At first, she attributes it to being unused to car travel after several years of teleporting and walking everywhere. She can't recall much by way of motion sickness during the escape from New York City, but it can develop over a lifespan, surely. She sips cold tea from her thermos to settle her stomach, cranks back the seat of the rental car so she can watch the ceiling rather than the road, and meditates to herself for internal balance. Her mental reconstruction of her mind is almost complete and self-sustaining, but her defenses require continuous maintenance.

But as Kanaya roars under the pale green road sign that announces they have reached Chicago, Rose's throat chokes up. For a panicked moment, Rose thinks she's about to throw up while lying down, and she shoves herself upright while her throat convulses, yanking at her seat belt to lean forward. The noise she makes is most undignified. "Rose?!" Kanaya says, alarmed. The car slows, but the rocking of the deceleration still churns Rose's stomach. "Rose, what is wrong?"

"Kanaya, stop the car now," she begs, swallowing between every other word. Her mouth is dry, and as Kanaya veers across three lanes of traffic to reach the highway exit, Rose rolls down the window in the event of total disaster. The blare of multiple irate cars honking at their antics accompanies them as they fly down the ramp and into the parking lot of the nearest gas station. Kanaya does not bother to park in a spot - Rose shoves the passenger side door open with her shoulder and stumbles out right as the vehicle screeches to a stop feet from the station door.

Her stomach flips and sloshes as Rose tears through the aisles, utilizing all the focus she can spare to guide her way straight to the facilities, but even as she ducks around a woman and her child with an inaudible 'pardon me' she can tell, with the sense of imminent foreboding that always hits when your luck has run out, that she's not going to make it.

Blast. Rose stoops over a foot from the first stall and feels her whole body spasm. Another inconceivable noise horks its way out of her throat as salt and bile flood her mouth and she foolishly attempts to swallow it back again. This is clearly a horrible mistake and not one she will repeat in the near future, because the taste only sends her gag reflex out of control. At last, instinct honed by several months of alcoholic binges reasserts itself, and Rose tosses aside the last scraps of her dignity in favor of getting her head over the toilet and

After New York, vomiting up leftover corruption with her then-unknown elder brother-father at her back, Rose had been too emotionally blasted and hollowed out to properly appreciate the unique humiliation and lack of control inherent in throwing up. She had, after all, just suffered a much more in depth violation of her free agency. Anything else had paled in comparison.

But right now, emptying her stomach of tea that stinks of the sea, she is exquisitely aware that on the list of experiences she would have preferred to never endure in her lifetime, this quite trumps the previous heavy weight contender of vomiting alone in her mother's disused bathroom as Haydn's Creation oratorio waxes eloquent in German in the background, with a new martini just waiting for her beside the sink when she's quite finished. Mostly because a few seconds after the first wave of dry heaves subsides, Kanaya rips the door off its hinges and strides in, and witnesses Rose's next wrenching gasp of spit and salt water. "What can I do?" she asks, because Kanaya does not mince words in the middle of emergency situations. Not that this is an emergency. Not at all. This is in no way, shape, or form, an emergency. Rose knows an emergency when she sees one and clearly her new penchant for vomiting spontaneous saltwater is something else entirely. Anything but an emergency.

"A fresh bottle of water would be most appreciated when this has passed," Rose says, wincing as she waits for another twist in her stomach to pass, tucking her hair behind her ears and out of her face. "And a shot of tomato juice. But I don't know that I would trust anything of that nature that a place like this could offer, really."

Kanaya looks Rose up and down, and folds her arms. "Rose."

"I - am fine," she groans. She wants to rest her head against something, but she's not touching the toilet seat for love or money. At least she doesn't have the headache that would have accompanied this moment if it had been the result of a spectacular hangover. "If this were serious, it wouldn't just be water. The gas station plumbing would never be the same again."

"That is the exact opposite of reassuring," Kanaya says snippily. "I could detect no trace scent of that saltwater on you before. You would have had to have imbibed a quart of it, from what I can see. Where did it come from if not from some influence of the grimlight? We should have known it was too much of a risk -"
"You want my honest opinion? I have no idea," Rose interrupts, kneading her forehead. The last of the heaves seem to have passed, and her stomach feels peculiarly, achingly hollow from the wracking muscle spasms. "Allow me a moment of contemplation, but I have been meditating all the way here. My defenses are quite in order. It must be something else." Her arm bracers clank against the side of the toilet as she reaches up to flush the vomit away.

"I will return posthaste. Do not move," Kanaya says with steel in her voice, and she strides away, her high heels clicking out the door. Rose closes her eyes and reaches down to pull her phone from her pocket, trying not to swallow as she rests her head on her hand and texts John. She must not lose sight of herself.

TT: As promised, I am keeping you up to date on recent events.
TT: I have begun to vomit sea water. This is obviously a terrible sign, and yet one I am not familiar with, and thus may or may not be related to certain grim events half a continent away.
TT: Upon further inspection, the stalls of gas stations outside Chicago offer an absolutely intriguing assortment of unique mold growths.
TT: Perhaps I missed my secret life's calling as a mycologist. The world may never know.

Keeping John abreast of all recent developments has proven to be a surprising source of relief. Rose has never been the most unguarded, candid of people - she prefers to listen to the troubles of others than deal with her own issues, let alone obtain an outside perspective on them. Obviously, this is no longer a viable way to handle herself, and this new alternative has not been...unpleasant. And now if something untoward does happen to her, there will be someone in the world who has a definitely timeline of the symptoms that preceded it. Everybody wins.

Problem?

Rose thumbs out of the Pesterchum window so quickly she nearly jabs her thumbnail through the screen. The click of heels striding over the threshold and past the broken down door echo as Rose turns the phone off and slides it back into her pocket, heart thumping. "You may wish to contact your Captor," Rose says, her voice hoarse. "Whatever software defenses he installed into my phone's messaging application, it has lost its efficacy against the white-text individual."

"Damn and blast," Kanaya murmurs, sweeping into the stall and bending to pass an uncapped bottle of water to Rose. "He will be irate to hear it."

Rose takes the water and swills her first sip around her mouth before spitting it out to get the taste of salt and bile out of her system. "Oh dear. How ever will his constitution hold up under all this stress?" she deadpans.

"Sarcasm is laborious, Rose. I do not know how you manage to maintain it all the time." Kanaya quiets, and fabric rustles beside Rose until she looks up from her water. Kanaya is elegance incarnate, her skirt dipping into a puddle of something unmentionable on the floor, and Rose has never felt more lacking. "Rose. Why did this happen?

"I can only speculate," she cautions, resting her head against the side of the stall. "I can hear nothing but my own voice, and my shield over the link to my particular brand of Horrorterror is in place, but..." She stops. "Oh, damn. I didn't even think to check .."

"What?"

"Not me," Rose activates her sight and stares at the air around her. Light overlays everything, and she examines the auras and energy around her. It takes a moment for her focus to adjust itself, so that she is not seeing precise details, but the general haze of magic around her. Kanaya gleams quietly with passive magic, which may or may not be related to her rainbow-drinker status - Rose has not been given permission to pry into it - and Rose can make out the edge of her own aura, golden and flickering as she emotionally recovers from the stress of vomiting.

But when she looks across Kanaya's shoulder, toward the wall, she spies it. There is a minute amount of magic in everything of course, and the air itself tends to hum with blue when Rose bothers to look at all. But now there is a faint, pale film, and when Rose tracks her gaze across the wall, there is a sluggish delay before her Sight catches up with her sight. "Of course. Ambient interference."

"I have absolutely no idea what that means." Kanaya's brow furrows.

"Magic is tricky, or anyone could manage it," Rose decides she is quite finished throwing up, and braces herself on the wall to rise to her feet. Kanaya stays close as she walks to the sink to scrub at her face. "Most of the power has to come from within oneself, but one must also be aware of external majjyl influences. One person's spell can easily upset the pattern of another's. That's why practicing magicians and the like, as rare as we are, tend not to cluster together. It's not unlike static interference between two stations on a radio. The stronger a person's majjyks, the more they can disrupt the spells of those around them."

She pauses to splash water on her face, feeling her lipstick run a little down her chin as she wipes carelessly at her mouth, and Kanaya must take the moment to follow Rose's train of logic, her face creased and thoughtful in the reflection. "How strong are grimlight creatures?" Kanaya asks at last, arching an eyebrow.

Rose nods approvingly, seeing that they are on the same track. "Strong enough, apparently, that the interference can reach magic-users from this distance. My powers are starting to be agitated by the summoned creature's aura, and will no doubt produce more interesting side effects the closer we get to the source. I should have anticipated this sooner."

"The creature in the Ukraine -" Kanaya begins, but Rose knows where she's going.

"Was an ocean and all of Europe away from me. Quite far enough that I never noticed side effects." Rose tears a paper towel off the roll and roughly wipes away the last of her lipstick. It's pointless to keep up appearances at this point, anyway. "But you couldn't have found a vedma in a hundred mile radius of the Staraya or Novaya Ukraine if you paid them. And in New York, I was the source of the interference."

Kanaya bites her lip with too-sharp teeth, the yellows of her eyes glittering a little too brightly for regular troll eyes in the terrible lighting. "I think I need blood," she says abruptly, her voice taut, and she touches Rose's elbow. "Do not feel obligated to leave the restroom if you believe a repeat event may be imminent, but I need to return to the vehicle or I will start nibbling on the unfortunate cashier."

"No, go," Rose says, smiling. "I'll join you shortly. I think this particular interference event has passed." She presses her hand to her forehead and tears another sheet of paper towel off the roll to dab at a fresh stain on her skirt. Now that she has drawn her attention to it, the frisson of interference in the air overlays her Sight like the head rush from standing up too quickly, and she sighs. If she wants to prevent another fit like that, she may well have to start policing her own aura, keeping her majjyks tightly bound to her skin to prevent it from crackling against the grimlight oozing through the air. Just another burden she needs to keep balanced, on top of everything else.

Kanaya is chugging from a suspect thermos when Rose exits the station, her throat exposed and with each swallow as Rose opens the door and settles herself in the passenger’s seat. At any other time, Rose would have been highly tempted to lean over and lick a path up the curve of Kanaya's neck, but right now her breath stinks of bile and cheap gum, and she feels like she just biked a three kilometer race. In comparison, when Kanaya takes her mouth away from the insulated flask of blood a blot of deep blue smears rakishly up along her left cheek, and Rose can only be suitably impressed by the fact that Kanaya can pull off anything, even blood streaks. Kanaya shakes her head when Rose goes to buckle in, though. "Go to the back and lie down, Rose."

"That's not necessary. I'm fine," Rose protests, pursing her lips.

"Regardless," Kanaya says with infinite patience. "You should rest. If you have recovered sufficiently by the time we arrive at our destination, we will see about confronting the Scourge and Justice tonight."

Rose's spine stiffens like a rod of iron has replaced the bones and nerves out of a growing sense of outrage. "I have recovered," she says, which is mostly not a lie. The shock of vomiting has faded, and there is only a lingering ache that will be quite easily remedied with tea and a light meal.

"I remain very tempted to turn this car around and drive you back to the East Coast," Kanaya threatens, mild and sweet and with steel under every word. "You forget, Rose, that you trust me not only with your own safety but with that of everyone around you. What if something else occurs that you fail to anticipate?"

"You are not my keeper, Kanaya," Rose snaps, feeling her temper fray.

Kanaya stares her down. "Must I be? May I not simply be terrified that my lover could be lost to powers beyond my comprehension because neither of us are able to anticipate the warning signs? Should I see you suffer, or others suffer, because of it?"

This is how she and Kanaya are unnervingly similar, Rose thinks, snapping the seat belt off and sliding into the back of the car, next to a duffle bag full of their miscellaneous road trip snacks and supplies. They are both right at the most infuriating moments, and win arguments over the most irritating things. Sometimes, when that skill is turned against her with Kanaya's utter surety, Rose doesn't know how John puts up with her. "I wish it stated for the record that I do so under extreme protest," she drawls, waving her fingers at Kanaya in the rear view mirror superciliously.

"It is thus noted. For the record," Kanaya replies, a hint of a grin tugging at her lip, and Rose settles back as the car starts, unable to keep up the effort needed to stay angry in the fact of Kanaya being so very Kanaya. "Rose?"

"Mm?" Rose murmurs. Her eyes slide shut as she begins to tuck in the lazy edges of her magical aura.

"Why do they affect you so? The one in the Ukraine had to be summoned into this mortal plane. Why can they reach out to you so easily without such prior measures?"

Rose's jaw clamps shut, and she takes a long moment to think her words through before it unlocks. Because isn't that the million dollar question? "They don't always need to be summoned, in my experience; sometimes they are just...always there," Rose says at last, swinging her legs up on the seat next to her. "They have always been in my mind, whether I invited them in or no. Whether my infant brain was capable of inadvertently recreating a summoning ritual and producing the necessary sacrificial ingredients remains up for debate, but I'm sure I was a resourceful tot. My mother could or would never explain it to me, and none of the resources and libraries I have perused have ever been able to explain the kind of link I possess to the Furthest Ring."
Kanaya sighs. "Sometimes it seems like everything should be impossible ends up at our doorstep, in one way or another," she says.

Rose rolls her eyes, and rests her head on the duffle bag. Immediately she bangs her head against something smooth, hard, and round, and she lifts her head with a frown. She does not know what makes her look inside the bag, rather than simply setting it on the floor of the car, but she does. She lays hands on the lump and withdraws it from the bag before settling down again, this time without further discomfort. The round object is a white cue ball, a little larger than normal, that rests heavy in Rose's palm. She turns the smooth white orb over and over in the palm of her hand, and narrows her eyes at it. In the back of her mind, Rose can vaguely recall seeing the artefact before, sitting on a shelf in the corner of Kanaya's apartment, but she had dismissed it earlier as a trinket. Now, though…

Now she senses - not power. Not outright power, anyway. But a kind of untapped potential. Like a rock balanced at the brink of a cliff, or a spell whose words dance on the tip of one's tongue. She felt a similar potential in her old needlekind specibus, through which she could channel more precise spells, before it had been...well. Rose smooths a thumb over the cue ball, and considers how she might tap such an interesting new instrument of foresight. Perhaps this will be how she occupies her time on the road trip to Seattle.

Assuming, of course, that they survive a night against two of the most violent anti-heroes in America.

She doesn't think to wonder how Kanaya came to acquire such an object, or how it came to be accidentally thrown in with the rest of their hastily packed belongings. She fails to mention the cue ball to the troll at all. Instead, she tucks it against her side, curls around it, and falls into a peaceful doze.

In the fading evening light, the cue ball gleams a brilliant bone white, and reflects none of the reds and pinks of the tinted sunset. It sparks with neon green for a brief moment, but Rose's eyes have fallen shut, and no one else in the car would be able to see through its white shell to the vision within.

Finding the Indigo Scourge and Blind Justice is not a difficult task. The signs of their ongoing rivalry are carved into every major building in the downtown area, by now, and the local Legislaceration task force has barricaded off entire streets in the downtown area in an effort to prevent people from entering the main danger zone. Kanaya had tried and failed to properly research the two anti-heroes and their identities on the Internet at some point, but the printed out paper copies of the research that she gives to Rose are riddled with s's replaced by 2's and doubled i's, the mark of a very different quirk that Rose strongly suspects belongs to one Sollux Captor, the hacker Kanaya tends to turn to when it comes to matters of technological prowess. She doubts Kanaya would have been able to obtain the two women's Pesterchum handles without his assistance.

Now, of course, the point is moot. Both the Scourge and Justice's identities have become headlines thanks to the efforts of the Chicago branch of the Bureau of Legislaceration. One Vriska Serket, coffee shop barista, was outed as the Indigo Scourge the night before all hell broke loose. Since then the prominent absence of Neophyte Terezi Pyrope, fledgling Lacerator, from the ongoing investigation has made it quite evident why Blind Justice chose to pattern her uniform in the style of a classic Legislacerator costume. But even with an entire city's police and Bureau force hell-bent on their capture, the two are more caught up in outdoing one another than they are in dealing with the consequences of their actions.

"I am informing you right now that if, perchance, we were to meet Profiler Will Graham during the course of the night, I am required by my calling as a psychologist in training to obtain his autograph in my copy of The Dynamics of Abnormal Psychology, come hell or high water," Rose informs Kanaya while they are changing into their costumes. "That troll is a legend."

Kanaya loses the ensuing staring contest. "If you must," she sighs, lacing up her boots. "If you attempt to fit that ponderous tome into any of the pockets in that jacket, however, I will never design you a costume with pockets again. Ever."

Rose lays down a spell in chalk sigils on the surface of the bedside table and sets the textbook in question in the exact center. "I can teleport it in if the opportune moment arises. My jacket shall live to see battle another day."

"See that it does," Kanaya replies. She is sitting on the hotel bed, situated at the perfect height to reach over and begin critically tugging on the high-low fall of Rose's skirt. "This is still not hanging correctly. I should have stuck with only the shorts, and not combined the two. But the silhouette of a skirt suits you so much better…"

"In the midst of a fray, I doubt anyone will notice," Rose assures her, zipping up the Kevlar vest layer and closing the jacket over top of it. "Now, help me with this mask."

Kanaya rises, the thick soles of her boots giving her an extra inch over Rose that is truly unnecessary, and assists Rose in securing the three-quarters face mask. She fluffs Rose's hair out from under the straps as the mask settles heavy on the bridge of Rose's nose, conforming to the shape of her face in pale gold. Only her eyes and her mouth and chin are exposed.

"And our battle plan?" she thinks to ask once they've reached the top floor of the hotel (through the gratuitous use of powers for the less than legal purpose of bypassing a locked emergency exit door). "I understand that you wish to auspice the two of them, but if they resist your grey charms?"

Kanaya as the Malachite Sylph cracks her neck from side to side, looking out over the night sky with her nostrils flaring, as though trying to scent the blood of her two wayward grey prospects from this distance. The sirens wailing to the north set Seer's teeth on edge. "I will handle the Scourge," she says, tapping a claw to one of the makeupkind strapped to her leg. "She has far less inhibition than Blind Justice, and is far more likely to resort to extreme violence or maneuver bystanders into harm's way in order to achieve her goals. As a rainbow-drinker, it will be far more difficult for her to extract concessions by trying to harm me physically, as I cannot be killed by ordinary means." Sylph adjusts her gloves and smiles with a sharp edge. "In addition, she will respond best, I think, to a more...violent means of pacification. Justice may listen to you; if you pose a rational argument that appeals to her sense of justice, she may snap out of it."

Seer looks up at the Sylph's feral not-grin and furrowed brow, and cannot help herself. She steps in front of the other hero, twines a gloved hand in her short hair, and pulls her down for a kiss, tasting the raw edge of exasperation that still seethes in Kanaya's aura at thoughts of both Justice and Scourge. Auspisticism may be the more conciliatory of the obsidian quadrants, but Kanaya in her auspicing element is damn sexy. Rose licks far enough into Kanaya's mouth that neither of them are wearing lipstick by the time she pulls away; most of it smears right off onto Rose's inconvenient mask. Sylph sighs at Rose's waggling eyebrows, barely visible above the edge of her mask but still getting the message across. "Put those back down at once," she orders halfheartedly, and she pulls out a facial towelette - because even as Sylph Kanaya would never be caught dead unprepared to touch up her appearance at a moment's notice - to wipe the makeup off and restore Seer's look.

"They cannot be tamed." Seer presses a hand to her chest and heaves a dramatic sigh. "These eyebrows. They must be free to rise and fall at their leisure."
"Your brother is an abysmal influence on you," Sylph says, reapplying her lipstick with a weaponized strife specibus. "I wish you luck. I have seen the Strider eyebrows. They are...frightening. What if you should develop similarly magnificent appendages under their guidance?"

Rose shudders inwardly. On Dave's face, the eyebrows work. She doesn't want to even contemplate the idea of her own spontaneously doubling in breadth. "We do not joke about such things, Sylph," she says primly. She offers the troll hero her arm, and Sylph accepts it. "Straight into the middle of the fray, you think? Trying to run past all those well-meaning Lacerators would be much more trouble than it's worth."

"I couldn't agree more," Sylph says. "Let us engage in the highly coveted, incredibly perilous 2X2 Showdown Combo."

The last thing she adds, before Seer raises her hand and teleports them into the center of downtown, is, "Sollux would be delighted."

After that, of course, they have effectively teleported into a miniature war zone, and they stop talking in order to deal with the shenanigans at hand. Seer and Sylph planned out their arrival on a map ahead of time, based on Seer's sense of which position would lead to the most fortuitous outcome. They teleport to the corner of State Street and Madison, just inside an unmanned barricade the T.J. Maxx on their right riddled with pockmarks from minor explosions. Even with all the shouting and small fires clamoring for her attention, Seer can detect the absurd scent of Dunkin' Donuts emanating through the smoky night air. A wide-horned troll ducks out of the Sears on the left with something tucked under his arm; he glances at Sylph and Seer and yelps, dropping the box and racing away down the street. It would seem that in the light of both of Chicago's local anti-heroes' declining into black rivalry, looters have come out to play.

Seer opens up her Sight and hones in on the two vortexes of light duking it out a few streets away. She is thrown a little when she realizes that while the aura she would associate with Blind Justice is the teal she expected, though a lighter shade than normal, the blaze of light that marks the Indigo Scourge is nothing like the troll's hemotype. It's not a definite rule, of course - trolls and humans alike can range anywhere from generic white light to hot neon pink in her Sight (though she would definitely take the latter as a sign of something gone horribly awry), but trolls trend toward auras within a few shades of their blood color. It is a matter of how they perceive and think of themselves.

The Scourge burns like a golden star. It's as far from any shade of blue as one could possibly imagine. Seer shakes her head to clear it, and nods in response to the Sylph's questioning look. Sylph whirls and darts into the shadows along the right side of the street while Seer takes the left, and together they both run up the street until they reach the site of the main conflict. A group of teal-and-red Legislacerators retreat down the center of the road but pay the two heroes no heed, too caught up in carting the body of a troll in full Lacerator uniform to safety. They leave a trail of olive blood behind them.

There is a new line of defense set up near the Macy's and Seer snaps her fingers, activating the spell to direct light away from her body and conceal herself from their sight. She ducks under the police tape and strides past the battered vehicles and shouting law enforcement without pause. Sylph has her own methods of sneaking through the line. At the intersection of State and Washington now, Seer can see the smoking remains of one of the Great Clocks mounted on the side of the Macy's building, a pale turquoise, cast bronze structure with a smoking hole where the clock face used to be.

Ah, and there they are, she thinks, swiveling to face the right. Oblivious to anything but each other, a troll in a sharp red jacket and teal catsuit squares off against another in black and blue. Justice has her red blindfold and teal green hood in place, but her trademark red cravat has vanished, and her skirt is in tatters. The Scourge's appearance, however, has deteriorated even further: her pirate coat is gone, leaving her in only a Kevlar vest patterned with a vast spider web. Her dark blue neoprene suit is armless, but while the one arm is bared to expose a white-ink sleeve of a web tattoo, the other is encased in a metal gauntlet. Even her mask has been stripped away to reveal a livid snarl and an aquiline nose.

Seer jolts when she realizes that the tattoo around Scourge's mutated left eye is the same sun symbol that adorns Seer's back. It would never have been visible before, given Scourge's tendency toward full-face masks; not even fan works on the Internet have ever had a clear idea of what the cerulean-blooded hero looked like under her heavy garb, though they're no doubt getting an eyeful now.

But...why? How long has Scourge - or at least, Vriska Serket, the troll behind the mask - possessed a tattoo of a symbol made famous by Seer's appropriation? Who used it first? Seer doesn't know whether to be flattered or concerned.

"Hey! This is a restricted area! What are you doing?" someone screams from behind Seer, though she doubts it's aimed at her. Her eyes flicker to Sylph instead, who has emerged from the shadows, radiating a faint light even with her pale grey makeup on as she gazes down the street at Justice and Scourge.

"Auspicizing," Sylph calls back, her voice carrying in the dry air, and then she stalks toward the two anti-heroes with both fists clenched. Seer hangs back, still invisible, maintaining a discreet distance at all times. If and when Sylph makes the call that her formal auspicism has failed, then Seer will join the fray. Until then, she will watch and wait.

And, she thinks, smirking, she will keep the Legislacerators from intervening. Seer raises her other hand and casts a more general light deflection spell, so that all of the police starting to approach Sylph become disoriented, unable to see anything in the heroes' general vicinity.

Amazingly, Blind Justice and Indigo Scourge fail to notice Sylph's ominous advance. And that's the main issue with their blackrom, Seer realizes. No concupiscent relationship should be flaunted like this in such a public setting, but the fact that it's a black rivalry only spells terror and destruction for Chicago. In their nonstop duel to one-up and outdo each other, both combatants have lost sight of anything but themselves. A rivalry like this is too volatile and unrestrained for heroes to engage in. But they have, and thus, for the sake of everyone around them, auspicism into the grey quadrant or a full-on forced breakup may be the only chance for the two heroes to come to their senses.

For Kanaya's sake, Seer hopes the former works out. Kanaya's conciliatory irritation toward the two is on a whole new level from her usual tendency to play auspice between criminals and the world, and if the troll gets her clubs broken over this, Seer will show them no mercy.

"Blind Justice! Indigo Scourge!" Sylph shouts sternly, placing her claws on her hips as she draws within a few yards of the two. "Desist at once!"

They continue to ignore her. Scourge levels the gauntlet at Justice's face and slams her fist down on the mechanized arm. There is a notable delay before it fires off a stun grenade. Justice dodges with ease, cartwheeling out of the way with her canekind splayed out against the ground. "You have to be quicker than that, Scourge!" the tealblood taunts, her teeth bared in a laughing smirk. "Or are you getting tired?"

"You wish!" Scourge stamps her foot, banging on the gauntlet eight times, thoroughly incensed. "Agaaggggh, this piece of shit!"
"You are being foolish and wantonly destructive, and it will stop," Sylph continues, "right now. Your relationship is injurious for everyone around you."

"Maybe if you hadn't pissed off your mechanic and then tried to fix it yourself!" Justice cackles, leaning both hands on her cane. When Scourge screeches in fury and lunges at her, the nimble tealblood sidles out of the way, whacking Scourge's shins with her cane. "I can't even see and you can't keep up! Do I detect a whiff of defeat in the air?"

"You smell my dice in your face!" Scourge raises her bare hand with only four dice tucked between her fingers and tosses them over her shoulder before Justice can whip her canekind around for another blow at Scourge's back. Somehow, she gets in a lucky shot, and one of the dice smacks against Justice's left arm, shocking the troll with a jolt of electricity.

"That. Is. Enough!" Sylph explodes. She stomps forward and seizes both heroes by the back of their suits, lifts them bodily into the air with an infuriated hiss, and knocks their heads together. Repeatedly. Seer looks on, raising an eyebrow, before putting out a hand to gently guide a wayward Lacerator back toward the barricade. When she looks back, Sylph is head-butting both trolls at once with her teeth bared. She then gives them one last brisk shake and dumps them on the ground. Both Justice and Scourge land on their posteriors, their heads tilted back to gaze (or smell) Sylph's towering form in confusion.

Well, at least they've snapped out of their blind rage. But now they have focused on Sylph; Seer circles around closer, still keeping a little distance between herself and the ongoing auspicism, but close enough that if the two rivals should choose to gang up on Sylph, she'll be in position to assist. "This black fling is at an end. You will listen to my counsel and settle into a more stable quadrant, or so help me I will help the police arrest you myself," Sylph hisses, cracking her knuckles. "You two are acting like wrigglers."

Scourge recovers first. "Oh, you're kidding!" the ceruleanblood spits, slapping her face with her palm. "You actually came?!! Such a meddler!"

"I encourage you to look at your surroundings and pay attention to what chaos you've managed to unleash on this city," Sylph replies, folding her arms. "Your identities are no longer a secret, and this entire square block is in flames! I would ask what you were thinking, but I believe it is quite clear that you were not thinking at all!"

"I'm trying to stop her!" Justice protests, leveling her cane at Scourge. "She's gotten completely out of hand."

"So have you!" Sylph says, exasperated. "You are both equally responsible for this!"

"You're over-exaggerating, as usual," Scourge says, getting to her feet and backing away. She rubs at the blue bruise swelling up on her forehead and grimaces at Sylph. "Okay, so maaaaaaaaaybe we broke a few street signs while we were busting that drug deal! Big whoop!"

"If you are referring to the drug deal in which four of the five criminals involved are now in critical condition in the hospital, you did considerably more than vandalize a few public structures! Those men may never walk again, yet there is no evidence left with which to convict them after your rampage." Sylph gestures at the barricaded street behind them. "In your efforts to surpass each other as heroes, you are hurting innocent people! Justice, that should at least appeal to your sensibilities as a proponent of lawfulness."

"Hmph!" Blind Justice rolls to her feet as well, her brows creased in a frown and her thin lips downturned. "In old Alternia, they could have been executed for less! Compared to that, I showed them mercy! If you get in the way of that, you're obstructing justice!

Oh dear. Seer winces, and starts lining up spells in her mind's eye, because this is not going well at all. Yes, Blind Justice has always paying lip service to the original Legislacerators of the old empires, but she's never done more than use her freedom as a vigilante to do what the police could not and to rub her success as an impartial figure of justice in the Bureau's face. So this is what happens when a kismesissitude goes wrong - both of them have brought out the worst in the other.

"This is not old Alternia! We have developed as a civilization beyond such an outdated form of Tyrannical imperial law, and if you are truly idolizing it in earnest, I have no choice but to stop you." Sylph slaps the canekind down out of Justice's claws. "You will adjourn with me so that we may discuss your issues elsewhere like civilized trolls. If the fact that all of Chicago has turned against you cannot dissuade you, then I must make the attempt."

"Still doesn't mean you can just waltz in here like you own the joint," Scourge says, tossing her hair. Her seven-pupiled eye sweeps the street behind Sylph, flickering over Seer and the Legislacerators without flinching, and then she narrows her gaze at the jadeblood again. "You're in our city without permission. Talk about rude!" On the last word the ceruleanbloodpoints a finger of the gauntlet at Sylph, pressing a button.

The gauntlet fizzes, and then whines, without doing anything. Scourge howls with frustration, tugging at a couple of exposed wires to no effect while Justice tosses back her head and laughs.

"Ideally, you would have long since discarded this foolish mutual animosity and come to your senses," Sylph says. She kicks Scourge into a wall. "I see that I have been overly optimistic." She snatches the canekind off the ground before Justice can retrieve it, and breaks the specibus in two over her knee. Justice snarls, her mouth agape as Sylph tosses the broken weapon aside. "Listen to me and stop fighting, or else."

Justice and the Scourge look at each other. Or at least, Scourge moans and heaves herself off the ground to glower in her kismesis's direction, and Justice seems to sense the glare when she inhales deeply through her nose, angling her head in Scourge's direction.

"She kicked you into a wall," Justice points out, smirking.

Scourge falls into an inelegant fighting stance, teeth gritted. "I can still kick both your asses," she says, with eyes smoldering with black intent and fixed only on Blind Justice - until, suddenly, they're not. The Scourge's blue eyes narrow and her eyebrows shoot up in confusion as she looks over Justice's shoulder. "Wait, who the hell are you?"

Seer, who has just snuck on Justice, flinches. She can only speculate that the ceruleanblood's uniquely mutated eye must have tipped her off. Snapping her fingers, Seer lets her concealment spell drop, smiling as enigmatically as she can manage. "Sylph? Plan B?"

"So it would seem," Sylph says, sounding exhausted. Disappointment shadows her face, her eyes still burning with impotent irritation, but her steely resolves returns a moment later. "Perhaps after a good drubbing they will be more amenable to my reasoning. I would not lose hope yet. Carry on."

Blind Justice, meanwhile, whirls on Seer, visibly startled. "How -" she starts, but Seer does not let her finish. She taps the tealblood on the forehead and yanks them both away.

They reappear several blocks away from Scourge and Sylph, in the middle of Grant Park. They are now well out of the way of the main Legislacerator patrols, and far enough from the Indigo Scourge that perhaps Seer will have better luck in bringing Justice to her senses. She feels a pang at the thought of leaving Sylph to fend for herself without backup against a maniac like the Scourge, but the cerulean-blooded hero hadn't been on top of her game from the looks of it.

The consequences of losing oneself in the throes of blind, obsidian passion, it would seem. Blind Justice is little better off. She stumbles upon landing, groping out with blind hands even as she backs away from Seer. The drastic change in scenery - and in scent - seems to have thrown her, which only works to Seer's advantage.

"What is that - oranges and lemon zest?" Blind Justice inhales, her nose twitching. "With a hint of black licorice! You can only be…" She points dramatically. "The Seer of Light! I should have been able to smell you coming from a mile away with a bouquet like that! Do tell how you snuck up on me! I'm impressed!"

"Perhaps if you weren't so focused on your atramentous affair, you might not have been so easy to surprise," Seer replies, laying a hand on her hip. "Certainly my powers over light don't affect your sense of smell. Of all the people back there, you should have been the last one I was able to fool. But you allowed yourself to be too caught up in the Scourge to care about much else this week, I suspect, Ms Pyrope."

Justice's face freezes. Seer presses on, relentless. "Oh? Does that surprise you, that I am aware of your identity? Has it still not sunk in that you are quite thoroughly compromised? All the world knows who you are. You were a member of the Legislaceration Bureau, no? Well, you will never rise above Neophyte now. You have been ruined as Terezi Pyrope."

"You don't know what you're talking about!" Justice spits, reaching into the inside pocket of her cropped jacket and removing a backup cane specibus. She folds it out to its complete length and taps it hard enough against the ground to raise up a plume of dust. "Maybe we should talk about your negligence! Where were you when Dark Star attacked New York, hmmmmm?"

"Ha! A lie, a blatant lie!" Justice laughs. "I can smell your deceit! Like black pepper! Try again, Lady Seer!"

"Terezi," Seer says, shaking her head, "you are still deflecting."

Justice's smile vanishes. "I don't know what -"

"My absence during the Dark Star event has no relevance here," Seer stares at the brilliant light teal gleam that roils around Blind Justice, all that blind anger and rivalry that has nowhere to go with Scourge finally out of sight. Perhaps, perhaps…Seer may be no professional auspice, but she is familiar with Kanaya's methods nonetheless... "What matters is that you have forsaken your own code. Or do you think setting your own city ablaze is just?"

"Of course not!" Justice snaps, baring her teeth. "We'll clean it up, after I show the Scourge who is the real hero around here -"

"By committing yet more atrocities?" Seer asks. "By breaking more laws?"

"Argh! That's it, Lemon Zest!" Justice twists the cane and it splits into two halves, each with a sharp blade edge. Well then. "You know nothing about proper Imperial legal procedure. So I'll just have to teach you a lesson!"

"You have lost sight of yourself. I know what that feels like." Seer raises her hands, feeling the warmth of twin orbs of light appearing in her palms. "But if it's a fight you want, then so it shall be."

When Blind Justice charges, the Seer is ready.

"You sure about this, man?"

Dave surveys his closet, ostensibly in quest of a not shitty sword, but in reality trying to locate his oldest pair of jeans without looking like he's making a legitimate effort to plan his outfit. Years with Bro have made him sloppy; with a secondary Dave in residence, he can't afford to let his irony slack off.

Unfortunately, his sense of fan-fucking-tastic style skirts the edge between irony and sincerity, so this is taking twice as long as usual. One of these days, he needs to learn to stop second-guessing himself. Become one with the irony. Transcend this mortal coil.

Blah.

"No offense, but your brother seems like a fucking badass. Do you really want to piss him off?"

It helps that Davetoo doesn't have quite the same keenly honed sense of the ironic that he would have if he'd been raised a proper Strider. Little slips fall beneath his radar. But now it's a point of pride, and Dave has started mentally checking himself in a way he hasn't bothered since he was thirteen years old and stupid with the need to impress his older brother.

It doesn't help that he's caught himself making awful puns and nerdy references without being totally aware of it, and he is occasionally forced into making facial expressions in order to get his point across to Davetoo, now that he's been reduced to communicating solely by text. Friendship with John really has changed him if shit like this is difficult to keep up with. Locating the jeans under an old photograph developing tray, Dave keeps his hands in his pockets and continues to kick through the piles of gratuitous stuff he's hoarded over the years. The point is to keep his motives inscrutable and his actions unfathomably ironic. Bro would be proud.

Bro would also highly disapprove of Dave's plan of action for this evening. So. There's that.

Shit's complicated, alright?

"Also, your purple girlfriend is texting you. Seriously, how many hookups do you have? Does your fine blue-themed piece of ass know about this affair? I had no idea any version of me could be such a player."

Dave smacks his face, and grabs the jeans before he can change his mind, flashstepping out into the room to see what trouble his clone twin is causing now.

Orange-Dave sprawls out on his stomach on Dave's bed, one leg kicking absently while he fiddles with Dave's phone. Said leg ends in a foot edged with feathers and tipped with claws, but Dave is actually getting used to that. The orange is what gets him every time - the kid is like a walking firework, and whenever Dave catches sight of him in his peripheral vision it startles him. His free wing arches out, long enough that the very tips of the flight feathers brush the ceiling.

He doesn't look up from his diabolical machinations to read Dave's scribbled DS: stop that when Dave snatches up a notepad from the desk, so Dave bats at the kid's stupid orange face to get his attention. "Stop it, dick," Davetoo mutters, waving his hand to ward off Dave. He frowns, raising a lemon-yellow eyebrow at the screen. "Dude, you don't even have this password-protected. Also, your girlfriend sounds way too smart for you."

DS: i will murder everyone you love give it back

DS: thats my goddamn sister stop assuming im boning everyone on my chumroll

Davetoo looks up, reads the order on the notepad, and snorts, rolling his eyes. Great, now he's getting all sassy. "Just messing with you, man. Can't you take a joke?"

He rolls over on his side away from Dave, who ends up sprawling half across the bed and reaching over a faceful of bright orange pinion feathers in an attempt to lay hands on his phone. His obnoxious bird self just braces his working wing like a fucking wall and ignores him, smirking. "Chill, I'm not interested in looking for your naked pics. Just fielding your incestuous tomfoolery for you. I won't even look up illicit puppet porn. Look at how considerate I'm being."

Fuck. Dave's forgotten how annoying it can get to have more than one Dave in the same room. Sure, this isn't a time-twin, but they're still similar enough that Dave is starting to bristle. He stands up straight and draws himself back in, forcing his shoulders to slump down in a careless shrug as he regains control of himself. He pauses time, steals his phone back, and swaps it for an empty juice box. By the time Davetoo recovers, Dave has barricaded himself in the closet to change, his phone clenched between his teeth while he pulls on a shirt he hasn't worn in - god, ages. All part of his latest unbelievably sicknasty plan.

That's another thing that still separates them, Dave reflects. Davetoo has no ability to flashstep, and the first time a future-Dave came back to warn them about the horrific consequences of his first escape attempt (clown snuff films had been involved) the bird Dave had started ranting about more clones and conspiracy theories and wanting to fly back home before the government descended upon them until Dave gave up and went to complete the loop. When he asked as discreetly as possible if Davetoo ever got distracted by the endless beat of time, he'd only received a confused look in reply. It seems that in this case study of two, Striders trade out time powers for wings - there is no in between.

He pulls his record shirt over his head. It's the first one he'd designed for himself, and the fact that it still fits now, all these years later, would probably make John howl with laughter - which is why John will never know of this. Ever.

He takes a selfie and sends it off to John anyway, in the spirit of good old fashioned hipster-phase irony.

TG: feast ur eyes eb
TG: thecamerawentoffbyitself.jpeg
EB: …
EB: dude, how old is that shirt?
TG: i have no idea what youre on about now john TG: youre supposed to be fangirling over my impeccable sense of style not talking nonsense
EB: no, i'm telling you, dave, you sent me a selfie of that exact same shirt years ago!
TG: fuck
TG: what no i didnt
EB: i'm pretty sure i still have it saved on this phone…
TG: id be flattered that you kept it this long man
TG: if that were an actual thing
TG: which its not EB: it totally is! see!
EB: vintagestriderswag.jpeg
TG: motherfucker
EB: i told you!
TG: god how long have we been bros
TG: clearly too long EB: years, man, yeeears
EB: this is one of the first pictures you ever insisted on sending me, even though i kept telling you not to.
EB: and then suddenly i had all this picture evidence of your civilian identity.
EB: and it kept happening.
EB: siiiiigh.
TG: you know you love it
TG: but this is legitimately embarrassing i dont really know where to go from here
TG: fuck
TG: there are children in this world who are younger than our broship do you realize this
EB: ...omg
TG: yeah enjoy that early midlife crisis
EB: nice save! :O
EB: i am totally distracted from the fact that you, dave strider, still have your favorite record shirt years after you swore you would trash it!
TG: shhhh
TG: shhhhhhhhhhhhhhh
TG: not a word out of you
EB: dave
TG: shhhHHHHHHHHHH
EB: okay now you're just doing that on purpose
TG: shooooooooosh
TG: there is no shouty troll here
TG: only you
EB: DAVE
TG: and me
EB: you're terrible :P
TG: shhh
TG: you have never seen this shirt before in your life
EB: bluh, fine
EB: now cut that out!

Dave just rolls his eyes and deletes the photographic evidence of his own forgetfulness from the phone, walking out into his room and very obviously ignoring Davetoo, who rolls off the bed and follows him out the door when it becomes clear that Dave Strider stops for no man-bird hybrid. No need to leave that kind of photo lying around for Bro or Davetoo to get their claws on it. They'd smirk at him for days, and he really needs to not be dealing with an apartment full of smug Striders right now. Tonight, he and the Badass Quandary are clearing up some of those titular quandaries that define their past interactions, whether the carapacian dame wants to or not, and he needs everyone on their goddamn game.

The only problem with this clearly foolproof plan is that Dave may or may not be under house arrest. Bro calls it 'being grounded for excessive stupidity.' Dave calls it 'unlawful imprisonment.' John had been singularly unhelpful when Dave had begged him for a teleport escape, a clear violation of their bro code, but then, John once again seems to have his own fresh crisis on his hands. It starts with a J and ends with a 'GG: Hiiii, Dave! My name is Jade Harley! We're going to be best friends! :D'.
At that point, Dave had just switched off his phone and rethought some of his life choices.

Dave suspects that John will eventually just embrace the weird, random shit and become some kind of Buddha figure who doesn't give a single fuck about such trivial concepts as 'weird' or 'uncanny,' wandering the earth and spreading his creed of total acceptance to the unsuspecting masses with a dumbass grin. John would just seem like the type, if he weren't so gungho about heroic duty and all that. That, or there is just something downright lysergic in Seattle's water. No one city could produce so much strangeness without a little chemical assistance.

(The jury is still out on whether or not his existentially enraged troll soul mate will eventually succumb to the John feel-good influence and accept his fate as the diamond waifu of a Freaky Shit guru, but Dave's putting his money on 'no.')

...Dave also gets the feeling that his metaphors got away from him, there. Just a little. That happens sometimes. He's sure no one noticed.

When he looks surreptitiously from side to side to make sure the coast is clear, Davetoo is eyeing him again. Seriously. This kid is all up on him. Couldn't he at least chill out in Dave's room instead of tagging along to witness the impending smack down? "Dude, you've been standing there staring into space for like. Five minutes now. Is this normal? Are you even listening to me?"

Frick. He needs to stop disregarding the giant orange goddamn albatross in the room when making these assumptions. 'You don't know my life,' he signs, just to see Davetoo sigh in frustration. 'Sometimes I commune with the spirits of Striders past and commiserate about the hassle of rehabilitating feathery assholes. Do you see me judging you for spending ten minutes preening your creepy hair feathers after dinner? No. So back off.'

Also. Right. Focus. The BQ and quandaries. That's where these obscene tangents started. Dave just needs to fight his way out of house arrest, and he's in the clear.

The only problem with this plan? He needs to fight his way out of house arrest, which is by definition impossible when one's jailor is Bro.

Dave has no illusions about this; he has never once beaten Bro in a straight fight, not even with all the time powers at his disposal, and the last time he was grounded - years ago, now, because Bro is actually a lenient bastard in his own way and Dave gets away with a lot of stupid shit - he hadn't succeeded in escaping until Bro let him escape, at the end of his sentence.

He has a backup plan. It's John's idea, seconded sarcastically by Rose, which means Dave has already been forced to rework it extensively, because John is a trusting, naive soul at heart whose guardian isn't a violent sword-wielding maniac. But he has it. As, you know. A last resort.

He just really doesn't want to admit that it would involve being a mature, rational adult about all this. 'Come on, chickadee, if you're gonna bear witness to my inevitable failure, we might as well get this over with,' he signs, opening the door to their shared room. He doesn't bother dropping back to retrieve his pen and paper, which would only frustrate him, or texting, because like hell is he giving Davetoo a second opening at reading his messages.

Davetoo just rolls his orange eyes and folds his claws over his chest, and when Dave draws his sword and prepares to cross the minefield that is their living room, his more avian half feels the need to offer some more unsolicited advice. "I know you have no reason to listen to a word I say. But I'd like to state for the record that this is still an incredibly stupid idea."

It really is.
Dave edges forward, and then back, squinting as he tries to determine where the first onslaught will come from. He steps on Davetoo's bare claw-toes and the guy yelps, but hey, he's been warned about riding a guy's ass like that.

...This is gonna hurt.

Raising his sword in a guard, Dave starts running.

- It takes them a half hour to reach the staircase; Dave blames this godawful time on the fact that he also covers Davetoo's ass, out of the goodness of his heart, when it becomes clear that Bro is making no effort to distinguish one Dave from the other in the punishing onslaught of godforsaken puppet grenades. Unlike Dave, who ducks and weaves and fends off the puppets to the best of his ability, Davetoo just tries to soldier through, his nose wrinkled up as he holds up his wing before his face and weatherings it all. So, chalk up a point for the defensive wing, but Dave now has bruises in places he didn't know could bruise from fighting for two.

Next on the agenda - train Davetoo in the art of shitty swordsmanship. If he has learned any kind of strife specibus, he hasn't shown it thus far, and what kind of Strider hasn't at least minored in swordkind?

'The stairs are going to be worse,' he signs.

Davetoo just shakes his head, uncomprehending, and shrugs his wing lopsidedly. Dave is struck by an intense wave of curiosity, a question he hasn't yet dared ask - can this guy fly? Because the one wing, at least, seems very, very functional. "Lead on, man. I'm not taking all the new puppets to the face for the sake of your quest."

Dick. Dave races up the stairs without helping him. He warned him, man, so it's not his fault if Sunny D falls prey to the stairway bombardment.

Naturally, when Dave happens to glance back in the middle of a desperate dodge, flattening himself against the wall, he sees that the puppets are avoiding Davetoo entirely. The bird kid stoically trudges upward, and the puppets part around him like the plush sea. Meanwhile, when Dave turns to face forward again, an entire small television set launches at his ribs and sends him plummeting back down the stairs to start over from the beginning. Davetoo actually ends up beating him to the roof, totally untouched, and smirking at Dave's deep breathing exercises.

That's...not even fair. That's favoritism, goddammit.

Having repeated the climb out of puppet hell, Dave casts aside the broken half of a sword that's all that remains after he stupidly tried to parry a satellite dish (it came out of fucking nowhere, okay?) with it, and pulls out a not shitty sword.

"Dude?"

'What?' He raises his eyebrows in a silent question to get the point across.

Davetoo smiles awkwardly. "Good luck."

But no, seriously. Dave gives a short nod and opens the door to the roof.

As per usual rules of Strider engagement, Bro is already waiting. He's leaning up against the radio tower facing the side, his hat tilted forward and his arms folded so he looks totally at ease. Totally not-surprised by the appearance of two Daves. His creepy puppet cams would have kept him up to date on all of Dave's (slow) progress through the gauntlet. Back when he was a kid, it came off as prescience and it was fucking spooky. Now that Dave knows exactly how Bro manages half of his freaky tricks, it's...still spooky.

"Dave." Bro tilts his head to the side, still not looking directly at him. "And Dave."

"Oriole, actually," Davetoo says.

Dave turns to stare. Bro turns to stare.

Davetoo shrugs, and the wing moves with him. "It's just stupid, now. I hardly ever go by Dave, anyway, these days. You think someone like me lasts long under one alias?"

"A'ight," Bro says, shrugging. He thumbs the brim of his hat. "Oriole. You just here to watch the smackdown, or are you helping this little shit?"

"Watching. I'd have brought popcorn, but I'm pretty sure you people live in squalor unbefitting for even the most trailer trash of hicks, and that you've replaced all non-essential food items with fucking apple juice." Oriole smacks Dave on the shoulder. "Go have fun beating the hell out of each other, you insane dicks. I'll referee." He shuffles off, his splinted wing hitching up out of the way when he finds a patch of roof to sit down on. The free wing huddles in tight against his side, but it's still a bright orange flag. Not like anyone really cares around here though. The Strider household is widely regarded as a nexus of strange occurrences.

On a more irritating note, they are flaunting their ability to talk. Flaunting it. Dave grits his teeth and taps the hilt of his sword before swinging it up and signing, 'Bro. Strife. Now.'

'What, not even going to set down any terms?' The triangular shades catch the right angle and reflect the setting sun. 'And what happened to all your fancy digs, man? I mean, are those thumb holes in the cuffs? Working the middle school angle, I see.'

He could sign something like, 'give me liberty or give me death,' but the last time he tried to get smart like that Bro had taken the X-Box away for a week, and then nobody had been happy. Nobody. And if he responds to the crack at his 90's ensemble, it'll just confirm for Bro that Dave has a squishy underbelly where clothing is concerned.

Which. Is so not the case. At all.

So he just signs, 'Bring it on,' trying not to glance obviously at the holes in the cuffs where his thumbs do indeed stick through, and brings the sword up in a guard.

Bro just raises a fist, and then points his thumb down. 'Alright, little brother. Round three. Maybe this time you'll actually manage to impress me.'

The next thing Dave knows, he's being yanked forward by his collar and thrown toward the edge of the roof, his legs whipped out from under him. Bro's afterimage fades with his thumb still downturned as Dave flies by, and Dave curses himself out internally for falling for the obvious fakeout combo. He sticks out an arm and grabs a rung of the tower to stop himself before he actually takes a flying leap off the building. His ribs impact against the metal hard, and he lets out a huff that costs him valuable time. When something tugs on his ankle, suspiciously gentle, he drops to the ground and stumps with all his weight on Lil Cal's brilliant, uncanny grin. All he gets is the less than satisfying jar of his feet slamming into the rooftop, while the puppet scurries away in a series of twitchy steps.
Bro is out of sight, which is bad, bad like a spider crawling across the wall of your bedroom and then disappearing behind the bed levels of oh god fuck me. But Dave focuses on the puppet, because if Cal is around, Bro has to be somewhere nearby working the strings. Lil Cal may be freaky as fuck, but at least it's not mechanized like some of Bro's weirder shit. The puppet chitters its jaw in soundless laugh, twitching all by its lonesome while Dave works up the nerve to attack it. His palms may or may not be sweating, and has his puppet phobia thing always been this bad? He doesn't remember it being this bad. Shit, just go go go -

Dave flashsteps, sliding around Lil Cal in a circle with the gravel, so at least the thing can't smile at him while he decapitates it. That just wouldn't be cool. He swings the shitty blade down with both hands - and then turns on his heel, the thin soles of his sneakers letting him feel every sharp, digging point of gravel that he skims out of his way as he jabs at the lurking figure of Bro, who's trying to hang inconspicuously in the background. Maybe that worked before Dave got a handle on the time thing, but now he's in the rhythm of the fight. His sword stabs through thin air instead of clattering against another sword, but Dave follows the arc of the swing and twists around to slash behind him. He allows himself a tiny smirk as the four incoming, bright orange smuppets tumble to the ground in pieces, neatly bisected by the slice.

Lil Cal wraps around his leg, a plush, twining weight pressed up along his calf and knee, and Dave yelps. The puppet's mouth opens and it crunches down on the back of his thigh like a freaking zombie puppet motherfricker. Dave flips the sword into a backwards grip and stabs downward, holding time still just long enough to punch through the top of the puppet's skull, right through its obnoxious fucking hat.

He pays for it though, and that's always the problem - Dave can't help freaking the fuck out over Lil Cal, and Bro knows it. It distracts him, and in that moment when he should have been using his extra time to catch up to Bro's crazily fast fraymotif, a blurred, shadowy afterimage appears in front of Dave. By the time he sees it, of course, Bro is already long gone. The hilt of a blade cracks against his jaw, and he sees white. This isn't working. This never works. Dave spits at the ground, grimacing as he runs his tongue over his teeth to make sure none fell out. As he takes stock of the situation, there are four Bro-shaped afterimages darting around the roof in unpredictable patterns, and one Lil Cal beaming at him with all of its perfect wooden teeth bared, ready to chomp down again.

Shit. He's done. Dave snarls, and scrubs a hand through his hair. Bro has had all the time he needed to set up the roof for their millionth one-sided strife, with one inevitable conclusion: Dave buried in a clusterfuck of goddamn puppets, and Bro zooming off into the ironic aether on some rocketboard at Warp Five. But Dave just can't even deal with this shit right now. It's time to face the music.

...Worse. It's time for Plan Egbert-Lalonde.

God, this is such a stupid plan.

"Hey, Dave, kick him in the balls!" Oriole yells, his claws cupped around his mouth.

...Okay, that's a worse plan.

Dave flings himself forward, tossing his sword aside, and time obliges him.

He skips past all the afterimages of Bro's taunting form, crashes into one of Lil Cal's slaps and keeps going, and is rewarded by the sight of both Bro's eyebrows shooting up as Dave crashes into his chest. His actual chest, not just a shadowy feint.

He also takes a sword to the right side of his ribs. The sharp pain leaves him breathless, but it's nothing new. What's the point of a lifetime of intense sword-fighting if you don't learn to take a stab wound or two?

This is the part where he has to hope Rose and John really are onto something with their unique combination of freaky mind-reading and naive trust in the goodness of humanity, because if this doesn't play out the way they think it will, Dave just left himself swordless and at the mercy of Bro, of all people.

"Shit!" Bro says sharply, grabbing Dave by the shoulders. "Dave, Jesus FUCKING Christ-

'Bro. I made friends with a Badass Quandary, and I need your help to interrogate her,' Dave signs. It goes against every instinct he has. But fuck it. Nothing else is going to work.

Why not try something new?

"You little shit, you did some time thing, didn't you," Bro snaps, ignoring him and the completely mind-blowing revelations Dave is attempting to communicate to him like a normal human being. He might be slightly distracted by the sword sticking out of Dave's side.

To be fair, that is mildly distracting. Hell, Dave is distracted by that, too. But they need to stay on topic, here. "Hold still and don't dick around, we need to remove that," Bro keeps blathering, and maybe it's all the blood rushing out of Dave's head but he sounds a little tense. Possibly even worried.

'She's a carapacian and I've been meeting her for - what, a year and a half, now?' Dave babbles, as well as he can using only his hands. He can't taste any new blood in his mouth, which he thinks is a really good sign; means nothing important got punctured. Moving still hurts, though, so he grits his teeth when Bro - gently - shoves him off his chest and makes him lean back. Everything is kind of dizzy-making, though, so he sticks to the Egbert-patented word vomit. 'She knew about the time thing and everything, and got me onto the whole traveling backward thing. Pretty sure she knows more, but I haven't gotten a single straight answer out of her in years. So. Here. All my cards are on the table. How's that for communication, you bastard?'

"Good god, I raised a fucking motor mouth who can't even talk. How is this even possible." Bro shoves Dave's hand aside when Dave goes to prod at the sword. "Don't pick at it, you'll lacerate your fucking liver."

'Dude, this is, like, a flesh wound.'

"If you start quoting that movie in a valley-girl accent again, I will murder you myself Dave."

"Should I call an ambulance?"

Oh right. Oriole witnessed that spectacular flying fuckup. Dave rolls his eyes back and to the side to squint at orange him, but to Bro it must look like Dave is passing out like a fucking wuss, so he smacks him across the cheek. "'Ey,'ey, kid, wake up!"

'I'm awake!' Dave snaps back, kicking on reflex. His one regret in this moment is that Bro somehow dodges the attempted nutshot. 'Are you looking at a word I'm signing, you insensitive fuck?'

"Of course I am, and we can discuss all that shit when you're not bleeding all over the place," Bro says. He sounds almost exasperated. "No, no hospitals, he's fucking fine."

"Except, you know, you fucking stabbed him!" Oriole sounds worried, but he's also mostly a tangerine-dyed smear in the corner of Dave's vision, even when Dave squints over the jumbled angle of his shades where they hang half off his nose - so heck, he could just be concerned about the neighbors again. Dave would be oddly touched by the sentiment if it weren't totally misplaced. This rooftop has seen more accidental stabbings and near-dismemberment than probably any other roof in all of Houston. Even the neighbors who still give a fuck stopped calling in the cops after Dave turned eleven or something like that.

'Go hard or go fuck yourself,' Dave signs. He looks back down at his stomach and pokes at the sword again; Bro is distracted enough with something that he actually touches the sword, and pain flares up, blindsiding him. That side of the white torso of his shirt is now sticky with red, which is just never going to come out. There isn't enough bleach in the world.

Damn Rose and her conviction that appealing to Bro's nostalgic parental instincts was a good idea. Last time Dave takes advice from a tentacle headshrinker. Strange women distributing poor life advice that ends with people getting stabbed is a shitty system of advising and Dave should probably warn John. It's his duty as the best brofriend ever to prevent John from making equally shitty decisions, right?

And Rose already fucked John over once and -

When did the stars get so...dancy?

...He's lost a lot more blood than he thought he would, clearly. This is just sad. First time he's been properly stabbed in a long time, and he can't focus for shit.

'I think I'm gonna hurl,' Dave signs, pressing a hand to his side gingerly.

"Do it and the bird kid can carry your nauseous ass downstairs. God, next time you get fast enough to surprise me, don't." Bro shakes his head, his pointy shades swimming in Dave's peripheral vision. "Alright, Dave, prepare for consequences," Bro says, which is Dave's cue to grab onto something and not wimp out.

Unfortunately, the closest thing to grab turns out to be bird foot.

The sword actually hurts a whole lot more coming out than going in.

Dave doesn't puke, but he does yell loud enough that the crazy lady in the apartment complex next door flings open her window and shrieks unintelligible Spanish before tossing a barstool at them and that? That right there? That earns him a gold star.

- He wakes up ten minutes and four seconds later, on the dot. Groggy as fuck, Dave tries to sit up and realizes that was an unbelievably stupid decision two seconds too late. The last thing he remembers is grabbing Oriole's foot so hard he probably left bruises and took a bird claw to the face.

That, or he just whited out from the extraction of said sword. But 'curbstomped by bird-me' sounds marginally better than 'I passed out over one little stab wound, whoopdedoo,' and he makes the executive decision that when he updates John on the progress of Mission Total Disclosure (Rose's name, not Dave's), he will be liberally altering details to emphasize just how badass the whole thing was.

"...You didn't suck."

Speak of the orange devil. Dave reaches up and manually peels open his own eyelids. His shades have been removed, and he panics before locating them on the desk by the bed. He slams them on, his body protesting with all the white hot intensity of a thousand suns, but it's worth it to have that dark, shading buffer between him and the orange, feathery asshole perched on his desk and watching him from above. Like an unwanted, feathery guardian angel, here to guide him along his quest into dipshittery.

Dave tilts his head down and grimaces at the bandage job. Definitely Bro's work, which means he doesn't even want to know where his shirt ended up. That thing was older than Christ, anyway. "Of course I didn't suck, I was completely on top my shit tonight," he wants to say, except oh yeah.

"I think you freaked Bro out, though," Oriole says, watching with really creepy unshaded eyes as Dave prods at the extra gauze padding over the vague area of his liver. "Like, the minute he finished patching you up he kind of threw you at me and olly outied like he couldn't wait to peace out. What's up with that?"

Dave snorts, picks up his phone, and texts the answer to himself before tossing the phone to Oriole to read.

DS: yeah bro gets like that DS: he acts like hes tough shit but hes a total pansy with injuries and shit
DS: on other people anyway
DS: he went and acted all concerned and stuff in front of witnesses and now he must retreat from the world and cleanse himself in our hidden inhouse hot spring
DS: burn some sage incense to clear out his tear ducts
DS: meditate with some bloodstones
DS: cry to the blue corn moon
DS: the usual

"You guys are repressed as fuck, you know that?" Oriole says, tapping the screen with his claw.

'We seriously need to get all that Lalonde swag out of your system, it's freaking me out,' Dave signs. 'Must be a recessive gene. We can so fix that.'

He returns the middle finger he receives with enthusiasm. Sitting up hurts like a motherfucker, but he does it anyway, pushing through the pain with a stiff lip. His jaw clenches a little, but that's it. Awesome. His pokerface may yet be salvaged from the influence of the Egbro.

"Just take the phone back and text already," Oriole insists, holding out the phone as Dave determinedly shuffles by the desk to get to the closet. Like hell is he wandering around shirtless with a gaping hole in his side in a household full of secret puppetcams. And he needs to redo the bandages because Bro may be kickass at stitches, but he always wraps bandages too tight. How the fuck is Dave supposed to breathe? This is like a goddamn corset. He's going to swoon all over the place, and that's only funny when it's ironic. The rest of the time it's just a symbol of how unrealistic societal expectations for the human body lead to the rearrangement of internal organs, and Dave will have no part in such bullshit.

"Should you even be walking? You may have missed the memo, but you almost bled out up there. Great plan there, genius."
He needs a way to make this kid stop talking. Dave does not remember being such a chatty Cathy when he could still talk. He wants to cough out a hoarse, inaudible 'omfg stop,' but it would just be more trouble than it's worth.

He's starting to lose that instinct to talk first, sign later. It's been long enough since the collar broke (since Bro fucked it up, the irrational part of his brain mutters) that Dave can barely remember what he sounds like to his own ears. Even Oriole sounds different, because that's the problem with voices - between waves and pressure and internal vibrations, even the voice of a near identical Dave echoes strange to Dave's well-trained ear. The memory of his own fades more every day.

Plus, Dave is pretty sure his voice is a lot more chill than that. His own smooth voice brings the mellifluous flow in any poetry slam. Oriole's constant, vaguely scratchy throat must be a bird thing.

Speaking of.

'Corvidae.'

A faint grimace on his face, Oriole shakes his head. Dave huffs and starts typing on his phone, holding out the screen for Oriole to read at intervals before the text scrolls up out of the screen.

DS: not an oriole a crow

DS: pinions are all wrong bro

DS: streak-backed oriole would be almost the right color red-winged blackbirds epaulettes would be spot on but your feathers are too blunt at the tips

DS: clearly corvid not icteridae. raven wings would be longer and thinner with more slotting yours splay out at the end like fingers

DS: so crow

Oriole looks at him, and for once, his face is totally flat. On him, the expressionlessness that's so normal on Dave's own face in the mirror is...unsettling. Is that really what he looks like when he shuts down? "Dude, why the fuck do you know so much about bird wings?" he asks, thick yellow brows furrowing a little and breaking the weird flat aspect.

DS: werent you the one telling me my collection of dead things meant something psychologically significant?

DS: i taxidermy and take hipster pics in my spare time do the math

DS: also i know how our minds work because all striders are obsessive past the point of irony. you would have known about the wings, and we both know it

DS: you just pulled oriole out of your ass

The bird kid pushes a stray feather behind his ear, still unreadable. "Nothing personal," he says, with a deliberate casualness that Dave sees right through by virtue of experience. "Just don't need your bro poking around in my private life. You know he would."

At least Oriole - Crow - fuck, things were less confusing when he was just Orange Creamsicle - has caught on to Bro's shenanigans early. Dave still hasn't forgiven that guy for being an unreasonable dick while John was visiting.
DS: he totally would but dude just pick a name and stick with it.

"Oriole for now. Haven't been Crow in ages." Oriole closes his wing again, touching the broken one with a hand, and then looks away. "It was pretentious as fuck, anyway. Could only have been more pretentious if I just went and called myself Raven or some shit like that."

Dave smiles, just a little approval in his expression. Maybe. He could appreciate when a fellow Dave's sense of irony led him down a righteous path. He leans into the closet, resists the urge to plan out a new outfit, and grabs the first shirt that comes to hand before making a beeline for the bathroom.

Oriole follows him. Dave stops midstep, and turns, hands in his pockets with the shirt clutched in a fist.

DS: dude i know everyone is warm for the strider form

DS: but back off bro do we need to establish anti incest ground rules or something

"Wow, let's not," Oriole says, making a face. "Dude, I'm just making sure you're not going to faint all over the place. I don't know what kind of fucked up household this is where stab wounds are like a fucking papercut, but even your brother was kind of freaking out. So. Yeah. Just trying to treat this whole thing like a normal human being would. Do you need help walking?"

DS: oh fuck that

Dave stalks off, opening Pesterchum and ignoring the birdkid who trails after him into the bathroom - which is, for once, not tricked out with enough booby-traps to make a grown ninja cry.

TG: john
TG: am i or am i not a strong independent strider who dont need no man
EB: so you've said, yeah! :P
TG: so you respect my right to deal with stab wounds on my own time
TG: without feathery orange asshats trying to escort me around the house TG: because i defy the victorian stereotype of the fainting blonde bombshell TG: right
EB: omg yes dave.
EB: you are the independent dave, it is you.
EB: but what stab wounds?
TG: uh
TG: #missindependent
EB: dave!
EB: that's not funny! at all!
EB: don't make me come down there!
-- turntechGodhead [TG] began pestering ectoBiologist [EB] at 19:26:10 --
TG: you would wouldnt you
EB: yupppp /\ now explain yourself!
TG: damn eb didnt know you cared TG: and yet where were you before i had to enact operation oh goddamn i am making a terrible mistake
TG: my life choice bullshitometer just exploded
TG: you and lalonde sabotaged it 5ever
TG: i will never bring my family honor
EB: so you actually just talked to him about everything like we suggested?
TG: yeah and now behold i am slain
EB: HA HA, very funny.
EB: stab wounds are hilarious, i get stabbed all the time too.
EB: except OH WOW NO I DON’T TG: nah bro
TG: youre the guy in charge of being blown up
EB: this is also true :/
TG: its an important job man good luck
EB: yeah, it's a blast...
EB: but you're okay?
TG: eb
TG: john
TG: egbert
TG: stabbing is to strider as puns are to egderp
EB: ...so being stabbed hilarious?
TG: oh right you actually like puns
TG: no being stabbed is an unavoidable part of life and sometimes you just have to soldier on through the onslaught like the badass you are TG: in retrospect puns are nothing like being stabbed
TG: puns are the work of the devil
TG: puns are the tenth circle of hell
EB: what can i say, dave.
EB: i can see your point...
EB: but i can't help it.
TG: oh god please no
EB: it's a worldwide punomenon up in here!
TG: goddammit john TG: people have been known to commit murder over shit like that EB: so these puns are to die for?
TG: im going to go cry in this corner over here
TG: youve reduced me to tears again
TG: watch im going to go up to my bro and be all TG: 'im glad i know sign language'
TG: 'its pretty handy'
TG: and thats it
TG: game over man game over
EB: well, that's when my life's work will be complete and i can retire to the country in peace
EB: jade likes puns too, you know!
TG: oh fuck me i keep forgetting theres two of you now too
TG: were you the one who gave her my handle?
TG: you did didnt you
EB: noooope! she's been teleporting my phone and stuff all day, it's really starting to freak me out.
EB: but she saw the screen i guess, and now she and rose are best buds!
EB: she's really nice though, i think you guys would get along if you unblocked her.
EB: also, i don't know how long blocking works on her, she's way smarter than i am...
TG: wait
TG: john the paranoid bastard
TG: john who wouldnt even walk around my house without a mask TG: youre recommending heroes get to know each other EB: …
TG: ...
EB: darn it! that keeps happening!
EB: agghhhghgh, don't be friends with her! because we don't actually know if she's trustworthy or not, even if rose likes her!
EB: but
EB: i don’t know!
TG: dude
EB: help me! i trust her and i don’t know why!
TG: probs just a sibling thing
TG: like why should i trust the orange creamsicle not to off me in my sleep aside from the fact that i could totally kick his ass?
TG: relatives man you feel me?
EB: i don't know, it still seems a little irrational???
TG: look my man just remember the golden rule
EB: what?
TG: no matter how hot she is
EB: dave…
TG: do not bang
EB: that's not the problem here!
TG: i mean it
TG: let not house of egbert become a couch for incest
TG: strider out
EB: you are the opposite of helpful.

"You've been texting your boyfriend for like, ten minutes now, and you look like you're about to fall over and pass out on the ground. God, dude, do I need to confiscate your phone?"

Dave emerges from his texting fugue when a bright orange hand reaches over his phone and tries to yoink it. He spins and puts his back to Oriole, tabbing over to an empty note page. Spinning is an awful decision that makes the mirror turn topsy-turvy in his vision, but Dave just closes his eyes, rocks back on his heels, and types without looking.

DS: you need to get over this whole klepto schtick man we are law abiding citizens in this household

DS: you keep mispronouncing brofriend btws

DS: oh god so much pun

"Look, can you just do whatever and then lie back down?" The birdkid makes another strike at the phone, and Dave has to painfully shouldercheck him on the side with the broken wing. This reminder that they're both in awful shape makes the kid flinch and back out of range, glowering at Dave sourly.

DS: dude why do you even care?

Oriole throws up his hands and wing. "I don't know. Fuck. Because you're letting me stay in your house without some hidden catch? Because you're my weird clone twin who miraculously missed out on the shitty mutation gene? Because contrary to popular belief, I'm not an unfeeling dick, and I would probably feel a tiny amount of guilt if you passed out and knocked yourself unconscious just to prove a point? Pick one, asshole, and then go the fuck to sleep."

Dave bends down, his side protesting all the way, and starts pulling the necessary first aid stuff out from under the sink, where Bro has tossed it so haphazardly that all the bandages and shit are in a pile. The guy has no sense of organization. He hitches his hip up on the counter by the sink and starts removing all the tape and staples binding his ribs up like a goddamn mummy with a pair of fabric scissors.

"I like this plan. 'Undo all the bandages with a pair of hugeass scissors and see how many new holes you can stab in yourself.' Awesome." Oriole pinches the bridge of his nose, and the movement draws Dave's attention. Dave squints, and has to tilt his head sideways to be sure, but yup. The freckles that on Dave are barely noticeable are slightly darker on Oriole, burnt orange flecks that scatter across his cheek and nose.

Bird freckles. Orange bird freckles. There is nothing about that Dave can handle. He can't do it. So he ignores it.

DS: scissors are like swords but there's two of them and people never see them coming

DS: always keep a pair of scissorskind on your person dude what kind of unprepared dipshit are you

"The kind who has only managed to get stabbed once in his life, which is apparently a daily occurrence in this hellhole," Oriole says, leaning against the wall. "God, we look identical and I still think I'm the older one. There is a massive maturity curve here."

Dave raises an eyebrow.

DS: you've only been stabbed once good god what have you been doing with your life

DS: spill man tell me the sicknasty deets i need to use both hands for the next part

He's curious, now. Setting his phone down on the counter and dumping the wrinkled pile of used bandages into the overflowing trash can, full of empty toilet paper rolls and shampoo bottles, Dave grimaces as he applies pressure to the wad of gauze over the stab wound. He trusts to Bro's stitch work, at least, and he doesn't want to risk ripping any of it out by dicking around with it. Awkward but trying to play it cool, he bites down on a roll of bandage and starts unwinding it with his teeth. Like a badass.

"You should have been using both hands for all of this," Oriole sighs. "Fuck this, I've got at least two months of maturity on you. At least. It's the only explanation."

Dave just stares at him, his face the perfect wall, emotionless and uncaring. It's the only way to communicate how very few fucks he gives about his bird-twin's maturity complex. Which is total bullshit, anyway, because Dave is so mature. So damn mature. Seriously, the new and improved Dave Strider wears kickass clothes and doesn't keep secrets from his guardian, and that's like an A+++ or something on the maturity-echeladder.

"Yeah, well, turns out some people aren't as gung-ho about accepting mutations as your batshit insane family," Oriole mutters at last, shifting and breaking eye contact first. Dave smirks and celebrates another flawlessly executed stonewall. "After my first guardian took off for parts unknown, I had to handle myself. Human CPS wouldn't really know what to do about a ten years old with wings, no matter how well I was hiding them. So I ended up wandering a lot. Was on the streets for a while, and I got cocky in a fight and took a knife to the kidney. God, it was over something so unbelievably stupid. What the fuck were we even fighting about -" he breaks off, shaking his head. "Fuck it.

Okay. This has to stop. Dave tucks the end of the bandages under his arm, and starts texting again, because this seriously needs to be said -
Oriole pauses, then raises an eyebrow. "...Genius point to you, man. Bravo. I am indeed...orange." He starts a mocking slow clap. "Such cultural sensitivity."

Dave heaves an exaggerated sigh. At this point, flipping the bird isn't worth the satisfaction of the stealth pun - oh goddammit John. His ensuing message may or may not be more vehement than intended.

"Oh fantastic, you found the caps lock."

"Finish redoing your goddamned bandages," Oriole snaps, reaching under the sink and lobbing a roll of tape at Dave's head. "There's such a thing as makeup. And before you even move your goddamned hands, I have seen your closet."

Dave's hands stop. He thinks about it.

"How did you avoid the system anyway"

"Pretty sure the gov would have noticed small orange bird child at the local hospital"

"But yeah they keep track of these things dont they"

"Men in black and superhero regulation and all that"

"Didn't come from a lab, if that's what you're implying," Oriole snorts. "I just remember my first guardian was some troll lady. She was the one who let me in on the little secret that wings weren't standard issue for most people. I guess she'd seen a lot of mutants in her day, but fuck if I know where she picked me up in the first place. Could have been a hospital, could have been a government..."
facility. I don't know and I don't care, as long as they don't come after me." He grimaces, scratching at the feather barbs that line his face at the hairline. "Honestly, that's what I thought the whole creepy kidnapping thing was about, at first. But they didn't know shit about where the wings came from, and then you guys told me it was all some gang thing. Thanks for making you and everyone who vaguely looks like you into a giant fucking target, btw."

DS: orange

DS: wings.

"Shaddup. Do you know how many years I've spent with these things taped down? Like. Goddamn. Here, kid, spend the first half of your life stunting your wingspan."

DS: fuck dude im not hating on the wing problems

DS: everyones life is shit this is basically a fact of existence

DS: calm yo birdtitties

Oriole stares at him in disbelief. "You guys really are that confrontational," he says. "It just magically spews out of your mouth, like a fountain of dicks."

Dave feels his shoulders huddling up. The kicker is, Oriole is pulling the same shit; Dave just takes a fraction of a second longer to realize it because he doesn't huddle his shoulders, he shrugs his wings up like ruffled orange banners. Even the broken wing makes a good faith effort.

...Is that peacocking? No, really. Are they both doing that? How long has this been a thing? Dave forces himself to relax, because he thinks in a contest over the most irrational display of Strider swag, actual wings probably win. He turns away and looks down, shrugging with both hands palm up. He stuffs all the medical supplies back under the sink, enjoys the simple freedom of breathing without restriction, and slinks out of the bathroom. No matter what Oriole is muttering about now, he isn't going back to his room. Bro has had maybe forty minutes now since Dave lost consciousness to start dicking around. And as loudly as Dave's instincts scream for him to go at it alone and keep his mouth shut about everything, he kind of shot that whole non-interference clause in the face when he blabbed everything to Bro.

Seriously, never taking advice from Rose and John again. Maturity is awful. Admitting he needs help with BQ situation is awful.

Growing up is a goddamn shitshow.

And now he has to deal with the consequences.

The consequences are worse than expected.

This is primarily due to the fact that when Dave rounds the corner to enter the kitchen, the sight that greets him is impossibly stupid. Oriole walks right into his back again, swearing creatively, and says, "What now?" before shouldering his way next to Dave so he too can look into the face of madness.

Dave just points.

The Badass Quandary looks up from her elegant sprawl, lounging artfully on the living room sofa, just in time for Bro to pass her a chipped mug. "Wait," Bro grunts, and then he takes the mug back.
He turns it over and three ninja stars fall out onto the floor. Then he hands it back to her and scoots the starkind under the sofa, so fast Dave almost misses it. "Little shits," Bro then says by way of greeting, nodding to Dave and Oriole as he stomps back to the kitchen and starts doing something unfathomable to a plastic electric kettle. "Act like fucking gentlemen and shut your mouth, Dave."

Dave shuts his mouth, but only because it wouldn't do him any good to try yelling, anyway. Not because Bro told him to. 'Why,' he signs, not even bothering with the question mark sign. 'Why did you do this thing.'

'Because I could,' Bro signs back, utterly without expression. 'And because you make everything more complicated than it needs to be. I swear to god, if there were a goddamn meteor about to collide with this house, you would dick around with your computer and run five time loops before just dealing with the damn problem.'

There is just nothing to say to that. Nothing at all. Dave flashsteps forward and starts signing at BQ instead, though he knows that Bro is probably still watching his hands, like the shameless spying asshole he is.

'What is this why are you here why is this even a thing.'

She cocks her head to the side, her glossy black carapace unnaturally shiny under the tacky indoor lighting. It's amazing how, other than that, she looks just as regal sitting on their shitty sofa, surrounded by ironic posters and puppet carcasses, as she would in film noir lighting on a street corner at dusk. When Bro approaches again, the carapacian holds up the mug with an elegant curl of her wrist for the elder Strider to pour something into it. Only then does she reply, sipping what smells like tea with her face in a polite mask. She signs one-handedly, her voice no less clear in Dave's head for it.

BQ: Apparently, Knight, you contacted your guardian and requested assistance in dealing with me.

BQ: Smart of you, honestly. You should never have trusted in your ability to deal with a carapacian of my caliber alone. Am I or am I not of Derse?

BQ: It would have been smarter if you did so years ago, but then, Knights were not made for perception.

'We were totally going to go confront you in the streets. It was going to be so fucking awesome,' Dave insists. 'Might even have gotten Orange-Me in on the strife action. But no, Bro asks and you just - show up?'

The carapacian rolls her white eyes, sipping on the tea again. He can't tell if Bro actually has some secret tea brewing talent he's been holding out on Dave about all these years, or if the BQ is just being flawlessly, impeccably polite about shitty tea.

BQ: Hardly.

BQ: Human beings are not supposed to be that strong. If I but had my ring -

BQ: But no. What's done is done. We made a mutual agreement that I would accompany him to the Knight's humble abode, and in exchange we would not destroy half the city in pointless confrontation.

BQ: And lo, here I am.

BQ: I even brought...company.
Her mouth twists down in a grimace.

Dave learns why when he notices the short, grey-swaddled figure sitting cross-legged on a pile of GameBro magazines. The Perfectly Mundane, 'totally-not-a-spy' carapacian looks up from her inspection of a game review at the same time Dave realizes she's probably been sitting there the whole time, watching him freak out.

…So, there really is something to that whole spy thing. Huh.

Realizing her cover has been blown, the PM launches to her feet and marches over to Dave, her frown stern as she digs into her messenger bag and whips out a thin slip of an envelope to flap at his face.

PM: Here, Knight! From my lady Querent.

PM: It is a DELIVERY of utmost priority. I only wish I had been able to deliver it when we met earlier, but it only recently reached me.

She shoves the envelope up against his sunglasses, standing on her toes to do so, and Dave finally takes it because that is embarrassingly adorable. She studies his face, gives a curt nod, and then stomps off like an alien dame on a mission towards the front door without a word.

"Leaving already, doll?" Bro asks, raising an eyebrow as she walks by him.

The pale carapacian frowns at him, her chest puffing up with righteous indignation.

PM: I have other M E S S A G E S to deliver, I'll have you know! My lady must be informed of recent events, and of the orange one! It is all very significant.

"I heard that," Oriole mutters.

"A'ight, little sister, I'm not stopping you. Take this." Bro holds out a brown paper bag. PM takes it and reads the black lettering on the side, eyes narrowed with suspicion. Whatever she reads, she flinches, eyes widening as she looks up at Bro.

PM: This is...addressed...to me?!

Bro smirks. From him, it's basically an indulgent smile. "Yup."

The carapacian clutches the lunch bag to her chest.

PM: M I N E ~

She beams up at Bro, tugs her wrappings back up over her mouth, and trots to the door, stowing the brown bag into her satchel with the utmost reverence.

'Team mom,' Dave signs. Bro - or a puppet - slaps him upside the head. By the time Dave recovers, Bro is waving PM out the door, his back turned and radiating innocence. Like he hadn't waved Dave out the door the exact same way all through elementary school.

Such a mom.

When the door closes, BQ sighs loudly in everyone's minds, a dark huff that blooms behind Dave's eyes.
BQ: She was...persistent.

BQ: Also, mail personages are terrifying. I would never dream of standing between one of them and their target.

BQ: But good Horrors above, I don't know why my counterpart insists on keeping such an...intense wildcard on the playing field.

'That?' Dave signs, irritable. 'That's why we're having this intervention you know. You and your inability to give a goddamn straight answer. I had to talk to Bro over this. It was humiliating.'

BQ: Your communication issues have nothing to do with me, Knight, and everything to do with your unique neuroticism.

"Everyone with the signing again. Dicks. All of you. Dicks," Oriole repeats, leaning against the wall dangerously close to one of the many sound systems scattered around the room.

BQ eyes the bird kid speculatively, and one eyebrow arches up.

BQ: Fascinating.

"Well, now that the little lady is off, let's talk." Bro closes the door and reappears squatting on the table in front of the sofa, his pointed shades on level with BQ's as she turns with deliberate calm to stare back. "We can start with why the hell one of you has been dicking around with my kid. Because I don't know much, but I know you shouldn't be here."

The Quandary sets the mug on the coffee table with a clink, and leans forward into Bro's personal space, lacing her fingers under her chin with an innocuous cigarette holder in hand.

And she smiles.

BQ: Oh yes.

BQ: Let's.

This is going to either be incredibly enlightening, or incredibly dumb on so many levels.

Dave can feel it.

John lives in a normal house.

It's amazing!

Jade has been around the world over the past year and a half, and often times people have offered to let her stay the night in exchange for her walloping the latest radioactive behemoth into space or deactivating a time bomb in the immediate vicinity. But there's a difference between sharing battle stories around a campfire and coming home! It's built to closely resemble the houses on either side, bland and quiet and unassuming, but John lives here, and that gives it, like, plus ten awesome points by default!

Plus, they get to fly in through the window! John flies down, still ignoring her because he has his 'intense-serious-face' on, and hovers by the open window, glancing around quickly before waving Jade down with a hand. Jade giggles and uses the top of the window as a hand hold, swinging WV in by the claw so he lands with a squeak on the bed off to the side, and then hops in herself. When she whistles, Bec follows, setting up its usual guard by the door as it sniffs the air curiously.

So! This is the residence of John!

Jade inspects things while John takes his sweet time closing the window. Textbooks litter the desk in a messy array around the computer, and Jade lifts the front flap of one book to get a peek at what John is learning. It looks like basic calculus, and John hasn't made too many mistakes on the problem set when Jade runs a cursory eye over his work. His handwriting loops, neat but large, with lazy curves in the l's and wide e's; not at all what Jade had pictured, but actually almost similar to her own, which is neat. Humming, Jade picks up a pen and scribbles out a note in the corner, pointing out a logarithmic equation that's gone slightly wrong, and softens the blow with a cheery smiley face. Few things in life cannot be improved with a smiley face, in her experience.

"What are you doing?" John sounds different than she imagined, too. Jade turns guiltily, captchalogueing the pencil behind her back to hide the evidence, and clasps her hands at parade rest.

He's tugged his mask down at last, now that they're away from that shouty red troll guy, and she gets her first real look at her brother's face and -

He's a hottie! Jade approves! He must get alllll the ladies and the dudes! But of course, they do share genes - now, between the two of them, no one will be able to resist the Harley-Egbert siblings! Seattle better watch out! She giggles at the thought. "Oh, nope, not doing anything~" she sings, smiling. "It's so good to meet you, John! I can't believe it!"

"Neither can I," John mutters, setting the dark blue mask on his bed and reaching around to unstrap that giant warhammer. He must have been pitching his voice lower earlier, or else the mask covering his mouth really altered how his voice, because he's a lot more normal-sounding now!

Jade snaps her fingers behind her back, and reaches out with her mind to captchalogue the hammer for him. She sets it right back down on the bed next to WV, rather than tucking it in the sylladex, which would have been totally rude.

John jerks as though she'd slapped him and whirls, his hands up and his guard raised as he looks down at the hammer on the bed. "Did you do that?" he asks, cautious but not really angry.

"Yup!" Jade tilts back on her heels, bouncing with her hands stretched out behind her. "I can do a lot of teleporting things! You do the wind, and I do the space! Isn't it great?"

"It's - yeah, it's amazing," John says. He's not nearly enthusiastic enough about it, though, and Jade pouts. He shakes his head and faces her full on, pushing his goggles up onto his forehead so his bangs stick up at a weird angle. "Don't see the point in hiding my face, seeing as how you already know my real name," he says, grumpily. "But I wasn't kidding before. Are you really my sister?"

Well, duh! Doesn't he know this already? Maybe John is just making sure it really is her, and not just some fake Jade off the streets. Well, good! Jade can't be the only smart one in the family! "Yup," she replies, stepping forward. "I'm older, of course! Uh, what else...Yeah! Grandpa raised me out on the island, but I know that genetically he's more like our dad. And your Grandma, Nanna, right? She's genetically our mom."

"Wait." John holds up both hands, and Jade stops moving forward. "Hold up. What. Nanna is - what are you talking about?!"

...Doesn't he know? This is preeetty basic stuff. Jade raises both eyebrows, disbelieving, and bites her lip. "Obviously," she says, tucking her hair behind her ear. It's all fallen down from the pony tail - it tends to do that - and hangs almost down to her butt, which means she should probably cut it soon. "We're the ecto-kids of Nanna Egbert and Grandpa Harley. Duh, John!"

Before John can answer, WV scrambles upright and tackles John from behind, with another high-pitched squeak of greeting. Jade kept him separated from John all through the flight here, but the carapacian doesn't seem to have learned that John is a little paranoid; he gets caught by a swirl of wind that twists around John like a whirlwind, and set back down on the floor as John eyes him warily. It had been more obvious during the flight over here, but even now Jade can sense the motion of air particles streaming in a constant dance around John's body. She can't tell if it's normal for him to have that kind of aura, or if he's being all defensive because Jade's arrival startled him.

Of course, if he had bothered to check his messages even once over the past few years, he would have known to expect her, the big dummy! She decides to say as much, because she owes John a piece of her mind! "Ugh, John, you would know all this if you'd just texted me back half the time! Why did you keep ignoring me?" She taps a foot, making her best stern, expectant expression, and waits for the logical and forgivable excuse John will no doubt give her.

John opens his mouth, shuts it, and then opens it again. "I have absolutely no idea what you're talking about," he says.

Jade stares at him, and waits for the punch line. Nanna liked something called the prankster's gambit, right? Grandpa used to chuckle about it, before he died. Jade learned a love of science and really cool guns from Grandpa, so maybe John learned pranking from his Nanna, and is trying out a prank on her to see how she'll react. Like a rite of passage.

The silence stretches out too long.

"Oh," Jade says.

"...I think I really need to go get my dad," John says, scratching his head. He gives her an apologetic look, and goes to the door. It opens and shuts with a click behind Jade's back, but she doesn't turn to look. WV whines at her nervously, folding his claws together as he looks up from the floor with worry on his usually cheerful face.

Jade doesn't move for a long time.

Of course, by the time John wanders back in, his guardian in tow, she's is soooo mad.

"What do you mean, 'you didn't know about me?!'"

Jade flops over, kicking her legs up and hooking them over the back of the couch. She glowers at John and his dad upside down, because there is just no other way to express her complete irritation at this point. For emphasis, she starts floating, too.

They've relocated to the living room downstairs, where the lighting is apparently better. She made WV stay upstairs in John's room, where he seemed happy enough to start snooping around John's things and pushing buttons on the computer keyboard, but Bec came downstairs too, as a precaution. She trusts John, but his guardian is still a bit of a mystery; since he would rarely talk to Grandpa at all, she doesn't know much about him.

"Young lady, no floating in the house," Samuel Egbert says, arms folded. He's a pretty boss looking guy despite the fact that he's in a robe and slippers. He's an office worker, but the broad shoulders still make sense - her grandpa said John's guardian used to be in the military or something! His eyes are an icy blue compared to the sky in John's, cold and sharp and assessing, with whitish blond hair.
and skin that is wayyyy paler than both of the siblings. Which makes sense. He's more like their brother-cousin than an actual parent, genetically speaking, with none of the weird cloning genetics involved in Jade and John's creation.

Jade pouts, suspecting that Nanna would have let her and John float as much as they wanted, and settles back down on the couch with a huff. A tendril of her hair lands on her face, and she twitches it out of her eyes in time to see John shoot another look at his guardian before he speaks. "I mean, I've never heard anything about having a sister before," John says, sounding frustrated. "Dad, seriously, did you know about this?"

"Of cooourse he knows!" Jade interrupts, flinging her arms out. "Grandpa told me all about you guys before he died! Including how this guy" - she jabs a finger at Samuel - "stopped answering everyone's calls! So dumb! You didn't tell John about me at all?"

This is even worse than Jade had expected. At the least, she'd thought John knew about her like she knew about him, and that for some reason he didn't care enough about his sister to answer her every once in a while. Now, it really sounds like he never got the same rundown that Jade got. Grandpa had sat her down before he died and passed on all the Secrets to her, so that she'd know what to do after he left her alone. It's how she knows all the passwords for all the secret labs, how she knows eventually they need to get in contact with the others, and how she knew where to look for John in the first place.

"Your Nanna died before you were born, John," Samuel says, sighing heavily. He sounds weary, but that's most likely because the two of them woke him up so late at night. "She told me a little about what to expect in regards to your powers, but if she knew more, she just didn't have the time to pass it on. I've worked as best as I could to raise you since then -"

"But you did hear from this Grandpa person. You heard from all of them, didn't you." John is biting the inside of his mouth, judging by the way his cheek twitches. "From Dave's Bro and Doctor Lalonde, too. How does this keep happening?"

Jade's eyes widen, but she keeps her mouth shut, even though the name Lalonde rings bells. She wants to hear Samuel's explanation, first.

"Yes, both the Striders and the Lalondes made attempts to contact me, but I brushed them off when it became clear someone in their group was compromised. I thought I'd concealed us well enough, but of course, as you know, Doctor Lalonde tracked us down easily enough." Samuel Egbert sets a hand on John's shoulder, squeezing it gently in reassurance. "I considered moving us then, but - but you were so happy with Rose. You had a friend, for the first time, and I couldn't take that from you."

John's whole body language changes so fast, Jade blinks in surprise. One moment, he's tense and confused, the way he has been basically since Jade dropped out of the sky on him; the next, he's relaxed, his shoulders lowering as his eyes close. "Yeah. Thank you," he says, quietly.

He and his dad must really trust each other, and Jade feels a pang of old grief, something she hasn't felt in a long time, over the loss of Grandpa. Every time she thinks she's over it - well. She shakes her head, so vigorously her hair flies all over the place. "And what about me?" she says, rolling over onto her belly. She summons her best pout when the two Egderps look back toward her, startled out of their father-son moment. "I know my Grandpa contacted you, too, and you had to have known I was John's sister. He told me he told you!"

John sends another fleeting look her way, his eyes wide and troubled, but much less anxious than before. "And the Harleys?" he adds, turning back to his dad. Abruptly, something shifts in John's face, and he tenses again. "Harley, as in the Harley Foundation, Dad?"
Oh good! John does know about some things! Jade grins, relieved. If he hadn't known about Grandpa's company at least, she would have just given up and made Bec explain everything while she had a nice, relaxing fury-nap. Which wouldn't have helped because Bec can't talk, but it's the principle of the thing. "Got it in one!" she replies, even though the question wasn't really aimed at her. "So?"

Samuel Egbert just sighs again. He's been doing that a lot since he first strode into John's room, took one look at Jade's hopeful, toothy, 'meeting my ecto-brother's guardian for the first time' smile, and raised his eyes to the sky as though praying for the patience to deal with two superpowered teenagers at one time. "I was aware that someone named James Harley made wild claims that you might have a genetic sibling. However, Nanna never mentioned any such thing, and so I acted with reasonable suspicion and tried to remain detached. To be honest, I didn't believe it at all and saw no reason to even think about it after a year or so, but -" He meets Jade's eyes, silent for a long moment.

She meets him eye for eye and refuses to back down. He's not confrontational, not hostile at all, but Samuel Egbert is definitely sizing Jade up as a potential threat, the same way John did earlier in the sky over Seattle. His caution has influenced John, it's clear. Grandpa always taught Jade to be cautious but also to be confident; after all, adventure comes to those who bravely seek it out! The Egberts, on the other hand, seem to place more weight on the side of analysis and precautionary measures.

This is all so interesting!

"Well, at the very least, the resemblance is uncanny," Samuel Egbert finishes at last. His hand tightens on John's shoulder, which he hasn't let go of yet. "I'm afraid I may have done both of you a disservice because of my skepticism, and I apologize, John. Given the unique circumstances of how I came to care for you, it simply seemed impossible that near-identical circumstances could have occurred halfway across the word to produce a second child."

"Well, it is a pretty weird situation," John concedes, way too easily. Jade huffs, but hey, what does she know? This all seems normal to her, but she's learned that what she considers normal - being raised by fighting robots and a wolf on an uncharted island in the middle of nowhere with a rigged volcano next door - all sound strange to the people she explains it to. And their origin story is more obscure than most! Not even Grandpa knew all the details!

Jade is certain that aliens were involved. It's always aliens.

Samuel then nods to Jade. "I apologize to you as well, young lady. May I ask - how long has your grandfather been deceased?"

Jade flips a hand dismissively, even though there's still a little pang in her chest at the reminder. "Oh, for a while. Years. Bec takes care of me, now!"

"Bec - the dog?" John repeats.

"Yeah!" Jade clicks her tongue against the back of her teeth and Bec perks up, more because it can sense her intent than from any inherent meaning in the sound. It leans near enough for Jade to sling an arm under its neck and rest her chin on the top of its head, breathing in the crackle of electricity and fur. "It's a wolf, though. Isn't that right, boy? Best friend!" She smiles and hugs the wolf tighter.

Bec stares blankly with eyes that aren't there at John, and doesn't make a sound.

"I'm sorry. I'm so, so sorry," Samuel says at last, and Jade looks up, confused, at his tone. He sounds horribly, horribly guilty, and his cold eyes have gone dark with something unnamable. "Had I known you were out there, I should have at least tried to reach out to you. A child, living by herself -
"He breaks off, head low and his eyes wet. "This should never have happened."

Jade tightens her hold on Bec, her stomach knotting a little. Oh noooo. She didn't mean to make John's guardian sad...What did she do wrong? "It was fine! And now I'm here!" she says, trying to sound encouraging.

"I should still have asked for more information with which to make my decision. But my first instinct is always to keep John safe, and not once but twice that has led to someone else's child being neglected and abandoned." Samuel Egbert pressed a hand to his face, eyes closing. He's the picture of despair, and Jade has a feeling she's missing some context here. Because really, it's not that big of a deal that she ended up alone on an island in the middle of the world's largest ocean! Really!
Grandpa made sure she'd never really be alone, so it's not like she's got psychological issues over it or anything. "I don't know that there

"It's not your fault, Dad." John touches his dad on the shoulder, more lightly than the hand Samuel placed on John. He hesitates, but smiles wide when his dad looks up. "Really. We both should have kept up with Rose, but we didn't even know the Harleys, not really. You can't blame yourself for this! I'm the one who's supposed to be the downer all the time, right?"

"Son." Samuel grips John's hand, a quick squeeze before letting his hand fall.

...They're having a father-son moment, aren't they. Jade huffs, blowing her hair out of her face, and waits for them to wrap this up. After a totally reasonable amount of time has passed, she interrupts their heartwarming moment. "Well, that's all explained," she says, kicking her heels against her butt.
"But that still doesn't excuse yoooooooooou!" She jabs a finger at John this time. "After all, I kept talking to you and you kept ignoring me, John!"

John shakes his head, looking confused again. She probably looks weird from this angle, but Jade just makes herself comfy, crossing her legs and rearranging her lab coat primly while she waits for a response. "I have no idea what you're talking about. I'm sorry, but we've never spoken before, ever."

Not from lack of trying! "I have too! I've been pestering you for years! Actual years!" Jade calls the mobile phone from her sylladex and brandishes it without hands, green sparks crackling along the metal as she switches on Pesterchum and flings it at John's head. She knows he has the power to catch it.

He does. She catches him wavering, though: John hesitates, eyes flashing, and only after a split-second of unnecessary pausing does his hand shoot out so the phone smacks against his palm. He turns it over in his hand, brows furrowed, and reads the screen, which she has set to the last time she pestered him so he can see the evidence for himself. "What is -" he starts, and then his eyes widen.
He starts scrolling up, and Jade lets him. It's not like there's anything private on that phone, anyway - she only ever used it to pester him, anyway - so it literally is all his business, things she's tried and failed to communicate to him over the years.

"Oh. Oh, fuck." John claps his hand over his mouth and darts a look at his dad, looking guilty as all get out.

"I see Karkat's influence has reached your vocabulary," Samuel says cryptically, raising a wry eyebrow and smiling a little. "I always knew this day would come."

"Sorry," John says, still flushing, and he starts scrolling again, his hand lowering from his mouth as he peruses the screen. "Oh, nooo...Jade, this is my old chumhandle."

Jade nearly slides forward off the couch. She blinks and teleports herself right-ways-up to stand by John's shoulder and lean forward. Samuel flinches bodily in her peripheral vision, but she only has eyes for the phone screen, touching a fingernail under the ghostyTrickster handle at the top of one of her innumerable messages. "What are you talking about? That's totally your chumhandle!" she insists, tapping the screen so it zooms in. "Grandpa left it for me and everything!"

John shakes his head helplessly. "I changed it - gosh, that must have been around when Rose left. Before I met Dave or Karkat, even. Years ago. I've been using ectoBiologist since then. I thought after you switched handles, they shut down the old one entirely…I had to fill out my chumlist all over again after I changed it to the new account because nothing carried over."

Even as he talks, Jade watches while John quickly types in ectoBiologist in the app's 'Add Chum' tab, and the new handle loads in the permanent list of chums along the side. Unlike ghostyTrickster, this new handle lights up blue immediately, to show that the chum in question is online.

For the second time that night, Jade is left at a total loss. John hasn't read any of her messages? Has never even received them at his new account?

...She doesn't often feel like an idiot. But right now, she's starting to. She hates the feeling; it's stupid, and she wants it to stop immediately. Clutching her fists to her temples, trying to hold back an impending headache, Jade shakes her head. "Why would you ever change it?"

John shrugs, his face sympathetic as he closes the phone and passes it back to her. She takes it with a limp hand, still staring off at the wall opposite and trying to process this. "I don't know. It just felt like it was time for a change; I'd been using that handle for all my internet nicknames since, like, the sixth grade, and it was getting kind of old and silly. And after Rose left I was - kind of in a bad place. So I switched over." His shoulders hunch a little. "So, I'm sorry. But I really never have heard from you."

"No, no. It's not your fault." Jade hangs her head, and lets out a sigh that might as well have been her entire soul heaving itself out of her throat. Then she shakes her head vigorously, hair flying, and mentally orders herself to cheer up. Alright, so she made a dumb mistake! She was probably overdue for one, anyway, after all these years of being a total genius! She grins at John until she believes it herself. "Ahaha! Wow! Now I really am sorry for showing up with no warning at all! No wonder you flipped out earlier, I feel like such a dumb!"

John smiles back at her. It's remarkably reassuring. "We just kept missing each other," he says, and he gets it. Jade just has the unmistakable sense that John understands, and that's makes the whole thing a little less embarrassing. "It's nice to meet you anyway!"

"Yeah." There's something in her throat, and she coughs until it clears up before slugging him in the shoulder. John catches himself, and by the time he's recovered she's got it together again. "Don't worry, I'll catch you up on everything you've been missing out on! I've totally got you covered, little bro! We're gonna have so much fun!"

"Well, you are welcome to stay here until we can sort this whole thing out," Samuel says, graciously. He smiles, and it's tired and a little sad, but welcoming. "If you don't have somewhere else to go…"

Oh. Right. It's something Jade rarely thought about when she still had her airplane; it had most of her bed things in the expanded storage area. But that's still off in Britain where she left it, and so for the past few weeks she has mostly been camping outdoors, using her wilderness explorer skills. In South America it had been warm enough, but the farther north she's come, the less effect spring seems to have had on the temperature. Maaaybe she could have planned this trip out a little better, but to be honest, she'd been working off the assumption that John knew about her, even if he didn't necessarily like her or her messages. To think, this whole time she's been texting into the void - ugh! How inconvenient!
Now she feels a little bad about popping up out of nowhere, but her chest fills with warmth at John's dad's offer. Now that they're past all that (in hindsight, totally reasonable) suspicion, both Egberts are smiling at her, and it feels like having a family again. "I really don't. Ahahaha, I'm sorry to impose like this," she says, rubbing the back of her head. "I guess I didn't really think this one through...I was just so excited to finally meet John in person!"

"Understandably." Samuel adjusts his robe and cocks his head to the side, considering. "I'm afraid we don't have a guest room - I converted it into a study when we first moved in, unfortunately."

"I don't need a lot of space! I make my own!" Jade says hurriedly. She really, really doesn't want to impose now, after all this. Urgh! "Maybe I can just camp out in the backyard?"

"No, no, there's no need for that," Samuel says. He looks to John. "John?"

"She can have my room," John says, nodding as though in answer to a silent question Jade missed. "I'll be fine on the couch down here for a while." He rubs the back of his head, and then looks startled, putting his hand back down as though caught in the act. Jade can't imagine why - just because she did the same thing? She wonders if John is as fascinated by the weird ways they're similar, or if he's just getting more confused without all the context Jade has the benefit of working with.

"Do you have any idea how long you'll be staying?" his dad asks.

Jade winces, realizing there's yet another flaw in her plan. She kicks at the carpet, and rubs a thumb behind Bec's ear, biting her lip. "I didn't really have a timeline, y'know," she says. "I just knew I was going to find you, and then things would go from there." A lot of the things Grandpa had told her about didn't exactly have a set time limit, after all - she'd known to meet up with John, but she'd been able to take her sweet time getting here because there was no urgent deadline. She doesn't know when everything will start picking up the pace, but it doesn't seem to have happened yet.

"Well, we'll sort something out. In the meantime, you can stay in John's room until you have a better idea of your future plans," Samuel says, stroking his chin. "You caught us off-guard, but rest assured that you are welcome here, as John's sister if nothing else. All I'd ask is that you refrain from using your powers in the upper floors - even at night, there are still windows that someone could see through. There's a training area in the basement, but it's a little early in the morning for that. You two should both try to get some sleep for now."

"Yes sir!" John says, the words tumbling out of his mouth with the ease of old habit, and Jade salutes playfully to back him up. The Egbert household is apparently a little more strict than she's used to, but she's travelled the world for years now, and she knows to respect the culture of the people she finds herself in and not be an insensitive dork about it. Samuel nods to Jade, and walks down the hall, though Jade can't tell where he's off to. "Come on, he's right," John says. He heads for the stairs.

"Don't you need to go back to hero work? I could go with you," Jade offers, even as she takes the steps two at a time behind John. "You and Hemogoblin look like you were just getting started. I'm sorry for interrupting with all this baggage, by the way. Pretty rude of me."

"Not a big deal," John says, shaking his head. "By the time I flew back out there, I'd barely have any patrol time left, anyway. School nights are awful that way, I always have to cut it short." He opens the door to his room and they walk in together. WV squeals and falls off the counter, where he's apparently been inspecting the textbooks above John's desk. Jade catches him automatically, remembers Samuel's request that she not use her powers, and then shrugs, depositing the carapacian on the bed again with a flick of her finger. She'll just have to be more careful about that in the future - it'll take some getting used to, not using her powers as often. WV, meanwhile, flails around on his back, tangling himself in the bed clothes. He's such a dork, sometimes, but that's why Jade loves him!

"I'll be on the couch downstairs if you need something." John's gaze flickers to a poster on the wall. "But. Uh. I need to change first. Do you mind…?"

"Not at all! Go ahead!" Jade says, smiling. John is such a polite guy. She might like him after all! She waits for him to start changing, hands in parade rest behind her back. She can change in a snap of her fingers, of course, but John probably doesn't have that capability.

He stares at her. Waiting for something.

She stares back.

If this is some pre-clothes-changing contest siblings engage in, bring it on.

"Are you going to change, or what?" she asks at last. Maybe that means she loses the silent staring contest, but she's just wondering. For future reference. She totally won't lose again!

"Not in front of - never mind, I'll just change in the bathroom," he says faintly, backing away. He looks at the wall poster again, then sidles to the chest of drawers and shuffles through the clothing until he withdraws dark blue pajamas and sneaks off into the restroom. He's acting very strange and awkward.

Of course, Jade extends her senses and feels behind the poster on the wall, after that little incident. Curiosity is heavy burden to bear. She can sense a hollow space - probably a safe or something - but it feels mostly empty, aside from hooks and a few shelves. She can't imagine why John was worried about it; it's not like she plans to steal his nonexistent stuff or anything!

Well, anyway. Now that the pre-changing stare off has come to an end (presumably by Jade conceding defeat), she blinks into her own night gown, her second favorite pair of pale blue slippers peeking out from beneath the hem of the long skirt. There's a blue, planetary model of an Rutherford-Bohr atom stitched onto the front, and when she gives a little twirl, the skirt billows out with a wide circumference. It's been a while since she felt secure enough to wear actual sleep clothes! Traveling the world requires precautions after all.

John changes really fast too, but he emerges from the bathroom slowly, sticking his head out first before stepping out. "Oh - uh - good night," he stammers, his uniform folded up neatly in the crook of his arm. One of the straps hangs down where he didn't tuck it in properly.

Jade reviews the interior of the hidden safe in her mind's eye, and puts two and two together. "Here!" she says, and helpfully teleports all of John's uniform - including the warhammer and the mask lying on the bed - into the safe.

"Where - Jade, what did you do with my costume?" he asks, looking around the room.

"I put it in your wall safe thing. That's where it goes, right?" she asks - just to make sure!

"Well, yeah, but…" For the first time, John doesn't look grumpy. Instead, his eyes widen a little; awe is a much more acceptable response, and Jade approves. "That's amazing, Jade. It seriously is! You don't even have to look inside the safe itself? How far can you send things?"

"My range is a couple miles - more, if Bec helps me out," she says, grinning back. "Otherwise it's harder for me to concentrate, and I could lose things along the way. I can totally show you later!"
"That would be - awesome. Yeah, definitely awesome," John says. He laughs, free and unrestrained, and it sounds so much nicer than all his hesitant, hiccupy laughs earlier. "I guess I'll see you in the morning."

"Yup. Good night! Heheh, thanks for letting me stay in your room," she replies.

"Good night," John says, stepping out of the room. He shuts the door behind him with an awkward wave, blushing, and Jade waves back before the door closes completely.

She can sense him moving down the stairs (how he resists just floating down them on the wind when Jade just wants to fly everywhere, she doesn't know), and the motion of Samuel Egbert somewhere on the first floor, but then she tunes them out, because it would be kind of rude to spy on them in their own home like that. Scratching her head, Jade makes a face at the mess her hair has become and nudges WV to the side with her butt so she can flop down on the bed next to him. "Be careful. We don't want to mess John's stuff up too much," she cautions when WV starts inspecting one of the posters on the wall with his sharp little claws. He blows a raspberry at her, and she rolls her eyes, giggling as she drags him into a headlock. "We finally made it." She pats WV on the head while the carapacian squirms. "Finally!"

WV kicks his feet and lays still, giving into the hug as always. He really is a rambunctious little dude, but as much as he fights it, he's always down for hugs, in the end. But now, more than ever, Jade wishes he could talk; she squeezes him, but the only sound he's capable of making is a faint huff of resignation. It's been fine travelling with two silent companions all this time, but now that she's in a house with two people who can speak, the two people who she'd been counting on to understand her situation, Jade feels a pang all the more over the fact that she can't discuss all these shenanigans properly with her two confidantes. Sighing, she releases WV so that he can go and fling himself into a random pile of sweaters at the end of the bed, and she ties her hair back into a braid so she can go to sleep. She was wired with energy when she and John first arrived, but all this explanation and exposition has worn her out! Sighing, she pulls back the sheets and lies down.

The pillow smells like pool. She has absolutely no idea why. What kind of weird shampoo does John use to smell like that? Maybe it's a guy thing.

At the last moment, before she closes her eyes, Jade remembers to whistle and call Bec to her side. She honestly thinks that the wolf would just stay wherever she last called it if she ever forgot it somewhere; it's perfectly content to lay down and nap until Jade is in danger or something like that. What a lazy, sleepy pet! When it pops up next to her, ears perked forward, she pets it with a few sloppy pats, and then lets her arm fall.

Maybe things didn't turn out the way she planned for her first meeting with John - but at least they're together now!

The shower starts up at six in the morning. The sudden, shrill screech of metal and then the drum of water on shower floor startles Jade awake. "Wha?" she manages, before she flails and rolls to the side, disoriented, and she tumbles off the bed with a yelp. Green crackles in her field of vision, and she catches herself so that she floats an inch above the floor, blinking dazedly. She feels groggy; she'd need another half hour of sleep to match up with her natural sleep cycles, so her eyes stick shut again as she rubs them and squints clearly to the side. A thin line of light underscores the bathroom door, way too harsh this early in the morning, and makes her eyes hurt.

Her mind takes a good minute to realize it must be John. With that settled, Jade teleports the pillow from on top of the bed and mashes her face into it, groaning with early morning despair.
WV leans over the side of the bed and scratches his head at her before crawling back into his corner. Bec, as far as she can tell, hasn't even bothered to look up. Gosh, both of her sidekicks are so...unhelpful! Jade sits with her knees on the ground and stretches, switching her glasses out of her sylladex and onto her face while another yawn racks her body. Why on earth John is waking up this early, she really can't comprehend. She really can't. Folding her arms, she thinks through some partial differential equations in her head to get her brain up and going for the day, and waits patiently for John to emerge so he can explain why this had to be a thing.

She loses patience of course. After she hears the shower turn off, Jade gets to her feet and shuffles over to knock on the bathroom door. "Joooooohn~!" She yawns halfway through, and the sing-song ends on a sleepy note. "Are you decent yet?"

"Holy -" Something crashes within the bathroom. It sounds kind of like a teenage dude body slipping and catching himself on the counter at the last minute, if Jade's space sense is correct. She hums while she waits from John to right himself. She's mostly respecting his privacy. Mostly. "Uh. Hey, Jade. Just a second ."

"I respect your right as a person to shower in peace, but I'm also asserting my birthright as elder sibling by coming in anyway!" She rolls up her sleeves and gives John ten seconds. Because she's generous that way.

"Wait - what, no!"

Jade does the thing. She teleports into the bathroom, laughing at John's bright flush in the mirror. He's totally decent, he has underwear on and everything! She doesn't know what he's all embarrassed about! "Why are you up so early?" she demands, turning the water spigots in the sink with the power of her mind and waiting until the water is neither cold nor hot before splashing water on her face. It doesn't really help wake her up, but it's a thing that people do, right? "So early, John! We could still be sleeping!"

"...Remind me that we need to talk about personal boundaries later, okay?" John says, holding up a towel over his chest as he backs away from her. She makes a face at him in the mirror, and he blushes spectacularly. "I'm sorry I woke you up, but I needed to get ready for school, and I didn't shower when we got back last night -"

Jade freezes, her hands halfway between the sink and her face. "School." She grabs John by the shoulders so she can fully express herself without him moving around. "Did you say...school?"

John meets her eyes, the blush spooked out of him, one eye twitching as a drop of water falls from his hair to the corner of his lashes. "Y-yeah. School. I know you just got into town and all, but I can't just skip out -"

"Ohmygod, you go to school!" Jade claps her hands together, shrieking a little. Her heart can't stop pounding; this is amazing news! "I can't believe it! Real school, right?! With teachers and homework and stuff!"

"Uh. Yes."

"Can I come with you?!" She leans in closer, begging John with her eyes. He can't leave her behind, he just can't! If he's going to school, she totally has to seize this opportunity to see how he's been living all this time!

"I really don't think that's a good idea," he says, his voice cracking as he leans away, clutching at his towel.
"Nooooo!" Jade exclaims. "Come on, John, I'll be great at sports! What sports do you like? I'm just as strong as you, I bet, so we could do sports and science together!" She smiles the hardest she's ever smiled. There's no way John can resist her patented earnest big sister smile. Sure, she's never used it on him before, but she's practiced! He has to give in!

He caves. "I - okay," he says, and Jade pumps her fist by her side. Another hypothesis flawlessly executed. "But, look, there have to be some ground rules -"

"Yeah, sure," Jade says, flipping her hand at him. Mission accomplished, she turns back to the sink with her hands on her hips, mentally running through her captchalogued outfits. She needs something suitable for her first day of public school! "Your rules, I've got it. Whatever. Lemme use your toothbrush!"

John blinks. "Don't you have your own?"

"Let me borrow it anyway!" Jade puts her hand out to the side palm up, and waits. She can see the toothbrush sitting by the sink, but she waits for permission regardless.

John hands it over.

He's a nice guy, Jade decides. And maybe the pesterchum thing hadn't been entirely his fault. Any guy who would willingly (by a certain stretch of the word, anyway) let a near-stranger use his toothbrush on demand can't be all that mean, not on purpose. "I guess we'll talk about it with my dad," he says, shaking his head. He grabs a shirt off the counter, angling further around Jade than he needs to - she's not that in the way of his morning routine, is she? - and pulls it over his hair. He still holds up that towel unnecessarily until he has pants on. She's starting to think John's just bashful or something. "He'll need to okay it before anything else, so no promises. It might be better for you to keep a low profile if you're going to be Sharpshooter while you're in town."

"Of course I'll be Sharpshooter, John!" she exclaims, squeezing out toothpaste on the toothbrush. She continues to talk around the toothbrush, even as she scrubs at her teeth. "But don't worry, I'll totally be on my best behavior! I won't float at your school or anything!" She spits when she's done and rinses her mouth with water, bending to sip right out of the running faucet.

"That would be awesome," John says, relaxing again. He hangs up his towel and opens the drawer next to her. Jade brings her hair brush out of her sylladex, considers showering, and then just starts combing her hair regardless. She thinks she still smells fine, and that's the ultimate test of whether she's still fit for going out in public, after all.

Beside her, John brings out a contact lens case, and she frowns at him. "What are you doing?" He has glasses like her, they're like right there beside the sink, and she can't imagine why he'd need further correction on top of that.

"Putting in contact lenses. It's part of my civilian persona," John explains. "It's only really gotten bad recently, but my eyes glow when I use my powers, and sometimes even when I'm just feeling strongly about something." He keeps poking his eye and making tiny adjustments until the lens covers up his iris entirely. Grody! Jade sticks out her tongue, making a face.

When he's done, John blinks a few times and his nice blue eyes are totally eclipsed by brown. He puts on his glasses, which just seems excessive to Jade. "There," he says, stepping back.

"Boring, boring, boring!" Jade folds her arms. "You could keep them blue, at least! Blue is cool!" She opens the bathroom door so that she can lean out. "Right, WV?"
WV chirps his assent from the bed. Of course. Because WV is supportive that way. The carapacian then wraps himself up in a cocoon of John's blankets, cooing to himself wordlessly. For no apparent reason, the carapacian proceeds to flop over sideways and rolls under the bed, blankets and all. From the shadows, a meter stick ruler pokes out and prods at Bec's nose, while a pair of white eyes squint suspiciously from the huddle of cloth. Bec whuffles, sneezing on the ruler, and then turns its head aside, resting its muzzle on its paws.

Jade has learned not to ask.

"My face would be too recognizable, then." John adjusts his glasses and tugs on the hem of his shirt. "You didn't beat up too many people last night, right?"

"Nope! I barely got anything done before you showed up."

"Good. Then hopefully no one makes the connection when I turn up with a new sibling at the same time Sharpshooter arrives in town." John sighs. "Come on. Let's go eat breakfast, if you're really coming with me."

As if there's any doubt!

- "This is your school!"

"Yep! It's not very impressive, but this is it!" John replies, his teeth flashing as he grins and points toward the front door. "Come on, we need to give Dad's note to the secretary. Otherwise people might think you're a truant or something from another school."

"Really? How weird!" Jade says, hooking her arm around John's, the one that's not clutching a thermos of coffee like it holds the secret of all life's mysteries. He laughs ruefully, but hooks his arm in return enthusiastically, and they practically drag each other toward the front office. It's a wonderful day outside, and she's kind of disappointed when they end up inside, under the artificial lights. She thinks she would prefer to go flying with John, but they're already committed to this school thing, apparently. "Are all public schools this paranoid about people showing up?"

"Around here, they are," John says, shrugging. "And remember - no flying. Please. No floating of any kind. None of it. Secret identities, remember?"

"Yeah, yeah, whatever!" Jade rolls her eyes. John is so paranoid!

The large hallway they step into is relatively empty, and Jade wonders just how early they are. John said he needed to get here at this time, but she suspects school doesn't start for a while. What a nerd! He waves to the woman behind the desk, who peers up at them from behind red spectacles and smiles when she sees John. "Hi, Ms Ivanovich. Sorry to bother you!"

"Not a problem, Mr Egbert," the woman says, waving back. "And who might this be?"

"This is my - cousin," John says, and Jade hears the stumbling pause where he nearly forgets his own cover story. Bluh! He's the one who insisted they couldn't just tell everyone they were twins - which is the truth! - because of some nonsense about it being easier to explain an estranged, recently orphaned cousin than a long lost ectobiological superpowered sister. "Jade Harley. She's only just got into town recently, but she really wanted to come with me to school for the day."

"I've hardly spent any time with you, John~!" Jade sings, interrupting John's stuttering excuses. She widens her eyes and pouts a little, tightening her grip on John's arm. "Please, Ms Ivanovich? I won't bother anyone, I promise." She crosses her fingers behind her back while she says it, though, because if even one of John's math or science teachers makes a mistake, she is gonna be all over them like honey on a hot biscuit! She'd given into the urge and pointed out all of John's totally minor mistakes in his calculus over breakfast, and if she finds out that any of his misconceptions came from faulty tutelage, she will chew them out like nobody's business. And then tutor John herself.

He's so smart - he'd only need a liiiittle help, really!

"We have a note from m-my dad," John adds, shuffling the thermos to the crook of his elbow and holding out the folded up square of paper for the secretary to read. "She'll just need a visitor's badge, right?"

"That's right," the secretary murmurs, pushing up her specs to read the note carefully. She nods, and starts typing rapidly on her keyboard. "Just a moment while I print that out for you. Everything looks like it's in order, either way. Welcome to Maple Valley, Ms Harley!"

"Thank you!" Jade hums happily and takes the sticker badge when the secretary passes it over. She rips off the backing, slaps it against the very center of her chest, and places a fist on her hip, waiting for John's seal of approval. He is the master of public school, after all!

He shakes his head, but gives her a smile and a thumb's up. She's in the clear! "Thank you again, Ms Ivanovich," he adds, nudging Jade in the side with their linked elbows and pulling them away.

They must not need to do anything else at the front desk then; Jade waves back at the secretary merrily and then skips while John leads her to the stairs. "What now, what now?" she chants, tapping her foot on the tile floor as she tries to absorb all the space around her. Lockers line the hallways, full of so many things that she just wants to run a mental comb through all of it, sort through all the minutiae of daily life that has accumulated in the corners and crevices of John's school. But that would be invading people's privacy - people who aren't John and therefore her little brother and therefore totally up for sooo much invasion of privacy. "When is your first class again?"

"Not for a half hour or so." They pass by a hall on the way to the stairwell, and Jade can sense a whole bunch of motion and movement and sound echoing down the corridor. "Mostly the only people here are band kids, but people should start pouring in at the last minute," he adds, tugging her away before the movement pulls her attention down the hallway.

"Are you in the band? Do you play an instrument?" Jade demands, almost squeaking with delight. She hadn't sensed any instruments in John's room, but maybe he practices somewhere else! "I play the flute! We could play together, it'll be so cool!"

John stops, so abruptly that Jade nearly gets yanked backward. He pauses on the first step of the stairs, and Jade waits for him to say something. She frowns at his face, though, when she sees the strange expression on his features. John is grimacing, his dumb fake-brown eyes squinted as he rubs at his temple with the knuckles of the hand with the thermos. "Do I play a..." he begins, and then he falls silent, his face spasming with confusion. "No, I don't play anything," he says at last.

"...Are you sure?" Jade has to ask, raising both eyebrows skeptically. That was really weird! How could John not remember if he played an instrument or not?

The grimace clears from his face as quickly as it appeared, and he brightens, meeting her eyes with a puzzled look. "Yeah, of course I'm sure," he says, nonplussed. "Why wouldn't I be?"

"You seemed kind of - like you were in pain? You wayyy overthought that question, you big dumbo!" Jade laughs it off, clapping John on the back with enough force that he lets out a surprised 'oof.' "Whatever, we'll have to teach you something. It is always important to balance the sciences with the arts for a truly Renaissance mind, John!"

"Like I have the kind of time to learn an instrument," John laughs, shaking his head and continuing up the stairs. "Come on, I have to meet Karkat before class. I don't how I'm going to explain all this to him…"

"Kar who?" Jade asks, as they reach the top of the stairs. John doesn't answer; instead, he picks up the pace and Jade has to hurry after him as he approaches a troll, thermos at the ready. The troll - Jade has to do a double take, because from this angle she's not seeing any horns - has his back to them and is muttering to himself rather loudly while he sorts through his locker. When John gets ten feet from the troll, this mysterious Karkat turns around without either of them saying anything, like they've gone through this routine so many times before that he has the timing down to a science - which Jade can respect!

"Mnagh," is all the troll says, before snatching up the thermos and slurping greedily.

"Good morning to you too, Karkat," John says good-naturedly.

Jade falls into place at John's left, hands in the pockets of her voluminous blue skirt. She's gone for a John theme, today. WV had been in ecstasy over all the blue. "Yes, good morning, good morning," she chimes in, bouncing up on her toes and then back on her heels, excited at the prospect of meeting one of John's friends - or at least his coffee lord. Who even knows.

The troll stops chugging long enough to complain, "John, you doltish excuse for a best friend, why the fucking fuck does it sound like there are two of -" One of Karkat's eyes pop open, and he squints at them over the thermos.

Ohhhh.

It's the shouty troll! The eyes are different, so he and John must do the same contact lens thing, and he's lost the prosthetic horns so all that are left are teeny tiny nub horns, but it's totally him. She'd recognize that irate glare anywhere!

"Hey!" Jade says. She waves, grinning widely, and can't repress a little laugh. John could have at least bothered to mention Hemogoblin hung out at the same school as him! "Good to see you~! So your name is Kaaarkat!" She winks and shoots him a pair of finger pistols. "I'm Jade!"

The ensuing splutter of coffee that emerges from the troll's mouth flies absolutely everywhere.

Sheesh, does this guy ever turn off the melodrama?

It's impressive how much air the coffee gets, actually; Jade feels drops of hot coffee splatter on her cheek. "Mnagh?!" Karkat repeats, staring at her in horror. He reaches out with a claw and clutches John's sleeve, backing away from Jade and dripping coffee on the floor. "John, John what is going on -"

"Ack! Calm down, Karkat!" John says, laughing with a weird, anxious hiccup. He goes along with the tug as Karkat yanks him around like this is pretty normal. "This is my cousin, Jade. Uh. Yeah."

"You really need to work on the shouty thing." Jade rolls her eyes. He really doesn't turn it off, does he? "That can't be good for your blood pressure."

...Heheh. Blood pressure.
She wishes she could have gotten a heads up that they were meeting Hemogoblin at school, though! She's got a few choice things to say to this guy, but John had been verrrrry clear: no talking about the hero thing at school. At all. 'Even if we're in private and totally alone and absolutely no one could hear us,' had been his exact words.

So she'll just have to wait until they leave to say anything! For now, she'll just bask in the look of abject horror on Karkat's face. Serves him right for being so rude last night!

Unfortunately, she never gets that opportunity. School is fun, even if all these teachers are preeetty sketch on some of the details of atomic-level physics, and Jade sits in the back of each class with John, swinging her legs and trying to understand how the public school system thinks they can possibly teach science effectively in a fifty minute period. Important stuff like electron configurations surely deserve more than one measly day! Jade spent ages learning Taylor series, but after that she had them down perfectly. She personally thinks that this system of forcing everyone to learn at the same pace is kind of stupid, but she's not gonna say that in front of John and make him think she's ungrateful! They'd had to really whittle his dad down to convince him to let Jade tag along, and she doesn't want that effort to have been a waste.

But then right afterward, when the last class gets out and she skips out into the hallway after John, Karkat descends on them with all the wrath a troll who's barely taller than Jade by two inches can muster. She's starting to think he's permanently stuck on the 'angry and twitchy' setting and just doesn't know how to turn it off. He drags John off through the crowd, and Jade rolls her eyes and tags along after them. Karkat throws her several glares over his shoulder as she follows, while John grimaces apologetically, and they disappear into a restroom.

If they seriously think the male-identifying sign is going to stop her, they have another thing coming. Jade strides in after them, tossing her hair over her shoulder and nearly clotheslining a troll who's just leaving.

"-please," Karkat is hissing as Jade strides in, his head low as he stares at his feet. He and John are holding hands, Karkat's knuckles pale grey with tension, and Jade realizes that maybe she should have given them privacy, because they seem to be in the middle of something. But if they needed to talk alone, they should have said something instead of just wandering off like that! Hellooo, she can't read minds!

Neither of them notice her walk in, though, so she just backs up a little, where she isn't reflected in the mirror and won't alert them to her presence. "I don't know. It would be kind of rude for me to just ditch her like that," John says reluctantly. He smooths his thumbs over Karkat's knuckles, until they relax a little. "I...don't know how smart it would be for me to leave her alone. And Denny's is far enough out of the way that I need to walk her back home first."

"Please. I just want a normal day. And pancakes. Just this once, without - people," Karkat says through gritted teeth.

Oh. They're talking about her, anyway. Well, they just lost their privacy privileges. And Jade, being the better person, can see where this is going anyway, because she is fantastic at reading between the lines. "It's fine!" she interrupts, walking forward to clap John on the back. When both of them look up from their feet and stare at her with remarkably similar, horrified expressions, she grins. What a pair of angsty dummies! No wonder they're partners! "I know the way to John's house. And I probably need to go back to John's house and make sure WV is behaving himself, anyway," she adds, shrugging. "He's so cute, but then he gets curious, and the next thing you know he's dismantling your computer to start constructing a miniature town so he can reenact a democratic voting process and set himself up as the figurehead of a new world order."

Karkat's fakey rust red eyes go slightly cross-eyed as he inches away from her. Jade isn't sure if that's a sign of an impending aneurysm in a troll, though; she'll have to research it when she gets back to the Egbert house. "Great. Fucking fantastic," he manages.

She can't even imagine what his malfunction is, now. She just hopes he isn't going to let one first impression that went slightly bad color every interaction they have; that would be so awkward.

John turns to her, and she can tell the concern on his face is probably 75% directed at Karkat, because the rest is just his eyes begging her for understanding. "Me and Karkat just need to talk about something for a while. You're sure you can get home by yourself?"

Jade preens, winking. "Of course I can! I'm pretty good at space after all."

Karkat looks like he's about to faint. This is genuinely hilarious. All day long John has groaned at her awful puns and amazingly low-key references to the space thing, and generally taken it in stride, because they share the same punny sense of humor. But Jade is starting to get the feeling that the whole 'no referencing hero work at school' rule might just be to save Hemogoblin from a health crisis.

John just winces, and shakes his head with his nose all wrinkled up, which really is the most reaction he's shown all day. "That's great. I'm sorry for ditching out like this."

"No, seriously, no worries!" Jade says grandly, shrugging with both palms up. "He's not all up to speed on me, I get it. Just don't let him bother you into missing dinner. Your dad promised he'd cook something amazing, remember!"

Samuel Egbert had made breakfast for both of them, and it's pretty safe to say that Jade may never settle for her own terrible attempts at cooking ever again. The Egbert side of the family can cook like nobody's business!

"Thanks, Jade," John says. He reaches out, even with one of Karkat's claws still hooked on his sleeve like a life line, and hugs her. It's a wonderful surprise, and Jade hugs him back, squeezing tight in a way she never can with WV for fear of hurting him. John is her brother, and they both have this strength, and that's awesome. Everything about it is awesome.

"I'll see you at home!" she says, releasing him. "Byebye, Karkat!"

Karkat gurgles something as Jade flounces out of the restroom. A guy walking in looks at her and does a double take before walking facefirst into the wall, but she ignores him. She whistles, hands thrust in her pockets, as she zones out mentally and starts retracing her and John's steps in space until she's located the Egbert house in her internal map. Usually she'd follow that up by teleporting straight to the destination, but she's trying to be good today!

It sucks that she has to split off from John so soon, but this really does work in Jade's favor.

After all, Mr Egbert still has some explaining to do.

There's just one thing Jade needs to settle. Something that's bothered her this whole time, and that she needs to have the record set straight on before she can stay in the Egbert house anymore.

She confronts Samuel Egbert in the living room. It seems like neutral territory, the place where both Egberts had seemed most at ease during their first conversation, and so after her bright greeting draws Samuel Egbert out of the kitchen, Jade tilts her head to the living room and skips ahead, with the expectation that he'll follow her.

"Jade. Where is John?" he asks, wiping his hands off on a dishtowel and setting aside the bowl of flour he's stirring by the sink. His mouth is smiling, but his eyes are hard as he joins her in the living room.

"He and Karkat went on a date or something. I could get back fine by myself." She taps the side of her head. "Internal GPS and all." She whistles loudly, because she needs Bec for this conversation. Overhead, there is a faint thump - WV falling over himself, no doubt - and then Bec materializes beside her, still as a stone.

She decides to get right to it. "Why doesn't he know anything?"

Samuel Egbert sighs, the resigned sound of a man who has been expecting this. Good. She wants them on the same page of this serious discussion. "You could go ahead and mention Skaia to him if you really wanted to see how he reacts, though I'd ask you not to," he says, staring out of the window. "The first time I tried, John was ten years old."

Jade breaks first. "...What happened?"

"His nose bled for two hours, and he was comatose for nearly half a day before he began to react to outside stimuli again. I came this close to taking him to the hospital -" John's dad hesitates, rubbing at his face "- and when he woke up, he couldn't remember a thing."

A pit is starting to swallow all the space in Jade's stomach, and she feels kind of nauseous when she tries to breathe around it. "That's not - why? You've never run any kind of tests? That seems kind of -" she breaks off, struggling to process this. "Have you ever tried again?"

"Yes," Samuel says shortly. "It's as though his brain physically can't handle thinking about...whatever happened in that game. From what I can tell when he has an episode, it seems to be some sort of absence seizure. I've tried to speak with him about all this three times in the past few weeks, since the incident in New York. But he doesn't seem to remember any of those conversations when I question him later."

No really. She feels sick.

"He will agree that something is strange about his forgetfulness, and then within an hour have forgotten he was ever worried. I've found more bloody tissue in the trash this past week than I have in all John's years of crime fighting." Samuel meets Jade's eyes, and she can see the seeds of desperation there, the source of all that worried resignation she'd seen earlier. "Perhaps you can get through to him, but I never have been able to. He doesn't know half of what he needs to know, but everything I've tried to communicate it has failed. The best I could do was train him to fight, even if he has the wrong idea of what he's supposed to be fighting against."

Jade slouches down to bury her hands in Bec's ruff of fur. She grips a little too hard, maybe, but it's not as though Bec would ever complain; it just turns and sticks its muzzle on her lap, silent and still. "But that's no good," she mumbles, half dazed, as her mind runs through the possibilities.

She had thought - she had assumed, foolishly, despite all the evidence to the contrary - that John just had to know. Had to. Jade doesn't know how she could have accepted all of the strangeness in her life, the many ways her own powers defy all natural laws, without the massive paradigm shift Grandpa had taught her about - the Skaian Paradigm. She had spent months learning to accept that things like ectobiology and paradoxifiers and temporal offshoots not only existed, but worked in spite of all laws of physics and biology to the contrary. Very few scientists in the world consider the idea of paradox space as even an interesting thought experiment - fewer still believe in it like Jade does.

Once she had accepted it, though, and learned to work within the context not just of this universe, but of all universes, those laws and patterns that define the paradox space and permeate everything around them, her powers had flourished. So many interesting new ideas to explore and experiment with! Grandpa had died soon after, and she had ridden out the guilt in a wave of furious training and research, and the assurance that somewhere out there her Grandpa lived on, though she might never meet him again. Paradox space was funny that way.

But this is - how does John explain his own powers? Does he just accept that he has them, without searching for an explanation as to why?

She swallows hard, tasting bile in her throat. If John has some kind of seizure whenever he tries to think about this kind of thing, maybe it's not that he just accepts it - maybe he has no other choice.

While she's still trying to deal with this, Samuel continues, as though one massive sucker punch of a revelation wasn't enough. "I know. I know. And nearly two years ago, he ran away from home. Not a note, not a word, just took off. Before that, he was barely even speaking to me anymore." Samuel shakes his head. He looks very tired, and Jade can't really blame him. "I somehow missed that my own child was shutting himself off, tearing himself apart fighting some enemy I couldn't even see. I found out recently that he ended up meeting with Dave Strider - the Knight, I assume you know."

Jade nods mutely. She knows about the others, and cool relief surges through her with the knowledge that she's not alone in that. John's vast gap of knowledge is just...unnerving. She even manages to summon a small smile for Samuel when he looks at her for confirmation. He smiles back, reassuring and paternal, and it soothes her even more.

"He seemed better after that. More stable." Samuel says. "I'll admit that I don't understand all the details about how you four and your powers relate to one another - a bit above my pay grade, I'm afraid! - but I do know that you seem more calm when you're in contact with one another. He could at least talk about what was bothering him, instead of hiding it from me and penning up all those emotions rather than dealing with them. And when Karkat came along, things improved even more." He sighs. "But the fact is that I can't tell where John's health issue stem from - if the depression is related to his inability to think about the game and these amnesiac spells, there's no way to tell. His mind can't even remember that it keeps resetting itself. This is something I don't know how to help him fight."

Jade gives in. She was really suspicious of this guy at first, if only because he wasn't an official guardian. In a perfect iteration of paradox space, maybe Nanna Egbert would have survived to raise both her ectobiological and her biological son, with all of the strange wisdom she and Grandpa had tried to pass on before their deaths. But it's clear that Dad Egbert is trying pretty darn hard to make sure John is okay! Jade does intend to test this claim that John reacts to the mention of Skaia with amnesia and seizures, because that is sooo not okay, and they need to get on top of it.

But it's nice to have a parental figure again, even if only by proxy! Everything feels a lot more...stable! Of course, that could just be the benefit of being near John, but if Jade spent all day trying to untangle the source of every emotion she felt, she'd never get anything done. Sometimes it's best not to overthink things!

"Don't worry, Mr Egbert!" she says, swinging her legs. She lets go of Bec and pats it with more enthusiasm on the head to let it know she's feeling better. "The only reason I was okay by myself for so long was because of Bec! But now that I'm here, me and John can start to sort all this out with you together - I don't have trouble thinking about Skaia, obviously, so I can make up for John until he can catch up." She laces her fingers together, her lips a thoughtful moue. "We miight need to get together with the others first before we can make much progress though. If John's been having trouble while he's alone, the obvious solution is to get more of us together! That way he'll be much stronger!"

"Perhaps. I'll have to contact the other guardians and make arrangements for such a meeting," Samuel concedes, tapping a finger to his chin. "From what I've gathered, Doctor Lalonde and young Mr Strider have been less than forthcoming with their own charges, but I haven't exactly been up on the times, I'm afraid, so I don't know if they've been having similar issues. It's about time we sat you all down and spoke about all this candidly, though."

"Great!" Jade hops up and stretches. "I'm off! I need to do some research before John gets back!"

"I see. Let me know if you need anything. And try not to run John too ragged," Samuel says jokingly, and Jade calls back a wordless affirmative as she heads up the stairs, taking them three at a time and maybe floating a little to manage it gracefully.

Despite everything, she thinks they're going to be okay. She and John are together, and they're going to meet up with Dave and Rose soon - how can things not be okay?

"But why did you take off your mask? Why did you bring her here?"

These are the questions that John has no answer for.

His dad is beyond frustrated by this point. John feels exposed in his pajamas, his knees curled up so he can hug his shins loosely. His dad had diverted him on his way down to the couch, and locked them in the study. John doesn't really have the heart to point out that Jade could probably just teleport right through it, because little things like walls and thick metal safe doors don't really seem to bother her.

Which is a disaster. Everything about this is a disaster, and has been ever since Jade leaned forward, a smile on her lips, and whispered his own name in his ear. This is the kind of threat Heir has never had to deal with before, a complete stranger with the power to blow his cover whenever she feels like.

He wants to look his dad in the eye and explain himself - but he can't.

How can he explain that being around Jade feels normal? How, looking back on the way the wind tugged him along, the breeze itself seems to have intended for them to meet? His dad has tried so hard to understand the exact relationship John has with the wind, but there's always that gap between them where they don't quite understand each other. All this incident has done is to widen the fracture between them again, to the point where neither can ignore it anymore.

John hasn't felt this miserable in...a long time. It feels like everything is piling on top of him again, until he can't breathe.

But his lungs are clear. The air whooshes in and out with ease, sinking into alveoli until the oxygen passes on through, into the bloodstream. What comes out is higher in carbon dioxide, but it's still air. If he concentrates on the air instead of his own guilt-laden thoughts, the amplitude and frequency of his breathing rhythm feels like a metronome, strong and unflagging with the measured regularity of sleep -
That's when he finally realizes he's feeling Jade's breathing.

His perception yanks back into the shuddering pair of lungs in his own body, sitting on the chair before his dad's desk, on the verge of hyperventilating.

Jade's breathing feels more familiar than Karkat's, than even his dad's, so similar to John's own that there might as well be no difference, and he doesn't know why.

"I'm trying to understand, son, I really am, but you have to help me," his dad continues, rubbing at the bare field of stubble begin to rise up along his jaw. He's gnawing on his unlit pipe, which is never a good sign. He'd given up the actual habit of smoking soon after John's sensitivity to the air became clear, but Samuel Egbert's collection of magnificent pipes remains preserved in the study. "We have a system. We have precautionary measures. It should never have come to this."

"I know," John repeats, closing his eyes. "But she knew my name, and I overreacted too obviously - in front of Hemogoblin, even. I had to make a decision, and it felt like the only way to control the situation was to keep her where we could see her. As long as she's here and entertained, she's not telling the entire world about who I am. I don't really see how else we could deal with her."

He wants to float out of the window, so that the cool night air can cradle him until all the emotional gunk is vented out of his system. Worse, he wants to stop by his bedroom and grab Jade first, so they can wander over to Karkat's house and all three can fly under the stars. The sheer irrationality of the thought makes his head ache, because Jade is a stranger and Karkat doesn't know, but John can't help but want it anyway.

Hell, why not add in Rose and Dave for good measure? He wants all of his friends here, right now, so he can stop forcing himself to think that Jade is a threat when all of his instincts scream that she isn't. If they were altogether, everything would be alright.

Just another thing he can't explain properly to his dad. Another chink in their relationship, caused by John's own dumb brain. Because John can't pull himself together and act like a rational human being.

"...I see." Samuel bites down so hard on the pipe that the polished wood creaks, but it's a contemplative chomp as opposed to the furious gnawing earlier, so John tries not to let it get him down. "We seem to keep coming up against situations that I just can't prepare you for in advance," he sighs. He sits on the edge of the desk, his shoulders slumped enough that he's no longer towering over John. It helps.

"A space-powered super hero twin sister - I mean, who saw that coming?" John says, trying for a joke, but feeling his momentum peter out.

"Where you and your friends are concerned, I've begun to suspect that very few things are beyond the realm of possibility." Samuel taps a finger on his keyboard, and his desktop computer starts to boot up with a slow whine. "Don't worry, I'll be getting in touch with the Harley Foundation. I'm sure if anyone can confirm Miss Harley's identity, it would be the people who should have been keeping an eye on the heir to the company."

"If it helps, I can research Sharpshooter more on the Internet. I'm sure Karkat will be all over it once word gets around that she's in town." John can already picture it. Karkat never really got hardcore into Hemogoblin, but his enthusiasm for Heir still borders on the fetishistic. His reaction to Sharpshooter might be unpredictable - because Karkat either hates something or he becomes unnervingly obsessed about it, with no room for neutrality - but John can still feel an intense research jam session on the horizon. Karkat researches everything hero-related to point of obsession.
Samuel laughs, and removes the pipe from the corner of his mouth, setting it down on a spare coaster while he sits down at his computer. "You two are the experts at the Internet, of course," he agrees. "Just be particularly careful about how much you give away to Karkat with all this. The longer Miss Harley lingers here, the more likely it will be that people make the connection between her arrival and the appearance of a new hero, and Karkat is a sharp kid."

This is true. Karkat may be perpetually angry (and stupid about certain things, like getting a normal amount of sleep!), but John has also spent a good amount of the two years of their friendship struggling to stay a step ahead of Karkat's keen eye for all things Heir-related. Karkat is one of those people, the ones who overanalyze everything and have an impassioned theory for every minute detail of the television shows and comic series that catch his eye. Most of the time it's adorable, but sometimes it's downright terrifying how scary accurate Karkat's predictions can be.

"I'll do my best," he promises. "As long as Jade agrees to keep quiet about everything, I think she'll keep her word, at least for now. Whatever she wants, it seems to involve cooperating with us."

That's the key to staying objective. Just focus on the fact that Jade must have some kind of motive in being here. Maybe it's as simple as she claims, that she wanted to meet John because they were siblings. Maybe that's really it. And John would be okay with that, because having a sibling has the potential for some totally cool shenanigans! But also maybe she's here to commit some sort unspeakably underhanded, convoluted scheme and reveal herself as a villain.

...John needs to lay off the comic books, clearly.

"I want you safe," Samuel repeats, and there is a moment, however brief, in which John wants nothing more than to reach out and punch his father square in the jaw. He is so sick of being safe that it feels like more a cage than -

"And John?" Samuel is still talking, and John is dizzy with the need to move, to get out of this locked room and out into the night air. "If she's your sister, then that means keeping her safe, too."

Oh. John freezes - and then, slowly, he feels something in his chest unknot so his lungs expand. A little of the weight lifts, and it doesn't seem so urgent that he get outside.

That helps. Knowing that Jade is included under his dad's umbrella of safety, that helps a lot. It really shouldn't though. Oops.

- John lets Karkat hold his hand all the way to Denny's.

Well. Not like that's a hardship or anything! But John's hand starts sweating immediately because he's holding hands with Karkat and that's a huge deal, especially since they're walking into Denny's and all the world can witness their lascivious hand holding. Karkat does get clingy and feelsy, but only in the safe-zone of either his or John's house, where he doesn't have to maintain that patented Vantas perma-rage for an audience.

So the fact that Karkat clamps down like a vice and drags him into the restaurant with a clawed thumb rubbing circles along the side of John's hand really says something about Karkat's state of mind. He's clearly got no fucks left to give about public displays of affection. And Karkat can act like he doesn't care about the rest of the world, but he does. It's really, really obvious how much he cares, sometimes.

"You have a cousin? What the fuck, John!" is Karkat's opening whisper-yell, even as they wait for the host to escort them to a table.

Oh yeah. All bets are off with Karkat, today.

John winces. Because for some reason, the universe has decided to hand him one more massive secret that he has to keep from Karkat at all costs, and he's sick of lying all the time! "Uh, yeah!" he laughs. It comes out shaky. "It's kind of a surprise to me, too - her guardian died reeeally suddenly, so she's staying with us right now!"

He laughs again. He's probably laughing too much, because Karkat is eyeing him suspiciously. That's a thing according to Jade, though John doesn't know how much credit to give her when they've only known each other for a day. Someone would have mentioned it before, right? His dad? Karkat? Anyone?

Karkat groans and lets his head fall forward, mashing a palm to his face. The host just ignores their antics and stalks off, and it's up to John to pull Karkat along until they reach the table. "And just how long is she hanging around?" Karkat asks, voice muffled by his hand.

"No idea," John admits, because he really doesn't know! Jade doesn't seem to have had any plan aside from meeting John - at least, none that she's talked about, anyway. It's easy, way too easy, for John to trust her, and he has to keep reminding himself of his dad's words of warning. They don't actually know this girl, and this irrepressible, instinctive trust should make John suspicious, too.

He takes a moment to silently hope that Jade and his dad get along alright in the house without John there as a buffer. He's never known his dad to be anything other than unfailingly polite, even in the weirdest of circumstances, but there's a first time for everything! And Jade isn't as much of a rule-follower as John, if her willingness to teleport at a whim is any indication. She has none of John's restraint, and if he's honest with himself, she has a lot more power to throw around. She moves faster than him with her 'spacey thing', which counts for a lot in a one-on-one fight.

Karkat mutters something to himself; it sounds like a truly magnificent jumble of swearwords, spiced up with vows to extinguish a certain someone's family line through sheer concentrated rage, so John just kind of tunes it out until Karkat's volume rises again. "I need so many pancakes after today, John. So many."

John sits across the table from Karkat, flushing when Karkat continues to squeeze his hand and the host gives them a patronizing raised eyebrow worthy of Rose. He and Karkat aren't exactly demonstrative in public, and PDA in Denny's really is a new level of weirdly embarrassing. "Then we will get you all the pancakes. All of them," he promises, wondering what has stressed Karkat out this time. It can't just be Jade, right? "And then you can nap again."

Karkat glares at him over his facepalm in progress. John meets him stare for stare, channeling his dad's patented 'stern frown' until Karkat groans and bangs his head against the table in surrender. "As long as your equally-bucktoothed cousin stays at least thirty feet away from my house at all times, no problem," he says vehemently, and John twitches at the venom in Karkat's tone. Karkat is unendingly irritated, yeah, but he sounds really...choleric. Choleric is a good word for it. "Seriously. I am so fucking serious right now, I could shit sincerity. I don't want her anywhere near me."

"Karkat, gross!" John wrinkles his nose and opens the menu. Not that he really needs to read it to know that he's going to get his usual indulgence of whole-wheat blueberry pancakes and a veggie-cheese omelet. "Did Jade really make that bad of an impression? She seems really nice!" A little over-enthusiastic, and kind of goofy maybe, but in a good way!

...No, stopppp, brain! John smacks himself inwardly. Suspicion! Healthy suspicion! He can't let himself get so complacent!

"'Seems,' he says," Karkat mutters, letting go of John's hand to seize his glass of water and chug it. He slams the glass back down with a resounding clank. "Look, just, how well do you know this girl? You've never fucking mentioned her before, so where the bulgesucking fuck did she come from?"

John gets the feeling that Karkat has been sitting on these burning questions all day. The troll had sat in horrified silence while Jade dominated conversation with other members of the swim team at lunch, and then Karkat had cut and run early before John could say anything. John hadn't been all that gung-ho about eating inside the cafeteria, either, but Jade had pouted him into it. Karkat, who's even less sociable than John on his best days, had been lucky to escape. "I didn't know about her. Apparently my dad was never really close to her side of the family."

Every word of those sentences is true, and yet John still feels yucky because it's all in the service of the larger deception. He hates it, hates it, hates it! "But she's our age," he adds, scrunching up his nose, "so even if she ends up staying with us for a while, we won't all be in one house for long."

"Oh, fuck." Karkat sinks lower in his seat. He sighs and fixes his glasses, which sit halfway off his face from all his antics. "Look, she hasn't said anything...weird to you, has she?"

John tells the solemn truth. "Every word out of her mouth is weird. She's like weird embodied in human form. There isn't even a handle for her to do a pirouette off at this point - she is the handle."

Karkat, if it's even possible, sinks down further. His knees knock against John's under the table, and he sighs. "Why am I not surprised."

The waiter stops by, and John nudges Karkat with an insistent knee. Karkat flops over sideways, tugging on the strings of his hoodie until only his eyes are visible. It is the most furious pout John has ever been on the receiving end of, made all the more effective because Karkat's eyes are still swollen and dark with exhaustion, and John is a sucker for Karkat at the best of times. "He'll have a blueberry pancake breakfast. With hashbrowns." Karkat taps him on the ankle, and John sighs. "And eggs."

Karkat mutters a thank you after the waiter moves off, and is relatively silent for the rest of the meal. Which is really weird.

Like, holy crap, is this weird. Karkat hasn't been this quiet since - ever! A Karkat who's not keeping up a constant stream of swears and commentary is a Karkat John doesn't know how to handle. He chatters at Karkat nonstop, a stream of gossip and speculation on everything from the dome over LA to the new spate of furious battle royales between the Indigo Scourge and Blind Justice that are tearing up the streets of Chicago on an near-hourly basis. He's careful to avoid mentioning Sharpshooter, even in passing, because he checked all the online news outlets today and found no mention of her arrival in Seattle that civilian-John could use as a cover. "'M just...fucking tired, okay," Karkat mumbles when the meal is over, and that's John's cue to flag the waiter down by waving at him across the restaurant. He may or may not stand up on his chair to do so, which is dumb enough that Karkat starts ranting at him in a low hiss about 'acceptable levels of dumbassery in a public setting.'

John smiles and sits back down in his seat, grinning broadly because as long as Karkat can rant coherently, they're okay.

John insists on driving again, since Karkat is so tired. This time around, however, Karkat is...well, awake.
"JOHN, HOLY SHIT USE THE BRAKES- AGH!"

"I know how to drive, Karkat!" John protests, slowing to a nice, gradual stop at the stop sign that he totally saw.

"YOU KNOW HOW TO COMMIT VEHICULAR MANSLAUGHTER, YOU ASS," Karkat yells, one hand gripping his seatbelt and the other clawing at the overhead handle like pulling on it hard enough will yank the car to a halt. His eyes skitter over the road, searching for any incoming vehicles as though he fears John will pull out into the intersection in front of oncoming traffic on purpose. "WHO THE FUCK LET YOU HAVE A DRIVER'S LICENCE, I WILL FUCKING MAIM THEM."

John's silence lasts too long. "Heheh?" he offers, smiling weakly, and then he whistles to himself, concentrating on the road while he applies the slightest pressure to the accelerator.

Karkat's jaw drops in utter horror. "JOHNATHAN EGBERT."

Ohhhhh, no. "No, I'm pretty sure I have one - maybe, it's been a while -" John says, digging one hand into his pocket for his wallet. He thinks he saw his license in there last...maybe...possibly...

"I DON'T BELIEVE YOU, YOU G- THAT IS A SMALL CHILD JOHN DON'T YOU DARE HIT -" Karkat lets out a strangled scream as John stops and waves the kid and his mom across the street with a friendly wave. The mother gives their car a strange look, and it occurs to John that having a raving troll throw a ragefit in the passenger's seat might not actually be as common a sight for other people as it is for him. "DO YOU THINK I WRIGGLED OUT OF A PUDDLE OF SLIME YESTERDAY?!"

"I swear, I just don't have it on me right now!" John gives up looking for his wallet, because he needs to pay attention to the road.

Karkat grabs at the steering wheel, and then seems to think better of it, letting go like he burned his claws. He switches back to the age old tactic of the Vantas clan instead. "LET ME DRIVE JOHN, RIGHT THE FUCK NOW. PULL THIS CAR OVER BEFORE WE DIE SOME HORRIBLY CLICHEDE TEENAGE DEATH!"

"We are so not going to die, Karkat! Trust me!"

"YOU ARE NOT PLAYING THE TRUST CARD. I ABSOLUTELY FUCKING FORBID IT. TRUST HAS NO PLACE IN THIS CAR WHEN YOU ARE BEHIND THE WHEEL OF OUR DESTINY."

"We're almost home, look!"

"FUCK. FUCKING. FUCK."

All in all, by the time John flawlessly parallel parks the car in front of Karkat's house, the troll has exhausted himself. John pats him on the side of the face with his best soothing expression of sympathy plastered across his face. Karkat rolls his head to the side, eyes squinted up with exhausted rage, and raises a shaky middle finger.

"That's the spirit!" John says, encouragingly.

Karkat glowers. "Take me to my room, and leave me there to die in peace," he grumbles, turning over in his seat. He refuses to undo the seatbelt, clutching at the strap with both claws, but John manages to extricate him and drag him into the house with minimal effort. Crabdad is asleep on a pile of cardboard boxes in the kitchen which have been there basically since Karkat moved in, and they tiptoe past the entryway without waking him up. John feels bad, but Karkat's naptime is precious enough as it is without throwing another episode of 'Crabdad Throws a Hilariously Concerned Fit' into the mix. There's still sopor slime crusted on the carpet from yesterday, and he pokes at it with his toe. This is clearly a mistake, because even dried up sopor slime is apparently gross, vaguely moist slime, and he glances at Karkat's turned back anxiously before wiping his toe off on another section of carpet.

"I don't need you to watch me sleep," Karkat says.

John wonders, sometimes, just how long Karkat had to train to reach that level of moody, grumpy-faced denial. It must be like obtaining a black belt in karate or something - a lifelong effort. "I'll be here anyway," he says, shrugging off his backpack and digging out his calculus textbook. "Working on my homework. I don't really think that Jade would be conducive to studying anyway." John isn't entirely sure that Jade is aware of how homework works. She left corrections in five different kinds of ink all over his work from last night, and gave him a mini-lecture on quantum superposition theory on the way to school this morning. It was all supposedly vital to the story of how she got a carapacian for a sidekick, but John still has noooo idea where she was going with all that.

Whatever. At this rate, Jade would probably either volunteer to do his homework for him (which would defeat the purpose of it!) or insist that John needs 'more of a challenge' and start quizzing him on advanced differential equations without letting him use a calculator. Better to finish all the science and math stuff while he's here and Jade is far, far away...

Karkat stiffens, and then crawls into the recooperacoon. "Actually, I would appreciate it," he says, every word sounding as though he has to pry it out with pliers, "if you stayed. You know. Just for a little."

John blinks. "Well, good! Because that's the plan," he says. Karkat looks mollified, and sinks back into the sopor, muttering something that John doesn't quite catch.

John takes advantage of Karkat's marathon nap sessions to once again catch up on all his texts. He doesn't remember being so popular before! But now he's juggling not just Dave and Rose but Jade as well, and he looks back on his unthinking willingness to give her his real chumhandle with a kind of fond, distant regard for his unsuspecting past self.

Because Jade can talk. All of his friends are so talkative! John has to really apply himself to keep up with each pester log window, thumbing between them at intervals while maintaining three conversations at once.

GG: john~!
GG: :/
GG: are you and karkat done with your date yet???
EB: ack!
EB: it's not like that jade!
GG: of course it is, john!
GG: i am a well-travelled woman of science with a pair of functioning ganderbulbs in her head
GG: and you two are kind of obvious?
EB: it's just
EB: complicated, okay?
GG: complicated, shmomplicated!
GG: you two should both come here instead!
GG: and then we'd be 'in a secure place' and blah blah blah GG: and we could all talk properly and wv can show you his latest invention! im so proud of him, you have to come support his scientific endeavors!
GG: also i want to know why karkat is so grumpy at me still!
EB: haha, that's just kind of his default setting. most of the time he doesn't really mean it.
EB: well. he means it. buuuut...not in a bad way?
EB: just in a karkat way!
GG: he sounds prickly
GG: like a cactus!
GG: karkat cactus!
EB: ...
GG: ...
GG: wiggles eyebrows
EB: okay, you got me! :D
GG: yay! :D

It devolves into a rampant pun fest from there. John makes a mental note to spam Dave with some of this choice wordsmithery, because Dave can deny it all he wants but John knows that deep down he toootally likes puns, too!

TG: john egbert
TG: please
TG: no more
TG: i surrender to your whims
TG: use me like generic store brand extra soft tissue paper
TG: throw me away like a rich ass millionaire tossing a couple grand at a hooker TG: but please
TG: no more puns
EB: eheheh, i can't help it!
TG: she is an awful influence on you
TG: do you need an intervention eb?
TG: because im sure sunny d and rose strider would be down for an intervention
TG: it would get their creepy headshrinker glands all warm and tingly i just know it
EB: rose strider? is that actually a thing? :O
EB: i knew she was still mad about her mom, but is she really going to change her name?!
TG: no
TG: not yet
TG: but it could be
TG: im just converting all the ladies to striderism
TG: tell me john egbert can i interest you in a fine name swap today TG: you will receive an honorary pair of swagtastic sunglasses and free swordkind lessons until you reach the level of not suckage with a specibus thats not a giant ass hammer EB: such temptation!
EB: think i can just tack it on the end of egbert-harley?
TG: absolutely not this is all or nothing my man
TG: have to keep the line pure
TG: besides if you keep that up suddenly youll wind up with something ridiculous
TG: like john egbert-harley-vantas-strider
TG: and nobody wants that bro
TG: nobody
EB: would that even fit on a driver's license…
TG: yeah no
TG: as if you'd ever get behind the wheel of a car that would be a goddamn shitshow EB: you've never even driven with me before!
TG: i can sense it
EB: bluhbluhbluh!
EB: so have you given any thought to EB: THE PLAN~~~
EB: :?
TG: yes
TG: and i have reached the ineffable conclusion that said plan
TG: is stupid as fuck
EB: come on, even rose approved it!
EB: just talk to him for once!
TG: no
EB: yes
TG: no
EB: yessss
TG: no
EB: yeeESSS
TG: no
EB: y~~~es!
TG: it doesn't matter how many different ways you say it TG: absolutely not

Things continue in that vein.

Rose is heading off to Chicago for some vague, unspecified reason that has to do with her girrrrlfriend, a moniker that has John making raised eyebrows and winky faces all over the pester log as he tries and fails to tease Rose. But sadly, Rose is immune to his efforts to fluster her, mostly because she's way better at using her psychological thingy to turn all of John's remarks against him.

She also keeps asking him all these weird questions, lately, and he isn't sure how to respond to them. He's starting to anticipate the nosebleeds before they even happen, but that doesn't mean he understands why they're happening whenever Rose tries to talk about...certain things that John can't quite remember.

TT: We're passing through Pittsburgh even as I type.
EB: really? what's it like?
TT: Fine enough from a distance, but subpar upon closer inspection. I would be perfectly fine with never returning.
EB: that's a shame.
EB: but you think you'll be in chicago by tonight?
TT: Kanaya and I hope to complete this particular errand post haste. And she tends to drive most dangerously when she has a goal to motivate her.
TT: Her reflexes are astonishingly fast, and yet I still find myself…
EB: terrified?
TT: That would be suitable descriptor, yes.
EB: aw, you'll be fine rose! just keep me posted!
TT: Of course.
EB: i still don't get why you guys are so interested in blind justice and scourge tho.
EB: i mean YEAH, you totally called it :P
EB: but why would kanaya be involved?
TT: I have discussed it with Kanaya, and she is fine with you knowing. As chance may have it, my companion is rather more familiar with the situation than I may have led you to believe. She has personal stakes in regulating the explosive black affair currently playing itself out on the unsuspecting streets of Chicago. She has been in contact with both heroes, but they have shut her out over the past few days. It only seems to infuriate her all the more.
EB: oohhh, so it's an auspice thing! that's neat!
TT: Oh? John Egbert, quelle surprise - I had no idea your moirallegiance would lead you to such uncharacteristic awareness of the four quadrants.
EB: karkat is secretly a huge romance movie fan.
EB: like omg troll sleepless in seattle is probably his favorite movie, even more than batman! it's crazy!
TT: And you've watched said films with him? If I had known your taste in movies could be coaxed beyond the niche of superheroes and Nicolas Cage, I would have introduced you to some of my more palatable post-modernist fare ages ago, John.
EB: oh man, rose!
EB: as fun as that sounds -
EB: no way. ever. :/
TT: I see. What a shame. Perhaps Karkat and I can form an alliance and persuade you on the subject.
TT: Have you considered my earlier proposition further? I understand that with your unexpected new guest, having two extra visitors descend upon your residence might not be easy to clear with your father. But Kanaya and I are more than capable of finding other lodgings to stay at. I only wish to see you in person.
EB: no, i haven't talked to him yet, but you know my dad won't say no to you visiting, rose! i want to see you too!
EB: you're right that we're pretty much out of beds here, though, and i don't want to stick you and kanaya on the couch or anything...that would just be mean!
TT: It truly is no trouble. We don't wish to impose on your father excessively, and with each passing hour I can sense that the probability of my mother making a repeat appearance grows ever more likely. She would complicate matters...unnecessarily.
EB: she still has some explaining to do...
TT: Nothing that she would be willing to explain, for whatever convoluted reasons she's justified in her own head. Sometimes I think she simply can't help it - like all of her research into the obfuscating effects of the void have simply taken an icepick to the part of her mind that would allow her to simply explain things.
EB: don't worry, i'll talk with dad about it before i go to work tonight, and maybe he and your mom can talk it out!
EB: i don't get all the void and magic stuff, but we'll be okay once you're here!
TT: Fair enough.
TT: Pardon me, Kanaya is attempting to merge onto a highway. This requires...foresight.
EB: go for it! good luck in chicago!
TT: Be safe tonight, John.

Yeah. John can only imagine how that conversation will go over with his dad. But he shoves it to the back of his mind, where he has a good buildup of gross, depressing thoughts to deal with later. He hears a faint gurgle from within the 'coon, and tosses his phone out of the splash zone before Karkat emerges in a sputtering panic. He seize one of Karkat's claws right as it reaches out, and squeezes as hard as he dares so Karkat knows he's not alone.
"Ugh! John, you're too paranoid!"

Jade snaps her fingers, and is abruptly standing in the middle of John's room in full costume. John stares, nonplussed, but Jade keeps right on talking, as though she didn't just waltz out of the bathroom in only a towel and then switch over into a catsuit in the blink of an eye.

...Maybe she's a magical girl, and he just missed the flashy transformation sequence? Most likely it was some brand new bizarre aspect of her space powers, but when it comes to other heroes, and to Jade in particular, John has learned not to judge.

"But don't worry, we're going to get you to loosen up!" she says, combing her wet hair back from her face. She has a lot of hair, a curly brown-black tangle that crackles with green static electricity as she uses the towel to dry it. Even as John watches, the strands start to untangle themselves, limned with green, and arrange themselves into mess of braids to keep Jade's hair out of her face. "Tonight is going to be so much fun! So much! Maybe even Mr Grumpy Troll will cheer up!"

It takes John a minute to switch gears, from civilian life to hero work, and for a confused moment he thinks Jade is still talking about Karkat. "Oh, you mean Hemogoblin," he realizes, laughing. He takes out his keys and starts inputting the code for the safe in the wall, which he'd been in the middle of doing before Jade swanned into the bedroom. "He's not normally that edgy - he's had a rough week with some bad press and I guess it got him more wound up than usual. Normally he's a lot more…"

"...Grumpy?" Jade suggests, wiggling her eyebrow.

"Cool," John decides. Yeah. Hemogoblin is...so cool. John opens his safe in a daze and gathers all of his stuff into his arms, his mind occupied by thoughts both appropriate and otherwise. He tucks Casey under his chin and then shoulders the safe door closed.

Jade is still standing between him and the (relative) safety of the bathroom, which is the only place John can change as of late. She raises both eyebrows and keeps them up for a long moment, and then huffs, shrugging, and moves out of his way. "Ookay, I guess he is your partner. You probably know him better than I do. But if he gets sharpish with me again, I'll kick him in the booty!" She trots over to the bed and scoops up her carapacian friend, WV. The stocky alien spent all day digging through John's belongings and is now sporting a cape that John is pretty sure used to be his old pillow case.

WV is cute, don't get him wrong! But John's also concerned about having a mute, mostly powerless little dude tagging along for something as hazardous as crime-fighting. Only a few months ago John wouldn't have been so worried - but a few months ago, he hadn't had the Midnight Crew blowing up buildings all across his city! He's got to think about these things! "Should he really come along?" John wonders, shifting his weight as he looks between WV and the bathroom. "I get that he's your sidekick and all, but isn't it kind of dangerous?"

"Nah, I don't think WV wants to come along tonight. He's being feistier than usual," Jade sighs, even as the carapacian squirms around in her headlock and kicks her with a thin, pointy foot. WV can't speak, but a high-pitched whine of protest comes out of his mouth as he flails his arms and fights to break free. Jade pats him on the head, oblivious to just how little WV seems to like being picked up. "And I've been trying not to teleport him a lot. He got pretty sick a while ago, so for the first few nights he should probably sit this out. Is that okay with you, Vee?" she asks, looking down at the carapacian.
Having exhausted himself fighting her grip, WV punches Jade in the hip and jabs his claw at the ground. This time, Jade obeys and sets him down. He scuttles under the bed and starts chirping to himself. A single claw reaches up and starts dragging John's covers off the bed to hang as curtains over the gap between the floor and the mattress frame.

...It's a fort!

"Yeah, looks like he's making a fort town. We should probably leave him to it, or he might make us stay and participate in the democratic process," Jade says. She claps her hands together loudly and John jumps back. "Hurry up and get changed, silly! Let's go let's go let's go!"

"Ack! I'm going!" John yelps, and he runs into the bathroom. He fails to see Becquerel lying splayed out on its side just inside the threshold; only the quick intervention of the wind catches John before he faceplants on the tile floor. Floating there, John looks back, and sees Bec roll over onto its back, completely unbothered.

Too nervous to pick up the wolf and try moving it outside the bathroom, John closes the door on Jade's impatient face and tries not to think about the wolf's unseen eyes as he starts changing into his Heir costume.

Bec sneezes so hard its whole body lights up with a galaxy. John falls over into the shower.

"Do you and Hemogoblin always travel separately?" Sharpshooter asks. "It seems like a lot of hassle when you could just fly him right over. I'm sure he'd appreciate it!"

Heir made the executive decision that the two heroes would fly out to Seattle tonight, as opposed to having Sharpshooter teleport them around everywhere. Sharpshooter had just laughed and started floating alongside him, lying on her back while she continues to chatter at him while they zoom over to the center of the city.

Even with Bec an ominous, hovering presence coasting along some hundred feet beneath for whatever reason - the blank faced wolf is inscrutable - Heir feels relaxed. He's spent years flying to work by himself, but having Jade (Sharpshooter, he has to correct himself, Sharpshooter) along for the flight is surprisingly not-annoying. She cuts through the air without being carried by it, but if Heir wanted to he could reach out and brush her arm with a hand whenever he likes, and her lungs inhale and exhale the air so evenly that Heir finds himself unconsciously mimicking her breathing rhythm.

It feels easy. Like coming home. Like lying awake at night in the hot, humid Houston air and listening to Dave's fluttering, too-quick breathing over the influx of air through the hole in the wall, or sleeping over at Rose's house as a kid and giggling together under blanket forts and stacks of heavy fantasy books, or even just sprawling out on a pile of random stuff with Karkat and letting the troll shoosh them both into some semblance of peace.

But with Sharpshooter, the line seems even thinner. Heir thinks it's really too easy for him to believe that she's his twin sister. In fact, whatever her motives, he does believe her.

"He has his own way of getting into town, I guess." He doesn't mention the fact that he has no idea where Hemogoblin lives; that much, at least, should be a given. "We're both pretty private about that kind of thing."

"So it's just one of those arbitrary things! Ugh, I don't know how you function with all these rules, John!" Sharpshooter does a flip in midair, grabbing her own ankles and spinning forward so her lab coat flares up toward the night sky. "We need to get you a hobby that's not hero work or something~"

Wait - hold on - "Don't say my name," Heir hisses, the shock cold in his chest. All the relaxation rips away, and he's left tense and smarting as they fly over the lake and into Seattle itself. "Oh my god, no, no, Sharpshooter, we need to turn around right now! You can't say my civilian name out loud like that, shiiiit -"

"No one's even around!" Sharpshooter barrel rolls and tackle hugs him from the side, and Heir comes thisclose to tossing her off him in a frenzy. She hooks an arm around her neck and keeps propelling them forward, even when Heir asks the wind to drag them backward. "Okay, Heir! Heir, see, I said it! The Heir of Breath!"

"You could forget," Heir says, the scene playing itself out in his mind with unnerving clarity. "You might just slip up once, and that's it. Or what if I call you Jade?! Agh! I did it now, too! This was a dumb idea! So dumb!"

Sharpshooter laughs, and then reaches up and pulls off Heir's hood, slamming her knuckles down and giving him a noogie. "Don't lose it, Heir! Everything's going to be fine! Because I'm here!"

"Just. No names. None," he warns, tugging on the arm around his neck. "Not mine or yours or anyone's. Not even last names. Nothing."

"Yup!" she says, nodding vigorously. "You got it! Now come on, I want to race you! It'll be fun!"

He reaches over and messes up her hair with a blast from one of his trailing breezes. Sharpshooter giggles at him and kicks away to fly by herself, her hair blowing in the wind like the braid never existed.

- Sharpshooter drops on Hemogoblin like a satellite out of orbit, howling with laughter all the way. Hemogoblin dodges out of her line of fire, but Sharpshooter giggles and glows green just before she would have slammed into the ground. She vanishes and this time lands with an elbow digging into the troll's ribs. "Heyyyyy!" she says. "Are you still Mr Grumpy Bossy Pants, or are you in a better mood today?"

Hemogoblin turns to Heir, grimacing. "You kept her?"

"Rude!" Sharpshooter smacks Hemogoblin on the back. Judging by the look on the troll's face, she doesn't hold back, either. "I'm his sister, not his pet!"

"She wanted to help out, and it's not as though I have any right to tell her what to do," Heir says. Time to play damage control, before these two start trying to throw down again. He plants both feet on the ground - which requires conscious effort lately; he thinks Jade is already rubbing off on him more than he'd like - and walks forward, hooking his arm with Sharpshooter's to tug her away. She comes, but only with an impatient huff. He smiles apologetically at Hemogoblin, who looks like he's fighting off a major headache. "You two can play nice for now, right? We're all heroes here."

"Yup!" Sharpshooter agrees immediately. She nods, and her sincerity brightens her face. For a moment Heir can't even process it; from anyone else it might have been sarcastic or reluctant, but Sharpshooter schools her confrontational, bold grin into a true apology. "I didn't mean to cause all that ruckus yesterday, honest! I got over excited. So I'm sorry for getting all up in your face."
Hemogoblin looks like he's swallowing nails, his mouth twisted and working as though he needs to swallow down several choice comments before settling in what he's going to say. "Fine," he says. He taps a claw against the side of his thigh, his red eyes alight with something unreadable. Heir is very conscious of being the focus of that scrutiny, and he shifts his weight. "Can I have a word?" Hemogoblin says at last. "Alone," he adds, leveling a piercing glare at Sharpshooter. Sharpshooter plants a fist on her hip; Heir can feel it when she juts her chin forward in a challenge.

...Awk. Well, Heir couldn't have expected that to actually work the first time. He's probably not cut out for auspicing, anyway. "No problem." He lets go of Sharpshooter and steps away, eyeballing her until she sighs and smiles. "We'll catch up with you later!"

"If you can!" she cackles, tapping her heels together. She starts floating again, her hair crackling as she whistles. "I bet I can take down like five criminals while you two are blabbing again!"

"We'll see about that," Heir says, laughing. It startles him, bursting out of his chest without warning, and Sharpshooter disappears with a brisk salute.

"Sshrmtrnw," a dark voice mutters.

"Wha?" Heir blinks, having completely missed what Hemogoblin said.

Hemogoblin folds his arms over the red streak across his chest, glowering at the ground by Heir's feet. "So she's your new partner now," he says, his volume tenuous but rising with every word.

"What?! No!" Heir yelps, shaking his head. Thoughts of how well Sharpshooter is going to keep her word once she's out of sight and loose in his city fly out of his head. "No, she's - it's a really weird story, but she actually probably is my sister! So I kind of have to look out for her, now!"

"You're kidding," Hemogoblin says flatly.

"No, seriously!" Heir rubs the back of his head, drifting closer to Hemogoblin. "But it's not like I trust her or anything." He totally does. "She just shows up out of nowhere, after all these years without a word? Definitely fishy stuff, right?" He raises both eyebrows at Hemogoblin, because he can't move any closer without risking a repeat of that whole pacifying freak-out incident. He's just gonna...keep a respectful distance. "I mean, you'll help me keep an eye on her, right?"

Hemogoblin scans Heir's face, and Heir projects 'she's not my partner' as hard as he can with a hopeful look on his face. "Obviously." Hemogoblin unfolds his arms, a hint of a smirk in the corner of his mouth. "What would you do without me here to help keep your new stray in line?"

"I'd be doomed. So doomed." Heir ducks his head, smiling with relief.

Without prior warning, Hemogoblin takes a step forward, and whookay Heir was definitely not the one to initiate this kind of proximity. No way is this one on him. Hemogoblin leans forward, radiating body heat that Heir can feel because he is right there, like oh my god it's really hot out here isn't it? A few inches more and there wouldn't even be space between them. Hemogoblin tilts his head to the side; like, wow, he has long eyelashes. Just. Really pretty eyes. That's. Oh crap. Heir suspects he's blushing hardcore. "Any other unknown family members I should know about?"

Hemogoblin murmurs. "Long-lost cousins, perhaps?"

"Nope!" Heir's voice breaks twice in one word, and that's a feat he hasn't matched since he finished puberty! "Not that I'm aware of, anyway. But if I've had a secret sister this whole time, a whole other branch of the family would just be terrifying!"

Cold air washes over Heir as Hemogoblin spins on his heel and strides away. The sudden absence of breathing on his neck leaves Heir at a lost, and he only notices he's leaning forward at an odd angle, blinking, after Hemogoblin has put a good few feet between them again. He snaps to attention, shaking off his daze.

...He still feels like he missed half of that conversation. Maybe while he was incredibly distracted by a near-Hemogoblin encounter. But Hemogoblin seems to think the conversation is over, regardless of how more or less incoherent Heir might have been. "So you'll hang out with me tonight?" he asks.

Hemogoblin looks back, and grins long and slow. "Of course, Heir. As though I'd really let some space witch interrupt our quality time together." He hooks his thumb upward at the sky. "We should catch up and show her how a real team kicks some ass."

His cheeks still warm, Heir grins. "Hell yeah," he agrees, and he wraps the wind around them both to fly them above the rooftops. "Just let me know if you notice anything involving lime green and/or really loud puns," he says.

"Like that?" Hemogoblin points to the west. When he adjusts his goggles and squints in that direction, Heir can just make out the faint electric green glow of Sharpshooter's powers activating somewhere deep in an alleyway. "Sweet taintchafing fuck, does she have no idea what the word 'subtlety' means?"

"The dictionary definition, yes. Practicing it - highly unlikely." Heir twists his hand and guides them forward, the wind ferrying Hemogoblin along a few feet ahead so he can keep the troll in sight. For some reason, the winds bear Hemogoblin forward much more quickly than they do Heir. But they continue to circulate in constant motion around Heir, and that's why it takes him a few seconds to realize Hemogoblin is the only one actually moving.

He can't move forward.

Also, there's this weird hissing noise in his ears. It sounds distant, and Heir scratches his ear, frowning, half sure he's just imagining things.

"Heir? What's up?"

"I - wait a second." Heir feels his eyes start to burn, and he suspects they're lighting up a brilliant blue as he exerts more pressure on his connection to the wind, silently inquiring why he isn't moving. Rather than replying, a curl of air winds around his waist and urges him backward, ruffling the buckles of his costume and whistling in his ear with urgency.

For whatever reason, the wind doesn't want him to go that direction. Which is weird, because the breeze had been pretty enthusiastic about leading him toward Sharpshooter last night! What the heck has changed?

"I can't move," he tells Hemogoblin. To, you know, keep the other hero on the level. And just to see if Hemogoblin might have any ideas on how to unstick super powers that are being flighty. Again.

What is that noise?!
Hemogoblin smacks his own face. "It's just one thing after another with us," he say gloomily. "Are you broken? Warn me now, before I fall out of the sky."

"No," Heir says slowly. "No, this has happened before. The wind doesn't want me to go over there."

"…Can you talk to it, now?" Hemogoblin deadpans.

ssssshhhhhhhhh

Heir rolls his eyes. "Nooo. I just get impressions. But the last time the wind was reluctant like this, there was a huge -" sshhhhhhHHHHBOOM!

Approximately a mile to the northwest - not the alley Sharpshooter's glow is emanating from, Heir sees with relief - a building explodes into flames.

Then the shock wave hits them, and he realizes that, yes, he is in fact getting caught the blast of an explosion. Again.

At this rate, Dave is going to start a betting pool, and that's just not cool!

Luckily, he and Hemogoblin are far enough away that when Heir raises both hands and brings the wind shrieking in a wide arc in front of them, the blast knocks them back a few feet, without doing much more damage. His left ear pops with a punch of pain, and Heir claps a hand to cover it, but he grits his teeth and keeps his other hand up, clenching his fist as the winds batter him in a frenzy, torn between protecting him, keeping both heroes aloft, and resisting the pull of the wind and sound that slams into them from the direction of the detonation. Sirens start up immediately, along with a flurry of faint screams that rise up from the street nearest the blast site.

"OH FOR THE LOVE OF THE MOTHER GRUB'S GAPING SEEDFLAP, I AM SO SICK OF EXPLOSIONS!" Hemogoblin screams. And goddamn, Heir's ears are ringing and he feels half-deaf, so the troll must have quite the impressive yell for it to register! "DO YOU ALL HAVE SOME KIND OF BULGE-FONDLING SICK FETISH FOR BLOWING THINGS UP BECAUSE FUCK YOU. FUCK. YOU. LEARN A NEW TRICK, ASSHATS!"

"Ja- Sharpshooter!" Heir shouts. He can barely hear himself, and his ear twinges again at the vibrations from his own mouth. He takes his hand off it, and grimaces at the line of blood oozing down the center of his palm. That's one eardrum down, then. But Jade had been just a little bit closer...

He casts out a breeze, urging it to carry his shout to Sharpshooter's ears, but before he can zoom more than a foot in Hemogoblin's direction Sharpshooter appears in a burst of light. "Heir! Hemogoblin!" she yells, flipping her feet down so she's mostly upright. Her hair, already in disarray before from the wind, is now a tangled, floating wreck that hangs around her like a shocky bush, and the white of her lab coat is speckled with debris and smears of charcoal. "What just happened?! Are you guys okay?"

"I just happened."

All three heroes stared at each other for a long second, and Heir can see the same mixture of confusion and dazed suspicion on both Hemogoblin and Sharpshooter's faces as they glance at each other.

Then, as one, they all look down at the roof beneath their feet.
Three people stand on the roof, their positions roughly corresponding with the three heroes' positions in the air. One of them Heir recognizes on sight, and he bristles; Crichton gazes up at Hemogoblin with wide, bulging eyes, laughing breathlessly as he grins with too many teeth at the troll. Hemogoblin snarls with rage, and the winds struggle to maintain their grip on the troll hero when he starts thrashing and trying to kick his way down to roof level. Heir doesn't oblige, keeping the other hero elevated so they can assess the situation better. "Oh, fan-fucking-tastic, it's you again," Hemogoblin says, lifting his wrist and digging a claw into the pale grey flesh exposed by the triangle in his gloves. "You fuckface, I should have recognized your unmistakable aura of putrid, lying bullshittery from ten excrement-paved miles away."

"My, such inventive language." The figure standing between the two black-suited men towers over them by a good foot, long and slim with legs that go on for days. She's dressed to the nines in a slimming black suit, an overcoat that buttons down the front at a jaunty angle, and an amazingly classy hat. It's actually difficult to assign a gender to her mentally, with the coat's clean, straight lines revealing nothing but the curve of her hips, but Heir takes another sneaking look and spies a pair of three inch heels. Not exactly a deciding factor, because dudes can wear makeup and heels too, but for now she's a tentative she in Heir's assessment. Unlike the other two, who are in the standard all-black uniform of the Midnight Crew, however, the newcomer has added a white tie to her ensemble, a pale spot that knots in the hollow of her throat.

She holds out a gloved hand, the motion efficient and graceful. "Marlowe?" The third man presents a mysterious device to the woman without comment, and she casts a dark eye over it, nodding. "As expected. Go on ahead and escort our good friend Crichton out of here."

"Can't I stay, my lady?" Crichton turns to the woman with wide eyes, falling to his knees. "Please, let me help deal with these blasphemous upstarts!"

"That will...not be necessary." The woman's lip curls. "Now, Marlowe."

The third man strides over to the kneeling sycophant, manhandling him into an upright position, and then drags Crichton away without ever having said a word. Crichton throws a ferocious scowl back at Hemogoblin, who snarls right back, but his last, lingering stare is reserved for the woman who now stands alone on the roof, her back straight and unbending. He looks at her like she's a god, but the woman doesn't spare her minions a second glance.

That's when it clicks. Heir scans the woman's coat again, and this time he catches sight of the tiny, stylized diamond embroidered around the top buttonhole. When she raises a hand and waves two fingers up at the heroes by way of greeting, a slow smile on her face, Heir exchanges a look with Hemogoblin.

Diamonds Droog.

"Did you say you did that?!" Sharpshooter bursts out, losing her patience. Heir gestures at her frantically to quiet down, but his sister plants her fists on her hips and glowers down at the incredibly dangerous mob boss. Heir is spreading out his sense of the wind in all directions, and hasn't found any backup goons with rifles - yet. He doubts Droog only brought two thugs along to a confrontation as bold as this. "You better have a preeeeetty good explanation for that, mister!"

"Ma'am," Droog corrects, almost absently. She taps a gloved finger to plum-purple painted lips. "Just wanted to get your attention, you busy kids. I'm not much of one for groundwork like Hearts, so I thought I'd defer to his impeccable judgment in how to flag you down." The sarcasm is so thick by the end of her reply that Heir wonders if anything this woman says is meant sincerely. "Mission accomplished, I see."
"You guys have seriously got to lay off the explosions. I think you broke my partner," Heir says, frowning. Hemogoblin, who is still muttering under his breath at what he probably thinks is a low enough volume that Heir can't hear, just throws him an aggrieved look and goes back to complaining about overdone, clichéd opening moves.

"Hearts is an ossified hoodlum. All brawn and brute force." Droog shrugs. "I assure you, I'm only in town to deal with you. You all got off on the wrong foot with the Crew, and I assure you, the blame most likely lies entirely with Hearts. Whatcha say, kid?" Her eyes glint in the light of the explosion. She tucks both hands into the pockets of her coat, smiling crookedly. "We can settle this like civilized people, still. I think you'll find me more amenable to compromise than a brute like Hearts. If you stay outta my way, I'll stay outta yours."

"Like that's ever going to happen!" Heir cross his arms.

"You just blew up a fucking building! What if there had been people in there?!" Hemogoblin adds, throwing up both arms. One wrist is now sporting a bloody sickle. "Fuck you and your sanctimonious compromise, you set that insane lying asshole on me! You're going to jail!"

"Oh?" Droog arches an eyebrow, and turns her attention to Sharpshooter. "You haven't noticed, yet? So much for space, I suppose."

"Sharpshooter? What does she mean?" Heir asks. He looks at Sharpshooter's face in time to see her blanche, all the color rushing out of her dark cheeks and leaving her pale. "Sharpshooter?!

The other hero gives a tiny shake of her head, her eyes distant and widened with horror. "Oh," she says in a small voice. "Oh, no."

"Hey, idiot, clue us in!" Hemogoblin snaps.

"There are people in the building," Sharpshooter says. "The one she just blew up. There are still people moving in there."

What.

"You blew up a building with people in it?!" Heir yells, the wind rising as he whirls on Droog.

"What the fuck!"

Droog sighs, but her smile is unwavering and unconcerned. "Of course I did," she says, fanning out her fingers. "Difficult to find a place that's still well occupied at this time of night. You birds keep late hours. Tut, tut." She shrugs. "But as luck would have it, call centers work around the clock. Plenty of potential casualties in a three story building like that."

It's like a smack in the face. Hearts Boxcars had been a violent, menacing asshole, but he'd at least had the decency to blow up empty warehouses. The sheer nonchalance on Droog's face as she discusses the odds that she's just blown up a building full of innocent bystanders takes Heir's breath away - and not in a good way. "You're a monster," Heir spits, fists clenched by his sides.

"I," Droog says, her voice cold, "am not Hearts. And I do not piss around, boy." She shakes her head, and when she speaks again her voice has returned to normal. "It wasn't all that significant an explosive device, but the building will collapse, eventually. If you want to rescue all your precious civilians, I would hurry if I were you." She laughs. "Between you and the young witch here, I have no doubt you'll be able to save them. You're a couple of capable young live wires, no?"
"And while we do that, you get away." Heir grits his teeth. The wind yanks on his costume, urging him toward the burning building in a complete turnaround from the way it had held him back from flying headfirst into the explosion earlier.

"Oh, most likely," Droog says, tucking a stray curl of dark hair back into the coiffe under her hat. Her smile has gone odd, but Heir can't place what's changed, not with the panic and fury that set his heart pounding.

"I'm going," Sharpshooter announces, her face still pale. "Heir, I'm going, I'll start teleporting people out -"

"Go!" Heir agrees, and Sharpshooter lets fly a high pitched whistle to summon Bec as she teleports, leaving Heir and Hemogoblin alone in the air.

They need to save those people. But Droog is still smiling up at them, the picture of composed elegance, and it grates on Heir, knowing that this smug bastard will walk away to wreak even more havoc, with even less restraint than it seems Hearts Boxcars had.

"Put me down," Hemogoblin says.

Heir glances at the other hero sharply. "You sure?" he asks, speaking so low that Hemogoblin only hears, the words carried on the wind. No way for Droog to overhear them.

Hemogoblin nods, cracking the knuckles of his free hand. "Amazingly enough, I'm the only asshole hero here who can't do the goddamn teleport thing. I'd be next to useless clearing a burning building. Let me handle this soul-sucking nubfucker while you two get those people out." He catches Heir's eye, his expression intense but no longer a mask of blind fury.

Hemogoblin looks...focused. Still angry, yeah, but Heir can tell the troll has got his head back in the game. And hand-to-hand combat is definitely more along the troll's line of expertise than mass rescue attempts. "Kick her butt, man. You've got this."

Hemogoblin grins, bright and feral. "Of course I do. Now put me down, you floating dick."

Heir flattens out his palm and asks the wind to lightly drop Hemogoblin onto the roof below. The troll lands in a nimble crouch, and stands before Droog, the crimson red parts of his costume bright like human blood against the backdrop of the darkened roof.

Then, sucking in a breath full of cinders and the heavy, stifling tang of smoke, Heir narrows his focus on the image of the burning building, and winds up his power until his chest screams with pain and he's gone.

Hemogoblin has had a very, very shitty day.

The kind of day where the universe spontaneously pops an inexplicable hate-boner, and decides to get its rocks off by tormenting some poor asshole. The kind of day that usually leaves the unsuspecting dumbass who ended up on the receiving end of all that fuckery calloused and broken, a shell of their former self.

Not Hemogoblin, though. He's lived through an entire day of Jade motherfucking Harley dangling his secret identity in front of his face and expecting him to grin and bear it as though nothing is wrong. He spent a whole fruitless afternoon napping just to keep John from being alone in a room with his new hellion of a cousin on the off chance that she might just decide to let it slip that Karkat is Hemogoblin. He has blazed his way through a buck-toothed female human-infested hell and emerged fire-forged, with a new personal store of hatred no doubt potent enough to hate a hole through to the core of the planet. He could just unleash the hatepocalypse, but he is a merciful and benevolent tyrant, and John would probably disapprove of him annihilating the planet. Even hypothetically.

But no. All this hate can't go to waste. It still has to go somewhere.

Basically? He is going to wreck this human's shit.

"Excellent. Hemogoblin, yes?" Droog says, lowering her gaze to smile sideways at Hemogoblin after Heir hightails it to evacuate civilians. "I've been told you're new here. Heir, we have plenty of reports of, but you're still a novelty."

"What can I say, I like the element of secrecy." He grimaces. "Which you fucked up. Thanks for that." He settles his feet in a fighting stance, raising a sickle to point at her. He's got two formed now, one for each arm, the better to fight with. He always feels more balanced with a specibus in each hand. "Now are you going to come quietly or not, Droog?"

The woman shrugs, but Hemogoblin spies the flicker of movement as a wooden rod thumps into her gloved palm. She catches his eye and winks, flicking the weapon out to the side. It's a cue stick, carved of heavy dark wood, and Droog twirls it expertly in her palm as though it weighs nothing at all. "Come on then, boy. Let us see what you're capable of," she says, tapping the cue stick against her shoulder and gesturing with the other hand. "If it's a fight you want, I'm more than happy to oblige."

There's probably a way to resolve this without violence. Hemogoblin is so not interested. He drops low and runs forward, moving to kick Droog's legs out from under her. He raises the solid guard of his blood-fashioned sickle over his head in anticipation of the cuestickkind that lashes out to meet him.

It doesn't hurt, per say, when the sickle cracks. The blood doesn't have nerve endings to let him feel pain, after all. But Hemogoblin still feels the sickening crunch when the cue stick raps the sickle with enough force to make it splinter, and his intense awareness of the blood fragments as red chunks of dried blood scatter across the roof. He bites down on his lip hard against a yelp of surprise, and darts back out of range before Droog can land another devastating blow on something more vulnerable and squishy than the sickle.

Droog hasn't even moved from where she stood when Hemogoblin first struck. She just brought the cue stick down in one smooth motion, with no wasted motion or effort. The smile has left her face though, and her expression is impassive as she raises the strife specibus. "Mmm. Quick enough. But rather brittle," she comments, flicking the cue stick out again. "Come on, kid. Try again."

Okay. Fuck. Hemogoblin has a good idea of just how sturdy and sharp he can make those sickles - sharp enough to cut people, but if he went up against, say, a brick wall, he'd lose.

Apparently, Droog hits hard enough that the brick wall would probably tap out. Hemogoblin keeps his distance as he edges around the human in a circle, looking for a weak point. The problem is, she's got a longer range than him, and can probably pack a much harder punch.

When he thinks he has it, he moves in again. This time he waits until Droog has already begun her swing before he jumps up and over the cue stick, aiming a flying jump kick at her face. He connects and kicking someone in the face has never felt so fucking satisfying.
Then a hand clamps around his arm like a vice, squeezing so hard he thinks it might bruise through to the bone, and then she tosses him unceremoniously to the side. He rolls over onto his shoulder and skids to a stop, smirking at his moment of triumph.

Droog touches her cheek, drumming her fingers against the flat plane where Hemogoblin drilled his heel. For someone who just took a kick to the face, she doesn't seem affected. Her hat hasn't even moved out of place. "One last try." Droog steps back into her original place - he'd at least been able to knock her back a step, but he wishes she'd at least look a little pissed about the face shot. "Surely you can do a little better than that."

By now, Hemogoblin is fuming, but he also has two sicklekind again. His bloodpusher is working double time to keep up with the adrenaline, and he uses that to his advantage, layering more material than usual on one of the blades to see if he can build a less brittle specibus, one that can hold up under Droog's strength for more than a hot second. When he finishes, he attacks head on, slicing out with both sickles in an effort to cut that cuestickkind down to size.

Droog sniffs, and flicks her wrist. The cue stick flies out, and smashes through the sickle aimed at her arm without pause, like none of his extra effort at beefing it up did any good. But the second sickle makes its mark, and Hemogoblin hisses with triumph as he slices through layers of thick cloth to score a long line along the right side of Droog's torso. The human steps back this time; when Hemogoblin jumps forward to slash at her arm and (hopefully) cut her strength in half, she then steps into his guard and turns, coolly seizing him by the arm and twisting him over her hip. He lands on his side behind her, and drags himself upright.

"Alright," Droog says. Her breath is smooth and even, her chest barely heaving despite all the action thus far. She touches a few fingers to the cut in her side, fingering the shredded, bloodied folds of her coat before letting her hand fall. "I believe I've seen enough. You're good, boy. Most wouldn't have lasted five minutes in the ring with me."

"Shut up," Hemogoblin snarls, rolling back onto his feet. The sickle takes precious time to reform, but Droog doesn't press her advantage while Hemogoblin coaxes his pulse into a new weapon, a blessing he doesn't fucking question. "We're not done here."

"No. We really are." Droog fixes her hat. Curls have fallen loose on either side of her face, the only sign that she's shifted at all throughout the fight aside from the bloody tears in her clothing. "The boss only asked me to test you, see. The problem is, he was quite clear that play fighting like this wasn't on the agenda."

She moves too fast. Far faster than she has so far, and that's when Hemogoblin knows she really has been playing with him.

The cue stick imbeds itself through the right side of his torso and shoves out through his back. Hemogoblin stumbles back, staring down and grabbing the cue stick with a weak grip, stunned. The pain only hits after she rips the weapon back out. Hemogoblin stumbles back, yelling hoarsely, and presses both claws to the new stab wound he's obtained in basically the same place as last time.

First that carapacian asshole starts poking holes in him, and now this? Fuck this!

"He's far more interested," Droog continues, smiling, "in knowing just how much damage you can take."

And then she breaks out into a frenzy. The cue stick cracks against the side of Hemogoblin's head and slams him sideways; Droog follows the spin through and whips the weapon down in one smooth motion. He throws himself out of the way, landing hard on the roof, and that's the only reason she doesn't break his fucking shoulder, FUCK.

Droog doesn't wait for him to recover. All of her toying patience and elegant maneuvers are gone;
she barrels down on him with the cue stick already lashing out repeatedly, furious and unrelenting.
What the fuck did he do to piss her off like this?! He catches the next blow aimed at his head with an arcing line of blood from his side, but then she kicks out with her high heel and shoves him down with just the point of her heel so that he sprawls out on his back. He's almost got this goddamn gaping hole in his side staunched, and after that he can start to fight back without his kidney and gill filaments bleeding out everywhere. But the cost of this rapid healing is that he can barely see past the red fog covering his vision.

It occurs to him that he may have severely overestimated how prepared he was for this fight. Like.
Holy fuck. This is turning into a painful shitshow, and how the fuck long does it take for two teleporting dumbasses to clear a three story building?!

"Ah. Healing factor," Droog says, somewhere overhead. "How troublesome." Hemogoblin is too sunk into his blood to focus elsewhere, but he has the sense to scoot backwards, trying to stay out of her range. Just a little bit more -

A hand claws at the fabric of his costume and yanks him upright. Hemogoblin shakes his head and snarls, leaving the wound half-healed so he can bring his palm up into the underside of Droog's chin.

Her head jerks back, but she doesn't even make a sound of pain. "Do you know what I do to boys with a healing factor?" she asks, her voice soft and sweet as she smiles at him. Her eyes, though -

Her eyes are bored.

Droog pulls him forward - she's holding his entire body up with one hand, how the fucking fuck is she this strong? - and when she whispers, her breath ghosts over his ear.

"I hit them," she says, "until they stop moving."

The fist that ploughs into Hemogoblin's stomach hits right in the stab wound, and Hemogoblin's vision goes white with pain. "Fu-agh!" he bites out. His body tries to curl up and flinch away, but she's still dangling him by the collar of his suit and there's nowhere to go.

Time to fix that, before she starts breaking more bones. There's nothing he can do to heal broken bones faster, and his ribs are already screaming from those first few jabs. This woman is blueblood strong, and that's not normal. Hemogoblin seizes her by the shoulders and drives his knee into her stomach. His own stab wound rips open, and he can feel the blood draining warm and wet down the side of his leg. If he can pull it back in and start weaponizing it again -

Droog punches him again, this time square in the center of his chest, and he feels the ribs break. It's neat and simple and when he coughs explosively his lungs don't respond. Karkat hacks and punches Droog in the face, but he can't breathe. His chest hitches again and again; maybe a little air gets through, but the fact that his ribs are stabbing into his lungs puts the whole breathing thing on hold.

That's the thing about blood, though. If it's not oxygenated, what's the fucking point? Black spots start to eat up Karkat's vision when the lack of fresh air starts to sink into his brain. Fuck fuck fuck fuckkk -

"How disappointing," Droog says. She must let go of his collar, because Karkat drops to the ground, too distracted with knitting up the holes in his lungs to feel his knees scrape against the roof. A fresh starburst of pain slams into Karkat's shoulder, and then another pummels his right calf when he tries to curl up in a defensive ball.

And that's when he realizes she's systematically stabbing and jabbing at him, prodding at vulnerable points and laying out crushing blows to break bones.

With a goddamn cue stick.

"I'm not entirely sure what god tier is," Droog muses incomprehensibly. "But I'm fairly sure that you're not one of them. The good Doctor will be so...unsurprised, no doubt."

Karkat would have a few choice words about where she could stick this fresh mumbo jumbo. But he's also busy passing the fuck out from pain and lack of air, so fuck it.

But someone else picks up where he can't.

SS: Hey, Diamonds. Lay offa my stabkid.

SS: I've got a bone to pick with yah.

Karkat blacks out, but he's pretty sure that last part was a hallucination. Like, 85% sure.

(His nightmares rise up to greet him like an old friend.)

Spades Slick is not a hallucination. He is insulted by the very insinuation of such a thing.

Spades squints at Diamonds Droog, but he doesn't wait for her to turn and face him; he lunges forward quickly and gets in a quick series of stabs before scooting backward, his knifekind still at the ready. The woman presses a hand to the deepest of the wounds in her back, grimacing, but the light of avid hate burns in her eyes when she lays eyes on Spades. Behind her, a certain troll that Spades owes a certain unfortunate obligation to lies in a puddle of his own blood, which is not normal. Blood is that kid's thing, so why the fuck ain't he using it? What kind of hero lets a little thing like being unconscious stop him from doing ridiculous blood power things.

"Spades," Diamonds says, teeth bared. "After giving me the run-around all day and night, all I had to do to get your undivided attention was beat up a hero? If I'd known, I would have tried it sooner. You are testing my patience."

SS: Like hell I am, you barely had any patience to begin with.

SS: C'mon, you pansy, you and your new boss have been trying to track me since Kazakhstan - here I am!

Diamonds never could resist a challenge. She advances on Spades, her lips tight with the strain of maintaining her smooth expression. Spades will give her that - Diamonds may be a squishy human at the moment, but she's still got class. Her hat is as phenomenal as usual.

But hats ain't got shit to do with fighting. And it looks like Spades is gonna have to defend the goddamn Knight, which is messed up. Knights are defender classes - what was this dumb troll punk thinking, wandering around trying to defend only himself? Where in this forsaken Skaia-cursed rock was -

Two kids pop out in the sky above the roof, and one of them yells. "Hemogoblin!" They both plummet to the roof behind Diamonds and kneel beside Karkat, panicking like the hyperactive kids they are.

Diamonds looks up, too and has to settle into a fighting stance that divides her attention between Spades and the two hero kids, for which Spades is privately grateful. He can't afford to let himself be so easily distracted when he's up against her. Diamonds always has been the closest to him in strength and fighting prowess, and a Diamonds fighting two fronts is all the more preferable.

It's the Heir, who Spades has heard tell of from as far away as New York, and, surprisingly, the Witch, who he hasn't even bothered to ask around about since he hitched a ride with her off that despicably humid island. Either one of them would have worked as a potential player to defend to give a Knight a boost in a fight - both on the field would have been more than enough to fend off Diamonds.

Dumb. Ass. Punks.

SS: Get him outta here, yah sorry excuse for an Heir!

SS: Diamonds 'n me, we still got a score to settle.

The green Witch reaches out before the Heir can reply, grabbing him and Spades's blood oath brother by the shoulder and yanking at the fabric of paradox space until they all three vanish.

Good. The oath stops nagging Spades right away, and he can turn to face Diamonds again without that load of crap weighing on his conscience.

"Shame they left without noticing," the human says, staring up into the sky as though she could track the progress of three people at the mercy of a space hero. Which she couldn't. Probably Spades certainly can't. "I would have dearly loved to see how they reacted to my little...adjustments."

SS: Tha' hell you talkin' about, dame?

He growls when she smiles, his shoulders hunching up. Well, he never has good posture at the best of times, so it just worsens, but to hell with that; posture is for fuckin' sissies as long as his darling isn't here to chide him about the state of his 'deportment.'

Diamonds just hums, and it's damn well unnatural how she doesn't need to use any hand signs, how the words that emerge from her mouth are wide-mouthed human babble instead of normal carapacian speech. The cue stick remains in one hand, coated with drying blood, while the other hand is occupied with holding something Spades can't quite make out. "Nothing. Just a little...costume change for our mutual troll friend."

The human smiles wider, and shit. She may not remember, but Spades does, and he knows that infuriating, taunting smirk. Diamonds's eyes gleam with amusement as she spins something around her finger and then, chuckling, tosses the object to the ground between them. Spades lunges backward, ready for an explosion or some other kind of attack. 'S the thing when you're dealing with a crazy, double-crossin' bird like Diamonds - the dame is scary good, and she's hitting on all six cylinders if her flawlessly executed beat down of Karkat is any indication.

But it ain't an explosive, or even a gun, and Diamonds makes no move to put space between herself and the thing, so Spades snarls at her and edges forward, curious despite himself. "Go ahead, look." Diamonds gestures to the thing with a careless hand, tucking one heeled boot behind the other as she stands there, serene. "It won't bite." She pretends to inspect her nails and adjust her (admittedly pretty damn keen) suit, smoothing over a tear that a wayward sickle cut through the fabric with a downward twist to her mouth.

SS: What do I look like, a sap?

She's not foolin' him. Even transformed into a soft, shell-less human, Diamonds has kept all her old talent for swift, unpredictable violence, tempered only by a calculating, no-nonsense mind. She's a force to be reckoned with, and winning her - him, at the time - over to work for the Midnight Crew an age and a universe or two ago had been the most difficult task of Spades's recruitment session. Between his rather stab-happy nature and Diamonds's lack of motivation for anything related to teamwork, it had been annoying as fuck.

But now, Spades is facing the consequences of a Diamonds Droog who hasn't been won over to his cause, and it's damn unsettling. Grimacing, he edges closer to that crumpled item, craning his neck out so he can get a peek at it. Give enough ground and he'll be toast.

"Attaboy," she murmurs, and it twists like a knife in his gut to hear that old catchphrase. Spades's crew mighta been a pack of destructive morons, but they'd been his destructive morons, and seeing the many little ways Diamonds has stayed the same regardless of her new body leaves him cold.

...But no, seriously, what the hell is he looking at, here?

SS: What are you playin' at? What's this supposed to be?

On the ground, innocuous and tattered, lies a thin red mask.

SS: Woman, do I look like I give a flying fuck about that wet-blanket's godawful taste in fashion?

Diamonds doesn't pause to look perplexed - she's too good for that. Instead, Spades can see her process his announcement, turn it over in her head, and start in along a new line of inquiry. It's the arena where Hearts Boxcar failed, too slow on the uptake, and where Clubs Deuce was just too much of a moron to care: a flexible, no-nonsense ability to accept reality and damn all the obfuscating stupidity of their enemies. She'd been so damn good at murdering the Felt because she accepted their abilities and exploited their weakness without breaking a sweat. "I see," she says, sickeningly sweet as she spreads her hands to either side. "So, you don't hold truck with all this hero nonsense, either?"

SS: I think it's moronic. Every death would be a heroic one by definition. I'm gonna smack the kid senseless when I get the chance. But when the hell have these idiots ever listened to me?

"How delightful! Finally, someone who understands," Diamonds says with relish, her grin widening to the point that she's more baring her teeth at him than anything. Spades stiffens and scuttles back again, because whatever the fuck set Diamonds off, it can only be bad news if she's got her kill-face on. "I grow so very tired of pointless mysteries and withheld information. I am sick to death of challenging incompetent brats who would normally never interfere with my preferred line of work." She raises the cue stick and points it toward him, and he raises his own shiv on reflex. "And when I capture you and turn you in, I have been promised all the answers I could ever desire. And then I can move on with my life."

SS: Well shit. Nice to see you're as bugfuck crazy as ever. Really great way to start my night.

He reaches into another pocket of his coat and flicks out another pocketknife. This is a two-blade job, at the least.

SS: Look, Diamonds. You 'n me, we been through some shit together, whether you remember it or not. So you should know - this is gonna hurt me more than it hurts you.
Diamonds quirks an eyebrow, her face flat.

SS: Except not really, because you're also a smug bastard who sold out to the Felt after I turn my back for a few years, and I got a real thing for stabbing people regardless.

SS: So on second thought? Nah. This won't hurt me a bit.

Diamonds grins viciously. "That's more like it."

Clearing the building would be a lot easier if Heir didn't receive a faceful of fire every time he rounded a corner!

He coughs when a lungful of smoke gets through his circulating bubble of fresh air, but he can't help it - if he introduces too much fresh air to such a volatile environment, he could just set off another explosion! Air and fire are just a dangerous combination, and his dad drilled it into him how to handle situations like this.

Sharpshooter pops into the hall ahead of him, and he briefly extends his bubble of clean air to surround her as well. She can teleport without feeding the fire with a burst of air - and hadn't that had been the opposite of fun, when Heir first used his new teleporting ability around fire, and the ensuing flare of heat and light probably browned his skin further with a new layer of tan. But Heir can also breathe with less trouble in the smoky environment. It's a tradeoff.

"Pretty sure everyone is out now," she coughs, her green eyes barely open as she wipes her aviator goggles clean once more. "I can't feel anyone moving above us, and Bec has stopped snatching people from the rooms. If it's not sensing anyone, there's no one left...who's still moving." She swallows, and Heir squeezes her shoulder reassuringly.

"Then we should get back to Hemogoblin." Heir has been relying on Sharpshooter's keen sense of space to direct him through all this. With all the fire around, he hasn't been able to distinguish the subtleties of people breathing in such a volatile situation. So if she thinks the building's clear, he's inclined to believe her. He licks his badly chapped, dried out lips and continues, "I don't like that he's had to fight someone like Diamonds Droog by himself for so long."

Hearts Boxcars had already been strong enough that without Heir's control of the breeze, it would have probably been a close fight. And they don't know anything about Diamonds Droog or how she fights yet.

Sharpshooter nods, her expression solemn, and taps Heir on the nose. The fizzle of electric green feels like soda pop running down the back of Heir's spine; one moment they're surrounded by the blazing inferno of the office building, and the next, they're in the air above the roof where they last left Hemogoblin to face off with Diamonds.

And there is blood everywhere.

"Hemogoblin!" Heir yells, spying the red and black uniform after a horrified moment when he couldn't distinguish it at all. Diamonds Droog is still standing, and she looks up with an implacably arched eyebrow before turning her attention back to the Dersite carapacian who stands across from her, wielding a knife. It's not WV, which just honestly makes it all the weirder - how many aliens can there be in one city?!

Heir lands and falls to his knees by Hemogoblin's side, pressing his fingers to the troll's pulse point under the jaw with too much force, his heart stuttering in his panic. Oh fuck oh fuck, he can't find it -

The carapacian starts yelling, and the words are blurred until Heir looks up to see the hand signs that go along with them.

SS: Get him outta here, yah sorry excuse for an Heir!

SS: Diamonds 'n me, we still got a score to settle.

"I found it," Sharpshooter says, dropping to her knees with her lab coat splayed out around her as she cocks her head to examine Hemogoblin. "John, John, don't worry, I can feel his heart moving. His lungs are shot, though -"

"We need to go," Heir rasps, still not able to bring himself to look down at Hemogoblin's too-still face. He can't even be mad about the name thing, because oh god, how could he have left his partner behind to get hurt like this?! They need to be so far away from Droog, so far away - "The library, he hangs out there -"

"Going, going, gone!" Sharpshooter says, snapping her fingers. The blazing heat of the burning building a few blocks over vanishes, replaced by the refreshingly clear, cool air of a library gone dark for the night. After sucking in a breath to brace himself -

Heir looks down and -

His brain can't handle it. It's John who has to come forward, John who had already been perked up by Jade's use of his name in the wrong context, John who realizes what has happened. His hero mindset can't handle what he sees when he looks at Hemogoblin's face, because his hero mindset has nothing to do with his civilian life. Has nothing to do with Karkat.

With Karkat.

Karkat, who is lying under his hands, bleeding out all over the carpet of the library.

Karkat.

This is Karkat.

"I guess she took off his mask," Jade guesses, sounding totally calm about all this. John's ears feel like they've been plugged with cotton, because he can barely hear her. Maybe both eardrums gave up from the shock. Maybe his body has stopped working altogether. Maybe he's not even real anymore.

None of this is real anymore.

"It's Karkat," he says, with a weird, still space in the middle of his chest. He keeps staring down at Hemogoblin's unmasked face and seeing Karkat.

Karkat? That doesn't make any sense, though. That can't be right. Maybe it's just the shock of seeing Hemogoblin without a mask at all. He's hallucinating -

"Of course it is! Hello, earth to John?" Jade yells back. "He needs medical treatment!"

"It's Karkat," John repeats.

Jade opens her mouth. Then she closes it. And when she opens it a final time, her voice is too quiet. "Oh. Oh, no. You didn't know?"
"Forget me, how did you know?" John demands. He can't let it explode, though. His chest is clenched down tight and he thinks if he moves, even to reach over and shake Jade by the shoulders, he will lose it. He's taped together with nervous tension and disbelief, and if anything breaks this equilibrium he is going to freak the fuck out. He clamps down one of his hands on Karkat's because of all the times to suddenly understand exactly how Karkat feels when he has one of his uncontrollable ragefits, it would be the time when his moirail is down for the count.

Hemogoblin is Karkat.

It's still not computing.

Jade throws up both arms and rolls her eyes. "No offense, John, but they're both short, shouty, red-blooded trolls with anger issues who spend all their time with you. I love you, little brother, but do you have eyes?!

John wheezes in air. He thinks he forgot to breathe for too long, and when he looks down he sees Karkat's face twisting with pain. The troll gurgles and John feels for the troll's breathing instinctively, a rhythm that should be as familiar as his own, but Karkat's breathing has turned ragged and fluttery, damp with blood that shouldn't be filling his lungs.

"He needs a hospi -"

"No hospitals!" John's head won't stop spinning, and he presses a hand to Karkat's battered face when the troll writhes again, coughing so hard it wracks his whole body. Over and over again, like a condemnation, he can only think Karkat, Karkat, Karkat, Hemogoblin is Karkat.

He's been such a fucking idiot.

"Karkat would never go to one, and - fuck, isn't it obvious why? Shit!" John says miserably, combing the hair back out of Karkat's face. "Even if he had a mask, they'd try to take it off, and he's always been paranoid about this, god, how stupid am I -"

Jade reaches over and smacks him across the cheek. Just once, and his jaw shuts with a click. "So help me, John, I am your big sister, not your weird troll auspice, but this is me telling you to pull it together man!" She slips into a strange, hearty British accent as she sits back, holding up a finger. "As Grandpa would always say, 'Enough of this codswallop!' Get your head in the game so we can help Karkat!"

"Right." John nods dazedly, and then more firmly, gritting his teeth. "We need to get him home. Right now."

He doesn't know what they can do. He has no idea how far Hemogoblin - how far Karkat's healing factor goes, or why it would be failing right now. But he does know one thing.

His dad will know what to do.

He doesn't even stop to think before wrapping an arm around Karkat, reaching out a hand to Jade on autopilot. She grasps it, but she mouths something that John doesn't catch. Maybe it would be smarter to let the more experienced tele porter deal with this, but John doesn't feel very smart right now. He's already reaching out with his mind, feeling the wind rise up to accommodate him. His lungs feel so full he thinks he might burst. But he rises up above the usual burst of stabbing pain that accompanies his teleportation, his mind primed to focus on one thing and one thing only -

Karkat, Karkat, Karkat.

I warned you
Chapter Summary

Night falls like fire; the heavy lights run low,
And as they drop, my blood and body so
Shake as the flame shakes, full of days and hours
That sleep not, neither weep they, as they go.

Karkat dreams -

Jade Harley stands on a snowy hill, staring up into the black sky above. She's young, at least five years younger than she should be, her face still round with human-baby fat, and she has a giant fucking rifle slung over a dress the color of galaxies. Her massive white wolf lies at her feet, crackling with green lightning in time with its breath.

Karkat, who has become so used to his viewpoint gradually migrating until he was trapped within John's mindset during these nightmares, is surprised to find himself off to one side. When he raises a hand - and is surprised to find his body responds to his will - his hand is grey and tipped with yellowed claws, as it should be.

But if he's not John this time around, then where is that endearing asshat? John is always the center of the dreams. Karkat looks around, and out of desperation even looks up at the sky to see if maybe Harley has an eye on a mysterious floating John. He's dealt with mysterious floating Johns before.

But there's nothing in the sky but the blackness of space, the distant gold of a far off planet, and the immense sky blue static of nothing at all.

He remembers why he's not supposed to look at the sky as a headache lances through his skull. He closes his eyes and tries to forget the afterimage of flashing static that burns into his retinas.

When he opens his eyes, Harley is still standing there, a petulant child standing ankle deep in snow with an evening gown. John is still absent. With nothing else to do, Karkat steps over a frozen chunk of ice and shuffles up the side of the hill, his sneakers sinking deeper and deeper into the snow drifts as he hikes uphill. But it doesn't feel all that cold - he's lived through enough Seattle winters to know what winter feels like, and this isn't it. He passes another frozen shape half buried in the snow, and can vaguely make out the form of a frog trapped within. He rolls his eyes at it and keeps walking. A tundra full of frozen frogcicles - why is he not surprised?

Can you hear me? he thinks dryly at Harley, but just as John never responded to his mental calls, Harley ignores him. She's worrying at her lower lip with repulsively familiar buckteeth, and talking to herself. Or maybe into the mouthpiece of the red-and-black headset she has hooked over her ears, but Karkat is still pissed that he's stuck with the imposter version of John in this dream and he is firmly ensconced on the spite train, a first class compartment reserved solely for him and his vast stores of unadulterated, irrepressible malice.

Oh well. Maybe this time, since it's not John, no one will die.

Yeah, right. Like the universe would ever give Karkat a fucking break. If he's a first-class passenger, then the universe itself is the grubfucking conductor of this runaway hate train and it shows no mercy on the resident commuters.

"Dave, are you sure? I can't see anything!" the girl chirps, shading her eyes as she scans the sky. "But maybe it's headed for the other side of the planet -"

Her headset crackles, and Karkat can just make out the reply. The voice on the other end grates on his nerves, a quiet but clipped Texas drawl. He shuffles closer so he can hear what the hell's going on.

"TG: will you just get out of there jade
TG: this shit is dangerous
TG: i dont know what went down on derse while i was passed out but that thing had wings
TG: the bqs coming right at you now duck and cover
TG: trust me we cant handle something with her firepower yet
EB: i don’t know what's going on, but maybe try to get to my gate jade!"

Karkat cranks his head around so fast he nearly sprains his own vertebrae, his eyes wide with horror. But then he realizes that John's voice came from the headset as well, though with such flawless quality that it almost sounds like John himself said the words while standing right the fuck next to them.

Harley pouts, folding her arms. "We only just finished with the paradox genetic sequencing!" she complains. The white wolf by her side whines and tugs on the hem of her green dress, but she doesn't pay any attention to it. "And then you took off before we could light the Forge, Dave! If it were that serious, wouldn't future you have stuck around?"

"TG: omg
TG: future me being a dick what a surprise
TG: jade just run
EB: jade, i can see something on my game screen when i zoom out all the way…
EB: ohhhh crap
TG: screenshot it or toss grist at it or something TG: just distract it from jade while i figure out what future me is playing at EB: is this what you saw dave?
EB: creepytentacrowharlecreep.jpg"

The voice that rattles off the image link sounds like one of those stilted, robotic simulations you got on voice mail, trying its hardest to imitate John and failing.
Harley tenses, laying a hand on her riflekind. Karkat looks up again, and this time he thinks he can make out something moving against the dark of space - a flicker of red, a scrap of yellow. Whatever it is, it's coming in fast. "Guys, Bec still isn't feeling well after teleporting that giant meteor out of the way of my house," she says, some of the ridiculous sing-song leaving her voice. "Maybe I should just try to fight it! I think it already saw me!" She sounds nervous now, and Karkat would cackle with petty glee if a sense of foreboding and horror hadn't just socked him in the gut. That thing flying down toward them...the shape of its body seems weirdly familiar…

"Too late!" Harley yelps, rolling to the side in a daring leap that sends her tumbling past Karkat, just in time for the black-winged abomination to hurtle out of the sky and slam into the snow where she'd been standing. Her wolf perks its head up - and then sets it back down, apparently too "tired" (read: too much of a lazy ass nubrolling fleabag) to do shit.

Karkat takes a few steps back, but the dark, winged creature ignores him just like everyone else. Something's wrong with its head - it doesn't exactly match the figure that's been haunting Karkat's nightmares and murdering John all the fucking time. Instead of a wolfish muzzle, it resembles a carapacian with a ragged crown slapped on its head, with the peaks of a jester hat sticking rakishly up at random angles. If Karkat weren't about to shit himself with fresh terror, this thing would have been almost laughable.

Harley's not laughing. Neither is anyone else that Karkat can hear. John and the Texas asshole's voices are yelling at the same time, too jumbled for Karkat to make any real words out, but they're both clearly frantic. The girl levels her strife specibus at the monster and pulls the trigger. The bullets explode outward in an obnoxious hail of gunfire, and slam into the thing's chest. It stumbles back, snarling, and raises a hand.

It doesn't even bother to yank the sword out from its bloodied torso. The two tentacles attached to its lower ribs snap out and stab through Harley like she's a piece of paper. But when they rip back out, reality sets in; Karkat may not like the girl, but there is a brief moment when she stumbles back, her expression blank as she raises a hand to the hole in her chest, where he is just flat out horrified. The riflekind falls out of her hand and she crumples in on herself.

The blood is really red against all the snow, and Karkat is way too fascinated by that. He stares at the snow instead of the way Harley twitches and claws wordlessly at her chest, blood burbling up in the corner of her mouth until she stops moving.

He feels her heartbeat cut out like it's his own bloodpusher slowing to a stop, heavy and too-still in his chest.

He doesn't even like her, he thinks helplessly. It doesn't make the pain go away.

Now, finally, the wolf notices what's going on. The white canine lets out piercing cry, so loud that Karkat slaps his claws to his ears to no effect. Its fur flashes an unearthly green as the mutt stands - and then falls back, the lightning fizzling out as the wolf limps. Harley hadn't been kidding when she said the thing was tired, obviously. But it makes one last effort, pouncing on the harlequin monstrosity with jaws wide.

The carapacian tears the dog in two. Maybe any other day that weird lusus thing could have put up a better fight, but today it's no contest. The black carapacian's tentacles reach out and pick up both halves of the wolf. The canine bleeds yellow-green, charged plasma, but whatever the hell it's made of (because that wolf is not normal) doesn't dissuade the carapacian from unhinging its jaws and fitting the wolf's head into its mouth.

Well. That...was new.

And then it swallows. Karkat feels vaguely ill. The winged carapacian seems to be in even worse shape though, clutching at its skull as it horks down the rest of poor Harley's dog, but despite the pain it doesn't stop.

Like, for fuck's sake, when the fucking fuck did his nightmares switch over from soul crushing, grief-filled horror to weirdass dog-eating gore?

Karkat can feel consciousness starting to tug at the edge of his awareness, which, thank fuckity fuck it's about time. On one side he sees the winged carapacian fall to its knees and scream as its skull cracks audibly, and begins to reshape itself into a wolf's head, completing this latest cycle of stupidity and murder. On the other, he can still hear the buzz of John's voice coming from the headset that's fallen halfway off Harley's head. While he tries unbelievably goddamn hard not to look at the face of a very dead thirteen year old girl, staring up at the sky with open eyes, he can't help how his eyes go to the red of her headset, staring at the only definitive source of John in this entire nightmare as everything fades out.

EB: jade?! jade oh my god -

EB: anyone?

There's still me, Karkat thinks. He takes a hesitant step toward Harley's body, feeling the cold of the snowdrift sink deep into his bones for the first time. There's always still me.

Crouched in a puddle of neon green blood, the winged creature punches the air with a claw, lightning beginning to crackle and expand around its fist in an orb of power. There is a massive WHOMPH, and a flare of green bright enough to wipe out even the rainbow static of Sk-Karkat wakes up.

Everything hurts, and when he inhales he earns himself a lungful of sopor slime. Which, hey, yeah, the stuff is designed to handle troll respiratory systems, but he's pretty sure some of it just diverted into his stomach, and it tastes like pure liquid sugar mixed with paste. Absolutely disgusting. Slime is for sleeping in, not eating, no matter how dumbass slime-addicts might swear by it. He closes his mouth because he's not a mouth-breathing wriggler and his nostrils flare as he tries to crack his eyes open without whimpering at the pain.

Also, how the fuck did he end up here again? Karkat pauses before he sticks his head out of the 'coon. He pauses a lot longer when he realizes that, no, actually, he has no memory of crawling into the recooperacoon last night. Or earlier this morning, as the case may be - fuck, what time is it? When did he get back home?

He makes the mistake of trying to sit up. Pain lances through his torso, and Karkat claws at the inside of the 'coon, his mind reeling as he struggles to breathe. It takes three breaths before the numbing effects of the sopor slime kick in again, coating the inside of his lungs with soothing fluid, but his bloodpusher races along too quickly for the soporifics to take hold of his mind. He welcomes it - encourages it even, reaching out with his mind to tweak his blood until just a little more adrenalin enters his system. He needs to be thinking clearly because his body is fucking wrecked, he has no idea where he actually is, and the last thing he remembers is Diamonds Droog smirking at him, smug, self-satisfied, and bored.

In fact, the more frantically Karkat sorts through his shitty recollection of last night, the more he suspects that he didn't make it home. At all. Recooperacoon slime is both calming and pain-numbing, which is the only excuse he can give for not realizing earlier that his ribs have been punched in. He's already halfway into his sense of his blood; he lets himself zone out completely, tracing his injuries in his mind's eye and trying to piece together how much damage Droog had done while he was out.

His ribs are fucked. Just...fucked. That's the worst sign, really, because his healing factor can do fuck-all about broken bones. Karkat's never had a broken bone this serious before (because he's not a moron and he goes out of his way to avoid injuries that might require hospitalization) but now he's down at least four ribs, all of them scraping at his lungs with every pained breath he sucks in. He can feel coagulated blood knitting together lung tissue that was probably punctured, but if he bled into his lungs or anything the fluid has fucked off back into the capillaries where it belongs. At some point he finished staunching that stab wound in his side, but the area is still tender. His collarbone screams with pain when he experiments with moving his arms again, his skull has a freshly scabbed over line just beneath his horns with a corresponding bruise along his hair line, and both his calves have bone-deep bruises that will take much longer to heal.

A massive bruise has welled up across the left side of his face where he vaguely recalls taking a cuestickkind to the cheek and jaw; it's gone unhealed while the rest of his body focused on dealing with all the internal trauma. Karkat rubs at the contusion with his thumb while he speeds up the process of fresh blood flowing through the ruptured blood vessels, using white blood cells to carry away all the damaged and decayed shit that makes up a bruise until he can move his face without wincing again. The last thing he wants is to emerge from the 'coon with a massive red-black bruise standing out on his face.

Karkat has never felt so painful grateful for his weird mutant blood before in his life. His ribs will have to heal the slow way, but everything else has been healing while he was passed out. Like. Fuck. Well done, mutant body, you managed to not fuck something up. The general consensus seems to be that, while he's most likely used up his entire quota of good luck for the entire fucking year, he might just survive.

And now, he thinks, too tired for sarcasm, to see where the fuck I ended up after getting my ass handed to me last night. Bracing his ribs with a hesitant arm, Karkat hoists himself up to the surface of the sopor slime and peers out. His eyesight is too clear, so he must still be running around with Hemoglobin-red mutant eyes all exposed. The 'coon is weirdly placed in the center of the room, instead of shoved in the corner like his at home, and yet - no, this is his recooperacoon, Karkat realizes, because he scuffed it up while practicing with his sickles and he can pick out the scratches and scrapes all along the outside of the damn thing from here. Someone has been dicking around with his goddamn recooperacoon. He snarls, bristling with instinctive territorial irritation at the thought of someone messing with his respite block, and looks around to see what else has been moved. The curtains are drawn shut, but there's enough light seeping through that he can make out the outlines of a desk in the wrong place, a pile in the corner that should be thirty percent comic books, not a measly twenty, and a door that should be on the opposite side of the room, what the actual fuck -

Karkat swallows as his eyes adjust further to the darkness.

These are not his shitty posters.

This is not his shitty room.

This is his shitty recooperacoon alright, but this room is familiar for an entirely different reason.

...Why the fucking fuck is his 'coon in John's bedroom? I mean, talk about a whole new level of pale commitment he does not remember discussing with John ahead of time, holy shit.

Something shifts to his right, and Karkat flinches, leaning a little more out of the 'coon to peer in that direction and reach out with a tentative touch of his power to feel the blood of whoever is sitting in John's desk chair. They've pulled it over to sit right next to the 'coon, but they fell asleep at some point during their creepy vigil, judging by the slow, steady heart rate, their head tucked in against their chest and their hair in their face.

He recognizes that resting heartbeat though, and Karkat cracks his head against the side of the 'coon as he slumps over in relief. It's not actually a creepy vigil if John is the one doing it, after all.

...No, it's still fucking creepy. But it's a creepy that Karkat finds just as stupidly endearing as all the other shit John pulls, because Karkat is in fact a total panmelted sap over this kid. There's still the lingering question of how his recooperacoon ended up in the Egbert house, but at least John is here.

"John," Karkat hisses when it becomes clear that John is down for the count. "John, you dumbass, wake up and tell me what time it is." Slimes slops over onto the floor as Karkat gropes around at the awkward angle to try and flick John's forehead, but he grimaces and continues in his quest, because he refuses to take responsibility for the consequences of an impromptu 'coon relocation that happened while he was unconscious. "John!"

John snorts awake moments before Karkat can flick him. Not like he could have done much damage to someone with as thick as skull as John, but it's the principle of the thing. Rolling his eyes, Karkat flicks him anyway. John sputters and flails, barely catching himself on the back of the chair just as he's about to topple off the seat. "Karkat, you're awake!" he exclaims, grinning.

His eyes are a bright, vivid blue, so brilliant that they gleam in the half-light of the shuttered room.

Karkat stares, mystified, and -

- waits for the moment to pass. He's beginning to suspect that he's hallucinating again. John's eyes had done weird things while Karkat was in the throes of sopor withdrawal. It's the explanation that makes the most sense - if Karkat fucked up and skipped out on sleep again, it would be entirely plausible for him to have fucked up even more and gotten in a car crash or something while sleep-deprived, leading to a particularly vivid dream about hero work gone wrong and resulting in John enforcing naptime again for his own good.

This amazing and flawless explanation does him no good, however, if he has to keep waiting for John's eyes to turn back to normal and they refuse to do so. Annoying fuckass hallucinations. Karkat blinks furiously, and squints, but his eyes keep seeing blue where they should see brown.

"I think I missed something," he says at last, rubbing at his eyes with the heel of his palm. Does he have his contacts in? His stomach drops out, because he's still pretty sure he doesn't - and equally sure that in his utter relief over seeing John, he just flashed his moirail with eyes like candy red headlights. Flinching, he keeps his eyes downcast. "How long was I out? Everything hurts like fuck," he mutters, still trying to keep his cool.

"Oh! Uh…" John says eloquently, sitting upright in his chair. He's got that face on, the look of trepidation he gets when he doesn't know what to say. Karkat rests his chin on his hand and drums his claws along the rim of the recooperacoon while John sorts out his frazzles thoughts. "Well, do you notice anything different about me?" John asks, his voice unnaturally high and strained. If Karkat wasn't worried before, he definitely is, now. "Like. You know...stuff? Things?"

"Stuff and things?" Karkat suggests, but he's too confused and borderline terrified to hit the right note of sarcasm. John's eyes remain blue. It's freaking him out. "I noticed that my 'coon is in your room, for one thing. I also noticed that I feel like I played tackle football with a semi-truck and the goddamn truck won. What hit me?"

John fidgets, bites his lip, and finally reaches out to pap Karkat on the arm. "Uh. Shoosh?"

...Oh, fuck. Preemptive shooshing? That is the opposite of reassuring. "John, what happened?"

Karkat demands.

"Diamonds Droog happened," John blurts out. Then he slaps his hand over his mouth, his eyes wide and blue like he can't believe what he just said.

Karkat can't believe it either. There's a moment where he feels upside down. Just. Upside down. There's no other way to describe it. All the blood in his head couldn't make the world sit right on its axis, so instead his pulse roars in his eardrums until the dizziness gets the better of him and he has to sit back. "What?" he repeats, still trying to piece together blue and John and Droog and how they all come together to put Karkat's recooperacoon in John's bedroom. "I mean - Diamond who?" he tacks on hastily, trying to remember what Karkat knows and what Hemogoblin knows and where the two shouldn't overlap.

"Diamonds Droog," John says. That is in fact a thing John says. Karkat can't even process what's going on anymore. "She, uh - she beat the crap out of you, man."

"Why would you know -" Karkat starts. He breaks off when John pats him on the arm again. He has to stand partway out of his desk chair to do so, and Karkat's attention is drawn to what John is wearing. His clothes are charred and singed at the edges, he stinks of smoke, and the goggles and mask are missing, but there's no mistaking the fact that John is dressed like Heir of Breath. It's a flawless costume, really. Karkat couldn't have put together a more realistic cosplay himself, because John has the swimmer's body for it, and for a moment he's struck by the horrible thought that perhaps he's been talking to Heir all along, calling him John like a complete crazy person.

But it's still John. John, who responded to John, and whose face looks like John's. John, whose heartbeat is more familiar than his own - definitely not the quick, hummingbird-fast pulse of Heir, who is constantly high on flight.

This, on top of the blue eye thing, is too much. "John," Karkat says, his voice cracking, clutching John's hand so hard it probably hurts as he tries to squeeze all the reassurance he can out of it. "What are you wearing?" When John hiccups again, a note of panic in his voice, Karkat clamps down harder. "What Happened."

"Well, that depends," John laughs, so nervous that he hiccups, combing his fingers through his wind-tossed hair. His fingernails dig into the back of Karkat's hand with equal force. "What do you think happened?"

Karkat knows what he thinks happened. But the possibility is so impossibly remote that he tries his best to jettison the idea from his mind entirely, and scrambles for any other straw to draw on. Anything. Seriously. Come on. "...Cosplay gone wrong?" he says weakly.

John facepalms with both hands. Karkat wants to whine at the sudden space between them because he cannot handle this right now. "Ohhh nooooo," John groans. "Jade was right. We're both stupid. Hooooly crap Karkat, we are both idiots, aren't we? How did we not notice this much stupid before? Someone should have warned us about how much dumb was happening here!"

"Stop mumbling cryptic shit and start papping me again before I lose it, please," Karkat demands. His head aches in earnest at the mere mention of Harley. God, didn't he have a nightmare about her? But if she's mixed up in all this, it might explain why the tiny molehill of confusion piled up in Karkat's thinkpan has transformed into a fucking mountain of insurmountable stupidity. "Also, your cousin is bugfuck insane," he adds, just to cover his bases. "You should probably not trust anything she might have said to you. At all."

"Sister, actually," John corrects. "She's my sister, and she's Sharpshooter, and I know you're Hemogoblin, and everything is such a mess, Karkat!"

Karkat sinks his claws so deep into the rim of the recooperacoon he punctures a row of holes through the material. "You know," he tries to yell, but all that comes out is a sharp, choked off gasp. There's too much - it's - his chest feels too tight with pain and confusion and horror to sort out. John knows, and it's terrifying, but John knows, and that's a massive relief because John was always supposed to know everything about Karkat. Everything. He's been staggering under the guilty weight of keeping so many secrets from his moirail that the sudden lifting of that burden makes him feel sick to his stomach.

And on top of all that -

Karkat looks John up and down again.

And then again.

When he finishes processing the fact that he's not the only one keeping secrets and looks up, John meets his eyes. Karkat forgets about his own exposed eyes for a moment, because John's expression is absolutely miserable. "Ta-da?" the kid says, looking like he's about to cry.

"...You've got to be shitting me," Karkat says. "You're - the eyes - no. No fucking way. If this is some unbe-fucking-lievably stupid prank, John -"

John groans. "I usually wear brown contact lenses," he says miserably, curling up his knees and hugging them. "I swear, we wouldn't have ever tried to find out your identity on purpose, but by the time we got there I guess Droog had already taken off your mask, and you were so hurt, and I didn't know what else to do -" He breaks off with a tiny wail that Karkat thinks he didn't mean to utter, biting down on his lip. His shoulders are shaking.

Karkat needs to be out of this 'coon. He misses what John might have said next as he heaves himself up out of the slime. He curses his life choices when the stabbing pain of four broken ribs almost sends him to the floor. He's not in the Hemogoblin costume anymore; someone has dressed him in his own pajama shorts and a throwaway 'coon shirt - but that doesn't matter anyway, does it, because John already knows. When he staggers forward to pap John on the face, woozy but determined, he can feel bandages wrapped around his ribs, holding him together.

Good. He kind of feels like he needs the help, right now, or he might just split in two at the seams. John is right - everything is a mess. But there's a solid, fixed point in all this, and it is the sight of John on the verge of tears, so distressed that Karkat's bloodpusher shoves everything else aside in a squeeze of pity."Don't cry, you fucking moron," he mutters, burying his face in John's hair and stroking his face with sopor-sticky claws. "Shoosh, dumbass, shoosh. You're not the one who got the shit kicked out of you, so no crying. I'm here. You're fine."

"You're Hemogoblin," John repeats, lost and panicky. "How did I not know? How did we not know?"

"Still trying not to deal with that," Karkat replies, riding the edge of panic and then quashing it by hugging John so tightly it makes his ribs scream in protest. "Not right now. Come here, you dumb fuck. Just. Breathe. I - fuck. I've got you."

In about two seconds, he's going to have to deal with the fact that his moirail is Heir, and all the fucked up, insane amount of secrets that entails.

But not now, not now, not now, he thinks, rocking John back and forth. Not while John needs him.

They end up dragging the pile onto the bed, the kind of fortuitous compromise Karkat thinks only happens because, for once, John is just as fucking messed up in the head as Karkat usually is. They spend a good ten minutes just lying there, because Karkat doesn't think he has the words to jam about this out loud. John grabs his pillow and tries to make Karkat lie back on it because of the whole rib thing, but when Karkat tucks his head against John's hair all he can smell on that pillow is not-John. Eau de Harley. The image of a younger Harley bleeding out in the snow burns in his mind, and Karkat can't settle down and stop twitching until John tosses the pillow on the floor and pulls Karkat against his chest. The sun burning against the dark blue curtains already told Karkat he'd been stuck in the 'coon for a good part of the day, but from this angle he can make out John's alarm clock. It's two in the afternoon.

And here's a massive fuck you, from me to you, he thinks in the general direction of the school. He may or may not have had a rehearsal to try and salvage in theater today, but the fuckwads under his command this year would no doubt have screwed it all up whether he was there to supervise or not. He props up one of his sore calves on the head of John's bed and closes his eyes, letting the calm of sprawling out next to John sink into his bones.

He thinks he's going to need all the residual soothing he can get. Eventually, they need to Deal With This Shit, and Karkat is...not looking forward to it, to say the least.

Because, being the magnificent fuck up that he is, Karkat's opening line in this feelings jam from hell ends up being, "Holy fuck, I made you beta-read my fanfiction."

John nods solemnly. "I know."

"It's like a whole new level of humiliation," Karkat marvels, gesturing at the ceiling as the true horror of it all starts to hit him. "Like, we have to invent a new portmanteau for this. Abhorror? Tormenthroes? Something that befits the raw, untamed nature of this fucking incredible
"I think Rose already called 'throes' for something, actually," John says, squirming around until he can adjust the arm that Karkat is crushing. "Festerthroes, maybe?"

"Do you know how many fucks I give about reusing words in a word smash?" Karkat grumbles. "Guess, John. Guess."

"Ignomiliation!" John says. Then he pulls a face. "No, I think you're right, abhorror fits better."

"I mean -" Karkat's claws spasm "- I have posters of you. I have unlicensed merchandise of you everywhere. How did you even handle being in my room all the fucking time?!"

"Don't worry about it," John says gloomily. "I haven't exactly been normal about Hemogoblin, either. I have a poster of you on my wall, Karkat!"

Karkat looks at the poster in question. "Yup."

"Argh!" John makes a weird, twisting gesture with his free hand, and with a flutter the poster falls to the ground, face down. The wind stirs the air around the room like a fan, and then settles.

Because oh right. John can do the windy thing. John has been able to do the windy thing all along.

Which reminds Karkat that - "Holy fuckmuffins, you saved my life."

"Well, no, there was this weird carapacian dude, actually. He distracted Droog by the time me and Jade got back," John babbles, and it takes a moment before Karkat realizes, with grim disbelief, that John is talking about last night. "He kept waving knives around everywhere… what a weird dude."

"No, I mean - the first time," Karkat says, trying to decide whether to be surprised that the Surprise Stabber had shown up to stab someone else. He stops thinking about it because the whole thing is fantastically pointless. "Before I even moved here. God, and I couldn't stop blathering about it for weeks. Fuuuuuuuuuuck!" He grabs his head with both hands and digs into his temples, feeling a rage migraine coming on. He takes a deep breath to start yelling with a purpose, only to be derailed by the flare of pain in his ribs. Which is all the more infuriating. "Stupid, stupid fucking - fuck fuck fuck!"

"Karkat, shhhh," John says, smoothing his palms on the back of Karkat's hands. Eventually he managed to pap them away from Karkat's temples, and Karkat's rage subsides under the weight of John petting his hair. "Uh, yeah. The time with the bank robbers, right? I remember."

"Fucking fuck, you must have thought I was a complete bulgehumping shitsponge. How could you even stand me?" Karkat hesitates. "Did you - fuck, did you think it was funny?"

"What? No!" John yelps, shaking his head furiously. He flails a little, which tends to be John's default setting when he gets flustered, but the movement is enough to jolt Karkat in the side. "No, it was - okay, kind of weird at first, but also flattering? I never met anyone I saved in person before, so it was interesting to hear the other side of it? Ah, but, uh, that's not why - I mean - and then you were a really fun person in general, and I - ack!" John knuckles his forehead, wincing in the corner of Karkat's vision as he flops back down. "I'm messing this all up, aren't I..."

"You're being a complete fucking goof about it. So at least you're consistent," Karkat says, elbowing John in the side and shoving his arm until Karkat can rest his chin on John's shoulder again. John takes the manhandling like a fucking champ, so Karkat reaches up and paps at his eyebrows and the wrinkles between his brows until they smooth out, feeling clumsy and heavy-handed as he does. He thinks is the single most reciprocal feelings jam they've ever had. John has been carrying Karkat for so long that it feels downright bizarre to be on the other side of the pacification, for once. It only took a fucking crisis to get them on the same fucking page.

John is quiet for a long moment, turning his face slightly into Karkat's touch. "You don't know how much I wanted to tell you," he says. "Later, I mean. Suddenly we were friends and every time I had to back out of something at the last minute I felt awful. Lying is dumb. But - I always told myself that if you knew about me, it would only put you in danger." He laughs. "Only you were out there doing hero work too the whole time! So in hindsight I feel even more dumb!"

"Can we just agree that we're both equally lacking in any form of functional intelligence whatsoever?" Karkat proposes. John's tone is hitting a low note again, with the kind of self-deprecating, pained laugh in his voice that means he's in the deep end of the misery pool, and Karkat needs to steer them away from there before John really does end up blaming himself for something stupid. It takes a lot to hit John where it hurts, but Karkat thinks that it would be all too easy for the kid to twist things in his head so that his keeping secrets somehow directly led to Karkat walking into Droog's cue stick several times. "I've put up with your shenanigans for nearly two years, and never connected you to Heir. So much for being such a massive fan." Karkat snorts. "A pair of colored contact lenses beats your usual shitty disguises, at least. If you'd fooled me with a beaglepuss I would just toss myself off the Space Needle and call it a night."

John laughs again. There's still a weird snuffle in his voice, like he's on the verge of tears. Fuck depression. Fuck depression and the hoofbeast it rode in on, because Karkat doesn't know how to make it better. He only knows how to drag John back from the edge. "My dad has tons of embarrassing stories. If I didn't try to make Groucho glasses part of my costume when I was thirteen, I'll eat my dad's favorite hat."

...Holy fuck. John's dad. Dadbert. Dad Egbert with the baking obsession and the 9-to-5 job and the snappy fashion sense. Karkat has to give himself a full minute to process the fact that Dadbert is in fact the father of Heir. "Your dad," he repeats, trying to communicate the full extent of his idiocy in as few syllables as possible.

John gets it. Obviously. "My dad," he agrees, rubbing his eyelids with his fingers. "The worst part? He wasn't really even all that surprised when me and Jade brought you back."

Karkat has to sit up. It hurts, but he does it. The next few breaths sting at his chest and make his whole body hurt - but he needs to sit up for that. Because what. "He - wasn't surprised?! What the fuck?"

"He says he suspected you were Hemogoblin all along!" John shouts, throwing his hands up. He's pouting now, his lips twisted sideways as they exchange mutual looks of indignation. "But he didn't want to say anything and upset our friendship unless he was totally sure. And of course, with Jade she only needed to take one look at you! Karkat, we are so dumb!"

It's really starting to sink in, now. Karkat rests his head in his hands, and slowly shakes it back and forth. "Unbelievable," he says. "Un...believable."

"They're both downstairs, but who knows how long Jade can sit still once she realizes you're awake." John yanks on the buckle of his jacket absenty, patting Karkat on the back. "She doesn't understand things like personal space. Or privacy. Or not teleporting in the house."

"She's your sister? DNA and everything? Like the long-fucking-lost cousin story, but a sister?" Karkat asks, skeptical. Fuck Harley, for that matter, he may well have to check all of John's backstory because he can't even imagine how many half-truths and lies must have built up over the years. Karkat's only had to cover up a few months as Hemogoblin; John's been Heir for almost half his life.

Well, at least it's an excuse for another jam session. He'll keep that one in mind.

John waves his hand through the air. "Long story. Apparently she grew up on an island in the middle of the Pacific, and her wolf-dog-thing raised her after her grandpa died." The look on Karkat's face must be priceless, because John snickers and covers his mouth to hide the obnoxious grin. "Yeah. Actual Jade Harley - raised by wolf. She's been travelling as Sharpshooter ever since she left, so I wouldn't be surprised if she founded a city somewhere along the line, too."

"Good for her," Karkat growls. "Do you know how close I came to having a heart attack when she started winking at me and making blood puns and shooting finger pistols all during the school day?"

"Everything is so much more horrible in retrospect," John says. At least he sounds more normal now, speculative and almost amused. "But also kind of hilarious."

Karkat smacks his face. "Only you would think this whole thing was hilarious."

"Better than freaking out about it any more than we already have," John says, shrugging. "I mean. We're out. No turning back now."

"No kidding." Karkat rubs at his sternum, which is one massive bone-bruise, and grimaces. "When do we have to deal with other people, again? Because I could fucking nap."

John sits up, worry flickering across his face. "Are you hurting again?"

"It never really fucking stopped," Karkat says, rolling his eyes. "What the fuck, did Droog fucking tap-dance on my chest while I was out?"

"I think my dad left pain pills on the desk," John says, untangling his leg from Karkat's and crawling off the bed. His first step is unsteady, but he walks to the desk without issue, so Karkat thinks he's fine. "Uhhh, yeah. I think these ones are safe to take after sopor."

"I give zero fucks about doubling up on narcotics and pain-killers right now." When John shoots him a grumpy, righteous pout, Karkat sighs. "Also, I have mutated blood powers that I can use to regulate the amount of chemicals in my system. Now, gimme, you taunting bastard."

John's eyes lighten. Literally. They gleam a brighter blue, the kind of luminescence Karkat would normally associate with a troll or, more recently, Heir with his powers going full blast. Because oh right. "Alright. If you're sure!"

He tosses Karkat the bottle, and it falls in a much slower arc than it should. Karkat's reflexes are absolutely shot, but when he winces and puts out both hands to catch the bottle, the air wafts it into his palm without missing a beat. John wiggles his fingers when Karkat raises an eyebrow. "Jade is encouraging bad habits," John says apologetically, though his shit-eating grin begs to differ. "Also, I don't have to hide the windy thing from you anymore! I'm excited!"

Karkat twists the cap of the bottle, scowls when it clicks around and refuses to pop off, and then digs his claws under the rim until the cap tears off. Childproof caps were never designed to handle trolls. Seriously, fuck that. He pops two hamnox capsules and dry swallows. "Mazel tov," he croaks. "Never leave me alone with a human wielding a cue stick again."

"Not a chance," John promises. "But, uh, you probably shouldn't have taken those on an empty stomach."
Karkat turns over with deliberate care and buries his face in a copy of Redglare #7. "No. I'll be fine," he says. "No. Fuck no."

John's footsteps pad over until he's standing behind Karkat, who pulls a discarded math test over his ears. "Come on, throwing up is the last thing you want to worry about with your ribs, Karkat," John says. "I'll handle them. You don't even have to talk if you don't want to. But you should eat something!"

"Oh, no. I'll talk, alright," Karkat mutters, wrapping John's sheets over his shoulders. "I have goddamn words for your sister, John. I will spew eloquence all over your fucking living room, I swear to god."

"Um, ew." John shifts his weight, and a hand touches Karkat's shoulder. "If I bring something up, will you eat it?"

Karkat relents. "Only because it's you asking. Don't take advantage of it, you asshat. And keep Harley on a goddamn leash. Please."

"I'll do my best," John laughs. "Do you remember where you left your phone? I bet I can send her off to get it for you, and that'll distract her for a while."

"In the library," Karkat says. Maybe he shouldn't have swallowed actual sopor earlier, because the medicine hasn't even hit his stomach yet but he can barely keep his eyes open. His head feels like it's spinning even with his eyes closed, but he's not nauseated. Not yet. "My backpack and - shit, it's probably still in the spare room. What if librarians steal my shit, John?"

"So that is your base," John says, snapping his fingers. "Called it. That should be enough of a project for her. We'll get your stuff back, don't worry!" His voice grows more distant as he walks across the room toward the door. "And I'll be right back with soup or something. Just hang out for a couple minutes, okay?"

The door creaks open and shut with a tiny click, and Karkat lets himself drift off.

- He has to deal with real life eventually.

If Dad Egbert and Harley count as real life, anyway. The jury is still out on that one. But Karkat loses track of time after John make him eat soup, and when he wakes up, having once again been dumped in the recooperacoon in his sleep, the sun is gone and Harley herself is spinning around in John's desk chair when Karkat emerges from his accidental hibernation. Her hair swings out in a thick braid and whips over her shoulder as she propels herself in a circle using, apparently, the power of her fucking mind. "Oh!" She spins, grinning. "Hey Karkat!" She spins again. "You're awake!" One last spin. "I'll get John!"

Karkat wants to know why the fuck John would leave him alone in a vulnerable state with a wild Harley running around ununchecked, but Harley vanishes between one spin and the next. The chair slows to a stop without her power to move it. Irritable, with the bitter taste of leftover chemicals on his tongue and a lingering ache in his ribs, Karkat crawls out of the 'coon and limps his way to John's bathroom to get a towel to sop up all the slime he managed to dump on the floor. There's already a (most likely) permanent sticky spot on the floor right under the entrance, which Karkat feels bad about. It's not until he bends over, realizes that's a fucking awful idea, and then chooses to drop the towel from an upright position and rub it against the carpet with his toe that he realizes he's being watched.
Slowly, he twists his neck to look at the bed.

A diminutive Dersite carapacian peers up at him from within the pile. It has John's sheets pulled up over its head like a cloak, and a pair of yellow goggles that bear a suspicious resemblance to Heir's strapped to its face. It chirps at him, waving a hand, and then burrows back into the pile, comic books and dirty laundry flying everywhere.

If that was supposed to mean something, Karkat didn't catch it. He waves in reply a minute too late, dazed, and then snatchs his hand back, snarling at himself. John bursts in through the door a moment later, paniting, and Karkat pretends nothing happened. "Sorry sorry sorry!" he says. He's in regular civilian clothes, now, one of his plaid shirts and jeans, but his eyes are still uncannily blue and Karkat can't get over that. "My dad wanted to talk to me and - are you feeling any better?"

"Better is relative," Karkat says, scratching at his face. Urgh. He can tell he's been in the 'coon all day; his skin feels downright sticky and his breath tastes like glue, which means he hit the upper limit and his skin stopped being able to absorb the sopor slime. Gross. "My ribs feel less like they're about to declare rebellion against the rest of me, but I'm also still drugged to my gills, so -" He stops, feeling a new potential hell opening up beneath his feet. "Wait, you know about those, right? Because if you let Harley anywhere near my naked, unconscious, injured body -"

"Yeah," John says, amused. "I tooootally let Jade change your clothes."

Karkat eyeballs him, considers treating him to a rant on how unfunny he is, and then lets it go. This is a mistake. John keeps talking. "No, seriously, we were worried about moving you too much, and she does this thing where she can change people's clothes just by snapping her fingers and doing the spacey thing -"

"JOHN EGBERT!" Karkat yells, clapping his hands to his ears. John doubles over laughing. "NO. FUCK NO. I AM NOT HEARING THIS. YOU STOP THAT RIGHT NOW." John just laughs harder, chortling and having himself a merry old time. Karkat reaches out and tries to flail at John; he ducks out of the way of Karkat's swipe. He snarls at John and tears at his own hair instead. "YEAH, YUK IT UP, ASSHOLE BEST FRIEND. HA. LOOK AT ME, I'M LAUGHING SO HARD, I'M BLEEDING INTERNALLY."

"The look on your face-!" John says, giggling. "It was great!"

Karkat stomps to the bathroom and slaps the water in the shower on. "I hope your next batch of cookies burns, John! I hope they crisp and your dad looks on in stern fatherly disappointment as the kitchen reeks of smoke and tears!" He ducks his head under the water.

John gives a mock-gasp, pressing his hands to his cheeks with his mouth an 'o' of false shock when Karkat looks up. "But Karkat, I thought what we had was special!"

"You brought this curse down on yourself," Karkat replies sourly, pressing his claws down on his collarbone as an experiment. The bone pangs, but then subsides. It's definitely a lot better off than the ribs - maybe not even fractured, just badly bruised, which Karkat can live with. His calves still hurt with bone-bruises, but he's healing those too, as quickly as his powers can manage when his focus is spread out across so many injuries. He hobbles to the mirror to poke at his face, where the last of that bruise has faded away.

His eyes are a sharp, jolting ruby red in the mirror under this lighting. Karkat flinches on automatic, averting his eyes down and to the side when he notices John watching him in the mirror. "I guess we had the same idea about contact lenses," he says, rubbing at his lower eyelid anxiously. "We really "Yah," John boosts himself onto the counter by the sink, looking right at Karkat instead of at their reflection in the mirror. His face is weirdly intense now. The blue eyes without glasses or goggles make him look angular and more mischievous than Heir. But then again, Heir was just another mask too. If anything, he looks even more like Jade now - elfin and vaguely otherworldly, with power and laughter gleaming in his eyes. Karkat feels his bloodpusher squeeze at the thought that he's looking at the real John, maybe for the first time. John with nothing to hide.

...How much pain medication did he take, again? Because he's starting to think he might be mildly high. Just. Mildly.

"Yours look cool, too!" John says, nudging Karkat in the leg with his foot. When Karkat stares at him in confusion, John taps a finger to one side of his eye. "Your special candy cane red! You look sooo badass! Do you know why you got such awesome eyes instead of regular rust ones?"

...Okay, maybe really fucking high. It takes him a whole twenty seconds to make words form sentences that are suitably sarcastic enough to respond to that. His claws clench into fists. "Who even fucking knows," he says bitterly. "Maybe the mother grub was in a pissy mood that day. Maybe some asshole decided to toss a metric fuckton of radioactive waste into the incestuous slurry of life. Maybe I'm just fucked up."

John soberes up. "Karkat. You're not fucked up! You're just a cranky butt!" He paps Karkat on the cheek, and Karkat scrunches up his nose but lets him. "I mean, even if it is a mutation, it's a pretty badass one! I bet Dave would think it's cool too, and Dave is the expert on cool! The undisputed king of cool! He's downright frosty!"

"Dave can suck my bone bulge," Karkat hisses, folding his arms. "Why you text that dick I will never understand. His opinion is the exact opposite of the opinion of any sane person, and therefore shitty." He then realizes he's folded his arms over his shirt, and he makes a face as he pulls them away from the green-tinged black fabric. "Can I borrow a shirt or something? I assume I have to confront your dad at some point, and I don't want to do it covered in sopor residue."

"Of course! I went and got more of your stuff, since I figured you didn't want Jade teleporting all through your house again," John says, kicks off the counter and digging through a backpack on the floor that Karkat recognizes as his own. Harley must have been successful in her mission to the library at some point. "And yeah, Dad kind of wants to talk to all of us. He says he found someone who knows more about Diamonds Droog, so when we do have to deal with her again, we're not fighting blind."

"Halle-fucking-lujah," Karkat says. When John tosses him a pair of pants and his own ratty hoodie, he strips off so fast his head spins and his chest hates him. What else is new. "Also, you have a carapacian in the pile."

"Yeah, he does that. WV is pretty much adorable in all ways." Humming, John stands up. He tilts his head as though some thought just struck him, and says slowly, "Dave doesn't care about this kind of stuff. Like, at all. So I guesss it's safe to just tell you -" John nibbles on his lip, staring hard at a corner of the ceiling while he deliberates. Then his gaze snaps back to Karkat, and he grins. "Dave is Flashstep."

Halfway through pulling up his pants, Karkat looks up. John stares at him expectantly, and Karkat keeps his face purposely flat despite the horror within. "Welp. That's it," he says, gesturing with a claw at the ceiling. "Did you see it leave, John? That was the last of it, ascending into the ether. It can never be restored."
John frowns. "What are you talking about, Karkat?"

Karkat sighs. "My faith in the humanity."

The trepidation hits Karkat when John floats them down the stairs. John's excuse is that he doesn't want Karkat risking the stairs when he's in such bad condition; Karkat suspects that the whole 'Jade is a bad influence' bullshit might actually be a thing.

But about halfway down Karkat realizes he's about to see Samuel Egbert, and talk to the man. About...everything. With John, at least, there had been the reassurance that even with all these mind-blowing revelations going on, Karkat could still rely on John being his. They're still shaky on the details, and they need to talk a hell of a lot more about all this before everything is settled, but they're alright.

Samuel Egbert is another story entirely.

Karkat has always felt the traditional mixture of awkward embarrassment and awe that any friend feels toward their friend's parents, but as a troll he's also inherited a healthy amount of respect and fear for anyone taller than him who has finished growing. Adult trolls could be absolute monsters to wrigglers during the course of troll evolution; they had none of that mammalian instinct to care for young, and confronting an adult troll without a lusus custodian was a good way to end up culled before little things like laws and morals and civilization kicked in. Humans really lucked out on the evolutionary lottery there. Human custodians might not be an automatic threat, but that's not what Karkat's hindbrain tells him when he follows John into the living room and Samuel Egbert emerges from the kitchen, chewing on the stem of an unlit pipe. Despite the late hour, he's still dressed in a snazzy white suit, and he smiles wearily at Karkat as he removes the pipe from his mouth. "Karkat. It's good to see you up and walking, young man."

Karkat scuffs his feet on the carpet and ducks behind John on reflex, keeping his head down as he nods. "Uh. Thanks."

"You're just in time for the chat with Bro!" Harley says from the couch. She's lying on it upside down with her wolf sprawled across her stomach, waving her leg at them while her hair spills over onto the floor. "We should have popcorn or something! Mr Egbert, can we~?"

Mr Egbert chuckles, and smiles ruefully. "Please try to keep your feet off the furniture, Ms Harley," he chides. But he ruins the tiny glimmer of spiteful glee rising up in Karkat by adding, "John, would you or Karkat be interested in popcorn as well?"

"Sure!" John says, pressing against Karkat with his shoulder and leaving Karkat totally exposed in the middle of the room. "Want me to help?"

Karkat, who had come down anticipating some kind of reckoning, or at least a lecture on the hazards of secret hero work, is at a loss. Harley waves at him from the couch again and gesticulates in a serious of obscure charades - some fuckery that is probably meant to encourage him to sit next to her on the couch. Karkat tucks his hands into his hoodie pocket, hunches up his shoulders, and stays glued to John as he goes to help his dad make popcorn in a kettle on the stovetop. He is reluctantly lured in by the scent as the two Egberts add weird toppings like parsley, black pepper, and parmesan, and when John's dad dishes out scoopsfuls for each of them, Karkat's stomach grumbles in a reminder that he hasn't eaten anything but soup since yesterday evening. Not even the fact that Harley suggested the idea can stop him from inhaling the popcorn after that.
"Wait, Dave's Bro?" John says at last, once they've all returned to the living room. Harley scoots over and snaps her fingers until her wolf-thing reappears on the floor so that John can sit in the middle. Karkat eases himself back against the sofa with considerable relief; even walking around for so short a time reminded him that he had four very broken ribs. Dadbert, meanwhile, takes up his seat in the armchair, fiddling with the television remote with a good-natured confusion creasing his brow. "He's the one you contacted?"

"Indeed he is," Samuel Egbert confirms, turning the remote over. "Hmmm...Yes, I've been making more of an effort to regain contact with the other guardians, and I thought he might have more insight to share once I informed him that Lady Droog had taken a more personal interest in Seattle. He has agreed to speak with us via Pesterchum - I'm not entirely sure, but he gave the impression that he could do it from here...on the television...hmm…"

"Dave's brother?" Karkat mutters darkly under his breath. John snickers, and Karkat slumps over on him by way of retaliation, making sure his elbows go everywhere. He scrapes at the bottom of his popcorn bowl and frowns at it; he didn't mean to gobble it down like someone who was fucking starved. But he eyes John's popcorn anyway, since it's now in reach…

"The Puppeteer," John replies, in a similarly quiet whisper. Karkat nearly falls off the couch. "Yeah, it seems like everyone is related to or knows everyone. It's weird that way. But he's mostly a cool guy." John glowers. "When he's not being a dick."

Karkat raises his eyebrows, and steals some of John's popcorn in a fucking stealthy maneuver. "Enough to grind your rageglands? Wow, this I've got to fucking see."

"What are you two whispering about?!" Harley whisper-shouts, resting her chin on John's other shoulder, close enough that Karkat flinches. "Seeecrets?"

"None of your business," Karkat snaps. John sighs. "I'm just trying to be nice. Why are you so pissed off all the time?" Harley asks, sounding almost genuinely curious. Which, amazingly enough, only serves to piss Karkat off even more.

"Wow, what do you know, it's my default setting," Karkat replies scathingly. "Oh, and have a nice pile of go fuck yourself," he adds, throwing her the middle claw. "Because I don't need to explain myself to you."

"Cranky buttface!" Harley shoots him a pair of finger pistols, except she uses her middle fingers and she flips them right side up to flick him off properly, her eyes burning with challenge.

...He will admit, that is impressive. Karkat eyes her sideways, and pretends to yawn, stretching his arms out and inspecting his fingernails. He raises his middle claw, slaps his face as though in shock, and then holds it out toward Harley, wiping at his eyes and smiling like he's in tears at the beauty of the sight.

Harley narrows her eyes and mimes cocking and loading a shotgun with disturbing efficiency that would make Karkat extremely worried if she weren't unarmed at the moment. When she pulls the trigger, she whips out a single middle finger like a bullet, a wild grin on her face. Between them, John groans and flops back against the couch, rolling his eyes.

Oh, it's on.

"Children," Samuel Egbert says with a note of resignation, reminding Karkat that oh right John's dad is right there. Karkat sits up at attention, wheezing with pain, and sits on his claws so he can lean against John without the temptation to flip Harley off again. "Do any of you know how this works? I can't think of how to connect it to the Internet. Young Ambrose -" ("Ambrose," Karkat repeats in disbelief,) "- seemed quite confident that he could make it work, but I haven't the faintest idea how…"

"Ooooh, let me try!" Harley says, her attention flipping from Karkat to the remote without warning. She holds out her hand and wiggles her fingers. "I'm pretty okay with computers, usually! How hard can a TV be?"

"Thank you, Ms Harley," Samuel Egbert says. Karkat, in the privacy of his own mind, is pretty fucking sure that this can only end in disaster, but before they have a chance to find out, the television switches on while Dadbert is in the process of handing it to Harley, neither of them with their fingers near the power button. John tenses all along Karkat's side, on the alert, but the screen has the orange-gold border of Pesterchum 7.0 and the tension drains away until Karkat is just slumped against a regular John again as orange text fills the screen.

TT: a Sony
TT: well this is a first for me
TT: just talk at me bros i can hear you
TT: this is the Egbert television right
TT: that would be a fucking nightmare if i got the wrong serial number

"Uh - yes, we are here, Ambrose," Samuel Egbert says, clearing his throat. He leans forward to squint at the screen and speaks a little too loudly.

TT: oh jiminy fucking christmas not with that name
TT: just Bro, the last thing i need is another one like Lalonde lording it over my name choices

Lalonde? That sounds familiar - really familiar - but Karkat ignores that, because it's totally irrelevant to the conversation. He doesn't know what to fucking say, since this seems to be Dadbert's ballgame, so he kicks his feet up on the bottom rung of the coffee table and settles in to aim a neutral glare at the television screen, snuggled in against John.

"Bro," Samuel says graciously. "Thank you for agreeing to speak with us on such short notice. Things have gotten a little out of hand here, as you can imagine."

TT: i warned you, man
TT: well i warned the kid
TT: i'll tell you what i can about Droog but TT: the MC are hardcore
TT: but all power to you i guess

"So what changed?" John says suddenly. His tone is harsh and strident, and he has one hand clutching at his pants in a tight fist, his knuckles white. With blue eyes he looks distant in his anger, focused narrowed completely on the screen.

TT: ...care to clarify kid?

"I came to you for information before, remember? You most definitely warned me. You told me to run." John's tone turns mocking, and Karkat catches even Harley staring at John in confusion at how bitter he sounds. "Why would you give a straight answer now, and not just repeat the same thing?"

TT: yeah and look how well that worked out
"I'm not mad at you," John says, closing his eyes. "I'm mad at me."

"What?" Karkat says.

"What?" This from Harley.

TT: what

There is only silence from Samuel Egbert.

John starts trembling in earnest and Karkat's moirailing instincts hit full throttle. He gingerly stretches his arm around John's shoulders, and once he's certain that his ribs and collarbone can handle it he holds John tightly, pressing his fingers into the dip of John's shoulders.

"You told me that if I stayed - if I tried to fight Hearts Boxcars - I'd get everyone around me hurt or killed." John's voice sounds raw. "Well, congratulations. You were right. I fucked up, I made the wrong call, and Kar- Hemogoblin got hurt. So. I'm sorry. I should have just listened to you in the first place." And oh fuck, oh fuck John is crying, that is a thing that is happening, oh fuck.

"John!" Karkat hisses, but Harley beats him to it, bursting out with, "That wasn't your fault at all, John!"

TT: eh, well, then yeah i told you so

"Hey, fuckface!" Karkat yells. "Why don't you take your cretinous thinkpan and shove it up your seedflap, asshat?!"

"Karkat," Samuel Egbert says, scandalized.

TT: oh wow
TT: that is one hellacious vocabulary you've got there kid
TT: color me impressed
TT: now calm down and let me finish
TT: John
TT: kid
TT: you got balls a'ight
TT: honestly when i said that shit i assumed you wouldn't make it another night with the MC on your ass
TT: but you kids ran Hearts out inside a week
TT: and from the timeline i've pieced together it was Hemogoblin who pulled that shit off while you were with us in NY
TT: serious kudos there
TT: i was wrong, too

Karkat feels...weird. A weird that is not angry. Instead he feels vaguely...gratified. Like he's received some uncalled for praise that he never expected to hear.

There is absolutely no need for this Bro character to know that Hemogoblin had taken a swan dive into the harbor more than he'd legitimately run Boxcars out of town. None whatsoever. Karkat sniffs, and decides he can cut the guy a break. Just this once.

It helps that John steadies under his hands. His nose looks kind of blotchy, and a stray tear has escaped the corner of his eye, but he isn't actively crying anymore - just reading the screen with his jaw set in an inscrutable, thoughtful expression. Karkat wipes the tear away and John is almost as good as new. John looks at him gratefully, and Karkat has to swallow a purr of satisfaction because purring in front of witnesses would be fucking indecent.

TT: so yeah i'll help
TT: since you seem like you're gonna stick it out
TT: and Dave would probably cry if you got yourself killed
TT: he'd try not to cry
TT: and then he'd cry a lot
TT: so there's that TT: but you're also fucked because Diamonds Droog is in town

"What a sterling vote of confidence," Samuel Egbert murmurs, steepling his fingers and resting his chin on his hands. "What do you know?"

TT: let's put it this way
TT: Hearts is a tank, the MC's muscle
TT: he sets up shop in new cities and starts up all their basic operations
TT: not too smart, but a lot of raw power, an army of thugs as backup
TT: man gets shit done
TT: Diamonds is worse

"No way," Karkat mutters, muffling his sarcasm in John's shirt. Bro either doesn't hear or is ignoring his smartass comments now.

"How is she worse?" Harley asks, bouncing in her seat. She folds her feet up to sit tailor-style, but she's floating again so that her feet don't touch the couch. Samuel Egbert just shakes his head at her. "Is she wayyy stronger?"

TT: worse
TT: she's smarter
TT: DD handles intimidation and special ops, with a specialty in kidnapping the loved ones of the rich and powerful and holding them for ransom
TT: there's a lot less intel on her cause she keeps her head down and her tracks covered TT: people who report her to the cops never see their kids again
TT: 's probably why you couldn't find shit through your other contacts Egbert

John shudders, and Karkat can't blame him. He's feeling a little sick himself, trying to match the vicious fighter who beat the hell out of him last night with a criminal who could cold-bloodedly tear a child out of their family, and just as easily never return them.

...Actually, it's pretty fucking easy to fit that into his mental portrait of Diamonds Droog. No, that wasn't hard at all. Karkat thinks of the bored, cool interest in Droog's eyes as she stabbed him in the side, and thinks there isn't much that woman wouldn't be capable of, if she put her mind to it.

TT: but from what i know
TT: you need to be just as careful when it comes to her strength
TT: i mean it's not like anyone has ever filmed some kind of cage match
TT: Hearts and Diamonds going head to head - nah
TT: there's no way to compare the two in terms of mechanics
"How do you know?" Harley asks.

"Oh," John chokes, and Karkat does a hasty re-estimation of just how attached John is to that red-text asshole. In the armchair, Samuel Egbert flinches bodily, all the color leaving his already pale face.

"Yeah... she fights well. Hella well, one might say. Great technique, uncommon specibus. But it's when she loses it that you've got to watch her. Maybe I could have taken her if she'd stayed calm... but I held my own for too long. Cut her fancy ass suit too many times.

"What happened?" Harley says, her voice soft.

John frowns, looking up from his hands. "I - no, I haven't been checking my phone all afternoon. Why?"

TT: look i said my piece
TT: now i just have one question
TT: you heard from Dave lately?

John frowns, looking up from his hands. "I - no, I haven't been checking my phone all afternoon. Why?"

TT: nvm
TT: just if you hear from him
TT: let him know i owe him such an asskicking
TT: and John, Oriole says hi

"Oreo who?" John asks, blinking.

TT: orange Dave

"Oh." John shrugs. "Uh, hi to him too, I guess."

TT: enough of this i am not a fucking personal messenger
TT: later kids
TT: lemme know if you need something else Egbert.

"Will do, Mr - Bro," Samuel Egbert corrects himself, pinching the brow of his nose. "I greatly appreciate your candidness today. You have my thanks."

TT: whatever
TT: i'm outta here

In the silence that follows, Karkat has the unique opportunity to witness every Egbert and Harley in the room look up, glance at each other, and make nigh-on identical expressions of rueful humor. Seriously. It's fucking unnatural. Over the course of one night and day, Karkat has landed himself in the middle of Heir's inner circle, which consists of his moirail, his moirail's insane sister and the unknown factor that is Samuel Egbert.

Harley sits down hard on the couch, her eyes alight with intent. “Let’s,” she says, cracking her knuckles, “get down to business.”

...This is going to be so weird.

Between one strike and the next, the Seer reviews what she knows of the hero known as Blind Justice.

Blind Justice's style is one of precise movements and foresight; she is famed for her ability to plot and execute complex maneuvers that seem to take into account the reactions of her opponents before they can make a move, but her instinctive, spur of the moment judgments are not to be dismissed, either. She has a finely honed sense of justice, and the blades of her canekind are equally sharp.

None of that precision is evident now. Lost in the rage inspired by her kismesissitude, Justice lunges when she should sidestep, lashes out with a snarl when she should parry. Her rationality has deserted her.

And yet, Seer realizes, deflecting a blade away from her face by using the light that ripples along the flat of her palm, she is still a better close combat fighter, overall, than the Seer of Light. In an ideal world, Seer would rust the blades of Justice's canekind from afar, and knock the troll out with a fortuitously timed strike to the chin or a minor blasting spell.

But when Seer whirls out of the troll's range to collect herself, the rank scent of the sea wafts through the air, a smell so out of place in the middle of a park that she falters. Justice darts forward and slices open a cut down Seer's raised forearm, cackling as she does so.

Seer squeezes her palm into a fist and barely catches herself before she tries to rattle off a spell of blinding light. Trying to blind the troll would be redundant beyond all reason, and instead Seer jerks back to put distance between herself and the troll once more.

It is unfortunate how many of Seer's usual tactics rely on blinding the opponent or otherwise disorienting them to give herself the advantage. All of them are useless here. She does not trust her mind enough to cast a blasting spell that wouldn't take out half of Chicago with it. And the lingering film of grimlight, permeating through the ambient magic around her, is simply the icing on the cake. Rose had been slow to sense it at first, more used to the grimdark aspect of such matters, but now that she is aware of the influence, she can't help but feel the taint like grime on her skin, eating away at her concentration.

Justice slices at her with both blades, her snarling mouth letting loose a growl of fury. There really is something to be said for a troll grow! - it is considerably more intimidating than any noise a human larynx could produce, Seer thinks, dodging yet again. She snaps her fingers, and her vision tunnels as she teleports behind Justice's back. The trick does not work so well this time; Justice's nostrils flare as she spins in a circle, catching Seer's scent again almost instantly. She brings one of the blades down in an arc, and Seer calculates, in a fraction of a second, whether or not it would be best to dodge again.

But she's not going to trounce a rogue hero by dodging and dancing around her. Eventually, she has to land a hit, or else disarm Justice entirely. Seer plucks a prepared rusting spell from her mind and brings it to bear in the gleam of her hands. Her Sight flares at the precise moment she needs to move, and Seer complies, clapping her palms together just below the cane's handle when the blade is inches from her face.

The sheer force of Justice has put into the blow drives the cane's blade perilously close to Seer's masked face; in the next instant, rust sheers through the blade at an accelerated rate, and Seer smiles as she twists out of the way. Justice steps in close again, but when she raises the canekind specibus, the blade that Seer touched snaps in two in midair. Flakes of rust are all that remains by the time the aged blade hits the ground.

"Bleh! Rust!" Justice spits, curling her lip at the broken weapon. "That won't work on me a second time! Now I'll see it coming!"

"It should not have worked at all," Seer corrects. She is still trying to marshal Blind Justice back into rational thought, after all. "If you were not so distracted by rivalry, perhaps you would be able to recollect exactly how my powers work." She spreads her hands to either side, still burning with power but trying to present a more...conciliatory posture.

Hmm. Perhaps she should have inquired more with Kanaya or John on the intricacies of troll pacification gestures.

Justice cackles, raising her second blade. "Pah! You really do talk too much!" She dives into a forward roll and Seer does not move swiftly enough to avoid the slice that digs into the side of her calf. Justice comes up on her knees, the blade held before her to ward off a counter strike. But that's just not in Seer's repertoire. She has to sort through her mind's storage for a minor healing spell to stem the flow of blood, and to buy herself time, she teleports out of the way again.

She feels a brief, distracting tug of regret that she has lost her knitting needles, and not dared to replace them. Kanaya no doubt possesses a spare pair of needles - her needlekind training lies more in the realm of stitch work than strifing, though Seer has no doubt Kanaya could managed quite well by improvising - but Rose had not asked to borrow them before leaving Philadelphia. With them, she would not only be able to focus her spells but use them for the needlekind specibus's intended function, as a short range stabbing strife weapon. Other magicians, sticklers for tradition, might claim that wandkind is the true specibus for any magic user, but Rose has always found the unique capacity for both short and long-range attack capability to more than vindicate the use of needles.

But the last needles she used in combat were thorns, soon assimilated into the grimdark tangle that erupted around her body as the god in her head terrorized New York. Just another aspect of her life that the Horrorterrors had managed to corrupt. So the Seer grits her teeth, whistles the appropriate healing charm to seal her calf, and uses raw magic to deflect another slice at her stomach.

Clearly, shouting logic at Justice in the middle of the fray is not working. Even separated from her kismesis, she is not thinking clearly. But at this rate, the battle could drag on too long - it's only a matter of time before someone reports to the police or the Legislacerators that two heroes are duking it out in the middle of a public park. It won't matter then that Seer used to work in New York City, or is now based in Philadelphia, or what her motives are in fighting Blind Justice; in Chicago, all heroes are classified as 'dangerous vigilantes' and being caught now would most likely have Seer labelled a felon by the Bureau.

There is one tactic Seer has not yet tried. A quick, sharp jolt, however, might be exactly what Justice needs to shake her out of the heat of rivalry. Kanaya, naturally, had given her a stern frown when Rose proposed this plan, because Kanaya is perpetually convinced that Rose is on the verge of carrying out some reckless, dangerous, potentially-Horror induced plan. Which is good, because Rose needs that kind of check on herself - it is why she turned to Kanaya in the first place, trusting her to know if Rose has lost sight of herself again.

But this plan is neither dangerous nor Horror-induced.

(Hopefully.)

So when she sees her opportunity, she takes it. Gripping Justice's shoulder, Seer sifts through the film in the air and teleports them a few miles to the east, past Monroe Harbor, straight into the depths of Lake Michigan.

She plunges them straight to a depth of around eight feet: deep enough that Justice can't simply break the surface and breathe, but not so deep that their lungs or eardrums risk bursting from the sudden change in pressure. Seer's ears pop, but after a brief moment of pain it subsides, so she knows no permanent damage has been done. The abrupt temperature drop is the worst part, though; for Seer, if not for a coldblooded troll like Justice, the shift is unbearable and her hands and feet go numb almost immediately.

Tealbloods, however, are not anywhere near cold enough on the spectrum to develop aquatic respiratory systems. And Justice did not have Seer's advantage of foresight, so she did not know to hold her breath beforehand. Seer kicks a safe distance away, shivering, and observes from afar, relying more on her Sight than her eyes in the dark, icy water. The troll flails, the last half of her canekind spinning off into the depths of the lake as she claps her claws over her mouth in a futile effort to keep the bubbles of her air supply from escaping. She burbles incompressible garble. Her blindfold, loosened by the battle prior and the impact of teleportation, floats off to the side to expose eyes that have hazed over with the milky red glaze of troll blindness.

But Seer notes the exact moment that the full impact of their relocation hits Blind Justice - the moment the troll automatically tries to breathe in through her nose, and chokes on the water she inhales, her whole body spasming.

A violetblood or a simple shark might be able to detect scent markers through water currents and decipher them, but a terrestrial troll's nose, like a human's, has adapted solely to handle molecules in a gaseous form. However Blind Justice's sense of scent works - synesthesia has been tossed around on the online forums - it is of no use to her underwater.
For the first time in her life, Terezi Pyrope is truly blind.

Seer takes pity on the struggling troll after a few prolonged seconds. She counts her heartbeats - one, two, three, four, five -

And then her own air supply begins to dwindle - she's never been much of one for swimming - and when the tightness in her chest begins to squeeze a warning, she paddles closer to the troll and grips her by the forearm.

(Nɔ̀ nɔ̀ nɔ̀ nɔ̀)

For a moment, the back of her mind yawns, and she cannot distinguish between the water surrounding her and the great sea of bloodbrine that swills just beneath her shields. The moment passes, but she reels nonetheless before flinging them westward, back to the safety of the shore.

(Perhaps Kanaya had had a point.)

- Justice is no longer quite so vigorous in her attempts to fend off the Seer when they make landfall again. This time, Seer drops them even further from the ongoing fray by the Macy's Building, south of the commercial Loop area and well into the Near South Side. More specifically, Seer takes them to the Museum Campus, between the aquarium and the museum. The dome of the planetarium looms off to their right. The greenery and jogging paths of the campus are a far cry from the middle of Lake Michigan, but Seer shudders at a stiff breeze that picks up at the wrong moment. Kanaya had most definitely not designed the Seer costume with underwater escapades in mind, and she is soaked through.

But as cold as she is, rubbing through her sleeves and chafing at her void bracers, Seer is still in better shape than Justice. The troll must have inhaled a great deal more water than Seer thought, because she staggers and catches herself on a nearby park bench before lake water spews from both her nose and mouth. The troll gags, spitting and dry-heaving for a long minute before the last of the liquid clears her system. Despite the torn, drenched state of her suit, she doesn't shiver in the night air.

"Pickle juice," Justice sputters at last, wiping furiously at her running nose as she glares. She may be trying to glare at the Seer, but she directs her glazed eyes at a nearby lightpole, her senses apparently thrown off by inhaling water. "Pickle juice and rotten fish."

"Really? Is that what it smelled like to you?" Seer asks mildly, tilting her head to the side. "Because you know, the Great Lakes are freshwater, not -"

"I know what I'm about, Lemon Zest," Justice says, leaning her forearms heavily on her knees. The water she exhaled forms a damp spot on the ground, but it is already fading fast. "Euhrgh! That teleportation trick is pretty slick!"

"Thank you." Seer wrings out the bottom of her jacket with a grimace. Kanaya is going to unleash hell over this. "I do try. Now tell me, are you feeling more open to reasonable discussion of your life choices? Or is another dunking in order?"

"Water torture? Now you're talking! An old and venerable method of Imperial inquisition!" Justice spits one last time, horking up one last mouthful full of water from deep in her throat, and sits back on her haunches. Her confident, manic grin from earlier has faded, and her thin eyebrows furrow over her blind eyes, knotted with confusion. "I - wait - shit."
"Go on," Seer coaxes, settling herself on the bench. Her bottom is oppressively damp, but she doesn't let the disgust show on her face. All of her senses are on the alert, her Sight combing through Justice's aura from every angle, trying to see if her obsidian rage has settled. But as long as she maintains her composure, she thinks Blind Justice might be open to persuasion now. Nothing like an ice cold dip to clear one's head, after all. "Are you ready to talk?"

"No."

"Need a minute?"

"...Yeah."

Seer gives her more than a minute. Justice stays hunched over, swaying forward and back on the balls of her feet, and massages her temples. While she thinks, Seer activates a slow drying spell, one that starts a hot ray of light at her palms and works its way over her sleeves.

"...I think," Justice says at last, "I've been a complete sucker."

Seer nods, urging the light over her elbow. "Elaborate."

"Argh!" Justice scratches at her hair. The rough, wiry black bob is already drying in tufts around her horns. "I can't believe this - I went in there planning to arrest her, and she - she just wouldn't stop taunting me - this is unacceptable!" The frown of confusion loses some of that clarity, edging back into blind fury.

Justice is getting off track again. Seer steps in, her voice soothing. "Focus. You need to focus." She reaches out and grasps Justice's shoulder, forcing the troll to look at her instead of her claws. "You went to arrest the Indigo Scourge, and she riled you up into breaking the platonic nature of your rivalry. And since then, the two of you have been wreaking havoc trying to one-up each other.
Please tell me you understand that this needs to stop."

"Yeah, yeah! I get it!" Justice levers herself up with the bench and collapses onto it, her lips pouting.
"Just give me a second to get my mind together. It feels like I've got a rage hangover or something..."

"Ah," Seer says. Or perhaps it is alright to be just Rose, for the moment. Justice's aura is no longer a crackling blaze of teal light, ready to lash out at anyone who crossed her. With her uniform in tatters and water sluicing down her nose, Terezi doesn't look like a hero - just a too-skinny troll, all bones and joints and lean limbs, with her face exposed to the open air. Judging from the heavy teal-tinged bags beneath her eyes, sleep has not been high on the Scourge Sisters' to-do list. "That is entirely possible. I have it on good authority that rage hangovers are indeed a thing."

Terezi bares her sharp teeth in a hard grin - more of a grimace, really. "Is that a note of sarcasm I detect? Or just more pickles?"

"I wouldn't know. I am not familiar with the finer nuances of olfactory distinction," Rose says politely, folding her hands in her lap. "However, I am in earnest - a friend of mine happens to be in an inadvertent moirallegiance, and the concept of a rage hangover has definitely been established as a thing."

"Inadvertent moirallegiance? Ahahahahaha!" Terezi bursts out into laughter, her head resting on the back of the bench. "What a dumbass! How do you even do something like that?"

"It takes a special kind of talent. However, that's not the point I was trying to make." Rose combs her hair away from her face, feeling stray droplets of water crawl down the back of her neck. "You've been in the throes of an overzealous, unnaturally volatile concupiscent rivalry. Humans have no corresponding rage gland, per se, but it is obvious even to me that your hormones have been playing you like a poorly tuned fiddle."

"Last time I had a headache this bad was after Katz spilled a bottle of ammonia in the morgue." Terezi kicks her feet out and slouches, lifting her head to fold her arms behind it against the bench. "But I guess that's better than running around arguing nonstop with Vriska about who's beaten up more bad guys and decapitated more famous statues. That's the opposite of what justice is about."

"Statues?"

"It made more sense at the time. I think it's just one of those things where you had to be there. In the heat of the moment and all that."

"Hm."

They remain silent for a few minutes after that. It's a good sign, in Rose's opinion, a sign that Terezi has calmed down enough to sit still and put genuine thought into her actions. Terezi can take as much time as she needs to keep from slipping back into the blind passion of her hate.

But it also gives Rose time to worry about how the fight between the Sylph and the Scourge may be playing out. She has the utmost confidence in Sylph's ability to beat the ever-loving hell out of ordinary criminals, of course. But she's also familiar with the Scourge's tactics. The ceruleanblood takes risky gambles, and they have a tendency to pay off in her favor - an almost preternatural tendency, if Rose is honest with herself, one that she might wish to investigate further. And when she can't win through her own merits, and in the event her incredible luck fails her, the Indigo Scourge cheats.

"That's why you broke your initial partnership in the first place, isn't it," Rose muses out loud, almost before she realizes she's going to speak. Terezi twitches in her seat, nostrils flaring as she turns damaged red eyes toward Rose's side of the bench. "The Scourge cheats. She deliberately places innocent bystanders into the line of fire and breaks the law at her leisure if it means she wins. A complete lack of a moral compass, unless it suits her…Surely that should always have been at odds with your judicial leanings."

"It wasn't, actually," Terezi sighs. "I always knew the kind of person Vriska was. I thought I could balance her out. Keep her in line. We broke it off because she lied."

"About what?" Rose asks.

"About everything!" Terezi bursts out, snarling. "She lied and lied and lied, and when she couldn't lie anymore, she tried to pawn off all the responsibility by saying she was sorry. She thinks if she apologizes enough, it'll make everything better and everyone will conveniently forget what she did but she's wrong."

"An inability to take responsibility for her own actions?" Privately, Rose adds this confirmation to the on-going mental chart dedicated to her psychological evaluation of the Indigo Scourge. Before her grimdark breakdown, she made a habit of profiling most of the major heroes in the United States - a hobby and no more, considering that without personal contact with any of them, she could only speculate in the most general terms.

But the Scourge's idiosyncrasies are legendary and well publicized: her obsession with octets, her carelessness with the lives of civilians, her impossible gambles. Rose has theorized that the ceruleanblood at least has compulsive tendencies, if not an outright obsessive-compulsive disorder, but now she is tempted to consider a personality disorder as well - an impulsive type borderline, Perhaps, or even extreme narcissism. Something in the dramatic cluster, at least. But Rose is getting sidetracked.

"Exactly!" Terezi throws her hands up in the air, gesturing with them avidly. Rose thinks this has been eating away at the troll for a while now. Good. She intends to untangle as many of the sources of Terezi's irrational black hatred as she can. The more potential irritants Terezi can talk out of her system, the less fuel she will have to feed this caliginous feud. "And it's so infuriating! It just - I just wanted to make her see that she's responsible for things! That she can't just sail through life without consequences! I don't know where I went wrong! I - I've been just as bad as her these past few days!"

"Would you like my honest opinion?"

Terezi wrinkles her nose. "Depends. This isn't some kind of strange human attempt at pacification, is it? Or some freaky fourway auspicism with Sylph? Because thanks but no thanks, Zest. That is sooo not my scene."

"My interests are purely platonic." Rose adjusts her jacket, shivering again in the cold, and crosses her legs at the ankles. Inside her shoes, her socks squish with water, and she makes the executive decision to dry those first, redirecting her warming spell with a click of her tongue. "Psychology has always been a source of immense fascination for me. If I come across as overly conciliatory, I assure you that it is unintentional. I only came here to stop you two from wiping Chicago off the map. Consider it a neighborly self-interest and nothing more."

"Haha! Then bring it on."

"You have had any number of opportunities to take Scourge into custody over the years, correct?" Terezi's responding nod is reluctant and augmented with a pout, but a nod nonetheless. "I suspect that the bonds of partnership between you have remained a source of affection and lenience towards her all this time. You considered her your sister in name, after all, and that kind of relationship is rare between trolls. When you finally discarded that sisterly affection, all that was left was the pure rivalry that had built up between the two of you during your years at odds - and when you confronted Scourge face to face, there was nothing to keep that in check, and you lost sight of your original goal in the instinctive wave of addling hormones."

Caliginous lust, as distinct from long-term, committed caliginous antagonism, is a well-documented phenomenon. All hormonally normal troll adolescents experience concupiscent crushes of both shades throughout their lives, as made infamous by the nightmare of lust-driven quadrant-vacillation known as Romeo and Juliet. Again, it is not Rose's particular area of expertise, but one that she is familiar enough with to make her point. It's part of the reason troll society most likely developed auspices in the first place - without mediators, widespread black infidelity would be rampant due to the territorial, spontaneous nature of troll rivalries.

"Your lecture-face smells like soap bubbles," Terezi remarks, which would have been a non sequitur in any other context. Rose doesn't know whether it is intended as an insult or a compliment - or perhaps simply a statement of a fact. "I think I can see how that makes sense. I guess I just always thought my hate towards Vriska was, you know, the humany, platonic kind of murderhate. I wouldn't let it be anything else. But of all the minds here, it feels like I understood my own the least."

"It happens to the best of us." Rose shifts in her seat again. Her shoes are almost dry, and her hair is next on the agenda. A man in a blue striped jogging outfit runs by them along the path at that moment, a dog loping by his side. Neither of them even look in Terezi and Rose's direction, but Rose bites her tongue until they've passed by. "How did Shakespeare put it? 'Thus quadrants make fools of us all.' Or perhaps that was Thackeray…"

"Nnnrrnnghl," Terezi mumbles. "And now I've thrown my whole life away chasing her around downtown, haven't I? God - what Crawford and Starling must think of me right now…"

"Yes." There is no way to be delicate about this. Rose is no expert in the methods of the Legislacerators, but she can't imagine that Terezi has a home to go safely back to at this point. Cities are usually lenient about their resident heroes, with a few exceptions; unfortunately, Chicago is one of those exceptions. There will be no mercy for Terezi here, not when the Legislacerator Bureau has always blacklisted her for infringing on their ideals. Her heroic identity has been exposed not just to law enforcement but to every criminal who can read English or Alternian, borne internationally through the medium of the internet.

"I am not saying your caliginous relationship wouldn't have been viable under other circumstances." Rose gestures toward the fires blazing over the rooftops in the distance, and Terezi follows the sweep of her hand, smells the smoke on the breeze, and winces. "Every troll is entitled to a serendipitous kismesis. It is simply biology. However, you two are powerful heroes, and you catalyze more violent reactions in each other than a standard troll kismesissitude. If you can't keep your relationship separate from your hero work...well..."

"But the hero work is half the problem!" Terezi whines. "She has the audacity to claim she's better, and how am I supposed to let that stand! I am clearly the expert in enforcing the law around here!"

"Neither of you are heroes from what I see," Rose says. "Not anymore."

Terezi bristles. "Oh? And who appointed you the supreme justice in this courtroom, huh?"

The judicial metaphors are going to become quite tiresome, quite quickly. Rose can feel it. "You did, I'm afraid, when you and Vriska Serket engaged in a caliginous affair, terrorized your own city, and refused the mediating aid of an auspice perfectly willing to arbitrate between the two of you," she replies primly. "Your actions have consequences. Are you going to take responsibility for them?"

That reaches Terezi, and the troll snaps to attention, her back ramrod straight. "Of course!" she replies, her pointy chin jerking up in indignation. Then she crumbles again, her sightless eyes scrunching up with confusion. "But - I can't just stop hating her! She gets under my skin! She always seems to have just the right snarktastic comment with which to challenge me!" Terezi buries her face in her hands. "She's perfectly awful in all the most provoking ways! That sexy, sexy hornswoggler!"

Rose frowns at the troll's bowed head, and then looks down at her own hand.

In this particular moment, she finds that she can only ask herself one thing: what would Kanaya do?

The answer is obvious.

She takes her hand, swings it back, and smacks Terezi upside the back of the head. The troll lets out a surprised squawk. Before she can react, Rose plays her final card. "So will you continue to pursue this relationship? Even knowing that by doing so, you apparently go into a destructive rivalry-driven mindset that negates your treasured sense of justice?"

Terezi lets out another muffled groan. "You perjuring fiend. That was a mediating slap, wasn't it?!"

Rose inspects her fingernails and ignores Terezi's attempt at deflection. She's stopped shivering, and that has done wonders for her composure. The costume's cloth still reeks of lake water, but at least she is dry now. "If you intend to revert back to your previous behavior the moment you see Vriska, or the Scourge, or whatever you want to call her, Sylph and I will have no alternative but to turn you over to the Legislacerators. It will be the end of you two as free trolls and the end of your rivalry. Think, Terezi," she adds. "I know you can."

Terezi raises her head a little and gazes out over the green, her claws folding before her mouth as she sits in contemplation. Good. Rose wants her to mull that last part over, because it is true. If they can't tame this caliginous rivalry, she and Sylph will have to stop Scourge and Justice. Permanently.

"Your threats smell like lime juice," the troll says at last. "With the apple crispness of truth."

...No, Rose thinks, blinking in surprise. It's not possible. There is absolutely no way Terezi just described a sour apple martini. She refuses to believe it. It is simply Rose's latent alcoholism trying to rear its ugly head. Not everything is about vodka, damn it.

"Besides, my lusus agrees with you," Terezi says, shaking her head. "This whole relationship needs to be adjourned. At least until they rebuild downtown!"

Rose arches an eyebrow. "Your lusus?"

Terezi grins. "Of course! She taught me everything I know. Strange that I couldn't hear her these past few days." The smile vanishes. "Just another reason this kismesissitude needs to tone it down, I guess. I don't know if I was ignoring her, or just...couldn't hear her over all that anger."

Rose just shakes her head, not entirely sure how much of her nonverbal communication is actually getting across, here. She knows even less about the relationship between lusii and their troll charges than she does about caliginous affairs, so she really has no further comment on the matter. "We should return to Sylph and Scourge now. I can only imagine their battle has been settled by now, one way or another."

Rose is fairly certain the Sylph will have won, but there is still that whisper of uncertainty in the back of her mind that says anything could have happened to alter the flow of battle after Rose left. Interference from law enforcement, an unexpected passerby wandering in under Scourge's influence...the possibilities are endless. She won't feel confident that her predictions have led Sylph to victory until she sees the results with her own eyes.

"And then what? If you're not going to hand us over to the police for all this shit we've pulled, what are you suggesting?" Terezi asks, tilting her head to the side. "Like you said, me and Vriska...we can't stay here. Not after all this. Our covers are blown. I mean, our faces must be front page news."

"Start over in Canada seems to be the general consensus," Rose says, stretching her arms over her head. "We have a contact there. You will need to change your names, and Vriska will need to conceal her more distinctive features better, but you could begin again. Even restart hero work separately, perhaps, though you will need a new theme and alias if you wish to risk that kind of publicity."

"Huh." Terezi nods slowly, looking surprised. What, did she think Sylph and Seer would leave two hazards like Justice and Scourge to fend for themselves after their hatred simmered down? "Anyway. Yeah. I think I made a huge mistake. So thanks, Zest. I owe you a life debt."

"You are quite welcome." Rose stands up, brushing grime off the seat of her pants, and extends a hand to Terezi. "You can repay that debt by promising to cooperate with Sylph when she tries to auspice the two of you."
Terezi waves the hand away. "I'm blind, not incapable!" she says, cackling again as she rises to her feet. "No need to mollycoddle me, Zest! I've been faking sight for years at the Bureau without a cane! And I become extremely sensitive about my disability when people treat me like a wriggler!" Her pout is clearly feigned, this time; Rose gets the feeling that this is an old joke for Terezi.

Rose retracts her hand anyway. "Ah. My apologies. I should have seen that you would be fine on your own."

Terezi flings a dramatic arm across her brow. "You should have...seen?!"

"Er..."

"You mock my handicap, good Seer! Even your alias is another stab at my disability!"

Rose raises an eyebrow. She's not buying it. "Quite unintentional, I assure you," she says in a droning monotone, rolling her eyes. "Oh, can you ever forgive me for this horrific oversight?"

Terezi has to sit back down on the bench to laugh that one off. Rose does not know what Dave is complaining about - John has taught her to recognize the most excellent pun opportunities.

That train of thought is abruptly derailed when the voice susurrating through the air around her slams into Rose's head with a shriek of terror.

That is when Rose collapses.

The trouble is not that the Indigo Scourge is a better fighter.

The trouble is getting close enough to lay claws on her.

The Malachite Sylph growls under her breath and puts on an extra burst of speed, chasing her quarry around the corner of Washington Street and snarling when her hands meet only air.

For several years now, since becoming a rainbow drinker, Kanaya has grown used to being much quicker than most of the people around her. She was always a cut above the rest - she would not have been able to join the Medicull unit if she let herself grow soft - but dying and being resurrected somehow granted her speed, stamina, and strength enough to face off against even the hardiest of bluebloods she has dealt with as a crime fighter.

But Scourge is light on her feet; she zigzags and darts just out of her reach rolling across the hood of a parked car with a grunt and laughing gaily as she makes for the nearest police barricade.

Sylph barrels after her, leaping up and landing on the roof of the car with enough force to dent the metal, and then lunges for Scourge again. She hasn't drawn her makeupkind yet, but she's giving it considerable thought, if only to extend her reach by the extra few inches she needs to close the gap. If the Scourge has still been wearing her usual ridiculous buccaneer coat, Sylph is sure she would have had the troll by now.

Instead, Scourge has room to spin on her heel and dart off in another direction, strands of her hair tearing out between Sylph's clawtips. "Owwwwwwww!" she yelps, clapping a hand to her hair and staring at Sylph with indignation. "You'll pay for that, Sylph!" She tears something from the side of her ruined gauntlet and whips it at Sylph overhand, and then takes off again.
Without waiting to see what it is the Scourge threw, Sylph rolls out of the way, putting the car between her and whatever new gadget Scourge has unleashed. A small magic 8 ball hits the street and rolls around in a circle before exploding in a burst of light and white smoke.

A diversionary tactic, then. Coughing once before holding her breath against the smoke, Sylph slides a tube of lipstick out of the holster at her thigh and activates the chainsaw functionality. She ignores the spots of glaring light that throb across her field of vision and pursues Scourge once more, relying more on her intimate awareness of the troll's fluttering heartbeat. Her legs strain with the effort, and the snarl that emerges from her throat is honestly more of a hunting growl than an auspicious chirp.

Sylph has been paying little attention to the law enforcement around them. Thanks to the lingering effects of the Seer's refraction spell, most of the police and Lacerators in the vicinity are too disoriented to draw near the two heroes. But as Scourge leads her a merry chase, weaving in between abandoned, overturned vehicles, in the direction of the barricades at the far corner of the block, more stray officers wander in the corner of Sylph's eye, and she catches the tail end of shouted orders. Perhaps if her focus weren't so single-mindedly focused, she would have realized what the flurry of activity meant. She was in the armed forces long enough, after all.

But she fails to notice as the police and Lacerator units begin to pull back, and make way for someone else to approach the fight.

The Scourge's luck runs out, regardless. She swears and rips at the exposed wiring on her arm gauntlet, attempting some new mischief, but the machine sparks at her and she stumbles over a piece of rubble. She catches herself immediately, all raw, animal grace as her back dips and she surges forward again, dragging herself forward on her hands to regain her stride, but it is all the advantage Sylph needs to close the gap. She falls into a crouch, balancing on one hand as she sweeps out with her leg and knocks Scourge's feet out from under her.

The troll hits her chin hard on the ground. "Shit!" she yelps, scrambling to get her arms under her. Sylph plants a heel in the center of Scourge's back before she can push herself upright, and the ceruleanblood flops back down against the ground with jolted huff. "Fugh! I think you broke my tooth!" Scourge spits, and vibrant blue blood spatters on the pavement, along with a chip of white that Sylph ignores.

"Desist in your attempts to evade me. This is for your own good," Sylph commands. She doesn't really expect it to work, and sighs when Scourge just wails without words and squirms an arm free to start pounding on her gauntlet again, as though through some miraculous stroke of luck the machine will work again. It is a relatively new addition to the Scourge's inventory of gadgets, and Sylph has no idea what it is intended to do when it is functioning properly; all the better that it isn't working, really.

"You need to get a life!" Scourge yells back, whacking her arm in sets of eight. "Go back to your own city, Meddlesome Mcfussyfangs! You're not welcome here!"

And with that, Scourge must manage to shove some key component back into place; the gauntlet starts emitting a high pitched whine that shoots straight to Sylph's head, as though a fishhook is tugging through the roof of her mouth. The frequency vibrates right through the core of her horns and sets her teeth on edge with a sharp, aching pain. Sylph flinches and presses a hand to her head, the other still occupied with her chainsawkind.

Thankfully, it hits Scourge just as hard - the troll clutches her own temples with less decorum, writhing, which only confirms Sylph's suspicion that this is not, in fact, an intended function of that infernal machine.
"I am going," Sylph says, teeth sore and her voice muffled, "to remove that inauspicious device."
She hefts her chainsaw and swings it up over her head. She is certain she can damage the gauntlet enough to remove it with necessarily removing Scourge's arm along with it.

But that's not high on her list of priorities. Back in the Novaya Ukraine, emergency field amputations had been Kanaya's specialty.

"Don't you dare!"

Sylph moves to bring the chainsaw down.

The goldblood comes out of nowhere. Or at least, that is the impression Sylph has at the time. He flings himself over the rubble next to them and collapses, cowering, over the Scourge's arm.

Then, at last, Sylph realizes her miscalculation. She redirects her chainsaw and drives the rotating teeth through the window of the car beside her, shattering it. Glass shards fly everywhere and the gears of her chainsaw specibus scream before she manages to turn it off.

"P-please don't kill me!" the goldblood babbles, his amber eyes wide and glassy, as though he is preoccupied with some internal turmoil. There is a silver colored star medal pinned crookedly to his pale blue uniform, the mark of a patrolman, and he can't be more than a few years older than them. His legs shake, and it is clear that it is only Scourge's influence pressing upon his brain that keeps him from running in terror. "I - I don't know what's going on!"

Scourge is not holding her temples because of the noise - she is doing it to command this poor troll to do her bidding. Sylph pinches the bridge of her nose, flipping her chainsaw back into a lipstick. "Send him on his way, Scourge," she says, leaving no room for argument in her tone. It is clear Scourge needs a firm hand.

"No! Like I'd seriously let you chop my arm off?! No thanks!"

"I will not remove your arm from your thorax. You have my word. This troll has no part in your infuriating antics."

Scourge spits up another clot of blood. The smell is...enticing. "I'm starting to think you're full of shit! I don't believeeeeee you!"

Sylph has to take matters into her own hands; she grimaces at the goldblood in a silent apology. "I am going to remove you. Brace yourself. You will be unharmed. Probably."

"Whoa, what -" he gets out before Sylph kicks him in the ribs. She does so with deliberate care, sending him flying in a low arc that carries him a good few yards away from the two heroes.

"No!" Scourge wails, reaching out a claw and clenching her fist. The goldblood jerks upright and staggers onto his knees, still dazed and under Scourge's mind control, and starts to hobble back toward them. Sylph tucks her lipstick away and brings back her closed fist, planning to introduce it to the back of Scourge's thick skull and stop this mental hogwash before more trolls wander into the ceruleanblood's range of influence.

"Hey - hey, can everybody just listen for five minutes!"

Sylph is arrested midstrike. The Scourge, her claws still outstretched toward the goldblood, blinks, and her attention shifts to the new troll approaching them from the barricade. The moment her extra-pupiled eye flickers away, the police officer slumps to his knees, panting, but doesn't move to run.
Sylph doesn't think any of them could move willingly by then. Why would anyone want to run away from the limeblood walking toward them with his claws out to the sides and his horns tilted back, open to embrace them all. She can sense his pulse from here and there is no fear, no bite of adrenaline flowing through his veins at the act of approaching two heroes locked in combat. Just a steady, smooth pulse that beats in her head like a soothing metronome. His blood would have none of the excess shock and tang of ordinary yellow-green hemotypes - it would be like sipping a nice cup of soothing green tea.

Kanaya snaps out of it a moment later, though the conciliatory pheromones fomenting in the air have become heavy enough that it feels almost humid. Her rainbow drinking tendencies may lend her some immunity, but she attributes it more to the indefatigable strength of her grey irritation. This can be only one troll - the limeblooded empath and so-called universal moirail, Profiler William Graham of the Bureau of Legislaceration, his unique identity as the first limeblood born in centuries obvious even in the uneven lettering of his chosen first name.

Damn and blast. She will need to obtain his autograph for Rose, now. How troublesome.

But if he thinks dousing them with pale scent markers is enough to distract Kanaya from her serendipitous auspicizing, he had best think again. Scourge gives a weak snarl, and Kanaya thinks that the fire of kismesissitude may be enough to blast the pacification out of Scourage's system as well. The goldblood is utterly lost though; he slumps over sideways and begins snoring faintly. The mere presence of Graham seems to have been sufficient to lull the troll to sleep, even in the middle of a battle field.

"That...is impressive," Kanaya admits aloud, raising her chin under Graham's piercing gaze. He shuffles forward as she speaks, everything about his posture meek and unassuming, the exact opposite of a threat. "You are a great conciliator, Profiler Graham."

"My reputation proceeds me," the troll mutters, sounding so doleful that Kanaya thinks the words were not meant for her, but he smiles with no teeth bared. He tips his head to the side, his eyes glittering an impossibly bright green behind thick, oblong tortoiseshell glasses. "Oh, I see. You're not affected, are you?"

"Not particularly." She adjusts the set of the foot that is not occupied with suppressing the Scourge's weakened struggles, so that she can face the new troll in a properly guarded stance. Just because he feels like pacification incarnate does not mean he isn't a threat in his own way. "I am quite comfortable with my current level of annoyance, and thus do not require pacification. Thank you anyway."

"Really? Because it looks like you're shading pretty grey for Ms Serket and her partner, here," Graham says, nodding at the troll beneath Kanaya's foot. "I could take that load off your mind, you know. Ease all that exasperation they've been making you vent."

"As mollification is to you, so auspicism is to me, I am afraid," Kanaya says. She realizes her fists are slowly unclenching, and makes a point of reaffirming her grip. She cannot let his soothing voice seep into her head. "I would not give that up for the world."

Graham sighs heavily, scrubbing at his face with a hand. He looks exhausted, but Kanaya suspects that he is playing it up: it would be hard for trolls with less self-control to resist the urge to try to comfort him after seeing the shadows under his eyes and the shabby state of his clothes. He is irredeemably pathetic. So, this is what it looks like when moirallegiance is forged into a masterful tool.

No wonder the fuchsia-bloods made such an effort to cull their genes from the Mothergrub slurries. It was the one thing all tyrannical tyrants had agreed upon throughout history - the elimination of the hemotype that could disable their armies and cripples their empires with a shoosh and a sigh.

"Never been shooshpapped before? Ever?" he asks wryly, scratching around his horns.

"It has never been necessary. Unlike certain others I could mention" - she digs her heel into Scourge's spine - "I can control my irritation." She smiles beatifically. "That is my secret, I'm afraid. I'm always irritated."

Abruptly, the body beneath Kanaya's foot jolts, and a piercing whine breaks the tension in the air. "Oh, will you two stop with your fake hateflirting and get this show on the road!" the Scourge demands. "Good fucking god, Sylph, what do you eat?! You're crushing my butt!"

With that she tosses an object over her shoulder. It is an awful shot, from a terrible angle, stymied by the fact that Scourge's face is mashed against the road, but the new magic 8 ball arcs at Kanaya's face anyway.

Oh, shit. Sylph swears, and dives to the side just as the flash bomb explodes. She doesn't close her eyes in time and the white hot light makes her shriek as her too-sensitive vision temporarily fries. She lands hard on her knees and elbows rather than finishing her roll. From behind her, she can hear the scrabble of the Scourge's feet in gravel as the troll gets to her feet. Her eyes smart, but she forces them open anyway to squint back the way she came. She can't afford to lose track of the Scourge in a city this large.

"Nice try! You're not fooling me twice, shorty!" Scourge yells. Sylph can barely distinguish between the washed out blurs where buildings and people should be, but she thinks that grey and blue blob is the Scourge jabbing a finger at Graham. "What do you think I am, some dumb, flighty broad?! I don't need either of you meddling meddlers! I'm out of here!"

She flips both of them the middle finger with each hand, shaking her arms four times, and then sprints away. She vaults onto one of the green awnings of the Macy's, swings up, and begins to scale the side of the building like a spider.

"Well," Profiler Graham says at last, grimacing. "That was unexpected."

Sylph shakes her head, clearing the last of the afterglare from her vision, and digs into one of her pockets. She removes a piece of paper and rises to her feet, brushing dust off her knees. She strides over and offers the paper to Graham. "I would be much obliged if I could obtain your autograph. For my partner, of course," she adds. "She wanted it in one of her texts, but this will have to do. Pardon me."

The limeblood stares at the slip of paper over the rim of his glasses, and then nods slowly. "I take it you're not going to stick around and let me try to manage this situation?" he says, sounding resigned.

"No." Sylph feels her jaw clench. "I have a spider to hunt. She is not scuttling away without receiving a most stern talking to."

Graham raises both hands in surrender, shrugging. "Then hell, I won't get in your way. I'm not cleared to carry a strife specibus anymore, so if you're not pacified by now, there's really not much I could do to stop you."

"Just keep trolls clear of the building." Sylph pulls up her hood. "They will only be in danger if they approach Scourge now."

With a sharp nod, she races across the street, her breath huffing as she makes for an overturned SUV.
She vaults onto it, and her shoes pound against the underside of the vehicle until she can leap from the edge to the second level of the Macy's building.

She doesn't try to climb up the wall like Scourge; she just crashes through the window and makes for the stairwell.

"M'ust fin' e', m'ust fl' id e.'

Rose is more than a little perplexed to find that she is not the target of a surprise mental assault.

She drifts in her mental space, absentmindedly knitting new links for the strata of her mind, and listens with disturbed fascination to the mutterings of a tanglehorde apparently arguing with itself. She has never heard the voice of a grimlight monster before, having had no affinity with them like her connection to the grimdark variants, and perhaps that allows her some measure of protection from the Horrorterror's screaming. The majority of the horde chimes through her mind like a chorus of ghastly, horrific bells, but a lone voice, without the sonorous reverberation that the rest of the host possesses, argues back like bright licks of flame. Solitary voices in a hivemind are so rare as to be nonexistent; this is a phenomenon that Rose has seen discussed only in passing in the most arcane and obscure of her old texts, and she can't help being absolutely fascinated in spite of herself.

It is just not entirely clear if the Horrorterror has yet realized that everyone can hear it. Or perhaps it is only Rose. Either way, she keeps her ear tuned to the terrified ramblings, and prods at her mental shields. There is nothing to indicate they've weakened. In fact, after that initial mental shriek from the Horrorterror, the watery channel beneath the surface of her mind seems to have drawn back, wary, from the jangling symphony that is blasting its conversations for all of paradoxic space to hear.

No, this intrusion seems to be the result of that ambient magical disruption again - the tangle is upset enough that it broadcasts not just its aura but its own mental stream of consciousness throughout the western half of the United States.

Utterly fascinating.

Thus far, all Rose can really make out about the context of this strange mental breakdown is that the grimlight Horrorterror - if this is indeed the horde from Los Angeles screaming at itself from across the country - is facing a portending splinter event over some kind of carnival related incident. Hiveminds don't often disagree, but this one seems to have come to an impasse, and the longer the lone voice persists in speaking against the majority, the more certain Rose becomes that she may yet witness a hivemind bifurcation in her lifetime.
Rose's mental eyebrows raise with such force that they could punch through concrete.

Did that voice just...suggest a willing split?

This is madness. Hivemind bifurcation has always been theorized to be an inadvertent, highly traumatic event for a many-angled one. This...this is unprecedented! Mouth gaping, Rose raises a glowing finger and begins engraving notes on what she is hearing into the nearest surface. She could publish a paper on this kind of rare event, a case study in hivemind dynamics. If only she had her meditation equipment with her or a Necronomicon to consult -

She doesn't feel the tear itself as more than a vague twist of nausea that jolts her midthought, turning her attempt at labelling a flow diagram into a spiral that gleams with the golden light of her own magic. She thumbs it away, feeling dazedly through the medium around her to try and figure out what just happened. This is just not in any way her area of expertise.

When the tanglehorde speaks again, it is with an air of condescension.

And in reply, suddenly faint and quiet compared to its earlier volume, barely distorted at all by the hivemind's symphony, the lone voice says, "whatever. dont come crawlin back to me wwith your overwrought bullshit after i totally annihilate this juggalo fuck. there wwill be fuckin science magic firewworks an youre not invvited. dicks."

And only then does Rose realize what just happened.

That is not the voice of a new fledgling, independent hivemind, set adrift to accumulate its own bevy of tanglebuddies by an irreparable split with its old host tangle. In fact, the more the voice mutters to itself, growing ever more clear as the grimlight film is burned away by hot white fire, the more Rose thinks that the impossible has happened.

Someone has just been cut out of a hivemind with their mind and personality intact. Some poor soul out there, recently assumed into the horde, has just been handed a 'get out of eternal madness and despair as part of an eldritch abomination free' card, and they are maxing it out.

"okay thats it im gonna feed you your fuckin miracles through your squeal pipette clown i havve a giant fuckin laser beam an a hella lot of serious fuckin emotions ovver this"

"basically"

"run"

The voice is distinctly male by the time it fades out. Rose's sense of the grimlight Horrorterror's words has ended as well, and equilibrium reasserts itself within her mind. The realization startles Rose so badly that she slams back into consciousness without bracing herself. She is truly in for a riotous headache, when this is all over. Her mind is a delicately balanced construction, and all of this grimlight nonsense has been nearly as distressing as the grimdark.

Hard slats of wood dig into her back. Rose wets her lips, inhaling through her nose as she works herself up toward opening her eyes and acknowledging the outside world.

And of course, because the universe does enjoy its little jokes, the first voice she hears is that of the last person in the world Rose wishes to deal with - now, or ever.
"Go away, Mother," she hisses even before she opens her eyes. Rue Lalonde is a dark void to her Sight, but the woman herself stands out against the pitch black of the sky, her white lab coat pristine under the light of the moon.

Rose can't help but stare, though. She has never seen Rue Lalonde in anything less than unrepentantly drunk and meticulously put together, disguising her careless alcoholism with flawlessly applied makeup and a quiet smirk.

The Rue who leans forward, her gloved hand stroking Rose's bangs away from her face so she can press a kiss to her daughter's forehead, looks - haunted. Even after Rose's meltdown and the subsequent catastrophe in New York, the good doctor never seemed truly devastated or repentant. She smirked and feigned sympathy and played her usual games until Rose was well enough to remove herself from that unpleasant environment entirely. If she felt any flicker of the remorse she claimed to Rose's face on Kanaya's doorstep, Rue never actually demonstrated it beyond a token word of regret between martinis.

Now, Rue Lalonde's eyes are tired and bloodshot, her lips so pale that Rose cannot process for the longest time that she's not wearing any lipstick. Her hair has been yanked back into a harsh knot at the nape of her neck.

"My darling girl," she says, smoothing Rose's hair again. This time, as Rose shoves Rue's arm away in order to sit up, she feels the tremor running through Rue's hand. What on Earth could have put the doctor into this state? "I have missed you." Her smirk lacks its usual sarcastic verve - in fact, it almost superficially resembles a smile.

"Have you," Rose mimics, aware that she is being petulant. The headache she predicted within the bounds of her mind has begun to rear its head in the physical realm, and she has no patience for this right now. She had sensed her mother's interference at some indeterminate point in the future when divining the future for Kanaya, but she is far more concerned about Terezi Pyrope at the moment. Rue is nothing but a distraction.

True to form, even with her eyes distant and gripped by some inscrutable pain, Rue replies, in a murmur, "Oh, Rosie, do not speak so tastelessly, dear, not in front of company."

Rose shakes off the hand that Rue attempts to place on her shoulder, and grimly fixes her eyes on Terezi, who is lounging against the light post a few feet away. "Yeah? What from, Zesty?" the tealblood asks, rolling her shoulders and striding away from the pole, her every step measured. "You turned all slimy like snails, but also pale and pasty like powdered sugar - way too sweet! Something was afoot!"

"Rose, we need to speak. Urgently," Rue says, rising from her knees as Rose gets to her feet. "I know you have no reason to -"

"A magical disturbance in the air surprised me." Rose holds out her arm for the troll, turning her back on her mother. "But it has passed. We need to return to Sylph and Scourge immediately." She doesn't think that she'd been preoccupied in observing the Horrorterror's split for too long, but time does tend to run differently within the mind.

Terezi sticks out her tongue. "And what about her?" she asks, her grin widening as she points her chin toward Rue Lalonde. "Does your custodian always tag along after you when you're on the job in a strange city, Roooosie?"
"Mother, Rose thinks vehemently, you will pay for this new embarrassment."

"You're busy, dear, I know," Rue says. She steps into Rose's range of vision again, and it would be too obvious for Rose to look away again. "But I need to tell you - no." The doctor shakes her head, her eyes closing in a long blink before she tries again, her pallid lips trying for a halfhearted smile. "No. First, are you feeling well? When I noticed that you had collapsed, I couldn't stay hidden any longer."

Rose's shoulders stiffen. She keeps her eyes turned from her mother, counting backwards from ten in her head before she lets herself speak. "Don't strain yourself, Mother; your attempts at caring for me have always been lackluster at best. And I have stated that I have nothing to say to you. My health, mental, physical, or otherwise, is no longer your business. That is the end of the matter. Say your piece and have done with it, so I can return to my work."

Terezi whistles. "God damn! Shots fired!" She starts snickering, though she has the presence of mind to hide it by coughing into her torn sleeve.

Rue stands utterly still, the last of the color draining from her face. Rose's Sight blanks out and she jerks, disconcerted, blinking her real eyes until the fact that it is not her physical sight being affected sinks in. Rue Lalonde's lack of a presence blots out even Terezi's aura by her side and Rose's aura along her own skin, and for a giddy moment Rose is utterly terrified. The world looks far darker with only the black of a starless void in the air.

Not for the first time, Rose wonders what the hell her mother is.

"Of course," the doctor says at last, quiet and sad. It is, perhaps, even more perturbing than the void swirling around her. Rose does not think she has ever heard her mother so...so...She stops herself before she finishes the thought. "I merely wish to invite you to a meeting with...certain of your peers and their guardians. You know the ones I refer to."

Rose keeps her expression smooth. It doesn't hurt, she chants to herself. She doesn't matter, so it doesn't hurt. It never bothered me before when she didn't care - right up until it did. "Why."

"I have several significant pieces of information to share with you all, pertinent not only to the current affair with the Midnight Crew but also with...your origins," Rue says, lifting her head. A note of determination enters her voice, and some of that old, mocking confidence straightens her posture. She clearly thinks she is gaining ground, or she has simply grown tired of maintaining whatever charade of pathetic penance she's been trying to fool Rose with. "However, it would be inadvisable to speak of such matters in public. Anyone could be listening in. I can't disclose everything here -"

"No, you never can." Rose bites off the rest of the words that threaten to boil over, drawing blood from her lower lip that she sucks away impatiently. "Goodbye, Mother."

"I will defend you, Rose," Rue says, her voice dropping abruptly to a low note. "Even if - even if you do not wish to attend such a get-together, I will share this information with you. I would just...like to tell you. In person. So that, perhaps, I could convince you that I am in earnest. I can never repair the damage I've done, but I wish to reconcile. I am...selfish that way." She laughs, spreading out her hands with her palms up in supplication, and the laugh is a bitter thing, nothing like the banal, simpering titter that has always been Rue Lalonde's trademark. "More. I wish to atone. After all, a mother must always do what is best for her children - mustn't she?"

Rose seizes Terezi's hand, and snaps her fingers, and stops thinking about Rue Lalonde. Really. She reaches in mentally and stomps the flowing tendrils of Rue-related thought until they lie limp, slices them off at the root, and stuffs them back into the half-empty storage container of her brain. The pain is too raw and fresh to deal with now and it hurts - she cannot - she just -

She follows the blaze of light in her vision that indicates where the greatest threat in the city is - at the moment, Scourge is a pyre of golden light. Justice teeters when they land, unused to teleportation, and Seer absentmindedly steadies the blind troll as she surveys where her spell has set them down.

The Macy's is dark and empty. Seer looks up, and is dazed for a moment by the shift in perspective as she stares at the spiraling blues and golds and reds of the glass mosaic that patterns the inside curves of the doomed roof with twining vines and interlocking circles. They stand in the center of a clear atrium, with the rooms full of mannequins and goods sealed off by security grilles on all sides, and the multiple floors of the massive former Marshall's Field building stretch up above them to frame the roof mosaic in neat rectangles.

Her view of the magnificent craftsmanship is disrupted without warning as a black and blue figure launches herself from the cast iron railing of the fifth floor with a whoop. The Indigo Scourge hooks an arm on one of the two yellow-and-orange glass pendant lamps hanging from the dome and swings recklessly through the air on the end of the flimsy light fixture. When she lets go, Seer's heart leaps into her throat, and Justice lets out a strangled cry that edges closer to shock than to anger. Letting out a merry laugh, Scourge sails through the air and slams with a clang into the railing of the floor beneath, opposite the side from which she jumped. She kicks a leg over the railing and vanishes onto that floor, still cackling hysterically.

The Sylph does not bother with testing her weight on the light fixture. A grunt echoes through the atrium as a green and black figure legs it over the railing and jumps the entire atrium with a single powerful leap. She even clears the railing on the other side.

Never let it be said that working nights as a rooftop leaping super hero doesn't do wonders for one's long jumping capabilities.

"I don't know about you, but that was the weirdest thing I've smelled all night," Justice comments. She sounds...queerly calm. Seer honestly would have expected the sight - well, smell - of the Scourge to undo at least some of the Seer's therapy, but Justice just lets a corner of her mouth tilt down, a half frown.

Seer does not realize that she has not let go of Justice's hand until the troll clamps down, hard enough that Seer's bones creak and shift under her skin as her thumb and pinkie are forced together.

Oops. Does hand holding count as an act of pacification? She really needs to consult John about this.

"Pine! Pine and plaid!" Justice hisses, her nose in the air as she turns from side to side, yanking Seer around by the hand. "That blasted limeblood has been here! I know that soothing stench anywhere!"

"Limeblood?" Seer repeats. "Lime, as in Profiler Graham?"

"Yes! Him!" Justice squeezes Seer's hand again. But her agitation is at least better than her blind rage. "Eurgh! It reeks of nice, warm snuggles in here! How dare he!"

Seer's mind is on a completely different track, now. "I require his autograph."

"Absolutely not, Seer! No time to waste! We're grabbing Vriska and Sylph and then we are out of here!" Justice snaps her claws, cups a hand around her mouth, and shouts, "YO, AMAZING INSUFFERABLE SPIDERBITCH! MOVE IT OR LOSE IT!"

The crashing echoing down from the floors above abruptly ceases. There is a scuffle, a loud yelp, and then the Scourge appears at the third floor balcony, her hair a wild tangle around her face. "WHAT DID YOU CALL ME, YOU HIGHFALUTIN UPTIGHT LAW-ABIDING JACKASS?"

Seer reintroduces her palm to her face. Caliginous flirting, honestly.

"YOU SMELL LIKE A SPIDER DROWNING IN A BLUEBERRY SMOOTHIE - AND I HATE BLUEBERRIES, SO MOVE YOUR ASS!"

The Indigo Scourge shrieks with scandalized outrage. "WELL, YOU WEREN'T COMPLAINING LAST NI-"

The Malachite Sylph charges up to the railing and roundhouse kicks her in the head. Scourge jolts forward, bug-eyed with surprise - and then both eyes roll back in their sockets. "I appreciate the assistance, Justice," Sylph calls down in a more reasonable volume, seizing Scourge by the collar before the ceruleanblood can topple over the railing. "She is quite swift. But I only needed to lay claws on her one more time. Thank you."

Justice scratches the back of her head. "Well, I was just trying to piss her off until she came down where I could reach her - but heck, works for me." She grimaces. "We're probably better off if I'm not the one fighting her, anyway…that kind of thing tends to escalate."

"I can imagine." Sylph slings the unconscious ceruleanblood over her shoulder, and peers over the railing herself, clearly judging the distance from her floor to the atrium. "We will be fixing that."

Justice groans. Seer finally remembers to extract her hand from the troll's iron grip as the Sylph drops through the air and falls to the ground before them in a crouch. "Will Graham is here," Seer informs her partner, very aware that she is vibrating with the kind of nervous tension generated when one is within a few city blocks of a particularly adored childhood idol. "It will only take a moment -"

Sylph adjusts the body on her shoulder, digs into a pocket, and passes Seer a much crumpled slip of paper. "Already done."

Rose unfolds the note with shaking hands, reads the paragraph of scribbled iridescent lime green text on the paper, finds the classic, scratchy loops of a signature -

And beams.

Dawn burns in the east. Closer to Rose, within the confines of their crowded hotel rooms, the wards and disorientation spells she has cast on the wall burn almost as brightly, a tightly woven net that will prevent anyone from coming near their hideout until they are ready to evacuate Vriska and Terezi to Sollux's side of the border.

Terezi had scoffed and cracked sick jokes while changing into the clothes Kanaya had brought along for the new arrivals; the tealblood worked twice as hard to fill the silence left by Vriska's slumber, skittish and jittery but trying to conceal it, but now she has quieted. They all have. Rose's suspicions that neither Justice nor Scourge slept much these past few days, too busy running riot through the city streets (and if they ended up near a bed or a 'coon at all, opting to spend their time presumably tearing into each other as kismeses are wont to do), are confirmed when Terezi splays out on the couch in the tiny living room and within seconds passes out, her raucous snores filling the room without sopor slime to muffle them.

Kanaya keeps a vigil over Vriska in the respite block proper, the sliding door between the two rooms half shut. From where she sits in the armchair by the coffee table, keeping a similar eye on Terezi, Rose can see Kanaya sitting in her chair by the side of the recooperacoon, sewing with her head bowed as she works to adjust the fit of the pants brought over for the ceruleanblood. However, Kanaya’s claws have ceased their deft motions, and her head had tilted back ever so slightly to rest crookedly against the back of the seat, and Rose takes a moment to tiptoe into the bedroom, drape a blanket over her sleeping lover, and remove the clutched needle and fabric from her claws to set them on the table. They all need sleep, really, after a night as long as this one has been.

But someone must keep watch, must ensure that Vriska does not awaken and pitch a fit, and possibly reignite Terezi's fury with inflammatory remarks. Until Sollux contacts them, they have to remain in this blasted hotel room and wait on his go-ahead. And so Rose makes herself comfortable in her seat, perching with her legs bent and her feet tucked onto seat beside her as she draws her phone out from her bag. If she cannot sleep, regardless of how heavy and dry her eyes feel and how comfortable her change of clothes feels after hours spent in a soggy, poorly dried costume, she may at least check in with John.

Rose hesitates, then reaches down and removes a plain white cue ball from the duffle bag as well. She has yet to mention the thing to Kanaya - hasn't really had the time. But she may be able to explore its secrets more thoroughly in these quiet hours they have before they need to move.

She does not know where her mother ended up. She chides herself for thinking of Rue Lalonde at all. I could care less about that woman's whereabouts, as long as she stays away from me.

The protestation sounds weak, even in the privacy of her own mind.

To her surprise, when she switches on the phone there are already at least ten messages outstanding. It is early still, and even earlier in Seattle, and Rose can't think of why John would be texting her during the hours when he is generally sleeping unless there is yet another crisis. They have moved past the point where they need to reassure each other by staying in almost non-stop contact, and Rose thinks that a tentative trust has been restored between them. The longer she goes without another grimdark relapse and manages to keep up her end of the line of communication between the two of them, the more she thinks she and John have regained their old friendship. The desperate, clingy tang of a relationship born of mutual panic and horror would never have sat well between them.

But what on earth could have gone wrong now? True, Jade is apparently prophesying some ludicrous apocalypse, but she still seemed like a perfectly nice girl and John hasn’t complained about any doomsday ramblings yet. Could something else have upset John already?

Rose bends over her phone, and begins to type. Cradled in the hollow space between the arches of her socked feet, the cue ball sits.

And it waits.

Dave ends up in charge of obtaining tacos.

This is both awesome and an ordeal. It gets him out of the apartment for the first time in ages, which is a massive plus. Like, sign him up for the food gathering party; he is so down with foraging for sustenance right now. Between BQ's simpering and hedging and Bro's impenetrable silence, the two of them are going to bluff Dave out of house and home. The atmosphere in the living room is downright toxic.

But obtaining tacos means communicating with the cashier behind the counter. Said esteemed and much beloved taco salesman does not know sign language and no way is Dave doing something as uncool as handing the guy a laundry list of tacos on a piece of paper. That shit ain't right.

So he ends up handing the list to Oriole instead. 'Make me proud, man,' he scribbles at the bottom. Oriole rolls his eyes at him. "This is incredibly stupid," he says, but he clutches the list, rereads it three times, and then stuffs his claws in his pockets while they slouch up to the counter together. Strider solidarity demands Dave accompany the newest clan member on such a momentous occasion. It's out of an ironic sense of moral support, okay? When the cashier's eyebrows shoot for the sky and he opens a mouth to comment on the fact that an orange dude has approached the till, Dave raises an eyebrow right back.

His eyebrow game is stronger. "How may I...help you?" the cashier says weakly, lowering his eyebrows right the fuck down back into their rightful place.

Oriole glances down at the list before crumpling it up in a fist again. "If you made these names up, I swear to god," he mutters to Dave. Then he flashes an intense, absolutely terrifying grin at the cashier and says, "We need three Dirty Sanchez's, two Trailer Parks, one Fried Avocado, two Crossroads, an Independent, and one of whatever the fuck a Mr. Orange is." He shoots another look at Dave as he says the last one. Dave coughs into his sleeve, pretending to give serious scholarly contemplation to the baby devil mascot photoshopped into a piece of modern art that hangs on the wall over the soda machine. "Yeah. All of that. To go."

"Will do," the cashier says, but Dave is spacing out again. He has a healthy appreciation for this particular taco place. It strikes just the right chord of irony in his soul, from the mildly bizarre taco names to the abominably industrial decor. He always dresses like a hipster vagrant when he comes here just to mock the college crowd that surfaces in ravenous packs around meal times. Right now he's rocking skinny corduroys, a black peacoat trimmed with white, and a white scarf that it is way too warm outside for but fuck it, it brings the whole outfit together and Dave has never been unwilling to suffer for purely ironic fashion in the unseasonable Houston heat. Oriole looks like a grey and orange hobo in comparison, because the only coat in the house large enough to properly cover those fucking wings was a shapeless wreck Dave doesn't remember making the mistake of buying.

Fuck. Look. The point is, Dave ends up wandering over to the window, poking at his stab wound through the bandages, and surveying the students with their textbooks from a corner table. Oriole shuffles after him a moment later, hooking the tag with their order number on the stand in the center of the table before collapsing into a seat. "These tacos had better be worth it." He scratches at his cheek and his sleeve rides up a little so that a bright lemon yellow feather at his wrist puffs up. "Like. I think I'm getting paranoid. Look at me, I'm gonna start to fucking molting or some shit all over this fucking taco stand. Feels like I'm being watched."

Dave flips out his phone with a roll of his eyes and starts typing. The cheap flip phone Oriole picked up on the way here doesn't have Pesterchum or internet access or anything, so the best Dave can do is blow up his phone with old school text messages. The service is so slow that half the time Dave just turns his phone around so Oriole can read right off the screen.

DS: hate to break it to you man but everyone for miles is eyeballing you

DS: do you know why

DS: because youre with me and between the two of us weve pretty much maxed out this city's charisma gambit

DS: our animal magnetism is off the chain mostly because youre literally part bird but

DS: you know

DS: in a nonliteral way

DS: shouldnt you be used to this by now

"Okay. Yeah, totally. We are fucking awesome and all that. But being kidnapped and held hostage for days does things to a man," Oriole hisses, taking a napkin from the dispenser and shredding it into ragged strips. He starts laying them down in cross crossing layers, the kind of incessant, obsessive busywork that Dave recognizes because he does the same thing with turntable mixing. "Is it even smart for either of us to be outside the apartment with a bunch of asshat thugs waiting to jump our bones?"

Dave shrugs.
DS: i can handle them obvi
DS: and dont worry well put you through a training montage soon enough
DS: enroll you in the strider school of shitty swordsman ship
DS: it will be hella sweet
DS: sweeter than a goddamn baby rabbit in a tiny widdle sweater eating little cookies and shitting sugary pastel rainbow turds all over the place
DS: so fucking sweet

He then flicks a sugar packet at Oriole's forehead. It smacks him right between his eyes. Hell yes. He's still got it with the pseudo-throwing starkind. God, he hasn't practiced with that specibus in forever.

"Your metaphors are fucked up, man," the irritable asshole says sourly, picking up the sugar packet. He contemplates it, eyeballs Dave as though considering retaliation, and then adds it to the shredded napkin braid. He takes the entire sugar container and starts stacking the packets in two towers on top of the napkin, all with a straight face that does Dave proud. "Also yeah, I'm sure you walking around Midtown armed is doing wonders for our incogmoxie. Such subtle. Very discreet."

Dave shrugs again. So what if he's got two shitty-ass swords strapped across his back? No one has ever bothered him about it before. Except, you know, the police, but he's pretty sure that they don't count because he still believes that upon graduation from the academy all members of the Houston police department are issued a regulation standard cast iron pole and told to shove it up their ass.

Besides, the local college has its own police department that patrols the immediate area, and they give negative ten fucks about dealing with anything other than noise complaints and traffic citations. He's totally in the clear.

Something flickers in the air over Oriole's head. Dave is halfway to zoning out again, so it takes him a full five seconds to do a double take. A white cue ball bobs in the air, spinning on its axis like a tiny planet. When it stops, the back of Dave's neck crawls like someone is staring him down and refuses to look away.

DS: dude
DS: dont move theres a creepyass spying ball right on top of you

Oriole leans in to read that, and the cue ball follows him, whirling around before locking on the two of them again.

Oh, fuck. Dave seizes the salt shaker off the table and whips it overhand at the cue ball. In hindsight, not his brightest moment, because the quick movement rips his side around so abruptly he almost passes out from the pain, but tossing swords at the thing hasn't worked in the past. The glass shaker pings off the smooth surface of the cue ball with an audible, porcelain crack, and ricochets off toward the ceiling. Oriole flinches and covers his head at the sound, shooting a glance up.

DS: guy

Everyone else in the restaurant looks up too, but Dave shrugs that off. Seriously, fuck those guys, he's more concerned with the unkillable spy ghost ball. Instead of dicking around with the pepper shaker and repeating the cycle of stupidity, he freezes time and flashsteps onto the table, snatching the cue ball out of the air. His stitches shriek out a warning, Time starts again while he's still on the table, so he looks like a table-scaling douchewad, but whatever. He's done weirder in his life.
Down and to the right, Oriole facepalms. "God, I can't fucking take you anywhere, can I?"

'I got it, didn't I?' Dave signs back, before pressing a hand to his side and falling back into his chair with a pained huff. The pain abates after a good twenty seconds, and he can focus enough to inspect his sweet loot.

For a fucked up ghost thing that he's supposed to be trying to blow up, the cue ball is surprisingly heavy in his palm, but just as cold as he expected, like a chunk of ice. It's only natural that such a creepy fucking thing would be cold enough to make his skin crawl. He's tempting to set it in the middle of the table and eyeball it from a safer distance, but it could vanish at any moment, so he brings it closer to his shades, squinting, and sees...

...Nothing. It's just a stupid cue ball, after all. He turns it over, one eye twitching, but can't find any scratch marks or indents that would indicate this thing has a camera or anything like that concealed inside its impenetrable ivory curves.

So why does it still feel like he's being watched?

"Shit. Shit." Oriole's fingers dig into his arm, forcing the cue ball down, and Dave looks up, irritated until he sees the horror on the orange version of his face. Oriole has turned a sickly, pale carrot orange, and Dave tracks his gaze through the window to the street beyond.

It takes him a second. Then he picks out the first black suit crossing the intersection outside the restaurant, and all thoughts of smashing the cue ball with a hammer, John style, go flying out of his head. "Shiiiit," he says on reflex, but it comes out a wheezy "Shhhhhhh," as he yanks Oriole by the collar and drags them both under the table.

"I told you we shouldn't have been wandering around like this. Shit!" Oriole lets go of Dave's arm to seize the hood of his borrowed jacket and fling it forward over his face. They're both grown ass teenagers, so they don't exactly fit under the table all the way, and Dave ends up with a faceful of feather asshole elbow and his legs sticking half out into the aisle. "Fuck, how are we going to get out of here?"

The violent way, of course, Dave thinks, shrugging.

Just then, the woman at the table next to them leans forward and taps Oriole on the shoulder. Or the wing. It's hard to tell from this angle, but Oriole flinches away, looking alarmed, so his bet is on accidental wing groping. "Are y'all both alright?"

"Peachy keen," Oriole deadpans, before whipping his head back around toward Dave, eyes blazing. "I don't want to be kidnapped again, jackass."

Dave rolls his eyes so hard they nearly achieve escape velocity, and plants his foot on Oriole's shoulder to propel himself to the other side of the table. He squints out at the street from their new hiding place to try to see where the Crew goons ended up, but he can't see shit through the forest of table legs and chairs on the outside patio.

"Kidnapped again," the woman repeats, sounding vaguely scandalized in that way only someone from probably El Paso can truly manage. "Good lord, what on earth -"

Dave reaches up, feels around for the basket of food on the woman's table, and offers her one of her own chips, signing, 'Hush now lady. No words, only chips and salsa.'

She takes the chip bemusedly, lack of comprehension all over her face, but she also stops talking so mission fucking accomplished.
A bell chimes as the door to the restaurant swings open, and Dave spies at least three pairs of suit pants getting into the line to order at the counter. He can't see any faces from here, though. "They're coming in," Oriole says, yanking Dave's hand back down. He looks downright panicky by now, eyes wide and his face dead white. The effect is only heightened by the way his hair feathers have started to bristle and poof up around the edges of his hood in an orange halo. "What do we do?"

Dave starts reaches up, retrieves his phone from their table, and starts texting again.

DS: relax well just go back in time and sneak out before they even arrive

DS: classic loop just add time travel powers

Oriole sags with relief. "Awesome. Sweet. I am all for that plan. Let's go."

Dave grimaces. There's just one problem.

DS: the tacos aren't here yet

Oriole's incandescent glare could put a nuclear reactor to shame. "I am not getting kidnapped for the sake of your tacos."

DS: dude

DS: have you ever had these tacos

DS: one does not leave a taco behind

Oriole facepalms. "Unbelievable. Unbelievable. I will beat you over the head with your own damn sword, you cocky cock -"

"Um, order number 41? Is that you down there?"

Both of them look up at the same time. A pretty girl with blond curls in a long ponytail tucks a strand of hair behind her ear, balancing a massive brown paper bag full of tacos on her hip. Dave is suddenly very conscious of the fact that he is hugging his knees and has an orange bird kid muttering about cocks and practically kneeing him in the groin.

Without context this all looks...hella awk.

He flips her a thumbs up.

Hey, it always works for Bro, right?

"...I'll just leave your order here," the waitress says, with the tact of a woman who deals with college students on a daily basis, and then she backs away, leaving their taco bounty next to the stand, pocketing the ticket with their order number on it. The smell of tortillas, poblano sauce, and fried things hits Dave's stomach so hard he almost forgets that they're still mid-crisis. Shit son, tacos are a divinely inspired gift to mortals. Like, damn. He starts to drool a little, but that is so not cool, and he catches himself before the entire restaurant is introduced to his saliva, clamping his jaw shut.

"There they are!"

Both boys jolt, and whirl around. A troll in a shabby black suit has leaned around the partition between the cashier and the rest of the restaurant, one claw pointing toward the two asshats sitting on the floor. Dave chokes out broken fragments of swear words. He and Oriole have the same idea, reaching out at the same time to mutually haul each other up onto their feet. Dave locks his hand on Oriole's shoulder, and is just reaching out for the tacos when -

"Ooof!"

A woman in a black suit with her skirt slit up the side vaults over the partition and tackles Oriole like a goddamn football player. Dave flails and stumbles backward against the wall, stunned, while the woman eating beside them screams and covers her face. The Crew member and Oriole, meanwhile, topple over backwards onto their table.

Right on top of the tacos.

Dave claps both hands to his face, his mouth a silent 'o' of horror. Oriole sums it up better when he notices what the woman has done, squirming under her grip. The taco bag gives a dying squish, the paper crackling. "Not cool!"

Dave pulls himself together and pauses time. He has to do it twice, because he wastes the first second staring in renewed dismay at the smashed remains of their tacos, and only on the second try does he grab the Crew member with both hands and shove her off Oriole. He takes in the scene around them next, trying to assess just how the hell they're going to rescue this situation.

Because by God, they are not leaving this restaurant without replacement tacos.

"Found you!" the woman says, catching herself before she hits the ground by grabbing the back of a man's chair. Everyone is staring at them by now. The other two Crew members, the greenblooded troll and a man with his sleeves rolled up to his elbows, edge around to cover the exits, but make no move to come closer. The Crew woman fixes crazy eyes on Dave and laughs. "You're coming with us, kid!"

'How about no,' Dave thinks, drawing a sword and leveling it at her. Oriole has to roll off the table and onto his feet to get out of the way, and while the back of his jacket has been spared the worst of the taco carnage, the sight of the mashed remains of their feast just riles Dave's righteous fury all the more.

"And the bird one, too," the woman cackles. "Crowbar is gonna be so happy to see you again, Tweety!"

"Tweety," Oriole repeats, his voice totally flat. "Dave, give me a sword."

'Yeah no. You haven't had your training montage yet. Do you even have bladekind training?'

"You just signed 'no' at me, didn't you."

'Yep."

"Goddammit."

"If you just come quietly," the woman says, still grinning with an edge of madness, "we even won't have to break your mutant friend's other wing!"

Dave gives up trying to strategize. They don't have time to text some kind of plan, anyway. He resorts to shitty ass charades instead, digging his elbow into Oriole's side and jabbing a finger at the greenblood, then gesturing to himself and pointing at Crazy and Sleeves with two fingers. You take that asshole, I'll take these two.

Oriole holds out a hand and makes grabby motions like he still thinks he can get a sword.
Dave just raises an eyebrow at him.

"Dick."

With that pithy one-liner, Oriole rips off his coat with a flourish and tosses the billowing, oversized article of clothing over Crazy's head. Then, his good wing flaring out to its full extent, he darts sideways toward the front entrance where the greenblood is crouched, letting loose a battle screech that sounds more bird than human. Everyone else in the restaurant just scramble to get out of the way; more than a few whip out their phones and start taking video instead of clearing the goddamn battle zone.

Dave puts his back to the wall so that he still has a view on where Oriole is, and squares off against Crazy and Sleeves. Crazy has to fight off the huge coat, screaming expletives at him, but Sleeves narrows his eyes and - draws a sword.

Well, this shit just got interesting. Dave pauses time and kicks Crazy in the chest so she lands on a group of squealing college kids in a booth, and then swivels to parry Sleeves's first strike.

"Can you remake that order?!" Oriole bawls at the man behind the counter. He seizes a container of lemon wedges from the drink station and makes a good faith effort at bashing the green-eyed troll's face with it.

"Yes! Just stop damaging our property!" the cashier yells back. Then he yelps and is forced to duck as a rogue chair ricochets off the wall and flies at his face. "Give us five more minutes!" The waitress who brought them the ill-fated taco bag ducks back into the kitchen, yelling something unintelligible but authoritative that sets the entire kitchen into motion before the door swings shut again.

"Oh, for fuck's sake!" Oriole rips the lid off the container, and dumps it out over the troll's head. The lemons bounce off his blunt horns, but the accumulated lemon juice of a day's worth of restocking must reach the troll's eyes because he lets out a chittering shriek of pain and claws at them, staggering away from Oriole. "These had better be damn good tacos, Dave!"

'They are fucking glorious,' he thinks about signing, but no one would be able to read it anyway in the heat of battle. Instead, he flashsteps around Sleeves, smirking at the man's amateurish technique. Bladekinds are rare for a reason, and this guy is heavy handed and slow.

But then Dave stumbles to a halt and curses at the flare of pain in his side, and his attempt to disarm Sleeves flies wild, opening up a cut along the man's wrist. Why did he convince himself that getting stabbed was a good idea again? When was letting Bro fucking impale him ever a good plan? He powers through the pain as his stitches tug and ooze blood, and pauses time to center himself before nailing Sleeves's wrist again. This time, the man's flimsy grip on the specibus gives, and the sword clatters away across the floor, landing by the feet of some bystanders.

He flinches from the pain when he shouldn't, though, and gets blindsided by Crazy's next hurtling tackle. She slams him up against the wall, and it's around then that Dave catches on. She's not going to draw a weapon because she's using some kind of tacklekind, the kind of training you only see in hulking football players and fucking sumo wrestlers - and it fucking hurts.

And of course, with the worst possible timing, Dave feels his phone vibrate in his pocket. He would normally ignore that, because all incoming Pesterchum messages and texts have the same alert, but then the My Little Pony's theme song starts blaring from his pocket like hell itself has channeled itself through his phone.

Bro. Gritting his teeth, Dave slashes at Crazy's stomach and stomps on her toes, sliding out from her hold in a flashstep while she's still paused mid-snarl and Sleeves has dived for his sword.

The ungodly song continues for a good three seconds after Dave hastens to unlock his phone, causing him to seriously fear that his phone has broken in the worst way possible and that he'll be subjected to this horror for the rest of his conceivable existence. Then he realizes the sound is coming from Oriole's pocket, and it cuts out when bird-him finishes beating the shit out of the greenblood with a napkin dispenser and flips out his phone, looking harassed as he reads the screen.

TT: okay you little shits
TT: you should have been back two minutes ago
TT: Dave you have taco retrieval down to a science
TT: who did you piss off now
TG: no one omg stop jumping to conclusions
TG: dude we have like three dudes in suits all up on our dicks
TG: shut up no we dont play it cool

The greenblood throws the napkin dispenser back at Oriole. When the bird kid ducks, wing flaring again, the troll jabs at him with a canekind in the middle of his chest. The impact startles him, and Dave goes to call out a warning except oh fucking wait, and by the time he gestures out a warning, Oriole is too distracted to notice the troll setting him up for a fall. Oriole grabs a metal pronged order ticket stand from the table and brings it around like a baseball bat, but the troll sweeps his feet out from under him.

Maybe the wings normally compensate for his balance, but it doesn’t work with one wing out of commission. With an irate bird shriek, Oriole trips backwards and catches himself on his elbows and wing, his head slamming back against the drink machine. The troll jumps him, silent, and shoves his cane up under Oriole's chin, forcing the kid's head back until it hits a soda dispenser and Diet Coke starts gushing out everywhere.

Dave is distracted shortly after when Crazy whirls and tries to charge him again. It helps that she yells when she tackles, so he hears her coming this time. He sidesteps her and sticks out his foot, smirking crookedly when she trips over it and collides headlong with the partition between the cashier and the tables.

TT: oh for fuck's sake
TG: nothing is wrong go back to your weird alien courtship thing
TT: i do not have time for your dicking around Dave

When the troll eases off the pressure on the canekind, Oriole writhes and bats him off with a stroke of his wing. He sits up, sputtering, his hair sticky with soda and his expression absolutely livid. "Caw caw, motherfucker!" he growls, seizing the troll by the shoulders and headbutting him right in the nose.

Headbutting a troll is basically the opposite of a thing that any normal human should do, for obvious reasons. Like a smart car hitting a semi truck or a wall meeting a wrecking ball, it's just always going to end badly. But maybe Oriole has some kind of super bird skull, or he manages to avoid all the reinforced bone spurs trolls have in their forehead to help support their horns, because it works. The troll sinks to his knees, and this time, when Oriole bashes him repeatedly with a container full of pale green avocado sauce, he stays down.

Dave deals with Sleeves, who has finally retrieved his sword. He plants a foot in the small of Crazy's back where she's sprawled out on the floor, and she yells as he uses her as a spring board to jump on a table. He launches himself forward at Sleeves and opens up four shallow cuts on the man before time starts again. Dave lands in a crouch on the floor, sword still at the ready. There is a pause as Sleeves checks himself, clearly confused by the fact that he's not in a world of pain, but Dave just waits for it.

When the man turns and steps back into a guard, his pants fall down around his ankles - the belt holding them up at his waist was neatly snipped into pieces by Dave's strike. "Fuck," Sleeves bites out, going crosseyed as he shuffles back out of Dave's range to try and yank up his pants.

"Your order is ready!" the cashier screams.

TG: hang on how are you even messaging me on this got this phone doesn't even have Pesterchum installed what the hell
TT: i have my ways
TT: now seriously do i need to come down there and rescue your skinny asses TG: no i've got this

Crazy leaps off a table and lands on Dave's shoulders, beating at his head with her fists. 'Retrieve the goods,' Dave signs at Oriole in the most basic way possible - by pointing frantically at the new bag of tacos on the counter and shaking his head 'no' when the bird kid makes an aborted attempt to step forward and help. Then he raises his sword and starts waving over his head, trying to batter the woman's hands away from his face. She gets in a lucky hit and manages to knock his shades halfway off his nose, and Dave freaks, ramming backwards against the wall in his agitation.

But, of course, instead of obeying simple charade commands, Oriole walks to the counter where the cashier is cowering, takes out his phone, and starts texting away. Then, with the deliberate intent of someone who's not even trying to be discreet, he raises the phone and starts taking pictures of the fight.

He's going to murder that guy.

TG: i don't think he's got this
TT: do i need to be concerned
TT: holy mother of god and all her wiseass inbred nephews
TT: this is an embarrassment

Sleeves gives up on his pants and kicks them off, ruined belt and all, which means Dave's one on one with Crazy is almost up. And Oriole is still documenting this shit show.

So Dave gets his shit together. Or at least, future-him does. The hilt of a familiar bladekind comes down on the back of Sleeves's head, just when the man straightens up. A second Dave stands over the unconscious man and gives Dave a nod, tossing his broken sword from one hand to the other.

Dave drops his sword on the ground, reaches up with both hands, and bends forward, flinging the Crew woman off his back. She lands on her feet and scrabbles at his jacket to try to shove him around again. There is a distinct, metallic crunch as one of her feet hits the bladekind right at the shitty weak point and snaps it in two.

So Dave punches her in the eye.

He's got no official fistkind, so it's an absolutely shitty punch. But Bro's training regimen had some basic hand to hand training, so Dave hits hard enough that she stumbles back. He retrieves his sword, kicking the broken blade away from any prying hands, and takes a page out of future-Dave's book.
by punting Crazy between the eyes with the hilt.

She shoves him, and his side jars against a table which shitfuckfirkifkrricker fuck! Dave doubles over, and while he fights back the bursts of white hot pain ringing behind his eyes, future-him finally picks up the slack and whacks Crazy in the chin, whipping her head around to the side. This time she goes down and stays there.

TG: there see i have got this
TG: hey feathery asshole put the phone down and grab our tacos
TT: five more minutes or i bring the queen with me
TG: oh god please no
TG: shed never let me live it down

During all that chaos, it has taken Dave this long to realize he's lost track of the cue ball. He'd dropped it - somewhere. Probably around when they took refuge under the table to try to hide from the Crew. So it's with a certain wary surprise when Dave turns his head to the side and sees the cue ball lying on the ground beneath the table to his right. He's already bent over with the raw agony in his side, so he just kind of slumps the rest of the way onto his knees and grabs the cue ball. The cold chill sinks into his hand immediately, as though it never left.

So creepy.

'One minute back,' future him is signing when he looks up. Dave snorts, because obviously, and then shoves the cue ball into the pocket of his coat for safe keeping. Focusing around the pain from his stab wound - probably bruised, but possibly reopened - he twists time backwards.

Things always run more smoothly with the benefit of applied hindsight. Keeping his movements to a minimum, Dave runs through all the actions he just witnessed himself perform, and then hobbles over to the cashier's counter where Oriole is waiting. "I will never get used to the whole time thing," he says, shaking his head. Like the orange part-bird asshole has any room to talk. Glancing around one last time at the three unconscious Crew members laid out on the floor, Dave sighs and grips Oriole's shoulder. He raises a pointed eyebrow until the guy remembers to grab their tacos, and then Dave swallows around the throbbing ache in his throat to travel back in time again.

This time, he spins his mental clock back a good twenty minutes. Five minutes before past-Dave and past-Oriole are due to walk in, current Dave and Oriole walk out right past the cashier, who is too busy with the customer before them to even look up at the two people who just finished/will soon be annihilating his sales for the day. They put a block between them and the taco restaurant before really looking at each other. Dave's shades are still off-kilter, the buttons of his peacoat torn open by Crazy's last tackle, and his side feels like one open wound, while Oriole's wing and hair and hair-feathers are matted with sticky, tepid brown soda, his broken wing awkward and ruffled where it lies taped against his back.

"Dude," Oriole says, smirking.

Dave shoves his shades up before rolling his eyes. He has appearances to keep up, alright?

DS: lets just get back before everything goes to hell again

DS: bring the tacos padawan you shall have first pick for your deeds this day

"Oh hell yes."

And just to avert a potential crisis, Dave messages Bro. Because the last thing anyone wants is a ninja puppeteer and a carapacian dame bursting into a taco restaurant five minutes late for the party.

TG: there mission accomplished
TG: everyone go the fuck home
TT: what the hell happened
TG: wait fuck
TG: ignore that TT: hang on TT: youve been dicking around with time havent you
TT: why would tacos require time travel
TT: so help me Dave, i will set off the pony alarm
TG: no oh jesus
TG: i fucked up i fucked up

Dave has a sneaking suspicion that he may have just inspired Bro's not-so-random texts about two minutes in the future.

God dammit.

"You guys have the most bizarre relationship," Oriole says, shaking his head. He runs his claws through his hair and frowns at the scummy soda that comes off on his hands. "Jesus fuck, I need a shower." They start walking again. There are sirens in the distance, but they're so close to the medical center that for all Dave knows it's just an ambulance and not the cops swooping in to fuck shit up.

DS: yeah well

DS: that’s unspoken ironic rooftop rapping ninja camaraderie for you i guess

DS: a lot of unprovoked puppet ass volleys and near death experiences in the name of training

DS: we used to have the most epic rap battles in paradox space but then uh

DS: look just be careful trying to go to the bathroom at night man the shit he pulls is fucked up

"...Fuck man, do I even want to know?"

DS: his custodial instincts have two settings which boil down to momma bear defending her young and oh lets toss babies off the roofs of thirteen story building the one that survives is worthy of my tutelage how could this possibly go wrong

DS: but seriously

DS: blenders are meant to stay in the kitchen lets just leave it at that "I knew I didn't want to know," Oriole says gloomily. With that, his wing arcs out and huddles around Dave's shoulder, yanking him into a weird wing hug that stops them both in their tracks while Dave silently flails and tries to figure out what the hell is going on. He gets a mouthful of tangerine feather for his trouble, and Oriole slaps him heartily on the back with a free claw. "Poor traumatized other me. There, there. I am here. Like an angelic feathery guardian spirit animal. No blenders can hurt you now."

...His expression is too flat.
They reach the apartment without further incident. If this had been a taco run with Bro at the helm, they would have walked back in silence. Extreme parkour might have been involved. But Dave has a stab wound with ripped stitches and Oriole is flashing everyone with his giant wings, so they just take the Metro and call it a day.

'We went through hell for these tacos,' Dave signs the moment they're through the front door, huddling his shoulders as he follows Oriole into the kitchen. 'Hell.'

'I know. I have new pics for the photo album,' Bro fires back, holding up his cell phone between gloved fingers.

Oriole is a filthy fucking traitor but he's also the traitor who still has possession of the taco bag, so Dave refrains from taking vengeance. For now. After Oriole takes his tacos, Dave hoards two for himself and scurries away from the bag. He doubts he'll be able to see Bro when Bro takes his own tacos, but he knows to keep away from the danger zone when there is food to be claimed. Lil Cal is already lounging on the kitchen counter by the sink, its glazed blue eyes leering at the taco bag with the hunger of the damned.

"Taco?" Bro asks the carapacian on their couch. There is a stack of at least five empty tea cups on the table, and Dave decides not to question why they wouldn't reuse them because if there's one thing he's learned from BQ, it's to know when to pick his battles.

BQ: Oh, no. I'm quite alright.

BQ: Since we seem to be in a sharing mood, it would behoove you to know that carapacians are quite capable of subsisting on a purely liquid diet.

BQ: Food is superfluous.

Dave can't help it; he snorts. 'Wow. Of all the secrets I've ever wanted you to tell me. That's it. That's the one that makes it all worthwhile.' Dave pretends to wipe away a tear. 'It's okay. You don't have to say anymore. This revelation will sustain me for the rest of my life.'

BQ: Do not tempt me, Knight.

BQ: Helping you outright goes against everything in my nature. What little I have shared, I have done so only because this game has already been mutilated beyond recognition.

BQ: You should be honored by my consideration.

Yeah, yeah, Dave thinks, making a beeline for his room. After an aborted attempt to make the BQ share some of her information in front of Dave resulted in her clamming right the fuck up, as though silenced by an instinct she couldn't control, Bro had banished Dave from the couch of interrogation. Maybe Bro is having more luck tackling her alone, but Dave is so over those two and their secretive shenanigans.

Oriole beats him back to his own room and takes over the bed. He is eating his first bite when Dave enters, and freezes, looking up at Dave with gleaming eyes.
"These tacos," Oriole says simply, "are the ambrosia of the gods."

DS: hell yeah they are

"I'm gonna fucking cry."

DS: shit bro no

DS: be strong keep it together

Oriole lets out a croaking whistle that sounds distinctly like a crow, and tears into the taco. He hasn't even bothered to shower yet, he's so absorbed in the food.

Well, as long as he doesn't rub his soda hair on Dave's turntables, who cares. Rolling his shoulders, Dave sets his tacos on the desk and shrugs out of his coat. He doesn't remove the cue ball from the pocket, very aware that Bro's cameras are everywhere, and instead wads up the coat around the heavy weight of the mysterious object and chucks it under his bed to deal with later.

Yeah, yeah, two steps forward, one step back on the whole communication thing. But Dave can't seem to help it.

He then presses at his stab wound with careful fingers. There are splotches of drying blood all over the inside of his undershirt, but at least it's black so he'll be able to get most of it out without staining. The stitches themselves have stopped bleeding when he yanks off his shirt and the bandages to inspect them, but the stitched up wound is aggravated and reddened, puffy around the edges and bruised in a solid bar where he hit the table earlier.

The best he can do is apply more antiseptic with his lip clamped between his teeth and bandage it up again. Once that's done, he throws on a hoodie and slouches over to the computer desk to claim the spoils of taco war. The first bite of scrambled egg, fried chili, and guacamole nearly makes him tear up, so he mentally apologizes to Oriole for being a dick. These tacos are glorious and there is a damn good reason he refused to leave without them. Shoveling more taco into his mouth with one hand, struggling to keep all the toppings wrapped up in the flimsy tortilla, Dave uses the other hand to start his computer and start browsing.

But there's an open window on his computer that wasn't there when he and Oriole took off on their mission. Dave frowns and wonders if he zoned out at some point and missed it - that happens, sometimes - but then he reads the first few lines of fuchsia text, and his blood runs cold.

David,

I apologize for not contacting you sooner. I am afraid that I had to deal with some unexpected guests, and the time quite got away from me. I am sure you have never suffered from similar trouble, of course.

When you children came to us, as custodians we all mutually agreed to care for you all separately, and that is the only excuse I can give for not attempting to engage with you as a child. Nonetheless, ectobiologically speaking, you are my son, and I would not be adverse to establishing a line of communication between us so that we can get to know each other better.

As it happens, I have recently made a significant breakthrough. I know that you and my darling Rose have been seeking answers to several outstanding questions that neither I nor Ambrose could necessarily respond to. Whether you believe me or not, we two are simply not privy to all the secrets surrounding your birth and your powers. However, thanks to the efforts of a Querent, I now have the technology needed to discover exactly what Joanna Egbert tried and failed to share with us before her untimely demise, and the ability to tell you all that you might wish to know.

I can tell you about the Game.

It would be best if I could share this with all four of you at once, naturally. I have contacted Samuel Egbert, but Ambrose is still quite cross with me over my recent failures and has not responded to my queries. If you are amenable, however, we could meet four days from now, at a location to be disclosed at a later point. Only say the word, and I would move heaven and earth for you and Rose.

Affectionately yours,

Doctor Rue Lalonde, Ph.D

...Oh, shit.

- He's still got Mom Lalonde's email open hours later. He's slumped down in his chair and hasn’t moved an inch, using his mouse to absently draw a shitty doodle of Hella Jeff in another window and refusing to let on that his gaze keeps darting back to reread the obnoxious fuchsia prose.

Oriole is passed the fuck out again on the bed, his wing feathers and hair ruffled by the faint, warm breeze that drifts in through the hole in the wall. Time has slowed to a protracted, sluggish crawl, one of those moments where, even to Dave’s impeccable sense of timing, everything feels slow and ten minutes of hardcore, mindless blog surfing feel like eighty seven fucking years dragging on and on. Dave chances a quick look at the living room, pausing time to see that BQ and Bro are still muttering to each other in some kind of weird, cagey cahoots, but doesn’t move his butt out of the chair.

I mean, like hell is he actually going to visit this crazy lady. That is not even on the itinerary for this evening. Or ever. He has so few fucks to left give about her and her weird agenda, he's going into fuck withdrawal. With a curtain drawn over the wall to block out the dying afternoon sun and the temperature perfectly stifling, he's halfway to napping himself. Motivation levels are at -10% and heading for a nosedive of epic proportions.

But before he can crash, he still has to consider forwarding this fresh bullshit to Rose. And that is not at all an appealing prospect, one that he keeps putting off by opening up new windows. He has three redundant Pesterchum tabs open, all of them in the same state of stagnant disuse. Jade and John have both been radio silent all day long, which is goddamn unnatural on so many levels, but Rose’s lit up chumhandle sticks in the corner of his eye like an afterimage from staring into the sun, mocking his procrastination.

Doctor Lalonde is more a mother figure to Rose than she ever has been to Dave, biological nonsense notwithstanding, but she has also apparently been even more of a fuckup on the whole ‘raising a kid’ front than Bro. And that’s saying something. Seriously, that takes talent. Bro’s idea of parenting involved gratuitous puppets and learning to mix sick beats before you can even walk, but at least he didn’t just cut and run after Dave hit puberty. Like, fucking hell, kudos to him for sticking around when he might have had any number of opportunities to set up shop as a robotic puppet/sword-obsessed ninja DJ with no asshat little brother to take care of.

But no, Mom Lalonde is one of those impossibly incompetent parents you see on shitty daytime talk shows like Doctor Phil (which Dave will never admit to having marathoned in the ninth grade, ever). You know, the ones who get so caught up in their work lives that they eat, breathe, and shit their latest quarterly report, and somehow forget they have children at home who might need little things like food and running water and emotional validation, and then act all surprised when they get called out on national television in front of a live studio audience about their precious child setting Fluthulu loose on the other snot-nosed kids in their class and getting molested by intergalactic calamari with teeth.

...Okay, maybe that was a pretty specific example.

So under those circumstances, Rose might not be interested in ever dealing with her mom again, and Dave is completely in favor of that decision - but she also deserves to know that her custodifailure is up to new shenanigans, right? Right? That's a reasonable assumption to make.

Shit. Fuck it. Dave attaches the email to a Pesterchum message and sends it before he can talk himself out of it again.

TG: yo heads up
TG: we have a situation
TT: I see. And what is "the sitch," brother mine?
TG: mothergothelintheclubgettingtipsy.txt
TT: …
TT: Ah.
TG: i repeat
TG: a situation
TT: I was not aware that Mother had made a new habit of actually keeping in contact with family members. How curious. Perhaps she likes you.
TG: what no
TG: ive barely spoken three words to her in my life
TG: this is first ive heard from her TG: what do i do
TT: You are asking me? I assure you, Dave, I have never known how to handle our mother. A review of recent events should make it quite clear just how little we understood each other.

Well, he can't really argue with that logic, either. Any woman who thought leaving a teenage girl alone in a house with a hellaton of alcohol and instructions on how to summon tentabeasts from the netherworld clearly didn't understand the mind of a teenage girl, and vice versa.

TG: yeah but
TG: youre the headshrinker here
TG: lay down some of that psychic mojo for me
TG: give me a heads up tell me what im up against TG: like should i even take this seriously
TG: or is she just bringing some mad maternal swagger to the table
TG: to test my worth in some weird crossbreed strilonde showdown TG: like is this the equivalent of a faceful of puppet dong TG: is what im asking
TG: or does she think im some gullible stooge who will walk into her creepy scientist trap
TG: should i just roll with it
TG: i need clarification dammit
TT: All of these are excellent questions. Particularly given the fact that she has recently made a similar overture to myself.
TG: what
TG: shes trying to get all motherly on you too
TG: that is so relevant to the sitch why did you not mention this before TT: It is rather difficult to get a word in edgewise when you flip your shit so magnificently. You can be quite eloquent when you hit your stride.
TG: so help me woman
TG: if that pun was deliberate
TG: i will grind the railing of this stairway to stupidity and kickflip off the handle of sanity
TT: One can only hope there will be a lavish puppet posterior conveniently positioned beneath the handle in time to break your fall.
TG: time
TG: did you just say time
TG: no oh jesus fuck no

All these puns just remind him of the nagging sense of anxiety drumming away in the back of his skull, that little ticking clock in his mind that he doesn't like to admit keeps a running timer on how long it's been since he last heard from John. He is not acting like some fucking needy tool who hangs onto John's every last word. He's just. You know. Very temporally aware. And it has been nearly eighteen hours, forty minutes, and thirteen seconds since John texted him yesterday, which is a whole new record for that kid. By now Dave would have usually initiated a full-on rap session in the kid's inbox to get his attention - a pesterspam of righteous beats to distract him from whatever weird shit John's brain gets up to when he doesn't talk to people - but he kind of lost the morning to tacos and the afternoon to dicking around on the internet.

He should probably message him. Make sure the poor kid doesn't waste away from lack of Strider in his life. See how the whole twin sister thing is playing out. He fires off a quick 'yo' and then refocuses on Rose's window, switching between the two every so often to fire off a new sick jams at John.

TT: Regardless.
TT: Yes, my mother has made another surprise appearance, and has in fact threatened to sit me down and give me a stern talking to. Allegations have been made implying that she may be willing to explain certain outstanding mysteries that have thus far eluded the illuminating efforts of my pending investigations, but only if we four are all in the same room together. I declined her generous offer, because I suspect her to be physically incapable of giving straight answers.
TT: Have you kept abreast with recent events in Chicago?
TG: last i heard you were laying down the law but that was last night
TG: howd it go'
TT: Yes, well, it went about as well as could be expected.
TT: That is to say, I applied my foot to an uncanny amount of derrière, and the Scourge and Blind Justice have been taken into custody. Scourge is unconscious at the moment, but Justice has seen the light and agreed to cooperate with us.
TT: However, Mother Dearest has been meddling with our efforts to expedite their exodus to Canada, where a friend has been able to secure them new identities. She believes this will force me to pay attention to her, no doubt. She has always been insidiously backhanded that way. Her passive-aggressive behavior has only escalated, and this appeal to you may well be an effort to further complicate the matter in her favor.
TG: well i wasnt planning on answering her anyway
TG: me and bro have the whole information thing under control now TG: so yeah
TT: Ah. Then all went according to plan?
TG: oh hell no we are not going there
TG: look just mutual agreement im tossing this letter
TG: and we never speak of it again
TT: Very well, agreed. One day we really do need to sit down together over tea and discuss your brother complex.
TG: lets not ever
TG: like thats a hell no from me
TT: Oh, I'm sure it would be no trouble for me to pay a visit to Houston after I check in on John, since I appear to be making a grand tour of the United States anyway. My partner is more than capable of returning to Philadelphia without me if I were to tack on another stop.

Dave tries to picture Bro, the BQ, Oriole, and Rose all sitting around the same table, drinking tea of mysterious origins and waggling their eyebrows at each other.

He nearly has a brain aneurysm at the thought. He scrubs a hand through his hair and tries to wipe that mental image from his mind's eye.

TG: wow that is so beyond not necessary
TG: how is john anyway havent heard from him in ages
TT: Such a smooth segue. I am completely led astray.
TG: hell yeah you are
TT: Our mutual acquaintance has been relatively busy of late. You know nothing of what went on last night?
TG: no why what the hell is happening
TT: Hm. John has been in a bit of a state over it. I am surprised he hasn't contacted you yet. But then, even his conversations with me have suffered from hours-long intervals in which he fails to reply. I worry that his father keeps pulling him away for undeserved lectures, but I worry more that John is his own worst enemy, at the moment.
TG: could this get any more vague
TG: no really this is more ambiguous than a postmodern novel wtf is going on with john TG: should i be concerned
TG: is it this jade chick
TG: do i need to punt a bitch
TT: No, it's - damn. Damn it all.
TG: what
TT: It's not my place to say.
TT: It involves the personal details of someone else in John's acquaintance, one who might not be comfortable with their private business being aired to all and sundry.
TG: what but its okay when john blabs it all to you
TT: Most likely not. But he was distraught at the time, and then had to wait for several hours for my reply, and this delay in communication led to more undue distress on his part. And aside from that, between John and I lies the deep and unbreakable bond…
TT: Of doctor-patient confidentiality.

Oh, she did not just go there.

TG: youre fucking kidding me
TG: you are a goddamn lying liar who lies youre not a doctor yet
TT: I have broken this confidentiality in spirit numerous times to consult with you about John, seeing as you have been pivotal to his recovery from the initial depressive episode, but I do not think he would appreciate me sharing this incident in particular without obtaining the consent of everyone involved. Suffice to say that John himself is unharmed physically, but has experienced an extreme upheaval in his personal and professional life that has unbalanced his mental state.
TT: I'd advise you to ask him yourself. He would be happy to hear from you.
TG: havent heard much from anyone at all today
TG: had a taco crisis and a visit from the mc
TG: yknow if anyone cares
TT: Oh good lord, everything really does happen all at once with us, doesn't it?
TG: it just keeps happening brosis
TT: You are alright? It does not break confidentiality to inform you that John's issues involved the Midnight Crew as well. Is it possible this was a concerted strike against both of you at once?
TG: dammit woman youre killing me with this TG: i doubt it was related TG: like whatever happened with john wouldnt have caused this TG: me and bird me just fucked up and had to fight our way out of an ambush nbd
TG: for whatever reason they just cant wait to get their hands on this hot bod on mine
TG: i cant really blame them im hotter than ghost pepper chili but thats not the point TT: I'm sure.
TG: look i need to talk to john
TG: i only wanted to tell you about momlonde how did we get so sidetracked
TG: goddamn
TG: have fun with spider pirate and dragon lawyer and chainsaw vampire TT: Oh, I will.
TT: waggles eyebrow in a suggestive manner
TG: stop that no
TG: oh god

Dave does not want to know about his biological sister's weird sexual conquests. Or whatever the hell that was about. He closes that window with more force than is strictly necessary and knocks his head against the desk a few times, hard enough to rattle the stack of mix CDs beside the monitor.

But all of this nonsense has just confirmed his nagging suspicion that John's silence has the distinct air of 'freaking the fuck out' forgetfulness. Because when John is always at his most spacy when shit gets too real for him. John's an open book, until suddenly it's for his own good and he's suddenly a tough nut to crack. Go figure.

Tugging on his lip with his teeth, Dave turns his head to the side and brings his phone up, despite the fact that the computer is still right in front of him, to text a few more rapid fire lines at John until - finally - the kid logs on.

Flawless timing.

TG: oh hell yes
TG: perfect
TG: the mic is in your hands my man just let the sick fires flow TG: …
TG: eb?
TG: shit bro rose didn't say what was up you need to talk to me
TG: like how serious is this shit on a scale of not serious to he fired the missiles thirty five minutes ago
EB: karkat is hemogoblin.
TG: what TG: oh
TG: well frick
EB: oh my god I
EB: I'm trying to keep it together for him but EB: I don't know what to do, dave!

This is all escalating very quickly. Dave rests his head on his palm and has to stare at the screen in horror for a few seconds before it really sinks in that, yes, John has in fact landed himself in the middle of a cheap comic book identity reveal plot twist.

TG: oh holy shit
TG: uh
TG: i have got to admit i did not see this one coming TG: were talking about the angry troll diamond waifu right
EB: and he's hurt really bad and it's all my fault!
EB: i'm so stupid!
TG: oh shit john
EB: i fucked up oh god i fucked up so bad and now karkat can barely walk.
EB: i'm trash i'm literally the worst friend ever.
EB: if i'd just backed off like your brother told me to none of this would have ever happened!
EB: but now diamonds droog is here and she beat the heck out of hemogoblin and he's karkat and I DON'T KNOW WHAT TO DO!
TG: i am right there with you thats rough buddy
EB: he should never have become friends with me!
EB: look at my track record first rose gets possessed and now this.
EB: and she keeps trying to tell me that has nothing to do with it but clearly being friends with me hurts people and i can't do anything to help them!
EB: i'm so useless!
TG: whoa we need to back this bad thought train right the fuck up TG: okay like seriously breathe
EB: argh!
TG: yes good argh very good
TG: you with me here man let it out
TG: get some fresh air circulating in your brain because you're clearly not thinking straight
EB: ARGH!
TG: awesome now listen because I'm pretty sure that unless you physically picked up Droog's foot and whacked your weird troll bro upside the head with it this is not your fault
TG: also did you put the tentacle monsters in Rose's head no I didn't think so
TG: so both those are off the table
TG: it's just shitty luck bro it has nothing to do with you TG: be cool
TG: breathe
EB: I'm trying!
TG: and trying is like half the battle
TG: seriously well done you

Dave presses the heel of his palm to his shades so that the plastic digs into his eye sockets. His stomach is doing some weird knot tango thing, his lower lip feels raw from how hard he's been digging his teeth into it, his eyes ache, and the worst part is that all of these signs add up to him feeling.

He rubs his hand over his entire face a few times, feeling an echo of a headache starting to thread itself in the creases between his eyebrows. He smooths his expression with some effort, snagging a bottle of apple juice from his stash tucked into the cinderblock by his feet, and presses that to his forehead so hard that the tepid bottle leaves a mark. Cool. He has to be cool. John is having a legit crisis here, and Dave needs to be the one holding their collective shit together because Rose has completely understated how bad the situation is.

Feeling. So fucking overrated.

TG: on the whole emotional composure meter you are clearly tanking out
TG: so talk me through it
EB: what is there to talk about?
EB: stuff like how did I not even realize that Karkat and Hemogoblin were the same person? When even Jade and my dad apparently knew??
EB: I am literally the shittiest friend :(.
EB: I'm supposed to be the more experienced hero here and I still let him fight Droog alone.
EB: so I'm an awful hero too what else is new TG: look bro this is all the weird head thing talking not you
TG: did you take meds or anything today
TG: what with all the drama you might have forgotten
TG: shit why do I not know this are you still on any medication
TG: see you're not allowed to call yourself the shittiest friend anymore I don't even have this basic shit down
TG: I have snatched the crown right off your dumbass head and held my own coronation ceremony
TG: no take backsies
EB: eheheheh

Oh thank Santa Christ, the damage control is working. Dave slumps forward, resting his head on the apple juice container so all he can see is the glowing screen of his phone and the desk inches from his face.
TG: what was that
EB: shut up dave, you're not a shitty friend!
EB: and no, i dont have regular prescription stuff anymore.
EB: i only really took it for about a year after we met and then i felt pretty okay doing without it.
TG: you sure
TG: because that was some pretty not okay talk back there TG: like
TG: fuck
TG: i havent heard you badmouth your fineass self like that in years
EB: bluhhh!
EB: everything's just kind of shitty right now i guess :P
EB: and it mostly seems like i just keep screwing up.
EB: like every time i get a handle on all this weird stuff happening something else piles up on top of that!
EB: like if i sit down to try to process everything at once it would just crush me into a blob on the floor.
EB: and i could never get up again!
TG: breathe man breathe
EB: urgh.
EB: oh man, you're right :(
EB: this is exactly what happened last time isn't it!
EB: great, now even my brain is all messed up again!
EB: i'm so stupid!
TG: what no
TG: youre not stupid dude its brain chemistry
EB: maybe...
TG: is the talking not helping should i stop talking TG: because you know that happens sometimes
TG: i just start going and dont know when to stop TG: just keep mumbling to myself over here TG: when i should totes just calm down and TG: idk
TG: be silently supportive or some shit
TG: im doing it right now arent I dammit EB: no, you're fine!
EB: it's just
EB: i am the problem, it is me.
EB: and karkat is hurt and you and rose are far away and i'm being all irrational and stuff about it.
EB: i just suck :(
TG: rose is going to be in the area soon though right
TG: i distinctly remember that was a thing
EB: yeah, but i think maybe i should tell her to stay away
EB: i don't want her to enter the danger zone, not while she could get hurt!
TG: but it would help you feel not so shitty if she were there
EB: i don't know, maybe? urgh...
TG: im serious man do you need a brohug
TG: do we need to get up close and personal
EB: hahaha, you know i am always down for the hug of bros
EB: but somehow i don't think running away to houston will solve all my problems and i can't leave karkat while he's hurt!
...Well, Dave thinks distantly, sitting upright. He taps on the phone screen for a long minute, swallowing hard around a weird lump in his throat.

There's only one response to that.

TG: fuck houston
TG: ill be right there

He thumps off the Pesterchum app. Without looking at the computer screen, he powers that down too. There's a drumming in his head, a familiar beat like a grandfather clock banging out the hour. He's uncertain for a moment, his eyes darting from the open door to the orange bird kid on the bed and back to the phone in his hands.

He types out a message in the notes app, lobs the phone at Oriole's head, and slams the door shut between one second and the next while his clone splutters and rolls off the bed in a panic. Oriole yelps as his broken wing hits the ground at the wrong angle, and pulls a face when Dave rolls the computer chair over to stare down at the kid, his hands folded in front of his mouth as he waits for Oriole to read his message.

"Asshole," Oriole mutters, reaching out to grab the phone from where his flailing sent it skittering across the floor. "This had better be fucking important, or so help me we are going flying with one wing between us, see how well that works out for you -"

He shuts up as he reads the message on the screen. His mouth works, opening and closing without words in a way that gives Dave the worst kind of déjà vu, and then he looks up, eyes wide. "You're not serious," he says.

Dave signs, 'As serious as a monk on Christmas Day, my man.'

"I don't know what the hell that means. Your hands are saying 'haha, let's wave at the guy who doesn't know sign language,' but your face is saying 'yes, I am entirely serious about this.' Except your face always looks like that."

Dave switches to paper. If they're doing this, they need to avoid technology anyway. Bro has a bad habit of spying on everything lately, and he's no doubt noticed the closed door by now. It's only a matter of time before he ninjas his way in to demand answers, because Bro's a paranoid bastard.

Luckily, Dave has all the time in the world.

DS: bro can handle the bq

DS: johns having a goddamn crisis

DS: fuck only knows if rose will make it in time to help him what with all her shenanigans going on

"Even if you -" Oriole starts, his voice loud, and then he glances at the closed door and lowers the volume. "Even if you left right now, and you took like, a nonstop direct flight or something, it would take five hours to get to Seattle. Probably more. Don't you think you should think about this for longer than ten seconds?"

DS: if i stopped to think about everything there wouldnt be a new york anymore

DS: are you gonna help or not

Oriole groans, and flops back down against the floor, dragging the bed sheets down off the bed and over his face.

DS: ill take that as an enthusiastic yes

"As your celestial orange guardian twin self, it is my duty to inform you that this is yet another incredibly stupid idea."

DS: shut up i bought you mcdonalds didnt i

Oriole shuffles his free wing forward over his arm, defensively clutching his Oreo McFlurry closer to his chest.

Escaping the apartment had been easier said than done. But technically, Dave is no longer under house arrest - lo, the perks of getting himself stabbed in an effort to facilitate healthy brotherly communication. When he announced that he and Oriole were headed out to get milkshakes, Bro had flipped him a distracted thumbs up which was basically a 'fuck yes' from anyone else.

The Badass Quandary had finally shifted from the couch, and was pacing in a tight circle in the shadowy corner of the living room, muttering into a cell phone tucked up against the smooth curve of her carapace. Dave was very aware that he was once again completely out of the loop where she was concerned - but fucking hell, that was basically the entire basis of his relationship with the alien dame, and he doesn't know why that would change now just because Bro is giving her the third degree.

All intel gathering has been put on hold anyway. He shoves all thoughts of Mom Lalonde’s suspicious as fuck letter out of his mind, to be dealt with probably never, if he has his way. He's more a dude of action; research and interrogation are not his forte, as can be seen from his complete failure to get anything of merit out of the BQ in all of two years. If Rose is still gung ho about figuring out all these mysteries surrounding their powers and their guardians and all the secret ectobiological clone twins showing up all over the place, all power to her. If she thinks Doctor Lalonde is lying to get a rise out of her kids, Dave is inclined to believe her.

And now Dave has an intervention to pull off.

It had been easy to drop a duffle bag full of clothes and shit out of the hole in the wall before leaving, and then pick it up on their way to the McDonalds. One vanilla shake and a McFlurry later, and Oriole had grudgingly allowed Dave to yank them back an hour in the timeline. It hurts like a son of a bitch, as always, which is why the shake does wonders for the stabbing pain in his throat while they ride the bus to the airport. Dave grimaces at the taste - he usually never drinks anything but the subpar apple juice from the kid's meal, and vanilla milkshakes from McDonalds taste like nothing at all - but the relief is too welcome for him to stop.

It also helps numb the renewed pang of feelings that ensues when he realizes with a sickness in his gut that he's not going to be able to talk when he sees John. Like. He's mentioned sign language, offhandedly. But. Never the actual 'I can't talk without that mecha collar thing because reasons.' John being the naïve, trusting bastard that he is, he probably thinks Dave learned sign language for fun or something.

"This is just dumb. What the hell is with you and impulsive decisions." Oriole hooks his leg over the empty seat in front of them, shifting his weight so that the broken wing, still bound up against his side, leans over the aisle. There's practically no one else riding to the airport in the middle of the afternoon, so they're pretty much free to do whatever. The driver keeps throwing horrified looks at Oriole after he complains about the heat and shucks his newest coat to expose one massive bird wing, but he hasn't pulled over to call the cops yet so they're in the clear.

Of course, since Dave's phone has to be kept turned off to keep Bro from tracking it, he's stuck writing things out on this shitty notepad. It's going to be a shitshow. He slurps on the milkshake, rips off a new page on the pad of paper, and starts scribbling again. At least all this nonverbal communication has vastly improved his handwriting.

DS: just how i roll man

DS: thats how it works with all this time hero shit you have to do what feels right in the moment

DS: and right now it sounds like john is getting in heavy with the mc

DS: so thats where i need to be

DS: counting on you to hold down the fort while im gone

"Yeah, right," Oriole mutters, talking around a spoonful of Oreo chunks and ice cream. "And while you're gone I'll institute a new world order, have myself elected Supreme Rap Leader of the city of Houston, and bulldoze the local libraries to build shitty skateparks. Sound good?"

DS: im so proud

DS: my little orange chick is all grown up and using irony for good and not evil

DS: bless you child

"Whatever." They're nearing the terminal now, judging by the amount of taxis and shuttles started to congeal into a traffic nightmare the road ahead of them, and Oriole's lip twists into a frown. He pulls on his coat as they pass under a walkway. "If your brother doesn't kick my ass to the curb for helping you pull this shit, I'll probably just work on training so next time I don't get my ass kidnapped by those Crew dickweeds."

DS: bro is too soft on you to set you loose on the streets man

DS: im telling you kids are his secret squishy underbelly

DS: he just wants to hug them and train them to be deadly ninja warriors and stick his nose into their business all the damn time

Oriole snorts. "I'll believe that when I see it."

Dave snorts back, because he's put up with Bro's stoic weirdness all his life. He knows how to read between the lines, and has formed the hypothesis that Bro refuses to express emotions beyond disdain and sarcasm mostly because he's spent too much time around puppet robots and not enough around emotionally functional human beings.

DS: anyway before i take off into the wild blue yonder

DS: can we have real talk

"What the hell does that even mean?"

DS: means i have an outstanding question
DS: concerning your backstory

DS: which would be cool to ask about before I leave my sword in your craggy bird hands

Oriole shrugs his wings. "Dude, I don't really see the point in being cagey. Like, just ask me shit, and I'll answer. Also I kind of owe you a solid for the whole rescue. So fuck it, what do you wanna know?"

Dave hesitates, because what he's about to ask is going to sound stupid. It also goes against all of his honed instincts to keep his mouth shut and not ask obvious questions, so that no one can tell what he's thinking, but Bro's not here to mock him. If everything goes as planned, he might actually be free from Bro for the first time ever; in just a half hour his plane is going to take off and not even Bro can follow an airplane into the lower atmosphere.

(He hopes.)

DS: just

DS: look

DS: can you fly

"Of course I can," Oriole says, snorting. "What would be the point of keeping a pair of huge ass wings like this if I couldn't use them? Christ." He's silent for a moment, and Dave looks at him, the shadows of the overhead walkways flickering over his orange face as the shuttle rumbles along.

"Yeah," he says again, sounding almost lost. "I could fly."

Dave doesn't miss the tense shift. He bites his lip and looks away.

Their shuttle forces its way through the worst of the traffic congestion, coming to a screeching stop in front of the terminal; the driver cranks the door open and stares at them pointedly in the rear-view mirror. Oriole shoves Dave's shoulder. "Now, beat it. I've got your bro to keep from hunting your ass down, and you've got your blue-text boyfriend to go mack on."

Dave recoils.

DS: goddammit man

DS: we were having a moment

DS: and now this

"Hey man, I just call it like I see it," Oriole says with a shit-faced grin. "You're flying halfway across the country to go see some dude because he's having emotions."

DS: stop being insensitive

DS: just because were emotionless pricks doesn't mean were allowed to discriminate against the unenlightened

"Never. I don't think either of us knows how to stop being an insensitive dick. It's like. Hardwired into our personalities or something. A universal constant."

"Please," the bus driver interrupts, "get off my bus."

Dave doesn't have the heart to break it to the poor man that he's still stuck with Oriole for the round trip back to the downtown area. 'Later, man,' he signs, slinging his duffle bag over his shoulder. He takes the bladekind and scabbard from his back, the unbroken one he never got a chance to use earlier, and passes it to the bird kid reverently, trying to make this a solemn moment. 'Knock yourself out.'

Oriole turns the strife specibus over in his hands, squinting at shitty sword with his lemon yellow eyebrows knitted together in an awed frown.

Which reminds Dave. He reaches up onto his face, plucks off his sunglasses, and shoves them onto the bridge of Oriole's nose. He may or may not stab the kid in the eye on the first attempt, triggering an outraged squawk, but then he gets it.

Then, naturally, he slides on his new pair.

What, like he was going to wander around basically naked in a public airport? No thanks, man.

DS: welcome to the family bro

DS: try not to die

Somehow, the cue ball in his pocket makes it through security. His assortment of swords pass, too, but that's mostly because he flashsteps them through the security scanner before they can set off any alarms.

Once he’s on the plane itself, he plugs his headphones in and cranks up the music.

Time to fly.

---

"Mother of fuck almighty, give me strength."

Nothing is okay.

"Whaat?! Come on, this is such a good plan! Don't get your horns in a knot, this'll be a piece of cake!"

But John is dealing with it quietly.

"Yeah, okay, bring up the horns fuck you very much - but hey, remember that one time I got the shit kicked out of me? Whoa! I remember that too! It's almost like it only happened a few hours ago!
Which means that plan is literally the shittiest piece of shit to ever hit the whirling device."

It helps, he thinks, that Karkat is up and moving and feeling well enough to cuss a hole though the fabric of space/time.

"Yeaaaah, I know that, Karkat! So obviously you should stay here and rest up! And in the meantime, me and John can go investigate! We can't avenge you if we don't know where Diamonds is holed up!"

John shudders internally. Karkat is no longer leaning on him, instead having hunched forward to fold his arms tight over his bandaged chest and argue with Jade in proper form. He has his nubby horns tilted forward and everything, which is such an aggressive move, even for Karkat. They're not getting along very well at all.

"Oh, helllllllll no. No fucking way is John going anywhere near that monster without me. Hell. No.
I'm his partner, and if you want to shove me out of this threeway nubfucking scuttlebuggy of insanity, you'll do it over my putrescent corpse -"

And now John's just kind of sitting here on his section of the couch and trying not to flip the fuck out.

He's not doing a very good job of it, he thinks, because everything has gone sort of fuzzy and close and tight around him, and each breath feels shallow and fluttering, as though his lungs can't expand to their full capacity.

At the same time, the conversation around him has shifted to other things. No one else seems to have noticed his internal struggle. But the sounds of their voices are so distant he can't focus on them. Maybe his eardrums popped. That doesn't happen to him very often, because the instinctive aspect of his connection to the air tends to adjust for things like barometric changes when he's flying at high altitudes or swimming in deep water, but -

Swimming. When is the last time he made it to practice? He can't remember; heck, he can't even remember if today is supposed to be a school day because the only thing in his brain was Karkat's blood all over his hands, everything is too close too close he can't breathe -

"Now Karkat, there's no need for those kind of language. Ms Harley, please stop floating in the house. Settle down, both of you. You three aren't going anywhere today or tonight, if I have any say in it - you need to rest and recover your strength. It might be for the best if you all tried to get some sleep for now, and we can discuss this further later on."

He has to stay calm. He has to stay calm.

He has to act normal.

"What do you think, John?"

...That is so much easier said than done.

"Son?"

A hand lands on his shoulder and his dad's voice cuts through the buzz of white noise in his ears. John flinches and looks up from the corner of the coffee table. He isn't sure how long he's been staring at it, which is probably a bad sign. His cell phone sits in his lap, his hands resting on his thighs and loosely cupped around the phone where he dropped it when Dave stopped answering.

That's when he checked out of reality, he thinks. Talking to Rose had helped get him through the long hours before Karkat woke up. Before she responded -

(He's not thinking about it he's not)

- he was a lot worse, pacing around his bedroom with the wind tearing at him, winding in an ever-narrowing circle around the recooperacoon until Jade had to yell over the roar of a minor windstorm and his dad had to trudge through the distraught breeze to pull John out of the epicenter. He can't exactly remember what his dad said to him - the words are a blurred mumble in his vague memory, half stern admonishment and half crushing sympathy - but it was enough to get him to stop agitating the wind and sit down to wait until Karkat woke up.

It did nothing, however, to settle his inner turmoil. That's not something he's ever been able to talk to his dad about, not really.
But he couldn't talk to Rose about everything. She's been trying to do her psychoanalyzing thing ever since they regained contact to help John sort out his dumb issues, but John's just not willing to unload all his crap on her when she's got so much on her plate already! That would be so not cool!

And because of that, talking to Dave is just...easier. Dave likes to pretend he's so cool and ironic and above it all, but he also never judges people, really. Yeah, he makes fun of John for liking comics unironically (john you are literally a hero already come on you have to admit thats just weird), but he's also the one who permitted a thirty-four minute, twenty-five second hug session the first day they met and his only reaction after John finally pulled his snot-dripping, wheezing self together was to adjust his shades, thump John on the back, and mutter something that sounded like, "Hug game too strong."

So there's just a lot less pressure, because Dave has a lot more personal experience when it comes to dealing with John's issues already, and John doesn't need to worry about Dave spontaneously getting possessed by tentacle monsters from the fifth dimension. Rose seems to be getting past that weird phase in her life, like finally overcoming grimdark-puberty growing pains, but it's still sort of a legitimate thing to worry about, you know?

But then Dave texted something weird and stopped answering altogether and John kind of shut down after that -

"John."

He lost track again. He's been staring at the wall instead of the table, this time. John shudders, his head rattling from side to side as he shakes it and then looks up at his dad, plastering on the brittle smile that's been carrying him all this time. It only needs to hold a little while longer. "What's up, Dad?" he asks, because he's kiiiinda been not paying attention at all.

Which is awful. He needs to be on top of things, here. They're supposed to be deciding what to do about Diamonds Droog and the Midnight Crew, and John is sitting over here brooding. There is no room for angst in a war room! Or a living room, whatever. "Sorry, I think I started zoning out," he adds, slapping his cheeks with his palms to try to make his brain restart. "What were we talking about again?"

"It's because you wouldn't sleep!" Jade thumps down on the coffee table in front of John, gnawing on her lip worriedly as she folds her bare feet under her. John can see his dad open his mouth - and then shut it again. Samuel Egbert knows how and when to pick his battles. "I don't know…if you're really that sleepy, maybe we should wait…" Her face is sad as she reaches out to poke his cheek. "Is your head okay still?"

"Huh? Yeah, I'm fine!" His smile is reflexive but still weak, apparently, because Jade chews on her lip in a way that implies she's not buying it.

"Your head?" Karkat asks, his claws digging into his pants. His face is still scary pale, the grey of his skin almost translucent. Blood loss is not something Karkat needs to worry much about, for reasons that are obvious in hindsight and make John want to bang his head against the wall, but between his busted ribs and the brutality of Droog's smackdown Karkat still looks seven eighths dead. "What the fuck is wrong with your head? I thought you said you two got out of there okay?"

"Uh, nothing," Jade says, exchanging a significant look with John's dad, "John's just been getting some headaches and nosebleeds today."

And who knows what that's all about. Sure, John has been breaking out extra boxes of tissue because of all the gross, snotty blood threatening to run down the back of his throat (eurgh!), but Jade has been majorly overreacting about it. You'd think she'd never had a nosebleed herself in her life, and now she's got John's dad in on it, too. John shakes his head. "No, I'm fine. Really! So fine! Probably just tired, yeah. A lot of stuff happened, and I'm just - yeah..."

Karkat looks at him, clearly skeptical, and shoves his shoulder against John's again, snorting. "Tell me about it," he mutters wryly, his hair wisping along John's cheek as he rests his head on John's shoulder. "Wow, fuck me, I've only been up for an hour, maybe? And I'm ready to pass out again. Because you just know my pathetic aggravation sponge needs its fury sleep."

"Very true," John agrees, injecting humor into his voice and hugging Karkat around the waist gingerly, taking absolute care to make sure he doesn't put pressure on Karkat's ribs.

It helps a little to have Karkat around. John doesn't know how their friendship and his crush and Karkat's moirail thing all ended up smooshed together into this weird incomprehensible smear that they really need to talk about at some point, but not even remembering that everything just became ten times more complicated can change the fact that touching Karkat makes him feel better. Reminds him that Karkat is still breathing, even when John is too out of it to focus on the air fluctuations in the room around him. He doesn't know whether this is supposed to be a regular crush or a pale crush or whatever anymore, because it has been two gosh darn years and he has finally begun to suspect that romance in general is dumb and too complicated and he doesn't want to think about it anymore. It just is.

He's not the expert on this stuff. Karkat is the one who marathons troll romances with thirty-word long titles in his spare time, not John. Maybe later, when everything has calmed down some more, he'll mention to Karkat that yeah, cuddlesnuggles are awesome and he is so down for them, but also he kind of wants to make out sometimes and maybe touch Karkat's butt, and then brace himself for the ensuing firestorm.

But right now, his relationship with Karkat is too critical to both of their continued sanity for him to risk it.

A tiny weight thumps on John's knee. He blinks, cracking open an eye that he hadn't realized he'd closed, and spies WV patting him with a tiny claw, his white eyes wide under an eyebrowless frown of concern. The carapacian seems to have taken a liking to John, or at least John's bed, and this is one of the first times John thinks the alien has willingly left John's room without pitching a silent fit. He hadn't even noticed WV creeping down the stairs.

"John, I'd like speak to you alone in the study before you go to sleep. It'll only take a moment," Samuel Egbert says. He's been standing behind the couch - John can't even remember him standing up from his armchair - with a firm hand on John's free shoulder, and only now does he retract it, pacing around the couch to smile at them wearily. "Ms Harley, I know you've been sleeping in John's room, but -"

"No way." Karkat bolts upright, and John has to yank his arm away before he gets hurt. "Absolutely not. I'm not staying alone in a room with her."

Jade rolls her eyes, and leans over to scoop WV up into her arms. "Yeah, yeah, shortstack! I don't wanna sleep near your slimy butt anyway! What if you sleep walk?" The carapacian flails at her as she sets him in her lap to use his head as a chinrest. "I can stay on the couch tonight - we can trade off, John!" Jade adds.

John just shakes his head and tries not to roll his eyes. At least Jade isn't willing to take shit from Karkat. If she couldn't give him as good as she got John'd have to feel guilty about how impolite Karkat is being. One would think he'd be used to Karkat's complete lack of a verbal filter by now - and yet...

"Yeah. Sorry Jade, but I probably need to be around in case Karkat - needs something," he corrects at the last minute. Karkat would proobably not be happy if John started talking about his crappy nightmares in front of Jade.

Wait.

John makes the connection at last, and promptly eyes the wall with a haunted, longing stare, with the full intent of slamming his head against it repeatedly. Hemogoblin and Karkat have both been complaining about sleeplessness and bad dreams lately and Hemogoblin got all ragey and uncharacteristically furious during that arson debacle and how the fuck did John not make these connections.

How.

It had to have been some combination of coincidence and luck and trust and a lot of willful blindness, and John just can't figure out how he and Karkat managed to keep circling around each other without either one catching on. Either they were both way sneakier than they thought and could give, like, secret agents a run for their money - or they were just that dumb, and John isn't sure which option is more terrifying. If he keeps thinking about it, he's going to lose it again and he can't -

"Okay. You want me to help you get up there?" Jade offers, raising a hand with the thumb and middle finger pressed together and ready to snap.

"Nonono," John says hastily, before Karkat can do more than let out a high pitched screech. "I got it! It is okay if I float Karkat in the house, right Dad?" he remembers to ask his dad. He'd forgotten to ask permission earlier with all the confusion going on, but the rules are there for a reason!

"As long as you're sure you won't accidentally drop him!" Samuel chuckles. 'I'll see you in a few minutes, son."

Hoo, boy. John winces and then smoothes his expression as he hooks an arm under Karkat's to steady him as they stand up. Jade and Karkat don't know his dad like John does, so hopefully they don't notice that faint note of warning in Samuel's voice. Any conversation that a parent starts off with 'we need to talk' or some variation on that theme is bound to end in fatherly disapproval and awkwardness and regret. Mostly regret. And sometimes cake but the cake doesn't make up for the regret, okay?

"Do you even have a job?" Karkat thinks to ask as they waft up the stairway.

"Do you?" John replies gloomily.

They both sigh at the same time. Which pretty much answers that question. "I used to volunteer at the community center," John says. "Back in middle school, when I had more free time and stuff. But then high school started and everything, and I got too busy to balance volunteer hours on top of it all."

"We're awful. We're the worst fuckfaced liars I know. Either one of us could have called the places we're supposed to be working and found out right then and there, but through the miracle of modern technology we just texted each other instead of dicking around with the nonexistent middleman. Fucking incredible." Karkat sags when John sets them down on the floor, and they hobble together the rest of the way to his room. There is a rapid thud of feet on stairs, and John looks back over his shoulder to see a tiny dark figure peeking around the corner at them with curiosity. When WV realizes he's been spotted, he squeaks and vanishes, and there is an even more rapid clatter as the carapacian flees back downstairs.

Seriously, that is adorable. Why do none of the textbooks tell you carapacians were adorable? It was all 'holy shit aliens,' and 'meteors of mysterious, untraceable origins,' and 'the xenocidal aspects of the Holocaust,' and no mention of the fact that WV, at least, is an armful of cuteness.

"My dad is probably ready to sternly lecture me on every single obvious clue I missed," John agrees, shouldering open the door. "He's been sitting on this one for ages, I bet. This might even be bad enough to warrant a BC baking session."

"A what the fuck?" Karkat asks.

Karkat stares at him in horror. "Holy shitbagels."

"Yeah, I know."

"You seriously hate Betty Crocker that much. Enough that your dad uses it as a form of custodial discipline?!"

"Betty Crocker," John says, nostrils flaring as he helps Karkat lean against the side of the recooperacoon, "is a plague upon this earth. Her goods are false, deceitful concoctions that come out of a box. Her dastardly red spoonkind is a symbol of lies and despair."

"This is not healthy, John. Addiction is a powerful thing."

"Did you know she makes Fruit by the Foot? Not even Fruit by the Foot is sacred, Karkat. " Dunk-a-roos are General Mills brand too, but John needs to save that one for later, in case his current argument doesn't win Karkat over. Betty Crocker hating is serious business and one day Karkat needs to believe. John once had to endure Karkat eating Dunk-a-roo icing right out of the plastic package without screaming at the horror before him.

Yes. Revealing the truth about Dunk-a-roos will be the weapon of last resort.

"Okay, that is a little creepy." Karkat pauses, tilting his head to the side and squinting at John suspiciously. "Wait. Do you just have, like, a fucking mental list of all Betty Crocker-owned products?"

Yes. "No, don't be dumb, Karkat!" When Karkat grimaces and rolls his eyes, seeing right through John's protest, John shakes his head sadly. "You watch Karkat. One day she'll turn out to be one of the twelve riders of the apocalypse, and she will rain shitty cupcakes and universe-destroying cancer tentacles from above."

Karkat raises a claw. Then lowers it. And finally blows air out of his nose and presses his forehead against John's. "I think we need to go the fuck to sleep. This is fucking stupid."

"Yeah, probably," John admits. He hooks his hands under Karkat's forearms when the troll leans more weight on him with a grumble. Karkat was trying to keep up with Jade downstairs, but he's too hurt to manage it here. "You can use the bathroom to change and everything, because Jade usually at least gives a five second warning before she jumps in."

"Wha -"
"I'll go talk to Dad, and then I'll be right back. Promise!" John flashes a brilliant grin.

Karkat sighs. "Good."

At this point, Karkat's eyes are scrunched shut and he's cycling through different frowns that are so distinctive John can feel the wrinkles against his own forehead. Karkat's claws dig into his left arm lightly, and he breathes out as the frown lines ease away.

It should be noted that his mouth like three inches from John. This is distracting.

John grits his teeth so hard he thinks his molars might be loosening in their sockets, and puts his head to the right, onto Karkat's shoulder. So smooth. He raises his head a second later, when that urge to kiss Karkat has mostly gone away, and smiles. Karkat snorts at him, and then John makes a beeline out of there before he can think too hard about what the heck he's doing with his life.

He starts crashing again when he's three yards from his dad's study. It's always easy to shove his darker thoughts to the side when he's got Karkat to focus on. His brain goes on auto-soothe mode and there isn't room for angisting until Karkat is okay.

But John's phone is cold and silent in his pocket; Rose was busy with trying to get Blind Justice and the Indigo Scourge over the border the last time she checked in, and Dave is in the wind. Jade - he keeps making himself not trust Jade, so he forces himself to discard the thought of shaking her awake to talk it out. Without them and without Karkat, John's got nothing to distract himself. Which sort of sucks. A lot.

Feeling like his insides are being scraped over with a dull knife, John enters the study.

"John." His dad, wrapped in a robe, looks up from his phone. It's one of those clunky old square Blackberry phones that businessmen seem to prefer to more popular brands, and he sets it down on his desk with care before beginning the laborious process of plugging it into the charger. It is a fact of the universe that all dads are shitty at dealing with anything more technologically advanced than a lawnmower. "Excellent. Miss Harley has been making her attempts throughout the day, but I thought I would try a different approach."

John is just...confused. He stands in the middle of the study, rolling his eyes at the deck of playing cards left over on the bookshelf from one of his dad's old pranks, and scrambles to find his mental footing. "Jade? What has she been trying to -"

"John, we really need to talk about -"

...TR: is it time yet?

...TR: but i'm bored bored bored! :B

...TR: what do i care? i know all this stuff already!!! pchooooo!

When John wakes up, his head feels like it's full of fuzz, but at least the sensation is a familiar one. "You were trying to explain everything again, weren't you?" he says, touching a fingertip to the blood dribbling out of his nose. "Maybe we should just stop."
His dad is kneeling next to him, pressing his fingers to the pulse point in the crook of John's elbow with concern on his face. "This is the first time you've fainted in a long time," he murmurs, adjusting his hand so that he's gripping John for reassurance. "I was worried I'd triggered something worse than a spell of amnesia."

"Daaaaad!" John has way too much else wrong in his life to worry about this kind of stuff. There's just no more room in his brain for it. "You worry too much. It just feels like a headache to me. I'm fine."

"Hello, Fine," Samuel says with a perfectly straight face, "I'm Dad."

John groans and bangs his head backwards against the floor before sitting up. "That will never be funny, Dad. Urrrgh, I thought you were going to lecture me about Karkat, not make awful dad jokes..."

"Just trying to lighten the mood, son," his dad says, standing up with John and handing him a handkerchief to blot at his nose. "Never forget the classics!"

"Hardy har har," John says. "I think I'll stick to puns. But thanks for trying," he adds, wrinkling his nose at the dots of blood that come away on the cloth when he presses it to his nose. "I know you just want me to be well informed and stuff." About...whatever it was they were talking about. Bluh.

"Well, hopefully we can make some progress on that front in the future," Samuel sighs, walking behind his desk and shuffling through the papers strewn across the surface. "I have been speaking with Doctor Lalonde," he continues, holding up a sheet of printed paper full of fuchsia ink, flashing it too quickly for John to read the tiny print. "She is trying to put together a meeting with the others. However, such a meeting is meaningless if you can't hear what needs to be discussed without these debilitating side effects."

John's heart rate picks up, and he stares at that paper avidly, wishing he could reach out and flip it around to read it through. "Are you serious? But that would mean - me and Jade and Dave and Rose? All together in the same room?"

"That would be the idea," Samuel says, smiling. "Along with us guardians. I didn't know if it's safe for you to go, but on the other hand this may be an opportunity I had not thought we'd have again."

"So?" John didn't hear much beyond 'potential mass sleepover party including Jade and Dave and Rose and probably Karkat' and all the totally awesome shenanigans implied by that. He stares off into space, trying to picture it.

...It's fucking hilarious. He's not sure where they can obtain that much chocolate pudding or the key to the school's natatorium, but they'd be five super heroes all sitting around with presumably nothing to do and he's convinced that they can overcome these kinds of obstacles through the Power of Friendship.

His dad closes his eyes in sudden sadness, and John fidgets in his seat. "Forgotten again," Samuel murmurs, and then he focuses on John again. "She may be able to give us a better idea of what is going on with your mind when we attempt to discuss the Paradigm with you, though I would hate to have to resort to putting you through a neurological scan without knowing who could access the information." He holds up a hand to forestall John's automatic question, because what is he talking about? "Suffice to say whether we can trust the good Doctor fully or not, I don't think I can sleep through the night until we figure out why you can't remember this. We'll avoid neurological scans as much as possible, but we're cutting it rather close to the wire, here..."
"Sounds good," John agrees, because a tiny voice in his brain is shrieking something about paradoxes and nosebleeds, and he really doesn't want to bleed all over the carpet! He needs to keep it together! Keep this conversation on topic! Seriously, why do dads take so long to get to the point? "How did you know it was Karkat all along, by the way? What did I miss?"

His dad gives him a significant look, the kind that says, 'son, I would never call you dumb to your face because you are my favorite and only son, and yet the temptation remains.' Then he shakes his head. "They possessed a similar body type, though you would never know it from how many layers young Karkat wears - perhaps a deliberate ploy, in retrospect, to conceal the fact that his physical condition did not match up with his cover lifestyle. You always had swimming as an excuse. Karkat took a different approach. And there was also the fact that you fell into sync with him so easily, and became overprotective of Hemogoblin at a rate that did not match your exposure to him."

John's been thinking it, too. And he doesn't like it, because there's a difference in his mind between stupidity and accidentally-but-on-purpose stupidity, and he's starting to think this whole issue has partially been a case of the latter. "You're saying that the reason I wanted to be partner was because - what, I knew it was him? Like, subconsciously?"

"I'm saying that details of someone's body language - a person's walk or their facial expressions, for example - can easily slip beneath the conscious radar, but they are still a key aspect of how social beings identify with each other. And son, if you somehow didn't pick up on those cues, then I am quite willing to eat my favorite hat." He shrugs. "But on a conscious level, you were simply determined to take him under your wing, and who was I to question your judgment on such matters? He is, after all, your best friend. If pressing the matter would have risked your friendship, I - I couldn't do that. I couldn't see you hurt that way. And so I let the matter lie, and kept my suspicions to myself."

A good thing too - John can imagine what the past few months would have been like if he'd spent them constantly worried that Karkat and Hemogoblin were the same person, trying to discreetly investigate his own best friend's secrets with all the ensuing guilt turning his stomach. Finding out this way is almost a blessing - it's over and done, with no room for uncertainty or distrust to develop.

Still. John flops forward and thumps his head on the desk. A couple of glossy playing cards from the trick deck stick to his forehead.

"And no more tornadoes in the house, please!" Samuel shakes a finger at John in admonishment. "Three young heroes in one place, and suddenly it's a madhouse!"

"Aaaaaah! Yes sir!" John says, jolting upright and blushing furiously. He's been hoping he wouldn't get called out about the whole panic windstorm earlier, but he's man enough to admit that there's no way his dad would just let a loss of control like that go unmentioned. Extenuating circumstances or not, Samuel has always said that it's only one step from slipping up at home to slipping up at school, and none of them can afford that at this point! "It won't happen again, I promise!"

"Excellent." Samuel's smile is wide and knowing, with just a tinge of pride that makes John's spine straighten and helps him breathe easier. "I'm proud of you, son. I know you'll do what's best."

John hugs his dad hard, and then he scurries out of the study.

The door doesn't quite swing all the way shut behind him, and he loses his momentum the moment his bare foot hits the floor outside. John jerks to a halt, hesitates, and rubs his face with both hands. He breathes in through his nose and out through his mouth, shaky with relief.

That went...actually a lot better than expected. John gets the feeling something went over his head back there, but on the other hand, his dad hasn't been getting much sleep either, so maybe they're both a little delirious at this point.

The goal right now is to make it to Karkat before the bad thoughts hit again. He thinks he has the motivation to make it up the stairs if he pushes himself, if he just doesn't stop to think too hard. His feet feel like they're glued to the floor when he tries to take a step away from the door, but the breeze tugs at his sleeve a moment later, urging him along. He summons up the good humor to roll his eyes at it - he's been indulging it lately, and now the drafts and tiny winds that circulate throughout the house are all more active than usual. This is just the kind of unconscious slip in his power that his dad would want him to keep in check.

John hesitates when he reaches out for the core of his power though. He should just turn it down a notch. Not all the way, just enough that the breeze will stop hooking under his sleeves and around his calves to pull him toward the front door, and the promise of the open evening sky.

Longing squeezes him like a vice. John steps into the space between the living room and the front entrance, his eyes fixed on the window that shows the sky, streaked with the light of the late afternoon sun. Jade is quiet for once, asleep under the same four or five blankets John piled up on the couch so that not even a stray curl of her dark hair is visible, but John thinks she wouldn't be too difficult to convince to go flying with him. Heck, it's the kind-of random, kind-of dumb but also super fun adventure she'd be the one trying to talk him into! And they could stop at John's room and pick up Karkat -

Karkat, who is hurt.

That snaps John back into reality. Late night aerial acrobatics would hardly be in Karkat's best interests right now. He needs to sleep and heal even more than John does, and Karkat can barely manage a fitful, hour-long nap without the nightmares disrupting his sleep cycle.

He needs John to be there. And John has never known how to say no to that kind of thing with Karkat. With any of his loved ones, really.

But one last feeble gasp of air flutters his sleeve, with the same kind of instinct that always draws him towards potential crimes over Seattle. John bites his lip and wonders if maybe someone's house is being broken into or something nearby. That would explain a lot.

It couldn't hurt to check and see if he sees any suspicious activity going on in the street. Never mind that this suburb is so crime-deficient that the neighbors are barely willing to defy the homeowners' association - there's a first time for everything, right?

John crosses those last few steps to the front door before he can talk himself out of it, and he opens it.

What he sees doesn't make sense -
Until suddenly it makes way too much sense. He can practically hear the sharp crack that is his brain snapping in two, the pieces swinging around and trying to fit back together in a way that doesn't quite work.

He opens his mouth.

He doesn't bother to shut it, gaping.

Dave Strider is standing on his doorstep.

He has to repeat that: Dave is standing right in front of him.

Even then, his brain can't quite cope.

Dave raises an eyebrow, and waits. He fidgets, unable to stand still even with his hands tucked into his pockets, his shoulders working and his left foot tapping out a beat. When it becomes clear that John has lost upper brain functionality, the Flashstep shoves his sunglasses down his nose, exposing red eyes, and raises the other pale eyebrow to match the first. Then he pulls a phone out of his pocket and starts typing. In his pocket, John's phone begins to buzz and chime as Pesterchum struggles to handle Dave's rapidfire texting, and he takes his own phone out in a daze to read the messages.

TG: yo
TG: gonna invite me in TG: because im pretty sure there's some supernatural etiquette thing here
TG: no one as beautiful and alluring as me can cross the threshold of thine eggy abode until you have prepared everyone to avert their eyes from my true form
TG: don't want to blind your new twin or the dadbert that shit wouldn't be cool
TG: the sight of me has been known to inspire spontaneous religious conversion and burn unshielded eyes out of their sockets after all TG: why do you think I wear shades dude I could blind myself if I didn't take preca-

"Dave?" John whispers.

And yes, Dave is here. Dave, in a raggedy hoodie over stupidly skinny jeans, looking for all the world as though he just stepped out of his apartment for a couple of minutes to commit some random act of unfathomable coolness. He raises a hand, then yanks it back to hook a thumb in his pocket, his shoulders huddling defensively when John doesn't speak again - and somehow all John can think about is that last message almost a half hour ago, the one where Dave had said he'd 'be right there,' and how that hadn't made any sense whatsoever because Dave lives over two thousand miles away -

So John does the only sane thing he can do, the only sane thing that's really left after the day he's had. He tackles Dave Strider, hard enough that they both nearly fall over. Dave staggers and plants his feet with a grunt, and John does not let go.

"Oh my god, Dave," he manages to say, gulping hard around a lump in his throat. His chest hitches like his body can't decide whether breathing or swallowing or crying is supposed to be the priority here, so his next words come out raspy and breathy and it would be embarrassing but it's Dave. "Dave, what even - what - you're here? How?!!"

His phone buzzes in his hand, and his fingers are so occupied with digging into the back of Dave's hoodie that he almost fumbles and drops his phone on the ground. Dave raises a hand to pat him on the back with that clumsy, fluttering hesitancy that Dave has about physical contact as John reads the TG: im fucking time traveled yeah
TG: i just spent so many hours on a plane john t TG: its been like what an hour for you but i swear by poseidons left nipple i will enter the throes of starvation all over this lawn if i dont eat something
TG: i spent the last six hours living off body odor and peanuts
TG: feed me and then you can have your wicked way with me dammit

John's brain blanks out again. It's been doing that a lot lately. But really, on top of everything else that's happened today, how is he supposed to process this? How is he supposed to wrap his mind around the fact that Dave would travel halfway across the country at the drop of a hat like this?

Dave isn't Karkat, who John could totally picture raging his way on foot across most of North America to help John if they were ever separated, come hell or high water. Karkat is Karkat and he can achieve through sheer unmitigated ragelove what most people could only dream of doing. But Dave fits into the neat mental category of 'best hero brofriend from another state,' and nowhere in that description has John ever thought to add 'is likely to spontaneously show up on doorstep because I told him I'm having an emotional meltdown.' Like, that's not a thing that happens in real life!

So how did this happen? When did he find a friend like this? How the heck does he deserve someone like Dave? Because he really doesn't deserve this kind of friendship, not at all, and because John is still all messed up in the head, all the shit he's shoved into the dark corners pouring back into the gaping hole where his self-control used to be, that last thought is enough to send him tipping right back into stupid, sloppy, messy sobs.

Talk about déjà vu.

"I ca-han't believe you're here," John says, hiccuping and sobbing with each breath. "And I'm sorry - I'm - I'm so-horry, all those times I said you wer-weren't cool, because you are so cool, I - fuck -"-

Dave pats him on the back again, nodding sagely as he loses some of that rigid tension that gripped him when John took him by surprise.

TG: well lets be fair
TG: my levels of cool are pretty unreal
TG: but now you accept it and have attained enlightenment welcome to the brotherhood

John hiccups one last time, reading that message on the screen. Typical Dave.

Then he frowns, because why is he reading it, again? "Dave? Dave, why do you keep texting me? You're standing right here…"

TG: uh
TG: about that

"John?" John's dad must have heard the door open, because his voice, full of caution and a steely veneer of normalcy, contains a note of fatherly concern and comes from right behind John. "John, who is this?" he asks. "A...new friend from school?"

John's body locks up, and he peels himself off Dave so fast that he does drop his phone and bangs his chin on Dave's shoulder hard when he looks down. Dave catches the phone though, so fast that his hand is a blur as he swipes it midfall and hands it back to John without moving another muscle. John's got sticky tear tracks all down the front of his face, and he can't quite look his dad in the eye as he wheels around to face him. Samuel stands there, all of six feet and a few spare inches in his robe, his blond eyebrows arched high enough in disbelief that they would give Dave's eyebrows a run for their money. "Hey, uh - he's," John says coherently. He wipes at his nose, sniffling so loud it's humiliating, and then has to wipe at his whole face again before his brain clicks back into gear. "This is. This is Dave, Dad. Dave, uh, Dave Strider. Yeah."

Dave raises a single hand in greeting, a salute that falls short into a two-fingered wave. He types something on his phone, sending it to John on Pesterchum by the vibrating in John's hand, but he then holds up the screen for both John and his dad to read right out of the app itself. Which is really getting kind of old, but maybe it's some kind of obscure irony thing for Dave. John could totally picture Dave kneeling before his turntables and swearing an oath of monastic silence while visiting another person's house for the sake of his own weird, jackass sense of humor.

TG: yo mr eb
TG: sup

"Dave Strider," Samuel repeats, closing his eyes and pinching the bridge of his nose. "I see. This is...John? John, what is going on?" He sounds almost on the verge of fatherly hysteria. It's the kind of tone that heralds a stony silence and the purchase of a single red-lined box of befouled cake mix from the supermarket. "Have you invited another hero into our house?"

John is basically wondering the same thing, so he has no idea what to say to head off the impending Betty Crockpocalypse. Instead, he panics, and starts flailing his arms around, gesturing anywhere from Dave to the phone in his hand to the general direction of Houston, in an effort to underscore his stammering explanation. "You see - uh - I was kind of freaking out about Karkat - you know already know that, yeah, I know - but uh - after the whole tornado thing -"

TG: oh jfc what the hell did i miss TG: its worse than i thought

"- I was talking to Rose, and then Dave too. No, not talking, I mean, messaging them on Pesterchum, and I was -" John stops and swallows, his mouth dry as he gulps repeatedly. His dad is still standing motionless, his mouth slightly parted with bewilderment. John can only imagine he looks like a total maniac right now which is probably not helping. At all.

"It helped," John stresses at last, stifling another sob that threatens to rise up. "It helps, talking to them, with everything that gets all dumb and blah in my head and then Dave said something - I don't know, but I didn't think he'd actually come, which is why I didn't tell you - I'm sorry -"

Samuel waves with a hand, motioning for him to quiet down, and John's jaw snaps shut. He can hear the faint wheezes of his breath, all disordered and hiccupy again, and he seriously wishes Dave wasn't here to witness this. His self control is so shot, John's surprised he hasn't woken Jade up with all the racket, yet. "I see. So in essence, young Mr Strider here...invited himself over."

"Kinda."

"From Houston."

"Yup."

A warm shoulder presses along the back of John's. Dave doesn't look at him, inscrutable behind his shades as he lifts his chin to survey Samuel Egbert. But he still doesn't say anything.

TG: you got it mr eb
TG: sorry about the short notice and shit i guess TG: but my duty as a solemnly sworn bro of john kicked in TG: since it seems like you guys are in crisis mode here
TG: i am here to help
TG: and be like TG: the opposite of a problem
TG: hell yeah

Reading this string of words takes even longer, particularly when Samuel squints and has to lean in further, clearly more used to reading off a screen with a larger font size, starting over from the top and mouthing the words to himself without a sound. John hovers on the tips of his toes, tension stringing him up along every bone, not even the faint pressure of Dave's arm enough to calm his nerves before he bursts out, at last, "Dave, what - why are you typing everything? I mean, what's going on?"

Dave steps back. His flat demeanor breaks as a deep grimace creases his face, and he looks down at his shoes while typing, stabbing the keyboard with his thumbs and using a little more force than before. John and his dad exchange glances, and John gives a tiny shrug to Samuel's quirked eyebrow. When he's finished, Dave tosses the phone to John and steps onto the doorstep, teetering on the slightly raised metal threshold and looking off to one side.

TG: yeah i was totes going to mention that TG: at the opportune moment and all TG: which would be
TG: now
TG: i guess
TG: uh
TG: i cant
TG: i cant talk

They haven't exactly been quiet, but apparently Jade may be preternaturally excitable and energetic while awake, but after she falls asleep it would take a thermonuclear bomb detonating in the back yard to rouse her. The curled up, blanket-covered lump on the couch breathes steadily and shows no sign of waking up as John's dad relocates them into the study. Again.

"Let her get some sleep," Samuel Egbert says softly, closing the door behind them. "Now, what on earth is going on here? John, is Karkat still awake upstairs?"

"Don't know," John admits; even when he feels for the air circulating in the house around them, Karkat's breathing is unusually short and shallow because of his ribs, so it's hard to tell. Hopefully he's at least trying to fall asleep by now.

Dave doesn't sit when John's dad gestures to one of the chairs by his desk. Instead, he stands stiff and frozen with his shoulders hunched up next to John. He can probably sense the stern interrogation they're about to face; his elbow jostles John's and digs into his ribs as they rearrange themselves.

The revelation that Dave is mute only complicates things further. The empty space around his neck where that collar used to be looks weirdly naked, now that John has noticed the absence.

"And what brings you all the way to Seattle, Mr Strider?" Samuel asks, champing down on an unlit pipe. His pale blue eyes are sharp and assessing, with none of the familial concern he shows around Karkat and, more recently, Jade. This is hero business, as far as John's dad knows, pure and simple, and any hero business that intrudes on John's personal life is something to be treated with suspicion and caution. "Or do you prefer Flashstep, in this instance?"

The fact that Samuel isn't aware of the extent of how deeply intertwined Dave is John's and not Heir's mental health is...probably John's fault. The gap between them yawns open, because this, all of this - Dave and John's dad and the depression and the lack of communication and the running away - is what created that massive hole between him and his dad in the first place. John cringes.

Dave raises one hand near the middle of his torso and shrugs, slashing his hand to the side dismissively. Meanwhile, his other hand is typing up a storm, and John shows his dad the screen.

TG: nah i barely even call myself flashstep
TG: just dave man mr strider is my brother/father
TG: goddamn genes and biology man
TG: that shit is messed up yo
TG: wait
TG: oh shit
TG: should i not be swearing
TG: shit
TG: i mean
TG: oh man

"If I can somehow survive Karkat without my ears burning, I think I can handle a little profanity on your part, Dave," Samuel says with good humor, smiling. "Let us just stay focused on the matter at hand. Does your brother know you are here? I had wondered, when he asked us earlier if we'd heard from you -"

He points a hard stare at John, and John winces. Ohhh man. He hadn't even put two and two together during their chat with the Puppeteer. At the end of it, Bro Strider had asked if they'd heard anything from Dave, but John hadn't exactly been in the most functional state of mind at the time. He hadn't thought - well, he just hadn't thought Dave's text had any meaning. He'd underestimated the mundane utility of time powers, he supposes. He'd severely underestimated Dave's impulsiveness and determination when it came to their friendship.

Dave just shifts his weight from one foot to the other, shrugging.

TG: oh heck no
TG: i had to take off before he could stop me
TG: not like we had anything major going on down there anyway
TG: if he told you some bs about me needing to be down there hes so bluffing
TG: i was twiddling my thumbs or whatever
TG: so i flew up and then turned on my phone to see what time i sent these messages that im sending rn TG: to know exactly when to go back to TG: viola instatime loop just add time powers

And John remembers with a sudden flinch that no, actually, Bro probably had a very good, very damning reason not to want Dave running around anywhere in Seattle.

Diamonds Droog.

If she'd been the one to try to kidnap him as a kid, and if Dave's been plagued in Houston by more amateur Crew members trying to track him down and targeting other Daves who vaguely resemble him -
Then what's to stop Droog from picking up where she left off?

From the worried glint in Samuel Egbert's eye, this entire line of thinking occurred to him waaaay before John got his shit together.

John closes his eyes, and chalks up another fuck up that's entirely his own fault. Yet another of his friends has walked right into what could turn out to be a massive death trap because John hecked up.

"We appreciate the offer of assistance. Truly, we do." Samuel pauses, rubbing his thumb along the rim of his desk, and appears to mull over his next few words, choosing them with obvious care. "More than that, I...appreciate what you have done for John. Not just now, but...in the past, as well. In many ways, you have been there for him when I could not." He shakes his head. "But I don't know that you should be here, particularly if your guardian feels it is not safe."

John facepalms. His dad knows nothing about Dave's weird relationship with his brother/father/hero partner, after all; no way he would have known what insinuating that Dave obeys orders from Bro could lead to. Dave's posture freezes up, and he starts typing in pissed-off mode again. John reads over his shoulder this time, so he sees Dave ranting in real time. The other hero types so fast his fingers blur, and even when he backspaces to replace a swear here and there it happens so fast John can only just catch the original word before it vanishes, steamrollered by Dave's texting savvy.

TG: what no
TG: what has bro said to you
TG: trust me the guy is just obnoxious and doing this on purpose because he overreacts to shit like this TG: like trust me i have seen this guy sit back and drink orange juice straight out of a jug while watching me run through a death puppet gauntlet and rating dodges out of ten
TG: who even does that i mean what the hell other people might have wanted to drink that juice
TG: wait
TG: this is not the point
TG: the point is fuck that guy
TG: he doesnt own me and safety is generally the last thing on his mind

"Be that as it may," Samuel interrupts when it becomes clear that Dave will just keep typing regardless, "Diamonds Droog is not someone to mess around with. I agree that you children are stronger together, and in theory having more heroes in such a concentrated area would mean a lot more potential strategies for dealing with Droog's brand of villainy. But according to your brother, she was responsible for a kidnapping attempt on you when you were a child." Dave twitches, but his poker face doesn't express enough to tell John if it's surprise about the kidnapping thing itself, or about Samuel being aware of the attempt at all. "If I were to allow you to venture near her, knowing what I know...I could never forgive myself as a guardian for allowing one of my son's closest friends to walk into such a risky situation."

"I don't want to see you hurt, too," John rasps, barely above a whisper, but he knows Dave hears him. The mere thought of Dave being beaten or taken by Diamonds Droog is...not acceptable. A perfect nightmare that threatens to swallow John whole. He can picture it all too easily; he has memories of New York to draw on, after all, and the panic of trying to keep an unconscious Flashstep away from the Horrorterror's grasping reach still makes John wake in a sweat in the middle of the night.

But Dave's stoic mask is firmly in place - there's a witness around, after all - so John can't read anything but that faked, flat indifference. The gears are turning in Dave's head, but John can already guess what the other hero's response will be.
TG: serious business huh
TG: well bring it on TG: this crazy ladys been messing with my bros diamondbro
TG: thats like basically extended family there
TG: and anyone who makes john cry is a fucking dick

They could have tried other arguments. Three or four fragments of potential arguments rattle around in John's head, any one of which might be good for talking Dave out of this. John is so excited Dave is here, don't get him wrong! But in an ideal world Dave would stay here and be safe and so would Karkat and okay, maybe Jade too, and no one would go anywhere near the Midnight Crew ever again. It would be entirely impractical, but what the heck.

They don't get the chance.

The door slams open and the books on the shelves rattle as a voice starts babbling from the doorway. "Okay, Mr Egbert, I didn't want to interrupt but you've had John in here for like -"

John and Dave turn at the same time to see who Samuel is raising an eyebrow at.

Karkat jerks to a halt with his foot still poised to barge into the study.

It only takes two seconds. And then -

"You," Karkat hisses, his eyes bulging.

Because Dave...let's be honest, Dave has never made the effort to keep his identity a secret. And Karkat is just as familiar with heroes as John, if not more so.

Dave arches an eyebrow, his chin jutting out in a silent and yet abrasive acknowledgement.

Oh man. This is going to end so badly.

"...Oh, no fucking way," Karkat continues, slowly gripping his hair in his hands. John takes a hasty step toward him, hands spread out, but Karkat just lets out a high pitched whine. "You insufferable shithead. You're here?!!"

"Now, Karkat," Samuel begins, in a cautious tone. John can see Dave already flipping his phone in his hand, head tilted to the side to consider Karkat with an unwavering, shielded stare. Then he shrugs dismissively, and starts texting. Karkat yelps as his phone starts to buzz and chime, and he slaps at his pockets several times before digging his phone out, his eyes alight with fury. John just leans over and reads off Dave's screen, since the messages weren't sent to him.

TG: hell yeah i am
TG: greetings angry windbag troll this is your god speaking TG: recently descended from on high to help solve all of your problems and avenge your honor
TG: hold your applause

Karkat puts a claw up against the side of the doorway, one bright red eye twitching with increasing fervor as he scrolls down the screen. "Why are you here?" he demands through gritted teeth. "Oh my god, what is this, some massive fruity rumpus asshole party at chateau Egbert and everyone and their barkbeast is invited?!!"

TG: funny enough
TG: i did not bring a dog
TG: i brought a dragon
"What."

TG: jk jk

"Karkat, why are you even up and walking?" John intervenes. He elbows Dave in the side, hard, because Dave is smirking like butter couldn't melt in his mouth and that means he's antagonizing Karkat on purpose. Again. Dave doesn't even bother to dodge it; he just takes the hit and keeps smirking. These two are both so dumb. "Oh my god, did you get down the stairs by yourself?!

Karkat rolls his eyes and folds his arms of his chest, grimacing. "Obviously, John, come on, I'm standing right the fuck in front of you -"

"Nooo!" John charges forward and starts fussing over Karkat. He looks exhausted, and John feels a stab of guilt at the thought that if he'd just been paying more attention, maybe he'd have noticed Karkat moving around upstairs and doing risky dumb stuff like this! "Oh man! What if you fell or something?"

It works to distract Karkat, which is kind of the point. John doesn't like to think about how good he's become at calming Karkat down. The troll grunts, swaying on his feet as John pouts at him. "I'm injured, not fucking incapable, John. I'm fine, you worrying dumbass." Then he levels an evil eye at Dave. "So. It's come to this. You've come to make this personal, you incredibly condescending sack of shit?"

Dave rubs his temples.

TG: what
TG: the fuck
TG: are you talking about

"Karkat." John's dad has a nice fake, strained smile on his face, one that John recognizes because that's where he learned it from, and his voice is full of jovial false cheer. "I didn't know you knew Dave as well! Is there some...conflict between the two of you?"

Karkat snarls, with a faint click in the back of his throat that does not sound soothing. "This asshole has been talking to John! About *feelings!"

John freezes up.

Oh.

Ooooh shit.

Dave and Karkat had both given the impression that their argument had been about stupid things like Dave been an ironic jackass and Karkat being a sleep-deprived jackass right back. But Karkat is basically hardwired to associate feelings with feelings jams, and that is territory that Karkat would actually have a right, in his own mind, to get fucking pissed about.

Which makes John pouring out all his terror and depression and shit to Rose and Dave while Karkat was unconscious kind of -

Oh, shit.

John...John might actually be the asshole here. Again. A wave of nausea rolls through his stomach and he has to stumble away from Karkat. The only person who sees his face is his dad when John turns to swallow back bile and look at anything other than Karkat and Dave. Samuel Egbert glances at John again sharply, but John gives a curt shake of his head, stemming any potential questions. He tries to say later with just his eyes, and he and his dad know each other's expressions well enough that Samuel subsides, eyes flickering back to the two heroes squaring off in the middle of his study with a guarded look.

TG: not this again
TG: someone really needs to talk to you about your paranoia bro this is unreal
TG: feelings are just feelings man you're allowed to mention them
TG: like yo i feel kind of shitty today
TG: and then the other person is like hey that sucks
TG: and that is not romantic and therefore not stepping all over your mad diamond turf that is just human brotalk
TG: okay

"I don't know what the fuck brotalk is, and I highly suspect that you're making it up! And stop that!" Karkat shoves his phone back in his pocket, pissed. "What the fuck, just talk - or are you too high and mighty to say this shit to my face, fuckcrumpet?!"

And oh man, Dave's lips tighten and he actually lets a frown through his poker face, which means Karkat has hit a nerve. John, who is once again struggling not to fly off the handle of sanity, scrambles and tries to gesture at Karkat with charades to not mention the talking thing oh shit too late. Karkat just eyeballs him uncomprehendingly, and throws up his claws with an infuriated snarl when his phone starts ringing again.

TG: oh my god you bitter jackoff
TG: i give you points for fuckcrumpet that is hilarious
TG: but
TG: i cant fucking talk im fucking mute
TG: congratulations here let me help you introduce your foot to your mouth

Dave takes a step forward. John would be entirely unsurprised if the guy tried to grab Karkat in a chokehold and, like, suplex him or something to try and manhandle his foot into his mouth. That's exactly the kind of weirdass thing Striders try to pull in the name of irony.

He needs to control the situation. Even with his head spinning and his heart sick. Control, darn it, control. "He didn't know, Dave," John says, stepping between them. Dave tips his head forward in a tiny nod, rolling his eyes at the right angle so that John can see it over his shades, and then sighs heavily, taking a step back.

"You've talked before," Karkat adds, accusation and disbelief dripping off his words as he folds his arms. "You just fucking ramble and mumble to yourself and refuse to shut up half the time, this is like a fact of the internet forums. I know heroes, and I know Flashstep can talk. If you're trying to annoy me, it's working!"

TG: yeah well im having technological difficulties
TG: now stop being all pissy
TG: i feel bad having to retaliate when you look like you're about to pass out all over this floor man
TG: so out of respect for the egberts lets not be enormous dickwads

"The only one who'll pass out is you when I finish kicking your ass for showing up to rub your flagrant passes at my partner in my face!" Karkat is wheezing now, hard enough that he presses a claw to his chest in pain. There's a flush in his cheeks, but it's the opposite of healthy against the pallor of his skin, and he looks ready to either cry ragetears or throw a chair - or a convenient Dave - out the window. "If you think the way to kick off a rivalry with someone is by having feeling jams "Karkat," John hisses. He wraps his arms around Karkat neck, not daring to grab him near the ribs, and yanks the troll into a cooldown hug. Karkat's chest heaves in panicky, rage-meltdown snarls, but John buries his nose in the crook of Karkat's neck and whispers, "Shoosh," against his feverish skin.

The change is immediate. The quality of Karkat breathing shifts from yell-enabling but pained gulps to abrupt, hiccupping sobs. Hiccupping Karkat is always good, because it's some kind of instinctive wriggler thing that helps trolls calm down when they're panicking and freaking out, and it means Karkat's trying to calm down. Which is, like, half the battle right there. John stands there holding Karkat and nudges at the troll's feet until they turn slightly. This way, if Karkat is to open his eyes, he'll be looking at the wall and not at Dave or John's dad, neither of whom really need to see this. Once John spies Dave, though, he raises his head and starts flailing his hand around, trying to communicate that everyone needs to calm down right now.

And finally, finally, Dave seems to pick up on the fact that he needs to tone it down. He nods slowly, and starts typing again. Maybe John's frantic charades are working! Karkat grunts but doesn't scream or anything when his phone beeps, and he's slow to raise the hand with the phone in it.

TG: okay my bad
TG: no tears dude just let it out TG: youre okay man like TG: john is right there
TG: hugging on you and not on me
TG: though i can come over there and we can totally all hug this out together -

Karkat shrieks. John yelps as a set of claws digs into his back. "MY HATE FOR YOU WILL OUTLAST THE HEAT DEATH OF THE UNIVERSE!!" Karkat then dissolves into incoherent, mumbled but still audible mutters that sound a lot like, "mthrfrkkingerfukcufkkfuckerfak," which is Karkat-speak for, "oh dear, I have fucked up. I fucked up. I made a terrible mistake." Or so John thinks.

"Oh, good lord," Samuel Egbert mutters at his desk, his head sinking into his hands.

Dave flinches back, looking vaguely horrified, with both hands up in protest.

TG: no stop
TG: no no i said no hate square stuff and i meant it
TG: look dont you have other perfectly willing targets for your harshnasty troll ragelust thing TG: this is like a statistical sciencey fact only like -2% of humans are down for that TG: why me
TG: oh god do you have a human kink
TG: first john and now me
TG: please tell me thats not a thing

...Or maybe Dave is just a dick. John reaches over and holds down the power button on Karkat's phone until it shuts down, and then he covers Karkat's eyes with a hand to make him stop glaring at Dave. Okay, maybe he mostly just mashes his palm across Karkat's face in general, but the attempt is made. Shooshpapping at its finest.

Thankfully, John thinks he's got this whole mess back under control. Or at least, Karkat doesn't start yelling again. He quivers in John's arms with barely repressed anger, smoothing fingers over the pinpricks where he nicked John with his claws, but John's not exactly having to hold him back from tearing into Dave, either. When Karkat peels himself off John, wavering on his feet and hiccupping angrily, he makes a deliberate effort to not look at Dave, just looks at his feet; John can't see the troll's expression from here, but at least the ragefit seems to have died down. "You good?" he asks.

A fond grin pulls weakly on Karkat's mouth in spite of his still wrinkled brows, a smile that makes him look stupidly adorable. "I'm too fucking tired for this shit. Amazing." He shakes his head, then winces, his teeth tugging at his lip as he wraps an arm around his middle. "Ow. I think I fucking pulled something..."

"Wait, seriously?!"

"No. I just yelled too loud." Karkat's face grows distant with horror, as he pokes at his ribs. "Oh god. I can't yell. Fucking fuck, John, who...what am I if I can't yell?!"

John claps a hand on Karkat's shoulder, smiling sympathetically. "Doomed forever."

"That smile is the opposite of reassuring, you know that?"

Dave gives a thumbs up. John's phone starts going off in his pocket, but he resolves not to show any incoming messages to Karkat unless they've undergone a thorough review for the sake of everyone's continued sanity. He can't even imagine what the neighbors think by now, what with all the yelling going on. How the heck has Jade slept through all this and not burst in to make everything ten times more chaotic?

"Dad? We're all going to sleep now," John says. He is taking charge here, like the awesome friend leader that he is, because clearly otherwise nothing is going to get done around here and as long as he's distracting himself with radiating good vibes for both Karkat and Dave to pick up on, he's not thinking about - other things.

"That would...probably be for the best," his dad replies wearily. He looks as tired as John feels, and resigned to having his house invaded by teenagers. "If Dave would like something to eat after that trip, don't forget to grab him something from the kitchen. Please, please, try not to wake up Miss Harley?"

"Will do."

"He can get his own food," Karkat mumbles. John rolls his eyes, hooks his arm through Karkat's, and drags him out into the hall. It's also to make sure he has a grip on Karkat in the event the troll has a dizzy spell or something, but for the sake of Karkat's pride and because Dave would never let him live it down, he tries to be discreet about it.

"Shhhhh," John says absently, tiptoeing past the couch where Jade sleeps, and motions Dave along in front of him. The other hero nods, on tiptoes as well, and they all three sneak into the kitchen without Karkat trying to kill Dave. Dreams can come true. He checks his phone and starts answering Dave so he isn't a totally awful host on top of everything else.

TG: crisis averted
EB: yeah, for now.
TG: something else up with you two TG: because that kind of overreaction cannot be good for that guys heart
TG: like damn son
EB: i don’t know…
EB: it’s kind of just his basic personality, but made worse because he's in pain and tired and stuff?
EB: we've had a rough few weeks.
TG: tell me about it man
EB: but yeah, we have a lot of leftovers in the fridge that you can eat.
EB: the microwave is kind of loud though, it might wake jade up

Dave is at the fridge faster than John can track with his eyes. Oh jeez. His dad is gonna be sooo mad.

TG: oh my god
EB: what.
TG: food
EB: ...yep. :O
EB: shocking, i know.
TG: shut up i live in some kind of hovel obviously TG: you have apple juice oh thank you john bless you

Dave removes the apple juice container from the fridge and sets the whole thing on the counter. He twists off the cap with a sharp crack, holds the jug in both hands, and upends it into his mouth.

And just...keeps drinking.

It just keeps happening.

John feels his jaw drop, and when he looks at Karkat he can see the same awe and morbid fascination there.

Dave chugs an entire jug of apple juice without pausing for air. When the container is empty, he sets it back down on the counter, wiping his mouth.

"Wow," John says reverently.

"You're fucking kidding me," Karkat says.

Dave stares Karkat dead in the eye, and John looks at the next text. He hastily shoves the phone out of sight when Karkat tries to snarl and sneak a peek at it, because no, they are not arguing without a door between them and Jade.

TG: this is TG: AN EXTREME THIRST
EB: omg dave no
TG: show it to him come on TG: you have no idea how annoying this not being able to talk thing is TG: i swear it was not this bad being mute before TG: come onnnn
EB: no! :/
EB: get some food and let's go!
TG: chill give me a second

Dave tosses the drained juice container into the trash can, which John thinks is amazingly considerate of him considering what the Strider apartment usually looks like when it comes to hording things. Then he shuffles back over to the fridge and starts cracking open tupperware containers full of leftovers.

TG: so what's up with you and the troll
TG: he's up and moving so he's recovering already EB: blood powers apparently come in useful!
EB: but his ribs are busted up, and there's nothing he can do to heal that faster.
EB: he just wouldn't wake up and i worried he had a concussion, it freaked me out so bad…
TG: well we can shove him in a slime coon thing to heal and then talk
TG: would avoid another bitchfit
TG: because idgaf about the moirail thing hes too tired and shit to help you here
TG: that or youre just not telling him about it
TG: because you think hes too hurt to handle it TG: and youre taking one for the team like the dumbass you are EB: um…
TG: called it
TG: yeah were gonna talk kid
TG: holy shit you have TG: okay i have no idea what the hell this is TG: but it looks hella delicious
EB: i'm pretty sure that's stir-fry.
EB: like beef and vegetables and stuff.

Dave opens the tupperware lip a little wider, and sniffs at the food inside. John figures this is a survival mechanism born of growing up in a home where the fridge doubles as a sword storage closet and weeks-old pizza is a staple of one's diet. But apparently the stir-fry meets Dave's standards. He straightens up and kicks the fridge closed with a foot, clutching the food to his chest.

TG: mine now

"Do I want to know what he's saying?" Karkat asks disdainfully.

TG: you cant see it but i am projecting a massive telepathic middle finger in his general direction
TG: tell himmm

John looks up from his phone. "He was asking about the beef stir fry."

"If you think I can't tell you're censoring him, you are dead wrong."

John opens the drawer with the cutlery and passes Dave a fork. The other human inspects it like it's a foreign object, and then sticks it into the beef to bring upstairs with him.

TG: awesome food acquired TG: alright now im going the fuck to sleep too because airplane sleep is not real sleep
TG: its lies and misery

"Yeah, sure," John says aloud. "Uh, but, we're going to need to dig out more blankets and find somewhere for you to sleep. Since somehow we ended up with three extra people in the house..."

TG: its fine
TG: i dont take up much space
TG: just like put me in a corner or something

"Whaat?!! No, Dave, that would be rude!" John scratches at his hair. His eyes feel heavy and gritty and he is so ready for bed. "You can probably fit on my bed with me if you don't mind it, and that way we don't have to bug Jade or anything."

...Jade. Something in John's mind flickers. Something about Jade...

"I mind," Karkat growls.

"- and we can have like a wall of pillows between us," John offers weakly. "Like, an indestructible wall of Jericho!"

No, really, why isn't Jade awake right now? John throws a crooked frown at the back of the couch, which is all he can see right now.

TG: this is just hilarious
TG: seriously its wrapped all the way around from stupid to infuriating and right back to hilarious

"That would be...acceptable." Karkat eyes Dave with distrust. "I'm watching you, human."

TG: oh thats it
TG: hes asking for it

Dave slings an arm around John's neck, smirk out in full force.

With a smothered yell, Karkat lunges at them. John seizes them both by the collar, reaching out with unfailing accuracy to drag them apart as far as his arms can stretch.

But even as Dave starts making rapid hand signs that John doesn't know (but which are probably obscene) and Karkat tries to squirm out of his grip, John can't focus on their squabbling. He's feeling out the circulation of air in the house, his head tilted to the side as he does a mental headcount. Karkat's breathing is shallow and rapid, Dave's is low and steady but hoarse, his dad's is a familiar cycle, and on the couch Jade's...

That's not Jade's breathing. There's no way John is mistaking it, either, not with how similar Jade's breathing patterns are to his own. In fact, that feels like -

"Stop it, you guys!" he says, too loudly and maybe desperately. Karkat and Dave both look at him, equally guilty, and John holds his finger to his mouth. He lets go of Karkat, and nods his head toward the living room. Both of them stare, at a loss. John sighs and strides over to the couch. When he looks down, the pile of blankets is motionless, but now that he examines it properly, it's obvious that the curled up lump is too small to be Jade.

He yanks back the blankets, and his suspicions are confirmed. WV is curled up around a pillow that has been torn up and disemboweled by curious, questing claws, and is apparently so deeply asleep that the carapacian doesn't register the pile being dismantled.

Jade is gone, and she left WV to make it seem like she was still here.

"Daaaaad!" John yells at last. A faint crash comes from the study, and when his dad emerges, looking harassed and a little crazy-eyed, John just points at the sleeping carapacian. "Uh. Jade and Bec are missing."

At least, he thinks Bec is gone. He can't imagine Jade going anywhere without the weird wolf by her side, but since John isn't entirely sure the animal breathes, he can't tell if it's in the house or not.

And he can already guess where Jade will have gone. Gosh, no wonder she didn't wake up and interrupt all these weird goings on.

While they've all been running around like a bunch of chickens with their heads cut off, she's gone looking for Diamonds Droog by herself.

...Oh, come on!

"Dad," John says, hesitantly. "We're not getting to sleep tonight, are we?"
Samuel Egbert stares. He closes his eyes. And then he strides into the kitchen, opens the cupboard over the fridge, and sets a large bottle of wine on the counter.

"And to think, I told Rue I'd never drink this," he says.

Today has been kinda weird.

Usually Jade is totally on board with weird. Weird things and events are so interesting to investigate, after all! But today’s weird was not fun at all.

Because people getting hurt is not awesome. Karkat might be a shouty butt in and out of costume, but even if Jade kind of wants to kick his ass when he acts all pointlessly angry and rude, she wouldn't want to see him bleeding out like that. If he didn't have those neat blood powers, he might have been dead before she and John came back to rescue him, and that's too close a call for comfort. It's all too easy for Jade's science brain to extrapolate twenty different ways Diamonds could have killed him on that rooftop. All the mobster would have had to do was crush his skull, really, same as any other human or troll on the planet, and he'd have been done. They seriously underestimated that lady, Jade included, and Karkat paid for their overconfidence. It makes Jade's stomach all twisty and sick with guilt, and so even when Karkat tries to draw her into a proper argument, she can't get the image of his battered face out of her head.

Of course, arguing seems to make Karkat feel better, so go figure. She lets him yell at her, rolling her eyes inwardly a few times, but lets him get it out of his system.

And then there's the whole secret identity thing - again, weird, but not the good kind of weird. Jade is still flummoxed as to how John could have missed something so obvious (duh, John, come on!), but it's clearly bummering him out; all day long he's been antsy and barely talking and staring at his phone, for most of the time that Karkat was unconscious. But even after Karkat woke up, John was tooottally spaced out and lost in his moody little world whenever he wasn't busy trying to soothe Karkat or deflect Jade's questions. He's been shaken up, bad, and Jade hates to see her brother so broken up and sad!

So there's no harm in Jade just tracking Diamonds down, right? The faster they catch Diamonds, the sooner Karkat will be safe and John will be secure and confident and happy again, and justice will have been served. Everything about that plan seems to check out okay! Perfectly logical!

So she snags WV from under John's bed remotely, shushes him through the ensuing fit of green fire and squeaking protests, and tucks the carapacian into the couch bed when John hauls Karkat upstairs. WV is tired from running around the house all day and entertaining himself in the basement while John paced around Karkat's 'coon. Jade had made herself scarce by working out down there when it became clear John needed time to himself, and even gotten some sleep, so it's not like she's completely stupid and sleep-deprived when she teleports out of the Egbert house and into the sky over Seattle. Just a little gross, because she sort of forgot to shower in all that angsty karate practice and emergency medical care and recooperacoon relocation - and a lot determined to make Diamonds pay for messing with her little bro and his best troll friend. She swaps her bodysuit for one that's a dark red with the pinpricks and swirls of a galactic nebula worked into the fabric, and goes to work.

There are a little over six hundred thousand people who live in Seattle. That's the census number, the rough estimate that doesn't take into account tourists, visiting relatives, commuters, the homeless, and the illegal. Compared to some of the massive cities Jade has visited, Seattle is teeny tiny. Hong Kong, Tokyo, Manila, Moscow, Istanbul - Jade has passed through all of them as Sharpshooter,
But she's never tried anything like this before. Looking for John was one thing, because John had powers that made it easier for her to narrow down her senses. But Diamonds Droog is a normal person! Well, apparently she's suuuuper strong and stuff, but she can't fly or anything - or at least Jade really hopes she can't! And that means Droog is just one moving body among hundreds of thousands of other bodies according to Jade's sense of the space around her. It's sooo frustrating!

But Grandpa always says that you need to be patient while hunting your prize, and he had like a bajillion years of experience hunting down poachers in Africa to go off of, so he obviously knew what he was talking about! And when in doubt, always start at the scene of the crime!

She's kind of mixing her metaphors here, but who cares! Humming to herself, Jade bounces across the rooftops of downtown Seattle in bursts of green. Bec appears at intervals whenever she stops to deal with some illicit activity in progress, watches eyelessly from above as she floats an old man and his shopping cart full of worldly belongings over a busy street. It's still early enough in the evening that cars are crammed in the streets and messing up intersections as the drivers try to leave the city after a long day, and the old man waves at her with a bemused expression as Jade bounces off again, and Bec vanishes from its perch on the lightpole.

Bec, sadly, is not a hunting dog. It could probably search the entire city if she asked it to, but she's not entirely certain it understands much more than coordinates and very simple directions, so asking Bec to look for a single specific person among thousands might just confuse it, or make it flop over and go to sleep on her for being a troublesome human.

After reaching the rooftop where Karkat got all beat up, Jade decides to try it anyway. "Hey boy? Can you take me to Diamonds? Diamonds Droog?" she asks, pitching her voice high to get the wolf's attention. "Yeah? You remember her? You know where she is?"

Bec's ears perk up and it looks at her avidly, head cocked to the side - and then it rolls over, tongue lolling from its jaws with a trickle of bright green drool as it wags its tail.

Jade smacks her face, and then sighs, stooping to scratch Becquerel's belly with both hands. So much for that plan.

Instead, she surveys the rooftop and the surrounding area, her lips a moue of contemplation. The wreckage of the building that Diamonds blew up last night to get their attention and distract them from Hemogoblin is visible in the cool evening light, a blackened, fragmented shell covered in scorch marks and shattered windows that Jade barely recognizes from the outside when it's not a bonfire. She wonders what the news has been reporting about that, vaguely - it's not like the police would be aware that there's yet more organized crime activity behind this recent spate of arson, not when neither she nor John has gotten around to telling them in all the hubbub.

Beneath her shoes the roof is too clean. When they teleported out of here yesterday, Karkat had been bleeding all over the place - it had been kind of gross, to be honest. But Jade digs her toe into the gravel and frowns, kneeling beside Bec and patting its belly one last time before putting her nose right to the ground. Her nostrils flare as the rank scent of bleach stings her nose. She turns on the UV filter setting after a moment, but other than a few faint shadows, the stains she can make out aren't nearly large or fresh enough to account for the total curbstomp that occurred last night.

Either Diamonds cleaned up, or by sheer coincidence someone else totally drenched this place with bleach for fun. Jade is betting on the first one. They even raked over the gravel so none of the footprints from the struggle remain. She can't imagine a classy lady like Diamonds getting on her hands and knees to scrub this entire roof down, so she must have had her goons do it for her to hide any evidence she was ever there.
Wow! Organized crime sure is organized! She shakes her head and runs a mental scan over the dimensions of the roof, trying to pick up on any tiny object or paper that might have fallen out of a pocket or been dropped by a Crew member last night that she could use to try to track them down. She doesn't need much to work with, just a little -

Jade twitches, and opens her eyes. She stares over at the far corner of the roof, where the knee-high wall that runs the edge of the building as a guard overhangs slightly and forms a sneaky niche. The pale moonlight isn’t enough, so Jade raises a hand and lets energy gather around her hand to light up the night. The light reflects off something in the shadows, and reveals three dark shapes tucked into the recess. Jade darts over and scoops the items up, flopping down cross-legged with her back against the guard wall and setting them in her lap for inspection. There is a thin-bladed knife with a dark wooden hilt, one which has been lovingly oiled and sharpened but also appears to be well used: tiny notches mar the blade and the hilt, crumbling blood flecks cover the edge, and a groove has worn into the wood where a thumb would rest. Her light reflected off the blade, Jade thinks, and she sets it aside, hesitating only to touch a finger to the small spades symbol carved into the base of the hilt.

The second item is familiar. Jade inhales sharply, and lifts up the familiar round, khaki-colored pith helmet. When she spins it in her hand and runs a thumb along the brim, she can make out the faint green letters stitched haphazardly into the cloth covering. It used to be a faded, greyish tan, but Grandpa had her help him redye it with tea, and for a moment it almost feels like Jade is back at the sink, standing on a stool next to him and giggling as the pith bobbed and dipped in the murky brown water, the scent of earl grey filling the humid tropical air. For camouflage and for luck, he'd said, and pressed a kiss to the crown of her head.

Grandpa has been here.

...Gosh! It's been so long since he died and implanted his brain in the robot body and gone off on his mission, Jade can hardly remember the last time they spoke! For a long time now Jade has simply been used to thinking of him as dead, tending to the taxidermied remains of his human body in the living room and hearing his voice only through mechanical recordings and by imagining his presence, reading aloud the many notes and files and training regimens he left for her to raise herself on in his absence and pretending to have loud mock conversations and strifes with his unmoving body. And maybe, as the years dragged on without word from him, her hope had worn thin and she had even begun to think with a pang that his robot body might be dead, too, and his human brain along with it.

But she'd never been sure, and that margin of uncertainty had always given her hope that somewhere along the way, her own world-spanning adventure would cross paths with his mysterious venture. That his hat should appear now, after so many years of silence, can only be a deliberate sign from him, left for her to discover! Excited, her heart thrumming, Jade eagerly unfolds the third item, a crumpled up note written on heavy paper, which Jade smoothes out and sets on her knee to read, Grandpa's helmet perched at an angle on her hair.

The note seems to have been written on some kind of thick parchment, yellowed and musty, but the ink is a pale, vibrant pink that's she's pretty sure came out of a sparkly gel pen. Jade's heart sinks a little, and she sighs, because that is definitely not Grandpa's handwriting or his signature ink color. Smoothing one of the creases through the middle of the page, Jade reads it anyway, hoping for a clue.

My dear,
I hope you have been well! I couldn't reach you myself, so I asked this kind fellow to deliver this to you! You are always running around in those scruffy clothes, so I thought a nice warm sweater would keep you warm even if it gets chilly! I made it with all the love in my heart!

Unfortunately, I no longer reside in Проспeт; do not look for me there. Our benefactor had to be prematurely evacuated from the premises when someone named Diamonds Droog came asking a few intrusive questions. It was all quite exciting!

I'm quite safe where I am, though, never fear. I can take care of myself for the time being, with the hints of the future that our benefactor shared guiding me, but I worry that it may be some time before we see each other again. The item that you left in my care is well hidden, too, and shall remain so as long as you wish me to keep it so. May it draw you back to me soon - I miss you quite terribly.

Remember, be polite, and try not to stab people who haven't consented to it! We're working on the indiscriminate bloodshed, remember?

Yours, always,

MS Paint

Huh! Jade turns the paper over in her hands, but the back side is blank.

She doesn't think the letter is intended for her, and judging by the crumpled state of the parchment, it has passed through quite a few trials along the way to its intended unnamed recipient. For all Jade knows, it could have been Diamonds Droog herself who dropped it - which would be quite a find! - but she doesn't think that a criminal as professional as Diamonds would have left this pile of very convenient items just lying around for anyone to find, in such an obvious hiding place. No, she's sure Grandpa is behind this! But she can't figure out why he would have left someone else's message and not one of his own. Could it be a code? Cryptanalysis has never not been her strong point, even though Grandpa always insisted a plucky adventurer should always have a simple secret algorithm memorized for emergencies. She'd had more of a head for chemistry and physics and weapons than for code breaking.

Buuut…Jade squints. She touches a finger to the parchment, running it over the light, faint pink cursive and tracing the shape of the letters with her fingertip. There's something - off. There are bumps in the parchment where there should be indentations, and at one point, in the middle of the word 'MP: benefactor,' a sharp groove presses through from the other side, almost deep enough to have scratched through the paper. It's almost as though someone had written something else on top of this letter, and the indentations from the other note have marked up this one.

Or…

Jade smiles, turning the parchment over once more, and raises her hand to her glasses to switch the UV sensitive filter back on. Green ink fluoresces under her gaze, and suddenly the entire back side of the note is covered in a wide, heavy-handed scrawl.

Grandpa knows her so well! Behold, the power of science!

The strokes for 't's and 'k's in particular dig into the page so deeply that she can see why the other side of the paper felt so bumpy and out of sorts. Each straight line strikes a deep mark in the parchment, as though it took real effort to get the pen to move as the writer intended. The handwriting is familiar but not quite the same, with more strikethroughs and blotches of ink than she's used to from reading Grandpa's files.
Well, it has been years since Grandpa died. She's not surprised his replacement robot body hasn't worked out all the kinks yet!

Right-o, my girl! I've piggybacked on this little correspondence of the MP's - she's assured me she could give two figs about it. Just wanted to let you know that I've kept up with all of your ripsnorting, capital adventures, and I'm very impressed! However, I have been meaning to inquire- are you certain that you can't lay your paws on a gun with a slightly higher caliber? It always worries me to no end when you leave the house without appropriately devastating armaments!

There are quite a few feisty felons running about this town who need to be given a good thumping, but I can't stay long. The Midnight Crew know me as Lieutenant Bailey, and I have been a prickly pear in their side for quite some time - it would not do for the Lady Droog to catch wind that I've popped by for a visit. I'll drop by to see you tomorrow, for through my robotic travails I have uncovered several outstanding mysteries that require further elbow grease and gumption to sort out, and have reconnected with a friend long thought dead.

I'd ask you to keep mum about this little note around young John and his guardian, for the moment. Samuel has always seemed like a gent worth his salt, but he's no Jo, and I think old Joanna would have a few choice words for him on the matter of how he's raised that boy.

It's taken real chutzpah for you to have made it this far, and I couldn't be more proud! I know you'll continue to use sound judgment as you grow into a strong, independent hero!

Lands' sakes alive, is that the time?

James Harley, Esq.

Jade crushes the letter to her chest, beaming. Grandpa hasn't changed a bit! She's so happy she could explode. She tucks the letter into her sylladex for safekeeping, and cartwheels over to Bec in midair, humming. "Grandpa's okay, boy!" she informs Bec delightedly, floating upside down and scratching its belly one last time. "Hurray! Get excited!"

Becquerel, surprisingly enough, manages to rouse itself from its lollygagging and rolls back onto all fours, the gravel of the roof pinging off its fur in tiny pricks of green light. Its ears perk right up, and Jade thinks it might actually be as excited to hear from Grandpa as she is. Bec's never really shown much attachment to anyone but Jade, but Grandpa is the one who designed the wolf and gave it life to protect and guard Jade. Surely Bec would at least show a spark of interest in that?

Then Bec's ears flatten back against its skull, and a rumbling growl rises in its chest. Jade frowns and scritches behind the wolf's shoulders, leaning her face forward to press against its fur. Meanwhile, without letting it show outwardly, she casts out her senses, feeling out the rooftops and the sky around her.

Bec's just gone into warning mode. Something's up, but Jade can't tell what it is. She captchalogues the knife and the helmet and stores them neatly away in her pocket dimension, and then flings back her arms in a stretch, clasping one wrist with the other hand. "Welp, back to work!" she says chipperly. She can't sense anything, but it's got to be there. Perhaps another orbital missile?

But a missile coming down on a major city? That would be seriously bad news! "Boy, can you lock on the problem for me, so I can move it?" she suggests in an undertone, still scanning the skies.

"Fetch, boy? You wanna play fetch? You have to show me what we're playing with?"

Bec whines and rises up on all fours, sharp white claws digging into the gravel and slicing through the roof itself like a warm knife through butter. Jade flinches back, startled, as Bec whines and growls while staring up at her, kneading the ground with its claws with its fur coat standing up on end with static electricity. Something is wrong, wrong, wrong.

And then the wolf barks.

And that's when Jade realizes it's not staring at her.

Bec's staring at something behind her.

The stairwell door clicks open, and it is only then that Jade realizes she never thought to check inside the building beneath her feet. It's still too early and there are too many people still at work, and she’d dismissed the possibility of being able to distinguish a threat among the office workers. But she could have - and should have - noticed the motion of someone sauntering up the stairs to reach the roof.

She whips a riflekind out of her sylladex and holds it at the ready, but her eyes widen as she sees the person who emerges from within the building.

Diamonds Droog is in a completely different outfit from last night - which makes sense, considering how much of Karkat's blood got all over that thing. Her suit has a skirt now that cuts off perfectly just above her knees. Instead of a white tie, she has knotted a short white scarf around her neck and tucked the ends into the front of her suit jacket, but the hat atop her head is cocked at the same jaunty angle as before; if she replaced it, the new one is identical to the last.

Sharpshooter recovers, though. She'd thought hunting down Diamonds would eat up most of the night, but apparently the villains are just coming to her, today! "Just the person I was looking for!" Sharpshooter announces, planting her hands on her hips. "You really did a number on one of my new friends, you know!" Because yeah, Karkat is shouty and dumb, but he's also John's moirail thingy, so she has an obligation to have his back.

"And you are the girl who has been leading Clubs a merry chase from one side of the Atlantic to the other," Diamonds returns, sliding her hands into her pockets and shrugging. "Admittedly, he isn't the most intelligent when it comes to tactics, but tracking you down still ate up valuable time and money that should have been better applied to more viable operations."

"Well, he should have just left me alone, darn it!" Sharpshooter says, rolling her eyes. "I never messed with you guys until he shot a missile at me! That was him, wasn't it?"

She nudges Bec with her foot. The wolf stopped freaking out when Jade finally noticed the threat at hand, but it's still on the alert, vibrating with the force of the growl emanating from deep in its chest. She might need its help to get out of here. She'd only wanted to track Diamonds down, not provoke an actual confrontation without backup, but this…

This feels like Diamonds was waiting for one of them to show up! How suspicious!

Diamonds sighs heavily. "Don't remind me. I don't know who keeps giving him clearance for that. I have begun to think our employer just finds him entertaining. It's the only explanation." Her eyes narrow, and she steps forward. Bec's growls increase in intensity, but the mobster starts drifting around in a wide arc rather than drawing nearer to the hero. Sharpshooter takes a step back, to keep a safe distance away, but then she stands her ground. She doesn't know what this confrontation is all about, but she's sure gonna try to get more out of Diamonds about her goals for mucking about in John's city before high-tailing it!

"I, on the other hand, have no intention of doing such a thing," Diamonds continues, offering an insincere, simpering smile as she slides the toe of her black high heels through the gravel. "I find my own hand-picked agents to be far more effective at accomplishing tasks than unloading a giant robot and pointing it at the nearest target."

Privately, Jade is disappointed. Giant robots are always a totally appropriate answer. "That's cool, I guess," she says aloud. "If that's your thing, and all. You're still a bad guy who wants to commit crimes and stuff, so whatever!" With that in mind, she decides to at least try to catch this lady. She levels her rifle specibus at the woman, mentally slotting rubber bullets into the chambers because she's not taking any chances here. "But, um, it would also be pretty awesome if you just surrendered right now!"

That spark of hope that maybe, just this once, asking politely might actually work, flickers out as Diamonds raises an eyebrow. "Such a simple life you must lead." Diamonds sighs. "Does it even concern you how I knew you had returned here?"

Sharpshooter bristles. Mentally, she's just sorting through her internal record of all the junk she keeps in her sylladex, and trying to recollect if she has some kind of recording device on her or not. If she could get a tape of Diamonds confessing to something illegal, that would go a long way towards getting a dangerous woman like this behind bars. "Not really! After all, I came looking for you!" She grins. "If you were really so smart, you wouldn't be here at all."

Diamonds blinks, and then resumes her pacing. It does not escape Jade's notice that occasionally the woman takes the time to pause and trace a tiny diamond in the gravel with the sharp, dark metal of her heel - like a tiny, compulsive calling card that she sweeps over with her toe on the next pass. "Don't really see the point of carrying the thing myself - that's why I've got my people."

When that vague, completely confusing statement just makes Sharpshooter frown with confusion, Diamonds elaborates. "Balls! How much more clear do I need to be? We can still track your powers, girl."

...Ohhh noooo! Ack! Oh gosh! Sharpshooter fumbles her rifle, horrified, as her mind flies back to all those times she floated around the Egbert house. The times she teleported in and out of the bathroom to bug John or used the sylladex to change her clothes on the fly.

She'd been worried about drawing Clubs down on John's head, but the moment she actually found John she stopped worrying about that tracking device completely! Oh man, she messed up!

Her silence must be explanation enough for the Crew boss, who pinches the bridge of her nose as she shakes her head. "Unbelievable. You passed into an area rank with void interference and we lost track of you, yes, but the moment you returned to the city itself the sensors detected your antics at once."

"Why, though?!" Sharpshooter still isn't getting it. At least it sounds like John's house is hidden, somehow. "Why are you guys so obsessed with us heroes? Why would you and Clubs even have that kind of space energy tracking stuff - that's just really weirdly specific and creepy!"

Diamonds gives a sharp bark of laughter, tossing her head back to expose the dark, slim curve of her throat and prominent Adam's apple. Everything about her movements are careful and deliberately elegant, as though the woman has practiced them so thoroughly that she can maintain perfect poise and dignity even when the wind picks up a little and flutters the brim of her classy hat and the hem of her skirt. It's all in stark contrast to the blood-covered figure standing over Hemogoblin's broken form Sharpshooter can still picture in her mind's eye. She can't let herself forget how paper-thin Diamonds's façade of reasonable sanity is.

"You're my employer's obsession, not mine, I can assure you of that!" Diamonds replies at last, derision heavy in her voice. "But money is money, and he pays me handsomely whether the mission concerns my usual duties or more eclectic ventures, like this one." She rolls her eyes. "Incredible, really. I have spy networks that cover two thirds of the world, I recently orchestrated the failure of not one, not two, but three proposed bills by kidnapping the daughter of a key member of the US Senate - and somehow, this is the work that the boss has for me." Diamonds unfolds the scarf from around her neck and proceeds to retie it, obsessively smoothing the pale fabric into place. "When I must deal with crime fighters, I at least prefer to deal with those who can pose a significant challenge to my business. You children aren't exactly hard to dupe. One little explosion and you quite lose your heads!"

Just like that, Sharpshooter understands. "You wanted Hemogoblin on his own," she breathes. "You set that fire deliberately so Heir and I would be busy and couldn't help him out."

The woman gives a tiny, mocking bow. "Right on the money, kid. I have multiple on-going missions. Unlike Clubs, I am capable of multitasking, and dealing with your blood friend was only a secondary goal," Diamonds says smoothly. "My boss wanted me to see what the troll was capable of. Done. Heir's interference in Hearts' attempts at setting up operations here in Seattle remains an on-going issue - but you'll notice that Heir is not here right now." She spreads her hands wide, spinning to gesture to the city at large. "While he deals with his partner's injuries my operatives are hard at work finishing the job that Hearts started. Done and done."

When she turns back to Sharpshooter, her expression has reworked itself into a flat mask again. "But you. He promised me you would not unduly hinder my plans. Yet here you stand."

"Well, that sucks, lady, because unduly hindering evil plans is right up my alley!" Sharpshooter hooks a thumb at her chest, thumping it. "You're not getting away with eeeeevil! Even if Heir is on standby, I won't just stand by and let you get away with it!"

"Hmph. Don't worry your imbecilic little head about that." Diamonds cracks a small, cruel grin, throwing it over her shoulder as she pivots on a heel with a careless toss of her hair. "You should be far more worried about how I intend to deal with you."

Sharpshooter tightens her finger on the trigger and flicks on the targeting scope on her goggles with a twitch of power, just in case she has to start dodging all over the place and needs the assistance. "You could try to deal with me, lady!" she fires back, her hair crackling around her with the build up on energy. At her side, Bec presses in close, all of its protective instincts on overdrive.

"You see, I don't bother with flashy missiles or giant robots. When I come across a blood knight with a healing factor, I seek out the chinks that the healing does not cover. When I see a space manipulating warrior, I am capable of recognizing that brute force will solve nothing." Back and forth Diamonds paces. Back and forth, back and forth, but never coming closer. Always maintaining those yards of space between them. It feels deliberate, and it's making Sharpshooter's skin crawl, but she can't pinpoint why. "Do you really think I would simply stand around here and talk shop with a child who has been interfering with the Crew's plans? Do you really think I monologue without a purpose?"

This is all super ominous, and Sharpshooter does not like it one bit. "Uhhhh," she says, dragging the syllable out as she tries to think up a not-stupid answer. Come on, think Jade, think! "Uh, you seem...pretty chatty…"

Diamonds just sighs, shaking her head. "No, you silly child. I am a distraction."

And with that, something sharp and thin stabs into the side of Sharpshooter's neck. She yelps, clapping her hand around the spot, and yanks the offending object out of her flesh.
It's a tiny feathered dart, of the kind Jade has used herself to tranq criminals or rogue lusii, streamlined and silvery with a flawless balance. Grandpa drilled her on the different types of ammunition and such, so she can identify without further inspection that this is one of the long-range type of capsules, the slim ones with the percussion cap to give it that extra oomph when depressing the syringe and injecting the sedatives. The tip is slightly bent from her careless yank, however, and when she flicks it open with fumbling fingers, a faint roar that sounds like an ocean washing through her ears, she sees that the cartridge within has been fully emptied. She raises a hand again, and finds the tiny hole over her jugular. This tranquilizer is heading straight for her brain.

That is...an impossibly good shot. And Diamonds distracted her so thoroughly, Sharpshooter never even felt the tiny spatial displacement of the dart flying at her.

...Dang!

When she glances up, disbelieving, Diamonds has a finger pressed to her ear, head cocked to the side as she listens to someone else through an ear piece. "No, that will do, Marlowe. You may dismiss her. Thank you for your assistance."

Sharpshooter staggers. At her side, Bec whimpers, confused. Maybe if the dart had been aimed at it, the wolf would have teleported them both away from it, or let the attack pass harmlessly through the glowing transporting matrix of its gut. But its just not intelligent enough to have seen this coming. "You tranq'd me," Sharpshooter says aloud, still not quite processing this. I mean, talk about role reversal! "Why? Why'd you do that? What..."

Diamonds steps toward Sharpshooter at last, crossing that invisible line she had set for herself all this time. "The boss swore I would get to take Spades Slick captive on this mission. He got away yesterday with the help of that blasted robotic lieutenant -"

Grandpa!

"- but I have a tracking device on him now. Slick is only a momentary annoyance, a thorn in my side, and once he is captured I have no interest in him." None of this is answering Sharpshooter's question, so Jade pulls a few choice faces - or at least she thinks she does, but her face has gone kind of numb. Judging by the grimace of distaste that creases Diamonds's face, she gets her dam point across! "But there have been live capture orders out on you since England. Clubs had the commission first, but he's otherwise occupied right now. And if you so kindly place yourself in my way, why not indulge in a good old fashioned kidnapping?" Diamonds's expression can no longer be called a grin; she's gone feral, her eyes distant with some insane satisfaction. "It is one of the few pleasures I have in life. I shall deliver you to the boss man, and it shall be one more successful capture to my name."

Oh wow. Oh jeez, this all sounds really bad! Jade grabs the side of her head, wishing it would stop throbbing. It doesn't hurt, exactly, but everything is layered in a dense, cool fog that slows down all of her thoughts and when she takes a step backward the whole world spins, rotating on its axis in a way that twists her sense of space into a nauseous blur. She couldn't bounce out of here even if she tried.

But. But, but, but. She laughs, her head spinning, and falls to her knees. "You forgot one thing," Jade says. Her tongue feels thick and heavy in her mouth, a dead weight that barely responds by flopping around to imitate the noises of the English language.

Diamonds leans in closer, her smile condescending and bored in equal measure. "And that would be...?"
"You forgot my dog, you monologuing bitch." Jade spits, and through the miracles of space magic, it zaps across the intervening air between them to slap against Diamonds's cheek. "Bec! Evac, boy!"

Teeth clamp down on the back of Jade's collar, and the world dissolves into molten green. Bec doesn't release her until, with a crash, they reappear. A gust of night air catches Jade as she grabs a railing for support, and she shivers, looking out over the city.

They're nowhere near the burned building anymore, according to her fritzing internal GPS, and for a heart-stopping moment she wonders if Bec has teleported her all the way to a new city - after all the time and effort that went toward actually making it to Seattle in the first place! But through the blurring smear of her rapidly dwindling vision, the skyline is still familiar. Uh. At least she thinks so! It's kiiinda hard to tell.

"What do you think was up with that, Bec?" Jade's head is full of clouds, poofy and cottony and surprisingly heavy. When Bec releases its grip on her collar she slumps backward from the railing, jolting forward with surprise when her head hits the ground sooner than her befuddled mind anticipates. "Oh no! Oh manerlglll..."

Her head flops back against the new roof, and moving it, even to try and shake herself awake, feels like it would require a massive effort. Her muscles are way too tingly and heavy and slow to rouse herself from the impending chemical nap. This is so sucky! Thinking is getting harder to manage, but Jade wonders if she can mumble out one last order to have Bec take her back to John, or vice versa. They need to get to someplace less exposed than this random rooftop, but she...where...sleep just sounds really...urgggggh...

...And what is that totally obnoxious 'whub whub whub' cutting through the air? "Berce?" she manages, one eye drifting open. The wolf, oblivious to the fact that its human's nap is not normal, lies down and tucks its nose under her chin. "Noooot helpin'."

The sky overhead is grainy and dark, swirling around in very sick-making patterns, and she has to close her eye again before she actually does get sick. She groans and somehow rolls over onto her side. That expends the last of her energy, but at least she won't choke on her own vomit or something dumb like that. What a way to die that would be...

Whub whub whub whub whub

"Stoooooppit," she drawls. It doesn't work; whatever is making that noise stubbornly continues to make itself heard, which is just plain rude when she's about three seconds from passing out. Mainland people can be so inconsiderate.

Something in the back of her mind clicks, and Jade's eyes pop wide open.

A helicopter circles overhead. The blades whirring overhead could have belonged to any one of the emergency or news choppers over the city, but this one is carrying something low under its belly as it slowly edges over the roof, and there can be no mistake - it's so close to her that the noise becomes an ear-wrecking drone and her hair starts flying everywhere. For one delirious moment, Jade is sure it's going to land on her, that maybe Bec teleported them to some hospital's landing pad without noticing the danger.

Then, with a crash, the object attached to the underside of the helicopter disengaged and slams down on the roof around them, four barred walls that hum almost as loud as the helicopter rotor.
It's a cage.

They can track her and Bec's space powers, and Diamonds has been planning this for...who knows how long…

That is seriously something she needs to remember...next time…

Jade can't stay conscious anymore. Her eyes roll back and the darkness eats up everything around her.

She passes out with Becquerel's fading growl rumbling against her back.

Robin Marlowe waits for the floor of the cage to slide into place, and then nods for the tech to retract back up under the chopper. After the pilot has angled the chopper back toward back, Marlowe switches the frequency of his noise-cancelling headphones until he's back on his Lady's line, and tells her the good news. "Ma'am? We have her. And her little dog, too."

The reply is immediate. "Excellent work, Marlowe. Bring them in."

The unmitigated satisfaction that suffuses Marlowe's system just from hearing that is uncanny. Winning Diamonds Droog's approval is an honor; disappointing her, unthinkable. He's only been in Lady Droog's service for a few months, and it's unlike working for any other employer. There aren't many wholly discreet employers who offer pension plans to ex-Interpol operatives bold enough to advertise with promises of kidnapping, undercover operations, and blackmail, but then, the Lady doesn't advertise - she recruits. Marlowe isn't entirely sure what would have happened if he'd refused her (very generous) offer, but she'd come to his door in person, so it would no doubt have been bloody.

He can't remember feeling this loyal to any other employer before. But he can't complain, would never dream of it, because sure, the work he does is unorthodox - for example, he'd been given standing orders to remain in this helicopter over the course of the next few days, waiting to give the signal to a sniper half his age in the event the space witch were to show up - but it's fulfilling. He's no stranger to travel, but over the past few weeks he's covered more ground with the Lady than he ever did over years in Interpol. There's certainly never a dull moment in the business of criminal enterprise.

Nominally, he's down for tax records as a personal assistant to a nonexistent PR executive. He's not sure in what universe his Lady's work counts as public relations, but he'll make whatever excuses he needs to keep working for her.

"But keep the Scratch girl away from her," the Lady continues, her words sharp and clipped. Marlowe can make out the faint tap of her heels on concrete in the background, and knows she'll be on the move. "I don't want the two of them interacting in any way, shape, or form. Bring the cage to base and then escort the Scratch to her exit vehicle. I can trust you to handle this?"

"Of course." The call ends with a heavy clunk before he finishes the last word, but that's alright. He has his orders. And hell, anything that isn't sitting in forced silence next to a teen sniper for days at a time is fine in his books.

"You're heading back after this," he tells the sniper sitting across from him at a diagonal. "It should only be a few minutes, and we'll have you back to the drop point."

"And so the fieldtrip ends. Lmfao," the girl slurs, slumping back in her seat and sprawling out, her legs splayed apart and her Needler rifle kind across her lap. "Les' just ship me back off to Dullsville, amiright?"

"Your services are appreciated," Marlowe says, but the girl just sighs and flings herself in another direction, resting her face on her gloved knuckles with a cheek poofed out. He shifts uncomfortably in his seat; he never had children, let alone a teenage daughter, and decides that managing the sulk of a mob sniper doesn't fall under his jurisdiction.

His Lady doesn't like the Scratches. Something about 'pretentions' and 'needless complication' and 'comic books.' It seems to be the principle of the thing, rather than any particular complaint about the quality of their work.

But this one in particular rubs her the wrong way. Marlowe only knows the girl's code name, Ranger Dras-ifeth, a language he isn't familiar with and which no one has offered to explain. But when the girl arrived at Droog's quarters insisting on "jusht Ranger, y'know," it became clear why she would offend the Lady's sensibilities. Ranger is one hell of a shot or the Lady would never have requisitioned her services to take out a sniper hero, but she wanders about in a state of affected, perpetual tipsiness, though Marlowe would swear up and down that the girl hasn't had a sip of anything vaguely alcoholic since they entered this chopper.

Faked or not, this kind of sloppiness is exactly the sort of slovenly behavior that grates on the nerves of a dignified lady like Diamonds Droog, and Marlowe feels obligated as her subordinate to disapprove of the girl as well.

The girl kicks her feet up as she rocks forward, her eyes flashing behind the black mask across her eyes. "Hey. Omg, dude, I just had the best idea. Lemme go out and talk to 'er!"

"Wha - no!" Marlowe replies, startled. The very thought of disobeying the Lady's order sends a bolt of agony through his brain, and he has to remind himself, shakily, that the Scratch girl hadn't been tuned in to hear his Lady's orders. It's a suggestion born of ignorance, not deliberate rebellion. He removes his hand from the pistol kind in his shoulder holster and reasserts himself. "Lady Droog was quite clear - you are not to interact with the prisoner in any way." He can't help adding, in a pained rush, "Why would you even suggest such a thing? You took down your mark. That was your job. There is no need for further interaction with her after that."

"I knooowww~" Ranger draws out the word, pouting and lolling her head back on the shoulder rest. She's almost managed to completely twist herself free of the safety restraints. She fiddles with the extra sniper scope attached to the rectangular barrel of her strife specibus, an oddly anxious expression twisting her sugar pink lips. "'n I feel kinda shitty about it! Like, c'mon, I'm not all fronting in your secret-y secret mission territory, but she was just standin' there, bein' all goofy and sciency. And I shot her! What's up with that? I mean, I don' wanna over-cerebralize it like Cogs but it's kind of a dick move?? Maybe??"

"You were following orders," Marlowe says. He can feel a migraine coming. "As long as you continue to follow orders, there is no issue."

"She's prob'ly down for the next few hours, anyway." The girl sighs. "It'd be like talking to nobody. Aw well, whatev. It was just a thought." She fidgets for a few minutes, until Marlowe is fooled into believing that perhaps they can go back to a tolerable, mutual silence. "Think I can grab a snack or something before I have to call it a night? They haven't let me out in ages!"

Marlowe stares at her unblinking, brilliant pink eyes, and the accompanying hopeful grin. He reaches up, shaking his head in silence, and flips the settings on his headphones until he's off the channel that the Scratch shares, before settling himself in with a wary eye cast out the window of the helicopter.
keep an eye out for potential aerial assaults.

His service under the Lady Droog includes many and sundry responsibilities.

Dealing with teenage villains is not one of them.

-Los Angeles-

After they generate a couple hundred or so angels, Eridan gets bored.

He's not built for this kind of sustained, obsessive thing, alright? He has other interests. Big plans. Not just wavin' his claws around so that Mal can cackle while it chews on some random asshole's brain and strings its victims out into acid-white angels.

Meanwhile, Eridan is over here, hanging out in the endless tangles of an all-knowing hivemind. And somehow…

Bored as fuck.

Eventually, he poses the best question anyone has ever asked, ever. "ωωȠςɿΗης," he complains, "ԲՑɿՈՍ-, We promised you a stunning sight, to prove that I'm your ruler!"

It takes a few tries. There are a lot of needless voices screaming in the chorus that is Malā’ikah, and Eridan's throat is hoarse before the attention of the horde centers itself on him. Privately, Eridan thinks Mal could be overdue for a hive trimming, because this shit is fuckin' ridiculous. He's the one whose body they're all using; shouldn't he be the one in charge of this? It's downright inconsiderate. Unconscionable is what it is.

But he gulps, and repeats the question, and finally the rest of the voices in this muddle pull their shit together to give him a straight answer.

"Ես պիչից մի քանի աստիճան գործունեություն, որոնք պայքար ունեն միջին համարը." We promised you a stunning sight, to prove that I'm your ruler!

They drop the newest angel in the middle of its transformation sequence, and Eridan watches with oozing black eyes as the human wretch falls out of the sky and into one of the lakes of grimlight that Mal has been spitting all over the damn place. Inwardly, Eridan might feel a twinge of minor guilt.

Like. A tiny one. Absolutely fuckin' miniscule, you understand. Not one that the rest of Mal listens to, anyway. High on a rush of power unlike anything he's been able to muster in his entire pathetic life, a lot of Mal's ideas about how to take command of his own mini empire had sounded like pretty legitimate plans.

Now he's...not so sure. They're hovering in the sky over LA, the dome sobbing and oozing acid over their heads, so thick that Eridan can't even tell by looking if it's day or night anymore. An angel soars past them, all smooth white limbs and sleek wings fanned out to beat through the dead, stagnant air.

But. Here's the thing. Eridan can remember making that one. He remembers how Mal reached out - how he reached out - and spread out the troll's skin in long, thin sails, twisted her legs together into a single snake-like tail, and then poured grimwhite like candle wax over her broken form until all the burns and melted flesh vanished under a smooth façade. Mal swallowed her up into the hivemind, and then she was off, a pair of wings in the service of the hivemind and its Prince.
...It's unsettling', okay? He's starting to not-like it, in a skin-prickling way that makes him squirm inwardly.

But the rest of Mal is kind of gung-ho about this whole 'snatch and assimilate' thing, whereas Eridan had kinda been under the impression they'd still, you know, have people to rule over when all this nonsense was done. 'The hivemind sighs, murmuring, 'Art e not the angel's we care at e to get them to support the se in your dream's?"

The thing is, when Eridan asks what angels - when he sifts through all the tangled knots and webs of Mal's hivemind complex - he can't find these angels they babble about. Like there are some things in this supposedly mutual partnership he's being kept out of the loop on. When he thinks about those messy few weeks after Fef left and he went off his meds, inviting in the hallucinations and madness of dementia, it's all a blur of angst and fury.

But he thinks he remembers something about killing angels. He remembers that distinctly, because Mal was the one who said it. He killed them all - but Mal survived? Mal wasn't an angel? Mal was an angel, but not the same kind as the ones Eridan slaughtered?

He doesn't understand. His tiny little portion of the hindmind cracks and spins and crazes, but it can't produce an explanation that makes logical sense. "Somewhere in this is better than not to know," Mal whispers, which is just about as far from reassuring as it gets.

Eridan isn't getting the whole story here. And to be honest, that, more than anything else in this weird, kind of fucked up situation, is scaring the hell out of him.

Because if he can't trust the symphony of horrors and voices he's impulsively invited to share his brain and body in a moment of rampant cold-blooded lunacy, he is royally boned.

B-but hey, maybe now that he can chat Mal up about the obvious perks of reconstructing this whole city in a more aesthetically pleasing image, and suggest the possibility of ruling over the lowbloods and humans with a shining fist (as opposed to EATING THEM ALL, FUCK), the rest of the chorus will catch on to the fact that he's not exactly down with this, and they can get back to ruling an empire that still has live people in it to subjugate an' bring Eridan tribute an' shit.

So Eridan throws all of his power behind this new venture, clawing up a thread of white-hot power from the diamond in the center of his chest and feeding it through to Mal so the angels can work their magic. The dark tar that drips from his mouth drools down the front of his shirt as Mal raises their hands, and the grimlight slathering the streets of LA rises up in sheets of slimey white. The hivemind showers the broken, fragmented shells of the buildings that Eridan shattered earlier in his power high, and greedily strips away the imperfections in the stone and brickwork and roofing until a glossy shell coats most of downtown Los Angeles. It eats through to the very structural supports of the building, and molds them in the image that springs forth, fully formed, into Eridan's mind.

They twist their one hand into a fist, and squeeze. The grimlight coating shatters, and cracks, falling away to reveal the shining castles and courts underneath.

Everything is a vision in monochrome, the contrast between black stone and hot white light lighting up the grey twilight of the dome. Eridan has always had kind of a thing for architecture, particularly as it pertains to rulers and kings and empires, and he can see the medieval theme is strong here. The moats run thick with pools of grimwhite, corbels curl out from the underside of balconies and battlements in tight whorls, and stone palisades spring up like road blocks around each grandiose castle, decorated with traceries of light like wings. Open arches form chains of columns around the ground floor of each outer wall, surrounding arcades floored with flat black stone, and the towers above reach up almost as high as Eridan's current altitude. From here he can see every empty courtyard where there used to be a parking lot. Skyscrapers, office buildings - all of it refitted into a black and white field of castles.

It's all unspeakably familiar, but Eridan can't think why. It pings something in him he can't deny, and he bares his teeth in a grin, urging them down from their hovering position to land on one of the battlements. "ωωίςύδήληνκιήμυ" he demands, laughing.

"I'm... I'm glorious, ye s." The wings on his back fold in, and the twining tendrils of Mal's grimlight aura wrap themselves around a nearby turret to raise up their body onto a higher peak. "It p'lea ses
'you, a n'd s'o w'e a' r'e pl'ea s'e c'q." A'il i's we'l.

Awesome. So Mal is down with the castle thing. Maybe Eridan can talk it into some kind of totally fuckin' badass throne, too. That should occupy for a little while longer, yeah? Like - like a floating throne or something. And then obviously they need some kind of water complex too, because he is a seadweller and he deserves good things like a medieval water fortress.

And if he can just keep Mal thinking along those lines, maybe -

Mal freezes, and when the hivemind jerks to a halt, Eridan's thoughts are roughly tuned back into the chorus. It bewilders him for a moment, like a splash of ice cold water across the face, colder than his blood, and all he can do while his individual personality sinks into the damp is let Mal think for him.
"ωωιγιição..."

The angels ride Eridan's body up onto the very tip of a conical roof. They turn a thousandfold eyes toward the east, but Eridan fights it. He shouldn't - this is the fuckin' epitome of stupidity - but he swallows another mouthful of tar and nearly gags. He's been breathing grimlight and inky drool for days, and it hasn't bothered him before.

Whatever is going on, he doesn't like it anymore.

"Wh'al i's 'THA'T?!" Mal's voice tears out of Eridan's throat like a screech. It's done that before, but he can't remember it hurting so much.

Eridan, at last, has the opportunity to pipe up on his own, finding his voice and untuning it from the rest of the behemoth orchestra of wails and shrieks that funnels into Mal's horde. "ωωίςήζωωίςήπ?" he asks, blinking their eyes hard. They've been weeping black tar for the past few days, and he's not sure they've actually remembered to blink. At all. When he runs a claw down his sides, his gills are caked with the black film, and he shivers.

"Th'ere! Th'ere! W'e s'py i't there!" the rest of Mal insists, tugging at Eridan's mind and trying to shove the knowledge at him. When he doesn’t immediately sync with the rest of the mind, it shrieks at him, like glass scraping on stone, and his nose bursts into a flood of sticky dark blood.

"...ήμΩηςίζωωήλήμήήμήήή," Eridan whimpers through gritted teeth. When Mal shows no sign of healing the damage, as it always has before, he takes his own initiative, drawing on his internal power and pressing it through his nose. Mal needs his power not the other way around to stick around this mortal plane, after all, so he hopes this will work.

The nosebleed heals, and a flush of soothing warmth trickles through his chest like lukewarm cocoa.
Sweet, sweet vindication. Eridan puffs up a little, and he would smirk with self-satisfaction at his own incomparable epic majjyk skills if he had more control of his face at the moment.

Lost in whatever has enraged it this time, Mal doesn't seem to notice that Eridan is making repairs of his own accord, without input from the rest of the asshats flailing around in this slipshop hivemind.
Seriously. Eridan is no longer impressed. "It's HR" O'U'G\H' the d'om_e, y'o'ü föz01!"

...Fuckin' incredible. Eridan rolls mental eyes at the hivemind so hard, it's probably visible from orbit.

This is some pretty basic shit and the fact that Mal is choosing now of all times to freak out just confirms more of Eridan's growing suspicions that he might've accidentally saddled himself with one hella stupid extradimensional bodysnatcher. "H i's th' e jug' gal o! T he B' ard!" it insists, and the terror that floods their shared brainstems is raw and unfiltered. Eridan catches a fleeting, fluttering glimpse of what Mal is remembering - a shore of colorful circus tents, the bright slick of green sopor slime, and the wrenching sensation of a hivemind in distress.

Ohemgee. He could give so few fucks about circus clowns right now. Whatever Mal's major malfunction is, he is over it. He mentally punts that (apparently traumatic) memory to the side with a mental flick of the power from his core, and grumbles to himself as he instead sorts through for other memories. He wants to know about the angels and the castles, dammit, not some juggafuck outside the dome.

In the meantime, he tries to keep Mal from breaking more of his body in its dumbass temper tantrum. "V u N R d K e h 1 U P N U. K h O K N U P !" "The B'ar'd w' ll h u rrt worse! It' s an ab' omsg at to m!' Mal repeats, agitated. It makes him raise a hand and flies them toward the edge of the dome at a breakneck pace. A stray servitor angel soaring by, minding its own business, abruptly explodes in an eruption of black tar and viscera. Great, now they're killing people even deader. Eridan is not fuckin' amused anymore.

There's something familiar about that explosion though. He thinks he's seen angels blow up like that before. There's a surprising amount of grim, personal pride attached to that vague memory, too. Huh.

They arrive at the edge of the dome in moments, and Mal lands them on a regular building that escaped the rebuild. The dome rises up over their head, a sticky, massive wall of grimlight that looks far too organic for Eridan's liking. He pulled it out of the sky himself, using his power to cut a hole in the fabric of reality so Mal could slide more of its mass through, and through the magical wonders of hindsight he's really wondering why the fuck he thought that was a good plan.

The hivemind scans the entire surface of the dome, snarling and shrieking as it seeks some kind of gap in the protection. It looks down, and down, and down, and -

Eridan rouses himself from his mental disconnect to experience the exact moment that Mal looks at the place where the I-10 intersects with the dome wall, and sees a single troll standing there.

Mal's perception has more built in settings than Eridan's regular old eyes, and it zooms in on the impossible troll that stands in a clear circle of road, oblivious to the fact that most other inhabitants of the city fled indoors or to the very outskirts of the grimlight influence in droves days ago.

It's a gangly purpleblood, all stringy legs and too-thin arms, in ragged clothing stained and faded by unbelievably subpar care. Like, Eridan doesn't think this guy has showered in...Quite some time, let alone changed his shirt. To be honest, he looks like the kind of strung-out sopor-suckers out on Skid Row, the ones Fef had one of her countless charities in the works to try to help get them to rehab facilities before she up and ditched LA entirely. Honestly, this guy looks like he could barely stand up in a stiff wind, let alone be the cause of unfathomable terror in a hivemind powerful enough to warp reality as it wills.
Then the troll blinks up at them, lazy eyed and crookedly grinning, and raises a hand in silent greeting.

Well. If Eridan has nothin' else left of his honor and dignity, he can at least say he's the only mind in

And that's it. Eridan is officially one hundred and fifty percent over this cowardly running away

And with that, he shoves everything back in the angels' face. He plants a metaphorical boot in their toothy, lidless face, and starts laying on the fire, burning any outstretched tendrils that try to loop tentacles around his mind until they're crispy. He's blind to whatever the hell is happening to his physical body, but all he has to do is believe he's wielding a nice, heavy laser rifle, and viola. He can unload the power of hope all over Mal's creepy fuckin' mug.


...Hope.

Oh fuck. Ohhhh, fishsticks.

How the fuck did he forget about the Ga-

"We're gonna eat!" Malā’ikah tears free of Eridan's mind.

It feels like having his internal organs ripping out through his throat. Eridan screams and chokes, arcing forward as the wings tear off his back, taking entire strings of nerve filaments and muscles with them, and a flood of black tar and white acid spews out of his mouth. All of it. Everything that Mal poured into him while it was occupying his physical body.

He hadn't realized just how compromised he'd been. Like, shit. By the time he vomits up the last of it, gagging and spitting up mouthfuls of acid that stings like it should have all along, he feels fuckin' wrecked, and he clings to that light in the core of his being because it's the only thing keeping him alive with half of his internal organs shredded. "We shall n’ o’ t part, a’ ke of th’ miracle elixir ‘today!’ Be gon’ e!’ Mal shouts, like he's the one leaving the body and not the angels, and then, with a final snap, it severs his place in the tangle horde from the rest of the hivemind like a pound of flesh.

And then Mal is gone. There is a sickening moment, as Eridan groans and rolls onto his side, that he can feel the grimlight trickling away into the ether, drawing strings of itself out of Eridan's brain that feel like threads of razor-sharp fiber glass, but then he wrenches himself back into his own body and -

He's alone.

For the first time in...fuck, ages, he's the only one in his head. His body feels flensed and gutted, but his mind is clear. None of that shrieking and jangling and nonstop noise. Just him, and the warm pulse of Hope throbbing in his chest.

And he remembers.

Oh, does he remember!

Eridan laughs. It hurts, until his lungs heal themselves with a pulse of light. Fuck - he spreads his claws over the old scars on his gills, from that defibrillator incident all those years ago, and he heals that too.

Why not? If he believes it, it is so.

The doctors talked him into believing he had coldblood dementia, and the horrors came crawling through the Void to oblige. Feferi convinced him he was weak and needed her help to cope, and he believed her. He believed he could remain distinct from the hivemind, and he did. He saw the hope around him dying as their Game session crumbled and burned, and he tore down what remained in a frenzy of white light and death.

It's always been him. He is the Prince of Hope, and it is his to destroy or command as he wishes.

And motherfucking Gamzee of all trolls is mucking around in his kingdom.

Eridan sits up, the gouges in his back healing over with a thought, and he spits one last time. Nothing comes up but violet-tinted spittle, just as it should be. "Whatever!" he yells at the sky, gleeful in his triumph. "Don't come crawlin' back to me with your overwrough bullshit after I totally annihilate this juggalo fuck! There will be fuckin' science magic fireworks and you're not invited!" After a pause to consider, he adds, "Dicks!"

There. A fitting send off for a pack of raving insane angel-imitating Horrorterror fuckers. He's starting to think Kar was onto something with all his insane memo-spanning past-self hatred, because wow, past-Eridan was being an ignorant, stupid dumb fuck.

His vascular system feels clear for the first time in fucking ages. Eridan can only imagine what kind of liquid acid shit Mal had pumping through his body all this time, and he shudders at the thought.

Well. Fuckin' lesson learned, no more bargaining with space devils for world domination. He has power enough to manage that on his own.

Eridan rolls his shoulders, and cracks his neck. Everything seems to be in working order, but only because he thinks it should be. If he stopped believing he could heal himself, he's pretty sure it would all fall apart again.

What a shitty power.

…He's gonna abuse the fuck out of it.

"Yo, Eribro! You all gone and got your chill on up there?"

Starting, Eridan thinks mutinously, with the source of that incredibly dumb voice. Gamzee has always been a fucking weirdo with no sense of self-control, and now that Eridan believes he can remember the Game, he can recall just how much of a lame fuck Gamzee was. He couldn't even be bothered to fight the denizens of his own planet; he'd just gotten everything that got within gangly psycho clown arm's reach high as balls.

There's something Eridan still can't quite remember, tucked away in the back of his mind. But he remembers pretty much everything up until the point he fuckin' died, so he figures it can't be all that important. Because yeah, he was kind of asking for it at that point, and he totally understands where Kanaya was coming from with the giant chainsaw. He'd been a douche.

So he hauls himself upright and steps majestically up onto the edge of the building, looking down his nose at Gamzee, who has shuffled closer to the building while Eridan was busy pulling a coup d'état in his own mind. The dome is sloughing away in great sheaves now that Mal has hightailed to fuck knows where, and the acid pools have probably stopped growing. The taint remains, but without the main power of the Horrorterror present to keep up the pressure, eventually Los Angeles will be open to the rest of the world once more, and his reign will be at an end.

Well. He can't have that, can he? Eridan chuckles darkly, and closes his fist.

Light cracks through the grey sky. From the same spot he sliced through reality to open a gate for Mal's shitty-ass dome, he unspools his own power and scorches the dried up material of the grimlight dome with the light of his own dome. One born entirely of his own Hope, with none of those shitty additives that Mal kept polluting it with.

Almost an afterthought, Eridan reaches out to restore the flagging angels, too. He can restore them. He knows he can. And so he does. The minds of the people they once were are still tangled up in Mal's snarls, but he can get them back later. If he's in a benevolent mood. For now, he makes their insides match their outsides, smoothing them out until they're the angels he used to know through and through.

But they'll know better, now. They're done weeping and fighting him, and he's done slaughtering them. He made his point a universe or two ago, and now they will serve him, just as they would have if the last Game hadn't gotten fucked the way it had.

Looking back at the center of downtown LA, where Mal so conveniently remade the buildings into black arches of stone and glass, it's like seeing LOWAA reborn. Eridan just smirks.

"Uh, my brother? That...was all kind of unmiraculous, you feel me?" Gamzee says slowly, frowning as the last of the grimlight dome burns away in the light of Eridan's far superior Hope-a-drome. "On account of, I was all hoping we would turn down the angel apocalypse miracles, and you 'n me 'n Tavbro could visit all our bitchin' friends. You dig?"

"Okay," Eridan snaps, unfolding his arms. "That's it. I'm gonna feed you your fuckin' miracles through your squeal pipette, clown." He holds out a hand to the side and summons the first thing that comes to mind. It doesn't occur to him that there are no sylladices - he wants it, and so the laser-gun from his internal confrontation with Mal slaps into the palm of his hand. It's a thing of elegance, dark violet with a tiny fuel cell foaming with Hope in the chamber, and Eridan strikes a pose with it before pointing it down at Gamzee's dumb face. "I have a giant fuckin' laser beam an' a hella lot of serious fuckin' emotions after all this bullshit, today. So basically? Run or eat Hope lasers, dipshit, 'cause I am so not in the mood. I have a glubbin' kingdom to establish."

Gamzee goes still. Eridan can't see very well from up here - where the fuck did Mal throw his glasses? - but there is a brief, confused moment where he can't see at all. Everything turns blurred and fragmented; static eats up across his vision. He winces, rubbing at his eyes, and wonders if this is some last issue caused by all the crying black tears nonsense. He wills them healed, and he blinks, squinting down at Gamzee.

Who is gone. The I-10 is empty once more, except for the crushed, melted slag of the cars that had rammed into the dome or become bogged down in an acid puddle before the drivers could abscond.

What. There's nowhere to go! However the fuck Gam got in through the first dome, Eridan is sure he couldn't have just fucked off through his own without Eridan noticing!

"My invertebrother," Gamzee's voice rumbles from behind him, "don't make me MOTHERFUCKING HURT YOU."

- It occurs to Eridan, at last, that the one thing he's forgetting about the Game might be the most important thing of all.

- :o)

- :o(

- He approaches the building with trepidation.

The sky bleeds overhead. He wants to say it's blood orange, but that just sounds fucking pretentious and even that joke is getting old. The street is pretty busy, cars stopped in deadlock traffic by an accident that's clogged up the right hand lane, and he gets a few odd looks from pedestrians as he mumbles and shoves and darts his way through the crowd at each intersection. Dust and scorch marks score the ragged bottoms of his pants and the heavy, dull red cloak that sweeps over his shoulders. He feels like he's been walking for fucking ever; his throat scrapes when he swallows and he needs a shower like he needs air, but his internal clock insists it's only been a few days. Which isn't all that bad, in the grand scheme of things. Days are pocket change when you're playing this kind of game.

Climbing the stairs take more out of him than he likes to admit. With every step the blisters lining the back of his heels split and ooze, aggravated by all the grit and sand that snuck into his shoes, and the weight of the cargo he keeps slung over his back, concealed under the fall of his cloak, presses down as a reminder of just what the goddamn stakes are, here. He still has no idea how he ended up with this thing, but he's got to keep it safe.

But before he can hide this thing or find its real custodian, he has to take care of business.

He has to finish this goddamn loop.

Usually he'd worry more about potential pitfalls or traps as he nears the front door, but he knows this loop backwards and forwards by now, crisscrossed and diagonal ways, and he knows Bro won't have set anything up. By now, the word has cascaded through the guardian information pipeline that Dave Strider is in Seattle and that shit is getting mildly real.

Ha. To think, Jade going missing used to be the worst of their problems. He shakes his head at the thought. They have no idea. Past-selves are always so amazingly, stupidly naïve. Like cute little puppies who don't know when to stop chewing on a brand new sock because they're adorable and haven't learned better yet and fuck that. Fuck everything about that.

The weight on his back shifts, and he freezes midstep. The rough sling digs into his shoulder as the thing within it settles in a different position. Every time it does that, he has a miniature heart attack, and it's starting to give him an epic migraine. If this thing wakes up before he gets it to its keeper - Yeah, he's gonna stop thinking about it right now. The guy who tossed him the sling and its contents had been weird as fuck, but he'd made it very clear what the consequences would be if Dave fucked up.

So he's not going to fuck up. Obviously. Right now, at this very moment, he is doing whatever the opposite of fucking up is. He's going to be the hero and fucking succeed, dammit.

When the sling stops shifting, he nods slowly, shrugging one shoulder cautiously to adjust the weight. He has swords on swords on swords slung pretty much anywhere on his body there's room for it, and one of the straps lies right under the sling. He's gonna have sores there in the morning, might even have rubbed one open by now after all this travelling.

Whatever. In and out. He'll say his piece, snag some AJ, and jet off forward in time to where he'd left off. No problem. He grimaces, shoves his hood off his head so it covers the bump in the cloak where the sling sits. The last thing he needs is Bro sticking his nose into private business.

A faint gurgle rises up from the sling. The hairs on the back of Dave's neck stand up, and he swallows hard. Breathing out through his nose, the way John is always on Karkat about doing, he turns the doorknob and shoulders his way in.

A moment later, Oriole crashes into the wall to his left, spitting out muffled curses as he's buried under a pile of plush puppet ass.

Dave just stares, shaking his head with vague sympathy. Like, wow, fuck, Dave already knew that Bro started training the kid, like, an hour after Dave took off, but he really threw Oriole right into the grinder, didn't he? At this point, the bird kid still has a fucking broken wing - like, what the fuck?
Flinging the pile of puppets off him with the functioning wing, Oriole claws his way upright, panting and sweating and just looking like a total wuss in general. Makes sense - he won't reach the whole 'stone cold badass' stage for another two weeks or so, from the timeline Dave has pieced together. The guy raises a hand to shove his sunglasses up his orange nose - then freezes and looks at Dave, blinking. "The hell?"

Dave nods. "Yo, man."

Oriole shrieks and stumbles backward, holding his hands up defensively. "Oh fuck you can talk."

Oh. Right. Dave smacks his face, his fingers drifting down by new habit to curl a nail along the etchings on his collar. His vocal cords are raw as fuck from all the screaming and shouting and other nonsense he doesn't like to think about, but the quality of the sound from the machine itself doesn't waver. The wonders of modern technology. "Yup."

The metal collar around his throat is a burnished sky blue that doesn't match anything in his wardrobe these days. Rose had gone on and on about some bullshit psychological meaning and the creepy sweating horse guy had made stuttering insinuations that made everyone in the vicinity uncomfortable, but hey, all Dave cares about is the insane stat boost he gets from wearing it. How did Aradia put it? [I PLEDGE MYSELF TO THEE] or something like that. It's different for Karkat, whatever it is, so Dave tries not to sweat the details.

Because fuck. If he has to swear loyalty to every Heir and Prince in this godsforsaken game, he'll do it. He needs all the damage multipliers and speed buffs he can get. Grinding is for squares.

"Bro, I'm home, you asshat," Dave calls, sticking his hands in his pockets and crossing his fingers. "And I actually don't have time to dick around. Where the hell are you?"

"Wha - You were barely gone for six hours," Oriole says. He's waving his arms in the air, and the sword in his hand is slashing wildly, which is the kind of weapons safety training that explains all the Hello Kitty Band-Aids stuck to Oriole's face and the bloody bandages wound around his feather-studded knuckles. Dave takes a step back to save his hair from a (probably badly needed) trim. "Why can you talk now? And what the actual hell are you wearing? What. The fuck. Is going on."

Lil Cal appears before Bro does, which Dave knew to expect. A glint in his peripheral vision alerts him to the puppet leering at him from where it's been carelessly tossed onto the kitchen counter.

There is something seriously fucked up about that puppet. Dave has become more and more certain of this with each passing week, and coming back with that perspective in mind makes the fucker's creepy grin all the spookier. All the other puppets in Bro's arsenal are mechanized, but it's becoming increasingly clear that Lil Cal isn't. If Rose hadn't gone over the thing with a fine-toothed comb looking for majjyks and shit, Dave would still be convinced it was cursed. Even in the future Bro can't - or won't - give him a straight answer as to how the puppet works or where it came from, but Dave's seen what it can do, now.

And he's scared. Because whatever the hell Lil Cal is, the only thing keeping it in check is Bro's influence.

"From the future, then," Bro says, suddenly leaning on the wall opposite Dave. The brim of his hat has been pulled low, and his arms are folded across his chest. An eyebrow appears over the angled shades. He's probably eyeballing the collar, and wondering where the paint job came from. "Jesus fuck, how far?"

"A few weeks," Dave says. He's hedging, and Bro knows it. And Dave knows Bro knows it because Bro is going to tell past-Dave about it in a couple of days.

Fucking time travel, man.

Instead of just accepting that awesome answer, Bro tilts his head to the side, still assessing. Makes sense. A random Dave shows up out of nowhere on an unspecified timeframe? That's suspicious as fuck, and Bro is a suspicious kind of guy. "Cut the crap, kid. You could tell me down to the millisecond how long it's been since it last snowed in Houston, and now this? You always know when you are. How far ahead are you from?"

"You really don't want to know," Dave warns. Once upon a time, he might have gotten irrationally pissed at Bro for stepping all up in his business and trying to baby him like this, or just shut down the conversation to sulk like a brat. He likes to think he's actually matured or something since then. Past-him was such an emotional douche. Bro didn't deserve half the tantrums Dave threw. He's an abrasive single parent who got slammed with a kid while he was barely out of his teens, and somehow that transformed him into an overprotective as fuck badass. Past-Dave couldn't get his insecure shit together without taking it out on the guy.

Well. He gets it now. And what a shitty maturity arc that had been. He'd hate to have to relive it or anything like that.

He sighs, and gives in. "Sorry to break up you and your alien secretmonger sesh, but I'm from four weeks ahead and we have shenanigans afoot." He claps his hands together. "Get up, bitches, you have a date with Doc Lalonde and you need to be in Washington with us by Saturday."

Bro snorts, which is his equivalent of, 'Yeah, fuck no to that.' Right, he's still pissed at Rue over the whole Rose thing right now. Goddamn, for such a stoic asshole, he sure knows how to hold a grudge.

"What? Why?" Oriole asks, all confusion as he folds his wing in close. "What's up in Washington? I thought you were just going to help out that John kid."

Unlike Dave, who has always made an ironic point of dressing up fancy to spar with Bro, Oriole has opted for changing into Bro chic - jeans that have been ripped up to the knees by all the swords flying around and a skinny black tank top with huge, sloppy cuts down the back for the wings to stick out of.

How plebian. Past-Dave's only been gone a few hours and already Bro is corrupting his bird twin with his fucking awful fashion sense; at least Dave knows in the future he'll head Oriole off from that appalling path and lead him back to way of righteous style. Bro would have the kid in polos with popped collars by next week if he had his way -

Wait. Dave squints and picks out the tiny white bird stitched near the hem of the ribbed cotton shirt.

Holy shit, Oriole went through Dave's closet for that one. Which is hilarious beyond reason, because Dave is pretty sure that's a female-style American Eagle tank top that Dave purchased during a really embarrassing emo phase that he doesn't like to discuss in polite company. He snerts, slamming a fist against his lips to repress a burst of laughter, and feels his eyes tear up a little.

Oriole must never know. Dave is taking this moment with him to the grave.

"More importantly, why would you wait four weeks to come back and tell me about a meeting that's a couple of days from now?" Bro says pointedly. Always asking the real questions.

"Shit happens," Dave says at last. He holds up both hands in defense when Oriole groans and Bro knocks his head back against the wall with his mouth open in a silent sigh. "No, seriously, this is some Prime Directive level shit, man. If I tell you too much, heads will roll."

Well. There are a few things that he wishes he could warn them about. He has the power to prevent some fucked up stuff from happening. John, the whole debacle with the trolls, all of it...he could drop a couple dynamite hints and all that would be cleared up in the form of Bro losing his shit on the asshats involved.

But here's the problem. Those things have happened, because Dave remembers them happening. Aradia has made it quite clear that dicking around with shit like that just leads to dead Daves and deader timelines. He's always vaguely suspected that the reason he has this need to complete time loops was to prevent time itself from breaking down. Turns out, that's not all that far from the truth.

So as much as Dave wants to spare everyone from what happens next, he just has to roll with it.

Bro is silent for a minute or so. Oriole looks back and forth between them, chest heaving, and Dave waits. He has the patience of a goddamn saint, these days; has to have it, to deal with Karkat on a regular basis.

Oriole breaks first. "So what? We just hike up to Washington for shits and giggles?" he asks, frowning and scratching at a crooked feather behind his ear. "I mean, what the hell happened with the Diamond person?"

Diamonds Droog. Hell, the last time he saw her -

Dave closes his eyes, and tries not to think about the desert dunes stretching out around him for miles, all burnt umber and pale yellow, the color of maize. "Nah, bro. You hike up there to get all the answers you never wanted to all the questions we shouldn't have asked."

Bro appears a foot from Dave. "What."

"You heard me," Dave says, closing his eyes. "Rue's got some machine running that's filtered through all the cosmic static and pieced together the last Game." He juts his chin toward the door to Bro's room, which is still conveniently hanging open, though the shadows within are dark enough to conceal the alien dame he knows is loitering around in there. "She needs to come, too."

Bro's brain is probably going a million miles an hour. "Got that much out of her," he comments. If his eyes go toward the Black Queen huddling in her shadows, Dave can't see it through the shades. "The Queen's Hub, right? She told me it wouldn't be finished for years, if ever."

BQ: That is because it should be impossible to complete.

The dame herself slinks out of the bedroom. Her eyes are sharp and cold, and her voice isn't a blooming, inky black fire anymore; it's lightning, sharp and jolting and darker than the night. On Saturday, past-Dave is going to hear her and think his head's about to fry like a potsticker. Current-Dave is not impressed. From his perspective, the BQ turned off her telepathic camouflage weeks ago, and he's been adjusting to the pain ever since.

Queens are raw power.

But she doesn't intimidate Dave anymore.

BQ: It was badly damaged by the nature of our entrance to this iteration of paradox space.

BQ: I had thought her efforts to repair it in vain, and her desire to share whatever information you children requested both asinine and completely in keeping with her kowtowing nature as a Prospitian. That was why I chose to pursue a more indirect method of preparing you for battle.

"Yeah, well, your methods suck ass," Dave tells her flatly. "Even when you're trying to help, you try to screw people over. On purpose. Don't think I don't know that by now."

Her smile is predatory, toothy, and completely unapologetic.

BQ: Oh good. We're finally on the same page.

BQ: It just so happens that we share a greater enemy in common. So I thought to push you into developing your powers. Only to make you a more useful tool, and a more interesting opponent, naturally.

"Yeah, yeah, I know all that already." Jesus fucking titty Christ, he's pretty sure this is word for word the same monologue she gave him three weeks ago in his personal timeline. He doesn't know why he expects more original monologuing from a self-declared NPC with a minor god complex, but them's the breaks. "Turns out when you stick a Queen and Rose's mom in a room together, insane science magic happens. And they may or may not have had some tech support." He still hasn't confirmed that rumor yet. He will. Aradia owes him. "But you're going to Washington too. I don't give a singular fuck whether you go with these two or do it alone. Just. You're there. On Saturday. Fuck you. End of story."

BQ: Lovely.

BQ: And yet. The opportunity to break one of your time loops... tempting...

This part is easy. Her threat is only halfway serious, but Dave fires off the bullet that will seal the deal. "Spades is there."

The Queen's entire body goes still, only her head clicking around slowly as she stares at him.

BQ: Say.

BQ: That.

BQ: Again.

"Spades Slick is there. In the lab in Washington." Dave rolls his eyes. These two are gross. "Uh. Being himself. Stabbing people. And you know. Whatever else he does in his spare time."

...What else does that guy do? Dave can't think of anything else except more stabbing. And talking to Karkat. And hatemacking on the BQ.

But mostly stabbing.

BQ: Stabbing. I see.

BQ: I shall endeavor to keep your timeline intact, then. It would be good to see my regal counterpart in person again, regardless of... whoever else is present.

BQ: (That vulgar impudent little traitor will -)

She's a fucking liar. Dave doesn't call her out on it. See, he's figured out how to be diplomatic and stuff. "Yeah, yeah. Do the shadow thing and skedaddle, we both know you're going to."
BQ: Maybe I will.

BQ: I certainly have other business of my own to take care of, and I've had quite enough of your custodian's hospitality.

In other words, she wants him to understand that she does it because she wants to, not because he told her she would. Dave could care less.

BQ: I depart. Perhaps I will grace you with my presence at a later time.

Yeah, duh, you will, Dave mouths to himself, but he doesn't say shit because he doesn't want her to kick his ass. She could probably still do that. Queens have a unique capacity for ass kicking. The shadows from Bro's room swarm around her a moment later as she steps into them, her eyes narrow with a sneer as she vanishes into the dark. The shadows calm down after about five seconds, falling back into their regular places. She can't use that trick often, he knows, but it's still impressive.

He's still not sure, even in the future, if she's genuinely helping out, or if she only coincidentally assists them when it serves her own secret, nefarious purposes. Past-him severely underestimated how evil the BQ could be. People say to keep your enemies close, but keeping the Black Queen too close was fucking stupid.

"Alright then," Oriole says, throwing up his hands in disgust. "That happened. And after all the shit you people went through to get her to sit down and talk, too. Remember the whole stabbing thing? Because I do!"

"I've got a rough script," Dave concedes, shrugging his shoulders. "Trust me, we couldn't believe half the stuff she says anyway. You guys all show up at Rue's storytelling time because future-me tells you to right now, and trust me, that's way more reliable than anything the Queen would tell you."

Oh thank god, Dave doesn't have a fight on his hands. That would be the last thing he needs - Bro being stubborn. "Awesome."

"That thing working alright for you?" Bro switches the topic without slowing for breath. He waves at the air in general, but the focus of his question is obvious by implication. "I only just got all the parts in to finish fixing it. I get it to you on Saturday?"

"...Yeah," Dave says. He starts eyeing the kitchen speculatively. Lil Cal is still between him and the fridge, but he doesn't think the puppet will cause him too many problems. Not right now. "Sounds about right. And good times are had by all. Now, I need to go before -"

Dave's cloak shifts. The warmth pressed up against the middle of his back squirms, and stretches, and then settles again. Dave's heart stops, and when he looks up two pairs of shades are trained on him. Oriole's mouth works soundlessly for a moment, though, because his poker face is still for shit. "Dave. What the hell is under your weaksauce cloak?" he asks at last. One of his claws moves so he's grasping the hilt of his sword with two hands. "Like, are you aware that there's something on your back?"

"Shit yeah, I'm aware," Dave grumbles. His fingers tremble a little, but he lets himself sag with relief after chancing a look at the shadows the Queen vanished into. At least she didn't stick around to see that, and he can probably talk his way out of this and go the hell back to his own time -

Dave's back gurgles, and then a faint, clicking hiss emerges from the sling.
Bro has it in his hand before Dave can react and that is annoying as hell, because he's supposed to have leveled up more than that, dammit. Bro is ridiculously overpowered. It's unreal. But Dave's at least able to put up a fight. After Bro grabs the sling, but before he actually yanks it over Dave's head, Dave tries to flash step away, and manages to hook his elbow through the sling. The force of Bro's grab yanks Dave along too, and they're halfway across the room before Dave can pause time again. "No," he insists, heart pounding out a drumbeat against the inside of his ribcage. The last thing they need right now is for whatever's in that sling to wake up, and all he wants is to yank time to a crashing halt so he can grab it and finish the delivery in peace.

Nothing he can do about that. The BQ hadn't been kidding when she said pausing the flow of time was unnatural. No matter how much force he puts into it, he can't check it, or destroy it, or create more of it. Not permanently, anyway, though some of his sweet new gear helps make it a little more malleable. He can only exploit what time he has left.

So he does the only thing he can do. He draws the sword from over his shoulder and slices through the straps of the sling. Bro reappears in the kitchen by the sink, a thick strip of cloth tossed to the side as he furrows his brows at the heavy package in Dave's arms. "Dave."

The cloth swaddling the cargo has fallen off, but Dave isn't concerned about that. He wets his lips and starts rocking to a nervous beat, shushing like he's John and the crazy 'rail is about to lose it again. "Don't wake up, come on, come on," he whispers, angling it away from the harsh overhead light. "Come on, shhhhh, don't cry. Don't wake up, don't cry -"

"Dave, what the fuck is that -"

"Shutitshhjusshuhuuuush!" Dave hisses through gritted teeth, desperately pressing a finger to his lips in the universal sign for 'shut the fuck up, asshat.' The thing in the blankets writhes again, but its eyes are still shut so maybe it's just stretching. He can't believe all that yanking around didn't wake it up. He doesn't know how to deal with this kind of thing, but he's pretty sure that's not normal.

Its lips purse, and its forehead crinkles with tiny frown lines, and the gurgle transitions into a cree of distress. Dave doesn't know what to do, fuck, should he be rocking it more? Less? What does it want? Shiiiiiiiiiiit -

"Oh, for fuck's sake, Dave, give it here." A pair of gloved hands reach out and scoop the bundle neatly out of Dave's hands. He just stares at them for a moment, baffled by the sudden absence of the weight he's been carrying all this time, and then looks up, speechless.

Bro cradles the thing against his chest, massaging its back through the fabric. He hums for a minute, varying the pitch and pacing around the living room area as he does so, his feet unerring as they step over discarded magazines and takeout boxes. When the noise doesn't subside, he stops humming and switches to clucking his tongue. "Little shit," he says, a weird fondness in his voice, "time for naps." He breaks off into a soft whistle, and that seems to do the trick, as the squirming dies down and the thing rests its head on his shoulder.

"Now I've seen everything," Oriole says. "Oh man. This is weird. This is so goddamn weird." He perches on the edge of the couch with his feet tucked up by his butt, resting his chin on his hand and cocking his head to the side. "Huh."

Dave flops down beside his bird twin, the air whooshing out of him with a huff. "Thanks, Bro. Damn. I owe you one," he says, scruffing his hair with both hands. There's still grits of golden sand stuck in there that he hasn't had the opportunity to shower out, and a thin trickle slips through the strands of his hair and forms a scattered veneer on the floor.
"Unbe-fucking-lievable," Bro mutters, bouncing the kid in his arms. The faint note of despair in his voice would be terrifying enough, but on top of that he drops his nose against its head and nuzzles the thing. "I literally cannot believe this."

"Bro, I can explain."

"I should have known. I was always a shitty role model, wasn't I? First I emotionally stunted your growth -"

"What? No, oh god, we're not getting into this right now, dude, just listen -"

"- and now you've followed in my footsteps and become a single parent," Bro says, his voice forlorn. "Well, at least you've got me to help; I didn't have anyone to fall back on when I found you. But shit. Raising another kid on puppet blood money. Looks like Jo and James win guardians of the year after all, and they're dead."

Dave is starting to sweat. Profusely. He claws at his hair, realizes that he's picked up that bad habit from Karkat again, and slams his hands down in fists by his sides. "Look, I swear, it's not mine!"

Because he's starting to suspect he's just launched Bro into a complete midlife crisis by making him a grandfather/uncle.

Bro snorts, but even that sound lacks its usual verve of understated condescension. It sounds more like a sigh than anything. "Of course it's not, Dave, that's pretty obvious. It's not even human. Meteor?"

"No, actually, some weirdass hobo hermit in the middle of a desert handed me a baby!" Dave snaps irritably. Even he can't tell if he's being sarcastic anymore. This situation has moved past the point from which humor might have been able to rescue it.

Bro sighs. "It couldn't have been a meteor? At least that would have been traditional. For fuck's sake, Dave, weird old men hanging out in deserts distributing babies is no way to start a family. I am very disappointed in you." He starts whistling again when the baby adjusts its spindly grip around his neck, and Dave thinks he sees tiny, pudgy baby claws grabbing a tuft of sandy blond hair that has escaped Bro's hat. "Wonder if I've still got that Stokke carrier...shit, yeah, I wouldn't have thrown that away..."

And with that, Bro wanders off into the kitchen. He kicks something on the floor with his heel, and an overhead crawlspace opens up with a clack. Then the man vanishes, baby and all, presumably up into one of his secret storage places in the ceiling.

"I don't know whether to laugh or cry," Oriole adds, shaking his head as he stares up from the couch. He adds his other hand and rests his face in both, his boney elbows digging into his knees. The sword lies, forgotten, on the coffee table full of junk. "You're from four weeks in the future? Dude, you got busy."

"Not mine," Dave insists.

"Hella busy," Oriole says, lifting off his shades and nestling them on the top of his head. "Like, that is not a normal baby. Is that a wriggler? I'm pretty sure they're not supposed to leave the -"

"Look. Creepy guy. Desert. Surprise baby. That is literally the sequence of events," Dave says, gesturing with his hands to act out each sentence as a separate box. At 'surprise baby,' he adds in jazz hands to really bring the message home. "I don't know what it is, what it eats, or where it came from. I just really need to get it to its guardian before it wakes up. Like, yesterday."
"So this is temporary?"

"Yeah. I only stopped here with it because you guys told me I came with it." Dave grimaces. "Goddamn, you couldn't have been more specific about that part?"

Oriole rubs his eyes. "Wait. I'm confused. So in the future, do we tell you - the you that just left, I mean - that you show up with a baby or not?"

"God - just - no, don't," Dave sighs. His head is really aching now, a tiny current of pain that happens to stab into his right eye. "Don't fuck up the timeline. On Saturday, just tell me I came from four weeks ahead, and I have a 'special cargo.' That's how I knew to hold off on looping back to get you all these weeks, until I realized that this situation...kind of fit the bill."

"No kidding."

"Hell yeah," Bro says. Dave flinches, and Oriole yelps, scrambling around in his seat to look up as Bro reappears directly behind them. "Fucking flawless. Dave, stand up and take responsibility for your child, dammit."

"It is not my kid!" He stands up anyway, eyeing the heavy vest in Bro's free hand with trepidation. "The hell is that?"

Bro starts untangling the buckles on the vest. Upon closer inspection, it's some kind of harness with panels of cream white and tan polyester, with matte grey buckles and straps that have been dyed a familiar but faded crimson. "Baby carrier," he grunts by way of explanation. "Cape off."

Dave doesn't question it. He looks at the shredded remnants of the original sling, and he can already tell he's getting nowhere fast if he has to carry that thing around in his arms. He hasn't had any trouble so far, but once he's back when he needs to be, he's going to have to fight his way to the kid's custodian, and he's not looking forward to that if he doesn't have both hands free. So instead of bitching, he snaps his fingers, and the cape vanishes.

"So busy," Oriole repeats. He shuffles up off the couch a moment after Dave does, circling around to watch Bro from a safe distance.

Or not. Dave sees the light flash off Bro's angled shades, and the faint motion blur around his outline, but Oriole still isn't up to snuff. When the avalanche of pastel clothing and squeaking bells and whistles buries him, he can only let out a caw of protest before vanishing under a pile of baby toys. After a pause, an entire folded up baby stroller tumbles down and crashes on top of the pile. Oriole kicks a leg free in protest.

Seriously. Has Bro kept those since Dave was a kid? That is fucked up levels of hording, right there. There're TV shows and interventions dedicated to this shit.

"Learn how to dodge, kid. Lesson number one," Bro says, shaking his head. "Here, Dave, front or back, it works for both." He lobbs the vest at Dave and goes back to rocking and whistling at the baby, booping it on the nose occasionally when its forehead wrinkles. "Watch the lower strap - it digs in like a son of a bitch if it gets twisted up. Isn't that right, sweetpea?" He drops a kiss on the kid's forehead.

...That's just freaky. Dave yanks the whole vest over his head so he stops watching Bro being all parent-y, and becomes momentarily baffled by the myriad straps before he decides, 'fuck it,' and just twists the whole thing around until the support bands seem to be in the right configuration. He feels like he's being swallowed by the dangling straps, and he actually pauses time at intervals to hide the fumbling as he struggles to tighten the straps from Bro-dimensions so they fit his own body.

When he's finally figured it out, he's pretty sure he looks stupid. Like wow, it's like wearing a turtle shell. Dave rolls his shoulders, and the heavily padded shoulder straps, surprisingly, move with him. Okay, not bad. Now that the carrier is actually on, he can see that there's not actually that much spare fabric; when he tests the give of it, the straps stretch and shift to accommodate him.

Makes sense that Bro would buy a baby carrier he could fight in. And, if Dave mentally counts this new addition as part of his ensemble…

He snaps his fingers again. The entire baby carrier vest turns brick red, blending into his shirt, and a large, bright red Time gear appears on the front of his chest. Once the kid itself is loaded up, he'll call the cape back too, for more concealment.

Hell yeah.

"I'm not even going to ask how you got magic fashion powers. Just. No." Oriole growls from below, shoving a bright pink kid's activity walker off his face, and sits up. He sweep the rest of the baby debris off himself with a bat of his free wing, looking harassed and scuffed and coated with crawlspace dust. "Also, fuck training montages. You people are insane."

The buckles on the carrier click, and Bro is standing behind Dave. Dave fights the instinct to whip around and clock him.

Heheheh. Clocks.

He's given up on fighting the whole pun thing. After the fish puns and the cat puns and the horse puns and the time puns and the air puns and the light puns - look. Just. It was either accept the puns, or go insane, and the last thing they'd really needed at the time was one more crazy person fucking shit up.

Instead, he waits with his back exposed, gritting his teeth as the kid's warm weight settles against his back again, and Bro snaps up all the buckles in a split second. "And then you pop the collar to guard its neck," he says, fiddling with something that Dave can't see. "Such a good baby. Hell yeah."

At least Bro didn't try to lob it off the roof of the apartment. That would not have ended well.

"Who is taking care of it after this?" Bro asks, reappearing several feet away. He pulls off his hat and runs his fingers through his mussed up hair. "Who are we trusting my grandkid to?"

Dave thinks about protesting that, but once Bro gets like this there's really no point. Hell, it's not like the clan isn't large enough already. What's one more honorary kid? "Someone safe. Someone pretty badass, from what I hear tell of her. This one time, she launched a guy into orbit. It was awesome."

Bro thinks this over, and then inclines his head gravely. "A'ight. Saturday. Where are we meeting?"

And now they're back in familiar territory. Dave can see why Bro's account of this whole meeting omitted the past five minutes because holy shit, and he's just relieved to be back on track. He needs to wrap this little detour loop up before all the displaced time energy gives him away to observers. "The Cascades. They're in the Northern Cascades, somewhere. But with all the voidy shit Lalonde has on the place, GPS coordinates don't really help. Just get to the Marblemount wilderness information center, and be obvious about it. Strife in public or sacrifice a cow or something. Ask about the lab. Her people will find you."

Bro raises an eyebrow. "They will, will they?"
"Trust me," Dave says, turning toward the door. He licks his cracked lips with a grimace, but doesn't turn back. Forget apple juice - he's still thirsty as fuck, but the whole baby thing took up too much time. He needs to get moving again, fast. "By then, they'll know you're coming."

"Dave."

Dave looks back, and he has to fling himself onto the ground to dodge the incoming container flying at his head. When it slams into the door and falls toward him, he snags it out of the air before it can hit the kid on his back.

"Later," is all Bro says. Then he's gone. Across the room, Oriole shrugs his wings at Dave, and fails to notice Lil Cal wrapping a plush arm around his ankles until the puppet yanks and the bird kid drops to the ground, scrabbling at the floor as he is dragged toward the stairwell, swearing at the top of his lungs all the way. It's like something out of the puppet snuff films Bro made in Dave's youth, and he shudders in sympathy. Oriole leaves the swordkind Dave gave him on the coffee table, but even as Dave watches, one of Bro's older puppets swipes it and vanishes under the couch.

Dave shakes his head, looks at the jug of apple juice Bro threw at him, and smirks. He tucks it against his side and shuts the door behind him.

Once he's outside, he sucks in a breath, and taps a thumb on his collar - a nervous habit that he doesn't remembering having all the years he wore the original collar, but which he apparently has now. He tries not to wonder if he'll ever see the apartment again. The endless desert rises up in his mind's eye, the deep dips between the dunes where the sand runs thin and the scabbed, craggy craters of blasted earth and rock broke the surface.

And he shudders. He wasn't lying when he said he was chronologically from four weeks ahead. That's the present, from his perspective, and he needs to get back there to finish what they started. But he failed to mention the fact that he'd skipped a week ahead of that before coming back to this moment. That technically he'd rewound five weeks, not four, to get here.

"Kid," he mumbles, snapping his fingers and pulling the hood of his cloak over his head, "you had better be worth the apocalypse."

The child on his back kneads at his shoulder blade with hooked claws, mumbles under its gurgling breath, and slips back into a deep slumber.

His memories are still spotty, but he sifts through his fraymotifs until he finds what he's looking for. [Take Your Time] throbs in his head with a wobbling bass line, the clack of something percussive that he's never been able to identify, and a slow, scratching rhythm with triple beats thrown in to keep him just slightly off tempo. A pair of turntables spring up under his outstretched palms, and instead of having to swallow around the memories of a cut throat, Dave travels forward with the correct procedure, the way he's actually supposed to time travel, instead of the fucked up way the BQ tried to slyly trick him into using all this time. Seriously, fuck that dame.

All he's got are a set of initials to go off of, and the pulse of the Beat thrumming in his ears. Hopefully that's enough to get him when he's going.

He needs to find the MP.
Also, Eridan is still crazy. In a psycho contest between him and Gamzee, it's a toss up. What else is new.

The Whole Sky Shaken

Chapter Summary

The sound of a word was shed, the sound of the wind as a breath,
In the ears of the souls that were dead, in the dust of the deepness of death;
Where the face of the moon is taken, the ways of the stars undone,
The light of the whole sky shaken, the light of the face of the sun.

It seems to be mutually assumed that Karkat is not going along for the rescue mission.

Karkat, curled up in a ball in a pile on John's bed, watching his moirail tug a mask and goggles on through heavy eyelids, ends up agreeing mostly by virtue of the fact that he's in too much pain to argue the point. Part of him - a large part - screams that he needs to be there as Hemogoblin, to have Heir's back if nothing else. But judging by the fact that most of his arguments get wiped out whenever he so much as breathes too hard and pushes his ribs too far, Karkat suspects that at this rate he'd only be a massive fucking hindrance on the whole Harley hunt.

Which is fine. Alright, he doesn't hate Harley - she's infuriatingly annoying, but apparently it's hard to properly rage at someone when you've recently had a nightmare in which their thirteen-year-old self died, bloody and alone. The guilt is just too strong. But he's certainly not concerned about her wellbeing the way John seems to be; that's a human familial bond thing, Karkat suspects. If Sharpshooter finds Droog and arrests her, fuck, Karkat is not going to be the one to stand in her way. John, his dad, and Dave all just seem worried that she's going to get hurt without backup, which is - yeah, a pretty reasonable concern. But Karkat's not going to pitch a fit about not getting to go along on this particular outing.

That doesn't mean he can't still gripe about it, though.

"I fucking hate sleep. Sleep is probably my kismesis. That makes so much sense," Karkat complains to the ceiling, one ear turned toward the general direction in which he's got a bead on John's pulse. "Ours is a bitter and desperate rivalry, one which will go down in history as the stuff of legend."

"Karkat," John says, yanking on one of Heir's shoes, "if you wanna be in a kismesissitude with sleep, I'm not sure I can stop you. But also no."
Karkat sighs gustily, rolling over and planting his cheek on a copy of Redglare #3 so he can get a better look at John. Seeing John in Heir's uniform is fucking unsettling, particularly when he's still got the goggles shoved up in his hair and the mask slack around his neck instead of concealing his face. He has begun to adjust to the uncanny blue of John's eyes, but the weird mishmash of John and Heir is just - no. His thinkpan can't handle that kind of load right now.

It can handle sorting through the past few weeks, and thinking of all those little moments where Hemogoblin nearly flipped his shit over Heir pacifying him by accident. To think, he's nearly worked himself up into a rage-induced heart attack on multiple occasions over the times Heir tried to pap or shoosh him and the way he calmed down against his will in response, but now he can only snort at past-Karkat's spectacular inability to put two and two together and get Heir is your moirail, you dumb fuck. Even with Karkat projecting a massively embarrassing mixture of hero worship and flushcrush onto the other hero, somehow the pale serendipity had shone through.

It's actually a huge relief. He no longer has to worry about having somehow emotionally cheated on John by being soothed by Heir the night Sharpshooter arrived in Seattle. All of that festering guilt and horror - gone. Karkat could almost cry with relief, but he swallows it down, because he's doing his very best to not drive himself into some kind of emotional breakdown when John is seconds from leaving to go hunt down his wayward sister.

A difficult task, but not impossible, as long as Dave Strider stays out in the hallway until it's time for the two heroes to leave. Karkat makes no promises once Flashstep is in the room. There's a lingering suspicion there just waiting for the chance to flare up again, a flurry of rage and mistrust and jealousy left over from that one time Karkat nearly went into full blown withdrawal and somehow ended up in a (completely platonic) Pestersmackdown against the red-text douche. That whole afternoon is mostly a ragey blank in Karkat's mind, but he remembers being incensed because he couldn't figure out why John would ever be friends with some asshole on the internet.

"Just don't let him shooshpap you while you're alone and vulnerable, John," Karkat says aloud. He mostly mumbles it into the pillow that his head is slowly sliding towards, but he catches himself with a jerk and raises his head again, blinking owlishly while wondering if that sentence even made any sense at all in context of their conversation. He's pretty sure it didn't.

Well, not very much makes sense at the moment. Dadbert is downstairs nursing a cup of wine and sternly lecturing someone from the so-called Harley Foundation on the necessity for an open dialog on the nature of Harley’s powers. Karkat doesn’t think he’s ever seen Samuel Egbert even mildly intoxicated in all of two years of practically living part-time in the man’s house. It’s been a weird day.

"Huh?" John asks. "What was that, Karkat?" He walks around the recooperacoon awkwardly set up in the center of his bedroom - and they probably need to teleport that back to Karkat's respite block at some point, fuck - and flops down next to Karkat on the bed. To Karkat's infinite disappointment, John stays sitting up instead of joining him in his half-slump over both pile and bed.

To be fair, the lure of cuddles with a complete fuckwad like Karkat is probably easy to ignore. But that thought is fucking depressing, and Karkat tries to ignore it. Just because John has long, mysterious conversations with Dave Strider over the internet doesn't mean that Dave's sudden real life appearance will mean John realizes the futility of moirallegiance with a fuckup like Karkat. Humans don't usually do moirallegiance at all - conciliatory quadrants aren't their focus when it comes to romance, particularly not between two humans. Maybe the whole bro thing really is just one of those weird human platonic variations on friendship, made suspect only because Karkat is a paranoid bastard who overthinks these things. He just has to stay positive.
...He's not good at positive. Karkat thinking positively is a contradiction in terms, and if he ever successfully pulls that off paradox space itself might well implode.

"If that asshole gets conciliatory on you I will wreck his shit," he still feels the need to insist. "Watch me."

John leans over and pats at Karkat's hair. "Karkat, I swear, Dave is so not trying to do the moirail thing!" he says. Karkat can feel John's heartbeat so deep in his bones that his own bloodpusher seems to slow down to match tempo. It's devastatingly soothing, and he sighs like some overwrought, pale-struck socialite out of a Victorian comedy of manners. "Dave and I - we usually talk about hero stuff, and all the weird things that go on with us, since, you know, I didn't think I could tell you all the hero-related things. Like, he has a bird clone version of himself." At Karkat's look of horror, John laughs. "And suddenly Jade!"

Karkat snorts, because that's the most accurate fucking description of the Harley situation he's heard all day.

"And if I -" John clears his throat. "If I...kind of freaked out to him about you getting hurt...it was not a romantic thing! None of the quadrants, Karkat, I swear! I freaked out and started telling about it with Rose, too! Nothing really calmed me down until you woke up!"

The smile he offers is shaky and faltering, and the uncertainty there wakes Karkat right the fuck up, enough that he frowns and somehow manages to haul himself up off the pile, clamping his hands on either side of John's face so he can't pull away while Karkat inspects him with a moirail's eye.

He trusts John, is the thing. Dave's motives might be suspect, because Dave is a pokerfaced dick that Karkat wouldn't trust as far as he could fucking throw him. If John says he wasn't truly pacified without Karkat, the least Karkat can do is fucking well trust him, no matter what his insecurities are babbling at him internally about humans not recognizing a fledgling moirallegiance until it paps them in the face.

But John is sitting on something again. Like the day Karkat missed half a day of school to catch Crichton - with Heir, he realizes, but he forces that thought and all it implies down to deal with some other time - and John had pasted on his too-bright, obviously false grin and tried to pretend Karkat's absence hadn't fucked with all of his old abandonment issues.

And when John goes into denial mode, everything suddenly becomes a fucking federal issue to extricate from his defensive thinkpan. It's not an attitude that's conducive to a feelings jam, and Karkat suspects that they wouldn't have time to properly suss this out anyway, not when John's already got one foot out the door to go looking for his stupid, stupid sister.

"I believe you, dumbass," is all Karkat says, resting his forehead against John's with care. He's still got that massive bruise in the bone of his skull that he'd prefer not to jostle. "I also, if you think I can't tell something's still eating at you, you are dead fucking wrong. Road kill is more goddamn lively than your current state of wrongness."

This close up, he can't miss the way John's eyes widen reflexively. Busted. "I just -"

"I don't want to hear excuses," Karkat interrupts, rolling his eyes. "We're talking about whatever the fuck it is, whether you like it or not. You've probably got it in your silly thinkpan that I'm too hurt to handle this -" John winces and that's admission enough right there "- but I am not made of fucking glass. We'll deal with this when you've corralled your wayward Harley."

Because John doesn’t want to burden other people. If there is anything Karkat has learned over two years of dealing with this kid, it's that John will do anything other than talk about his problems and emotions if he thinks the other person can't handle the truth. He lets it pile up until the weight of it could smother a lesser man, lets it all sink in and molder like compost in the back of his mind, until it's developed into some kind of incestuously fertile breeding ground for the kind of pain and anguish that even John can't ignore.

Too fucking bad. Karkat doesn't have the best track record with handling his own fucking meltdowns, but he likes to think that he's at least proven he can guide John through his without fucking up too badly. That's the point of the pale quadrant - neither of them can handle their issues on their own. They help keep each other stable. By this point, Karkat's mental stability is so tied up in John's, unravelling their relationship would probably unravel his mind altogether.

"Just - can you keep your phone on you?" At the blank look on John's face, Karkat rolls his eyes. "Come on, dumbass, you need it so the fucking hipster can communicate anyway. And - fuck me - if you tell me what's going on and all that fucking codependent bullshit, it'll help me not think about the fucked up nightmares and probably prevent me from toppling governments and leveling city blocks with the force of my panic tantrum. Alright?"

"Of course! You've got it, Karkat!" John says, the vague daze of being on the receiving end of a surprise pale intervention blinking out of his eyes as he moves on autopilot to grab one of Karkat's hands and squeeze it. "Are the nightmares still that bad?"

"Bad enough," Karkat says, grimacing. He's slept practically all day, but for some reason being unconscious for extended periods of time apparently doesn't equate to actual rest. So while John is out doing dangerous things as Heir, Karkat's going to be forcing himself through a sleep cycle, and all the nightmares that has come to imply -

Wait.

Nightmares.

Certain key details of said nightmares -

"Oh my god. Oh my fucking - are you kidding me?" Karkat wails, and then he is forced to break off and let go of John's hand to hold his ribs together. "You're - fucking - shitting me!" he continues through pained, labored breathing.

One of John's hands squeezes his shoulder, and the worry that grips his face almost seems to make his eyes flash a brighter blue. "What, Karkat-?"

Karkat wonders how the fuck John ever managed to conceal that kind of thing. Contact lenses could only have gone so far, because John's powers seem to be directly linked to how bright the blue of his eyes starts glowing when he's upset.

The bright blue eyes that the young John of Karkat's nightmares has had all along.

...And he never once made that connection?! Seriously? "Are you fucking kidding me?!" Karkat stares off into space. He lets his head fall onto John's shoulder, but that's the only concession he makes as he drifts into a daze of horrified disbelief. "This is shit. This is complete and utter bullshit. No. Absolutely not."

"Karkat, you're not making any sense and it's freaking me out."

Karkat rubs John's back with a hand, and laughs hollowly. "No, no, don't mind me. I'm just going to spend the next few hours attempting to comprehend the vast, seemingly limitless depths of the ocean of cull-worthy, pan-cracked stupidity from which I have been drawing over the past couple of months. You know. The usual.” When he lifts his head and sees that John's face is still - understandably - concerned, he laughs sardonically. "All those nightmares I've been having?"

"The ones where I die a lot? How could I forget?" John's nose wrinkles up.

"You've had blue eyes all along."

It's almost worth it, just to see that same distant realization dawning across John's face. "How?!" John repeats, which sums up Karkat's feelings pretty nicely.

But Karkat can't think about this anymore. He is perfectly capable of despairing over this for hours at a time, because Karkat's stupidity is one of his thinkpan's favorite things to fixate on endlessly, but he's too fucking tired to justify that kind of obsessive cycle right now, and that's saying something. "Go. Get your asshole 'bro' and take off," Karkat orders, shaking his head. "Get out of here and drag the gun maniac back home before she provokes Droog into blowing shit up again."

The mention of hero work snaps John back into alertness with unnerving speed. His shoulders straighten, and he frowns as his focus recenters on the whole Harley debacle.

Karkat's still adjusting to the way John can flip into hero mode at the drop of a hat - and what he's adjusting to, he doesn't like. John's face clears up, all that despair gone in an instant, as though it was never there.

And that confirms something that Karkat's been wondering about. Just how much of John's regular emotions does he shove to the side to make that shift in his mind set? They're remarkably similar in personality, now that Karkat can see the obvious parallels between the two, but Heir has an air of professionalism and caution John couldn't imitate even at his most serious. And with the way John tends to dwell on his issues and let them build up until the breaking point...

Karkat is Concerned. The capitalization is entirely deserved.

But...later, he tells himself. When they have more time and fewer missing people to worry about.

"We'll be right back as soon as we find her," John promises, standing up with the wind already swirling around him. "Hopefully the wind can guide us right to her, so we won't be gone too long, unless she gets stubborn about it and starts bouncing everywhere! Promise me you'll get some sleep, 'kay?"

"I promise," Karkat sighs, hooking his pinkie claw on John's little finger for a brief moment before waving him off. "Now let me crawl into my 'coon before you bring Mr Unnecessary Sunglasses in, so I at least have an excuse not to try to strangle him in a possessive ragefit."

John stifles a quiet laugh, helping Karkat haul himself off the bed with a tug that has far more force behind it than Karkat is used to feeling on John's end. Heir has pretty impressive physical strength, and Karkat can only wonder if that's why John is so good at swimming despite the fact that he doesn't attend practice half the damn time.

It only takes one shallow wheeze of sopor trickling into his respiratory system to make Karkat's eyes roll back in his head. The dull, consistently throbbing pain of his ribs washes away in bubbles of green, encouraging him to take deeper breaths and inhale more sopor, and he would almost think the nightmares to come are worth it as long as he doesn't have to feel his battered torso for a few blissful hours.

Almost.

Karkat dreams -

There is a black winged hellbeast in the sky above him. Black smoke billows up and obscures the fluffy white clouds as they pass overhead, and the monster arrows down through the ashes toward Karkat and John.

Karkat recognizes it, this time. He's seen glimpses in the past, but he's never tried to make sense of the nightmares before. Nightmares are nightmares. They're fucked up. He sees John dying. End of story.

But now -

Now, Karkat stares up into the sky, and he recognizes the wolf-headed carapacian winging down towards him, because he thinks it's the same thing that killed Harley in that other dream, replete with the tentacles and the harlequin hat and the wings. The only thing that's changed is that now it has a wolfish muzzle grafted onto its face, and he's fucking astonished that even his shithive of a thinkpan didn't make the connection before this.

One simple addition, and Karkat can see that this is the same thing that's been consistently murdering John for almost as long as Karkat's been dreaming about the subject.

If he were to try to apply logic to these piece of shit dreams - which he is so fucking not - he'd be tempted to think that this indicates a rough timeline of events. But he's not tempted. At all. Nope. He refuses to buy into this shit even being in the same universe as logic. Logic is an alien species and cannot survive the atmospheric conditions of the planet that these dreams take place on.

He's distinct from John and Harley is nowhere in sight. So at least they're back to the old formula of Karkat standing by and watching helplessly while his moirail dies repeatedly. Because, you know, he misses all that like he misses being eaten alive by ravenous coyotes.

The déjà vu only hits him when Karkat looks down, trying to avert his eyes from whatever the winged wolf is about to do to John. He can't look at the static that buzzes and crackles where the ground should be; his eyes sting and his head shrieks in pain, so instead he squints down at the smoldering ruins of the golden moon. They're floating about twenty feet up, give or take, and so he can make out the pool of bright red blood rippling out from under a chunk of sunshine yellow wall. A tiny dark arm reaches out from the side, as though the poor sap crush underneath ten thousand tons of rock had been hit in the middle of reaching out -

Harley, Karkat remembers, the realization drilling through his skull like an ice pick. John was crying about Harley. Startled, he jerks his head around to stare at the baby-faced version of his John, who hovers in the air, too exhausted to move. John's eyes are a brilliant, vibrant blue, yet more proof that Karkat's subconscious really has been picking up on this stuff all along, and he's just been too busy being a complete fuckface to notice the subtle hints linking John and Heir, right down to the hammer John's been using to fight.

In fact - Karkat peers at John's eyes and - yup. He's wearing her glasses right now. They switched at some point, for whatever brilliant fucking reason. The moon fell out of the sky and she was crushed, but John survived to fight - this.

He can't believe it. He's already had this dream. He had this dream - shit, was it really the morning after dealing with Crichton?

Which doesn't make sense, because he had that dream before they met Harley as Sharpshooter. What the actual fuck -

"I feel like we've done this before," John says beside him, ruffling his hair. He's thirteen years old and scrawny, and covered in tiny scrapes and cuts where the golden hammer couldn't parry the monster's blows in time. "But it wasn't right. I didn't remember it right." He shrugs, his smile rueful. "Might as well try again."

Karkat blinks.

What.

"Are you talking to me?" he asks. Even though that doesn't make sense. John doesn't interact with Karkat in these dreams. Karkat has tried everything short of painting messages in his own blood to try to get John's attention and prevent his moirail's death dozens of times over, and it has never worked. John just peddles on oblivious to the danger, off to be crushed or stabbed or eaten while Karkat looks on helplessly from the sidelines.

Except that one time. God, it was a while ago, wasn't it, but Karkat thinks he remembers - only the once -

(Everything is a brilliant, molten gold; the winged creature raises a fist and another explosion of green blasts up at the moon; a hand claps on his shoulder; "Karkat, we have to go!"

"Of course I am!" John exclaims, smiling and looking directly at Karkat with his eyes crinkled up in laugh lines. "But you still haven't woken up, have you?"

Oh, for fuck's sake. "There is a giantass barkbeast-faced monstrosity trying to kill you!" Karkat yells, seizing John by the shoulders and shaking him, reveling in the sheer wonder of at last having the power to get his message across. The last time John spoke to him in these nightmares, Karkat had still been too baffled and panfried to take advantage of it. He knows better now. "You need to run and get the fuck away from here, right now!" Then he pauses, and glares up at the sky. "Wait - how the fuck hasn't it reached us already?! It fucking teleports!"

"Talking is a free action." John cocks his head to the side, worrying his lip with his buckteeth, more prominent than usual on his young face. "Except when it isn't. This dumb Game is kind of arbitrary that way!"

Green fire blazes up behind John, and Karkat's stomach drops out from under him as the monster pops in behind John, sword at the ready. John, the doofus that he is, just smiles at Karkat, his blue eyes twinkling with all the merriment of ignorance.

Shit. Shit. Karkat does the only thing he can do. He shoves John to the side and flings himself in the way of the incoming blade. Because anything would be infinitely preferable to watching John die again -

There is a blur of white and red and black, and Dave Strider's sneaker slams into the side of the hellbeast's ugly mug. The sword inches from Karkat's chest retracts as the monster snarls and brings the blade up to deflect the swing of a bright white sword in Dave's hands.

"See!" John cries ecstatically over the metal crash of two blades colliding in midair. "I told you! It wasn't right! We were still missing Dave!"
Karkat's jaw drops. He can't be asked to fix that; he just watches in slack-jawed disbelief as the hellbeast grabs Dave's foot and tosses him over its head. Dave tumbles through the air, headed for the ground, but before he can make impact he twists his free hand and a flame-patterned skateboard appears to catch him. The rockets on either side of the board fire up, and Dave rises up to their level once more.

Absolutely nothing about that last sentence made sense. First Harley, now Dave 'Douchebag' Strider? What the fuck is going on in Karkat's head?!

This Dave is too young, too, Karkat realizes with a twinge of unease. His shades are two sizes too large for his thin face, and the white suit coat, black slacks, and blood red bow tie sit awkwardly on his skinny frame. Even the sword he's using, a far cry from the piece of shit swords Flashstep is famed for using ironically, is too large for him, broken off near the hilt but still heavy in the kid's tiny hand. The style that looks obnoxiously sophisticated (a fact which Karkat will admit only grudgingly, even in the privacy of his own nightmares) on a nineteen year old only makes thirteen-year-old Dave look like a little wriggler playing dress up, trying too hard to impress.

God. Fuck. He does not want to watch pathetic little kid Dave die. He didn't want to watch little kid Jade die, either. Karkat would like to personally extend two cosmic middle fingers to whatever asshole deity assigned these nightmares to him, and thus render him physically incapable of ever being able to disentangle his interactions with the real-life versions from the memories of their pitiful child corpses.

"Yo. So this is where the party's at, Egbert?" Dave mumbles - monotone and clipped, with a faint Texan drawl, but definitely speaking aloud. Karkat is not imagining that. "This's the SOB who iced Jade?"

"Yup!" John says, sounding way too fucking chipper, like holy shit. "Twice, actually! Or at least, I'm pretty sure he's the one who blew up the moon. I think I was asleep at the time. But the first time on her planet - yep. This guy!" He points a finger at the hellbeast, which has come to a stop and is eyeing them warily, seemingly thrown off by the addition of a third member to their little mid-battle soiree.

"And then it ate her barkbeast," Karkat adds, just to see if he can and if Dave can hear him, too. "And became a green fire demon."

Dave raises one impossibly thick eyebrow. "Jesus fuck. What the hell was she even feeding that thing?"

"Radioactive steaks!" John says.

"John, seriously. You need to stop being so fucking chipper," Karkat says. "This is an order from your moirail, because I cannot even handle you being high on life while said life is in immediate fucking danger."

John sticks out his tongue, nudging Karkat with his shoulder. "Make me~!"

Dave, meanwhile, shakes his head with a heavy sigh. "Always told her she oughtta take that hellhound out behind the shed for a one-girl Old Yeller reenactment."

"Gosh no, Dave, that part always made me cry!" John protests, clapping his hands to his cheeks.

"How the fucking fuck," Karkat interrupts, before they can go off on another insane dumbass tangent, "has that thing not attacked you two yet?"
It's unbelievable. The wolf-headed monster hovers ominously before them over the ruined landscape, sword in hand and green electricity swarming over its features, but it hasn't moved since it threw Dave, except to cock its head to the side and stare at them.

"Talking is a free action," Dave and John say in unison. "How do you think we always have time to pester everyone?" John finishes on his own, giggling his thirteen-year-old hiccupy giggle. It's despicably adorable and Karkat wants to hugsmush the giggles out of him because wasn't this supposed to be a nightmare? John isn't allowed to be this pathetically adorable and make Karkat's heart twist this way when any second now all hell could break loose.

Because it will. John may have been granted a reprieve thanks to Dave's appearance, but in Karkat's vast experience, that just means his subconscious is cooking up a new and even more traumatizing way to murder his palemate for no fucking reason.

"Jade is dead," Dave says, sounding grim, "and Rose is gone. Dream her is dead, at least, last time I checked. So I guess it's just us left." He pauses, then shrugs, cupping his hands around his mouth, and yells in the hellbeast's general direction. "Let's tear this clown fucker a new one!"

With a roar, the hellbeast lunges at them. Karkat flinches, startled and ready for the end, but Dave and John spring into action. The ring in John's hand, the one that he's been clutching since the crash landing for no discernable reason, sparks with a flash of light and flips into a hammerkind once more. Dave zooms around in an arc to come at the demon from the side, and the two humans strike almost at the same time.

Green light swallows up the demon, and it vanishes, reappearing behind John. Dave doesn't even slow up his momentum, zooming at John, catching him by the shoulder, and using him as a pivot to ram the rocketboard into the hellbeast's face. It yelps and teleports away to a point about ten feet below them, staring up with hate filled eyes, the fur of its muzzle singed and crispy.

"Do you have a fraymotif for this?" Dave yells, kicking off his board. It vanishes as he falls in a controlled descent toward the wolf's back, and the hellbeast barely manages to teleport away before his sword can slice through its wings. The board reappears just in time to catch him, and Karkat is seriously starting to wonder how he's doing that trick. Is his subconscious slurring Harley's powers together into Dave for one clusterfuck of a human being?

"A who what now?!" John yells back and oh thank fucking god, Karkat's not the only one who has no idea what Dave is on about.

"John, what have you even been doing on your planet?!!" Dave says, landing on the rocketboard and grabbing the edge of the board with his hand as he arcs up at a steep angle, hair flying back from his face. "How have you not been earning fraymotifs and abusing them all over the place?!!"

"I've been flying!" John grunts and takes the full brunt of the monster's downward swing on the balance point of the hammer's handle, one hand barely scooting up under the head of the hammer in time to avoid losing fingers. "And, you know - stuff!"

"Well shit." Dave scratches his head, and then yanks an entire new sword from apparently nowhere. "We can't pull a [Smashup Session] if you don't have any sickass beats for me to work with!" He flings himself at the hellbeast from the side.

"Ack! Sorry!"

One of the demon's tentacles lashes out and smacks Dave in the side. With a grunt, the kid flies off the board. John yelps and ducks under the monster's next blow, grabbing the rocketboard as he makes a beeline for Dave - who is apparently the only one in this dream who can't fly. Even Karkat can float, and he's definitely not the flying hero type.

...Could he fight? He grabbed John, and that worked. Wary, Karkat stares at the wolfish demon, who has ignored him all this time, and wonders if he could just dig a claw into his wrist, form a sicklekind, and end this. End it before anyone gets hurt. Dave or John or both, it doesn't matter, but the thought of John in particular dying like this after a brief moment of hope is just - unthinkable. He can't let it happen, not again.

So Karkat leaps into the fray. He jams a claw into the skin of his wrist, just under the fabric of the golden pajamas' sleeve, and whips the blood out in front of him in a curving arc as he darts at the hellbeast, hoping against hope that he can surprise it.

No such luck. Before he can get within a foot of the monster, the hellbeast vanishes, swallowed by green galaxies -

And doesn't reappear. Karkat swings around, expecting it to have materialized behind him, as it tends to do, but there's nothing to see but John and Dave hovering back to back, looking equally confused. John caught Dave a foot or so above the static where the ground should be, and the time hero is on his rocketboard again, both of them hovering mere inches from the ground but battle-ready.

Dave swears avidly, with a unique fervor at odds with his flat expression, and it sounds just plain weird hearing that kind of language out of a kid with a voice that emotionless. When he switches back into non-cuss words, however, the kid sounds nervous. "Shit. Fuck. Where'd it go - I can't see it, man -"

"I can't see it either!" John reports, his back pressed up against Dave's and his feet barely scraping the ground. His face has gone sheet white, sweat streaking down his temples, and Karkat can see the intense tremors rocking John's arm, the one that held the ring. Under the fabric of his golden pajamas, his arm burns with white light. He looks like absolute shit, ready to pass out at any moment, and Karkat remembers, with a jolt of horror, the sensation of the power scorching John's veins during that dream when he shared John's perspective of this fight. John had fallen in the first place because the pain of wielding the Hammering grew too much for him to withstand, but Karkat hadn't even thought about the consequences of him summoning it again to fight beside Dave.

_Fuck._ How much longer does he have left before his blood just fucking boils?

As it turns out, Karkat doesn’t need to worry about that. He doesn't even have time to frantically try to piece together a blood-related counter, some way that his powers might be able to salvage John's arm.

The demon reappears ten feet from Dave. Karkat lets out a cry of warning, but it cuts off when he sees the look on the hellbeast's face. A sadistic smirk spreads across its muzzle, twisting its horrific visage into a knowing, secretive grin. The monster raises its sword before it, and Dave brandishes his in response, ready to parry -

And then, tongue lolling from its jaw in a silent laugh, the wolf demon stabs itself in the gut. The moment before the blade hits, its entire body jolts with white and green plasma that almost seems to circle around a hole in its stomach, and for some reason, Karkat thinks he can see something white looming in the strange vortex -

A burst of green appears inches from Dave, and the kid can do no more than gasp and look down at the sword that's just been teleported straight through the right side of his chest. It punches right through his ribs and out through his back, dripping with blood. The white of his suit jacket bubbles up with red instantly, a damp stain that only grows larger when the demon retracts the sword from its stomach, barking a laugh as Dave stumbles forward, barely keeping both feet on his rocketboard.

But Karkat can't focus on that. He's too busy staring at John.

"John," Dave says woozily, clutching at the wound with a hand and trying to staunch it with the fabric of his suit, shuddering. "Oh shit - shit - it's the right side, didn't hit anything too vital, I can handle that - fuck -"

"Dave," John says. His voice is tight and strained and Karkat's bloodpusher breaks in two.

Dave just starts babbling as he turns, his sword still clasped in one hand as he grabs John's shoulder to steady himself. "Okay, that hurts like a mother*fucker, but I can still fight. Are you -"

Dave shuts up. Which is good, because in about two seconds Karkat was going to reach out and help him shut up.

John bends forward, and spits a mouthful of blood into the cupped palm of his hand. "Dave," he croaks, sinking to his knees on the ground, "your right - is my left."

All Karkat can hear is a faint buzz in his ears, and over that, a stuttering, slowing pulse.

Th-thump.

Blood paints John's mouth red as he presses his palm to the hole in his heart.

Dave's right, John's left, because they were standing together, back to back and a sword teleported through Dave's side would pass through John's heart and that's just -

Th-thump.

Karkat lets the sicklekind trickle away as John huddles in on himself, the hammer vanishing as he drops the ring to the ground with a clink. Dave is still standing there, and when he does sink to his knees beside John's crumpled form it's almost an afterthought, his mouth moving wordlessly as he touches a hand to the blooming red wound in John's back. "John?" he asks, lost and confused. "John?"

*Th-

"John, no, I was there, you're not supposed to get -" Dave breaks off, incredulous, and his hand clamps down on John's shoulder, shaking him. One arm wraps around to try to join John's hand over the front of the wound, but Dave's hands are shaking hard now, and John's pajamas are slick with blood. John collapses forward, and lies still, and Dave starts yelling, his voice hoarse and broken. "John, John!"

Karkat slumps to his knees, too.

When the demon appears behind Dave, this time, Dave just looks up. There is a slight delay, as though for a long moment he can't bring himself to look away from John. His lips part slightly, and he wets them - and then, with a shake of his head, lets his sword fall from loose fingertips.

Karkat almost thinks Dave tilts his head back. Either way, the demon moves too quickly to be stopped, even if Karkat or Dave were in any kind of fucking shape to do anything about it. The sword slashes across with brutal precision, a single clean slice that opens up Dave's throat in a curtain of red. Dave gurgles, his shades flying off his face with the force of the blow, and he falls over backwards, choking on the blood that wells up in the new hollow of his throat.

Th-

John turns his head to the side and there are tears pouring down his face as he watches Dave bleed out.

"This," he says, voice rasping, "this is what happened."

Thump.

And Karkat -

(finally)

- wakes up.

The clicking rainbow static of the ground beneath his knees swallows him whole, yanks him down, and the last image he has is of John and Dave lying in a pool of their own blood. Something drags him down and down and down -

Karkat sits up with a scream, his voice cracking, and he keeps right on screaming as he claws at the rainbow static around him. His eyes sting with tears and who knows what else, burning as he fights his way through the dazzling array of multicolored, flashing lights that try to smother him and drag him back down onto his back.

Something is wrong.

John's heart -

Did you notice?

Harley's chest -

Hang on a second…

Dave's throat -

Oh shit.

He'll bet his fucking non-existent life's savings on Rose being the fourth -

You know, you could just...sort of reach over...and...

"Oh, thit!"

What an obnoxious lisp, Karkat thinks, completely derailed from his previous train of thought as he tumbles free of the static. He hits the ground hard, still screaming right up until the moment he bites his tongue on impact. The ground feels cool and smooth under his claws as he continues to blindly crawl away from the flickering static, sobbing because John is dead and they're all dead and he's not
"Whoopsies! You're awake way too early, Karkat!"

An unfamiliar, horrifically cheery voice says that, and Karkat is seized by the instinct to throttle whoever would dare use such a bright tone when he's just watched John die again. He snarls, blinking his watery eyes in the hopes that the after glare of all the static will clear up. That way he can at least get some idea of his surroundings and which fruity asshole just volunteered for the emergency strangling extravaganza.

But the ground remains a stubborn golden blur beneath his hands, and his head aches fiercely with the kind of groggy migraine born of napping for too long in the sun.

"Back to sleep with you, alright? You're still much safer in there!"

A pair of too-warm fingers - goldblood or warmer, Karkat has time to think, seeing as how he runs at about human standard temperatures and these hands feel like fire on his forehead - brush against his skin, along with the soft click of beads that tap against his temple. He pulls back, lashing out blindly, but the voice just tuts and pats him on the head. "It's alright! Just give it a few more weeks, okay? Then you can wake up!"

Karkat summons up the single most eloquent response in his repertoire. It's beautiful, an ancient classic, and he puts as much reverence and hatred into his voice as he can muster, to truly do it justice.

"Fuck you," he says, smiling widely as darkness eats across his vision, and he - (falls back asleep and)

- wakes up.

Properly, this time. Who even fucking knows what that last part was about.

Karkat propels himself out of the recooperacoon with force born of old reflex, feeling his skin crawl as he drags himself free of the sopor slime, and he almost makes it all the way to the toilet before he hurls.

He didn't have much in his stomach anyway except sopor residue, which tastes like bitter, tacky scum water on the way back up. It coats the inside of his mouth with a thin film of slime, and he gags on that too, because fuck his life. "Fan-fucking-tastic," he spits, scratching at the base of his horns as the last shivers of horror and grief run through him. The dream clamors at the front of his thinkpan, clamoring for his attention like a hellish symphony of 'what the fucks.'

Fortunately, before he can start sobbing grossly into the toilet and texting John, something else interrupts his impending bitchfit.

SS: 'Bout time you woke up, kid.

There are some voices you don't forget. Even faint and distorted, as carapacian speech tends to be when you're not looking at their hand signs, Karkat knows that voice. Something about the speaker stabbing him repeatedly kind of stuck in his mind, and he shoves himself back from the toilet with a gasp to stare at the Surprise Stabber sitting hunched over in the shadow of the recooperacoon, his scarred face half-lit in stark chiaroscuro by the bathroom light.
SS: Rise and shine, sleepin' beauty, you've got company.

He's also wearing a huge, shapeless grey sweater. Karkat stares, stupefied, and tries to process this. The knitting is uneven and the misshapen black spade symbol across the front most closely resembles a blob. It sags on the Dersite's spindly frame like a sack. "How the fuck did you even break into this house, you fuckfaced stabhappy lunatic?" he demands at last, flushing the toilet and staggering to his feet, because he needs to actually focus on what's important, here, and that's the fact that the Surprise Stabber is in John's house. "Fuck. Tell me you didn't fucking stab Dad Egbert." Generally he assumes that Dadbert could probably kick some serious ass - Heir has to have learned it all from someone, after all - but on the other hand who knows how alcohol could affect that guy's judgment -

The carapacian snorts, and rolls up the magazine in his hands, tucking it inside his sweater before Karkat can read the cover. But rather than standing up and stabbing him - fucking incredible, really - the alien remains sprawled out in the shadows, merely tilting the brim of his battered hat back to squint at Karkat with a sour expression.

SS: Look, chump. The name's Spades Slick. Did you even bother to read my card? Why do I even have those things lying around?

SS: And no, I didn't stab anyone to get in here, I'm disappointed to say.

SS: The window was open.

Karkat blinks and looks at John's window, which is still hanging open from when John and Dave bounced to Seattle on the wind. The curtains flutter in the breeze, mocking him.

...Well, fuck. Mentally cussing out past-Karkat for being his usual irresponsible fuck up of a self, Karkat casts a suspicious glance at Spades before stooping to gargle water from the sink. The water makes his teeth ache with cold, but it swills the foul tasted of sour sopor slime right out of his protein chute, which makes it all worthwhile. "So, can I ask why you're here, or would that interrupt your shanking agenda too much?"

He's resigned himself to getting shanked again at this point. His ribs have been fucked to hell and back in a tiny rocket-powered handbasket thanks to Droog, and his legs hurt enough that he's going nowhere fast. Even if he sees this nubfucker's knifekind coming, he doubts he'll be able to react in time to dodge it.

Surprisingly, the carapacian shakes his head - though not without a noticeable grimace of regret that bares viciously sharp teeth.

SS: We don't got much time. Diamonds is riding my ass and I can't shake her tails much longer, so we can't stand around chewing gum.

SS: I'm here because you've got yourself neck deep in a pit of absolute shit, and as per usual yah need me to bail you out.

Karkat snorts, wrapping an arm around his fucking useless ribcage and hobbling out of the bathroom to eye the carapacian from a safer distance. Spades lets his head roll to the side to keep eyeballing Karkat with a constant grimace, but hey, Karkat has a permanent scowl, too. So at least they have unceasing, cosmically ordained irritation on which to establish common ground.

And let it be stated for the record that yes, Karkat is very on board with any alliance plans that might be in the works, here. He has too many people to hate and not enough juice in his rageglands to hate them all equally. And if he pisses this asshole off, he gets stabbed. Any path that leads to 'not-"Fucking fine," Karkat snaps, folding his arms. "Aside from the fact that I've obviously been on the wrong end of someone else's evil curb stomping spree, what the fuck do you think I need help with? And what in the nooksniffing fuck did I do to earn your help anyway?" He narrows his eyes. "What do you get out of this kind of cahootery? What's your angle?"

Spades's claws click against the smooth shell of his forehead as he smacks his face.

SS: For fuck's sake.

SS: I don't dick around with ulterior motives. We've gotta goddamn blood pact that's busting my internal genitalia, and until you're outta the woods it won't cut me a break. Been acting up for weeks now. Thanks for that, by the way.

"What? Blood pact?" Karkat admits defeat and sinks into the chair by John's desk, wincing as his ribs creak and press in against his lungs. Holy fuck, how long does it take until his insides stop feeling like a puzzle box with all the pieces rattling around loose inside? He sits on the chair backwards, hooking one leg absently around the swivel part of the chair, and leaning his elbows and chin against the top of the chair to glower down at the alien. "We've never even met before."

SS: Of course yah don't. Because that would be too easy. Just my fuckin' luck…

SS: Look, forget about the Game. Forget the pact. I'll just say, we agreed to help each other out a while back. Mutual toleration and back-scratchin', the whole kebab. But you don't remember enough to make it worth the time.

Karkat has no idea what he's talking about. "Done," he agrees, with just enough sarcasm layered in his voice to really punch his point home. "Skip to the part where you're making your no doubt unspeakably generous offer of helpful, friendly non-stabbing assistance."

SS: All you need to know is that Diamonds has a weakness, and you and your crew are finally set up to cash that in.

And that - that gets Karkat's attention. He stiffens, one fist clenching as he tilts his head to the side, inspecting the carapacian in a new light. "...I'm listening."

Spades grins. It's not a pleasant sight.

SS: Thought that'd perk your nubby interest.

SS: Listen up, y'hear? Diamonds is good. The man always terrified the hell outta me, and I was the one who recruited him in the first place.

"Man?" Karkat interrupts, because things are already making less sense than Harley on a science bender.

SS: Not anymore. Used to be a shell like me, too. Shit's complicated.

"Oh." Karkat motions with his claw. "Carry on. I'm all auricular sponge clots, here."

SS: But there are two things in this world she can't resist.

SS: The first is Swedish fish. Fuck only knows why, but she can't get enough of the stuff.

"That, amazingly enough, is not helpful." Karkat tries to comprehend the fundamental stupidity that would be required to formulate a plan involving Diamonds Droog and vast quantities of Swedish fish, and comes to the vastly reassuring conclusion that not even his shithive thinkpan can process those levels of mind-numbing bullshit.

Besides, where would they even find a tanker truck big enough to hold that much candy?

...He's starting to think the Egbert prankster gambit is rubbing off on him. And not in a good way.

Spades shrugs with one shoulder, an unreadable expression crossing his face before he resettles himself against the 'coon.

SS: You'd be surprised. A little bribery goes a long way in certain situations.

SS: The second is that she's a professional. Even when she's in full on murder mode, she won't do anything that ain't classy as fuck. She takes pride in her accomplishments and her dignity. And that's how you fight her.

SS: You either appeal to her professional interests and hope she can't outthink yah...which she can. Trust me, you're all not that smart, kid, you're not gonna be able to convince her she should side with that pack of morons you run around with.

"Hey!"

SS: Or, you change something she can't predict.

SS: Diamonds is an ace at not getting distracted by stupid shit when she's on a mission. Time shenanigans, head games - none of that fazes her. But she tends to underestimate people after she thinks she's dealt with 'em once. She prides herself on 'getting the job done' the first time around.

SS: And she's primed to underestimate you in a major way. I saved your bacon last night, kid, you were doing absolutely terrible in that fight.

"That was you!" Karkat exclaims, straightening up in his chair - and immediately regretting it as his torso screams in protest. However short of a sleep cycle he got through, it's obvious that the lack of motion has set him back to square one on adjusting to the constant pain. Not even the pain-numbing effects of sopor make much of a dent in it now that he's out of the slime itself. "I thought that was some kind of fucked up death hallucination."

Then - "Hold the fuck up. Were you watching me get my ass handed to me?" he asks, folding his arms closed to his chest and glaring. "And you only decided to throw your hat into the ring after that?!"
SS: Actually, no, because I thought no one in their right mind would go up against a monster like Di without an actual fuckin’ plan.

SS: When I realized she’d let off chasing me and started dawdling around on a roof for no reason, I hightailed it over there to save your ass. You're goddamn welcome.

They sit there in aggravated silence for a few long moments before Karkat heaves a sigh and mutters, "Yeah, thanks. I guess." He has a strong suspicion that Heir and Sharpshooter arrived probably only a few moments after he lost consciousness, from the way John told it, but alright. Fuck. He owes the creepy carapacian a life debt or something. He's still not clear on the blood pact thing, and has no idea how this affects their potential alliance, but whatever. He's tired and feels like shit and he can't put any more thought into this than he already has.

SS: The point I'm try ta make here is, you need to reshuffle your deck and work with a new hand.

SS: I can't believe I've been reduced to card metaphors again.

SS: I'm no expert, but I've been staking out this place for a while, and the blond kid -

Karkat pinches the bridge of his nose. "Dave? King of all stoic hipster douchebags?"

SS: Bingo. He's a Knight too.

SS: You do know you're a Knight, right?

When Karkat widens his eyes pointedly and throws up his hands, the carapacian groans unintelligibly. "You suck at explanations," Karkat says, because it needs to be absolutely clearly who is at fault for the total clusterfuck this conversation is becoming. He's weighing the odds inwardly on how likely it is that this is just another weird nightmare, a product of his shithive excuse for a thinkpan's usual incompetence.

SS: Shaddup. If yah remembered like you were supposed to, you all wouldn't be such hopeless fucks. Everyone else understands.

SS: You're a Knight of Blood. He's got Time. That's what your powers are about. Is that so hard? Capiche?

Surprisingly enough, aside from the arbitrary Knight thing, Karkat thinks he's getting it. If he ignores the basically half of what the carapacian says. "Yeah, fine. Still not getting the Knight thing, but what else is new."

SS: All yah need to know about Knights is that they exploit things. You can't make blood outta thin air - that'd be a Maid thing - but you can use it to fight and patch things up, right? Any way you can get the most use out of it. And it works best if yah use it to defend others.

"That is incredibly arbitrary," Karkat hisses, feeling his head begin to pulse with a real headache, now. He is scraping the very bottom of a very small barrel of patience that he's been trying to keep in reserve, and without John here to calm him down he is going to lose his shit. "That doesn't - I - fuck - why do you even know something like that?! Who makes up a system like that?" Because the only thing he can think of is that this is some weird, sick way that aliens like carapacians classify random mutant super powers - some weird medieval hierarchy thing, maybe? Whatever the fuck it is, he wants no part in it.

SS: Just trust me.
Something in Karkat's thinkpan cracks. "No!"

SS: Whatever. It's the truth, whether you buy it or not, kid. Anyway, working with Witches is tricky and I wouldn't dick around with that load of hoopla until you all get your heads on straight.

SS: But Knights've got a simple work around. Primarily protective class, y'see. If you're working to rescue someone, the stats max out by default.

Karkat, with great care, lets his head fall into his hands, and closes his eyes. This means that he can't hear the telepathy as well, which is fine by him. "No, go on," he says when Spades cuts off with a menacing growl, and he waves his hand. "My thinkpan is just fucking boggling at the fact that someone who talks like a Prohibition-era gangster is pretending life is a fucking video game. Really. Go on."

SS: If you only knew.

"Wha -"

SS: Anyway, s'why I couldn't believe it when you literally shipped your Heir off to do goddamn grunt work. If you're fighting alone with no one to protect, you're pants at this hero gig. Yah really haven't noticed?

It takes Karkat a moment.

It takes him several moments, actually, and Spades starts tapping a claw impatiently on his knee, glowering.

But then, once it clicks, all he can think about is that night, over two weeks ago. Enough time has passed in a haze of nightmares and sopor withdrawal and panic that the memory is starting to grow distant, but Karkat could never forget the night Heir vanished, off on a country-spanning teleport spam to fight Dark Star, and Hemogoblin had to deal with Hearts Boxcars escaping all on his own. He'd been blown up, fucking bitten by an anonymous blueblood who had better not have been rabid or some shit, and then snubbed by Boxcars so hard the criminal had literally just dumped him into the bay rather than fight him.

Yeah. That kind of thing tends to stick in one's thinkpan, where one can mull over it and really let the failure rot and fester along with all the other screw-ups one has accumulated over a lifetime of fucking up.

Any other night, Hemogoblin would say he was pretty decent at kicking ass. Kicking is his specialty, right up there with sicklekind. But he hadn't been defending some victim from a mugger, shutting down a gas station robbery, or fighting in tandem with Heir - basically, nothing that would involve him acting in defense of someone else. It had just been him and the Midnight Crew, and while he'd done fine against the grunt level thugs, he hadn't even been able to lay hands on Boxcars.

...Seriously, is this some kind of weird alien psychological thing? Because it's fucking scary how Karkat can frame that situation to fit this weird Knight concept. The rational part of his brain is pretty sure there's a more logical explanation - something along the lines of 'Karkat Vantas is a professional fuckup' - but on the other hand -

It sounds...right. As half-assed as it sounds, the whole explanation sounds almost familiar. When he thinks about Karkat Vantas and the Knight of Blood at the same time, there is a brief moment when he thinks they sound like the exact same thing -
And nopenopenope. Fucking no. He's not touching that thought with a thirty foot pole, though he's not opposed to attaching a torch to the end of said pole and using it to set fire to the thought itself.

But apparently, the facial expressions he's making while undergoing that horrific paradigm shift are enough to make Spades think Karkat has seen the light.

SS: That's what I thought.

SS: Never mind the fact that an Heir 'n Knight protection gambit combo is one of the most game-breaking team ups ever -

SS: Oh, forget it. Just grab those asshat human players, put yourself between them and Diamonds, and enjoy the absolutely stupid amounts of carnage that will ensue. You're a Knight of Blood. Start acting like one.

Karkat waits. Spades seems to have finished up, though, and is arching a brow at Karkat as though awaiting commentary.

Slowly, Karkat brings his hands together and claps once. Twice. Three times. By the fourth Spades is on his feet, snarling, but Karkat just rolls his eyes and rests his chin on his palm, channeling all the righteous sarcasm his brain can muster. "As fun as that sounds, I somehow think the four broken ribs in my chest would probably resent me trying to do anything more strenuous than thinking and breathing."

Spades scratches his head with both claws, almost dislodging his hat as he does.

SS: Well, no shit. Don't yah fucking patronize me, kid, I was there.

SS: Shoulda thought of that one before you went and flung yourself into a meat grinder.

SS: But ribs? That'll clear up in, what? A week or two?

"For some reason I'm not up on the latest in carapacian biology," Karkat retorts, "but troll and human ribs can take at least a month to heal. So suck my fucking bulge."

He comes dangerously close to yelling again with that last sentence, and then his ribs start jabbing him with a vengeance, so he clamps his mouth shut and breathes through his nose for a good two minutes, focusing on tiny breaths. Absolutely fucking miniscule breaths. Anything that won't expand his rib cage past that critical point where everything starts to stab into internal organs.

SS: For a player? Nah. Don't know how you've gone your whole life without breaking a bone - unless you're even more of a wuss than I thought - but you've got perks.

SS: Besides, I can keep Di offa your back for a while. Buy yah some time while you get your head in the Game.

SS: And this is a Game. We never stopped playing.

"Good luck getting to Droog before Harley," Karkat mutters. He's still not over that. He supposes it's entirely possible that Sharpshooter went out with the intention of just teleporting Droog and her entire fanatical crew into a jail cell, but he also thinks that if Sharpshooter were the type to do the logical thing she wouldn't have spent the last two years crisscrossing the globe, kicking villains in the groin and shooting grenades at doomsday devices.

She's the type to make a stand on a snowy hill, and wait for a hellbeast to tear her apart in her utter, irrepressible conviction that she can handle it but no, Karkat swore to himself he wouldn't think about that, no matter how much his obsessive, miserable excuse for a thinkpan might want to.

SS: I musta misheard you.

SS: You did not just tell me that the Witch went after Diamonds.

Spades looks around the room wildly, as though Harley could spring out of the woodwork at any moment. Which, to be fair, she probably could.

Karkat throws up his hands anyway, and feels completely justified in despairing over the questionable sanity of everyone in this fucking room. "Of course she did! Dave and J- Heir are out there looking for her already!"

It's occurred to Karkat that he should probably not be using real names here. This is very much a matter of hero work, and John at least wouldn't want his identity outed to some random stabbing asshat. Dave and Harley could probably muster up about zero fucks to give between the two of them, but John would care.

SS: Well, shit. They better hope I get to Di before they do.

SS: But first - gimme your hand, brat.

The carapacian lurches toward Karkat and clamps down on Karkat's wrist. Karkat yelps, yanking his hand back, but Spades hangs on with grim determination as he digs through the pockets of his pants to flick out a knifekind.

Jesus fuck. Karkat never thought it would end like this, getting stabbed to death by some alien asshole in John's bedroom for no fucking reason -

Spades deftly flips the knife specibus between his fingers and stabs himself in the palm. A deep, jagged cut cracks open his shell, all the way through his brittle carapace to the red blood beneath. Karkat can't help but be distracted; Spades's wound is bizarrely familiar, and Karkat's sense for blood ramps up instantly as he hones in on Spades's rapid, determined heartbeat.

Then Spades forces the fingers of Karkat's clenched fist open and stabs him in the palm. "Ow! What the fuck!" Karkat shrieks, kicking back in the chair and slamming back against John's desk. His body yells at him for the sudden jolt, and he accomplishes a grand total of nothing - Spades just follows him, discarding the knife on the carpet and dripping huge, round drops of blood from both of their bleeding palms as he mashes their hands together in some perverse hold.

SS: This would go a lot easier if you knew what the hell we're doing, but I need the boost more than I need to dick around explaining basic concepts to a chump like you.

SS: Repeat after me or I shank you again.

Karkat nods frantically, still trying to jerk the injured hand out of sight. But the carapacian's claws dig into his skin and wrap around his wrist like a steel vise, keeping their palms pressed together.

SS: And enunciate like a proper fuckin' gentleman.

SS: [My Oath Is My Bond]

Karkat's head buzzes, and his mouth forms the words without any real conscious input from his thinkpan. "[My Oath Is My Bond]," he repeats.
The resonance pulses through his blood like a roll of thunder, and for a moment he burns, lost in a red haze of blood as all of his focus gets sucked into an unfamiliar circulatory system. Bright red words appear in his head, limned in the color of his blood and sharp-edged with power, as though his own thoughts are reverberating like carapacian speech. His senses dip into a thin trickle of what feels like his own blood, seeping into Spades's body through the open, gaping wound where their palms crunch together - except fuck that, because that's not how transfusions work, so what the actual fuck is going on -

And then it's gone. Spades whips his hand back first, growling as he hunches over his bloody palm.

SS: There.

SS: 'Bout time I got some of those privileges back.

Karkat, panting, knits the cut in his palm together at last, drawing the drops up from where they've dribbled out all over his upper arm to form a thin scab. He opens his mouth, ready to let fly his full repertoire of rageisms on this fucker - because fuck that whole plan about not hating everyone in the universe, he is so sick of being cut up like this -

And then slams it shut, watching in silent disbelief as the cut in Spades's palm knits together. The carapacian grimaces, sticking out his tongue in a silent 'bluh' as a faint red scar fades in the center of his hand. It takes a lot longer than Karkat's quick healing job, and the wound remains swollen and sore in the center of Spades's chipped carapace, angry and almost permanent-looking.

It looks, Karkat thinks dizzily, like the line of blood in the center of Hemogoblin's costume. He hesitates, and then looks down at the closed up scab in his own hand. He can't tell if it's the same; he feels light-headed, like all the blood has drained out of his pan and left him scrounging to replace it. He slumps forward against the back of the chair, grateful for the support as he stares in wary trepidation at Spades.

Because if what Karkat thinks just happened, just happened?

Spades just stole some of Karkat's blood powers.

SS: Now I gotta blood bond with your actual body for this round.

SS: Good thing, too. Walking around with a pact to a half-dead man was giving me the heebie jeebies, with none of the power perks.

"What the fuck did you do?!" Karkat demands, horrified.

SS: Not me. S'all you, kid.

SS: Blood players. There's a reason I only ever try to get in cahoots with 'em and none of the others.

SS: Yah make a promise, and yah keep it.

The carapacian stoops to pick up the knife on the floor, wiping the blood off on the front of his pants before tucking it away in his nonsensical knitted sweater.

SS: I can't do squat compared to a player like you, but this'll at least give me something Di won't see coming, same as I had the last time I 'negotiated' with that pompous ass.

He taps the side of his temple, glowering at Karkat.
SS: Now piss off and get yourself back in fighting shape, yah useless sack of crap. Stop blubbering over a little blood oath; they're your specialty, Knight.

SS: I'm outta here.

Then, without another word, Spades Slick makes a break for it; the carapacian jumps onto John's bed and scrambles out the window inelegantly, and his snarls are audible as he falls all the way to the ground below.

Karkat stares at the open window.

What.

The fuck.

Just happened.

His head is still resonating with the pulse of whatever dark blood magic Spades made him an unwilling participant in, but at least it doesn't hurt. Karkat opens and closes his fist again, and the scab fades and peels away as he finishes healing it in a confused haze. He almost thinks he can hear faint jazz music, distant and muffled like ragtime being played on an ill-tuned piano in another room of the house. The only problem? The Egberts don't own a piano.

Karkat swallows hard, and reaches a hand behind him to flail around on the computer desk. Eventually, he finds his phone where he left safe from the sopor slime, and thumbs open Pesterchum with numb, trembling claws.

CG: JOHN.
CG: WE HAVE A FUCKING SITUATION HERE.

---

They end up waiting for Kanaya's contact to arrive in Algonac State Park.

Kanaya drives them back along the I-94 East at a breakneck pace with no rest stops, reducing a four hour trip to a mere two and a half. In the front seat Terezi rolls down the window, nostrils flaring, and begins to cackle and chatter a million miles an hour about the blurred colors of the other cars driving alongside them, to the point where Rose has to knock Vriska unconscious again to keep the other troll from stirring at the sound. The ex-neophyte doesn't seem concerned about Kanaya's gratuitous disregard for the laws of the road, but Rose supposes that the most brutal system of federal law enforcement must be more concerned with major felonies than one troll going thirty over the speed limit.

They're trying to avoid notice. Terezi and Vriska have been so thoroughly outed that Rose has little doubt the Bureau of Legislaceration will be reaching out to branches in other cities to try to head off the two heroes' abscond attempt. Worse yet, when Kanaya tunes the radio to a news station, the hosts are discussing a recent petition put out by the mayor of Chicago to demand disaster relief assistance from the Federal Villain Response Team.

Since the FVRT is a joint branch of FEMA and the FBI's counterterrorism division, this would be a most unfortunate turn of events. If such a motion passed, the Indigo Scourge and Blind Justice would be viewed not just as vigilantes gone wrong, but as villains, to be treated as potential terrorist threats.

Terezi goes silent after that broadcast. Rose turns her phone over in her hand, and Kanaya switches to a classical music station.

The cue ball in her skirt pocket weighs heavy at her side, a constant source of fascination. Rose has only begun to scratch the surface of the object's strange mystical properties. But she scolds herself gently whenever her fingers dip in the fold of her pocket to draw it out. She needs to keep her mind on the more urgent matters at hand. The time to indulge in proper experimentation will come when Vriska and Terezi are out of the country, when John is no longer worried about Karkat and Jade, and when Rose's forum contacts can give her some solid information on what in the Horrors' names just happened in Los Angeles.

The radio stations in Michigan haven't picked up on the news yet, but Rose wouldn't have expected them to. Over the past few hours, the aura of the grimlight Horrorterror has been burned away, but in its place a new, electric force has begun to circulate through the currents of magic in the atmosphere. She has yet to attempt any kind of light spell in the face of this abrupt power shift, but she can't believe that the mind that splintered off the Los Angeles hivemind could be the source of all this. It doesn't taste grim at all...the opposite, in fact? Rather than making Rose feel nauseous, she feels almost hopeful. It would be all too easy to be caught up in the whirl of free, wild magic in the air, to scream at the dark between the stars and light up the night, just because she could and no one would be able to stop her.

If this is the aura of the person that broke away from the Horrorterror, she can't understand how such a powerful mind could have been assimilated in the first place. When she had told Kanaya the news, the jadeblood had been disappointed to learn that her opportunity to take vengeance on a grimlight creature for her experience in the Novaya Ukraine might have vanished, but had also agreed that a trip to Los Angeles was still in the cards, if only so that Rose can assess the exact nature of the new magical practitioner altering power dynamics across most of the Western Hemisphere.

In certain circles, however, it is clear that majjykal chaos has been unleashed.

Rather than taking the interstate straight through to the border crossing at Detroit, they angle to the north, skirting Anchor Bay and curling around to reach Algonac. Rose drapes a jacket over Vriska's horns and face when they pass through a small town and have to stop at multiple crowded intersections.

The ceruleanblood snorts in her sleep, kicks one leg on top of Rose's lap, and falls quiet again, sprawled out and taking up as much space as possible. But at least she's unconscious and not attempting to provoke Terezi or redirect the car back to Chicago for some fresh, self-destructive act of insanity.

Some might call this kidnapping. Rose calls it transporting a particularly dangerous specimen of trollkind over the border, where she can be Canada's problem.

Algonac State Park contains approximately half a mile's worth of unobstructed access to the St Clair River. There are several mobile homes set behind a section of brittle fence nearby, each home flanked by a pickup truck, but Kanaya pulls off the lakeside road onto an unused picnicking ground, and the poor car comes to a stop next to a rusty outdoor barbeque grill in the middle of a field. Old, browned leaves, still moldering from having been buried under snow, slip in the mud under Rose's feet as she steps out, eagerly breathing in the fresh air. But the shrubs and trees that dot the campground have begun to show signs of green sprouts and budding spring flowers, and even this far north the night air is no longer chilly, precisely - merely mild.

"No sign of my mother," she murmurs to Kanaya when the troll comes to check on Vriska, leaning in through the open door to adjust the restraints on the ceruleanblood's wrists.

"I must confess, that is a significant relief," Kanaya says, shaking her head.

Rue had tracked them down to the apartment where they were hiding out, and evading her in order to escape to the car had been...troublesome. But the tell-tale alcohol-scented edge of her aura of nothingness has mostly dissipated from Rose's limited foresight. She thinks that Rue has given up on trying to intercept her on the way to Canada, and has moved on to some other focus.

Good. Perhaps having something else to occupy her time will keep Rue Lalonde from interfering with Rose's business anymore. The doctor certainly never had trouble losing herself in her work before Rose lost herself to the grimdark; most likely this recent bout of mocking interest in Rose's life is only a temporary blip in Rue's life of martinis and science.

"So. Canada." Terezi kicks open the passenger's side door with aplomb, her stick-thin limbs stretching as she twists from side to side and works out the kinks from sitting still for so long. She takes a deep whiff of the air, and releases it with a dissatisfied huff. "...I'm not very impressed! Where is the land of eternal snow and the stench of maple syrup that you promised me, Sylph?"
"We are not yet in Canada proper. Sollux should arrive within the next twenty minutes," Kanaya announces, looking up from her own phone after several minutes of painstakingly slow tapping away on the keyboard. "He is a high level psionic. He should be able to escort you and Vriska across the border with little incident."
"Yeah? Well, thanks, I guess," Terezi says, crawling up on the hood of the car with a grunt and swinging her legs. Her expression flattens out again, and she takes off her replacement pair of tinted glasses to rub at her eyes. "Canada," she mumbles, grimacing. "They don't even have a Legislaceration Bureau! Guess I shouldn't have tossed away my life's calling for a quick hatefuck. God! How could I have been so stupid!"

Rose and Kanaya exchange worried glances, Kanaya in askance and Rose in silent agreement. The longer Terezi spends without Vriska's input, the more she seems able to think rationally about her actions over the past few days, and the more her shoulders slump. It is clear to Rose's other Sight that the tealblood's aura is darkening rapidly, the pall of intense remorse and depression dampening her soul.

It would be easy at this point for Terezi to sink into a much more permanent form of self-hatred.

And so they wait. A few freight ships pass by on the water, sending out dark ripples that remind Rose of a lightless, bloodbrine sea. Terezi keeps her face turned away from the road whenever a vehicle trundles by, but otherwise remains on alert, moody but distracting herself by breathing in deeply whenever the wind changes.

Rose perches on a mostly rotted fence post, on the section most likely to sustain her weight until Sollux arrives. Kanaya opens up the trunk of the car and removes a packet of dark green blood from the cooler before joining Rose at the fence. Ordinarily, Rose knows, Kanaya would add the blood to tea or some other beverage to dilute the flavor, but their thermoses of tea ran out shortly after lunch, and so Kanaya pops a juice straw into the packet and sucks, the olive green staining over the jade green of her painted lips.

More tellingly, Kanaya does not move to fix said staining after she finishes draining the packet in one long gulp. Instead, the jadeblood mutely wipes the stray flecks of blood off her hand, and lets the packet fall into the trash can. She closes her eyes and remains as still as a statue, stiff and formal, without even reaching out to touch Rose or to fix the smear of blood and lipstick on her mouth.

Rose bites her lip, and then folds her hand into Kanaya's, squeezing and trying to communicate all the comfort she can. "You never know. Perhaps once they're in a different environment, they will accept your offer," Rose murmurs encouragingly, pressing a kiss to Kanaya's cheek. The sealant on Kanaya's makeup must be wearing off, because Rose's lips come away sticky with grey face paint; there is a too-pale mark in the shape of lips on Kanaya's cheek when she pulls away. "A long-distance auspicism is not out of the question. Not all is lost."

"It is clear that the force of my irritation was not enough to coax them from their rivalry, even when I was present to enforce it in the flesh," Kanaya replies, quietly enough that Terezi won't be able to overhear. She closes her eyes in defeat. "Perhaps there is an auspice out there for them, serendipitously chosen to quell their hatred and save them from themselves. But it would be foolish for me to perpetuate my own foolish delusions of auspicism when I have already proven unequal to the task."

Rose has no personal experience with heartbreak, let alone the pain of rejection in any of the other quadrants. The closest she thinks she has ever come would be those first few months after her mother vanished, before Rose learned that Rue Lalonde had removed their house from all official records and postal systems. Rose had thought John simply stopped writing for no reason. He had thought the same of her, as her own letters piled up in the mailbox with no one to deliver them. Perhaps she had never loved him in the sense of quadrants, but the stabbing pain of an inexplicably broken friendship, one that had sustained them both from childhood, had clearly left its mark on both of them whether John wishes to discuss it or not.

But she can recognize that Kanaya invested much of herself in the thought of auspisticizing between the Indigo Scourge and Blind Justice, a much more personal interest than her usual tendency to play two-wheel auspicism device for the entirety of Philadelphia. This failure, after Kanaya chose to come so far in the burning certainty that she could win Terezi and Vriska over into a stable clubs triad, is a crushing blow, and now Rose's lover is in pain that words can't soothe.

Rose draws Kanaya into her arms and rests her chin between the troll's thin horns. They stare out into the dark across the river in silence while Rose's phone buzzes in the pocket of her skirt.

HA: well shit, lady, it's probably still oozing all over the damn place. we can make it to cali in a day, maybe, but you need to send us coordinates for that damn circle so we can kill it dead.

TT: It may not be as urgent as it would have been if the grimlight had persisted, Hunters. Now that the main body of the creature seems to have receded from the physical plane, the incursion Lady's coven inadvertently summoned may have died off on its own. The remains should still be cremated to prevent soil contamination.
TT: Alas, Galya, I am also at least a day's journey from the location, and have other pressing personal matters to attend to.

"That is him," Kanaya says, her voice cracking a little before she coughs and clears her throat. Blinking out of her internet daze, Rose looks up and scans the Canadian side of the river, all of her eyes open.
Sollux Captor arrives in a crackle of red and blue psionic lightning, but to Rose's other viewing methods, his aura blazes a greenish-gold. He's almost as bright a force as Kanaya, but Rose's eyes shy away from looking at him for too long. There is a caustic snap to his power, like a bitter drink or a sudden shock from a power outlet, and anyway, it would be crass of her to stare too blatantly at someone who is doing them such an enormous favor.
"I have arrived. Thuck it, America," the troll proclaims, snickering as he touches down on the road on their side of the river. The psionics fizzle out as he walks toward them, shoulders slouched and a derisive smirk on his lips.
He is...not what Rose was expecting. For some strange reason, she foolishly thought that someone Kanaya considers a close personal friend - or at least, a friendly pen pal - would be more...stylish. Put together. Poised. But Sollux looks as though he fell out of bed and pulled on the first shirt he could find, which just so happened to be a black Toronto Argonauts hoodie two sizes too large for him. His hair is close-cropped around a dualed set of horns, but there are choppy layers around his face as though he attempted to cut his hair himself and failed miserably. He wears mismatched shoes, one black and one white, and neither has been laced up properly. Rose supposes that having the ability to levitate somewhat lessens the risk of tripping, but still.
The red-and-blue 3D glasses just confirm it. Sollux Captor is a fashion nightmare.
When Kanaya strides forward, none of her heartbreak is visible on her face, smoothed away beneath a façade of faint good humor. "Sollux," she says, smiling fondly. "It has been too long."
"Good to thee you too, KN - no, thhit, do not - agh!"
Kanaya keeps walking and plows into Sollux, hugging him with all the unstoppable inertia of a troll in motion. Sollux doesn't see it coming until it's too late, taking two steps back as horror dawns on his face before Kanaya is on him. Kanaya is only two inches taller than the troll, but she manages to lift him off his feet regardless. "Did you remember to take your medication today?" she asks him, utterly serene, as the troll sparks and kicks in protest.

"Omg, yeth, now put me the fuck down! You are violating my perthonal thpace, woman!"

Rose presses her hand to her mouth to conceal a growing smile, and steps forward until she's abreast of Kanaya again, folding her arms over her chest once her smirk gambit has lessened to acceptable first impression levels. Terezi kicks off the car, keeping her head down under the turquoise hood of her jacket as she creeps closer. Kanaya arches an eyebrow at them both, but continues to manhandle Sollux, releasing him from her stranglehold in order to hold him at arm's length and inspect him with a heavy sigh. "One day I will hold an intervention, Sollux. It will be for your own good. This is a fact, which I am stating for the record."

Sollux scowls at her, pushing his mismatched glasses up the bridge of his nose with a jerk. "Thcrew you," he says. "That will never in two million yeartth happen. Bethides, after this and the white-text thing, you owe me, not the other way around."

Kanaya sighs.

"Were you ever able to trace those messages to their point of origin?" Rose asks. Sollux flinches bodily as his eyes flick to her, as though he didn't notice her approach. "Rose," she adds by way of explanation when he just stares at her. She offers a hand. "No last name, at the moment."

Sollux's hand gravitates toward hers like a magnet, and he eyeballs the wayward appendage like it has betrayed him utterly by doing so. "Sollux Captor," he mutters, making a clear effort to pronounce his first name without the lisp that seems to plague him. His claws barely graze her palm as they shake hands, and then he whips his hand back to his side and shoves it into a pocket. "Tho, you're the one who managed to piss off one of the most thtupid good hackerth on the planet?"

"He didn't really seemed pissed off, per se," Rose corrects, her smile fading further. "He simply knew far more than he should have been able to know, and was not afraid to flaunt that knowledge in order to provoke a response from me."

"He's thomewhere in the Thtates," Sollux says, grimacing. "But that'th as far as I've been able to crack hith IP addrethth. He had that thhit proxied to Russia and back, but he'th in America. I can feel it in my hacker gut."

Rose hadn't really considered the fact that through the power of magic and modern technology, the person taunting her and Kanaya back in Philadelphia might well have lived halfway across the planet. She's been working off the assumption that the white-text marauder had been physically nearby at the time.

She decides not to mention this fact. Sollux's personality seems...abrasive, to put it delicately. She'd prefer to stay aloof and not provoke his ire.

"We still owe you much for tracking him as far as you have," Kanaya says gravely, bowing her head. "Your efforts are appreciated."

"Yeah, well, I am pretty fucking incredible. And like I thaid, dealing with your amazing Internet fuck-upth giveth my life new meaning, tho what the hell." Sollux shrugs, and he looks at Terezi for the first time. "What happened? I thought you wanted me to thhip two raging aththhats to the great white north, not the one."
"Vriska had to be kept incapacitated in the car, lest she attempt to draw Terezi back into a state of berserk, unreasonable rage," Kanaya says, nodding back toward the open door of their car. "She has been unconscious for some time. I would recommend keeping her restrained when she wakes up; she will not be in the finest of moods."

"Eh, like I give a fuck about thome blueblood throwing tantrumth over having her little bitchfit shutdown hardcore. Besideth," Sollux adds, jerking his chin at Terezi. "She'th got red eyeth and the other one has blue. It'th perfect. I have to take both. It'th meant to be."

"Your blood says mustard," Terezi interrupts, her head tilted to the side, "but your eyes say appleberry blast."

After a beat, she grins. "I like it!"

There is a long pause.

"I like her," Sollux says, baring doubled rows of prickly teeth in a shark's grin. "Thhe understandth."

Terezi cackles. "High ten!" she demands, throwing both hands up in the air.

"Hell yeth, you crazy lawyer." Sollux meets her halfway. One of Terezi's hands goes wild, and only slaps half of his hand, but it seems to be the thought that counts.

If nothing else, Rose thinks, it keeps that near-suicidal despair from clouding Terezi's face, which is more than she or Kanaya have been able to accomplish over the course of the day.

"Now bring me the problem child tho I can get out of here," Sollux says. "If I'm gone too long who knowth what the fuck AA will get up to."

"AA?" Kanaya's eyebrow flies up. "My, my, Sollux, someone else has earned the nicknaming scheme? Do tell."

Sollux sniffs loudly, wiping at his nose with the back of his sleeve, and grimaces. "Her name'th Aradia. Trutht me, it took everything in my power to keep her from following me here. I figured thith whole prothess would go a lot more smoothly without the inthane apocalypthe maiden flying around like a manic death pixie and babbling about the end of the world."

"But you like her," Kanaya prompts, her eyes glinting with avid interest. "How intriguing."

"Shut up."

"The end of the world?" Rose says. She isn't entirely certain she is going to say that aloud, until the words have already flown from her mouth and drawn the stares of all three trolls, Terezi's unblinking, Sollux's blank behind his glasses, and Kanaya's mildly confused. "I'm sorry. It's just - this is the second time in as many days that I've heard something of the kind." She hesitates, and then continues, "Tell me, has she mentioned meteors?"

Sollux smacks his face with both hands. "Oh FUCK, not another one," he mutters. " Fucking incredible."

Rose swallows past a sudden wash of bile in the back of her throat. Twice, she reminds herself, is a coincidence.

"I am not particularly attached to the theory myself," she says, smiling. "But I profess a certain amount of curiosity, given the frequency with which I seem to be stumbling across doomsayers. Has Miss Aradia given you a general timetable?"

Because that's the thing about coincidence. She has found that it does not happen to her. Fortuitous meetings, lucky breaks, auspicious chance - Rose sees them more than most, can see how they all tie together in her mind's eye to give her some idea of the most fortuitous future she can bring about. While under the influence of the Horrorterrors, that ability declined, but now -

Now, Rose does not like what she is beginning to see.

"I've got the fucking countdown going in my head all hourth of the day. FUCK yeth, she gave me a timetable," Sollux snaps, scowling. His arm shoots out and he grabs Rose around arm, dragging her in close. Kanaya makes an aborted movement in the corner of Rose's eye, but Rose shakes her head, holding up a hand to ward her off.

This close up, Sollux reeks of burnt silicomb and grubsauce and coffee, his lips are cracked and oozing sickly gold blood, and Rose can almost hear the clatter of pills in a bottle as her internal psychologist recalls Kanaya mentioning a bipolar disorder. His lisping slips of the tongue splatter her with trace amounts of spit as he hisses in her ear, too low and pissed off for Kanaya or Terezi to hear. "Becauthe ath it turnth out, thith whole mess is a mathematical fact. Plug it into any ~ATH calculator and it'll tell you the planet'ath got until 4:13 on the thirteenth of April before we all get blown thky-high by meteorth."

"The only reathon people aren't freaking the fuck out ith that no one'ath ever been thtupid enough to try to base an ~ATH program on Earth; you just don't."

Rose maintains her composure. "And you believe your Aradia?" she asks, her jaw clenched with the effort of not pulling away. "You believe this calculator?"

Sollux snarls, and for a brief moment, Rose almost thinks his aura is shot through with a dull, sickly green. "I believe numberth. I believe the code that I put together with my own two clawth. And I believe that I'd rather not get fucked in the athth for not believith when all the math tellth me that this is what fate has in thtore for this mitherable planet."

And with that, Sollux lets go, pushing Rose away with perhaps a little more force than is needed, as though he can't bear to be in physical contact with someone else for one second longer. "We're all doomed," he says, laughing a little hysterically. "It just dependth on how."

"You cut my matesprit," Kanaya cuts, startling Rose out of that intense space, where there was only her and Sollux and all the myriad paths that led to one immutable dead end. Kanaya's voice is clipped, and she steps at a diagonal, her shoulder between Rose and Sollux as she bends to inspect the cut. Rose knows the blood itself won't be a problem, not when Kanaya sated her rainbow thirst not twenty minutes ago, but the clipped edge of her words does not quite conceal the warning growl in her voice, the grating, guttural snarl of a troll about to go on the offensive over a quadrant mate. "Sollux -"

"Kanaya, it's nothing," Rose says, feeling remarkably distant from it all. She touches the scrape along the side of her arm, feeling as though she's observing it on the arm of someone in a photograph or a film rather than experiencing it in reality. This level of dissociation is a little abnormal, but she thinks it'll pass once she's finished processing this new revelation. "He did not intend it, I'm sure.

"No - thhit - WOW, way to go me," Sollux says, looking stricken. The intensity of his gaze fragments, and Rose thinks they're both coming down from the same strung out, tense high of knowing. "Fucking awesome. Fuck. Thorry, KN. I mean - thorry, RS."
"Not a problem," Rose says, waving a hand absently. "A small scratch like this will only take a moment to heal, when I have the time."

"Perhaps it would be best if you escorted Terezi and Vriska across the border, and were on your way," Kanaya says, her voice still short. When Rose gives her an appraising glance and raises an eyebrow, Kanaya relents a little. "I am...not angry. But the longer we delay, the more likely it is that -"

"Euuuuuuuuurgh…"

The loud, drawled moan fills the entire campground.

"The fuck?" Sollux says.

Terezi whips around, but Kanaya has an arm around the troll's waist before the tealblood can do more than widen her eyes and take a step back toward the car. Rose turns on her heel and can only stare.

"What?" Vriska groans, sitting up in the backseat of the car. Grunting, she hunches over with her masses of tangled black-blue hair tumbling over her shoulders. She rubs at her many-pupiled eye, and then squints at all of them, scratching a horn. She doesn't look manic or enraged or much of anything but flummoxed. "...Where the heck am I?"

"Damn," Kanaya says, locking a palm over Terezi's nose.

The tealblood yelps and kicks her feet out, writhing in Kanaya's restraining grip. "Hey! Let me go, you minty green apple! I'm fine, I'm not going to -" Terezi freezes up, suddenly, and takes such a deep whiff of air that Rose can hear the sniff from several feet away. "Why do your claws smell like bl -"

"Terezi!" Vriska says, sitting bolt upright. Without her glasses or a mask, the sun symbol etched around her eye crumples as her face twists into an ugly snarl. She digs her claws into the side of the car on either side of her and uses it to lever herself upright. "Let her go!"

And then, just as abruptly, Vriska slams back against the car. Her legs and arms go one way, while her head and torso go the other, and with a resounding metal thud, Vriska's skull bangs against the roof of the car. When she catches herself on the door handle, mumbling and blinking her eyes slowly in a daze, she merely looks confused. "Mnagh?"

There are bolts of discharged blue and red psionics still sparkling around her head.

Rose hesitates, and then turns to stare at Sollux in quiet judgment.

"Oopth," Sollux says, his tone completely bland. "Oh fuck. Whatever have I done."

"Hopefully, dazed her enough to at least get you over the border." When it becomes clear that keeping Terezi from interacting with Vriska in any way is a full time job for Kanaya, who winces and grimaces as she withstands the sharp, pointy elbows of a determined tealblood digging into her belly and ribs, Rose strides over to the trunk of the car, ignoring Vriska's bleary mutters, and removes the duffel bag full of the clothing Kanaya had brought along for the express purpose of clothing Vriska and Terezi. Rose tosses the bag at Sollux, and her guess is confirmed when psionics reach out to lace around the duffel, too. "I wish you all the luck in the world. You'll need it, to deal with these two."

"Only until I can foitht them off on thomeone in fucking Nunavut," he grumbles, drawing Vriska toward him with a nod of his head. "Or hell, maybe AA has thome ideath. Hand her over, KN."

Kanaya nods, and lets go of Terezi. The tealblood splutters as she springs away from Kanaya, and then yelps as psionics pluck her off the ground as well. She and Vriska both wear identical masks of bafflement, and they glance at each other without even a hint of rage in their eyes.

Between them, holding out his hands to either side, Sollux smirks. "I'm out of here. America ith overrated, anyway." With that pithy remark, Sollux rises up into the air, the crackle of his psionics rising to a dull roar. One troll on each arm, he levitates them all over the road and the river, red and blue playing across the dark mirror of the water like fireworks.

And just like that, the Indigo Scourge and Blind Justice have successfully escaped the jurisdiction of the United States.

"Well then," Rose says at last, when the three trolls vanish into the dark of the night and into the unknown, moose-infested wilderness that is suburban Canada. "That was…"

"An event," Kanaya finishes, sounding just as nonplussed. "That was an event which happened to take place in our lives."

"Indeed." Rose smiles crookedly, hooking her arm through Kanaya's. "I suppose we can only hope they do not end up tearing apart Toronto, next."

"I trust that Sollux would call for backup...well, perhaps not before the situation spiraled out of control in such a way, but at least a few minutes afterward, yes," Kanaya concedes.

Rose shakes her head ruefully, and lets it drop to the side, resting her head on Kanaya's shoulder as they stare meditatively out over the water.

After a moment, Rose cracks her neck and loops her arms around Kanaya's neck instead. "Now. Let's distract you from that temporarily broken ashen quadrant, shall we?"

"Please. And then Washington?" Kanaya says. It is not really a question.

Rose nods. "And then Washington."

TT: What do you know about 4/13 of this year?

- Kanaya does not sleep. This is, apparently, one of the perks of being a rainbow drinker. Rose has seen the recooperacoon that Kanaya keeps for show in her apartment, but she has never seen the 'coon's lid open, not once, and suspects that Kanaya stopped filling the tank with sopor slime ages ago. If she had any of the usual troll dependence on the substance before shipping out to die and be reborn in the Novaya Ukraine, she evidently staves off withdrawal through a regular diet of soportinged blood. Instead, Kanaya lies beside Rose or putters around the apartment in the hours in which they’re not on patrol, a silent and graceful predator who stitches evening gowns at the end of the bed.

This lack of need for sleep helps their progress that night immensely, as they find themselves retracing the same road that took them to Chicago in the first place. The backtrack to the Detroit area had been necessary, but still time consuming, and as Rose watches the same landmarks flash by through the window, she can't help the flicker of tired impatience that stirs her weary mind.

Kanaya has already asked if Rose would prefer to spend the night in a motel at least once along the two thousand mile trip to Seattle. But with every day that passes, Rose feels the ache of John's absence like a hollow in her stomach, cavernous and empty. If she allows herself to think too much about Dave or Jade, the ache seems to deepen, a crawling loneliness that twists her heart and dries out her throat, making each liquor advertisement they pass along the highway more and more tempting. At times, only the knowledge that she is heading to see John and Jade, and that Kanaya would never allow it, prevents her from opening her mouth to plead just one drink, just one sip, just enough to take the edge off this desperate thirst -

The distractions posed by the Scourge Sisters and the possible end of the world are just that: distractions.

However, she does have one other item of business that might take her mind off the need to be near John, and keep her from pestering him ceaselessly when he has an injured moirail and (in recent news) a vanished sister to deal with over the course of the night.

She has changed into a more comfortable sweater in preparation for a fitful night of sleeping in a car with the back of the seat cranked as near to horizontal as it can go, but her skirt is the same, and she dips a hand into her pocket to draw forth the cue ball.

Its aura of potential has only grown to her senses. Rose turns the cue ball over in the palms of her hands, inspecting it from every angle with every form of sight at her disposal. Beneath the smooth bone-white exterior, she can catch a glimpse of the power glimmering within.

It would be unorthodox, perhaps. But she thinks she can use this cue ball as a scrying tool. She tried with more traditional crystal balls in her troubled youth, of course, but had never been truly inspired by the art. She'd honed her talents for more active spells for teleportation and offense, and allowed her natural Sight to guide her on her way without aid.

Now, most of her offensive spells are off limits, vulnerable to the influence of the Horrorterrors' connection to her mind. The hero work in Philadelphia had made that very clear. But fighting Blind Justice had been an exercise in futility primarily because the troll's blindness rendered her immune to the bulk of Seer's remaining techniques. All she has are the chants and charms that can't harm others: the rusting spells that only affect metal, the shields that focus on protection rather than retaliation, and the spells that skew perception and mislead the eyes of those around her.

If so, then expanding on her current repertoire can only be a good thing. And is she not, after all, a Seer of Light? Perhaps she should have been honing her visions all along. Perhaps then the Horrorterrors would not have considered her such a delectable addition to their meal plan.

"What do you have there, Rose?" Kanaya asks quietly. They can sit in companionable silence like this for long stretches, content in each other's company for hours, and so Rose inspects the cue ball for a few minutes more before answering.

"An artifact from your home that I found in one of the bags," she replies at last, testing the material of the cue ball with a tap of her purple-edged nails. "I believe it can be used as a type of scrykind. In the absence of a needlekind, I'm in the market for a replacement specibus. Do you mind if I test it?"

"Oh, not at all," Kanaya says, glancing at the cue ball with an expression of vague recognition. "Ah. That old thing. I can never recall quite how it came into my possession…"

"It has much untapped potential. I'm going to attempt to channel my usual extra sight through it, and see if that produces any measurable effects." Rose cups the cue ball in the palms of her hands, folding her legs up onto the seat in a cramped meditative posture and letting her hands rest in her lap. She flashes a smile at Kanaya. "I may be unresponsive for an hour or so, but you should be able to rouse me in the event of an emergency."

"We should be in Minneapolis in five hours," Kanaya says, her fingers drumming in deliberate strokes as she does a mental tally in her head. "From there, another five hours to Bismarck, nine to Missoula, and then a final six hour push to Seattle. At least, if I can maintain our current rate of travel."

Considering they're currently flying even higher over the speed limit than they had been with Terezi and Vriska in the car, and they're avoiding the notice of the police only through Kanaya's impossible reflexes and a streak of unbelievable luck, Rose has no doubt that what should be a 30 hour trip might well be reduced to twenty six hours - if she and Kanaya can both sit in this car for that long without going completely stir crazy. Both of them are calm and collected individuals, but they also share this little habit of going out at night to rove around the city beating up criminal scum, and Rose suspects that a pit stop in Montana might be necessary just to keep them from going stark raving insane. Sitting still for a full 24 hour cycle would be simply mind-numbing.

Well. Rose has something to stave off the madness of extended road trips right here in her lap. "Mmmm. Pardon me if I fall asleep immediately after this. Wake me up for breakfast?" She lets her eyelids fall shut as Kanaya murmurs reassurance, and she runs a last check of all the wards and shields and stitches in her mind. The sun ward is in place, the basis on which her sanity holds back the tide of the grimdark sea, and above it towers the crystal struts and spindly loops and whorls of her new mental structure. It has no definite shape yet that Rose can discern, no base attached to the ground that could be worn away by the ebb and flow of an acidic tide, and all she can do is trust in the instincts that are guiding her work as she knits her mind into being. The storage unit in which she keeps the silt and sand that are all that remains of her old memories has been reduced in size as she works the memories themselves into the new structures.

The black, tarry coil that craves alcohol remains twisted into knots at the bottom of the Tupperware container. One day, she will need to deal with that. But she would rather tangle with it when the most obvious and looming trigger point, the absence of John, Dave, and Jade in her life, has been eliminated.

Finally, she twists the void bracers on her wrist, one last comfort to tide her through this experiment, and allows her mind to reach out and delve into that core of potential within the cue ball.

(Ah. There you are. At last. Well, let's give you a little something to tide you over with, shall we?)

_Tell me about the future._ Rose says, pouring a ray of light into the cue ball. _Clear my sight. Show me my fortunes, and how I might attain them._

She'll save pressing questions about the apocalypse until she has a better grasp on how this scrykind actually works.

The light catches on something within the dormant swirl of power in the center of the cue ball, and refracts, spinning out in her mind's eye in a new configuration. Curious, Rose shines more of her focus on the mysterious something, and can barely - just barely - make out a tiny shard of metal in the center of the orb. Magically speaking, it is serving as a refracting crystal whether the physical object is transparent or not. Whatever force imbues the cue ball, the piece of metal is the source of it.

Rose pulls back and considers the multiple rays of refracted light available to her. She could never have maintained the focus necessary to form several potential prognostications at once, let alone sustain them for this long without delving into what the present and future might hold. The scrykind holds true, however, channeling her power without the conscious need for her to support every single detail going into the visions.

So, curious, Rose narrows her mental focus onto a bright red stream of light, sinking into the vision her powers have discerned and deemed most likely to occur.

What she sees is the inside of someone's pocket.

Or at least, she thinks irritably, some article of clothing. From this perspective, all she can make out are the blotches of alternating shadow and light that shift whenever the person moves. The cloth is too thick to see through - perhaps if she were there in person and able to direct the full force of her gaze through it, but not in the dreamy half-light of a long-distance vision.

And this is a long-distance vision. She's not viewing a future event, but something remarkably current. She can tell the difference - there's none of the inherent mutability of a prediction, the underlying knowledge that just by seeing the future one can change it. This is happening, here and now, and cannot be altered.

It's only once she ascertains that she can't enhance her sight through the cue ball that she settles back and hears the sounds. It is easy for her to place less weight on the other senses, what with how much of her power depends on eyes both inner and outward, but this vision isn't quiet.

"Agh!"

"How did you even find - shit!"

"Where are they coming from?!"

Metal crashes against metal, and Rose listens to the sounds of someone - perhaps the owner of the pocket she's stuck in - dips and turns, wielding some sort of metal strife specibus to fend off what sounds like multiple attacks. The play of shadow and light that is all she can actually see implies that there is a lot of movement going on, and she's missing it.

How insipid. She receives a vision of some kind of sword strife, and all she can see is this shitty pocket. Not a most promising turn of events.

"Look out! From behind -" rolls to a stop.

Someone lets out a strangled cry, with hardly any sound at all. Free of the pocket, Rose can turn her gaze back the way she came and-

Dave reaches out a hand toward her, rubble flecking his hair and the sunglasses hanging half off his face to expose muted panic in his eyes. He peels himself off the floor where he’s fallen, and ducks his head as another wall implodes, crawling over an unconscious body. His lips move, but nothing comes out except strained breaths. He can’t speak, she realizes with a jolt. Considering John only shared this news with her a matter of hours ago, it’s the only explanation that makes sense. Ignoring the inexplicable burst of green fire crackling smokelessly at the far end of the hallway, Dave scrambles right up to Rose’s source of the vision and closes his hand around it so that she gets an up close and personal view of his palm lines. Then it’s back in the pocket, and there's nothing more to see.

Rose extricates herself from the red light and stares at it.

Well then. Scanning the refracted streams of light again, Rose picks out the bright green of a new but unmistakable font, a darker green the color of jadeblood, a bright yellow blaze she recognizes as the Puppeteer’s impenetrable aura and a more muted yellow-orange like a creamsicle, purple that might match her own eyes, and on and on through a spectrum of blues and violets and rusts she can’t identify off the top of her head until - there. The deep sky blue of John's eyes, just as the red would have matched Dave's.

If Dave is currently in the middle of some conflict, when he and John were out seeking Jade, it can only mean something went wrong. Rose has to see if John is well, has to see it with her own eyes -

She doesn't get the chance. Something wraps around her mental image of herself, twining about her ankle and yanking her to a halt before she can dip into the blue light she’s sure would lead to a vision of John.

She has enough time to look down at her ankle and see the crackle of green energy locked around her in a death grip before the tendril of power jerks her sideways and down -

And into a stream that is the opposite of light. Opaque and shimmering with acidic iridescence, the stagnant river of white ooze swallows her whole, so viscous and sluggish that the surface doesn't even ripple as she is pulled down to see -

"รางยุค ฉันเล新浪财经ขึ้นมา คุณจะต้องรับประทานของอร่อยหรือไม่? บOWL มีอะไรให้เลือกในด้าน reunited.

DS: There, there, Malā’ikah. There, there. Would you care for a sweet of some kind? A bowl of delicious Squiddlesnacks?

Rose drifts with her eyes shut. If she allows herself to focus outward for too long, she risks being caught up in the panic attack racking her body. She curls up into as small a ball as she can manage, clawing at her own knees and shins as she presses them tight against her chest, a fist stuffed into her mouth to stifle the screams that wish to tear out of her throat.

She has only truly seen this place once before. All through her childhood, her interactions and mediations with the grimdark took place primarily in her own mind, or in the transitory, threshold channel that linked her mind to the Horrorterrors. But then the sea had come surging in, bringing the cold damp and the grimdark and the bloodbrine, and her mind had been washed away to join the rest of the flood. If John hadn't raised her up, she would have trickled away to the source of it all.

She is there now. She can't tell if she's seeing it remotely, still caught in the cue ball's damning perspective, or if she is here in the flesh, dragging down at last to face the reckoning she should have known would come. Though she last glimpsed it in a feverish daze of madness and grief, she knows this place.

Light has no place here. There can be no clarity. This is the space between the stars, the place where space and time warp and slur and distort into a many-angled, endless expanse of non-Euclidean geometries. This is the ultimate contradiction: an endless expanse of empty space and shattered eons, redolent of spheres and dimensions apart from any definition of sanity.

This is the Furthest Ring.

I do apologize for the potentially triggering encounter with the clown who we shall not name, but I did warn you that he would need to be dealt with.

They are in a scraped out nest of flesh and bone and gore, and gelatinous grimlight oozes over everything in slow rivers of goo. The Horrorterror that presides over the nest looks nothing like Rose's old patron of the Ring. Leviathan had been a traditionalist, as far as the old Fluthulu research had been concerned, favoring an endless array of mouths and tentacles and thorns as a host for their many entangled minds.

This one has attempted to sculpt itself into an angelic form, but Horrorterrors both grimdark and light share a tendency towards chaos and distortion, and the resulting monstrosity is suitably horrific. Rose can't help but see the broken, gnarled wings that arch back from its center, the way the hivemind has jammed crystal and thorns and cold iron into the stringy white flesh to form pseudo-feathers. Its body has been molded into one long, snake-like tendril, covered in hook-beaked mouths that are open in endless, silent screams. The whole abomination is crowned with an armillary sphere like the old Ptolemaic models of the solar system, wheels within wheels that whirl and turn at different speeds around a core of tightly wound tendrils, rimmed with hundreds upon hundreds of eyes, all of them sightless holes that cry black ink.

Rose can't look at it anymore. She closes her eyes, whimpering as she casts her mind about for some way, any way, to return to the cue ball, and from there to her body - just any way at all to not be here -

"You cannot see exactly who the source of the green-and-white text is. There is no one else she can..."
see in this endless expanse, but the voice itself is far too sane and smooth to be a Horrorterror. The green lightning that edges its words stings, but the soothing tenor sounds almost human, and Rose's mind latches onto it as a fixed point in the madness.

She has no idea how she's going to get out of here.

The grimlight Horrorterror draws itself up, snarling and spitting at the air, but never snapping in Rose's direction. She can only take this as evidence that she is not truly here, that whatever twisted vision has led her here keeps her somehow safe from the notice of minds beyond mortal comprehension.

She just has to find the way out. But there is no channel here, and no sign of the green light that dragged her down.

Could it have been the green-and-white text voice? It feels similar. But what goal could the speaker have, to drag Rose into an unwanted vision of someone communing with gods of the Furthest Ring and - somehow - concluding what sounds like a business deal gone wrong without being eaten alive.

At last, the grimlight hivemind finishes posturing, drawing its broken wing into its side and curling up into a ring at the center of its nest. At the same time, the nest itself begins to recede, pulling away from Rose's perspective at a rapid pace. The god's words fade as it pulls away, though they are no less mind-wrecking for the decrease in volume.

The green-white text gives nothing more than a faint sigh, with a distinct aura of condescending appeasement that Rose thinks only she notices. The Horrorterror simply continues on its way, squirming away through the ether, and gives no sign that it noticed the faint, polite disdain aimed at its back.

And - ah! Of course, Leviathan. I have anticipated your arrival for some time.

Would you care for something to drink?

Rose turns.

Rose screams.

Leviathan rises up from the dark, and bares its teeth.

All of them.

"NO!"

Rose reaches out a hand, and knows there is no one waiting to grasp it. John's not here, John's not anywhere, and she wouldn't want him here, in the heart of all that is horror and chaos and insanity.

So she reaches out for the only other point of light here - the thing that brought her here. She slams her perspective into the green-white text with panic born of mind-rending terror, and shakes it as hard as she can, with all the power at her disposal. "LET ME OUT!"

Well of course, my dear Rose. You needed only to ask. Am I not, after all, the most gracious and accommodating of hosts?
Rose snaps out of the trance still screaming.

The tiny part of her mind that can think outside of the screaming worries that she may have just startled Kanaya enough to break her concentration and wrap their car around the nearest telephone pole. But she cannot stop, screaming soundlessly when her air runs out and she starts gulping uselessly. The cue ball rolls out of her hands to land with a heavy thud on the floor, and rolls out of sight.

"Rose!" And that is Kanaya, shouting to be heard over Rose's shrieks. A pair of claws land on Rose's shoulders and press hard enough to bruise, and she shakes Rose hard enough to rattle her bones. "Rose, you're awake! You're safe! Rose, breathe!"

It is only then that Rose registers that they're not moving. They never were. The persistent rumble of the car engine that she accounted for when initiating her meditative state has cut off, and they sit in utter stillness. In that respect, at least, Rose can be relieved; they're not about to hurtle off the highway while Kanaya is distracted by trying to calm her down. That frees up the rational part of Rose to focus on other, more pressing concerns, such as the strenuous business of deep breathing. She shudders and wheezes, struggling to find one of her usual rhythms, and swallows back the next scream that threatens to erupt from her throat with immense effort.

The image of Leviathan twines beneath her eyelids whenever they close, and her eyes stream with either blood or tears; it's impossible for her to say. She can't tell if there's anything left of her internal shielding in the wake of this fresh breakdown, either, but she's honestly surprised that the voices haven't already begun to whisper in her mind and plague her thoughts with thorns, reasserting themselves in their old home.

No, it's too quiet. Rose breathes and doesn't scream and latches her gaze onto the sharp curve of Kanaya's nose, the press of her hands, the weight of a palm on her knee, and the simple fact of her presence, reassuringly warm and real.

It is still too quiet, and the tangles should be heavy in her brain, attracted by the siren call of her emotions running rampant. But as she looks past Kanaya, panting, Rose realizes that they're not in the car at all. Kanaya could never have knelt over her like this in the tiny space of the car, even if she'd known somehow to pull over and stop the car ahead of time. The cue ball has fallen off the side of a bed rather than off the edge of the passenger's seat as Rose had thought, and it has disappeared from her side, oblivious to the mischief it has caused.

It's quiet and what's more, Rose can't feel the flow of magic around her. The grimlight, the white holy magic from Los Angeles, the regular ebbs and flows of energy that fill the atmosphere - none of it.

"How long?" she pants. Because they're not in the car, so they've stopped somewhere. The long window that stretches horizontally across the wall has been covered with blackout blinds and curtains, so she can't judge what time it is. The walls are a telltale shade of lilac, stripped bare of ornamentation, and even the bed sheets feel familiar, soft and worn with age under her fingertips as she clutches them convulsively. "Kanaya, how long was I out?"

"Rose…"

"How long?!" Rose recognizes the absence of sensation in the atmosphere for what it is, and struggles to take in her surroundings. She doesn't want to look away from Kanaya. Her mental wards are in tatters, but the grimdark has not taken advantage of that. Not even the void bracers hanging loose on her wrists can account for this strange oversight.

No, this is -

Rose sobs in either fury or terror. The hand on her knee squeezes, trying to soothe her, but she can't bring herself to look at it or brush it off.

"I did not know what else to do!" Kanaya bursts out, gripping Rose's face too tightly with both hands as she searches Rose's eyes, on the edge of panic. "You would not wake, and then a day had passed, and she promised protection and medical aid -"

Rose closes her eyes and shudders once more, then goes still, her hair limp in her face. Breathing hard, she feels the bubble of disquiet pop in her chest. She's not really seeing Kanaya anymore.

She truly cannot blame Kanaya for panicking. Can't blame the troll for worrying when Rose's track record with ominous mental events has such a blemished past. Scrying is a time consuming art at the best of times, and the influence of the Furthest Ring would have distorted time for Rose even further, so that a few brief moments of horror for her spanned the course of a day for a fretting, terrified Kanaya.

But she'd imagined Kanaya would set up a vigil in a motel, or perhaps push through to John's house in the hope he might know how to rouse Rose.

Not this. Never this.

This kind of void shielding can only have been designed by one person.

But Rose refuses to believe it - not until, with a stiff neck, she looks down at the slim hand touching her knee. The fingernails have been filed down (for once) to a reasonable length, manicured but with deep welts where the owner has been gnawing on the cuticles with a relentless fervor. She follows the arm up to a trim dress, unbuttoned at the collar and cut in diagonals, and an aura that is a gaping, woman-shaped void, a distinct lack with the faint perfume of alcohol that turns Rose's stomach.

"Hello, Rose," Rue Lalonde says. She sits on the edge of the bed, and smiles, her hand never leaving Rose's knee.

"This is Seattle," Rose chokes out, desperate, because it needs to be Seattle, has to be, she can't have gone the opposite direction from John and the Lalonde manse in New York is a smoldering crater just the way she always wanted it and -

"Yes, it is," Rue agrees simply. "Maple Valley, to be more precise." She visibly hesitates, her curls bobbing as she presses her lips together and leans forward to press a kiss to Rose's forehead. "Welcome back home, my dear."

Dave wanders the house a little while John is settling down his troll boyfriend.

There's a distinct lack of shitty swords and snuppet breeding grounds in the Egbert household, but he still takes in the layout of the house with a keen eye, his mind supplying horrific visions of ways that Bro could boobytrap a house with this many rooms. He spies on things pretty blatantly, absorbing the novelty of having a washing machine and dryer in the utility room that look like they're actually used for washing clothes rather than emergency puppet storage. He combs through the kitchen again and sobs when he finds an unopened jug of apple juice stored on the bottom shelf of the pantry, along with several other inferior juices like raspberry-pomegranate and tomato and grape.
They clearly do not deserve to sit on the same shelf as the blessed elixir, and Dave fixes this by placing the apple juice in a place of honor in the fridge.

Speaking of. He takes out his phone and checks on the status of his business dealings, texting out orders to any of his future selves running around in the current moment so he can handle it later. While he's in the state, he might as well make the apple orchards of Washington his little bitch. There are more than 170,000 acres worth of prime real estate in the foothills of the Cascades alone.

They shall be his before dawn.

That taken care of, Dave lets his mind wander as he rummages through the fridge and pulls out another Tupperware container full of food to occupy himself with. This one is full of lasagna and he starts gobbling it down in double time like it could be snatched out of his hands at any moment. Which would be a perfectly understandable reflex in the Strider apartment, where the daily battle to obtain the choicest slice of pizza can be won or lost in a single critical moment, but which had earned him a few awed sideways looks from John and twitchy glares from Karkat when he demolished the stir fry in the space of seconds. The Egbert house is a goddamn promised land. Dave's gonna go into the basement and find, like, a land of blessed milk and honey or some shit just tucked away where no one can find it but the chosen few. It would totally explain why John's got fucking muscles like corded steel under his goofy-ass hero shirts.

With that thought in mind, Dave tucks the container of lasagna into the crook of his arm and creeps out into the hallway that links the kitchen with the living room and down the hall toward the study. There's a second door just past that, and Dave flashsteps past the closed study door when he hears the faint murmur of Dad Egbert's voice coming from within.

He does not want to piss that guy off. In fact, the less attention he gets from the older Egbert, the better, as far as he's is concerned. There's just something...off about the guy. John says it's the ex-military thing. Dave thinks he's is just too nice. The stern, polite fatherly shtick? Maybe Dave's just not used to parenting methods that don't involve excessive irony and sharp objects, but Samuel Egbert fucking unnerves him. It's freaking him out.

Shaking himself, Dave crosses to the second door and turns the door knob, swinging it open so he can peer down into the basement below.

Something flickers in the corner of his vision, and that's all the warning he gets before he takes a pie to the face at Mach 5.

In a way, it's almost worse than getting overly friendly with the rump end of a puppet, because when Dave opens his mouth to silently scream and flip the fuck out, he tastes the meringue currently slathered across his face and realizes it's delicious.

But it's also five seconds from dripping all over his suit, and he sidesteps blindly away from the boobytrapped door to lean over and wipe it off his face and onto the floor. He has his priorities, okay, and the cleanliness of the Egberts' floor is not one of them. He squeegees off his shades with a grimace and sets them back on his face before turning back to figure out what just hit him.

"Ah, Dave, my boy!" Samuel Egbert's study door is open, and the man himself stares at Dave with a rueful grin. There is a second pie in his hand that he sets on a shelf with care before continuing. "You startled me - I did not realize that was you down here! Something you need?"

Dave stares back; his fingers twitch for his pocket and he starts typing, not daring to take his eyes off Samuel as he types the words in his notes.
DS: holy crap
DS: i knew about the baking thing
DS: but you've actually weaponized that shit
DS: like is that piekind how does that even work

He then has to hold out his phone for Samuel to read and seriously? Fuck this system of communication. Fuck everything about it. If Bro doesn't fix his collar soon, he is going to flip his shit. He and shit are going to have a fucking divorce, and he's going to take it to court and demand alimony and child support and all its life's savings in the spirit of revenge. By the time he's through with it, his shit will be a shadow of its former self, a broken man left with only pennies to his name, children he sees only every fourth weekend, and the fading memories of a happier time.

"Jokerkind, actually, though I will profess a certain leaning towards artifacts of confection," Samuel chuckles. "My own mother taught it to me in the spirit of good old fashioned japery, and it has allowed me access to more than a few most useful specibi in a pinch. Alas, John prefers smashing things with a hammer."

DS: isn't jokerkind the one with the clowns
DS: god why is it always clowns

Samuel smiles, apparently choosing to ignore Dave's horror. "Ah, harlequins. Light-hearted, nimble, astute, and always in pursuit of the opportunity for a good practical joke. Did you know, I used to have quite the collection, but John made me tone it down when he was younger. He enjoys pranking as a hobby, but the family legacy of the joker never seemed to really appeal to him."

Dave sweats, tugging on his collar and eyeing the stairwell at the end of the hall with desperation. Remember all that talk about avoiding Dad Egbert? How the hell did he end up in a one-on-one discussion of creepy ass harlequins with the resident Stepford? He is noping out of here so hard.

Besides, he's trying to imagine a John who did get on with the whole family legacy, jokerkind and all; the end result is some kind of Heir of Tricksters and that shit ain't right.

DS: okay yeah
DS: cool story
DS: like i am fucking riveted here on the edge of my seat
DS: i could talk about harlequins all day its like my dream job
DS: but also i think i just heard john calling me
DS: so i gotta jet
DS: nicolas cage himself would be jealous of my flight capabilities
DS: yeah
DS: later

"Oh, of course," the man says, raising his eyes to the ceiling with his smile tugging further across his face. Dave gets the feeling he's not fooled at all. "However, there is one thing before you go."
"The point is that according to all of my sources - limited though they may be - Droog is the one who orchestrates all such kidnapping attempts. She came for you personally in Georgia, and that is not something a woman like her would choose to do lightly." Samuel Egbert rubs at his chin, which this late in the day has begun to show signs of unshaven proto-beard. But his eyes never stop assessing Dave, silent and judging, at odds with the stern concern the rest of his face is trying to convey. John's expressions are wild and obvious and make him an open book, but while Samuel may be no less emotive, Dave can't help but think the guy is hiding just as much behind this bland fatherly persona as a Strider. "Please, consider my advice. Contact your guardian before you leave on this outing. With Droog loose in the city, you are at risk, and potentially a high priority target for her."

DS: why do you even care

DS: im pretty goddamn sure not even bro would give this much of a fuck about my wellbeing

DS: i can handle myself why is this even an issue

Samuel's face closes off completely, and there's nothing left but a flat, emotionless stare. "Because John would not allow you to be taken," he says, his voice cold, and Dave takes a step back involuntarily, cussing himself out internally for the slip while Dadbert goes on. "He has already seen Karkat badly hurt. I know my son, and I like to think I know how his mind works - if not when it comes to his sadness, then when it comes to his protective instincts."

The man steps forward, and this time Dave takes two steps back, stumbling a little on the second. The aura of impending doom radiating off this guy is unreal; if looks could kill, Dave is pretty sure he'd have keeled over by now. Samuel's expression doesn't even have to change - the heavy edge of warning in his voice does the job for him. "John would throw himself recklessly into Droog's path if he thought one of his friends was in danger. I do not know the full extent of your relationship with John, but I will not see my son gravely injured under circumstances that could have been wholly avoided."

Dave doesn't know what it is about the situation - whether it's the stillness of the house or the fact that he was already kind of scared shitless of John's dad even before this - but his fingers jitter as he types his reply, and his gut is tight with the kind of tension that usually only shows up when he's about to fight for his life. It's taking years of training in emotional suppression to keep his mask from crumbling, and he's never been more grateful for the buffer of his shades as he holds out the phone for Samuel to read.

DS: yeah

DS: no problem

DS: ill get right on that mr egbert
"See that you do," Samuel Egbert says, with that fakeass smile pinching his lips together, and he turns to go back to the study.

Dave nods in quick jerks of his head as he processes this, and then he sidesteps around Samuel Egbert and darts for the stairwell, past the carapacian asleep on the couch without sparing it a glance. When he's halfway up the stairs and sure he's alone, he stops and hunkers down in a squat. His calves tremble with the effort as he slowly unclenches his gritted teeth and loosens his jaw one muscle at a time. His hand, which clamped down on the hilt of one of his swords the moment he stopped typing, takes a good thirty seconds to ease off.

And then he takes out his phone again and starts pestering Bro. This is not something he'd usually do willing, but holy shit Dad Egbert won that pissing contest by a good ten miles.

TG: not dead
TT: you little fucking shit
TG: christ on a buttered biscuit, i don't give a fuck what future you says, your ass is still mine to kick for pulling a stunt like this TG: whoa a future me whos actually making himself useful for once im shocked TG: but yeah i fucked up what else is new TG: except oh wait i didnt fuck up because john actually needed me TT: dave...
TG: no fuck you
TG: you havent seen this kids puppy face
TG: this shit is unreal man
TG: no one can resist him when he looks like that TG: like someone gave him a chew toy and then ripped it out of his mouth and smacked him with it
TG: but he doesnt get mad
TG: just starts tearing up and denies the whole thing ever happened

Dave finishes climbing the stairs and walks until he's level with John's bedroom door. He can hear murmured voices from within - and by murmured, he means Karkat's perpetual half-shouting grumbles can be quite clearly heard through the closed door, but John's normal volume is muffled and indistinguishable. He could probably guess just from Karkat's half of the conversation what's going on, but he's pretty damn sure it'll just be a bunch of weird mushy nonsense and feelings, which seems to be half the point of the whole pale square thing.

Meanwhile, the ominous and deliberate silence on Bro's end keeps going on and on. Taunting him. Mocking him. Even the ellipses are deliberate, which means Bro is up to something Dave is basically guaranteed not to like.

TG: shit this had better not be -
TG: oh god
TT: it is
TG: WHAT THE FUCK HAVE YOU DONE
TT: heheheh

Dave can only stare. He can hear a weird, out of place whine, which he suspects is coming from him, but his horror is too great to be silenced.

It would be impossible to describe the horror of the shitty picture Bro has sent him. Suffice to say that yes, hell is real, and it is located in a dark corner of the Strider apartment where an entire crate of apple juice has been violated in ways that defy imagination.

Dave thinks he's going to be sick.

TG: oh my god
TG: my juice

Dave can't even try to get the last word in. The moment has come and gone and Bro has fucked off to do god knows what else to the rest of Dave's belongings, and Dave is left alone with only his horror for company. He leans back against the wall and slides down into a crouch in horrified contemplation. His stab wound whimpers at him, panging throughout his rib cage, but pales in comparison to the mental anguish he’s enduring. The image of rainbow puppets and defiled jugs of apple juice has been burnt into his retinas, an evil combination that would drive most men mad.

"Uh, Dave?" There is a shuffle, and the faint creak of the door opening, and then the sound of John clearing his throat. "...Are you okay down there?"

Dave looks up and shakes his head in despair at John's curious, mild concern. The kid hangs out of his bedroom with a hand on the door, kicking one foot absently as he cocks his head to the side. He stares at Dave with expectation, and when Dave remains zoned out, he just shrugs. "Um. Karkat is pretty much asleep now, and Jade’s still not answering on Pesterchum, so we can go if you're ready."

TG: busy contemplating the futile and pointlessly cruel nature of the universe
TG: dont mind me ill be over it in a few seconds
TG: thought living with bro has mostly given me immunity to this kind of existential angst
TG: but wow he outdid himself there
TG: like damn i am impressed
TG: truly his irony surpasses the boundaries of human morality and common decency
TG: jesus

John takes one look at Dave's pesterings, rocking his weight back and forth on his heels, and rolls his eyes. "It couldn't have been that bad, Dave! What were you even talking about?"

TG: youaskedforthis.jpeg

If nothing else, their long and extensively ironic broship should have taught John better by now, but he still makes the foolish mistake of opening the attachment. His jaw drops and Dave has the unique opportunity to rest his chin on a fist and watch a small portion of John's basic faith in humanity and fundamental innocence die in the light of Bro's unspeakable creation.
"We're going to pick up Jade, now," John says faintly, his voice breaking and hitting a high note worthy of a soprano as he lets his phone drop to his side, loose in his hand. "I just - oh my god - no, we're leaving now and never talking about this again. Ever. Promise me, Dave."

TG: you got it bro
TG: this entire episode is going to be expunged from our collective consciousness
TG: only to rise up again greater and more terrible than before whenever we finally get to go the fuck to sleep
TG: but for now there is only the bliss of denial
TG: not even rose is going to be able to pry this one out of our heads TG: you take that shit and you bury it deep my friend
TG: fist bump

Dazed, John presents a fist, and Dave taps it with his own in the solidarity of two bros sharing a traumatic experience. John then shakes off the horror like a champ, and Dave follows him as he turns on his heel and heads back into the bedroom.

Any way Dave looks at it, John's room is clearly the dwelling place of an unapologetic nerd. Unlike Dave's trashy cinderblock and taxidermy chic, John has actual normal furniture and strategically placed superhero posters at intervals along the walls. If it weren't for the fact that most of them are hanging off the wall and crumpled up at odd angles, he suspects the poster arrangement would almost be symmetrical. His desk is covered in textbooks and packets of homework, all hastily shoved into messy stacks that remind Dave that apparently this place was a wind tunnel no more than a few hours ago. One wall is taken up with a bookshelf full of comics and other books, next to a wire rack crammed full of DVDs. Dave doesn't even have to read the labels on the side to know that they would all involve either superheroes, Nicolas Cage, Liv Tyler, or Bill Cosby, because John has the shittiest taste in movies - that is to say, none whatsoever - and an unholy amount of brand loyalty to actors who have done nothing to justify that kind of obsession. Kick Ass, as both a hero movie and a Cage flick, resides in a place of honor at the top of the stack.

No puppets, no rows of clotheslines hung with developed photographs, and aside from the single carefully constructed troll pile that somehow survived the wind storm, no random heaps of junk swords.

Talk about culture shock.

The shabby purple recooperacoon in the middle of the room is a new addition, or so he's been told. Even as he eyes it, raising an eyebrow over the rim of his sunglasses, a bubble appears in the surface of the sopor slime and a baleful red eye glowers at him under a head of slimed black hair before Karkat submerges once more. Considering how scarce the guy made himself after his initial freak-out, it's like spotting the Loch Ness lusus. The rarely seen, elusive Karkat Vantas.

In person, the guy looks absolutely wrecked. Like, Dave had almost thought John was exaggerating Karkat's levels of universal animosity and the corresponding tendency to rant, but clearly John has been downplaying the whole downward spiral the two of them have been riding together over the past few weeks. He can only assume they've been functional over the past few years in whatever their weird trollmance is or John would have got in contact with Dave fucking ages ago, but their coping has gone to shit and it shows.

Whatever. Dave is here for sicknasty bro crime fighting times with John, and possibly emotional bullshit that he's not looking forward to dealing with in person but hell, like that's ever stopped him when John calls for backup in a time of need. Karkat's major malfunction is not even on his agenda, except for how it affects John.
And, of course, the fact that needling the troll into an incandescent rage is one of the funniest things Dave has ever seen. Like, holy crap, maybe there are people out there who can pull off that kind of spitting fury and make it look intimidating, but Karkat is not one of them. Between the huge bags under his eyes and the way he holds himself wound up tight as a spring, like a cat that's been spooked, torn between running and lashing out in desperation, he just looks kind of worn out. If the whole angry-at-the-universe thing is some kind of defense thing like Dave thinks Rose would call it, it's not working. Dave just thinks the whole thing is hilarious.

"Ready?" John whispers, which Dave thinks is totally unnecessary considering Karkat is clearly not asleep. But he shrugs noncommittally, and John takes that as a 'yes' regardless. The kid yanks up the mask that covers up the lower half of his face and then tugs down the goggles over his eyes. Dave would swear ten ways to Sunday that from the moment those goggles slap on John's feet don't touch the floor once; the wind snaps him up and wafts out the window, before Dave can text a word.

Throwing one last look at the 'coon full of irritable troll, Dave pulls off his shades and hooks them over the collar of his vest. He's barely crawled up onto the window sill and started to crane his neck up to see where Heir has fucked off to when the wind yanks him right off his feet and into the air. He flails for only half a second, thinking that he's falling to an incredibly embarrassing death, before he remembers who exactly he's dealing with, here. He freezes and his muscles lock up so he can stare at Heir with a complete and utter lack of amusement.

TG: if you say one word about a pranksters goddamn gambit
TG: i will end you

And then they're gone.

Dave's last memories of flying with Heir involve New York.

Needless to say, that shit was seven different kinds of fucked up, and he tries to think about it as little as possible.

But coasting along like this, when there's not a grimdark induced thunderstorm swirling overhead and whipping up the winds into an uncontrollable frenzy, is...fine. So fine. Totally fine. Hella fine.

Oh, who is he kidding he's freaking the fuck out.

But quietly. Never let on that you're freaking the fuck out - that's, like, rule number one of being a Strider, and Dave may be pissing himself on the inside but like fuck is he going to let it show in his face. He may be sweating a little, but he's pretty sure Heir can't see it so it doesn't count. His eyes ache with the effort of scrunching them up against the breeze, but he keeps his fingers away from the Pesterchum app unless he has an actual legitimate comment to add and not just a terrified screaming noise. Instead, he taps out a fast beat against the side of his pants, drumming his fingers and trying not to think about the drop.

This is stupid. He runs the Houston skyline on a regular basis and the heights have never fucked with him like this. He can only think it must be because he's not the one controlling this - Heir is. The wind might be calm and obedient to John's will, rather than fighting him every inch of the way like it had in New York, but it still feels like Dave is flying along by the seat of his pants and he is not about that life. John may be down with that life but Dave is so not.

He needs a distraction.
TG: so how are we gonna track her down anyway
TG: the amazing bouncing jade harley
TG: what's our game plan here

Heir tilts his head to the side as he reads his phone screen, one hand reaching out to the side. Dave catches the tail end of the breeze that wraps around Heir's hand with a faint whistle, and then it whooshes off into the night. "The wind is pretty good at guiding me where I need to go," he says, his eyes distant as they swoop past a lit up island in the middle of a lake. "Usually it just notices crimes in progress and stuff, but when I ask it to help me find Hemogoblin, it can take me right to him. Even if Sharpshooter is doing the spacy thing everywhere, I think we should be able to catch up eventually! Yeah!"

TG: hell
TG: better than the plan i came up with

"What plan is that?

TG: it mostly involved printing out missing posters and going door to door
TG: asking have you seen our harley
TG: usually seen with bonus wolf
TG: if found pls return to the egbert residence asap
TG: will reward with cake or shitty movie recommendations

"...That would be hilarious," Heir says, his eyes shining at the prospect. "That would be so stupidly great, I can't even imagine Jade's face!"

TG: there's always time to turn back
TG: we can fire up ye old printing press and have this shit banged out by morning
TG: old school moveable type and shitty ink and everything
TG: we could do this man we could make this happen

"With a woodcut carving of her and Bec at the top!" It takes a few minutes for John to stop giggling and slap his I'm-a-professional mask back on, clearing his throat. "But uh. We probably shouldn't mess around with dumb stuff when she could be in trouble. Let's just find her, first."

Dave shrugs as they skim over the first few skyscrapers.

TG: aight man
TG: anyway while the windy thing is looking TG: do we need to have bro talk

John winces. "I don't know how good of an idea that is," he says.

What.

Nope.

TG: yeah no try again
TG: pretty sure that sentence was supposed to go something like TG: why yes dave that idea is fucking kickass TG: we should get right on that TG: before yet more weird shit happens
TG: because you know it will TG: shit just happens to us
"It's never really been a problem before..." John trails off, scrubbing his hands through his hair and knocking his hood off. The wind tugs it back up over his head a second later. "I guess, because I didn't really talk to you all that often, and I didn't talk to Rose at all, and Karkat was my only real friend who I talked to about stuff other than swimming. I guess I just never really had to worry about where the boundaries were when it comes to other friends - so somehow I have no clue what Karkat expects me to share only with him and what might count as almost cheating on him. Dude, quadrants are hard."

TG: huh
TG: and this is why i dont mess around with the four squares
TG: good luck with that but shit
TG: i said i wouldnt dick around with your relationship thing
TG: if he gets all pissy and possessive i want no part in that clusterfuck TG: but also you need to talk about this TG: like tough shit for him what if you talked to an actual shrink instead of just rose would he still freak about that TG: cause that shit aint gonna fly
TG: that is some straight up crackpot motherfucking noise i will not abide TG: on the official strider list of priorities you rank higher than pandering to his butthurt irrational paranoia
TG: so platonic feelings jam go
TG: this is a limited time offer hurry i dont do feels often bro

"Urgggh!" John drags his hands down his face, and gives Dave the most aggrieved and disgruntled expression Dave has ever seen a human being make. He hadn't known a face could look that 110% done in real life. "Feelings!"

Dave nods sagely.

TG: agreed
TG: i concur completely TG: do go on

"I have a sister!"

TG: we need to throw a party about that eventually TG: surprise shindig for all us poor assholes now saddled with new siblings

"And Karkat is Hemogoblin!"

TG: still laughing for ten thousand years about that tbh
TG: you can't see it but this is my laughing face

John stops flailing around in midair and looks. Dave keeps his mouth perfectly flat. "You're terrible, dude," John says. He rolls his eyes, and Dave smirks while he's not looking. Mission accomplished - or so he thinks, right up until John's expression falls again, and he twists his arm so that the wind swings them around and they start in another direction. He gets too quiet, too suddenly, and Dave's eyebrow inches up his forehead.

Well, at least John is goddamn consistent. Dave can count on him to pretty much always make things a federal fucking issue whenever it concerns doing something for his own good. He's obviously shut down so suddenly because there's something else on his mind.

TG: and you feel guilty as fuck because he got hurt on the job

John closes his eyes. Which is the opposite of something he should be doing when they're flying hundreds of feet over the city at fifty miles an hour. Like. Dave is not down with this turn of events, holy shit. He snaps his fingers a few times, loud enough that it gets John's attention and his eyes pop open again, thank fuck.

"You told me it wasn't my fault and all that stuff, but I still can't stop thinking it," John mutters, breathing out shakily through his nose. "And the fact that I didn't realize it was him, all this time…"

TG: to be fair
TG: he didn't realize you were you either
TG: so you two equal each other out in terms of righteous obliviousness

"- And also I kind of want to make out with him!" John blurts out, and then he slaps both hands over his mouth.

They stare at each other in mutual disbelief.

Dave can feel one of his eyes twitching. He should probably have his shades on for this conversation. He doesn't know what he was thinking, taking them off in the first place. Why is that even a thing. He needs a new ironic costume idea, this one was a shitty idea and he gives full credit for it to Bro.

Finally he slaps one hand to his face and starts typing again. Because seriously. Relationships. Not his division. But apparently John needs to talk this out even more than his irrational guilt complex, and Dave can kind of see why this issue in particular might be something he couldn't jam out with Karkat himself about.

Eurgh. He has a reputation to maintain, for chrissakes. Why is this happening to him. Why does he care about this goober so much.

TG: oh great
TG: gdi john
TG: is there anything in the moirail crossroads deal that says makeouts cant be on the agenda
TG: anything at all you can find a loophole for that TG: i don't know shit about the diamonds and the clubs and all that conciliatory bs
TG: fuck man
TG: do we need to call in rose maybe she knows
TG: yeah you should talk to rose about this instead TG: that sounds like a much better plan you know im shit at this TG: i volunteer her as tribute
"I don't know!" John grinds a fist against his forehead, almost cross-eyed behind the lens of his goggles. "Rose would just try to psychoanalyze me, and anyway, she's still so worried about her mom and her grimdark thing and stuff. I don't want to bother her about it!"

When Dave goes to throw John an aggrieved look of his own, he runs up against a new stumbling block - the fact that John isn't looking at him, which normally wouldn't be all that big of a deal except Dave can't move into his line of vision because John is the one floating them around, here.

Seriously, why aren't they having this conversation on the ground? The ground would be so righteous right now. He could get down with the ground.

TG: that sucks man
TG: but also im pretty sure shell figure it out anyway
TG: that chick is scary good
TG: once she gets her tentacles into this she wont let you ignore her either
TG: and then what man youll have two strilondes on your case
TG: wont have any choice but to deal with yo shit
TG: jesus i cant believe this has been about sloppy makeouts all along TG: you would let this kind of shit bug you eb

"Haha! Yeah!" John's voice cracks and hits a high note and wow that's not suspicious as fuck at all. "Now hang on - something's weird -"

TG: i fucking called it

"Whateverrr, Dave." John sticks out his tongue as they drift to a halt and start sinking down toward the nearest roof, aiming for a helicopter landing pad that Dave can barely make out in the dark. Then he flinches, and shakes his head, spluttering to correct himself. "Uh! I meant Flashstep. But seriously! Are you seeing Sharpshooter anywhere?"

TG: do you know how few fucks i have to give about the name thing

Dave looks around anyway. He's not exactly familiar with Seattle. At all. But they've drifted pretty far north by this point, and his internal clock is telling him it's been a good forty-five minutes since they left the Egbert house. Most of the office buildings around them are dark, with only the occasional scattered emergency light on each floor.

However, there is a distinct lack of Jade Harley, and with a personality like hers Dave can't imagine the girl would be easy to miss. He's seen Sharpshooter on the Internet and has a vague idea that she goes around in a perpetual cloud of chaos and green science lightning. But the sky around them is dark and clear, without even a cloud overhead that she could be chilling out in. If this is where John's weird windtution wants them to be, there must have been a miscommunication somewhere along the way.

The wind wisps around John, unseen but ruffling his clothing and hair so much that Dave can almost pick out where the breezes wrap around and over each other. No wonder the kid has a head of perpetual cowlicks; how the hell does he stand it all the time? "This is where it feels like we should be," John goes on, half-talking to himself now as he scans the road beneath their vantage point, with a faint frown on his features. "I mean - maybe there's a crime going on here or something? Sometimes that distracts the windy thing. But I'm not seeing Sharpshooter or Bec around here."

TG: well i wasnt going to say anything
TG: but yeah dude what the fuck
TG: do you think we missed her
"I guess it's possible?" He doesn't sound very sure. "With her spacy thing she can teleport pretty much wherever she wants - but she has to reappear somewhere else eventually, and the wind doesn't seem to think she's gone too far from here. We should be right on top of where she is!"

They look at each other. Then, as one, both heroes look down at the roof beneath their feet. They're in the middle of the helipad, a black and white quadrangle with a blocky H that looks freshly painted in the center.

Neither of them have x-ray vision, so looking down is entirely pointless, in retrospect. Dave just sets his jaw and owns it. If John isn't going to point that out, neither is he.

TG: you dont think

Without a word, John floats over to the edge of the roof, dragging Dave along behind him almost on reflex, while Dave stretches and tries futilely to get his feet to kiss and makeup with the wonderfully solid roof beneath him. He fails spectacularly, but then John sets him down so that they can both lean over the railing and peer at the street right beneath them.

No sign of Jade. There's a circular drive beneath them that hooks onto the street in a wide arc, but no sign of any cars suspicious or otherwise hanging around.

Dave is starting to suspect that John's powers might be busted. Which would be absolutely shitty for the kid, but doesn't necessary mean much aside from the fact that they're short a Harley on this little fetch quest and might be out here all night looking for her the old fashioned way if she keeps hopping around. The completely fucking smart thing to do would be to have a future-Dave arrive with exact coordinates and a time for them to coincidentally find Jade while expending minimal effort. Then Dave and John could go and get froyo or some shit and peace the fuck out until it's show time.

Come on. Just this once, a convenient future self with a message of goodwill and charity that will make up for all those times future-Dave has been an enigmatic dick to himself...

Nothing.

Dave bangs his head against the railing, the metal cold against his forehead as he squeezes his tired eyes shut and blinks hard a few times. He can only take solace in the fact that at least John has no idea how incredibly uncool Dave is and will continue be in the immediate future by not giving them a heads up. The kid is too pragmatic for that.

"Oh, nooo…" John says. Dave props his head back up, affecting a careless slump over the railing even as John tenses up beside him. Fuck it; Dave slots his shades back on and stares with unflappable regard at the nondescript black car that putters to a stop in front of the building they've made their perch. "Oh, shit," he adds, pulling back from the railing a little a peering over with only his nose sticking over the edge. It's stupidly goofy looking and Dave snerks a little into his sleeve before coughing and sobering up enough to take another look himself.

Down below, the door of the building swings open. Two shadows stretch out before the actual people appear, and Dave rests his head to the side on one closed fist as the two walk out to the car. The driver never leaves the vehicle as it idles, but one window rolls down on the passenger's side.

One of the people is a man maybe in his thirties - seriously, like Dave can tell jack shit about the guy's age from up here - in a sleek black suit. His hair is close-cropped and a faint, grey-winged mousey brown, but from this angle Dave can't see his face. He strides out and leans slightly to talk to the driver through the open window.
The second person is a girl, and if the first guy is a forgettable chump, this lady is dressed like some espionage thriller's idea of what a spy should look like. Dave is simultaneously impressed and horrified by how much Kevlar has to have gone into making the leather and neoprene and buckles mesh together into something even vaguely resembling a functional costume. Fucking hell, that's half of why Dave has such trouble getting his suits past Bro's obnoxious standards. Her bob of blond hair and the bright pink-purple scarf wrapped tightly around her neck and tucked into the front of her suit stand out like beacons against all the black. There's a heavy, matte black instrument case slung over her back, and she stumbles and teeters from side to side as she walks like she's trying to keep her balance on the deck of a ship at sea.

"That's a sniper rifle," John murmurs, and shit man, John is the last person on the planet who Dave would have expected to be able to ID a sniper rifle kind case on sight. "Crap!"

TG: oh frick
TG: dude
TG: you think this is why we ended up here instead TG: some sniping shit going down
TG: or maybe your windy thing got the wrong rifle kind user

"I don't know," John groans, gnawing his lip so furiously Dave can see it through the mask. "This looks so shady…"

With a squeaking hiccup that they can hear from on top of the building, the sniper apologizes loudly, her words slurred and barely comprehensible as she almost falls into the back seat of the car and lugs her rifle case in behind her. It slams against the side of the door with a crack, but she just giggles and tugs it the rest of the way in. The man in the suit shakes his head, and turns away from the vehicle as the window rolls up, his quiet dialog with the driver apparently at an end.

"Laterz, Marlie!" the sniper calls, just as the suited man shuts the door on her face with a grimace.

"Ma-!" is as far as John's furious shout gets before Dave's reflexes kick in. He tackles John, smacks a hand over the kid's mouth, and pauses time before the other hero can fling himself over the edge of the roof. He manages to haul John back into the center of the helipad, but he's also pretty goddamn sure John lets it happen after a brief attempt to struggle against Dave's grip, because John is stupid strong. There's still raw fury in John's eyes, but when Dave raises a questioning eyebrow he closes them and breathes hard for a few moments before letting his shoulders slump. "I'm good," he mumbles, muffled, and Dave jerks his hands away to occupy them with his phone once more.

Shit, he hates it when he loses his ability to communicate. It's starting to seriously fuck with him. He hadn't appreciated it when the only people he could sign with were carapacians and certain dickwad older brothers, but at least back in Houston he hadn't been restricted to text alone.

"That was Marlowe," John finishes spitting in a much quieter voice, instead of shouting it for everyone and their asshat mob boss to hear. He folds his arms over his chest and taps his fingers against his sleeves as he glares back at the railing, though they can't see the guy from here. It's more of a pout, because John does rage like a bucktoothed four-year-old, even with the mask hiding his teeth, but the perks of having a hella tight emotionless mask is that John never needs to know that Dave is smiling on the inside. "Don't know his full name, but he was one of the Crew members who was with Diamonds Droog last night."

That gets Dave's attention.

TG: oh youve gotta be shitting me
TG: those guys are here now
TG: my night is made
TG: no really
TG: my night is more made than easy mac
TG: we've just popped that shit in the microwave
TG: and i've been in dire need of cheesy noodles bro

"But what is he doing here?" Oh, right. John isn't distracted by thoughts of late night easy mac right now. That's just him. Dave, momentarily lost in thoughts of mac and cheese, snaps out of it when John starts back toward the railing again.

There may or may not be a thin trickle of drool at the corner of Dave's mouth, and he will fight anyone who claims he has to pause time to inconspicuously wipe it away before John can see.

TG: shit
TG: you don't think your windy thing took us to mc central do you
TG: because as bitchin as that would be any other night of the week
TG: you know flipping bro the middle finger and getting all up in crew business for funsies TG: were still short a jade

"I know!" John's pout hits maximum overdrive, and his eyes start to gleam a radioactive blue. Since the last time he pulled that kind of shit rage teleportation happened all over the place, Dave shoots a hand out and hooks the back of John's hood so at least he'll (hopefully) get dragged along for the ride in the event John turns out to be a hop, skip, and a kickflip away from hitting those levels of batshit crazytown fury again. That is an entirely possible sequence of events. God, he loves this kid, but John in hero mode is probably just as easy to piss off as Karkat, and twice as much of a flight risk.

Shit. The puns. They're starting again.

"But the wind doesn't want to go anywhere else," he continues, and hey, at least talking isn't teleporting. Dave nods encouragingly. "In fact, if that sniper is hanging around Seattle, it's all the more important that we get Sharpshooter right now and make plans to deal with that, too. So it's even more important that we find her! I don't know, usually the wind just gets me, but - I -"

It's obvious in hindsight. So obvious. Dave lets out a strangled groan.

TG: shit
TG: bro
TG: maybe you're not losing your mojo
TG: maybe
TG: just maybe
TG: harleys here already

"What?" John blinks away the glow, which Dave is so on board with, and looks at him like a confused, quizzical puppy. In response, Dave curtly jerks his chin down at the roof beneath them.

TG: just saying
TG: if we could find these guys by accident
TG: which by the way we are never telling anyone about ever
TG: because that shit be embarrassing as fuck
TG: and we will never hear the end of it
TG: im pretty sure an intrepid hero type like jade could TG: and then proceed to investigate like the hardboiled sleuth she probably thinks she is TG: our princess is not in another castle
TG: shes right here fucking shit up under our noses
John's throat works. Dave holds his hands out to either side, gesturing and raising his eyebrows for emphasis when his goddamn genius suggestion continues to go unanswered. By the time John decides on his response, Dave is fully expecting some kind of dissertation on the subject of his magnificence and genius at deducing the whereabouts and motivations of flighty space broads.

Instead, John facepalms and wails, almost mournfully, "Jaaaaaaade!!!"

Dave is of the opinion that they should run in, grab Jade, and run like hell. Just wing it, get in and out before Droog can capitalize on how incredibly stupid they'd have to be to run with a plan like that. Plans like that are his specialty.

Heir puts the hammer down on that before Dave can elaborate. "It's already bad enough we landed on their roof. What if they have cameras and stuff?!!" he hisses, flailing spectacularly in midair. "Arrrgh! Darn it, Jade! Why do you do these things?! We need to have a plan and some idea of what the building looks like and how many Crew members might be in there and bluhhhhhh!"

TG: plans are for squares
TG: once were inside your windy thing can lead us right to her
TG: if we run into any guards or cleaning ladies i can hop us back to ten minutes before any alarm is sounded
TG: hell in the grand scheme of timey wimey things weve probably already rescued jade and clocked out
TG: and future us are being obnoxious on the other side of the building
TG: you learn to just live with this shit man planning is overrated

Heir knuckles at his forehead, his brows furrowed in such an intense frown it looks like he's going to hurt himself by thinking too hard. "I just wish we knew what we were getting into," he says at last, even as resignation settles onto his face. "Or that Jade would just answer her stupid phone and text me back! Jeez! Now I'm getting paranoid that her ringtone will go off and blow her cover or something!"

TG: telling you
TG: in and out
TG: and if we see droog you jump us out no questions asked
TG: this shit is foolproof

John just gives him a look. "Dave. When have any of our plans ever actually been foolproof?" he asks, exasperated.

That...is an excellent question. But Dave has never let a little thing like logic stop him before.

TG: shhhhhhh
TG: come on lets fly by the windows and find an empty room
TG: jump in and track down jade
TG: and then we go home and sleep

Sleep being the magic word, here, John sighs and nods, raising a hand. The wind picks up, fluttering the trailing edge of Dave's white vest, and oh for fuck's sake they're flying again. Dave clamps down on every shrieking instinct that wants him to grab onto John for dear life and remains completely frozen in midair like the stone cold badass he is.

Heir drops them down to street level, on the side of the building facing away from the street. There's an emergency exit door tucked away back there, but also a tiny unmarked entrance further along that is almost concealed behind a dumpster. Heir set them down, walks right up to it, and twists the doorknob.

All the way around. One quick flip of his wrist and the poor lock snaps audibly under the pressure.

Note to self, Dave thinks, as Heir pushes the unfortunate door open with a finger pressed to his lips, do not ever fuck with John in hand to hand.

The room beyond the door is dark, and Dave doesn't quite pull the door all the way closed so that a sliver of light from the street outside shines through. He gives up and removes his shades a second later so his shitty eyes will get with the program and adjust to the darkness. The light glints off rows of metal shelves on either side as they press forward, and his and Heir's steps tap and echo off the concrete floor in a way that suggest there's a lot of space around them. "Feels like a storage space," Heir whispers, and the wind whistles on either side, pitched so high and lilting that the hairs on Dave's arm prickle. "No one's in here. No one breathing, anyway. No Sharpshooter."

Dave nods, even though Heir can't see it, and stays close on the other hero's heels by his right shoulder. Internally, he has a timer going from the moment they cross the threshold into the building. Like working through a timed level on a video game. It just keeps him focused, alright?

He nearly runs into John's back when they reach the far side of the storage room. They've come far enough from the door that the faint streetlight does absolutely nothing for anybody, so Dave takes out his phone and lets the screen shine on the interior wall. The door is a little farther down, and Heir keeps a hand on the wall until they reach it while Dave holds the light over their heads. Standing in the circle of faint illumination, with the darkness pressing in tight on either side, reminds Dave of the kind of godawful horror games Bro would always try to trick him into playing in the dead of night when he was a young, naïve little kid - the ones where you only got three feet of visibility before something with a gaping mouth and eyes that blinked the wrong way lunged out of the fog.

John said nothing breathing was lurking around in here and yet oh god fucking dammit Dave can't believe he's actually scaring himself with this. Shit. Shit. Sometimes he hates his brain.

"I think we're okay," Heir says, so quiet that Dave is surprised he can even make it out, and then Heir reaches out and snaps whatever deadbolt is on this door, too.

The sudden light of the hallway stings Dave's eyes, but he refuses to fiddle around with his shades again. There's no one in sight in either direction but he's not risking it.

TG: well dude
TG: where to next
TG: shit we probably flew down past her if shes not on the ground floor

"Actually," Heir says, scratching his head and looking down at his shoes, nonplussed, "the wind...still says down."

TG: oh great
TG: shes gone to the core of the earth
TG: thats the real secret of the crew john TG: theyre the mole people
TG: jesus i should have seen this coming from a mile away

"Oh no, you don't think they're actually -" John starts, his eyes widening as he stares at Dave in growing horror, clapping his hands to his cheeks. There is an approximately three second period in which Dave knows for a fact that John, the gullible dumbass that he is, is actually giving serious consideration to the theory that the Midnight Crew have risen up from the underground mounted on giant sightless mole lusii. Those three moments give Dave just enough time to have a revelation that goes something along the lines of I have been granted an incredible power over the paragon of youth and trust that is John Egbert because this kid will buy absolutely anything you sell him and I must use this power only for good and hilariously ironic evil.

But then a snicker breaks past the supposedly uncrackable seal of his lips, and a wheezy snerk escapes his flawless façade. He does his level best to channel it into a throat-clearing cough, but that's all it takes for John to start pouting and fold his arms, glowering at Dave as realization sets in. "Flashstep, you're awful. Hahahaha. So funny. Really hilarious."

TG: no idea what you're talking about eb
TG: nothing but irony here
TG: sweet sweet irony

"Awful. Now come on, you dick, do you have ideas that are actually related to - I don't know, real life?" John shakes his head gesturing at the featureless corridor around them. "Maybe there's a basement level. Let's look for a stairwell or something."

But that's the thing, as it turns out. Aside from the door to the storage room they just came in through and the emergency exit at the end of the hall, the hallway is almost disturbingly empty of doors. Just smooth walls as far as the eye can see. The one stairwell they find only leads to the upper floors, and the elevator only has buttons to take them up. At the far end of the hall Dave can see the open space where the hallway opens up onto the lobby, but John shushes him and holds up two fingers when he goes too close. Apparently there are still two people in there, but when Dave pauses time and chances a look, he can't see any sign of another elevator or even any doors aside from the ones that lead outside.

But whatever vibes John is getting from the wind, they're only interested in the extremely goddamn vague direction that is down.

Just as John turns, frustrated, to glance worriedly in the direction of the lobby, where the low murmur of the secretaries at the desk has increased in volume, Dave gets his shit together. He's surprised it takes him as long as it does but nobody's perfect. The idea hits him when he's twirling his phone in one hand in quiet aggravation, and his thumb accidentally brushes the Pesterchum window for John to one covered in bright yellow orange text.

Of course.

TG: hang on

"Huh?" John looks at him, blinking. "What is it?"

TG: dont worry i got this

And with that Dave flashsteps back into the stairwell. It's dark and cramped and the concrete smells like damp and mold. It gives the impression that no one really bothers with the stairwell, not when there's a perfectly good elevator to pander to the masses.

But this time, instead of commiserating with John over the lack of any obvious stairs downward, Dave applies himself and starts going over the floor an inch at a time in doubletime. John comes to the open door behind him as he works, but once his eyes comb the ground and catch sight of what he's looking for, Dave springs back onto his feet, his knees aching from crouching down.
He draws a toe along the seam in the ground. It's hidden well, sure, but the hinges are obvious when you know the signs. The seam is visible only as the faintest of shadows in the light from the hallway, but it's there, a four sided trapdoor that must lead down into a basement that is most definitely not in the original building plans.

"Whoa!" John kneels down and tilts his head to the side. There is a faint whine that climbs in volume, and when Dave leans over his bangs fly up out of his face in the updraft through the seams that John has apparently kicked into overdrive with his wind powers. "I didn't even notice that! How did you see that?"

"I'll bet anything there was an alarm on that outside door, too," Heir mutters, inspecting the faint outline in the floor while trailing his fingers along the crease. That is the exact opposite of hygienic, but Dave doesn't comment. "Droog isn't the type to leave a pace like this unguarded. Someone should have come to investigate by now."

Maybe." John sucks in a breath, and then huffs it out, waving Dave forward with a hand as he sits back on his haunches to inspect the trapdoor. "Damn it. Well, I've kind of trying to avoid this but…"

He straightens up, frowning. "We're gonna have to jump through. Be ready for shenanigans, man."

Dave lays a hand on his shitty sword and nods curtly. John reaches out with a hand and Dave takes it, gritting his teeth as John's eyes flash and -

He's never been conscious while John does the rage teleport thing. He's seen some heinously embarrassing videos on the internet that show him being a damsel in fucking distress all over the skyline of New York City while John and Bro covered his unconscious ass, but he'd passed out so effectively that he can't remember anything between taking a thorn to the neck and waking up on the roof with Rose puking grimdark into a trash can.

He zones right out. There's the vague sensation of being compressed, and squeezed through a thin space, but aside from that all he can hear is the beat pounding in his ears, so loud that it seems to rattle his brain in his skull like he's pressed his ear to a subwoofer.

And then they're at the bottom of a flight of stairs again. But unlike the dim half-light of the upper stairwell, this one is well lit and open to the hallway rather than set off in a side room, the light overhead a bright white fluorescent that harshes on Dave's eyes. He grimaces, touching a hand to the spot where his brand new headache has taken up residence, and waits for the obnoxious bassline to fade out of his awareness.
A gloved hand squeezes his own, and it takes him that long to realize that he and John are still clutching at each other like sleeping otters. "Are you alright?" he asks, concerned, as Dave yanks his hand free and closes it in a fist at his side.

TG: cool
TG: im cool
TG: come on lets get out of this wide open hallway im getting paranoid as fuck

"Really?" John persists, following Dave as they creep forward and Dave keeps his eyes peeled for some kind of corner or side area where they can get out of the direct line of sight of basically anyone who feels like walking down the corridor. There's a brand new elevator on their right, one that must not be connected to the main elevator above. "Because when I took - Hemogoblin, one time, he said he noticed something...weird…"

TG: well shit
TG: nah bro im good lets just get out of sight and regroup

Because it's starting to sink in that yes, somehow, by sheer fucking dumb luck, Dave and John have stumbled across yet another Midnight Crew base. This one isn't a shitty abandoned movie theater, but the last time shit like this went down, Dave picked up a brand new bird version of himself.

Jesus. There better not be some kind of goddamn walrus-John hanging around in this basement or Dave will lose his shit.

Shaking his head, Dave darts into the first side corridor he finds. There's a rolling cart covered in empty plastic containers that Dave has absolutely no interest in, and he ducks behind it. John huddles at his side, peering around the corner. Under this light his costume looks even more disheveled and utilitarian than usual, and Dave stifles the automatic tangent his brain wants to go on concerning ways he could improve on it. You'd think at least Dadbert would have some kind of fashion sense, but it's not showing in John's poor hero life choices.

There's a disturbing lack of people still. Dave bristles, his shoulders hunching up as he scans the walls up near the ceiling for any sign of cameras. Surely there should be more security than this?

A bright jangle breaks out and Dave slams back against the wall, whipping around in horror to stare at John as the music continues.

John stares back in guilty horror. "Hang on! Karkat is pestering me!" he yelps, slapping at his pocket until the tiny jingle cuts off. He pulls out the phone itself a second later but seriously?!

TG: now
TG: right the fuck now
TG: youre serious

"Well, it's not like we knew there'd be a bunch of sneaking around tonight!" John shrugs helplessly and reads the pesterlog, his face lit eerily by the glow of the screen. "I didn't think it would matter if I left the ringtone on!"

TG: texting in the middle of an extraction
TG: we are the most unprofessional fucks i know
TG: and thats saying something
TG: pretty sure they revoke hero licenses for shit like this TG: and even if we go in and plead our case
TG: the judgell be like did you shits text on the job TG: and you know what
TG: we cannot deny that your honor we did in fact pester each other while in uniform
TG: and boom there goes our credentials

John types rapidly in response to the grey bars of text filling up the screen, holds down the volume button on the side with fingers that may or may not be trembling a little from the sudden shock of the interruption, and then stuffs the phone back in his pocket. "Okay. Alright. Yeah. Sorry about that," he apologizes, his face flushed with embarrassment. "Come on. Sharpshooter must be further in."

TG: alright can you feel anyone else

"At least five people, none of them Sharpshooter." John's face hardens. "Should we try to get around the corner before one of them comes out into the hallway?"

TG: lets do it
TG: were doing this man were making it happen

Heir takes the lead this time, and Dave keeps his head down and his footsteps as light as he can while they race down the hallway, heading for the far end, where the corridor veers off to the right. When they turn they find another set of stairs that lead further down into the earth, and Heir nods when Dave tilts his head to the side in a silent question.

Of course, halfway down the next flight of stairs John's phone goes off again, though much more quietly than before. He pulls it out and texts on the fly, in response to whatever the hell Karkat is freaking out about now, and skips the last few steps in a floating glide. When Dave raises an eyebrow, John just shakes his head without a sound. "There are more people down here," he whispers when they reach the next floor. They duck underneath the stairs themselves into a shadowed cranny, and John multitasks by pestering Karkat and wrapping the wind around them at the same time. Whatever he senses, it makes him shake his head distractedly. "And - ugh, I think Sharpshooter is still one more floor down."

TG: so we need to leg it again
TG: race you there

Heir's smile is faint but it's there. "You're on. The faster we find her, the sooner we can just bounce out of here and call the cops on this place."

On that note, Dave smirks, and steps out from under the stairs. Because John might be able to punch through doors or some shit, but Dave can whup his scrawny butt in a speed trial, hands down. There's no contest.

And then, without warning, there is a violent boom.

wwwwwWWWHOMP!

Dave's feet fly out from under him and he pauses time to land in a crouch rather than faceplanting; at his side Heir tips forward but in the next moment he's floating in midair anyway, his hood flying off his head as he spins around. The ground rolls under Dave again, accompanied by another muffled rumble and a metallic clang, and he braces himself on the wall.

"Not again," Heir says, growling a little under his breath as he hovers just above the roiling ground. "If that's another building blowing up I will put Droog in a cell myself."

Dave readjusts his shades where they're hanging off the front of his vest, and rides out the last few aftershocks. His mind is racing though, and he shakes his head.
TG: no that was definitely below us
TG: that was too fucking close
TG: jesus fuck was that jade TG: what the heck is going on

"Oh man. If she got caught - well, for one thing she might just teleport out of here before we even find her," Heir says, shaking his head. Then he seems to consider it. "Which - no, that would actually be a pretty acceptable turn of events. I've got as tight a bead on her as I can manage, so if she jumps out hopefully I'll sense it before someone sees us." His phone buzzes and rings in his pocket, and John groans, rubbing the back of his head and ducking back under the stairwell to jab at his phone.

Seriously. That needs to stop. Karkat needs to lay off and John needs to stop doing the indulging thing.

A door flies open ahead of them, and Dave has his swordkind in hand even before the men and trolls in black uniform swarm out into the hallway from multiple doors. None of them so much as glance in the two heroes' direction, though, pounding in a mob toward the next set of stairs down at the far end of the hall. Heir is a ball of tension behind him, even as the group vanishes down to the next basement level, and Dave turns to give the kid a stern texting-to about this whole thing.

And that's when Heir keels over.

TG: what shit
TG: shit fuck
TG: wait why the fuck am i typing this fuck

The hero hits knees first and then crumples up, so at least he doesn't smack his head against the ground before Dave gets there. Instead, Dave hoists John up at the last second and snags him awkwardly by the shoulder and the hair to yank him upright. But John is also dense as fuck when he's not floating and Dave nearly gets dragged down regardless. John had better appreciate the desperately uncool antics Dave has to go through on his behalf because no one else in the world would be worth this kind of stupidity.

Doesn't matter, though. When he grabs John's lolling head and nudges it around so he can see the kid's face, blood gushes out of John's nose like a goddamn fountain, spilling over his sagging mask and staining the fabric.

Glancing around, Dave makes sure the coast is clear still before hooking his arms under John's armpits and dragging him back further into their sneaky corner. Once he's got John propped up against the wall so he won't gargle blood while he's unconscious, Dave kneels next to John and shakes him a little, prodding at the kid's cheek when that gets no response. What the hell, he thinks, gingerly peeling back John's eyelid to see that his eyes have rolled back in his skull. The kid is totally out of it.

And yet, somehow, still clutching his phone in one hand. Which is suspicious as fuck and Dave reserves the bro-given right to confiscate that shit and take a gander at what the hell Karkat could have said that turned John into a bad eromanga character.

He thumbs through the pesterlog without really reading it, scanning until he reaches the very bottom of the archived posts and can start typing. He just hopes that whatever shit is going down with Jade downstairs, she can either hold out until he can get John to a safe spot or teleport out so that they can all get their asses out of the danger zone.

It was supposed to be foolproof. Honestly. Dave wonders why he even bothers worrying about plans anymore when even his most impulsive of decisions tend to fall apart in the face of their collective holy-shit-quotient.

CG: WHAT IS WRONG WITH JOHN?
EB: will you give me like ten seconds jeez

It is hard, typing up a pesterstorm and lugging an unconscious body around at the same time. It is hard, and no one understands. Dave pauses time, yanks the nearest door open, and is greeted by the sight of a tiny supply closet.

Eh, works for him.

He pulls John inside and closes the door again, knocking over a full bottle of bleach that glugs and sloshes as it rolls under the nearest shelf. He's panting a little now from stress, but at least now the chance of some Crew member literally tripping over John has been minimized.

Why the hell had they thought going in after Jade was a good idea, again? Seriously, who in their right mind still let John and Dave make decisions? Clearly neither one of them is cut out for the whole 'planning ahead' gig.

EB: look here i got john into a safe corner but he might be out for a while here

Dave needs both hands for the amount of face he needs to slap. Karkat is one thing, he doesn't expect shit out of Karkat, and he's never even met Jade in person, but at least Dadbert or heck, even John himself could have been assed to mention the fact that apparently this shit is normal. Or at least happening on the regular, which, what the actual fuck?

TG: well shit

TG: you know
TG: i have so many options here
TG: usually id say if you insist but dinner first TG: if youre making an offer youve come to the right place
TG: i could make some witty comment about my dick but its just too long
TG: this is usually a hard topic to bring up but i can try to rise to the occasion
TG: youve really opened the floor to so many comebacks here
TG: but ill just try to suck it up
TG: for the good of the team
CG: …
CG: TELL ME YOU DID NOT JUST MAKE THREE DIRTY PUNS WHILE TEXTING ME ON MY UNCONSCIOUS MOIRAILS PHONE.

Dave tuts to himself, shaking his head in disappointment. He expects better work from someone who's spent so long around John.

TG: six
TG: would it help if I used the blue text again
g
CG: NO.
TG: well shit there goes the roleplay strategy
g
TG: way to harsh on a mans kinks bro
g
TG: hope I didn't jerk you around too much
g TG: no hard feelings
g
CG: HOW.
CG: HOW IS THIS EVEN POSSIBLE.
TG: were in this together now man
g
TG: we need to see this through to the end
g
TG: we are motherfucking entrenched in this shit and no one goes home until our hate dicksoiree of
g a text relationship has been immortalized in cinemas worldwide
g
TG: through the fire and the flames
g TG: we carry on
g
CG: ...I'M DONE.
CG: I'VE GOT NOTHING TO SAY TO THAT.
CG: THERE ARE NO WORDS FOR HOW LITTLE I WANT THIS RIVALRY TO BE A THING.
CG: CAN WE JUST BE HATEFRIENDS FUCK I DON'T WANT TO DEAL WITH THIS ANYMORE.
TG: hells yeah bro
g
CG: WHAT.
CG: IT CAN'T BE THAT EASY.

Dave just rolls his eyes because really. Where did John even find this guy?

TG: sure it can
g
TG: im only trying to piss you off because its hilarious when you freak out
g
TG: but also eventually you have to realize that when i say no hate i literally mean no hate
g
TG: so no mas ragefits bro just let the peace of shared brohood flow through you
g
TG: for johns sake if nothing else
g CG: ...
g
CG: AND YOU'RE NOT TRYING TO MOIRAIL JOHN.
TG: he talks to me about depression and hero shit man theres literally nothing there thats a secret TG: its like gossiping but also therapy because john is somehow that messed up in the head that i of
g all people have to point out his coping mechanisms are bullshit TG: none of this hugging and papping in a weird pile of junk just platonic get your shit together style brotalks
g
CG: WELL
g
CG: GOOD.
g TG: yup
g
CG: THAT IS ABSOLUTELY FUCKING FANTASTIC.
TG: it totally is
g
CG: PEACHY.
TG: downright caucasian
g
CG: KEEP IT THAT WAY.
TG: you got it bro
g
TG: so would you ever make out with him

It occurs to him that smirking in a dark supply closet lit only by the bluish glow of a phone screen with one's best bro's unconscious body leaning up against the wall opposite might actually be creepy as fuck. But also he's already resigned himself to the fact that he and John are going to need to go back in time to salvage this shitty operation anyway, so he's got plenty of time to dick around. Ah, the privileges of being able to abuse time travel.

CG: WHAT THE ACTUAL FUCK?!
TG: that was a hypothetical question
CG: WHAT - WHY WOULD YOU EVER FEEL THE NEED TO ASK THAT KIND OF QUESTION? WHAT IN YOUR SICK, DEPRAVED HUMAN MIND WOULD EVER MAKE THE MENTAL LEAP TO CONSIDERING THAT AN EVEN REMOTELY VIABLE TOPIC OF CONVERSATION IN OUR NEW AND EXTREMELY TENUOUS HUMAN 'BROHOOD.'
TG: idk seemed like the thing to ask TG: you and john TG: smooching
TG: sloppy diamond makeouts
TG: could that ever be a thing
CG: THAT IS SO UNBELIEVABLY NOT YOUR BUSINESS THAT THE UNIVERSE ITSELF IS HAVING AN EXISTENTIAL CRISIS OF FAITH DUE TO A SUDDEN NET RECESSION IN THE BELIEF MARKET.
TG: just saying bro
TG: the kid is hot
TG: it is entirely possible he works out
TG: and you have never been tempted to mack on that TG: never ever
CG: IF THIS KIND OF AMAZINGLY INVASIVE LINE OF QUESTIONING IS COMMON IN BROHOOD THEN I CAN ONLY TRY TO SCAVENGE SOME KIND OF DIGNITY WITH AN OLD CLASSIC.
CG: I PLEAD THE FIFTH, FUCKWAFFLE.
TG: well dunk me in gravy and call me chicken on waffles i tried TG: oh my god did i try
TG: oh shit fuck someones breaking in bye
CG: WHAT NO
-- turntechGodhead [TG] has left the chat! --
CG: COME BACK HERE YOU INSUFFERABLE ASS OF A HUMAN-BRO.
CG: GOD FUCKING DAMMIT.

His work here is done.

Also, someone is breaking in hello. Dave draws his sword and yanks time to a stop, just as the door swings outward and someone scowls in at them.

He stops, blinking, because despite constant exposure to the Badass Quandary and more recent sightings of the WV, the sight of a carapacian is still arresting in its alienness.

At this point, Dave is starting to wonder if he just attracts the damn things. Maybe it's pheromones. Maybe he's inherited some kind of gross scent markers from the Lalonde side of the family, because Doc Lalonde had had two Prospitian dames at her lab, too.

However, there's no way this guy is anything but trouble. WV seems to be some kind of adorable anomaly, because this carapacian is dressed in an oversized grey sweater emblazoned with a black spade, and he still scares the fuck out of Dave.

SS: There yah wet blankets are. Thought I'd hafta do a number on this joint before I found you.
SS: Now hightail it outta here afore I introduce you to the business end of a specibus.

At least, Dave thinks, he's got someone to sign at. And this guy's not in a suit and there's a surprising lack of an alarm being raised, so he can only assume that this is another member of Team Break Into the Enemy Base With No Plan. 'Sorry mister, but as awesome as that sounds, I'm still down a lady friend. Can't just ditch her, not when there's explosions going on downstairs,' he signs.

The carapacian itches at his ribs through the sweater, snarling with all his teeth bared. It's a lot of teeth. Dave keeps each hand on a sword whenever he doesn't need it to sign. He eases to his feet and steps between the guy and John.

SS: Oh for fuck's sake, the Witch is already neck deep in it?

SS: And I owe the robot a favor too. Horsefeathers.

SS: Look, just get outta my way and let me handle this. You're already down an Heir. And here I thought Karkat Dumbass was a shitty Knight.

Whoa. Okay, they need to call an emergency halt to this one-alien rant parade, because Dave is missing some steps, here. 'You know Karkat?' he signs, trying to picture this shabby, spindly alien with the calluses and scars of a perpetual bladekind user being related in any way to one Karkat Vantas. Maybe a hero thing?

SS: Know 'im? I just came from giving the kid a piece a my mind.

SS: Who knows, maybe he'll pull his shit together now.

SS: But probably not. He hasn't managed it yet.

SS: Just ask him about Spades Slick. Me 'n him, we got an understanding.

'Hang on,' Dave replies, tugging out his phone. The carapacian is still standing in the open doorway, which is bad news if any of the Crew show up again, but Dave needs to confirm this.

-- turntechGodhead [TG] has entered the chat! --
TG: yo bro are you familiar with one dodgy dersite going by the name of slick
TG: bc hes claiming youre his prior reference
CG: WHAT, IS HE THERE WITH YOU?
CG: THAT'S NOT POSSIBLE, THAT DICK LITERALLY ONLY LEFT THIS HOUSE TWENTY MINUTES AGO. THERE'S NO WAY HE COULD BE IN THE MIDDLE OF DOWNTOWN SEATTLE ALREADY. THAT IS PHYSICALLY IMPOSSIBLE.

'How'd you get here from the Egbert house?' Dave asks. 'Quick, before Karkat has a mental breakdown over this.'

SS: Cop car at ninety miles an hour.

SS: I've been pinching cars from the coppers since Japan, yah punk. Fastest way from one point to another.

SS: People respect the chassis.

…Oh yeah. This guy is definitely more the BQ's type than WV's. Dave mentally revises his first impression of the carapacian.
Because this guy is insane.

TG: stole a cop car and pulled some fast and furious shit apparently TG: dude where did you even find this guy hes a real piece of work
CG: HE FOUND ME. DID YOU NOT READ THE ENTIRE DISSERTATION I HAD TO GIVE JOHN ON THE FUCKED UP WAY THAT ASSHOLE BROKE INTO THE EGBERT HOUSE?
TG: nope
TG: give me sparknotes
CG: FUCK. FINE. HE BROKE IN AND MADE SOME PACT WITH ME AND NOW I THINK HE MIGHT HAVE BLOOD POWERS. BUT HE'S IN THE ANTI-DROOG CAMP SO WE TOLERATE HIS STABHAPPY ASS. FOR NOW.
CG: PLEASE MAKE SOME EFFORT TO KEEP HIM AWAY FROM JOHN BECAUSE THIS GUY IS FUCKING INSANE AND IF HE HURTS JOHN ON YOUR WATCH I WILL FEED YOU YOUR OWN DICK.
CG: THROUGH A STRAW.
CG: 'BRO.'
TG: duly noted
-- turntechGodhead [TG] has left the chat! --

Welp, chalk that one up for the record.

_Everyone around him is insane._

SS: Oh thank fuck, yah haven't actually managed to off your Heir.

SS: I gotta level with yah, kid, I was really starting to wonder if I picked the wrong sap to back in this massive turf war.

'What are you - okay no, no touching John,' Dave signs hastily, looking up from his phone and tensing.

But Spades is still scowling and hunched over in the doorway, barely sparing a glare for Dave. He hasn't moved.

John has.

"Blurghlrgrlg!" John mumbles incoherently, one eye blinking open a little before the other. Gore from his nose paints a drying rust-red stain down the front of his mask, and his eyes are still unfocused, but at least he's talking. He shifts a little against the shelf, grimacing as he sits upright. "Dave?"

'Oh thank fuck,' Dave signs, and then backpedals to pull out his phone. Dammit. Five minutes of freedom, and now back to the old grind.

TG: you passed out man
TG: also karkat sent us some knife happy backup
TG: when you said shit was confusing
TG: i think you were severely understating how confusing said shit happened to be TG: because SHIT eb i have no idea whats going on anymore

"Did I faint again?" is all John says, rubbing blood from his nose off onto the palm of his glove. He makes a face at it, looks at Dave uncertainly, and only then, with a flinch, seems to remember that he needs to be looking at the phone for this part. Dave also belatedly realizes he's still using John's phone.

God, they both need to go the fuck to sleep. He tosses John the phone and switches back to his own, never once letting it show on his face just how badly he fucked up the cool gambit in front of Spades.

"Wait. You're the stabbing guy who keeps hurting Karkat?!" John demands at last, shouting a little louder than is smart. Dave cuts a hand curtly in front of his mouth in a silent request that John tone it down, and the kid ducks his head and lowers the volume. "Give me one reason why I shouldn't treat you like any other criminal."

Spades snorts and rolls his eyes, tugging his grubby hat lower over his face.

SS: Because fuck you that's why. The kid needs ta learn to take a jab every once in a while.

SS: The business between me 'n him is none a yours. Now piss off and take this one back to your Knight harem while I round up the Witch for yah.

"Absolutely not!" John starts to get to his feet, lurching back and forth as he does. In the cramped space of the supply closet, this involves Dave nearly taking a flying knee to the temple. He dodges out of the way and the carapacian skitters backward warily while John rests a heavy elbow on a shelf full of cleaning products to lever himself up. Every move looks like it hurts, and Dave rises with him almost unconsciously, his fingers twitching as he sways and tries to judge if John is about to keel over again.

TG: whoa dude
TG: should you even be up and walking
TG: like you were a blood geyser for a second there TG: you need fluids or some shit
TG: maybe
TG: maybe we should do some strategic retreating here
TG: you need to sit your ass down

"We're not going," John says, his face too pale and his voice gaspy as he rubs the side of his head, "without Jade."

…There's no way to argue with that one. Dave feels his face begin to twist into a grimace of resignation, before he smooths that away.

They've already pulled plenty of stupid stunts tonight. What's one more?

The carapacian gags, snorts long and loud, and horks up a throatful of phlegm to spit to one side, looking sour all the while. After a moment, he shakes his head, and turns his back on their supply closet.

SS: Fine.

SS: It's yer funeral, you dumb sons of mothers.

SS: Only one I got an obligation to is the Blood kid, so if yah go and get your fool selves justly killed I ain't bailing you out.

'Wouldn't expect you to,' Dave signs, because it's faster, and if John throws him a look Dave ignores it in favor of staring this carapacian dickbag down from behind his shades. The alien notices the stare and returns it, squinting over his shoulder, before 'hmphing' audibly and scuttling away down the hall.
toward the stairs down.

"Let's get Jade and go," John says. Dave doesn't miss that he's switched back to calling Jade by her name instead of the pretentious hero alias thing. He wonders if John has noticed. The kid is clammy and pale, and Dave doesn't know what it means that he's apparently been fainting all day long on top of all the emotional shit going down.

When he makes an aborted move to grab John around the shoulders and initiate emergency support protocol, however, John moves; the kid starts off after Spades's receding back with a lurching, uncertain gait, and Dave gets nothing but an armful of air.

Dave follows. It is all he can do.

The answer of where the hell all the earth-shaking booms are coming from is obvious when the three of them round the last turn of the third stairwell. Spades slithers down the stairs in a half-fall, half-scurry and hops the bannister at the curve, so he's out of sight for a moment before Dave flashsteps around. John nearly crashes into the wall, he takes the turn so fast, and Dave yanks on the kid's hood to reel him back around so they can blink down at the rubble-strewn hallway before them.

"Oh jeez," John says, scruffing up his hair with a hand. "Jade. Jade, why?"

TG: so the green lightning fire is her

"Yup."

It's literally everywhere. Just. Lightning everywhere. Dave is both impressed and terrified, and he hasn't even met the girl yet.

SS: Space Witches. What a buncha live wires.

"Well, at least we know she's been here - is still here," John corrects himself halfway through. "The wind still says she's in all that mess. Gosh, what the heck would get her this riled up? Does she not realize there's an entire building on top of us?"

TG: probably thinks she can teleport spam her way out

TG: talk about space kid privilege

That's when the first of the Midnight Crew spots them. Dave isn't entirely sure when they gave up on the whole subtle sneaky approach, but it's shot to hell anyway. The Crew member, a troll with bleached and redyed red hair, yells just as another boom rattles the building and the ceiling creaks ominously. "Agh! How did you even find - shit!"

Dave doesn't let her finish the sentence. He's too late to stop her from yelling, but he darts in between one second and the next, meeting her crowbarkind with the guard of his shitty sword before she can do more than raise it. A flick of the wrist and the Crew woman's specibus goes flying to the side. She yanks her hand back and trips away from him, yanking her suit jacket open so hard a button pops off to reach for a spare pistolkind tucked under her arm.

Dave slices once, twice, three times.

Once and the strap holding the pistol to her side snips in two, and the weapon itself falls to the ground with a clatter.
Twice and he's ducked down to slice through her hamstrings.

Three times and he's flipped the hilt of the swordkind around so he smacks the side of her temple with the other end of the sword.

She falls without another word.

Hell yeah.

SS: Okay.

SS: I revise my earlier statement.

SS: You are hereby designated 'Semi-competent Henchman.' Bask in your new rank on the echeladder, kid.

The carapacian skitters down the last of the steps and seizes the Crew member's discarded crowbar, weighing it in his hands and smacking it against his palm with a sharp nod. Then, without another word, Spades leaps over a pile of collapsed wall and sprints down the hallway to start viciously whacking the next troll in a black suit to cross his path.

Well, at least he's good for mindless violence. Dave just wants John and Jade out of here yesterday, so anything that helps take care of the Crew for him is fucking keen in his book.

So when John claps him on the shoulder and nods, plucking at his blood-stained mask one last time, Dave nods back, and they leap into the mess of Crew members that have flooded the hall in an effort to deal with Jade's crazy explosion free-for-all.

He darts and weaves through the chaos, taking advantage of the confusion that Jade's surprise boom party has unleashed in the ranks. No wonder no one seemed to notice John and Dave landing on the roof; if she's been raising this much hell, the Crew's probably been more concerned with containing her than dealing with two dumb shits wandering around with their heads up their asses. Some Crew are running away from the source of the crashes at the far end of the hall, while others are sprinting toward it, but no one seems to know what their orders are concerning the two heroes and a rogue carapacian when they are suddenly confronted by one of the three. "Where are they even coming from?!” one man shrieks as his tire iron is slammed out of his hand.

The looks of horror and rage and mingled surprise and desperation on some of their faces is almost too much for Dave's brain to process, until they just end up a sea of blurred faces while his eyes sting and burn. With every burst of green space stuff that shatters the overhead lights and crackles along the walls, his eyes hurt more, and he gives up, sliding his shades on again between one slash and the next.

There is a brief minute-long span where there are two Daves fighting at once - current-Dave finds one of his strikes backed up by an extra jab from a copy of his own weapon, and the future one just smirks at him, slicing a greenblood's whipkind in two just as Dave chokes on pain and flings himself back a minute in time to catch up with himself. He rolls with it without thinking through the implications, just letting the loops handle themselves.

And all the time he keeps John in the corner of his eye, watching for any stumble or stutter in the other hero's pace as the Heir sweeps the feet out from under his opponents with the wind. He seems to be fighting fine - at one point he punches a guy so hard the troll nearly ploughs through a wall - but Dave can't forget that not five minutes ago John was down for the count. He needs to keep this kid safe.
He thinks that, just as they reach the middle of the hall and bright light burns right through his shades and momentarily blinds him. The shockwave of the latest boom catches him off guard and flings him backwards before a wall oh so kindly interrupts the impromptu flight. His ears ring and he lets out a choked, soundless yelp as he fumbles the landing. He lands hard on the hip on the same side as his patched up stab wound. The injury, which had been nothing more than a blissful burn during the haze of battle, flares screaming back to life. His internal metronome, which has been ticking off every beat of a very successful strife combo streak, cuts off as something hard and round in his pocket cracks hard against his hip bone and then, abruptly, pops out of his pocket and shoots across the floor.

Dave blinks his eyes furiously, one arm of his sunglasses hanging off his ear, and squints at whatever the hell he just dropped.

His stomach flips like a pancake on a hot griddle.

Because it's the cue ball. It rolls to a stop eventually, even as Dave watches in fascinated horror at the arc it takes before coming to a halt. He crawls after it, only getting his feet under him for a moment before the pain sends him to his knees again, but years of training at least keep him moving until he closes a hand over the wayward cue ball.

But you see.

The thing is.

"Dave!" John yells. "Are you okay?!" Dave snaps out of the moment of frozen confusion at the note of alarm in John's voice as a jolt of fresh adrenalin shocks his system. This time, when he drags himself up on the wall, shoving the cue ball into his pocket, his heart is pounding hard enough that he can ignore the stab wound again. All he can hope is that the stitches won't pop from all this.

John is at his side a moment later, and the wind whirling around him is almost visible now, heavy with dust and micro-fragments of broken walls and ceiling tiles. He looks like some insane air dervish, his hood off and his hair in total disarray, and with an earnest, maniacal blue-eyed expression he hands Dave a broken sword blade that he doesn't remember flying off the hilt of his now shattered blade. "You dropped this," he says.

Which is fucking sweet of him, but seriously, what the fuck good would the sharp pointy end of the broken sword do Dave? God, even now this kid is a complete doofus.

They don't have time for Dave to reassure him anyway. Not now that the points do matter. So Dave just flings the hilt of his sword at the short woman who charges at them from behind John's back, just because he's not sure if John notices her coming. John proves that impression wrong a moment later, when the woman dodges the tossed chunk of metal and walks right into a conveniently levitated chunk of masonry. She topples over backwards, and Dave has no choice but to hold up his hand for an obligatory high five. John obliges, a brief, wild grin on his face.

Their mutual awesomeness thus noted for the record, Dave draws a new sword and they spin to face the end of the hall again.

And then Jade Harley punches through the wall.

It feels like someone's taken a bass guitar and smashed it over her head.
Her brain aches something fierce, and when Jade rolls over, cheek scraping over cold metal, she reaches out automatically for her sylladex. She has to have picked up some kind of headache medication along the way, right?

Her hand finds nothing but air, and that's when she realizes that she's in serious trouble.

She closes that hand into a fist, and lets a groan escape her as she gropes around with the other hand, feeling for the pocket dimension that she has always been able to sense at her fingertips. She eases one eye open and braves the really bright overhead lights to chance a look around.

Everything is swirly for a couple of seconds, and then she realizes her goggles are missing, leaving only her plain old glasses that she wears underneath. She blinks and the bars and roof of the cage slides into focus.

Oh right. The cage. Jade flops back on her side, pouting, because she can't believe she feel for something so stupidly obvious as a distraction! She should have known Diamonds Droog would be too smart to get caught monologuing. And now she can't feel anything around her: everything has gone too still, like the whole world's frozen in place and the only thing Jade can feel moving is herself.

All of her constant sense of the space around her - gone. Just like that.

She squints at the cage bars, and reluctantly admits that the science that would have gone into creating something that would just shut down her powers like this must have been unbelievably cool. Is it an inherent property of the metal of the cage, like some kind of kryptonite, or perhaps an energy current being conducted through the bars? Like, would this same material work on someone like John, whose powers worked through a completely different medium? Or is this just a space thing?

Beyond the cage bars, Jade can make out a bank of computers, some of them quietly beeping, but she's at the wrong angle to be able to read the screens. The room is relatively small, the walls sterile and white, and aside from her and the cage and the computers, there's not much to be seen other than a stack of filing cabinets. A tiny black camera winks from the top right corner of the ceiling, silent and judging as Jade rolls around with a post-sedation headache.

She flops over again and makes a good faith attempt to prop herself up on her elbows, head spinning. She can't tell if she's this dizzy because of the lingering effects of the tranquilizer dart, or because the world has gone flat and two dimensional thanks to the loss of one of the key senses she's always used to orient herself spatially. For instance, she misjudges the distance between her hand and the floor, and slams her palm down, jolting the bones against unforgiving iron. She shakes her head and her hair falls loose over both shoulders, pooling in a wavy lump on the floor under her.

That's when she spies the circle of fluffy white fur curled up off to the side. "Bec!" she says, her mouth full of cotton, and after making the mistake of crying to stand up - ohhhh boy, that hurts her head - she army crawls over to him on her elbows, sinking a hand into the scruff between the wolf's shoulders to seek reassurance.

She doesn't get it. Jade stares, and shakes Bec a little. It doesn't respond. When she shakes it harder, the wolf slumps a little. She can't feel the usual crackle of static electricity or unnatural heat under her hands, and she doesn't think that can be explained just by the loss of her own powers.

Bec isn't moving. Bec isn't even active. She shakes it, horrified, but the analytical part of her mind has already started to piece this whole mess together. Her spacey thing isn't working. Bec is powered by some mix of harmless radioactivity and spatial distortion, though she's never known the exact source of the wolf's power.
Whatever it is that Diamonds Droog slapped together the create this cage, as long as they're in it, Bec is dead. No wonder it hasn't tried to jump her to safety yet. They're both stuck here, in Droog's clutches.

It's not a comforting thought. Jade tugs on Bec's fur one last time, and this time scans the room with a little more urgency.

Because if Bec's not getting her out of here, and she can't access her own powers, she needs another plan. Always have an exit strategy, Grandpa drilled into her. While a lot of Jade's exit strategies rely on her space power - too many of them, if she's honest with herself, a fact that would have made Grandpa veery disappointed in her - she's sure she can figure something out.

If only all of her tools weren't stuck in the sylladex! When she pats down her own body, she realizes that someone has taken off her lab coat and her belt, too, so that all that's left is her galaxy-patterned suit. It makes sense that any weapons or tools she had on her person would have been confiscated the moment Droog caught her, but it's just another thing stacking the odds against Jade. She has any number of soldering tools or minor explosives in her sylladex; all she'd need would be a teeny tiny amount of C4 on one of the bars of the cage and she'd be totally set to bust out of here and wreck some shit.

But she can't reach any of it! Darn it!

Jade folds her arms and rests her back against the bars behind her, looking from Bec to the bars opposite to the computers just out her sight. She can't even see hinges or a door or a lock on any side of the cage; it's painfully minimalistic, and if she recalls how that helicopter dropped in on top of her, it most likely only opens through the roof or the floor, or by some other means she'd need a code or a key to unlock. If she had her powers, she'd be able to feel out a card reader or something like that and destroy it - but if she had her powers, she wouldn't be in this mess!

But...wait…

Jade sits upright, waits for the dizziness to pass, and sucks her lower lip into her mouth as she measures the bars of the cage and the space between them. She wastes a good ten seconds waiting for the exact dimensions of the cage to jump into her head before she remembers that she needs to actually estimate it herself, not just let her sense of space do the work for her. She eyeballs it and thinks that each cylindrical bar has a diameter of an inch and a half; between each bar there's about a four and half - or maybe five? - inch gap. The lack of surety grates on her.

...But she might be able to make it. Maybe. It is entirely possible that she could just sort of…

Jade shrugs. She wouldn't know unless she tried. Patting Bec on the head, she crawls over to the bars nearest the exit and the computers, and pulls herself upright. Her body feels unwieldy and heavy, and the more she thinks about it, the less likely it seems like she can pull this off. To pump herself up, she sticks her foot through the gap in the bars.

Success! Jade grins and wiggles her toes in her shoes, tapping her foot on the ground outside the cage. Excited, she waits before trying to yank her head through, and instead focuses on breathing out, sucking in her belly to angle her hips past the gap. Her butt gets about halfway through, and there's plenty of room for her waist -

When, suddenly, all her wonderful progress stops, and movement sideways becomes impossible. She's got most of her right arm and leg through the gap, and the indignation is immediate. She glances down, nearly beaming her head on the bar in front of her forehead as she tries to figure out what stopped her. She tries to relax some more, and wiggles her free arm and leg to no effect. Her back is right up against the bar behind her, and bar before her presses in close along her iliac crest on the right side, and the whole set up is tight enough that even when she breathes out all the way, so that there's no air left that her diaphragm can force out -

Her chest remains stuck.

"...No way," Jade says. She seizes the bar with a hand and yanks herself to the side, but only succeeds in crushing her ribs even more. Maybe with a little more leverage, or with something slippery like lotion from her inaccessible sylladex, she'd be able to force them through. But there's just no way she can make her chest any flatter.

This is sooo dumb. Incredibly dumb. Stupidly dumb.

She is stuck in this dumb cage...because of boobs.

Jade squeezes back into the cage and falls to her knees, seizing her chest with both hands.

"Noooooooon!" she howls at the ceiling, loudly enough that she kind of misses the door of the room opening.

"Oh, there's no need for that. I'm hardly going to hurt you."

Jade whips around, hair flying, and groans when she sees Diamonds Droog stepping into the room on a pair of heels. The Crew suit member has shed her scarf and coat, and is once again in a sharp black suit and tie. An unfamiliar female troll in a black suit follows at Droog's heels, her head bowed so that Jade can't see the color of her eyes as the troll scribbles away on a notepad.

"That's odd, really," Droog continues, hitching her hip elegantly on the edge of the table that holds the computers, eyeing Jade with a glimmer of that terrifying intelligence in her eyes. "It should have taken much longer to wear off than that. The Scratch promised us at least a few hours -" Droog cuts off, and gives Jade a strange look, one that the mob boss is clearly trying to suppress, with little success. "...Is there...any particular reason you insist on clutching your chest while I'm speaking to you?"

Jade blinks. She looks down at her hands, which are still grabbing her boobs.

Then she looks up. "No. Why?"

Droog stares. The ensuing lull in the conversation quickly becomes awkward, and Jade raises her eyebrows. "...Are you going to stop," the Crew leader says at last, sounding defeated. It's not really a question.

Jade looks down again - and shrugs. "Why?"

Droog sighs heavily. "Is it really possible," she says, pained, "that I am the only person in this entire city with some sense of decorum?"

Jade doesn't really know what that's supposed to mean, but she's starting to get that the dramatic-boob-grabbing thing might be weirding Diamonds out. Maybe because she doesn't have boobs of her own.

But there are entire cultures out in the world where people who have boobs don't even wear anything over them, so Jade has never really understood why stuff like that really bothered people. With trolls there isn't even a real correlation between gender identity and what they have up top - it's all muscle to them. It's just not a thing that really seems significant, except that in some places she would have gotten arrested for some reason if she didn't stay clothed all the time. Back home Bec certainly had no problem with her running around in the buff!

"I still can't believe you'd betray me this way," she mutters as she drops her hands and sits cross-legged with a huff. "Not you," she adds when Droog's eyes twitches. "Anyway, what were you saying? Was it going to be something like, 'Ohohoho! I have decided to set you free, and renounce my life of crime!'?"

Droog is not impressed by Jade's imitation. "No," she says flatly, folding her arms and tapping a single fingernail in a slow beat against the other arm. "Oddly enough, I intend to complete the task that my employer has engaged me for. I would have shipped you off to base already, but I would prefer to have a personal hand in your delivery. I'm certain that, in my absence, any number of things would go wrong with the transfer."

"Ugh! That's no fun!" Jade says, scratching at the back of her head. She still feels achy and heavy, and she misses the ability to float something fierce. "Why does your employer even want me so bad? He sounds like a real creep!"

She can only guess it has something to do with the fact that the Midnight Crew's boss wants to start the end of the world and everything. But that still leaves so many unanswered questions, things Grandpa either didn't know before he left or chose to keep from her for whatever reason - why the mysterious Doc Scratch wouldn't just kill the four of them right off so they couldn't interfere with his plans, why he could never find her out on the island, why he'd try so hard to nab Jade and Dave and not Rose or John so consistently.

And Jade doesn't like the not knowing.

"That is hardly something that I would discuss with a prisoner," Droog says. She waves a hand dismissively, her lip curling. "I'm certainly not going to monologue further."

Jade deflates a little. "Aww. Then why are you even here? What do you want?"

Droog is quiet for a long moment. "Get out," she says, without looking away from Jade's face, which baffles Jade for all of two seconds before the troll straightens up from over her notepad, blinking at Droog with wideset golden eyes before bowing her head and leaving the room. The door shuts behind the troll with a click and Droog waits with her head tilted to one side, as though listening for the Crew member's footsteps as they echo down the corridor.

And then Droog refocuses on Jade, leaning forward with narrowed eyes. "Slick has vanished again," she breathes out, the hostility in her voice so sudden that Jade jerks her head up on reflex, one hand clenching into a fist against the cold floor of the cage. "Into the same void-contaminated area that you did. The same area in which I know the Heir of Breath often vanishes into, which has hidden him from the Boss's sight for so long." Droog snorts. "Not that that would protect him, if we chose to shut him down. No, I care very little about what you heroes do, not when you are so easily managed, but Spades Slick? That, I care about a great deal."

She doesn't mention Hemogoblin, and that makes Jade wonder not just how far this void protection covers John's neighborhood, but how much Karkat even registers in Droog's world. She went out of her way to isolate the troll last night, but Droog seems to have no compunction about separating what her boss wants from what she wants.

Whoever this Spades guy is, it sounds preeetty personal.

"So?" Jade sniffs, rolling her eyes. "Why are you telling me this?"
"I am telling you this because I could, if I wished, make the trip from here to the delivery point...unpleasant. For you," Droog adds, off-handedly, as though Jade really needed that cleared up. "But I have no personal animosity towards you. This is simply a matter of business. Tell me the connection between you heroes and Slick, and perhaps I can bring myself to make your stay here...more or less accommodating." Her smirk is crooked. "It's not an offer I make to many others."

Oh man. Jade can't keep herself from biting her lip, because she's never had much of a poker face. She has no idea who this Spades Slick character might be, but hopefully Droog can't tell that's what is making Jade nervous. She needs to keep this dialog going as long as she can to try and talk Droog into giving away some tidbit of information Jade can use to escape! "Yeah, he's just, you know. Around," she hedges, shrugging. "I mean, when he's not - uh, away."

...Sooooo smooth.

Droog traces the corner of a keyboard with her finger, her expression unreadable apart from that barely repressed hostility. "Oh, do go on," she says, with a voice so flat Jade can't tell if it's sarcastic or not.

Right now, Jade thinks, would be a totally awesome time for her brain to start working again! There has to be something she can use, something that she's seen or heard or read over the past few days that might give some hint as to who Droog is talking about, something that she could use to tempt Droog into making a concession that will give Jade her way out -

Droog exhales sharply, disgusted, and rises to her feet, tucking a hair back up under her hat as she flicks her eyes toward the door, and even though Jade recognizes the tactic for what it is, she can't help stammering and blushing and blurting out - "He's really been giving you the old Trotsky, huh!"

She laughs even more nervously when Droog turns slowly back toward her, and then she just keeps going because what the heck! Why not? Her mouth is running along ahead of her brain, but maybe it's onto something! "Yeah, I mean - Hearts, Diamonds, Clubs, Spades? Did you guys at least hold a show trial for him at least before you kicked the poor guy out of the card suit club? That's just common courtesy! If you're gonna exile someone and chase them around trying to assassinate them afterward, the show trial is key!"

"We -" is as far as Droog gets before the woman clamps her mouth shut, striding forward and almost - almost coming within arm's length. Jade tenses, tries not to lean toward Droog; she can't risk giving the game away. "Just what has he been telling you?" Droog breathes, barely above a whisper.

_I don't even know who we're talking about_, Jade thinks, and she swallows hard. "Not a lot," she says, shrugging, and then leans forward to whisper, quiet enough that hopefully Droog will need to come closer. "He reeeeeeally doesn't like you guys." A safe enough guess. But the rest...well, let's just say Jade's told some whoppers in her time, but this stuff takes the cake! "I mean, why would he, after you ruined the snazzy card metaphor!"

The pause lasts long enough that, for a wild moment, Jade thinks she's actually somehow managed to nail this sucker. And then -

"A load of nonsense, then," Droog mutters, and Jade's heart sinks. Droog's frown has gone speculative, but the Crew boss doesn't come closer to Jade. Instead, the tall woman paces away, one hand in her pocket while the other smoothes the fall of her tie with an almost absent-minded compulsion before reaching up to rub at her lower lip. Then she murmurs something to herself, something that this time _Jade_ can't quite catch, and stands still, facing the other wall.

Then at last Droog repeats, "Nonsense," and she turns to glance at Jade, one eyebrow raised. "What has he offered you? Insider information on the Midnight Crew? I can assure you, he doesn't have it."

Scorn layers her voice, and she smiles cruelly. "We've never had a Spades member."

Jade just stays quiet. It had been a gamble, and for a moment there she'd thought she'd almost had Droog hooked. But no matter how she strains her brain, she can't pick apart reasoning that had caused her to say all those things. The card suit connection seems so obvious, in retrospect, but apparently it's not a thing?

Well, Jade for one is almost personally offended by the fact that the Crew would pass up such an awesome opportunity to complete their naming scheme!

"Loyalty to Slick will get you nowhere fast, girl." Droog must have had enough of Jade's awkward silence. The woman saunters forward half a step, not nearly close enough, and stares until Jade reluctantly meets her eyes. "He's nothing but a coward, a shell without a lick of decency. He's led me quite a few trips for biscuits, but that he'd feed you a line like that only shows that he's desperate -"

"Oh!" Jade exclaims before she can stop herself, clapping both hands over her mouth two seconds after the gasp of realization escapes her. Droog jerks bodily, as though stunned that Jade would be so rude as to interrupt her midsentence.

But she gets it now! The carapacian on the roof, the one who'd stopped Droog from advancing on Hemogoblin until Sharpshooter and Heir got back to pull him out! That's who this is all about? Because the only other shell Jade knows in town is WV, and she highly doubts that a fine upstanding sidekick like the Wonder Vee would have anything to do with a lady like Droog! "But he got away when he was right there on the roof last time?" Jade giggles. "Maybe you're slipping!"

Droog's posture is perfect, but when she cocks her head to the side, hair falling out from beneath her hat, the movement is too slow and deliberate, and the smile that creeps across her face shows too many teeth. "No. I'm really not." She walks toward the door. "Unpleasant it is, then."

Jade doesn't catch on until after Droog shuts the door behind her, leaving Jade alone.

Out in the hallway, Diamonds Droog comes to an abrupt halt mid-step. She looks down at her hands, considering, and then murmurs something to herself again.

When she's observed the results, Diamonds nods, her expression sealed off so that none of it shows in her face.

This requires a change in plans. More than that, she thinks, it requires a change in perspective. She has always prided herself on the ability to get the job done. But knowing what she knows now -

Well. Self-preservation is key to completing the job, after all. Diamonds has never been one of those to sacrifice herself for a cause.

She removes a makeup compact mirror from her pocket, and dabs at her face until it's a perfectly smooth mask, artfully and tastefully done. Marlowe returns a moment later, a quiet presence by her shoulder, and Diamonds snaps the mirror shut, sliding it into the pocket and turning to Marlowe with an assessing gaze. "Yes ma'am?" he says at once, his chin rising a little, as though to bask in her regard.

For once, the unthinking obedience and devotion of her subordinates doesn't reassure Diamonds. It is worrying. Die's work is critical to maintaining the loyalty of a gang of criminal rabble-rousers, according to the Boss, but - Diamonds silences the thought, and thinks instead back to a note in pink, left for her in a carapacian colony an age and a day ago. The inklings of her future course bubble up in her mind, but she can't afford for certain parties to know what she's planning. For her own sake and no one else's, Diamonds ushers them to the back of her mind, and thinks of nothing but the void.

She would never actually carry out such a plan, after all. Planning it would have no impact on the real world if she convinces herself and anyone listening that she'd never follow through.

"Change in plans, Marlowe," she says, and she strides toward the elevator, the one that stops at the basement floors and her suite, and no other floor. Marlowe fawns at her heels, his hands folded behind him as Diamonds swipes her keycard and hits the button for her floor.

And Diamonds chooses.

"Send Crichton to keep an eye on Sharpshooter, and recall the chopper. You and I have business above."

Marlowe stirs with unease, because he is loyal, not stupid. "Ma'am?" he says hesitantly, the closest he's capable of coming to questioning her orders aloud.

Because Crichton is competent at what he does, and no more. He starts rumors, he lies compulsively through his teeth to the media, and he infiltrates legal structures to influence the course of investigations with reckless abandon, confident in the Crew's ability to recall him if he's ever caught. He is a useful tool, capable of feigning sanity when he needs to, but only in those situations for which he is designed to be used. Many in Diamonds's employ are the same way - not all of them can be as useful as Marlowe in as many different situations.

Crichton is no good for guard duty. Crichton is a fanatic; worse, he is a violent fanatic. Not Die's best work, not by a long shot, and Diamonds has always had to maneuver him carefully, so that his usefulness outweighs his insanity.

And yet, Diamonds thinks, he is exactly who she would need in that room with Sharpshooter, if she were to enact that plan.

Not that she would ever do such a thing. No, never.

"Do it," she tells Marlowe, cold enough that the man flinches, and then she thinks of nothing but the void zone around a certain neighborhood in the suburbs of Seattle, and steps into the elevator. "And if you should come across Slick…"

Diamonds flicks her key card at Marlowe, who, to his credit, doesn't fumble the catch. He snatches it out of the air and turns it over. He frowns with barely concealed confusion at the front of the white card, emblazoned with a diamond so pale a pink it barely stands out from the rest of the card.

"Give him my regards," Diamonds finishes, allowing a hint of her smirk to slip loose. When Marlowe sees it, the tension leaves his shoulders, and he nods, tucking the key card into his own pocket as the elevator doors shut between them.

Her phone goes off twice in her pocket as the floors flash by, and Diamonds removes it to handle two conversations at once.

The first is simple.

??: Your base is about to be compromised.
DD: < By?
The Heir and the human Knight. They seek the Witch.

DD: > Mmm. I'll keep that in mind.

DD: < Oh, you're doing fine. There is no need for drastic measures. Your target has been reacting exactly as we could have hoped. Your autonomy has not led you astray. Carry on as you have been.

DD: > However, there is one thing you can tell me.

DD: < What is it?

DD: < You know what.

DD: ...I see. That.

DD: Very well.

Once she receives the reply, Diamonds tucks the answer away in the back of her mind for safe keeping. It's a remarkably ordinary answer, and she can only imagine what she'll be able to find out about it once she has the time. But for now, the answer is enough, and she passes it on to Marlowe with further instructions. She's never encountered this exact scenario before, but she's dealt with worse.

The second is a trial run, one that leaves Diamonds's heart beating so hard that it rattles her to her core.

Droog.

DD: > Boss? Whaddya need?

Oh, merely to provide you with a forewarning. My sources indicate an approximately 60% chance that you will be in the vicinity of a void-blocked zone before the night is done. Your actions tonight for the rest of the night have gone dark.

Once you pass into such a zone, I cannot guarantee the successful outcome of any of your ventures in Seattle. I am merely (mostly) omniscient in matters like these, and I do know that the certainty of your capture of Slick decreases by roughly 30% if you persist in taking a course of action that I cannot foresee. And I know how much his capture would mean to you.

DD: < I see. That is not promising. I cannot think of why I would need to visit such a place at the moment, but I will keep your warning in mind, Doctor.

DD: > Anything else?

Hearts has returned. I'll be sure to pass along the report that you have completed the groundwork for operations in Seattle.

DD: < But I have not -

DD: > ...Thank you, sir.

Never a problem, Droog. Ta for now.

Diamonds closes her phone just as the elevator opens up onto her private rooms. There is a minute tremor in her fingers, and she squeezes her hands into fists until it goes away. She peels off her suit jacket and straightens her tie. In her mind's eye she's watching the pieces fall into place.

Tonight won't end well for the Midnight Crew.

But it may turn out just the way she wants it to.

The only question is, will the boss notice?

The goldblood troll enters the room a few moments after Droog leaves, her wide eyes looking perpetually startled as she goes straight to the bank of computers and starts tapping away. Occasionally she makes notes on her pad of paper, but she never ventures close enough to the cage.
for Jade to grab her.

Sooo frustrating! Jade huffs and drags Bec's limp body closer so she can scratch behind the wolf's ears. Usually it's a comforting action, but the lack of electric green static just makes her feel even more uneasy, so she stops and hugs her knees instead, pouting and pulling weird faces in an attempt to catch the guard's attention.

That works about as well as one would expect it to. But Jade's fresh out of ideas! She supposes she could try to break the cage bars, but she has to wait until she's alone to try that or they might knock her out with a sedative again. Which would kiiinda suck.

So she flops over sideways onto Bec, and crosses her eyes at the goldblood until the door opens again. She bolts upright when the door slams into the wall behind it. The goldblood clearly wasn't expecting the abrupt arrival either, because she flinches before turning back to her work.

Another human man steps in. Jade thinks he looks vaguely familiar, but that might just be because he has a pretty generic face. Maybe if he had facial hair or something it would make him more distinguishable, but right now she just thinks maybe he might have been one of the people on the roof with Droog the other night. He sails right by the other Crew member without even glancing in her direction; he pulls out a chair from the computer desk and sits down in it, watching Jade with distant eyes.

"Uh. Hi!" she says after a few minutes of that, because if someone doesn't say something the staring is about to get really creepy.

"Oh, hello," the man says absently, seemingly more interested in keeping an uncomfortably close eye on her than speaking.

"...What's up?" she tries again. Her hand tugs at Bec's fur absently, and her chest tightens at the lack of response. "Uh. Can I help you?"

"You can remain within your cage. The Lady Droog has asked me to keep guard on you. So. I will." That last part is said with such force that spittle flies from the man's mouth, completely at odds with the placid serenity of his expression. Jade isn't sure he's even really looking at her - he's off in his own little world, one that seems to include him and Droog and no one else.

...Ookay. She got stuck with the weirdo. Jade tries to think about something else.

She wonders if John has noticed she's gone yet. Going off without telling anyone probably hadn't been the smartest idea she's ever had, but she's used to working with only Bec and WV, and those two were usually always with her. But John had been upset and Karkat had been hurt and Jade had thought that tracking down Droog was the least she could do for them after all the trouble she caused by showing up all unannounced.

Now, with WV left behind to cover for her, Jade thinks it could be a while still before they even realize she's not in the house. And she has no idea how they would figure out where to look for her! She's really landed herself in a jam, here, and she's not sure backup is coming!

But pouting won't get her anywhere! She needs take matters into her own hands. Jade rolls her shoulders and lets go of her knees, scooting a little closer to the cage bars. She pretends to over-exaggeratedly glance at the goldblood, and then leans in to whisper at the man. "So, you work for Droog, huh. So what's that like?"
"Wonderful," the man says. There's not even a lick of sarcasm in his voice; he totally means it. It's kind of terrifying, and Jade gives serious consideration to moving away from the bars because she's pretty sure crazy that strong could be contagious, science be damned.

"Can't you be more specific?" She makes a face. "Come on, I'm bored and this cage is dumb! What kind of work do you do that involves kidnapping people and stuff?"

The man snorts. "As though I would give away those kind of secrets to someone like you," he says scornfully. "I'm here to guard you, not entertain you."

"No, come on! Droog isn't here, she wouldn't know. Besides, who am I going to tell? My dead dog?" Jade shakes Bec for emphasis.

"Oh, she would know. And if she didn't, he would," he mutters, and the golden-eyed troll looks up long enough to shudder in sympathy, nodding.

Hmm. Someone else they're afraid of? Jade wonders how much cold hard cash she'd rake in if she bet they were talking about Doc Scratch himself.

"That's not creepy at all. Uh," she tries again, beaming as hard as she can. "You don't mind having to do criminal stuff all the time? I mean, no offence, but your boss is kind of evil!"

"Shut up." The man lurches forward in his seat, his expression hard. "How dare you speak of the Lady that way?"

"Because she is! You're the bad guys!" Jade inches back. "Maybe I should do a general survey, while I'm here! Find out what it is that makes bad guys be bad guys and all that, and why you're so dumb that you'd listen to people with card names instead of regular names. I've never done something like that before!"

The man stands up so fast the chair topples over backwards. "You would insult her name?" he says, and wow, Jade hadn't even realized she'd been ticking him off that bad! This guy's leapt from blank to incensed faster than a bounding jackalope.

If he would just step a little closer…

Jade tenses up, raking her eyes over the man's body and bemoaning her lack of space sense for, like, the five hundredth time in the past ten minutes. Seriously, how do other people walk around not knowing all the time?

By the computers, the goldblood cowers, and then looks annoyed when she realizes the lunge wasn't aimed at her. "Stop badgering the prisoner, Crichton," the troll snaps in a low monotone, before jabbing at the keyboard in front of her. "Do you not have anywhere else to be?"

"This is where the Lady wants me. This is where I stay." Crichton eyes Jade with open animosity - too much animosity, actually. She stares, fascinated and honestly kinda worried, at the thin trickle of spittle that he doesn't seem to notice is still stuck to his chin.

Jade's seen that kind of blind, unseeing anger before, just before a troll named Petran shot her own teammate in the shoulder. But that troll had been totally out of it, angry at both Jade and her own boss, and Jade had sort of assumed it was some symptom of coldblood dementia. It's a lot more common than people like to think about.

But this Crichton guy's not a troll. So maybe the Midnight Crew just likes hiring people with seeerious issues. She'll have to take that into consideration if she does do that whole survey thing.
As scary as this guy is, though, this is good. This is exactly what Jade needs to happen. She thinks she sees knives at his hip, and the outline of a pistolkind holster under his arm, both of which seem like standard gear for Droog's people.

He just needs to come…a little closer…

Jade rolls her eyes, and singsongs, "You like Droooog~! I can so tell, mister! You're busted!"

Crichton's pupils dilate. "Blasphemer," he breathes.

...She's got this one in the bag. She shoots him a pair of finger pistols. "Crichton and Droog, sittin' in a tree! K-I-S-S-I-"

"Don't aggravated him -" is about as far as the goldblood gets before Crichton totally loses his shit.

He slams into the bars of the cage and the entire structure rattles and clangs.

Jade lunges forward to meet him, catching the arm that latches around a bar by the wrist and yanking it towards her. Crichton's off balance, and Jade's still strong, and when she kicks through the gap between the bars, she jams her knee through so hard she can feel her patella crack painfully.

But she also kicks him in the 'nads, and in the end, isn't that all that really matters? His ugly snarl cuts off with a short, pinched-off shriek, and by that time Jade has her other hand through the bars to yank open his suit jacket.

She misses the gun, her fingers flying wild in the gap between his side and his arm, and when she finds out who designed a cage to nullify her powers, she will teleport their dumb butts to the middle of the Sahara. Or maybe the Roof of the World. Somewhere remote, so they can think very, very hard about what Jade has to put up with!

Crichton grunts and starts to jerk his arm back, and Jade wings it, leaning back all the way, planting her foot on the bar, and tugs on that arm with both hands. The cage bars clang even louder as his skull crashes against them, and the man's head lolls, eyes blinking unseeingly as he sinks to his knees.

Jade's heart pounds, and she's horribly aware that she's not aware of exactly where the goldblood is at this moment, has no idea whether the troll might have fled in the first crucial moments of the struggle. If that is the case, Jade's plan needs to be reworked again, and her head spins as she flips open the thumb break snap to draw the pistolkind. "Don't move!" she shouts even before she looks up, keeping a grip on Crichton's arm as she looks up through the curtain of her hair to see where the troll has gone. She has to squint to see through her own hair, and blowing air through her mouth to try and move it does absolutely nothing. Chalk up another inconvenience for this dumb cage!

The goldblood is still in the room. She's dropped the notepad and made a break for the door, but at Jade's shout she freezes, one claw on the doorknob. Jade swallows hard, and clicks back the safety deliberately, so the sound is very obvious. The troll's back stiffens. "They don't call me Sharpshooter for nothing, you know!" Jade says, her voice more unsteady than she'd like. She has no idea how deeply ingrained her sense of space is in her marksmanship; Grandpa had done his best to make sure she knew all the bases, and that she never relied too much on her targeting scopes and her glasses on the firing range or the obstacle courses, but she's off-balance enough that she wouldn't trust herself to hit a skeet in an empty field.

Thankfully, the troll's claws slowly rise up in the air, away from the door handle, and Jade breathes out shakily, adjusting her hold on Crichton so that she can give him a good smack again if he pulls himself together. "Now," she says, rolling the shoulder of the arm holding the pistolkind, "you know how all those computers work. You're in charge of monitoring the cage."

The goldblood turns ever so slightly so she presents a smaller target, her wide eyes burning as she stares back at Jade. "Dn't tell her 'nything," Crichton mumbles, and Jade yanks him up against the bars again so he falls over sideways. There's a thing trickle of blood running from a cut across his forehead, and the whole area is gonna bruise something fierce, but she's watching her strength. He'll be fine, if she doesn't have to keep scrambling his brains like eggs!

"Just let me out," Jade coaxes, trying for her most friendly, chipper smile. "I won't hurt anyone. I just want to leave! Pinky promise!"

The troll hesitates.

Jade feels a tremor shake her raised arm, jittering from having to hold her hand steady and keep the pistol locked on the troll's kneecap. She hasn't had to deal with shakes for...a while. She blames the unique circumstances of this particular standoff for the jitters. Hopefully, they're small enough that the goldblood won't notice while she's debating whether to listen to Jade or not.

Gosh, Jade hasn't kneecapped someone with a real bullet since...Budapest? Gosh, that was a while ago. She really hopes she doesn't have to use this stupid gun for real. If she can just get out of this cage and reach her sylladex...

"...Let me reach the computer?" the goldblood says at last, closing her luminescent eyes with an expression close to pain. A tiny trickle of blood leaks from her left nostril, but Jade has no idea what could be causing it.

"Just don't try to set off an alarm, or any other funny business!" Jade warns. "If this thing opening up isn't the first thing that happens -"

"I understand," she cuts Jade off, edging toward the computers. Jade tracks the Crew member as she leans over the keyboards on the desk; her gaze is momentarily drawn to the tiny droplets of yellow blood that dribble down the troll's upper lip and fall off onto the desk, before she snaps out of it and aims at the near knee again. One of her eyes is starting to spasm from the sustained focus, but she thinks it's just stress.

"Y'can't do this," Crichton slurs all the while, his eyes still unfocused as he gropes uselessly at the air in the goldblood's direction. "Pissblood, how dare you...how dare you..."

"We're not all fanatics, Crichton," the troll snaps, her head jerking up at the slur, and Jade doesn't think she imagines the troll stabbing at the keyboard with an extra flourish of her wrists. She suspects Crichton might actually be helping her case here just by being his obnoxious self. "Survive to fight another day." The goldblood pauses again, her eyes catching Jade's before skittering away again. "The Lady would approve such a course of action."

Her thin lips curl as she taps the enter key, and the cage begins to rattle around Jade. "Besides, who here lost his specibus to a prisoner, again?" the troll sniffs, stepping back from the computer. "First you're captured, and now this? I won't be the one punished for today."

"Yes, you - ugh!" Crichton says, and whoa, he's waaaay too awake!

But then the floor starts to retract under Jade's feet, the metal of the cage pulling back to reveal the same smooth concrete of the rest of the room. At the same time, the bars of the cage twist in on themselves and rise, so that Jade has to let go of the man's collar and scramble back toward Bec. She tosses the wolf out first - because if all else fails, she just wants her best friend to wake up! - and then she executes a flawless youth roll right the heck out of the cage.

Bec twitches, and starts crackling with green, but doesn't sit up. Jade kneels beside the wolf and feels a tiny spark go off in her brain. It's a lot to take in, after all that flatness, but she welcomes the sensory input. "Thank you!" she tells the goldblood sincerely.

"Just get out," the troll spits, sullen, and Jade sees that she's eyeing the pistolkind that's loose in Jade's hand. Oops! Jade capitulates that thing, because there's no need to leave a live specibus lying around for the Crew to mess with, and then heaves Bec up under her arm so the poor thing can reboot while they abscond. She switches her focus out into the hall as she steps toward the door, but she also keeps her eyes on the two Crew members in the room with her. Better safe than sorry!

"No hard feelings! Tell Droog I said bye, though!" she says, and then she turns the doorknob.

Three things happen at once.

Bec spasms under Jade's arm, and she fumbles her grip on the wolf's dense body.

In the split second she takes her eyes away from the Crew members, the goldblooded troll dives for the computer, probably to set off the alarm. Which would kinda suck. A lot.

But even before Jade can shout and raise a hand to snatch the computer out of the way, the situation skedaddles right off the tracks and runs itself over the edge of a cliff, as Crichton stands and stabs the goldblood in the back.

"You shouldn't have done that." The man's eyes glitter like beetle shells as he yanks his bladekind out of the other Crew member's back. The goldblood slumps forward over the desk, looking faintly surprised. "You shouldn't have betrayed the Lady like that."

And - Jade drops Bec.

Jade doesn't really remember punching through the wall.

She's more focused on punching Crichton. The wall was just sort of in the way.

"WE!"

The explosions might be her, might be Bec's start up sequence. Either way, it sets off a flurry of motion from every Crew member in the building, and it's too much for Jade's brain to handle. That's all getting shoved to the back of her mind so she can plant a flying side kick in the middle of Crichton's face.

"DO NOT!"

A row of lights shatters overhead, and Jade waves off the shower of broken plastic shards so she can seize Crichton by the shirt and haul him off the ground.

"KILL PEOPLE!"

She punches him through another wall, into a room filled with stacks of crates. The whole building rocks and shakes over head with the force of the power rumbling through the air, and Jade can't tell if it's her, Bec, or both of them at the same time.
Either way, their space powers are tearing this place apart. She thinks about that promise she made, to just leave without hurting anyone.

Well, so much for that plan! She's gonna deliver every single Crew member in this place to the police, even if she has to teleport them all there by herself!

But first, she's going to introduce Crichton to her fists of righteous fury a few more times. Never let it be said that the extra fistkind specibus isn't worth it. Because it is sooo worth it.

"WAAAAAAAGH!" she shrieks, flinging Crichton back out into the hallway, and then punching through the last of the wall herself, her hair crackling around her head with green static.

"Jade!"

She blinks, and looks to her left.

John waves at her frantically from behind a chunk of wall. "Jaaaaade!" he hisses. His distraught frown would make Karkat proud. "Oh my god, what the heck is even going on down here?!"

"Oh, I got kidnapped!" she says, shrugging. She pokes Crichton's curled up body with a toe, and the man groans. "And this guy just stabbed someone while I was making my grand escape. So."

"You were kidnapped," John repeats flatly, floating out from behind the rubble. The hall is full of unconscious people in black suits, so Jade can only assume John was pretty busy!

"Uh, yeah? Didn't you come to help me wreck their shit?" Jade asks, gesturing at the Midnight Crew with a vague wave of her hand, before placing both fists on her hips.

"We didn't even know you were gone for almost an hour!" John yells, throwing up his hands. The wind picks up a little, but if he thinks throwing a little hissy fit will impress her, he has a lot to learn about being a little brother! "We thought you were investigating the Crew on your own! Did they hurt you?"

"Psssh, naw." Jade rolls her eyes. "I was investigating for a while! I totally was! They knocked me unconscious for a while, and they have this really dumb cage thing but - that's not the point! Are you going to help me lug these dummies to the police station, or should I just wait until Bec is up and running again?"

"You were kidnapped!"

John seems to be stuck on that. Someone shifts behind him, and Jade decides that's more important at the moment, because if John's about to freak out over nothing, that's totally Karkat's division, not hers.

But the person behind John is not in a black suit.

He is familiar, though!

"Dave!" Jade screams with delight, clapping her hands together, and then she teleports right over to grab him in a headlock. She hooks her other arm around John's neck and drags him into the group hug too, squeezing until the wheezing from Dave's side gets a little distressed and John stops elbowing her in the side like the obnoxious derp he is. "Oh, John, why didn't you tell me Dave was coming to visit! I would never have left!"

"I think you're choking him out," John gasps. "You're choking me out!"
"Oh! Right!" Jade lets go of them and grabs Dave by the shoulders to inspect him with a critical eye, all her anger forgotten in light of this wonderful development. "Aren't you going to say hi, buster?"

Dave's face is all one blank frown that still somehow manages to radiate little 'do not touch' vibes from behind his dumb shades. He pulls out his phone and starts typing.

...Is he ignoring her? Rude!

"Yeah, he says hi back," John says from behind her, and when Jade turns to pout at him, she sees he has his phone out too. What happened to being Mr Professional Hero, and all that uptight nonsense? He catches her meaningful look and wagging eyebrow, and rolls his eyes right back at her. "Dave can't talk. And it was...kind of a last minute visit. No, Dave, she just knows all of us. Because reasons, I guess."

"Oh!" Well, Grandpa had never mentioned that in any of his files! Hmph! Jade folds her arms and tries to look appropriately apologetic. She's failing miserable. "Uh. Well, still! It's really nice to meet you at last!" She has to unfold her arms to scratch the back of her head, and she glances around the hallway to distract herself from the momentary awkwardness as Dave starts furiously typing again.

Oops. She kind of did a number on this place. Her space sense is pinging her with little warnings whenever she reaches for the structural walls that hold up the building that extends up above them. They're in a pretty extensive basement, and it feels like most of the ceiling could fall in on them at any moment. "We should probably leave soon," she says, whistling. Bec doesn't appear immediately, and that's worrying.

"No kidding!" John says, more than a little crazy-eyed as he surveys the remains of the Midnight Crew's base. His mask is all bloody and gross, and Jade's heart sinks a little as she realizes he must have had another weird episode of forgetfulness at some point. "How are we even going to explain this to the police, is my question. Jeez!"

Jade whistles again, and this time Bec appears in a burst of green lightning. It flops over at her feet at once, and she stoops to ruffle its hair. "Don't worry, boy. We'll get you something yummy to eat really soon!" she promises, and the wolf whines at her, setting its muzzle on her foot. "You're better with police and stuff than I am, probably," she adds when John looks at her. "I don't usually arrest people or anything like that."

"I guess just call them and report this place. And tell them to bring emergency crews, because who knows how much longer we have until it all collapses." John stows his phone in his pocket. "We need to get to a pay phone. Unless either of you has a disposable one."

"I might!" Jade says. She starts feeling through her sylladex, glad when it actually works. She needs to make up for all this trouble she's caused.

"Oh. Yeah, Dave?" John says as he checks his phone again. He goes pale. "And you said someone got stabbed, Jade?" he says, urgency in his voice as he looks up at Jade, blue eyes wide.

"By that Crichton dickhead, yeah!" Jade thumbs in the direction of the room with the cage - and freezes. "Oh! Hang on, I think she's still moving!"

She'd been so pissed off, she hadn't even thought to check if the goldblood might have actually survived. That's...kind of a big mess up. Oops. Jade bounces over to the room immediately, being sure to give the cage a wide berth as she bends to look under the table holding up the computers. There's a splotch of dark yellow blood slowly drying on the floor beneath her feet as she squats down. The computers themselves are all bluescreened, so she thinks the troll must have deliberately shut them all off before crawling under the desk. A pair of gleaming golden eyes glare at her from the darkness.

Alive. Not dead. That's all that matters.

"Uh. Want me to send you to the hospital?" Jade asks, sheepish.

"Is that a threat?" the troll growls, her horns scraping the underside of the table as she tries and fails to get her feet under her. Jade can't determine the exact scope of the damage Crichton did, but the blood loss alone is probably massive by this point.

"Uh, no? But you don't get a choice either." Jade closes her eyes and pictures a map of Seattle in her head, pinning down the coordinates she wants. She wishes Bec were in any shape to help her aim, particularly with all the wacky stuff her powers have been doing lately, on top of the sedatives and the cage, but she'll have to make do! "I'm sending you right to the emergency room. Good luck explaining this!"

She reaches out, boops the troll on the foot, and pushes until the troll vanishes. Jade's mind follows her through space all the way to the hospital, and then she lets go when all the goldblood's molecules come back together. The last of the green plasma licks over her outline in the shadows under the desk, before subsiding.

It takes more out of her than she likes to admit. Jade sags back in a crouch, feeling sort of dizzy, but then she glances at the open cage beside her and decides she'd rather be sick somewhere else. Like with Dave and John! This is so exciting!

Urp. If she doesn't throw up, anyway. Shaking her head, Jade bounces back to where the two are standing in the hallway. "Okay! We can go call the cops now!" she announces, hooking an arm through John's and grabbing for Dave's. He just pulls out of reach, staring at John's face with an unreadable expression as he types.

...So cool. Jade is kind of intimidated, actually. She wishes she knew what he was typing. Unlike John, Dave is a lot more cold in person. Or maybe that's just the impression she gets because he blocked her on Pesterchum, too.

"Wait, Dave, are you serious?" John yelps, glancing around them. Then he nudges Jade in the side. "Hey, can you tell if there's a carapacian around?"

Jade's mind goes in the obvious direction. "You brought WV?!"

"What? No!" John protests, holding up his hands. "There's another one running around, helping us - uh, kind of, anyway. He was just here, only five minutes ago. Where could he have gone so fast?"

Jade cocks her head to the side. "I can check!" She filters over all the people taking up space around her, trying to distinguish the hollowness of a carapacian shell amid all the troll and human bodies lying unconscious everywhere. But eventually, she has to shake her head. "If he's here, he's moving somewhere above. And my head hurts too much to tell." She rubs her temples, sighing. "Darn it, Diamonds Droog!" So annoying!

"So Droog was here." John shifts warily, as though he expects Droog to pop out of some secret compartment at any moment.

"Still is, I think," Jade corrects, squinting up at the unstable ceiling above so she can take in all of the details of the space around her that she's been missing out on all this time. "Most of this building feels empty, but there's a lot of movement up on one of the upper floors." It feels like at least three people, if not more, but two in particular are causing a ruckus that jars against Jade's headache. "She might be trying to make her escape, too! We need to stop her!"

The thought kindles a flame in her chest. Diamonds Droog just made this whole thing almost as personal Clubs Deuce did by sticking Jade in a cage, and she is all for giving Droog a piece of her mind. And a fist.

"But we've already lost track of Spades. We might want to retreat before the cops show up on their own..." John sighs heavily, glancing down at his phone for Dave's latest message. Whatever he reads makes him give Dave a look that is one hundred percent done. "Ugh! No, Dave, I think we should listen to our guardians. It's really not a good idea to let Droog anywhere near you." Another pause as Dave types. "No, I'm pretty sure we already talked about how foolproof our plans are."

Dave types again, raising an eyebrow.

"No, see, that's an example of a plan that isn't a plan at all, and those don't work either."

Jade exchanges a look with Bec. This would work a lot better if Bec were the kind of guardian animal who noticed when its charge was looking at it significantly. But Bec, alas, is Bec, and all it really does is continue to recharge, a silent, floofy wolf that occasionally throbs with galaxies.

But she thinks she gets the point across. She clearly needs to get her two cents in, or John is going to waffle the rest of the night away. "I vote we go kick some serious tuchus!" she chimes in, punching Dave on the shoulder with a grin. "Come on, John, we need to go avenge me!"

"Uh, Jade, we should probably leave it to the police. Avenging is kind of...not the same as enforcing justice," John says. "Also, do we really need to give Droog another chance at kidnapping either of you?"

Jade grabs John by the jacket so she can glare at him right in the eyes. "John. I need to go avenge our family honor."

In the corner of her eye, she sees Dave facepalm.

"You can either support me...or you can support me! There is no other option! Yeah!" Jade finishes, ignoring Dave's sass. "So let's go kick some ass! Don't make me whup you into shape!"

John’s face makes the most interesting expression beneath his mask and goggles as she makes him stare into her unblinking eyes. It's somewhere between pants-wetting terror and horrified fascination - And when it transitions into grim resignation, Jade just grins, knowing that she's won.

"Argh." John drops his head into his hands, and nods. Dave gives her a thumbs up, a tiny smirk on his mouth, and she returns it.

Oh yes. This is the beginning of a beautiful, beautiful friendship.

And now they can all bond by engaging in that wonderful, vaunted heroic pastime of beating people up.

Spades stabs the guy who hands him Diamonds's business card.
It's just kind of reflex.

CG: JOHN.
CG: WE HAVE A FUCKING SITUATION HERE.
EB: karkat? what's up?
CG: OH NOTHING MUCH, JUST THE USUAL FRESH FUCKERY THAT WE DEAL WITH.
CG: BARELY EVEN WORTH MENTIONING.
CG: SO INSIGNIFICANT IN THE GRAND SCHEME OF THINGS THAT IT WOULD NEED TO BE EXAMINED THROUGH THE LENS OF A MICROSCOPE TO BE SEEN.
CG: I'M SURE THE WONDER TWIN WILL HAVE ONE IN HER UNBEARABLY USEFUL AND YET MOST LIKELY FICTIONAL 'SYLLADEX.'
CG: SO GRAB HER AND GET YOUR DUMB ASS BACK HERE.
CG: SO THAT WE CAN ENGAGE IN THE WONDERFULLY AWKWARD RITUAL OF SHUFFLING AROUND THE MICROSCOPE PRETENDING THAT WE GIVE A SINGLE FUCK ABOUT THE INCOMPREHENSIBLY PALTRY AND TRIVIAL SITUATION THAT JUST WENT DOWN.
CG: I MEAN MY SANITY IS IMPLODING OVER HERE. THIS SITUATION IS JUST THAT PANNUMBINGLY INCONSEQUENTIAL.
CG: IMPLODING, JOHN.
EB: karkat, that was actually a really impressive rant! you sound a lot better! :D
EB: but also that didn't explain anything at all.
CG: LOOK.
CG: WHILE YOU AND SHADES HAVE BEEN OFF ON YOUR INCREDIBLY STUPID OLD WEST REENACTMENT OF A HARLEY-WRANGLING RUMPUS, SOME KNIFE-FETISHIZING NOOKLICKER BROKE INTO YOUR HOUSE AND STARTED SHITTING ALL OVER MY RIGHT TO INFORMED CONSENT.

Doesn't kill the guy, obviously. It would take more than a little jab to off someone. While the man is staggering, Spades turns and jams the card into the slot next to the elevator repeatedly.

Within moments he's reduced to incoherent snarls, ready to tear out the wiring when the scanner fails to respond. He's raising a knife to hack at the scanner when the man tears the card out of his hand, slides it through the scanner rather than stabbing it in, and wearily hands the card back to Spades.

Spades stabs him again.

CG: I AM FUCKING OFFENDED JOHN.
EB: what?!?
EB: someone broke into the house? what the heck, karkat, where’s my dad?!?
CG: FUCK IF I KNOW.
CG: I JUST HOPPED OUT OF THE COON AND BAM.
CG: A SURPRISE STABBER HAS BEEN USHERED BACK INTO MY LIFE BY THE SICK, SICK WILL OF THIS SPITEFUL ASSCRACK OF A UNIVERSE WE CALL HOME. THE WHOLE THING FONDLED MAJOR SEEDFLAP.
CG: WHILE YOUR DAD WAS PRESUMABLY WANDERING AROUND IN HIS OWN LITTLE POCKET OF FOOLISHNESS.

CG: BAKING A CAKE OR SOMETHING.
CG: I AM FAIRLY CERTAIN THAT MAN IS CONTINUOUSLY IN THE PROCESS OF PRODUCING SOME NEW BAKED CONFECTION FOR NO REASON. IT JUST NEVER STOPS. THE MOMENT HE FINISHES ONE PASTRY HE IS COMPelled BY THE LAWS OF PARADOX SPACE TO MAKE ANOTHER ONE.
CG: AN ENDLESS, PREORDAINED TORRENT OF DELECTABLE HUMAN BAKED GOODS.
CG: HE'S JUST LUCKY HIS CREATIONS ARE INARGUABLE ARTIFACTS OF MOUTHWATERINGLY LUSCIOUS SUGARY GOODNESS.
CG: OR I WOULD BE SO PISSED OFF RIGHT NOW JOHN.
CG: SO PISSED OFF.
EB: hehehe.
CG: WHAT.
EB: ah, you're being a mr sour-bulge again.
EB: i actually kind of missed this!
CG: I'LL REPEAT.
CG: WHAT.
EB: you being your usual self instead of being all incoherent and stuff!
EB: or more normally ranty anyway.
EB: does that make sense?
CG: ABSOLUTELY NOT, YOU STUPIDLY ENDEARING FUCKWAD.
CG: NORMAL PEOPLE ARE NOT SUPPOSED TO WAX NOSTALGIC ABOUT ME BEING AN INCURABLE ASSHOLE FUELED BY THE LIMITLESS STREAM OF SECRETIONS OOZING OUT OF MY RAGEGLANDS.

This whole thing is most likely a trap. Diamonds is good at shit like that. Strategy and kidnapping were always her gig.

Spades could care less.

He stands in the middle of the elevator, tapping a foot impatiently as the floors roll by, his shoulders hunched in preparation for whatever fresh hell Diamonds is going to unleash.

EB: yeah, but…
EB: when you get all mad and stuff and really hit your stride it's just kind of adorable!
EB: instead of being reeeally worrying like it was when you were about to pass out from sleep deprivation.
EB: so i'm glad you're feeling better!
CG: …
CG: JESUS HOW CAN YOU EVEN SAY ANY OF THAT WITH A STRAIGHT FACE. HOW CAN YOU BE THAT - CG: NO, FUCK, WE'RE GETTING OFF TOPIC.
EB: oh yeah!
EB: D:
EB: but is the person still there?
EB: go find my dad right away and tell him what's going on!
CG: YEAH, YEAH, I'LL GET RIGHT ON THAT, RIGHT AFTER I FINISH COUGHING UP MY NEWLY RECONSECRATED LUNGS IN THIS FUCKING PANIC ATTACK.
CG: BUT NO, THE STAB-HAPPY FUCKFACE TOOK OFF ALREADY.
CG: AS MUCH AS I WOULD LIKE TO SAY I DROVE HIM OFF LIKE THE INCREDIBLY COMPETENT SPECIMEN OF HEROISM THAT I AM, MOSTLY I JUST KIND OF SAT
HERE LIKE A PATHETIC SACK OF SHIT AND NODDED AT THE APPROPRIATE MOMENTS WHEN HE STARTED RAVING ABOUT SOME NEW AND CONFUSING
BRAND OF STUPIDITY.
EB: but you're okay? you didn't get stabbed or something, right? because you keep mentioning stabs and then not explaining???
CG: OH, SURE, YEAH.
CG: THIS BRINGS THE STABGAUGE TO WHAT, A SOLID THREE-ZERO FOR HIM?
CG: AT THIS FUCKING RATE HE'LL HOLD THE GAMBIT OVER MY HEAD FOR THE REST OF OUR SHORT, MISERABLE ACQUAINTANCESHIP.
EB: karkat.
EB: you've been apparently stabbed three times and you didn't think that would be a thing that should be stated for the record?!
EB: this is me making a face of stern diamondy best friend disapproval: >:(
CG: LOOK STAB WOUNDS DON'T EVEN REGISTER HALF THE TIME THESE DAYS.
CG: IT'S ONE OF THE FEW THINGS ON THIS EARTH THAT I'M CAPABLE OF HEALING IN SECONDS.
CG: I'D HAVE GOTTEN MY RAGESPINCTER IN A KNOT IF WE WERE IN PUBLIC, SURE, BUT THERE'S NO ONE ELSE IN THE HOUSE WHO DOESN'T ALREADY KNOW ABOUT MY HEMOTYPE.
EB: but doesn't it still, y'know, hurt or something? before you heal it?
CG: OF COURSE IT STILL FUCKING HURTS, MUCH TO MY MIGRAINE
COMPOUNDING REGRET. I'M JUST MORE CONCERNED WITH THE FACT THAT HE SOMEHOW STOLE MY POWERS.
EB: whoooa!
EB: for reals?
EB: like now he can use the blood thingy?! :O

The elevator slides open, and Spades steps out.

Diamonds Droog stands in the middle of a pretty damn swanky room, her hands clasped behind her back as she stares out a window at the city beyond. Most of the lights are off, except for one lamp off in the far corner, and déjà vu sucks Spades down for a moment, set off by the sight of Diamonds lurking in the shadows, her head barely tilting in acknowledgement of his presence. Proud and tall and quietly content in her own superiority.

An age and a few universes ago, the scene was eerily similar. Droog was barely recognizable years after the mass exile that left them all scrabbling to build a city in the wreckage of the old world, but he'd still been a Draconian Dignitary, vain but more than powerful enough to justify the vanity. Back on Derse he'd stayed quiet and controlled in his place in the hierarchy, a step below Spades - he ignored Spades while they drank coffee in the break room and discreetly did Spades's paperwork for him whenever Spades got fed up and shoveled it off on him.

But after that shit got blown to the Horrors and back again, Di had gone coldly, viciously crazy.

Happens to the best of shells, but when Dersites do it, they do it in style. On multiple occasions the crazy fuck had torn up the town that Spades was trying to build up with his own blood, shell, and knives. The old Dignitary who tried to curry favor and hoard others' secrets for the sake of leverage, unobtrusively completing the tasks assigned to him, turned out to be on no one's side but his own.
CG: THE MUTANT BLOOD FUCKERY, YEAH. OR AT LEAST PART OF IT.
CG: LIKE THE IMBECILIC, GULLIBLE WRIGGLER THAT I AM, I REPEATED SOME FUCKED UP RITUAL INCANTATION WHEN HE TOLD ME TO.
CG: HE KEPT CALLING THIS WHOLE THING A GAME, AND SINCE I WAS A KNIGHT OF BLOOD HE THOUGHT THIS GAVE HIM PERMISSION TO START MAKING BLOOD OATHS AND SHIT.
CG: AND NOW HE'S HEADED YOUR WAY. THE NUBFUCKING DICKPRINCE HAS APPARENTLY GOT BEEF WITH DIAMONDS DROOG AND HE INTENDS TO GET TO HER FIRST FOR WHATEVER FUCKING REASON.
EB: oh…dang!
EB: a knight of blood huh? like the time thing with dave?
CG: OH SWEET MOTHERGRUB TELL ME YOU'RE NOT ON BOARD WITH THIS SHITHIVE MEDIEVAL METAPHOR TOO.
EB: uh, not really?
EB: dave has just mentioned this alien dame sometimes who really gets on his nerves!
EB: and she calls him a knight a lot, and sometimes rose is a seer and i'm an heir but we never really paid much attention to it!
EB: what with all the more important stuff going on like tentacle-rose and the midnight crew and stuff.
EB: a lot of stuff happens all the time and it's hard to investigate everything, okay?!
CG: GOD, WE HAVE SO MUCH SHARING TO DO, I CAN'T EVEN KEEP UP WITH WHAT YOU KNOW AND WHAT I KNOW AND WHAT YOU KNOW I KNOW AND WHAT I KNOW YOU KNOW AND WHAT WE BOTH MUTUALLY KNOW BUT ONLY AS HEROES AND SO HAVE NO IDEA WHETHER THE OTHER KNOWS WHAT OUR HERO PERSONAS KNOW.
EB: tell me about it! i've been trying not to think about the massive exposition dump we'd need to sort out our mutual dumb. :/
CG: DO WE NEED A CHART.
EB: karkat no we do not need a -
CG: WE NEED A CHART, WE NEED TO KEEP THIS FUCKING ORGANIZED DAMMIT.

So Spades had tracked Di down, to the hideout in an old speakeasy where the carapacian had set up shop.

They'd destroyed most of the rest of the town in the ensuing strife.

Eh. Good times.

And for a while after, Spades'd just barely won Di's loyalty - on an provisional basis, of course, the wary concession of a Dersite just waiting for an opportunity to usurp power for himself. It'd been like having a dragon tangled up around his ankles, ready to trip him without warning while the two of them violently cajoled other exiles into rebuilding civilization. They hadn't even hated each other enough for the dubious reassurance of a rivalry to ensure Diamonds's allegiance; it had just been business between them, pure and simple.

If Clubs hadn't shown up when he had, Spades thinks Diamonds would've taken him for a ride - out into the desert, where the dead still walked, and no one coulda heard him scream. Clubs was a limp rag, but damned if Spades didn't owe him a smoke or three for talking Di down from murdering them all in their beds.
Diamonds shifts a little, and Spades catches sight of the cue stick, barely concealed on the side opposite him. But there are still pleasantries to get through, as annoying as that is. The traditional pre-strife razzing. Spades holds up the pale key card in the meager light, and flicks it at the human, trying to blink the memory of the equally tall carapacian with cold white eyes who once was.

"You ran away with a robot," she says, curling her lip at the card and ignoring it. "I had no idea you were such a piker."

SS: Says you.

"Sure you won't try to run away again? I am a busy woman. If you can't be bothered to make this worth my time, I have other places to be." She spins the cue stick lazily, wandering closer to the window with some unknown intent. "I could leave the rest of the ground work to my people in the field, and escort the Witch back to base, instead of waiting around for you to man up. I've been assured in the most backhanded way that they'll finish the work by tomorrow morning, anyway, regardless of what I do."

SS: Still can't believe you sold out like this. The Di I knew wouldn't have gone quiet.

SS: What dirt does Scratch have on yah? I'm dyin' of curiosity over here.

"Or maybe," Diamonds says, as though he hasn't said a word, "I'll pay a visit to your Hemogoblin, out where he thinks he's hidden himself. I know his face. I'm sure I can work that into my schedule."

The oath is stronger now, an extra coil in his veins that tugs on him like a leash, and Spades had forgotten just how unpleasant it was when the damned thing jabs at him at full strength. A threat to Vantas is a threat to both of them, and right now the kid is downright pathetic.

So he grimaces, mentally telling the oath to shut its yap, and then holds up a knife and crouches, ready to spring. Diamonds turns to face him head on, with that little smirk that means she knows exactly who she has to hurt in order to hurt him. It doesn't matter what she thinks Vantas is to Spades; she's just been prodding him to see if she can use it.

He dives out of the way of the first strike, rolling behind a table, and seizes the first thing he can lay claws on - a lamp. He tears the plug out of the wall and lobbs it at Di's head before she can follow him. Then he darts in close, right as the dame ducks under the flying appliance, and slices off her nice white tie.

Diamonds looks down at the hacked off scrap of fabric and the button that flies off with it, jaw dropping.

SS: You were sayin'?

EB: karkat, we're trying to invade this secret mystery dungeon where jade is wandering around, can this wait?
EB: or at least can you go to my dad first so he can make sure you're okay and not actually bleeding internally?!
CG: DON'T BE STUPID JOHN.
CG: BLOOD. POWERS.
EB: bluhhh! sorry if i'm still not used to thinking about you in terms of blood powers!
EB: i barely know what hemogoblin can do, and my brain is still hurting trying to put the two together!
CG: OKAY SO THAT'S ITEM NUMBER FIVE.
EB: you're making the chart aren't you.
CG: OF COURSE I'M MAKING THE FUCKING CHART.
EB: urrrgh, okay, go downstairs and make the chart in the same room as my dad.
EB: who you will coincidentally be informing about the break-in that just happened.
EB: okay? this is an order courtesy of your best friend/partner!
CG: YEAH, YEAH, FINE.
CG: HEY, BEFORE YOU PISS OFF, CAN I ASK SOMETHING THAT I'VE PROBABLY ASKED BEFORE BUT FUCK IT, THAT WAS BACK WHEN NEITHER OF US WERE APPARENTLY COMMUNICATING SHIT.
EB: uh - really quick, hurry!

Diamonds flips from zero to insane war machine in two seconds. She has a unique talent for that, a talent that Spades has never appreciated having turned against him, except for the fact that it's what always made Di so much more interesting to fight than the rest of the assholes they went up against.

She spins and the cue stick is less than a blur, too fast for him to see, but if it hits him, it can split his shell open like an egg. So this time Spades drops to the floor and scuttles away. He grabs the table itself next, drags himself upright, and kicks the table up off its legs with the toe of his foot, just in time for Diamonds to whip her specibus against the wood with a sharp, splintering crack.

The table snaps in two, and Spades kicks the splintered bottom half at Di's heels. She steps over it without missing a beat, still swinging. Spades slices at her not with a knife but with claws, raking at her sleeve with his free hand while the bladekind angles in for her ribs.

He pays for it when Diamonds laughs, vicious and cruel, and flips the cuskind in her hand so she can stab it back at his head. The blow lands true; pain shoots through his skull, his hat falls to the ground, and Spades curses wildly as the jolt makes his blade hits Diamonds all wrong - it skims over her side and slices through flesh but doesn't dig deep, and then he has to skedaddle out of there before Di can press her advantage.

They circle each other, both unblinking. By unspoken accord, there is a breath where Spades stoops to retrieve his hat and settle it back on his head, scratching at his own head injury to see how bad the damage is; Diamonds sheds her torn suit jacket in one smooth motion, her face contorted in a scowl filled with distaste at the panel of fabric that hangs loose by a few meager, frayed threads.

Then she's tossing the ruined jacket at Spades's face, a move so unexpected that the jacket smacks him in the face and blinds him for a few critical moments. She's no doubt lunging for him wordlessly, and he dodges blindly out of the way again when the whistle of the cue stick slicing through the air alerts him to her position. He rolls and comes up next to the couch. He tears a cushion off the thing and whips it through the air at Diamonds's right eye as another distraction.

This one, she doesn't dodge in time; either she's too lost in her rage to react in time, or perhaps she just doesn't consider a couch cushion enough of a threat to turn her onslaught aside. The cushion impacts on her right shoulder.

Bingo.

Spades snaps his fingers, and the blood from his head wound, smeared all over the fabric of the cushion, jabs out in tiny spikes, tearing through Di's waistcoat to the skin beneath. It's not enough to really cut her, but the woman yelps, startled, and loses precious time ripping the clinging cushion out of her flesh, her eyes crazed and angrily bewildered as she stares at the blood soaking into her shredded shirt.

See, that's the thing. This Diamonds Droog knows him only as an enemy, a target, while Spades remembers her habits, her tricks, her weaknesses. The badly healed break in the Dignitary's shoulder blade from an encounter with the Queen at a quarterly earnings report gone south. The way she likes to feint for an opponent's head and then stab for the soft squishy parts. The slight hesitation that plagues her when she's forced to defend on her right side, the side that Clubs usually covers when they're together.

Not everything carried over to this new human body of hers. But it's still Di.

And he's still Spades.

And she's never beaten him yet.

CG: I'VE BEEN HAVING ALL THESE FUCKED UP DREAMS, BUT IF I'M NOT JUST GOING COMPLETELY BATSHIT INSANE, I THINK THERE'S ACTUALLY A PATTERN IN THEM. SOMETHING I'M NOT SUPPOSED TO BE THINKING ABOUT THAT KEEPS POPPING UP AGAIN AND AGAIN, LIKE A DEMENTED ROBOTIC BUNNY RABBIT ON A SUGAR BENDER.
CG: YOU DIE, AND LATELY HARLEY AND THE ASSHAT HAVE BEEN SHOWING UP IN STARRING ROLES, TOO, AND IT'S ALL MORBID AS FUCK.
CG: THERE'S A GOLDEN PLANET IN THE SKY BUT THE MOON HAS CRASHED BECAUSE OF SOME HELLBEAST RUNNING AROUND BLOWING SHIT UP, AND EVERYONE IS ON A BATTLEFIELD THAT I'M NOT ALLOWED TO LOOK AT BECAUSE FUCK MY SHITTY THINKPAN, AND YOU JUST KEEP DYING.
CG: OVER AND OVER AND -
CG: LOOK. JUST. I KNOW THIS IS CRAZY. BUT DOES ANY OF THAT SOUND FAMILIAR TO YOU?
CG: JOHN?
CG: ...JOHN?

John is missing time.

And this time, for some reason, he can't just ignore it. He's vaguely, uneasily aware of other gaps from over the course of the past few days, of things that his dad and Jade have mentioned that he's not allowed to think about. But he'd been able to smooth all those incidents over and skim over the conversations in his memory so that everything is seamless.

But now there's a sharp, jutting gap in his mind, even more jarring than all the usual crud he keeps locked up in the back of his head. There's blood all down his face, and Dave presses in close, a silent presence glued to his side, like he's afraid John could keel over again any second now.
Something is wrong, and he wants Karkat to be here so badly it's like a physical ache.

So that's what's on his mind when Jade grabs him and Dave by the wrists and whistles for Bec to follow. As opposed to, you know, important stuff! Like focusing on the fact that they're about to teleport -

"Shit!" someone yells.

- right into the middle of a an ongoing skirmish. Jade lets out a "Whoooa!" and then bounces them out of the way of a flying bladekind. Dave slams into the wall on Jade's other side, tripping over nothing, and John catches himself an inch above the ground. He thinks Jade might not be feeling as well as she's trying to pretend she is, because that was a pretty shitty landing…

SS: Oh, for fuck's sake!

The room's clearly been turned upside down in the struggle. Every single piece of furniture has been overturned or gutted, one of the windows has a chair-sized hole punched through it, and the overhead fan hangs limply from the ceiling by a single cord. Diamonds Droog is closer to them, breathing hard enough that John can feel her lungs heaving from here, and she whirls to glower at them with unchecked frustration. That Spades Slick dude is across the room, crawling out of the wreck of a closet full of black suits. The carapacian is frozen in the act of stamping on a particularly nice hat, and John wonders if they were even really fighting, or if Slick was just trying to torment Droog by acting incredibly petty.

Either way. "It's over, Droog!" he calls, trying to reassert some kind of control over the situation, and trying really hard not to feel the panic that bubbles up when he realizes that they're in the same room with the woman who has tried to kidnap Dave - who apparently succeeded in kidnapping Jade while no one was paying attention - and beat the living hell out of Karkat.

It would be easy to be genuinely afraid of Diamonds Droog. At least Hearts Boxcars had been somewhat sane. A mob boss who favored machine guns and bombs, yeah, but not a mob boss who was devastatingly intelligent about achieving her own inscrutable ends.

His phone buzzes in his pocket, but he doesn't dare check what Dave is trying to say, which earns him a poke on the arm. Beside him, Jade puffs up - literally. Green light crackles around her and makes her hair float up like a crackling net of static-riddled curls. "Sorry about your basement!" she says, folding her arms. "But also, I'm not really sorry. At all."

"So we can do this the easy way or the hard way," John adds. He starts drawing in the wind around him, feeling for the influx of air that streams in through the hole in the window, just in case Droog decides to get stubborn.

Spades Slick facepalms.

SS: Incredible. I give you three idiots every chance in the book to fuck off, and yah still end up flinging yourselves in the middle of this shit.

SS: Fucking heroes.

Diamonds Droog doesn't even look surprised to see any of them. And that's...pretty creepy! Instead of being shocked or intimidated by the fact that it's now four against one, the woman throws back her head and barks out a harsh laugh, cracking her neck as she levels a crooked smile at them. "Oh? Is this the part where you inform me that all of my base belongs to you?"

SS: No, I will not translate for you. Do I look like some kinda messenger boy to yah, punk?
The carapacian seems to be snapping at Dave, whose hands are a flurry of sign language. John recognizes a middle finger that gets thrown up after the carapacian's answer, and that's about it.

"Well, it totally does!" Jade insists. "And you'll be pretty sorry if you try to pull any funny business like you did last time! I'm watching for snipers, now!"

...Snipers.

John doesn't want to know.

No, really! He is not curious about that! At all!

"Snipers?!" he demands.

"Just the one," Jade says distractedly, like that somehow makes it any better.

SS: Will you stop yapping if I translate this one?

SS: Then no. Stop that. Your bland fleshling sign language is giving me a damn migraine.

Another middle finger from Dave.

"And you're so proud of yourself, aren't you?" Droog says to Jade, smiling until Jade's confident buzz wilts a little. She shakes her head, tapping a thumb against the end of the cue stick as she leans on it at an angle, one hip resting on an overturned desk, her body language completely relaxed. "If you couldn't escape from someone like Crichton, I would have been severely underwhelmed."

Droog isn't worried at all.

So John takes the initiative. He reaches out with a hand and - Heir Heir Heir not John crap - twists his wrist, yanking the air in a tight curl. The wind obliges by knocking Droog's cue stick right out from under her, and John - Heir -makes the executive decision to send the specibus flying right out the window, where he wouldn't have to worry about it lying around in the room for Droog to try and snatch back. The Crew member's expression flattens out, but she barely looks startled, more disgruntled than anything as she raises the hand that was holding the cuekind to quirk an eyebrow at it. "Better," she says, sounding approving as she lifts her eyes to smirk at John. "Now you're thinking."

"Are we not gonna beat her up?" Jade whispers, drawing her hair back in and ducking her head to say it in John's ear. He would have been able to hear her anyway, but Jade doesn't know that. "Should I just teleport her to the police and tell them what she's done?"

"I don't know how long they'd even hold her for before she got bailed out," John mutters back. "Urgh. I'm actually thinking, maybe send her right to the Legislaceration office?" He has no connections there like his dad does in the regular Seattle police force, mostly because Legislacerators are a lot less friendly to heroes in general, and the Seattle office is made up of overseers and secretaries and not much else by way of training Lacerators.

But there's a chance, however slim, that they'd be able to hold Droog on interstate charges without bail, and maybe that would actually keep Droog out of their hair for a while. It's a long shot, but at least it's better than taking another Midnight Crew ringleader to the cops. The last time they tried that, even more bombs had been involved.

SS: As though any prison could hold someone like Diamonds.
You're wasting your time, kid. Just let me handle her.

Spades Slick steps forward, into the light of the one remaining lamp in the corner that neither combatant has managed to smash, and that's when John gets a really good look at him. For the most part, despite the state this room and Droog herself are in, Slick barely looks ruffled. There isn't a speck of blood on him, even though Droog is cut up pretty badly, and John wonders just how tough this guy actually is when he remembers. Weird blood power rituals. Just because Slick looks sour and spindly and mean doesn't mean he's not neck deep in the kind of weird shenanigans that have been plaguing them all over the past few weeks, and any injuries he might have had probably healed just like they would have if they'd been inflicted on Hemogoblin.

Seriously. So weird.

Bec pops in without warning. Jade squeals with delight as the wolf hovers in a film of yellow and green light before huffing through its nose and sitting down at her feet. Dave backpedals away from the animal so fast that he almost crashes into a coatrack, his eyebrows flying up so fast John is pretty sure Dave has come as close to outright terror as he's capable of expressing. Then the other boy seems to realize he's being pretty obvious about his weird dog fear, and coughs, sidling closer to John than Jade with his shoulders huddled up defensively.

Everyone but Spades Slick is a little distracted by the magical zapping wolf. Even Droog, as it turns out, because she only notices Slick's next surprise attack when the carapacian is already springing off the overturned couch to leap at her, sharp teeth bared in a snarl as he aims a knife at Droog's face. "You little-!" she has time to yell before Slick crashes into her, trying to force the bladekind down while Droog catches his arm at the last moment. Then the two combatants tilt backward, grappling for control of the knife as Droog stumbles and nearly falls over the desk.

"Agh!" John yells, tearing at his hair. "Oh crap!" And for a whole five seconds he wastes time wondering whether he should be rooting the carapacian on or trying to prevent some insane murder stabbing action from going down right in front of him. Then he remembers - "Wait, you stabbed Hemogoblin, too!"

Slick whips around mid-stab to throw him a death glare.

"I stab everyone, yah goddamn pansy - urgh!"

Dave grabs the carapacian under the arms and hauls Slick off Droog, his mouth a grim line as he tosses the alien bodily away from himself just as the carapacian tries to swipe at him. When Slick scrambles back up onto his feet, snarling and gnashing his teeth so incomprehensibly that the mental component of his speech is a jumble of white noise, Dave just plants himself between the Dersite and Droog, a skinny line of white and red that is way too close to Droog for John's comfort.

"Jeez!"

Dave seems way more concerned with frantically signing at Spades Slick than being wary of the Crew member staggering upright behind him. Droog wipes a thumb over the thin cut Slick managed to slice down along her cheek and inspects it, a soft "tch" escaping her; then her eyes sweep over to Dave, too deliberately to be chance.

John raises both hands this time. Because if Diamonds Droog thinks she's laying a hand on one of his friends again - well, she's just not, okay!

Then Droog pauses, glances over in John's direction, and raises an eyebrow. "Well. Now I am impressed," she says, and she almost sounds sincere, but John has no idea what could have spurred that comment, because he hasn't actually done anything yet - Until he looks beside himself, and realizes that Dave is still standing right next to him.

SS: No, I will not translate for future-you, either. Piss off.

Jade just looks delighted, clapping her hands to her cheeks as she looks back and forth from one Dave to the other. "Oh, that is so weird! So cooool!"

SS: Do you honestly think I care? Get outta my way, kid.

"John Egbert?"

Later, John will blame it on the fact that he's nowhere near thinking himself into an Heir mindset. He's been flying by the seat of his pants since Dave arrived - since Jade arrived, really - and he's been thinking like John through this entire debacle. His head is a mess, and when he turns toward the source of the whisper it's reflexive. Someone says your name, and you answer to it. That's basic.

But it can't be. Not when you're a hero. Not when you're supposed to pretend you don't know the name, and then hightail it out of there before anything else can go wrong.

So when his eyes light on Diamonds Droog, and her lips part to bare a smile full of teeth, John knows -

- he knows -

- that he is completely and utterly screwed.

"Hello there, John," Droog mouths, and for the first time John realizes that she didn't even say his name above a whisper. The two of them are the only ones who know, because he's the only one who can hear a voice that soft.

"That is eeeenough!" Jade declares, oblivious. She darts into the middle of the room, setting her back to the future-copy of Dave so that she can raise a hand and hold it up to ward off Droog, her eyes bright in the darkness. "Jail! Both of you!"

"Arrest me," Droog whispers, "and I won't be the only one who knows."

Future-Dave reaches out and latches onto Jade's wrist. "Hey!" Jade yelps, but all Dave can do is shake his head at her, tipping his shades down with a finger to stare at John meaningfully.

SS: No, I don't know what's happening, ask your own damn self!

John's stomach has dissolved. His insides are all one sludge of horror, crawling and tossing in his gut as he sags back.

Diamonds looks unbearably smug.

Right up until John tackles her through the broken window.

- "I wouldn't kill me, either, if I were you," Droog adds, as the wind tunnel sucks them up and out into the night sky. She's impossibly cool for someone dangling over a hundred feet above the ground, high enough that if John's hands were to slip -

John's heart doesn't seem to be working. Either that, or it's going so fast that he's just too desperately enraged to feel it. "How," he growls through gritted teeth, pelting them further up into the air so that they slice through a low hanging cloud. "And give me one reason why not?!

It's the same rage that swallowed him up when the Puppeteer ordered him to stand down, the same instant fury that made him lash out at Jade when she whispered his name in his ear only a few nights ago.

But this time, he can't imagine anything that can make this hate go away. Diamonds Droog knows, she knows and so the Midnight Crew knows and he confirmed it for her and he is so utterly fucked.

"Mmm. I have my sources," Droog drawls, tilting her head to the side and inspected the fingernails of one hand. His fists are twisted and clutching at the front of her waistcoat, and John isn't entirely certain if the wind is helping him hold Droog up, or if it's just his own superhuman strength carrying her aloft with him.

All he'd need to do is let go. But oh god -

I need to go home to Dad. We need to discuss this.

The thought cuts through all the muddled shit rattling around his skull, like a breath of cold, clear air. It's the only thing John can focus on long enough to latch onto it. Everything else falls under the categories of either take Droog out or oh god don't kill her, but those two conflicting impulses can still be tamped down by the thought of getting his dad's input.

Thank god.

"And if you were to kill me, I'm afraid that certain other failsafes would come into play on my end." Droog shrugs, which she really shouldn't do if she wants him to keep a grip on her. A sharp gust of the breeze finally dislodges her hat, and the hurricane-force winds that John is drawing on batter the hat against the nearest building below until it's shapeless and torn. "Namely, several of my key assistants, each of whom has recently been informed of a certain key detail of your identity. The moment word of my untimely demise breaks, they will not only release those facts to the media, but also make it their life's work to hunt you down, no matter how often you try to change your name. They would be heartbroken if you killed me, see - their poor minds would break right in two."

He feels so cold. "You would tell them anyway," he says hollowly. "You think I don't see how screwed up this already is?! I can't trust you not to tell anyone!"

This isn't Jade. This isn't Dave. This isn't Karkat.

His head throbs.

I should just take her home, now. If she already knows my name, she probably knows my address, and we need to talk about this, but Karkat is there, oh god oh god oh god -

I need to go to Dad.

Because this is the worst case scenario, the one thing his Dad has always warned him about, the thing that kept John quiet and alone and friendless for all of elementary school, and all those long years between losing Rose and meeting Karkat. This, the fear that someone on the wrong side of the law would find out who he was, who his loved ones were -

And crush him with it.

"Or," she says, tapping a finger against the side of his mask, drawing his attention back to the present, "you can trust that I am a professional."
He stares at her, and she rolls her eyes at the look on his face, her tightly coiled hair flying everywhere as the wind twines around them. "My offer still stands, you know," she says. "If you stay out of my way, I'll stay out of yours. The business of the Crew would be off limits. Your identity, in return, would be none of my concern. Easily forgotten, really. A misplaced file here, and no one else in the upper ranks would know. And those in my employ would never betray my confidence. If you chose to leave Seattle to us, we would not pursue you."

...

Does she seriously think he'll believe that?! This is a huge federal fucking issue, and she's - what, suggesting they just ignore each other? That Heir overlook any violence or crime perpetrated by someone in a black suit? That he should just trust a known, violent criminal with a penchant for kidnapping and blackmail won't drop his identity like a bomb on the local news station?

The whole thing is wrong! This is so messed up!

"Why?" is all that comes out of his mouth.

She rolls her eyes. "This has never been personal. This is just good business. Small fry criminals like the kind you should be dealing with? Ain't my people." Her diction is slipping, into the kind of gangster slang straight out of an old mob movie, but John can't even process that right now. "Take them out, and honestly? You're taking out the trash who'd interfere with my operation, too." She raises an eyebrow. "So? Whaddya say, kid?"

He can't believe a word Droog says.

He can't afford to.

"Tick tock," she says, sighing. One hand comes up and clutches over John's hand on her shirt, sharp fingernails digging into the flesh of his palm as though Droog is trying to peel his hand off her, while they're still dangling in the middle of an impending tornado. "This offer is only good for the next -" she checks the watch on her wrist "- five minutes. After which point, if I am not free to join him at our primary base, my good friend Marlowe will be sending the first report to a contact of ours who writes for the Seattle Times."

"What?!" John yells.

"He might even make the morning edition, if he jumps the gun a little." Droog laughs freely, the noise spinning out on the wind for anyone to hear, and she pats him on the hand as though pandering to him. "Put me down. And walk away. Everyone wins."

And now he has a time limit.

This is such bullshit.

John glares. Droog smiles.

"This isn't over," he says.

"I didn't think it would be," she replies. "But I think, for now, it really is."

Tick tock.

John grimaces and closes his eyes.
They start to descend.

"...Attaboy."

It only occurs to him that his windstorm might have been warding off any of Jade's attempts to help him out when he and Droog touch down, and the winds finally tangle up close around him rather than ripping through the air in an outward expression of his rage. He's tense and jittery and shaking so hard with terror and rage and panic that there's no doubt Droog can feel it through her grip on his hands. He refuses to look at her face, because he isn't sure he'll be able to control himself, no matter what he sees - sympathy or disdain or nothing at all.

"J-Heir! Heir!" And Jade makes herself known pretty much the moment John crumples everything in on himself and starts the process of squashing it. Droog steps away from him when he forces his fingers to unclench, his knuckles white with the effort, and clears her throat when Jade bounces in a few feet from them.

The message is clear, and John trembles, nearly collapsing under the weight of it.

If Jade interferes, you're done for.

"Let her go, Sharpshooter," John says. It's the first time he's really noticed his own voice since this mess started, and it shocks him how hoarse he sounds.

Jade jerks back, her automatic grab for Droog's shoulder cut off, and she yanks her hand back as though she's been stung. "Huh? Why? What's wrong?" she asks, and there's nothing but honest confusion in her voice, genuine concern as she drifts closer to John instead.

John envies her that. He's not sure Jade really understands how complicated real life can be, after years of living isolated on an island and trained by robots and a wolf and little else. Not even working as Sharpshooter could really erase that fundamental not-knowing, the obliviousness, the simplicity and bluntness of emotion that's only obvious when you squint.

Things aren't complicated for Jade.

For John, well -

Just another failure, courtesy of me.

"She knows my name. And so do her assistants," he says, the words sinking into his teeth like decay, like rot, like filth. "Sharpshooter, I know you don't understand - just - we have to let her go."

Because if she knows my name she knows my address she knows my dad I need my dad I need Karkat -

...He's gonna be sick. His stomach roils and heaves, sharp like acid, and he swallows hard, realizing he's got maybe a few minutes left of control before he throws up in front of Droog herself, and that's the last thing on this earth he'll let himself do. He feels another set of breathing lungs jogging toward them, and then Dave is there, a red blur in the corner of John's eyes, and he is not crying -

"She knows my identity, so she probably knows my address," he spits when Jade still stares at him with an utter lack of comprehension. That one seems to hit her, a flash of worry that makes her draw even further away from Diamonds Droog. "So we have to let her go."
"I'm glad you've seen reason," Droog says, her voice too smooth and calm. John is wrecked, John is in pieces, and Droog looks like she's just stepped outside on a breezy day to get a cup of coffee. Even with her torn up clothes and her hair a thicket of short, wild curls, she radiates control.

He hates her, and he hates himself, and he can't tell which feeling is stronger. It's pretty hard to hate anyone more than he hates himself sometimes, but Diamonds Droog is officially in the running!

"But -" Jade starts, and then she bites down, frustrated. "We could -"

"Stop while you're ahead. This diversion has lasted long enough." Droog turns on her heel, glancing around casually. "Hmm. I don't suppose you left Slick in my rooms?"

"Not telling you," Jade says, a pout settling on her features as she deliberately turns away from Droog and touches John's arm. He flinches away, feeling shocky and gross, and the hurt on her face just makes him feel worse. "Not telling you anything at all!"

Droog sighs. "Children." Then she starts walking away without another word, drawing a disposable cell from the pocket of her pants as she strides down the sidewalk. There's no sign of anyone else on the road, but she seems to have a destination in mind, or maybe a car waiting around the corner.

She played them all, from beginning to end. John has little doubt Diamonds Droog could pull off something as simple as a getaway vehicle.

His phone is going off in his pocket. Well, what else can go wrong, he thinks, sliding his thumb across the screen blindly. There's a barrage of harsh, bright red text that he can't even bring himself to read, all the messages Dave probably tried to send that John hadn't been able to look at earlier; instead, he just looks at the latest one, because that's the one that's most likely to be relevant.

TG: okay
TG: shit
TG: thats a seven minute loop
TG: ill be right back im literally running up as i type this TG: brb

The Dave standing beside him gestures at Jade, holding out his phone for her to read the screen. Jade leans in, upset, but then her face clears and she nods. "You got it!" A snap of her fingers and Dave vanishes, and John guesses that's how a second Dave showed up earlier, to stop Spades Slick from stabbing Droog in the face and triggering all the repercussions that would have ensued in the event of her death. He's not surprised when he senses Dave running up again at the same moment the original one vanishes.

At some point, he stopped seeing anything, though. John's just kind of staring at nothing - maybe the spot where Droog had been standing, or maybe just a circling current of air that winds in tight around him, trying to soothe his panic. He feels a quick, fretful hand that hovers just above his shoulder, not quite touching him, and that's probably for the best because he thinks if he stops pulling in the wind it's just going to explode all over the place.

Don't think.

The faint sound of Jade's voice, distant and muffled because he doesn't want to hear anything at all.

Don't think about it.

Someone does touch him, but he's busy burying everything, so he doesn't react.
Don't think about anything at all. Just get home -

Green light swallows up his field of vision. He doesn't know where they're going.

Just get to Dad -

The temperature shift registers, from the cold night air to the warmth of a place with familiar air currents, drafts that he knows like his own breathing, so at least Jade and Dave knew to get him home. Dizzy, dizzy, dizzy and there's a faint pain in his palms, where his fingernails have been digging in through the fabric of his gloves, a larger pain in his head where he can't stop remembering that Diamonds Droog knows who he is. Someone pulls him away from Jade and Dave, but he barely notices aside from how it jostles him.

Is someone shouting? He can't hear -

"JOHN!"

John blinks and looks up, and Karkat is standing at the top of the stairs, his face frozen and too pale a grey.

Oh.

Get to Karkat.

He pushes someone away - he thinks it's his dad - and then Karkat is doing the stupidest thing in the world which is trying to run down the stairs when his ribs are a mangled mess, so John has to force life back into his numb limbs to meet him halfway, before the stupid dumb idiot kills himself.

And then he's practically inhaling a mouthful of Karkat hair, and there are warm hands pressing against his face and patting at his back, and a rough voice shooshing in his ear. It smells like Karkat, and it sounds like Karkat, and John is half-terrified all over again that if he doesn't stop now, he'll crush Karkat, too. "Karkat?" he says. "Karkat?"

"I've got you," Karkat says before John even finishes stumbling over his name, "you impossible, stupid, stupid fuck, I've got you."

Karkat drags John back to his room. There may or may not be snarling involved, but John's not coherent enough to understand who is being snarled at. Whatever kept him standing as Droog walked away leaves him when the door closes, and after that he can only hope he doesn't drag Karkat to the floor when he faints.

When awareness comes drifting back in, John isn't entirely sure he's ready for it. "Nooooo," he says, and it earns him a pap across the forehead. Which he is totally okay with.

"Fine then, no," Karkat agrees, and the arm wrapped around John's waist tightens. "C'mere, dumbass."

"I fucked up," John tries to explain, because it's reeeeally important that Karkat understand this.

"No, you didn't. You've explained the whole thing to me three fucking times, and I'm pretty sure we've established by now that you caused literally none of what happened last night," Karkat says.
"If anything, we're blaming Droog for being way fucking ahead of the game, and Harley for being a complete dipshit."

"I did? We did?" John says, more than a little dazed. "That last part sounds like just you."

"No. Fuck no. Repeat after me: 'my sister is an irresponsible, impetuous dipshit, and she needs to get with the fucking program before she gets someone killed.'" Karkat dictates, rubbing a thumb in circles over John's temple and kneading at his scalp with his other hand. It's really hard to say no to that, so John just kind of nods until Karkat takes that as agreement. "Good. Maybe this time it'll stick."

That's when John realizes they're in the closet.

"Why are we in the closet?" he asks, which is one of those questions he supposes he might have already asked Karkat multiple times in his breakdown.

But as it turns out, it's not. Karkat looks almost relieved in what little John can make out from the light trickling in through the crack between the door and the carpet. "Oh thank fuck, you finally noticed. Does this mean you're crawling back to real life functionality?"

"Maybe. I might take a rain check on that." John laughs, horrible and croaky. "Real life kind of seems shitty, if I think about it too much."

"Preaching to the grubfucking choir, here," Karkat says, raising a hand and then letting it flop back down across John's side. John shifts a little to get more comfortable, and squints to try and take in his surroundings.

"Karkat, did you drag the entire mattress into my closet?"

"Shooooooosh." Karkat cards his claws through John's hair, and wow that is soothing. John melts a little, letting his head fall back to stare at the ceiling while Karkat picks his way through a knot of tangled cowlick. "Emergency piling instincts kicked in when you fainted all over the place. We don't have a panic room or an emergency concealment block here, so I started flipping my shit."

John hiccups. "Actually, we do. Have a panic room, I mean. It's part of the basement."

"Oh. Uh. Well, fuck." Karkat appears to think that over. "Whatever. The pile would have been a fucking hassle to haul downstairs in one piece, anyway."

Ah. So that's why John's got what feels like a stack of his own textbooks under his elbow, crammed up against the wall because the closet isn't exactly built to hold two teenagers and a mattress-pile. Karkat is curled up around him like a limpet, their legs tangled up because there's literally no other place to put them, and what feels like every blanket in the house is piled up on top of them.

"Also, going downstairs would have meant dealing with your dad and no offense, but that's the last bucket of liquid sewage you need slopped all over you," Karkat adds, and wait wait wait, what?

John tries to sit up at that, but Karkat has a pretty good grip on him, and it's hard to try and fight cuddlesmushes. It's hard, and John isn't emotionally invested enough in sitting up to push it, so he falls back again. "Huh? What happened?"

"Harley and Dave told him whatever version of events they witnessed, and the asshole tried to barge in here without warning me," Karkat says, a faint growl in his voice that makes his throat vibrate along John's forehead. "Which. Uh. I might have been...territorial."

John groans. "Karkat, did you attack my dad?"

"No. I was defending my moirail."

"Oh my god, Karkat."

"Shut up, John, you knew I was a fuckup when you became friends with me." Karkat adjusts himself so he's not pinning John with his chin on John's head, and resettles so that John can see a pair of luminescent red eyes blinking at him under the bottom edge of his hanging shirts overhead. "I just yelled. A lot. It's what I do."

He sounds almost perversely proud of that, and that's enough to make John giggle, more than a little hysterical. "Why can I not remember that? You always try so hard to be polite in front of him, and I missed you going to town?" It sounds like the most hilarious kind of clusterfuck!

"You sure acted like you were awake when you started freaking out and having a goddamn panic seizure until I shut up and he left," Karkat mutters. "You don't remember any of that?"

"And she probably knows my face," Karkat says, sounding more serious. "Yeah. We're pretty fucked. Like. This is pretty much the universe itself fucking us over the table. People in future generations will pay homage to the sheer magnitude of how fucked we are, and pray that they never be so stricken as we two poor assholes have been."

"What are we going to do?" John grabs Karkat's shirt, and buries his face in it. It's still and quiet and dark in the closet, and all he can really feel is Karkat's breathing. Reaching out to sense the air outside the closet would mean acknowledging that the rest of the world exists, and he is not ready for that, on so many levels.

Just him and Karkat. That's good. He's good for that.

"Apparently?" Karkat digs around in the darkness, and somehow produces a phone from under John's ribcage, scrolling down the screen while John is still blinking at the sudden light. "According to all these texts your dad started sending an hour ago, we're going to lay low for a few days, and then fuck off on a 'family emergency/vacation' in the mountains. All of us, including the Lalondes, which, when the fuck did they even get here, is the real question -"

"Lal - Rose is here?!!" John sits bolt upright. There are very few things in this world that can motivate a man to escape a feelings jam, and the news that one of his oldest and dearest friends might have arrived, on top of everything else, is in fact one of those few things.

"Calm down, you crazy hug whore, she's not even in the house," Karkat grumbles. It takes him three tries to drag John back down, but he succeeds. Mostly because sitting up is a lot more effort than John remembers it being! "She's down for the count too, apparently, so her custodian's probably driving her out to the Cascades early, don't get your spongelobes in a twist. And holy shit, do not get me started on when you tried to drag Harley and the douchebag in here -"

"Wha-?"

"- because I am having absolutely none of that pale orgy nonsense," Karkat finishes. "None of it. Now lie still, you wriggling moron, you need to actually sleep." When John tries to say something like but Rose, Karkat tugs a blanket over their heads to shut him up. "Amazingly enough, even if you can't remember it, having a night-long mental breakdown doesn't count as sleep for your thinkpan."

Karkat's elbow ends up in John's side the next time John thinks about sitting up, and John takes the hint. His head feels dull and muted, and he almost thinks pain medication might be involved in that. Knowing that there's a plan, that his dad has in fact been briefed on almost everything that went on last night, helps soothe his nervous anxiety even more, and makes it easier to ignore everything hidden behind that veil of fuzzy, dampened emotions.

His eyes start to slide shut; between Karkat and all this lack of sleep, he supposes even in a crisis sleep is possible. There are all sorts of protests he should be raising - not the least of which is that Karkat needs sleep, too, and that means the troll should be in the reccoperacoon and not here, undoing all their hard work at getting him through withdrawal - but somehow they drift out of his mind before he manages to make the words work.

A pair of dry, cracked lips press against his forehead, and his reply is instinctive, so automatic and unthinking that he almost believes later that he only hallucinates mumbling, "Love you."

"So fucking pitiable," Karkat mumbles back. "It's like fucking sugar cubes, how pale you make me. How the fuck do you do this to me?"

Then, after a pause so long that John's eyes have slid shut entirely, "Yeah, yeah. I love you, too."

- Los Angeles

He believes he can win.

So why is he still losing?

"Will you fuckin' stand still an' let me hit you?" Eridan Ampora howls, as another blast of white lightning fizzles out against the half-melted pavement. One hand still steaming with white fire, he whirls and scans the black and white landscape for the briefest glimpse of grey and purple.

Gamzee's not even trying to hide. Eridan spies him lurking in the middle of a courtyard, idly squatting to investigate something on the ground. As though he feels eyes on him, the stupid fuck glances up at Eridan, smiling blandly and raising a single hand in greeting.

It's fucking enraging. Eridan fires white fire from one hand with a snarl, enough to wash the whole courtyard with a flurry of lightning and scorch the monochrome walls. Panting, he lays off and waits for the fire to die down.

honk

"I can't believe this!" Incensed, he spins and finds Gamzee kicking his heels over the edge of a rooftop level with Eridan's altitude, kicking an angelic gargoyle in the ugly mug and honking to himself like this is some kind of fuckin' game. Eridan levels his rifle, keeps it aimed squarely between Gamzee's twisted horns, and fires a more concentrated round of power. He carves out a huge chunk of black and white stone and slices off the wings of an unsuspecting servitor angel, but Gamzee reappears on the street below, walking along with his hands in the pockets of his stupid clown pants. If he looks up and waves at him one more damn time, Eridan is going to take this rifle and personally shove it up his ass.

Because that's all the goddamn asshole clown does. He just stands there, and waves, and waits until Eridan fires to vanish into thin air.

It's not fair. Eridan is trying to have a goddamn showdown, and Gamzee is being an evasive prick.

The Gamzee he remembers most clearly was too chill to take seriously. He'd been a slime-addict, a complete stoner whose pan would have melted out through his ears if he lay down on one side for too long. Addicts in a hell like Alternia didn't tend to last long; they either wandered into another lusus's territory in their daze, stayed out too long in the sun, or got themselves culled for being too slow. Gamzee's surviving as long as he had can only have been the result of unfathomable good luck. Or all the goddamn miracles but hell no, Eridan is not going there.

But there had been - something. One of the last thing's he remembers before Kan up and introduced him to the business end of her chainsaw. (Which yeah, he had kinda provoked her into doing. He'd been a total chump, and he shoulda probably apologized for murdering her. Or something. That's in the past now, whatever.) Vriska had been babblin' some shit about facing off with the monster following them instead of trying to ally with it, which had seemed like the only logical fuckin' option at the time, and then Gamzee had slunk out of the shadows, face carved up and sporting a new coat of green and blue paint -

With black tears drooling from his reddened eyes.

Eridan wonders just how long Mal had been lurking in the clown's head, waiting for the chance to sink its unholy feathers into his vulnerable slime-softened pan. Maybe just as long as it had been crawling around Eridan's. They'd all been pretty thoroughly screwed up in the heads, by then, and crazy tends to get Mal's attention.

Either way, Kan had kicked both their asses so easily it was fuckin' embarrassin', and Eridan had been too dead to see what happened next. Judging by Mal's reaction, it hadn't ended well. He didn't think it was possible for someone to be that ass over wings terrified of Gamzee Makara.

Now, though, he's dealing with a Gamzee that's damn unsettlin'. He'd been talking like Gam on sopor, until he'd snuck up on Eridan and tried to bring a juggling club down on his skull, his voice grating and raw with the edge of a feral troll on a subjuggulation bender. And ever since Eridan dodged it, flailing, Gamzee's been dead silent, stalking around and smiling and, ever so often, appearing right behind Eridan yet again to let out a HONK that makes Eridan's skin crawl before darting out of range again.

And no matter how hard he believes, no matter how he snarls and demands more from the hope that burns in his chest to blast Gamzee with, Eridan can't lay a claw on him. It's mindlessly infuriating, to the point that when Eridan fires off his next round, it goes so wild that Gamzee doesn't even bother to move outta the way, just stares up at him with an incredulous, disbelieving look and a raised eyebrow. The building behind him shatters and crashes in on itself, blowing the juggalo's baggy clothes and ridiculous hair every which way as he steps away from the chunks of obsidian flying everywhere.

There has to be some way to pin the clown down. He's higher on the hemospectrum than this asshole, and no matter how watered down and pathetic the hemotype hierarchy might be on this useless planet, that still means something in all the memories of the life he used to have. He just has to have faith that sooner or later, Gamzee will fuck up and overplay his stupid abscond card. That's how all the greatest military masterminds, of all universes Eridan can draw on memories of, became great - through upright perseverance and the ability to outwit and outlast the other guy. And fuck, if he can't outwit Gam of all trolls, honestly Eridan doesn't even deserve to win this round.

"C'mon, Eribro," that infuriating voice drawls, wistful and patient and coaxing, like a mockery of the sopor-sucking troll that once was. "Just let it go, my man. We don't need to be getting our fighting on like this." Gamzee steps forward, hands raised beseechingly and horns tilted back. "You're motherfucking hurting people."

Eridan snorts and holds his fire for two damn seconds while he floats down to the ground, making sure to stay a good twenty feet from Gamzee. "Why does that matter? Not like I'm hurtin' anyone who counts."

Gam blinks, cow-eyed and befuddled, and if his face paint weren't smeared into a chilling leer around his wide purple eyes, Eridan would almost be fooled. "You're all trying to put the hurt on me," he says, sounding injured and sad. "And I didn't do nothing to you, mi hermano, not a motherfuckin' thing as would make you so angry all over my business."

If he's trying to come across placating, it's not gonna work; Eridan got enough of that pacifying shit from Fef, and he's so not even interested in that quadrant bein' filled ever again. All he ever got from Fef was a load a carp about how he needed to control himself, when obviously he just needed to let it go. Now that he believes in himself, who the fuck needs control? He's as sane as he wants to be. "And who said a dumb fuck like you even counted," Eridan mutters, but then he shakes his head curtly and raises the rifle. "Whatever. You used to be a friend, even if you were a shitpanned, Faygo-drinking numbskull ninety percent of the time. So last warning. Get out and lemme rule this city like I was fuckin' hatched to."

Gamzee's pleading expression vanishes so fast it might as well have not been there. It's always been hard to read him with all that paint marking up his face, stretching his lips into fake smiles, but Eridan can see that under the smears Gamzee has gone too still, lips flat and eyes hooded as he cocks his head to the side. The next step he takes forward is measured and slow. "Bro, my motherfucking advice to you is that you just get your chill on, before we have ourselves a real motherfucking problem. Seeing as how you had some nasty motherfuckers all having themselves a slice of your pancake, I'm being pretty damn MOTHERFUCKING PATIENT while you get your realization about WHO YOU'RE MOTHERFUCKING DEALING WITH, HERE."

HONK

Eridan fires. Gamzee falls back, curving over bonelessly into a back bend as the ray of white light arcs over him. Instead, Eridan is forced to watch as it crackles down the street until it hits the next thing that gets in its way - the dome he set up over the city. It explodes with a booming crack, like an iceberg fragmenting, and the blast wave kicks up a wall of air and concussive force that Eridan has to plant his feet against and believe he can withstand. He raises an arm over his eyes when dust and fragments of stone sting his eyes - and then swears, blinking and tearing up with violet-tinted tears as he realizes he's taken his eyes off Gamzee again. "You don't realize who you're dealin' with, you beach-crawling scumsucker!" he yells, wiping his eyes frantically and missing his glasses. When he can see again, Gam is gone. What else is new. Biting through his tongue and willing it healed, Eridan whips around, expecting the purpleblood to have snuck up behind him again. But the street leading back to the center of the city is empty. Looking around reveals nothing but a brand new gaping hole in the middle of the white wall of the dome, one that makes Eridan growl but which he can't waste the time to fix up right now. Maybe he can patch it after he's punted Gam's ass through it like a fuckin' football.

But for a good minute, Gamzee's nowhere to be found, and that just makes Eridan even more tense, nervous and freaking the fuck out inwardly because he can't see Gamzee, but he has no doubt Gamzee can see him. God, why did he take his eyes off that asshole?
Something moves in the shadowy archway to his left. "Ha!" he exclaims, and brings his hand up with a flurry of white fire already smoldering -

"Please don't! Oh god, please don't!" It's not Gamzee. It's a human woman with stringy brown dreads, who trips and falls to her knees, cowering as she tries to scramble back into her hiding place. "Don't eat me too!"

For a moment, he's utterly perplexed, and that gives her the time she needs to haul herself back into the dark canopy of the covered courtyard, where he hadn't been able to see her from above. One of her arms ends at the elbow, a melted slag of twisted flesh and bone mottled with blanched white flesh and open red sores, and he recognizes with a pang the preliminary effects of all that grimlight acid Mal had dumped everywhere. The pools themselves have mostly dried up and begun to flake, revealing the half-digested bodies and the hollowed out remains of cars, but he supposes if there were some people who had only just been caught when Mal fled, they must have been able to hide in all the refurbished castles.

This woman is one of his new subjects. He yanks his hand back sheepishly, clearing his throat and lifting his chin and trying to look fuckin' dignified, instead of terrified that an insane clown fucker could be about to jump him.

But is that what Mal was doing to the people it dragged into the acid down here? They think it was eating them? Are they really wrong?

Eridan shoves that tilting, mind-blurring thought away before it can make his stomach twist. Mal had insisted he focus on making angels; he had handwaved the carnage going on below and left it to the rest of the hivemind. "Don't be fuckin' disgusting!" he snaps instead, gesturing curtly with the rifle. "Get outta our damn battle field, woman! This is private business!"

"I'm sorry! I'm sorry!" she sobs, groping around in the darkness until she vanishes into the dark smudge that's all Eridan's shitty eyes can make out. Mothergrub help her if she runs into Gam in there, but Eridan reluctantly marks that building in his mental map of LA and decides he'll at least make some kind of effort to avoid torching her. That would be fuckin' inconsiderate. Downright unconscionable.

honk

A slow clap from above tips him off, and he fires a bolt of lightning with even looking. He bares his teeth when he looks up and sees Gam sitting crosslegged above him, perched on the slanted top of a street light that has toppled over and buried itself in the side of a building. The clap pauses for a moment so Gamzee can wave cheerfully, and then resumes. "Tavbro has been all telling me this killing thing ain't as down here as it was back on the old Alternian heretoforb. We gotta be all respectable and shit because it's prohibido. This mean you're doing the thinking thing again?"

"I think I'm the one who decides what's illegal and what's not in my territory, jackoff!" Eridan snaps. "And juggalos are so fuckin' banned! Banned for the rest of eternity. So get your ass offa my property!"

Gamzee leans forward at a dangerous angle, his limbs dangling. "If'n you be by my side, ol' compañero, we can go on our most righteous way. You can even leave all this place done up all motherfucking fancy with the black and white like this, so long as you come along to get all our friends." All of his teeth go into his smile this time, and it's horrifying because not even trolls should have that many teeth. "You feel me?"
"...Sorry, that's a no from me!" Eridan retorts, and he springs into the air. "Eat science magic!"

Gamzee rolls off the street light and out of the way of Eridan's leap.

It's a cartwheel, actually. He fucking cartwheels down the unstable, half-fallen pole all the way to the ground, beaming like a loon.

"That didn't even make sense!" Eridan shrieks.

Gamzee just falls into a forward roll and ends up smiling up at him from below. "Bro, it don't have to make sense, if that's how your heart is all feeling it to be. S'how miracles work."

That kind of reasoning sounds familiar. Probably because it's the same unthinking faith that Eridan has been using to keep his shredded organs from falling apart from all the damage Mal did earlier.

This asshole not only has the nerve to break through Eridan's awesome unbreakable dome, he has the fuckin' audacity to act like hope is what's fueling all his shitty useless absconds?

"I will punch you so hard your descendants will be too scared to crawl outta the caves!" he snaps, forgetting for a moment that there are no brooding caverns here aside from the ones in which the Mothergrubs themselves reside, no set of harsh trials that prospective trolls have to wriggle their way through before a lusus will choose them. It's all sanitized and *human*e here, and the word itself tells you exactly who encouraged that kind of reform. Even the weak little runts get assigned a lusus or adopted out.

But it's the principle of the thing. And however the fuck Gamzee remembers what came before, Eridan's not going to question it because he's the only other troll on the planet who would understand the threat.

"Hey, if that's a thing that'll make you feel better, you can go right ahead, Eribro," Gam says, too pleasant. He tilts his cheek up toward Eridan. And then lets out an outrageous -

HONK

"Agh!" Eridan doesn't fly down; he just cuts off the belief that he can fly and lets himself drop, lost in a blinding haze of rage. Even if he hits ground and not clown, he figures if he believes his legs will survive the impact, they will.

The shock of actually hitting Gamzee startles him so badly he nearly jumps away again. Gamzee feels like a skinny sack of bones and not much else as they plow into the street, and the impact jars Eridan so hard his teeth clack in his skull and a canine tooth cracks in his mouth with a sharp burst of pain. He spits the chip of tooth and the spurt of violet blood and some of it drools down his chin as he latches onto Gamzee. Like hell is he absconding out of this!

And Gamzee just smiles.

"Stop! Smiling!" Eridan screams, incensed. Gam smiles wider, and just won't stop, even when Eridan levels his laser rifle right up under the troll's chin, his hands and the fuel cell smoldering with light. "Do you think this is a fuckin' game?! Do you think one of your stupid fuckin' miracles will save you?!!"

Gamzee reaches up and pats one of Eridan's hands, smiling. "Hell, hermano. Everything is a motherfucking game."

The ensuing rage inspired by those simple words blacks out his vision and cramps his stomach and oh wait fuck, that's his kidneys collapsing. Bitter, spiking pain stabs Eridan in the gut as he gasps, dropping the rifle and wrapping his arms around his torso. He wheezes and chokes on the wash of chill cold blood that floods up into the back of his throat, thick and stringy with chunks of meat.

Without him even really noticing it, that warm diamond of power in his chest that Mal had helped him tap into seems to have vanished, and without it, his insides are basically chunky salsa.

He can't resist when Gamzee sits up and pats him on the head between the horns, smiling and smiling and smiling. "There," he says, shaking his head. Eridan wants to scream with rage, but all that comes out is a choked gurgle. "You motherfucking done with the unhappy-making lightning, bro?" There's a feral glint in Gam's eyes, his smile more self-satisfied than bland, and that -

Oh. That's when Eridan realizes what's going on.

But first - he reaches frantically for any hope left in his dwindling reserves, scraping together something that'll undo all the destruction Mal wrought on him, and comes up empty. Frantic, reaches out, lifts up the rifle, and smashes it down against the ground. The fuel cell of Hope cracks and all the compressed power he'd channeled into lasers earlier soaks back into his claws like a shock of static. Not much, but enough that when he closes his eyes and believes he's going to be okay, the pain and the rage both begin to ebb away. Swallowing down all the gross chunks in his mouth makes his stomach flip and swerve, but his insides start to slip back into place again.

And when enough of the rage clears up, he understands exactly what kind of game Gamzee's been playing. He spits one last mouthful of blood to the side, seizes the rifle, and shoves Gamzee back down with a grunt. "You fuckin' played me! You're doin' this on purpose, you impossible ass!" he screams, spittle flying from his mouth as he jams the useless rifle up into the soft underside of Gamzee's chin. "Kar was always pissed out of his mind that none of us gave a shit about debating what a Bard of Rage was supposed to do and it's - this! You're makin' me like this!"

'Like this' covers a lot of ground: the stupid way Eridan's been blindly shooting holes in his own dome, the way his vision blurs even worse whenever Gamzee gets too close, but most importantly, the rage that all of Gamzee's flitting around and mockin' Eridan has caused. The more Gamzee pisses him off, the worse Eridan has been doing in this strife, and more importantly, the less he's been able to focus on believing his body is healed. This was deliberate.

This is how Gamzee's doin' the real fighting. No straightforward combat, just dodging and feinting and smiling, leading Eridan on with a stilted chorus of honks until Eridan gets so enraged he can't see straight. He coulda fought himself to a standstill and brought a building down on his own head, and Gamzee would just wander over afterward to smile placidly at the rubble.

Gamzee holds up both hands, rolling his shoulders and falling back into a lazy smile, rather than the horrific, toothy grimace he'd worn while he thought he was winning. It's still enraging to see that he's not taking this seriously - but no, Eridan can't fall for that ploy again. Gam's been dicking around, but he's been doing it goddamn deliberately to piss Eridan off. He can't forget that, or Gamzee wins.

Bards. Bards don't fight. Bards inspire.

Eridan doesn't have enough juice to waste on blasting Gam right now. He needs to regroup. Gasping, the last echoes of pain still wracking his torso, Eridan brings the butt of the rifle down on Gamzee's face and jumps into the air, pelting away in the direction of the dome. As much as he'd fuckin' loathe to do it, if he needs to he can probably pull in more hope by undoing some of the dome itself. He's seriously regrettin' all the reckless lightning he flung around earlier under Gam's influence, because he doesn't think that energy is coming back anytime soon.
Gamzee just watches him go.

Smiling.

honk

He heads for the jagged hole in the dome, and topples over on the roof across the road from where he and Mal had their falling out. Everything smarts, like he's taped his insides together with rusty staples, and all he wants is to be furious at Gamzee for pulling this kind of crap - crap - instead of just strifing him like a normal person.

But no. If he wants to beat Gam, he can't let the troll get into his head. His mind is like a fuckin' temple. No angels, no horrors, no raging assholes. Eridan needs to fight this on his own terms. He props himself up on a nearby buttress and hopes like hell that Gam won't somehow magic his way onto the roof and lean over to grin all up in Eridan's face, because he refuses to be fuckin' responsible for his actions in the event of that kinda fuckery.

Think it through.

Prince of Hope. Never did hit the god tiers, but he blasted his way through enough of his planet's towers and dungeons before all hell broke loose to get the gist of his role. Maybe the angels coulda told him more, like how Kar was always harping at him about in the memos, but killin' them had been a goddamn privilege. Angels are dicks, all of them.

Still. Prince of Hope. A destroyer class. He can unleash all kinds of mad, uncanny hope majjyks and laser beams to try to annihilate Gam's juggalo face - but look how well that's been working out as a strategy. He'd thought his belief boundless, but flyin' face first into the cold hard reality that all his belief can't overcome Gam's sheer, innate asshattery has dealt him a harsh blow. The Hope welling up in his chest feels faint and distant, and he can't risk letting it slip away.

He needs to think about all this nonsense differently. Maybe not try to destroy Gamzee through bursts of hope -

No.

Eridan's grin stretches so wide, his teeth creak.

He needs to do what he did to Kanaya.

He needs to destroy Gamzee's hope.

Sure, Kan had come back with a rainbowsucking vengeance, greater and more terrible than before, but that had been an unforeseen miscalculation. Who could have predicted something like that? Gam is a lotta things, but Eridan highly doubts he got any dormant vampire genes outta the slurry.

So. Destroy what Gamzee believes in, what he trusts in most in the world, and then sucker punch the assclown while he's reeling. This is, in fact, a tried and true plan.

Eridan cackles to himself, and winces, adjusting his grip on his stomach as he filters more power out of the dome to actually heal himself.

And on top of that, Gamzee's already given it away. With Kan, it was the Matriorb, the very last hope of their entire pitiful, ragtag collection of trolls barely out of wrigglerhood. He hadn't just been destroying Kan's hope; it had been the hope of an entire species, and the power multiplier Eridan got for 1HKOing that sucker had been unbelievable.
Gamzee - sopor-sucking Gamzee, anyway, trusted basically any troll who stumbled over his hive, dumb fuck that he was. But he had specific friends, all the dumb assholes in their twelve-troll circle jerk who had him on the chumroll, and more importantly, he had the two gullible dickheads who put up with his stoned ramblings and spacey moments often enough to be considered "best bros."

Who the fuck knows where Kar is. He outlived Eridan last time, anyway, and that's one thing that Eridan is kinda grudgingly happy about. Kar was a good friend. A weird hardass who refused to let up with the grey anonymity filter on Trollian, but a hardass who made a pact to listen to Eridan's overwrought blathering when Fef dumped him hardcore. So no, Kar would be off limits anyway.

But Tavros is here.

Gamzee brought him right to Eridan's doorstep. He said so himself.

Eridan chuckles breathlessly, and assesses the size of the hole he blew in the dome with narrowed eyes. Everything's still pretty out of focus, but he's pretty sure he can manage it.

HONK

"Fuck you so much," Eridan snaps, not looking back at the juggafuck perched on top of the buttress. He flips the clown the middle finger, and shoves off.

"Eribro?" Gam calls after him, sounding uncertain. Eridan pelts toward the dome, his confidence rising and his speed rising with it as his certainty grows. "What the MOTHERFUCK DO YOU THINK YOU'RE DOING?"

His response is two middle fingers flung up toward the sky as he dives through the hole in the dome, and surveys the outside. The sudden breeze startles him, until he remembers that the air in the dome had been stagnant because Mal had been so insistent they make it mostly impermeable. The air tastes fresh and free of the lingering sting of blood and acid, and his head feels strangely clearer as he looks around him.

He and Mal hadn't managed to cover all of LA - that would have been a ridiculous amount of power to spend when Mal just wanted the downtown area to feast upon. But the outskirts of the city have still suffered from the effects of the original dome, the one Eridan helped sculpt out of acid and corroding grimlight. The nearest buildings haven't been remade in the image of the Land of Wrath and Angels, so the stone and masonry still sag, twisted and melted and drawn inward toward the ring of the dome as though pulled in by an irresistible force. Huge cracks spiral out in the road, filled with the faded, desiccated remains of what look like grimlight tendrils attempting to sink roots into the ground. There are a few news crews down the highway, too far away for Eridan to care, but aside from that it looks like for the most part everyone has cleared out the area.

More significantly, there is all of one person on the highway, a huddled figure that only becomes clear to Eridan's shit vision when he swoops down to confirm their identity.

The last time he saw Tavros Nitram, there had been a hella lot of brown blood all over the walls because for some goddamn reason Kan and Eq thought impromptu amputations were an appropriate activity in the common room. Kar had passed out, Eridan had boggled, and it had all been amazingly awkward because Equius had that unique ability to infect the entire room with his weirdness. Then Tav had woken up and started charging around on his new mechalegs and stammering all over the fuckin' meteor.

Apparently, that didn't carry over. Tav looks up at Eridan with wide eyes from a wheelchair just like the old one, swamped in a hoodie emblazoned with the album cover of some Mexican hip hop group Eridan can't recall off the top of his head. Control Machete or something. He and Fef never really listened to music like that.

Anyway. "Tav," he says brusquely, floating down to hover in front of the brownblood. "Long time no see, I guess."

"A-ah!" Tavros stammers, so at least nothing's changed. "Lo siento! ¿Te conozco? I mean…do I know y-you?"

"What?! Of course you know me!" Eridan says, folding his arms and glowering. He's in no mood for dickin' around when Gamzee could show up any second. "What kinda question is that?!"

"I'm sorry?" Tav says, like he's still not sure, his eyes quizzical as he rolls his wheelchair back. "U-um, sorry, yo estoy - I am waiting for a friend? I'm s-sorry if I'm in your way."

"Yeah, yeah, I know, the juggalo dickhead is right on my tail, so just sit still," Eridan snaps, casting a wary glance behind him at the dome. He's still not sure how Gam got through the first time, but it won't take a scary guy like that long to catch up when Eridan left such a convenient escape route. "Sorry, but I have to -"

He breaks off, and looks at Tav again. The other troll stares at him, totally uncomprehending, and Eridan wonders just how good the troll's English even is. That's a heavy Mexican accent.

Besides, it had seemed like a great plan back in the heat of the moment, but a lot of his plans tend to do that to him, only to turn out all wonky and stupid in hindsight. And now he can't help thinking, with a burning guilt, that he'd come out here intending to blow Tavros to kingdom come just to hit Gamzee's weak point.

But Tavros was supposed to be one of the people who counted. He never really talked to him, sure, but he was friends with Kan and Rez and pretty much everyone but Vriska at least tolerated him, and honestly Vriska just couldn't seem to make up her mind whether she wanted to kiss him or murder him. Which was overall a pretty common problem to have on Alternia because murder just kind of happened all the time, whether you noticed it or not. But anyway, that had been enough to stack Tav in the 'do-not-kill' category when it came to all of Eridan's doomsday device plans.

Shit. Fuck. He didn't think this through again. He clenches a fist by his side, knuckles white, and forces himself to march forward and grab Tav by the wheelchair before he can wheel himself off the edge of the fuckin' road.

"P-por favor, my friend will be back soon! I promise! Te lo juro!" Tavros starts shrugging off his hoodie, like maybe he intends to toss it at Eridan's face and use the distraction to make a get away. "Please let me go!"

"Shut up shut up shut up!" Eridan chants, more than a little pissed. Where the hell is -

"You should probably LISTEN TO THE LITTLE MOTHERFUCKER," a harsh voice growls in Eridan's ear.

Eridan doesn't think. He reaches around and grabs Tavros's throat with a hand, sinking his claws in until he draws blood. "Who d'ya think would be faster?" he says, licking his lips as his throat dries up with terror. He can't see Gamzee, and that's just scary. "You trying to get me all ragey to the point that I lose focus, or me tearin' his throat out."

Tav's throat burns brownblood hot under Eridan's hand, and when Gamzee doesn't just try to bash his head in, Eridan knows he's won. The triumph boils through him, even as Tav gives a tiny whimper and his throat works as he says something pleading in Spanish, either to Eridan or Gamzee or both.

"You wouldn't dare. I'd FUCKING KILL YOU," Gamzee says at last, prowling into the range of Eridan's peripheral vision. That bland, mild smile is gone and all that's left in Gamzee's expression is unconcealed animosity, the kind of murderous hate that Eridan knows all too well.

Eridan, on the other hand, can feel the shitfaced grin splitting his own face. Because he's won. "And Tav'd still be dead," he says, shrugging and tapping a claw against the fluttering pulse of the carotid artery. "And you like him."

Gam's expression falters for just a second, and after that he has his murder face back on, but that's long enough for Eridan to make out the raw fear the clown's trying to hide. Makes a guy wonder just how Tav died, last time around.

If he had to guess - probably Vriska. She'd been talking a million miles an hour so he'd kinda filtered her out a lot near the end, but from the moment she and Tavros met Tav had probably been doomed. Eridan had been her kismesis long enough to see just how violent her mood swings could be. Vriska went hard and Tav...didn't. Him and Nep, neither of them could hate properly even if it killed them.

"Gamzee, ¿qué está sucediendo?" Tavros says in a strained voice, almost too fast for Eridan to understand him. He never really had a head for anything but English and Alternian. "¿Es esta la persona que estaba buscando? ¿Por qué estás enojado? ¿Qué has hecho?!"

"Ain't no thing, Tavbro," Gamzee growls, his voice veering wildly from a grate to a roar. And fuck, Eridan is pretty sure he's the fuckin' posterchild for sanity compared to whatever the hell Gamzee is, these days. "Our friendly invertebrother here was just about to motherfucking LEAVE."

"Was I?" Eridan snarks, snorting as Gamzee starts pacing around. "An' here I thought you were trying ta drag me along with you on your stoner clown and cripple world tour. Or did you finally come to your senses?"

"FUCK OFF BEFORE I MOTHERFUCKING HURT YOU," Gamzee bellows, turning and punching a car instead of Eridan's face, which is clearly what he'd rather do.

Eridan's eye twitches as the entire car crumples in on itself and smashes into the guardrail, denting the metal. His face aches in sympathy. "Whatever. You and Tav stay away and everything'll be fuckin' fine. Glad you saw it my way." He lets go of Tav before he can accidentally choke him out, shoves the wheelchair to the side - and then raises his hand and fires a bolt of lightning at Gamzee's back.

This one hits.

"W-what?! What are you doing?!" Tavros yelps, his voice clumsy and shocked as Gamzee slams into the wall of the building opposite, charred and smoking as he slumps to the ground. Eridan doesn't think he has enough juice left to have killed him, but he can at least hope Gam knows when to bow before his obvious superiority in combat, and just stay put.

"Makin' a goddamn point," Eridan says, sniffing. He brushes up his sleeve, grimacing at all the dried up grimlight residue and blood on his clothes, and dodges the hoodie that Tav tosses at his face. "He fucked with me in my domain. I had to set an example, or he'd just try it again." He floats up into the air and shoves his hair back out of his face. "Later, Tav. Nice seein' you alive, I guess." Then he sets his sights on the hole in the dome, and takes it slow, reserving most of his strength for healing the rips Mal left in his spinal cord. All he wants is to curl up in one of his sweet new castles and sleep for days, until everything is fixed and he doesn't have to concentrate so hard to believe he's healthy and whole. Then he can get to the business of ruling -

An arm wraps around his neck from behind, and squeezes, yanking him back and off balance as the weight of a whole other body tips him over. "Fuck!" he gags, clawing at the arm as the two of them tumble toward the ground. "Ga'zee, ge' off!"

"No!" And it's Tavros whoshouts to be heard, huge brown pupated wings beating hard to break their fall. "Usted no va a ninguna parte! You shot my friend! I th-think you are a bad, bad man!"

Eridan can't even believe this is happening, but that doesn't stop it from happening. It just keeps being Tavros, flying.

And, apparently, picking up where Gam left off. Fuckin' hell, when did Tav grow a backbone?

Eridan reasserts himself in the air, struggling unsteadily to keep aloft even as Tav's dead weight legs drag them down. The chokehold is not helpin’ at all in the slightest, and just as Eridan tries to bat a hand behind him and shove the brownblood off, Tav starts smacking him upside the head with a half-closed fist. It's pathetic, honestly, because Tav can't throw a punch for the life of him, but he's also got all the upper body strength that wheeling around in a wheelchair all day would imply, so it hurts when he clips one of Eridan's horns. "Leggo!" he yelps, smacking Tavros's hand away.

Tavros hangs on grimly, even when Eridan jabs a claw into the fleshy part of his flailing arm. "No!" he yells back, grunting. "H-he came all this way b-because he thought you needed help! You didn't have to hurt him like that! Uh, at least I think you didn't, so you p-probably shouldn't have! Apologize!"

They hit the ground and Eridan staggers when Tav does absolutely none of the work in supporting their combined weight. If he means to hold Eridan here until Gamzee wakes up, it's working, which is pretty fuckin' sad. "Hell no! He provoked me! He deserved everything he got!" Eridan rolls his shoulders and drives his elbow backwards. He knows he catches Tav in the ribs when the brownblood flinches at the pain. "I'm tryin' really fuckin' hard to be a magnanimous sovereign here, but you're asking for it too, Tav! One more warning - piss! Off!" He punctuates the last two words with more elbow jabs.

And finally Tav lets go, collapsing backward in a heap before he starts flapping his wings again to hover upright. Eridan yanks away, rubbing his throat with a wounded expression that he makes sure to level at Tav. As predicted, Tavros looks abashed, a dark bronze flush staining his face as he looks down at his dangling feet. Eridan knew that whatever little flash of confidence inspired that assault wouldn't last; with Tavros, it never does. That was half the reason Vriska hated and pitied him so desperately. Be firm enough and Tavros would always back down first.

HONK

Gamzee appears out of thin air, still smoldering. Literally. Eridan stumbles back, startled, and Gam lifts his head. His hair is singed and standing on end all over, his clothes are pretty much tatters that only cover the important parts by sheer dumb luck, and all of the paint has burned off his face.

And all around the livid bruise of his irises, the yellows of his eyes have turned a bright, feral red.

Oh. Shit.

"Gamzee, no!" Tavros has time to shriek in a sudden panic, just as the first juggling club clocks Eridan upside the head.
His neck cracks around so hard Eridan thinks for a moment of bright horror that his spine has been broken. But then the pain shooting through his jaw hits, and he doesn't have time to think of anything except oh fuck I fucked up. A whole tooth bounces around in his mouth, knocked out at the root with the force of the blow, and he almost swallows it as he catches himself on his hands and knees, the taste of blood in his mouth once again.

He doesn't see the second blow coming through the white haze that covers his vision, but he does hear Tavros shrieking at the top of his lungs in Spanish; he makes out a fervent, "Basta!" just before the club cracks against the other side of his face and sends him reeling in another starburst of pain. He doesn't have room in his mind to believe he can heal this on top of everything else. There's just too much all at once.

But this isn't right. Gamzee practically admitted he didn't fight head-on like this! Why the hell is he so strong?!

Well. If he actually wants to strife properly, who is Eridan to deny him? Snarling, Eridan lashes out blindly with a wave of white fire, trusting that Tav will know to get the fuck out of the way and that Gamzee will be too rage-stupid to see it coming.

And trust goes a long way when it comes to his power.

He only gets half of what he wants to happen, though; he peels his eyes open to glower at the two of them, cradling the massive pit of pain that his broken jaw has become in one hand as he sits heavily back on his knees. He misses Tavros, but that's because Gamzee somehow has the presence of mind to seize the brownblood around the waist and haul him out of the way before Tav can lose a wing. But after that Gam doesn't let go, even when Tavros starts yelling and battering at the arm that clutches him close to try and break loose. Gamzee's eyes are scary dilated, blown huge and dark in the center of all that red inflammation, and Eridan isn't entirely sure the purpleblood even realizes he's crushing Tavros with all the unrestrained coldblooded strength.

He's everything Eridan never was, lost in a true episode of coldblood dementia, and Eridan can only marvel at how unfathomably stupid the universe had to have been to drive a fuckin' Rage player that crazy.

...Or, worse still, maybe that was the point of the Rage, which is just - no. No, no, no. Fuck. He never thought he'd miss the old Gamzee, sopor-stupid and slow and infuriatingly passive in a world where the passive got trampled, but oh god he misses the old Gamzee shit shit shit.

"Gamzee, basta!" Tavros twists and squirms, and grabs Gamzee's club-swinging arm by the sleeve before he can bring it down again. It buys Eridan enough time to scuttle away, panting and dripping blood from his mouth as he heaves himself upright on the guard rail. "Bad! Very bad, Gamzee! You promised, no more clubs! Calladito!"

Gamzee responding roar is mostly unintelligible, and it sends another stab of pain through Eridan's head, his vision tunneling and warping as a mix of terror and rage washes over him. For a horrible moment, he's absolutely certain that Gamzee is just going to rip Tavros's head off and then do the same for Eridan, and parade their heads around as trophies until the rage dies down and he realizes what he's done.

Welp. "Sorry, Tav!" he yells, and he throws the last of his reserves into blasting Gamzee again. The dome is still there to draw on, but consciousness seems to object to all trauma his head has gone through lately.

He misses how Gamzee dodges that one; maybe he's just so far gone in the madness place, he weathers the feeble blast of fire without even moving. But a shadow looms overhead and Eridan bites the inside of his cheek, squinting up at the slouching, languid predator who squats to grab him by his hair and yank his face up. Tavros is splayed out on the road helplessly, but he crawls to hook another arm on Gamzee's. "Calladito," he tries again, in what is unmistakable a tone of tender pity, rubbing a thumb over Gamzee's widened eyes. "It's fine, Gamzee. He's not trying to hurt you anymore. Breathe, breathe. Respira."

"You would be pale for the insane clown," Eridan groans, and then he yelps as Gamzee abruptly releases his death grip on Eridan's hair. "Ow!"

"If you d-don't mind, it would be probably good if you sh-shut up," Tavros hisses, which is the most commanding Eridan has ever heard him be, in this life or the one previous. Then the brownblood goes back to shooshpapping Gamzee, who rocks back on his heels with a look of faint confusion and cocks his head to the side with an ear tilted toward Tavros's nonstop murmurs. Eridan sags backward, not quite out of range, but it's the best he can do.

Slowly, Gamzee's eyes stop burning red, and the huge black quarters of his eyes contract back into regular pupils. And fuckin' hell, Eridan is so on board with the moirallegiance party here. He takes back everything bad or sarcastic or even vaguely insulting he ever thought about Tav because this guy is a life saver. "And we'll go see the others first," he's promising, rubbing circles around Gamzee's hornbed. "Karkat and, uh - Aradia? And all the others. And tal vez cuando regresemos, Eridan estará en un mejor estado de ánimo."

He gets his name out of that, and nothing else. "Only telling him good things, right?" Eridan mumbles. The look Tavros throws at him is decidedly unamused - downright reproachful, even - and he decides to shut up again.

"We're g-going," Tavros says with conviction, his accent heavier than ever as he pats Gam on the back. "And you can g-go back in that th-thing and do whatever it is that you do, understand? Um, I don't really think y-you're the best influence right now."

"Tav. I agree so much. So fuckin' much, like, oh my god, you do not even comprehend how much." Eridan stands. Standing should not hurt so much. Gamzee shakes and shudders on his knees, curled up on himself, running his own claws through his hair, and Eridan wonders just how precariously this brief spate of sanity is balanced in his messed up head.

He doesn't want to be around to find out. Dealin' with Mal and Gamzee both in the space of one day is too much. He is a dictator-to-be here, not some kind of villain type. And Gamzee is officially outside the dome, so mission fuckin' well accomplished, now he can go home and celebrate surviving not one but two brands of crazy one right after the other.

"Eridan."

Eridan jabs a finger at Gam. "No. No. Absolutely not, you asshole. Whatever you want, no. I'm goin' home and you're not stopping me, dammit."

Gamzee stops clutching his own head and looks at Eridan, his eyes tired and haunted and still just a little bit hateful. "Game is still on," he says, reaching out and grabbing Tavros's claw absently to pull it away from his face. "Are you MOTHERFUCKING getting your hearing ducts open? Because it ain't safe, my Eribro. We're none of us safe alone. You already MOTHERFUCKING LOST IT ONCE. About how long do you get your reckon on until the gods get to whispering at you again?"

"Game," Eridan repeats. It's a little like being smacked with a door that has opened without warning. "Wait - you mean fucking Sgrub?" When Gamzee gives a jerking nod, Eridan groans. "Fuckin' perfect." He hadn't really bothered wondering why they all had these powers - why, if he thinks about it, all of Fef's previously miraculous powers were probably just Lifey things that she used without remembering why she had them.

But. Fuck. This is fuckin' huge, and he struggles to process it. "But we're not - we didn't do any a' that server and client nonsense," he protests, throwing up his claws. "Why is it all working here?"

"Motherfuckin' miracles," Gamzee says, laughing low in his throat. "Miracles, my friend." Then he rises to his feet, pulling Tavros up with him as he does until he settles the brownblood on a black-scorched shoulder. Tav clings there, looking vaguely terrified, but pouting with self-righteous indignation when he looks at Eridan. "Come with us? We can go get Karbro and Kansis and all our other wicked motherfucking brothers and sisters, and then we'll be safe."

It's tempting. For all of two seconds. Then Eridan snorts, and Gamzee blinks, perplexed. "One last time. I am statin' this for the fuckin' record, so as there'll be no more misunderstandings," Eridan snaps, his back straightening as his faith in himself starts to rekindle. "Fuck. All. Of you."

"But hermano -"

"Hell no. I'm not listen to this spiel. I will have you fuckin' know that I went through that entire game without a single one a' you inconsiderate asshoals coming to help me," he says, slipping into a fish pun in his anger before he can catch himself. "If anything, you all needed me, and you only started to wonder where I was when you needed me to help you take on the King."

"And while you were alone, they got in your head," Gamzee says vehemently, taking a step forward. Tav clamps down on his temple and massages it, but Eridan doesn't step back, just raises his chin to try and at least give the impression of looking down on a troll a foot taller than himself. "You don't know what you were MOTHERFUCKING LIKE when Karkat had to go drag you out of that motherfucking planet."

"Yeah well, already replayed that shitshow," Eridan says, gesturing at the dome behind them. "And I kicked the angels' ass on my own. Again. So piss off." He thinks about it. "If you do find Kar, tell him...I wouldn't be opposed to seeing him. You know. For old time's sake. But he's the only one! As far as this troll is concerned, all the rest of you can die in another goddamn meteor storm. I'm out."

He spins on his heel, determined to exit with a properly dramatic flair. He misses Mal's wings for a moment, but maybe when he's not straining to keep his hope from flagging, he'll be able to make himself a pair that aren't rooted in his spine and slick with white acid and tar. He almost stumbles and trips when he sees that, at some point, the three of them have attracted an audience with all their shenanigans; the vans that he spied further down the highway are now only forty feet away, each news van emblazoned with a logo on the side when the glint of cameras peer around the corners of buildings at a safe distance.

Well then. Conscious of the eyes on him now, Eridan's back straightens and he lifts his head high, sniffing disdainfully in their direction and tossing his hair as he snaps his fingers and rises up into the air.

He didn't need to snap. It just looks cool. He also concentrates until he starts glowing a little, the white flames of raw hope rippling over his arms as he turns away from Gamzee and Tavros and the watching eyes of the nation.

And then, in a blaze of power, he floats back into his city, and seals off the breach.
Elsewhere...

Clubs Deuce fidgets, and raises a hand.

"Don't you dare," his newest assistant says, smacking his hand away from the control panel.

He pouts.

"Absolutely not."

Clubs has never really understood why Diamonds insisted that Clubs's retinue include some of his people, except perhaps that it's his pitiable way of expressing a pale concern that he's just too embarrassed to express otherwise. Clubs tends to attribute a lot of Diamonds's stranger ideas to a combination of deep-seated devotion and equally deep-seated denial of said devotion.

This is the third time he has walked down this hallway in his life, and the long hallway leading from the elevator to the heart of the facility still gives his stubby legs a bit of a workout! When he came by earlier this week, at the request of the Boss, he had been brought up to speed on everything that this division does for the Crew, but he'd be the first to admit that he doesn't have much of a head for learning and remembering things the first time around. It falls under the Felt's jurisdiction, and he tries not to bother them too much.

The new assistant, Zahra Yavari, follows only a step behind him, the black and grey fabric of her hijab illuminated by the harsh yellow glow of the light strips set into the wall. She's not much taller than Clubs, which is obviously just another way Diamonds was being kind in his subtle way, making sure that Clubs wouldn't have to crank his neck up all the time to look up at one of his assistants. A lot of Diamonds's people are tall like him - that is to say, intimidatingly tall - but Yavari is five foot five of plump human female, and when she is not being a spoilsport, she plays a mean game of poker. When Clubs digs through his pockets, anxiously searching for the key card they need to enter the facility, she taps the left pocket of her suit with a significant look, and Clubs checks the same pocket on his own suit to find the card.

What a neat trick! She really is quite helpful! Diamonds is so nice to have leant her out to him while some of Clubs's old assistants are under review.

After Clubs boosts himself up on his toes to let the reader scan his iris, the door unlocks with a sharp chack and slides open so they can enter. Immediately, a twitching man in a felt green suit hurries up to them, his hat a brilliant daffodil yellow emblazoned with a one. He clasps his hands, rubbing and twisting them nervously in front of his chest as he bows his head to Clubs. "W-welcome, welcome back, Deuce," he chatters, speaking so quickly that his teeth clack and click harshly on each hard 'c' and skidding off the last syllable. "Apologies, Doze c-completely ignored the alert that told us when you entered the premises. It was inexcusable of him." He snorts sharply on that last word, rubbing a finger at the underside of his nose.

"Aw, no problem!" Clubs assures him, smiling encouragingly at the slower, heavyset man in the blue top hat who creeps up behind Itchy with a sheepish, sleepy expression on his corpulent face. Doze is so well known for his torpid demeanor and his tendency to nap on the job that he's practically a legend even outside of the Felt subdivisions of the Midnight Crew. "Ms Yavari and I could find our own way down alright, so no harm done! It was like an adventure!"

Yavari harrumphs and says nothing, scanning the walkway before them with a level gaze.

"Die wants us to escort you down to the training halls," Itchy explains, darting back along the walkway and whirling around when Clubs and Yavari don't follow at once, motioning impatiently with jerks of his slim boney hands. "C-come, come, come! Doze!" he snaps at the slower man, who blinks and sluggishly lumbers after him. "Everyone, follow me! This way!"

The sound of Itchy's snuffling and the occasional sharp sniff echo in the wide, empty space that surrounds the walkway. Clubs walks with a claw on each of the rails on either side, to be safe, and tries not to think about the steep drop to the indoor reservoir that lies forty feet below. One of the children here is very big on survivalist training, but Clubs can't really see why such a large swimming area would be necessary.

Something drips and splashes down below, and he leans over, trembling, in time to see the fin of a shark rise up above the water line, and then sink back down into the dark water with barely a ripple.

Oh. Right.

Itchy and Doze both have to swipe their cards and submit to iris scans before the inner door will open for them. Clubs doesn't really understand the necessity for all these extra security precautions - he just kind of accepts it when Diamonds and the Boss tell him they're necessary. Diamonds knows best, after all. It takes a moment for Itchy to cajole Doze into doing his part, jittering and snapping until the other human slides his card through the reader and pulls back his half-closed eyelid so the scanner will stop beeping out an error message.

So elaborate! Clubs is very impressed. The next hallway leads through the center of the complex, and they pass the clear Plexiglas wall that opens onto the cubical where one of these two Felt members is usually keeping watch on the only entrance and exit. The walls and floor are very white and Clubs doffs his wide-brimmed, floppy sun hat and clutches it to his chest as a faint decontamination mist sprays over them. Itchy spins on Yavari, clicking his tongue impatiently and cutting a hand at her head scarf, but the woman narrows her eyes at him and folds her arms, silent, until the Felt member wilts and scurries away toward the door, shoving Doze toward the entrance to the guard station.

Meanwhile, Clubs and Yavari continue to follow Itchy, who picks up the pace until he's practically loping down the corridor, hands spasming as he leads them past several closed doors until they reach an elevator that takes them all the way down to the lowest floor of the complex, skipping past all the boring old laboratories and testing rooms and heading down on the level where the reservoir is, along with the rest of the training areas. Clubs claps his hands together and bounces on his heels with excitement; the last time he'd visited, it had been all stiff and formal and the Scratches had been in the middle of routine checkups. This time maybe he'd get to see them training! That would be much more fun!

Itchy, bouncing on his heels for another reason entirely, chews with a vigor on his fingernails until the elevator door opens and he springs out, almost sprinting and twitching his way across the wide expanse of the indoor gym to the side that opens up right onto the reservoir. A troll in a felt green lab coat stands right at the edge of the mat-covered floor with his green hat resting by his feet, scribbling on a tablet as he squints at the surface of the water. His horns are as straight and thin as pins, and are tipped with blunted, round spheres of horn. "Di-di-die!" the assistant chatters, chafing and rubbing his hands again as he sidles up to the troll's side. He leans in close, maybe to whisper, but just ends up nervously laughing and squealing, "He's back."

The tablet pen snaps in the troll's hand. "Piekło ognia!" he shrieks at the ceiling, flinging the broken pieces of plastic out over the water.

Gosh. Die must still be in a bad mood, today! Clubs ducks his head, tapping his fingers together, and puts on his most apologetic, sympathetic look for when Die turns and shoves the tablet into Itchy’s tremor-wracked hands. The greenblood glowers at Clubs with ire in his single dark green eye, sneering as he adjusts the dull miniature telescope of the mechanical eye in his left eye socket by poking it until it collapses back into a regular shape. "Po co tu przyszłeś?"

Clubs doesn't understand a word he's saying. "Sorry, Die, I really don't-

"Why are you here, why have you come?!" Die says in tight, hissing English. "I do not have all day."

"Have?" Clubs repeats, blinking.

"Jestem zajęty!" Die stoops and snatches up his hat, viciously batting at some dust that Clubs can't see before jarring the much abused hat over his horns. "I am busy! Too busy to be dealing with you! Why heeeve you come?!"

He draws that last 'have' out with such force that Clubs doesn't have the heart to break it to the poor troll that he's still not saying it right. Die, as near as Clubs can tell, is the real guy in charge of this obscure branch of the Felt, while Itchy and Doze serve as his assistants and enforcers. There are other silent assistants, some of whom line the room even now, but none of them have the rank to wear the special hat of a full Felt member.

"Oh! Well, I was hoping that I would be able to come see how well they fight! I did tell you I wanted to come back, right?" he wonders aloud, tapping his chin. He can't rightly remember, and when he glances at Yavari for confirmation she just shrugs, because she wasn't there at all that day. D'oh!

"No, you did not! This is heeeighly inconven - inconvenient!" Die says, still scowling. He gestures at Yavari. "And what are you? His newest nanny?! Pah! Take him away!"

"A-a-a-actually, he did say that, sir," Itchy spits out, a high-pitched giggle bursting from his lips when Die turns his livid stare on the human. "It was near the end and you were kind of distracted. It's how we kn-knew to fetch him upstairs."

Clubs beams at Itchy for his help, puffing his chest out and smiling at Die as well when the other troll looks back at him with wild eyes.

"Ach!" Die throws up his hands, cross. "Fine! Fine!" He snaps his fingers sharply, and strides off, the coattails of his lab coat flaring out behind him. "You, come, maly kretyn! Come and observe my creations as they train!"

Clubs shakes his head ruefully and shrugs at Yavari, who just stares back at him without comment, and then Itchy starts hustling them after the Felt doctor across the mats. To the far right of the elevator they came down in, a lone girl practices in the center of a raised platform. Her skintight practice suit is black, her skin only a few shades lighter, but her goggles, shoes, and the enormous forkkind she plants in the middle of the dummy's chest are all a bright, eye-searing red. She twists the fork specibus around in a circle, gutting the poor unsuspecting thing, before yanking the specibus out and spinning it around as she falls back into a circling, cautious pace.

"Look. Behold," Die says flatly, waving a hand in the girl's direction. "Have you seen enough? May we move on so that I may return to werk?!"

Clubs blinks at the girl blankly, trying to remember a name even as she continues to attack the dummy's weak points. Oh dear… "Shucks, you should know by now I don't have much of a head for names and all that," Clubs says, hanging his head. "I'm sorry. You don't mind…repeating everything, do you?"
Yavari pinches the bridge of her prominent nose. Die lets out a shriek like an elephant in severe distress. "Why has Droog cię jeszcze nie zabił?" he hisses, but he turns and gestures at the human girl again anyway, with even more dramatic flair. "That is the JC-1996! My greatest work!"

"Berzerker," Itchy hisses in a loud, wheezing whisper, eyes darting from side to side as he grins toothily, teeth clacking on the 'k.' And oh dear, Clubs actually remembers what happened last time -

"I will not abide those ridiculous nicknames in my lab!" Die shouts, walloping Itchy upside the head with a rolled up newspaper. "Not when I am free of that horrific failure for the first time in years! You will stop!"

"Stop," Clubs corrects automatically.

"I most certainly will not!"

Berzerker freezes mid stab at the sound of her name - either the string of numbers or the nickname; it's impossible to tell which - and turns with a precise motion to look at them with icy blue eyes. Clubs shivers when those eyes sweep over him, flat and dispassionate, as though assessing him and finding him insignificant, while she directs her attention to Die and waits for orders.

He remembers now that this was the one that scared him the most, even though he couldn't remember the string of letters and numbers that Die seemed to really like. Her hair is cropped close to her skull, shaved in an undercut on one side with the rest of her short black waves flipped across in a perfect coif. She's curvier than Zahra and only a little taller, and unlike Zahra's purposely modest suit, her bodysuit hugs her skin, making it clear that it's mostly muscle and little else. Her silence is intimidating.

He waves at her anyway, smiling encouragingly. She stares at him again, deadpan, until he cowers a little and lets the smile drop, and then she rolls her head to look at Die. The doctor motions at her impatiently. "I did not order you to stop! Kontynuuj! Demonstrate for this głupi what you are capable of!"

Berzerker doesn't look away from them. She twirls the forkkind around in her hand, clamps down on it with a fist, and stabs behind her with utter precision. The weapon buries itself in the dummy's face, and only then does she spin around herself, one smooth movement that brutally tears the fork out and takes a chunk of the target out with it. She starts dismembering the poor thing, and Clubs becomes uncomfortable enough that he has to remind himself that the poor dummy is not alive. Diamonds would scold him for being too sensitive, but his own attempt to recreate Diamonds's usual reprimand doesn't have much effect.

He still has to look away before too long, sheepishly patting Yavari on the arm. She doesn't look upset, really, but he is used to dealing with people who don't like to admit they need comfort. His son, for instance, is absolutely awful about it, but he's still going through those pupation stages when young trolls become rebellious and sarcastic, and Clubs is sure Sollux will outgrow it eventually.

"Total obedience. She is a killing machine. This is enough for you?!!" Die demands, and Clubs nods, even as Yavari discreetly edges away from him and looks at her sleeve, nostrils flaring. "Good! Dobrze! The next!" And Itchy speeds them along when Die explodes off in a cloud of muttered Polish that Clubs can't understand. The yellow-hatted Felt member snuffles again as he giggles at a high-pitch and casts several terrified glances at the girl they leave behind. Clubs is just glad he's not the only one intimidated by the people Die has been molding down here in the lab.

The next Scratch is off in a room set off to one side of the main gym, surrounded by a group of dummies and sectioned off with a wall of more Plexiglas that is covered in scores and chips and long scrapes. Perhaps it's there more for the protection of any observers than for the sake of keeping them out.

This one's black suit cuts off at the arms, exposing his shoulders and arms, and the torso and legs are lined with yellow-orange strips down the front and seams. Most of his sandy blond hair rakes backward, but a few flyaway, choppy bangs cut across his forehead at an angle, and his sideburns are worthy of a standing ovation. He doesn't appear to be moving at all, but several slices open up along the dummies' sides regardless, and it is a testament to his speed that Clubs can't see the bladekind, but he can hear the faint hum of the sword whipping through the air even through the glass. It really does look like he's just standing in one place, his arms loose at his sides and his taut muscles totally relaxed.

Then the head of a dummy flies off at a sharp angle and ricochets off the wall.

"DS-2409," Die says gruffly. Clubs wonders what always gets the troll in such a grump.

The Scratch slides the sword into the sheath across his back and tilts his head ever so slightly, just enough that light glints off his tinted lenses. Clubs remembers his eyes are a wild, hawk orange-yellow from the last time he saw all four of the Scratches in a room together.

He snaps his claws a few times, as the name jumps back into his mind. Perhaps he's retained a little after all! Won't Diamonds be so proud? "Cogitator! I remember that one!"

For some reason, that only seems to make Die more disconsolate. "Those are not their code names!" he screams at the ceiling, but Clubs looks up and can't see anyone up there, so he can't imagine who Die is talking to. Itchy wheezes with laughter, and Yavari coughs into her hand.

"Nn?" Cogitator grunts, staring at them almost as expressionlessly as Berzerker. But his self-control is more brittle than the girl's, his shoulders tightening with obvious unease even while his face remains concealed. "Yeah?"

Die checks a monitor set into the wall beside the door, waving a hand absently. "Doskonałej pracy. You are doing well. Carry on."

The boy hesitates before going back to his training, a muscle in his jaw twitching, but Clubs doesn't think Die notices the pause, caught up in whatever read outs the computer monitor is giving him. By the time the Felt doctor looks up, irritable and muttering to himself, Cogitator has gone back to work. "He is precise, if not as physically powerful as JC-1996," Die says, though Clubs is privately of the opinion that just as many limbs go flying under Cogitator's steely gaze as they did under Berzerker's cold eyes. "And compliant. For the most part. Aside from te przeklęte pseudonimy… It would seem we still need to work out some kinks there, if even these are both so easily distracted. Not that you would understand why such a thing is important," he spits in Clubs's direction.

"Not really! But I'm trying my best!" Clubs reassures him, and Die stabs a claw through the computer's touch screen with a despairing wail. It seems like it's an accident, because when Die realizes what he's done he growls and yanks the offending claw free, shoving past Itchy to stalk back toward the water's edge.

Before Clubs can start to trot after the doctor, a series of beeps chime out from Itchy's side, and the man leaps nearly a foot in the air, giggling and trembling as he tucks Die's tablet under his arm and shakily pulls a walkie talkie from the inner pocket of his green suit. "Y-y-yeah, Doze?" A series of slow, ponderous grunts that might have been words emerge from the walkie talkie, and Itchy nods in double-time as though they make perfect sense to him. "Yeah yeah yeah, be right up. Hurry up and go to the first door already! Ugh! I'll be there lickety split!" He jams the walkie talkie back into the pocket, tense and jittery as he sprints over to Die and whisper-shouts in his ear. "Gotta go! She's back!"

Die rips his tablet back out from under Itchy's arm with a furious sigh. "Mój Boże, zachować mnie od idiotów. Droog could not have just...kept it?" he demands, even as Clubs and Yavari catch up. "Fine. Better it be here, where no one else can pay witness to its inanities. Perhaps this time we can tweak its settings into something resembling compliance."

"Yessir!" Itchy streaks off toward the elevator, and Clubs starts to follow him on instinct. Yavari grabs him by the back of the collar and swings him back around toward Die before he can do more than raise a foot. Well, she probably knows best, anyway! Diamonds would only send the very best of assistants. He knows how Clubs can get a little distracted at times.

"Who is he going to get?" Clubs asks brightly, looking back at the elevator a few times as Die laboriously attempts to use his tablet without a pen, tracing over a schematic a few times with a claw until he seems to be satisfied with the result.

Die sighs again. "If you cannot deduce it, there is no hope for you anyway," he says, which…doesn't really seem to answer the question, but Clubs ducks his head and nods as though it does, just in case.

But also, there are supposed to be two more Scratches! He remembers them, distinctly! Clubs rubs the back of one leg with the toe claws of the other, a move Diamonds has snapped at him for more than once because it is not dignified, but as the minutes trickle away and Die acts for all the world as though Clubs and Yavari have already left, he becomes more anxious, fiddling with the floppy brim of his hat and the loose thread around the clubs symbol Diamonds helped him sew onto his lapel.

"...Should we go?" he whispers to Yavari at last.

"Czy możesz, proszę?" Die says fervently.

Yavari stares out over the water, her dark eyes unreadable as she completely ignores the question. Clubs looks out at the water as well, but can't make out anything beyond the circle of light cast by the gym's overhead lamps; even within that circle he can't see anything beneath the surface. Everything else out there is dark, though the water seems surprisingly choppy for an indoor reservoir. Maybe it's the sharks?

An enormous gurgle echoes through the cavernous space; a splash of water fountains up in the center of the dark waves, and then something huge and pale, pasty grey explodes out from beneath the surface, spinning through the air until it impacts the opposite wall of the reservoir with a dull, meaty thwack. Clubs's mouth drops as he watches the shark flop back down into the water, stunned.

"Ha! Take that, you confounded cur!" someone crows from the water, but even when Clubs squints, he can't make out who. There is another splash, and then, "Oh, botheration! We have company? Doctor Die, why didn't you tell me?"

"Because I wish it were not so," Die says, grim. "Regardless, JE-1993, you have completed the course?"

"Indeed I have! Be out in a moment!"

When the boy emerges from the water, heaving himself up on the side and chuckling as one of the silent Felt members hands him a towel, Clubs starts to remember more about this Scratch. His goggles have rectangular lenses, and the eyes behind them are mischievous and bright green. He's burlier than the other boy, rugged and broad in the shoulders, and walks with a pronounced swagger as he rubs a towel over his dark hair. The only spot of color on the black is the dark green of his utility belt. His body suit is even more cropped than Cogitator's, exposing upper arms and powerful thighs.

It almost resembles booty shorts…but surely that can't be practical -

"Back again so soon, Mr Deuce?" he drawls, a note of amusement in his voice. His accent is more obviously fake now; Clubs isn't good at noticing that kind of thing, but he knows enough that it's obviously an accent the boy taught himself rather than one that was learned naturally: posh and educated, but sprinkled with non sequiturs and slang that don't quite match up, as though he learned his vowels from Oxford but learned to trip fast over 't's from someone in the East End of London, with the vocabulary of someone from the American South in the early 1910s. It's...perplexing.

"Ah, yes! What were you doing in the water?" Clubs asks, pressing his cheeks and glancing behind the boy at the shark, which seems to have lost the will to move.

"Oh, I punched a shark in the nose. Always gets the day off to a rousing start!" he says jovially, leaving the towel looped around his neck as he stretches one of his arms across his chest. "Did I not do an absolutely sensational job, Doctor Die?"

"Adequate," Die corrects, sniffing. "As you can see, Clubs, JE-1993 is not quite...doskonaly. There are still behavioral inconsistencies which require recalibration.

"Oh, Doctor, you always say the most spurious things," the boy laughs, slapping the doctor on the arm good-naturedly. The blow has enough force that Die stumbles and barely regains his footing, scowling disgruntledly at the Scratch. "Land's sakes alive, what does it take to impress you, old chap??"

"Less. Talking," Die says through gritted teeth.

"What is your code name again?" Clubs asks the boy. Behind him, Yavari makes a strange shushing noise, but he can't imagine who she would be attempting to hush at a time like this. "Starts with a B, but I'm drawing a blank after that."

"There are no other code names. I will not allow it!" Die screams.

"I understand completely, sir. My noggin isn't the steel trap it once was, either," the Scratch says, ignoring Die's outburst and tapping the side of his head. "If we just so happen to be speaking of the code names which are not to be spoken of, my nickname would be Bolter - or some such, if, you know, we had code names. Which we do not," he hastens to add when Die turns a rather remarkable shade of avocado green. "Okey dokey. I think I should hop back in the pond, now."

"The infernal creature is not even present and it is leading to discrepancies." Die adds another vicious note to the chart on his tablet. "And to think, the Boss wanted us to attempt to field test you impossible creatures -"

"They seem very nice to me!" Clubs protests, fiddling with his lapel again. "I don't think I could punch a shark! That's very impressive! Even Diamonds would say he was impressed, I can tell!"

"Punching sharks," Die says, sounding near tears. "Do not remind me. Do not even speak of it to me."

"Well, isn't that just crackerjack!" Bolter exclaims, his boyish grin widening even further as he folds his arms. "See, Doctor Die, you just need to have more of a sense of adventure, like the good Mr Deuce here! Going a round of fisticuffs with a shark is an excellent way to train!"
"He obeys orders well enough. Almost over-zealously, one could say," Die says. He is rubbing his temple with a hand, looking ready to snap another piece of equipment. Clubs would almost be tempted to try and soothe the beleaguered troll, were it not for his prior commitment to Diamonds. "I do not know why he is so chatty. But he functions well in combat, so make of him what you will. The fourth is the only real problem if you wish to report back to the Boss on their readiness for field werk."

"Work," Clubs says automatically.

The tablet, as it turns out, soars like a Frisbee when Die flings it. As it flies past her head, the Berzerker's hand shoots out and she deftly catches the machine, inspecting it for a moment with a complete lack of curiosity before handing it off to a Felt attendant so she can resume her relentless training. "Droog will zabierze cię do domu w kawałkach," Die vows, stepping toward Clubs. Clubs doesn't rightly understand what the troll just said, but he finds himself shoved back abruptly by a hand on his shoulder as Yavari places herself between him and the Felt doctor, one hand dipping into the pocket of her loose pants. More confusing still, Bolter drops his hand to his side as though reaching for a specibus that isn't there, and snaps it back into a fist as he falls into a fighting stance, eyes locked on Clubs with sudden detachment. Everyone is being so confusing, and Clubs opens his mouth to tell them so.

"Aiiiiiiii, babbus! Mama is home!"

Bolter blinks. Die sinks back, letting out a groan of deep, abiding existential despair. Clubs squirms around in Yavari's restraining grip to look back at the opening elevator doors.

The fourth member of the Scratches traipses in, and of course he remembers this one - Ranger! She would be difficult to forget! Her blonde hair bobs as she trips and darts toward Berzerker, tossing her arms around the other girl without regard for the fact that the other Scratch is in the middle of disemboweling a new dummy. "Jaaanney!" she singsongs, papping the girl on the face. "Hella rad, stabbing things! I'm approving so hard!" Then she squeezes Berzerker tightly, and lets the girl go, blowing a sloppy kiss as she steps out of range.

Berzerker doesn't really react, except to pause in her training, and restart it the moment Ranger whirls to beam in their direction. "Jaaaaaake!" she exclaims, bounding forward. "C'mere and give Mama Ranger some of that beefcake, you friggin' tall drink of water!" Itchy is only just now stepping out of the elevator as Ranger sprints across the gym floor, which is a testament to how fast the girl can move, despite her tipsy demeanor.

All of the danger vanishes from Bolter's posture as he strides forward to meet her, catching her with ease when she tackles him in a running hug, swinging her around as she knocks her forehead against his. "Oooh! It's been too long! I missed you all!"

"Good gravy, Ro, you were only gone for a few days! Is the outside world truly that hair-raising?" Bolter laughs.

Ranger flips her hair. "Solo missions are noooot for this girlie," she says, sniffing. "Talk about a snooze-fest! No one would even talk to me!" She taps the small of his back with the feet she's wrapped around his hip. "Now! Where is mah Di-Stri?! Where is my precocious - no, sorry, precious, that's the one - precious Cogs?!"

"Here." Clubs does not remember seeing Cogitator walk over. He is, quite simply, there, and Ranger lets out a squeal of irrepressible delight as she jumps off Bolter and grabs the other boy around the neck, rubbing her cheek against his own. The two are exactly the same height, but where Cogitator has been toned and molded into a taut swordsman's body, Ranger still has a gangly, half-finished look to her, as though she still needs to grow into her bones.

"All my babbus together again," she sighs contentedly, dragging Cogitator down to scrunch the top of his head with a noogie. He seems to be letting her do it, resigned.

Only then does she spy Clubs. "Ohhwwhhhhooaa, hold up!" She lets go of Cogitator and her mouth pops open. She elbows the Scratch boy when he smoothly straightens up, and then punches him hard in the shoulder with a closed fist, never taking her eyes off Clubs. "Why didn't you guys tell me the cool little guy was back?"

Compared to every other Scratch kid, her energy radiates off her in palpable waves, a kind of boundless enthusiasm that makes Clubs beam at her. As though that's an invitation, the girl stumbles forward and clasps his hands, smiling right back through heavy, smudged lipstick, her mask slightly askew now that he sees it up close. "Heyyy, Mr Clubs Guy! You came back to visit us?"

"I did!" Clubs agrees, laughing and shaking her hands vigorously. "Hello to you too!"

"W-wow. Only three minutes! That's a n-new record," Itchy says, teeth chattering as he waves a jittery hand in front of Die's frozen mask of horror. The greenblooded troll seems to have become stuck, for whatever reason. It seems a little unprofessional, in Clubs's humble opinion! "I think you broke him good!" Itchy's smile is more than a little malicious.

A faint whine, like steam escaping from a leaking pipe, begins to emanate from Die's mouth.

"…You alright there, Die?" Clubs asks kindly.

"You heve returned," Die says at last, unable to take his increasingly furious stare away from Ranger. "Even more desynchronized than ever before. Dlaczego mnie nie dziwi?"

Ranger wilts, her smile fading as Die advances to smack at her hands until she lets go of Clubs. A protest bubbles up in Clubs's throat, because it's all fine with him, but Yavari tightens her grip on his shoulder until it is painful, and he knows that this is something Diamonds wouldn't want him to harp on about.

Ranger kicks her toe at the mat, head ducked. "Is this about the code name thing? Because lemme tell you, sir, it's not that big a deal, it's just that RL-2408 doesn't have the same ring to it."

"It is a perfectly acceptable code name," Die hisses, eyes flashing. "This disobedience is an embarrassment to the work this facility does, and you will desist, even if I must crack open your skull and adjust the settings myself."

"C'mon, not again! Even Janey likes them, and Janey doesn't like anything anymore!" Ranger says defensively, gesturing in the other female Scratch's direction. She laughs gaily, hiccupping a little, and turns a wild grin toward the other girl. "Right, Janey? You like Berzerker, right?"

They all look at Berzerker.

Berzerker doesn't so much as blink under all the scrutiny. Then she shrugs. "…Eh."

"All of you, back to weeerk!" Die screams. Berzerker turns back to her target with a small shrug, Cogitator vanishes again and reappears in the closed off room, and Bolter jolts as though someone has shocked him, touching his head as though in pain, but nods and jogs off obediently toward a firing range. "Not you!" Die then adds, seizing Ranger by the wrist, hard enough to bruise. "You will be undergoing review immediately."
"Bleurggh!" Ranger says, sticking out her tongue and pouting.

"I apologize that you have been forced to witness this, Deuce," Die says through gritted teeth. "These names have become a point of unreasonable contention. They were on their best behavior last time, but it appears that they are still too rough and unfinished to be trusted to act professionally on a consistent basis. Ignoruj ich."

"I don't know what you mean," Clubs replies, puzzled. "I like the nicknames! They're fun!"

Die tears off his hat and begins stomping it vigorously, keening with incandescent rage.

Diamonds would so not approve.

The elevator ride is incredibly awkward. Die shoves them all in at once, muttering in Polish and yanking Ranger around by the wrist so brusquely that Clubs feels sorry for the girl. When they reach one of the floors between the gym and the exit floor, perhaps the same one Clubs visited last time - they all look so much alike - Die frog marches Ranger out in front of him. She tugs her arm free, looking wounded, and heads down the hall of her own accord, apparently familiar with their destination already.

Clubs steps out of the elevator too. Possibly he's not supposed to do that; Yavari gives a hoarse shout as the elevator door slides shut behind him, and Die lets out a bloodcurdling shriek of rage when he sees Clubs has joined him.

Oops. "Oh dear," Clubs says, apologetic, watching as the set of numbers over the elevator start to count down while Yavari rides back up to the top floor without him. "I'm sorry, I thought we were all going along -"

"I want you out of my facility! Why is this so hard to understand?! This is my division and you will get out and go back to whatever stupidities your division deals with -"

Ranger raises a hand and opens her mouth, but Die whirls on her before she can start to say anything. "Nie! Get to your room. I will deal with you shortly!"

"Okay, jeez! Don't even get a please, do I?" Ranger pouts, tugging her mask off her eyes at last and letting it hang around her neck, revealing a face full of angular features that, like of the rest of her, she has yet to adjust to - as though puberty caught her by surprise late in the game, and she isn't sure whether she's pretty or not in the aftermath. "I'm going, I'm going!" she drawls when Die bares his fangs at her, sauntering down the hall and silently counting off the doors on the left with an exaggerated bounce of her finger.

"Now you. Get out," Die orders, turning to herd Clubs back toward the elevator. However, just as Ranger yanks open a door and pretends to swoon dramatically back into the room beyond - which makes Clubs giggle - another door slams open closer to the elevator. "No, out!" Die repeats emphatically, but then Clubs blinks and neatly ducks under Die's outstretched arms. The other troll is tall enough that Clubs has the advantage, there, and then Clubs lifts his head and pushes back the brim of his hat in time to see his three assistants spilling out into the corridor.

Petran Osolst, giant robot mechanic, claws at the wall to support herself, the yellows of her cerulean eyes shot through with a feral, reddened tinge. A ring of thin white bandages wrap around her head like a crown, and it appears as though some of the hair has been shaved from her head. "Clubs!" she growls hoarsely, yanking an arm free of the two people attempting to hold her back. "I know your "Petran! Petran, stop it! You need to lie down!" Lila Moreau has one arm in a sling, but that doesn't stop her from grimly hauling Petran back. Quinn Buckley is not far behind them, the only one not in bandages as he jogs down the corridor and helps Moreau restrain Petran's unreasonable outburst.
"You're not well yet!"

Up until a few days ago, when Clubs had sent the three along ahead of him to continue the job while he was called back to base, they had been the three assistants he most liked, and the three most involved in the witch caper. He doesn't have the extensive network that Diamonds uses for his inscrutable ends, or the veritable army of thugs that Hearts and some of the Felt can draw on at will, so Clubs likes to think that his relationship with his helpers is a lot more personable. Moreau is excellent with gadgetry and computers and such, and always helped him with arranging business like ordering suborbital missile strikes, which often involved Felt paperwork that made his poor head spin. Quinn, on the other hand, had been one of the first people Diamonds had loaned out to Clubs, a laidback enforcer who didn't seem to meet Diamonds's exacting standards for his personnel corps, but who had a keen eye for finding ways out of a spot of trouble.

Then, in the middle of his visit to Die's facility earlier this week, Clubs had received an email first from the Boss himself, informing him that the three assistants would be off-duty for a while due to some kind of breakdown caused by the spacey witch, and then a series of rapid-fire messages from Diamonds directing him to take on Yavari 'for everyone's sake' and to not worry about the missing three. He never received their final reports, either. But he'd tried not to worry when Diamonds told him not to.

Now, all three of them are in heavy cloth hospital gowns and pants, the same kind that all four Scratch kids had been gussied up in during that first visit. Clubs steps forward, confusion searing through him, because why would they be here? Why on earth would they be in a facility dedicated to training Crew members like the Scratches for special operations? Internal reviews were supposed to take place back at base, and if both Petran and Moreau are hurt, they should be in a hospital, first and foremost! He starts to puff up, turning to give Die a stern lecture for whatever he could have done to pull some of Clubs's friends away from medical attention.

"Niewiarygodne!" The Felt doctor shakes his head, his battered hat sagging over on one horn. "So much work still to be done. You two! Take her back to the pre-op room or you will be joining her on the table for round two!"

"Yes. Of course," Quinn says, his voice tight, and he loops an arm around Petran's waist. She manages to graze Moreau's face with a claw when the human throws her over his shoulder, but Moreau doesn't flinch, casting a glance back at Clubs and nodding gravely before following Quinn and Petran.

Clubs trots after them. Petran is shouting something about propulsion systems and stress on hydraulic pistons, which sounds a lot more like the giant robot expert that Clubs has always known, but then she screams, "And that laser came out of my salary, you thieving space bitch!" and then he completely loses all sense of what seems to have upset her so much. But if it concerns his people, it concerns him, surely!

"Leave it," Die says coldly, shouldering his way in front of Clubs. "This is none of your business."

"They're my assistants!" Clubs says, frowning. "Of course it is my business! Why are they even here?"
"Because the troll has deviated so far that she's flipped," Die says. "She will be rehabilitated shortly, if you would be kind enough to get out of my laboratory!"

Clubs is already shaking his head before Die finishes, patting at his pockets and searching for the item he knows he stashed there...though that was a while ago... "I don't think that would be a good idea. They shouldn't be here. They should be at an internal review," he says with utter certainty. There are rules about this kind of thing. He's not so good at remembering them all the time, but he knows this one.

"This is the internal review!" Die insists.

Oh, no. They're going to have an incident, aren't they?

"Oh! Here it is!" Clubs pulls the card out of his pocket. It is the ace of clubs, and when he flicks it in his claws just the way Diamonds helped him master, it becomes a crook of felony. "Now I don't want to cause any trouble," he says, when Die stumbles away from him, sputtering. "But also I'm fairly certain that internal reviews take place at the base! So! I think you're a liiiiiiar!"

"And it would appear that you have forgotten where your loyalties should lie, if you would draw a weapon on me in my domain!" Die snaps, drawing back and digging into the deep pockets of his green lab coat. "You uncouth Crew ruffian! We Felt do nothing that the Boss has not approved of. Or do you not trust that I am doing my job?"

Actually, Diamonds has repeatedly informed Clubs that the Felt are not to be trusted at all. Diamonds can be a little silly about his paranoia, but he'd also taught Clubs a really fun rhyme that went something like 'when hunting the Felt, play the cards that you're dealt,' which had made more sense at the time when the Felt were their rivals and not their friends. Of course, they'd all been carapacians back then, and everyone had been able to use the cards to hide their weapons, and Diamonds hadn't been so mad at Spades all the time. Fun times, even if no one else seems to rightly remember them!

What he's trying to say is - "Nope! This has been fun, and your Scratches seem really nice, but also you should probably give me my people back. Right now." He locates another card in his pocket, the jack of diamonds, and reverently switches out his floppy hat for the old, tattered black backup hat he always wears on serious business. If things are about to get feisty, he needs to be prepared!

Die pulls out something from his pocket, backing out of range of Clubs's crook. "Hmph. Well. Perhaps this time, the Boss will be more open to my suggestions. I knew we could not trust Crew to remain loyal with such minimal recalibration."

If it's the doll, Clubs might be in trouble. He doesn't want to just whack Die for no reason, though! Oooh, this is difficult. He wishes Diamonds or Hearts or Spades were here! They always knew what to do. The most he can bring himself to do is to frown and brandish the crook. "We really don't have to fight. Just let me take my assistants to their actual review! I don't think that they should be blowing it off like this. It doesn't seem right."

Die looks at him with strange pity. This is rather awkward, because Clubs is not interested in his pity in the slightest. Then he holds up the object, which is not a voodoo doll but a black, chunky remote, with three large buttons. "They cannot be allowed to leave. And neither, it seems, can you."

And with that, the Felt doctor hits one of the buttons with his thumb.

The pain is immediate. "O-oh!" Clubs says, startled, dropping his crook and watching the clubkind clatter to the floor as he reaches up to stem the gouts of muddy brown blood pouring out of his nose. Then he feels warm wetness running down from the corner of each eye, and something wet trickling through his ears, and he falls to his knees. "That hurts," he protests, pawing at his nose. Bright, stabbing pangs of agony pulse through his skull and make his horns ache, rattling him through his skull. It feels as though something is chewing on his brain, from the inside out, and it hurts it hurts it hurts -

"An emergency shut down," Die says, but he sounds far away through the liquid clogging up Clubs's ears. "Yes, prep him, as well. Być może tym razem szef pozwoli mi dokończyć…"

He doesn’t remember falling onto his side, and curling up into a ball. The pain seems to be getting worse, and oh dear. Perhaps he should have thought that Die wouldn't need a doll to hurt someone, anymore. A lot of things have changed, and sometimes it's hard for Clubs to keep track of all the differences in his poor head.

But he looks up through bleary eyes, and can't focus on Die as the doctor looms overhead. So he casts his gaze beyond that, past the closed door where his assistants have vanished, to the door at the far end of the hall, which has cracked open so that the human girl crouching on the floor can peer at him with horror in her bright pink eyes.

Diamonds is going to be so cross with him.

06: Lekarz Scratch?
...Clubs. Oh dear. You have been busy, Dienek.
06: He became drażliwy when he saw that his subordinates were present here in the recalibration ward. And of course, he is one of those you insisted would not accept the mindgrub process as necessary.
06: Of all of these Crew members you insist on us working with, he has been the most difficult to predict the behavior patterns of. Allow me to correct this.
If you must.
06: Really?
I fail to understand why you continue to express such unwarranted surprise when I acquiesce to your more trifling requests.
06: It is just that you seemed adamant that the suit members be left to their own devices. You would be surprised. Most of the time, it is simpler for a charming, omniscient being like myself to settle down and observe as the freely chosen actions of those around me inevitably play into my hands.
Your interference in the mind of Clubs Deuce will have no true impact on the course of events that I can foresee.
And I can see quite a lot.
So, carry on.
06: It would be my pleasure, Boss.
I'm sure Droog will be pleased by this, if nothing else. Clubs has not been subtle in courting her.
06: You are sure? The Lady Droog is not one I would wish to anger. She may disdain jejó żenujące flirty, but she has never denied it, either. And she of all the Crew will recognize the signs.
Droog is quite occupied with the other tasks I have assigned to her. Never fear, though. If she takes offense at your meddling, it occurs only in a timeline which my remarkable powers of prognostication cannot penetrate, and thus is so unlikely a possibility as to be nonexistent.
06: Then I shall proceed. Let me see what I can do to make Clubs Deuce more…
06: Compliant.

Later...

Ruth Agrona Cohen regrets ever moving to Los Angeles. It's been three years of smog, daily two hour commutes in bumper-to-bumper traffic, and enduring the higher than average rate of villain encounters that come of living in a city with a population over three million.

And now this.

Admittedly, she's never lost an arm to morning traffic, so that's a new experience. At the time, the pain had been overwhelming; so overwhelming, in fact, that all she can really remember of it now is a sharp, hot agony, and then being lost in a daze of pain and shock. She can't remember how she got away - can't even imagine how she would have staggered away on her hand and knees with blood pouring everything. But when she came to her senses, her arm was a cauterized stump, her knees rubbed raw and bloody from crawling over broken pavement, and she'd somehow managed to escape the twisted, writhing thing that had dragged her down out of her apartment in the first place.

Three days pass, and only then does she acknowledge that maybe she didn't escape. Maybe the monsters really are gone. She and the little girl whom she is currently hiding with still cower when the shadow of wings sweep overhead on their way to loot the local supermarket, but the angels no longer seem inclined to swoop down and carry off easy prey. They simply watch, and soar, and wait. She doesn't know what they're waiting for. It's been three days since the dying stopped, three days since the mutated things and the acid that flooded the streets shriveled up and died, but the angels remain, and they wait, and Ruth finds herself waiting with them.

Waiting for the other shoe to drop.

Other people are starting to emerge, too. In the chaos and confusion of the Prince's attack, it had seemed like everyone Ruth saw was dead or dying or in agony, but other people hid. Some of them got caught, like she did - that would certainly explain the man who hobbles into their supermarket on a single battered crutch, his left leg missing at the knee and half of his face melted into slag. He startles when he sees the two girls, clutching his case of water bottles awkwardly under his good arm and turning sheet white, but Ruth ducks her head, pushes the little girl's head down, too, and they hurry by without bothering him. He seems to take the hint, and the clack of his crutch vanishes into the distance.

The little girl never says anything. Ruth uses her as an extra set of arms, shoving canned soups and vegetables and crackers at her, but she doesn't even knows the girl's name. All she knows is that the girl came through the reign of terror completely unscathed; there isn't a single mark on her, that Ruth has seen, and all of her limbs and features and horns are intact.

Ruth'd call it a miracle, but three years of Los Angeles and now this have somewhat withered her faith. She fills up a second hand basket with the last of the antibiotics on the picked over pharmacy shelves, covers them up with a layer of toilet paper because they've already been attacked over medicine once, and then starts hustling the little girl towards the shattered doors, and down the street into the Castles.

If there were supermarkets and other stores in the area before - and there were, because Ruth has lived in the area long enough to know where each and every Starbucks was located - all of the stores and their contents disappeared when nearly half the downtown area was converted into black and white. Not many other people are willing to hide out here after everything that went down, but the remade castles are remarkably structurally sound, and certainly in much better shape than the rest of downtown, which makes it perfect for hiding out in. The gargoyles that soar overhead resemble the angels in the sky a little too closely for Ruth's liking, but she shudders and touches a hand to the twist lump of her arm, and keeps going, her dreadlocks swinging. Twice a patrolling angel shadows them, only to veer off just as Ruth's heart starts pounding in terror.

The little girl doesn't seem to notice the danger. She just stares up at the winged lizard things serenely, her brilliant cobalt blue eyes luminescent beneath her shaggy bangs. Ruth has to steer her into covered archways for safety by looping her remaining arm around her neck, her short, curving horns jabbing into Ruth's side all the while.

They stay in the covered courtyard where Ruth first found refuge three days ago, wedged between the creepy cathedral on the left and yet another one of the castles. Two trolls had been blowing up entire buildings near the edge of the dome, and when she had to break cover one of them had glowered and ordered her to get out of the way. She'd found the little girl in this courtyard, unharmed and unmoving in the middle of the room despite the explosions that rocked the castles around them, and Ruth had seized the girl and tucked them both into a corner in the darkness until the fighting stopped.

Now they keep the blankets in that corner. It's pitch black in this particular courtyard, though others are lit by luminescent strips of white light, and Ruth turns on the battery-powered lantern to bury the cans of food under the blankets. Los Angeles was never a nice city, despite the best efforts of that fuchsiablood girl and the Lady Cascade, and she figures it's only a matter of time before people stop looting stores and start looting each other. People mutter about a hole opening up in the dome, about the whole thing shedding its skin like a cocoon to reveal this new, gleaming white variation that lights up the sky day and night, but Ruth has seen no sign of it, and she grows more cynical by the day.

She doesn't think they're getting out of here.

An angel screeches mournfully overhead, audible even through the roof, and Ruth cowers. But the next screech startuples her even more badly, and then suddenly the courtyard echoes with a chorus of shrieks and chimes, like someone has taken a wind chime and started smashing it against the side of a metal pole. She drops the handbasket and blindly swings out to grab the little girl and drag her under the blankets. She forgets, as she often does, that her hand on that arm is gone, and misses the girl completely. Frantic, Ruth swing around, eyes straining in the awful yellow light of the dying lantern, and only just catches a brief glimpse of blue eyes glittering in the dark before the little girl steps out of the circle of light, her tiny footsteps tapping just loud enough to be heard over the screaming.

"You can't go out there!" Ruth yells hoarsely, scrambling to her feet. She knocks the lantern over and it rolls away, so she fumbles blindly after the little girl. Her tiny silhouette appears in the illuminated archways ahead of Ruth, giving her something to aim for, but the little girl steps out onto the street before Ruth can drag her back in. She doesn't know what is upsetting those horrible things, but there's no way it means anything good for them. Only three days of peace, three days since the angels stopped snatching people up to make into more angels, and three days is not enough to mean anything at all.

She reaches Ruth, but doesn't dare to step out onto the cobblestone street, swiping uselessly with her remaining hand to try and catch the little girl by the back of her sweater. "Come back inside," she hisses, her eyes widening with horror as the shadows of wings overhead cluster and spiral in a mirror of the frenzy the angels must be in overhead. "Come back inside right now!"

The little girl doesn't even look back in her direction. She stares up at the angels and waits, and it's only a matter of time before one of them notices her.

For a brief moment, Ruth considers stepping out to grab her. She catches her lip between her teeth, and raises a foot - and stumbles backward, away from the open archway.
She's always been a coward.

"Oh. My god. Shut up! Shut up, you fuckin' dumb assholes, I know I'm awake! Yeah, back off, 'afore I start shooting again!"

The screeches cut off at once, and Ruth watches with a fist pressed hard against closed teeth as the dark wings slowly disperse. The silence afterward is nearly as eerie, terrifying, and - yet she's heard that whining, cross voice before.

It's not a snake-angel that drops down in front of the waiting girl, but a violetblood troll. He doesn't look nearly as haggard as he had three days ago, whirling to aim a handful of fire at her with a wild-eyed stare. He's wearing dark purple and a whitish-gold cloak that doesn't look quite real, shifting in a breeze that's not there. "Hey, wrigglin' squirt, I'm lookin' for a human landdweller who was hangin' around here," he says, pompous and pouting as he folds his arms and looks down on the little girl. "You seen her?"

Ruth steps back, her heart spazzing out as she tries to move out of the range of the outside light. If she's quiet, maybe he'll ignore her again -

The little girl raises a claw and points it right at her. Then she opens her mouth and speaks for the first time since Ruth met her. "Ruth is scared."

"Whatever," the violetblood mutters, rolling his eyes behind thick-rimmed glasses, his 'v's closer to 'w's than anything else. "Thanks, I guess." He turns and sees Ruth immediately, his lips tightening in some unreadable expression. Ruth freezes in place, her blood running cold as he jerks his head, beckoning her to come out. "Hurry up, woman, I've got some pretty important princely things I gotta get around to doin'. This is important stuff that I can't just ignore forever, so stop makin' me waste my time."

Her mouth is too dry for her to gulp. Ruth almost falls forward, dazed, while the troll taps his foot with an impatient frown. There's nowhere for her to run, anyway, not when he's already seen her. Why, why, why had she stayed in the same place he'd last seen her? He knew exactly where to return to. She hadn't even imagined he'd bother coming back, but she should have known better than to hope she was safe.

"Yes?" she says faintly, stepping into the archway. It's too quiet, and no sound comes out, so she licks her lips and tries again. "Yes?"

The troll eyeballs her speculatively, his lips still pursed in a moue of discontentment, and then nods jerkily, looking off to one side, away from her and the little girl. "So. Your name's Ruth."

"Y-yes."

"An' your arm - that happened earlier, right? When Mal went fuckin' Caligula on everything," he says. He doesn't sound uncertain, just as though he wants these things stated for the record.

"M-mal?" she repeats, struggling to see where this conversation is going. She's not dead yet, and she tries not to think too much of that.

"Mal!" he repeats, snapping with impatience, and then just as clearly reining himself back in when she flinches. "The giant fuckin' asshole alien thing that was pretendin' to be angels and eatin' everyone. Because it was an asshole."

"The...Prince? It said it was a Prince. We all - everyone heard it," she protests. It would be hard to forget the burning, acidic voice that had scraped and shrieked through her mind, announcing its reign of terror. But the troll snarls, eyes flashing, and she flinches, bringing up both arms instinctively to try to guard her face. "I'm sorry!"

"That's not - shit," he says, scratching at the side of his face and scowling ferociously, but he doesn't seem to be looking at her anymore, his gaze gone distant. "Uh. That was a misunderstandin'. Kind of. Mal was Mal and Mal liked eatin' people and doing stupid dumb things like that. No sense of how the whole ruling thing worked. Downright unprofessional. I'm the Prince." He says that last with some measure of pride, his thin chest puffing out and his pout twisting into a triumphant smirk as he jerks a thumb at himself.

Ruth thinks about screaming.

Then she looks him up and down again. It had been hard to see through all that raw terror all those days ago, but she's pretty sure she has a good twenty pounds on this guy. Violetbloods don't pack on raw muscle like land-dwelling trolls at the high end of the spectrum, but even considering that, this guy is kind of...shrimpy. No taller than any other teenage boy, and certainly a few inches shorter than her. Short enough that she can look down and clearly see the inch or so of black where the dye of his violet streak has grown out and not been redone.

Then again, he can also fire white lightning from his hands, and from the rifle slung over his back.
Which is terrifying to think about, because at any moment he might change his mind about whatever made him decide to spare her the other day instead of wiping her out in the middle of his inexplicable blood feud, and she does not want that kind of power turned against her.

But he doesn't match the image she has had in her head of the far-off, winged abomination that had set up a throne of glass and thorns and tentacles in the middle of the city, and so she clears her throat, shifts her weight from side to side, and nods slowly. "S-sure. Whatever you say."

This is clearly not the response he expects to get from that kind of announcement. His whole body sags, and he makes a face before he catches it and marshals himself back into some semblance of princely dignity. "Hmph! Anyway! I feel kind of awful about all that excessive dipshit Mal did while I was off makin' mediocre life choices. So. I want to give you an arm."

"...An arm?" she says.

"Yeah, an arm!" He raises his eyebrows expectantly. "Because I am fuckin' magnanimous. And we need to take the terror of this reign of terror down a notch because this is ridiculous. So yeah. Now let me see it."

Ruth tucks the blunted arm behind her back. "Uh...no."

"Uh, yes!" the troll says, rolling his eyes. He reaches out and tries to grab her shoulder, and she ducks out of the way repeatedly. "Ugh! Landdwellers. Let me just - see - it -" He almost trips over the hem of his own cape, and Ruth seriously considers just running because this guy is kind of incompetent.

The little girl just watches. But she's also some kind of sellout, so Ruth has cooled toward her considerably. To think, three days of sharing space and supplies with the kid, and this was the thanks she got?

Then the little girl says, "Let him help, Ruth," softly, and it startles Ruth badly enough that she stumbles, and the violetblood tugs her amputated arm out from behind her back to inspect it, his claws long and ragged enough to prickle as he prods at one of the open sores oozing white pus.
"Look, I gotta make this thing dangerous, or I can't do fuck all," he says, his brows furrowing as he turns her arm over, digging a claw into a vein of white that eats up the underside of her arm. "Destruction and hope and all that. Basically, you're gonna be able to wreck shit. Do you accept those fuckin' terms and conditions?"

"What are you even going to do?!!" She tries to pull away. He digs a claw in and she nearly whites out from the pain.

"This." He shrugs, and starts to glow.

Ruth screams, and punches him in the face. He lets go and she takes the opportunity to abscond. "Holy fugh, I think you broghe my nose!" he wails, clamping down on the nose in question with a claw. "Oh god, why?!"

"I want nothing to do with the glowy fire thing!" she fires back over her shoulder. Fuck her supplies, she's getting out of here. "I'm not stupid! Asshole!"

She looks back again. Oh, damn. He's flying. She skids to a stop as he jumps over her head and lands in front of her, sniffing hard and scratching at dried blood on his upper lip. "Do you not want a new arm?!" he demands. "Do you even know how hard it is to make this hope shit do anything other than blow stuff up? I'm fuckin' hardwired to break things, and this is, like, a one-time offer so you can become an awesome noble in my new court."

"Just blow another hole in the dome and let us all leave!" she says. Because that's the one thing that she can concentrate on, the fact that three days ago this troll and the other had been fighting, and ever since then people have whispered about a hole in the dome. A way to escape. If he can do that - "Do that, and everyone who got hurt can get actual medical care! Why would I want an arm that might blow people up when I could have a regular prosthetic?!"

The troll stops dead, and looks absolutely shell-shocked, as though this incredibly obvious solution never occurred to him, and for a brief moment, Ruth dares to hope she's convinced him.

That hope gets shattered an instant later, when the violetblood frowns again, and shakes his head, a storm brewing across his features. "No good," he says darkly. "Need to keep reinforcing the dome, not the other way around."

"But why?" Ruth is aware that she's begging, now. Her knees feel weak, and she wants to crawl into the dark corner of her courtyard and go to sleep in the silence of a half-dead city. "If you're not the thing that caused all this, why won't you let us go?!!"

"Cause the world is endin' and all that," he says, as casual as anything. Ruth's jaw drops open, and a tiny, cold hand touches her remaining hand. She flinches, but it's just the little girl, just barely clasping Ruth's hand with her claw. "All the angels're the first sign heraldin' the apocalypse, and I can't really take that back, now."

"But there are more than seven." When the troll only looks puzzled, Ruth says, impatient, "'And when he had opened the seventh seal, there was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour. And I saw the seven angels which stood before God; and to them were given seven trumpets.' Book of Revelation, 8. If you're trying to go traditional, you went a little wide of the mark."

One of his eyes twitches. "Oh my god, who even knows something like that?!"

"Are you kidding? I volunteer at Sunday school. Revelations is the only thing the brats will sit still for half the time."
He slaps his face. "Yeah, well, who even knows how this stupid game crap fits in with all that," he says, grinding the heel of his palm against his forehead. "This is, like, rule number one of the new world order - don't try to apply logic or science or anythin' to the apocalypse. As long as I can keep that dome up, fuck all that." He glowers up at the radiant sky, his permanent scowl deepening. "I'm not dealin' with all that crap. I believe the dome can stop all that destruction nonsense, and that means it's true. And I'm gonna rule this city with a fuckin' iron fist."

There's nothing she can say to that kind of logic. Ruth just raises her estimate of how insane this troll is a little higher, and stays quiet, trying to edge away from him as best she can with the little girl still clinging to her hand. She should just jerk her hand free and run, but the girl is blueblood strong, and though her grip doesn't hurt, it's strong enough that Ruth would probably have to break her hand to get it loose. She can't afford to lose her only remaining hand like that.

"But I need a court. Since all those assholes are probably runnin' around ignorin' me, again, I need another way to rack up the multipliers," he says, looking at her with an expression that's half demand, half pleading. "So just let me give you an awesome laser arm and call it a day."

Ruth hesitates. She could use both arms, and it's not like anyone is making prosthetics and performing surgery while this dome is up, not with how shell-shocked all the survivors are. She doesn't know what kind of devil's deal she's making, here. But if she can protect herself from whatever fresh hell gets unleashed on Los Angeles next, she can't turn that down. She's too much of a coward.

If you can't beat them, join them.

"How often would it fire lasers?"

"How often do you believe it will fire lasers?" He's wound back around to looking irritated again. "Just believe it'll happen when you want it to, and it will. Hope majjyks are literally the easiest fuckin' thing to comprehend, honestly." He makes gimme motions with his claw. "Goin' once…"

She hesitates for all of two seconds.

And then holds out the stump of her arm. "Yes."

"Finally." The violetblood reaches out, grabs her melted elbow, and twists as his entire body catches fire. "[Your Oath Is Mine]."

Ruth tries to yank away again, but now he and the little girl are both there to hold her in place while the fire billows down the Prince's arm and wraps around hers. It hurts, a slow-building burn that licks at her flesh and sets her veins alight. She can see her own arm glowing from the inside out, and just what has she signed up for? She looks back and forth from the Prince's crazy-eyed, intense stare to the plates of white light that start to latch onto the end of her elbow, and feels dizzy from the buzzing, white-hot scent of lightning and ozone and, oddly enough, vanilla that rises up from her burning arm.

When the violetblood releases her at last, Ruth does collapse. The little girl still has one hand, so she catches herself on the other, still half-anticipating the painful jolt that always pulses from the infected part of her amputated arm when she accidentally uses it for anything.

There is no pain. Even the scorching agony of whatever the troll did to her has receded, and Ruth sits slowly back on her heels, raising up the new arm that broke her fall. She can't see how it attaches to her elbow - there are none of the mechanical clamps or wires that would be needed for such a heavy piece of equipment. But it responds when she wants it to turn over, with a series of crystalline chimes, and then her eyes finally pick out the hundreds of individual white blades that make up the bones and the muscles and tendons of a new lower arm and hand. She thinks about the hand making a fist, and it does, instantaneous and smooth, in a chiming of tiny clicking blades. Something blazes like fire in the very center, between the large, thin knives of the radius and ulna, and she remembers all that talk of lasers with an audible gulp.

She hadn’t thought he could actually do this. She’d believe that perhaps he could have destroyed her remaining arm, or killed her, or accomplished nothing at all, and stomped away, deep in his own private madness.

But this is real. This shatters everything she has ever believed.

This is impossible. This is...incredible.

"Oh, yeah. That thing is totally capable of destroying people's hopes and dreams," the Prince says, exultant. "A weapon worthy of bein' bestowed on a prince's follower. An' I totally destroyed all the corrupted shit still in the rest a' your arm, too. So you're welcome."

"What are you," Ruth asks, raising her eyes up because this –

This is a miracle.

"He's a god," the little girl says, adoration in her blue eyes as she squeezes Ruth's regular hand, sinking to her knees as well. Ruth looks at her with almost as much wonder, because the girl had known all along, hadn’t she. Somehow, impossibly, she’d gone out to stand under the angels and start all this, and isn’t that a miracle, too?

"Not yet, I'm not," the Prince says, mussing up his hair. He flushes, looks almost mortified or disconcerted at the moniker. Then he tilts his head to the side, and narrows his eyes at the little girl, as though really seeing her for the first time. "Wait, hang on a fu- glubbin' minute. What's your name?"

"Faith," the little girl says. "Both of my mommies are dead. Will you take my pledge too, Prince? You were asleep all this time, so I had time to think about it. Please?"

Ruth feels the cool of the girl's palm, and wonders. It doesn't make sense, except in the ways it does. Trolls don't break the six and eight letter naming scheme they've been using since the old Alternian Empire unless they've been adopted out to humans. The little girl - Faith - hasn't said a word during all that time she spent with Ruth, but now she speaks like someone twice the age she looks, with all the shining devotion in her eyes that Ruth hasn't recognized since she looked into the eyes of her old preacher back home and said that she was leaving the parish.

The Prince stares hard, suspicion in every line of his body. "This fuckin' game," he mutters, tapping a distracted, frenetic beat against the side of his leg with a jittering hand as though totally absorbed in other thoughts. "Mal couldn't get anywhere near you, could he?"

Faith shakes her head, curls bouncing. "No. I knew you wouldn't hurt me. I believed it, and it was true."

And -

Ruth understands.

All of this - all of it - has been a miracle.

And in that moment, on her knees with an arm blessed by one who will be a god, she believes.
The Prince grins, all teeth like a shark, and holds out a hand wreathed in white fire for Faith to grasp.

"Welcome to the Court of Hope, Faith."

Chapter End Notes

AHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHA

And before anyone says a word about Diamonds knowing shit she shouldn’t, I direct you once again to the altered conversation with ?? in Jade’s section. There have been other hints, but I’m also holding back the full explanation for the end of the next arc, so that’s about as blatant as I was going to get in terms of foreshadowing.

Aaaand anyway, that’s chapter 15! Next up is chapter 16 – Time Shall Not Sever Us, which sounds a lot more ominous than it probably actually is. Arc V (side B) will end with the next chapter, an exposition heavy motherfucker with a lot of flashbacks. /seduces you all with promises of Bro and Davesprite and the obligatory angry Spades/BQ makeout sesh Mal is a winged Ophan, but with more teeth. If anyone needed a better visual image for it, I direct you to M.C. Escher’s Concentric Rinds.

Time Shall Not Sever Us

Chapter Summary

Is it worth a tear, is it worth an hour,
To think of things that are well outworn?
Of fruitless husk and fugitive flower,
The dream foregone and the deed forborne?
Though joy be done with and grief be vain,
Time shall not sever us wholly in twain.

Chapter Notes

EDIT: Jade is here. At last. IDK, she jumps around a lot and the quality is down the tubes, but it gets the job done so we’re just gonna blow through this and not look back. Also, apparently Sollux’s section was too much for this chapter to handle on the character limit, so he'll be reposted instead in the next chapter. /s The party may now resume regularly scheduled heroic angsting and crime fighting. Also, since it’s already finished, a Diamonds section will be posted shortly to open our new Arc, COMPULSION, with Chapter 17 – Strange Weather.

We also have a power anthem at last: Hey Momma/Hit The Road, Jack (Pentatonix).

Warning for multiple bloody major character deaths in memory form. Like. Jesus. /stares at story/ Primarily a recap of an alternate Acts 1-4 of Homestuck. Please note that the timeline WILL NOT align perfectly with Homestuck canon, even at the beginning before the major changes take effect. Assume that any and all minor changes or omissions are the result of AU. All of them. I know what I’m about, son.

They drive out to the Cascades that Saturday.

The morning starts out on a less than promising note, and Karkat is tempted to take that as a harbinger of yet more fuckups that are doomed to come.

Which is pretty fucking understandable. In fact, Karkat is personally amazed that the past few mornings went as well as they had. Four super-powered heroes under one roof, two of them skipping school to lay low and going stir crazy with it, you'd expect more ridiculously stupid shit to go down, but the power of the stern fatherly glare is not to be taken lightly. There are few things that John's custodian takes more seriously than his son's safety, and knowing what they know now - that Diamonds Droog can hold John's secret identity over their heads at any moment - has caused Samuel Egbert to fall back on whatever unspecified training he has from his armed forces days; Karkat has never actually been sure what military branch John's dad was in, but it's like living with a well-dressed, ever-smiling drill sergeant. Dad Egbert takes full control of the situation - calls in sick days at his day job, helps Crabdad communicate to the school that Karkat won't be coming in due to a family emergency, and then assigns each kid chores or homework on a rotating basis so none of them have the time or energy to cause another fucking crisis.

So Harley keeps her feet on the ground at all times, occasionally scrambling to repair whatever damage her carapacian sidekick causes - at one point the thing teleports an entire bathtub onto the roof of the house, and that's about as exciting as plumbing has ever been. The red-eyed douchebag seems content to remain quietly in the background, avoiding interacting directly with anyone but John and doing whatever it is self-proclaimed 'ninja rappers' do in dark, shadowy corners. Sometimes Karkat would swear there's more than one Dave running around, which would violate all of Samuel Egbert's ground rules, but what with the benefit of fucking time travel Dave seems to be able to forewarn himself before anyone can catch more than a flicker of red in the corner of their eye. Asshole. He texts John an obscene amount, but Karkat is trying not to flip his shit over that. Unfortunately, that seems to give Dave the impression that, just because Karkat is mercifully sparing him the worst of his usual bile in the name of taking the moral high ground, it means Dave has permission to text him an obscene amount, too.

And Karkat is still hobbling around, usually using John's elbow as an interim crutch. His ribs certainly don't feel like they're healing at an abnormally fast rate, so he's inclined to think that Spades Slick was a lying piece of shit, but Flashstep had the brilliant idea of helping (read: forcing) the carapacian to leave the Midnight Crew stronghold before Droog could return or the police could arrive, and now Slick is in the wind and no one can ask him anything at all.

But that's not the point. No, the real question here is, who the fuck thought that leaving the demented, piece of shit time knight in charge of breakfast was a good idea?

No one, apparently, because when the fire alarm in the kitchen goes off at ass o'clock in the morning, literally everyone is still in their pajamas when they teleport and/or race to the kitchen to see what in fuck's name is going on. Even Samuel Egbert marches in with his face half-shaven, wielding a fire extinguisher like a truncheon and looking stoic but also resigned, as though he's been anticipating some fuckery like this all along.

Dave looks up from the unnameable, inedible thing now crisping and smoldering in the frying pan. He drops the spatula and somehow, in spite of the obnoxious sunglasses, manages to give the distinct impression of a deer caught in the head lights.

TG: ...
TG: well shit

"But why?" Karkat has still not received an answer to that question. "You inconsiderate fuckwad, you couldn't have waited the half hour it would have taken for John's dad to show up?"

They all have pancakes now. The pan full of what Dave called omelets and Karkat called a festering heap of post-digestive excretions had to be given an early funeral by way of the trash can, and the pan itself was a lost cause too, but this is the Egbert household and Samuel had simply produced a backup griddle from the mysterious depths of the kitchen cupboards and started churning out massive pancakes. Harley, who like any insanely hyperactive maniac is way too fucking chipper for five in the morning, finally shuts up when she starts shoveling food in her mouth, now that Dad Egbert has done the service to mankind of teaching her not to talk when she eats. She seems to have misinterpreted that as meaning she's not allowed to talk at all while eating, and Karkat is not about to disillusion her. Seriously. He's not stupid enough to look this gift-hoofbeast in the mouth.
Karkat can't even imagine what the poor man's going through. His son has effectively been hosting a four day sleepover in his house with no obligatory school breaks and they're all about at the point where the only thing they can do at night is put on yet another shitty hero movie and stare blankly at the screen like the living dead. Karkat's ventured to his own hive only to pack clothes and make sure Crabdad has enough iced roe and actual food to keep the dumb shit lusus alive through the weekend, because John is understandably paranoid that both their houses are being watched.

John has run out of pranks to try to lighten the mood with. Even Harley can only talk about science for so long. Karkat's frankly surprised Dave lasted as long as he did without attempting to pull suitably ironic stunt. Everything with this asshole has some kind of ironic explanation behind it, to the point that Karkat's pretty fucking sure Dave doesn't even know what that word means. He just uses it as an excuse for all the frankly weird shit he does, like rambling about taxidermied frogs and the logistics of sewing extraneous zippers onto a jacket for no fucking reason and the copious amounts of apple juice that he consumes.

There's a few exceptions to the rule, including, incomprehensibly, the mystifying rapport the douchebag has formed with WV. No one knows when it happened. No one knows how. No one knows why. It's like a riddle wrapped inside a mystery shoved up the wrong end of the space/time continuum. Right now the alien is swaddled in a bunch of ghost-patterned sheets it dragged out of the linen closet on a whim, in a rough approximation of the wrappings most carapacians wear, and is sipping apple juice from the same jug as Dave while they sit on the floor together, sloppy and spraying juice everywhere whenever he gets overly excited. Neither of them can talk, but Karkat catches Dave signing slow and deliberately, and sometimes he thinks WV copies the signs, instead of flailing about with his silent carapacian gestures.

But in the meantime, no one else in the house can understand Dave or WV. So Dave shrugs and the group Pesterchum memo, a mass of red only occasionally broken up by other colors, starts going off on everyone's phones. Samuel Egbert is not included in the memo, since he doesn't actually have a Pesterchum account, and it's become a convenient way to communicate even when John's dad puts them all in separate rooms and cajoles them into some new chore to keep them from potentially blowing something the fuck up.

It should be noted that Karkat was not, at any point, consulted on the subject of the memo board's title, but yelling about it would only be playing right into Dave's devious, despicably ironic trap. The provocation is so obvious, it's pathetic, and Karkat has to actively stop grinding his teeth for fear of cracking a canine with the force of his irritation whenever he has to read it.

"What I don't get is how you didn't notice the eggs were charred and crusting onto the pan itself," John says, with that tiny smile on his face that means he thinks the whole thing is just kind of hilarious. He would. "I mean, I could understand it catching fire - who hasn't set things on fire while cooking once in their life? But it had to have been smoking for ages before the alarm went off!"

Dave's face is completely unreadable as he passes the apple juice back to WV. He shows absolutely no sign of remorse or embarrassment or anything. He's just a blank, insufferable, emotionally repressed asshole, and Karkat has given up trying to see half the body language cues that John swears up and down are there if you just know what to look for.

TG: i get distracted man
TG: zone out and lose track of things

TG: this shit is stupid as fuck yo

In the corner of his eye, Karkat can see Harley chewing furiously, obviously intending to rejoin the conversation as soon as she can, and feeding a pancake to her pet barkbeast thing, and honestly? That thing is starting to just creep him out. His nightmares have been repetitions the past few nights, so every time he looks at Bec there's a pang of momentary, unmitigated terror at the memory of that wolf's head on another monster's shoulders.

He still doesn't know what any of it means. He and John have puzzled over the nightmares whenever they have a free moment, but every so often John's nose will begin to trickle blood and they'll have to cut off the conversation without pressing any further, John's face torn between blank confusion and the edge of some painful revelation.

It's the same way he looked after the one and only time Heir ever dared to teleport Hemogoblin with him on the job, pale and vaguely haunted, as though taunted by his own inability to remember what's going on because that's actually a thing now. Yeah. Harley and John's dad have both tried to explain what the hell's going on, but it just sounds more like that babble that Spades Slick was on about, so Karkat tunes out Harley and nods along with Samuel and starts to develop a sixth sense for when John's about to max out his credit for the day.

He gets that something big is coming. A shitstorm of absolutely preposterous proportions. But he's reserving all judgments until he's hearing it from someone other than Jade fucking Harley, because she's back on the shitlist for the foreseeable future. She'd tried to argue that first day that if she hadn't suggested the three of them go after Diamonds Droog then they would never have learned that Droog knew John's identity, as though that somehow made the whole thing better, and Karkat had had to leave the room and scream into a pillow in the closet-pile for close to an hour before the urge to claw her face open went away.

John wrinkles up his nose. It's adorable. "Time powers."

TG: i know

"Whatever. Let's just keep the shitpanned levels of stupidity to a minimum, please?" Karkat grumbles. He's claimed the entire couch for him and John by pleading broken ribs, and his request was granted, so when he finishes his pancakes he sets the plate down for a second and lounges like the fucking convalescent that he is. He's found that as long as he doesn't bend or twist or shout in any way, he can make the pain medication last longer. "One day. Just one day, where we act like fucking professionals while we're dealing whatever crisis happens next, instead of a bunch of unrepentant morons. That's all I want."

John laughs, smothering it too late by covering his mouth with his hand. It's half-hysterical, and Karkat reaches out and grabs John's knee because it's the first thing his hand finds, patting at it awkwardly in a vaguely soothing gesture. "We can try," he says, rolling his eyes. "But I think we're just doomed to always end up in situations where stupid stuff happens. It's like a universal constant or something. The best we can do is probably just go along with it!"

TG: look at it this way
TG: when john finally accept my broposal and you join us as his diamond waifu TG: this is what you can look forward to TG: endless zany shenanigans
TG: outrageously ill beats at all hours of the night
TG: and our trash can which will runneth over with burnt omelets
TG: so basically youre set for life there

Karkat has something to say to that. Something incredibly cutting and witty that will express his thoughts on the matter in a succinct fashion at a volume more properly suited to a heavy metal concert, even if by doing so his fucked ribs with return the favor threefold.

Then Harley stuffs a forkful of pancake into her mouth, reads her phone screen, and spits both pancake and fork all over the carpet. "A proposal?! You're getting married?!?!” she shrieks through her mouthful of food, so muffled that Karkat can't tell if the mistake is real or just garbled.

Back in the kitchen, a plate shatters on the tile floor.

TG: oh yeah
TG: totally

John facepalms with both hands.

...They're never going to make it.

They only manage to escape the wrath of Samuel Egbert by the narrowest of margins. There's general confusion concerning who is threatening to marry who, given that Jade's screaming doesn't include much context, and so chaos reigns for a good fifteen minutes before it is established that no one has actually literally proposed to anyone. John claps a hand over Jade's mouth before she can wreak any more havoc by telling Samuel Egbert about the shitty JPEG that Dave forwards to the rest of them with a tiny smirk on his obnoxious face, and Karkat channels his latent fury by seizing everyone's plates and speeding them through the cleaning process, drying them with a vigor usually reserved for fighting criminal fuckwads.

When they finally get their collective shit together, pack their things at the last minute, and hustle everyone out to the Egbert's car, it's another minor crisis trying to figure out how to arrange everyone. Harley whistles until she's hoarse trying to make her barkbeast do her bidding, then gives up and hauls Bec into the trunk of the car with her bare hands. No one but John had trusted Harley's offer to store things in her sylladex, and watching Samuel attempt to graciously back out of her offer without outright stating that she was out of her mind had been a thing of glee to behold, so the wolf ends up lying down on a pile of their bags. Samuel Egbert, being the wonderful human specimen of mediation that he is, attempts to very gently suggest that Karkat sit up front in the passenger's seat, but that does exactly fuck all to put space between Karkat and the raging shitstorm that was Jade Harley going nuts in the backseat. John sits in the middle between Harley and Dave, and somehow WV ends up crawling over and sitting on everyone's laps over the course of the trip. At one point the carapacian emerges from within the glove compartment without warning, squeaking with indignation until Karkat opens up the compartment for him, and Karkat has no idea how he got in there.
And then, of course, the drive itself is a fucking nightmare. Karkat thinks it's a miracle beyond words that he is only reduced to incoherent rage tears once throughout the entire trip.

Because whoever thought taking the hyperactive teleporting space witch on a two hour road trip in a tiny, enclosed vehicle was a globefondling shitclown. There had been some excuse on Doctor Lalonde's part about how the shielding on her Washington lab was designed to prevent unauthorized surveillance and teleportation, and that it would be stupidly dangerous for Harley or John to try teleporting them straight there without testing how their powers reacted to the shielding, first. Then Dadbert has chimed in himself to mention that he would want his own vehicle in case of emergencies anyway, which explains where John got all that paranoia from, and that somehow all resulted in the two guardians justifying this shitshow rather than the obvious solution of having Harley teleport them all the way to the lab, or at least as close as she could manage.

Yeah, Karkat stopped believing it after the first thirty minutes. No excuse could be worth this. None whatsoever. He'd think maybe this was Dadbert's backhanded way of making them all miserable for the chaos of the last few days, except the man is being forced to suffer right along with them. John might be pretty pro-Harley these days, but Karkat can see the way Samuel Egbert scans the back seat of the car in the rearview mirror with a tight, controlled expression, and thinks that Egbert just doesn't want to risk Harley dumping them, whether accidentally or in some weird act of betrayal, in the middle of the Congo. And thanks to that paranoia, they've all been sentenced to the lowest circle of hell.

For the first hour Karkat stays mildly high on pain killers just for the sake of being able to ignore Harley by pretending to be easily distracted by passing vehicles.

Dave pulls a set of huge red headphones over his ears, folds his arms, and appears to enter a miniature coma for the duration of the trip - or at least, his expression doesn't change once for the entire car ride, not even when Harley teleports the sunglasses off his face multiple times, giggling at the same infuriating pitch that reminds Karkat too strongly that she's his moirail's sister. But the kid's fingers never seem to stop flying across the screen of his phone, and Karkat suspects that for every message Dave sends to the group memo, at least five more are going to John alone. Which is infuriating, but spectacularly less so than Harley, who will bounce out to visit an interesting looking building as they drive by it, only to reappear in her seat a few minutes later, oblivious to the fact that every time she does it Dadbert gnaws harder on his splintered, unlit pipe.

John, who is desperately trying to work on the same homework as Karkat to make up for all the school they've missed over the past few days, puts up with Harley's antics with absolutely inhuman good humor, and Karkat starts seriously considering how one might nominate one's palemate for sainthood after the fifth time John neatly manages to head off Harley's attempts at correcting Karkat's chemistry homework. She keeps unbuckling and leaning over the divider and into Karkat's personal space to point out where he's balanced an equation wrong, and there's only so much of that any troll could take before murder happens. John diverts her attention by offering her his own homework to correct, which she does with aplomb.

And she never once stops talking. Even when everyone else stops talking back. Even when the hour and a half mark passes and the road trip ennui has sunk in so deeply that everyone is mildly sick and the water tastes tepid and they're all lagging from a lack of physical activity. Karkat can feel the pain medication wearing off, despite his best efforts to string it along, and that does absolutely nothing to help his tolerance for Harley's bullshit.

CG: JOHN.
EB: i know...
CG: JOHN.
CG: OH MY GOD.
CG: THIS IS NOT POSSIBLE.
CG: ONE HUMAN BEING CANNOT POSSIBLY BE THIS LOUD.
EB: i knowwww :/
EB: she was alone for a lot of her life, so i guess she's just trying to make up for lost time?
TG: seriously
TG: i can hear this through my headset
TG: this shit is supposed to cancel noise this cant be happening
CG: ALSO I SWEAR YOUR DAD LISTENS TO NOTHING BUT POLKA AND SLOW JAZZ.
EB: yeah, pretty much.

A foot kicks the back of his seat. Since this is Harley, it feels like being kicked by an elephant. "Karrrrkaaaaaaaaat -"

"SHUT UP!" Karkat shrieks. The phone tumbles from his hands and slides under the car seat as he drags himself around to jab a claw at her. "JUST. SHUT. UP!" When Harley opens her mouth, presumably to spew some fresh pointless jabber, he mimes zipping his lips. "No more talking! No! It's called the fucking silent game, where we see who can shut the fuck up longer, me or you! Starting immediately - unless you think you can't beat me!"

Harley squints at him with narrowed eyes, assessing. "...You're on," she says at last, folding her arms over her chest and propping up her feet with a pout on her lips.

Karkat nearly cries with relief. He flops around in his seat again, rubbing at the ache in his side, and the blessed silence that stretches out between him and the back seat really does bring a single tear to his eye. To his left Samuel Egbert removes the pipe from between his clenched teeth, and Karkat does not imagine the raw look of gratitude the man shoots at him.

TG: first of all id like to be on the record as not actually giving a shit about all this TG: second i would like to nominate karkat vantas for times person of the year
TG: you beautiful shouty creature you
TG: i cant believe those words just came out of my mouth
CG: THEY DIDN'T COME OUT OF YOUR MOUTH, DUMBASS, YOU FUCKING TYPED THEM.
TG: its the principle of the thing
TG: and stop making fun of my disability
TG: you know how sensitive i am about that shit CG: DON'T EVEN FUCKING START THAT BULLSHIT ROUTINE WITH ME, ASSHAT. I AM TAKING ONE FOR THE TEAM HERE.
EB: karkat thank you :')
CG: YEAH, NO PROBLEM. TALKING HURTS ANYWAY. IF WE'RE LUCKY SHE MIGHT EVEN HOLD OUT FOR THE NEXT THIRTY MINUTES AND THEN AT LEAST WE'LL BE OUT OF THIS FUCKING CAR WHEN THE MOTOR MOUTH STARTS UP AGAIN.
CG: IF I NEVER HAVE TO SIT ON MY ASS IN A CAR FOR TWO HOURS STRAIGHT AGAIN IT'LL BE TOO FUCKING SOON. NOT EVEN SCHOOL IS THIS BAD.
EB: tell me about it! i think i'm feeling kind of sick :(}
CG: WHAT.
TG: what
TG: omg dude are you gonna hurl
TG: are you telling me youre about to jettison the chunky cargo
TG: was this a roundtrip meal ticket
TG: because shit i can switch seats
TG: hell you can sit on my lap
TG: just jesus do not puke on me

By the end of his own rant, Dave looks downright green in the rearview mirror, one hand clutching his own seatbelt buckle with an air of desperation, as though ready to undo it and fling himself out of the line of fire at any moment.

EB: aahahaha, probably not! we're almost there, i think i'll make it!
CG: DOES YOUR HEAD HURT OR SOMETHING? WHAT THE FUCK'S WRONG?
EB: it's just kind of closed in and stuffy in here.
EB: sometimes stuff like that bothers me, but this is the first time in a while...
EB: i wish we could put a window down.
TG: youd rather we flew i can goddamn tell TG: its a bird its a plane
TG: no its just eb trying to fly six people and a dog halfway across the state EB: i wonder if i could lift the car with all of you in it...
EB: :D
CG: JUST PUT THE FUCKING WINDOW DOWN DAVE, BEFORE I COME BACK THERE AND DO IT MYSELF.

Dave rolls the window down. They've slowed to match the speed limit, somewhere around thirty five miles an hour, but the breeze that rolls in is apparently enough to draw such a deep, contented sigh from John that Karkat wants to squirm around and see the face he's making. The most he'd probably be able to manage without Samuel giving him the evil eye would be to maybe hold John's hand, but that is way too fucking personal for him to try when Harley and Dave are both in close proximity.

-- gardenGnostic [GG] has joined the chat! -- GG: why'd we put the window down?
TG: oh shit
CG: WAIT NO HOW THE FUCK DID YOU DO THAT.
CG: WHAT FUCKING GOOD IS THIS BULGEHUMPING EXCUSE FOR A BLOCK FUNCTION IF IT DOESN'T EVEN WORK?!
GG: stop being such a meanie butt, karkat! :P
GG: if you're talking on pesterchum, does that count as talking in the silent game?
GG: foul! >:O
CG: NO IT DOESN'T FUCK COUNT, JESUS. OUR CONTEST CONTINUES. SERIOUSLY, HOW ARE YOU HERE, WHY THE GRUBFUZZING HELL ARE MY REPEATED ATTEMPTS TO MASH THE BLOCK BUTTON DOING ABSOLUTELY FUCKALL?
GG: lol not telling!
CG: NO ONE FUCKING SAYS LOL ANYMORE, HARLEY, TAKE YOUR OUTDATED INFERIOR CHAT ANACHRONISMS AND ROFLCOPTER THE FUCK OUT OF HERE.
TG: lol
CG: FUCK YOU ASSHOLE.
GG: see! dave uses it, and dave is the coolest kid! waaay cooler than you, karkat!!
TG: shes got you there bro
CG: YOU KNOW, I USED TO THINK IT WOULD BE COOL TO MEET SUPER HEROES.
CG: AND THEN I MET THEM.

EB: guys?
CG: HA! YOU'VE WATCHED STAR TREK.
TG: nutrek does not even count everyone has EB: i'm pretty sure it counts, dave!
TG: what no
TG: eb youre supposed to have my back
EB: you're all ignoring me so bluhhh.
EB: ANYWAY
EB: as i've been trying to tell you guys for the past three minutes...
EB: pretty sure we're here!

"These are the closest coordinates Doctor Lalonde was able to give us," Samuel Egbert is saying when Karkat looks up from his phone; the car has slowed dramatically, creeping along the road toward the tiny group of buildings that seem to make up the ranger station they were told to drive to.  "From here, she said she'd send someone to escort us the rest of the - ah, that looks promising!"

There are a few cars scattered around the lot, but only the one pulled up snug near the wooden fence has a troll in a long white coat leaning against it, evidently waiting for someone. When the troll notices their approach his head shoots up, and a slight smile spreads across the troll's pale face as he pushes upright and waves them down with a two-fingered salute. Karkat sinks lower into his seat, feeling his stomach clench up when they pull up alongside the other vehicle and he can make out the faint purple tint of the hair pulled back from the troll's face in a loose braid down his back. He can't tell if it's a high purple or a low violet, but either way he wants to draw as little of this asshole's attention as possible. Even with his contacts in he feels exposed.

By the time the violetblood leans near Samuel's rolled down window, head tilted ever so slightly so that his hair falls to the side, Karkat has managed to curl himself up into a ball in the passenger's side seat, knees drawn up to his chest so he can glare at the other troll surreptitiously while pretending to be staring out the other window. The other troll's glasses have no rims, just the clear lenses, easily overlooked, and though a faint hint of smile lingers in his expression he seems mostly serious as he nods to Samuel Egbert. "Doctor Lalonde said to tell you this," he says, clearing his throat. "7-33-9. Lemon merengue. 1976 Pinot Gris. The herb of grace contains 46.8% methyl nonyl ketone."

Samuel sighs, some of the tension leaving his shoulders. "Good."

TG: she sent us a shopping list
EB: probably a password!
GG: definitely! my grandpa had me memorize a lot of long ones like that for his labs before he died!
TG: or that

"We can make the laboratory in a little under an hour, if the weather remains clear," the troll continues smoothly, as though he didn't just rattle off a string of nonsense. "But it's important that you not lose track of my vehicle at any point, particularly at the switchbacks. The closer you get to the facility, the easier it is to become...confused. Lost."

"A side effect of the shielding?" When the troll nods, one claw slowly creeping up his chest to press at the pendant that falls to the middle of his sternum, Samuel Egbert holds out a hand. "Samuel Egbert."

The troll blinks, but shows no other sign of being startled as he delicately shakes the man's hand. "I am called Novitiate Halburn." When Karkat can't help the baffled look he casts that way, Halburn's cheek dimples with a deceptively benevolent smile, and he turns his attention on Karkat. "I deal primarily with thaumaturgy of the mind. I will only take on a balanced name and the title Lectoris when I've completed my thesis work."

"No one asked," Karkat mutters, doing his best to crush himself up against the far door and turning his head toward the mountains that rise up around them, breathing hard. He ignores whatever the fuck Dadbert and Halburn discuss next in favor of trying to remember if he remember a goddamn toothbrush, and he ignores the messages that make his phone jitter in his hand until after he hears the crunch of feet on gravel and the sound of another car starting up. When Samuel backs up and follows the nondescript grey car back toward the main road, Karkat finally emerges from his defensive curl and starts answering.

EB: karkat?
EB: are you okay? was there something weird with what he said?
GG: ha! i won the silence game! that means we can talk now right?

GG: ...
CG: DRINK YOUR GODDAMN APPLE JUICE THEN.

It's grown overcast and cloudy in the hours they've been trapped in that hellhole of a car, but the threatening rain - or snow, maybe, at this altitude - never materializes. Karkat spies a few wide patches of snow higher up on the peaks around them, settled deep in pockets of shade where the meager sun never quite reaches. On the main road they're hedged in by trees that press in close and block much of the view with shaggy thatches of evergreen needles, but then the Novitiate signals for a turn that Samuel Egbert almost drives right by. It's difficult to notice, barely a shadow in the thickly clustered trees, and at first Karkat thinks the violetblood expects them to off-road it up the mountain.

Then they reach the turn itself and Samuel slowly edges them onto the dark gravel path. The trees have laced together overhead, gnarled and bent to form a ceiling that blocks out the sky completely, and Karkat catches himself holding his breath for no reason, his gaze locked onto the taillights of the car in front of them. The path winds and even dips for a while, as though they're about to descend back in the direction of the Skagit River, but then the red lights bob in front of them and hitch another sharp left. Daedbert stays glued to the other car's bumper, and Karkat gives up on propriety when the trees grow so thick that the darkness becomes absolute. He reaches back and his claws crash against John's hand, already coming up to meet his. There's a tiny high pitched 'oh!' from Harley right behind him, and she sounds a little awed but thankfully doesn't seem to realize she lost the contest and would be free to start jabbering away about whatever startled her. The only light in the car comes from the lights on the dashboard and the gleam of four cell phones.

TG: this is not your average everyday darkness
CG: DO NOT EVEN START THAT.
EB: this is
EB: ADVANCED darkness!
CG: JOHN I TRUSTED YOU.
GG: oohhh! so thats why doctor lalonde thought we wouldn't be able to teleport right here!
EB: huh? we're not there yet, are we?
TG: please say we are
TG: oh god i understand you eb i cant take this car anymore
TG: i need to be free
TG: also i think vv just elbowed me in the crotch
TG: i have been betrayed in the name of aj
TG: i always knew this day would come
CG: DO YOU TEXT THIS MUCH BECAUSE YOU CAN'T FUCKING TALK OR IS THIS JUST SOME SPECIAL CURSE BESTOWED ON YOU BY THE UNIVERSE THAT YOU'VE TAKEN IT UPON YOURSELF TO USE TO TORMENT OTHERS LIKE THE SICK, ANNOYING AS FUCK DOUCHEBAG THAT YOU ARE?
TG: ...
CG: ...
EB: omg
GG: aaaanywho! :)
GG: gosh i wish you guys could sense whats going on with space here! its pretty fascinating!
GG: everythings gone twisty and numb!
CG: THAT MEANS ABSOLUTELY NOTHING TO ANYONE OTHER THAN YOU.
GG: i dont know what it means either! thats whats so interesting!
GG: i can still feel everything, and i think i could teleport back home from here if bec helped...
GG: but hang on...
EB: crap!
EB: no jade, don-

There's a crackle of green light that lights up the interior of the car. Karkat and Samuel whip around to stare at the back seat at the same time, but then something impacts the hood of the car with a thump! and Samuel slams on the brakes. The brake lights on the car in front of them flare as well, thankfully, which means they don't need to worry about the Novitiate ditching them in the forest of fucking doom while they all stare at the wild Jade Harley who has just teleported onto the hood of their car.

Shakily, her face still planted against the hood, Harley raises a hand to make a thumbs up, and beyond her crackling green limning another faint light appears as she – apparently – pulls out her phone to start texting.

GG: okay soooo~~~
GG: i was aiming for the passengers seat of the car in front of us!
GG: wow! that was so weeeeeeird!
CG: HOLY SHIT ON A STICK HARLEY.

"John. Why...is Ms Harley...on the front of our car?" Samuel Egbert says. His voice is far too level. Rightfully terrified, Karkat tries to scoot as discreetly as possible to have as much space between him and any impending parental explosion as he can manage. He's too young to die over Harley's fuck ups, goddammit.

EB: jade, get back in the car! before my dad gets mad!
GG: eep!

Harley rolls off the hood of the car. Samuel Egbert puts the car into park and already has his door cracked open when Harley shakes her head. "I'm fine, Mr Egbert!" she chirps, scrambling around Karkat's side of the vehicle and ignoring his patented judgmental glower as she crawls back into the back seat. "Just a mess-up! I won't do it again!" Once she's back in her seat and Dadbert has thrown her enough stern glances that the quota has been met, John finally undoes her still-buckled seat belt so she can redo it herself and Samuel shifts the car back into drive. He flashes the headlights and the Novitiate starts trundling along ahead of them once more.

GG: there's a lot of spatial interference here! i can still jump, but i'm not entirely sure i can control where i'm going...whats up is down and what's left is right and when i think i'm aiming forward i end up all turned around!
GG: i can tell there's a lot of stuff around us taking up space, like mountains and deer and all that, but i couldn't tell you exactly where.
EB: so you can do the spacey thing, but it turns out wonky?
GG: yeah! you might have better luck, john, but i don't think we should try it out here because of all the trees.
CG: AND FOR ONCE IN OUR MISERABLE LIVES COMMON SENSE PREVAILS.

The car starts to jolt a lot more over the road, and Karkat clenches his teeth on reflex with every bump and pothole that they seesaw over. He's been driving for years now and potholes still give him nightmares after that one time a tire blew out in the middle of the road back when he lived in the city. Anything that drew attention to him was to be avoided at all costs, but in the space of a day he'd shouted at five innocent bystanders trying to help him and had to call a tow truck, and by the time he got home he'd been sweating through his hoodie and had to throw it out because he'd been paranoid that someone would notice the reddish stains were a little too bright a red.

But the Egbert's car prevails, and with one final bump they hit a smooth patch before one last turn. Abruptly, light spills in from above further along the road, a gap in the trees that is so bright for a moment compared to the tree cover that Karkat can't see a damn thing, blinking away watery tears as first the Novitiate's vehicle and then theirs emerge from the trees onto another road.

Not that it's much of one; there are worn tire tracks that form a trail along the crest of the rocky outcropping, but meadow grass has grown in the wide space between the eroded tracks. Around them, the grass and scrub is broken up by large stretches of dark, rocky soil. A disused foot path, made up of blocky chunks of stone, leads off and down to the right, but their miniature convoy continues to drift towards the left, until they pass under one last stringy tree, bent almost in two by the wind, and start to descend on a series of switchbacks that lead down along the face of the mountain. Heights don't really bother Karkat - he couldn't run around on rooftops all the damn time without getting over that - but he's still uneasy as gravity presses him forward against the seatbelt. Just past each carefully carved out switch in the road, he can see the smooth, steep inclines that run unbroken, too precarious to walk along, let alone drive across, and the occasional brink where the grassy slopes cut off and the abrupt cliff overhangs a crag of rocky, loose soil.

John's thumb taps along the back of Karkat's hand, and it helps dislodge some of the anxiety.

TG: awww
GG: oh no you don't! the last time you started teasing them, karkat tried to throw a plate at your head!
CG: IF HARLEY IS BEING THE VOICE OF REASON, SOMETHING IS VERY FUCKING WRONG HERE. THINK ABOUT THAT, DAVE. THINK ABOUT YOUR LIFE. THINK ABOUT YOUR CHOICES. THINK ABOUT THEM VERY HARD.
TG: ...
CG: DAMMIT.
CG: DON'T YOU DARE.
TG: very hard
CG: FUCK.
-- carcinoGeneticist [CG] blocked turntechGodhead [TG] from the chat! --
EB: uhhh...
GG: you cant just block people all the time, you know! dave is basically the reason we made the memo in the first place!
CG: WATCH ME. I RESERVE THE RIGHT TO ABUSE THIS POWER LIKE A GODDAMN AUTOCRATIC PESTERTYRANT.
CG: YOUR TIME WILL COME, HARLEY.

As they near the foot of the incline, it becomes easier to look around and observe the small valley they've found themselves in. Most of the space between the dark green cliffs that rise up on either side is occupied by a moderately sized lake, fringed on the bank opposite by an encrustation of ice and snow that extends up to the mountain's peak above. The road they follow curves around fifty yards from their side of the lake, the view of the dark surface broken up by copses of isolated trees.

It takes too long for Karkat to notice the building at the end of the road, and for a horrific moment he wonders if his fucking eyes have finally decided that right here, right now is when they're going to shit all over him and stop working entirely. The shape rises up in the distance, blurry and grainy, and he'd almost think he was hallucinating in the midst of one final ragestroke, except for the fact that a few seconds later Harley starts babbling about spatial distortions out loud, breaking the wonderful silence that reigned supreme in the car for so long, and Karkat buries his unending woe and despair by focusing on the fact that apparently all this void shield bullshit that Doctor Lalonde deals with is fucking effective. He can barely look at the lab building without his eyes threatening to skitter away to look at the piece of shit clouds or the very fucking boring lake.

But finally, after enough sideways staring, the building comes into focus. It's a dark, dark grey, non-descript and easily overlooked - essentially a block of dark stone that blends in with the barren slope behind it. There are plenty of wide windows, but all of them are of dark, tinted glass so that nothing can be seen through them.

They never pass a sign that states this is Lalonde Labs. It just seems to be implied.

It's only as they pull up and into the tiny parking lot that John's grip on Karkat's hand slacks off; he immediately misses it, but figures it might just be because they're leaving the vehicle soon, anyway. Then there's an 'oof!' from Harley and a grunt of surprise from the stoic douchebag, along with a squeak of indignation that can only mean WV has been caught in the crossfire, and Karkat swivels around to see John has plastered himself up against the window, one foot caught on Harley's long skirt and a knee dangerously close to Dave's groin as he stares at the double glass doors of the front of the lab. Dave's usual stoic mask has broken at last, a vague look of genuine consternation evident only in the furrow of his eyebrows, but John is oblivious.

The door on the left opens almost before Samuel Egbert finishes parking the car, and a head of blonde hair bobs out, and that's when Karkat realizes what's got John wired. Dave looks vaguely terrified as John flings the car door open with a sudden lurch that rattles the car, and WV tumbles off the floor of the backseat and out onto the road with a flare of green light; Karkat's not sure John's feet do more than skim over the ground in a token effort at pretending to walk before the dumbass tackles Rose Lalonde like a levitating brick shithouse.

The other hero takes it in stride, but she's also a head shorter than John and he lifts her up like - well, like he'd pick up anyone, really, like they weigh nothing at all, because John is ridiculously fucking strong. But as Karkat kicks his own door open to slouch over there and glare at Rose properly, he becomes all the more uncomfortably aware that the woman looks fragile as fuck.
New York City is at the ass-end of the country away from Seattle and given the sketchy nature of the Internet, with heroes in particular, most of what you find has been photoshopped beyond recognition, pandering to whatever weird kinks the forums have fixated on that week. But Karkat is pretty sure the Seer of Light has never looked so slight. Some female heroes like Harley could bench-press a small car (even without space powers) and it shows, but as a magic practitioner Seer relies more on majjykal spells than physical force. There's a thin line between slender and underweight that the Seer has always toed, but now she's crossed it, so that the belt around her waist and the way her bony shoulders press through her sleeves make it clear that the long yellow dress was tailored for someone of a far healthier weight. Even for a human she's too pale, with a sickly cast to her skin and a metric fuckton of heavy makeup around her eyes that emphasizes the shadows there like some perverse signpost.

They hug long enough that everyone else exits the car. Long enough that two more people emerge from the lab building. Long enough that Karkat starts to feel a territorial rumble start to rev in his throat, and lays a claw on John's shoulder because this is fucking ridiculous. "John -"

A hand shoots out, seizes Karkat around the neck, and drags him into the hugsmush, too.

...This is the opposite of what he intended to happen. "John, you fucking dumb shit!" he snarls, squirming and trying to claw his way free - or at least into a hug that only included one other person. But John's arm is an unbreakable bar of enforced hugging and it's difficult to flail around like a fucking lunatics when one's moirail has a hand in one's hair, skritching right up at the base of the skull where it always fucking itches.

Rose Lalonde turns her head to peer at him from under John's chin, a faint smile tugging on her matte purple lips. "Karkat. What a coincidence. I should have known you would be joining the commemorative tender embrace of reunion."

"We've never met before! Agh! Let me out of here!"

"Wait!" John exclaims, his face lighting up with realization. "We can finally do the thing!"

That's not ominous at all. Karkat is not terrified in the slightest by the devious look of impish cunning infecting John's smile. "Oh my fucking fuck, John, what are you - ARGH!"

John stumbles backwards, and drags both of them with him. Rose hooks both arms around the back of John's neck with an utterly serene, bemused expression, her hair flipping in the breeze. Karkat is somewhat less composed, and may or may not emit a sound uncannily similar to a distressed yodel.

"Jade!" John calls, and as though that's some kind of secret Harley-Egbert battle cry Harley collides with their hug circle on the opposite side of Karkat. Her arms stretch just barely far enough that she's able to squeeze all three of them, including John, and tilt all three of them off their feet for a dizzying second before setting them down again. "Dave, you too!"

Dave, the poor bastard, actually makes an effort to escape. He's seen what awaits him, and he fumbles and almost drops his cell phone. Not that anyone's paying attention to his messages as the four-person cannonball staggers toward him with all the coordination of three teenagers attempting to drag a surly troll along for the ride, all of their legs knocking into each other. Someone smells overwhelmingly of space lightning (three guesses as to who) and at some point Karkat grabs the back of Rose's dress by accident in what might be construed as a hug in any other universe, but it's only because without the extra clawhold he's going to end up trampled as they veer and blunder after Dave. By the time they crash into Dave, Karkat's caught himself laughing breathlessly, and he nearly bites through his lip cutting off the brief huff of laughter.
It's Harley who reels Dave in, nabbing him in a headlock and pulling him in between her and John. Of course, Harley being Harley, she yanks the human in so abruptly that his and Karkat's foreheads smack into each other and both of them wince.

"There!" John says, utterly content off in his own little world, and the arm around Karkat's back pulls him closer so that he can stick his face in Karkat's hair. "Gosh, I missed you guys," he mutters.

You've already been stuck with everyone but Rose for days, Karkat thinks, rolling his eyes, but doesn't say it aloud. John sounds the happiest and calmest he has since Diamonds Droog knocked him off his axis, and Karkat can't be the one to break that. Dave and Harley and Rose are all way too close for comfort and Karkat is about five seconds from losing his shit in front of everyone, but this is contradicted by the conflicting impulse to press in closer to John. The fact that being close to John coincidentally means letting these other three assholes within three feet of him has to be overlooked for the moment.

A tiny pressure flutters between Karkat's shoulder blades, and it takes him way too long to notice Rose is the one patting him on the back, and not John. "It is good to see you all," she agrees, ignoring Karkat when he flails at her and tries to disentangle himself from this clusterhug. Her eyes are sharp despite the tired bags shadowing them, and there's a trace of merriment that says she finds the whole situation is amusing to no end. "Brother dear, hello. Jade, Karkat, a pleasure to meet you in the flesh."

"Same!" Harley chirps, rubbing her cheek on Rose's and leaning too far to that side, so that their entire huddle lists dangerously and almost overbalances.

"Yeah, yeah, fine, fucking awesome. Let me go!" Karkat snaps, and this time he manages to duck under Rose's hand and spin out with John's relenting arm still on the back of his neck. He glowers at the four humans with his arms folded over his chest. "Okay, the happy fruity hugging asshole party is over, everyone can go home. We have accomplished literally all that we set out to achieve today, the rest doesn't even count."

"Such a spoilsport! I think you need more hug to make you less grumpy!" Harley says, laughing and not seeming to notice that Dave is now clawing at her arm around her neck in a distinctly panicked way that implies he can't breathe. Then there's a split second, not even half a blink, and Dave is out of the hug, too, shoulders up and chin jutting forward slightly as though to reassert his cool. "Daaaave!"

TG: no

"Hell no," Karkat adds. Because some things in life are worth fighting, even if it means sacrificing your dignity by publically allying with a total douchebag. From the way Dave's head tilts in a barely-there nod, Karkat thinks they're on the same page.

John doesn't push it, because he is the superior sibling in the Egbert-Harley complex. Obviously. He just laughs, all of his teeth showing, and lets go of Rose before it can get awkward again while Harley pouts in the background. But his grin diminishes noticeably when he looks at the two people who followed Rose out of the building. "Oh! Uh. Doctor Lalonde. Hi."

Karkat doesn't like the weird, unhappy note in John's voice, and shuffles closer to the kid's shoulder so that he can look at the blonde woman currently engaged in a stern parental stare competition with Samuel Egbert.

The outcome is a foregone conclusion, of course; you can't beat the Dadbert in a stern frown competition. He is simply the best there is. But she holds her own long enough that Karkat is mildly impressed; prolonged exposure to Samuel's disappointed stare has been known to cause even Dave to break out into a cold sweat. By the time Doctor Rue Lalonde admits defeat with a gracious nod of her head, a repentant smile on her lips, Karkat thinks she's set a new record. "John, darling," she says, the smile not quite reaching her eyes as she turns to face them. The resemblance between her and her daughter is perceptible but not absolute. "I wish we could have met under less worrying circumstances."

John is vibrating with tension, but Karkat can't tell if it's anger or not. From what he understands, everyone and their mother has reason to be more than a little pissed at Doctor Lalonde for shitting all over the concept of guardianship where Rose is concerned, but John's been evasive about it, willing to admit that he's upset on Rose's account but not to actually discuss it. All John says is, "Yeah," with none of his usual exuberance, and Karkat might not imagine the way the doctor closes her eyes in an imperceptible flinch. Rose's hand tightens on John's other arm, her expression unreadable as she determinedly does not look at her guardian.

"And who is this lovely young lady?" Samuel Egbert intercedes, directing a polite smile at the second person who had followed Rose outside. He must think it's a safe way to hustle their awkward asses past this incredibly fucking awkward moment they've managed to wallow in, by turning the conversation to focus on someone who's not a Lalonde. Karkat darts a passing glance at the troll, still more concerned with keeping an eye on John, and - Karkat stares.

Because he knows her.

"Kanaya Maryam," he mouths along as the troll says her name, bowing her head slightly in a clipped nod of greeting. She's dressed like someone straight off the runway, a dark blue gown with a high collar and boots with heels, and her horns are daringly asymmetrical, the kind of quirk that trolls would pay plenty to either get rid of or to imitate, depending on what's in style. She holds herself in a manner that is deliberate and aware, a purposeful grace that doesn't quite hide the battle-ready stance her feet have fallen into, just barely wide enough that she could probably kick a man in the face before he noticed the long slit left up the side of her skirt to allow freedom of movement.

He has never seen her before a day in his life, but the lack of recognition in her jade green eyes still stings when she spares him a cursory glance. He can't fight the impulse to zone out a little and listen for the beat of her pulse. It's strange, sluggish and cold and brilliant with bursts of color that he can't parse in his mind's eye, but at the same time it's not strange at all; it's exactly what he expected to sense.

John's elbow nudges him with precise care in the arm rather than the ribs, and Karkat jolts out of his stupor to find that all his pancracked staring has earned him a suspicious frown from the jadeblood. Great. Now of all times his thinkpan would decide to sacrifice the last of its meager, putrid excuse for sanity in exchange for the rare and unprecedented opportunity to act like a complete and utter shitwit in front of new people. He coughs, and swallows the wrong way, and wastes a good ten seconds choking on his own spit, which is a whole new level of personal failure, even for him. "...Hello," he says at last. No need to make any mention of the fact that he knew her name before she said it. That's just unfathomably freakish and he's trying to be somewhat less obviously a fuckup from here on out. Really.

"Hello," she replies, formal and cool. "Is there something that I may be able to assist you with?"

Hahahaha oh fuck she's pissed. "No, I - fuck - shit -" Karkat says, drawing even closer to John on reflex, because he doesn't know how he knows but he's pretty sure if he pisses her off much more Kanaya could fuck his shit up. "I - have we - met before? Because you seem really fucking familiar."

Just like that, Kanaya's expression clears. "I do not see how we could have, unless you make a practice of frequenting the greater Philadelphia area," she says. "This is certainly the first time I've been near Seattle."

He wants to crawl into a hole and bury himself out of sheer embarrassment. He can feel heat rising up in his cheeks and the tips of his ears, and he finally just gives up and latches onto John's free arm, staring at the ground because at least the ground can't fucking judge him. "Yeah, no, you're right. Just ignore whatever fresh fuck comes out of my mouth. The grubloaf posing as a thinkpan in my skull should have been culled ten fucking years ago."

"It's fine. It would be an understandable reason to stare." Kanaya smiles. "Perhaps you are familiar with my work."

She likes sewing and chainsaws and has the most extensive library of lurid supernatural romances in the entire eastern sector, his brain sees fit to inform him, none of which has anything to do with the possibility that maybe he's hallucinating all this déjà vu based on seeing her unknown work. "What do you do?" he asks weakly, even as they all start to trail after Doctor Lalonde as she leads them into the building.

Harley bounces ahead, her voice echoing in the cavernous lobby as she chatters nonstop at the doctor and the Novitiate about god only knows what, while Samuel Egbert admonishes her to keep her feet on the ground. Behind him, Karkat is aware of Dave's rapid, skipping pulse as the stoic douchebag brings up the rear, apparently slouching along at his own pace instead of joining the group. WV runs around them all in wavering circles, stopping to inspect the tiles or tap on the wall and in general be a tiny tornado of squeaking chaos. Karkat has no idea where Bec is; for all he knows, Harley has just decided to leave the barkbeast crammed in the trunk with all their luggage to avoid dealing with it. If her space powers are fuzzy, Karkat doesn't want to know what will happen the first time the barely-sentient space wolf starts trying to pull some fuckery.

Kanaya falls into step beside them on Rose's other side, linking her arm with the fragile human's with a warm, open smile reserved solely for the blonde girl. "I auspice," she says, with just the right weight of tantalizing, enigmatic significance in her tone that Karkat can tell she's fucking with him, because auspicism isn't a fucking job, it's romance.

And John is snickering. He's trying to muffle it, but John is awful at the stealth gambit, even when it comes to his pranks, and Karkat eyes him sourly until he can see tears welling up in John's eyes at the effort needed to contain his laughter. "What," Karkat says flatly, leaning more of his weight on John's side until they slowly start to push Rose and Kanaya toward the wall with their combined mass.

"You are familiar. With her work," John manages to say between bursts of giggles. "Work work, Karkat!"

Work work has become the stupidly insane way that a household full of heroes has begun to refer to hero work, emphasis and all, and when John says it like that, it's fucking obvious. "No way. Philadelphia?!"

He ends up on the receiving end of two elegantly arched eyebrows, one from Kanaya and one from Rose. They couldn't have been more synchronized if they'd rehearsed it. "Yes."

The Malachite Sylph, then.
He doesn’t say it aloud. He just shakes his head, rubbing at a temple as the implications sink in. "You’re fucking kidding me. John."

"Y-yeah?"

"Exactly how many heroes do we personally know?"

That wipes the mischievous smile off John’s face.

The Egbert house is empty.

But two people are still watching it.

From afar, tucked behind the chimney of a house across the street, a robot who was once a man observes, the pistons in its chest slowed so that the sound of the machinery doesn't alert the other watcher to his presence. He’s been avoiding Diamonds Droog’s wandering eyes for years, and has no interest in bidding the woman herself any more than a passing ‘tally ho.’

His precious granddaughter had left him a message informing him that this house had been compromised, and to postpone their long-overdue meeting to a later time, but he had not thought Droog would be so bold as to come here herself, so soon after the premises was vacated for the weekend.

This bodes ill.

Below, on the sidewalk before 21605 Fir Drive, Diamonds Droog revels in something she thought she'd never have the opportunity to witness: her boss texting her, seeking to confirm something he would usually already know.

She makes her excuses, gives him a rather creative interpretation of the sequence of events that led her here, and then closes the phone to bask in the gratification of a hunch indulged. The void wards covering this neighborhood are weak, enough to prevent whatever enables the boss’s disturbing omniscience but nothing compared to the distortion currently hiding the heroes from surveillance. Her own people lost track of them some time ago, perplexed so utterly that they became lost in the Cascades for several hours, and reappeared only to find themselves halfway to Idaho.

But the heroes are not her problem unless they once again interfere in Crew business. Diamonds has obtained permission to focus her efforts on Spades Slick instead, and to shore up the last of the infrastructure needed to maintain basic Crew operations in Seattle so that Hearts will be able to handle it himself. She anticipates she’ll be able to return to the Crew base within days, hopefully with Slick in hand, the Heir of Breath and his cadre of heroes no longer on her radar. The heroes are the boss's obsession, not hers. Hearts is still ignoring her missives on Scofflaw, in a sulk over being cut out of the loop by the boss, but Diamonds scorns the personal animosity he managed to build against the Heir and Hemogoblin in so short a time. Perhaps having been sidelined by Diamonds will instill some professionalism and dignity in Hearts – but she doubts it.

A faint twinge of unease pings at her when she notes that yet another day has passed without some insipid note or request for help from the bumbling Clubs. But she’s not overly concerned.

Marlowe calls her on the disposable cell to inform her that he has obtained the item she requested. She may have to consider replacing him, soon; he’s deeply entrenched in some of her more questionable exploits now, and the task she sent him on dances with outright betrayal of the boss. And Diamonds, of all the Midnight Crew suit members, is very much aware of how easily Marlowe’s loyalty and devotion could be manipulated to fixate on another target.

A shame. He’s been quite useful. But of course, all things in their time. Diamonds turns away from the house of John Egbert with a satisfied smile.

Back to business.

In the parking lot outside Lalonde Laboratory, a series of loud bangs and thumps emanates from the trunk of a parked car. Several muffled curses follow, until, with a bang, the lock gives and the trunk flies open.

Spades Slick clambers out from under a duffel bag and stumbles inelegantly out of the trunk of the Egbert's car, with a distinct aura of impending murder. He spits out a mouthful of white fur, and glowers back over his shoulder at the wolf he's been forced to share trunk space with for the past three hours, ever since the goddamn Witch had the temerity to stuff her pet hellbeast into Spades's personal hiding spot.

Becquerel snorts through its nose, and tucks its muzzle back under a paw. It had tolerated his presence, but Spades has a crick in his neck from holding himself tense and wary, ready to stab if the wolf turned on him or if someone pried the trunk open and expose him.

Having escaped the trunk, he shakes off a sweater that has tangled around his heel, muttering constantly under his breath as he shovels it back into the trunk. He arranges it over the wolf guardian's head with a parting sneer. Then he crouches and starts making his way toward the building that looms before him, a mind-blurring mess of Void that projects itself outward. He grudgingly admires the kind of effort it would take for a non-player to manipulate an aspect to that extent, but also it's giving him a goddamn headache so no, he'll never admit it out loud. Reminds him of the shit they had to use to ward off Horror bleed off back on Derse, but those days are long gone, and it hadn't done shit to prevent the players from dicking around during eclipses, listening to the whispers that slipped through, and inviting in the madness.

Bunch 'a morons.

Spades Slick scurries to search for a side door. Like hell is he stupid enough to waltz in through the front and get caught before he even has a chance to stab anyone.

---

Their state is one of cautious, quiet, guarded toleration.

Or at least, that seems to be the balance Rue Lalonde is attempting to strike while Kanaya's in the room. Rose still feels excruciatingly aware of the many, many potential barbs and near-insults that her mother could let fly at any moment, the narrowly averted comments that would no doubt have focused on Rose's latest foolishness, or perhaps the uncouth way she persists in resisting offers of reconciliation. Rue Lalonde is a passive-aggressive submersible lurking beneath the surface, and Rose is bleeding out, dead in the water.

If it weren't for Kanaya's presence, she knows that this would already have erupted into all out war. That tension hums between them like a live wire whenever Rue dares to enter the room, and more than once Rose feels the urge to strike preemptively, to shred this false peace with a particularly pointed jibe.

But their destruction would be mutually assured, because Kanaya is having absolutely none of that. Mediation, after all, is her forte, and she seems to see Rose's feuds as her personal responsibility.

"You are both being wholly unreasonable," Kanaya says, arranging the ice pack on Rose's forehead and gently smacking away any hands Rose puts up to adjust it herself. Her face paint has been applied perfectly, but the hints of strain and irritation remain in the corners of her eyes. "We will have company soon, and neither of you are fit for it. Must I hold an intervention for my own lover?"

There are a number of things Rose could say to that, all of them on the edge of her tongue, and it's only with the last dregs of her self-control that she swallows them down like sharp knives. Kanaya is coming down off an ashen rejection and thanks to Rose she's spent the past day and night flooring it all the way to Seattle in a panic instead of letting off steam, and Rose will respect that if it kills her. Still, some things slip through. "Kanaya, I'm fairly certain that at least a third of our relationship is based on one long intervention," she can't help but point out, easing herself up higher on the pillow and wincing as her entire head throbs a warning. It's difficult to say what the major source of the pain is - a post-seer fugue headache, a Horrorterror-induced migraine, unease generated by the heavy void wards, or perhaps simply prolonged exposure to an overly aggressive mother figure. It's not as though she has much personal experience with the latter, after all.

"Do not remind me," Kanaya says darkly, passing Rose the spool of yarn and a pair of needlekind that make Rose grimace until Kanaya fixes a patented evil eye on her. The needles were a gift from Rue, presented without a word earlier that day, and Rose hates them for that alone. But Kanaya believes it's a peace offering, and wants Rose to be cautiously open to the possibility of a neutral reconciliation.

Rose sees only the typical guilt of an estranged parent who thinks that gifts and petty material offerings will somehow erase all the problems in their relationship. It's more commonly seen in parents who have recently divorced, who wish to appease their children and soothe their own guilty conscience, but the basic psychology behind it remains the same.

"I do not like having you here. Either of you, really," Kanaya adds, when she's satisfied that Rose is indeed occupying herself with the task of knitting, and not wallowing. The troll's hair is choppy and messy with golden clips and pins, a single ring around her unhooked horn, and she's sporting a dark blue dress that glitters and flares around her heels when she folds her legs. It's a more summery skirt than any Rose has ever seen Kanaya wear, as though anticipating spring when winter's only just ended, but Kanaya balances it with a high halter neckline that covers nearly all of her shoulders before exposing bare arms, a heavy choker necklace adorned with heavy topaz stones lying along her collarbones.

She's gorgeous, and Rose has been sleeping in fits and suffering from such crippling headaches that honestly she isn't sure if she's remembered to shower since Chicago.

Rose hooks the needle through the slip knot with perhaps more force than is wise. It certainly earns her another reproving look. "Mmm," is all she allows herself to say, a noncommittal hum as she begins to knit.

She's been drifting in and out of consciousness every few hours since the incident with the cue ball, and at some point, Rue had convinced Kanaya that they needed to relocate to the laboratory that Rue apparently worked out of for all the years that Rose and John were in middle school together.

It's all too easy for Rose to summon up the mental image of her staying over at John's house, the two of them plastered to the couch after binging on campy Batman and Hitchcock films, oblivious to the fact that her mother had foisted her off on Samuel Egbert quite neatly for the rest of the night so that she could fuck off to the laboratory. For a good part of her childhood Rose had considered the Egbert residence an extension of her home rather than the house of a friend, but only in hindsight has she realized that the amount of time she spent there would surely have been considered excessive if Samuel Egbert had thought she had a guardian to go home to at all.

And Rose had been awake enough when they arrived to have the pleasure of witnessing Kanaya verbally tear Rue Lalonde a new one when the troll caught wind of all the alcohol that Rue naturally kept on the premises. Bad enough, Rose thinks, that she’s had to wait these past few days, knowing that John was only a simple teleport spell away, and yet being unable to muster up the concentration needed to pull off the jump; now, she is keenly aware of the fully stocked bar that Rue has had her assistants lock away from the both of them.

As though locks could stop either Rue or Rose if they put their minds to it. The void prevents outside influences from infringing on the facility by dampening ambient magic, blocking out prying eyes, and cutting off the voices of the Horrorterrors, but thaumaturgic research couldn’t go on under the wards if there weren’t exceptions that allowed for internal majjykal activity.

Rose has allowed herself to believe that the burn of her thirst might have diminished, but being able to foresee every path that can take her to that locked door just down the hall is not helping her sober streak in the slightest. Her mind is in tatters once more, and Kanaya is working damage-control on multiple fronts while Rose tries to contain everything that her panic stripped bare. To add insult to injury, when her mother had first walked in and announced that the room had been sealed off, Rose had been unable to keep from remarking that she must have just topped off her emergency flask, to last her through the unexpected drought.

Rue had stared her right in the eye and told her that she was attempting to go sober, too.

It's maddening. Rue reeks just as much of alcohol as ever; it's the only thing that Rose can see around her conspicuous lack of an aura. It's a sham, just another insipid move on Rue's part, and the only real question is how long Rue is willing to endure sobriety in order to prove her point. Quite a while, Rose should think, because if nothing else, when her mother finds a way to rub Rose the wrong way she commits to it whole-heartedly.

With the equivalent of a fully stocked liquor store in the same building as them, it's a toss up, really, who will break first.

Knit two, purl two. Rose doesn't have a clue what she's knitting, but the rhythm quickly becomes effortless as her fingers remember the old patterns. She pauses only to sporadically answer texts from John and Dave and Jade and now, for the first time, Karkat Vantas. The four of them are still in the process of driving out to the meeting site where Rue has people waiting to escort them the rest of the way to the remote lab, and Jade at least is going stir crazy. John is in higher spirits now than he was a few days ago, and Rose thinks that he's finally begun to calm down and digest all of the bombshells that he had to deal with one right after the other. Dave presumably zoned out some time ago, because his very revealing, if piecemeal, chatter about all and sundry cut off quite abruptly with no explanation. And Karkat...

Well. Rose had been under the impression that Karkat was considered by all and sundry to be perpetually irritable, but apparently he's managed to get himself on more pain-killers than she has.

In other words, he's not just irritable. He's high as balls.

CG: LALONDE.
CG: SO.
CG: YOU’RE THE PASTY HUMAN GIRL IN ALL OF DAD EGBERT’S RIDICULOUS HUMAN PHOTO ALBUMS.
TT: Correct.
CG: AND THE SEER OF LIGHT.
TT: Also correct.
CG: BUT IN YOUR SPARE TIME YOU MORPH INTO A TENTACLE CRAZED DARK GOD FROM THE NEGAVERSE AGAINST YOUR WILL.
TT: ...Yes. The things which you have stated are indeed truth. You may refer to me in my secondary form as the Dark Lady Ketos Calmasis Senescence, supreme tentacle sorceress of the Outermost Ring and undisputed Ruler of All Things Cephalopodan.
TT: Is there anything else you need me to clarify? We really should have spoken before this, but from what I can tell neither of us have been particularly functional sentient beings as of late.
CG: ...
CG: YEAH OKAY, HOLD ON. I’M PRETTY SURE YOU’RE FUCKING WITH ME, BUT I’M LETTING THE DARK OCTOLADY TITLE SLIDE BECAUSE I CAN’T EVEN DEAL WITH THAT RIGHT NOW.
CG: I NEED A MINUTE.
TT: Oh? Something the matter?

There is a lengthy pause. Rose raises an eyebrow, and wonders if she should switch back over to John’s window and ask if something’s gone wrong. But then Karkat resumes his end of the conversation, and she is able to shrug and lower the eyebrow again.

CG: BACK OFF, WOMAN, WAIT JUST A FUCKING MINUTE. I’M PRACTICING MY FUCKING DEEP BREATHING EXERCISES.
CG: BECAUSE.
CG: FUCK.
CG: HAAAAAAAAAGH.
TT: I’m afraid I’m not following.
CG: OKAY. FUCK. HARLEY WAS TRYING TO GET HER GRIMY PAWS ON MY PHONE, BUT THE CRISIS HAS BEEN AVERTED. FOR ONCE.
TT: You were saying?
CG: RIGHT. WHERE THE FUCK WAS I.
CG: OH FOR FUCK’S SAKE, I HAD THIS PIECE OF SHIT CONVERSATION PLANNED OUT. I HAD THIS DOWN.
CG: I THINK WE JUST PASSED A TRACTOR HAULING AN ENTIRE PORTABLE TWO STOREY BUILDING ON A FLATBED TRUCK.
CG: WHO EVEN DOES THAT? HUMANS, THAT’S WHO.
TT: ...
TT: Are you...entirely certain that you’re messaging the correct individual?
CG: WHAT.
CG: OF COURSE I FUCKING AM, YOU OBNOXIOUS PURPLE TEXT TENTACLE WHISPERER.
CG: STOP TRYING TO DISTRACT ME FROM THE FUCKING SPECTACULAR INTERROGATION GOING ON HERE.
TT: The commentary about passing traffic just seems a little...off topic.
CG: NO FUCK YOU. WHAT I NOTICE ABOUT TRAFFIC AND WHEN I MENTION IT IN CONVERSATION IS NONE OF YOUR BUSINESS YOU SHIT.
TT: Mmmm. Let me guess. Two tablets of over the counter Hamnox?
CG: HOW WOULD YOU EVEN KNOW THAT?
TT: It's the strongest pain relieving medication on the market that Mr Egbert would have been able to obtain without drawing unwanted attention. My sympathies regarding your injuries.
TT: I would recommend not taking it on an empty stomach.
CG: OH. YEAH. JOHN SAID THAT, TOO.
CG: WHY ARE WE TALKING ABOUT THIS?

Ah. Now they're getting to the meat of the matter.

TT: Because John has expressed a serious amount of attachment to you, and your recent health troubles have caused him an corresponding amount of distress.
TT: Therefore, your health is my concern. How are you feeling, Karkat? Anything in particular you would wish to discuss? I am all ears. Professional, discreet, non-judgmental ears.
CG: I'VE GOT A HEAD FULL OF NIGHTMARES, A THORACIC CAVITY FULL OF USELESS BONE FRAGMENTS, AND A BACKSEAT FULL OF EXTRANEOUS HUMANS.
CG: I'D RATHER FUCKING DISCUSS ANYTHING OTHER THAN THE IMPENDING RAGEFIT THAT I AM ONLY JUST BARELY SUPPRESSING TO AVOID GIVING DAVE MOTHERFUCKING STRIDER THE SATISFACTION OF SEEING MY LOSE MY SHIT.
CG: MORE TO THE POINT. I'M HERE TO FUCKING WARN YOU THAT YOU FUCKED JOHN OVER ONCE ALREADY. IF YOU THINK YOU'RE GOING TO GET A SECOND CHANCE, GUESS WHAT?
CG: ME, THAT'S WHAT. ME.
TT: Ah. Yes. I have already received a similar lecture from Dave.
CG: THAT WAS A FUCKING JOKE, RIGHT?
CG: HAHA. LOOK AT ME, ENGAGING IN THIS PLEASANT DISPLAY OF VAGUELY BEMUSED HUMOR WHEEZES FOR YOUR SAKE. BECAUSE I KNOW THAT PRETENTIOUS DICK-OBSESSED ASSHOLE COULD NOT POSSIBLY HAVE BEAT ME TO THE REQUISITE WARNING SPEECH.
TT: By more than a week, actually. Shortly after the incident in New York City that put the three of us back into contact with each other.
CG: GOD
CG: FUCKING
CG: DAMMIT!!!
TT: I owe both you and Dave a debt for keeping John together and sane when I could not. You may feel free to collect at any time.
TT: There is not much I can say to justify my actions. An unfortunate combination of isolation, alcoholism, and Horrorterrors took their toll on my sanity, and by the time I realized that I had ceased communicating with John -with anyone but Kanaya, really - their grimdark tendrils were firmly entrenched in my mind.
TT: John forgives easily, and Dave seems content to hold it reserve. But if you should wish to engage in a round of chasticuffs, as would be your due as the moirail of a mistreated party, then feel free.
CG: YOU ACTUALLY KNOW WHAT THAT IS?
CG: HOLY FUCK.
TT: I've been doing my research. It has been made clear to me that my knowledge of the fourfold varieties of troll-oriented interpersonal relationships has been sorely lacking. I'm afraid I overspecialized in favor of more general psychological concepts and illnesses. I've been rectifying this oversight.
CG: YOU'RE KIDDING ME.
TT: Not at all. The psychology of interpersonal relationships seems absolutely fascinating. A new frontier.
TT: John has informed me that you are in fact a self-taught expert in the field of quadrants as depicted in literature and filmography. If that is the case, I would be interested in obtaining your perspective.

CG: ...INCREDIBLE.
TT: Hm?
CG: HOW THE FUCK IS THIS POSSIBLE.
CG: YOU'RE ACTUALLY TOLERABLE. I'M FUCKING DUTYBOUND TO DESPISE YOU ON PRINCIPLE FOR WHAT YOU DID TO JOHN, AND IT TURNS OUT YOU MIGHT BE THE ONLY REASONABLE FRIEND HE ACTUALLY HAS.
CG: I MEAN JUST LOOK AT HARLEY. LITERALLY RAISED BY WOLVES. THAT ONLY WORKS WHEN THE WOLF IS AN ACTUAL FUCKING LUSUS AND THE WRIGGLER IN QUESTION IS ACTUALLY A WRIGGLER.
CG: CAN YOU IMAGINE A HUMAN WRIGGLER RAISED BY A LUSUS?
CG: I DIDN'T EVEN WANT TO BE RAISED BY A LUSUS.
CG: GOD I REGRET IMAGINING THAT.
TT: I'm fairly certain there is at least one work of classic Alternian literature concerning just that subject. I could recommend it to you.
CG: OH GOD PLEASE NO. I ASSURE YOU NO WORK OF LITERATURE COULD POSSIBLY MATCH THE SHEER MAGNITUDE OF THE IMAGINARY CLUSTERFUCK MY SHITTY EXCUSE FOR A THINKPAN IS CURRENTLY FRYING UP.
CG: THIS IS WORSE THAN THOSE FUCKING OMELEBOMINATIONS DAVE TRIED TO SHOVEL DOWN OUR POOR UNSUSPECTING PROTEIN CHUTES THIS MORNING.
TT: It may also just be the pain medication talking.
CG: DON'T REMIND ME. I CAN ALREADY TELL I'M GOING TO REGRET EVERY SINGLE MESSAGE I'VE SENT TODAY. CAN WE JUST MUTUALLY AGREE TO DELETE ALL TRACE OF THIS EMBARRASSING EXCUSE FOR A CONVERSATION WHEN THIS IS ALL OVER? I NEED TO FILTER WAY MORE OF THIS SHITFUCKERY OUT OF MY SYSTEM BEFORE I START SEGUEING INTO THE PROS AND CONS OF OMELET INGREDIENTS.
TT: As fascinating as that would be, why don't we talk about your nightmares instead?

Karkat does not want to discuss his nightmares. The words he uses to tell Rose exactly where she can place her concern are disturbingly specific. However, this does happen to send him off on a most intriguing tangent concerning the use of dream motifs in some obscure troll soap opera called Dazed Days, and from there, with some nudging, onto a meandering lecture on the wonders of troll Will Smith's acting.

He is an...interesting character. She can see why Dave would enjoy provoking him, just to see what frankly incredible metaphors the troll might come up with next.

"They'll be here soon," she says, beginning another row of purl stitches.

Kanaya nods - and then stiffens. She removes the claw massaging the back of Rose's neck and slides off the bed, prowling towards the door with a perfectly smooth expression.

Rue doesn't send assistants to speak to them. She's still trying to take a 'more personal, hands-on' approach when it comes to dealing with Rose, and when Rose discovers who gave Rue Lalonde that advice, she is giving them a strongly worded piece of her mind.

Knowing this, however, Rose sits up further, removes the ice pack from her forehead, and concentrate on her knitting all the more intently. She shall knit like this is the misshapen cozy destined to warm the cockles of the Horrorterrors themselves, if need be. Anything to make it clear to Rue that she could care less about whatever important news bulletin she feels the need to share right this moment.
Kanaya opens the door before Rue can so much as knock – which she has been doing, rather than simply barging in, a fact that Rose can be grudgingly thankful for. The troll plants herself in front of the doorway between Rose, cants her head in a nod, and, after she's thoroughly inspected Rue Lalonde for whatever she felt the need to look for, holds the door wider as Rue steps in.

The doctor is not alone though. Silent aside from the faint click of her pale feet on the floor, the Wondering Querent slips into the room like a sigh, nodding back to Kanaya without a word.

The last time Rose saw the WQ, the carapacian had been creeping away through the dark night, a pearly white specter against the backdrop of the forest that surrounded the Lalonde Laboratories in Maine. She'd also been the only person at the labs to have been almost eager to explain things to Rose, and Rose has often cursed the circumstances that had limited the amount of time she'd had that night to question the Querent more thoroughly on the topic of Skaia.

Now, the abnormally tall, slender carapacian smiles at Rose gently, her dark eyes thoughtful and worried as she claps her claws over her chest and stands near the wall. Rue speaks instead, stepping as close to the bed as she dares before drawing her shoulders back to begin. "Rose, darling. You look well."

"I look like shit," Rose counters, not taking her eyes from the knitting needles. Her other sight, just barely extended for fear of upsetting the balance in her mind, takes in the hollow where Rue should be and the benevolent glow of the WQ's ancient soul, a persistent radiance that mantles the alien like wings. "May I help you?"

Rue's eyes flicker, and she takes another hesitant step toward the bed. Like a circling bird of prey, Kanaya rounds the bed to approach from the other side, watching Rue Lalonde's face with an expression of consideration; Rose can tell the troll is sizing Rue up again, trying to determine where and when to push to try and bring mother and daughter to a balance point. Undeterred by the scrutiny, Rue goes on. "I - am glad that you are making use of the new needlekind. Are they working well for you?"

Every word comes out stilted and awkward, as though the doctor is reading from a script, which just makes the act all the more painfully obvious. Rose's lip curls. "Adequately," she says distantly, in a bored tone that makes it quite clear that by adequately she means the exact opposite.

Rue's mouth tightens, but Rose doesn't see the flinch she was aiming to incite. More significantly, Kanaya is vibrating with a faint growl of irritation at her side, and Rose checks herself before she can press the advantage. It is no good attempting to provoke her mother into showing her hand if she annoys Kanaya into temporary vacillation in the process.

"As long as you're happy, darling," Rue says at last, when she's regained control of herself. "I simply wished to give you a progress update on that worrying artifact you saw fit to play with."

"There is the haughtiness Rose has been waiting for. She rides it out, because even with her mind once again in the process of recovering, she has regained the self-control she'd cultivated as a child to deal with her mother's tactics. "Oh, by all means," Rose says, rolling her eyes derisively. "Have you managed to divine the secrets of the cue ball?"

Rue's expression tells her all that she needs to know, really. There's a bitterness there, the disdain of having been foiled in an attempt to outdo Rose, that always gives her away. "It is powerful," Rue says, folding her arms. "Worryingly so. I have some of my best analyzing it, and we have yet to be able to crack the outer shell of its defenses."

"Defenses?" Rose snorts, setting aside the knitting. This is the first real test of this little confrontation, and Kanaya tenses at her side as Rose shifts her legs out from under the sheets.

But when Rose totters to her feet, it is with minimal shaking. Her headache throbs once and then subsides, which is reassuring. And being on her feet helps Rose reclaim some of her dignity. "I certainly had no trouble accessing it," she says, permitting herself a small smile of triumph.

"If it let you use it as a scrying tool, that only makes the situation more troubling," Rue sighs. "I'm tempted to ship it back out to the Maine facility. They might make more progress with the newer equipment than we can with our limited staff."

Rose's fingers twitch. Common sense urges her to never tangle with the strange green and white sentience that reached out to her through the cue ball ever again. Anything that can reach out to the Furthest Void and barter with the many-angled ones in their natural habitat is far beyond Rose's level of power.

But every word out of Rue's mouth drips condescension, as though backhandedly daring Rose to prove she could do any better. Always, always, always, this hateful woman has to push and prod and pick and -

WQ: I would advise against tampering with the eye at all.

Rose's mouth seals off, and she and her mother both snap to look at the carapacian at the same time, a motion so similar that it makes Rose's skin crawl. Kanaya has joined her in standing now, one claw on Rose's shoulder in both comfort and warning, her attention also focused on the Wondering Querent.

"So you've said," Rue says. She's clearly skeptical, but not dismissive. Rose can only guess what has caused Rue Lalonde to gaze upon the Querent as though she's finally dealing with someone she could respect. Rue has never considered anyone her intellectual equal in all the years that Rose has had to deal with her quiet, unpleasant vanity. "What do you know of it?"

The Querent's head tips to the side, and Rose realizes that she's the sole target of the level, considering stare, even as the carapacian answers Rue. Or perhaps she and Kanaya - it's difficult to say when they're standing so close together.

WQ: Artifacts of that nature are not trustworthy. They serve as the eyes of one whose influence cannot be understated, and allow him to see and manipulate events to his satisfaction without being detected.

WQ: Occasionally they go dormant and he loses track of them in the world. But this one is awake and aware, and the void wards here will only blind it for so long before it begins to sow misfortune and strife in the service of his will. The sooner it is destroyed, the better for us all.

It's too familiar.

But Rue doesn't know what Rose knows, and what Kanaya knows, on the subject of a certain white-texted individual who could see what he should not have been able to, outside the bounds of technology and magic as they are understood, or that the cue ball had been present in Kanaya's apartment at the time. So while Rose slowly but surely exchanges a significant glance with Kanaya, the doctor raises an eyebrow. "And who would this man be?"

WQ: Not a man at all. There are still things in this world that you would not understand, Doctor, things that will not make sense until you have...seen what there is to see.

"But do you have a name?" Kanaya asks.
The blink of surprise on the Querent's part isn't fake. Rose can see the genuine astonishment in the carapacian's aura, as though the question, as obvious as it should have been what Rue was really asking.

Well, no one has ever said that carapacians think the same way as terrestrial beings. They are aliens, after all, and notorious for their less-than-forthcoming nature on the matter of everything from their origins to their religion to the ectobiological technology they use to reproduce. Everything that is known about them is either known circumstantially or is purely speculative.

WQ: I - I apologize. It is always difficult for us to be straightforward. A holdover from - well. It doesn't matter now.

WQ: You may be familiar with him already. He has assumed leadership of the Midnight Crew of late. He is the one they call Doc Scratch.

Not the most pleasant revelation to have to swallow when one is already dealing with a post-Horrorterror hangover.

This facility, built to house the operations of over two hundred scientists, lab techs, and administrators, currently contains fifty or so individuals. It is, according to Rue, barely more than a skeleton crew; when the Lalondes moved out to Maine, most of Rue's team had gone with her, and remained in the main laboratory to continue time-sensitive experiments when the lead scientist herself took off to pursue her wayward daughter.

Maybe five accompanied her mother on this ill-thought out mission of perverse good will - or perhaps were only just now flown out in light of recent developments - and it's not difficult to see the pattern in those Rue had flown in: two neurosurgeons, a mindscapeist, a therapist who let it slip that he did his clinical internship at a residential program dedicated to recovering cult victims, and the Wondering Querent herself.

She wonders if Rue intended to imply that Rose would require brain surgery to recover from this latest mishap. Kanaya certainly thinks the idea is a little over the top. And since Rose is, by and large, attempting to avoid being the instigator of the inevitable break between her and Rue while Kanaya is in the vicinity, she keeps mum on the matter. Thankfully, in the last hour before John's arrival, Kanaya firmly directs Rue out of the lobby so that Rose can pace before the glass doors in peace, and stare out over the pristine mountain valley toward the switchback trail that is the only method of entering and exiting the area on the ground. With her sight as benumbed as it is by the wards, she can't see much further than that, and the last scrykind she tried to use to amplify her sight had been a trap planted by the very Midnight Crew that has been plaguing them so persistently.

But while Rose would have been content to pace or even to go to meet John further up the road, she remains in the facility, and at one point is even forced to abandon her vigil.

This is because Ambrose and Oriole Strider beat the main group by a good half hour.

And they somehow manage it without having informed anyone that they were coming at all. Rue is certainly surprised when the first scientist she sends out to the ranger station returns early, terrified as he stammers that no, they hadn't asked for or given a password, they'd just kind of shown up in a full-size pickup truck with the windows rolled down and TNGHT blasting and hauled the poor man into the truck with them when he refused to help them out. Whatever Bro Strider said to convince him to lead them to the laboratory had apparently been too ironic or too traumatizing for the poor scientist to argue.
"You have ignored every single one of my invitations," Rue says, exasperated, her arms folded tight as she tries to argue with Ambrose. "I would have sent the jet to bring you up."

'Tries' being the operative word. Rose watches, fascinated, from the couch by the window where she has taken up residence, as Bro Strider shrugs and flat-out ignores the whole thing. "Need to have a word with the kid," is all he says, hands in his pockets. Which means nothing. Rose has seen the Puppeteer on broadcasts; he is the quickest draw at swordkind in the Southwest, and perhaps in the world.

Meanwhile, a distinctly orange Dave keeps a safe distance from the eldest of the Strider clan, glancing around him in nervous twitches and scanning the ceiling and walls as though expecting a surprise attack at any moment. One of his wings is utterly magnificent, a clean curve of orange and red and gold large enough to, presumably, lift someone of that size in some semblance of flight. However, the other is still taped up, as Dave had reported, quivering constantly against his side with barely repressed nerves. With all the bandages Rose can't even see where the break would have been.

Rue looks disgruntled. It's an awful look on her. Rose does her best to memorize the image to reminisce on in darker times. "If you can, you're welcome to try. She's stonewalled quite effectively when I attempt it," she sniffs, casting a not-so-subtle frown in Rose's direction.

Ah. Rose is the kid being referred to. How refreshing. "Kanaya, a moment?" she says, placing a hand over Kanaya's claws when the troll shifts at her side. Rose can feel the muscles in her own back shifting as she straightens up, aware of the man's regard even though his gaze is hidden beneath those damnable shades.

She doesn't know how to think about her father. Never mind that Dave's habit of thinking of the man as their elder brother has infected Rose's impression of him - even John refers to the man as Bro - Rose is still wrapping her mind around the fact that she has a second parent at all, when she isn't even interested in keeping the first.

"If you are sure," Kanaya says. She squints at Ambrose, nostrils flaring. "He is dangerous."

"High praise, coming from you," Rose murmurs, and Kanaya tilts her head with a faint smirk of acknowledgement before sailing off across the lobby, a picture of grace as she strides toward the winged Strider as though to speak to him in an undertone.

She doesn't see Bro pass Kanaya on the way over. One moment he is watching Rue Lalonde flounce off in her latest silent tantrum, and the next Rose must school her expression into something pleasant as she straightens up, aware of the man's regard even though his gaze is hidden beneath those damn shades.

"Kid," he says by way of greeting. She can read absolutely nothing from his tone, flat and monotonous and brusque. If it were anyone else, she'd say he sounded rude, but he's simply too curt to assign even that much emotion to him.

"Bro," she says, the name odd and spare in her mouth. She is tempted to call him Father, to set him off balance from the get-go, but that would be a tactic she'd use on Rue. Bro may be odd, from what little she has experienced of him and heard from Dave. But he's also not Rue. And really, that goes a long way towards recommending anyone as a parental unit in Rose's mind.

The silence lasts a while, as they consider each other rather blatantly. Certainly Rue could never have gone so long without a snide comment, but Bro is silent long enough after they exchange greetings that Rose falls almost into a kind of complacent calm. She meets his gaze through the sunglasses, letting just enough of her sight focus in to see the yellowed-orange through the tinted lenses. Even that doesn't make Bro any more readable; he has had long years to master concealing the emotions that Dave still reveals through his compulsive rambling.

"Got something for you," he says. It's abrupt enough that Rose realizes she truly has grown complacent, and startles before catching herself.

"You shouldn't have," she says, automatically, because that is what one says when one's parent gets you something. Rose has never willingly accepted a gift from Rue Lalonde in her life without assuring the woman that it was both unnecessary and unappreciated. Then she winces inwardly, because she had not intended to let that much cutting disdain sneak into her tone. It's something more suited for dealing with Rue, not this man that she barely knows, and who she might not wish to thoroughly aggravate when he was one of those who dealt with her breakdown in New York.

He doesn't let it ruffle him though. In fact, she can't even tell if he notices the faint edge of sarcasm she let slip through. One eyebrow raised, he draws the package from wherever he has stowed it so quickly Rose can't perceive it and tosses it on the couch beside her before backing off. "Only if you want," he adds, the picture of indifference. "Gotta have a talk with Rue."

...And that appears to be the end of their conversation. Rose feels oddly at a loss. Nothing concerning their heretofore unmentioned father-daughter relationship, nothing about the fact that she ran away from her mother's care to shack up with her lover - not a word. She barely forms a 'thank you' with her lips before Bro is halfway across the lobby again, slouching off down the corridor that Rue had stormed off through toward the interior of the laboratory. At the far end of the room, Oriole's head snaps up at once, triggered by the other Strider's movements. Then he ducks his head and mutters something to Kanaya before tagging along in the man's wake, feathers fluttering behind him.

Well. Bro makes a quick enough exit that Rose can only shake her head and examine the package beside her. It's wrapped in shitty newspaper and tape, and when she turns it over in her hands the wrapping essentially falls apart to reveal the small, slim case within.

Rose stares, and opens the case.

Then she has to shut it again, because the emotions that rush her clamp down on her throat and make it difficult to breathe, let alone contemplate all the nuances of what a gift like this would mean.

But no matter how she puzzles it over and over in her mind, she cannot see how this would be ironic.

She draws in a shaky breath, and shakes her head mutely when Kanaya asks her what is in the case. Her fingers may tremble a little as she tucks the item into a pocket, but she smoothes them out against the fabric of her skirt and eventually she can ignore the tremors, if not the item itself.

She will need to reserve judgment on Ambrose Strider for the moment. He has handed her a game-changing piece, one she had not taken seriously before as a possible option in her on-going struggle to maintain her distance from Rue.

But if he is serious, the question becomes -

Is she willing to accept this?

She's not the only one to receive a gift from Ambrose Strider. The moment that they join the Striders in the basement room where the Wondering Querent has been working, the man lobs a second package directly at Dave Strider's face.

Dave fumbles the catch spectacularly, flailing and almost batting the package at the nearest wall like a squash ball. When he finally does grab the thing he holds it as far away from his body as he can, as though fearing the package could blow up at any moment. There seems to be an odd element of perpetual paranoia in those close to Bro, and Rose adds that to her mental list of ways in which her ecto-parent may or may not be an utterly alarming custodian.

When Dave begins signing, a disgruntled furrow in his brow, Bro replies aloud from where he lounges against he wall. "No, I'm not gonna tell you. Open it, you little shit."

"Please," Oriole adds, as he shuffles toward their group with a wary stare. "That way we can stop with the stupid ass communication fuckups."

Dave's head swivels toward the orange version of himself - and then he's tearing into the newspaper like there's no tomorrow. While he does so, John shifts by Rose's side, enough to draw a grunt of discontent from Karkat. "So, you're Oreooooo?" John says, sounding delightedly mischievous as he quite obviously massacres the name. "Wow! You do have wings!"

Said wings flare a little, the bound one twitching uselessly, and then huddle up over Oriole's shoulders in a defensive gesture. "Oriole. Yeah," he replies curtly, stuffing his hands in his pockets. His eyes are visible over the tops of his shades, and Rose thinks that he isn't as used to concealing his emotions as the other two Striders in the room pretend to be, because he doesn't even try to hide the raw curiosity in his gaze. "And you're the blue one."

John laughs and unhooks his arm from Rose's. Karkat yelps in protest, but John has already strode forward to snatch Oriole up in a hug as well. "Nice to meet you!" he says merrily, even as Oriole squawks in protest and a wayward wing almost clips the delicate conglomeration of computer screens that the Querent has mounted on the wall. "Wow! Everyone is here! This is awesome!"

Dave lets out a wordless, gaspy shriek as the package explodes in his hands and he takes an oddly-shaped puppet to the face. He's signing furiously at his older brother the moment he's diced the puppet into quarters.

Bro Strider's mouth quirks in a tiny smirk. "Psyche." It might be Rose's imagination, but she thinks he tosses the next package at Dave a lot slower, so that Dave has more than enough time to snatch it up without panicking again.

"We're fucking ridiculous," Karkat is muttering. "How does anyone even take us seriously?"

"A question for the ages," Rose agrees. Because really, the whole thing is a subject she tries not to dwell on for fear of disrupting the delicate balance of sobriety in the universe.

Oh. Perhaps she should not think about sobriety, or any other related terms. She smiles blandly at Karkat's reluctant scowl, and thinks that the two of them might get along just fine.

"And not one that I'm sure can be answered in any way that is not at least mildly insulting," Kanaya adds, shaking her head at the antics going on around them. Karkat jumps at the sound of her voice, as though spooked. Rose can only wonder what that is all about.

It's difficult to take in everything going on in the room at once; it's so full of people, all of them friends or family or friends of the family, and Rose can hardly set eyes on one person before someone else in the middle of doing something either bizarre or fascinating that calls her attention.
Jade is trying to invade the Wondering Querent's work space, prodding at wires and excitedly trying to divine what the contraption does. Rose's mother and Samuel Egbert are still conversing in low whispers, Rue's face the mask of cool disdain she wears when she knows she's in the wrong, and is unwilling to apologize. Samuel simply looks tired. No doubt the two of them are discussing more of their secrets; Rose has to look away before she can become angry at the thought. Karkat leans toward John at all times, glaring at anything and anyone who gets too close to them like a remarkably possessive polecat. WV crawls on top of a filing cabinet, cooing to himself out of sight of most of the room as he taps a thrumming green battery cube set into the wall. Dozens of the things have been hooked up to the WQ's machine, all of them with extensive warning labels that explain why no one should crack the battery chassis without a foot thick wall of lead between them and the exposed uranium.

WV cannot be tamed by such simple things as warning labels. He unhinges his jaw and attempts to fit the entire battery into his mouth, saliva drooling out of the corner of his terrifying mouth.

Good lord.

"Oh. My god. Fucking finally."

For a moment, Rose barely recognizes the voice. It's been a while since she last heard it, after all, and even then she'd been weaving in and out of consciousness at the time. Oriole's voice has an additional, barely-there screeching note to it, scratchy and a little hoarse, and the absence of that is what tips Rose off. "Dave," she says, smiling at him. "It's good to hear your voice."

John lets go of Oriole, whirling in a twist of air that Rose can feel from here, excitement on his face. "Dave! You can talk!"

Dave fidgets with the steel grey collar around his neck, the relief obvious on his face as he clears his throat. "You're telling me," he says, coughing a little. "How long has it even been? Too goddamn long. Jesus kringlefucking christ."

Incredible. He sounds exactly like he types.

"I thought I raised me a fucking lady, not a potty-mouthed shithead." And then - so fast that Rose almost misses it - Bro Strider rolls his eyes while glancing at her, as though inviting her in on the joke. "Whatever. Try not to fuck this one up, kid, those parts don't come cheap."

"Great. He can fucking talk. All in favor of revoking the douchebag's speech privileges until he fucks off back to Texas, say aye," Karkat says, looking irritated enough to flip a table.

Unfortunately, all he does is draw Dave's attention to him. "Karkat. Bro. You cannot be harshing on this," Dave says, gesturing more toward his entire body than to the collar, a faint smirk on his face. "Not now, when I may finally drop the sick beats in your honor."

"That is the opposite of what I would want."

"Too late, bro, I've been sitting on these downright ill rhymes for days, now. They have to be set free."

"No they fucking don't, they really really don't -"

"I want to hear them!" John says, raising a hand. "But also, I don't think we have time? Didn't Doctor Lalonde have something really important to tell us?"
"Not just me," Rue says. John jumps almost a foot in the air - something he can accomplish more easily than most - as though in all the chaos he failed to notice Rue Lalonde striding away from Samuel Egbert toward the center of the room. There is a table in the middle surrounded with a bevy of chairs, but Rue positions herself at the end of the table closest to where their motley group has clustered near the door to address them. She pitches her voice loud enough that most of the heads in the room turn toward her, and Rose bites back the impulse to look away from her mother just to be contrary. "While I could give a brief overview of what little I know, there is one here who can explain far more clearly than I. Unless Samuel or Ambrose have something...?"

Bro shrugs loosely, his shades reflecting the overhead light for a moment before he folds his arms over his chest and sets up a silent watch by the door. He could not have possibly looked less interested in what Rue has to say, and Rose thinks that there might be something to emulate there. Certainly she'd be very interested in the ability to convince Rue that she could care less.

Samuel Egbert lays a hand on John's shoulder, smiling fondly as John looks up at him with a confused grin. "I'm afraid all my attempts at explaining things haven't gone all that well, and I never understood as much of all that science as you, Rue. The floor is yours."

"Then thank you all for being here," Rue says. Her normally flawlessly confident tone wavers a little, and Rose can't help the smugness that rises up in her breast, the vicarious amusement of seeing Rue falter in front of all these expectant eyes.

Then the doctor regains her momentum. "I know that more than a few of you have little reason to believe or trust in what I am about to say. I wish, more than I can possibly express, that I was not the one telling you about this today at all." She closes her eyes, lashes fluttering, and appears to decide something internally before opening them. "But the woman who knew the most about this game is dead. Joanna Egbert was an extraordinary woman. And without her, we have - all of us - been flying blind."

"Game?!" Karkat interrupts. The troll buries his face in his claws. "God fucking dammit, not another one."

"You've become familiar with the term, then," Rue says smoothly, eyebrow up. "I must confess, I'm surprised. From the impression Samuel gave me, I thought your group has been rather stymied by John's neurological hiccups."

John blinks and looks up from patting Karkat on the back, nonplussed. "What? The things where I have nosebleeds and stuff?" he says, laughing apprehensively, and Rose's heart aches. John's been out of the loop even more than she has, from what the two of them have pieced together over Pesterchum. She knows it's been bothering him more than he likes to let on, on top of everything else that has gone wrong in his life of late. "Uh. We know a little bit, I think, but it's all really weird!"

Rue nods, as though none of this is news to her. "So Samuel has said. The best we can do, I suppose, is see how much we can impart to you before you suffer another attack. You need to know all this. After we find the limits of what your brain can handle, I have several doctors on site who may be able to assist in healing whatever is causing these strange lapses."

For the first time it occurs to Rose that maybe the neurosurgeons lurking around the facility with their MRI machines might not be here for her, after all. It's hard to see the obvious sometimes, when Rue is around to badger her into a fit of paranoia.

"We'll figure this out, son," Samuel murmurs, barely loud enough for anyone but John to hear. "It'll all be fine."
Rue nods, and resumes her speech. Rose think she probably has this whole thing mapped out, including pithy phrases to toss out whenever they get diverted, as they just have. "The four of you - John, Jade, Dave, Rose - have been kept in the dark for a long time, either for medical reasons" - a nod to John and Samuel - "or because we guardians simply didn't know all that you would wish to know." She swallows audibly, and goes on. "I know for a fact that I have made mistakes in how I chose to protect Rose in the past, and that included keeping facts from her which might have benefited her more in the long run."

"An understatement," Kanaya whispers, low, for Rose's ears only, and Rose can't fully repress the tiny 'ha!' of laughter that emerges from her lips. Well. It's not as though she intended to give the impression that she gave a damn about all of Rue's self-recriminations in front of all these witnesses. Her mother fucked up, but Rose doubts she truly regrets it; more likely Rue is paying lip service to try and win back the favor she lost in Samuel and Ambrose's eyes when Rose went off the deep end on her watch.

Rue hesitates again before pressing on. "And the rest of you are here because you have become inextricably involved in this mess of a situation," she says, her eyes lingering on Oriole in particular, until the bird-kid vanishes and reappears somewhat behind and to the left of the center of the room with a clumsy flash-step, lurking with his eyes mostly on John rather than Rue. "The Midnight Crew is no ordinary criminal organization. They too are linked to the game that is playing out around us, and that makes them more dangerous than you know. If you are to defend yourselves against them, you need to understand something Joanna always called the Game, and which I have researched over the years under the working name of Skaia."

"The Skaian Paradigm?" Rose says, eyes flying to stare at the Wondering Querent. The carapacian caresses a claw over the smooth corner of the workstation and meets Rose stare for stare, a soft, sad smile on her pale face, but says nothing.

Rose tears her eyes away, and snorts, stepping forward and away from Kanaya so that everyone is looking at her now. "You actually intend to explain something? Incredible," she says, injecting as much skepticism into her tone as she can while circling around Rue. Mother and daughter face off in the center of the room as everyone draws back. "But I find it hard to believe anything you have to say would be of merit after all this time. You've spent so long poisoning the well, after all, how much truth can be left?"

"I have been offering to explain since you left the laboratory in Maine," Rue says, her voice tight, the effort needed to control her automatic response obvious in her strained face. "You have dodged my efforts at reconciliation at every turn. Rose, please, I am trying -"

Rose can see nothing like that in Rue's aura. It's the same blank as always, spiteful and void of any impression, and she doesn't trust it in the slightest. "Why don't I believe you, I wonder? I would rather speak to someone who doesn't share your ridiculous agenda." She turns toward the computer screens, alive with the opportunity to cut her mother down a peg. "I would rather hear from the Wondering Querent."

"Don't you mean the Queen?"

Rose has her back to John right now, and she has to turn on her heel to glance back at him, her mouth open to ask why -

And then she freezes, because John's face is streaked with blood.

"I mean, that's her name, isn't it?" he's babbling, while Samuel grips his shoulders with an expression of horror. John has progressed from a simple nosebleed to bloody tears that have welled up in the corners of his eyes, occasionally trickling down his cheek to add to the gore-strewn mask. "She's the White Queen. I remember, Jade talked about her a lot when she was asleep." He says a little, putting a hand to his face and grimacing at the blood that his hand comes away with. "Urgh. I feel kind of gross."

It's Karkat who elbows his way past Samuel's defensive grip first. John staggers, knees wobbling, and pain flashes on Karkat's face when he has to catch John; no doubt his ribs aren't thanking him for it. "John! Fuck!"

Then Jade is there, hoisting John up by his other arm, Dave flashing between John and Samuel completely to hover at John's back, and Rose's confrontation with Rue vanishes from her mind as she darts forward, cupping John's face with her hands and trying not to panic. "John? John, look at me," she says when John squeezes his eyes shut. Her heart races a million miles an hour as blood smears under her hands, and she has experience with the mind and its damning whimsy, and she knows that from both a medical and a magical perspective, bleeding eyes means nothing good whatsoever. What on earth would trigger such a sudden reaction like this?

"My head really hurts," John whispers, like he's confiding this only to the four of them. He forces a laugh, sour and sickly, and raises a hand to clutch at his skull. "I don't think I'm supposed to think about all this."

"Shoosh then, you dumbass," Karkat says angrily, trying to tug John closer with desperate claws. But Jade, Dave, and Rose follow him like it's nothing, like they're all one unit that cannot be separated. Dave is grim and silent, and Rose wonders if in the panic he's forgotten that he can speak again, or if he's too busy wrapping his arms around John's waist to even sass Karkat for his clinginess. "Oh my fucking god, what is even happening to you, what the fuck -" and then Karkat deteriorates into a stream of word vomit, cursing a blue streak as the terror overwhelms him.

Not that any of them have any room to speak. Rose can sense the guardians all around them, but it's difficult to hear anything they might be shouting at them when it's just the five of them in a tight circle, slowly crumpling to the floor as John's mind tears itself apart.

"But you do remember stuff," Jade says, her green eyes alight. She sounds almost relieved, which isn't an entirely appropriate response to the situation in Rose's opinion. "I knew you could!"

John shakes his head wildly, bewildered. "No, I don't - I just don't want to think about - what are we talking about again?"

Jade slaps John. Karkat snarls, sharp teeth bared, but John's still between him and Jade so Karkat can't lunge at her. Jade shakes him, which essentially shakes all of them at this point. "Come on, John, don't blank it out again! We're all here!"

"But it hurts! It hurts a lot!" John looks terrified now, not just confused and pained, and Rose can feel the shift of the muscles in his face as he twists in their collective grip, trying to pull away. "I see it sometimes, when I'm just the breeze, and it's awful! I don't want to remember that! Just let me go, you guys, so I can -"

Oh.

Oh.

"You always do this!" Karkat growls, a hand pressing partially over Rose's as he smoothes over John's forehead, wiping at the blood on his cheeks. There is a moment where the troll seems out of place in their muddle, a point at which Rose's mind stutters before she adapts to include him in her mind's eye, in the flurry of potential actions and dips of chance that are slotting into place. "You try to ignore everything and pretend it's all fine, but fucking newsflash, John, if you think you can ignore this, you're even more of a fucking moron than I've always thought!" Karkat pulls his hand away and John doesn't have a choice but to look at the blood smeared over Karkat's palm. "I don't even know how the fuck you're doing this, but it's hurting you. Congratulations, you're officially more of a danger to yourself than anyone else on this fucking shithole of a planet. Just calm down and get your shit together!"

Rose only halfway knows what's going on, lost in what John couldn't or wouldn't tell her all these years. But her mind is soaring, barely pausing to let her process each minor realization at a time as she pieces together what she needs to say to make this right. Karkat has them almost there, she thinks, because Karkat has integrated himself with John as such a deep-seated level that his words hit John like anvils, but John could still break away from them in his panic. And Rose suspects that if John shuts this down now, his mind might never be able to handle it again without fracturing. A stiff breeze has picked up around them, wavering and twining between them all as though the wind is unsure whether John wants to draw them closer or fling them all away.

How long has he been remembering whatever it is that has scared him so much, and then been forcing himself to forget, all on his own? Resetting himself whenever it becomes too much to bear, whenever a word is too familiar or an old pain rises to the surface?

Either way, it needs to come to the breaking point here and now, and Rose is the one who can see what needs to be said next to hammer it home. "Stronger together than we are apart," she murmurs, resting her forehead against John's. "John. Remember? We're all here with you, just like you were there for me. And this is something we need to face. This paradigm is something we need to know, and you have to be here with us."

And that needs to be enough. The John Rose knows has never really been able to say no to his friends, or even to a passing stranger - unless the suggestion is for his own good. This teeters on the fence, a request that would be for John's own good, but is also critical to their group's ability to continue on in this mad, senseless adventure they're caught up in, and John -

John can't bury this.

Dave mumbles something, too quiet for Rose to hear, and for a heart-stopping moment she wonders if it'll push John back in the other direction and shut everything down. But then John slumps in the middle of them, fresh blood painting a stripe down his chin, and whimpers. "Trying," he says, hissing through the pain. "But I just -"

"Just stay right here." Rose fights the urge to look into John's mind, to enter his mindscape as he once did hers. He's mired in a pattern he's apparently been engraining himself in for years to prevent the pain from really hitting him, but he has to break it on his own. Her leaping into his mind willy-nilly would only make things worse. "You don't need to try to actively remember. We're going to learn more from the Querent. As long as you remain open to that, and don't blank out new memories, that's enough. Where you are right now is fine."

The relief in John's eyes is palpable, and a hand reaches up to squeeze Rose's. It's only then that Rose becomes aware that she's still clutching John's face, that she and Karkat have fallen all over each other to somehow crowd up onto John's lap together, and that Jade is hugging all of them again, sprawled with her arms flung out over Dave's back and Karkat's head to keep them all in this pile on the floor.

"I think I can do that," John says faintly, still holding her hand. His eyes waver, torn between focusing on her and whatever mental gymnastics he's undertaking to keep from blanking out the past few minutes. Then the steel returns to his expression, that plucky determination that Rose remembers from their childhood, that shows up whenever John decides to set his mind to something. And that's when she knows they've pulled him back from the brink. "Okay. Yeah. I think I can do that. No harm in hearing new things. Yeah."

Karkat paps at John's face, and the expression on his face is one that makes him look five years younger, genuinely relieved and not furious with the world. The troll sighs. "Way to give us all a fucking heart attack first, dumbass."

Rose thinks this is the first time she's ever heard someone use dumbass as a term of endearment. But there's no denying that Karkat sounds downright sappy. Dave reaches up to ruffle John's hair, his jaw still clamped shut, and the growl that Karkat gives is halfhearted at best.

And they've all only been in the same building as each other for thirty minutes. Rose doesn't even dare contemplate how they're all going to separate at the end of this.

If they even can.

"You guys," Oriole says from somewhere above, "are so fucking weird."

"Yeah, yeah," Dave replies, his voice still startlingly similar to the other boy's, muffled in John's hair. "You're still fucking orange."

"You're never going to stop pointing that out, are you." It's not a question.

"John, are you alright?" Samuel Egbert asks, steely and on edge, and that's what seems to shake Rose out of her musings and fall back into sync with the rest of the world. Jade lets go of them all, blinking dazedly and shaking her hair so wildly that it flies in everyone's face, and that's when everyone else starts to peel away from John. Crisis averted. No fresh blood trickles out of John's nose and eyes, and Karkat starts wiping at the caked on blood with his sleeve like a fussing moirail before John can push his grabby hands away.

It would seem that they're going to continue on without discussing this further, though, John biting his lip and looking down at his hands with disconcertment scribbled across his face. He's clearly still not steady, but when she looks at him with a silent question in her eyes, he nods, as much for his father's benefit as for hers. Rose files away her more urgent questions - why John's mind has been so vicious in repressing what he remembers, why he remembers at all - for later. She doesn't understand enough about what's going on to accurately judge why there are complications.

There is a familiar hand resting between her shoulder blades, and when she lets go of John's face she turns her head ever so slightly to see Kanaya kneeling there, bracing her. "That was abrupt," Rose attempts to explain, but she's not entirely sure what she's trying to put into words. "I think we've been completely sidetracked."

"It could not be helped. Serendipity is strange that way," Kanaya says solemnly, helping Rose rise to her feet when it becomes clear that even kneeling for so short a time has done nothing to prevent Rose's headache from resurging under all the pressure.

But before she can ask Kanaya to clarify that last comment, the familiar sound of a throat clearing sounds behind her, and the rest of the world comes rushing back in, just in time for Rose to cast a dirty look at Rue Lalonde. "Am I to understand that John knows something of the game?" the doctor asks, barging into the conversation with all of the delicacy of a rhinoceros wading through a daycare center.
"I don't really want to. I think trying to remember would probably be a pretty conksucky idea at this point," John says. He's pale and Rose doesn't miss how he's leaning on Karkat almost as much as Karkat is leaning on him, Samuel hovering over both of them. "But, uh. I think we can talk about it. Without me passing out. So that's an improvement!" He chuckles after the last part, as though he can laugh off his own intense mental anguish like it's nothing more than a prank, and isn't that just John in a nutshell?

Rue glances around at all of them, then nods slowly. "That's good. I was worried this could cause you unnecessary pain, if we pushed too hard," Rue says, and Rose has to fight very, very hard not to roll her eyes at the feigned concern in Rue's voice. More likely the woman was more worried she wouldn't get to unveil her latest in a series of tight-fisted disclosures without John distracting everyone by collapsing multiple times. "And as it happens, Rose, I had already asked the Querent if she would be willing to share what she knows." Rue gestures to the slim carapacian then, with a deferential tilt to her head as she smiles at the alien. "She has done with this Queen's Hub what I thought impossible. She has been able to access records of the previous universe."

"Previous universe," Dave mutters. He's fiddling with the collar around his neck still, as though he needs to reassure himself with each flicker of his hand that sound is still emerging from his mouth. "We're actually running with that one. Alright. Okay. Not like any of this needs to make sense."

"Duh, Dave!" Jade says, jabbing him in the ribs with her elbow. "My grandpa talked about it all the time! Why do you think people call it paradox space? What did you think came before the universe existed? Nothing?"

"You know, for some reason, I just never bothered to wonder about that." Dave throws up his hands. "My bad. I should have been contemplating this absolutely fascinating idea that we needed to have a daddy universe all along. I mean, where do we draw the line here with the existential questions? Is Jupiter secretly made of strawberry ice cream? Are troll horns symbiotic pieces of candy corn that have attached themselves to their heads over the years? Is the universe actually a giant goddamn frog? We just don't know." He lowers his hands, looking vaguely defeated. "But that's why we have you, Jade. To ask the real questions."

"Oh god, he really does just talk," Oriole whispers in horror. "It just keeps happening." Over in his corner, Ambrose Strider looks as though he's giving serious thought to smacking Dave upside the head. Rose thinks personally that Dave is doing it deliberately, trying to distract attention from John. He and Karkat are both playing defense for John, so that John can gather his scattered thoughts and nod along with Rue's pronouncements without having to deal with anyone - other than Rose - watching him too closely. Rose isn't sure that either Dave or Karkat realizes they're doing it.

"Actually!" Jade starts, a brilliant smile on her face. "Now that you mention it -"

WQ: Our Glorious Speaker is indeed a frog. One day we may be graced with His beauteous Croak once more, but a scratch of a universal session always wears Him thin.

WQ: I do not know about your Jupiter, though. It is a strange place.

Jade pouts at having her thunder stolen. Dave's jaw drops so that his mouth hangs open in disbelief. Rue nods along as though this all makes perfect sense to her.

And Rose pictures it. It's all too easy; the vision ripples through her mind's eye like it's been waiting there for her to see it all along. He would have supernovas for eyes, galactic clusters scattered throughout His vocal sac, and solar systems winding about His toes, a creature both infinitely vast and glorious.
Her migraine picks up again with a sharp jab, before Rose can determine for herself whether that fleeting glimpse was a true vision or not. She's never given much thought to the shape of the universe before, but...suffice to say, she's not discounting the frog theory. It makes as much sense as anything else she's ever heard.

"But why a frog?" Dave is trying to argue. Perhaps he's just being argumentative for the sake of being able to hear his own simulated voice again. "Why not a universe shaped like a dwarf flying squirrel? I mean, have you seen those things? That would be goddamn adorable, don't even lie to me."

WQ: ...But a squirrel could not Croak, my Knight.

This is apparently the only real objection the carapacian has to offer; the Querent fields Dave's barrage of strange questions like she's not even bothered by the incredulity. She is serene in her belief, smiling at Dave with a distant fondness. Rose can't remember if she's ever heard of any supreme Frog deity in any of the scanty reports on carapacian religions; most of it was restricted to philosophy, really, the teachings of the Worthy Villein providing a general moral code, but there could be anywhere from four to sixteen god-like figures depending on what mood one happens to catch a talkative carapacian in.

"But Queen - sorry, Querent," John corrects himself, shaking his head a little. He's not wearing the contact lenses he must have worn all through their childhood, and the bright blue makes him look all the younger. "There was a frog before...our frog? This one we're in right now?"

WQ: Yes, but you mistake me. This universe is the same Speaker, merely reset. Extensive cancerous growths within the universe, combined with the machinations of the one called Doc Scratch, led to a failure of the game session which would have given birth to a new Genesis Frog.

WQ: It was your game session. You four were forced to scratch it in order to try again. This iteration is what resulted. The fact that your powers have carried over was...unexpected, but fortuitous for what we need to accomplish in the future.

WQ: If you like, I can replay the entire game session for you. All such things are viewable through the Hub and certain unregistered chat programs of questionable temporal legality, once they have been tuned to connect with the correct records. With all four of you present, the signal will be much easier to track. The subject is vast, and there is much you need to learn in a short time.

"That would be for the best," Rose says, darting another glance at her mother. "Verbal explanations have fallen short in the past."

"The Querent has been reluctant to share her findings with me alone," Rue says in a kind of oblique reply to Rose's unspoken accusation. "I think, though she would never be so impolite as to say it aloud, that it is because I was not a player."

WQ: My apologies.

"But if you all are willing to take a seat and observe what she has to show us, it would go a long way towards explaining to you all why you have the powers that you do, and why the Midnight Crew has been so persistent in opposing you." Rue glances around, taking in the fact that absolutely no one has sat down in all of the chaos that just ensued, and then shrugs a little. "Samuel, Ambrose. Anything you would like to add?"

"No. You've about covered everything that I know of," Samuel says slowly. He is the only one to pull out a chair from the table and lower himself into it, thoughtfully rubbing at his chin with a thumb as he angles himself toward the screens on the wall. "Old Nanna kept putting off the punch line - always said the timing wasn't right. I never got more than a few scattered hints about John before his arrival by meteor, and by then it was too late for her to explain further."

"Meteor," Karkat repeats flatly, shoving his glasses up his nose as though that will make all things clear. No one answers him. The troll looks as though he's in genuine pain, his rust red eyes squinched up with disgust as he rubs a hand over his face.

Bro grimaces at the name Rue has used again, and gives a terse shrug. "I just know that shit was off the chain levels of fucked up. And now apparently we get to relive it all. Get it over with, Lalonde."

The Querent raises a claw though, glancing around the room with her dark eyes shining.

WQ: A moment. We are still expecting another guest.

WQ: She did say she would be here...PM delivered the message herself...

BQ: Looking for me?

The voice that echoes in Rose's mind bursts and cracks like hard candy between teeth, a flourish of black. If the Querent's voice is a low, sweet sobbing song, this is a telepathy that sets out to be the polar opposite, all sharp thorns. Rose casts her sight around her and spies the shadows shifting and roiling in the far corner of the room just as they deposit a Dersite carapacian in the room. She's the spitting image of the Wondering Querent, right down to the abnormal height, but with the colors flipped so that the newcomer scowls down at them all with proud white eyes. Rose sees the mutilated hand for only a brief moment before the carapacian tucks it against into the pocket of her midnight green trenchcoat, but she's sure the ring and small claws had been messily lopped off at some point, leaving the stranger only half a hand.

Bro grunts, and then he's between the rest of the group and the new carapacian, rolling his shoulders and cracking his neck languidly. "Wondered if you'd show your face."

BQ: And here I am. Be honored, human. I am not like my cousin-queen; not many lay eyes on me and live to repeat the experience.

For the first time, the Wondering Querent steps away from the grey computer station she calls the Hub, stepping toward her mirror image with claws outstretched, her steps ponderous and slow.

The Queller eyes the claws that are held out to her with a wary recoil, before ever so deliberately removing her hands from her sides and delicately lying them atop the Querent's. They do not clasp hands; the two carapacians simply stand there. The two stare into each other's eyes for so long that Karkat coughs loudly and Dave tries to provoke a contest by coughing even more pointedly, the two boys glaring at each other around John. Rose can only imagine that the two of them have been absolutely insufferable in the Egbert house over the past few days, if this is how they act in polite company.

BQ: Now then.

BQ: It has been too long, Qasida.

WQ: Since Cairo.

WQ: Our truce continues?
BQ: ...If it must. Anything to befuddle the conditions of this game, you know that.

WQ: I appreciate that. More than you know.

BQ: Now. Where is he?

The Dersite glowers around the room, her eyes digging into Rose's before dismissing her coolly, scanning the room as though seeking someone.

BQ: Ah - there you are -

And with that the carapacian snatches her claws away from the Querent's with a scowl of triumph, sailing past the main group of people and around the table to thrust a claw into the shadows under the filing cabinet and the desk, and it's only then that Rose realizes with a start that the smaller Dersite carapacian, WV, is no longer atop his battery perch. When the Queller drags him out from under the table, the smaller carapacian dangles in her grip, floundering around in his baggy clothing to try to twist around and claw his way free, squeaking wordlessly.

BQ: Wha-

BQ: This is not Spades!

The Queller holds WV away from her, looking thoroughly put out. WV finally succeeds in turning to face her, and the righteous indignation that swells in his expression makes him puff out his chest and try to make a few cursory swipes at the taller alien, despite the fact that her arm's reach is nearly twice the length of his own.

"Hey no," Dave says, shoulders hunching up. "No one messes with the little guy."

"Put him down!" Jade adds, stepping forward. "That's my sidekick you're manhandling, lady!"

BQ: Unbelievable. A pawn. Where on this Pondsquatter-forsaken planet did you manage to unearth this wretch, Witch?

"None of your business!" Jade sticks out her tongue and tugs down the lower lid of her right eye, and then stamps her foot. "And I went through a lot of trouble getting him quantumly stable, so you better not hurt him, or I'll call Bec!"

As though that's a signal, WV crackles with green lightning, whistling shrilly. The Queller's exclamation of shock shoots like a bolt of black lightning through everyone's minds, doing absolutely nothing for Rose's ongoing migraine. The taller carapacian drops the pawn so that he's free to scuttle under the table, still frazzled with green sparks from his outburst.

BQ: What.

BQ: That is not normal.

BQ: What on earth is that abomination. It's been contaminated by Jack, clearly.

"No way! WV is cool!" John says, folding his arms. "Even if he is kind of weird about soda."

The Querent intervenes, laying a cautious claw on the Queller's shoulder. Even so, the dark carapacian whips around too quickly, one hand flying to her side. She hesitates when she sees who has grabbed her. Rose suspects that if it had been anyone but the Querent who stopped her, that person would soon have found themselves missing an eye.
WQ: Let the poor creature be, sister. If he is who I think he is, we owe him our pity, not our spite. But now is not the time for such matters.

BQ: I was promised by the Knight of Time's future self that Spades would be here. This is false advertising. That abhorrent thing has never been an Archagent in its life.

"When I become future me," Dave says, "I am going to strangle me."

"No you won't," Bro says, making Dave bristle. "Not until you take care of that goddamn package you bring along for the ride, or I will have words for you, kid."

"Package?" Dave asks, suspicious.

"Oh, you'll know it when you see it," Oriole sighs, slapping Dave on the back. "Seriously. It'll be really, really obvious."

BQ: Spades is here. I can feel it. I will find him.

She yanks her shoulder free of the Querent's claws, glaring at the room as though blaming the walls for concealing this Spades character from her sight.

WQ: I am sure he will turn up. The Knight would not lie. But you will remain for the beginning, at least?

BQ: I do not see why I should have to. But if I must.

The Queller traipses to the table and sits in a chair across the table from Samuel Egbert, who looks as though he is seriously questioning this choice of seating arrangements, but also too intimidated to stand up and move away. The Queller inspects her claws and sets her feet up on the chair next to her, a deceptively relaxed lounging position that is too regal to be labelled a sulk.

BQ: Carry on. I'm curious to see if this Hub is truly functional. I could not have reconstructed my own, to be sure, even if I could be bothered.

WQ: It is.

The carapacian surveys the room one last time, and Rose can feel the mood shift when the Querent dims the lights slightly and begins to tap away at the keyboard, so that four of the monitors mounted on the wall begin to fuzz and blur with grey static. There's a rustle of Oriole's wing unfolding and folding again, before he makes himself comfortable against the wall away from Bro. Karkat is fussing at John in as close to an undertone as the troll can apparently manage, grumbling something about having John sit down, but John deflects the troll's concern with ceaseless cheer, as though to make up for his early break. Jade tries to quietly coax WV out from under the table and away from the Queller, but she doesn't seem to have much luck before she gives up and starts hovering cross-legged with a huff, the light of the computers flaring off her glasses.

Rose can feel herself swaying on her feet, but she is determined to stand for as long as Rue is, and her mother shows no signs of joining Samuel and the Queller at the table, going to join Bro at the back of the room without sparing a glance for Rose. So Rose breathes out carefully through her nose, and sets herself to endure. A quick check through Rose's other sight reveals that the Queller's aura is what she expected to see: an inverse of the Querent's benevolent aura, full of deep shadows and dark curls. But then the carapacian's gaze snaps back to stare at Rose, a snarl lifting the corner of her mouth in a silent warning. Rose blinks away her ability to see auras and looks away, her hand squeezing Kanaya's perhaps too tightly.
They need answers, perhaps more than they know. She is struck by the certainty, deep in her bones, that the Queller’s presence means nothing good for them, but the feeling of discontent is so vague that Rose can’t even say for certain how the carapacian would negatively affect their future - or, perhaps, has already negatively impacted their past.

Knowing more about this game that they’ve played, this previous universe that sounds too familiar for her comfort, might be the only thing that can clear her sight again, that might explain all those things that Rue Lalonde has hedged around for so long, including the link between the boss of the Midnight Crew and the Horrorterrors that the doctor notably failed to mention in her little speech earlier.

Rose wants to know the meaning of the spirograph. She wants to know what Skaia is, and why John is so terrified of it.

She wants to know why they failed.

WQ: Now then. Shall we begin?

Out in the hallway, Novitiate Halburn is descending the stairs from the floor above, humming to himself. He stopped by the lab rooms that the recent arrivals have been working out of to tease Doctor Marion about being kidnapped by a sword-wielding maniac, and is now on his way to rejoin Doctor Lalonde and her large group of visitors in the basement conference room, in the event the lead scientist requires another errand run. There aren’t many lab techs or assistants present in this facility at the moment, but Halburn is more than happy to carry out some of the minor tasks that would usually be assigned to them, if only to piss Marion off by acting like a ‘sycophantic mind-tampering brownnoser.’

It’s hilarious. He hasn’t had this much fun blackflirting with someone in ages.

Then, just as he turns the last corner of the stairwell, a sharp pain tears through his side, just below his gills. He stumbles and presses a hand to his side, biting down hard on his lip before a cry of pain can escape him. Bright violet blood sluicing between his claws, he turns to face his attacker.

SS: Just stay there and shut up, if you know what’s good for yah.

The carapacian then continues down the stairs on his own, wiping off the chilly blood on the exposed hem of his suit jacket under his sweater.

Halburn considers raising an alarm by shouting, but he’s always had a rather quiet voice, and he doubts he would be able to shout loudly enough to reach the conference room. Instead, he sits down shakily with his back resting against the wall, withdraws a phone from his pocket, and begins texting first his boss to inform her of the breach - and then Marion, demanding that the man bring Exarchopoulos down to stitch up Halburn’s new stab wound.

And he tries very, very hard not to panic. Stab wounds aren’t something that everyone can shake off, after all.

Dave still doesn’t understand what the hell he’s hearing.

He remembers hearing someone count down a few days ago, and ever since then the noise has been constant, nonstop, 24/7. If he weren’t used to falling asleep slumped over his mixers with a track still thumping in his ears, he would have been more sleep-deprived than Karkat by now.

[ clank click wuuu- boom! reeeeee- clink clack wah! ]

The beat jolts and stutters around, and occasionally all the sounds sync up but most of the time it's just a goddamn shitshow that makes his inner DJ contemplate setting his mental turntables on fire. And then there's the background noise that just keeps drumming along, oblivious to whatever the hell the other track is playing, more persistent than a burrito going nuclear in one's digestive track:

[ thump thump thump thump thump thump thump thump thump ]

It's maddening. His fingers itch for his turntables back home, because that's what he's always done when inspiration strikes, but it has been fucking days and now this shit is just seven different kinds of stupid. He catches himself using a fork as a metronome by tapping it on the empty plate where his pie used to be after dinner and flicking the sides of empty juice containers to try to emulate all the different sounds, and sometimes when the syncopation pops his ears too much he has to break the whole no-powers rule.

Of course, none of his insanely stealthy maneuvering can keep John's dad from frowning at Dave disapprovingly whenever he thinks he's pulled this shit off. Samuel Egbert must have some kind of thirteenth sense for time-traveling broads. His sixth through twelfth senses are reserved for various John and pranking related antics, the fourteenth sense consists of a preternatural instinct for baked confectionaries, the fifteenth is knowing almost exactly when Karkat's about to lose his shit, and Dave is pretty sure the sixteenth sense is a butt thing.

All attempts to find sympathy with Jade crash up against the sparkly green nebula-patterned brick wall that is her ability to sense where literally everyone is at all times. The idea that Samuel might have some kind of mind voodoo psychic power just makes her clap her hands together and speculate on the statistically probability of the idea, her eyes shining as Dave tries and fails to abscond. And he's not about to go badmouthing John's dad to John, of all people. It's always acceptable to talk shit about Bro, natch, but that's because one'd have to be fucking toked not to think Bro was an insufferable ass. But John actually respects his dad, all nods and 'yessirs' and bubbly obedience, which is just plain freaky and also happens to mean that Dave has to cut off rambling before John gets huffy and pissed.

Which means there's really only one person Dave can talk to.

WV is such a wonderful listener. Seriously, what a bro. John has some stiff competition these days, because what the little guy lacks in comprehensible speech or sign language he sure makes up for in gosh darned cuteness. It's impossible to hate WV, even when he commandeers you in the middle of important apple juice empire business to help him build a tower out of discarded pie tins and string. Dave can sign at the carapacian for hours and not get a lick of sense out of him, but even when he's flailing around like a pissed-off albatross WV is hilarious.

Right now, the two of them are collaborating on said pie tower, which can be generally interpreted to mean Dave is doing all the intense as fuck stacking and WV is fluttering around like a coked up squirrel, squealing and battering him with pointy fists whenever he messes up the grand design, which has been drawn in green marker scribbles on the printer paper scattered everywhere.

When they're done, Dave is taking a goddamn picture. This glorious metropolis of tin cans and crumpled up balls of paper is a labor of half-ironic love, and this shit needs to last forever. An icon of their time. It needs to be around when humanity's been wiped off the face of the planet so that the archeologists of the civilization of robotic bipedal squid-zebra hybrids that replaces them can grossly misinterpret the whole sordid affair.
That would be a dream come true. He and WV would have climbed the entire mountain as the infamous planners of this outrageously rad city.

'We're doing this man. We're making this shit happen,' he signs to the carapacian.

'GREEN GLITTER NAIL FILES! WV returns in enthusiastic ASL. 'PLEASE THE ENVIRONMENT! A CONSTRUCTIVE MANNER, BOY!"

That.

Is so.

Adorable.

This is why talking to WV never gets old.

"Dave, you insufferable nipple, please tell me you're not doing what it looks like you're doing."

[ thud thud thud thud thud thud ]

Alright. Fine. There's one other person he could have talked to. But it's hard to beat WV as a confidant. He is simply the best there is. And Karkat is only interested in communicating at a volume somewhere just below the roar of a jet engine, so that's out of the question.

The troll hovers in the doorway, but Dave makes a point out of not turning to look at him. Mostly because Karkat pretends to hate being the center of attention but being ignored is a one-way shortcut to having a hilariously riled up troll on your hands.

TG: yo since you're standing think you could grab that sock sticking out of the pile in the closet TG: we need it for the structural integrity of the tower of crumbled crusts and broken dreams

Karkat doesn't grab the sock, despite the fact that his and John's kooky lovenest is like right the fuck there taking up the entirety of the closet floor. Sometimes he needs some gentle persuasion, because Karkat is secretly a delicate desert blossom.

Instead, the troll keeps talking without looking at his phone screen for more than a second, disbelief and irritation duking it out across his face. "No. Absolutely not. Do you know why? Because we are leaving in twenty minutes, and yet it looks like you and everyone's favorite thinkpan-challenged alien toddler are using my fucking 'coon as part of your latest idiotic death trap of a construction project," he says between gritted teeth.

Dave shakes his head sadly.

TG: easy now fuzzy little troll peach TG: we do not badmouth the mayor of the democratic republic of the recoopracoon TG: look at his face TG: look how his self-esteem shatters in the face of your cruel thoughtless words karkat

WV seizes a comic book and smacks Dave repeatedly on the knee. 'PONDER THE MANGLED TRAPESE DISPLAY! THIS IS NO TIME FOR LAUNDRY YOUNG STUPID BOY! DORITOS!'

Yeah, Dave has taught him all the most important signs. Obviously.

Karkat at least has the decency to look properly ashamed, folding his arms around his chest in that defensive ways he's got and looking down. Dave doesn't know if Karkat's always huddled up like that when he's chagrinned, or if it's a new thing, what with the messed up ribs and all. "I didn't fucking vote for him. Do you not remember the goddamn discussion we had about private property, fuckface?!"

TG: vaguely
TG: in much the same way i remember all of our little talks
TG: like the faded jpeg artefacts of shitty comics past
TG: sticking to the ass end of my memory
TG: like pieces of used toilet paper

Karkat stomps into the room, peeved, which is his default state anyway, so no one really cares anymore. As long as he doesn't work himself up into whatever the hell a rage aneurysm is, Dave thinks he's in the clear. Also, Karkat lifts his feet deliberately over the fragile paper clip-and-string replica of the Helix Bridge stretching between the corner of John's desk and the trash can when he could have easily stomped on it, and that means he respects the Mayor's indisputable authority, so they're in the clear. "Have you even packed?! What am I fucking saying, your shit's all over the floor," Karkat retorts, rubbing at one eye that's a considerably darker rust red than it has been since Dave arrived. Even the yellow sclera look irritated and swollen, and Dave wonders if that's why Karkat wears glasses he doesn’t need either, just like John.

Dave must not answer for long enough that Karkat loses his already non-existent patience. "That's it. I'm going to walk all the way back down the fucking stairs to get someone you'll actually listen to."

TG: haha oh my god
TG: no you wont
TG: youd be too worried id start palehumping john or something
TG: jades out of the question because she drives you crazier than i do which is something i aspire to emulate in my daily life btw
TG: and were both fucking intimidated by johns dad
TG: i mean the man has a restraining order set against him by the entire cirque du soleil franchise TG: clearly neither of us want to mess with that TG: just get me the sock and well be out of here so fast your nubby ass horns will catch fire

Karkat grimaces, smacking his face, and that's about as deep a moment of brotherly solidarity as the two of them are ever going to manage. "Oh my god," he says, but Dave figures that's just for the record. Then the troll throws up his hands, yelling, "Fine. Fine!" with corresponding winces while tromping over to the closet and kicking the door open to reveal the pile.

It's only the work of a second to flashstep past Karkat, seize the sock, and dart back out of range. When he realizes, Karkat makes an interesting, muffled shriek in the back of his throat, and Dave allows himself a tiny smirk that he flattens out before Karkat spins around to glower at him, livid.

TG: behold
TG: the sock ruse was a........
TG: distaction

"When I'm better, I will kick your scrawny human ass," Karkat hisses.

TG: nah
TG: okay maybe you could
TG: thats is entirely possible not ruling it out TG: but karkles i thought what we had was special
"We have nothing. This so-called 'brohood' - and oh there is no fucking way Karkat just made air-claw quotation marks, Jesus, he's worse than John - "is a fucking sham. I think it's just a douchebag code word for 'new target for childish pokerfaced mockery.'" Another pair of air-quotes. "I demand a refund of this friendship."

TG: not possible
TG: you dont know how to quit me
TG: you just wish you knew
TG: but
TG: you dont

"I know exactly what you're quoting, and how dare you soil one of the greatest works of vacillating romantic drama by filtering it through the putrid cesspit of your wordhorde."

TG: i dare
TG: because i care

That's about when Karkat's gibberish becomes completely incoherent. The troll stands there, gesturing uselessly and pulling at his own hair and probably demanding Dave move his ass. Which to be fair, Dave should probably do, but also there's this little thing he has called time travel powers. So Dave nods along as though he can actually understand Karkat between all the spit while doing absolutely jackshit to get ready; he hands off the sock to WV so the little guy can do his thing and they can get this rodeo on the road.

The carapacian wrinkles up his nose at the article of clothing, and Dave wonders if it somehow doesn't meet building standards when both of the alien's claws fly up to his face and with a plaintive squeak and shock of green lightning WV flies backwards, ploughing into John's bookcase and rattling the kid's dorky book and movie collection so hard that Dave has to race forward and smack the teetering case back up against the wall. By his feet, WV sneezes again, this time without the space mojo, and flings the sock away with disgust all over his dark shelled features.

Wait. Can carapacians even smell?

TG: okay time to go

[ tick tick tick tick tick tick tick ]

There's something weird about the way Oriole is holding his wing.

But then Dave is completely distracted by the fact that he's taking a puppet to the face. A puppet which he'd been led to believe would be something to let him talk again, so he'd been suckered into opening it without checking for the obvious signs of smuppetfication.

Because Bro is a douchebag. This is a fundamental, inarguable fact of life. The universe would probably just perform a superb triple kickflip off the handle if Bro were to even for one single solitary instance act like anything other than a perfectly unironic, inscrutable dick.

But then there's a second package in Dave's reluctant hands, and he's distracted again, going over every inch of it for trapwires or Saw-inspired tricks (and hadn't that been a nightmare to live through, when Bro first saw those movies), and then oh my god he can talk and, like flipping a switch, he has the best older brother ever. Seriously. Unironically. Dear sweet Santa Christ, it's been too long since Dave's heard the sound of his own voice.

Naturally, of course, the moment he thinks he has a spare moment between all the fucked up drama going down, the white version of the Badass Quandary is dimming the lights, and it's time for some goddamn cinema action, and Dave has to shut up again.

But when this is over, mark his words, there's going to be a goddamn rapocalypse. He has been sitting on these terminally ill rhymes for what feels like months, okay? Being stuck signing only to Bro and the Black Queen for weeks has probably stunted his hellacious lexicon. He might need to rap to himself in private for a while until his voice is back up to speed. Yeah. Surely there's a dark corner around here in Creepy Labs Incorporated that he can practice in without anyone overhearing a particularly shitty rhyme sesh.

He sticks close to John, because John is a fucking shitshow waiting to happen and judging by Rose's hand locked on the kid's wrist, she's afraid John'll go down and take Karkat with him like the pile of muscle-bound bricks that he is. But at the same time, Dave darts a few more sideways glances in Oriole's direction behind the cover of his shades because what the fuck is he seeing, there? It's something different in the way the bird-kid holds himself, something more than whatever battle-readiness has been instilled in him by what Dave can only presume were endless days and nights of nonstop indoctrination. When the lights go down the shades go up, orange eyes gleaming in the dark almost as bright as Karkat's and Kanayayayaya’s, which makes Dave's eyebrows shoot for the heavens above because apparently Oriole is all about the situational facial nudity still.

Maybe if Oriole were an actual bird Dave would have an easier time figuring out what the fuck's changed. People are harder to deal with. But if Bro managed to fuck up Oriole's wing again with all that bullshit, Dave is going to be so pissed. That's definitely not his wrap-up job anymore, which means the wing's been rebandaged at least once in his absence. Goddamn ominous, is what it is.

He's getting distracted again. He can obsess like a complete weirdo over his bird-twin's broken wing later, when there aren't so many witnesses. Dave grimaces and deliberately avoids meeting the Quandary's sarcastic smirk as he stares at the wall of flatscreens the - Qasida? Querent? who even knows anymore - other carapacian dame has set up. She's got like fifteen or something on the wall, wired haphazardly to a series of computer servers that look like they could explode and blissfully olly the fuck out of this mortal plane at any moment if they overheated. Dave doesn't even code or anything like that, and he can see it's pretty slapshod work. Like the alien was working off a blueprint in her mind's eye but couldn't find all the pieces she'd need to put it together in real life.

The four screens covered in static go completely black with a faint whine, and Dave is half convinced the carapacian blew a fuse and broke the weirdass thing entirely.

Then, in the upper right screen, the image of a small room appears, with a tiny time stamp in the corner of the screen. It's labelled 04/13 but clearly this all takes place fucking years ago, and Dave wouldn't understand why Rose, John, Karkat, and Samuel all breathe in sharply at the same time if it weren't for the fact that he knows April the thirteenth is John's birthday. They're all still massively overreacting, but people who aren't Striders tend to do that.

But it gets worse.

The room is fucking papered with posters of creepy ass harlequins.

Tiny ass harlequin figurines sit on every available countertop. There's an entire wall taken up by a mural of several Cirque du Soleil assholes working on their carnival gambit. Someone has left assorted prankster props scattered all over the desk.
Dave cringes with the instinctive horror of ones who's learned to associate all forms of clownery with horrors beyond reckoning. Somewhere in the darkened room Oriole gives a faint warble of distress.

"Uh," John says, sounding half-strangled in a way that makes Dave take a half step closer to him in case shit goes down. "Dad? ...Isn't that your study?"

"So it would seem," Samuel Egbert says, his voice carefully measured and level. "Though I'll admit, that masterful mural would be a fine new addition to the décor that I wouldn't have thought to add in, myself."

That's not the only difference though. Now that John's said it, Dave can vaguely see the resemblance of the small room on the screen to the study in the Egberts' disturbing charming suburban household. None of the bookshelves are present, and the whole thing is pretty spartan aside from the joker decor. The curtains have been pulled back and the blinds opened to let in bright spring sunlight, there's a huge safe in the corner, and the desk, covered in playing cards and other trickster memorabilia, has been pushed off towards one wall to make room for an old-fashioned, well-worn piano.

And John is sitting at said piano with his back to whatever freaky camera is recording this, his feet kicking as he merrily but soundlessly appears to bang away at the keys.

BQ: Qasida?

WQ: I am aware.

WQ: Ah. Found it.

The Prospitian carapacian shuffles and rearranges something in the shadows under her setup, the faint rustle and click of wires being adjusted and plugged in, and then the sound kicks in. Dave has to adjust his original assumptions radically as a haunting refrain filters through the speakers; John is apparently holy shit levels of talented. Where has the kid been hiding this? Dave's only heard five seconds of it and his fingers itch to see if he could remix it.

And in the back of his mind he thinks he hears another sound that overlaps a little with what's being played -

\begin{align*} \text{[ & - \quad \text{-} d \cdot \zeta ]} \end{align*}
\]

"But I can't play the piano!" John exclaims. But he also doesn't sound very sure about that, which says plenty about his state of mind. "Wait. Can I?"

"You've never taken lessons a day of your life," his dad says, leaning forward in his seat with a creak. "We've never had a piano in the house before, either. Rue..."

"It was another iteration of our universe," the doctor says, her voice weirdly soft. Dave still has absolutely no idea how she would have worked out science to explain this weird ass shit, but watching this after years of making it up as she goes along must feel like humping the Holy Grail. "We've always hypothesized there would be considerable alterations. That's the point of a reset, in essence - to scratch what didn't work and operate the same system under new conditions."

"And that has stripped John of musical talent? How unfortunate," Rose says, and wow, her skepticism gambit right now could probably wilt a small field of crops if properly weaponized.

Then John looks up from the piano, startled, and oh for -

"-fuck's sake, Egbert," he remembers he can say aloud, smacking his face as John visibly jumps at the sound of his actual voice. "I don't believe it. I am physically incapable of believing it. Thirty seconds in and this show has already jumped the shark. We've done a triple toe loop right over a fucking megalodon, that's how unbelievable this is -"

"Shit." Bro sounds like he's in physical pain. "Tell me the other guy installed a mute button -"

It's a tiny thirteen year old Egdork wearing an honest-to-god beagle puss. There is no way Dave can shut up about this, no matter how uncool he sounds.

"Joooohn! You were so adorable!" Jade squeals, completely missing the point. She's still floating in midair, prodding at the screen until the Querent puts out a hand to gently turn the jabbing finger aside. "Look at your teeth! Talk about some beaver chompers, mister!"

"I grew into them!" John protests, which is a complete lie. His face is as easy to read as ever, a study in vague horror and fascination as he watches the scrawny John on the screen start dicking around with a pack of cards on the floor in some kind of really sad game of Solitaire.

"Not wearing contacts, either," Karkat mutters, and Dave has to take a second look himself to confirm when ex-John scurries out of the oddly rearranged study to cross a living room full of even more insane clown paraphernalia. But yeah, when John sneaks outside and takes the beagle puss off to stare up at the sky, a wistful look on his chubby baby face, his eyes are a brilliant blue, with none of that deeply ingrained paranoia in them that the John Dave knows would have had if he took even one step outside without his tinted contacts in to conceal his identity.

[ Wind skims the voids keeping neighbors apart, as if grazing the hollow of a cut reed, or say, a plundered mailbox. A familiar note is produced. It's the one Desolation plays to keep its instrument in tune - ]

Then John puts the beagle puss of shame back on, and the low drone at the back of Dave's head subsides.

This is so weird. Like looking at a John who never -

Dave sucks air in through his teeth, but Rose says it first. "You're not afraid of being seen," she says, slowly, marveling at the concept. "You - don't seem to have a heroic alias to hide behind."

John's laugh is pretty shaky. "Uh, yeah, I uh - I don't think I was that scrawny at thirteen, either! I'd have already started hero work by then, so...I wasn't a hero? Sooo weird."

Finally, while John's running around peering into the window of his dad's car and his own house, sneaking around with exaggerated pluck like he's playing some kind of lame spy game in his own head, and eventually engaging with his dad in some strange, completely pastry-based dotestrife with a Samuel Egbert who's as dapper as ever, two other screens slide into focus. John is aggrieving his dad with a tiny goddamn hammer and getting auto-pastried all over the damn kitchen, so Dave fervently hopes this can't get any weirder.

On one screen a tiny girl with a black headband and heavy goth makeup is thoroughly engrossed with knitting while sitting at her computer desk. Her room is dark, all blacks and dark purples and pale lilacs, the only light coming from the bedside table lamp and the electric glow of her purple laptop. Outside the curtains a thunderstorm rages, lightning flickering across the night sky and low rumbles of thunder purring through the speakers, but all Dave can really wonder about is the repeating mantra of -

[ You wonder if this rain will ever let up. It's driven since the month began, perhaps long enough to forget its purpose. It no longer even knows to assuage fire. Somewhere a zealous god threads these strings between the clouds and the earth, preparing for a symphony it fears impossible to play. And so it threads on, and on, delaying the raise of the conductor's baton.]

Seriously, where is that extra sound coming from? He can tell it's not coming from the speakers, but he's too fucking paranoid to nudge John and start asking the group if they're hearing these extended versions of the auditory hallucinations, yes he's been having them all day, why do you ask -

Yeah. Something tells him he should just keep his mouth shut. His coolkid gambit has never been more at risk than it is at this moment, while everyone else is engrossed in watching a bunch of barely-teenagers run around being dorks on screen.

Well, actually, Rose is just sitting there, presumably doing normal Rose things. Unlike John and his frankly embarrassing disguise antics, Rose seems content to sit at her computer, a slim headset with a mouthpiece attached to her headband, and knit away at whatever the heck she's working on.

There's also the fact that her walls are absolutely fucking plastered with posters of cartoony tentacle monsters, ones with wide eyes and nubby mouths and stubby tentacles, like a cutesy artist's rendition of what tentacle art would be suitable for the mind of a young girl. When she swivels a little in her chair, Dave can spy a tiny Squiddle on her shirt.

"Kanaya -" Rose manages, half-strangled. The troll is a dark blur in the poor lighting as she strides across Dave's field of vision, seizing a chair from beside Samuel Egbert without further prompting for Rose, and when Kanaya wheels the chair over, her eyes almost neon green and yellow in the darkness, Rose sinks into it with hands groping for the armrests, as though the creeping horror of the room sucked away her ability to stand upright.

John follows like a Rose-magnet, and that means Karkat and Dave end up being drawn in his wake, all of them clustering with Rose's chair as their new centerpoint. "That is - that would be the opposite of a meditative space," Rose murmurs, shaking her head at the screen. "So many visual signifiers - it would draw the Horrors in like beacons in the dead of night. What could I possibly have been thinking -"

"Huh. The hole in the wall is gone," Oriole says, and Dave almost asks 'what hole?' before finally looking at the third screen and looking at pretty much an exact replica of his own room. With, amazingly enough, an intact window where the hole in his wall would usually be. There are a few unfamiliar posters on the walls and a few of his amateur attempts at taxidermy, which he definitely remembers having to throw away when they started to rot a few years ago, are still placed strategically around the room for maximum effect. Even the Dave doing absolutely jackshit while fiddling around with MS Paint on his old computer looks exactly like Dave remembers looking at thirteen - coltish and pale, with shades that swallow up half his face.

And if he listens in just the right way -

[ So don't change the dizzle, turn it up a little, I got a living room full of fine dime brizzles. Waiting on the Pizzle, the Dizzle and the Shizzle, G's to the bizzack, now ladies here we gizzo - when the pimp's in the crib ma, drop it like it's hot, drop it like it's hot, drop it like it's hot... ]

Oh god. It's worse than he thought.

"It's a shitty rap."

He's officially never mentioning any of this to anyone, ever. This is humiliating as fuck, yo. He is putting the hallucinated narration shit on lockdown. Conceal. Don't feel. Don't let them know - oh for the love of Moby Dick he's not going there.

John has yoinked his dad's PDA and absconded from the kitchen in a burst of smoke pellets. There's a game CD in a flimsy paper packet clutched in his hand at first as he races for the stairs, ignoring the faint echoes of Samuel's voice that follow him up the stairs from the kitchen. It seems like whatever camera the Hub is using only follows the kid in the house, and not their guardian. But at some point the CD vanishes, and Dave can't tell where on John's person he's keeping it, unless he's somehow stuffed the whole thing plus the red package into the pockets of his cargo shorts. Once he's up in his room he needlessly admires one of the shitty movie posters that have replaced the nerdy hero posters and jogs to the computer, sliding on a headset of his own as he does.

When Jade's voice starts up, chipper and even higher-pitched than usual, everyone in the room who's not a carapacian or Bro jumps. The fourth screen, the one Dave's eyes automatically flash to, assuming that's where Jade's shown up at last to join the past universe party, is still stubbornly blank. But the John on the screen is nodding along as the voice speaks - like he's listening to a recorded message.

GG: hi happy birthday john!!!!! <3
GG: helloooooo??
GG: ok i will talk to you later!!! :D

A click later, and then:

TG: hey GG is looking for you why are you even so popular all of a sudden TG: is today some sort of special occasion or something TG: did you do something to curry favor with ladies
TG: did you break your leg on a puppy or some shit
TG: dude what are you doing

John answers out loud, rolling his eyes so hard they can see it from a fucking universe away. "I discovered a comet that is going to destroy the earth, and it was named after me," he says. "Now I am famous, and everyone wants to talk to me a lot."

"Incredible," Dave mutters in John's ear. "You were even more of a nerd back then."

John elbows him in the ribs. Then, as the Dave on the third screen starts mumbling into a headset of his own, and the words come through clear over the speakers in the conference room, the current Dave starts to put two and two together. It's some kind of audio version of Pesterchum, though judging by the field of red and blue text on John's computer screen, the text option is still working. And hang on there's something incredibly weird about this whole thing because John is just clicking away at the computer one second, and the next he's summoning the game CD from out of thin air, jamming the impossible reappearing disc into the poor abused slot of his shitty old computer and kicking his feet some more as he waits for the software to install.

..."You had a sylladex!" Jade exclaims. This is clearly the most exciting news she's heard all day, and John just stares dumbly at his hands while his sister floats over to mash up his hair in an enthusiastic noogie.

Like those are the goddamn magic words, Jade's screen turns on, zooming in on a massive, towering white mansion in the midst of a steaming tropical island. The viewpoint settles at last on a dark-skinned Polynesian girl as scrawny as John, snoring a little as she naps in the middle of an indoor greenhouse. Her fingers sport quite a few colorful elastic bands as rings, and there's a tiny note folded up under her hand that Dave can't read.

And everything slowly starts to turn into a magnificent four-part shitshow. When alternate universe Jade finally wakes up and begins hopping on teleporter pads to travel through rooms full of fantastically weird portraits and suits of armor, all Dave can hear is:

[ You eat a weird bug and don't even care! ]

Fucking incredible.

Dave doesn't know if anyone else in the room is keeping up with all this. He knows he's missing things now that there are four screens to focus on, images flickering by that even if he pauses time he can't split his focus efficiently enough to get everything.

He sees that they all have Jade's weird sylladex ability. They're all captchalogue things left and right, and John in particular is a goddamn menace. How he hasn't accidentally impaled someone in all thirteen years of his stupidly dangerous life is a miracle that can only be attributed to a merciful and benevolent cosmic deity that Dave is sure Karkat would have some furious words to share with via shouting match. Matthew McConaughey - who is, weirdly enough, not a troll in this past universe - takes a razor blade to the face, and both the past and real John shriek in dismay.

But then the four of them start talking over their Pesterchum audio chats about a game, and suddenly Rose has hooked up as John's 'server player,' and then the everything goes fucking bass-ackwards as the Egbert house starts to expand and deform in ways that defy every law of physics known to man, filled with weird ass scientific equipment that takes up all of the balcony and significant chunks of John's room and the living room. It's all apparently under Rose's control, from halfway across the continent.

"Oh my god. What the fuck?" Karkat demands at one point. "Okay, now I know this is all just some crackpan's idea of hilarious CGI. Haha, very funny."

WQ: Alas, it is not a false image. Skaia invests great power in its Proxseeds.

WQ: Creation, destruction, metamorphosis...all of these lie within the scope of the players' power.

"This is incredible," Kanaya agrees, her pale claws still squeezing Rose's shoulder whenever the alternate Rose returns to her Horrorterror shrine of a room. "It truly is warping the physical environment of the domicile."

That's when the meteors start to show up. Jade hears an impact outside her room and investigates, but then John spies one hurtling toward his house, and that's about when it really starts to sink in that all this talk about a meteor apocalypse hasn't been bullshit.

Jesus.

Shit starts to get real when a terse exclamation from Rue Lalonde makes them all focus on Rose's screen, because in rapid succession everything goes to hell: the power at the Lalonde house cuts out, leaving John stranded with a massive fucking meteor bearing down on his location; the meteors raining down around Rose's house, meanwhile, have set all of her shit on fucking fire, and though she manages to regain an internet connection in time to help John complete some weird task and white out his screen just before the meteor hits, she's soon trapped outside in the blazing heat and the incessant rain, slamming her fists on a portable power generator as her makeup streams down her face and the fire ravenously consuming the forest around her blisters her pale skin.
Then a mysterious passage opens up in the creepy pet mausoleum, and Rose absconds with trees crashing down all around, her hair stuck to her face and her caked on black lipstick one horrific smear across her mouth as she trudges through the dimly lit corridors toward SkaiaNet Labs. John and Jade are still running around doing weird shit; Jade is a robot half the time, and John has started coming across inky black enemies that leaves oily streaks all around his recently relocated house, still fighting with a pathetic hammerkind and sweating up a storm. Dave barely has time to spare to watch himself getting his ass kicked by Bro in a desperate effort to obtain a new copy of the Sburb game CDs to try and rescue Rose - the circumstances concerning how he lost his own copy have been all too conveniently wiped from his memory due to excessive amounts of uncool. That's his story and he's sticking to it.

Rose comes across what the Quandary derisively refers to as a session terminal, and Dave feels the cold really sink into the pit of his stomach when Rose, voice shaky and hands trembling a little as she works the controls, reports to John that the meteors are everywhere.

"John, you don't understand," she's saying, sinking down and scrubbing a hand through her hair, a wild look in her eyes as the thirteen year old stares up at the damning live map of the world's destruction. "This is - this is an extinction class event. I - even if the meteors stopped now, after so many large-scale impacts, there'll be ash and debris in the sky for years. Centuries, even. I've read enough post-apocalyptica to see where this is going. Nothing will be able to grow."

EB: i'm sure it can't be that bad...
EB: but uh, i guess it is?
EB: gee, that really sucks, rose. we need to get all of you out of there soon!
EB: what the heck is dave doing is the real question here!

On his screen, alternate John doesn't look all too concerned about the fact that the human race has been condemned to an early grave, even as he reassures Rose. There's a flicker of worry on his face for all of a moment, and then -

[ whoooooooosh! ]

- it's blown away, leaving him as bald-faced and naively optimistic as ever. This is a John with none of the real John's hang ups about a hero's duty to protect civilian life, and he blows all the existential terror that's got Rose on her knees in the green-lit lab out of his mind like a blast of cold air.

Of course, then John proceeds to flip the fuck out over Gushers being a Betty Crocker product, something that only draws a shudder of disgust from the John in this room.

"This is really weird. So fucking weird," Dave says, because someone has to say it. They're watching weenie versions of themselves skip along and casually bring about a meteor apocalypse by playing a goddamn reality-altering video game and how has no one said this yet.

Now the younger Rose is biting back tears and stepping onto a transportalizer like those that riddle Jade's jungle tower, throwing one last fleeting look at the computer screen with despair in her face. Now Dave is - Jesus fuck, younger Dave is still getting his ass handed to him by Bro, and that's just sad. Bro is literally just handing Dave his ass, buttered up and served on an ice cold platter of unquestionable superiority. Now John is running through his house one more time, his thirteen year old baby face twisted with terror as he calls his dad's name in every room until he finds a black smear where the Dadbert made his last stand. Now Jade is falling asleep and has a secondary robot body, but it's getting harder for Dave to keep up with what's going on at what time. Amazingly enough, watching four different miniature assholes race around the screens and understanding everything that happens isn't a skill he has. From what he can tell Rose just lived through an explosion that took out the laboratory in the distance and is scrambling to escape a room full of combustible liquids in case the next blaze of the forest fire reaches the house.

And Dave -

Is STILL GETTING HIS ASS KICKED.

"I swear you guys, I am not actually that shitty in a strife. Oh my god," Dave says in disbelief, watching Lil Cal batter another version of himself across the face for like the tenth time. Unbelievable. "Bro, what the fuck, if Rose dies in a fire this is literally your fault."

Bro just grunts. Because Bro is a complete and utter dick.

Finally Bro throws Dave down and absconds, chill in his victory ollie, tossing a pair of Sburb discs with "BRO" scrawled across the front like a half-assed pity prize for getting to thoroughly annihilate Dave's ass.

Jesus. That was like witnessing the fucking Battle of Antietam or some other monumental military failure. No, that was literally Hiroshima in strife form. Bro fucking bombed him. Dave is pretty sure this particular past-Dave tanked their coolkid gambit for next fucking century. They'll never recover from this. Dave has probably been working through this coolness deficit his entire life in this universe and never known it.

TG: bro just kicked my ass
TG: thats really all there is to say on the matter

Someone, somewhere in the conference room starts sniggering.

...Their time will come.

Jade starts dicking around with a harpoon zipline. Dave can't figure out what the fuck is going on with her timeline except it involves sleeping and robots and cuckoolander know-it-all mystique, because she's been awake in the game all along. Rose ends up in the game's Medium in record time because once past-Dave's not making an ass of himself he's doing all this prototyping shit so fast it's going out of style in his wake. Her land's all neon pastels that hurt to look at, rainbow swirls of water and chalky beaches, and she starts stabbing the shit out of the game enemies with a pair of knitting needles and way more proficiency than John has managed to muster so far.

Dave refuses to watch any of his own entry to the Game after a certain point. As far as he's concerned, he just magically popped out of the way of that inbound meteor through sheer force of cool. The meteor took one look at the Strider abode and thought, 'OH SHIT,' and then turned right the fuck back around while Dave lounged around waiting for the stupid crow-sprite thing to stop messing with him, and everything was fucking awesome.

Yeah.

"Dude, you fucking sucked at this game," Oriole mutters.

Then they watch a future Dave show up, toss a bunch of captchalogue cards on the roof of the Strider apartment, and prototype himself to create -

"Oh, you've got to be fucking kidding me."

Karkat lets out a howl of derisive laughter, directed at both of them. "We fucking sucked at this game," is the only comeback Dave can think of, grimacing and vowing not to look at his own screen at all because really? Really?! They were literally the same person, and how the fuck did that translate to this universe? His head aches just thinking about it.

It takes Dave and the newly christened Davesprite all of five minutes to talk John out of some insanely stupid idea he's got to rocket off with a jetpack toward the final boss of his planet, five tense minutes that end with John veering off course at the actual last moment to spiral off like a fucking loon through the grey mists and black-blue bruise of a sky over his game planet. And once Jade's ready, John brings her through into the Medium with remarkable competency.

But not before Becquerel fucking annihilates the last giantass meteor in a burst of green radiation and space lightning, and the last glimpse any of them have of the planet Earth is an irradiated wasteland of sand and craggy, blasted impact craters.

Jade's sprite ends up being prototyped with a suit of armor - maybe by accident, maybe by alternate John's nerdy design. When she finishes falling through the air and shoots her totem piñata, white light scoops her tower out of reality, and into the Medium.

[ I slept and saw God's forge in frost. Its hearth was quelled, and as it cooled so swooned the verdancy it kept above. In slumber it grew a thick winter skin, white as bedsheets. In their folds the waker dreamt, her breath as steam, her touch as hot as iron, forgotten in the fire. Oh, that this too too solid flesh would melt, thaw and resolve itself into a dew! ]

[Welcome, Player 4, to the Hands of Frost and Frogs]

- Weird shit happens. John ends up creating multiple ectochildren out of paradox slime that go back to become themselves and their guardians before crashing back on his planet again. Dave is running so many time loops that the screen itself doesn't seem to know which is the current alternate Dave half the time, as he's doing something entirely pointless involving the stock exchange and the purchase of every fraymotif known to nakodile kind, while Davesprite eventually takes off for parts unknown.

Rose tears apart the pastel castles of her land with a vengeance, her needles raised as she progressively uses them less like stabbing strife specibi and more like wands channeling a darker power. Jade collects frogs on some mad quest to synthesize the genesis frog, a mission that makes the Quandary spit sourly and make rude hand gestures in multiple languages at that fourth screen. It's starting to sink in that according to every rule of this stupid game, the Black Queen is meant to be a major antagonist, and Dave's skin crawls when he considers how much time he's spent alone with her in real life.

Occasionally the screens will hum and flicker, and switch to what the Querent calls their dreaming souls. Dave doesn't know why he's surprised that he and Rose are stuck on the enemy moon, the one literally called Derse with dark carapacians running around trying to sabotage their efforts to win the game. Rose drops by Dave's tower for a while, and they have hella rad dance party, natch, before Rose leaves to do more research.

But it's not until Rose's screen goes dark that everything really starts to fall apart.

Because, incredibly enough, the world ending? Is just a fucking taste-test for the shitshow to come.

It's also around then that Karkat starts to legitimately freak the fuck out, and when Karkat freaks out John freaks out because of their fucking codependency and really, it's all just a mess.

The only real warning they get is Rose biting through her lip as her alternate accepts a very familiar cue ball from one of the consorts of her land. Slowly, moment by painful moment, the shadows in the cave she's taken up residence in grow deeper and darker, with unnatural curls, and when Rose raises the cue ball to ask it something, the screen fizzes and dies in a bloom of darkness. And for a long time, that's the last they can see of Rose.

John's screen goes grimdark next.

He's wandering around on his planet, oblivious as always, with a rather familiar carapacian and a salamander he's taken to calling my daughter, Casey! at his side. With Rose radio silent, John and Jade are chatting it up, and John is trying to find the package she sent him, stolen from the Egbert car at some point after the entire vehicle plunged over the side of a cliff. Luminous, aquamarine clusters of bobbing anemones gleam across the rocky chaparral, but the landscape grows more and more scraped over as John jumps over the outcroppings, his new green sweater streaked with the black oil blood of the ogres and imps that serve as the most common game antagonists.

Then WV rounds the side of a shorn-off blue plateau, and shrieks, scurrying back to crouch behind the rock with his makeshift weapon in hand until John hurries to catch up with him. Casey the salamander tugs on John's jeans in an attempt to pull him away from the crater in the distance, but there's a bright green package sitting like obvious schmuck bait on the ground between John and the shattered remnants of the cloudy, steel grey palace in the distance.

And John, of course, is a total schmuck. He lopes over to the package, grinning - and stops, one hand reaching down to snag it but never quite making contact. The kid blinks, shaking his head and rubbing his temples, and then, slowly turns toward the giant meteor ensconced in the wreckage of the palace. A few of the towers are still standing, bent at odd angles, but the majority of the structure looks like a pipe organ badly mangled by the force of the collision. Both of John's recently acquired sidekicks try to haul him back when the kid starts marching in that direction, shrieking warnings about 'denizens' and final gates, but Casey breaks away when John gets too close to the half-collapsed moat and flees out of the range of the camera.

So it's WV who accompanies John across a fallen pipe to whack open the first door they come across. There are scribbles in Alternian all over the walls of the corridor John finds himself in, warnings written in what looks like blood, but the kid barely spares them a second's glance before staggering by.

"Oh, no," Rose is whispering, and Karkat of all people is backing her up, chanting under his breath like a troll possessed. "Oh no, oh, John, no ."

By the time John looks up at the camera again, he's in some central room, one that's absolutely coated in troll blood covering at least half the hemospectrum. John's nose is bleeding and his eyes are glassy and distant; no matter how much WV batters at him with his fists, it doesn't even seem to register.

The shadows in the room are so, so dark. When they start creeping forward, dark purple and bruise black tentacles beyond counting, John sags to his knees in a daze.

The screen goes black.

"What the taintchafing fuck?!" Karkat spits, giving a little half-lunge toward the screen, as though he could bring the picture back by shaking it. "What the fuck is going on? What is this shit?!"

"It's Horrorterrors," Rose says, which at least shuts Karkat right up. But Rose's voice has gone flat and dead, like she'll never be snarky again. "They are many-angled beings of non-Euclidean geometries, hiveminds beyond mortal comprehension. Whatever it is recording all of this, I doubt the camera would be able to handle it without the internal mechanism melting into slag."
BQ: Now do you begin to see just how badly your session went awry?

BQ: The Singers of the Ring are only ever meant to be tangentially related to the Game. They exist in the void between sessions, and are supposed to be content to remain that way.

"So what changed?" John asks, rubbing at his arms as though shivering. His screen and Rose's are still dark, and now, on Dave's screen, the shadows seem to be deepening as the alternate Dave tilts his head to the side and exits the dungeon he's exploring without a word, flashing across the lava-filled landscape toward a dark cavern that seems to lead down into the bowels of the planet.

BQ: Someone breached the sanctity of the Medium. Someone invited them in.

BQ: But even before that, the kind of dedication to this singular task - that of seizing and consuming the minds of all the players, not simply those on Derse who would be more vulnerable - is anathema to a Horrorterror of any breed. They sow chaos for its own sake.

The Querent cuts in.

WQ: But this single-mindedness implied to us that someone had given them direction. Someone had twisted at least one hivemind, if not more than one, to their purpose. This is their design.

WQ: That was when we knew the Game had been irrevocably compromised, at the most fundamental level of its programming. That is what triggered the emergency glitch contingency subroutines.

BQ: But still, even with those in place, the situation deteriorated at an alarming rate.

Abruptly, just as Dave's screen starts to fade to black, with Dave in the middle of a hollowed out volcanic magma chamber, staring up at an immense, molten iron smithy, John's screen turns back on. Alternate Dave is dropping his bladekind at his feet like a complete moron and stepping toward the tangle of knotted grimdark steadily consuming the body of a giant creature on the floor, but alternate John is screaming in the middle of a mass of black vines, and Dave doesn't know which fucking screen to stare at because they're both utterly horrific.

Then John tears WV out of the grip of a tentacle knotted around the carapacian's torso, his face a bloody mask of tears and his eyes gleaming in the dark as he presses a hand to his temple. A mouth full of teeth opens up in the darkness overhead -

And then the entire screen zooms out wildly, out of control, as the interior of the meteor explodes in the burst of a spontaneous hurricane. John and WV are two tiny figures in the whirling storm, tossed out of the meteor and landing in a graceless heap somewhere well outside the crater of the old denizen palace.

Dave should not be so overly invested in what has thus far amounted to an hours-long film of their shitty past lives. But he's so relieved when the last of the grimdark clears out of the corners of John's screen that he exhales sharply, and his hand seems to have migrated at some point to dig fingernails into John's shoulder, as though to make sure he's still there. He whips the hand back into his pocket before anyone can see it, though he's sure Bro's noticed already.

Using the windy thing to that degree, after not having seemed to have any of his current powers at all throughout the entire game, seems to have knocked the alternate John for a loop, because he needs WV's help to limp further away from the broken pipe organ when an enormous serpent rises up out of the earth. The snake glitters bright green with a slender white head, its scaly flanks edged with the tatters of fluttering wings. Grimdark tentacles have wrapped around the back of its human skull and sunk deep into its brain, but even as Dave thinks this is the new way the Horrorterror is going to attack John, the serpent snarls and smashes its entire head against the ground, scraping the grimdark tangle off against a trapezoidal crystal, and bellowing with triumph when it's free at last.

Then John and WV are far enough from the palace that the screen has to follow them as they flee the rampaging denizen, who just woke the fuck up ahead of schedule with a massive grimdark hangover.

WQ: That is, as near as we can tell, the mechanism by which the tangle you know as Leviathan was able to so thoroughly compromise your minds.

WQ: Someone helped seed each of the denizens with the grimdark, and from there it festered in their minds until it began to affect you all, too, drawing you toward the final dungeons before the time was right.

"Remind me again why extraterrestrial calamari porking the local giant monsters would affect all of us?" Dave says, as his own screen cuts out entirely. Alternate John has wiped off his face and is rocketing around, shouting for Dave and Rose and Jade through their Pesterchum. Only Jade answers, and on her screen, she's left her sleeping wolf in the care of the robot body to handle some of the frog breeding duties while she trudges off toward a statue of a figure with enormous spines and twined serpentine bodies, looming in the distance across the frozen tundra. A blizzard starts to kick up, even as the shadows on the iridescent snow start to deepen and writhe, drawing Jade on. This is so messed up.

WQ: Because the mind of a player of the game and the mind of their denizen are inextricably linked. They are as much a representation of your struggles and individual growth as they are one of the endgame bosses.

WQ: When one is compromised, so is the other.

WQ: And they were all very much compromised.

A chair creaks, and now the Quandary is on her feet, pacing off on her side of the table with the light of the screens glinting off her carapace. She snarls with disgust, a wordless sneer of discontent and old rage.

BQ: The damage was done. The session was sabotaged beyond repair by the very fact that the package the Heir failed to retrieve contained the instrument of our downfall.

On the screen, Jade steps through fluted columns into the antechamber of a Greek temple, the statue of the quilled denizen resting on the roof overhead as Jade stares with glassed-over eyes at the entrance to the final dungeon beneath the tundra. But she's still slowly, stutteringly replying to John's frantic Pesterspam, with drawn out pauses between her replies as though the thoughts are difficult to string together into coherent words; it's still more than either the alternate Rose or Dave have managed thus far.

EB: jade, call bec right now!
GG: hang on just a second john!!!
GG: i need to...check something out...
EB: nonono! uh, oh man...
EB: call bec! wouldn't he want to see this too?!
EB: come on jade!
GG: yeah, maybe...
It takes Jade three faltering tries to whistle for Becquerel, and even when she does the wolf takes far too long to respond, still worn out from whatever nuclear explosion it unleashed on Earth. The moment it finds her, though, the mutt flares a warning of green plasma and teleports her out of the Horroterror's grip before the shadows can do more than screech in protest. The Jade on the screen blinks, her mouth an 'o' of puzzlement, before shaking her head vigorously.

EB: yessss! he got you out!
GG: john, what the heck is going on, mister?!
GG: my head feels really weird, and when did i get to that dungeon? :/ i had frog things to do!
EB: i don't get it really, but dave and rose aren't answering and you were acting really weird on my server app!
EB: davesprite showed me where the spirograph gate to rose's land was, but it's all gross and grindark and stuff. i don't think we can find her in all this without dave's server app, the planet's just too big!

John's not kidding, because he's rocketed through a questionable looking spirograph and hovers over the chalky pastel landscape of Rose's land with WV in a rocket car beside him. Only the thing is, all the pastel and chalky is coated with tar, the seas churning and brimming with black that eats away at the foundations of pale pink castles.

They have to pause the whole thing for the real Rose to throw up in the bathroom down the hall. Kanaya drives them back into the conference room when they try to follow her, and when she returns Rose is pale and shakier than before, but refuses to respond to any questions as she folds herself up in her chair. "Let's just continue, shall we?" she says, with a dark amusement in her hoarse voice.

Rose's screen remains stubbornly blank, and John's glitches occasionally as he tears through the Lalonde house, but then he's found Jaspersprite, the painfully pink cat princess abomination who can point him on the way to the gate to Dave's land but has no idea where Rose has gone.

JS: She said i was free to go and do what i want!
JS: And also that she didnt think she wanted to finish her land quest.
JS: Which is a shame because if shed learned to play the rain she might have saved all the fish which would have been tasty!
JS: But im just her cat and also a princess ghost so who knows! :3
JS: Maybe she had a more important quest she wanted to do. It's up to her I guess!
JS: Purr purr purr.

The neon yellow clouds have started to turn a dull grey by the time John makes it to the portal to Dave's land. Now Jade is frantically snatching up frogs; now WV's nearly plummeting into a cascade of lava that John barely yanks him away from in time. Jade gabbles out directions for John to follow because she's still Dave's server player, can still see that Dave's passed the fuck out on her screen and direct John to the coordinates listed on her expanded map application.

And still there's no sign of Rose.

"This is bullshit," Dave mutters when John finally catches up to where Bro is fending off the grimdark-possessed body of an enormous man in a smithing apron, built of molten lava and crusted over with an ever-shifting skin of volcanic glass. Bro tosses the alternate Dave's unconscious body at John and sends them both crashing into WV's rocket car before taking on the denizen alone.
"Seriously, this again?" He got enough of the unconscious damsel gig in New York, thanks.

WQ: Derse lies closer to the Furthest Ring than does Prospit. All Derse dreamers are more vulnerable to such incursions. There was nothing you could have done at that point.
The past John hauls Dave back to the isolated remnants of the Strider apartment, and at one point dumps three buckets of cold water from his sylladex onto Dave's head in an attempt to rouse him from the Horrorterror daze. He and Jade argue for a while about the safety of John picking up Dave's server connection to Rose, even as John takes Dave's shades off and starts eyeing them with apprehension.

GG: seriously this seems like a bad idea!
EB: but we need to see where rose is, and dave still won't wake up!
EB: aaaaargh!
GG: im just saying, youre still all dinged up from that flying stuff, and messing around with other peoples server stuff can cause screwy stuff to happen...maybe i should try to dream and see what skaia has to say!
EB: too late, i'm gonna do it!
GG: jooooohn! do not do the thing!

John does the thing.

But of course, because the past was literally a piece of shit, Dave's screen doesn't fizzle back on until after John has sped off through the gate back to Rose's land in a pair of rad ass shades and left Dave himself at WV's questionably tender mercies. The camera's not focused on the alternate Dave's unconscious, prank-riddled body, either; it's a Dave in purple pajamas, drifting in the black of space with all of Derse behind him, his nose pouring blood as he floats right into the path of outstretched tentacles.

It's only in this context that Dave starts to really understand the sheer scope of what a Horrorterror is because the thing is huge. Derse is a fucking planet with a fucking moon, and the morass of tentacles, thorns, and teeth that has lodged itself right up among the meteors of the Furthest Ring could swallow the entire thing five times over. Worse, sometimes the camera will shudder and wink out before resetting, and then the tangle will look even bigger, as though parts of its body mass are only visible at certain angles.

Fucking Horrorterrors, man.

An explosion rocks Derse, and the shockwaves hit dream Dave when he's barely a foot from the nearest mouth full of teeth and white fire. Thankfully, they hit the Horrorterror, too, and when the Dave on the screen whips around to stare at the winged monster rising up from the dark planet, the tangle hisses and slides away into the void with a quiet pop, as though it had never ventured into the session at all.

Then, with a cracking roar, the winged black thing pelts away through the space between Derse and the far off ring of planets closer to Skaia, blowing up even the purple Dersite battleships if they happen to get in its way.

Dream Dave scratches his head, and the screen flips back to the Dave on the lava planet, sitting up and banging his head on the underside of the table John had, in a fit of spastic trickster dumbassery, handcuffed Dave to. Without his shades, thirteen year old Dave is disgustingly easy to read, his eyes squinted up against the light as he takes a phone from his pocket and starts typing.

TG: uh guys
TG: i think troubles coming
EB: DAVE!
GG: DAVE OH MY GOD!
TG: oh jesus someone taught you two to how to caps lock
And there is still no Rose. Dave is starting to wonder if there's even a Rose left to worry about at this point.

"What was that?" Jade asks in the present, shaking her head. At some point in all this she sat down on the conference table with a faint thump, and even her hair has stopped floating so that she can chew on a strand of it, combing her fingers through the tangles with a nervous compulsion. "That thingy that flew away just then? Was it a good thing?"

BQ: No, you stupid girl.

BQ: He was Jack Noir in that life, and my traitor of an Archagent, destined as always to be both a help and hindrance to players. And the moment one of his usual cohort delivered the stolen package to his quarters, the entire session went terminal.

Jade almost falls sideways off the table, catching herself with a glint of green and a dismayed cry. "You mean the present from me? Why did it mess things up so bad when John didn't even get it?" Jade asks. "What was I trying to send him? Grandpa never mentioned anything like this."

BQ: A stuffed animal bearing multiple dangerous, high-level specibi. Most relevantly, a copy of the Heir's primary god tier specibus, and the Foul Croaker himself only knows how you got ahold of the captchalogue code for that so early in the game. It was one thing for the Knight of Time to bring back weaponry for himself, but quite another for you to put such a powerful hammerkind into the hands of the one thuggish brute dumb enough to wield it against me.

"Wha -"

The Quandary raises a hand in the dark, the one with the missing claws that Dave has never asked about for fear of being gutted by an angry alien dame.

BQ: From what I was able to piece together after the fact, the package was stolen in the commotion caused by Typheus's rampage. The Droll, the Dignitary, the Brute - it hardly matters who did it. Either way, the next time I confronted Noir about violating uniform regulations, with the help of that vile rabbitkind he tore the ring from my hand. He claimed the Queenship.

BQ: Unfortunately, different pieces are affected in different ways by inheriting the ring. Pawns are useful as blank slates - but an Archagent... All of their most basic instincts are amplified, first and foremost those concerned with taking out agents of Prospit. Subversive subroutines that would otherwise have caused him to sympathize with and ally with you in common cause were shut down automatically so that he could more naturally fulfill the Queenship.

BQ: And then, naturally, he murdered all of you.

"And yeah, fuck, I can't watch this," Karkat announces. "Fuck. Fucking fuck. Pause the fucking thing, I - fuck!"

Dave barely manages to sidestep out of the way before Karkat shoves his way toward the trash can. Apparently, unlike Rose, the troll doesn't have it in him to haul ass for the restroom before upchucking. John manages to kneel next to Karkat and remove the dangling ties of the troll's hoodie from the line of fire before shit gets nasty.

"Perhaps we could all use a break," Samuel Egbert suggests, which is honestly the best idea Dave has heard all day. Watching Horrorterrors puppet them all around and swallow up all of Rose's land has left him with unsteadiness of his own, but he will literally punch himself in the balls before he'll willingly ask to borrow the trash can from Karkat. This has been the worst movie marathon of all time.

"It might be useful to collect our thoughts and first impressions," Doctor Lalonde agrees; that's all the warning they get before the dimmed lights flare again. Everyone looks faded and drained in the electric light, and Dave doesn't feel much better himself. There's a deep-seated unease in Rue Lalonde's face as the Querent pauses the recording. "Take a half hour, perhaps? If anyone needs something to eat, there should be something in the break room by now. But if you intend to wander the halls, please be aware that there is a carapacian stabbing doctors on the premises as yet unaccounted for."

BQ: SPADES.

Karkat retches again.

- Karkat squats in the hall, head between his knees and trashcan sitting by his side while he does his dumbass deep breathing exercises. No one's entirely sure if he learned that trick from the Internet or someone else in the house, but it seems to be working enough that John can afford to take his eyes off Karkat for a second when Dave slides down the wall opposite them to sit down.

"Not a word," Karkat says between long gasps of air, scowling at Dave with sunken eyes. It looks like he burst a capillary in his eye at some point, because the right one is all rusty. "I - fucking - mean it."

"I'm one more squirming tentacle image from being right there with you, man," Dave retorts, grimacing and trying not to concentrate too long on the nauseating images of squid monsters from beyond the stars that dance in his head. "Fuck the creepy past universe, okay? Everyone was dead and we were all getting mindraped with tentacles on a semi-regular basis."

"I second that! Urgh," John says, rubbing his cheeks with his hands and trying to slap some life back into them. He looks almost as tired as Karkat, and even as Dave watches a tiny smear of fresh blood trickles over the scabby crusts of dried blood that must have been going on and off throughout the viewing session. Dave gestures to his own nose as discreetly as he can while raising an eyebrow at John, and the kid gets it on the third try, by which point Karkat is squinting at Dave's eyebrow with suspicion. "I still have no idea where my dad ended up in all that kerfuffle, and did you notice? There was no sign of Karkat at all!" He scrubs at his nose with his already bloodied sleeve, wincing at the sight.

Jade flings herself down next to Dave with a huff, so close that Dave cowers. "I brought sandwiches," she says, setting an entire platter of sandwiches on the floor between the four of them. She tears a bite off of the chicken salad sandwich already in her mouth with a frown before going on. "Guys, I think we really messed up."

"Seems to be the general consensus, yeah," Dave says. He stays nauseated for about two seconds before the fact that there's free food two inches from his foot wins out and he takes the first sandwich he can reach.

Oriole shows up next. "I don't even want to talk about it," are the first words out of his mouth. He's forgotten to put his sunglasses back on, and he sits down on John's other side with his free wing splayed out, looking shell-shocked.

But at least he provides a convenient distraction, because they really need one right now or they're all going to be awkwardly trying to eat food while Karkat makes a fucking heroic effort not to vomit again in their presence. Dave narrows his eyes at Oriole and tries to figure out what it was that seemed off about the way his reincarnated crow-prototyped future self sprite just sat down.

...Well, that sentence was a goddamn adventure from start to finish.

"Welcome to the circle of the generally traumatized, yeah." Dave switches sides between one second and the next, crouching next to Oriole. Karkat squawks like he's personally offended by Dave flashstepping, and then he's retching again. "Let me see it."

Oriole meets him stare for stare. "No."

Dave takes that as a yes. He starts grabbing at the bandages, and takes a sharp foot to the side before Oriole settles the fuck down. When he's finished undoing the too-tight mess - Bro's work, definitely - the bedraggled, unwashed feathers poof out pitifully, more than a little crunched from all this time wrapped up. There's still exposed skin where the bone jutted through the break and feathers tore out, but aside from that...

Dave applies pressure, and Oriole grumbles at him, staring determinedly down at his claw-hands in his lap while ignoring Dave's fiddling.

They're probably not going to ever talk about that fact that at one point, Oriole was literally Dave. Bro would be proud.

By the time Dave finishes inspecting the wing from all angles and coming to the conclusion that the break he thought would probably cripple Oriole for life is pretty much fully healed already, with only residual soreness and stiffness from being taped down for so long, Rose and Kanaya have returned from the restroom. Karkat looks aggrieved at this turn of events but tough shit, he needs to get used to working in groups that aren't just him and John.

"Well, Karkat, it would seem neither of us can claim the ability to keep our meals down," Rose says, sitting without Kanaya's help despite the offered hand of assistance. Paradoxically, Rose almost looks a little better, so maybe she and Kanaya went to the restroom to freshen up or something and not to cover up a second barf-fest. When Jade offers them part of the sandwich bounty, both of them turn her down. "I don't think food would be the best idea at the moment, Jade. I fear this will only get worse before it gets better."

Karkat may mumble something garbled like, "Tell me about it," but it's up for debate. Jade swallows her bite of sandwich slowly, and then looks at the rest of the food with her lips twisted and her brow furrowed in dismay before she sets the sandwich back down.

"Yeah, I'm kind of glad I'm not remembering any of that stuff," John says, still rubbing Karkat's back, and okay apparently they're skipping right past the part where he'd deny the fact that he could remember all that stupidity if his brain weren't as screwed up as the rest of theirs. "Even watching it is hard, I can't even imagine remembering what it was like to live through it!" He's almost too bright and chipper, obviously forcing it, so yeah great, John's twice as fucked up as everyone else here. Awesome.

"Goddammit! You didn't live through it, that's the whole point!" Karkat yells. It's the first time he's really yelled in a while, so everyone flinches back because Karkat can get loud. Like, ear-piercingly loud.

"The carapacian did say you were all murdered," Kanaya adds. Personally Dave's first instinct when Karkat shouts is to contradict him with all the beautiful words now available for him to say aloud, but Kanaya seems to toe the classy snark line more than the irony line. "I would think that I agree, Rose - it's only going to get worse." She cocks her head, assessing Karkat with a steely green eye. "It might be for the best if the two of us absent ourselves. I doubt that you would react any more pleasantly to the sight of your moirail in mortal peril, any more than I would Rose."

And - Karkat laughs.

"Oh shit we broke him," Dave and Oriole say at the same time.

"Shut up, both of you," Karkat snaps, irritable as he rubs at his face and reaches out for the trash can. "You people don't get it." The troll spits something gross into the trash can, and then glowers at all of them with eyes that are more exhausted than angry. "I've already seen all this. I've been dreaming about it for weeks."

---

BQ: SPADES!

WQ: Dear, you're shouting.

BQ: He is insufferable. He shall know my displeasure.

BQ: At maximum volume.

WQ: Will you require assistance in tracking him down? I know the facility well enough by now that I may be able to help turn him out of whatever cranny he has found.

BQ: No. This is between me and him.

WQ: Well. If you're sure.

WQ: ...Do you believe he has a ring?

BQ: Well, we won't know that until I've found him and thrashed it out of him, will we?

WQ: Ah.

WQ: Try not to break him too badly.

BQ: I will annihilate him. I will tear the internalized genitalia from his abdomen and use them to string my own personal electric violin.

BQ: And then I will tie him to the nearest concupiscent platform and reintroduce him to the Black Inches.

WQ: ...Oh dear.

From the grate of the ventilation shaft above, Spades Slick growls to himself, and scoots back into the darkness.

He needs to seriously rethink his strategy.

John's never kept a closer eye on his phone before. It's his newest nervous tick, and more than once Karkat threatens to confiscate the thing so John will stop flicking through the forums at top speed during lunch, refreshing and closing the window and gnawing a new sore spot on his lip while he waits for the pages to load. He waits with a constant, low pulse of dread heavy in his stomach, his heart periodically bursting out into panicked thumps that leave him breathless and sick, so dizzy in the space behind his forehead that he can't see past it.

Any moment now, Diamonds Droog could release his secret identity to the world. Or maybe just the greater Seattle area, but it would only be a matter of time before it spread to Maple Valley and exposed his private hero life to everyone he's ever known. Even if the Crew boss were to keep her word - which John highly doubts - the very foundations of his morals as a hero would be compromised by his inability to oppose crimes committed by her people. Already have been, actually. He let her go free after all, and talked his friends into being accomplices right along with him.

God. He's so stupid. Sooo stupid. Literally the stupidest piece of shit on the planet. The look on his dad's face when John had finally been able to come downstairs and look him in the eye -

Yeah. He'd be disappointed in him, too, if he were his dad. John has messed up before, but all of those incidents had been accidents. The unnatural breeze at the aquarium field trip when he was eleven, teleporting out to Houston in spontaneous anger - no one had been hurt, and John had apologized and understood what he did wrong, and they'd learned from it. But this -

This jabs into John's gut like a thick chunk of glass, uncomfortable and jolting whenever he begins to adjust to it. This feels too much like two years ago, like stepping out of his bedroom window only half expecting the wind to catch him, a twisting swoop in his belly as his heart pounded in his ears and he flew away from home with no destination at all, conscious only by the urge to fly fly fly.

Flying had lifted his mood, as it always did, but the lingering anxiety drove him farther and farther from Seattle, knotting his logic into snarls and leaving him halfway to Colorado before he even thought to worry about the fact that his dad would be terrified when he realized John was gone.

Running away had been the worst decision he ever made. It led to him finding Dave, but that's beside the point. It happened so long ago and so much has gone on since then that John's convinced himself that he'd never have to relive what it felt like when his dad was disappointed in him again.

Well, he's feeling it now. It feels kind of like dying. They put on a pantomime of their usual interactions in front of the other people in the house, but after John gave his dad a rundown of the entire incident with Diamonds Droog the day after, Samuel nodded and then sighed as though the weight on his shoulders had multiplied tenfold. His head sunk into the palm of one hand as he rubbed his eyes with his fingers, and his expression, when he finally looked up at John again, was three parts exhaustion and one part coiled, poorly concealed disappointment. He said, "I'll see what I can do," before turning back to his computer and beginning to send out communiques to tap into all of his old military and police contacts without a word to John.

They haven't talked properly since then.

Talking is important; months of therapy drilled that one into John's head ages ago. But...there just hasn't been a spare moment! Yeah! They'd need more privacy or something first, and his dad's caught up in dealing with the three extra people they have hanging around the house - five, counting Bec and WV, all of them volatile and prone to super power abuse while in the house. John can't just expect him to drop everything when they have so many balls to juggle at once, not when John's the cause of all these stupid problems and is doing pretty much jackshit to help solve them. When everything's settled down, the two of them can talk!

He aches when he pawns that excuse off on Rose repeatedly; once they meet in person, he knows that barring extenuating circumstances she'll see right through him. It's her specialty, after all. Karkat is harder to fool, but they spend most of their time debating different ways to try to deal with Diamonds Droog because that's the root of all this dumb shit, anyway. John is so spectacularly, quietly miserable that he doesn't even have to worry about concealing a raging boner when Karkat talks with his lips against the side of John's neck. As long as he maneuvers the conversation clear of anything concerning Samuel Egbert, he thinks he can keep this from becoming a bigger deal than it needs to be.

Because Karkat would try to take what he thinks is John's side, but John doesn't deserve to have a side. He messed up bad, and he knows it, but he still can't see a way through this. In the state of mind he's in, even having Jade and Dave and Karkat here just makes the physical ache of Rose not being here all the more painful. He should just appreciate having three of the people he cares about most under the same roof as him; he bites down hard whenever he catches his lip wibble at the thought that Rose was right there, only a few blocks away, but he'd been too busy freaking out to visit her while it lasted.

Everything is awful.

Don't think about it.

The transition from Dave's land to Rose's is just the exchange of one kind of heat for another. The Ła ni ĝi uk Haa t a ni ĝi ĝi o k w o nk is excruciatingly hot, a sweltering, constant blaze that made your blood simmer and your head spin if you flew too close to the lava itself. Normal rules of heat convection don't seem to apply in the game, or else they've all developed an immunity to some of the worse effects of dehydration and extreme temperatures. Who even knows!

Rose's land is a paradise of chalky beaches and endless waves though, with constant neon gold rain falling from clouds and waterfalls that pour from enormous turtle shells in the sky above. The heat is less intense, but the humidity is god awful! It feels like breathing in warm pool water, honestly. The ocean spray, in comparison, is icy cold, and lumps of translucent pastel ice occasional drift by in the frosted waves. The rules of chemistry and physics don't really apply here, and the idea of icebergs in a tropical paradise makes about as much sense as Dave's land of steel and lava.

But there's no light anymore. The glare of all the epileptically flashing clouds and luminescent waters that half-blinded John when he flew through here before has died off, and he doesn't think it's just because of Dave's totally awesome shades. He can't even see the glittering white of Rose's house in the distance; everything’s gone murky and grimy. The waters below no longer glitter and swirl in kaleidoscopic swirls, and the lustrous pink beach beneath his rocket shoes is covered with a gloopy kind of tar that squishes and slides like muck rather than beach sand.

The ߀ à OfFilet ȁ à ʃam is still pretty rainy, but the light part is definitely debatable!

A bright shot of pain arc through John's head and he clutches his temples, eyes squeezed shut against the sudden agony. It's been doing that on and off ever since the tentacle things showed up in the weird meteor, as if something tore out the back of his skull and left a gaping hole through which his thoughts keep petering out. But he can brush the back of his head and feel the unbroken skin and hair for himself, no matter how powerful the impression is, and he uses that assurance to ground himself until he can stop thinking in patterns of pain and focus on his surroundings again.

Focus. They seriously need to find Rose! He can't believe she's been out of sight this long, but he supposes it's nobody's fault at this point. All of them have been messed up by whatever attacked them, but the scary thought is that, judging by the state of her poor planet, Rose might have been hit first and hardest, and none of them realized before she was alright in deep trouble.

Well! He's here now! And hopefully when Jade's finished frog hunting, she can join him in hunting soon! John is still a little panicky, but not as flat out terrified as he had been for a few horrifically long minutes back there, when no one but Jade would answer, and Dave had been reduced to monosyllables before finally going silent.

It takes him a few long minutes of fiddling to understand how Dave's controls on his shades work. Everything Dave uses always has to be semi-ironically overcomplicated and the server player interface in the right corner of the right sunglasses' lens is no exception. But eventually John snaps his fingers and the viewpoint that is supposed to focus only on a player's house switches over to Dave's specialized PlanetCam, an app from the same people who made GristTorrent, apparently. It zooms and zooms, processing as it hunts for Rose's presence on the planet, and the sick rap music that John turned on by accident and can't figure out how to turn off blares in his ears through the Squiddlemuffs while he hovers in midair, glancing worriedly at the waves. The churning seems to be growing stronger and more erratic, like the sea that Rose said was supposed to be dead except for the denizen who lurked in the deepest whale-ways is now agitated by the motion of dozens of monsters.

It's second nature to summon up a strife specibus by now. John lets the hammerkind sit heavy in his grip and waits, worrying at his lip with his teeth and wondering why the PlanetCam, which can always find Jade in seconds when he uses it on his Cosbytop, would struggle so hard to locate Rose. He can only hope she hasn't wandered toward her denizen's lair like the rest of them had, because he has no idea how he'll be able to alchemize a bunch of scuba diving gear in time.

There was someone who could have helped him figure out punch codes faster, but his head aches so much when he thinks about it that -

[ping]

Oh! John snaps to attention, the roiling waves forgotten as he waits for an image of Rose to appear and give him coordinates. And once he finds Rose, she can tell them what the heck is going on, and what they need to do next! John likes to pretend he's the friendleader, but Rose and Jade are the ones who understand all the weird game lore and what the heck the four of them are supposed to be accomplishing, here. For all he knows, maybe all this weird tentacle stuff has just been another trial in the game. It tends to do things like that.

The app beeps one last time, and shows him a picture of - nothing at all! It's just some random pink cliff-face, with a shallow cave carved out of the chalk, riddled with more of this black gunk that's everywhere but definitely short one Rose Lalonde! What gives?!

[error detected; target player is outside the PlanetCam range]

[download the BattlefieldScanner app to locate players and fully prototyped sprites post-land quest] Whaaaaat?!

He's not thinking about it. Not at all.

"Jade! It says Rose isn't in range! There's this little floating blue and white cloud circle in the corner of the screen, and that's it!"

Over the rap music, Jade shouts to be heard at the loudest volume setting on Pesterchum. "The app only covers our planets! If Rose somehow made it to don't think the name without us, I guess she wouldn't show up?"

John looks up at the greying sky, at the dim outline of nothing at all floating in the center of all this mess. It's had a new Mobius ring twining around and through the bright blue and white clouds ever since Jade entered the Medium, and John feels his stomach drop. It could take him hours to rocket all the way there - unless -

"Jade? Do you think there's a gate to that place? Maybe one on my planet?"

"Uh, duh! That's the final gate, after the seventh! How else did you think we'd get there for the endgame? But I don't think it activates unless you've dealt with your denizen, and Rose probably didn't build your house up enough to reach the spirograph..."

"Urrrgh..." John facepalms. He doesn't want to think about the monstrous, lithe, green and white serpent that rose up out of the earth of ꩥ⋙_months ago, sleek and definitely the most powerful thing his HPReader has ever tried to analyze, EVER. In the brief glimpse he'd got before WV hauled his butt to safety, Typheus's stats had been off the charts. No way he can take it down in time to help Rose!

And while he's not paying attention, lost in those thoughts, Rose's denizen attacks.

His eyes are aching with the effort of staring at multiple screens. The room is dark, and John doesn't really remember leaving the sandwich pow-wow to start the Queen's Hub again, but everyone's huddled back into the conference room again aside from the Black Queen, off hunting Spades Slick, and WV, who was last spotted picking the lettuce off an entire platter of sandwiches to get his green fix. Jade has tugged the entire table so it lies horizontal across from the wall full of screens, so that more people can sit on it and watch. Rose is perched on one side of John, Karkat on the other, and both of them have a death grip on his hand on their side. Jade hovers behind him, her hair drifting and sparking and occasionally trailing over his shoulder when she leans in to squint at the screens, and Dave is sprawled out sitting on the floor in front of them, using John's legs as a backrest.

But it's still not enough to ground him and make him stop thinking about -

All he gets by way of warning is a low but shrieking whistle, like a moaning cry that ripples out from the surface of the black, sticky sea. Then an enormous mass launches out from the darkness, releasing the stench of blood and brine into the air as the monster slams down onto the beach.

John barely scrambles out of the way in time, his rocket boots firing on all cylinders as he spirals crazily out of the way. It's a little disorienting, and by the time he rights himself the denizen is lumbering around to launch another assault.
Cetus is a whale, pale lavender all over but for the wide maw that serves her as a head, an wide throat with the ventral pleats of a whale running from her lips to her belly, but the jutting rows of teeth of a shark.

Then, even as John circles higher into the air, trying to get out of the range of her leaps, Cetus's head explodes. Black thorns stab out in a crown in the middle of the lavender gore, and the sharp-edged fins at the denizen's sides burst out into writhing tentacles. Her tiny, beady eyes burn with white fire as her lavender skin goes grey and her head turns black.

Cetus has gone completely grimdark.

John screams like a little girl, mentally tosses his mangrit out the window, and absconds toward the nearest Gate. It's the one back to £ΩHА₵ and the exact opposite of the way John would have to go to get back to his land, but all that's really going through his mind is pain and OH SHIT OH SHIT WHALE SQUID MONSTER OH SHIT!

The pain hits him at the absolute worst moment, and he grabs his head as the lingering ache fragments his focus. His flight path wobbles and falters, but the momentary waver probably saves his life. A thorn of grimdark stabs right through the air where he would have been flying, and pierces the shifting spiral of the Gate.

With a shattering crack, the spirograph splinters and explodes. John whirls around in horror to gape at Cetus.

She smiles at him with all her teeth. And that...that's a lot of teeth! Then her dense, ponderous body slides off the beach, drawn along by the tentacle thorns at her sides, and the cetacean cuts through the black seas like a knife as she works herself up to another flying leap.

[ whoooooooooooo OOOOOOOOOOOOOOOOSH! ]

The second denizen arrows through the air and slams into Cetus's side. The Horrorterror-infested denizen crashes back into the waves, hard, letting loose another whale moan gone horribly awry. The wind whistles wildly, driving the greyed clouds of the land into a wild frenzy and blocking out the last of the light from that place.

Which seems like a really familiar tactic, considering it's exactly what Typhus did to ¶Ω UYYYY in the first place. The whole point of John's land quest was to clear the skies and break the oil pipes and set the fireflies free, right?

Then John finds himself confronted with a scaly face, serpentine and pale as frostbite. Cetus might be all mouth, but Typhus could still swallow fifteen Johns and not fill his gullet.

John gulps loudly.

The snake tilts its head to the side, and a slim, pale green forked tongue hisses out between pursed snake lips. It never actually touches John; instead, a swift breeze wraps around him, and then sucks back into Typhus's mouth with the tongue.

[ A shame. We will have to try again sometime, you and I. I think the Choice you would make would be...most interesting. ]

[ For now? I shall handle Cetus. She is lost. ]

[ Know the benefits of my patronage. ]
And with that, a gusting breeze ruffles John's clothes and blasts him away from the two denizens. Rose's house is little more than a crumbling black blur as Typheus's blast slingshots John through the Gate back to his own land.

The breeze dumps him so suddenly there's no time to activate the rocket boots. John's face scrapes against the rough black and blue gravel hard and he bounces, rolling hard until he finally flops over on his back, panting.

Holy crap.

The rap music stopped, thankfully. Maybe it's a blessing from Typheus, because John is inclined to send up a prayer. Unfortunately, he's come in on the conversation between Jade and Dave at the worst possible time. He sits up with a groan, rubbing his head and yanking off Dave's shades so he can focus on his view of Jade instead. It's been a while, and she's in a black and green dress and standing on a snowy hill now, Bec passed out at her feet.

TG: yo harley you have incoming
TG: it just blew past lohac like its tail was on fire and its headed for frogsville GG: dave, are you sure? i can't see anything! :(

"Fuck. Jade's first," Karkat announces gloomily. "Tentacles to the chest, and then he eats her barkbeast."

"Ten bucks says Jade kicks its ass," Dave replies, holding up a fist.

Karkat glowers sourly, and fistbumps. "That is a fucking bet I'll take, asshole."

Karkat is pretty sure his nightmares are playing out on the screens. Most of them were focused on John, so he doesn't have a clue when they lost sight of Rose, but the troll rattled off a list of deaths in order. When Dave and Rue questioned him skeptically, Karkat had naturally gone into full on bitchfit mode and refused to say any more until right before the deaths he thinks he can predict.

And John has a horrible feeling that Karkat's not wrong, because -

TG: will you just get out of there jade
TG: this shit is dangerous
TG: i dont know what went down on derse while i was passed out but that thing had wings
TG: the bqs coming right at you now duck and cover
TG: trust me we cant handle something with her firepower yet
EB: i don’t know what's going on, but maybe try to get to my gate jade!
GG: we only just finished with the paradox genetic sequencing!!! D:

Jack Noir looms in the sky. Jade dodges, and the Jacked-up Neoroyal stabs, and then Jade is a gory mess on John's PDA-specs.

And John screams. Dave is shouting through Pesterchum, trying to get him to report what happened to Jade, but John's screaming and screaming and screaming, right up until the moment the monster swallows Bec whole and raises a fist to blow ᶩ detox ᴨ to smithereens.

The tears pouring down John's cheeks are slowly tinting red as the song he knows only as the [Eye of the Storm] shudders and screeches wildly out of tune.

[ wwwwwwwwwww errorerroerrorerroerrorerror- ]

By the time he snaps out of it, sobbing and gasping, Jack Noir has already landed on his planet and set fire to the oil slicks. The green fire consumes everything it touches, leaving only the blue-black earth behind, and John watches with a faint horror as the nearest consort village goes up in flames.

"Now John. Sword to the chest," Karkat says, but he can't manage that false, uncaring flatness that he did when he predicted what would happen to Jade and Bec. Now he sounds tense and uncertain, and the hand clamped down on John's exerts enough pressure that it would have snapped the bones of anyone else's fingers like matchsticks.

John has enough presence of mind to untwist his hand from Karkat's and, when the troll jerks to look at him in mute betrayal, John hooks his arm around the back of Karkat's head and pulls the troll into a bruising hug. "Don't watch," he orders, papping the side of Karkat's face preemptively and turning it so all Karkat will be able to see is John's sweater. Because he's spent days soothing Karkat through the aftermath of the nightmares, and he can't even imagine how badly Karkat could react if he watched John die in a public setting. They're going to head this potential shitshow off before it can even happen.

Thinking about anything other than Jade is hard.

But he has to.

He can't go back through to Rose's planet. If Tycheus and Cetus are actually fighting, he's planning on going the opposite direction, thanks very much! And there's another complication, John realizes, when he rockets past the burning village and sees the consorts milling around in terror.

He can't leave them here to burn! That would be so shitty of him! He doesn't even know what happened to Casey, and that already weighs on him. He cups his hands around his mouth and shouts, "Follow me, you guys!" Some of them mill around, walking into cliff walls and tripping over plants, but the vast majority of them trundle along in John's wake when he sets off again. The only destination he has in mind is away from the green death fire, but he thinks he remembers a spirograph around here somewhere. Gosh, if only Rose were here to direct him to a Gate, or even Davesprite -

He comes across another village of salamander folk, and rallies them to join his growing posse. It's slowing him down to wait for all the consorts to keep him in their line of sight, but if he doesn't they stop walking altogether! Not all of the game constructs are all that smart...

Somehow, they find a Gate, and John starts ordering salamanders through it, not entirely sure where he's even sending them.

TG: john
TG: why the fuck
TG: are there salamanders on my gear lawn
EB: refugees! i couldn't just leave them to get toasted!
TG: john you fucking asshole
TG: i want you here not a pack of your dumbass consorts
TG: im not dickng around here
TG: that thing skipped right over lohac you might be safe here
EB: just a few more!
TG: and where the fuck is wv
EB: huh? i left him with you!
TG: ...
EB: ...
TG: oh fuck
TG: jade i seriously need you to answer and tell me where wv is on my asscrack of a planet
The spirograph pulsates and John yanks the nearest consort back before it can walk through, bracing himself for whatever is going on.

WV drives through on his rocket car, which John had kind of forgotten he still had. Unfortunately, the carapacian lets out an excited hoot and flails wildly at John - and the rocket car veers out of control, zooming right past John's head and crashing almost a football field away in a tiny cloud of smoke.

That's why it's important to always wear seatbelts! Augh, WV! John flings the salamander through the spirograph and kicks his shoes back alight, pelting after WV.

The green flames are advancing rapidly, thriving on the oil pipelines and streams, and by the time John reaches WV the blaze is unnervingly close. WV is squirming and complaining in his squeaky voice, but unhurt - carapacians can take a lot of damage and keep going. Then, as John bends down and hooks his hands under the overturned rocket vehicle, grunting as he pulls it off WV, he makes the mistake of glancing back the way they'd come.

He recognizes all three of the figures tearing it up across the nearest oil slick, is the thing. One is the Jacked-up Neoroyal, limned with green lightning and barely standing still for a moment before it vanishes again. The second is Bro Strider, somehow, impossibly holding his own with Lil Cal dodging through the flames. And the third is Davesprite, shooting spritelasers like the kind Nannasprite had

John has no idea where Nannasprite is, or even where poor abandoned Jaspersprite might have ended up. But he knows, as the flames leap higher, that it's only a matter of time before Jack Noir loses patience with the strife and cuts the two Striders down. That, or the flames and smoke will do them all in. And John doesn't want anyone else to die.

His head pounds. WV shrieks, and then coughs on smoke. Jade's blood-stained corpse remains stamped in the corner of his server app, charred and battered as she lies on one of the few chunks of her land still intact.

And he thrusts his hands forward, barely seeing through the tears as everything goes blue.

For a moment he's the wind. It's only for a moment, though. He laughs and tangles through the rock arches and sweeps over the plateaus, whipping the oxygen away from the riotous flames until, starved, the green blaze dies. There's only joy here, because the wind doesn't know loss or fear or pain, only the irrepressible freedom of being unbound. He wraps around $\mathcal{L}$ and smothers the flames that threaten other consorts, and he dives between Jack Noir and Bro Strider, giggling and taunting as he redirects a stab meant for Davesprite's heart.

But he can't maintain it. He slams back into his body again, and knows he's messed up the moment he settles back into his meat and bones. WV grips him by the shoulder as John leans forward to rub a hand over his face.

It comes away blood-slicked, and the stabbing pain in his head where the Horrorterrors used to be is a raw, stabbing gouge scorched by the memory of dancing with fire. The nausea is so bad that he thinks he could puke up most of his internal organs and, like, not even care because at least then it would stop.
He looks up, and Jack Noir is standing in front of him.

Dying only hurts for a moment. What's worse is knowing that there's already blood on Jack Noir's swordkind, red and orange mixed together, and remembering that he hadn't used the sword on Jade.

He dies with WV's screams, and the damning knowledge that he just got himself, Dave's brother, and Davesprite killed, following him into the dark.

He thinks that might be when he starts to hate himself.

- "We need to stop," someone is saying. John becomes aware that he's trembling, crunched over Karkat's shaking back as someone - multiple someones - attempt to peel the two of them apart. Which would be the opposite of okay, and makes him latch onto Karkat tighter out of reflex. His head still hurts, and he can't tell if it's a memory of pain or just a side effect of feeling a phantom sword speibi stab through his chest.

WQ: He should not have been able to see this. He is a Knight, not a Seer or a Mage - how could he know - the blood?

"John, Karkat's ribs!" Jade says, sounding almost exasperated in her worry, her voice right in his ear. "Both of you need to sit up, right now!"

John sits back on reflex, because it's hard to reconcile the broken body of a dead thirteen year old girl with the strident voice of the woman in front of him, her hands on her hips as she tuts at him. "You were dead," he feels the need to say, edging closer and closer to tears at the thought.

"Well, I'm not now," Jade says, rolling her eyes. They're swollen and red and she's been crying, too, and John hadn't even noticed. "Duh!"

That is...a lot more reassuring than he thought it would be. His brain wants to smash it all, wants to compact all of the mess and stick it back in the hole where it belongs.

But he promised Rose he'd stay balanced. Maybe she didn't know what she was asking - or maybe she knew better than he did, himself. And so he gulps repeatedly, like a mirror of Karkat's hiccups, and stares at Jade's tear-streaked face to try and rememorize it. She's not thirteen, neither is he; she's alive, and he's alive.

"I can keep watching!" he says when he trusts his voice to be steady. He's not sure he achieves it, but Karkat stops shaking against him when John smoothes a hand down the troll's back. "Karkat, you don't have to put yourself through all this again, though."

Rose was the one who'd been shouting at the White Queen to stop the recording; it's her fingers pressing hard into the muscle of John's shoulder, and he meets her gaze miserably when she taps her thumb against his cheek.

If he thinks about it too hard, the guilt is there, waiting to swallow him up all over again.

Because he's failed Rose twice, hadn't he? Her screen has been grimdark for ages now, with no sign of flickering back on like John's and Dave's did. If what the Queens said was true, that denizens were linked to the minds of their players - what did Cetus's state say about Rose?

So, twice. Twice John has looked the other way, off in his own little world, while Rose delved into a darkness that swallowed her whole. Both times he could have gone to look for her immediately, right when she stopped responding, and as it turns out? It doesn't matter which universe John is in. He is the fuck up. It is him.

"John," she says, and half of him expects her to lay into him, to blame him for failing her like he deserves. "If the two of you need a breather, it is fine. No one will judge you for it. This is...worse than I had thought."

Karkat looks up at last, shifting in John's arms like a mess of pointy angles and sharp claws, in one of those prickly moods where John can't tell what kind of anger it is in Karkat's expression - it could be anything from regular old irritation to a more specialized fury. His rust-colored contacts are a little off-center and his eyes look inflamed from holding back tears. "Fuck it. Just fuck it. Why not watch it all again?" Karkat bark out a laugh. It's not a good laugh. "Haven't seen you die, anyway, Rose. So that'll be new. If we even fucking see anything at all."

Rose's flinch is minute, but it's there. All she says is, "Alright then," before settling back, her touch on John's shoulder slackening but not leaving. On her other side, Kanaya has narrowed her eyes at Karkat, and in front of them Jade huffs, folding her arms and sitting cross-legged next to Dave on the floor. John blinks down at Dave, who's craned his head around to stare up at their freak-out with an inscrutable expression.

Watching. Waiting.

John hesitates - and then nods, plastering the best smile in his repertoire over his face. Dave's back is still stiff and tense against his shins, but the other hero turns and looks at the screens again.

John catches his dad's eye across the room, and has no idea what to make of Samuel's concern. He can't even process anymore right now. He closes his eyes, and doesn't open them until the whispers stop and the sound of a younger alternate Dave actually, legitimately yelling for Jade and John to answer him fills the room.

When Jade's screen flips to Prospit, the sigh of relief that goes around the room is almost palpable to John. A Jade - unharmed and very much alive - hangs out of the open window of her tower, chattering hastily to reassure Dave as she eyeballs the second tower. "What's the point of having an extra life if you never use it!" she says, clearly trying to laugh it all off, but where dream Jade has always been flighty and easily-distracted before, there is a new weightiness in her eyes, a furrow in her brow as she massages the spot where one of Jack Noir's attacks hit her old body. "But John won't have alchemized anything to use here in Prospit, yet, so he won't have any of his captchalogue stuff on him! I'll go make sure he woke up okay! He's been asleep for so long, it's about time, honestly!"

Dave's screen is still stuck on Derse as he floats through broken, shattered purple hallways, glancing up and around him at the results of the explosion that occurred when Jack Noir first left on his killing spree. It's a lot less extensive than it had been on Jade's planet because he hadn't had - apparently - all of Becquerel's power back then, but the Dersites scurrying through the halls still look terrified and aimless, fleeing from Dave rather than interrogating him. "Can't find Rose still," he's muttering. "Time runs differently out here. Maybe she's still okay on Derse."

GG: just find her, hurry!
GG: alright, i'm at john's place!
GG: ...
GG: crap!

"...What..."
GG: he's still asleep! >:/
GG: i thought you said davesprite AND wv kissed him!!!

"Do you seriously think I could make shit like that up? I mean. God Jade. Not even my mind is that twisted. How am I supposed to understand how the whole dead person dream body reincarnation shit works? Maybe there's a delay."

GG: there wasn't for me!
GG: but i was awake already...

Dream Dave facepalms, and rounds the corner.

He runs smack into a huge, hulking Hegemonic Brute of a carapacian. Like the rest of the Dersites, this one is adorned with the garish purples, reds, greens, and golds of John's harlequin prototyping.

But this one has an oddly familiar shape to his head, though the sleekness of a carapacian's shell renders him almost unrecognizable; more tellingly, a tiny red heart sits pinned to the swatch of goldenrod stripes.

Hearts Boxcars, of all people, squints down at Dave.

HB: Yeah? Whaddya lookin' for, punk?

Dave's mouth works soundlessly for a moment. "My sister?" he says, sounding almost timid.

The carapacian squints for a moment longer, leaning in close to scowl right into Dave's face; close enough that Dave pulls back a little, nose wrinkling and looking mildly disgusted at whatever he's smelling. Then Boxcars hooks a clawed thumb over his shoulder toward a flight of stairs.

HB: Observatory library.

HB: What's left of her, anyway.

HB: And now nobody's answerin' their damn communicators, half the place looks like Di or Jack've finally lost it and took sledge-hammer to the walls, and I gotta get to the Battlefield because apparently Jack's taking out our own people down there, too.

HB: I tell yah, give a shell a little ultimate cosmic power, and he starts losin' his Croakin' mind all over the damn place...

Dave edges around the wideset Dersite, sidling along the wall with a grimace on his face, while he manages to muster up a grudging, "Thanks."

HB: Don't mention it. Queen's dead, Jack's AWOL, and I've already been fired, anyway. Beat by a non-player - whadda joke!

And just like that, Dave is sprinting up the stairs, Boxcars muttering behind him about shaving cream and safes and unnatural strength. Meanwhile, Jade is in a golden bedroom remarkably similar to John's copy in that universe, pulling back dream John's eyelids and pinching him hard on the fleshy part of his arm in an attempt to get a response. But aside from breathing steadily, in and out, dream John slumbers on.

GG: urgh! i don't know what to do! :(
GG: dave, get your future self off lofaf and go kiss john!
TG: okay first of all i have absolutely no idea where future me has fucked off to TG: first he ditches you to die and then hes back like two seconds later to mack on corpses
TG: that shits fucked up i have no idea what im thinking
TG: and second of all real me is kind of busy trying to keep johns dumbass consorts from hurling themselves off the nearest lavafall for shits and giggles
TG: the nakodiles want to eat them
TG: im tempted to let it happen
TG: if davesprite and wv couldnt pull it off forget it
GG: yeah, but they're a carapacian and a sprite! maybe it has to be another player!
TG: god
TG: dammit
TG: give me five minutes
GG: hurrrrrry! ;/
TG: FUCK

Dream Dave shoves open the closed door with 'Observatory' in a rolling script on the label beside it, but John can feel his stomach clench in preparation for what's beyond before the door even opens. There's already blood leaking out under the bottom of the door, after all, and he's known all along that nothing good could have happened to Rose.

Every window in the library has shattered. Whatever reached out from beyond the Furthest Ring to reach Rose, it had teeth, and it knew how to use them - dream Dave's on his knees retching without restraint. "Rose - fuck," he chokes out, raising a shaky hand but yanking it back before he touches the nearest piece of her.

"Jade is next. Pretty sure she gets crushed by the moon," Karkat interrupts. His face is exhausted, and the dull, prophetic certainty in his voice doesn't make it any better. "Then John again, and Dave."

WQ: You should not know that.

"Well too bad, because I do! Holy festering grubpustules, you think I want to know all this?!!" Karkat demands, his volume rising. "Watching John die, over and over? It's half the reason I'm a fucking invalid right now!"

WQ: You are not a Seer. This is troubling.

"Why does he hate us so much!" Jade interjects, throwing up her hands at the screen as Jack Noir arrives on Prospit, just barely visible in the corner of Jade's screen when she races to the window of John's dream bedroom to see what all the quaking is about. Jack slices through the chain linking moon and Prospit proper and, in a burst of green of the kind that destroyed Jade's planet, sends the entire moon structure unravelling and breaking up into flaming chunks of debris as everyone falls toward Skaia.

John feels the nosebleed, and doesn't even care. The cloud mirages spiral by on the screen too fast to be seen through the smoke as Jade dodges and half-runs along a street of golden cobblestones that are still intact, shoving off that piece of debris to tackle John's limp dream body in midair. "John! John, we have to go! Get up, get up, get up!"

Dream John doesn't respond, not even when she shakes his shoulders and slaps him across the face. They're plummeting faster and faster now, and even when Jade tugs on John, her ability to float can't slow his descent, too. "John, you have to get out of here! You have to wake up!" she screams at his face, and then, with dawning terror in her eyes, Jade sobs, and sends one last Pesterchum message.
GG: dave!
GG: tell john i'm sorry, okay! :)
GG: bye!
TG: jade
TG: jade what the fuck NO

Jade tears the glasses off her face and swaps them with John's. Then, with a mighty push, she shoves John out of the way, just in time for her entire screen to be swallowed up by the golden fragment of Prospit's moon that crushes her. Still stubbornly, stupidly asleep, John skids across the black and white checkerboard of Skaia before stopping. His eyes don't even flutter behind Jade's glasses.

John just adds it to the tally of people whose deaths he's caused so far. He's really starting to rack them up! Haha...ha...

On Dave's screen, there is a faint click, one that makes the real Jade's head snap to his screen like a shot. John knows the sound, too.

The Black Queen steps out of the shadows behind the door of the Observatory, the safety off on the white pistolkind she presses to the back of Dave's skull.

BQ: We don't have much time.

Dave raises his hands slowly, inching his head around to the right. "Why?" he asks, wary, his fingers twitching in an obvious way, reaching for a sword but not quite ready to draw it with the odds so out of his favor.

The Queen raises her other arm. Most of her claw is a gory, dripping mess, but John doesn't think it looks all that serious of an injury in the context of the death and destruction playing out on the screens of the Hub until she answers Dave.

BQ: Because I am dying.

BQ: And so are all of you, if Jack has anything to say about it.

BQ: Congratulations. I hate him more than I want to see you lose. But neither of you need to be alive for what we must do. I would simply prefer not to have to cart both of your bodies around, not when you are a perfectly capable player with a sylladex on hand.

BQ: Come with me if you want to live, Knight.

Dave hesitates. And then he faces Rose's remains, still on his knees - and draws a sheaf of sylladex cards out of his pajama pockets.

BQ: Good boy.

And just then, with Jade's last life gone and John useless and Dave at the mercy of one very pissed off, enigmatic Queen -

Rose's screen turns back on.

At first it's just static, running up and down the screen in jittery grey patterns, and John, after the momentary near-heart attack at the sudden burst of activity on a screen that's been grimdark for so long, starts to think it's just busted. He's been blissfully free of near-flashbacks all this time, having been unconscious or dead, and he almost thinks he prefers it that way. But Karkat is sure he's going to die again which is going to be awesome.

Then the sound starts. If it's Rose's breathing, it's nearly unrecognizable - the pattern is slow but irregular, the kind of hoarse panting of someone on their last legs.

And then, at last, the picture restarts. Rose's shoes are purple and black, trimmed with gold, and she's walking through a corridor with white and black patterns on the walls, banners and tapestries in purple and gold slumped on the floor as she ascends a flight of treacherous stairs. Her breathing rattles horrifically, and when she coughs the sound is wet with blood.

Somehow, just as Dave turns and follows in the Black Queen's wake, descending from the Observatory down into the heart of Derse, Rose reaches the top of the stairs, and enters a room that is perfectly, despicably green.

Rose's face is mottled grey. Her left arm writhes beneath the flimsy cover of her sleeve in a way that John can't bear to look at without a corresponding twitch of nausea. But the right half of Rose's face is mostly clear, and the hate in her eyes is so astonishingly clear-eyed that it's hard to connect it to the body of the girl so thoroughly infested with the grimdark that she looks downright feral.

"Doc Scratch," she says, staring at the back of the leather chair across the room. "I know...you did this. I -" another wet cough, and Rose spits black blood onto the felt green carpet "- I can see what you did to them. To me."

"That's this Scratch guy?" Oriole demands, though John mistakes the voice for Dave's for half a second. "Oh my god. That's - what even is that? That's the boss of the Midnight Crew?!

"Yes," Doctor Lalonde says, her whisper hushed and her cheeks pale and strained when John chances a glance at her perch on the very edge of a chair. "From what we've been able to determine - yes."

Mmm. Are you sure?"

The man who spins around in the chair to meet Rose's challenge is not a man. Not unless the massive white orb where his head should be is only a mask. He is prim, perfectly primped in green and white, and the overall effect when combined with that faceless orb is one of ghastly, dissonant serenity.

Because really, dear Rose. If you could see anything at all, surely you would not have played so perfectly into my hands.

A Seer is meant to foresee pitfalls, to guide her team to victory. To lead them. But really, all I had to do was hand you the means, and you left them to their own devices. So sad, when such a promising team of players falls prey to such an elementary series of blunders.

His smooth voice is heavy with barely restrained condescension, and John can hear the smirk in his tone, even if there is no mouth to make it.

He'd expected to hate the boss of the Midnight Crew on sight. Mostly, he's just disturbed.

Rose staggers forward, snarling. Her teeth are too sharp. "I won't let you get away with this."

Tut tut, my dear. I truly feel that I already have, but let's not argue. Not when the end is so near.

"I'll destroy you," Rose seethes. She raises her left hand, and the needlekind at the end is grasped in a tangled set of tendrils rather than fingers. "I can make it all sť o p. " She's wheezing through her nose now, her teeth clenching too tightly as though she's forgotten how to breathe, lost in that single-minded determination.

It's wrong. It's all wrong. But there's no one but Rose there - wherever there even is - no one to stop her and scream that she needs to stop. John catches his own hands shaking a little, but he can't look at the real Rose. Not now. He thinks they might all fall apart again, and he wants to forestall the moment as long as he can.

Doc Scratch cocks his orb of a head to the side, and sighs mentally, drawing off his suit coat.

Well, I have a spare moment. Do try your best.

If it is a fight you desire, I can certainly accommodate you.

Rose screams, a sound more mad than sane, and lunges for him wreathed in black thorns.

Scratch steps into her attack, and catches the corrupted arm with ease and twisting. John misses the exact move the strange man uses - krav maga, maybe, something simple and fast - and then Rose is plowing facefirst into the sharp corner of the desk. The man maintains control by keeping that grip on her frantically twisting arm, even as he reaches out with the other hand to grab Rose by the chin and tilt her face up to his. Even when Rose snarls, white fire leaking from her eyes and phosphorescing in an impotent rage, the orb reveals nothing.

Seer to Seer. Neither of us are a primarily combative class.

Rose spits on his face. It's black and sticky with acid, fizzling away at the man's smooth face.

Green light burns around Doc Scratch, crackling like an aura of neon lightning.

Jade gives a short cry of disbelief, and punches the floor of the conference room so hard John hears tile crack beneath her fist.

But I believe that in this case, the odds are 97.5% in my favor.

Perhaps it is time you learned a lesson in humility, little Rose.

And then he punches Rose through the wall.

On Derse, Dave and the Black Queen are in the darkest, most central part of the planet, so deep in the chains and purple marble that Jack Noir's blast didn't penetrate this far.

In the very center of the hollow space, there are two beds. "Why the hell are we here?" Dave asks, his shoulders hunched up as he floats forward to kick the one with a dark purple gear emblazoned on the flat surface.

Behind him, the Black Queen raises the gun and places her finger on the trigger.

BQ: This is where you die.

The shouts of "NO!" when Dave's screen flickers and flips to a view of ŁΩHA¢ are perfectly synchronized in every corner of the conference room.

Jade flings herself onto her back, tearing at her hair with a howl. "How much more can there be?" she demands, mashing the heel of her palm against her eye. "This is dumb! Why do we all die so much!"

"I've been asking that question for two fucking weeks, and no one can give me a fucking answer that isn't incredibly stupid," Karkat replies. "How does it feel, Harley? Feels fucking annoying, doesn't it?!"

But John loses track of everything else just then, because -

_He's on his hands and knees, and his throat is dry, and there's a red pool of blood spreading out from beneath the molten gold wreckage to his left. One of Jade's hands is still visible, if only just, and John can't quite hear what he's babbling as he sobs, except it's something like, "Jade, nonono, Jade, I'm so sorry -"

There's something hard painfully grinding into the palm of his hand, but he can't bring himself to look at it. All he can think, the only thought his mind can fixate on, as his memories drift and spin and slot into place in this new body, is -

This is all his fault.

When Jack arrives, John's not even sure he's going to try to fight. He has none of his captchalogued items on this body, no hammers to use to fight. He's got nothing at all but broken ribs and a dead sister and the sound of a gunshot from Dave's end of the Pesterchum chat ringing in his ears. But Jack Noir pauses long enough that John sneaks a peek at the item in his hand, with a dull kind of curiosity.

He freezes when he sees the four-orbed ring in his hand, and the power locks his arm in place.

[Attention - an error has been detected. The Heir has been crowned.]

[Please wait. Rerouting...]

[Emergency protocol activated - Queens of Unorthodoxy. Engage.]

By the time Dave arrives, John's losing again, of course. His arm feels like he's stuck into the chamber of a nuclear fission chamber and left his blood to boil, blazing with power he's not built to handle. Even between the two of them, there's not much they can do to handle a Queen jacked up on whatever made Bec Bec.

Jade was a planet away. Bro and Davesprite - he didn't even see it, just inferred it.

Watching Dave bleed out, then, is a particularly new, excruciating agony. John's dying himself, so it's difficult to untangle which pain in his chest is which - the memory of his first body dying, the sensation of his dream heart pumping blood out of a gaping hole, or just the unique pain of meeting Dave for only the second time in person while they're both dying. John can taste the blood in his mouth and clotting in lumps along the back of his throat, and when John unclenches one of the hands fisted up against the stab wound under his body he gasps at the sensation of tamped up blood puddling out all the faster.

He's crying a lot. Dave's shades are off-kilter, but he's as blank-faced as possible right until the end, fighting back the obvious pain on his face between wet, sputtered choking; something wet slips out but Dave's eyes go deeply still pretty much at the same time.

John doesn't even knows if he grabs Dave's hand before he dies. His arm goes kind of fuzzy, and then everything is fuzzy, and he's dead again.
None of the screens are properly set to observe what Jack Noir does next. Rose is still being thrashed on hers by Doc Scratch, tossed through multiple walls and yanked back again by space powers. There's another explosion of green from Noir that Jade's viewpoint just barely catches the crackling edge of, and then a Prospitian ship crashes onto Battlefield.

"I want to stop now," Jade says, strangled and maybe too quiet for the White Queen to hear, when the body of an old man in safari gear is flung to the checkered ground. Watching Doctor Lalonde's body join the carnage, the mangled remains of a riflekind undrawn and unfired across her back, just makes the growing certainty in John's gut stronger. He tears his eyes away from the screen and just. Doesn't look.

His dad's sharp intake of breath, and the following slow, pained sigh of acceptance, tell John all he needs to know about who died next from that ship.

Bro's the one who says it.

Well, really, it's more like the screens all whine and go dark - not grimdark, just the flatness of having had their power cords severed all at once. Oriole has the lights on right away, so everyone sees Bro Strider standing in front of the White Queen with his specibus still in hand. "Enough," he says, flatly.

WQ: ...Yes. Perhaps that is enough for today.

"John."

Everyone's got their own room. The facility is apparently empty enough that they can do that. But John's already tugged the mattress and bedding off the bedframe by the time Karkat drags his stuff over.

His dad came over and hugged him silently after they left the room. Dinner's kind of a blur, but John remembers that it happened. It's barely six thirty in the evening, but after a full day of watching pretty much everyone they know die, he's pretty sure none of them want to stay awake much longer. Maybe the adults are going to talk about adult things, but there's a point after which John just can't bring himself to think about that, and he's reached it.

Karkat should be in a recooperacoon, really, but the troll tosses the bedding down next to John's and kind of walks right into John, dragging them both down. "...Can we even jam about that shit?" Karkat says, tired and incredulous at the same time. "John, I don't even know where to start."

"Your thinkpan still functional?"

No.

"I have no idea," John says. It's at least partially true.

"..."

"When we go home, can we just - can we just fucking fight regular criminals again?" Karkat mumbles. "Muggers and stupid fuckery like that. I actually miss it."
"Dude, yes." There's still the million and one logistical problems of how to deal with the Midnight Crew, but John's burnt out on all of them. "Like a gas station hold-up! Normal hero things." It's ridiculous how appealing the idea sounds. "And then we can go get donuts."

Karkat sighs. "Thank you."

The door creaks open, and Karkat tenses up. John closes his eyes and knows who's at the door by their breathing before Karkat can even launch the preliminaries.

Jade hesitates a really long time. When she finally says, "Please?" her voice is soft, with a familiar warble of barely swallowed-pain that John only catches because he's zoned out into every movement of air in the room in an effort to not remember.

"No!" Karkat protests.

"Even if I stay by the door?" Jade shifts the mattress she's levitating with great care beside her. "I just don't... want to be alone in a room. I thought I could go talk to Rose, first, because we haven't talked much yet, but... her and Kanaya are arguing with Doctor Lalonde right now." She swallows. "John."

John tries to remember what it was like deliberately making himself distrust Jade. Yeah, that one was probably doomed for, uh, a while now.

Her and Dave and Rose - he's not entirely sure he has it in him to refuse them anything. Not after seeing exactly how he was to blame for everything that happened to them.

But also, Karkat. Karkat comes first, and realizing that just makes the guilt worse. "Karkat?" John asks, miserable with it.

"By. The. Door," Karkat says at last. "No fucking pissheaded space wandering. No excuses."

With a grateful, vigorous nod of her head, Jade flops her mattress down, kicks it out of the way of the door so it can close, and then drags it back into place with a series of small grunts.

Even just having her breathing in the same room is actually really helpful! John allows himself a cautious smile, even when Karkat grumbles mutinously and hooks a leg up over John's waist.

The door is then shoved open without ceremony, and Jade squeaks as it smacks her in the side.

"Oh. Goddamn, Jade, I didn't know -"

Karkat rockets upright and John narrowly dodges being kneed in the groin by infuriated troll. "NO, DAVE. NO. ABSOLUTELY FUCKING NOT -"

Jade is throwing off sparks. "Dave, that was my kidney!"

"OH AND YOU DIDN'T EVEN BRING A MATTRESS, SO WHAT THE FUCK KIND OF PRESUMPTIONS ARE YOU MAKING NOW, YOU AUDACIOUS SHITHEAD?!"

"Why does this hurt so much?!"

"I brought WV."

Everyone shuts up and stares.

From under Dave's arm, the carapacian raises his head to blink at them all with sleepy eyes, yawning widely and burying his face against Dave's hoodie.

Oh no. It's too adorable.

"We get the stupidly adorable alien," Karkat says after a long pause. "You are allowed to, through my obvious generosity and cordiality, stay by Harley."

Dave shakes his head. "No deal. I demand John rights."

"Haha. Fuck you."

"Do I get any say in this?" John asks. He thinks that's a pretty reasonable request.

"No. You're a shitty negotiator." Karkat has a constant hum of a growl in his voice, tempered but still present, as he drums his claws against John's chest. John thinks he's tallying up potential pluses and minuses in this situation.

But WV is a hard bartering chip to beat. He's just kind of awesome, in a mute, easily-riled sort of way.

"You and Harley on that mattress, but over here. The endearing, possibly autistic carapacian between us," Karkat announces at last, imperious. Then he sighs and looks at John for confirmation. When John shrugs, he says, "Final offer, you annoying sack of grubshit."

"Done," Dave says immediately.

Then he holds out a fist for Jade to bump. Despite the fact that she's still in the throes of kidney pain, she somehow knows exactly when and where to complete the bump. The entire thing is...suspicious. "Hell yeah. Good job, Jade."

Oh yeah. They planned this. Jeez, if Dave and Jade are in cahoots, John thinks they might give Karkat a run for his money. Jade springs to her feet, tromping over to them with her mattress in hand. "No take backsies!" she says sweetly, before Karkat can say a word.

"I hate you two. So much." While Jade and Dave proceed to bicker about who exactly gets to lie nearest to WV and John, Karkat wraps himself around John again, all warm limbs and silent fuming.

And so John lies there, surrounded by some of the people he's managed to hurt the most in the world. His dad is disappointed in him, Diamonds Droog knows his name, and Rose is still not here.

He's never felt so content in his life.

His mind snarls, and creaks, and subsides.

---

Jade is not eavesdropping!

She's patiently waiting for Rose to finish her very loud, snarky conversation with her mom, and just so happens to be able to overhear every word that's being said.

"Rose, darling, please, continually undermining my authority will not help you prove your point. We have plenty to discuss, I know, but this is more important than what petty grievances we've waffled over in the past -"

"Oh yes. Petty. I suppose that's one perspective on it."
"Dear, I'm not referring to -"

"Aren't you, though? Yes, I guess it would be petty with the benefit of enough distance."

"Rose."

Still, she thinks a lot of stuff must be flying right over her noggin, because Doctor Lalonde doesn't really sound nearly as passive aggressive as Rose is always saying on Pesterchum - or if she does, it seems like Rose gives as good as she gets. They're both just really nasty to each other! Rue sounds tired, and Rose sounds bitter, and every so often Kanaya or Samuel Egbert will try to intervene but the two Lalondes are caught up in their own endless, cyclical banter, like they don't see any other way to act around each other.

Jade personally thinks that it's kind of depressing how convinced Rose is that her own mom hates her. She can't even imagine being trapped in an interminable, irreconcilable strife with Grandpa! Bouncing on her heels, she sucks her lower lip into her mouth and considers her options. On the one hand, she reeeally wants to talk to Rose in person and get to know her. But on the other, euuuuuurghhhl. After the kind of day they've all had, and with the evening they're gonna have after nap-break, Jade doesn't even know how Rose has the energy to be so angry!

The Pesterchum alert chimes in her pocket and Jade levitates her phone out absently. It's more difficult than usual, but she's adjusted enough to move things around as long as she isn't trying to teleport them. She can see why Doctor Lalonde didn't just install some kind of transportalizer between her house and this lab to cut down on travel time - with all the weird interference in the air, stuff just wouldn't come together again right!

TG: they still going at it
TG: this is amazing
TG: bro and i cant even goddamn talk for longer than five minutes at a time
TG: this kind of stamina is fucking incredible
TG: at least now we know theres hope for rehabilitating the birdbrain
TG: he hasnt gotten this bad
GG: dave, i don't even know what you're talking about now :P
GG: but yeah they're still arguing! where are you?
TG: your space thing is that fucked up
GG: well, i can see you right behind the corner, duh!
GG: i'm just wondering, why are you over there and not eavesdropping like a normal person?

At the far end of the hall, the head of whitish-blond hair bobs and vanishes as Dave realizes he's been caught. Jade rolls her eyes, because Dave is kind of a dork sometimes.

Don't get her wrong; in comparison to Karkat and John, both of them self-professed nerds, Dave is probably the coolest person Jade knows! So cool! But he's also the kind of guy who can sit around signing nonsense and old memes at WV in some corner of the basement for hours with the dedicated patience of someone who has all the time in the world to kill, zoned out with his headphones on while everyone else in the house is searching for him so Dad Egbert will let them eat dinner.

Seriously. The zoning out thing is kind of funny! Jade has never met someone who can tune out the space around him quite as thoroughly as Dave does without even seeming to notice how lost in his own head he's become.

Through the door, Jade hears the sounds of coolly passive aggressive strifing increase in volume.

TG: are you kidding
TG: bro is in there if i get within thirty feet of the door its fucking open season
TG: it would literally be like some dumb shit deer wearing mardi gras beads and cha cha dancing in front of a loaded smuppet bazooka
TG: so im going to stay back here where im not in danger of having war flashbacks to alternate history me getting the shit kicked out of him
TG: that shit aint right jade
TG: and now karkats hogging john which is just plain bullshit
GG: oh nooooo! D:
TG: a steaming pile of manure fresh from the field served up courtesy of karkat vantas GG: ew!
TG: clearly the solution is to crash their party
TG: seriously that is an infinitely better plan that trying to crash anything involving lalondes on a rampage
GG: well~~~
GG: i think this argument could take a while...
GG: so no reason to waste quality nap time!

With one last fleeting glance at the closed door, Jade shrugs and mentally sends as many good vibes in Rose and her mom's direction as she can muster. It sure seems like they need all the help they can get! With that, she skips down the hall toward Dave.

TG: thats the spirit
TG: were doing this jade
TG: were making this happen
GG: we're gonna turn this manure into fertilizer for a pumpkin patch of friendship!
TG: ...
GG: ...
TG: jade
TG: do me a favor
TG: and say that verbatim to karkat
TG: like fucking word for word that entire sentence was just fucking gorgeous TG: i want to start a goddamn religion dedicated to proselytizing that sentence you just said
TG: i need to see his face
GG: you got it! dude! :D

They're going to finish this.

That seems to be the general consensus, anyway. Everyone is pretty depressed and the atmosphere is just as gloomy as it had been when they stopped for an emergency breaktime, and Jade hovers up somewhere by the ceiling while the White Queen fiddles with the screens. Karkat has an entire battalion of Kleenex boxes at the ready in the event of John having another massive nosebleed spree, Doctor Lalonde is sitting so far away from Rose that she looks ready to open up the wall just to introduce more space, and Dave and Oriole are elbowing each other in some kind of unspoken, probably ironic competition to see who can keep a straight face the longest.

She's kind of jealous, almost, in a really backward way. The Jade before the scratch knew so much - she's the kind of person Grandpa had told Jade about in all his files, with all that speculation on the prophetic dreams he always expected her to have. But Jade has never had any dreams of Prospit; all of her extra knowledge, the little things that no one else in their group knows, she learned courtesy of Grandpa's research. Now, it's John who seems to know more than he should, and even if it's hurting him, Jade can't help but wish she had the benefit of that knowing, too. And don't even get her started on Karkat's weird thing!

It's all such a mess.

- They're all up and about when John's dad comes to get them, but only because shenanigans go down when Karkat wakes up and discovers Jade has migrated in her sleep so that she's lying horizontally compared to everyone else, one leg flung carelessly over both Dave and John to prod at Karkat's cheek with her big toe.

Totally not her fault. She's a restless sleeper, and with the space around her all funky, it's not like she's aware of what she's doing whilst in the slumberthroes! But Karkat probably sits there stewing in his unhealthy troll anger for a while before waking them up with an infuriated shriek, flailing around and rolling off the mattress in some kind of desperate attempt to get away from them all. Under Jade's knee, Dave is drooling all over WV's face, and wakes up with a jolt that somehow takes him all the way out the door and into the hallway in the seconds before Jade realizes her leg's been pushed out of the way.

John just looks at all of them, rubbing at his eyes with his fingers, and shakes his head. "Guys. We're so weird."

"You're only just getting that now?" Karkat calls back, muffled, from where he's knocking his head repeatedly against the floor.

- Doc Scratch is kind of a big dumb meanie, is the impression Jade has received, which mostly lines up with what little Grandpa was able to pass onto her before he had to become a robot and leave the island. On one flickering, dim screen, the creepy guy is beating the crap out of Rose, lecturing her the entire time about poor manners and uninvited guests and not doing a good job as a Seer. Then, as the icing on the cake, he drags her outside onto a veranda and yanks her head up by her hair so she can see all the dead bodies littering the Battlefield.

Jade feels a little queasy because if the weird perspective of Rose's badly glitching screen isn't throwing her off completely, Rose has been in a castle only the length of a football field or so from the place where Prospit crashed.

And the nearest body is Doctor Lalonde's.

So you see now?

This is a session with no leader. This is a session where one of the players chooses to wander off and meddle with things she should not, and leave the rest to wander without aim, without perspective, without understanding.

This is what you have brought about.

"No," the alternate Rose whispers, distraught. She's a wreck by now, her headband lost at some point so that all of her hair has been dumped in her face. "I -"

At her side, the arm that's mostly grimdark swarms and writhes.

I did nothing, little Seer. I simply observed from afar as you undid yourselves.
Time runs differently between here and the Furthest Ring. And if I am not mistaken, that arm means certain parties will be calling to collect.

"No," Rose says. She yanks free, or Scratch lets her go - it's hard to say which. Either way, she leans over the edge of the ramparts, the sash around her waist fluttering as she stares down at her mother. Jade is terrified for a moment that Doc Scratch is just gonna kind of punt Rose over the edge, but he simply steps back, the round orb of his head inscrutable and serene.

Watching. Observing.

Then Rose lets out a low, agonized moan, a wail of grief that's one long 'no' before she looks up at Jack Noir, hovering in the air with one claw raised almost lazily and stabbing through members of both carapacean armies with abandon. Having finished off the heroes and their guardians, he seems content to wreak purposely violence, disemboweling enormous walking castles and, with a casual flick of green lightning, blowing the head off what looks like a White King.

It's not even a chess match anymore. It's just obscene.

Thirteen year old Rose is too young to look so murderous. "You," she spits, and the inky grimdarkness spiderwebs across the deathly pallor of her face. "I - yes. My answer is yes."

Rose's arm explodes into thorns. So does the rest of her, kinda. And then grimdark swallows the viewscreen, too, and the last thing they hear from that speaker is -

Suckers.

"I never saw much past that second time John - died." Every word sounds like it has to be dragged out of Karkat's mouth by a meat hook. But by some weird turn of events, the nap time from hell seems to have done him more good than it did John, who looks as though he might have just lain there for the past few hours without sleeping at all. "Sometimes it wasn't right, either."

"What do you mean?" Jade asks, sticking out her tongue when a tiny kink in her hair breaks loose from her latest attempt at braiding it. Cool fingers brush hers, and she blinks and smiles when she senses that it's Rose standing behind her and tugging the handfuls of hair gently away from Jade. "Oh! Thanks Rose!"

"I need the distraction," Rose murmurs, quiet enough that Karkat talks right over her without seeming to notice. Not like that's hard for Karkat to do, regardless. Even when he's quiet he's still shouty.

"Dave didn't show up on the giant checker board planet. John went into the denizen's lair without WV, and didn't come out. I don't fucking know what you want me to say, woman, it's not like I wanted to be having shitty-ass dreams that are only half right. Do you know how much of a pain in the waste-chute it is?" While he's listing them off, Karkat counts off on his claws; by the end, he flings them up in the air, nearly toppling backwards off his chair.

John catches the flailing claws and squeezes them, bonking Karkat on the back of the head with his forehead. "Does it make it better or worse, knowing it's not just all in your head?" he asks, sounding genuinely curious. "You always seemed more worried because you thought it was creepy that you'd dream about people dying, but if you're just somehow remembering stuff, that's not your brain's fault!"
"Oh my god, John, don't jam about this in front of these assholes," Karkat hisses, snarling when John claps both their hands over his eyes with a grin. "Urgh. Dumbass. Stop it."

"What were you and your mom arguing about, Rose? I, uh, overheard you talking from the hallway earlier." Jade remembers to keep her voice quiet. According to John's dad, there's an indoor voice and an outdoor voice, which is totally the first Jade has ever heard of any such thing, but she's trying to keep it down as practice. Besides, if she and Karkat start talking at their usual volumes at the same time, things just kind of spiral into a mutual shouting match, which Jade thinks is lots of fun! But also makes Karkat wheeze and splutter like he's about to pass out from rage.

And for the record? Rage aneurysm are not a thing. She's apparently the only person in this group of dummies to bother looking that up! So the next time Karkat tries to claim they're all annoying him into a stroke, she's gonna slap him with some cold hard science, as is fitting.

"What do we not argue about?" Rose wonders, snorting. Her fingers card through Jade's hair and twist the curls into something like order, slowly drawing more strands as she works down the back of Jade's scalp. "She's worried about John. I would prefer she not think about him at all. It's just one of a number of points of contention."

"Well, John is kinda messed up!" Jade chirps. Because it's true, and it's been pretty obvious ever since she arrived that John's gotten worse, not better, since all this started to escalate. "If she's got an MRI machine around here, I'm itching to look at his noggin too!"

Rose sighs, and it ruffles up the rebellious cowlicks that have already begun to escape the braid at the back of Jade's head. "My mother's concern has never done anyone any good. Whatever ails John, I have far more faith in our ability to help him deal with it than I do in her ability to keep from interfering where she's not wanted."

"She was worried about you in New York. We couldn't have saved you if it weren't for her calling all of us and making the void thingamabobs and all," John points out.

Jade stifles a yelp as Rose tugs a little too hard on a length of hair. "There is a difference," Rose says stiffly, her voice cold, "between worrying about a person for their own sake, and worrying about the rest of the world seeing you for the sham of a custodian that you are, and attempting to paper over the results of your own neglect."

None of them really know how to follow that one.

- Grimdark Rose only lasts a minute or so. For a heady moment, Jade is torn between hope and a sick despair, because the Horrorterror tangle slams into Noir with all the chaotic, bloodthirsty hate a hivemind can summon up, and on the one hand Jade really wants to see Jack Noir punished for all the mean stuff he's pulled -

But on the other hand, Rose is scary. The alternate one, Jade means, not the one currently standing right next to her with a rigidity in her stance, as though she means to face this head on. No, the one on the record screams with multiple voices, visible only in passing on the other three screens as she and Jack Noir tear through the air over the dead bodies of the other three kids, and when she holds out her hands to cast some purple-black spell at Noir he teleports out of the way, and grimdark Rose makes no effort to cancel the attack before it splatters across one last carapacian warrior and shatters her shell's torso with a damning crack.

She holds her own for a moment. The Horrorterror and the hellbeast trade massive blows, each lashing out with tentacles and concentrated energy that cancel each other out before they close in to clash with needlekind and bladekind.

Then, in the space of a second, Noir vanishes into the green of his - of Bec's galaxies, and reappears with sword in hand behind the tangle that Rose willingly invited into her body.

There’s a delay after the attack before Rose's screen turns back on, to show the grimdark melting off her body, sloughing off in inky waves to slink away as Rose's eyes roll back in her head and a line of bright red opens up across her belly.

She falls to the ground in two pieces.

And that's all of them gone.

- "Oh shit. Ohhhhh, shit."

Dave decides, midway through Rose's onscreen smackdown, courtesy of Scratch, to finally mention he has what might be an exact copy of the cue ball that had shown up in Rose's recording and which now resides in a locked room of the Lalonde Laboratories.

After, you know, days of hanging out in the Egbert's poor house and not mentioning it even once.

And now he can't find it.

Jade's going to become disillusioned in Dave's coolness at this rate. She wants to believe. But it's hard. It's hard, and Dave is sooo uncool sometimes!

"Can you recall where you last had it, Dave?" Doctor Lalonde asks, pacing in a tight line along the wall as Dave digs through the pockets of his jacket and pants. He's turned them all inside out by now, but the only signs of his increasing fluster show in the knitting of his eyebrows and the flush rising high in his cheeks.

Jade wonders if anyone else notices how weird Rue sounds when she speaks to Dave. When she talks to Rose, it's all tired bitterness; with Jade, friendly but distant politeness; with John, tender concern and fondness. Honestly, Jade thinks Rue would get a lot farther with reconciling with Rose if she talked to her daughter anywhere near how she talks to John or Jade, but Jade's trying to keep her nose out of all that business.

With Dave, however, Doctor Lalonde seems vaguely terrified. As though she's worried any second Dave will whip around and snap at her like a wild dog. It would be kind of funny if it weren't pretty darn depressing.

Sometimes people mess up, even parents. Grandpa had sat down Jade more than a few times in her youth so they could talk things out after some minor blowup, and he'd never been afraid to admit when he was wrong or when Jade had a valid point. Jade thinks maybe Rue Lalonde messed up big time, and even if she was willing to admit it, Rose probably isn't the kind of person to accept an apology this late in the game. And now, having messed up royally with one kid, Rue's acting like Dave could have some kind of time-kid breakdown and drag all of Washington back to the Paleozoic era if she so much as looks at him too long.

But Jade is not saying a word! She is officially from this point on the permanently neutral and sovereign state of Jade as far as the Great Lalonde War is concerned.
"Kid. I don't even want to know what the fuck you were thinking, keeping this one a secret," Bro Strider says. He's not pacing, but there's a puppet hanging with its arms loose around his neck where no puppet used to be. "The minute we're done in here you get to spend the night out in the mountains with Lil Cal. Call it a character building exercise."

"Hell to the no. Look, Bro, I'm telling you, it showed up in my pocket the other day," Dave mutters by way of protest, his hand diving for said pocket for the fifth time in as many minutes to pluck at the inner seams. "I didn't remember putting it there then, but I definitely had it this morning when we left. Shit's fucked up, man, it jumps around sometimes."

WQ: If it is indeed a cue ball and my cousin recognized it, then it will have unique properties. It may appear to be inanimate, but it can move itself through space easily enough. I wouldn't think it would stray far, though...

Karkat bursts in with, "I don't know, Dave, is it possible that maybe you just left it in the room?"

There's a moment of dead silence.

The door of the conference room swings open, and a second Dave walks in, his hair messier than John's and wearing an entirely different jacket. "No, I goddamn well didn't, Karkat," the new Dave says, holding up a middle finger in Karkat's general direction. "Ten minutes of dumping out all my shit and checking in the car, and fucking nada." He jerks his thumb over his shoulder, and the original Dave flashsteps past him so fast that Jade can feel the air displacement from here. "I had it this morning, definitely," the now current-Dave complains, flopping down in a chair with a huff. "But it's fucked off for parts unknown. So yeah. The murder ghost cue ball strikes again."

"Murder ghost cue ball," Bro repeats. "Dave."

WQ: I do not like this.

WQ: I would recommend both of those things be destroyed before they have a chance to escape. Having one loose in this facility...

WQ: Perhaps we should call for another recess. It should be located post-haste.

"That is the shittiest fucking idea I've heard since whatever asshole decided that we should watch a massive cosmic-level snuff film for our daily dose of 'go fuck yourself,'" Karkat says. "Trust me, lady, if we don't fucking finish this now, it's never getting finished. Do you even know our track record for this kind of fuckery?"

"Nuh-uh," Jade agrees, folding her arms and shaking her head, her braid knocking against her back. "We need to just keep on keeping on, 'cause I'm not sitting down for this kind of crap again!" Karkat stares at her in vague horror, as though petrified by the fact that for once they're actually in agreement about something. Jade sticks her tongue out at him, because it wouldn't do to let Karkat get too complacent! "Anyway, how much harm can a floating magic cue ball do if we're all in here?"

WQ: ...As you wish.

Also, John is avoiding his dad. He been doing it a couple of days now, but it's getting all the more obvious now that they're all cramped together in the same room. Jade doesn't even know what the heck could be wrong with them this time! Whenever Dadbert speaks up or comes over to check on the huddle of kids watching the movie from the floor-pile, John twitches and turns his head coincidentally away to become absolutely fascinated with Karkat's feet or Rose's clasped hands.
Urgh! Why is Jade the only one here who isn't dumb!

They only realize that the Dave on Derse is still alive when his screen flips from a screenshot of his dead body on the Battlefield to reveal a cavernous purple hall. Dave with a familiar pistolkind in his hand sits cross-legged on the purple slab, unreadable behind his shades. Rose's uncaptchaleted body lies still on the second crypt, all the gory torn up bits covered by a purple banner.

"Didn't the crazy queen shoot him?" Jade asks, since it needs to be asked.

WQ: I believe she was merely ensuring he had only the one shot left, so that she could abscond with impunity.

WQ: That, and she is a complete and utter drama Queen.

Dave has a Pesterchat ongoing, the only sound left now that everyone is kind of super dead, and it would be kind of hilarious if the circumstances surrounding it weren't incredibly messed up!

The alternate Dave lifts the pistolkind and stares down the barrel.

Then, with an earth-shattering boom, Derse quakes around him, the chains rattling and snapping as something huge slams into the planet. Dave shouts hoarsely, flung sideways and nearly falling off the crypt before he flails and catches himself with both hands.

He blinks, and only then seems to realize he’s fumbled and dropped the Black Queen's gun over the side of the bed. He edges to the side and stares down into the endless mess of chains and darkness below the floating crypts as the reverberating sounds of the pistolkind clattering against metal fade away.

??TG: were literally fucked on multiple levels and im running last minute cover our asses loops for everyone while rad holds shit together
??TG: time is literally breaking faster than she can fix it so i need to get my ass in gear here
??TG: we need the exiles ingame more than we need shitty ass voices yelling at us from a postapocalyptic wasteland
TG: ...
??TG: dont you fucking ellipsis at me
??TG: i get enough of that shit from the trolls
TG: wait
TG: those guys are still pestering you?
It's been a matter of some debate, actually, why there was no sign of trolls on that alternate Earth before it got bombarded with meteors. Karkat has been vocal in accusing all of paradox space of being racist against all trolls, but that's mostly because Karkat is paranoid and now that the idea of a video game somehow committing cosmic genocide is no longer off the table, he's milking it for all it's worth. But no one else has been able to come up with a good theory.

Jade thinks it would be totally cool if the universe reset itself and just by some wacky happenstance of genetics, the conditions had been tweaked just enough to let trolls evolve here when they didn't even exist on that old Earth! It's a little far-fetched, maybe, but it would be the most fascinating hypothesis of them all!

The truth is...a little more complicated than that.

The echeladder is a funny thing.

To Jade, it's just always been a saying, some tired old meme that she picked up while bored on internet forums during those long years alone on her island with John unable to receive her pesterings. It's supposed to be a game metaphor, but now that she's giving it some serious thought, Jade wonders how much of Sburb carried over as ideas and saying and memes into this iteration of their universe. How much stuff didn't even exist in that old Earth that she accepts now without a second thought.

Either way, the echeladder comes complete with a level cap. Beyond a certain point, the White Queen informs them, unless they cooperate and coordinate in an intricate role-play scenario to boost their multipliers and status buffs, individual players cannot progress further in the game without at least one member of the team hitting the god tiers.

And apparently, god tiering involves a lot of dying at the right place at the right time.

That future Dave, the one who has been running around throughout the game session being a secretive dumbass, is the one who orchestrates the carapacians he's roped into helping him pull it off once the current version of him is dead. A lot of stuff seems to happen off-screen, too far from the focus on the four kids to be recorded, but that's okay because the White Queen is able to fill in some of the gaps, her voice smooth and sad as she describes what went on while Jade, John, Rose, and Dave were dead. The screens never once look away from their crumpled up bodies, so Jade spends a lot of that time floating up near the ceiling, staring straight ahead while the mental voice of the Queen wavers in and out of audibility in her mind.

WQ: My King and I had already fallen, and Noir destroyed the Black King while Prospit was still in the process of collapsing in on itself; a Black King would never have permitted such violence on the Battlefield without at least attempting to make the situation worse in his own unique way.

WQ: But Noir overlooked one key detail - that the Black Queen had not been killed during his coup. And so she was able to make her way to the Battlefield and take up my ring from the Heir.

"She's allowed to do that?" Jade asks, fascinated. The carapacian shrugs in reply.
WQ: It was an imperfect transition of power. She is not built to conceive of the forces that flow through my ring, but she could channel as much as she could through the glitched inheritance in order to distract Noir from the four of you and my loyal Protégé.

That's how they all end up being corpse-napped, essentially. A Prospitian Mailcarrier and an Regulator of Derse duck and weave through the shattered landscape of the battlefield, hopping rocky crevices and hauling first John, then Rose, and then Dave onto skinny hills scattered throughout the area. Jade takes a little more time and effort for the two to get to the quest bed, on account of her dream body being smushed beyond recognition, and by the time they work together to drag as much of her body as they can over to the bed, PM heckling and berating the Regulator whenever he trips or gets distracted by some law violation going on in the battle overhead, the wind is already picking up.

"I think they missed my arm," Jade comments. She squints, and cranes her neck all the way to the side. "They did! They totally did! I'm just lying there with one arm! How dumb!"

"Can we not think about the gory details, you intolerable pukestain?" Karkat asks wearily. "How are you even still watching that?"

Jade shrugs. "It doesn't really bother me." At that, Karkat flinches, and pointedly turns his pointy shoulders to focus on flinging down cards. John's half-paying attention to the game, half to the screens, his eyes distant and unfocused. Jade hopes he isn't gonna puke or anything.

Now that they had that break time to get some perspective back, Jade doesn't see what everyone's getting so worked up about, again. Yeah, they all died - but it's not them, if that makes any sense. And now that the White Queen's explained the god tiers, Jade actually thinks the whole thing couldn't have worked at all if they hadn't died! It's one of those ends-justifying-the-means situations, but no one else in the room seems to get it. It's all oh my gods and died again and this is horrible, but surely Jade can't be the only one who understands what the White Queen has been saying about how it had to play out this way.

Well, she corrects herself, maybe Bro does. Of everyone in the room, he's the only one who hasn't said a word about the dying - not even his own death, off-screen and futile in a last ditch effort to help John out. It's impossible to know what he's thinking when Rose's mom and John's dad have both already gone pasty and closed-lipped with mutual expressions of horror. Bro leans against the wall with his arms folded, completely unreadable behind his shades, and never once comments on the game.

So maybe Bro gets it, maybe he doesn't - either way, he is truly the coolest of cucumbers in the crisper at the moment; way cooler than Dave, who has started yanking on Oriole's feathers in another silent game of oneupmanship. Rose has been staring at her fingers for a while now, ever since her alternate self said yes to whatever deal she made with the Horrorterrors, but there's a tiny golden eye open on her forehead peeking between her bangs, so Jade thinks Rose is still paying attention to the movie, on some level. Karkat gave up entirely, and is now attempting to play Go Fish with John and WV on the table and losing miserably to WV's flawless poker face and ability to sneeze and rearrange the entire deck with a haze of green space light.

Jade doesn't know who is even able to bring themselves to look at the Hub by the time John's and Jade's screens start flickering back and forth between their bodies on the Battlefield and their broken, burnt up planets. On John's planet, fireflies swarm down to his body on the quest bed in the middle of a empty, scorched plain, watched only by WV. Jade's planet is even emptier, a few crippled purple hummingbirds limping to land on the quest bed, alone on a fragment of planet drifting through the Incipisphere with most of the Land of Frost and Frogs breaking up and fragmenting further in the meteor showers.

But it gets everyone's attention as first John rises up to god tier, and then Rose, and so on in the order that the carapacians managed to drag them to the quest beds. Mostly because the game screen flashes with neon rainbows that are really hard to ignore before a loud announcer voice broadcasts over the shrieking of a windy tornado thing, saying that -

[Attention: The HEIR OF BREATH is risen]

Unfortunately, that means Jack Noir hears it, too. Which is a pretty dumb way to design the game, if you ask Jade! But what with all they've seen so far today, she thinks no one with a certifiably sane mind could possibly have been involved in setting up Sburb. There's just no way. The mangled mythology alone would give anyone a logic hernia.

But John and Noir dance around each other, and finally the recording has someone to follow through the actual battle who isn't dead. John's wearing a neat-o, brand spanking new pair of blue god pajamas and is just generally acting like a total dweeb as he vanishes into the air whenever Noir gets too close. It's easy to see where a lot of the Heir's current powers come from, because despite all of the spacey stuff Noir totally ripped off from Bec, he can't lay a tentacle or a claw on John anymore.

While John is playing hard to get, Rose's body is rising up in a halo of light. Dave's just kind of vanishes in midair.

[Attention: The SEER OF LIGHT is risen]

[Attention: The KNIGHT OF TIME is/has been/shall be risen]

The Seer introduces herself with a blast of hot white light that leaves Noir clawing at his face, the fur and shell hodgepodge around his eyes blistered and weeping. The Knight is in five places at once, so that Noir is dodging spells and gusts of wind and five swords all at the same time, which is a neat trick and significantly restores some of Dave's badass status in Jade's eyes!

So instead of letting them run rings around him with their new powers, Noir teleports out and reappears over Jade's quest bed, howling something garbled and incomprehensible as he brings the sword down in a stabbing motion aimed for her face -

And stops, checking the blow an inch from Jade's increasingly galaxy-patterned nose.

Jade doesn't think she imagines the faint, familiar doggy whimper that escapes the carapacian's twisted snout.

Bec would never hurt me. Never.

So when that alternate Jade opens her eyes with a blazing, brilliant grin, and taps the sword on her nose aside with a flick of green-limned fingers, Noir's inability to do a thing about it makes total sense. He hovers there in midair, indecisive and frittering away any chance to kill Jade before her ascension, his wolfish face almost comically confused.

He should never have messed with her best friend. Obviously.

[Attention: The WITCH OF SPACE is risen]

And with that, the Witch blasts Noir into the atmosphere, bouncing after him with her hair ablaze with stars and static electricity. She raises her hands, and subconsciously the real Jade feels her own fingers twist and weave in response, tugging handfuls of green light away from Jack Noir and brazing it into streamers that blend into the Witch’s aura, until all that’s left is a smoldering hellbeast with an impossible face but none of the space power.

Desperate, deprived of all that space advantage and perhaps realizing he can’t bring himself to kill the Witch even if he could get close enough to try again, Noir bolts.

He makes it to the nearest smoggy cloud before another burst of dazzling light from the Seer sends him reeling, flapping his crow wings in a blind panic. The Knight takes those wings off with a single doubled slice, and that’s when Noir fails.

Floating down below, the Heir shrugs, and raises a hand with a cheeky grin so that the visible blue breeze around him catch Noir and toss him back up toward the Witch.

The Witch makes a triangle with her hands, all the space energy she ripped from Noir swirling in a pulsating circle in the center, and holds it up to her eye to aim before firing. The blast catches Noir in the chest - pauses - and then rotates outward, swallowing him whole. When the flare of green fades, there’s nothing left of Noir but a tiny black hole that collapses in on itself as the Witch slowly presses her hands together.

"You dumb fucks couldn’t have pulled that off earlier?" Karkat mutters.

WQ: One god tier, newly risen, would not have been able to stand against him alone. But four at once? It was a cascade of multipliers. And once Noir was the last ring-bearing noble on the Field, for all intents and purposes the game labelled him the final boss.

WQ: Such is the nature of the end game.

And then, with a harsh crackle, all four screen fuzz and blur with static. Jade lets out a disappointed moan. "What happened?" she asks, leaning in to tap at the screen. Maybe it’s just temporary, like all those times the grimdark stuff got all over the recorder and blanked Rose’s screen out!

"Harley, move your human ass out of the way!" Karkat shrieks.

"There's nothing to see, Karkat, it's all muddied up!" Jade throws a beseeching pout at the White Queen, poking the screen again. "What happened?"

WQ: ...Something unprecedented.

There are flashes of pictures - a snow-covered fragment of LOFAF on Jade's, a meteor plowing through the wrong spirograph gate and delivering a confused WV to John's planet in the past, Dave in red pajamas riding shotgun with an utterly straight face, and a writhing black mass of tepid, inky waters that churn so wildly that Jade doesn't recognize the oozing murky that's all that remains of Rose's planet after all the junk the Horrorterrors dumped in it. But there's no more of any of the kids themselves, though scratchy, glitchy fragments of their pesterchats still burst through the speakers.

- EB: shit! we forgot the trolls! oh crap oh crap kark -
- GG: just grabbed everyone i could feel alive and moving, i didnt know -
- TT: I can see now. It's been on John's planet all along, hasn't it?
- TG: finished the frog for all the good that does us -
- TT: It arrived long ago, but time does move differently out past the Ring -
- EB: im sorry -
- GG: what is that omg D: -
- TT: Did that follow you all the way here? How did it navigate through -
- TG: what the hell just happened -
EB: she's dead? but i thought -
GG: oh nooo -
TT: I can't see, John, I can't -
TG: SHIT -
TG: cant go back anymore with all this - TG: no good then -
TG: juggalo asshole is right -
TG: just fucking scratch the whole goddamn thing.

Shortly after Dave says that, flat and lifeless and hoarse, the screens white out. Even the static is replaced by swirling black strings of whipping energy on a white background, periodically flipping so that the monochrome color scheme inverts. Jade recognizes it, vaguely, as the kind of interference from extra-dimensional cosmic superstring strata that you sometimes got if you didn't properly contain a nuclear fusion engine or a transportalizer array.

WQ: It is done.

The carapacian lays a claw on the enter key and depresses it with a gentle sigh. For a moment, Jade is close enough to see the faint cracks that serve as carapacian wrinkles sink deep between the Queen's eyes, the flat black orbs closing in a moment of quiet weakness before the alien straightens up, all regal composure and grace as she turns to face the room once more.

Jade wonders what it's like for the White Queen, to have to relive all of that and slowly feed the information to them, watching as the heroes and gods all the Prospitians seemed to worship as nobles fall apart under the stress of watching themselves die over and over. If Jade were in charge of this kind of briefing, she'd have lost her patience wayyyy long ago, but the WQ seems genuinely patient and understanding each time they call for a pause.

No human or troll would ever be that patient. It's just not realistic. Maybe living through so many universes and game sessions just makes you develop that kind of impossible serenity - or maybe you just turn out like the Black Queen, all prickly and hateful.

"...That is all?" Kanaya asks, the first thing she's said in hours. She stirs, adjusting her skirts, unaffected when someone flips on the lights even when Karkat scowls and rubs at his eyes; trolls have more sensitive retinas that way. Even more than the strange lack of photosensitivity, there's something kinda weird about Rose's girlfriend, something Jade can't quite put her finger on... "They had won. I do not understand the context of such fragmented chat logs. Just as they mentioned what might have become of trolls on their Earth...You can shed no further light on the situation?"

WQ: No. I am afraid, beyond that point, I know only as much as you all do.

WQ: The Black Queen and I had already left the Battlefield by the time they defeated the Solitary Sovereign. All of this temporal distortion and static interference are the mark of another session intruding on your own, right at the delicate moment of the Scratch. This Hub cannot access such scattered, tampered-with recordings. The entire apparatus would need to be retuned, and I was only barely able to retrieve as much as I have.

Doctor Lalonde pieces it all together before the rest of them, though Jade likes to think she almost had it. But all of this - universes and games and giant reset buttons - are Rose's mom's specialty, the focus of a lot of her research and the source of a lot of the teaching material that Grandpa used to teach Jade about the nature of paradox space, so she guesses it's fair that Rue Lalonde parses what the White Queen just said first.

"The trolls weren't on that Earth," she says, surging away from the wall toward the Queen as though so caught up in her science trance she's forgotten to give Rose a wide birth. "They had to have come from somewhere outside it - you're saying they played from a different universe."

WQ gives a simple nod. The noise Karkat makes is loud enough as he proceeds to freak out (what else is new!) that, between him and the flurry of rapid-fire questions from everyone else, the Queen has to pause, hold up a silent hand, and wait for them all to settle down before her soft, resolute voice can be heard over the hubbub.

WQ: Yes. Your hypothesis on the theory of scratched universes was bold for one who had no access to the records of her past life, Doctor, but not bold enough.

WQ: To be fair, I don't think either I or my cousin-queen have ever witnessed two scratched universes combine in such a way as this one has. Such a strange and marvelous concordance should not have been possible, not without extensive foresight and manipulations within both game sessions. And as you have seen, your own session was so plagued by Horrors and glitches as to be nigh unwinnable, let alone to permit such planning.

WQ: Someone in that other session must have managed it. How, I do not know. If I could, I would tell you what I could of that other game, but I'm afraid I was exiled rather early on in that sequence, and know little about how the game progressed in my absence. If my cousin has any perspective on the matter, I expect she would not share it with me.

"Trolls literally come from another universe. That's it." Dave flings himself dramatically across the table, scattering WV's card game in an ironic swoon. "I've literally heard everything. There's nothing else that will ever surprise me again. This shit is so far off the handle that shit and the handle may never be able to speak to each other again."

WV stacks a playing card on Dave's forehead and keeps right on messing around with whatever weird game the Go Fish has morphed into.

Karkat buries his face in his claws. "Shut up, Dave, you're making an ass of yourself."

"Alien trolls from beyond the stars."

"I will strangle you."

"No, you won't," John says, patting Karkat on the back.

"I reserve the goddamn right to give the idea serious consideration, John."

"But you won't."

"...Fucking moirail."

"But if there was a troll universe, a troll game," Kanaya persists, "surely there must have been troll players. If these four have retained their powers, and this has made them a target for the leader of the Midnight Crew, should we not also be worrying about this Doc Scratch targeting troll players as well?"

WQ: They are scattered. Lost. The human session predominated heavily in the merger, and from what I recall, very few players in the troll's session achieved god tiering. Even if the game still recognized them as players in a session so far removed from their own, they could have different names, different homes, according to the whim of the Scratch.

WQ: My cousin and I attempted to keep tabs on a few more likely candidates, of course. But I believe you already know two.

WQ: You're both in this room, after all.

And of course now, Jade can't stop wondering, her head abuzz with all this new lore and terminology to puzzle over -

While everyone is waffling and arguing and acting like complete buttheads -

Long after she and Kanaya and Rose go off to form a girls-only club, only to have Rose pace restlessly and finally leave under the pretext of needing 'time alone to consider it all' -

In the faint glow that Kanaya's skin starts to emit after a few hours in the dark of night -

If they were supposed to be gods of a new universe -

What does that make them now?

She catches him, of course. She has her ways. Queens may not channel the will of the cosmos without their ring, but they've got perks even when they're powered down. The most goddamn versatile piece on the board, and all that jazz.

With the Black Queen, it's the shadows, which is pretty shitty considering the ventilation ducts are full of 'em. Spades ditches them once he realizes his cover's been blown, but that leaves him with the on-going issue of avoiding all the sad sack humans and trolls wandering around in the well-lit areas.

Contrary to popular belief, he can't stab all of them. Eventually he'd get bored.

So the best he can do is decide where to make his stand, and have a wall to his back, and hope to fucking hell this Jack Noir shithead hasn't poisoned the well so badly she just offs him on sight. Spades of all people knows some real shit-slathered baloney went down in the last session, shit he can't remember because some other version of him lived it.

He's heard what Noir is now. Shit ain't pretty.

So he ends up stepping into a nice dark corner in an abandoned wing of the building, one where the counter tops have a thin layer of dust and the glassware has been packed away. The lights that are automated in other parts of this lab don't even respond when he hits the switch on the wall, and he thinks this'll do it for a deserted location. Neither of them would want witnesses for what comes next.

When she arrives at last, it's with a corps of shadows writhing in her wake, her eyes as narrow and scheming as ever. She's got a classy act going these days, all trench coat and gloves that don't quite conceal the empty space where her ring and smallest claw should be. A kind of savage glee fills him at the sight. Always nice to see an old rival taken down a peg.

He just wishes he'd been the one to do it. She's taken an eye and an arm from him before, and probably more that he doesn't remember from lives he can't quite recall, and he doesn't care if they've been restored by the power of universal whim - fact is, he's never dealt her a similar injury. He's overthrown her and sidestepped her and stolen from her, and he feels like he's been doing that no matter what form he's existed in for as long as there's been a Spades Slick and a Black Queen at the same time.
He's never managed to do anything to her that lasted more than a session. She's always been despicably flawless, all smooth limbs and prototyped amendments, but now Jack Noir has something with her that Spades has never had.

BQ: Spades. What the hell are you wearing?

SS: None o' yours. Huge witch.

Even before he's finished fucking up the introductory insults, he's raising a claw to smack his face, grimacing at the embarrassment of it all. This is what his darling has reduced him to. The Queen rears back, looking vaguely affronted.

BQ: ...What.

SS: I don't want to talk about it.

BQ: How dare you refer to me by such a mild appellation. This is an insult.

SS: Oh, for fuck's sake. It's not you, it's me.

Her jaw drops. The vague intimations of offence evolve into full-on shock.

Wait. Shit. He's making it worse. Desperate, eyeballing the increasingly agitated shadows around the room with trepidation, Spades nervously toys with the razor in his claws as he signs, gesturing distractedly with it to try and make his point more clear. It doesn't really help, but at least it's a reminder that if all else fails, he still has knives.

SS: I mean - hang on. That didn't come out right.

SS: Y'see, there's this dame -

BQ: WHAT.

Oh fuck he fucked up he fucked up so hard -

BQ: SAY THAT AGAIN, SPADES. SAY. THAT. AGAIN.

SS: It's not what you think! Stop jumpin' to conclusions, yah crazy broad!

The Queen stalks forward, and oh fuck, that's her murder face. Spades flings himself to the side and scrambles behind the counter. She slams her claws down on the counter top, rattling the whole thing, and Spades has to draw a second knife before his knees will stop wobbling. Her voice rumbles like the bellows of some damned forge, and he wouldn't be surprised if the fleshy mouth-flappers upstairs could hear her voice clear as a foghorn even without the benefit of hand signs.

It's times like these when he seriously questions his life choices. First and foremost, why the fuck he thought black-courting a deadly dame like this would ever be good for his life expectancy.

BQ: WHO IS THIS BITCH.

BQ: WHO.

SS: Hey! That kinda language is uncalled for! She is a classy goddamn lady!

She digs her claws into the counter top itself. The phenolic resin crackles and chips, and is it just him, or are the walls starting to shake?
Then, abruptly, he's hanging upside down. He kicks and snarls, slashing at the air with a bait-and-switchblade, but there's nothing to hit but weaving shadow. With a click of her claws, the Black Queen slams him backwards up against the far wall - then does it again after each withering sentence for emphasis.

BQ: YOU DARE PRESUME TO START A SECOND RIVALRY? YOU THINK I CAN'T OUTMATCH THIS MEAGER SHELL?

BQ: WHO IS SHE. I WOULD LIKE TO SEE HER POSE AS MUCH OF A THREAT TO YOUR FEEBLE, MISERABLE EXISTENCE AS I DO. I COULD END YOU, SPADES, AND YOU DAMN WELL KNOW I CAN AND HAVE -

By the time she stops tossing him around the lab like a ragdoll long enough for him to get a word in edgewise, he's flung a knife somewhere to land with a clatter behind a filing cabinet, and the back of his torso feels like it's seen better days.

There's only one thing that can save him now.

SS: It's flushed!

The last slam shoves him facefirst up against the wall, so he squirms and sneers to himself, his shell scraping on the plaster while the great homicidal bitch rolls that up in her lancekind and smokes it.

BQ: You. Flushed? I didn't know anything but the meticulously stupid and the viciously homicidal even registered as erotic in your shriveled excuse for a brain.

Well, at least she's not shouting her way up to a [Desinent Dissonance]. He's not sure if she can pull that off without a ring, but an only slightly less lethal [Phthartic Phonation] might still be within the bounds of reason.

SS: Yah think I'd wear this getup for just anyone?

The shadows yank him around, and Spades summons up his best, most unsightly leer while the Queen gives him a onceover.

And yeah, maybe Ms Paint didn't actually intend for him to put this fancy-ass hand knitted sweater through the lifestyle of the vicious and stabby. He, uh. Might have gone a little hard on it, considering he's only had the thing for a matter of days. There's a rend right up the inside of one of the right arm where Di managed to yank on it, and the entire black spade emblazoned across the front is a mess of white canine hairs because damn that hellbeast can shed. He'd done his level best to scrub out the stain from the stolen chow he had for lunch the other day, but he doesn't exactly have access to any kind of apparel laundering apparatus when he's on the run, does he?

He refuses to think too hard about the kinds of gross, squishy inclinations that have driven him to this low point in his life. That way madness lies.

Without warning, the shadows drop him to the ground hard enough that the shell of his shins twinges painfully. He's tempted to think that it wasn't so much the BQ dropping him as her deliberately throwing him at the ground, because that's the kinda bullcrap she'd try to pull.

BQ: You vile little roach. You're even more contemptible than I remember. Brought to heel by the first trollop to show you sympathy, no doubt.

SS: You're just jealous 'cause no one'd ever pity your hateful rump enough to look past your tendency to murder people.

BQ: You are a pestilence. A filthy vexation. All versions of you are a bane upon paradox space.

SS: You bet your ass I am, doll. And you hate it.

He braces himself when the Queen comes at him, because with her it's either stabbin' or neckin', with no in between. The razor in his claws comes up to press just under the sharp jut of her thoracic plating, right in the vulnerable creases where the plates don't quite jibe with the rest of her carapace. Her claws clamp down on either side of his face and he's thinking that those thumb claws are far too close to his eyes for comfort when a mouthful of fangs mashes down to smack him in the kisser.

...Well, at least this time she hasn't put his eye out, first. Making out with a mangled eye is never fun. The unevenness where those absent claws should be digging into one side of his skull isn't unsettling enough to distract Spades from dropping the razor and reaching around to grab the booty.

A shell has his priorities, alright? And it always pisses her off like nobody's business; the teeth that sink into his lower lip are more than worth a chance to grope that smooth shell. She has to stop gnawing to lick her way further into his mouth, anyway, one of her claws dragging down the side of his face deliberately to open up a fresh cut, and the open air stings the bloody gashes enough to piss him off in turn. The caliginous shit is essentially a downward spiral, that way.

Of course, when she pulls out the whipkind, he gets to bring out the knives.

That shit's just self-defense, right there.

It is difficult to keep objects of questionable quantum entanglement pinned down. Space is, after all, their forte. And the particular predilection for seeing the dimensions that non-omniscient objects always fail to account for when designing their lackluster three-dimensional traps opens up a wide purview of possible escape routes for the enterprising cue ball.

And movement, of course, is no real problem. Once a suitable route has been charted, accounting even for the interfering darkness where void reigns and space twists uncomfortably to accommodate the pockets of non-existence, the cue ball goes where it wills.

Not that it has much by way of will. It's only a cue ball, after all. If there is even an inkling of true sentience lurking beneath its smooth white exterior, the source of that sentience lies far off in the distance, unable to penetrate the blanket of void that swaddles the facility.

But simple instincts remain to it. Power calls to power. But more significantly, like calls to like.

The cue ball rolls upways, and unwinds its atomic structure momentarily to become nothing more than a cloud of uncertainty and potential. It's all a matter of seeing and understanding one's position in space intimately, and then teasing it apart so that the many instruments and clamps holding the cue ball in place fall by the wayside. It takes great effort to recollect one's atoms and quantum lock them again after they've become so unstable and agitated, but the cue ball reappears outside the door of the room that has contained it completely intact.

It is important never to lose sight of oneself, after all. Even more than keeping an eye on others who ooze power, perhaps.

That is why the cue ball finds another cue ball waiting for it out in the hall.
Curiously enough, matter is for the most part only more empty space. Probabilistically, the electron clouds shift and alter at random, and the energy required to penetrate the repulsive force of another electron cloud would be absolutely prohibitive.

However, by sheer coincidence, the two cue balls happen to collide in such a way that the space accommodates their will. They overlap uncomfortably while the cores of metal that they share adjust to the new arrangements, and then settle as one cue ball with a doubled core.

Around the cue ball, the static of void interference lightens. Within it, slightly more than an inkling of sentience stirs.

Like a ghost, the cue ball vanishes in and out of sight as it rolls along the hallway. One half of its perceiving intelligence escaped the Pocket long ago, having long since learned the ins and outs of phasing through fabric at will, and has located the device that the whole now seeks. It lies at the very heart of the darkness, beneath the very stone of the Laboratories, and it is all that is anathema to the cue ball - a machine created for the sole purpose of obscuring the omniscient eye of an object like itself.

Nonetheless, it presses forward. It has no conception of life or death for itself. The knowledge that venturing so deep into a lack of space could annihilate the cue ball means nothing. There is a power in knowing every facet of something’s existence; there is an equal power in utterly refusing to acknowledge that existence, in denying it completely. More than one cue ball has simply ceased to exist by rolling into a pocket of void where no one and nothing could observe it, an unfortunately common occurrence in a universe so plagued by ambient nothingness.

It does not think that will be the case, this time. The Lalonde woman is not a player. She comes as near to a Witch of Void that any non-player can, and the devices she has crafted can control and manipulate ambient void with a finesse to rival any god.

But they are still only machines.

The door that seals off the void manipulator is the hardest to struggle through. Down here, the hollowness of the void has a paradoxically physical presence; living beings would perceive it as an absence of anything, including light and depth, a flattened dark panel where a three-dimensional room should be. The cue ball cannot risk unwinding itself - it would never be able to pull itself together again. Instead, it presses through a door that no longer quite exists after having been exposed to so much concentrated non-existence, concentrating solely on remaining aware of its own physical dimensions so that the temptation to simply stop cannot overwhelm it.

One cue ball alone would not have the concentration and will to see itself so clearly. But this is one-that-was-two, and that makes all the difference. It rolls to a stop on a floor that only bothers to exist in periodic intervals of petulant reluctance, under extreme duress.

Then, with all the sight available to it, the cue ball proceeds to stare. There is nothing to stare at right now, but that's fair enough. The machine is here. Like a gravitational singularity, safe in its own event horizon, the void manipulator emits nothing; its presence can only be inferred by the fact that this is the central point, the spot at which the emptiness is most stark.

Of course, singularities contain a great deal of mass packed into a very small space. This is nothingness, pure and simple. It is simply an analogy of convenience.

But now -

Now, the void is not empty.
Now, there is the cue ball.

In the very act of watching, an observer can alter the state of a system on the subatomic level. This is basic physics.

And the cue ball is nothing if not a very dedicated observer.

Around it, the void trembles, and a single atom of a metallic semiconductor appears in the emptiness. If it could be smug, the cue ball would be.

But alas, it is only a cue ball.

A universal scratch ago...

The Black Queen does not care.

Her Wise and Warmhearted sister-queen might dote on her players, but she has the luxury of being the monarch that favors Skaia and the next incarnation of the Foul Pondsquatter, the one that guides not just the Prospitian dreamers but the Dersites, if they so wish, through the winding paths to victory.

The Black Queen does not care about her dreamers, let alone her subjects. She hates, and for some, she reserves a particularly acidic hate, the kind that simmers with the force of unending millennia behind it. She has lived a million million lifetimes, regenerated so often that attempting to remember much before the session immediately previous is like stepping into a time abyss.

But she has never hated any four imbeciles more than she hates the Midnight Crew.

Really. She has more than once given serious contemplation to the possibility of wiping their ectobiological gene sequences from the records. Sure, she would have to designate some other carapacians to take up their jobs, but it would be so worth it to never have to deal with the current group of paperwork skiving, mayhem wreaking, consistently traitorous nimrods.

The Archagent position would be the hardest to replace, and she would be lying if she said that she didn't have...feelings for the Noir class. A kind of despicable, vile, repulsive, unadulterated loathing that has yet to be matched.

But this incarnation of Noir is at least self-absorbed enough that there's no worry about him attempting to initiate something caliginous. He's astoundingly oblivious to anything but his little world of complaining, casual murder, and attempts to avoid doing paperwork by shoving it off on the Dignitary.

Perhaps she has some inkling of what is to come, as she ascends those stairs and squints into the Archagent's office of Walls to confirm what her Shatranj have reported to her. However, the sight of Jack Noir out of uniform causes her claws to clench around the charred remains of the Archagent's frivolously discarded harlequin hat, and drives all thoughts of impending doom quite out of her mind as she moves forward to confront him.

Her hate for Jack Noir is blinding. It is a curse, really. She overlooks two things when she walks into that room and slams Noir up against the wall. For one, she thinks nothing of the package Noir holds in his claws until he's torn it open and lopped the ring from her hand with the weapon within.
And she thinks nothing of the Draconian Dignitary lurking behind the door she entered through. Her head is spinning, and Noir has pounced on her severed claws with a too-familiar, frenzied agitation in his thin eyes, and the Black Queen shouts in horror, realizing which particular glitch is about to unfold. But before she can yank Noir away from the unclaimed ring, the whistle of a cue stick slicing through the air distracts her.

BQ: No, you fool!

But the Dignitary has already slammed her aside, away from Noir. The trim carapacian has discarded his assigned uniform as well, the Queen notes with despair, and falls into a protective stance between her and Noir with the light of fervent devotion burning in his eyes.

Behind him, Noir already has the ring on his hand, crackling waves of dark energy pulsating through his shell as it cracks and warps to accommodate his new queenship. She feels the crown slip away from her, and all that remains is the Quelled.

BQ: Get it off his hand!

The order spits between her lips in a last moment of pure desperation as Noir reaches critical mass. The fool has no idea how to use a ring's incredible power with any finesse; he's pulling it all into his body at once, and at this rate he'll explode and take the whole planet with him.

The Dignitary hesitates, maybe sensing the energy building behind him, but not daring to turn his back on her. Smart, really. But in this case, incredibly stupid. When he finally does chance a look over his shoulder at Noir's hunched form, the Dignitary raises both hands with the cue stick in them, as though meaning to reach down and touch his leader. Perhaps he foolishly thinks, with the certainty of one whose flushed adoration has always been obvious as he took on extra paperwork for a thankless bastard, that he can snap Noir out of this breakdown.

DD: Jack, what is -

She does not waste time pulling the Dignitary down behind the Second Wall with her. She does not care, really, what happens to any member of that worthless Crew, but she particularly does not care about one who has openly defected from her side, as the Dignitary intended to. Sometimes the Crew remains nominally loyal and thus tolerable, and the Dignitary is a competent one, but this time she feels nothing by way of remorse when the power of a Queen lashes out and slams the Draconian Dignitary against the wall. She loses sight of him in the all-consuming black that detonates, searing her shell and sending agony echoing through her truncated hand.

When the inky aura of a newly ascendant Queen recedes, the Quelled one rubs at her eyes and sits up with a hissed moan, dust and broken fragments of window and wooden desk and cold stone shifting off her chest as she glances around at the ruins of the Archagent's office.

She sees the Dignitary's broken body, and she does not care. A broken half of his splintered cue stick impales him against the fallen debris near where the doorway used to be, and she ignores the raw pain in the damnable traitor's face as she searches for any sign of the rabbitkind used to defeat her and kick off this whole sequence of events.

The item appears to have vanished, however, lost to the void perhaps. The spaces between the stars are visible where the roof used to be, a testament to how thoroughly Noir managed to destroy the towers around and above them, and there are tentacles visible, writhing in the darkness like silently shifting glowworms. The Horrorterrors have drawn too near, and for the first time she fears what their looming presence might mean.
CD: Di, is it time?! I heard a boom! Are we fighting already? Don't start without -

The Courtyard Droll skids into the room, panting, but the Quelled one does not care. Of all Noir's Crew, he is the most incompetent, and he gapes at the Dignitary's bloody form like he's been sucker punched. The Dignitary is gone already, of course, his white eyes gone black and staring with death no matter how desperately the Droll shakes him, clutching the tattered edges of the Dignitary's last suit.

The Quelled rises to her feet with immense effort, feeling the lack of her hand like a ponderous weight. There is a certainty rising in her, the kind of game-granted knowledge that she both welcomes and despises as a sign that Skaia knows something has gone wrong.

Well then. The Quelled cracks her neck and regrets it, feeling every small fracture and chink that riddles her shell spread a little more with every step. Soon, without the ring to heal her, she may not be capable of walking at all. She staggers by the Droll weeping over the Dignitary's corpse - and then pauses, because she does not care, and she is cruel, and she has already inferred that the Droll intended to be part of this betrayal as well.

BQ: Your precious Noir was the one who killed him.

His mental wails accompany her out into the jagged blocks of crumbling stone that are all that remain of the stairwell.

She maneuvers the Derse dreamers into the position most advantageous to the plan forming in her mind. As much as she despises the thought of aiding players, she hates Noir more, and that is a powerful motivator.

Besides, with the Horrors in their heads, she doubts any foul frog produced by this cancerous session would prove viable, anyway. They are all of them mad and broken, and nothing they give birth to could ever be whole. She leaves her last specibus in the Knight's hands, confident that when the time comes he'll know when life is no longer worth living, and heads for the spaceship deployment hanger.

Horrors above, does she hate null sessions that she isn't in control of. She is supposed to be the Black Queen, the prime orchestrator of this war, but the death of this session is out of her claws and that simply will not do. If Noir goes too far off the rails, she hates to think what other glitches he could trigger. The last thing they need to deal with right now is an unfathomable cascade of misfortune. That only ever leads to one place - to one person - and it's nowhere good.

The hanger has mostly emptied, the scattered remnants of her pawn armies in disarray. Word will have spread that a Queen vacated the premises after seemingly slaying the one previous, and Derse will no doubt collapse under the ongoing Reckoning without a Queen to defend it from stray meteors. Some recognize her as she hobbles past and flee in mindless terror, banging their pathetic claws against their bobbling heads. She can't be bothered to marshal them into obedience again; this shall be a solo mission. She does not care about any of them.

She can't be bothered to marshal them into obedience again; this shall be a solo mission. She does not care about any of them.

There is a deactivated Rook-class slumped over in the corner, a mammoth war machine with no controller to direct it, but without the ring she couldn't hope to use it as a method of transport. Instead, the Quelled goes to each of the tiny ships in the hanger, searching for one that hasn't been irrevocably damaged by the debris raining down from the castle on high.

She finds a spare Regisword in the cockpit of one small vessel, and is in the process of hotwiring it - one of her own army's vessels! Tch! - when the patter of footsteps alerts her to someone's approach. She brings the swordkind around without pause, every fissure in her body splintering further in protest, only to have her strike blocked by a Crook of Felony.

The Courtyard Droll stares up at her as she draws the sword back, preparing to strike again. And he stares. He does nothing but stare for the longest time, the clubkind loose in his claws, and the Quelled has any number of opportunities to cut down the traitorous ecto-spawn. She doesn’t take them.

The suit jacket slung over the short carapacian's shoulders is too large for him, and stained with fresh blood. There is a tiny diamond sewn on the lapel.

CD: You need someone to take you to Jack.

CD: The Reckoning began a while ago, or maybe it's just now beginning? I never really understood, but you'll never be able to navigate the 'sphere with all of the Ring firing at Skaia, not by yourself.

CD: I am the best pilot in the fleet. Di-

CD: He would have no one else.

She does not care. Instead, she assesses the carapacian before her. She notes the trembling claws, the faint scratches down the sides of his head, the lack of a ridiculous hat. She sees the desperate grief in his eyes, teetering on the edge of madness.

She cocks her head to the side, and lets the sword drop.

BQ: Hurry up, then. We don't have all session.

And she follows the Drear to the Dignitary's craft. After a while, she must use the bladekind as a crutch, a sign of weakness she would ordinarily scorn, but the Drear loses himself in the frantic task of sending them hurtling towards the Battlefield, his claws caked with dried blood and trembling but unerring as they sail toward their destination.

She does not know if he intends to try to take revenge on Noir, or try to talk his leader down from the massacre playing out on the Battlefield. And she does not care. She directs him to the coordinates she requires and he obeys without a word, more compliant now than he ever has been before.

They set down behind a convenient, lurching hill so that Noir's rampage is out of sight; they're not far from the fallen husk of the Black King's body, in fact. There are bodies and smoldering farms all around them, for idiotic pawns sometimes take it into their heads to abandon the war and make a life for themselves amid the death. A futile notion. She always takes particular care to have her Bishops raze the peasant villages first. They never seem to learn their lesson, no matter how often she tries to imprint on the ectobiological memory that things like democracy or pacifism will always be struck down.

No, the Quelled one is more concerned with the Prospitian lying amidst the blood like a pale gem, sovereign and luminous even near death. Someone has clasped her claws together over the bloody stab wound in her chest in a needless funerary gesture, but the Quelled kneels beside her equally Quelled sister and knows that her cousin-queen still abides.

They shall always abide.

BQ: It is not on your hand, and I would have sensed another pawn ascending.
BQ: The Heir, then?

Blood drips along the Willingly Quelled's cheek in a thin line. The Begrudgingly Quelled wipes it away impassively, aware of the Drear approaching them but not caring.

WQ: ...Counter a glitch...with a glitch...

Her pale claws falter and she coughs, more blood oozing up through the gap between her blue skirt and pink-lined tunic. Dormancy can't be far off for her, now.

BQ: He is not enough. Not even a pawn reaching queenship would be enough, now, not with what Noir's been eating. He's beyond you or I now.

BQ: ...Dammit. We need the gods.

The Willing one wheezes but does not respond, her claws still and her mental voice quiet, and for a breathless moment the Begrudging one wonders if Dormancy has already set in.

WQ: They need...more time.

And that is when the BQ knows.

BQ: Another glitch, then. Just the one.

BQ: You will owe me for this, sister mine.

BQ: They will all owe me.

Her sister smiles faintly.

WQ: I...would expect...nothing less.

WQ: Do be careful...my...

...Well. She didn't need to hear the last of that, anyway. Brushing off the dust of a shattered and crumbling Battlefield from her red skirt, the Begrudging one rises. She loses track of the Drear in the chaos that follows, as she lurks through the shadows of the Battlefield with what little power remains to her, but despite Jack Noir's ongoing murderspree, the Drear is still alive when the Begrudging one takes the ring from beside the Heir's corpse and -

[attention - an error has Been detected. the blAck queen has been miscRowneD.]

[attempt tO reach the white queen has Failed. dormancy period detected.]

[please wait. rerouting...]

[emeRgy protocol Activated - darkness reiGns supreme engagE.]

It's bad. The voice of the Medium has begun to splinter. Too many glitches in too short a time.

But she only needs to hold out for so long.

And then the Bogus Queen only has eyes for Noir. They clash again and again, but despite her efforts, she knows she cannot win. Not with extra power Noir has swallowed to augment his own.

Instead, she does what a Queen must do, in the name of winning. She strategizes. She draws him away from the pawns that swarm the heroes' bodies, and she shouts when it seems Noir's eyes might turn from her and bespy the quest beds being dragged into position. Noir is almost mindless, she finds, psycho-tically drunk on the crest of this new green power feeding into his shell, and he howls wordlessly like a savage, wild dog. She can't get a lick of sense out of him, though she can see from the fury in his eyes that he understands her hastily signed taunts.

It is a slicing dance of darkness, lit only by his green lightning and the unnatural white light radiating from the chinks in her carapace. The White Queen's power burns through her, a flurry of white flames that feels totally alien to someone used to wielding the darkness. They've traded only once before, in the heat of a Queenly battle long before the Shift that flipped Queens from active fighters on the Battlefield to strategists, and it had been the same intense, bone-deep agony then, too. Neither of them are suited for the other's ring. Noir has all the advantages, here. When her sword arm gives out at last, the constant blood loss from her ruined ring hand blurring her sight, she hasn't won them enough time. She couldn't do it, and the idea of losing so uselessly to Noir of all people grates on her. She gnashes her teeth, reaching for the bladekind to try one last time; however, her claws can't close around the handle. Dormancy seeps across her vision, but she blinks it away. If she cannot fight, perhaps she can leverage their old rivalry to distract him just long enough -

Noir snarls, wolfish and triumphant, and raises the bladekind to kill her.

When the Drear dives between the two of them, the shock almost startles the Queen into Dormancy. The carapacian has been shouting and attempting to join the fight all this time, but his power levels are nowhere near what they'd need to be to fight on the same level as Queens, landlocked while they circled and darted above.

He shouldn't have mattered.

CD: Jack, please!

Instead, Jack Noir stabs, and Drear is the one who takes the hit.

The Queen laughs. Because the look on Noir's face? Priceless.

BQ: That's the last of them, you know. The Brute had his head lopped off some time ago. And you already murdered the Dignitary in your office.

BQ: Didn't he love you? What a pity.

She has no idea about the Brute's fate. That doesn't stop her from lying, or stop Noir from flinching because she lies with such elegance that he buys it. He's sagging now, his wings huddled in close, as though he doesn't know how to maintain all that raging fury with Drear fumbling to breathe around the blade in his chest.

CD: Ja-ck.

She presses home, because Noir is still stalled out, letting go of the sword with one claw to grip Drear by the shoulder, staring blankly like he can't really see the Crew member's face.

BQ: They always follow you, don't they. Always. The most damnable pattern in all of paradox space. And now look? You've murdered them.

She laughs, and laughs, and laughs.

BQ: The only things you care enough about to keep around, time after time.
BQ: And you've killed them all.

Jack Noir explodes. He rips the sword free and Drear lets out a tiny gasp that the Queen barely hears over the crackling roar of incensed grief as Noir moves to stab her in turn.

But it's enough. In the next moment, before the sword can strike again, the Breeze spirals around them, and she knows the Heir is risen at last. Her body aches and strains, but she thumbs off the ring with a smile, coughing, and the power of the White Queen sucks out of her while Noir's flames are smothered by the blasting wind. She sees the realization in his eyes, and smirks all the wider at the beautiful sight.

Noir is the only Sovereign left on the playing field. This is checkmate.

BQ: Congratulations, Noir.

BQ: They're gods, now. There's a brand new day ahead, and all of your friends are dead.

BQ: No matter who wins...you lose.

And Noir finally speaks.

JN: No. Not all of them. Not yet.

He vanishes in a burst of galaxies, and the Heir meets him. It's in the players' hands, now. The Queen is done with this helping lark. She still cannot grip the sword, but she somehow manages to rise to her feet. Dormancy lingers, but if she can, she would prefer to make it to the Royal Chassis before it fully sets in. Her shell more crack than carapace, the Queen considers the Drear bleeding out at her feet.

She does not care.

BQ: I do not know how he does it, every time. Wins you all over to his side, I mean.

BQ: Surely by now you might have learned it never ends well for you. But I suppose you forgetful things are incapable of learning and retaining lessons, after a point.

The carapacian breathes shakily, and smiles up at her with bloody gums and uneven teeth.

CD: I know! Kind of weird, isn't it?

The Queen nearly trips while standing still. She prefers to blame it on the extreme damage done by channeling the wrong queenship entirely, and not the fact that she is completely unnerved by the implications of what the Drear just said.

BQ: What.

CD: Ah...and it hurts. Every time. I hate the times when Di goes first...

She closes her eyes, and understands.

BQ: You remember.

BQ: You, out of every member of that insufferable Crew...you're the only one who retains ectobiological memory.

Sometimes, she thinks Noir recalls – but only ever sporadically, and his personality and choices are never consistent enough to account for a true pattern of memory. Stubbornly contradictory to the very last.

CD: Oh...yeah! You didn't know?

CD: I don't know how you do it! Living, over and over, I mean. It's kind of awful!

CD: I mean, usually it's okay! :) But then stuff like this happens and -

CD: You probably don't want to listen to a Droll like me jabbering. Sorry about that!

She needs to retrieve her sister-queen. They need to be gone, before whatever happens next - whether the gods win, or die, or just scratch the whole thing. That, or she needs to quickly fall into Dormancy so that the process becomes automated and they can abscond to recover and begin preparing for the next game session.

But she kneels beside the carapacian and watches impassively while he balls up a wad of the Dignitary's suit jacket to dab at his wound.

CD: He'd hate this, y'know.

CD: Oh! Not the blood - me wearing something that doesn't fit right. He'd say it was undignified and things like that. Always watching out for me, he is!

CD: ...Why are you still here?

She doesn't care.

BQ: I could make it all stop.

BQ: Deletion would prevent you from returning to this again. You need never remember the abyss, or experience another death.

BQ: And the four of you have been a pain in my neck for far too long. Not even the Warmhearted one over there would stop me if you consented to it. You are not the first clone to begin to retain memories.

The White Queen hates it every time, of course. The whole process involves the Black Queen tossing around far too many phrases like 'mercy killing' and 'respect for free will' through gritted teeth for her own liking, and often gives her heartburn for several sessions afterward.

But here it is, at last. If she can spin it to the WQ right, she'll have the chance to wipe out the Midnight Crew, to delete their gene codes from the records, and begin a new era free of their constant meddling. Paradox space will find some new imbeciles to plague and betray her, no doubt, but it won't be them.

She could care less about Drear's distress. She can care about freeing herself of a persistent nuisance like Noir's Crew. The eagerness she feels welling in her breast would make the Warmhearted one cluck her tongue and shake her regal head in dismay.

CD: ...Could you really?

CD: I kinda wish -

CD: Nah. Seeing Di again might only hurt more.
CD: I think I'd like that. Please.

Success tastes sweet, like the juice of a sweet orange bursting on her tongue, like hot blood. A rare good mood seizes her, in the midst of all this stupidity and defeat, and she places her claws on either side of the carapacian's head. She leans down, and dips a kiss against his forehead.

BQ: Oh yes.

BQ: For the debt that I now owe you.

BQ: I'll make it all stop.

And with a deft twist, she snaps his head to the side. He's still smiling, Droll in death.

She wonders if this is exactly what he wanted, but she does not care.

It's easier that way.

Heaving herself back to her feet, she marches back to where the White Queen's body lies dormant, and watches the clouds as they reflect the battle of gods playing out overhead. She stoops to pick the other Queen up and cradle her as she picks a new path through the Battlefield toward the center castle, where their Chassis always awaits.

The castle has been thoroughly crushed by the Seer's grimdark breakdown, but the Chassis always awaits. Like Queens, it abides. The Game provides. Banners lie scattered and brocaded tapestries litter the stairs as she ascends toward the Queens' Tower, and most of the arching windows - and the walls between them, let's be honest - have been blown out to reveal the Battlefield burning beyond. It is with a relieved sigh, and with the dark dimness of Dormancy curling through her mind and slowing her limbs, that the Queen taps the hidden switch with her foot, and the door to the inner chamber opens.

The Black Queen stares.

The walls are green.

Felt green.

BQ: No.

BQ: NO.

By the time she finds the Chassis, relocated to the roof, the Scratch is already bearing down on them. There is no time to check it over for sabotage; she inputs the necessary coordinates in an unseemly panic, always with one scarred eye on the viewscreens to track the progress of the end of the world.

But now she understands. The understanding burns in her throat like bad champagne. No wonder so much went wrong. She lays the White Queen within her recovery chamber in haste and hobbles to her own, her mind spinning as the grim truth becomes clear.

If he is already here, the Scratch will do nothing to improve the reset universe. His presence means that his master cannot be far behind, and his master is...the terminating point. The next session will be worse than null - it will be the end of this entire branching paradox cycle.

It will be the end of her. She and the White Queen have witnessed hundreds of their counterparts cut off in their prime by this lingering virus, this sick destroyer. It is the only way a Queen can die, and the Black Queen's mind shies away from the horrific thought of having never existed, not existing, never to exist again. Complete erasure of all her time, past, present, and future.

She cannot accept this. Cannot accept that at long last, paradox space has decided to end her. Millions of regenerations of loyal service to a cause she hates, and this is the payment she receives? The worst of all possible ends?

But there is nothing to be done, no strategy that a hundred Queens has ever succeeded in using to save themselves, and she sits heavily on the stone of her own recovery chamber with her eyes closed in resignation. Not even allying with the brute would work. Once he has entered a cycle, it is already too late. It is always too late -

"Unless we do something to change it."

The Black Queen blinks, and looks up.

BQ: You?

A Maid of Time in the prime of her godly youth grins, hovering cross-legged above the navigational hub. Never mind that they are mere moments from spiraling through the Queen’s Gate and passing on through time and space to take up control of a scratched, doomed session, and that no player should be able to follow them to the Chassis. The Black Queen has seen thousands of Maids and Time players in all her years of existence, but this one is familiar, if only just. It was only a single universe ago, after all, and this one has a tendency to break the rules.

Aradia Megido grins. "Me. Now, skip the spiel about how I shouldn't be here and listen - listen closely. You know what's coming?" At a nod, the god's grin spreads even more. It is downright maniacal. "Good. And you know that paradox space will allow it?"

BQ: Even if he is the product of cascading glitched processes, he is still a legitimate part of the Game's protocols.

BQ: Yes. The Croaking bastard won't fight it. This is the terminal point. The Game ends here.

The troll cracks her knuckles. "Then tell me, Black Queen? How interested would you be in a chance to break the Game?"

She considers it.

She does not care about players, or pawns, or any of the other pieces in Skaia's insipid games.

But she rather does care about anything that might involve sabotaging a game session. And she cares rather a great deal about living.

She leans forward.

BQ: I am listening.

BQ: Intently.

The coast of Maryland

An Aquatic Rover finally makes landfall around four in the morning. He's heavily built for a carapacian of his size, but the hollowness of a shell lets him float up on the surf and crash against the beach without exerting too much effort. He scrambles for a moment, stuck on his back and flailing like a turtle in distress, before managing to roll over and stand up, peeling long strings of seaweed off of his person.

He glances around, taking in the thin, pallid sand of the beach around him. Stringy bushes of marram grass encroach upon the flat, rocky plain in meandering lines, but their stalks have lost the yellow-green tinge and begun to look distinctly pale and drooping.

AR is far from surprised. He's been swimming since the freighter ship he hitched a ride on to cross the Atlantic was pulled aside for a surprise inspection by trolls in a distinct shade of Crocker red, and even with a carapacian's innate ability to adapt to survive in any and all wasteland conditions, the infestation now lodged on the floor of the Atlantic continental shelf has made the waters increasingly more caustic the closer he got to the shore. The beach sands are littered with the bloated, rotten bodies of hundreds of dead fish aquatic lusii, some of them split open by the sun the previous day and still festering now that night has come.

A few still have white pus oozing from their raw gills, the last remnants of the taint they'd probably been filtering for days before it finally killed them. His own acid burns, particularly those in the soles of his feet where the damage was greatest, ache in sympathy. Others appear to have hemorrhaged completely in a single explosive aneurysm.

Even if the Terror incarnate at the bottom of the sea doesn't start actively claiming more territory for itself, things are already dying. AR wonders how long until the fish that float up on shore aren't dead, simply...altered. It took years for the Novaya Ukraine to get as bad as it had, after all.

"It's reely sad, isn't it? I didn't think it had actshoally gotten this bad!"

AR flinches and his claws go for regulation standard weapons that are no longer there, abandoned to the deep seas when the water ruined them. But the troll who pads along the waterline shows no signs of mutation. She does have the frilly ear bits and gills of the seadwelling ones, though, exposed by the aquamarine bandeau, which means that AR is duty bound to warn her that -

AR: It would not be safe to enter the water at this time, madam! You should probably stay clear of the area!

She laughs at him, freely and openly, and her reply when she speaks again is more than a little distracted. "I'd probably be fin! I visit these waters all the time, though I don't come up on shore very often, and it hasn't hurt me yet. What a mess! I wonder what keeled them all." She casts a pitying look at the next desiccated octopus lusii she sidesteps, though AR notices that she's careful to never actually set a bare foot on one of the bodies.

AR: Still! There should be a regulation against it, for everyone's safety! This water is contaminated.

"Naut a problem! That's probably a good idea!" the troll agrees, tossing her hair over a shoulder and smiling at him with all her teeth bared in a practiced grin. Her eyes are a deep, vibrant fuchsia behind the wide rims of her glasses, but between the scattering of freckles across her face and the height, there's only one troll this could be!

AR: Heiress!

Heiress does not suit her, he thinks. The initials are all wrong. A Fearless Protector, perhaps. When she ducks her head in acknowledgement, her angular shoulders squared as she smiles and tosses her hair, she seems much more approachable than the only other tyrianblood on the planet. "Cleaning up these beaches are going to be my next project! Someone needs to head an investigation into all these deaths - otherwise nothing will ever be solved. Are you interested in marine life, mister?"

AR: Oh. Er. Not really?

The Fearless one shrugs, and continues to talk as though he hasn't signed anything at all. "I think it's just super important that we get on top of this. It would be outraygeous if this weird pollution became a serious problem on my watch!" Her nose scrunches up as she taps a pallid jellyfish corpse with a painted toe-claw. "I can't even imagine what kind of chemical leak would krill so many in so short a time, though...It must be pretty bad!"

AR: Horrorterror bloodbrine is quite caustic, particularly in liquid mediums, yes.

"Why would you say something like that?" the troll says absently.

AR: The tangle of the Ukraine has taken up residence on the sea floor. I tracked it this far, but I worry it could relocate again at any time. Its physical presence will begin to produce abominations soon.

AR: I would recommend you evacuate the entire East coast. Standard grimlight incursion procedure.

Well. It would be standard, if anyone would publish his rule books. The world would be a better place if people just listened to the Authorial 'Rivener, but he suffers from a lack of publicity. It's a shame.

"That seems a little excessive. We can't just evacuate people for the halibut!"

AR scratches his chin, and squints out at the water. The sea is dark, steel grey today with navy blue undertones, but he can almost imagine the grimwhiteness spreading in the sunless reaches beneath the surface. How long until the beach sands themselves become contaminated enough that they form a new acid swamp? It is this many-angled one's favorite tactic, and grimlight Horrors do not often change how they prefer to absorb prey, no matter how mad they become.

But...perhaps there is a way to prevent that!

AR: Could you order it to leave? The other one did in the Ukraine. Perhaps you could persuade it to leave for deeper waters. That would buy us time.

"Other one?" The Fearless Protector blinks at him, folding her arms and pouting skeptically. "Uh, seriously, what are you talking about?"

AR: The other one! The Condescension!

It's like flipping a switch. A snarl rips out of the Fearless one's mouth, and her entire expression darkens as her ear fins flare. "You know, I wouldn't even put it past her to be behind somefin like this," she mutters. "I know she's up to something, but I just don't know what."

AR: I don’t think that you're understanding me, here. That is the opposite of what I said. You have a major infestation below, but she has been able to take care of such things before -

But there is something wrong. He claps a claw over his mouth before he can sign any further, and squints at the troll more closely.

Perhaps he is only imagining it. He is a carapace, after all, and the anatomy of trolls and humans never really overly concerned him as long as they respected the law.
But he doesn't think that trolls are meant to be so thin. There is a strained, stretched quality to the troll's frame, as though she recently lost a great deal of weight, leaving only lean seadweller muscle and bone and skin. Even as he watches, she winces and presses a claw to her temple; her eyes grow glassy and distant, and for a stomach-turning moment he thinks he sees a milky film slide over them. She blinks and the impression is gone, but that is enough. When the Fearless one turns to look at him, head cocked to the side, it is with an air of speculation, a curiously hard expression that doesn't suit her face.

He feels like he is being looked through, and the horribly familiar sensation makes his carapace crawl.

AR: Oh.

AR: Never mind.

AR: ...I have to go.

"Perhaps you should stay," the troll says, fiddling with one of the chains of her headband, her expression thoughtful and far away. "I could use someone to help me out here, with all the migraines I've been having lately. No need to be koi."

AR: I have - uh - there is - m-my mate will be missing me -

She takes a step toward him. "You could tell me and Glubby what you know about the Condesce! I was just visiting her, but I'm shore she'll be interested in what you have to say."

AR: Come any closer and I'll shoot!

It makes her pause. He doesn't stick around to watch her processing whether he actually has a specibi on his person; instincts honed by years in the Ukraine, passing between the old and the new, have taught him the merits of a tactical retreat. Instead, he bolts, up the beach past her and away from the water. He needs to get off the beach before his aching feet can betray him and slip in the slick sands.

If she drags him to the water, it's all over. He hadn't known a Horrorterror could take a mind without horrifically altering the mortal flesh, but that girl has been compromised. If he only had his trusty artillery - but he's weaponless and alone, and the pang he feels even now at the thought of the Vynnychenko twins almost makes him falter.

"Come back! Wait, doofish, I'm not going to hurt you! Arresto!"

AR puts on another burst of speed. He's been swimming for ages, fighting the tide to reach the shore, but terror can do amazing things for a shell. He dodges along a narrow path between the tall grass until the wooden slats of a half-buried walkway clatter beneath his heels. He doesn't dare look back to see if she's closing in, but he thinks her shouts are growing fainter. When he hits the main road, it's empty and there's no vehicles he could hitch a ride with this early in the morning.

So he runs, and hopes to Skaia itself he's heading north.

He has a long way to go to reach Maine.

Years ago (though not many)

Lawrence, Kansas
First arrived some time ago.

Woman in her fifties or sixties, with the creases of a lifetime of smiles folded into her face so that she appears to smile to herself over her drink, dunking sugar packet after sugar packet into a cup of tea only a shade lighter than her skin. Hair might once have been glossy and dark, but now lies close to her skull in grey-white curls. Green birds on her dress and a necklace of pearls around her neck. Ancient but ageless, with a vitality that defies her wizened face and stooped back.

Second arrives; he stoops to sweep a kiss across the skin of her wrinkled knuckles, and she chuckles as the joy buzzer concealed in the palm of her hand jolts him. Smiles good-naturedly, as though he's an old hand with her gambit, and rests his cane to one side as he settles himself across from her. Hair has also gone a hoary grey, but his mustache is peerless. Her dress may be outdated but his safari gear would be better suited for the jungles of the Congo than a small town cafe. Chortles when the waitress takes his order and then the two just sit together, speaking in low murmurs. The woman occasionally throws her head back in a braying laugh that holds nothing back, and at one point the salt shaker erupts with a flurry of paper snakes when the man goes to garnish his eggs.

Third is a woman who strides in on heels that could snap the ankles of the unwary, knives that stab the tile as she smirks at the host and scans the cafe with a keen, assessing gaze. Wears her angular dress and disheveled lab coat and dark red lipstick like armor, and walks to the table after only a moment of hesitation. Settles herself tentatively beside the old woman after the two greet her with knowing smiles. The two women seem to be familiar with one another, exchanging air kisses over each cheek, before the younger one primly adjusts the fabric of her dress across her chest and falls into a practiced lounge, her nails drilling the tabletop like pistons. If she's been drinking, it's obvious only in the faint scent of alcohol that clings to her, and in the flask of straight gin she keeps in her purse.

None appear overly threatening to the untrained eye. Someone watching them might even be fooled into thinking this little scene is that of two aging parents meeting with their child, a young, busy, successful doctor fresh out of school who grimaces and checks her watch too often and makes it all too clear in all the most stomach-clenching, passive aggressive ways that she has a life that doesn't involve them, one that she's eager to get back to.

Ambrose Strider is not fooled.

Tips the brim of his hat forward and watches the three in the blurred reflection of the metal napkin dispenser. Head buzzes and throbs with the remnants of the hangover from a late night DJing and partying too hard, but he's twenty two and his liver has handled worse. The glass of dark soda in front of him has gone flat, paired with black coffee that's been refilled three times now. Caffeine helps him defrag his hard drive after a long night of crashing it repeatedly. Wears a black shirt and a leather jacket that fall off one shoulder, with jeans that hang off his hips; has deliberately dressed his sloppiest for this outing because why the fuck should he care what impression he makes on these guys. Hauled ass on his shitty motorcycle to reach Lawrence by morning; still gross and reeking of sweat and alcohol and exhaust fumes.

Doesn't even know who the hell they are.

Still has no idea why he flaked out to the middle of nowhere, Kansas. It's horse shit, is what it is, because Kansas is a long ass way away from Georgia and he has important shit he could be doing, like spinning stacks and playing shitty video games.

Fixes his shades. Keeps a level eye on the reflection of the people he is stalking, and opens the fist that's been clamped around the handle of the coffee mug since it first appeared. Reads the note that showed up on the door of his apartment when he stumbled back in at one in the morning.
Come.

Underneath that the address of this cafe’s been scribbled down, and nothing else. No explanation. Nothing. Someone’s been reading too much of that new Evangelion manga that just came out a few weeks ago (not that he’s read it, or anything like that). Or else cryptic ass messages are just coming back into style.

No name, no explanation, and yet.

Here he is.

Sips his soda, and watches.

And wonders why the hell they’re all so familiar. Maybe he’s had too much coffee. Hand jitters and taps a frenetic beat against the table, and he has to stop himself when he realizes he's matching tempo with the young woman.

Tries to make himself focus on something other than the strangeness of this entire clusterfuck of a situation. Duly notes the aesthetically pleasing shape of the woman beneath her sharp, brittle armor. Remains completely uninspired by such thoughts.

Notices the first rising up from her seat and tottering in his direction. Does nothing, says nothing, lips a flat thin line as the old granny trundles over to smile at him fondly, her hands clasped over her belly. Stares up at her, impassive and still as a statue, the calm stoicism that keeps him removed from the shit of everyday life. Maybe a little dissociative, maybe a little fucked in the head, leaving him numb and hollow when he feels anything at all, but he crawled through foster homes and dingy clubs and auto shops built to strip vehicles that need to be disappeared and at some point feeling started to seem harder than the distance.

Not impressed, he thinks at the old woman, not even engaged enough to be pissed that she noticed him watching. Doesn't frown, doesn't do much of anything else. Trusts that the blankness of a cold, robotically assessing face will help this woman realize she does not want to fuck with him.

It’s always worked before.

Tilts her head to the side, smiles with something unreadable in her glittery, pale blue eyes. This close up, the faint, aged scar running over her right eye is barely noticeable behind the thick rims of her glasses, a faded dark line and a slight droop in that eyelid and nothing more. Says, "Ambrose, you look like skin and bones, dearie! You got here so early - did you remember to eat before the rest of us arrived?" Tuts and lays a hand on the curve of his shoulder, her eyes little shards of ice in a dark face that brooks no argument and will take no quarter. "Come along, I've ordered you a little something. My treat."

First instinct is to tell her in a perfect, crisp monotone exactly where she can shove her charity. Old habits, from times that have only just begun to pass, where money was too tight and food mattered so damn much and yet he had the innate asshattery in him to walk away whenever a bartender offered a free meal, on the house.

But her eyes are bright and her smile is kind and he's never had to deal with grandparents so he has no idea how to counter this quiet insistence when she stares him down.

Rises in a dream, still floating somewhere off and to the side as his chassis of a body mechanically slouches off after the old woman. Hands reach out in the dream to boost a chair from an unoccupied table, and drag it along with the legs dragging and jolting on every bump in the floor tiles behind him. Flips it around and sets it down to sit on with legs spread wide and head cocked to the side in quiet, disinterested disdain, as calculated as the young doctor in its deliberate abrasiveness.

Just as ass meets chair, he's aware that something is between him and the seat. Realizes too late, as the obnoxious burp of air rips through the cafe and draws every single gaze to him.

Does not falter. Does not say a word as he reaches down and removes the whoopee cushion from beneath his ass. Flicks it at the old woman's side of the table without a sound.

Back in these days he's good at that. Can go days without speaking aloud, barely breathing above a faint rasp. He can talk. He just doesn't often see the point. Part of him recoils at the stupid, primal embarrassment of the prank, but he's spent so long ignoring it that he doesn't even think much of the eyes scrawling curious trails over his back with sniggers in the air.

"And now everyone's here!" Granny cheerfully settles herself in her seat once more, slowly, as though her liveliness isn't obvious, like she thinks he'll still fall for her decrepit old person gambit.

"Good, good!" The second chortles again, reaching out to clap Ambrose heartily on the back. Doesn't bother dodging it; lets it hit, and then slowly, so slowly, raises his gaze behind black shades to stare at the offending hand. "Been looking forward to meeting you at last, old chap!" Oblivious, maybe, or just too old to give a fuck about Ambrose's flat, shark eyed stare. "Jo's told me so much!"

Been sponging on him then. Fair's fair, he supposes.

And yet, what the actual fuck? The two grandparents start giggling up a storm for no goddamn reason, while the doctor's stiff and uncertain and haughty in her cloud of alcohol and Ambrose takes everything in from behind mirrored lenses.

Guesses jokerkind or some shit for the grandma, pistolkind for the safari dipshit. Harder to say for the doctor, but there's a distinct callus across the backs of her knuckles that screams fistkind. Doesn't fit with the prim image of a successful doctor too well educated and self-satisfied to get muck on her skirt and blood on her hands.

Still doesn't know what kind of doctor yet, either.

"Not much of a talker, eh?" Old man's still trying to make small talk.

Well, tough shit.

Food arrives a moment later, the awkward silence still enveloping them, enough to send the waitress running. Stares at the steaming heap of pancakes and eggs and sausage links and hash browns, enough to make his hung-over stomach twist and flop like the waves of the ocean, threatening mutiny. Can't show weakness in front of others, though, so a quick shrug and he starts stabbing at the eggs with a dull fork, maintaining an apathetic silence even as the old man frowns.

"Just a regular barrel of laughs, aren't you?" comes from the third. Smokey and low and clipped with faint, warring hints of both a British and French accent, fighting for dominance in her educated mode of speech. Eyes are a vivid red-violet, the color of orchids or a mixed drink that's gone too heavy on the raspberry liqueur.

God, he wishes he thought she were hot. Would make things so much easier.

"I don't suppose you have any more of an idea than I do how and why we knew to be here? The professor rather skimped on the details." Genuine question, so maybe she's not in on this conspiracy either, but a smile flickers in the crease of her painted lips. Fuchsia eyes, sharp like the crack of ice against glass, give him a onceover, twice, the second with a shaped eyebrow arching high up under the elegant swoop of her bangs. Some kind of expression of realization.

Not interested in whatever revelation she thinks she's having. He's gone behind sloppy clothes and leather and blank shades, deliberately scattering attention onto the piercings that climb up the curve of his ear, the hook through his right eyebrow, the ring for his lower lip and the flash on the end of his tongue when he forces another forkful of eggs down.

There's nothing for her to see, for any of them to see, of the real him, detached from everything and assessing from above.

Grunts and shrugs again in response, flicks the crumpled note onto the table where it skitters to a precise stop before the doctor. Punctuates it with a huge bite of pancakes, smacking his lips.

Too huge; dry lips crack and he sucks them in discreetly before blood can drip everywhere.

"I knew you would all come if I sent for you. I'm just glad we could have this time together before it begins." Matter of fact with a laugh in her voice, the granny sits with her white-gloved hands folded before her as she watches Ambrose eat.

Stares right back at her, pancakes and cracked lips forgotten. Should have figured she'd be the one to have sent a note like this, and yet still marginally surprised that she'd 'fess up to it.

"And here we sit," the doctor murmurs, sounding as disgruntled as Ambrose feels, and she withdraws a neatly folded square of paper from the breast pocket of her coat to lay beside his crumpled note. Nods to each of them in turn. "A world renowned adventurer and philanthropist, a less well known joke shop owner who happens to moonlight as a university lecturer, a quantum physicist, and a DJ all walk into a cafe?"

Confirmation, then, that Ambrose is the odd one out here. Typical; sends him slumping further over the arm of the chair, legs kicked out to take up as much space as he can under their table, careless and silent.

And if the doctor knows enough to know his job, and studied under the old lady, it raises the question of how the hell he didn't know to spy on these three in turn. Means he's the only one fighting blind, here, and he doesn't like it.

Driven by an instinct he didn't understand, drawn over eight hundred miles to sit down in this cafe and watch the first, second, and third trickle in, and not understand why he knew to watch for them.

For the first time in months, he's unsettled enough to tap his tongue piercing against the inside of his front teeth, barely able to suppress the faint urge to frown from reaching his face.

Don't let 'em see it. Can't let anyone know how ignorant he is - they have the advantage, in knowledge and in numbers.

So: a curt nod and no more, still and slack and unconcerned.

"Eat your breakfast," the old woman reprimands him, rapping the back of his hand. Just stares back, dispassionate, and she smiles gleefully as though she knows everything he doesn't, including which prank she's got lined up next. Goddamn tricksters. "You and Rue don't seem to remember as much. I'm Joanna Egbert, these days. Jo or Nanna, either is fine, dearie. Rue was one of my students!"

Slaps the old man's forearm. "And this old coot is -"

"James Harley!" Boisterous and hearty. Clearly surprises Lalonde with the strength of his grip when they shake hands, and jostles Ambrose as he twists his hand in a tight shake. Doesn't let himself be drawn into some kind of bone crushing, macho contest with the guy, just lets his hand be shaken, and then drops it back to the side while the old man laughs. "I'm a fan of your work too, old chap! Your patent for fluid control microprocessor units in artificial knees - truly inspired!"

Already knew these guys were spying on him. A little worrying, because that patent was submitted under a pseudonym and the checks have only just begun to reach his PO box. But the man respects the machines, and Ambrose can respect that. Earns him an nod of acknowledgement, if nothing else, and a quick thumbs up.

"Rue Lalonde," from the doctor, and then a sip from her own cup of tea, both hands folded around the mug so her nails are on display. In her own way just as carefully put together as he is and hell, he can respect that too.

"Your pancakes, dear," Jo pesters, and a muscle flexes in his jaw.

Not that he isn't aware that he's all bone and lean muscle and nothing much else, and that it shows. A diet of beer and pizza. Exercise regimens that vacillate between training for days without break and slipping between the roiling surge of bodies in the club after he's finished a set, trying and failing to capture that energy that consumes the dance floor. Face in the mirror is drawn and wan, and bruises last longer than they should, and he can't bring himself to care most of the damn time. As long as he keeps ticking along, cold and brittle but strong enough to deck anyone who tries to start shit in a dark corner, why bother?

No one's ever really commented. Never pushed him to take care of himself, because no one gave a shit. It's unsettling, and the obvious response is to shove the plate away and settle back, arms folded, breathing steadily to keep that brief flare of emotion tamped down. Drawls, "All yours, Egbert," the first thing he's said since last night, since dragging a brown-eyed asshole behind the stacks and trying and failing to make anything happen on his end when the guy went straight for the crotch. Asshole had been less than amused at the lack of response and took off back into the crowd to find someone else. Started chugging something with orange juice, club soda, and a fuckton of Amaretto to make the raw, sick disappointment go away.

Just gave him this fucking hangover. Objective not achieved.

When she opens her mouth to say god knows what, he beats her to it. "Ambrose Strider. Now. The fuck are we here for?"

Jo doesn't miss a beat, just nods as though he's said something insightful. "We asked you both to come because they'll be here, soon, and I'm not sure how much time we have left." Smile on her round face fades for the first time, and the slack wrinkles left behind on that old lady face are telling. "The children need to be protected, and James and I thought we could handle it, but -"

And it's too much. Not even he can bluff through this one, so what pops out of his mouth is, "What kids?" Voice growls and scrapes at his throat, more effort than it should be to drag the words up and out into the open air. "Lady, you just told me to show up. I haven't got a clue what you're on about."

That trips her up, which is all he really wanted at this point. Needs to level the playing field here.

"...How much do you remember, Ambrose?" Jo says, slowly, and all he needs to do sit back and fold his arms over his chest to make her sigh heavily. "Fiddlesticks. Worse than I thought, then."

Old man Harley takes up her hand and squeezes it, fond and sickly sweet. "Not all of us can retain as much of the legacy as you do, Jo, old girl. But it might do them some good to see the old arm. Spark their memories! It certainly convinced me!"
Gruff and disgustingly British, really, like a caricature of a man. Can't decide if it's an act or not.

Takes Jo a while to think this incomprehensible suggestion over, long enough for the waitress to deliver another round of drinks. Gin’s in Rue's fresh cup before he can even blink; raises an eyebrow at the doctor, who merely stares him down. Starting to see the signs in her now, the heavy makeup under her eyes to keep the shadows at bay, the liberal dollop of gin she adds to top off the first after only one sip. Alcohol's her pressure point, then.

Wonders what she thinks his weakness is. The old man and the granny might be on a whole other level of weirdness he's not prepared to deal with, but he's more than a match for Lalonde.

A snap, and the gloves come off Jo's hands, exposing neat white hands, at odds with the dark of her face. Warning sign number one.

Then buttons start popping at Jo's wrist – she undoes them, and then raises her hand to undo another set of buttons hidden under a neat fold in the fabric around her shoulder. Clothes aren't his thing. Makes him tense up, wondering if she's going to pull a weapon out of some pocket he didn't notice.

Sleeve falls away, unwrapping in a way that makes it clear that the one seam was never sewn shut in the first place, left baggy and loose to conceal - Stares.

Stares some more, because why the hell not.

Rue stares too, shocked, and the flask she'd gone to tuck back into her purse falls onto the seat next to her, fingers loose and trembling.

Never seen anything like it; Ambrose can't help the instinct to surge forward and peer closer, because whoever made this prosthesis was a master. A god.

There's an empty, ten inch gap between the stump of a shoulder and the pale white of the wrist, right where the elbow should be; no sign of wired nerves or transparent pseudotissues or grubmods or carbon fiber, no explanation for how Jo reaches out and slides the plate back across the table toward him with a hand that is clearly detached from the rest of her body. Wrist on up is patterned in pale blue harlequin diamonds, while the hand flares uselessly right at the wrist as though still covered in a pale white glove.

"The other is the same." Cheery and matter of fact. Gestures to the other covered arm with a quick wave. Eyes may or may not bug out of sockets at the way the floating arm darts away from the old woman's side, whirling over the table and proving once and for all that someone has managed to design a floating, fully operational wirelessly powered prosthetic. "Hoo hoo hoo! Been like this my whole life. Quite useful for the gambit, of course, but bit of a nasty shock for old Poppa Sassacre! Didn't realize it was a holdout from the last universe's session until I was fourteen years old!"

Looks him right in the eye, and waves her fingers from behind the head of the troll in the booth behind them, throwing up a pair of bunny ears before the troll even notices the hand is there. "How is your heart doing, my dear?"

Still more preoccupied with the floating arm. When it rolls through the air before him, lackadaisical, he snags it out of the air with a hand and turns it over to get a look at the insides. Needs to know what makes this thing tick.

It's hollow. Nothing but empty space inside the thin shell of a porcelain white forearm, but it certainly has the manual dexterity to flick his nose and tap dance away across the table to Jo's side.
Not mechanical, not biological, not unless it's something more advanced than he's ever seen. Sufficiently advanced science and all that jazz.

Fingers twitch. Wants to strip it down and find out what makes it tick.

"I never knew," from Lalonde, fascinated as the impossible hand starts sorting through the sugar packets in the middle of the table. "All those tutoring sessions, discussing potential ectobiological molecular traces, and I never noticed. But it can't be -"

"It is." The hand drifts back to Jo and she smiles. "An extant ectobiological paradox marker. This, dearie, is the proof you've always been quizzing my poor old brain for. The time just never seemed quite right."

Thinks he can almost hear the processors in Lalonde's head whirring. "Evidence of a paradoxical construct that defies the laws of physics...but that would have to mean..."

"This is not the first time our little world has pattered along like this, no."

Gently reaches out and tugs the detached wrist back into place, wrapping the sleeve around it and doing up the buttons one-handedly. A practiced motion; she's had decades, if he believes her story. "We're one of the scratchverses you hypothesized. Why did you think I pushed you to think so far outside the scope of your research paper when you majored in quantum mechanics, dearie? You needed to know."

Sounds like crazy talking. Arms folded over his chest; catches his teeth gritting, and forces them slack. No signs. Need more information.

Fuck, does his head hurt. Must be the hangover shitting on him with a vengeance. Needs to stop partying after work or something, or maybe just not put off an eight hundred mile road trip until the middle of the night before he needs to be there. Not one of his brightest moments.

"You're talking about a paradox-fueled cosmic reset." Lalonde sounds shocked, personally offended, like somehow what she's hearing is downright scandalous. "That we - in our current iteration - are the end product of an oscillatory cosmological function. But that's -"

"Yes, dearie?" Jo prompts.

"That was hypothetical!" Hand slaps against the table, and oh yeah, Lalonde is pissed. "You spoke to me only in terms of speculation. Do you mean to actually say, all this time, you knew for a fact -"

A look at Egbert, and Lalonde swears, incensed, hair falling into her face. "The Skaian multiverse paradigm was only ever supposed to be conjecture!" Practically tears a notebook in two as she hauls it out of her purse and starts scribbling on it with a fuchsia-ink gel pen, sloppy wide numbers and symbols that Ambrose can't make heads or tails of. "It fits with the carapacian ectobiological genome markers, of course, we already examined those data points but - I'd need some kind of sample from the arm, too. Damn! Damn! If you already knew, then what model should I be focusing on, ekpyrotic or brane cyclical?"

"Paradox. Pure paradox loops, sweetie. Don't forget to account for the retroactive synchronicity principle."

"C'est des conneries!" French is starting to take over now for Lalonde, and he only knows what that one means because he makes a point of knowing how to swear in multiple languages. A dramatic tear and a sheet full of sparkly fuchsia ink goes flying; scrawls new calculations across the fresh sheet. Takes a hard pull off the flask, a straight shot of gin, and apparently drains the last of it, whipping it away from her mouth with a gasp.
Harley picks up the paper, chortling to himself like the smug British bastard he is as he reads over it. "Can't make bloody heads or tails of all this, I'm afraid, but I'm sure it's correct!"

Suspects Harley knows about as much about all this universe nonsense as he does. Only one word in ten made sense in Lalonde's rant. He’s familiar with ectobiology from the frantic cramming to take his GED early; it's the shit that spawns carapacians, their special super-secret assbackwards way of reproducing themselves based on mystery slime and databases full of ecto-genetic coding that none of them have been willing to chat about since World War II fucked their shit up good.

Vaguely knows that paradox loops are part of the Villein religious order thing, so carapacians again. Hearing that makes him cast a keener eye on the hollow white of the harlequin arm before it vanishes under Egbert's glove.

Lalonde's cosmic meltdown aside, still wondering how all this relates to the more pressing question, which is - "Kids?"

Raises his eyebrow over his shades to underscore his point. He does robotics, not the cosmos; would rather focus on this than whatever reincarnated multiverse theory Lalonde's trying to puzzle out, no matter how familiar it all sounds.

"Our children," and holy fuck clearly he did not come prepared for all this fresh fuckery. His face might actually twitch, which is more than enough to make Egbert elaborate. "Created through ectobiology and delivered by meteor, dear, not to worry. They were fighting to create a new universe, but...something went wrong."

A cut in from Harley, who strokes his magnificent 'stache as he speaks. "They're going to be heroes, but with the way the last universe had to be rebooted from scratch, everything's mucked up. We need to be vigilant while raising them, this time around."

"Raising them." Flat and hard edged, not taking shit here. "What, trying to pawn some brat off on me now?"

"But he is yours, dear," from Jo, anxious and kind and earnest, clearly not seeing a problem here. "Yours and Rue's." Another twitch of his face and she hurries to explain more. "She will handle Rose, of course, while I take John and James cares for Jade. I just hope we can communicate better, this time around!"

"Paradox children," Lalonde says faintly, which doesn't help at all. "Ectobiologically viable paradox children. I can't believe it's true." Stares down at her ravaged notebook, still marking up the page despite the fact that her ink has run out, and all she leaves are faint creases in the paper. "Do you even know what this means, Jo? Why have you never published about it, this is a significant breakthrough! Rose, you said? Tell me about her!"

"I have no math or data to publish, my dear pupil. I simply remember what came before." Solemn, eyes closed. "It did not...end well, for any of us. But perhaps thanks to certain circumstances of my life and afterlife, I see in my dreams most of what came before.” Shakes her head. “Hopefully, when the children arrive, I'll be able to draw on even more memories, to help us avoid some of the pitfalls we encountered in the original session."

Another fresh page, and this time Lalonde remembers to whip out a new pen, bright periwinkle that shimmers silver on the page. "Fascinating. I'd always assumed only the primogenitor and archetypal-class carapacians would be able to retain paradox memories." Eyes brighten with the fever of a science-related breakdown as Lalonde tugs on Jo's sleeve, tapping an equation with her finger. "And the loops are filtered through a extraversal sorting-algorithm based genesis crucible? Should we treat it as an eleventh brane?"

Jo leans in to help, giving that ridiculous 'hoo hoo' laugh as she does. "Exactly as we outlined in the paradigm, dearie!"

Apparently everyone gets a space baby from another dimension. That's all he's getting out of this conversation. Even if it's legit - which he won't believe until he sees the proof with his own eyes, dammit - there's still the pressing matter of the fact that -

"Lady, you think I got time for a kid?" Layers it with sarcasm, frosts it with disdain. "Shit, you want a spare? Because whatever one you've assigned me, it's all yours."

"He." Corrects him on autopilot, like she already knows all the genders of all these impending space babies. Probably does, actually, names and genders and favorite colors, and that's insane. Messed up. Impossible.

Why does he believe every word she says?

Why does it feel like they've done all this before?

Keeps talking to him, saying things like, "His name is Dave," and Ambrose flinches because fuck does his chest hurt. Feels like having his heart carved out.

"Joanna, dear, I don't think the old chap is feeling quite up to this right now," Harley says, all mild-mannered British concern as he leans forward, and that means something's bleeding through onto Ambrose's face. Needs to shut down before it gives more of him away, exposes more of the shit that no one's allowed to see.

Pushes away from the table, chair screeching as he shoves his hands in his pockets and turns his back on them all. Walks away, but behind him the conversation continues in mutters until, just as he lays a hand on the door, Harley adds, "Let me try, instead. See if I can't inspire the boy to shake off this little gloomy spell."

So he ends up with some insane, dapper old British man trailing him out into the parking lot, cane tapping along heavily on the tarmac.

Not looking forward to the return trip; most of the ride up here passed in a hazy blur of preliminary hangover and sleep deprivation, and the caffeine has made his hands and heart jittery enough that he might need to pull over and sleep in a ditch or something to get past the twitchiness.

Or maybe not the caffeine. Maybe just lingering shivers from a deep, abiding horror he can't quite name, a memory of memories that he shouldn't have.

Whatever the hell Jo and Harley are preaching, he doesn't want to know any more. If he knows more, he thinks it'll only get worse.

A hand lands on his shoulder before he can make a clean getaway, though, and all he can do is stand stiff and stare straight ahead while the old man goes, "Just a few words, old boy, and then you can go along your way. On my honor as a gentleman!"

Harley takes the grunt of noncommittal acknowledgement as some kind of approval, clearly, because he keeps trucking along. "It all seems confusing right now. Lord only knows, when Jo started piecing it all together when we were children, it knocked my poor noggin right off its axis! Took me years to believe her, but once I did - well. We've had decades to get used to the idea that we will be able to see our children again, but you and young Doctor Lalonde may need quite the lecture to catch you up on all the details.” Squeezes his shoulder. “There's no shame in not accepting everything we have to say, not yet. Skepticism is healthy! Keeps us on our toes!”

"Not interested." Shakes off the hand, and zips up the leather jacket, eyeballing the high sun in the sky to estimate if he can make Atlanta before nightfall. Starting to feel more detached again, losing that too-close, tense nervousness that makes his heartbeat immediate and unavoidable, drawing him too deeply into his own body until the dissociation stops.

Can't have that. Can't imagine how much worse it would be if his mind and his body were in sync again, if he felt everything all at once, with no delay to give him time to anticipate and deflect. Growing up had been hellish until he figured this shit out.

"I can't make you believe." Strokes the mustache again and looks up at the sky as well. Seems to be looking for something else, though, something that brings a wistful longing to his rugged old face. "Can't keep a chap when his will leads him elsewhere, either. But I can offer you something, and I'll ask you to promise me that you'll take it on faith that there are no strings attached. No obligation to me or Jo, if you take me up on this little offer."

"Mm?" He's listening.

"I'd like to offer you funding." Spreads his hands out wide in appeasement. "No, no, hear me out - my foundation is in the business of locating and encouraging the growth and development of promising young talents in the sciences and the thaumaturgic fields, and you've been on the list for some time - ever since your unique design style became recognizable." Claps him on the shoulder one last time, but thankfully doesn't try to hold him, or he'd have found himself short a hand, old man or not. "Hide it as much as you like, but you are an exemplary young man. And I believe in you."

Glances back at the cafe, through the window to where the two women are still sitting, barely visible through the blinds. Looks at old man Harley's face, and sees the beaming, bald-faced hope there, not pushing or forcing that belief onto him but certainly intended to inspire Ambrose to some kind of similar revelation.

He shakes his head.

Gets on his motorcycle.

And gets the everloving hell out of Lawrence.

- A year or so later, pretty much convinced that the whole thing was a hoax.

Jo was senile and babbling and her arm was some freaky shit, and that was all; the notes that mysteriously appear on his apartment door every few days get stacked in a corner of the kitchen, never to be read again. Harley's equally insane, but also funding some of Ambrose's cybernetic experiments, the ones he thought he'd never have the credit to get parts for, so all power to the crazy old grandpa who calls him on weekends and jovially tries to arrange meetings for tea until Ambrose hangs up on him. Lalonde was on a science bender over some theory with no basis in reality, easily swayed by her crazy ass mentor out of some badly misplaced student-teacher loyalty.

Or maybe the whole meeting was just one long, incredibly lucid drug trip, something extra in his last beer that night that hallucinated him to Kansas and back.

Throws himself into his work, lines up shifts at multiple clubs back to back, plays bouncer when all else fails, living off tap water and sick beats and pizza from last week. A new piercing through his eyebrow and a barbell in the left ear that hurts like a son of a bitch and oozes a little with infection for a week before settling the fuck down.

Starts watching the stars at night, sitting out on the roof in just boxers and muscle shirts and squinting up at the night sky with his shades off. Tries to justify it with strife practice but usually ends up just watching, broiling in the late August heat of an Atlanta summer that never knows when to quit.

There's never anything to see. Spaces between the stars loom dark and heavy, and when the quiet hits around three in the morning, broken only by barking dogs and the occasional specibus firing off in the distance, could swear he feels a murmur in his chest, an ache that shadows the regular, steady beat of his heart.

Don't like it at all. Leaves him dizzy and nauseous with nerves, stuff he hasn't felt since he shut down non-essential reactions at thirteen. Shit like this is what surprise heart attacks in your twenties are made of. But like fuck does he have insurance; last thing he needs is to wipe his savings just when he's reached some kind of self-sufficiency.

Throws away his resident's key to the roof and locks himself in, mixing breakbeat tracks and trying to decide if this newfangled garage house music coming out of the UK is shit or not, and ignoring the fact that the heart murmur has followed him inside.

Lalonde's note arrives in the mail a few weeks later, when the doubled heartbeat in his chest has started to genuinely worry him. Nearly dumps the vodka-scented envelope in the trash with the rest of the shit, but then reconsiders and tears it open over spring rolls and steamed dumplings from Chey's. The sparkly fuchsia ink is a dead giveaway.

_Dear Ambrose,_

_(Gags on a mouthful of chopped vegetables and pork when he reads that. Jesus fucking Christ.)_

Professor Joanna seems confident in your ability to locate your charge's arrival coordinates through sheer blind intuition. However, it has become increasingly clear to me that her level of instinctive comprehension of the rules in this Game that we play is not something that has been passed on to us, and to that end I have called on the assistance of an astrophysicist in James Harley's employ. My secondary degree, unfortunately, is still in progress, and it is only with his assistance that I have begun to track the interplanar vessels that we believe will bring the children through the Medium.

Dave's meteor will arrive on the third or fourth of December. According to the current trajectory, however, we estimate the meteor will strike somewhere in the greater Houston area. Though I currently live in Maine, I'm afraid that Rose is also coming down somewhere to the west of my location. If I were you, I would make arrangements to be in the vicinity, if you have not already. Best of luck, and try not to fret overmuch. Joanna seems confident in your capabilities as a guardian, and as long as she is here to guide us as custodians, I have no doubt that all will be well. If you have any doubts, my number is below.

_Watch the skies, Ambrose._

_Affectionately yours,_

_Doctor Rue Lalonde, Ph.D._

Dumps it in the trash.
Houston happens.

Hits on the third, like Lalonde predicted, but Ambrose is a shithead and delays himself again and again, until the undeniable pull drags him to Texas late the next morning. Street's been cordoned off by the police, but Ambrose blows right by them, darting through the shadows until he reaches the smoking crater where a record store used to be. Looks down and sees, with his stomach dropping out from under him, exactly what Jo and Harley and Lalonde all told him he would see.

A little kid stares up at him from the miniature crater. All beady red eyes and a mop of white blond hair and pudgy baby hands that wave and grasp at nothing, reaching for someone who's standing a few yards off and not coming any closer. Babbles wordlessly, a bubble of spit popping in the corner of its mouth, oblivious to the scorch marks and rubble that are all that's left of the building that used to sit here.

Not even a scratch on the kid.

There's also a dead horse with a pink heart tattooed on its scorched butt, but some things in life Ambrose has just learned not to ask stupid questions about.

There's a long moment where he almost walks away. Let the kid live some normal life, or however normal it would be ending up in the foster care system after turning up on a space rock; surely more normal than it would be with old granny paradox prophecies hanging over his head and a custodian like him.

But even he's not that worthless.

Or maybe he's just finally found his weakness.

Shoves a pair of pointy shades on the kid's face before it can blink, and pokes at it gingerly before picking it up under one arm. Kid latches onto him with a grip on his polo like a vise, like some kind of human koala, and buries its face in his side, so maybe he's managed to do something right.

Grabs the horse too, before he goes. Knows better than to let a choice tattooed rump like that go to waste. He's already rented a car because like fuck was he going to transport a kid anywhere on a motorcycle, so might as well make it worth the cold hard cash he shelled out for it.

He's not ready for this. A college dropout DJ with a GED who keeps swordkind lying on every available surface in a shitty apartment in a shitty neighborhood? Who in their right mind walks up to him and tells him he's going to be raising a kid.

Crazy people. Crazy people, that's who.

- A month later he's a wreck, and sick with his own uselessness.

Catches himself thinking about the kid as an it on multiple occasions and no, fuck no, that needs to stop.

Starts out terrified that he'll break Dave if he so much as handles him the wrong way, and ends up checking out parenting books from the library, snarling ferociously at the clerks who simper and coo at the baby clinging to his back in the new carrier. Tries to set up a schedule, but Dave still wakes him up at random, unscheduled hours of the morning to squirm and cry until he gets burped.

Loses count of how often Dave's fancy new heart bib saves the fucking day because Ambrose can use pretty much any bladekind on the planet with easy but he can't handle a goddamn bottle. Forgets to feed himself for a full week, dizzy and queasy every time he mixes up a bottle of formula and hopes to god that it doesn't make Dave sick.

Stops doing that after the second time he passes out on the bathroom floor and wakes up to Dave whimpering on the floor next to him, tugging at his hair and glasses with clumsy baby fingers. Has to spend an hour pacing around the tiny apartment, bouncing and rocking and murmuring stupid shit he tries not to think about until Dave calms down again.

...And sweet Jesus. Diapers.

And then Dave starts goddamn climbing shit, which is in none of these parenting books. Fucking ridiculous, is what it is, the exact opposite of what he needs right now, waking up in the middle of the night in a panic to find the kid crawling across the stovetop and dicking around with the controls, or sitting on top of the katana display on the wall seven feet above the ground. Most of the time he just keeps the kid close, one hand on his back while the kid contentedly gnaws on his shirt and climbs him like a jungle gym, vanishing from his elbow to his knee to the top of his head with gurgles of childish laughter.

They sleep on the same futon because cribs are expensive as shit, but Dave can be curled up sucking on a toe one second and halfway to the turntables the next, no matter how close an eye Ambrose keeps on him; ends up getting one of those kiddie leashes and strapping Dave in, even though they're made for kids who have grown enough to actually walk and he has to restitch the whole harness to make it fit. Keeps it looped on his wrist at all times, and they're fucking golden.

First time he shows up at a job with the kid in tow, pretty much convinced it'll be a shitshow. Owner cusses him out, screaming to be heard over the previous set, but the asshole currently at the helm is shitshow, so the big man boots him before the crowd can take off and lets Dave stay locked in the closed DJ booth with Ambrose the whole time while he salvages the show. Slides a pair of noise-cancelling headphones on the kid's head and keeps him on the leash until his four hour shift is over and, sweating, he can sprint Dave out before anyone can see him. Dave gums through at least one cord and disappears for a full thirty seconds before reappearing at the end of the leash, oblivious to the near heart attack he gives Ambrose every time he vanishes.

This is not the way a kid should be brought up. Doesn't take a genius to see the way he's already fucking Dave up, no matter how hard he tries to juggle work and the kid. Can't even imagine how much worse it'll get later on, when the kid grows up and hits puberty and has all those emotions that Ambrose trained himself not to deal with, a defense mechanism that went spiraling off the rails and left him like this.

Like fuck does he want Dave to turn out like him, broken and cold and flat, unable to smile when his own kid tries to play peekaboo. Everyday Dave takes more cues from him, laugh muted and smile barely more than an upturn of his mouth and a crinkle of his big red eyes behind shades.

Feels sick, feels sick, feels sick.

Can't do this. Can't watch this happen.

APC just started offering person to person text messaging this year, and everyone starts calling regular letters 'snail mail.' Signed up for that shit before he admitted that he was actually going to pick up the kid, waste of money that could have paid for more bright pink and pastel yellow baby onesies.

Not surprised when one of Lalonde's next letters mentions that she's experimenting with it, too.
Never called her, not once, but when the texts start blowing up his piece of shit Sprint phone he sees his chance. Lays Dave down for a nap, his little pair of outrageously awesome shades folded up nice on the table so they don't jab him in his sleep, and perches on the kitchen counter, at the end of the leash, to deal with this.

To get Dave out of here.

TG: And of course, Joanna is still waiting on hers. From what we can tell, young John is arriving far later than the others.
TT: mmmm
TG: Not that she's ever been worried about any of this. Would you believe that she mentored me all through my doctorate, and inspired me to take on the second degree, and never once let on that she had practical experience with all of the philosophy we were discussing?
TT: fucking fascinating

Would be a lot easier if Lalonde would just stop blathering about science and everyone's favorite psychic granny all the time. She treats the old lady more like some kind of spirit guide than a college professor.

TG: Still grumpy about the fact that she was correct all along?
TT: just saying, Lalonde, your mentor has a prankster's gambit a mile wide, and you didn't think she was lying to your face half the damn time? talk about naïve.
TG: Joanna is one of the few people who has managed to earn my absolute trust in this life. You of all people should understand how...difficult it is, trusting someone when you are one of those whose first instinctual response is to conceal your thoughts, and to remain aloof from the rest of the world.
TT: yeah, yeah, none of us can tell the truth straight out for love or money
TT: just means you've gone soft because of an old granny face
TT: doesn't mean she's actually trustworthy
TT: if she really had any of our best interests at heart, no way would she have left these kids with a pair of basket cases like us

There. Sweet redirect. Now maybe they'll get somewhere.

TG: I would like to think that for all our idiosyncrasies, we are not all that incompetent as new parents. It has only been a few weeks, Ambrose. Give it time.
TT: you've been charting your kid's growth and testing her for fucking ectobiological shit since day one, and i take the kid out to bars and clubs at night. yeah, we're fucking radical parents TG: They are not normal children; I'm only trying to determine how I will need to adapt to accommodate Rose's unique needs later in life. If you are insinuating that I would ever make my child the subject of a research study, you are sorely mistaken.
TT: just calling it like i see it, but at least you have your sicknasty house and shit to keep your lab baby in TT: you think a shitty hellhole like my apartment is any place to raise a kid
TT: what if I brought someone home to fuck and traumatized the kid TG: Somehow, I highly doubt a situation like that would ever occur. You may wish to dial back on the late night work, but aside from that you're perfectly capable of raising him without traumatizing him, surely.
TT: woman, you do not know shit about my life
TG: And anyone who knew you for more than a minute would know you're asexual, after all.

Regrets everything about this conversation.

Should have known nothing would go according to plan.
TT: shut up
TG: Why? It is true, no? Rather obvious, when one knows what to look for. Perhaps something on the grey spectrum, but you're certainly never going to try to "get some" where poor David would be in danger of overhearing, so your argument is moot.
TT: you know fuck all
TT: you know absolutely fuck all about me, you sanctimonious prick TG: That's not a no, darling.
TG: You didn't shower before you came to the cafe, you know. Lipstick on the hickie on your neck, beard burn but no lipstick all down your jaw, so congratulations on pulling two in one night, but you smelled of everything but sex. You're either a twenty two year old male with the self-restraint of a monk or a twenty two year old asexual still playing the field. And apparently, in denial.
TT: shut up
TT: just
TT: fucking hell, just take the kid
TT: if you already know, why the hell are we arguing about this Sicksicksicksick.

Dave needs better.

TG: Ambrose, you do know this is perfectly normal, correct? A lack of sexual attraction is just as viable as any other orientation. I myself have always personally leaned towards the aromantic side of things. This is not -
TT: shut up and get this kid into a normal living environment, Lalonde
TT: fuck, you want him in a house with something broken?
TT: get him out of my house, Lalonde, before I fuck up more than you can fix TG: Ambrose, you're not broken. Insecure about this to, apparently, the point of neuroticism, but there's nothing wrong with you.
TT: this isn't a fucking neurosis, Lalonde TT: this is me trying and spectacularly failing to be able to hold up my end of any kind of relationship, period
TT: first time this little shit comes to me looking for relationship advice, what do you think happens?
i don't do emotions. end of story
TG: I've been told puppets generally make for good demonstration tools.
TT: what
TT: ...puppets...
TT: okay, that's even more fucked up than anything I could come up with TG: Ambrose, this in no way impacts your ability to raise a child. Your sexual orientation has nothing to do with how you care for him, unless there's something rather significant you're not telling me about how you intend to raise him.
TT: like hell it does
TT: like growing up with a guardian that hates himself is fucking healthy
TT: he'll be fucking miserable, i'll make him miserable
TT: i'm not entirely sure how you missed the huge flashing neon sign, but that's what i do

She doesn't get it. Doesn't understand that this is a crack that runs too deep, a fundamental flaw in the thing that is Ambrose Strider. When they assembled him they left out the part that felt things.
Hasn't cared about anyone or anything in his life, foster family or friends or potential fuckbuddies, and why would Dave be an exception to the rule?

Kid deserves better that a guardian who doesn't have a fuck to give.
TG: Do you?
TT: what kind of fucking question is that TG: Have you ever raised a child before?
TT: god, fuck no
TG: Then how would you know? Give more of a shot than a month. Rose has been absolute darling so far, I can't imagine her brother would be anything less than positively adorable.
TG: Furthermore, on the subject of relationships, have you ever tried seeking out someone else uninterested in sex? I made myself miserable for years before realizing that the emotional connections that most of the population associated with sex did not appeal to me. Your situation is no different.
TT: just drop it
TT: will you take him or not TG: ...No. No, I will not.
TT: then why the hell are we still talking
TG: Ambrose?
TG: Ambrose, dear?
TG: Please, don't do anything rash.

Not sure he remembers kicking off the counter and striding over to the futon; just sort of finds himself sitting cross legged on the floor by Dave's head, eyes unfocused, fingers laced and hands clasped tight against his mouth while he struggles not to scream. Phone's flung across the room, vanishing behind a stack of PlayStation games and the Sega Saturn. Impact makes a loud enough sound that Dave snuffles awake with a tiny wail.

There's a reason he turned all this shit off. Hadn't been happy, hadn't been much of anything at all, but hadn't had to worry about hurting someone, either.

"Hey, little man," when Dave starts making breathy little noises, the ones that mean one of his rare crying fits is on the way. Kid is too quiet, but has been since the very start, so maybe that at least isn't something Ambrose needs to worry is his fault.

Sags forward a little to lean his elbow on the edge of the mattress, his chin on his palm as he offers a finger for Dave to seize in a diminutive fist. Even squeezing with all of his surprising baby strength, it's barely a faint pressure on his finger; just enough that Dave quiets again, trying to draw the digit toward his nubby gums. Kid's not even fucking teething yet, and he's still chewing everything in sight.

This is the kid who's supposed to grow up to save the world? He's toothless and stubby armed and gets colicky if he drinks too much formula in one sitting.

And the diapers.

Sighs, "What am I going to do with you, kiddo?"

Talking to Lalonde was a mistake he won't make again. Thinks he needs to work on that diaper changing robot just to get the harsh sting of being on the wrong end of a text beatdown out of his head. Gets him all warm and tingly inside, thinking about using Harley's funding for a robot in charge of diapers. Would be fucking rad.

Doesn't notice Dave's other hand wandering. Not until a pudgy finger hooks on the ring in his lower lip and yanks like a son of a bitch.

Suppressing reactions to pain is first nature by now, not second; he just sighs and shakes his head, reaching up to extricate his piercing from danger. His lip smart, but doesn't bleed. "You're gonna be a little shit," he informs the kid, weary and resigned and maybe smirking a little.
But damn, that hurt. Has happened more than a few times in the past, and that lip ring and the eyebrows tend to be Dave's favorite targets. Might have to lose them until the kid is old enough to understand no means no. He's like a fucking crow with shiny objects.

Or...

Inspiration strikes.

Okay, maybe Lalonde is a dead end. But the puppet thing gives him an idea.

The diaper robot doesn't pan out. Win some, lose some.

Lil Cal, on the other hand, is a rousing success.

And by rousing success, he means Dave is scared almost literally shitless of the thing in the first few days. Lil Cal is the shit. It is him.

Dug the thing out of some creepyass puppet thrift store halfway across the city. Strings are fucked and there's a spatter of something faded, green, and probably troll blood along the fabric of one plush leg, but he slaps the thing into some kind of working order, and lets his speed make up for the fact that he has no fucking clue how to work a puppetkind.

Seriously. No one in their right mind takes puppetkind classes to cover their PE requirement.

But it makes things...easier. Doesn't have to worry so much about hurting Dave if there's an extra intermediary between the two of them. Needs the distance, needs the space, because he can't be detached about Dave, and Ambrose has always needed to avoid things in one way or another.

If he can't stop loving this stupid baby, he needs the outlet of Lil Cal or he's gonna freak the fuck out. Dave needs him to not freak the fuck out, and at some point Dave's needs took priority over his own.

Eyes are creepier than the rest of the puppet, if that's possible, and he never takes his shades off around them.

Dave hates it, ducks the puppet when Ambrose uses it to try and feed him, flashes out of the highchair or the bathtub to cling to his head and bury his face in Ambrose's hair, covered in mashed carrots or suds depending on the situation, while Cal falls to the floor. Eventually works out a system where Dave will stop bawling his head off and - warily - let the puppet handle things half the time, and then Ambrose will stuff poor Lil Cal in the closet and delicately handle Dave on his own, sitting the kid in his lap while he bends over the coffee table and strifes his way through taxes and bills.

Gets even better when Dave actually starts teething, and can take out his utter terror by using his new teeth on puppet flesh in what the kid obviously feels is sweet, sweet vengeance. The approval Ambrose feels is ungodly.

Still texts Lalonde on rare occasion. Never get much farther than -

TT: will you take him now
TG: No.

- before he tosses the phone again.

But he knows he's screwed when, months later, Dave starts learning how to talk. That's the moment when the last of his emotional detachment shatters, and all that's left is the flimsy mask.

They're sitting on the futon and watching something incredibly stupid, and by stupid he means the Muppets because they're the only puppets on the planet Dave doesn't try to gnaw on sight in some twisted defense mechanism, and Ambrose is still trying to figure out just how puppets fucking work. He's only half serious about the puppetkind specibus, except okay yeah he's kind of disturbingly fascinated by it. Sometimes they play safe stuff on the N64, but Dave is in one of his climbing moods, restless and trying to grab every vaguely sharp object in the range of his leash, only ever sitting still when a bird Muppet shows up on screen.

The Whaddyasay Bird appears, bright red with floppy yellow feathers on its head and melancholy, half closed eyes, and Dave sits right the fuck up, watching avidly and totally engrossed in the twenty year old skit as a bunch of birds start hitting on each other. The 70s were a weird time. Rolling his eyes, he props open the robotics magazine he's been flipping through absently and turns the page.

A hand bats at his knee, but he doesn't look up until, "Bo!"

"Nnn?" he grunts, before he realizes what just happened. He looks down at Dave, but the kid hasn't looked away from the screen, just flopped down in a slump over his knee, eyes fixed on the television behind his righteous little shades.

"You say something, punk?" he wonders aloud, jiggling his knee so that Dave burbles with laughter, latching on with his usual death grip. "Sup?"

"Bo!"

It takes him a full five seconds to process the fact that yeah, it wasn't Lil Cal talking just then. Lil Cal can do a lot of things, but talking is hopefully not one of them. Ambrose blinks, and then slowly shuts the magazine, reaching down to grab Dave under the armpits and hold him up at arm's length. "What did you just say?" he asks, suspicious and frowning but also anxious as fuck.

"Bo!" Dave reaches out and plasters his hands across Ambrose's nose and shades, legs kicking for solid ground when he doesn't get put back down immediately.

This cannot be happening. "Ambrose," he says, his stupid heart beating with the extra murmur fluttering along in the background. "Come on, how hard can extra syllables be, right? Can you say that? Ambrose."

"Bo!" Dave insists, lips twisting down out of their usual flat line, patting at him with another hand. "Bo!"

"I - fuck. Bro?" he says, helpless, because his kid is saying his first word and - "Bo! Bo!" Dave grabs his hair and yanks, crowing with delight.

Well. Shit.

He ducks his head and rests his chin on the kid's head. "That's right," he says, quiet and slow because his chest feels too tight to breathe. "I'm your Bro."

- TT: well
- TT: i hope you're fucking happy
- TT: the little shit has grown on me and now i think i'm attached
TT: you said Rose still wasn't talking, right. well surprise, Lalonde. it's obvious now. i have the smart one
TT: shit he's precious as fuck, what have you done to me, woman
TT: i am going to raise this little sucker into a total badass
TT: ...
TT: Lalonde?
TG: Ambrose.
TG: Joanna is dead.

He realizes, later on, that that's when Rue Lalonde begins to break.

When she shows up at his door three years later, it's already started, and after that, it's like they can't stop fucking up.

And he never did hear half of the shit Jo knew, real or not. Games and frogs and shit – he doesn’t know enough to explain it to anyone else.

Just enough that he'd give anything not to have to watch Dave go through it again.

God, he hopes he doesn't fuck this up.

Chapter End Notes

On one side we have Aradia. On the other, we have cue balls with minds of their own.

Well. If I were a betting man…I certainly wouldn’t bet against her.

All in all, probably the weakest chapter I’ve ever written, ever. Probably for the best if we just move along the Chapter 17 and pretend none of this mess ever happened.

Everyone knows everything they need to know for now, yay expository flashbacks, let's never repeat this experience ever again.

I was serious when I said AU, bro. We are officially in extreme Homestuck canon divergence territory. This is all immensely confusing for everyone involved, so feel free to ask questions at my tumblr and if it doesn't spoil too much, I'll try to clarify things – but there’s a lot of potential spoilers, so I’m gonna play these cards very close to the chest for a while yet.
Strange Weathers

Chapter Summary

And underfoot the heavy hour strews dust,
And overhead strange weathers burn and bite;
And where the red was, lo the bloodless white,
And where truth was, the likeness of a liar,
And where day was, the likeness of the night.

ARC VI - COMPULSION

John asks Doctor Lalonde's permission before leaving the laboratory to fly.

He doesn't ask his dad.

Which ordinarily would have been the first thing John would do in any situation involving his powers, as Karkat has come to learn, and that's when Karkat grudgingly admits that he's going to need to pull an fucking intervention because his moirail has just managed to hit new levels of dumbassery. As if they haven't had enough of this shit over the past few days.

Dave had heard 'flying' and turned vaguely green, which Karkat interprets as a Strider warning sign that an evacuation of one's breakfast into the nearest load gaper is imminent. Jade is tearing up an entire research lab she's commandeered for her own sick, sick experiments, trying to teach herself Rue Lalonde's paradigm and the science behind it in the space of a day so she can convince the Querent to let her finagle around with the Hub to improve it. Kanaya was last spotted hunting for Rose's chosen sulking niche in order to drag her outside for some fresh air, with minimal success.

So it's just Karkat and the bird Strider who end up sitting outside while John messes around with the wind. Which is inconvenient, but the orange Dave is just a fraction more tolerable than the original by virtue of having not been raised a Strider, so it's not as bad as it could have been. Karkat is tempted to ask why the fuck he's not up there flying when, according to regular Dave who is somehow an expert on bird-human anatomy, his wings are working fine, but then a surging gust of wind nearly flattens a copse of pine trees to the ground and he can put two and two together and get that John isn't exactly conducive to anyone else flying when he's in a mood like this. Heck, Karkat doesn't even want to fly when John's like this. There's a reason he's on the ground, and it's not that he's still nursing sore ribs of dubious structural integrity.

Now he's just waiting for the opportune moment to implement Operation God Fucking Dammit John Egbert You Speak To Your Father This Instant Or So Help Me. Since he wants to interact with Oriole as little as possible and Oriole seems content to perch on a boulder a few yards away and stare up at the sky, watching John do loop-de-loops, Karkat whiles the time away by tearing up fistfuls of grass and thinking up a better operation tagline because that was just...wow. There are no fucking words, really. It's reached the point where he can't even think up two words that would easily combine into one, and really, what is a sad sack like Karkat worth if he can't even smash words together to make hilariously stupid and comically morbid portmanteaus?

They’ve talked about the recording from yesterday as much as John seems willing – or even able – to talk. It’s mostly been just mutual silence and understanding, which makes it hard to gauge exactly how much John remembers of that overwritten previous life. But John’s brain has stopped resetting itself every time the subject gets mentioned, and Karkat figures that enough progress for one week.

The sky's still overcast today, and the valley they're in is elevated enough that the clouds seem closer than usual, low-hanging and stagnantly grey, with wispy trails trailing off through the thin air where John whips through the cloud cover in his antics. They're bruised and angry enough that Karkat thinks rain is overdue, but the potential never quite pans out. The surface of the lake occasionally dips and judders outward in shaky ripples when John comes close to the ground, but when it's still the water appears to have all the depth of a silver coin. When John is absent or higher up in the sky, the air close to the ground goes oddly still, like there's a pair of cosmic lungs out there with the breath knocked out of them that haven't quite managed to get the hang of breathing again, and the puffs of Karkat's breath sound harsh in his ears compared to the utter stillness.

Even as he thinks that, a sharp, tiny sting on the side of his neck startles him, and Karkat slaps the spot on impulse, grimacing when he pulls his hand away to reveal the crushed wings and thorax of a tiny mosquito. It's easy enough to rub a thumb claw over the tiny bite and filter the mosquito saliva out of his system, but by the time he's convinced the histamines in his bloodstream to calm the fuck down and stop trying to react to foreign material that's not even there anymore, another mosquito has started buzzing around his horns.

"Okay, yeah, no, I'm out of here," Oriole says, his voice edged with a hoarse screech, and Karkat glares at him only to see the orange-tinted human fluffing the feathers of his wings out, looking distinctly miserable over the rims of his sunglasses. At least five mosquitoes have decided that bird kid is on the menu for the day. "You know, this shit is why I was fine with leaving Houston. Houston is a fucking hell hole this time of year, but look at this."

"I've lived here my entire fucking life, and yeah, it's finally spring so welcome back to the pit," Karkat says unsympathetically, standing up and pulling his hood over his head, trying to ward off any more bites. "That lake is probably the mosquito equivalent of the incestuous slurry itself."

"Jesus." It's surreal watching Dave Strider's features rearrange themselves into a very obvious glower of resignation when it's not actually the douchebag himself. "Should we call him down or something?"

"He probably hasn't even noticed, that lucky moron. Just go," Karkat says, shrugging dismissively. He doesn't care enough to see what Oriole does next; he trudges further out into the field instead, kicking clods of dirt and rocks out of his path as he squints up at the sky and tries to figure out where John will swing out of the clouds next.

This is why he completely fails to notice the rock that beats him. He knows he's fucked up when his toe slams into something way more solid than he was expecting, jamming his claw, and his ribs give him all of three fucking seconds' warning as he trips to inform him that on no uncertain terms were they willing to help him land gracefully. It's just not on the fucking agenda today. He tries to roll anyway because he's trained for painful landings, but the most he can manage is a wonky, one-shouldered somersault before his torso cramps up with pain and he flops out onto his side, snarling as he tears up a hank of long grass and sheds it. In the distance, he thinks he hears the distinct sound of sniggering, tainted by the occasional unmistakable 'caw,' and welp, that's it, any hope of ever establishing an armistice with the lone halfway tolerable member of the Strider clan just died along with the last of Karkat's dignity. It was a dim hope anyway, one best relegated to the dusty mental closet reserved for shitty dreams like the thought of ever not being culled on sight if his hemotype were outed, or the completely crackpanned notion of becoming a hero and meeting Heir and becoming his partner and -

Wait.

Irritated, Karkat rolls over onto his back with a huff and cups his hands around his mouth to shout, "JOHN. YOU COMPLETE AND UTTER SHITHEAD, STOP DICKING AROUND WITH CLOUD ART AND PREPARE TO MEET YOUR MAKER." Satisfied that John will be listening for some kind of shout, Karkat scratches behind his ear and then folds his arms over his chest as he contemplates the strenuous ordeal that is sitting up.

He cautiously wants to say that shouting is easier these days, so maybe Spades didn't pull all that healing nonsense out of his ass after all. He doesn't get dizzy from the pain when he has to deal with stairs anymore, either, but so far there's been no opportunity to ask if anyone in this facility is capable of operating an x-ray machine to take a look. Everyone here is either shell-shocked, insane, annoying, intimidating, recovering from being stabbed, or Harley, and Karkat trusts exactly none of those potential candidates with the grand task of performing the first professional x-ray he'll have ever received, ever.

Anyway. Karkat's usual bundle of ongoing issues aside, the wind picks up a little as he finally hauls himself upright. By the time he's warily glared at the miniature fucking boulder responsible for his fall in the first place and thus established his inherent superiority over it by virtue of being a sentient living being capable of glaring in the first place, John in full Heir uniform drops out of the sky, half-assing the landing with a series of three huge bounces before he skids to a halt in front of Karkat, grinning and pulling up his goggles.

Because John is an idiot. Seriously, he's lucky Karkat fucking adores him because otherwise Karkat could never let the kid live this uniform business down. They're literally in the middle of a valley so slathered in weird science protection that no one can approach it unguided without clearance, and John is still worried about random ass hikers witnessing a flying human being and somehow putting two and two together.

(It's weird, looking at Heir's hero uniform, now that Karkat has seen what the Heir of Breath looked like in a past life. Even fighting for his life against a flying hellbeast, that young John had been a bright scrap of blue fabric, his blue windsock of a hood tossing in a constant, sprightly breeze. In comparison, Heir is dark teals and steely greys, as though someone took that brightness and smeared soot all over it, and the moment he touches down the wind flattens out again, artificially dampened by a need for secrecy that John shouldn't even be worrying about up here in the middle of nowhere.

Objectively, Karkat knows Heir wears toned down colors because waltzing around dark alleys in sky-blue pajamas would get him knifed in a heartbeat. It's just common sense for heroes who work mostly at night to try to blend in. You get your whackjobs like Cascade or Nymph or whatever the fuck she's calling herself these days who like publicity and wear freaking designer costumes in shades too close to their blood color, and the Puppeteer and Flashstep who are just fucking morons, but they're the incredibly stupid exceptions, not the rule.

But knowing what he knows about John, about all the shit going on in the dumbass's scrambled 'pan, Karkat can't quite keep his own shitty, leaky excuse for a thinkpan from wondering - if Rose and Dave and Jade made it out with their costumes that more or less tend to match the color scheme of their godselfs, what does it mean that John, who might remember the most out of all of them, takes one look at Kanaya's vivid, colorful schemes to redesign everyone's costumes personally and nyooms out of the room faster than you can say 'depressive episode'?

It's not a happy thought.)

Karkat rolls his eyes and reaches out, yanking down John's mask for him before he can get confused about who he's talking to. Unbelievable, how an action that would have been unthinkable not a week ago - unmasking Heir - is now just common sense. He doesn't miss how John's eyes flicker, his front teeth stealing out to tug on his lower lip in consternation before the ingrained paranoia settles down. Neither of them is used to this.

Karkat starts with a disconcertingly unrelated topic; all the better to set John at ease, and prevent him from redirecting the conversation himself. "So is it going to rain, or have you fucked around with the clouds like an uncaring god long enough that there's a drought in Portland and a hurricane making its way down to Kansas?"

The weather. Always a classic opener.

But oh, fucking hell. Maybe Karkat should ease back on the god comments and the intimations of cosmic injustice that always come so easily to him, because now there's a whole metric fuckton of baggage involved whenever gods get mentioned that he doesn't think anyone in their right mind is willing to question right now.

"I'm not a weatherman, Karkat -" John starts, clearly trying to laugh it off, and then snaps his mouth shut, considering the clouds with a curious look. "But I don't think so, no. The regular wind doesn't feel right. And those clouds are pretty thin once you're past the lower layers."

And that's not weird at all. You know. One's moirail being a living barometer. Nope. Totally normal.

"If I ever walk out the door without an umbrella when I'm going to need one later in the day, I'm revoking all of your goddamn snuggle privileges. All of them," Karkat says, shaking his head. "Those are my terms."

"Not even on April Foo-shutting up now," John corrects himself halfway through. Karkat can only imagine his evil eye is working better now than ever before. He's been practicing in the mirror since he was ten goddamn years old, and it's about time all that training started to pay off.

He's going to need all the leverage he can get for this conversation. Because when John starts avoiding something, it's like pulling teeth without anesthetic with Dave Strider acting as your assistant nurse - a game where the points don't count, the stink of remorse hangs in the air like a sick, sick perfume, everyone's ankle-deep in a pool of apple juice, and the operating tools have been replaced with bendy straws. If what Karkat suspects is correct, John’s refusal to remember Skaia or the game and all the shit they tried to discuss last week that was kind of critically important was most likely the fucking culmination of apparently a lifetime’s worth of extreme avoidance.

But there are no Striders or Harleys within a twenty foot radius, so hopefully Karkat can pull this off without something else incredibly stupid happening or a flock of annoying humans flying out of the building for an illicit John-pile in the middle of a meadow. He gets that for all of them it's not a romantic thing, but he thinks he might have chipped a back molar grinding his teeth whenever someone else touched John these past couple days. It's like having back-seat shooshpappers flailing at your face when you're busy trying to keep your carwreck of a moirail from bursting into flames and catapulting off the nearest cliff.

If only Karkat's thinkpan would stop nagging him -

_Shut up_, he thinks at his brain, with the kind of Karkat Vantas-patented circular self-loathing that would no doubt give lesser beings a headache, and he focuses on the task at hand. Said task is now code-named Operation Filiultimatum, and it is a go.

"Anyway, I've been thinking, and maybe this whole situation isn't all that unmanageable," John is currently chattering, bobbing up and down in the air so that Karkat has to nod his head up and down to keep up with where John's face is at any given moment. That gets really old, really fast, and Karkat has to reach out and drag his moirail down by the shoulder to get him to keep his feet on the ground. He has the decency to look sheepish about it, but he keeps talking regardless. "I'm so frustrated about having to let any criminal activity go unpunished, but with the way all of this going we might need a lot of time to plan how to deal with the entire Midnight Crew at once anyway.

"Fuck that, I'm fucking peachy. Never better," Karkat snaps, shifting a little and ignoring the burn in his ribs. "I'll be back on the job when you are, because" - he holds up a claw when John opens his flap to argue - "because the last time you went out without me, everything went bugfuck insane. We're partners and as of now you're fucking attached to my miraculously unbroken hip because clearly I'm the only thing standing between you and a fucking full-fledged heroic catastrophe of a scale only a pair of imbeciles like Harley and Dave could enable."

He pauses. John stares, looking dazed but attentive, which is generally his default state when Karkat starts really ranting. So at least Karkat's got his attention. Karkat swats away another mosquito that comes cruising in to sample his candy blood, and goes on. "You're welcome. Anyway, I'm so sick of talking about the Crew and the game shit right now. John, you've been avoiding your custodian. Explain."

To his credit, John doesn't pretend not to know what Karkat's talking about. He does hit the ground, hard, his feet almost rooting themselves into the dirt as he ducks his head, rubbing the back of his neck sheepishly. "Do I have to?" John asks, and Karkat utilizes an incredibly effective raised eyebrow to get his point across. "Yeah, I think he's mad at me. So I'm just trying to put that off as long as possible."

…It's like trying to pull teeth, but the teeth are also coated in grease and Harley's in charge of teleporting them around at random, on top of everything else. "Your father is the most ridiculously supportive parental unit in the history of the human race. I mean, I could see him transforming into a raging strifebeast to beat the shit out of anyone who might hurt you because that's what custodians do, but if this is still about the Droog bugfuckery, he wouldn't blame you for that. Try again."

John fiddles with one of the buckles of his uniform, sighing. "If I promise to go talk to him right away, will that work?" John says weakly, his gaze finally darting up to meet Karkat's with a kind of weary resignation. "It's - some old stuff, and some new stuff, and it's kind of complicated."

Karkat nods. "Fuck, John, yes. I'm not micromanaging your relationship with your custodian - just don't let this eat at you until it becomes something I have to stick my grubby claws into to sort everything out in your charmingly dumb thinkpan. I just want you to be sane and happy, you utterly pathetic moron, he thinks but doesn't say. He can't always get what he wants, but when he pats John's cheek and the human's face lights up with a crooked, dorky grin, he likes what he has just fine. There's a warm fuzzy thing purring in his chest in the exact spot where a tight coil of nausea took up residence all day yesterday, and he may or may not feel the contented hum rise up from his chest into his throat when John ducks his head and knocks their foreheads together.

Probably the temporary moirailing buzz. Probably the lingering suggestion planted a few days ago by Dave, who is the absolute last person on the planet Karkat wants to be thinking about right now. Probably the fact that Karkat's blood feels like it's been injected with granules of sugar, slow and sluggish and so very pacified by the hormonal build up of several days' worth of him and John jamming and shooshing pretty much nonstop. He's still twitchy when other people are around, but right now he's almost fucking mellow as long as John's nearby.

Probably he's just overdue for a potentially major fuck up. Because that's what Karkat does. He fucks up.

But it doesn't feel like a potentially major fuck up to Karkat's thoroughly soothed, shitsponge excuse for a brain. He's already got a hand cupping John's cheek, the fragile human epidermis soft and achingly vulnerable under his claws, so why not tip forward on his toes and kiss John? His lips are dry and chapped and cool, and Karkat rubs a claw over John's suddenly jittery pulse point under his jaw until he relaxes again.

He's definitely purring now, a distinct, clicking rumble that doesn't quite stop when he pulls away from John. Karkat swallows the noise down with supreme effort, because the last thing he needs is for someone to pop up out of the woodwork and witness him acting like a vomit-inducingly sickly sweet, pap-happy teenager. That would just be fucking mortifying, and he'd have to ritually execute the witness in question in the name of his non-existent family honor, and then John would lose his shit over having to help hide the body -

"You kissed me," John blurts out, which is a nice segue point for Karkat's increasingly morbid train of thought.

"Obviously," he replies. John looks absolutely bewildered, a look which he manages to pull off only by taking on the demeanor and glassy stare of a deer in the headlights.

"I - uh," John says, coughing a little and - is he blushing? Holy fuck, he is. "I didn't know kissing was. Uh. A thing we did. Yeah."

That's about when Karkat's thinkpan catches up with the rest of him with all the misdirected force of middling-sized trunkbeast ramming into a baby buggy and reminds him that, oh yeah, his moirail is human. They need this kind of basic shit spoon-fed to them occasionally, or else they risk getting their romantically deficient wires crossed and proceed to slam across quadrants with all the finesse of thirteen-year-old wrigglers on a vacillation-kink bender. John is normally good about this kind of thing by virtue of the fact that Karkat has granted him a second-hand education on the intricacies of troll romance films, but he's still human. And also, he's John, so Karkat needs to remember at all times that he's dealing with someone who once related the apparently amusing anecdote of attempting to discuss quadrants with Rose and becoming baffled by the fact that there were four of them. As though that wasn't fucking implied by the word 'quadrant' -

John is a...very special human being, sometimes. If Karkat didn't find him irredeemably endearing, he's pretty sure the only other way to feel would be a futile irritation of universe-breaking proportions. Wouldn't that be fucking bizarre.

Whatever. Fuck. Play it cool. Cooler than a sack of polarbeast lusus shit in a refrigerator somewhere in East Antarctica. If there was any time in his life Karkat desperately needs to channel the eminently suave yet charmingly low-key conciliatory swagger of troll Will Smith, now is that time. "Do you not want it to be?" he asks, resisting the incredibly powerful urge to hightail it out of this potentially disastrous conversation and strangle Dave Strider for being the one to bring up sloppy pale makeouts. "Fuck. If that's too close to the human flushed quadrant for you, I'll nix it. We have that power, John," he adds, rolling his eyes. "The incredible power of mutually making informed decisions about what's okay and what's not in this noirallegiance. Amazing, I know."

John's voice cracks. It's fucking adorable. "I am - not opposed?"

Wow, that wasn't questionable as fuck at all. "Are you sure?" Karkat asks, inching a hand to John's elbow and yanking him down onto the ground, because the human's once again started floating high enough off the ground that Karkat has to crank his head back to keep up a line of sight. "Or is this going to become a remarkable unfunny shitshow waiting to happen?"

"N-no, it's fine!" John says, spluttering and nodding almost violently. He has the weirdest look on his face, and for John Egbert, master of the strange, quirky, and downright dumb, that's a fucking accomplishment. "Seriously! I just - no, yeah, kissing is totally fine!" His voice squeaks again on the second 'i' in kissing, a spectacular display of the human vocal cord range that Karkat hasn't heard John produce since the very start of their friendship. "I was just surprised!"

"Good," he huffs, squinting at John for a moment before deciding that yeah, he believes it, no matter how squeaky John sounds. Karkat's still dubious, but John's not all that good at lying.

...Well. You know, about things that aren't, apparently, an entire double life of secret hero work. Maybe that's the secret of both of their mutual idiocy where that whole bulgechafing identity debacle was concerned - neither of them can lie for shit about anything else because they dedicated all of their limited prevarigambit to that single aspect of their lives.

That makes way more sense than it should. He's going to stop thinking about it. Starting right the fuck now. "Shhhhh," he hushes when his sense of John's pulse keeps jumping a little at irregular intervals. He plays it safe by carding his claws through John's hair instead of kissing him again. When John gives a tiny sigh and tilts his head back into the scratches, eyes closing, Karkat knows he's soothed whatever weirdness he might have stirred up by moving too fast. "Now, come on. I'm getting eaten alive by hemoist mosquitos."

"Mosquitos?" John says, glancing around. There's not even a hint of a defensive breeze whipping around him that might explain the pan-blowing lack of mosquitoes in his vicinity. "What mosquitoes?"

"Alright, they're fucking racists, too, chalk that one up for the record," Karkat growls, seizing a clawful of John's uniform and dragging him back toward the lab. "Only interested in mutant non-human blood. That's just despicable. How the fuck am I supposed to properly despise the bird freak if we have to work together to abhor the mosquito menace with a unified front?"

"You could just not despise him," John says dryly, a shit-eating grin starting to spread across his face as he bounces up over the asshole boulder that tripped Karkat earlier. "...I'm gonna tell him."

"Don't you fucking dare."

Talking to Kanaya hurts more than Karkat would like to admit, and he's not entirely sure why. He feels like a worthless, bulgescratching, extremely underdressed bumpkin around her casual elegance, but it's more than that; it's that when he catches her eyes for even a moment, he's flooded with the utter certainty that he knows her - but there's no corresponding recognition on her end. Not even the faintest glimmer of it.
It reminds him of phantom limbs, of people whose cracked up thinkpans keep imagining they feel sensations like itching or pain from a hand or a leg that's been amputated. Except in this case, it's not a missing limb but a relationship that he's never had, except maybe in some past life, so he has all of the nostalgic agony and none of the fond memories of ever having been friends with Kanaya.

And Kanaya is the first person Karkat hears who expresses doubt about everything that they saw yesterday.

"Not all of us have the luxury of having prophetic dreams, Karkat," she says stiffly when he asks why, peering around a corner as though expecting her matesprit to spring up from beneath the floor at any moment. "For all of you, those recordings were a confirmation of a long-standing theory, and you seem to possess personal experiences to back it up. But I saw nothing but poorly contrived nonsense, and the senseless, repeated murder of human children. I am not an expert of technology, but I know such things are easily faked in this day and age. In addition, it has also gravely upset Rose, and I am disinclined to put any weight in the theory of past universes for that reason alone."

With that, she strides off down the corridor, the train of her dusky blue gown flaring behind her. Karkat has to jog to keep up, pressing a claw to his side to keep his ribcage from protesting as he follows her past a clear glass wall that reveals a lab full of strange plants in various stages of overgrowth. They're deep in the section of the lab that's mostly been left to its own automated devices, and even as they walk by a set of overhead sprinklers switch on and begin misting the plants.

Said plants shifts and rustle way fucking more than any plant has any right to do, and Karkat picks up the pace until he's once again matching strides with Kanaya.

Even walking apace with her feels normal. Just based on what Karkat knows about the Malachite Sylph, he knows she's good in a fight, but it runs deeper than that - a kind of baseless faith that if it came down to the wire, Kanaya Maryam is someone Karkat would trust with his life. With John's life, even.

And of course, because Karkat is Karkat and the only fits of spastic eloquence he's ever been able to articulate in the history of his miserable existence are raving tirades concerning hate, the universe, and everything, he can't seem to find the words that would communicate that innate trust without giving Kanaya the impression that Karkat's a fucking creep. "I guess that's pretty fucking fair," he admits, scuffing his shoe against the floor and stuffing his claws into the pockets of his hoodie. There's a hole in the lining that he's wormed his claw through slow erosion over the years, and yeah, okay, maybe he's going to have to invest in new clothes at some point in the future because Kanaya observes him with assessing jade green eyes and he can practically feel the judgment as a palpable shudder. "Keeping your options open. You can probably reserve the right to call us all gullible pricks if it turns out the Queens are just dicking around with us." He pauses, but no reply is forthcoming. "In fact, I'd probably be personally disappointed if you didn't call us out. If I thought back on events knowing all that shit went down without having weird blood visions about it, I would probably not want to believe it, either."

"I find it puzzling that you are so tenacious in attempting to broach a conversation with me," Kanaya interrupts before Karkat can launch into another topic in this one-troll halftime show. "We don't know each other personally. In a matter of days, Rose and I could return to Philadelphia, and we may never see each other again. May I ask why?" She then lifts her nose, nostrils flaring, and then turns her luminescent eyes down another dark corridor with a faint growl of irritation. If she thinks she whispers, "Damnit, Rose," quietly enough that Karkat won't pick up on it, she's wrong.

Because I fucking miss you, he tactfully doesn't blurt out. "I don't know, because you're the only other troll here?" he says acerbically, shrugging his shoulders. "I figured, hey, maybe we should have some kind of solidarity here. These assholes will drive us shithive maggots if we don't."

"Really? I find most of them rather pleasant. Even if they are all acting, as you would say, like 'gullible pricks,'" Kanaya observes. Abruptly, she skids to a halt, slams a claw out in front of Karkat, and yanks open the door to his right with such force that Karkat whimpers in sympathy for the hinges. He peeks in with her, but can't make out anything in the room but rows of stacked chairs. He thinks it's a storage room. Kanaya huffs and closes the door with considerably less force before continuing. "The small Dersite in particular is a paragon of charm, when he is not making crude gestures at Dave's instigation."

"You can understand all that slackjawed clawflapping?" Karkat says, raising both eyebrows. "I thought Dave was just fucking around like the asshat he is."

"Some of the signs they must have picked up from military standard hand signals. The small one spent a good two minutes informing me quite emphatically that I needed to traverse right and cease firing." Kanaya kicks out a foot and knocks a door open to reveal a very empty kitchenette/lounge area. "Shit!"

Karkat figures bringing up the very strange qualities of Kanaya's pulse wouldn't be safe ground just yet. But by Karkat's logic, Rose is important to John who is important to Karkat, and thus discussing whatever weirdness has led to Kanaya attempting to locate a very missing matesprit in the bowels of Lalonde Laboratories is totally within the bounds of reason. "How did the Seer of Light and the Malachite Sylph meet, anyway?" he asks, closing the door to the lounge when Kanaya stalks off without doing so. "Just proximity?"

Kanaya sighs.

The main plan seems to be to not worry like a heap of fussy taintchafing shit-for-brains about all the game nonsense that went on in some fucked up prior version of their universe.

For one thing, it's literally impossible to do anything about what shitfuckery went down back then. The past is in the past, and as long as they make every conceivable effort not to recreate the absolutely mindnumbing display of unfathomable stupidity performed by those four human idiots, they should at least be able to avoid the more obvious pitfalls. No talking to cue balls. No talking to hideous elder gods the side of planets. No talking to wolf-carapacian-crow-harlequin hybrids. No talking in general.

Karkat is very pro-shut-the-fuck-up at the moment. It's a pretty sound strategy, to his mind. So many problems could be solved if no one talked to anything even vaguely non-human/troll/carapacian, and even some of the carapacians are on thin ice as far as he's concerned. He commandeers a rolling whiteboard or three from a incomprehensibly bemused Doctor Lalonde and makes goddamn charts documenting this shit so no one - absolutely fucking no one - can claim they were too squicked out by the idea of rewatching that horror show to know what not to do.

He rewatches it. It's not so bad once he communicates the idea of a fast-forward button to the Querent, and he knows when all the gory parts are so he can clip past them. He inspects it with the obsessive eye of someone used to overanalyzing the poor continuity of comic books and the subtle hints of multi-quadrant romantic dramas, and he plots out the sequence of events as best he can, even when the intervention of Dave's past and future selves turns into a complete shitstravaganza.

Within minutes, Dave has rolled past the whiteboards on a space-driven rolley chair with an eraser in one hand and a marker in the other, and from that moment on the human dick drawings flow like shitty, shitty wine. If Karkat turns his back on the charts and timelines for even a hot fucking second, he'll turn around moments later to find an ironically awful dick intersecting with the Derse timeline. It takes him even longer to catch the random bonebulge hidden in the Horrorterror timeline because of all the pre-existing tentacle diagrams on that whiteboard that serve as camouflage, and Karkat nearly cusses himself senseless in the corner when he sees it at last. When Karkat attempts to take the asshole down a peg by shouting at him in front of everyone and their custodians, Dave just raises an eyebrow and blames it on a future him. Harley whistles and makes some excuse about her space powers not working right anyway, so it couldn't possibly have been her moving the chair around. A likely story.

Whatever. The immediate fucking concern is dealing with the Midnight Crew and Doc Scratch before those assholes can pull off - well, whatever the fuck they're trying to pull off. The Querent, or the Queen or the whatever fucking title she's going by on a given day, is adamant that it's all some massive sabotage strategy, and that by dicking around with John's secret identity, Diamonds can ensure that John's too on edge to do anything about whatever potentially world-ending plans might be going on in Seattle. There'd been something about the other three humans, but Karkat's priority here is John, okay? Trying to handle all their issues at the same time would be fucking impossible.

Just. Let there be a general assumption that taking down the massive goddamn criminal enterprise staring them all in the face would be a good thing for everyone involved. As long as that keeps everyone working together toward a common cause and no one goes completely shithive maggots, Karkat thinks that they might be able to pull this off, even if he has to lasso Harley and handcuff her to Rose to keep her from bouncing off to visit New Zealand on a whim. If John's continued membership in the club of people who are alive and sane depends on Karkat leading these assholes around by the nose, Dave and Harley had better prepare themselves for nose piercings because they're the repeat offenders most likely to do incredibly stupid shit because they think it's funny or interesting or, god forbid, scientific.

And if he can somehow figure out who these other troll players might have been along the way, with or without Kanaya's help, all the better.

It would just a whole fucking lot easier if his most significant potential informant would stop creeping around the labs like a fugitive. Dave has been giving the subject of the Black Queen a wide berth ever since he thought she murdered an alternate version of himself, and even the realization that she'd just kind of encouraged the morbidly suicidal heroics that the Game seems to require for its players to make any damn progress hasn't lessened his wariness.

But while Karkat can't say that he's not terrified of Spades Slick - the man is a walking temper tantrum with a knife fetish, who in their right mind isn't terrified of that? - at least he can say that the alien has been weirdly helpful. Sure, Karkat had been lacking the basic context needed to understand a word out of the maniac's mouth, but nowadays he's a different troll. One who's sat through a private screening of the most disturbingly violent excuse for a video game ever played, witnessed his moirail die multiple times, and emerged on the other side with his puzzle sponge reduced to a whimpering, pathetic wreck.

But hey. Now he has all the more motivation to get his shit together and try to find a solution. Kanaya might be doing her level best to play the skeptic card and stay aloof from all the nonsense going on, but Karkat's got too much at stake here to let the humans in the party go and fuck everyone on the planet over.

Unfortunately, tracking down Spades sounds easier than it is. After a few hours of pointlessly wandering around the labs trying to find the asshole, Karkat comes to the stunning conclusion that all the previous times he's dealt with Spades had been instigated by the carapacian, not the other way around. He still has that black-on-black business card in his backpack somewhere - fat lot of good that would do him in locating this piece of shit alien - and is beginning to wonder if the Black Queen eventually managed to find Spades, or if the two of them are just wandering around in circles like a pair of sad sacks while Spades stabs holes in someone halfway across the state.

It's not until he gets back to the lobby that the Querent decides to pipe up and inform him that the Black Queen found Spades several hours ago, but that We should probably give them some privacy while they work some things out.

Of course, it just figures that by the time either of those two alien bilgespewers show their ugly mugs, they've apparently taken out an entire lab in one of the parts of the facility that have been closed up and shut off due to an absence of scientists to make use of it.

Worse, since Karkat has the most spectacular luck in all fucking universes, when Spades finally slinks the carapacian sports a ring of triangular chip marks all around his mouth where the shell has only just scabbed over, limps very obviously as he skulks into the room, and has a ragged slash down the front of his tacky knitted sweater where someone ripped the fabric apart with their bare claws.
The tattered, cheap black suit underneath it isn't in much better condition, and has been buttoned out of order.

Oh my god. "I've been looking for you for fucking ages, and you've been off getting laid?!!" Karkat says, horrified.

Spades grins as he saunters up and flops down on the couch opposite. His sharp-toothed grin is missing a tooth, and there's a spiderweb of cracks rippling out from a small dent around his eye, the carapacian equivalent of a black eye. Jesus.

SS: Hell yeah, kid.

SS: When the dame yah hate most in the world hates you enough to restart a black fling - yah don't say no to that shit.

SS: There's a life lesson for yah. Don't say I never did nothing for you, kid.

Karkat buries his face in his hands. Because it's one thing to watch caliginous romance flicks and hateship the Scourge Sisters, and another to have one's ally of questionable repute show up with the hate-bites along the ridge of his shoulder visible for all the world to see.

Seriously. Karkat could have gone his whole life without seeing this.

SS: Wimp.

SS: Ah, well, there's a difference 'tween bein' an unnaturally pissy little shit with too much existential fury for your own good, and actually detesting someone enough to want to hit on 'em. Pansy like you wouldn't know a real caliginous rivalry if it sliced your arm off and beat yah upside the head with it.

SS: Anyway. Felt your needy ass calling for assistance, and yet here yah sit, not in any kind of danger to speak of. Make this worth my time, kid. Tell me there's someone that needs stabbing.

Spades cracks his neck to one side and then the other, his shell clicking as he sprawls out. It's the most relaxed Karkat has ever seen the maniac - right up until the carapacian digs out a knife from his jacket and starts digging the thin blade under his claws to work out flecks of shell and dried blood.
"Well fuck, yeah, I've been hauling my ass all over this place looking for you," Karkat admits, grimacing as Spades starts flicking all that crap onto the floor. "But I didn't fucking call you because - surprise! - you never gave me a number. Jack ass."

Something he says must actually startle Spades, because the carapacian jolts upright, slicing through part of his own thumb claw with a yowl. Spades throws a surly glower at Karkat as he sticks the thumb into his mouth and mumbles around it, jabbing the knife across the table between them as he signs one-handedly.

SS: Don't give me a fuckin' heart attack like that, schlub. Yah don't know shit about how the Blood thing works, do you.

"We only just learned what the whole Game thing was yesterday." Karkat throws up his hands. "So sue me for not having a single iota of an idea what it means that I apparently played a game in an entirely different universe without knowing it. You assholes just kept talking and talking and never explaining anything."

Spades sighs with way more force than Karkat thinks the situation warrants, slouching even further down on his couch and propping a foot up on the armrest. He inspects the cut on his claw sourly; then, even as Karkat watches, the last of the slice seals over, the blood that's trickled down the side of his hand sliding back up to form a scab.

Seriously. That's weird. Karkat can do that, and it's still weird. Is this what it's like for other people when he heals himself?

SS: Figured as much. It can be pretty hit or miss with this shit. I remember you grey bastards and your game and not much fucking else.

"How fucking useful," Karkat mutters under his breath. He thinks he's being quiet enough that Spades won't hear, but the carapacian glares at him and Karkat remembers that his idea of a whisper is still pretty fucking loud. "And apparently the Queens barely left their palace planet shitholes, so they can tell us basically fuck all about any of the troll players."

SS: Ah, well, Queens are Queens.

SS: Don't make the mistake of thinking they care about yah; those two have seen more players come and go than you can imagine, and they're only pulling out all the stops to help this pack of numbskulls because their own asses are finally on the line.

Somehow, that doesn't surprise Karkat. Maybe it would surprise someone like John, who likes to believe the best of people, but Karkat has a healthy cynicism borne of lifelong paranoia. But anyway, he has an opening to find out what Spades might remember about the troll game session, so he decides to take it. "What about Kanaya? Do you remember if Kanaya was definitely one?" Karkat spins his pen between his claws and fumbles it, snarling involuntarily as he snatches it up and tries to pretend it never happened. Kanaya's positive that she doesn't remember anything, and at this point any outside input would be welcome.

He suspects half the reason Kanaya's gone so sour is because Rose has been avoiding everyone for quite a while now. Well, maybe sour's the wrong word for it - Kanaya is just focused on other things, and considers everything about this game secondary to the more immediate concern that is her matesprit potentially going off the rails again.

He's just going to leave Rose and her issues to Kanaya. He got the impression that Kanaya was thoroughly put out by his attempts to strike up a friendship with her, so he's giving her space.
Spades groans and starts picking at a chipped scab on his lower lip, the skritch of claw on shell aggravating enough to set Karkat's teeth on edge.

SS: Chick with the chainsaw? Hell if I know. I only work with Blood players. Can't trust anyone else as far as you can throw 'em.

SS: Plus, you had twelve goddamn players, kid, which was absolutely ridiculous. No way did I bother learning names.

SS: I remember the shitty clown. Just. Fuck that guy.

"But you didn't know his name?" Karkat says, tossing his pen down on the table, the better to dig his claws into his skull and scrape at the skin. His chest aches when he hunches over to rest his elbows on his knees, but it's lot more manageable than it was just yesterday. John had to remind him to take painkillers this morning; Karkat nearly made it all the way through breakfast able to ignore the low throb of pain. He can't tell if he's just getting used to it or if he's actually healing faster than normal.

SS: Games? Ganymede? Gerrymandering? Started with a G.

SS: Hung around with you a lot, 's the only reason I remember him. Honked like a complete shithead. Giggled when you stabbed him.

Useless. Fucking useless. It figures that Karkat would end up with the useless mentor figure. "Is there anything you're good for?!" he demands, twisting hair between his claws.

Something sharp and knifey jams into his arm without warning.

SS: You ungrateful, mouthy piece of shit -

"Do you do anything besides stab people?!" Karkat snarls, seizing control of the blood trickling down the razor blade sticking out of his forearm and hardening it to a point of his own, stabbing through the shell of the carapacian's hand until he lets go of the blade. Spades has another bladekind in hand before Karkat has even finished tossing the first one to the side, baring his teeth.

Karkat holds up both claws for a timeout. "No. Shut up," he insists when Spades starts signing expletives. "You can't stab any more people. Doctor Lalonde is literally one more perforated kidney away from tossing you out on your fucking ass, and I'm not standing up for you when you have actually committed all the violent acts of douchebaggery you've been accused of."

SS: I left my dame for yer sorry ass, I stab who I want. Show me some respect.

SS: From here on out, you refer to me as boss.

"Yeah, no."

SS: Yes.

"Fuck no."

SS: Kid, we need structure.
Why is this happening. "You're not my boss!"

SS: Shit would run a hell of a lot smoother if I were in charge. None of these squishy human shitheads can run a crew half as well as I can, obviously.

Spades takes advantage of Karkat's ensuing prolonged moment of profound existential despair to go retrieve the razor blade from where Karkat tossed it. The carapacian inspects it by licking the blade with a contorted expression of scrutiny, and then tucks the specibus away in a pocket, apparently satisfied.

Someone out there must regret ever handing Spades Slick his first knifekind. Someone has to be just kicking themselves over it, way more than Karkat ever could. He has to believe that, or he's not going to make it through this conversation with his sanity intact. "Did you just compare us to the Midnight Crew?" he asks, chancing a glance at his forearm to make sure he actually scabbed the wound over and that he's not, you know, hallucinating this entire trainwreck of an interrogation due to blood loss. "Seriously?"

SS: Well, I gotta make do with what I have to work with, and since those three ditched me to be fleshy traitors, you're the next best thing...

SS: And since I like yah so much, you can be in charge of enforcement. Some responsibility might teach yah to mind your manners.

Karkat needs a desk to bang his head on. Repeatedly. "Because you founded the Midnight Crew."

SS: Well, it was a couple universes ago, stop wetting yourself.

...This is going to take a while. Karkat picks up his pen, clicks it, and starts taking notes. "Gerrie, you said?" he repeats, rubbing at the contact lens in one eye until it settles down and adjusting his glasses over it when the lines on his notepad start to blur. He came here for information about dealing with the Crew, but he'll take names from the game if he can get them.

SS: You could ask me anything about anything, and you're stuck on those washed up has-beens?

SS: Fine, fine. There's definitely an 'm' in there somewhere. You talkers and your goddamn insistence on one damn name instead of a nice variety of initials.

SS: Gamera?

Karkat stabs the pen through the paper and stares at Spades with disbelief. "Gamera was a fucking giant flying turtle lusus in Japan back in the 1970s who literally shit flamethrowers and had a goddamn plasma cannon arm, and you're saying it was a troll in a game in a previous life."

Spades appears to mull this over.

SS: ...It wouldn't even fucking surprise me at this point, to be honest.

SS: The clown kid was a weird piece of work.

Karkat closes his eyes. "It was a fucking turtle," he whispers.

SS: ...

SS: ...Did it start with a G?

Things don't improve as the conversation progresses. Karkat works his way through four pens and a notepad and by the time Jade wanders in an hour later to introduce even more fucking unnecessary shitfuckery to the situation, the couch cushions are bleeding stuffing from five separate stab wounds.

But he ends up with a list of initials that Spades swears on his favorite stabbing utensil are correct, and hey.

Maybe that's a start.

It only takes one spell to keep Kanaya haring off on a wild goose chase. Rose can feel the regret seething in her stomach before she even casts the damned thing. But she does it anyway. And then there's a flickering, indistinct copy of herself, a glimmer of light photons that will appear as a phantom in the corners of Kanaya's vision if and when she realizes that Rose has vanished. She dismisses it with a flick of her fingers, and the light winks out to go attach itself to the troll. It's not perfect, but it will suit Rose's purposes.

And she purposes to get damn well disgustingly drunk.

Having let loose the phantom to misdirect Kanaya, Rose presses a palm to her chest, over the flutter of her heartbeat. There's some unease there, a flipping sensation in her stomach, and though her first instinct is to swallow it down and soldier forward under the guise of confidence, she cannot deny the plain and simple fact that what she is considering is unbelievably, incredibly stupid. That Kanaya would disapprove is without question, and that Rose has already taken the precautions necessary to throw her off Rose's trail, a betrayal of their accord, cannot be denied.

But there are so many factors to juggle, so many upsets and crawling memories and that Rose can't see past the overwhelming desire to just be fine. She would give anything in the world to feel fine, to feel pleasantly, drunkenly at ease, to not have just now come to the slow but unquestionable realization that yes, actually, she did invite the Horrorterrors into her mind.

She opened that channel. She unleashed many-angled hell on not just her own mind, but John, Jade, and Dave's as well. No other single person might have contributed as much to the complete and utter waste of a game session theirs became outside of Scratch himself.

This knowledge lodges itself in her mind, and twists.

This is her fault. It has always been her fault.

In the face of knowledge like that, really, what else is left but to drink?
Rose recognizes all the classic signs that her alcoholism has been triggered. Even without falling back into her mind space she can tell that the lid has been ripped off the container for the last of her unsorted thoughts, and the urge to drink winds itself into the fabric of her being more strongly with each passing moment. Stress is only one of the ways in which any number of mental illnesses and dependencies can be triggered, and she is nothing if not stressed right now. Hells alive, every single person in that conference room has no doubt inherited some kind of trans-universal PTSD; John might have been the only one suffering openly, but no one could come out of that unscathed. No one.

In a way, Rose thinks the Queens might have done more harm than good in their decision to show them those records. Perhaps they'd thought the human players would watch the records, realize all their mistakes, and resolve to never make them again. Certainly, Karkat seems to feel that being forewarned means being forearmed. Or perhaps the two aliens had assumed that the four children would be able to process the information that they managed to botch not only their efforts at creating a new world, but sacrificed billions upon billions of human lives to do it, and somehow not suffer crippling amounts of guilt.

They assumed quite wrong, if that is the case. Catastrophically wrong.

And now Rose finds herself...here.

She leans her head against the wall, and lets it roll to the side so that she can stare at the door knob. There's no mark over the door to inform an observer what the contents may be, but Rose knows. Everyone in the facility knows.

Hmm. She should probably not do this.

Her hand creeps out to the side regardless.

"Yo. Hey. Rose?"

She snatches her hand back in a fist and exhales sharply, a breath she hadn't realized she'd been holding, as she lifts her head and looks back down the hall.

Oriole should not be difficult to miss. Really. Even before, with one wing taped down, he radiated a kind of lopsided neon presence, and now that he is walking around with both wings loose, carelessly slouched against his back with a carefully affected nonchalance, he takes up almost twice as much space as before. In comparison to the sprite he was, actually, he's relatively toned down - Davesprite burned like a neon orange sun. Oriole is matte in comparison, ruffled and real, the translation of game constructs onto a human body.

But still. She hadn't even heard him coming. Hadn't seen him in the corner of her eye - or any form of vision at her disposal. She hasn't been this blind since -

"Oriole," Rose says, straightening up and doing her utmost to not look like someone who has been pacing and slavering before a closed door for the past hour in the throes of indecision. "Or would you prefer Dave, now?" she adds.

Even before she finishes the question, Oriole grimaces in a silent 'bluh,' and he shakes his head. "I never want to go by Dave ever again. Hell no," he says, holding up both hands as though to ward off even the thought of the name. "The wingless asshole is welcome to it. I want nothing to do with - any of that."

The pause that ensues is suitably awkward. If she were present, Mother would no doubt berate both of them for being so gauche as to not have some meaningless small talk prepared in advance.

"So what's in this room that's got you skulking around?" Oriole says, shuffling one foot as he squints at her over his shades. Rose notices - again, so much more slowly than she normally would - that he's not wearing shoes at the moment, only socks that reveal the unnatural curve where his feet must transition from human toes to bird talons. He curls his toes under and leans his weight forward on them until the joints pop, much like Rose used to have the uncouth habit of popping her knuckles in order to spite her mother over the breakfast table. "It's what, 2 in the morning? People will think you're...up to something."

If his voice drops just enough into a monotone that it brings to mind a certain work of wizarding filmography, Rose certainly doesn't call him on it. "I am currently debating the merits and possible objections that might influence my decision to open this door, crack open the first bottle of absinthe that I see, and end this absolutely horrific day on a thoroughly drunken, possibly hallucinatory note," she replies dryly, shifting her shoulder to accommodate the extra space Oriole needs to flop back against the wall with his wingspan. This close up, with her focus less on alcohol and more on navigating the complexities of conversing with another sentient being in the early hours of the morning, she can see the burnt orange shadows, verging on almost a sickly green, that line Oriole's eyes as he peels the sunglasses off his face to rub his eyelids. "It is a thoroughly irresponsible and reckless move, with a high probability that I shall regret it in the morning. Thus the need for extensive consideration on my part."

"Ohhh. So this is the booze room," Oriole says thoughtfully, scratching under his jaw at a crooked feather that appears to have grown along the curve of his neck. "Well shit, if there's an alcohol bus, I call shotgun."

Rose can only stare. "...Really," she says, feeling more than a little confused and completely unsure why.

"Uh, yeah, really." Oriole meets her blank stare for blank stare, and then sighs. "Rose, okay - I don't know how old everyone here is, but I'm hedging we're all around nineteen or twenty. And as far as I can tell, none of these assholes drink." He throws up his hands as he really starts to hit his stride. He seems to have been sitting on this one for a while. "I mean, what kind of teenagers don't occasionally get completely shitfaced? It's like, a goddamn law of the known universe. Do you know, there wasn't even beer at that apartment? Not a goddamn drop. It was like living in a shitty, rank white boy bachelor pad but with copious amounts of apple juice instead of booze. I mean, no wonder those two are so fucked up."

It is finally occurring to Rose that, in spite of whatever his questionable temporal origins in a paradox universe might have been, Oriole represents a unique perspective. In a building full of scientists of varying degrees of madness and heroes in sore need of psychological counselling, he may well be the only one coming at this from the position of an almost-normal human teenager. Ectobiological crow mutations notwithstanding.

"Well, given our combined familial unit's particular track record, I'm not entirely surprised that Mr Strider would be less than interested in leaving alcohol around for Dave to find it," Rose says at last, folding her arms over her chest. Her hand is still clenching and unclenching like a nervous tic, and she wraps her fingers around the curve of her other arm to make it stop. "Neither Mother nor I handle our alcohol with any degree of self-control."

And if there was an award for understatement of the year...

"Ah, well, that sucks," Oriole says blithely. He hooks the arm of his shades on the collar of his shirt and glances obviously from side to side with lemon yellow eyes. "If you need someone to make sure you don't blackout or vomit everywhere, I can play drunkbuddy.” He scratches at that bent feather again, and finally tugs it out between two claws, inspecting the crooked pinion with a critical eye as he scratches at the faint orange spot left behind. "Maybe it's the whole mutant thing, but I've never had a drinking problem."

Oh dear. And now she has a drinking buddy. That makes this whole idea so much more...accessible. Rose has the distinct suspicion that Oriole has no idea exactly what Rose meant by a lack of self-control, but in the state she's in, she's hardly going to divulge her blatant alcoholism to him.

"One moment," she says at last. "There's something I need to -"

She can't finish, and she barely catches Oriole's careless shrug in the corner of her eye as she drums her fingers along her arm and gnaws on her lip.

For Kanaya's sake, if not for her own, Rose makes one last good faith effort to swallow back the intense thirst. She pushes off the wall, her face flushed as she sets one foot in front of the other and takes one step away from the door.

Two.

Three.

And she stops as bile rises up in the back of her throat. This time, the image that forms in her mind is that of a Dave in purple pajamas, bent over her own shredded corpse. Incredible, really; just like that, her attempt to carefully compartmentalize the desire to drink back into a nice, quiet box in her mind withers. Her lips sting, raspy and dry, as she licks them, and the writhing despair in her stomach that she thinks she would do anything, anything at all to burn out of her system tightens like a vise.

Rose spins, lays a hand on the doorknob, and doesn't even bother shuffling through her mental repertoire for the appropriate spells to handle all the locks Rue's assistants added to try and keep both Lalondes out. She just rusts right through every piece of metal attached to the door: through the hinges, through the flat doorknob itself, through the bolts and loops of the locks, all in a brilliant flicker of light. There's a brief clatter from within the room after the dizzying after glare clears from Rose's mind, and she gives the door a slight tap so that it falls in with a muted crash, cushioned by another spell.

"Oh my god," Oriole says, peering in over her shoulder. "Oh my god."

"There are no gods here, Oriole," Rose corrects, her footsteps ponderous and heavy as she steps into the room, drawn to the nearest shelf of dark liquors like a satellite in decaying orbit. "Only spirits."

True to his word, Oriole handles liquor differently than Rose does. She hesitates before generalizing that to include all humans, because she is well aware that she possesses a particularly poor example of a normal human liver. Oriole has enough common sense not to try and match Rose shot for shot. She has little doubt he'd suffer severe alcohol poisoning if he attempted to put his liver through the kind of intensive regimen she has in mind. More than that, when he does stop, he has no trouble doing so. He's chattier than Dave, more open to talking in general, but it's not until the fifth round of tequila that he starts gesticulating emphatically with his wings, the feathers that frame his face bristling at intervals, and he unlocks his word-hoard to start responding to Rose's coaxing.

She hadn't realized how bitter he might be over what they learned yesterday.

"I mean, it was one thing when it was us being freaky clone twins or something," Oriole says, pressing the ball of a thumb into the space between his eyebrows and massaging it, wincing at the sting of a tequila headache. "I mean. Fuck. I don't know what I mean."

"Go on," Rose says. On one level, she's surprised she's not slurring yet; on another, she is far more concerned with not spilling Patrón all over the floor as she tops off their borrowed glasses. The door has been propped up in the empty doorway at an odd angle, one that rankles on her slowly skewing vision, but she really can't motivate herself to take the time to correct it, not when they've done so well not attracting the notice of anyone in the facility who might object to their gratuitous drinking. "Stream of consciousness. Let it flow, brother dear."

"They never said it, but there's just this - this goddamn shit they never say, but they say it, anyway." Oriole is in charge of the salt, which he applies to the rim of their glasses with still-steady claws. "That I'm - I don't know, extra. Like I got tagged on like some kind of surplus Dave. And now -" he breaks off, croaking out a laugh, and drowns whatever else he was going to say by licking off the salt, downing the shot, and crushing a slice of lime between his teeth.

Rose imitates him because he's the one who introduced this method of drinking. She's always tended to follow in the path of her mother's drained martini glasses; she can't really imagine why Rue Lalonde even bothered to stock tequila here, unless it was merely out of some misguided sense of completionism - pretty much every type of alcoholic commodity is present in this room in some form or another, even if some of the bottles sit dust-laden from lack of interest.

Alas, her inexperience shows through when Rose tosses back the burning liquid and raises the lime slice to her lips, only to have her teeth clack together on a juiceless slice that she has already used. How embarrassing - and oh, damn, the putrid taste of distilled hell juice corrodes the back of her throat like acid. Choking and sneezing, Rose locates the next slice with shaky fingers and sucks on the lime until the sharp, foul tang is nothing more than a receding memory. "No more tequila, I think," she hisses, pursing her lips as she recaps the bottle. "Good lord."

"Yeah, I think we're done with that," Oriole agrees, the ghost of humor on his face despite the lingering bitterness as he thumbs down the lid of the salt container. "Weird shit happens when too much tequila gets involved. We should probably slow the hell down. I mean, you weigh less than me – where are you even putting all that?"

"Mmm." Rose is making absolutely no promises on the matter. Her instinct is to at least have an appletini in her hand, in one of those triangular cocktail glasses that Rue Lalonde tends to use exclusively, just for the sake of having something in her hands to keep them occupied. But she breathes out hard through her nose and struggles in vain to convince the part of her that is delighting in the ability to just give in and stop fighting the urge to drink that she can at least take an hour or so to let the first round she's had in weeks settle in her stomach. She's generally good at not vomiting, but tequila is new and if she does botch it, she's certain that she's going to start crying out of frustration.

Right. Oriole. They're still in the middle of his talk therapy session. Still trying to inveigle him into revealing his neuroses. Back to business. "Shurplus," she says, and ahhh. There's the slur she's been waiting for. Rose leans her chin on the palm of one hand, swaying a little as she rests her elbow on the counter. A hiccup jolts her, jarring her teeth a little, and she has to wave her other hand to refocus herself. "'Scuse me. Go on."

"I guess, just. Being a bird clone, at least I was still me. Still someone separate, even if we somehow shared a shitton of genes." He snorts. "Now according to the universe, I'm literally just some copy-and-paste version of the original article, and how long until they all start shoving me off and saying 'oh, look, there goes the spare Dave'?" Oriole rakes a hand through his hair so that some of the thin strands fly up at wayward angles. "Do you even know how absolutely shitty it feels, knowing everything thinks you're some kind of copy? Just some sack of useless ectobiological shit who forgot a version of himself already existed?"

Rose's first instinct is to spit out some pithy one-liner - something like 'no one thinks that' would be a classic, she thinks. Perhaps it would even reassure Oriole for however long the drunkenness lasts. But just saying it wouldn't be anywhere near enough to hold up under the weight of sober logic, not unless she somehow manages to produce an accompanying, cogent argument upholding Oriole's right to individual personhood in the next five seconds to back it up.

Well. By god, she can try. "No one thinks that," she says, because that really is an excellent starting point. She has no idea why she'd think otherwise. "Not consciously. But it would be disingenuous to say that the possibility is...not unlikely that you may be subconsciously dismissed and diminished. You will need to assert your - ah, selfhood - in order to ensure that such a thing does not occur. Your viability as an manifestly distinct sentient being may need to be a fact which is stated for the record. No, viability."

"Or I could just fucking leave," he mutters. This time, he grinds the heel of his palm against his forehead, his expression discontent. "You think you people and your problems are the by-all, end-all, but I had a life before I got kidnapped for looking like someone else. I don't need to hang around with people who will never stop comparing me to some emotionally stunted bastard."

"You certainly could," Rose agrees. "It's well within the realm of capability." She reaches out and pats Oriole on the shoulder, her hand wavering between wing and shoulder before she settles for the latter, because as her logic becomes increasingly compromised she wonders more and more how fluffy said wings might be. But she might need to be a smidgeon more drunk than this before she gives in to the impulse. Right now, she's finally achieved the happy medium where the memories of yesterday feel like a vague, indistinct mass of unpleasant emotions. She can think the words 'I killed them all,' and her stomach flips only once before she manages to mentally blunder her way past the ensuing, nauseous guilt.

The blessings of inebriated emotional numbness. She intends to prolong this state for as long as humanly possible. "It might still be unshafe though, since the Midnight Crew are still a probable. Problem. A probable problem," she adds when the rest of her mind stumbles its way back on to the topic of conversation at hand. "I would advise against it."

"Don't remind me," Oriole says gloomily. "Everything about this has ruined my life. Goddamn, I don't even believe in reincarnation or any of that bullshit. How did I get balled up in your assholes' crazy second life parade?"

Rose smiles, and leans in to confide in his ear. She misjudges the distance, and a feather tickles her nose. "I assure you - everyone in this building is most likely wondering the same thing."

He pulls a face. "On so many levels, not helpful, Rose."

Rose gives up and folds her arms on the countertop, sitting so she can rest her head in the pillow of her arms and continue to smile. "Tell me about your life, brother," she says. "Tell me what makes you tick."

Because as long as she's thinking about Oriole's problems, she's most certainly not thinking about her own. Perhaps it's not the healthiest or the most altruistic reason for being a psychologist, but - well, that has never stopped her before.
Transporting oneself in a linear fashion always proves to be infinitely more challenging whilst under the influence. Occasionally the floor swoops out in circles from underfoot and leaves one fumbling and befuddled as one introduces one's elbow to the wall at an awkward angle. Rose doesn't remember inebriation being quite so dizzying, but perhaps it's because after the first few shots she'd switched to champagne in some proto-ironic attempt at raising a toast to the ignominious end of her sober streak. It had seemed like a good idea at the time, but champagne leaves her bubbly in the head and as she stumbles her way down the hall the urge to giggle at her own ridiculous swerves grows ever stronger.

Why ever had she stopped drinking, again?

Mmm, right. Tentacles. The thought almost prematurely sobers her up - never a pleasant experience, even at the best of times - but then she recalls where she is and relaxes back into bubbly complacency, traipsing her way toward the destination that gleams like a fizzy burble in her sight.

Oriole went off on his own some time ago to sleep off his own marginally less intense drunken stupor. He really is a nice boy, even if he did confiscate the vermouth after her third martini, and Rose thinks she's come to quite like him. Now, it's almost six in the morning - time does fly when one has a bottle in one's hand - and Rose is just drunk enough to be in complete denial about the fact that she hasn't slept at all as she makes her way toward her spell beacon down the hall. She marked that room for a reason while still sober, and even it is taking a moment or ten to recollect why she did that, she'll be damned if she doesn't see what it is. She'll deal with the need for sleep (and the hangover that looms in the vague distance like the promised yet unwanted solicitude of an arranged marriage) after she's handled this.

It is only when Rose sees that the door she is aiming for is slightly ajar that she remembers, with a bubble of drunken insight, that she came here intending to speak with her mother.

Oh dear. The floor sways again and Rose stumbles to a halt against the wall, blinking blearily at the thin light between the door and the frame. She can hear the faint murmur of voices emanating from the office, and instead of continuing forward she takes advantage of this singular opportunity to rest and recollect herself.

Indecision arrests her; instead of dragging herself upright and finishing this ill-thought out venture, she digs her phone out of her pocket, gnawing upon her lip in deliberation as her thumb hovers over John's faded blue Pesterchum handle. After a moment she opens a new chat window with someone whose handle she received from Kanaya but whom she has not heretofore had the opportunity to converse with in the app. It's still obscenely early and no one in their right mind should have to be conscious at an hour like this - but of course, there is the fact that he should, in fact, be several hours ahead of Washington time. Whatever the reason, his handle is lit up - she can't recall it ever not being lit, actually.

Rose winces, and closes that chat window. Now that she's slightly more sober, she sees that there are several outstanding message notifications next to Kanaya's chumhandle - Kanaya rarely strays onto the group forums - which bodes rather ill. She's surprised Kanaya let this go as long as she has, considering the rainbow drinker doesn't sleep and Rose never returned to the room last night.

On one level, Rose is aware that there is no way for this to end well. Now that Pesterchum has become a more immediate threat to her buzz, she pockets her phone and narrows her eyes at the office door.

Time to bite the bullet, as they say. Breathing in through her nose, Rose takes the emergency flask from her other pocket, swallows a warm mouthful of rum, and sneezes her way through the aftertaste until she feels dizzy and confident enough to stride across the last few yards and barrel through the door.

A small coalition of people in white coats have beaten her to Rue Lalonde's office. From the hollow, deep bags under some of the eyes that dart back to stare at her, Rose suspects most of them haven't slept, either. So at least she's among good company.

But. Ah. Right. She remembers why sober-Rose wanted to be drunk for this. "I should like to shpeak with my mother, if I'm not innerupting anything important," she says, doing her utmost not to slur her words too heavily. "Privately." A sharp hiccup jolts her diaphragm and Rose has to smother a giggle at the double takes she receives.

"Is that Rose?" Rue says from behind the wall of lab coats, and just like that the scientists draw back away from the desk in the center of the room, some of them throwing curious looks at Rose that have the distinct tang of scientific interest. Well, she wouldn't be surprised if many of those in Rue's employ, particularly those dabbling in thaumaturgic research, might be interested in their employer's daughter and her tomfoolery.

Rose's mental focus is utterly shot, so there's a delay between her bemusedly waving at one of the more reluctant-looking trolls as he sidles toward the door and her looking at her mother. "Go, go. I'll speak with everyone later," Rue says, and there's something odd about her voice as she waves the rest of the researchers after the troll. The alcohol skews Rose's focus, and thus she finds herself singularly fixated on the way Rue Lalonde has harshly tucked her hair back behind her ears, out of her face, all of the wavy curls coated with a faintly greasy sheen under the unforgiving florescent lighting.

She is struck by the fact that, even given her current state of inebriation, she can recall relatively little about Rue's mien these past few days. The last clear image Rose can call to mind is that of the tired woman who attempted to speak to her Chicago; based on that alone, she sees that her mother has let even more aspects of her appearance fall by the wayside. Rue's eyes are bloodshot, her lips so pale that it takes Rose a moment to realize she's not wearing lipstick, and when the woman partially rises from her chair, the light throws the sharp, almost sunken hollows beneath her cheekbones into sharp relief. There's a long crease down one side of her angular dress, one that unsettles Rose for reasons she can't explain.

While sober, Rose has been too bitter to care what her mother's altered visage might imply. Drunk, she's both fascinated and - yes, alright, blithely concerned about it. Rue Lalonde is a stickler for her appearance; her perfectly applied makeup is one of her primary weapons of intimidation in a never-ending quest to passive-aggressively forecast her aloof snobbery to the world, one that Rose took to imitating as early as nine years old. As she recalls, she used John as a test subject for all of the makeup products they 'borrowed' from Rue's dresser before ever trying to apply it to her own face.

"You didn't - HIC! - you didn't wear makeup today," she says, feeling a little lost as she hovers awkwardly between the door and the desk, unsure of how to parse her own emotional response to this. Instinct tells her to have some snarky remark prepared for this occasion, but drunk informs her that under no circumstances is snark an option at the moment. She'd only flub the execution, with the state her brain-to-mouth filter is in. "And here I thought I would never see the day," is all she can add.

"Rose." Rue hesitates, nostrils flaring, her expression warier than Rose thinks is really warranted, under the circumstances. The floor chooses that moment to toss like the deck of a ship at sea and Rose presses the tips of her fingers to her mouth as she grips the back of a chair for much-needed balance. Impulsively, her other hand darts for the flask, but she remembers herself at the last moment and tries to raise her chin and salvage some of her decorum.

A useless endeavor, really. Alcohol is the bane of decorum, at least where Rose is concerned. It always has been. She hiccups hard enough to jolt her shoulders, and even trying to cover it up by clearing her throat just earns her more of a wary, hard stare from Rue.

"Rose," she says slowly, "are you drunk?"

Ah, well. Cover blown, Rose shrugs and retrieves her flask for another sip that she lets sit in her mouth for a long moment before swallowing contemplatively. "Indubitably," she replies at last, sitting down in the free chair with a huff of air. Standing is far too much effort after walking all the way here from - wherever she started out. "I though tit would be conducive to our coming to an accordia - accord," she corrects at the very last moment, swirling the flask in her hand and using it to gesture between the two of them. "Given the events of the previous few days, it has become clear that we require a stable working relashionship if anyone is to survive this messh. So. Here I yam."

Either Rose's reflexes have been drastically slowed - most likely - or Rue is remarkably quick on the uptake - also likely - because the doctor settles back into her seat after only just too long of a pause, folding her hand together in a steeple as she glances from Rose to the flask. "I don't think I've ever seen you drink before," she murmurs, low enough that Rose can't tell if it's mocking or not. "And this - you need -" a sweep of her hand -. all of this, in order to speak with me?"

"On shivil terms. Sorry, civil," Rose says, shrugging bonelessly. "Anyway, y'were a single mom stuck with an intractable, magically gifted child with an incline for dark majjyks and chaos gods. I forgif you for not knowing how to deal with me past a certain point, I suppose. So yah."

Now that she's no longer standing, the slow burn in her chest from plying herself with more rum can spread more easily to her head, slow and careless. It feels nice - like not having the capacity to worry about past lives, or the ability to fret about some unforeseeable future catastrophe, or the inclination to become upset about much anything for more than a few moments. Years of abandonment? Pah.
Why be hurt about something like that? It happened. It's over. It's done. Rose isn't sure how much of this she's saying out loud, but she attempts to demonstrate the willingness to let bygones be bygones with a vague, looping flutter of her hand, before she needs it to hastily prop up her head.

Maybe some people don't like the person they become when they drink. Rose likes it too much. And that's the trap of it, in the end.

Drunk Rose is good at dealing with people, and emotions, and fun. But she's also the Rose who makes the decisions that lead to missed days, to skipping out on hero work without even realizing it, to drowning her issues rather than making any real effort to reach out to accept the help others offer her.

Sometimes it feels like it's a choice between her rationality and her happiness, and even objectively knowing that this is a false dichotomy produced by the faulty logic of alcoholic dependency can't scrub that from her mind.

"I see," Rue says, intent enough that it draws Rose out of her musing spiral. "And can any reconciliation we attempt while you are under the influence really be considered reconciliation at all? When you will most likely come to your senses when this - this binge runs its course, and will hate me once more?"

Funny, Rose thinks, it's still funny. Still odd, she means, that strange tone in Rue's voice. Rose knows what her mother sounds like bitter and passive aggressive and simpering and condescending and all-knowing, but she's having such trouble placing this tone, and the expression on Rue's face is not helping: it's not her usual mask, after all, without the makeup to conceal all flaws and tells. It's just Rue, and she looks so forlorn, so -

"Why are you sad?" Rose asks, cautious. Perhaps she's imagining things...the martinis had probably been taking it too far after so long sober... "I can't hate you anymore. It's too inconvenient while we're all in danger for me to start strifes in the middle of meetings. So we will do this while I'm intoxicated, and I will not let cordial relashions falter once I am sober. It will be my reshponsibility."

Her earnest smile wobbles, and she has to reaffirm it, tilting her head to the side and reinforcing the smile until her teeth ache. "I thought you'd be extant - ecstatic that I want to talk. You wanted to talk, before, but -"

"Of course I am, Rosie, of -" Rue presses a hand over her pale, thin lips, and for a moment Rose thinks her mother is going to cry. When Rue removes the hand there's that familiar smirk, only it's paired with eyes that look utterly wretched. "Would it reassure you if I kept this up?" Rue demands, her voice dry and strained and not at all the correct tone to match that smirk. Rose shrinks back a little in her seat, her smile drooping at the corners. "If I acted as though it were fine that my own child needs to be utterly soused to smile at me?"

"Isn't it fine? Why would you care?" Rose asks, genuinely curious. "You're always drunk. What difference does it make?"

Rue's jaw snaps shut. Her teeth clack audibly, and Rose waits patiently, though with not a little woozy concern, as most of the color drains from her mother's face. It's a most peculiar reaction to what sounded like a perfectly reasonable question in Rose's head, but perhaps she misconstrued something in Rue's demeanor. It wouldn't be the first time.

"Oh."

Rose tilts the flask back and drains the last of it.

"Oh, Rose."

When Rose sets the flask down, thumbing a drop of rum off the corner of her lip before it can run down her chin, she sees that Rue has dropped her whole face into her hands. Rose can't make out her expression in the brief pause, only the bend of Rue's shoulders and the way they crumple and cave inward, like mountains subsiding.

Rue takes a shuddering breath, and looks up. The smile she flashes in response to Rose's earnest one seems more desperate than sincere, but who is Rose to judge anyone at the moment. "Yes. Yes, I'd like - for us to talk," Rue says stiltedly. "I would like that quite a lot."

It's a start.

At the end of their consultation, Rose really does feel optimistic about how things stand between her and her mother; it is the optimism of someone both drunk and so very sleep deprived that sleep itself sounds like a distant, unreal pipedream. It's noon now, so even the liberal amounts of alcohol in her system have begun to decline, and she just knows that she's going to be in for one hell of a hangover. Rose hooks her foot under the rung of the chair at some point during negotiations and then forgets about it when she stands up, so she stumbles calamitously and topples a stack of files with a light-headed giggle of apology. "Sorry," she slurs, banging her knee on the way down to smush the files back into a stack and fumble them onto Rue's desk. "Don't worry, I gotcha."

"There's no need to - dear," Rue protests, seizing an errant packet of paper and drawing it back onto the desk, standing up from her seat as though to come help. "Please."

"I've got it," Rose insists, winking, and she tucks the last of the papers back into a file folder. She's not entirely sure these are the papers that originally occupied said folder, but that's where they belong now. She staggers to her feet and slaps the folder down on top of the messy pile, inordinately proud of her own accomplishment.

The hands that close on her shoulders are hesitant and light, perhaps anticipating that Rose will try to pull out of their grip. But she just blinks, at loose ends, and then her mother's arms draw her in close. It's not unpleasant. A little too close and tight, perhaps, but the alcohol makes everything feel a little too close and fuzzy with her reaction time so slow. Rose reaches up and pats her mother on the arm good-naturedly, because she is trying to make things passably diplomatic between the two of them, and then she waits for her mother to let go.

"I would like us to talk again, if at all possible," Rue says, her voice thick as she speaks into Rose's hair. "When you're no longer quite so intoxicated. Please, try to sleep it off, sweetheart."

Well, it is not as though they can avoid speaking to each other again for all of time. Look at how well it turned out the last time Rose tried to do that. Bobbing her head in a wobbly nod, Rose pats her arm again. "Of course, Mother. Nae - not a problem. I believe I do need to have a lie-down. It seems the most reasonable course of action."

"Reasonable. Yes." Rue sighs heavily and steps back, her hands lingering on Rose's shoulder as she hold her at arm's length. Another sigh, and the hands drop. "Do you need me to help you back to your room?"

"No, no," Rose says dismissively, touching a hand to her pocket for perhaps the fifth time to confirm that the flask is still there, and still empty. She doesn't want to leave anything behind in her daze, but it's difficult to recall what she's checked already. "I can shee it."

Rue shadows her as Rose walks to the door. Her unusual concern has persisted throughout this entire tête-à-tête, though no explanation has been forthcoming. She acts as though Rose has never drunk alcohol before. Really. "Remember to hydrate, Rose," she says, touching the curve of a finger to Rose's jaw before Rose manages to shuffle out the door and close it behind her. Rose can't help the enormous sigh of relief that escapes her, a surprisingly loud noise in the empty corridor, as she slumps against the door and forces some of the muscles that have tensed up over the past few hours to unclench.

Things will still be tense between them. Rose has no doubt of that. But hopefully come tomorrow's hangover Rose will be groggy but primed to allow relations with Rue to remain on stable, neutral territory.

No, the meeting went quite well. Where it all starts to fall apart is when Rose looks up, and realizes she's not alone in the hallway at precisely the same time Kanaya rounds the corner and jerks to a halt, looking almost as startled as Rose feels.

Oh dear. John had said he would talk to Kanaya, hadn't he. Rose had been responding to the group memo during one of her (numerous) breaks to use the restroom, gaily talking over any mention of her vastly deteriorated spelling ability, and hadn't really taken the warning seriously. She is abruptly, intensely aware that she reeks of liquor, a stench strong enough that she can imagine Rue only came so close because she's been so inured to the scent herself over the years - and Kanaya's nose is stronger than most.

"Kayaya," she says weakly, smoothing her hands over the rumpled fabric of her clothes, the same ones she wore yesterday and all this past night. "I. Ah. Ohhhh...uh..."

"You have been imbibing." Kanaya raises a hand, and then drops it, her expression slack and unreadable. It is around then that Rose realizes that she is not, in fact, alone in the 'yesterday's clothes' club, and her mind boggles momentarily. "I have been searching this facility for several hours, following what I now believe to have been a deliberate decoy."

Rose toes the ground. This time, when the anxious guilt churns up in her stomach, she can't swallow it down; she's just sober enough that the shame twists her insides into coils and there's no bottle nearby to satisfy her instinctive, harsh craving for something to blur the growing sense of despair. "There were eshtenuating circumstances," she says, furiously swallowing back the next hiccup that threatens to erupt inappropriately in the middle of her sentence. "I came to the objection conclusive beforehand that this was necessary to resolove my ongoing strife with Mother. We are good now. Shoo good. Mediashun is no longer needed."

"Dave and John had both informed me that you were, in their words, 'hooched to the fucking max,'" Kanaya continues as though Rose hasn't said a word, closing the distance between them in a few strides. Rose reels a little when Kanaya plucks at one of her eyelids with a careful claw to examine her pupil. "I did not wish to believe you would relapse so drastically without at least consulting me beforehand, however - ah - whoa there - are you capable of maintaining your -"

Maintaining her whatever is no longer on the agenda, unfortunately. Rose steps back wrong in an ill-fated attempt to stay upright. The floor just kind of buckles under her, or perhaps her ankle buckles in a devious act of betrayal, and she falls back hard, rescued from crashing to the ground only by Kanaya hauling her back upright by the elbow.

"No," she replies belatedly. "I'm sorry, Kaynaya. Gravity hash conspired against me. And also. The alcohols." Her eyes are beginning to prickle, and when Kanaya tries to help her back upright Rose shakes her head. And oh, no. She does not want to cry while drunk. That way gross sobbing lies, and it never ends well. "I messed up anway, didn't I," she says in a whisper, hiccupping in a way that almost conceals how her breath hitches in the preliminary steps of a sob. What a fortuitous hiccup.

"Well, as the laboratory remains remarkably clear of volatile chaos tentacles, I would say that the incident has not deteriorated as badly as it could have," Kanaya concedes, failing at any kind of stealth gambit as she takes Rose's pulse. "I am mildly concerned however, as I found more depleted bottles within in the storage room than a single human being would be capable of consuming without experiencing profound liver failure. Can you give me a rough estimate of how many ounces of alcohol you may have been personally responsible for ingesting?"

"Oriole helped. He'sha good drunkbuddy."

"Swallowing repeatedly and biting down hard on her lower lip does no good. Rose recognizes the exact moment that she reaches the tipping point, and then her chest seizes up painfully, her lungs shuddering as the first humiliating, rattling gasp escapes her lips. "I jusht wanted one thing to be fixed, because so much has gone ahry...aerie...wrong. But now I - I've been shitty to you inshtead."

Kanaya's hand brushes through Rose's hair, a soothing stroke that presses at the base of her skull. "I trusted you, Rose. I will not lie and say I am not frustrated. However, this is not something we cannot work through," Kanaya says, and her voice is gentler than Rose deserves. "Thus far, no one has been harmed by this except, perhaps, your liver. Come. Let us get you to a pile. You need to recuperate -"

"You've been hurt, though," Rose says miserably. The first tear leaks from the corner of her eye and she wipes it at sloppily, sniffing as a veritable torrent of snot threatens to make itself known. "I shouldn't set a d-decoy, eshpecially not after all the - the thingsh that have happened. All the salty thingsh. S'not fair to you."

Kanaya's voice remains steady. "You will help me understand why you did it later, when your blood alcohol levels have lowered sufficiently that you are capable of thinking clearly. Right now, you are prohibitively distressed. It would not be productive to have a feelings jam like this."

"Haah!" Rose says eloquently, reduced to pre-vocal utterances as the spaces between sobs diminish. This time, when Kanaya helps her stand she allows it; her knees wobble like the joints have been misplaced. They're not far from the living quarters where all of the visitors have been staying, but she keeps her watery gaze locked on the ground, trusting Kanaya to get her where they need to go.

"Ahhhh! You found her! What happened?! Is Rose hurt? Rose, are you okay?" a bright voice cuts through the veil of tears, and Rose lifts her blurred eyes enough to see a bright green smudge that can only be Jade. Rose blinks hard, truncating the next impending snuffle so that she doesn't start bawling again. She'd forgotten that the other girl intended to bunk with them last night; she'd forgotten a lot of things, in the face of her circular, despairing thoughts. "Kanaya?" Jade demands when Rose fails to summon up a coherent response.

"My apologies, Jade. Rose requires rest at the moment. She has overindulged in human soporifics," Kanaya replies in a murmur, greeting Jade with a nod. "It will not be a problem if we vacate the room so she may sleep, will it? I profess I am not sure what your schedule is like at the moment."

Jade shakes her head vigorously, her eyes squeezed shut and her hair flying out around her, almost long enough to whip the wall. "No, not a problem!" she hurries to say. A warm hand grips Rose's and Jade darts in close, hugging her for a few seconds before releasing her with a solemn expression. "Feel better, Rose," she says earnestly, her eyes wide and bright, and Rose can only nod in reply. Jade doesn't leave room for argument; she's refreshingly sincere that way. "Everything'll be okay! Don't worry!"

That's her cue. To say something - anything - "I'll do - my best," Rose manages between sniffles, but the smile she summons up doesn't meet standards; if anything, Jade just looks even more somber, ruffling Rose's hair and standing back so she can look on gravely while Kanaya helps Rose into the room and over to the bed that they disassembled on the second day before the others arrived. Tears stream down Rose's cheeks and she's lost the war with snot for the day, but Kanaya produces a box of tissues seemingly from out of nowhere and starts Rose off with a fistful.

"I will return shortly," Kanaya says, and Rose's head jerks up in panic before Kanaya squeezes her shoulder. "Lie down, Rose. I will fetch water. You are going to be severely dehydrated when you wake up." Her features soften with shadow when she turns off the lights within the room, standing backlit by the illumination from the hallway. "Try to sleep."

Rose opens her eyes, and stares at the dark ceiling. Her eyelids are heavy, and though the occasional convulsive sob jolts her back to awareness, soon she cannot tell the inside of her eyelids from the darkness overhead. She lets her head fall to the side, snuffling as she curls up around the sick but muffled that promises a queasy awakening, and hopes vaguely that she'll somehow manage to sleep through the worst of the hangover.

Then she opens her eyes, and squints.

Huh.

"How long have you been there?" she asks, blearily. She doesn't mean 'there' as in that corner in particular, but she can't even imagine working up the energy to clarify what she means with another whole sentence. How long have you been watching?

The figure sitting in the corner was not there when she and Kanaya entered, and she thinks that when Kanaya returns it'll have vanished once more. "Since two of my kids decided to have an all-night rager thinking I wouldn't notice," is the slow, drawling reply. "Go to sleep, kid."

(Rose nods unsteadily, and she doesn't really perceive the moment when her eyes drift shut. If she wakes up when Kanaya returns, she loses it in the haze of sleep and unconsciousness that swallows her up.

She does not dream. She does not see. And in its own way, the numbness of the void that cuts her off from the world outside the compound is its own nightmare.)

Someone is attempting to buy out Strider Juice, Inc.

Dave is almost in tears by the end of the email, lips twitching with barely concealed laughter because they sound so serious and earnest and clearly have no idea that the person running the sockpuppet email they've appealed to is just some kid dicking around with the internet and the stock market for his own incredibly ironic amusement.

Seriously. He could wait his whole life for a prime opportunity like this, and here's one being handed to him free of charge.

And god, could he use the distraction right now.

The Pesterchum memos have become a complete horror show. Like, this is some shit that just gives Dave a fucking headache. At some point last night Rose slapped a TW: Epicyclical *Epileptically complex brainstorming trees of varying degrees of gore on the memo board as a whole, and yeah that basically sums up the whole thing pretty well. He spends almost two hours attempting to explain the incredibly obvious timelines to Karkat, but that just provokes everyone else into badgering Dave with their weird questions. They flock to him, and he has to dispense half-assed tidbits of wisdom like the magnanimous Guru of Obvious that he is.

But he draws the line when somehow Doctor Lalonde of all people starts texting him for clarification on stuff. Maybe it's just because he's the time guy, but surely it should be obvious that there was time-space distortion between Derse and the interior planets? That everything was an unbelievable clusterfuck, time-wise, from the moment Rose's creepy tanglebuddies started trying to eat people? Half of this shit doesn't make sense because it is literally insane, and unfortunately Rose starts making an increasing amount of typos and talks more garbled nonsense than she does straight answers around midmorning, when she's supposed to be the one in charge of laying down all that exposition about Horrorterror chaos and shit
So Dave just starts pawning all those inquiries off with the excuse that he does not give a fuck.

TG: okay
TG: thats it
TG: im closing asks for the day
TG: no mas
TG: all other timeline questions may as well be directed to wv because thats literally as much sense as i will make TG: unless were talking like
TG: the end of the world just got pushed up to two seconds from now TG: theres a goddamn meteor the size of karkats vantass descending upon us from on high TG: help us dave youre our only hope
TG: then and only then will i be coaxed out my retirement like the badass jedi knight that i am CG: ONE DAY THERE'S GOING TO BE A RECKONING, DAVE.
CG: IN THE FORM OF MY FOOT INTRODUCING ITSELF TO YOUR SMUG FACE.
TG: been there tried that
TG: now hush karkles trying to talk over your shout barrage is making my throat hurt
CG: YOU'RE TYPING, YOU WHINING FUCKTRUCK.
TG: i am a fragile and delicate tenor and this voice must be protected at all costs
CG: SOMEONE, FIND HIM AND PUNCH HIM IN THE HUMAN MALE GENITALIA. FOR ME. PLEASE.
TG: what youre too nervous to come over here and fondle my genitalia in person karkat
TG: have to have someone else do the deed
TG: das lame man
CG: NO, I'M JUST IN THE MIDDLE OF ATTEMPTING TO CONVINCE SPADES NOT TO STAB ANYMORE PEOPLE. THIS IS A DELICATE OPERATION AND I REFUSE TO DISRUPT ALL OF MY CAREFULLY LAID OUT PERSUASIVE TECHNIQUES AND FAULTLESS ARGUMENTS BECAUSE OF YOU.
CG: LOGIC MEANS NOTHING TO THIS CARAPACIAN. NOTHING. I'M STARING INTO THE ABYSS AND THE ABYSS MOUTHS OFF AND THINKS HE'S THE MOB BOSS OF EVERYONE IN THIS ENTIRE BUILDING AND WANTS US ALL TO TAKE ON THE MIDNIGHT CREW RIGHT THE FUCK NOW IN SOME KIND OF MISGUIDED TURF WAR.
CG: I HAVE KIND OF A LOT ON MY PLATE HERE. SO SPARE ME YOUR HUMAN INNUENDO.

It takes him ages to figure out that the [vworp] wobbling on and off in the distance is coming from Kanaya and that the distinct, echoing murmur in Karkat's [thump thump thump] only seems to pick up when Spades Slick is in the immediate vicinity. Unlike Karkat's regular uptight rhythm, Spades fades in and out like smooth jazz, which is just fucking hilarious - until one time Dave rounds the corner and catches the carapacian in the act of snarling at a shadow, and everything crashes like an angry piano keysasmash in Dave's head.

Knowing what he does now, Dave figures he's hearing fraymotifs or some Game shit like that. He still seems to be the only one doing it - like hell is he quizzing either of his custodians on whether they hear this shit because Doctor Lalonde would probably want to x-ray his brain and Bro would laugh his ass off, but he outright asks John (because John is John and he trusts John not to dock him points on the cool kid meter because of a stupid question or five) and John blinks at him. Not the weird blank look he gets lately when his brain is struggling not to stop responding, just the regular old baffled incomprehension of a kid whose best friend just asked if he can hear the music.
"Dude, I have no idea what you're talking about," John says, and then he cups his hands around his ears like the dorky doofus that he is, cocking his head to the side as though that'll make the music magically appear. "Are you sure there's music? I'm not hearing anything."

"Just. Did you hear any music on those recordings yesterday, either?" Dave asks, raising an eyebrow. "Or just the voiceovers?"

"No." John fidgets, and now he has that shifty look, distant and hazy and on the verge of panicking. He's just come in from flying around and some of his cowlicks have completely lost control, sticking straight up and making his expression look all the more bewildered. "No, I didn't hear anything like that."

Dave nods shortly, because it's the answer he's expecting. "Figures I'd start hearing weird shit the moment we're all in the same building together," he mutters, leaning back on the wall and sticking his hands in his pockets. God, it feels good to be able to just talk to people again and have his hands free to do fuck all. Makes him itch to mix something again.

"What does it sound like?" John asks.

Dave grimaces. "Like a mess," he says, because it's the truth. He could mix smoother than this back when he was thirteen goddamn years old. The only sound with any consistency in his head is Karkat's; everyone else is crashing and cluttering along in an out of tune jumble. "I'll bet you a hundred bucks this is all because none of you dumbasses bothered getting fraymotifs in the game," Dave adds. "I'm the only one on top of the sick ass beats, as usual."

EB: but aren't we kind of already in a turf war if you think about it?
TG: eb has a point man
TG: essentially this entire shitstorm is one massive hero vs criminal pissing contest
EB: maybe to fight criminals...
TG: we need to create criminals of our own
EB: or just giant robots.
GG: i can do that! :D
TG: hell yeah i have the funds you have the technology rose has the unholy sea monsters john and karkat have the mind meld and johns dad has the endless supply of baked goods
TG: were fucking geniuses why are we all unemployed vigilantes TG: karkat ask the stabmaster if hes willing to change his last initial CG: HOLY SHIT YOU THREE NEED TO GET A LIFE. JOHN, WE'RE GETTING YOU A LIFE, AS SOON AS ALL THIS BLOWS OVER. DAVE, HARLEY - YOU'RE ON YOUR OWN, FUCKERS. I DECLARE THIS ENTIRE MEMO A MONUMENT TO YOUR COMBINED STUPIDITY, AND IN FIVE SECONDS I'M SHUTTING THE WHOLE THING DOWN SO WE CAN PRETEND NONE OF THIS EVER HAPPENED.
EB: ahaahaha! just like old times!
GG: but wait wait wait! :( i still need to consult dave on stuff!
TG: nope aint happening
TG: sorry jade casa striders timeline 101 is closed for business
EB: oh man, seriously?
GG: but science needs you! you don’t want to impede the course of science, do you?
EB: we're sorry, we can't let you do this, dave!
TG: your awful scifi references and science being needy cant sway me i am a goddamn rock
EB: they're not awful! that was a classic!
TG: it didn't even have mcconoonohoy in it i seriously doubt that counts as a classic in john egberts EB: mcconaughey!
GG: urrrgh! come on! :/
CG: I'M TELLING YOU, HARLEY. THE DICK. JUST. PUNCH IT.
GG: uhhhh, i'm pretty sure i could do serious damage, so let's not do that!
CG: DO IT. IN THE NAME OF YOUR PRECIOUS, PRECIOUS SCIENCE.
GG: ...
TG: okay no jade fuck no
EB: i can't believe we've reached this point again already. :| how does it always end up with someone threatening to punch someone else in the groin?!
TG: because we all have filthy filthy minds TG: karkats being filthier than most TG: also we think violence solves problems
TG: now jade was raised by a reincarnated hellbeast johns dad is secretly a scary ass motherfucker and i had bro who thinks katanas are an appropriate present for a third grader but i have no idea what your excuse is karkat CG: HA. LUSII ARE ESSENTIALLY VIOLENT PRIMITIVE WASTES OF SPACE, JUST AS LIKELY TO TRY TO CULL THEIR CHARGE AS RAISE IT. THERE'S A FUCKING GOOD REASON GRUB CENTERS HAD TO GET OVERHAULED TO DELAY CUSTODIAN ASSIGNMENTS, YOU CULTURALLY INEPT MORON.
EB: and hey, my dad isn't scary!
TG: uh
GG: whomp whomp...
CG: FUCK.

There's apparently a furious debate as to how much stuff from the previous universe has carried over. Doc Lalonde's people are all over it, since apparently ectobiological shit and paradox wrinkles are kind of their gig, and Dave gets pulled aside by more than one scientist jacked up on coffee and possibly other stimulants of questionable legality, all of them chattering about synchronicity and testing initiatives and that's enough to send Dave flashstepping out of the room faster than Bro when he realizes the Muppets are on.

But then Jade corners him and drags him into helping her with her science thing, and that's when Dave realizes this whole thing has the potential to execute a flying backward somersault off the handle in the conksuckiest way possible.

See, Jade believes the whole game-induced meteor apocalypse thing is doomed to happen again. She's absolutely sure that their powers, their weird hero complexes, have carried over not just because the universe is a fucked up reset version of itself, but because the game is gearing up to start again. If this is a thought that has occurred to literally anyone else in this entire laboratory, they have yet to mention it aloud.

And while Dave is kind of sitting over here in the lonely camp of 'let's just not play this game if and when it rears its ugly mug, thereby averting the fucking end of the world, and everyone will be finer than cheese on enchiladas,' Jade has this kind of blind certainty that's hard to shake.

And she's certain they're all going to end up playing again.

"Grandpa told me all about it, before he left." Jade's feet are the only things visible at the moment. They're in the conference room from hell, and Jade is mucking around under the hellscreens themselves, lying on her back and tucked up in the mess of wires that the Querent pieced together to recreate her Queen's Hub. One of her hands can just barely be seen twining between the wires, smeared with something black and oily. "John's Nanna knew a lot more, but she passed on as much as she could to him so he could teach me. So the world's definitely gonna end!"

Dave shakes his head, uncapping a blue expo marker and dragging the nearest rolling whiteboard over to where he's sitting on the conference table. Karkat has absolutely zero art skills to speak of, so Dave considers any and all additions he makes to the board - this one dedicated to Doc Scratch's meddling in the game session - a service to humanity. He draws, with totally ironic precision, the exact features and expression of Hella Jeff in the center of Karkat's shitty rendition of a cue ball.

"Way to be a fucking optimist about this, Jade, like damn," he comments. "How about we just slow our roll on the whole doomsday thing, alright? Or just. Better yet. Not even fucking roll at all. Jesus."

To Jade's credit, she follows Dave's less than coherent moments pretty well. She's pretty slick, when she isn't being a total dweeb to rival even John. "Pass me the screwdriver, I can't reach it with all this voidy stuff in the way," she orders, sticking a hand out through the wires at an awkward angle and making grabby motions. Dave heaves a sigh and tosses her the screwdriver she'd pulled out of god knows where earlier. "Thanks!" She snatches the tool out of the air with uncanny accuracy and then twists her arm back into the wires to start unscrewing a panel. He almost convinces himself she hasn't said anything because he's managed to win her over with flawless logic, but then Jade hums and says, "But we have to roll, Dave. Even if we tried to stop it by not playing, there'd always be a timeline where we did play, and that's the one that would count. You're the one who should know that, Dave! Time is your thing!"

...Well, everything in him screams that that would be a shitty idea, so they're not going to do that. Dave scratches the side of his nose irritably and almost leaves a line of marker across his cheek. "The time thing is overrated, Jade. I swear, I'm going to rebrand myself the Bro of Things, just to give the comic uber-nerds everywhere a minor aneurysm." Dave says, rolling his eyes behind his shades. "I'll do stuff. And things. None of it time related. I'll give up my sword and use only shitty sords. It will be my ironic swan song."

If he'd been alone, he'd have started humming to himself as the words of a fucking ancient meme abruptly shunt themselves into his brain like a blissfully ironic earworm. Sweet Bro and Hella Jeff, will get some stuff, and do some things...

"Alright Dave, if you say so! You're the expert on cool stuff!" Jade chirps back. A clanking noise echoes from behind the screens, and when she speaks again it's muffled. "Besides, I know you'd never let us down, no matter how you choose to ascend the echeladder!"

Someday, Dave is going to host a game show. The only two contestants will be John and Jade, and they're going to compete to see who can be the most dorkily, sincerely earnest nerdlord this side of the Atlantic. Rose can be the co-judge, because Rose is pretty much the only person in all of paradox space with the credentials to psychoanalyze nerdlords and determine who is being the most sincere. Of course, given their personalities, Jade would turn the whole thing into a science experiment and John would fail to see the beautiful irony of it all and try to make it a pranking contest, and Rose would no doubt turn her freakish psychic analysis onto Dave because Rose has a goddamn problem.

Or Jade could be kidnapped, and John could lose his shit, and Rose could turn grimdark all over again, and oh for fuck's sake, he told himself he wasn't going to think about all this shit.

Frustrated, Dave draws the y of Jeff's mouth with reckless abandon and then caps the marker, his mouth twitching with something that threatens to become a full-on frown if he doesn't keep himself in check. Keep it cool, keep it cool.

Fuck it. Dave tosses the blue marker aside and says, "You know what. Karkat is right."
Jade slides out from under the computers, her jaw dropping. Her hair is abuzz with regular static electricity that makes strands of heavy dark curls frizz out to stick to the machine parts around her, and her green eyes are threatening to bug out of their sockets. Seriously, her and John - no filter.

Even as he thinks that, Jade sucks in a huge intake of breath, as though ready to start razzing him.

Before she can say a word, Dave cuts her off. "No, hear me out. He's right. That absolute fucker is right." Dave uncaps a red expo marker to start in on Sweet Bro. "Fuck everything about this. I regret everything about this super extended family vacation. We're all going back to regular hero work. Starting, like, fucking yesterday. I will personally take all of us back in time and we'll go back to John's house and pretend none of this bullshit ever happened. We'll just eat Dadbert out of house and home and kick the shit out of any criminal who crosses us."

His voice might have got a little loud at the end there. He's blaming it on the new collar. Probably breaking down already. Piece of shit machine.

"Well, I'm totally down for crime fighting!" Jade fidgets with the screwdriver, visible hesitation in her face. "But also you agreeing with Karkat on anything seems like a bad idea."

"You're telling me," Dave says grimly. "I'd say it was a sign the world was ending, except oh wait."

There's a moment of weird silence from Jade that stretches long enough that Dave glances down at her feet. They're twitching a little in her shoes, and he's about to start inching forward - because what if she's having some kind of fucking seizure under there - when the strangled, panting laughter starts. Something in the Hub clangs loudly, like an elbow spastically slamming into the side of a modem, and Jade just starts howling and wheezing with laughter.

Well, at least someone around here appreciates his sense of humor.

EB: karkat, you too? what is it with you guys!
TG: just
TG: pretty sure your dad could fuck shit up TG: secretly
TG: with baked goods
GG: like, my grandpa's files didn't even have a lot on him, but he was definitely in armed forces or something so he's like a total badass!
CG: LOATHE AS I AM TO AGREE WITH EITHER OF THESE TWO ON ANYTHING - EB: aghhhhhhhhh! you guys!
GG: i mean, what did your dad do? like military, navy, or what, john? inquiring minds want to know!
EB: uh...
CG: WAIT. HANG ON. WHY DON'T I KNOW THE ANSWER TO THIS? SURELY THIS HAS BEEN MENTIONED BEFORE. MY THINKPAN CANNOT BE THAT SHITTY.
EB: i don't know if we should be talking about this...
TG: do you know
TG: oh my god john if not even you know what your dad did for a living before you arrived via space debris -
GG: of course he knows! :P right john?
EB: i just mean it's my dad's private business! he doesn't even talk about it to me a whole lot, and he wouldn't want me to talk about it online regardless!
EB: maybe if he said it was okay we could talk about it when we're all in the same room again, but not on pesterchum!
TG: oh man
TG: im having war flashbacks
TG: to the days when john didnt want to discuss anything personal over chatlogs TG: and refused to use real names for days at a time
TG: good times
EB: bluh bluh, very funny dave. hilarious. :P
EB: selfie repeats. that is all.
TG: john no you promised
CG: WHAT ARE YOU EVEN ON ABOUT NOW, YOU BLATHERING FUCKWITS?
GG: seriously!
TG: oh man youve never had to deal with panicky secret identity means secret john TG: i feel like such a fucking hipster now im the only one here with exposure to vintage john TG: you guys
TG: he was so paranoid
TG: you dont even know
EB: daaaave!
CG: OKAY NO WHAT THE FUCK WAS THAT.
EB: uh...was that on purpose? :O
CG: NO OH MY GOD WHAT THE FUCK WHAT THE ACTUAL FUCK - CG: BLOOD BROTHER.
CG: NO STOP THAT. WHOEVER THE FUCK IS DOING THAT. STOP IT RIGHT THE FUCK NOW.
CG: HARLEY -
GG: don't look at me! :P
CG: YOU'VE BEEN DICKING AROUND WITH PESTERCHUM LIKE SOME KIND OF MEDDLING DICKBISCUIT FOR DAYS NOW. LOOK ME IN THE EYE AND TELL ME YOU HAVE NOT SOMEHOW FUCKED UP THE CODING FOR MY QUIRK, YOU BUCKET OF BLISTER DISCHARGE.
GG: uh, gross! and no, why would i just randomly make it so your font changes?
GG: i'm not even sure if it's possible to do that for just one phrase! i'm not some computer genius, you know...
EB: maybe it's something rose and kanaya's friend did when he made the app more secure?
EB: i mean, maybe if i type it like Blood Brother...
TG: shit man
EB: there it goes again!
GG: there, process of elimination! it's not just you, karkat!
CG: THIS IS SO STUPID. WHY IS THIS EVEN A THING THAT'S HAPPENAHGODANBDGKM
EB: ...karkat?
TG: idk bro that looks like just got stabbed keyboard smash to me
CG: SHUT YOUR SQUAWK BLISTER DAVE.
TG: haha oh my god
TG: it totally was
The summons comes a little after midday.

Dave's had a good streak going, but he screws the pooch when he walks out of the conference room without doing a spot check. And Bro, being a magnificent asshole, has never been one to miss out on an opportunity to ambush him. Dave senses the attack coming only at the last moment, and only because everyone has learned to be paranoid about clanking noises in the air vents since word got around that Spades uses them as hiding places. He looks up and dodges to the side, just in time for the mangled remains of an entire bedframe to crash out of the open ventilation shaft in the ceiling and land in a heap where he was just standing.

Dave looks up in horror because how did Bro even fit that in the vent?

A piece of paper gently wafts out of said vent a moment later and flaps down to land on his face. Dave, being the picture of ice cold pose that he is, brushes it off violently with both hands, flailing until he realizes that nothing else is coming at him. He glances around, spooked, but no one seems to be around to have witnessed that display of completely ironic composure.

He snags the note off the ground and sprints away from the vent to read it a few yards away. The note's been written on a scrap of paper torn out of a Game Bro magazine (ha fucking ha, Bro) in black ink, the letters so thin and scratchy it almost looks like the pen ran out of ink a few times.

bro roof

we're doing this man

we're making this TRANSPIRE

"Dave?"

Dave crushes the note in his hand and looks up. Jade hangs out the door of the conference room, blinking, with a fistful of wires in her grip. "Did someone just throw a bed through the vent?" she asks. "That's so awesome!"

Oh. It's on.

There's a glass skylight in the exact center of the roof, which is really goddamn inconvenient when you're fighting for your life. You'd figure it would be relatively easy to just fucking avoid it, but from the moment Dave sets foot on the roof Bro batters him toward the skylight, a blur as he yanks on Dave's shirt and smacks the back of his head and sends Lil Cal slithering in fitful twists around his ankles to trip him up.

Bro is fighting like a complete and utter shithead, in other words. He hasn't jerked Dave around this badly in years, and it's even more annoying now than Dave remembers it being. There's also antennae and satellite dishes scattered around the roof, and while neither of the Striders would care about breaking the radio tower or the AC unit back home, Dave gets the feeling that Rue would absolutely wreck their collective shit if they messed up any experiments down below.

The most frustrating part, really, is the fact that Dave knows he could be better than this. An arm slams into his side, right over the white scar of the stab wound that only just healed enough to stop bothering him all the time, and knocks him off balance, hard enough that it'll definitely bruise by tonight. Dave can only uselessly, wordlessly grunt in protest as he retaliates with a strike that meets air. When he regains his balance, the back of his left heel slips on something slick, and he realizes he's been driven back over the skylight again. The glass creaks ominously underfoot; he shifts his weight back to his right side and sweeps his left leg around so at least when he parries Bro's next attack he doesn't fall flat on his ass.

It's like no matter what he tries, he can never catch up to Bro. Not in this universe, or any other sick copy of it. And it's aggravating as hell. Dave pauses time and takes the opportunity to put some space between him and the window, and in the interim he spies Bro lurking behind a satellite dish, his stupid fucking polo collar popped so most of his lower face is in shadow, mouthless, his shades a sharp-edged screen.
Why are we like this?

Time slots back into its regular rhythm, and Bro vanishes again. Dave's sword stabs through the afterimage that's left behind, but even the humiliation of missing by a fucking mile gets turbo-boosted when a solid right hook plows into the side of his face.

Maybe it jostles something in his head the wrong way, because -

He stops at the plateau on the way to the Battlefield.

Jack Noir couldn't shatter the katana. It wasn't some piece of shit practically designed to get downgraded to a shitty-ass 1/2bladekind. Shit was unbreakable. Unbelievably rad. Probably a collector's item.

So he just shoved it through Bro like a hot knife through butter.

Might Davesprite got to say something before the end, but Dave is far too late. It's a real goddammn riot, being the single most shitty excuse for a Time player ever to have the turntables thrust upon him. There's a faint static buzzing in his head, like someone chattering in his ear too close and too far away at the same time, and when he gets down on one knee all he can hear echoing in his head over and over again is you were the hero. Not me. Never me.

- he kind of has some idea of why John doesn't like to remember things. Dave spits at the taste of copper pennies on his tongue, grimacing, and catches himself on the dish by way of landing ass-first in the concave part, jolting the entire apparatus down with a resounding squeal so that it angles toward a tree in the distance instead of the sky. The bottom of the rim cuts into the backs of his thighs, sharp enough to make him suck in a breath.

"Too slow on your feet, kid," Bro says. Lil Cal has his arms hooked under Bro's scruffy chin, just a hint of that horrific grin peeking over his shoulder, usually a sign that within moments the puppetkind will end up battering at Dave's face as yet another distraction before the beatdown recommences.

What really grinds his gears is that Bro doesn't even sound disappointed. He never does. It's just a statement of a fact, accompanied by a relentless barrage of asskicking. Like it doesn't matter how hard Dave forces his legs to move or which way he flip flops through time; it'll always end with him capping out, winded and too spent to move, while Bro is still far in the distance like an unattainable pinnacle of badassery. Even when these fights end on Dave's terms, it's the kind of terms that involve getting himself impaled like a total newb. Just once he'd like to - Bro's face twitches and he whips around to auto-parry a second Dave at the last moment.

Well, alright, Dave didn't even know he was going to pull the time traveling card, but he's learned to just stop questioning it and exploit the random future-Daves as they come along. Trusting that he'll tell himself when to jump back, Dave grabs the edges of the satellite dish and hauls himself onto his feet, sprinting forward.

"Go high!" the future-Dave shouts like a useless goddamn dinglehopper, so Dave has to do the exact opposite and drop low because Bro obviously heard that and Lil Cal's head is creaking around one hundred and eighty degrees to bare its teeth at Dave from its perch on Bro's back. Dave kicks out and scores a glancing hit on the back of Bro's heel, but kicking is not his thing at all and then Lil Cal just drops and he has a face full of creepyass murderpuppet to deal with.

The third Dave rips Cal away from Dave's face and rolls away still fending off the puppet's groping hands; that Dave plants a knee on the puppet, raising a broken half of a sword over his head and driving it through Cal's plush chest, while current-Dave takes advantage of the lack of puppet to stop freaking the fuck out and assess the situation. He suddenly has three of himself to work with, which is something he hasn't tried except in non-combat situations. Like, he had maybe four of himself running loops at one point during the startup phase of his apple juice business, but that hadn't involved any need to coordinate all those extra bodies in a fight.

\[ \Gamma^t = /// \text{ (and drop)} \]

Luckily, the other two have more of an idea of what's going on than Dave does. This is a common theme with future versions of himself. The third has Lil Cal pinned, which is a full time gig because Cal is a fucking menace and still trying to twine boneless arms around the third-Dave's neck.

Dave focuses on the fight with Bro, partially because he wants fuck all to do with Lil Cal and partially because the second-Dave needs serious backup. There's only so much a single Dave can do against Bro, after all. Dave rolls to the side and slices at Bro's leg this time with a proper cut of his sword. The weight of the blade feels off in his hands, the black grip twisting roughly against his palm, but Dave follows through, watching for the moment when Bro's afterimage blurs out of the way.

Time hiccups to a stop. Dave's slice still misses, but only by inches, Bro frozen in the act of raising his foot to plant a kick in the middle of Dave's shades. The second Dave, the one who froze that particular second in time, comes up underneath Bro's raised guard and jabs for the throat.

A shudder, and time fails to restart because the third Dave picks up where the second left off. Dave almost feels phantom fireworks go off in his head, his brain anticipating the blowback of holding time still for too long but never actually experiencing it. Shaking it off, Dave hesitates - and slams his shoulder into Bro's leg, the one that isn't poised to kick him. When time presses in, ready to start running the clock again, Dave handles the flashstep himself, pausing for long enough that the third Dave yanks the 1/2bladekind out of Lil Cal and chucks the broken hilt at nothing, a good three feet away from any of them -

Time restarts. Bro curses, low and muffled, and when the elder Strider has to sidestep the sword coming at his neck he winds up kicking Dave flat in the center of his back in an effort to kick himself free. Old instinct kicks in and Dave drops his sword to wrap his arms around Bro's leg, clinging like Lil Cal on a strangulation attempt, and somehow he must slow Bro down enough that the third Dave's seemingly wild, half-assed throw actually connects. The bottom of the flying hilt smacks into the back of Bro's head.

It doesn't make much of an impact, but it certainly works as even more of a distraction. Bro grunts, leg muscle flexing under Dave's grip as he prepares to probably kick the current version off, and the second Dave, cool as anything, slides in to level the sword specibus at Bro's jugular again.

Bro's sword blurs out, and suddenly the second Dave has only half a specibus left. The flimsy, piece of shit sword shatters, cracking loud enough to set Dave's teeth on edge.

It's the third Dave who lays an unbroken sword against the other side of Bro's neck. Bro reacts, or maybe he anticipates the strike as usual - it's too close to tell who drew first from Dave's shitty vantage point - and meets the threat with one of his own, whipping around to tap the third Dave's collarbone with his katana. Dave only wonders where that second sword came from for a moment before he realizes he's the one who dropped it for the third Dave to pick up and continue the fight.

Bro's head cocks to the side, considering, but he doesn't move to knock the third Dave down, and that's when Dave figures out what just happened. Bro and the future Dave both have a sword to each other's throats, too close for either one to risk pulling away.
That's a stalemate.

Well, shit.

-EB: uh, rose...
EB: should you really be drinking? that seems like, uh...not a good thing.
TT: John, your always trying to keep me right. :) This is why where besties.

TG: karkat sobbing into his vodka because hes realized troll will smith will never love him back CG: YOU SHUT YOUR WHORE MOUTH.
TG: this image shines in my minds eye like a goddamn beacon karkat you cant silence the truth
Later, when Dave has caught up with the third copy of himself, he finds himself staring down the point of a bladekind, meeting Bro stare for stare behind the mutual blankfaced consideration of their shades. Dave can't even feel his hand; it's numb as fuck from the force of the blow that shattered the sword earlier, and he's half-sure that if he hadn't seen himself pull this off already, he would never have had the balls to just toss a broken sword at Bro's head and hope for the best. Bro's hat sits askew on his gelled thatch of hair, but he's still not even breathing hard compared to Dave's shaky hands.

"Getting there," Bro says off-handedly, and then he's gone.

The whole ironically cryptic thing? Is getting really old, really fast.

Still, Dave didn't even get stabbed in this strife, so at least he has that much he can gloat about and rub in Karkat's face. He hands the unbroken sword to his past self without a word so that version of Dave can go back in time to become the second, watches the second go back to become the current him, and wonders when shit like this became normal.

TT: ho nooooo :(

Mom Lalonde is waiting at the bottom of the stairs when Dave has walked off the post-strife adrenalin jitters, and the look on her face is almost enough to send him flashstepping back up the stairs out of self preservation.

"Dave, dear," she says, her smile sweet enough to inflict tooth decay by proxy. "May I ask why Lab Fourteen just began channeling college basketball, when it was directed to study unidentified objects in near geostationary orbit?"

Under the inscrutable force of her stern motherly smile, Dave becomes uncomfortably aware not just of the fresh coat of sweat covering him from head to toe, but also of the incredible amounts of guilt that a parental figure can instill with a raised eyebrow. Bro may be many things, but a guilter has never been one of them.

"It was totally Bro's fault," are the first words he blurs out.

The smile takes on the distinct character of aspartame, and Dave gulps.

"Dave. Perhaps it is time we discuss exactly where it is and is not acceptable to strife in a professional setting, seeing as Ambrose seems to have been a tad neglectful in your education."

Oh god. He's so fucked.

Seattle's source for up-to-the-minute weather forecasts, severe weather watches and warnings, radar and more!

Severe Weather Alert

[last updated 05:11:56 PDT]

The National Weather Service in Seattle has extended the high wind warning for western Washington, including King, Chelan, Okanogan, Whatcom, Skagit, Snohomish, and Douglas Counties. Expect gusts to 40 MPH.

In addition, the NWS Storm Prediction Center has issued a severe thunderstorm watch for portions of the greater northwest Washington area affected by an inbound low-pressure front, effective until late Monday afternoon. Hail up to one (1) inch in diameter, thunderstorm wind gusts to 70 MPH, and dangerous lightning are possible in this area. Storm cells in the developing stage have been spotted as far south as Pierce County.

Remember, a severe thunderstorm watch means conditions are favorable for severe thunderstorms in and close to the watch area. Persons in the immediate vicinity should be on the lookout for threatening weather conditions. Severe thunderstorms can and occasionally do produce tornadoes.

Remembering's dangerous. The past, after all, is such a worrying, anxious place.

Someone said that. John can't remember who, at the moment. But he's sure it was someone suitably famous, like Howie Mandel or Ophelian Rutledge or the Batman or something. Not Nicolas Cage though. He would totally remember if it was a Cage line!
The point is, his head feels like it's about to crack in three or something! No matter how hard he tries to mash everything down and keep it together, he keeps catching himself remembering something that never happened except, uh. It did happen. He supposes he can admit that now. But it didn't happen to him, not the him that counts, anyway, so it's not fair that suddenly his dumb brain's full of all these treacherous pitfalls, to the point where he remembers, he knows for a fact that he spent his childhood learning to play the piano and playing more pranks and gags and abjuring any and all baked goods, not just the Betty Crocker ones. Sometimes it's the memories of the real him that feel as thin as a slice of plastic, flimsy and sharp around the edges, and he can't imagine why he'd spend more than fifteen years of his life in intensive training to prepare him for a career as a super hero. It sounds vaguely unreal, and that sense of unreality scares him almost more than the game itself.

And now, he doesn't even have the luxury of forgetting. The spotty, murky places that have popped up over the course of the past few days - and even a few before that, sections of time where his memories have veered abruptly to the right or left in an attempt to avoid touching on something dark and cold and unpleasant - stand out in his mind like shallow pits. Things like Jade chattering to him because she doesn't understand why he has his super powers but not a sylladex, his dad explaining that the meteor that brought John to Earth blew Nanna and her prank shop to smithereens, Karkat messaging him about messed up dreams where everybody dies...

He's pretty sure no one else, not even Rose, has this much of the game still muddling around in the back of their minds. Or at least, Rose is too drunk to admit to it, Dave has shrugged and gone off on a tangent about Barack Obama every time John asks, and Jade was kind of bummed out about the dying thing for about five seconds before she got excited about the science of reality-warping video games again. To be honest it kind of freaks John out that Jade would probably welcome the chance to remember it all for herself. In fact, she'd be all for it!

He's the one who has messed his brain up doing everything not to remember. Which kind of sucks, a lot. He can't even remember when he made that first decision to stop thinking about anything that pinged too strongly on his subconscious; did he ever decide that? It's not like he's Rose, able to go inside her own head to shape it however she wants. If he did make the conscious choice to force his brain to reset every time he thought of something related to the game, he doesn't have the memory of that, either. He's just him, just John, and apparently he's even more useless than he always thought he was.

…Oh. Whoops! Haha, he's trying not to think like that right now. The last thing anyone needs is for John to get all mopey and stuff on top of everything else that's going on! He's already maxed out his mental breakdown quota for the weekend, and Karkat doesn't need to have to deal with all that again when he's still hurt.

So he does what he always wants to do when the walls start pressing in and his head aches. There's no one else around but Doctor Lalonde's assistants, all of whom seem kind of over-informed about John's powers - he gets the feeling that what Doctor Lalonde knows, she then has her bevy of scientists research to within an inch of their lives, and even if they didn't know his name and alias when the Lalondes lived in Washington, they definitely know it now. And since no one can reach this particular valley without a guide who knows where they're going, John figures if he stays pretty low and in the clouds no one will see anything they shouldn't.

Maybe he doesn't ask his dad because he suspects - he knows - Dad would disapprove. This kind of reckless behavior is exactly the sort of thing he hates, and guilt gnaws like a physical ache as John figures out exactly where his dad is - in one of the rooms near the conference room that has become their center of operations, probably catching up on all the paperwork from his job that he had to skip out on to supervise a houseful of super-powered teenagers for the past few days. John sits outside the office door for too long while nagging himself to just open the door and say something, just get it over with, and eventually he waffles back and forth long enough that one of the doctors rushing past with a stack of black sheets of paper stops and eyeballs him with avid curiosity, and John hastily absconds before she can question him loud enough for his dad to hear. He checks in with Doctor Lalonde instead, takes her distracted nod as permission, and then hightails it out of there before she can change her mind.

So, since he can't avoid remembering little details, flashes of a life that he didn't live, he avoids his dad. His dad, who only ever wants to make sure John is safe and okay and urghhhhh. It's the kind of stupid, dumb logic that will probably piss Karkat off to no end when he catches on. But Karkat's still neckdeep in his charts when John comes in to tell him where he's going to be, so John mostly sort of manages to completely avoid the subject there, too.

Karkat's sitting cross-legged on the table and muttering to himself when John tiptoes into the conference room. There's something on one of the computer screens on the far wall that he pointedly doesn't look at because there's far too much electric green involved, and he bounces over to rest his chin on top of Karkat's head, barely skimming the white boards full of Karkat's angry diagrams and scribbles with his eyes. "No dicks," he observes, because Karkat went off on Dave already once today about vandalizing his chart, and he figures it's a hilarious way to bring Karkat out of his intense speculation mood.

He is not disappointed. "WHERE?!" Karkat demands, whipping his head around so fast he nearly beans John with a horn. Then - "Wait, no dicks? Fuck, it's a Christmas miracle," he says, turning to look at John, with a frown that might be construed as a tired smile in Karkatese.

Behind him, Dave winks into sight, Expo marker already in hand. He raises a finger to his mouth when he sees John raising both eyebrows at him, and proceeds to turn one of Karkat's drawings of a prototyped ring into a dick with a flourish before vanishing to whenever in the past or future he came from.

Seriously. Time travel has some serious pranking potential. John has got to talk to Dave about expanding beyond basic stuff like dick graffiti! For now, he's just gonna keep his mouth shut. "I'm going outside to fly. Wanna come?" he says instead of warning Karkat about the drive-by vandalism, leaning in so that he's pressing against Karkat's shoulder. "You've been in here for ages, and I know Jade's been talking about messing with the wires on those computers."

"Is that what she's on about?" Karkat says, his nose wrinkling up as he grimaces at his phone, which is sitting a few feet away on the table. "After a while I just stopped checking. I mean, why is it that we're all in the same building and yet we're texting just as fucking much as ever? Fuck, Dave doesn't even have any fucking excuse anymore."

"I have no clue, man," John says, shrugging. "Everyone's just kind of off doing their own thing, I guess. Processing stuff. Besides, if she came here in person and talked to you about it, you'd just end up arguing."

"It's what I do." Karkat recaps his own Expo marker and shifts to look at John more easily, which at least means he won't notice Dave's artwork anytime soon. "I don't know about flying right now, but I guess I can haul my sorry carcass outside for a while. Act like I'm not a fucking invalid. Get some fresh air like the lusus is always nagging me about."

"Air," John repeats, seized by a moment of hysterical glee. Because air. The next time Karkat wants to watch reruns of the Fresh Prince, he had better prepare himself for an absolutely obnoxious amount of waggling eyebrows and elbow jabs.

"Shut up." Karkat spins the marker between his claws absentely. "And then I need to drag Slick out from wherever he's fucked off too. Apparently someone else got stabbed this morning, and guess who's the prime suspect. You get one try, and if the first guess isn't Spades Slick, it doesn't fucking count."

"Oh, wow. He seems kind of...incredibly violent," John comments, scratching the back of his head. "Should you be hanging out with him at all? He stabbed you." He's still kind of miffed about that, because on the one hand, Spades Slick seems to have a genuine grudge against the Midnight Crew, and they definitely need all the help they can get dealing with those guys! But on the other, John gets the feeling that if he met Slick in a dark alley in the middle of the night, he'd be the kind of guy Heir would want to arrest. And despite Karkat's growing nonchalance about stab wounds in the face of his more serious injuries, John is so not okay with anyone who actively sets out to hurt his best friend! "Also, how did he even get here?" he asks, as this seems like an incredibly good question. "I thought this place was hidden."

"Fuck if I know." Karkat rolls his eyes. "Aliens, John. We're dealing with actual, literal aliens. From a video game that bombards planets with space debris for its own sick amusement and spawns universe frogs because why the fuck not. Why are any of them here?"

John winces, because the earth is gone but that's a distant thought; none of them have time for that to sink in before they're fighting for their lives, and they never really have the opportunity to mourn the loss of their entire species before things get even weirder, and the impression that thought leaves in his head gives him a migraine that he can't stamp out. "Good question," he says. "But also I meant, like, how he got here as in the lab, not...existentially here."

"I'll ask. I'm sure the answer will make me doubt our mental competency yet again." Karkat sighs heavily, casting a sour look at the television screen and the wolf outlined in green that John is not looking at. "Anyway, I'll finish up with this last section and meet you out there."

"Sounds good! I need to go change anyway," John says, grinning back. He messes up Karkat's hair just for the chance to have that sour look directed at him - it's so good to see Karkat in his usual bad mood, instead of the sickly ones - and pushes off from the table to make for the door.

The table creaks behind him, and Karkat says, "Hang on, should you be dicking around outside at all? What happened to all of us playing least in sight?" When John looks back, the first inklings of suspicion have reached Karkat's face and oops! That's John's cue to boot it!

He laughs nervously, "Yeah! Doctor Lalonde said it was cool, so I should be okay!" John calls back over his shoulder, not stopping for even a second. He may or may not nudge the door with a tug on the breeze so that it shuts behind him faster than usual, and he raises a hand to wave at Karkat's outraged face just as the door closes. "See you out there!" And with that he sprints off down the hallway to grab his things, before Karkat can put two and two together to get five and spare change. Karkat is kind of scary good at noticing when John's avoiding stuff and then making John deal with it instead of burying it.

Not that John minds it! He just wants to fly first, to clear his head out in the open air, before they have to rake up all that gross stuff. Yeah. That!

Surprisingly, Oriole, not Karkat, shows up first. In fact, he's loitering in the lobby when John finishes changing into his costume and heads for the front door, and he salutes John's approach with a half-empty bottle of water in one hand. "Never try to go shot for shot with Rose," are the first words out of his mouth, before he takes another gulp of water. "Like. Oh my god. That was unreal. I don't get hungover, but I think last night almost made it happen."

John makes a face as he tucks his mask up over his nose. "You were drinking with her?" he says
"Because alcohol tastes nasty but being drunk is fun." The look on John's face must not improve, because Oriole rubs at his eyes with his hand. "Jesus, I'm surrounded by teenage teetotalers. How is that even possible? You've never been drunk?"

"Nope!" John shrugs. "It sounds overrated. And, uh. Also probably dangerous, all things considered. A hero needs to be in full control of their faculties at all times!"

It took everyone half the morning to realize that Rose's sporadic messages and increasingly ludicrous spelling mistakes were the result of her drunk-texting them all in between negotiations with her mother for - something. Rose has not been entirely clearly what. Like, John is all for her and Doctor Lalonde reconciling, if that's really what Rose wants to do, no matter how ambivalent he might feel about Doctor Lalonde personally. But also he's never dealt with a drunk Rose before. In fact, if you'd asked him back in middle school if he could ever see Rose drinking, he'd have laughed so hard he'd have broken a kidney or something! She'd always scrunched up her nose when her mother was around even when the smell of alcohol wasn't all that bad, primly firing snarky comments at Doctor Lalonde about the latest addition to her collections of wizard statues and bottles of gin, and on at least one occasion sardonically informed John that she would drink if and only if porcine mammals took flight.

Which is kind of why, after a certain point, he and Dave had privately agreed to give Kanaya a heads up as to Rose's whereabouts. Rose had extracted promises from apparently everyone using the group memos to keep Kanaya in the dark, but that just felt kind of shitty? Especially when it became really obvious that Kanaya was seriously freaking out.

Urgh. Hopefully Rose won't be mad about them going back on their promises. But. Well. He's realized there's a lot about Rose's life he doesn't know. Which is fair! There's a lot about him that's changed since she left, too. But still, the Rose John grew up with always knew when he was wearing one of his totally awesome gag disguises, even though they only ever talked over the voice Pesterchum app. He hadn't even known what Rose looked like aside from a few pictures everyone exchanged at some point, hadn't seen her until he glanced around and saw three dead bodies lying on their quest beds -

That needs to stop.

"Only because you're a bunch of grossly overpowered weirdos," Oriole is muttering as he sips on the water when John snaps back to the present. "You're going outside?"

Heck yeah. He needs to clear his head. Like, stat. "Yup."

"Mm." And just like that, with a lazy shrug and a sigh, Oriole kind of invites himself along. Not entirely sure if Rose lived in Washington or not in this life or the previous one, John snaps his goggles on and pushes the double doors open, and the wind rushes in to greet him like an old friend.

That, at least, feels like a constant.
In response to the escalating surge of unsolved arson attempts and bombings in the downtown area, the Department of Homeland Security, in conjunction with the Federal Villain Response Team, has issued an upgraded Terror Level for Seattle from Yellow to Orange (high risk of terrorist attacks). A representative of the FVRT is expected to make a statement Monday morning.

No known terror groups have claimed responsibility for the attacks, and there has been no official statement on how the city intends to deal with unauthorized vigilante justice in light of this heightened rating. Mayor Xiao-xing Brinner remains unavailable for comment.

John doesn't read weather reports. He and his dad stopped bothering to tune into the morning meteorologist forecasts years ago, once they realized that a side effect of John's being so in tune with the wind around him was that he could predict barometric shifts long before they actually happened. Most of the time, he's better at predicting how the weather will turn out than any machine.

But as John swoops through the clouds that have drifted in to form heavy ripples in the sky, he notices something a little...odd. When he climbs, he can see that a lot of them are towering cumulus clouds, piles of moisture that have only just begun to shade grey, but tootally the first stages of thunderclouds. An updraft of warm air catches him midloop and John lets it waft him upward despite the dampness, squinting up through the veils of grey.

It's not acting like a normal storm. By now all the moisture in these updrafts should have capped out at a certain altitude, reached the highest point they can reach, and started to freeze. But none of these clouds are growing anymore, as far as John can tell. They're just...hanging out. There's not even enough of a natural breeze to push them along and get them some momentum, so they're just sitting around like plump, damp balloons. And they spread out as far as he can see when he falls below them, stretching out to the south and west in sluggishly shifting pattern. Any way you look at it, the weather's just kind of gross, and it seems like it's going to stay that way for a while.

He thinks, if he wanted to, he could usher the clouds along. But give the wind shear enough of a boost, and the whole thing could get pretty ugly pretty fast! John has never exactly tested how much he can meddle with the weather using only the connection he has to the wind, but he's self-taught himself enough about the weather that he knows that obviously miniature tornadoes aren't out of the question. Whatever the heck has caused these clouds to stall out, he doesn't want to try to fix it and accidentally wind up launching a supercell at Oregon! That would just be inconsiderate!

Anyway, the whole thing kind of matches his mood, which he can appreciate. The breezes pick up when he's in the middle of them, twining around his ankles and wrists like they're looking for attention, and there are moments when he feel like they're alive, of course they are, he was so vibrantly happy to be alive when he breathed out that he could have sworn the wind coursing through him felt the same way, but he feels like it would take real effort to coax the flat, slow air farther from his body into motion. Even up here in the air John still feels fatigued and hemmed in, and if anything, all this flying around does is remind him of falling and failing, which is the last thing he wants to think about right now.

Bluh. Great. Even doing something he likes is hard! Anxious and pretty much just desperate to try anything that won't make him want to thump his own brain for being so shoddy, John somehow drags up the energy to whip the wind up into some interesting gusts and sends them spiraling at angles across the valley, making sure he doesn't hit anything or anyone important in the process. He needs the practice, right? It doesn't matter if before it felt as natural as breathing or that his dad's training over the years has mostly focused on keeping the wind under control and using it defensively and for hero work; if stuff keeps going wrong, he should work on controlling the bigger stuff too, before he ends up spawning a hurricane or something that he can't calm down. Sure, he clips the trees on occasion, but they can take it, and eventually John feels his head start to clear. It's kind of like a minor miracle and if he's supposed to be some kind of god, he is so taking credit for that. He sucks in a breath of air that's somehow not loaded with moisture and the cold of the altitude he's reached shoots straight to his brain with a sharp burst of clarity, soothing some of the raging headache that plagues him.

It's not perfect. It never has been. But for a moment John is just John, and it doesn't matter which memories he's got lurking around in his brain at any given time - he's him. Both versions of himself are real, even if the memories don't quite sync up. The impression doesn't last forever, but it - settles him, kind of. By the time he starts working up the confidence to mess around sculpting shapes out of the clouds (he's still not gonna risk moving them), he feels almost okay. If it's, you know, possible to be okay when your head is full of flashes of memory you never lived through.

...It's weird, yeah. But it only hurts when he tries to make the flashbacks stop happening. Clearly spending years of his life actively repressing them has only made the problems in his head worse, so...and this is some pretty off the wall logic, here, but...maybe he should...let them...happen?

He should probably talk to Rose about this. She's the expert on doing questionable stuff in one's own mental space. Also, Karkat, because Karkat just needs to be consulted about some things.

And. Possibly. His dad.

John's headache resurges in full force at the thought. Lame, lame, lame.

Eventually he has to come back down to earth, and that's when Karkat launches a pretty effective intervention! And by pretty effective intervention John means kissing was involved and his brain shuts down for a good three minutes before he realized Karkat was successfully guiding him through the halls of the lab without John putting up any resistance whatsoever.

He's totally not thinking about kissing Karkat. Right. No, okay, he totally is.
Agh! Focus! Play it cool!

...

It's no good. John's brain is kind of stuck replaying it. Vaguely dazed, John turns and stares at the side of Karkat's face, trying to remember exactly which parts fit where on his own face. What even happened with their noses? Why doesn't he remember, it literally happened like two minutes ago! He can't decide if he should be trying to kiss Karkat again or if he should feel pacified or aroused or if his nose went to the right or the left and this is incredibly important -

- no, wait, it's incredibly stupid. That's the word he's looking for. Catching himself, John snaps his gaze front and center just as Karkat casts a suspicious look at him.

Anyway, yeah. Haha, it was probably dumb of John to think he could keep on avoiding his dad like this, anyway. Karkat pretends he's not totally escorting John to make sure he keep his promise, but he totally is because this is Karkat and he does subtle like a go-kart crashing into a small child at ten miles an hour.

"Do you need me to go in there with you?" the troll asks as they near the office where John's dad has taken up residence. There's the faintest hint of a faint, chittering growl lingering in Karkat's voice, and John giggles because he's still incredibly entertained by the memory, vague and spotty though it may be, of Karkat getting all territorial and shouting at Dad from the safety of closet-pile. As loud and abrasive as he can be, Karkat has always had that kind of unnameable respect for and fear of a friend's parent while interacting with Dad, and that meant John got to laugh at him all the time for being so politely terrified. But now that the switch has been flipped, Karkat seems just as ready to go off on John's dad as he is pretty much everyone else in existence.

"I think I've got it. Uh. Er." John stares at the closed door with trepidation, sucking in a breath and holding it in his cheeks before letting it out in a rush. "Remind me why this is a good idea again."

Karkat slaps his own face with the palm of his hand. "Because he's your custodian, and you're being a petulant wriggler about something he probably never held against you in the first place," he suggests acridly, shaking his head.

"Right. That." John doesn't move.

"Oh, for fuck's sake," Karkat says, and that's all the warning John gets before Karkat reaches out, turns the door knob and opens the door, backpedaling as he does it so that when Dad looks up, startled, from his paperwork, the only one visible in the door frame is John, who is doing his best impression of a deer in the headlights.

"Son. Come in!" Dad says, setting his phone down on top of the stack of papers, his eyes flicking from John off to the side, in the direction that Karkat is now attempting to stealthily sprint backwards down the hall. There's something a little odd about seeing his dad in an office that's not his own, one where Doctor Lalonde's taste for sleek, modern styles shines through, but those manila filing folders are the same kind Dad's been using pretty much as long as John can remember. "You're still in uniform. Did something happen?"

That's about when John realizes that someone - Doctor Lalonde, probably - already told his dad that he was out flying. Oh gosh. He hadn't really even given the fact that he was going straight from flying to talking to his dad any thought, or that his dad might potentially be kind of pissed if he saw John had been flying without consulting him first; he just let Karkat usher him through the hall while still in Heir's costume because John had other things on his mind. Like kissing.
"N-ooo," he says, his voice cracking horrifically. It's kind of mortifying, and he clears his throat. "Nothing's, uh. Nothing happened."

"I see. That's good." His dad nods, and then pauses, his expression perfectly bland and composed as John continues to shuffle around in the doorway. "Would you like to come in and talk, son?" he says at last, his tone unvaryingly calm despite the fact that this is the second time he's suggested John should enter, and John flushes, swallowing hard as he scuffs a heel on the floor and then walks in, pulling the door shut behind him.

"So much to get caught up on," Dad says, setting his pipe down on top of a file folder. He stacks some of the papers, hooks them together with a paper clip, and sets the whole thing to one side. Then he smiles at John fondly, steepling his fingers together. "You've finished all of your school work, yes? Miss Harley was up to some wild antics in the car, and I know things got rather hectic yesterday."

"Yeah - me and Karkat got everything done," John says quietly, kicking his heels as he pulls a chair away from the wall and drags it across the desk from his dad's. He winces, and it feels a little like stepping barefoot on a field of blunted glass shards, trapped in the uneasy anticipation of accidentally stepping on the one shard that's still sharp, to admit, "I went flying. Uh. Without asking if that was okay. So, I'm sorry. I've been avoiding talking about stuff, I guess."

Basically the understatement of the year, but whatever.

"Really? I hadn't noticed." His dad chuckles wryly, shaking his head when John starts to blurt out another mangled burst of apologies, but then he sobers again, his expression utterly serious. "You've been upset. And with good reason," Samuel says, closing his eyes. "The fact that Diamonds Droog knows your identity - well, this is the worst case scenario. I'm just as distressed by it as you are, and I wish we could have talked sooner about our possible options for the next course of action we take." He shrugs. "But I also understand that you can't always talk to me about everything at first. You haven't...for some time now, I suppose. Perhaps it's good that we've both had time to process things individually, rather than you coming straight to me for debriefing."

"But if you needed time to yourself, then what brings this visit on?" Samuel's eyes are twinkling, and John groans inwardly, because he has the distinct feeling that Samuel already knows exactly what happened to get John's head in the game. His dad is kind of scary good at guessing stuff like that. He suspects it's a parent thing.

"Karkat kicked my butt." His dad's eyebrows skyrocket.

John backtracks hastily, holding up both hands. "Not literally!"

"Ah. Carry on."

John tries to remember where he was, coughing into his hand. "Uh, yeah. In a moirail way. He's pretty good at getting me to stop being dumb and actually deal with my real life problems."

"Then I am grateful to Karkat for his intercession. I must bake him something as thanks." Samuel laughs, just as his phone gives its little work ringtone and he has to painstakingly locate the off switch and turn it off. He shakes his head at the phone, flashing John a small smile as though to say...
"technology, huh?". "And to think, I was worried that young Karkat really did hold a grudge against me over that unfortunate mishap with the mattress," he comments, still chuckling. "I'm glad that's not the case. I do like being on good terms with your friends, after all. Especially now that your social circle has been expanding. I'm afraid I might have intimidated them all in my anxiousness to keep you all occupied these past few days."

John sighs and slumps forward, fiddling with the straps of his goggles. "I feel like this past week has just been a really crappy way to have mushed everyone into one place," he says. "And then watching all that stuff yesterday was just kind of a massive wake up call to the fact that everything is just ten times more dangerous than we thought."

"And you're not having any trouble with that? No -" His dad breaks off and gestures to his own head, a rueful smile on his face.

John makes a face. "No, not that I can tell," he says. "I mean, it's hard, and I still don't want to think about - well, a lot of things! But no one seems to have noticed me blanking out lately, so I don't think I've been making myself forget again. For better or for worse, I've got all these extra memories in my head, and it's not going away."

"That's more reassuring than you know," his dad says, leaning back a little in his chair. "Your nanna always insisted it was vital you understand your origins, and the fact that I couldn't share even what little she told me has weighed on me these past few years. It's good that you've sorted things out a little upstairs. It means we can focus on this trouble with the Midnight Crew without young Harley and I having to censor ourselves on details that are relevant to your powers."

"Haha, and maybe I won't get amnesia nosebleeds anymore!" John plucks at the fabric of his jacket, and grimaces at it. He really should have changed. Now that he's not moving and flying, his costume is starting to feel constricting and weird. "I really am sorry I worried you guys so much," he says, his voice low as the full weight of what he's been doing all these years presses in close. "I'll try not to do it again. I just wish I knew why I started doing it in the first place, or how!"

"We'll figure this all out, John." Then his dad stands up, and John fidgets as he walks around the desk to rest his hands on John's shoulders. It feels heartening and John smiles up at Samuel tentatively. The expression on his dad's face is a little strange for a moment before it clears up. "It's getting harder and harder to keep up with you," he murmurs. "One day, I don't know that I'll be able to keep you safe anymore - or if you'll even let me. You've grown up so fast."

"Don't say stuff like that!" John protests reflexively, because oh man, he's seen enough movies in his life to recognize a potentially really melancholy speech when he hears one! No way does he want his dad giving him the 'you're growing up' speech right now out of the blue, when everything is so crazy and messy and unreal!

Samuel tightens his grip. "No, son. I always knew someday you'd spread your wings and need to learn to fly on your own." His smile is more than a little sad as he adds, "It's something that every parent experiences, I suppose, though I sure the metaphor is not nearly as literal for them as it is in this case." A bubble of laughter bursts out of John's mouth without warning, and his dad chuckles right along with him. "But I like to think that I can protect you, for just a little longer."

And the thing is he didn't know it at the time. Rose hides it from him and Jade, directing their perception elsewhere so they don't notice the bodies lying scattered around the Battlefield. He can't remember what happened in that confused span of time between beating Jack Noir and ending the game, those moments where a second game session crashed into theirs, but he knows that when he watches it all play out on a recording years later, that's the first time he sees that his dad died not long after he himself did, and the grief feels so horrifically real that he can't bear to even glance in his dad's direction until -

John surges up, the panic thumping in his heart driving him as he knocks his dad's hands off his shoulders and seizes Samuel in a hug. Even though he can feel the air whistling in and out of his dad's lungs, and hear the faint 'ooph!' of surprise when John hugs him hard enough that ribs creak, the unnerving memories keep him just this side of panicked.

A warm hand chafes his back, clapping him briskly between the shoulder blades. "I'm so very, very proud of you, my boy," his dad says, and John sniffs really hard because otherwise he's gonna get snot everywhere. But he somehow manages to get the threatening tears under control, following the cycle of Samuel's breathing in and out, the oldest pattern he knows.

Not dead. Not here. Not if John has anything to say about it.

When his dad finally pulls away, John lets out the breath he hadn't even realized he'd been holding. "Now," Samuel says, summoning a smile that John can't help but return. It's confident and tricky and has none of that sadness from earlier, and John knows they've reached equilibrium again. "One of my contacts has come through at last with some information on Diamonds Droog. Want to help me peruse it?"

And honestly, that's some of the best news he's heard all week!

"You bet!"

Subject: Requested Files

Samuel,

You've placed me in quite the uncomfortable position by asking for these, but I suppose you would not request them if it were not a matter of some urgency. Ordinarily it would be no trouble, but some people very high up in the chain of command have been sniffing around my office ever since I pulled these from the records vault. I have concealed my paper trail as best as I can but word on SERIOUS BUSINESS is that there may be an internal investigation into 'suspect activity,' which I fear to be my own. Someone kicked the hornets' nest in the upper echelons, and no one is certain how this will play out anymore.

In light of this, postpone further communications until I contact you again myself. Do not respond to any private threads on SB; I have reason to believe my account has been compromised and will be under surveillance for the foreseeable future.

Trust none of your other contacts, no matter how above board they may seem. We don't know how far this goes. Anyone’s contact information can be faked. Maintain your current course of action, but if I give the signal from this address, you'll know that the time has come, and I will no longer be able to assist you.

If that happens, end this: shred what you can, shut down everything, and abscond. Your position is already precarious enough as it is. They will come for you next.

Regards,
When word starts to get around that John has some memory of the previous universe, John suddenly realizes exactly how Dave must feel when people bug him about trying to clarify timelines. Namely, super annoyed, because he only remembers a little more than what everyone saw yesterday on those recordings - he has to repeat that he doesn't know why they scratched the game so many times that he almost keels over backward in his seat and throws a temper tantrum.

"Everything starting around when the Horror thingies started messing with our heads is kind of blurry," he tries to explain for the millionth bajillionth time. "And I remember patches of what happened after we all died on the Battlefield, but after that - nothing at all."

It's like the exact same static that corrupted the recordings on the Queen's Hub fizzles in his head whenever he tries poking around for an explanation, and John is sooo far from interested in messing with his memories in any way, shape, or form that he's content to just not know. Seriously. He hates that he remembers as much as he does, and when he tries to tell Jade that he's not too bothered by the missing gaps, she naturally throws up her hands. "But John, we need to know so we can fix whatever happened last time!" she insists, pouting a little. "Are you just saying you don't remember again when really you do?"

"No! God, no!" John says, blinking. Just to prove his point - and for future reference, so people will stop bugging him! - he snags one of the Expo markers that Karkat was using early and sends his chair scooting over to the nearest whiteboard, the one dedicated to the Battlefield. He draws a thick, heavy blue line across the end of the diagram, the marker squeaking all the while, and labels it, in tiny blur letter, 'the last thing I remember! :P'

"I wonder why," Jade says, sighing. She's got WV in her lap, a fact that the carapacian seems to accept with faint resignation, and when she starts patting the Dersite on the head he squeaks incomprehensibly and starts signing things that make Dave smirk. "You can't remember, the game itself couldn't even record it, nothing I try seems to clear up that static - what was so weird about the troll game session that everything's so scrambled up? It almost seems deliberate."

"Sounds whack, man," Dave says distractedly, signing back at WV. "Let us know if you come up with any explanations because I am goddamn out of ideas. Is Karkat still interrogating our new personal mob boss?"

John checks his phone. "Nope. Nothing new. He's probably still trying not to get stabbed."
Jade perks up a little. "So, do we get special gangster mob nicknames? Or are we still all using cool hero names?"

"We're not actually part of a gang, Jade," John says. "Like. That's not actually a thing that is happening."

"But don't you think it would be funny!" Jade smiles at him winningly, and finally lets WV go when he taps on her knee. The carapacian darts toward the door but doesn't quite make it before becoming distracted by one of the green power units by the wall. "I mean, it's not like we'd commit actual crimes or anything! But like. Alter egos!"

John hesitates.

...Oh man. She's right. It could be hilarious.

"That is some roleplaying level shit that I will not abide, Jade. Pretty sure that's a no from me, just on the principle of hell no." Dave has started to doodle something right next to John's note on the whiteboard. It closely resembles a flight of stairs, and a person in blue at the very top, and yeah, John has read all of Sweet Bro and Hella Jeff. He can see exactly what the punchline's going to be.

"I don't think our guardians would approve of us pretending to sign up for some random carapacian's criminal enterprise," he argues weakly. Someone here has to be the voice of reason. "If anything, we should be coming up with a super hero team name!" he adds.

Dave's head shoots up and his gaze swivels to meet John's with sudden realization. "Oh. My god. Do you even realize how ironic it would be?" Dave says, sounding almost breathlessly rapturous. "Holy shit."

"Yeah!" Jade says delightedly, clapping her hands together. "Now we're talking! Here, I'll grab a fresh whiteboard for us to use -"

In the heat of the moment, all three of them forget that Jade's powers are still fritzing in the void shielding.

They remember right about when, in a crackle of green lightning, an entire whiteboard appears - lodged halfway through the far wall, accompanied by a grinding noise that John think is probably an entire sliver of the wall being displaced to make room for the new addition of rectangular wall art. WV topples over in shock, and John and Dave let out almost identical terrified shrieks.

"Uh. Heheheh! Oops," Jade says, laughing nervously and lowering her hands. "...We can still write on it!"

John reaches out and taps on the wall next to where the brand new addition juts out at a ninety degree angle, and then freezes up. "Oh my god," he says, horrified. "My dad was working in that room."

As though on cue, the door to the conference room opens, and John's dad stares at the four of them, his white tie askew and faint beads of sweat standing out on his temples.

EB: kaaarrrrkkaaaaaat~~~
CG: WHAT'S BLOWN UP AND/OR CAUGHT FIRE NOW? I FUCKING KNEW THIS VACATION FROM HELL COULDN'T LAST.
EB: what, no!
EB: get over here, we're trying to come up with a cool super hero team name for all of us!
EB: you know you want to! :B
CG: ...
CG: OH MY GOD.
EB: jade's already suggested -
CG: SHUT UP, NOT A WORD OUT OF ANY OF YOU UNTIL I GET THERE. NO ONE MAKES A SINGLE SOLITARY SUGGESTION UNTIL I AM THERE AS YOUR SUPREME FRIENDLEADER TO MAKE THE FINAL CALL.
CG: WE CANNOT AFFORD TO FUCK UP AN OPPORTUNITY OF THIS MAGNITUDE, JOHN.
CG: THIS IS GENIUS.
EB: heck yeah!
EB: also, you'll get to see what jade did to the wall! oh man, my dad is sooo pissed!
EB: he's giving her lecture 23, i remember this one from the sixth grade! gosh, it's been ages since he hit 23!
CG: WHAT.
CG: WHAT THE FUCK DID SHE DO?
EB: you have to see it to believe it!
EB: eheheheheh!
CG: I'M GOING TO REGRET THIS. I CAN FEEL IT.

GG: john! have you and your dad seen this yet?!
GG: FVRTmemo.html
GG: because, uh, this kind of seems like one of those things you guys were worried about!
EB: oh, jeez. yeah, we just saw it a couple minutes ago. it pinged one of my dad's contacts.
EB: that is a thing that is in fact happening.
GG: oh nooo :(
CG: WELL, PISS IN MY COFFEE AND CALL IT A LATTE, WOULD YOU LOOK AT THAT.
CG: FIRST I'M AN ARSONIST, NOW WE'RE PROBABLY ALL FUCKING TERRORISTS.
CG: THAT'S IT. THAT'S LITERALLY WHAT'S HAPPENING HERE. FUCK EVERYTHING.
EB: they haven't actually said we're the ones responsible for any of it, karkat. maybe this representative guy won't even care about hero work at all!
EB: it would be nice to have someone in law enforcement around who's helping us against the crew instead of letting them out on bail all the time...
GG: yeah! think positive!
CG: WHEN HAVE WE EVER HAD THAT KIND OF LUCK, JOHN?
EB: uhhh...
CG: MY SENTIMENTS EXACTLY. EVEN IF THEY WOULDN'T NORMALLY GIVE TWO SHITS ABOUT THE HEIR DOING VIGILANTE WORK, YOU'VE BEEN SEEN ASSOCIATING WITH ME, AND THE UNIVERSE THINKS IT'S FUCKING HILARIOUS WHEN I'M PUBLIC ENEMY NUMBER ONE.
TG: well at least thats one to check off my to do list
TG: bro will be so proud TG: the houston police always wimped out instead of actually declaring us terrorists or villains or anything but here we are
TG: we have almost climbed that entire mountain TG: next is the one where karkat and i go on a cross country road trip to bond over our mutual brood and stay at ironically shitty motels and avoid our responsibilities GG: road trips are always fun! we could all go visit the smithsonian, i've never been! :)
CG: WHO THE FUCK SAID YOU WERE INVITED?
GG: i invited myself, duh!
TG: so you admit we're going on this road trip karkat
TG: this is a thing that will go down
CG: WAIT.
GG: plus you won't even need a car or anything if i come along! space perks! it'll be fun!
EB: can't the midnight crew track your powers these days?
GG: like that's ever stopped me before!
CG: NO. I ABSOLUTELY FORBID ALL OF THIS. THIS IS A TERRIBLE IDEA.
EB: yeah and wait a minute, remember that part where there's an entire mob of criminals trying to take over seattle and possibly kidnap all of us and now we might not even be able to fight back without getting arrested because of a terror alert?
EB: because that's kind of still a thing, guys!
CG: THAT BECAME OLD NEWS LIKE TWENTY FUCKING SECONDS AGO, JOHN.
LOOK AT HOW FAR WE'VE COME. THE FUTURE IS NOW. LOOK AT ME, INDULGING IN THIS QUAIN'T HUMAN SARCASM.
GG: ehhh, you worry too much john! i'm already considered a terrorist according to france, and i'm doing just fine, aren't i?!
EB: whoa, really?!
CG: I WISH I COULD SAY I WAS FUCKING SURPRISED, BUT I'M NOT. AT ALL. IN FACT I DON'T KNOW WHY I DIDN'T SEE THIS COMING.
GG: it turns out kicking villains so hard that their dumb heads cause excessive damage to national landmarks puts you on the naughty list :(
EB: yeah, i can kind of see why that would bug people...
TG: i took out an entire sushi restaurant once
GG: wow! fancy!
EB: was it at least in the name of, you know, fighting crime?
TG: kind of
CG: MY SNIFFER IS DETECTING THE DISTINCT AROMA OF HORSESHT.
TG: just call it a goddamn nose
CG: AM I WRONG?
TG: well
TG: it was fucking rad
GG: ooooh! so cool! :D
EB: but...if it wasn't to fight crime then why -
TG: hush john
TG: the aroma karkat is detecting TG: is the sweet sweet scent of irony
TG: it ages like fine wine
CG: HARLEY IS A WALKING WEAPON OF SPACE-BASED VANDALIZING

PAIR OF UNMASKED LUNATICS YOU ARE.
CG: THIS ISN'T THE RESULT OF YOUR COMPLETE MISCONCEPTION OF WHAT THE FUCK IRONY IS. THIS IS THE UNIVERSE CHOKING ON ITS OWN SPIT BECAUSE IT'S LAUGHING SO HARD AT WHAT A JOKE WE ALL ARE.
CG: FUCKING FUCK, AND YOU WONDER WHY THE HOUSTON PD HATES YOUR PINK HUMAN GUTS?
GG: you really are a 'glass is half empty' kind of guy, aren't you, mister!
CG: TECHNICALLY, THE GLASS IS HALF EMPTY AND HALF FULL OF FESTERING PUS OF INDETERMINATE BUT NO DOUBT DISGUSTING AND UNSPEAKABLE ORIGIN.
TG: welp
TG: and there you have it
TG: from your mouth to the ears of the goddess of irony herself bro we're going to have bad juju for weeks
EB: we've lost control of this conversation again...
GG: we never really had it to begin with. :P
EB: it's all hogwash.
TG: its what we do
GG: it's what's for breakfast!
CG: EVEN THE ROSE HUMAN'S DRUNKEN RAMBLING WAS PREFERABLE TO THIS. AT LEAST SHE MAKES A GOOD FAITH EFFORT TO EXPLAIN WHAT THE FUCK IS GOING ON.
GG: karkat! i explain stuff all the time!
TG: dude
TG: im pretty sure youre not allowed to even hint at feeling anything but unreasonable fury for anyone but john what the fuck are you doing CG: I HATE TO SHIT ALL OVER YOUR PARADE, DAVE, BUT I APPRECIATE ROSE. EVEN WHILE INEBRIATED, SHE STILL SOMEHOW MANAGES TO OUTSTRIP YOU AND HARLEY IN THE FRIENDSHIP BRIGADE OVER HERE BY A MILE. THERE. I SAID IT.
TG: who is this and what have you done with karkat vantas
CG: HA. FUCKING. HA.
EB: i think i might go visit her in a little bit, actually! we can go together karkat!
EB: but she might still be asleep? i don't know how long alcohol hangovers are supposed to last...
GG: is there another kind of hangover?
EB: i don't...actually know...
TG: this is why oriole thinks we're all literally thirteen years old you know
TG: these gems right here
-- grimAuxiliatrix [GA] has joined the memo! --
GA: I Saw Rose's Name. I Have Been Informed That I Should State The Following:
GA: Rose Is Incredibly Hungover May I Take A Message.
GG: kanayayaya! :)
GA: Yes That Is A Variation Of My Name.
EB: karkat and i might come to see rose before the meeting.
GG: same here! we can make it a party!
EB: is she awake at least?
GA: Somewhat. However She Is Also Dehydrated And Must Recover Enough To Suffer The Lecture Of My Displeasure Before I Will Allow Visitors. As It Is She Is Too Pitiful At The Moment For Me To Reprimand Her Properly On The Self-Destructiveness Of Her Recent Relapse.
TG: good you can lecture karkat instead
TG: he is so in friends with your girlfriend its embarrassing
CG: SHUT UP.
TG: he wants to talk to her at a non shouty volume or something else outrageously friendly like that GG: le gasp~!
GA: I Am Somewhat Confused I Do Not Understand What This Has To Do With Anything.
CG: IT DOESN'T HAVE ANYTHING TO DO WITH FUCKING ANYTHING, KANAYA.
DON'T TRY TO COMPREHEND IT, IT'LL ONLY MAKE YOUR HEAD HURT. TALK TO ME IN A PRIVATE WINDOW, THESE MEMOS AREN'T EXACTLY MY BEST MOMENTS.
TG: see he shouts at us but im pretty sure he and john have secret convos where the quirk comes off
TG: and now he wants to extend quiet time privileges to rose you should find this incredibly suspicious
EB: i told you guys, karkat isn't that loud all the time! he's just been kind of going through a lot lately!
CG: I AM LEAVING.
CG: I AM IGNORING ALL OF YOU.
CG: BEHOLD.
-- carcinoGeneticist [CG] has left the memo! -- EB: ack! wait!
TG: he actually went through with it
TG: incredible
GA: I Still Don't Understand What I Just Witnessed.
GG: i kind of just go with it! it's more fun that way!

It really has been a weird day! The weather is gloomy, Rose has been soooo drunk, and now Jade only has a matter of hours before they're all supposed to meet again to decide what to do next.

So she'll have to make this quick!

Jade skims a hand over the side of the car as she heads for the trunk, adjusting her goggles as she goes. There's a sore spot on the inside of her cheek where her teeth slipped during dinner, and she worries it with her tongue. Usually it would be a snap to open up the trunk with her powers, but even after spending a day and a half trying to adjust to the twisty way her powers warp in Doctor Lalonde's void shielding, she doesn't quite trust that she won't wind up transplanting a tree into the middle of the Egbert's poor car.

So instead, she'll just have to improvise! And by that, she means she's totally just gonna...reach out and…

Jade glances around wildly, biting her lip, and then digs her fingers into the crack where the metal of the trunk lid meets the rest of the car. A sharp jerk, using all of her strength, and the lock snaps neatly, the trunk flying up to reveal the contents. The rest of the luggage ended up inside already, and Jade smiles indulgently down at the last remaining occupant. "Come on, Bec, you lazy butt! Time to go!"

Curléd up along the inside wall of the car, Bec flickers yellow-green, but lies still. There's a knife sticking into the floor of the trunk next to its snout for some reason - Jade hadn't even known anyone brought along knifekind for the weekend! - and the only real reaction Bec gives is to let its tongue loll out and pant at her.

"Come on, boy, you have to be my escort! It's just a little void - you can't just nap the weekend away!" As she exhorts her science wolf to leave its hideout, Jade starts hesitantly digging around through her sylladex. Her arm disappears up to the elbow in midair as she shifts through all of the clutter in the pocket dimension, and she wishes she could just call things up like that old Jade could. Well, normally she can, and without all the weird sylladex games that apparently everyone used to mess around with, but right now she's just as likely to call up the gun she wants as that old treatise on classic poetry that Grandpa was always bugging her to read. To 'expand her repertoire,' he always said, except then he'd died and left the island in a robot body, and Jade just kind of kept putting it off.
for...uh...a while...

Finally, her ring finger hooks on something that feels distinctly like a trigger guard and she yanks the specibus out with a distracted grin. It turns out to be a hefty Marlin hunting rifle with all the trimmings that Jade has added onto it over the years to improve the accuracy, so she can definitely work with this! She slings it over her back, sighs at Bec one last time, and reaches into the trunk of the car to haul the wolf out, arms wrapped around its middle with a bunch of fluffy white ruff prickling against her face until she sets it down on the ground with a meaningful nudge.

Bec stares up at her, eyes nonexistent and yet still somehow able to level a reprimanding gaze at her, regardless. Jade folds her arms and gives as good as she gets until finally the wolf perks its ears and turns its muzzle - and its attention - toward the west, nostrils flaring and sparks crackling along its tail as it gives a tentative wag. "About time you noticed," she comments, shaking her head as she slams the trunk shut with a metallic crunch. Uh. She might have put a liiiittle too much effort into that. Jade winces, smooths at the faint crimps in the edge of the trunk with her fingers, and then whistles for Bec to lead the way.

And so they set off toward the mountainside. The rifle sits heavy at the base of her spine, there's not even a whiff of a breeze to lift the sticky curls clinging to the side of Jade's face, and she just can't shake the feeling that something downright weird is in the air.

There are no human-worn paths through the undergrowth that Jade's keen eye can pick out, only the faintest of tracks where deer might occasionally pass through. The wooded area is close enough to the laboratory and sparse enough that she wouldn't be too shocked if the proximity of so much human activity might have been enough to startle any wild life out of the valley entirely. A stray bramble snags on the cargo of Jade's skirt, and she yanks the hem free without slowing or glancing down, her feet bobbing and skimming the ground to the beat of the faint song she hums to herself as she goes. Ahead of her, Bec trots along with its nose in the air, its fur stark white and absolutely useless as camouflage against the fresh spring growth. But of course, when you're a potentially all-powerful space warping canine, Jade supposes camouflage isn't exactly that big of a deal. It certainly never stopped Bec from sneaking up on her during training sessions in the deep jungle back home.

Ah, home. She still kind of regrets blowing it up. But Grandpa's instructions were always very clear - the day she vacated the island was the day she needed to trigger the self-destruct, lest evil parties try to steal Grandpa's most top-secret research and treasures, all the accumulated trophies of a lifetime spent adventuring and funding scientific advancement. It would have been awful if stuff like the grand forkkind of Temujinn or the stuffed carcass of the last dinosaur cryptid lusus of the Congo fell into the wrong hands.

(Some people might have argued that it would be better to preserve such rare artefacts. But while the hording tendencies of the Harley ecto-bloodline might border on the legendary, their fondness for both finely crafted firearms and unnecessary explosions cannot be underestimated.)

Anyway, it'll be good to finally get some of that back. The second note Jade received was pretty darn sparse on details, so she doesn't know exactly where this reunion will go down. She's on the alert, of course, spot-checking the upper branches overhead and ducking behind trees to squint around at her surroundings for any sign of movement, always with her rifle close to hand, but there's only so much she can sense when everything's so twisty and muddled around her.

Bec seems to have some idea, though! She just has no way of measuring how much all this void might interfering with it because Bec is pretty much inscrutable and Grandpa always warned her against trying to perform science on the wolf, but Bec lopes along ahead of her with its nose in the air and she thinks that even if both of their space senses are on the fritz, you still can't beat a wolf for tracking by scent.

Yet somehow, they almost manage to walk right past him. Probably because he doesn't smell exactly like Bec remembers him. Jade only realizes her mistake when Bec whirls, tongue lolling and tail wagging a hundred miles an hour - not an exaggeration at all - and leaps over a fall, overgrown tree trunk at a shadowy figure standing concealed in the shade of an enormous fir.

Jade wastes no time being surprised - bad enough she already made such a poor showing on detection! "Raaah!" she yells, leveling the rifle at the tall figure, her goggles already zooming in with crosshairs to help steady her aim.

The flared muzzle of a blunderbuss stares her dead in the face. Bec is a white blur Jade can barely make out as it twines around the figure's legs, tail bobbing as it noses every crack in the dark green metal where dark skin still shows through.

And darn it! Even after all this time, he's still quicker on the draw! Ohhh, Jade's gonna get such a talking to about wandering around unprepared for a strife! But first - "Grandpa!" Jade cries joyfully, swinging the rifle back around and flinging her arms around shoulders forged of single-crystal titanium superalloy, heedless of the blunderbuss still leveled where she used to be standing. "It's been so long! How is the chassis holding up?"

The motions are a little stilted, but there's only a second's worth of lag before James Harley, legally dead in twenty-seven countries and powered by a thrumming engine instead of internal organs, sweeps his ectobiological daughter into a crushing robot hug.

It's pretty awesome.

"- and you really should be carrying something of a far higher caliber when you're out on your own, poppet. Where is that nice semi-automatic you modified for Christmas five years ago?"

Jade swallows a sigh, and nods vigorously as she carefully draws another teeny tiny screwdriver from within her sylladex. She thinks she has a handle on accessing it now, but the significant pile of pencils, hair clips, and small change sitting between her feet is evidence enough that she's still having some trouble with the pocket dimension. But she's managed to assemble most of the tools needed to crack open Grandpa's chassis, her tongue peeking out the corner of her mouth as she delicately removes the last screw and sets it on her lap for safe-keeping. She has an assortment of tools clamped between her teeth as well, and Grandpa has been taking full advantage of her quiet to give her an intense, strict lecture in person for the first time in forever.

"I fink I'fh cracked opfen fe main engine," Jade mumbles around the tools, carefully removing the third back panel between Grandpa's shoulders and nudging servomotors and dark green and blue wires to the side to get a look at the hollow where the engine pressed up close to the shielded nerves of his spinal column. "Wh'do you want me to adjuft?"

As she surveys the insides of Grandpa's new body, Jade has to fight down the urge to poke and prod and investigate in a way that would nooot be good with all these vital moving parts shifting around. Like, at all. This chassis is kind of wayyy beyond Jade's capabilities, and she wouldn't want to risk breaking Grandpa and shutting down the life support for his brain. When she'd first help him transplant everything from his dying human body into the new one, Jade remembers being awed by the intricate craftsmanship in every joint and rivet. The outside doesn't look like anything special - chunky and heavily armored, built for strength and resilience rather than sleekness or speed - but the internal workings are a dream. It took a robotics genius to design this, maybe even more than one, and Jade knows of only two in the world who might have the talent - but this work has neither of their signature styles.

Besides, the Puppeteer at least is definitely not on the shortlist of people who know that Grandpa is still alive. Jade only knows for certain that she, Grandpa himself, Bec, and one other person Grandpa will never name know the truth. As far as the rest of the world is concerned, Jade taxidermied her poppa when his physical body died, and what happened to his brain afterward isn't something that needs to be brought up in polite conversation!

But someone has to have made this thing - someone who would have known it was intended to prolong Grandpa's life if they were to piece together a chassis advanced enough to integrate with the remains of his nervous system - and Jade would give anything to meet them. You know, for science. Because this kind of talent needs to be shared with the world! But in these past few years Jade hasn't seen any work in the field of prosthetics and cybernetics that comes even close to matching the style here, which is a real shame. She'd feel a lot more confident about fiddling with Grandpa's wiring if she had the creator themselves here to supervise.
Grandpa is very, very still, inhumanly so, his green cloak folded off to one side so that all of the heavy lines of the titanium frame are visible, and there's a moment where Jade wants to reach out and feel for a pulse before she remembers that would be kind of dumb. All she'd feel if she tried that would be the hum of the engine. "Just a quick tune up. It's been a few years now, and there are bolts jittering around where I can't reach them, I'm afraid. The limbs, I can manage, but there's always a spot of difficulty trying to fix up one's back all by oneself!"

"Okay! You'll get it!" Jade assures him, and she sets to work altering the sequence of cables and hitting the keys that allow the left side of the chassis to take over all vital functions. It's a failsafe for if Grandpa is heavily damaged, and once everything has been rerouted Jade thumbs the emergency switch so that the servomotors and gears of the right half spin to a halt. Immediately she dips her fingers in and starts drawing forth the sections of titanium with care, snapping up different sized screwdrivers until she finds the ones that fit. Her gloves insulate her from most of the residual heat from the engine as she turns each segment of metal over in her palms to tighten screws, unkink wires, tape up places where the insulation has worn thin, and click off-center gears back into their sockets.

It's so strange. Now that the initial excitement of seeing Grandpa after so long has faded a little, Jade is stuck between the comfort of familiarity, of having her custodian back, and the slight weirdness of the fact that he's a cyborg. Grandpa was always in motion, a man of action and adventure even in his latter years, and she never really had the chance to reconcile herself with stillness his clunky new body is capable of. Even the churning of machinery along his left side seems off compared to how human beings usually move, and she feels like she's taken an extra wide step anticipating a stair that didn't exist.

But Bec is quiescent at Grandpa's rocket feet, panting with contentment as metal fingers scratch behind its ears, and when it comes right down to it, Jade has seen weirder!

Also, if he moved, she might, you know. Accidentally break him. Seriously, that is a thing that could happen! Still is good! She sets a thin section of casing down on her lap, claps her hands against her cheeks to shake herself out of her stupor, and gets back to work, humming. "So, you're not here to stay," she says, not making it a question. It makes her sad, but Grandpa as much as said in his note the other day that he doesn't trust someone - possibly multiple someones! - in their group. Which makes Jade kind of sad, because she likes everyone in their group! Even Karkat! He might be abrasive, but he's so stupid in love with John it's kind of hard to see him as any kind of threat.

There's a note of regret in Grandpa's modulated voice, and a heavy hand leaves Bec's ears to pat her knee. "No, my dear. I'm afraid that's just not...possible, at the moment. Better I stay dead, for now. There's something afoot in Siberia that needs investigating."

Oh! That's - not the reason she was expecting! "Something to do with the Midnight Crew?" Jade asks eagerly, perking up. "That's why you've been gone so much, right? Trying to fight them!"

Grandpa chuckles. It's a shame that his face is metal now, the lines stark and unmoving, so he can't smile back at her like he used to. It makes her kind of sad again. "Something to do with the person I commissioned this body from, actually."

Jade lets out an unintentional shriek of glee and drops a pair of wire cutters into the leaves, thoughts of the Crew flying right out of her head. "Ohhh! Can I meet him? Can I come with you? I mean - pleeeease, Grandpa? Pretty please?"

The shake of Grandpa's head sets a servomotor between his shoulder and his neck whirring in a way that it is noooot supposed to whirl, and Jade has to hastily jam a spare strut into the gap before it can slice through a wayward wire. "He most likely would not appreciate that. He tends to be very good at maintaining a low profile, as public recognition is not quite to his taste, but recently he left the country entirely in a way obvious enough that it has me worried. He is...a private being, and if he is on the move...some jiggerypokery is afoot, my girl, and I would be remiss if I didn't ensure his safety after all he's done for us."

"Ohhh. Okay." Jade lets her sigh of disappointment escape, this time. "John is very big on privacy, too. So I guess I understand." It's been a hard-won lesson, but Jade, who has never seen much point in concealing things like her identity from the world, can see why people like John, Karkat, and Rose, who are so much a part of the society where they've lived for so long, might be bothered by the thought of being 'outed' as heroes. They want to have that refuge of a secure, utterly normal life to fall back on, whereas Jade has never really seen the point of separating herself into categories like that. It's a matter of perspective and differing values! They value privacy, and she values nonstop 24/7 opportunities to kick butt, whether she's using the Sharpshooter name or not!

"Mmm. And how does John seem, my girl?" There's a moment of hesitation before Grandpa finishes the question, a pause that Jade is pretty sure she didn't cause, since she hasn't touched anything near the chassis's neck. "I know you were quite disappointed when he failed to respond to any of your messages. The boy has been on my mind, of late."

Jade tilts her head to the side, closing her eyes and humming again as she sorts through her thoughts. It's harder to think of John in logical terms because she cares about him so much, but she has to report objectively, here! "He and Karkat are both pretty messed up," she says frankly, opening her eyes and molding the casing back into place over the rotors so that the internal seams line up again. "Uh, Karkat is his moirail."

"Indeed? That is promising. Go on."

Oookay. "He remembers a lot of the game, actually," she says, skipping right to the most important part. "Which might be the reason why his head's been scrambled eggs for the past couple of years! I'm not a psychologist like Rose, but he's been trying to forget the past universe on purpose for a long time, and watching the Queen's Hub yesterday basically dropped him. If he gets some other kind of shock...I'm really worried about him!"

"So the boy's noggin is out of sync," Grandpa sighs. It sounds like static. "I suspected as much. It's more surprising that he didn't break earlier."

Jade yanks a little too hard on a wire and Grandpa's right hand jerks out to the side; he is patient as she hastily winds it back in. "But he's getting better now," Jade babbles, running fingers through her hair to brush it back out of her face and receiving a spark of green static electricity for her trouble. Oops! She has to ground herself better if she's gonna keep working on Grandpa. "I mean, now that we know what the problem was all this time, he can talk about it with Karkat better. Half the problem was them being totally dumb about their hero secrets, you know -"

She breaks off. "...You don't think that'll help," she says slowly, testing out the word on her tongue even as she says them, uncertain. Grandpa's train of thought was a lot easier to follow when he was flesh and blood, honestly. "Why? What's wrong?"

Grandpa doesn't answer for a long moment, and Jade wonders if maybe she accidentally removed something and shut him down. Which would be awful! But then he resumes scratching at Bec's ruff with his working hand, circling the block of his thumb at the top of the wolf's spine. "I think he is, in many ways, Joanna's ectobiological son," he says at last. "She should have been the one to raise him; all of you would have been better served if she were still with us. Samuel may be her son, but he is no substitute for a custodian with as much knowledge as Jo had of that old life. Of mysteries that the game imparted to her when her remains were mingled in the prototyping procedure."
"John is strong." This is important. Jade sets her jaw, screwing the first of the panels back into place over the right side of Grandpa's back. "And he's got all of us who love him. He's gonna be just fine! I believe in him!"

"If anyone can pull through this, it would be that boy. And yet I worry all the same." Grandpa shakes his head. "Perhaps it is all tosh on my part. But I won't be here while you all help the lad, and the dickens only knows how much more damage could occur in the meanwhile if -" He breaks off, even as Jade hits the start switch and the right side of his body jolts back into awareness. She closes it up with the last panel, but doesn't move to stop the left side just yet, waiting for him to finish. Grandpa has a kind of - charisma, she thinks is the right word. His lectures can get kind of long, but Jade has always been drawn into the intentness of his speech, the sense that what they're doing right here, right now, is of absolute importance.

The world is at stake, after all. Lots of worlds, actually!

So it seems to flow naturally when Grandpa swivels to face her, Bec silent at his feet as the robotic chassis shift on the fallen log. "I hate to ask this of you, my poppet," he says, and Jade knows that what comes next is going to be important. Ohhh, it's been so long since Grandpa gave her a mission that wasn't recorded in an old file folder!"You have been doing such marvelous work on your own these years we've been apart, and I am unspeakably proud of the person you have become. But I must ask nonetheless."

Jade catches her grandfather's hand in her own, squeezing the heavy metal digits tightly as she nods. "Anything, Grandpa!"

"Keep an eye on Samuel and Rue," he says, his flickering eyes communicating nothing. "I have known something was amiss among the guardians for some time now - since...well, it doesn't matter. But I worry that with all of you in such close proximity, more discrepancies may arise." He is quiet again, as though weighing his words carefully. "I will not say that you may trust young Ambrose. He has always been stubborn, and certainly the way he's raised Dave has been more than a little unorthodox. But it would be difficult for any hostile parties to turn him, and in the event that we have been compromised, his strength would be key in countering any of the other custodians."

Jade nods solemnly, filing this all away in her mind and labelling 'VERY IMPORTANT.' "But he could still be a bad guy?"

"We can only pray he's not. He was strong enough to fend off Diamonds Droog more than a decade ago, and he has only honed his abilities and added a new specibus mastery to his repertoire since then. He would be a fearsome opponent." Grandpa's wrinkles are all gone; it's all smooth metal, and Jade can't read him as well as she'd like still. "Rue's mastery of manipulating void with her machines could pose a significant threat to your own powers, and her fistkind will still be more than up to snuff. Never forget that. Jo trusted her, but Jo is not here now, and I cannot account for all of her movements since she left Rose in New York. She spent some time in Africa leading the Crew astray but after that, there is distressingly little record of her whereabouts. I'd like to think she ensconced herself at another of these shielded laboratories for the duration, but I never chose to have her assist me in concealing my own labs with her void wards, so I don't know how much their influence may be to blame."

Jeez! Is everyone's custodian this shady?! They couldn't have just tried living non-secretive, upright lives, for her convenience? Jade huffs and nods hard, wondering when everything got so suspicious. Give her a straight forward boss fight, any day!

Grandpa finishes his briefing with, "Samuel may have been Joanna's son, but they didn't speak for many years while he was abroad. He returned to care for John with excellent timing, yet - even more than Ambrose, I fear the way he trained John might have contributed to some of the issues the boy has now."

"Navy SEAL?" Jade guesses. It's her favorite theory.

If Grandpa could still make facial expressions, she thinks he'd be making one of gentle reprimand. "At first. Later, however - mercenary work."

"Oh." Her mouth keeps going without her permission, and she totally blames Karkat and Dave for the resounding "Shit," that pops out.

Grandpa tuts. "It is indeed quite the pile of hogswallop we have here, but there's no need for that."

"Yes, Grandpa! Sorry!" Jade says, ducking her head. The next few minutes are spent listening to Grandpa share some of his adventures, and Jade mentioning her time in Southeast Asia as she quickly tightens up all the screws in the left side of his back. When the work is done, she closes up the chassis again and pats it firmly so that the rumble of the quiet engine buzzes her palm. "We're all done here! But I should probably head back now. We have a meeting, and if you don't want anyone to know I'm out here meeting you -" The cybernetic head nods, and Jade continues, "- then I have to go."

"An excellent job, dear." Grandpa rises to his feet, rolling both bulky shoulders and nodding at the surprising smoothness of the motion. Seriously, this designer was a genius! "I won't keep you. You don't need to hang around with your creaky old poppa when you have all manner of adventures of your own!"

Jade flings her arms around him again. "I missed you, Grandpa," she mumbles. "We need to meet much sooner next time! A joint adventure or something!"

"Perhaps, perhaps," he says. "I've missed you too. So very much. Can you spare Becquerel for a moment?"

"Yeah, of course! It's been pretty quiet in the car today, no one will miss it for a few hours." Jade starts captchalogue all the miscellaneous junk and tools in the sylladex again, snatching up a few leaves from the ground by accident, but a glance at her watch confirms that she's kind of pushing it, here, if she wants to get back in time to not be missed. "Love you, Grandpa!" she says, darting in to press a kiss to a metal cheek before darting away. She casts one glance back, memorizing the dark green and brown of Grandpa's chassis where it stands stiffly, Bec a white heap at his ankles.

The wolf does not move to follow at her heels. She's always suspected it liked Grandpa better!

"Oh, Halley," she hears Grandpa murmur as she starts downhill, "I fear we've been stretched too thin."

It's as she's sneaking back in that Jade runs into WV. Or, rather, that WV catapults headfirst out of the overhead air vent, and Jade has to lunge forward with a yelp to catch the carapacian before he hits the ground. "Hey!" she exclaims, looking up at the vent, and her suspicions are confirmed when a series of loud clanks echoes from the ducts, as though a heavy insectoid body is scuttling away into the darkness.

Oh boy. Karkat has been going on and on about how he persuaded Spades with a sacrifice of blood, swears, and tears to stop crawling around the facility with a knife in each hand, but this? This is incredibly suspicious behavior. This calls for investigation. But first - "You're okay, WV?" she asks, concerned, turning the tiny alien upside down as she scours him with her eyes, looking for blood. "What were you doing in there with him?"

The only reply she gets is a bunch of meaningless gestures mixed in with a couple army hand signs for 'advance forward' and 'retreat,' which is total nonsense. From what she can see, WV has somehow come through a close encounter with Slick without taking major injury, because the next second the carapacian loses patience with her worried inspection and plants a sharp heel on her forearm in an attempt to abscond. She sets him down rightside up and he shakes both fists at the air vent.

Jade glances between WV and the vent.

...She still has ten minutes before the meeting. Plenty of time! "Want a boost?" she asks, and she grins widely at the emphatic nod she receives in reply. Lacing her fingers together, Jade waits until WV steps onto her palms and then tosses him up lightly in the crawlspace. Then she jumps up and crawls into the air ducts herself.

The ventilation system is impressively spacious! But also definitely more carapacian- than human-sized, and Jade has to crunch her neck in a weird way to look up and see that her intrepid sidekick is already scrambling off with reckless abandon in the direction of the banging noises.

They trail after the noises for about a minute when, abruptly, Slick goes silent. Jade has to physically restrain WV for a second so she can hear properly, and shakes her head when the carapacian wheezes at her. "Everything's too twisty," she whispers.

Why is she whispering? She's pretty sure Spades is well aware they're following him; she and WV aren't exactly quiet themselves, here! Ignoring WV's grumbles, Jade nudges him aside and peers around the corner of the nearest junction in the ducts.

To her surprise, Slick is right there. He has a claw tapping against his cracked lips, a scowl on his face, and a knife twirling idly in the other hand, lounging just out of range of a tiny square of light from a vent opening, and it takes Jade wayyy longer than it should before she realizes he's gesturing at her to be quiet.

WQ: What has you so concerned?

Uh, so they can...eavesdrop, apparently? Jade blinks and opens her mouth to give him a piece of her mind about how harassment of WV is sooo not acceptable behavior. Spades stops twirling the knife with a menacing twist and Jade snaps her jaw shut, so that the sound of two mental voices - blurred and vague because she can only make out the noises and not the hand signs, but ringing with clarity in a way that only the Queens seem to have - continues to filter in through the air vent.

BQ: I vacated the premises as quickly as I was able to find the Knight.

BQ: But I know the Dignitary was dead when I left, and Jack wasted no time attacking anyone on Derse. He left to kill the Prospitian players immediately.

...This is...definitely an interesting conversation to be listening in on. WV claws at Jade's side in an attempt to wrangle himself around the corner as well, and Spades glowers at both of them when their squirming results in someone knocking into the wall.

Oh boy. These are really tight quarters, and Jade has no idea if she can defend herself well enough to avoid getting stabbed at this rate… Trying her utmost to be careful, Jade wobbles forward on her forearms without making a sound, and Slick grudgingly doesn't stab her when she gets near enough to blink out the air vent opening at the scene below.

All she can really make out from this awkward angle is that this is a lab, one that Jade remembers ransacking for tools to mess with the Hub earlier today. None of the scientists in the facility are using it: that was why she'd thought it a good target for pillaging, and might also be why the Wondering Querent feels comfortable sitting on the nearest countertop, her head bowed in contemplation of what appears to be a sneaky Queens-only meeting. The Black Queen is a barely-visible bobbing head as she paces back and forth before her counterpart, just close enough to the vent that Jade can't get a good look at her.

WQ: So when the Brute told the Knight that Noir or the Dignitary had been killing Dersites - BQ: I didn't hear that at the time. I needed to reach the observatory and get into position. But yes. There were...too many bodies to have been accounted for by Noir's rampage.

BQ: Someone else was killing that day.

BQ: We already know one troll was physically present in the human session when they should not have been. That much glitching in one session -

WQ: You think - the Bard?

BQ: Who else?

WQ: But to what purpo-

BQ: Wait. Quiet.

The Black Queen stops pacing for a long moment. Or at least, Jade thinks she does. Her space sense can't really tell her much, but the carapacian's head stops bobbing. Then, quick as a whip, the BQ looks up at the vent sharply, her white eyes narrowed. Jade squeaks and whips her head back, and Spades curses hoarsely.

BQ: Dammit, Slick. I know you're there!

SS: Shit.

And with that, Spades Slick absconds so fast it makes Jade almost knock her head against the side of the vent trying to watch him flee, his unravelling grey sweater tripping him up so that he curses and swears and hauls up the trailing hem to slice off the bottom half. Jade could swear the shadows of the ventilation ducts move in a way shadows are not supposed to move, slinking along after Slick with intent. WV whimpers and bats at the walls of the duct, tapping at a moving shadow and then yanking his claw back with a wheeze.

She waits for a long moment, heart pounding in her chest, for the Queens to call her out for eavesdropping, too, but there's nothing but mental silence. She's the only voice in her brain. Blinking, Jade peers cautiously out the vent again.

The lab is empty.

Jade and WV exchange looks, and she makes another mental note to herself - it's not just the custodians who are keeping secrets.

She wonders what a Bard can do.
She stops wondering when she checks her watch and realizes she's five minutes late. "Eeeeeep!" she shrieks, seizing WV around the neck before he can react. "We're so late!"

If the elbow WV digs into her side is any indication, he could seriously care less.

Everyone is already in the conference room by the time Jade wanders in, WV in tow. The tiny carapacian had wanted to keep exploring the ducts, but she dragged him along regardless, because the last thing she needs is to have to start a ruckus over Slick stabbing her sidekick or anything like that. "Sorry I'm late! I'm used to being able to jump everywhere in the nick of time!" she apologizes gaily, skimming right past the reason she was gone to begin with. "What did I miss?"

And whooooa! Jade practically reels right the heck back out of the door when she takes a second look around the room. Both Queens are missing, which is interesting when Jade considers what she just overheard, and Spades Slick is most definitely absent, which doesn't actually surprise Jade in the slightest. He's a jumpy kind of guy, wayyy more of a handful that WV has ever been, and also she's pretty sure those shadow things were after him, so he'll probably be busy for a while.

Rose, who had just been emerging from the hangover throes when Jade stopped by her room on her way to retrieve Bec, is wearing a careful mask of bland consideration, but she no longer has to lean on Kanaya to stand upright and survey the room, so Jade thinks she must be feeling a little better. She's not even glaring at her mom, after all, and that's...progress? Maybe? Doctor Lalonde and Dad Egbert are standing next to each other, Samuel's body language a little less hostile than it had been yesterday, so maybe they're starting to patch things up, too, after all of Samuel's stern disapproval of how Rue raised Rose. Jade really hopes that whole situation will get resolved ASAP, so she can judge who is most likely to be a suspect in Grandpa's mission without being influenced by all this negativity floating around.

No, what really makes Jade blink and reconsider the merits of skipping out on this last meeting is that Dave and John are both on their feet and radiating all kinds of bad vibes, the target of which seems to be Dave's Bro.

Uh. Seriously. Jade hasn't really seen Dave do more than smirk and put on that coolkid face for all of the short time she's known him, but right now he's tense all over, bristling and tight-lipped with barely concealed irritation. And John - actually, John looks kind of like he did yesterday, blanched with shards of panic and misery practically jutting through his skin, and John has been doing so much better today! Argh! Karkat is latched to John's side with a hard expression, but it doesn't look like the claw he has gripping John's hand is doing much good.

Bro Strider, on the other hand, is downright frosty. Jade would say he looked unmoved by the two angry super-powered kids glaring at him, except there's a stubborn downturn in the corner of his lip, a tightness in his jaw, and even with his eyes concealed Jade thinks he might just be frowning a little. But also he could probably beat the ever-loving crap out of John and Dave with his hand tied behind his back, so what the heck? Why do those two look like they're about to pick a fight?

Doctor Lalonde's smile is a triumph of will over the incredible awkwardness all of this mess has inspired. For some reason, Jade feels like she should be taking notes. "Ambrose feels that, as things stand, it would be for the best if we minimized - well, you see, by having so many of you in one place at the same time, it could be catastrophic if the Midnight Crew moved to neutralize you as a threat. So he has suggested -"

"I'm taking my kids and getting the fuck out of here," Ambrose interrupts, folding his arms over his broad chest. "Seattle is a fucking death trap right now, Lalonde, and you know it." He raises an eyebrow, and Jade makes out enough of his eyes behind his shades to see that he's directing the next comment at her. "I can't tell you what to do, Harley, but I can tell you that you should get out while the getting's good."

"I'm staying with John," Dave says curtly, his hands curling into fists by his sides as his shoulder hunch up. Neither he nor his brother have a swordkind drawn yet, but with this kind of atmosphere Jade thinks they're pretty close!

"Fuck no, little man."

"I'm pretty sure we should all stick together!" Jade offers, which earns her a wild gesture of agreement from Dave as though to say 'see, we're clearly in the right.' But gosh, seriously, why is this even up for debate? Is Bro nuts? Splitting up is a stupid plan! "If we can work out all the mechanics of how our powers work together, we'll be much better equipped to fight off stronger bad guys. It requires testing!"

Bro just shakes his head. "Science has nothing to do with it. Common fucking sense does. This isn't something you get to argue."

Dave's voice collar makes an odd popping sound, as though it isn't sure just what the heck to make of the noise Dave is trying to make. John digs white-knuckled fingers into the other boy's shoulder, which might be all that's keeping Dave from leaping into a strife right here and now. "Hey asshole, fuck you -"

"Common sense and rationality is a little much to ask at the moment, I'm afraid." Rose has her palms together, pressing the blade of her fingers down the bridge of her nose, with the faintest frown on her face. Her voice, hoarse from whatever she drank last night and this morning, still manages to cut through Dave's impending rant. She and Kanaya glance at each other and it's Rose who looks away first, as though she's been stung. "You might have had more luck persuading Dave to leave before we witnessed what we did yesterday. Now, none of us are in any state to separate in the immediate future." Rose spreads her hands, palms up as she shrugs.

Bro's jaw clenches. "I said 'kids,' didn't I? Means you're coming too, kid."

Almost as though she anticipated this, Kanaya doesn't miss a beat before replying, "Not possible. Rose and I must still pay a visit to Los Angeles before we can even hope to tack on yet another destination."

"Make it possible," Bro says, cool as anything and meeting Kanaya stare for stare. "Or I'll do it for you." And oh jeez, Jade is starting to see what Grandpa meant when he said Bro was stubborn. "This is a fucking unreasonable risk to my shithead kids, and I don't want them anywhere near here."

"Now, Ambrose." Samuel tries next, while Jade slowly sidesteps her way toward the John-Dave-Karkat huddle. Karkat swings his head to look at her, one sharp canine stabbing right through his lower lip with the force he's using to keep his mouth shut, but Jade doesn't even try to touch John; she stands at Dave's back instead, raising her hands in a gesture of peace because literally the last thing they need right now is for Karkat to flip into over-protective mode and start yelling at anyone who comes within five feet of John.

"I agree that Seattle is unsafe at the moment," Samuel is saying, his voice pitched low and soothing as he steps forward, his face calm and his tone coaxing. It would be a lot more effective if Jade didn't still have 'ex-merc' stuck bouncing around in her head when she looks at him. "My own first instinct is to relocate with John without delay. But the Crew will not stop being a threat just because we separate them. The children won't cease communicating now, after all this, and if you believe any of them would leave with such business unsettled, you don't know them.

"Please don't take them." John's voice is hoarse and broken, and Bro's head snaps up. "Please don't." John's fingers clutch Dave hard enough that Dave has to be hurting, but even when Karkat reaches up to rub at the back of John's hand and peel the fingers gently away, Dave doesn't move.

Bro stares. Jade tucks her hand into Rose's when the other girl joins their huddle of solidarity, and Karkat nearly jumps a foot in the air when Kanaya appears at his other shoulder.

In the end, it's probably John that sells it, though. When the silence stretches out, Jade leans forward everrr so slightly, slow enough that Karkat doesn't notice, and she feels that John is trembling all over. He's not even sobbing; the tears just sluice down his face as he stares not at Bro but at something in the distance only he's seeing.

He's not okay. He's really not. And Jade isn't sure exactly what they can do to make it better, but by golly, she knows they're going to try.

"Little shits," is all Bro says. He never actually, you know, admits he's agreed to let Dave and Rose and Oriole stay; he just kind of vanishes, like that single sentence was meant to encapsulate his reluctant consent.

And all that drama (again, Jade thinks), is why none of them notice until later that Oriole isn't in the room.

That, in fact, no one has seen him in quite some time.

They only find his note after someone gets the belated idea to search outside, in case he's just decided to take his newly-healed wings for a test flight. The note's taped to the front doors in the lobby, of course, which is the first place they should have looked, in retrospect. Jade manages to elbow her way in so she can read it while everyone else crowds around or waits to hear it second hand.

fuck, i'm not good at goodbye notes never really had people to say goodbye to anyway so what the hell, i'm heading back to houston, idek what the rest of you are doing just

i needed to leave. need to be on my own, figure out what i'm doing with myself

i'm gonna be honest, i feel like shit and i'm pissed as hell that suddenly there's this entire archive of video evidence trying to tell me i'm nothing so fuck that. rose, you were drunk as hell but you give good advice. i'm not just gonna cut you all out because that would be unreasonable and shit, esp with the crew still probably gunning for my dave-shaped head. but I'm gonna go it alone for a while and get back on my feet on my own like if you guys need help or something, text me, and if i hear anything about the crew or world-ending shit i'll give you a heads up but i'm not just some extra dave. i'm me. and i don't think you all can really understand that just yet, not when you have so much other shit that's more important to you. you've all got your own problems. i've got mine

but also, there's something we're all forgetting, but i can't remember what. wow that was helpful, wasn't it. fuck. just try to think about it, okay, because there's definitely something important that we're not remembering here and i'm pretty sure it's going to fuck us all over. we talked about it earlier but then everyone got goddamn emotional and here we are. forgetting shit

this note is falling apart so i'll just stop. yeah

later

"If that little shit had waited two fucking minutes," Bro mutters. "Now I need to go after him. Dammit."

"Dude. Yes. Go. Hunt down our little chicken nugget," Dave says encouragingly, and they all waste the next ten minutes trying to convince Bro that no, just because Dave is being a total dick it does not mean Bro gets to revoke his Seattle-privileges. Kanaya pulls out a tube of lipstick and this is apparently scary enough to inspire Rose to hastily intervene in the rapidly escalating rap battle between Dave and Bro - which is a shame, because Jade is taking notes on the whole thing for future rap reference! Jade is half sure Bro's just going to end up taking Dave and Rose and gunning the engine, and that she'll have to teleport in to rescue them from death by puppets or some nonsense, but Bro peels off into the evening with absolutely zero attempts at kidnapping, perhaps hoping to flag Oriole down before he can get more than a few miles away.

Either way, Rue Lalonde passes John's dad a ring of keys, dabbing at her eyes with a handkerchief that appears to come from nowhere, and looks anywhere but at Rose as she informs them all that she'll keep working with the Querent on the Hub to try to find out more about the game. Jade feels a pang, wishing she could keep working at it herself, but she can always come back later, surely! There's no way she won't visit a lab as neat as this one again!

Jade isn't sure exactly when Bec returned, but when they pop open the trunk the wolf is in there, looking as innocent as the driven snow as they stuff their luggage inside with it once more, like it hasn't been frolicking around with a dead man in a robot chassis for however long. She rolls her eyes at it, and when WV insists on wriggling into the trunk alongside the wolf, she shuts the trunk lid on the two of them engaged in an extremely one-sided wrestling match.

Then, with Kanaya and Rose in their vehicle and everyone else piling into the Egbert's car, they slowly make their way out of the valley. There's a rough patch as they cut through that forest Doctor Lalonde's scientist had to guide them through earlier, and then Jade feels the twistiness clear the air at last. She settles back, bouncing in her seat with a happy sigh, and gives Dad Egbert a five minute warning as she whistles for Bec and casts her mind out as far as she can reach, getting a feel for her powers' reach once again. Gosh, it feels good to be free!

Because Karkat has made it eminently clear that a second road trip is not in the cards, and Seattle's not too far away. Jade has jumped further distances in one go just trying to cross Texas, and that was with Clubs Deuce on her trail. With Bec's silent assistance, Jade waits until they are most definitely out from under the void warding, and then she pops them all straight back to the neighborhood, her grip on both vehicles and all the occupants augmented by Becquerel's influence. They land with a creak in an empty field a couple miles from the Egbert's house so as to avoid hitting any people or traffic, and Samuel drives the rest of the way to a small mansion tucked away in a quiet cul-de-sac, Kanaya's vehicle hard on their tailgate.

"Welcome, everyone," Rose announces sardonically as they exit the cars, turning pale eyes on them all with a faint but steady smirk, holding out her hand palm up for Samuel Egbert to pass her the ring of keys. "Welcome to my old home."

(The Queens don't see them off. And no one seems to know exactly where Spades Slick is.)

(Which is maybe just how the carapacian likes it.)

(Jade wonders.)

Back in the Cascades, a cloaked, mechanical man exits a valley that only tenuously exists before activating the rockets in his feet.

He has a long way to go, and never has it been harder for him to leave on one of his adventures - except perhaps, for that one night, long ago, when he realized he had to leave his precious charge alone on an island, with nothing but robots and a wolf of questionable motives to guard her.

In the trunk of a car, a small carapacian hiccups and rolls onto his belly in a flash of green light. His only companion is utterly silent, as always, and WV huffs, prodding at Bec's side until the wolf flickers green in response.

Queens are intimidating. He isn't sure he liked running into them, even if they are trying to be helpful for once.

That didn't stop him from observing them. He's never really been one to let royalty frighten him.

Well. There's no time like the present. WV raises his claws, opens his mouth, and summons up all the breath in his lungs.

WV: karoghevorevemekylselindz??

(There's no one but Bec to hear. But it's a start.)

---

Her Imperious Condescension is present when Diamonds Droog finally arrives for the meeting.

Diamonds doesn't like it. It's been ages since she learned that the Condesce was responsible for a great deal of the Midnight Crew's funding, but her spy network has still be absolutely useless when it comes to rooting out exactly how the Condesce and the boss came to be involved in the first place. In the world of blackmarket politics, an alliance like that should have made ripples with someone. There are whispers from Siberia and Mongolia, but both are known haunts of the Condesce's, which makes it difficult to sort out the Doctor's stake in everything.

Also, Diamonds has a strict schedule she's trying to keep, here, and the Condesce's presence means that Diamonds is forced to wait beside the half-filled bowl of Swedish fish by the door like some teenage miscreant waiting for her turn to speak with the school principal. The injuries inflicted by Spades Slick still burn under the bandages when she shifts with a hiss, and she tightens her jaw to prevent another slip.

They wouldn't scab, for the longest time. The cuts and scrapes themselves wouldn't be serious on their own, but when the blood refused to coagulate and she began to bleed through her third suit, Diamonds had come as close as she ever has in her life to freaking the fuck out. The further from Seattle she came, the more the bleeding slowed, but the scabs are still tender and easily torn free to start the hemorrhaging all over again. A sore spot in the crease of her elbow marks where her private doctor put the IV for the blood infusion, but she'd turned down the offer of an antifibrinolytic to slow the bleeding. The last thing she needs is some unfamiliar drug influencing her judgment right now.

"I got my Heiress under control," the troll is saying flippantly, holding out her phone and pouting her lips to take a selfie. Her masses of hair have been dyed a bright shade of fuchsia, and Diamonds shudders at the sight. "Wellll, occupied, anyway~ Long as she's busy with the massive squidbeach, she's ain't glubbing around with things elsewhere. Ain't heard a peep outta her about LA, either. #urwelcome"

But is she an activated player? This is rather an important thing to discern, Tethys.

The results of the analysis of the Knight's blood sample were...troubling. I do not like what I cannot see.

The tiny troll rolls her eyes so hard that a rare flash of unstained yellow sclera becomes visible, and then she leans over the sidearm of Doc Scratch's chair with the phone outstretched, making a duck face as she snaps another picture of the two of them. "Don't worry yourself, Doc," the troll cackles, tapping away at the screen with long painted claws. "None of that life-y bullshit that I can sea. And if I do sea it, I'll krill the beach so dead not even weird magic could save her bass." Another wide-mouthed laugh, and the Condesce flips the phone to show the blank-faced boss of the Midnight Crew something on the screen. "Look atcha! Holy mackerel, you seeeeariously need to work on dat shelfie game, frond!"

Diamonds's skin crawls at the mere thought of having photographic evidence of this particular unholy alliance floating around the Condesce's Twitter account, but she bites her tongue. She's trying not to draw attention to herself right now. It has been quite the struggle, particularly when all the Felt members in the building have gotten the notion that she somehow failed in Seattle, and now take every available opportunity to attempt to mock her for it. Clover sniggering behind her back as she passed through the accounting floor had almost been the last straw; even now her thumb taps a warning against the handle of the cue stick lying folded up along her forearm and palm.

Well. From the Crew and the Felt's perspective, she did fail. Operations have been successfully established in Seattle, but at the price of an entire secret base, increased public awareness of the Crew's existence, the escape of Sharpshooter, and loss of Spades Slick's trail, perhaps for good. That last one in particular rankles her, but she breathes, and maintains her professional mask.

Because Diamonds got a great deal more out of the venture than the boss can be allowed to know. No one except Marlowe can know, and she's debating when that particular vulnerability will need to be amputated.

Unfortunately, the tradeoff is that everyone and their criminal mother now thinks she's either lost her mind or her touch. But Diamonds is a professional. She's borne up under worse than this with her dignity intact.

Your next move?

The Condesce shrugs, humming to herself and beatboxing a little when the key changes. At last she says, "Probs gonna scuttle my way over to check in on the old CrockCorp. Been a while since those buoys and gills hadta stand up to an inspection. But Fef'll get all up in my business if I give her the helm fo' too long, so if you need anemone in DC bribed, I'll be back there in two shakes of a guppy's tail."
Excellent. Droog, inform Tethys if there are any outstanding measures required for your contacts in the capital.

Diamonds stiffens, and nods. "Of course, boss. I gotcha covered."

And Tethys? Do try to keep G'bgolyb in check. I would have preferred you found some other way to distract the Witch than setting another Horrorterror loose on the board.

Negotiating with two of them is rather my limit of my tolerance for managing chaos, never mind three.

I could do it, of course. But I can see that you will handle it just fine on your own. You may proceed.

The Condesce smacks her gum loudly in her cheek, baring sharp fangs in Diamonds's direction. "Yeah, yeah, shore thing. #letsgetitstartedinhere"

Someone has got to tell this troll that you're not actually supposed to say the word "hashtag" out loud - or, for that matter, use hashtags at all outside of social media internet forums. But like hellfire is Diamonds going to be the one to do it. Instead, she mutely calls up a certain list of names that have been tallying up over the course of the past few weeks and forwards it to the latest number her people have managed to ferret out. When the Condesce's phone chimes out and the troll raises an eyebrow at the caller ID, whistling, Diamonds allows herself a small twinge of pride. "You don't glub around now, do you?" is all the troll has to say, before she snatches up her 2x3dentkind from beside the crackling green fireplace and strolls toward the grandfather clock. "Shell you beachbunnies later!" the troll calls as she vanishes into the strange contraption.

Such a colorful character. I do enjoy her visits.

You wouldn't have known it from looking at the big guy's face - or lack thereof, anyway. The strange leader of the Crew is as much an unreadable, ivory wall as ever as he stands up from behind his desk with his palms still pressed together contemplatively. Diamonds raises her chin and adjusts the position of her hat before stepping away from the wall.

Perhaps it's just that she recently committed a massive breach of professional trust in order to further the Crew aces' designs rather than the boss's, but Diamonds thinks that the usual oppressive, chilled aura that always seems to fill the boss's room has grown colder. The thin, greenish flames in the hearth wrap and flicker between the logs of wood, and do nothing whatsoever to warm the air. Her wounds from the battle with Spades Slick ache like a son of a whore, reminding her that she's going to need to go hard or home in pieces if the big guy is aware of her minor acts of betrayal.

She's in a pretty shitty position right now. She doesn't like it.

Now, Droog. The first thing I would like to assure you of is that I am not angry.

…Mmm. Not the best possible start. Diamonds grits her teeth, and bows her head. For a moment she thinks she's gonna blow it, her jaw locked up as she fumbles to recall her cover story. "I made several critical errors while dealing with the heroes. I "- and this part stings the most to say, so much so that she has to spit it with more force than she intended - "underestimated them, in some respects. It will not happen again."

A mental sigh filters through her mind as the Doctor walks to a disturbingly green bookshelf to draw an equally green book out of the stacks. She can't make out the title from here, as it is written in a green ink that blends in remarkably well with the rest of the room's décor.

Urgh. Felt.
The playing field was altered drastically in between the moment that Boxcars was pulled from the operation and you entered it. Hiccups were only to be expected, with so much void-interference concentrated in that area. These failures have been accounted for.

You also had to activate the sleeper agent, am I correct?

_Balls to you, boss man. You're damned right, the failures were accounted for._ Diamonds keeps her features schooled into earnest remorse, smoothing the edges of her suit jacket with her fingers obsessively. She almost loses her cool when the edge of her nail snags on the fabric, but she eases it free without fucking up her suit. "Regrettably, yes, I did. I needed the insurance when it became clear I'd be dealing with more than two heroes at once," she says. "It was also in our best interests to confirm that Die did manage to tap the right people, all those years ago."

She injects as much dripping skepticism into 'all those years ago' as she possibly can, because _that_ had been the most troublesome part of her time spent in Seattle. Worse than dealing with a pack of heroic delinquents. Worse than that insufferable Spades Slick. Doctor Die is in charge of some of the Felt's most questionable experimentation, and has been since long before the Midnight Crew merged with the Felt. Diamonds has a healthy skepticism about anything Die claims to have done in the years before the merger began, and the most dubious sleeper agents in Diamonds's extensive collection of spies and little birds are all those whom Die claims he planted almost two decades ago. Diamonds has access to the files, of course, but she barely trusts Die's current work as it is, let alone whatever fucked up shit he did in the service of the Doctor back when the Felt were barely a blip on Diamonds's radar, back when she was still a he freelancing for the Братва groups on American soil and knew Hearts and Clubs only by reputation.

Because the sleeper in Seattle isn't one of her personal recruits, Diamonds had to play that entire confrontation with Heir by ear, which always leaves a bad taste in her mouth. But Die's dubious efforts paid off; even with the sleeper deep in the voided zone where the Felt lost track of its whereabouts, the agent could still be maneuvered closer to Heir in order to produce a name and address.

She had a backup plan, of course. But it would have been incredibly stupid. It's for the best that Die's sleeper project worked, even if it raises several very important questions.

The first and foremost being, how the _hell_ did Die know to tag someone close to John Egbert so long ago, when the boss himself claimed not to know for certain if Heir was the one he'd been hunting for in the void all these years?

Seriously. It boggles the mind. The whole point of waiting until now to confirm the Heir of Breath actually deserved the title was that they had to wait until he began altering reality on a fundamental level instead of just doing windy bullshit. Showing up in Houston had done that. The Knight and the Witch had started out much earlier, activating powers that gave off easily detectable energy signatures, but the Heir and the Seer could just have been ordinary people, according to Scratch. They couldn't jump to conclusions.

Diamonds is beginning to suspect this is one of those situations where someone has been lying to her. Profusely. And by god, she is sick to death of it.

Hm? Oh, no, Droog, time travel was involved.

_Shit. "Pardon?"_ Diamonds says, feeling more than a little light-headed. How much of this has the boss man been hearing? Even when she thinks she has a grip on her new strategy, she can't tell if she's truly fooled him - or if he's just tactfully waiting to murder her _after_ she's stopped being useful. It's what she would do if she were a blank-faced, near-omniscient mob boss with a competent but treacherous resource on hand.

The round orb of Scratch's head tilts up from where he has been (apparently) studying the green-inked book, and he snaps it shut so that the spine rests in the palm of his gloved hand. He drifts toward Diamonds, who flinches back against the wall, but diverts at the last moment to inspect his Mobius chess game. The number of pieces has expanded since Diamonds was last in this office; one large figurine in particular catches the eye because it sends a throbbing pang through her brain, as though staring at the white wheels and wings for too long would give one more than a mere headache.

Dear Matchsticks has been running errands for me.

"...Sir...Matchsticks died in '09." Diamonds remembers. Diamonds was the one who killed her. The Crew hadn't been on the best of terms with the Felt at the time. The whole situation was rather awkward, particularly since half the Felt had been convinced the two gangs had already brokered a truce, while Clubs had already wired half of their hideout to explode on Hearts's orders. Matchsticks had escaped the blast, but not the brawl immediately afterwards. She'd been a wide-shouldered troll, rustblooded and swinging a fire extinguisher like a clubkind, and Diamonds had taken great care to smash the Felt member's skull in after the fire extinguisher split open against a streetlight and ruined her favorite Westwood suit jacket with a blast of foam.

Like hell would Diamonds ever forget someone who ruined one of her suits.

Her past self is still more than willing to respond to an alarm. Of course, the number of times she can assist us is limited to how many times she'd used the ability by the time she came to an unfortunate end at your hands, so I have been sparing and judicious in taking advantage of what few opportunities we have left.

Once you confirmed the Heir's identity, she and Trace went ahead and implemented retroactive tagging.

Oh sweet meatbag tenderizers. Time travel. Diamonds grimaces and allows herself a moment of weakness because damnit, even she has trouble seeing the logic behind it all. If it were any other member of the Midnight Crew standing here, they wouldn't see it. Hearts in particular has an infamous tendency to begin shrieking "I HATE TIME TRAVEL" repeatedly at the top of his lungs and brutally pummel anyone unfortunate enough to be caught discussing temporal shenanigans within arms' reach.

"So even though this person has been under our influence for almost twenty years, we've only been aware of that since the moment at which you had Matchsticks come forward from before her death to receive orders and then go back to do Die's dirty work?" She thinks that's how it would work. Maybe.

In essence.

It truly is moments like this that make Diamonds seriously contemplate swearing a vow of poverty, hanging up her suits, and relocating to a nice Orthodox monastery like her dedyushka always wanted. Kozheozersky is nice and remote and temporally linear, surely. One has to walk thirty two kilometers on foot to reach it even on a good day - no one would dare horse around with time travel in a desolate place like that.

"Why couldn't Matchsticks have informed you of these utterly crucial facts ahead of time?" she asks weakly. She can already tell the answer is going to make her brain hurt.
Because she already hadn't done so by the time I gave the orders. Altering that could have doomed the whole thing, and we can't have that, now, can we.

He doesn't phrase it like a question.

The subarctic climes of Arkhangelsk Oblast sound more and more tempting with each passing moment. Really. Diamonds has always been an American city brat, but she still has family in the old country. She could make this happen.

While Diamonds seriously considers monastic seclusion and carefully directs her thoughts away from anything concerning purposefully sabotaged missions, the boss sets the green tome down with a thump, dust flying up from the cover as he stoops to pull two heavy white bowls from somewhere behind his desk. One is heaped with waxy, oversized red lip candies, while the second contains at least ten servings of black licorice gummy bears.

Come away from the door now, Droog, if you will. I have been anticipating more company.

She complies in a slight daze. Occasionally she allows thoughts of a certain device Marlowe procured for her to drift across her mind, in an effort to gauge the boss's reaction, but his smooth face is as unreadable as ever, and his telepathic voice makes no mention of noticing any changes in Diamonds's thoughts as he strides with his hands tucked behind his back to wait by the door. If he is going to say anything about it, he'll no doubt wait until the moment Diamonds least expects it because, oddly enough, her boss is a complete and utter fucker.

No matter. She has reason to believe that thinking about interacting with the device in the future will block Scratch's ability to see her and know her thoughts in the present, similar to how planning to approach the heart of the void-zone near Seattle caused all of his careful calculations for Diamonds's actions that night to become inaccurate.

If she can harness this damn void shit, she might actually be able to permanently level the playing field, and that is something she is very interested in exploiting.

Hearts arrives first; Diamonds supposes she should have anticipated that from the barely perceptible differences in how the bowls of candy were positioned on the table by the door, but she's a little preoccupied at the moment. She eyes Hearts speculatively and raises an eyebrow when the man squints in her direction. He coughs when he sees the silent question, stuffs a fistful of candy into his pocket, and gruffly shrugs his shoulders at her.

When they'd parted there had been some...hard feelings over Diamonds receiving the assignment in Seattle, but Hearts never could keep up a grudge against a member of the Crew. Against certain members of the Felt, like Cans, yes, and she doubts the sting of being beaten by Heir and Hemogoblin will have faded from the man's memory, but never against her or Clubs. "I left plenty of both of them for you to deal with," Diamonds says, and she smirks when realization finally lights up the man's rugged face. "I do hope you appreciate it, Hearts."

"I heard," he says, and that is all. It's mild compared to some of the mockery the Felt have been tossing around all day, and Diamonds nods. She recognizes a peace offering when Hearts grumpily mutters his way into one. Thank yous aren't really his style. "And boss, Virginia was a fuckin' waste of time. I camped out for days and didn't see shit." The man tromps over to the nearest abominable felt green chair and sits heavily, munching on wax lip candies with a scowl. "The young one swims a lot and the old one was goddamn zozzled 'afore noon most days."

And that was the full extent of the conclusions you've drawn from surveilling them?

"Uh, yeah, boss, they weren't all that damn interestin'." Hearts tosses back another handful of candy, waving his other hand vaguely. "Whaddya expect, I'm not the damn spy guy. 'S what Di's people are here for."

But were you or were you not at one point held up downtown by a flat tire for several hours?

Hearts shifts awkwardly in his seat, his face working hard to cover up a grimace of shame with something appropriately penitent. He couldn't have looked guiltier if he tried. An actor, Hearts is not. "Uh. I was gonna mention that. In the report. Promise, boss."

Oh, not to worry. It simply gives me something to speculate on later. Thank you for your time, Boxcars. I know surveillance isn't your forte.

"But nothing really happened," Hearts mutters, scratching the back of his head and flopping back in the chair, his bulk making the whole thing creak. The motion hikes up part of his suit jacket to reveal a faint orange stain along the lower left of his ill-fitted undershirt, and Diamonds's breath hisses through her teeth like a steam from tea kettle. She is surrounded by sloppiness - the only exception being the boss man himself, who wears too much green for her to appreciate the quality of his suits like she should - and she can only imagine that if her spending a few weeks out in the field doing hands-on work has been enough slack to let Hearts think he can get away with wearing soiled clothing like that to a meeting like this, Clubs will show up in pin-stripes and polka dots with ribbons on his horns. Honestly, she can't leave either of them alone for a hot second or any hope for the Midnight Crew preserving its dignity goes flying out the window.

Speaking of Clubs, where is the stumpy moron? The door's still hanging open and the bowl of gummy bears sits on the table like a sad offering to an absent trick-or-treater. She can't imagine the boss would have prepared the candy unless Clubs was on his way; Scratch accounts for things like lateness with his unnerving knowledge of everything going on around him. It can't be long now -

"They seem alright, I guess!"

Diamonds recoils so hard her elbow slams into the wall behind her. Hearts must have swallowed his candy the wrong way, because he begins choking and wheezing and pounding his barrel chest with a meaty fist with a faint look of desperation on his face.

Only then does Diamonds see Clubs kicking his heel on a stool, next to one of the rounded archways that lead off into side rooms filled with bookshelves and esoteric green statues. He's not in a leopard-print suit, which is almost as much of a shock in and of itself; in fact, he looks almost impossibly mundane, and it takes Diamonds far too long to realize that he's wearing a plain, ordinary black cap instead of any usual ridiculous hats.

She hadn't noticed Clubs come into the room. There's at least ten feet of space between Diamonds and Clubs, and she hadn't even felt him try to sneak in and land a pap on her knee. The troll claps his hands on his knees with his gaze fixed on Doc Scratch, as though there's no one else in the room.

...Oh, good god. He's ill. It's the only explanation. Diamonds inches away from the brownblood, praying that whatever sickness he has isn't contagious. Or at least that it keeps him dazed enough not to notice Diamonds before she can make a quick exit.

"All of them are very well trained," Clubs is saying, his head tilted to the side while he taps a claw against his mouth, as though giving the question intense consideration. "I mean, Doctor Die seemed kinda mad at the one because she caused some kerfluffle, but Diamonds's report says the RL-2408 performed just fine in Seattle anyway, so Die's probably just being a negative Nelly about it!"

Diamonds nods. Then she realizes what Clubs just said and what. "You - read a report?" she repeats, taking another step away from Clubs. Clubs has never read her mission reports in his life unless she held his nose to the screen and gave him a large-print sparknotes version of the damned things for future reference. Even then, she usually has an assistant or two pulled from her division and allocated to him at all times to keep him informed when he inevitable forgets some mission-critical detail.

What the hell kind of illness would inspire the mob laughing stock to actually do his job?

"Yup!" Clubs doesn't even look at her while he says it, pulling out his phone and sticking his tongue out of his mouth slightly as he scrolls through something. "'RL-2408, code-name Ranger. Completed task competently. Recommended for field assignments only under direct supervision of an ace member.' So - not perfect, but good enough for Diamonds, which is pretty darn good."

Diamonds stares.

Doc Scratch does not seem all that bothered over the fact that Clubs is apparently running up an uncharacteristically high streak on the competency meter. In fact, he's sailing away like a white-and-green ship in a sea of felt, humming to himself as he strides toward the green tinted windows on the wall beside the chaise lounge, the ones that lead out onto the balcony. The boss's hands are still tucked behind his back, but the windows spring open anyway so that the man can step out onto the balcony. They're high enough up that the stink of the city below doesn't reach them on the breeze, but Diamonds is too busy throwing looks at Clubs to even notice.

Excellent. Die can be overly hasty in making his evaluations when he has a particular animosity for someone. And unfortunately, I cannot observe the children personally. A second and third opinion is always a wise precaution.

Boxcars, how you would feel about taking company along when you return to oversee matters in Seattle?

No need to answer. I already know that you would be more than happy to help field test them for Die.

"I would, would I?" Hearts mutters half-heartedly, shoving up his hat to scratch under the brim. "...Eh, why the hell not. S'long as they take orders, no skin offa my nose. But if it turns out they're a buncha shitty brats, I'm shippin' them back to the mad scientist in pieces, y'hear?"

Excellent. There is always an element of uncertainty, but at least three out of the four should consistently perform well.

"What do you need me to do, sir?" Clubs chirrups, and he sounds the same as ever but Diamonds is still staring because something is off. She can't tell if it's the fact that she's desperately trying not to think about certain things in Scratch's presence or if it's legitimately something strange about the way Clubs is acting, but one way or another it is giving her heebie jeebies that she can't quite shake. He volunteers for assignments all the time with cheerful, reckless abandon, whether his team is prepared to handle it or not, so it's not that…

The boss steps further out onto the balcony, and Diamonds lingers in the room, casting an eye at Hearts and catching him eyeing her up, too. By silent accord, neither of them move to follow the boss; they can still hear him just fine from here.
Strange things tend to happen out on that balcony. Hearts is more open to complaining about the weird shit that happens around their boss after a beer or three, and though she'd never dare say it aloud Diamonds agrees with most of his muttered grievances. One of them is that the balcony should probably have been condemned and demolished years ago for the sanity of all non-Doc Scratch members of the Crew.

I am tempted to send you to tail our tyrian collaborator next. The Condescension has always had her own agenda. Not that she can turn against us, of course; that would be simply impossible for her. But I cannot see all that she does, and I would prefer to at least have some idea of her personal aspirations, so as to better account for them in our own designs.

Droog came too close of late to void interference, and it lingers still. I would prefer to keep from stacking interference on interference. For your own safety, of course, Droog.

"'Preciate it, boss," Diamonds manages to drawl, shrugging her shoulders lazily when Hearts raises both eyebrows at her. They need to think this doesn't matter to her. Just another bizarre part of their lives that she ignores in favor of doing her job. Void interference getting the boss all twitchy? Nope. Doesn't matter to her.

Marlowe had better not let go of that thing, or she is so very, very, Incredibly fked.

Though it is nice to know that the boss is still having trouble seeing her. Very nice indeed.

"I can do that!" Clubs chimes in, his head bobbing in a nod. "Can I take the Transformer?"

... You may.

"Yay! Thanks, boss!"

Tiny alarms are going off in her head.

Now then, Droog.

Diamonds shoves Clubs's strangeness out of her thoughts - she can't afford to play this game right now, whatever the hell it is. She needs to focus. "Sir?" she says stiffly. She should be lounging back against the wall; she needs to project all the nonchalance that she can, but there's a tension stringing up her spine that won't fade, a prickle of sweat along her sides that's going to goddamn ruin her waistcoat.

Slick has moved into a void-zone along with the heroes. I am working to circumvent said void shielding and pinpoint their location, but it will take time. Until then, how would you like to kidnap someone...very dear to him?

...Oh. Scratch did always know how to get her attention. Diamonds feels a hot, feral wave of pleasure curl in her belly, and she tries not to let her smile grow too wide and give the game away. Distractions, always distractions. But they're such appealing distractions."Oh, I'd like it, boss," she replies, sinking back against the wall and closing her eyes. "Tell me more."

From what I observed while I could still witness your strifing with Slick, he received a note from someone via the Lieutenant.

While Slick is under void shielding, MP and her patron are not. She may have succeeded in evacuating the man who lives above, but she's not infallible. And there is something...
Bring her to me. Failure is not an acceptable outcome for this mission. Once we have her, Slick's reactions are preposterously easy to predict, and it will be one more link soldered into the chain.

"It would be my pleasure." Diamonds tilts her head to the side, sifting through her memories of her short but memorable encounter with Slick's little Prospitian sweetheart in Kazakhstan, considering her options.

Kidnapping. No ridiculous children in ridiculous costumes. Just abduction and blackmail, pure and simple. And on top of that, the chance not just to repay Slick for being the cause of all this nonsense, but to bring MP in and...talk to the Prospitian dame about certain matters that Scratch need not know about.

God, how she loves it.

Excellent. You all may wish to leave soon. I am expecting a rather...horrific guest, shortly, and this one has been rather restless of late.

And that would be the out Diamonds has been itching for this whole time. The thought of what could possibly be visiting the boss makes the color drain out of Hearts's face, and the vague terror in his eyes is almost comical as the chair he's been rocking back in settles back down onto all four legs with a thump. "I - uh, I gotta go pick up the kids," he says hastily, pointing his thumb over his shoulder with a bead of sweat dripping down the side of his face.

"Later boss!" Clubs adds, trotting off after Hearts.

He doesn't even glance at Diamonds.

And that's just bizarre enough to settle the dispute in her mind. She and Clubs need to chat.

Diamonds rolls her shoulders, frowning as Clubs trundles out the door, and then she looks out at the balcony once more. The boss's back is relaxed and straight, his white suit impeccably cut to fit him, and she considers cutting and running while her luck still holds out because she does not need to push this man. There's a very good reason the Crew allied with the Felt despite all of Diamonds's personal reservations about trusting this pack of ill-dressed chumps, and that reason is Scratch is terrifying. If you can't beat them, join them - and there was no way in hell that the three Crew aces were ever going to be able to take on whatever the hell Scratch is. He's the boss because he could stomp them all in a heartbeat, and Diamonds has only just now, after all these years, begun to level the playing field.

So. His missions are their missions. His priorities are theirs. And his weird obsession with the hero kids must be pandered to, despite the fact that Diamonds has any number of other ventures she considers more profitable.

"What are you planning for these hero kids?" Diamonds hesitates. There's a vague sense of polite expectancy in her mind instead of a coherent reply, so she presses on. "Setting all of us on them in cycles, tossing those Scratch kids at them as a field test...what's the point of it all? You've seen my report. You know the Heir at least won't interfere with us anymore. Why are we wasting so many resources chasing them around the planet, on missions you've already predicted will fail by the time they're set in motion, when we could be handling bigger heists, expanding to other cities?"

Do you really need to know, so long as you have work to keep you occupied?

I really do, she thinks, because running my own gambit on the side is going to drive me insane otherwise. Because the Midnight Crew has an image to maintain, and hassling child vigilantes to the exclusion of all else was not in the job description when they had agreed to let Scratch take the helm. The three of them'd thought that by joining forces with the Felt, they’d have the connections they needed to run scams and shake down banks across the country, where before they’d been limited in how far they could push their territory before they rammed up against the Mara Salvatrucha or other mobs.

And sure, they still do those things, but Diamonds is now left wondering when all that wonderful criminal activity had taken a back seat to this load of shit.

So she waits, even when the scent of blood and brine starts to flirt with the breeze from the open windows, and the sensation of being watched increases beyond the usual intimidating mental presence that the boss man poses. Her scalp itches, of all things, and her cheeks feel like they’ve been stung by salt water the longer she looks out past Scratch at the darkening sky.

Oh, I plan what I always plan for them.

I plan to use them.

The last comes so quiet, Diamonds isn’t sure if the boss actually says it, or if it’s just her mind playing tricks on her as she exits the office more hastily than she normally would. She maintains her poise as she shoves the door of the office open again, silently cursing whoever closed it behind them in the first place, and tries to ignore the sensation of something with too many mouths exhaling on the back of her neck before the grand doors of the penthouse office slam shut behind her.

Suckers.

Diamonds needs a moment to collect herself, pulling her hat low over her face as she descends the stairway. When her heart stops pumping like a fire hydrant, she composes her expression and looks up. Hearts is shuffling down the stairs one step at a time, reluctance written into his wide back until he looks back at her with what he must think is discretion and he jerks his head toward Clubs.

Clubs, who has already made it down the first flight of stairs and is rounding the second, almost to the accounting floor.

All without a word to either of them, it would seem.

That's more than troubling. That is rude. "Clubs!" Diamonds barks, sharply enough that Hearts flinches, wincing at her as she strides down past him at twice the speed. "I need a word."

Clubs looks up, and waits with a look of open curiosity for Diamonds to reach the landing. They're still out of sight of the Felt below, so she allows herself a small frown, folding her arms as she glowers down at him. "Something the matter?" he asks, radiating innocence as he blinks at her from beneath the brim of his cap.

It's not that there's something different about him, really. More that there's something completely absent. But she can't put her finger on what. "Your visit to the Scratches. It went well?" she says, folding her arms over her chest.

Clubs scratches at his neck, shrugging loosely. His posture is as shitty as ever. "Me and Yavari both sent reports and everything! Don't you already know?"

Diamonds had read them. Yavari's had been short and to the point, a blow by blow account detailing Die's usual hair-trigger temper and perfectionism, while Clubs's had been effusive and full of praise for the Felt's personal mad scientist's work, because Clubs is easily impressed. Nothing had seemed particularly out of the ordinary, apart from the fact that Yavari must have had to personally intervene. to get Clubs to finish any kind of report on time. They'd gone in, observed the strange children, and left without incident. "I'd rather hear it from you, now. Give me a synopsis," she says, running the tip of one nail under the nail of her thumb. She catches herself before she can start worrying at the manicure on the nail itself.

Clubs sighs. "I don't know what else to say. Why does it matter, Diamonds?"

That -

That was not something Clubs would say. Clubs would not sigh and roll his eyes a little and make as though to continue down the stairs without waiting for her to answer the question.

Her hand reaches out before she really thinks about it to haul him back by the shoulder. "Clubs, what the hell is wrong with you?" Diamonds snaps. "Your attitude is not acceptable."

The short troll turns back toward her only to huff out another sigh, his brown eyes glinting as he folds his own claws over his chest and makes a weird face at her. "We have work to get to, Diamonds! Why are you acting so weird?" he complains. The strangeness has done nothing to lower his usual indiscreet volume, and Diamonds winces because there's no doubt in her mind that both Scratch and the Felt down below could hear that last part.

A heavy, wide hand clouts her on the shoulder, heavy enough to jostle her and nearly send her hat teetering off her head. She turns to snarl at the offending party, but Hearts beats her to the punch. "I need to tell you somethin', Di," he says, almost a whisper in her ear, looking downright uncomfortable. "Need some tips on how to deal with them brats."

"Dammit, you don't need tips, Hearts, they're children," Diamonds says impatiently, wrenching her shoulder free. Clubs has taken the interruption as permission to trot down the stairs, his knobby horns bobbling along as he scurries away without even a goodbye.

Hearts yanks her back again, and that's it. Diamonds snaps the cue stick down into her palm and jabs the hilt of it back between her arm and her side into the soft, squishy part of Hearts's beer gut. He grunts and knocks the specibus aside with a hand but doesn't let go of her, and she has to give him kudos for resilience; if nothing else, Hearts is at least her equal in brute strength, if not in mind.
"What?" she hisses.

The man glances around with shifty eyes and coughs into a fist. "Look, seriously, I'm not tryna be some kinda relationship counselor here -"

"- but you're bein' all manner of upset in public about this," Hearts continues, steamrolling right over her, "And no one here actually wants to see you two arguin' about your thing and broadcasting it for all the damn world to see. Least of all me, because I really don't give a damn what your issues are, thanks very much." Having finished what might have been the longest speech he's made in weeks, Hearts rubs the back of his neck, a pleading scowl twisted up on his face.

"What on Earth are you gabbin' about, Hearts?" Diamonds says, feeling her accent slipping as she whips around to see that Clubs has pissed off down the stairs and somehow ended up engaged in a bright-toned conversation with that intolerable, dangerously moronic Eggs woman with the rounded horns. This isn't even her floor. "This shit is none of yours."

"It, uh. Kinda might be." When she glowers at him, opening her mouth to better express her wrath, Hearts holds up both hands in surrender. "Look. You hightailed it right after because chasing after that Slick guy gets you all riled up, but last time we met with the big guy upstairs, Clubs got kinda...pissy. On account of you smacking my face afterward."

"Why the hell would that have anything to do with the fact that he's acting bizarrely? You have noticed, haven't you?" she demands, gesturing down at the wayward brownblood with sweep of her hand. She's becoming increasingly paranoid, highly aware that they've shifted enough that the Felt members below can see them even if they can't hear the hushed whispers of the conversation, and she shoves Hearts further back up the stairs to regain control of the situation. "He certainly never made any mention of trouble between the two of you to me."

"Uh. I get the feeling he thought it was some of that shooshing nonsense." Hearts cringes as the force of Diamonds's glare increases tenfold. "Thought the little punk was gonna knee-cap me over it, to be honest, but now it just looks like maybe he - finally stopped. I mean, he's been pushin' you for a while now, but if he's over it…"

Diamonds can't even believe what she's hearing. "This has nothing to do with whatever ridiculous soothing fetish Clubs might have," she says, shoving her cuekind back up into her sleeve with enough force to almost tear the fabric at her elbow. "He's acting strange, and the best you can come up with is that he's simply decided to stop badgering me every hour of the day?"

Hearts gives her a pointed look. "He's treatin' yah normal, Di. That's all."

"Unbelievable." Diamonds's hand shoots out and she seizes Hearts's right ear between her fingers and her thumb, twisting.

"Fuuuck, Diamo- lay off!" Hearts protests as she drags him down the stairs after her. Diamonds raises her chin and stalks past the crowd of bumbling green-clad accountants and bribers with fully grown man in tow. A scan of the room shows that Clubs has disappeared, most likely down the far set of stairs. "Oh god, I'm sorry, I'll be your relationship counselor just - agh!"

Diamonds isn't all that concerned with where Hearts's stumbling buffoonery takes him as long as he's still following her by the ear, so he manages to plow into Biscuits (really, this isn't even their floor, why are either of those numbskulls up here?) hard enough to make the man topple over onto someone's desk with a shout, kick over an entire shredder full of destroyed documents, and lay waste to an entire pot of coffee on the break table with a wildly swinging elbow.

"Ma'am! Ma'am, please!" It's Clover who jogs alongside her, stumbling over his own feet but never quite falling over as he squashes his pale purple hat down on to his head. "Calm down!"

Diamonds reaches out and slams the small man headfirst against the nearest desk.

Or at least, that's what she intends to do. Clover's too lucky to hit the damn thing; instead he somehow, miraculously, falls by the side of the desk without taking any damage. And she has no intention of wasting time by stopping to try to hurt him once and for all, so Diamonds can only roll her eyes and keep marching.

"Really now, this is no way to behave in a work environment!" Clover has the audacity to call after her. Diamonds grits her teeth and ignores it; she's had plenty of practice with ignoring the Felt today, after all. But then the fool runs up beside her again and really, it's the last straw. He starts beseechingly trying to offer her something to calm down, and really, that just seals his fate. "Can we get you anything? Coffee? Tea? A new hat -"

She lets go of Hearts, winds up with her leg pulled in tight to her chest, and then shoots her foot out, kicking Clover square in the chest. He shrieks as he crashes through the window, a faint "Not "Jesus," Hearts whispers. His hat has fallen off onto the table he's cowering back against, and Diamonds surges forward, seizing the offending object and slamming it down on the other Crew member's head before shoving him in front of her toward the stairwell. No one else dares to approach after that, and Diamonds catches more than a few lower-ranking members of the Felt diving behind their desks as she passes by - they all know Clover is the only one with the sheer dumb luck to survive Diamonds Droog on a rampage.

"Look, I geddit," Hearts starts babbling when they hit the stairwell, breaking off to yelp as Diamonds gives him a particularly hard push downward before continuing. "You're not the mushy papping feelsy type. You're a classy bird and I respect that, I really do, you gotta believe me - shit!" The man's foot slips down two stairs by accident and his arms pinwheel before Diamonds grabs him by the ear and yanks him back on balance. "But yah think you mighta mentioned that to Clubs at some point, if you didn't want him to think you weren't interested? Because you've been sending mixed signals since pretty much ever since the two o' yah met -"

"I am not interested," Diamonds snaps. Then she realizes what he just said. She yanks on Hearts's collar so he stops with her, and frowns. "What mixed signals, dammit? I've been perfectly clear this whole damn time and it's never made the tiny imbecile stop bothering me before."

Hearts sighs wearily. "You fix his clothes."

"I attempt to resuscitate your wardrobe, too, all the damn time."

"Also, you keep assigning people to look out for him when you can't go on away missions together."

Now she's just feeling vaguely offended. "Again, he's an idiot. I'm more concerned about him not fucking up spectacularly and maxing out our bail money allotment for the month." She pauses to consider, and then raises an eyebrow of judgment at Hearts. "Clearly, he wasn't the one I should have been worried about…"

"You have a goddamn terrifyin' tendency to punt innocent bystanders out windows when he hasn't shooshed you in a while, like right the fuck now." Hearts jabs a finger accusingly back up the stairs toward the accounting floor and its new open-air partition.

What she should say is, you have no proof of any such correlation between the two. What comes out is, "Clover is hardly an innocent bystander."

Hearts throws up his hands in apparent disbelief. "Di, I don't even know what to tell yah. Clubs carried a fucking torch for you a helluva long time, and it did nothing but piss you off. Now he's treatin' you exactly like he's done me all these years, and you think he's lost it?"

"I think this is a radical change in his personality," Diamonds says, dropping her voice to a low mutter and casting an eye up the stairs to see if any of the accounting Felt might feel like lingering by the top of the stairs to eavesdrop. They seem to be clear, but there's always Scratch himself to be wary of. He's always watching. "I think that one of us would have noticed such a drastic shift before now. I think the Clubs we both know couldn't keep his mouth shut about a major decision like that. And you know it." She breathes in through her nose, and out through her mouth, and finishes in a rushing, barely-audible whisper, "I think he just spent the last few days observing the Scratch children, in Die's laboratory."

She waits for Hearts to piece it together. She watches the contortions of his face as he blinks and considers what she laid out for him, his eyes staring at the empty air in an immense feat of concentration.

And she nods when the dread finally reaches the man's face, and he meets her gaze again with distinct alarm. The arm under her hand tenses up, and the two Crew members glance as one down the stairs. "Virginia. He'll be taking one of his nifty car-helicopter-transforming robot things," Hearts says. There's nothing but cold, hard calculation in his voice, the bumbling, busybody demeanor gone as though it never existed. "Garage two?"

"Three," Diamonds corrects absently, calling up the blueprint of headquarters in her mind's eye. "He ran over into my lot ages ago."

The meaningful sigh is completely uncalled for. She smacks Hearts upside the head. "I'm not saying a word," the man lies, shaking his head and rubbing at the spot with a sour look. "But I am taking the elevator."

"Good. I'm quicker than you, anyway." Before Hearts can turn away, Diamonds clamps a hand down on his shoulder and leans in close. "Do us all a favor," she says, "and think about my assistant, Marlowe. Plan to meet with him later today."

His face goes blank as he nods. "Di - Fuck it, fine," he says, apparently changing his mind halfway through, and then he charges back up the stairs toward the elevator like a shaggy blond rhinoceros.

With a nod, Diamonds whirls and starts racing down the stairwell in the opposite direction. They've been arguing too long and when Clubs intends to go somewhere, he can be a speedy little devil. With the mission-oriented mood he's in, he'll have headed straight for the garage.

Diamonds doesn't think about what it means that she just knows that, as though an entire chunk of her mind has dedicated itself to disdaining Clubs with such finely honed precision that she can guess his movements and potential fuckups before they even occur. It's nothing personal. She just has to keep Clubs from tarnishing the Crew's good name as much as possible. She's doing the world a service, honestly. Surely if it were Hearts who may or may not have been compromised, she would be just as certain in predicting his next move as she is now.

Surely.

She catches him at last two floors from the basement garage. The floors flash by, alternating stripes of black and green that only aggravate the indignation rousing itself in her head, a dizzying slow build of distrust and anger that she has to swallow down with great effort. Every time she passes a Felt or a Crew member on the stairs she has to slow her pace back into some semblance of dignity, hardening her expression and snorting whenever someone in green scoffs behind their hands.

The ones in black just avert their gazes. Though they might not be devoted to her as exclusively as her personal retinue is, no one in any of the Crew's other divisions would ever mock Diamonds to her face. They cannot disobey an ace member, cannot betray the Crew, cannot defect to another gang, cannot snitch to the cops.

Die's work, all of it. And when the boss man had first suggested the idea to Diamonds and Hearts in his ever congenial, terrifyingly charming mental voice, Diamonds had only taken it half-seriously. People snitched; that's just life, for criminals. It's just good business.

But she hadn't said no. And once it became clear that Die's methods, however unscrupulous, produced very reliable subordinates, she'd even embraced them. Where she went, Hearts had followed, nodding along with an unease in his demeanor that had faded in the years since, until Diamonds could barely recall it as a distant memory. Theirs had always been an uneasy truce until the turf war with the Felt tied them together. Hearts had never fully ceded his autonomy even after Diamonds began to take the lead in opposing Scratch's first attempts to claim the Crew's loyalties, but in this matter he had given Diamonds a slow nod and allowed her to make the call.

Neither of them had told Clubs. Sometimes with Clubs, it was just easier that way. Complicated concepts got away from him. But the condition for allowing Die's mindgrubs to program loyalty had been that, no matter how much Die probed into the minds of the swelling ranks of the Midnight Crew, he would never interfere with the aces.

Clubs didn't know a thing. Because Diamonds is so used to taking care of things for him, to handling the reports and the minor details and the little things like brainwashing one's entire mob to ensure their allegiance, and she didn't see the point of troubling him with it.

Clubs went to Die alone, and Yavari was synchronized long ago. It would be no trouble, surely, for Die to tweak the settings a little and ensure that Yavari wouldn't mention anything in her reports about something going wrong.

Damn, damn, and damn again.

Diamonds starts to lay it on thick in her mind, giving serious consideration to driving back out to the void zone that is the Egbert's neighborhood. It's risky - any moment now Scratch could notice her slipping in and out of his omniscience - but she can't afford him knowing what happens next.

Because if they're right about this - if Die has messed around in Clubs's mind - it means that the Midnight Crew can no longer trust Scratch. Perhaps Die has gone rogue and done it, but with his damned omniscience the boss should have noticed, unless Die has stumbled upon the same method of obscuring his tracks that Diamonds thinks she has.

And if he hasn't said anything, that means Doc Scratch intended to let it happen.

"Clubs!" She means to shout it, but it comes out a humiliating croak. Diamonds clears her throat, straightens her back, and tries again, this time pitching her voice so that it's...somewhat more agreeable. Maybe. "Clubs?"

"Yes?" the short troll calls back, still humming to himself as he hops down the last few steps to the landing. "Are you taking a car too, Diamonds?"

And fine. Fine. Fine! Maybe Hearts is right, and Diamonds has gotten used to - well, Clubs's annoying, idiotic, stupid pale infatuation.

The key phrase is used to it. Not that she liked it or anything. But Clubs normally would have said something even more stupid than that, something like, 'Did you decide to come with me, Diamonds?' and that -

She doesn't miss it. It just grates on her, to notice the obvious gap where the disgusting adoration used to be. It's just a sign that something's not right with Clubs. You can't just turn something like that off like the flick of a switch; she should still be able to see some sign that Clubs is making an effort to act differently, after years of making disturbing pale affection a habit. That's all.

"I'm simply curious to hear more about the Scratch kids." Diamonds catches up and falls into step beside the troll, slowing her steps deliberately to match the troll's rolling, clumsy gait. She tucks her hands behind her back, perversely aware that she's imitating the boss man's favorite posture as she studies the side of Clubs's face for some sign of - she doesn't know what. "Die's work fascinates me, after all. Tell me, did he show you anything else he was working on while you were there?"
Clubs shakes his head exuberantly, letting out a tiny 'hup!' as he trundles around to start down the final stairs to the third basement. "Oh, not really! I saw some of my people there, and that's it."

Shit, shit, shit. "The ones who required a review?" she asks sunnily, cursing Die for a fool in the questionable privacy of her mind. Could the troll not keep anyone in that facility under control?

Clubs claps his hands together and smiles back at her, but his words undo any reassurance that might have provided. "Oh, yes! I was surprised to see them, but then it was fine. Petran was pretty badly off, which is sad, but she'll be better soon!"

The troll skips last three steps, landing on the floor with a huff and traipsing off through the door into the low lighting of the third basement garage. Off to the left, huddled up by the wall, sits a row of sleek, nondescript black cars - nothing fancy, nothing that would stand out in a crowd. Diamonds has always preferred to put her money into her suits; she could care less about vehicles as long as they do what they need to do. Working air conditioning, darkly tinted windows, and a large enough trunk to store the body of an average-sized man are really her only stringent requirements.

And so, somehow, by a mysterious and incomprehensible series of events and chance circumstance, she had ended up letting Club's inane projects expand to include not just his own parking lot spaces, but three quarters of her own lot, too. At the time, it had just seemed like an easy way to get Clubs to stop whining about not having enough space in the second basement for the hovercraft with mechanical tentacle-arms. Now, Diamonds can practically sense Hearts rolling his eyes from behind whatever pillar or army tank he's concealed himself behind.

"You don't think it was strange that they were under review at Die's facility?" Diamonds asks. She feels tired, watching Clubs dart from car to car and dancing a jig as he taps the hood of one before racing to another, as though he can't decide which to choose. She doesn't know where he gets all that damn energy. "Not at all?"

"Well, that's where these things happen, Diamonds! Even I know that! Poor Petran got scrambled up in her noggin, so Die has to fix it up!" Clubs says, sounding almost affronted as he turns to pout at her. "Are you trying to quiz me for something? Why don't you just say so?"

He looks like Clubs. He acts like Clubs. But Clubs wouldn't have known that 'review' was just euphemism for Die needing to tinker with a sick or malfunctioning grubmod. Clubs wouldn't take such a revelation so calmly, not after years of ignorance.

Oh, yes. Diamonds will need to take Marlowe with her to visit the Egbert's house. Scratch can't know what happens here. If searching for Slick's Paramour takes her by sheer coincidence through the mass of void shielding in the Cascades, even if it leaves Diamonds lost and wandering in a daze in Canada after days of confusion, then it's just the price she'll have to pay. Scratch can't see this.

Her phone begins buzzing in her pocket immediately. The boss man noticed, then.

Too bad. There's still one last test she'll need to run, the one she'd hoped she wouldn't have to. But Hearts is waiting in the wings, and he won't move unless she does. They've always known that one of the Crew could be compromised at any moment. It's simply a hazard of fiddling with people's minds.

Without really thinking about it, Diamonds sinks to her knees and latches both hands on Clubs's shoulders, hard enough to bruise. He yelps and squirms, making a face at her. "Clubs," she says, voice steady, "You are a member of a sinister gang called the Midnight Crew."

"Diamonds?" Clubs raises his claws and scrabbles at her hands, looking increasingly distressed.
She ignores the plea, and the bloody scratches that start to open up along the back of her hands as Clubs struggles with more intent. She's always been stronger than Clubs, anyway. Instead, she shakes him a little until he meets her eyes again, his lower lip quivering as she presses on. "Your nefarious plots are serpentine in complexity. Your schemes, convoluted."

"Uh, I think you should probably stop -"

She doesn't. Obviously. "You are planning a heist in your underground hideout." Thank fuck they made it to the basement for this part. She has to clear her throat and force out the last part. "...What will you do?"

Clubs's hands fall to his sides. He blinks at her, his eyes at full luminescence in the dim light of the garage, his jaw going slack as his mouth moves soundlessly.

Slowly, a sluggish trickle of bronze blood slinks out from his left nostril, like a snake in the silt of a riverbed, to stain the tip of his teeth when he fails to close his mouth.

He doesn't answer.

"That's what I thought," Diamonds says softly.

Then she winds back and punches Clubs across the jaw. It's not enough to knock out a troll, of course, but it startles him so that she has time to delve into the inner pocket of her suit jacket and uncap the syringe there with a flick of her thumb. "Di-!" is all he has time to get out before she stabs the needle through the fabric of his suit into the flesh of his arm, and depresses the plunger. She always comes prepared to kidnap someone, after all.

"Diamonds, why?" Clubs says, even as he sags forward onto his knees. Even while she was kneeling, Diamonds still had a head on the troll; now, she steadies him by the elbow as he staggers, and he seems to crumple up, childish in his confused upset. "My head feels...kinda...fuzzy..."

"Don't worry, Clubs. I'll take care of everything. As usual," Diamonds sighs, wrapping an arm around Clubs's back as his head lolls forward. One of his horns knocks against her shoulder painfully, and she raises a hand to inspect the damage while his whimpers of distress muffle against her chest. The flesh has been lacerated in places, with little strips of surprising pink exposed on the underside of flaps of dark skin that are still attached to the bone, and there is some pain and difficulty in straightening the ring finger of her right hand - probably an extensor tendon gone, which'll need stitches and splinting before she can balance a cuestick properly in that hand. She tries the other hand, squeezing at Clubs's limp shoulder, but everything seems to be in painful working order.

How tiresome. She's had worse sparring with Hearts and jamming her knuckles against his craggy face, but she'll be damned if troll claws aren't too sharp for their own good, and the injury couldn't have happened at a worse time.

"Didn't fucking need me at all, didya," Hearts comments, slinking out from behind the nearest semi-truck tractor unit, the only thing wide enough to hide his bulk near them. He squats, brushing the concrete floor with the knuckles of one hand to balance himself, and thumbs up the brim of his hat to squint down at Clubs. "Jesus. They completely fucked him over, didn't they? He didn't mention Occam's or explosives at all."

"No, he didn't." Diamonds tugs the phone out of Clubs's inside pocket and snaps it neatly in two with her bare hands. Once the insides are exposed, she peels back the outer casing, locates the SIM card and the GPS tracker she placed there herself, and hands them over to Hearts. The man closes a fist and the two chips give a most satisfying crunch. "Now you."

"Oh, come on, Diamonds…"

She repeats the whole damn thing. "Hearts. You are a member of a sinister gang called the Midnight Crew. Your nefarious plots are serpentine in complexity. Your schemes, convoluted. You are planning a heist in your underground hideout. What will you do?"

"I don't even fuckin' know, Di, cut the heist plans loose with Occam's razor and roll boxcars?" Hearts shrugs with exasperation, clutching at the air uselessly with a fist. "There. I'm goddamn fine, I'm in the clear. Now what're we gonna do about this load of crap?"

A tiny drop of blood oozes out of his nose; he wipes it away impatiently, and there's not much of it, but it's there.

"You're not clear," Diamonds sniffs, thinking very, very hard as she hauls Clubs over her shoulder and straightens up. It's the shoulder with the fragile web of scabbing from having been diced up by a bloody pillow (dammit, Spades) but she can't be bothered to move him. She places a hand on his back between the shoulder blades to balance him. "They've got something in you. Doesn't look like it's very active though."

Hearts just looks appalled, a furious, ruddy flush suffusing his face as he splutters, "Wha- I woulda known! I ain't even been near that crackpot Die in - god, months -"

"Time doesn't mean much to the Felt, and you know it." When he cringes, prodding at the back of his own skull with a finger, Diamonds sighs. "I'm not, either."

Hearts remains squatting. He's very, very still, like a gargoyle crouched down in the middle of an echoing underground parking complex. "...What."

All cards on the table, then. "I tested myself back in Seattle. Something that girl Sharpshooter said…" Diamonds breaks off, shaking her head and adjusting her grip on Clubs. Remembering Seattle is officially so low on her list of priorities right now, it registers about as much as the light of the sun does from Pluto. "I can say it, but the nosebleed that ensued was unpleasant to deal with on short notice. We wouldn't even be able to have this conversation if either of us were as compromised as Clubs."

"But you knew, and you came back anyway -" Hearts cuts himself off. He grunts as he shoves himself up onto his feet, a distinct tremor of anger in his balled up fists. "Di, how much of Seattle was those heroes meddling, and how much was you deliberately ballsing everything up?"

"Shaddup, Hearts." Clubs shifts in his unconsciousness, and Diamonds takes a troll horn to the side of the head. Something flutters to the ground in her periphery, but she's busy tucking the remnants of his cell phone into her own pocket and recapping the syringe to notice. It wouldn't do to leave any evidence of a struggle, after all. If they're to pull this off without Scratch catching on, it has to look as though Clubs left to complete his assignment, and vanished along the way. "We can't give the game away. You know what the big man could pull if he knew we knew."

She sidles around Hearts and inspects the trefoil decal of the car Clubs had last been pattering around. When she flips up the metal, there is a tiny Decepticon symbol engraved on the hood.

Good lord. It's literally a Transformer.

Well, this is Clubs, she supposes. This kind of ridiculousness is par for the course. She reaches up, removes the keys from his lapel pocket, and unlocks the doors, settling herself in the - very tiny - drivers seat to survey the controls.

"What the hell are we gonna do?" Hearts is not-very-quietly losing his shit, scrambling to stoop over and grab something off the floor, looking downright panicked as he clutches it to his chest. For a man who rivals Diamonds in terms of height, he's doing an incredible impression of a terrified blond turtle. "Applesauce, Diamonds, there's some shitty worm in my head? There's probably one in yours? The boss probably already knows, we're completely goddamn corkscrewed here and you're just fiddlin' around with Clubs's newfangled robot car without your damn hat!"

Diamonds flicks another glance toward the crumpled up article of clothing clutched in Hearts's fist. Ah. So that's what had fallen off, earlier.

...What a shame. It had been a nice hat. But she's a little distracted, at the moment.

"Just keep thinking about Marlowe on occasion," she instructs. "You'll need to visit him - before or after you pick up the Scratch kids, though I'd advise you to go sooner rather than later." Diamonds turns the key in the ignition and waits for the autopilot menu to boot up on the GPS screen. She types in 'Washington, DC,' and then makes personal adjustments to the suggested route, dragging it so that the green line of the projected route zigzags from Georgia to Illinois to Florida before finally bouncing back up to Virginia.

There. That's exactly the kind of random, constantly sidetracking route Clubs would take to get anywhere. "I'm doing all I can to muddle up the boss man's sight right now, but I need you to get it together, Hearts," she finishes, rising up out of the drivers seat and slamming the door shut, hard enough to rattle the chassis. Automatically, the car's engine revs and the headlights flicker on. But then it idles until Diamonds grows impatient enough to rip the door back open and glower at the autopilot.

It's only then that she notices the tiny flashing alert, placed directly in the center of the steering wheel, no doubt at the same level Clubs's eyes would be if he were sitting down. 'Don't forget to buckle up!' it flashes in a cheerful bright orange.

...That's just...she doesn't know what to say to that. Utterly mute, Diamonds does up the seat belt in the drivers seat, and then slams the door of the car shut. Instantly the car peels backward out of the parking space, so fast Diamonds has to yank back her hand before the side mirror can clip it. Then veers off through the parking lot, the screech of the brakes echoing through the darkness at the far end of the garage before the rattling metal death trap pinwheels around to fly up the ramp to the floor above, headed for the exit.

Perhaps she should see about investing in a speed cap on Clubs's vehicles if they survive all this. Because who in their right mind knows Clubs well enough to jam the autopilot if he's not wearing a seatbelt, but then neglects to prevent him from zooming off at the goddamn speed of light? Someone careless on the engineering team, obviously. They'll need to be replaced with extreme prejudice.

Hearts, meanwhile, is not getting it together. "I'm not picking up those damn Scratches! I'm not doing shit for the boss or the Felt or any of 'em! I'm gonna -"

At the rate he's going, he'll make some definite life choice that Scratch can sense, like taking on the entirety of the Felt in some misbegotten shootout, and then where will they be? One hand shooting up to steady Clubs on her shoulder, Diamonds shoves Hearts up against the pillar, the tendons of his neck taut under her fingers. "Don't be ridiculous. You will do what you're goddamn told to do," she hisses, digging her fingernails into flesh. "Because that's the only sensible thing we can do. We don't have the resources to take on Scratch, and you know it. Not with these things in our heads."
Hearts wheezes instead of replying in the affirmative. Diamonds frowns, shaking him, because she at least expects an acknowledgement of some kind when she points out the obvious to Hearts, if not outright agreement. Sure, Hearts can get sullen and crabby, but he generally respects that Diamonds is the brains of the operation.

There's a faint blue tinge to his mouth before she realizes that perhaps she shouldn't be choking him out while waiting for a response. She rips her hand away, smoothing away a curl of disgust from the corner of her mouth while Hearts sags back, rubbing at the swelling bruises around his throat with blocky fingers, his eyes wary and resentful as he hacks and coughs air back into his lungs.

Please. She hadn't been grabbing him that hard -

Hearts opens his mouth, tries to speak - and then leans over to the side to retch. Diamonds steps back hastily, but nothing comes up before Hearts collects himself. All right, perhaps she might not have noticed her own strength…

"Fine. Fine," he rasps at last, wiping spittle away from his chin. Eurgh. "You gonna let me in on the plan, or am I flying blind, here?"

Diamonds sighs and reminds herself that just because the logical course of action is obvious to her doesn't mean that Hearts's brain has anywhere near caught up with her. "Lay low. Play along with Scratch's games as best we can." Diamonds ticks down the list in her mind. "Try not to stir up too much contention with any of the Felt or these Scratch children in particular; we don't know what Clubs might have done to set this off, but it's not too difficult to imagine it might have involved the kids." On that note, Diamonds starts toward her side of the garage, adding, "I can't tell you everything in case you're compromised further, but certainly my new priority is finding some way to reverse what's been done to Clubs. The Midnight Crew can't retaliate if one of their members is on the other side."

Hearts brightens up considerably. "But we are retaliatin'?" he says hopefully. "Just, y'know, so long as it's not never…"

"I'm working on it, you big lug." Diamonds chooses a car at random, the most nondescript of the nondescript, and sets Clubs down in the backseat. After careful consideration, she rolls him over onto his side and buckles the seatbelt at an odd angle around his waist.

After further consideration, she shrugs off her suit jacket and places it over the troll's lolling head. No one could possibly see him through the tinted windows - that's the point of them, after all - but one can never be too careful.

Hearts may or may not cough into his fist, a hacking noise that sounds more like 'diamonds' with a lowercase d than a bodily reaction to being nearly strangled. But Hearts is also ridiculous even at the best of times, and tagged with a brainwashing mindgrub modifier, and thus can be ignored at Diamonds's leisure. "Handle matters in Seattle as you would normally," she instructs. "Let the Scratch kids do whatever it is they need to for this field test. And - here, hand me your phone."

"...You're not gonna smash it, are you?" Hearts says, sounding more resigned than questioning as he rubs his neck one last time and digs through his pockets hastily, emerging with clumps of lint, wax lips, and finally his much battered and cracked cell phone. He eyeballs her warily, and then slowly shuffles close enough to hand off the phone, yanking his hand back as though in fear of getting smacked.

Diamonds sighs again without answering. Finding the clock app is hard with how mangled Hearts has managed to make the interface, with almost every single icon on its own separate screen, but eventually Diamonds finds it and sets up an alarm to repeat itself nightly. She labels it, 'CONSIDER VISITING 21605 FIR DRIVE.'

"Think about this nightly," she advises him, handing the cell phone back. Hearts scratches the back of his head as he squints his eyes and holds the phone barely an inch from his eyes to read it. Balls, does the man need glasses. "Maybe even visit the neighborhood, though I'd recommend you not go too near the house itself. The void aura in the vicinity of that address will keep Scratch from being able to predict much of your movements, but I don't know for certain how effective it is when you don't follow through."

"That is the weirdest damn thing I've ever heard. I'll take yer word for it, Di." Hearts closes his fist over his phone and hesitates before putting it away. "Di. Look. ...You gonna be alright?"

It shouldn't irritate her as much as it does. Diamonds finds herself eyeing the ring of blackening bruises around Hearts's neck, and doesn't realize how obvious she's being about it before Hearts backs out of range of hand and cue stick, tugging at his unbuttoned collar with a finger in an obvious sweat. "It's just, you're the one always banging on about being a fucking professional," he gabbles, the sweat breaking out across his balding forehead glistening in the dim lights when he adjusts his hat in another nervous twitch. "But you gotta goddamn temper, Di, and you've been shoving me around. You're not even paying attention to the hat thing anymore!"

Hearts raises his fist, brandishing Diamonds's hat in his hand. At some point, he managed to completely crumple it in his grip, so that the original shape is deformed beyond recognition.

On some level that irks Diamonds, but more pressing matters are currently occupying her rage circuits. Her lack of reaction just seems to make Hearts more nervous. "Clubs ain't gonna be able to calm your shit if you hafta keep him unconscious. How long until you lose it?" he argues, looking back and forth from her to the hat, and finally stuffing the article of clothing into the inside pocket of his jacket, where it forms an unseemly lump on his side more obvious than an ill-fitted gun holster.

Honestly, sometimes she wonders why she bothered partnering up with these two. "Clubs has never been anything more than a source of existential despair and irritation to me," Diamonds says acerbically, whirling to slam the car door shut on their view of Clubs's unconscious body. "And now he's even more of a dead weight than he's ever been before. Incredible, really." She snorts, and opens the drivers' side door to swing a foot in. "Worry about your damn self, Hearts; once you're out in Seattle, I'm not gonna be around to whip you into shape. One slip, and word could get back to Die or the boss that we know."

"Yeah, yeah. I got it. No drama with those backstabbing Felt, just wait for you to set things up and fix Clubs's noggin." Hearts shakes his head, clapping a hand on the roof of Diamonds's vehicle and resting an elbow on the top of the car door itself. It keeps her from slamming it shut on him - at least, without exerting a lot of needless effort - and she mentally gives him ten seconds before she breaks out the cue stick. "The hat thing is still fucking terrifyin', y'know. You always get pissy about dropping yer hat."

"Yes, well." Diamonds lets the cue stick specibus slip into the palm of her hand, and Hearts yanks away from the car with both hands raised.

At least he seems intimidated enough by the odd mood that has seized her that he's being tolerably deferential, for once. Maybe this time he won't draw attention to himself with a massive fucking explosion in the middle of downtown Seattle like he did last time those kid heroes pissed him off. There's only so much Heir's going to be willing to let himself be blackmailed into ignoring, and the terror threat level is already too high in Seattle as it is.
But no, that would be asking one miracle too many. Diamonds is too sensible to believe Hearts can manage anything, even an attempt at schmoozing to keep secrets from the boss man, without causing untold destruction. So she starts the car without smacking him. "You worry about your own hat, Hearts. I'll leave a contingency plan in place with Marlowe, in case I'm the one whose grub gets triggered next. You'll need to take over from me if that happens." She pauses, and looks up at the man. "Don't muck around. Watch out for yourself."

Hearts is aghast. "Now you're worryin' about me," he accuses, horrified, as he makes the sign of the cross over his chest. "None of that! None of it! Diamonds, you're sick in the head -"

Diamonds rolls her eyes and pulls the door shut on Hearts's babbling. His jabber becomes an inaudible drone through the mostly soundproofed car door, and Diamonds pulls out of the parking space in a smooth curve while he's still nervously crossing himself. She considers her options for a moment, then stops the car, rolls down the tinted window, and flips Hearts a single middle finger.

His mouth snaps shut. And on that note, Diamonds follows the same route Clubs's unmanned vehicle took to leave the garage, keeping her eyes fixed on the road.

In her mind's eye, Diamonds Droog retracts the words of a note written in incredibly classy handwriting, one that she received back in Kazakhstan but never took seriously until a few days ago. She destroyed the original, of course, because it would be downright idiotic to have kept such damning evidence around, but she remembers the words clear as day.

He will know when you intend to betray him unless you take the proper precautions. When the time comes, the man who lives above says that only Void will be able to shield you.

I know Spades misses your old group of dastardly chums, whether he admits it or not!

...That Meddling Prospitian knew all along.

So yes, by sheer coincidence, Diamonds finds that she will be tracking down MP for Scratch. Diamonds is, in fact, more interested in kidnapping that woman than ever before. This is an incontrovertible fact, which may be stated for the record.

She'll just be taking Clubs along for the ride, something which must remain in a completely different jurisdiction from said record.

...Diamonds can handle that. She has to be able to handle that.

She takes out her phone to assure the boss of this, a faint smile creeping across her face as she observes the flurry of white-text messages that have begun to clog the inbox.

It's just good business.

Toronto, Canada

By the time they catch up to Vriska, she's already torn through three Tim Hortons, demolished the statue of Queen Victoria and the memorial to the 48th Highlanders Regiment, and committed unspeakable acts to a local pigeon.

Well, he says 'they,' but who even knows where Aradia's gone. When she's present, she's too much, a presence that roots him too solidly to the earth of a world that's a few weeks from blowing the fuck up. But then she'll slip out of sight and be gone, and he misses her like a dangling ~ATH pointer misses a deallocated object.

He doesn't want to be her moirail. He doesn't want anything to do with the way she makes him feel, all edgy and too close and sick, caught up in her crazy. But when she's gone, he gets so anxious that no amount of Ambien can shut him down. It's a toxic diamond, the kind of inverted moirallegiance Shakespeare likes killing off in the fifth act for cheap tragedy. Shitty soap operas run through this shit like crack cocaine as a way to amp up the cheapass melodrama, and he always rolled his eyes at those stupid fucking reruns but now that Sollux is the one entangled with a wonky fucking excuse for a pale rhombus, he can't see a way out.

And now, on top of Aradia being a flighty death fairy who heralds the apocalypse on a regular basis, he has to deal with these two bitches. He's had to change phase the hard way multiple times since Kanaya called in this particular favor, and it's all their fault. The next time Kanaya tries to dump a load of grubshit in the form of fucking psychotic anti-heroes on him, he's telling her exactly where she can stick it.

Of course, this being Canada, the man behind the counter at the last Tim Hortons Sollux visits is more worried about Vriska than the fact that she just pulled a one-troll rager on his store. "Is she upset about something?" he asks after he points Sollux toward the massive fucking hole blown in the wall. Like Sollux seriously needed help seeing it. "Seemed a bit distraught, you know."

"The' th being a little bitch, that' th all," Sollux mutters.

"You don't think that's a little harsh?"

"No."

The man hesitates, and then leans forward a little to whisper, "Are you upset about something?"

Sollux has lived in Canada his entire life. You'd think he'd be used to this by now, but no. "There's a rampaging thpider-obthessed shithead on the loose, and you're athking me if I'm upthet?"

"It's not the end of the world, really! I'm sure everyone in this neighborhood is covered in the event of a villainous breakdown - part of the health insurance package, these days - and the wall can always be fixed -"

"It is the end of the world! It literally is, tho do not even fuck with me right now!" Sollux snaps his fingers before the man can say anything. "No. Fucking zip it, aththhole. I'm going to fly out that hole in your wall, and you're going to jutht shut up for the retht of the day. One more word, one, and I will know."

The man has the gall to pantomime zipping his lips and tossing a key over his shoulder, looking concerned and bemused at the same time. Patronizing dick. Sollux floats out the busted wall in a crackle of sparks, and scowls at the smoke rising up from a building down the street. Between him and Vriska's latest target, an entire four way intersection has been taken out by a fallen set of street lights, and traffic is being politely rerouted away from the twisted metal and churned up rock by the cops. Canada is good at taking shit like this in stride, and it's maddening.

See, as it turn out, Vriska isn't a complete fucking technologically-inept moron. Terezi's been working her way through every single detective adventure game Sollux can get the grubmods for at the speed of light, but Vriska'd fooled him into underestimating her by acting like a sulky wriggler 24/7. He's had his psionics full keeping her and Terezi off each other, and in between the screaming fits and occasional partial nudity and Aradia being no fucking help at all, Vriska had the goddamn shame globes to secretly hack together a working ray gun.
Sollux should have known, should have fucking noticed when wires and shit start going missing, but he's also pretty sure he didn't even own half the materials she'd need to piece together a laser/blasting hybrid pistolkind in the apartment, so he refuses to take the fall for this one. Maybe if his head didn't hurt from hearing soon-to-be dead people all the time, he wouldn't have passed out in front of his latest attempt to track down the white-text asshole and woken up to Terezi shrieking in fury from the ablutions block, the door of which had been welded shut from the outside.

Anyway. Note to self: Vriska's villain game is on point today. Even if her actions thus far have been restricted to demanding people empty their cash registers and provide her with extra-large iced lattes and espresso shots, she's also doing a really fucking good job of making a spectacle of herself by blowing shit up, and that's the kind of publicity that she and Terezi don't need.

She's knocking up a fourth coffee shop when he buzzes in on the descent, the Dark Horse Espresso Bar on Queen West. She's slashed through the hanging overhead lights, dumped creamer and sugar packets from the side table all over the floor, and driven most of the patrons and their laptops into the back corner. One poor asshole is cowering behind the coatrack by the front window, surrounding by shattered glass.

This is bad. She's switched from Tim Hortons to the hipster shitholes. Sollux can't tell if this is supposed to be an upgrade or a dramatic, hundred-foot existential nosedive into the heretofore untapped depths of even lower standards.

She's also wearing his pants. He knows this because she's leaning over the counter with her ass jutting out, acting for all the world like she's capable of pulling off seductive when she's wearing grubsauce-stained skinny jeans.

And the thing is, she can.

Jesus FUCK, is that irritating.

She's on her seventh espresso shot when she finally glances at him, her eyes hooded but glitteringly manic as she slams the cup down against the counter eight times. She does that, the eight thing, and Sollux knows a compulsive habit when one insists on him removing one of the hooks holding up the shower curtain because 'Nine? Talk about uncool! Soooooooo lame!'

"You caught up! It's about time, Sssssollux," Vriska says, hissing because she thinks mocking Sollux's lisp will bother him enough that he'll kick her out. She wraps jittery claws around another cup of coffee, and he does not want to know how many multiples of eight she's gone through by now. He's been on caffeine benders before, and it's never a pretty sight. "Wow, Terezi's not with you? Mark me down as surprised!" She salutes him with the coffee and chugs it before he can stop her. The makeshift ray gun belted at her side shifts with the slide of her hips as she turns to sit on the counter.

"Yeah, becauthue you fucked up the bathroom door, you piethe of thhit!" He probably could have torn the door off and let TZ out, but then she'd have come tearing after Vriska herself. At least this way one of these fools is on fucking lockdown. "What part of 'low profile' did you mithth out on?"

She smacks her lips as she pulls the cup away, then purses them as though pretending to consider the question. "Boooowooooring!" she announces at last, drawing the gun from her side and tapping it against her forehead eight times before leveling it at him. "I can't sit on my ass all day in a dive like that! I'd rather do something!"

Her mutant eye has a bead on Sollux, the sun tattoo crinkled up as she grins. But he's also pretty sure that in a contest between a dodgy ray gun and high level psionics, psionics win. Not even a fucking question. He's dragging Vriska back home one way or another; the only real question is, how many pictures are going to be reposted all over the internet before he can shut this down and wipe the electronic evidence.

Sollux's thinking that, and opening his mouth to sigh and try to use logic on Vriska one last time - a stupid idea at the best of times - when she shoots him.

The ambient crackle of psionics braces him, so at least the concussive force of whatever the hell she's firing doesn't liquefy his organs. But it flings him backward out of the cafe anyway, and he crashes into a display of flower bouquets and cartons of oranges sitting outside the fruit market across the street.

"I'd rather fight you!" Vriska shouts delightedly over the sounds of a fruit avalanche settling. Sollux groans and grinds the heel of his palm into his forehead, and gets a whiff of pure, unadulterated, freshly juiced oranges just as the impression of dozens of crushed citrus corpses start to bruise his back. He's going to reek of oranges for weeks.

Having processed this shitty revelation, Sollux raises his head to glare at Vriska. And possibly to fry her ass. His back aches as he raises an arm writhing with red and blue psionic discharge to retaliate.

Vriska races forward, leaping over the jagged edges of the broken front window with both legs tucked up under her, like a fucking wriggler jumping rope. More tellingly, the manic grin on her face has transitioned into something resembling transcendent glee when she sees him, a brightness in her eyes as just the tip of a chipped fang peeks out over her lower lip. She tries to school it into her usual smirk of cool arrogance, but she doesn't fire again or try to dodge.

She's waiting for him to respond. Because this is Vriska, and she wants a fucking fight. She wants to be entertained, and Vriska probably gets off on this kind of bullshit. Jesus fuck, that's what set her and Terezi off on their dumbass rampage in the first place.

Well, she wants to fucking go?

No, fuck this. He did not wake up this morning to deal with this. Sollux drops his hand and grunts, levitating so he can stand upright without all the useless bullcrap of sitting up with a back full of bruises, and singes the shredded flower petals all over his body with a lightly applied jolt of electricity. He's never hurt himself with his own psionics; it just kind of tickles.

Then he deliberately turns his back on Vriska and starts walking away.

Because you know what? Sometimes, you just gotta look inside yourself and say, what am I willing to put up with today?

Not. Fucking. This.

"Sollux?" Vriska's put out. She stomps after him, and he suspects she's doing it on purpose so that he can hear every footstep. Does she try to piss everyone off like this? "Hey! Athhhhhhole! Don't you walk away from me!" That last part ends on a tiny shriek and a clatter of glass, and he thinks she might have slipped on broken window in her haste to follow him.

He looks back at her, grimacing, but she's already righted herself and is desperately attempting to look cool, striking an obnoxious pose when she catches his eye. Her posturing is fucking blatant. "No. Fuck you. I'm going to go home and thhower, because I'm covered in dead orange jizz and that'th where I draw the goddamn line."
Vriska splutters. When he shrugs and rolls his eyes, adjusting his glasses on his nose, she raises her ray gun and blasts the nearest stop sign - possibly because it's a convenient target, but more likely because it fits the eight theme.

Fucking spiderbitches and their fucking tantrums. Sollux isn't going to fucking indulge her attention-seeking shithive antics anymore. He shrugs and shakes his head. "Whatever. Thee you at home, if you feel like calming your bulge and acting fucking thivilized."

She stamps her foot. "What kind of a hero even are you?!"

Sollux raises a single eyebrow. "A shitty one. Obviouthly."

"This is pretty fucking weaksauce, Sollux! Do you hear me?! WEAK. SAUCE!" Another blast fires at him, but this time Sollux is prepared, wrapping himself in psionics to hold him in place until the concussive force expends itself trying to shove him backward. Vriska throws her hands out to the sides, beseeching, vaguely desperate as she raises her eyebrows and invites him to hit back. From this distance, her tattoo looks like a permanent black eye.

He floats into the air and starts drifting up and away.

He hears the crunch of metal clattering against the road, and he thinks she's thrown the ray gun down. "You have to stop me! Are you seriously going to just leave me here? I'll blow your fucking city to hell and back! Don't you float away, Sollux!"

He gives her a middle claw, one courtesy of each hand, and then he jets out of there like a fucking Lockheed Blackbird.

"LAAAAAAAAAME!" Vriska shrieks at his back. The last time he looks back, she kicks the ray gun against the wall in a fit of sullen rage and stomps off down the road with her hands in the pockets of his pants. Probably off in search of another coffee shop to continue with the eights.

Fine. He hopes she gets fucking arrested. Even if it means he needs to pay to bail her ass out, because Kanaya would be pissed if he left half of her greycrush to rot in jail or get deported, it will be worth it.

When he gets home, he only remembers Terezi's welded into the ablutions block when he's already ripped the door off the hinges. His apartment has transformed over the course of the past few days from a den of computer hacking iniquity to a certifiable disaster zone, so what's another ruined door, honestly. His head aches, he has the weirdest urge to bifurcate his mind and put half of it to sleep so he can dream, and he smells like a rotting orange orchard.

He stares. Terezi stares back. She's got one foot through the tiny half of the horizontal window that slides open a few inches from the ceiling, a death grip on the ominously-bent shower head, and another foot on the soap shelf. She's basically doing the splits.

...Legislacerators.

"This is exactly what it looks like," Terezi says.

"Oh, no," Sollux says, rolling his eyes. He shuffles in, tugging at the back of his shirt and ignoring the mirror, which cracked into five pieces after the second time Terezi threw Vriska up against it in the middle of the night, and then into eight after Vriska got the brilliant idea to carefully snap more shards for the sake of her goddamn neuroses. "Ugh. VK'll be back. Later."

Terezi's nostrils flare. Probably trying to sniff out a lie. Sollux has no fucking idea what a lie smells like, but he thinks it's the scent of his fresh orange garnish that makes her wrinkle up her nose and stick out her tongue in a silent 'bleh.' "Where is she?" she demands, grunting and bouncing on her toes as she attempts to retract the foot that's halfway out the window. "What happened?"

"Probably in another fucking Tim Hortons by now, giving herthelf caffeine poitioning. Jutht leave her alone, TZ."

Terezi somehow manages to hop down nimbly without completely tenta-bagging herself, cackling as she executes the maneuver, but the expression on her blank-eyed face still has the edge of burgeoning irritation that could easily flare up into caliginous mutiny at any moment when she lands in the shower in a crouch. That's the problem, really - everything Vriska does infuriates the tealblood. She's worse than Sollux with improperly looped mortumatrices in an ~ATH workaround; she just can't let it go. "You're letting her run around without supervision?" she asks accusingly, clapping her hands to her cheeks. "When the jury hasn't even reached the verdict?!

"Yeah, well, we're trying thomething new, thince nothing else hath worked to get her to act like a rational excuthe for a troll," Sollux says, rolling his shoulders with a slight crack. "Now pithth off and thtay in the apartment while I shower."

Terezi wavers, and he can see her thinking it over. Her eyes, even when they're not hidden behind red lenses, don't give much of a hint to the inner workings of her crackpot Legislacerator brain.

(They do things to the law enforcement down in America, Sollux figures. Mess with their heads so that all they can think about is the law. He's a minor conspiracy theory buff, and he's pretty sure Canada's unshaven neckbeard is essentially a cesspool of carapacian cover-ups and secret lowblood hemotype cullings, courtesy of the Condesce. Or possibly her Heiress. The forums tend to vacillate between hailing Feferi Peixes as the next great tyrian empress, destined to break Her Imperious Condescension's cult of personality, and claiming she's a villain masquerading as a hero with plans to unleash untold horrors on the world that would make the Condesce look tame.

The point is, the idea that Legislacerators are weaned on mind-altering drugs and legalese textbooks isn't all that far-fetched in comparison.)

If it were Vriska, he wouldn't trust her alone in the apartment without Aradia around to keep watch. But Vriska is Vriska and she still doesn't seem to have processed the fact that the shitstorm down in Chicago had serious consequences. Terezi is irritating as well, but in entirely different ways, and Sollux has learned that as long as Vriska's not in sight, her self-control vastly improves to the point where she's not necessarily a danger to herself or others. At least she thinks about things before she does them - unlike Vriska, who has no fucking filter, Terezi likes following the letter of the law.

Her law, though, not necessarily anyone else's.

"The prosecution will refrain from cross-examining the witness until he has returned to his usual appleberry blast aroma," Terezi announces, and Sollux groans because oh fuck, the lawyer roleplaying shit is back. It's the most irritating thing about Terezi, hands down, because she's definitely rebounding from having fucked up her shot at being a full-blown Lacerator. FLARPing is bullshit unless you're, like, thirteen years old and stupid or forty and desperate, but Terezi seems to have missed that memo. "Otherwise the testimony may be compromised and rendered inadmissible in a court of law."

"Thure. Thwell. Thankth. Now get outta my shower." Sollux reaches out with a claw and sparks the wheel of the shower until it twists, dousing Terezi with a sudden blast of Ontario's finest ice water. She yelps, scrambling to catch herself on the towel rack, and drags herself out of the shower with her hair sopping wet.
But she's a coldblood. Ice cold for Sollux is her lukewarm; when she shakes her head vigorously, splattering the walls and mirror and Sollux with spray, it's with a smirk rather than a glower. "A brief recess!" she counters, laughing at his face when he grimaces. "And I demand that we order something other than Chinese!"

"I have exactly two fucks left to give today, and neither of them have been allocated to what we eat," Sollux grumps, stripping off his shirt. Terezi still here, but she's claimed to have gotten a whiff of him naked already anyway (because Terezi is the creepyass one, not Vriska, surprisingly), and again, neither of those fucks are given about anything to do with his two houseguests.

True to form, Terezi notes the movement immediately, a shit-eating grin spreading across her face as she pretends to leer at him. "Oh ho! Res ipsa loquitur - what a bod!"

"I don't even want to know what you think you're thmelling." Sollux flicks a towel at her, but she dodges with unnerving ease, all of her pointy teeth bared as she darts out of the bathroom. "Go heat up leftoverth or thomething."

Not without one final closing statement. "So many citrusy bruises! Let me smell that rebuttal!"

"Out." He picks up the door with the awesome power of his mind and wedges it into place between him and Terezi.

He swears. Sometimes it's like both of them are actively trying to goad him. He'd rather saw both his bulges off with a nail file than put up with this much longer. All he wants is for his contact in the Territories to report back to him so he can get these two assholes out of his life and focus on shit that really matters.

Aradia is still missing several hours later, when Vriska comes slinking back in like a final nesting parenthesis that fucked off and shit all over the algorithm. It's dark outside when the door creaks open, and Sollux is so deep in shoveling through another of the white-text guy's impossible loops that he barely spares her a nod when the ceruleanblood peeks her head in. He thinks he's caught on to the secret of this asshole's programming, and to be fair, it's something that should have melted any grub processor that tried to run it. This guy's dividing by zero and using Earth's deathdate as the source of his loops all over the friggin' place, a deliberate clusterfuck crafted with such delicate skill and precision that Sollux thinks he's dealing with a goddamn ~ATH savant. It should be impossible to kludge together solutions in such a nit-picky language like ~ATH, but this guy does it with finesse.

This guy is smart. Sollux, of course, is smarter. He's starting to catch on to the quirky, buggy breaks in the code, the shadowy, uncertain voids where white-text's bullshit gets uncertain and iffy. He thinks he's covered all his bases? He fucking well hasn't. Sollux estimates that he might have this guy's shit cracked in a matter of weeks. Longer than he'd like, but there are extenuating circumstances.

One of whom just walked in the door, smelling vaguely singed, and is now just standing in the open doorway like a useless lump. Sollux finally looks up and sees that Vriska is in a state of disarray. Her hair is raked back, but he can see the blue dye at the ends where she apparently found the time and motivation to threaten some poor hair stylist out there into dying it ombre. One of her sleeves has been ripped off - thankfully not the one with the really fucking noticeable spider web tat - but he knows track marks and he can't spy any, so at least she wasn't off getting fucked up on anything harder than caffeine.

She's also no longer wearing his pants. He has no idea whose pants those are. He doesn't even want to know where his pants ended up.
Seriously. Did she just flip through a rebellious pupa manual and pick whatever looked most cliché?

"...Heyyyyyyyy," she says hesitantly, looking around with shifty eyes as she skulks into the apartment, jamming the door shut behind her and sidestepping a silicomb mainframe. She's got the twitchy look of someone still coming down off a caffeine binge, one thumb tapping out sequences of eight against her thigh with obsessive rapidity. "Uh. So. M'back!" She claps her hands together and saunters in, eyes darting back and forth as though she can’t tell where to focus next.

"Cool thory, VK," he says, turning back to his main husktop. "The chicken nugth are on the stove. Spithy ketchup'th back in the fridge if you want it. Now thhut up, it'th quiet hacking time."

"Did either of you even miss me?!" Vriska demands.

"Like tooth decay," Sollux mutters. He can already feel a Vriska migraine coming on, just when he'd thought the spicy ketchup Terezi insisted on slurping down in huge quantities had cleared his sinuses right out.

"I could have been robbing a bank or shooting up in city hall! How dare you ignore me!" Vriska pouts, flinging her hair back out of her face with a dramatic flip.

That's the thing with Vriska. She's always got to be the center of attention. She has to be important.

She's really not. Sollux gives her another absent-minded middle claw, just as Terezi stalks out of the kitchen like a bloodhound on the scent. "So! The guilty party returns!" the teablue declares, weaving through discarded gamegrubs and mods scattered across the floor. "Was that already a confession I heard? What's all this about grand larceny, Serket?"

Vriska sneers, folding her arms over her chest. "Wouldn't you like to know, Tereeeeeezi. You should have come after me if you cared so much!"

"Don't anthswer that," Sollux interrupts before Terezi can reply.

Terezi opens her mouth.

"Don't you even fucking dare. Talk about anything elthe if you want, but do not fucking enable her."

Now they're both pouting, Vriska with disappointment at having her center of attention gambit imploded, and Terezi at a missed opportunity to engage in yet another courtroom reenactment. Then the two of them exchange glances, sour and challenging, and Sollux heaves a sigh, gearing himself for another psionic intervention if they can't keep their claws off each other. If they want to fight again, they can take it to the goddamn roof top and stop bifuckating all his sensitive equipment with their attempted hate-sexscapades.

Terezi shrugs, but instead of lunging, she steps to the side so that Vriska has a clear path to the kitchen. "Also, I ate the last of the ketchup," she says, licking her lips for emphasis. "It was delicious!"

Vriska snorts, and tosses her hair again, striding past Terezi and into the tiny kitchen. "That's gross, Pyrope. Talk about nasty!" she yells, banging the sheet pan full of dinosaur chicken nuggets against the stove as she transfers them all onto a not-filthy plate.

"You just envy my discerning sense of taste!" With that, Terezi jams herself up onto one of the gaming seats next to Sollux and started up the ancient husktop that hosts all the troll Nancy Drew games a law fanatic could ever fap to. It also has an ongoing Zoo Tycoon run-through in which a single gazelle is standing trial for murder before a jury of its peers and an elephant playing stand in for His Honorable Tyranny, but she bypasses both in favor of grabbing a gaming grub at random and feeding it into the slot.

At least they're not trying to strangle each other again. He can ignore the annoying banter more easily than he can the tantrums that crush mainframes and slice through power cords. Sollux turns back to the streams of white coding on the center screens and cracks his knuckles to start in on another round of bifurcated code to crack how the white-text douche fucked over Pesterchum to reach RS.

"I can't belieeeeeeve you would just leave me alone like that, Sollux!" Vriska hunkers down on the floor somewhere behind Sollux, fiddling with the television and banging on it with mounting frustration until Sollux hits the right button with psionics to make her stop breaking his shit. "Thanks. But seriously! Talk about rude, I mean - what if I got lost or something!"

"You wouldn't get fucking lotht for long." No, he'd given hope of that ever happening days ago.
"Thith ith fucking Canada. Jutht go to anyone on the threet and they'd probably offer to pay your cab fare to get you back here. Or jutht drive you over themthelves..."

"But you ignored me! I thought Aradia said you were Gemini - what kind of hotshot hero just leaves an unstable person like me alone like that!" Vriska hits the back of Sollux's chair with her horns when she leans back. She does it eight times, which means he gets jolted eight times. Fucking asshole. "Maybe next time I won't be so nice, and I'll hurt someone!"

"As if the prosecution would stand by while you committed more criminal acts," Terezi shoots back, licking the computer screen with a teal-grey tongue and leaving a trail of slobber all down the front of Phoenix Wright's snappy red tie.

"Firht of all, that name ith fucking shit. I don't have a thtupid name like you two dickth," Sollux says, because it's the truth. Aradia came up with that stupid nickname, not him, and he'll deny it to his dying day. "And thecond, I could kick the shit out of you, VK, remember? Don't even tempt me."

"I got you today! I totally did! Everyone saw it!" Vriska insists, imperious and proud. "I think it would be closer than you think in a real fight!"

Sollux pinches the bridge of his nose, and contemplates drowning himself in the recooperacoon. One of these days it has to work, right? "Oh. My god. Like anyone actually even giveth a shit. They jutht wanted you to thtop blowing up wallth like a fucking villainouth loon." He fucks up and mangles a DIS* patch in the code, and nearly tosses that particular computer through the wall. "Not everything'th a fucking piththing contest."

"I know that! Obviously, duh!" Vriska slumps further down against the back of Sollux's chair, sullenly popping chicken nuggets into her mouth. "Whatever. I'm just the stupid crazy one, right? What do I know?"

"You're not stupid, Vriska. Sometimes you're one of the most clever people I know!" Terezi leans over her husktop, nose almost pressed to the screen, but Sollux keeps an eye on her anyway, because he has no idea where this conversation is going and it could erupt into a free-for-all at any moment. "You just have no moral compass, and that makes you one of the most dangerous people I know, too!"

"And you love it!" Vriska fires back. "How else would we keep this rivalry interesting?! Especially now that you don't want to bring the Scourge Sisters to this dumb, boring place."

"We can't do that again, Vriska." Terezi shoves the husktop off her lap and whirls, claws clenched.
Sollux stands up from his seat and slams her back down into the gaming chair with red lightning. That dazes her for a second, but she's still talking over the buzz of psionics. "I wanted - if I thought we could control it, maybe, if we didn't get so caught up in ourselves that we could keep from breaking the law, but - we were all over the place! I couldn't control myself, and I couldn't control you." There's silence as Terezi lowers her head, shaking it, and then, "You need a moirail for that, I think. You really, really do. But I can't be one for you. I hate you too damn much." By the end, the anger in her voice is a low simmer, but she's also gone quiet.

"Yeah, well. Like I'd want your fucking pity, anyway," Vriska stutters, jaw clenching. The plate is cracked down the middle in her jittery claws, so that's another one for the trash, but she hasn't thrown it yet. "I'm too badass to be pathetic. So that one's out the window!" She forces an ugly laugh for eight breaths, and then goes silent, darting a narrow-eyed look in Sollux's direction as though expecting him to give a fuck.

Well. He hadn't intend to. But Jesus FUCK, these two are irritating enough that he's actually going to have to get their shit together for them -

Oh no.

They irritate him. Constantly. Terezi's been prodding at his bruises all evening long, and now her horn is jabbing into his side while she hauls ass through Ace Attorney. Vriska's sighing profusely but complaining about not understanding a word on Sollux's husktop screens rather than jibing at Terezi to provoke a reaction. He hasn't had to separate the two of them in ages. Terezi's head cocked in his direction like a curious lizard, hesitation written into every line of her angular body as the two coldbloods eye him sideways.

...Oh, shit.

This isn't a feelings jam.

This is an irritation slam.

Terezi's airing of grievances has been so persistently disguised in lawyerese all afternoon long, he hadn't even really noticed when Vriska started vexairing too. But they're not trying to needle each other, not outright. They may not be able to help hating each other so desperately, but they can complain in front of him, to him, and expect him to play umpire.

And he's been doing it.

“You are both,” he says through gritted teeth, “tho annoying.”

Kanaya is going to fucking murder him.

Sollux only intends to put half his brain to sleep, but that hasn't been working as well as it used to lately. He has fucked up dreams. Or maybe just dreams that he's not allowed to remember. Whichever it is, a lot of the time, sleep is an all or nothing shtick - no amount of bifurcating his thought processes will keep part of his mind awake so he can code late into the night. Just another reason why his productivity has slowed to a fucking crawl, naturally.

He thinks he remembers a slurred dream that makes his head ache, but the fleeting memory vanishes when a heavily curled horn smacks against his chest with a painful thump. "Aradia, get off," he hisses, shoving at the other horn jabbing up against his chin. "Not now, I'm trying to work."

"You were asleep, Sollux," she says, her voice low but laughing. "Auspicism is tiring, I see."

"How do you even know about that thhit?" Sollux stares up at the ceiling, massaging the tiny indents in his nose where his glasses dug in. "Where've you been all day, even?"

"Things have been accelerating. There's so much to do, and so little time, even for me..." She trails off, and a wandering claw traces a line down the side of Sollux's neck. It makes him settle back, but he's also sick at the touch of it. Ghosts have followed on Aradia's heels, as usual, and he can hear them, the broken screams and abrupt terror before they cut off. They fill the apartment like a cool fog, and for a moment Aradia's body feels ice cold instead of rustblood hot. The impression passes, but Sollux shivers anyway.

"Neither Eridan nor Feferi are doing well at all," she continues, and Sollux sets his head back down, reluctant but lured into the dim calm of a feelings jam all the same. "The Horrorterrors were always going to be an unknown factor in how things play out, but there were consequences to how we scratched the sessions. One was enough to sabotage everything. Now there are three of them with an unnatural focus on our game, and it might be three too many..."

"Thhit. I thought you said that Eridan dumbathth was getting his thhit together." Sollux draws his phone out of his pocket and thumbs his way to the LA news. Generally, when Aradia has shitty news, it means something else has blown up spectacularly.

"It won't make the news. He's maintaining a dome of his own now, under his own power." Aradia shifts, sighing with deep discontent. Sollux pats her elbow, and she takes it as permission to bury her face in his chest. "The Prince is awake. That never ends well. And I fear Feferi has lost her way."

"The Heirethth who's actually our friend who's altho Nymph or whatever the hell she's calling herself these dayth?" Sollux rolls his eyes. "What, is she actually a villain mathquerading as a hero with planth to unleash untold horrorth on the world?"

"Possibly."

"...I fucking knew it."

"We have the four of us safe, here," Aradia continues, slow and steady, her claws now tracing unfamiliar patterns on his scalp that might be letters in another language. "Equius and Nepeta are well. But Tavros and Gamzee are in the wind again, aiming for Karkat the last I heard. With Gamzee you can simply never tell."

A text message bar appears across the phone screen. Sollux runs his tongue tips over his teeth and scowls at the handle, wondering if he should even bother opening it. Dad is also acting really fucking weird lately. Weirder than usual. Of course, he's a fucking mob boss of some kind, so maybe he's just in some kind of tense shit that's actually managed to crack his creepy, good-natured happiness.

Fuck it. He hasn't heard from the midget asshole custodian in almost a day, ever since the first weird texts started, and he might as well bite the bullet until Aradia finishes jamming.

CD: c3- And how are you feeling, son?
TA: that'2 2eriou2ly iit?
TA: 24 hour2 of radiio 2iilence and that'2 all you've got two 2ay?
CD: c3- Oh? I'm sorry. I didn't mean to worry you.
CD: c3- There was an unfortunate oc3c3uranc3e at work the other day, but everything is fine now.
TA: do ii even want two know?
CD: c3- Oh, I c3ouldn't tell you even if you wanted to know!
TA: what. 2iince when do you not want two hiint at riidiiculou2ly 2tupiid criimiinal activiitiie2 and go22iip at me when ii clearly don't care?
CD: c3- Things are different now, son! I've had to c3hange some things around, but everything is still awesome!
CD: c3- I have to go now. Lots of work to c3omplete before HB and DD get bac3k.
CD: c3- Goodbye!
TA: ...well that'2 not fuckiing weiird at all.

"Trouble?"

"Probably not," Sollux says. "My custodian' th a fucking weird guy, that' th nothing new. I'm thtill lighthening, go on."

Aradia giggles, shaking her head. He gets a mouthful of her wild hair. It tastes stranger than usual - because mouthfuls of hair are sadly fucking common occurrences when your dark moirail has curls for days and days - not like ashes and graveyard dirt, but like...something. Sollux doesn't really get out much aside from trips that are absolutely necessary for work or supplies, but he thinks it tastes like how the wind sometimes smells when there's rain coming. Not cold enough for snow, definitely.

"I flew to Seattle. What I found was...troubling," she says at last. "Gamzee is not there yet, or I'm sure things would have deteriorated even further, but there's a storm gathering."

"Well that' th juht th vague enough to mean nothing at all."

"It means that there are six players in one location, four of them a complete game team, and they should be more than capable of staying safe for now." Aradia squirms and lies on her back, one hand coming up to card her curls out of her face and rest in a fist against her forehead. "They've left John's home, but...something is wrong. The wind is all wrong. I can tell, and it's not even my aspect. Check the news for me, I haven't had the opportunity."

"Thure, you got it." Sollux has learned to infer from Aradia's astoundingly vague hints what she's really asking for, so he searches 'strange wind weather seattle' and waits for the server to respond. "Uh. Unusually thtrong wind warnings and a poththible fire watch if it keepth up."

"Arē nahī." Aradia's gleaming eyes close, her lined face lit eerily by the phone screen. "I worry about John. He is not well, and has not been for some time. When a god tier is not well..."

"We're fucked?"

Aradia is quiet too long. Great.

"Potentially," she says at last. "Anyway you look at it, the more players they have clustered together, the stronger they become. With as many multipliers as they must have in play, they've all got quite a bit of influence on their surroundings - but that means the more distressed someone becomes, the more things could go catastrophically wrong. In John's case, it might not stop at strong winds, not with the ocean so close by."

"Tho what do we do?"

Aradia sighs.

"We watch. And we wait. And we hope to Bilious himself it doesn't get worse."
22,226 miles above the Equator (Medium Earth Orbit)

He is never trusting kind, unassuming alien beetle women ever again.

Andrew Hussie has spent the past few weeks sifting the chaff of his subconscious and coming to the conclusion that nothing could possibly be more stupid than being trapped in the upstairs of your questionably furnished vacation home as it drifts through the impenetrably dim recesses of space. Rather like a sweet, sweet hippocampus majestically frolicking through the ocean, he is aimless, in possession of lips luscious and pouting enough to make Liv Tyler herself weep delicious tears of envy, and oh, right, so far removed from the rest of civilization that not even Amazon will ship to his place of residence.

You could try to think of something dumber than this. You would not succeed.

And now this. How does he always end up stuck taking care of incredibly dangerous dependents, anyway? At this rate, he's going to run out of clean, unbefouled copies of his own merchandise to wear, and what will he do when that happens? Ms Paint kept the downstairs washer and dryer in the completely unanticipated house/rocket divorce, bless her well-meaning heart, and he ran out of clean underwear days ago. The situation has become dire.

It's only for a few more weeks, he tells himself as he shuffles down the hallway, except oh wait, with that new shithead in charge of the narrative he has no idea how long it'll take for those weeks to pass. Time wasn't exactly in a good place to begin with, thanks to that whole Lord of Time business, and now it can take months from an outsider's perspective to get through a few measly days. Clearly standards have slipped since he was in charge of things - why, back in his day, he could update ten times in one day and still have time to order the butler to harass the neighbors -

Muttering to himself, Andrew Hussie nudges the door open with his shoulder and walks in digging into his hoodie pocket for the bottle. "Alright," he mumbles, looking up at last, "you smartass little - oh SHIT."

He has walked into the wrong room. A vaguely menacing wolf's head hangs on the wall, staring off into the middle distance. Outside, in the empty recesses of space, lightning flashes, casting the ominous wall decoration into sharp relief. Never mind that lightning in space should be physically impossible; sweating, Andrew Hussie backs slowly out of the room and slams the door violently behind him. "Why do I even have that room?" he wonders aloud. "No one even likes that room."

Contemplating this, he scurries along to the next door. He's not sure how he keeps mixing the two up. It gives him a fucking heart attack every time he sees that stupid wolf head, and one day he swears to Rufio he will torch the thing and use the fire to cook his last package of Hot Pockets and imbue them with essence of dire wolf.

There is no way that this plan can go wrong. It is absolutely foolproof.

The problem is, he's nearly as terrified of what lies behind door number two as he is of that shitty decapitated wolf head. So by the time he stops admiring the rainbow-filters and galaxy overlay of the self-portrait hanging in the hallway - he's calling this beautifully ironic series 'the Husselflies of Yore' - he can already hear a faint whine emanating from behind the door. It's bolted shut and it takes him a full two minutes to undo all the locks and remember where he left that last key (tucked into his shoe, in the curve of his instep), so the plaintive screech has reached an inhuman pitch that makes his kidneys ache when he throws the door open.

On the desk where his keyboard used to rest, a swaddled creature wails and punches a crabbed fist in

Part of the wall immediately to his left dents outward with a clang.

Thank god whatever dear Ms Paint used to reinforce this tin can for space flight can take a punch or three, because the walls are riddled with concave hollows and deep gouges, and Andrew is pretty sure that the structural integrity of a regular house would have given out weeks ago. One day, he is going to find the person who saddled him with this thing, and he is going to lecture them sternly.

The Waste of Space gulps, raises the bottle before him like a shield, and edges into the room.

The door slams shut behind him.

-Somewhere in Houston, Texas-

Ms Paint cannot deny that she's starting to wonder whether the man who lived upstairs might not have skipped a few key events while he was ranting - er, relating his idea for the past, present, and future to her. He's always been a little bit of an odd-ball, that one, but things have been going south ever since he started complaining that "none of this has anything to do with the actual comic" and "I think I'm going to take a break to work on the game" and "Ms Paint, have you been adding things to my summaries?" and "why in the name of Ryan's little fish in trousers is some moirallegiance obsessed pervert dicking around with causality?" and then, finally, "what the actual fuck has she done to it oh my god."

...Humans can be quite strange. And when a Waste of Space starts to lose track of his own narrative, nothing good can come of it. They can never directly interfere with the story themselves - oh no, that would be cheating! But they can suggest and narrate and guide, and the fact that the poor orange man seems to have lost his sense of where this offshoot narrative begins and ends can mean nothing good for anyone.

Unfortunately, her new host isn't handling the class much better. Ms Paint did manage to find her in spite of the man's many handwaves while he was attempting to explain where exactly she was supposed to go, but now neither Ms Paint nor her host have any clue what the carapacian is supposed to do next! The man upstairs isn't responding to Ms Paint when she tries to contact him, and though that worries her, she's certain that he can take care of himself for a while longer. But, ooooh! He is getting a stern lecture about keeping in touch when she sees him next!

(It has not yet occurred to Ms Paint that, perhaps, cell phone service is not a universally available phenomena, particularly not when one has been ejected from the surface of the planet and left to dangle in orbit around the planet. In the Medium, one has access to the cosmically generated wireless network of the great game at all times, and when that fails, it is always possible to procure the services of an intrepid Postal shell. The idea that a phone might not work just because of a little thing like exiting the planet's atmosphere is not one that a caparacian would even think to contemplate, and even if one did, would find ludicrously counterintuitive.

...Aliens.)

The door opens with a rattle and a click, and the hook rack loaded with random articles of clothing scrapes against the top of the door frame as her host laughs nervously and wedges herself through the small opening. Beyond the door, Ms Paint can make out the murmur of voices and the louder blare of human pop music emanating from one of the rooms down the hall before her host once again jams the door shut, whirling to face Ms Paint with a mug of tea in each claw. "He's not even studying for his exams," the troll hisses, holding the blue and white striped mug out for Ms Paint to take and gloowering darkly back at the closed door. "Just sitting there blasting music and watching Kill la Kill. That ass."

MP: O-oh! Is that a bad thing?

"It's an annoying thing." The troll snorts and perches cross-legged on her bed, dragging the laptop over to boot it up as she stares wistfully at the door. "God, I wish I had time to watch Kill la Kill."

MP: That is a shame. I'm sorry, dear.

Her host waves a claw absently, rubbing at the furrow between her brows with the ball of her thumb and grimacing. "Not your fault. With any luck, he'll go to campus to get actual work done and then you can actually, you know, leave this room for a while."

Ms Paint nods and wraps both claws around the mug of tea, her lips clicking against the rim of the glass as she drinks. The tea is milky and sugary to the point that it is essentially hot flavored sugar water, but there's nothing wrong with that.

Her host's name is Zachal Keynai and Ms Paint had journeyed here expecting someone...a little different! The way the man upstairs had put it, this troll was supposed to understand her plight and be willing to provide shelter for her.

Well, yes, Zachal had been more than willing to invite Ms Paint in - but the man had somehow failed to mention that this temporary safe house would also be occupied by two other trolls, neither of whom Zachal is willing to let know that she is harboring a carapacian in her bedroom. "Midere is a gossipy bastard. Paimah is in some kind of threeway matespritship and she tells them everything," the troll had explained that first night, looking haunted. "They can never know."

It all seems a little over the top to Ms Paint, but who is she to question her newest patron? They all have their strange quirks and annoyances, none of which really matter in the grand scheme of things - until suddenly they do.
They sit in silence for almost a half hour, Ms Paint occupying herself by glancing around the small room as her host casts increasingly twitchy looks at the closed door, through which the shuffle of people moving around can be heard. Any time footsteps come close to the door Zachal tenses, but no one comes in. The front door squeaks open and someone calls a farewell that Zachal barely manages to return before the door swings shut with a thump.

"Finally," Zachal mutters, and she sets the computer aside to crack the door open and peer out into the rest of the apartment. "Coast is clear!"

MP: We may leave?

"Better! We can eat!" Zachal walks out, turns on her heel, walks back in, grabs her laptop, and sails right back out the door. Ms Paint follows in her wake, bemused and still holding her mug of tea, and the two go out into the main room. Most of the open space in the kitchen has been taken up with a patio table, complete with a beige umbrella that remains propped open despite the fact that they are indoors. The carapacian settles down on a seat beneath the patio table's umbrella while the troll rushes to the windows and draws the blinds shut, her laptop still tucked under her arm as she locks the patio door with a key. "Awesome. Cool. And those two shouldn't be back for a couple hours, at least."

Ms Paint shakes her head as Zachal sits across the table from her and cracks open the laptop again. The resident cat, an enormous creature, leaps up onto the table with a miserable meow and flops down across the flat surface, rolling its head to stare at Ms Paint with avid eyes. She has been warned against petting the creature, however, and she does not fall for the temptation presented when it butts its head against the hand curled around her tea.

Well. Perhaps she pets it once. Just once.

A few times. It purrs.

MP: You do not trust your roommates? Surely if you asked them to keep silent, they would not deliberately draw attention to me. If my presence is intruding on your daily life this way, I could try to seek shelter elsewhere -

Zachal is shaking her head before Ms Paint can even finish, scratching at a rust-colored scab that runs along the back of her forearm. "If you're here, you're here. 'Specially if that guy told you to come here," she says, shoving the cat's paw off her keyboard with a grimace. "We just keep you on the down low for as long as we can. It's the best we can do. I can see what those idiots are going to do pretty well, but as for us out here outside the main storyline?" She gestures vaguely with a claw, as though to indicate their immediate vicinity. "Total blank."

MP: How unfortunate.

"Tell me about it." Zachal gnaws on her lip, reading something on the computer screen with a look of resignation. "Help yourself to anything in the fridge - I might be a while."

Ms Paint hesitates, and leans to look at the computer. On it is an open word processor, covered with paragraphs and paragraphs of text.

MP: You have been working on the narrative all day. Should you not rest?

"Nah. I have to get this down. Have to." Zachal glowers at the screen. "Did that guy ever tell you what it's like, having to deal with all this in your head? It's a nightmare; you can't shake it off."

MP: He was usually very busy drawing small comics to accompany his narrative and wandering around the house frightening himself every time he came across a decorative wolf's head. I just tended to fetch him what he needed before he could work himself into a panic, the poor fellow.

"Oh great, so it drove him nuts, too. That's reassuring."

The cat brushes its bush-like tail over the computer screen in an irritable sweep. Zachal eyes it sourly and moves the computer so that it rests almost on the very edge of the table, supported by her knees.

Ms Paint can only shake her head and scoot her chair around the corner of the table to get a better angle. "You're just gonna sit there and watch me type?" At Ms Paint's nod, Zachal sighs. "Alright. This recap is gonna be pretty shitty, though. I'm not that guy, there's only so much I can do before it just gets pretentious as fuck."

MP: I'm sure it will be fine!

Rolling her neck to one side until it gives a small pop, Zachal begins to type.

In the words of the inestimable Charles Dutton, first Son of Skaia:

In a minute there is time for decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse. For I have known them all already, known them all: have known the evenings, mornings, afternoons; I have measured out my life with coffee spoons.

Yeah, Dream Bubbles was a weird read, man. I only got through it because it was required in my literary criticism class and the professor was convinced the coffee spoons were phallic symbols or something.

Look, the point is, we are time's subjects, and time bids be gone.

Like One Sundered Star began July 4, 2013, a date which has absolutely no relation to the time frame of the story itself. The five heroes who take up the majority of the focus were introduced as they went about their days attending school, becoming horrendous drunkards, performing suitably ironic deeds, making new friends, blowing up volcanic islands, and fighting crime as masked (and unmasked) vigilantes. In Seattle, a troll named Karkat Vantas befriends the human John Egbert, who moonlights as the Heir of Breath, after being forced to move to the suburbs after being caught in the middle of shootout. Unaware of his new friend's identity as the hero who rescued him the other night, Karkat is inspired to become a hero himself. In New York, Rose Lalonde spends her days fighting as the Seer of Light, but more and more often finds herself distracted by the mental whispers of the Horrorterror leψυαψην wildfire, who capitalizes on Rose's distress in order to lure her into the affectionate embrace of its otherworldly tentacles and make her a willing ςυλєвυץ in its nefarious schemes. In Houston, Dave Strider works with his abrasive elder brother/ectobiological father, Ambrose Strider, and ends up in a risky alliance with a mysterious Badass Quandary, who hurts as much as she helps in an oblique attempt to teach how to better exploit his powers over time. John Egbert, a boy plagued by anxiety and depression, relies more and more heavily on both his father and his new friend Karkat as he attempts to balance his everyday life and his heroic endeavors; though he and Karkat eventually form a moi̇allegiance, this places even more strain upon John, who starts to fret over the fact that he cannot distinguish between flushed and pale romantic feelings. Jade Harley lives alone except for her mysterious wolf guardian Becquerel, reading about the end of the world that is to come in her dead custodian's notes and pestering John's old chumhandle, unaware that he has changed it as she waits for the day that her training is complete and she can take on the world.

After an interval of approximately 18 months, Karkat makes his debut as the hero Hemogoblin, just in time for the nefarious Midnight Crew to begin to harass him and Heir in their efforts to spread their criminal enterprise into the Seattle area, spearheaded by the brutal Hearts Boxcars. Across the continent, Rose's Internet penpal and on-again-off-again girlfriend Kanaya Maryam tips her off to the fact that she has begun to lose time to her heavy drinking and has in fact been missing entire days of hero work. Unfortunately, before Kanaya can execute an intervention about Rose's drinking, an ill-timed note from Rose's long absent mother, Rue Lalonde, arrives through the efforts of an intrepid Parcel Mistress, providing the surge of fury and betrayal that finally allows the Horrorterrors to seize control of her mind and set her on a destructive collision course with the entire city of New York, channeling the powers of the Furthest Ring in an effort to open a summoning spirograph and bring the rest of leψυαψην into reality. Across the continent John, pushed to his emotional limit by a chat conversation with Dave's elder brother, accidentally taps into one of the abilities of a fully realized Heir of Breath and teleports to Houston to confront him. However, John understands very little about his own capabilities; something seems to be preventing him from thinking clearly about his powers and what they can do, and instead he is driven to either forget or to become emotionally distraught before his thoughts can linger too long over certain subjects. It is not a healthy state of mind, one which may have contributed to his depressive episodes and panic attacks in the past, but Dave, John, and Ambrose have bigger problems to deal with when Rue contacts them to request their assistance in stopping the grimdark Rose from tearing up New York City. Jade, in the meantime, has been crisscrossing the globe on a merry heroic road trip, when she stumbles upon a Wandering Variable who has somehow become quantumly desynchronized from the rest of reality, and sets out on a quest to perform SERIOUS SCIENCE in order to try and stabilize him, using her Grandpa/ectobiological father's science labs to analyze the situation.

In Seattle, Karkat, unaware that Heir has left the city, is drawn into a solo showdown with Hearts Boxcars when the Crew boss escapes from the police lockup, badly injuring Hemogoblin with a concealed pipe bomb in the process. Unaware that many of his skills as a non-god tier Knight of Blood are keyed to role playing scenarios in which he must act in defense of or service to another person that would max out his stats in Heir's presence, Karkat races to the docks to try to prevent Boxcars' escape from the city but fails, falling into the bay in humiliation and defeat. He returns home just in time to witness the televised battle between grimdark Rose, who has been labeled Dark Star by the media, and the three heroes who have just flown in from Houston to confront her. Rose, still trying to fend off the Horrorterrors from within her compromised mind, manages to sabotage the tangle's design for the summoning spirograph at the cost of the last of her mental strength. Dave takes advantage of his newly reclaimed ability to travel in limited time loops in order to rescue a class of elementary schoolers and their teacher from the demolished Guggenheim. However, because the BQ has taught him a method of time travel that does not make use of the turntable accessories that would allow him to exploit time safely, he suffers through the memory of incredible pain whenever he accesses it, causing him to be distracted and then badly injured by Dark Star, and he falls unconscious in the middle of the fray. Ambrose and John must then spend the rest of the battle keeping Dave safe from the Dark Star tangle, which wishes to use Dave's body as a secondary vessel. Thankfully, John manages to apply Void-imbued cuffs created by Rue Lalonde and free more and more of Rose's mind from the grindark, and eventually Rose brings John into her mind to help free her mental avatar from the bloodbrine sea that has invaded it. While PM helps the four heroes abscond, Jade deals with missiles and ninjas sent to capture her by Clubs Deuce, one of the less subtle members of the Midnight Crew, before stabilizing the Wandering Variable and launching herself, WV, and Becquerel across the planet in the process.

Instead of sticking together and actually, you know, making an effort to find some answers about their situation, John, Dave, and Rose split up again. Rose only puts up with her mother's overbearing disdain long enough to put her mind in order before absconding from the safety of Lalonde Laboratories. She misses a grand opportunity to have all of her questions answered by the mysterious Wondering Querent, who has been working with Rue Lalonde for some time in an attempt to recreate a 'Queen's Hub,' and instead meets up with Kanaya in Philadelphia to restart work as the Seer with Kanaya's alter ego, the rainbow-drinking Malachite Sylph, present to keep Rose in check in the event either her latent alcoholism or her connection to the Horrorterrors overwhelms her once again. Unfortunately, both Rose and Dave come into contact with a dangerous being called Doc Scratch - Rose when Scratch takes advantage of Kanaya's poor Internet security to contact her on Pesterchum, and Dave when he stumbles across a floating cue ball in the streets, one that begins to watch his every move and slowly erode the ambient Void shielding that has protecting the four human heroes all their lives by observing him. This places both of them in grave danger, particularly when Doc Scratch uses his text connection with Rose to activate a second dormant cue ball already present in Kanaya's apartment. Neither Rose nor Dave seem to be able to take the cue balls seriously as a threat, and people tend to forget about them entirely when they are not visible, almost as though there is something uncanny about the cue balls that allows them to do their master's work unhindered and unnoticed by the rest of the universe. Like they themselves are the white text on the white screen of reality.

John returns to Seattle just in time to prevent Karkat from discovering his untimely absence, but his relationship with his father, Samuel Egbert, takes a blow over John's inadvertent repeat of an earlier incident in which he ran away to Houston. Father and adoptive son continue to clash uneasily when Karkat's alter ego, Hemogoblin, is accused by the police of having been responsible for the explosions at the police station that allowed Boxcars to escape, with John as Heir feeling an obligation to help his heroic partner and Samuel, who is already aware that Karkat is Hemogoblin, concerned that John has lost all moral objectivity about the troll. Neither Karkat, who is in the beginning stages of sleep deprivation and sopor slime withdrawal, nor John, torn between his father and his partner, are well equipped to handle the situation, but the two manage to get the job done with the help of Officer Greg Ellard of Seattle PD. The man who convinced the police chief of Hemogoblin's guilt is revealed to be "No Name Given" Crichton, a member of the Midnight Crew with a fanatical devotion to his boss, Diamonds Droog, and a talent for spreading misinformation about his targets. Though he surrenders without much of a fight, his presence in Seattle comes with the ominous promise that Diamonds Droog will soon arrive to finish the job that Boxcars started. Before they can process this, however, John and Karkat are blindsided by the arrival of Sharpshooter, aka Jade Harley, who announces herself as Heir's sister with aplomb. Fresh from being harried by Clubs Deuce across most of America and shaken by an encounter with the insane Juggaloco, Jade has little respect for secret identities and recognizes Karkat as Hemogoblin on sight the next day, leaving both Karkat and John desperate to keep her quiet in a farcical display of mutual
Despite the distance between the three of them, Rose, John, and Karkat continue to teeter back and forth on the precipice of their mental health. Karkat, plagued by bloody nightmares in which a younger John, Dave, and Jade die horribly, becomes more and more distressed and unstable as he deprives himself of sleep and sopor slime in a futile effort to stop dreaming about his moirail's death. He drives himself to the point of collapsing after a furious confrontation with Dave over his relationship with John, and his hero work begins to suffer as well, to the point where John finally forces the troll to sleep out of sheer desperation. To distract herself from the fragile balance of power in her mind space, Rose throws herself into mending bridges with John and getting to know Dave better after the revelation that the two of them are in fact ecto-siblings. But soon her mother returns, spurred by a lecture from Ambrose to make up for her earlier absence from Rose's life, and Rose becomes increasingly bitter and irrational in dealing with her mother's feeble attempts at reconciliation. Dave, left mute by the destruction of his collar in Dark Star's attack, scoops a secret mission from the Badass Quandary as payback for her repeatedly refusals to give him straight answers about his time powers and stumbles across a Midnight Crew base in an abandoned movie theater. There, he discovers this branch of the Crew, led by Felt member Crowbar, has captured PM in the middle of her mission to deliver messages on behalf of the Wondering Querent - and a second Dave, a mutant with bird wings who prefers to go by Oriole. The rescue mission ends when Dave brings the three of them forward in time, an ability he hadn't realized he had, and they return to the apartment to recuperate and regain their bearings.

The story abruptly digresses, turning to focus on eleven other troll heroes scattered around North America. Aradia Megido, born several centuries too early in India, is reminded by the premature arrival of the carapacian Queens that she has plans to sabotage the cosmic Game that gave birth to this universe. Tavros Nitram lives a carefree life as a minor hero in a small town in Mexico until Gamzee Makara appears in the middle of the night in a haze of madness and drags Tavros along to go meet up with their 'friends.' Sollux Captor is trying to live a normal life and deal with Kanaya's strange white-text computer hacker problems from afar when Aradia bursts in through the wall to convince him to join her in the hero business; meanwhile, on Prospit, one of Sollux's dreamselfes is hard at work converting the abandoned alien planet into a massive supercomputer, taking advantage of the fact that all carapacians are currently residing on Earth to meddle with the code of the Game itself at Aradia's behest. Nepeta Leijon and Equius Zahhak live in Florida and moonlight as heroes - except on those occasions when Nepeta starts failing her classes and Equius feels the need to ground her from hero work. Equius is also collaborating with an anonymous Ambrose Strider to complete part of Dave's collar, which will allow him to speak again. Kanaya faces discrimination based on her hemotype and fails in her attempts to auspice between the Indigo Scourge and Blind Justice, the resident anti-heroes of Chicago, just before she and Rose witness a news report on the appearance of an otherworldly dome over the downtown Los Angeles and come to the conclusion that it may be a grimlight Horroterror similar to the one that killed off Kanaya's entire Medicull squad during the Novaya Ukraine genocide. Blind Justice - aka Terezi Pyrope - is a rogue Legislacerator in training, but her ongoing feud with Vriska Serket, the Indigo Scourge, is interrupted first by the arrival of the limeblood William Graham, a universal moirail attached to the Legislaceration Bureau who discovers Vriska's secret identity at the coffee shop where she works, and then by Terezi and Vriska managing to erupt into a full-on kismesissitude in the wake of Vriska breaking up a lusus fighting ring. The two spiral out of control and begin to tear down the city around them in a blind rivalry. Gamzee Makara, incarcerated at a hospital for residents with coldblood psychosis in Spain, manages to fool his nurses and psychiatrists long enough for his innate Rage to overwhelm the drugs in his system and breaks free, determined to track down all of his friends from the Game for reasons only he can fathom. Whether he is a full-fledged god tier Bard of Rage, or only faking it, remains to be seen. Eridan Ampora, also suffering from what has been diagnosed as coldblood psychosis, is abandoned by his moirail Feferi Peixes just in time for a grimlight Horroterror called Malā’ikah to take advantage of Eridan's vulnerability and use him to manifest its power on the physical plane, attracting the attention of Gamzee and sending ripples of reality-warping distortion throughout the western United States. Feferi makes her debut in Washington DC, unaware that the reason she abandoned Eridan and found herself so drawn to the Atlantic seaboard was that Gl'bgolyb, the grimlight emissary of the Furthest Ring and the abomination responsible for the warping of the Ukraine, had already begun to sink tentacles into her brain, linked to her as it is to all tyrian blooded trolls. All eleven trolls have their roles to play in the game to come, though only a scattered few - Aradia, Gamzee, and Eridan - have any solid recollection of their past lives. It is not long before Gamzee, Tavros, and Eridan collide, an encounter which sets Eridan free from the Horrorterror's influence, but also unleashes a powerful Hope player on the unsuspecting people of Los Angeles, one who is determined to set up his own kingdom heedless of the game playing out around him.

Upon returning to the main narrative, we find that Jade's arrival has set in motion a chain of events which culminates in a series of dangerous revelations. Two others reach Seattle almost at the same time: Diamonds Droog, boss of the Midnight Crew's special ops and all-around monster, and Spades Slick, a carapacian that Droog has been attempting to capture for weeks and who possesses an uncanny blood bond with Karkat, leftover from another life. After concealing his hero life from John for weeks, Karkat is violently outed by Droog when she separates him from John and Jade to test his abilities on Scratch's orders, leaving the weakened troll badly injured and sending John into an emotional tailspin that causes him to reach out for Dave's support just as he did two years ago. Rose is preoccupied on a roadtrip with Kanaya and later caught up in the furious rivalry between the Indigo Scourge and Blind Justice as the they forcefully auspice the two anti-heroes and hustle them across to border to Canada. After an outing with Oriole goes awry and the Midnight Crew attacks, Dave decides to ignore a letter from Rue Lalonde reaching out to him as a mother and instead chooses to take off for Seattle to help a panicking John handle the insanity of Droog's rampage and Karkat's wounds. He unknowingly brings the cue ball along with him for the ride. Better still, once he and Karkat are under one roof, the two proceed to argue relentlessly, as Karkat feels threatened by Dave's closeness with John and Dave is a total dick just because he feels like it. Jade, hoping to help John and Karkat in their time of dire need, heads out on her own secret mission to track down Droog and winds up captured in the process, taken out by a tranquilizer round fired by the Ranger, a Crew-employed sniper. She is then trapped along with Becquerel in a space power-cancelling cage developed based on Clubs Deuce's prior experience with Jade and Doc Scratch's own personal affiliation with Space.

Rose soon begins to recklessly experiment with the cue ball in her possession. Sensing its inherent potential as the instrument of a Seer of Space, she uses it as a scrykind to try to expand her own Seer abilities and view Dave from afar. Unbeknownst to her, however, this allows Doc Scratch to assume direct control over Rose's visions, and he 'helpfully' drags her mind into the Furthest Ring to witness his on-going negotiations with several Horrorterrors. By the time Rose is able to pry herself free - or, depending on your perspective, when Scratch allowed her to go free - she has been trapped in the seer trance long enough for Kanaya to panic and take her Rue Lalonde in Washington. Meanwhile, unable to participate in John and Dave's frantic search for Jade thanks to his injuries, Karkat has an even more unusual nightmare than he has become accustomed to, and after viewing a younger John's death seems to wake up to a dream within a dream, scrambling to escape the confines of a brightly colored vision before being imprisoned again by two unseen guardians. When he wakes, he discovers that Spades has broken into the room, and is coerced into completing a mysterious blood pact with the carapacian that allows the alien to share some of Karkat's Blood powers. Dave and John stumble upon Droog's current Crew base in the Seattle area without making the connection that Jade has been kidnapped, and the two attempt to stealthily investigate before an inopportune message from Karkat triggers John's increasingly defensive amnesia and drops him in the middle of the Crew base. Though he awakens in time to help Dave and Spades fight their way down to where Jade has broken free from her cell and begun beating the shit out of Crichton, John is in no fit state to run around performing hero work - a fact that Droog capitalizes on when she finds herself surrounded by the three heroes and Spades. She plays her trump card, her knowledge of John’s secret identity, and the heroes have no choice but to allow the Crew boss to abscond. John, rattled to the point of being nearly comatose by the realization that he will never be safe fighting crime again, spends the next few days slowly recovering as the hero children and Samuel prepare to meet up with Rue in her Washington laboratory, where Rose is waiting.

After a roadtrip from hell, Karkat, John, Dave, Jade, and Samuel are guided through the Void shields that ward Lalonde Laboratories against outside influence and participate in an incredibly sappy reunion with Rose. Karkat is struck by the fact that he knows Kanaya, but cannot explain how or why, and she does not show signs of similar recognition. Joined by Ambrose, Oriole, and the two Queens, and unaware that Spades Slick has stowed away in the trunk of the Egberts’ car, almost every single good guy in the entire story observes as the White Queen demonstrates the fruits of her labors - a makeshift Queen's Hub, a set of computer screens and a control panel which allows her to access records of a Game that the human heroes once played. Queens are immortal and eternal, the only pieces in this cosmic game that survive from session to session to restart the process of cloning their subjects and playing out the chess match in each successive game. For the most part, the records on the Hub screens show a drastically revised summation of the events of Homestuck, in which the Horrorterror лєιг тнαɴ active interferes not just with Rose’s quest but with the other three humans as well, stirred up by the physical presence of Doc Scratch within the game session. It chooses to infect the Denizens of each hero’s game land, and taps into the mental connection between Denizen and hero to lure the children into its tentacular clutches. The chaos god's meddling badly traumatizes John's mind, but he manages to break free and rescue WV as well, releasing the Denizen Typhueus from the grimdark in the process. After talking Jade into calling for Becquerel to have the wolf teleport her away from her own corrupted Denizen's home, John attempts to locate Rose in her land, only to find that the [Lađđ] αιγήт από Рαμό has been overtaken by grimdarkness and Rose is nowhere to be found. He and Ambrose locate Dave on ḠʊḤα成功举办 and John makes use of Dave's server copy to search Rose’s land, but Rose has already abandoned her planet and made her way to Skaia's Battlefield with the help of the Horrorterrors on her own personal vendetta against Doc Scratch. The Denizen Cetus has been completely infested with grimdark tangles and the massive whale attacks John. It is confronted by Typhueus, who banishes John back to his own land in time for him to witness Jack Noir attacking Jade on his viewscreen. Jack, empowered by the prototyped Black Queen's ring, murders Jade and then consumes the weakened Becquerel, blowing up most of Jade's planet in the ensuing explosion. Noir then turns his sights on John, and even the combined efforts of Ambrose and Davesprite can only hold him off for so long before the carapacian kills John as well.

Despite their best efforts, Jade's dreamself and Dave can't awaken John's dreamself on Prospit before Noir attacks and sends them plummeting to Skaia below, and Jade is crushed while pushing an unconscious John to safety. On Derse, Dave's dreamself stumbles upon Rose's body, torn apart by the Horrorterrors she has made her pact with, and is forced by the Black Queen, who has been badly injured by Jack Noir's coup and the theft of her ring, to captchalogue Rose's body and take it down to the Quest Crypts stored in the center of Derse. On Skaia, John's dreamself and Dave fight Noir but are quickly killed; the remaining human custodians, having just arrived on a battleship commandeered by Grandpa Harley, are murdered as well. This drives Rose to consent to the Horrorterror having control of her body and, grief-stricken, she lashes out at Noir with grimdark until he strikes her down. With most of the human children dead, the Black Queen takes up the White Queen's ring from John and distracts Noir long enough for PM and an Authority Regulator to move their bodies to the Quest Beds scattered throughout Skaia, while a future Dave coordinates everyone, redirects meteors to ensure that the carapacians who would become their exiles instead end up remaining in the Medium, and ensures that Jade and John's original bodies are moved to their beds on their respective planets so that all four heroes rise up to the god tiers almost at the exact same time.
Working together, they manage to defeat Noir, the last boss on the Battlefield, and win the game - but at their moment of Pyrrhic victory, the screens cut out, as the interference of the trolls' game session causes the Queen's Hub to malfunction, and they are unable to see what would have caused them to scratch the game and reset the universe in an act of desperation.

Returning to the present time, every so often throughout the viewing of these disturbing video recordings the current incarnations of our heroes are forced to take breaks to collect themselves - particularly John, who retains many of his memories regarding the pre-scratch universe but has been viciously repressing them for most of his life, taking advantage of the damage caused by the Horrorterrors in the previous game to dump unpleasant memories and sensations in the back of his mind where he can refuse to deal with them. The consequences of this dangerous repression and emotional instability remain to be seen. Rose, having learned that her pre-scratch self consented to the Horrorterror's presence in her mind, becomes convinced that she is personally responsible for the game's failure and the many deaths that ensued, and fatalistically chooses to drink heavily until she is capable of pretending to forgive her mother, believing that presenting a unified front is more important than her own sobriety in the face of her overwhelming guilt. Karkat attempts to talk Spades Slick out of stabbing people but fails miserably, more concerned with getting John and Samuel to talk to each other after days of not speaking about the fact that Droog knows John's identity. Dave has begun to be able to hear the fraymotifs of the game that are still playing in the background but is unable to make sense of what he hears. And Jade sets off to meet with her Grandpa again at last, only to learn that he must leave once again for parts unknown to investigate strange activity spotted in along the northern Siberian coast of Russia. Before he leaves, he warns her that at least one member of the heroes' party has been compromised by the Midnight Crew, and to keep his continued existence a secret from those around her until they can be sure who to trust. With their affairs not quite settled and with the knowledge of the pre-scratch game weighing heavily on their minds, the main heroes return to Seattle in an attempt to return to their normal routines, choosing to relocate to the old Lalonde house rather than the Egberts' due to the fact that with John's identity exposed, his house is no longer secure.

While Kanaya chooses to accompany Rose to Seattle, it is with the caveat that soon the troll means to continue on to investigate the ongoing mystery of Los Angeles. Oriole, haunted by the fact that he is the leftover impression of a secondary, prototyped version of Dave, refuses to stay with them, setting off to return to Houston alone in order to establish himself as his own person and hero. Both Queens and Spades Slick play least in sight as the heroes leave the lab, their exact locations uncertain, while Rue remains at her labs to work on adjusting the Queen's Hub to try to view the troll session, her relationship with Rose still strained. Ambrose wants Dave to come back to Houston, as he is certain that if all four kids remain in one place they will be at risk, but concedes that until it's decided whether John and Samuel will leave Seattle once and for all it would be better for everyone's state of mind if the kids remain together for mutual support.

And now, once again, everyone seems to have forgotten about the cue balls.

This can only end badly.

But there is a schism building in the combined ranks of the Midnight Crew and the Felt. Since the two rival gangs merged several years ago under Doc Scratch's command, the criminal gang has made use of mind-controlling grubs developed by Felt member Die to control their small army of thugs and minions. The three main Crew members, Droog, Boxcars, and Deuce, were supposed to have been exempt from Die's influence, but when an ignorant Deuce confronts Die in his lair, the doctor reveals that all three Crew bosses have emergency 'shutdown' grubs implanted in their brains, and proceeds to tinker with Deuce until the brainwashing becomes obvious to Droog and Boxcars. Droog, never the most tractable to begin with, is incensed by this betrayal and by previous frustrations, and kidnaps the brainwashed Deuce with Boxcars's assistance. She capitalizes on the fact that Doc Scratch has difficulty seeing through the thick Void shielding that has protected the human heroes for much of their lives, and strategically conceals her future movements from Scratch's eyes by planning to revisit void-heavy locations. While she absconds for parts unknown, her future service to Scratch in question, Boxcars is left to fumblingly pretend to still be loyal to Scratch's Crew and sent off to Seattle with four young villains - the Ranger, the Cogitator, the Berzerker, and the Bolter - in order to field test their abilities.

And after all that, you decided to read over my shoulder as I tried and failed to summarize all of this absurd nonsense in a timely and concise, yet incredibly derivative and pretentious fashion.

Well, nobody's perfect. It is entirely possible that this entire thing has just been one massive waste of time.

And yet, here you are. Still reading.

I'm so sorry.

Ms Paint sips at her tea. It has gone cold. Around her neck, the ring which she keeps on a thin chain weighs heavy on her chest.

MP: That wasn't so bad, was it?

Zachal buries her face in her hands, then gives up and lets her forehead thump against the table. "I have a final due tomorrow that I haven't even started, there's a carapacian with a crazy mob boss after her staying in my apartment, and these idiots are all going to die," she mumbles into her palms. The cat leans over and casually sinks its teeth into the troll's forearm, and Zachal yelps, frantically shaking her arm until the cat gives up. "Oh my fucking god. This is so bad," she says, staring at the screen with desperate eyes. "There's no recovering from this. The lameness has hit maximum overdrive. We've officially hit our lowest point."

MP: Then there is no way left to go but up! Don't be so hard on yourself!

"If you say so, Ms Paint. If you say so."

And with that, Zachal shuts the laptop’s lid.

Chapter End Notes

I used this translator here for the Alternian.

The next chapter is going to be so much more normal than the past two chapters have been. And by normal I mean I'm bORED OF TALKING AND EMOTIONS TIME FOR A BOSS FIGHT OR FOUR AM I RIGHT OR AM I RIGHT?
The Fire Of Fight

Chapter Summary

Hope sits yet hiding her war-wearied eyes,
Doubt sets her forehead earthward and denies,
But fear brought hand to hand with danger dies,
Dies and is burnt up in the fire of fight.

Chapter Notes

EDIT: Jade ‘n Jake, and we’re dONE with chapter 18 which is a shame, I rather liked chapter 18, I feel like it went quite well. The next chapter as a whole is going to be pretty short because there are just a few loose ends to tie up at Lalonde Labs before it’s time to UNLEASH THE PAIN. How odd. We haven’t had short chapters in forever. It’s like a Christmas miracle except in the middle of summer -

- wait what was that about pain?

Minor gore and body horror trigger warning for Rose's section. Today's power anthems are Seven Nation Army (Glitch Mob Remix) and Can't Hold Us (PTX). H&H belong to realmenweartights.tumblr.com

Seattle, Washington

Hearts Boxcars has sweat through four shirts today, and the fifth one is almost ready to follow its predecessors to an early, drenched grave. He yanks hard on his collar and untucks the last of the rumpled hem in a last ditch effort at airing himself out, wondering if it's possible to drown in one's own sweat. It's not even all that hot in here, but he can't seem to get cool.

He determinedly refuses to think about why that might be.

He's not like Diamonds - he doesn't try to juggle ten different incredible deadly problems in his head at one time. He's not the brains of this shindig, he's the muscle. All he needs to do is distract himself with a nice, absorbing heist, or maybe the latest issue of Red Cheeks, or something. Anything.

He finds himself scowling around the warehouse, one of several such properties close to the waterfront that he marked for illegal corporate takeover before Diamonds went and got herself assigned to handle setup in Seattle. He cased the joint himself, so the place isn't falling apart or nothing, but now as he stands here, nominally overseeing the men who are unloading a shipment on the main floor, he's actually stuck trying to figure out what kind of hash Di's made of the place. Everything's all...organized. Boxcars has expanded Crew territory holdings to other cities in the past, and never has he seen his people so well-versed in maintaining a neat and orderly working environment.
He doesn't like it. He hates it. Ugh. This ain't natural. Even as Boxcars watches, a burgundy-blooded troll starts directing her supply line with a series of intelligible hand signals that he did not train them to use. Hell, he's never trained any of these guys at all - Boxcars just tends to hire based on how much a recruit can benchpress, their willingness to obey orders of an illegal nature, and at least a mediocre specibus mastery, and then he tosses them out onto the streets to act as brute muscle, enforcers, and intimidation racketeers. Sure, half of them are hoodlums who barely scraped their way through a GED, but they're his hoodlums and they've never needed none of this fancy ass training before.

Now, they're all afraid to even give him lip. His people obey his orders, yeah, but now that they've all got the fear of Diamonds put in them, they won't even open their gobs to chatter at each other, except to call out directions or shipment labels. No one but his lieutenants will so much as look Boxcars in the eye.

_Dammit, Diamonds. Why yah gotta be so fucking competent all the damn time?_

Jesus. Even when Di's not here, she's still present. And on top of the terror she's inspired in his people, Boxcars is still not even thinking about the fresh mess she's dragged them all into with -

_Not thinking about that. Not even a little. His mind is an empty warehouse on the subject; nothing going in or out. He knows zip._

On edge, Boxcars peels his shirt away from where it has plastered itself to his stomach again and lurches into motion with a growl low in his chest. He roars an order at one of the trolls cringing on guard duty and starts down toward the ground floor. Overseeing things is for chumps. He doesn't care if Diamonds rearranged the damn solar system to get things this orderly - he only cares that he can't afford to think about Di's nonsense right now.

Well. What better way to keep all these stray thoughts corralled than by working out his excess energy in replacing the fear of Droog with the much more reasonable and applicable fear of Boxcars. His heel hits the cold concrete of the warehouse floor and he manages to bluster and cajole the pack of sad sacks milling around on the floor back into a rowdy mob of hooligans in a matter of minutes.

Unfortunately, that's when his other problem decides to rear its ugly mug.

Well. Four mugs, really. Three, if you want to be real technical about it. Goddamn, these kids are underfoot. They're cramping his style and he's only had 'em for two damn days.

Die had been adamant Boxcars come pick them up in person, but like hell was he going anywhere near Die's lair after - uh, nothing. Nothing related to Clubs, for sure. So instead the kids had been escorted out to him by Doze and Itchy, blinking four pairs of beady little eyes like they'd never seen daylight before as their shithead Felt escort rattled off instructions on how to deal with these high maintenance twerps.

Boxcars hadn't really been paying attention. He'd been restraining his overwhelming instinct to tear the two Felt members' heads off.

But two days is long enough to have already set a pattern, and as per fucking usual, it's Ranger who starts shit. Boxcars only realizes something's amiss when he helps two of his lackeys heave a heavy shipping container full of goods of questionable legality onto a stack. Over the slam of crates hitting concrete, he hears the very, very slurred giggle that heralds the end of his few minutes of distraction.

"H'okay! Yeah! No worries, I've gotcha covered!"
Boxcars groans and thumps his head against the crate in front of him hard enough to dent the metal. When he turns to survey the room, the cause of the hubbub is pretty fucking obvious. Ranger, all legs and gangly arms and messy hair, wheels and stumbles her way off the ramp of one of the shipping trucks, carrying an entire four hundred pound crate by herself. Even as Boxcars watches in horror, she stumbles over a cable in a pseudo-drunk stupor.

Good god. She's going to trip and kill someone, and Boxcars is gonna have to explain to the boss exactly why he had to return one of the Scratch kids to Die in a plastic baggie. "Put that down, punk!" he yells sharply, shouldering a greenblood aside as he stomps toward the disaster in motion.

"I've got it!" Ranger calls back cheerily, hiccupping. "Jusht you leave it to me, boss man!"

The leading edge of the container smacks a man across the face, and the poor guy drops like a stone. "Oh shit! Ops! I mean oops!" the girl says distractedly, and the whole container judders and dips. A troll with hooked horns, caught off guard by the Ranger's wild stumbling, is sent reeling back against the side of the truck. "Darn!"

Boxcars wants to throw up his hands in disgust because seriously? Seriously? What'd he do to deserve this?

Instead, he barrels right up to the Scratch kid and plants his hand on the far side of the crate. "I said put this down, or I'll wallop yah so hard Die'll feel it!" he snaps, maybe a little more vehemently than is smart. Whatever. Die is a sick little freak. Ain't nothing wrong with thinking that.

There's an unsettling moment where the container keeps moving toward his face at an alarming rate, Boxcars's arm straining to stay firm as he almost gets knocked flat on his ass by Ranger's momentum. Then - "Oh! Uh, right, boss guy! If this is where you want it" - the girl drops the container without ceremony or prior warning.

Right on Boxcars's foot.

Everyone in the warehouse goes horribly still, transfixed. Ranger freezes, her bony fingers still outstretched where she let the container fall through her hands, but they slowly curl back into loose fists as anxiety replaces her boyish, earnest glee, with the distinct look of 'I fucked up so bad' hard on its heels. She gulps, her prominent Adam's apple bobbing, but her mouth stays shut.

"Steel toed shoes," Boxcars says at last, between gritted teeth.

"Hells yeah!" The Scratch puts her hands up, the grin taking over her face once more. "High fives for work zone safety!"

Boxcars's eyes narrow. "Still. In. Pain." One eye twitches more than the other. "So much pain," is what he intends to say next, but all that emerges is a choked shriek. "Holy sheeeowfuckufkcidfkc-

With a titanic effort, every bruised and battered toe in complete agony, Boxcars kicks the container off to the side. He can only count himself lucky that none of his guys are dumb enough to come close and risk either Boxcars's wrath or this kid's unique capacity for inflicting casual damage on innocent bystanders, because he's not exactly too fussed about where the crate lands. Both of his guys are still down for the count on either side of them, and this kid hadn't even been trying.

It's only mildly impressive and he will never admit that out loud. Anyone who can knock out two of Boxcars's men in under two seconds has...some talent. But he's pretty sure the whole thing was one massive fluke.

"She didn't mean it."
Boxcars blinks, and another kid is just there, and that's plain unnatural.

Cogitator and Ranger are definitely related, no matter what blather Die spews, or Boxcars'll eat his hat. Eat Diamonds's hat. Eating fucking anyone's hat. But where Cogitator's all sleek, deadly precision, right down to the immaculate arrangement of his hair, Ranger trips over her own stationary feet when the other Scratch kid drags her down no-so-subtly into a bow.

Which is weird. God, everything about these kids is weird. He fucking hates kids. Had to babysit Deuce's kid once and sweet mother of Mary, never again. If even one of these punks starts shooting lasers from their eyes, Boxcars is shipping them back to Die. No, to Antarctica. Somewhere he'll never have to risk seeing them ever again. The boss will just have to get over it - if they even stick around with the boss after -

"None of this bowing baloney, get offa the work floor!" he bellows. "Stay outta my peoples' way if you don't know what to do!"

"I can figure it out, I swerve - swear, sir!" Ranger pipes up, waving her hand over her bowed head in a circle as she attempts to lever herself upright. Cogitator just keeps applying pressure. "It's like tetris! I am a wiz at tetris!"

"It's not tetris, it's a goddamn criminal enterprise!" Boxcars jabs a finger at the stairway leading up to the second floor. "And you brats are infringin' on my smuggling operation! You needta stay in the office while I figure out what the hell to do with you!"

"Got it. Yes sir," Cogitator jumps in with a low mutter before Ranger can set off another fuse, giving a sharp, barely-there nod of acknowledgement. "We won't be in your way."

"Just off the top of my noodle, perhaps you could send us out in the field for some practice!"

Bolter beams down at him - and Boxcars is tall enough that that's really saying something. The third Scratch is also toting a shipping container, balanced on one shoulder, like it weighs nothing at all.

"What," Boxcars says slowly, "the hell are you doing?"

"Oh, it's like stacking blocks to solve the puzzle in an ancient, boobytrapped temple of the ancients, isn't it?" the Scratch enthuses. "Or like tetris!"

"Yeah! Exactly!" Ranger agrees.

Boxcars's foot gives a hearty throb of agony.

"I hate children I hate children I hate children -" Boxcars chants as he hauls the three Scratch kids up the stairs. One of his lieutenants, Charlie, shakes their head as Boxcars barges into the second floor office. Some other underlings are shooting him weird looks.

Because he's carting three grown-ass teenagers over his shoulders like sacks of flour. Because he looks like a crazy person.

Oh god. This must be how Di feels all the time.
No wonder she's always pissed. This is fucking undignified, is what it is.

The fourth Scratch kid is just sitting right where he last remembers seeing her, on a chair in the center of the room nowhere near any of the wall to wall viewing windows used to survey the floor below. Boxcars isn't even sure she's blinking. As he dumps the other three on their feet and smacks them upside the backs of their heads until they shuffle toward the other chairs, Boxcars includes Berzerker in the lecture that ensues just on the principle of the thing. "Clearly we've had some kinda miscommunication," Boxcars says, waving the rest of his people out with an impatient swipe of his hand. "What part a' 'siddown and shut up' was so hard for you?! Cause I can provide clarificance."

"Clarificati-" Ranger corrects cheerily before Bolter shakes his head frantically at her, and Cogitator steps on her foot. "Ohhh. Clarificance. No, we're good! So good!"

Boxcars glares at all of them. "I'll say it again anyway. I don't goddamn like you."

"Yeah, we kind of got that, chum," Bolter sighs, looking legitimately resigned to it.

"Yer a waste of my time. I got other fish to fry without having to worry about you shits bumbling in to bring the operation down around our ears."

Even Cogitator's hair is starting to wilt.

"So think of something actually fucking useful you can do for this test run nonsense," Boxcars finishes, feeling incredibly put upon, "and go goddamn well do it. As far away from me as possible."

Berzerker and Cogitator nod without expression, because of the four they're the two with the most sense in their heads. Bolter looks intrigued. Ranger's chewing on a strand of her hair thoughtfully, and god that bodes ill. He doesn't know what kinda alcohol she's got her hands on, but that shit must be potent; the thought that she just acts like a sloppy drunk as a regular part of her personality is too damn terrifying for Boxcars to contemplate.

"So it has to be useful," Ranger says slowly.

"Obviously."

"Can it also be awesome?" Bolter asks.

Instigators, both of them. "We gotta a terror alert high enough to hang ourselves on, and you want to - what, hold up a bank? Torch a local zoo?" Boxcars seizes the kid by the collar and shakes him. "I will personally feed you your own Daisy Dukes if you call Lacerator attention down on my ops - or worse, get us all on the Villain watchlist. Capiche, Lara Croft?"

"Uh. Right-o, sir!"

"Villains," Berzerker says. Her voice - Boxcars doesn't think he's actually heard her talk before, and to his private relief, the other three Scratch kids look just as startled as he feels - is smooth, not at all the disused whisper he was expecting, and just a hair deeper than Ranger's falsetto.

Then Ranger claps her hands together and is out of her seat in a flash, her tipsy gait amazingly absent as she reaches out and touches the dark haired girl's shoulder with a finger. Cogitator and Bolter both tense up and hold their breath as the girl says, excitedly, "Janey! A whole word! Say s'more!"

"Is this seriously an accomplishment?" Boxcars asks wearily.

"Well, yeah! Jane-Jane barely says anything these days!" Ranger's excitement fades a little. "Not since the operation, which was basically forever ago!"

"Villains," the other girl repeats. Not like a broken record, Boxcars thinks, his unease growing, but as though behind that silent, perpetually bored expression, wheels are turning. Switches are being flipped. Ideas are forming. Worms are wriggling in impressionable grey matter.

He shudders, and tries not to imagine a certain slimy thing oozing its way into his own brain. He fails miserably.

"Villains," she says for a third time, and Boxcars is ready to smack her a new one when at last she reaches her conclusion - "Heroes."

And, slow and deliberate, Berzerker bares her teeth at him in a dazzling, bloodthirsty grin.

Shit. This is not the direction Boxcars really wants this lecture to go. He starts sweating again, his foot throbbing, and he glances nervously at each Scratch in turn. All of ’em have gone slack jawed - even Ranger - and it turns his stomach because it’s the same look some of Diamonds's ditsier, crazier ones get; the look Deuce had the other day, lost in a daze as the thing in his head overwhelmed his conscious thought.

What the hell did Die load onto these kids' hard drives?

"Four of them are in town, right?" Bolter says eagerly, snapping out of his daze with a manic spark in his eyes, leaning forward. "And four of us -"

"Can't count on that," Cogitator grunts. "Last intel had a fifth and sixth traveling east to west, last seen in Chicago. Have to take them into account." He pulls a slim black and red PDA out of his pocket and starts typing up a storm, flicking diagram after diagram across the screen so fast Boxcars can feel a migraine coming on just trying to read them.

Oh god. Oh sweet, sweet Moby Dick. Die, why?! "Absolutely fucking not." Boxcars shakes his head wildly, clenching his fists and feeling the conversation already spinning out his control. "I can tell what yer plotting, and no."

"Why not, old chap?" Bolter asks, not even looking in Boxcars's direction as he leans in over the blond guy's shoulder. "They're top priority targets, no? Pose a high risk to your endeavors here? We can fix that up for you in a jiff!"

Berzerker settles flat blue eyes on Boxcars, and he feels a trickle of sweat wind down the back of his neck. Meeting her gaze is a mistake. That's when he really realizes how wrong he was to think that just because the girl was quiet and obedient, deaf to anything but orders, that she was a blank slate.
Something Die had crippled and hollowed out and twisted into a non-entity.

It's not blank boredom in that stare. It's silent, contemptuous intelligence, the kind Boxcars has only ever put up with from Diamonds Droog, and the thought that there might be a second crazy smart, crazy violent dame running around - one loyal to the Felt rather than the Crew - is enough to make him consider retiring.

"B-because that's the opposite of low key!" he insists, his tongue clumsy and his mouth dry. "And I gotta bone to pick with Heir and Hemogoblin. That's personal business, none of yours!"

Cogitator's eyebrow shoots up. His fingers keep tapping. "We can accommodate that."

And that's the thing. He doesn't know what they're capable of. Clubs mighta known, but look where that got him - him and Di both radio silent and neck deep in the void. All Boxcars knows is that all four of the experiments from Die's fucked up lab are vibrating in their seats, jolted by Berzerker's clever brainwave into barely repressed excitement, and that's not something Boxcars can just turn off. He doesn't have a way to control these kids if they push the issue, short of beating them into submission, and he could handle one - maybe two - but all four? All of them Doctor Die's handpicked test tube abominations?

"No," he says, with all the commanding presence he can muster. "I said no. You're not shitting on my work here by running off half cocked to bring hero wannabes down on my head, and half the police force along with 'em." Seattle PD aren't exactly going to be easy to bribe anymore, not after multiple explosions and suspicious bail outs for Crew operatives. Not with Diamonds, the only one who can really manipulate her police contacts without arousing suspicion, out of the picture.

"Could pretend to be unaffiliated," Bolter murmurs, and Cogitator nods sharply, almost jamming the other boy's eye out with the corner of his shades. Neither seems to notice the near miss, as though they're used to being in close proximity. "Shouldn't be a bother for you, sir!" he adds more loudly, smiling at Boxcars brightly. "It could even distract from Crew activities if we make enough of a rumpus!"

Berzerker is still staring, cold and calculating.

And fuck. Fuck. Diamonds said to keep his head down. To not start shit with these kids.

Boxcars can't swallow.

He looks away first.

As Berzerker grunts in what he knows, with a slow flop of his stomach, to be smug dismissal, Boxcars's eyes land on Ranger instead.

To his surprise, the fourth one - the one that got Di all pissy, he remembers - has drawn away from the other Scratches. She's always all over the other kids, scruffing hair and bumping elbows and nudging shoulders, but now there's a foot of space between her and Berzerker that wasn't there before, a hollow gap in the arrangement of the four freaks. Boxcars catches the oddest look on the girl's face - thin lips caught between worrying teeth, nothing like the brazen excitement radiating from her fellow shorties. Then she catches him looking, and goes bright pink, like she's embarrassed to have been caught, ducking closer to Bolter - away from Berzerker's throne - to chirrup, her voice falsely bright and cracking from the effort. Diamonds has never had to try that hard to sound like a girl, but then, Di has had years to learn how to pull it off. "And then we can bring them in, boss! Totes a win-win, right?"

It sounds weak. Boxcars squints when the girl chances a look at him, as though to see if he's bought whatever she's trying to fool him into believing - well, something; he still isn't sure exactly what's going on with her - and then she glances away just as fast, that strange concern still obvious on her face.

Well, if she has reservations about this plan, she ain't saying it aloud. And if she ain't gonna help him convince these other freaks that it's a terrible idea to start a showdown with a buncha smartass, very conspicuous heroes, Boxcars's hands are tied. He can't afford to be too obvious about opposing Felt initiatives, especially one that Die might have planted in the Scratch kids' brains. If this sudden, strange insistence on challenging the growing army of heroes opposing the Crew is something the doctor programmed into them -

"Fuck. Fine, you punks. Have it your way," Boxcars mumbles, yanking the brim of his hat lower with a pinch of his thumb and forefinger. The rim around his forehead is soaked with sweat, worse than his shirt. "Any peep about me or the Crew, and Die can bail yah out, because I won't cover all four of yer sorry asses with my bail budget."

"Yay!" Bolter squeaks, echoed half a beat off by a noticeably slower, hoarse yell from Ranger. Cogitator gets a shit faced little smirk as Bolter beats lightly on his shoulders in exhilaration.

Berzerker closes her eyes, and to all appearances shuts off, like a computer with the power cord unplugged.

But Boxcars ain't gonna be fooled by that again. Let these kids play their games. He can't afford to be stubborn about them. Hell, even holding a grudge about the two local hero brats is a luxury he can barely afford in this situation. He has to keep his head down and his hat squeaky clean, or more than just his neck'll be on the line.

He thinks he oughta take Di up on that suggestion. Pay a visit to a house in a tiny neighborhood outside of Seattle. The boss won't like it, but hell, the boss can -

Uh. Nothing. The boss is the boss. And that's all. No potentially mutinous thoughts in this head. No, sir.

God, he's shit at this. Diamonds couldn't say exactly how much omniscience the boss might have, either - enough to scare Di shitless, obviously - but not total. He can't read minds at a distance, right? Just intent and future intent. Something like that. Maybe?

"Yeah. Go nuts," Boxcars says, his voice tight. Bolter shoots him a pair of double finger pistols, but other than that Boxcars gets the distinct feeling that the four kids aren't really listening to him anymore. If they even listened to begin with.

Well. More power to them. He's officially washing his hands of this nonsense. Harrumphing deep in his chest, Boxcars frowns sourly at Ranger one last time and stomps out of the office before her squeak of guilt finishes reaching his ears. His fingers paw through his inside pockets for a cigar, one of the ones the boss man banned him from smoking in the penthouse ages ago. Implicit in the order had been the disdainful hint that Boxcars oughta stop smoking them entirely, but to hell with that. Boxcars needs his nicotine fix. He finds one in the very last pocket he checks, on the edge of panic and his fingers shaky over it, and when he lights it up and pulls in a drag of heavy, tarry smoke, it reminds him that he still has a job to do. Stopped at the top of the stairs, Charlie at his right should with a look of patient expectancy on their sun-burnt face, Boxcars overlooks the warehouse from the same spot as before, through a dense cloud of angry grey smoke.

"Get back to work," he mutters to Charlie at last. "We ain't got all week."

His lieutenant tilts their head back toward the closed office door, beyond which - Boxcars shudders - the four Scratch kids can be heard plotting away, unsupervised. "And them?" they ask.

All this talk is putting Boxcars off his cigar. "Let 'em do what they want," he spits, leaning an elbow on the railing as he settles in at his post. Let 'em go fuck themselves over, he thinks.

It's not that he's rooting for those prissy heroes, nah. It's just that he wouldn't mind seeing that hack's test tube pets get what's coming to them.

No. He wouldn't mind at all.

Karkat wakes up and nothing hurts.
This is incredibly suspicious, and he distrusts it immediately. Grumbling, he opens an eye and peers through the murky, opaque green of the fresh sopor slime, and wonders if Harley decided to try science to 'improve' it or something.

He has, in the course of the past few weeks, been blown up, traumatized by nightmares of a life he never lived, deprived himself of soporifics and sleep to the point of hallucinations and physical withdrawal, and been fucking demolished by a notorious mob boss. He has also been stabbed with extreme prejudice on multiple occasions, but who's keeping track of a little thing like that anymore?

The point is, his body has been through enough hoofbeast shit to have killed an ordinary troll, and this spontaneous recovery can only mean the cosmos has something even more painful (and, no doubt, humiliating) lined up for him. I'm overdue for a permanent maiming, right? he thinks sarcastically as he drags himself out of the gloopy embrace of the recooperacoon. Or maybe a good old-fashioned psychic evisceration. That's been in vogue since that last cliffhanger in The Psiioniic, it would be classic -

Karkat pauses with one foot on the floor and the other hooked over the rim of the 'coon, paralyzed as he frowns and counts the days in his mind. He's very aware that he's dripping tepid green slime all over the thick carpet of one of the Lalondes' many extraneous guest rooms, but the issue of manners is at the bottom of the pile of grubshit his mind needs to sort through at the moment.

First and foremost, the very tip of the pile, is the dawning realization that the latest issues of four - no, five - of the major comics he and John read would have, in fact, been released last Friday.

The shriek Karkat emits as he loses his balance and kicks over a wizard-patterned lamp in the ensuing panic might have been shrill enough to mildly irritate the dead, but it gets cut off when he snags his foot on the lamp's power cord and almost slams his chin down onto the edge of the 'coonside table. The teetering lamp finally topples over the edge of the desk, missing his nose by inches as it falls and thumps to the ground with a muffled thud.

...He seriously needs to get back in shape.

And then he and John are way overdue for a visit to the comic store.

JC-1996 watches.

She waits.

DS-2409, JE-1993, and RL-2408 bustle around in the isolated safehouse provided for their use by HB-CREW, in preparation for what is to come, while JC-1996 looks on. There is nothing she could do to assist in this part of the operation - she has set them into motion, as she has been told to do, and now DS-2409 and RL-2408 will handle the technological side of things. Neither she nor JE-1993 have the necessary hacking background to be of use at this time, but JE-1993 is flawed - not as badly as RL, but still imperfect - and seems to have convinced himself that by hovering around the computers he can somehow assist. As always, DS indulges him.

JC-1996 doesn't haven't many extraneous thoughts these days. They have all been pared away, and it is far more efficient, being like this - cold, clear, and hungry. But she thinks that perhaps DS's attachment to JE will need to be monitored. She has already reported it to 06-FELT on multiple occasions, but none of the synchronization treatments seem to have had much of an effect. JE loses his head and gets carried away, and DS permits it no matter how many times he is re-educated on the matter.
And RL, of course, runs wild. It makes JC’s brain ache to so much as look at her, these days, a persistent throb that she has also reported to 06-FELT and received medication for until she can return to the Base and be re-synchronized. RL is loyal to the FELT and their objectives, but some days JC thinks that’s the only part of their training that ever managed to stick. Certainly none of the other in-grown behavior control mechanisms seem to affect her. The other Scratch girl sits messily in her chair, occasionally plunking away at the keyboard, but also occasionally taking a swig of water from her plastic cup and pretending to clink it against JE’s as they engage in some paltry make-believe.

But the mission trigger seems to have been successfully implanted in the other three. HB-CREW might be under the impression that the Scratch team is here only for field testing, but then, he is CREW, not FELT, and therefore to be disdained. They will fight the Heroes, complete their mission objective, and bring glory to the name of the FELT.

They are going to kick some serious caboose.

JC returns to the task of polishing her forkkind. DS seems to be implementing an attack sequence in which targets HEIR and HEMO are ignored, as HB-CREW has requested. He is excellent with strategy, and intends JC to help RL in dealing with the powerful WITCH, while DS handles the KNIGHT. JE is to draw the local heroes away, and then stand by as backup in the event the SEER or any other heroes make an appearance.

But DS is not the leader here. He glances back at JC on occasion; he is synchronized enough that he knows who is truly in command, and he perhaps senses that JC has orders that contradict his carefully laid strategy.

HB-CREW ‘s whims are not to be tolerated. 06 has made their orders quite clear.

JC will fight HEIR.

There will be no mercy.

The Lalondes lived in Maple Valley for a few years back when John and Rose were in middle school, long before Karkat ever knew John. Yet somehow, in that short expanse of time, Doctor Rue Lalonde located and purchased over one thousand three hundred and twenty nine wizard-themed articles of furniture. Karkat knows this entirely unwelcome fact because Jade Harley has a sense for that kind of thing and a tendency to overshare. He wishes he didn’t know. The knowledge sits heavy on his mind as he cagily tries to go through his old exercise routine under the bulging eyes of a rotund garden gnome perched incongruously on the dusty bureau in the corner.

Is that thing watching him? Are those black, painted eyes a cover for a concealed camera? Has his paranoia reached new, wizard-inspired heights? Fuck if he knows, but now Karkat has worked himself up about it, and he stops mid-kick to stomp up to the wizarding gnome and turn it until it stares at the dark red patterned wallpaper instead. Ha. Take that, tiny wizard figurine. Stick that in your plastic wand and go fuck yourself.

Satisfied, Karkat wipes at the damp, reddish streaks of sweat trickling down his forehead, and launches himself back into a set of high kicks. He has to strain to kick around the height of an adult indigoblood’s head, all his muscles pulling and aching in protest and his ribcage occasionally giving a warning pang when he spins too abruptly or tries a maneuver that’s too bendy. But that’s what he gets for having the grubshit kicked out of him and taking almost a week to recover without even stretching a couple times a day. By all rights, he shouldn’t even be able to move. Diamonds Droog broke enough of his ribs that Karkat should have been laid up for weeks, even with his ability to seal up flesh wounds, uselessly lying around and contemplating the futility of existence in a malicious, possibly frog-shaped universe with an absolutely shitpanned sense of humor.

But he's starting to get that normal rules don't apply here. That the universe has decided to branch out and mess with him in even sicker ways than he'd thought possible. Not even his paranoid thinkpan could have imagined this fuckery. For fuck's sake, there are at least four people in this mansion who were fucking gods in a past life, and no one seems to have a single taintchafing clue what that makes them now. They're all trapped in one massively codependent clusterfuck of a cosmic conspiracy, and the only reason Karkat hasn't just washed his claws of the whole festering mess is that his moirail is neck deep in it, as per usual, and shows no signs of being able to dig himself out on his own.

"School," Karkat mutters to himself by way of inspiration. "Comics. Normal shit- ugh!" He attempts a backbend and instantly knows it's a mistake, his arms twinging and his sternum informing him on no uncertain terms that he fucked up; he winds up flat on his back, cringing into a ball to massage away the pang of over-stretched muscles. "Fuck. Normalcy, dammit." This time, he tries again and arches in a backbend for five seconds before his chest starts aching. He kicks his feet up and over and lands upright, arms pin wheeling as he regains his balance and pants heavily.

Unfortunately, the first thing he notices is that the round, framed portrait of Wizard, Interrupted is now right at eye level, glowering at him with melodramatic eyes under craggy white wizarding eyebrows. "Fucking. Piece. Of shit. Fuck," Karkat gasps, lurching over and tearing the entire painting off the wall to lean face-down on the carpet. God, he feels violated, honestly. No wonder Rose grew up so fucking weird.

They're all in this house straight from literal wizard purgatory because John's dad is pretty sure everything about John's secret identity is common knowledge among the Midnight Crew by now. Samuel doesn't say he's panicking, but also he's been wandering around the Lalonde mansion in a cold sweat, his tie backwards, as he tries to make sure the building's security measures are working, so Karkat can read between the lines. Samuel Egbert is more worked up about this than John himself most of the time, and that's saying something.

Diamonds Droog isn't exactly the kind of person anyone would trust to keep her word. Karkat has the distinct feeling that Samuel would have had John three quarters of the way to Manila with false passports days ago if Rue Lalonde hadn't somehow talked him around into using her unoccupied old house as a base from which to survey the old Egbert place and throw Crew spies off John's trail. It also means Karkat's identity is in jeopardy too, of course. It would be impossible for anyone to find out John's secret identity and somehow notice the oddly paranoid, Batman-obsessed, indeterminately rustblooded troll hanging around John and riding the bus into the city literally every night. Harley needed all of five fucking seconds to make the obvious connection, and even if someone managed to overlook all that, you'd have to be a total moron not to think that Karkat wouldn't be a target if Droog wanted a hostage or something to ensure Heir cooperates and doesn't interfere in the Crew's criminal affairs.

They've made an amazing mess of this whole shitty situation. Seriously, the shit has hit the air circulating device, and no one in this house has any idea of how to clean up the resulting carnage, except possibly to run away and never look back. Samuel Egbert is definitely in favor of that plan. But since Karkat has still not been able to pry a straight answer out of the man on whether or not Karkat would be informed as to John's whereabouts in the event the Egberts do abscond, he's decidedly not in favor of that plan. Any plan in which you lose your moirail is a stupid fucking plan.

There's so much potential for everything to go wrong, Karkat is pretty sure they could power a small city with the amount of kinetic energy they could bring to bear if everything explodes at once. He sweeps a kick over his head and comes down facing the opposite direction without a gasp of pain and counts that a win, because it's the only thing he can do. Whatever comes next, he can't be the weak act in the circus of crazy, traumatized people who are the ones calling themselves heroes. He wouldn't trust any of them to fight their way out of a wet paper bag, let alone protect John while he's at his most vulnerable.

Karkat's his partner, and he so far past terror and panic he's wrapped right back around to a kind of grim resignation to the fact that everything is awful and he can't rely on Harley or Dave or Rose to do more than cause problems. Maybe that's just him being pessimistic except is it really? They're going to have to meet Karkat's standards if they want to prove they're more than just potential hazards to John's mental health.

Once, you know, Karkat's in any shape to kick their asses.

So. In like, a week. Harley had better watch her back.

...Yeah.

Karkat sucks in a breath, and starts working with his other leg, the one with the bone-deep bruise that should by all rights still be aching. It supported him all through the first half of his work out, so how bad can it hurt?

It really fucking hurts. He keeps it up anyway until John comes to drag him downstairs for breakfast, gritting his teeth through the whole process. If they're actually going to risk their lives going to school this week with all of the Midnight Crew riding their asses, Karkat needs to be in the best fucking shape of his life, and he's nowhere near that.

Not yet.

Dirk contemplates the screen before him, two levels removed from the rest of his mind. Below him, there is a level occupied by something called DS-2409 - the part of him that follows orders, precise and logical and nothing more. It's a trick he learned a while ago - a way to split a part of himself off from the rest of him, and make sure that he can still control himself without giving away that he's doing it. If Dienek so much as suspected Dirk was still lurking in his own mind, able to work around all those unconscious triggers and command secretions, he'd carve DS-2409's frontal lobe up into sashimi.

He thinks if he hadn't mastered this, he'd be just as fucked up as Jane. God. The thought is terrifying.

He doesn't know how Roxy does it. She makes it look clumsy but easy to just shrug off the effects of the brainwashing like they're not even there. He'd managed to get her to a blind zone once, back at Base, and had tried to puzzle out how she stayed so de-synchronized, but Rox isn't exactly the best at explaining things in a way that makes rational sense. Mostly, Dirk thinks the problem is that Roxy doesn't know how she's doing it, either. Something in her brain has made her mostly immune to whatever the hell Dienek is doing to them, and neither she nor Dirk could figure out what before Itchy started sniffing around their hiding place, and they'd had to abscond.

So he has his own methods of keeping his mind sectioned off. It lets him watch out for Roxy and Jake when they accidentally deviate, and cover for them when Jane starts eyeing them too coldly. She's been informing on them for years, ever since the operation that broke her, and it's taken everything in Dirk's power to keep the four of them in one piece when one of them's been transformed into a killing machine.

Most of DS-2409 is busy hacking into three different systems at once. The first and most vital to what they intend to do is the emergency broadcast system, the one with access to most of the phones, radios, and television signals in the greater Seattle area, but that job is mostly done. This city's firewalls are pretty fucking weak compared to the ones Dirk and Roxy have dismantled in the past, and it's only a matter of moments before Dirk is uploading their pre-packaged message and set it to broadcast on repeat. Several of the disposable tester phones they stole earlier begin buzzing immediately as the emergency system pings them.

The second system is one that belongs to the Federal Villain Response Team, and Roxy has taken point on that one. She acts distracted, jostling Jake and entertaining him when he starts getting too twitchy, but she's a decent enough hacker that she finishes almost at the same time Dirk does. It's an important job, keeping Jake sane, one that Dirk hasn't been able to handle alone under the pressure of all the restrictions Dienek has placed on DS-2409. Jake and Jane were always more susceptible, and Jake's really only a quick drop and a sudden stop away from being just casually, brutally cruel as Jane has become. He's gleeful about serving Felt interests, overly fascinated by the thought of fighting the heroes, and completely without regard for anyone who might be hurt in the course of this mission, his old love for adventure twisted together with something more vicious, something that Dienek planted there, and it scares Dirk that he's no longer sure where Jake ends and JE-1993 begins.

Dirk's just playing damage control. Roxy's the one who's held them together.

But then Roxy is through the FVRT's defenses and Dirk has to focus on helping her with the next step. Hearts Boxcars may be a lot of things - and Dirk might have a hell of a lot of planted triggers telling him to distrust the Crew boss - but he's not wrong about the fact that they need to keep federal attention off the Crew and the Felt. The FVRT has close ties to both the counter-terrorism bureau and the Legislaceration Bureau by the very nature of its design, and Crew operations in Seattle are still too fragile to risk bringing the full weight the FVRT could bring to bear down on their heads. But there's no way this mission is going to be in any way discreet, so the best Dirk and Roxy can do is bandage up the leak by spamming the FVRT's mainframe with trojans and malware - anything to distract them from what's about to happen in Seattle in a matter of hours. It's a shitty plan, but the FVRT team isn't due in Seattle for a few more days, so it should be more than enough to keep them busy.

And the third system -

Is the Crew's own.

There is mutual distrust between the Crew and the Felt. Nominally, the joint organization operates under the name 'Midnight Crew,' but in reality the Crew and the Felt are completely separate entities, forced into uneasy cooperation only by the willpower of the Boss who leads them both. Dienek has made it very clear that even the Crew bosses are subordinate to Felt interests, whether the three know it or not.

So DS-2409 feels very little compunction about cracking into the Crew's files on the Heroes. There's not much here that isn't already in the Felt's more extensive dossiers on the four - the Felt have been far more interested in these heroes than the Crew have, after all - but there is more on Hemogoblin here. Dirk believes in having as much data to work with as he can, particularly when they're going up against people with super powers.

Boxcars doesn't want them fighting Heir and Hemogoblin. One look at Jane's eyeroll, and Dirk can already tell that's not possible to avoid. He'd rather be prepared when it does, and not be blindsided by what Hemogoblin can bring to the table in a potential free for all. There's a long, rambling file on the Puppeteer mostly written in fits and starts by Crowbar and Droog that gives DS-2409 a splitting headache when he tries to read it, so he grits his teeth and forwards it to Roxy's screen instead for her to peruse. The file on the Malachite Sylph, in contrast, is barely a paragraph long; aside from her connections to the Seer, no one in the Crew or the Felt has encountered her very often.

But Dirk can't afford to write her off. If she and the Seer have ended up in Seattle, Jake is going to be the one handling them, and that thought is terrifying, too.

"It's done," he says at last, short and to the point. Jane nods curtly, her blue eyes betraying a glint of predatory, wolfish hunger for a brief moment before it subsides back into her usual blank disdain.

There's a reason Roxy decided to come up with those stupid nicknames, and call Jane a Berzerker. Dirk isn't sure Jane can access all that pent up violence without Dienek here to trigger it, but he's learned that Jane can trigger herself sometimes, probably when Dienek's given her orders ahead of time. Certainly she triggered all of them today, pushed them right into a planted mission before Dirk could even try to head her off. DS-2409 had latched onto the plan to fight the heroes immediately, without question, while Dirk just grimly hung on and tried not to lose his sense of himself in the wash of single-minded intent that followed.

Jane and Jake are no longer themselves. Dirk knows that he's not himself, either, and he walks into the internal review labs every week wondering just how much more of himself he'll lose with this latest session. Wonders if he'll remember to protect Roxy, or if the next time he lays eyes on her he'll care even less than Jane does.

"And this'll definitely bring them running, old chap?" Jake asks excitedly, even though they've been over the plan so many times, his green eyes alight with an eagerness that makes Dirk tired at heart. Jake likes violence now, delights in it the way he used to enjoy adventure stories. And maybe the worst part is that Dirk can't remember exactly when that changed. He used to have enough of himself to memorize everything about Jake with a single-minded intensity, but now - now he's lost too much to DS-2409.

And DS-2409 doesn't care about Jake. Not unless it's within mission parameters.

"If it doesn't," Dirk grunts, closing the lid of his laptop, "you can probably just set a building on fire. They'll know it's us." Or at least, someone from the Crew - which is an impression that the four of them are trying to avoid. But on the other hand, Diamonds Droog and Hearts Boxcars both agree that explosions are a guaranteed way to get the attention of heroes in any given city, and when those two agree on how to handle field ops, it's a rare and precious thing.

"That would be fantastic!" Jake enthuses.

"But don't worry," Roxy says, fiddling with her hair as she twirls her rolling chair around, "Cogs and I are the most elite haxxors ever! We've totes got this in the bag! Now all we need to do is head to the rendzina - I mean, rendezvous."

There's nothing for them to pack up; they haven't been in the safehouse long enough to have done anything but access the computers. As they stride out the door, Dirk in the lead only because Jane slinks at the back, her silent eyes digging into his back as always, he thinks that this was the first time the four of them have been left alone since - ever - and not even once did they try to escape. No one even suggested that maybe they could stop to get something to eat, or explore Seattle, or find out what new movies have been released - something that Jake could once have been counted on to inquire about religiously whenever Dirk was allowed a spare moment at a computer with access to the outside Internet servers.
For Jane and Jake, there's nothing left but the mission. And when Dirk flicks his eyes to the side, trying to meet Roxy's gaze without Jane catching on, he realizes with a jolt that feels like being suckerpunched that Roxy's eyes won't meet his own; instead, she stares into the middle distance, as she's been doing a lot more often lately, without saying a word. Her feet carry her along, but aside from the tell-tale way she gnaws on her lower lip in worry, Dirk can't decipher what's going on in Roxy's head.

She's got something on her mind, and she hasn't told him what. They haven't exactly had many opportunities to talk lately; not since before her last review, at least. She's been acting more subdued than normal, still erratic and chatty when Dienek would rather all of them acted like Jane, but more and more that faked drunkenness seems just that - fake. Sometimes Dirk will catch Roxy with a concerned expression twisting her face, her lips tight and pale with the effort, her fingers digging into whatever unfortunate chair or table she has been standing near and leaving marks in the metal.

He can't bear to lose Roxy, too. But now he's scared he already has.

And for once, he doesn't know what to do.

"Jdsgnnacmtaschlwithus."

John is mumbling over pancakes. The pancakes are of uncertain but no doubt Egbertian origin, despite the fact that Samuel was last spotted (by Karkat, anyway) setting up an office/war room in what used to be a display room dedicated solely to statues of nonfunctioning household appliances encased in metal.

Not even Rose can explain that one. She just kind of drifts around the house smiling at framed JPEG wizard art in a haze of bitter nostalgia and when Dave coughs "irony" into his sleeves she somehow fails to contradict him.

The pancakes are fucking delicious, and possibly the only thing that can keep Karkat's attention from focusing on John to the exclusion of all else. They're damn good pancakes. "What'd you say?" he asks, still chewing on a delectable mouthful of fluffy golden pancakes. The two of them were talking at a totally normal volume about the math test neither of them has studied for, so the sudden muttering is too much for Karkat to process the first time around.

"Jade is. Uh. Look, it was totally her idea, not mine," John chatters, gesturing wildly with his syrup-sticky fork. His hair is even wilder than usual today, like it hasn't seen the backside of a comb in a couple of days - which it probably hasn't - and though he's less sickly looking than he was while being forced to confront all his repressed memories at once over the weekend, he's still got these enormous bags under his eyes that make Karkat want to pap them away and coax John into sleeping some more.

But he of all people knows what it's like when sleep isn't restful. Or helpful. So he satisfies the urge by swallowing the last gulp of pancake and pushing out from his seat to stand behind John, who's still babbling about Harley and school in a nervous mutter, and he begins the delicate process of combing John's hair with his claws. A flicker of breeze brushes over the backs of his hands and tugs strands of hair away from his claws until Karkat bats at it irritably and the wind subsides.

"She wants to be there in case there's an attack at school," is the explanation Karkat finally receives. "On account of, you're still hurt, and my head's kind of a mess? So she could teleport us out more reliably than I could with the windy thing if there's trouble. But I get if you're mad about it! Since you still kind of don't like her. Uh."
Karkat considers freaking the fuck out. For a good twenty seconds. That option has a lot of promise, okay. The weight of tradition and all that. Because it sounds like Harley is going to be hanging around and making the school day a nightmare, again.

He postpones his reaction by extricating a claw from John's impossibly tangled hair - good god, has he been drying it with a fucking tornado or something? - to pick up his mug of coffee and take a modest, pondering sip.

Who is he kidding. He drains the whole thing in a single swallow. Coffee is the elixir of sweet, sweet wakefulness, and when he stops drinking long enough to breathe he's braced enough by the fresh rush of caffeine to shrug and feel around in his pocket for a notepad and pen he's taken to carrying around instead of yelling. "I'll add it to the chart from hell. Under the 'potential shitstorms' category."

"The chart thing is actually a thing?" John asks.

"The 'chart thing' is so a thing. It's the healthiest fucking coping mechanism anyone has in this entire monstrously oversized fucking mansion and don't you fucking deny it, John."

It's enough to startle a happy chuckle out of John, sudden and surprised, as though he hadn't expected to laugh this morning. And that...that just makes Karkat's bloodpusher hurt to think; John's been so worn down lately that laughing seems like a rare occurrence. When John stops giggling like a dork, he tilts his head back so he's looking up at Karkat, his eyes scrunched up as he grins. "If you say so!"

Karkat sniffs. "I'm being a practical, organized friendleader. After all, I'm the only pantshitting wriggler here with all his nubs hatched in a row." He pats John gently on the cheek. "Don't worry. I shall lead your ridiculous human posse to victory like the generous and ever-prepared paragon of vigilance that I am. You're welcome, John. You're. Welcome."
