the wildling king continued. “My question. Why would Stannis attack me? Last I heard, his quarrel was with the Lannisters on the Iron Throne, not with free folk. Why did he commit so many men to an attack like that?”

Davos hesitated briefly, glancing around. I must be useful. Because King Stannis was defeated on the Blackwater during the assault on King’s Landing. He intended on routing the wildlings, protecting the realm, and using the victory to rally the northern lords.”

“I see.” Jon Snow looked between them. “It appears I have been removed from the affairs of the realm for some time, my lords. Do you mind entertaining me?”

Davos had no choice but to nod. If I don’t answer, I become useless. Useless objects get discarded. For the sake of his duty, Davos would be a craven and answer this traitor king’s questions.

Snow asked few questions, but something about the silence demanded that Davos talk. Davos talked about King Renly’s betrayal, the War of Five Kings, the ironborn rising against the north, the Young Wolf’s campaign in the Riverlands. Davos’ voice was stiff as he told them about Stannis’ defeat at the Blackwater, of their fleet burning in wildfire. He didn't mention his sons, but the pain was still there.

Snow occasionally turned to Salladhor for confirmation, but otherwise he just nodded and listened.

“What about my brother?” Snow asked after a while, almost hesitantly. Like it was a question he feared to ask. For a second, Davos was confused, before he remembered Jon Snow was Eddard Stark’s bastard. “Robb Stark. What happened to him?”

“Dead.” The room stiffened. Answer the questions. A more cunning man would have tried to manipulate the wildling king, but Davos didn't know how he could. “Robb Stark died three months ago.”
He saw the man’s mouth stiffen, his grey eyes growing dark. Angry. Very angry. “How?” He said sharply.

Because we burnt the leeches in the fire and the Red Woman worked her sorcery, Davos thought. But that was the answer he would never, ever say. “Robb Stark died at the Twins, at the hands of the Freys.” Davos hesitated. Enemy of my enemy. Make sure he has reason to hate Stannis’ enemies too. “Most likely at the command of the Lannisters,” he added.

Snow took two steps forward. He had an unnerving gaze for one so young. “How?”

“During the wedding of Edmure Tully to Roslin Frey,” Davos replied, his voice low. “Robb Stark was engaged to Walder Frey’s granddaughter, but that engagement was broken. The Freys took offence, and they and the Boltons plotted betrayal. The Starks arranged the marriage of Edmure Tully in recompense, but during the ceremony they prung an ambush. The Stark men were butchered. Robb Stark died.” He hesitated. “They beheaded Robb Stark, and stitched the head of his direwolf onto the body.”

Snow’s nostrils flared. “And guest right?”

“The Freys broke it.”

Around him, he felt the room ripple. Guest right was sacred even here in the far north. Jon Snow took a deep breath.

Outside, Davos heard the beat of the dragon’s wings as it broke into the sky.

“My family,” he demanded. “Tell me what happened to my family.”

Jon Snow had a demeanour like iron. Still, Davos could feel it shivering with every word.

His sister, Sansa, married to the Imp and then vanished after Joffrey’s murder, and held responsible for the crime. His brothers, Rickon and Bran, murdered by the turncoat, beheaded and hung over Winterfell, before the castle was sacked. His other sister, Arya, disappeared during the murder of their father’s men and presumed dead ever since.

Davos saw Snow’s body tense at the mention of Arya.

There was a long moment of quiet. “Damn,” the man in the bones said finally, breaking the hush. “Your family has fucking awful luck.”

Jon Snow’s eyes were dark, murderous. His pale face and white hair almost made him look like a ghost. He didn’t reply for a long time. All eyes focused on him.

“Rattleshirt,” Snow said, barely even moving. “That man is trying to slip out of his bindings. He has been edging towards your spear for the last five minutes. Do your job – shut up and watch the prisoners.”

Davos glanced to the man of Night’s Watch alongside them. He had indeed been trying to wriggle his hands free of his bounds, staying quiet but taking advantage of the distraction. Now how did Snow notice that, he didn’t even glance at the man? But that shadowcat of his had been staring right at the prisoner.

Rattleshirt cursed, forcing the man to the ground. He didn’t resist, but something about his eyes told Davos the black brother was just waiting for his chance.
Jon Snow dismissed Davos with barely a glance. He was unnerved, visibly angry, but something about him looked focused on his job before his emotion.

_Damn, _Davos thought. _He reminds me of Stannis._ Stannis Baratheon could take all of his rage and grief and just push it to one side, right up until the moment he needed it. Jon Snow did the same.

“You are Iron Emmett, aren’t you?” Snow said, turning to the sworn brother. “We met once, briefly. Cotter Pyke considered you the finest fighter in the Watch.”

“Why don’t you take off these ropes and find out?” The man – Iron Emmett – challenged.

“I think not,” said Snow. “How many men are at Eastwatch?”

“Not a clue.”

“How many men did you take with you in the forest?”

“Never counted.”

“What happened to Lord Commander Mormont?”

“Who?”

_Brave man, _Davos thought. _Stupid, but brave._ Jon Snow rolled his eyes. “Give him to me,” the wildling with watery eyes offered. “I’ll get him to talk. Hells, I’ll make him sing.”

“Don’t bother,” Snow sighed. “I already know the answers to those questions. There were less than a hundred left at Eastwatch, maybe plus some from the survivors. The ranging had four hundred men, their forces scattered. The Lord Commander was last seen wounded during the battle, before his men deserted him.”

Snow looked down at Emmett. “In case you’re wondering,” he said after a pause. “Of those four hundred men, we captured two dozen. At the very most, maybe fifty or so managed to escape to the Wall during the night. All of the others were slaughtered.”

Iron Emmett didn’t reply. Snow continued, _“I never killed them. We both know what did. You saw the real enemy too.” _

There was no response. Snow paced around the fire. “I would think very carefully about whether or not we are still the enemy you should fight. Not when the _others _are still out there.”

The room felt deadly quiet. Snow paced, thinking as he looked between his prisoners. “Salladhor Saan,” he said. “I will give you better quarters and treatment. If there are other prisoners who you wish to join you, select them out. In return, I want your vow not to attempt escape, and then we can discuss potential partnerships.”

“Partnerships?” Salla said sharply.

“My people are hungry. We are a large host and food is thin. We have wealth, however, and the Free Cities are open for trade. We need merchants to trade with us, ships to supply us, and men to acquire for us,” he said, before adding, “perhaps in return I won’t sink every one of your ships I find.”

Salladhor nodded, an almost predator gaze flashing across his bloody features for a moment. The pirate could sense an opportunity a mile away.
“Lord Seaworth,” Snow said. “You will stay by my side. I have more questions for you, and I mean to treat with Stannis. Help me and you could spare many needless deaths.”

Davos nodded, his eyes guarded and suspicious. He didn't speak. Jon paused for a moment, as if waiting for an answer, before moving on.

“And Iron Emmett,” Jon Snow continued, turning to the final man. Davos tensed, sure that the king would execute him. Emmett’s eyes were defiant to the end. “I will release you. In four days, you are free to return to Eastwatch.”

There was a moment of silence. The wildling Rattleshirt reacted first. “What?” The man spat. “The crows attacked us, and you’d let them go!”

Snow’s gaze silenced the man. The king was not in a mood to be trifled with.

“You will act as envoy to Eastwatch,” he continued. “In five days, I will assault the castle. You are to bring a message to them before then. Convince them to lay down their arms, and nobody will be killed. I will be attacking with overwhelming force, but I would prefer it bloodless. The choice will be yours.”

“Attack with all the force you want,” Emmett snarled. “Larger armies than yours have been broken by the Wall.”

Jon shook his head. “I will not be attacking the Wall. I will be attacking by sea.” He paused. “And not by boat, either. I have a vanguard already in position. Four thousand men will be walking straight over the bay.”

Emmett hesitated. Davos realised first. “… Your dragon,” he said breathlessly. “You’re going to use your dragon to freeze the sea.”

Snow nodded. “And the free folk will walk straight across. The Wall will be useless.”

Behind him, one of the wildlings cackled wickedly. “And if you do try to mount a defence,” he said. “Know that my dragon will be flying over ahead of them. Anyone who tries to fight will face Sonagon first – and after that I can make no promises on your safety.”

Davos caught the flicker in Emmett’s eyes. “In case you’re wondering,” he continued. “The men belonging to Stannis have already fled. They ran as soon as they saw my force approaching. I spotted them sailing away from Eastwatch last night, from Sonagon’s back. That will leave only the men of the Night’s Watch to defend Eastwatch.”

Davos took a deep breath. Had Queen Selyse truly already fled? She would never have run without Stannis, so then his King must have survived.

“I will do my part to reduce casualties,” Jon Snow explained. “I will assault the Eastwatch patrols from dragonback and leave them shipwrecked. Assuming twenty men on each ship…” He thought for a moment. “I’ll take the overestimate and say there’ll be two hundred men left in Eastwatch. That’s two hundred men to defend against four thousand free folk and a dragon, without a Wall to hide behind. Do you see why I’m encouraging you to surrender instead?”

Emmett’s face was pale. There was no sign of a bluff in Jon’s voice.

Could he do it? Davos thought with panic. Yes, quite easily, actually. Davos had seen the number of men Snow had, and he seen the power of the dragon. The dragon froze the bay around Hardhome into solid ice, there was no reason to think it couldn’t freeze the ocean leading to Eastwatch as well.

Sure, the wildlings would be at a disadvantage trying to cross solid ice and clambering up onto the coast again, but they could do it. The presence of Snow’s dragon in the fight would offset any disadvantage.

Hells, even without freezing the ocean, even if the dragon was just used to ferry men across a dozen at a time, then they could probably still take Eastwatch that way. The Wall couldn’t stop a dragon.

Davos’ head spun as he tried to picture it. They’d start at Eastwatch, and open the gates wide to let all of the wildlings from Hardhome come through. After that, there’d be no chance of retaking the castle again, not with the limited number of men of the Night’s Watch. Jon could move across the Wall at his leisure, taking every castle one by one. Castle Black was the only one that could mount any decent defence, but even that wouldn’t be enough.

After that, the wildlings would take the Wall. Until the northern lords rallied and built an army, there’d be nothing that could stop them.

The Wall was already beaten. Davos realised with a jolt that they would be relying on the Boltons, of all people, to throw out the wildlings, but the Boltons’ grasp over the north was tenuous at best. Between civil unrest, ironborn and wildlings, Jon Snow could form a powerful position.

Perhaps the first ever King-Beyond-the-Wall who could actually succeed.

Davos took a deep breath to calm himself. That dragon put the whole realm at risk.

“Go think on your positions,” Jon Snow said, his voice hard. “I do not want any bloodshed, but if you force me to I will reply in kind.”

Stay alive, Davos told himself. Stay useful. Keep calm and keep close to him. Keep close enough you could put a dagger in his chest.

“Yes, King Snow,” Davos said with a respectful bow.

Val

“He’s beautiful,” Dalla whispered, cradling the babe. “I want to name him.”

“You can’t, he’s still too young,” Val said, stroking her sister’s hair.

“He deserves a name.”

“Not yet, it wouldn’t be right.” The babe was still such a frail little thing. A quiet child. It made Val’s heart pang every time she saw him clutching her sister’s chest.

Across from them, there was a clanging as the pots of boiling water were hoisted up. “You should take him before the dragon,” the washerwoman, Wylda, interrupted. She was a strong, beefy woman, over sixty with half a dozen children of her own. “Let him touch the scales. Let the child be a blessed by a god.”

Val shifted slightly. The white stone on Wylda’s chest was smooth and well-cleaned. “I dare not,” Dalla said nervously. “The dragon is so big, I heard what happened to the crofter’s girl.”

“The crofter’s girl demanded too much,” Wylda said as she changed the pots. “No one ever said the god must be gentle. But look at Gilly – she brought her child before the dragon and now the child is healthier than ever. Mother Mole welcomed her into the congregation, and the boy will be raised under the shelter of a god.”

Her sister looked uncomfortable. “We are not believers, Wylda,” Val said sharply.

“You should be,” the older woman said with a shrug. “Now is the age of the ice dragon.”

The washerwoman changed the pots without another word. Dalla didn't meet Val's gaze. There was a moment of silence as she left. “Have they been pestering you again?” Val asked. “You know I could–”

“It’s fine,” Dalla replied. “They’re fine. It’s not pester, Mother Mole has been bringing me food and blankets, she sends her followers to check on me.”

“Because she bloody wants you to convert.”

“Val, it’s fine. You don’t want to make it a problem.”

Val’s hands twitched. Their tent was hardly the biggest in the camp, but it was still warm, sheltered in hide, with a fire pit carved into the centre. There were two guards at her door at night. That would have made Val feel more reassured except, in all likelihood, those guards would be wearing white stones too.

“I know that two nights ago a fisherman was beaten half to death for ‘sacrilege’,” she said. “The man complained about how much the dragon eats, and was overheard by a few devotees. It’s already a problem.”

“They’ve been nothing but kind to me.”

“For now. How long before they decide that you’re sacrilegious too for not praying with them?”

Dalla didn't reply. Val had asked Snow to look after her sister, and he had. He made arrangements for her tent, he assigned guards to look after her, and women to care for her and the babe after her sister’s hard childbirth. Wylda and the other women stopped by very frequently, on the orders of King Snow.

No, King Snow never even needed to order them, Val thought. He just proclaimed that he wanted Dalla to be taken care of, and it had been done. They proved very good caretakers as well. Very rigorous, very devoted.

“If they ever cross the line,” Val said, “I’ll kill whole bloody lot of them. They can keep to cleaning pots and bringing firewood, but no preaching. I don’t like the way that they preach.”

Dalla paused, cradling her child. “It won’t be long. We’ll be going south soon.”

Val shook her head. “I'm going south soon. You've got to stay in Hardhome until it's safe.”

“Is Hardhome safe?”

“It's safer than attacking the Wall.”

“Don't go,” her sister begged.

“I've got to. It was part of the deal.” She kissed her forehead again. “You just look after the babe. Once we take Eastwatch we'll start moving people south.”
The camp was already in turmoil. They were gathering a force – strong fighters only – that would be marching south quickly in less than two days. The whole camp was stockpiling as many supplies as they could spare, and that dragon had been spotted flying south repeatedly. King Snow was preparing to move in force.

Val lingered by her sister’s side for as long as she could. Then, she heard the activity outside, and she knew that she had to go. She kissed her sister, kissed her babe, and promised to be back soon before leaving the tent.

It’s part of the ‘agreement’, Val thought with a scoff. He protects my family, and I have to serve him. Fealty, he calls it.

Outside, the camp was heaving. In the distance, she could hear shouting as free folk lashed together a wooden structure on the cliffs. King Snow had wanted a string of watchtowers around the camp, and it had been done.

She met the gathering warband by the southeastern cliffs. She saw Garth motioning for her, sword on his hip and spear in his hand. The older man looked weary. “Come on, party is moving out towards the cliffs.”

The bay was still blockaded by ice, most of their fishing vessels still destroyed. Food was short, so instead dozens of raiding parties had to take to the forest to hunt for game. No less than thirty men per party, the king had ordered. Large parties for hunting, yet they were hunting wights as well as animals.

“What’s the game this time? Rabbits? Boar? Deer?”

“No. We’re hunting giants. Let's move, Snow will be joining us.”

“Oh.” The camp already had fifty or more giants coming in on mammoths, but they had heard reports of larger giant clans sheltering in the forests near the cape.

Val sighed quietly, collecting up her spear and bow. About thirty men from hers and Garth’s warband were gathering, and another thirty from those that seemed to constantly follow Snow. They lingered on the sand dunes with a quiet wariness. Waiting for the king.

“Val,” Halleck greeted. The loss of his sister had been hard on all of them, but Halleck was a fighter first and foremost. “I haven’t seen you around recently.”

“Aye, been busy,” Val sighed. “Snow had me running around on a ‘special request’, of all things.”

Halleck grunted, and smirked. “Aye? What sort?”

“Hunting ghosts. Searching for some red-haired lass that he knows.” She had spent the last week questioning men from the Frostfangs about this mystery spearwife of Snow’s. He had been insistent Val try to find her. “There’s no sign of her.”

“Aye, too much going on in this bloody camp. He’s got every man running ragged with some task or other,” Halleck grumbled. “I can’t bloody keep up with what’s going on.”

Val nodded in agreement, tucking her furs up and settling into wait on the dunes.

“You heard the news?” Another raider said to her. “The dragon sealed off the west side of the camp last night.”
“Sealed off?”

“With ice. It scorched the pass in ice, left it impassable. I hear the king’s planning on making a whole wall of ice around the camp.”

“Of course, he would like his walls,” Val muttered.

“It's bloody insane,” a spearwife said. “I saw it. The dragon created bloody ice spikes so big not even the dead are getting through that way.”

“That's nothing,” a large man grumbled. Val recognised him as Hatch – Snow’s man. Hatch the Halfgiant. He was an enormous, bearded man holding a new iron warhammer. A lot of Snow’s supporters were well-equipped now. “King Snow wants to use dragonfire to freeze sea defences around the peninsula too.”

“He'll want his castle built out of ice as well, I expect,” Val grumbled. “Where is Snow anyway? He coming or are we just standing around with our dicks in the air?”

“He said to wait, so we wait.” Hatch folded his arms.

So he can order sixty seasoned raiders to stand around waiting for him? Val thought. If Mance tried that, everyone here would have told him to bugger off and left.

Garth gave her a cautious look. “You look annoyed?” He said quietly.

“Bloody stupid hunt, and the king makes us wait around.” Val said, before pausing. “And those devotees have been pestering Dalla again.”

“Oh.”

She kept her voice quiet. “You know it’s me she wants?” Val said. “They're trying to convert Dalla to convert me.”

“I know. Mother Mole is a hag,” Garth said with a grimace. The devotees were deliberately picking out the most influential targets and focusing on them. “She’s been targeting a lot of leaders, to pull more to her congregation.”

“They're a bunch of fools.”

His eyes flickered. “You sure?”

She looked at him. “All I'm saying is that the dragon is a hundred foot long and can freeze oceans and destroy armies,” Garth said. “If you want to argue it’s godhood then it's easier for than against. Folk can't see the Old Gods, but they can see the dragon.”

“So what?” She growled. “Just go along with them? Pray with them at night, worship at the dragon’s feet?”

“It keeps them off your back.”

She didn't reply, but the thought of ever putting a white stone on her chest made her feel sick.

They were waiting for another fifteen minutes, shivering in the wind, before they saw Snow walking towards them with another fifteen men. Some of Snow’s bodyguards were almost as intense as any of Mother Mole’s group. Now does he expect me to curtsy? Val felt more inclined to kick him in the groin for making them wait.
He approached with a nod. _The king makes a good sight_, she admitted, clad in shadowskin with his monster of a wolf at his heel. That white hair makes him look old. She wasn’t sure of his age, actually.

“Snow,” Garth said, crossing his arms. They had over eighty fighters with them. “How much trouble are you expecting here?”

“Hopefully none. I hear we've got a clan of forest giants not far in the forest. I want to go find them and bring them into camp.”

“You want to recruit some giants?” Val said. “If you expect giants to kneel to you then you're mistaken.”

“Of course.” He gave her a cool gaze. “I’ve gathered some supplies – nuts, vegetables and berries – to bribe the clans with. A gesture, show that we can support them, welcome them to our host. They should be friendly.”

“They're giants,” Val scoffed.

The warband moved out quickly. It was early and nobody talked. The king brought four garron to help carry the supplies and rations, but each raider still had to carry a sack over their shoulder too. The sack of turnips that Val took smelled mouldy. She was sure that Snow would take one of the horses, but instead he walked on foot. Nobody said anything.

There were several wearing white stones even in their warband, whose gazes would flicker to him with awe. Snow didn't seem to notice.

It was still early dawn when they set out. A crowd seemed to gather as they passed the barricades and guards around Hardhome. _Snow can’t even bloody move without a crowd around him_, Val thought.

When they reached the forest, the free folk started to walk spread out but always in earshot. Everyone kept their weapons ready. There had been patrols, but any distance outside of the stakewalls was still dangerous.

“You see any corpses,” Garth called. “Any at all, then we stop to cut off its head and limbs!”

Shortly afterwards leaving, they met up with a man waiting for them. He was a hulking man, black browed, with a flat nose, heavy jowls dark with stubble, and small close-set eyes. In the trees, Val glimpsed a huge shape as large as a bull, with tusks like swords. The boar sniffed at the soil and snow, snorting through the roots. She recognised the figure quickly.

“Borroq,” Val muttered, as Snow greeted the other skinchanger coolly. Borroq the Boar was a stiff, taciturn man who barely ever spoke. He even looked and acted like the beast he partnered with. He joined the group without even a word, causing a few men to ripple. A lot of raiders kept their distance.

“What is he doing with us?” Val demanded as they started moving again.

“Borroq?” Snow blinked. “He will help search for the giant’s camp. His boar will scout the west while Ghost searches the south.

She just grunted, settling into a continuous trek through the snow. Snow glanced at her. “Borroq has been nothing but supportive. He’s even been helping me hone my own skills.”

“I’m sure. You skinchangers must have much to talk about.”

Snow nodded. “The free folk don't trust skinchangers very much. Why?”

“Have a look at Varamyr and see if you can guess.”

“Point. I suspect I will have to send Varamyr away shortly. That eagle of his looks ready to maul me at any moment.”

Val didn't reply. He glanced at her. “I was also considering recruiting every skinchanger into a single warband, and searching for any boys with talent so they can be trained properly. Bring them together so they don’t need to be shunned,” he said. “A group of skinchangers, sharing experience and talent.”

“Why? Keep them all together for when they turn against you?”

“So I can get more use out of them,” Snow replied. “The north has many skinchangers and wargs, why not encourage them rather than spurning them? Bring them into line and use them.”

Val grunted. “You're a southerner,” she said. “You want everything in its proper place, all the people standing in a line.”

“Seems better to me than letting them run wild.”

“And once again you prove that you don't even know us.”

“I suppose I am still learning, my lady.”

She grimaced at the honorific, glancing back at him. He kept his face as solemn as always.

There was a short call from Borroq. His boar picked up on a lead. They changed direction, walking past the scarred gouges in the woods burned by dragonfire. The trees had been scorched away that night, and the earth left deformed and twisted into jagged lumps. The ice had cooled, but the sight of what dragonfire could do even to a random patch of forest sent shivers down Val’s spin.

As they walked, Snow moved between the raiders, talking to each of them in turn. He asked the names of any he didn't know. Val watched him through the corner of her eye.

After six hours of walking, they stopped for a break. A skin of malted vegetable wine was passed around, thick and intoxicating enough to keep them warm. Val noticed Snow stretching his leg against a tree.

“Answer me something,” Val said, walking up to him and throwing a canteen. “You didn't have to be here. Why come yourself?”

He paused. “I wanted to see the giants.”

“Aww, you want to gaze at the queer creatures?” She said sarcastically.

“I want to make sure we're on good terms. I want to bring in as many giants as possible. I thought that coming myself would be a good sign of respect and trust.”

“You want giants for your army,” she said, folding her arms. “But giants are more than big humans, Snow, they're different creatures. They don't have leadership, or hierarchy, they have no reason to follow orders. They don't care for gold or baubles; in a lot of ways they're more animal than man.”

“Mance recruited giants for his army. Mag the Mighty followed him.”

“‘Follow’ is a strong word. More like the giants agreed to head in the same direction. And those were plains giants, anyway, not forest giants.”

He glanced at her. Val smirked. “The plains and mountain giants are the only ones with mammoths, Snow. They herd their mammoths all over the north, they eat mammoth cheese and milk; they live and die by their mammoths,” she explained. “The forest giants don’t. The forest giants live in very tight-knit clans, they’re very isolated, very territorial. They’re smaller than the plains giants too – most only grow up to ten or eleven feet.”

The giants were famous for constantly being bonded to their mammoths, but that was only half true. Perhaps the forest giant clans had just run out of mammoths. Val had once heard the rumour that there were no giant women and that giants would fuck their mammoths to give birth to more giants, but she supposed the forest tribes disproved that.

“You know a lot about them.”

“There was a tribe of forest giants near the village I grew up,” she said with a shrug. “The kids would play games trying to sneak into their territory, and steal a tuff of giant fur.” That caused Snow to blink in surprise.

“It was a bloody stupid game,” Val admitted, but she couldn’t help but smile. “If the giants caught you, they were likely to eat you.”

“Wait, I thought giants were vegetarians? They eat berries and fruits.”

“Oh, they are. Mostly.”

“Mostly?”

“Depends on how hungry they get,” she said. “Giants don't often hunt for meat, but they don't like wasting food either.”

“I see.”

There was a call from their outriders. Borroq’s boar sniffed out the right direction, and they spotted the giant trails. Two men pointed to an uprooted pine tree, with gouged bark. “Those are giant markings,” Garth said with a nod. “They mark their camps deliberately, to keep humans away.”

“A warning?” Jon asked.

“More like a boundary.”

“Humans have a bad habit of hunting them,” Val added.

They all turned to look at Snow. Val quietly noted the way they deferred to him. He paused, thinking. “Well, these giants should be friendly. We have had scouts that made contact with them before. We go in slowly, offer the food.”

“Friendly means different things to giants, Snow.” Val shook her head. “You’re doing this wrong. You walk this many people into their camp, they’ll smell you coming and spook. They don’t like surprises; they’ll get confused and angry.”

Jon frowned, turning to face her. “And how would you do it?”

“Small groups. Three or four going in first, make introductions, and then signal the others to filter in afterwards. Send the horses in first, butter up to the chieftain with food, and promise that there’s more food.”

To her surprise, Snow just nodded. “Very well. Lead away.”

“Excuse me?”

“You've got more experience here than I do. We'll do it your way.”

She hesitated, glancing at Garth. The older raider nodded fractionally. “Fine. Everyone else stay outside the perimeter. Bring those garron over here. And the apples. Giants like apples.”

She picked out a Thenn who could speak the Old Tongue better than she could. Jon walked forward too, along with Hatch. Val stared warily. “You don't need to come. If it's safe, we'll call for you.”

“I'd prefer to come myself.”

“If you're trying to impress, don't bother. Don't be stupid.”

“I'm not. If it’s not safe, then I can have Sonagon here in five minutes.”

“You think you'd last five minutes against a clan of giants?” Val scoffed. Snow looked sheepish. He's younger than he appears, she thought. “Fine, but keep that wolf back.”

Snow nodded. He never even needed to look at his wolf to give orders, she noticed. “And pick up those flowers – the purple ones in that bush there,” she said. “We crush them and smear them over us.”

“What flowers are these?”

“Buggered if I know. But they stink and giants are less likely to be surprised if they smell you coming. Remember, their vision isn’t so good but their noses are.”

The trees shivered as they walked on ahead. Val walked in front, eyes peeled for the distinctive tracks. The garron neighed quietly as they crunched over the snow, heading towards down into a rocky valley in the forest. There would probably be a river through here when the snows melt, she thought. A little valley filled with rocks, maybe some caves. Sheltered and hidden. Exactly the type of place forest giants would gather.

Val glimpsed the figure before the others did. The others probably mistook it for a rock at first glance. Despite their size, it was always amazing how easily giants could blend into the woods.

She heard the curse from Snow as the rock stood up. The giant was a big one; at least fourteen feet with malted, shaggy brown fur. It wailed and stomped its feet, scratching at the leaves with stubby fingers. Even hunched up it loomed over them all, barely thirty feet between them.

“Gods,” she heard Snow mutter as the other men called in the Old Tongue. “It's huge.”

She smiled, edging forward cautiously. “Too big to be from one of the forest tribes. He's a mountain giant. I guess they've been taking in outcasts and survivors from other clans too.”
“He’s an outcast?”

“Why do you think he's sitting in the forest by himself?”

They edged forward slowly. The giant kept on wailing, but backed away and kept the distance between them. A sentry. It sniffed the air with every step back, hunched up so its knuckles trailed across the ground.

Val walked slower, but pushed on ahead. “You can tell the difference between the tribes,” she noted. “The plains and mountains giants are big sods, but they're more used to moving and socialising, even with humans. They're less aggressive. Generally they'll run rather than fight.”

“And the forest giants?”

“They're the ones that you really want for your army, if you can get them. They're territorial, and that means they know how to defend it. The forest giants know how to fight.”

They could see the camp approaching. Between the trees, the forest shivered with large shapes moving. It was like the trees themselves were moving. They heard the sound of footsteps, and grunting and sniffing. Some of the wails sounded angry. Snow looked ready to back away.

“Stand straight,” she hissed. “Make yourself as big as possible. Got to make sure they see you.”

The giants seemed to ripple out of the trees, surrounding them. Some of them had brown pelts, others black, some patchy and others streaked with grey. Several hoisted weapons; huge clubs larger than a man, some so big and heavy that even the giants had to drag them across the ground.

A couple big brutes waved their clubs threatening, causing Hatch to curse and clutch his maul tightly. Snow looked ready to back away, but Val forced herself to stand her ground.

“It’s just a show of dominance,” she told herself. Don’t panic. Still, it was hard not to panic with an immense roaring beast towering over you. Twice Val’s height and ten times her weight. Each one was so broad and stocky they looked like walls of fur and muscles.

The sounds of grunting and wailing filled the air. Val knew the Old Tongue, but even she could barely make out the words. The Thenn spoke the dialect better. He replied with short, sharp sentences. “Friends,” the man called in the Old Tongue “Friends. We are friends!”

Most of them were around ten to eleven feet tall. The first giant they saw in the forest had been freakishly large. Hatch the Halfgiant had never looked so small.

“Tell them we offer protection from the dead,” she whispered. “We want to fight the wights too.”

Hatch and the Thenn held their hands up in the air, shouting to the giants. Val looked for the biggest giants, or the ones with the largest club. One of the giants was speckled brown beast wearing a bone necklaces of assorted skulls – goats, wolves, possibly human too – around his neck and a thick club in his hand. “Focus on the chieftains or the best warriors. The other giants will follow them.”

Val knew only vaguely about the dynamics of giant tribes. A single clan could have several chieftains that would lead them when it came to blood, but there would also be matriarchs that would lead for everything other than fighting or hunting. They formed very close-knit groups, and were quick to anger. You had to stay alert when approaching them; constantly respectful, constantly non-threatening.

Snow's mouth hung open slightly as more and more giants gathered around them, sniffing and stamping. At least a hundred, Val reckoned. Maybe more than two. In this single camp there must be several dozen giant clans forced together from the Others’ attacks.

It took a long time for them to calm. A few giants looked threatening, but Val and the other free folk slowly reassured them as they placed down sacks of fruit and vegetables.

For the most part, Snow stayed quiet. “Tell them about Hardhome,” he whispered eventually. “Tell them there is protection.”

Val caught only a few words. One of the big ones stomped and growled. “Monster,” it said. “Flying death. Monster.”

Hatch translated. “They already know,” he said. “They're afraid to approach Hardhome because of the dragon.”

“Ah. Tell them that dragon is no threat. The dragon is there to protect them.”

It took a lot of pleading for them to relax, and even more to get their meaning across. The giants skittered, staring at them curiously.

Val saw a little giant, a babe, about four feet tall. It stood up to her chest, but it was so broad it was probably already heavier than she was. It had weirdly lanky arms and knuckles that dragged across the soil. Val stared into a gaping square jaw hanging open filled with large, flat teeth. The little giant approached curiously, reaching out to touch her blond hair in fascination. She forced herself to stay still. The giant babe wasn’t aggressive, yet it still had strong, curious, stubby fingers.

Slowly, the free folk asked for permission to bring the rest of the warband into camp, which was eventually accepted. Val gave orders to bring them in only four or five at a time, and to constantly talk to the giants to reassure them.

Snow had learned four words in the Old Tongue – ‘Greetings’, ‘Friends’, ‘Help’ and ‘Snow’ – and he was trying to use them repeatedly to introduce himself. He sounded like an idiot. A few of the giants were laughing at him.

The giant’s ‘camp’ had no tents or fire pits. The giants had been huddled together against the cold.

It took a while for them to convince the giants to follow them into Hardhome. The giants made no decisions, but they weren’t throwing them out either. They mingled very cautiously, but agreed that the free folk could stay with them for the night and travel back in the morning.

At Snow's order, the free folk set up a perimeter, and lit fires around the camp. A few of the free folk told stories of the dragon to the giants. The younger giants were more willing to mix with the men, while the older giants huddled together and growled at any humans who tried to approach them.

As dusk fell, Val was wide awake, keeping watch by the fire. She heard the lopsided steps as Snow approached her. “Two hundred and eleven giants,” Snow said finally.

“You’re a good counter.” The majority of the giants in the camp were from the forest tribes, but some plains and mountains giants were mixed in.

“We've already got a hundred or so at Hardhome,” he said, settling in around her fire. “Do you think any more will come?"

“Maybe,” Val admitted, but with uncertainty.

Jon cast a look behind him, where Borroq was meditating by the fire pit. The skinchanger stayed a good distance away from anyone else. “We need to use skinchangers to find them. Men that can search through an eagle's eye. Groups of skinchangers could track down survivors before the Others do.”

“And what? You want an army of giants?”

“I want any advantage I can get. Bring them in, give them armour, give them proper weapons. Teach them how to fight alongside humans.”

Val snorted, but Snow looked so earnest she might actually believe him. He looked at her seriously. “What would it take?” Jon asked. “To bring men and giants together?”

She shrugged. “Give them shelter. Food. You'd have to talk to the chiefs one by one. The old chieftains would never agree to it – too much distrust towards men – but the matriarchs… hmm. Maybe. It would be a lot of work.”

“It usually is, my lady.”

Val grunted. “And what? You'd try to send legions of giants on the front lines?”

“I think they'd be better served in the rear, actually. Strength to support the troops, mammoths to carry supplies. They could move siege weapons, even. What sort of bow would a giant be able to fire?”

She glanced at him, measuring his expression. “Fine. Let's say it's possible and I agree with you. What's the plan, King Snow?”

He shrugged. “I will be marching on the Wall very shortly. Eastwatch is vulnerable, but I want to get Hardhome secure before I leave,” he said. “Sonagon takes Eastwatch, we open the gates, and then move across to Castle Black. Bring through as many refugees as possible.”

“And Hardhome?”

“Stays safe. Protects the women and children until we can move them by ship. Brings in the giants. Hardhome needs to keep sending out parties against the Others and looking for survivors, while I take a force to secure the Wall.” He nodded. “When we’re ready to leave, it has to be quick and smooth.”

Around them, the night crackled and hissed. Outside the campfires, the darkness in the forest was absolute. Val sat still, judging his expression. “And you want me to…?”

“I need people to manage Hardhome while I'm gone. I need leaders I can trust. You're one of them.”

She thought about it. “I see.”

That was all she said. That was all she wanted to say right now, at least. Snow looked at her quietly as if expecting more, but then handed her a skin of water. “I look forward to working with you, my lady.”
Val twitched. My lady. Every time he called her that, it caused her to twitch. He said it sounding so serious and forlorn too. “There are times when I think you're trying to irritate me, King Snow.”

“Of course not, my lady.”

Jon

He looked out over the sea, a craggy coastline overlooking the rugged waters of the Bay of Seals. He could see the towering black outline of the Wall in the distance, about ten leagues away. The cliffs were barren rocks, swept clean by vicious winds, but the wildlings had used this coast to launch raids across the bay for centuries.

Right now, they were sheltered in what used to be a small fishing village on the craggy coast. Four thousand wildling warriors left Hardhome, ready to take Eastwatch. The camp was alive, filled with warriors and spearwives ready for battle.

Jon’s heart pounded. It had been pounding for days. Even after coming up with the plan, even after convincing the other wildlings to follow through with it, and even after all of the preparation, he was still nervous. All around him, the free folk were cheering, celebrating, like the battle was already won, while Jon felt the fear seeping into him.

Today is the day that I will defeat the Wall.

He looked at the hulking shape of Sonagon, resting on the ground. The men clambered around the dragon like ants.

“Leather straps!” Devyn Sealskinner ordered. “Quickly, leather straps, around its wings!”

The dragon grumbled. Jon took a deep breath, trying to push calm, reassuring thoughts. It had taken a lot for Sonagon to stay still. They had to bribe the dragon with fish, and then wait for Sonagon to roost in the evening before they could get close. Even then, Jon had to be on hand constantly.

Mounting the harness on Sonagon had proved a major feat all by itself.

It started with a quiet word to Furs about whether or not it would be possible. Furs passed it on to Devyn Sealskinner and two dozen other sailors and crafters. It had spiralled into a major undertaking requiring all the leather and hides the free folk could muster, and every skilled leatherworker in the host. Two hundred men tanning and weaving, another hundred to bring in enough leather, not even counting the men trying to coordinate them.

Truth be told, Jon did little while others arranged it. There were a multitude of tasks that needed his attention in preparation for the assault, and it was just a quiet relief to have one less.

The harness was a hulking mess of long leather straps, hides and hemp rope designed to wrap around the dragon. They hooked the rope onto the dragon’s spikes, with a leather harness to across its back, and then underneath its belly. Jon hadn't quite realised how big Sonagon’s body was until they tried to wrap leather around it.

The harness came in two parts, one on across the dragon’s skull and horns and the other across his back. No more clinging desperately onto rough ropes around the horns; instead it would be a securely fastened harness that Jon could tie himself into. The leather harness on the head would be big enough to support four men easily between the dragon’s horns.

The harness across Sonagon’s back proved more difficult; it needed to be fastened very carefully across the dragon’s wings and huge, serpentine body. The back harness was much larger, more difficult to climb on, but large enough for well over three dozen men to hold on between the dragon’s wings as it flew. There were even straps that could hold the soldier's weapons, and positions that hopefully good bowmen would be able to fire from. Archers and warriors on a dragon’s back.

The hard part was trying to fasten the damned thing. Strong climbers had to scale Sonagon’s body to wrap the leather straps, and trying to climb a dragon’s body was not a task for the faint of heart.
They were all brave men trying to delicately complete such a cumbersome task, particularly when a single movement from the dragon might easily crush someone.

Jon could feel the dragon’s irritation with so many figures moving around him. It took everything
Jon had to keep the dragon calm, and still. Convincing the dragon to shift his body to one side slightly to allow them to fasten the straps had been an achievement by itself.

Devyn tutted slightly, frowning as he inspected his men’s work. “We made the leather as strong as possible. Still no telling how long it’ll hold, though. Don’t let the dragon dive into the water.”

Jon nodded. “Are you happy with it?”

“It’s the best we could have done with so little time,” Devyn conceded. “But still so little. Amazing how difficult wrapping a few straps around a dragon really is. If I had more time…”

“You’d do what?”

He thought about it. “Better leather saddles for across the back. Stronger hide as cover from the wind. I added some thick leather across the head – thought it might protect the dragon’s neck and lower jaw a bit – but we should think about armour as well.”

Jon shook his head. Around them, men were shouting for ropes to be pulled. “Maybe something to shield Sonagon’s eyes and snout,” he said, not a clue how that would even be possible. A dragon helm, perhaps? “But Sonagon’s wings are the most vulnerable, and those are too wide to protect.”

“Aye, that’d be a challenge. Can’t put too much weight on the wings, either. Maybe a leather sheath, but damned if I know how we could mount it. For armour, most we could do is around the underbelly, neck and jaw, possibly legs, but that’d be a lot extra weight and a lot extra hassle.”

“Not worth it. Sonagon’s scales are already harder than most metal.” He paused. “Yet I was taught that Valyrian dragonlords used to use armour dragons in steel plate.”

“Heh. You would float on a breastplate that size. How much can your dragon carry, anyways?”

“I’m not sure,” Jon admitted. “He could likely carry his own weight again, at least briefly. More weight and he struggles. Right now, I’m thinking two dozen fully grown men would be a safe bet for any journey.”

“Well, it’ll be an uncomfortable ride,” Devyn noted. “Make sure you get men strong enough to hold on tight. The head is a pretty stable seat, though that one will jerk around a lot, but the back?
That’s going to be sitting right on the wing muscles.”

“We better bring heavy furs too,” Jon admitted. “It gets cold.”

“Ha! I can imagine. I think you’d be best off looking for experienced sea raiders to join you up there. They’d probably handle it better.”

Jon grimaced quietly. The news that he was making a harness to fly men on the dragon had spread like wildfire. I should have expected it, for bragging rights alone. How many could say that they’ve flown to war on a dragon’s back?

Jon had been flying Sonagon frequently recently; testing the dragon’s power, scouting the distance, moving between the two armies here and in Hardhome. The dragon loved flying again, growing stronger with every journey.

He had decided to ferry two dozen strong men across on Sonagon, an advance force that could make a difference if things went badly. If the harness was completed in time, Jon had offered thirty positions to the strongest warriors willing, but he had half-expected that nobody would stand forward. After all, they would have to fly through cold, harsh weather clutching a possibly unstable harness, all the while being easy targets for any archer aiming for the dragon.

That offer proved a mistake. The raiders took it as a challenge, and then two days ago Jon found the free folk hosting a miniature gladiator tournament all vying viciously for a spot on the dragon’s back before Jon put a stop to it.

The harness was already being tightened, but they looked like frilly bands of leather against the dragon’s white scales.

They would attack in three parts. The main force heads towards the gates, the vanguard crosses over the frozen water, and an advance force flying over on Sonagon’s back.

Assuming all went well, they would arrive at Eastwatch with the depleted men of the Night’s Watch surrendering peacefully, or maybe abandoning the castle all together. That would be enough for the free folk to fortify Eastwatch and open the gates wide.

If not, and things became bloody, Sonagon could douse the castle in dragonfire, and end resistance quickly. That’s the final resort, Jon told himself.

Jon knew he was probably over-preparing, wasting himself in trying to plan every eventuality. They likely wouldn’t face any sizeable resistance at all. Still, he was nervous so he made plans.

This time tomorrow, I will take the wildlings south. I will defeat the Wall and I will open the gates for the free folk.

He took a deep breath to focus on the task at hand. Less than twelve hours now. Did time always move this slowly?

Eventually, he left Devyn Sealskinner and the others to finish up the harness. A dozen men flanked Jon as he walked through the camp. In the distance, he saw the large shapes of mammoths rumbling over the ice. Giant clans ferrying supplies from Hardhome to them.

It was the eve of the battle, and it seemed like everyone was carving more arrowheads, weaving rope or sharpening weapons.

He met the Weeper bellowing at men to get into formation. The Weeper’s face was still bruised, as was Jon’s, but he had no time to hold grudges. “How goes the preparations for the march?” Jon asked.

“Aye. I got a thousand good men ready to cross the ice. As many from the ice lake clans as possible – they’ll take the front. The Thenns will bring up the rear. Make damn sure your dragon does a good job freezing the ocean.”

“Just make sure your men are ready to move light and fast,” Jon said. “How about the men who will be riding on Sonagon? Have they been picked?"

“I’ve got twenty-nine of the strongest meanest raiders I could find.”

“The hell I ain’t. I’m the strongest meanest raider around here.”

“Your job is to lead the men over the ice.”

“Let Sigorn and Rattleshirt handle that, I’ll be buggered if I’ll let you fly on ahead.”

Jon didn’t trust Rattleshirt enough for that. Hells, he didn't really trust the Weeper, but at least the Weeper was reliable in an untrustworthy way. “You lead the men, I’ll lead the dragon.”

“I expect the battle will be over by the time we get there.”

“Perhaps.” Hopefully. “But I still need the main force to secure Eastwatch.”

He snorted. “It’s not so hard to secure corpses.”

“No killing.” Jon’s eyes were hard. “That was the deal.”

“Sure. No killing unless they try to kill us.” A cruel little grin past over the Weeper’s face. “But as soon as they do, I’ll slaughter them all.”

Not for the first time, Jon wondered about his ability to keep the wildlings in line. It was one of many matters to worry about.

Across the camp, Devyn’s men had finished securing the dragon harness. Right now, they were busy feeding Sonagon the last of the supplies they had set to one side. Huge sacks of fish, some of them rotten, were poured out in front of the dragon. Jon saw Sonagon’s nose twitch hungrily as the dragon’s neck stretched outwards. Normally they fed the dragon livestock or garron, but fish was a tasty delicacy for it.

There are metal-rich stones on the coast too, Jon thought. The dragon would fill up on fish, and then chew rocks for his stomach. Jon wanted Sonagon well fed and content for tomorrow, so he would be less likely to snack on any men.

He found Iron Emmett tied up to his post in a tent, but Jon had instructed that the prisoner needed extra rations. He needed his strength for tomorrow too.

“Emmett,” Jon called, with the Weeper and a dozen others behind him. “How are you?”

The man’s eyes were dark. Three times now Emmett had tried to escape. One time he had waited for a chance to throttle Jon. The sworn brother was every bit as dangerous as his reputation suggested. Jon took care never to approach him alone.

“You are a fool, Snow,” Emmett growled. “Gods, if you let the wildlings south they’ll rape and pillage the north. They always have.”

“If they do, I’ll stop them,” Jon replied coolly. “But it seems to me that keeping them locked up north just encourages more raping and pillaging. You’ve seen the real enemy, Emmett, or are you doubting your own eyes?”
A pause. “I saw the blue-eyed dead that night, aye.” Emmett growled. “But that does not make the wildlings any less of savages, or you any less of a traitor.”

I can’t really argue that one, he supposed. “Enemy of my enemy,” said Jon. “But enough. We will release you when we start to march. You will have furs. We’ll give you back your cloak. It’s ten leagues to the Wall, I suggest you make haste. Do you know what you have to say?”

“That wildlings and monsters are coming.” His voice was bitter.

“That anyone who surrenders will not be harmed,” Jon said. “Surrender the castle peacefully and nobody dies, on my word.”

“The word of an oathbreaker? What’s that worth?”

More than you think. “It’s all you have. This offer is a courtesy – I need not give it. I could quite easily take the castle by force, and I’m prepared to do so.” His eyes were hard. “Make sure you remind them of that.”

Emmett glared, but Jon could see the doubt in his eyes too.

“I want you and Sigorn leading on the ice,” Jon said to the Weeper after a pause. “Have Rattleshirt stay behind with the reserves. The dragon goes first, the army follows, and as soon as the door is open Rattleshirt brings the rest through.”

“Fine.”

“And I’ll send Devyn back to Hardhome by boat,” Jon said after a pause. “Have him tell Val and the others to prepare to follow.”

“What about the Others?” Furs asked. “What if they attack?”

“They’re in retreat. Hardhome is defended. I don’t think the Others are bold enough to launch an attack like that.” Not yet. “They’ll wait for a better opportunity.”

“If you say so.” Jon had organised two dozen hunt squads to work through the forests around the cape, to cut down as many of wights as possible. They could secure the area and keep the Others at bay, at least until they opened the Eastwatch gate.

Jon looked around his army and sighed softly. Tomorrow, he would fight the Night’s Watch. Fight against his sworn brothers.

The thought made him pause. My brothers are dead. My real brothers had died while I was lost in the wilderness searching for a dragon. The Night’s Watch were the only family I have left, but I turned my back on them too.

The camp was tense, but there was nothing to do except wait and prepare. Jon walked around the camp, inspecting the clans and soldiers. He knew he wouldn't be able to sleep, so instead he paced through the camp.

Even at night, at least a hundred men or women – mostly women, actually – surrounded Sonagon. The dragon gathered a retinue that would flock around him whenever he was in camp; that would prepare meals, sometimes even clean his scales. A week ago they had an incident when a crofter’s girl very nearly died after being knocked by the dragon’s tail and Jon had tried to stop the followers, but they always seemed to come back.
Everywhere he looked, he saw men, women and children staring at him wide-eyed, with white stones on their furs. Even more of the raiders were taking the white stones now.

Jon honestly didn't know what to do about that one. It made him uncomfortable, but he also seriously doubted that he would have the same support if it wasn’t for his followers. Sonagon was no god, but Jon found himself protesting less and less whenever tributes were made. There were four old women who would prepare his meals every day, served on iron plates. Jon and all of his guards ate well.

He paused for a long time, staring at the outline of Sonagon further towards the coast. Tomorrow, for the first time in three hundred years, a dragon would invade the Seven Kingdoms once more.

It would be an easy battle, he told himself. It would be so easy that it didn’t deserve the amount he had been obsessing over it. They had forty times the number of men and a dragon. The Night’s Watch would be fools to try and fight back. Eastwatch was an undermanned castle cradled by a fishing village, with more ships than they had sailors to man them. The castle would never stand a chance, and everyone knew it. It would be an easy victory.

So why do I feel so nervous?

He spent the evening pacing. Darkness seemed to fall painstakingly slowly, until finally it was time for the army to move.

“Weeper! Sigorn! Get ready to march!” Jon bellowed. “All men to Sonagon, we mount now! Bring rope and as many furs as possible!”

The camp seemed to ripple. Jon motioned to Rolf and Hatch to keep everyone else back, while the thirty men gathered around Sonagon. Thirty very experienced men and they all looked terrified approaching the dragon. The man leading the warband was a grizzled white-haired Thenn named Stiga. One of Sigorn’s cousins, Jon had heard.

“You need to climb up onto its back,” Jon instructed. “Two men at a time; climb up towards the rear, over his hind legs. The scales are poor handholds, so be careful. Do not touch the wings. Leave weapons behind for now, bring rope instead. Climb up and hook yourselves onto the back spines, and then wrap yourself in as many furs as you can. It will be really cold.”

Jon went first. His heart pounded as he climbed up the dragon’s horn and delicately levered himself into the unfamiliar leather harness. It was uncomfortable, but Jon wrapped furs around him and tied himself down with the straps, clutching the rope. The leather straps had been left deliberately sparse to allow quick movement, but they still felt like very flimsy, sparse tethers that might be the only thing keeping him alive.

The dragon had been well-fed and sated, but Sonagon was still on edge. Jon watched with hushed breath as the men behind him slowly scaled the dragon’s back. Mounting the dragon was a feat by itself, let alone holding onto dear life.

Thirty free folk warriors – most of them Thenns – armed with willow longbows and copper spears, wrapped in sheepskin furs over bronze platemail.

His heart was in his mouth, watching with quiet horror and wondering if one man might accidentally poke one of Sonagon’s wounds, and then Sonagon would surely snap and tear the man apart in anger. It took everything Jon had to keep the dragon calm, but still…

How long does it take to mount men onto a dragon? Is it always so cumbersome? They’ll never be able to dismount quickly in battle. We’re using a dragon alongside military tactics, Jon thought to himself, something that hadn’t been done in over a hundred years. There’s no experience with this. We have to make up the strategies as we go.

I wonder, how did the ancient Valyrian generals used to stop their war assets from eating their own army?

The camp was screaming, or cheering, as the last Thenn dragged himself up and held out to Sonagon’s back ridges, the man tying himself to the leather straps. Stiga was shouting in the Old Tongue, a series of short harsh raspy cries to rally his men. Jon could feel the tension in the air. They all grunted fiercely; raiders about to experience the most extreme raid of their lives.

He suddenly wished that he had warned Stiga to spare the battle speech: it would be a long, cold flight, and it was still far too early for any speeches.

And then, finally, they were ready. Jon gave the unspoken command, and Sonagon lumbered upwards. The dragon growled with irritation with the passengers, but Jon soothed him. Jon clutched the ropes, and behind him he heard the screams of the raiders clutching on as the dragon reared up.

Giant wings unfurled slowly. The first beat of immense muscles sent shockwaves through the camp. The sound drowned out even the cheering of the free folk.

This is the fifth time that I’ve flown on a dragon now, he thought.

It never became any less magnificent, or less terrifying.

Suddenly, the night sky rushed up to meet them. The cold air hit him like a warhammer, as the dragon gained speed frighteningly fast. Even with thirty men on his back, Sonagon was no less graceful in the air.

The wind was deadly, so cold that it could easily bite off fingers. Even under his thick hide furs, clutching the Sonagon’s scales, he could feel the wind buffering around him. If there was any exposed skin at all, the cold wind would bite it off.

His heart was beating. Jon couldn’t hear anything from the men on Sonagon’s back, but he just had to hope they could hold on.

It was exhilarating. Terrifying. The pressure, the wind, the power, the acceleration. Each beat of Sonagon’s wings threatened to tear him apart.

Jon gasped, trying to focus. Focus.

He extended his mind. He felt himself slipping out of his skin.

And suddenly the world shifted. He was staring out over a black ocean, feeling the joy in his wings with every beat. Sonagon loved flying. Everything was so black and cold, even Sonagon’s vision could barely make out a thing, but the smell… the scent of the ocean was so overwhelming, but on the wind there were fragrances and tastes from leagues and leagues away. It felt Jon was the king of the world, the natural predator in his element.

Focus. Don’t lose myself. Give Sonagon his freedom, but keep him under control too. Focus on the task. Sonagon quite often enjoyed diving into the water during flights, but if he did that now it would kill everyone. Sonagon couldn’t be completely controlled, but Jon just needed to push him in the right direction, to steer him.
The dragon swept through the black night. They would be nearly invisible in the dark.

The ships. The night patrols across the bay from Eastwatch. There were usually two ships, both undermanned by tired but experienced crewmen. Firstly, Jon needed to disable them, to keep their men away from defending or warning Eastwatch.

Sonagon picked up the pinprick scent of oak, metal and sweat among the salty sea air. Jon pushed Sonagon gently, and the dragon turned in the air, dropping low over the water.

He could see the glow of heat and lanterns from the ship. The Talon, Jon guessed. A narrow and low sloop with a dozen men on board; old, but sturdy against cold storms.

Sonagon came in fast and hard. The dragon’s wings folded, beating powerful strokes as the roar broke the air. Jon heard screams. Raw, strangled screams of pure panic. Even if there were archers ready and waiting with bows, Jon gave them no chance to fire. Sonagon went too fast.

I’ve learned my lesson after facing Stannis’ fleet. Don’t give them any chance to retaliate.

The cold exploded from the dragon’s jaw. Jon heard the hissing. The water, he pushed, as forcefully as he dared. Freeze the water, not the ship.

It was over in less than a dozen heartbeats. A single pass left the Talon caught in a streak of hissing ice across its port, and then the second pass it’s rear was frozen too. The sea water froze in icy tendrils, trapping the whole boat instantly. The sloop would be trapped in an iceberg so cold that, even with pickaxes, it would take days to get the ship free.

It will be dangerous for them to be frozen on these waters, but I can send men to rescue them once I have a chance. Lives would be threatened no matter what Jon did or didn’t do. He took the route with the best chance of saving the most.

It took an hour and a half before Jon caught the second patrol ship, off the coast of Skagos. With only a single pass, that ship was frozen too, left to drift aimlessly on a chunk of ice. The iceberg would probably drift back onto the peninsula of Skagos. Sonagon was already turning around, the dragon roaring over the bay and towards the mainland.

It was well past the hour of the raven. Need to hurry. The army will be on the move, probably nearing the coast. They wanted to cross the ocean at dawn, so they had the sunrise on their side.

The shape of the Wall loomed over head, a black brick on the coast, taller than a mountain. Eastwatch was barely a lump cradled at the Wall’s feet. Jon tried to keep the dragon low and slow, to save themselves the worst of the coastal winds.

Sonagon’s roar was like thunder. They’ll know we’re here, even if they can’t see us in the dark.

Freeze, Jon pushed, focusing on the swirling ocean. Freeze, ice, freeze.

The dragon grumbled, but his body was powerful and well-rested. Songaon wanted to exert himself, to conquer. Ice was the dragon’s domain. With a low growl, the white cold fire exploded outwards, firing over the sea.

Jon felt his body almost lose grip as the cold air hit them from below. Behind, Sonagon felt a shape topple off his back, crashing against his tail as he swept upwards again.

A man fell off, Jon cursed. The dragonfire was so cold that the man’s body exploded before it hit the water, lost in the cold mist. Jon could only hope the remaining men would hold on tighter.
Sonagon circled for a second pass. He breathed a continuous stream of fire for nineteen seconds, but then needed to break. Not so cold, Jon thought desperately. It was hard for Sonagon to understand such awkward instructions. I need less intense dragon fire, but more continuous. Longer, freeze further streaks.

The second pass lasted almost a minute. A full minute of icy fire, transforming everything it touched into solid ice.

Each pass formed jagged chunks stripping out of the sea, the tendrils pluming outwards. Smoother, Jon thought with a silent curse. They have to walk over that ice; try to freeze the water into smoother pathways.

Half a dozen passes, and beneath them the ocean was consistently transforming into an icy wasteland. Great billows of steam rose upwards. Sonagon was panting now, straining more and more with every breath.

Jon was panting too, his muscles hurting from holding on so tightly. It was still dark, but there was just the faintest tinges in the distance of the sun about to rise.

Sonagon could hear shouts from atop the Wall. The men of Night’s Watch would have seen the dragon beneath them, working his way south across the coastline. The darkness was Sonagon’s best cover, but that was fading. How long before they start shooting arrows from the Wall? How long before one gets a lucky shot?

Need a distraction. Move forward, trust that there’s ice enough for now.

Sonagon flapped forward, zooming over the frozen water. Jon saw the shadows and harbours of Eastwatch zooming ahead. Cut off any defence before they could mount one.

With a single breath, the harbour exploded into ice. Jon heard the bells of Eastwatch ringing in panic.

His body was trembling. Sonagon flapped, twisting around low to the group. I need to be brutal here. Force them to surrender quickly.

Sonagon roared overhead, so loud the earth rumbled. Jon wanted absolutely everyone to see the size of the dragon.

With a single beat of his wings, Sonagon twisted around in the air. Beneath him, Jon glimpsed old towers among thatch houses of the fishing village, and men and women running for their lives.

Sonagon dropped to the ground in the plains outside of the Eastwatch, the grass scattered in light snow. As the dragon dropped, great clouds of snow billowed around him.

Jon was panting for breath. It was almost dawn. The free folk had very experienced mountain and frozen lake men leading the front, men experienced at traversing ice, but it would still be slow going. Jon needed to cover them until they reached Eastwatch, to take the castle and the Wall.

“Everyone off!” Jon shouted, at the Thenns on Sonagon’s back. Twenty-nine free folk as a landing party, to hold the ground until the main force arrived. “Quickly now!”

Few of them spoke the Common tongue, but they got the meaning. The men looked ill and woozy from the long flight as they lowered ropes to climb down. The dragon trembled impatiently, growling at Eastwatch as the sun rose sluggishly over the horizon. They had barely even dismounted before Sonagon burst off again, roaring into the sky.
The earth disappeared. Jon saw rushing bodies across the castle and the Wall. In the morning sun, the frozen ocean looked like some strange, alien wasteland. He could barely make out the shadow of the wildling host on the other side of the coast, on the edge of the frozen, steaming ocean. The Weeper made good time, he must have driven the men hard.

Eastwatch is still a strong castle. Don't afford them the chance to build up a defence.

This is the first time I've been to Eastwatch. I never thought I would come to destroy it.

With an immense crash, Sonagon dropped right on top the castle’s keep, claws clinging to the tiled woodwork. The whole structure seemed to groan, stones clattering. With a single breath, the courtyard was split into ice. Jon could barely even hear the screams of terror. The second dragon breath tore open the balconies atop a tower, causing the stone to crackle and explode with cold. A warning for any archers that might try to take position against them.

Jon saw men on the Wall. He glimpsed shafts being loosed at them.

In a second, Sonagon shot upwards, tearing through the sky and to the top of the Wall. Seven hundred feet in an instant, the acceleration so fast that Jon nearly gagged. It took everything Jon had to suppress Sonagon’s urge to eat, and instead the dragon’s tail whipped out furiously, and then a craning siege weapon and winch atop the Wall shattered into massive splinters.

Jon glimpsed black shapes falling off the Wall, screaming. Men of the Night’s Watch driven off the edge in the chaos and panic, and dead because of him. Jon’s stomach clenched, but there was nothing he could do. He couldn’t save everyone.

Eastwatch was in chaos. A single sweep of the dragon was all it took to send the castle mad. Jon saw the group of free folk charging through the chaos – twenty-nine good men to hold the harbour while the dragon terrorised any defence.

How long before the Weeper’s men get here? Maybe another four hours to cross the frozen ocean. Sonagon just had to stop any foolish acts of bravery until the free folk arrived, and then they would have the men to hold castle and open the gates.

A dragon could destroy a castle easily, but Jon didn't want to demolish it. Jon needed to wait for the Weeper’s men before he could take Eastwatch itself.

The time moved so slowly. There was no battle; just pure, constant panic. Sonagon did regular passes of the castle, the Wall, the coast and the harbour. He saw men of the Night’s Watch riding from the castle, or across the Wall. Jon considered giving chase, but then decided against it. Let them run; running is better than fighting.

It took another twelve passes to freeze the ocean before he was confident the ice was solid enough. If anything it might be too cold.

Finally, when he saw the shapes of men skittering across the ice with ropes and ice picks, Jon knew it was as good as over. The advance force held position and faced barely any resistance, while Sonagon easily scattered anything that looked like a defensive perimeter.

It was noon by the time Jon finally dismounted the dragon. The raiders were clattering on the coast. The free folk in the harbour killed seven men, four Night’s Watch and three fishermen, but only those that tried to drive them away. The bodies left a foul taste in Jon’s mouth, particularly as he dismounted and clutched Dark Sister tightly.

About fifty men on the harbour, but more arriving every second. Easily enough to take Eastwatch.
Jon let Sonagon fly away. “To me!” He called, as others took up the cry. “Take the castle!”

On the ground, the perspective was so different. Eastwatch was an old dumpy castle, squat and well-made, but even the brief passes from Sonagon had ruined it. Half the tower had collapsed from where Sonagon had perched, Jon noted. He hadn’t realised at the time.

They encountered no resistance, but he glimpsed faces hiding in huts and houses. Old women, children, mothers – those too scared to run. The men of the Night’s Watch had fled with every horse they could find.

Or so he thought. Then, Jon rushed into the castle courtyard, he saw a dozen men in black waiting for him, huddled by the tower steps, clutching swords and bows. The free folk around him growled.

“Yield!” Jon shouted, holding up his sword. “Yield right now, and you will not be harmed!”

“Aye? You mean to feed us to that monster instead?” A sworn brother growled, a broad man with a stocky jaw and broken nose.

“No one will be harmed, you have my word,” Jon said, glaring at the free folk. “So long as you surrender your swords.”

“And what is the word of a traitor worth?” The man spat. “Jon Snow, I presume? You made a vow.”

“I did.” I made several. “And please don’t force me to break it. Lower your weapons.” Jon glared at the man. He was a brave man, facing off against Jon and fifty wildlings behind him. The other brothers were scared, but they looked to the one in charge. “Cotter Pyke, yes? You have command here?”

“What did you do to my ships, traitor?” Cotter Pyke demanded. “The men on them?”

“The ships frozen in icebergs, ser,” Jon replied coolly. “But the men unarmed. And will remain so, as long as you surrender now.”

Cotter snorted. “I am no ser.” His eyes were angry, defiant. “Eight thousand years this Wall has stood. You expect me to step aside and let it fall under my watch?”

Jon took a step forward. “If you are that eager to die, ser, then I have no choice but to oblige you.”

There was a pause. Behind him, he had no doubt that the wildlings would happily kill all the crows they could.

Finally, Cotter’s gaze twitched. “Lower your weapons,” he said, his voice sour. “We surrender.”

Jon suppressed a breath of relief. A castle fallen, the Wall breeched, and it appeared only single casualty on their side. One man who fell off the dragon.

Swords clattered to the ground. Jon nodded at the free folk. “Collect them, escort the crows to their quarters. If they resist, escort them to the cells.”

“Where are their quarters? Where are the cells?”

“Not sure,” Jon admitted. “Search the castle.”

About two dozen men of the Night’s Watch in total, mostly old stewards or builders. Everyone who couldn’t run. Cotter Pyke himself could have run, though, Jon thought, instead he must have chosen to stay behind at his post. Brave man.

He saw wildlings roughly marching an elderly maester – Maester Harmune, he recalled – at spearpoint. Jon wanted to order them to be gentler, but he couldn’t. He had to pick his battles. It already took all of his control to stop them from killing the crows, it would be too much of a stretch to order them to act nice as well. Cotter Pyke looked absolutely furious as he saw wildlings stomping into the grounds, chanting and cheering.

“You’re going to destroy the north,” Cotter said. “Those savages will rape and pillage everything in their path.”

They would probably try, Jon admitted. He had to keep the wildlings under control too. “Your man,” Jon said. “Iron Emmett. Where is he?”

“Halfway to Last Hearth by now, I expect,” he scoffed, folding his arms.

So they ran to the Umbers. It made sense. Jon fully expected that Cotter Pyke’s men had either ran west to Castle Black or south to the nearest northern houses for aid. Jon just nodded. “I trust he made it safely?”

“Aye, arrived eleven hours ago, half-dead from cold. Always was a faster runner, Emmett,” Cotter said. “Babbling on about raiders coming, and dragons. Didn't really need to, I’ve seen that monster before.”

Jon paused. “You were at Hardhome.”

“Aye, I was escorting the King’s fleet. The Blackbird was at the rear though, and much tougher than any southern ships. We made it out of the ice. The Queen never believed me when I came back rambling about what I saw. Not until the King made it back as well five days later. Never seen so many men run so fast.”

“You didn’t run.”

“I did not,” Cotter agreed. “I've spent the last two weeks trying to think of some way to stop a monster like yours. Still didn't come up with anything.”

It shouldn’t have been this easy, Jon thought. The Wall should be better defended. If I could get through it, then how long until the Others did the same?

“Stannis Baratheon?” Jon demanded. “What happened to him?”

“Two ships of his crawled back a week ago. They grabbed his Queen and Princess and sailed south pretty damn sharpish. Your dragon put the fear of god into them.”

“Where to?”

“His Grace never deigned to tell me.”

“But he survived.”

“Presume so.”

Jon hadn’t been sure if Stannis would live or not after he lost his hand. Stannis had less than a thousand men, apparently, he was no threat now. Still, would he be able to rally more and try again?

One problem at a time. “Sigorn!” Jon shouted. “The gatehouse is through there! Have your men secure the tunnel and open the gate.”

The Magnar grinned a toothy smile. Jon saw the Weeper charging through the crowd. The free folk looked exhausted from the trek over the ice, but they were already celebrating. Can’t let them celebrate, not now, he thought. Free folk tended to rape when celebrating.

“Weeper, we need to get on top of the Wall,” Jon shouted. “As many as you can grab, get up there and light the signal. Clear the wall and set up sentries.”

“You expected an ambush?”

Not really, but it’s possible. “Just be on guard,” he said simply. “And then we need barricades and patrols around Eastwatch in case they’ve got any reinforcements coming.”

“Aye,” the Weeper grumbled, before snapping at two nearby men. “Abel, Sten! Go find Rattleshirt’s hairy ass! Grab Rolf and Haldur too. Get them here and pass on the orders. I’ll take the Wall. Lord of Bones can handle the ground.”

“Be careful, the steps can treacherous.”

“Snow, my lot are used to climbing the Wall without steps,” the Weeper snorted, picking up his scythe.

“We sleep in featherbeds tonight, King Snow!” a raider laughed, staring at the keep. “The crow’s castle is ours!”

“No laughing, no jeering and no drinking until we’ve got barricades and defences set up!” Jon shouted, turning to bellow at the men. “Not unless you want to risk an ambush in the middle of the night!”

Cotter Pyke didn’t move, he stood still as the free folk rushed around him. The free folk would try to raid any supplies, weapons or valuables for themselves. It was in their nature. Jon had to assign men to find the important location first – the armoury, the pantry, the vault – and guard them.

Emotions were still high off the victory. They had come prepared for a battle, but there had been none. Jon couldn’t let them run wild. He could feel his head aching, but he didn’t dare rest lest he lose control of the rising chaos.

Maybe five hundred here already. About twenty thousand on their way from Hardhome.

Beyond the Wall, Jon could sense the remaining free folk marching through Ghost. The smoke signal rose into the air – the signal that the Wall had fallen.

Sonagon was flying off east, over the coast of Skagos. The dragon enjoyed exploring new lands. Perhaps he’d find a unicorn to eat.

It had been a long night and it looked like it would be a long day too. Jon stared around the unfamiliar castle. Jon would take the commander’s quarters for himself, but he had to figure out where they were first.

“The maester,” Jon ordered. The wildling gave him a blank stare. “The old man with the chain. Bring him to me, assign him to his quarters.” The rookery was important. Jon had a lot of letters and world events to catch up on. “Cotter Pyke, I will let you stay alongside your men. I trust you will help keep the peace.” The warning was clear.

“My ships. My men,” Cotter Pyke said darkly. “You’ll bring them back.”

“I will.” Put it alongside the other hundred tasks that I have to do urgently.

“And what did you do to Castle Black?” Cotter demanded. “Do any of the brothers there still live?”

Jon paused. “Excuse me?”

“We lost contact with Castle Black well over a week ago. No ravens. I’ve sent brothers to investigate, but none returned yet. What did you do to the castle?”

He hesitated, meeting Cotter’s eyes. There was anger there, but uncertainty too. Cotter didn’t know. “Point me to the rookery,” Jon ordered. “I want any letters you have delivered to me straight away.”

He walked away. Cotter Pyke didn’t resist as Hatch, Rags and Erik took him to the quarters.

“We should keep marching,” Sigorn hissed, staring at Jon. “Get back on the dragon. Castle Black.”

Jon shook his head. “We will. Not right now. Sonagon needs to rest, so do the men. We’ll secure Eastwatch first.”

“My father—”

“— Is perfectly safe in the Castle Black dungeons.” That might be a lie, he admitted. “Rushing isn’t going to help anyone. We go slowly, secure the Wall first.”

The Magnar looked unhappy, but there was no time to argue. Too much to do, so many tasks. Jon saw Maester Harmune being shuffled out of the courtyard, much to the man’s chagrin.

“I’ll take it from here,” Jon said at the free folk, limping towards the maester. Damn, my leg seized up from riding so long. “Maester, please show me to rookery. There are also injuries that I would like you to look at.”

Harmune was an old, greying maester with patchy hair, and the stink of alcohol on his breath. He floundered, clutching at his robe. “… Um, yes, Your Grace…” he mumbled, quickly lowering his head.

Jon had to stop his grimace. Your Grace. Jon Snow, the King on the Wall.

He heard the cheering as the gates were hoisted open.
Chapter 20

Chapter Summary

The fall of the Night's Watch, and the deal of sworn brothers and free folk.

Davos

When he first arrived, the Wall had been a towering, indestructible blot on the landscape. The castles were old and sturdy, the defences better fortified than any in Westeros. At the time, Davos had thought that it would take hundreds of thousands to breach the Wall from the north.

Apparently, it only really took a single dragon.

“You like it?” A free folk laughed, a hard, beefy man called Leathers. He clutched polished brass plate with guffawing smile, while wearing a satin drape, formerly a curtain, wrapped around his body as a gown. “Like what southron ladies wear, right?”

“Indeed,” Davos replied, keeping his voice cautious.

“I hear that Two-Toed Dirk got a proper silk dress, found it in the keep,” Leathers laughed. “Fucking silk dresses!”

Davos had seen that dress. It had been one left behind by the Queen in her rushed evacuation. The thought made his stomach clench.

“I mean, dresses,” another wildling – called Lemmy – chuckled, as if it was the queerest thing the world. “Do you southerners all prance around in dresses and drapes?”

“Many do,” Davos said, keeping his distance.

The two wildlings were often cheerful, sometimes even friendly. Davos expected that Jon Snow picked them especially for their temperament. Still, Davos was well aware that his guards were armed while he wasn’t, and they were experienced fighters besides. Doubtless they’d be cheerful as they killed him too.

Eastwatch and the surrounding village had been a poor castle, but the wildlings still raided it dry. Davos watched as they laughed and joked, clutching metal plates and forks as if they were alien trinkets. Davos had seen a young wildling boy, barely thirteen, with a spear and holding an iron fishing hook as if it was the greatest treasure imaginable.

Jon Snow had apparently claimed much for himself to stop others from taking it, but there were still raiders walking away with everything that wasn’t bolted down. One time, Davos saw a man peeling the iron bars off a window to make clubs.

More and more wildlings were coming every day. First there were hundreds, and then quickly thousands. The gates had not shut, and tide was not stopping. At one point, a queue formed for people to fit through the tunnel.

Davos had watched as the giants on mammoths came through. His heart had been in his mouth to see columns of massive woolly beasts trundle into the stone keep.

He tried to keep up with their activity from the bits and pieces he heard or saw. Jon Snow wasn’t in Eastwatch anymore; he had already flown either west across the Wall or maybe he went back north to Hardhome. Davos did know that Sigorn of the Thenns had went west to take Castle Black, followed quickly by a force of another two thousand to hold the Wall itself.

There was little doubt that Castle Black would fall quickly, and then soon the Shadow Tower would fall as well. After that, all three gates would be open, and every wildling in the north would be coming south.

It could easily form a horde tens, perhaps hundreds, of thousands strong. A mass exodus from beyond the Wall.

For a while, the ugly man called the Weeper reigned at Eastwatch, but then he took a raiding party south to harry Karstark forces that were gathering. After that, it was the Lord of Bones who took control of Eastwatch. Rattleshirt was a mean, foul man, but he proved effective. Eastwatch was not easily defendable from the south, but Rattleshirt had built rings of sharpened palisades and fortifications all around the flooded wildling camp, with constant patrols across the perimeter. Davos had hoped that the unstable chain of command might leave an opening to retake control of the castle, but Rattleshirt proved as capable as he was ruthless.

Still, Rattleshirt also proved much laxer on the prohibitions against rape that King Snow had enforced. Within days of Rattleshirt taking control, the wildlings dragged two dozen village women into an outbuilding and raped them all half a hundred times. The eldest was a woman of fifty, the youngest a girl of eleven.

Jon Snow came back about three days later, flying on his dragon to check on Eastwatch. Davos heard that the king had been beyond furious upon learning about the rapes, so much so that he and Rattleshirt almost came to blows. Instead, King Snow took the twelve biggest conspirators of the mass rapes – the ones that had kept the women locked up – and tied them to a post and had them lashed more viciously than any Davos had ever seen. One of them was executed trying to protest.

The women were returned to their homes, beaten and trembling. To hear the rumours, Snow had threatened that anything that happened to more women would happen to Rattleshirt.

Davos had also seen the king’s shadowcat pet, lingering around the castle more. The whispers said that Snow left his shadowcat behind to watch matters more closely.

The rumours circulated constantly. There was nothing Davos could do but linger and try to listen to make sense of talk.

The Weeper was fighting off Karstark and Umber forces to the south, while apparently Varamyr Sixskins led sorties beyond the Wall. Raiders led by Soren Shieldbreaker, Morna White Mask and Gerrick Kingsblood had left Eastwatch, but then King Snow had warned that any warbands that raided without his permission would face his dragon, and they had all returned. Many times, Davos questioned just how strong Jon Snow’s control over the wildlings really was.

Still, there was no doubt the wildlings were in control. He had heard that a small fleet from Skagos tried to sail against Eastwatch, but the dragon had seen them away. The wildlings were even manning the Night’s Watch ships and claiming fishing vessels, forming a fleet of their own.

A fat man – the Lord of Seals – sailed to Eastwatch with a ragtag collection of barges, boats and ships, and started calling himself the Admiral of Seals. Wildlings were poor sailors, but they were Fishing vessels went out constantly, trying to feed the growing host of men and women. At this rate, Davos suspected, they would eat the Watch’s rations bare in a matter of weeks.

The sworn brothers themselves were kept locked in the main keep. The king had been keeping them alive with the other prisoners, but none were allowed to conspire or move freely around the castle. A few had been placed in dungeons.

Davos had better fare, as did Salladhor and a few select others. Davos received private guards, friendly guards, and his own private room in the Eastwatch’s east tower along with other prisoners. His movement was still restricted.

“I hear Castle Black has fallen,” the wildling Leathers said suddenly, causing Davos’ heart to jump. “Sigorn took it. Expect the Shadow Tower won’t be far behind.”

“So soon?” Davos said with a gulp.

“Against a bloody dragon?” Leathers laughed. “Aye, not surprised.”

“God,” Lemmy said suddenly, causing Davos to blink. Lemmy wore a polished white stone on his furs. “Sonagon is a god, not a dragon.”

Leathers just shrugged. “What’s the difference?”

Outside, in the courtyard, Davos could look down and see the east wall was littered with figurines and statues of the dragon. The smallest were woodsman carvings, the largest a statue taller than a man. Some carvings were from stone, others wood, and more than a few were from weirwood. Frequently, free folk would come to place more carvings, or pray at the dragon statues.

Davos looked at Lemmy hesitantly. He dared to ask. “You really believe that the dragon is a god?”

The man just looked at Davos like he was stupid.

“It can fly, freeze oceans, and destroy forests,” Leathers said with a snort, lowering the satin drape. “Aye, I’d call that a god.”

“What about them?”

“How can you call the dragon a god when you already have gods of your own?”

“Who the hells said there can only be one or the other?” said Leathers. “I hear some say that Sonagon is an Old God given flesh. Others claim the dragon is a champion of the Old Gods, or a different god entirely. Doesn’t really matter to me. I was born under a heart tree, aye, but I sure prefer to stand behind the dragon than a tree.”

What did that make Jon Snow? A man who commands gods? A prophet? There were many upset with the restrictions that King Snow enforced, but he didn't think there was any real threat of dissent. Not when so many of the free folk would bow and pray to the dragon.

Davos honestly wasn’t even sure if it counted as religion. There were no sermons, no religious texts, no commandments. Still, the faith was there. Sometimes, Davos saw a type of faith and dedication that matched or exceeded anything he had seen among the queen’s men. Melisandre had stoked the flames of faith into an inferno, while Jon Snow’s dragon seemed to exhume it naturally. That type of faith was scary. It had been scary on Dragonstone, and it was scary here.

He heard the free folk scoff at ‘kneelers’, but Davos suspected there wasn’t as much difference as many would like to believe.

Davos had heard one of the free folk mention that a few of the young girls who had been raped by the wildlings had converted to worshipping the dragon. Davos didn’t believe it at first, but then he started to wonder. Maybe the girls had converted to improve their standing with the wildlings, or maybe they had just been so traumatised by the experience that they clung to the faith.

Leathers was looking at him curiously. “You know, whenever the king comes into camp there are half a hundred men flocking around him,” said Leathers. “Raiders that give anything to try and get the king’s attention. Hells, the only reason I took this boring guard duty is because I hear the king wanted it. Do you know why?” Davos shook his head. “Because anyone who is even close to Snow gets featherbeds and full meals every single day. I hear that even the king’s guards get to bed a different woman every night. Imagine spearwives just opening their legs for you!” He laughed.

Lemmy’s eyes flashed. “They are serving the dragon,” he warned. Leathers was more pragmatic, but Lemmy really believed. “They are following the path to salvation, not serving selfish needs.”

Leathers just grunted. Davos held his tongue.

The prisoners were fed together in groups of a dozen or so, at a small canteen in the Eastwatch tower. Everywhere Davos looked, he saw sunken eyes and dark expressions. Food was stew, on a good day, or a turnip and an apple on a bad. No spoons. The majority there were Night’s Watch men, or captives from the battle at Hardhome. The wildlings barely tolerated them at the best of times; make any commotion and they could just as easily lock you in a cell.

Davos spotted Salladhor Saan slumped at the dining table. Without his rings or silk or perfume the pirate just looked like an old, withered man. Davos had seen Salladhor occasionally, but they rarely had a chance to exchange words.

“Salladhor,” Davos said throatily, limping slightly. The wound on his torso hadn’t healed properly. He winced as he lowered himself down, feeling older than he ever had.

“Onion Lord,” Salla grunted. No more ‘old friend’. “Enjoying your stay?”

“They keep us alive.” Davos had seen worse hospitality, in any case. “We get better treatment than most. Jon Snow must put value on us.”

How many valuable hostages did King Snow have? Not many, actually. Salladhor was perhaps the most valuable, though few would pay to see the pirate returned. Davos was worth something to King Stannis, perhaps, but to little else. Ser Justin Massey… maybe, yet the knight had lingering been on death’s door ever since the battle.

Davos glanced around the room. “I haven’t seen Ser Clayton Suggs in here,” he said slowly. “Has he attempted escape?”

“Hardly. Your Flea Bottom knight agreed to join the savages. He rides with the one called the Weeper, now.”

“Clayton Suggs?” Davos said in surprise, remembering the landed knight. A short, burly man, who flew a winged pig on his surcoat. Formerly a hedge knight, he had grown up in the gutters of King’s Landing. He had been one of the queen’s men. “He truly defected from Stannis?”

“The winged pig knight always cared more for hurting people than he did for his king or god,” Salla snorted. “I’m sure he gets on well with the savages.”

Davos didn’t reply. “Several of my men defected too. So have some ‘sworn brothers’,” Salla continued. The boats taken by the wildlings would need seasoned sailors, Davos thought, they must be willing to recruit prisoners as sailors. “Men are like rats, Onion Lord. They’ll stay on a ship, but they have no loyalty when it goes down.”

“Loyal men are different.”

“Loyal men are rare,” the pirate scoffed, staring down at his stew. Turnip stew. Davos doubted that Salladhor Saan, pirate prince of Lys, had ever eaten turnip stew in his life before his captivity.

Davos lowered his voice. “Do you have a plan?” he asked quietly. “If you’ve got men on ships…?”

“Hardly. Less than fifty prisoners, amidst three thousand savages?” Salla snorted. “Salladhor Saan has no intention of dying in a fool’s escape attempt.”

“I never expected Salladhor Saan to surrender so easily, either.”

“Surrender? Oh no, you see patience, not surrender.” There was a glint in his eyes. “I have too many enemies to kill, so many debts to repay.”

Davos’ hairs tingled. “King Stannis is not…”

“‘King’ Stannis ruined me,” Salladhor snarled. Stripped off all the finery, there was nothing but vicious ruthlessness in the pirate’s eyes. “He promised me much and gave me nothing but paper. He stole my ships and destroyed my fleet. I will see him burn for that, I think.”

“You mean to join with Jon Snow and the savages?”

“Mean to?” Salladhor laughed. “Oh, I already have. Admittedly the hospitality is still lacking, but trust must be earned and so I will pay penance.” He shrugged. “The savage king is a man desperate for allies. Perhaps he is not such a savage. But even savages have their uses. And Jon Snow has a dragon.”

“If that dragon dies, then Jon Snow has nothing. His army will splinter.”

“So then it becomes a question of whether or not anything is capable of killing it, then?” Salla mused. “Tell me, how would King’s Landing fare if a dragon were to terrorise it?”

The picture of King’s Landing covered in ice flickered before his eyes. Conventional armies couldn’t stand up to a dragon of that size. He could quite possible ruin any castle in the realm.

Salladhor smirked. “I think that I may even have a better chance of reclaiming what is owed from King Snow than I ever did with Stannis,” he said. “You said once that I am good gambler, and yet it seems that only a fool would wager against a dragon.”

“Jon Snow might destroy the realm, but he’ll never conquer it.”

“Are you sure?” Salla challenged. “I told you, men are rats. If Jon Snow destroys enough kings and lords, how long before the rats flock to him? How long before people decide they’d rather be a savage than fight against the savages?”
Davos hesitated. “Is that what you are then, Salladhor?” He asked. “Just another rat?”

The pirate laughed hollowly. “I am the prince of rats, Onion Lord. That’s all I have ever been.”

He finished his stew and stood up. “I will be moving out shortly, I think,” Salladhor continued. “I have already negotiated with the Seal Admiral. They will give me a ship and a crew – at the king’s approval I could be sailing away across the Narrow Sea. To Braavos, perhaps down to Lys if I can arrange it, to negotiate for supplies and sellswords. I think the Free Cities will be quite… _excited_ to learn of a dragon in Westeros again.”

Davos was left sitting quietly on the bench, wondering what would happen next.

The rest of the day was spent in cold quiet. Davos pushed his bounds as much as he dared, watching the men coming and going through the castle, trying to talk to the guards or washerwomen. The wildlings mostly left him alone along with the other prisoners in the tower. Davos might have tried slipping away and running at night, but then again where would he go?

He had access to the rookery with Maester Harmune, where he could sometimes peek in on the ravens being delivered, and to a couple of the other prisoner's rooms. Rattleshirt and several others distrusted the maester and his ravens, often not letting the man tend to them, but Jon Snow had insisted that the birds be used. They received so few letters, all of them from the king, that each one was an occasion. When one such bird arrived, Davos lingered quietly by doorway as Rattleshirt and two dozen armed men stomped into the room. The maester had to read the words out loud. Underneath Rattleshirt’s bone helmet, the man’s eyes narrowed distrustfully of the writing.

The maester was practically trembling as he finished, mumbling so quietly Davos couldn’t make out the words. “… So Tormund and Mance still live,” Rattleshirt snorted. “Does that paper of yours say anything else?”

“The… um… the Magnar’s father, Styr of Thenn, died from injuries during his imprisonment.”

“It’s Mance that I’m more wondering about. How does Mance Rayder feel about bowing to the new ‘King-Beyond-The-Wall’?”

“I’m sorry, my lord, King Snow does not mention…”

The Lord of Bones waved his hand dismissively, so fast the maester flinched. “Get out of my sight,” he snapped, causing the maester to squirm and bow.

The news that Mance Rayder still lived caused a ripple through the castle. Later that night, Davos asked if this meant that Jon Snow is no longer king, but Leathers just snorted. “Mance was never king. We followed Mance, but no one ever bowed or swore fealty to Mance,” Leathers said with a shrug. “We swore to Jon Snow.”

“So then what does that leave Mance?”

“Buggered if I know. It’s your lot that tries to put titles on everything, not ours. Mance is just Mance.”

All of the other answers he got over the next days were equally confusing. Still, the rumours persisted; some saying that Mance had been left crippled from his torture by the crows, others saying that he was fighting against Jon Snow. There were others who swore that Jon had fed the former King-Beyond-the-Wall to his dragon.

Still, Davos watched as the castle rippled. Many celebrated the news that Castle Black had fallen, but he could see others simmering. From the tower windows, he glimpsed quiet arguments in odd corners of the courtyard.

Rattleshirt started spending more and more time in the maester’s rookery, demanding that the maester read him letter after letter. He had never seen a man as terrified or as harassed as Maester Harmune.

Davos would often linger by the doorway, and one day he heard frenzied voices from the rookery. He heard the maester being sharply dismissed and skittering out the room, while Rattleshirt and some others retreated to the upper levels. Something was happening. Davos took a deep breath, but decided to take his chances and crept forward to eavesdrop.

“–destroy us, you know he will,” a man hissed. “We’ve got to do something now, before it’s too late.”

There was no response, only an exasperated sigh. The Lord of Bones was keeping quiet.

“He’s a much of threat to us than anyone,” another angry voice growled. “Have you seen the bloody courtyard – they’re bowing to him. Bowing.”

“I got eyes,” Rattleshirt said. “I seen it.”

Four men in the room. They were pacing at the top of the tower, in between the squawking bird cages. Davos crept quietly along the corridor, looking over the battlements and overfilled castle.

“We’re already south of the Wall,” a man grumbled. Davos recognised him as a raider, Ned Bearclaw, a bloated, powerful man with squinty eyes. “We don’t need him anymore.”

“Aye,” another agreed. “And we’ve got support. The Walrus Men are with us. So is Baldr Boarhunter, Larrs Stonebrock, and Erikkson of the West River. Varamyr will support us too, you know he will. Gerrick Kingsblood, Aki Twentysons and Broqq Big-Chin will likely be on our side as well. That’s at least a thousand men right there.”

“What of the Lord of Seals? Huh, the Admiral of Seals now, I mean.”

“If we sell it right, he’ll join with us,” Ned Bearclaw said firmly. “He’s got the boats, that’s important. You’ve got the gate, that’s all we need.”

“We could easily be pushing two thousand supporters,” another wildling hissed. “Think about it.”

“Oh, I am.” That was the Lord of Bone’s quiet voice. Davos crept forward, towards the stairs. “I’m thinking. And what happens to Snow?”

“Crows should be shot out the sky,” said Ned Bearclaw. “Next time he flies into Eastwatch, we’ll have some good men with arrows waiting for him.”

“And the dragon?”

“Let Varamyr take it. A group of skinchangers working together can overpower any beast. As soon as Snow’s dead and his dragon’s collared, any support he has is going to disappear.”

“Hmm.”

Davos’ heart was in his mouth. Rattleshirt said something he couldn’t quite catch, so slowly he crept forward a bit further.
“He’s making you serve, man!” Ned Bearclaw snapped. “He’s making us all serve. Telling us what we can and cannot do – he’s going to destroy the free folk as sure as anything. Have you seen the courtyard? Are you really happy watching them bow to him?”

“No,” said Rattleshirt. Davos was close enough to see the outline of his shadow scratching his chin. “I’m not happy.”

Ned Bearclaw sighed a breath of relief. “Then we can do this,” he insisted. “All of Snow’s biggest supporters have either been sent away or are still in Hardhome. We kill the bastard, we force any coming through the gate to swallow it or stay north. One gate is all we need.”

“Aye,” Rattleshirt agreed. “We can do this.”

A coup, Davos realised in horror. They’re discussing a coup.

He listened for as long as he dared. They talked about who they needed to recruit, how to deal with the devotees, how to they could hold Eastwatch. Davos crept by the stairway, before the fear caught up to him. If they see me they’ll kill me on the spot.

He very quickly and quietly left the rookery, taking care not to close the door behind him. A safe distance away, Davos stopped to take deep, calming breaths. A coup. They are going to kill King Snow.

He hesitated. He could have went and warned someone, anyone. Any of the true believers would do. Instead, he didn’t. Davos returned to his quarters and retired for the night.

If the king dies, the host will surely fall apart. It will be bloody, and savage, but the wildling army will collapse under itself and the threat to the realm will disintegrate. I’m not likely to survive, but I won’t stop it.

The next morning, Davos awoke to find the whole castle buzzing with news about the men that Rattleshirt had executed. The Lord of Bones had given the order, and the bodies of Ned Bearclaw, Baldr Boarhunter, Larrs Stonebrock, Eriksson of the West River and half a dozen others were swinging over the gates of Eastwatch.

---

Samwell

The siege of Castle Black didn’t last long. The sworn brothers saw the wildlings coming, they simply didn’t stand a chance to stop them. It was less a battle and more an argument.

They all saw Bowen Marsh and Ser Alliser Thorne screaming at each other in the middle of the courtyard. The tensions were so high that every man seemed crazed. Alliser wanted to stand siege in the castle, Bowen argued to run.

Sam felt the terror in his bones. Edd, Hake and Pyp both struggled as they hoisted a wooden table to barricade the doorway. They had been given orders to reinforce the towers, but Sam didn’t know why they bothered.

“We should be running,” Pyp hissed, his voice thick with fear.

“Run where exactly?” Hake muttered, wincing with his wounded chest. Hake had broken two ribs trying to fight the wights. Even over a fortnight later, the wounds from that night remained.
“Shadow Tower. Anywhere. Anywhere that is not here.”

“There are no horses left,” Sam said.

“We can still run.” Pyp was shaking. Lots of people were trembling.

“Run,” Hake repeated. “If we run, we have to run through a storm, on foot, past wildlings with horses.”

“And if we stay we get crushed and slaughtered.” Pyp gulped. “I was talking to Garth Greyfeather. He said that the wildlings have a dragon. He said those from Eastwatch saw it. Is that true?”

Sam paused, listening intently. “I don’t know,” Hake admitted.

Over a fortnight ago, no one would have believed stories of dragons. But then they had faced an invasion of wights, and now nobody in the castle was willing to disbelieve it.

Through the gaps in the crudely barricaded shutters, Sam could see the fires of the wildlings sitting right outside Castle Black. They were camped across the road. Not quite enough of them that they were willing to attack, it seemed, but enough that no one liked the castle’s odds when it came to battle.

There were four hundred of them already, the ones who came first on horseback and established a perimeter around Castle Black. There had been brief scuffles, nothing major, but they were choking the Night’s Watch. Ser Alliser had been readying a sortie to clear them out, when the patrols alerted the brothers to more marching west from Eastwatch.

Two thousand more wildlings coming along at the base of the Wall, and another two hundred moving atop of it. They were moving fast, only two days away.

Very soon, there would be two and half thousand wildlings against three hundred sworn brothers, with no walls to hide behind. Those weren’t even slightly survivable odds.

And yet what chance do we have? Sam thought.

Castle Black was ruined. When Sam first returned, over a week ago, it had been in shambles. Coldhands had dropped him off at a secret passageway through a white weirwood door leading under the Wall, into the Nightfort. By the time Sam returned to Castle Black, he found a garrison left devastated.

Sam’s return had caused some stirs. Everyone had expected that he had died. Sam had met up with a Wall patrol coming to recover the castle, and nobody was sure what exactly happened. When pressed, Sam had muttered something about escaping and running away.

There had been questions on how exactly he got away and back through the Wall, but fortunately everyone has been too distracted to really pressure him on them. What was I supposed to tell them, the truth? I had dream where I met a man in a tree?

In the middle of the courtyard, the gatehouse was wrecked. They had collapsed and blockaded the gate and tried to seal the tunnel with stone and ice after that night. No more rangings north of the Wall from Castle Black.

Seventy men died that night when the Other came through. Most of the survivors had been the ones barricading themselves in the towers, away from the fighting. The sworn brothers managed to kill the wights, eventually, but then everyone who had been trying to retake the tunnel had been slaughtered when the Other itself came through gate.

Donal Noye had been in charge of that force. According to the garbled witness accounts, Donal had even managed to land a blow on the creature before it skewered him. Something described as ‘ice white and burned black’ limped away south into the forest.

After that, the only way to describe the situation was pure panic.

“What happened here?” Bowen Marsh had screamed, face red, when the recovery force from Eastwatch arrived. “How did the wildlings got through? How many were there?”

“Just the one,” Sam stammered. “One white walker.”

“Don't be a fool, man.”

“It was an Other,” Sam tried to protest. “It cut through our men and it's out there! We've got to go after it, hunt it down now!”

Bowen Marsh’s face flushed, shook his head. “We have too few men, we cannot waste them traipsing through the forest!”

“But it's out there!”

“And how do you know?” Bowen cried. “By your own account you were on the other side of the Wall at the time!”

There were a few corroborating witnesses, but most of those that had laid eyes on the Other had died. Ser Alliser Thorne survived, albeit missing his right eye, but he had been fighting the wights in the Flints Barracks when the white walker broke through the courtyard.

Bowen Marsh and the others from Eastwatch stubbornly refused to believe the story of the white walker, even despite Sam’s protests and the evidence. They’re scared, Sam remembered thinking. If they let themselves believe that an Other was out there, they’d break down in fear.

Sam didn’t know what to do. Bowen took command and very quickly ordered the tunnel to be sealed and barricaded, as if that would make it all better. The castle became a simmering pot of fear and confusion. Everyone was panicked, shaken, and nobody knew what to do.

I know what to do, Sam thought. I just don't know how to do it. And nobody will listen to me in any case.

Castle Black’s numbers increased to two hundred after patrols as well as reinforcements of Eastwatch and Shadow Tower men. There were even those who started to doubt that there had been wights there at all, once the bodies had been burned. Those who hadn’t been present.

Sam’s hands were trembling constantly. He had been treated like he was insane, or even a conspirator. He tried to do his duty. He tried to warn them, but no one listened.

Sam had also tried searching the library and vaults for any mention of a spell used to build the Wall, but found nothing.

Maester Aemon survived – the wights had targeted mainly fighting men, and the maester had been locked in his quarters – but the maester also knew nothing of any record of a spell from the children of the forest. Aemon questioned Sam about the details of his escape harder than anyone else. The maester was the only one who seemed to be really suspicious of Sam’s story, while the rest had dismissed him.

But then wildlings arrived. A hundred sworn brothers fleeing from Eastwatch came first, followed by reports of wildlings on the Wall and south of it. Eastwatch-by-the-Sea had fallen. Stories of massive hordes of wildlings, and giant dragons.

Sam had never known this type of panic before.

What am I going to do? The greenseer gave me a duty and I am failing.

“Answer me, Edd,” Sam whispered, shuffling to one side. “What are our chances here?”

Eddison looked at him with a dark frown. “For what?”

“If we abandon the castle and run? How far will we get?”

“Maybe to Shadow Tower. We could rally with Denys Mallister.”

“That's over a hundred leagues, across mountains and there's a storm brewing.”

“I didn’t say we'd all make it,” Edd admitted with a grimace.

“And if we stand and fight? Barricade up and try to hold the castle?”

“Then maybe we'd last until reinforcements from northern lords arrive.”

“How likely is that to happen?”

“Not very likely at all,” Edd admitted. “Yet if we do nothing they'll kill us.”

“But if we fight or try to run then they'll also kill us,” Sam said shaking his head. “They will kill us no matter what.”

“Yes. So isn't this a bitch of a choice?”

There was an emergency meeting in the Shield Hall that night. Bowen Marsh’s plan won out, Thorne had too little support to fight. It was agreed that half the men would run to Shadow Tower, the other half would scatter south and flee to the nearest holdfasts. The Night’s Watch would have to scatter and try to rally later if they wanted to survive. Orders were given to raze the castle, to spoil the food, to destroy the weapons – to burn the castle behind them before letting the wildlings take it.

The air was grim, terrified. Sam suspected that half the men there would have deserted if they thought they could get by the wildlings at the front. Even Bowen Marsh, the man in command, looked like he was barely holding together.

Sam was ordered to go back to the rookery and collect any tomes, books or messages of the utmost importance. All other books and parchment would be burnt. Scorched earth left behind them. Sam tried to protest, but nobody listened.

He felt hollow. Maester Aemon wheezed by the fireplace, quietly sorting through his herbs and medicines. Nobody said it, but the maester would certainly die trying to flee at night.

“Are you happy with this plan, maester?” Sam croaked.

“It is not my place to be happy with it or not,” Maester Aemon replied. “The decision has already been made. I am old maester; I simply serve.”

It’s wrong, Sam thought. He remembered what the greenseer said. The strength of the barrier relies on the sworn brothers on the Wall. If they – if we – die or abandon our post, the barrier weakens.

But what can I do? Stop them from running and stop them dying? How?

They would dismiss it as a ludicrous dream if he told them about the greenseer. Perhaps it was. I'm useless.

“T’m a craven,” Sam said out loud.

The maester looked at him. “Yes,” he agreed. “You are.”

He scratched his chin thoughtfully. “I once knew another man who was a craven too,” Aemon continued slowly. “Everyone else knew him as a great warrior, though. I always wondered how a man so cowardly could survive so many battles and so much deceit. It was only later as I got older and wiser that I realised that his cowardice kept him and everyone around him alive.”

Sam looked at the maester, unsure how to reply to that. “Brave men die hard but die fast, Samwell,” Aemon said, levering to his feet with cracking knees. “But the craven shall outlive us all. Whatever you are going to do, do it because you are a craven.”

Sam stared at the fire. “Now, excuse me,” Aemon sighed. “I feel like I should retire early for the night. Tomorrow will likely be a busy day.”

Sam sat for a long time, thinking.

From the very first rays of morning onwards, the castle was hectic. They would light the fires and flee together come dusk. Thorne would lead a group of fighting men to keep the wildlings back, while all others fled from different directions. The idea was that the wildlings might not be able to catch them all.

Sam stopped and stared, watching the men run like ants. Sam saw Eddison bustling backwards and forth, moving kindling through the keep. “The prisoners,” Thorne announced at dinner. “We’re going to take the prisoners with us during the sortie. We’ll put swords at their backs and we’ll use them as hostages to distract the wildlings.”

“We can’t let those prisoners escape justice,” Bowen warned.

“We won’t. We’ll kill them before we let the wildlings near them,” Thorne grunted. “But we should at least get some use out of them. Have a steward check on them, make sure they’re healthy enough to last one more night.”

That steward would be Edd. Sam watched the steward finish his other tasks, until eventually Edd headed downwards into the wormwalks. Sam followed him down to the vaults, and through the twisty mazes leading towards the ice cells.

The cells were cold, but that wasn’t the reason Sam's hands were trembling. He paused and picked up an unlit torch from its bracket and the wall, and clutched the heavy wood with both hands. His nervous feet skittered.

“Edd!” Sam shouted, wheezing. Edd walked fast. “Wait, hold on!”

“Sam?” Edd frowned. “What are you doing down here?”
He took a deep breath. “I'm really sorry about this,” Sam admitted.

With both hands, he slammed the torch downwards onto Edd’s head like a club. There was a dull thud.

“Bugger Sam!” Edd groaned in pain, clutching his head. “What the hells was that for?”

“Oh, I'm sorry!” Sam grimaced, stuttering. “I thought if I hit you over the head, you'd get knocked out, and, well, I need to steal your keys.”

Edd stared in admonishment and shock. “You need to steal my keys?”

“Yes. Really sorry.”

Sam hit him again. Harder this time.

“Oww!” Edd cried clutching his forehead. “Have you gone insane?”

He tried to lunge at Sam, but Edd was short and scrawny and Sam was still much bigger and heavier. Edd tried to yank the torch out of Sam’s grip, but Sam hit him again.

“Really sorry,” Sam repeated dumbly. He wasn’t quite sure what was happening anymore. By the Seven, I am trembling in my boots.

“ Bloody! You bloody–” Edd cursed. Sam raised the club once more. “Here, take my bloody keys just stop bloody hitting me!”

He dug out of his pocket and threw an iron ring of keys onto the ice. Sam blinked, and nodded. “Um, thank you,” he said, and then hesitated. “… And I need you lock yourself into one of those cells there?”

Edd’s jaw dropped. “Are you serious?”

Sam gulped, and nodded. “Yes. Go into that cell and shut the door.”

“Sam, you’re out of your mind.”

“Do it or I hit you over the head again.”

He looked at Sam incredulously.

“This really isn’t how I pictured this happening,” Sam admitted. Edd tried shouting for help. Sam was so lucky that with everything else happening, there were no men to be spared as guards on the cells.

Edd tried to wrestle the torch off him again. Somehow, Sam managed to overpower him and whack him once more. “Bugger it!” Edd howled.

“I don’t see another option here,” Sam said with another gulp. “I think I have to keep on hitting you until you get in that cell.”

He raised the torch threateningly. “Bloody, alright!” said Edd said. “Alright, I’m doing it, I’m going into the cell.”

Edd walked slowly. Sam had to force him through the door. “Why are you…?” He asked, baffled. “What are you trying to do here, Sam?”
“I’m trying to save your lives.” Sam slammed the door shut, and twisted the lock shut with a click.

Sam leant on the wall, and took a deep breath. He could hear Edd shouting and banging on the ice, but the cells were thick.

Maybe I didn't think that part through properly, Sam thought, taking deep breathes. His hands were shivering as we walked down the frozen corridor, by cell after cell.

When he saw the one that he needed, his courage almost failed him. Still, he unlocked the door and shambled in.

The cell was large, cold and empty. Sam saw two dark eyes staring at him from under a thick sheepskin cloak. The cell stunk of frozen shit and piss. Mance Rayder had been in here so long he wasn't even shivering from the cold anymore.

Sam stared. His mouth hung open.

“… The fat boy.” Mance croaked. His voice was so weak and raw. “Tarly, wasn't it? What are you doing here, Tarly?”

Five months. He's been in here five months.

They had been hard months. Mance’s arms were still chained to the ice, his wrists chafed bloody. His fingers had been broken and hadn’t set properly, leaving his hands looking twisted and mangled. His skin was frighteningly pale and his bones almost protruded through his skin. Like a skeleton that still had just bit of meat left.

They hadn't fed the prisoners much, Sam remembered. For a while after the attack, the sworn brothers had been too distracted to feed them at all.

The plan had always been to execute then when Mormont returned, but then the Lord Commander never came back at all so the prisoners had just lingered. Half the prisoners had died in their cells and the remaining ones were so weak. Sam hesitated. How is my plan to work if he is this frail?

“Excuse me, I'm unaccustomed to have guests,” Mance muttered dryly, rattling his manacles weakly. “Is there something I can help you with?”

Sam gulped. “I need your help.”

“Oh now this ought to be good.” Was there a ghost of a smile on his sunken face?

No choice. “A host of wildlings is camped outside Castle Black. They are waiting for reinforcements before they attack, but it’s coming soon.”

Mance’s eyes widened. “There are? Truly? How many?”

“There will be thousands shortly.”

Mance grinned. Sam had never seen a grin like that before. His teeth shone in the dark.

“Oh now that's beautiful. Now I get to die with a smile on my face,” he chortled. “I was ready to die months ago but you bastards had to keep me alive down here.”

“Maybe you don't have to die at all. Maybe none of us do.” Sam gulped. “The Night's Watch surrenders.”
“His head cocked. “They surrender?”

“Yes. They haven't realised it yet, but they surrender.” Sam looked at him with all the determination he could muster. “And you're king, aren't you? You could convince the wildlings outside to accept our surrender and leave everyone alive.”

“Maybe.” Mance pulled himself up straight. His bones creaked. His eyes were sharp now. “Who leads outside?”

“I don't know. I've seen men with bronze disk armour, painted faces and pierced brows.”

“Thenns.” Mance sighed. “Oh, now that's unlucky for you. Their Magnar, my neighbour, passed away a few months ago.”

“But you can deal with them, right?” Sam insisted. “Convince them to keep prisoners?”

“Possibly. But if the Watch tries to fight back then they'll get themselves killed.”

“So we won't give anyone a chance to fight back.” I'm a craven; I'll take the coward’s choice. “The only way that we might survive this is if we lose. We let the wildlings in with such an advantage that nobody even tries to fight back. They take us hostage instead, but everyone lives.”

Mance’s eyes narrowed. “And what's to stop them executing you later?”

“Hopefully, you,” said Sam. “These were your brothers once, you served for a long time. I have to believe that you don't want to see us dead either.”

“Hmmph. I'm not sure if you're a fool or not, Tarly.” Mance groaned in pain as he shifted position. “Alright, what's the plan?”

“I get you out of here, sneak you out of the Castle and over to their lines. You bring them terms, tell them the plan, and I'm going to light a fire in the main hall. During the distraction, the wildlings can swoop in and capture the castle.”

Mance shook his head. “Won't work; the sentries will still raise the alarm and there will be fighting. If you could get the free folk into the courtyard undetected, now that would be a better chance of losing the castle bloodlessly.”

Sam blinked. “What do you mean?”

“If you can distract the sentries enough to get a few dozen or so to one of the tower. They could make their way to Flint’s Barracks and hold position near the Grey Keep. The trick is to capture the sworn brothers in small groups rather than as one force.” Mance bit his lip. “Who has command in Castle Black?”

“Bowen Marsh.”

“Ha, now who really has command that men will listen to?”

“Ser Alliser Thorne.”

“Hmm… I know him. A hard man, aye, but he’s not the most creative thinker. We could use that.” Mance cast a worried look at the door. “How long do we have?”

“Probably not very long,” he admitted nervously.
“Very well, so listen to me closely, Tarly,” said Mance. He was still croaking, but his voice was hard. “Unlock these chains and help me to my feet. Then, go to the other cells and see how many prisoners are still alive and what state they’re in. After that, gather them together and we can see about coming up with a plan to lose a castle.”

Val

Castle Black wasn’t as large as she imagined. Somehow, she had pictured the castle being some mammoth structure as gigantic as the Wall itself. It wasn’t, but it was still the largest castle she had ever seen.

The walk through the courtyard seemed so strange, unreal. Val’s muscles were tense, walking between stone towers that seemed so foreign to her. She had never thought she would end up here, walking in the crow’s castle itself, except perhaps as a prisoner, or perhaps a head on a spike.

Above them, the white dragon circled the Wall.

The battle had been over by the time Val arrived with two thousand fighters. Castle Black fell quickly to the advance force by Sigorn and his Thenns alone. His instructions had been to wait for reinforcements and the dragon, but Sigorn had went ahead nevertheless.

“Val,” a voice called. She saw Sigorn waiting for her with his arms folded. Very few of the Thenns looked bloodied. “You’re late.”

“You went ahead,” she retorted, keeping her eyes cool. Next to her, a huge lumbering figure wailed, looking around the buildings in amazement. The giant kept close to Val constantly.

Sigorn’s eyes flickered. “You brought giant.”

“Meet Wun Wun,” Val said with a smirk. Wun Wun cried with the mention of his name. He didn’t know much of the Common Tongue, but he was learning.

The giant had travelled with her from Hardhome after the gates fell. Wun Wun was massive and very simple even by giant standards. He had been an outcast in the clan, but quite receptive when Val recruited him and brought him into camp. She made sure that he ate well and that nobody bothered him, and it helped a lot to have a friendly giant by her side when dealing with some of the giant clans. It also didn’t hurt to have a fourteen foot tall bodyguard.

Wun Wun growled as Sigorn stepped closer. Val raised her hand and touched his fur to calm him.

“He’s protective.”

Sigorn just grunted, yet he looked at her hesitantly. Sigorn wasn’t sure how to act around her. He’s a good man, Val thought. A bit simple and headstrong, but decent enough.

Val had slept with Sigorn a while ago, back when she needed to recruit his support for her host. She didn’t regret it, and he had been kind, but it didn’t become anything more than a few nights. Val had even been debating taking him for a time.

Still, despite his appearance the Magnar of Thenn had a soft heart; he had been looking a proper woman to hold and protect, while Val just wasn’t. Their ‘relationship’ had ended very quickly, but for some reason the man insisted on making things awkward afterwards.
“How was the battle?” Val asked.

“Quick,” he said sourly. He had been looking for a battle. She couldn’t see any bodies littering the courtyard.

“How many casualties?”

“Of ours, five,” he said. “Twenty of them.”

“Now that’s hardly a battle at all. So few?”

“One of the crows defected, opened for way for us and released the prisoners. We captured the castle quickly.”

“The prisoners,” she repeated. Her heart pounded slightly. “Mance? He lives?”

Sigorn just nodded. She took a deep breath. “And your father?”

He shook his head. Ah, no wonder he seems so bitter.

“I take you to Mance,” he offered, pointing towards the keep. “Others are securing prisoners. You have time to talk, before Snow calls us.”

She nodded. Mance, she thought with shock. Mance is alive. She had barely dared to hope.

Wun Wun wailed as she walked up the stairs to the keep. “It’s alright,” she reassured the giant. “You wait here, I won’t be long.”

The keep felt tense and quiet. Val saw some signs of fighting – half-made barricades, broken arrows littering the floor, a few blotches of blood – but it looked more like constant scuffles through the keep and corridors rather than any major fights. The stone corridors felt so confined that she tensed, but Sigorn pointed the way and she walked down into an old storeroom.

The first time she saw Mance again, he looked like a broken man. He was sitting on an old chair, and Val wasn’t so sure if he could walk. His bloodshot eyes widened as she saw her. Val had never seen him look so frail.

He’s been in a cell for over five months, she thought. Malnourished and broken.

“Val,” Mance croaked quietly. His voice was raw. “Dalla? How is Dalla, and…”

“Your son,” Val whispered, watching Mance’s eyes bulge. “He’s fine. So is Dalla.”

With that, Mance almost collapsed onto his chair. She saw tears in his eyes.

His fingers had been broken, and hadn’t quite set properly. His hands looked broken and malformed. Mance struggled to hold a cup as he drank a deep gulp of warmed tea.

The stone room was quiet and empty. Val opened the shutters, and paused to stare outside down at the courtyard. She could see more and more free folk milling through the keep. She watched as men dragged dead bodies out of the towers, and dumped them unceremoniously onto the fire. Twenty dead crows.

She wondered briefly how many of those corpses had been Jon’s friends.

“My wife,” Mance said after a pause. “Where is she?”
“Hardhome. Or perhaps moving towards Eastwatch by now.”

“Is she safe?”

“She’s with twenty thousand free folk. As well defended as they could be.” The gates at Eastwatch were wide open, and they were bringing as many through them as possible.”

“I see,” said Mance quietly. “So it’s true then? The Wall has truly fallen?”

“They’ll be opening the gates at Castle Black right now. The Shadow Tower still stands, but I doubt it will last any longer than Castle Black did. The Night’s Watch is broken. They could never stand against a dragon.”

Mance nodded, closing his eyes quietly.

“You saw it, haven’t you?” Val asked. “The dragon?”

“I saw it. I thought I was dreaming. I’m still not sure if I’m not.”

“Aye.” Complete disbelief, shock, horror and awe were all reasonable reactions to that sight. “It’s real, believe me.”

“Where did it come from?”

“Buried under ice, to hear the tales. Others say it fell from the moon, or burst from the ocean. I know a few claiming that it grew from a weirwood tree, a gift from the Old Gods – white bark given flesh.”

“And yet Jon Snow controls it?”

“King Jon Snow now.” Val nodded.

Mance smiled humourlessly. “… So I hear… I wonder if I will have to call him ‘Your Jon’, now?” He muttered, almost to himself. “I didn’t believe anyone could make the free folk kneel.”

“I didn’t believe in dragons.”

“True.”

There was a pause. “I remember Jon Snow,” Mance said. “I remember a young scared little boy coming into my tent, kneeling… he hadn’t really defected, you know? I suspect the Halfhand ordered him to infiltrate our camp. Qhorin probably ordered the boy to kill him too, the stubborn fool.”

“I always thought as much.”

“Oh, I was pretty certain. Jon agreed too quickly, he kept his words too vague and his hand didn’t go far from his sword. I’ve seen defectors before; Jon Snow was not one. He probably thought himself so cunning, telling the tale he thought I wanted to hear.”

“If you knew, then why didn’t you just kill him?”

Mance shrugged. “I was curious.”

“What?”
I wanted to see how long his vows would last. I knew he would probably return to the crows given a chance, but I figured he was no threat. I knew that girl Ygritte was warm on him, and perhaps if he had a chance to live among us…” Mance shrugged. “I wanted to see whether or not even a bastard lord of Winterfell could grow to like the taste of freedom.”

Val smiled softly. The room felt cold. She didn’t like stone rooms, they made her uncomfortable. “I saw Jon Snow again earlier,” he continued. “White hair, gaunt face… I didn’t even recognise him from the boy I once saw.”

“Aye,” Val agreed. “I didn’t either.”

“And he controls that dragon?” Mance said. “He actually commands it?”

“He’s a warg.”

“A warg with a dragon…” Mance shuddered, wincing slightly. Gods, he looked so starved and frail. “I’ve seen plenty wargs before,” Mance murmured. “Worked with them. Rode with them. Never trusted them. It goes both ways, you know? I’ve seen a man that skinchanged with a bear that ended up absolutely feral and living in a cave, or a man that couldn’t talk – only hoot – after warging with an owl for too long. The animal takes on traits of the human, but the human takes traits of the beast too. Men who start thinking more like animal than man… I shudder to think what a man shaped by a dragon could become…”

“What about the sort like Varamyr? The skinchangers that have multiple skins rather than just one?” She asked curiously. She knew that Jon Snow kept a direwolf and a shadowcat too.

“Oh, they are even worse. Controlling many bodies like that, living and dying in different forms – they forget what shape they are meant to be. Even on his best days, Varamyr was always half-insane.”

There was a long pause. Val didn’t know how to reply.

“How are you, good-brother?” Val said quietly. “My sister has been missing you dearly.”

“Not as much as I’ve missed her,” he muttered. “They locked me in a cell and forgot about me. Five months in that ice cell… I didn’t know if she still lived or not. I would have dreams about Dalla dead in the snow, or rising up with blue eyes. Dreams so vivid I wasn’t sure if…” He gulped. “I didn’t know what happened to her, and now you tell me that the Wall has fallen, and I have a son?” Val nodded. “I’ve been in a cell for five months,” Mance said. “Tell me everything.”

She did. Val told him about the fallout after the Frostfangs, the free folk gathering at Hardhome. Jon Snow and his dragon appearing, the battle against the Night’s Watch and the Others in the forest and against the king’s ships in the bay. Jon demanding fealty, and then taking Eastwatch with his dragon. Mance didn’t speak, he just listened intently.

“I see,” he said finally.

She hesitated. “There are many people wondering, Mance,” Val said carefully, “whether or not you’ll swear to him as well?”

“Why? Will King Snow take my head if I don’t?”

“I have no idea what King Snow will do,” she said honestly.

Could Snow do that? Probably could. Mance had been well-respected; Mance been a good leader to the free folk for a long time. Still, Jon Snow had broken the Wall for them. Jon Snow had a dragon. There were a large and increasing number of free folk worshipping King Snow and his dragon as a god and prophet.

If Snow wanted Mance dead, he would be dead. A few people would grumble, sure, but not enough to break King Snow’s reign.

Would he though? Val didn’t think Jon a cruel man, but she didn’t think that the current King-
Beyond-the-Wall would look kindly on the previous one.

Mance sighed, with a humourless laugh. “Oh, how things have changed.”

Val hesitated. “Tell me about the battle,” she said, changing the subject. “I heard you had a part.”

“Aye, a crow took me out of my cell. The most spineless man you’d ever seen, but he was smart enough,” Mance explained. “There were enough strong prisoners to send someone over to the Thenns, and we barricaded the doors to the barracks and locked the crows inside. It didn’t last long, but it was enough of a distraction for the Magnar to…”

His voice trailed off as he heard footsteps outside. A free folk with a gruff, greying beard, clad in chainmail and leather hauberk stepped into the room. Looks like they had been looting the crow’s armour and weapons.

“Mance,” the wildling said with a nod. “Should have known you’re too stubborn a bastard to die.”

“Wulf,” Mance greeted with a sigh. “It’s been a long time, friend.”

“Aye. A good day. We’ve taken the Wall, just like you gathered us to do,” Wulf said with a rugged smile. “Come. King Snow wants to see both of you.”

“King Snow?” Mance’s head cocked. Wulf was a seasoned warrior and raider – a true free folk.
They have known each other for years, Val recalled. “You kiss his arse as well?”

Wulf just shrugged. “If you had a dragon, I would have called you king too. Now come on.”

Mance’s jaw tightened. He struggled to stand. His legs were trembling, Val noted. He was a strong man, but after five months of muscle deterioration, cold and untreated injuries his body was failing him. “You can’t stand, Mance,” Val said. “Here, let me…”

“Bugger that,” Mance grimaced, gasping weakly as he clung to the chair with a pained wince.

“I could carry him if I have to,” Wulf said with a shrug, but Mance’s eyes flashed. There was no way that Mance would let himself be carried. Stupid male pride, Val cursed. Had Jon Snow done this deliberately, just to shame him? Summoned Mance like a dog, just to parade him around as a weak, broken man?

In the end, Mance’s arm wrapped over Val’s shoulder and she had to hold him as they staggered out of the room. The stairs proved difficult, and Wulf walked impatiently behind them with every strained step.

It was night outside, but the campfires were burning and free folk were celebrating throughout the castle. Snow drifted gently from the sky, and they trod through the crowds towards the oak and iron door of the King’s Tower. The King’s Tower, Val thought. Of course Jon Snow would take the King’s Tower as his quarters.
The King’s Tower was a hundred feet high, broad and circular. The stairs were nightmarish for Mance, he refused to stop even despite gasping and wincing in pain. The solar was a broad, stone room on the third floor, and it was full of people. There were four free folk guards standing outside, but they parted to let Mance past. Val could hear angry yelling from within.

“You fucking traitor bastard,” a man snarled angrily. “I should have gutted you when I had the chance.”

The room was on edge. Val saw Sigorn, Soren Shieldbreaker, Harle the Huntsman, Gerrick Kingsblood, Ygon Oldfather – every wildling leader and warrior crammed in the room, all tense with their hands on blades.

In the centre of the room sat half a dozen crows in black. None of them were armed, surrounded by angry free folk. Val could feel the tension with every step.

And there was King Snow, sitting behind the desk, staring at the crows with cold eyes. He wore his thick giant’s hide cloak, even despite the warm fire burning in the room. Now what is he thinking when he stares at the crows? Val wondered. Is he seeing enemies who would have him killed, or men who used to be his friends whom he betrayed?

The room hushed as Mance staggered through the doorway. Mance’s body was trembling, but his eyes were sharp. She heard the breath hiss as they stared upon the state of the man who was once their King-Beyond-the-Wall.

Still, the first person who spoke was one of the crows – a slim and sinewy aging man with grey whiskers and a bloody missing eye. The crow’s gaze darkened as he stared at Mance Rayder limping through the door. “Another one I should have killed,” the crow growled. “You proud of yourself, ‘King Snow’? You murder good men and let killers and traitors walk free?”

Val was half-surprised that nobody in the room killed him for that right there and then. She could see some free folk came close. “You forget your position, Ser Alliser,” Jon said coolly. “I’d advise you to restrain yourself.”

He paused, and then stood up. “Mance,” Jon said, with a respectful nod. “It’s good to see you again. Please, take my seat.”

The room shuffled slightly, but Jon didn’t seem to notice as he carried his chair away from the desk and placed it for Mance. Then he turned back to the crows. The one called Ser Alliser was almost fuming with rage.

“You happy, traitor?” Ser Alliser growled. “You bring savages into the realm? I’ll see you hung for the men you murdered.”

“You were the ones insisted on deaths, not me. I gave you every chance to surrender.”

“You were the ones insisted on deaths, not me. I gave you every chance to surrender.”

“Surrender to wildlings? I’ll fight you to the last, I swear it.”

“Let me kill this one for you,” Sigorn said suddenly, stepping forward, clutching his blades. “I’ll cut off his head and feed it to pigs.”

Alliser nearly jumped up, before three big men pulled him down. Ser Alliser had lost his right eye fairly recently, Val noticed. The ugly wound was still raw, as if it had been clawed out of his skull. He still bore wounds of battle, but he was defiant. Jon just shook his head.

“As bull-headed as always, Thorne,” Mance muttered, his voice croaky.
He was trembling. “Against traitors? Always.”

“That one should die,” a deep voice grumbled. Val saw a white-haired giant of a man looming at the far end of the room with angry eyes. His skin was paler, clumps of hair were missing, and his broad chest was gaunter, but there was still raw strength in his voice. Even after months of imprisonment, Tormund Giantsbane made an impressive sight. _Gods, how can Tormund even stand up straight?_ “That crow likes to torture his prisoners. Likes to hurt people, that one. I’d like to hurt him too.”

Sigorn’s eyes were vicious as he stared at Thorne. “Was this the man that tortured my father? Was this the man who left Styr, Magnar of Thenn, to die in a cell?”

_Ser Alliser is going to get himself torn apart, Val thought. Limb by limb._

“Aye. Your father died a wailing old man,” Ser Alliser growled. _As brave as he is stupid._ “I wish I had swung the axe myself. One less wildling.”

Sigorn roared in fury. He would have lunged if Jon Snow hadn’t have snapped, “Enough! Ser Alliser here is trying to provoke us. You will not let him succeed” His eyes glared. “Perhaps he will die, but not like this. Not tonight, or not in this room at least.”

“Why not give me a sword and try to kill me yourself, Snow?” Ser Alliser challenged. “One on one. Or are you not man enough to beat a one-eyed fighter?”

“The realm would come off worse if you did kill me, ser,” Jon lowered himself to glare into the crow’s eyes. “As bad as you think I am, it would be so much worse if I did die. I’m the only one who can control the dragon. Kill me, and Sonagon rampages wildly instead.”

That caused the room to pause slightly. Ser Alliser’s eye twitched. “Jon,” another crow said quietly. It was a fat, pudgy boy cower into the corner. The fat crow’s face was filled with fear rather than anger. “Please, Jon, don’t do this…”

Strangely, those words seemed to unnerve Jon more than any of Ser Alliser’s threats or taunts. Val looked at the fat boy curiously.

“I do not want to do anything,” Jon said, stepping backwards. “Mindless slaughter serves no purpose. Ser Alliser, you are here because you are the most seasoned ranger left in Castle Black.” He turned between the other crows. “Bowen Marsh, Lord Steward.” A round, red-faced man with a balding head. “Cotter Pyke, Commander of Eastwatch.” The broadstock captive they had brought with them from Eastwatch. “Othell Yarwyck, First Builder.” An old, white-bearded lantern man jawed with a stony face. “Maester Aemon, Maester of Castle Black.” An incredibly old, crooked man with a grey, blind gaze, but who still seemed strangely at ease. “And Sam Tarly. Steward.” The fat boy, he was the odd one out. Jon’s gaze flickered as he turned to him.

“You are here because you are some of the most respected men in the Watch,” he continued. “And you are here because together I wish to negotiate a truce.”

“A truce?” The crow, Bowen Marsh, squeaked.

“I have no wish to destroy the Night’s Watch.” His voice was firm. Some of the free folk shifted slightly. “I want the Night’s Watch help to defend against the real threat: the white walkers. Your rangers fought the dead in the forest. _They_ killed Lord Commander Mormont. They are the real threat, not us. And I propose a deal to work together to beat them.”

Nobody said a word. Jon kept on pacing the room. “The terms are simple. We agree to a ceasefire between sworn brothers and free folk. The Night’s Watch continues to man the Wall, with the condition that any refugee is allowed free passage, so long as they keep the peace. The gates stay open.” Ser Alliser’s face twitched. “The free folk are allowed to settle in the Gift. In return, they will agree to aid and reinforce the Night’s Watch against the Others.”

“You’re talking about stealing the Wall,” Bowen Marsh said, aghast.

“I’m talking about coming to the best arrangement anyone is going to get. There are forty thousand free folk. Good men, strong men – well-motivated to fight against the Others. The Watch had less than a thousand and I don’t even know how many still live. You need more men to stop the Others, and we can offer you that.”

“The Others,” Ser Alliser spat. “You’re bargaining to fight against fairy tales?”

“You’ve seen the Others yourself, ser.”

“Oh, I’ve seen corpses move. I’ve seen corpses kill good men. That doesn’t mean I believe every load of horse crap around, though. For all I know, it could have been wildling sorcery that raised them. They could be working for you. I don’t know what the Others are, but I know the threat in front of me.”

“Then you are a fool,” said Jon. “I’ve seen the army of the dead. It is coming. Right now, this is just the beginning, their skirmish forces; they haven’t even started their main assault yet. The white walkers will build up strength, and they will not stop. Not unless we stand together to stop it.”

“It is treason,” said Bowen Marsh. “It is pure treason, to stand aside and let you…”

“I could take the Wall,” Jon said simply. “I don’t have to offer you this deal. I could quite easily just kill you and take it. I don’t want to, though; it would be a waste. The Wall needs every good man it can get. The living, rather than the dead.”

Ser Alliser won’t yield, Val thought. Too much pride. Bowen Marsh was a weaker sort, but she didn’t think he would concede either. He might be cowed, but he would always look for a chance to betray. The others though… the ones called Othell Yarwyck and Cotter Pyke were both frowning, thinking. The ancient man, Maester Aemon, hadn’t said a word, just listening intently.

“Let’s say I buy it,” Cotter Pyke said after a while, his jaw clenched. “Let’s say we sign a piece of paper or whatever. The wildling have been raiding, raping and pillaging the north for centuries. Hell, there’s even been peace before, but it’s never lasted. How do we know that they won’t just start pillaging and raiding all the more freely?”

Oh, now he’s a different sort. Raiding and stealing is our culture, true enough. All eyes were on Jon Snow.

“The wildlings can keep their culture,” Jon said. “But they will also keep the peace, I will ensure it. The stakes are too high, I will not tolerate anyone – on either side – who might threaten the real battle.”

His eyes gazed around the room, waiting for the objections. “You’d stop us free folk from taking vengeance against the kneelers?” a wildling growled. “After what they’ve done to us for centuries?”

“And after what you’ve done to them? Aye, I’d stop you, in the same I’d stop any who’d take vengeance against you.” He locked eyes with the man. “You swore fealty to me, Haldur Bullspear, and that means respecting my peace.”
You're taking a treacherous stance, Jon Snow, Val thought to herself, but stayed quiet. The free folk happily followed him when he brought them south, but to tell them that they couldn’t raid or take vengeance? Free folk wouldn’t like that.

“Do you see why any peace is doomed for failure?” Othell Yarwyck spoke up in a lumbering voice, shaking his great mane. “Others have walked down the same path. We’ve reached out to the wildlings in the past, they’ve even reached out to us. It always ends the same way; one side has to make concessions they don’t want to make, and bad blood rules.”

“Then we draw the line in the snow and we keep it,” said Jon. “The free folk get their own land, land gifted to them by the Night’s Watch. On free folk land, free folk culture rules.”

Ser Alliser snorted. “Don’t bother trying to wrap it up,” the knight sneered. “We all know that you’re going to take everything you want no matter what you say. There’s no deal here, not really. You won’t respect any terms we make, and no one else will either. The north will still raise banners to throw you out, whether you have the Night’s Watch’s ‘gift’ or not.”

“He has a point,” Cotter Pyke said with a grunt. “It seems to me that you’re negotiating with an axe in your hand while we’re in chains. That’s a hostage situation, not a negotiation.”

“If that’s what it takes for peace.” Jon seemed irritated, pacing the room. “We have either a chance for peace, or a certainty of war. Which one would you prefer?”

“I know which one is going to happen,” Ser Alliser scoffed. Brave man. Stupid, but brave.

Jon glared at him, eyes narrowing. He paused for a few seconds, staring around the room.

“Ser Alliser,” said Jon, loudly. “Do you agree to a ceasefire between Night’s Watch and free folk? Will you agree to do your duty, happily or not, to continue to man the Wall, while the free folk settle in Gift?”

“So did I, ser,” Jon replied, almost sadly. His hand went to his sword. “Very well. Fetch a chopping block, and take Ser Alliser down to the courtyard.”

Bowen’s Marsh’s face went pale. Ser Alliser bared his teeth and snarled. “You don’t have the spine, boy.”

Jon hesitated, but then nodded and stepped back. “Take his head, but make it quick.”

The Magnar of Thenn grinned toothily. Ser Alliser screamed, lunging at Jon. It took five men to restrain him. Ser Alliser didn’t go quietly – he went kicking and screaming to the last. The free folk had to beat him on the floor of the king’s solar, before dragging him physically out the door and down the steps. Sigorn was already clutching his swords.

The fat boy, Sam, cowered in the cower. Cotter Pyke averted his gaze. Othell Yarwyck stared at Jon. Jon’s hand was trembling slightly.

“Cotter Pyke,” said Jon, loudly, turning to the man. “Do you agree to a ceasefire between Night’s Watch and free folk? Will you agree to do your duty, happily or not, to continue to man the Wall, while the free folk settle in Gift?”
He snorted. “Do I have a choice?”

“There’s always a choice, ser.”

“If that’s how you want to play it, then fine.” Cotter nodded. “I’ll do my duty, I’ll protect my men. If bending the knee keeps more of my brothers alive, then I’ll bend.” He stared at Jon intently. “But when the bodies start stacking up, the villages start burning, and the woman start being stolen, I want you to look at your actions, Jon Snow, and I want you to really think, ‘Am I doing the right thing?’”

In the courtyard, there was a shrill scream, followed by a slice of a blade as Ser Alliser lost his head. It didn’t sound like a clean kill. The free folk cheered.

The ‘negotiation’ ended quickly after that. Jon forced a promise out of each of them to respect his law. It was a promise that was worth less than dirt, Val knew.

The fat boy, Sam, looked at Jon wide eyes as wide as saucers. “Jon,” Sam whispered, pale faced. “We need to talk…”

“Not now, Sam,” Jon snapped. His shoulders tense, as free folk escorted the crows out of the room.

“But…” Sam tried to protest, yet the free folk pushed him roughly out the room.

If they were lucky, the crows would be locked in some tower for the night. Otherwise, they would likely spend the night in the dungeons.

“Jon Snow…” Maester Aemon mused slowly, running the name over his lips. It was the first thing he had said. A raider went to pull the old man out, but he held up his hand and walked. His voice was quiet as he paused, limping towards the door with a crooked back. “Jon Snow… Tell me, Jon, were you perchance born under a red star?”

Jon blinked. What sort of question is that? Val wondered. “I have no idea how I was born, my lord.”

“I see,” the maester said without another word, hobbling out of the door.

Nobody left the room happy. Jon had ordered that the crows who agreed to the truce would remain unharmed, but it made Val wonder. The crows wanted to kill them, and the free folk wanted to kill the crows. That truce was little more than wind.

Now how does King Snow expect this will end? Does he really think any sort of peace is possible? Val wondered. Or is he just afraid to kill men who were once his brothers?

Tormund Giantsbane was the last one out of the door. “Har! Jon Snow! You have a member larger than my maul, boy!” He exclaimed, grasping Jon’s arm in a hearty handshake. “I thought you were gonner, but no! You were just out digging up a dragon to fly back!”

“Tormund,” Jon said wearily. “How are you, the ice cells…?”

“Oh aye, the crows captured me and tried to freeze my member off. But some things are too big to freeze, anyways,” Tormund grunted, yet there was a dark edge in his voice. The jape didn’t reach his eyes.

Jon hesitated. “Your daughter,” he said slowly. “Munda. She was captured at the same time.”
Tormund nodded, his jaw tight. “Aye. They took Munda to try and ransom her. Of course then, some crows must have gotten bored, because instead they snuck into her cell at night, raped her, and then slit her throat. Then they raped her again, I think. She was in the cell next to mine. I heard it all.” Oh. “Now, fair warning, boy, because you rescued me and everything, but if I see those crows who killed my little girl, I will be butchering the bastards, no questions asked. Understood?”

Jon blinked. Val remembered Munda. She had been a sweet girl; she used to play the harp beautifully around the campfire at night. Jon looked lost for words. “Tormund, I’m…”

The broad man just waved his hand. “Forget it. I get it; these crows were once your brothers, and I’m sure there’s some good ones among them. You don’t want to kill the lot of them, and you did save me – so I can forgive. Mostly.” He paused. “But not the crows who hurt my Munda. Those scunners will die brutally, alright?”

Jon just gave a stunned nod. Tormund flashed him a toothy smile. “Har! Jon Snow – King in the North and dragon rider! Never would have guessed it!” Tormund laughed, limping out of the room.

The other free folk trickled out, but Jon motioned towards Val and Mance to stay. It sounded like there would be a party in the courtyard. A great bonfire, while they raided the crow’s supplies and slept in their beds.

When everyone left, the room went quiet. Jon looked towards Mance, eyes turning wary. He looked tired.

“Jon Snow,” Mance said finally. “I didn’t think I would ever be in this room again. Not like this. How many sworn brothers still live?”

“Not many,” Jon admitted. “Mormont, Smallwood, Locke, Buckwell, Hobb, Dywen, Black Jack, Noye… They all died in one battle or another.”

“I see. I’ve known some of those men half my life. I was born in the Watch, my brothers were the only family I had,” Mance said sadly.

“And then they captured and tortured you.”

“They were doing their job. I knew the stakes when I defected. It was the price I paid for my red cloak.”

“Tell me something,” Jon said, sounding genuinely curious. “Let’s say your plan worked perfectly. You marched down the Frostfangs with the Horn of Winter. You forced the Watch to open the gates and you captured Castle Black. What would you have done to the sworn brothers?”

“Honestly? I don’t know,” Mance admitted. “I didn’t want to, but I suspected that I would have to kill them all. All who wouldn’t turn, in any case. I would have held a bonfire in the grounds and burnt every black cloak I could find. More likely or not the men would have died wearing them.”

Jon grimaced. “I don’t want to do that.”

“You had the choice between saving either – what? – thirty thousand men, women and children behind the Wall, or five hundred men on the Wall. You chose to save the thirty thousand. Like I did.” Mance nodded. “I wasn’t there to see it, but you have my lifelong thanks for that.”

“Maybe. But they’re not safe yet.”

“Nobody is.”
Jon paced across the room, quietly closing the door. “Some of the free folk will try to demand to cut the crows. They’ll demand their right to raid.”

“They’re free folk. They don’t like anyone telling them what they can or can’t do.”

“If they want to survive, they’ll have to learn,” said Jon. “No needless deaths.”

“There’s always a need for some people.”

“And what about you?” Jon pressed. “Are you going to let them go wild, or will you help keep them in line?”

He didn’t reply. Jon folded his arms. “I could use your help keeping control. You have more influence than anyone.”

Mance snorted, staring at his crooked hands. “Ah,” Mance said after a long pause. “Is this the part where you threaten the lives of my wife and son unless I support your claim?”

Jon shook his head. “No, I promised Val that I would keep Dalla and her babe safe. They have nothing to fear from me, in any circumstance.”

Val allowed herself a soft smile. There were times when Jon Snow talked and she found herself believing him. Mance didn’t twitch. “And if I decide to retake my title of ‘King-Beyond-the-Wall’?”

“Then you're welcome to try,” Jon said with a humourless smile.

“You know, I spent eight years fighting to unite the clans into a single host,” said Mance. “Eight years. Hardest eight years of my life. You did it in five months.”

“Yes,” Jon agreed.

Mance just scoffed under his breath, taking a deep breath. “And what would you have me do?”

“Actually, I was planning on giving you command of Castle Black.”

Mance blinked. “You’d make me Lord Commander?”

“Not Lord Commander, no. The brothers need to elect their own Lord Commander, as it should be.
But you’d be in command.” Jon nodded. “You’re the only man who knows the Night’s Watch and the Wall as well as he knows the free folk. The Others attacked once, they could easily attack again. They were testing the Wall, trying to break through. Sooner or later they’ll find a way. I need someone to get the Wall into a better state, as quickly as possible.”

“And yourself?”

“I suspect I’m going to be busy. Ser Alliser was right; the northern lords won’t accept wildlings through the Wall. I need to convince them otherwise.”

Mance scratched his chin. “And then what?”

“We evacuate the lands north. All of it. There will be no more living for the Others to kill, and then they run out of corpses for the army. We stunt the growth of wights, and we force them to attack the Wall. And when they do, they will find thousands of free folk and sworn brothers protecting the Wall to repel them.”
“Standing side by side?” Mance said with doubt.

“Eventually.” Jon nodded. “We convince the Night’s Watch that their vows command them to fight white walkers, not the free folk. We make free folk a part of the realm, not a threat to it.”

“And afterwards we’ll all ride off together into the sunset, to live long lives in the land of eternal summer, I suppose?” He snorted.

Jon just smiled. “Why not?”

Mance thought about it for a long time. “I will sleep on it,” he said. “And I suggest that you sleep with your doors locked and really, really trustworthy guards outside.”

“I think I will,” Jon agreed, heading towards the door. “But these quarters are yours, my lord.”

“Excuse me?”

“You can take the King’s Tower for yourself,” Jon offered. “I wouldn’t subject you to climbing those stairs again, and I doubt I could sleep soundly on a bed that soft in any case. I’ve grown accustomed to sleeping next to Sonagon – I’ll be staying in Hardin’s Tower.”

Hardin’s Tower was a stout tower, but still one of the biggest and with a broken battlement spilling stone into yard below. The tower had a lean, but it would still be a good place for a dragon to roost on the top. Jon intended to sleep right underneath the watchful gaze of the dragon itself. Clever boy.

Jon nodded and bade Mance goodnight. Tomorrow, he said, they would see evacuating the tunnel, about resuming patrols, as well as organising the march to the Shadow Tower. Val said goodnight the same, leaving Mance bemused in the suite built for a king.

“May I walk you to your quarters, my lady?” Jon offered, like a respectable southern lord. Val could have snorted. He does that deliberately, she thought. He calls commoners and free folk ‘my lord’, ‘ser’, or ‘lady’, just to catch them off-guard. He even said it so earnestly that sometimes she believed it.

Val scoffed, stepping down the stairs. “You may, King Snow.”

“Many of the men will have to camp in the courtyard until the castle is secure. There will be space for you in either the Silent Tower or the Guard Tower. I could arrange for some guards for you, if you wish.”

“Don’t bother,” said Val. “I sleep with a dagger under my pillow – as any ‘respectable lady’ should.”

“As you wish,” he said with a nod, holding the door open for her into the courtyard. She could have rolled her eyes.

“So why are you walking with me… ahem… ‘Your Grace’?” She said, taunting. “Do I need my dagger?”

“I just wanted a word. You are popular with the free folk. They respect you.”

She shrugged. “I’m no raider.”

“No, but you’re popular among smallfolk – farmers, fishermen, the refugees. After the Frostfangs, many would have kept to the fighters, warriors and spearwives, but you treat them all equally.”

“So I did. I stuck to Mance’s rules. What of it?”

They passed the bonfire in the courtyard. Val noted how Jon averted his eyes from the bodies littering the snow.

“What if I were planning on assigning titles, rank and land to free folk that have proven themselves?”

“Then I would say you mistake us, Snow. It’s you southrons that need fancy names, not free folk,” she said curtly.

He just nodded. “As you wish, my lady.”

They approached the Silent Tower, an old, dusty structure swarmed by rats, but it would be warm enough inside. Many of the spearwives had already made their camp. She would have to see about finding a place for Wun Wun and the others who had come with her, but right now she just want to reserve her bed for the night. Likely it would be a patch of floor somewhere until she could scrounge a bunk. Val simply nodded at the doorway.

“Good night, King Snow,” she said, before turning and walking away.

Only when she was inside did she allow herself a small smile.

End of Part 1
Chapter 21

Chapter Summary

The Boltons at Winterfell, and the things worse than the Boltons...

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Part 2 - The North

The Mad Hound

“Please, m’lord…” the old man wept. “Mercy… please…”

The knife paused. There was a moment of quiet.

“Say that again,” Ramsay said.

The man’s eyes flickered. “Go on,” Ramsay insisted. “Say it again.”

“Mercy,” he gasped. “Have mercy… I beg you…”

Ramsay scratched his chin thoughtfully. “Now why would you say that?” He asked, genuinely curious. “Do you really think that I would go this far, and then stop just because you ask for mercy? Has that ever worked before?”

The man let loose a whimpering cry as Ramsay cut off another finger. He never asked for mercy again.

_Honestly, ‘mercy’ – the cheek of it!_

The old man was still alive when Ramsay left him. He was only a poacher caught sneaking onto their lands. Ramsay’s father would likely just have had the man killed and be done with it. Still, truth be told, Ramsay didn’t actually like killing people.

In fact, Ramsay went to great lengths to avoid killing people. He much preferred to keep them alive. Every time somebody died, Ramsay felt like he failed somehow.

Dead people were just… _there_. Stiff and boring, pretty much useless to everyone. A living person, though, a living person was full of so many possibilities.

Ramsay took a deep breath, cleaning the blood off his hands as he walked out into the courtyard of Winterfell. His father disliked Ramsay’s sports, but Lord Bolton was out at the moment, gone to meet Lady Cerwyn. Ramsay had never believed in keeping it quiet like his father did – people needed to see it. The needed to see the bodies, the missing limbs, the scars, and they needed to know, yes, this could happen to you too. Otherwise what’s the point?
However, Lord Bolton’s tactics had their merits too. Sometimes it was the quiet, unspoken, uncertain fear that bound men more tightly. There was a fine balance between the insidiousness of the fear and the obviousness of the threats. It was a skill that Ramsay was still trying to learn, to be honest, but he was a dedicated student.

Still, part of Ramsay suspected that it was a subject in which he and his father would always clash heads over. After all, Roose Bolton preferred to rule through intimidation, while Ramsay would rule through hate.

Around him, there was the banging of hammers and shouts as men struggled to patch up the Great Hall. Even now, weeks after arriving, they were struggling to rebuild Winterfell after the sack. The amount of time it takes to rebuild the castle, I almost regret burning it down. Almost.

His marriage to ‘Arya Stark’ would be a joyous affair. Almost as joyous as their wedding night would be. The lords and ladies of the north would have to attend; they were expecting ten thousand in attendance, before marching off to throw out the last remnants of the ironborn invasion at Deepwood Motte. Torrhen’s Square had already fallen to the Boltons weeks ago, that had been a bit of delay from the wedding, but it meant that Ramsay’s wedding would be the start of a new, unified north.

After that, I will march on Bear Island, and those stinking, treacherous Mormonts, Ramsay decided. Or maybe the bloated, weak Manderlys. Or maybe the Umbers. The mountain clans have been acting far too defiant for my liking too.

“My lord,” a quiet voice muttered behind. Ramsay turned, to see Maester Tybald approaching him, head bowed respectfully. “A raven has just arrived with notice. Your lord father is half a day’s ride away.”

Ramsay grinned. The Lord Bolton was finally coming back. The sooner he arrived, the sooner the lords of the north gathered, the sooner he could finally be married.

“Then let’s greet him!” Ramsay said cheerfully. “Form up the men in the courtyard! Let us welcome Lord Bolton and Lady Cerwyn properly!”

The maester nodded, pausing uncertainly. “And, um…” Tybald hesitated. “There’s an incident in the kitchen with your… retainer.”

“Oh no. What did poor Reek do this time?”

The old man stumbled over his words. Ramsay heard a shout from the kitchens. He saw his squire, Little Walder Frey, rushing for him. “Never mind,” Ramsay said with a sigh. “I’ll go see myself.”

Maester Tybald bowed, not quite meeting his eyes. The maester had only recently arrived with Lord Karstark, he recalled. Ramsay didn’t mind – he quite liked maesters in general, actually. It had been a maester at the Dreadfort who had taught him to read and write, two years ago when Ramsay was first welcomed into his father’s household. The maesters had always fascinated him.

There was a time when Ramsay himself thought he might want to be a maester, if he had more patience. He had heard that maesters were men of learning. Ramsay was a man of learning too, in his own way. Ramsay was a student of humanity – he had cut open bodies to learn what was inside of them, he had cut men apart to see the animal inside. He was constantly pushing the limits, learning more and more about pain, fear and response.

Ramsay had very diligently learned how to read and write, and more often he had even mused about logging some of the many things he had learned during his research. Ramsay suspected the tome would be ground-breaking.

After all, I’m a highborn lord now. I am the Lord of Hornwood and soon-to-be heir of Winterfell, son of the Warden of the North, he thought proudly. Writing books about my exploits is what a respectable lord would do.

If Ramsay ever did find the time to write that manuscript, he suspected that Reek would have a chapter all to himself. Reek was Ramsay’s finest work.

Ramsay found his creature huddled into the kitchen corner, between a shouting match of Tallhart men. Little Walder brought Ramsay straight to him.

“My name is Reek, Reek…” the creature muttered, sobbing. “It rhymes with freak…”

“Turncoat!” a man snapped, clutching an iron baton as he tried to run at Reek. “Fuckin’ turncoat Theon–”

“Why, you’re confused, my good man,” Ramsay said suddenly, stepping into the room. “I see no one called Theon. This is Reek.”

The sound of his voice made everyone go quiet. They all stopped still. Ramsay grinned brightly.

“Well, what seems to be the problem here?” Ramsay said happily, looking at the men. “I do hope there’s no disagreement.”

He turned to face the man at the front. A big broad northman – a man-at-arms bearing the Tallhart crest. The man hesitated, eyes flickering. Gods, I love that expression. “I was at Torrhen Square,” the man said slowly. “When the ironborn attacked. I lost good friends to the reavers, and then I find that you’ve got the bloody Prince of Pyke walking–”

“Prince of Pyke?” Ramsay laughed. “Reek is no prince. To be a prince, you’d have to be a man.” He paused, staring at Reek’s wide eyes with a small smile. Ramsay was proud of his work. He wanted to show it off. “Take off your breeches, Reek. And your tunic too.”

Reek gulped, his hands trembling. He was staring at the floor fixedly. Ramsay patted him on the shoulder almost kindly. Almost. “Come on now, Reek,” Ramsay said. “Take them off. Take off all your clothes.”

Reek knew that voice. Reek had learnt what it meant when Ramsay became that cheerful.

The creature’s mutilated hands were trembling as he stripped off his filthy rags. Ramsay heard gasps as they saw stripped, raw skinless flesh on his chest, and then cauterised, ugly, severed flesh as he pulled down his pants. Whole strips of flesh were missing, like any fate had been cut off him.

The Tallhart man’s face paled. Yes, Ramsay thought with pride. Bloody fine work.

“Do you see?” said Ramsay. “Reek is no man. Reek is a dog. Go on, lick the floor, Reek. Lick the floor.”

There were tears down Reek’s eyes. The room was deathly quiet. All eyes were focused on the broken little prince. How strange, Ramsay mused. I didn’t know he was still capable of crying.

“Please…” Reek muttered, eyes averted. Naked, frail, broken, standing in front of two dozen eyes. Tears leaving streaks down his filthy cheeks. “Please…”
Ramsay smile froze. “Oh Reek,” he said sadly. “You know that we never say that word.”

In a smooth motion, Ramsay grabbed a black iron kettle from the kitchen counter and swung it forward. Reek screamed. The impact of solid metal colliding with him sent him to the floor.

And then the kettle spilled, and scalding water splashed out. The sound of Reek’s screams howled outwards as the steam hissed. Burning water all over his head and back, so hot the skin bubbled.

The sound Reek’s agonised screaming filled the room. Some men fled. Ramsay just laughed.

“Lick the floor, Reek. Lick it.”

He did. The Prince of Pyke licked the stones of the kitchen, even as steaming water burnt him. He heard the wails. Ramsay approached the Tallhart man slowly.

“Do you see?” Ramsay said. The man’s face was pale, frozen still. “He’s not Theon Greyjoy – he’s Reek.”

“Reek, Reek…” Ramsay’s creature wept through stammering breaths. “It rhymes with freak…”

The man didn’t move. So strange how some men screamed and others just froze. “What’s your name, man?”

He looked deathly pale. Ramsay knew the men in the room – over half of them were his Bastard’s Boys now. “Cley, milord,” the man gulped.

“Well, Cley,” Reek said graciously, slowly pulling a dagger out of his belt. “If you still want to punish Reek for what the ironborn did to your friends…” He handed the dagger to Cley. “…then please be my guest.”

The man-at-arms stared at the dagger with wide, fearful eyes. Reek was still whimpering as he licked the kitchen stones.

“No thank you, milord,” the man stammered after a long pause, handing the dagger back to him. His hands were trembling too. “I have no quarrel with Reek.”

“Then as you were,” Ramsay said, smiling, before motioning for two of his men – Yellow Dick and Sour Alyn – to drag Reek back to the kennels. The Tallhart men ran away very quickly.

What a shame, Ramsay thought quietly. Honestly, Ramsay would have probably had more respect for Cley if he did take the dagger to Reek. Maybe if he cut off an ear, an eye, or even a good old-fashioned rape. If he had done that, then Cley would have probably earned a place with his Bastard’s Boys, and the world always needed more hounds. Instead, Cley proved to be just another sheep.

Reek was still whimpering as he was dragged away. Ramsay walked with him. “You know, Reek,” Ramsay said, his voice chiding. All dogs needed to learn boundaries. “I’m not happy with how you questioned me there. I think there might be too much of the old you left in there.”

“Reek… reek….” he whimpered quietly, body trembling.

Ramsay mused over it. “Tell me, do you want to fuck a dog?”

Reek stared at him with broken, fearful wide eyes. “The old Reek used to fuck dogs,” Ramsay said. “And if you’re a dog, then you should fuck like a dog. Of course, you can’t fuck anything. Maybe tonight I will let loose a big brute of a hound into your cage and let the dog fuck you. How would you like to be a dog’s bitch?”

Reek never replied. His mouth hung open, quivering. “Your name is Reek,” Ramsay said quietly, just before the men dragged him away. “It rhymes with shriek.”

I need to catch any disobedience in the bud. Always make sure they know what they are.

He would have to have a word with the Ben Bones, the kennelmaster, about suitable partners for Reek. It would be difficult to train the hound not attack him, but Ramsay quite liked the thought of the creature that used to be Theon Greyjoy being taken like a bitch. Definitely something to think about.

Ramsay really did care about his Reek. He spent a long time caring for him. In fact, there had been several people who had died as practice before Ramsay ever took the knife to Theon. Ramsay had refined his art painstakingly – choosing the perfect amount of pain to break him without ever risking killing him. The very last thing Ramsay ever wanted to do was kill Theon – not when the sight of him as Reek brought Ramsay so much pleasure.

When he had first seen Theon Greyjoy, Ramsay had been the one in chains and Theon had been the brief prince of Winterfell. Ramsay had wanted him from first sight.

After all, Theon had been exactly the type of lord that Ramsay just loved. He had been arrogant, highborn, all easy smiles and daddy issues. If there was a combination that Ramsay loved to break apart…

He reminded me of my brother, Ramsay thought with a soft sigh.

Oh yes, it was so very satisfying to look at his new Reek – it was a victory every time he laid eyes on him.

The thought made Ramsay think of his betrothed, ‘Arya Stark’, waiting for him in the castle. Ramsay was so, so tempted to go see her early, but he had other distractions. The act of sex could never be half as intimate as the act of torture.

Ramsay still remembered his first time. He had been twelve when his father sent Reek – the original Reek, that is – to him.

That was the last time I ever begged for mercy, he recalled. It had been a valuable lesson too. Beg for someone to stop and they never, ever would. Begging is the most useless exercise.

He spent the day preparing for his lord father’s arrival, grinning as the men snapped to attention around him. The bowed their heads before him, and they called him ‘lord’. The Lord of Winterfell. He had made sure that nobody dared to ever call him bastard, or Snow.

He stood in finery, in his own castle, staring out over his land.

Do you see me now, Mother? Do you see your little bastard now?

Mother had been a mean, spiteful bitch. All the while Ramsay had grown up, she had barely used his name. He couldn’t remember his Mother ever calling him anything other than ‘bastard’.

He knew the story. Mother had told it to him frequently, whenever she was drunk and angry. All through his childhood, she told him the story. The story of how his father had murdered her husband on her wedding day, and then raped her while her husband's corpse was still swinging.
How she had spent her wedding night being violated by the stranger that had murdered her one true love, and raped her with her husband’s blood on his hands. The miller’s daughter whose life had been destroyed only hours after she’d been wed.

All because Lord Bolton had grown bored while on his hunting trip.

If not for the payment that Roose Bolton gave her yearly for Ramsay’s upbringing, Ramsay had no doubt that his mother would have strangled him in his crib. Instead, she used the coin to drink herself angry and bitter, giving Ramsay little more than cruel words and vicious neglect.

_You fed me nothing but hatred my entire life_, Ramsay thought with a self-satisfied smile, _and so I learned how to live on it._

He had learned very quickly that he could hurt her too.

Ramsay had been a bulky boy growing quickly. When he was twelve, Mother went back to his lord father to request help raising him. In return, Roose Bolton sent Reek. Ramsay long suspected that it had been his father’s idea of a jape. Reek had certainly been no servant or steward.

Reek had been a big man. The man had stunk of some birth condition, with rotten teeth and watery eyes, with foul yellow skin. Ramsay still remembered the way Reek had forced him down to the ground, back when Ramsay had been small and weak…

Eventually, Ramsay grew to be grateful. It had been a valuable lesson of how the world worked. In his own way, Reek had done more to raise him than his mother ever had.

Later, Ramsay stopped being small and weak, and Reek stopped being able to force him to the ground. Ramsay did not share in Reek’s… base tendencies, but Ramsay certainly learned how to appreciate being the one in power. That was something he and Reek could bond over.

It was all about power, really. How to not be the one being pushed to the ground.

That was when Ramsay had met Domeric Bolton – his father’s trueborn son. The son that Ramsay would never be.

_Mother taught me about hatred, and Reek taught me about cruelty_, he reflected. _But, in his own way, Domeric helped shape me into the person I am more than any of them._ Domeric had been his friend. His first, and possibly only, real friend.

Ramsay still remembered the way Domeric had rode into his cottage, following up rumours concerning his wild half-brother. Domeric had been older – he had been handsome, charming, and quick to laugh. He had been dressed in samite and velvet and he rode a horse like a knight. Domeric showed Ramsay a world he had never even imagined.

He had been cheerful and charitable. They rode together into White Harbour, Domeric bought Ramsay new clothes, a new sword, and he slept in feather beds. Domeric would laugh, and make girls blush. They didn’t blush when Ramsay laughed.

Meeting Domeric had been a whole different experience, a look at a completely different world. The look at the life of a lordling.

Ramsay still remembered when Domeric had sat him down at a tavern, ordered the finest wine, causing the barmaid to curtsy and he winked as he flicked a gold stag at her.

“Ramsay!” Domeric had said cheerfully. “We must get you out of that dreary cottage more often!
Life like that isn’t good enough for my brother.”

“Half-brother.” Ramsay had blinked, struggling to respond. He had never been good at keeping up with the laughter and smiles. “I have no money, I am a…”

He hadn’t been able to say the word. Bastard.

Domeric had scratched his chin. “Well,” his half-brother had mused. “Do you really need coin? It seems only fair that you have a chance for happiness too. I have a proposition, if you’re interested.”

“What?”

“How would you like to kill our lord father?”

It turned out that had been the whole reason Domeric had sought Ramsay out in the first place. Domeric had wanted Ramsay to murder Roose Bolton for him.

It made sense, actually. Domeric had grown tired of waiting for his father to die, and tired of being the heir to the Dreadfort rather than the lord. Of course, Domeric couldn’t kill him – not easily, not without coming under suspicious and risk being branded a kinslayer.

Instead, Domeric must have figured, who would want to kill Roose Bolton more than his insane, savage bastard son, neglected from birth and born of rape?

Domeric had promised a life of luxury if Ramsay did the deed. He promised to raise Ramsay up when Domeric became lord, for them both to have a chance to escape from Lord Bolton’s grip. To stand side by side in the Dreadfort as brothers.

Domeric promised a lot of things. He even supplied the poison that Ramsay could use. Ramsay had seen the glint in his grey eyes. Domeric had thought him a fool, some pawn to be manipulated.

They sat opposite each other, and that was when Ramsay realised; if one brother could become a lord, then why couldn’t the other one?

They had been toasting to their partnership when Ramsay had slipped the poison into Domeric’s glass instead. Domeric Bolton had died with a look of surprise on his face, gasping at his chest.

Soon afterwards, Ramsay turned up at the Dreadfort. It appeared Roose Bolton was now missing a son and heir. Of course, Roose always knew that Ramsay had been responsible for his trueborn son’s death, but Ramsay kept the exact reason why to himself. It felt good to be able to smirk secretly each time Roose compared him to his trueborn ‘golden’ son Domeric, with no idea that son had been plotting his father’s death.

Domeric hadn’t been the first person Ramsay killed, but he was the first kill that actually meant something to Ramsay.

I am my father’s son.

Ramsay was waiting on the battlements, watching the host march through the wide gates of Winterfell. There was a flurry of snow sweeping through the yard. Four hundred more men from Cerwyn, with Bolton men at the front.

He was smiling as he walked up to greet his lord father. “My lord,” Ramsay cheered. Roose Bolton sat grim faced on his horse, clad in black ringmail and leathers with his spotted pink cloak over his shoulders. “Have you had a safe journey?”
Roose’s pale eyes danced over him, but he didn’t reply. Ramsay turned to Lady Cerwyn, a plump homely woman, with fearful eyes. Lord Rodrik Ryswell and Lady Barbrey Dustin were in the courtyard too, while the men filed through the gate.

“Welcome to Winterfell, my lady,” Ramsay said, bowing fractionally. “It’s such a pleasure to have you here for my wedding.”

Lady Cerwyn extended her hand, timid as a dear. Ramsay noticed her eyes flickering. I murdered your father, Ramsay recalled with a smile.

“Ramsay,” his father said coolly. “A word.”

Ramsay’s smile never flickered. His father’s man – Steelshanks – walked by his side as they headed towards the Great Keep.

“I saw your work on the kingsroad,” his father said. “Half a dozen lords and ladies had to ride past your work. Who were they?”

Ramsay’s eyes glinted. “I can’t recall. Which ones are you talking about?”

“Discretion, Ramsay. Is the concept lost on you?”

“But they should see! I’ve been keeping the north safe. Winterfell is to be my home, and my men guard proudly it against traitors and the like.”

“Were they traitors?”

Ramsay shrugged. “Probably.”

Before the Sack of Winterfell, six hundred Bolton men had cut their way through two thousand collected northmen under Rodrik Cassel – assembled to take back Winterfell from the ironborn under Theon Greyjoy.

It had hardly even been a battle. Ramsay’s men had been the most vicious killers that House Bolton had to offer, while Ser Rodrik’s host had been expecting friends.

Still, some of them had escaped. Some men managed to flee the battle, who could testify that it had been Bolton’s men, not ironborn, who had sacked Winterfell. Ramsay had worked diligently to ensure that such men, nor anybody they may have talked to, ever had a chance to cause problems for his family.

Ramsay was feeling very protective of his family, actually.

“We will discuss this later,” Roose said coolly. “Come, to the keep. We have more urgent matters.”

Ramsay bristled as if he had been slapped. After all the work I’ve done…

He looks at me like Domeric did, Ramsay realised with quietly simmering anger. That quiet, arrogant superiority in the gaze. He thinks me a fool – some puppet that can be used.

A hound that can be kept on a leash.

Roose intended on using him. Ramsay the wild dog to hunt down his enemies, to make Roose’s rule seem tame in comparison. Ramsay wondered how his lord father would describe him in private. Vicious but with low cunning? Some sort of butcher? True, and Ramsay had even encouraged that description. But Roose Bolton was just like his Domeric, while Ramsay was more than he could ever see.

Let him have his games. He thinks he owns me, he thinks that my men will choose him over me. He really thinks that Sour Alyn, Luton, Skinner and all the rest actually report to him. Let him have his delusions.

I am a Bolton, father. My blade is sharp too.

Ramsay followed his lord father towards the Keep, as the castle stirred with the new arrivals. He saw Maester Tybald bow to Lord Bolton.

“My lord,” the maester said. “A raven arrived from Last Hearth, from Hother Umber to you.”

“The Whoresbane,” Ramsay said sharply. “The Umbers have sent word? Why was I not informed?”

Lord Bolton gave a cool nod. Tybald trembled. “I will deal with them shortly.” Tybald whimpered away. Ramsay glared. His lord father glanced back at him. “And yes, it appears that House Umber will be giving fealty at your wedding.”

“They waited too long.” I should flay them for that defiance.

“Yes,” Lord Bolton agreed, musing. “It also appears that Lord Umber himself will be attending.”

The Greatjon? Isn’t he a prisoner at the Twins? “Why are we giving hostages away to the Umbers?”

“They have offered a token of fealty in return for the Greatjon’s release. I must admit it is unexpected. We shall see what comes from this deal.”

Ramsay was about to ask more, but they had already arrived at the Great Hall, and the lords and ladies were gathered. Ramsay saw the banners emblazoned with twin towers, battle axes and pikes, iron fists and chains, horse heads and moose, all under the flayed man of the Boltons at the top of dais.

The room was quiet, the granite walls still blackened from the sack, and many had to stand because there were tables. Men would have sat easily while Lord Stark held court, but they would never, ever sit comfortable in the presence of Lord Bolton. Nor did he expect them to.

“My lords,” Roose announced quietly, and the room quietened. “We welcome you to Winterfell. It has been a trying time for all of us. We have all felt the touch of war on our lands.”

“The ironborn still hold Deepwater Motte,” Lady Barbrey Dustin said coolly. A bitter bitch. “They have taken prisoners to their isles. The reavers still threaten the west coast, and you hoard men here that could see them off.”

“The ironborn are finished!” ‘Lord’ Arnolf Karstark announced, in a raspy voice. Crooked old hunchback. “They lost their grip on the north when they lost the Moat. They have already turned their attention to raiding the Reach – they attacked the Arbor barely a week past.”

“Then we must be rid of them for good,” Lord Rodrik Ryswell called, an old man with red-hair turning to grey and a long, stern face. I’ve murdered his grandson and one of his sons.

“At ease, my lords,” Lord Bolton said, his voice low. People always fell quiet to listen to him, Ramsay thought proudly. “The ironborn will not be able to hold their ill-gotten gains, not when the main bulk of their fleet has already moved on. We will leave them in their stolen castles to starve, and they will fall easily when we do take them back.”

“And what of the prisoners of House Glover?” Berena Tallhart snapped angrily, to a murmur of agreement. Aw, I married and murdered her good-sister. And murdered her husband, actually.

“The heir to Deepwood Motte and other captives?”

“Hostages are most easily negotiated for from a position of power. The ironborn have none. Any prisoners will not be harmed.” Lord Bolton’s eyes shone. “I am Warden of North. I will see the north put to rights.”

The words caused the room to ripple. Beneath the dais, Ser Hosteen Frey and Ser Aenys Frey both look smug. “I expect vows of fealty from each of my loyal lords,” he said quietly. “And then together, we can return order to these lands.”

Some of the men looked like Roose had asked them to swallow shit. His father didn’t pretend it was anything other.

We murdered the old Lord Paramount – everyone knows it, Ramsay cackled quietly, and now we demand that they bend the knee to us as well. The Freys had an expression sickly-sweet.

They all knew what Lord Bolton would want of them. Bend the knee, and we will give you back your lands and castles. Stand defiant, and we will break you. Our allies hold your kin hostage at the Twins. we have the men, we have the support of the Throne, you have nothing.

Still, northmen were proud. Some like Lady Dustin and Lord Ryswell had surrendered early and would come off well, but others like Manderly, Tallhart or Umber would not say the oath easily.

And so Roose had invited the entire north to Winterfell – to make sure that everybody saw their defiance break.

“My lords,” Ramsay said sweetly, speaking up for the first time. I am the Lord of Hornwood – I have a right in the room now too. “It is so good to see us all together like this. The north has been led astray for too long, now we can finally return it to peace.” He grinned. “Yet it seems to me that our numbers are lacking. What of House Manderly? House Umber? Should we not wait for their arrival, on my wedding day?”

Roose stared at him with pale eyes, before quietly shaking his head. “The Manderlys will not be attending. They have refused the invitation.”

Ramsay froze. His smile disappeared. “They what?” Ramsay snarled

“House Manderly, House Locke, House Flints – many lords around the White Knife,” Lord Bolton explained quietly. Some of the lords were rippling, it was news to them too. “They sent a raven excusing themselves that arrived at Barrowton. They will not be attending.”

“Why?” Ramsay snapped loudly. He saw a few, but he didn’t care. They were all staring at him, but good. They should stare. They should see rage. “They dare defy their lord?”

“They claim the need to gather men to face the threat from the north.” Skin him. I’ll skin them all.

He snorted. “Stannis is already gone.” Ramsay’s voice was shaking. “You are their liege. Command them to come. Otherwise I’ll take their heads as my wedding prese–”

“It is not Stannis that is the concern.” Lord Bolton’s voice turned sharp. Chiding Ramsay for his outburst. “There was another raven. The Night’s Watch has fallen.”
Ramsay flinched. There were mutters from the back of the room.

Ramsay had been furious when reports came that Stannis had landed on their shores. If his father hadn’t stopped him, Ramsay would have ridden to Eastwatch himself to take the false king’s head. Stannis had even sent ravens to the northern houses – asking them to declare for him! The nerve of it caused Ramsay to shake.

And then, weeks ago, the news came that Stannis had fled. They had seen his ships leaving, sailing south past Grey Hills, and the raven came from Karhold. Twenty-nine ships had arrived at Eastwatch, but only eight had sailed out. No ravens, no announcement, just a broken king fleeing once more. Stannis had agreed to sail alongside the Night’s Watch against the wildlings. And then the wildlings won.

Ramsay had laughed so hard when he heard the news. It wasn’t the victory Ramsay envisioned, but it was funny. Ramsay could picture the pure indignity on Stannis’ face – to arrive declaring himself king, and to run away weeks later! ‘King’ Stannis would be the laughing stock of the entire realm, if he wasn’t already dead.

He had no idea where Stannis would run. He arrived with maybe up to five thousand men, and left with less than a thousand. Hopefully, Stannis would die at sea, crashed against the rocks somewhere, and that would just be the most gloriously ignominious end to a king famed for his pride.

First Tywin Lannister died on the privy with a whore in his bed, Ramsay mused, and then Stannis was turned into a craven beggar king. It was unhealthy to be proud man, it seemed.

Oh, how Ramsay had laughed and laughed for hours. Normally, whenever Ramsay laughed that hard, he needed to get cleaned up afterwards.

“We received a raven from Ser Denys Mallister, of the Shadow Tower,” Lord Bolton continued. “Many other lords received the same. It was quite desperate. He reported how their ranging led by the Lord Commander went missing against the wildling host. Then Castle Black fell quiet.”

“Mallister,” said Lady Dustin. “House Mallister rebelled alongside Robb Stark, could it be a scheme?”

“Perhaps. But nights later, there were urgent pleas from Eastwatch, reporting a large force of wildlings at its gate. Then they fell quiet.”

“All of the major houses on the west coast of the continent received similar pleas,” Arnolf Karstark said dourly. “Manderlys included. Shipbreak Point took in four men of the Night’s Watch – men who fled the battle – who confirmed it. They reported a horde of wildlings overwhelming Eastwatch.”

I’ve only just heard about this now. Have these fools been keeping me in the dark? “How many?” Ramsay demanded.

“They claimed thousands upon thousands. The men were scared senseless.”

That caused the room to stir. Ramsay paused, looking across dark faces. “If Eastwatch has fallen, the rest of the Night’s Watch will not be long. They will not be able to defend from the south of the Wall,” Lady Dustin noted.

“We should have seen this coming,” Lord Stout growled. “The Night’s Watch is less than a thousand men. They have been requesting aid for years. It was only a matter of time that a King-Beyond-the-Wall broke through.”
“Everyone is demanding more men, if you hadn’t noticed.” That was Lord Ryswell, snapping angrily. Bickering like fools.

A wildling invasion gave the disloyal houses an excuse to ignore the Bolton’s summons. They would claim to be massing a force against the savages, but they could turn their blades against them instead.

Ramsay’s hands were trembling. “Give me the men, father,” Ramsay snarled. “Give me a thousand men and I will paint the Wall in wildling blood.”

“The men are not what gives me pause,” said Lord Bolton.

Karstark grunted. “Surely you don’t believe such nonsense.”

“If it were one man reporting it, I’d call it nonsense too,” Lord Bolton replied calmly. “A dozen men saying the same gives me pause.”

“The ravens also report a dragon. A white dragon, in fact.”

There was a long moment of stunned silence.

“That is insane,” Lady Dustin said finally.

“Then the insanity is spreading. I have had testimony from three different houses saying the same thing,” Lord Bolton replied. His voice was calm, but his eyes looked troubled.

“There are no dragons left,” said Lady Cerwyn, shaking her head. “And there have never been any dragons in the north.”

“Well, apparently there’s at least one,” another lord – some minor north-eastern house – grunted.

“The reports are all consistent,” That was Maester Tybald, speaking up nervously. Ramsay glared furiously. I have been kept in the dark. How dare they? “They report a white dragon over a hundred and fifty feet long. Larger than Balerion the Black Dread, to hear the tales. This dragon breathes ice, and flies with the wildling host.”

“It could be only a wild rumour to stir up fear,” Lord Bolton said with a long sigh. “But I suspect more.”

“The Night’s Watch is weakened, but the Wall is still extremely defensible,” Lord Stout growled. “It would not have fallen so quickly except to something exceptional.”

A dragon. Ramsay blinked. Are they serious?

“How is that possible? Where could a dragon possibly come fr–”

“Who cares where it’s from?” Karstark snapped. “Karhold is further north than any of you – it’ll be Karhold on the front lines. There’s a bloody wildling horde heading south.”

“What of Last Hearth? The Umbers must see a threat coming to them first.”

“Dragons? Should we be concerned of grumpkins and snarks as well?”
He heard the bickering. Some were calling it lunacy, yet Lord Bolton didn’t speak a word. His lord father was considering the possibility. That made Ramsay convinced. A dragon.

Ramsay’s face twisted. He had only read the books, heard maesters speaking. I’ve never killed a dragon before.

… no… I won’t kill it… I could tame it. I’m good at taming things. I could cut its wings, I could chain it, I could hurt it until it obeys me…

“And what of the king?” Karstark demanded. “The testimonies from survivors mention a wildling king – King Snow.”

“Snow!” Ramsay said suddenly. That word snapped him out of his thoughts. “Snow?”

Lord Bolton cast a cautious eye over him. A few men stepped back from Ramsay. “They claim that this dragon obeys this king. We have yet to learn the truth of it.”

There was a long murmur of quiet. Ramsay saw a few people shift. Rumours travelled fast in the north, yet Ramsay hadn’t heard anything. I’ve busy with my hunts and distractions, all the while the lords have been talking and whispering without me.

“And what of the rumours,” Lord Ryswell said slowly, his eyes hard, “that this King Snow is one Jon Snow – the natural son of Eddard Stark, the bastard of Winterfell?”

The room froze. Ramsay felt his hands clench. A bastard.

A fucking bastard.

Nobody met his gaze. Lord Bolton was at the centre of the hall, but Ramsay could feel their gazes glancing to him. His head spun. Oh, no wonder nobody dared to tell me.

A fucking bastard king.

Ramsay had to take a deep breath. He could feel his body trembling. All of that emotion – that rage, that hatred, that pride – oh, he could feel it.

“The wildling king is a threat to the realm. I imagine each of the rumours that you have heard have been exaggerated a thousand times,” Lord Bolton said. “More likely that this is nothing but some savage king trying to take the identity of Stark’s bastard. A feeble and useless attempt to claim a sliver of legitimacy.”

Nobody replied to that. There were more talks, talk of raising men and sending ravens, and strong-arming allies, but Ramsay could feel everything that wasn’t said echoing with quiet glances in the room.

The court dissolved quickly after that – Roose Bolton wasn’t fond of addressing assemblies of large numbers. Lord Bolton much preferred to take men to one side, one by one to air and resolve grievances quietly and discreetly.

Ramsay took a deep breath, feeling his arms shake. Everyone, even his Bastard’s Boys, kept their distance. They looked at him like he was some rabid animal off the leash. Ramsay could feel the whispers. By dusk, all of Winterfell would be whispering about the wildlings invasion.

A dragon, and a bastard. It was hard to say which thought infuriated Ramsay more.
King Snow, he thought. King Snow. King Snow…

He heard Ser Hosteen Frey arguing with Lord Bolton after the court was over. Ramsay was left lurking outside of the corridor, waiting for his lord father and glowering at the wall. Lord Bolton was calm, quiet, as he walked out. His father went everywhere flanked by at least four guards, Ramsay noticed. Although Lord Bolton usually preferred eight in Ramsay’s presence.

“Well?” Ramsay snapped at his father. “What are you going to do about it?”

“About what, Ramsay?” Lord Bolton replied, motioning for his guards to step backwards.

“The wildlings! The dragon! About King ‘Snow’!” Ramsay snapped. “Give me the men! I’ll kill them myself.”

“Don’t be a fool. You would march up to the Wall? Through the snows, mountains, risk the autumn storms and waste our strength?” he scowled. “You’d be taking five thousand men – many of uncertainty loyalty – to face a much larger force on their own ground.” He shook his head. “No, our armies stay in Winterfell.”

“But he comes south! Ned Stark’s bloody bastard!” Ramsay was almost frothing at the mouth, eyes bulging in rage.

“Patience.” His voice was dark. “Our hold in the north is tenuous at best. We must conserve and rally our forces.”

This threat could not have come at a worse time, Ramsay realised. Roose Bolton was a patient man, he liked to wait until he was in control, yet this invasion could be disastrous to his plans. In a few years, Lord Bolton could have the north completely under his thumb, or his blade, but now? When the memory of the Red Wedding was still so fresh? When any aid from the Iron Throne was nigh non-existent at best? These wildlings threatened everything they were building.

He kept his voice steady, but Ramsay could see it in his eyes. His father was actually concerned.

“Learn your history, Ramsay,” Lord Bolton said. “If we truly face a dragon, then armies are useless. Aegon the Conqueror proved that – large dragons can torch ten thousand men. No, we must be careful.”

“I’ll kill a dragon, I’ll rip its bloody wings off!” Ramsay spat.

“Perhaps you’ll have your chance,” he replied. “But patience. We must allow this ‘King Snow’ the first move. Our response will depend on his.”

“His? And how will he move, father?”

“Depends. If he is a fool, he will march south on us with his overwhelming force and put our castles to the torch. In that case, I will rally the north against a common threat to throw him out.”

That’s what I would do, Ramsay thought with a scowl.

“But I fear that this King Snow may be smarter than that,” Lord Bolton continued. “I fear he may reach out to our ‘allies’, to convince them to join him against us. His force is made of wildlings, and negotiating any alliance would be difficult, but in exceptional circumstances… hmm… he may succeed in finding supporters among the disgruntled northern lords.”

“And if he does?”
Lord Bolton smiled softly. “Then I will win. Against a conquest of might, it may be very challenging for me,” he said. “But if he tries to play the game of thrones, then I will most certainly kill him at it.”

Ramsay spat. “You keep your game,” Ramsay scowled, already storming away. “I will take his head.”

Ramsay spent the rest of the day in his dungeon, working through his anger. He felt agitated. He need a distraction, to clear his mind and help him think. Ramsay poured wine over one of his dogs – Kyra – and then lit the bitch on fire. The hound went mad as her fur caught light, howling, barking and snapping against the cage. Ramsay watched her fur sizzle for a long while, feeling the grin spread over his face.

Fire was too quick and messy for Ramsay’s tastes, but he could see the appeal.

He returned to his captive later that night and repeated the experiment, this time by pouring lamp oil over his head and shoulders. The man didn’t even have the strength to quiver in his chains. Oil dripped onto the floor. “Why?” The old man croaked. “Why are you doing this?”

Ramsay’s grin was predatory. “Because it’s fun,” he replied sweetly, before throwing a torch onto the man. “And because I love it.”

He forced Reek to watch as well. He watched the flesh bubble and smelled scorching skin. The man’s mutilated body spasmed and twitched even long after Ramsay would have said he was dead. Ramsay just laughed; the way he thrashed and fought so futilely… it felt quite satisfying.

It was only when the meat stopped smoking that Ramsay felt calm enough to think. Reek was trembling on the floor, trying to hide in the corner.

“Reek,” Ramsay demanded, turning to the quivering creature. “Tell me about Jon Snow.”

Reek’s voice quivered, but he talked. Reek described a young, dark-haired boy lingering around the castle. A Stark in all but name; a spoilt, proud boy who had been so eager to escape his father’s shadow.

A bastard, Ramsay thought. A proud, brooding bastard who calls himself king. A man with a superiority complex and a chip on his shoulder. I could have fun with a man like that.

He felt the idea form slowly. I’m going to kill a dragon.

______________________________

Bran

He heard them arguing. They would argue constantly, but never in front of Bran. The two castellans of Last Hearth would retreat to the main hall to argue, out of earshot, yet Bran would still hear them through the senses of the hounds and ravens in the castle. His abilities were growing so much it felt like he could see through a dozen eyes at once.

“Bloody fool!” Mors Crowfood cursed, a heavyset old man, white-whiskered, clad in a snow bear’s skin. “You’re a fool, brother, if you think the Boltons will give you aught but treachery!”

“Aye they’re vermin,” Hother Whoresbane growled, pacing. He was the older – skinny and gaunt compared to his brother’s bulk, but pacing constantly and snarling while Mors shouted and stomped. “And they’re vermin that hold our nephew hostage. I will not see that boy dead, Mors, I refuse.”

_Boy. They called the Greatjon Umber a ‘boy’,_ Bran thought. Both castellans of Last Hearth, the uncles of Lord Umber, were well over sixty. Hother Whoresbane was pushing seventy, but the old lean man was still strong.

“I refuse. I refuse to pander to the fucking Freys,” Mors bellowed. “We kill them all and force them to release our nephew.”

“Now wouldn’t that be a fine thing?” Hother kept his voice low, dangerous. “Our armies of greenboys and greybeards marching against Winterfell and the Twins?”

Mors eyes flashed. “Yet you suggest treason. Treason against the Starks.”

“Treason has already been done. We bend, or we die.” He shook his head, long white beard rippling. “If it were only our lives I’d soak Last Hearth in Bolton blood before I cave, but I will not see the boy dead, Mors. We bend to save our lord’s life.”

The Crowfood hoisted up his maul – a large, unwieldy thing like a club of iron. “And what of our king, Hother?” He snarled. “Brandon Stark. By the grace of the Old Gods we found him again, and if you dare to suggest we turn him over like cravens I will end you right now.”

The dog that Bran possessed whined quietly from the floor, but both men ignored it. Hother just scoffed. His hands clutched the spear he used as walking stick tightly. Mors had his maul, but Hother fought with a spear. It was hard to say which one was more dangerous.

“What kind of man do you think I am, brother?” Hother said with a grunt. “No, Bran Stark will not fall into the Bolton’s grip, I would never send the last son of Eddard Stark to his execution. But we still must yield. We pay lip service to the Boltons, we march with their army and we say the words. Brandon Stark takes refuge at Last Hearth and then eventually we might see Jon again.”

“Bugger that. We have the King in the North under our roof,” Mors challenged. “The north will rally for Stark. Let’s fight back and take the heads of those kingslayers.”

“The boy is a cripple!” Hother snapped. “He will never lead an army, or take a castle. No, I will not do it, and I will not risk him like that.”

“I never thought you a craven, Hother.”

“And I never thought you a fool.”

They had been arguing for a week, ever since Hother found Bran and his party in the woods. Bran hadn’t been to Last Hearth before, but it was a squat structure of oak and stone so old it had been carved into the hillside. There were no towers and it wasn’t a large castle, but the three circular walls were thick and strong and the keep was solid like a block of granite, the whole castle nestled amidst a thick forest of soldier pine, ironwood and sentinel trees. There were two moats filled with sharpened wooden stakes, and three gates that were constantly open.

Every night, hunters, woodcutters and farmers poured in to find shelter in the keep. Last Hearth had only very rarely ever turned away smallfolk from their gates, Bran remembered. For miles and miles around, men and women would always take shelter at Last Hearth during the hardest times of winter or war. Even those from the mountain clans could make the trek to take refuge at Last Hearth. It left hundreds, approaching thousands of men, women and children huddled around the great fire pit in the keep for which Last Hearth was named.
It wasn’t the strongest castle, but the Umbers had held their territory fiercely for centuries. Rather than concentrated forces in a single castle, the Umber forces held the roads and pathways through the forest and the mountains of their lands. They manned any crossing over Last River all the way across to the kingsroad.

There were more petty lords than Bran could count. Their elite soldiers were more like hunters, who could move in small groups and constantly harry any enemy crossing their terrain. Whether against wildlings or Boltons, the Umbers could hold their lands better than anyone.

Still, House Umber was suffering dire times. The Greatjon had devoted a large percentage of their forces to Robb Stark’s host, far more proportionally than other lords had, and now they were suffering for it. House Umber was running out of men-at-arms, while wildlings and Bastard’s Boys ravaged their smallfolk from the north and south.

Mors Crowfood and Hother Whoresbane had been on the brink of schism when they found Bran. The last time Bran had seen the pair had been at the Harvest Feast. They had been elderly, lecherous lords full of cheer and bellowing voices, prone to arguments and mock battles, but now they seemed darkened and angry. His mother had once called them pair of hoary old brigands, but at the time they had appeared more boisterous than dangerous. Now, everywhere they went, they both carried weapons in hand.

The only thing the two castellans agreed on was that Roose Bolton and his bastard son would have Bran executed if they found him. Ever since Bran came to the castle, he had been restrained to his own wing along with Meera and Jojen. Not even Summer was allowed out to hunt. Hother had been paranoid that someone would spot him and word would get back to the Boltons.

Hother Whoresbane wants to keep me hidden, safe, Bran thought. Perhaps he’ll give me a different name and I’ll pretend to be an Umber, or maybe he’ll put on me on a ship. Some way to keep me out of Bolton grasps. Mors Crowfood wants to use me as a figurehead to lead a rebellion, a Stark that the northmen might rise for.

He spent a long time thinking about it. They're both wrong.

His body sagged as he fell back into his skin. Bran stared around the dim, cramped room, with Meera pacing and Jojen sleeping upright against the wall. Summer was almost as on edge as Meera, hacksles raised with their confinement. Every time Summer even howled, it was like announcing that there was a Stark here, and that made their guards very nervous.

Mors and Hother would argue violently all day, but whenever they came before Bran they pretended to be in agreement. They think I’m a young child who wouldn’t understand, Bran thought. Perhaps I am young, but I don’t feel like a child anymore.

That evening, the two castellans came to see him over the evening meal. Hother was about to suggest moving him away from Last Hearth to a smaller holdfast in the east, when Bran interrupted.

“No,” Bran said suddenly. “I want you to sell me to House Bolton instead.”

It was hard to say who was more surprised, the Umbers or Meera. Jojen just nodded.

“No,” Bran said suddenly. “I want you to sell me to House Bolton instead.”

It was hard to say who was more surprised, the Umbers or Meera. Jojen just nodded.

“Bran what are you–” Meera started, but Bran didn’t dare to meet her gaze. He was trembling.

“I've already thought about it,” he said firmly, meeting Hother’s and Mor’s gaze. “Send a raven to Winterfell saying that I am here. Promise the Boltons your fealty, and promise to send me to them, if in return they release the Greatjon from the Twins.”

Mor’s mouth hung open. Hother shook his head, his long beard wafting. “Hells no. If I sold a son of Stark to get him free, the Greatjon would rip my arms off himself and beat me with them. And he’d be right to do so too.”

Bran forced his voice to stay firm. “There’s no other choice. I can’t stay here, and I can’t lead armies into battle. I won’t be useless, so I’m going to do the one thing I can do to be useful. I’m going to be sold for the Greatjon, and however many other hostages we can negotiate for.” He nodded. “Let the whole north know that I am alive. Make it sound like I’m your prisoner and you’re ready to sell me. Act a traitor, both of you.”

Mors shook his head, but his eyes twitched. “You don’t know what you’re asking, child. They will execute you. The Bastard of Bolton is marrying your sister, and they don’t need another Stark to challenge them. They’ll have you executed.”

“Yes.” Bran nodded. They have Arya. “That’s why I have to do it.”

Both men refused, no matter how Bran pleaded. Meera looked at him with shock. “Bran, what are you doing?”

“I need to go home. And this only way I can do it,” he whispered. “All I need to do is look Lord Bolton in the eyes, and then I’m going to kill him.”

“Just like I did with that wildling.” The man who died bleeding from his eyes.

“Bran, you jumped into his body and you almost lost yourself. It almost killed you.”

“Then it’s going to almost kill me again,” he said with a nod. “But it will definitely kill Roose Bolton.”

“Bran, it’s too dangerous,” Jojen said, shaking his head. “The Boltons might kill you on the spot.”

“They’ll take me to their lord first, I know they will. Or they’ll keep me hostage.” Because I’m a crippled boy who’s no threat to anyone. “And I only need to get close enough to look him in the eyes.”

Both Jojen and Meera objected as well. Meera tried to talk him out of it. Bran barely listened.

The next morning, Hother Umber was quiet as they broke their fast together, but his face was hard and his eyes thoughtful. “You said that I was King in the North,” said Bran. “Is that true?”

“You are the eldest living son of Eddard Stark. Robb Stark declared himself king, and you are heir presumptive. Many would see you take your brother’s place.” Hother paused. “But Robb Stark wore a crown for less than a year and didn’t step foot in the north while he had it. He was my lord, he was just, and none can question his bravery, but naming himself King in the North was a decision I did not support.”

“So am I your lord or your king?”

“You are Brandon Stark, and I would not send you to your death.”

“I could order you to send me to Winterfell.”
“Then that is an order I must disobey, my lord.”

Bran was quiet for a long time. He ate the porridge in silence, yet he had no appetite. An Umber serjeant had to carry him back to his room like a sack of potatoes. He was quiet as he closed his eyes and went to sleep.

There was no maester in Last Hearth, so Hother Whoresbane managed the rookery himself. Despite his strength, the old man was limping stiffly and cursing as he walked the steps to the rookery at the top of the keep. A raven flapped onto one of the battlements, staring Hother straight in the eye as it cawed.

“Stark,” the raven croaked. “Stark, Stark.”

Hother looked at the bird quietly, a heavy frown on his face. Another bird flapped. “Stark, Stark.”

The rookery rustled. One by one, the ravens took up the cry until they were all cawing and chanting. “Stark, Stark, Stark.”

The next morning, Hother watched Bran in the hall with something different in his expression. None of the ravens had stopped repeating the word. Soon, every bird down to the Lonely Hills would be chanting the name. If they do not agree, Bran thought, then I will let the whole north know that I am here myself.

Hother and Mors’ argument was especially loud that night.

It took over two weeks before they finally agreed. Bran would not be convinced otherwise. “House Bolton is fighting against the ironborn,” Bran insisted. “Ironborn are a threat to the north as well, so House Umber should join against them. Send the raven, offer your support, and go to Winterfell.”

Mors shook his head. “You would have me pledge fealty to a traitor.”

“Fealty means nothing to Boltons.”

Still, Hother Whoresbane finally nodded and reluctantly agreed to send the ravens. One raven to Winterfell, another to the Twins, and a final one to King’s Landing. Bran was shaking as he lay sleeplessly in bed that night. We can only be brave when we are scared, he told himself.

Bran half-expected it to happen instantly. Instead, it took a fortnight before a raven replied, with a letter written in the pink parchment of the Boltons. The raven came from Barrowton, so clearly the Boltons hadn’t reached Winterfell yet.

The message was short and cold, stating that the Starks were traitors, and that Last Hearth was committing treason by harbouring Bran. It threatened death to House Umber if Bran was not executed immediately.

Another raven returned from the Twins saying that Bran must be brought to Winterfell otherwise the Greatjon would be dead within the week. The letter from the Iron Throne, signed by Queen Cersei Baratheon, Queen Regent, was the last to arrive and the most diplomatically written, but it demanded proof of identity and also that Bran was sent to Winterfell.

“Bloody vermin,” Hother growled after he read it, already penning more letters in reply. He was a vicious old man, but he had plenty of wits and he could read and write with ease. “It’s a negotiation, boy. They want what we have and they know what we want, they just don’t want to trade anything.”
Hother penned another set of letters, sending them multiple times with different ravens to ensure they would arrive. He also sent letters to White Harbour, Widow’s Watch, and even the mountain clans. Bran forced himself to watch and learn.

It took another dozen ravens back and forth before the terms started to emerge. The wait between each one was excruciating. The ravens from House Bolton refused to negotiate at all at first, but King’s Landing seemed hungry for a deal. The Umbers had to deal between all three parties and that took time.

Eventually, the Twins agreed to release Lord Umber, Robin Flint and Ser Wylis Manderly to the care of the Boltons at Winterfell, in return for Bran Stark and the Umbers’ fealty. Mors protested that the last son of Stark was worth more than three highborn nobles, but Bran pushed them to accept the terms. While Mors and Hother Umber gave fealty, Bran would be brought to Winterfell for his identity to be confirmed and, if true, the Greatjon would be released to his uncles. Bran wasn’t to stay in Winterfell, however; instead, the Iron Throne had demanded that Bran should be shipped to King’s Landing to remain a hostage there indefinitely. The Boltons would have killed him, but it seemed King’s Landing wanted him alive.

Bran didn’t care. It was all just a mummer’s act to get him back to Winterfell. But it was a mummer’s act that took time, and he was left simmering in the keep of Last Hearth, in his cramped stone room. Jojen helped in the household, and Meera had taken to going out alongside the Umber hunting parties, but Bran could do little but sit and meditate.

The last letter said that the Umbers had to arrive in Winterfell for Arya’s wedding. My sister’s marriage to a monster, Bran thought. The date loomed. Every day and week waiting until then felt nightmarish.

While Hother held Last Hearth and readied as many as they could gather, Mors Crowfood would go out on patrols regularly. Occasionally Summer would join the Umber scouts and hunting parties. Wildlings were slipping over the Wall regularly and Umber lands were the first to be pillaged.

Through Summer’s eyes, Bran saw farms and cabins that had been raided by small parties of wildlings that had crept over the Wall, the corpses of men littering the ground and women and children raped and savaged.

More and more refugees made the journey to Last Hearth, but not all of them made it. He could feel the mood in the castle become more and more grim as the weeks turned into months. They tried to keep the reports away from Bran, but he still heard them. Sometimes it was wildlings who would rape and murder freely as they roamed, or Bastard’s Boys from the south who would leave brutal displays of mutilated bodies. Slowly, Bran started to hear of smallfolk that would just disappear entirely. Shepherds and hunters in the woods that would vanish without a trace.

“Mullen Holdfast went quiet two nights ago,” Mors reported one evening in the great keep, his voice low and furs still wet with snow. He had only just returned. “A whole family gone in the night. Two hunters the day before that.”

Hother shook his head. “This ain’t a subject to be spoken of in front of children,” he muttered, with a discreet nod towards Bran at the other end of the table, his voice low.

Bran still heard it. The dogs had better ears. “No, tell me,” he called loudly. “I need to know.”

Hother and Mors shared a glance. They had been arguing less and less since the plan formed, at least. “Riders along the kingsroad found the Mullen holdfast empty,” he explained. “No bodies, nothing. Travellers pass that holdfast daily, so whoever hit them did it very quick and very quietly.”

“Wildlings?” Bran asked with bated breath.

“Must be, that far north,” Hother said with a nod.

“Except nothing was stolen from the home. No damage and no sign of a fight,” Mors growled darkly. “They just vanished. There are some queer bandits around Cragspeak Point.”

That seemed to unnerve Hother more than anything. The old man chewed his leg of mutton in silence, while Mors promised to send out three hunting parties to search for the brigands. Hother suggested to send four.

Jojen was fast asleep as Bran returned to his room. Meera was awake, watching him as the serjeant hoisted him back into bed. “Are you okay Bran?”

“Yes,” he said, wishing he believed it. “We’re going to be heading to Winterfell shortly. We’re going to go save my sister. I’m going to go home and everything will be alright.”

Jojen didn’t reply.

Bran closed his eyes and felt himself slip away. It was a comfortable, familiar feeling by now. There’s something around Cragspeak Point, Bran thought. He focused upwards as the world twisted, and he tried to push himself into the body of a raven or a crow. Instead, the birds seemed too agitated, and Bran felt himself falling downwards.

He felt the earth around him. Bran forced himself to stay concentrated and centred, pushing himself forward through the roots of the earth.

The world was obscured and distorted from a different perspective. Bran was used to such dreams, but this time he wasn’t sure exactly what he was looking through. The world twisted into something vague and dreamlike. No, a nightmare.

Bran dreamt of death – the Stranger itself – limping across the snow. A figure of black and white. Bran could see it, and he remembered the hidden, shawled statue that stood in his mother’s sept. His mother had never prayed to the Stranger, there were never candles lit under that statue, and all Bran remembered of it was a dark figure looming in the dark.

Bran saw a man in a black cloak gasp as he swung an iron sword back and forth, lashing and striking with desperate fury. He wasn’t fast enough. Instead, the man fell as a sharp white blade skewered him through the chest. The wound hissed and spluttered.

The corpses littered the snow. Two dozen brothers of the Night’s Watch. It looked like some of them had tried to run, but none of them ran fast enough. The man with the iron sword had been one of the last and most stubborn to fall.

He saw the Stranger look downwards at the corpse with disdain, before pulling out its sword and limping away. It was a creature tall and sinewy, with skin half as white as dappled ice glittering in the sun, and the other half blackened and scorched as if it had walked through a fire. It looked wounded, injured, with half its face burnt off and one arm hanging uselessly at its side. It walked with an inhuman grace despite the limp. It barely left a trace in the snowdrifts.

The final man in a black cloak tried to hide in the roots of a tree, trembling and wailing. He didn’t hide well enough. The Stranger hunted the man down and stabbed its crackling white sword through his chest.

Those are sworn brothers, Bran thought, thinking of Jon. Men of the Night’s Watch being murdered. He could see the outline of the Wall in the distance. It looked too far away from Castle Black though, so these men must have been running from Eastwatch. They had been running as the Stranger hunted them down and killed them in the night.

The creature paused. This is a dream, Bran told himself. This has to be dream.

“I see you,” it said suddenly, to nothing but the empty wind and forest. It wasn’t speaking the Common Tongue, but somehow Bran could still understand it. “I see you, little boy hiding in the trees.”

It turned and paced, face still hidden in darkness. “You look… you look ‘scared’,” it said slowly, its weird, echoing voice rolling over the word. “I was scared once. They said that I was scared. They said that I had been a boy once. A son given to the cold, left to die in the snow. I was given over to something greater, I became something greater.

“Scared. Scared,” the Stranger repeated. It stepped forward, approaching the trunk of the tree. “Warmth is always scared before it dies, why? My liege tells me of fear, but I don’t understand. What is fear, and what is death? Why do you want to feel those things? Yet you must do, if you continue trying to resist. To resist the gift of immortality.”

Hands like ice touched the bark, and Bran felt himself shiver. He felt the world freeze. He saw an eye that shone like a cold blue sun. “I see you.”

Bran woke up gasping. He felt the cold sweat stinging his eyes, dripping down his brow. His whole body was shivering. The room had been warm, but now it just felt so cold.

“Bran!” Meera called, rushing to his side. “Bran, what’s wrong?”

“I saw it…” he heard himself mutter. “It saw me…”

Jojen was awake too. It was well past the hour of the wolf, but the crannogman looked wild-eyed and frantic. “Focus Bran,” the boy hissed. “Tell me what it was. Do you know whereabouts you saw?”

He blinked, still shivering. Just that gaze… its gaze alone had left him cold. It felt like something inside of Bran’s chest was frozen. The Stranger, Bran thought, still wheezing for breath. That was the gaze of death itself.

They all heard the sound of a horn echoing through the keep. A faint sound coming from the walls. An alert.

“That’s a war horn,” Jojen muttered, and the whole castle seemed to tense. He heard footsteps charging outside. Men reacting in panic. “The perimeter…?”

“We’re under attack?” Meera asked sharply, hand going for her trident. “Boltons?”

“No,” Bran wheezed. “Worse.”

Chapter End Notes
Author Notes:

Just to clarify some of the more subtle differences between here and in canon. In canon, the Boltons gathered their army and allies at Winterfell in force to prepare for Stannis' attack. In this story, though, there was no campaign in the north from Stannis, and so Roose Bolton could take his time, so he went to take Torrhen's Square and others from the ironborn before Winterfell. Bolton forces were split and Ramsay was sent to Winterfell ahead of Roose, which led to Ramsay's wedding not happening instantly as it did in canon. Without Stannis, there's been no open rebellion to the Bolton's rule in the north, instead there's more simmering from disgruntled lords.

Doesn't really make a difference, I just thought I'd comment for anyone trying to place the timeline.
Chapter 22

Chapter Summary

Dark wings, dark words, and the lions stir...

The Gold Queen

“This is madness,” the Queen said firmly, throwing the parchment on the ground, beneath her gold-and-crimson high seat by the Iron Throne. “What, will have we to discuss grumpkins and snarks next?”

Qyburn smiled apologetically. “I am sorry, Your Grace, but the reports—”

She snorted. “—are either lunacy or conspiracy. I have yet to decide which,” Cersei said. “Do they seriously expect us to believe in ice dragons?”

Grand Maester Pycelle hesitated. “From a learned man’s perspective, the current stance is split,” the old man wheezed. “There is some evidence to suggest ice dragons either exist or used to exist, and a minority in the Citadel believe that they still might survive in numbers. Legends from Cannibal’s Bay in the Shivering Sea, for example, say that ships that enter find themselves trapped forever as the sea freezes behind them. Maester Margate famously theorised the possibility that—”

Cersei snorted and rolled her eyes, causing Pycelle to sputter and trail away. Lord Qyburn was all smiles and explanations, but the Grand Maester was shifting in his seat and the others on the small council seemed fairly uncomfortable too. Cersei felt like slapping them; did they really think that the realm was now under invasion from magical ice dragons?

It wasn’t so long that the Wall was giving reports of moving corpses and white walkers, she recalled. The audacity of the lies coming from that place astounded her. Did the cold freeze their wits?

No, Cersei decided. Far more likely it is some scheme of some sort. Who was scheming was harder to guess. The Night’s Watch had strong ties to Winterfell, so maybe this was some ploy on behalf of House Stark. Stannis had headed straight to the Wall, so he was a likely conspirator too. Another name that kept coming up was Cotter Pyke, so perhaps this was because of ironborn defiance too.

Too many enemies, too many lies. She instantly distrusted any reports coming from that cold place.

“Your Grace…” Lord Qyburn cleared his throat slowly. “… there have been ravens from across the north, particularly the Shadow Tower, Karhold, Last Hearth, White Harbour, and down to Winterfell. The details vary, but the message… they all report that a large force of wildlings have broken through the Wall.”

“How many?”

“The letters seem to suggest between ten to fifty thousand, Your Grace.”

Cersei scoffed. “These are the same reports that claim ‘ice dragons’, I take it?”
“Ice dragon, singular, Your Grace,” Qyburn corrected. “It is described as with a hundred-and-fifty-foot wingspan, white scales, and a breath that can freeze oceans.”

“I wonder why they didn’t throw in tales of armies of unicorns and mammoths as well?” She slowly took a long sip of Arbor Gold from her goblet. “It seems obvious that these reports have been exaggerated beyond all rational sense. I expect five thousand wildlings, at most, would be a more reasonable number.”

“Not so long ago, Lord Commander Mormont was reporting a host of a hundred thousand under a… Mance Rayder, if I recall,” Ser Harys Swyft wheezed. “He sent many ravens concerning it.”

“More likely some frightened fool has counted double,” said Orton Merryweather. “Or is puffing up the threat so we will not think them craven.”

“And the fact remains that the Wall has been breached,” Pycelle insisted. “Lord Bolton is calling for aid.”

That made her stiffen. “The north raised in revolt against us, and now they have the audacity to call on the crown to save them?”

“Lord Bolton is—”

“The Warden of North. It is his job to keep the north in order, not mine.”

“But, Your Grace, if the realm is threatened…”

“If,” Aurane Waters interrupted, glaring at Pycelle haughtily. “I remain unconvinced that any of these reports are genuine.”

“There are more letters streaming in daily,” Pycelle warned.

“Yet it seems to me to more likely be a ploy; they give us reports of some massive army, and expect us to race to their aid,” Waters pointed out. “A foolish trick to draw our armies and fleets away from us, to leave us more vulnerable to real threats. All the houses that gave you those reports are traitors or fools.”

Cersei smiled approvingly. Aurane Waters had proved himself a good choice for her Grand Admiral. Pretty, agreeable, and he knew who he was loyal to. “Exactly. They’re trying to exaggerate a threat.” Ice dragons – absurd! She shook her head. “I consider those letters little more than hearsay and ridiculous rumours.”

There were nods around the table. “There is one detail that many letters agree on,” Lord Qyburn added. “They say that the leader of the wildlings is a man named Jon Snow – the bastard son of Eddard Stark.”

Cersei paused, blinking in genuine surprise. Then she chuckled, actually laughing. “Eddard Stark’s bastard?” She said incredulously. “Turned… what is that ridiculous title? ‘King-Beyond-the-Wall’?”

The thought of Eddard Stark, the great, honourable Eddard Stark, having a bastard had always made Cersei smile. She tried to recall him from their visit from Winterfell, briefly recalling a dark haired, long-faced, sullen little boy. She had seen little of the bastard, truth be told; Catelyn Stark had tried to hide him from sight like a ugly wart.

Eddard Stark had been so ashamed of him that he sent his bastard to the Night’s Watch, she remembered. “This… Jon Snow? How old is he? Sixteen? Seventeen? I thought he took the black.”

“So that made Eddard Stark’s dishonourable son a deserter as well as a traitor. Perfect. ‘Bastards are fiends by nature,’” Orton Merryweather said, drawing an evil gaze from Aurane Waters. “I suppose this one is trying to follow in his half-brother’s footsteps.”

“And I am sure he will end up lacking a head as well,” Cersei said dismissively, but she was still laughing to herself. What a perfect final insult to Eddard Stark’s disgraced legacy: his bastard son invading the realm with savages. She had no fear of some bastard boy, with savages and tall tales of dragons.

“I hear that wildlings are savages, Your Grace,” Ser Loras Tyrell said, clad in his white cloak standing by the table. Cersei cast him a foul look – the Knight of Flowers should learn to stay quiet. It still irked her that the Tyrell boy ended up on guard duty next to Ser Osmund Kettleblack. “And an army without discipline is no army at all. No wildling invasion has ever lasted long.”

“True, true,” Ser Harys Swyft said. “Surely the threat has been overstated.”

“Yet the rumours are disturbing,” Grand Maester Pycelle said with a gulp. “Perhaps we should—”

“Young blood must have turned to milk, if you are intimidated by tales like that,” Aurane sneered at the old man. Pycelle flinched as if slapped.

“It seems to me that this is an opportunity for Lord Bolton,” Cersei said. “His realm faces a common enemy, one that will unite the tenuous loyalty of his vassals. The wildlings have been foes since times immemorial, and so the north must come together to face them.” She paused, taking another sip of wine. “Yet we shall not be unreasonable. After Ser Jaime’s campaign in the Riverlands is complete, part of our forces shall march to the Neck to relieve them.”

March very, very slowly to the Neck, she thought to herself, and a small part at that. She had no interest in sacrificing Lannister soldiers unduly. “Very wise, Your Grace,” Orton Merryweather bobbed.

The north was no great concern, truth be told. It was an empty, cold wasteland. It didn’t provide food or great trade. In winter the north would be frozen shut, and Cersei had no interest in committing so many of her men to such a needless conflict. Not when they were already so thin on the ground, and so many more immediate threats around her.

No, the true threats were from the Tyrells, those power-grabbing whores. And from Stannis, as meagre as his forces now were, or even from those blasted peasant ‘sparrows’ and the dirty smallfolk that infested her city. The Martells also concerned her, the treacherous snakes holding Myrcella as they did.

She thought over it. Still, the north was very delicate, and she had growing concerns over House Bolton’s suitability as wardens. “Tell me,” Cersei said, “what of the Stark boy that came back from the dead? Brandon Stark, I believe?”

“House Umber has offered him in trade. I do not know of his situation after the news of the wildling invasion,” Qyburn said, apologetically.

“Has his identity been confirmed yet?” She remembered Bran Stark quite clearly, from a long time ago. The boy that liked to climb.
“It has not, Your Grace.”

“That deal has not changed,” Cersei decided. “If Last Hearth truly is under threat, then this Brandon Stark must be brought south to King’s Landing with all haste.”

“Would not execution be a simpler method?” Aurane Waters said with a frown.

Ser Harys and Orton Merryweather looked appalled at the suggestion. Queen Cersei only smiled. “A ten-year-old boy? Do not be barbaric.”

_No, I want this Stark kept alive and well as a hostage in King’s Landing. If House Bolton proves treacherous to them as well, then keeping the last son of Stark to replace them would be useful. Perhaps this Brandon Stark would be meek, useful and easily groomed. And he’s a cripple too, she recalled. A cripple must be very easily held captive – absolutely perfect._

Most of the small council seemed satisfied, but Grand Maester Pycelle still looked nervous. “Your Grace, if Lord Bolton requests aid then we should consider–”

“No, the matter is settled.” Cersei shook her head. “We cannot commit any significant forces north, not when there are so many threats closer to home.”

“You refer to the ironborn?” Ser Loras asked with a frown.

_I was thinking more of the Tyrells, you clutching thorns._ “I mean Stannis Baratheon,” the Queen said, moving swiftly onto the next issue at hand. “I find this letter from House Celtigar of Claw Isle far more concerning. Is it accurate?”

“I think so, Your Grace. Stannis’ ships have indeed been spotted past Claw Isle, heading south towards the Blackwater.”

_Lord Celtigar is our guest and hostage at the Red Keep, Cersei recalled. The letter had been penned by his wife, and she did not think they’d risk his well-being._

“Then Stannis is retreating back to Dragonstone,” Ser Loras said, leaning forward quickly. _Well, of course._

“Can we stop him?” Waters said. “We have four dromonds ready to sail, and if the Redwyne fleet is blockading Dragonstone…”

“That letter was penned three days ago,” Qyburn reminded. “Taking into account how the crow flies and deployment time, I expect Stannis may have already reached Dragonstone or is about to.”

Ser Loras Tyrell looked unhappy. “Then there could be a battle happening this moment on Dragonstone.”

Aurane Waters met his gaze. “And if Lord Paxter Redwyne fulfils his duty, then Stannis will never reach the castle.”

“We have a force laying siege to Dragonstone, do we not?” Orton Merryweather said, looking nervous. “Two thousand men, if I recall.”

“We sent messages and ships to alert them as soon as the news came in, last night,” the Queen reassured. “Lord Redwyne has already been informed, as has Lord Tyrell. We have deployed what reinforcements we can spare, but it could well be that there is naught else to do until news arrives.”
“So we will just sit here and talk?” Ser Loras fumed.

Mind your tongue, boy. “Yes. Whatever is happening is happening many leagues away, and we must plan for it,” she said coolly, turning back to Lord Qyburn. I will have to see about removing Ser Loras from small council meetings. “How many ships did the spotter report?”

“Eight cogs and galleys, Your Grace.”

“I recall that Stannis left with twenty-nine.” Eight ships – that was what? Perhaps a thousand men? It was hard to judge.

“He did indeed, Your Grace.”

“So it is true?” Orton Merryweather frowned. “Stannis was defeated in the north?”

“Either by the wildlings or by storm, the reports are uncertain,” Qyburn admitted. She took a deep sip from her goblet. “Then once again Stannis has been proven a craven!” She proclaimed. “He was defeated at Blackwater and fled north, only to be defeated in the north and flee back here! He has barely a thousand men left and half a dozen ships. How many times must this fool bounce around the realm trying to incite treason, before his men finally desert him and his so-called claim?”

She felt like laughing at the thought of Stannis running backwards and forwards across Westeros, or the thought of Eddard Stark’s bastard – ha! Stark had a bastard! – turning savage wildling king.

“That is true, Your Grace,” Grand Maester Pycelle said in a laborious voice. “And yet the fact remains that Dragonstone may have just been reinforced by another thousand men. The castle will not fall easily.”

“Then we can starve him out, if we must,” Cersei said. “Stannis’ meagre forces cannot match our fleet.”

“Dragonstone is a strong castle,” Waters warned. “And its stores are large. It will not fall quickly either.”

“We should have stormed it when the garrisoned was weakened,” Loras pouted.

“Lord Redwyne has Dragonstone blockaded, has he not?” Cersei said with a shrug. “The Redwyne fleet should intercept Stannis’ ships. There may well be no reason for concern.”

The discussion continued for a while, but there was little to be done. Stannis’ army was finished, but annoyingly he still held two of the strongest castles in the realm. Both Storm’s End and Dragonstone were under siege, yet both might still last months even against far superior numbers. The Redwyne fleet was two hundred warships strong, yet ships alone could not conquer a castle like Dragonstone.

It was the hour of the bat when the talk finally eroded Cersei’s patience and she retired for the night. During the siege at the end of Robert’s Rebellion, Dragonstone lasted for a whole year with a garrison of less than a thousand, and Cersei cursed the thought of spending a whole year with Stannis breathing down her neck.

With luck, a raven would come reporting that Paxter Redwyne had successfully routed Stannis before he reached the castle, but none came during the night. That useless fool Redwyne, weak like a sour grape.
The next morn, she held court and the whole keep was whispering about news of Stannis’ return. Ser Desmond Redwyne, some second cousin and commander in the fleet, could only give feeble excuses. “It was the wind!” the aging Ser Desmond protested. “A freak squall took Stannis’ ships in past the blockade, and no fleet of warships can defy the wind. We could not stop them, Your Grace.”

She scoffed. More likely Lord Redwyne had grown lax on his duty patrolling the Blackwater. “And the garrison at Dragonstone?” she demanded.

“They were ambushed in the middle of the night, Your Grace – Stannis came in too fast, and the warning did not reach them in time. Stannis broke the siege and reached the castle.”

She dismissed him angrily. Two thousand westerlands men ambushed and broken. Perhaps Redwyne did this on purpose, just to weaken us further, Cersei simmered. Lord Redwyne sent a message promising to redouble the blockade, but it left her in a foul mood.

Enemies, enemies all around me.

Two days later and she was only just retiring for the night, feasting on wine and lemon cakes when she heard footsteps marching to her chambers. Her door knocked, and Ser Osmund Kettleblack entered. “Urgent news, Your Grace.”

“Stannis? Has he been defeated?”

“No, from the Reach. Highgarden claims reavers moving against them. They’ve taken the Shield Isles,” Ser Osmund reported, unable to suppress a tired yawn. The hour was late. “Queen Margaery has called an emergency small council session.”

She has done what? Cersei downed the last of her wine in an irritated gulp. Little brat should learn her place.

The small council was already gathering in the shadows of the Iron Throne. It was the hour of the owl, or around about, and Cersei was left feeling stiff and weary as she walked through the gloomy double doors. Despite everything, she couldn’t allow the girl of a queen to host a small council session without her, so Cersei had to rush. Her hair was left tousled and uncombed, and her bodice felt lax and pudgy without her usual handmaids to tighten it properly.

The hall felt rumpled and confused. She passed Boros Blount and Meryn Trant, who seemed to be sleeping on their feet. Loras Tyrell and the darling little queen were wide awake, though, looking hassled by the news that just arrived by raven. Dark wings, frustrating words.

“Why is it that these damnable birds insist on arriving at such an hour?” she muttered irritably to Pycelle.

“Ravens do prefer the dusk, Your Grace,” the old maester tottered, walking quickly with rackety bones.

“A thousand ships!” Cersei heard the little queen exclaim, her voice echoing through the cavernous throne room. “Your Grace, this must be answered fiercely!”

Her eyes narrowed. She dares say ‘must’ to me. So the ironborn are gathering against the Reach, in large numbers too, though claims of a thousand ships was met with doubt from the small council. The new king of the Seastone Chair, Euron Greyjoy, had launched an assault of the like that had not been seen since the days of Dagon Greyjoy.
“The reavers come in strength,” said Margaery Tyrell. “Lord Hewett and Lord Chester are slain, as well Lord Serry’s son and heir. Serry has fled to Highgarden with what few ships remain to him, and Lord Grimm is a prisoner in his own castle. The iron king has raised four lord of his own in their place.”

“I see Stannis’ hand in this,” Cersei declared. “Balon Greyjoy offered my lord father an alliance, this new king has clearly made one with Stannis. Stannis returns just as his new allies launch a raid on the west, attempting to divide us.”

Pycelle frowned. “Stannis and ironmen have long been foes.”

“And yet clearly they have joined forces. By raiding in the west, he hopes to distract us from a renewed assault from Dragonstone.”

Lord Merryweather nodded eagerly. “He is more cunning than we knew. Your Grace is clever to see through his ploy.”

“And we will not rise to the trap.” She smirked, turning back to the little queen. “The Shield Islands belong to the Reach. It is for Highgarden to answer this.”

“The best part of our power remains with our lord father, though,” Margaery said, with Loras standing behind her. “We must send word to him at Storm’s End. At once.”

“Absolutely not. I will not let Storm’s End fall into Stannis’ grasp again, not after the failure Lord Redwyne suffered at Dragonstone. The siege of Storm’s End must remain strong and the Redwyne fleet is required in the Blackwater.”

“You Grace,” Loras Tyrell bowed. “From those strongholds on the Shields, the ironmen threaten Oldtown and the Arbor. With ironborn raiders on the warpath, they can sail up the Mander into the heart of the Reach, as they did of old. They may even threaten Highgarden itself.”

“Then you must roust them,” she said irritably. “But Lord Tyrell’s and Lord Redwyne’s forces remain in service to the crown.”

“Yet Stannis has eight ships,” Margaery protested. “The ironmen have a thousand. Our fleet is more urgently needed in the Reach.”

‘Our’ fleet? She stiffened. The Redwyne fleet belongs to the crown, lady. As do you. Not the other way around.

“You Grace, the siege of Dragonstone may take a year or more,” Grand Maester Pycelle warned, in a low voice. “The siege of Storm’s End perhaps just as long…”

“But you would allow such a knife at the capital’s throat? I forbid it. The crown forbids it.”

“But you must–” Margaery protested, and Cersei’s patience finally snapped.

“Enough!” she snapped, and the word rang and echoed through the cavernous hall. Margaery recoiled, Loras jumped to his sister’s side. “Mind your tongue and remember your place, girl – I am the rightful queen and you dare to command me?”

The room turned deathly silent, Margaery’s delicate little face paled. Cersei could have growled. There was a long pause that no one dared fill.

“Your Grace…” Pycelle stammered nervously. Cersei glared around the room at the speechless expressions and she forced her fists to unfurl. Her nails dug into her palm like claws. She deserves to be snapped at, little slut.

“The hour is late,” Qyburn said coolly, his hands hidden up his sleeves. “I fear it is all too easy for passions to run hot where the security of the realm is at stake.”

“Indeed,” Cersei growled, with a lingering glare at Margaery. She turned to Ser Loras, because at least his effeminate face was easier to look at than that doe-eyed slut. “… How many ships does Lord Redwyne command?” she demanded.

“Two hundred warships and galleys, Your Grace,” Ser Loras replied with hesitation.

“And with enemies on both sides, it appears we must divide our forces. Equally.” She turned and paced, scratching her chin. “Lady Tyrell, in return for the crown’s leave to abandon their post, your father and Lord Redwyne must relinquish command of one hundred vessels of the Arbor to the Royal Fleet.”

“One hundred,” Margaery repeated quietly. “You would halve our fleet.”

“Seems only fair, does it not? I am sure that a hundred fine warships shall be more than sufficient to drive back the ironmen, as exaggerated as their numbers surely are.” Her voice was hard. “The remaining vessels must remain in the Blackwater, under the command of our Grand Admiral.”

There was a stunned silence. Aurane Waters blinked in surprise, and then grinned. Margaery Tyrell’s mouth stammered briefly. “You expect my father to confiscate half of Lord Redwyne’s fleet?”

“It is a Lord Paramount’s prerogative to command his bannerman’s forces, is it not?” As it is for the crown.

Aurane Waters nodded in agreement. “It seems very reasonable to me,” he agreed with a nod. “Overly reasonable, in fact, to allow so many ships to leave the capital in such a crucial time, and yet Your Grace is generous. We must combine the Redwyne vessels with the Royal Fleet. Together we can blockade Dragonstone and keep Stannis contained.”

“Exactly. I am sure that Lord Mace will understand the need as well – especially since Stannis threatens the very city where his own daughter resides.”

Margaery hesitated, but Ser Loras placed a hand on her shoulder. Cersei just smiled sweetly.

They would whine, but they had no good reason to object and Cersei would enjoy trimming the Tyrell’s thorns a bit. Doubtless Redwyne would leave his own captains and officers, but under Aurane Waters’ command they could see about filling the ranks with more… reliable men.

Any man sworn to the Tyrells over the crown is a man who cannot be trusted, she thought quietly. If they are not culled, the roses might well overgrow the whole kingdom.

Yes, she decided, growing more satisfied with the idea. Let this Euron Crow’s Eye bleed Highgarden for us, to put them in their place. Cersei would have to stock up on wine, though. The capital may well lose its supply of Arbor Gold for a time.

The small council meeting ended with forced pleasantries and tired chatter. Little Margaery barely said a word, while Pycelle whined and hobbled away to draft up the royal decree concerning the Redwyne fleet. Cersei smiled and excused herself, dress sweeping across the ground as she bid them all good night.
The meeting actually left her in a good mood. The reavers were concerning, but the thought of Highgarden facing such a threat was appealing. That, and the excuse to steal half of the Reach’s navy made her smile.

She could have returned to her own apartments, where Taena Merryweather shared her bed, but Cersei was suddenly in no mood to sleep. Instead, she walked the inner courtyard, heading towards the burned husk of the Tower of the Hand. She stared out over the blackened stone of the Tower, the wreck looming in the faint moonlit courtyard.

First Starks rose against us, she thought, then the riverlands. Then Renly, and then Stannis. The Tyrells were grasping, and her own city was being overrun by peasants under this new High Sparrow. There were ironborn reavers in the west and wildling savages in the north. Why is it that this whole realm seems to be falling apart, everyone trying to steal what is mine?

There were no shortage of enemies around her, Cersei thought with a grunt. Enemies trying to steal her crown, steal her kingdom, or steal her children. She would have to see about playing those enemies off against each other.

She had a serving boy fetch her wine from the kitchens. It felt apropos to savour the taste of the Arbor. She spent the night lingering around the courtyard, staring out over the godswood highlighted under the dark moon. There was a chill in the night, but she didn’t mind.

Very quickly, it seemed, she saw the faintest shimmer of dawn over the horizon. Cersei spent the night enjoying the serene of the godswood, with Ser Osmund and Ser Boros standing guard. The serving boy continued to fetch more wine. Arbor Gold was something to be enjoyed at night.

Above, in the holdfast, she caught the glimpse of dark wings coming and going from the rookery. Slowly, she decided to retire. Her head was tingling pleasantly, and she was Queen. She could spend the morning lazing in her apartments.

As she stomped up the serpentine steps, she saw a bearded figure waiting for her. Grand Maester Pycelle was twitching as he approached hesitantly, holding a piece of parchment tightly. Cersei had no patience left for him. “What is it now, fool?” she snapped.

The old man was flustered, out of breath. “I have just received a letter, Your Grace… it is marked from your brother.”

“Jaime?” She breathed a sigh of relief. “Good, then I expect Riverrun has fallen by now. How goes his campaign in the riverlands?”

The maester twitched. “No.” Pycelle gulped. “Your other brother. This letter is signed Tyrion Lannister.”

---

The Griffin

Jon Connington had never been an easy sleeper. At night, he stared at the stone walls constantly, thinking intently about every risk, every peril and everything that could go wrong. Come morning, he pulled himself off his slab of a bed, dressed in velvet and steel, and walked out the door.

He was met by the sounds of steel and boots ringing through the courtyard. The marble buildings of Lys stretched over the horizon, and the waters glittered in the morning sun, while the harbour churned with the sounds of war.
The Golden Company was preparing to set sail again.

Lys had been only a short stopover from Volantis, but still too long for Jon’s liking. The city of Lys was too soft, too bright, too perfumed. Too many of his men seemed too content to linger with the bed slaves and perfumed gardens of the Free City. Everywhere he looked he saw soft men, house slaves and extravagant luxuries.

Jon detested such things. That feeling of weakness lingered over the city like a stench. I should be nearing my homeland now, to wage war, not waiting idly in this place.

They were docked at a private harbour on a smaller archipelago of Lys, overlooking the merchants’ ships flowing in and out of the white city. The harbour was owned by one Magister Illyrio of Pentos, who had strong connections to Lys too. Many of the city’s magisters had been understandably nervous when the Volantene fleet carrying sellswords approached, but they had managed to smooth it over. It gave the Company a respite to restock and resupply before Westeros.

Jon had argued against the idea of a stopover altogether, instead pushing to go straight across the Narrow Sea for the Seven Kingdoms. It would be too risky, he had said, and it wasn’t so long ago that the Golden Company had been hired to fight Lys. As it happened, he had been outvoted and then proven wrong, which left a bitter taste in his mouth.

The magisters had been all too eager to accommodate the Company, to see them on their way. There had been gifts to placate them, and they had managed to recruit other sellswords to their campaign, all the while stocking up on all the weapons and armour that the famed tradesmen of Lys had to offer. Eventually, Jon’s complaints of ‘this is costing us time’ had to fall silent when he realised they could gather up to two thousand more men from a short stop.

“My lord,” a squire wheezed, rushing to meet him. A young boy, with a thick, fluid Lys accent, and the silver blond hair of Old Valyria. Even commoners had the features of dragonlords in Lys. “A message from Black Balaq. Four more ships from the rear flank have arrived at East Docks.”

“They have arrived.” After the hard voyage out of Volantis it had been doubtful whether any more ships would make it through the storms. “Has he reported casualties?”

“Few. One ship is crippled. Most survived – including fifty more elephants.”

He nodded in approval. The Company’s elephant cavalry had always carried the most risk during the journey. They had kept the majority of the elephants in the rear flank of the fleet. The huge beasts were logistical nightmares, but they’d be so worthwhile when they reached the open field.

“Have me updated when a full headcount comes in,” he ordered. “Send word to Balaq to report to me with all haste.” They would probably be up to nine thousand by now, at least. Only three of their ships had been completely lost.

“Yes, my lord.” The squire hesitated. “Also, my lord, Lord Tyrion requests your presence.”

“Requests my presence?”

“He is breaking his fast in the solar. Along with Captain-General Strickland and the King.”

Jon’s eyes narrowed. It was well-known among the Company now, but to hear word of King Aegon babbled so carelessly… “Guard your tongue, boy. His presence is not one to be babbled around,” Jon said. “Who are you?”

The squire turned nervous. “Oshio Sathma, my lord,” the boy said. “I am the cousin of Magister Sathma. Lord Tyrion recruited me for your noble campaign, my lord, to squire for Commander Strickland."

Under his gloves, Jon’s hands tightened. The dwarf had spent far too long making deals with the fat magisters of the city. His mood turned foul. “The crown’s catspaw would kill our liege if they knew,” he growled. “Secrecy is paramount, and loose tongues cost lives.”

“Begging your pardon, my lord.”

The Golden Company had already overrun and dominated Illyrio’s walled compound. Oshio Sathma led the way through the maze of extravagant Lysene architecture. Doubtless any squire of Harry Strickland would never see battle, only wine and highborn guests, he thought bitterly. Yet Magister Sathma must have still made some sort of deal with the dwarf.

It irritated him to no end that the dwarf was babbling about the king’s identity to every merchant lord of Lys. Does he not know that Aegon’s identity must be kept secret until we reach Westeros? He risks losing our advantage – we cannot allow them to prepare for this invasion.

I should never have taken the Lannister with us. A month ago Jon could have easily taken the blasted dwarf’s mutilated head, but the imp was a wily creature. While Jon had been busy with the goliath task of arranging transport for ten thousand men, the dwarf had been making plans of his own.

As Jon crossed the parapet marble walls, he glimpsed Ser Brendel Byrne and Ser Laswell Peake preparing horses and men. The sight made him frown, moving away from the squire and down to the courtyard confront the men gathering. Byrne and Peake both made a good sight; strong, handsome, dressed in finery. Both were highborn soldiers with rich gold bands across their arms.

“Sers, our departure is soon and this compound is on lockdown. Where are you heading?” Jon demanded.

“Into the city, my lord,” Peake replied with a grunt. A hard man, an exiled Westerosi lord. “Magister Allyios is hosting a soirée, and we have secured invitations. We are to attend.”

Jon bristled. “We should be preparing for set sail again and you wish to dawdle for parties?”

Ser Brendel looked confused. Ser Laswell’s eyes flickered. “Magister Allyios comes with a fleet of trading ships behind him, Lord Hand, and he has been looking to expand towards the Seven Kingdoms for years. We attend this party now, pay respects, and we are to ensure a dozen trading vessels of provisions sailing with us.”

Jon’s eye narrowed. “And who gave you that order?”

“Lord Tyrion, my lord,” Peake replied, mounting his horse.

Of course. Jon had no patience for such politics and flattery, but the dwarf seemed to live off it. There had been a few orders now given without his knowledge. The dwarf seeks to usurp my campaign.

The Lannister had arrived to the Golden Company as a prisoner, a curiosity. But the dwarf had sharp eyes and a sharper wit. He found a soft spot and pushed himself in.

At first, Jon didn’t think much of it when the dwarf started talking to Harry Strickland without him. It kept Homeless Harry’s cowardice away from him as Jon had been managing the fleet out of Volantis. But then, Tyrion Lannister signed up with the Golden Company by himself, squirming under Harry's thumbs and escaping Jon’s grip. He was a prisoner no longer, he became a member of the Company and Jon had no valid reason to object.

Soon after, though, Harry had the idea of promoting Gorys Edoryen to quartermaster, while Tyrion stepped up to the job of company paymaster. Jon didn’t realise just how influential the position of paymaster was.

The Captain-General Harry Strickland was weak and spineless with bloated feet. Tyrion Lannister made decisions that the general didn’t want to.

Many of them had been good moves as well. The dwarf gave enough bribes to smooth their passage out of Volantis. He had also weeded out the bad sailors and officers in the crews offered by the Triarchs of Volantis. Tyrion had also insisted that the wives, sons and daughters of Volantene captains travel on different vessels. It gave the Volantenes so much more motivation to keep the fleet together.

It had been Tyrion who had pushed for stopping at Lys, and he manipulated Harry into the idea as well. Jon was Hand of the King, but not even he could easily argue with the commander of his army. He couldn’t risk a schism within the Company.

They made the journey out of Volantis in good time, through storms and all. Without the dwarf, it could have been so much worse. Tyrion Lannister had taken over many of Strickland’s duties, and quickly proved his worth in the Golden Company after the voyage.

Still, it wasn’t lost on Jon how all of his allies ended up on different ships. Whenever decisions were to be made, Jon's supporters would be coincidently out on patrol and the discussion inevitably ended up going wherever the dwarf wanted it to go. The Lannister allowed Harry more time to soak his feet, eat plums and count coppers, and in return Harry became the dwarf’s own little puppet.
He may as well put motley on the Captain-General and use him as a fool.

The Golden Company was sworn to King Aegon and Jon Connington was the Hand of the King, they should be following him. If it had only been Harry, then Jon would have been in complete control.

Still, Tyrion neatly placed himself between Harry Strickland and the officers, and between Aegon and his army, all the while gradually pushing Connington out of the picture. So long as the dwarf continued making good decisions and proving a capable tactician, however, Jon could not easily object.

Except this should be my campaign. My redemption. I am the commander. Yet the dwarf steals my power and my influence with his blasted meddling behind the scenes.

There’s a reason dwarfs are malformed, twisted creatures. Cursed in the eyes of gods and men.
Jon’s eyes were dark as he marched up the room to the king’s solar. He heard laughter and the chinking of glasses. There were five men in the king’s solar around the table, chuckling over Lys wine early in the morn, and guards standing outside.

“… About fifty savages surrounding us – trapped in the Mountains of the Moon, just me and my poor sellsword,” he heard a voice laugh. “This big one, the leader, comes up and asks me how I want to die. And I reply, ‘In my own bed, with a belly of wine and a maiden’s mouth around my cock, at the age of eighty’!”

Laughter. Jon heard the unmistakable sound of Harry’s guffaw. “I’m sure that that would be a scene!”
“How did you survive?” That was Aegon’s rapt voice, leaning over to Tyrion’s side.

King Aegon sat at the head of the table, and yet everyone was still focused on Tyrion by his side. Streaks of blue still stained the King’s silver hair. The dwarf sat drinking a very large glass of wine from the castle’s rare stock. “Survive? I hired them,” Tyrion laughed. “A savage is a very useful thing to have by your side, Your Grace.”

Jon stepped sourly into the room. Blasted dwarf. Sometimes Tyrion antagonised Aegon, sometimes he was all charm and tall tales, but the young King had begun to seek the Imp’s opinion. Working his way into the boy’s head with every fanciful story and clever jest. Jon had been so proud of Aegon when he announced that he would sail against Westeros, but then he heard that it had all been the Imp’s scheme. Oh, he’s a cunning bugger, I’ll grant you. I should have thrown him off the boat.

“A savage is just a savage. Barbarity is all too common, it's men of honour that are rare,” the Hand of the King said as he stepped into the room. Jon turned his gaze from the dwarf, bowing to the king. King Aegon had already washed the blue out of his hair, sitting at the head of the table, young, proud and handsome. “Your Grace.”

“Ah, my Lord Hand!” The dwarf said the greeting as if he were the butt of a jape. “How are you? Did you sleep well?” He took a large sip of wine. “In my experience, though, men of honour have very tight lives and brittle deaths. A bit of savagery, however… a bit of savagery can last you a lifetime.”

The solar was well-cushioned and decorated. It was the king's solar, but the dwarf sat like he owned the place. Jon remained standing. Aegon had a large goblet of wine as well and the alcohol left his cheeks flushed. Jon glared at his young liege.

“You should not be drinking, Your Grace,” he warned.

“Why not?” Aegon said, but they were the dwarf’s words. “I am man grown, I can drink if I wish.”

“It is early and there is much to be done. We mean to sail in two nights.”

“Then please, Lord Connington,” Tyrion offered. “Take a seat. Take a glass. We were just reciting some old war stories.”

The two other men around the oak table, Ser Tristan Rivers and Ser Castor Stone, were laughing and drinking too. The scene was a disgrace. The drunken dwarf, Homeless Harry propped up on pillows, and Aegon going along with it all.

“There are duties to attend to,” Jon said, voice like ice.

“But it is an important duty here!” Tyrion protested. “It is a duty to enjoy the free moments, the times of peace. You learn more from tales over a glass of wine than you do from charging blind.”

“Hear, hear!” Harry agreed. “More haste, less speed, I always say.”

That is the commander of my army. You put Myles Toyne to shame. “My lord speaks the truth,” Castor Stone said. Another of the dwarf's catspaws. Castor was a young landed knight, hungry for advancement, young, eager but undistinguished, lowborn and with no place at the king's table. Why would they even permit such a man to speak? “Sharing tales of battles over a drink is a long-honoured tradition.”

“And what battles have you ever fought, my lord?” Jon said to the dwarf. “What great feats do you
“Oh, you’d be surprised,” he said. “I was regarded as the finest foreman of the drains of Casterly Rock in my youth.”

“Drains. You managed drains?”

“Oh, you jest, ser.” He looked wounded. “But the drains of Casterly Rock are not for the weak of heart. So much gold being flushed away each time my father sat on the loo, it would jam something terrible…”

“Indeed.” The edge in Jon’s tone caused the laughter to stop. He focused on the dwarf with cold blue eyes. “It is barely dawn. You are drunk. You detain the king and the Captain-General with this foolery, while there is business to attend to. Have you forgotten why we are here? It is not for wine and japes.”

Aegon blinked. Jon’s voice rarely turned so hard with his king. Aegon was like a son to him, but there was no time to be coddled. “There is a war to be won,” he warned, with quiet fury as he turned to Aegon. “Now put down the glass.”

The room stiffened. With just a few hard sentences he silenced them all. The full intensity of his glare focused on the dwarf.

“You mockery,” Jon said, his voice low. “You seek to waste the King’s time at this crucial hour?”

Aegon averted his gaze, shamed. He slowly pushed the glass away from him. The dwarf just shrugged. “I thought it would be educational.”

“On how to act a disgrace?”

“No.” Tyrion slowly extended a beefy finger to point at Ser Castor. “On how to spot a spy.”

The room froze. With his other hand, Tyrion took another sip of wine. “It’s always useful to tell bad japes, Your Grace. Tis the ones who laugh the loudest that you should be most suspicious of.”

Castor blinked. “What is this?”

“This is treachery. Your treachery.” The dwarf pulled out a small folded piece of parchment from his tunic, handing it to a stunned Aegon. There was a seal showing a white winged chalice on the front. “That is a letter written by you detailing our numbers, ships and infantry. You entrusted it to a merchant in Lys headed to King’s Landing.”

The young knight looked flustered, off-guard. “I wouldn’t… I would never…”

“You would. I have the proof right here, from your own hand. You are the bastard son of Lord Hersy of Newkeep. You think that by siding against us you could be legitimised by the crown for your services. To claim your father’s seat.” The dwarf took another sip. “I suspect you’ve been so eager to drink and laugh so that you could eventually play poisoner and assassinate someone. The King most likely. Did my dear sister reach out to recruit you?”

Castor protested, but the guilt was written all over his face. He was caught off-guard and intoxicated by wine.
Jon's hand went to his sword, but Ser Tristan Rivers was faster. Castor tried to charge out the door, and the knights collided. Tyrion clapped his hands and two guards stomped in and dragged the knight away screaming and red-faced. He kicked the table, spilling expensive wine over Myrish carpet.

“Was he truly a spy?” Aegon shouted. The young man couldn't hold his wine, he also sounded drunk. “What is to be done with him?”

“Execution is the only way to treat treason,” Harry Strickland blustered.

“Executed? But then we'd only have a corpse. A corpse is a fairly useless thing, Your Grace.” The dwarf’s voice was smooth. “Instead, let's keep him alive and keep him writing letters. That way, we can be sure that King's Landing knows exactly what we want them to know.”

The dwarf stood up, waddling with a glass of wine still in his hand. He looked at Aegon. “You see, Your Grace, that's the purpose of having these little sit-downs. Some battles are won by spilling blood, others by spilling wine.”

Jon looked at him, and back at Castor Stone. How much had the spy reported? Their numbers, their plans? That Aegon was alive? He had been counting on more of an element of surprise, if the Iron Throne already knew…

He turned to tower over the dwarf. “You should have come to me. His betrayal could have been handled diplomatically.”

Tyrion looked wounded. “But, my lord, it was.”

Is this a ploy? “Let us see this letter of yours. What evidence do you have that Castor was a spy?”

“Evidence? Poor Castor there was approached by an agent of the Iron Throne during the first night in Lys, who offered him the deal. After that, Castor wrote two letters direct to King’s Landing via peddlers and merchants detailing our movements, all of which were eagerly accepted. The third letter is in my hand, however, and the fourth will be one that I will dictate.” He nodded. “You are welcome, of course, to interrogate all of the witnesses and unwitting accomplices who saw Castor snooping around. There is plenty of proof to his guilt.”

“And what of Lysono Maar?” Harry demanded.

“Our spymaster must have missed Castor, I’m afraid. I handled it for him.” He turned to the table. “Please could you grab that goblet before it falls, my lord? It’s a horrible tragedy to waste good wine on the carpet.”

Harry blinked, and then laughed boisterously. Tyrion laughed as well. Aegon eagerly asked questions, while Jon stood stiff, glaring at the dwarf.

This was planned, Jon thought with quiet fury. Of course it was. The dwarf invited me to the solar knowing full well I’d object. He then named Castor as a spy in front of everyone, making me seem the fool while everyone praises his cleverness. He works to shame me.

The Hand of the King hesitated, glancing around. The spilled wine stained the carpet like blood. I had assigned Castor Stone to the king’s protective guard. I had thought him young, but bold and a good man. I let a double-agent come within sword’s reach of my king…

The dwarf excused himself quickly, claiming he had paperwork and payslips to complete. He trundled away with a bottle of wine to his quarters.
Jon went to see Castor Stone. The man was babbling excuses as Company soldiers stripped his golden armbands and threw him into the wine cellars acting as dungeons. He spent the hour questioning the man, demanding to know exactly who recruited him and what he wrote. After only a few punches from the interrogator, Ser Franklyn Flowers, Castor was left a wailing mess.

He just watched, fuming quietly. There should only ever be one answer to treachery. It disgusted him to have to keep filth like Castor alive.

Before long, the news had spread and any who even knew Castor Stone came quickly to denounce him and deny their own involvement. Jon knew there must be accomplices who, knowingly or not, helped Castor send those letters away. Jon would see all who slacked or assisted either lashed or hung.

Still, it was the thought of the smirking, ugly face that really caused Jon’s teeth to grind. Jon’s posture was as stiff as stone as he walked to seek out the Lannister.

Jon had assigned the dwarf one of the dankest, cramped storerooms in the compound as his quarters. He had intended it as a slight, but Tyrion didn’t seem to mind. The dwarf fit quite snugly into the small office, while Jon was left gritting his teeth as he tried to squeeze himself through the door.

“My Lord Hand!” Tyrion grinned, and bowed. He still held the bottle of wine. “You honour me with your presence. Are you here for your payslip?”

Jon’s eyes narrowed. “I promised you once that you would die before you touched a bottle of wine again.”

“You did indeed,” he agreed. “Awfully foolish of you to do so, if I may say so myself. Why make a promise when you have no means of upholding it?”

I could gut you. I could split your malformed twisted skull in a single cut. Back on the Shy Maid, he certainly could have done so too. Nobody would have objected to an execution when the dwarf had been Jon’s prisoner. Now, though, Tyrion Lannister was a listed man of the Golden Company and under Harry Strickland’s protection. As feeble as the coin-counter was, Jon still needed the Captain-General of the Golden Company. The dwarf had too many friends in the Company, and he was gaining more every day.

Focus. Patience. But Jon had little patience left. “How did you know that Castor Stone was a spy?” he demanded.

“I thought that would be obvious,” the dwarf said with a twisted frown. “I was the one who hired him to spy.”

Jon’s hand clenched in his glove. The tips of his fingers felt numb as they hovered over his sword in its scabbard. “I was the one who hired a mummer in Lys to approach him, pretending to be a Lannister agent,” Tyrion explained. “I put the idea in his head that he could sell information to the Iron Throne. He then sent the offer directly. I also paid mummers to approach several serjeants of the Company, but you’ll be relieved to know your sellswords are a loyal lot. They all reported their encounters to our spymaster, and two of the mummers almost died making their offer, actually.”

Jon glared. The dwarf’s voice was slightly slurred and intoxicated, but smug. “Castor Stone made the choice and sent off the letters all by himself, however,” he continued. “Nothing that my dear sister wouldn’t learn anyway, and it verifies him for when we send the false information through.”
“And yet each time you talk of Aegon’s existence you give the enemy more time to prepare. You have been dealing and talking to the magisters.”

“Yes. I have made our ventures seem like a grand quest of legend. Many magisters are quite eager with the idea, just as they were during the War of the Ninepenny Kings. I wager we could recruit another thousand reinforcements from Lys alone.” He scratched his chin. “With the support of Lys and the wealth of all the cheesemongers behind us, we could buy more mercenaries, sellsails and pirates into our venture.”

Jon’s face twisted. “I intend to put the Rightful King on the Iron Throne and you talk of recruiting pirates.”

The dwarf just shrugged. “A soldier is a soldier. And I also hear that my sister has stopped paying the Iron Bank of Braavos. We make our case properly and the Iron Bank will be more than happy to finance our efforts to put the realm to rights. That is all support which can make or break any campaign.” He smiled. “So yes, that is why I wanted to stop in Lys.”

“So you claim,” he growled under his breath. “But you’ve been spending more time with whores than anything else in the city.”

“Oh yes, the whores are important too,” Tyrion agreed, taking a deep gulp. “I was wondering if Lys is where whores went. Your soldiers have been enjoying the whores as well.”

The Hand of the King hesitated. He’s a cunning creature. “Mind your place, dwarf. You have no business giving orders to any of my men.”

“Yet you’ve been so busy.” He grinned, noseless face wrinkling. “And the men have been following.”

That’s what disturbs me the most. “And who gave you the authority?”

“I am the paymaster now. Sellswords follow those who pay them, even in this Company.”

First he takes over as paymaster, and then takes the job of spymaster and commander. A month ago, Jon could have killed him, but now? Damn him, he’s made himself indispensable.

The Hand of King considered his options. Killing him seemed so tempting and so satisfying, but also useless. It felt like he did when Jon agreed to work for the Spider; simply talking to the fiend was slimy, disgusting.

“What do you want?” Jon said finally. “No more games.”

“Me? I’m a creature of simple desires,” Tyrion said. “I want my right as Lord of Casterly Rock, of course, and I have already agreed to share the wealth with all faithful friends who help to place me there. I could be King Aegon’s most loyal retainer in the west.” He paused to think of it. “Oh, I also want to rape and murder my sister.”

Jon’s face twisted. He likes to make people uncomfortable. Do not raise to the vulgarity. “You wish to rule.”

“Rule? No, I have no interest in ruling. If we’re considering just rewards, though… well, I did quite enjoy my time my time as Master of Coin. I would be satisfied taking that position again.” Liar.

“Reward for your service?” said Jon, his voice a quiet sneer. “And which service is that? Undermining the campaign? Distracting my officers?”
“Have I not been helping? I think this venture stands a very good chance, truth be told. We have ten thousand loyal and seasoned men and the realm is torn. If Dorne declares for Aegon, with some financial support from the Free Cities, and if we convince my sister to make a few bad moves…” He mused, and nodded. “Yes, I think the Golden Company could finally succeed this time.”

He motioned at a letter on his desk. “Speaking of,” Tyrion continued, “when we reach Westeros, I wish to send this letter away to King’s Landing, Casterly Rock, and perhaps a few other select places. In the spirit of spreading disinformation.”

Jon looked suspicious, but picked up the parchment. It was written in a smooth, practiced hand. The words were fancy, pompous. The first line read; ‘Lord Tyrion Lannister, son of Tywin, Rightful Lord of Casterly Rock and falsely accused and sentenced, return to reclaim my rights and lands with the assistance of the leal and just men of the Golden Company of free brothers’.

Jon paused, lips moving as he tried to make sense of it. “This letter is lies and slander. You would claim that you hired the Golden Company?”

“We have the benefit of surprise. Let us offer a distraction from Aegon Targaryen altogether,” the dwarf said. “Instead, let us spin the tale that Tyrion Lannister recruited and hired the Golden Company, joining up with Jon Connington, to retake possession of Casterly Rock. We present this to the Seven Kingdoms as a Lannister invasion, rather than a Targaryen invasion.”

_He seeks to usurp my whole invasion._ “This is a coward’s and a fool’s game to seek recognition that is not earned.” Jon’s voice was hard, and bitter. “You have no place leading this campaign, dwarf. _None._”

“But if that letter is sent then Cersei will believe that _I_ am responsible. And her response to that will become the same as it has always been wherever I am concerned; irrational.” Tyrion grinned. “My sister is a very predictable woman. Mention my name rather than Aegon’s and I guarantee you she will destroy herself.”

Jon shook his head. “_No._ The realm sees you as a murderer and kinslayer. We must unite the realm behind us. You could taint the image of the whole campaign.”

“And yet if the Tyrells believe that this is a Lannister problem, rather than their problem, then they are going to be far less willing to rally against us. The forces of Highgarden would prefer to sit back and let us bleed the Lannisters first. And my brother Jaime will be reluctant to lead his armies against me. Cersei will spit and scream and become more and more unreasonable, and will only succeed in driving everyone away.” He held up his stubby arms. “With a few letters and a small lie, I could break the realm apart.”

_That I believe._ His eyes narrowed. “And what of Aegon?”

“King Aegon Targaryen stays in the background, quietly rallying support with Dorne and mustering his forces. When the bodies start to burn and the realm sees the options they have, they will raise for Aegon instead.”

Jon’s lips curled, but he paused before replying. “The battle plan is solid,” Tyrion continued. “Your intention to take Griffin’s Roost is a good one. We seize the castle, establish ourselves across the stormlands and Cape Wrath, raising forces among the disgruntled storm lords. Let the Tyrells bicker while we reach out to Dorne, and then Aegon starts gathering banners to him. The true threat to the Iron Throne goes unnoticed for as long as possible.” He nodded. “You lead the men in the field, I can manage the papers and the letters, while we both leave Captain Strickland plenty of time to soak his weary feet.”
“You’re not doing this for King Aegon. You don’t care about him, or the cause. You just want to gain everything for yourself.”

“Doesn’t everyone?” It was jape, but those mismatched eyes were hard.

Jon hesitated. The dwarf was clever, but… “No.” He shook his head. “I will not suffer you derailing this campaign. Mind your place dwarf. Manage the payslips, but if I hear of you giving orders to my men again then I will have you flogged.”

“Well, isn’t that a shame.” Tyrion sighed. “I only mean to be helpful. After all, I think you need someone like me.”

“You think wrong. No one needs you.”

“Yes father…” he muttered so softly under his breath, before smiling and saying, “but surely the strain of managing such a campaign must be taxing for you alone? With your condition?”

Jon froze. He felt his shoulders stiffen. Mismatched eyes narrowed at him, unblinking. He has a piercing gaze too. “What are you—”

“Greyscale. How is your hand, Lord Hand?”

No… he can’t know…

The dwarf chuckled, standing up slowly. “You think nobody would wonder why a man who shunned alcohol would suddenly start drinking the bitterest wine every night in his chambers alone? Let me guess, did you think that asking for a pot of vinegar would be too obvious?” He chuckled. “Did you also wonder whether wearing thick leather gloves even in the heat of Lys would go unnoticed?”

Jon shuffled his hands, twitching. Tyrion scratched his chin. “And, thinking back to the Bridge of Dreams, there was so much panic when I fell into the water but nobody ever stopped and checked you, though you pulled me out, did they? Did I ever thank you for that?”

The silence stretched out. His head whirred. Jon took a deep breath, his shoulders shaking slightly. “Who else knows?”

“Nobody, as far as I’m aware. Most men are very oblivious creatures.” He tutted. “But let’s keep it discreet, hmm? No need to create an unnecessary panic.”

Oh, the bastard…

“Do you see why you need me, Lord Connington? Why, if I were flogged, who knows what I might shout in my pain? If I were killed, who knows what letters I might have squirrelled away previously?” His voice was almost soft. “And how long would the King… or any of the officers, actually… suffer a man in such close proximity who is carrying such a horrendous disease? That does not seem healthy for you, Lord Hand.”

Jon forced his voice to harden, but he could feel the situation slipping out of his control. “What do you want?” He demanded lowly.

“Nothing. I’m here to help.” He cocked his head. “I just hope that you are not going to object to my help any further. Let us work together.”

The bastard.
“I’m not unsympathetic.” The dwarf smiled, while Jon’s jaw tightened and his mouth seized. “You are loyal, capable, and I understand why you would keep your condition discreet. You wish to see your life’s regret redeemed at all costs, and I am hardly one to judge.”

Jon’s gaze flickered. The dwarf caught it. “Ah. Or is it already too late? Both hands infected, I take it?”

He nodded without a word. The bastard dwarf. The conniving little fiend.

“Ah, my sympathies,” Tyrion said kindly. “I can understand your wish to accomplish something with the years you have left.”

“If you try to blackmail me again, you will see your own death far before I do,” Jon promised darkly.

“I would never dream of it. I only want to reach a compromise between us.”

Never compromise. A lifetime of war had taught him that. “Compromise is for the weak and the craven. The only thing that matters is certainty.” He kept his voice low. “I will see Rhaegar’s son taking his place on the Iron Throne before I go.”

“And I am here to assist,” Tyrion smiled widely. “Mayhaps this could be a glorious partnership, then? Together we may accomplish what one alone cannot?”

You have no use. You are just too awkward to dispose of. Was this what Lord Tywin felt? Still, Jon just nodded curtly.

Tyrion paused. “However,” he said, “there is yet another concern. Even if we could take King’s Landing, and the Iron Throne, our forces will have difficulty holding the Seven Kingdoms together without assistance.” He shook his head, and tutted. “Even if Aegon triumphs in the field, we will need Daenerys to secure the realm for the Targaryen regime come again. We will need her dragons.”

“I am aware. She will come to her nephew’s aid. For now Queen Daenerys is distracted in Meereen.”

“So she is,” Tyrion said with a nod. “And thus we must give her a reason to come west all the sooner. Rest assured, I will provide one. The cheesemongers of Lys are well-connected.”

Jon didn’t reply. This dwarf and his schemes could threaten everything I’ve worked so hard to achieve, he thought bitterly. Blasted cursed little fiend.

The dwarf stood up with a smile, motioning to the door behind him in a small gesture. Jon glared at him furiously. “I look forward to working with you, Lord Connington,” he said with a short bow. “But forgive me if I do not shake your hand.”
The Vale of Arryn stretched beyond her. The Gates of the Moon was a hard castle, drab and pale, but sometimes the view alone made it worthwhile. Alayne stood on the battlements of the keep, watching out over the valleys and sharp peaks. She could see low hanging clouds rolling across the mountains, and the Tears of Alyssa sprinkling down the Giant’s Lance.

The wind was so cold she had to wrap herself tightly in her woollen furs. She was wearing a thick wool dress with an overcoat, but the wind had a bite to it. Winter is coming. They had made the descent down to the Gates of the Moon barely a fortnight past.

Snow blanketed the heights of the Giant’s Lance above, but below the mountain the autumn lingered and winter wheat was ripening in the fields. From below, she could hear the laughter of washerwomen at the well, the ringing of steel on steel from the knights at their drills.

“You should not stand so close to the edge, my lady,” a voice called. She turned to see a tall, broad-shouldered and rough man looking at her with concern. “It is dangerous.”

“Ser Jorah.” Alayne lowered her head respectfully, just like she had always been taught. “How fares the castle?”

“Very well, my lady. Lord Baelish is to return later this evening.”

“That is good. He has been gone so long I was concerned he would miss the tourney.”

“I doubt your father ever would.”

“Lord Baelish,” Alayne chided. “You should address him as Lord Baelish, ser.”

“Forgive me, my lady.”

“That is quite alright, Ser Jorah.”

The knight lowered his head respectfully, stepping back. His hair had been balding when he arrived, but now he had shaved his head entirely, somehow making himself seem older and wearier. His face was weathered by lines and old scars. He was a big man, formidable and fearsome, but there was a certain softness in his eyes as well.

Lord Baelish had gifted the knight with a fine steel plate engraved with the likeness of a bear’s head, its maw gaping on the centre, with greaves and gauntlets to match as well as a thick brown velvet cloak. Somehow, the finery seemed almost awkward on him. He had been in boiled leathers and dull iron when he arrived.

Ser Jorah was most certainly not a comely man, but Alayne could understand why Randa enjoyed flirting with him sometimes.

“Do you mean to compete in the tourney for the Winged Knights?” She asked.

He shook his head. “I think not.”

“You and Ser Shadrich are both not, then.” She looked at him curiously. “Why not? I hear you were quite the jouster. You won the tourney at Lannisport.”

“That was more fluke than skill, my lady. And this tourney is for the Knights of the Vale, I doubt I’d be welcome.”

He’s uncomfortable, she noticed. Shifting on the spot. Alayne had to learn quickly how to spot the little signs. “A pity then. The Brotherhood of the Winged Knights could use warriors of such skill.”

“I am sure there are plenty in the Vale.”

Personally, Alayne didn’t really want Ser Jorah as part of Robert’s private guard either, but it was good to stay respectful. She had envisioned the Brotherhood of the Winged Knights as Lord Robert’s personal kingsguard – eight of the most noble knights sworn to protect House Arryn. Each knight could walk proud as the strongest in the Vale, a mantle that both kept the Lord of the Vale safe and the knights loyal. Ser Jorah would be a good protector, no doubt, but he would do little to appease the Vale lords.

There were many that questioned the exiled knight’s presence, and his loyalty to House Arryn.
Lord Baelish had been all too eager to bring Ser Jorah in, however. “Ser Jorah is a simple creature,” he confided to her once. “A man of little intelligence and low ambition. Varys used him for years on the promise of one day letting him come home. He provided quite useful and reliable information.”

“Yet why is he here now?” She had asked.

“Oh, he has nowhere else to go. The Spider is no longer around to pay him, so he came to me instead,” Petyr laughed. “His Queen kicked him out, and the Starks are dead. He wants to return as Lord of Bear Island and I can help him get there. Like I said, very simple, but useful enough so long as you prod him in the right direction. The man is too straightforward to scheme.”

Some of the Vale lords had grumbled about the exiled knight’s presence, but Lord Baelish had hired him as a personal guard and kept him out of the way nicely. He doesn’t know who I am, Alayne told herself.
Sansa Stark and Jorah Mormont had never met, except perhaps when she had been a very small child.

But still, sometimes she caught him staring at her, curiously. Then again, she found more and more gazes of men lingering on her. As she grew, her body became more womanly and Alayne knew that she was turning heads more often recently. Still, somehow there was something different in Ser Jorah’s gaze. She wondered if the knight had a lady he fancied.

Perhaps she was just on edge for the upcoming tourney. The tourney where I will meet my betrothed, Ser Harrold Hardyng. It was a fortnight away, but the date loomed. Even the sight of the grand mountains and immense expanse of the valley could barely calm her fluttering heart.

Alayne loved it here. She felt alive again, for the first time since her father… since Lord Eddard Stark had died.

“If you excuse me, ser,” Alayne said with a curt bow. “I should return.”

“Of course, my lady.” It looked like there was something else the knight wanted to say, but he didn’t.

Lord Petyr returned late that night. There was no warning or announcement, just a group of riders from Gulltown returning to the castle near dusk. The next morn Alayne met her father breaking his fast in the lord’s dining hall, feasting on porridge, mint leaves and summer fruit while sorting through parchments scattered across the table. His eyes were red and tired and he looked quite annoyed.

“It really is becoming quite irritating,” Petyr muttered as she approached, not looking up from his papers. “I thrive on chaos, but at a certain point it becomes too much even for me.”

“What is the concern, Father?” Alayne asked.

“Oh, many things. We all knew that Queen Cersei would destroy herself, yet her brother giving her an extra push was really quite unnecessary,” he sighed, muttering under his breath. He looked over two rain-soaked parchments, both marked with a seal bearing a white winged chalice, before pushing them to one side. “And very annoying. Cersei has issued a ‘royal decree’ commanding the stormlands, the Vale and Dorne to muster men for the defence of the crownlands.”

“Truly? She has?”

“Indeed. She demands it. Quite strictly too,” he said with a humourless smile. “Apparently our dear Queen believes that the best way to fight a war is by starting three more.”

He normally laughed and teased more around her, but now just Petyr looked weary. “Is that why you have been gone for so long, Father?”

“In part. And yet the most truly concerning situation,” he said slowly, lowering his voice, “is the one developing in the north. It appears that land is in dire straits. Sooner or later we may just have to cordon it off at the Neck.” Petyr paused, glanced at her, and frowned. “Actually, tell me Alayne, what do you remember of one Jon Snow?”

Alayne blinked. Petyr very rarely even referenced her former life. She didn’t want to talk about it. I am his daughter, and we don’t speak about this out loud. Why is he mentioning Jon?

“Jon… you mean my half-brother?” She whispered. He nodded. “… I… he was my fath… he was Eddard Stark’s bastard.”

Just the thought of her old life made her shiver. Remembering Winterfell again brought back so many old feelings.

“Could you describe him for me?” Petyr pressed. “I want to know more of this Bastard of Winterfell.”

Why is he making me remember these things? “Um… dark haired, narrow face, grey eyes.” She remembered a boy of fourteen. “They would say that he looked like his father.”

“No, I care little for his appearance. Describe him. Describe his personality. Was he loud, angry? Temperamental or calm? Sensitive or reserved?”

“He was…” Alayne hesitated. “Sullen, quiet. Jon used to constantly compete with Robb, or tease Arya. When it was just his siblings Jon would be lively, but with my mother or with any guests he would turn sour. Especially as he became older. He didn’t laugh so much.”

“The life of a bastard among highborn.” Petyr scratched his goatee, fingers drumming. He turned over a few parchments so she couldn’t see what was written there. “Jon Snow was resentful, then? Did he curse his trueborn siblings?”

“No.” Alayne squirmed slightly. “I don’t think so? He would play with Arya, teasing her. He used to truss up her hair something terrible, and mother would spend hours trying to comb it straight. And Jon and Robb were constantly challenging each other. Jon was the better sword and he would always win in their spars, but Robb was the better lance and the better rider.”

“And when Jon was sent off to the Night's Watch?” Petyr insisted. “To be exiled from his home and disavowed by his father. Did that leave Jon bitter?”
“No. No, Jon wanted to take the black. He insisted on it. Uncle tried to dissuade him, but he said that even bastards could rise in the Night's Watch, that…” Even a bastard could prove his worth.

Her throat jammed. Jon is the only family I have left. My last living sibling. “… I never knew Jon very well,” she admitted. “Mother never wanted me around him. We rarely talked, we never had much to do with each other. He was a bastard.”

And so am I, now.

“Indeed.” Petyr looked at her critically, eyes sharp. “In my experience, every man or woman is defined by two features: the things they love, and the things they hate. Answer me, sweet thing, who did Jon Snow love, and who did he hate? And where does his family fall on that spectrum?”

Alayne gulped. “Arya. He used to love Arya.” Her lips pursed. “And Robb too. As for hate… I don’t know. Maybe Mother? Jon never liked the way Mother treated him.”

“Hmmm… one last question, and please consider it carefully. Do you think the bastard brother that you knew could grow to be a cruel man? Could he be vengeful, evil even?”

“I… I do not know,” Alayne admitted. A year ago, she might have replied “No”, but she had learned not to underestimate cruelty and its wickedness.

“Why are you asking me such things?” she asked. “What is Jon to you?”

“It appears that Jon Snow is causing waves in the north. And in quite a spectacular fashion too,” Petyr said, keeping his voice low. “Many of my plans for the north threaten to be undone by a bastard that I never even knew existed. So now, I must decide whether to try to stem the tide, or let the chaos run its course.”

“Jon is on the Wall. He joined the Night’s Watch.”

“Was on the Wall,” he corrected, and then paused. “Well, he still is on the Wall, but he’s most certainly not a sworn brother anymore.”

“What has he done?” she asked, voice trembling. Seeing Petyr so concerned made her nervous.

He forced a smile, but then seemed to hesitate. “Nothing you need concern yourself over. Forgive me, sweet Alayne, it has been a long trip and I am quite tired. I should not have pressed my burdens onto you.”

She just stared. Petyr smiled again, before standing up and retiring to his study. He kissed her on the lips before he left. Alayne wasn't sure what to do. The corridor was silent as she walked away.

Jon, she thought. What could Jon possibly have done at the Wall that could make Petyr so concerned?

She felt numb as she retreated to her own chambers. She passed Ser Jorah and Ser Shadrich, their eyes on her as she walked quickly through the hall. MaesterColemon found her to say that Sweetrobin was calling for her, but Alayne was in no mood for the lordling’s attention. Instead, she claimed she had a headache and excused herself to her chambers.

In her room, she closed the door and collapsed into her mattress. She felt tears in her eyes.
What is wrong with me? What is wrong with me, that even the thought of Winterfell again makes me cry?

The wound left by her family never healed. It was more than a scar, it was like a missing limb. Like the loss of her brothers, her sister, mother and father had cut something away from her.

I am not that person anymore. I am Alayne Stone, betrothed to the heir of the Vale. I am happy here. I have a new life.

She would have to clean herself up before leaving her room. She could not allow anyone to see her cry.
Chapter 23

Chapter Summary

Dealing with dragons in Westeros again; problems at Castle Black, the duties of a king, and the founding of the Dragonguard.

Sam

They locked and barred the tower door. The captive brothers of the Night’s Watch were split between the storerooms, barracks, stables or cells of the castle, with no more than ten per group. The wildlings would lock the doors and stand guard outside, ensuring no sworn brother could even try to assemble or move against them.

_We’re captives now_, Sam thought with a gulp, _captives in our own castle_. He supposed it was better than being executed, but from the look in some of the wildings’ eyes he wasn’t sure that they wouldn’t be.

Sam ended up confined in the rookery, along with Maester Aemon, Clydas, Bowen Marsh and Othell Yarwyck. There weren’t enough bunks, so Sam had to sleep on the floor by the fireplace. The wildlings had already ransacked the tower for anything that could be used as a weapon, right down to the quills, as well as stealing anything of value. They would have stolen Aemon’s chain too, except the old man refused to part with it even under threat of violence.

It was a bitter night. The next morning was bitter too. Bowen Marsh paced constantly, convinced that the wildlings would have them all executed. _Did I make a mistake releasing Mance Rayder from his cell?_ Sam wondered. _Edd will tell all the others what I did, and they will curse me for it._

Come evening, a double-chested man built like a keg pushed through the doorway, flanked by two others. The whole rookery froze in fear. The wildling looked around the quarters. “You,” the wildling ordered, pointing at Sam. “Fat boy. Come.”

Sam squealed. “Come where?”

“Now.”

The wildlings had axes. Sam’s hands were trembling as the man grabbed him and dragged him roughly out of the room. Nobody else said a word, and the wildlings barred the door behind him.

The wildling frogmarched Sam out into the courtyard. The snow was thick underfoot. He had never seen Castle Black so wild – thousands of wildlings were hollered around campfires in the castle grounds. Celebrating and feasting on the sworn brother’s stores. The scene looked mad, savage, highlighted by fires in the black night.

Sam glimpsed a fourteen-foot-tall figure stomping around the grounds, roaring. A giant. The sight made his knees so weak the wildling had to kick him to keep him moving.

_He’s taking me to the King’s Tower_, Sam realised. _Jon?_

His heart was in his mouth as he was walked through the reinforced oak and steel doors, and up the
A heavyset wildling grunted as he stepped away from Sam.

Mance stood at last. It wasn’t Jon waiting for him behind the desk in the solar, though; instead Sam saw a gaunt, pale figure cradling his fingers. Mance Rayder looked at him and just nodded. The heavyset wildling grunted as he stepped away from Sam.

Mance could only stare. It had only been twenty-four hours, but Mance looked so different. Gone were the foul rags and filth; now he had been washed, and dressed in wool and leather. Three guards in the room stared at Sam suspiciously.

“Tarly,” said Mance, his voice still raw. He looked weary but alert. “Samwell Tarly, I hear?”

Sam could only nod.

“You are of House Tarly, I take it? What is it, Horn Hill?”

“Yes,” Sam said weakly. “Lord Randyll Tarly’s son.”

“Indeed. I trust you can read and write?” Sam nodded. “Good, I need you to write a letter for me, Tarly. Several, in fact.”

Sam hesitated. “Who to?”

“Denys Mallister, for now,” said Mance. “The Magnar of Thenn has already left for the Shadow Tower, and I would like to encourage the good ser to surrender. You will write how all of the sworn brothers who surrendered here have remained unharmed.”

That was a lie, for Sam knew of at least three who had been executed and five who had been beaten, but he nodded in any case. Mance dictated the words and Sam wrote them. It was a very firmly worded message, short and to the point. There would be a few hundred in the Shadow Tower against several thousand. Afterwards, Sam read it back, before placing it before Mance to check. Mance couldn’t even hold a parchment with his ruined hands.

Sam could feel the wildling guards staring at him with evil eyes. He couldn’t stop trembling. “How are your brothers?” Mance asked finally, as his eyes roamed over the parchment.

“Scared,” Sam replied truthfully.

“Understandable. Also necessary.” Mance looked up at him with curiosity. “Answer me, Samwell; why did you release me from those cells?”

“I was afraid for my brother’s lives, Your Grace…um, my lord…?”

“Spare the titles, they aren’t due,” said Mance. “But that was an awfully brave act for a scared man.”

“I was awfully scared.”

A pale ghost of a smile passed over Mance’s face. The former King-Beyond-the-Wall looked at him critically. “Indeed. You need not return to the maester’s quarters, Samwell; I want you by my side.”

Sam’s eyes widened. “You want me to be your steward?”

“No.” He shook his head. “I want you to be my deputy. I have been granted command of Castle Black, and I’m choosing you as my lieutenant.”

Sam stared with disbelief, stammering to try and form words. Mance just shrugged. “You proved yourself smart, and capable, and I want smart and capable men next to me. You clearly care for your sworn brothers, but you can work with free folk too. So yes, you’ll do as my second-in-command.”

“No,” Sam gulped. “You shouldn’t, this… this looks like a reward.” Mance’s brow raised. “A reward for freeing you. I don’t want a reward for freeing you, my lord, I don’t want anything.” The sworn brothers will hate me. Despise me. I will be joining the wildlings in their eyes.

“The ‘reward’ is an offer,” Mance replied coolly. “If you believe that you can help those who you call brothers – to help me help them – then you will accept the position for them. Otherwise, I will give the position to a capable free folk instead, who may not care as much for the black brothers as you would.”

“But… but…” Sam squirmed, meeting Mance eyes. He didn’t have the appearance or the rank of a king, but he had the gaze of one.

“You are scared of what your sworn brothers would think of you working under me,” Mance said sharply. Sam could only nod. “Then that is your choice. But I think you will do what is for the best of the Watch. As you did before.”

There was a pause. Sam shifted on the spot, staring at the worn but rich carpet of the King’s Tower. It was already filthy from wildling boots. “Where is Jon Snow?” Sam asked finally.

“Away, preparing for the march against the Shadow Tower. I suspect he will be back shortly, however.”

Sam nodded, biting his lip. “There is something you must know…” he murmured. “Castle Black was attacked, the Wall breached…”

“Oh. You mean the white walker that escaped south.” Sam stared. “You know?”

Mance nodded. “From interrogating the prisoner.” That phrase caused Sam to squirm. How many fingers had been broken? “I heard the tale. Jon… ahem… King Snow was quite concerned. The Night’s Watch may not have had the manpower to mount a search for the Other, but the free folk do. Once we are secure in our position, there will be free folk raiding parties hunting the creature down.”

His mouth stammered. “Normal swords won’t hurt it,” Sam said, remembering what the three-eyed crow told him. “You need Valyrian steel or dragonglass.”

“Snow said the same thing,” Mance said, narrowing his eyes. “Valyrian steel is in short supply, but we have two dozen or so obsidian arrows, and a few daggers. They’ll be spread around our best hunters and archers.”

Sam blinked, struggling to respond. Mance cocked his head. “Was that why you chose our side when taking the castle? You were concerned about the true enemy?”

“In part,” Sam admitted. “But there’s more.”

He hesitated. Mance’s eyes narrowed. “Yes?”

I have to tell him, Sam thought. He had to tell him everything that happened, but… “You’ll think I’m crazy,” Sam promised.
“I will reserve judgement on that. Now what has you so concerned to speak?”

Sam bit his lip, well-aware of how it sounded. “Have you ever heard of a person called the last greenseer?” he asked hesitantly.

Mance didn’t reply. Sam told him everything that had happened that night. Unlike every sworn brother in the castle, Mance sat and listened.

---

Jon

His grey destrier pounded through the snowdrifts, while Jon’s eyes were peeled in the distance. Fourteen other riders galloped besides him, some with spears but most with willow longbows. The snow-ploughed plains leading up towards the mountains stretched out in front of them, dappled with white-capped sentinel pines.

Ygon Oldfather had gifted Jon the speckled grey and black destrier when he arrived at Castle Black. Doubtless it had been taken from the Night’s Watch stables, but it was a strong mount with a good temperament, and Jon had been grateful. Jon was even considering taking the horse to warg with – the ability to skinchange into a mount seemed very appealing – once the animal was more comfortable with him.

“These mountains clans of yours,” Hatch called to Jon as their party stopped. “Are they going to be an enemy?”

“Perhaps.” Most likely. “The mountains clans are old, dating back to the First Men themselves. They’ve been fighting against wildlings for time immemorable, and they won’t be happy to see so many pass,” Jon replied.

“And this is the place?” Ygon Oldfather called, a one-eyed, aging warrior who rode as strongly as a man half his age.

“Aye,” Jon said, pointing out over the foothills leading towards the northern mountains. Grey-green sentinels, spruce, fir and soldier pines littered landscapes. “Clan Norrey keeps a holdfast nestled in the hills just over the ridge. They have long been friends to the Night’s Watch; there is regular trade between them and they’ve came to brothers’ aid more than once.” He shifted his grey to have a look, trying to remember. “Further over the valley are the First Flints, the Wulls, the Burleys and Liddles. Clan Wull is the most powerful of the clans.”

“And how many men do they have?” Hatch asked.

“Three thousand fighting men in total, perhaps. Some regard the mountain clans as primitive, but my father once said that the north had none more loyal and steadfast than them.”

“Three thousand,” Hatch murmured. “We could take those numbers easily.”

He shook his head. “No. If we fight every force against us then we’ll lose men quickly. We will treat with the mountain clans, not fight with them. We will approach Norrey under a truce, and then negotiate with the rest.”

“Easier said than done,” Haldur Two-Notch called, the most keen-eyed of them as he scouted over the pass. “There are bowmen waiting on that ridge. At least a dozen.”
Jon frowned, squinting at the rocks and outcrops where the man was pointing. A faint slurry of snow obscured the scene. “I see nothing.”

“Aye, they’re wearing white cloaks,” Haldur explained. “But you can catch them when they move. There’ll be another bunch over on that side, by those rocks, and probably another group in the trees there and there.”

The horse whinnied, as it paced over the clearing. Jon tried to follow where the raider pointed. Parties overlooking the uphill approach, Jon realised. The mountain clans had no castles, but they knew how to fortify the terrain. If we bring our horses much closer into bow range then things will be bloody.

Haldur looked like he was having similar thoughts. “Snow, you could lose two hundred men against two dozen up those slopes,” he warned.

“You’ve seen tactics like this before?”

“I’ve used tactics like this before,” the lean man scoffed. “If they know what they’re doing, there’ll be pitfall traps and rocks rigged as well. You want to get into those mountains, you can’t use horses. You need men on foot moving slowly in small groups with bowmen of our own.”

Jon nodded, staring out over the distance. “And then that would guarantee a fight.”

“If they want a fight then we’d be better off giving them one,” Ygon called.

“Not today.”

Jon had wanted to make contact with the mountains clans, to offer peace, but those bowmen would be more likely to shoot first and talk later. He seriously considered moving forward anyway under a branch of truce, but he had no idea how they would react. It’s too risky, he decided. At least with this group.

“Alright, we fall back for now,” Jon ordered. “We need scouts with horses on the plains here, to watch for any force of men coming against us. I’ll arrange an envoy to head for the mountain clans.” I need to find free folk with the right temperament to broker peace between age-old enemies. Difficult. “They know we’re here, but let’s not drag ourselves into a fight.”

He glanced around, causing his grey to shimmy. “There’s a tower fairly close to here,” Jon said to Hatch, pointing. “A place called Queenscrown. It’s a ruin, but it’s defendable. Hatch, I want you to put together a force to hold Queenscrown, to form a perimeter across the Gift.”

Haldur and three other men agreed to linger to scout the route to the mountains, and Jon promised to send reinforcements to them shortly. Hatch turned to head back to Castle Black to gather the men.

Ygon Oldfather nodded, clutching the reins of his mare. “Aye. Back to Castle Black, then?”

“Not yet,” Jon said. “I sent Soren Shieldbreaker south down the kingsroad with a group of men to scout out Last Hearth. We ride southeast, and see if we can meet up with them.”

There were nods, stirrups whipped and the horses neighed as they started a quick gallop down the plains. There were so many who could be rallying against them, Jon needed to reach out gingerly to each northern house. Worrisome, particularly with the looming threat of storms. The last thing he wanted was to end up snowed-in at Castle Black while the northern houses rallied against the free folk. A truce must be brokered quickly.
House Umber and the mountains clans were the largest concerns. Both were significant forces, both with plenty of reasons to despise free folk. The Boltons and the Iron Throne might rally tens of thousands against them, but they were further away while Last Hearth was very close.

They rode until late evening. Everything was hectic managing the campaign, but it was worth the trip just to scout the landscape alone. Every valley or hill, Jon imagined how he would fight a battle there.

He saw the group of wildlings camped by the edge of the kingsroad, huddled into the forest. Horns blew as watchers spotted Jon’s party. Soren Shieldbreaker’s warband was mostly on foot, but large enough to secure a location by the road, but with orders to hold position and fortify rather than assault.

Soren Shieldbreaker met Jon as he dismounted, with a deep nod. “Snow,” the raider greeted, grey whiskers flecked with frost. “No dragon?”

“Sonagon is roosting at Castle Black,” he replied. “I’m here to check on the situation.”

“Situation,” Soren grunted, clutching his axe in his hand. “You mean freezing our asses off sitting here? You said I wasn’t to attack.”

“You’re not. You’re to hold the road,” said Jon, dropping to the ground with a wince. “Has anyone scouted out Last Hearth yet?”

“Aye, I sent four of my men forward to your keep. No return yet.” He paused. “However, I did pick up a few stragglers around the forest. They were heading your way.”

Jon frowned. Spies? Scouts? Soren Shieldbreaker led the way to the centre of the camp, and Jon saw seven men fastened around a tree with hemp rope that knotted and bound and across their wrists. All of them were men, the eldest looked over forty, the youngest barely seventeen. They wore old, ruined leathers and woollen jerkins. They aren't dressed like soldiers, Jon thought.

“Were they armed?”

“One was. With a bow,” said Soren. “Said they were hunters.”

Jon paused, looking between scared eyes and shivering bodies. These aren’t enemies, these are smallfolk. His hands clenched. “Why are they in binds?”

Soren frowned. “You said not to kill anyone.”

“And why do you view these men as enemies at all?” Jon demanded.

“Well, they ain't free folk, are they?”

Some of the captives were shivering and weeping. They were trapped, bound to a tree with no fire to warm them. A few had bleeding wrists from the rope.

“Release them,” Jon ordered harshly. “We will not terrorise smallfolk. There is no need.”

They’re not free folk, Soren had said. The wildlings viewed anyone who wasn't them as an enemy; they would treat commoners the same as they would enemy soldiers. We will not last long if that attitude prevails.

If the wildlings terrorised smallfolk, then the lords and highborn would never, ever treat with them.
Jon highly doubted that Soren would have unbound the men even after the free folk marched out. Even if Soren followed Jon’s orders and didn’t kill, they would happily leave these men bound to a tree in the wilderness.

I only discovered this because I happened to stop by, Jon thought. The wildling army was already occupying two castles and several villages around the Gift. How many other commoners are being treated this way?

The wildlings gruffly cut their prisoner’s binds. The hunters looked scared out of their wits. I must be more careful, Jon cursed. This is the wildlings’ nature, and I must work harder to overcome it.

“Hail,” Jon called to one of the men, stepping forward. Jon’s guards huddled protectively around him. “Where are you from?”

One of the eldest, a thin, gaunt man with a heavily wrinkled face like gnarly bark, gulped nervously. “We don’t want no bother. Just passing through, we never… we never knew…”

They stared at him with pure fear. “These men were too zealous, I apologise,” said Jon, glancing around. “But you were still trespassing and we have valid reason to beware spies. Now answer; where are you from, and where were you heading?”

“Mole’s Town,” the man muttered shakily. “I have two sisters there. My name’s Yorrick, m– m’lord. Three of us are from House Forrester, another four stragglers picked up along the way. We were heading to Last Hearth, when…”

His voice, glancing around the armed wildlings surrounding them. “When what?” Jon demanded.

“Fighting, m’lord,” another of the group said. He was a younger boy, with a stocky, podgy build, red face and wide pale eyes. “We heard fighting at Last Hearth, and we don’t want no part of that. I joined the group to get away from it, safety in numbers.”

“Fighting. Who was fighting who?”

“I don’t know… I never got close enough to see,” he said shakily. “If it weren’t, well, you, then it must have been flayed men.”

Jon paused. Boltons attacking Umbers? “What is your name?”

“Harlow, m’lord,” the younger man replied uncertainly. He bowed his head again quickly.

“Please,” Yorrick begged. “We are three hunters, one crofter, and two farmers. We don’t mean no trouble.”

“And these men could tell your northern lords exactly where we’re camped and how many numbers we have,” Soren Shieldbreaker warned.

“Let them. It is hardly a secret and I imagine a dozen other scouts will have done the same by now. The best scouts are the ones you don’t see.” He turned towards the captives. “Yorrick, your sisters are safe. Mole Town is under our occupation, but no one has been hurt.” That I know of, he thought grimly. Might need to check. “If you wish, I can take you to her. My party will be returning to Castle Black in any case.”

Yorrick didn’t respond, but he still looked scared. Harlow’s mouth hung open. What am I going to do with them? Jon cursed. Forcing them away could be a death sentence in war-torn lands. And there is a white walker on the loose.
He made the decision quickly. “There will likely be fighting in these parts, and I wouldn’t see anyone caught up in that. If you wish, you can join me to the camp at Castle Black. If nothing else, I can offer a meal and a fire for the night.”

Soren looked unhappy, but he didn’t say anything. All of the wildlings just glared. The men didn’t reply either, just nervous nods. Jon caught Harlow staring him intently through the corner of his gaze. They still think they’re prisoners, Jon thought. Perhaps they are.

Still, panic among the smallfolk was the last thing Jon needed. I need to set a precedent, to make sure the wildlings can get along with the northmen rather than fight them. It was a task that would only get more urgent the further south his army expanded.

Jon ordered some men to escort the hunters up the kingsroad, and told Soren Shieldbreaker to hold his position. News of fighting at Last Hearth was unsettling, and Jon couldn’t charge into an unknown battle.

Perhaps I should take Sonagon to Last Hearth, he thought. Jon could feel the dragon now, roosting atop the tower at Castle Black. Sonagon would sleep, but then he would need to fly again. Too much to do and not enough time, Jon cursed.

He debated returning to Castle Black, but the thought of those men’s treatment gave him pause. There were three other perimeter hosts led by Gerrick Kingsblood, Morna White Mask and Haldur Bullspear. Jon took a dozen riders to tour the other hosts, to check how they were treating any northmen they encountered. I won’t let any claim ignorance as an excuse for raiding.

Before long, the whole of the Gift would be under wildling control. My control. Expanses of vast, untamed forests, crags and mountains fifty leagues south of the Wall that Jon somehow needed to manage.

He spent the rest of the day riding through the plains and flurries, between the forests all the way up to Sable Hall. Morna White Mask reported coming across two abandoned homesteads, but little sign of any northmen moving against them. There was a chill hovering over the land that threatened a cold storm.

By the time he finally headed back to Castle Black, it was dusk and the setting sun threw long shadows across the snow. Castle Black was a shadowy silhouette in the distance, flooded by the wildling camp spilling out of it.

Castle Black was already overflowing. In the courtyard, they were only halfway through excavating the sealed tunnel to open the gate again, but already more and more free folk were already waiting on the other side ready to come through.

Jon heard the activity in the castle from the plains, stirring his destrier into a gallop. He heard the horn blast as the watchers saw him, but it sounded strained.

Sonagon was snoozing atop his perch, a white shape draping over Hardin’s Tower. Hardin’s Tower was a large tower with a dangerous lean, and the dragon roosted on the broken roof by using dragonfire to form a nest of ice around the top. Jon could see the glittering white ice glinting in the sun, cracking through broken stones.

Jon knew something was wrong as soon as he approached. He heard shouting, and saw men rippling across the perimeter. Jon’s hand instinctively went to his sword, but it didn’t look like there was any fighting. More panic.
As soon as his grey rode into the courtyard, Jon heard mutters and saw suspicious glares. The whole camp was silent, everyone looking at him. Shivers went down his spine.

“What happened?” he demanded, to no one in particular. His guards looked confused too. “What’s going on?”

He dropped off his horse. Everyone avoided his gaze. He saw Val’s blond hair whipping as she glared at him. “Snow,” Val growled. “What the bloody hells are you playing at?”

“What are you talking about?” Jon replied, eyes narrowing.

“Mole’s Town, Snow,” she snapped. “Why did you do it?”

“I did nothing.”

“Your dragon did.”

It didn’t take long for him to mount up his horse again and ride out down the road. Others followed. He could see wafts of steam in the distance, men scattered about the road. He heard somebody wailing.

As soon as he passed a bend in the road, he saw the jagged plumes of ice and torn up ground.

Behind him, in the distance, Sonagon was still sleeping on his tower, but the dragon’s snout and claws were filthy. Jon’s breath froze with the sight of the icy spikes jabbing out of the earth where Mole’s Town used to be.

Oh no no no…

Jon stared across the field, at what little remained of Mole’s Town. He felt his hands clench, his shoulders stiff. The cold had warped and distorted the earth itself, the whole ground swollen and cracked. Wooden buildings had to exploded and then frozen into twisted, jagged ruins.

Only this morning he had passed by the small village, and now there wasn’t a building left intact. The destruction looked hours old, but the ice was still steaming.

His grey whinnied, nervous to move any further. Death and destruction was as thick as the cold in the air. Jon’s mouth hung open, head spinning.

There were men gathered around, but nobody seemed to approach the icy ruins. Jon heard a spearwife sobbing by one of the frozen spikes. Her hands were bleeding from trying to scrape uselessly through the wreckage.

The air felt so cold that it hurt in his chest.

“… How many?” Jon asked with a pause, dreading the answer.

“Forty-three, by my count,” his man, Wulf, said with a grunt. Free folk cautiously surrounded the icy ruin, everyone staring back at Jon. “Maybe some got away, but I doubt it.”

Half of Mole Town had been underground, but Sonagon had destroyed it in a single explosion of dragonfire. Afterwards, the dragon had dug the ground and ice upwards to eat the frozen bodies. The earth was jagged from where huge claws ripped open the exploded buildings.

Mole’s Town had been small village, but there was barely anything left of it.
Jon’s heart was beating. His grey shimmied in the icy field. “Who?”

Wulf scratched his lip. “Let’s see… a dozen whores or so that didn’t run, some farmers, a couple of children.” Children. His heart skipped a beat. “A few free folk from the east coast. I think two or so Night’s Watch deserters as well. They were all in the village when your dragon attacked.”

“The free folk? What were they doing? Raiding?”

“Nah, guarding. Most of Mole’s Town fled before the battle, but some lingered. Mance offered them all protection, sent a few of his men to guard the place. The Night’s Watch been visiting there too – Mance said that the crows could keep the whores, to help calm tensions.”

Why didn’t I feel it happening? I wasn’t close enough to Sonagon, or was I too distracted?

He felt like screaming. He wanted to scream. Forty-three dead, their bodies scorched by ice and then devoured.

If any raider or sworn brother had butchered forty-three men, Jon would have had them hung. But how on earth am I meant to punish a dragon? Am I fool enough to try?

He stared at the destruction of Mole’s Town. Why did Sonagon do such a thing?

No, that’s a fool’s question too. Sonagon did it simply because he was hungry. That was his nature. The dragon had no concept of laws, or even right or wrong. Humans might as well be cattle to Sonagon. The dragon had eaten men before, during battle. The only difference was that Sonagon recognised some humans as ‘these men will feed me’ and others as ‘these men are food’.

Sonagon must have become peckish as he snoozed, flew off, and then went back to sleep. He killed forty-three men as easily as a terrier would kill a pack of rodents.

“I met some hunters in the forest,” Jon said slowly. “I had men escort them back to Mole’s Town.” Yorrick had two sisters.

“Oh aye, they’re dead. I think that’s what tipped the dragon off – it must have seen men approach and got curious.”

“All of them?” Jon demanded. “They’re all dead?”

“I think three of them went ahead into the camp. Only the ones who lingered in Mole’s Town died.”

Only the men visiting their sisters.

Sonagon knew through Jon that Castle Black was his. But Jon had thought nothing about any humans in Mole’s Town, outside of the castle. As far as Sonagon was concerned, the village had just been a convenient little pantry of forty-three tasty snacks.

How many others had the dragon eaten? How many hunters in the woods, or farmers in the fields? None that Jon was aware, but it was only a matter of time.

I had only been away for such a short trip too. The dragon had seemed so content roosting over Castle Black when he had left.

He heard screaming. A woman was shouting at him. She looked over forty with a leathery face and tears running down her cheeks. “You bastard!” The woman screamed. Jon recognised her; Zei, a whore from the brothel. “You did this! You bastard! You bastard!”

The woman looked grief-stricken, charging at Jon. A few of the free folks drew their blades. “No!” Jon snapped. He glanced at the woman, but breathing deeply and unable to speak.

She picked up a stone, ready to throw at him. Wulf scowled, jumping off his horse to restrain her. “You bastard!” Zei bellowed. “YOU BASTARD!”

There was no choice and nothing he could do. Jon turned and rode back to the castle.

She is right to demand vengeance too, he thought hollowly. But what can I do? Chain the dragon? Lash the dragon? Execute the dragon? Sonagon would kill Jon himself if he tried. There were no chains strong enough to hold a beast of Sonagon’s size, not here.

No, the fault is mine, he thought coldly. Sonagon is just an animal – a smart animal, but a beast nonetheless. He’s my responsibility, I’m the one who should be lashed.

Anyone who hated him, and there were many who did, just received forty-three additional reasons to do so.

I can’t leave Sonagon again, Jon thought. Ever. I have to stay by the dragon’s side constantly. It had been fine north of the wall while Sonagon had been injured and didn’t move so much, but now Sonagon was becoming more restless.

And when the food runs out? Sonagon could eat as much as a small army all by himself. There were many free folk to feed, and the Night’s Watch rations had already been depleted. Come winter many men would starve at this rate, but with Sonagon they might not reach winter at all.

First, they were already sacrificing livestock to feed the dragon. Soon, they would have to start killing horses too.

All eyes were on him as the riders rode into the castle. Jon kept his face hard. I can’t show emotion, can’t show weakness.

He glimpsed Sam staring at him from the steps of the rookery with an expression of horror on his face. He saw Bowen Marsh, Donnel Hill, Hairy Hal and Pypar lingering by the Flint Barracks with angry, resentful glares. They looked too scared to even raise their voices with so many wildlings around. All eyes seemed fixed on him. We have only just convinced the first of the sworn brothers to resume their duties rather than stay in chains, but what man of the Night’s Watch would work with wildlings now?

The men of the Night’s Watch were outnumbered fifteen to one. Two hundred men of the black were still in Castle Black. Another seven men had joined Ser Alliser on the chopping block in the first two days, but after a few futile revolts or protests most had settled in simmering resentment.

The Shadow Tower was the last holdout for the men of the Night’s Watch, but not for long. Both Tormund and Sigorn were leading forces to take the Shadow Tower. Ser Denys Mallister refused to surrender, but he couldn’t last. There was little doubt that the Shadow Tower would break.

Tormund sent word that there could be up to four hundred men holding the Shadow Tower, men who had fled west all the way from Eastwatch as the Wall fell. Combined with the two hundred men held in Castle Black, Jon guessed that there were fewer than six hundred sworn brothers left.

Only six hundred. There had been a thousand, when Jon joined. Doubtless more would fall when they took the Shadow Tower. The Night’s Watch might well have been cut in half.
If only they had yielded, Jon thought. If only they had yielded and seen the true enemy. None needed to die at all. It was a bitter thought.

He saw Mance Rayder waiting for him outside of the keep. The man was clean-shaven again, still with a gaunt face, yet he looked much fuller wearing a thick hauberk and leathers. He wasn’t quite walking by himself, and still with a severe limp. He wore thick gloves to hide broken fingers. Maester Aemon had tried to treat Mance’s poorly-healed fingers, but Jon doubted if his hands would ever be the same again.

“Snow,” Mance said, his voice hard and arms folded. “A word.”

Jon was fumed quietly as they stepped aside. Mance winced as he tried to stagger forward. Jon saw the eyes watching him. “It won’t happen again,” said Jon.

“Is that so?” Mance grunted. He kept his voice low because of those watching. “How many?”

“Forty-three.”

Mance thought about it. “Five leagues further south, your dragon would have reached the first areas of farmland and homesteads. It could have quite easily been five times that many. A bit further still, and that’s Last Hearth. That would be a banquet for the dragon, I suspect.”

“I said, it won’t happen again,” he growled.

“And you’ll swear that, can you?” said Mance. “Promise it on your honour?”

Jon didn’t reply. “Course not,” Mance grunted. “That’s because it’s a dragon and not even you can control it all times.”

“I won’t let it happen again,” Jon growled, eyes blazing.

“Words are wind, Snow. We need actions.” Mance met his gaze with hard-worn eyes. “If your dragon needs to eat, needs to hunt, then I’m sure we can find hordes of enemies, but not whores and children.”

“I’ll fly Sonagon to Eastwatch,” Jon promised. “I’ll double feeding times. The host there and the fishing boats could supply for him.”

“For a while,” Mance agreed. “But no matter what, sooner or later there are going to be a lot of folk starving – but that dragon needs to eat.”

Jon couldn’t argue with that. “How bad is this?”

Mance snorted. “Well, it won’t be a picnic,” he said dryly. He hesitated. “But we can handle it this time. They’ll be a few angry and a lot more worried, but we can handle the deaths of some whores and farmers. Though if it happens again…”

“It won’t,” Jon hesitated, with a gulp. I must make sure of it. “How many chains are in Castle Black?” He demanded.

“What?”

“Chains,” Jon insisted. “What are the thickest chains do you think we could have forged? Enough to hold a dragon?”

“Oh no.” Mance shook his head, eyes wide. “You cannot be serious. You mean to chain your “Forty-three people are dead, Mance,” Jon growled.

“And how many more will die if that dragon is chained when we need it?”

“That doesn’t make it right!” Jon snapped. “There must be justice. Lives need to mean something. How can you just brush off murder because it’s… it’s inconvenient?”

“I don’t bloody know what’s right,” Mance hissed. “And lower your bloody voice. But I do know that if you try to chain that dragon up, then that ain’t going to end very well.”

His jaw clenched. Mance looked down on him, with a curt nod as he walked away. “I can handle the men, Snow, but you need to take care of the dragon. Sort it out.”

My father would surely execute any beast that killed forty-three people, Jon thought.

Jon wanted to hit something. It would be easier if he could. If this was a fight he could handle it.

Jon glimpsed two of the hunters he met – Harlow, he recalled, and one other – gaping upwards at the dragon with open mouths. Jon might have approached them, but what would he say? I’m sorry my dragon has just eaten your companions?

Instead he walked on, needing time alone. The shape of Hardin’s Tower had never looked so foreboding.

Jon spent a long time pacing in his bare quarters as night fell, staring upwards, through the stone and ice towards where Sonagon slept. He wondered if the dragon even knew what he had done. Probably, Sonagon just wouldn’t care.

Jon wasn’t in control of Sonagon, not really. The dragon tolerated Jon, even followed him, but Sonagon would still have his own way more often than not.

Aegon and his sisters brought dragons to the realm three hundred years ago, he thought suddenly. The Valyrians rode dragons for centuries. Someone must have had this same problem before.

Now how did the Targaryens of old used to keep their dragons under control? It was hard to say, when the last Targaryen dragon died a hundred and fifty years ago.

Jon paused, as the idea came to him. He changed out of his sweaty riding leathers into wool and furs, and then broke his fast on dried meat rations from his bags. He had no inclination to wait for his guards, so he moved by himself.

He walked quickly out into the courtyard, heading towards the rookery at the far end of the castle. He knocked twice, and the door opened quickly. Jon took deep breath, forcing his body to stay steady.

“Just a minu – oh,” Sam gasped. Jon saw Sam’s face widen in shock at the sight of him. His mouth stammered.

“Hello Sam,” Jon said softly. “I would like to speak to Maester Aemon.”

The rookery was one part the free folk stay clear of. After settling in, they had left Maester Aemon, Sam and Clydas mostly alone. There were no guards posted on them, they slept in their own quarters. The ravens were important, but the free folk were unused to sending letters.
Still, Jon wondered if Sam would ever stop staring at him like he barely knew him. “Who is it, Samwell?” Maester Aemon croaked from the room.

“Umm… ermm… King Jon, maester,” Sam squeaked, stepping aside. Sam seemed nervous even just being in his presence. Do I really frighten him that much now? “Your Grace.”

“In private Jon is fine, Sam,” said Jon, stepping inside and nodding. Gods it feels so long since I was last here. How things have changed – it feels surreal. “Maester.”

“Your Grace,” Aemon said with a blind nod, shuffling to his feet. His old bones seemed to creak. “Although I must admit, I am uncertain of the honorific to use. They call you king yet I do not believe anyone bows, or that you wear a crown.”

“I ask for neither,” Jon said. “I am king because I rule, and that’s enough. So long as they obey, then I don’t see the crown as important.”

Aemon nodded. “Very well. But if I may say so, men must see respect being acknowledged for it to be solidified. The crown and the courtesies exist for a reason. I would advise you to either take a crown or do not, but don’t try to live in limbo.”

“And do you have a problem with that?”

“Me? No.” The maester’s wrinkled hand clutched his chain. “I am but a maester. It is my place to obey and to teach; never to rule and never to judge. For better, or for worse, you are in charge here, King Snow, and I will acknowledge that.” He lowered his head respectfully.

“Sam,” Jon turned to his friend. “I hear that you have been working with Mance.”

Sam nodded meekly. He hardly looked like the picture of a wildling leader’s lieutenant, but Mance seemed to be satisfied. He paused. “I also heard the tale you told Mance,” said Jon, his voice low. He blustered. “You did?”

“Aye. Mance told me last night.” You met the greenseer too.

“Mance didn’t believe me,” Sam squeaked.

“He did,” Jon promised. “I told him to.” Sam’s eyes flickered. Maester Aemon didn’t seem to react. “… We will talk later, Sam.”

Jon suspected that the three-eyed crow had saved Sam because he had known Sam was Jon’s friend. He must have wanted Sam to pass on the information to me, Jon decided. The three-eyed crow was clever and powerful enough to control events like this.

It made Jon wonder how many other strings the greenseer was pulling. There were too many coincidences that Jon was starting to suspect the greenseer’s hand in. Mother Mole’s prophecy, the support he had gathered at Hardhome, the wildlings flocking to him… the three-eyed crow could have easily been manipulating events. Now did the greenseer also manipulate Stannis and that Red Woman into attacking us? Jon mused.

It was a question for another day. He had to focus.

“I am looking for books on dragons,” Jon said, glancing around. “There are old tomes here, are there not?”
“Ah, of course. Come in,” Maester Aemon said, shuffling with his cane. “I have been expecting that you might stop by.”

“You have?”

“Hoping, is a better word, perhaps.” Maester Aemon walked slowly, towards the staircase heading downwards into the lower stacks in the wormwalks, leading down to the vaults. Sam hesitated in the quarters, unsure as to follow. Eventually, Sam lingered behind.

“How much on dragons?” Jon asked. How to control them?

“Too little,” Aemon sighed. “And too much unsorted and undocumented. Yet I have a selection of books prepared that may be of interest. Samwell has been assisting me. The Citadel would be a better source for dragonlore, yet the Night’s Watch has its archives too.”

The air was cold, but still and dry. Jon saw gloomy stacks of bound shelves looming below him, stretching outwards into the vaults of Castle Black. Each shelf was sealed; some with markings on them but most blank. He heard rats skittering in the darkness.

The maester stopped to motion at a lantern hanging on the wall. Jon paused to pick the rusty thing off its hook, lighting it before moving down into the narrow, dusty corridor. Aemon seemed to count the steps in the dark.

“The gods continue to be cruel, it seems,” Aemon mused softly. His voice even sounded like dry paper. “All my life, I have longed to see a dragon. And now, there is one right outside my very door, but alas, I am unable to see it.”

Jon wasn’t sure how to reply. “I... I am sorry.” He paused. “You are Aemon Targaryen. You have studied dragons?”

“Obsessed over them, in my youth. I was first drawn to the path of a maester as a means to discover more about them. Before I took the black, I would even say that I read every tome on dragonlore in the Citadel, bar one.”

“Bar one? Which one?”

“‘Blood and Fire’, “Aemon said wistfully. “‘The Death of Dragons’, a manuscript which only the Grand Maesters themselves are allowed to lay eyes on.”

He kept working towards a dusty oak at the far corner between the stacks, with a dozen half-burned tallow candles and four neat stacks of leather bound books. Some of the older books were wrapped in old vinegar-soaked clothes to preserve them against the cold, and the dust was so thick that even Jon was wheezing. Aemon sighed.

“How I miss my sight...” he muttered, his hands fumbling softly in the gloom. Jon blinked, reaching for another candle. “May I present the single most precious book in this collection,” he explained, pointing to an old, black bound tome four inches thick. “‘Dragons, Wyrms and Wyverns: Their Unnatural History’, by Septon Barth, Hand of the King for Jaehaerys I Targaryen. Please be gentle, this book may well be one of the last two complete copies in the world.”

Jon blinked. “Really?”

“Indeed. Too many tomes like such were burned under King Baelor’s zealous reign. This tome I stole from the Citadel archives before coming north, so many years ago. In my arrogance, I believed that my own safekeeping was better than any in Oldtown.” His voice was slow, laborious.
“Yet I could never part with this book. Brynden did love it so.”

Jon froze. Brynden. Brynden Rivers? He didn’t say anything, but there was a knowing edge to Aemon’s tone.

He hesitated, glancing over the leather-bound cover. The tome was so large and thick it might be used as a shield. “What does this book say? What are wyverns? Or wyrms?”

“The wyverns of Sothoryos are great winged lizards. Not as large or as long-lived as dragons, and they do not breathe fire, but they are still fearsome beasts. The firewyrms of Old Valyria are thought extinct after the Doom, but they were great serpentine creatures that would live in volcanoes, burrow through earth and could produce intense heats.” His wheezing voice was quiet, but the whole library was still. Jon had to focus to listen. “It has long been theorised that the very first dragonlords of Old Valyria bred wyverns and wyrms together to produce the dragons we know today. Some scholars suspect the use of blood magic, yet such theories are unpopular to the modern historian.”

He hadn’t heard that before. “I… I see.” Dragons had been bred? “So wyverns were fireless dragons? And wyverns are still alive today?”

“Presumably, though the swamps of Sothoryos are hardly the most accessible. While dragons were known to fly halfway around the world, the wyverns had smaller wings and were far more territorial. I know of no claim of ever being able to tame a wyvern.”

“And what of… what was the name? Firewyrms?”

“The wyrms are thought extinct, alas,” Aemon said shuffling around the stacks. “Either they are extinct or deep underground. The great firewyrms have not been seen since before the Doom, as the Fourteen Flames of the Valyria Freehold were the only place in the known world where the wyrms would ever come to the surface. Thus it is thought they were left extinct in the cataclysm.”

“I have never heard such things.”

“Tis not common knowledge,” Maester Aemon admitted. But you are no common maester, are you? As both a Targaryen and one of the oldest men alive, Aemon must have had access to histories like no other.

“So the Valyrians actually created dragons from these two different creatures?” Jon asked, entranced.

“Once, thousands of years ago, perhaps. There is no way to be certain. There is other evidence – the blood pits of Gogossos have long been reputed to have produced unnatural creatures and twisted hybrids under Valyrian rule. The basilisks of that area are another creature that are theorised to have been created by Valyrian crossbreeding and blood magic. My view is that very few of the monsters of the old empire continue to roam, but some linger.”

“And what of ice dragons?” Jon asked. “Is there any mention of them?”

“Not in Septon Barth’s accounts.” Jon wondered how many times the maester must have read that book before his sight failed. “The only veritable reference of ice dragons I have ever encountered came from a theory from Maester Margate supposing the existence of dragon subspecies. Cannibal’s Bay, north of the Shivering Sea, has long since been held as an example of ice dragon activity. Unfortunately, few ever return as witnesses from that place.”

The maester scratched his beard, shuffling forward between the stacks of books with small steps.
“Margate has often been dismissed as an… imaginative maester,” Aemon explained slowly. “He claimed that the term ‘dragon’ should be considered a genus, not a species. The Valyrian firebreathers were but one form. He referenced the old lore of ice dragons to the north, sea dragons of the west, and even the rumours of the shadow dragons of Asshai.”

“Sonagon is an ice dragon.”

“And yet yours is not the type that Margate described. In his work, Margate was very clear; that the ice dragons north of the Shivering Sea were wingless and could not fly, hence why they are not widely known. The ice dragons that he wrote of were more related to the sea dragons of the west rather than the Valyrian stock.”

Sonagon was a Valyrian dragon first. “And what is your view?”

“Me?” Aemon mused. “I consider wolves.”

“A hunting hound and a wolf appear very different animals. Yet most maesters agree that they share the same lineage and can even crossbreed. A direwolf and a dog seem drastically different, yet perhaps not as much as the appearances may suggest,” Aemon explained. “I think of the shape of the ancient dragons – the firewyrms and the sea dragons – which were all recorded to have long, serpentine bodies and stubby limbs, and I think that perhaps the Valyrians created an offshoot when they bred the first flying dragons from wyverns. They all, however, remain very similar creatures.”

“I see,” he muttered, lighting a candle carefully as he looked between the stacked books. “May I?”

“How long has it been since I just read a book? The last time had been at the libraries of Winterfell, sat next to Maester Luwin. He opened the leather cover of Unnatural History very gingerly. On the front page, a dark three-headed dragon was stamped, curled around itself. The Targaryen seal. The parchment was very thick, but the ink was faded and so cursive that he could barely read it.

“It has been decades since anyone other than myself has read that book,” Maester Aemon muttered, so quietly Jon barely heard him even in the gloom. “The last person to do so was a prince…”

Jon turned the page, squinting as he skimmed over the words. An excruciatingly detailed sketch of huge dragon – wings outstretched and its features annotated – dominated the double pages. The caption marked it as ‘Balerion the Black Dread’.

Septon Barth’s details and observations were absolutely precise and pristine. The first pages of writing were a mixture of his studies of the Targaryen dragons, their behaviours, diets and mating habits, as well as a good chunk of history and supposition.

Dragons require a very high iron content in their diet due to their metal rich bones, Jon read. They produce incredibly little excrement as there is little their stomachs cannot burn. In groups they establish very strict social hierarchies, but alone they become incredibly territorial. They are extremely responsive to the phases of the moon, and well-known for becoming aggressive and broody under the full moon. Barth suggested that this was a mating cycle, as it was observed that dragons living in isolation rarely showed the same characteristics.

A dragon's natural lifetime was unknown. Balerion lived to two hundred years old before appearing to die of old age, but there was fairly significant evidence of other dragons living much longer.

Anything that Jon didn't understand, Maester Aemon would linger by his side. He began to realise that the maester was more knowledgeable than any book.

Three tallow candles burned one after another as Jon sat and read in thick, comfortable silence. He felt the stiffness between his shoulders slacken.

Jon was working through a description of dragon vulnerabilities. Contrary to popular notion, dragon could not be slain by attacking down its gullet – Barth wrote that “death comes out of a dragon’s mouth, but death does not go in that way”. However, Septon Barth considered the eyes and snout of a dragon their largest vulnerability, citing the death of Meraxes during the First Dornish War.

“What page have you reached?” Aemon asked quietly, after a long pause.

“Twenty-seven.”

“Pages thirty and thirty-one could be of interest to you.”

He turned the stiff parchment. At first, all he saw was a long list of names. Jon frowned. At the very top of the list, were three names: Aegon, Rhaenys, and Visenya Targaryen, marked with Balerion, Meraxes, and Vhagar. “This is a list of dragonriders.”

“That is correct,” Aemon nodded blindly. “That is a list of all known dragonriders of Barth’s time. And what do you notice?”

He paused. “Most of these are either Targaryen or Velaryon.”

“Yes. Many have attempted to tame dragons, yet a mature dragon will generally bond only with a few men over its lifetime, and usually only those of a certain bloodline. It is one of the reasons that the dragonseeds became so valuable during the Dance of the Dragons. Old Valyria created their dragons through blood magic, and through blood they kept control of them.” Aemon paused, his face hard. Jon guessed what he was implying. “Have you considered that you might be of Valyrian blood, Jon?”

“Aye,” Jon admitted, with a quiet grimace.

“Indeed. Now isn't that curious?”

“My father was Eddard Stark,” Jon sighed. “I know of the dragonseeds; there are many Targaryen bastards still lingering. More likely than not my mother was some fishwife or washerwoman somewhere with a drop of Targaryen in her.” Maybe my mother had silver hair. Perhaps that was why Lord Stark had been so ashamed to tell him of her.

“That is possible,” Maester Aemon said, but there was something in the old man's tone that Jon could not quite place. The old man sat quiet for a while.

Jon glanced at the old man. “Have you tried to approach Sonagon, maester?” he asked curiously.
“I have indeed. Your dragon reacted quite poorly to my presence. I heard it snarling, and poor Samwell had to push me away quite quickly for fear it would attack. I have not left the building since.”

So Sonagon objected to Aemon. Surely if it was Targaryen blood that was required, then Aemon has more than anyone? “I could escort you to Sonagon,” Jon offered. “You should have the chance to touch the dragon.”

“Yes,” he said with a deep sigh. “That would be most welcome. I am an old man, but I would so dearly love to touch a dragon’s scales before I go.”

Jon grimaced quietly, glancing back at the book. Septon Barth wrote that dragons were creatures of magic and chaos, he recalled. So why do men idolise them so?

“May I ask,” the maester wheezed after the long silence, “what has you so troubled, King Snow?”

He hesitated. “I killed forty-three people today.”

The old man paused. “Ah. So I hear.”

There was quiet again. Was that his only response? Aemon didn’t seem to feel the need to say anything more. Jon glanced at him. “They died because of me. I made a mistake – a mistake that seemed inconsequential at the time, and forty-three people died. I don't know even know their names.” His voice quivered. “And it was solely my responsibility.”

“Yes,” Aemon agreed. “It was.”

Jon sighed. He wondered if there should be more outrage, guilt, or rage at the statement. It felt like there should be. Instead, there was nothing but quiet in the cold stacks of the library.

“It’s going to happen again,” Jon continued. “I know it is. Maybe not with Sonagon, but maybe a wildling party will raid and rape a village because I wasn't there to keep them in line. I try, but I can't be everywhere and hundreds of people are going to die because of it.”

“Yes. Most likely.” Aemon just nodded.

“I don't even know what I'm supposed to feel about that,” he muttered. “How can I, when everything I do or don't do is going to cost lives? What sort of choice is that?”

“One which you must face every day,” Aemon said softly.

A humourless smile passed over Jon’s face. “Then I don't see how I could win.”

“You cannot. You will most definitely lose,” the maester muttered. Jon blinked. “It may be a disastrous loss or it may be a small defeat, but eventually you will lose. Every king or queen there has ever been must roll that dice, and, although many would pretend otherwise, the outcome is all too often beyond their control. You are not in control of everything, and sooner or later you lose.”

“That is…” Jon hesitated. “I don't know what to say to that.”

“It was what you accepted when you took this duty,” Aemon said. “It is a truth that every king must one day accept. The best rulers are the ones who accept it early.”

Jon didn't reply. His hand stroked the stump of his missing finger. “Be prepared, King Snow,” the old man continued. “Prepare for the defeats more than the victories and that will place you in good stead. Accept the losses but work to reduce the next one.”

“That is easier said than done, maester.”

“Yes,” he agreed. “Most things are.”

Aemon hobbled to restack and wrap the books, treating Unnatural History with delicate care. “And what would you have me do?” Jon asked.

“That is for you to decide,” the maester replied softly. “But whatever it is, you cannot do it alone. If you continue to attempt to take sole responsibility regarding everything, you will simply fail all the faster.”

Jon opened his mouth, but then held his tongue. “I would suggest a crown, King Snow,” Aemon said. “Take your crown and force others to bow, no matter how uncomfortable it may make you. Give them order, and expect them to serve.”

“My army is free folk. They will not bow to me.”

Grey eyes passed over him. “Then you are doing something wrong.”

He didn’t reply. The old man winced as his knees cracked, hobbling weakly. “I must retire for the night,” Aemon apologised. “It was very good to talk to you, Your Grace.”

Jon paused, watching him go. He snuffed out of candle and walked out in the dark. The maester is over a hundred years old, he thought quietly. He is a very wise man.

It was dark outside. The hour of the bat, or later. He hadn’t realised how long he had spent in the library, but he was still barely a tenth through Septon Barth’s book. I had forgotten how much I enjoy reading, he thought, rolling his shoulders. It has been so long since I just sat behind a book.

He saw Sam waiting nervously for him by the door to the rookery. “Jon, I…” he stammered.

“I know,” Jon said, his voice low. “I’m sorry for putting you in this position Sam. You are just trying to do your duty. And so am I, Sam, believe me.”

Sam’s mouth paused, hesitating. “Ty and Jeren spat at me today. I passed them at the mess hall and they spat at me,” Sam mumbled. “I have been spending my time hiding with Maester Aemon because the sworn brothers spit on me at every chance they get. They call me traitor for siding with the wildlings, and… and they’re right. I feel like a traitor. Sworn brothers died because I tried to do what was right and they curse me for it.”

“I know, Sam. Believe me, I know.”

“But it’s not alright, is it?” he muttered. “The Night’s Watch are going to be captives and I’m walking around free and working for the man in charge. I know those men, Jon – they are my friends – and now they despise me.”

Jon grimaced slightly. They were his friends too. “And yet it doesn’t matter what they think. We have to do what is right, Sam.”

“And is this right, Jon?” His voice was a whisper. “People are dead. How many deaths can you justify because it’s all for the greater good?”

His mouth opened, and then closed. “I don’t know,” Jon admitted. “But I know we can’t give up now. We do what we can, and then we try to do it a bit better.”

Sam shuffled. “I can handle the northern lords, Sam,” Jon said, wishing he can believe it. “I can work on keeping Sonagon controlled. I trust Mance to keep Castle Black running and the Wall manned, and I need you to help find a solution. I need to know more about the Others. I need to know how to defeat them.”

“Aye. So we need more of both. Much more. If there’s a spell that can stop the Others, we need to find that too. I need to trust you to help me with that.”

“And all the rest that must be done?”

“We find others that we trust too.”

Sam just nodded weakly. Jon offered a smile, before stepping out into the bonfire-filled courtyard. “I will talk to Mance about those spitting on you,” he promised.

“Alright, Jo…” Sam stifled, and straightened. “Thank you, Your Grace.”

Val

She still wasn’t used to the thick stone walls and hard wooden rafters overhead. Just being in the castle made Val feel uncomfortable as much as anything. The giant man-eating monster that snoozing overhead didn’t help either. Hardin’s Tower was at the edge of Castle Black, but there was absolutely nowhere you could go where Sonagon was not in sight.

She could feel the mutters through the castle after what happened to Mole’s Town. Four dozen men and women dead. “This place is bloody loony,” Val heard one spearwife saying to another. “That beast is a monster. We need to get out of here.”

“Fuck, you want to run?” Her partner muttered. “You know that King Snow don’t take kindly to free folk that split off.”

The spearwife looked ready to object, then a woman wearing a white stone walked by with a pot. Everyone held their tongue when talking about the dragon while around those with white stones.

There were mutters and apprehensive stares wherever she went. The far more concerning ones to Val, however, were the wildlings that simply accepted the deaths, no question asked. She had overheard another spearwife saying, “the dragon killed them, so they must have deserved it.” Those who viewed Sonagon as a god would not accept that the god could ever make mistakes.

People are dead and those kneelers just swallow and accept it, Val cursed. She did not know what she would prefer, but the thought of so many just taking that view sent shivers down her spine.

Perhaps I should take a place on one of the hunting parties, she wondered, to get away from the bloody beast. The main reason she didn’t was because Mance was still weak and needed her aid. Val was in the armoury taking stock of swords and arrows for Mance, when she heard footsteps totter down the steps.

“Oi,” a man with a big bushy beard and an axe on his waist called. “The King wants you.”
She grunted. “Aye? And what does Snow want of me?”

“No, all of us,” the free folk called, motioning to the others in the room as well. “He’s summoning every leader who isn’t on duty. At the Shieldhall, at noon.”

Val bristled. Summoning? “And what does he want us all for?”

“Not a clue. Just be there.”

She dropped the tally and headed on outside. True, she could see the castle stirring with news.

King Snow invited every free folk leader, as well as sworn brother officers, to an assembly into the old Shield Hall. Val heard the mumbles as the summons went out, and then soon it seemed like half the men and women in Castle Black were cramming into the great hall. They had to stack the tables and dais out of the way so they could all fit, and even then many were spilling out the double doors. Val had to push her way through.

The sworn brothers were sat at the very front of the hall, under guard. Many of crows were given a wide berth, none of them had weapons, and they were all either wide-eyed or glowering.

The Shieldhall was a great feast hall of dark stone, cold and damp, and from the old dust it looked like it had been rarely used. A few free folk had been sleeping in the hall after the occupation, but they had to be shifted as the boots marched through. There were worm-eaten rafters overhead, and she glimpsed rats going mad with the sound of the ruckus.

Val only glimpsed Snow briefly, but then the crowd parted to let him to the front. He wore dark wool and ringmail, his longsword on his hip and a rich shadowskin cloak over his shoulders. The crowd murmured as he passed.

Val saw crows glaring at him with hate, while other free folk lowering their heads, but none said a word. Val could see a mixture of devotion, admiration and anger moving through the hall.

Mance sat at the top of the hall, one of the few sitting, watching quietly. Snow kept his face hard, pausing to talk to men briefly, moving towards the front. When he turned to speak, the muttering in the hall silenced.

Like a king, she realised. This was the first time he had ever assembled everyone like this. Like a king holding court.

“Friends,” King Snow said in a clear, stiff voice, stretching out over the hall. “Be at ease in my hall. We are here together – united against a common foe. There will be more battles ahead, but we will fight them for a better future.”

There was something that sounded like a snort coming from one of the sworn brothers. A man could have lost his head to a free folk’s axe for that, if Snow hadn’t raised his hand. “But this is not the time for celebration,” he continued, his voice hard. “Now is the time for unity, to come together to overcome the challenges we must face. For the future of the free folk. The future of the living.”

He kept it short, and his voice hard. To Val, it seemed the type of speech he may have spent all night rehearsing. “And for the future of the free folk, I must put affairs to rights,” he said, pausing as he looked around the hall. “Furs of Old Mother’s Crock, Hatch the Halfgiant and Haldur Two-Notch, please step forward.”

She saw the group stir. The three men looked confused as the bodies seemed to part around them. All eyes were staring. “Furs of Old Mother’s Crock,” King Snow continued, pacing. He motioned Val blinked. Dragonguard? What the hells was that? By the looks on their faces, no one else knew either.

“He’s treating us like southrons, Val realised. Handing out fancy titles and accepting us to jump for them. She expected – wanted – others in the room to laugh at him for it, but instead they seemed quite serious.

“There must be just rewards given in return for good service,” the king said, almost shouting over the din of mutterings. “Now, I intend to allocated some of the rewards. Mance Rayder,” he called, turning to face the man, “I hereby formally appoint you as Lord of Castle Black, Keeper of the Wall. Let it also be known that I appoint Sigorn, Magnar of Thenn, as Lord of the Shadow Tower, and the Lord of Bones as Lord of Eastwatch.”

Mance didn’t react, but his eyes narrowed. Snow turned, pausing as he picked out faces. “Old Man Harwick,” he called, “I hereby appoint you Lord of Deep Lake, to hold and fortify the castle with your men. Ygon Oldfather, I grant you Sable Hall to the East. Haldur Bullspear shall take Hoarfrost Hill. Each will receive a suitable command, and the duty to man and fortify the castles.”

King Snow kept on talking and there were more names, but Val was distracted by stirring that sounded like a brawl taking place between sworn brothers and free folk towards the back. King Snow kept his voice hard and spoke over it. “Soren Shieldbreaker, I appoint you Lord of Oakenshield, and Lady Val of Whitetree, I appoint you Lady of Queensgate.”

She froze. Queensgate? Lady Val of Whitetree? What is the fool thinking?

Val would have confronted him there and then, but as he stopped talking the crowd seemed to surge towards him. Jon Snow’s voice bellowed as he demanded order. It seemed like every free folk pushed past each other to talk their king. She heard voice demanding their own appointment, crying out of their own worth. Fools calling for the attention of their liege.
She slipped out of the hall and paced. From the talk, she heard that Snow had been giving or promising gifts to those that support at him. Val could have growled. We’re free folk, she cussed. We should not be jumping for attention like southron fools.

The whole castle was stirring and talking. It was only hours later that he finally left the hall, but there were still so many men shuffled around him that Val couldn’t even approach. Finally, Snow retired to Hardin’s Tower, and Val followed.

She saw the white tail swaying from atop the tower. Normally she tried to avoid even going near that dragon, but this time she had no choice. There were guards at the tower doors that she had to push her through, and walked into a bare and dusty tower of rotting furnishings and crumbling stone.

Snow’s quarters were on the third floor. The rooms had collapsed, so he took what used to be the landing of the spiral staircase as his chambers. Val saw a mattress that had been brought up from one of the living quarters, and a fireplace over the broken stone and rubble in the corner, but his quarters were still bare. Like Snow had hardly had time to sleep in them.

There were voices. He wasn’t alone; Val saw an aging woman, and a very scared heavyset boy standing before Snow and two guards.

The woman was weeping. Red eyes glaring at the floor. “…ry sorry,” she heard the king saying. “Rei, the deaths of those at Mole’s Town were not at my command, and I am truly sorry.”

The whore, Rei, stifled but didn’t speak. Val stayed quiet, but she saw Snow slowly pull out a leather pouch from his pocket. “I will pay the gold price for any who lost kin and friends at Mole’s Town,” Jon continued. “These are gold rings that should see you in good stead. Wherever you want to go from Castle Black, I will see you there in safety.”

Rei paused, staring at the pouch. Very woodenly, she reached out to take it, but she didn’t meet his eyes or even say a word as she turned and left. The pouch jangled.

The king’s eyes looked sad, but he turned to the other one. He was a gormless, pudgy southron man wearing leather and wool, who had wide eyes and a fearful expression. One of the hunters who he had brought in yesterday, she recalled.

“Harlow,” she heard the king say to the boy. “I take responsibility for your friends’ deaths, it was… regrettable.” Snow’s voice twinged. “Do you know of Yorrick’s and the others next of kin?”

The hunter, Harlow, stammered. “I do not, my lo– Your Grace. We were just travellers for a short time. I did not know him well enough to deserve such.”

“Indeed,” Snow said almost… disappointed. Sad that he could not make amends? “Very well.”

The man gulped. “What is to happen to me now, Your Grace?”

“Whatever you wish. You are not a prisoner here and you have committed no crime.” He turned to walk away. “I am deeply sorry for your companions’ deaths.”

Harlow seemed to hesitate, bowing. “I heard that you were looking to reach out to the mountain clans?”

“That is correct.” The king’s eyes narrowed.
“There is a goat track I know of, it won’t be defended. If you want to reach Clan Flint, it will take you straight to their holdfast safely,” Harlow said. “I’m a hunter, I’ve used it before.”

“Really? And are you willing to share it with our parties?” Snow said. The man nodded eagerly, and for a second a bright grin split his features. “In return for…?”

“Safety, Your Grace? Shelter?”

“Of course,” Snow said with a firm nod. “You will have it.”

The man grinned brightly, and then bowed low before skittering off down the stairs. He made a fool of himself bowing so deeply he nearly stumbled. Val watched him go, before stepping up towards Jon.

“Will you expect all of us to bow to you like that, ‘Your Grace’?” Val scoffed. “I told you I don’t want no fool’s title, Snow.”

Jon appeared to hesitate. “It would be appropriate, my lady.” He nodded at the guards. “Please give us a moment.”

The men nodded and stomped away. The room felt quieter. Something about him seemed to relax as she approached. He had been standing so stiffly.

“W…kingly,” Val scoffed. “And if the ranks are nothing, then why do they bother you so much?”

He paused, stepping towards her. “Because you’re treating us like we’re southrons, Snow.”

“South of the Wall,” he noted.

“Dragonguards,” she said tauntingly. “You need a group of men with fancy names around you to protect you? Wipe your ass too, will they?”

“The Dragonguard will be to protect Sonagon, not myself. The dragon rarely interacts with anyone but me; I want that to change. I want Sonagon to be familiar with more people, and a group to watch the dragon when I cannot.”

“You want to prevent another accident. Stop your dragon from killing another village.”

Her eyes narrowed but she didn't reply. King Snow lowered his head. “Lady Val,” he said, stressing the title, “I will ensure you are given a capable command. A command with proper ranks and authority. Good fighters and spearwives, that will follow you alone.”

“And then what? You expect me to go to Queensgate?”
“I thought it would suit you. Queensgate is not far from here, yet it is a strong castle. Bring your sister and her babe, you could shelter them there. I do need good officers to hold the Wall.”

“Is that me,” she said, with a slight grunt, “another of your officers?”

She caught the flicker in his gaze. “… What would you rather be?”

Val stopped, meeting his grey eyes. He looked uncomfortable. He’s younger than I am, she thought. It was hard to tell his age from his hair and the way he held himself, but sometimes he let himself slip. He was around eighteen, and she about seven years older. She gave him a sweet smile, and stepped backwards.

“I’ll let you know,” she said. “I ain’t going to Queensgate. I’ll stay here and I’ll help Mance, but I won’t go off to a ruin like Queensgate.”

He hesitated, seemed to bite his lip, and then nodded. “Very well, my lady. I’m sure Mance could use your support.”

“I’m sure,” she replied, already turning to walk away.
Chapter 24

Samwell

“Tell me about the Other,” Sam asked, his quill poised over the parchment. He tried to make his voice sound firm. Mance had ordered him to try and talk less like a boy, with more force and much less stuttering. The free folk across the table stared suspiciously. “As much as possible. How much do you know of it?”

There were half a dozen of them, men and women, their furs still damp and muddy from just returning to Castle Black. For a moment, Sam thought the raiders weren’t going to answer, but then the heavyset man behind Sam – Wulf – gave a quiet grunt.

One of the raider’s eyes flickered. “It’s a vicious bugger,” he said. He was a short man with two scars over his cheek and a hunting bow cradled in his grip. “Cunning too. Arwin’s party spent two days tracking it west, before realising it left them a false trail. The thing has been haunting from here to Eastwatch – any holdfast, farmers or scouts are being targeted one by one.”

“It’s trying to create as many corpses as possible,” Sam gulped. The thought of blue-eyed dead sent shivers down his spine. “How many wights have you burnt?”

“As many as we find. Not as many as it killed,” another raider grunted angrily. “I reckon it’s raising everyone it slays and then burying the bodies underground. Storing its army in the snow until it needs them.”

The first man nodded, his eyes bitter. “Aye. It’s been roaming south for weeks now. It’s probably killed at least two hundred. It could have killed more, but it’s being very careful too.”

Two hundred. There was an army of at least two hundred wights somewhere, biding its time. The reports of missing scouts and abandoned holdfasts were increasing. More and more of their parties had encountered moving corpses on the roads. It was an army that only ever became bigger.

But we’re prepared for that, Sam tried to tell himself. The wildlings were all on the lookout for the Other, and there were dozens of hunting parties searching for it. They were scouring the woods burning as many bodies as they could find. Two hundred wights could raise a lot of mayhem, but not against experienced men cutting them down.

“And the Other?” Sam insisted. “Has anyone seen it?”

Their gazes darkened. “No,” a raider muttered as he chewed a chicken bone. “Nobody’s seen it. Nobody’s seen Malvern and lived, anyways.”

“Malvern?”

“That’s the name the hunting parties are giving it,” Wulf interjected. “Malvern – it means death in the Old Tongue.”

The memory of blue eyes flickered through Sam’s vision, causing him to twitch. “We ain’t seen it,” one of the hunters continued. “But we’ve felt it. You can feel the cold when it’s nearby. It makes the air itself colder.”

Sam nodded, gulped, and then made a scribbled note on his parchment: ‘do the Others have powers over cold?’ “Really? It controls the cold?”
“Oh aye. I don’t know what that thing does, but you can feel its presence in your chest, it gets harder to breathe,” a man muttered grimly. All of their eyes were dark. “That’s the only way you know you’re getting close. When your blood freezes. One night, we were so close that our fires froze over, and then a cold mist dropped upon us. We had to huddle together and Malvern slipped away. We couldn’t follow it in the fog.”

He made another note: ‘ability to summon fog?’ “You mean it created a fog to hide itself?”

“Aye. But that’s nothing. Marv’s party swears they got so near that a flurry appeared out of nowhere. They lost two men to a snowstorm that came and went in a flash. No human can match it in weather like that, but Malvern keeps on moving.”

‘Ability to create flurries? Immunity to cold.’ Sam scribbled quickly. “But you can catch it, right?” Sam squeaked. “You can kill it?”

A couple of them shared dark gazes. “It’s injured,” a spearwife muttered. Sam noticed that didn’t quite answer the question. “Most of its kind don’t leave any traces at all, but we think Malvern is limping. We can track it, usually. But it’s also careful – it doesn’t even go near the hunters, like it knows.”

“You have dragonglass weapons,” Sam muttered. “It knows you do and it’s keeping its distance.”

He made a note; ‘it’s not invincible’. Only one dragonglass arrow would be enough to kill the creature, but it had no reason to make things that easy. Sam flustered slightly, flicking through the list of questions he made. “Does it eat? Drink? Does it need to sleep or rest?”

“We think it hides during the day,” a man shrugged. “Malvern only seems to move and hunt at night, but it moves fast.”

‘Vulnerable to daylight/warmth?’, Sam jotted. He kept on going with the questions they had made, even as the raiders started to scowl. These men had been out hunting for weeks now, and had only returned to Castle Black when their supplies became critically low.

“So is that your job, crow?” the scarred hunter grunted. “ Bloody writing? Too scared to swing a sword?”

Sam squirmed in his seat. “Watch your tone,” Wulf warned darkly, from behind his chair. The raider grunted, but didn’t reply.

Writing is important, Sam wanted to protest. Jon asked to know as much as possible about the Others, and how to beat them, and that meant trying to collect everything the free folk knew. Sam was interviewing hunters, and there were even orders out to capture a moving wight for study. Sam had to gather information; he was thinking about sending his research to Oldtown to see if the maesters could assist.

Sam continued with his questions because that was his job, but the raiders didn’t stop glaring at him. If it wasn’t for Wulf standing behind Sam, he had no doubt the men would have spat at him and left already. Wulf made an imposing sight, standing stiff with folded arms.

When Sam was finally done with his lists, the free folk stomped off without a word. The man with the scars gave Sam a spiteful glare as he left the room. Wulf shifted slightly.

“That brat was giving you the evil eye,” said Wulf, after the door closed. Wulf’s hand went to his axe. “Say the word and I’ll teach him some respect.”
“No, no,” Sam choked, shaking his head quickly. “Please don’t, tha-that’s not needed.”

Wulf frowned, but didn’t reply. He thinks I’m weak too, Sam thought. Jon had asked Wulf to act as Sam’s bodyguard, but there was derision in Wulf’s eyes when he looked at Sam as well. The wildling was a big man, almost as broad and stocky as Sam was, but Wulf was head and shoulders taller, far more muscular than fat. A gruff figure coated in ringmail and hides.

Wulf had never once acted as anything less than devoted to being a bodyguard, but his constant presence scared Sam as much as much anything.

“How many warbands are out hunting for Malvern?” Sam asked, glancing down the list of scribbled notes. He outlined that name – Malvern, the single Other south of the Wall.

“Right now? A dozen or so. There would be more, but we don’t have enough dragonglass to risk it,” Wulf replied.

“A dozen,” Sam repeated. “So many?”

“Aye, a rumour’s going around that King Snow has promised a place on the Dragonguard to whoever kills Malvern. There’s no shortage of raiders eager to claim that.”

Sam had seen the Dragonguard. There had been a dozen or so chosen for the position, and they were already walking around like kings through the castle. It was a position offered to whomever proved themselves, open to all. A chance to be near the dragon. No wonder so many were eager for a chance to become one of them.

But still… a dozen warbands hunting a single Other and none of them had even come close.

Maybe we’re trying to catch it the wrong way, Sam thought. A white walker is too strong, too fast and too smart to easily be caught, especially with the growing storms hampering the hunters’ movements constantly. The Others could walk through the cold and the snow far more easily than any human.

But what if we trap it? Sam wondered. We know it’s targeting small groups, so what if we disguised a group of wildlings as farmers, and armed them with obsidian weapons, small enough to be hidden? The Other was too strong, too cunning; taking it by surprise might be the only way to easily kill it.

Sam would have proposed the idea to any of the raiding parties, but in all likelihood they would dismiss it just because it came from him. Instead, he would have to try and find a chance to talk to Mance. I might have been appointed as second-in-command of the castle, but I sure don’t feel like it.

It was nearly evening. Sam went to the mess hall near the time of the bell, just so he could try to avoid the sworn brothers, but he still passed Pyp and Hake in the courtyard. All the brothers in black gave Sam evil looks, but at least nobody tried to spit on him with Wulf walking behind him.

When he sat down with a bowl of turnip stew, he caught a mutter of whispers in the corner. He saw a red-faced Bowen Marsh talking to Wick Whittlestick in a quiet hiss. There was some brief argument, and a glimpse back to Sam. Bowen Marsh had been removed as Lord Steward two days ago for refusing to work with wildlings. Afterwards, Bowen had been sent to work in the kitchen chopping turnips. Now Sam had to take on the duties of Lord Steward. As well as half a dozen other roles.

After a pause, Bowen hobbled over and sat down opposite Sam, his eyes narrowed. There were bruises on his face, Sam noted. Many sworn brothers had suffered similar beatings.

“Samwell,” Bowen muttered quietly, with a nervous glance at Wulf across the table. “A word?”

“I shouldn’t be talking to you,” Sam muttered, not meeting his eyes.

“I just want a word, Tarly.”

“There’ve been too many words already.”

“They bar my door at night, Tarly,” he muttered. “I cannot leave the kitchens or the mess hall. They beat me if I stare too long. I’m not even allowed sharp blades for the turnips. You are the only man in a black cloak who moves freely around the castle.”

There was disgust in the former Lord Steward’s eyes. He hates me too, Sam realised. They all hate me. He’s only talking to me because he has no choice.

“A word, Samwell,” he muttered darkly. “You write all the letters. What is happening at the Shadow Tower?”

Sam hesitated. “The Magnar of Thenn is laying siege to the tower. It is expected to fall shortly. I wrote Ser Denys the final offer of surrender that he’s going get. They will take the castle, with or without prisoners.”

Bowen Marsh’s gaze darkened. “And what of the mountain clans? The Norreys and the First Flints are the Watch’s allies.”

“King Snow took his dragon and a force of men to the First Flint Holdfast, and then all around the mountains clan’s villages. I hear the clans will yield.”

Jon’s great-grandmother was a Flint, Sam recalled suddenly. He heard that they were calling him ‘the Snow’.

“And House Umber?”

“Last Hearth was attacked by Bolton forces weeks ago.” Bowen’s eyes twitched. Sam paused, begging the man. “Please. It will be easier if you make peace.”

“Peace?” Bowen choked. “The wildlings don’t know the meaning of the word. Every night those thugs come into our quarters, just to beat someone new.” The man’s lips curdled. “You hear what happened to the miller’s girls, Samwell?”

Sam fidgeted. “They were children,” Bowen hissed. “Children. Right up until some wildling thug decided to take them for himself. They’ll do the same to every girl in the north.”

“They won’t,” Sam murmured, averting his eyes. “Jon won’t let them.”

Bowen just scoffed. “Have a look at what’s left of Mole’s Town and tell me what Jon Snow won’t do.”

Sam couldn’t even look the man in the eyes. The thought of Mole’s Town made him squirm.

Bowen Marsh stormed from his seat. For a moment, it seemed like he was about to spit on Sam as well, but then Wulf stood up. Bowen hesitated, glanced at Wulf, before turning and marching away.
It isn’t so bad, Sam tried to tell himself. The monster who took the miller’s girls had been punished for it, eventually. Some wildlings were taking advantage and going, well, wild, but Jon’s law kept most of them fairly tame. Bowen Marsh and the others only had a rough time of it because they refused to concede, but there were other sworn brothers who were starting to work with the free folk. Sam repeated the thoughts to himself, trying to make himself believe it.

Sam returned to his books. Come evening, a raven arrived, and he was summoned to the solar in the King’s Tower. Sam stumbled up the staircase, and saw Mance frowning over his desk.

“Tarly.” Mance nodded at him. “There’s been a raven from Karhold. I need you to draft a reply.”

“Is there news, my lord? Lord Karstark sent word?”

“No, the Weeper,” Mance said with grunt. “The Weeper has just taken Karhold.”

Sam’s mouth stammered. “So quickly? I…” He knew that the Weeper led five thousand men from Eastwatch, but for a castle like Karhold to fall? “Did Jon order him?”

“No. The Weeper’s orders were to defend Eastwatch from Karstark forces mustering, not to raise a bloody assault,” Mance said darkly. “And yet the Weeper claims that the battle was won swiftly.”

“How could Karhold fall so quickly? It is the strongest castle on the east coast, is it not?”

“The Weeper’s host marches with five hundred giants, Tarly.”

Oh.

Sam took the letter, beginning to read aloud. It was written by Karhold’s maester – maester Tybald – but stamped with the bloody fingerprint of the Weeper.

“He says that Karstark forces tried to hold the Grey Ford against them. There were two thousand, though mostly farmers and other rapidly-mustered smallfolk,” Sam read quickly. “At night, the Weeper led a sortie three leagues south, swimming the river at the mouth of the Grey Cliffs and raiding their flank. Karstark forces scattered, and then they fled altogether at the sight of giants approaching.”

Sam gulped, eyes flickering through the scribbled handwriting. “Lord Karstark retreated to Karhold, but the Weeper followed,” he read. “The giants broughts heavy bows and mammoths.”

“Aye,” Mance grunted. “Giants rarely use bows, Tarly, but when they do they’re fearsome. A giant is thrice as big but ten times as strong as a man. You call them bows, but siege weapons is a better term.”

Sam remembered relaying orders from Jon about those weapons. The first of them had been scorpions salvaged from Stannis Baratheon’s wrecked ships, but then the wildlings had started enlisting villagers and smallfolk to build more for them. They were bows that put human longbows to shame. Yes, that would be an overwhelming force.

“Lord Cregan Karstark surrendered,” Sam read. The parchment was stained by what looked like tears. “Both him and his wife Alys are captive in their castle.” He gulped as read the final line, glancing at Mance. “My lord, the… the Weeper wants to execute Lord Cregan and take Lady Alys for himself.”

“Aye. And won’t that just send King Snow into a fury?” Mance sighed. “Write a reply, Tarly, and hope that the maester has a very firm tone of voice when reading it back to him. Tell the Weeper that we’re in the south, we play by southron rules. You don’t kill hostages and you don’t steal a man’s wife unless your king gives you permission to.”

Sam nodded. Mance winced as he tried to move his fingers, drumming the oak desk. “I’m not sure if Snow is going to be happy or not,” he muttered. “The Weeper has got himself a brand new castle, but I shudder to think how many of those smallfolk the man actually spared. And when Rattleshirt learns that the man ran off ahead all by himself…”

“Rattleshirt?” Sam asked.

“The Lord of Bones sent a letter as well.” Mance motioned across the desk. The parchment was filled with squiggles, like a child’s writing. “Aye, it appears Rattleshirt has been teaching himself to write. Now Rattleshirt and the Seal Admiral have been launching raids against Skagos, like they want to conquer the island all by themselves. News of the Weeper’s success by himself will only embolden them further.”

“He’s attacking Skagos, my lord? Truly?”

“Aye, and Rattleshirt is a fool if he thinks the stoneborn will fall easily. The Skagossions have always been half-wildlings themselves.”

“Skagos is sworn to Winterfell, is it not?” They rode unicorns there, to hear the tales. An island of cannibals.

“Only on paper. When was the last time Skagos ever offered men to the north’s defence?” Mance shook his head. “The Starks waged a hundred wars against the stoneborn. Even the Kings of Winter broke their jaws on that isle more than once. Eventually, they agreed that they ‘bend the knee,’ and occasionally the stone lords pay lip-service to those old oaths, but Skagos is and always has been its own land. It just wasn’t worth the trouble to keep on fighting it each time they rebelled, and they rebelled often. It’s the very furthest corner of the north.”

“And the Lord of Bones wants to conquer it? Why?”

“Oh, wildlings and stoneborn have had a bloody history. They raid us almost as much as we’ve raided them.” Mance thought it about it. “We must write another letter convincing Rattleshirt to keep away from that island until they’ve got a dragon to assist them. Let’s not use the word ‘order’, though, Rattleshirt won’t like that.”

There were more letters to be sent. Sometimes it felt like Sam could see the panic in the north spreading from the rookery alone. Messengers reported fighting from petty lords at House Forrester’s Keep, raiders breaking away from the host across farmlands, a roadblock at West Mill Road, and murders up and down the kingsroad.

We only learn of about a tenth of all the battles and skirmishes happening, Sam thought, at best, and only if we’re lucky. It was sobering realisation of how much violence must truly be happening across the north. The wildling’s invasion had truly begun.

From Hardhome, Mother Mole and her followers were moving south. Scouts reported Varamyr Sixskins bringing a group of fifty wargs and skinchangers to the gates of Eastwatch. Tormund Giantsbane reported groups of free folk already waiting across the Gorge, and a message from the wildling host at Shadow Tower saying that they were only waiting on King Snow’s dragon before assaulting the castle.

“Should we send reinforcements to the Shadow Tower?” Sam asked with a gulp.
“Why bother? It will be over by the time any get there,” Mance said with a shrug. “It likely already is.”

“But we can’t let any more sworn brothers die,” Sam warned, thinking of the greenseer’s warning. “If the men of the Night’s Watch fall so does the barrier.”

“Then the easiest way is to just bring in more men of the Night’s Watch,” Mance replied, giving him a cool stare. “There will be five hundred free folk taking the vows and wearing the black cloaks by the turn of the moon.”

Sam blinked. “You’re… you’re replacing sworn brothers with free folk?”

“Aye. Convincing men to give up women and sit on a wall is a tough sell, but I can do it. The word spread that King Snow wants more volunteers for the Watch and he will look after the families of any who steps forward, and suddenly we’ve got plenty of recruits.”

“And what about the existing men of the Watch?” He asked, with a lump of lead in his stomach.

“They’ll either have to learn how to get along, or face the noose,” Mance said. “That’s the only way this was ever going to work, Tarly. They’re the ones who have to bend here, not us.”

‘Us’, Sam thought. He wasn’t even sure what side he was on anymore. Why does that thought fill me with dread?

Mance looked at him, musing. “You’d be a capable Lord Steward, you know that Tarly?”

He stammered. “Excuse me?”

“You should spare a thought to where you want to end up. One way or another, the Watch will be lacking commanders,” Mance said, “but they could do a lot worse than choosing you as Lord Steward.”

Lord Steward. Sam heard his father’s voice ringing in his ears. No son of House Tarly will be a servant. “I would not, I…” he mumbled. “I am not experienced enough.”

“Who is?” Mance said humourlessly. “I will not stay on the Wall myself. I may be Lord of Castle Black now, but I have no interest in ever wearing a black cloak again. As soon as the Wall is secure, I mean to go south with my wife and son. I will recommend to Snow that you are considered for Lord Steward.”

Sam opened his mouth, and closed it again. He paused. “And what of the next Lord Commander?”

“Likely some free folk will be given the role. Probably one that the king chooses. I very much doubt any of the existing members are willing to step up for the role now.”

A brand new regime for the Night’s Watch, Sam thought. The wildlings had won.

Sam didn’t say a word as Mance dictated the letters. They were running out of ravens for Eastwatch, so instead Mance had to entrust the message to a runner. Afterwards, Sam watched and acted as scribe as Mance coordinated patrols and assigned commands for the Wall.

In less than a week’s time, they would have the largest new recruitment ceremony for the Night’s Watch in living memory. Five hundred free folk would head north before a heart tree to take the black. If Jon really wanted the Wall secure, Sam considered, there could well be thousands more very shortly. The wildlings were wholly abandoning the Lands-Beyond-the-Wall.
At dusk, two riders galloped along the Wall from the west. Messengers from the Shadow Tower, the scouts relayed. Sam’s heart was beating as the two men were brought quickly up to the King’s Tower. The wait even as they stomped up the staircase was excruciating.

“We bring word from King Snow, Lord Mance,” the wildling man said, stepping into the room.

“Aye?” Mance’s eyes narrowed suspiciously. “And why didn’t Snow send a raven?”

“The Shadow Tower has fallen.”

Sam’s hands were twitching. “How many casualties?” he asked. “Did the sworn brothers surrender?”

The man frowned. His companion shook his head. “No, we mean literally fallen,” the man explained. “The dragon wiped that castle off the map.”

---

Jon

Jon gasped as the warm water hit him. He swashed the steaming water into his face from the bucket, trying to wash out the weariness. After flying for so long the chill had gone deep into him, his hands still hadn’t stopped trembling.

“You alright, Snow?” Hatch asked. Jon could only gasp, spitting hot water out of his mouth.

…”snow and screaming whipping through the air, stone crumbling…”

Jon nodded weakly. “Have the men prepare Sonagon's evening meal. The dragon will expect it.”

Since joining the Dragonguard, Hatch had taken to wearing a steel cuirass with a white serpent painted on the centre. He bobbed his head.

“Yes, Your Grace.”

Your Grace. Jon had started insisting more on the use of the title. Right now, it didn't feel deserved. The sound of screaming, groaning stone and hissing wind still echoed in his ears.

His face was pale as he staggered around the courtyard. Jon's clenched fists were trembling. His Dragonguard rushed to prepare for Sonagon, clearing the crowds backwards. There were already thirteen members, all of them armoured and rushing towards Hardin's Tower. He had made two appointments just last week when he named Toregg – Tormund's son – and Bulden Horn.

There was still space for more. Guarding the dragon was a tremendous duty and Jon didn't want to restrict the numbers in the Dragonguard. Above him, Sonagon growled as he shifted on his perch hungrily.

Jon saw Grenn approach him, looking disturbed. How much had Castle Black already heard?

He bit his lip. “There was an accident at the Shadow Tower.”

“Ser Denys?”
Jon just shook his head, pushing his way past. Grenn was left standing confused, stunned.

Jon's staggered stiffly across the courtyard. He met Mance, Val and a few others waiting for him.

“Snow,” Mance called. “We got your message.”

“It was a mistake,” Jon said. “The Shadow Tower… it was an old castle.”

“What happened?” Val asked.

He looked around at dark eyes. “Sigorn’s and Tormund’s forces were camped outside. Ser Denys was insistent on holding siege against us. I flew Sonagon in to break their defences.” My mistake. “The sworn brothers panicked. I dropped Sonagon onto the keep, and the dragon breathed ice-fire over the courtyard to scatter the barricades.”

“And?”

Jon shifted. That moment flashed before his eyes. “The dragonfire is very, very cold. The stone cracked, and the foundations were already crumbling. And then when Sonagon dropped on the roof, the weight…”

The Shadow Tower was one of the oldest castles of the Watch. It was built overlooking the Gorge, to keep watch at the edge Wall and over the Bridge of Skulls. The main keep had been a single tower of black granite, nestled over the grounds and outbuildings where the Watch put up their last stand.

That scene replayed constantly, haunting him even on the journey back. Between the snows and confusion, Jon hadn't even known what was happening until he heard the stone groaning…

He shivered. It hadn't even been a battle.

Mance had a dark look. Mance had served at the Shadow Tower, Jon recalled.

“How many?” Mance asked quietly.

“Some managed to escape the tower. The Thenns pulled everyone from the rubble that they could.” Jon nodded. “There were about a hundred survivors.”

And three times that number dead. The Gorge was so deep that they would never even be able to recover the rest of the bodies. The Shadow Tower took a good chunk of the cliffs with it when it fell.

“Dammit,” Mance cursed, hands on his head.

“What of the Bridge of Skulls?” Val asked.

“Tormund took it. The Night's Watch tried to collapse the bridge when the army approached, but they didn't have time. Tormund is heading back here with the sworn brother survivors while Sigorn stayed to man the remaining structure.”

“Come on,” Val murmured quietly. “Go get yourself cleaned up.”

Jon shook his head. “No,” he muttered. “I want to talk to Maester Aemon.”
Two of his Dragonguard, Haldur Two-Notch and Urwen Rockfist, tried to escort him, but Jon waved them away. He needed time to think.

The image of a great black tower slowly tilting and screaming flashed before his eyes. Even as it fell, there had been men inside who refused to flee.

He found Maester Aemon waiting for him, boiling a pot of herbal tea.

“Your Grace,” the old man said, and bowed. How does a blind man know it's me? Jon shut the door behind him.

“How did Aegon the Conqueror capture castles with dragons?” Jon demanded.

“My fault. My mistake,” Jon muttered. “The castle was old, the tower crumbling, the Builders haven't been properly manned in centuries, and I… I just brought a dragon straight in, I didn't even think…”

“I see.” The words were soft. “Your Grace, have you rested?”

“I can't, I…” It felt like there were tears stinging in his eyes. “I need to know what I did wrong. What I should have done better.”

Aemon paused. “Your Grace,” he said, “have a cup of tea.”

Jon wanted to protest, but then Aemon gently steered him to the table. The two cups touched the old pine table.

Jon stared at the table. With everything that had been happening, it had been days since he had even sat down.

… It feels like a lifetime ago when I was at this table, trying to convince Aemon to take Sam as a steward. Now, I'm a king struggling to fight a war on a dozen fronts.

Jon could feel the stress getting to him, like a knife in his gut. Three hundred men dead because of a stupid mistake…

“Is the Bridge of Skulls secure?” Aemon asked quietly.

“Aye. There were still enough outbuildings to house Sigorn's troops,” Jon said hollowly. All three gates were now open. There had already been wildlings across the Gorge waiting to cross. When the Frozen Shore clans crossed too, his ‘army’ could well reach fifty thousand.

“I see,” Aemon nodded. “And what of your search for allies?”

“Clan Liddle and Norrey cursed my guts,” Jon replied with a sigh. He spent a week in those mountains before rushing to the Shadow Tower. Maybe I rushed too fast. “Nobody likes wildlings. But nobody seems to like Boltons either. I said I was the son of Ned Stark, and that I could hurt the Boltons for them. Clan Wull at least considered an alliance, and the First Flints agreed to allow my hosts passage. They all saw Sonagon and I don't think they'll move against us.”

He paused. “Scouts say Last Hearth was sacked by Bolton forces. The Weeper conquered Karhold, and I think Lord Karstark may be willing to make an alliance. Otherwise the best chance for allies may be House Mormont or Manderly.”
“And then you mean to fight against House Bolton?”

“Aye. They won't accept us.” And they murdered my brother.

Aemon just nodded, blindly shuffling along to his chair. Jon held his cup but didn't drink it. He spent a long time just staring at the liquid. “How did Aegon Targaryen conquer castles with dragons, maester?”

“His dragons rarely did,” the old man replied. “A dragon is far more suited to demolishing a castle, like at Harrenhal, rather than taking one. Aegon used his dragons to destroy, and to force lords to concede or burn. Aegon and his dragons… changed the game, so to speak. Nobody at the time knew how to fight them.” He paused. “If you want to learn more from Aegon’s example, however, you’d be better served looking at his failures.”

“What do you mean?” Jon frowned.

“It is very easy to think of a dragon as invulnerable,” Aemon said softly. “It is not. But that is a mistake that even the first Targaryen conquerors made. They grew so comfortable in their success that they became lax. They became overconfident enough to siege a castle from dragonback without suitable ground support, and thus Meraxes ended up with an iron bolt through its eye.”

“Oh, many reasons,” Aemon sighed. “House Martell learned their lessons by watching the folly of the Reach, stormlands, and westerlands. Dragon wars require a different type of tactic; the Dornish learned quick to never amass troops in numbers. They learned that dragons themselves could be nigh unstoppable, but the support troops that the Targaryens relied on were anything but. A dragon alone can destroy, but it cannot conquer.

“Eventually,” Aemon mused, “it became a matter of simple economics. The Targaryen newly forged kingdom was just too fresh and too unstable. Their dragons could do much, but they couldn't rebuild trade, establish a stable government, or appease a population. Aegon the Conqueror ran out of resources to continually invest in a costly war in Dorne, so he was forced to retreat bloodied into order to secure what he already had. A thousand pinpricks killed a dragon, so to speak.”

“I… I see.” The Boltons might well use the same tactics against me. “Do you have any books on the First Dornish War?”

“Let us see what we can find, Your Grace.”

Aemon hobbled slowly to the stairs. He didn't bother with a lantern, but Jon picked one up.

“May I ask,” Aemon asked. “Why do you wish to learn so much, Your Grace?”

His lips pursed. “Because I want to do better.”

The maester just nodded. “Then I believe we have an account from Maester Yandel in our stores, who provides a study of the use of dragons during the Dornish War.”

It took a while to pull the dusty old tome from where it had been wrapped up in the stacks. Jon lifted the book down when Aemon’s hobbling knees failed him.

“I will fetch a bowl of hot water and a pot of stew, Your Grace,” the old man wheezed.
“You need not—”

“I insist.” The maester was already walking back up the stairs. “Wash, ease your mind and relax. You will not be disturbed.”

Jon bit his lip, but slowly sat down on the chair. Somehow, the quiet gloom of the vaults felt comforting. His eyes were red and weary, but he gingerly opened the book.

The candlelight flickered, wax slowly dripping down the stem.

_I should have done more_, he thought quietly. _I could have gone to the Shadow Tower sooner, before they had a chance to seal themselves in. I could have approached slower, more carefully…_

_Even if I just waited for better weather, I would have been able to see the tower falling. I was too impatient and too late._

Maester Yandel had a slow, cursive hand. The words were long and laborious. Jon felt his eyes drooping as he started to read.

Three hundred brothers died at the Shadow Tower. There must be fewer than four hundred left.

The candle slowly burned downwards in peaceful silence. His muscles ached after moving and riding for so long.

Suddenly he felt metal chain wrap around his throat. Jon gagged. Arms thrashed. He pushed back, but strong hands held him down. He heard his attacker grunting.

“Quickly!” A voice hissed. “Kill the bastard.”

More footsteps behind him. Couldn't breathe. His face turned red. His whole body lurched, kicking back.

The chair toppled. His feet kicked the table roughly. Parchment scattered, and the candle toppled.

His attacker fell backwards with him. Sweet, sweet air hit his lungs, and then they were crashing into the ground. Bodies rolled in the dark.

Figures. Multiple figures. Jon barely managed to gasp and then someone was on him. A heavyset man grunting and wrestling.

“Kill him already! Kill the bastard!”

“Watch the door!”

“I'm trying, he's squirming!”

Something sharp in the man's hand. Metal. Jon managed to grab his wrist before it stabbed into his chest. It didn't seem like a dagger, it was round and sharpened. A sharpened spoon.

Jon felt the edge press down against his chest. If it wasn't for his leathers, it would have skewered him. The man was on top, trying to push the crude edge downwards, while Jon desperately tried to hold the man’s hands up.
A blow. His teeth rattled. One of the other men kicked his face. They rolled, thrashing…

Jon couldn't breathe. His vision blurred, panting…

He felt the metal edge jab into his stomach.

The world rumbled. Jon could barely hear it over the sound of his heart.

“Kill him! Bloody kill him already!”

“For the Watch!” a voice cried. “For the Watch!”

Something big and heavy crashed into his face. Jon fell.

In the distance, he heard screaming. Roaring. The ground was trembling, the stacks shaking. He smelt smoke. Burning parchment.

Jon dropped, and the attackers were on him. Multiple men, lots of feet and blunt objects crashing against his body as he fell. Jon couldn't even feel the pain, not through the panic and fear…

“For the Watch! For the Watch!”

He glimpsed a flash of blond. A sharp cry. Suddenly, warm blood was hissing.

He couldn't even make sense of it. He was too busy gasping on the floor while the bodies thrashed. He heard shouting, and sharp bloody strikes of a blade.

Val, he realised suddenly. He recognised her blond hair striking, face twisted in fury. There were half a dozen men, but she had a sword and they didn't.

Flames hissed. The table he had been sitting at burst into flames from the toppled candle. Ancient tomes scorched in dusty flames. He saw Val kick a figure backwards, where he burned, thrashed and screamed. Wick Whittlestick, Jon recognised suddenly. He could recognise these men. He saw Sweet Donnel Hill scream and fall.

In the light, Jon saw Bowen Marsh fall backwards, crying. “Please, please!” he begged. “It's for the good of the realm!”

His skull splattered and Val’s sword jammed into his head.

Jon was gasping, struggling to breathe. There were other bodies stomping down the steps. He heard screams as bodies were being hacked to pieces.

He saw a podgy young boy flailing as he tried to wrestle a man in a black cloak. He was about to be overpowered, when two wildlings rushed to his aid.

The attackers were being killed quickly, but the everything was shaking…

A figure heaved Jon upwards off the ground. The ground was still trembling. “Your dragon!” Val screamed. “Calm your bloody dragon down!”

It took two men to pull him up the stairs and out of the rookery. Jon’s vision was still spinning.

Outside, it was absolute pandemonium.

He heard wood and stone raining downwards. The ceiling was shaking. The rookery, Jon realised.
Sonagon had ripped the tower of the rookery apart.

They opened the door, and then the figures yanked Jon backwards as a stone gargoyle crashed into the porch. Heavy wood splintered, stone crumbled. The whole structure shivered, ready to collapse.

There was a scar over the courtyard. Sonagon must have tried to tear up the ground to reach him in the vaults. He could feel the dragon raging.

Calm down, Jon pushed. Calm down! They’re dead! They're dead!

Sonagon roared so loudly the whole Wall quivered. Those moments were absolute panic.

The dragon didn't relax, and instead took to flying restlessly above. It felt like the whole castle was screaming. Sonagon felt my pain and panic too. He really didn't like it.

His throat felt raw, bruised. I nearly died. Sonagon went mad.

“Snow!” He saw Hatch and a dozen others stamping towards him clutching weapons. “What happened? What happened?”

“They tried to kill me,” Jon muttered, still wheezing. “They tried to kill me…”

He could see the bodies littering the floor. All with black cloaks. Some had tried to run, but they never escaped the building. Eleven of them in total. Val had been first through the door and killed four, and the other wildlings hacked apart the others.

Many of their faces were barely recognisable through the blood and gore. Then, Jon glimpsed a short figure with large eyes, wide eyes and an axe through his gut.

“No…” Jon muttered, staring at the lifeless corpse of his friend. “Pyp?”

Pyp tried to kill me. Bowen Marsh and ten others tried to kill me. Those moments were frantic, replaying in his mind.

Once Pyp chased me down as a friend to stop myself from forsaking my vows. He was a friend. How could he try to kill me?

“We're sorry, Snow!” He heard someone shout in the chaos. “They slipped past and ambushed the guards. Killed a man with a sharpened spoon.”

“Maester Aemon,” Jon demanded, head spinning. “Maester Aemon, where is the old man?”

They found the maester lying crumpled by the pans, blood dripping from his head. Lifeless grey eyes stared upwards. The old man was scattered and crumpled as if he had tripped.

Jon felt the scream jam in his throat.

Eleven men slipped into the rookery to try and kill him. Six went down into the vaults to do so while the other five stood guard by the stairs.

It looked like the maester tried to stop them. It didn't seem a deliberate murder; instead it looked like one of them pushed him and the old man fell and cracked his skull.

His whole body was trembling. He saw Val, panting for breath with blood on her sword and streaking through her hair. Jon was still shaking.
“… What… what happened?” Jon wheezed.

“Your dragon went berserk,” Val replied. “Nobody knew what was happening, but then I heard someone shouting that you were being attacked.”

His eyes were wide. “You saved me.”

“Aye.” Her eyes were hard. “And if I hadn't, that dragon would have slaughtered everyone in this castle. Snow, you be more bloody careful.”

Sonagon had been trying to save me too, he realised. Except the dragon didn't understand how, so it went mad trying to reach me.

Mance took him, brought him to the King's Tower. Behind him, it looked like the rookery was ready to collapse. There were orders to evacuate everything they could just as the walls started to crumble.

Jon took a deep swig of ale from a leather pouch, trying to calm his shaking nerves. Aemon. Gods, Aemon couldn't be dead – he was the last Targaryen in Westeros, the oldest man alive. How could a man like that die just because someone pushed him?

His mind kept replaying that moment. There hadn't been any escape plan for the attackers. Pyp, Bowen, Wick, Donnel... they all wanted me dead so badly they were willing to die for it.

“We found three other crows who helped those bastards escape the kitchens. Killed another guard too,” a man reported later, his voice angry. “They worked with the conspirators, keeping the guards distracted so the others could slip out to try to kill you.”

“Who?” Jon croaked.

“Their names Jeren, Hake and Rast.”

Gods I know those men. Jeren was a recruit alongside me …

“Are you sure?” Jon demanded. “Are you sure they were a part of it?”

“Oh aye. The one called Rast had a man's bite mark on his wrist from where he strangled the bloke.”

Mance gave him a dark look. “Snow,” he muttered. “No matter what these men were to you, you know what has to be done now.”

Jon stared at the floor. “Place them in a cell.”

“Snow—”

“I'll execute them myself in the morn,” Jon snapped. “Just place them in a cell.”

Mance lips tightened, but he nodded. Outside, the castle felt frantic. Mance's men and the Dragonguard had to seal the King's Tower.

“How many?” Jon asked finally. “How many died?”

“The conspirators killed two, three if you include the old maester,” said Mance. He paused. “And then your dragon probably killed two dozen or so when it became enraged. I'll tell you exactly how many when we find the bodies.”
Jon's hands tightened into fists. He didn't reply.

“We need to deal with the crows, Snow,” Hatch warned. “They tried to kill you.”

“Some of them tried.”

“And how many of the others are going to try again?” Hatch said. “We don't need those crows and they're not going to work with us. Say the word and they'll be dead.”

“No,” Jon growled.

“And what? You want to keeping staying in the same castle as men who hate our guts?” another voice growled. “How did you think this would end? There must be blood.”

There were mutters of approval “Enough!” Jon shouted. His jaw clenched. “Leave the room.”

He saw angry scowls. “… You heard the king,” Hatch said, folding his arms. “Everyone out.”

Shuffled footsteps traipsed through the door. At Jon's nod, Mance lingered in the room. “How do you want to play this, Snow?”

He stared out of the shuttered window. “Start by picking up the pieces. Keep the Night's Watch men out of the way until tempers cool. Compensation to the families of all those who died and rewards to Val and all the others who came to my aid.”

Mance nodded. Jon’s shoulders felt so tense. “And Maester Aemon deserves a proper funeral,” he said quietly. “A cremation – that’s the Targaryen way. He was a good man, he didn’t deserve to…”

Jon paused, trying to focus. “But keep the sworn brothers alive,” Jon continued, muttering. “Weed out any that look like they're going to cause trouble and send those away. They'll work with us, they will, as soon as tensions calm.”

“Aye. You stay in the King’s Tower tonight, Snow.” Jon was ready to object. “This tower has thicker doors and it’s easier guarded. I don't trust Hardin's Tower after your dragon gave it a whack.”

Jon bit his lip, but nodded. “I can't keep Sonagon in the castle, can I?” Jon muttered.

“No. You need to keep that dragon well away from everyone else. We should have moved it out a long time ago.”

“Aye.” But where can I keep him? “Tormund will be here soon with his host. Keeping so many wildlings, crows and Sonagon… it aggravates things. As soon as Tormund arrives we'll march out.”

“It would be easier if we killed the crows,” Mance noted.

“You want to do that?”

“No. Just pointing it out. It would be easier.”

Jon shook his head, but didn't reply. Mance didn't push the subject. “Where will you be marching to? Winterfell?”

Jon just nodded. Home. “Aye. I will have to. The Wall is yours Mance. Keep it secure.”
“Aye.” He folded his arms and narrowed his eyes. “But take my advice, Snow. That's a dragon. It's good at destroying and little else. Give it something to destroy.”

Val

She watched as the free folk cleared the ruins of the rookery. A single tail whip from the dragon had sent granite and wooden beams across the courtyard. It took the giant Wun Wun to hoist up the great chunks of stone, while men scrambled between the debris.

Hardin’s Tower had lost a good chunk of stone too as the dragon had thrashed, and then there was the huge gash through the wards where the beast tore up the ground. The earth was jagged and gouged from where giant claws and teeth had torn and ploughed up snow and stone.

Two minutes of rage, and the whole castle trembled.

Sonagon wasn’t here now; the beast had left to hunt. She had seen it flying away north beyond the Wall, and the castle sighed a breath of relief to see it go.

Val saw the bodies of the dead crows being dragged out. Jon Snow insisted that the old maester should be given a proper funeral pyre, though all the others were taken behind the logging house and burned in a shallow pit.

It's a queer thing, Val thought, to watch men whom you fought being carried out. In the moment it had been nothing but rage and bloodlust. Her shoulder still ached from where one of the big crows had tried to claw at her.

A messenger, a boy with wide eyes and a white stone, told her that Snow demanded to see her. Her jaw stiffened, but she nodded and headed off to the King’s Tower while the boy ran off to other raiders. Val paused as another three raiders trundled up the stairs besides her. There were four Dragonguards standing stiffly at the entrance to the tower, and another three by the king’s door. Cool eyes watched her as she passed.

She found Jon Snow waiting for them. “Val,” he nodded to her and the others. His throat was still raw and bruised. “Boyd, Hal, Erik.” No one spoke, but Snow just limped forward, and slowly dropped a sheepskin pouch onto the table in the solar. There was a metallic thud. “You all came to my aid, and good service should have good reward. Take yours.”

From the pouch, he poured out a mismatch of dull bracelets onto the surface. Silver armbands, Val realised. They were unpolished, but rich. The free folk had little coin, but there was still wealth enough.

She saw flashes of avarice in the expressions of the men next to her, and they quickly bowed, muttered to Jon, and walked away cradling the sliver. Val stared more suspiciously, but she took one of the bracelets in any case.

“You should take more than one, my lady,” Jon offered. “You killed four men by yourself.”

She paused, then took two. They were both forged for thicker wrists than hers, but she could barter using them. “Aye,” Val nodded. “You pay silver in exchange for your life?”

“I already tried to give you a castle, but you refused,” he said with a dry smile.
She tutted, but let the issue drop. He looks tired, she realised. Very tired and worn. Now when was the last time he slept? The king seemed to always be moving and working, she didn't think he ever took time to relax.

“… It is that southron you should reward,” Val said, as she started to walk away. Fair is fair. “The one you brought in. I heard him shouting for aid. Everyone else was running from the dragon, and he was the only reason I managed to get there in time.”

“Then I must reward him too. Care to join me, my lady?”

She paused, but nodded. He wrapped himself up in his cloak and had a quick word with his man, Furs, before following Val. Three of his Dragonguard stomped down the stairs behind them.

“You mean go to everywhere with your guards behind you?” Val asked.

“I think that would be wise.”

So did she, but she didn’t say anything. The dragon would have killed everyone in the castle if something had happened to Jon. The rumours of what had happened yesterday and had already spread, and she wondered briefly if anyone would dare attack the king now.

The camps outside of Castle Black were sprawling tents of cloth and hide, with fire pits dug into the ground, littering outwards from the Tower of the Guards. As soon as Snow even stepped foot towards them, Val felt the murmur pass through the camp and wide eyes staring up at him. So many people all looking and muttering. Even refugees who weren’t fighters had made the trek along the Wall to Castle Black with their host, to follow the dragon. Every single person seemed to have a white stone on their furs.

She passed a carving of white bark in the shape of a dragon, sitting at the very centre of the camp.

So many eyes looking towards her like that made her nervous, but Jon either hid it better or didn’t feel it. Towards the fringes, there were tents of those that weren’t free folk, villagers that had been captured by their army or forced to flock to Castle Black nevertheless for food and shelter. It didn’t escape Val’s notice that everyone who wasn’t free folk was at the back of the queue whenever food was handed out.

Jon saw the boy first; the pudgy young man named Harlow. There was a wound across his forehead from where he had tried to fight the assassins. Val just nodded. “Aye, he’s the one.”

For a second, Harlow looked scared witless as Jon approached him. Between the crowds, Val couldn’t catch the words, but she caught the look of absolute astonishment on the boy’s face as Jon extended his hand.

She hung back and watched. Harlow looked stunned, but the king said some words and Harlow nodded, and grinned. Val caught the mutters from the reactions, though not what the king said.

“What did you say to him?” Val asked as he turned back. His Dragonguards escorted Harlow out of the refugee camps.

“I offered him a place on my Dragonguard,” Jon replied simply.

“You did what?” Val smirked. “That boy is gormless. I saw him try to fight against one of those crows and it was absolutely pathetic. He is no fighter.”

“Yet he still tried,” Jon said as he walked. “While everyone else was running mad, Harlow was the only one who thought to chase after me. I would be dead if not for it.” Jon shrugged. “And he helped me greatly in dealing with the mountain clans. I know he’s brave and resourceful, and I don’t think he’s scared of Sonagon. He’ll do on my Dragonguard.”

“And yet he's not exactly a warrior.”

“I need more than just warriors.”

“And how many are you planning on appointing?”

“As many as needed. The Dragonguard needs stewards and stable-keepers as much as anything.” He shook his head. “No, the Dragonguard won’t be my version of the kingsguard. It will be a rank open to anyone from commoners to knight.”

They were heading back into the castle, muddy slurry underfoot. There were light flecks of snow in the air. “I don’t know what a kingsguard is, Snow,” Val said with a frown.

Jon blinked. “They are the royal bodyguards of the Iron Throne, the finest knights in the Seven Kingdoms.”

“And then that would be that fancy place down south, the big chair that the little boy sits on?”

“Tommen Baratheon,” Jon nodded. “He is king right now. But the kingsguard is an ancient brotherhood, founded three hundred years ago by Aegon Targaryen.”

He must have seen the confusion on her face. “Aegon Targaryen,” he repeated, with a frown. “The Conqueror? Do you not know of the Targaryens?”

“Snow, I know how to track a hare under three feet of snow and how to herd a bull mammoth away from a village,” Val said, irritated, “but don’t be surprised if I know little of your southron names.”

He blinked, and then smiled. He had a soft smile. “Forgive me, my lady,” he said, bowing his head. “The Targaryens were first dragonlords in Westeros, those who built the Iron Throne and conquered the Seven Kingdoms.”

“Dragonlords,” she repeated. She’d heard there had been more dragons that went extinct, but she never really knew the truth. Such things were little more than idle rumour north of the Wall. Or they had been, until Sonagon appeared. “Like you?”

“I suppose so.” He shifted. He didn’t sound comfortable saying so.

Val was about to ask more, but then he paused and headed up the stairs towards the Flint Barracks. Val caught figures coming out to watch him. The Barracks seemed to shuffle.

Val heard the words he gave to a free folk through the doorway. “All Night’s Watch men get double their current rations,” Jon ordered. “The curfew is still in place, but from now on they have permission to move around the castle freely.”

She heard the brothers mumbled. What is he thinking? Val cursed, stepping into the cramped and dirty barracks. The Dragonguard shuffled, trying to squeeze in and follow him.

Jon walked straight up to a thick necked and broad-shouldered crow, a head taller than Jon. Still, the big man looked nervous, shuffling on his feet. He had a blunt and honest face.

“Grenn,” Jon said quietly. “Did you know that Pyp was plotting to kill me?”
The big man’s voice sounded choked. “I did not,” he mumbled. All of the free folk around him were staring hatefully.

Jon didn’t reply. Something about the silence demanded answers. “… Pyp was angry, Jon,” Grenn muttered. “He… we… had friends at the Shadow Tower. We had brothers who died in the forest. And then you come along with wildlings and dragons and there’s death everywhere…”

A free folk growled, moving to strike Grenn. Jon raised his hand, glared at the wildling, and motioned for Grenn to continue. Grenn gulped. “I saw the blue-eyed dead in the woods, I did,” Grenn continued nervously. “But I don’t know what they were. There were mutters going around that the wildling sorcery was responsible for them, and the Red Woman did say that you were evil…”

His voice trailed. The room was quiet. Jon just paused, and nodded. “You’re right,” he said slowly. “… I’ve been expecting the Night’s Watch to come around, as I did, but I’ve given you no reason to do so. No reason to trust me. I’m sorry Grenn, that’s on me. I could have done more.”

The crow blinked. Jon just continued in a firm voice. “Grenn of Duskendale, I name you to my Dragonguard. I offer you a full position in my service,” he said, as the room muttered. “If you believe that my motives are foul, then you can stand in my presence during the day and you can see that they’re not.”

Grenn’s jaw dropped open slightly. He looked stunned. Some free folk looked ready to object, but Jon’s gaze turned hard. “Furs, give Grenn armour and weapons as suitable,” Jon ordered. “And a room under the King’s Tower.”

He turned to walk away, passing a cold look over a few free folk that were glowering at him. “I also expect free folk to watch their manners around the men of the Night’s Watch,” Jon said, warningly.

Some of them tried to object. His Dragonguard pushed their way through. Val heard Hatch the Halfgiant bellowing for them to get back. Val hesitated, lingering away at the bottom of the barracks.

“Are you a fool?” Val muttered as he approached. “The crows try to kill you and you name one of them as your guard?”

“Grenn didn’t. I know Grenn, he’s a good man.”

“You knew the others too.”

His glanced at her as they walked. “Grenn is strong and good with animals. He’s honest, and he’s brave. Aye, I’d trust him as my Dragonguard.” He nodded “And I appointed him for the same reason I chose Harlow. I want to fill the ranks with more than just free folk – it has to be free folk, sworn brothers and northmen come together.”

Val narrowed her eyes, but didn't object. They were heading into the King’s Tower. Guards opened the double oak doors for them, and they trundled up the staircase. Val lowered her hood.

“There’d be a spot on the Dragonguard for you too, my lady,” Jon noted, “if I thought you’d accept it.”

“And what? So I could spend my time looking after a dragon?” Val snorted. “I want as little to do with that beast as I can, Snow.”
“As you wish.”

He shrugged his cloak off as he limped into the solar. The air was cool, and he moved to light the fireplace. Val lingered, looking at him curiously. He is constantly so busy, she thought, folding her arms. When was the last time he relaxed?

“So these dragons of yours? There were more, at one time?” she asked. “How many?”

“At one time? Dozens. The last dragon in the south died over a hundred and fifty years ago.”

“And they were as large as yours?” She said doubtfully.

“Some as large, perhaps, but none larger I think.” He paused, hesitating. “I have a book I can show you, if you're curious, my lady.”

“I cannot read, Snow.”

“There are pictures too.”

From underneath the desk, he brought out a heavy, dusty tome of yellowing parchment. The cover and some of the pages looked recently scorched, charred by fire, but others towards the front were still legible. Jon treated it with the utmost delicacy. “I intend to find a maester as soon as possible.” He sounded sad. “To transcribe as much as possible before more is lost.”

He opened the cover. The faded squiggly lines and runes looked nonsensical to her. He turned the page again, and there was a sketch of a dragon with wings outstretched flapping over the double fold. Val peered over his shoulder. It was a strange thing to look at something so large that had been drawn so small.

She pursed her lips. “So this what you southerns do then?” she muttered. “You write words and draw little pictures of big things?”

“Aye, I suppose we do.”

He turned to a page showing a dragon’s maw and teeth as it gaped open. She had to admit, they were good pictures.

She peered over so she could see, trying to trace the ancient pencil strokes. Val ran the tips of her fingers over the dry parchment. Jon smiled softly.

“So these old dragons,” Val muttered. “You said they died. Died how?”

“There was a war.”

“A war of dragons?”

“Aye. The Dance of Dragons, it was called. The Targaryen civil war. Where once there were dozens, after the war there were only a few, and none that produced healthy offspring.” He walked, moving to sit down. He sighs when he takes weight off his leg, she noted. “That was the start of the Targaryen decline.”

“These Targaryens,” she mused. “Dragonlords. Does that make them kin to you?”

A flicker passed across his face. “I don’t know,” he admitted. “But the last Targaryen in Westeros died yesterday. He was an old man. He fell and cracked his skull.”
“The blind maester.” Val glanced at him, trying to read his expression. Whenever he had dealt with trouble his eyes could turn hard like grey iron. Slowly, she watched as they softened like fog. “… So he could have been your family?”

“I’m not even sure,” Jon said, with a hollow smile. “But it felt like he was.”

Val paused. “Lives should be celebrated, Jon Snow,” she said, her voice turning softer. “Let’s raise wine to the blind old man.”

He looked surprised. “I shouldn’t,” he said, biting his lip. “There are duties to attend to.”

Jon seemed strangely nervous. Val smiled sweetly.

“The castle can survive one evening without you, I think.” She leant backwards on the chair, stretching outwards. “Tell me about these dragons.”

Jon hesitateed slightly, but he smiled. “Aye, alright.”

“I think Mance stashed a bottle of wine in the cupboard there.” Val pointed.

“Will he mind us taking it?”

“We’re wildlings, Snow,” she said as she stood up. “If we steal his wine, then it’s his own fault for not keeping it properly.”

She went to fetch two wooden cups. There were glasses, but it still felt so weird for her to drink out of glass. Jon smiled as he uncorked the decanter, and the smile looked out-of-place on him. Like he wasn’t used to it.

“To Maester Aemon,” he said quietly. Their cups clunked.

Snow talked about dragons, about Targaryen history. He mentioned names like Aegon, Dareon, and Aemon, the Conqueror and the Dragonknight and wars in places that she couldn’t even place. Val laughed, and drank wine, noticing how his eyes lit up slightly as he talked.

It was good wine too. Probably something the old Lord Commander had been saving. Thick southern wine, lighter and fluffier than the hard northern stuff she was used to. Not so bad, she mused, as she downed the last of the cup with a small belch.

For some reason, Jon seemed very amused by that. He burst out in quiet chuckles. “What the hells are you laughing at?” she demanded.

“Nothing,” he chuckled. “Nothing, my lady.”

They went through the wine quickly. Darkness was falling outside, the smell of smoke from the camps heavy in the air.

“… so when King Daeron declared to announce another campaign on Dorne, his advisors thought him mad,” Jon was saying. “They reminded him that that Aegon the Conqueror and his sisters failed twice trying to conquer Dorne and now the Iron Throne had no dragons. Daeron replied, ‘You have a dragon. He stands before you’.”

“Wow,” said Val. “He sounds like a pompous little shit.”

That caused him to chuckle. “I suppose he does. But he was the Young Dragon. He was a great tactician and leader.”
Her head cocked. “You sound like you admire him.”

“I do. I used to read stories about his campaign with Robb. We used to pretend we were Daeron the Young Dragon and Aemon the Dragonknight.” He paused, a pained expression over his face. Eyes flickered. “… And then Robb led his own campaign. He became the Young Wolf.”

He seemed to pause. The wine left his cheeks flushed. “You have a dragon,” Val said, lowering her voice.

“I do, but I cannot…” He trailed off, and then shook his head. “Forgive me, my lady, too much wine on an empty stomach. I will have Beth bring us up a meal.”

“Beth,” Val repeated. “Is that the lass with the mousy hair always tottering around you?”

“Aye. She and the others have been tending to my meals and clothes.” He stood up, walking towards the door.

“I'm sure. That's because she wants you to fuck her.”

He blinked, gaping. “What, she’s not…”

“Snow, she's a free folk. No free folk girl would ever bring a man food without expecting that man to take them too.”

He shook his head. Gods, is he blushing? “They are just being helpful.”

“Sure.” She rolled her eyes. “Although I am surprised she's kept at it even after she must have heard about the…”

“The what?” he asked, baffled.

“The snip-snip,” she said softly, with finger motions. He gaped at her. “Well, they do geld you when you take the black don't they? I imagine they must cut it off so you don't miss it when you're on the Wall. It explains a bit.”

Jon looked flustered. “I am not a… they didn't… who has been…?” He paused, and blinked. “… Are you teasing me?”

“Never. Perish the thought, Your Grace,” she said innocently.

It seemed like he was trying to respond, but his mouth just opened and closed a few times. He shook his head. “… I will see about food, my lady,” he said finally, turning to walk away.

Val just smirked, dropping the cup on the table as he left.

She waited. She heard voices outside the door. Somebody shuffling up the stairs.

“What is going on?” Val called, pulling herself up. There were mutters from outside; somebody must have come up to meet Jon.

She creaked open the door. The voices were very low. She saw the fat crow – Samwell – standing nervously by the landing. In the torchlight, Jon's face suddenly seemed hard.

He's clutching a letter, she saw. “Oh, one of your birds have arrived?” Val called. “Where from?”

Neither of them replied. Jon's hands were trembling. Val moved closer.
The letter was smeared in pink, she noticed. She couldn't understand the words. “What is going on?” She asked, lowering his voice.

Without a word, Jon dropped the parchment on the ground and stormed away. She could see his shoulders trembling.

Sam squirmed, fearful. Val reached to out to grab him.

“Oi, crow,” she demanded. “Sam, right? What was in that letter, Sam? What the hells did it say?”

He quivered. “… I shouldn't…”

“Tell me.” Now what would make Snow react like that?

Eventually, Sam conceded. He picked up the parchment and he read out loud;

“Your sister Arya has been telling me about you. She tells me that you used to love her. She told me that she used to mess up her hair. She told me about the little sword you gave her. That you would play with her. Now, I play with her.

“She's my wife, and when I hurt her it is your fault. I make her scream your name. Sometimes she calls for you to help her.

“I hurt her. I rape her every night and cut her every morning. For all of your crimes and lies, I make your sister suffer and cry for them.

“Come and see, bastard. Come and see what I'm doing to your sister.

“I want you gone. Take your savages and go back north of the Wall, but leave. I want your dragon. Surrender the beast to me. Every day you are in defiance I will hurt your sister a little bit more. Come and see.

“Challenge me and I will cut out your bastard heart and feed it to her.

“Ramsay Bolton, Trueborn Lord of Winterfell.”

There was a long silence. Sam gulped. “There was something else,” he muttered, lifting up a wooden box with a shrivelled, severed thing inside of it. “It came with the envelope.”

Without a pause, she pushed past Sam and strode after Jon. The snows were thick, she had to force her way out into the grounds. She saw him barge his way into Hardin's Tower and storm up the staircase. The guards looked confused.

When Val followed, she heard a short, sharp scream. There were short, dull impacts. Fists punching against the wall.

She had never seen him look so crazed. “… Jon…” she called softly.

His breaths were haggard. He was pacing constantly, restless as a wolf. For a while, Val didn't think he would reply.
“He has my sister,” he growled, punching the wall again with an angry growl. “My sister.” She walked forward hesitantly. “I know of that man. Ramsay Bolton,” he spat, between deep, trembling breaths. “The man is a butcher. A dog. And he has Arya.”

“Your sister,” Val muttered. “How old is she?”

He stopped. “Twelve. I have not seen her in three years.”

_I am sorry_, she almost said, but she held her tongue. He wasn't looking for sympathies right now.

“They cut off her nose,” he growled. “Ramsay Bolton. Bolton. When he married Lady Hornwood he imprisoned and starved her until she had to eat her own fingers. And they married Arya to him?

“They murdered my brother. They killed my family. They torture my sister.” He screamed, slamming his fist against the stone again. She heard something crack.

“I think that wall has had enough, Snow,” she said. Her voice turned hard. “You done?”

He turned to her. There was no softness in his gaze now. “What?”

“Go ahead, keep beating the wall. While you're breaking your knuckles, your sister is being raped.”

“Don't,” he warned.

“Fuck hurting yourself over that prick,” she snapped. “Don't waste your rage against a wall; _savour_ what you're feeling right now, keep it in your heart, and then put it through that bastard's skull.”

She stepped forward, pushing into his space. She kept her gaze locked on his.

“He's got her,” Jon muttered. “She's a hostage, he'll kill her…”

“Then take her back.” Val challenged, raising her chin defiantly. “Take your justice. Take your vengeance. Take their heads and take their balls. You're a wildling, Snow.”

She took another step forward, keeping her eyes on his. Gods, her heart was racing. The air felt so tense, savage…

“If you want something,” she said, “all you've got to do is _take_ it.”

The moment froze. In the background, the fire hissed.

He lunged at her aggressively, his body pushing into hers. Val felt herself smirk just before their lips smashed.

His body was against her, pushing her back into the wall. She could smell the thick pang of wine on his lips. She could feel him, drunk and full of desire.

They broke for air. His breath was husky, shallow, panting in her ear. Jon seemed to hesitate, until Val grabbed him and pulled him into her. She bit his lower lip so sharply he winced, which seemed only to drive him further.

His hands pressed into her body. His hips pressing into hers even through their clothes. Her fingernails dug into his shoulders.

It seemed like he tried to say something, but she kissed and bit his lips shut. No words were Groping hands went for her bosom, and she replied with a sharp slap to his jaw. Jon blinked, looking stunned.

Val just gave him a sultry smirk, eyes twinkling. Her blond hair whipped around her face.

Come on, ‘Your Grace’, she challenged. Not a word was said, but he could feel the challenge in her touch, and in her gaze.

When his hands went for her again, he was far more aggressive, forceful. She gasped as she felt herself slammed back against the wall. She felt the hardness protrude through his breeches, desperate for release.

Hands fumbled at her furs, so she ripped the threads of his tunic off his shoulders

His chest was toned, muscular and lean. She felt her hands roam over the scars on his body.

By the time he finally got her clothes off, it felt like there was a fire between them. His hand clawed her breast so tightly it hurt.

Val bit, scratched and slapped him at every chance she got. Her nails scraped between his hair, forcing him to go just a little bit further, a little bit harder, a little bit stronger….

Oh yes… there we are…

Around her, she felt the tower shake as the dragon roared.
Chapter 25

Chapter Summary

The aftermath of the bastard letter, and dragons attacking...

Val

Her eyes flickered open lazily. The faint morning sun filtered through the shuttered windows of the room. Val yawned and stretched, feeling toned muscles and hair lying underneath her. He felt warm, solid, masculine. The smell of him in the morning caused her to smile.

Jon was already awake. He lay on the featherbed, staring up at the ceiling.

“Morning,” Val muttered tiredly, rolling slightly. She still wasn’t used to these soft southron beds. The smell of sex and sweat still lingered in the wool blankets, but it wasn’t an unpleasant smell. Her whole body felt stiff, sore, but relaxed, in the way that good sex did.

He didn’t reply for a while. “I am sorry, my lady,” Jon said finally. His voice was low, forlorn. “We… I shouldn’t have… it was dishonourable.”

Val didn’t react straight away. She sighed. Well, there’s a bucket of water over my good mood. Too early to do this, her head ached. “Now isn’t that what every girl wants to hear the morning after?”

He shuffled away from her, tripping and stumbling slightly as he pulled himself out of the featherbed, taking a deep breath. Val groaned, pulling herself upwards. They were both naked, and a chill crept into the room.

“Get back in bed,” she said with another yawn. “The air is cold and the sheets are warm.”

“No, I… I shouldn’t have done that,” he said, voice dripping guilt. “I beg your pardon, Val. Last night, it was shameful.”

“We must have different opinions on what that word means,” she said, pulling the sheets off her to reveal her naked form. “Do I look shamed to you?”

He bit his lip and averted his eyes. “It was shameful for me.” Still he didn’t even look at her. It made her irritated. “I took a vow.”

“That ship has sailed, Your Grace.”

No reply. She saw him wince in pain as he moved his scarred leg, trying to get dressed quickly. Where is he trying to run off to? She wondered. This is his room.

He hasn’t even called me ‘my lady’, she realised. Normally that was their little teasing joke; he’d say ‘my lady’ and she’d say ‘Your Grace’.

“You’re serious,” she groaned. “You really want to do this now?”

“I was upset last night. I exploited you.”
“Good. Exploit away.” She rubbed her eyes. “You were upset and you took comfort in the arms of another. There ain't nothing wrong with that.”

“It shouldn’t have happened, I’m sorry…”

“You say sorry one more time and I will geld you,” she warned. That apology irked her.

He took a deep breath. “There’s someone else.”

She nodded. “Ah. Your little redheaded girl, I take it?”

He nodded. The guilt on his face reminded her of a little pup, staring at the ground. He can't even meet my eyes. Or my breasts.

Val shrugged. “So?”

He flustered. “So it’s dishonourable, I shouldn't have—”

“When was the last time you saw your girl?” Val demanded.

“Seven months ago.”

“Is she even still alive?”

No reply. He doesn’t know, then.

“And you think it’s dishonourable taking company with another after a lay you had seven months ago? Bugger off.”

“Ygritte,” he snapped. “Her name was Ygritte, we were together and I never finished things with her. I can’t… do this… it’s…”

“Sex,” said Val. Her good mood was burning away fast. She shambled up. “Rutting. Make love. Coupling. Fucking. Call it what it is, don’t act like a bloody blushing maiden.”

“It’s wrong,” he stammered. “There was too much wine and I shouldn't have.”

A mistake? Is that really how he wants to treat me? Oh, that made her annoyed. “I swear, Snow; you’re not a eunuch but you sure do pretend to be one. You act like you're frightened of your own dick.” She tried to wash her face with her hands as she shambled over the cold stone floor. “We had sex. So what – why do you need to make it something foul? There ain’t nothing dirty in it unless you make it so.”

His gaze flashed. “I have a duty. I never intended on breaking my vows and I can’t break them again.”

“Is there really some god in the south that goes around punishing folk each time they get their dick wet?” she said incredulously. “Do you think you’re marked for each night you spend with another?”

He shook his head. “I have a duty,” he repeated. “And love is the death of duty. I can’t, there’s…” He grimaced. “I can’t marry you, Val. And I can’t sire a child.”

“Did I ask for marriage?” she said, standing upwards. “And bugar off if you think I’m having a child. Moon tea exists for a reason, Snow. Why do you always have to try and complicate things?”
“It’s not that simple.”

“It’s very simple,” she said, stretching out the words like she was speaking to a dimwit. “We had sex. It was good sex too. If you want to have sex again, then let me know and maybe I’ll want to as well.”

He didn’t reply. He stood frozen at the far side of the room, looking downwards. Couldn’t even come close to her. She pulled on her breeches and tunic, and then her gown in an easy motion. She didn’t bother with her smallclothes, they’d need to be washed anyways.

“I swear, Snow,” Val continued. “You’ve got a nice body and I’m attracted to you, but I really don’t need this headache afterwards. I’ve got things to do.”

She walked out of his chambers without another word, letting the door slam behind her. She shivered in the cold, trying to straighten both her furs and her hair as she walked down the spiral staircase.

She saw two of the Dragonguard at the bottom clearing looking upwards at her. One of them, Furs, call up and asked, “Did you two just fuck in there?”

“Yep.” Val nodded. “It turns out that King Snow really does have no balls.”

She went back to the Silent Tower to wash, and change her clothes. She left her knife behind and picked up her dirk and belt instead. She thought back to the exchange in Jon’s quarters. Did I go too far back there?

No, she decided. That was a pretty justified reaction against someone who used the word ‘shameful’ the morning after we slept together.

---

Jon

He groaned as he paced his chambers, hands on his head. The wine left his head aching and the sex left his body aching. His skin still shivered from her phantom touch.

It was mistake, he told himself. A drunken mistake made in grief. Too much wine.

Val could send him mad sometimes. She was beautiful, fearsome and so, so maddeningly alluring. She had glorious blond hair, sharp cheekbones and a lean and nubile body. Her lips, her legs, her breasts…

All of the alcohol in the world couldn’t dim the feeling of last night. The tension, the touch, the trembling motions. Thrashing bodies and soft squirming. He could barely picture it, but he remembered the sounds – her breathing in his ear, her muffled groans beneath him. He remembered golden hair in his face, lips tracing his collarbone…

Ygritte had been fair, even cute, but Val was the type of beauty that men could fight over.

The thought of Ygritte made Jon feel even worse than he already did. The memory of him pushing her off the cliffs had haunted him for months.

His body didn’t stop trembling.
I shouldn’t have spent the night with her. That was a mistake, he thought, ignoring the tightness in his chest. I shamed myself, and shamed her.

I loved Ygritte, I did. Now why is it that everyone I love seems to die? My father, Robb, Ygritte, and Arya…

Love is the bane of honour, the death of duty. What is honour compared to a woman’s love? The ghostly words of Maester Aemon only served to make him feel even more tense.

He broke his morning fast alone in his tower, stewing in frustration. Jon caught the flicker in the serving girls’ eyes, but no one said anything. After that, he didn’t want to see anyone at all.

After a long time, he sent word to Sam to bring him the pink letter from the Boltons. The thought of that letter sent shivers down his spine, but he needed to read it again in the cold light of day.

Jon didn’t even say a word to Sam as he dropped the parchment at Hardin’s Tower. Sam muttered something about burning the severed nose, and Jon just nodded. What was the acceptable way of disposing of your sister’s nose? Jon had to force himself not to even think about it.

He read that letter four more times, constantly. He had been too drunk last night to really process it beyond rage. Arya, he thought. Gods, Arya what are they doing to you?

Jon remembered a sweet, wild nine-year-old girl. Would he even recognise his sister anymore? Would she recognise him?

Why would Ramsay Bolton send me a letter like this? Jon thought slowly. It was crude, taunting, mocking. He used the phrase ‘come and see’ three times. He’s trying to provoke me. He wants me to do something rash like charge to Winterfell in anger.

And it might work too, Jon though. His was a constant, simmering anger, like tar bubbling in his gut.

He delegated his duties to his Dragonguard and to Mance while he retreated into Hardin’s Tower. He gave the pink letter a special place on his desk, so he could reread it constantly. Then, he passed a message onto Sam to bring him all of the letters and correspondence the castle had received concerning the Boltons.

The more he read and the longer he simmered, slowly all that rage turned cold, as frigid as the roost of the ice dragon’s perch above him.

All of the grief, the stress… all of the problems he had but couldn’t deal with it. The assassination attempt, his dragon, Aemon’s death, Val… Jon could feel it all getting to him. He could feel himself becoming liable to do something rash, so he gave the order that he wasn’t to be disturbed. He needed focus. Jon couldn’t even focus on anything without the echo of Ramsay Bolton’s words haunting his mind.

They torture my sister. They murdered my brother.

Jon turned to focus on an older letter, well lined with faded ink. This letter had been sent months ago – declaring Roose Bolton the Warden of the North. Robb Stark executed for ‘treason’. How would Robb react to this?

It had been over three years since the last time Jon saw Robb. He remembered a smiling, confident, curly red-haired boy who could always outride him but would never gloat. Now, Jon sat at the desk in Hardin’s Tower, staring at so many letters describing events that he had missed.
It was like looking at a timeline of everything that had happened. Sam had dug out every letter they had ever received - every missive of events that occurred so far away.

Now, Jon had to try to match his memory of his half-brother with the person described in the letters. The parchments described the Young Wolf and his campaign – a young king who fought valiantly in the riverlands, fighting for justice for his family and the freedom of his country. Robb Stark had been crowned, married and then murdered all the while Jon had been in the wilderness, a thousand leagues away.

Jon’s hands gripped the table, tightening quietly with every letter he read.

He remembered Theon Greyjoy – laughing, cocky, constantly smirking Theon Greyjoy. Jon wondered whether Theon had been smirking when he murdered Bran and Rickon and mounted their burnt heads over Winterfell and sacked the castle.

He remembered Tyrion Lannister, the clever dwarf who had even befriended Jon during their trip to the Wall. Jon wondered if Tyrion had been so kind and clever when he married his sister, and plotted to murder his family. Now Sansa was gone, by all accounts; disappeared and implicated when the Imp assassinated Joffrey at his wedding.

And Arya… wild, sweet Arya… It made Jon’s hands tremble with just the thought.

Was that the fate of the Stark children? Jon thought, quietly fuming. The sons to be murdered by their enemies, and the daughters to marry their enemies?

He wasn’t angry, it wasn’t rage anymore. It felt colder than anger; like an ice-cold blade through his chest. His fingers traced the line of the scar between his ribcage. The more he thought about it the more he felt the dagger dig into his heart...

There was a knock on the door. Furs brought him an evening meal. Jon was in no mood for company, so he ordered his guards to refuse all guests.

He didn’t sleep that night. Instead, he reached out to Phantom, feeling her prowl darkly and simmer. The shadowcat seemed to suit him better right now. The feline prowled restlessly over the battlements of Eastwatch, sharp eyes overlooking the hustling bay.

Jon felt Ghost howling, still hunting beyond the Wall around Hardhome. Sonagon was on top of the tower, looming over Castle Black like some enormous gargoyle.

What would Robb do in this situation? Jon thought. He thought of his brother a lot, of the campaign he had led. The Young Wolf victorious in every battle he fought. Would I have been able to do that? To win those battles?

Robb had always been the leader, the confident, assured trueborn Stark. Jon was a fighter more than a leader. The free folk followed him not because of his leadership, but because he fought for them.

What would Robb do here? Robb Stark would have rallied the north. He would have raised his bannermen and led them against the Boltons, marched down to Winterfell and rescued his sister, and put the Boltons and the Freys to the sword. Robb Stark could have won justice for his family, could have rallied the realm.

I can’t do that. I am Jon Snow, not Stark. I am a deserter, wildling and traitor to the realm. By the laws of men I should be executed. I am a warg and skinchanger – a bastard.
He could feel that anger in his chest. Robb would have been the justice. But I can be the vengeance.

He woke up early that morning. His two legs felt weird after spending the entire night in Phantom’s skin. Jon spent some time thinking about it, and then prepared his full battledress. He clad himself iron top-capped boots, a worn wool-lined hauberk and leathers, before fastening his giant hide furs over his shoulders. He took a steel half-helm formerly belonging to the Lord Commander, cradling it under his arm.

It was only just dawn when Jon walked down the tower, with Dark Sister on his hip. His guards stared at him in surprise.

“Furs!” Jon shouted. “Prepare the saddle.”

“Your horse?”

“No,” he replied. “The other saddle.”

Furs grinned, revealing both missing front teeth. “Ah.”

“Hatch, prepare ten of the Dragonguard to fly with me. We need supplies for a week, thick furs, and we’re going prepared for a fight. Make sure the men are ready,” Jon ordered.

He saw the big man’s face pale. “We’re riding the dragon? Today?”

“Aye. It’ll be a long journey too.”

“Where are we heading?”

He paused. “We’re going raiding. I’ll tell you more on the journey.”

He could see the murmurs spreading. He just pushed on. Jon stopped off by the armoury with one of his saddlebags. He picked up a spare longsword, a wooden buckler, and a set of dull iron gauntlets. He ordered his men to bring longbows.

The castle was already moving. Jon saw Grenn watching him open-mouthed as his guards prepared equipment and supplies. He glimpsed Val standing on the battlements with her arms folded, but Jon just walked past her. He couldn’t handle complications right now. Let’s focus on what I can do.

He met Mance limping from the King’s Tower, with a spearwife holding his arm for support.

“Where are you going?” Mance demanded, eyes narrowing.

“South. Sonagon and I will be gone for a few days, a week at most,” Jon replied.

“You leave and we might have a riot on our hands.”

“It’s only a week.”

“That might be too long. Lots of free folk worship you like a god. That dragon might be the only thing keeping the northern lords back and the Night’s Watch in-line. What happens when they figure that this might be a chance to throw us out?”

“Well, make sure they don’t. Remind them who has the power here. You’re in charge of Castle Black when I’m gone.”

Mance’s lips pursed, but he nodded. I’m king now, Jon thought. Let’s be king.
He could feel the people stirring. His Dragonguard rushing for arms was confirmation that Jon was moving out. He knew it was sudden, but sudden was good. Sudden gave any conspirators little time to conspire.

The whole castle was definitely waking up quickly. Mance looked at Jon with a frown. “... I heard about that letter, Snow,” he muttered quietly.

“Yes. They have my sister.”

“And if you fly to Winterfell, your sister will be the very first casualty in that battle. She’s a hostage.”

“I’m aware,” Jon said coolly, walking away towards the rookery. His heart was pounding. This was a big moment. This time, he was finally flying south, and he knew just what to do. “I’m not going to Winterfell.”

Sooner or later, the whole realm would know about Sonagon, but Jon wanted it to be on his terms.

He headed towards the rookery, before remembering and staring at nothing but broken rubble of the half-crumbling keep. Jon had to backtrack, recalling that Sam had moved the ravens and anything salvageable to the Grey Keep – the Lord Steward’s former quarters. His rooms in the Grey Keep was left a dump from all the books and letters that had been piled, unsorted. Jon saw a big, beefy man standing guard in front of Sam’s chambers, before he half-bowed and let Jon through.

Jon met Sam staring at him wide-eyed. “Sam,” Jon said, his voice turning softer. “I need maps – as good of maps as you have. I’m heading south.”

Sam’s voice trembled. It looked like he had been crying after Aemon’s death. “Maps? Um, I’m not sure... I think Aemon had a few... where of exactly?”

“South of Moat Cailin and down towards the riverlands. Maps of the Trident, if you’ve got it.” Jon hadn’t even been south of the Neck before, and it was too easy to lose all bearings when flying on Sonagon. “As detailed as you have, as fast as possible.”

Sam blinked, and nodded. With Aemon gone, Clydas would be in charge of the ravens and Sam the library. Aemon never even had a chance to touch Sonagon, Jon thought with a pained grimace. There just hadn’t been time.

Jon paused, an idea coming to him. “And if you want,” Jon offered, “there’s a place for you to come with us.”

Sam’s mouth dropped. “Wha... I can’t...” he stammered. “You mean on the dragon?”

“Aye,” Jon ordered, but gently. He had plenty of fierce fighters, but he needed intelligence. “I’ve never been out of the north before, you have. You know the route, and you can manage ravens. I need to bring a few birds to send messages back to Castle Black.”

The noise out of Sam’s throat sounded vaguely like a fish out of water. Jon gave him no time to protest as he swept out of the room.

Val cornered him as he was packing supplies from the kitchens. “What’s going on Snow?” she demanded.

“We’re going on a trip south.”
“Why?” She said sharply. “Your sister…”

“It’s not about her,” he lied, sharply. “All across the realm, there will be rumours about a dragon on the Wall. I don’t want them to be rumours for much longer. We’re going to take a trip south on Sonagon’s back, and make sure that everyone knows that there is dragon in the north.”

She looked at him suspiciously. “I thought you wanted to wait for the right moment.”

“I’m tired of waiting.”

Jon was already walking away. So much to do, so little time. “You’re going to make a lot of people very scared.”

“Good.” I want them scared. When your enemies are scared, then that’s half the battle already won.

Jon had wanted them ready to move out as fast as possible, but anything involving Sonagon’s harness required at least two dozen men to prepare. Three of his Dragonguard – Harlow, Gregg Sheepstealer and Mo – would stay behind but the rest were coming with him. Twelve fighters in total. He saw Toregg, son of Tormund, roaring in anticipation. Grenn looked pale-faced and trembling; he wanted to stay behind but Jon ordered Grenn to come and ordered the sworn brother to stay by Sam’s side at all time.

The first flight is always frightening, Jon thought. Only four members of his Dragonguard had ever even flown before. They needed Wun Wun to help clear the courtyard to prepare for the dragon, and carry stacks of rations. Furs was busy directing the giant, getting him ready to help lift the men on to the dragon’s back.

Crowds were gathering. He heard Bullden Horn and Hatch arguing for who got to sit at the front.

Jon closed his eyes and reached out with his mind. Sonagon was already awake, already alert. It didn’t take much prodding before the dragon started to twitch. Come. Hunt. Green fields and new territory. We fly.

The white shape twitched. Enormous wings unfurled. From atop Hardin’s Tower, the white dragon dropped downwards. Jon heard the collective gasp of breath as those wings pounded against the ground. The sudden beat pounded so hard that great billows of snow whooshed in the wind like a sudden storm dropping out of the sky.

Sonagon landed so hard that the ground rumbled, while snow washed around them. People were screaming, but Jon could have laughed.

The dragon was so large that it could barely fit in the courtyard. Sonagon was a fearsome sight, lumbering between the buildings. The great keeps and towers of Castle Black looked like toy houses compared to the dragon.

Men ran under Sonagon’s wings in panic, causing the dragon to snap and growl irritably, but Jon soothed him. We’re going to fly a long way together, Jon promised. We’re going further south than you’ve ever been before…

Furs was one of the few who didn’t panic. The wildling was more used to Sonagon than most, snapping orders for men to get moving. Perhaps I need to appoint him some rank, Jon mused looking at Furs. Official dragon keeper, perhaps. Furs was certainly capable enough.

It was awkward, panicked, and took longer than Jon would like. It required a lot gentle pleading to get Sonagon into position, and even longer to position the men around them.

Jon had to rub the dragon’s snout reassuringly to stop the dragon from moving. They needed Wun Wun to lift the men upwards with his great, beefy hands so they could clamber onto the dragon. I need a better way of mounting, Jon thought. Perhaps something like a siege tower that could be pushed up against Sonagon.

Sonagon’s back was jagged and ridged, particularly around the wings, but they were more experienced now. Sam and Grenn had to be fastened down and covered over with their cloaks, but Hatch and Furs wrapped ropes expertly around the dragon’s back spikes to secure themselves.

Jon couldn’t help but grin. By contrast, he had an easier job. He was well-used to climbing up the rope over Sonagon’s right horn, using the dragon’s neck crests as footholds, to position himself on top the dragon’s head.

“Get comfortable, and secure!” Jon ordered. “Find a position and keep in it, but make sure you’re wrapped up!”

“It doesn’t seem so cold,” Hatch shouted. When Jon was on the head and the others on the back, there was about a twenty-five feet distance between them.

“It will when we start flying,” Jon said grimly.

The best bowmen of his Dragonguard – Haldur, Bullden, and Harle – had longbows cradled in their grasp, but most didn’t dare take their hands off the hoists. Very awkward sitting, Jon admitted. His seat on the head was more vulnerable, but also far easier to mount. Anyone on the back had to shuffle dangerously over rippling muscles, clutching the dragon’s spikes.

Sonagon shifted uncomfortably with the weight shuffling on his back. Jon had to soothe the dragon constantly. The dragon was a fickle beast at best, but only the promise of food and flying made him wait.

By the time they were ready, it was already noon.

They were fiddling with the last few straps, when Sonagon decided he had enough. Jon heard screams. The dragon rumbled and his tail whipped, and Jon ordered them to back away. Time to go.

Jon’s heart was beating. He had flown nine times now, and twice with other people, but flying on a dragon’s back would never be anything less than magnificent.

South, he pushed. Let’s head south.

“How long do we have to stay like this?” Haldur shouted, his body rattling with every thunderous step as Sonagon turned.

“Maybe half a day!” Jon bellowed, though truthfully, he had little idea. He could barely guess how fast Sonagon could fly or the distances involved – he had never taken a trip this far before. “Just hold on really, really…” Sonagon took another step. Jon’s teeth rattled. “… tight!”

He had deliberately not mentioned their destination to anyone. He didn't want to give any warning, as unlikely as it was to reach ahead of them. Now, he was on his way.
There were screams as the dragon reared up onto two legs, wings outstretching wide. Sonagon roared, taking a few uncertain, unsteady steps as his wings started to beat. Jon had to hug the dragon’s scales to protect himself from the draft and snow.

And then, slowly, he felt the dragon rising up into the air. Sonagon roared under the strain.

_I wanted to go to Winterfell_, he thought foggily. _I wanted to go home_. But he couldn’t; that letter seemed too much like the bait for a trap, and they held his sister hostage regardless. Heading to Winterfell seemed too risky, too expected.

But that didn’t mean he had to let his brother’s murder go to unpunished. “The Twins,” Jon muttered head rattling by the thunderous, mind-wracking beat of wings. “We go for the Twins.” To give Walder Frey my regards.

They were lifting upwards quickly. The pressure so intense he gagged. Jon’s eyes opened, only to see the Wall disappearing beneath them…

For the first time in two hundred years, there were dragons flying over the north.

Sonagon had never flown so freely before. Generally, the dragon liked to keep its own territory, to patrol the same hunting grounds on an evening. Now, though, the dragon was roaming wild, flapping over pine forests, lakes and rolling hills.

And Sonagon loved it. Jon could feel the dragon’s glee as it pounded faster and faster, accelerating and streaming through the air.

All around him, the cold wind hissed so hard that it could have sheared skin. Jon had to keep his face pressed against the dragon’s scales, cloaks wrapped around him.

He had no idea how the others were doing. Jon could only thank the gods for the quality of Devyn Sealskinner’s workmanship. The leather harness felt secure even despite billowing winds.

Flying on a dragon’s back… it felt like a once in a lifetime experience. Jon could still barely believe that he got to do it repeatedly.

The people on the ground would be like ants. Jon wondered vaguely what it must be like to be on the ground beneath them, to see the white shadow flying over the clouds…

He gasped as he extended the warg towards Sonagon. The dragon was having so much fun he didn’t object. Jon’s mind expanded as suddenly he was staring downwards, watching the world through a dragon’s eyes.

_Dragons._

_Dragons._

No one had ever mapped the world like this. Jon struggled to recognise the shapes of the mountains, or of the forests in the distance.

_South._ Jon pushed, thinking of all the landmarks he knew. South towards the Long Lake, the Wolfswood, the White Knife, and the coast. The Neck, Moat Cailin, the Bite – all the way to the rivers. Jon wanted to see the south. And Sonagon wanted to see it too.

Jon had no idea how long that journey lasted. It was hard to measure time when every heartbeat felt like your last.
Jon forced Sonagon to fly low, low enough to be survivable for the passengers. Sonagon reluctantly complied, but it was still so fast the winds were vicious.

He felt the way the dragon instinctively sheared over wind currents. The dragon tilted left to avoid a strong headwind storm, his tail swishing through the air. Jon could feel the exertion every time the dragon pounded his wings, but the dragon was well-fed, energised, and free. Flying was where he belonged.

He must have made this trip before, Jon realised suddenly. A lifetime ago. Sonagon once flew from Old Valyria to the North.

They were making good time. As fast as the raven flew, if not faster. Jon reckoned he could probably reach the bottom of the north by the end of the day.

The sun was bright. Sonagon’s shadow roamed over the ground. By tomorrow, the whole north would know the dragon was no rumour.

It was dark when the dragon finally landed. Sonagon flapped down over a small mound on a grassy plain, one of the old barrows of the north. The kingsroad was somewhere to the west, probably. He could smell coast and ocean to the east. Jon spent most of the journey with his own body unconscious, while he shared Sonagon’s skin.

By the time they stopped, it was past dusk and the riders could barely even see straight. Most of them had fallen unconscious during the trip. Over half had soiled themselves, but Jon honestly couldn’t fault them.

Sonagon was exhausted too – exhausted enough to curl on the ground flat for them to stagger off. Hatch and Toregg were the only two who managed to stay conscious the whole trip. It took Grenn and Urwen to carry a pale and limp Sam down to the ground.

Sam had brought two caged ravens with him. One bird had died during the flight, the other didn’t look so good either. But at least no one had fallen off this time.

“Fuck. Me,” Black Maris gagged, her body trembling. “You said nothing that it would be that hard, Snow.”

Jon nodded wearily. Black Maris was the only woman in the Dragonguard with them, yet the spearwife was better with a spear than Furs and as hard a leader as any. She shambled to the muddy ground, helping Furs clamber off as well.

The trip around the Wall had been a gentle breeze by comparison. It had been a day of hard flying. Thank gods they had all buried themselves under cloaks. Hopefully there wouldn’t be frostbite.

“Set up camp here!” Jon ordered, as the men staggered on the hilltop. “Eat, clean yourselves up, sleep however much you can.” He stared at Sam sympathetically, still half-conscious and white-faced.

All of them were hardened raiders or rangers, but the journey still nearly proved too much. Gerwick almost crashed as soon as he hit solid ground. It was lucky Jon brought plenty of rations, because they all pigged themselves out on supplies, and then puked again.

“Fucking hells!” Grenn gasped. The big man was pale and trembling. “Fucking hells!”

“We must keep watch,” Jon ordered. “Someone must have saw us, they could have followed. Rest now, but don’t unpack. We leave early at first light.”
It wasn’t ideal – they could lose a lot of their advantage if anyone saw them coming – but there was nothing for it. People would die if they had to fly through the night as well.

Jon couldn’t sleep. He had to unroll the maps and try to figure out where they were. He reckoned somewhere north east of Moat Cailin, by the coast, in a deserted cliffside. Six hundred leagues, he decided finally. They’d had flew for over half a day straight.

“What’s the plan here, Snow?” Furs slumped down next to him. Others were listening around them. “You say we’re raiding? Raiding where?”

“We’re going to a place called the Twins,” Jon muttered. “And we will burn it to the ground. We raid only what’s left.”

“Aye? Just the fourteen of us?”

“And a dragon. Have you ever heard of what Aegon the Conqueror did to Harrenhal, Furs?”

Grenn’s eyes widened. Furs paused. “I can guess. So this place is a big castle?”

“Yes.”

“And you're okay torching it like this?”

“Aye.”

“Without warning or chance to surrender?”

Jon’s jaw clenched. “If they have any warning whatsoever, we lose half our advantage. They might try to prepare a defence.” He shook his head, well aware that everyone was listening. “We don’t give them any warning. Surprise and panic are our best allies here.”

They murdered my brother. They don’t deserve surrender.

“Then let’s bring those bastards down.” Furs grinned, tightening his clutch on his spear.

The Twins. Jon hadn’t even seen the Twins before, but he knew of it. The Freys murdered the northern host there. They murdered Robb Stark. Jon would bring dragonfire to the Freys, and he would make sure that the whole world knew.

I will take my lesson out of Aegon’s book.

The whole north would know. The Boltons would lose their strongest ally. Any man who tried to oppose Jon would think twice. Any man who wanted vengeance for the Red Wedding would flock to his side.

And the Freys would pay. Oh boy, will they pay.

The anger didn’t fade. Sonagon could feel Jon’s bloodlust seeping through their connection. The dragon stirred slightly.

The camp was tense. They were all ready for battle, but had to wait. Grenn, at least, stuck by Sam’s side protectively. Jon didn’t sleep at all.

The next morning, they mounted Sonagon again. They climbed on faster this time, although Sam still had to be carried. By first light, they were ready to go.
“Noon,” Jon promised. “We’ll reach the Twins by noon. This needs to be a fast journey, but we can take it gentler going back.”

Grenn muttered something that it would be easier to walk. Jon just smiled, but the smile was wooden. His fist hadn’t unfurled.

No matter how intense the journey was, Jon knew that it would be nothing compared to what would happen when they reached there. Jon’s heart was buzzing with the thought. Is this what Aegon felt before he razed Harrenhal?

Sonagon made good time. This far south the air was warmer. Jon could afford to lift his head up, staring down as they flew over boggy swamps and marshes. They flew so low that, occasionally, Jon could even see the people running. He glimpsed horses galloping down the roads.

Dragons. Dragons flying south.

Oh yes, come tomorrow the whole realm will be buzzing.

He saw mountains in the distance, dressed by low-sitting clouds. He smelled lands teeming with livestock and people, new scents he couldn’t place. Sonagon roared, a cry of dominance like thunder.

The maps were useless. Jon couldn’t even think to place the squiggles on parchment with the great expanse that stretched before him. Instead, he just had to try and guess their position. The Trident, he thought. I know the Twins rest upon the northern Green Fork of the Trident. Follow the river.

He could see a cape in the distance. He heard seagulls scatter around the dragon. The Cape of Eagles, he realised. I must have gone too far south and west. Sonagon had to backtrack and flap east again.

There were definitely people screaming beneath him. He passed over farmsteads and small villages and he saw panic.

Jon saw the Trident. The river muddy and reedy, but it was so wide he could barely miss it, even through the forests and clouds. He followed the Green Fork upstream, watching the river turn deeper and swifter.

The dragon roared. They would hear the dragon coming, like thunder in the distance. But so long as they don’t have the time or the coordination to prepare, it won’t matter.

He smelled the stench of men. He saw two squat, ugly and formidable castles of grey stone with curtain walls and towers sitting in the distance. There was stone bridge beneath them, the Trident gushing through the pillars. From dragonback, the Twins had never looked so small.

He heard Hatch from the the back shouting for the men to prepare themselves. Sonagon flew so low over the rushing waters of the Trident that the river splashed with every immense pound of the dragon’s wings. The river was wide, yet the length of Sonagon’s wings still reached over its breadth.

Jon heard the ringing of bells. The Water Tower sat in the middle of the bridge, with barbicans and portcullis leading left and right. He heard the east tower ringing first, and then the west. The two were singing in fear. His heart pounded in the moment.
The sun was bright, the air was warm, yet winter was here.

Dragons. Dragons are attacking the realm.

This is right. This is my vengeance.

“Dracarys!” Jon shouted at the top of his lungs, over the sound of roaring air. “Dracarys!”

White fire exploded from Sonagon’s mouth in a continuous stream. The dragon swept over the eastern bridge, and ice plumed from underneath. Jon saw men like ants skittering over the white stone.

The first plume of ice froze a chunk of the bridge twenty feet wide. The spikes of ice were ten feet high, the cold steam billowing upwards. The cold was so extreme that the stone shivered and cracked. Great billows of steam hissed and howled.

Suddenly, the frozen rock crumbled away, and a wall of ice split the crossing into two. The ice plumed across the river, chunks of frozen stone scattering the wastes.

Screaming, so much screaming. It was so chaotic Jon could hardly process it.

Jon was gasping. He had known it would be panicked but this… it felt unreal.

Sonagon roared upwards, circling. The dragon was eager, ready. The cold was bubbling in his chest. The dragon loved a good armageddon.

Men littered across the battlements of the Water Tower. Men running mad.

These men killed my brother. All Frey bannermen had been either conspirators or complacent. Jon could give them all a king’s justice.

No. Vengeance. This is vengeance, not justice. But right now Jon just didn’t care.

Wings roared as Sonagon flapped over the Water Tower. A few arrows bounced uselessly off hard scales. The sounds of screaming filled the air as the ice burst out of the dragon’s throat. The tower exploded into bloody white spikes and mist.

The castle. The bridge could be destroyed at will, but the castles were the priority. They were both identical, so Jon just had to pick one to destroy first. The east, he thought, the east one was facing the north.

Destroy the east castle first. A small but squat keep with high curtain walls and deep moats. Both were useless now. There was an apple orchard and cornfield spilling out of the grounds, with men and women scattering…

Sonagon circled. Jon saw hundreds of men trying to stampede out of the gate. Jon saw men jumping off the battlements in their panic to escape. A few tried to shoot arrows, but it was useless – the pure force of Sonagon’s wings swept the arrows away.

Sonagon was a blizzard given flesh. The dragon swept over the gate first, white dragonfire raging.

All of those men fleeing. Jon saw bodies rupturing and exploding in the extreme cold. Frozen chunks of bone and pink ice, scorched in white steam. Dragonfire scoured the ground clean.

Some men – the ones towards the edges – were left frozen solid, transformed into brittle, grotesque ice statues frozen in motion. A courtyard of dead frozen bodies.
At least fifty men dead in an instant.

Then Sonagon swept over the walls, in a continuous stream of dragonfire. The walls cracked and froze into rubble. The limestone didn’t stand a chance against anything that cold and destructive.

Another thirty dead.

Then the courtyard. Sonagon perched on an outbuilding, flapping amidst the great billows of steam, raining bursts of frozen death onto the yard.

Another fifty.

Jon gasped as the dragon jumped, crashing into the main keep. The dragon dropped down onto the tiled roof, crunching through stone, and the frostfire exploded from his jaws. The dragon’s breath blew down through the roof and the walls exploded outwards. The whole structure groaned and screeched.

The waves of cold were so intense that even the backdraft nearly scalded Jon. The noise sent him deaf. Frozen rubble scattered.

He could see the keep crackling and crumbling. Ice so cold it burned.

After that, Jon lost count of death. He wanted to push the dragon to restrain himself, but Jon could barely even think. The noise and chaos left his mind blank.

It was over quickly. In a single sweep, Sonagon turned the castle into a frozen ruin and graveyard.

And then, the dragon leapt into the air towards the western tower.

Jon lost control. Sonagon wasn’t listening to him anymore. The dragon’s blood was burning for destruction.

My brother’s killers.

The din was deafening, the force bone-shaking. Jon couldn’t even focus on the falling mortar and flying arrows when everything was screaming and shaking. He heard a woman’s wail.

Those sounds… they made his blood curdle. This was a mistake. This is a mistake. Too much death, too much…

Too much chaos, so little order. Jon had no idea the fury he had unleashed. The cold scorched his skin. The dragon had hard scales to protect him, but those on Sonagon’s back had nothing.

He glimpsed Haldur managing to fire his bow uncertainly from Sonagon’s back, but most others were struggling to even hold on. The panic, the disorientation, the noise…

The dead. So, so many dead.

A tower collapsed under Sonagon’s breath. Jon watched it crumble.

It was all Jon could do just to hold on.

The dragon felt exhausted from breathing so much ice, but also so, so happy.

Around them, the Twins were crumbling into the Trident in frozen rubble.
It was too much. Jon couldn't even breathe. Down, Jon ordered. Put us down.

The dragon didn't even seem to hear him. The beast was having too much fun catching those trying to flee. Jon saw some of them, and they were serving girls or servants, not soldiers. Sonagon gave them all the same mercy.

Icy fire transformed the orchard yards into cold ruin. Trees exploded in frozen splinters.

Finally Sonagon complied. The dragon dropped to the earth outside of the eastern keep with a great growl. Jon staggered, feeling the bile rise in his throat. The air was so cold.

They shambled down off the dragon's back. Sonagon twitched impatiently. Jon's hands could barely clutch the rope.

“Please…” a voice croaked. “… By the Mother's mercy, please… help…”

Jon turned, to see a figure crawling across the stone. It was hard to even recognise him as a man under the rime and frostbite coating his skin. The figure used to be a man-at-arms with a jerkin emblazoned by the two towers, but Sonagon's breath had ripped straight through him. The man’s legs were left frozen solid as he dragged himself over the courtyard.

Jon watched in horror as the man's foot broke apart as he crawled. He didn't even seem to feel it. His legs were just lumps of ice dangling from his waist. Dragonfire had frozen over half his body. “Please…” the man whimpered.

Jon’s jaw tightened. “Put him out of his misery.”

“Aye, Your Grace,” Hatch offered, hoisting up his hammer and stepping forward. Jon averted his gaze. There was a dull crack. Metal through skull.

Sonagon flew back up into the air. The dragon's bloodlust hadn't been sated, not yet. There were hundreds of men left running down the road, but Jon doubted they’d get far. Jon heard Sam being sick.

In front of them, the eastern castle of the Twins was a steaming wreck. Great walls of limestone were left pulverised. They heard the crash as another chunk of bridge fell into the current.

“By the Gods…” Grenn muttered breathlessly, staring in horror.

Sam’s legs gave out, falling to his knees. Jon felt the urge to do the same. Focus, Jon told himself.

“Haldur, Bullden, and Harle, go stand guard on the walls. Watch for anyone coming back. Hatch and Stiga, guard the doors,” Jon ordered. The oak gate had exploded in cold, along with half the walls. “Grenn, you stay here with Sam. Everyone else, on Furs or me, we search the castle for survivors.”

“To prevent any?” Toregg asked.

“Just search,” Jon ordered. “But watch your step, the structure is crumbling.”

They had only fifteen men to hold the castle, but it looked like everyone had either died or fled. The biggest worry was if any of the survivors managed to group together and head back towards them, but with Sonagon still in the air Jon wasn’t too concerned.
There could have been a thousand men between the two castle. Jon doubted if more than a dozen had survived inside the castle itself.

_They deserved this_, Jon told himself, trying to calm his beating heart. _They deserve this_.

He heard Furs cackling as he walked away towards a steaming outbuilding. “Big castle like this! Let’s see how much treasure we can salvage.”

“Just be careful!” Jon ordered. “Beware – it’s still very cold. You could lose a hand touching the wrong place. And any survivors, let me know.”

The wildlings split up in groups of three or two. Sam and Grenn were left huddled together.

They found the first three survivors, a group of serving maids, huddled together and weeping under a wall. The girls looked at him like he was a demon. One of them was a young serving girl with wide eyes and pretty brown hair and she had her left hand frozen into a block of ice. There was no doubt she would lose the arm.

Furs encountered another four men, guards, who tried to attack them. The men were left so panicked and crazed they couldn’t think, though, and the wildlings killed them all. Black Maris and Gerwick cut through them easily and stole their armour.

The only ones who survived had been the ones to hide in the odd nooks and crannies of the castle, taking shelter from the ferocious cold breath. There were corridors that had been scoured clean by the power of Sonagon’s dragonfire. Afterwards, the collapsing buildings killed almost as many the cold did.

Jon found a screaming man who had dived into a well to take shelter, and broke both of his legs from the fall. They had no rope to get him out, so they left him in the well to die.

It turned out there were two dozen or so survivors in total, but most injured, panicked or weak. Jon saw several limbs that had been bitten off by the cold. It seemed like the castle was wailing and weeping.

“Walder Frey,” Jon demanded from one man. “Where is Lord Walder Frey?”

The man pointed weakly towards the great hall in the keep, unable to form coherent words.

It had been some sort of meal when the dragon attacked. The great hall had taken the full blast of Sonagon’s fire exploding downwards through the roof. It was left a frozen, desolate waste; there was nothing but steaming, cracked stone and frozen corpses remaining. The dragonfire hit the hall like a giant hammer of ice, gouging a massive streak through the stone floor.

The high table of the Twins had been blasted into frozen splinters. It would be impossible to even identify the bodies. Even the intact corpses had been frozen beyond all recognition like bodies. Lord Walder Frey died over his table, in the middle of his meal, and his body blasted into oblivion.

_My brother died in this room_, Jon tried to remind himself. He wanted to explore the keep further, but it was too cold to even enter.

From the wall, Haldur reported some men poking around the castle. The archer put three shafts into two of them to convince them to stay back. Fourteen men could hold a castle like this easily when everyone else is frightened witless or dead, Jon told himself.

The only highborn survivor they found was a man called Merrett Frey, discovered hiding in the pantry with frozen piss in his groin. He tried to run, and Bullden Horn killed the man before they even realised who he was.

Everything that wasn’t destroyed, the wildlings tried to steal. Furs found a good pouch of several hundred gold dragons hidden in one of the chambers somewhere, but the treasury or vault was left inaccessible when the building collapsed.

The prisoners were left huddled and guarded together in the only surviving stable. Black Maris and Eywn stood guard over them, but they looked too scared to even move. The sight of scorched frozen flesh scattering the castle made Jon feel sick.

Jon came running as fast as his leg could move over the crackling ground. He saw Hatch standing over a fat, bald, white-faced man in wool robes. “He has one of those chains,” Hatch explained, folding his arms. “That makes this one a maester, aye?”

It did. The rookery had been destroyed in one of the first passes of Sonagon, but the maester was lucky to survive hiding under the stairwell even as the tower collapsed. Jon nodded Hatch away, and bent over the man. He kept his hand on Dark Sister. Good. A maester would know everything that had been happening in the castle.

“Maester,” Jon muttered. The man was wheezing for breath in panic. There were bodies crushed by frozen rubble around him. “Deep breaths, maester. What is your name?”

He stammered. “Bre— Brenett.”

“Maester Brenett.” He nodded. “My name is Jon Snow, maester. King Jon Snow. I trust you will answer my questions.”

“Aye. The dragon obeys me.”

His eyes were wide, bulging. Jon had rarely seen a man so scared. “You killed them. You killed everyone.”

_The maester would lose at least three fingers from the cold_, Jon realised. He had seen frostbite like that before. It looked like a broken leg too. Doubtless the man would never walk or write properly again. “You monster,” Maester Brenett gagged. “How… how could you?”

“This is justice.”

“This is barbarity.”

“I am Jon Snow. My brother was Robb Stark.” Jon’s eyes were dark. “He died in this castle, did he not? Murdered in defiance of guest right and the laws of men.”

“You monster,” the maester croaked, shuffling backwards. “Monster.”

“No. Vengeance for the Red Wedding.” Jon stood upwards. “Hatch, bring the man here a drink to calm his nerves. Tend to that leg. He has questions to answer.”

Brenett looked so scared he couldn’t even grip the bladder of water. Hatch had to force it down into his throat. Even afterwards, he was left a twitching mess. “How could you?” Brenett gasped, looking fearfully at Jon. “How could you kill so many?”

“Did you ask the same after the Red Wedding?” he replied coolly. “The Freys murdered my brother, maester.”

“What of the serving girls and stableboys?” Brenett demanded. “The innocents in the castle?”

“They died for the lord they served, and for the crimes they are accomplice to.”

“The Red Wedding,” the maester gagged. “I knew naught of the Red Wedding. No one told me until it happened, I had no part in it. Many who did know tried to object. For every one soldier in the castle that could be held accountable, there were ten stewards and servants that were just doing jobs, trying to provide for their families. Do you see those as murderers?” His voice cracked. “And what of the babes and widows? Did they murder your kin?”

Jon’s hand twitched, clutching Dark Sister. Maybe the maester caught his unease. “You killed them just the same,” he accused, voice breaking. “How many in the castle even survived?”

Not many. “Mind your tongue,” Hatch warned.

“Tell me who was in the castle,” Jon demanded. “Where was Lord Walder Frey?”

“In the hall. It was Edwyn’s nameday, there was a feast…” He trembled.

Then all the Freys in the Twins were dead. There had been no survivors from the hall. “What of guests? Was there anyone else in the castle?”

“Lord Tytos Blackwood and Lord Karyl Vance were being hosted,” the maester gasped, struggling to speak. “As were guests Ser Harys Haigh, Ser Marq Piper and Patrek Mallister. And Tristan Ryger.”

They were? Blackwood, Vance and Mallister had both been Robb’s allies. Loyal allies. Jon twitched. ‘Hosted’ – a polite term for hostages. “Who else? What of Frey allies?”

“Ser Harys Huigh, and his son Donnel Huigh. Ser Theon Charlton. Ser Daven Lannister was present – he was to be betrothed to Walda Frey.” Lannister. The maester must have seen Jon’s expression change. “Ser Daven was named Warden of the West. Cousin to the Queen. Ser Jaime Lannister had been here over a fortnight passed before marching to break the siege of Raventree. And Tytos Marbrand stayed to squire for Ser Arwood.” The maester quaked. “Hoster Blackwood and Jayne Bracken lingered before heading down to the King’s Landing. They were children.”

The Freys had been sitting themselves up as the most influential house in the Riverlands, Jon realised. They had been taking hostages from other houses who had been forced to bend the knee. Hostages.

The maester’s eyes were wide. “Oh Gods… and Roslin Tully,” he gasped. “Her babe.”

Jon’s hands clenched so tight they hurt. “Roslin Tully.” Formerly Roslin Frey, he realised.

“The woman that Edmure Tully married. She was staying in the West Tower. She was pregnant.”

Jon looked. There was no West Tower anymore. Somewhere in the rubble maybe there was a body of pregnant woman. How could he know? What can I do about it?
Deep breaths. Focus. But she had been pregnant. With the child of Edmure Tully, my brother’s family.

“Prisoners?” Jon said urgently. Loyal Stark prisoners. “Where? Where were they being held?”

Brenett gave him directions to the dungeons, the entrance of which was under the causeway. Jon ordered Toregg to go investigate. The man came back fairly quickly and shook his head. The dungeons had been completely collapsed. Unlikely to be any survivors. He ordered him to try and clear the rubble nevertheless.

Jon could have screamed. “These prisoners,” he demanded. “How many were there? Who?”

“Two dozen or so,” Brenett said nervously. “The crown ordered us to surrender them to King’s Landing, but Lord Frey refused. He kept them in the castle. They were from either the north or the riverlands. Um, there was Lynel, no, Lyndel Westerly, um… a son from House Ryswell, and…”

The maester shook his head. “No, Lord Umber, Robin Flint and Ser Wylis Manderly were moved a month passed. There was to be a trade of hostages in the north and they left for Winterfell escorted by Black Walder, but their caravan was ambushed by the crannogmen in the Neck. Lord Frey was furious, yet the prisoner went missing.”

So Lord Umber hadn’t been in the castle. Oh gods, small mercies. If I had actually murdered Lord Umber…

There had been hostages and prisoners. Of course there had been prisoners.

This is vengeance, Jon tried to tell himself. The men who murdered my family are dead. The Red Wedding had been avenged. The Freys are destroyed, the Lannisters and the Boltons have lost their major ally. There are casualties, yes, but there is no way to save everyone, and this is vengeance.

He stared around at the bodies and the ruined castle. If this was vengeance, then he didn’t like how it tasted.

So, so many dead.

How did Aegon feel after torching Harrenhal? Jon wondered. Did he feel victorious, or was he left shaken by so many dead? Did Aegon ever torch another castle the same way again?

He spent the next hour questioning Maester Brenett. How many men had there been in the castle? Where were their allies? Who ruled the riverlands? What was happening in King’s Landing?

The answers came quickly. The main force of the Freys had either left north with the Boltons or went west with Jaime Lannister's host to Raventree. They had then been summoned south to deal with an invasion of sellswords, but many men had lingered to hunt down the outlaws plaguing the riverlands. Ser Jaime Lannister was said to have vanished after being captured by the Brotherhood-without-Banners. Lord Petyr Baelish was supposedly Lord Paramount of the riverlands, yet Riverrun was held by Emmon Frey and his wife Genna Lannister.

The Golden Company under Jon Connington and Tyrion Lannister was said to have taken Griffin’s Roost, and there had been a schism in King’s Landing after the High Septon declared Queen Cersei unholy. It was either a power grab by the Faith to topple the government, or a cry for justice for the Queen’s crimes, depending on who was believed.

Euron Crow’s Eye was said to be readying to assault Oldtown, and the Golden Company was marching from the stormlands. There were revolts from smallfolk all around the crownlands, and the Tyrells and Lannisters were at each other's throats. Stannis Baratheon was waging war from Dragonstone with a series of raids and skirmishes. The most recent news said that Stannis had seized Claw Isle.

Ser Kevan Lannister and Lord Mace Tyrell were trying to contain the unrest in King’s Landing, while the city was locked in a power struggle. Rumours said that Queen Margaery Tyrell was being held hostage, either by the High Septon or Queen Cersei, but details were foggy. The Lannisters face enemies on every front; Ser Jaime had vanished, Queen Cersei was said to be going mad, and Tyrion was leading an invasion against the realm. Ser Davan had been trying to regather forces in the riverlands and from the west, but now he was dead too.

From the maester’s words, it seemed like the whole realm was collapsing in on itself. A power struggle in the capital, reavers in the Reach, mercenaries from the south, bandits in the riverlands and even the Vale was said to be suffering some leadership strife.

The War of Five Kings was over, but it had left the realm so, so unstable. It gave Jon much to think on, head still spinning.

Jon listened for as long as he could, before passing the maester over to Furs to continue the interrogation. He gave orders to collect as many letters and correspondence as salvageable, and pass them over to Sam. The maester was a wailing mess as Jon limped away.

He heard activity from the building. Gerrick, Maris and Urwen had finally evacuated the ruins of the vault beneath the keep. Jon glimpsed gold bullions being hoisted into sheepskin sacks. The Twins had a lot of wealth in them – they had been wealthy and in a good position. Well-paid for their services. The wildlings would steal it all.

“King!” Haldur shouted from the ruins of the crumbling curtain wall. The man had his weirwood bow notched and poised, not even turning his head from the scene. “We’ve got men poking around out front, by the trees.”

“How many?”

“Fifty or so, I think. Maybe more coming.”

“Can you hold them back?” Jon demanded, limping forward. The gates and wall were ruined – they couldn’t stand siege in this castle.

Harle, Bullden and Eryn all had bows drawn too. There were only four archers standing guard on the walls, but they were all very good.

“Oh aye. For now. They seem awfully scared.” His bowstring pulled back a little bit further. “But sooner or later they’ll want to come back to this castle. We’d be good making ourselves scarce.”

“Aye. I’ll call Sonagon back.” Jon turned to stare out over the steaming ruins of stone. We have to get out of here. “Gather what you can and prepare to leave.”

Jon didn’t meet Sam’s eyes. The feel of death seemed to linger over the castle. Perhaps they could have pillaged the west castle of the Twins too, but there was no chance since the bridge was
It took Jon a long time to centre himself enough to reach out to Sonagon. He felt the dragon flying happily over the river, idly chasing down horses. Like a well-fed cat toying with mice. Sonagon responded quickly to Jon’s call.

“Oi,” Dark Gerrick called over to him. The hard warrior wore the necklaces and expensive lady’s jewellery he had pillaged from the chambers, wearing silk and silver draped over boiled leather. “Why stop now? There are other castles around here, aren’t there? I don’t think your dragon is tired yet. Why not bring down a few more too?”

Jon’s fists clenched. The thought of the man crawling with frozen legs flashed before his eyes. “No,” he said icily. “This is enough.”

As soon as Sonagon appeared over in the sky, Jon heard the men in the forest screaming and scattering for cover. Haldur and the others launched shafts at them as they fled.

The sight of Sonagon sent some of the prisoners into a frenzied panic. Hatch had to kill three of them before they finally fell back. Sonagon dropped slowly into the courtyard, sniffing at the ruins. “Load up anything we’re taking. Get ready to move quickly!” He shouted.

Maester Brenett was still wailing. The wildlings loaded up their plunder, as Sonagon sniffed and rummaged. “Maester,” Jon said, approaching. “I want to you write a letter for me.”

The maester didn’t reply. He didn’t even look up from the ground. “You will write that for the breaching the laws of men, for treason and breaking guest right, for murder and kinslaying,” Jon said, “that the Freys of the Crossing faced the highest punishment. Their lands are razed, their lord is dead. The guilty are punished. Write that I will see justice for the all crimes committed against my family.” Jon knelt downwards by the old man. “Write the letter, maester, and sign it King Jon Snow, King-Beyond-the-Wall and in the North.”

It took a bit of coaching before he actually wrote it. Only one of Brenett’s hands could even clutch a quill. The handwriting was horrible and shaky, but the message was short. There were no ravens left, but Jon ordered the maester to keep a hold of it and pass it on to whomever came to rescue them. All of the prisoners were to be left unharmed when they flew away.

There was no hesitation in Jon’s voice. He couldn’t afford any sign of weakness, not here, not now. This is right, he told himself. These men were my enemies, and this is a good tactical decision.

Still, it didn’t feel like it. The sound of wailing women echoed around the frozen ruins.

One of their prisoners – barely more than a boy, actually – tried to lunge at Jon with a pitchfork as he moved to leave. He was a brave boy, to attempt to assassinate him so boldly. Furs intercepted him, though, and knocked him easily to the floor. It took several spear thrusts before the boy was finally dead. Jon didn’t say a word.

It was approaching dusk by the time they were mounted on Sonagon and ready to leave. As Sonagon burst upwards into the sky, Jon saw a land in pure panic. Behind him, the wildlings were cheering. The ruins of the two castles were still steaming gently in the faint sun.

I was so, so angry. He didn’t feel angry anymore, just hollow. I have my vengeance, but my brother is still dead.

They couldn’t safely fly at night, so they had to stop around the coast as they had done the previous night. Sonagon could smell an early winter storm brewing up north. The grassy plains were deserted, but as they made camp, Jon ordered everyone to stay alert.

“They may well be riders following us,” Jon ordered. “They can’t beat Sonagon in battle, but they may try to ambush us while the dragon is asleep. Everyone stays alert.”

There were wary mutters. They were all tired and weary, but the tension kept them alert. There had been few injuries – Eryn took a cut across the waist from a man’s broken sword, and Harle had some nasty scalds from getting too close to Sonagon’s frostfire. There were many bruises from bouncing and holding onto Sonagon’s back, but one of the most vocal injuries came from Sam tripping and spraining his ankle.

Night fell. The watch fires burned over the cold, grassy knolls. He had spotted the rocky coast to the east. “Where are we?” Grenn asked finally.

“Between the Neck and the Bite, I think,” Jon replied. “That’d be the waters leading to the White Knife over in that direction. Moat Cailin to the west or northwest, maybe thirty leagues.”

“Moat Cailin,” Furs repeated. “Those Boltons hold that place, yes? They’re enemies too?”

Aye,” Jon nodded.

“Better put scouts on those hills over there, then,” Black Maris advised. “With no torches lit, but to give a bit earlier warning if anyone approaches.” Jon agreed, and Maris and Haldur both went to take positions watching south and west.

“Then let’s see if they’re brave enough to charge against a dragon,” Hatch barked. Sonagon was a huge coiled white shape snoozing against the hills.

“They’re all enemies here,” Dark Gerrick insisted. He had his longsword cradled in his grasp. “Let’s start with this Moat Cailin place. We torch that castle by dragon too.”

“No,” he said sharply.

“Why not? We got good plunder from that place, and they didn’t stand a chance.”

“We won’t survive long if we treat everyone as our foes.” So many dead. “We find someone to treat with.”

“You mean to ally?” Furs’ eyes narrowed.

“But why should we treat at all?” Gerrick grunted. “We have a dragon.”

Jon turned to Furs. “If the realm really is as unstable as the maester said it was, then we need allies. There may be a chance,” he said. “The Freys weren’t well-liked. Maybe in destroying them we might make ourselves some friends.”

“Who?”

“I don’t know,” Jon admitted. He felt so, so tired – emotionally and physically. “Give me time to think.”

He said that they could sleep in turns, but nobody even tried to rest. The camp felt restless.

“We don’t have long,” Eryn warned. He was a short man, lean, with a worn face and quiet and soft voice. A sailor’s slender dirk cradled in his hand. “The weather is getting cold and it’s a long and dangerous flight back north. We aren’t a vulnerable target here with the dragon, but we are an exposed one. We could use shelter.”

“… Um…” Sam gulped, and spoke up hesitantly. “What of Greywater Watch?”

Jon frowned. “House Reed?”

“It’s not far,” Sam offered. “And the… the maester said that crannogmen are opposing the Freys and Boltons. Maybe they could shelter us?”

“Or maybe they could try to trap us,” Bullden warned. “How would we know what they’ll do?”

“Maybe,” Jon admitted. “Yet the weather is getting cold and it’s a long and dangerous flight back north. And we sorely need an alliance.” He stopped, trying to think of the maps he saw. “Sam, who else is around here?”

His mouth floundered slightly. “Moat Cailin is the closest. The kingsroad to the west,” Sam said. “Oldcastle across the water to the east, White Harbour to the northeast. Or the Three Sisters if we fly across the Bite.”

_I know of those names, but I know little of the men who live there_, Jon cursed. They were all foreign places to the wildlings too. The idea of approaching a noble house for an alliance was tempting, but if he made the wrong choice then they could all be in danger.

“White Harbour,” Jon said. He remembered the fat Lord Manderly. “White Harbour is the biggest city in the north.”

Sam looked pained. “The maester said that Lord Manderly was to marry his granddaughters to Rhaegar and Walder Frey.”

“Then we run out of options that would help us.”

It was past the hour of the wolf. Hatch, Gerrick and Bullden argued that they should fly against Moat Cailin. Jon was more tempted to head south to Greywater Watch, if not for the possibility of meeting forces coming from the south. The torches crackled in the darkness as the hard wind swept over the plains.

He heard a horn blow echo. His turned south, but then he realised it was coming from north. Black Maris’ alert cried over the dark hills.

“We got riders,” Harle shouted suddenly. He already had longbow in hand.

They were exposed on the plains, but they could see anyone approach easily too. Jon quietly prodded Sonagon as his hand went to his sword. “How many?”

“Two dozen mounted men.”

Jon spotted the torches too. They were coming from the north. Jon could see spears and lances. Furs grinned. “Well, you think they can match a dragon?”

Two dozen riders, all well-armed. The Dragonguard reacted quickly. They quenched their fires to hide in the darkness, drawing bows or taking cover behind the dragon. Sonagon stirred, nostrils sniffing, but Jon restrained him. Furs was right – the dragon had little to fear from so few men in an open fight.

“We take their horses,” Jon decided. Sonagon was too awkward to mount easily, good steads would be useful. “Give them a chance to surrender, but be ready.”

With a gentle prod, Sonagon lumbered upwards, growling and sniffing irritably. They must were able to see the dragon, but they didn’t stop. Brave men, Jon thought quietly.

Furs must have had similar thoughts. The riders were coming in too slowly, too obviously. “If this is an ambush, then they’re doing a crap job of it.”

“Aye,” Jon agreed. “But don’t relax.”

They were all in position when the riders stopped, fifty feet away. Their horses shimmied as the dragon loomed over them. Most of the riders lingered backwards, but three of them broke off to approach. They had to force their scared horses to trot forward towards the shadow of the dragon. Don’t attack, Jon thought, pushing to the dragon. Not yet. Sonagon snorted, breathing a gust of steam.

“Identify yourself!” Hatch bellowed. “Who do you serve?”

The riders didn’t move. They’re not here to attack. The men looked terrified, staring between Sonagon, the wildlings and Jon. “We hail from White Harbour,” the man at the front shouted back. “King Snow! Lord Manderly would treat with you.”

Notes

Dragonguard of King Jon Snow:

- Furs of Old Mother’s Crock
- Hatch the Halfgiant
- Haldur Two-Notch
- Toregg, son of Tormund Giantsbane
- Bulden Horn, unicorn hunter
- Stiga of Thenn
- Urwen Rockfist
- Gregg Sheepstealer
- Mo
- Harle the Huntsman
- Black Maris
- Eryn, son of Alvin Whaletooth
- Dark Gerwick, seventh son of Old Man Harwick
- Harlow
- Grenn, of the Night’s Watch
Chapter 26

The Queen of Love and Beauty

Lances clashed like lightning. The sound of horse’s hooves clattered like lances. The crowd cheered as once more the wooden lances snapped against each other.

“Well struck!” Lord Gilwood Hunter cheered. “Oh well struck, well struck indeed!”

“They are both very gallant, my lord,” Alayne agreed. Despite herself, she could stop her heart from beating faster as the horses toured the tilts. Both riders were noble and dashing figures. Every highborn maiden must be swooning right now.

And yet I am betrothed to one of them, Alayne thought. And the other carries my favour. I think I chose well between them.

Both Ser Harrold Hardyng and Ser Roland Waywood motioned toward her as they passed. Ser Roland Waynwood pressed his hand to the sewn falcon handkerchief on his breastplate, which seemed only to make Ser Harrold more determined to beat the older knight.

Harry the Heir was fostered at House Waynwood, she thought. They were distant cousins, but Alayne could see something of a brotherly rivalry between them. Ser Roland was taller, with an easier laugh and more prone to teasing comments. Ser Harrold was stiffer, stockier built, and sullener, yet he also seemed far more focused and determined.

Four nights ago, after dancing and flirting with Ser Harrold, Alayne had given her favour to Ser Roland. The knight had been teasing Ser Harrold relentlessly ever since, all the way until they were the final two contenders. They’re not competing for the tourney of the Winged Knights anymore, Alayne thought with a smile, they are competing over me.

“Our Harry is the simple sort,” she remembered Littlefinger saying, “he enjoys comely women and jousting. He always wants what he can’t have, and he loves fighting for it. Make it difficult for him and he will follow you to the end of the earth.”

Ser Harrold is going to win this, she thought quietly. Ser Roland seemed to have the advantage in the first tilt, but since then he had been riding more and more unsteadily, while Ser Harrold only seemed to get stronger.

If he wins, he will crown me as queen of love and beauty, I know he will, Alayne thought. She had seen the wreath of white roses that would be handed to the victor. He will place the laurels on my lap and it will be just perfect. The Vale will toast us, and later we will be betrothed.

Alayne sat in the lord’s booth, below her father’s empty seat. The most powerful lords in the Vale were all around her, watching intently. Myranda Royce sat by her side, bouncing in excitement.

She tried desperately not to think of the last tourney she attended, a lifetime ago at King’s Landing. Her fath… the Hand’s tourney. She had been a different person then, but something of that old excitement and wonder started to creep through.

“He is very good,” Randa whispered with a smile. “Ser Roland is seven years his elder and many times more experienced. But Harry the Heir rides well.”

“Indeed, not quite a jumped-up squire,” Alayne said lowly. Harry the Arse, Lothor Brune called him when they first met. When they first met, he had been rude, dour and aggressive. Yet ever since that unpleasant introduction he has been the perfect gentlemen, she added to herself.

“It’s always nice to see a man who can handle a lance,” Randa whispered.

“Oh hush.”

She gave a teasing smile. Randa is wearing a very tight corset, Alayne noticed. She displayed more cleavage than was strictly decent, particularly considering the cool air. Alayne knew that Randa had been flirting with Ser Roland before the tilt as well. She japed, but perhaps Randa hoped to be named queen of love and beauty if Ser Roland won. Alayne doubted it would happen – Ser Roland was likely to name Alayne as well.

“What is the reward for the victor?” Randa asked.

“A thousand gold dragons,” she replied. To the last of the sixty-four noble knights. “And admiration of the Vale.”

“I believe they both care more about the admiration.”

Indeed. The eight members of the Brotherhood of the Winged Knights had already been selected from the semi-finalists. Ser Harrold Hardyng, Ser Roland Waynwood, Ser Andar Royce, Ben Colderwater Ser Andrew Tollet, Ser Edmund Breakstone, Ser Elbert Belmore and Ser Osgood Upcliff had all qualified to the order. Ser Mychel Redfort had been a strong hopeful, but he lost the final place to the surprisingly skilled Ser Osgood Upcliff. Nobody had expected Ser Harrold to go so far either, considering his youth and newly minted spurs, but the young heir had a series of good tilts all the way up to the final.

The knights clashed again. The crowd was in arms as Ser Roland swayed dangerously from the broken spear against his shield. He was having difficulty with his horse.

“Your lord father is missing quite the bout,” Lord Gilwood noted, as he clapped.

Yes, and that is queer. Petyr had been so very busy recently. “Six broken lances so far!” Lady Waynwood said, clapping for both her grandson and her ward. “Soon we will need to judge it.”

“Yes,” Lord Yohn Royce rumbled. The Lord of Runestone had a face lined and carved like stone, and a booming voice. “Should we search out our Lord Protector?”

There was just a bit of bitterness with how he said the title. “Forgive him, my lords, but my father has been quite under the weather recently,” she lied. She turned to Lord Nestor Royce. “But Lord Royce, as our host here I am sure there will be no objections if you would make the judgement, if it comes to such.”

Lord Nestor looked surprised. “Indeed?” He looked around the box and no one objected. “What of it, Lord Robert, may I?”

Her Sweetrobin was the only who wasn’t looking at the tilts. Lord Robert Arryn had the largest chair in the lord’s stands, yet he was curled up on it with his back turned, trying to hide from the crowd and the tourney. Lord Petyr had to force the young lord to attend.

“Sweetrobin,” Alayne chided, gently. “Lord Nestor is trying to talk to you, you mustn’t be rude.”

“Tell him to go away,” the boy muttered, under his breath. Alayne knew she was only allowed to sit alongside the high lords because she was the only one Sweetrobin could talk to. “I don’t want “Hush now,” she soothed, with a smile. She softly stroked his hair. “They’re fighting for you. Your Brotherhood of the Winged Knights, your loyal protectors.”

“Not him,” Sweetrobin muttered, with a fearful motion towards Ser Harrold. “He wears a falcon on his shield. He’s not a falcon, I am.”

“It’s okay, Ser Harrold is your cousin. He will be your protector too, a loyal knight.”

“He’s not. He’s just waiting for me to die.” The boy sounded scared, quivering as he clutched his throne. “They all are. They think I don’t know, but I do. They all want him to be lord, not me. He wants my castle.”

That is not strictly untrue, Alayne thought with a sad, sweet smile. He is a delicate thing.

There was a break after the seventh broken lance. Ser Roland’s horse lost a shoe and he needed a replacement. Lord Nestor decided to allow them an eighth and final tilt, before making a judgement.

The anticipation was horrible. How long does it take to find another horse? she thought impatiently.

“I don’t want any of them near me;” Sweetrobin muttered. He constantly stared at Ser Harrold. “Send them all away, I don’t want them. Take me back to the Eyrie.”

“Hush now, Sweetrobin. Just enjoy the tilt.”

“I won’t, I—” She put a finger on his lips. He was quivering.

“This is the final tilt, my lord.”

“I don’t want them!” Lord Robert wailed. The sound caused all the lords to turn to stare. “Send them all away! I am Lord of the Eyrie, I command everyone to get out!”

There were mutters behind her. He’s in one of his moods again. Gods, where is Petyr?

“Forgive me, my lords, I fear Lord Robert is quite tired,” Alayne said apologetically. She stroked his fingers reassuringly.

“I want everyone out!” There were tears in Sweetrobin’s eyes. “I don’t like that Harry, I want him gone! Make him fly! Make him fly!”

Curses, he’s likely to scream at Ser Harrold when he wins. I can’t let there be a scene. “Ser Byron, Ser Morgarth,” Alayne called to knights. “Please, take Lord Arryn back to his chambers. Fetch Maester Colemon to tend to him.”

Normally, Alayne would have left with him to soothe him, but she couldn’t leave her seat. Not when she could be named her queen of love and beauty so shortly. She didn’t miss the look in the lords’ eyes while their liege lord was carried out of the stands, though. Lord Robert was not the lord the Vale wanted.

The crowds cheered as Ser Harrold and Ser Roland rode onto the tilt yard once more. Ser Roland had switched to a grey charger. “Harry the Heir!” the crowds boomed. “Harry! Harry! Harry the Heir!”
I hope Sweetrobin does not hear this, she thought, but it was fleeting worry. The two jousters galloped. Alayne was on her feet, cheering. Both horses sprinted full force, both lances leaned in hard…

And then Ser Roland crashed downwards off his horse. There was a moment of worry, but squires rushed to the knight’s side, and then the call came that he was unhurt.

The crowd went wild. Ser Harrold dropped his lance and shield, raising his hands above his head. They were chanting his name. The Young Falcon, they called him, and Alayne couldn’t fault them. He looked every inch the part – handsome, strong, with sweat across his forehead and shining armour.

Ser Harrold rode a lap of the tilt before coming before the stand. Alayne’s heart was in her mouth as he stopped before her, bowed, with a wreath of white roses in his hands.

She couldn’t stop the giggle, or the blush. Harrold’s deep blue eyes shone brightly, dimples in his cheeks as he laughed.

Strong hands placed the crown of roses over her head. There she was, bastard-daughter, yet the envy of every highborn maiden in the Vale. Ser Harrold had eyes only for her even as Lord Nestor declared him the champion.

She gives him a coy smile, eyes twinkling. Randa was giggling besides her. Lady Waynwood smiled at her brightly as she clapped.

The excitement didn’t fade. Even as Ser Harrold was played away to dismount and clean, Alayne’s heart was skipping. Every maiden was cowing around her, gushing at the sight of the crown of roses.

There will be a feast, she thought. A celebration. Ser Harrold will be the champion and I will be by his side. All eight of the finalists will receive their silver wings, and blue cloaks bearing the Arryn coat of arms. The eight members of the Brotherhood of the Winged Knights would walk proud for the next three years, as the Lord of the Vale’s personal kingsguard.

The closing feast wasn’t as lavish and extravagant as the opening feast had been, but somehow it felt even more exciting. Ser Harrold was surrounded by crowds of knights and squires, and Arbor Gold was served by the casket. Even before the feast began, she saw Ser Harrold celebrating with his first bottle.

Ser Shadrich, Ser Jorah and Ser Lothor Brune escorted her back to the Gates of the Moon. Still she heard young knights laughing and toasting by the tilts. Ser Jorah walked stiffly, but Ser Shadrich was smiling.

“They were all very skilled, weren’t they?” Alayne laughed. “Sixty-four of the finest knights in the Vale, and those eight proved the champions.”

“Skilled?” Ser Shadrich laughed. “I wouldn’t say that. When it comes to jousting, skill matters less than the length of your arm, in my experience.”

Alayne blinked. Ser Shadrich was a wiry, short, sharp-faced man with a brush of orange hair. “Why do you say that, ser?”

“Well, if you have two men with lances charging against each other, it’s always the one who has the longest arms that hits his opponent first,” Ser Shadrich said with a smirk. “What does skill matter, when your reach decides the battle? Take a look at your champions, my lady. They’re tall.
Every one of them. Do you think that’s a coincidence, or that no short person can be skilled?”

Alayne laughed. Ser Shadrich was so short that he might have been taken for a boy, but his face belonged to a much older man. She saw long leagues in the wrinkles at the corner of his mouth, old battles in the scar beneath his ear, and a hardness behind the eyes that no boy would ever have. This was a man grown. “I fear you underestimate them, ser.”

“That would be an achievement,” he said with a laugh. “But mark my words. Length of the arm, that’s all it is. I am sure Ser Jorah here can attest to that.”

The older knight looked off-guard with being mentioned. “Excuse me?”

“The tourney at Lannisport, where you were declared the victor,” Ser Shadrich explained, with a smirk. “I give good odds that Ser Jorah here was simply the biggest of all his opponents.”

It was a jape, but there was a somewhat mocking edge to it as well. Ser Jorah was a big man, sure enough. “You jest, ser,” Alayne chided, but with a smile.

“And if size is all that matters,” Ser Jorah rumbled as they walked, “then why did I never win again after Lannisport? Did I become shorter?”

Ser Shadrich shrugged. “Perhaps everyone else started using longer lances instead?”

Ser Jorah scowled quietly. The big, bald knight stood nearly two feet taller than Ser Shadrich and twice as wide, but the smaller man still made jests.

“And if size is everything,” Alayne teased, “then why on earth would a mouse ever become a knight?”

“Oh, we mice have our place too. We are smaller targets, harder to hit.” Ser Shadrich smiled. “I imagine that the melee on the morn will have a different result. Ser Jorah, will you be competing?”

The big knight hesitated. His eyes glanced at Alayne, and then he said, “I think not, ser.”

“A shame. It could be a good contest. The best fighters prefer the melee to the joust.”

“I am sure it will be a grand spectacle,” Alayne smiled. They reached the keep doors. “But forgive me, sers, I must go find my lord father. I will be back down shortly for the feast.”

“As you will, my lady.” Ser Jorah lowered his head stiffly.

She was still smiling as she skipped – skipped – up the castle stairs. Alayne never touched the wreath of roses on her head. He chose me, she thought happily. Harry the Heir picked me. They would be betrothed soon, and then married. The whole Vale would cheer for her marriage. Ser Harrold Hardyng. Or maybe soon Lord Harrold Arryn.

Soon, she could be Lady of the Vale, just like Petyr planned.

And then maybe Winterfell… Alayne’s heart hurt at the thought. No, don’t think about Winterfell.

She heard voices approaching Littlefinger’s solar. Annoyed voices. “–ween ten and fifteen thousand,” a man’s voice grumbled. “With Dorne gathering swords they could easily reach thirty-five thousand.”

“And yet the Tyrell forces stand at forty thousand,” said another voice. A deep voice, with something of a lisp. “Perhaps five thousand from crownlands and riverlands. Potentially another ten from the westerlands.’

“No.” That was Petyr’s voice. “War is not maths, numbers only go so far.” He paused, thinking. “What of the Faith Militant? How many, and which side of the coin will they answer to?” “Who can say? Can you count the number of smallfolk with pitchforks?” a voice scoffed. “Easily thousands, and hundreds of Warrior’s Sons. I’d wager there could be a riot of tens of thousands any day now.”

“It’s not enough. Best numbers say that Aegon leads eight thousand against King’s Landing. Part of their forces have split, and another three thousand are heading west.”

“Then they are to fight armies several times their size,” the other man in the room protested. He sounded younger than the other, his voice more high-pitched. “And three thousand sellswords against Casterly Rock? Is the Imp a fool?”

Alayne’s heart pounded. “The Imp is many things, but rarely foolish. Ambitious, though,” Petyr noted. “And I would not count the Golden Company out yet. They have other allies that have yet to show their hand.”

“The crown demands the Vale start mustering men,” one of them protested. “And the Vale lords are eager to do so. It will be rebellion if we refuse any longer.”

“We need not defy, just… delay,” Petyr muttered. “For just a touch. Let us give it a bit of time for the pieces to fall as they may. Very soon the stalemate around our dear Queen will …” his voice trailed off. Petyr glanced to where she was standing at the doorway. “Ah, excuse me gentlemen.” Petyr very quickly walked towards her, and closed the door before she could glimpse inside. “My dear Alayne. I do apologise, sweet thing, my business has run over.”

Littlefinger looked tired. There were bags under his eyes like he wasn’t sleeping. She was well-used to Petyr running from one meeting to the next, but recently it seemed like he rarely stopped. “I heard the Imp. Tyrion Lannister,” she said, her voice a whisper. “How… where…?”

“Nothing to worry about,” Petyr soothed. “But it seems that Tyrion may well be losing his head soon enough. How did the tourney fare?”

When Tyrion Lannister dies, I could be married again. “Um, Ser Harrold was victorious.”

“Marvellous.” He smirked. “And how did Ser Roland fare?”

Alayne blinked. Something about the question… “His horse lost a shoe.”

“Such a shame.” But he didn’t sound surprised.

“Indeed.” I wonder, did Lothor Brune or Oswell spend some time near the stables this morning? She wondered suspiciously. And when the brackets were drawn, Ser Harrold did end up with fewer matches than anybody. The length of the arm.

“You I am sure our Harry is celebrating. Do celebrate with him; this is an opportunity, sweet Alayne. A good chance to secure Ser Harrold’s favour.”

“It…” She hesitated. He seemed off. The smile was less smooth than it usually was. “Father, is everything ok?”
“It is indeed. Very well, in fact, except we may have to move a bit faster than intended. Timeframes must be moved up.”

“Why?”

He gave her a reassuring smile, caressing her cheek. “It seems the lord of the Vale are eager for war, and I cannot deny them any longer. Soon our armies will be gathering, and when they do I expect to see Ser Harrold Hardyng at the very front. I would like to see you wed before that happens.”

“But… but the betrothal…?”

“Can be accelerated,” Petyr promised. “I imagine that Harry will be quite eager to. You need only be your beautiful, charming self, Alayne. You are the queen of love and beauty tonight,” he said with a soft stroke of her forehead, brushing at the wreath on her head. “There are none in that hall a higher status than you. Dance with your champion and there are none who could take you away from him. Wrap him around your little finger and how could he resist?”

“I thought Lady Waynwood wanted the betrothal to wait.”

“She did,” Littlefinger said with a nod. “But if Harry insists, then we can make it happen sooner. Dance with the boy, drink and laugh with him. Later in the night, spend some private time alone with your betrothed. Entrance him like I know you will.”

There was a flicker in Littlefinger’s eyes. Something she could not quite place, but then he smiled again. A soft, gentle, nearly wistful smile. This is what I wanted, Alayne thought. A handsome, young and gallant knight to marry. She nodded. “Yes, father,” she nodded. “I will.”

“That’s my girl.” Petyr smiled. He kissed her on the lips as she turned to leave.

The celebration in the hall of the castle was already underway. She heard laughter, music and singing. Sweetrobin could not abide singing ever since Marillion, but it seemed that nobody cared.

“Off to Gulltown to see the fair maid, heigh-ho, heigh-ho,” the singers cried. “I’ll steal a sweet kiss with the point of my blade, heigh-ho, heigh-ho. I’ll make her my love and we’ll rest in the shade, heigh-ho, heigh-ho.”

“Off to Gulltown”, she thought. It was a bawdy song to sing in a noble castle, but this was a celebration. “Alayne!” She heard Ser Harrold shout. His face lit up as soon as he saw her. “Alayne… my lady.”

He lowered his head. His cheeks were flushed. She grinned. “Good ser,” she said, with a low curtsy. Ser Harrold laughed and took her by the arm.

The whole hall was in good cheer. She saw Randa dancing with Ser Roland, and Ser Lothor dancing stiffly with Mya Stone. Wine was flowing, and for once Alayne partook in it. Sweetrobin will be calmed and put to sleep by the maester, she thought, tonight is for Ser Harry the Heir, first of the Brotherhood of the Winged Knights.

“You are beautiful,” Ser Harrold whispered in her ear. “My queen…”

She didn’t reply, but she grinned and she stood up to dance again. Ser Harrold shared a toast with every knight who passed, celebrating his victory.
As they danced, she felt his hand slide against her bosom. He had soft hands. She didn’t react, but she didn’t move away either. Tease him a little, she thought. Just like Petyr taught her to.

The celebration lasted until late. Many of the older men retired early, but the younger knights and squires remained, content with their music and drink. Lord Petyr apparently gave instructions to let the merriment happen.

It was black outside – the hour of the bat or later – before finally the singers started to retire. Ser Harrold greeted, drunk with and laughed with half a hundred people, but he only ever danced with her. “My lady,” a voice called. “It is late. Allow us to escort you to your chambers.”

She turned, to see Ser Jorah standing there. The large knight seemed so grim-faced and stiff amidst all the merriment. He looked at her with narrowed eyes. “A bit longer, good ser,” Alayne laughed. The wine made her giggle.

Ser Harrold grabbed her hand as she made to walk away. She giggled, biting her lip. “Don’t go,” he begged into her ear. “I don’t want the night to end.”

The laughter burst from her throat. He nuzzled into her hair and pressing against her neck. He had soft lips, and his breath caused her skin to tingle…

Ser Jorah stepped forward warningly, eyes angry. Alayne quickly pushed Ser Harrold backwards. “Forgive the good ser, Ser Jorah, he’s had quite too much to drink,” she said, before turning to Ser Harrold. “Ser Harrold Hardyng! You are being quite uncouth! You forget your manners.”

Still, her eyes were playful. Ser Harrold grinned brightly and she grinned too. “We must go now, my lady,” Ser Jorah ordered, strictly. “Your father would not want you up so late.”

“One of course, ser,” she said, curtsying again. Her head spun. “But first, to the chamber pots, please. I’m afraid I’ve had too much to drink as well.”

Ser Jorah walked behind her closely. He means to chaperone me to my room, she thought sourly. Still, he lingered in the corridor outside of the latrine, which gave her the chance a slip out down the other hallway. She glanced around, and then noticed Ser Shadrich sulking by a tapestry.

Alayne grinned. Ser Jorah was strict, but Ser Shadrich was often more playful. “Ser!” she called. “My lady.” He seemed surprised to see her. “Um, what are you doing here?”

“I was hoping to ask a favour of you, ser,” she said, with a smile. “I was hoping for more… private time with my betrothed.” Bewitch him, Petyr had said. “It is not proper, of course, for a young lady to be out at night, but… could you assist?”

He hesitated. “Private time?” He repeated.

She nodded. “I fear Ser Jorah is too zealous in his duty.”

Ser Shadrich smirked. “Yes, I think I could help,” he said. “Let Ser Jorah take you back to your room, my lady. Wait until you hear a knock on your door, and then count to a hundred before leaving. I’ll lure the guards away and clear the corridor for you. Take the servant’s exit to the wards, and the east stables will be deserted this time of night.”

Alayne grinned. “My gallant knight,” she said happily, before rushing back. Ser Jorah was just about to come look for her when she headed out.
Ser Harrold chased after her, to bid her goodnight. Ser Jorah had to try to push the knight away. Still, he allowed him a goodnight kiss, and when he bent forward to kiss her hand, she whispered, “The east stables. Tonight.”

There was no indication that he heard for a bit, but then he smiled brightly and looked at her with wide, bright blue eyes.

Alayne could have danced as she walked away. My gallant knight. There were two guards outside her quarters. Ser Jorah muttered something to her about her betrothed, but she didn’t catch it as she bid him goodnight and closed the door. She never undressed, she never even took off the wreath of white roses. Instead, she stood behind her door, and waited, hopefully.

She was about to give up hope when she heard footsteps outside. Her guards. Sure enough, there was a quiet knock on the door. She closed her eyes and counted to a hundred.

When she left, the corridor was deserted. She pulled on her shawl and walked quickly. She passed a few serving girls in the castle, but she walked with purpose and nobody questioned her. The castle was only just winding down from the celebration. There was movement around the main hall, but it left the postern door deserted.

The night’s air was chilly, but Alayne walked fast, excitedly. Dainty heels clipped against the cobbled stones as she rushed to the stables. Even in the dark, she recognised his outline instantly.

“My lady,” Ser Harry muttered, stepping forward.

“Good ser,” Alayne replied. There were no torches, she couldn’t make out his face, but she could smell his musk, feel his breath on her cheek, and his hand on her waist…

Something soft touched her lips. Ser Harrold was on her, pressing into her. Oh Gods… By the Maiden…

“You promised to be all the spice I want,” Ser Harrold muttered in her ear. The flirt she had said when they first danced.

“I did,” she whispered, so softly like any noise might break the mood.

The kiss was deep and tender. Alayne remembered the last kiss she received – the one from the Hound in the dark room with the bloodied cloak. This kiss felt nothing like that, Ser Harrold – Harry – felt nothing like the Hound.

She took a deep breath as the lips parted. He was breathing deeply too. Then, they kissed again, longer this time, deeper. Yes, she thought. This feels good.

She didn’t want it to end. The wine was thick on his breath, but he felt warm, strong, and tender. For a what seemed like a lifetime, there was nothing but him and his lips.

When Harry’s hands moved upwards to her breasts, she didn’t object. But then, slowly, when his fingers started to fumble with her dress and her neckline, she grasped his fingers and slowly moved his hands away, but kept kissing him.

His fingers came back again to her breasts shortly later. She giggled, but she had to hold his hands to stop him from trying to take her bosom out. “No, good ser,” she muttered chidingly. “Not tonight.”

They kissed. His lips were strong, forceful, but not unpleasant. She kept on hold of his hands, caressing his knuckles.

And then his grip slipped out of hers. His hand went for her inner thigh, and she jumped as she felt him grip at her groin. She slapped his fingers instinctively. “No, Ser Harrold,” Alayne warned. “No tonight. Not until we are wed.”

“My lady…” he muttered huskily. “You are my queen… my queen of love and beauty…”

“And until we are married, keep your hands to yourself,” she said, as she stroked his cheek.

“Are you sure?” Harry whispered. “I have good hands. They can do a lot of things these hands…”

He pressed her close and kissed her tightly, leaning her backwards. The kiss was good, but then she felt his hand sliding up her dress. “No, ser,” she said forcefully. “Not until we are wed.”

In the gloom, she saw him grin. Does he think I’m teasing? His hand didn’t leave her leg. It hovered upwards slowly, and she slapped it away.

And then, his body pressed into hers, forcing her backwards. She could have squealed, but then his lips were on her. She tried to object, but he was forceful. Suddenly, she could feel his fingers in her smallclothes, his hands fumbling at her lips.

“NO!” Alayne shouted. “No, don’t, don’t –”

Her voice turned muffled as forcefully kissed her. His body pressing against her so tight she could barely breathe. Harry was big, strong, solid. One hand between her legs, the other at her breasts. It didn’t feel good anymore – it felt like he was fumbling at her, pawing her body, fingers grasping and squeezing.

Alayne dug her fingernails into the back of his neck, scratching at him to stop, but that seemed only to egg him on further.

“It’s alright… It’s alright… it’s alright…” she heard him mutter. The stink of wine on his breath almost made her gag.

How much has he had to drink? she thought with panic. How drunk is he?

Pain. It hurt. Clumsy fingers at her most sensitive region. Fumbling. Squeezing. Tearing. A sharp cry broke her lips, panic swelling her body. She was twitching, thrashing, but he was just so strong…

She heard something rip. My smallclothes. He tore them off. She heard the clink of him fumbling with his belt. Taking off his breeches.

Alayne screamed. Suddenly, a great hand was over her mouth, clamping her shut. “Quiet,” Harry whispered into her ear, still kissing her cheek. “It feels good, but you must be quiet. They’ll hear us if you scream.”

She choked. Panic. Fear. Pain. Gasping for air, arms flailing, and suddenly he was lifting her upwards and dropping her to the ground. Sharp hay poked beneath her. Her dark hair falling loose, the wreath of roses toppling and falling over the stables.

“No… no… stop! Stop! Stop!” she protested, gasping for air. He either didn’t hear her, or didn’t care.
Her dress ripped. Her breasts spilled out of dress, hungry hands clawing at them. She would have kicked him, but he was between her legs, his body pressing down onto hers, so heavy it hurt.

_No, no, no… Can’t let him, don’t let this happen…_

There were tears down her cheeks. She could taste the salt. There was nothing but the black stables, and the thrashing and flailing bodies.

She felt aching pain from her nether regions from his hands. She gagged.

He had his breeches off. She couldn’t see it, but she could feel it. Between her legs, him grunting to position herself. He kissed her neck, mauling her like an animal, and all the while Alayne couldn’t even move, or breathe, or– “Ahem.” That single sound in the darkness felt like it shattered some spell. There was suddenly light in the stables. A lantern.

Ser Harrold shot upwards. There was a figure in the doorway. It was a boy’s figure, but the voice was of a man.

“It… It’s not what it looks like!” Ser Harrold protested, scrambling up. His cheeks were flushed, his breath panting. “We’re betrothed, _she_…!”

Alayne could only sob, barely able to breathe. She was crying. “Help…” she sputtered. “…Help…”

Ser Shadrich looked around the barn quietly. The small knight wore full armour, a long sword at his belt. His gaze was cool. “Ah,” he said. “Not what it looks like indeed.”

Ser Harrold flustered, drawing himself up. His pants were still half-down. “Listen to me, _hedge knight,_” he said sharply. He stood head shoulders above Ser Shadrich. “I am the _heir of the Vale._”

The knight paused. “Yes,” he agreed. “You are.”

One moment they were standing against each other, and the next Ser Shadrich had a dagger in his hand. Ser Shadrich lunged so fast Alayne couldn’t even process it. Then she heard Ser Harrold gag.

Ser Shadrich shoved him backwards, pinning him against the wall. He was small but strong and lithe. The dagger was in Ser Harrold throat. The younger man flailed, but Ser Shadrich pressed up close. Blood gushed as Ser Shadrich twisted the knife and cut downwards. Ser Harrold’s red cheeks drained quickly.

“_Short arms,_” she heard Ser Shadrich mutter. “They don’t have the reach, but they sure can draw a blade faster.”

He paused only to pull the dagger out of the corpse’s throat. Alayne’s jaw dropped, eyes widening.

She saw the crown of white rose, stomped on and splattered with blood.

Something heavy collided with her jaw. A gauntleted fist knocked her down.

The world went black.

She felt pain. Everything was spinning.
There was something being forced into her mouth. Ser Shadrich ripped off part of her torn dress, to make a gag.

“I am sorry about him, my lady,” Ser Shadrich said quietly. “I really cannot abide men who would treat women that way.”

The bloody dagger was at her throat. “Now, I don’t want to hurt you,” he warned, his voice a whispered. “But make a noise, and I cut your throat.”

The dagger’s blade glinted even in the gloom. She glimpsed a plain blade with a black and unadorned handle, but it felt so sharp. Alayne was gasping, and then his hand smothered her mouth.

She could only gasp. The panic shut down her lungs. What is happening? What is he doing?

Alayne heard him sling a heavy satchel over his shoulder. A knight’s travel satchel, packed and ready to go. He forced her upwards, and he was small but strong. “Forgive me, my lady,” he said. Ser Shadrich really did sound apologetic “But, pray tell, would you prefer Alayne or Sansa?”

How could he…? Why…?

He dragged her into the far section of the stables. She tried to run, but Ser Shadrich knocked her down, and lifted her physically off the floor with a quiet grunt. Alayne could barely even breathe as sharp metal – the gorget over his mail – dug into her stomach. A wordless cry of pain broke through her lips, yet Shadrich just cursed and yanked her hair violently.

She heard horses neighing. Ser Shadrich’s horse, a rangy chestnut courser, was already waiting for him saddled in the stables. With practiced ease, Ser Shadrich jumped onto the horse and dragged her kicking and screaming over his lap. He held the dagger in one hand and the reins with his other hand as he wrapped them around Alayne in a crude knot.

“Listen to me,” Ser Shadrich hissed into her ear. “I really don’t want to hurt you; the bounty is for you alive and whole, Sansa. But if need be, I’ll cut off your head alone and just apologise. So come willingly because you’ll die before I get caught.”

The bounty. Oh Gods, Cersei.

He kicked his horse into motion, a fast stride. Alayne tried to squirm, to slip off, but then the dagger pressed into her torso softly. The blade was sharp enough to draw a trickle of blood even without any force.

He’s trying to take me to Cersei, she realised in panic. Trying to steal me from the middle of a fortified castle filled with knights, from the most secure realm in the Seven Kingdoms.

The man is mad.

Behind her, she heard Ser Shadrich break the glass of his lantern and throw it into the hay of the stables. The flames sputtered and spread. It was the dead of night, past the hour of the wolf and he rode quickly. But there’ll be guards on the gates? Even at this time, there must be…?

He glanced at her, holding her close. “The guards have already been dealt with,” he promised. “And the gates are open for the tourney.”

“But you can’t…. you can’t…” Alayne stammered. “You’ll never get past the Bloody Gate, you’ll never get through the high road!”
He just smirked. The guardhouse was deserted. Ser Shadrich spurred his horse into a gallop.

She heard shouts behind her, but they were the wrong direction. Guards rushing to fight the fire in the stables, not stop the man stealing their lord’s daughter. Nobody even knows I’m not in my room, she realised with horror.

Before Alayne even knew what was happening, they were galloping out of the postern gate and the highroad. If anyone saw Shadrich galloping away, they never reacted in time. She screamed, but Shadrich just slammed a hand over her mouth while laughing maniacally.

Behind her, horns rang and voices yelled, but Ser Shadrich’s courser was fast and hardy.

The air was bitingly cold, so cold through her torn, flimsy dress that she could only shiver. They were out on the road, riding past the watchtowers. “No no no!” Alayne gasped, trying to thrash. The horse neighed as it galloped. “No, no, you ca–”

With an idle motion, Ser Shadrich brought the pommel of his dagger onto her head. There was a thud. Everything went black.

All of the pain, all of panic, and the fear and the emotion. Alayne couldn’t handle it, she just blacked out.

When her vision returned, she felt cold. Woozy. The earth was rocking and jerking. Snow on the forest ground, staring down as hooves struggled to push through. It was daylight, but still just as cold. He had wrapped a cloak around her. Shadrich was still riding, pushing his courser through uneven terrain. He wasn’t on the road, it was barely even a dirt path.

She was so dazed she couldn’t even protest. He’s going east, she realised slowly. He’s trying to slip through the forests and the Mountains of the Moon rather than the Bloody Gate. The panic was so thick she struggled to breathe.

It was noon before Ser Shadrich finally stopped. He paused only to allow his courser time to breathe, and to bind her wrists in thick rope.

Her blue wool dress was torn. If not for the cloak, she would have frozen. Her body was shivering, weak and sore. When she looked, she saw droplets of blood staining the inside of her thighs, and bruises across her breasts. Ser Harrold’s strong hands.

“He’s going east,” he offered her skin of water. “Drink up. It’ll be a long journey and you don’t want to lose your strength.”

“You can’t do this,” Alayne begged. “You won’t escape. Every knight in the realm will be looking for you. You killed the heir to the Vale and kidnapped their lord’s daughter. You’ll never escape.”

“Maybe. But I reckon they’ll be more likely to think that I’m going west or north rather than east. And the Vale is a big place, not even high lords can cover every mile of it.”

“The Vale of Arryn is impassable except for the high road, everyone knows that.”

“It’s impassable to an army,” he said with a shrug. “But one man can slip through the Mountains of Moon, if he’s strong and tough enough. I am the Mad Mouse, Lady Stark, I reckon I’m tough enough.”

“And what of the mountain clans?” She said fearfully.
“Well…” Ser Shadrich mused. “That’s more of a reason for you to keep quiet now, isn’t it?”

“This is suicidal, you cannot…”

“Maybe. Every battle is a bit of a suicide, if you think about it. In each battle, both sides rush forward to commit mutual suicide. It’s the mad ones that come to enjoy the rush.” He grinned. “And for your sake, don’t cause any trouble. If we are spotted by the mountain clans… well, at least I’ll get a quick death with a sword in my hand. You don’t even want to imagine the things that those savages will do to a sweet girl like you.”

He started moving again very quickly. Alayne didn’t even know where he was going – it was like he navigated the forest at random, keeping off the trails. Father will have sent search parties after me, she thought, there’ll be hundreds, thousands, looking for me. But Ser Shadrich moved fast and pushed his courser hard, all day with few stops.

“You worked for Littlefinger,” she mumbled as they rode. “You were hired for protection.”

“Not really. I was searching for you all the time,” Ser Shadrich explained. “I wasn’t sure that it was you in the Vale, but after the third week or so I was pretty convinced. It was the little things that gave you away, Sansa – like how you couldn’t describe anything about Gulltown despite claiming to be from there.” He smiled. “But even once I knew, I just had to be patient and wait for an opportunity. You gave me one last night so I helped myself to a few of your father’s valuables,” he motioned to his satchel with his dagger. “And set about my escape.”

“And Ser Harrold?” she whispered. The thought of her gallant knight pushing himself on top of her haunted her eyes. She could still smell the booze and horse manure in the stables, hear the grunts and gasps.

“Oh, he wasn’t planned,” Ser Shadrich admitted, sheepishly. “Truth be told, I probably made a mistake by killing him – that could well come back to bite me. Still, I just can’t stand seeing brutes who enjoying hurting women.”

“You’re kidnapping me.”

“That’s just money. I don’t want to hurt you.”

The snow thickened. They started to move over the mountains, and the forest became rocks and scattered spruce trees. Alayne felt so weak and disoriented that she faded in and out of consciousness, but Ser Shadrich barely even paused.

The cold winds swept over them all through the night. Her body trembled fiercely, and she had to hug to the horse to try and keep herself warm. Ser Shadrich ate in the saddle, from a pouch of dried bread and meat.

The next day, Ser Shadrich dismounted and pulled the saddlebags off the courser. She thought he was finally stopping for camp, but then he started walking, leaving his horse behind. “Come on,” he said, clutching the dagger. “Start walking.”

“What?”

“Would you prefer I left you here?” he said with laughter. “I leave you alone out here and you’d be dead long before anyone finds your body. Start walking, my lady. Here, you can carry these bags too.”

“What about the horse?”
No, the horse is too easy to track. Won’t make it much further over this terrain either. We go on foot from now on.”

He’s insane, she thought with horror, but he clutched the knife tightly. Short as he was, she knew she wouldn’t be able to overpower him. She was shivering, but he gave her a blanket as a cloak and ordered her to start walking. Her blue woollen dress was already ruined and ripped, her shoes falling apart. She had never felt so cold, or so weak.

“It is fifty leagues to the coast,” she muttered finally. “You expect to go that distance on foot? Through mountains?”

“Not really. We just need to go two leagues, towards the Oak Lake, where I’ve stashed a boat to take us down the river.” She looked at him. “What? Just because you’re mad doesn’t mean you need to be stupid. Now keep walking.”

She was shivering, but he refused to stop even when she started trembling. It was only late that night when he finally stopped for rest. Alayne was left pale and cold, while he nestled into a camp under a rock to keep them out of the wind.

She was hoping there might be a chance to steal his sword away from him, or even just the dagger, but instead he bound her wrists to a tree before closing his eyes, and slept with both sword and dagger tight in his grip.

Alayne was so weak that she couldn’t even protest. She was only given hard bread to break her fast. Shadrich stuffed his face with dried meat and gulped water, but he gave her very little. Starving me so I can’t resist.

The mountains were hard, steep and threatening. At one point, Shadrich had to hold her to push her forward through the fog and snow.

It took another day before she glimpsed Oak Lake in the distance. In the patchy morning light flickering through the clouds, the lake looked picturesque. The lake was fed by a dozen small streams running down the mountains, before breaking away into Oak River and leading out to the Narrow Sea. Iroquois and House Waynwood is not far from here, she thought. They’ll save me, they must.

“You won’t reach King’s Landing,” she muttered wearily. “Whatever boat you have will never get make it through open sea, much less around down the Blackwater. You’ll need to charter a ship in Gulltown, and Lord Baelish will spot you. Father owns Gulltown.”

‘Father,’ Ser Shadrich snorted. “Tell me something, has your ‘father’ fucked you yet?”

Her shoulders tensed. “He wants to fuck you, you know that yes?” Ser Shadrich laughed. “You think it’s normal the way he kisses you? Oh yes, I’ve seen that. The man you call father used to love your mother, and you look just like her, don’t you? You are his replacement, the copy of the woman he couldn’t get in his youth.”

“You’re wrong,” Alayne said, body stiffening. The man is a fiend.

“Sure,” Shadrich laughed. “Did he also tell you what happened in King’s Landing? Who do you think betrayed your real father? Who put a dagger – this dagger – to your old man’s neck?”

“You lie.”

“I do not. I heard it from a Spider.” His clear voice rang out, still pushing his way over the heavy snow. “Lord Baelish had your father killed, all so he could take the daughter and make her call him daddy. I’m not sure whether to be impressed or horrified.”

Her hands were shaking. He lies. Of course he lies.

Ser Shadrich smirked. “You’re nothing more than a game piece to him. He’d fuck you himself if he didn’t think he could make more money selling you to someone else. Why do you think your Ser Harrold forced himself on you like that?”

Alayne froze. “Oh the booze, sure,” Ser Shadrich continued. “But I’m guessing Littlefinger took you to one side and told you exactly how to entice him. Drink with him, take him alone? If I was a betting man, I’d say Littlefinger probably shared words with Harry as well. Maybe something like, ‘My daughter is really fond of you, and nobody would be too upset if you enjoyed some time with her’? Hint, hint.” He looked at her expression and laughed. “Come on, you’re a smart girl. Littlefinger wanted you married. What better way is there than arranging some leverage he could hold over Lady Waynwood, to make sure the marriage happens quickly? Maybe knock something off the dowry too?”

“No. You lie,” she muttered, shaking her head. “My father would never do that…”

“Who’s lying now? You know exactly the type of man your ‘father’ is.” He shook his head. There was something like sympathy in his eyes. “Now come on, keep walking.”

Alayne took a few nervous steps. “Listen,” he continued. “I know you probably don’t see it now, but this is a good thing for you. The absolute healthiest place you could be is away from Littlefinger. That man is more dangerous than anyone. I’m helping you here, believe me.”

“The Queen will have me killed,” she said with a gulp, trying to shamble over the rocks. Her shoes weren’t meant for mountain climbing, and even under the cloak it was cold.

“I’m not taking you to the Queen.” He shook his head. “I work for the Spider. You should be happy, Lady Stark, because I don’t think Varys wants to kill you. I’m doing you a favour – I’m getting you out of the grip of a man who is just going to use you and discard you. Say what you want about the Spider, but at least he doesn’t pine after little girls who look like their mother…”

“You’re lying,” Alayne growled, glaring at him. Her legs stopped.

“Keep walking, my lady,” he warned.

“Say that you’re lying!” she hissed.

Ser Shadrich’s eyes narrowed, clutching his dagger a bit more tightly. “Keep walking, or I’ll mak–”

Suddenly, a horn blew out over the mountainside. They both froze. It sounded harsh, screeching and jagged. She saw the knight’s eyes widen in fear. Shadrich’s hand went to his longsword. “Burned Men,” he hissed, growling at her. “Run, girl.”

There was a second horn blast. She couldn’t tell from where it came. “What, where–”

“The treeline,” he growled, grabbing her shoulder and starting to sprint. “Run, the trees!”

Alayne stumbled, dainty shoes stumbling over rocks. Shadrich cursed, grabbing her arm and yanking her upwards. There were more horns blowing. Some spotter had seen them, and the savages were answering the alert.
“Keep running!” Ser Shadrich sounded scared. “They catch you and they feed you to the flames, girl.”

They ran down the slope, taking cover in the trees. She was panting for breath, but Ser Shadrich kept on dragging. Behind her, she saw figures on mountainside. Dark figures clutching spears, pitchforks or axes. One of them was clutching a huge burning torch, his face painted red, howling war cries.

“Keep running,” Ser Shadrich hissed, and Alayne ran for as long as she could. She heard men behind them, but the forests and rocks were thick and winding. Shadrich dropped his satchel without a second thought so could run faster.

She could hear the sound of waterfalls down the mountainside. The fast rapids were fed from the Tears of Alyssa and swashed into Oak Lake, and then all the way down to the Narrow Sea.

More horns were blowing. Even Shadrich was wheezing for breath. When Alayne finally turned, she glimpsed figures moving away through the trees. The clansmen were moving away. “Why aren’t they chasing us?” she panted.

Shadrich just shook his head. “Because they didn’t see us,” he muttered, grabbing and pulling her away.

Only when they shambled up a ridge did she realise what he meant. In the distance, five hundred yards away, she saw riders trotting through a snow-buried road. A group of knights. Knights searching for me from the Gates of the Moon. While we cut through the mountains, a party of knight heading east must have travelled along the highroad and made similar time. The Burned Men had been watching the road – they saw them first.

She lingered to stare, but Shadrich grabbed her and pulled her roughly towards the waters.

Behind her, it looked like a standoff was forming. A dozen knights on horseback against thirty or so clansmen slipping out of the forests. She glimpsed burning arrows. A battle. The knights would ride through the clansmen to save her.

She heard war cries and horn blasts. No, Alayne realised. It looked like the knights were being forced to retreat. They didn’t have the numbers to safely fight through the Burned Men.

Shadrich was still running. Alayne’s heart pounded.

“HELP!” she bellowed at the top of her lungs, before Shadrich could stop her. The sound rang out over the forests. She glimpsed the mounted men ripple. “HELP M—”

The backhanded slap took her to the ground. Her vision blurred. A horn answered her screaming. At the sound of her voice, the knights wouldn’t retreat anymore.

“Bitch!” Shadrich hissed furiously, face red. “You’ve just cost a lot of good men their lives.”

He grabbed her and hoisted her upwards, his feet shambling over the rocks. Behind, she heard screams, sounds of horses charging. Shadrich was staggering, struggling to lift her over the uneven rocks.

In the distance, she glimpsed two mounted riders fall to Burned Men’s arrows.

Her heart was beating so hard it might stop. She could hear rushing water. “Nearly there…” Shadrich wheezed. “Nearly there…”
The world seemed to blur. She heard hooves behind her, arrows pinging, people and horses screaming. A voice – a heavy, husky voice – bellowing words she couldn’t make out.

“Fuck!” Shadrich cursed, and without another word he shrugged his shoulders and dropped her onto the snow and stone. The impact caused her to body to oomph. She could barely breathe. “You think you can stop me, Mormont?”

Footsteps approaching. A large figure. “Move away from the lady,” a voice growled. Alayne could barely make out of the shape of a man in heavy armour, pacing towards Shadrich. A bloody bear’s maw growled from his breastplate.

Ser Jorah Mormont was wheezing slightly. His sword – a broad hand-and-a-half sword – was slick with blood. His eyes dark and his face hard under his helm.

He must have cut through the Burned Men to chase after me. She glimpsed a fallen horse with an arrow in its rump. Ser Jorah’s mount had collapsed, but he kept on running on foot. Over the ridge, the clansmen were still clashing with the remaining knights, but there weren’t many left. Ser Jorah was a strong man.

Ser Shadrich forced a laugh. “You ready to die over a bastard girl, Mormont? You sure you want to do this?”

“Sansa Stark,” Ser Jorah growled, glancing down at her lying in the snow. She looked a mess – beaten, bruised and weak. Unwashed and filthy. “Are you injured?”

Her heart pounded. He knows, she thought. He knows who I am. Shadrich’s face flickered. “So not quite as dense as everyone thought you were, old man,” Shadrich grunted. “But it seems there’s even less reason for a fight. You sure you want to risk your life over a Stark?”

“You think I fear you?” Ser Jorah grunted, taking another cautious step.

“Depends on how much a fool you are. Back away, Mormont,” Ser Shadrich warned. “Turn around, walk away, and you can still get out of this. Or better yet, come on and help me. There’s a fat purse of gold in return for this lady and I’m happy to share.”

“Move away from the lady,” Ser Jorah growled again, raising his blade.

Shadrich had his longsword in one hand and his dagger in the other. He swung both of them with confident ease. “What do you care?” Ser Shadrich scoffed. “You’ve sold people before for coin, haven’t you? The gold is good and there’s a debt to be repaid, Mormont.” His gaze darkened. “We’re just the same, Mormont. We both do what we need to do.”

“Move away.”

Shadrich just smirked. For a little man, he had an easy arrogance. “Then have it your way.”

The Mad Mouse stepped forward, darting at Ser Jorah. The large man swung first, a furious double-handed swipe. Shadrich didn’t parry, he just sidestepped, and as soon as Ser Jorah tried to recoil Shadrich’s blade was jabbing forward.

If it wasn’t for Ser Jorah’s platemail, that jab would have cut open his stomach. Instead, the edge grated off hard metal. Shadrich swung his blades as fluidly as water.

The second stroke, Jorah managed to block, but barely. The third swipe and Jorah was on the backfoot. The fourth attack was with Shadrich’s back hand, and she saw the dagger lash against Jorah’s shoulder. The bear knight winced.

Ser Shadrich swung his blades in his hands, and then darted in for another assault. Jorah barely had a chance to retaliate.

Ser Jorah was bigger. Much, much bigger – he looked three times Ser Shadrich’s size. He was stronger too and Ser Shadrich didn’t dare even try to block any of the larger man’s blows. And yet Shadrich was the faster swordsman, and that mattered far more.

The blades clashed. Alayne could only stare, still wheezing with pain and fear.

Ser Shadrich took second blood with a graze across Jorah’s hip. The bear knight might have lost his head too, but he barely managed to push Shadrich away. The sound of Shadrich’s laughter filled the air.

“You are slow, old man,” he taunted. He spun and caught his sword in one hand, mocking.

Jorah could only growl. Blood and sweat dripped down his brow. He clutched his bastard sword with both hands.

Shadrich charged. Jorah managed one hard swing, but the next four strokes were all wicked fast and precise from the Mad Mouse.

She heard the clang of steel against steel. \textit{His heavy armour is the only thing saving his life}, Alayne realised. While Shadrich wore light mail, Ser Jorah was clad in heavy plate. Ser Shadrich’s swords clipped his plate repeatedly in short succession, but didn’t pierce. Not quite.

She glimpsed the panic in Jorah’s movements. He was losing ground while Shadrich danced over the rocks. Ser Jorah swung out wildly, yet Shadrich was too close and already attacking. Shadrich’s dagger darted forward, straight for Ser Jorah’s grip on his sword.

There was a plume of blood. The impact of the cross-guard took the dagger straight out of Shadrich’s hand and it flew backwards and landed in the snow. She heard Jorah scream and stagger backwards. He was clutching his hands.

\textit{His fingers}, she realised in horror. Ser Jorah was missing two fingers on his left hand from where the dagger had carved straight through his gauntlets. The large man staggered, eyes bulging in rage, but he was struggling to even grip his sword.

Ser Shadrich laughed, leaving his dagger behind him and swinging the longsword alone. \textit{“Tis a fine thing, is it not?”} Ser Shadrich taunted. \textit{“The mouse that can maul a bear.”}

Jorah’s veins throbbed, his face red. Blood dripped from his hands. He didn’t speak, or even scream, there was just one long grunt of pain.

“You should have walked away, ser,” Shadrich said with a soft smile, before stepping forward and swinging his sword downwards–

She never knew how it happened. One heartbeat, Alayne was lying on the floor staring in horror. The next, her body was moving all by itself.

She felt cold and fear. She felt the snow brush underfoot. She felt her hands wrapping around the smooth dragonbone hilt. She felt Ser Shadrich’s mail cleave as she jammed in the edge forward with both hands. She felt a sharp scream breaking through her throat.
Before she had even realised what was happening, Sansa was standing upright and plunging the dagger straight into Ser Shadrich’s back. Her hands were still bound and trembling. Blood oozed over her fingers.

His eyes widened in surprise. His body flinched.

“Oh,” Ser Shadrich said dumbly.

He tried to raise his blade. Ser Jorah roared and his sword swung first. The steel bastard sword went straight into his skull.

Blood and bone shards splattered against Sansa’s face. The blade cleaved halfway through Ser Shadrich’s skull before it jammed, dragging his body with it like a ragdoll. The Mad Mouse’s body flopped limply under Ser Jorah’s blade.

The knight roared in wordless fury. He had to grunt as he dragged his sword out of the man’s head. There was barely a head left – brains and skull splattered like a half-squashed tomato. Gloopy gore and blood soak into the snow.

He was wobbling slightly, panting heavily. “Lady Stark,” Ser Jorah murmured, with a nod.

There was blood dribbling down her chin. “Ser Jorah,” Sansa gasped, dropping weakly to the ground. Her hands just felt numb. Her wool dress was shredded, stained and filthy.

Jorah was staggering, limping. “I can take you back to Lord Baelish, my lady,” he said, still cradling his bloody hand. “I could take you back to Lord Arryn, Lord Royce and Miranda, my lady. If that is what you wish.” His face was pained. “Or I could take you north. I could take you home, as a Stark, where you belong. There are allies there, those that support your family… I am here to bring you home, but I will not do so without your permission.”

He grimaced, struggling to breathe. “It is your choice, Lady Stark. I could take you home. If you want to go. Say the word.”

She was left breathless, staring upwards in numb shock. “Home,” Sansa repeated. She wasn’t quite sure where the words came from, but her head was spinning and… “I want to go home.”

“Aye,” Ser Jorah said with a gulp. “Then we must run.”

Her fingers were gripping the dagger so tightly she wasn’t quite sure if she could dislodge them. Ser Jorah shambled upwards, wrapping his missing fingers roughly and then snapping her binds off with his other hand. The knight’s armour rattled as heavy feet started to pound.

Behind them, a ragged horn blew over the rocks. The Burned Men. Two of the knights turned to gallop away, and one was cut down by arrows. The clansmen were howling, victorious, and she heard heavy footsteps chasing after her and Jorah.

Sansa stumbled, and Ser Jorah stopped to pick her up with one arm, pressing her close as he kept on running. He stunk of musky sweat and blood, every breath deep and heavy. Even injured, Ser Jorah had stamina. He ran in heavy armour, with her body pressed into his shoulder, lumbering feet never stopping.

The clansmen gave chase, blowing horns and stomping spears. They are behind us, and we have nowhere to run. There was nowhere to hide, no way to outrun them. Ser Jorah could only sprint and stagger, towards the sound of rushing water.
She saw Oak Lake stretch out before them. She heard the gushing falls. The currents streamed down forty feet into cold water beneath them, as hard and as grey as stone. She saw spray splashing, droplets hissing in the air, and the falls rumbling like some great beast.

“Lady Stark,” Ser Jorah gasped, staggering up the rocky ridge. “Can you swim, my lady?”

Her head spinning so fast she barely made sense of the words. “Lady Stark,” Ser Jorah pressed. “Can you swim?”

Swim. “Yes,” she gasped. She used to swim with Jeyne Poole and Beth Cassel in the shallows of the Long Lake during the height of summer. Little Arya would have joined them, sometimes, splashing and giggling by the beach, and her mother would watch from the shore, fretting. Sansa stopped going out to swim as she grew to be a lady. Gods it was so long again… “Yes, I can swim.”

“That is very fortunate, my lady,” Ser Jorah said with a grimace. He struggled with the clasps of his steel plate briefly, but could not unfasten them with one hand. “Because I cannot.”

“Wait, what—”

He didn’t even pause. Without warning, Ser Jorah held her tightly, and jumped off the cliffs.

The Wildling King

Jon had never seen White Harbour before. His first sight was of New Castle rising over the landscape, while seagulls cawed and the smell of salt was thick in the air. The city was all white stone and straight streets, with steeply pitched slate roofs tilting downwards towards the coast of the White Knife. Even from a distance, Jon could see the harbour heaving with sails, ships attended by ant-like figures.

The journey had been quick and hard, but they ran their horses into the ground. The White Harbour riders led the way, but Jon and his Dragonguard huddled together. “I do not trust these southrons,” Gerwick warned, as hooves galloped over the grassy plains. “This could be a trap.”

“Aye,” Jon agreed. “But they say Lord Manderly promises me guest right. They approached with an offer of truce.”

“Didn’t they give your brother guest right too?” Gerwick said darkly. “It seems to me that honour stops at the Wall.”

“These Manderlys,” Furs called from Jon’s other side. “You say this fat lord was to marry his daughters to those Freys. Now what sort of man gives his grandchildren away to scum like that?”

“It may be that betrothal was forced.” Jon kept his voice as low as he could. “Or you’re right, this may be a trap. Be wary – if they try to hurt me, Sonagon will hurt them much more. Make sure they understand that.”

The leader of the men, a lithe and tall knight introduced as Ser Alek, had dismounted and bowed before Jon. His men had dropped their weapons. They had been extremely formal and scared, and begged that Lord Manderly wanted to treat, that the lord offered safe passage to White Harbour. If there was deception in them, Jon didn’t see it, and it was too good an opportunity to pass.

There had been little time to dawdle. Ser Alek had offered each of the men a horse, some to ride two abreast, and even left eight of his own men on foot. Ser Alek surrendered his own horse to Jon, a great grey warhorse. Jon noticed how the man had been sweating, constantly lowering his eyes as he addressed him.

It took a while to convince Sonagon that the men weren’t a threat. In the end, Jon was convinced to leave the dragon to hunt aurochs over the plains, to avoid attention, while they rode to White Harbour.

They passed two smaller villages, but never stopped as they rode. Ser Alek seemed afraid to. They rode for a full day, until finally they saw the pale walls of White Harbour. They were approaching the first of the stables and farmhouses leading up to the city. None of the wildlings had ever seen a town so big, so crowded. Some tried to hide it, but they all looked either awed or nervous.

“Halt,” Jon shouted to the riders, drawing his destrier to a stop. The riders paced. “What is the intention here, Ser Alek?”

His face seemed pained. “Your Grace,” the knight said. “Lord Manderly wishes to treat, White Harbour offers no threat to you, I promise.”

“Indeed. And we will be entering through the main gates?” Jon demanded.

“I had clear orders to bring you direct to the New Castle. We will not go through the city, we will circle around and there’s a postern gate to the north straight into the keep itself.”

No, that felt risky. If this was a trap, then it would make sense to keep Jon out of the streets. “If Lord Manderly wishes to treat, then let’s go the most direct route,” he said firmly. “Through the main gate, and up the Castle Stair. I wish to enter through White Harbour itself.”

“Your Grace, the city is in panic. The sight of your dragon sent many into frenzy, it may not be safe to ride through the streets.”

“I have no doubt you can provide a suitable escort. I also expect Lord Manderly himself to meet me outside the gates. Go ahead and bring those requirements to your lord, and two of my companions will escort you. When they return and tell me the path is clear, I will enter the city tomorrow morning. To give you ample time to prepare a procession.”

He grimaced. “You—Your Grace, it is not safe for you to linger on these plains all night.”

“I am sure I will be fine,” he said coolly. “Furs and Eryn, please escort the good ser. We will camp on the coast.”

Ser Alek tried to protest, but Jon gave him no space to. Furs and Eryn were two of the most level-headed of his Dragonguard, and Jon ordered them not to antagonise, but just watch. Jon’s instincts said that the offer of truce was genuine, but he couldn’t afford to take that chance. If Lord Manderly really is willing to meet me, then let him meet me personally, during daylight, in the main street, to reduce any chance of an ambush.

It starting snowing during the night, but they camped two leagues outside of the city. Ser Alek left twelve of his men, but they all kept their distance by unspoken command. The Dragonguard kept watch diligently, still suspicious of the southerners. Jon could feel Sonagon hunting over the Bite, and if need be the dragon could be here quickly.

It was a cold morning. Furs and Eryn both returned at first light, reporting that Lord Manderly was waiting with a group of fifty guards by the front gates. As they rode off towards the city, Jon called Sonagon back towards him, just to be safe.
They had barely reached the gates when the dragon soared above them high in the sky. The shadow blanketed the entire road.

Jon’s first impression of White Harbour was of a city in panic. He saw people on the road sprint in panic as they approached. He heard screaming in the streets. Jon only caught a single word, “Dragon, dragon!”

Even the guards that met them seemed terrified. Jon approached slowly, and a field of green cloaked soldiers with tridents stood to attention outside the thick ironwood gates. Jon could smell the fear in the air, even though Sonagon circled far above. Well, I wanted the whole north to see Sonagon.

“Your Grace,” a man greeted, pushing a great horse forward. He was a big man: very fat, bald, with a large walrus moustache. His green cloak was clasped with a silver and sapphire trident. He held himself straight, but there were dark shadows under his eyes too. He said the words ‘Your Grace’ very hesitantly. “Forgive me, but my lord father is sickly and does not travel well. I am his son and heir, Ser Wylis Manderly, to greet you. I have bread and salt for you and your party.”

A table of honeyed bread and jugs of wine was already set out for them. All guards very deliberately kept their weapons lowered. Oh, they're being very, very nervous. They were treating him as if a single offence risked sending him into a rage – they didn’t know what to expect from him, and that made Jon feel better. “Thank you for your hospitality, Ser Wylis, it is very much appreciated.”

“Yes, Your Grace.” He bowed in his saddle. Jon noticed how he winced. There were men near him as if to support Ser Wylis. “House Manderly are not Freys; our hospitality is ironclad. I swear it by the Old Gods and the New.”

Jon pushed Sonagon to back off a little bit. The gates were opened, and Jon heard the sounds of the city get louder. There was already a crowd in the streets, a mob that had been trying to push out of the gates towards him. He saw thrashing bodies forced backwards by green cloaked guards with tridents.

Ser Wylis grimaced. “Please, stay close to me, Your Grace. Ser Marlon will clear the way for us.”

Horses shimmied nervously. Guards rushed. His Dragonguard all had weapons readied. “Your people are panicked.”

“We have heard rumours of you and the wildlings from the north for months,” he shouted over the din. “Refugees pouring into the city. The sight of your dragon flying south two days ago triggered riots in Fishfoot Square.”

So I see, he thought, but he kept his face hard. “Savages!” Someone in the crowd was screaming. “Rapers and savages!”

“Death to wildlings!” another shouted.

Still he heard someone else shouting, “Death to the Boltons! Vengeance for the Red Wedding!”

Then the white dragon shot over them in the sky above, each flap causing gusts of wind through the narrow streets, and the whole city watched as the shadow of the dragon cut across the buildings. Many ran for cover, and others just fell to the ground in terror. Sonagon isn't even being aggressive, just curious.

It looked like a riot as Jon’s party rode up the main street. The city guards had to fight to clear the path up to the Castle Stair. In the distance, Jon sensed Sonagon fly out over the coast, and then turn to perch on the Seal Rock overlooking the harbour. There were townsfolk trying to flee the gates, but the city was on lockdown. It was all so hectic Jon could barely even process it.

By the time they started the approach up the pale staircase leading to New Castle, Jon saw fighting on the docks below. Ships were trying to flee the harbour, but there were galleys in the water forming a blockade to stop anyone leaving. On the docks, the green cloaks looked like they were seizing ships and making arrests, and the cries of fighting were sharp noises in the orchestra of chaos. The whole city felt crazed with panic. Off the coast, Sonagon roared.

“Forgive me, Your Grace,” Ser Wylis panted. “The city is…”

He didn’t seem to know how to finish that statement.

Jon was shuffled quickly into the handsomely furnished pale castle. Silver and green ordained the walls, along with broken shields and rusted swords from ancient victories, and wooden figureheads from the prows of ships. The doors to the Merman’s Court opened, leading into a great hall of wooden planks decorated with all the creatures of the sea. A large cushioned throne of weathered oak rested at the far end, in front of a painted wall showing a kraken and grey leviathan locked in battle.

The first time Jon lay eyes on Lord Wyman Manderly, the fat lord’s chins were wobbling furiously at a maester with blond hair in the centre of the Merman’s Court. There were screamed objections, shouts that Jon couldn’t quite make out.

The whole room was heaving. Men were stomping their feet. Someone was screaming. Whatever he was expecting, this wasn’t it. Jon saw fat lords and ladies in silk and the whole room felt…
bloodthirsty. Savage. For a moment, he was left speechless.

Jon saw the elderly maester in chains being dragged away as he screamed, “Please my lord, don’t – this is treason! This is treason against the crown!”

Lord Wyman was clad in sealskin and wool as he shook his great head. His face well-lined, doughy and wrinkled, but those eyes looked wide and mad. “That crown committed treason first,” the fat lord growled. He could barely stand, but he was trembling. “Take the maester away and throw him in the Wolf’s Den. No ravens leave White Harbour tonight.”

There was the sound of wailing and crying. Jon could only stare as he limped into the Merman’s court, all eyes wide. The sight of Jon walking through the doorway seemed to cause the room to freeze. Jon saw ladies and young girls backing away from him.

The maester’s face paled as he saw Jon. “You can’t do this, my lord!” The maester screamed, struggling against the men pulling him out of the doorway. “He’s a monster! He’ll bring ruin to the realm! He’ll-”

He was cut off by a blunt blow to the stomach with the butt of a trident.

The lords and ladies of Manderly’s court were all up in arms. There were others trying to object, but they were being forcefully escorted out of the room too. The Dragonguard flanked around Jon closely, all of them staring in shock.

Suddenly, all of their southerners didn’t seem so civilised, Jon reckoned.

“We have all heard the news!” Lord Wyman boomed. The voice was echoing. “The ravens have been flocking across all corner of the realm. The Twins – the Freys! – scorched by a dragon’s fury!” Jon stepped forward, and all wide eyes were on him. “My only regret is that I could not watch it myself. Letters from Seagard down to Fairmarket all speak of the destruction of the Twins, and I say those honourless bastards deserve to freeze in the very coldest of hells!”

Ser Wylis Manderly lingered at the back of the room. Jon stepped forward, walking quietly into the hall towards the dais. Lord Wyman was a fat, morbidly obese man, struggling as he stood up. Jon didn’t say a word, he just watched.

“The Freys,” Lord Wyman spat. He could barely make out the words over all the din. “They butchered my son and my liege. They imprisoned my other son for six months. They defile all honour with every breath they took, and they had the gall to smirk about it?”

He motioned to his guards with a flabby hand. Jon locked eyes with the lord; Wyman was trembling with emotion, but Jon showed none. “If there is naught else that we can agree on, King Jon Snow,” Lord Wyman continued, “we can agree that House Frey had to be punished for its crimes.”

He heard someone screaming. Wrestling bodies coming through the door. Jon’s hand went to his sword instinctive, and the wildlings braced, but no attack came. Instead, it took seven men to force three squirming, chained men into the Merman Court. Jon forced himself not to react, but many in the court seemed shocked.

The men squirmed and thrashed, but the green cloaks were ruthless. They stomped the three men to the ground in front of the dais, chained them and tightened their binds until they were pinned to the ground. There were manacles on the prisoner’s feet that were stretched outwards, until all three were left stretched out like starfish. The clanging of thick metal rings echoed and chimed as arms and legs squirmed.

Some were shouting for Lord Wyman to reconsider. More were egging him on. “May I present the noble Ser Jared, Ser Symond, and Ser Rhaegar Frey…!” Lord Wyman shouted over the din. “The sons of Lord Walder Frey who came to deliver my dear Wendel’s bones back to me, under the guise of friendship! The murderers who came to blackmail me, to steal for my granddaughters by threatening the father they held hostage, and to spread lies about my liege!” Beefy, trembling hands tightened. “You dared to claim that the Freys were the victims of the Red Wedding?”

The three Freys looked frantic. Bloodshot eyes, pale faces. Chained in the centre of the room atop a painted octopus’ tentacles, while around them the mermen looked ravenous. “You can’t…” Ser Jared gasped. He was tall, thin, pockmarked and of fifty years of age. “We came in peace…!”

“You came to deliver the body of the son that you murdered!” Lord Manderly growled. “You came to strongarm me to bend the knee – you came to smile at me after you murdered and captured my sons!”

Rhaegar Frey gasped. He was round-shouldered and kettle-bellied. “It was Robb Stark – he betrayed us, he–!”

A guard slammed his foot into the man’s face. “You betray all honour, Frey,” one of the other men shouted. A bushy bearded man, Jon didn’t recognise him. “Your lord father died a frozen grave, your castle lost. You lands froze in dragonfire!”

“You promised us!” Ser Jared Frey screamed at the lord. “You bent the knee, you gave amends. You promised!”

“Weasels deserve no promises,” Lord Manderly growled. “I feasted you when you arrived. I smiled, I fed you, I danced along to your tune. When you left here, true to the laws of hospitality, I even allowed you to ride freely for three leagues unencumbered. Before I had you captured again.”

He waddled backwards towards his throne, eyes fixed on the Freys. Ser Rhaegar Frey broke down into tears. “This time, you receive chains instead of bread and salt. Consider your previous treatment as my gratitude for returning my son’s bones. This, however, is your punishment for murdering him.”

A large figure, well over six-foot-tall, stepped into the room from the other side of the hall. The crowd part for him. He wasn’t dressed like a guard; instead he wore an executioner’s black mask. He dragged with him a warhammer so heavy that the head scraped across the planks.

The man stepped up to Ser Rhaegar Frey. The knight was shrieking something nonsensically, tears and snot dribbling down his chin.

The big man heaved the hammer above his head, with a hard grunt. The whole court seemed to freeze as the hammer swung downwards…

Jon flinched. He heard the crack of wood and bone. Blood plumed as Ser Rhaegar Frey’s right leg shattered. The massive warhammer snapped his leg like a matchstick. Jon saw a splinter of bone flying into ground.

He had never heard a man make the same noise that Ser Rhaegar Frey made. Jon didn’t think that type of scream was humanly possible. It sounded too high-pitched to come from a human.

“Well, damn,” Furs muttered quietly as he watched. One of the ladies in the court, a young girl, looked like she was about to be sick, but she didn’t turn her eyes away.

The man with the warhammer was already swinging again. This time at Ser Rhaegar’s right leg. There was barely a scream this time, Ser Rhaegar just went limp.

Ser Jared was next. He was begging incoherently, screaming something about mercy, justice and trials, and but then the warhammer cracked against the wood once more. As loud as Rhaegar screamed, Jared screamed louder as the hammer squashed straight through his leg, severing the limb at the kneecap in a bloody gloop. First the left leg, then the right. The manacles went loose. Blood splattered over the sharks on the ceiling.

Symond didn’t scream at all – instead his lungs seemed to clamp shut in pain and horror. He received the same treatment. By the time the executioner was done with Symond, Ser Jared had already died of bloodloss. Ser Rhaegar lingered, babbling strange sounds almost like words.

After the legs, the executioner moved to squash their spines with his hammer. Jared was already dead, but the hammer cracked through his back anyways. Ser Symond was the last to do, spasming with the hammer head through his back. Even the executioner struggled to pull it out again.

Lord Manderly just watched hungrily as the men were executed in front of him. Jon had never seen a man with so much raw hate. Three large pools of blood stained the painted ground.

Those moments blurred. So much screaming, like the panic permeated the air.

Lord Wyman needed deep breaths to calm himself. “Begging your pardon, Your Grace,” Lord Wyman said finally, pulling his eyes up to look up at Jon. “But I require time to bring my house into order. May we treat together another time?”

Jon nodded. He didn’t say a word. They were escorted out of the hall and into the castle. Jon didn’t let it show, but he was shaken.

White Harbour has just declared open revolt against the crown, he realised. The whole city was in uproar. Lord Wyman was cleaning his court and preparing for a war. The dragon in the harbour tipped the scales.

Why did he execute the Freys like that? Jon wondered. It could have been done cleanly, it certainly didn’t need to be done in the middle of his court. It felt barbaric, savage. Like Lord Manderly wanted to make a point.

It took him a while before he realised. Because of me, he thought. Lord Manderly knew of my ruthlessness at the Twins, so the lord wanted to demonstrate his own ruthlessness. He wanted to impress me.

Jon was given quarters in his own wing of New Castle, and all around him the castle was filled with hectic activity. From the windows, Jon could see the whole harbour being shut down, and war galleys in the water. The realm would learn about Lord Manderly’s actions very quickly, and the lord seemed intent to be ahead of it.

Hatch just looked at him in quiet shock. “Vicious creatures, these mermen, aren’t they?”

Each of his Dragonguard were offered their own chambers. House Manderly’s servants were very respectful. Scared, but respectful, and constantly on hand to tend to Jon. Just like Ser Alek did, they stared at him like he was some wild monster that might tear their throat out at a minor slight. Now just what have they been hearing about me, I wonder?

He paused. And how much of it isn’t true?

Ser Wynal, a cousin of the lord and castellan of the castle, came to Jon’s quarters to beg his forgiveness, but Lord Manderly had urgent business to attend to and he begged the king’s patience. He provided orders that all of Jon’s needs would be met, and that White Harbour would do its best to accommodate His Grace. His quarters in the New Castle were fit for the most prestigious guests.

In return, Jon kept Sonagon calmed in the harbour. The dragon still lurched over Seal Rock occasionally snapping at seals in the water every time he moved. There had been an old fortification on Seal Rock, but that was abandoned to the dragon.

Lord Manderly wants – no, needs – an alliance, Jon thought. If White Harbour was going to fight the Boltons and the Iron Throne, then they needed a dragon on their side. Sonagon was the greatest military force in the north.

There could be little doubt of Lord Wyman Manderly’s intent, at any rate. By killing those Freys in the middle of his court he had made it quite clear how he felt. Perhaps it was some sort of trap against Jon, but he struggled to see any advantage for the lord. Far more likely, Wyman Manderly was sincere in his desire to ally with him.

And we need White Harbour too, Jon thought quietly. White Harbour could provide food for the Wall. Jon had plenty of wildlings under his command, but White Harbour had ships, silver and infrastructure.

It made Jon feel hopeful about an alliance. If House Manderly was that angry with the Freys, then they could have a strong position. Jon gave Lord Wyman the patience he requested, and he settled in without complaint. He ordered his Dragonguard to stay cautious, but rest, and Jon for once relaxed in the stone chambers, curling his feet in Myrish carpet.
At his request, a bath was drawn up for him – a warm bath in a marble chamber carved with seahorses – and Jon soothed into the waters gently. It was the first castle bath he had since leaving Winterfell, oh so long ago, and it was like he could feel dirt from months in the wilderness ooze out of him, the water was brown when he finally left.

Jon’s clothing, thick padded leathers lined with wool, were warm and sturdy, but also worn and unwashed. Good for riding, not so good for meeting with lords. He debated meeting in full armour, but he decided that might appear too aggressive. Instead, he requested more proper attire, and a scrambled hour later the servants returned with a grey velvet tunic, lined in silver, and tanned cotton trousers. The leather boots they provided were slightly too large, but still better than iron-heeled boots he had been wearing.

His cloak – the giant fur cloak that the children of the forest had provided – was dirty itself, but it was still thick and rich enough for him to wear. He kept Dark Sister on his hip at all times.

His companions were mixed. Manderly had provided a room for all of them in the castle. Many of the wildlings snapped and growled suspiciously, others had to be restrained not to pillage their rooms. Sam just washed and changed, while Grenn looked totally befuddled by all the attention from the servants. This is the first time that the wildlings, or Grenn, have ever been in a lord’s castle, Jon thought with a quiet smile, let alone as guests of honor.

As evening approached, Jon was served honey roasted lobster, fine wine and fresh apples. He could have eaten with the others in the private dinner hall of the wing, but instead he retired early to his room. Lord Wyman must have removed any other guest in the whole wing for Jon and his companions. There was no lack of hospitality, as scared as the servants were. In his quarters, Jon closed his eyes and carefully reached outwards.

First, he checked on Ghost – beyond the Wall in Hardhome, hunting in the forests as the refugees moved towards Eastwatch. There had been some wight attacks, but the wildlings were organised enough to survive them. Then, Jon reached out to Phantom, stalking and simmering on the rooftops of Eastwatch, before finally stretching himself out to Sonagon.

The dragon responded, perched over the Seal Rock off the harbour, lazily snapping in the water at the fish. Slowly, the dragon’s wings unfurled with great gushes, rising upwards to the air. The dragon circled on the warm air from the coast, circling in the low clouds, while Jon stared downwards at the coast. He tried to count the ships through Sonagon’s eyes: thirty vessels on the coast and another ten under construction in the Inner Harbour.

Lord Manderly had indeed been preparing for war. Sonagon circled, sniffing and staring over the rolling landscape. Even from the sky, he could see the blur of bodies gazing upwards from the ground.

It was dusk when the knock on Jon’s door alerted him. A small group: Ser Wynal, Leona Manderly, some stewards, and two escorts. “Your Grace?” Ser Wynal called nervously. “Begging your pardon, but Lord Manderly requests your presence.”

Jon just nodded as he exited, wrapping his cloak loosely over his shoulder. The men had swords, but they kept their hands well-away from the weapons. Very deliberately non-threatening, Jon decided. Hatch and Furs were standing guard by his door.

“The lord wishes to discuss terms in the Merman Court,” Lady Leona said hesitantly. The wife of Ser Wylis, he recalled, a plump pink woman with yellow hair. “Will any of your… companions wish to accompany you, King Snow?”
“Samwell Tarly will join me. As well as Furs and Hatch.” It would be too aggressive to bring all of his Dragonguard, but he didn’t want to go in alone. Sam could represent the Night’s Watch.

They were escorted down to the Merman’s Court. “King Snow…” Furs muttered dryly. Was it his imagination, or did he sound apprehensive? “So this is how you southerners do things?”

“Sometimes.”

“I will announce you to the court, Your Grace,” Ser Wynal said with a slight gulp as they walked. “Forgive me, but what honorifics and titles would you use?”

“Jon Snow. King-Beyond-the-Wall.”

“Um, is that all?”

“I believe so,” Jon replied coolly.

The Merman’s Court seemed strangely quiet. Compared to the frenzy of earlier, this time Lord Manderly wanted a more private meeting. There were no guards, no crowds. The corridor seemed strangely quiet. The floor had been wiped of blood, but Jon could still see the stain, and the wood was cracked where the executioner’s hammer had smashed the Freys’ legs.

The voice rung in the cavern. The stewards sealed the door behind them. There were a dozen people in the hall, all standing grim-faced around the dais. Jon met their eyes, one by one. He recognised six.

Lord Manderly stood – heaving – to greet him. “King Snow,” the fat man said, clearing his throat. “It is good to have you have in White Harbour. I hope this is a chance to come to terms.”

Oh, how strange it feels to be in a lord’s court again. I’ve been among free folk too long. “As do I, my lord. You are very gracious to extend the invitation.” Very brave too, to publicly invite a wildling king and his dragon into your city.

“This morning’s events gave little time for greetings. Formal introductions are in order, I believe,” Lord Manderly said, raising his voice slightly. “This is Ser Marlon Manderly, commander of the city garrison. The castellan of New Castle, Ser Wylan. And you have met my son, Ser Wylis, and his wife, Lady Leona of House Woolfield.”

“Ser,” Jon nodded. Be patient, respectful. “I heard you were imprisoned at the Twins.”

“I was, Your Grace. For a long time. It is good to know that justice has been delivered.” Still, the polite comment didn’t reach his eyes. Ser Wylis looked suspicious, maybe even angry. Perhaps he too was thinking of the prisoners he left behind, as Jon was. Jon didn’t press the comment.

“And may I present Lord Jon Umber,” Lord Manderly introduced, turning to the next figure. “Lord of Last Hearth.”

Oh yes, there was no mistaken him. It had been years since he’d seen him, but somehow the Groatjon seemed bigger than ever. He was a broad, huge man with dark face, muscular arms like tree trunks. Still, he also looked more… ragged. The Groatjon’s beard was unshaven, his face gaunter. Jon could see scars around his neck. He’s missing fingers, Jon noticed.

“I didn’t expect to see you here, Lord Umber,” Jon said respectfully. Behind him, Hatch tensed – it was rare for Hatch to ever meet a man bigger than himself.

“You can thank Lord Howland Reed for that,” the Greatjon grunted. He too, stared at Jon suspiciously. “I was in a cage being moved through the Neck when the crannogmen sprung an ambush on the convoy. Those weasels spent weeks searching for us, but Lord Reed sheltered us at Greywater Watch before bringing us here.”

“That is good to know. My father always spoke highly of Lord Reed.”

There was a slight ripple through the room with the words ‘my father’, Jon noticed. “Aye,” the Greatjon muttered. He kept his arms folded. “I thought Lord Reed a sickly old craven when the crannogmen did not march with Robb Stark’s campaign. And yet he proves that he still has wits; his bog-devils have been bleeding every force, from ironborn to Boltons and Freys.”

“That is why we are here, is it not?” Lord Wyman said, with a glare at the Greatjon. “To find common ground against common enemies?”

He turned around the group. “May I introduce Galbart Glover, Master of Deepwood Motte, and his brother and heir, Robett Glover.” Jon could see the likeness between them – both were stocky, brown-haired and broad-shouldered. “And Lady Maege Mormont of Bear Island.” Another one Jon recognised, she was a short, stout grey-haired old woman, with lined eyes. She was the only one in the hall wearing armour, clad in patched chainmail, heavy gauntlets and a bearskin cloak over her shoulders. There was a flicker of eyes as they greeted each other stiffly. Bear Island is a long way from White Harbour, Jon thought quietly.

“My lady,” he nodded. “You marched with my brother Robb?”

“We did,” Lady Maege replied. “Before the reaching the Twins, King Stark sent us to Seagard, to then sail to Greywater Watch in preparation for the assault on Moat Cailin. Lord Reed sheltered us, and after we heard the news of the Red Wedding, he gave us passage to White Harbour.”

Now why would you go that far rather than return to your own lands? Jon wondered. “I see,” he said. So they had already been gathered in White Harbour, preparing a rebellion to fight back against the Boltons. Lord Reed has been recovering loyalist forces.

“Also, we have Lord Ondrew Locke of Oldcastle.” An old, toothless man with vulturous features. “And Lady Lyessa Flint of Widow’s Watch.” She was a plump, red-faced woman with dark hair. She looked around seven months pregnant, swollen with a hand on her stomach. “Lady Flint’s son, Robin Flint, is upstairs, yet he is still recuperating from his captivity.”

“That is good to hear. Robin Flint served in my brother’s personal guard, I believe.” He kept his eyes fixed on every little detail. It was polite, but it felt dangerous. “May I introduce Sam Tarly, steward of the Night’s Watch, as well as two of my Dragonguard, Hatch the Halfgiant and Furs of Old Mother’s Crock.”

The Greatjon’s eyes were locked with Hatch. His arms were still folded. “Wildlings,” he growled.

“Aye,” Jon nodded. “Though they prefer the term free folk.”

“Wildlings have been a blight on the north for millennia.” The Greatjon had a formidable scowl, looking down at him. His voice dangerously low. “Do you expect me to stand easy in front of the man who brought a horde into my lands?”
“Lord Umber,” Lord Wyman warned quietly.

Lord Wyman was trying to be diplomatic, but Jon could feel aggressiveness coming from others as well. “You invited me here, my lords,” Jon said after a pause. “I had hoped we could make peace.”

“So you say,” the Greatjon growled. “But I think you might just be as much of a threat as every other bastard out there.”

“Enough,” Lord Wyman ordered. “Let us not be distracted by squabbles. Not when there are more pressing matters to attend to.”

“Jon Snow,” Lady Maege said loudly, stepping forward in front of the Greatjon slightly. Her armour rattled. The older woman had hands that seemed designed for a mace. “Let us be clear. Are you the same Jon Snow, natural son of Eddard Stark, half-brother to Robb Stark?”

“I am.” He met her gaze firmly. She had such a piercing blue gaze.

Robett Glover shook his head. “He lies,” the man said firmly, glaring at Jon. “I saw the boy before, and you do not look like him. The Jon Snow I remember had black hair for one, not white.”

“Forgive him, Your Grace,” Lord Manderly said quickly, casting a warning look at Robett. “But the question does remain.”

“If you walked through a snowstorm north of the Wall, my lord,” Jon said, looking at Robett, “then you would not come out looking the same either. My hair froze when I was stranded in the ice. I am Jon Snow of Winterfell, son of Eddard Stark – and we last met saw each other four years ago, when you brought your son Gawen to Winterfell. I spent little time in the hall, I admit, but Robb told me afterwards that you almost broke Sansa’s foot, tripping over her in the dance hall.”

Everyone turned to Robett Glover. He didn’t speak, but he gave a curt nod. Lord Umber’s eyes flickered. Jon turned to Maege Mormont. “Lady Maege, we have not met before, but I did meet your daughters Dacey, Alysane and Lyanna when they passed through Winterfell. Alysane feasted in the hall, but Lyanna snuck out with my sister, Arya, to swordfight with sticks in the yard. I was ten, but the girls roped me into teaching them to fight.”

“I remember,” Maege admitted. “The girls told me so. Dacey said you were quite the gentleman.”

“I believe he is who he says he is,” the Greatjon spoke up, sourly. “White hair aside, he does have his father’s look to him.”

“Then perhaps he is,” that was Lord Locke, speaking up gruffly with toothless gums. “But Robb Stark fought for freedom for the north. He is a Night’s Watch deserter who might have damned the north when he opened those gates. He shames his brother’s memory.” Lord Wyman flinched slightly.

“I do no such thing.” Jon had to force his voice to stay level. He knew what he had to say, but… “I brought the free folk south to save the realm – to strengthen the Wall against the true threat. I united the free folk to fight against the white walkers.”

The room froze. He saw the surprise and confusion over people’s face. Yes, I knew they would react like this, he thought sourly. The majority of people south of the Wall would. Still, they had to be warned. Robett Glover guffawed. “White walkers?” he exclaimed in genuine confusion. “Are you defending against snarks and grumpkins as well?”

Someday, I wish snarks and grumpkins actually do invade, he thought. “You talk about matters you know nothing of, my lord.” His voice was bitter, meeting their eyes darkly. “I’ve seen the Others myself. So have many – ask any free folk or sworn brother on the Wall.” Lords glanced around, looking for any sign that this was a joke. “I could provide you with ten thousand witnesses that the white walkers are very much real.”

“Or better yet,” Furs spoke up suddenly behind Jon, “why not go north to look? I expect you’d see them yourself soon enough.”

Robett coiled as if he had been snapped. The room hesitated, the lords sharing glances. “It is true, my lords,” Sam stammered, his voice a squeak. “Castle Black came under attack from wights two weeks ago. Dead bodies were brought through the gate, and dead bodies rose again as creatures with no heartbeats, and blue eyes.”

“And who are you?” the Greatjon demanded.

“Samwell Tarly, my lord. Son of Randyll Tarly, steward of the Night’s Watch,” Sam said, stepping forward. “I took my vows and I uphold them, my lords, I swear it. And yet when the wildli… when the free folk came through the gate, I sided with the living because I believe that is the only way to stop the Others. All I want is to keep the Wall standing, and I believe that Jon Snow wants the same thing.”

Sam had an earnest voice. It caused some of them to hesitate. “Your own brother sent letters to all houses the first time we encountered them,” Jon said, staring at Maege. “You know that Jeor would never lie. It was only two of the wights then, but then we came under attack from thousands.”

She didn’t reply, but her eyes were thoughtful. Robett stared at him as if he were insane. “White walkers? Dead rising?” he exclaimed. “This is a fool’s excuse to justify an invasion. A bastard’s attempt to steal his brother’s kingdom.”

“I once believed that all southerners are fools, my ‘lord’,” Furs spoke, cocking his head at the man. “You are doing little to disprove that opinion.”

“Enough!” The Greatjon shouted, so loud the whole room seemed to shudder. Despite himself, Jon flinched. “I do not know if the Others are real or not,” he growled. “But that dragon is real, that’s for certain.”

Lord Wyman nodded. “Aye,” he agreed, chins wobbling. “The dragon is very much real, and very… concerning for many people. Can you tell us about the dragon?”

“His name is Sonagon.” Jon gazed around the room. It felt like he was on trial here, so many men staring at him intently. “He was buried in the far north, buried for a long time. I awoke him to fight against the Others.”

“Awoke him how?” The Greatjon demanded.

“I bled on him,” Jon admitted. “As I was dying.”

There was a long, uncertain pause.

“And you control it?” Lord Locke pushed.

“Sonagon listens to me.”
“But not with words,” Ser Wylis spoke up. “I was watching when we entered the city – you never said a word to the beast, not even a motion. Instead, you close your eyes and the dragon obeys.”

“Aye,” Jon said simply. The discussion of wargs could get even more tangential.

“How?”

“How did Robb Stark control his direwolf?” Jon asked. “I have a direwolf too, in case you’re wondering.”

“Is the dragon tame?” Lady Maege asked with a pause.

“He is when he’s well-fed.”

There were a few uncertain mutters, but the Greatjon just snorted. “I know plenty of Boltons I’m happy to feed to it.”

“I do not trust him,” Robett said, shaking his mane as he glared at Jon. “He’s given me no reason why I should.”

“He’s standing here, talking to us, for one,” Lord Wyman objected. “He came willingly, because he wants to treat with us. He struck a devastating blow against our enemies, for two. And his dragon is not destroying my town right now, for three.”

For the first time, Galbart Glover spoke up. “I think my brother is understandably upset,” he said quietly. He was much calmer, taciturn compared to Robett. “But we had kin at the Twins. Two cousins who were being held hostage.”

Oh. Jon forced himself to stay stiff. Others were staring accusingly. He hesitated, and then risked, “I see.” He kept his voice low. Dammit. “I am sorry for your loss.”

“I understand how casualties work,” Galbart said coolly. “And I am trying to remain very rational and calm in this matter. I think to myself that their deaths are primarily the fault of Freys. And yet there are more hostages. My family, my brother’s wife and children are being held by Boltons. If we side with you, they may well be executed as punishment.”

Nobody replied. Jon held his tongue too. Lord Wyman continued in a hoarse voice. “And the fact remains that a dragon may be the best weapon possible against our enemies, my lords,” he continued. “Aegon the Conqueror proved the worth of dragons three hundred years ago. Jon Snow proved it again at Twins.”

“There are few castles in the realm that could stand against a dragon that size,” Maege agreed, her voice low.

“And if you were to fly to Winterfell right now?” The Greatjon demanded, glaring at Jon. “Could you destroy those blasted Boltons as you did the Freys?”

“Perhaps I could.” Jon nodded, his eyes hard. “But not while they hold my sister. I will not risk Arya Stark’s life.”

Nobody replied for a while. He didn’t know why, but that seemed to change the atmosphere in the room slightly. A bit of the aggression faded away. “The north is a land divided, my lords,” Lord Wyman said carefully. “The Dustins, the Ryswells, the Cerwyns, the Karstarks… they all declare for the Boltons. I think I can speak for all of us that none here ever will. A dragon could tip the balance in our favour.” He looked between them. “Can we all agree that we are united in our enmity for House Bolton?”

“And all he asks in return is for us to bow to him,” Lord Locke grunted, with a foul look at Jon. “I have difficulty trading one usurper for the other.”

Jon’s eyes flashed, stepping forward. “You mistake me, my lord,” said Jon. “I have no interest in my brother’s crown. I am no King in the North, and nor do I want to be.” He shook his head. “I am no Stark.”

“Says the man calling himself king,” Lord Locke muttered.

“I am. I am King-Beyond-the-Wall. I don’t think anyone would question that. Perhaps I am King-on-the-Wall too, but I have never claimed to be King in the North.”

Lady Maege’s frown deepened. “Then what do you want, King Snow?”

“I want the north to be put to rights,” he said firmly. “If the north is secured, then the Wall will be. I want for northern soldiers to reinforce the Wall, to fight against the white walkers when they come.” He paused. “And I also want citizenship for all free folk south of the Wall. As well as amnesty from all past crimes and raids. The free folk become part of the realm, to settle on the Gift.”

That seemed catch them all off-guard. Even his Dragonguard seemed surprised. The Greatjon’s face twisted. Ah, Lord Umber lost two daughters to wildling raids, didn’t he? “Citizenship?” the Greatjon spat. “Amnesty?”

“Aye. If you expect the free folk to assist you, then they deserve that,” Jon said. “That is my price. Peace.”

The Greatjon looked ready to object, but Lord Wyman motioned at him. “The terms of an alliance can be negotiated.” Lord Wyman said, trying to move forward, to deny the Greatjon his chance to object. “But let us say that we are successful in bringing justice for Roose Bolton’s crimes.” Lord Wyman cleared his throat and spoke carefully. “Who would you expect to take the position as liege in the north?”

That question… it felt weirdly worded. Jon almost instantly replied “Stark”, before realising. All my brothers are dead. “That is for the great lords of the realm to decide,” Jon said after a long pause. “I do not know the rights of succession. But so long as the north is stable and the Wall is manned, I will not intervene.”

Was that the right answer? Jon honestly wasn’t sure. Galbart Glover and Lady Maege shared a look, as if unspoken words were going between them. There’s something else in this room that I am not aware of.

“Now, I have been very patient. I have answered your questions, yet I have nothing to defend here,” Jon said, his voice turning sharp. “You invited me here for a reason, and I expect you to answer mine. You are plotting rebellion here from White Harbour?”

“Then you must rescue my sister.”

“We hope to,” Lady Maege admitted. “But so long as Arya Stark is married and in Winterfell then matters are difficult. We gathered together in White Harbour to determine the rightful king.”
Jon frowned. “Show him,” Galbart said quietly. “He has a right to know.”

“Show what?” Jon demanded, looking at Lady Maege. He was taller than the old woman, but she still seemed to look down on him.

“Your brother wrote a will,” Lady Maege admitted. “He did so shortly before arriving at the Twins, after the news of the sack of Winterfell came through. It was something else that we were to bring north to Greywater Watch.”

There was no reaction for a good while. “A will,” Jon repeated.

“Aye.” She slowly picked up a sealed sheepskin pouch from the side of the dais. The parchment inside was stiff and well-lined, but it had been well preserved. All eyes were on Jon as he took the paper.

He paused before opening it. There were shivers down his spine. When he finally did, he pulled it open so tenderly as if it might crack.

Jon’s heart pounded. He recognised the handwriting instantly, even though it had been so long since he’d seen it.

“I, Robb Stark, First of His Name, King in the North and of the Trident,” it read, “hereby legitimise my brother Jon Snow, to be released from his vows of the Night’s Watch and to take his rightful place as a Stark of Winterfell. If I should I perish without progeny, I hereby name Jon Stark as heir and successor to my crown.”

Jon blinked. He reread the letter again. It was marked by the seal of Winterfell, as well as half a dozen great noble houses.

There was no reaction. He reread it again, looking for any sign it was forgery. There was none, but he reread it twice to make sure.

Nobody said a word. Jon read every letter of the message individually, as if he could understand it better that way.

They were all looking at him, as if waiting for a reaction. He didn't give them one.

“We gathered to attempt to bring that decree to you, but at the time you were reported lost in the wilderness,” Maege said slowly. “And then, when news arrived that you led wildlings, well, we had to debate whether or not that left the king's will invalid.”

He stared at Robb's signature. “Is it invalid?” Jon asked, a whisper.

“I do not believe so,” Lady Maege said, looking around the room as if daring anyone to disagree. The Greatjon scowled, but didn’t speak.

Robb… Robb chose me as his successor?

The thought was… he didn't know what it was. It just doesn't feel right. I'm a bastard, he shouldn't have…

Jon Stark. He said the name and it didn't feel his. He couldn't imagine ever feeling comfortable with a name like that.

“No,” Jon said, finally looking up from the paper. “Robb made a mistake. I cannot be his heir.”
He handed the parchment back to Lady Maege. Jon kept his body stiff, but he could feel his hands trembling slightly. Nobody seemed to know how to respond to that.

“That was a king's final decree,” Lady Maege said quietly, frowning.

“He was wrong. I'm a bastard, and the realm will never accept a bastard on the throne of Winterfell.” His voice turned cold. “King Robb was mistaken, my lady.”

“He legitimised you.”

“He was mistaken.” Jon was trying very hard to keep himself stoic, but the anger still felt like it was slipping through.

_All my childhood I wanted to be a Stark and now... now I'm finally comfortable being a Snow. I can't fill Robb's role, I can't..._
_I'm a bastard_, he thought with a deep breath. _I know I am, I wear that title like armour._

The lords and ladies didn't understand. That was fine, because Jon didn't feel like explaining. He just nodded and stepped back.

“You have the largest army in the north,” Lord Wyman said carefully. “You have a dragon. With the support of the lords in this room and your brother's decree, we could win this war in a month.”

“I will not steal my brother's inheritance. It was not meant for me,” Jon growled. His eyes narrowed. “I'm a Snow, not a Stark.”

They looked confused. The Greatjon had a deep frown on his face. He met Lord Wyman's gaze for a moment.

“There is,” Galbart Glover said gingerly, “another option.”

“Yes,” Jon agreed. “We rescue Arya Stark from the Boltons. She is the lady of Winterfell.”

“I was not talking of her,” he said lowly. “The sons come before the daughters.”

Jon frowned. The room was quiet, thoughtful. “What?” he demanded. “What does that mean?”

“It means...” Lord Wyman cleared his throat. “That is another issue concerning the succession, to make matters more complicated. It may well be that King Robb's will is mistaken, as it seems that the reports of your brothers' deaths may have been false.”

Jon blinked. “What? Ho-”

“Bran Stark still lives. There good reason to suspect Rickon does as well,” Lord Wyman admitted. “They were not killed during the sack of Winterfell as the realm thought. It appears that Theon Greyjoy could not find the Stark children, so he killed two other children in their place.”

Jon blinked.

“I heard this first from a witness at Winterfell several months ago,” Lord Wyman explained. “I had no proof, but I began my search. I knew that we needed a Stark, so I investigated all the possibilities. It was only last month that we received confirmation.”

“Proof,” Jon repeated dumbly. _Bran. Rickon. Is this a scheme? Or am I really so lucky that they might still..._
“Aye,” Ser Wylis said darkly. The Greatjon grumbled something. “When we were being moved north from the Twins, we were going to be traded. Three highborn prisoners in exchange for one Stark. Bran Stark was discovered at Last Hearth, and the castellans there offered a trade.”

“You're sure?” Jon pressed, not daring to hope. “You're sure it was actually him?”

“Hother and Mors Umber would not have mistaken him,” Lord Manderly said. “They sent ravens to White Harbour as well as Winterfell and King's Landing with the news. I urged them desperately not to go through with the trade, to bring Bran Stark to White Harbour instead, but I could not discourage them.”

“I do not know what those fools of my uncles were thinking,” the Greatjon growled. His gaze darkened, he looked even angrier. “I should beat them both senseless for even considering a deal like that. I can hardly believe they'd be so foolish.”

“Yet there was no trade.” Jon felt himself smile. “The crannogmen rescued you before there could be. So where is Bran Stark now – I can find him and rescue him on dragonback.”

His heart was beating faster. My brother. My brother is still alive. Why was no one else ecstatic with the news?

He met Lord Wyman's eyes, and they were grim. “At their last message,” he said slowly, “Bran Stark was being held at Last Hearth. Then the castle was attacked and razed by Bolton forces weeks ago.”

The Greatjon shifted, glaring down at the floor. “It was the Bastard of Bolton, and his thugs,” Lady Maege explained. “Fiends worse than rabid dogs. We think the Bastard's Boys disguised themselves as refugees and snuck inside the castle among the smallfolk. They set an ambush from within and without at the same time.”

“So… so where is Bran Stark now?”

“As far as anyone can guess?” Lord Wyman said grimly. “Your brother has been captured and is in the care of Ramsay Bolton.”
Chapter 27

Chapter Summary

The coalition of the lords of the north, and a war is declared.

Jon

The mattress was soft. Satin sheets, pillows of goose down. The four-poster bed was by far the softest and most luxurious he had ever slept on – a bed fit for an actual king. Naked, silver-eyed, mermaids were engraved on the bedposts. The pillows and sheets felt suffocating, as if he was sinking into them. If he hadn’t have been so exhausted, Jon wouldn’t have been able to sleep at all.

Jon was up early, before the first light of dawn. There’s a war to plan, he thought grimly. Kings don’t get the luxury of sleep. Still, his head felt foggy, his eyes ached, and his muscles stiff – he could feel the strain of too many long days and short nights taking their toll.

White Harbour was churning for war. From the window, he saw the curled white dragon snoozing at the mouth of the harbour like a great marble sentinel, his body curled over the Seal Rock so his long tail dangled into the water.

The castle felt half-asleep, but there were still eight guards posted in the outer chambers of his quarters, and then four of his Dragonguard in the inner chambers to watch over the Manderly men. As he passed, Jon noticed that Furs had shaved to fit in with the southerners, and the man looked queer without his bushy brown beard. Too long-necked and weak-chinned.

Jon was to break his fast with Lord Wyman, yet an idea had come to him the night before that he wanted to see to first.

“Bullden,” Jon called to the wildling. “Meet me in the solar. We have matters to discuss.”

Bullden Horn followed. The solar was unfamiliar to Jon, yet the stewards had left a tankard of wine on the desk. Jon was about to pour a glass, before remembering his audience. He passed the whole tankard to Bullden and spared the glasses.

“What is wrong, king?” his Dragonguard asked.

“How well do you know Skagos?” Jon queried.

Bullden frowned. “Is that a jape?” The man had changed his tunic from the castle’s laundry, but no matter what he wore he always kept his unicorn horn hanging around his neck.

“Of course,” he said with a smile. “Lord Wyman believes that my youngest brother Rickon might have taken shelter on Skagos. The lord has been unable to mount a search party, but I would like you to search for my brother, rescue him, and bring him to safety. You are familiar enough to search the isle?”

“Oh aye. I’ve raided Skagos half my life. How old is your brother?”

“Nearly six.”
“Then he better be one hell of a tough six-year-old to survive on that isle,” Bullden warned. “It ain’t place for anything but the tough.”

“He has a direwolf with him,” said Jon. Shaggydog had always been the most aggressive out of the litter. “And he is in the company of a spearwife. Lord Wyman has a witness who said they fled to Skagos.” His eyes hardened. “This is important, Bulleden. We need a Stark to reclaim Winterfell. If Arya is a hostage, Bran is missing, then Rickon could be vital to rally the north.” While Sansa disappeared, and Lord Wyman has only the faintest suspicions of where she could be.

He scratched his chin. “Then why not fly your dragon over there to find him?”

“I can’t.” Jon shook his head. “Sonagon creates panic everywhere he goes. If Rickon is truly hiding on Skagos, he could be endangered in the chaos a dragon sighting will cause. I can’t risk flying my dragon in blind, and a small party on the ground stands the best chance of tracking him down. Find my brother first, and then I can fly in to bring him home. Can you do that?”

“Last time I went to Skagos, I was hunting unicorn,” Bulleden scoffed, fiddling with the bone horn around his neck. “The stoneborn protect their unicorns viciously, they’re... sacred animals to them or whatnot. The best raiders hunt unicorns just to prove that they can. It took me four days to bring that bloody beast down and take its horn, and I had to cut through half a dozen cannibals to do it. Aye, I reckon hunting a child on Skagos can’t be any harder than hunting a unicorn there. I can do it.”

“Good. Take Eryn and Gerrick with you.” Eryn was a sailor from birth, and Dark Gerrick was as fearsome with a blade as anyone. “As well as however many of Lord Manderly’s men you think you can move fast with. A ship will take you to Eastwatch, and from there you can cross to Skagos.”

“I won’t want many of these southrons with me. A few men can move more safely than a dozen. Black sails and small boats are the way to go – I’ve done that raid a hundred times. Usually from the north, but can’t be much different from the south.”

“Yes,” Jon agreed. “But Rattleshirt will be warned to help however he can. If I thought a fleet would have a better chance, you’d have one.”

“If your brother is so important to you, I’ll get him,” Bulleden promised. “But how do I recognise the boy?”

“Lord Manderly has a young man in the castle – a boy called Wex Pyke. He followed Rickon and this spearwife as they fled, so take him with you. The boy is mute, however.” Bulleden’s eyebrows raised. “Yet I’m told that Wex is a clever, resourceful, and eager to prove himself. I’ve arranged for Wex to squire for you during the journey.”

“Squire?” Bulleden snorted.

“To tend to your armour and weapons, manage your horses and luggage. An apprentice,” he explained. My Dragonguard are elite warriors, they should act like it. Each member should have at least one squire beneath him. As should I, actually.

Bullden shook his head, but didn't object. “Aye, alright. When do I leave?”

“As soon as possible. And there’s one more thing; my wolf will escort you.” That took Bulleden by surprise. “You will pick up Ghost at Eastwatch,” Jon explained. “Take him with you on the boat. If Rickon is on Skagos, then my direwolf stands a very good chance at tracking his. Then, if you do find him, I will know through Ghost and I will be able to meet you on Sonagon.”

“Wargs,” Bulden muttered under his breath, but he nodded. He took a deep gulp of the wine and dropped it on the table. “Aye. Understood.”

“Thank you. Send in Hatch when you pass him.”

He left. One done. Hatch the Halfgiant traipsed in shortly afterwards. Jon pushed the tankard of wine to him.

“Hatch,” Jon sighed. “I have something to ask of you. You won’t understand why, but I just need to do it.”

He frowned, but nodded. “I want you to go to the godswood in the Wolf’s Den, below New Castle. Make sure you are alone, and sit before the heart tree and describe, out loud, everything that was discussed last night. Mention the need to find my brother, Bran Stark, and ask for help. Repeat three times.”

Hatch did look confused. “You want me to pray for you?”

“Something like that,” Jon said with a wry smile. “I just ask you to trust me.”

Hatch looked puzzled, but he nodded and walked away anyways, albeit frowning. Jon would have done it himself, but then at least two dozen people were likely to follow him and he didn’t want to have to explain himself, or turn it into a scene. It was risky to even leave the castle unsupervised. But the three-eyed crow will be watching through the weirwood tree, Jon thought. Let us see whether or not the greenseer can offer some aid in rescuing my family.

Hatch barely left before a servant cautiously summoned him. Jon downed a large gulp of wine himself. So much to do, so little time.

Lord Wyman was waiting in the dining hall. Jon had expected a light meal for the morning, but instead he saw lobster, eel stew and thick pastries covering the table. Even just breaking his fast felt as formal as any great feast. Six nobles and knights of House Manderly sat with them at the table.

“Your Grace,” Lord Wyman greeted.

“My lord.” It didn’t feel quite as tense as the meeting last night, but it was still a long way from being comfortable. “We have a rebellion to plan.”

“We do indeed. Have a seat, I find the best plans are ones made over the dining table.”

Jon took a seat. All eyes were on him, but he acted as if it didn’t affect him. He paused, and then slowly took a slice of bread from the banquet. “Let us start with the obvious question,” said Jon. “We declare defiance against House Bolton, and an alliance between you and me. We raise men to bring Roose Bolton to justice. How much support could we expect to raise? And what forces will we face?”

Lord Wyman cracked a lobster’s claws roughly. “That… is a difficult question. Lady Mormont will support us steadfastly, and Lord Umber will fight the Boltons to his last breath. We can raise banners for justice, for punishment for the Red Wedding, for the sack of Winterfell, but without a Stark to rally around our odds plummet.” He paused. “Will you please reconsider your brother’s decree?”
“No.” Jon said, his voice was a bit more of a growl than he intended. “We recover Bran and Rickon Stark, and we fight for them.”

“Then we are fighting for a King in the North that we do not have,” Lord Wyman sighed. “But I can guarantee the loyalty of all lands east of the White Knife, from Widow’s Watch and Ramsgate to the Sheephead Hills and the headwaters of the Broken Branch. I have a fleet of fifty galleys and the men to sail them, I can field four hundred heavy horses, fourteen hundred infantry, and a hundred or so trained knights.”

“And Lord Umber? And Lady Mormont?”

“If Lord Umber is capable of returning to his lands to raise swords? Potentially a thousand. Lady Mormont I suspect a few hundred or so. Lord Glover has lost his seat and is in a more difficult position, yet perhaps in the hundreds. There are factions from the battle at Winterfell that won’t sit quietly, either.”

“And the Boltons have…?”

“Houses Ryswell, Dustin, Hornwood, Cerwyn, and Karstark. As well as two thousand of the Frey army that marched north with them. I hear that their forces sits at ten thousand. Whether or not they can raise more, hmm, I cannot say.”

“What of reinforcements from the Iron Throne?”

“Very doubtful. The Lannisters fight this arisen dragon, and the Tyrells the kraken. Let us say ten thousand, as a broad guess of what we might face.”

“Ten thousand,” Jon repeated. “I have five thousand men from Eastwatch already in the field. By now, the numbers of wildlings that are south of the Wall has likely exceeded fifty thousand, including women, children and elderly. I suspect that, should I call for them, then at least ten thousand of those would be ready to fight – the free folk have a higher proportion of fighters than any other; both men and women.”

“And a dragon.”

“Yes. The dragon is well worth a hundred thousand by itself.”

There was a dark glint in the fat lord’s eyes. I can see why Lord Wyman is pushing so hard for an alliance. Even with the lords Umber, Mormont and Glover by him, White Harbour cannot match the Bolton forces by themselves.

“Yet there is a catch, my lord,” Jon continued. “The free folk are not a unified host. They are not trained soldiers, they do not have formation or ranks.”

“Yet they will follow you?”

“They will,” he said. “But they need supplies. They need food, blankets and rations sent to the Wall. They need armour and good steel.”

“I can provide it,” Lord Wyman promised. “I have silver in my vaults that I am prepared to spend. There are many silversmiths in White Harbour.”

“I care for steel more than silver now, my lord. And for grain more than gold. The need is urgent; there are starving, exposed mouths on the Wall and the weather is turning.”
“And there is a fleet in my harbour that could deliver aid,” said Lord Wyman. “But right now, I need manpower. I need soldiers guarding my lands, to allow our allies muster their forces.”

“There are five thousand free folk in the Grey Cliffs, led by a man named the Weeper. I can summon them to White Harbour.”

“Aye yes. The same army that half the north has been preparing to fight against. Any alliance with wildlings will be dangerous, but…” He thought about it. “I need guarantees that there will be no raiding and pillaging of my lands. I have seen refugees pour into my city from Karstark lands, and I cannot suffer the same. By your word, King Snow; you must keep your wildlings in order.”

“Aye,” Jon agreed. “The Weeper is a hard man, and he knows the stakes. He will keep order.”

“I must hold you to that, King Snow,” Lord Wyman warned. “For it is the only way that this alliance has a hope of succeeding.”

Jon didn’t reply. He wished he felt as confident as he spoke. I must fly to the Weeper, to make sure they’re keeping the rules. “You hold Karhold, do you not?” Lord Wyman demanded.

“Aye.”

“And Lord Karstark still lives?”

“As a hostage. Him and his wife.”

“I know of Cregan Karstark. His father Arnolf was a castellan, yet his son became lord by marrying his cousin. It should be Rickard Karstark’s eldest, Harrion Karstark, the rightful lord, but he was being held prisoner at Duskendale and may already be dead.” Lord Wyman thought about it. “If Cregan is a prisoner, then we can push Karstark forces into our ranks. We convince the new Lord Karstark that he is better served as an ally than a hostage.”

“Is it needed? I have a second host under Tormund Giantsbane already mustering in the north, and we have something of a fleet stationed at Eastwatch.” Jon nodded. “In terms of numbers, it seems we already have the advantage.”

“It is not the numbers that concerns me, it is the men. What type of war do you want this to be, King Snow?” Lord Wyman crunched through a pastry roll. “The Boltons will never fight a pitched battle that they cannot win. Do you wish to see burning farms and poisoned wells? Do you want to see riots in every town and village, defiance in every corner? Even if we win, this war could tear the north apart – turmoil and strife, murder until our forces are stretched on every side. No, I will not let it occur.”

“Then we are agreed.” Jon kept eye contact. “Aye, a thousand pinpricks could hurt us more than a blade.”

“Then heed my advice,” the fat lord warned. “I know Roose Bolton. The man does not fight a battle without preparing for both outcomes. Before he allows himself to lose, he will turn any victory for us into something bitter. He will scatter his forces and turn them into bandits and raiders. He will burn crops and slaughter cattle until we all lose come winter. He will incite such violence and discord that even if we kill him, his legacy will be worse than a thousand battles. He might not win, but he could well deny us a victory.”

“His own reign will fall apart before that,” Jon said. “The other lords will not let him do it.”

“Oh, they might. If you are naught more than a wildling invader, then this realm will deny you to their very last. What does it matter what you are, compared to what they see you as? Regardless of your intentions, you could easily become a tyrant invader king, and I the fat, spineless lord that was cowed to support you. Smallfolk will rise against you in every corner.” He shook his head, crumbs of pastry flying from his whiskers. “No, if this war dissolves into bitter skirmishes then the damage could be devastating. It must end in battle, or it may not end at all.

“Do not underestimate House Bolton, Your Grace,” Lord Wyman warned darkly, as he cut from loaf of bread to slather butter on. “Do not dismiss the grief that a smaller force can inflict, if they are vicious enough. Roose Bolton is as dangerous as they come, and to say nothing of his son…”

“Ramsay Bolton.” Jon’s voice was cold. The man who married and tortures my sister.

“Ramsay Snow,” a knight spoke up from the table. Jon didn’t know his name. “A bastard born of rape. He is a Snow, no matter what the boy king says.”

Jon’s hands tightened. “He concerns me,” Lord Wyman continued. “Roose Bolton is cunning, but predictable enough, in his own way. But Ramsay? There is no predicting him. The Boltons have always been as cruel as they were cunning, but this one seems a beast in human skin.”

Jon didn’t reply. His gaze was dark.

Lord Wyman picked up the knife again to cut a slice of pie. “No, we are not lacking forces. We are lacking legitimacy. The only way to beat Roose Bolton in the long run is to have every house supporting us, to have a rightful claim to Winterfell. To ensure that they are the tyrants and we the champions.”

Lord Manderly has his wits, Jon thought quietly. Jon wanted to deny it, but a war was more than just men marching into battle. It wasn’t simple, it could never be simple. I tried to make it simple and I ended up surrounded by the corpses of hostages. I will not make the same mistake twice.

“Words are wind, Lord Wyman. We could sit here, eat lobster and talk about it until winter comes for us all,” Jon said stiffly. “But how do we make it so?”

“Beyond finding a legitimate member of House Stark?” Lord Wyman muttered, and then swallowed.

“We do have a legitimate member of House Stark. Arya Stark.” Jon said harshly. “She was forced into marriage under duress, their wedlock is invalid. Without knowing my brothers’ fates, she is the Lady of Winterfell, so we gather banners to rescue her.”

“Yet that is a more difficult war cry to call. Would you not reconsid–”

“No.” If I took the name Stark, would I be damning Arya’s rescue as unnecessary? “Do not ask me again.”

“Then I suggest marriages,” Lord Wyman sighed. “We must seek to arrange as many betrothals and alliances as possible between northern highborn and the leaders among your wildlings.”

“That… that is a good idea. Strengthen the bonds to the north.” And give the free folk less reason to pillage. “But they are wildlings. Would any noble lord truly entertain the notion of a betrothal to one?”

“Many won’t,” Lord Wyman admitted. “But we should be considering petty lords rather than great lords. Each marriage is a thread of string that brings your wildlings, and yourself, closer to being accepted by the realm; we should aim to facilitate as many as we can. Hundreds, mayhaps.”
He frowned. “Why would so many petty lords ever consider such?”

“Consider their situation. A small lord and his holdfast may have only a dozen or so fighting men under him. If they hear of a wildling army coming south and threatening their lands, lives and livelihoods, then their circumstances become dire. Such a lord may quite happily consider wedding his daughter to a wildling chieftain or leader, if it would ensure the safety of his holdings.” He nodded. “There are many such petty lords in the north, these lands are vast. A strong wildling warrior could make a good match to northern lady, provided there is influence promised and the wealth to provide a dowry, of course. Do you have, ahem, commanders in your army that could consent to such?”

“I have.” Although the thought of arranging marriages on their behalf made his head spin. “They may be… difficult matches, but, yes, in the right circumstances.”

“The lords of the White Knife will follow my lead. I know that Lord Holt of Westwood has two daughters that he would see married, the house owns large grain farms and a mill outside of Ramsgate. It is very important to secure our farmland. Lord Dywen Poole has a mature daughter who was widowed in the Young Wolf’s campaign, as well as a young son who has proved problematic to betroth. Lord Anders of House Overton is an old man, but a good warrior in his heyday and still an influential name – he may well accept a young wildling bride. Perhaps even our Lord Locke, Lord of Oldcastle, could be convinced to betroth one of his grandchildren for the cause.” Lord Wyman paused. “Would you care for a scribe to make note of this, King Snow?”

“I think that would be best, Lord Manderly.”

Jon summoned Sam towards the dining table with parchment to scribble notes and names as they discussed. Lord Wyman called for his castellan, and several other men who were more familiar with the minor nobility. Together, they went through and made lists of lords and ladies who could be willing to accept wildling betrothals. There are so many houses that Jon had vaguely heard of but couldn’t even place, with names like Forrester, Lake, Harclay, Ashwood, or Slate.

Scribbled lists were made until the ink spills stained the parchments: the most influential of the petty houses and landed knights, and the wealth, men and influence they might bring. Soon, there were arguments erupting on whether Lord Lake’s twice-widowed and dim-witted daughter was still marriageable, or whether House Whitehill would support a second-cousin over an unpopular nephew, or whether House Lightfoot’s wool and furs were worth more than House Slate’s rockeries.

Jon had to wrack his brain to suggest matches from loyal clans and leaders in the free folk host. It was like every option had to be ranked and matched. The great and old houses, with names like Umber, Karstark, Mormont or Manderly, were by far the most valuable alliances, but Lord Wyman seemed more interested in quantity than anything.

“Threads of string, King Snow,” the lord said when Jon asked. “The realm will only accept your wildlings if they become part of the realm. With enough threads of string you can weave a rope.”

“And yet shouldn’t we be considering great lords as well?”

“We will,” Lord Wyman said with a nod. “But the great lords will be more willing to accept wildling betrothals if the petty lords beneath them have done the same. Start from the bottom. There is also the matter of cost – each of these potential betrothals will need require a dowry, and it is far cheaper to pay the dowries for ten minor houses than for one greater one.”

Politics. Lord Wyman said it so matter of fact. The decisions I make at this table could well shape the rest of people’s lives. It was an unnerving thought, more so than leading them into battle for some reason.

Lord Wyman hunched over parchments, lips muttering as he read back through the notes. “Lord Umber should be involved in here,” he decided. “House Umber has more lesser lords sworn to it than anyone. Further, lands to the north are the most critical, as well as the most urgent, in building relations.” He paused. “Mayhaps we could even convince Lord Umber to take a wildling wife himself.”

“The Greatjon? Truly?”

“It would go a long way, if it is possible to persuade him,” Lord Wyman admitted. “Lord Umber lost his eldest son and heir at the Red Wedding. He did have two more sons and three daughters, but two daughters were lost to wildling raids and the circumstances of the rest are uncertain after the attack on Last Hearth. The Greatjon could possibly be pushed to accept a new wife for the future of his house and the security of his land.”

Jon couldn’t imagine anyone pushing the Greatjon, but he nodded in any case. Sam scribbled down Lord Umber’s name, with a question mark.

“What of lords south of the Neck?” Sam asked suddenly. “Why not reach out to southern lords for alliances as well?”

“We’d be overreaching ourselves to attempt such, I think.” Lord Wyman shook his head. “No, if this to succeed we must aim to work for the north. Leave the riverlands to their own conflicts.”

“The riverlords supported Robb Stark as well,” Jon noted.

“It was the riverlands and their squabbles that damned King Robb. He crowned himself King of the North and of the Riverlands, but an area as central as the riverlands could never be defended. Robb Stark lingered south to protect the riverlords — a noble effort, aye, but also futile. As the war shifted, we all knew the riverlands would have to be abandoned, and yet Robb still lingered for their sake.” Lord Wyman’s voice turned bitter. “If only your brother had returned north sooner, to consolidate his power in the Kingdom of the North, the tyrants of the south would have lost tens of thousands of men trying to break the Neck to end our independence.” The lord’s face scowled slightly. “No, we need nothing from the southerners, least of all to be embroiled in their conflicts. Dragonfire was the only thing capable of forcing the north to kneel, and now that is no longer a concern of ours,” he said with a soft smile towards Jon.

Jon frowned. “It is surprising to hear you say such. Didn’t House Manderly originate from the Reach?”

“Aye, for thousands of years we were the lords of the Mander; in the age of the Gardener kings we grew to one of the most powerful forces in the Kingdom of the Reach. And yet House Manderly was the only major house under the Oakenseat not to claim descent from Garth Greenhand, and so, despite our riches and influence, we were constantly slighted in favour of those with a better bloodline. The Peakes were envious, the Gardeners insecure and the Tyrells grasping. A thousand years ago our lands and castle was finally usurped, and we were left exiled.” Lord Wyman scoffed quietly. “Yet when I look back through my family’s history, leaving the Reach for the Starks of Winterfell was the best decision my ancestors ever made. Winterfell has been naught but good and loyal to us, while the south continues to squirm like a pit of vipers. We are northmen, that is the only loyalty my family knows. The blasted iron chair is nothing to me – White Harbour will fight for independence in the north.”
There was an iron passion in his voice, Jon noted. “The north has been part of the Seven Kingdoms for three hundred years,” Sam said nervously. “The Iron Throne unites the realm.”

“And yet I wager that the Iron Throne will fall within my lifetime,” Lord Wyman said, with cold anger. “It has been falling for the last seventeen years, in fact. Ever since Robert Baratheon broke the Targaryen dynasty, the Seven Kingdoms has fallen into decline. Succession and order was broken, a once iron-clad reign was shattered and flimsily patched together. The war proved that, and continues to do so. Each claimant is another hole poked in the broken rule of the boy king, they come one after another. Even after one set of contenders falls, another set takes their place. And the rebellions will continue to rise and fall until finally the Iron Throne is ground into dust. Southron affairs are best severed before they hurt us further. I would build a wall across the Neck if I could.”

Sam looked like he wanted to object, but Jon just nodded. “And to unite the north,” Jon said, trying to push the subject back on track, “what would it take for the lords under House Karstark to accept the free folk host?”

The discussion continued. It turned into the longest meal Jon had ever had. By the end, it felt like they had been through every house in the north and there was still so much more to go. Jon could only promise to inquire on which of his followers could be rewarded with an arranged marriage, and the first of the dozens of letters were drafted.

Lord Wyman pressed him on which lands north of the Wall could be used to incite allies, on whether to name new lords north of the Wall, to form new houses of allies. Jon kept himself focused and patient, working through each detail in turn. One problem at a time.

Eventually, Jon agreed take both Lord Wyman’s cousin, Marrion Manderly, and Lord Locke’s grandson, Bennard Locke, as his squires, as well as to consider naming several northern lords to his Dragonguard. Jon donated the gold they had raided from the Twins to House Manderly, while the lord would make inquiries into arranging some of the betrothals. Lord Wyman promised to arrange the captains and ships to move supplies to Eastwatch, provided that Jon could bring the free folk host at Karhold into line.

There was still so much to discuss. Which houses will be burned in dragonfire and which ones will be negotiated with, Jon thought.

“Let us retire for now,” Lord Wyman said with a sigh. It was already late afternoon. “Yet we must still write a letter, King Snow. Many letters. To announce our alliance and our intent to the entire realm – let no lord be unaware that the dragon and the wildlings fight for justice, and for House Stark.”

“Aye, I agree.” Jon nodded. He had seen too much panic and uncertainty already. “That is urgent.”

“Then I will arrange a gathering of the nobles in White Harbour this evening. We will need to rally their support, and then we can inform every castle in the north.”

“Good.” Jon hesitated, slightly. “And to the riverlands,” he said firmly. “Especially to Houses Blackwood, Vance and Mallister. Any of my brother’s supporters who might have lost kin at the Twins. I must offer my apologies, and promise recompense for their losses.”

Lord Wyman flickered. “Your Grace, I would urge you not to. There are absolutely no words that you can offer them that would not seem insulting.”

“No.” Jon shook his head. “They deserve apologies. I mean to pay the gold price. I will offer houses that lost innocent kin at the Twins coin in recompense for their loss.”

“I… I would not,” Lord Wyman warned. “Giving gold in return for murder only makes bitterness sow deeper. Do not send them any messages, do not admit any responsibility. Let them think the deaths happened as punishment because they conceded to the Freys. It is better to be seen as ruthless than as making a mistake.”

Jon could not be persuaded otherwise. The families of those who died deserve something, Jon thought, they were loyal to my brother to the end. Lord Wyman protested, but he conceded eventually.

“From what I hear, the south faces its own strife,” Jon said. “Let the riverlords know that the north are still allies, and we could offer support after House Bolton is deposed.”

“Very well. I would, however, also suggest penning a letter to this ‘Aegon Targaryen’ in the south,” Lord Wyman said. “He has recently taken Storm’s End.”

“Aegon Targaryen,” Jon repeated. “I heard of him, the contender who leads the Golden Company. What is there for me to say to him?”

“From what I hear, a short message could be a useful thing. Maybe not an alliance, but at least offer an agreement. Agree to leave him to his campaign and us to ours, so that he might distract any southern reinforcements from the north.”

“This Aegon,” Jon said slowly. A Targaryen in Westeros – can he bond with dragons too? “Is he genuine? Rhaegar’s lost son, is it truly him?”

“Perhaps. I’m more inclined to name him a pretender, the Imp’s little puppet, but his army is effective at least. The Golden Company marched through the stormlands swiftly, and Aegon’s forces under Jon Connington have won victories in the crownlands, while Tyrion Lannister leads a force of mercenaries west to Casterly Rock,” Lord Wyman explained. “So long as the Golden Company is camped outside King’s Landing, however, we can safely expect to be free from Lannister involvement in the north. If Dorne declares for Aegon – and I am hearing strong mutterings that they might – then this returned king might well have a good chance of taking the Iron Throne.”

“Aye,” Jon nodded. “And what of the other one – this Euron Greyjoy?”

“The Crow’s Eye. As mad as they come, I hear, but he dropped the ironborn invasion of the north for favour of warmer plunder.” Lord Wyman’s huge shoulders shrugged. “I will be a strong advocate of scorching the Iron Islands in frostfire from dragonback, but for the moment Euron Greyjoy is distracted leading reavers in the Reach.”

Sam didn’t look happy with that statement. How far is Horn Hill from where the ironborn are reaving? Jon wondered. “Whereabouts in the Reach is he raiding?” Sam asked. “Ironborn have not threatened the Reach since the days of Dagon Greyjoy. What of the Arbor Fleet?”

“They took the Shield Isles first, and for a time they appeared to be preparing for an assault on Highgarden,” Lord Wyman explained. “The Arbor Fleet was left on the wrong coast, in King’s Landing. Yet since then, the Shield Isles have been recovered by the forces of Highgarden, and the ironborn have moved south. Most recent news I heard said they had conquered parts of the Arbor, and then Three Towers itself. It does seem that they are preparing for an assault on Oldtown itself.”
“Never!” Sam’s face paled.

“Aye, he’s an ambitious man, this Crow’s Eye, but not particularly clever. He failed to secure a foothold against Highgarden, and he is a fool again if he thinks Oldtown will be easier prey. The kraken does not have the tentacles.” Lord Wyman shook his head. “No, the Crow’s Eye will not succeed. He does not have the men, and he faces forty thousand of the Reach’s finest to oppose him. Still, so long as Euron Greyjoy is keeping the Tyrells and their fleet busy in the Reach then that is only good for us.”

“But not good for the Reach,” Jon noted.

“Does it matter? While the other six kingdoms are preoccupied with their own civil wars, we have an opportunity. To establish our independence before any might break it.”

It took two guards to help Lord Wyman to his feet. There were still platters of food left on the table. Jon left with Sam, and Sam promised to sort through the pages of scribbled notes. “Are you happy with this plan?” Sam asked as they walked down the corridor. “To break away from the Seven Kingdoms altogether…”

“No,” Jon said slowly. “I don’t agree with Lord Wyman on that matter; I think that Westeros is strongest when it is united.” He paused. “But he’s right in one respect; there can be no unification with the crown as it stands. The Seven Kingdoms are falling apart.”

Jon took a detour out onto the balcony, feeling the cold air whip around him as soon as he opened the door. The view from New Castle overlooking the city was stunning, but the coastal wind felt bone-chilling as it swept across the white cliffs. The seagulls cawed out over the coast, but otherwise the city seemed strangely deserted. There were no ships leaving the city.

Even from this distance, Jon could see Sonagon roosting atop Seal Rock. The old ringfort of the First Men seemed a comfortable perch for the dragon. As he watched, the dragon splashed down into the water, swimming towards the cliffs so the dragon could scratch and chew curiously at the white cliffs of the coast. From the docks, he saw figures pointing and staring out across the coast.

I’m a long way from Hardhome, Jon thought with a soft sigh. Today, he had to barter an alliance between great lords, arrange several dozen marriages, secure a fleet of ships to provide aid, and declare independence and rebellion against the crown. Tomorrow, he would wage war on dragonback. Somewhere in between, he would have to figure out a way to save his brothers, and stop a white walker. Those are the stakes now.

But with White Harbour’s partnership, there is a good chance. House Manderly took a huge risk reaching out to him, but they were invested against the Boltons and they had much to gain. With all the resentment after the Red Wedding and the fear of the dragon, they could likely gather allies.

Jon stared out over the city. The Lannister’s crowned lion wasn’t flying over White Harbour anymore. Instead, once more the Manderlys had raised the grey direwolf of the Starks. He could only imagine the ripples that would be spreading around the north.

He wished he could go down into the streets, to find out what the common people were saying of him. What was the mood in the city? Were they terrified of the dragon lingering at their port? Were they furious at the news of defiance against the crown? Were they plotting to flee or incite riots? Were they cheering at news of an alliance, or celebrating vengeance for the Red Wedding?

Jon wanted to go down and find out, but he couldn’t. He was likely to trigger a riot if he stepped out of New Castle. I am the wildling, dragon-warg king, after all.
Spending so long discussing politics had left him stressed and tense. His head ached from so many thoughts and concerns, possibilities and chances. All of the numbers of men and potential alliances. Back with the free folk, negotiating for so long would have probably ended in a brawl by now. Somehow, sitting at a table and just talking left him feeling more exhausted than a dozen fights.

Jon paused, thinking of the fat lord and his great dinner table. Is it strange that I miss the fights?

He took a long breath, and rubbed his face to try and clear his eyes. A good spar felt more and more appealing.

Jon found Ser Wylan quickly. The castellan seemed to be following Jon around, to ensure he was content. “The sparring yard,” Jon demanded. “Where is it?”

The man directed him into the wards. Jon heard the thuds of colliding tourney swords. Knights and soldiers were drilling constantly for battle. The grounds seemed to quieten as Jon stepped into the courtyard. All eyes looked at him, but Jon ignored them all.

“Toregg,” Jon called to his Dragonguard. “Care to spar?”

Toregg grinned. He was a foot taller than Tormund was, and he fought with a bastard, bone-hilted iron longsword. “Aye, King Snow,” he said in a deep voice.

“Tourney swords?” Jon offered with a smile.

“No where’s the fun in that?” The wildling laughed, in a deep boom. Jon could see the similarities with his father sometimes.

Jon drew Dark Sister. A few onlookers stopped to stare at the spar. Metal blades clashed, Valyrian steel against dull iron. Toregg was a good sparring partner, but not an especially challenging one.

His reach is long, and he’s powerful with a strong form. Jon couldn’t match him easily in strength. Still, Toregg’s footwork was predictable, and he swung his sword like a maul. He would overextend himself in the long swings, and would flail slightly against sudden counterattacks.

After a dozen strikes, the flat of Dark Sister slapped against Toregg’s ankle. The tall man winced. “Keep your arms up,” Jon warned. “If you’re going to fight with no shield, you can’t risk leaving yourself open.”

“Aye,” he said, panting for breath.

“Are you sure you don’t want to use tourney swords?”

“Those wooden things? Like twigs. How you supposed to fight properly holding something like that?”

Jon shrugged. The image of Arya flashed before his eyes. “You stick them with the pointy end.”

They clashed again. Jon focused on defence and parrying, challenging himself to try and meet Toregg’s reach. Jon saw opportunities to counterattack but didn’t take them, trying to make the spar last.

“That sword,” a voice boomed across the yard suddenly, “where did you get it?”

Jon broke off. He could see the Greatjon looking at him across the yard. The Dragonguard were all staring at the big lord. “From a friend, my lord,” Jon replied.
“That’s Valyrian steel,” the Greatjon said suspiciously. “But I’ve never seen one so fine.”

“Aye. Her name is Dark Sister.”

“Dark Sister.” His eyes flashed. “A Targaryen sword.”

“Once.”

That seemed to catch him off guard. “I don’t know what the hell you are, ‘King Snow’, but I don’t trust you,” the Greatjon said, shaking his head. “The fat lord will stammer and beg, but don’t expect me to.”

He blinked. “A spar.”

“If you would like,” Jon offered, nodding. “You seem restless.”

“Do not get arrogant, boy,” the Greatjon warned. “Aye, lets spar. Squire, bring me my steel.”

The castellan looked nervous. “Please, my lord, perhaps tourney swords inste–”

“No,” the Greatjon growled. “King Snow seems to prefer steel.”

The huge man flexed slowly as he stepped downwards. Nearly seven feet tall and heavily muscled. Jon paused, he wore a helm, gauntlets and greaves, full armour, for the spar. Jon debated bringing a shield as well, but then he saw the Greatjon’s weapon – a greatsword bigger and uglier than any he had ever seen – and he decided that a shield would be useless. The Greatjon’s blade was like a sharpened slab of steel, one of the few that could even make his father’s greatsword Ice appear small.

Perhaps this wasn’t a good idea, Jon admitted silently as they sized up. He had wanted to make a point.

By the time the Greatjon even lifted his sword upwards, a large crowd had formed. Everyone stopped to watch.

He’s a big man – big men tend to attack fast and hard. Survive the first few strikes and you have an advantage. Watch his footwork, and just don’t try to parry against that greatsword…

“Anything to say?” the Greatjon growled, lowering his helm.

“Let us fight, my lord.”

With a grunt, he attacked first. Jon could almost feel the ground shake as the armoured, towering lord swung at him. He thought of the actual giants he’d seen. He’s a big man, Jon thought, but I’ve fought bigger.

Jon sidestepped the first two strikes. The third one very nearly took Dark Sister out of his grip, but then he barely managed to break the lock to counterattack. The Greatjon avoided Dark Sister smoothly. For a big man with a cumbersome weapon, he has a perfect form, Jon thought. He reminds me of the Weeper, actually.

Jon attacked first this time, quick sudden slashes and strikes. Dark Sister clunked against that ugly greatsword.
“You seem to dislike me, Lord Umber,” Jon growled between the ringing of steel.

“You let wildlings in to ravage my lands,” the Greatjon growled as he parried. “My people. My family. Aye, we won’t be friends.”

“It seems to me the Boltons have been doing more ravaging than anyone.”

“And that’s the only reason you’re still breathing in my presence.”

He saw him preparing to swing. Jon backed away quickly, and the Greatjon lunged. Jon parried, but the force of the blow still sent him flailing to the stones. He wheezed.

“I am sorry about your two daughters, Lord Umber,” Jon said, panting as he stood up again.

“Don’t mention my daughters,” he warned. The Greatjon stunk of booze and sweat, like a perfume clinging to his leathers. “They were only babes when the wildlings attacked their caravan. I can name a dozen families that have lost babes and kin to wildling raids. It makes me sick to have to ally myself with someone like you.”

Swords clashed again. Jon struck three times for every one of his, but each strike from him felt devastatingly powerful. Perhaps he was expecting Jon to back away. He didn’t.

“I cannot do anything for your girls,” said Jon. “But perhaps we can stop anymore daughters from being taken!”

“I told you not to mention them!” the Greatjon growled, swiping up and then swinging hard. Jon sidestepped the first but the second swing… there was no choice but drop downwards as the blade whooshed overhead. Jon fell to the cobbles again. “My girls were stolen and taken the gods-know-where, and you expect me to give their killers fucking amnesty?”

The Greatjon was over him. Jon kicked out and jumped to his feet, pushing so close into the big man’s defence he could hardly even swing the greatsword.

“Let the wildlings be on this side of the Wall,” Jon hissed between frenzied blows. The Greatjon tried to shoulder-barge him. It very nearly knocked him down again, but he spun. “If there are raids, we will know the responsible and then we can bring punishment to them. There could be accountability – punishment against those who commit the crimes rather than the whole people. Give wildlings a chance to learn of law and justice.” Metal clashed. Jon pushed with everything he had, trying just to push the Greatjon on to the backfoot. “Having a Wall between them only serves to encourage more wildlings raiding over it!”

The lord recovered by kicking Jon away. Jon had to back off as soon as that greatsword was raised. Still, the greatsword had notches taken out of it, while Dark Sister remained flawless. It’s an exceptional blade.

“This could be a chance to stop the casualties for good, Lord Umber,” Jon said, panting heavily now. “Rather than fighting off one raid and then the next, we could change things for good.”

“You want to talk about casualties?” he growled. “Tell me, if they hadn’t have moved me from the Twins, maybe if they delayed and left me in the dungeons. Would I still be alive right now?”

Jon didn’t reply. The lord struck back, hard. “You’ve got a bloody dragon. We side with you to defeat our enemy, fine – but what about when you decide we’re your enemy too?” The blades clanged. “What if you decide to take whatever you want, like your wildlings?”
He couldn’t reply. It took every bit of speed and concentration he had to fall backwards from the swooshing blade.

“What if I strike a bit too hard?” the Greatjon growled furiously. “What if I part your neck from your head? Maybe I could get rid of another tyrant king right here and now.”

“Maybe you could,” Jon panted, struggling to pull himself straight. “But we have a chance for peace or a certainty of war. Which one would you prefer?”

The Greatjon’s jaw clenched. He didn’t reply.

Jon attacked first this time. He could feel his movements becoming sluggish, tired. “Only together can we actually do something good,” Jon panted. “I know what the stakes are here.”

“You don’t know a bloody thing,” he snarled. “I watched my son be murdered right in front of me. I watched my king shot full of bolts and stabbed by that traitor. They tried to drink me under the table that night and I was left flailing drunk when they came for me. I spent six months being tortured by those murderers.” Jon saw wide, bulging eyes under the helm. “And when I escaped, my home had been sacked, my entire family could well be dead. Do you think you understand my rage?”

“I do understand,” Jon panted. “This war killed my family too.”

They kept on fighting for a while. The next time Jon hit the ground, he pulled himself up, and had to surrender. It was becoming too dangerous to avoid the Greatjon’s sword the wearier he became. Jon was panting heavily as he bowed and conceded the fight.

Still, the Greatjon was panting too. He was bleeding slightly from his hand where Jon clipped him, and Dark Sister cleaved straight through the gauntlets. For a long time, the Greatjon just stood and glared, still gripping his greatsword.

“You’re a fighter, Jon Snow,” the lord said finally, as he turned to walk away.

Jon took a deep breath. Gods, if the Greatjon is weakened at all by his captivity, I can’t see it. The man fights like a monster.

The Dragonguard helped him out of the armour. Jon saw Sam staring at him with wide eyes. “You nearly had him,” said Sam breathlessly. “For a moment, I thought you were going to take the bout.”

Jon shook his head. “No. He beat me soundly. He is bigger and stronger, and he was holding back.”

“But he’s the Greatjon!” Sam hissed. “One of the strongest living men in Westeros. You matched him blow for blow.”

Jon allowed himself a small smile. There were others in the crowd mimicking Sam’s expression. The Weeper had been slightly better, Jon thought, or maybe I had just been more tired in that fight.

He was limping badly as retreated back to his quarters. He needed to stretch and relax his leg again, smoothing out the cramps. There was a brand new bruise on his chest, shaped like the Greatjon’s boot.

Still, Jon couldn’t help but grin. His hands were shaking and muscles were aching, but it was a good pain – like stretching stiff muscles.
He had a barely settled when he heard a rapt knock on the door. It opened and he saw a grey-haired, hard faced woman walk through, arms folded. Jon ordered the Dragonguard to leave him. Lady Maege seemed to walk everywhere wearing her grey, patched ringmail. Her eyes were guarded.

“Lady Mormont,” Jon said, nodding. “What can I do for you?”

“Just wanted to share some words,” she said dourly. “Should I call you ‘Your Grace’?”

“If you wish.”

“Then let’s not. You don’t appear to be comfortable with the title.” She walked forward glancing around the room. “I saw you in the courtyard. You are skilled with a blade, especially for one so young.”

“Thank you, my lady,” he replied, coolly.

“And Lord Umber was right. That sword is a Targaryen blade – you say it is Dark Sister? Once wielded by Visenya Targaryen, I believe. A slender blade; designed for woman’s hand originally, but you swing it with enough grace.” Her voice was suspicious.

“Aye, and it was last wielded by Bryden Rivers, the Bloodraven, when he took the black. It went missing north of the Wall and ended up in my possession.” That was true, at least, though Jon wouldn’t mention the greenseer.

“Indeed.” She cocked her head. “You are not what we expected.”

“Should I apologise?”

“Don’t. Lord Manderly prepared White Harbour for a savage wildling king. The whole north has been hearing tales of the King-Beyond-the-Wall that could curdle blood. I thought our host was a fool when he suggested we may make an alliance with the king that broke the Wall. So did many.” She had a piercing gaze. “And yet instead, here you stand.”

Jon didn’t reply. When in doubt, stay silent. She met his eyes, critically, and seemed to frown.

“Let me state the obvious. You can guarantee that others are thinking it. You have white hair, you control a dragon, and you wield a Targaryen sword.”

“White is not my natural hair colour.”

“Nevertheless.” The single word hung in the air.

“I am a bastard, my lady,” Jon said, answering the unspoken question. “I do not know my mother’s heritage.”

She paused. “I heard of you at Winterfell,” she admitted. “Did you know that the rumour was that you were born from Ashara Dayne?”

That caught him off-guard. “I… I did not.”

“Your father was quite taken with Ashara Dayne at Harrenhal, shortly before the war. His brother Brandon teased him relentlessly on it,” Lady Maege explained. “When the war broke out, they always said that Lady Ashara was pregnant.”

“Ashara Dayne,” he repeated. He knew only vague mentions about her. The sister of Arthur Dayne, Sword of the Morning, the finest knight in the realm. House Dayne, one of the most ancient and noble families in Westeros. “I… I don’t…”

“Tis a sad tale. Lady Ashara was said to be a great beauty, dark haired with the brightest violet eyes,” Lady Maege explained. “And then towards the end of the war, Ned Stark rode to the Tower of Joy – a misnamed place if there ever was one – to rescue his sister. He slew Ser Arthur Dayne in single combat, and afterwards returned his greatsword to Starfall. Lady Dayne threw herself out of the Palestone Tower in grief. And from there Lord Stark rode back to Winterfell carrying you, a babe.”

Jon’s head was spinning. Lady Dayne. Does that make me Jon Sand? A child born of war. Did my father really kill my uncle, and my mother committed suicide? Is that what I was to him, a reminder of the love he lost…?

She was looking straight at him. Jon took a deep breath. “Did House Dayne have any Old Valyrian blood in it? Blood of dragonlords?”

“Not as far as I’m aware,” she replied. “House Dayne descends from the First Men. If you are looking for women that have Valyrian ancestry then I can think of few options. Some daughter of House Celtigar or Velaryon? It is possible, I suppose.” Her tone was doubtful. “As is some dragonseeds or Targaryen bastards. As far as the mainline of House Targaryen goes, well…” She stopped to think. “As far as I’m aware, there was only one mature Targaryen woman around at the time; Queen Rhaella Targaryen, wife of the Mad King. And she was pregnant. Do you think it’s likely that Ned Stark had a clandestine affair with his liege’s wife?”

The thought was so outlandish Jon could have laughed. “Of course not!”

“Then I run out of options who could be your mother,” she said with a nod. “I vaguely recall someone mentioning a nursemaid that Lord Stark met in Starfall, but I cannot attest to it.”

Jon shook his head. “I spent my childhood agonising over the identity of my mother, I will not do it any longer. No matter who she is, serving girl or highborn, it doesn’t matter.”

“Is your mother why you refuse to accept your brother’s will?” Her voice turned sharp. “To refuse legitimisation?”

“No,” Jon admitted. The room was quiet, he kept his voice low. “But I know of the Great Bastards, my lady. I know of the Blackfyre Rebellions. If I took the name Stark, then that would be one more insult my enemies would throw at me. Pretender. Usurper. It is a name that will only divide when we should unite.” Jon shook his head, and laughed hollowly. “Just another bastard trying to steal the realm. I will not do it.”

For a moment, there was some strange expression he couldn’t recognise in Lady Maege’s eyes. “Indeed. You are interesting man, King Snow.”

“Thank you, my lady.”

“I’m not so sure it was compliment.”

He smiled softly. “Very well.”

“Answer me one thing,” she said. “What happened to my brother, Jeor Mormont?”

Jon’s eyes flickered. “He is dead. He died on a ranging north.”
Her face frowned; not angry, just faintly sad. “I thought as much. Did you kill him?”

“No, I did not. I swear it, my lady, he died fighting the Others, not the free folk.” There was no immediate reaction, just a quiet nod. “I’m sorry for your loss,” Jon said after a pause, sounding earnest.

She sighed. “My brother was an insufferable, grouchy, little sod,” Lady Maege said with a grunt. “Part of me thought he took the black just because he couldn’t stand my presence. But he was my brother, and I loved him, wretched fool as he was.” After a moment’s pause, she frowned. “And what happened to his sword? Our family’s sword, Longclaw?”

Jon’s face was pained. “It was lost, my lady.” It felt like something else needed to be said. “I wish I could have saved him.”

“If wishes were warmth then summer would last forever, King Snow,” she said curtly, walking towards the door. “But I believe Lord Manderly would see us shortly. There is a war to declare.”

“Very well,” Jon nodded. He paused, twitching, and then called, “Lady Maege… are you happy to accept the alliance between the wildlings?”

The She-Bear stopped. “Happy? No. Bear Island has suffered more from wildlings than anyone. I grew up losing friends in raids from the Frozen Coast,” she said. Her voice was like iron. “But queerer unions have happened. And my brother was too simple to lie; if he said the dead were rising, then I’ll believe it.”

She stopped at the doorway. “Jeor also said that you could be a good leader,” she continued. “In one of his letters, he wrote that he hoped you might succeed him. I’ll believe that one too.”

When she left, Jon released a sigh he never realised he’d been holding. There was something about Lady Maege that felt as hard as the strictest matron.

Outside, it was already dusk. Gods, where did the day go? Doubtless tomorrow would be just as busy.

He paused as he looked out over the setting sun. Despite what he said, he couldn’t stop his head from raising up at the sky. He could see the flickering stars in the darkening red sky. Ashara Dayne, Jon thought. Could I really be the nephew of the Sword of the Morning? Jon Sand, of Starfall?

Jon was summoned to meet with the lords again that night. Minor lords from White Harbour and the surrounding area, not just great lords. They met in Lord Wyman’s personal solar, far smaller and more cramped than the Merman’s Court. All eyes were wary and red; Jon didn’t think that anyone had been sleeping for all the frenzied discussions and talk of war.

Besides Lord Manderly, Galbart Glover and his brother, Lord Umber, Lady Mormont, Lady Flint, and Lord Locke, there were a dozen other petty lords of the White Knife present. Jon looked coolly around the room. The Greatjon stood stiffly at the doorway, arms still folded, but there was maybe something less hostile in his expression.

“We all know why we’re here,” Lord Wyman announced. “I wish for everyone here to place our seals on a declaration of war. To reclaim our lands and justice for our lost kin.”

Nobody spoke first. Jon stepped forward.

“Let us start with what we want,” Jon said to the quiet room, after a long pause. He looked between Lord Wyman, Lord Umber, and Lady Maege. “I want security for the free folk, the realm put to rights, and the defence of the Wall. You want justice for the crimes committed by House Bolton, your lands and holds secured. Am I right in saying that no one in the room can achieve their wants unless we all agree to work together?”

There was no immediate reply. “And what's to stop you and your savages raiding our lands if we don’t comply?” A man demanded, some minor lord or knight that Jon didn’t know.

“Nothing,” Jon admitted. “Except I don’t want to.”

An alliance is in their best interests too, Jon thought. They're all just nervous.

Galbart Glover demanded that his family was to be rescued at any measure. The Greatjon demanded that Last Hearth was to be recovered, and that there was to be no mercy for those responsible. The matter of citizenship and amnesty for the wildlings caused the Greatjon to spit on the floor, but there were no objections. Maege Mormont was the voice of reason as things became heated, while Lord Wyman came close to expelling one obnoxious lord from the room.

Jon said very little. He remained calm, stoic and patient even though it felt like a few of them were trying to draw him into a fight.

I have the army and the dragon here. They need me more than I need them.

The Greatjon made the demand that Ramsay Bolton was to be hung, drawn and quartered. Nobody objected to that one, and Jon found himself agreeing happily as well.

Finally, some sort of agreement was reached. Lord Wyman called a scribe to dictate a letter.

Jon had never known a message take so long to write. The lords seemed to squabble over every detail, on what to include. Lord Whitehill insisted fiercely that the letter should be signed in name of the Seven, while others demanded that the north would only follow the Old Gods. Jon could feel himself becoming more irritated, but he couldn’t let himself be drawn into an argument. Stay calm. Stay focused.

Lord Umber wanted to declare the alliance for Bran Stark, but Lord Wyman insisted that it was too dangerous to declare for a King in the North until one was secured. Instead, Jon forced them to declare for the only Stark that they could be sure of: Arya.

It was the hour of the owl before the letter was finally written. The scribes agreed to copy it with all haste, and the ravens would fly at first light. Jon spent a long time reading it over and over again, and when the line was done the scribe read it out in a loud, clear:

“On behalf of all true and loyal houses in the north, I hereby declare Lord Roose Bolton a usurper and his rule unlawful, and I call upon all good men to bring justice for the crimes committed by House Bolton.

“The Red Wedding was planned and perpetrated by Bolton men for their own advancement. We have witnesses Lord Jon Umber of Last Hearth, Ser Wylis Manderly of White Harbour, and Robin Flint of Widow’s Watch who attest to the murders. Roose Bolton murdered the good and noble King Robb Stark with his own blade, in breach of the laws of fealty and hospitality. They are as guilty as the Freys of the Crossing for the massacre; House Bolton planned and perpetrated the coup from the beginning.

“For his detestable crimes, the crown saw fit to name Bolton as Warden of the North – a rank left invalid by the illborn boy that sits on the Iron Throne. There is no legitimacy to any of Bolton’s claims.

“True bannerman of the north renounce the Bolton’s rule. The north renounces the Iron Throne. The north remembers.

“Their crimes are countless and evident. The daughter of the honourable and true Lord Eddard Stark, Arya Stark, was forcibly and unlawfully wed to Ramsay Snow, Bastard of Bolton. A wedding under force is no true wedding. The whole north knows of the monstrous crimes committed by the Bolton Bastard. His first ‘wife’, the widow Lady Hornwood, was starved, tortured and murdered in a tower after being wed at dagger point. Loyal bannermen of the north must rally to save the young Lady Stark from such a fate.

“The Sack of Winterfell, a crime accused on the ironborn, was committed by Bolton men under Ramsay Snow. They torched the castle and put its inhabitants to the sword, another ploy to weaken House Stark’s power in preparation for their defiance. There are countless deaths of innocents that demand justice.

“It falls on noble houses to bring Roose Bolton and his illborn spawn to trial, and to rescue the rightful Lady Stark of Winterfell.

“To answer the call, free men from the lands beyond the Wall have been enlisted against the true foe. Warriors from the far north and loyal bannermen stand side by side, united in the common cause of defending the realm. The forces that hold Karhold, that march from Eastwatch, Castle Black and Shadow Tower are allied with those of White Harbour, Last Hearth and Bear Island.

“The white dragon has been tamed and mounted to put the north to rights. The conspirators, the vermin of House Frey, have already been served justice by dragonfire. The Twins was destroyed in the name of vengeance for Robb Stark, and the same dragon stands ready at the forefront of our armies.

“Let Roose Bolton and his bastard stand judgement before the lords of the north for his crimes. There will be a trial, or they will be brought to trial. He will be judged by the laws of men, by the honour of the Old Gods and in the light of the Seven.”

“Signed Jon Snow of Winterfell. Son of Eddard Stark, half-brother to Robb Stark. Defender of the Realm, King-Beyond-the-Wall, and dragonrider.

“Allied alongside Lord Wyman Manderly of White Harbour, Lord Jon Umber of Last Hearth, Lady Maege Mormont of Bear Island, Galbart Glover Master of Deepwood Motte, Lord Howland Reed of Greywater Watch, Lady Lyessa Flint of Widow’s Watch, Lord Ondrew Locke of Oldcastle.

“The north knows no king but the King in the North, whose name is Stark.”

Jon signed his name to the bottom. He didn’t have a seal, so he left the space blank. It went around the room for lords to sign and seal. It was a big letter to fit on a raven’s leg.

“This is your chance,” Lady Maege said quietly, her voice low enough that no one else would hear. “Follow your brother’s will, and take the name Stark. Let us sign a different name rather than Snow.”

“No.” Jon shook his head simply. He could hardly even explain why it felt so wrong to be Jon Stark, but it just did.

“What do you think?” Galbart Glover asked Lord Wyman behind him.
The fat man paused. “I think that this letter, with those names behind it, aye, that carries weight. It will cause a stir. I do not imagine any Bolton supporter will be sleeping easily. Lord Bolton will never surrender for a farce of a trial, of course, but it is justification enough to begin a campaign.” He paused. “And yet all the ink in the world is useless without the actions to support it.”

“And it is signed by a bastard’s name,” Lord Locke said sourly. “We are giving the realm the choice between one bastard or another.”

Jón didn’t react. He kept his gaze completely cool and stoic as he looked towards Lord Locke. The room felt tense. They shuffled around in silence. The start of a new war.

“I want riders to leave as soon as possible,” Lord Wyman said finally. “Criers to every town and village for leagues around. Let them all know the deal that was struck tonight.” He turned to Jon. “You will have your ships to Eastwatch within days, Your Grace. But first I need your vow that the army at Karhold will be brought to order.”

“Aye,” Jón promised. “I will leave on dragonback on the morn.”

In the end, that was what it came down to: promises and vows. The Greatjon forced him to promise that he would try to find out who raided his daughters’ caravan, and then also threatened that at the first wildling raid then all agreements would be off. Lady Maege needed a promise that all raids on Bear Island from the Frozen Shore would stop, and that the dragon would be ready to defend Bear Island should the Boltons launch an invasion. Galbart Glover only demanded his family must be ransomed and recovered.

There was more talk with other lords, and reassurances concerning protection, family, lands and payment. Jón didn’t even know many of their names. He found himself growing more and more stoic as he looked around the grim, nervous faces and listened to the polite, desperate talk.

So much fear and tension in the room. Everyone has so much at stake, and this is war. They’ve all lost family, and they are likely to lose more still. Why do people talk only about all the big battles and not of all the nervous meetings and grim war council discussions?

“I suggest that White Harbour will become the centre of this coalition,” Lord Wyman continued behind him. “We will need steel, sellswords and more from the Free Cities. And my gates will accept refugees and free folk from the north.”

“What of armoursmiths?” Jón asked, shaking himself out of his distraction. “Does White Harbour have smithies capable of forging steel in bulk?”

“Armour for your forces? It is easier to purchase it.”

“Armour for giants. And armour for mammoths,” Jón said, to a few glances. “As well as steel armour for a dragon.”

There was more discussion. The Greatjon and Lady Maege were to head out quickly, to raise forces from loyal lords to the north. Galbart Glover wanted to leave for Deepwood Motte but Lord Wyman argued that the journey would be too long and too dangerous.

Jón just stood rigidly. For all the discussion and tension, he knew this was only just beginning. Perhaps when he had been younger he would have been excited with the thought of marching off to battle, but now he just felt weary, stiff.

He wanted to retire for the night, but Lord Wyman insisted on having a feast and a celebration of their declaration. Jón was too tense and too tired to understand how he could even want such, but he found himself going along with it in any case. Summons were sent out, and suddenly the whole castle seemed to be stirring.

“A feast is important,” Lord Wyman insisted, as the lords moved down to the Merman’s Court. “We must announce the news in proper manner.”

It was very late, but the castle gates were opened and the city was restless. Half of the Manderly household was crammed into the Merman’s Court, along with every noble and rich merchant in the city. The long tables were overfilled, and crowds spilled out through the doorway. There wasn’t the time to prepare a feast, so instead they just served wine by the gallon. The Greatjon drunk more than Jon thought possible.

The Merman’s Court was stunned as Lord Wyman announced the news in a booming voice. That White Harbour was allied with the dragon, the wildlings would join them in the fight against the Boltons. Defiance against the Iron Throne, and an army of tens of thousands and a dragon by their side.

There were a few nervous cheers, but there were more confused mutters than anything. Jon felt hundreds of eyes fixed on him.

Jon was sat at the high table, besides Lord Wyman himself. His throne was almost just as tall as the lord’s. A seat fit for a king. The last feast I attended, he thought, I was sat in the bastard’s chair. Nobody looked twice at the bastard, hidden among the men. Now, I’m on the high table and everyone is staring at me. Did I ever imagine that I would end up here?

He felt far too tense for any cheer. They served wine, but Jon didn’t trust himself to drink it. He had never known any ‘feast’ so tense – it felt like the entire hall was muttering and whispering. Dozens of men approached Lord Manderly to voice their worries – trade from the Seven Kingdoms, supplies in their granaries for winter, the refugees in the city – but no one approached Jon with anything other than wide-eyed stares.

It was late, when a brave minstrel stepped forward to play his harp. The sound rang out over the cavernous court as his fingers plucked in a long, slow melody. Jon slowly recognised the tune as the Rains of the Castamere.

He felt the hall tense, but then he made out the words the minstrel was singing.

“And who are you, the late lord said, that I must respect some feed?

Only a bowl of bread and salt,
that’s not the vow I need.

Be a wolf or a leaping trout, give crossbows to the bards,

And may the north remember this, my king,
the Freys send their regards.

And so he croaked, and so he croaked, that Lord of the Crossing,

But now the snow sits o’er his hall, with no one left to sing.

Yes now the snow sits o’er his hall, and not a soul shall sing.”

When he finished, a cheer went up through the court. It was the first time all night that there was laughter breaking through the tension. Lord Wyman applauded, stamping his great feet from under the table.

Jon didn’t smile. He just sat and watched. A few other bards and singers followed suit: changing words, adding new verses, turning it into a glorious victory ballad. “The Frayed Crossing”, Jon thought quietly, as he took a deep breath.

Val

Eastwatch-by-the-Sea looked like whole different place. Somehow, in the weeks since she last past through, the whole castle and village had boomed into a thriving settlement. She saw the smoke and fires thick on the horizon, the sound of cattle and livestock bustling. The small village of thatch and stone had expanded into an overflowing flood of bodies and tents, with palisades, ditches and spike walls stretched over the countryside. The harbour was filled with ragtag boats, ships and barges.

Even from the distance, she saw shapes of giants and mammoths at the fringes of the camp.

“How many do you think?” Val asked as her small group approached. They rode hard-bred pounceys through the snow, bringing with them two wayns of blankets, arrows and rusted iron weapons for the Eastwatch force.

“Thirty thousand?” a free folk said with a shrug. “Likely more.”

And the majority of them have white stones on their chest, she noted as they entered through the earthen defences. Nearly all of them, actually. The Lord of Bones ruled as the lord of the Eastwatch, but since Mother Mole and her followers moved through the Wall their numbers were legion.

She headed into the castle itself. The grim stone towers had been decorated with wildling statues and markings. It used to feel barren and desolate, but now it felt lively and hectic.

The castle’s courtyard was now dominated by a hulking structure of oak. They had built a huge wooden hut right by the gate, and inside a whole weirwood tree had been cut down and carved into the shape of a winged, white serpentine figure, with its jaws open. The statue had smoothened obsidian shards for eyes, and it was painted with streaks of red that looked like blood. It stood in a place of awe, in the middle of the temple for the ice dragon.

Somebody felled a whole weirwood tree to carve that thing, Val thought, as she looked at the dragon’s eyes. The free folk didn’t used to chop down weirwoods – the trees used to be sacred.
Val met Garth in the middle of the Eastwatch crowds, as he overlooked the huge gate through the ice. The older man looked more tired and worn than she had ever seen him. “Garth,” she called, smiling. “How are you, old friend?”

“Val,” he said with smile and sigh. “Lady of Val of Whitetree, I hear.”

“Don’t you start,” she scoffed, moving to pull him into a hug.

“It is good to see you. You look well.”

“As do you,” she lied. “How goes it?”

“Long days and long nights,” Garth said. “King Snow appointed me ‘Warden of the Exodus’, along with two other men and women. It was our job to bring as many living south of the Wall as possible, and gods if I had known it would be so hard.”

“Hardhome?” she asked.

“It’ll be deserted by now. The very last of the folk there will be sailing down the peninsula now,” he explained. “We could not move them all quickly in the cold, so it had to be done step by step so we were not left undefended.”

She cast a cautious eye of the crowds and sprawling camp. She saw hungry mobs, and cold, hard eyes. It did not look like a safe place for a young mother and her child. “What of my sister?”

“Dalla will be arriving by ship shortly,” Garth promised. “The sky was calm and wind steady, and with her babe we thought safer to go by sea rather than make the trek. Less risk of an Other attack.”

Good, Mance had tasked with her bringing Dalla back safely. “Were there any attacks?”

“Four,” he said grimly. Gods, no wonder he looks so weary. “But none so bad as that night. And King Snow left his direwolf with us, for protection.”

She blinked. “His direwolf?”

“Aye, the beast is hunting north right now. The wolf warned us before attacks, but more importantly the man was watching through it. He never abandoned us, and we could have called the dragon to aid us when needed.” Garth paused, and then added, “Is it queer that I think the Others were aware of that too? They didn’t seem to risk it.”

“Wargs.” The word had so often been used as a curse, but now she said it with a touch of uncertainty.

“I won’t deny their use,” Garth said with a shrug. “King Snow promised status and protection to any skinchanger that came forward. And he might be the most powerful skinchanger of all.”

She glanced behind her, at the ice dragon temple. It was crowded even now with shuffling bodies. A mother and her babe prayed together at the base of the statue. Val noticed more carvings rather than just dragons; there was wolf statuette of cream oak with red eyes, and a feline statuette of ebony pine with amber eyes, both standing at the base of the dragon. Garth noticed her looking.

“You see there?” He pointed to the west of the castle, and a stubby tower on the walls. “That’s the Hook Tower, reserved for the king. Right now, the only creature there is the king’s shadowcat, and the man himself hasn’t been to Eastwatch in months. That’s a whole tower, just for a shadowcat. That cat is kept better fed than most folk too.”
“So even his pets are royal too.”

“Aye, even his pets,” Garth agreed. “Word spread around that the king favours those who gift him animals. First it was Kyleg Stonehand bringing a great snow owl. Then Marrick One-Foot and his clan spent four days capturing and reigning in a big brute of a bull auroch that they intend to present to him. Not to be outdone, Aki Twentysons and his family vowed to capture a snow bear for him, one bigger and stronger than Varamyr ever had. Larrs the Pretty took the challenge – he started bartering with one of the giant clans, so he could bring King Snow his very own mammoth.”

Val stared incredulously. “These people are fighting for their lives and they’re worried about gaining favour with him?”

He nodded. “Aye. Take a look at that temple over there and tell me you’re surprised.”

She pursed her lips. Her eyes darkened slightly.

Everywhere she looked, she saw pale faces, gaunt expressions, and wide eyes. Even now, there were more people trekking through the great gates. The line of free folk never stopped. Maybe it was an army, but it was a weak, exhausted and hungry army.

“And now they’re coming south of the Wall,” Val said after a pause. “How do you intend to feed them all?”

Garth shrugged. “Isn’t that why we’ve got a king?”

It was only the next day when she realised what he meant. She was awoke at first light by the sound of shouts and horns. They spotted the white dragon flapping in the distance, circling around the coastline. Shortly later, there were cries of sails on the horizon.

Ships, Val realised, big ones. They were galleys of dark oak, each with three sails and lines of oars. Big southron ships coming north. The ships flew a green half-fish figure as well as a grey wolf on their banners.

But the dragon isn’t attacking them, she realised. Instead, Sonagon flew in slow, lazy circles above the vessels – escorting them. She heard the mutters ripple around her as the crowds gathered. Some were rushing for weapons, but not many.

It was noon by the time the dragon finally came into Eastwatch. It dropped itself onto the roof of the keep, and Val saw cautious figures climbing down from it. They used ropes to clamber onto the balcony of the keep.

There were so many men and women rushing forward to meet King Snow that Val could hardly even get close. The free folk pushed, shoved and neighed like cattle, all calling for their king’s attention. It was so hectic that the sudden rush through the gates threatened to crush those in the middle.

Between the shoving bodies, Val didn’t even try to get close enough to see the man, but she heard his voice as he shouted to the crowd from the castle steps. “White Harbour has allied with us!”

King Snow shouted over the chaos. “They will support free folk settling in the north, and fight alongside against those who will not! These ships bring food, blankets and iron. There will be more coming behind them. I cannot promise feasts, but I promise that nobody will starve!”

The mob reached fever pitch. Some shouting questions, but Val saw other faces of wide-eyed, stunned hope and devotion. She didn’t see where it came from, but slowly she started to hear the sound of stomping feet, and the chant from a dozen lips. “King Snow! King Snow!” The cry spread around the crowd, growing louder. “King Snow! King Snow!”

Bloody kneelers, Val thought angrily, turning to walk away. The supplies were good, but they’d be kissing his feet at this rate.

She could hardly even explain why the thought left her so bitter. The thought of her lying in his bed, and that word – shameful – flickered through her memory.

The ships docked that afternoon. So many crowded around the harbour that it took the king and his Dragonguard to keep order. Huge boxes and barrels were unloaded by nervous sailors. Most of it was taken into the castle by Rattleshirt and his men, but they were already starting to distribute crates of turnips, fish and grain by the beach.

Val had very little to do with it; she only gave the scene glances from afar. Instead, she moved around the camp, enquiring after her sister, the giants and people she knew. More than once, though, she heard the phrase “the blessings of the ice dragon”. She even saw men and women wearing white furs and with the shape of a dragon’s body painted or tattooed onto their cheek – the most devout of Mother Mole’s followers had taken to dedicating themselves to their god. The dragon worshippers.

No doubt there’ll be more joining the cause after tonight, she thought darkly. Right now, they had one temple. Soon, there could easily be more.

Even after dusk, the camp didn’t settle. The king hosted the sailors from the ships in the castle, while outside it looked like a celebration. Huge bonfires were raised, with the sound of singing and chanting filling the air. Whole queues of men and women formed at the castle gates, pushing and shouting for an audience with King Snow. The Dragonguard had to huddle to keep them all back, while men uselessly bellowed for the king’s attention.

Val set up her tent and retired early for the night. It was a full moon, pale light shimmering over the smoke and fires around Eastwatch. She saw the dragon’s scales glint in the moonlight. It’s a new age, Val recalled Mother Mole proclaiming. An age of people bowing and whimpering at the ice dragon’s feet.

The night stretched out, but there was no sleep to be have. Then, she saw a hooded figure walked towards her tent. The figure went straight for the door. She reached out for her knife.

“You walk towards a spearwife’s tent and you lose an appendage,” Val warned, drawing her blade. It was late, but she wore furs and leathers at all times, wrapped in her white snow bear fur cloak.

“Val,” a familiar voice said. He lowered his hood, and she saw bone white hair. “It’s me.”

She didn’t lower the knife.

“Snow,” Val said curtly. “You’ve got crowds wanting to see you.”

“Furs will keep them back,” Jon sounded tired. “I’m in no mood to stand before any of them.”

“And here you are. Is it normal for kings to have to sneak away from their… what is it?… subjects in the dead of night under a hood?”

“Perhaps not.” He smiled humourlessly. “But there are only so many problems I’m capable of handling in a day.”
She didn’t return the smile. “Well, where are my manners? I should be curtsying, should I not?” she said snidely. “Or do you want me to turn around and hide myself under a blanket, so I do not tempt you into anymore ‘shameful’ acts?”

“Val…”

“Or perhaps you just want to continue where we left off,” she continued. She knew she was being aggressive, but she was angry enough not to care, “after bedding me and dismissing me as a mistake? I hear in the south you have those ‘silent sisters’, so perhaps you want–”

“Val,” he said, with a low sigh. “I’m here to apologise. I’m sorry, I shouldn’t have reacted how I did.”

Her eyes narrowed, but she didn’t speak. Her arms folded.

He smiled ruefully, gaze flickering. She saw the dark circles under his eyes. “I… I enjoy your company,” he said hesitantly. “I enjoy spending time with you, I… I enjoyed spending the night with you. You’re beautiful, and… I didn’t mean to – it happened fast, and I don’t want to…”

His voice seemed to trail off. She let the silence linger for a good while, before finally asking, “what do you want, King Snow?”

“I don’t even know,” he admitted. His expression felt softer. None of the iron demeanor he put on when others were watching. “I want to do my duty well. I want to protect people, I want to keep my promises, and I…” A pause, a sheepish gulp. “I’ve made a lot of promises recently. I promised a lot to even just get this far, and then I promised more to get this alliance. I don’t want to make another promise that I can’t keep or another person that I fail, but I would still…” He sighed. “I would really, really like it if I could spend more time with you.”

The silence returned. Val kept her face stoic, but her heart betrayed her with a slight skip.

His face looked pained. “And right now,” he admitted in a quiet murmur and with wide, honest eyes. “I really like to just go to sleep. I have been working on half a day’s rest for the last week and I am so tired.”

Her posture broke. A chuckle broke through her lips, and she felt herself smile. She moved her hand upwards, scratching at her chin. He seemed different, more vulnerable, more… weary and exposed.

“How many women have you had, Jon Snow?” Val said finally, keeping her voice quiet.

“Just one. Ygritte,” he replied. His gaze flickered to the ground. “And she… Ygritte pursued me quite forwardly. Even when we first lay together, I did so because… well, I did so because I thought I had to fit into Mance’s host. I loved Ygritte, I did, but I… gods!” he cursed, breaking his ramble. “I suppose what I’m saying is that I don’t know much on how to do this.”

“With women?”

“With anything.”

Her cheeks twitched. There was something of a young, lost, little pup in his expression. It made a change from the cold, quiet and strong wolf she was used to. She took a step forward. “It’s really quite simple,” she whispered. “Kiss me.”

She could feel the air between them. He took a step forward too. She could see every detail of his face; the lines around his eyes, the faint grey stubble on his chin. Dark eyes and white hair. She felt him leaning in, and his breath on her lips.

The kiss was soft, light and chaste. Val didn’t know why, but that made her giggle.

There was a long moment of quiet. Suddenly, all of the noises from outside didn’t seem to matter.

They paused, their breaths hushed. His arms wrapped around her slowly, but still he seemed to hesitate. Like there was something else he needed to say. “I pushed Ygritte off a cliff,” he muttered, eyes pained. “The Others were coming for us and I needed to get her away, but I... I promised to protect her and then I pushed her away.”

She paused. Ah. “You don’t need to promise anything to me,” she muttered. He felt his hand stroke her hair. He had nice fingers. Her hand touched his chest, tracing the line of his scar. “Let’s go to bed, Jon.”

He nodded. His lips moved forward to kiss her again. Her hands slowly unfastened his tunic. Then, they wrapped themselves in the furs of her tent, curled up together, and went to sleep.
Chapter 28

Chapter Summary

The kings in the realm, and the tyrants trying to destroy it. The war of five kings come again.

Chapter 28

The Imp

Their camp was bustling, constantly hectic. They had ridden most of the day, but somehow even when they’d stopped the activity had never ceased. The camp was nestled by a curve of the Tumblestone River, north of Lord Harroway’s Town. The muddy earth was covered in a faint slush of dirty snow stomped by boots and hooves. There’d been no time to set up stakewalls around the campsite, but the men of the Golden Company were experienced enough to patrol and watch diligently.

It was a hard, bare campsite of horses and a hundred hide tents with few comforts, but it wasn't the worst place Tyrion had ever stayed. The lack of wine caused him more grief than the lack of blankets.

Tyrion saw the riders come from the north. Three chargers galloping down the road. “Is it true?” the dwarf asked eagerly, as they approached.

“Aye,” one of forward riders said. His eyes were grim and his face exhausted. “It's true. We followed the river north and saw it ourselves; the castles really have been turned to rubble. I swear, I've never seen aught like it.”

“Survivors?” Ser Franklyn Flowers asked harshly. Tyrion was trembling.

“Few. Not many of the host at the Twins made it out, and then the monster chased down those who did.” The man looked an experienced, hard-faced sellsword, but he sounded unnerved. “We saw riots from Fairmarket to Oldstones. Whole mobs mad with panic.”

It’s true. Dragons. The laughter broke through Tyrion’s throat. The sound caused a few men to jump. “That is brilliant!” He cackled. “Come, let us raise a toast! To Walder Frey, and the legacy he will leave!”

There were some strange looks at him. The news of the dragon had left the riverlands in disarray, even many of the Golden Company had been shaken. For days, the ravens were flocking around the sky in panic – demanding answers where there were few to be had. Nobody had expected the destruction of the Twins, and now it was just gone.

Still, Tyrion just had to smile.

Walder Frey worked with my father, Tyrion thought viciously. The destruction of the Twins is just another bit of my father's legacy broken to pieces. And by the time I'm done the realm will remember Tywin as the great lord who broke everything.
These last months had been... revitalising. Tyrion felt like he had a purpose again.

“Dragons,” he muttered out-loud, as he waddled back to his tent. “Dragons!”

“Just the one dragon, it seems,” said Ser Franklyn Flowers, walking next to him. Ser Franklyn was a big-bellied, shambling hulk of a man with a seamed face crisscrossed with old scars. His right ear looked as if a dog had chewed on it and his left ear was missing entirely. He was an extremely formidable fighter, and a loyal lieutenant, so Tyrion quite liked having the man with him. By comparison, Tyrion was one of the few men who could make Ser Franklyn seem handsome.

“But it’s a big one,” Tyrion chuckled. “Do you not see the jape? I go halfway around the world for Queen Daenerys’ dragons and it turns out there’s one right here at home. Our king declares himself a dragon returned, but, no, a real dragon has already beaten him to it!”

“How the hells can you even laugh about it?” Ser Franklyn said incredulously. “That dragon ain’t on our side, you know.”

“We should all be laughing. We might as well laugh rather than cry.”

In his tent, a letter waited for him where he left it. Such a glorious letter too. Tyrion had read the letter several dozen times already, and his reaction had slowly turned from incredulous shock to laughter. Jon Snow, now King-Beyond-the-Wall and dragonrider, Tyrion thought. He remembered the young bastard, he had even befriended him during the trip to the Wall. Who would have guessed?

“What does this mean for us?” Ser Franklyn grumbled.

“Means?” Tyrion scoffed. “It means that our king may well be scorched – sorry, froze – to a crisp should a certain Stark bastard wish it. And there’s absolutely nothing we can do about that possibility either. The whole realm stands at the northern king’s mercy; we are somewhat lacking dragons ourselves.”

“We have a dragon,” another sellsword said harshly. A tall, hard-faced serjeant called Chains.

“King Aegon is a dragon.”

“But not the flying sort, I’m afraid.”

“I don’t bloody understand,” Ser Franklyn grumbled. “How can there be a dragon in the north? Why is it here?”

Tyrion chuckled as he scrambled up onto a seat. They were no chairs with them, so instead he just used a barrel. “Oh, it’s quite simple really; it’s here because the gods are cunts,” he explained, with a cheerful, bitter laugh. “All of them – vicious little cunts. The powers-that-be heard of Aegon’s return, a young boy with a very good chance of actually reclaiming his throne, and so they decided to ruin that plan with another conqueror with another dragon. They are gods – they’ll stamp on your face every single time.”

There were a few glances shared between the Company serjeants. Tyrion didn’t really care what they thought of him. Lord Tywin had been obsessive about preserving his reputation, staying stiff and prideful. Tyrion didn't have a reputation – he was already the drunken, fiendish dwarf. There had been mummers’ plays performed about the Imp’s evil misdeeds. So instead, Tyrion had resolved himself to drink and to jape, and yet be just as ruthless as his father ever was. More.

“But this letter,” Tyrion said finally, pointing, “it came from Harrenhal, did it not?”
“Aye.” The Golden Company had taken Harrenhal a week past, and the castle fell very easily too. The castle supposedly belonged to Lord Baelish, but it had been held by Ser Bonifer Hasty and the Holy Hundred. Then Ser Bonifer left for King’s Landing for the ‘Holy War’ brewing between Crown and Faith, which had left Harrenhal so poorly held a token force of the Golden Company managed to seize it easily.

“If Harrenhal received a raven, then it’s a good bet that Storm’s End has too,” Tyrion said. “Oh, how I wish I could be there to see King Aegon’s reaction when he reads it.” Though, truthfully, it’s Jon Connington’s reaction I’d be more interested in. Perhaps one of the spies I left behind could relay it?

“We can’t fight against a dragon,” Chains grumbled. “If this bastard Jon Snow has declared himself king too, where does that leave us?”

Tyrion stopped to think about it. He shook his head. “It doesn’t change a thing,” he said finally. “Our plans remain the same for now. Read the letter; Jon Snow has not declared himself king of the Iron Throne – his interest appears to be in the north.” But how long will that last? He paused, biting his lip.

“I know of Jon Snow. I met him, travelled with him for a time,” Tyrion admitted. “I remember a young, brooding boy so bitter about being a bastard that he ran off to take the black. Nice lad, though a bit sullen, naive and arrogant. I have difficulty matching him with the king declared in this letter. And yet I suppose war changes us all.” Idly, Tyrion ran his finger over the scar mutilating his face and cutting through his missing nose.

They were all looking at him, uncertainty in their eyes. “No, we must use this to our advantage,” Tyrion said. “The riverlands has lost its major force, and the west is now lacking its warden.” I must raise a toast to my poor cousin Daven. We Lannisters seem to be dropping like flies. “If Aegon has his wits, he’ll use this to his advantage as well. The people are panicked, they should be calling for a strong Targaryen leader to save them from the savages and dragons.”

“And if the Bastard King flies south to raze Aegon’s castle too?”

“I’m not so sure that he will. But if he does, we will negotiate.” I wonder what type of man Jon Snow has become? “We will stall him with talk and empty words, and we will do so for as long as we can without fighting him. Remember that sooner or later Queen Daenerys will be coming from the east, and she will bring three dragons versus his one. When she arrives, Aegon Targaryen must be sitting on the Iron Throne, and of course Daenerys will support her own family over a northern pretender.”

Hopefully, with Queen Daenerys’ reinforcements, they could convince Jon Snow to bend the knee. If not, he’d have to die to secure the Seven Kingdoms. Tyrion wouldn’t be happy to see the boy dead, but, well, Tyrion had lived with worse deeds.

The thought of Shae’s gasping face flickered across his eyes. He wished he had some wine.

The sellswords didn’t look convinced. “It changes nothing,” Tyrion insisted. “Our war is in the south, we leave the north alone. We need only take King’s Landing and then the rest of the realm will declare for us. And when Daenerys arrives, it will be simple maths; three dragons is greater than one.”

“Aye, if you say so, my lord.” Chains muttered, as he stepped out the tent.

Tyrion grinned. My lord. Lord Tyrion Lannister, Lord of Casterly Rock. Yes, this changes nothing of the plan.

“Should we prepare to move out?” Ser Franklyn asked.

He mused. “Not just yet. Let’s give our guest one more day to arrive,” he said. “But bring me the letters we have on Riverrun, Darry, Fairmarket and Pinkmaiden. Let us see if we can forge any alliances while the ruins are still warm. Or cold, as the case may be.”

Tyrion settled in, exhaling deeply. He reread the northern letter one more time, just because it was still barely sinking through. A dragon of ice.

“I should think that House Bolton will be able to fill a moat from their collective shit after they read this,” Tyrion announced in his tent, to no one in particular. “Oh, what a grand letter. I shall frame this letter and mount it over my fireplace: in the lord’s chamber of Casterly Rock, right next to where I place my father’s skull and my sister’s crown.”

Some much work to be done. This is my campaign, he thought, and gods it feels exciting. It was Tyrion’s first true campaign as well; the only experience Tyrion had with an army was his short-lived tenure alongside his father’s host, up to the battle on the Green Fork. Even then, his lord father had denied him any true command. Now he was the commander of his own force; a fairly inexperienced commander, true, but Tyrion felt like he was learning quickly.

Now then, how will the riverlands react? Where are the most crucial places? Who will muster forces first? My aunt still holds Riverrun, but her options are limited. Houses Blackwood and Piper are lacking lords, so Pinkmaiden and Raventree will be wide open. The brotherhood without banners and the outlaws are sure to take advantage. Wayfarer’s Rest will be stirring, Fairmarket is in frenzy, and the Saltpans were raided to all hell. Harrenhal is already ours, and House Darry...

Tyrion paused with the thought. After only a brief hesitation, he picked up a quill and started to write a letter. Three letters, all in a swift hand.

“Ser Franklyn,” Tyrion called. “I have a letter here. I want five good riders to head for Castle Darry with all haste.”

“Darry?” Ser Franklyn frowned as he stomped into the tent. “What is there in Darry?”

“An opportunity. This letter is for Darry, addressed to Lady Amerei Frey. These two are for Storm’s End, one for our king and the other for Ser Tristan Rivers,” Tyrion explained. The man looked confused. “I do believe we could a broker a marriage here.”

“A marriage,” he repeated dumbly. Not the sharpest tool, Ser Franklyn, Tyrion thought, but not that I need him to be.

“Yes. The male line of House Darry went extinct during this war,” he explained. “The castle and lands were named instead to my cousin Lancel Lannister when he married Amerei Frey, whose mother was a Darry. The marriage was never consummated, and poor Lancel abandoned his newfound house to go join the Warrior’s Sons. It seems that bedding my sister drove my cousin to a vow of celibacy.” Tyrion chuckled.

The knight still didn’t understand. “This all leaves Lady Amerei Frey, wed but not bedded, in a very precarious position, sitting in a castle that she has little claim to,” Tyrion continued. “However, in the ranks of the Golden Company we have Ser Tristan Rivers, a bastard of Darry who fled Westeros after Robert’s Rebellion. A strong man, a well-seasoned and loyal knight. Such a bastard could be legitimised by the king, to provide Lady Amerei with the claim she needs to keep her castle, and I think that in light of recent events, we could broker a union between them quite quickly.” He paused, and then added, “Very quickly, if half the rumours I hear about Lady Amerei are true.”

“It’s not about men,” Tyrion said irritably. “House Darry is traditionally an extremely Targaryen loyalist house. If House Darry declares for Aegon, then that means something – another part of Targaryen legacy reclaimed for Aegon.”

By the look on his face, it seemed Ser Franklyn was beginning to understand. “But wait,” he said with a frown, “why would this Lady Amerei even want to wed a bastard anyways?”

“Because it’s become very, very unhealthy to be a Frey in this kingdom,” said Tyrion. “She will be looking to ditch her family name as soon as possible.”

Between Lady Stoneheart and the brotherhood without banners and now this ice dragon, it seemed that anyone from House Frey had developed a very short life expectancy.

Ser Franklyn agreed to gather the riders. “And tell them to bring back a casket of wine from Darry, as payment for brokering the marriage!” Tyrion called. “I have gone the last four months without ever being sober and I don’t intend to start now!”

A grin spread over his face as he went through the letters and maps, twisting his scar. Yes, many riverlords will be panicked, and looking for new allies. The Golden Company is in a good position to make some friends.

He could imagine Lord Connington fuming yet unable to object over yet another service Tyrion provided for Aegon. Now aren’t I a devoted ally to the king?

He paused where Riverrun was marked. Tyrion debated the wisdom of visiting his Aunt Genna as well, but decided against it. He had nearly three thousand men under him, and a campaign in the westerlands awaited.

It was dark when his guest finally arrived. The patrols saw the horses coming, and a runner called for him. Tyrion had just left his tent when he saw an old, familiar facing dismounting and walking guardedly through the perimeter. A tall, well-worn man with dark hair and narrowed eyes. The sellswords all watched as he strode through the camp.

Lord Bronn Stokeworth of the Blackwater wore steel and finery rather than his old leathers and ringmail. He wore a steel plate, and a surcoat showing a black lamb on a red field, drinking from a silver chalice. The coat of arms of House Stokeworth, but inverted. Bronn wasn’t just hired muscle now, instead he had two guards of his own walking behind him. He’s come a long way from being the sellsword I picked up at the crossroads inn, Tyrion noted. Oh, doesn’t war change us all?

“Lord Bronn!” Tyrion greeted, his voice slightly icy. “Such a pleasure to see you again.”

Bonn’s eyes were cautious. “Lord Tyrion,” he muttered. “So it’s true; you are behind this invasion. I didn’t think I’d ever see you alive again, my lord.”

“Evil men never die, my lord.” Tyrion replied. “There’s too much bitterness in us, the Stranger won’t go near. That’s why both of us are still alive, is it not? Come into my tent.”

‘Lord’ Bronn followed cautiously. His hand never moved far from his sword. Ser Franklyn kept by Tyrion’s side, staring suspiciously. “And I see you’ve got yourself some new muscle,” Bronn said, with a nod at Ser Franklyn. The burly knight only grunted.

“It’s a profitable position, is it not?” Tyrion said. “Why, just ask my former muscle, and see what heights he’s achieved.”

“You sound bitter.”

“What, because you abandoned me in that jail cell to be executed? Never.”

He only grunted. “You’ve done alright for yourself.”

“As have you. Selling out friends appears to be good business.”

“As does murdering your father.” For the first time, Bronn cracked a wry smile. There’s the old dark sellsword I know.

Tyrion raised his hands. “I’m an opportunist.”

“I didn’t think I’d ever see you with a head again,” Bronn muttered, shaking his head incredulously. “Tell me, how the bloody hell did you manage all this? The Golden Company? Invading Westeros behind a bloody Targaryen?”

“I have too many debts to be repaid, old friend, I didn’t have time to let myself be killed. Pray tell, how has the Seven Kingdoms been since I’ve been away?”

“Falling to pieces. Did you know your sister tried to have me killed?” Bronn said, shaking his head. “She manipulated my new goodbrother to try and kill me. Bloody fool he was. I mean, honestly; the murder plot is bad enough, but sending an assassin that crap is just insulting.”

“Of course. You know Cersei would never rest easily with an old friend of mine sitting so close to her in a position of power.”

“Yes, well.” Bronn just shrugged, dropping onto a barrel cross-legged. “Oh, and I named my son after you.”

“I heard. Little Tyrion Tanner? The bastard born after his mother’s rape by a hundred men? Aww, I’m honoured,” he said with chuckle.

Bonn chuckled too. “I thought you’d like it. I don’t think your sister was laughing, though. Lollys wanted to call the babe Tywin.”

“That would have been better.” He nodded. “How is your lady wife?”

“She’s sweet enough so long as I don’t talk to her,” he said. “But I’m Lord of Stokeworth now, so who cares?”

“So I see. The black sheep on a bloody field is a fitting personal sigil for you.” Tyrion leaned forward, resting his head on his hands. “But let’s be frank; we both know that any opportunities you have in a realm where Cersei is in power are fairly limited. There’ll be more catspaws to kill you, more lords to replace you. Do you really want to keep suffering my sister’s meddling?”

“From what I hear, your sister isn’t going to be in power much longer. She’s not in much power right now, actually.” Bronn shrugged. “My guess is that the Queen Dowager will be removed and sent away somewhere remote, after the mess she’s made of things. She’ll probably be exiled on
“And will the Tyrells, or whoever comes after, treat you any better? Do you expect them to share their influence with you, or invite you to their court?” Tyrion challenged. “You’ll always be just an upjumped sellsword to them, someone to be shunned from their games. Wouldn’t you be better off joining us?”

Bronn bit his lip, pausing. They both knew why Tyrion had invited him, and he rode a long way to get here. The Golden Company could use support. “Hells, I like you. Twisted little thing that you are. But I’m Lord Stokeworth now, I got a castle and everything. So you aren’t buying a blade anymore, you’re dealing with a noble house. Why should House Stokeworth commit rebellion for you?”

“Because you’re a sellsword at heart. And the rewards are great,” Tyrion scoffed. “Don’t act noble; you would sell your own wife for enough gold to buy a prettier one.”

“Is that supposed to be an insult?”

“Do you take it as one?”

“Not really.” Bronn shrugged. “But I got a status at stake now. And I won’t get a damn thing when you lose.”

Behind him, Ser Franklyn stiffened. Tyrion held up his hand. “‘When’?” Tyrion asked curiously. “You think we’re going to lose?”

“Well, yeah.” Bronn nodded. “Your sellswords are putting up a good fight, I’ll give them that. But they ain’t going to be able to take the city, and I can’t afford to back the wrong side here.”

“Every war is a gamble, you know that more than most,” Tyrion said. “But let’s go through the odds, then. How many men are holding the city?”

Bronn paused to think of it. “Five thousand men under Kevan Lannister. Fifteen to twenty thousand under Mace Tyrell. Anywhere between four to eight thousand from the city itself, including gold cloaks.” Bronn would have more experience than most in holding the city. “And you have got – what? – five thousand sellswords marching up the kingsroad?”

“Seven.”

“Alright, seven.” Bronn shook his head. “It still doesn’t work. Stannis had twenty thousand, and he couldn’t break the city walls. And Stannis was up against fewer defenders too – we didn't have Lannister and Tyrell men to support us against Stannis’ siege. You’re not going to win that battle without some serious reinforcements.”

“Except those numbers aren’t right, are they?” Tyrion argued. “Do you really think the Lannister men and Tyrells will still be on the same side when the Golden Company arrives?”

Bronn didn’t reply. “My dear sister holds Queen Margaery hostage in the Red Keep,” Tyrion said softly. “The Red Keep is besieged by the Faith Militant. Neither Mace Tyrell nor my uncle Kevan can even get through the city without triggering riots. This High Sparrow has declared that the Red Keep is on lockdown until Queen Cersei comes forth to stand trial, and she refuses to do so.” He grinned. Thank you Cersei, for your beautiful assistance to my war effort. “Ser Kevan is trying to keep the peace, a difficult task when the king and his wife are being held hostage by his mother.

“So let me share how we are going to win the battle, Lord Bronn, it’s fairly simple; we are going to convince the High Sparrow to declare for King Aegon.”

“But why wouldn’t he?” Tyrion challenged. “Three hundred years ago the High Septon fasted for a week, and then declared Aegon the Conqueror as the anointed and rightful ruler of the realm; do you think this one couldn’t do the same for the rightful Targaryen ancestor? The High Sparrow is a man who cares for the smallfolk, who wants a more devout and dutiful crown, while Aegon VI could be the king he requires. What would a pious septon appreciate more than a young man of humble upbringings, rising up to accept a greater duty?” Tyrion smiled sweetly. “Yes, I think the High Sparrow could be convinced, especially when considering his other options. My sister has proven herself corrupt and unworthy, Stannis is mad and nobody else seems to care about the smallfolk that he holds so dear. Meanwhile, Aegon VI, young, bold and earnest, will prostrate himself before the Faith and pledge to uphold his duty to the people. Once the High Septon and the Faith Militant declare Tommen as illborn and unrightful, then I think the tides in this war will very quickly change.”

Poor Tommen, the thought made Tyrion feel a little guilty. The boy was one of the few innocents in this whole game. Still, it would be worthwhile just to hear Cersei’s screams. I will destroy your legacy, father. I will pull down everything you ever built, brick by brick, just so I can hurt you again.

Bronn was looking a lot more interested. “Alright then.” Bronn nodded. “That would get you a hundred or so Warrior’s Sons, but gods-know-how-many thousands of the Poor Fellows. Smallfolk with pitchforks. There’d be riots in the city like you’d never seen before, and the whole Tyrell-Lannister alliance wouldn’t be looking so good after that. But your young king still needs to beat an army at least twice his size, and he just doesn’t have the numbers.”

“Not so when Dorne declares for us. Do you think that’ll even the odds?”

He looked surprised. “You have Dorne on your side?”

“I spoke to Princess Arianne myself,” Tyrion said smugly. “She is with King Aegon right now. Yes; there’ll be Dornish spearmen fighting alongside the most formidable company in the world. We will take King’s Landing, King Aegon Targaryen takes the Iron Throne to the jubilation of the people, and suddenly lords will start bowing to him. Does that sound like an opportunity you’d want to be a part of?” He cocked his head, meeting Bronn’s gaze. “This is a golden opportunity for you, Lord Stokeworth. A chance to hedge your bets on the dark horse early, and reap the greatest rewards.”

“Alright,” Bronn said, eyes sharp. “And what are you offering me?”

Tyrion smiled. “What castle would you like?”

“What are you bringing?” Ser Franklyn spoke up suspiciously from behind him. “From what I hear, you are nothing but a mercenary who bought a dim-witted highborn wife.”

“I’m Lord Stokeworth. I’ve been recruiting for a while; I’ve got two hundred good men,” Bronn snorted. “Maybe up to five hundred once I round up some of the local boys.”

“Five hundred farmer’s boys and sour sellswords?” Ser Franklyn scoffed. “Ain’t worth it.”

“And he also controls Stokeworth – a castle of crucial importance right outside King’s Landing’s
“Gate,” Tyrion argued. “When King’s Landing is under siege, they rely on Rosby and Stokeworth to provide food and aid. You control them, and that is another notch on the noose.”

“Aye,” Bronn said with a smug smile, “and I could bring you Rosby too. The late Lord Rosby’s ward – the one who controls the castle – he ain’t so fond of Lannisters. You buy my services, and I promise you that no aid from Duskendale or anywhere else will be getting through to King’s Landing.”

Ser Franklyn looked unconvinced. “He’s a fiend, but he’s good for it,” Tyrion promised. “House Stokeworth’s declaration will be the start of a crownlands rebellion, undermining the throne where they should be strongest. And Bronn led the defence of King’s Landing during the last siege against Stannis; who could be better to lead the second siege?” Tyrion turned to Bronn. “Let us go through the numbers, Lord Bronn. Let’s see what your contribution is worth. If you want a second castle or a second wife, I’m sure there’ll be lands and widows to spare. I pay my debts, you know I’m good for that.”

“Shouldn’t it be King Aegon that I speak to?” He said suspiciously. “He’s the one I’m fighting for.”

“I’m the King’s Master of Coin,” said Tyrion. “Aegon appointed me as a commander in his army, to be Warden of the West under his rule. You fight for me.”

Brons shook his head, but he looked impressed. “Well, you’ve got yourself in with him good and proper, haven’t you? How the bloody hell do you manage it? I sell my sword, sure, but somehow you manage to sell your words.”

“His Grace was very appreciative when I helped broker the alliance with Dorne,” Tyrion said. Princess Arianne had been somewhat reluctant to agree to such, but Tyrion helped persuade her. “Come on, walk with me. Let us enjoy the night’s air.”

They stood up and walked out of the tent. The sound of water gushing and crickets chirping sounded in the night, but the camp was restless with the stomping of boots and stirring men. “I want Claw Island,” Bronn decided finally. “You make me the Lord of Claw Island and I’ll declare for you.”

“That is the seat of House Celtigar.” An old and ancient seat too. He’s still ambitious. “It was, until Stannis Baratheon raided that island to the hells and set it on fire,” Bronn explained. “I take Claw Island and all of its lands. I reckon if they’re looking for a new lord they could do a lot worse than me.”

“I’ll bear it in mind.” Tyrion paused, frowning. “So Stannis is still in this fight?”

“Yes, he’s been strangling ships from Dragonstone, and starving the city by sea,” Bronn explained. “They say Stannis went half mad after his defeat on the Blackwater, and then went the other half after his second defeat up north. He doesn’t have the forces to fight any true battles, but he sure has been hacking away at the corners.”

“Last I heard he had less than a dozen ships.” Tyrion shook his head. “How could Stannis even compare against the size of the Redwyne fleet from King’s Landing?”

“He can’t. But I’m not surprised Stannis is still fighting, I am amazed that his men are still following him,” said Bronn. “Most men, even loyal ones, would desert their commanders when their cause becomes that desperate, but his men are fanatics, from what I hear. And he has the luck of a devil with him too; in every raid or ambush he has the wind behind him, but no other vessel does. Stannis burned three galleys off the coast of Dragonstone just the other week.”

“Beautiful.” One more knot in Cersei’s noose – a relentless force blocking travel by sea too. Cersei won’t risk fleeing by ship, and her Royal Navy had been rather lacking ever since Cersei’s ‘Grand Admiral’ Aurane Waters had fled the city along with three dozen of their vessels. That’s another fine decision I must thank her for.

Tyrion stopped to enjoy the view the rivers. Somewhere in the distance a wolf howled, but the sound of boots and horses filled the quiet din. There are thousands of experienced men camped here in the riverlands and ready for war under my command. Let Lord Connington besiege King’s Landing, I have a campaign of my own to lead.

“One thing I don’t get,” Bronn commented as he looked around the camp. “You have, what, three thousand men here?”

“Twenty-five hundred,” he clarified. “All of them mounted men. We went ahead of the main force to secure areas of the riverlands, heading west.” A tactic borrowed from the Young Wolf’s playbook.

“Why the riverlands? Doesn’t Aegon need all the men he can get to take the city?”

“Unfortunately, it seems I will have miss that battle. There is the fear of reinforcements gathering from the west, and so Lord Connington wants to be ready. I was sent ahead of the main host to lead a sortie, as well as to potentially rally any riverlords to our cause.”

That was true, but there had also been something of power struggle between Lord Connington and Tyrion. The Lord Hand was insecure in his position, and he feared Tyrion’s influence. Lord Connington couldn’t get rid of him, of course (the dwarf had nestled himself in too deep), so instead he had resolved to send Tyrion away. Tyrion ended up named as the commander of near three thousand cavalry going west.

Lord Connington wants to take the lion’s share of the victory, he thought with scoff, he doesn’t want me around in King’s Landing. Still, in this case Tyrion was all too happy to comply. There were opportunities that Tyrion intended on exploiting in the riverlands and in the west.

There had not even been a whisper of news concerning his brother Jaime, but Tyrion had been preparing to fight against Ser Daven when the news of the dragon attack against the Twins emerged.

Tyrion explained their plan and the progress they had made. Bronn didn’t look convinced. “Does Lord Connington expect your twenty-five hundred men to fight off the entire westerlands and riverlands for him?” Bronn said doubtfully. “Seems like a waste to me. Whatever force they rally will be more than you can beat.”

“Oh, Lord Connington doesn’t expect me to win anything. He simply requires that I harry and delay any reinforcements heading east until his victory in King’s Landing is complete. The Lord Hand does not want to risk getting caught between two hosts, and the Young Wolf proved that a small force of mounted cavalry moving swiftly in enemy territory can be quite effective,” Tyrion explained dryly. “Ser Franklyn Flowers over there joined me as second-in-command on the off-chance that we would be raiding Cider Hall, while most the other sellswords here joined for the plunder. None of them are the Golden Company’s best, I admit – many of them are unreliable recruits from Lys. No doubt Lord Connington expects to win the war with Aegon before I even play a major role.” Which was doubtless the intention, Tyrion mused. The Lord Hand only allowed Tyrion paused, pursing his lips. “Nevertheless,” he continued slowly as the smile spread over his face. “It occurs to me that there may be an opportunity here. Ser Daven died at the Twins, Ser Kevan is very much distracted in King’s Landing, and my brother Jaime is nowhere to be found. That means my home is currently being held by the old master-at-arms, Ser Benedict Broom.” He felt the smile twist his scar. “So why shouldn’t I march straight for Casterly Rock itself?”

There was a pause. Bronn looked at him like he was japing. Yes, if Lord Connington thinks to reduce my contribution to this war, then let's prove him wrong. “You expect to take Casterly Rock with less than three thousand men?”

“Take? Of course not. A siege or an assault would be pure folly – even dragons would struggle to take that castle. But I am the rightful Lord of the Rock now,” Tyrion mused. “I expect them to open the gates and let me in.”

The Lioness

It was my brother. It was all my brother. He’s behind everything.

Cersei sat stiffly on the hideous iron chair, feeling the world fall to pieces around her. There was another set of petitioners today. Firstly a snivelling envoy from Ser Kevan pleading for her to negotiate, and then from the fishermen’s guild reporting the lack of food. Then, Lord Adrian Celtigar, a gnarly and sour old man, came before the throne sweating and shivering to demand retribution against Stannis after his crimes on Claw Island. She dismissed them all and made no commitments. After that, there were more of those pathetic Warrior’s Sons who demanded that she surrender herself to face trial in the Great Sept of Baelor.

She told the Warrior’s Son the same thing she said every time; the Queen and the realm will not dance to the twittering of sparrows.

If not for Ser Robert Strong standing diligently by the throne, it might have ended in violence. Her champion was as silent and as strong as stone. The whole court was quiet, tense, as she gave her decree. Ser Robert stood toweringly in armour thick enough for an elephant.

The final petitioner was her own Master of Coin, Ser Harys Swyft. He came to her in front of the whole court, looking twitchy and panicked. “Your Grace,” Ser Harys said with a slight stammer. “Please, Your Grace, reconsider your position. There are women and children in the castle, highborn daughters and sons that long to see their families. The stores are dwindling and the situation only grows more dire. Please, Your Grace – let us open the gates and make peace.”

Cersei sat silently. Two months ago, she had been a lioness, proud, beautiful and strong. Now, she felt cornered and betrayed. Enemies everywhere, allies dead, and treachery around every corner. It was my brother, he forced me to this.

Even her own body had betrayed her. Where once she had been slender and beautiful, now her waist was growing thick. She felt fat, bloated and weak.

“I am aware of the plight,” Cersei said to the court. “And yet treachery and corruption invades our city. The enemies of the Crown are camped outside our gates. Men who plot conspiracy and rebellion under the banner of the Faith. I cannot allow anyone to leave until such wickedness is destroyed.”

There were no replies. Ser Harys gulped, but backed away as Ser Robert Strong stepped forward. Her tone and the presence of her champion left no room for protest. They all knew that everyone in the Red Keep was a hostage. My son included, she thought foully. They have left me a prisoner in my own castle.

My brother did this. This is all the twisted little Imp’s fault.

They are all working together. The Tyrells, the Martells and Tyrion Lannister – a conspiracy to steal her throne.

It was obvious, really. She had known that Martells and the dwarf were allied from the beginning; that became clear when Tyrion sold her precious girl Myrcella off to Dorne, and it was only further proved when the Red Viper chose to champion the Imp. Cersei had also known that the Tyrells were untrustworthy and ambitious, but she realised too late that they were all in the plot.

First Tyrion killed Joffrey. Joffrey was strong, proud, a true lion, and so Tyrion killed him on behalf of House Tyrell. The Tyrells wanted their little slut to marry Tommen instead, as he was weaker and more easily manipulated. Her father Tywin might have challenged the Tyrell conspiracy too, so Tyrion killed him next.

She should have realised sooner. She had even found the gold coins of the Reach, used to pay for Tyrion to escape from the black cells.

But Cersei only really realised the full extent of the scheme when Tyrion returned to Westeros with the Golden Company. That was when she knew; the dwarf didn’t have the coin to hire mercenaries like the Golden Company. Not without the Tyrells and the Martells bankrolling him.

Slowly, she realised as the conspiracy started to form, the teeth started to close, but by then it was too late. The prophecy is coming true. The valonqar – the little brother – is coming to kill me.

Everywhere she walked, she kept Ser Robert Strong by her side. She saw dark eyes staring at her from the corridor. Her true allies could be counted only on one hand.

Cersei didn’t even know why she bothered holding court anymore; every day it was the same. The same whining, the same petty demands, the same simmering defiance. I should let Moon Boy hold court next time, for all the use it will be.

She met Lord Qyburn as he climbed the stairs from the black cells. He had grey hair, a lean frame, and looked fatherly, slightly stooped with crinkles around his soft blue eyes. He was garbed in white robes with golden whorls around his hem sleeves and high collar. There was just the faintest scent of dried rot about him. Her spymaster was one of the true friends she had left. And a capable one, at that.

“Your Grace,” Qyburn said, bowing deeply as she approached. He pulled out a bundle of letters from his thick sleeves. “I have sent out your letters as you required, and replies were quickly received. There is a message from Lord Mace Tyrell. He demands the release of his son and daughter. He gives three days before his men break the walls and take the city.”

“Margaery Tyrell has been placed under arrest for murder and treason,” she said stiffly. She would not use the title queen.

“Indeed she is.”
“And Mace Tyrell made the same threat a week ago.”

“Indeed he did, Your Grace,” he smiled apologetically. He had a sweet smile. “But now Lord Randyll Tarly is in position outside of the city as well. They have twenty thousand men between them.”

Cersei bristled. “Make sure they understand the stakes. If they will resort to barbarity then I will meet them in kind.” Her voice turned dangerously low. Tommen, I am doing this for you. “I have over two hundred highborn hostages with me in the Red Keep. Should they break the city walls, I shall drop Margaery’s ladies-in-waiting – Megga, Alla and Ellinor Tyrell – over the walls. Should they pass the Street of Sisters, it will be the Redwyne twins. And should they reach our walls itself, I will return Lady Margaery. By trebuchet.” They won’t risk it, they won’t. “Let there be no misunderstanding. Make sure that Mace Tyrell knows the consequences his rebellion brings.”

He hesitated. “That is a drastic ultimatum to put to ink.”

“These are drastic times,” Cersei said stiffly. “Walk with me, Lord Qyburn.”

“Yes, Your Grace.” They set off down the corridor. Robert Strong was a silent shadow behind them, strangely light-footed for such a big, heavy man. “And I have a letter from the High Septon too, Your Grace.”

“Call him what he is. A sparrow,” she said in a low voice.

“Very true. But he and the Most Devout have reached a verdict,” Qyburn continued, reaching for the letter. “He has declared that you have seventy-seven days to present yourself to the Great Sept to be tried before the Seven. Else your sovereignty will be renounced and you will be judged in absence.” The maester hesitated. “Your Grace, I do not believe that the High Sparrow is a man to make a false threat, or to back down on an ultimatum like Lord Tyrell will.”

“An ultimatum,” Cersei repeated. “He issues an ultimatum to me. He presumes to have the authority to judge me? I am Queen Regent.”

“He has a confession from Ser Osney Kettleblack that you gave the orders to assassinate him, Your Grace,” Qyburn said softly. “As well as Ser Osney claiming to have murdered the previous High Sparrow on your behalf. Charges of infidelity and accusations from Ser Lancel Lannister have also been levelled.”

That was a mistake. I should have never have trusted Ser Osney with the task. Not only did he fail, he allowed himself to be caught and interrogated. A confession brought about by torture. Her posture didn’t even twitch. Cersei just felt dead inside. “A sham of an accusation. The High Sparrow is no holy man, he is just another one of my brother’s catspaws.”

“As you say, Your Grace.” His voice was level.

“The High Sparrow is working for Tyrion too,” she continued. “Of course he is – the Imp has shown in the past that he can buy and control High Septons, and he used the same trick again. The Imp brought the man into further weaken my rule, and the fool I was for not noticing it sooner. Dwarves are cunning, wicked creatures.”

“And yet the man has decreed that you must fast until you see the path of redemption. The Faith Militant will not allow food or supplies to enter the Red Keep for the duration, until you relent for a trial.”

Her shoulders felt tense. “Any trial will be a sham orchestrated by my brother to shame and strip me of power. No, I will not do so. I will not leave this keep.” Seventy-seven days, she thought. Time enough for this stalemate to end.

The Red Keep was under Cersei’s control. She had over two hundred hostages, and strong walls and enough loyal men. But even outside on Aegon’s Hill, the Faith Militant were camped in the streets. Cersei dared not allow a single soul to leave the keep for fear of losing control altogether.

She saw a figure across the grounds. “Ser Harys!” Cersei called. “Walk with us, Ser Harys.”

The Knight of the Cornfield looked worn and weak. He had lost weight since his stay here. If the High Sparrow intends to starve us, I expect he will lose more. Ser Harys wheezed, glancing up at Ser Robert Strong fearfully. “Your Grace?”

“Tell me, Ser Harys, why has your goodson not acted?” she said coldly. “He has been given explicit orders on how to act, and still he replies with defiance. He replies with inactivity and negligence to his duties.”

He looked pained. “Your Grace, Ser Kevan is trying to maintain peace—”

“He is doing nothing,” she said sharply. “I ordered Ser Kevan to take the Great Sept and remove that charlatan of a High Septon from power, and still he does nothing. Ser Kevan leads five thousand men in the city, does he not?”

“Ser Kevan is a precarious situation, Your Grace,” Lord Qyburn soothed. “He is caught between Lord Tyrell’s demands and the High Sparrow’s. He is trying to negotiate a peace.”

No, she thought. Ser Kevan will not march against the Faith, not when Lancel fought alongside the Warrior’s Sons. Ser Kevan refuses to fight against his son. His inactivity may doom us all.

The city could well turn into a battlefield any day now. Battle lines were being drawn. The Faith Militant was fortified in the Great Sept of Baelor on Rhaenys’ Hill, while Ser Kevan Lannister’s forces were being garrisoned in the Dragonpit on Visenya’s Hill, and the Crown in the Red Keep on Aegon’s High Hill. A city-wide stalemate, where no force dared to act.

My uncle is a weak fool. If it was my father and not my uncle outside then this would never have happened. “Ser Kevan proves himself a fool. He is negotiating between two enemies,” she said, looking between the men. “House Tyrell is allied with the Imp. The High Sparrow is the Imp’s puppet. Tyrion murdered Joffrey and Tywin for them, and in return the Tyrells bought his release. And then the Imp returned with the Golden Company – a force paid for with Reach gold.” Her voice was a growl. How many times do I need to say it? “An invasion to justify a coup. Or do you think it’s a coincidence that this pretender appeared at the same time the Tyrells tried to steal the kingdom?”

Ser Harys looked pained. Qyburn kept his face blank. “Aegon Targaryen, Your Grace.”

“A mummer’s puppet. Some boy hired in Lys most like. A farce to get rid of the rightful king Tommen Baratheon so that they can steal power through Margaery. House Tyrell steals the kingdom, House Martell gets revenge against my family, and my brother gets to hurt me.”

“Your Grace…” Ser Harys wheezed. “How could you possibly know that?”

Because it was prophesied. My little brother is going to kill my children and choke me. “Because I know the Imp, I know his puppets,” she growled. “And because I see the strings. If not for Lady Margaery, how do you think the assassin managed to infiltrate the holdfast to murder the Lord Hand, his wife and the Grand Maester?”
Neither of the men could meet her eyes. This is all that is left of my small council, she realised suddenly. My weak treasurer and spymaster. Cersei’s Grand Admiral Aurane Waters betrayed her, her brother, the Lord Commander, abandoned her, and her Hand of the King and the Grand Maester were murdered.

It was two months ago now. They might have murdered Orton Merryweather too, but she knew the real target was Lady Taena Merryweather. As far as anyone could tell, Grand Maester Pycelle had only stumbled upon the scene but he was killed too.

The death of Taena still pained her. An ache in her chest. It had been one of the rare times that Cersei wept.

Cersei had ordered her friend and confidant Taena to keep a close watch on Margaery and report back to her, and then the woman was found dead with a crossbow bolt in her stomach, right in the middle of the Red Keep itself. Taena must have found something about Margaery and the Tyrells, and she was killed for it. The assassin must have come into the keep along with the House Tyrell guards, and that was when Cersei knew that there were knives hidden all around her. Thorns crawling up the walls.

Margaery murdered my friend. No, Taena was more than just a friend. The Tyrell slut deserves to be imprisoned, the evil bitch that she is. Tommen wept and wailed, but her babe didn’t understand. Cersei needed to keep Margaery hostage; she was the only leverage she had to keep the Tyrells at bay.

Cersei didn’t have a choice. It was all Tyrion’s fault.

Qyburn paused. He drew another parchment out of his sleeves. “Your Grace…” Qyburn said slowly, glancing quietly between her and Ser Harys. “I must… I fear the letter from White Harbour demands more attention. What of the reports of the white dragon and Bastard King in the north?”

Cersei hesitated. Her eyes twitched slightly. “I know not how my brother managed it,” she said finally. “But these false claims of a dragon are just another way he seeks to ruin my power.”

Qyburn didn’t reply. Ser Harys’ eyes widened. “False claims?” the man exclaimed. “Your Grace, do you truly believe that the reports of the Twins are false?”

“Hearsay or rumours or blatant forgeries of noble house signatures. The letters cannot be trusted even if the lies spread like wildfire.” Cersei’s face flickered. “Or do you seriously believe an ice dragon just happens to appear at the same time the Imp leads an invasion of the realm?”

“But, Your Grace, there have been hundreds of letters. How could your brother even…?”

“Imps are cunning creatures, Ser Harys,” she said sharply. “And treachery is thick in the realm. I know not how he managed it, but he has; the tales are false.” They must be. Cersei paused. “And a detail returns to me; I remember that this Jon Snow and Tyrion travelled together. My brother escorted Jon Snow up to the Wall, three years ago now. Doubtless they were planning betrayal together even then. Tyrion recruited Jon Snow into his schemes – parallel plans that work together.” Cersei shook her head, flicking her blond hair back. “No, these reports of ‘ice dragons’ are just another way the Imp seeks to hurt me, by inciting mass hysteria and panic in the realm. He recruited his sour bastard traitor friend to do so. There must be hunters shooting down the ravens from noble houses, and then replacing them with false messages dictated by the Imp, false testimonies of dragons. Doubtless the Twins were raided and razed by wildlings, the deed ascribed to a dragon such that the rumours might aid their cause. Words are wind, Ser Harys, and the Imp has been blowing them. My brother could arrange it so; this conspiracy must have been a long time in the making.” She shook her head again, more forcefully.

Neither of them replied. Qyburn looked down at the ground silently, and Ser Harys stared at her, mouth agape. This is all my brother’s doing, why can no one else see it?

That clueless look on Ser Harys’ face made her eyes narrow and her lips purse. She stepped forward warningly, lowering her voice. Behind her, Ser Robert shifted slightly.

“You asked me to open the gates, Ser Harys?” Cersei said coolly. “Allow me to tell you when the gates will open and this will end: Ser Kevan is going to attack the Great Sept and put those blasted sparrows to the sword. He will remove the High Sparrow from power permanently. Mace Tyrell is not going to be allowed into the city lest his son and daughter suffer for it. Instead, Lord Tyrell will fight the Golden Company for us – to fight the very sellswords that he himself hired. Afterwards, once both threats have been vanquished – when my brother and his schemes are finally dead – I will open the gates and Lady Margaery can be tried properly. That is the only way this will resolve. Is that understood?”

Ser Harys nodded, weak chin flapping. “Then I suggest you write to your goodson, ser,” she ordered. “Make sure you convince Ser Kevan of the need.”

Ser Harys bowed and stammered away. Her eyes narrowed as she watched him run.

“Do my warnings fall on deaf ears?” Cersei murmured. “The murders, the invasion, the schemes. There is a conspiracy afoot and for some reason I seem to be the only one who can see the strings. It all leads back to my brother.”

The castle felt silent. Cersei saw the Redwyne twins, Horas and Hobber, staring at her suspiciously from the far side of the courtyard, but none dared to approach so long as Ser Robert Strong stood behind her. Her gaze met the Redwyne boys, and they backed away.

Treachery behind every corner. “Is the keep secure?” Cersei asked, keeping her voice low. “I do not trust our hostages not to try and overpower the guards to escape.”

“They have no weapons to speak of, Your Grace,” Lord Qyburn reassured her. “But the soldiers have been warned of the possibility. Due precautions have been taken.”

“All hostage that seems rebellious goes into the cells,” Cersei ordered. She paused. “And what of the soldiers themselves? Are they loyal?”

The sack of the Red Keep had posed a problem. It had to be done swiftly, but there had been many guests and guards inside, while Cersei couldn’t even trust any of the gold cloaks. All of House Tyrell’s men had to be captured, killed, or removed from the Red Keep, and that required manpower. Lord Qyburn had proved invaluable in arranging it.

“Many of the soldiers were formerly sworn to Ser Gregor Clegane, Your Grace,” Qyburn explained. “The Mountain’s Men, as they were called.”

“Good,” she nodded approvingly. “Seasoned, loyal Lannister men.”

“Indeed. There are also what remains of your household guard, some handpicked sellswords. I also recruited two dozen Tyroshi mercenaries that do not speak the Common Tongue – it makes them very difficult to be bought. All of the men were vetted by me personally, Your Grace: three hundred in total to hold the castle and the walls.” He smiled, with just a hint of quiet pride. “And then, of course, there is Ser Robert Strong. Ser Robert will be eternally loyal, and as formidable as ten men, Your Grace, I guarantee it.”
She nodded. “Loyalty is most important attribute in times like these. There must be no catspaws left in my house.”

“As you say, Your Grace. Alas, none of the men are the most… shall we say… disciplined soldiers,” he said apologetically. “But they are of a certain simple nature and low barbarity that they will remain loyal. They will not falter no matter how long this siege lasts, I just fear we may have to allow them a certain leeway with respect to the stresses they face.”

“Barbarity has its uses.” In desperate times, she would take Qyburn’s simple soldiers over all of the treacherous knights in the realm. Even the kingsguard had to be vetted and secured.

Ser Loras Tyrell had tried to protest when she secured the castle. The Knight of Flowers killed two men who tried to take his sword, and it took Ser Robert himself to overpower Ser Loras and place him in the black cells. Ser Loras suffered two broken legs and a shattered arm after Ser Robert Strong threw him physically against a wall.

Ser Osmund Kettleblack had abandoned his white cloak and fled when the Faith captured his brother, only to be captured himself by the Warrior’s Sons. All three of the Kettleblacks were tortured and became more witnesses against Cersei.

Tommen only had two white cloaks left in the castle – Ser Meryn Trant and Ser Boros Blount. Both of them guarded her little boy constantly, but she had to keep Tommen restricted behind a locked door for his own safety.

I can keep my castle secure until the crisis is over, Cersei thought with a deep breath. My child will forgive me so long as he is kept alive.

“Your Grace,” Qyburn said cautiously. “I must ask; what is the intention should Ser Kevan not raise swords against the Faith Militant?”

“He will. His king commands him to.” Everything hinged on Ser Kevan, his was the only force Cersei could call upon to act. He is a follower, he must obey.

“I fear that if Ser Kevan was willing to, he would have done so by now,” Qyburn shook his head sadly. “Your uncle seems more concerned trying to keep the peace within the city. Forgive me, Your Grace, but I do not believe he will act as you command.” Her jaw tightened, but she didn’t speak. “I fear Ser Kevan will be more inclined to wait out the High Sparrow’s deadline, until you are forced to surrender,” Qyburn continued. “The situation is… volatile. Should either the Faith or Lord Tyrell move against you first, matters may quickly spiral out of control.”

“I am aware. And I will not let power-grabbing schemers break this kingdom. I will not allow it.” Tommen, I’m doing this for you. She turned away, and walked towards two men-at-arms in motley grey armour, standing guard by a doorway. “You. You two. What are your names?”

They both looked surprised. One of them was a younger man wearing a yellow surcoat, with a mop of sandy hair. “Um, Raff, Your Grace,” he said. His voice was softly spoken. “They call me Raff the Sweetling.”

I see why; he is handsome, Cersei thought. Though there’s something in his eyes. The other guard was the opposite; he was gruff, unkempt, short and portly, with hard eyes and a scarred, pockmarked face under his grey helm. “Craster, Your Grace,” the man grumbled, in a deep, hard voice.

She looked between them. Yes, they’ll do. “Lady Margaery Tyrell has been arrested for treason.
She conspired to steal the throne. She arranged the murder of Lady Taena Merryweather, Orton Merryweather, and Grand Maester Pycelle. Her scheming threatens the whole realm,” Cersei said curtly. “She is restrained in the Maidenvault. She must be interrogated and then tried. Are you fit to question her?”

Raff the Sweetling looked panicked briefly. Craster grunted. “Your majesty,” the heavyset man rumbled. “She is the queen.”

“Was the queen.” Her voice was cold. “The marriage was not consummated, it has been annulled. She is naught but a traitor to the realm. She will confess to her lies and her treachery. Do you understand?”

“See that a confession is drawn from her. Keep her presentable. Recruit whatever aid you require,” Cersei ordered sharply, and then walked away. She motioned at Qyburn, while Ser Robert trailed behind. “Lord Qyburn, Margaery Tyrell committed treason. She fucked the Kettleblack brothers and sent them to the High Sparrow to slander me. She coerced them into a false confession that they revealed under torture, using my name instead of hers. That is what Lady Margaery will confess, and she will admit her crimes to the realm and beg for mercy in her punishment. In return, the throne will give… leeway.” She might keep her pretty little head, if she concedes, Cersei conceded, but not her crown. “It’ll be a generous sentence – one of exile or imprisonment rather than execution. Lord Tyrell will be humbled and shamed, but unable to object. Can you see that it happens?”

“Of course, Your Grace.” The white-robed man bowed again.

“And then the High Sparrow will demilitarise the Faith Militant, or they will all face the sword as they did in Maegor’s day.” I should never have tolerated those sparrows in the beginning. Her red satin dress brushed against the stones as she turned towards the staircase. “Lord Tyrell will be forced to deal with the mummer’s king and the Golden Company, the forces in the Reach will beat this Euron Greyjoy, and the Boltons will overcome the Bastard King. Stannis will be destroyed as soon as we can rally a proper force to deal with him.” She kept her voice low, a quiet growl in the cavernous staircase. “They will not steal my son’s throne, Lord Qyburn. None of them will. I refuse to allow it.”

“Very wise, Your Grace. I shall assist of course.”

“I will need you to keep my castle secure. As well as to take over the duties of maester since our late Grand Maester’s demise. You report to me directly, nobody else.” Cersei winced slightly, stretching her shoulders as she walked up the stairs.

If Qyburn was uncomfortable with the added duties placed upon him, he didn’t show it. He kept his expression humble and neutral. “However I can help.”

“You could help by providing me a treatment for my back,” Cersei said irritably. “Sitting in that damnable chair has left my spine aching constantly.”

Qyburn bobbed his head, and then appeared to hesitate. “Forgive me, Your Grace, I cannot help but notice…” His lips pursed. “It is of a sensitive nature, but I would be remiss in my duties if I did not broach the subject.” His eyes were soft, grandfatherly. “Your Grace, you are gaining weight.”

Cersei froze. She had worn the same red satin dress for the last week because none other would fit her. Her handmaidens still had to restitch the others. She spun around and snapped. “You dare?”

“Forgive me, Your Grace, I mean no insult,” he said quickly. “I spoke to the serving girls. They say you have not had your moonblood for at least two months.”

She stiffened. “It is stress. The stress of running a kingdom takes its toll on the body.”

“That is true, Your Grace,” Qyburnnodded. “However, I fear you may be pregnant.”

The corridor turned silent. Cersei’s hands clenched so sharp her fingernails dug into her hands. “No.”

Qyburn didn’t reply. He just lowered his head, respectful. “No,” Cersei repeated.

I cannot be pregnant, she thought firmly. How long has it been since my brother left the city? The dates do not match up, it's impossible, I can’t…

And then she remembered Ser Osney Kettleblack, and the ‘reward’ she had granted him before sending him off to kill the High Sparrow. She remembered his unsatisfactory kisses and rough thrusts. I told him to come on my stomach. I told him to come on my stomach.

“No…” Cersei muttered. She felt the colour draining from her face.

Qyburnstepped forward. “Your Grace, I can provide a simple tonic to ensure–”

Qyburn bowed, and very quickly turned to trot back down the stairs. Cersei was panting, head spinning. Not here, too many watching eyes. She turned and very quickly walked upwards to her quarters. Ser Robert Strong stood like a sentinel at the base of the stairwell.

As soon as she closed the door, she collapsed into a fit of wheezing breaths. She felt herself groan.

It’s impossible. The prophecy. Maggy the Frog foretold that I would have three children, not four…

Unless I do not survive to term carrying the babe. Seventy-seven days.

I’m pregnant. That cursed, treacherous sellsword’s babe.

She saw Ser Osney Kettleblack’s mocking grin. With a sudden jolt, she realised that she might finally be carrying a black-haired child.

She could feel herself gasping, struggling for air. Her legs buckled and she fell. No, she thought. I am a lioness. A queen. Not a fat, bloated woman begging on her knees. Still, no matter how hard she tried she couldn’t control her breathing, or pull herself to her feet.

It’s all coming true. My brother. The younger queen. My dead children. Joffrey is already dead, Myrcella is in the grip of the Dornish, Tommen is trapped in a city besieged. My little brother is coming for me.

She felt tears stinging her eyes. My son, my babe…

The valonqar will wrap his hands around my pale white throat and choke the life from me. Just like he did with that whore.
Her plans were nothing more than grasping at straws. She could barely control the Red Keep, let alone a kingdom. Her allies were treacherous, her friends gone. Her enemies everywhere.

This is all the Imp's doing. And I cannot stop it because it has already been foretold.

Cersei spent the next two hours weeping and wailing on the floor.

Then, she stood, straightened her dress and cleaned her face. When she left her chambers, her face was once again stiff like ice. She motioned at Ser Robert to follow her.

I will not allow them to hurt my son. I will defy them all, I will defy the gods, I will defy the fates to keep my little boy alive.

She met Lord Qyburn again in the Grand Maester’s chambers, sorting through Pycelle’s vials, papers and medicines. “Lord Qyburn,” she said curtly.

“Your Grace.” He bowed quickly. “I apologise if I crossed any line, I meant only to offer assistance—”

“Enough. We will not speak of that matter.” The thought scared her, she couldn’t even begin to handle it. For some reason, she couldn’t even swallow the thought of drinking moon tea. No, I will have to. I must get of rid of the babe before any talk starts. “What of the tunnel that you discovered under the Red Keep?” Cersei demanded.

He blinked, off-guard. “Yes, Your Grace. You ordered to seal any secret exits, and so I had the castle searched from top to bottom. We discovered the tunnel built into a well in the lower dungeons, it leads out towards the sewer, and then the river. A relic from King Maegor’s construction.”

“And does anyone else know of it?”

“No, Your Grace.”

“Keep it that way,” Cersei ordered. “But have the tunnel unsealed. We will need a secret tunnel into the city. There is much work to be done.”

Lord Qyburn bowed. “Whatever you require, Your Grace.”

“Firstly, I shall need a hundred more just like him,” Cersei said, motioning to Ser Robert Strong’s hulking mass. He stood at the doorway stiff like a stone titan. “Apply your skills, Lord Qyburn, and make your soldiers. There are tasks to be and I will need their unwavering loyalty.”

His eyes widened. “Your Grace, my methods are still so rudimentary!” Qyburn exclaimed. “Ser Robert was the first of his kind and he required months of labour! To create a hundred more? I am but a blind man studying a whole new field, I cannot make such a promise.”

“Whatever resources you require, you shall have them. Draw your work out of the black cells if needed. The castle is at your disposal. Whatever it takes. Tommen, I am doing this for you. “I require one hundred soldiers of Ser Robert’s quality. You have seventy-seven days.”

Qyburn blinked, bit his lip, and then bowed. She caught his eyes flash as he lowered his head quickly. “I shall devote myself to the task, Your Grace.”

“Good. And then bring me Lord Hallyne of Alchemist’s Guild,” Cersei demanded. “I will require him and his pyromancers too.”
The Godly Man

“Do you ever wonder of mermaids, Urgard?” Euron mused. “Do you wonder whether they are fair or hideous?”

The grim-faced man never replied. He had two flame-shaped brands on each cheek, and crisscrossing scars over his face. “You may answer, Urgard,” Euron insisted.

“I cannot say, my king.” Urgard’s voice was a grumble. He didn't turn away from the candles. He didn’t even blink

“It is strange, is it not? They talk of mermaids as being beautiful, but men do like to idolise the unknown,” Euron wondered, as he paced the dark cabin. The glass candles blazed all across the far wall. The Silence rocked against the waves, the wind and ocean a low howl in the background. “But if mermaids truly are fish, then I would say they would have to be hideous. Have you ever seen a sea creature that has any care for beauty? Does a shark or a tuna look pretty? And if mermaids are just ugly fish things, then I think they would also be fairly benign. I find that even the biggest, scariest creatures of the sea generally want to be left undisturbed.”

Euron paused, as he picked up a glowing hot poker from the low fire. “But,” he continued, “if mermaids really are pretty, then does that not make them far more dangerous? For if they are comely, then they must have knowledge of men. They must have cunning. They must be more than just fish, for they have the intelligence to entice and entrap. It is strange, is it not? How the hideous creatures are the most benign, yet the fair ones are dangerous?”

Urgard didn't reply. He kept his back turned, staring blankly at the obsidian flames. Euron just smiled, as he stepped forward and moved the poker to Falia’s face.

Falia Flowers would have begged, but she could not because she had no tongue. Euron preferred the silence.

His bed mate’s eyes were bloodshot and wide, and her wrists were chained. Her dark hair was coated in salt and sea grime. Falia had been good company to him, easy to laugh and full of whimsy. Her stomach was swollen, pregnant with his child. Euron just smiled, as he stroked her cheek. She tried to squirm, to escape to, to cry out.

“You are very beautiful, Falia,” Euron whispered. “But right now I wish to test my theory on whether uglier things have less reason to be dangerous.”

He put the burning poker to her cheek. Flesh bubbled and hiss. Chains rattled and her mouth gasped, but there was nothing but choked, frenzied and wordless screams.

Urgard didn't stop staring at the candles.

Euron knew he could do whatever he wished aboard his ship, and not a single crewmember of the Silence would ever speak of it.

When he was done, Euron kissed his pregnant bed mate on her mutilated forehead and let her drop to the ground.

“This is a good thing, Falia,” he whispered gently. Her hair was burnt from her scalp, her skull black and red with deep blisters. “There is power in pain. Strength from suffering. I hurt you, and perhaps you will become more for it. The more our bodies are cut away from us, the closer we become to something more than mortal. Divinity comes from burning away the flesh and the mind.”

She could only whimper. Euron pressed his hand against her pregnant stomach. Old Valyria built their empire from harnessing the power of suffering, and Euron intended to follow suit. Perhaps something worthwhile could be birthed from Falia’s pain, but, if not, such distractions were still useful. Euron considered cruelty just another skill to be mastered. A learning experience for both parties. He sighed softly and walked away.

“Urgard,” he said finally, turning away from his distraction. “How goes it? What do you see?”

On the black wall of the cabin, three dozen dragonglass candles blazed across the shelves with quiet, flickering black flames. The art of scrying through obsidian fires was a delicate and subtle skill. Fire was power, and power gave knowledge. Skilled men could see across the entire world using a glass candle, they could see into dreams and into the future. Past, present and all possible futures all flickering in the candlelight, refracted in every spark of light. The same power existed in every flame, or so the red priests claimed, but the dragonglass helped focus it.

Urgard had been a red priest, once upon a time. Euron wasn't sure what he was now, but any faith the man once had had been whipped out of him. Now, Urgard was one of the many sorcerers and mages that had been brought upon the Silence, and one of the few who still had their tongues. It took great skill, focus and patience to use the glass candles; Euron had the first two, but he was often lacking in the third.

“I see naught but snow and ash,” Urgard muttered hoarsely after a pause. “The flames are out of balance. I shall attempt to refocus them.”

Euron sighed. And that could take weeks, even months. The glass candles were an extremely difficult art; it was easy to light a fire but far, far more difficult to focus it. “Just do it. Find me dragons. Show me my brother’s progress towards Slaver’s Bay. Show me when my bride-to-be is coming home,” Euron ordered. “Do it, otherwise I shall cut off your eyelids so you will never be distracted again.”

He left the cabin. As he walked through the rocking hull, Euron passed lines of warlocks, red priests, holy men, shadowbinders, spellsingers, firemages, hedge mages, maegi and necromancers. They were all bound in chains with their eyes covered and their mouths gagged. On quiet seas, you could hear the strained, muffled gasps from his hull. Sorcerers and the like are useful things to have, Euron thought, but it's important to keep them contained. Like a blade, you must sheathe them when not in use.

He kept all his mages chained constantly at the very bottom deck of his galleon, blind and manacled and always under watch. Euron’s collection of mutts and murderers from the far east kept a close eye on their prisoners, and they carried barbed whips and daggers. His crew was on-guard against magic to point of paranoia; they had to be, to survive in the places where the Silence had sailed. They had all learnt to watch for flickering shadows or lingering hexes, or any sign of a prisoner trying to use their skills against them. No exposed flames were allowed anywhere near the spellbinders, except under close supervision. It left the decks of the Silence in constant gloom, but the darkness had a certain comfort.

Euron was something of a collector. He didn’t care for riches or gold, but he was an avid collector of old magicks, monsters and myth. Ever since sailing away from the Iron Islands so long ago, he had become obsessed and devoted to the power of gods and magic. Knowledge is power, Euron thought silently. Knowledge is also fear. Power and fear shape the world.
His ship was the silence before the storm. His crew of mutes, mongrels and mages brought fear to the entire world. No, he thought. Not yet. They do not know fear yet.

It was raining when Euron stepped out onto the red deck. The sky was black, and a sharp wind howled down through the straits of Redwyne. Rain sputtered down across the bay, and the coast was ringing with the sound of thousands of men and hundreds of ships.

On either side of the Silence, the Thunderer and the Dusk rocked on the choppy seas. So both the Drumm and the Knight of Grey Garden are here, then, Euron thought, as a wiry smile stretched over his blue lips.

He saw grim faces waiting for him as he stepped out into the rain. Hard-faced men standing steady on the rocking vessels. Raindrops scattered across Euron’s black Valyrian steel armour, water dripping down to the red blade at his hip. He stepped past Harren Half-Hoare, Rodrik Freedborn, and Left-Hand Lucas Codd all standing stoically by the door. Euron’s grin widened as he saw his guests.

Ser Harras Harlaw, Lord Denys Drumm, Lord Maron Volmark, Lord Gorold Goodbrother, Lord Germund Botley, and Andrik the Unsmiling all stood waiting for him. All powerful and influential men of the Iron Islands, Euron thought. And all of them are bitter and coming here in defeat.

“My lords!” He laughed, raising his hands in the rain. “Happy days! It seems the Drowned God blesses us with more water from the sky!”

In the distance, thunder rumbled over the Arbor. Across the bay, hundreds of ironborn longships scattered over the beaches, the entire fleet docked and fortified on the northern edge of the island, nestled around a collection of wooden thatch houses and barns. The ironborn had taken and occupied an Arbor fishing village, but there were far too many ships to fit in the small harbour.

Three hundred and sixty-six vessels, Euron was told. Once, they had been over five hundred, but then there had been battles, and the best one hundred longships of the Iron Fleet left for Slaver’s Bay. Now, the ironborn had more ships than they had men to comfortably sail them – his army was nine thousand strong. On average that meant twenty-five to a boat, Euron mused, but there were many smaller longships that were holding only ten or so.

Nobody spoke. “Lord Botley,” Euron called, looking to the man. “What news from Lordsport? Are these rumours that I’m hearing true?”

Eyes flickered. The lord wiped the rain from his brow. “Aye, they are true. The whole realm is up in arms about it. There is a dragon in the north – a huge, white beast larger than Balerion the Dread. It is ridden by the Bastard King. It destroyed the Twins, demolished two whole castles in a single afternoon.”

Euron felt laughter rising from his throat. Around him, the waves howled. “Well, isn’t that just typical?” He chuckled. “I send my brother halfway around the world to fetch me dragons, but it turns there was one right next door the whole time! Ha! Oh, how the fates like to tease us, don’t you think?”

In truth, Euron had suspected the dragon for a long time now. Months ago, all of his glass candles had suddenly started burning brighter and clearer. Magic returning faster, older powers were stirring and Euron was likely one of the first know about it. All of the magicks aboard the Silence had become… clearer. Sharper.

Yes, another dragon, he thought. Another great elemental force to move the world; such beasts caused ripples of power as naturally as fish splashed. This is only good news. A fourth dragon for me.

They didn’t look so amused. “We are at war with the north, and now they have a dragon!” Lord Goodbrother growled.

“I know, brilliant, isn’t it?” The taste of shade of the evening on his lips made his head feel tingly. He danced softly over the rocking deck. “It does indeed look like I sent Victarion and the Iron Fleet away for no reason. Typical.”

“We need to return to the Iron Islands,” Lord Goodbrother insisted. “If there is a dragon, we need to return to defend our lands.”

“You cannot. I will need the whole force of the Iron Islands for our assault on Oldtown,” Euron said, shaking his head.

There were mutters. Ser Harras Harlaw stepped forward, frowning. “So it’s true. You really intend to assault Oldtown.”

“Of course. Have I not been announcing such?” Euron said with a smile. “I hope the entire realm knows my intention. We will raid wealth that no ironborn has been able to pillage in thousands of years!”

“This campaign of yours becomes more moon-addled by the day!” Ser Harras Harlaw shouted. The Knight of Grey Gardens sounded angry. He had his hand on the black Valyrian steel blade at his waist, Nightfall. “The Shield Islands have been retaken by the thorns, and you move on to your next folly?”

“The Shield Islands were supposed to be our launching point for this campaign. You named us the lords of them, yet abandoned them at the first chance,” Lord Denys Drumm accused. Lord Volmark and Andrik the Unsmiling looked bitter too. Yes, they had all been my potential enemies, and they lost their strength trying to hold the lands I handed to them. “We’ve lost our foothold in the Reach.”

Euron just shrugged. “Then you should have defended them better. That is your failure, not mine.”

“You dare–” Ser Harras bellowed, before Lord Drumm held up his hand.

“How could we defend them, when you took the fleet south with you?” Lord Denys Drumm shouted over the waves. “You left us with a half a dozen ships each, to defend against Highgarden itself!”

“Ships that you use to flee upon,” Euron noted. “Do you really care so little about the newfound lands that I gave you that you would flee from battle?”

Lord Denys Drumm’s face twisted. The young Bone Hand was a stout and strong fighter, clad in grey armour with skeletal white bones painted upon it. His iron helm bore a white skull. “My father perished trying to defend Southshield! We barely held them back, but Oakenshield had already fallen! Once two out of four isles fell, there was no choice but to retreat.” His eyes flashed. “We escaped those islands, and then I find that you had your men steal my father’s blade!”

Euron cocked his head, looking at the young lord. The newly-named Lord Drumm had none of his late father’s patience or wits. Euron’s hand lingered on Red Rain on his hip. It was a fine Valyrian steel blade of shining crimson metal, with a white hilt carved like a skeletal bone. Red Rain was formerly the ancestral weapon of House Drumm, but it was sword that had been known to change hands. The Drumms themselves stole it from House Reyne. It was a bloody sword if there ever was one.

“Lord Dustan was an old man,” Euron scoffed. “He fell in the battle and some rat looted his sword. It is a nice blade, I liked it myself. I found that rat, and I bought this blade off him with the iron price. Truth be told, Red Rain has quite taken my fancy.”

“That sword belongs to House Drumm,” Lord Drumm said darkly, stepping forward.

Harren Half-Hoare and Left-Hand Lucas Codd took a step to block him. Euron raised his hand to stop them. “I told you,” Euron repeated, with a mocking smirk. “I paid the iron price for the sword. Do you want to try and buy it back with the same?”

Lord Drumm’s face twisted. He didn’t back down, but he hesitated. Everyone was watching.

“Forget the bloody sword,” Ser Harras growled. He was a tall and dark man, fearsome in full grey armour. He was glaring at Euron too. “You attack the Reach but you leave our homes undefended. The retaking the Shields was just the beginning. You claimed those lands but you had no intention of defending them, did you? You let the lords you raised linger there only to be defeated.”

Yes, actually. That was completely my intention – I took the credit for taking the isles, and then I left you to take the blame for losing them. Still, Euron just smirked. “Why would you obsess over bunch of cold, dreary rocks?” Euron laughed. “Look around you – I am offering you the whole Reach itself. The Arbor is undefended, go pillage and rape to your heart’s content! Lord Orkwood has already conquered Three Towers, soon Oldtown itself will be wide open! We could be feasting on lands that have grown fat and rich for hundreds of years, where no ironborn have raided since the days of High Kings of old.” Euron looked at Lord Drumm and smirked, keeping his hand on Red Rain. “Surely, what is a little sword compared to that?”

“You dare to steal my family’s ancient weapon and laugh?” Lord Drumm growled. He had a war-axe in his grip, a hefty, well-rounded weapon. Many of the other lords were looking angry as well. Oh, they are mad. What, just because I abandoned them to defeat?

“It is better than not laughing at all, is it not?” Euron smirked. “Come now, have I ever led you to defeat? We have seen victory after victory, I have given you plunder more than you could have found up north! Why are we squabbling? We are all ironborn here!” The sound of his chuckles was like thunder. Euron spun, motioning to the great island of the Arbor, filled with rolling hills and grape fields. “I promised the ironborn victory, and here I am providing it! We will ravage the lands, just like the Drowned God promised to us, when he brought flame from the sea, and sailed the seas with fire and steel! I am leading you towards a victory the likes that Balon couldn’t even imagine!”

A few looked uncertain. Lord Volmark and Lord Botley were staying very quiet, but Ser Harras and Lord Drumm didn’t back down. Ser Andrik the Unsmiling, the great grim giant of a man, looked ready for a fight too.

“What of the Damphair?” Lord Goodbrother said suddenly. He was an aging, portly, white-haired man, but still strong. His eyes were narrowed, dark.

Euron just shrugged. “What of him?”

“How do you expect us to follow your orders, ‘king’?” Lord Goodbrother grumbled. He pointed towards the front of the boat. “When you have the leader of the drowned men – the Drowned God’s chosen priests – tied to your fucking prow?”
He chuckled. “My brother seems to like the ocean. I thought he would appreciate being closer to it.”

Aeron Greyjoy was all rags and bones, frail and pale, fastened to the prow of the Silence by chains. On the prow of Euron’s ship was a mouthless maiden of black iron with long legs, slender waist, high breasts and mother-of-pearl eyes. The Damphair was left chained against the iron woman’s bosom, dangling metres above the cold water. Probably the first set of breasts my brother has touched in years, Euron thought with a quiet scoff.

Every time a high wave hit the prow, the salty water splashed hard against the man. At first Aeron had been sputtering and coughing, but now he just hung limp and weak. I hope he’s not dead. It would be no fun if he’s dead.

“I placed him there for the battle against the Hightower and Redwyne ships,” Euron explained. “My brother had a better view of the battle than any of us. And I thought it would be lucky – surely it must be good fortune to hang the Damphair as a figurehead, to gain the Drowned God’s favour?”

Truth be told, Aeron Greyjoy fascinated Euron. Religious and devoted men always did, there was something riveting in their blind belief. Euron considered faith to be only one step down from magic.

Lord Goodbrother looked appalled. “The Damphair was right about you. I should never have supported your claim.” He shook his head, raindrops splattering from his whiskers. “No, I will have no part of this madness.”

“Aye,” Ser Harras agreed darkly. “You are mad, king. You talk of madness. Aeron spoke the truth; you are a godless man.”

Euron saw the Red Oarsmen, ready to move forward, spear in his hand. Euron just shook his head and kept his men back. “Godless?” Euron laughed. “I am the most devout man you have ever met.”

The deck was tense. There were men clutching axes on the Thunderer and the Dusk, either side of the Silence. Reavers were preparing for a fight, Euron turned his smiling eye between the group. The lords hesitated, and Ser Harras shared a look with Lord Goodbrother.

“We will be taking our men and leaving,” Lord Goodbrother announced. “Try to stop us, and half the lords here will abandon you as well. We will return to our seats and leave this madness in the Reach behind us.”

“Madness is a word for concepts greater than feeble minds can understand.” The rain pounded around them.

“Enough of this. Our ships and our men are leaving your fleet,” Lord Drumm grumbled. “Do what you want with those fool enough to keep following you.”

Hmm, that's not very good. Houses Drumm, Harlaw and Goodbrother have a hundred and fifty vessels between them. He saw the Red Oarsmen and Qarl the Thrall move to block them, but there were men on their ships too. Euron paused, still smirking.

“Do not stop us, Crow’s Eye,” Ser Harras warned. He had Nightfall drawn, sleek and black like obsidian with a moonstone pummel. Nightfall is a fine blade too. “If you wish to start a battle here, you will suffer for it. Let us disembark.”

“Disembark,” Euron mocked. “Cravens running from a fight.”
Dark eyes all around him. “Crow’s Eye,” Ser Harras warned. “Do not—”

“What of you, Lord Drumm?” In a smooth motion, Euron drew Red Rain from its sheath. The blade seemed to growl bloodthirstily in the gloom. “Are you really so happy to walk away and leave your family’s blade behind?”

Lord Drumm stiffened. “Your father would be ashamed,” Euron continued. “Not only would you shame his memory by fleeing from his battlefield, you would abandon your own family’s weapon?”

Euron took a step forward, motioning the others to keep back. Lord Drumm had his axe tightly held in both hands. Andrik the Unsmiling was clutching his great blade too, standing head and shoulders above all others.

“You are a fiend,” Lord Drumm growled, body shaking.

“Why not settle this the Old Way?” Euron offered, as he danced backwards and forwards over the rocking deck. Black armour and red sword. “You and me. Pay the iron price, Bone Hand.”

Lord Drumm hesitated, and then turned to step forward. He was a stout and strong man. Ser Harras’ face flickered, and then he stepped forward too. Lord Goodbrother looked more interested in fleeing, but he paused uncertainly. Lords Volmark and Botley stepped backwards.

“Asha would have been the better ruler, better than you ever could be,” Ser Harras growled. “If you die, could our queen take the Seastone Chair?”

Euron only laughed, loud, clear and taunting.

Lord Drumm charged. A wordless battle roar broke his throat as he swung his axe, hard and strong. Euron fell backwards. A chant broke out across the Thunderer calling for their lord, but the crew of the Silence didn’t make a sound. Ser Harras stepped forward anxiously, but no one interfered.

Heavy boots clattered over the red deck. Euron kept on falling backwards, moving almost idly, while Lord Drumm hacked and slashed. Euron’s bright blue eye didn’t stop mocking him, even as the axe slashed and the Bone Hand grunted and roared. Red Rain hovered and waited.

“You are a godless man!” Lord Drumm bellowed. The skeleton on his armour rattled. The axe struck downwards.

Somewhere in the distance, lightning flashed.

And Red Rain moved like a viper. There was a crunch of metal, and then blood splattered against the decks. Red steel carved through the iron skeleton.

“I am the most godly man you’ve ever met,” Euron whispered as the Lord Drumm fell with the downpour. “Can you not hear the gods crying out for my victory?”

Before Lord Drumm even hit the ground, Ser Harras jumped in and struck. Red Rain was still embedded in the Lord Drumm’s chest, Euron couldn’t pull it out in time. The Knight of the Grey Garden lunged at him with Nightfall slicing in the gloom, as fast as a shadow.

Euron dropped his sword and rushed to meet him. He didn’t try to block, instead he shoulder-barged against Nightfall’s swipe, and the blade rushed towards his breastplate. Valyrian steel clanged against Euron’s armour. It didn’t pierce, it just bounced off and jarred the knight’s wrist. He saw Ser Harras’ eyes widen in surprise, as the sound rang out like a bell’s chime.
Men who wield Valyrian steel are always surprised when their blades don’t pierce, he thought smugly. My armour is well-worth the price I paid for it.

He didn’t need a sword. Euron grabbed Ser Harras’ shoulder and pushed him down to the deck. Ser Harras didn’t recover in time from his lunge, and Euron was grabbing his arm and twisting it around. The knight tried to wrestle, but then Euron’s armoured knee slammed into his throat. Ser Harras could only gurgle and thrash, pinned to the ground. The knight’s arm flailed, yet Euron grabbed it by the wrist and twisted. Euron slowly forced the blade around, still grasped in Ser Harras’ own hand.

“Godless man, you call me,” Euron scoffed, his voice low and gentle, whispering in his ear. “You have no idea how false such an accusation is. I know more of god than any priest ever will. You all just delude yourselves into thinking you know of god. You look at the waves and imagine something greater, but me?” Nightfall crept closer to Ser Harras’ throat. “I’ve seen god itself with my own two eyes.”

The blade cut through Ser Harras’ neck. Blood wept and gurgled, disappearing into the rain and soaking into the red planks. The deck turned quiet.

Euron grinned, dropping Ser Harras’ arm. He moved his hand up to scratch at his eyepatch. Euron would never forget that moment he sailed into Valyria itself, deeper, further and darker than any man ever had. He had seen something… something divine, and it had burnt his eye out of his skull just by laying his gaze upon it. From that moment onwards, it… it had defined him.

I am a godly man. I will become god.

The bodies rolled with the waves beneath his ship. Two noble ironborn lords, killed by their own blades. Euron picked up Red Rain in his right hand and Nightfall in his left, spinning both Valyrian steel swords at once. The old men say the Drowned God made the ironborn to reave and rape, Euron mused, to carve out our kingdoms and to make our names known in fire and blood and song.

Fools. Gods are but one fractal of something far greater.

Euron looked between the other men, and laughed. “What of it, Andrik the Unsmiling?” he challenged. “Do you wish to challenge me too?”

The giant of the man hesitated, face twitching as he looked at Lord Drumm’s corpse. After a long pause, the giant of a man lowered his axe. “No, my king,” he murmured.

“Throw the bodies overboard,” Euron ordered to his men. “And then send word to Donnel Drumm and Hotho Harlaw. Congratulate them on their new rank.” He turned towards Lord Goodbrother, and smiled. “My lord, you seem to have lost your allies. Are you sure you wish to proceed with your defiance?”

Lord Goodbrother twitched, but didn’t speak. Euron looked around the ships. Two of his mutes dumped the bodies into the churning waves. “What is dead may never die,” a few of his men chanted.

“Oh yes. What is dead may never die,” Euron agreed. “They are given to the Drowned God, are they not? To be served and pleasured by mermaids, I’m sure.”

Ser Harras’ and Lord Drumm’s men looked unhappy, but Euron’s crew were all around them. He gave orders for the Red Oarsmen to seize the Thunderer, and for Harren Half-Hoare to claim the Dusk. Lord Goodbrother was escorted below deck, to be held hostage as his ships were secured.
The Lord of Hammerhorn would be kept safe in the hull, to make sure his sons followed their king’s command.

Whatever rebellion they were intending died as swiftly as Lord Drumm and Harras Harlaw. Euron gave orders to seize their men and ships.

Then, Euron walked before Lord Volmark. He was curious to see how the young lord would react.

Lord Volmark bowed quickly, kneeling down against the blood-soaked wet wood. “My king.”

“Come, stand! The wealth of Westeros is stretched out before us!” Euron said cheerfully. “I promised to deliver the ironborn the entire realm. For glory like we have not seen for an age!”

Lord Volmark was pale. He was young, pale and beardless. “My king, those men…”

“Fools with no sense of ambition,” Euron dismissed. “They squabble and they fight with no concept of something greater than us all.”

“They were scared, Your Grace,” Lord Volmark said with a gulp. “They’ve seen the forces of Highgarden. I know you mean to attack Oldtown, but the latest raven from Three Towers said that there are nigh forty thousand Tyrell and Hightower men mustered to oppose us. And the Redwyne fleet must only be weeks away.”

Euron paused. “Forty thousand? Truly?”

“Aye, Gormond Bluetooth reported it so. They are gathering forces in strength, from Highgarden down to the marcher lords. A huge force led by Garlan Tyrell, he says. And then when Paxter Redwyne arrives from around the Cape of Dorne, they will have ships to support them too.”

“Forty thousand. Hmm, that’s not very good for us,” Euron mused, scratching his lip. He paused for a while, thinking about it. “No, let us delay by another fortnight, then, before launching our assault. There could well be ten thousand more by then.”

“Ten thousand more?” Lord Volmark looked confused. “How could… Wait, you mean ten thousand more enemies? You want to give them more time to prepare?”

“But of course. What is the point in taking riches if you can’t kill for them?” Euron chuckled. He sounded panicked. “We are outnumbered four against one!”

“Aye, and I’ve always thought that an ironborn is worth at least five green landers. Let us also attack Blackcrown, so they will be certain of our intent. Once the bay of the Whispering Sound is secure, we will sail up the Honeywine in strength,” Euron commanded. And slowly. No point moving too quickly; the most devastating storms are those that have time to simmer. “In the meantime, let us enjoy raiding the Arbor. I feel like we should be taking more thralls and salt wives – let every captain indulge himself. Let each warrior take several slaves. Let us take them all, actually.”

Lord Volmark’s mouth trembled, staring at him as if he were mad. Fools with no sense of something greater. “My king…!” he protested weakly. “Once the Redwyne fleet arrives we will lose what little advantage we have!”

“Well, we need to give them a fighting chance,” Euron said, a cruel smirk spreading over his lips. “Come now, Lord Volmark, why not enjoy the day? The Arbor is rich and populated. Find yourself a salt wife to warm your bed. Find yourself several. Let us pillage and reap, as is our right. Do you forget? The Drowned God granted us supremacy over all that we could take, so let’s take it all.”

The young lord looked ready to object, but the glint in Euron’s smiling eye caused him to pause. The lord was left shaking as Euron walked away. Euron was still holding the two blades. Red Rain was sleek and bright, while Nightfall was far more ornate and sublime. Nightfall’s blade would ripple, while Red Rain’s edge glinted. Yes, Euron thought as he stared out over the stormy waters. Two fine blades.

This is my age. Firstly, Euron intended to reap and rape the Arbor of everything it had. They will speak of the destruction I wrought for hundreds of years.

In the distance, thunder rumbled. The storms had been brewing through the Redwyne straits for a while now, but it could simmer for just a bit longer. His mages had promised him so, and Euron could be patient.

A few hours later, his mage Urgard walked up from the bottom of the deck. His eyes were raw. “My king,” the scarred man muttered, bowing his head. “The glass candles have responded.”

“Aye? And what did you see?”

“I saw your brother Victarion in the fire. His fleet has taken losses, but they are heading into Slaver’s Bay now. A fleet of ships has blockaded Meereen, though the Lord Captain is intent on cutting through them to reach the city.”

“Grand. Let my brother bring my wife to me.”

Urgard hesitated. “My king, I have seen more. The flames showed me Victarion’s intentions. He doesn’t plan on bringing Daenerys Targaryen to you, he intends on claiming the Targaryen and her dragons for himself.”

Euron gasped. “Oh no. You mean my own dear brother plans to betray me? To ruin my ambitions so. How shocking.” He laughed raucously, grinning as he looked around his men. “Well, I certainly didn’t see that coming.”

---

Author Notes:

Edit: There will be no update this weekend, I'm afraid. Next update on the weekend of the 3rd.
Chapter 29

Chapter Summary

A day in the march of King Jon Snow, and the road to Winterfell...

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chapter 29

Jon

He saw the dragons explode into the sky. They burst upwards from their rocky perches, scales of all colours glittering in the bright orange sun, from deep blue to glimmering gold to pitch black. The youngest were barely more than hatchlings, the oldest a great grey and brown behemoth with a wingspan twice the size of his own.

The largest of the dragons, the dominant, perched at the peaks of the crags while the lesser dragons lingered on the hills around them. There was a structure, a feudalism almost, to the massive reptiles scattered across the cliffs. They were dragon clans, each one a pack under a single alpha ruler.

He wasn’t happy giving tribute to anyone, however; he was a roaming dragon, beyond the claims of others’ territory.

The waters of the mountain lakes reflected his own body. He was huge, lean, his scales a blood red. A hundred battles had marked his hide, but he was large, lean and formidable. Not the biggest of the wild dragons, but close, and vicious and strong enough to hold his own against any foe.

Every full moon, dragons flocked to these mountain ranges to mate and fight. To prove dominance or to relent, to establish their hierarchies and their clans. Some moons were more important than others: sometimes a few clans fought, other times every wild dragon gathered from across the peninsula. Each one a vicious beast eager to prove its strength – a dance of dragons that blocked out the sky.

The first of the spars was already ignited. A great plume of scorching flames exploding from one maw, other beasts meeting them in kind. Beneath them, the bleak grey mountains caught fire, until the fires lit the sky. The rocks themselves melted and burnt.

The heat and power… it was incredible. As was the force beneath his wings as he flapped upwards, a great shriek exploding from his throat.

His target was the big grey and brown dragon. The biggest and eldest, with bleak dull scales that looked starch and cold compared to the bright colours of others. The grey dragon was twice his size, but he had no intention of submitting to anyone but the very strongest.

The two immense beasts collided in mid-air with the force of a storm, meeting fire with fire and teeth with teeth. All around them, the other dragons were shrieking, crying out and flapping around their duel.
For all that he was outmatched, the red dragon held his own. He was smaller, but his flames were hotter and his jaws more determined. He snapped forward and bit down on the bigger dragon’s neck – not at full strength, this was just a spar – but hard enough for black teeth to leave a mark against the hard scales.

Right now the red dragon was the weaker one, but the flock knew someday he would transcend. He was growing faster and flying further than any others, taking territory where no other dragon was brave enough. He had flown across the seas, far away from the burning mountains. The few beasts that could match him was steadily decreasing.

All around him, hundreds of wild dragons danced through the air. The sound and the heat was so immense it could have been a fifteenth flame on the peninsula.

Then, a shriek burst through the air. One of the hatchlings, crying in panic. The cry was echoed by others. At once, the dance stopped. Every dragon forgot their duel, abandoning the fights in a single moment.

From the south, he smelt a large group of more dragons approaching. Dragons that smelt of humans.

The dragon ‘lords’. Dragon slavers. A bloodthirsty growl broke through the red dragon’s throat. They hunted the wild dragons relentlessly; pathetic humans that were constantly eager to steal eggs or fill their cages. They had grown bold to interrupt a dance of such numbers.

Many of the wild dragons fled the humans, but not all were so easily cowed. For every two that fled in panic, one would roar in anger. A great cry broke through the tribes as the dragons swarmed to meet them.

He saw them. The tamed dragons wore great, spiked metal armour wrapped around their bodies, and they carried men on their back. The humans’ dragons were outnumbered, but they flew in formation. On the ground, he smelt human armies marching with them, bringing siege weapons, nets and bolts. A trap. They prepared an ambush to interrupt the dance. The wild dragons didn’t care. Dragons were the superior, not humans. This was a challenge of dominance, and the great beasts met them in kind.

In a single lunge, the great grey dragon snatched another out of the air, crushing wings in its teeth like a fly. The red dragon followed suit, lunging downwards against an armoured dragon and forcing fire into its throat. Its metal plate bubbled and melted under his breath, its body thrashing. No mercy towards those corrupted and enslaved by humans.

Humans were shouting, screaming, a buzzing of insects compared to the dragons’ roars.

And yet the dragon slavers didn’t relent. They fought back with flaming lances and whips of pure fire. They used arrows and nets and wires. Even when their dragons were outmatched, the armies supporting them launched great boulders and bolts into their wings. Dragging wild dragons to the ground, shredding their wings. A grounded dragon could be overpowered by their unending armies. If the dragon slavers had to sacrifice ten thousand men for one caged dragon, they would. The humans’ armies always needed more dragons.

In the air, the mounted dragons focused on the weakest first, and they matched raw fury using formation and tactics. The thick smoke, the stench of burning flesh and the immense shrieks filled the air.

The red dragon fought against two smaller beasts at once. Unyielding, merciless. The dragons he could handle, but the men… the men wielded unnatural fiery whips that would lash against his hide, so hot they burned even through his scales. Their whips spun into great lengths, hissing and snarling like they had lives of their own.

And then there were the shadows, clinging to his scales. It was the men’s doing, somehow. Shapeless shadows with claws, clutching at the dragons’ bodies, snaking around their wings, digging inky black tendrils into open wounds and biting…

He could see bodies failing out of the air one by one. The human armies could not be stopped. Still, the dragons fought.

The grey great dragon was trembling, struggling to keep in the air, burning lances and arrows through its wings. He heard the humans chanting something, their voices were weak and meaningless.

And then a great boom shattered through the mountains. Dragons screamed and fell. Pain rocketed through his body, his wings spasming. It was a noise like the screaming of a thousand souls, lighting his very bones aflame and scorching his skin from the inside…

The red dragon fought it. He fought for as long as he could but the sound of the horn could not be matched. The whole world seemed to explode into shadow fire. Ahead of him, he saw the great grey dragon collapse, falling to the earth with enough force to shake the mountains and then everything turned–

“Wake up, Your Grace. They are calling for you.”

Jon gasped, struggling to process the phantom pain in his head. Sonagon stirred as he woke up at the same time.

Wide eyes stared at him. “The host is to move out, Your Grace,” his squire said nervously. “I was told wake you.”

Jon gulped, still blinking repeatedly. “Urgh, aye. Aye. Bring me a skin of water to wash my face. And then prepare my horse.”

“Your horse is already readied, Your Grace,” Marrion bowed his head. “I will fetch water.”

Jon’s head was still spinning. He remembered fire, flying, and dragons clashing in the air. A dream, he told himself. Sonagon’s.

Focus. The army had been marching hard, and there was little time for rest. All around him, six thousand men stirred. The sound of horses and boots filled the air.

He washed his face roughly, wiping cold water into his eyes. Too many long weeks of marching had left his body sore. Jon knew they were close and could hardly quit now, but his body yearned for rest and comfort. Weeks since he’d had a decent night’s rest. More and more he found himself daydreaming of Val’s dark golden hair, planting soft kisses across her neck while her…

“Lord Umber says we are three days’ march away,” the boy reported. Marrion Manderly was a young boy of eleven, podgy and stoutly built, though a dutiful squire. “And, um, Lord Giantsbane has sent three parties ahead.”
Jon smiled. His squire brought his riding leathers. “Lord Giantsbane,” he repeated. “Have you called Tormund that?”

“I… I haven’t, Your Grace?”

“Best not. The man doesn’t need more titles.”

It’s a been another night, and the Greatjon and Tormund still haven’t killed each other, he thought wearily. That is a success in its own right.

Jon stepped outside of his tent. The plains were thick with snow, though the camp had stomped it into a muddy slush. The weather made progress slow, but they were moving forward. He could see the frozen headwaters of the Weeping Water in the distance.

From his Dragonguard, Toregg the Tall and Gregg Sheepstealer both stood outside his tent. Jon’s second squire, Bennard Locke, had his destrier ready and waiting for him. Bennard was a dark-haired and grim-faced boy of fourteen, attentive, quiet and keen-witted. He wore a surcoat with a crude stitching of a white dragon on a grey background. Jon hadn’t yet decided on a coat of arms himself, but his squire proved a quick hand with a needle.

“How goes the march? Any more attacks?” Jon asked as he mounted his horse.

“Not that I’ve heard,” Toregg replied. “But we still can’t find that supply escort that got attacked. My pa has been hunting the bastards that did that for the week.”

Jon nodded. They were a big host, snows were thick, and supplies were proving a problem. “We have food to last for now. We can restock when we meet the Weeper’s host. Until there’s an alternative we can’t delay the march.”

“A hungry march then.”

“Not so,” Gregg Sheepstealer grunted. He was a stout, fat-bellied man with thick arms. “The southerners brought horses to eat, didn’t they?”

Jon grimaced. Not ideal, but my army is mostly free folk – they have survived harder marches than this. Behind him, Sonagon stirred. The dragon rested at the very centre of the camp, but all the men kept their distance. “Better get the dragon in the air, king,” Gregg warned. “We don’t want to be caught by any raids like the other day.”

“Aye,” Jon agreed. His grey destrier shimmied slightly beneath him. “Fetch Ser Marlon, Lord Umber, and Tormund. We move out quickly, and I’ll send Sonagon ahead.”

He closed his eyes and stretched out the warg towards Sonagon. It was accepted easily. The dragon was still tired and sluggish, but they had been bonding more and more easily during the march.

Come now, Jon pushed, as forcefully he dared. His vision blurred, his senses shifted. Fly. Hunt.

Huge wings flexed outwards slowly. The great shadow fell over the camp. Even after weeks of Sonagon being with them, there was still a minor panic every time the dragon burst into the air.

Jon felt himself rising up into the cold air, the wind howling under his wings, snow drifting across his body. All around him, there was the stink of men marching into the Lonely Hills. Jon’s host of over six thousand seemed so formidable from the centre, but it was left a small shapeless blur from a dragon’s eye.
Head towards the hills, Jon pushed. Find the river. Look for any armies amassing.

Sonagon flapped southwest, before twisting and circling east. Then, his nostrils flickered as a sharp scent hit him on the wind.

He heard the cries from over a mile away. Sonagon smelled the cold tang of blood. A faint slurry of snow rolled over the forests, and then blobs of figures appeared in the snow, as small as ants. Wrestling bodies in the middle of a battle between the pines.

The boom of wings cracked through the air. The men below all heard it. Jon watched hundreds of figures quiver – actually quiver – as the white shape roared above them like a hurricane.

There was no shock quite like Sonagon’s roar. Ant-like figures fell down in the snow, panting desperately as if their hearts were collapsing in their chest. A dragon brought out a primal fear in all men – it could turn even the bravest into scurrying little rats.

It’s the sense of scale, Jon thought. No man likes to see how little they are.

Sonagon roared. The blob scattered and broke, and a cry of victory rose from the ground. By the time Sonagon turned to sweep low across the hills, the men were already running into the trees.

He would have chased them, if it were possible to recognise ally from foe.

How can you tell which side are allies when they all look like bugs? Jon cursed. It was lucky that one side ran, because Sonagon was left useless trying to intervene in a pitched battle. I need large banners, something that even a dragon’s eyes can make out.

Jon took a deep breath, feeling himself shudder as he let go of the warg. His senses blurred, and slowly he fell out of the dragon’s skin. Snow whipped at his face. Beneath him, his grey destrier snorted.

“There’s fighting on the Lonely Hills,” Jon shouted, blinking repeatedly, trying to focus. “Bolton forces attacking our forward parties. Pass the word to Greatjon and Tormund.”

“Yes, Your Grace,” Marrion said hurriedly, turning to run over the snow.

A figure wearing the Manderly sigil rode towards him. “How many?” Ser Marlon called.

“Hundreds or so.” Damn, it was so hard to count from above through Sonagon’s eyes. “Their forces scattered as soon as they saw Sonagon.”

“Again?” a free folk grumbled, by Jon’s side. “Isn’t going to be much of a battle then.”

“Aye, but I don’t want to let them get away,” Jon said. The Bastard of Bolton could be with them. “Gather up five hundred mounted men, we move out quickly.”

“What of your dragon?” Toregg asked.

“They’ve reached the woods. Sonagon can’t follow easily through the trees.” And they know that; their entire tactic is based around making it inconvenient for the dragon. “We need mounted men if we want to stop them getting away again.”

Most of their cavalry were from White Harbour. In the host, there were four times as many free folk than northerners, but the free folk were primarily infantry while all of the heavy horses were northern soldiers. Jon heard Ser Marlon shout as he prepared the riders.
“Bloody hells,” Tormund Giantsbane grumbled as he came trotting forward on a large dark pouncey. He chose a mild and comfortable mount, but he still sits uneasily in the saddle. “What are we chasing this time?”

“Skirmishers in the hills,” Jon ordered. Sonagon was still in the sky, soaring through the low clouds. “I saw them ambushing one of our groups.”

“The fools. How did they expect the fight to go when that dragon is in the air?” He guffawed.

“The dragon is not always in the air. If I hadn’t spotted them it could have gone badly for us,” Jon said stiffly. They take the dragon for granted and that’s dangerous. “That warband shouldn’t have went so far ahead.”

“Aye, that’ll be bloody Gerrick Kingsblood,” Tormund snorted. “I bloody warned him not to go too far, but him and his warband were all eager for a fight.”

Horses were stirring, riding from the camp. Bennard Locke brought him his helm and shield, but Jon didn’t want his squires with him. He needed to move quickly. “Come on,” he ordered. “I will not allow Ramsay Snow a chance to escape.”

“You saw the Bastard with them?” The Greatjon growled darkly. He rode a huge, dark warhorse, with his greatsword over his back.

“No,” he admitted. “But someone must be leading these attacks. It could be Ramsay Snow. I intend to find out.”

“Then move,” Lord Umber snapped. “He will not escape.”

“Oh aye,” Tormund agreed, hoisting up his maul. “This Bastard of Bolton seems like a scunner who ought to be losing his limbs.”

Their horses marched out, all of them were strong northern breeds to manage the snow. Jon gave orders for his Dragonguard to bring the infantry and follow as quickly as possible.

Ahead of them, the Lonely Hills stretched out ahead of them. Jon saw the streams that led down to the Weeping Waters trickling over the landscape. The ground was thick with snow, and the sound of galloping hooves.

Sonagon swept over the sky, the huge shadow passing over the ground. Horses around Jon whinnied, and the riders had to struggle to control them. “I see them scattering south and west,” Jon called. “Ser Marlon, ride around the hills, try to cut them off!”

“Of course, your Grace!” Ser Marlon called, and he shouted to split off with a hundred men.

Jon pulled on his rein looking for the officers. “Ewan Bole,” he shouted at the northerner. “Take fifty men along the streams, in case they try to double back.”

Ewan Bole just nodded. He was a heavily bearded man, one of Robett Glover’s sworn swords. “Aye, Your Grace,” he shouted gruffly over the sound of horses. “Riders, on me!”

Beside him, Tormund scoffed. “‘Your Grace’. Now why does it being king suddenly make you so graceful, I wonder?”

“Just go left through the hills,” Jon ordered. “They’re on foot and they’ve scattered.”
They circled around, striding through the snow. Jon had his forces split again. The Lonely Hills earned their name; they were desolate and barren hills and rough and empty countryside. Large, but lightly sloping and scattered, leading down to the Weeping Water and the Dreadfort. Jon heard that sometimes the wind blowing through the hills sounded like wailing.

“If this is Ramsay Snow,” the Greatjon called, riding next to Jon, “then we take him alive. We take him alive so he gets to die slowly.”

Jon just nodded, casting a wary glance at the big man. The Greatjon had recovered Last Hearth a week ago. It hadn't been difficult; there had only been a skeletal Bolton force holding it, most of whom had tried to flee. The entire keep had been ransacked bare.

Inside the castle, the Greatjon found his youngest son, a boy of six, nailed to the keep’s wall. Ramsay Snow had signed his name.

They had also found one of the castellans, Mors Umber, with a spear wound in his chest and on the brink of death's door. It was doubtful the Crowsfood would survive much longer. Some of Lord Umber’s other family may have fled. There was no sign of Hother Umber.

Or of my brother, Jon thought with a grimace. Bran.

He could see a dark, simmering anger in the Greatjon's eyes. What happened at Last Hearth had been savage. The sooner the Bastard of Bolton is caught the better everyone will be.

They met up with Ewan Bole’s force again quickly, who reported that none had slipped away towards the streams. After securing the foothills, they rode to meet up with the forward party. Jon saw the wildling warband atop the snowy field. They were cheering, celebrating. That made Jon’s fists clench as the cavalry rode up to meet them.

“Gerrick Kingsblood,” Jon shouted. “What the hells do you think you're doing?”

The broad, red-haired man grinned. He could have passed for a southerner, with his hair shaved and wearing chainmail and leathers provided by the White Harbour fleet. “Victory, that's what,” Gerrick laughed. “We saw those bastards fleeing like cravens!”

There were bodies littering the snow. More wildlings than Boltons, it seemed. “They fled from Sonagon, ser. Not you,” Jon said curtly. “And if the dragon hadn't been there, I would be burying your corpse right now.”

The man faltered slightly. “But we won!”

“You let your bloody warband get ambushed. You got lucky that Sonagon was in the air, there were no guarantees he would be,” Jon said angrily. “You went ahead of the main host and left yourself exposed.”

Gerrick bristled. “You gave the order to secure villages around the Dreadfort, I went and did that.”

“Did I tell you to walk into a Bolton ambush?” His voice turned cold.

His eyes were wide, his shoulders tense. Gerrick opened his mouth to object. Tormund pushed his horse forward. “Stop talking now, Gerrick,” Tormund warned. “Bow your head and step back if you know what's good for you.”

Gerrick’s face twisted, but he didn't speak. Jon let his gaze linger on him quietly. “I'll handle it here. Gerrick, you are relieved,” Tormund offered. “Snow, you go chase the cunts responsible.”
“Aye,” Jon muttered, turning his horse and signalling the men to follow. They rode down the hill, following the footprints in the snow.

The Greatjon looked at him with a scoff. The horses didn’t stop their quick trot. “Your wildlings aren’t soldiers.”

“They know how to fight.”

“That ain’t the same thing.” The Greatjon grunted, as he shimmied his horse away from Jon’s.

From Jon’s other side, Ewan Bole moved his horse closer towards his, cautiously. “Lord Umber has a point, Your Grace,” the man noted, in his very rough voice. “I do not doubt your wildling’s strength, but there’s a reason why no King-Beyond-the-Wall has ever succeeded.” Jon turned his gaze on him, but the man’s tone was just observational, not aggressive. “The wildlings are not trained. They can fight, but can your wildlings hold a shield wall? Can they set battle lines and keep to them? Can they mount a siege, or brace against cavalry? Their raiding parties are fearsome, but their hosts are less so. Historically, even when the wildlings have had the far greater numbers, their armies have been bested easily enough by those of the Night’s Watch or Stark.”

Jon hesitated. “They can learn what they’re missing.”

“Then I hope they learn quickly,” he warned. “Too many make the mistake of focusing on the number of men, rather than the type.”

He’s right, Jon thought. Bringing the northmen and the free folk together had highlighted some fairly large flaws in Jon’s army. “Yes,” Jon said, suppressing the sigh. “Thank you for the honest counsel, ser.”

He laughed brashly. “I am no ser. I ain’t no friend to wildlings, either, but I lost kin at Winterfell and then again at the Red Wedding. Between wildlings or Boltons, I know which one I hate more.”

Jon could believe it; the northman had a strong, honest attitude to him. Jon had been keeping an eye on which of his men had been distinguishing themselves, and Ewan certainly had. “Joining forces will help greatly to patch our weaknesses. And good commanders like yourself will aid even more, if you’re willing to work with them,” he said. He tried to measure the man’s reaction to that comment. “Right now, they’re overconfident. We’ve been winning every battle we’ve fought, and that makes men like Gerrick brave enough to do something stupid. Or become lazy.”

“You do have a dragon,” Ewan noted.

“I have one dragon. And when there is more than one battle happening, my dragon can't attend them all.” Jon shook his head. “The Boltons have proved they aren't willing to fight a pitched battle when Sonagon is involved, but they're still trying every other type of conflict.”

“Aye, they've been a nuisance. But we cut them down piece by piece and sooner or later they run out of places to—”

The man’s voice was cut off by a horn blast over the hills. Ser Marlon’s men. At once Jon's riders turned to change direction. He reached out and summoned Sonagon back towards him.

The horses galloped, but by the time they arrived the battle was already practically over. Jon saw some fighting on the ground through Sonagon, but he had to hold the dragon back. Sonagon would hurt his own men as much as the enemy if he intervened in tight rank skirmishes.

“We found them,” Ser Marlon called to Jon as the reinforcements arrived. The last of the attackers were being subdued. “Mostly Bolton men, some Karstark and Hornwood among them. They tried to fight, and then they surrendered pretty quickly.”

It wasn't much of a battle. They had been fleeing the dragon on foot and Ser Marlon's men were all “Sixty or so surrendered. Another twenty died in the fight.”

Jon shook his head. “No. I saw at least three hundred ambushing Gerrick's men.”

“Yes,” Ser Marlon agreed. “But these are the only ones we caught.”

Jon could see the soldiers gathered in the middle of the riders. They didn't have enough rope, so instead the prisoners were held at spear point, forced to their knees in the snow. He saw the flayed man of Bolton stitched on their hauberks. Gods, Jon thought, they all look so scared and cold. Why is it easier to think of enemies as faceless foes in uniform rather than as cold and scared men?

“We think the rest of their force must have scattered between the three villages around here,” Ser
Marlon explained. “Or maybe they have hideouts in the woods.”

“No, it'll be the villages,” the Greatjon grunted. “They run to the villages and they hide their swords and helmets; all of those soldiers pretend to be farmers and smallfolk. When you go chasing after them, they'll shrug and say “who, me?”. And when you walk away they'll pick up their swords and stab you in the back.”

Jon was reminded of the books he read on the First Dornish War. Dammit, I do not want that type of war. “And what do you suggest?”

“Put the Bolton villages to the sword.” The Greatjon's eyes were grim. “Make sure they know the punishment for harbouring soldiers.”

Jon smiled humourlessly. “Wouldn't that just encourage more villages to resent us? Give them reason to hate you and they will learn how to hide soldiers better, how to make their ambushes more effective. That is the catch, Lord Umber; you lose no matter which way you fight it.” Jon shook his head, turning to Ser Marlon. “No, try to find out where these soldiers went. Question the smallfolk – carefully – but the rules haven't changed.”

Ser Marlon nodded, moving off to gather up his men. The Greatjon stood stiffly on his mount, arms folded.

“We cannot punish smallfolk, Lord Umber,” said Jon. “Not even Bolton smallfolk.”

“I might have agreed,” he replied darkly. “Except then my home was razed because my uncles were too generous in which ‘smallfolk’ they let through the gates.”

Jon didn't reply. He turned to inspect the prisoners, the first of which were already being interrogated. Perhaps some would have useful information, but Jon doubted that common soldiers would know much of Lord Bolton's plans. And it is impossible to weed out the lies from the truth in any case, Jon thought bitterly. It’s hard to trust anything they say when it might be a desperate lie or a deliberate ploy.

I have the larger army and a dragon, yet they are still making things difficult at every chance. The Boltons know how to harry a force from all sides.

“Sixty prisoners,” Lord Umber noted. “That’s sixty more mouths to feed out of our rations. And another delay to our march.”

“We're not executing prisoners, Lord Umber. Not because they're inconvenient.”

“Half-measures, boy,” the Greatjon warned. “They'll kill you every single time.”

The Greatjon refused stubbornly to ever call Jon king. Jon wasn’t fool enough to call him out on it; their alliance wasn’t so secure.

Afterwards, outriders reported movement to the west. The rest of the attackers were fleeing from the hills. Jon closed his eyes and took a deep breath, and in the sky Sonagon twisted around with an almighty flap. The dragon will become irritated flying like this without hunting, Jon thought with a grimace. There was a limit to how much Sonagon would allow himself to be controlled. I cannot keep using him indefinitely.

Jon’s infantry caught up with them towards dusk, as they moved over the hills. He had done his best to try and organise them, but even from a distance he could see the lack of rank and file in the sprawled, black blob of men. His host of six thousand men, mostly wildlings with some northmen mixed in, stretched over the snowy fields. Tormund had brought the wildlings south from Castle Black, and Lord Umber had rallied what he could from the Umber lands, and the rest were Manderly men that had rode up from White Harbour alongside Ser Marlon and Ser Wylis. Robett Glover and a small force of men had joined them from other houses of the east coast.

We will meet up with the Weeper’s force from Karhold soon, Jon thought. The Weeper brought five thousand wildlings, some Karstark men, and five hundred giants with mammoths. The plan was to converge on the Dreadfort together, from the west and northeast. They would be over ten thousand strong. Whatever Bolton force was left stood no chance in battle.

Of course, that’s little reason for them to fight a battle, he thought grimly.

Later, Ser Marlon returned. The knight was grim-faced, his horse breathing heavily as he rode towards them. “We gave chase for as long as we could, Your Grace,” Ser Marlon reported. “We only caught ten of them. The rest slipped away. There was little luck scouring the villages.”

“Chasing bloody ghosts,” Tormund spat, grumbling as he walked towards Jon. “They’ll have us chasing our tails at this rate.”

“But they are folding,” Jon insisted. “They are losing ground, and the worst they can do is slow us down. They can’t stop us. We are days away from the Dreadfort, and they don’t have forces to even try to stop us.”

“Aye, and am I the only one who thinks that’s queer?” Tormund folded his arms. “We’ve been marching all the way through Bolton lands and not a single bastard is even trying to challenge us.”

“So the wildling has some wits,” the Greatjon grunted. Tormund glared at the lord, sizing up against him. The Greatjon was over head and shoulders taller, while Tormund was short and stocky. “He’s right, we haven’t even seen a tenth of the opposition we should expect.”

“They’re scared of the dragon,” said Jon.

“If they’re that scared, then why don’t they surrender?”

Jon didn’t reply, but there was something bothering him too. It was only at the hour of ghosts when he learned what. Outriders arrived from the east, reporting a battle on the banks of the Weeping Water. The Weeper’s host, the one that had been coming down from Karhold. Ambushed as they tried to cross the river.

The Battle of Weeping Water was over before Jon or any others even heard of it.

It was too dark and cold to safely move men at night, but Jon readied their mounted men to head out at first light. He brought his Dragonguard with him, and summoned Sonagon to follow. He could see the frozen banks of the Weeping Water in the distance; in spring it was a long, slow and gloomy river, but now it was frozen scar cutting through the snowy plains. Jon smelt the smoke and blood in the air before their horses even got near.

“It was a bloody distraction,” the Greatjon growled, echoing Jon’s thoughts. “They ambushed your outriders and led your dragon on a merry chase to the west. All the while a larger force ambushed your second host while the dragon was busy.”

Jon saw the bodies littering the valley. There were corpses with arrows in them, half-buried under the light snow. They spotted a bloodied corpse of a mammoth, with spears through its hide, as it lay collapsed through the ice in the trickling river.

Jon saw the smoke of the Weeper’s camp, surrounded by wooden spike fortifications in a typical wildling defence. Besides the mammoths, the Weeper’s force was on foot. Thousands of men all huddled together in the bend of the water. Likely around four thousand, Jon thought. Maybe less.

Their army wasn’t moving, the camp felt bloodied. Wounded. Horns blew as they approached, and the Weeper met Jon and the riders as they rode into the camp. Jon saw the shadows of giants, sniffing in the air cautiously. Wildlings lowered their heads or bowed to Jon as he passed.

The Weeper didn’t bow. Even in steel and hard leathers, the man looked just as hard and worn as ever. His armour was grimy, and blood trickled down his cheeks.

“About bloody time you arrived,” the Weeper grumbled as Jon pulled his horse to stop. “I was thinking I would have to win this whole bloody war by myself.”

“Weeper.” Tormund spat the word. “Why aren’t you dead yet?”

“You think anyone has the stones to kill me?” The Weeper’s voice turned taunting. “Fucking ‘Giantsbane’. You’ve lost weight. Did the crows not feed you after you lost the battle at the Frostfangs like a–”

He grunted. His scythe was covered in dried, cold blood. “The flayed men ambushed us crossing the river last night. They came from all sides, with arrows and horses.”

“How many?” Jon demanded.

“Five hundred. Maybe more. I could only count the corpses, but enough of them ran away. We fought them off.”

“So we won?” Ser Marlon asked. Jon didn’t look too convinced.

“And how many losses did you take?”
The Weeper’s eyes flickered. Dammit, Jon cursed. The camp stunk of blood, weariness and wounded. He saw giants with the stubs of arrows still sticking out of their furs.

“Where the bloody hells was that dragon?” the Weeper demanded. “We could have used him here last night.”

“Distracted,” Jon replied icily. Lured away. “Sonagon can’t be everywhere. I didn’t even receive news of the battle here until it was too late.”

The Boltons are learning, trying to find weak spots in my campaign. They’re learning how to fight around the dragon rather than face it.

“How many managed to flee?” the Greatjon demanded. “And who was leading them? Was it Ramsay Snow?’

“Hundreds or so,” the Weeper grumbled. “And I didn’t bloody have a chance to ask.”

“You let hundreds escape?” Tormund guffawed. “You must have had five times their number.”

“Aye, five times as many weary and tired. They were fucking prepared,” the Weeper snapped. He glared angrily between them, bristling aggressively. “I gave chase and they hurt my men coming over the hill for it.”

The battle would have gone poorly from the beginning, especially as the wildlings were struggling trying to cross the river. The Weeper was a ruthless and capable leader, but of course he would always attack. When a prudent man would have fallen back, the Weeper must have tried to lead an assault up the valley.

Wildling warbands didn’t have formations – in open skirmishes that wasn’t so much of a disadvantage, but in any fortified clash it was disastrous. From the state of the camp and the battlefield, Jon expected that at least ten wildlings fell for every Bolton man. Maybe thousands dead. We only ‘won’ because of numbers.

“What of prisoners?” Jon demanded.

The Weeper’s lips twitched. The grin was bloodthirsty. What prisoners?

Dammit. But not now. “Where did the Bolton men retreat to?” Jon demanded, quickly changing tack.

“South. The southerners ran back to their little castle.”

“Then we follow them,” Jon ordered. “The plan hasn’t changed; we bring our hosts together and march on the Dreadfort. We split our mounted forces. Tormund and Ser Marlon, return to the camp with half our horses. March on the Dreadfort from the west. The Greatjon and I will stay with the Weeper’s forces and march from the northeast.”

“Yes, Your Grace,” Ser Marlon bowed in his saddle. His men turned and rode away, along with Tormund.

“‘Your Grace’,;” the Weeper sneered, glancing at Jon. “So while I’ve been fighting a war, you’ve been getting those southern dipsticks to bow at you?”

“Just be careful with the way you speak to me,” Jon warned. He kept his voice very low. “I will only tolerate so much.”
The Weeper only snorted.

He’s been fighting more battles than anyone, Jon told himself. He’s weary and grim. As gruff as the Weeper was, Jon could hardly ask for a better front-line commander. The Weeper had fought off both Umber and Karstark forces ever since the crossing at Eastwatch, and fought all the way down to take Karhold itself. The Weeper’s four thousand men were all battle-tested and worn. And this battle has likely been the worst casualties he’s suffered.

“We need rest for our horses,” the Greatjon grumbled, glaring around the wildlings. Jon noticed how nervous many of the northmen were at the sight of giants. The Weeper motioned and waved for one of his men to handle it.

“To me, my lord,” a deep voice called. Jon saw a short burly man with a balding head and a mouthful of broken brown teeth step forward. He wore thick iron plate, carrying a large, ugly longsword over his back. “I will arrange for them.”

Jon’s eyes narrowed. The man did not sound like a wilding. He had a southern accent. “And who are you?”

“I am Ser Clayton Suggs, Your Holiness,” the man bowed. He had a white stone on his chest. He smiled, but there was no humour there. Eyes like a pig. “Formerly of King’s Landing.”

A knight? Jon paused, making the connection. “You served Stannis at the battle of Hardhome.”

“To my shame. I was deluded by false gods and fake prophets.” Ser Clayton was respectful, but Jon didn’t like his expression. “I see the truth now. For the glory of the ice dragon, Your Holiness.”

“Indeed,” he said, icily. “You converted fast.”

“Lord Weeper vouched for me.” Ser Clayton Suggs’ grin widened. “He said that I have talent. Talent better served on a battlefield rather than a prisoner. I serve faithfully, I swear it on my honour.”

Jon didn’t reply, but he dismounted and let Ser Clayton take his horse. The southern knight’s eyes lingered on him. Looking around, Jon was surprised to see that quite a few of them weren’t wildlings.

Karstark men. Most averted their gaze, but he followed their eyes towards a group of four men, huddled together.

The only one who met Jon’s stare had the look of a lord. He was a strong man past fifty, with brown hair, a beard and thick moustache, wearing dishevelled clothes. Jon stepped forward.

There were bloody dark bruises over the lord’s face, Jon noticed. Some of the bruises were old, others fresh. Gritting his teeth, the man lowered his head jerkily. “King Snow,” the man choked. “I am Lord Cregan Karstark of Karhold.”

Ahh. “Thank you for supporting our cause, my lord.”

His jaw clenched. “I will do what is best for my family,” Lord Karstark said. He was a strong man, but his voice was strained. “And for my house. Your Grace.”

“Your family,” Jon repeated. “Tell me, where is Lady Alys?”

Lord Karstark’s gaze was dark. “On a ship heading to White Harbour. Along with my brothers, sons and nephew.”

“And yet your father Arnolf Karstark is at Winterfell, allied with Roose Bolton, I believe?”

“Aye.” Jon could see the anger and emotion hiding behind a faint layer of civility. Civility reinforced by fear, though. Karstark has not been treated kindly. “And I fought against the wildlings that invaded my lands, I did. I will not lie and say I would not do it again, even. But I will act as is best for my house and my people – and if that means resolving this war with you, gods forgive me, I will do it. I will fight alongside you and so the name Karstark will survive. My lands, my castle, my family will be kept safe.”

“I see.” There’s no loyalty with this one. The only reason he is with me is because he knows he will not survive being against me. But perhaps that is enough?

From the looks of things, Lord Karstark was being kept under very close supervision by the wildlings around him too. It didn’t escape Jon’s notice that Cregan Karstark was missing a sword on his waist.

“That was the pledge you forced from me, Your Grace,” Lord Karstark spat the words. “And I will even uphold it. However, should anything happen to me or my wife, then the whole realm will know you a liar and oathbreaker. Just like your accursed brother – a man that would wipe his ass on vows and loyalty. So just keep your dogs away from me and my men.”

Jon had to consider his words very carefully. There was a long pause. “Thank you for your loyalty, my lord,” he said slowly. “Although I would advise you to consider your words more thoughtfully. And respectfully.”

The man’s face twisted. He had to close his eyes, and force the words out of his throat as if they were bile. “I apologise, Your Grace,” Lord Karstark growled, taking a gasped, deep breath. The words seemed to physically pain him. “I will mind my tongue.”

How many times must the Weeper have beaten the man to put that sort of fear into him?

He looked around the camp. The free folk were loyal, even the White Harbour men had come willingly, but the other northerners that were filling their ranks? How many have only joined because of the same fear?

The thought felt like a lump of iron lodged in his chest, making him scowl.

Jon walked around the free folk, trying to recall the names of the leaders that left with the Weeper. Everyone was worn and tired, but he still saw many wearing white stones. Jon’s squires looked terrified at the sight of giants and mammoths lumbering near the water. Several giants approached to stare at him, and in the Old Tongue he heard them muttering, “King, King.”

He met the Weeper by the water’s edge, washing the blood off his face in the icy water. “I got headcounts from the war chiefs,” the Weeper called. “We lost two thousand in the battle last night.”

“Then we must find the men to burn the bodies. Leave none untorched,” said Jon. “They’ve bloodied our noses, but this is still a Bolton defeat. Combined, we will still be nine thousand strong. We will take the Dreadfort, and then the Boltons lose their seat.”

“Nine thousand strong,” the Weeper grumbled. He was bare-chested as he washed, but he didn’t seem to mind even despite the freezing cold. His back was covered in scars. “And most of those free folk. You’ve got what, two thousand southrons with you? Less?”
“For now. The northern lords are still rallying.”

“And so are the free folk. I hear Rattleshirt is mustering another host from Eastwatch. Sigorn of Thenn is doing the same from the Shadow Tower. We’re still getting refugees trickling south through the Wall, and they’re likely coming through faster now that we’ve got all three gates. There could well be an army of over fifteen thousand free folk fighters gathering for you.”

“What’s your point?”

“Fifteen thousand.” His voice was low, warning. “Just remember which side you need more, king. In a choice between these southerners and the free folk, I expect you to choose the free folk.”

“It doesn’t have to be a choice. It’s not us versus them.”

“And once again you prove yourself a fool.”

_He still sees all southerners as enemies._ Jon met his gaze. “What did you do to Lord Karstark, Weeper?”

He scoffed. “That filth? I bent him over and I showed him the butt of my scythe a few times. Maybe more than a few. The man was stubborn.”

Jon’s fingers twitched. “You did what?”

“Hells, you told me to convince Karstark to declare for us,” the Weeper chuckled. “I convinced him to declare for us.”

“And can you not show restraint?” Jon snapped.

“He’s still got a head, doesn’t he? That was my restraint.” He pulled himself up by the river’s edge, scowling. “That scum should count himself blessed he’s still breathing. I would have happily killed him, except I knew you would have a hissy fit over it.”

“And how do you ever expect his loyalty after bloody beating him?”

“Who the fuck cares about his loyalty? I don’t need him. He shouldn’t be alive,” the man snarled. “Cregan didn’t have any choice but to join me. At every fight, I put Karstark men on the very front ranks. I don’t trust any of them, I don’t give any of them a chance to betray us. You can sure as hells bet I have men ready to kill them at a moment’s notice if they even look treacherous.”

Jon thought of Ser Clayton Suggs. The Weeper recognised ‘talent’. “And how do you expect that’s going to work in the long run?” he challenged. “We will lose if we try to rule by fear, Weeper.”

“Fear is the only thing men like Cregan Karstark understand,” he grumbled. His hands twitched as he turned to face Jon. Without his armour, Jon could see the ugly, bloated red scars across his neck from the white walker’s grip.

“And fear will only sow more hate,” Jon muttered, stepping forward. “We will not do it. We will conquer the northern way, not the wildling way.”

Weeper’s bulging eyes narrowed. “You see, that’s what concerns me,” he growled. “Consider this a friendly warning, Snow. It surely as hell seems like you’re abandoning the free folk in favour of your new southron friends.”

Jon stiffened. “What are you talking about, Weeper?”
“I hear you’ve been selling free folk daughters to your ‘noble houses’,” the Weeper spat. “Your marriages.”

“And I’ve been buying highborn brides for free folk warriors,” replied Jon. “They are alliances that help bring us together.”

“And also rewards for those that serve you,” he sneered. “Making proud warriors want to be treated like dogs. Forcing them into all your northern games for what? Your favour?”

Jon didn’t reply. There had been only five confirmed betrothals so far – two of Old Man Harwick’s granddaughters to minor lords of the White Knife, Ygon Oldfather’s son to Lord Forrester’s third daughter, Gerrick Kingsblood to Lord Holt’s eldest daughter, Soren Shieldbreaker’s daughter to Lord Bole and Baldor Icewall’s daughter to Ser Ian Poole – but the news had spread and there were two dozen other potential matches up in the air.

The Weeper rolled his shoulders as he stepped up from the riverbank. “Me?” the Weeper muttered. “I might start wondering why I should have to be given a woman at all. Why not just take one?”

“That would be a mistake,” Jon warned darkly. “There are still more of them than there are free folk.”

“Oh aye. And I’ve followed your rules, I’ve kept these free folk in line. You ordered ‘no raids’, and, hells, I’ve followed. Not a single warrior has pillaged from my warband without losing his own head for it, I dare you to find to find living soul that can say otherwise.” The Weeper grinned. “But now I’m starting to wonder what I get for all my efforts.”

There was an edge to his voice. “What do you want, Weeper?”

“Karhold. I took that castle, I get to keep it.”

“Karhold is the seat of House Karstark.”

“A family that betrayed and fought against you, from how I hear it,” the Weeper said. “Now why should a bunch of traitors get to keep a castle like that?”

Jon’s lips pursed, but he nodded. Good allies needed to be rewarded. “I can make no promises right now,” said Jon. “But I will bear it in mind.”

“And I also want the girl,” the Weeper called. Jon stopped. “She’s a pretty girl. Alys Karstark. I want her.”

His eyes turned hard. The Weeper folded his arms. “Is that not how you southerners do things? You marry the right woman and you take the castle?”

“Alys Karstark,” Jon said stiffly, “is already married.”

“Not because she had anything to do with it. I spoke to her. If you take that Cregan cunt’s head, I imagine she’d be cheering the loudest in the crowd.”

“Lord Cregan Karstark is an ally now. He agreed to support us.”

“Not willingly. He conceded only because we didn’t give him a choice.”

“That’s not the point.” Jon took a step forward. “There are rules here. When a lord surrenders to you, you can’t kill him afterwards. Otherwise no lord will ever surrender again. How do you think the northern lords would react if I executed a prominent northern lord and gave his wife away?”

“Fuck them. Cregan Karstark is a nasty little parasite. World would be better off if he never had a head. I should have killed him already.” He folded his arms, shaking his head quietly. “Did you know that Alys asked me to? Back at Karhold – she suggested it. She wanted me to kill him for her, and I wanted to do it. But I decided to be really reasonable,” he spat the word, “and wait for your permission. This is a simple one, Snow; let me kill the sod and take the girl.”

No, Jon thought, not so simple at all. There was a nasty glint in the Weeper’s bulging eyes. Jon twitched. “And why,” he asked slowly, “why do you want Lady Karstark so badly?”

“I told you. She’s pretty.”

“I heard what happened to the last woman you stole, Weeper. The fisherfolk’s lass,” Jon said icily. “Tormund told me the tale.”

“And the last one was a girl of seventeen. You cut out her eyes.”

The Weeper’s smirk only grew. “Well, she had pretty eyes. I’ve still got them somewhere, I think.”

It took everything Jon had to keep the revulsion off his face. His hands clenched. The Weeper is not a good man. He’s never been good. Even among the free folk, the Weeper is feared for good reason. He’s an evil psychotic fiend who just so happens to be my strongest ally.

“Why?” Jon growled. “By the all the gods, why would you do that to a girl?”

He only scoffed. “What, can’t a man do whatever he likes to his own wife?”

And I argued for amnesty for all crimes north of the Wall. I defended all of the wildling’s crimes.

A castle was one thing, but Jon couldn’t give the Weeper a wife like Alys. The Lady Karstark didn’t know what she was asking for, calling on a man like Weeper to help her. That was a disaster waiting to happen. Jon’s nostrils flared. “You will not touch Alys Karstark,” Jon warned. There was no anger, his voice just turned cold. “You will not harm any woman. Any rapes – any missing eyes – and there will be no peace. No peace between us, no peace between the lords.” He shook his head, unblinking as he met the man’s gaze. “I will not tolerate it. Ever.”

The Weeper took half a step forward threateningly. “Boy,” he muttered. His voice turned low and his eyes bulged. “If I wanted Alys Karstark, I could have taken her. Maybe I still will.”

“You won’t.” Jon shook his head. There was a pause, and then he turned to walk away. “I’ve got to believe not even you are that mad.”

“I could have Fucking killed you in those woods!” the Weeper snapped. “I could have killed you at Hardhome.”

“Yes,” Jon muttered, not turning around. “You could have.”

“If it wasn’t for me, you wouldn’t even be here! You would never have made it this far!” the Weeper shouted. “Just remember that, boy.”

Believe me, I am. I am.

It took a long time for Jon’s temper to cool. He needed deep breaths, trying to shake the image of the Weeper cutting out a young girl’s eyes from her skull. I will raise commanders and officers from White Harbour amongst the free folk, he thought finally. Men who could be trusted to watch the Weeper carefully, and enforce order. But for now, I can’t risk reprimanding and alienating him. The Weeper scowled when he saw Jon later, but neither of them said anything. He knew the matter was shelved, but not forgotten.

It was snowing when the host set out again. They used mammoths to carry rations, and the crowds of wildlings with spears set out over the Lonely Hills. They spent a full day marching hard along the branch of the Weeping Water, and then the next morning they saw the high red walls and triangular merlons, like sharp teeth, appearing over the hills.

The Dreadfort was a strong and squat castle of light red bricks that appeared pink in the weak sun, with thick walls and high, looming towers.

A castle as old as Winterfell, Jon thought. A strong and formidable castle by any measure.

The Weeping Water joined streams by the castle, and water from the Lonely Hills gushed over the frozen banks. A large town, a mill and farmland scattered around the Dreadfort, but it all looked eerily abandoned. There was a sour tang in the cold air.

Jon saw Tormund’s men and the Manderly host already in position. The armies surrounded the castle from the east, north and west. Jon called Sonagon towards him again, but from the first sight he knew that there wouldn’t be a battle here; the Boltons had already retreated. The gates were sealed and the castle was fortified against a siege instead.

The moat around the Dreadfort was filled with spikes. The drawbridge was raised. There were men on the walls hidden under wooden huts, shield walls already in position. Jon caught the glint of scorpions scattered around the keep and walls, and faint shapes of what looked mangonels in the courtyard. All of the scorpions were angled upwards towards the sky. They prepared themselves to face off against a dragon.

Sonagon would still win, of course, but there was a more of a risk here. A small risk, perhaps, but not one that Jon was comfortable with.

The Weeper gave orders to prepare stakewalls and spikes for defences, while Jon headed into the town. It stunk of old smoke. The Boltons burnt the town and the homes rather than give us any advantage, he realised. Scorched earth warfare. Ewan Bole and a small escort met him with word from Robett Glover, that the commanders were waiting for him.

Jon met the Greatjon, Ser Marlon Manderly, Ser Wylis Manderly, Robett Glover and half a dozen others again in the ruins of a mill they took for a command centre. The walls and ceiling were charred black from the fires, but the structure seemed strong. Lord Karstark wasn’t present, but Jon knew that lord had no place in their war council. Or within earshot of it.

“My lord,” Jon nodded at the Greatjon. “How goes it? Were there any attacks?”

“A few stragglers, nothing of note.” Lord Umber shook his head. “My guess is that the battle at Weeping Water was their last attempt to try and drive us away. We’ve got the larger army and they know it.”

“How many men are holding the castle?”

“A small garrison, by the looks of it,” Ser Marlon replied. “The majority of their forces have already fled. If it was just us I would wager they’d be more likely to stand and fight, but…”
“But they’re scared of the dragon. They won’t risk devoting large hosts of men to battles where dragonfire would obliterate them.”

“The skinless man has no spine,” the Greatjon grumbled.

“Does that not make them more dangerous? Spineless creatures are often the most venomous,” Jon sighed. They won’t make it easy, the Boltons seemed insistent on taking whatever victory they could get. “Will the garrison surrender?

“I very much doubt it, Your Grace,” Ser Marlon admitted. “I am told it is being held by a man named Steelshanks, and manned by old, hard veterans. I sent an envoy to the drawbridge under a banner of truce, and they put four quarrels in the man. They will not negotiate, Roose Bolton wouldn’t have left them if they would.”

“And they’ve have had weeks to prepare for us,” Robett Glover noted. “I’ve rarely seen a castle holed up so tightly before. They burnt their own lands and hoarded whatever they couldn’t flee with inside that keep. No, there will be no negotiation here.”

“So as far as I see it, we have two options,” the Greatjon said. “We either siege the castle or storm it.”

“It’s a strong castle. A siege could take months.” Jon frowned.

“And a storm will take hours.” His eyes narrowed. “Can you dragon raze it?”

“Of course.”

“Then let’s bring the beast here,” the Greatjon ordered. “Turn the cursed place into ruin. Show them a storm.”

Jon lips tightened. The thought of what he had seen at the Twins had not left him eager to repeat the experience. But if they will not surrender then what choice is there?

Ser Wylis grimaced. “Your Grace,” he said hesitantly. The son of Lord Manderly was a large man, but he looked worn and haggard in platemail that didn’t quite seem to fit. “I would urge you to not.”

“Is there an alternative? We cannot leave the Bolton’s seat of power intact. The Dreadfort must be secured before the march on Winterfell.”

“We have enough forces that we can safely dedicate some towards a siege, Your Grace,” Ser Wylis argued. “Their garrison cannot threaten us. We secure the area and leave behind, say, two thousand strong to starve the castle and we continue our march.”

“And how long would that take?” the Greatjon protested.

“No, it will leave us too vulnerable,” Ewan Bole said, shaking his shaggy head. “Our men will be exposed.”

“It is better alternative than destroying a castle entirely,” Ser Wylis countered. “The Dreadfort is an ancient northern castle. Even despite its reputation, it’s an historical and influential seat. To raze it into ruins will not endear anyone to our cause. The Dreadfort is valuable enough to be worth a siege. Let us take it, rather than raze it.”

“It would cost us time,” Robett Glover said quietly. “But there is little risk to our own men.”
“Little risk?” another said incredulously, to the support of others. “Are you mad? What of storms? Or starvation? You want to leave men hungry and cold outside a castle like the Dreadfort.”

Jon hesitated uncertainly. The Greatjon folded his arms. “Bugger that. You want to devote two thousand men to a siege like this? We will need our forces against Winterfell.”

“We have a dragon. Surely our armies are already secure.”

“No, a siege is folly,” the Greatjon insisted. “Just bloody blast the damn thing.”

“All the while the Dreadfort stands, we risk Roose Bolton taking back his lands,” Ewan Bole nodded. “And it weakens us in the process.”

“He won’t take it back. How could he, when his forces are amassed at Winterfell?” Ser Wylis objected.

The Greatjon shook his head. “No, we should turn the castle into rubble. Demonstrate just what treatment Bolton scum deserve. Demonstrate power.”

Ser Wylis eyes flickered towards Jon. “Or you could demonstrate patience and restraint instead.” He lowered his head quickly. “Your Grace.”

Jon didn’t outwardly react, but he looked to the mood of his allies. The Greatjon wanted destruction, but most others seemed to agree. Ser Wylis was the only one who really seemed to object. I want to destroy it too, Jon admitted silently. But…

“There will be hostages inside the Dreadfort, Your Grace,” Ser Wylis said finally. His eyes kept flickering to Jon. “There will be prisoners from the sack of Winterfell. Bolton dissenters as well. Their dungeons are vast.”

Ah, that’s why the man is so hesitant. “How many hostages?”

“I cannot say. But all of the smallfolk from this town must be somewhere.”

“The Boltons are expecting us to destroy the castle,” Ser Marlon noted. “They only left that garrison behind to ensure that we will not benefit from their loss. They are trying to make our victory as bitter as possible; maybe they’ve filled the castle with smallfolk, but there will be no important hostage inside. They would left no one that might drastically help our campaign should we recover them.”

“Aye,” Ewan Bole agreed. “Lord Bolton is a ruthless man, to leave behind his own seat as a sacrificial goat.”

“So you would support razing it, then?” Jon demanded, turning to the knight.

Ser Marlon grimaced. “It would be a logical decision, Your Grace.”

Ser Wylis was the only one vocal about a siege, the rest strongly opposed the idea. Robett Glover looked like he may agree with Ser Wylis, but he didn’t speak out loudly in support either. The discussion continued for some time. Lord Umber snapped at the heir of White Harbour as if he were a fool, and Ser Marlon had to try and mediate between them.

“Could your dragon breathe at the castle with more care?” Ser Marlon suggested finally, looking for a more moderate path. “What if your dragon demolished the gate and walls only, such that men could then assault the keep?”
“Sonagon is a dragon, ser, not a siege engine. He has only one type of attack.” Jon shook his head. “No, I cannot restrain him, and I must attack with overpowering force or not at all. To do anything less puts Sonagon at risk from scorpions and iron bolts, as I’m sure Meraxes could testify.”

Jon remembered the battle at Hardhome, and how poorly that battle had turned because he tried to hold Sonagon back on the initial strike. No, a dragon's greatest advantage is overwhelming power without restraint. So why am I hesitating?

Ser Wylis was still arguing. White Harbour was a crucial ally and Jon had no wish to dismiss Ser Wylis’ opinion, but the whole room was stacked against him. Jon didn’t even need to ask to know that Tormund and the Weeper would both object to a siege too.

“Please, Your Grace,” the knight said, looking to Jon, “the prisoners inside don’t deserve to die. Even just as a statement, we could show the realm…”

He hesitated. Show the realm that I’m not a monster. Jon bit his lip. I really, really want to destroy that castle. The majority of my commanders agree that it is the tactical move, and they’re right.

Still, the image of the Twins, and all those frozen corpses flickered before his eyes. No, he’s right, Jon thought with a sigh. The smallfolk inside don’t deserve to die.

That made Jon’s decision. “I did not have choice but to raze the Twins,” he said finally. The room muttered. “But there is a choice here. We will siege the Dreadfort with men rather than using Sonagon.”

The Greatjon cursed. “That will take months, boy. Months.”

“We have the resources to spare,” Jon said firmly. “What sort of commitment will be required?”

“I would wager three thousand men would be a good number,” said Robett Glover. “The old Kings of Winter proved that it is a difficult castle to siege.”

“But it is the good option,” Ser Wylis insisted. Nobody else looked convinced. “When the starvation kicks in and they see our intent, men inside will trade whatever prisoners they have for leeway.”

“For three thousand men, it will have to be a mix of free folk and northern soldiers.”

“I… I see. And who will lead them?” Ser Marlon asked. “Your man the Weeper?”

“No,” Jon shook his head. The Weeper would be the worst possible commander to lead a siege. He briefly considered Tormund, but Jon wanted to keep Tormund by his side. A siege required patience and discipline, a free folk would not be ideal. “Ser Marlon,” Jon said finally, turning to the face the knight. “Will you accept the command?”

Ser Marlon blinked, off-guard. The commander of the guard at White Harbour had proven himself capable, level-headed; a good, patient man for a long task. “The— ah, yes, Your Grace. I will.” He bowed.

“The free folk will follow you, I will ensure it,” Jon promised. “And there will be reinforcements from Eastwatch led by a man named Lord of Bones shortly. The dragon will return regularly to support the siege. The rest of our forces must continue onwards, west to Winterfell.”
“I will take the castle for you, Your Grace.” Ser Marlon bowed. “For my house and my realm.”

The Greatjon spat on the floor in disgust. There were a few unhappy objections, but Jon’s tone left no room for argument. Jon looked at Ser Wylis and tried to imagine what it would be like to be trapped in a prison for all those months.

There was more talk: who else would have command, their forces that would march. They had much ground to cover and they agreed to split into three hosts: Ser Marlon’s force to stay at the Dreadfort, the Greatjon to lead men to secure Hornwood, while the Weeper would lead his force west towards Long Lake. Jon insisted on integrating the northmen alongside the free folk, so that Tormund would keep with Lord Umber while Robett Glover and Ser Wylis would move with the Weeper.

They would need to spread themselves and secure as much area to fight against the skirmish attacks, and Jon wanted the giants and the mammoths with him as they hit Winterfell. It was to be a pronged attack against Winterfell supported by reinforcements from the north and south.

“What of you, Your Grace?” Robett Glover asked. “Where will you be heading?”

Jon grimaced. Where was the most urgent priority? It seemed like he was needed absolutely everywhere recently. “I must fly back to White Harbour with all haste,” Jon decided finally. “Lord Manderly should be informed and I must see to our alliances.”

Above him, he heard the flapping of great wings as Sonagon circled above. There were faint cries from the walls of the Dreadfort, and arrows were feebly fired upwards.

The Bolton men inside should know how fortunate they are that they’re not being scorched in dragonfire right now, Jon thought fouly.

All around him, the camp churned. Ser Marlon was talking about setting up fortifications and catapults, but Jon only nodded. Across the plains, Sonagon dropped into the river, crashing through ice with enormous thud and clawing at the water. Sonagon is getting antsy, Jon thought with a grimace. He’s hungry and there has been poor hunting across these hills. I must leave quickly before Sonagon’s patience burns out.

Still, Jon lingered long enough to watch their siege take formation. He had to arrange supply trains and set commands, and twice he had to interfere between Tormund and the Weeper butting heads. It was getting late and his scouts warned of bad weather, but Sonagon wouldn’t tolerate being used much more and Jon had to leave.

There were only a few hours before dusk as Jon climbed onto Sonagon’s harness. For once, Jon travelled alone; both of his squires were too young to risk riding Sonagon, and he left them with his Dragonguard to represent him in his absence.

At the first red rays of dusk, the dragon burst into the sky. The ground shrunk beneath him, and suddenly the imposing Dreadfort turned so small. All around him, he could see the plumes of smoke scattered across the Lonely Hills as his army marched out to secure all the surrounding villages and towns. Jon could smell the tang of blood in the air.

Sonagon was restless. They made good time, and it wasn’t long before Jon saw the pale cliffs of White Harbour nestling in the distance, and the sea wind blowing over the Bite. There were ships in formation across the harbour, and overflow camps stretching out of the gates of the city. Despite the late hour, Jon heard a bell ringing as soon as the dragon was spotted.
Sonagon has come to the city two dozen times now, and every single time they insist on ringing the bell, he thought with a grimace. They would wake the whole city for his arrival. The dragon’s wings whooshed as he soared down towards the Seal Rock jutting out of the ocean.

There were torches already moving from the rock. The old ring fort was a crumbling, circular structure of ancient stones, but they had cleared the centre and set up tents for the garrison. There were crude wooden structures nestled between the ancient stones, and barricades and fortifications carved into the rock. The top of the Seal Rock stood thirty feet out of the water, and they built a rickety wooden staircase sprawling across its side down to a single dock by the waves.

It was a very good roosting spot for a large dragon, Jon thought. The Seal Rock was high, secure and defensible, but large and open. It was isolated enough that the dragon couldn’t cause disturbances in the city, and that nobody could disturb the dragon either. It even overlooked the harbour – an ideal position for Sonagon to sit protectively should they come under attack.

Occasionally, Jon wondered if the ancient ring fort from the First Men had been designed specifically to house a dragon in its heyday.

As soon as Sonagon dropped, he curled onto the exact same spot that he had left, right down to the grooves he had carved into the stone. Jon heard voices, and saw men pushing carts of meat towards the dragon. Very little warning and yet they are already prepared to meet Sonagon’s needs, Jon thought approvingly. My Dragonguard has become very efficient.

He saw men dump the contents of a cart onto a marked spot on the ground, and then quickly backed away. Sonagon sniffed, snorting cold mist hungrily.

“Get the second cart ready!” Jon heard a voice shout as he lowered himself. “Drop the food and get out of there – this dragon doesn’t like waiting for his meals!”

He saw the big man standing by the barracks. Hatch wasn’t wearing armour, but he still wore his cloak. Jon saw Urwen, Black Maris, Mo and Harle all rushing and giving orders. His Dragonguard didn’t have any uniform, but they all wore something white to signify their rank: such as a white cloak or white stones stitched into the shape of dragon on their hauberk.

More and more wildlings from the Wall were arriving in White Harbour by ship. Galleons would ship food supplies to Eastwatch and return carrying refugees. Jon had sent Sam and Grenn back to Castle Black, while the Dragonguard that he left behind had arrived in White Harbour recently.

“Hatch,” Jon called. “How goes it?”

“Aye,” Hatch grumbled. “The city is in a right state, but we’re keeping this rock for you.”

“Not a luxurious place,” Jon admitted, looking around the gloomy torches and bleak, wind-beaten stones.

“Hells, I’ve lived in worse,” he said with a snort. “And we’re Dragonguard, right? Glorified nannies to a giant monster.”

Jon smiled wearily. “We should prepare carts three and four,” an eager voice called, rushing up to Hatch. “Two of the last five times, the dragon has eaten four carts after long trips. We still have that cut garron that will likely turn rotten shortly, and then there’ll be two carts of fish in reserve to break the dragon’s fast on the morn, next delivery after that.”

“Aye, get to it then,” Hatch ordered, and the young man nodded quickly.
“Harlow,” Jon greeted.

Harlow grinned as he saw Jon, and then flustered and bowed quickly. He had a white stone on his chest. “Your Grace.”

“At ease,” Jon said with a wry grin. “You have good response time to Sonagon.”

“The meals were prepared in advance, Your Grace,” Harlow explained quickly. “Last time the dragon arrived very hungry and… well, the delay was not well-received. Since then I try to keep five carts loaded and ready to be served at any hour.”

“It is appreciated.” Behind him, Sonagon gouged into his meal with sharp black teeth, his hard tongue scraping the rock. They didn’t bother unpacking the food, instead Sonagon just ate the sacks as well. Even a huge sack was a tiny morsel to Sonagon’s size – it was little wonder that whole carts were needed.

“It is my honour, Your Grace.” Harlow bowed again. Now how can I convince him not to keep doing that? Jon mused. The young man never even met his eyes – he always looked to the floor in Jon’s presence.

Hatch was bellowing orders for the men to gather to remove Sonagon’s harness. Jon notice there was something in Harlow’s hands. He was fidgeting, glancing back to where Sonagon had already finished his meal. “What is that?”

“Um, just a parchment, Your Grace,” Harlow admitted sheepishly, handing the rough animal-skin parchment to Jon. “I have been keeping a tally of how frequently your dragon eats and drinks, Your Grace, and which meals he seems to like more. To plan.”

The parchment was rough with flint scribbles and markings. Harlow couldn’t write, but he used crude sketches and tallies to keep notes in messy columns. It must make sense to him. Jon looked at it curiously, while the man seemed abashed.

“The dragon eats five parts of stone and rock for every one part of meat,” Harlow explained, eyes twinkling. “And four parts grain and veg to fill out the size of the meals. And a larger serving of meat after the dragon has been flying for a long time. It’s usually fish, sometimes livestock too. There are seven butchers and fishmongers in the city that have been hired to prepare solely for the dragon.”

Slowly, Jon started to make sense of the scribbles. There were columns for servings and rows for days. Gods, how much does my dragon eat? It never failed to impress him how gluttonous Sonagon could be. “And the stone?”

“Mostly the white stone from the cliffs. Chalk, I think. The dragons seems to prefer soft rock to bedrock, usually. It really likes these yellow rocks, I guess they must be tasty for a dragon? Sometimes the dragon likes chewing on iron or steel as well, but I’m not sure how often…” he grimaced. Jon could see him trying to stop himself from rambling. “Well, they’ve brought across barrels of old rusted swords and such as well, just in case the dragon is peckish.”

“This… This is good,” Jon said after a pause. “Talk to a maester. Have him transcribe your logs into a proper form. And then have the maester send letters to Eastwatch, Castle Black and any other place Sonagon is likely to visit. Make sure they reserve at least a good day’s worth of supplies for Sonagon at all times.”

Harlow blinked. “Your Grace?”
“His diet is important. It’s what keeps him placated. We need to know how to best feed him.”

Perhaps if I fed him properly, would there be forty-three people at Mole’s Town still alive? Jon wondered. I must wear every mistake I make on my chest, and resolve to never make any of them ever again. “This is good work, Harlow.”

“I… Thank you, Your Grace.” He bowed again. Jon had to stop himself smirking lest the man think he was mocking him. “It is my honour, Your Grace. I would likely be dead in the wilderness if not for you. However I can help.”

“Good service must be rewarded. Yours has not gone unnoticed,” he said with a smile. I shall have think of a rank or boon to grant.

Harlow rushed off to prepare Sonagon’s meals. “Oh aye, he’s good for feeding and cleaning the dragon, that one,” Hatch agreed, stepping back to Jon and motioning at Harlow. “Bloody useless with a sword, but eager enough.”

“Well, you said it yourself that the Dragonguard are glorified nannies,” he mused. “A squireship would be good for him, I think. Perhaps Furs would take him on.”

There were men rushing around Jon, all looking between him and the dragon. The Seal Rock was garrisoned by fifty men, but Jon’s Dragonguard had command. When Jon had left, it had been a rough military outpost, but it had quickly been established and better fortified. New wooden outhouses had been built between the great slab of rocks to the house men, supplies and arms, and there were at least two dozen scorpions overlooking the rocks pointing down to the water. There were bowmen perches and gates built around the fort. Good, proper defences to guard Sonagon while he roosted and slept. Jon had placed Furs in command before he left, and it looked like he had done a good job.

“Where is Furs?” Jon asked, glancing around.

“Lord Manderly requested him in the city,” Hatch replied. “I think there was talk of recruiting stonemasons to rebuild the Seal Rock entirely.”

“Good. The Targaryens built the Dragonpit for a reason. I will fully support as much security built around Sonagon as possible.”

“We’re on a raised outpost in the middle of sea with a fleet of ships stationed around us,” Urwen noted. “How much more defence could there be?”

“That depends on whether or not we can trust the fleet,” Hatch snorted. Jon sent him a hard glare to mind his tongue, and the large man shifted.

“Your Grace,” a Manderly man said, bowing his head as he approached. He was dressed like a sailor. “I have a small boat ready by the port. We can escort you into the city itself.”

Jon shook his head. “No. It is late and I am quite tired.” And doubtless Lord Wyman will insist on seeing me straight away. “I will rest here for tonight and travel across in the morning.”

The man’s face paled. “Your Grace, we… Tis a barren outpost here, we have little hospitality to offer you.”

Jon could have laughed. “I think I shall survive sleeping rough, ser.” And I shall be grateful for it, compared to that hideous suffocatingly soft bed in the castle. “A tent and a blanket will serve just fine.”
As it happened, the commander of the garrison insisted on clearing out a storeroom for Jon’s sleeping quarters. The building was a cramped and narrow outhouse built at the edge of the rock, previously used to keep their lumber and arrows out of the damp and salt air. It stank of dust, and there were bugs skittering in the corners. Honestly, Jon would have preferred to sleep out in the open sky, but he didn’t care enough to make it an issue.

He could hear the waves gushing and crashing against the rocks, rocking him to sleep. There were bells from the nearby ships. Often you could hear the seals shuffling and barking as they gathered on the rocks below as well, but Jon guessed that Sonagon had quickly scared those away.

As he slept, he saw the world through a direwolf’s eyes, pacing and scratching at a narrow barge. Ghost was on a ship too; confined in a narrow hull and rocking with the waves. He could smell stone, smoke and earthy scents drifting on the sea wind.

Dawn came too soon. Jon was already up with first light, and he washed his face in cold salt water to wake himself up. Early morning, and a large ship came to ferry him across into the city. Ser Alek met him on the rickety, tiny port built onto the Seal Rock, and he left Sonagon to Hatch’s care, bringing Urwen and Harle with him into the city.

There was a crowd waiting for him on the Inner Harbour of the city, but there were no riots at least. It was quiet. Jon glimpsed free folk wearing white stones lingering in the crowd. True to his word, Lord Wyman had been ferrying wildlings to White Harbour. The free folk huddled together in small groups, and the cityfolk kept their distance. All wanted to see Jon, but there were different moods mixed in the crowd.

“How fares the city?” Jon asked Ser Alek.

“White Harbour is prepared for war, Your Grace.”

“That is not what I asked, ser.”

“It is strained,” the knight admitted. “Winter looms closer than ever, rationing has been introduced, and our stores are already suffering. The refugees are already overflowing the city, and there have been disturbances between the wild– the free folk and cityfolk.”

“I see,” Jon said, keeping his voice firm.

“But we are prepared for war,” Ser Alek insisted. “Our forces have been mustering; nearly every house on this side of the White Knife is with us. More and more noble houses are joining the coalition.”

“Yes,” Jon mused. “Tell me, are they joining because they support us, or because they are too scared of the dragon and the wildlings to do otherwise?”

A brief grimace flickered across the young knight’s face. “Does it matter? They are still joining.”

Jon smiled hollowly. “Do not act the fool, ser. You’re not very good it,” he said with a sigh. “It matters a great deal.”

The whole atmosphere of the city seemed so different from what it had been a few weeks ago. He saw grey camps and grimy tents set up in the middle of the white streets. The trip up to the New Castle was short and tense.

Jon met Furs at the top of the Castle Stair. He wore armour fit for a knight, but he kept his bone spear. Furs had a lanky body shape, though he still strong. Strangely, Furs bowed low as Jon approached. “King,” he greeted. “How was that bow? These southerners have been teaching me to bow properly.”

He smiled softly. “Very well. How goes it, Furs?”

“Oh aye, we’ve been minding the keep sure enough. How is the real war going?”

“Making progress. It’s not over yet.”

There were nobles and guards milling around him. Jon struggled to remember all the names and faces. “I wish you told us to expect you,” Furs noted, “this place always goes in a right panic whenever you just fly in.”

“I was I knew myself. I come back only when I have a chance,” Jon muttered. “Have the free folk been settling in?”

“Oh aye. I don’t think your southerners know how to handle so many free folk filling up their fancy castle. You know these guys use four knives and forks during meals?”

Jon smiled, but before he could reply he recognised a familiar face. “Galbart,” Jon called to the Master of Deepwood Motte. “It is good to see you.”

“Robett is quite fine. Any news of the hostages from Deepwood Motte?”

“None.” There was a grim look in his eyes. “Little news at all of my family.”

Too many families have been split in this war. “We will recover them, Lord Glover,” Jon promised. “The Dreadfort may not have fallen, but it is lost. When we push against Winterfell, the Boltons will sell their hostages to save themselves.”

“As you say, Your Grace. I linger here to aid with White Harbour’s defence, though we will join the force against Winterfell’s walls.”

He turned to walk down the hallway. Galbart walked with him. “Although, I’m glad to speak with you,” Jon said. “I was intending on offering Ewan Bole, one of your house’s sworn swords, a place in my Dragonguard.”

Galbert looked surprised. “Ewan? Aye, I know the man. Loyal and steadfast, but he hails from a minor and unremarkable house.”

“I care more for the quality of men than the name they bear, my lord. During the march Ewan Bole proved himself more than capable. I am looking to fill the ranks of the Dragonguard,” he explained. “I was also planning on offering Ser Alek the same.”

“Ser Alek is a good knight. The son of a landed knight in White Harbour. He’s young, but brave. He was the first to volunteer to ride after your dragon on the plains.” Galbart frowned, looking confused. “But your Dragonguard will have more influence if you were to name sons of old and great houses. Few hightborn will respect such a… mixed grouping.”

Jon shook his head. “The Dragonguard needs little status or ceremony, my lord. I care for skill, loyalty and bravery in its ranks.”
“Then you should still recruit from good houses. You cannot expect common blood to breed noble qualities,” Galbart Glover said as if it was obvious. “Noble families are reliable, their heritage breeds loyalty – they can be trusted. The commonfolk have no past, they must be treat with caution.”

“I’d disagree. I find that hightborn most certainly have no monopoly on any of those traits,” said Jon. There were too many who constantly misunderstood what his Dragonguard was. “I will happily recruit men from low birth too. Months ago, I found a hunter in the woods of no standing whatsoever, but Harlow has continually impressed me with his dedication and resourcefulness. I would more than happily invite many of the same – I have no wish to reward good service anything less than the appreciation it deserves.”

Galbart frowned. He didn’t understand, Jon thought. Many lords wouldn’t. Perhaps it was a bastard’s trait. “Your Grace, if you want this rank of Dragonguard to be respected, then you must fill it with men who can be respected. Not commoners.”

“Not so,” argued Jon. “In the Night’s Watch even those of low birth could rise to high positions and influence. All the way up to Lord Commander in many cases. The sworn brothers appreciated their duty and the skill of those who uphold it more than any name. They appreciate stewards and caretakers more than just fighters. I mean to follow suit.”

“So you would fill your guard with farmers and stable boys?” Galbart asked, baffled.

Jon smiled coolly. “Should they earn it, then yes, happily, my lord.”

Glorified dragon nannies, as Hatch phrased it, Jon mused. Still, Jon was considering splitting his Dragonguard into two ranks, perhaps dragon guardians and dragon keepers? Jon couldn’t expect the stewards and caretakers to fight, and it was a waste of the fighters to have them constantly looking after Sonagon. Perhaps the keepers under Furs could be responsible for Sonagon’s care and wellbeing, while the guardians led by Hatch would be the fighting unit responsible for defence? It was something to think about – his Dragonguard were already taking on far more duties and responsibility than he had originally conceived. All of them are good men and women well-motivated to prove themselves.

He excused himself from Galbart, and Jon was met at the stairs by Leona Manderly. The plump woman curtsied towards Jon. He motioned for his guards to stay back. “Your Grace,” she greeted. Lady Leona’s eyes looked red like she had been crying. “Lord Manderly would see you at the earliest convenience.”

“I thought he would. Please, I will see the lord now.”

Jon knew the way and Lord Manderly rarely left his quarters, but Lady Leana escorted him nevertheless. Jon noticed how stiff and brash her posture was towards him, even despite the forced courtesies. “Your husband rides with the army, my lady,” Jon said, lowering his voice. “I spoke with Ser Wylis only last night.”

“That is good to hear,” Lady Leona replied curtly. “And yet once more my daughters and I must wait for him to come home again.”

There was a quiet hurt in her voice that caused Jon to wince. “There is little danger to him,” he said lamely, trying to reassure. “We have won every battle we’ve fought, my lady.”

“So did the Young Wolf, Your Grace.”
They reached the corridor towards the lord’s solar. Without another word, Lady Leona curtsied and walked briskly away. Jon stopped to stare after her, before shaking himself off and walking towards the solar.

As he approached, he heard voices from the room. They sounded polite but strained. The voices were too low for him to make them out, though Jon caught a few snatchets of words: “… rightful and just liege, m’lord… bring the realm to ruin…”

There was something that sounded like a short, sharp dismissal. The door opened, and Jon saw a short, greying and stout man, looking unnerved. Lord Davos Seaworth’s eyes widened in shock and horror as he saw Jon standing there. There was a pained pause, and then Lord Seaworth bowed and quickly walked away. Jon watched him go, before stepping inside the solar.

The fat lord stood to meet Jon as he entered, wheezing for breath slightly. “Your Grace,” Lord Wyman said. The circles around his eyes seemed darker. “I have just received the raven from our forces at the Dreadfort. You should have come straight to me last night.”

“Sleep is underrated attribute for kings, it seems,” Jon said dryly, as he took a seat opposite the desk. The chairs were oak with velvet cushions.

The lord laughed humourlessly. A steward brought wine and pastries into the room. “Yes, too many waking hours do creep up on you. And you have a dragon. Has there ever been a commander who can move around the realm half as fast as you do? Where most men must rely on the use of ravens, you could arrive just as fast in person.”

“Aye, it’s useful, my lord, but also taxing.”

“Indeed.” Lord Wyman’s voice softened. “And how fares my son?”

“Ser Wylis is a strong man and a capable commander,” Jon reassured. “He led the rear flank competently, and is a valuable voice at the war table. Ser Marlon will command the siege of the Dreadfort, and Ser Wylis is secure in a force many thousand strong.”

“That is good. His captivity was a long and arduous thing, I admit I was concerned about his health and his recovery. And his wife, and daughters, have dearly missed him so,” Lord Wyman sighed. “It was a painful and terrible thing, Your Grace, to watch my son leave for war once more. I am unable to follow him; my body has become my prison. I know that Wylis must go, and yet…”

There was a quiver in his voice. Lord Wyman usually sounded so strong and booming. For a second, Jon was left unsure what to say. “Your son is at the centre of a large army,” he said finally. “He is secure, and wily enough not to put himself at risk. We have soundly won every battle we have faced.”

“We both know how quickly wars can turn, do we not? Make no mistake; Roose Bolton has been allowing himself to lose ground. We have the larger armies, yes, but he is not surrendering and he is not fighting back in force. There have been no true battles; only Boltons harrying us and slowing us down. He will be preparing his own campaign too, though what exactly he intends I cannot say.”

Lord Wyman shook his head, multiple chins wobbling. “No, this is no time to become complacent. I shall not rest easily until both Roose Bolton and his bastard have their heads on spikes above Winterfell.”

Yes, Jon agreed. For all the difficulties, their progress so far had been unnervingly unchallenged. “I had hoped to face Ramsay Bolton at the Dreadfort,” Jon admitted. “But there was no sign of him.”
“I have had no word either,” said Lord Wyman. “Concerning Roose Bolton, at least, I can be reasonably confident he is at Winterfell, but Ramsay has seemingly disappeared.”

Along with my brother. Damn Ramsay Snow. First my sister, and then Bran? The Bastard of Bolton must be brought to justice. The mood over the desk turned grim.

“What of the search for your brothers, Bran or Rickon?”

“There has been no news.”

“Well, it is still early days.”

“And yet they must be recovered to unite the realm.”

“We have other options, it is still…” His voice paused, and then Lord Wyman shook his head again. “No, enough of this. Obsessing over ghosts and what ifs becomes pointless. I cannot lead any battles, so I will trust the command of our armies to you, Your Grace. In return, I hope you can trust me to manage affairs of state and politics. You lead from the battlefield, I from the city.”

“Happily, my lord.”

“With the Dreadfort under siege, House Bolton’s lands are effectively ours. That means that Houses Umber, Karstark, and, very soon, Hornwood will be under our control. Most of the east coast, while House Bolton gathers still holds power and allies in the west.” He paused. “Can we expect more forces from the Wall mustering for us?”

“Some. The Lord of Bones and Sigorn of Thenn will both be readying to assist,” Jon hesitated. “Though I dare not reduce the defence on the Wall much more. There are other threats to consider than just Boltons.”

Lord Wyman straightened slightly. “You mean your white walker?”

“Aye. Malvern we call it. Just the one, but it has proven itself too strong and too cunning to be tracked. I can’t commit entirely to this campaign so long as Malvern is a threat to the Night’s Watch castles.”

He looked uncertain. “Just for one of these fiends?”

“Malvern has proven itself capable of fighting and defeating a hundred men singlehandedly, my lord. Its power is not to be underestimated. It has been haunting holdfasts and farms in the Gift, killing any party small enough to be taken easily and hiding otherwise. Perhaps I am lucky that Malvern was left so injured in its crossing through the Wall, because I fear that it is capable of doing much more.” Jon grimaced with the thought. How many had Malvern killed already? At least hundreds, but they hadn’t found most of the bodies. “Though the good news is that so long as my hunting parties are hounding it and my castles are fortified, the walker’s options are limited too. It still cannot face an army. I need only keep on the pressure, and sooner or later an obsidian arrow will find its mark.” I hope.

“And you sound concerned.”

“I am very concerned. But there is naught I can do about it,” Jon confessed, his gaze twitching. “Malvern is an extremely dangerous creature and one that I don’t know the location of. I prefer my enemies where I can see them, my lord.” And this war is proving a poor one on that front.

“Yes,” Lord Wyman said with a sigh. “If there is anything I can provide—”
“Obsidian, my lord. Dragonglass. Do you have a means of purchasing obsidian? We require large quantities.”

“I cannot say that I do. Obsidian is usually used in trinkets, not typically needed in bulk. I will make inquiries,” he promised. “I must speak with merchants in the city, and find captains willing to scour the free markets on our behalf.”

“Are there any?”

“Not many,” Lord Wyman replied, reluctantly. “Most independent merchants and captains have shunned White Harbour’s docks ever since the dragon appeared in the harbour.

“Of course they have.” Why couldn’t anything just be simple?

“It is not yet dire, but our trade is being stifled.”

“Can I assist?”

“Not with force. A softer hand is required to secure trade, I think.”

He nodded, and conceded the task to Lord Wyman. I trust Mance to guard the Wall, and the Weeper to lead his raiders. I must trust Lord Wyman to his duty too. Still, Jon paused, and then frowned. “Mind, what was Lord Seaworth speaking to you about before?”

“You, of course,” replied Lord Wyman. “The Onion Lord tries to convince me to support Stannis Baratheon instead.”

“Ah. Lord Davos is a loyal man.”

“His loyalty cannot be faulted.” Lord Wyman nodded. “Neither can his earnestness. Both are traits that I admire, except it is his sense that I question.”

“What arguments does he make?”

“The same ones that I hear several times a day. He says that our alliance is doomed for collapse. That the wildlings will not recognise authority, or accept laws, be controlled. He says that this war will schism and ruin the north in the worst possible way. He urges me to return to the fold of the Seven Kingdoms. Lord Seaworth then supports and defends Stannis Baratheon and his actions, but that is the point where his bias becomes apparent.” The lord paused. “Still, it is rare to see a man who chooses to act from loyalty rather than fear.”

Lord Wyman sounded mildly impressed. Perhaps Lord Davos made more of an impression than he realised, Jon wondered. “Lord Davos is a good man,” Jon said finally. “I have no wish to let him suffer unduly. I took him as a hostage, but there is naught needed from him and no family to ransom. His continued captivity seems pointless, perhaps he should just be released and allowed to return home.”

“Perhaps. Though Lord Seaworth is still held in high regard by Stannis Baratheon. If Stannis’ campaign musters support and gains strength once more, Lord Seaworth could still be a valuable piece.”

“How likely is that to happen?”

“Unlikely,” he admitted. “But who knows? Stannis has been doing remarkably well in the battles he’s been leading. In any case, to release Lord Seaworth now would be folly: there are many wars and outlaws about, the crownlands are in turmoil, Dragonstone is under blockade and he has no means of travelling safely. He would likely not make it home to his wife. No, the Onion Lord is being treated fairly in New Castle; he can remain here until a better solution appears.”

“Very well,” Jon conceded reluctantly. Lord Davos was a good and loyal man, though Jon knew that he would never be loyal to him.

Lord Wyman picked up a pastry from the platter. “Another of your associates has reached out to me from across the Narrow Sea. One Salladhor Saan of Lys.”

Ah, now he was the opposite of Davos. An untrustworthy man that was their ally. “A pirate,” Jon said with distaste. “A pirate lord, he calls himself.”

“I am aware. But the man is ambitious and eager enough to ally himself with us. The man has been quite capable too, and well-motivated to earn influence to rebuild his former fleet and wealth. I received a letter; Salladhor is in Braavos, and he approached the Iron Bank on our behalf.”

“A pirate dealing with the Iron Bank?”

“Oh, the Iron Bank never turns away potential customers. They are the greatest pirates of them all, in many ways,” Lord Wyman said with a scoff. “But yes, Salladhor Saan was largely dismissed in Braavos, until you flew south, then the word spread and there could be no doubt that we truly have a dragon. In the wake of that news, I imagine the pirate was looked upon in a different light by the Braavosi.”

“I allowed Salladhor Saan to sail free on the promise that he would broker trade and supply for me,” Jon said, slightly sourly. “Has he?”

“I believe so. It is a planting that might provide fruit. I cannot understate how useful the Iron Bank’s support would be, if we are able to secure it. I have hope; the news of a dragon causes stirs, and perhaps a savvy banker would rather be on the right side of that wager.”

“But you don’t sound convinced.”

“From what your pirate writes, there is a conflict of interests,” he explained. “The Iron Bank has already entered a contract with Aegon Targaryen, financing him to claim the Iron Throne. It was to be expected; when the Lannisters burnt that bridge, the Iron Bank sought other ways to reclaim their debt.”

“Ah. And I am in conflict with this Aegon.” As indirect as it is. “As indirect as it is. “The Iron Bank can’t support me without jeopardising their interests in their chosen champion?”

“Just so. A difficult position for them. However, the Iron Bank does not like being on the losing side. The deal they made with Aegon was agreed upon before your presence was widely known, and suddenly the young Targaryen does not seem such a promising wager, since there is a dragon stacked against him. A new loan could perhaps be negotiated.”

“For how much gold?”

“Enough gold to establish a new kingdom in earnest,” Lord Wyman said with a nod. “The price will be steep, but such a loan is not to be dismissed. It could pay for food all winter, to repair the damage after so much strife.”

Jon leaned forward in his seat. “And what must I do?”
“For now? Nothing. I only wished to alert you to the possibility. After Winterfell is secure, taking your dragon to Braavos may be a useful thing. I cannot afford to bankroll this campaign on my own indefinitely.”

The conversation continued for some time. The lord quizzed him on every step of the campaign. Lord Wyman drunk wine, but Jon didn’t. The lord insisted on the servants bringing more platter of pastries or dishes of stew for such meetings, and Jon was beginning to realise why Lord Wyman was so fat. As the talk turned to alliances, Lord Wyman called for two scribes and his castellan.

“Where is your steward, King Snow?” the lord asked. “The Tarly boy.”

Jon shook his head. “Sam is not my steward, he has been appointed the Lord Steward of the Night’s Watch. He left to return to Castle Black along with Grenn.” Jon paused, hesitating. Sam had a duty of his own to see to – to search for more information on the white walkers. Sam had left from Eastwatch escorting Mance’s wife and babe to the Wall. “I have been debating whether to send Sam to Oldtown, in truth,” he added. “The Citadel may be the greatest source of knowledge in the world, and I need someone to scour it for information for us.”

“I would strongly advise against it,” Lord Wyman said. “Not while the ironborn still reave, it is too perilous a journey.”

Jon agreed. Too many duties as king, too little time. Ser Wylan brought a stack of letters that the lord insisted on going through with Jon. It was already noon. Jon reluctantly resigned himself and took a glass of wine.

There were five more acceptances of the betrothals from northern lords that Jon had to sign off. There were petty lords that needed promises of safety and protection from Jon before they agreed to the coalition, and a dozen other matters that needed attention.

Lady Maege wrote from the Flint Holdfast in the northern mountains. The northern mountain clans had been reluctant to join with wildlings, but they had strong relationships and respect towards Houses Mormont, Umber and Glover. The letter said that Lady Maege was having success where Jon did not in persuading the mountain clans to declare alongside them. They were eager to fight for Ned’s girl, even if it was alongside wildlings too.

There will be more promises made before the day is done, Jon thought with a grim sigh. But there is nothing for it; the mountains clans are another three thousand strong that are sorely needed.

As he added up the numbers, the force of their combined, deployable fighting men started to reach over twenty thousand. And rising.

The discussion turned towards Hornwood lands. Even though Ramsay Bolton claimed to be the Lord of the Hornwood, whatever hold he had on the lands disappeared quickly. The minor lords previously under House Hornwood were all too quick to declare against House Bolton.

“Your Grace, Lady Hornwood was my cousin, and fine woman,” Lord Wyman said, pushing the paper to one side. “I offered myself as a suitor to Lady Hornwood once. House Manderly has close ties to the area, and it is a tragedy that their house has gone extinct in this war. I suggest that Hornwood lands and titles be granted to House Manderly, to secure their loyalty.”

Jon paused, frowning. “You would take the Hornwood for yourself?”

“I have a strong claim to it. A cadet branch of House Manderly could be formed,” he explained. “And who has staked more on this cause than I? It seems a fair reward.”
Except the Hornwood is an extremely large, rich and valuable area. It would leave House Manderly as undoubtedly the largest and most powerful house in the north. To take another great house’s holdings in their entirety is a bold demand.

“I cannot make such a decision here,” Jon said eventually. It may upset too many others. I cannot afford any schisms right now. “It is a matter to be decided by a rightful liege, once Winterfell is secure.”

“Very well. Although I do intend to push my claim. I will look after the future of my house, Your Grace.”

“It seems too early to consider such while the war has yet to be won, my lord.”

“You can be sure that others are doing the same,” Lord Wyman insisted. “The easiest way to win this war is to ensure that it is in the best interests of all parties that the war is won. The Greatjon will want security for his lands, Lord Glover will want security for his family. And I have high hopes that Lady Maege will marry her daughters to the strongest of your free folk leaders, such that an alliance could be made and Bear Island could start providing ships to evacuate the Frozen Shore. More will follow suit. Even Lord Karstark decided to support us, when it was made clear that was the only way he could keep his lands.”

Jon paused. The thought of the Weeper’s words came back to him. “Lord Karstark,” he said slowly. “You hold his wife, do you not?”

“Alys Karstark is being transported to White Harbour. She will be kept safe in my castle.”

“I hear that Cregan Karstark only claims lordship through his marriage to Alys Karstark – was the marriage legal?”

Lord Wyman paused. “Perhaps,” he admitted. “Lady Alys was the last of the main branch of the house, and with her father’s death her uncle Arnolf became custodian. He was within his rights to marry her to her cousin Cregan. Legally married? Justifiably so. Happily married? Most certainly not.”

“My… my commander, the Weeper. He said that Alys asked him to kill Lord Cregan for her.”

“Hmm. Unfortunately, that does not surprise me. She is a girl of sixteen and Cregan is, from what I hear, a hard and brash man of fifty. She is now his third wife, he has buried two previously. It was hardly a desirable marriage for her.”

How bad could any marriage be if she would prefer the Weeper over Cregan? Jon thought foully. The Weeper is the most psychotic man I know.

Lord Wyman looked at him, measuring his expression. “The marriage could, perhaps, be annulled,” the lord said carefully. “If there was an alternative.”

Jon grimaced. “And how divisive would that be?”

“Potentially problematic. But Karstark only nominally supports us as is; they still have forces from Arnolf Karstark alongside Boltons,” Lord Wyman mused. “And this ‘Weeper’ of yours is a strong candidate for the same marriage betrothals we are offering others. With Lady Alys’ agreement in the matter, we could–”

Jon shook his head. “No, Alys does not know what she is asking from the Weeper. I trust the Weeper to lead my armies, but I’ve never deluded myself concerning what sort of man he is. He is liable to cut her eyes out himself if she even looks at him the wrong way. No, when Lady Alys arrives in White Harbour, we must keep her well out of sight from the Weeper.” I do not trust him not to become obsessed.

“As you say, your Grace. And what of Lord Cregan?”

His jaw clenched. There was a moment of painful indecision. “Lord Cregan Karstark is a vicious and unlikeable man,” Jon said finally. “But I cannot dispose him of his lordship. He has committed no crimes that would justify me so.”

Lord Wyman frowned. “House Karstark has many crimes to their name, Your Grace.”

“Oh yes. His father is a traitor who sided with the Boltons,” Jon said foully. “Even his cousin was a child-murderer who helped doom Robb Stark’s cause. But that does not matter because I can’t punish any man for acts of other members of his family. Maybe killing Cregan Karstark would be the right action, but it wouldn’t be lawful. The law must work both ways.”

“There is one offence to Cregan Karstark’s name. He did fight against you,” Lord Wyman noted. “He led his forces to attack your wildlings.”

“And in that he was well-justified to defend his lands.” Jon shook his head. “And the Umber lords did the same. If I punished House Karstark for fighting wildlings, I would have to do the same against others.”

“That would be unwise,” Lord Wyman said with a grimace.

“Aye. And I cannot make up laws to kill a man just because of a grudge.” Jon shook his head. Damn being king. “For now, Cregan has little option but to support us. He is being kept under close supervision.” It was a bitter thought. Legalities or no, Cregan Karstark was an abusive brute who forced Alys to marry him. “Perhaps we should do something concerning his marriage later, but for now let us not risk causing problems.”

“Very well,” Lord Wyman said, though he didn’t sound in agreement. “Although, it occurs to me, that there is another marriage that deserves consideration.”

“Whose?”

“Yours, Your Grace.”

There was no immediate reaction. Jon felt his hands stiffen. Lord Wyman sucked his lips. “I have considered it. You do not have lands, house or rank in the north, Your Grace, and it would be beneficial for your status and our cause if you did. I offer you my granddaughter’s hand in marriage, and an alliance between us stronger than steel.”

“Your granddaughter.” There was no reaction or emotion. Jon kept himself like stone. Do not react until you have figured out how.

“My son’s eldest, Wynafryd. She is of an age with you, Your Grace, and a more fair, brave and capable girl you could not hope to find. Have you given any thought of what should happen to you and your dragon after this war?”

“The end of this war will be the start of the next, my lord.”

“Preparations must still be made,” he insisted. “Your dragon is the greatest advantage the north has, it should not stay in Winterfell. Winterfell would struggle to house Sonagon, and struggle further to feed it. Winterfell may be the heart of the north, but I see little advantage of keeping a beast like that close to our chests.” The lord placed his goblet on the desk of papers. “However, when the north becomes an independent kingdom, it seems only fitting that White Harbour should be the capital city. A dragon would be a great boon in White Harbour, and we have the resources to support it.”

Jon blinked, struggling to understand. “You… you want me to marry into House Manderly?”

“I considered it, but no. It would not send a good message. Far better to create a new house; a house of northern dragonlords,” he explained. “Take a new banner – a white dragon, perhaps. This is my proposal; I will grant you lordship of the Wolf’s Den in the city. It’s an ancient castle with a long history of serving House Stark. It was once named to House Manderly, but truthfully it has been neglected ever since the construction of New Castle. Right now it is used only as a prison, currently under the custodianship of an old and had knight who once served me well.

“I will provide the funds for the Wolf’s Den to be renovated to its former glory,” Lord Manderly offered. “Likewise, your dragon appears quite comfortable upon the Seal Rock, so I shall name you the lord of that too – to turn the Seal Rock into our version of the Dragonpit and to provide defence of the harbour and kingdom. And if you were to marry my granddaughter, then that would be the beginning of an alliance that could see the north in very good stead indeed.”

“And Sonagon will reside in your city.”

“What other city has the trade to provide for it?” he challenged. “You will become a great and influential lord in White Harbour. I hope that this alliance will prove greatly beneficial to us both.”

But especially to you. White Harbour would benefit immensely. The kingdom of the north would be created by the dragon, and the dragon would be at the centre of it. “And your granddaughter?”

“Wynafryd. She is precious to me. Both my granddaughters are. My youngest Wylla is willful and strong, while Wynafryd has always been determined, brave and dedicated. I do not offer her hand in marriage lightly, Your Grace.”

Marriage. Jon remembered seeing the granddaughters, vaguely. Wynafryd had looked a few years older than him; she had been holding the hand of her little sister tightly. The youngest girl had dyed green hair, while Wynafryd was tall and full-bodied, with brown hair tied in a long braid. Not the most beautiful woman, but fair and comely.

Politics relies on marriages. I always knew it would be on the table, even for me, but…

The thought of Val’s golden hair flashed before his eyes.

Jon shook his head. “I cannot make any such commitments now, my lord.”

“I do not expect you to. I am not Walder Frey, Your Grace; I will not pressure you into an unhappy marriage. I hold my granddaughter far too dearly for that. Consider the options in full, and I will discuss and treat with you honestly and fairly,” he said with a nod, leaning back on his chair. The wood groaned. “However, I do hope that you will consider the benefit it might bring to us both. Spend time with Wynafryd, if it pleases you.”

“And is your granddaughter aware of the proposal?”

“I broached the subject to her, briefly,” replied Lord Wyman. “I spoke to her mother in great length. Leona eventually agreed that it was in our family’s best interests. My son does not know, he left before I could talk to him about it, but he will agree.”
Jon didn’t reply. Lord Wyman is an ambitious man. He fought for House Stark, but he was most certainly looking after his own house’s interests too. A marriage to bring a dragon into White Harbour could certainly be a huge boon to his standing.

Though he makes good points. It would benefit me and my cause too. He would give me a castle. The dowry would be great. In return for a wife.

But I haven’t even spoken to the girl before.

There was a long moment of silence. The lord tried to measure his expression. “Nothing need be decided now,” Lord Wyman said finally. “As you say, Your Grace, there is a war to be won first.”

There was more small talk after that, but Jon grew more and more reserved, and distracted. How did I think it was going to end? Sooner or later I was always going to have to marry to solidify my standing.

Which standing, though? My standing with the free folk? Or my standing with the north? With the Seven Kingdoms? Should I be considering gold, influence or martial strength? Too many different concerns, all of them reliant on marriage.

And how can I rank my happiness compared to matters like these?

By the time they retired, Jon was left feeling worn and gloomy. Lord Manderly would doubtless insist on feasting tonight with the highborn, but Jon was already feeling bloated just from the pastries served. It was all too easy for lords to lose control of their gut. Is it queer that one day in this castle makes me miss weeks of hard marching through the north?

Jon left the solar walking stiffly. He asked a servant about sleeping arrangements, and then Lady Leona Manderly came to escort him to his quarters. “Your… um… household has been settled within the castle, Your Grace,” the lady said, curtseying. She still didn’t quite meet his gaze. “The west wing has been reserved for you and your court.”

“And have there been any issues?”

“Few. Your pet, the shadowcat,” her voice was haughty, “proved troublesome to relocate.”

“Phantom can be stubborn,” Jon said with a grimace. The ship journey moving the shadowcat from Eastwatch had not been a pleasant experience for anyone. “Provided she has her privacy she is no trouble.”

“The cat has a room by itself, by yours. The windows barred and the door locked from the servants.” Leona’s tone was slightly icily. I wonder, has any noble castle ever hosted a shadowcat before? “And I directed your paramour towards your chambers.”

Jon stopped. “Excuse me?”

“Your… Lady Val of Whitetree. She was placed in the other room adjoined to yours,” she explained. “Is that suitable, Your Grace?”

Val has arrived in White Harbour already? His heart pounded.

My paramour. For a moment, Jon was left fazed. “Um, yes. Yes, thank you, my lady.”

Is Val really my paramour? His instinctive reaction was no, but then… well, they weren’t betrothed and they were together. Though the word ‘paramour’ implied that Jon was a highborn lord, and that was a concept he was still struggling to get his head around.

Paramour. Mistress. Is that what they will view Val as?

The wildlings looked they had made themselves at home in the west wing. Tapestries were missing from the walls. Jon passed a sketch of a dragon drawn on the wall in chalk.

Lady Leona’s eyes lingered on the crude marking. “There was a… a conflict at the Sept of the Snows last week,” she said, breaking the quiet. “A mob of free folk tried to burn the statues of the Seven. They tried to raise up a totem of the dragon instead.”

Jon didn’t reply. He didn't know how to. Lady Leona just kept walking.

His Dragonguard were waiting for him, sprawled out before the spiral staircase leading upwards. The wildlings kept weapons in their hands constantly. Lady Leona looked scared by their presence, shuffling and averting her eyes.

Jon noticed that his own chambers had been marked with a white crown. “If there is anything else you require, Your Grace,” Lady Leona said, with a stiff curtsey.

“My lady,” Jon asked. “You know of the betrothal Lord Manderly offered me?”

“I do.” Her arms were tight at her sides. Still she didn't meet his eyes.

“I would like to know what you think of it? Do you support it?”

She hesitated. Jon heard the quiver in her voice, like she wanted to say something else. “I support stability for the north, Your Grace,” Lady Leona replied. “I want to see the north and my family brought to order again. The Seven knows that there's so little left in the north these days. Goodbye, Your Grace.”

Lady Leona turned and left. She's scared, Jon thought. She's scared in her own castle.

Jon hesitated for a good while before placing his hand on the door and walking through. Val is here.

The first thing he heard was a low growl. A bloodthirsty snarl. “Close the bloody door, will you?” a voice called. “Last thing you want is this girl bolting away.”

Jon blinked. Val was in the room, standing at the far end. She's wearing a dress, he realised. A white and blue samite and silver-lined dress, with a cream ermine shawl, highlighting her dark golden hair. She wore her long hair pinned upwards in a southern style, with only a few locks coiffed down from her crown. With her high and sharp cheekbones could have easily been mistaken for highborn. She would have looked right at home in any southern court in the Westeros. She was beautiful enough to draw every gaze in the hall wearing that dress.

No, Val would draw gazes no matter what she wore, he thought with a shallow breath. She could be wearing rags and look like a queen. Wearing finery made her so attractive it seemed unfair. She still kept a sheathed sword on her waist.

Jon had to blink as he realised she was holding a slab of raw, bloody meat in her hand as she turned to him. “Well,” Val chided. “You've finally got here. I was wondering how long it would take you before you deigned to pay me a visit, King Snow.”

“I didn't know you had arrived.”
“Well, you do now.” Val turned back to her task, carrying the meat towards the adjoining room. Jon heard that growl again. He recognised it instantly.

“Careful, Val!” Jon called, but she just tutted.

In the doorway of the guest bedroom, he saw a pair of pale blue eyes staring back at him. Phantom had a whole chamber for herself. There were velvet blankets over the mattress, but the shadowcat had shredded the pillows and clawed the sheets to shreds, before curling up underneath the four-poster bed. The room was dark; the servants must have blanketed the double windows so the shadowcat would be more comfortable in the gloom.

Phantom was growling as Val threw the cut of bloody meat, and sharp teeth flashed hungrily. Val just watched curiously, already pulling out another cut from a platter the kitchens must have provided.

Jon could have reached out into Phantom's skin, but he didn't. “Careful, Val,” he warned. “She's not tame.”

She looked at him curiously, raising a perfect eyebrow. “Would you expect her to be?”

“I… I suppose not.”

Val threw another slice of meat at Phantom. “She's just a cat,” she said with an affectionate stare. “A beautiful cat too. Her fur is lovely but I don't dare touch it. She wants to eat, she wants to hunt, she wants to be kept safe. She might attack me, though so long as I don't threaten her and I keep her sated I don't think she will.”

“And if she does?” Jon took a slow step forward cautiously.

“That's why I have a sword, Jon.” Her other hand never left the blade, he noticed. “I'm not stupid, but neither is she, so it's fine.”

Phantom gulped down the meat with a hungry growl. Val watched, entranced, as she threw down the last of the meat. “You control her, don't you?” Val asked curiously.

“Sometimes,” he admitted. “I can take her skin, or share her senses. But most of the time I don't, I can't – I don't have the concentration to spare. She's still a wild animal, and it only works so long as she's kept contained or isolated any time that I'm not present.”

“Well,” Val said, “that's where the similarities between her and me end, I suppose.”

Phantom took the last of the meat in her mouth back to her lair under the bed. The shadowcat disappeared into the dark. Jon could hear the shadowcat gulping down the meat. Phantom seemed comfortable enough not to lash out. He felt himself relax.

“She has mellowed somewhat,” Jon admitted. “When I first found her she was feral, I dared not let her close to me unless I was in her skin. For a while I couldn't even bring her into camp. But she has grown more comfortable around people, I think. She doesn't lash out so much. I can leave her alone for longer periods.”

“And you're still nervous to be in the same room with her?”

“She’s still a shadowcat.”

“True.”
Very cautiously, Val stood up and moved to close the door. The door thudded, and Val latched it shut. There was a splatter of blood from the meat on the stone floor. Val wiped her hands clean on her dress.

Then, without a word, she reached across and pulled Jon into her. There was a sharp intake of breath, and then their lips touched. The kiss caught him off-guard and her touch… he could feel her hands moving across his chest, causing his whole body to tremble. She tasted warm, fiery, alive.

“I’m glad you’re back,” Val whispered as the kiss broke.

Gods, she was beautiful. Everything about her was beautiful. She was slender, toned and full-bodied, the type of body shape that was universally stunning. Dark golden hair and pale grey eyes. Even just being in her company left Jon feeling nervous, hesitant. He tried to reply, but the kiss stole his words.

Val looked at his expression and smirked. There was a playful glimmer in her eyes.

“Have you been treated well?” Jon managed finally.

“I have indeed.” She turned to look around the room. “These southron castles do not lack for luxury, I’ll give them that. I even wear these dresses that they insist on placing on my bed, but you should see the queer looks they give me when I wear the sword too. And at every feast your fat lord insists on parading me through his court.”

“Lord Manderly does that? Why?”

“To show off the savage wildling dressed like ‘proper’ folk?” Val snorted. “Every meal it’s always one knight this or noble lord that who tries to approach me.”

_They think you are my paramour._ Jon could almost understand it too, looking at her now. He wondered how many of those in the Merman’s Court could only see the beauty, and not the strength underneath. “Should I be worried?” Jon asked.

“What of? Of me entertaining one of them or gelding them?” Val laughed.

“The latter more than the former,” he admitted.

“I’ll have you know, I have been the picture of grace, Your Grace,” she chided, with a smile. _You always are._ “I’ve been sharing their smiles, even using all of their little titles. A few have asked me to dance, but I always decline _politely._” She rolled her eyes. “Isn’t that why we are here? To make all of these kneelers like us?”

“I am sorry for the torment you’ve endured. It sounds horrible.”

“Well,” she said with another smile. “I am sure you can make amends for it.”

Jon really, really wanted to step forward and kiss her again. _Gods, how I’ve missed her._ Even the weeks of being apart had left him craving her touch. Her voice. Her scent. Her taste. Still, he hesitated. _They call her my paramour. I was only just offered a marriage betrothal by the lord of the castle who is hosting me, and here I am with another woman._ It felt wrong, disrespectful, even, but….

Val paused, stepping forward. “You look tired,” she noted. “How goes the march?”
“Long. Too long. If every man had a dragon to ride upon we would have reached Winterfell by now. But we are winning.”

“You don’t seem triumphant about it.”

“It is hard to feel triumphant when the battle is not over,” said Jon. “They have not been good victories.”

“Ah.” That word seemed to linger in the air. Val took another small step closer. “How long until you must fly out again?”

“Not long,” he replied with a grimace. “Too soon.”

“Very well then.”

Casually, Val pulled her dress off her shoulders. In a smooth motion, she twisted her arm out of the sleeves, and her shawl fell to the floor. And then the dress itself fell too. She was not wearing any smallclothes. She bit her lower lip, a smirk playing across her eyes.

Jon was left staring at her bare breasts, mouth agape. Her skin was smooth, soft and unblemished, with full breasts. Her nipples were erect. Val quietly pulled off her belt and kicked off her dress. Jon could see the bush of dark blonde hair beneath her legs. Val’s pale grey eyes didn’t even twitch away from his.

There was a long moment of quiet. “Perhaps I can stay a bit longer,” Jon said dumbly. Val only laughed.

He stepped forward to hold her. Their kiss was much more forceful, aggressive, hungry. Her naked body pressed against his armour. Jon’s clothes had never seemed so restrictive.

Whatever hesitation, doubt or worry seemed to just vanish. Perhaps Val dragged it out of his mouth. No, Jon thought, there is absolutely nothing wrong with this right now.

Fumbling hands tried to unfasten his belt and chainmail, clumsy trying to strip his clothes off him without breaking their embrace. His cloak fell off him, and then his belt. Dark Sister clunked to the floor. Val fumbled to unfasten his breeches, yet Jon held her off.

Instead, he kneeled down onto the cold ground, his lips trailing downwards from her breasts, kissing down her navel. He could feel Val shivering as he lowered himself towards her moistness.

He could smell her. One hand was on the back of his head, pushing him into position, the other hand rubbing her own breasts.

“So,” Jon whispered. “Kneelers, huh?”

“Oh be quiet,” Val gasped. “And don’t stop.”

Jon grinned as he pressed his mouth towards her lips. Val was shivering, muffled groans from her throat as she pushed his tongue forcefully towards the right places. Jon pushed her backwards onto the bed, and she fell on her back, her thighs wrapping tightly around his head.

She was all he could taste. It was a bitter, sweaty taste that he hardly noticed. He loved that moment where she lost control, her body convulsing and the cry breaking her lips. She was normally so stiff, tight and composed, and at that moment when he pushed her to the point of breaking down… that felt special.
Val didn’t scream, instead she just gasped. She would bite her lip trying to restrain herself, and all that would come out were short, raspy groans and moans, building in pitch. Jon loved that sound.

At some point, Jon’s breeches were lost and he climbed into bed, into a tangle of limbs and hungry kisses. It stunk of sweat and sex, but he didn’t care. He could have spent an eternity wrapped with her wrapped around her, and it wouldn’t have been enough.

By the gods, how did I ever go so long without this?

Nobody disturbed them. Vaguely, he was surprised that no summons came for him from Lord Manderly, he supposed his Dragonguard must have heard the sounds and held the servants back. Perhaps that was disrespectful to his host, but he couldn’t find it in him to care.

By the time it was dark outside, they were both left gasping for breath. Jon could hear Phantom scratching at the wall in the adjoining room.

She was laughing. He didn’t know why, but Val was left chuckling throatily as she gasped and shivered. “Have I amused you?” Jon asked, feeling the grin spread.

“Somewhat,” she replied, closing her eyes and taking deep breaths. Her hands were on her breasts as she stretched outwards across the bed. “So if you’re a king and you kneel in my presence, than what does make me?”

“A goddess?” Jon leaned across her to take another kiss.

Val flicked his nose. “Flatterer,” she chided, and then kissed him again.

Jon was left grinning like a fool. Something about her face, the sweat dripping from her breasts, that moment, he couldn’t stop chuckling even as he kissed her again. Trying to breath, kiss and laugh all at once felt painful, but he couldn’t help it.

All of the weariness and achiness from the march felt like it was creeping out of his bones. He hadn’t even realised how tense and stiff he been until now, until her.

Val’s long, long leg wrapped around his torso and pulled him closer, her foot stroking against his back. It felt so comfortable, with her muscles squirming softly beneath him and the scent of her skin all around him.

“I want you with me,” Jon whispered in her while as he kissed her neck. “Val… will you come with me when the host sets out?”

“What? To warm your furs at night after a long march?”

“If you’d like,” he spoke between the kisses. “I don’t like being apart from you. And I want to show you Winterfell.”

She paused, and smiled. “Aye. Alright, let’s go see this castle of yours, Jon Snow.”

He froze. There was a slight shiver down his back. Those words… it made him think of Ygritte. Then Val kissed him and that thought disappeared from his mind.

“And in return,” Val whispered. Her cheeks were still blushed red. “I expect more of those king’s kisses of yours, Your Grace.”

“Happily, my lady,” Jon grinned.
Her fingers traced the scar on his chest. “I’m sure,” Val whispered, smirking. With a gentle push, she shoved him around and onto his back. Val pulled herself up from the blankets. “But I can take the hint.”

“Where are you…” She stood up and walked around the four-poster bed across to his side. And then she kneeled down by his legs. “Oh.”

Val was still smirking. Somehow, that smirk was even more enticing that her breasts. He felt her fingers playing around his groin, running through his hair. He could already feel himself turning stiff again, and then the sight of her moving downwards between his legs, and her mouth, and her lips…

Jon groaned. His fingers clenched, and clawed at the mattress. “So…” he said, strained, as he took a deep breath. “… you lose all right to criticise southerners for being kneelers.”

“If you make that jest again, then I’ll bite you,” Val warned, but they were both grinning and giggling like fools.

Chapter End Notes

Of all the chapters that I’ve written so far, there have been a few that I haven’t been that satisfied with. And then there is one. This one has been a pain...

From now I’m hoping to get the next few out weekly. Next chapter is mostly written, and after that I’ve got a quite a few bits and pieces of the next five or so.

Oh, and also I’ve just noticed that Dragons of Ice and Fire now has it's own TV Tropes page! Google "Dragons of Ice and Fire serpentguy", it's one of the top links. Special thank you to whoever created it, I wish you told me.
Chapter 30

Chapter Summary

The two lost Starks, trapped and held hostage, and the road to Winterfell...

The Wayward Daughter

Lightning split the northern sky, etching the black tower of the Night Lamp against the blue-white sky. Six heartbeats later came the thunder, like a distant drum.

The guards marched Sansa and Jorah across a bridge of black basalt and under an iron portcullis showing signs of rust. Beyond lay a deep salt moat and a drawbridge supported by a pair of massive chains. Green waters surged below, sending up plumes of spray to smash against the foundations of the castle. Then came a second gatehouse, larger than the first, its stones bearded with green algae. Sansa walked across a muddy yard, the guard holding her arm tightly. A cold rain stung her eyes. The guards pulled her up the stairs into Breakwater’s cavernous stone keep.

Sansa walked with them, face buried in her old wool cloak, but Jorah fought and thrashed against the men with every step. There were heavy iron manacles around Jorah’s arms, but it took half a dozen men to force the knight. He didn’t look much like a knight now – Jorah had abandoned his armour, vambraces and greaves for a cheap tunic and weather-beaten cloak to pass as a fisherfolk. He had sold his engraved steel breastplate for a small fishing dinghy to take them to the across the Bite.

They might have gotten further than Sweetsister, but then the storm hit. It still hadn’t ceased, either. Breakwater Castle howled in the stormy wind. The roar of the waves against the rocks made Sansa shiver. The waves were thunderous and unyielding, like the beating of some great heart as they pounded one after another.

Sansa was scared. She would have told Jorah not to fight them, but the man escorting her didn’t give her a chance. They beat Jorah with the butts of their spears until he finally ceased. It took four men to drag the great knight up the stone stairs.

The guard escorting her was the captain, a fleshy and portly man, face hidden under a half-helm. When she looked, she saw that his hand had webbing between his fingers. She refused to let herself panic, but she couldn’t stop her heart from beating.

Breakwater Castle had a threadbare Myrish carpet over its entrance, and a gloomy stone hall with mould clinging to the ceiling. As she was escorted into the main hall, Sansa saw a great white spider-crab on a grey-green field hanging over the hearth. They found the lord alone in the gloom of his hall, making a late supper of beer and bread and sister’s stew. Twenty iron sconces were mounted along his thick stone walls, but only four held torches and none were lit. Two fat tallow candles gave a meagre, flickering light.

She could hear the rain lashing at the walls, and a steady dripping from where the roof had sprung a leak. Several leaks, actually – they had tried to stop the water with buckets and clothes, but then it seemed like they had resigned themselves when the buckets overfilled. The heavy boots of the guards splashed through the puddles on the stone floor.
“M’lord,” said the captain. “It was as you said. A large man and a girl he calls his daughter, at the Belly o’ the Whale, trying to buy passage north off the island. We knocked on the door and demanded he come with us. He refused. He was armed with a greatsword. He didn’t come easily.”

“Indeed,” the lord said darkly, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand. “You fight well for a man missing two fingers, ser.”

Jorah Mormont only growled, trying to protest. Sansa felt her breath freeze. She knew the lord by mention only; Lord Godric Borrell of Sweetsister, Shield of Sisterton, Master of Breakwater Castle and Keeper of the Night Lamp. How much does he know?

He was an ugly man, big and fleshy, with massive shoulders and no neck. Coarse white hair grew from his cheeks and chin, with a bald scalp and a lumpy red-veined nose. The Lord of Sweetsister dressed more like a hard-worn sailor or smuggler rather than a lord. He has a webbing between the three middle fingers of his hand, Sansa noticed. So it’s true; the lords of the Three Sisters truly do have webbed hands. In the Vale, she remembered Randa saying it was as the Sistermen descended from mermen.

Lightning flashed outside, making the arrow loops blaze blue and white for half a heartbeat. One, two, three, Sansa counted, before the thunder came. Behind her, she heard the noise of the guards struggling to drag Jorah further into the hall.

“Have you ever heard such a storm?” the lord said. “The Andals may have torched our temples, but once the Sistermen worshipped the Lady of the Waves and the Lord of the Sky, and when they lay together they would give birth to scared storms. From the sounds of it, right now the two gods are fucking each other’s brains out in hate.” A dry chuckle. “Tonight will be a profitable night for me, I think.

“Alas, I fear the Night Lamp will not be visible in weather such as this,” the lord continued, with an ugly smirk. “Already the wreckage of an Ibennese whaler has graced my shores – I expect at least one of the White Harbour’s new fleet will do the same. Merchants and cogs through the Bite will be stranded on my rocks. If there is one thing the Sistermen know and all others seem to have forgotten, it’s that the ocean has teeth. Men are not the masters of the sea, not by a long shot. I could tell you tales of the things that reside in the depths, or the storms that could shake the earth.” He stood up, waddling forward to inspect them. Sansa met his gaze. “But here you are. Another gift from the storm. I think you will be more valuable to Sweetsister than a thousand shipwrecks.”

There was nothing sweet about Sweetsister. The isle was cold and drab and wet. Sisterton was a vile town, a sty, small and mean, rank with the odours of pigs and rotting fish. Its streets were mud and planks, its houses daub-and-wattle hovels roofed by straw, and by the Gallows Gate Sansa had passed hanged men with their entrails dangling out. She hadn’t wanted to enter, but Jorah had said that the Three Sisters were a favourite haunt of smugglers, and a good place to find voyage north across the Bite without drawing any attention. Jorah had been proven wrong.

Ser Jorah was gasping on the floor, his face bloody. He had grown out a large beard lined with grey, looking haggard and older than ever. His bandaged hand was bleeding again from the fight. “You have no right,” he panted. “To detain us like this.”

“No right?” Lord Godric Borrell seemed amused. “I think I am well within my rights to apprehend criminals, Ser Jorah Mormont.”

“You are mistaken,” he snarled. Sansa only pursed her lips, glancing around the room quietly. “I am no ser. My name is Qhorin. This is my daughter Beth. We are but two travellers, heading north—”
Sansa hid her grimace. Ser Jorah is a poor liar. “Liar,” Lord Borrell scoffed. As if I would believe that a brute like you could produce a lovely daughter such as this.” He turned to Sansa with a polite nod, but she said nothing. She knew little of Lord Borrell, and she would not put herself at a disadvantage with rash lies. “You are Ser Jorah Mormont, former Lord of Bear Island, once a slaver and now murderer and kidnapper, it seems.”

“You are mistaken–”

“Oh very well, if that’s how you want to play it.” His voice turned annoyed. He still kept looking at Sansa, frowning. “Captain Gerrick, take off his breeches.”

“What?” Jorah shouted, shocked. “What are you – no! No, damn you!”

“And then his tunic,” Lord Borrell insisted, folding his arms. “Strip him naked.”

Sansa’s heart was in her mouth. Ser Jorah thrashed ferociously, but there were too many men. The man holding her arm kept Sansa back, while the others swarmed against the knight. There were muffled grunts and curses. Sansa heard fabric being torn. She heard the thud of Ser Jorah’s forehead breaking a man’s nose.

He will only be beaten more by resisting, Sansa thought quietly. He should learn when to concede. The guards had to drag the knight up, tearing off his clothes. Jorah body was hairy and scarred, trying to cover himself. She saw strong, muscled shoulders, but also a flabby gut that was growing with age. The big man’s face was flushed with anger. He screamed bloody murder right up until a man slammed a spear under his chin.

Sansa had never seen the big knight look so small. She still didn’t speak.

“Fiend!” Jorah gasped. “You bloody–”

“Oh, don’t flatter yourself,” Lord Borrell said with a grunt. “You have a scar on your thigh, ser.”

Jorah glowered. Sansa glimpsed a large, old wound across his waist, looking like a cut from a sword, decades ago. “My father once told me to never to discard anything that may be of use, and once more he is proven correct,” Lord Borrell continued. “Did you know that I still have a letter from eight years ago, when you fled the kingdom to escape Stark justice? Ned Stark sent out ravens to White Harbour and the Three Sisters, to watch for an exiled lord fleeing on a ship across the Narrow Sea. Ravens that arrived too late, as it was. Most of the descriptions he gave are out of date, but the letter mentioned that scar across your thigh as a means to recognise you. I suppose Stark would know about that battle wound, considering he was there when it was inflicted, at the Siege of Pyke.” There was pause as he stepped forward. “Now I was fairly confident about who you were, but that scar proves it without doubt. You are Ser Jorah Mormont, and do not insult me by lying about it again.”

The lord turned towards Sansa. She gulped, but her gaze stayed steady. “And so that makes you Alayne Stone, natural daughter of our Lord Protector,” he said, a slight mocking edge to the title. “Your father has missed you dearly.”

He is not my father. There was a frown on Lord Borrell’s face as he waited for her to talk. She did not. “The girl is drenched to the bone,” he said after a pause. “Gella! Bring the girl a blanket. And a pot of sister’s stew. Warm yourself by the fire, lass. Never let it be said that House Borrell was inhospitable.”

Inhospitable. Sansa could have laughed. The Three Sisters were sworn to the Arryns of the Vale, but the Eyrie’s grasp on the islands were tenuous at best. She knew the Lord of the Three Sisters, Tristan Sunderland – him and his sons had attended the Tourney of the Winged Knights – but House Borrell had had little involvement in politics in the Vale. The Keeper of the Night Lamp was infamous for the lantern going dark, and his men scoured the shores for wrecks like crabs. Smugglers, scavengers and pirates. This is an island of fiends.

But the world is full of fiends, Sansa thought. Fiends and evil men. And yet all of the evil men are on different sides, are they not?

It sounded like Ser Jorah was trying to growl something, but he couldn’t with the spear under his throat. The guards held the knight to the ground. The captain standing by Sansa stepped forward. “She had this on her, Godric,” he said in grumbling voice, as he handed up the dagger. “Found it hidden in her dress.”

The sleek black dagger gleamed in the gloom. Even after everything, Sansa had kept that dagger on her, hidden in her tunic. She had never forgotten how it felt to jam that blade through Shadrich’s back. Sansa stiffened as Lord Borrell took the blade.

“Hmm,” the lord grunted, suspiciously. “A dagger. A fine dagger too. Isn’t that curious? Now what sort of kidnapper allows their captive to carry a dagger, ser?”

“I kidnapped no one,” Jorah said, his voice low and rumbling.

“So you say. And yet you disappeared along with Littlefinger’s daughter. Now what were they supposed to think? The first raven I received blamed the crime on a Shadrich something or other, yet the second raven named you as accomplice too. Littlefinger names you responsible for her disappearance, as well as the murder of Ser Harrold Hardyng. Now there’s a crime that has the Vale up in arms.” He looked between them. “My lady, do you have anything to say in your knight’s defence?”

Sansa paused. The room was tense. “Ser Jorah did not kidnap me, my lord.” Her voice was soft, innocent. She averted her eyes like a scared, helpless maiden. “He did not murder Harry the Heir either.”

“Indeed.” A few of the men in the hall hesitated. Lord Borrell bit his lip, before coming to a decision. “Gella!” He called to a portly woman stammering into the hall. “Fetch a second bowl of stew. Let Ser Jorah eat at the table as well.” The lord motioned at the guards. “Place him on a chair. But keep him naked. Naked men are less inclined to brave and stupid acts, I find.”

Lord Borrell sighed, and rolled his eyes. “Fine. For the sake of the ladies present, he gets a cloak to cover his decency. But cause any trouble, ser, and my good nature evaporates quickly. I am told you killed two men before they managed to restrain you in the tavern, and a third one might die still from his injuries. The only reason why I am not delivering you to a cold wet hell for such, is because right now my curiosity exceeds my anger.”

She could see the bruises across Ser Jorah’s body. His hand was covered in poorly-bandaged linens, stained with dried, black blood, after Ser Shadrich severed two of his fingers. She had warned Ser Jorah the wound was likely to fester if not properly treated, but then had never been time. Lord Borrell stared at Ser Jorah too, keeping his distance across the table. “You are strong man, ser,” he said finally. “To escape the Vale such, on foot as well. You have left a realm in an uproar behind you.”
The bowl placed before her was filled with some yellow, stringy meat, along with bread still hot from the oven. Sansa didn’t touch it. The woman who placed the bowl had webbed hands too, Sansa noted, but she did stare. “Eat, my lady,” Lord Borrell insisted. “Gella makes the finest sister’s stew on these islands. Eat. It is good.”

Crab stew served with leeks, carrots and turnips. She had seen the giant spider crabs scuttling on the islands and the meal had turned her stomach at first, but it was good. He gives us guest right, at least. The lord of Sweetsister had a black repute, but even robber lords and wreckers were bound by the law of hospitality. Few would succumb to the depravity of Freys.

Lord Borrell eyed Ser Jorah closely. “You should eat as well, ser,” he said. “Because I am sick of you wrestling against my men. Take your bread and salt and quit it with the defiance. From the moment you eat, my men will not force you and neither will you attack them. Yet the chains stay on, ser.”

Jorah did, but he didn’t stop glowering. The guards didn’t go far from the table, either. There were strange spices in the stew, but Sansa had no time to focus on them. Her attention was on Lord Borrell, sitting in his leaky hall.

“Is there any news of Lord Baelish?” Sansa asked hesitantly.

“Oh yes. He may not be Lord Protector for much longer. The Lords Declarant only ever tolerated him because Robert Arryn was sickly and they thought Harry would become Lord of Eyrie soon enough,” Lord Borrell replied. “But Harry the Heir’s death has left the succession in crisis. Nobody is certain of who has the next strongest claim, and it seems every great lord is vying for the seat now. You have much to answer for there.”

“I did not kill Harry the Heir,” Ser Jorah wheezed.

“And yet he is dead and you disappeared with his betrothed.” His eyes turned to Sansa, waiting for her to speak. She did not. “Now then, clearly she is no captive so answer me here; why did you run, and why did you take her?”

Jorah grit his teeth, eyes narrowing. “Ser Shadrich of Shady Glen kidnapped Alayne and murdered Ser Harrold. I rescued her,” he said. “And yet her father is abusive. She asked me not to return her to Littlefinger, and so I did not.”

“And you were the noble knight to come a lady’s aid? The bear and the maiden fair,” Lord Borrell shook his head. “No, I do not believe it. I know your type, ser, and you are not so noble as you would pretend. And why would a man like Littlefinger offer twenty thousand gold dragons for his bastard daughter?”

Jorah didn’t reply. His jaw clenched stubbornly. “If you will not answer, you have no place at my table,” Lord Borrell ordered. “Wait out your guest right in my dungeons. Escort him there.”

Jorah’s stew toppled over the table as he stood defiantly. The guards in the room all stepped forward, spears raised. “No, wait!” Sansa shouted.

“Give me the truth, girl,” Lord Borrell warned.

“Alayne, don’t—” Jorah shouted. He doesn’t want them to know. He thinks Lord Borrell a fiend who will ransom me if he knows the value of the hostage he holds. Jorah is probably right, but greed I can work with.

“I am not Alayne Stone, my lord,” she said softly. “I am Sansa Stark of Winterfell.”
The room turned silent. There was no noise but the pitter-patter of rain on the leaky roof. She saw Lord Borrell’s face freeze. Then, a long grin spread over his bloated face.

“Oh,” he said, and then frowned. “Oh! Oh, now so many puzzles make more sense.” He burst out in brash bark of laughter. “Littlefinger. Of course. And here I was wondering why a bastard daughter would ever be betrothed to the heir of the Vale. Oh, now things come into focus. No wonder he offered twenty thousand dragons for you.”

The large man jumped to his feet, pacing happily. The men stood back. Jorah glowered at the lord. “Ah, but of course, Littlefinger proves his reputation,” he mused. “First he was appointed Lord Paramount of the Trident, and then he took power in the Vale. Next, he intended to seize the north too, with the eldest daughter of House Stark. He means to take over half the realm, piece by piece!”

The man laughed. “And Lady Stark. Or is it Lady Lannister now? I wonder how the queen would react to learn that the wife of the most infamous man in the realm was being harboured in the Vale?”

“You must not tell,” ordered Ser Jorah, but he sounded nervous.

“I must not? You are no position to make demands.” Lord Borrell laughed again, shaking his head. “But thank you for enlightening me, my lady, I shall be laughing over this for days. I must admit, you do not have your father’s look to you. I do remember seeing your mother, only briefly, and, yes, you share her resemblance.”

“And now I am in your hall, my lord,” Sansa said. “What are you to do with me?”

She could see greed in his eyes. “Hmm, now there’s the question. The Iron Throne will be very appreciative to receive you, I have no doubt. Perhaps your husband will be too, and I do hear the Imp commands legions of men with gold.” He smiled sickly. “Sunderland would demand that I hand you over if he knew. He’d sell you for a pot of gold. The poor man is always looking for gold to keep his sons in plate and mail, and riding destriers.”

Sansa remembered Lord Triston Sunderland’s sons; they hadn’t been very skilled knights, but they were brave and earnest. Still, she knew from the look in his eye that Lord Borrell would never surrender his prize for another to sell. He paused, and then shook his head. “No, I think Lord Baelish is still the highest bidder,” the lord announced. “Although perhaps twenty thousand is too modest a figure for the Lady of Winterfell. Perhaps I could raise a new castle from the gold your caretaker will pay me. You will be returned to the Vale, ‘Alayne’.”

Jorah’s face paled. “Please, my lord,” he begged. “You cannot.”

“I cannot? You do not return wish to return to Eyrie, my lady?”

“There are few things I would despise more, my lord.” She kept herself calm. I could try crying, or begging, but he is not one to be moved by a maiden’s plea, Sansa thought.

“I would not be so certain. Tis the best option for all, it seems,” he mused. “Queen Cersei would most certainly have your head for her son’s poisoning, but regardless the lioness is unlikely to last much longer, and she has little means to pay in any case. Perhaps the Tyrells and their little queen would want you, but it still does not seem sensible for me. The Reach may be rich, but it is far away and I would be best served to seek favour with the Vale.”

Jorah looked ready to object. Sansa spoke first. “Favour with whom, my lord? The Lord Protector? You said it yourself that Littlefinger may not be in power much longer.”
He grunted. “True. And gods know that I have little love for the men of the Fingers. Sistermen have clashed with the Fingerlords for ages. I could tell you tales.” A pause. “But gold is gold and Littlefinger has it.”

“Gold means little if you tie yourself to a sinking ship, my lord,” Sansa argued. “And why would Littlefinger pay for what he could take instead?”

His face twisted. “Do you think I fear that upjumped coincounter?”

“You should, my lord. Petyr Baelish is ambitious, cunning and remorseless. Do you think he will leave you with knowledge that may threaten him? Littlefinger is not a good person; he would not allow anything to interfere in his plans.” Her gaze turned dark. “He will give you the same treatment he always gives; he will pay you for your service, and then he will have you killed for your silence.”

Lord Borrell scratched his stubble. “And what did the man do to you to give you such a foul opinion of him?”

“He tried to have me raped, my lord.”

That caused the table to fall silent. Sansa kept her voice totally level, emotionless. There will be no weakness here, not from me. “In retrospect,” Sansa continued, “I wonder if that was his intention from the beginning. He betrothed me to a union that he knew would turn sour. He knew the sort of man that Harrold Hardyng was, he knew how Harry treated the last two mothers of his bastards, he knew that any marriage to him would end in ruin. He even encouraged the ruin. So Littlefinger sold me to a handsome chivalrous knight, one who would rape me and force himself onto me.” She smiled softly. “And I wonder… did Littlefinger think then maybe, in my hurt and pain, I would cling to him more tightly for support? Perhaps he meant to position himself to be my solace, my support, to make me dependent upon him. To take advantage of a miserable marriage, well, it’s a plan that worked very well for Littlefinger with my aunt, did it not?”

There was no reply. Sansa absently stirred her stew. “But Harrold was to go off to war and get himself killed, Littlefinger could arrange that. And maybe I would be left afterwards with a child in my stomach, and Littlefinger’s arms around me for ‘comfort’.” She shook her head. “I know what the man wants. He wanted my mother. He wants me. By marrying me to Harry the Heir, he aimed to obtain everything he ever desired; he thought he would have me weak, wounded and malleable, and in doing so he would secure his own position in the Vale through whatever child I carried. That is what he does. That is how he manipulates people.”

That is what he has done before. She thought of Lysa Arryn, weeping, fearful and proud, and putty to Littlefinger’s schemes. Perhaps Littlefinger thought he could manipulate her in the same way, with fake kindness, gentle words and so many schemes. There was a sympathy towards her aunt Sansa never felt before.

You told me to put the tears in Jon’s wine, and I did, Sansa remembered. The Tears of Lys. She remembered Lysa screaming that before she was pushed, but Sansa hadn’t truly realised the meaning at the time. It was only during the trek with Jorah, after the words Ser Shadrich had said, Sansa started to wonder. Littlefinger arranged the death of Jon Arryn, to start this whole war. All part of his plan, and it worked.

I wonder, did Petyr Baelish also have my father killed just so he could get to me? Sansa doubted it was the sole reason, but it would have been a motivation – Littlefinger didn’t make just one scheme, he made several running in parallel. She was done with it. Done being the little bird.
There was a long pause. Sansa shook her head. “So no, my lord. I will not return to Petyr Baelish. I understand your position, but understand mine; I will never let that man get his slimy hands on me again.” She didn’t break from Lord Borrell’s gaze. “I will defy him out of pure spite. If you try to ship me back to Littlefinger, I will scream and I will fight to my last. If I become desperate enough, I will shout lies and I will claim that you abused me, or took advantage of me, or anything that I can say that might help me. And if I am truly left with no choice, I will claw out my own eyes or bite off my own tongue before I let Littlefinger touch me. You will be the lord that delivers my corpse to Littlefinger, before you deliver me alive.” No emotion in her voice. Lord Borrell shifted. “But you’re right. I am completely in your power right now. If you insist on selling me to Littlefinger, then there is nothing I can do to stop you, and it will not go well for me. But I can promise that it won’t go well for you either, Lord Borrell.”

Beefy eyes bulged at her. “My lady…”

She took a sip of her stew. “Also, give my compliments to Gella please,” she added. “This stew is truly delicious.”

The Lord of Sweetsister’s face twisted. “I think I have been very kind to you, my lady,” he warned. “I risked my men to rescue you from your kidnapper, I feast you in my hall.” Around her lightning struck. The blue-white light flashed in the wet, gloomy hall. “Do you really want to turn this unpleasant?”

“No at all. I understand your position. I am under your roof and you want to be paid for me. I understand that, I do,” Sansa said with a nod. “But find someone other than Littlefinger. Think of a different buyer.”

There was something like astonishment in Ser Jorah’s face. Lord Borrell bristled. “Someone else? Are you thinking of your Imp of a husband, my lady? Or that mummer’s monkey he calls a dragon?”

No, I wasn’t. But out loud she said, “Aegon Targaryen will want the daughter of the north as much anyone, my lord.”

“This ‘Aegon’ will not last long enough to see you,” the lord grumbled. “Did you know that the knights of the Vale have rallied for the crown’s defence? Fifty thousand Vale soldiers are marching south to King’s Landing. The Golden Company does not have a chance.”

“Even while the Queen goes mad?” Sansa asked.

“Even while,” Lord Borrell nodded. “Despite everything, the boy king still has the wealth of Casterly Rock, the power of the Reach, and the might of Vale behind him.” His voice turned bitter. “Littlefinger persuaded the Vale lords to muster and they have. Their armies will crush the rebellion around King’s Landing, and doubtless Littlefinger will be well-rewarded once more for his service. He is no fool, this enemy of yours.”

“And you’re still far from eager to sell me to the Iron Throne,” Sansa noted. “That is because you know the Iron Throne is more unstable than it has ever been.”

He didn’t reply straightaway. I have him, Sansa thought, I can manipulate him. “The whole realm is unstable,” the lord said after a long pause. “This storm is breaking the Seven Kingdoms apart.”

Jorah raised his voice. He was shivering in his cloak in the cold hall. “There is another option,” the knight said suddenly. He took a deep breath, hesitating. “Queen Daenerys Targaryen. The last good and just ruler. You must raise your banners for her, my lord.”
Both Sansa and Lord Borrell stared at Ser Jorah in shock. What is he…?

Then, Lord Borrell laughed. “The fucking dragon queen of Meereen?” he guffawed, in clear confusion. “How could you think she’s even a contender?”

“Daenerys Targaryen?” Sansa said, frowning.

“The daughter of the Mad King. She takes after her father too, from what I hear, but the tales say she has dragons,” the lord explained. “I heard of her from sailors from Qarth, and then from Meereen. I also heard that this Aegon, who claims to be her nephew, begged her for aid and she rebutted him. Daenerys abandoned Westeros to forge a new kingdom in Slaver’s Bay.”

“I know not of Aegon Targaryen,” Jorah grumbled. “But I know Daenerys. She is good and she is rightful, and she will be coming to take the Seven Kingdoms. If you were to support her –”

“How long till then? A year? A decade?” Lord Borrell shook his head. “If Queen Daenerys was interested in the Seven Kingdoms, she would be here by now.”

“She has three dragons. She is Aegon the Conqueror come again,” Jorah insisted, stubbornly. “The only rightful ruler, you must declare for her. Sansa Stark of Winterfell could bring the north to Dany’s name–”

“A name that is half a world away, ser,” the lord said. Sansa could only stare at Ser Jorah in shock. Is that what he is fighting for? Even after weeks of travelling together he had never told her. Why he really saved her.

“Daenerys is the rightful–”

“Rightful,” Lord Borrell snapped, slamming his hand on the table. “What is bloody rightful? Some dead man’s arse in a chair. Who cares what cock gave birth to her? The only thing that is right to me is my island, my family, my castle! My rock that I sit on.” He spat. “Goddammit, talking to you makes me remember why I hate the whole bloody lot of your games. The days were better when the Sistermen ruled the Three Sisters.”

Jorah faltered slightly from his outburst. Sansa averted her gaze, while the lord scratched at the table with webbed hands. “… You’re right, my lady,” the lord said finally, taking a deep breath to calm. “The options that would buy you are all terrible. All of the mainland kings are horrible. Now maybe I should just drown the both of you in my waters and be done with this headache.”

His tone didn’t sound like he was japing. Jorah grimaced. “You could just let us walk free.”

“I don’t like you, Ser Jorah.” Lord Borrell muttered, narrowing his eyes. “It would please me more to see you drowned to the Lady of the Waves, as they did in the days of old. Your septons forbade that practice, but Sisters do not forget.”

Please be quiet, Ser Jorah, you’re not helping here. Sansa took a deep breath. “There is another option, my lord,” she muttered quietly. “Sell me to White Harbour. They are near, they have silver, and my brother Jon Snow will pay for me.”

Lord Borrell gawked at her. They had heard of the tales as they fled the Fingers. Every smallfolk was talking about it. Sansa didn’t know how true they were, but…

“The Bastard King,” Lord Borrell muttered. “The bastard with the dragon. Every bastard has a dragon nowadays, it seems.”
“It’s not true.” Ser Jorah shook his head. He had never believed the tales of the dragon as they passed through the villages on the Fingers. Jorah dismissed them outright in every tavern. “The rumours are false. They must be.”

“It’s true.” Lord Borrell nodded, and Jorah’s face paled. “I’ve seen the beast myself, flying over the Bite. Your Jon Snow has released a monster, as well as hordes of savages,” said Lord Borrell. “And you would want to go to him, my lady?”

The smallfolk in every village they went through all talked about Jon Snow as if he were a demon from the coldest hell. The Seven Kingdoms were mad with whispers about the ice dragon.

“He is my brother,” she replied. Although I barely even talked to him. My mother shunned him and so did I. “I have not seen him in years and I do not know the truth to the rumours, but I choose him. I want my family.”

And Petyr was frightened of him. If Jon has become Littlefinger’s enemy, then I want to be by his side.

“You should not. Bastards are cursed fiends. Bad blood, my lady,” Lord Borrell said. “The Sunderlands dragged us into two Blackfyre rebellions and Sweetsister suffered for them. This Jon Snow is just another bastard stealing a crown, and I do not care to be another one damned for it. Bastards and pretenders.”

“I would think you would be more eager to gain favour,” Sansa noted. Jorah turned quiet, uncertain. “He has an army. He has a dragon.”

“His cause is still doomed.”

“Not from how it appears.”

“Then you do not have my perspective,” the lord rumbled. “I have seen the wildlings run amok. Raids across fishing villages even this far south. Families and lords are fleeing the north in droves, how can you build a kingdom from that? I hear the tales, I have seen the fear. There will be no peace in the north. Whatever ‘kingdom’ your bastard builds, even if he does win, will surely collapse. You cannot build order out of wildlings.” He shook his head. “Maybe Jon Snow considers himself a conqueror, but he is bringing only ice and fear.”

He swigged down the last of his beer, and slammed the mug onto the table. “I will not ally myself with such a man,” the lord said. “You cannot expect me to aid your bastard’s rebellion over my own lord.”

I must go to White Harbour. It was the only option that could be good for her, where she could be more than someone else’s hostage. What words will sway the Lord of Sweetsister? She could promise gold that she could not guarantee, or lands, honours and titles that maybe her brother could grant. She could threaten retribution, or she could beg and weep for pity. She wasn’t so sure that any plea would work.

Instead, she said, slowly, “I notice you speak very poorly of House Sunderland, my lord. You do not care for the Lord of the Three Sisters?”

The man shifted. “What of it? Triston Sunderland is an old penny-grabbing geezer.”

“He also descends from Andals and the Vale,” Sansa noted. “They are mainland lords at heart. They are not true Sistermen, are they? They do not share your heritage, or your history. They do not have that the mark on your hands, that legacy of your family. And yet they are the Lords of the Three Sisters – they sit in Sisterton. The town right outside of Breakwater, a town that you have historical claim to, and yet you still must give fealty to them? What percentage much of your plunder, fish and livelihood do they tax?”

There was no reply. In every kingdom, there were areas that were only nominally sworn to the Lord Paramount. The north had Skagos, the Iron Islands had Lonely Light, Dorne had the Stepstones, and the Vale had the Three Sisters. Their loyalty to the mainland is barely a thread.

“I spent time at the Eyrie,” Sansa continued. “In their politics, in their minds, the Three Sisters receives no consideration. Now House Sunderland competes and tries desperately to earn favour and status for themselves, but where that does leave you? It seems to me that the Vale has not been very kind to you. Their septons forbid your faith, their rule hurts your trade. You said it yourself that the Three Sisters have suffered greatly in southron wars and rebellions.”

“The Kings of Winter and the Kings of the Mountain and the Vale once spent a thousand years fighting over the Three Sisters,” Lord Borrell said bitterly. “The War Across the Water, it was called; or the ‘Worthless War’, as others named it.”

“It was not worthless to you, I’m sure.”

“No. The maesters say it was two thousand years ago that these islands were conquered by the northmen – an invasion called the Rape of the Three Sisters – but we Sistermen have long memories.”

“Do you remember a time when the Borrells were pirate kings?” Sansa asked. The only sound was the howling of the rain and wind. She could feel Jorah’s eyes on her, but she kept her gaze on her Lord Borrell. “It could be again.”

“And you expect me to take your side?” he said incredulously. “I have no love for the Starks of Winterfell.”

“You said it yourself that there are bad options all around. I don’t think you care for the Vale either,” Sansa insisted. “My brother is fighting for independence in the north. Why wouldn’t he support another ally seeking independence too?”

Sansa paused for five heartbeats silently. He did not reply. “Support my brother, and he could support you,” she continued. “You depend on trade with White Harbour, they are a strong partner to you. If there were a dragon behind you, House Sunderland couldn’t resist. House Borrell could be raised up to rulers of the Three Sisters. And my brother will be very grateful if you were to return me to him.”

His eyes narrowed. “The Sisters only bent the knee to the Eyrie originally,” the lord said slowly, “in exchange for driving the northmen out.”

“And the world is circular it seems.” Sansa gave a sweet, innocent smile. “Why not think, my lord, on the benefits that you could reap with standing behind a dragon? The same benefits that the Tullys, the Greyjoys, and all the others once reaped for being the first to declare for Aegon during the Conquest. You have a dragon right next door.”

I think I have him. This is an argument that may work. It didn’t escape her notice that Lord Borrell was very invested in the old history and culture of his people – that past was important to him. And there is a tension between his and House Sunderland that could be exploited. She caught the flicker in his gaze.
She didn’t push it. She just sat back and waited for his response.

“Tell me, my lady,” Lord Borrell said finally. “Why do you want to be by your brother’s side so badly?”

“Because he is my father’s son,” she replied honestly. “Because Jon took after my father.”

“Your father,” Lord Borrell repeated. “Ned Stark. Did you know that your father once sat in this very hall?”

That caught her off-guard. “I… I did not. He was here?”

“At the dawn of Robert’s Rebellion. The Mad King had sent to the Eyrie for Stark’s head, but Jon Arryn sent him back defiance. Gulltown stayed loyal to the throne, though. To get back home and call his banners, Ned Stark had to cross the mountains to the Fingers and find a fisherman to carry him across the Bite. A storm caught them on the way. The fisherman drowned, but his daughter got Stark to the Sisters before the boat went down. He left her with a bag of silver and a bastard in her belly. Jon Snow, she named him, after Jon Arryn.” Sansa’s mouth hung open. “That is where your bastard comes from.”

“I did not know that,” she said, gobsmacked. “Jon’s mother?”

“The mother is dead; she died at childbirth, I hear, and the new Lord of Winterfell took the babe back with him as he sailed back home,” he replied. “But before then, when you father was shipwrecked on our shores, my father sat where I sit now and Ned Stark was walked into our hall. Our maester urged us to send Stark’s head to Aerys, to prove our loyalty. It would have meant a rich reward. The Mad King was open-handed with them as pleased him. By then we knew that Jon Arryn had taken Gulltown, though. Robert was the first man to gain the wall, and slew Marq Grafton with his own hand. ‘This Baratheon is fearless,’ I said. ‘He fights the way a king should fight.’ I argued my father to allow Ned Stark leave Sweetsister freely.” She could see a glimmer in his eyes. The lord hesitated, his voice softening slightly. “… But the difference between then and now, my lady, is that your brother faces a very different fight. And perhaps I could gain a great advantage by siding with this Bastard King, except for the fact that I do not believe that your brother has the support needed to prevail in his fight.”

“He has the gained the support of White Harbour, has he not?”

“So it seems. He has the fat, cowardly lord with him.” Lord Borrell shook his head. “No, the Bastard King has succeeded in only splitting the north into thirds; one third that supports him, one third that will oppose him to the last, and another third that has supported him because they’re too scared to do otherwise. I hear that he is marching on Winterfell right now, and I think he will win. But he will still lose, do you know why?”

She didn’t reply. “Because winter is coming, Lady Stark,” Lord Borrell continued. “They say it will be the longest and hardest winter in living memory. Because the north is war-torn and ravaged, it doesn’t even have enough food to support itself. Come the heavy snows, the people will starve and Jon Snow’s little kingdom isn’t going to be able to feed itself. Not without support from the south, and you can be sure that there will be none coming from there. As soon as the circumstances turn dire, his wildlings will pillage, and his people will revolt. His weak ‘rule’ will collapse under his grip and tear down the north with it. He will win the battle, but the war and the winter will destroy him – that is inevitable.”

Sansa kept her gaze unblinking, focused. There could be no weakness in her eyes. “Winter is the only thing that is certain, my lord,” Sansa replied. “Everything else is still to be fought for.”
She didn’t know why, but the comment cause Lord Borrell to pause for longer than she would expect. She saw his face twitch. His hands stirred the sister’s stew. “You look very much like your mother, my lady,” the lord said finally. “But there is something of your father in you too.”

---

The Lost Prince

The world was spinning. Screaming. The ground split beneath him, bodies pouring into a great black abyss. Bran was left staring downwards at the huge tide of corpses, all the while he fell upwards into the green and red skies. Giant white roots snaked around him, great veins spreading everywhere. He could see shadows and ice dancing across the world.

Beyond the green, he remembered. That was what the crow called this place. The home of the faces in the weirwoods, a place beyond past, present or future.

The scenery blurred. The world was red with blood. Pools of red burning. He glimpsed a great tower piercing the dark sky over a churning ocean of blood. He saw a stone man dissolving into a sea of shadows bursting from the earth. He saw a great river frozen solid, bodies trying to escape the ice—

“You cannot do this, Bran,” the voice was in his ear. He felt claws around his waist. Huge wings flapping around him. The three-eyed crow was on him, a giant winged monster snatching him out of the air. “If you keep on losing your skin, you may not be able to pull yourself back.”

Every time Bran fell into this place, the three-eyed crow was there to catch him. He could feel the greenseer dragging him back to the ground. Back to his anchor, his body, his time.

“This is not the place to lose yourself,” the crow cawed. All around him, he saw a raging storm, ice and fire clashing. The crow had to physically pull him away. “Now is not the time to dream, Bran.”

The world lurched. Bran dropped.

He fell into his own body. He felt pain. He tasted blood in his mouth. Bran gasped and shuddered, coughing into a dirty stone floor.

The little boy trembled, trying to lift his gaze upwards. A pair of unseeing grey eyes stared back at him from the darkness.

Bran would have screamed, but his throat jammed.

Hother Umber was lying across from him, dead, limp and pale. Hother’s long white beard was stained red, his limbs flailed across the floor. The Whoresbane died clutching his chest in a pool of dried blood, his heavily lined face was scowling even in death.

They killed him, he thought in horror. The axe cut open half his stomach, and then they left him to die slowly. They let Hother Umber bleed to death and then they just left his body where it fell in the prison cell.

Bran’s first thought was of his father. He wanted to scream for his father to save him.

“Bran,” a quiet voice soothed, but she sounded scared too. “Don’t move, Bran, they hit you over the head pretty hard.”
Meera. He could see Meera in the gloom. She looked like she would have come to him, but there were manacles on her legs. She looked so skinny, frail. They were in a stone, black room. Two children and one corpse, all in chains.

His heart was racing so fast it might burst. The stone floor was cold and dirty. Bran tried to squirm, flailing helplessly. “Meera. Meera! What happened, where are we, those men…?”

“They got us, Bran. They got us.”

His head ached. He remembered blurry visions and sounds from the battle.

He remembered the frenzied bodies in the darkness, men screaming. He remembered Hother Umber bellowing at them to run. He remembered Mors Umber bellowing some war cry, and Summer howling viciously. Hodor had been trembling, weeping. He remembered faceless figures storming the castle, and fires raging.

The Whoresbane tried to get us out of Last Hearth, he recalled. When the ambush hit them, Hother Umber tried to flee with Bran and the others into the woods while the Crowfood held the attackers off. There were children in that castle.

A shiver went down Bran’s spine as he remembered hearing the dogs barking, and those seven figures chasing after them from the darkness. One of them had pale blue eyes, and a mad smile.

Ramsay Snow. Bran barely recognised him from when he first came to Winterfell in chains. ‘Reek’, he had called himself once. The man had been covered head to toe in blood, clutching a blade like a cleaver, laughing maniacally. The hunters taunted them as they tried to run through the dark forests, hounds barking. Ravens flocking all around him, the direwolf howling…

Bran remembered Summer surrounded by packs of feral dogs. The Umber guards tried to fight, but the Bastard’s Boys had arrows and horses and torches, while they were all on foot. Hother hadn’t backed down for an instant, bellowing for him to run while lunging at Ramsay Snow with a spear and a murderous cry.

Run. That word haunted Bran’s head. They had all been screaming at a crippled boy to run.

Hother tried to stop him, and the Bastard of Bolton cut half the Whorebane’s stomach open while his men charged at the children. Bran couldn’t stop it, it was over too fast. Hodor stumbled in the darkness, tripping over a root. Another man had lunged at Meera with a spear. Bran hadn’t even hesitated; he jumped into the man’s skin, and crushed his presence beneath him. And then everything had gone black.

The man Bran possessed had spasmed and then died quickly, bleeding from his eyes. Bran lost his grip on the world and dropped into the world beyond the green. I killed that man with my mind, and then I blacked out. How long was I out?

His whole body was trembling. His head ached, he could hardly breathe. “What happened?” Bran gasped. “Where’s Jojen? Where’s Hodor, or Mors, or—”

“I don’t know,” Meera said with a gulp. He had never seen her look so frail or pale. “I lost sight of them during the battle.”

“Meera, where are we?”

“I don’t know.” She was whispering. Why is she whispering? “Bran, they took us. It was the Bastard of Bolton.”
Bran’s head was still spinning. There was blood oozing down his forehead. He was in a keep, must be. A stone castle or holdfast. A prison. Above him, he heard voices. Heavy footsteps. Laughter.

The battle. The memories kept on rushing back to him. Bran remembered the battle from a hundred different skins. He had taken the skins of dogs and birds, but it hadn’t been enough to stop the men. He remembered clawing the eyes out of dozen different men, but not even Summer could stop them—

Summer. Where’s Summer? A jolt of panic shot through him.

He reached out to his direwolf in the same way he would grope for his own limb. Summer was part of him. Bran flinched as he felt pain. Scorching and blinding pain.

The direwolf was injured. Bran could feel Summer curled up, whining and hiding in a den under the roots of a gnarly tree. It was snowing, but the air smelled of death. His silver-grey fur was covered in blood, his jaws scratched and bruised. There was an arrow embedded into Summer’s hind leg that he couldn’t remove. Bran had never felt the great wolf so weak, so wounded.

There were corpses littered across the snow. Summer had tried to chase me, Bran realised, but not even a direwolf could match armoured men wielding lances and arrows.

Captives. Prisoners. Somewhere in the distance, the wolf howled and Bran couldn’t even hear it.

“Where are we?” Bran asked again.

“I don’t know. They blindfolded us and galloped us here. A long day’s ride,” Meera whispered. Her chains rattled. “A small keep or holdfast. There are at least two hundred men. Maybe three.”

“Jojen,” he choked. The room felt like it was shaking. “Hodor. What happened to Last Hearth? All of those men, the children—”

“I don’t know. I don’t, Bran, we’ve got to focus, we’ve got to—”

Her voice was quivering. It was all too much. Bran felt his vision blur and blacken again.

When he woke up, he was cold. And hungry. So weak he was shivering. The cell stunk of dried blood. He could see flies buzzing around Hother Umber’s corpse. The fear was so thick he struggled to breathe.

Meera was squirming and trying to escape her iron manacles, but the restraints were so thick and tight it was useless. There were chains around Bran’s ankles too, but he couldn’t even feel them. The manacles were pointless on him; his legs were useless, numb hunks of flesh.

Their prison was a dusty stone box, but the oak door looked old and rotten. The door had even been left ajar, yet that didn’t matter because they were chained to the wall.

Above him, it sounded like a celebration. He heard stomping feet and laughter through the stone floor. That noise scared him more than anything.

Meera hissed some words at Bran, but he could barely hear them. The room felt like a coffin. Hother Umber didn’t stop staring at him, dead-eyed.

The walls were getting tighter, more constricting. He needed to escape. So he did.

Bran forced all the concentration he had and he reached outwards. The world blurred. He felt the presence of a rat who jerked and gasped as Bran squeezed his way into the rat’s skin. The rat skittered through dusty corridors, staring at the world through half-blind rat eyes.

He heard heavy boots stamping through a dusty keep. Bran didn’t recognise it, but the keep was heaving with movement and men. It was a small stone keep with a wooden wall, and his horses in the grounds. This wasn’t a great castle, just a minor one – only a single floor and a cramped stone hall filled with barking dogs and drinking and cheering men.

Then, Bran heard squeals and quiet sobs from the middle of the main hall. Women were crying and men were jeering. The rat skittered beneath the tables, its little heart pounding. Bran felt his whole body tremble in horror.

There were women on top of the main dining table. Six women, all of them stripped naked. Their bodies were beaten, covered in blue and yellow bruises and blood. Some of the girls were begging for help, but the men just laughed.

The rat could only watch from the floor in horror as men dragged the women to the floor and unfastened their breeches. He heard the grunts and squeals. Raping them, Bran realised in utter horror. A hundred men, and they were raping the women in the right middle of the hall while they laughed, jeered or drank. They sacked Last Hearth, and this is how they celebrate.

He heard the girls begging, weeping, for mercy and the sound haunted his soul. The ones who begged were only raped harder. Bran found himself almost grateful for the rat’s poor vision, because it was a sight that scarred his eyes.

‘Worse than Boltons’, Bran had said. I was wrong. Not even monsters could be worse than this.

He even recognised those women. Two of them were serving girls from Last Hearth. One of the older women had been a wife of a petty lord, he suspected. The youngest was barely older than Meera. As Bran watched, the men finally slit the throats of a woman who wouldn’t stop crying. Then, her corpse was given to another man to be raped again. All the while, they didn’t stop jeering, drinking or taking turns.

Bran couldn’t watch anymore. He fell back to his own skin. His eyes were wide and bloodshot. He felt sick rise up his throat from the memory. He couldn’t stop trembling. He could still hear the jeering from above, and now he knew what they were jeering at.

These are the Bastard’s Boys, he realised. The worst killers and murderers in the north. The monsters in human skin that had sacked Hornwood, sacked Winterfell, and sacked Last Hearth.

I heard what happened to Lady Hornwood. The memory of Ramsay Snow’s laughter haunted his mind.

He could see Meera’s wide eyes. “We must escape, Bran,” she hissed. She did not stop scraping against her manacles and the mortar with her bare fingers. Her ankles were scraped from where she struggled against the iron bracelets.

Every hour felt torturous. It was like he was counting every heartbeat. He struggled to breathe, struggled to think.

“They’ll come for us,” Meera kept on saying. “They will, they’ll come for us… We will escape and they’ll come for us.”

Nobody came for Lady Hornwood. She had to eat her own fingers. Bran stared at his hands.
I am not trapped. I am a skinchanger. I am the winged wolf. I have killed men with my powers and I can do it again. That thought was the only one that gave him strength.

It was nightfall when he heard men coming down the steps towards him. Five figures. He recognised the man at the front instantly. It is him, Ramsay Snow. Twice now he has razed a castle and slaughtered innocents to get to me.

Ramsay was an ugly young man, wearing a black leather jerkin over a pink velvet doublet slashed with dark red satin, along with black boots, belt, and scabbard. He was big boned and slope shouldered, with a fleshiness like he would be fat later in life. Ramsay's skin was pink and blotchy, his nose broad, his hair long and dark and dry. Although his mouth is small, Ramsay's lips were wide and meaty, wormy looking, and he smiled a wet-lipped smile.

"Brandon Stark," the Bastard of the Dreadfort laughed. "Oh, how we meet again. I believe we haven't been introduced properly: I am Ramsay Bolton, Lord of Winterfell, Lord of Hornwood. You will address me as Lord Bolton."

Bran didn’t reply. He was too busy trembling with fear and rage. "I must admit, for a boy with no legs you can run," Ramsay chuckled. "I had been sure that, after Theon and the miller’s boys, you would end up dead in a forest somewhere. But instead you made it to Last Hearth. Where you conspired to steal my title. For shame, Brandon. For shame."

There were sniggers. Meera was coiled, pressed up against the wall as far as her chains would allow, like she was readying herself for an attack. I could attack. I am winged wolf. I could kill him. But I can only kill one of them. Will the others kill me and Meera as soon as he fell?

"The little prince," a man besides him snorted. "Not anymore," Ramsay’s voice sound cheerful. "I am the Lord of Winterfell now, Brandon. We are goodbrothers, are we not? Your sister Arya is so sweet."

Arya. Arya.

Maybe he was waiting for response. Bran was curled up on the floor and quivering too badly to give him one. Ramsay Snow stepped forward, with that eerie smile and pale eyes.

"Those people at Last Hearth? They died because of you. Brandon Stark. Just like the miller’s children did. Those at Winterfell? The Umbers? Jojen Reed, your dumb stable boy, your little wolf? They’re all dead and it’s all your fault."

"No," Meera growled. Tears in her eyes. "You lie. You lie. Jojen can’t be…"

Ramsay just laughed, but his attention was all on Bran. I could kill him. I could kill him… "I want you to remember that, Bran. I want you to remember just how many people die because of you."

Bran’s eyes flickered towards Meera. Ramsay’s grin widened. A predator sensing weakness.

"So I’m going to leave this old man’s body in here with you, Brandon, just you know exactly what your defiance costs," Ramsay continued, with an idle kick at Hother Umber. "Oh, today is going to be a good day, I think."

“What do we do with him?” A man with yellow teeth grinned. “Another hunt?”
“Hunting a cripple? Now where’s the sport in that?” Ramsay chuckled, pacing. “No, Brandon Stark, you are valuable to me. King’s Landing wants you to hold over my father’s head. My father wants you to hold over my head. You might be my replacement, should I step out of line. After all, you have a better claim to Winterfell than me, don’t you? A little crippled puppet to replace a ‘rabid’ dog.” His lips pulled back to reveal teeth, but it couldn’t be called a smile. “No, I will not let that happen. I will not let my lord father get his claws on you either. I wouldn’t kill you, Brandon, I would never kill you. But maybe I’ll cut off your face so nobody will ever recognise who you are?”

The men were laughing. They were towering figures, all big and armed, and Bran was just a curled shape on the ground. “But until then,” Ramsay mused, sucking his lips. “I need you alive and looking like a Stark. You’re my game piece now, Brandon. You are the perfect bait. Bait enough to catch a dragon, I think.”

What is he talking about? Ramsay was looking at him almost hungrily. Finally, Bran trembled and raised his voice. “Are… are you taking me to Winterfell?”

“So he speaks. Joy,” Ramsay laughed. “But no, not just yet. Nobody knows where you are, and I mean to keep it that way. Let my lord father fret a little bit – nobody will be speaking of you. Isn’t that right, Alyn? Luton? Skinner?”

The thugs nodded. “Oh aye.”

“Aye,” another agreed. “Keep your tongue or lose it, like you always say, m’lord.”

“Oh yes.” Ramsay kneeled down in front of Bran, his face barely metres away. Bran averted his eyes. “I know what you thinking, Bran. You’re thinking that you have me at a disadvantage because, well, I can’t hurt you for fear of killing or mutilating you. You think that I need you whole, and, hmm, you’re right actually. I do.” There was that grin again, worming over his cheeks. “But that’s why she is here with you. So here’s the deal Bran; if you disobey, I take it out on her. If you object, if you cause trouble, then your little girlfriend suffers for it.”

“You fiend…!” Meera snapped. Ramsay only laughed, while one of his thugs kicked Meera in the stomach. Bran screamed.

“They’ll rape her, Bran,” Ramsay laughed. He sounded cheerful. “Every one of my boys will happen have a go. Have you seen what it looks like after a girl’s been raped by a hundred men half a dozen times each? I doubt you’ll even be able to recognise her by the end of it. I could take you upstairs to show you a few examples of what it does to a girl, if you want?”

He’s a monster. They’re all monsters. Bran was struggling to breathe.

“So be good, Bran,” Ramsay said, still chuckling. He was towering over a crippled ten year old boy, and laughing about torturing him. “I’ll be back soon enough, and I’m sure we’ll have more time to get to know each other. Now is there anything you want to say to me? I want to hear you address me as Lord Ramsay Bolton.”

His voice quivered. “You’re a bastard,” Bran muttered, still staring downwards. “That’s all you are, just a bastard.”

The cold blue eyes flickered, and then a cruel smile spread over Ramsay's face. There was no immediate reaction, he just stood up. Then, Ramsay raised his foot and brought his boot down upon Bran’s ankle. Slowly.
Meera shouted. There was a crack of bone as Bran’s foot crunched. The boy stared, but didn’t even flinch. He couldn’t feel a thing from his legs.

For a second, Ramsay seemed confused. “Hmm, how strange,” the bastard mused. “It’s not as satisfying if they don’t feel it.”

With that, Ramsay turned and walked away. Bran looked at his crumpled foot, like it belonged to someone else. His ankle bent out of shape.

They were walking away. Bran’s heart didn’t stop racing. The other men left the room, sniggering. What would happen if I took his body now? I am a winged wolf. I could kill him, all I need to do is fly…

Barely even thinking about it, Bran extended his mind. He opened his third eye and he focused on Ramsay Snow, he focused his power and he extended himself out of his skin…

Bran gasped, flinching hard. His head burned. He felt rage. Hate, so much hate. His warg recoiled as if slashed.

The footsteps stopped halfway up the stairs. He heard Ramsay break step slightly, momentarily dazed, but Bran was left gasping for air. “Lord Ramsay,” a faint voice called. “You alright?”

In the cell, Meera hissed. “Bran!” Chains rattled as she tried to reach him. “Bran! What happened?”

“It’s him,” Bran choked, staring wide eyed at where Ramsay left. “There was so much hate.” I’ve never even imagined anyone with that much pure hate in them. As if hate was the only thing Ramsay Snow could feel.

Meera didn’t seem to know how to reply. Ramsay must have shrugged off whatever it was that caused him to stumble slightly, and Bran heard the door to the dungeons close. He’s gone, Bran thought. I lost my chance to take his skin. I’m not even sure if I want to.

Bran was shivering in the cold and the fear. Men can only be brave when they are scared. I must be brave.

“You can skinchange,” Meera whispered, when she was sure no one was around. “Take Summer’s skin. Go get help.”

“How?” Bran murmured. It felt wrong to even raise his voice. As if Hother Umber was only sleeping next to them. “And from who?”

She didn't reply. Meera looked scared, more scared than he had ever seen her.

She's the trapped one now, Bran thought. She's trapped in this cell, but I can fly through the animals and birds. My powers are the only advantage we have.

They went another day without being fed. Meera’s fingers and ankles were bloody from struggling against her manacles.

The next morning, Bran heard orders being given, and felt men preparing supplies for a march. The ears of rats and birds couldn’t make out any words, but he felt the activity. The Bastard’s Boys were moving out. Ramsay left very early morning with his hounds and most of his men, heading north.
One hundred men were left garrisoned in the keep behind them. They sealed the portcullis and barred the gate after the other Bastard’s Boys left.

The Bastard of Bolton must have a plan. He attacked Last Hearth to stop me from being traded to his father. But why would he leave in such a hurry? Bran spent some time thinking about it and couldn’t reach any conclusion. He means to ransom me, but ransom me to who?

“They’ve left,” Meera muttered, after Bran relayed the news. In the gloom of the cell, there was no day or night. It was so dark he could only just see the bruises on her faces.

“Half of them have,” Bran explained. “The other half seem to be locking themselves down tight.”

“Where are we? Where’s the nearest help?”

“I don’t know. I can see crags and ironwood trees nearby. There’s a forest outside, and it’s cold. It’s a small stone keep with wooden walls. It looks old, decrepit, very recently occupied. I think we must be towards the mountains – maybe this keep used to belong to one of the small mountain clans – but the area seems isolated.”

“He’s hiding us here,” she said breathlessly. “He doesn't want anyone to know about you.”

Bran nodded. His stomach rumbled hungrily. “But that means there can't be any reinforcements around,” Meera insisted. “And you can control animals. Could you chase these men away, just like you did with the wildlings at the Nightfort?”

The boy bit his lip. “Maybe I could. If I could skinchange into enough of them. I could control ravens or crows, rats, maybe some wolves if I can reach them. There are horses in the courtyard I could maybe take too…”

