John bursts out laughing again. Karkat allows himself to crack a fraction of a grin as he unknots a stubborn cowlick at the back of John's head. He tries to smooth the hair into some semblance of order, but with every giggle another tiny inkling of the breeze seems to find its way back into John's hair to twist it around. John doesn't even seem to notice he's doing it, which is adorable enough that even the thought of having Harley tagging along all day like a harbinger of irresponsible good will can get downgraded from 'freakout worthy' to 'mildly annoying' in Karkat's brain.

"Oh god. Future-me #3 was right. You two really do need to get a room."

Dave wanders into the room in a casual state of disarray that's probably supposed to be ironic. John and Karkat are both dressed for school in jeans and superhero hoodies, but Dave is decked out in the same clothes he wore yesterday, with the air of one who has slept in an unholy amount and has every intention of going right back to sleep after obtaining food. The blond tosses himself onto the nearest chair to John with abandon, scooting a new plate of pancakes in front of himself and reaching for the bottle of syrup. "Appalling, both of you," he continues, light from between the curtains drawn tight over the window glinting off his shades as he upends half the bottle over his plate. "There are young impressionable minds in this house."

"Jade. I'm talking about Jade."

"Dave, you despicably opaque trashbag, you wouldn't know if this was an inappropriate display of romance if I slapped you upside the head with the broadside of a Harlequin Diamond paperback."

"Are you kidding? This is goddamn sordid, is what it is. A man should not have to wander in on two of his best bros getting their feels on." Dave produces a can of whipped cream and flicks the cap off with his nail, with the ease of long practice. "Rose assigned me and Harley homework on this shit.
"Why're you up, anyway?" John intercedes - which is good, because Karkat can feel the urge to slap Dave with the broadside of a Harlequin Diamond paperback warring with the equally powerful urge to test his new appreciation for high jump kicks on Dave's face, and the conflicting impulses are giving him a headache. They're both such good options. It's a pretty standard reaction to being within ten feet of Dave, to be honest. "Oh gosh...Dave, I don't think my dad will be happy about you coming to school, too! He's already worried enough about Jade coming!"

"Also, I fucking forbid it," Karkat adds, yanking on one of the knots in John's hair with more force than intended. "Sorry, John. Anyway, yeah, all complaints can be submitted to my corporeally challenged office, Strider. No school for you. I don't make the rules, I just enforce them with a bloody fist."

"Well, at least you're feeling perky today, huh, Karkles," Dave says. He smirks at Karkat's snarl, completely, to all appearances, unfazed. "Heheheh. But oh man, I haven't been to school ever in my entire life. I refuse to break my winning streak now."

"Wait, you've never been to school?" John repeats, sounding intrigued. "But I could have sworn you -" Then, abruptly, he breaks off. "Uhhh. Never mind me!" He smiles brightly at Dave, shaking his head a little.

Wrong life, Karkat thinks uneasily, clawing John's fringe back away from his forehead. It hasn't happened often, but then, John's been quiet lately. Maybe sitting on more slips just like that one, where his memories of one life don't quite sync with this one.

"Homeschooled since forever," Dave says without missing a beat, dousing his pancakes with the whipped cream. His plate is rapidly deteriorating and bears a startling resemblance to the aftermath of a hurricane - soggy pancakes drowned by moats of melted butter, treacly lakes of syrup, and smothering crests of whipped cream. "Have I mentioned Bro is a fucking human disaster? Guy is hella cool, don't get me wrong, but also such a dick. For like all of elementary school he tried to convince me England was a myth, the Cold War was started by Nazi robot velociraptors from the Arctic, and a meringue was a kind of swim suit."

"Somehow, that explains so much about you," Karkat says, rolling his eyes. "Homeschooled by that guy. No wonder. Was your stupid 'irony' a pre-req for every single class?"

"Irony," Dave says flatly, "was the mission statement. The pledge of allegiance. The mascot. Irony is a way of life." And with that, Dave sets down the whipped cream, picks up all three pancakes in one hand to roll into a cylinder, and crams the entire gory mess into his mouth.

Karkat's jaw drops. John gasps and starts applauding, his eyes wide and dull brown behind his glasses. Dave accepts the applause with both hands raised.

Karkat buries his face in John's hair and reminds himself that although John's choice in friends may be suspect, they're still his friends and Karkat needs to respect his life choices.

...Or he could yell at Dave for being a horrible influence.

Yelling has always worked out for him before.

-

Bolter has forgotten his name again.
It itches at him, and he scratches the back of his head in a token attempt to ease the itch before sighing. He's JE-1993, naturally, and the other code name is Bolter, the moniker good old Ranger thought up, the one he secretly prefers even though Doctor Die doesn't exactly approve.

But he used to have another name, didn't he? He just can't for the life of him remember what it was. Egad, he really is losing his marbles!

Ah, no matter! He can ask Cogitator when they next have a spare moment. Right now, there's danger afoot, and Bolter shifts his weight from foot to foot in excitement as he waits impatiently for Berzerker to explain exactly what dadblasted malarkey has got her arguing with Cogitator's foolproof plan right when they're on the cusp of giving those heroes what's coming to them.

"What Boxcars desires is irrelevant," Berzerker says, her voice rigid. "Implement a secondary strategy."

The thought of contradicting her is untenable. Cogs might be tiptop at coming up with plans, but Berzerker's in charge, no two ways about it. There's a twitch of wrinkles in Cogitator's forehead, but Bolter's sure that it's not really that much of a botheration to Cogitator to have to switch to a second plan. He's always got dozens of different plans whirling around in that great big brain of his; Bolter admires him for that quite a bit.

"You want us actively fighting four at once, instead of driving two out of the red zone," Cogitator says at last, pressing his fingers to the thin strip of plastic where the two triangles of his shades meet over the bridge of his nose. "Possibly six, if the Seer and the Malachite Sylph are in town, seven if the Puppeteer has shadowed the Knight. Jane, that's infeasible, even for us."

"Make it feasible. These are our orders," Berzerker says. "Do you not obey?"

And something tightens in Bolter's stomach, a gut instinct that has his head jerking up and all of his senses on fire, everything focusing in on Cogitator. Waiting for a response.

"Of course I do. It's just going to take time. Time we barely have," Cogitator replies, and Bolter feels all the air huff out of him with a whoosh. He hadn't realized he'd become so tense! He lowers his hands back to his side, and can't remember why or when he might have raised them in the first place. That happens, on occasion, but not usually around any of the other Scratches. Mostly around Crew members, because they're a potential liability.

Hmm. Oh well. He's sure it was nothing! Cogitator would never disobey orders; that would be preposterous!

And anyway, Bolter will have an opportunity to work out some of this tension shortly, when the heroes arrive. Finally, a chance to take on these boorish curs who've occupied so much of the Felt's time and give 'em the old one-two!

"Gonna need to rearrange things," Cogs is muttering, his phone in hand as he makes some last minute calculations. They've met up in a parking garage, next to one of the outer walls with a view of the city visible between the concrete half-wall and the roof. The weather's a dull, dismally boring grey outside, so the other boy's hair has a silvery cast to it, rather than the faded, sandy blond Bolter knows it to be. "Almost all of us will need to take on two at a time." He pauses, head bowed, and then says slowly. "Jane - you want them."

"Yes."

"Done. Jane handles Heir and Hemogoblin," Cogitator says, dragging something down the screen of his phone. Bolter leans in to watch, bouncing on his toes before settling with one arm bumping against Cogitator's. "They're basically guaranteed to show up; getting rid of them was going to be more trouble than it was worth."

Ranger's hand shoots up. Bolter twitches and nearly jumps out of his own skin, it's so sudden, and it takes a good few seconds before his heart stops racing. "I wanna fight the seeing one!" she says, her legs wide in a v as she kicks out her feet and sits on the hood of a dark blue car. She's been biting her lip for some time now, but now her eyes are fierce and certain as she waves her hand around. "C'mon, Cogs, do mamma a solid!"

"The Seer?" Cogitator's voice is tight. "She might have the Malachite Sylph as backup, Rox, and I've got fuck all on her. I wouldn't know what you were going up against. You've handled the Witch before ."

"Yeeehah, and it was boring and kind of sad-making!" Ranger pouts, batting her eyelashes at Cogitator and clapping her hands together. "Plus, she'll totally remember the whole sniping thing, this time around, so it won't work again. Lemme fight someone else!"

"I can tangle with the Witch, Cogs," Bolter offers. He beams when the two blond heads whip around to look at him; Jane is resting her eyes or something over in the dark corner by the stairwell, only the red of her goggles, shoes, and forkkind standing out in the shadows, so he thinks she at least doesn't disapprove, which is all that matters when it comes to Jane these days. One always knows when one has gotten a foolish, wrong-headed notion stuck in one's noggin when Jane starts squinting at you! It's quite handy! "Her sharpshooting versus mine - we'll sort out who has more of a knack for it!" He pats the pistols as his hip for emphasis - then, mentally, he runs through the ones holstered under his arms, over his shoulder blades, at the small of his back, and on the outsides of his calves.

"I don't like it," Cogitator says, drumming his fingers on the phone and rocking back slightly. "We don't know how much firepower she can actually bring to the table. No one knows, not when she can pull weapons out of thin air. If she's got the wolf with her - even more radicals I can't account for. Once she knows where you are, you're finished."

Bolter presses a hand to his heart, miming as though he's been shot. "Cogitator! You wound me! You think so little of my hand to hand prowess? Of your own inimitable planning capabilities! I know you'll see us through to victory!"

"Inimitable, huh," Cogitator mutters, but he's back to drawing diagrams on his phone with a purpose rather than hesitating, so he's at least considering the idea.

"Peerless!" Bolter assures him, and it wins him a brief flicker of a smile that barely flutters at the corner of Cogs's mouth. "And you, bosom friend?"

"Only two potentials left," Cogitator says, his expression flattening out again. "Flashstep - the Knight's definitely in town at Droog's last report. We don't know if the Puppeteer might have followed." He runs his fingers through his hair, even though it's already perfect. "But no. Yeah. I should be the one to handle them."

Bolter gives a small, rousing cheer that Ranger joins him in, and the two of them exchange wide grins. Ranger can always be counted on to be up for a good challenge, even if she is a little unpredictable sometimes. As they settle in to wait for the heroes to react to their summons, Bolter can feel the tension winding up in his muscles, and he moves closer to the gap in the wall, knuckling at the grey concrete and scanning the overcast city before him. They’re a little distant from the downtown area of the city, so most of the buildings around them are no more than five stories tall, and he wonders if Ranger will choose one of them when she's moving into position. There are plenty of little roads and grassy areas between the low, splayed out buildings – so not many potential places for a sniper to set up shop. Only one, really, and Jake can see from here there would be some logistical difficulties in trying to secure that location. She's far more the long-distance shooter than he is, though she's a bit slower on the draw - to each their own, of course! But when the time comes, no doubt Cogitator will direct them all to the most advantageous positions from which to draw off their designated target, and depending on what his calculations tell him would be the best approach for Ranger to take, that will settle that.

"Ready for this, Jake?" Cogitator mutters, still at Bolter's side. Bolter can already see that the other boy is preparing himself mentally; no longer drumming his fingers or running finger through hair, but standing perfectly poised to leap into battle at any moment.

"Jake?" Bolter repeats, distractedly.

Cogitator doesn't clarify.

- They stop by Karkat's house.

This is a terrible mistake.

"Are you sure you want to do this?" John asks, dubious, as he eyes the door from the passenger's seat. "'Cause we only have half an hour."

"And me!" Harley points out, leaning in. Her hair is in two braids today, far more neat and orderly than Karkat has ever seen her hair behave, and he thinks Rose might have had a hand in that. "I can get us there in a snap, don't worry!"

"Stop reminding me when I'm busy trying to forget that over here," Karkat mutters, unbuckling and nudging the car door open. He steps out and turns back to the interior of the car to scowl at John and Jade.

Two twin, expectant faces stare back at him.

Karkat opens his mouth, decides it's not even worth it at this point (he needs to conserve his fury for what lies ahead), and shuts it again with a clack of teeth. "If I'm not fucking back in ten minutes, get the hell in there and pry me from that imbecile's big, meaty claws."

"But he loves you!" John says with a huge grin, because John is an idiot.

"It doesn't know the meaning of the word. As far as that monster is concerned, 'love' is an annoying attachment mechanism born of a millennia's worth of evolution that culminated in a creature with the sole goal in life of making my life a living hell."

"Really?" Harley says, resting her chin on her fist.

"No. Karkat pretends not to like his lusus sometimes, that's all," John says, shrugging.

"I mean every word, John, and don't you dare tell her otherwise." Karkat pouts and allows just enough of a pause for John to reach out and pat his hand conciliatorily before he heads for the front door. It's another overcast day, and as Karkat digs through his pockets for his keys in a jangle of metal he glances down at the raggedly kept front lawnring. The neighbors' is immaculately trimmed, so the border between his house and the other is even more jarringly embarrassing. But both lawns look faded, like the grass is dingy and greyed out, and when Karkat looked out the window earlier today, most of the neighborhood had the same pallor. The clouds sit thick and heavy overhead like winter's decided to pay a return visit, but it's not chilly; the air's too still for that. Something's off, and Karkat can't quite wrap his recovering, measly excuse for a puzzlesponge around it.

Then he notice, at last, a loud, distorted murmur coming from inside the house. Even before he jams his key in the lock, all thoughts of the weird weather get lost in the certainty that his neighbors are going to kill him if Crabdad has done what Karkat thinks it has done. "I will dump you in boiling water and the lusii control people can drag your steamed, tenderized carcass to the reserve seasoned with Old Bay, you absolute piece. Of. SHIT!" Karkat bellows before he's finished shoving the door open.

His house is once again a disaster zone. Crabdad has been alone without Karkat to minimize its rampaging custodial instincts for several days, and the house has paid dearly for his neglect. For a full minute, the sheer amount of mess is simply too much for Karkat's beleaguered thinkpan to process. First and foremost, the wall directly across from him bears a single, enormous scratch clear through to the electrical wiring, as though a large pincer caught on the wallpaper, but also - more inexplicably - several scorch marks trail across the wall at sharp angles as though Crabdad actually managed to create fire. The carpet of the stairway has been completely uprooted and left leaning in a rumpled wave along the front hallway. Empty ice cube trays lie scattered across the damp floor, and in the kitchen the sink is running, with every pot Karkat has ever owned filled to the brim with water and arranged on every available surface. In the living room the couch has been shoved up against the far wall and most of the cushions disgorged of their stuffing. The television blares the news at the highest possible volume setting, the voices of the two news anchors the same ones that Karkat could hear having a conversation from halfway down the front walk.

Then, with a skree, the culprit itself appears at the top of the stairs.

"AND IN OTHER NEWS THE RECLAMATION OF NEW YORK CI-"

"You senile spawn of a brackish rock pool -"

"SKREEEEE!" Crabdad jumps the entire stairwell, its legs creaking as it lunges for Karkat with widespread pincers and a joyful shriek.

"-WELL, THOUGH SOME HAVE QUESTIONED WHETHER THE DANGER HAS-"

Karkat yanks the door shut behind him before dodging out of the way. Crabdad slams into the door in a clatter of spindly limbs, the spines that run along the spine of its shell flared up as it twists its knobby head around to peer at Karkat in confusion. As though he'd actually sit around like a complete fuckface and wait for the sea monster to tackle him.

He could have had a nice sheep lusus, or a giant horned hopbeast, or any other one of the thousands of warmblooded, landdwelling lusii out there. But noooo. He had to get saddled with a fucking mutated freak of a marine custodian.

"Did you try to torch the place?! That's a new low, even for you!" Karkat accuses, and then he shrieks and has to cartwheel out of the way when Crabdad shoves off the door and flings itself bodily at him. Moving hurts, dammit, and he lands in the living room, where it becomes clear that yes, Crabdad has made an attempt to watch the television. The screen is riddled with tiny cracks and the remote has been crunched beyond recognition, several of the buttons stabbed out of their sockets and the plastic case cracked down the middle. Classic signs of a ham-handed custodian dicking around with Karkat's nice things. He hates to think what his comic book collection looks like right now.
Karkat can't even begin to figure out where the volume buttons might have ended up before something hooks the back of his hoodie and reels him in. "KREEEEE!" Crabdad whines at the top of its lungs, plaintive and ululating as it crushes Karkat against its carapace.

"You're crushing me, fuckface, now put me down this instant," Karkat screams back, his throat scratching at the effort needed to out-yell both the lusus and the television. He realizes he has dropped the remote, and is forced to scrabble and claw at Crabdad's limbs ineffectively in an effort to reach the remote again. Crabdad is having none of that, of course; it just spins Karkat around in a circle, rubbing the painfully bony underside of its chin against the top of Karkat's head in some sick, sick display of custodial affection. "I need to go to school! Schoolfeeding, you horrific creature of the shitty abyss, I have to go!"

"KREE?"

Oh god, yes, they're finally making some progress. "Yes! School!"

"AND NO COMMENT FROM THE TWO MOST PROMINENT COLDBLOODS IN THE AREA, THE CON-"

Karkat is jerked away from Crabdad's chest to be held at arm's length while the crustacean inspects him with all eyes blinking. With all the self-control he can muster, Karkat waits for his custodian to put two and two together.

"...Skree?" it whistles.

His self-control gambit tanks. "I'll deal with you later!" Karkat says, squirming and trying his best to kick Crabdad between the eyes, but the angle's all wrong. Finally, he jams the claw of his thumb into the palm of his hand and smacks the bleeding wound against one of the lusus's claws holding him up off the ground. A pulse of red, and he jams the blood out in the form of a spike sharp enough to jab through a crack in the lusus's shell. Crabdad lets out a skree of pain rather than inquiry, and Karkat is released. He lands on the balls of his feet and rolls, lunging for the remote control as Crabdad beats a hasty retreat to the kitchen.

"NO PROGRESS MADE IN ANALYZING THE NEW DOME-"

Then it hits Karkat what he's just done, and he stares at the blood knife kind in the palm of his hand in horror. "Oh, fuck. Did I just stab - fuck," he says, horrified. "I'm turning into him."

Because that's exactly what Karkat needs right now - to start stabbing things on reflex, in gory homage to Spades fucking Slick.

One of these days he's going to reach sarcastic critical mass and collapse in on himself. He can only pray he takes Crabdad down with him when the time comes. Seriously, how much longer does he have to put up with this annoying fuck? He can't even remember the last time he heard from the lusus control departme-

"AND IN LOCAL NEWS, SEATTLE IS STILL UNDER A HEIGHTENED TERROR ALERT-"

Karkat groans, steps over the remote, and yanks the television's power cable out of the wall socket.

-

Roxy has a plan.
Said plan runs...somewhat counter to Cogs's plan.

She just hopes that when the time comes, he's not toooo pissed at her.

He'll understand. She has to do it.

Has to.

Roxy bids Jakey and Dirk an inattentive goodbye, and skirts Janey nervously as she makes for the stairwell to head up to the top floor of the parking garage to get a better view of things.

All the while, there's a tremor in her fingers, in her hands, in her heart, a too-quick thud as her heart races along.

But this is the only thing she can think of to do.

This is her only shot.

- They make it all the way to lunch before shit hits the fan.

Karkat is frankly surprised they got that long of a break. They're outside when it happens, and Harley is busy climbing up the limbs of John's lunch tree because she's a terrible influence, so they don't learn until later that everyone in the lunch room - in the entire school, for that matter - gets the same text at the same time.

"You got a text too?" Karkat says, not bothering to look up from his sandwich. John's dad made it, which means it's basically the most delicious BLT ever crafted by mortal hands, and must be eaten with great care because John is pretty sure there's got to be some kind of prankster's gag hidden in it somewhere. John is rarely wrong about these things; he's had to live with his dad's weird specibus specialization for years, after all.

"Yeah but - oh, holy crap, my dad's texting me too now, hang on." John grimaces and sets down the apple in his hand so that he can type with both thumbs. "Dad, what the heck! I thought he promised he wouldn't freak out like this again! Jeez!"

"What iss it?" Harley calls down from where she now sits perched tens of feet above, her braids swaying in the faint freeze. It's the most breeze they've gotten all morning; Karkat's pretty fucking sure that there's some kind of permanent draft around this tree and that John's probably responsible in some way. Fucking hell, Karkat's been eating here for years with this kid and never once realized that the weird, out-of-place gust of wind might be a sign of, oh, he doesn't know, something incredibly suspicious?! Like, per-fucking-se, one’s lunch companion having wind powers?! "Heeey, did you guys get a text too? What's yours about?"

Okay. No. He's not getting worked up about this again. He and John were both equally idiotic. Their respective gene pools were literally scraping the bottom of the barrel of incestuous slurry when they cobbled together the code for John and Karkat's intelligence quotient. It's over and done, now. "We have no fucking idea!" he calls back up at Jade, and then, grumbling to himself, Karkat thumbs open the text message on his own phone while John becomes increasingly bewildered by whatever the hell his dad is messaging him about. He takes a long sip of his bottle of orange juice, as he casts a discerning eye over the contents of the message.

He does not spit the juice everywhere when he realizes what he's reading. That's fucking slander, spread around like the black plague by Harley's tender, gossiping ministrations later on. No, Karkat just lets his jaw drop a little after swallowing, and he has to reread the message three times before it makes any sense.

THIS IS NOT A TEST OF THE EMERGENCY ALERT SYSTEM.

WE SCRATCH KIDS CHALLENGE ALL HEROES PRESENT IN THE SEATTLE AREA TO A DUEL.

FAILURE TO SHOW WILL BE TAKEN AS EVIDENCE OF SAID HEROES BEING HELLA LAME. AND CIVILIANS WILL PAY. FACT.

COME TO THE INTERNATIONAL FOUNTAIN IF YOU TAKE YOUR SHIT AS SERIOUSLY AS WE DO. WE ARE HERE. WE ARE WAITING. WE HAVE REALLY SHARP WEAPONS AND RAD GUNS.

REPRESENT, MOTHERFUCKERS.

"Well, I guess we know why your dad is losing his shit," Karkat says. “How the fuck did they get both of our numbers?”

John makes a noise somewhere between the squeal of helium leaking out of a balloon and a mourning humpback whale, his face slowly turning a disturbing shade of puce.

Harley lands next to Karkat lightly in a cloud of fabric, pollen, and hair, and Karkat nearly falls over into John's lap trying to dodge her while still sitting down. She has her own phone out and is inspecting it with one of the extra lenses on her glasses pulled down. She squints and wipes at the screen with the hem of her purple shirt. "Huh. Do you think this is meant for us?" she muses, elbowing Karkat in the side.

He flinches and starts making a good faith effort at crawling up John's arm to try to reclaim some personal space away from Harley. "I don't fucking know, Harley, what do your amazing powers of scientific deduction tell you?" Karkat demands.

"Probably that it's meant for us!" Harley replies cheerfully. "The key phrase is 'all heroes,' after all!" She snaps her fingers in some kind of eureka moment. "Ohhh, that means Kanaya and Rose are invited too! Sooo coo-

"Oh my god, are you alright?!"

All three of them look up to see a teacher striding towards them from the open door of the lunchroom, one of the ninth grade English teachers if Karkat remembers right - hey, it's not like he was here for freshman year; he has no reason to know even that much about the lower grades. She looks existentially harassed as she irritably tucks a strand of hair behind one of her horns, a state of being that Karkat fervently sympathizes with, because he's been suffering under the same conditions for basically his entire life. "You fell," the troll says, her concern directed mostly toward Harley, and oh fuck they're in trouble.

"Yeah, I'm fine! No worries!" Harley says, flashing a reassuring smile. Because Harley is the kind of indiscreet paintthuffer who leaps from tall trees without caring about the fact that both her legs should have been broken by the fall.

"You jumped out of a tree!" the teacher repeats, stomping towards them with a vengeance and folding her arms over her ruffled shirt. "What were you thinking? That was a fifteen foot drop! Why aren't you three inside the cafeteria with the other students?"
John surges to his feet and Karkat follows on instinct, checking himself and pretending to become fascinated with the tree in question as John loops his arm with Harley's and smiles winningly at the teacher. Maybe if Karkat stares despairingly off into the distance long enough, the teacher will think he doesn't know who these two idiots are and leave him to wallow in his own misery in peace. "I know! We'll make sure she gets to the nurse's office," he says. Harley opens her mouth, and Karkat almost snorts with laughter when John steps on her toe with the heel of his foot. When John of all people steps on your foot, it hurts. "Come on, Jade, doesn't your butt hurt or - something? Anything?"

When Karkat cancels his despair-fuelled staring contest with the tree, he sees John is winking furiously at Harley, who looks a little baffled before very, very obvious realization lights up her face and she starts to play along. "Yeah! Now that you mention it! I landed kind of hard! On my butt!"

Karkat slaps his own face and considers how practicable it would be to strangle himself with his own hoodie drawstrings out of embarrassment by proxy. He considered this scenario several times in the past, and come to the conclusion that yeah, if he removed the drawstring and ruined his hoodie forever more, it would probably work just fine as a garrote or something when the time comes and the number of fucks he has left to give implode.

But he really likes this hoodie.

"Hurry along, then. Lunch is over. All students are to return to their first period rooms," the teacher says, shaking her head and clearly not convinced at all by John and Harley's incredible display of shitty acting.

"Huh? Why? Did something happen?" John asks, brows furrowed as he reaches out behind him and waits for Karkat to clasp his hand before hustling Harley back toward the cafeteria doors.

"The school is in lockdown," is the answer, and Karkat nearly trips headlong over the threshold of the door as the teacher ushers them back into a cafeteria full of the rustle and murmur of high school students chattering to themselves. All eyes look up, scan the three of them, and dismiss them before every student goes back to their intense conversations.

It's fucking freaky. Usually this close to the end of lunch period, everyone is basically shrieking to be heard over all the other conversations, and the stoners are lined up at the cashier's station in a desperate bid to wheedle the last of the pizza out of the cafeteria workers. But everyone is huddled in their seats, bent over their phones and communicating only in whispers. The teacher provides no more by way of explanation before hurrying off to join the other supervising teachers at the exit doors, where they seem to be releasing the students back to their classrooms one table at a time.

"Over here," John whispers, and Karkat squeezes his hand before letting go and stuffing his claws back into his hoodie pouch as they approach the table where four members of the swim team sit, as far from the exit as possible. They're okay, as far as people in general go, but they're John's friends, not Karkat's, and he's not comfortable with PDA when other people are watching. "Guys, what even?" John says, scooting onto one of the benches and dragging Harley down with him.

"Taken a look at your phone recently?" one of them answers, a violetblood with red-rimmed glasses, as he holds up his flip phone and spins it so the butterfly phone charm clacks against the side. Karkat tries not to make eye contact with him, ever, because that's just the policy he has around coldbloods who could disembowel him if they ever got too good of a look at his eyes without contact lenses. It's a fucking sensible policy and he sees no reason to change it. Ever. "Everyone got the same weird message, and then the teachers started bugging out because they all got calls from the emergency alert system. Sounds like the administration just wants us all in lockdown until they figure out what's going on."
"Well, that's not happening," Harley says too loudly, tossing one of her braids back over her shoulders and lacing her fingers together, stretching her hands palm out in front of her. "Where's a place we can -"

"Shut up," Karkat hisses before Harley can finish whatever no doubt suspicious thing she was about to say. He darts a glance at the four swimmers, but the three who nodded in welcome to John without pausing have already started talking about whether swim practice will be canceled, and the violetblood's been drawn back into their heated debate. "Not in public, Harley, fuck."

"The bathrooms are still open, but it'll look totally dumb if all three of us go at the same time," John says in an undertone, rubbing his temples. "Teachers will notice."

"Wait five minutes, then," Harley says, shrugging, and she pushes up from her seat. "I'll see you guys later!" she says, humming to herself as she sidesteps between the crowded tables and sashays her way into the female-identifying bathroom. None of the teachers head her off, too preoccupied with cajoling a bunch of cheerleaders into paying attention.

"She just does whatever the fuck she wants, doesn't she," Karkat says, taking off his glasses and pressing the heel of his palm into his right eye as the room blurs fuzzily around him. It's only been half a day with the contact lenses and his head has started aching; he hasn't worn them as much over the weekend, surrounded by people who know and didn't really give two fucks about his hemotype since they had their own secret identities - or lack thereof - to worry about, and now it feels like getting used to the constant distortion of his vision all over again.

By the time he's put the glasses back on, John has sighed heavily and flopped down a little in his seat, smiling ruefully. "Well, she does get stuff done!" he says, shrugging. "She's always been so enthusiastic about things!" He says it with a fondness that doesn't entirely match up with the fact that they only met Harley about a week ago; it's the fondness of years of friendship, and Karkat doesn't have to say a word before John winces and catches his slip. "Uh."

"It's fine, dumbass," Karkat interrupts before John can retract his comment or apologize or something else stupid like that. When John stammers, he snorts. "You seriously think it would bother me that you mix up memories sometimes? I like knowing what weird shit is going on in your thinkpan, remember? Helps me make sure you don't wander off and poke your eye out, or ignore important shit and let it eat at you until it actually is unhealthy." He does a spot check to make sure the teachers are still busy, rubbing his temples. "Uh."

"It's fine, dumbass," Karkat interrupts before John can retract his comment or apologize or something else stupid like that. When John stammers, he snorts. "You seriously think it would bother me that you mix up memories sometimes? I like knowing what weird shit is going on in your thinkpan, remember? Helps me make sure you don't wander off and poke your eye out, or ignore important shit and let it eat at you until it actually is unhealthy." He does a spot check to make sure the teachers are still busy, and stands up.

John joins him, doing his best to act inconspicuous, but John is way more noticeable than Karkat so the troll huffs and switches sides so that he's concealed behind John rather than the other way around, which would never work in a million fucking years. "I just don't want to worry anyone," John says, his voice too small as they duck into the restroom. "It's not like my head's any more messed up than usual; it's just that now I know more about how it's messed up. It'll just weird people out if I'm talking about stuff that didn't happen all the time."

"Pretty sure you've managed to get this process backwards," Karkat says, rolling his eyes. "Now that we know why your pan's a disaster, we can do more to get it back together again." He drops his volume for once, with great effort, as they walk past the mirrors over the sinks and come to a halt to wait for Harley. "And I'll stop worrying about you when we're both deader than my shriveled up, fury-infested soul, John, so good luck with that," he adds, resting his forehead on John's shoulder.

"Harley patented pale-block interruption, coming through!" Harley announces as she appears in a burst of lime green. She comes so close to the far wall that it almost looks like she's walking through it rather than teleporting around it by meddling with the fabric of the universe. Karkat's still not used to that. "You dorks ready to rumble?"
"Yeah," John says, though in Karkat's opinion this impromptu jam should probably have lasted another ten minutes before he'd say John was over this latest dip in his mood. John's smoothing over his issues instead of dealing with them, again. "Let's meet up with everyone else and find out what they want to do."

Harley's eyes glow green. "No problem!"

-

DS: Sound off.
RL: here!!
JE: Ahem! Reading you loud and clear bro!
JC: .

DS: State your positions, everyone. And Jane, take it easy with the radio silence horseshit. There's only one hope for this mission to avoid insolvency, and that hope lies in everyone keeping me abreast of their current status and not clamming up right when they need assistance to salvage their asses from the trash heap of failure.
JC: If that's what the mission requires, DS-2409.
JC: I am on your five o'clock.
DS: Meritorious, yo. Jake?
JE: Some harridan just attempted to oust me from my position but i gave her the old run around and i believe she has lost interest in me. She seemed to think that i was up to some skullduggery and i cant imagine what gave me away!
RL: lmao jack
RL: if u were 2 look around u would toytes notice were all dressed up in black leather and p much everyone else is in normal cloths
RL: * totes
RL: atm you are probs the most shady charracter shes seen all day
RL: ur shadier than cogss shades congrats
JE: Oh wow! tugs at disreputable collar with sweaty mitts
DS: Roxy? You're secure?
RL: yaya
RL: srsly cogss i got this DS: Really?
RL: rly rly
DS: Why is this not reassuring me, Roxy.
RL: le siggnnnn
RL: i dont see u micromanaging ur jakey poo and his new elderly lady friend over yonder
JE: Well i wouldnt be so spurious as to call her elderly...
RL: a n c i e n t~~~
DS: Micromanaging is what I do. That is the literal definition of my job. It is basically the indefatigable fundament upon which the unstable ziggurat of our first trial run must be built and somehow, impossibly, reach its nadir.
DS: So please tell me you've got this.
RL: bor
RL: * BRO
RL: i got tihs
RL: in RL: the bagg
RL: winnkwnoks
JC: .

-
Karkat misses the part where John finishes negotiating with his dad to convince him they need to go out to confront these Scratch kids. He assumes there's a lot of stern fatherly frowning, countered by earnestly sincere arguments on the part of the offspring, because human custodian-child relationships tend to involve a lot less incoherent shrieking and accidental demolition of furniture than lusus-troll negotiations. (Unless you're a Strider, in which case casual destruction and mental trauma are apparently a fact of life.)

Either way, John emerges from the Lalondes' display room-turned-office looking shaky and pale but with a thumbs up that means he and Samuel Egbert reached some kind of heartwarming, hard-won compromise. Of course, with civilians being threatened in that initial message - one that Karkat, John, and Harley came back to the mansion to learn had been broadcast on the television's emergency alert system, as well - Karkat can't imagine that Dad Egbert, the one who taught John all of that kid's strict heroic moral code, would try to discourage them from meeting this challenge. Heir has to get it from somewhere, after all.

But yeah. Karkat misses all that.

 Mostly because these assholes are trying to ditch Karkat to go off and do the hero thing on their own, just because of a little thing like him having been gravely injured last week.

He is completely justified in performing a spectacular jackknife off the fucking handle.

"LOOK ME IN THE EYE, HARLEY."

"It's not -"

"LOOK ME IN THE EYE AND TELL ME YOU'VE FORGOTTEN WHAT HAPPENED THE LAST TIME I LET YOU INBRED SEEDFLAPS DRAG JOHN OUT ON THE JOB WITHOUT ME."

John freezes with one foot out the door of the office, mouth agape. His father appears behind him, his suit as impeccable as ever as he removes the unlit pipe from the corner of his mouth to stare at the five young people standing in the poorly-lit, absolutely fucking massive living room. There are empty pedestals and dusty wizard statues scattered around literally everywhere, and a heavy brocaded sofa with the plastic cover lying crumpled on the floor where Dave dumped it in his quest to find somewhere suitable for lounging and/or lying in a daze as he zones out for the fifth fucking time.

"But you're still injured!" Harley blurts out, planting her fists on her hips as she glares him down. She's already in uniform of course; she snapped her fingers and changed right after they teleported back to the house. "You should be resting!"

Karkat is fucking offended. "Do I need to kick your ass?!"

"No, dummy, I think you need to lie down!"

"BECAUSE I WILL KICK YOUR ASS TO PROVE A POINT."

"Isn't there an emergency?" Dave drawls. He has a stuffy purple couch cushion resting over his head, so it comes out muffled. "My crisis senses are tingling. Or maybe that's indigestion."

Karkat rips the pillow off Dave's face and tosses it to the side. "I agree with you of all people. There's an emergency. DO YOU KNOW HOW MUCH IT PAINS ME TO SAY THAT OUT LOUD?!"

"No, but I know how much it pains me to hear it," Dave replies, cracking his neck to one side and digging into his ear with a pinky finger. "Shout a little louder, Karkat, I'm not sure you achieved the volume needed to liquefy solid walls, yet."

"Stop being a truculent jackass and tell Harley I'm well enough to go fight crime."

Dave raises his shades a little, enough for his red eyes to peer underneath, and he gives Karkat a onceover. Karkat straightens his shoulders with indignation under the scrutiny. "You were kind of, like, on your death bed, dude," Dave says, fiddling with his collar. "John threw a bitch fit about it and everything, remember? That didn't stop being a thing."

"I'm fine. Slick explained a few things, and I am almost entirely not in any way in doubt of my ability to function in a strife setting." Possibly. Maybe. Look, John's not going fucking anywhere without him, and his ribs stopped hurting hours ago, and that's the only standard Karkat is measuring himself by at the moment.

"That sounded like a load of word salad and not a lot of substance, mister!" Jade says, shaking her head. "I'm the one teleporting everyone, so I can totally dump you here if I have to."

John finally seems to unfreeze, and he walks out into the living room, dodging his way absently between rows of junk and random pieces of expensive-looking furniture like he still has the layout of the Lalonde place memorized - which he kind of does. Karkat throws him a beseeching look. What the fuck does a troll have to do around here to get the other heroes to take him seriously when he says he's fine. "I'm going with you," Karkat repeats, because it bears repeating.

John's face twists up in consternation. "Karkat - I, uh -"

He needs to explain. Because clearly no one here paid any attention to the charts Karkat made back at the laboratory - too busy drawing cartoon dicks behind his back, no doubt. Aware that this isn't exactly a subject John's in a good headspace for hearing about right now, Karkat crosses the last few feet between them and grips John's arm before he starts talking, just in case. "Game mechanics," Karkat mutters, and he sees John's eyes flicker, rings of blue around the brown contacts. The kid's whole body stiffens in kneejerk, barely repressed panic. "Yeah, I know. You don't remember anything about accelerated healing? Because Slick seemed pretty fucking sure I'd be on my feet again in less than a week. I wouldn't believe a word out of his foul mouth, but -" Karkat gestures to his ribs. "I feel fine."

"I know I hardly ever get sick. And we took a lot of hits in - uh, that game that normal thirteen year olds probably shouldn't have gotten up from. It all happened so fast..." John says hesitantly. He casts a glance back at his dad. "You're sure?"

"We don't know how many of these Scratch kids there are, and we don't know how they relate to Doc Scratch himself," Karkat says grimly, tightening his hold on John. "Yeah, I'm fucking sure. You need someone there to watch your back, dumbass."

John is quiet for a long minute, and Karkat wonders if he is actually going to have to do a fucking cartwheel or something to prove to everyone in this goddamn room that he's not about to keel over in the middle of a fight.

Sure, he's still a little sore. But he doesn't intend to leave John alone for a single solitary second as Heir after what happened last time. If nothing else, he can hang back in the shadows and provide an element of surprise. It's worked out well in the past, after all. It's totally a solid plan.

"Well, back at you, then," John says, loud enough to include the rest of the room in their conversation. "You watch my back, I watch yours. I'm not leaving you to fight by yourself, either."
Ever again, goes unstated. And yeah, okay, Karkat can see why that would be a reasonable caveat. He doesn't buy into half of the bullshit Spades Slick tries to pass off as truth the last time he met with the mysterious carapacian, but he certainly has no plans for fighting criminals alone for a while.

Maybe the Knight thing is nonsense. Or maybe - Karkat glowers at Dave - maybe he's just going to focus on protecting Heir for the foreseeable future. Just as a precaution.

"Karkat…" Harley says, in what is not quite a whine; more like genuine, sincere concern, the kind that makes Karkat feel kind of bad, because Harley's a lot of things but she's also (he grudgingly admits) probably really worried about his wellbeing. Fuck only knows why.

"Are we all prepared?"

Karkat shakes his head a little, and looks up into the gloom of the second story. Even with all the light fixtures on the walls and the lamps lit, the Lalonde mansion still has all the atmosphere of some Gothic horror novella. Rose descends the stairs with the air of a young lady of the house, Kanaya sweeping in at her side. It takes him a beat before he realizes that both of them are in costume, though neither wears a mask; Rose has her jacket zipper up all the way to her chin and Kanaya has an unseasonably long, dark bottle green coat that completely conceals what she has on underneath, but he recognizes the boots and gloves of the Malachite Sylph, and there are tiny stylized suns all over Rose's jacket that give it away instantly. When Kanaya turns the corner of the stairs there's a weird moment where Karkat has to do a double take, because he could have sworn the skin of her face cast a faint, pale glow on the wall beside her.

Rumors have always floated around the blogosphere that the Sylph might be a rainbow drinker. Holyyyyy fuckballs.

"Hemogoblin's coming with us, so we still need to change," John says steadily, betraying none of the uncertainty Karkat might have expected. "Can you see anything that might be bad about that, Rose?"

Rose tilts her head to the side, her eyes closing. Her blond hair falls over her face a little, almost obscuring the glimmer of gold light as a third eye blinks from her forehead. Which is fucking weird, still. "Hmmmm. I can't sense much of anything that might go horrifically awry, actually," the girl muses at last, one eyebrow arching up even though her eyes remain closed. "It's not an exactitude, of course. I'd need more time to scry the portents in detail. But it's not an unfortunate path." She cracks one eye open, and both eyebrows rise up to the heavens. "David, put some clothes on."

"You know what's even more ironic that fighting villain dorklords in fancy fucking suits, Rosemary?" Dave returns, crossing his legs and bouncing his foot. In all the hours that Karkat, John, and Harley have been at school acting like civilized members of society, Dave has still not changed into regular clothes. "Fighting them in pajamas. Bam. What now."

Karkat, who's still trying not to stare at Kanaya because god fucking dammit he's trying to not act like a moron in front of her all the time, rolls his eyes. "Suit yourself, fuckface, we'll leave you here instead of me. Have fun."

Dave grimaces and then vanishes at pretty much the same time someone taps Karkat on the shoulder. Someone who's not John, so Karkat whirls around. Dave is in a white suit, the collar of his red shirt popped in a despicably douchebaggy fashion reminiscent of his elder brother. "Go put on your fakey fake horns, sweetie," the human deadpans, accidentally - probably - smacking Karkat on the shoulder with one end of his black tie as he starts to knot it around his neck.

Okay. That was blatant provocation, and Karkat snarls on impulse before John loops an arm around his shoulders and drags him away. The two of them are suddenly the only ones not ready to go out for a midday heroic emergency, and Karkat catches John almost floating up the stairs in his haste to scramble back to their rooms and get into costume.

It only occurs to Karkat that the last time he saw his costume it was in tatters when he digs into the duffle bag full of his stuff that he packed for the trip to the labs and pulls it out completely and impossibly intact. Karkat blinks and shakes out the dark, blackish red body suit, and searches for any sign of the gaping holes and tears that should have littered the fabric and the Kevlar underneath, but there's exactly fuck all. Only on closer inspection does Karkat make out the minute stitches where the rips have been sewn back together, and when turned inside out the Kevlar has been expertly patched.

The note that flutters out and lands by his horn prosthetics when he hastily starts yanking on his costume provides something by way of explanation. One claw still free of the hugging closeness of the suit, Karkat reaches down and snaps it up to read.

It has been brought to my attention by a third party that you have been out of commission for quite some time, and required repairs to your costume that you might not have thought to complete on your own. Consider this a boon, and a sample of my talents in the field of costume repair. In the event you wish to redesign your costume in the future, speak to me first. You and I need to have a long heart to heart chat about the questionable fashion merits of spikes.

And by questionable I mean what on earth were you thinking. Please speak to me.

Please.

And then underneath that, like a completely unnecessary footnote:

youre fucking welcome can we go now please

-

JC: .
JC: .
JC: .
JE: I think berzerker just implied an ellipsis in three parts!
RL: a meaningful pause u mean?
JE: Quite possibly! The transcript definitely shows her sighing three times!
RL: say sometihgin else janey!
RL: impart to us ur salient wisdom
RL: *silent
JC: .
JE: Oh wow!
DS: I believe that at some point you all promised me you would not abuse this live chat function. We're supposed to restrict it to imperative communiques, not constantly call in like this is some kind of automated phone sex hotline.
JE: But what could be taking these hooligans so long cogs? It's been almost an hour!
JE: A vendor of fine shaved ice just approached me and i had no money with which to procure a sample! How else are we to pass the time?
RL: ohh hhhoooo! shaved ice??
DS: Absolutely not.
RL: i have funds
RL: adn the woman who hass the cash hass the power!
RL: capitalism
RL: fact
Karkat has visited the International Fountain basically fifty fucking times. Sadly, aside from the public pool, the fountain has always been one of Crabdad's favorite places to make a fool of itself in public. When he'd been a young, naïve city wriggler, Karkat had splashed along with the lusus and probably terrorized all the poor human wrigglers in the vicinity for years before he grew up and realized how incredibly dangerous it was for him to run around and risk scraping his knees in public. The last thing he'd needed was for another troll to get a good look at him. His pupils hadn't filled in with his blood color yet, so he'd just been another black-eyed face in the crowd, but those days of youthful hemononymy were soon to come to an end. Karkat had stayed inside more and more, and before he knew it he'd amassed an army of hoodies and false colored contact lenses to hide behind. No more trips to the pool for him or Crabdad. Maybe that had contributed to the lusus's tendency to go absolutely fucking stircrazy when left alone in the house for any extended periods of time, but what the fuck else was Karkat supposed to do?

Anyway. The fountain's located smack in the middle of the Seattle Center, north of Belltown, where they held a World's Fair back in 1960-something - Karkat never really paid attention on field trips. The weather's not all that great today, so the grassy mall around the fountain's outer rings is mostly clear of all the usual hordes of families that come by to cool off in the summer months. But there are a few people still wandering around - most of them being ushered away by the handful of cops circling around the area. A couple of white tents set up to provide shade for food and drink vendors flap in the faint breeze, but most of them are already vacant.

The cops might be a problem. But if there are any roadblocks in place, they're not an issue by virtue of the fact that they're all travelling by Harley's space powers. She'd spent the last five minutes before they left dragging a squirmy WV out of the trunk of the car to wait for them back home and consulting with her weird wolf pet thing to have it help her aim for a location near the fountain that wasn't occupied by some poor fleshy human body or someone else's car. As Samuel pulls up beside a building across the street from the fountain, idling and trying to look inconspicuous, Harley begins crackling with lightning again, and Karkat braces himself for another vaguely unpleasant trip.

"I'll bring the car around on the road by the Space Needle - for those of you unfamiliar with Seattle, you won't be able to miss it. That will be your point of retreat in the event you find yourselves overwhelmed or in need of medical attention," Samuel Egbert announces from the driver's seat before Harley can follow through with it. The man looks as strained as ever, but not quite as run down as Karkat remembers him being while all of the kids were in varying states of trauma recovery. He even manages a reassuring fatherly smile for all of them, twisting around to where four of the six heroes have crammed themselves into the backseat. "I know you'll all do well. Be careful."

"You got it, Mr Egbert!" Harley promises. Rose, sitting on Kanaya's lap and looking far more comfortably regal there than Karkat feels smushed on top of John in the front seat, inclines her head, the shadows under her eyes concealed by precisely applied makeup but still visible in this close of a proximity. She hasn't been drinking or they'd all be able to smell it, but Karkat is very aware of the fact that between him, Rose, and John, three out of the six people here have recently been incapacitated in some form or another.

"And if a member of the Midnight Crew arrives?" Samuel says, staring at them all meaningfully.

Dave pipes up, "Grab John and get the hell out of Dodge."

"Thank you, Dave. That will be all, children." And with a burst of neon green, Dad Egbert winks out of sight with Bec still presumably in the trunk, to be replaced in Karkat's watery vision by the sight of the silvery dome of the International Fountain. It's smaller than he remembers it being, but still fucking huge, resting at the center of the dip in the ground. The fountain's jets arc up in plumes of water, following the beat of some music that Karkat can't hear at the moment - maybe someone shut it down after, you know, the threatening text message that literally everyone in the greater Seattle area received. Even as he watches, some of the central water jets cut off abruptly, splattering the stone around the fountain with an aborted arc of water. The miniature jets keep going for a while longer.

Hopefully, the six incredibly obvious people appearing in the middle of the clearing won't attract the attention of the cops attempting to establish a perimeter for a while.

"Heads up, we just got a second message. Think we pissed 'em off by taking our sweet time," Dave says, his artificial voice low. He's lurking on the other side of Rose and Kanaya, scrolling through something on his phone. Karkat, who doesn't bring his phone when he's in costume, has to read over John's shoulder when he pulls his own disposable phone out of a pouch on his belt. Neither Karkat's nor John's costumes are very easily concealed or altered to fit in, so they're both wearing hoodies over everything, pants having been deemed too hard to get rid of in an emergency.

THIS IS NOT A TEST OF THE EMERGENCY ALERT SYSTEM.

WE'RE GETTING BORED, HEROES.

TICK TOCK. TICK FUCKING TOCK.

"Karkat, it took us, like, an hour to get our shit together. And Jade can teleport," John points out. "Instantaneously."

"I am not interested in semantics, John -"

"Preeetty sure that's not what that word means -"

"You may want to shed your hooded garments, gentlemen," Rose says. Karkat blinks at her in time to see the girl unzipping her jacket. "We have company."

"What do you see, Rose?" Kanaya asks, pressed almost as close to the human as Karkat is to his own.

"Two at a distance, two right in front of us. But one of them is -" Rose breaks off and makes a noise of frustration. "It's - that's not possible. I've only seen someone like this once before, and it was my mother."

"Wouldn't that be awkward as hell," Dave comments. He takes off his shades and hooks them inside one of the inner pockets of his suit jacket. His face is pale and freckled without them to obscure half his features. "Yeah, I see 'em. It's that sniper again, shit."
That's when Karkat spots them, too. There's only one vendor still at work, and just as the cops turn their attention towards driving the shaved ice stand off the premises, the vendor's last two customers step out from under the shade and onto the grass, walking shoulder to shoulder with cones of bright pink and green ice in their gloved hands. Both are humans, one with bouncy blond curls, goggles, and a brilliant pink scarf knotted around her neck, and the other a man that dwarfs her, tall and muscular enough that he gives John more than a run for his money, and made no less intimidating by the fact that he's essentially wearing the equivalent of evil booty shorts.

Seriously. Nothing is left to the imagination, there. Nothing.

"Heir," John corrects automatically, and it's like flipping a switch as John's voice loses the strain that has been plaguing him for days and Heir's confident, serious tone takes over. That can't be healthy. "...Are they seriously eating shaved ice? Isn't that kind of unprofessional?" And yeah, as all six heroes watch, the girl spoons the shaved ice into her mouth with a nervous jitter to her hands, and the guy laughs at something she chatters between bites. Neither of them seem too concerned about being noticed by the police.

Hemogoblin yanks his hoodie off over his head. "We've probably done worse."

"This one time Clubs Deuce attacked me when I was eating tacos!" Sharpshooter chimes in.

"Okay, so, making my point for me, good."

"Perhaps we should simply ask them if they're involved or not," Kanaya says, removing her coat in a smooth, practiced motion and folding it into a neat bundle that she lets hang over her arm. Rose finishes undoing her jacket at the same time and Karkat drops out of his hero mindset long enough to have a minor, geeky aneurysm.

Because he's seen the Seer of Light's new costume design floating around the internet, snapshots from her fight in Chicago the other day. But he had no idea that the Sylph had been redesigned, too. This definitely isn't what she was wearing in Chicago. Her legs and arms are sheathed in leggings and sleeves of dyed greyish-white Kevlar, while her torso is covered in dark green with diamonds of grey at her hips and a cowl of pale grey hugging her shoulders and upper arms instead of a cape. She wears an open black skirt with a vibrant green damask-patterned inner lining, and has traded in the more subtle caps that she must have used to even out the asymmetry of her horns in the past for black horn guards that completely cover the candy corn keratin underneath.

And then, just to boggle Karkat's inner fanboy even more, with a flick of her wrists Rose removes a clear, pale yellow visor from the inside of her jacket. Tucking the arms of the visor behind her ears like glasses, Karkat can see that it imitates the style of her original mask, the one she wore before New York got blown the fuck up.

It looks like she's wearing -

"You've got," Dave says, "to be shitting me. He did not."

"I believe it was his way of welcoming me to the family," the Seer says, a sly smile curving her lips as she adjusts her shades.

Heir takes a deep breath, and says what probably everyone is thinking. "You guys look so cool."

"Everyone ready? Awesome!" Sharpshooter claps her hands together, nods sharply, and then, with a snap, is floating over toward the two black-clad figures engrossed in their snack, the rifle slung across her back swinging by its strap. "Helloooooo! Right here! Yoohoo!"
Oh. Right. That. Hemogoblin checks that his mask is still in place, and falls back, letting most of the rest of the group spread out in front of him. His instinct is to stay close to Heir, but he slinks over to side behind the Seer of Light, keeping one eye on Heir and the other on the Scratch kids. "In Chicago," he says through the corner of his mouth, "none of the cameras could see you. Blind Justice and the Indigo Scourge acted like they couldn't, either."

"Mmm. A trick of the light. Why do you ask?" Seer replies just as quietly without looking back at him, tapping an old, antique knitting needle against her thigh. The Sylph does look at him, assessing Hemogoblin with jade eyes, and shaking her head a little. He gets the distinct feeling that his costume is being found wanting again. Well, not everyone can roll out of their 'coons and dress like a fucking fashion model for a day of violence, okay?

"Can you do it to me? Not many shadows I can hide in in the middle of the fucking day." The sun's not out, but there's still enough ambient light that Hemogoblin trying to sneak around would stick out like - well, like a troll wearing a racy skin-tight bodysuit. "I prefer stealth."

Seer is quiet for a long moment, chanting something so low under her breath Hemogoblin can't make it out. Then, abruptly, the light around him skews and when he blinks, there's something weird about his surroundings. Like all the colors are being refracted through water. "Sorry," the Seer says, and there's another spark of light from her hand before the world settles back into the right dimensions. "That should last until I cancel it or my power runs out, whichever comes first. Good luck."

Sharpshooter, in the meanwhile, has managed to flag down the two presumed Scratch kids. "We got, like, every single hero in the city to meet you, so what do you want?" she singsongs, planting her fists on her hips, her lab coat billowing out behind her as she bounces. "Ringing any bells?"

"Mmwha?" Pink Scarf says eloquently around a mouthful of shaved ice, looking up and gulping hurriedly. Her eyes go wide as saucers, and she elbows her burly companion in the ribs. "Crap, I think 's them! Shit!"

Evil Booty Shorts actually drops his ice cone onto the ground when he sees them, pressing a finger to a black earpiece. "Uhhhhh, Cogitator? Bro? I, uh. I hate to be a pest. But. Oh, devilfucking dickens…this is so embarrassing…" After a pause, he looks at all of them very deliberately. "Er. Five."

"Oh, good," Hemogoblin says, rolling his eyes hard as he slides back into position at Heir's back. "They're just as bad as us. That’s reassuring."

He then remembers that no one can actually see him, and everyone's attention is too riveted to the Scratch kids in front of them to, apparently, pay attention to the disembodied whispering.

Fuck. Muttering to himself, Hemogoblin starts digging his claws into his skin and drawing out his sicklekind.

"Ah, yah, we called you out here! It's like, hecka yeah!!" Pink Scarf starts babbling, her words slurred and jumbling together in some kind of really fucking familiar speech pat- oh for fuck's sake is she drunk. "And five of you, like - what a good turn out!" She hesitates, trading equally bewildered stares with her companion. "Uh. Do you all...come here often?"

"Yes, and it's kind of rude of you to call us all the way out here in the middle of the school day. Rude!" Heir says, sighing through his mask.

"No," Flashstep says flatly.
"We do not even reside in this city," the Sylph adds. "This is a bit of an inconvenience."

"You're stalling, dear," Seer says, folding her arms. "At least tell us what spurred on this unorthodox challenge of yours while your teammates get into position to attempt to ambush us, if you would be so kind?"

Pink Scarf winces. "You know about that?" Booty Shorts says weakly.

"Oh yeah, I see what you mean now," Sharpshooter says, with the glee of one who thinks her nonstop punning is clever as she winks at the Seer. "Two and seven o'clock, right? They're coming at us pretty fast!"

"That's who I have my eye on, yes" Seer says with a perfectly straight face.

Hemogoblin groans. Heir starts snerking. "You forgot they were friends with me," he whispers, elbowing Hemogoblin in the side, and Hemogoblin throws up a middle finger that no one can properly appreciate. The stealth is not worth it. He regrets everything.

Wait. "How did you know where to elbow me?" he hisses.

Heir gives him a look like 'really?' "You're still breathing, dummy."

Foiled again.

"Holy Toledo! You all really are on top of all this. Well then! Time for plan C!" Booty Shorts says, frowning. He points at Sharpshooter, squinting. "Sharpshooter?"

"Me!" she says, jerking a thumb at her chest.

"I challenge you to a sharpshooting contest!" he says dramatically, drawing two pistols but thankfully not pointing them at anyone. "Winner take all!"

"Ohhhh!" Sharpshooter's eyes light up and oh god she's falling for it.

"Mano-a-mano!"

"Oh, totally! That sounds fun!" Sharpshooter says, delighted. "Where can we find a good target range on such short notice, though?"

"Sharpshooter, we should probably not split u-" Heir manages to get out before Booty Shorts spreads his arms with a smirking grin. "I've already got a range set up. Take us to the stadium, if you would be so kind. Ladies first, after all!"

"Be right back, guys!" And then, just like that, Sharpshooter and Booty Shorts are gone, in a sharp jolt of green light that sets all of Karkat's hair on end with static.

"IMPULSE CONTROL, SHARPSHOOTER!" Hemogoblin screams after her ineffectively. Sadly, the stadium is at least a couple of miles away. Not even he can shout that loud.

"Oh my god," Flashstep says, dropping his face into both hands. "He played her. He played her like a sad southern Appalachian hillbilly's creaky hand-me-down two string fiddle."

Pink Scarf now finds herself the sole object of the attention of five vaguely irritated heroes - well, four that she can see, anyway. Eyes darting from side to side, she takes another furtive bite of shaved ice as though they somehow won't notice. "Fck. I mean, fuck," she stutters. Her sweeping gaze skips over Hemogoblin, but he still catches the deep panic in her stare. An inordinate amount of panic, really. "If I said I just wanted to say hi to the Seer, that wouldn't go over so hot, would it?"

"Not particularly," Heir says, shrugging.

Pink Scarf laughs nervously. "Ask for an autogriefer? Wait. Autograph? OhcomeonCog'sI'mdyingoverhere." A beat. Then she loosens her scarf a little and laughs again, even more shrilly than before. "You guise need to cut a girl some slack, here."

Heir scratches at the back of his hood, looking over at Seer with both eyebrows raised. "Say what?"

Seer is not looking back. Without warning she lets out a wordless shout, spinning around and staring behind them. "Damn! Too fast - Dave, move!"

There's a moment where maybe Flashstep tries to move out of the way. Maybe he even tries to pause time to do it; Hemogoblin knows absolutely fuck all about the whole time thing.

But whoever it is just moves that fast, and instead of Flashstep dodging out of the way, he turns just about right in time to get tackled backward by some guy on a flying rocket board. Just as quickly, a black-sleeved arm shoots out to the other side and the Malachite Sylph barely has the time to blink and snarl before she's yanked off her feet by a hand on her arm. Hemogoblin reaches out and yanks Heir back defensively, even as Heir shouts and tries to jump forward instead because Heir likes jumping into danger without prior warning. The Seer is wide eyed behind her shades as she follows the careening rocket board's speedy retreat, hair whipping in the wind kicked up by the sudden passage.

It's like watching a fucking drive by or something, except with added rocket skateboards.

And suddenly, just like that, as the skateboard peels off around the corner and vanishes into some other section of the Center, the heroes are down to three.

"What the fuck!" Pink Scarf yells, which Hemogoblin is pretty sure is his line. "COGGGGS!"

"We have to go help Flashstep, Hemogoblin! Let go!" Heir says, squirming. He's stronger than Hemogoblin, and he manages to yank himself free while Hemogoblin's still processing what just happened.

"I was exaggerating, you dope!" Pink Scarf says, deep in the indignation throes. Hemogoblin is pretty sure she's not talking to any of them anymore; she's spun on her heel to shake her fist in the direction of the receding rocket board. "S'not an excuse for you to go around stealin' people like some kinda frisky peoplestealer! How am I s'pposed to fight people if you don't leave nary a boby to fight!"

Okay, now she's just fucking incoherent. Hemogoblin can't understand a fucking word of that. "There's still another one out there," he hisses, lunging forward to try to reel Heir back in. Police sirens start cutting through the air, which is distracting on account of the fact that Hemogoblin is about 75% sure they're ten seconds from being arrested or something like that. "Focus, Heir, we cannot fuck around here -"

"But Flashstep - and Sylph!" Heir protests, his hood falling off as he hovers just out of Hemogoblin's reach. The human is obviously hyperventilating now.

"They can take care of themselves, dumbass!" Hemogoblin swears again, jumping and missing Heir's ankle. "Oh, come on! Get down here!"

"Heir," Seer says tersely. "You might...want to do as he says." She's squaring off with Pink Scarf, her expression grim as she raises her needlekind, her opponent still shouting into the ear mic to be heard over the wailing of sirens. Are they getting louder? Hemogoblin winces, rubbing one ear as the police sirens reach a volume that can't possibly be normal. He's heard sirens before, and this is really fucking uncalled for.

"Oh, crap," is all Heir says. Then, Hemogoblin has his arms full of his moirail as Heir drops out of the air and flattens them both to the pavement. "Crap!"

A entire police car flies through the air where Heir was just hovering, mere feet from Seer and Pink Scarf. It clips the International Fountain and smashes into the side of the structure, water spurting everywhere as metal tears with a shriek.

But hey, at least the car doesn't explode. With a creak, it settles onto its back next to the shattered remains of the fucking city monument it was just complicit in demolishing. Hemogoblin forcibly snaps his gaping mouth shut with all the power left to him, and stops gawping at the wreckage of his shitty childhood to stare at the person responsible.

It's another woman in black, but the difference between her and Pink Scarf couldn't be more pronounced; this one walks like she could vaporize a small village with her little finger. She plows through another police car at the edge of the mall like it's not even there, smashing it to one side with her forearm, and when a screaming police officer shouts at her and raises a pistolkind in his shaking hands to point at her, she swings a fucking enormous forkkind over her shoulder and whacks him upside the chin in a one hit KO. Most of the other cops who have been working to clear the park look to be in pretty much the exact same condition.

And the best part it, she's charging right at the two of them.

"Did she just throw that?" Hemogoblin says, incredulous, looking back and forth between the inbound Scratch and the upside down car. His bullshit-o-meter caps out and promptly explodes, rocking him internally. This is just too much bullshit for one troll to cope with. "Who does something like that?!"

"A crazy person!" Heir replies, sounding just as put out as Hemogoblin feels. He pushes himself off Hemogoblin in a billow of air, at least three distinct breezes wrapping themselves around Heir in a volatile cocoon as he rises up to meet the Scratch. "Hemogoblin -"

"Yeah, yeah!" Hemogoblin tucks and rolls out of the way, warily eyeing the woman in red and black as she slows to stare up at where Heir is floating above the fountain. He tries not to breathe loudly as he creeps away from her, circling around to try to get a sense of where he should strike from. The Scratch is all corded, heavy muscle, and she's gripping her oversized specibus with such ease that Hemogoblin suspects she doesn't think it weighs very much at all.

"Your ascension is impressive, Heir. But also annoying," she says at last, squinting behind her goggles. Aside from that and the aura of impending murder, she's almost expressionless. "You will come down," she continues, hefting her forkkind, "or I will make you come down."

Heir seems to consider this. Then he reaches behind his back and unhooks the equally oversized hammerkind resting there. "I don't want to hurt you," he says, dropping just low enough to tap a foot against the ground. "But also, you're so under citizen's arrest."

"Tch!" The Scratch girl cracks her neck, her lip curling just enough to make it clear what she thinks of that idea.

There is absolutely no way this ends well for anyone involved. For anyone in a five block radius, for that matter. Heir never uses Casey all that much, and for good reason.

Well. At least they have one thing going for them.

Unseen by anyone except maybe the Seer herself, Hemogoblin darts along the outer ring of the fountain mall, and sets about sneaking up behind the Scratch kid's back, just as she and Heir lunge for one another, weapons colliding between them with a crash.

---

Rose suspects, somewhere in her mind, that she always knew the reprieve would be temporary.

While in her mother's labs, under the muffling weight of all the void wards that Rue Lalonde has learned to generate with her machines all these years, the dampening effects of the void bracers on her wrists were amplified. No influence, magical or many-angled, could reach her mind. After that unfortunate scrying incident, Rose should have spent her time reinforcing the sun in her mind; she lost quite a bit of the structure of her mind in her panic to escape the vision of Leviathan. Knowing as she does now that Leviathan most likely persisted from one universe to the next, taking advantage of the consent her previous self gave in order to access Rose's mind at its leisure, just makes the situation all the more dire, really. After everyone arrived at the labs to view the records of the last game, all the time that she should have dedicated to strengthening her mind and taking another step towards independence from her mother's whims was lost to her stupidly, stupidly getting shitfaced drunk. It's too much, all of it happening all at once, and it's left her badly off balance, and if she's struggling to process all that's happened over the past few days, she can't even imagine how everyone else is dealing with it.

And now there's something missing there - some memory that naggles at her with its absence, like the space where a lost tooth once resided, because she can't remember under what aegis she managed to be drawn to spying on the Furthest Ring in the first place. Surely she had a scrykind of some sort, something that amplified -

But ah, the memory's lost again. She has her suspicions, none of which have coalesced enough for her to voice them aloud to anyone but Kanaya, in the dead of night when everyone else has fallen into an emotionally exhausted slumber. Something has gone missing - something has faded into the background, like white text on a white screen, and Rose doesn't need to know what it is to know that it's significant.

And yet -

There's something else. Some pall that has been building over the past few days - or perhaps it has been there all along but that's just when it became so ubiquitous, so unavoidably there, that Rose first noticed its presence. When she casts her sight out to test the potential fortunes of taking some future path, it feels as though she has to slog through the dim, greyish mist of something so pervasive and insidiously intertwined with all possible future paths that she can't even begin resolve it into a settled vision. She wants to say it isn't something grimdark or grimlight - tentatively. Whatever Horror manifested itself in Los Angeles, it's still running around unaccounted for. But Rose knows the grim gods, and whatever has caused this ever-present sense of doom, it's not nearly mind-breaking enough for an entire, fully manifested elder god to be the cause.

Something is coming. Or perhaps, she thinks, it is already here. But whatever is about to go wrong, it's far too late to prevent it from happening: it's already in motion.

(you've for gotten somethin' go rose.)
Well, I'm afraid you're all rather late to that particular party, Rose thinks dryly. Really now, you need to try harder than that to sound as pompously all-knowing as you're aiming for.

Mmm. She should probably not be responding to the voices. That never seems to end well. Instead, Rose breathes in steadily through her nose, which is really all the meditative effort she has the time for right now.

Hush. Remove yourselves from my mind, or I will come in there and make you move. It's not an empty threat, Rose hopes. She can't delve into her own mindspace at the moment to see exactly where the grimdark whispers have started to emanate from this time but she suspects that with John, Jade, and Dave in such close proximity she might well have the wherewithal to pull it off.

Just not right now. "Your ally just kidnapped my ectobiological brother and my paramour," Seer observes, striving for a suitably nonchalant tone as she purses her lips at the Scratch kid opposite her. Dave and Kanaya can handle themselves quite well in a fight, after all, so she's not overly concerned - it's the principle of the thing, really. She has a duty to complain about such a rude pre-battle manners.

It also hasn't escaped her that the six of them have been separated for a reason. She can only pinpoint four major threats - the four Scratch kids - with her extra sight, but that doesn't eliminate the possibility that there might be more outside her scope of vision, waiting for the opportune moment. If Jade and Dave are out of sight, do the four of them still benefit from power buffs. Just how far do these game mechanics reach? This is something they should have tested before now, under controlled conditions.

The Scratch kids wrinkles her nose, heaving a large sigh as she casts a look in the direction the rocket board took off in. "Tell me 'bout it," she slurs, stumbling to the side as though standing upright is simply beyond her capabilities. "I told Cogs that I could fight two people, but he's an innerfeelin' busbod so of course he has to swoop in like nyoooom!" This last is accompanied by several wide hand gestures that might, under less formal circumstances, be considered demonstrative, before the Scratch kid flings up both hands with a huff.

"So he was Cogs," the Seer repeats, filing that away for future reference. "And you are?" It really would be inconvenient to continue thinking of someone as 'that Kid' for the duration of a skirmish, after all.

"Ranger!" the girl replies, suddenly beaming. "Ranger Dras-ifeth, tectonically - technically - but no one ever gets it when I try to explain the whole thing, sooo...One word names for errbody!"

"Fascinating. I'm the Seer of Light." Seer spins the needlekind in her hand slowly, trying to get a feel for them. They're too small, purchased with much younger hands in mind, a relic from her childhood. She'd thought them lost in the move to New York, but she'd discovered them in the dresser of her old room along with a container of knitting supplies and a pair of mittens, one complete and one half-finished, abandoned in haste years ago.

Some memories have faded with time. She'd knelt there with the unfinished mittens lying in her lap until Jade had ducked in to say goodnight, pressing the blue and white wool between her fingers and just barely recalling that she'd been attempting to finish a gift for John before Rue abruptly tore her away from their lives in Washington. She can't remember making a conscious decision to leave all of these materials behind, can't remember if it was done by accident or in some sulking fit of rebellion.

But they'll serve well enough in a duel. They're not the products of a deranged game, but they should still hold up better than anything Rose's mother could provide.

"Oh, I know! I mean, we know!" Ranger says hurriedly, blushing and scratching the back of her head in what seems to be a flustered panic. "You were in Chicago, for insance! We kept track of all that!"

She doesn't seem to be interested in attacking. It's all very strange. Seer wonders if over in the stadium, Sharpshooter might actually be facing her Scratch opponent in a legitimate sharpshooting contest - it's entirely possible that wasn't just an incredibly transparent excuse to isolate Sharpshooter from the group. "You have, have you," Seer says, just as her awareness of the battle field around them alerts her to a piece of rubble flying at the back of her head. She ducks under it smoothly, and when the chunk of rock hurtles onward through the air towards her, the Scratch yelps and sidesteps tipsily out of the way. "Interesting."

As this goes on, Rose tracks the progress of the battle between Heir, Hemogoblin, and the last Scratch kid to appear. They seem to have it well in hand. Of all of them, John and Karkat have been the weakest physically over the past few days, both plagued by restless nights and old injuries, and consumed by their nightmares of the scratched universe, but it hasn't impacted their fight yet. Perhaps they really are on the road to recovery.

That doesn't change the fact that the Scratch kid they're facing off with seems to be intimidatingly strong. She's matching Heir blow for blow, both of them smashing the stone of the fountain's base whenever their weighty strife specibi strike the earth and kicking up clouds of dust that Heir's winds toss around wildly. In fact, Heir seems to be letting loose more and more, swinging faster and throwing more of his strength behind each strike. He's probably always held back when fighting ordinary human and troll criminals, but each time he escalates, the Scratch coolly rises to the challenge. She hasn't demonstrated any latent capacity for flight as of yet, but every time Heir tries to press his aerial advantage, the Scratch deflects the blows from above just as deftly as she does those on the ground. When Heir sends out breezes to trip her up, she simply kneels with her forkkind thrust into the ground to brace her and weathers it until he stops, grim and unmoving.

It's not safe to be so close to them, Rose thinks worriedly, tracking Hemogoblin's progress with her sight. She's deflected the light around him so that he's effectively invisible to the naked eye, but that only makes it all the more likely he could be caught in the rebound of some ill-timed blow on the part of one of the other participants. With the strength both Heir and the Scratch are throwing behind their strikes, they could smash Hemogoblin's bones like dry kindling. She considers dropping the spell from here, but to do so without forewarning Hemogoblin would only leave him in the lurch. He's out of range right now, circling and looking for an opening, but Rose isn't sure that he'll find one; the battle is only growing more heated and personal as it drags on.

"So, uh…Are we gonna fight?"

Seer snaps back to her own battle, blinking to regain her focus to see Ranger tapping her forefingers together. This seems to require a lot of concentration, as her fingers tremble and keep missing each other. She's not really drunk - Rose being most eminently qualified to detect the distinct scent of alcohol - but would anyone really feign debilitating drunkenness to that extent? Seer frowns at that distinct tremor, one that was already present when Ranger and the Scratch in impressively short shorts were eating their shaved ice, and wonders -

"Oh, if you like. Since you called us all this way and all, it would be a shame not to," Seer says, smiling coolly. "Just one last aside - Scratch? No relation to a certain doctor?"

The expression that Ranger makes next is very telling. Seer picks out apprehension, uncertainty, realization, terror, and finally horror, all passing across the other girl's face in quick succession, and those are only the emotions she has time to observe before Ranger laughs loudly, pasting a smile across her face that does a very poor job of concealing the fact that she's hiding something. "Don't worry 'bout silly thins like that!" she says, raising her hands in fists and wobbling back into a fighting stance that is jolted when she hiccups. "If we don't start fightin' soon, Janey'll get all mad! And that would be unhappy-making for everybody."

"We really ought to discuss the identity of your not-so-unknown benefactor." Seer raises her needlekind, and levels them at the Scratch kid. "He has caused me an undue amount of tribulation of late. But fine. Enjoy your transparent attempts at obfuscation. It can wait."

This isn't Blind Justice, someone immune to most of Seer's spells of blinding, obscuration, and sensory distortion by virtue of being too blind to be affected in any way. The Seer of Light had to resort to more drastic measures to work around that immunity. Now, fortunately, it should only be the work of moments to throw up a shield, cast a rusting spell to take care of any concealed weapons on Ranger's person, and temporarily blind her. Depending on how experienced a fistkind strifer she is, of course, Ranger might well be able to fight blind, but it would at least buy Seer some time to incapacitate her further. So Seer channels the power for a shield through the medium of her needles, murmuring the correct words under her breath to erect a barrier.

Seer makes the rash error of thinking this battle will be a snap - right up until she takes another cursory scan of her opponent's aura and realizes that her first impression was entirely correct. There is only an outline of a person where Ranger should appear in Seer's sight, everything else vanishing into a void of absolute nothingness. She dimly registers as a threat, as Seer sensed earlier, but nothing compared to her fellow Scratches.

But Seer has always received the exact same impression from her mother.

It also just so happens that Rue Lalonde is one of the most dangerous people she knows.

Oh. Damn.

She realizes this just in time for Ranger to punch through her first shield like it's thin air. The ward is a glittering, honeycombed curve of golden light, and should have been able to deflect any strike coming at her from the fore. This is most assuredly not the case, thanks to the new gaping hole in the middle of it, and Seer receives almost no warning before there's a clenched fist jabbing at her face.

It connects quite solidly with her left cheek only just below the lower rim of her new shades, and somewhere in the piece of Seer's mind that is still somewhat intact, susurrating voices laugh at her.

(ɹs o mu ch v old - is_n 'f she so like yo u r mothe'r?)

On so many levels - not helpful, Rose thinks back, and mentally shoves until the laughter cuts off. It's not Leviathan proper, just more of those uncertain, squabbling voices that occasionally break through her wards to whisper at her and complain about being blocked out of her mind all the time.

She has more significant complications to deal with right now. Such as the fact that one of her upper bicuspids is threatening resignation from active service and may decamp from its socket at any given moment, and the entire left side of her face is throbbing with a sharp pain that encompasses everything from the roots of her teeth to the jut of her cheek bone.

Eurgh. She's been punched before, yes, but it's never pleasant. Grimacing, Seer tastes the trickle of blood leaking from the loosened tooth and gives serious consideration to spitting it out. Surely that would be a suitably dramatic gesture for her to make as she waits for her head to stop spinning.
She's doing this. She is causing this to transpire. Leaning to the side, Seer spits a globule of hemorrhaged blood and spit onto the ground. The motion stretches her throbbing cheek, but it is indeed an aptly badass gesture. Perhaps she shall gloat about it to Dave later. Striders probably consider that a good sibling bonding exercise, no?

Wiping at her lips with a finger, she looks up at Ranger again, more wary than before. The Scratch girl looks just as cautious, though; she hasn't pressed her advantage whilst Seer was busy taking stock of her new injury, but instead has fallen back into a guarded stance, as though anticipating some form of retaliation. When Seer doesn't offer much by way of defense or retaliation, the girl just looks at a loss, peeking between her fists in bewilderment. "Waht the fuck?" Ranger says, nonplussed. "I don' think I hit you too hard...was that too hard? Ohmigod I'm so sorry!" With each sentence she seems to become more distraught, her pinkish eyes widening behind her goggles.

If Seer has become so pathetic that even random villains off the street are worrying about her, she is clearly doing something wrong. "Oh, no, that was perfectly adequate. I'm simply used to my shields deflecting that sort of thing." Seer sighs at the shield and dismisses it by curling her hand into a fist. "But no matter. I'm practically an expert at fighting those who prove stubbornly immune to my usual repertoire of thaumaturgic solutions to mundane problems by now," Seer says, rolling her shoulders and lifting her needles again. "Let's try that again, shall we?"

Ranger quickly snaps her hands back into fists, flustered again. "O'course!

It only takes a few more deft punches for the Seer to conclude that yes, this is almost uncannily like facing her mother in a strife. Gods, she and Rue haven't fought properly, physically, in years - they escalated to passive-aggressive tactics in place of all-out warfare at least halfway through the fourth grade, and never looked back. Rose had only had her extra sight back then, not having mastered the spells and incantations to wield thaumaturgic forces in battle at the time, but even her sight was useless in a fight against someone as impenetrable as her mother. And now it's happening again: she's fighting blind, ducking and dodging under punches and searching for a spell in her inventory that might be useful against someone who can shrug off shields like they're not even there.

It doesn't help that Ranger, despite her tipsy appearances, is good at this. Soon the Seer is hard-pressed to dodge without giving ground, so she lets it happen to buy herself more time to think. Ranger drives her back in a wide arc, and they're only just managing to skirt the margin of increasing destruction that marks Heir's battle zone. Stone cracks with a sharp creak to their right as someone else's specibus hits the ground and a cloud of dust billows out, swallowing Ranger and Seer. Seer coughs on the gritty air, the bruised cut on her cheek stinging, but her new shades protect her eyes from the worst of the dust quite nicely. Ranger hesitates, drawing her arms in close as she glances swiftly in the direction of the other female Scratch's rampage.

Seer spits again, licks her lips, and chants out the same spell she used to hide Hemogoblin, deflecting light and attention from her presence. By the time Ranger looks back, her expression grim as she bites her lip, Seer has fallen back out of the cloud of dust so it can't give away her position. Perhaps, if she can avoid being hit by those fists of void, she can maintain her invisibility long enough to formulate a feasible strategy.

Dammit. She's going to have to use her needlekind as a regular short range strife specibus, rather than channeling spells through them. And these are nice knitting needles.

"Wha? No, no, no!" Ranger's jaw drops, and she looks panicked. "No whey! Way! Where'd you go?!" She lifts up one of the eyepieces of her goggles before letting it snap back down, her mouth setting in a determined frown before she hisses, "You can't jus' run away, I have something to te-"

Seer sidesteps out of the Scratch kid's path and starts aggrieving, jabbing with both needles in quick succession. She aims for the girl's hips, her elbows, and, ducking beneath Ranger's startled attempt to blindly parry, reverses the grip of her needlekind in one hand to jam it backward into the soft part of the back of her knee. Then she rolls out of the way again, staying low to the ground when it becomes apparent that Ranger is only trying to retaliate with punches, not kicks. Fistkind does not always include a footkind mastery, though it's unusual that someone wouldn't combine the two.

"Yore still here!" the Scratch exclaims, half delighted, half relieved. There's little pain on her face, so whatever material makes up her black uniform must be durable enough that Seer's investigative strikes haven't made much of a dent. "Oh thank Jegus - Jesus - ow!"

Seer spins in from behind and stabs her needles into the muscle of Ranger's left shoulder, aiming for the supraspinatus muscle. These needles aren't sharp enough to be stabbing implements, but if she can bruise the muscle deeply she might be able to prevent Ranger from lifting her arms without considerable pain. Take her fists away, and the Scratch kid will be much easier to deal with.

Maybe her aim is a little off because her sight can't penetrate Ranger's void nature; maybe weeks of on-and-off mental stress have caused her fall behind on her calisthenics, so her strike doesn't damage the muscle as much as Seer wishes. Either way, Ranger recovers quickly enough to round on Seer with her left elbow leading the rest of her body; she grazes the underside of Seer's arm and drags up the fabric of Seer's jacket sleeve to slam the elbow into her side with a grunt.

The invisibility spell vanishes, Seer's power rendered inert by the contact. Wincing around the pulsating throb in her side, Seer skips back again and circles at a wary distance, drawing up the power necessary to repeat the spell as she eyes Ranger.

This is almost enough to make Rose wish she had fought her mother properly, with all the spells at her disposal. At least then she'd have a better idea of how deal with her spells being nullified on contact. She doesn't even have time to speculate whether teleporting would work if she tried to include this Scratch kid in the jump, as she did with Blind Justice. Would Ranger just be left behind, or would the entire spell fizzle out? There's no way to tell.

Worse yet, the bruise on her cheek from that first punch has begun to swell, and though it's not high enough on her face to impede her eyesight, her head has begun to ache from the combination of the pain there and having to stare around the abyss where Ranger's soul should be. "What is the point of this," Seer finds herself saying irritably, more sharply than she intends. "What is Scratch's game here, setting the four of you upon us?"

And Ranger's eyes dart, once again, to the other Scratch kid in the vicinity.

There's something strange about that. Something in her expression that's a cross between guilt and resolve, an inner conflict that begs to be psychoanalyzed.

"Don't worry 'bout it," Ranger says unconvincingly when her eyes dart back to the Seer. "Tha's basically the opposite of a thing to worr' about right now whilst we're bein' fineass foxy fighting ladies o'er here."

"But it is his game."

With a huff, Ranger throws another side hook that Seer wrenches away from, her shoved-up sleeve crimping in the corner of her elbow as she yanks it out of reach. "Okay, yah, it totally is!" Ranger replies in an undertone between jabs, dodging Seer's next attack. "But don't talk about it in public where there's eyases watching all over!"

The memory that has been avoiding her contemplation suddenly surges to the front of her mind, in all its damning glory. Seer freezes, arm outstretched midjab in front of her, because horrors above, they forgot about the cue-

Later, she has to piece the exact sequence of events together with assistance. All she really registers, too late, is a sharp jolt that runs up to her shoulder as Ranger knocks the outstretched arm to the side with an open palm. But it's the arm with the sleeve riding up, and Ranger's hand hits both cold grey metal and pale skin, right on the edge where the void bracer meets flesh -

And, with a piercing note like running a finger along the rim of a wine glass full of water, Rose feels the void in the dampening bracer get sucked up into the Scratch girl's aura, stolen without so much as a by your leave.

She has a moment - just one - to stumble back and stare at the useless cuff digging into her wrist.

And then Leviathan's presence slams into her mind like a tidal wave.

-

RL: oh shittles
RL: fuckufkcuckfuuck
DS: Sup? Roxy?
JC: .
RL: i tinhk i broke her
RL: oh nooo :(
JE: Pretty sure thats the point of fighting her ranger!
RL: haha jakey jake ha fuckin ha
RL: hoLY CRAISINS
DS: Do I need to come back over there?
RL: SHOOTBAGGLES
RL: * SHITBAGGLES
JE: Okey doke ranger this is getting a little ridonkulous...This is supposed to be an official channel not a forum for intriguing new variations on expletives!
RL: this ss no laughign matter jake!
RL: cant u see im fuck deep in tentacles over here!?
DS: What.
JE: Are we talking sharktopus or bermuda tentacles style tentacles?
JE: Or.
JE: Er.
JE: Tentacles from...the animes?
RL: not stupid hentais jake i mean SUDAN ARM TENTACACLES RL: * SUDDEN!!!
DS: Oh, that. The Seer of Light has Horrorterror connections. The Dark Star incident was in the briefing packet, Roxy.
DS: Are they acting hostile?
RL: PRETTY FUCKIN HOSILE oh thank godd shes snappin out of it
JC: .
RL: don look at me like that janey our job is 2 fight peeps
RL: not deal with their octotumors

The other void bracer is still functioning. It is, perhaps, the only reason Leviathan doesn't manage to wrest control from Rose right away.

She loses almost all sense of the world around her, barely aware of falling to her knees and clutching at the arm that suddenly feels as though it has been dipped in chilled acid. She is more occupied by the rush of grimdark that rises up from the channel in her mind, buckling the sun ward on impact and reaching out with writhing, tangled tentacles to sink thorns into her mind.

And water pours in.

It almost breaks her. Rose feels the pain distantly as her teeth sink into her lips, chewing back a cry of agony as the pressure on her mind spikes. "Not here, I didn’t," she says or thinks - it's hard to tell the difference at the moment. "Not here, not now. I - I revoke - the consent of my past incarnat-"

The distinct sensation of many voices chuckling sends cold tendrils down her spine, and the sun in her mind gives a crunch, flickering on and off as her desperate attempts to reinforce it falter. Rose stretches in a breath and it tastes like blood and salt, burning on her lips.

"Rose!"

Leviathan's tangle recoils; Rose wrenches her head around, her good hand clutching at her hair as she stares blind, still seeing her mindspace when her eyes are straining to see the real world again.

One of her eyes burns, like something white and pallid has begun to blaze there, but she can't think she stares blind, still seeing her mindspace when her eyes are straining to see the real world again. Her mind is only half lit now, the sun slowly sinking beneath the atramentous waves and being warped by the colddamp chaos found there, sloughing off layers of light like sheaves of dead skin. Rose can't tell how much of the Horrorterror she is dealing with here - last time her mind was invaded only by an offshoot tangle designed specifically to puppet her body around like a marionette...
and summon the rest of itself into reality, but her meditations before that breaking point had made her very aware that Leviathan was immense, one of the eldest of the elder gods, more ancient than the stars and full of more entangled minds than many lesser hiveminds could hope to swallow. Even a fraction of its multifaceted attention spans more chaotic majjykal resources than Rose can hope to counter without two bracers.

When it gleams to reply, the tangle dismisses her abjuration with a shrug of its mental thorns. You lie, you crave power and know I, ed, el, but m o r e than, t h a t, y o u w a n t t o s p e l y p r o p e r l y m e g. You can’t lie d u s tim e an d a g a i n, a n d w h y is h e d r o p p i n g, s p e l i n g s o m e of th e m u s i c a u n i v e r s a l t o s, n o t t h e p a f f l y t u n e s o ’ i t h e r a i n. T h e abomination heaves more of itself into her mind, shoving more of the lower struts of her mental landscape to the side to make room for itself.

Making itself at home once more, slotting itself into place like coins in a pork hollow.

More grimdark tentacles begin to manifest, not from under her skin but in a tangle that reaches around to wrap around her infected arm, joining the first in a writhing mass that Rose can barely feel, the sensation lost in the maelstrom as she attempts to erect more wards in her mind, using what little time with the tangle's shout, and when she blinks her physical eyes she can feel the worms that did remember, I do not need you to be free. I wouldn't know. I can't remember, and you all are not the pfaffly tune so 'I the rain'. The abomination heaves more of itself into her mind, shoving more of the lower struts of her mental landscape to the side to make room for itself.

I wouldn't know. I can't remember, and you all conveniently blacken the screens when you begin to write your way into a session, Rose gasps, raising the arms of her mental avatar to summon light in both palms. What little she can dredge up is barely enough to light the structures above her head, but she flings it down anyway - anything to stave off the incursion of grimdark is welcome. And even if I did remember, I do not need you to be free. I don't want you here!

\[ \text{\textbf{WRONG}} \]

The declaration shatters the lowest level of Rose's mind. She thinks she speaks the word aloud in time with the tangle's shout, and when she blinks her physical eyes she can feel the worms that writhe behind them, gleaming with sickly light. "Jo h n?"

She does not receive a reply. She can't tell if that is because she didn't say the words loud enough for John to hear, or if it is because he is unconscious or worse.

Leviathan, however, has only just now hit its collective stride. The ca ll ow s a r s sh u d d e r s b e f o r e w h at a t w e c o u l d a c c o m p l i s h togethe r. W e w i l l s t e p t h r o u g h t h e G a t e a n d c l e a r e n t s i n j u s t o l d t o d i e r e g a r d l e s s s - W E C A N’ T M E’LL T’ R O T T I N G. w h y ‘ de ny us, ‘ Ro se?"

Because you got us all killed, Rose screams to be heard over the roaring of the sea. Because you attempted to devour my friends, not just me! Because you blew up my city, you odious creatures!

All she hears in reply is a single, contemptuous roar - that cuts off as abruptly as it begins. Rose goes still, and only a fraction of a second later realizes that the grimdark sea below her has stilled, as well.

Someone is holding her hand.
"What do I do?! Seer, waht the fuck!"

Leviathan royally flips its shit.

On some level, Rose is pretty sure that the grimdark tangle is shrieking in her mind. But it sounds like nothing more than a loud, shouted whisper in a way, muted and becalmed by steady influx of heady nothing that seeps in through the palm of her hand.

"We need to dial the tentathing wayyy baack," Ranger babbles on, her grip on Rose's hand so painfully tight that it has almost gone numb. By some stroke of luck, she's not touching the second void bracer - luck, or perhaps, somehow, an intuition that it was her larcenous aura that drained the other bracer in the first place. "Plz, Obi-Seer Kenobi, you’re my only hope and now you've got crazy evil tentacles, I mean, why even-"

With a jolt, Rose falls out of her mindscape completely. The gravel of shattered stones needles at her knees, where her leggings have been scraped thin by the impact. One of her arms is a drooping tangle of tentacles that hangs slack and limp by her side, as though lacking the will to galvanize themselves into motion. Even as she stares, perversely fascinated, one of the tendrils stirs, straining to lift itself, and beneath the horror of purple and black flesh Rose can just barely make out the pale skin of her arm, hopefully still intact.

Ranger kneels at her side, bracing herself with one hand while the other digs sharp nails into the back of Rose's hand. Her goggles hang around her neck rather than obscuring her eyes, which really are an impossible shade of pale pink, as though she yanked the goggles down once again to make sure her eyes weren't deceiving her; an understandable reaction to have when one's sparring partner abruptly bursts into tentacular mutations, Rose thinks wryly. There's something about the Scratch girl's angular face that's startingly familiar, almost horrifically so, but at the moment everything feels vaguely horrific - existential terror tends to bleed over into all the rest of one's emotions, Rose has found.

It's not that the void of this girl's aura is leaking into her, she realizes. It's that the void is swallowing up everything - pilfering both the grimdark and her own thaumaturgies and leaving nothing but plain flesh and bone behind.

Good lord. She hopes that's not permanent.

If Rose is too shocked to feel much more than bemused and relieved, Leviathan has descended into a flurry of wrathful, vehement updownulations that Rose barely registers as quivers in her mind. "I said, no," Rose repeats, still not quite able to comprehend the fact that the act of hearing those screeching voices in discordant harmony isn't giving her a minor aneurysm. "Get you hence."

This is actually working. Incredible. "I'm going to have to ask that you not let go of me. Pardon the inconvenience," Rose says, wincing as she makes an attempt at moving the fingers of her entangled hand.
"I just wanted to get out while I still could, but then you all showed up early except late and Janey was right there so we had to fight and why do none o' my plans ever work out right?!” Ranger finishes, almost in tears. She doesn't appear to be listening, though Rose can't blame her - if she's been having even half of her conversation with Leviathan aloud rather than mentally, Ranger must think she's gone completely insane.

She wouldn't be half wrong.

"Ranger. Ranger!” Rose says louder. She gags on some fluid that seems to drip from her nasal cavities into the back of her throat, and she has to spit out a mouthful of brackish, black-tinged water. How perfectly foul. "Ranger, I understand that first encounters with grotesque manifestations of eldritch abominations from beyond this mortal plane can lead to existential crises in the uninitiated, but we really need to talk."

Thankfully, Ranger seems to snap back to her senses quickly enough, jolting at the sound of Rose's hoarse voice and - thank god - not letting go of Rose's hand as she sits back hard. "You're, uh, you're not gonna sprout any more of those, are you?” she asks, ducking her head toward the flimsy tentacles of Rose's other arm.

"With any luck, no. But I'm afraid that I must ask that we parley,” Rose says, weary. Leviathan's raving shrieks have dimmed from too-present, jarring mental screams to the much more tolerable subliminal whispers that barely rise above the volume of Rose's own thoughts. "Because however it is that you're suppressing the influence of the Furthest Ring right now, as things currently stand either you continue to maintain contact with me and assist me in reaching my rendezvous point, or most likely everyone in a ten mile radius is going to end up dead or otherwise permanently displaced from this mortal coil." And John would definitely not be appreciative of Rose accidentally unleashing a grimdark holocaust on his city.

"Is that last one likely?” Ranger asks, anxious.

"Have you visited New York City lately?"

"Oh. Right." Ranger nibbles her lip, and casts a glance over her shoulder. Once again, Rose follows the path of her line of sight, and sees that Ranger is staring at the other Scratch girl. Relief floods Rose when she sees John on his feet and fighting and - oh dear - a very visible Hemogoblin tumbling out of the way of a wild swing from their opponent. They're further off now than they were when Rose got forcibly dragged into her mindscape to deal with the grimdark influx, having at some point rounded the battered fountain and begun to fight their way across the lawn toward the street. There are sirens in the distance, but most of the police vehicles nearby have been abandoned, as far as Rose can see.

Then, with only a moment's hesitation, Ranger clamps down on Rose's hand with renewed force, turning to frown at her with her brows furrowed and her eyes intent. Despite her continued slurring of her words, Rose gets the distinct impression that Ranger has dropped whatever pretense she's been maintaining, and is fully engaged with the discussion at hand. In Rose's heady, barely-sane state, she even sounds like Rue, and that's potentially even more disturbing than anything Leviathan could come up with."If we're paralleling, that means I get to negotiate too, right?” Ranger says in a low voice, her bottom lip just barely pouted in a grim moue. "Cause right now, what everyone else would want me t'do is drag your booty back to base and ship you off to uh - that guy you mentioned before. Those're orders."

"That would be a less than desirable outcome," Rose says. She twists her hand to clutch Ranger by the wrist, locking them together. "You wield void. Intentionally or not, you stripped the void powers from my bracer, and only the two of them working in tandem could keep the Horrors out of my mind. Right now, the only reason there aren't more tentacles is because your aura lets me keep control; let go and we all suffer for it - including your friends. And you and your fellow Scratch kids might be serving under the Midnight Crew," Rose adds, summoning up a pained sickle of a grin, "but I think that you might be open to alternative offers of employment."

To her credit, Ranger doesn't try to play hard to get or hide it. Her mouth pops open in surprise, and she peeks at the other Scratch girl again, a reflex she apparently can't seem to stamp out. Rose has noticed it all through this disastrous battle, and she's drawn a very simple conclusion from her observations: it's not loyalty to the Crew or to Doc Scratch that's keeping Ranger in line, these days - it's fear, pure and simple.

"You want out," Rose whispers, refusing to wince as Ranger's fingers dig deeper and deeper into her skin. "You said that I was your only hope - we are your only hope. If defection is your aim, now would be an excellent time to follow through on it."

"Just like that?" Ranger leans further over Rose's arm, curling up around it in a defensive huddle, her googles tapping against Rose's wrist. "You'd believe I want to quit, for real, when we've only said like, ten words to each other?"

"Well, it's considerably more than ten by now. I've been told I am prohibitively verbose when I get momentum going." It's an awful attempt to lighten the mood. Rose isn't sure it works until Ranger lets out a surprised giggle. "I like to think of myself as a good judge of character. If nothing else, I can see that you're afraid," Rose says, shifting on her knees. Her legs ache, but it's the normal stiffness of having collapsed on top of them for so long; her head, the primary concern, is almost blissfully numb by now. Sure, Rose could not have told anyone the state of her mindscape for love or money, but she can tell it's not getting worse, and the lack of pain is more than she could have asked for after such a ruinous event. "If you're being coerced into villainous activities, then of course we'd want to help you escape."

"Oh thank jiminy kringle," Ranger exclaims in a rush, the last of the tension leaving her shoulders as she rocks forward and almost collapses on Rose's shoulder. "There's such hella messed up stuff, I can't even tell half 'f it - like, I will totes saddle up the beyootiful defection pony! Please!" By the end she's half-laughing with it, and Rose can see a teary film welling up in the corners of the Scratch kid's eyes before the girl hastily wipes them away on the back of her sleeve.

Rose, meanwhile, cannot believe this is working. Perhaps she's delirious, or trapped in some hallucination induced by Leviathan to keep her compliant. Really, how on earth did she have the good fortune to end up with the one Scratch kid willing to go turncoat? It's preposterous. "Then if we have an accord -" she begins.

"Oh, yeah," Ranger replies fervently, her eyes still shining as she nods. "But uh - there's one thing - you can do the seeing thing right?"

"At the moment...I wouldn't risk it," Rose says, slow and deliberate. "You'd need to let go of my hand, and trust me when I say that is not an advisable course of events. Why do you ask?"

Ranger sighs, keeping one hand on Rose's while the other slowly unclenches and drops to the Scratch girl's side. "Means I gotta do this all the manual way and other unfun stuff," she says, smiling at Rose crookedly as she draws a knife-kind from a pouch at her waist. "Y'think they let us all run around without makin' sure they could find us again afterward?"

Rose watches the knife cautiously, her belly tensing, because she can't see anything other than the physical world right now, and even if she could access her magical sight she has little doubt that Ranger would be just as much of a black void in her foresight as Rue Lalonde. She stays in a crouch, ready to dodge, but Ranger sticks the knife hilt between her teeth and starts fumbling at the zipper of her body suit instead. "'Otta 'et 'is off," she mumbles around it by way of explanation, her trembling fingers skittering against the zipper and buckles for long, drawn-out seconds before she manages to loosen the buckles and wriggle her shoulder and upper arm free from the suit. Rose finds herself keeping watch almost unconsciously, one eye on the other Scratch girl in the distance to make sure these activities aren't noticed. "'Amn 'erve 'amage!" Ranger pants before spitting the knife onto the ground and picks up the knife. She's freed the arm with the hand that still has to hold on to Rose, so the bottom half of the sleeve is still in place. With her free hand, Ranger takes up the knifekind again and bites her lip, setting the tip of the blade against an unmarked spot on her upper arm. "Wish me luck," she says, adjusting her grip and setting her jaw and oh dear, she's going to -

"Luck," Rose hisses back, bracing just in time for the Scratch kid to stab herself in the arm. Ranger's grip on her hand spasms and closes hard enough to make bone creak. Blood pours out and starts spilling down the line of Ranger's arm, trickling between their interlaced fingers. "Are you sure you can find it? You're going to damage the muscle tissue or nick an artery at this rate," Rose points out, watching with rapidly escalating discomfort as Ranger carves up her arm.

"Hope - agh! - fully?" Ranger whimpers, not quite swallowing back a gasp of pain. "No - no, there, I got this!" She pulls the knife free, slathered with blood almost half an inch up the point of the blade, and lets the knife fall into her lap again. Closing her eyes, her pale face growing steadily paper to the point that the girl resembles a sheet of marble, Ranger digs into the open wound with her free hand. "Jeeeeesh!fuckuefufk!" After an even more painfully strained, too-long minute, the girl almost sobs with victory as she pulls out a thin piece of blood-coated metal between her fingers, more blood burbling up from the ravaged cut as she holds it up triumphantly with a dizzy grin. "Like goddamn laser surgery," she says proudly. "I totes get my emergency field operation handheld badge for this one. In-dis-putin-able. Fact."

"A GPS chip?" Rose looks on as Ranger sheathes the knifekind and levers herself up into a crouch, looking at Rose in askance as she yanks the shoulder of her suit back on. After a cursory inspection of her grimdark arm - still a pallid grey, the tentacles only slowly melting back beneath the surface of her skin - Rose decides she can risk standing.

"Yeah. And after this, we're not gonna have a lot of time, on account of Cogs is gonna flip his shades," Ranger replies, setting the chip on the ground. "Can you run, or will that, like, upset the balance of tentacles?"

"An excellent question." Rose moves to stand first, and knows instantly that it is a mistake. The world lurches sideways, spinning so that everything is reduced to streaks of grey and black and green, and she sags so quickly that Ranger only barely rises in time to catch her shoulder and haul her back upright. "Damn."

"No good? Seer?"

Rose snorts a laugh through her nose, letting her head hang a little until it feels like a weight settles in her mind. She can't see what's going on in there, but she thinks - she knows - Leviathan must have shifted again. After a moment, the vertigo seems to subside, and she blinks her eyes open to an arm that is still grey and a black-clad companion who has almost gnawed a bloody patch in her lower lip from the tension. Right. Defecting. Usually tends to cause feelings of ill will in the ones being defected from. They should probably hurry this along. "Running's probably out of the question, I'm afraid. I need to get to my mother."
Ranger's pupils dilate a little. "Your momma," she says, almost reverently. "And she can fix you?"

"My mother can't fix anyone. But if I know her, she'll have twenty spare bracers tucked away behind the vodka, 'just in case,'" Rose says, rolling her eyes. This is the moment of truth - gods, she can only hope her judgment isn't too impaired, because trusting Ranger could be an absolutely terrible idea and Rose would have no way of knowing it. "Our ride is by the Space Needle. After that - well, the best case scenario is that your friend in the short shorts doesn't succeed in whatever he's attempting to do to Sharpshooter, because she's the best method of reliable transportation we have over such long distances."

John could do it. But Rose pushes that thought away from now, because no one has dared bring up John's method of travelling through the wind since they watched those damnable recordings. Besides that, Heir is more than occupied with the Scratch kid, still.

At least, those are the excuses Rose makes for herself.

"But we still hafta get there fast, or Janey'll be on us like a fuckton of bricks. Really, really deadly bricks," Ranger says emphatically. She nods, apparently to herself, and one-handedly drags her goggles back up over her eyes, her hair in complete disarray by the time she achieves it. "I gotchu, babbu, don't worry."

Rose should probably ask her to clarify that statement. She doesn't have the time, however; Ranger lifts her foot and slams her heel down on the bloody GPS chip and yelps, "Gogogogo!" as she quickly switches which hand is holding Rose's, wraps the free arm behind Rose's back, swaps hands again so that the arm looped behind Rose's back is the one sinking void into her hand, and finally, with a grunt, hooks her arm behind Rose's knees and picks her up.

"Please, for the love of all that is incomprehensible in this universe, do not drop me!" Rose has to yell to be heard, because Ranger starts running and shouting at the same time. They peel off toward the road; the other Scratch girl, Jane, is between them and the most direct route to the Space Needle looming in the distance, and even as Rose wrenches her head around to look back over Ranger's shoulder, Jane wheels to stare at them hard, mouth curling back in a snarl before Hemogoblin jumps on her from behind.

"Ohhh fuck, Cogs - Dirk, bae, I'm so sorry," Ranger is saying tearfully. Rose misses most of the rest of the Scratch girl's one-sided argument with whoever is on the other end of her earpiece - Ranger only seems to address Cogs, but Rose can hear the shouts of at least two other voices blaring over the speaker as well. Rose is more concerned with the second wave of vertigo that washes across her field of vision. For an instant there is a brief tugging sensation, like a fishhook caught in the back of her mind, and she thinks the grimdark tangle might have just tried to pull her down into the dark again. But all of Leviathan's influence ebbs out into the anesthetic void of Ranger's aura, and everywhere Rose touches Ranger feels like it too has been numbed, all magical sensation dampened so that all that's left are her ordinary, purely human senses.

It feels a bit like dying. But it's still, somehow, preferable to the alternative.

The shouting stops without real warning and Rose snaps back to the present as Ranger ducks her head and hooks her ear piece out with a single finger, letting it drop to the ground so she can smash it with her heel as she did the chip earlier before they start running again. "I don't believe your deadly cohort is able to give pursuit as of yet," Rose reports quietly, letting her head fall back a little. Every so often her vision distorts and veers, but it's the jostling of Ranger's frantic absconding that twists her stomach into knots. "Jo- ah, Heir and Hemogoblin can give her more than a run for her money."

"Yah? Maybe." Ranger doesn't sound convinced. Mmm. Troubling. As they dart between a pair of overturned police vehicles, Rose lifts her head again, squinting and cursing inwardly at the fact that she can't see if any more police cruisers are coming towards them or not. There are no roadblocks on the short side path that Ranger lunges toward, and they rush past the colorful walls of the children's museum to reach another open area of grassy lawns and well-groomed trees. It's the kind of area that would ordinarily be bustling with people, even on a weekday, but once again everyone seems to have cleared out. Rose doesn't recognize some of the buildings spaced around the area - perhaps they're new. She hasn't visited the center for years, after all, and her memory isn't exactly in top working order at the moment. Another building with walls that are mostly windows flashes by, and Rose thinks she can catch brief glimpses of people watching them from inside, too wary to venture out.

"I'm not going to pass out," she informs Ranger.

Ranger laughs nervously, adjusting her grip under Rose's leg and almost stumbling. "Wait. Uh. Are you telling me that because you actually are gonna pass out?"

Rose sighs. "I'm making a decent effort not to. But I am also making an equally decent effort not to vomit all over both of us, and at some point one of those two options is going to make the decision for me."

"How about neiither of these options?"

"I can't work miracles here." For some reason, this is inexplicably hilarious to Rose, and that's perhaps a sign that her mind isn't exactly in working order. "I'm not that kind of god," she says, laughing.

"...We're so fcked," Ranger says with an air of realization.

"Nonsense," Rose says, flapping her free hand dismissively. "We just need to reach our rendezvous. Our contact is ridiculously capable in a caretaking capacity."

"You said that already and it's not really reaassurin' when you're passing out on me! They're gonna think I beat you up to make you take me to them!" Ranger skids to a stop. "Which I totally did! Outta context and everything! Shit!"

(yours is the only mind we k now. it is simple ly a m atte r... of fin'd in g th e correct a 'n gl e.)

Shut up. Rose grits her teeth and jerks her chin toward the Needle ahead of them. "Keep going anyway. The sooner we get there, the more likely it is that I'm conscious enough to convince him you've switched sides. Communication is key, you know."

- DS: Roxy, why the fuckin' hell did your tracker just go offline?
DS: Literally what ridiculously convoluted sequence of improbably inopportune events could have led to the goddamn chip in your arm being damaged?
RL: o h fuck
RL: cogs
RL: dirk bae im so sorry
JC: RL-2408, you will desist from your perfidious actions this instant.
JC: Where in the blue blazes do you think you are going?
DS: Roxy.
DS: No.
JE: I don't understand chaps what's going on? I can't see a blistering thing from over here and you're all talking at once!
RL: ear micks gotta go too dirk
RL: smy only shot n u know it
RL: one day well go in 2 that room and what comes out won't be either of us DS: Dienek will kill you.
RL: hasn't worked yet
JE: Ranger, cogitator...What are you two on about?
JC: You treacherous shucks busters.
RL: jus come with me
RL: plz plz come with me you now ill fuck up somehow if ur not there DS: I can't leave him.
RL: he dosn't even rememereb you!
JE: Ranger you can't really mean to say that you're...going rogue, can you?
RL: got 2 run
RL: seers arms basically evil calimmari
RL: its hellsa crazy up in this bitch u dont even no
RL: dirk b there or b a syncronutty grubclone 4 the rest of jakeys life
RL: im doin
RL: the roguey thing
-- RL's earpiece has experienced a lethal malfunction! -- DS: Dammit, Roxy.

By the time Roxy spots the non-descript white car idling alone on the street, the Seer of Light's head is lolling. Roxy is still not entirely clear what in the heckie happened in these past few rushed, insane minutes; she just knows that the Seer's arm is almost entirely troll grey, though thankfully missing those creepy tentacles at the moment, and that somehow it was her fault that Seer is having some kind of crazy alien chaos god episode.

Things tend to get screwed up when Roxy is just trying to do her best; Dienek def made that very clear over the years, and the guilt curdles in Roxy's gut as she sprints across the grass.

But there's no sign of Janey or Dirk or Jake following them as she carries Seer the rest of the way to the car. So maybe, just maybe, she hasn't messed up everything.

Maybe she can still get this thing out of her head. Then she can go back for Dirk, and then Jake, and the three of them together could totally save Jane, right?

"Hey, uh, mister!" Roxy calls. The driver's side door opens at their approach and a dude in a jaunty white suit steps out.

He turns around and oh no this guy -

Is hot.

It is a suave gentlemanly caller and Roxy is dressed to kill way too literally to get her mack on.

Dammit.

Oh well. First impressions. "I come in peace," she announces, batting her eyelashes and then remembering her goggles are back on.
Not only is this gent a goddamn fox like damn, he is also on point. Doesn't even blink at the fact that they're both bleeding everywhere, just says sternly, "What on Earth is happening here, young ladies? Seer?" There's an edge of warning in the last few words, and Roxy aborts the whole mysterious eye winking seduction technique in favor of the compliant newb good guy routine, shaking Seer a little to get her to stop passing out while smiling nervously at the hero's rendezvous, trying to project as many 'not a bad guy anymore' vibes as possible.

"Mmh? Oh. This's Ranger," Seer says, shaking her head a little. She's starting to get a little heavy, but also Roxy is pretty sure if she sets the hero down she's probs not gonna be able to stand on her own anyway. "She's defecting. It's rather a work in progress. Forgive me, but there's been an incident, a grimdark one. My mother must be notified."

The man nods, worry creasing the corners of his eyes as he reaches for his phone. "I'll call her. How urgent is the situation?"

"Under control." Seer taps the back of her hand against Roxy's collarbone. "She has...an affinity for void, not unlike my mother's. But - urgent, nonetheless."

"And the others?"

"Still fighting." Seer slumps more, her hair brushing the underside of Roxy's chin. Roxy tucks her chin down instinctively, the way she used to when resting her chin on top of Dirk's head while he working away on one of his projects. "We were all separated, and I can't see them like this."

The man nods and steps away from the car, pressing the phone to his ear. He still keeps a watchful eye on Roxy as she shuffles to the backseat door at Seer's mumbled instructions, and as much as Roxy wants to believe it's because she obviously still looks fantastic covered in blood and dust, it's probably just that he doesn't trust her not to off Seer when his back is turned.

Ehh, fair's fair. She did kinda appear in his life after her entire villain team challenged a bunch of hero types to a duel. But nothing says that he can't be attracted to her incredible sniper chic. That's, like, the plot of every lame-o cheap spy thriller ever written. It could totally work out.

Once they're inside the back of the car Roxy sucks in a breath, and lets it go, trying to fight down the last thumping beats of panic rocking her heart from the successful escape. Dirk should be here, she thinks - no, all four of them should be together - and their absence hurts more than she can afford to dwell on right now.

But the Seer's mom is Doctor Rue Lalonde; it's in all the files.

And if anyone has the medical technowhatsits at her disposal to undo all the crazy brainwashing in Jane and Jake's heads, surely it will be her.

Roxy just has to figure out the opportune moment.

---

"I think we're being kidnapped," Dave informs Kanaya.

"What did you say?" Kanaya shouts to be heard over the whistling of the wind.

"We are so being kidnapped. Shit's embarrassing as all hell."
"Dave, now is not the time for your typical incessant mumbling. We are being kidnapped."

"Snatched out of our nests like unsuspecting, really fucking overgrown baby birds." Dave twists his head to get a better look at his partner-in-being-kidnapped. She's stopped writhing around trying to escape, but that's mostly because they're rocketing around at sicknasty-whiplash miles per hour and any wrong move could send their whole rocket board humpfest careening into the side of a building. It's pretty inconvenient. "And neither of us can fly. Yet." He squints. "Can you?"

She seems to hear that one. "I have not yet achieved independent flight, no."

"Oh, awesome. Because I was starting to get worried there. Jade floats. John floats. Bird-me flies. Rose can probably float with her intense dark wizardries when she's not, you know, whacked out on existentially inscrutable horrorjuices." Dave sighs heavily, staring down at the black-and-grey decaled board beneath his butt. "So at least you're as incompetent as we are."

Kanaya looks at him, offended, arching an eyebrow. "Who's we?"

"Me and my main man Karkizzle, duh." Dave waves a hand back towards the fountain area they just evacuated.

"Of course not," Kanaya says matter-of-factly. "That would be an impossible feat, one I could not hope to match in two lifetimes."

Dave has to think about it for a moment. "Wait, wha-"

"Do you people," their kidnapper says, sounding strained, "ever stop talking?"

Dave cranes his neck up and around. It doesn't really work, seeing as the guy has the back of Dave's collar in a death grip. Seriously, that's gonna need to be ironed out or something, and Dave hate ironing - Bro always manages to swap out the iron for a smuppet halfway through, and looking down to see that you're rubbing an enlarged proboscis along the lapel of your favorite jacket is trauma you don't get over. Shit like that haunts a man to his dying day. "Have to make up for lost time. The world has been deprived of my sweet vocals for too long," he offers by way of explanation. "Also, I'm about to wreck the shit out of your sweet ride, so, uh, sorry in advance."

The man blinks. Dave hauls time to a stop. The death grip on his collar is probably the only thing that keeps him from flying forward as he draws his sword and stabs it through the rocket board, shoving down with all his weight.

When time restarts a moment later, the rocket board veers down sharply, the nose aimed at the road flashing by underneath them. "Fuck," the Scratch kid has time to say before he stomps on the back of the board to try and stabilize it. Kanaya has other ideas; her foot lashes out and knocks his off course, and that's about when they all introduce their faces to the curb. Or at least, Dave assumes the other two will; he's taken harder falls under Bro's shitty tutelage and learning how to survive a fucking savage landing is one of those things he mastered ages ago. So he tucks and rolls and he really, really fucking hopes he didn't just break Rose's girlfriend, because Rose could probably kick his ass into next week in an entirely literal fashion if she set her mind to it.

He looks up to see, unfortunately, the Scratch kid executing a sweet landing, his form mechanically perfect as he rolls and skids to a stop just a little ways down the street from where the rocket crashlands. Kanaya, who bails off toward the sidewalk, narrowly misses colliding with a tree and lands harder, but pops up instantly afterward like some grey-and-green vision of disgruntled decorum.

They're at the intersection of Mercer and something or other according to the street signs, with a covered parking garage running the length of the road on one side and a building walled with windows beside an exhibition hall with ramps leading down at an incline from street level on the other, with an overhead walkway connecting the two sides. The fountain area's nowhere in sight, which means literally no one else from their hero posse is in sight, and Dave is kind of not about that life. He and that life have irreconcilable differences and the divorce papers are in the process of being served harder than any mortal butler could hope to match.

Okay. Fuck. That metaphor got away from him. Also, he's zoning out in the middle of a battle. Again. Why does this always happen at the shittiest times? Why is it always so much easier to get lost in his own head than think about all the horrifically dangerous and painful real life drama going on around him?

…Rose would could probably carve a four-course meal out of the irredeemably mortifying psychologically fucked up meat of that last thought. Dave resolves never to share it with her. Ever. Her perverse obsession with psychoanalyzing everyone around her has been thwarted by John's dumbass refusal to discuss his feels with anyone but Karkat these days and by Jade's sheer immunity to any kind of psychological crisis, which means Dave has avoided becoming her primary target only by virtue of extensive time power abuse. One of these days, she's gonna pin him in a dark corner of the Lalonde house with no cell service and he will be well and truly fucked.

But today is not that day.

"I don't suppose we can attempt to settle this in a calm and respectful fashion?" Kanaya suggests as Dave checks back into real life. "We have no reason to quarrel. Whatever motivated you to send that message, villainy is never the answer."

The Scratch kid doesn't even consider it. "No," the guy says, his mouth a perfectly cultivated flat line that brooks no emotion. But Dave thinks he can make out the faintest signs of a frown, tensing the corners of the kid's mouth.

Hey, Dave gets it. The only person he knows who's even close to mastering the stoic ninja lifestyle is Bro, and the older he gets the more Dave finds new ways to provoke him into outright irritation, which is still more than nothing. It's the little things in life, okay? And there's no way this guy could top Bro. He is simply the best there is.

Then, between one blink and the next, the dude vanishes.

"Oh, hell no," Dave says, because invisibility powers would basically be the biggest fucking cop-out ever, and -

Kanaya staggers back, gasping with indignation and maybe a little pain; Dave looks and oh fuck, oh shit, when did the Scratch kid get behind her. That was uncanny fast, and Dave has always lived in the hollow comfort of knowing that no one could be as quick as Bro without having completed the necessary blood sacrifices to the batshit insane puppet gods. In fact, he's been meaning to ask Rose if there's some demon puppet-themed calamari elder god lurking in outer space or wherever tentacle monsters live, but he hasn't had the time -

The tiny clack jolts Dave back to awareness. The sound of a sword clicking back into its sheath.

The burst of livid green blood that erupts from the slash across Kanaya's chest puts it into perspective. Kanaya looks appalled as she stares down at the wash of green sluicing down the front of her costume.

Behind her, the Scratch kid smirks.
Dave didn't even see him draw. The swordkind is right there, across the kid's back, but it doesn't even look like it's moved. How.

"Ok, that is some anime bullshit that I cannot abide," Dave starts to say, when the guy blinks out again.

He pauses time. Which should have been the first thing he did, to be honest. Shit should just be reflexive by now.

This means that at least Kanaya's too frozen to witness Dave flail backward because there is a goddamn really not shitty katana pointed right at his face. He draws his own sword and holds time as long as he dares to give himself an opening to dodge out of the way; stars and static dance in front of his eyes as time yanks itself back into motion.

He doesn't even have a spare moment to stop and make sure Kanaya is, you know, still among the living. His sudden dodge brings the Scratch to an abrupt halt, eyes flicking toward him at the right angle for Dave to catch the weird, creepy yellow of them behind his shades. He assesses Dave's guarded stance with the katana still leveled where Dave's nose used to be.

Dave is seriously trying so hard not to blink. His eyes water with the effort as he and the Scratch stare each other down.

Well. At least that's one thing he can razz this douchebag about. "Your shades are a weak rip-off of my older bro's," he says, throwing down the sickest burn he has at his disposal. Unfortunately, he can't insult anything else about this guy's costume, because it's actually pretty fucking cool and Dave is never admitting that out loud, even if it kills him. "Like, that shit is all kinds of blatant. Your originality gambit is non-existent and your irony game is not strong."

It earns him a twitch of an eyebrow and then the dickhead is gone again, and Dave has to clamp his mouth shut against the urge to channel Karkat at his most foul-mouthed and incoherent. He flashsteps out of the way of another stabbing blow on autopilot, and brings his own sword up to bear. A good thing, too, because - Christ this guy moves fast - he is by sheer coincidence positioned to block the next slash, one that comes so soon after the first that he barely processes the flash of the katana before it slams against his own with enough force to send sparks flying.

Dave's brain flips from 'generic hero mode' to 'fuck fuck shit fuck fighting Bro' mode, because that's kind of his default when he's up against someone who is ludicrously fast. Hell, this kid even looks like he's actively trying to imitate Bro's physical appearance, if not Bro's unironically awful sense of style. He's got the speed and the stupid sideburns down at least, if not the muscles or the puppet fetish - yet.

It's probably some kind of psychological warfare. Seriously, Dave will bet his fucking apple juice empire that this is some deliberate attempt to freak him the fuck out.

Well, at least the goal in any strife with Bro is pretty basic. Don't fucking die.

He pauses time, the effort making his head throb, and runs for the thin walkway to the exhibition hall. He skirts around Kanaya, who is kneeling and clutching her chest, all hunched over so he can't make out how deep the cut runs. God, where's a future-Dave? What does he need to do, pull one out of his ass?

He doesn't hear the tap of a single booted foot when time restarts, and couldn't honestly say what instinct has him whirl to parry the Scratch's next stab. Years of strifing Bro, probably. Then the dude's hand blurs and a flurry of cuts and slashes follows; Dave takes a step back, knocking aside... each blow, and soon he's lost track of whether he's parrying in between seconds or not. He can't even clear enough of a path to reposition himself or try to launch an attack of his own. His hand aches from the pressure this kid exerts, and this sword is shitty enough that it can't possibly last much longer before he has to swap it out or - he snorts a laugh - fight on with a 1/2bladekind.

Which would be weird. He is so not doing that. Ever. Past life-him was a moron.

He finally manages to twist out of the way of a glancing blow aimed for his shoulder and feints for the guy's side, yanking back before the Scratch kid can parry and pausing time again to flash backward, keenly aware of the railings of the walkway rising up on either side. His plan to not die officially has the corollary get away from Kanaya and hey, look at him, multitasking with a crazy-fast villain guy on his ass.

But the moment time restarts, the Scratch vanishes without a word or a moment of hesitation. Dave swears, hissing at the sharp pain that lances through his head from his powers trying and failing to chain two flashsteps together in too short of an interval. It reads the same as trying to hold a time pause too long, and time snaps back too soon for Dave to do more than blink. Then the Scratch blurs back into sight, inside Dave's guard like whoa, a sword angling for his ribs.

Then - "Shit!" the kid curses - Dave registers the growl of a motor revving.

Just in time for Kanaya to bring her fucking chainsaw down where the Scratch kid's head of spikey hair used to be.

Oh. Uh. Correction: it's not the chainsaw that's growling. The chainsaw has nothing on Kanaya's snarl of outrage when the specibus stops just short of rebounding off the concrete or worse, slicing through Dave's shoe. Dave stares and oh god he's not ogling his sister's girlfriend, he swears to any god out there. Fuck, he swears to the four of them, because they're all supposed to be gods, right? It totally counts. He swears to John himself that he's not giving Kanaya a onceover.

It's just that the fabric of Kanaya's costume flaps open, the edges of the fabric so smooth as to testify to the sharpness of the Scratch kid's katana, and Dave is right at eyelevel to see the long line of the jade green slash below her collarbone. The wound looks goddamn weeks old - not scabbed over, oddly, but not bleeding anymore either, and surrounded by flesh that gleams white.

Like, actual light, here.

Kanaya is glowing.

Dave thinks this is one of those things someone should have mentioned before now.

Another not-sound, and Dave snaps out of his confusion. He drops to the ground before Kanaya's eyes narrow, and he rolls as far to the side as he can with the railing in the way as Kanaya yells, "Down, Dave!" and swings her chainsaw around like a major league baseball player. She narrowly misses the Scratch's bare arm as the guy pulls back the katana he was about to introduce to Dave's lungs from behind.

"You glow!" Dave feels the need to point out, rolling to his feet and flashstepping after the Scratch, who is in the middle of darting back toward the hall to regroup. That katana slashes out again and Dave ducks under the slice, aiming for the guy's ankles because hey, maybe that never works on Bro
- like, ever. Not even once - but they need to do something to slow this guy down. He's running circles around them, and anyone who's faster than Dave and possibly as fast as Bro is someone who needs to come down off the fucking amphetamines.
His sword meets nothing but air. Kanaya charges up behind him, her feet pounding on the stone, and Dave just stays low, the tip of a boot barely skimming over his hair as Kanaya launches a flying kick at the Scratch's face. She doesn't connect, either, but heck, she comes closer than Dave has so far. "You cannot just point out that someone glows in public, Dave!" she yells back, huffing with exasperation.

"Like, is that normal? Should we be concerned? Do you need to, like, lie down or something?" Dave starts to sweat. Oh god. This is a genuine concern. "Rose will literally disembowel me if you've caught some glowing troll disease. What if you catch fire?"

"I assure you, I am not about to spontaneously combust -"

"Because if you're infected with something and it sets you on fire," Dave continues, feeling almost feverish as the realization hits him, "it would be a sick burn -"

"Dave, we are kind of busy here!"

"I'm just saying!" Then he blinks. "Oh my god. I'm turning into John."

Besides, they seem to have bought themselves some kind of lull in the strife. The Scratch kid has come to a halt a third of the way further across the walkway than where they're standing, one knee on the ground and his katana sheathed as he (presumably) stares at them, one hand pressed to his ear. No - wait - his mouth is moving. He looks down and to the side before Dave can squint and try to read his lips, which is a fucking pain in the ass. Must be talking to his fellow dickheads or something. At least it's distracting him from wiping the fucking floor with the two of them.

"Yes. The transformation is almost complete. I can see it in you now," Kanaya deadpans, straightening and adjusting her grip on the chainsaw. She flips the thing around like it weighs nothing at all. "Do we have a plan? Any plan?"

"Plan? Uh, not die?"

"An excellent plan. But I was hoping for something more detailed."

"...Don't die and stop making shitty-ass puns?"

Kanaya smacks her face. "How have any of you survived as long as you have?"

"Shit, lady, I ask myself that on a daily basis. I mean, Rose is probably the best one at thinking up plans, and she ended up with evil god cooties anyway. We put all our skill points into maxing out our incredible charisma and shit all over our survival gambits." Dave pulls himself upright with the railing. "So do we arrest this guy, or-? I mean, he's not exactly dicking around here. He's not just gonna stop if we try to make a run for it or anything."

By this point, Dave is seriously wondering where the fuck a future-Dave might be. He's matched Bro all of once in a strife only by throwing three different Daves at the guy, and he can't imagine he and Kanaya are going to be able to wear this sucker down without time powers being involved. God, he wishes he kept himself better informed. But even when he leans on the railing to discreetly glance down at the ramp that leads to a lower level, there's nobody there. He needs to get himself a time tracker or something.

"I propose that we beat the shit out of him until he ceases inflicting his anti-social tendencies upon the public, and then return to the others," Kanaya says, worrying absently at the cut across her outfit and pinching the two sides of the fabric together, as though imagining how she might stitch it back together.
Dave shrugs. "Hey, I'm down with that plan." It's one of those plans that seems really hard to fuck up. Now, a lot of seemingly unfuck-up-able plans have, in fact, been fucked up over the past week or so, but that is no reason to start discriminating against them now. "Oh, shit, head's up," he adds, because the Scratch seems to have wrapped up his conversation and has lowered his hand from his ear, staring at the two of them behind his shades.

Kanaya just revs her chainsaw. Seriously, she could take someone's eye out with that thing. And half their face along with it, but who's counting?

The Scratch draws his sword, his face still unreadable, wraps both hands around the hilt - and disappears. When Dave pauses time to figure out where he's heading next, he sees the kid paused while running along the railing - fucking anime nerd - to get around Kanaya's raised chainsaw, because one does not simply run headlong at an angry troll with a motorized weapon. That's just basic common sense.

[activate fraymotif? y/n]

What?

Dave shakes his head, trying to clear it. He's lost the instinct that used to have him flinching and glancing around for the source of the weird fucking noises. While they were watching all those videos, he'd just assumed they were coming out of the speakers, until John enlightened him to the fact that no one else had heard jackshit. This is just the first time he's heard actual, you know, words, and not just clashing musical notes.

Then he belatedly realizes he's distracted again and lunges forward just as time snaps back into motion, angling his sword around Kanaya to block the katana stabbing for her claws. The Scratch is poised on the railing still so Dave just fucking goes for it, following the other sword as it gets yanked back out of the way to try and incapacitate that hand, or at least shove the guy over the railing. The fall probably wouldn't hurt him, but it would be funny as hell.

The Scratch kid doesn't give him the chance. Instead, he swings back down onto the walkway foot first, kicking Kanaya's chainsaw neatly out of his way and knocking her off balance. Kanaya's kind of still right there, in all her angry, glowing...anger, but the Scratch has no problem spinning on his heel and slashing at them so fast Dave loses track of it again between pauses, alternating cuts that aim for Kanaya's wrists and shoulders with stabs that aim right past Kanaya's face to jab at Dave's instead, throwing both of them on the defensive at once. Dave finds himself flashing back again and again, pulling Kanaya by the back of her costume at times when she can't dodge quite fast enough so the cuts she does get are only superficial. She ends up parrying and retaliating, swinging her chainsaw again and again with grim determination while Dave just worries about keeping the two of them from randomly dying.

They end up back on the empty street again before he really registers how effectively the Scratch has driven them backward, and soon there's a parking garage obnoxiously inserting itself smack in the middle of their path of retreat - no, their strategic backing-the-hell-up -

[activate fraymotif? y/n]

"What does that even mean?" Dave mutters under his breath. For lack of a better target, he says this to the sky, because he figures - you know, sky, Skaia, whatever. "Are you shitting me, more music? We already have a stupid goddamn soundtrack mixed by five year olds, what more do you want to subject my eardrums to?"

That's the thing. He's been hearing it on and off for a couple days now - a weird, unsettling note, one that started soft and has slowly built to a permanent drone in his ears, buzzing and nondescript but ever-present. He thinks the closest he can describe it is as a kind of [oooooooooorrrrrr], or maybe a [ɯɯɯɯɯɯɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹ]. It's been enough to drown out the constancy of Karkat's angry pulse and Kanaya's sporadic [vworp]ing and even the constant clamor he associates with Rose, Jade, and John that Dave hears loudest and clearest of all, and hey, it's not like he was complaining. Hearing weird shit isn't supposed to be a thing you get used to; compared to all the whooshing and clanging, this monotonous drone is wayyy easier to ignore when Dave starts mixing songs in his head.

But still. For the record. Actual five year olds could mix better than this.

Unfortunately, now that they're not hemmed in on both sides by the railing, Dave means to get out from behind Kanaya and actually contribute something to the ongoing hack-and-slash fest - but the Scratch isn't hemmed in anymore, either, and suddenly he's feinting and stabbing faster than even Dave's flashsteps can keep up with, as though anticipating Dave's every attempt to outflank him before Dave even thinks to try again. "Oh, come on!" he bursts out after another slice sends him falling back behind Kanaya, where he can accomplish nothing by way of attacking without literally going through Kanaya to do it.

"I will concede this plan has some logistical concerns," Kanaya grunts. She's forced back another step and Dave compensates for it by being a complete ass and not moving his foot, so he ends up with the weight of an entire troll warrior woman using his foot as a pivot on which to bring a chainsawkind down in a massive downward hack that drives the Scratch back a few feet. "Given we cannot subdue him if we cannot - oof! - lay a claw on him."

"Kanaya," Dave says, blocking a slash that almost hacks off her ear, because he's not sure if she can grow that kind of thing back or if the glowy thing has a limit. "We're about to fall into a goddamn parking garage. This isn't just a logistical concern anymore. This has evolved into an actual problem."

"I noticed, Dave."

"Scientists are fucking baffled by how fast this has evolved, because a problem like this should have taken millions of years of inbreeding to occur. Between the two of us" - a huff, and Dave hauls Kanaya back by the shoulder, nearly taking that same stab to his face as repayment for his goddamn courtesy - "we have spat in the face of all the scientific method has to offer. That's it. Science died today. Game over, man. That's how problematic this is."

"Dave. How attached are you to your ability to speak, again? I ask only out of a purely hypothetical curiosity."

And see, that's the cool thing about Kanaya. John, Karkat, and Rose are sticklers for the names on a good day, and Jade goes with John's flow out of some kind of sisterly solidarity and because she thinks codenames are cool. But Kanaya seems to understand and possess the rare and valuable quality of casually not giving a single raging fuck about one's secret identity. And Dave can respect that.

The Scratch's blade clatters off Kanaya's chainsaw and slices up her sleeve instead, exposing another too-pale line of ripped skin and drawing Kanaya's attention away from Dave. At the same time, Dave's left foot slides back and runs out of sidewalk to walk on. There's a slight drop because some dickhead decided the ground floor of the parking garage would not actually be level with the street outside, so Dave has basically two seconds to decide that yes, they're doing this. Any second now the cops could realize there's a party going down here as well as back at the fountain, and Dave has enough experience with police to know that they harsh one's groove no matter how sick the beats might be.
"Going down," he warns Kanaya, and she jerks her head, horns bobbing in a sharp nod - or maybe she's just smoothly ducking under another strike, who can even tell anymore - and Dave pauses everything to grab Kanaya around the waist and jump down to the sloped floor of the garage. Time restarts while he's still trying to set her down, but Kanaya just plants her feet and drags him onto her left with a steering claw before the Scratch can jump down after them. Of course, just as Dave thinks that, the Scratch vanishes again and reappears right in front of them, battering Kanaya back as she blocks everything with her chainsaw only in one hand. She reels one arm back, claws clenched tightly in a fist, and Dave flashsteps in to jam his sword along the blade of the Scratch's katana, gritting his teeth as he tries to give Kanaya whatever opening she needs -

- and his fucking sword snaps. It's a clean break, half a foot above the guard of the hilt, but of all the times to -

Dave loses the beat of his motion, and the metal of his splintered sword lets out a shriek that echoes painfully in the awful acoustics of the parking garage as he stutteringly shoves it upward to lock the guard against the katana instead. The Scratch darts a look at him, one not quite strong enough to be called irritation but close e-fucking-nough, and Kanaya's fist flies a moment later, arcing past the Scratch kid's cheek by inches when he just barely tilts his head to the side and dodges it. He blinks out of sight and the sudden absence of the katana means Dave's broken sword has nothing to push back, and by the time Dave has regained his balance, Kanaya's screaming because there's a sword through her stomach.

Dave slices his broken sword at the Scratch kid's face, only half convinced he even has the reach with only half a blade, and it actually hits. A jagged line of blood opens up along the jut of the kid's cheekbone, and then, before Dave can process anything, the Scratch is off again, strafing off to the side to put space between them with his sword still in hand, dripping splatters of green blood behind him. Shit.

Kanaya clutches a claw over the green stain spreading across her midriff, adding to the collection of blood stains from that first attack, and Dave hooks his elbow with hers to pull her behind the nearest car, one of a good number scattered throughout the garage. Cover won't do them much good with a guy who's this damn fast, but it'll make Dave feel better while they scope out how much damage they're dealing with, here. Because the last time something like this happened to him, he totally fainted.

Kanaya is not fainting. Kanaya is pissed. "This was new;" she hisses, inspecting the thin but deep wound in the middle of her stomach, and for one wild second Dave thinks she's referring to her internal organs or some shit like that. But no, she's talking about her outfit.

She's probably not dying. That is in fact the vibe Dave is getting here. Cool. Awesome.

...Where is the Scratch kid?

Dave whips around, scanning the garage around them with a wary eye, but there's no sign of the guy under the dim lights or between the scattered vehicles. Crap. Not cool. Not awesome.

Then, abruptly, a hoarse "Roxy, why the fuckin' hell -" breaks out from the other side of the garage, before the Scratch realizes he's broken his stealth mode and shuts up again. Doesn't matter; Dave's got a better idea of how far away the guy is after that outburst, and it's far enough away that they probably have a moment to breathe.

"Is that gonna stop bleeding the way the other one did?" Dave asks, this being the primary concern. "Because that would be handy, not gonna lie."
"Well yes, but that's not the point here," Kanaya says.

Dave mashes the heel of his palm against one eye, thinking fast. "It is totally the point. Like, how many of those can you handle before we need to get you to a hospital or something?"

"Roxy. No," comes from somewhere off to their left, and Dave nearly cracks his head against the side of the car trying to pinpoint it. Shit. The Scratch is moving.

"Indeterminate. I've been disemboweled before, but a few days afterward I needed to take measures to replenish my blood supply." Kanaya waves her chainsaw a little, which is not a safe thing to do at all, and tucks a wayward strand of black hair behind her ear. She has two gaping wounds, but she looks like she considers all the gore barely more irritating than grass stains earned during a casual walk in the park. "This is nothing. Focus less on worrying about me, and more on finding some way to take that man down. I'm just not fast enough."

"Well, I don't know if you've noticed, but neither am I," Dave hisses. "His moves are too outrageously unreal, man. Like, even Bro would maybe take ten minutes to beat this guy. He's that fast."

She gives him a look. "Never mind. We should stop talking. It is clearly not conducive to us finishing this battle in a timely fashion," Kanaya says exasperatedly. She's mostly preoccupied with inspecting the jade green wound in the middle of her stomach with a claw - wait, belay that one, she's still more concerned with the torn fabric. Again. Apparently mortal wounds don't really faze her. When Dave replays that scream earlier in his head, he's pretty sure Kanaya was screaming more in surprise than in actual pain.

Okay. Dave can admit it. Rose has chosen well. He can grant his blessing for their marriage. Any woman who can take stab wounds in stride like this is worthy of the clan and must be married in ASAP.

"Why? He's obviously cool with us talking - he's making some kind of mid-strife phone call as we speak," Dave points out, even as a loud "Dammit" comes from somewhere further along this lane of parking spots, past a bright yellow truck. "See, he's being cool about this."

"Dave, you are Rose's brother, and she has grown somewhat attached to you, no doubt having contracted that strange human disease called familial affection." Kanaya turns to look him directly in the eye, nostrils flaring. "But if you do not desist in your infernal babbling and focus, I will dropkick you through this Lexus and not even apologize."

Dave meets her eyes without blinking. "That would be awesome enough that I wouldn't even care."

Before he can learn if Kanaya reacts the same way Karkat does to ironically prolonged eye contact (that is, with profuse, flustered swearing and multiple attempts at strangulation), their friendly bonding moment is interrupted by another echoing "Dammit!" - and then the Scratch kid is on them like a bat out of hell, landing on the roof of the Lexus at their backs with a bang that dents the metal and stabbing down at Dave.

Who has still not replaced his swordkind. He has backups, obviously, because when you break as many piece of shit swords as Dave has in his lifetime, you never travel cross country to visit your BFF without packing, like, thirty extras. But he's wasted his time gawping at Kanaya's miraculous feat of not-dying, and so he blocks with the half of a sword, trying not to think about the fact that he once spent an entire game wandering around with a sword that was only whole a quarter of the time.

"Enough!" Kanaya shouts, wheeling around to crush what's left of the poor car's roof with her
chiansaw when the Scratch dodges out of the way. The blond lashes out with his foot, one hand still on the car as he plants a kick on the first cut and knocks her staggering back into the next parking spot. Then he's on the pavement again, jabbing the sword up at Dave's face in a low-to-high arc.

And for a brief moment, when Dave flashsteps out of the way, the Scratch is frozen with his head low but his eyes staring up behind his rip-off shades, and there's something wrong.

Because that emotionless mask? Gone. The guy looks fucking distraught.

Sharp metal slices across Dave's shoulder, and he knocks the katana aside with a clang before the Scratch kid can shift his aim towards something more vital. Dave barely feels the cut, too busy blocking the next blow or five. Half of them, he doesn't see coming, and soon there are superficial nicks and slashes opening up along his forearms and sides; he's reduced to picking and choosing which of the countless attacks to parry, and letting the rest fall where they may. The pace of the battle is suddenly unreal, and he loses track of Kanaya completely because he doesn't dare look away from the Scratch kid long enough. At once point Dave's back slams up against the side of a minivan, and that's it, he's pinned. His elbow jars against the vehicle when he twists his arm the wrong way, and that's when he realizes his range of motion has basically been halved.

And the Scratch kid does not let up. Suddenly it's not just the superficial cuts making it past Dave's guard; it's deep ones, leaving his sleeves in shreds and slicing dangerously close to his exposed eyes. With a roar Kanaya catches up and starts battering at the kid from behind, but the Scratch accounts for her attacks effortlessly, so smoothly that even when Dave pauses time the kid is barely more than a blur of motion.

Okay, something happened. Something changed, and it's driven this guy into some kind of frenzy that's somehow made him even more of a goddamn menace. So Dave is not interested in hearing, when he's in the middle of fending off an onslaught of attacks that he's not fast enough to handle -

[reactivate auto-fraymotif? y/n]

It's the last straw. "Yes, okay!" Dave bawls at the roof of the parking garage. "Yes to all of the above! Lay down the sick beats, for fuck's sake!"

[y/n/all of the above acknowledged]

Wait.

[fraymotif activated: Recurative Accelerando]

Shit.

[fraymotif activated: Space-Time Stretto]

_Fucking Christ on a Pringle's container._

[auto-fraymotif reactivated: Turning the Tables]

…This is gonna suck.

[engage]

Dave's broken-ass sword disappears.

This would be a hell of a lot more of a problem, if not for the fact that he pauses time in a panic before the Scratch can take advantage of his sudden lack of a strife specibus, and it's not until about five seconds later that he realizes three things are very wrong with this picture.

Problem the first - Kanaya punches the Scratch across the back of his head.

While time is still paused.

Problem the second? The seconds keep trickling by, and Dave lets his jaw drop as the flashstep doesn’t end. It just keeps happening. There's no headache, not even the pain in his throat that would accompany his other forms of time travel.

Time seems content to stay stopped.

And problem numero tres -

There's something under his fingertips. He spreads them unconsciously, tracing familiar whorls and grooves, and it's only when Kanaya, taking advantage of the Scratch kid's inability to move, kicks the man out of the way and stares at Dave in disbelief that Dave can bring himself to look down.

He already knows what's there. He just doesn't really want it to be happening; there's still a goddamn enormous part of him that has wanted Jade to be wrong -

"What on earth is going on?" Kanaya says slowly. And that's - just bizarre. Just so goddamn bizarre. Dave is used to the space between seconds being a place of utter silence, a world of still people disturbed only by his own breaths and actions. Kanaya sounds odd, her voice echoing and amplified in his ears like she's speaking right into them rather than talking from a good three feet away, but she sounds, and that's -

"Hell yes," Dave breathes, the collar around his throat thrumming with a weird aftershock as he runs his fingers over the surface of the twin red-and-black turntables hovering beneath his hands. They lack any of the switches or cords of his mixers back home, but he knows without words exactly how to achieve the same effects. They feel like coming home. Like he's been cheating on his one true waifu-tables with a cheap hooker and now he's come crawling back on his hands and knees after all this time. How could you ignore us for so long, they seem to whisper. That is the opposite of all things ironically cool. "Hell fucking yes."

Kanaya is not feeling the wife vibes. This is probably because Kanaya does not do the timey thing on a regular basis, and is totes understandable. "Dave, I Would Appreciate An Explanation. Yesterday."

"Don't tempt me, because I think I could totally make that happen," Dave says. He tears his eyes away from the sight of the tables, which he's been soaking up like a man at an oasis in the desert, and checks on the Scratch - still frozen where Kanaya kicked him, which is kind of funny as hell - and then looks at Kanaya herself, shaking his head a little. "Remember that whole game thing you've been playing skeptic about?"

"Someone has to."

Dave is still not ogling his sister's girlfriend. He's just, y'know, casually watching as the cut across her chest seals up rapidly, the gleaming white skin knitting together without a scar or even a trace that it was ever there. The stab wound in her stomach is healing in double-time as well, and on impulse, Dave slides his ring finger upward across the tracks of the turntable under his right palm.

| Recurative Accelerando - basic notation:$\zeta \nabla \chi$ limit: 4±1 players effects: $x2$ health vial regen, $+3$ Vim, $\pm \iota \chi$ Pulchritude (max Sylph echeladder advancement attained; see God Tier for limit |
Oh god. It's so handy. Another twist, and he has the stats for [Space-Time Stretto], too. For the first time in for-goddamn-ever, Dave understands what all the music about. Where has this been his whole life?

"Well I'm pretty sure that as of thirty seconds ago, we are abusing the fuck out of some hella righteous game mechanics. So yeah, we're basically going to kick major ass here." Dave feels an itch running along his shoulders and scratches at it without really thinking. The turntable of that hand spins smoothly out of the way, and when he checks the skin of his shoulder, he sees that his own cut has begun to knit together, skipping straight from scabs to smooth flesh. This fraymotif business doesn't seem to be doing much for clothing damage, but hey, you win some, you lose some, and ones you lose? You jailbreak until you win anyway.

Seriously. This has so much potential.

On a hunch, Dave frowns, and listens past the three new scores playing in his head. [Turning the Tables] is a nice, steady beat that doesn't flow too badly with the other, louder two melodies, and [Space-Time Stretto] and [Recurative Accelerando] have a weird synchronicity, like they're designed to overlay with each other. It's not perfectly smooth, but it's not flagrantly unrighteous, either. What he's saying is, he could totally jam to this.

But. There's still that one weird note, droning on and on in a persisting [ɯɯɯɯɯɯɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɿ
At the moment she is on special assignment - one of her first field assignments in quite some time, actually. As a specialist in marine lusii, of course she has to suffer through the usual 'lock up your mutated, oversized custodial beasts' lecture that everyone gets whenever Japan has an incident - which happens basically every other week. This time, oddly enough, it was a midsized clam rampaging through South Korea. The point still stands.

But quite a few of her colleagues have already visited this particular house, and all have come back empty-clawed for reasons that, quite frankly, make zero fucking sense whatsoever. The lusus here should have been reclaimed and either reassigned to a new grub or retired permanently in a reserve ages ago, according to the paperwork. Jenvir claims he was attacked, but there hadn't been a mark on him when he returned to base soaking wet and vaguely singed a fortnight ago. Loucas is still in therapy and won't say a word. Ulaine was actually missing until last Friday, when she mysteriously turned up in the middle of a lusus retirement reserve in northern Alaska, with no memory of how she got there and clutching several empty aluminum tins. After a quick search of the park, they found that no, she hadn't managed to deliver the lusus she'd been sent to retrieve, never mind that a crustacean-type shouldn't have been taken to the Alaskan reserve in the first place. It's quite the conundrum.

And of course, the troll assigned to the dwelling has responded to none of the official summonses or retirement notices. Typical. Korlas always ends up stuck with the cases everyone else is too terrified to deal with anymore, which happens on a semi-regular basis. She still has nightmares about the one time she had to deal with a giant seahorse gone feral. It's never pretty when a lusus gets overly attached to its current charge, and even less pretty when it's a marine lusus - they're bred tough to deal with tougher grubs, and have a nasty tendency to go as crazy as their charges when an adolescent troll descends into coldblooded dementia.

As Korlas approaches the front door, she can make out scratch marks on the paint at about shoulder-height, and when she tests her theory by holding up her own retirement notice - yeah, someone's been tearing these off. Or worse, something. Because if Mr Vantas isn't the one reading these, there's only one possible culprit. Damn, she hates the overattached ones. "Mr Vantas! Mr Vaaaantas! Helloooo!" When she receives no reply, Korlas sighs, and starts flipping through the papers on her clipboard, still shouting. "Mr Vantas, I am the fourth delegate the lusii control department has sent to this hive in the past two weeks. We seriously need to discuss this delay in your lusus's retirement!"

She squints at the third paper and nudges her assistant in the side. "Is this troll still in high school?"

"Yes, but he filed for early custodian retrieval. We haven't been able to confirm his report that the lusus is senile on account of...no one seems to have actually seen the lusus. Except Jenvir, and he's still kinda -" The assistant uses her finger to draw a spiral at the side of her head for 'cuckoo.'

"Oh, for god's sake. He's probably not even home right now." Korlas shakes her head - and frowns. "Shit. Mr Vantas filed this request himself?"

"It's the tenth page in."

She flips through to it. "Damn. He's not the one ignoring our notices, then. He probably hasn't even seen them, if he's always out at school when our guys come around to pick up the lusus."

Her assistant gulps. "You don't mean -"

"Yup." Korlas passes the clipboard to her assistant, and starts loosening her tie and rolling up her sleeves. "We have us an overattached, non-standard crustacean custodian."

"Should we call for backup?"
"Backup couldn't get to Loucas in time. We're already trampling all over this sucker's lawnrnig - it's been watching us." Hell, she thinks, an overprotective sonofabitch like this? It probably marked them at the sidewalk, and depending on how defensive it has become, could lash out like the cornered animal it is at any moment.

Damn. If Vantas had just noticed when the date for his lusus's retrieval came and went...the longer an overattached lusus hangs around the unfortunate troll in question, the harder it'll fight for what it convinces itself will always be its charge. "It's gotta be all or nothing, at this point," Korlas says, cracking her knuckles and baring her teeth.

Her assistant takes a large step back from the door, yellow eyes flicking to one of the windows, and Korlas glances through the window on the other side of the door, assessing her best method of entry. The house is dark inside, as though all the lights are out, and she can't make out much through a crack that spirals outward in the glass pane. She looks away.

In the corner of her eye, she just barely misses as something pale and hulking crosses room behind the window, without so much as a skree of warning.

Her mind made up, Korlas snaps on her goggles and draws out her industrial-strength taser. "Hold the clipboard, Miaran. This is going to be...messy."

She hauls up her foot and kicks the door down. It's one of those things you learn in lusii veterinarian school.

She never sees it coming.

Miaran Wether, assistant veterinarian, reports back to the branch office two days later. The transport vehicle is missing a tire and the metal roof has been shredded like paper. All of the lusus restraint belts have been torn out of their sockets, and when she steps out of the driver's side door, the door itself comes off in her hand.

When questioned about the location of the branch marine specialist, she can only shake her head, eyes wide as she sits silently in the corner of the office.

The clipboard is intact.

---

John wakes up.

Everything feels flat, and for a moment, however short, he can't breathe. There's a weight in his chest that he can't shift, and he wheezes before realizing there's nothing but the heavy coverlet thrown over him, nothing else holding him down. There are no breezes tugging at the sheets or the covers, or trying to lift him out of bed and out the window - but only because he's awake to suppress the urge when he realizes the breathless panic is needless. He's not in any danger. Not really.

A soft gust runs through his hair like fingers, a half-hearted tug as he rolls over and pulls up the corner of the old-fashioned, dusty blue drapes to peer out the window over the bed. The Lalonde house looks modern on the outside and like something out of Harry Potter on the inside, and John's old bedroom is no exception. Apparently, when they moved, the Lalondes hadn't taken much of the existing furniture with them - Rose's room is picked over and sparse, since she took all her belongings with her in the move, but when John looked in yesterday she had the same bedframe and curtains he remembers, and his own room is perfectly preserved. The dust-covered wizard statues in the far corner may be weirdly tacky, but they still match the dark blue of the furniture and wallpaper, a testament to Doctor Lalonde's strange but generous instincts.

He can just barely recall the first time he visited Rose, and Doctor Lalonde had announced that his room had already been decorated for him. He's pretty sure no other parent in the world but Doctor Lalonde would insist on dedicating an entire room in her own home to her daughter's friend of barely a week; Lalondes are kind of passive-aggressively over the top that way, and Rose had certainly treated the whole thing as an embarrassing indulgence on her mother's part. But then, John hadn't known then what he knows now. Now, the thought that Rue Lalonde might have already known more about John's powers than he did himself as a kid makes the whole thing way more plausible.

Looking outside, John presses his fingers to the glass and sees that the sky above is just as tepidly grey as it was yesterday, and the day before that, and the day before.

And that's good! Yeah! That's awesome! Because the meteorologists on the news keep reporting a lot of weird storms and other weather phenomena going on elsewhere in the state, with a high risk of hail and thunderstorms that have flooded some areas, and the last thing John wants is to have to fly through weather like that for work every night. That would just suck! If they're having a weird rainy season, it can just steer clear of Seattle, thanks very much.

John lets his forehead fall forward on the glass, and blinks at his fingers as they continue to slowly drum on the glass. His breath leaves a misty trail of condensation that he draws two eyes in before hesitating over the mouth, and it clears up before he can finish the drawing. Memory gnaws at the back of his mind, something biting and cruel that threatens to scream through his synapses and make him relive some inescapable, not at all friendly event from before. He mentally shoves it away with a weary nudge, and the tightness in his chest recedes. He's gotten better about not forgetting to the point of unconscious amnesia, but he can't deal with everything his mind wants to subject him to at once. The past is kind of a tense subject right now, and -

...The past tense. Heheheheh. Okay, that was a good one, and John hadn't even been thinking about it! Chuckling to himself, he wonders where he's heard that pun before. Maybe some famous person said it, or he got it out of one of Karkat's lamer sitcoms. When in doubt, it's usually troll Will Smith. He'll put money on it being an awesome joke from Men in Black, because even John can admit that movie was quality. Karkat thinks the sequels are just as quality, but Karkat also has a massive poster of Will Smith's face from Thresh Prince of Bel-Air in his closet that he thinks John doesn't know about.

...Laughing isn't really helping. Thinking about Karkat's dumb adorable quirks isn't helping, either. John groans, thumps his head against the glass a few more times for good measure, and wonders how he's gonna get through the day when it feels like he's got grey sludge where his insides used to be. He's supposed to be feeling better, now that he's let all these memories sink into his head where they belong and the agony of rewatching everyone die has faded a little into his subconscious, but in the absence of that sharp pain now he just feels gross. Seriously, the last time he felt this gross, he ran to Dave halfway across the country without even letting himself remember why Dave was so important.

But everyone John would want to escape to is already right here, so! He should go see them! Wow, the solution is really obvious when he puts it that way! It still takes him several precious minutes to sit up and tumble out of bed toward the wayyy over-decorated bathroom, but by the time Karkat stumbles in, having missed a splotch of sticky green sopor slime behind one ear that he insists John help him wipe off, the conflicting instinct to either curl up in bed and sleep through the day or grab everyone with the Breeze and sweep them up into the sky to do something about this dumb weather has mostly been tamped down by logic. John can practically hear his dad's voice in his ears already, admonishing him sternly on the ever-present need to maintain the façade of normalcy - especially since missing another day of school, after so many random absences over the past month, would kinda start causing problems with the school administration. John needs to be as normal as possible in his everyday life, given the circumstances!

The last thing he needs is to lose control in class and out himself before Diamonds Droog can. That would just be lame.

-

Don't panic.

It's the mantra that has been getting him through the day.

It's not working all that well. It's been a bad day, okay?

Jade is gone - there's an insistent breeze tugging on his sleeve that yanks Heir toward the stadium in the distance, some ingrained instinct that he thinks can always lead him to her, but from this far away he can't distinguish her breathing from the rest of basically all of Seattle, and his stomach drops out from under him at the sudden, unexpected absence. Then Dave is ripped away, too fast for him to do anything about it, and it's like being asphyxiated.

Like he's losing track of who he is again.

Seriously. A really, really bad day. Not as bad as some of the days he's had recently, but still - holy crap, he needs this to not be happening while he's on the job.

Breathe. Breathe. Holy crap, breathe!

He's actually kind of embarrassed that it takes Rose's warning to jolt him out of his panicky, rapidly tunneling vision and notice the entire police car flying at him and Karkat. The wind doesn't even try to catch the two and half tons of metal and shrieking sirens with so little forewarning; Heir feels his head whip back as the breeze lifting him up into the air abruptly reverses direction and slams him down on top of Karkat, with more force than if it had simply let gravity take him. He can't see Karkat - Hemogoblin, Hemogoblin, alright? Not this again - because he's pretty sure Rose did something to make him invisible with her sweet magic powers, but he's always unconsciously zeroed in on the troll's breathing these days. Mostly because listening to Karkat's breathing is really soothing - and wow, talk about one of the creepiest thoughts he's ever had. Ever. But it totally is, like somehow Karkat's lifetime of honing his lungs for the sole purpose of shouting down the rest of the world has both trained him to yell at a moment's notice and act as a balm to John's frayed nerves.

Because if nothing else, when Karkat really hits his stride, it's always guaranteed to be side-splittingly hilarious to listen to.

But the realization that the two of them are in danger at least snaps Heir out his super embarrassing moment of panic. Part of him wants Hemogoblin to stay down, where basically anything coming at them will have to go through Heir first, but that's not practical. At all. For a lot of reasons.

He's standing up now.

Stay calm - stay calm.
What he confronts when he does stand, however, is something completely beyond his realm of experience.

See, Heir has never been up against someone as strong as him before. Jade could probably hand him his butt on a platter, yeah, but they've never had the chance to put that to the test. And neither Dave nor Rose have demonstrated the kind of superhuman strength and endurance that John and Jade do - who knows whether that's down to ectobiological genetics or just some strange quirk of the game and their old titles. And while fighting crime, Heir has always, always held back. Normal people, humans and trolls alike, are kinda fragile, and he doesn't want to accidentally hurt someone or worse when he's just trying to prevent a robbery.

The whole ability to juggle a police car like it's light as a feather should have tipped him off sooner. Because the moment the Scratch girl slams the bar of her oversized forkkind against Casey, Heir nearly crumples under the impact, his knees buckling and his calves jolting as he strains to remain upright, caught completely unawares by the jarringly unwelcome sensation of clashing with someone who is exactly as strong as he is. If not more so. He breaks the deadlock fast, before she can press him further, and half-jumps, half-floats backward so he can circle around cautiously, panting as he tries to regain his bearings. The urge to panic drowns fast now that he has something to focus all of his attention on.

Right. Focus. Heir meets the girl's pale blue eyes and resists the instinct to track Hemogoblin's position with his eyes, knowing there'd be nothing to see. The troll is circling around as well, but in a much wider arc, no doubt looking for an angle from which to launch a sneakier attack. Hemogoblin has always favored shadows and stealth to make up for his lack of raw strength, so Heir is glad he and Rose found a way to play to that strategy.

The question remains, though. How exactly is Heir going to approach this? They'd agreed while getting prepared to leave the Lalonde house that they'd seek to subdue the mysterious Scratch kids and hand them over to the authorities if possible, in a show of solidarity that might ease the unconscious tension between the city and its ridiculous high number of resident vigilantes before the FVRT arrives.

But clearly, they're not dealing with any ordinary, run of the mill human criminals here. In his entire career, Heir has only come up against one super-powered villain before (he's not sure if anyone from the Midnight Crew counts or not); they're more common in larger cities with more crime, and he's got no doubt Jade as Sharpshooter, bounding around the world for years, has plenty of experience with them. And to be frank, the villain Heir fought - three years ago, some doofus with electrical powers who shorted out the power grid for a couple hours - hadn't been all that clever or strong on his own merits. Other people who have tried to claim the title have usually just been wannabes cribbing off villains from comic books. Nothing special.

He shifts his grip on Casey, his gloves feeling a little worn (when was the last time he replaced them specifically?) and the hammer almost too familiar in his hands. At least it's not painted blue with rainbow accents; the last thing he needs right now is more flashback fuel.

The Scratch girl breaks the standoff first, hauling her strife specibus back for another powerful swing of the kind she used to take out the police officers. This time, Heir parries without holding back as he did the first time, bringing the hammer down with as much force as he has time to muster. Both metal weapons reverberate, so hard that it almost startles Heir into letting go out of shock as his hands numb. Then, without pause, the Scratch pulls away and spins right into another strike. Heir dodges under it, his eyes wide as he rolls out of the way, dizzy with the alternating view of stone and sky until he comes back up on his feet in a crouch.
Crap. He should have begun sparring with Jade ages ago. He's not out of shape, necessarily; he just has zero practice compensating for his strength being equaled like this in a battle. Heir and his dad designed and specially commissioned Casey to withstand a heck of a lot of stress, or the weapon wouldn't have lasted long over the years; he guesses the Scratch's forkkind has been forged with the same idea in mind. Despite the two hard blows, there's not a dent or a scuff anywhere he can see on the burnished red metal.

And she's not pulling any punches, here. When she hefts her specibus and narrows her eyes at him, the stone of the fountain where her blow landed instead of on top of his head has shattered into tiny slate grey fragments, crumbling rock trickling from the lowest prong of the fork as she lifts it over her shoulder. At this rate, they're going to end up annihilating what's left of a city landmark. Awesome.

But! He's not going to win this on the defensive! He needs to knock her unconscious, because he's pretty sure that forkkind isn't breaking any time soon, and disarming her probably wouldn't be enough to stop her, regardless. Huffing, Heir reaches out to the breezes still writhing around him, and opens one of his jarred fists to gesture ever so slightly with a flick of his fingers, directing a gust to circle around the Scratch's ankles. The girl looks down sharply, the flat corner of her mouth curling downward with faint displeasure and suspicion, and Heir lunges in to bring his hammerkind down. As expected, she blocks the strike in one smooth movement, her hands set wide along the fork as she tilts her head back to catch Casey right along the balance point of her specibus.

At the same time, however, she adjusts her stance, moving her feet to brace herself properly - and Heir yanks on the breeze, hard. Her right foot stays stubbornly planted; her left boot grates and slides out from under her, slipping on the fragments of rock she herself shattered into pieces, and just like that she starts tipping backwards at a dangerous angle. Yes!

Or maybe not. Heir could swear her eyes roll at him derisively and then she drops backwards of her own accord, kicking off her solidly balanced foot into a back flip with her forkkind caught under her splayed fingers. The foot Heir yanked off center almost kicks him right in the nose, and only the timely intervention of the wind jerking his head back by the hair - ouch - saves him from spending the rest of the fight with a very smashed up nose. The Scratch lands without missing a beat, longer sections of her black hair flopping over the shaved section by her ear and around the back of her skull when she tosses her head back to stare at him coolly.

Okay. So. She's good. She's really good.

Heir swallows, and halfway through the motion the Scratch kid strikes again. She moves faster, the weight of the forkkind slams against Casey with even more force, and Heir finds himself struggling to shove her back until, gritting his teeth, he lets the wind help him, floating up to hover in the air and knock the fork back. He can't fight back the thought, however, that floating might be even more dangerous than standing on solid ground where this kid is concerned, a nagging unease that has him tapping his feet back onto the ground before bringing Casey down over his head. She sidesteps him and he's the one to crack open the stone unfortunate enough to take the brunt of the hammer's weight. If he leaves an even wider ring of broken rock, it's only because the hammer has more surface area than the prong of a fork. Recovering quickly, Heir tries the trick with the wind again, clenching his hand into a fist as the gust assigned to the Scratch's feet yank and tug at her to no avail. She just sinks her weight into her heels and waits to shift her stance until Heir's distracted again by her next attack.

Heir fails to notice that his winds are growing more and more agitated until he hears, very faintly, someone cough hoarsely, and recognizes it as coming from Hemoglobin. As he kicks off the ground and flies out of the way of the Scratch's blow, the girl grimaces as her specibus breaks another chunk of the ground up into shrapnel - and dust, dust which Heir only just now realizes his winds have seized and begun to filter into the air like a grey dust storm. Ugh. It's gonna start obscuring vision, soon, if he's not careful with it, but the longer the strife lasts, the more Heir finds himself having to loosen more and more of his control over both his physical attacks and the breezes themselves. He stops landing when the broken-up surface of the ground becomes too fragmented to keep his balance on, and focuses on trying to knock the forkind out of the Scratch's hands from above, because that thing has to go - the only hope he has at the moment for finishing this fight fast, before Hemogoblin can get himself involved and possibly hurt, is that maybe the Scratch only has one specibus specialty. Yeah, he doesn't think he's gonna be that lucky. But hey, if he can separate her from the weapon she favors, that is most definitely a good thing in his book! A little desperate, Heir pulls even more of a crosswind and directs it to blow first across the Scratch's face, bringing a cloud of dirt along with it so that she can't see, and then doing everything it can to trip her up and bring her to the ground.

No good; perhaps sensing that he's urging the wind on to a gale force, the Scratch drops to her knees, the forkind spinning to stab through a section of splintered stone and dig into the ground beneath her. Heir groans with frustration and calls the wind back.

This is so weird! If he doesn't figure out a way to break this stalemate, he's not sure who will outlast who, and that's a scary thought! Hemogoblin's still circling, and Heir doesn't blame him at all - the harder he and the Scratch swing at each other, the wilder the strikes fly, and that's not exactly a good situation to jump blindly into when your main hero gambit involves not dying. You know. As a general rule.

Then, with little warning, the Scratch kid changes the rules: when Heir swings Casey, he just barely catches the change in her body language, the distinct way she lines up not to swing back, but to do something entirely different. At the last moment he realizes what he's seeing, just in time to stop his blow midswing and pull out of the line of fire as she jabs the forkind rather than swinging it like a bat. All the tines of the fork are sharpened to a deadly point, and Heir gulps unconsciously at how close he comes to having a fork introduced to his face in the most stabby way possible. Unbothered by his dodge, the Scratch retracts the fork fast.

Too fast. Heir is trying to track the weapon, of course, which means his head turns a little to follow it when it jabs past him, and continues to do so when he thinks she's pulling it right back to her side for another hit.

Instead, without warning, the Scratch grunts and forces the fork to the side, right as it's passing his face. Heir yelps at the sudden blur of movement in his periphery, but there's no time to bring Casey up at such an awkward angle. He almost thinks he's managed to dodge it again by wrenching his near shoulder backward - but then the wind gives a pang of warning, wrapping around his face hard enough to make his eyes water, and that's all the defense he has as the Scratch's fork continues on its abrupt swing -

And slams into his far eye. The goggles he wears to protect his eyes and identity do absolutely nothing to buffer a blow with that much force behind it, and there is a moment, however brief, where he can't even tell if he closes his eyelid in time or not. Heir knocks the forkind away on reflex with Casey, gaping at the pain but not letting any noise escape him as he claps a hand over the eye, yanking the single, now-cracked goggle lens down for a moment to check the damage. It burns like it's been set on fire, throbbing so hard it feels like his optic nerve decided to tap dance on his brain, too, but when he traces his eyelid and the socket, he finds a long, thin score where the skin has broken and the outside of the eye socket where the blunt curve of the fork caught on the bone and jammed the edge of the goggles deep into the soft tissue has already begun to bruise and swell up into a puffy mess when he dares to press at it. He runs a finger along the underside of his eye and the glove comes away damp only with clear fluid, rather than blood.
But that's good. If all the damage is on the outside of his eyelid, and he can't feel anything but tears oozing out from the eye itself, he got his eye shut just in the nick of time. It could have been way worse if the Scratch had bludgeoned his eye and - he shudders - it had popped like a grape under the pressure. Ewww, ugh. He doesn’t even want to imagine that anymore. Gross.

His awareness of Hemogoblin's breath spikes at that moment, however, and Heir glances over the Scratch's shoulder before he can repress the instinct, jerking his head back down quick enough that he knows it's too obvious a tell. The troll has stayed well out of the way of the two humans smashing up the fountain mall, but now that they've come to a lull in the action, evaluating each other, Hemogoblin must think he has an opening, and slinks toward the Scratch girl from behind.

God. This is so dangerous. One wrong move, and the Scratch could crack Hemogoblin's head open like an egg. Heir hastily clamps down on the panic that rises up again and starts backing away from the Scratch in a straight line, floating about a foot above the ground as he does so. His eye throbs painfully and it's swollen shut by this point; even if the pain were absent, he couldn't open it even if he wanted to. Hopefully, it'll make the Scratch kid underestimate him more than it actually impedes his reflexes. The girl squints at his sham retreat, her expression bored but assessing once more. Heir strings together a plan that is basically just keep moving, keep her attention here so her back stays turned away from Hemogoblin, and most importantly, act normal -

Rose screams.

Forget normal. Normal is overrated. Now sounds like an awesome time to freak the fuck out. John's head cranks around on his neck before he even finishes deciding whether it's a smart idea to look away from the Scratch kid for more than five seconds. His mind screams at him in agonized pain, struggling to explain how Rose could sound like she's in so much pain when not even a moment ago her breathing was controlled, if a little labored, not at all the breath patterns of someone who felt like she was under immediate threat. But when he finally sees her, his heart leaps into his throat and does a good impression of a tango, because Rose is down. She's curled up on her knees, the lone Scratch girl she's been paired off with looking utterly bewildered - and then, accompanied by a second scream, Rose's arm swarms with tentacles of grimdark.

John forgets himself completely. Above the screaming that echoes in his head, the only really thought that escapes the mire is get to Rose. Whatever is happening, he has to get her out of here. "Rose!" he shouts, trying to get her attention. When she looks up, his stomach knots further; her eyes leak a sickly white fire, and he barely sees any recognition in her stare when she meets his eyes, like something else now looks out through her eyes to stare through him.

But there is recognition. John hits the ground hard, misjudging the distance between him and the ground so that a sharp pang runs up through his heels. "Rose, hang o-"

In retrospect, he managed to make the whole thing into a constitutional fucking clusterfuck just by taking his eyes off the Scratch. He totally deserves the sudden, blinding pain as something smashes into the side of his head and sends him reeling.

And Heir is -
TR: bluh bluh bluh! let me take over!
    (John, mo vê! )
TR: gosh, you're really so useless...
    …probably...not...
TR: whatever. you can't keep this up much longer. we can have fun soon!
Urgh...
TR: it'll be great!
...Whew! Not falling unconscious! Kind of touch and go for a second, there! But Heir snaps back into awareness, the side of his head throbbing, but otherwise pretty sure everything's still in working order. His palms and one knee ache as the dark, static-riddled fuzz clears from his field of vision, and he shakes his head to clear it further and see that he's staggered onto one knee, hands splayed out over broken stone to brace himself through the worst of the light-headedness. His goggles have twisted around with the force of the blow, one lens over the wrong eye and the other yanked up at an angle over his hair and his ear; when he reaches up and firmly tugs them back into place over his eyes one of the lenses - the one that took the full force of the earlier eye shot - just pops out of the setting altogether, landing on the ground in two pieces. It leaves his vision weirdly distorted. He squeezes his eyes shut again. They're not even prescription lenses, dam it! But the presence of a lens in front of one of his eyes and not the other, in combination with the bright pain in his head, shoots his depth-perception in the foot.

"Heir! Come on, dumbass, do not pass out on me! Open your stupid fucking ganderbulbs right this blood shitting second!"

Honestly, it's hard to tell which of the two voices alarms Heir more - the one that sounds like Rose's voice filtered through the spinning blades of an electric fan, or the one that is obviously Hemogoblin, very loud and very much on the edge of genuine panic.

And if Heir's brains weren't too scrambled by that hit and he's not hallucinating things, Rose might well be on her way to tearing apart most of downtown Seattle in a grimdark fugue. So he looks for Rose first, his vision wheeling and dizzying for a moment before straightening out, and scans the area around the fountain. There's no sign of a massive cluster of thorns and tentacles rising into the sky, so kudos for that! In fact, Heir almost doesn't see Rose at first because the other Scratch girl, the one with blonde hair, is kneeling between the two of them, grabbing at Rose's not-tentacle hand and shaking her arm as though trying to snap her out of it.

Uh. Weird. But Heir appreciates the effort! Yeah, it worries him that it's one of the bad guys doing it, but he crosses his fingers that the Scratch kids might have a vested interest in not dying of invasive exposure to really evil tentacle monsters, just like heroes do, and cautiously hauls himself back upright to help Hemogoblin out.

Blood streaks down the side of his face, dribbling warm and wet along the side of his neck, and he tries not to think about how deep the throbbing cut along the side of his head and temple goes. He likes to think that if his head were splitting open and his brains were sticking out or something gross like that, he'd be able to tell - that would be pain on a whole other level! Head wounds always bleed a lot, right? Right.

He consults with his dad before making up his mind. He's pretty sure Jade at least is determined to investigate this weird message all of them have received, and everyone else is pretty curious, too, whether they live here or not. The threat towards civilians would normally be a clincher for John too, middle of the school day or no. The result of having so many kids who moonlight as heroes all packed into one house? It's kind of a perfect storm of impulsive heroism, and it would be totally awesome to witness in real life if John hadn't been super concerned about little things.
Like the fact that these mysterious challengers call themselves 'Scratch kids.'

Scratch, who heads the Midnight Crew.

Scratch, who is Diamonds Droog's boss.

Scratch, who did something, something John can't quite puzzle out - led Rose astray, somehow, but it's one of the rare memories crackling with static that not even John's silly head can replay, no matter how much he wants it to, for once.

"Does this count as interfering with Crew business?" bursts out of John's mouth before Samuel has even finished closing the door of the office on a living room featuring Karkat, Dave, and Jade — not exactly the least volatile of trios to leave alone and unsupervised, but Karkat isn't nearly as sleep deprived as he was even a few days ago, his nightmares having mostly been repeats that he's handling a lot better now that he understands the context of them, and John believes in Karkat's rapidly replenishing, if still hilariously minimal, self-control. Also, Dave has a cushion over his head, so maybe Karkat won't be able to hear him. Fingers crossed. And toes crossed, because they need all the luck they can get.

"Too hard to say, son," Samuel says, his expression thoughtful but grim as he paces toward his latest borrowed desk. It's so weird, still, seeing his dad making use of offices that are not his own; particularly when this room contains several display cabinets full of telescopes and wizardly figurines. Rose once dubbed this the 'porcelain wizard baby collection,' he remembers fondly.

The Lalonde house is full of nice memories like that. Memories that can't be confused for those cleaved from another life, which is nice. That, combined with the return of that sickly, anxious greyness that has gunked up his mood all day, makes him all the more secretly relieved that their own house is too compromised to be a safe haven for everyone anymore - being torn between memories of a house full of monsters and no sign of his dad anywhere until it's too late and memories of the place he felt trapped in by his depression and anxiety since Rose moved would have been too much to handle.

"They called us out. Deliberately. It can't be interfering if they want me there, right?" he suggests, hedging. "Unless...Droog's planned this as a test? To see if I'll give her a reason to use her blackmail..." He trails off, because honestly, they can't put anything past a criminal and a monster like Droog. "If - if it's too much of a risk -"

The idea of Jade, Dave, Rose, maybe even Kanaya being forced to pick up the slack on defending John's own city, even considering the extenuating circumstances - it sucks. He loves having them around, but if they were to separate, to fight alone where he couldn't follow -

John mashes the wrong memory down with a silent gasp, lips parting as he sucks in a breath to replace it and try to slow his frantic heart rate down before Karkat notices and comes charging in. Blood powers, yeesh.

But it's terrifying.

Samuel presses a hand on his shoulder, and John looks down at his dad. Too much so - he realizes he's floating a foot above the carpet, and when he sets down with an apologetic look, his connection to the wind presses at his mind, still fretting because of his own infectious, momentary panic. "Sorry."

"No need to apologize, son," he dad says, squeezing John's shoulder and then stepping back to the desk, stroking the underside of his chin with a pondering expression. John forces himself to relax, shaking out his arms, because his dad doesn't look as strained as he has of late - he looks like he's thinking carefully, and will no doubt have the situation puzzled out to his satisfaction shortly.

John's been trying to be more independent as a hero as he gets older, in fits and starts, always hampered by insecurities that even he doesn't always understand. But it's still reassuring to have the full weight of Samuel's years of experience and fatherly wisdom to fall back on in times when John feels like he's lost his objectivity - particularly now that Droog has carved out the very foundation of his safety and stability.

"I think," Samuel says, slow and measured, as he rights a wizard bobblehead knocked over onto his computer's keyboard by John's outburst, "you should be fine. A brazen challenge like this has not been Droog's modus operandi, from what we've read about her dealings in the past."

John nods, biting his lip, and falls into a litany of, "Kidnapping, bribery, blackmail -"

"But not challenges. She works in the shadows. And the term 'Scratch kids..." Samuel shakes his head. "There's never been a word about them before. I emailed one of my contacts already, and when they felt secure enough to respond they were positive Droog had no such task force by that name. They could be new additions, true. But the Midnight Crew is a vast organization - no one is entirely sure how large, simply because their members are so stubbornly loyal and tight-lipped about the details. Not a single member has broken ranks or snitched in years, now, since they first started expanding."

"So we just can't know for sure." John sighs, scratching at the back of his head. What a dumb situation…

Samuel hesitates. "And if worst comes to worst, and they are involved in Droog's business," he says, clearly striving for casual as he adjusts his tie absently, "John...you already know how I feel. We need to be ready to leave at a moment's notice, regardless."

John can read between the lines. As far as his dad is concerned, John's identity as a hero is already out, beyond hope of concealing or repair.

Even if this is a trap to lure him into breaking his deal with Diamonds Droog...well, it's only ever really been a question of when, not if, Droog would betray him.

John breathes in deeply, and lets it go when it does nothing to help the nausea in his belly. "I'm going." If for no other reason that he's seen the look on Karkat's face, and he knows that Hemogoblin is going. He isn't leaving Karkat to fight alone, not ever.

Samuel smiles, and only his eyes are tired. "Of course, son."

- Hemogoblin is very much visible, and Heir can only put that down to the fact that Rose can't focus on making people invisible when she's got other things on her mind. The flat light of day leeches the vibrancy from the colors of everyone's uniforms, not just Hemogoblin, and so the dark reds and greyish blacks of his uniform seem dull compared to the obvious luminescence of his eyes. The troll has both sickles out but fights mostly on the defensive, weaving and ducking and tumbling out of the way of the Scratch kid's relentless onslaught. If his motions lack their usual liquid grace, Heir chalks it up to the fact that Hemogoblin is still nominally recovering from pretty severe injuries - and, okay, might be a little out of practice from almost a week of convalescence. But the fact is, he's smooth enough to avoid every swipe of the Scratch's forkkind, even without the benefit of darkness to obscure him, and that takes real talent.
It's also obviously a delaying tactic to keep the Scratch occupied, and the moment Heir lurches to his feet, his head still buzzing with a weird afternote of dissonance, the Scratch girl demonstrates that she's not as distracted as Hemogoblin might like by breaking off her next strike to focus on both of them at once, her lip curling again. Her disdain is clear, and unlike Heir, now reeling a little as he struggles to collect himself, and Hemogoblin, stiff and lacking his usual smirk as he lands in a crouch, she has the advantage of being at the peak of health and physical fitness. Maybe it's two against one, but the odds don't reassure Heir the way he'd like.

Seriously. There are so many things wrong with this picture.

"Aauugh," Heir says, hefting Casey over his shoulder. He has to shove through the sharp twinge in his head to do it, but Hemogoblin meets his eye from the other side of the Scratch and Heir makes a face at him, even more aware this time of the lopsided look of his goggles with the single lens missing. "Lame. This is so lame."

"Haha. Really tickling my absurdity palate over here, Heir," the troll replies, rolling his eyes. "We're totally getting our butts kicked."

"No, really? I hadn't noticed."

The curl at the corner of the Scratch's mouth ticks down a fraction. Their lack of action is clearly not on her agenda.

Well, sucks to suck, basically, because Heir wants the opposite of her agenda. Whatever it may be. He shrugs, and the hammer shifts with the curve of his shoulder. "So, you gonna be alright if we stop being lame? We have a reputation to maintain, y'know! Think you can keep up?"

Hemogoblin's eyebrow achieves liftoff. "Can you?" he drawls, one fist resting on his hip as he tests more of his weight on one leg than the other. "See, this is why humans need to fucking reconsider their evolution choices - maybe if you pile of irresponsible fucknuts all got your shit together at some point throughout the continuum of your existence, you'd have horns to protect your fragile nugbone instead of wandering around waiting for someone to crack it open like an egg."

And this - this banter sets Heir at ease. He's used to thinking of Hemogoblin as a mysterious entity of the night, not Karkat, his best friend, but now that same cocky attitude that Hemogoblin uses to differentiate himself from his everyday identity seems to have started breaking out into spontaneous bursts of Karkat-style insults. It filters through the worst of Heir's headache like a cool breeze.

Sure, he's still not sure in what way he finds the whole thing attractive, flushed or pale, because he's still not ready to admit to Karkat that might be an issue. But by the time the Scratch loses patience with their banter, Heir can feel his grin growing into something more genuine, his head settling back into normalcy as he swipes half-heartedly at the next trickle of blood leaking down his temple before it can drip into his eye.

"Alright then," he says cheerily. "Let's get started!"

And the Scratch kid launches her forkkind at his face.

He flings himself to the side hastily, the memory of getting his head and eye bust open still fresh in his mind. But then, in quick succession, the Scratch keeps the forkkind extended and spins in a circle, sending Hemogoblin diving for cover and whirling all the way around to strike again at the back of Heir's head. She's not at all stymied by the logistics of fighting two people at once - if Hemogoblin cartwheels out of the path of one blow, the Scratch smoothly channels the force into another swing at Heir, occasionally resorting to kicks with drill-like precision that force one hero to retreat while the other takes the full brunt of her intense focus.

Soon they're over the grass instead of the stone, slowly driven toward the street as Hemogoblin concedes ground. Heir can block the Scratch girl's fork with Casey and, rarely, retaliate. But when Hemogoblin catches one blow on a sickle, the sharp blade shatters under the force, retracting back into the troll's wrist as a ribbon of bright red blood, and from that moment on Hemogoblin knows better than to try and hold his ground. Instead, the troll does everything possibly to dart in whenever the Scratch turns her back for even the briefest moment, dropping low on the water-slicked grass to sweep out kicks aimed for her heels and the backs of her knees. Almost less than an afterthought, Heir can hear more sirens - backup for the police the Scratch girl took down, and hopefully an ambulance for some of them - but he thinks if he lets himself be distracted again for any reason either he or Hemogoblin are gonna be hit in a way they won't come back up from.

It's not even that the Scratch is that much faster or stronger than him. It's that she's coldly, brutally competent, proficient with wielding her specibus to its maximum capacity in close proximity, and the more they fight, the more she adapts to their tricks. When Heir batters at her hands with the wind to try and rip the weapon from her grasp, she tightens her grip and stabs with a purpose until his concentration is broken; when Hemogoblin takes advantage of her distraction to slice at the cords of her Achilles tendon, she stabs the forkkind down into the earth so fast Hemogoblin barely moves his hand in time so that his wrist is caught between the tines rather than being impaled. Heir lets out a wordless shout of warning, but Hemogoblin looks up, sees the foot coming at his face, and flattens himself to the ground. Her mouth a thin line, the Scratch jams the forkkind further into the ground with all her weight and then rounds on Heir, using the long pole of her specibus as a brace to launch herself up and land a flying side kick across his cheek.

Hemogoblin lets out a choked, barely swallowed yelp as Heir slides backward in the grass and the fork crunches down harder over the thin bones of his wrist. Black splotches flaring across his vision, Heir feels more than sees that the Scratch kid could easily just twist and with enough force Hemogoblin's wrist would snap, and so instead of letting the wind waft him back to recover from the renewed wash of pain in his skull, Heir wrenches himself forward against the breeze's silent protests, tackling the Scratch around the waist.

It's kind of a stupid move. But look, stupid has worked before, right? And if nothing else, it seems to be so stupid that even the Scratch girl is taken by surprise, the breath driven out of her with a faint 'oof!' between her clenched teeth as Heir knocks her back a step. He considers picking her up and flying, but the last time he pulled something like that and threatened to drop someone to end the fight, that someone had been Diamonds Droog and look how well that worked out for him. Instead, he focuses on pulling her down and away, the winds momentarily rising to a shrieking pitch in his ears until he hears, with a rumble of soil shifting, the forkkind still clamped in her hand being pulled sideways as well. Hemogoblin rolls out of the way at once, holding his arm gingerly but his wrist still whole. Of course, in the moment Heir spends to check on the troll, the Scratch snarls wordlessly and brings her elbow down against her shoulder. Her knee, when it comes up for what would probably have been a mortal blow to his groin, sparing him only because he's kind of hugging her stomach and the angle is off. His chest takes the blow instead, which isn't much better, except on so many levels it kind of is -

And then, just as abruptly, Heir finds himself kicked to the side and the Scratch, previously so stolidly tight-lipped, whirs away from both him and Hemogoblin to growl, "RL-2408, you will desist from your perfidious actions this instant." A beat, in which Heir pulls himself off the ground and exchanges bewildered looks with an equally baffled, blinking Hemogoblin to his left, and then, carrying but not quite loud enough to be called a shout: "Where in the blue blazes do you think you are going?"
Literally what is happening. Heir looks around, surveying the total mess he and the Scratch have made of the poor unfortunate fountain area - that police car in particular makes him wince, because the dent it's left in the metal of the fountain broke a few of the fountain jets and now there's a spreading, shallow pool flooding parts of the mall where the broken stone prevents drainage. If they hadn't moved to the grass, they'd all have started slipping at the worst moments, he bets -

Where is Rose.

Where the hell is Rose?

John's heart lurches like he's missed a step on a stairway, jolting his entire chest with a tense burst of nausea as he realizes the other Scratch girl is nowhere to be seen, too. Hemogoblin catches sight of them first, though, reaching out and shaking John's shoulder. John doesn't know if Karkat even realizes how badly he needs it; the motion rattles him loose from a suddenly burgeoning panic attack, and he follows the pointing claw to the far street, where John spots a black-clad figure picking her way between deserted police vehicles at a run, something gold and orange cradled in her arms. "Ro-" he starts to shout before closing his mouth hard enough to make his teeth clatter against one another, before he can yell Rose's name in public. The claws on his shoulder dig in, a grounding prickle of nails through his jacket, and John reels himself back in with several pained gulps of air, sorting his mind out again.

"You treacherous shucks busters," the Scratch roars, and it startles Heir again because this it's definitely a shout and she is most definitely pissed.

Even if, uh. Okay. He has absolutely no idea what a shucks buster is. The vocabulary section of his brain makes a good faith effort and then shrugs mentally, as though to say not my problem, which is bullshit because it's totally supposed to be on top of things like translating random shouts of villainous outrage into regular English. He just keeps coming up blank.

Then - "Shii," Hemogoblin swears - Heir realizes that the Scratch has stopped paying attention to them entirely and is instead taking a deliberate step in the direction of the other girl and Rose's sudden joint abscond. Hemogoblin jumps on the Scratch from behind before Heir finishes registering the fact that what they just heard was their Scratch apparently flipping her shit at Rose's opponent...going rogue or something? Either way, their Scratch seems momentarily more focused on chasing down her teammate for some perceived betrayal and that's all the opening Hemogoblin needs to grab her in a headlock, his legs hooking around under her ribs to squeeze for leverage. Her chin jerks down against her chest reflexively to prevent him from choking her out and her free arm comes back to claw at the base of Hemogoblin's crimson false horns. Usually, that's a pretty solid way to break out of a submission hold when fighting a troll, because the base of their horns are pretty sensitive, and where the horn goes, the head and the rest of their body generally try to follow, to avoid pain.

All she succeeds in doing is yanking the horn prosthetic out of whatever Hemogoblin uses to secure it into place. When she realizes her effort has been wasted she twists her head to the side and lifts her forkkind in her other hand, attempting to twist it into the right angle to stab for Hemogoblin's side, that free hand clawing at Hemogoblin's hair and hood for a handhold.

Heir isn't entirely aware he's decided to move until he already has, dropping Casey in a split-second decision - there's no way he'll risk swinging her when Hemogoblin's in such close quarters - and kicking instead to knock the specibus off course. But she still won't let go of it, and as she finally tears her eyes away from the other Scratch's retreating back - and from Rose - Heir realizes that she'd probably keep ahold of her specibus even if they succeed in KOing her. It's the surly strength of resolve in her expression that tips him off.
Something in the realization makes his stomach list and pitch like the deck of a ship, and he thinks, without really knowing when he made the mental leap, that this girl is a weapon and cold, efficient fury, and nothing more. She's been pared down to the barest bones and once she dispatches the two of them, she'll go after her teammate without the slightest moment of hesitation with the same vicious purpose.

What could turn someone into an empty shell like this? Heir is used to swapping between personas when he flips from civilian to hero life, but if there's some kind of equivalent for the Scratch girl...hm. She's switched into villain mode, and in the place where her regular personality should be there's just this person-shaped space, full of sharp edges and cold purpose.

It's terrifying. Even Diamonds Droog felt like a person - a psychopath, yeah, but someone who had a life and motivations of her own, however horrific said motivations might be to Heir. These Scratches have emerged from nowhere with no explanation, no background, no source that Heir can pinpoint aside from their tenuous connection to Doc Scratch himself, and that's just not right.

"Keep on her!" Heir says to his partner, shaking himself out it and latching onto the Scratch's hand, awkwardly attempting to wrap himself around her arm and specibus both to stop her from moving. "Can you knock her out?"

"Trying!" Hemogoblin calls back exasperatedly. There is a single, convulsive shudder, and Heir feels the exact moment the Scratch regains her footing because she keeps her head down and ploughs into Heir, the forkkind trapped between the two of them. Heir realizes what she's doing when their feet tangle together in an impossible knot, her knees feeling like a pair of iron bars as they slam into his own and take them both to the ground. She falls on her back, a deliberate twist that means Hemogoblin hits the earth first with a pained gasp. Heir yanks free when the wind catches him, but neither of them will let go of the specibus, so he ends up drawing enough breezes into motion to lift the Scratch and Hemogoblin as well - anything to relieve the pressure and prevent Hemogoblin's uncertain ribs from breaking again - and pulling all three of them into the air, five feet above the ground. The girl's eyes narrow and her free hand gives up scrubbling at Hemogoblin's face to seize the back of his hood.

Heir doesn't always think through the implications of what his super human strength means, let alone how that strength could be used by someone else. But he kind of gets the idea when the Scratch yanks Hemogoblin over her head, peeling his arms away from her neck with only the strength of that single hand, and tries to fling him at Heir.

Which yeah, kind of works. She is strong. Heir drops the forkkind - drops the Scratch too, while he's at it, the wind flattening beneath her so that she drops five feet without a buffer - to catch Hemogoblin under the arms. "I'm fine, I'm fucking fine!" the troll is already saying by the time Heir stabilizes the two of them in midair, lifting his head to reveal multiple nail tracks raking down the grey skin of his cheek that have begun to seal off with thick scabs. The wind hovering them in place lifts the fringe of Hemogoblin's thick hair, sending it skimming over his forehead and blazing eyes. "Fuck! Throw me at her or something, she's running!"

Hindsight is twenty-twenty. Current sight is slightly more myopic. Like, probably around 20/200. Which is to say, it can hardly be considered a respectable standard for eyesight at all, can it?!

So Heir throws Hemogoblin.

Seriously. Hindsight.

Twenty-twenty.
The Scratch has only made it ten feet at a breakneck, determined pace in the precious moments Heir wasted catching Hemogoblin. Falling didn't even seem to knock the breath out of her - she's just up and running, legs pumping steadily as she angles for the side road the other Scratch has disappeared down.

Hemogoblin hits her - like, well, like a good-sized troll hitting a relatively unsuspecting human after being thrown at a very hastily judged angle. "I didn't mean it literally, for fuck's sake!" the troll howls, scrambling frantically for a claw- or foothold as the Scratch girl staggers under the impact but keeps charging along, rounding the curve of the stone floor of the fountain and sticking to the edge of the grassy turf as she goes.

"I'm sorry!" Heir yells back, clapping his hands to his cheeks, which feel like they've been set on fire. Oh my god. How does he always end up making himself look so dumb in front of Hemogoblin when it's just Karkat?! Why would he throw Karkat? Why would he throw anyone at all?!

His brain provides nothing by way of explanation. He doesn't think there is one.

"Just get down here and help me, you brainless wonder!" Hemogoblin skids along the grass, one claw still latched onto the Scratch's shoulder, only for her to try to shrug him off, all his efforts to dig his heels in useless.

"Ack! Right!" Heir can smack himself mentally about this later - right now, there's still a fight going on, even if the villain who started it has apparently lost interest in anything but dealing with her traitorous teammate at the moment. He zooms around with the wind ferrying him along and half falls, half lands at a run to tackle the Scratch from the side. Casey still lies on the ground a ways back, and he wonders if he should use to wind to lift the hammerkind back into his hand, because that would be so sweet, a total Thor moment, why has he never thought of this before? So many missed opportunities.

But there's no time for it; the Scratch brakes suddenly, her free hand shooting out to try to punch him in the face, and then she seizes Hemogoblin by the arm and pivots hard, throwing the troll over her hip before he can so much as blink. The troll lands lopsidedly, the weight of his now-mismatched horns clearly throwing him off, but stands up on Heir's right looking none the worse for the wear. The marks down his face have already sealed off without scarring, though he looks odd with one red horn curving around in front of him and the pale nub of the other barely visible in the mess of his hair. "What is this, the celebrated annual 'toss the troll around like he's bag of lusus leavings' contest?" he demands, rolling one of his shoulders and wincing as the joint complains with a pop. "Because I need advance notice about this kind of thing!"

"So not a contest, I got way more air than she did -"

"You stop that right now -"

"Unreal air."

Hemogoblin is outraged. "No."

"ENOUGH!"

The two of them flinch at the sudden shout. The Scratch girl stamps her foot with annoyance; her forkkind creaks loudly, and Heir is alarmed to see that the bright red metal has started to warp and bend under her closed fist. Gosh, is she strong!

"My tolerance for this insipid drivel," the Scratch says, seething, "started at zero. It has since declined at a pace comparable to a fighter jet aiming itself at the ground and gunning the engine. First, I will put you two chuckleheads down, and then I will deal with my backstabbing excuse for a best friend "
"Best friend," Hemogoblin repeats flatly.
"- and DS-2409, curse his conspiring, disloyal soul."
"Why do I feel like we're missing so much context for this?" Heir wonders in a whisper.
Hemogoblin must be in a philosophical mood. "When the fuck are we not?"
"Figures."
Then the Scratch kid makes good on her promise, stabbing at Hemogoblin's legs with a deft jab. Her weapon kinks halfway along the grip but the defect doesn't seem to slow her down for a moment; when Hemogoblin jumps back she hooks the back of the fork's head around his heel and yanks, so that the troll has to catch himself awkwardly on one arm before he can set his foot back under him.
He pushes out of the way of her next swing but only just, and the forkkind clips him so that he has to tumble away again.
Then she flips the forkkind so the bend in the metal angles towards Heir and it comes flying at his face. Watching her hands to try to read which way she intends to swing the specibus is no longer a reliable way to predict her next attack and Heir still doesn't have Casey. He ducks instead, and that's a mistake - even as he drops to the ground the Scratch barrels him over, using all her weight to shove him off-balance and whipping the angled forkkind across his throat. Then in one smooth motion she slings herself behind him, both hands yanking back on the pole, and she has him in a chokehold, the metal bar crushing down on his trachea with punishing force. Heir shoves his left hand up into the diminishing gap between the side of his neck and the pole, but she redoubles her grip on the specibus, yanking him back, and he can't push it up and off without more leverage. He can't breathe and how dare she, how dare she, the wind seems to be screaming in his ears, and there's a white hot moment of fury before he just dissolves.
He can't blank it out. He thinks his brain would explode from the pain, if he weren't totally incorporeal at the moment. Something twist and judders and laughs at him when he shoves it back down into the back of his mind, a high-pitched giggle strung thin like sentimental candy-floss, which is a really weird phrase for John to think, how really, really weird, and under it all, thrumming through the vise clamped around him to keep him still, is the klaxonic, agonizing foghorn of the [ɯɯɯɯɯɯɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹooooooooʇʇʇʇʇʇʇʇʇ] that keeps the sky still and lets him forget the worst memory of them all.
What was it again?
The voice is still giggling like it knows the punchline to perfectly awful joke, and when he remembers, with a start, that Karkat is still fighting on alone, there is a panicked moment where John isn't sure if it's him pulling the Breeze back together into a human form or Heir's body becomes tangible again with a pop! of displaced air, and please God let him not have teleported to Texas, please let that not have been the default setting on his incredible dumb windy powers, holy crap He's not in Texas. It's a little harder to guess how long he's been floating around as a wind-powered ghost, but when Heir wheels around he can see the Needle in the distance - maybe a little closer now than it was before, since he's over forty feet in the air and showing no signs of losing altitude. The last thing he remembers seeing before his stupid rage-porting kicked in again was the dizzying, cloud-strangled sky, framed by the branches of the trees that line the road, and he supposes his instincts must have just launched him skyward out of self-defense. He looks below his feet and for a moment the people fighting on the ground seem absolutely tiny. He must have been bodiless longer than he thought, because Hemogoblin and the Scratch girl have fought their way right over the lawn and into the middle of the road, pushed ever further in the direction the other Scratch took off towards. Even as Heir watches, taking stock of the situation with growing alarm, Hemogoblin rolls to the side and rips open the driver's side door of an abandoned police car so that the Scratch girl's punch smashes through bullet-proof glass instead of through the troll's head.


Heir drops. The only thought left in his brain is I shouldn't have left him alone, but there'll be time for guilt later. He aims to land a kick right on top of the Scratch kid's head but at the last moment the rush of the wind must give him away; she brings the forkkind up and he lands on that instead - and bounces off again right away, the wind scooping him up in what it must think is a helpful fashion.

Heir isn't sure if helpful is the right word for it. Worrying, maybe, because he didn't even have to reach out with his power and ask for the wind to do that. His power feels like it's teetering on a hair-trigger, verging on another complete loss of control, and then for all he knows it'll catapult him to, like, Siberia or something and he won't be able to figure out how to come back. Not good. Not good at all.

"Heir!" Hemogoblin calls, and he's not imagining the relief in the troll's voice.

"Sorry." Heir forces himself down to the ground. Even that much is a struggle, the soles of his shoes barely skimming the surface of the road before the wind sends him skimming again. "I'm back!"

"Good!" Before Hemogoblin can say more, the Scratch kid settles on her next target after a moment of cold deliberation, lunging for Heir again. He doesn't so much as dodge as leap six feet straight up into the air because dammit, the wind is overreacting massively. When he comes to rest on the overturned police car a couple yards away the Scratch is charging after him - then, suddenly, she trips, forkkind clattering on the pavement beneath one hand as she catches herself and yanks on her foot with a silent snarl of impatience. There's a weird hook of dull red wrapped around her ankle that, even as Heir watches in bewilderment, loses coherency and collapses back into a thin stream of blood.

"Because that's a fucking lot easier when you're around, dumbass!" Hemogoblin snaps. He's kneeling on the ground behind the car door and the blood trickles back to his palm splayed out on the road, flowing back into his wrist until all that remains is enough to reshape into a sicklekind.

Heir can only stare, thrown. Because - "Is that even sanitary?"

Hemogoblin slaps his own face. Thankfully, not with the hand that has the sickle. Heir jumps down from the roof of the car - okay, floats gently downward at a cautious pace makes him want to facepalm. By the time he has solid ground under his feet the Scratch has righted herself and -

Okay. This still isn't working. Because she rights herself, and Heir gets a good look at her face. Despite everything they've thrown at her, she's not even breathing hard when he reaches out with his senses for it, allowing nothing more than a faint huff of disdain to escape her nose before she settles back into the same steady, measured breaths she's had from the start. She raises her forkkind to parry Hemogoblin's sickle, and she's just as fast and strong as ever, shattering the solidified blood almost faster than Hemogoblin can reform it on the fly. In the aftermath of that surprise teleport Heir feels disconnected and not at all in proper control of his powers, and across from him Hemogoblin has no visible cuts, but more of his uniform sports tears and gashes, evidence that he's taken more hits while Heir wasn't there to help divide the Scratch's attention.
Heir's not feeling it yet, but Hemogoblin could start flagging at any moment depending on how much his ribs are tested. Even if he called Casey back to him, the hammerkind hasn't helped much to even the odds yet. They need to wrap this up fast, because god only knows what was happening with Rose before the other Scratch basically kidnapped her - the more time they waste trying to whittle down this girl's seemingly insurmountable stamina, the more Heir frets over the fact that Rose could be going grimdark, or something could happen to Jade or Dave, both of whom are still out of sight, and -

"I'm gonna try something new!" he says, grunting between dodges.

"Are you asking permission?!" The Scratch girl raises her foot and Hemogoblin doesn't move fast enough; she knocks him back hard and he lands hard on the hood of a red car parked across the street, spitting up blood that he swallows back down with a grimace. "Because permission fucking granted!" Hemogoblin screeches, swinging his feet under himself and jumping off the car with two sickles raised to slash down at the Scratch from above.

Great! So - what to do?

Heir's mind draws a blank.

Crap. He hasn't thought this through. Heir glances around frantically, waiting for inspiration to hit him, sending gales of wind to deflect the Scratch again and again from afar, blowing her hair into her face and wincing when she just fights on blindly and manages to spear the door of the red car and tear it off the car to fling at Hemogoblin.

…Wait.

Oh no. Ohhh no.

This is a terrible idea. Heir is pretty darn sure literally everyone - even Jade - would agree that this is a shitty idea. It doesn’t even qualify as ‘something new,’ which is pretty lame.

But oh crap, he's going through with it.

He's pretty sure he could survive it. It would hurt, but he would live, and he's banking on the theory that the Scratch girl can take pretty much anything Heir could and keep on fighting. So he sends tendrils of the wind out, and lifts. It's easier than he expects - so the sudden rush of uncontrolled air can work in his favor, good to know - but he finds himself unconsciously lifting his hands as though to carry a heavy burden, the gesture helping him to focus as he silently asks the wind to carry it over. There's a telltale shadow cast on the ground, weirdly shaped and very obvious as it ripples over the grass and then the street, but the Scratch doesn't think to look back toward the fountain or at the ground. Plus, the weather is cloudy enough today that the shadow isn't too obvious once Heir has his new weapon lined up and ready to drop.

He can't warn Hemogoblin, though, not aloud - he'll just give the plan away to the Scratch if he does.

Breathe in -

Heir lets the battered police car drop.

Breathe out -

He reaches for Hemogoblin and the desperate need rips Heir apart.

Breathe out -
And he's behind Hemogoblin with a burst of air, wrapping his arms around the troll from behind and wrenching them both away into intangibility. They land on the grass again when the wind lets them go at last, much more quickly than it did when it was only Heir being unraveled and raveled again. Their ears are solid again just in time for Heir to hear an audibly vexed exclamation as two tons of metal meets one very indignant villainess.

Heir counts to thirty, his senses trained to a breaking point on the Scratch girl's breathing.

It doesn't stop - it falters, and then becomes slow as she passes into what he suspects is unconsciousness, but it never once stops. She's still alive. Thank god.

He waits for the uproarious applause. Sadly, there is none.

Around that moment, he remembers he's once again pinning Hemogoblin to the ground, his body huddled over the troll with tension rattling through him so strongly that the fear leaves him breathless when he comes down from the disconnecting high of teleportation. If the wind hadn't listened, or if he'd been even a second slower grabbing Karkat - John gulps, lets his forehead tip forward to press against Karkat's with that last fake horn needling at the side of his head, and then flops over to the side, the bright cut of terror shaking its way out of his limbs in what he hopes he can pass off as adrenaline jitters.

"You dropped a car on her," Hemogoblin says between huge gulps of air, his eye twitching a little as he turns his head away from the spectacle to stare at Heir. "A police car."

"Not a police car. The police car." Heir shrugs, feeling grass shift under his shoulders as he corrects the troll. "Turnabout is fair play?"

But it's too late. The logic circuits have started firing in Hemogoblin's brain, and they latch onto the obvious immediately. "For fuck's sake, you could just drop cars on people on the damn time! Why do you even bother fighting people?!"

"Most people can't survive a car to the head like she's doing," Heir points out. "Plus, throwing a car at someone isn't the first thing you think to do with wind powers, okay? It's so not a thing."

"Uh, yeah, actually, that should be literally the second thing you think to do with it! Right after you fly around the city singing Disney songs like a moron, which I have no doubt you already have covered!" And yeah, that's Karkat. Hemogoblin has fallen away, and Karkat throws his hands up to claw at the sky beseechingly. "Troll Jesus, preserve me from a moirail with absolutely zero common sense."

Okay. He's right about the Disney song thing. But that's still not the point here. "Look, I try not to use the windy thing that much, okay!" John says, not really arguing, because it's hard to get mad at Karkat when he probably has a point, just – just repeating his own justifications, the ones his dad has made sure he’s got memorized. For the record. "It feels...wrong, like cheating or something! My dad always says to keep it to the minimum, even on the job, or else I'll start relying on it too much. And I could hurt someone unintentionally so, so easily."

Karkat sighs and nods afterward, conceding the point. "Okay. Fine." His brow furrows, and he turns to glare at John accusingly. "You have done the Disney thing, haven't you."

Damn. "Yyyyyeeeaah."

Karkat closes his eyes, kneads at his forehead with the heel of his palm, and shakes his head before sitting up, curling one knee to rest his arm on as he wearily looks over at the pinned Scratch. "Her heart's still going. Come on, we have to do something, because I'm pretty fucking sure zipties are not going to work on her."

"Heck, she wouldn't even need a bomb to break out of prison," John agrees. His legs support him when he stands, but only just, and probably only because the wind is there, a silent soothing support that gently nudges him back upright when he nearly topples over. He holds out a hand and Karkat helps himself up. "Let's just...get her back to my dad." He then starts digging through the pockets of his uniform. "How many zipties did you say you had?"

"I didn't."

Levering the police car off the Scratch girl requires, somehow, more effort than lifting it in the first place had - which is totally not fair. John is quietly disturbed to see that his earlier guess was correct: even when Karkat presses a cautious claw to her pulse and pulls back her eyelid to confirm that she's down for the count, the girl's hand remains clasped around her strife specibus with a white-knuckled grip. By silent mutual accord, neither of the heroes tries to pry it out of her fingers - John can't think of any action more likely to provoke her into waking up to start bashing at them again - and instead just ziptie her wrists together with a ten-ziptie rainbow of plastic cords with the forkkind leaning against her chest.

Surprisingly (or maybe not) the black leather along her arms and palms has been scraped raw and Heir realizes that she probably tried to catch the car before it knocked her down. In fact, her head wound is in entirely the wrong place, a ragged cut along the shaved portion of her undercut at the base of her skull rather than on top or on her forehead. The car might have knocked her to the ground, but it was hitting the ground that must have jostled her enough to render her unconscious.

…Scary. She's scary, so scary - for a moment it dazes John. But then Karkat finishes ziptying her ankles together with great effort, and nods to John, and he has to snap out of it to gesture with one hand for the wind to lift the Scratch girl into the air. He doesn't dare teleport after all this; they jog instead, following an old path that Karkat finds more familiar than John does because he's lived closer to this part of the city for more of his life. By the time they round the side of a children's museum, John remembers how to make his mouth work, and he compliments Karkat on the slick move (Karkat almost roars his outrage at the heavens, but somehow resists the urge with what he calls great force of will) that he used to trip the Scratch girl up.

The troll preens at the praise, but he rolls his eyes to make it less obvious. "I can be taught, even if the teacher is some kind of insane alien serial killer," he grumps, folding his arms. John wishes it was harder to figure out who Karkat is referring to but it's Spades. Yeah. No question. "No more fighting alone, for fucking starters - apparently that's the worst possible thing I could do. And I've always been meaning to branch out with the blood thing, figure out different ways to use it. I just… I don't even fucking know, I got distracted from training by little things like nearly dying."

"Understandable," John agrees, perfectly solemn.

Karkat scowls at him anyway, and punches him in the arm as they start across the green around the Needle, the Scratch floating along behind them. "Whatever. There's your dad, thank fuck."

"You are okay, right?" John asks, anxious again. "I'm sorry about vanishing like that, I'm still not good at the teleporting thing -"

Karkat's pap cuts him off mid-apology, a firm hand that presses to the side of John's face. "Shoosh. Don't make me get all conciliatory and obvious when we're still in uniform, dork," Karkat commands, his tone fond. "I'm fine. Which obviously means we can bid the dicklord a hearty farewell and ship him back to his squad in Houston."
John feels the blood drain from his face. "...Don't call Dave that to his face," he says weakly. "I can't tell if he'd be insulted or if he'd make it his new official hero name."

"...Fuck."

"Heir, Hemogoblin," Samuel says as they approach. His hat shadows his forehead, pulled low to obscure his face from any news crews that might be wandering around trying to get a piece of the action, no doubt. Both the driver's side door and one of the backseat doors are hanging open, all sets of lights blinking an alarm, and both license plates concealed by tactful panels of blank white metal, but it's not like anyone is driving around the area today to see them. "You two were successful in tackling one of these Scratches, then?"

"Yeah, hopefully she's down for the count," John says, grimacing as he checks the floating Scratch girl's eye again. Still unconscious, for now. Then his other concern overrides any potential for a quick field debrief. "Dad, did you see a girl in black and pink run by here? With Rose? Only they took off in this direction, and our Scratch seemed to think she was betraying her or something, but she had Rose and we couldn't stop her."

"They are here," his dad interrupts, smiling. "They are quite safe, my boy. We are unfortunately in the dark as to the current status of Flashstep, the Sylph, and Miss Sharpshooter, but Miss Ranger has declared her intent to defect from the Scratches, and escorted Seer here."

And John notices the two people breathing in the back seat of the car at the same time one of them shifts, and a familiar head of blonde hair raises up from a slump. "Oh, excellent," Rose says blearily, peering at them from the far corner of the backseat. "You have obtained your own specimen."

John almost drops the dark-haired Scratch girl in his relief. He jogs to the side of the car, searching Rose's face keenly and scanning her arm. Her flesh is a sickly, pallid grey a few shades lighter than Karkat's, but - "No tentacles?"

"Not at the moment. Our ally has thoughtfully demonstrated her dedication to our new association by assisting me in resisting the incursion."

"Thas me!" Shifting a little, the blonde Scratch girl from earlier looks out at them as well, her smile uncertain and her pink eyes widening with awe as she takes in the sight before her. Her hand and Rose's are intertwined for some reason, and John blinks in incomprehension because - just, why? "Oh, wow! You said they could take on Janey 'n you were right! Holy cripes!"

That's when John realizes her eyes aren't covered. The Scratch's face is exposed with no evident concern for keeping her features a secret, and what he sees is -

Karkat takes an extra five seconds or so, but that's probably because he doesn't have the advantage of years of experience that John and Samuel have, here. "What the fuck?" Karkat says - and John can't really blame him.

The girl scratches at the her hair and waves, eyes darting back and forth from each of their faces. "Heyyy, I'm Roxy. Uh. I am surrendered. We can has peace?"

And the eye color is wrong, yeah, but the rest...there's no mistaking it.

John whips around to look at his dad, desperate for some kind of reassurance that he's not crazy, here. Samuel's smile fades a little at John’s silent inquiry and he nods. "You see it, too?" Samuel says, and John stares some more.

"Wha? What'zit?" Roxy asks loudly when neither he nor Karkat seem to be able to come up with a coherent response. She wipes at her cheek with her sleeve. "Is there sumthin' on my face? Uh. Is Janey really out? Do you think you should check again?"

"Oh, slap me with a wet bag of dog shit," Karkat breathes, shaking his head. "This has got to be some kind of sick, sick joke."

John doesn't see how it could be, unless Karkat is actually right and the universe runs with an engine powered by their tears of disbelief. Because this strange girl Roxy might be ragged, streaked with blood and sweat, and on the verge of collapse, but there's no mistaking that her face is that of a much, much younger Rue Lalonde. If Rose is in any shape to notice, she's not showing any sign of doing so.

…John thinks he's getting a headache. Or maybe that's just his head wound making itself known again. He can't tell. "I need to sit," he announces, and gestures for the wind to keep supporting the Scratch girl - Janey? - as he sits heavily on the grass, trying to process the face of his oldest friend's mother mysteriously repeating itself on a member of a villainous gang. How does something like that even happen?

Karkat sits down beside him with a little more grace, and mutely shakes his head as he leans along John's side, a coil of warmth. "What the fuck do we do, now?" he asks, and John can't tell if he means the question in an immediate 'how do we deal with two villains in our vigilante custody' way or in a more existential 'what the actual fuck' kind of way. Knowing Karkat, it's probably both.

Samuel takes him at his most literal. "Now? Now, we hope that young Miss Sharpshooter returns safely," he says with a sigh. "Because young Seer requires her mother's attention as soon as we can arrange for it. I've called ahead, but there's nothing Rue can do from the lab. We must go to her."

"Sharpshooter is still the most expedient method of travel, even if she can't take us all the way into the void wards," Rose adds, leaning her head against the back of the seat in front of her and summoning up a faint smile that John returns. "And here we find ourselves yet again, old friend. Has the bittersweet taste of déjà vu caught you in her wily coils, yet?"

"S'okay, Rose," John says, any concern for their identities completely forgotten. "We'll get you better. Don't worry."

Karkat shifts and one of his hands creeps up, inspecting the edges of the graze along the side of John's head gently enough that John can hardly feel it. Here, next to the comforting white of the family car, it feels like they're sheltered from the press of the outside world. He wishes badly that the rest of them were here, but he doesn't want to risk the Scratch girl waking up, either here near Rose and Samuel or back out in the middle of a fight against another Scratch. All he can do is keep Janey floating where she can't hurt anyone even if she does regain consciousness.

And so they set in to wait for the others.

-

"…Shit."

"What?"

"I forgot Casey!"

"Oh, right. Fuck. Back at the fountain?"

"Yup." John clenches his fist. "There's only one solution."
Karkat grins toothily. Because Karkat is a nerd, and his brain might run on rage but he and John can still make the same mental leaps when it comes to comic book solutions to real world problems. It's probably a moirail thing. "Mjölnir?"

"Heck yes."

(It totally works.)

The night previous…

They're trying to cut back on their use of Pesterchum, on account of Kanaya's Canadian friend blowing up at them about being security risks. The Lalonde house has even more hidden rooms and hallways to explore than John's, but for some reason it feels like they don't need to message each other to make up for it.

So he doesn't know what keeps him awake, or what draws him down the hall, past the creepy window where Doctor Lalonde used to sit in the shadows and drink martinis, lying in wait for Rose to sneak by when John stayed over for the night. At John's house, his dad always made sure they were in bed and asleep by a regular bedtime, like clockwork; sleeping over at Rose's was always an adventure, crawling through dark wizard-bestrewn halls, stacking books and hanging blankets over them to build forts, and daring each other to crawl out onto the widow's walk that ringed the observatory to hang over the railing and breathe the night air. Rue indulgently let them run wild, or maybe Rose just shrugged off the rules like she did everything else her mother said, petulant and bitterly sarcastic whenever she thought she could get away with it, which was often. John always knew her relationship with her mom wasn't the best; he could never have imagined it would deteriorate as far as it did in later years, remembering those times when he slumped over in the middle of some game and woke up with blankets tucked in around him.

Rose, he supposes, never really slept. She would have needed to go meditate the moment John fell asleep, maintaining her own secrets. Or maybe the Horrorterrors weren't as deep in her head right then - it's not something they've had time to talk about.

She's not sleeping now, either. He paused outside her room, and felt only Kanaya's breathing; when he hesitantly knocked and peeked inside at a murmured "Come in," he saw the troll lounging on the bed against the wall, looking up from a fold of green fabric to politely meet John's eyes with a questioning look. "She needed time to herself," is the answer he gets. "There's no alcohol in the building. If you see her before I do, inform her that I require her for costume alterations."

John nods, hesitant, because Kanaya is kind of really cool? Not dumb ironic cool, like Dave is always pretending to be when really he's a total dork, but...sophisticated. But then she'll say something off-beat, something that's absolutely backhandedly hilarious, and John gets the feeling that maybe, like Rose, Kanaya is a practitioner of Advanced Snarky Broad brand dorkiness, so at least half of it is going over his head. "Thanks," he says, clearing his throat. "Uh. Night?"

"It is indeed," she observes dryly. He closes the door before he can walk into another one like that, and then, after a moment of consideration, makes his way down the hall to the observatory. It's one of the rare rooms that has been cleared out right down to the floorboards, the cupboards that were always locked hanging open and empty as John tiptoes through the dark, circular room. He can sense everyone else breathing below his feet - and Becquerel does not breathe, at least not regularly, he has confirmed, so he can only assume that the wolf-thing is still around. Dave is also awake, he thinks, pacing in the room he's claimed as his own, and Karkat's breathing is submerged in sopor slime so that John has to swallow around a faint, phantom echo in his own throat.
But there's definitely one pair of lungs working outside the mansion, soft and familiar, almost as familiar as his dad's breathing patterns. Rose got older and sadder, but hey, so did John, so they're probably even. John crouches by the low door out onto the widow's walk and turns the handle. It's only about four feet tall, and used to seem just the right size when they were younger, so he never questioned why Rue would have commissioned a house with such an oddly sized doorframe. He swings the door open and ducks through, stepping out into the still air. He calls up one of his own breezes, because the nights are starting to get warm and sticky with humidity, and this stillness isn't helping things one bit. It swarms around him, a spark of delight flaring in his mind, and he thinks he dad totally wouldn't approve of him using his power so obviously. But it's late enough and dark enough that one errant breeze, well above the roofs of most of the houses around them, won't be noticed, right?

"How cruel of you, John. You know that the summer humidity always makes me wilt, and now I learn that you could have eased my suffering all through our youth. How can our friendship recover from this?"

"Hey, I had to suffer too!" he protests, one hand on the wall as he walks around the curl of the walk, squinting through the dark. The cloud cover's too thick for the moon or the stars to shine through, so it's dark as heck out here. "Just another rule my dad set. No powers unless it's for training or for hero work! That's why swim team was such a relief - where else could I dump myself in cold water for hours and still have my dad sign off on it as exercise?"

A chuckle sounds a little further ahead, and John finally rounds the curve to see Rose. She doesn't wear dark clothes as much anymore - he thinks Kanaya has slowly but surely been reworking her wardrobe - but she's gussied up in a dark purple night gown, her hair loose from its usual headband and fluttering a little in the tail end of the breeze that John stirred up. It's longer than it was a few weeks ago, after New York, the ends brushing around her shoulders, and he wonders if she's going to cut it soon. She's leaning forward on the twined metal of the railing, one hand cupping a candle in a brass holder that doesn't fully account for the faint gleam of gold light on her forehead, but is probably meant to fool people at a distance.

"What do you see?" he asks when Rose hums to herself and the light brightens a little. He joins her at the railing, slinging one leg over the side and sitting on top of the metal rail so that both feet dangle over air. It's the kind of dumb thing he'd do on a dare as a kid, blithely confident in the knowledge that in a worst case scenario, the wind would never let him hit the ground.

For years now, he's kept the Breeze tamed as much as he can. That kind of instinctive defense mechanism seems almost unreal. The only time he allows the wind to catch him like that anymore is when he's on the job; he's not clumsy as a general rule, but when he does fall in public, he usually has to let it happen because there are witnesses around.

"I'm not sure," Rose replies, running a finger around the lip of the candle-holder thoughtfully. "Maybe nothing." She smiles at him briefly, and her grin turns teasing. "Mmmm. Your eyes are glowing, John. Might want to put them out before someone sees."

"Oh! Crap!" John claps a hand over his eyes - he hadn't even noticed them doing that! He lets the wind fall back into stillness and Rose makes a noise of protest, but only when he's tucked his powers back into dormancy does the faint blue glow on the inside of his cupped hand fade away. He's going to need to order new colored contacts soon if he keeps burning through them at this rate… "Better?" he asks.

"Dimmer." Rose blinks, and the faint impression of an eye on her forehead blinks away as well. "There. We shall be perfectly inconspicuous watchers of the night together."
John scuffs his bare foot along the side of a wrought iron post, and realizes, guiltily, that he might be interrupting Rose's meditation time or something. "Kanaya said you wanted to be alone - uh, I can leave, or -"

"Please, don't." When Rose shakes her head, her hair falls further into her face, and she doesn't fix it. "We've established that alone time isn't a smart thing for me to over-indulge in. Stay, John. We can gossip." Her tone takes a turn for the wry. "About the good and the bad."

"...You see something bad," he guesses. It's not so much a lucky guess as it is just kind of common sense, by this point. Bad things happen a lot. "Something bad in the future that we should...probably avoid?"

Rose cuts to the side with her free hand, a gesture neither dismissive nor conceding. "I can't see the future, precisely. I can see that some paths may be fortuitous, and some...less so. It's easier when I have some specific action in mind, so I can trace how future providence is affected." She hesitates, long enough that John opens his mouth to ask the same question in a different way, because he's still curious, and then continues. "Something's already in motion," she says, rubbing at her left temple. "Which worries me. It's been in motion for quite a while now, too - it's hard to tell what future events it will affect, simply because it affects so much."

He tries to wrap his head around it. "Something?"

Rose makes a noise of frustration. "I wish I could state it more sensibly than that, too. At some point in the past, someone did something, and the result of that action is coming to a head soon. But it happened too long ago, and now it's too diffuse for me to specify what. But it relates to all of us. Of this, I am certain."

Wow this explanation is...not explaining anything. Ugh. John rubs the back of his head. "That sounds like it sucks. And you can't tell if it's lucky or not, or who did it? Why is magic so weird?"

It startles a laugh out of Rose. "If I knew who had done it, I might have a better idea what they did," she admits, leaning to the side so she can set her unlit candle on the floor of the walk by her foot, and then straighten again. "Scrying, unfortunately, is one of the most unclear and unresearched of the thaumaturgic arts. Mindscapes, spell work, even necromancy - all of these have been investigated and systematized, to some degree. Even my mother, stickler for the scientific method that she is, acknowledges and employs thaumaturgic specialists as part of her research team." She shakes her head again. "But the future changes with every choice every person on the planet makes. I see only a tiny fraction of it, and most of the time it's impossible to pin down with any accuracy. All we can do is cast our roll of the dice and hope fortune favors the bold."

"That sounds really intense, Rose." John holds out for all of five seconds. "...I don't get it."

"It means free will is a pain in the ass, John. But we wouldn't get anywhere without it."

"Oh."

They stay quiet for a little while longer, long enough that John starts picking up on the faint sounds of insects from below, all the louder to his ears when he thinks to focus on the vibrations in the air. It's about time spring got started; at the rate things are going, he was worried it would be winter forever.

"Rose?" he asks quietly. "Are we going to be okay?"

"I don't know, John," she says. She sounds so tired. "I really don't know."
"You know nothing, Rose Lalonde?" he says solemnly, and she swats him on the arm for it.

"More than you, Jonathan. Stick to your comic books, young man."

He makes a face. "Hahah, very funny."

Rose rests her head on his shoulder, and after a moment of hesitation, he leans his head on top of hers, still staring out over the dark neighborhood before them. For a few minutes, at least, he can pretend they're still short enough to squeeze through that door, that Rose never left, that neither of them have spent the past few years messed up in the head on so many different levels.

"I missed you."

"I missed you, too." Rose rests a hand against the side of his cheek. "Now go back down and go to sleep, John. We'll all still be here and well in the morning."

He smiles sheepishly even though she can't see it from here, because Rose always knows this stuff. Well. She doesn't know everything. But even if Rose isn't sure if they'll all be okay, John can be sure for her. It's the least he can do.

They're going to be okay.

He'll make sure of it.

---

The first thing Sharpshooter notices as she bounces them to the open air stadium is that the promised target range suffers from a single critical flaw.

Namely, it doesn't exist.

She spins in a circle as her sense of the space around her confirms that her eyes haven't failed her. There's nothing around but a couple of football nets - soccer, she remembers, which always made Grandpa shake his head -

And when she finishes the circle, rounding on Mr Booty, he levels a pistol at her face with a brilliant grin.

Oh. Oh crud! Sharpshooter scowls, stamps her foot in the turf, and bounces out into the middle of the blue stadium seating. The place feels large enough, with the space to seat ten thousand, at the least, but relatively deserted. Someone's wandering the perimeter (probably security), and a couple other bodies mill around in the building beneath the large scoreboard; no one's on the field itself or in the stands but the two of them. "Foul!" she shouts down at the field. In the meanwhile, she starts digging around through her sylladex, snapping her fingers whenever a gun comes to hand to dismiss it. Where is it, where is it... "Talk about being a jerk!"

"Pardon? Ah, right, we were going to have a ripsnorting good time playing target practice," the man sighs, flipping one of his pistols around his finger idly in a poor display of firearm safety. Then he scratches the back of his head with the butt of the other pistol, and Jade's inner gunkind enthusiast cringes. They're really nice looking pistols, too, dark and matte and sleek - nice enough that she wishes this guy wasn't gonna blow his own ear off with them, at the rate he's going. Who even taught this guy how to handle a specibus?! "Right! Well. I'm afraid I lied."

"I totally would not have noticed that by now," Sharpshooter replies, rolling her eyes and choosing a tranq gun at the last moment. She also drags a police riot gun loaded with rubber baton rounds to the fore of the pocket dimension for easier access, on the off chance she needs to swap between weapons on the fly. She considers calling for Bec - but no. She can handle this lame butt just fine on her own. Bec's been tired and sluggish a lot, lately, and it needs its rest to recharge its batteries. She'll only whistle for it if there's a dire emergency.

Plus, she's a lot more wary about having Bec right at her side while on patrol, now. She can't help but remember how easily Droog was able to drop that power-dampening cage right on top of the two of them, preventing Bec from knocking over the cage or blasting it or anything like that. On the off chance this lame-o has something similar waiting in the wings, Sharpshooter would rather have Bec at a safe, discreet distance!

With that decided, she pushes out her focus further. There's a lot she might accidentally overlook if she's not careful. A sniper's not gonna be one of them, not again. Thus prepared, she tosses her hair back behind her shoulder and brings the tranq out of the specibus. It smacks into her palm as she activates the targeting magnifier on her goggles. At this range she probably won't need it. But better safe than sorry. Caution is the order of the day.

...Caution should probably not have included sidetracking into a fake duel with a Liar McLiaron. Oops. She seriously needs a better way to remember these things! Ack, John is gonna be so mad! "You're such a jerk!" she says, because it needs saying. "Heir's gonna use his stern look of brotherly disapproval on me!"

The Scratch kid -

Smirks.

"Not my problem!" he laughs, lightheartedly.

He's fast, Sharpshooter will give him that - she feels his arm move and since she's already on the alert, the light twitch of his finger on the trigger tips her off right away. But the pistolkind has already fired by the time she blinks out of the way, relocating herself just a few feet to the side. Before she can lift her own gun the Scratch fires again - fast, so fast, twice in rapid succession - then both guns at once, arms spaced out along her strafing line so that Sharpshooter has to veer backward, her feet skimming the tops of the bleachers. A few of the shots ricochet with high pitched whines, but most punch right through the aluminum of the benches and lodge in the raised concrete of the seats behind them.

Okay. So, he's taking this pretty seriously! But the more Sharpshooter considers the situation, the more she's pretty sure she needs to backtrack. Get back to the group and act like a responsible team player! Really, Bec and WV always make it look so easy - but Bec wouldn't ever want to ditch Sharpshooter midterm, and WV is...kinda sorta incapable of getting very far under his own power...

So! She'll just wrap this up quick! Sharpshooter backflips out of the way of the next shot, then pushes off the bleachers with her free hand and keeps moving up the slope of the stadium seating one row at a time instead of teleporting. Sure enough, the guy gets cocky and tries the two shots at once again, one of his eyes squinched up as he aims.

He pulls the triggers on what Sharpshooter is positive is the last shot for the left pistol, the second-to-last on the right, and Sharpshooter grins as her space powers crackle and she skips right over the last few rows of benches. Instead she lands mid-flip over a stretch of railing, just off-center enough from the Scratch's previous line of fire to be out of his peripheral vision, and grips the cold metal railing under her with one hand as a brace while she yanks the tranq riflekind up to her shoulder with a clack.
Her lab coat catches up with the curve of her flip. The Scratch - barely sparing a glance at her new position - drops to the ground, rolls under the tranquilizer round, and comes up kneeling. The pistol on the right fires in a bright burst; then both hands down in a practiced drop, a reload so fast the clips snap into place with twin clicks, and then back up to fire again, and gosh, was that fast -

Then Sharpshooter squeaks and flips out of the way again. Another round of bullets peppers the railing where her palms used to rest and that's when she knows for a fact he's aiming for her hands.

Which is pretty darn smart of him.

"Okay, this is kinda fun!" she calls. A skip sideways, a crackle of green light, and she's on top of the overhead awning that covers the stands, teetering a little as she peers over the edge at the field spread out below her. "You're pretty good!"

"You're not so bad yourself, miss!" The Scratch punctuates each sentence with another shot - and despite the upward slant and the distance between them, his aim with the pistols remains spot-on. He's still favoring that left gun, though; he has to reload it again as he speaks, while the right stays in reserve. "A moving target always proves more of a challenge! I would be ever so friggin' put out if you weren't as accomplished as reports had it, but you're even more accomplished-er than I could have hoped! What a jolly rumpus!"

Not...the wording she would use...but okay! Jade has experience with translating her grandpa's notes, so this kind of creative word-mongering isn't beyond her, but it's strange to hear old-timey nattering come out of the mouth of someone who can't be any older than Sharpshooter. Beaming and rubbing the back of her head, Sharpshooter nods agreeably - and teleports behind him, with the tranquilizer pressed to the nape of his neck. "I agree! This has been, uh, jolly! But we're still done here!"

She expects him to duck. She's ready for him to duck! That's what any normal person would do, right, people who don't have space teleporting perks?

He doesn't duck. He holsters the pistol on the right and spins, his teeth startlingly white in that smirk as he seizes the barrel of the tranq rifle with one hand and clamps down. It's smoother than cream, one motion that makes Sharpshooter yank back on reflex, and before she can bounce herself and the rifle out of his reach the Scratch brings up the other pistolkind and shoots her rifle through the side of the barrel, metal grating on metal as magazine bursts outward in powder-blackened peels.

"Crap!" Sharpshooter teleports down the field, past the soccer goalpost. The tranq rifle comes along for the ride, but sags and snaps in the middle when she hits the turf. The clip's breached, and she ends up removing the intact tranq rounds entirely before they drop to the ground, but two spill out anyway, leaving little drops of anesthetic on the green. "Oh, jeez! Are you enjoying yourself? First you bring me here under false pretenses, and now you broke my favorite tranqkind!" Sharpshooter grimaces, trying and failing to jam the two halves of the poor disemboweled rifle back together. But there's no way for her to fix a break like this, not in the field! Honestly, even if she were back in the island gun repository, she'd still have to replace the entire forestock, modified clip, and the pneumatic chamber, which would basically make it an entirely new gun by the time she finished. Harrumphing, she tucks the remains back into her sylladex - rest, wounded soldier! - and swaps the riot gunkind into her hands, waiting for an answer.

"Well, there was a better plan that didn't involve lying, but - uh - we had to improvise." A wave of his hand - he still wailing those guns around like toys! - and the Scratch kid purses his lips, his eyes widening a little with remorse, as though inviting her in on some spectacularly awful joke, just between the two of them. "I mean, I would have loved to preface this with a more formal introduction before dear Ranger laid you out from a sniping position again, but things have rather gone tits up on that front!"
...She's pretty sure he just admitted that they were going to assume she'd be dumb enough to fall for the sniping trick again. Stupid, stupid, stupid! Sharpshooter groans and brandishes the riot gun. "So?!

He hesitates, squinting. "So what?"

"Introduction! I don't have all day here, buddy!" She's getting kind of tired of labelling him 'Scratch kid' and 'this total jerk' in her head, anyway. She gestures with the gun again, a silent hurry up, doofus, so they can get this show back on the road and she can totally kick his stupid dumb over muscled tuchus!

"Oh! Right-o, then! My codename is JE-1993," he announces grandly. She almost thinks he'd strike a pose to say it, but both of them are pointing loaded specibi at each other and aren't inclined to shift their aim. "But you can call me Bolter!"

"Bolter, huh." Sharpshooter huffs, her mouth turning down a little at the side. "...Someone who...runs away a lot?"

She expects him to lose his temper at that. Instead, he throws up his pistols, both eyebrows rising. "That's what I thought she meant!" Bolter insists. Then he shrugs. "I was right put out, but Ranger - er - she gave some darned explanation, and sure as shooting, it's the name of some kind of gunkind from one of her blasted games that fires explosive kinetic rounds. So - why not? It's as good a moniker as any, eh?"

"Yeah, that sounds pretty neat!" Sharpshooter agrees. She makes a mental note to look into that - an explosive kinetic round sounds interesting - but tables the investigation for later. "And you already know my name... But, uh, just some friendly advice!" She grins, letting her head fall to the side as she extends her senses.

"Mm?"

"Don't let the hero get you monologuing."

And she yanks the two pistols out of his loosened grip.

She captchalogues them in a trice, because these are some nice guns and they deserve a loving new owner. Then she fires off two plastic rounds and doesn't wait to watch him dodge. She closes fast - she doesn't zoom right in with a flicker of power, not after what happened last time, but instead pops in a good few yards away so he can't get his grabby-hands on her specibus while she aims and fires again from a different angle.

Pop - and another angle, above his head and to the left. A rush of green - and again, this time with her back skimming the grass as she fires up from a low angle along the white boundary line of the field.

To her immense frustration, her sense of space singing as she zaps back to a floating, upright position by the building at the far end of the stadium, she feels every single shot miss. Bolter rolls and twists, totally exposed in the middle of the field with no cover to duck behind, and somehow manages to wrangle his way through her barrage of random attacks without a scratch on him. He rolls to his feet, eyes twinkling as they instantly dart to her new position, and he slips his hands back over his shoulders to draw the pistolkind there without a single misstep. He begins firing again and the renewed assault shatters the concentration Sharpshooter would need to separate him from the rest of his weapons - more specibi at his heels, his sides, with an seemingly endless stock of ammunition.
"Pshaw! You've underestimated me! A true scofflaw never engages in a good scrimmage without gratuitous amounts of backup flintlocks," he boasts, no longer standing still. He matches Sharpshooter stride for stride as best he can, sprinting along the field and jackknifing around to dog her tail whenever she dodges a stray bullet by teleporting out of the fray. At some points, she zaps in close enough to overhear him muttering, apparently not to her - scattered phrases like 'getting a little ridonkulous,' and 'from the animes?' that make little sense without context. When she returns fire, he leaps easily out of the way, never once fooled by her efforts at bouncing around the field to catch him unawares.

But it sounds so very much like a memory of - _Pshaw, my dear girl_ -

"Stop saying stuff like that! URGH!" Sharpshooter reloads the riot gun when her ammo count ticks down near zero, and has to cartwheel on one hand when four slugs shatter the brick of the building at her back. They've worked their way back down the field, so she kicks off through the pale cloud of dust and flies up on top of the roof to assess the situation again. "You sound like Huckleberry Finn or something!"

He responds with a grunt, running full tilt at the building with both guns blazing and a wide smile. Just before she's almost bemusedly convinced he's totally lost it and is gonna ram into the wall, he stops firing.

Holsters both pistols.

And winks, vanishing from her line of sight in the shadow of the building.

But of course, she can still feel him running. She also feels when he jumps, plants a toe high on the wall, and - just keeps going! His hands smack flat against the roof of the building as he clears it, whooping, and swings both feet up to the side. "PARKOUR!" he roars happily, launching himself at her feet.

"Park-no!" Sharpshooter steps back, winds up, and kicks at his face, spinning as she does just in case he pulls another gun, to present the least amount of surface as a target.

Spinning is a grave miscalculation. But in her defense, under the usual circumstances, there are few situations that cannot be improved by the addition of some kind of rotation. Bolter ducks the kick, and then his hand snaps out to the side to grab the end of her lab coat, wrapping the fabric around in a quick twist before _yanking_.

Her reflex is to bounce out of there lickety split. But the sudden jerk on her coat whips her head to the side and Sharpshooter only just grits her teeth and regains enough of her bearings to teleport away when a wide hand clamps down on her forearm - and Bolter gets dragged through space along with her.

Their molecules snap back into the proper configuration thirty feet in the air above the field; Sharpshooter processes the fact that she's got a hitchhiker a second too late, and feels her center of gravity pinwheeling as the extra weight the Scratch kid dragging her down by the arm registers. "Hey! Let go!" she shrieks, bringing the riot gun around to point at Bolter's face.

"No!" he replies, not letting go. "Orders are orders, I'm afraid!"

Sharpshooter...doesn't actually want to shoot this guy in the face. True, he's been willing to shoot _her_ in the face with live amunition, but at this range even her rubber bullets would probably conk him in the noggin with such force that he won't wake up intact. Suffice to say, his face will be rearranged deliberately, pouring more energy into her gravity-defying hover to keep both of them afloat, but doesn't fire. "I mean it! Orders say you have to dangle here and take a bullet to the face?"

"Oh, no," he says, thick eyelashes fluttering as he winks again. "Orders just say to bring you back to base before you can teleport away! So - you're not going anywhere without me, I'm afraid! One way or another, you're stuck with me!"

"I'll drop you from higher up!" she threatens. "Watch me! I totally will! I'll ditch you in three -"

He starts whistling. She can feel the bones of her wrist grinding together as he digs his fingers into her skin, and her concentration almost breaks.

"Two!"

Sharpshooter yanks them to the west and north, floating over the stadium and random buildings and all the while wrenching her arm from side to side, trying to shake him. Bolter pulls on the coat like it's a leash or something, and they almost faceplant into a glass window before she rights herself again. Sharpshooter tracks higher and higher in the air until they're five stories above street level.
"One!" she says, exasperated, even though it's been wayyy more than three seconds - she's counting pretty generously, here - and - Bolter lets go of her wrist without warning.

"Wha -" Sharpshooter starts, and then he's heaving her down by the lab coat, a sharp yank on the fabric with all his weight that tears a huge chunks with the thick sound of threads snapping en masse.
It wrenches her shoulders back, and his now-free hand swings around to try to latch around her waist.

...Fine. Fine! If that's how he wants to play! It's too hard to try to distinguish where his hand entangles with the fabric and just swap the lab coat into her sylladex - too much risk she'd end up captchaloguing Bolter right along with it in the heat of the moment. So she kicks in midair so she hangs upside down, sticks out her tongue as the Scratch kid's hand paws uselessly through the empty space where her body used to be, and lets her riot gunkind fall back into the sylladex pocket so she can shake her arms out of her lab coat.

Yeah, okay, she'll catch him before he hits the ground. She salutes first, a jaunty flick of her fingers away from her forehead, as the dumb-o and his microshorts of evil plummet toward a bus parked along the side of the road beneath them, her torn labcoat still streaming like a banner from one hand.

Thirty feet above the ground, just when Sharpshooter's fingers start to itch and buzz with green sparks, Bolter tosses the coat away. The lab coat billows, distracting Sharpshooter for a beat - and then, when she's returned her focus to the kid he's firing a grappling hook at the nearest light pole.
Cable unspools from the chamber in a black arc, and the three-pronged hook at the end just barely hits the horizontal bar of the light pole at the right angle so that the cable wraps around the metal in a tight loop and brings him swinging to street level in a low, dipping curve. The hook retracts on command, metal tines clanging against the hollow of the light pole as it unwinds from the bar and returns to Bolter's side. "Jesus Christmas! You nearly had me there!" he laugh, slotting the mechanism back into the holster along the side of his thigh and brushing imaginary dust off his bared forearms.

Ohhh nooo. That's was...so awesome. Sharpshooter is genuinely impressed and she hates it! Her poor labcoat, yet another victim of the battle, lands in a crumpled heap on top of a bus parked by the side of the road, and she can't even bring herself to spare it a glance. She's down to her dark blue nebula suit, her gloves, her shoes, and her glasses, and although it was only a bundle of fabric with admittedly minimal value as armor, she feels vaguely exposed without the wrap of the lab coat. It's like, half her uniform, gosh darn it! "You owe me a new gun and a new coat, mister!" she grumps, folding her arms over her chest and fully expecting Bolter will start shooting at her again.

Weirdly, he doesn't. Not right away, at least. While Sharpshooter waits, Bolter jolts a little, his head turning just a fraction as though to glance at something behind him before he aborts the motion, shaking his head. Then he presses two fingers to his ear - to the earpiece - and appears to just...check out of the fight entirely.

And she was so impressed, not even two seconds ago! That was some Lara Croft levels of cool maneuvering, and now - this! Lame.

"I don't understand, chaps, what's going -" Bolter groans, glancing at Sharpshooter with an apologetic slant to his lips, and silently mouths, 'I have to take this' at her before turning on his heel so he's at an angle to her, rubbing at the side of his temple with the heel of one hand while he chatters at the earpiece some more. "I can't see a blistering thing from over here and you're all talking at once!"

"Trouble on the evil villain team front?" she calls down.

He rolls his eyes and nods - another silent message that she reads as 'high maintenance chaps, the lot of them' - and then he starts frowning, his smirk sagging. "Ranger, Cogitator, what are you two on about?"

Okay. Uh, well, if the villains are having trouble (no matter how questionable Sharpshooter finds the fact that Bolter would just...tell her that up front without a second's hesitation...) that is - good? Yeah, she's pretty sure that's a-okay in her book! It must mean that the others are doing just fine kicking butt, in spite of Sharpshooter's unfortunate split-second decision to...bolt.

Okay, that was awful, even for her. She's gonna have to inflict it on Dave later, just to see the non-look of absolute despair on his face. Sharpshooter sets her chin on her fist, floating crosslegged, and waits for Bolter to finish up his conversation. Her space sense starts gnawing at her, and Sharpshooter feels outward, trying to get an idea of what she's sensing. There are people in the buildings around them, though the parking garage is mostly empty aside from - something really jittery, that keeps cutting in and out -

"Fiddlesticks!" Bolter exclaims, derailing Sharpshooter's train of thought. His face is a mask of concentration, now, none of that good humor from before visible in the flat line of his mouth as he removes his hand from the side of his head. His spine crawls at the assessing look he directs at her, and though his voice is as gung-ho and chipper as it was not three minutes ago, Sharpshooter summons her riot gun again as she notices the flatness in his eyes.

...Bad news for the villain team...might mean bad news for her, too. Whoopsie.

"Gee, we really have done a bangup job of pecking away at each other, haven't we?" Bolter laughs; it's hollow. It's so totally fake. She doesn't buy it for a second! This guy just went from weird but enthusiastic to scary in ten seconds flat! "But I've just got off the horn with my good comrades, and...well, there's been a spot of difficulty with some of my chums, I believe, so let's agree to make this snappy! Shall we?"

Sharpshooter nods tightly, not daring to look away. "Totally."
Before he can start shooting, she flings herself in close and roars, because roaring is a confidence booster. Reaching out, she snags the grappling hook out of its holster with a wave of green power and doesn't really care if she catches some of his clothing along with it as she clumsily launches the hook like a cannonball into the concrete wall of the parking garage. Bolter brings his pistol kind around in a horizontal slash - she didn't even feel him draw it - and makes no bones about aiming; he just tries to smash the darned thing into the side of her face. She bounces out of the way, and then bites back a yelp as the rapport of the gun echoes in her ears and a new array of bullets slam into the road beneath her feet. The Scratch can only fire so often with one gun, but he fixes that up in a jiffy, stooping to draw another pistol from a holster at his calf without taking his eyes off her. His firing hand remains steady as a rock, targeting her with such preternatural accuracy that it has to be some kind of super power. Has to!

Then she hecks up. She's sick of being on the defensive nonstop, so she 'ports between Bolter and the building on their left and -

Sharpshooter feels someone move inside the building, right behind her position - about the same time she realizes the wall behind her is mostly glass windows. "Crud!" escapes her as she belatedly realizes what she's just done, and what Bolter is totally about to do oh crudcrudcrud -

She bounces into the building without looking, guided only by that distinct sense of where the body-shaped mass is crouching to peer outside, and then flattens herself on top of the troll that she teleports behind, forcing them both to the ground as four bullets shatter the pane of the glass door. Sharpshooter flips her hair up out of her eyes to see Bolter striding from the sidewalk between the dull grey, rectangular pillars that frame the wall of windows, looking for all the world unfazed by the fact that there's a jittering body underneath Sharpshooter's protective, splayed crouch that nearly got caught in their crossfire. "Stop it! Ahg! You're gonna hit someone!" she says, alarmed, realizing that the room she's in right now is full of people crouching behind desks and chairs and -

"I'll lead him away!" she yells for the benefit of the civilians, and to deliberately tip Bolter off before he can fire again. She makes her next teleport as obvious as possible, thinking fiercely about how she wants the wash of neon green to light up like a flare, and then she's back on the street, making sure to keep the mostly-deserted parking garage at her back this time. Whoever's moving around in there - multiple someones, at least two or three - seems to be moving fast enough and are still a ways down the street relative to her and Bolter's strife.

"Faster faster faster, wrap this up faster, because he doesn't care who he hurts, Sharpshooter thinks, and at last she starts firing back. Aiming and dodging is harder than the Scratch is making it look, but she has the benefit of being able to feel his slightest adjustments in the angle of his wrists, the white-hot path the bullets take through space, and she finally, at last, manages to catch him off guard. One of her reloaded rubber bullets ploughs into his kneecap and the crack of bone sounds louder than the gunshots have in a while (she tends to get used to the loud reverb of gunkind, after enough of a shootout).

Bolter grimaces, ceasing his fire to stagger to the side a little, testing his weight on that leg with a harsh tug on his lips. "Oh, shitknickers!"

Sharpshooter can't take it anymore. "What does that even mean?! What are you, Karkat?!" she shrieks, slapping another round of ammo into the riot gun's chamber and sending down a hail of rubber not-death-but-extreme-bodily-trauma at his head.

"Who?" the man asks, bewildered. His dodge is slower - yesss - but when he stands upright again and plants his stance to fire, he doesn't favor the fractured kneecap at all - noooo...

Sharpshooter breaks off with a gasp of pent-up outrage, and teleports in low and fast, kick straight out in front of her and planting her heel right on that damaged kneecap. "- because that sounds like something Karkat would say! An old man Karkat!" she yells, twirling up three feet and kicking the Scratch right in the sternum with all the space punchiness she can muster. "I'll shit in your knickers, you - you grandpa imitator!" she adds as Bolter flies across the sidewalk to impact a concrete pillar along the flank of the parking garage.

Bolter shakes it off, peeling himself away from the wall and reloading his pistols with two clacks. "I have no idea what you're on about, my good ma'am, but -" He stumbles, frowning, and then reels around to stare into the depths of the garage behind him. "Whoa, nelly!" And with that he rears back, plasters himself up against the concrete column with wide eyes. Sharpshooter senses the body being flung out of the garage right around the time it sails past Bolter to land hard on the sidewalk and slam into a tree.

She and Bolter trade looks, and then they stare as one at the troll clawing her way back upright, leaving thick white scratches deep in the bark of the skinny tree as she hauls herself upright. Her outfit is in tatters, she's covered in jade green blood from head to boot, and her makeup has been smeared and smudged all over so that her face is a gleaming white mask, glowing faintly in the half light.

Kanaya! Yay! "There you are!" Sharpshooter exclaims, clapping her hands together around the trigger of the gun. "I was wondering where you all got off to, Sylph!"

The jadeblood troll grunts, one pointed tooth tugging on her lower lip as she uncaps a tube of lipstick and uses it to reapply a layer of green to her lips. Then, with a shake of her wrist, the Malachite Sylph unfolds her chainsaw. "I am fairly certain it should be the other way around, given that you were the one to vanish first. But pardon me; this human does not know when to give up."

That's all the explanation Sharpshooter receives before, with a trilling war screech, the jadeblooded hero takes a running leap past Bolter, back into the parking garage - and reappears ten feet further along the ramp between rows of parked vehicles, skittering across Sharpshooter's senses and skipping large chunks of space in a matter of seconds, like - like Dave! It's Dave's flashstepping thingy!

Neat!

Wrestling with the instinct to go learn how Dave's teaching other people to do the time-y thing - so fascinating! It has to be a game mechanic at work, right? - Sharpshooter rivets her eyes on Bolter again. She needs a finisher, a one move takedown to end this so she can go help with the strife playing out in the garage, and she thinks she has just the sweet move!

But, uh. Bolter won't look at her. Sharpshooter holds back the adrenaline rush twitching through her body with a frown of consternation creasing her face. The dark haired Scratch kid continues to peer around the concrete pillar, into the dimly lit parking lot, the whites of his eyes almost glassy from what she can make out from here.

"Cogitator," the Scratch breathes. Then, without a backward glance, Bolter rounds the pillar and nimbly bounds in the Malachite Sylph's wake, hurdling the hood of a truck and ignoring the secondary creak as his patella protests vigorously.

Sharpshooter hangs there, alone, for a good five seconds.

"...HEY! COME BACK HERE, YOU - YOU DORKLORD!" she yells, throwing up both hands and gripping at her hair with the free hand as she grumpily zooms after them, the green of static lighting up her frizzling, riled hair. "Who says you get to just tag out before the finale?! This isn't pro wrestling, you jerk!"

He spares a fleeting look over his shoulder, a flash of green, and then the mouth of a pistolkind replaces Bolter's face and Sharpshooter dodges an over-the-shoulder shot that goes wild. Still, the Scratch kid keeps up a dead run, sprinting toward the flurry of three figures weaving their way through a row of scattered but utterly demolished cars. Sharpshooter raises the riot gun and fires two rounds - the second of them makes another mark, slamming into the back of Bolter's uninjured knee, but he takes the fall like a real champ, barely breaking up his momentum until he skids to a halt a good few yards from the choke point where Flashstep and the Sylph duke it out with a nameless, shades-sporting blond Scratch kid that Sharpshooter - does nooooot remember. Must have been after her unfortunate vanishing act. Errrr…

"Cogs." The nickname tumbles out between Bolter's slightly-too large front teeth, his toothy grin making the disproportionate set of his front incisors all the more obvious as he cups his hands around his mouth. Sharpshooter jerks to an abrupt halt a safe distance from him, debating whether she should just punch this inconsiderate guy's lights out.

Curiosity wins out. It tends to do that.

Flashstep is a less than a blur in Sharpshooter's senses - she still feels a burst of sympathetic pain when the Scratch kid pinned between the two heroes kicks Dave across the face and slashes through Kanaya's hamstrings in two swift movements. "J- Bolter," the other Scratch says, his voice a flat, emotionless monotone.

Or is it, really? Sharpshooter shifts from foot to foot as well as she can while floating a foot above the ground, her stomach sinking like concrete blocks to the bottom of a bay, because the Scratch's voice is - hesitant. Just barely, but it's there, a faint hitch in his words that breaks the rhythm.

She recognizes Bolter's motions. She's been fighting him for, like, fifteen minutes now. Recognizing them doesn't make the struggle to translate what she's witnessing any easier, as Bolter raises pistolkind and levels them at his teammate.

"You were conspiring with a traitor," Bolter sing-songs. The horrific thing on his face is not a grin. Not anymore. "Tsk tsk, tut tut!" He doesn't even see aware of the three heroes arranged around him and the other Scratch, both Dave and Kanaya looking just as bewildered as Sharpshooter feels. It's like they don't even appear on his radar.

Cogs's bladekind lowers ever so slightly, off guard, his whole body frozen in place, so still that Sharpshooter thinks it isn't a deliberate plot - it's - "Jake," he says, his voice far more urgent this time. "Jake, there are variables you and Jane are not aware of."

"Ranger's consorting with the heroes," Bolter says, sounding almost dreamy. "And she wants you to join her, by Jove!"

"Jake -" The pain is audible.

"Which means," Bolter - Jake? - continues, talking over the other Scratch's low voice, "you've given her reason to think you'd be all aboard the locomotive of betrayal!" The Scratch pulls one pistol back to tap against the side of his head. "I know what you all think: Bolter, well, he's a little loose in the loafers, no? Plumb weak, north of his ears, eh? But I can deduce with the best of them, old friend. And I do believe that I've deduced this one exactly."

"Jake, don't." It's terse, it's low, it's so quiet Sharpshooter almost doesn't hear it.
Jade still feels an unaccountable twist of guilt pang in her gut. Even without context to understand what the crap is going on, the note in Cogitator's voice hits some old sympathy nerve in her monkey brain; it's the tone of someone who wishes desperately that their pain could play out in private, without nosy strangers listening in. Yeah, she kind of feels bad for the guy - And she feels even more bad when Bolter pulls the trigger because oh crap he pulled the trigger Cogitator doesn't move. Even if he started moving now, no matter how fast he has to be to keep up with Flashstep for this long, it wouldn't - why isn't he moving - it wouldn't help anything, because the blond's expression just looks lost.

"Shit!" Sharpshooter doesn't feel Dave move - he kind of gives her a headache that way, sometimes, when his time stuff leaves her space sense at loose ends - but between one second and the next, he and Cogitator crash together in a tangle, the blond belatedly struggling to shove Flashstep off as the hero fights tooth and nail to drag them both behind a convenient van. The Sylph skips steps too, reappearing on Bolter's flank with her chainsaw whirring and all her teeth sharper even than a troll's should be as she lunges at the Scratch.

Sharpshooter almost thinks she hears music, sweetly aching in her ear, but maybe she's just imagining that. She chooses to focus on Bolter, instead, because the total maniac is still firing, the shots echoingly loud in the cavernous parking garage.

But he's also focused completely on trying to do the murder thing to his friend. So when the Sylph swings the specibus at the backs of his knees, the distraction jars him; he jumps over the swing rather than to the side, knees tucking up under him, and he's so lost in his head that even the agony that has to be throbbing through that fractured kneecap doesn't slow him down.

But he still ends up with both feet off the ground, with no way to turn or go any which way but up and down, in a straight line.

So there's that in her favor as Sharpshooter spins the riot gun in her hands and brings the butt of the gun down on the crown of his thick skull.

Bolter hits the ground hard, knees and shins first, with the force of Sharpshooter shoving him toward the concrete, and she hears something else crack. But his arm wraps around his chest quick as a snake, the other shooting straight out to the side, and Sharpshooter just barely zaps out of the way.

Kanaya's not so lucky. But the slug carves its way through her (barely misses grazing the hip, exits cleanly through her back) and the Sylph just keeps coming, blood stripping down the front of her and adding to the pastiche of dried blood already soaking through her uniform.

Thankfully, at the last minute, the chainsawkind retracts back into a lipstick container, and it's just Kanaya's fists of righteous fury that clasp together and clock Bolter in the temple. Sharpshooter's first blow might have been stymied by all that bone in his noggin, but after that one the Scratch kid's head jerks to the side, and Jade knows a knock-out when she sees one.

When the pistolkind clatter to the concrete and Bolter sags forward, collapsing face first without a single crazypants word more, she knows they've got this in the bag. "Nice hit," Sharpshooter says admiringly, drifting closer and nudging Kanaya in the side. Wait. Oops. "Oh, darn, did I hurt you?! You probably need stitches for that one, I'm so sorry -"

"I'm fine. I heal quickly." The jadeblood peels the blood-sticky fabric away from her side, and most of it just kind of falls apart in her claws, hanging by threads. Her nice, pretty outfit looks like it took on a blender and lost the battle, if not the war. "See? The wound has already sealed over."

Huh. Jade leans in and sure enough, the blood trickling out of the hole in Kanaya's side has already slowed to a crawl. She's standing pretty straight too without looking like she's in pain, so her hamstrings must be knitting together fast, too. "Wow! You heal so fast! That's so convenient!"

"Indeed. I am as surprised as you."

From behind the van, Dave raises his head and a single finger, his lips a perfectly smug line. One of the arms of his sunglasses appears to have snapped, because his left eye is almost completely visible over the rim of the black shades. He doesn't seem too concerned about adjusting it, either, looking worn but victorious. "I'm not. Music saves, ladies."

Kanaya rolls her eyes, presses the pad of a claw to the weird not-scab where the bullet wound has knitted together, and then cocks her head to the side, listening. "Actually, I believe the music has stopped."

"Well, obviously, you try to mix for shit when you're embracing an armful of spikey haired - ffrrmglll!"

And that, Jade thinks, through a muffled giggle, is the sound a dude makes when someone else's knee has written their name on his groin's dance card and come a-calling. She still has her riot gun in hand, and at her side Kanaya basically transforms into a statue, radiating such wary tension that Jade thinks she might well jump Cogitator solely on principle when the guy emerges from behind the van. He moves fast, wayyy faster than Bolter could earlier, even before Jade 'capped him, but he doesn't even look up at her and Kanaya. He just lurches to a stop in a tight crouch beside Bolter's unconscious form. His bladekind is clenched tight in his fist, but his pale fingers shake where the black, fingerless gloves don't conceal his hands.

Jade raises a hand, just in case. "But actually, you guys - what the heck? What did I miss? This guy was fighting me and then he went even more cuckoo?"

"Your guess is as good as ours," Kanaya says with a shrug, gradually uncoiling from her stony battle stance with a wary eye on Cogitator.

"Jake." Jade and Kanaya both flinch, but the Scratch kid just clenches his bladekind - and then sheaths it, curling both hands into fists so tight she's sure his nails must be digging into his own gloved palms with a vengeance. He doesn't lay a finger on Bolter, to help or to hurt or even to check for a pulse, and with those Bro-style triangle shades, Jade can't even tell if his eyes are open or not.

"...I'm not really sure, but I'm pretty sure that was him trying to kill you," Dave says at last, his strained wheezing making it clear that he's playing up the grievous assault of his groin for all it's worth from his position behind the van. But still, he's stating pretty much exactly what Jade thinks everyone was thinking. "Y'know, those tricky, thinky thoughts. "Uh. Aren't you all supposed to be evil bros 5ever? Or are betrayals actually as sudden and inevitable as they're rumored to be?" Dave crawls out from behind the van, his head low, and then, before Jade can even bounce over and flick him for being an overdramatic coolkid, stands up and braces himself on the side of the vehicle under the guise of casually lounging there, with the stoic expression of someone suffering for a cause.

Irony, probably.

"...Fuckin' hell." Cogitator's response is a long time coming, and when he raises his face without looking at any of them - Jade's half convinced herself he's gotten himself stuck all hunched over permanently by then! - his voice is just tired. Really tired, like all the fight's been sucked out of him.
"Roxy's done. Should've extrapolated that would mean I'd be done, too." His chin angles ever so slightly, and Jade thinks with almost 79% certainty that he's eyeing Kanaya.

Jade sneaks the riot gun back into the sylladex. Yeah. She's pretty sure the fight's done; Dave's swords have been tucked away as well, and he turns a broken piece of crap broken bladekind over in his hands before sticking it through a belt loop with a shrug.

Hoo, boy.

Finally, Cogitator says, expressionless, "There's an 86% probability that I could strife my way past the three of you and successfully abscond. It only drops five percentage points if I expend the resources to take Jake with me." Another, shorter pause. "And those numbers are totally not based on algorithms that I just pulled directly from my ass. You know. Just for the record."

"The record shall reflect your statistical capability for trouncing us without compunction," Kanaya promises, solemn as she bows her head, and how the heck did she become the one in charge of this, anyway?

"But are you gonna fight us?" Jade asks. She bites at the inside of her cheek when the guy takes forever to answer again. It's like now that he's not on his feet and fighting, he needs to overthink things and debate his options so much he forgets to respond out loud! Are all of these kids crazy?

"Nah...Nah. I'm done." The Scratch runs his fingers through his hair, and the faintest inklings of a bitter smile ghost over the corners of his lips.

"You surrender? Goddamn - finally." Dave slumps a little more obviously. Jade catches his left hand spread a little, reaching for something, but then he smooths his fingers back down against his side like it never happened. "I'm starving. I could literally eat a goddamn whale. And not some shitty ass beluga whale. We're talking, like, Greenpeace blacklists all of Houston for my sins levels of marine mammal consumption." The lens of the crooked half of the shades pops out, just in time to reveal Dave's smirking has reached new levels of smug bastardry. "In fact, I know exactly what kind of whale I'm going to suggest to Karkat. Oh fuck yes, he's gonna flip his tiny angry troll shit over this one -"

Kanaya rubs her face with one hand, and mutters something like, "surrounded by greybait," but Jade is still trying to keep focused on the currently-compliant but still probably super dangerous Scratch kid right in front of them.

"Did I say I surrender?" Cogitator cuts in, his tone dripping acid sharp enough to make Rose proud as he rolls his head to the side to stare at Dave instead. Still assessing. Still calculating. Jade adjusts herself accordingly - she's pretty sure at any moment, this guy could decide it would be easier for him to just cut through them rather than - whatever is going on right now. "The answer is hell no. I call ceasefire. Nothing happens 'til I see Roxy."

"Who?" Jade asks, drumming her fingers against her arm as she folds them again.

"Ranger." Cogitator moves, and Jade has a hand in the sylladex before she realizes he's moving to lever Bolter upright, his face unreadable as he slings the unconscious guy's arm over his shoulders. Which seems kind of unsafe, if Bolter wakes up without warning, but Jade keeps her mouth shut. "She's pleading sanctuary and defection with the Seer of Light. If it's any consolation, coming from me, she's sincere about it." He shrugs, and Bolter jostles a little with the motion, making it very obvious that in terms of muscle mass, Cogitator is far slimmer. "I talk to her, or we do this the tedious way. Nonnegotiable."
Dave shrugs when Jade looks askance at him. Kanaya's concern is evident on her face, though, and her hair swings in messy chunks around her ears as she murmurs in Jade's ear, low enough that the Scratch can't hear, "If she's alone with Rose -"

"Right! We're going! Express teleport to everyone else, leaving riilliight now!" Jade announces, her voice a higher pitch than usual for a reason she can't name. She pastes on a nice, generic smile though, trying to put everyone at ease but especially trying to beam intense 'happy teleporting truce times' in mental waves at Cogitator. "Gather in close, guys, while I pinpoint where Rose's at, 'kay?"

Dave stumbles the rest of the way over. Ouch. "We don't have to walk it?"

"Walking!" Jade pretends to sniff haughtily - she ruins it by cracking into a smile midway through her attempt to imitate the strongest, classiest accent Grandpa ever used around her. "Nonsense, Dave! Powers are made to be used!"

"Alright, then? We've got everyone? Positive?" Sharpshooter checks - cautious, be cautious! - before they take off. At Dave's curt nod, Jade casts one last, lingering look over their group to make sure she has them all in her mind's eye, including Bolter's unconscious, limp form slung over Cogitator's shoulder, and wraps her space powers around them all. Cogitator himself is almost as still as Kanaya, and Jade is grateful to have the jadeblood here to keep up a keen-eyed vigilance while Jade is distracted and Dave is...uh...incapacitated to some unknown degree.

Anyway! "Next stop, Mr Egbert's car!"

- 500 feet above...

Built to withstand wind speeds up to 200 miles per hour, the Space Needle stands out against the skyline of Seattle. From the observation deck five hundred feet up, on a clear day and with at least a passable excuse for good eyesight, the Cascade Mountains rise up clear in the distance while all of downtown Seattle and Elliott Bay spread themselves out before the viewer like a patchwork of greys, browns, and blues.

Spades Slick is not up here to enjoy the view. It took some wrangling to make his way to the outside observation deck when the humans and trolls running the joint were so determined to evacuate the place as a likely terrorist target, but the carapacian has found that a judiciously applied threat and a flash of a knife can work fucking wonders. The vast majority of people he's come across on this watery cesspit of a planet barely know how to hold their strife specibi the right way up - the only exceptions, naturally, turning out to be either crooks or cops or pissants like these shitty heroes, who insist on risking perma-death with every move they make.

Unfortunately, said pissants are now the only stooges Spades can call his own, at the moment. Which is why he's up here, squinting down with his arms looped through the wires strung around the viewing area and angrily kicking one of the white metal struts to pass the time. There's something off about the sky overhead, but what the hell does he know about this planet's weather? The only showers Derse ever suffered from were spontaneous meteor-storms and the horrors that could drive anyone stupid enough to be outside during an eclipse insane. There's something foul in the air, but he'll be damned if he can figure it out.

Besides, he's gotta see his new crew in action. More to the point, he's gotta be ready to cover Vantas's incompetent ass in case the sad sack of extra organ meat fucks up and tries to pull a solo job again. The blood oath is stronger now, a persistent jangle in his blood - and that's sayin' something. Hell, the remnants of the last one faded over the years but still managed to hook Spades halfway around this shitty planet to get him here in time to yank Vantas ass over horns out of Diamonds’ path before the kid could get his fool self killed. But before that he'd had years of not having to give two shits about the kid's well-being, and it irks him that he's been dragged into schooling this stupid troll on the basic facts of life.

Spades just keeps reminding himself that it's worth it to have that extra edge in a strife. He doesn't like many things, but he likes having Blood players in his corner. Never mind that he wouldn't have had a clue how to end the first oath anyway, and coulda ended up stuck with a ghost of a blood bond to a dead troll for the rest of his miserable life. With Diamonds, Hearts, and Clubs all gone fleshy and fucking off to work with the enemy, Spades needs whatever he can squeeze out of Vantas if he wants any hope of standing his ground.

He gnashes his teeth, muttering to himself as the plastered human Seer returns first. Back at the labs he'd gotten an eyeful of the damage she inflicted on the room full of booze, and while he can respect anyone who can hold their liquor, the fact is this dame cannot. What she does is the opposite of holding her liquor. He's not quite sure what to call it, but it ain't healthy. A growl of exasperation escapes him when he sees she's not even on her feet; some other human is carting her around, and he's pretty sure it ain't one of his crew. They all kinda look alike, all easily-perforated skin and lumps of random fat deposits, without even the weird goddamn horns trolls have to help tell them apart, but this one is in an unfamiliar uniform so Spades grimaces and hooks a foot on one of the wires in case he has to intervene. But the two rendezvous with the butter and egg man without incident, crawling into the backseat of the car in some kinda ceasefire, and Spades lowers himself back down to the ground.

Vantas arrives next, along with the human Heir, and all without Spades' s blood oath pingin him for anything other than moderate amounts of danger. The kid didn't try to ditch his Heir even once. He'd be grudgingly proud if it weren't common fucking sense; he's still floored by how little Vantas remembers about the game. As a sign of his reluctant, resentful approval, Spades uses what pull he has to jerk on the blood oath, waiting impatiently for the kid to notice their pulses synchronizing until Vantas's head snaps up to stare at him. Spades bares his teeth and snaps before sticking out his tongue, certain that the troll can see him from here, and receives a twitching eye and an extended pair of middle claws as a salute.

Well, if nothing else, at least the kid still has brass. Sure, Spades'd shank him for being a snot-nosed piece of shit if they were in close quarters, but look, mutual hemorrhaging is just a standard Dersite hello. What can Spades say, he's a product of his cloned upbringing, spawned on a planet on an eternal war-footing. It's all about body language. Heh.

The arrival of the space Witch leaves angry green afterimages burning across Spades's field of vision, and he snarls in impotent rage as he waits for it to clear up. Powerful, sure, but subtle, Witches ain't. And they're always so damn quirky. This one seems reasonable enough, but her control of her powers spins on a Russian roulette and if she's not unconsciously spamming some kind of mood-altering fraymotif Spades will stab himself in the eye to escape the chipper brashness. But she brings the rest of the crew with her, including an unconscious man in shorts so tiny that Spades, never the strictest proponent of leg garments himself, tugs at the side of his pants leg just to assuage the powerful wave of feeling somehow nearly-naked by proxy. It's like second-hand embarrassment, probably, but Spades has never met the empathy quota needed to sympathize with jackshit, so he wouldn't know.

Anyway. With the strife over and, one can only assume, the potential for immediate danger to Vantas's life declining to its usual background levels that Spades can easily ignore, the carapacian draws back from the edge of the observation deck, stowing his knife with only a sour sigh. Down below, there's another crack of lime green light that makes Spades scowl reflexively, and then the whole bunch has fucked off, which takes a load off Spades's back. Loathe as he is to admit it, he and Vantas have problems controlling their blood pressure thanks to their air-trigger tempers. Since the oath would normally react to such little things as a heightened pulse or a rush of adrenaline, it's taken a damn lot of maneuvering for Spades to feel free to ignore the everyday flare-ups of compulsive danger sense that ensue on a regular basis when one's linked to a troll with anger management issues. It still makes Spades's shell crawl, insisting that the brat is still in danger at the most innocuous times, but he snaps at himself mentally and digs his claws into his unraveling sweater until he thinks he has the bond convinced it's safe to ignore whatever has Vantas in a huff this time.

BQ: Dear, dear. They're becoming competent, aren't they? I'll have to do something to fix that, soon.

Oh for fuck's sake. Spades hears the door sighing shut with a hushed noise before the Queen's mental speech has even finished resolving itself in his mind. It's the most annoying possible thing he could hear at this exact moment, putting him in mind of days when her lightning-sharp, dark bloom of a telepathic command could reach through a hundred floors to harass him in the dark cubicle of vigilance. Queens and their fucking command privileges, honestly.

At least she did come through the door. Spades isn't stupid; even on a day this grey, the shadows aren't long and dark enough for the Queen to use her teleporting trick, so he'd thought he'd be alright if he watched where he stepped. But obviously she's been tailing him, regardless, and sneakily enough that he didn't hear her coming before now. Not like that's anything new - she's always sneaking up on him at the most humiliating times - but he clicks at her with his claws occupied by drawing knives, and shoves as much of a rude impression into the mental projection as he can muster.

The result involves enough implied expletives and physically impossible but still insulting suggestions to set Vantas's ears afire. The most censored translation would run something like:

SS: Great. Just the broad I didn't want to see. Why don't you go [redacted] [redacted] [redacted] with a crayon where no one can hear you scream, you massive goddamn [redacted] [redacted] spaghetti strainer up your -

The Black Queen leans bonelessly against the wall by the door, the collar of her deep green trenchcoat popped so that the crunch of a healing hickey at the base of her neck is clearly visible. Because this woman is a fucking menace.

BQ: One day, I am going to smash every last one of your teeth and rejoice in the silence that ensues as you choke on your own blood.

BQ: I may declare it a planetary-wide holiday, just to commemorate the anniversary of the event.

SS: Bluh, bluh - as if yah even have a planet to lord it over, anymore. Think I haven't noticed you ain't got any lackeys running at your heels?

'Course, just cause she doesn't have any attendants waiting on her claw and foot here in the Americas, where carapacians are rare enough to get noticed on principle, doesn't mean she ain't without her little birds. Plenty of shells overseas are still loyal to their Reginae Absentes, and the Shatranj may be an unholy mess thanks to the GP's ham-fisted efforts at consolidation and unification, but the Dersites of the hodgepodge carapacian spy network are still damned good at their jobs. He's run across them more than a few times over the years and it always had to end bloody.
But he thinks the BQ might be more isolated than that. The White Queen openly announced she was going to search for her missing sister-queen, after all; Spades picked up that much from his darling gal. All those dumbass pale shells came out to bid her farewell in a tearful shindig, and she apparently checks in often to reassure her subjects - every couple decades or so. This Queen, on the other hand, up and vanished like the inconsiderate b - urgh, witch that she is before most carapacians were even cloned, and just like that the Dersite corner found itself Sovereignless and hedged into an uneasy truce with their neighbors. No way any dark shell with half a brain would willingly put up with centuries of cooperating with Prospitians if they knew their Queen was still breathing. And Villein followers don't count.

Queens. They act all benevolent by not murdering you on sight and pretending their armies are so vital to the war effort. But give 'em the chance to run off and play solo, and they'll slaughter their own kings and armies to seize it with both claws. And that's why Spades'll never kneel to one again.
You know, aside from the fact that the only sovereign he has experience with is the most infuriating dame to ever try to beat him upside the head with the Regnant Throne.

BQ: But still you think of me as Queen. Very telling, Spades.

SS: Pah. I don't see no ring on your hand.

BQ: True. I wonder where that old thing could have misplaced itself.

BQ: You wouldn't have any ideas about that, would you, Spades?

With every bitter exchange, Spades finds himself edging backward while the Queen insinuates herself further into his personal space. Instinct says stab her while secondary instinct screams do not do the thing, because she can still dish out twice the damage he can if he pisses her off in the wrong way. But soon she's got him backed up so that he can feel wires pressing up against his jacket, the still, open air through the gaps reminding him that he can't goddamn fly.

And the way she drawls that last part, innocuous and mild in his head with hardly any electrifying blowback, he can tell she's up to something. There is goddamn flimflammin' chicanery afoot, and considering the subject -

Well. He just really needs to change the subject, is all. Last thing he needs is his on-again-off-again spades fling hunting down his lady love.

SS: Hell if I know.

BQ: Don't you?

SS: God damn, woman, it's your ring, not mine.

BQ: Really? I wouldn't have guessed it from the way you continually attempt to wrest it from my claws, in every life you've ever lived.

BQ: But I've seen every vomit-inducing inch of you. It's not on your person, and you have not gone to retrieve it from some hiding place these past few days or I would have sensed it by now.

BQ: Where is it, Slick.

She advances on him again, and Spades can feel the power that radiates from the slim, tall figure before him, dying the faint shadows a deeper black. Shit. Shit shit shit. All he's got are knives. He longs for his old Rapier Wit or a nice serviceable horse hitcher - knives are good enough for warding off a quadranted rival, but if the Queen's angling for her ring after all this time and willing to kill to get her claws on it, he's screwed.

There is little Spades hates more than being cornered. Getting limbs hacked off or eyes poked out might top the list - and whoop-de-fucking-do, who else can he have been cornered by other than the dame most likely to make those things happen. He'd thought - he'd hoped - they'd managed to hatefuck each other senseless enough over the past few days that she'd let him take off without pursuing. Dersite kismesissitudes trend that way - try to kill and/or depose each other multiple times, develop an entirely undesired hardon for the mutual rivalry, fuck each other in an attempt to work out the despicable concupiscent urges, and then avoid each other for a decade or so until the urge to murder someone special picks up again.

_Damn_ that fucking ring. He shoulda dropped it in a volcano. Sure, the ring can survive a little thing like molten rock - hell, it could survive a tactical nuclear strike, seeing as how it's more powerful than any man-made weapon could ever hope to be - but it would be a hell of a lot harder for the Queen to retrieve it, and more importantly, it wouldn't currently rest in the lovely claws of Ms Paint, the one dame Spades will protect at any price.

_Deny, deny, deny. And try not to die._

(He can't remember who said that one. Sounds like something stupid Di would come up with for Clubs in an attempt to ram common sense into Deuce's tiny brain, but Spades and Hearts were equally guilty of thinking up shitty rhymes on the spot when Clubs started acting like a moron mid-heist.

He does not miss them. Whadda pack of idiots.)

SS: Woman, I do not have any idea where your goddamn weapon of mass destruction ended up. Don't you usually respawn a new one when you lose it?

BQ: No. Not when it has been _claimed by an upstart Sovereign_, you absolutely imbecilic excuse for an Archagent.

So that _is_ what happened. He'd applaud his other self, except for holy shit, apparently that guy is bugfuck insane and the consequences of said bugfuckery might yet put MP in jeopardy.

SS: You're thinkin' about the _other_ me, remember? The one who actually _existed_ in this last session.

SS: Bilious's punctured vocal sac, are you finally going senile? Go rip _him_ a new one -

BQ: I would. I really would love to slit your throat right here and now, and go on to ensure that both iterations of your benighted self perish in a unholy inferno.

BQ: But you know very well whose protection he is under. Much good may it do him.

BQ: So instead of mourning that which can never be, I'll just have to satisfy myself by forcing you to _tell me where the ring is._

She lunges for him, something dark and sharp flickering between her claws, and Spades launches himself to the side. In desperation, he hauls himself up on the wires and squirms his way in between them to crawl up along the outside of the observation deck's railings. By the time he reaches the square-patterned net that stretches over the deck, the Queen has tilted her head back to vocalize a clicking growl in his direction, the hat that hangs low over her face just barely sticking to her bald head. Yikes. At the rate this is going, her hate really _is_ gonna flip platonic and Spades won't survive it with all his limbs intact.
So he takes another stab at it.

SS: Come on! It's gotta be with him if he had his claws on it last. Or with the other Queen bitch or the ex-King, ever thought a' that?

SS: Literally any other candidate would be more likely than me! My coup barely fucking worked, no thanks to those useless trolls!

Inwardly, Spades is chanting a little somethin' that goes a little like piss off piss off piss off, and only just barely restrains his claws from signing that, too. But just when he thinks his Skaia-cursed, impeccably bullshit etiquette has drilled through that Queenly shell of hers, the Black Queen's white eyes narrow and the mangled claw of her ring hand spasms with the force of her contempt.

BQ: Really. Because I think we're both right. I think it respawned with the Sovereign who wielded it last.

BQ: The only problem with that...is that two versions of you have spawned.

BQ: And I think you have it.

BQ: I think that with all the glitches and the Horrific interference and the countless other ways this terminal train wreck of a game has sabotaged itself, I think that it chose to spawn the ring with the wrong cohort.

BQ: Neither of you should exist. Your ectobiological codes were wiped from the servers. And yet here you are, Spades. Alive and well, in a carapacian form, and with two copies of one mind in a single session because you just don't know when to quit.

Damn. She's hitting too close to the mark, here. All of these are thoughts he's had before, and what's worse, Spades has already (stupid, stupid!) confessed the existence of his flushed gal to save his own shell. If anyone can put two and two together in the worst way, it's the Black Queen. This can't end well, no matter what Spades says next, and his only possible backup just teleported out to their mountain getaway without him. He's gonna have to sternly lecture his new crew on the matter of not ditching him when he's behind the eight ball.

If he lives. Which depends heavily on what he chooses to do next.

Yeah, fuck it, he's gonna run for it.

SS: You're outta your mind.

SS: I don't have the ring. If I did, you really think I'd miss out on a chance to wipe the floor with your ugly mug? Hell no.

SS: I'm out of here.

He bolts. It's hard running along the net but his feet are nimble and there's not even a hint of a breeze in the air to knock him off balance with a gust sheering across his path. Behind and below, the Queen expresses her displeasure with a stamp of a foot that rattles the entire Needle, but Spades tunes her shouted insults out on the off chance she tries to whammy him with some secret Queenly mojo. By the time he manages to clamber down and launch himself at the outside of the nearest elevator, knives clenched between his teeth to free up his claws, she's almost caught up, and the shadows walk with her.

Vantas'll just have to keep the crew together as deputy for a while.
Spades is on the run again.

From: Samuel Egbert <pipefan413@skaia.net>
To: [redacted] <address unknown>
Subject: Child care

[redacted],

Require dossiers on possible MC assets, codename 'SCRATCH-KIDS.' Future engagement with said assets imminent and unavoidable. Please respond.

Regards,

Samuel Egbert

From: [redacted] <address unknown>
To: Samuel Egbert <pipefan413@skaia.net>
Subject: Re: Child care

Samuel,

No dossiers can be obtained at this time. You've put both of us in danger with this message. I repeat, postpone communications.

Yours,

[redacted]

From: Samuel Egbert <pipefan413@skaia.net>
To: [redacted] <address unknown>
Subject: Re: Re: Child care

[redacted],

Status urgent. All four children now in custody. Escorting to Cascade base. Recommendations?

Regards,

Samuel Egbert

From: [redacted] <address unknown>
To: Samuel Egbert <pipefan413@skaia.net>
Subject: Re: Re: Re: Child care

Samuel,

I told you to restrict future communications, but I see now that you have been attempting to contact other members of the company without my all-clear. You're lucky that I took the trouble of having a trusted specialist reroute all of your incoming inquiries to a secure inbox. We are not secure. Maintain your cover and desist in accessing the SERIOUS BUSINESS application, or suffer the consequences at your own peril.

I do not know how much more clear I can be. I have no access to any files concerning green-restricted projects at this moment. But if you feel one of these children could compromise your position, you are permitted one more email. The security risk is high but should you receive the signal in reply, proceed as instructed.

And take as many of them down with you as possible, if you would be so kind. These are to be considered standing orders.

Yours,

[redacted]

-

Rue Lalonde is still nursing the latest in a string of migraines when the alarm detonates in her office like a tactical nuke, and she goes utterly cold.

Her hand moves before her head does, wrenching her computer monitor around so she can better force-quit most of the unnecessary programs and click through to the one that matters, the one designed to blare a warning alarm at the faintest hint of a burst of grimdark or grimlight magic anywhere in the continental United States. It blew up not too long ago over the mess in Los Angeles - in a very literal manner. The shockwave reduced almost every sensor on the roof of the Maine facility to puddles of jellied metal. But Novitiate Bion recalibrated all the instruments and by the time she assured Rue that everything was in working order again, almost half a week later, the energy signature in Los Angeles had changed into something unrecognizable. There have been periodic blips from the Atlantic coastline in the meanwhile, ones that her Maine team has not had the time or resources to investigate the source of in person, and aside from that - nothing. She has the sudden, overwhelming urge to whack the side of the monitor, and it takes every ounce of willpower in her being to remind herself that that never works.

Rue sits bolt upright in her chair as the alarm continues to wail. The noise was sudden enough that Dana, the only medical intern to have accompanied her department heads from Maine, jumps almost half a foot in the air on her way out the door and swivels back toward Rue so quickly her head almost knocks against the side of the doorframe. Rue doesn't blame the girl.

All she can tell from the alarm is that there has been a potent surge of grimdark energies - nothing by way of location or visuals. But her heart sinks nevertheless.

Rose.

Thankfully, she has taken to keeping Bion's personal number on her phone in case of situations exactly like this. Few of the other scientists will let her pester them so directly these days.

RL: Bion, where is that surge coming from? I need an analysis, stat.
NB: // triangulating with Miskatonic and Derlith in Wisconsin, doctor Lalonde, please hold.
Rue Lalonde is not one to wait around in her office when there's a crisis. She appreciates that Bion is most likely trying to keep her calm in the face of the worst news possible, but that doesn't change the fact that by the time Samuel's number appears on the screen of her cell phone, Rue has spent the past fifteen minutes pacing around the novitiate's lab in a flurry of lab coats, barking orders and generally treating the whole thing as the certified federal goddamn issue that it is. A few other scientists hobble in to lend a hand with Bion's equipment, but a good quarter of her staff is still recovering from various stab wounds inflicted by a certain uncontrollable carapacian and another half specialize in neurology, and therefore have absolutely no clue how to deal with chaological sensors of the grim persuasion.

"Samuel, what has happened to my daughter?" she demands, doing her best to coax out the tension behind her forehead by pressing her fingers between her brows. Going through the kind of extensive withdrawal that ensues after spending the majority of one's adult life indulging an addiction is nothing to be sneezed at. On top of the tremors and constant migraines that have plagued her since she first decided to get her life back on track, Rue has been swamped by what feels like thrice her normal workload. Running a major cross-discipline scientific lab involves a disgusting amount of paperwork; resurrecting a second major lab halfway across the country, even in a temporary capacity, has trebled the amount of said paperwork. She hasn't had time to oversee her own private projects in weeks, too consumed with trying and failing to deal with Rose on equal footing. And now this. Her heart is racing at a dangerous rate, Dana is attempting to press a cup of hot tea into her hands with frank terror in her dark eyes, and Rose is in Seattle, Rose may well be at the very center of this grimdark outbreak, and Rue can do nothing to help her from here.

It feels like New York all over again. And that day rather caps the list of days that Rue feels should not be repeated. Ever. Under any circumstances.

A faint whine always tends to distort phone calls that have to breach a void ward - a kink that Rue has yet to smooth out of her machines to this day - but Samuel's voice remains recognizable all the same. "There has been an incident," he says, a forbidding note underlying his usually bright tone.

Rue slams the cup of tea down against the nearest desk, tea sloshing over the rim and scalding her hand. She pays it no heed. "Obviously, Samuel!"

"A group of young villains challenged the children to some kind of competition or - I'm not sure what. They seem to have some connection to the Midnight Crew, but more to the point," he says over top of Rue's exclamation of outraged concern, without pause, "Rose's opponent was able to render one of her bracers inert."

The frantic panic that has driven Rue into a frenzy coalesces into solid mass, a cold stone that drops out from under her and sends her heart into further worrying palpitations. She has some of the best medical researchers in the country under her supervision and none of the cardiologists have ever once told her she may be at risk for heart disease, but at the moment she is seriously questioning their judgment. "How bad is the breach?" she says, her heart too loud in her ears and her breathing harsh.
She gestures at Novitiate Bion, and the woman looks up from a screen full of esoteric letters and readouts. Bion, at least, understands the one-handed charades, and seizes Halburn by the shoulder to wheel the limping troll in front of her station before racing off to fetch what Rue needs. "Is she hurt? Samuel, where the bloody hell were you-"

"She says that it remains contained within her mind, for the time being - er. One moment." A faint murmur of conversation, the pause stretching long enough to make Rue fear something else has gone wrong, and then Samuel's voice returns to its usual volume. "Miss Ranger has defected and can apparently serve in place of the bracer's, but only if she stays in contact with Rose. The two of them believe they have this under control, for now, but if there's anything you can do, Rue..."

"Bring them here. Bring them here this instant, Samuel, what were you thinking?" Rue brings the cup of tea to her lips, and the hot liquid only burns her tongue for an instant before she swallows without tasting it, grimacing at the absence of a familiar, bitter sting.

"That there were lives at stake, and that no one could have predicted this," Samuel replies, sliding neatly beneath her accusation with impassive certainty. "It is done. The situation is contained. There is nothing you can do from there? Miss Harley is still absent at the moment. It may be a good while before we can make our way to the labs, and we will be impeded by at least one of the children's opponents when we do."

"I have no way to tell from here how the bracer failed." Bion rushes back in with her braids flying out behind her, nearly slams into poor Dana with such force that the intern grabs the back of someone else's coat for support, and spares a moment to steady the intern before dumping the steel grey cuff onto the desk in front of Rue. Rue nods curt thanks and seizes the spare bracer to begin turning it over in her hand, running a chipped fingernail along the underside until a panel slides open and she can begin tinkering with the insides. "And I'd have to drive out to deliver the replacement myself, which would take hours. Where is Jade?"

Perhaps, Rue thinks, if old man Harley would have allowed her to study his system of transportalizers before his death, she might have her own way of teleporting physical matter from point to point and they wouldn't need to rely so heavily on Jade Harley's incredible abilities. Certainly the Rue Lalonde from the previous version of this universe mastered it, or at least installed a working transportalizer in her New York lab, which has no parallel in this world. Just another project to add to Rue's interminable list of technologies she needs to put together a task force for.

Sometimes she misses the simple days when her thesis work focused on astronomy, before her interest in void manipulation peaked and Jo Crocker snuck in to encourage Rue to take on yet another degree with all her talk of hypothetical multiverses and ectobiological echoes across paradox space. There's just so much science to be done; the world is truly a peculiar place, and even with the Querent's help, Rue has barely scratched the surface.

Novitiates Halburn and Bion print something out and it takes both of them working in tandem to haul the long sheet of scan results over for Rue and Bion to examine on the tabletop. Bile curdles in the back of Rue's throat as she and Bion lean over the graphs. There's been a decline in the level of grimdark, enough that there's no longer a constant alarm deafening anyone near a computer station, but before that decline the outburst of chaos energy that Rose - Rose - channeled onto the physical plane was...frightening. Not quite a match for New York, but enough.

And her child still has all of that mucking around in her head. Her child, her child.

Should Rue have been there? She can't even tell anymore. Ambrose is the one with the halfway-accurate moral compass where their children are concerned, and he isn't here, either.
She can start by calibrating this bracer in front of her to suppress the fresh flood of grimdark in Rose's mind. It's - it's all she can focus on doing, all she can pour her energy into.

In her panic, she thinks she misses whatever Samuel says next, the poor man. "Bring Rose. Now," she orders, and thumbs the off button with her mind somewhere else entirely. "Halburn - no, no, stay sitting. Sir. You'll tear your stitches." She glances up from the bracer's inner workers for only the barest moment, and the first unfortunate she lays eyes on is - "Ah, Dana."

Dana freezes, looking up from where she's helping one of the other scientists with a thaumaturgic device it is clear neither of them have much experience with, the tea tray forgotten at a precarious angle by the electromagnetic field meter. "Doctor Lalonde?"

"Leave that. You'll need to drive down to the ranger station and escort at least Jade Harley and my daughter through the void wards - possibly more, knowing them. They could arrive at any moment, and they won't have the experience necessary yet to find their own way through without delays we can't afford." Rue plucks a delicate filament of conducting metal out of its place in the casing and curses vibrantly. Now that they've adjusted to her mood, the majority of the scientists don't flinch like Dana does - they've been through this before, after all, and last time Rue had been even more frantic, if such a thing could be possible. "Halburn, can she take you car?"

"Of course, ma'am." When Dana turns toward him in a clumsy whirl, horrified by being called out in front of others, the troll novitiate removes a ring of keys from the pocket of his lab coat and sets them in the intern's palm with a reassuring smile full of shark-sharp teeth. "You'll do fine," Rue hears him whisper to Dana - he has to be loud enough to be heard over the shuffle of so many scientists in one room, and he winces audibly when he shifts and (probably) pulls at his healing stab wound the wrong way once more. "If the space child lands on the hood of the car, just keep driving. I've been assured she barely feels it."

"Wha-" Dana manages before shaking her head, her face turning a particularly pasty shade of green, and scurrying out the door. Once she's gone Rue can only hope that the poor intern actually knows how to drive a car - medical students sacrifice much in their endless rounds of residencies and internships in the pursuit of a degree, and most of the people staffing this lab flew out on the jet plane.

And for a quarter of an hour, that is the extent of the panic in the lab. Rue's heart continues to pound, the knowledge that Rose is not in imminent peril not quite reassuring enough to soothe her nerves when her daughter is not in sight. If she had but a sip of something to steel her - no. No, no, no.

Rue and Bion are halfway through the bracer, peeling apart each piece and inspecting it centimeter by centimeter for any sign of a flaw or damage from being transported over the past few weeks, when Rue's phone rings again. There has been no new alarm, and Bion's latest measurements show the grimdark has settled to a near-zero point on all of her sensors, but it is still with a deep sense of foreboding tossing her stomach's contents around that Rue answers. "Samuel, please tell me you are standing outside my lab this very instant or so help me -"

"We will be there shortly." A fifteen minute span has been enough to inject even more weariness into Samuel's voice; the man sounds haggard in a way his physical appearance would never substantiate. Rue's clutching grip on the phone tightens unconsciously, and she has to force herself to relax her fingers when the phone casing creaks. "However, Miss Ranger - ah, the one who is assisting Rose with her problem - insists that she speak with you. She seems adamant that it cannot wait, and I - well, if it is something to do with her void abilities, she seems to believe you would understand the danger better than I. Not that I can blame her - I'm no scientist!"

He chuckles, but Rue knows Samuel and she knows when he's faking it, his laughter bright but hollow as an act for the sake of children present on the other end of the line. He often had cause to laugh like that when Rose and John occasionally returned too early from the park and interrupted a tense meeting between him and Rue on the subject of the children's powers, years and years ago. Samuel has always been cagey, no matter how he tries to hide it, but his determination to ensure that his adopted son be as secure and nurtured as possible has always been something Rue admires.

"Take over here," Rue murmurs to Bion, and the woman nods, measuring the slope of the latest graph with a careful eye as Rue reinsets a surge protector in the bracer and sets it down to focus on the conversation at hand. "By all means, then." She steps away from the desk and folds her arm over her chest, noting with distant dismay that the angular buttons of her lab coat have been done up out of sequence in her panicked haste to get ready for working on the bracer. "But first - you say this Ranger has defected?"

Samuel's voice drops to an undertone, between the two of them alone. "So she claims. I have my own reservations. I'd take whatever she has to say with a healthy pinch of salt, myself, but you'd know more about whether what she says about the void is - well, scientifically reasonable or not. She acts quite sincere. And she looks like - well, that doesn't matter, for the moment. We'll concern ourselves with it when we get there. Forget I said anything."

Rue only deliberates for a moment. If there is even a passing chance that this Ranger might have ill-news that could impact Rose's fragile state, she needs to hear it. "Very well. Give her the phone. I'll see what she looks like when you all arrive, with my daughter unharmed," she adds, dry as sandpaper. Samuel sighs - and who does he think she is, that she'd just let him get away with a clear segue like that? Really.

The phone crackles and flutters with unclear noises, the distant sound of voices mixed with the loud, vague thumps of someone jostling the phone repeatedly. The clunking noises continue even after there is a faint scramble of someone pressing the phone to the side of their face, as though the hand holding the cell can't stop trembling. "H'lo?" someone who must be this 'Ranger' says, slurred and hesitant and just a touch too loudly, as though unused to speaking through a phone. "Oh crud. This's Doctor Lalon', right?"

"Speaking," Rue says automatically, and only then does what she's hearing catch up with the rest of her mind -

She's heard that voice before. It's familiar but not, imbued with that odd, unsettling lack of recognition that Rue remembers from her earliest days at med school, when she replayed audio recordings of her notes and what she heard on the tapes didn't quite match pitch with what she heard every day of her life when she spoke.

That's her voice - younger and without the faint hoarseness of a life of drinking, too highly pitched because she still wasn't comfortable in her own skin back then; it's like a blast from the past, and it is utterly impossible.

Rue thinks she knows who this Ranger looks like.

Dammit, Samuel!

"Oh thanks gogs," the girl with Rue's voice says, verging on the kind of incomprehensibility Rue hasn't achieved since the worst of her drinking binges shortly following news of Jo's death in an unfortunate meteor-related catastrophe. Then Ranger drops into a harsh whisper, so slurred that only a lifetime of inflicting the same vernacular on others allows Rue to decipher it. "Pleash, you have to help me, and my friends! I know you don't have enny reason to believe me, but we're not doing all this a' purpose."
"Slow down, dear - Ranger," Rue says, processing this as swiftly as she can. Perhaps it's only the voice. Maybe Rue's abrupt sobriety has led to genuine auditory hallucinations at last. Is her heart rate elevated? She thinks her heart rate is elevated. And the speed at which the girl is slurring in a frantic, hushed mutter is not helping to assuage her residual panic - hearing someone that sounds exactly like yourself is not exactly conducive to maintaining one's calm. "If there is an issue concerning your ability to keep Rose stable, please - tell me flat out."

"What? Nooo, this has nothing to do wit' the voidy thing, id even k about any of that stuff," Ranger hisses, and then she seems to hush herself and drops back into an undertone, almost a whimper, really. "It's zabout mindgrubs. Please, please, you're a doctor, right? Doctor Lalslonde, it's sayss it 'n all the files, you're a doctor zo you can help, right?!" The girl yelps and says - not into the phone, but to someone else - "No, s'fine, I got it! No worries, mister foxy dad - uh, ne'emind that. I didn't say that. I'm good!"

Rue's mind skips like a poorly record audio track - from Rose - to my voice - to wait what and screeches to a screaming halt on mindgrubs. "What did you just say."

Another clatter, a thunk of plastic hitting glass, and then Ranger has regained control of the phone, whispering so ferociously Rue quite loses that sense of disturbed familiarity at the sound of the girl's voice in her rising consternation. "In'r heads. It's - it's hard to talk about? On account of they make you lissen to orders, and I'm not, and it doesn't like it when you don't follow orderlies." Ranger laughs, bordering close to hysteria. "I mean orders. Oh man, 's getting worse. Please, you haff to get it out of all our heads, Jakey's brain is already mush and -"

Good lord. More of the Midnight Crew's mindgrubs, of the sort that drove at least four trolls into fanatical displays of insane loyalty, and one of the victims has broken the brainwashing. Rue strides around the table to swoop down on Bion's computer station, where Halburn is still handling the basic thaumaturgic processes with a deft claw. The troll looks up in acknowledgement, and the look on Rue's face must be frightening enough that he lurches to his feet with a claw instantly going to his side to brace himself, earfins flaring. "Fetch Marion," she murmurs, placing a hand over the phone so her voice doesn't carry. "And prep everyone we brought from the neurology and mental magics departments. Mindgrubs," she says by way of explanation, in response to Halburn's furrowed brows. "If Marion complains, inform him that we have actual, enthusiastic consent for extreme brain surgery, that should please him."

Halburn's face darkens, grave, and his eyes dart to the readouts on the computer screen beside him. "Is this related to...Miss Rose?" he asks.

"Tangentially. The people she and the other children were fighting seem to have been infected with these parasites, too. And at least one of them is very interested in having it out. We'll need you to pinpoint the exact location before Marion can proceed." When Halburn's violet eyes light with determination and he retrieves his crutch to tuck under his arm, Rue removes her hand from the phone. "Ranger, dear? How many of you are there?"

"Four!" the girl says, her voice trembling with relief. "Only - Janey and Jake, they're, they're not doing so good. They got it wayy worse, and now Jane is kind of a killing machine? Jake's not mush better, to be honest…"

"Ah. We dealt with similar, the last time we came across Crew members with this affliction," Rue says, nodding to herself. She does not mention that the worst of those other victims remains trapped in her madness, a coldblood-type insanity exacerbated by years of chemical brainwashing that has, according to reports from Maine, proved resistant to the usual drug regimen used to treat dementia. "We can remove them. If you can hold out until I have finished preparations for helping Rose with her grimdark breakdown. I will owe you more than I can say for assisting her."

"Uhhh, since it was kindamyfault," the girl says in a rush, "I'll do that. Yeah. Of course! But uh -" another muffled thud of feedback, the sound of a girl murmuring in an inquiring tone - Rose? - and then a grunt. "Okay, I figured out how ta get the little door thingie between the backsheet and the trunk open, so I think this is private. Oof."

A pause. Rue waits, attempting to piece together what the girl means, and coming to the conclusion that the Egbert's car must contain a center console with trunk access, and Ranger might well have stuck her head through the gap.

"There is a doge back here," the girl says at last.

"He'sh all…"

"Yes?"

"Glowing."

"There is no risk of being irradiated. I've checked." Multiple times. She still has no idea what's powering that thing or where on earth Harley could have found it. After witnessing what happened after the Becquerel of the previous universe was brutally devoured by Jack Noir, Rue is all the more perturbed by the possible answers to both questions.

"...Awesome. 'Kay." Ranger swallows, a loud gulp, and afterward her voice is noticeably lower, so quiet that Rue almost can't hear it over the whine of void interference. "M pretty sure one of your guys' people has one, too. In their brain."

It's not - that's - "Damnation." Rue bites her tongue before anything worse can spill out - the Vantas boy was only around for a few days, and he had a horrific influence on everyone's vocabulary. "You're sure?"

"I hear thangs. Not lots, on account of Doctor Dienek kinda hates me, cuz I don't respond to the brain worm thingies the way he wants." Ranger hiccups, and it sounds pained. Like she's on the edge of tears. "I know there's grub things in basically everyone in the Mittlenacht Crew - uh, Midnight - and sometimes Dirk hears more, and he's heard that the Crew has a sleeper argent. Agent. Whatever. I hope it's not you, please let it not be you, but it's someone related to these hero guys and if they find out I'm tellin' you this I'm so screwed."

Which means, in a worse case scenario - it could be anyone. Could be her - none of those troll thugs had seemed aware of the parasite in their minds, certainly, and those on the mend were genuinely baffled by the news. Could be Ambrose…

Ranger's secrecy makes far more sense now - it could even be Samuel himself. A cold sweat breaks out across the back of Rue's neck, and she rubs her thumb across her mouth, smearing the already patchy lipstick impatiently as she considers her options. For god's sake, if she expands the criteria it could be anyone on her team. "Not another word about it then, dear." Not on this line, anyway. "I'll take care of it. The important thing is that you all get here safe and sound." Closing her eyes, Rue leans back against the computer station. Internally, she runs through the grimdark levels on the screen, and what she has memorized of the dissections of extracted mindgrubs, and exactly what flavors of vodka she has in her emergency storeroom -

Oh. Right. The interns already purged the storeroom. Twice damnation, then.
She allows her eyes to blink open, and her smile is brittle. "We'll get this all fixed up, I assure you. Everything will be alright, Ranger."

"You could." The girl breaks off, and there is a click loud enough that Rue almost thinks she's hung up, or worse. But then she whispers, cautious but hopeful, "Roxy. Thas my name. You could call me Roxy."

"Roxy." Rue's chest performs an intriguingly complex twist. "Roxy it is, then. I'll see you soon, dear."

By the time Marion and Halburn check in from two floors down, ensconced in the rooms where the mindscape pentacles have been chalked on the floors and walls, Rue has hung up the phone to the girl's shy but exuberant farewells. She has no idea what Samuel is bringing to her doorstep. She knows only that something is afoot, and Rose's grimdarkness is only one jagged piece in a puzzle Rue isn't sure she wants to solve.

She calls Ambrose.

He does not answer, and she feels very, very alone.

RL: Do you both have everything that you need?
NH: Yes, ma'am. Everything was restocked before we left Maine, and you told us to bring whatever would be necessary in the event we needed to repeat the procedure.
TM: I've printed the consent forms. We're doing this right, this time.
RL: As you will, Marion, but only one may have the mental capacity to agree. The rest are under varying levels of brainwashing and are most likely unable to legally make decisions for themselves.
TM: Really. Really?
RL: I know this troubles you. But I do not have the mental stamina to debate the ethics of brain surgery with you when it has been demonstrated we're just undoing the effects of pre-existing illegal brain surgery.
TM: ...Yes, Doctor Lalonde.
NH: You said to prep for four, iç that correct?
RL: I'm afraid it isn't, not anymore.
RL: Prepare to screen our entire staff. You will also need to make arrangements for your teams to be able to screen you two, as well.
TM: What?!
RL: I hope that only preliminary MRIs will be necessary. Once we ascertain whether those in other departments show similar tumor-like masses on their scans, we can decide whether to proceed to mindscape scans.
NH: But iç...you suspect people within our own teamç. For how long?
RL: I suspect no one in particular. But I have reason to believe at least one person close to the children is compromised, and unfortunately, that means anyone under my supervision could be a potential leak. This is merely a precautionary measure. I will be volunteering to be scanned first, as the most likely target.
TM: Jesus. I'll draw up a schedule. This is going to take some arranging.
NH: You only have a few MRI machineç, Doctor Marion. My scanç can lighten the burden.
TM: Your incredibly invasive, uncontrolled, ethically questionable scans?!
RL: Marion.
TM: ...Thank you, Halburn.
NH: Of course.

Rue has the feeling it is going to be another very, very long day.
TM: Do you have to type like that? Try for some professionalism in front of Doctor Lalonde, for Pete’s sake.
NH: Yes, unfortunately, I have to.
TM: Oh let me guess. If you don't type like that, your fancy hoodoo consent-ignoring magic will stop working.
NH: No. It just seem to aggravate you.
NH: And your hatred is remarkably stimulating. My apologies.
TM: …
TM: Oh, you've got to be kidding.
TM: No. That was one time. One time.
NH: I don't know what you could possibly be talking about.
TM: That - gah! That hate thing! Once!
NH: If the approaching group arrive right at this exact moment outside the void ward's outermost perimeter, it will still take them ten minutes to drive down and park.
TM: No.
TM: Absolutely not.
NH: Nine minutes.
TM: …
TM: Your office, not mine.
NH: ♠
TM: I despise you.
NH: ♠-

Doc Scratch is not pleased.

And when he is not pleased, it means nothing good. Alone in his penthouse suite, he surveys the Möbius net of the Battlefield, and finally, at last, is forced to concede that his positioning of Diamonds Droog is no longer accurate. Like four children years before her, Droog has enmeshed herself in the emptiness of the void, and he can no longer trust in his ability to wield her as a piece, harrying Slick across the board.

It is a true inconvenience, the predominance of void within this session. He has his suspicions, but unfortunately, the most likely culprits are naturally those most shrouded by the void, and thus obscured from his near pansophical sight. And the most likely of all, for a void level of this magnitude…

The Heir.

What a quandary. If what Scratch suspects has occurred is indeed so, he has twelve players on the board he previously dismissed as insignificant, all of them veiled from his sight and steadily accumulating significance he could not account for in his previous calculations. He was aware of the existence of the Peixes spawn and Eridan Ampora, but only due to the fact that they are entangled in the affairs of chaos gods in his acquaintance - he’d thought them superfluous, dangerous only if said gods used them to interrupt the game for their own reasons. And the Bard is...the Bard, powerful, unpredictable, but just as much of a sucker as the rest. But now he must assume that his instinct to dismiss them, to consider them only ex-players who echoed through space-time by the whim of paradox space, was the result of the void hemming in his vast thoughts and preventing him from fully considering the implications of the trolls' presence in the session. The Knight of Blood at the very least is active in Washington, worming his way into the lives of the human children and spoiling very delicately-laid plans.

And now, dearest Gl'bgolyb won't even return his calls.

He.

Is not.

Pleased.

With a considering sigh that reverberates telepathically through his bone-white orb of a skull, Scratch removes the black-and-white diamond-bedecked pawn from its square and sets the piece back within his collection of unassigned markers. He leaves Boxcars' mark in its place - the man continues to serve well in Seattle, for now, though his future has become murky and blotted with smears of void. Unfortunately, Clubs may have to be scratched as well, soon. A shame. He had hoped, with Dienek's help, to transmute the three into more pliant instruments of his master's will, but they've only ever been pawns of convenience, and not necessarily to be relied upon for the endgame.

Still. This means that now he must begin to apply himself to predicting just how the Crew may seek to interfere with his plans, rather than enjoying the expediency of their submission. As loath as he is to ever assign importance to such a rabble, the Crew have ever proven themselves dark horses, careening headlong into the affairs of more powerful pieces and upsetting the game with their greed and ambition, all guns blazing. He's manipulated them in the past, but never before this game has he been so deeply involved in the Crew's affairs. It has been ever so tempting to do more than oversee and nudge events into motion by sending the three ex-carapacians out to perform work his master's loyal Felt cannot -

But that is not how he works. True, he has taken on a more...hands-on approach, shall we say, with this particular game. But really, all he has to do is allow the pieces to move on the board around him, and in a few select cases, provide them with the opportunity to do as they wish that would otherwise be denied to them. A tangential role has always best suited him.

Let Droog fall where she will, then. Now that Leviathan has agreed to a mutually beneficial arrangement - the fruits of which Scratch hopes to reclaim shortly - a multitudinous legion of opportunities have spread themselves before him.

Horrorterrors that one has not bred for a specific purpose are ever so much more uncertain to work with. Chaology has never been the most exact of majjykal branches, most likely because the elder gods themselves prefer it that way, dipping in and out of the realm of the games at their leisure. Scratch was able to groom Gl'bgolyb, a minor hive chosen especially from the ranks of the Furthest Ring for the purpose of being presented as a gift to Alternia, but chaos does ever defy expectations, and the death of the hivemind's carefully-bred corporeal form, and its subsequent prototyping, have not stopped it from seizing a new body in this new session and heaving itself from the Ring to Earth without so much as a by-your-leave. It feels it owes him nothing.

In fact, Gl'bgolyb is the first and only Horrorterror to have successfully convinced a foolish group of mortals to complete a bloody summoning spirograph and to have manifested all of itself on the material plane, without Scratch's assistance. Not even Leviathan, for all its scheming, has achieved as much through its many proxies. If dear Gl'bgolyb were not a relatively minor horror, Scratch might have needed to step in - but no. Even glutted as it has become from the spoils of Europe, Gl'bgolyb is still manageable. Scratch engrained the grimlight god's obsession with the trolls Peixes with a fine hand and a sharp thwap of a mental newspaper whenever it strayed, and now the horror seems content to meddle only in their affairs.
Malā’ikah had taught an interesting lesson in the judiciousness of choosing allies. Even now it possesses the raw power and vast legion of minds that had made it a very attractive potential business partner, but the madness inflicted upon its blasphemous choir by exposure to the Bard have rendered it too unstable for a working relationship.

Leviathan, though. Leviathan has a reputation. An ancient one, older than the stars and the spaces between them, and may have paid court to the Lord Azathoth himself - but whose timeworn, coiled, screaming minds keep the truth of such matters within their tangled, thorny hive. It could, perhaps, match even Scratch himself in the sheer scope of its power if it truly applied all of itself to the task. An alliance with even a small portion of its hivemind proved more than enough to sabotage the previous session to Scratch's design; another accord with Leviathan should produce exactly the kinds of conditions Scratch needs to maneuver events in his favor.

So Scratch sets aside his contemplation of how to deal with Diamonds Droog's vanishing act, and focuses on making himself presentable for a meeting with a multi-angled being of the most Noble of the Horrorterror Circles. The Crew are only a few small pieces in the grand scale of the game he plays, and can be removed from said game with ease. Sure enough, as he snaps a tasteful sheet of linen over the chessboard - no need to needlessly antagonize a Horrorterror with the sight of Skaia - a distinct aura of horror begins to permeate the space around him, a faint breeze sheeting in through the open windows that lead out onto the balcony he has reserved for other such meetings with inhabitants of the Outer Rings throughout the years. One must maintain one's contacts, after all, even if a good number of them have fled the destructive influence of one's timeless master over the years without leaving a forwarding address. He steps out onto the balcony, adjusting the collar of his green shirt to an acceptable angle, and casts his ample mind out to greet Leviathan.

Leviathan. Do come in.

With a damp, soughing billow of wind, the sky over the balcony darkens to a bruised purple, and Leviathan unspools itself within his mind. It cannot present itself physically without a consenting host or a summoning spirograph, and Doc Scratch has no intention of playing either role for the grimdark Horrorterror at this juncture in time.

He can, however, provide a neutral ground in which Leviathan can communicate from the Furthest Ring. The perks of possessing a near-omniscient, indestructible mind. Unlike Malā’ikah, the tangle keeps its sucking, entangling impulses to itself, for the most part, which always makes for a more pleasant negotiating environment. Soon the balcony reeks of dead fish and too-salty blood, and Scratch reaches out with a spark of green energy to discreetly close the windows behind him before the smell can permeate the upper floors of the building and drive some of the more telepathically sensitive members of the staff quite mad. As a perfectly logical being he is immune to such mental frailties as insanity, but it would do no good to lose the Felt to madness at this point.

\[ \text{S'}cra tch. } \text{A projection of Leviathan begins to twine around the thick stone of the balcony railings, knotting together to form a thorny tangle that blinks at him with a single visible eye. Scratch is sure there are more, but their lids remain closed - for now - and he takes care not to stare too deeply into its gaze. He once had a neophyte protegé who did just that (in spite of his frequent, cautionary warnings about stares) and - well, look where she is, now. Do w'è not këp ur word?} \]

You do, indeed. I appreciate your cooperation immensely. I would offer you something to satiate your appetites, but I am aware that such a task would be impossible with my current resources.

Then - well, if he could frown, he would. From this vantage, Scratch can cast his mind out without the need for subtleties and see all of Leviathan that there is to see on this plane. The god twists and inverts in patternless black webs and welters, but a jumble of knots extends outward from Scratch's mind not toward the Furthest Ring, but scraping along at a different angle to branch out to the north and west. It's a subtle loop, one crafted with great skill so that it skims over the ambient magic of the physical world without leaving a trace of itself to be detected by mortal senses or instruments, and he has no doubt that it leads directly to Rose Lalonde. His poor protégé Seer.

Ah. I hope I am not interrupting something. When you agreed to a second meeting, I assumed your schedule was free.

The eye does not blink at him. He does not blink back. The projection eventually waves a stray tentacle in what may be interpreted as dismissal, if one has experience in deciphering the horrific cat's cradles and madness-inducing loops of Unmodified Elder Sign.

Fair enough. Scratch adjusts his negotiating plans accordingly. He took advantage of the young Seer's access to one of his cue balls to tempt Leviathan forth with a familiar piece, but if the horror becomes too engaged in using Rose as a host vessel too soon, he'll need to spin this very carefully.

Thankfully, he is excellent at spin control.

Nevertheless, I hope that at least some of our goals coincide. We were able to reach a point of mutually beneficial association once before, and I have reason to believe we may do so again.

Another flip of the tentacle, this one considerably smugger. You are as blind as he is shy. Macabre's own delight, water begins to trickle over the mosaic of the balcony floor, running in brackish black rivulets over the stone and flowing around Doc Scratch's white shoes, giving him a wide berth as it laps up against the wall of the building. It's still only a projection, but the more water oozes out of the air, the more discolored and warped the mosaics begin to look in reality.

No need for such harsh words. You are a being of pure disorder, and so from your perspective the inevitable logic of my actions in the service of a singular, ultimate goal must seem insipidly single-minded, when it is, I assure you, ineffably complex. Inevitability is my invitation, as self-serving chaos is yours.

Leviathan snorts and the water inches deep around Scratch's polished shoes begins to froth and churn with what might be horrific amusement. A sploch of black-tainted water splatters against the bottom hem of Scratch's pant leg, but he remains impassive.

You are entitled to your own opinions, of which you no doubt have many. But as a general rule, you and my Lord share similar goals - triumph through destruction.

And perhaps, if Scratch presents the truth at the correct angle, he may be able to persuade more concessions from Leviathan. Lying is never necessary, naturally; the truth must simply be used to its fullest advantage.

He has done reckless harm to your kind in the past - does harm even now, for he already is and always shall be here, and the End of Time cannot be reined in. But my vision can chart his course, and may help you evade further damage to your hives, if you so choose.

There. Not a lie. Simply a suggestion so unlikely as to be essentially irresolvable. He could do such a thing. But by the time Leviathan would be most likely to call upon such a favor, Scratch will already be quite dead. His demise is inevitable, and every action he takes, every player and horror on the board he manipulates and coaxes and coerces across the Battlefield, is just another step along many simultaneous paths. Even if one such path fails to come to fruition, one of the others will continue on. It would take a fully realized, self-actualized Seer at the top of their echeladder to even hope to map out and derail every one of his plans.

He has made a point of taking all such potential Seers in all games into consideration. Some require a special hand to keep them blind; others do quite well enough on their own. None ever have or ever will succeed.

Then, with a careful hand, Doc Scratch plucks at the buttons of his suit jacket and begins the tiresome process of disrobing himself. The fabric of the jacket has already begun to burn and fester, the clean white threads fraying as tiny patches of grinddark acid seep into them. He pats at his head absentely with the fabric to remove the worst of the condensation, and by the time he has dried himself to satisfaction, little is left of the jacket but scraps of thin, greying cloth. But his green undershirt remains as spotlessly intact as ever, and he adjusts the fall of his white tie to compensate for the unfortunate loss of the jacket, allowing the last piece of fabric to drop into the water around his waist.
Horrorterror's have absolutely no concern for one's state of dress. But Scratch prefers to present a charming, polished appearance even when negotiating with beings of naked chaos.

Leviathan ruminates in a moment of relative silence; Scratch can make out the murmur of countless voices screaming in anguish as the Horrorterror deliberates among itself, but for the most part it just sounds like incomprehensible, ever-changing nonsense.

And then, at last, the many-angled one's response smashes into Scratch's mind, crashing and in something as close to unison as any horror has ever achieved. "H E R E."

With that to signal their accord, Leviathan opens all of their eyes. The eyes along the thorny spine, the eyes along every tendril sunk into the stone, and of course, the eyes that fill the black water around Scratch - thousands of eyes, really. It would be more disconcerting to someone not impervious to insanity, perhaps, but Doc Scratch has no eyes and thus no real emotional response to their absence or presence. The water begins to drain backwards, sloshing acid in ever-higher waves as Leviathan sucks it down into a vortex midway between its tendril on the railing and Scratch's circle of dry stone. Beneath the murky water, Scratch can just barely make out the spirograph melted into the green stone of the mosaic, warped and corroded by bloodbrine but intact all the same.

Not enough to bring forth a Horrorterror of Leviathan's size and density. But enough for it to pass on what Scratch has requested. The geometric, alternating curves of overlaid hypotrochoids and epitrochoids burn with pallid white fires, and there is a moment wherein two outcomes are equally likely, poised on the edge of reality - one, that Leviathan defaults on their agreement, and sends a physical tangle of itself through instead, to annihilate and flood the city around them to make room for a brood of its own - and two, that it fulfills its end of the bargain.

It is the second that comes to pass. The grimdark waters drain away down through the spirograph, sucked back into the Furthest Ring, and leave behind, in exchange, something that is not a projection but very much solid and corporeal. Scratch does not take a step toward it until it finishes melting through the gate, a process very much resembling a candle of wax growing rather than dissolving. Tints of lavender and mauve dance across the surface of the pearlescent white, while the dregs of mineral, but veins of grimdark thread through the mottled chunk of enamel, and it appears to be lit from within by a thin, throbbing light.

A tooth. Or, Scratch knows, in the correct hands - a seed.

Ták e n. Scratch's eyes are open, and he can just barely make out the spirograph melted into the green stone of the mosaic, warped and corroded by bloodbrine but intact all the same.

Never, Leviathan. I have a uniquely capacious memory. Call upon me and I shall return the favor in kind whenever you so wish. You have my sincerest gratitude.

At the worst, Leviathan could demand the Seer once and for all. It will simply be a matter of postponing that demand until her role in Scratch's plans comes to a close.

"O u r m a n y m e n t h a n y o r y i s a l s o c a p a c i t o u s, S c r a t c h. W e d o n o t f o r g i v e. W e d o n o t t o l e r a c e. A n d w i t h o u t a w o r d f u r t h e r, t h e h i v e m i n d ' s p r e s e n c e b e g i n s t o d i s s p a t e f r o m S c r a t c h ' s m i n d, g r e a t i n t a n g i b l e t a n g l e s o f it d r i f t i n g b a c k o f t o t h e s p a c e s b e t w e e n t h e s t a r s, w h i l e t h e d r e g s o f i t s p o w e r w a f t a w a y t o t h e n o r t h. S c r a t c h a l m o s t w i s h e s h i s t w o o f f s h o o t c u e b a l l s i n t h e a r e a c o u l d b e d i r e c t e d t o t u r n t h e i r a l l-s e e i n g g a z e u p o n t h a t v o i d-i n f e s t e d r e g i o n, b u t t h e y a r e e n g a g e d i n i m p o r t a n t w o r k, t a s k t h a t s h a l l r e s u l t i n i n n u m e r a b l e r e w a r d s - n o t t h e l e a s t o f w h i c h m a y h e l p c l e a r u p s o m e o f t h a t v o i d w a r d i n g."

So he shall be patient, and await whatever reports come in from Boxcars and from Dienek's experiments. Patience is a virtue Scratch possesses in spades.
"Doc? You in here?"

It is an audible sound, a human voice, and Doc Scratch turns to open the windows with a click of his fingers and folds his hands behind his back, his suspenders shifting as he sighs telepathically. He had sensed Steven Haydon's passage through space as the human ascended the steps to the penthouse, of course, and part of Scratch's power had taken care of locking the suite doors until the risk of Leviathan's chaos driving the man insane had passed, while the rest dealt with the Horrorterror itself. It's a simple matter of always being perpetually, omnisciently aware of everything that goes on in one's immediate vicinity. With another spark of power he transports the tooth to sit upon his desk, where it will not be disturbed - if any of the Felt know what's good for them. Which, in general, they do.

Ah, Stitch. A problem?

Steven Haydon long ago expressed a preference for going by the shorter sobriquet, and Doc Scratch has seen fit to oblige the man. Some members of the Felt recall more than others - this is the first time they have reincarnated as anything other than leprechauns, and though their loyalty remains programmed into the very essence of their beings thanks to Scratch's hand in their conceptions, some now prefer new names for a new world. It would be impolite in the extreme not to accommodate them.

But Stitch remembers more than most. It hasn't helped him evade Diamonds Droog's more forceful overtures of permanently enforced patronage on numerous occasions, but it lends the man an air of weary docility that keeps him on everyone's good side, and his ability to reverse the flow of entropy has never been more useful, given the odd tears that have erupted in the fabric of space-time in ways that Scratch cannot attribute to his master's work.

It is troubling. But Stitch has had no trouble stitching together the rends in space as he has always mended the Overcoat. When one deals intimately with time travel, it is imperative that one keeps a damn good tailor on the payroll. And Stitch has yet to be bested in a contest of tailoring. He is simply the best there is.

"Yeh could say that, Doc," Stitch sighs, digging through the pockets of his tailcoat and walking right up to Scratch, where the dark-haired man reaches up without pause to pinch the fabric of Scratch's undershirt between his fingers. The ragged scar that runs the length of the man's face lends his frown a surly cast as he plucks at the frayed edges where stray drops of grimdark have eaten right through the fabric. "Been up to sommat with them again? I'da brought a proper patch kit if I'd known."

No need to concern yourself. I shall remove it shortly. But let me - ah.

Scratch turns his sight to Stitch's workshop, far below the surface of the earth. Droog once referred to it as a 'foul green basement,' he believes. She always did have such a way with words. The other regular inhabitant of said basement workshop, apart from Stitch himself, is the man's most important and invaluable project, but the very nature of the being's extensive injuries means that Scratch cannot always get a clear view of the goings on in the basement area.

But unfortunately, there is simply nowhere better suited than said basement to keeping Jack in confinement. Noir swallowed the essence of an aspect, and then had it torn from him by a god of Space. Such wounds are not so easily stitched as the one upon Stitch's face, and their severity vacillates wildly so that one moment Noir is up and raging, as is his wont, and the next the carapacian lies torn open on the floor, his insides exposed by the spiraling lesions that Stitch holds together with surgical sutures and prayers.

Still, Noir has been functional enough to make his mark; his presence in the basement is a secret that everyone in the Midnight Crew and the Felt knows, and they all speak of him in whispers they think Scratch cannot hear, a mixture of awe and terror in their voices whenever they discuss the carapacian who can tear a grown troll in two with a single claw and a snarl.

Now, however -

Now -

Ah, Stitch. You have outdone yourself, truly. Excellent work.

It takes only a millisecond for Scratch to observe Noir in the basement, and then turn his full attention back to Stitch. In that time, Stitch has already managed to stuff a pin into his mouth, replying only in grunts as he swiftly sews together the unravelled edges where grimdark acid ate through the shoulder of Scratch’s shirt. "Got'n eyeful of it? Took me long enough to figure out the right thread," he mumbles around the pin, the scar rippling along his cheek as his scar tissue-flecked fingers pinch and pull at the needle and fabric.

He is stable? Permanently?

"'s stable as I can make him. I tried to tell him to keep his damn self on the bed, but does he ever listen?"

Yes, Noir’s intolerance of authority figures telling him what to do has always bordered on the pathological. He has already found the effigies.

Stitch spits out the pin in disgust. It lands in the trash bin Doc Scratch has placed beside his desk for just such an occurrence. "What a piece o' work." He snips off the thread close to the shirt, inspects the near invisible repair job, and then shakes his head in resignation.

You might wish to return without delay. Before he lights one of them on fire. But I shall join you shortly. There is much Noir and I need to discuss.

"Yeh got it, Doc." Stitch steps away, eyeballs the massive tooth resting on the desk with a slow shake of his head, and then ambles off to the exit, stuffing his sewing supplies back into his pockets as he goes. "If yeh see 'em first, tell Eggs and Biscuit to lay off. We're gonna need another warehouse, at this rate, and I'm the one that's gotta ship out all the dud copies."

Of course, Stitch.

Before he leaves, Doc Scratch places the tooth within a safe, one built to withstand even an expert safecracker like Boxcars.

He knows exactly when and where he wishes to activate it.

Doc Scratch is pleased.

And when he is pleased, it means nothing good.

Chapter End Notes

Stretto – music, the close overlapping of two parts or voices, the second one entering before the first has completed; also, a concluding passage in a composition, played at a faster tempo than the earlier material.

Karkat has had a lot on his plate, after being away from home for so long, and he somehow failed to notice that the time of Crabdad's reassignment came and went, like, chapters ago.

If you listen closely, you can make out the distinct sound of foreshadowing in the air.
Who Art Wind and Air

Chapter Summary

Thou art far too far for wings of words to follow,
Far too far off for thought or any prayer.
What ails us with thee, who art wind and air?
What ails us gazing where all seen is hollow?

Chapter Notes

This is the chapter where a lot of things start to come together, but then shit gets too real? No really, I'm warning you right now, this chapter will have one hell of a cliffhanger. Every single narrator we have is unreliable in one way or another. But one narrator has been far more unreliable than the rest...for several very good reasons.

Power anthem is Devil's Spoke (Laura Marling). General 'oh god what a clusterfuck' warning for John on down, with special points to John for some depressive thoughts, Dave for loving too damn much to not try to save people, and Jade for demonstrating what happens when you try to use space powers while in shock and trapped in wards that fuck with your powers.

H&H belong to realmenwearights.tumblr.com. Assorted posts in Dave’s section come from sbahisecrets and sbahjpickuplines, while the dashboard theme/abomination in the eyes of god and man is the SBaHJ theme by spaceking on userstyles. Hussie was the one to describe SBaHJ as “rich sub-cognitive lexicon" and who am I to question the creator?

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

"See, Karkat? We totally survived!" John somehow, impossibly, has his cheeriest grin on. And okay, yes, fine, Karkat has resigned himself to having fallen for an unapologetically peppy moron, but there are limits, and Karkat thinks that one more trip via Harley's space powers might push him to his. The incorporeal windy sensations of John’s air teleportation, even if they make Karkat feel like all the blood in his body has been sucked away, at least don't border on genuine physical pain like the sensation of being drowned in neon green soda and having one's atoms squeezed out the other end like toothpaste from a tube.

But: "Yes, to Harley's credit, we didn't ricochet off Australia and teleport to the center of the Earth," Karkat mutters under his breath, barely loud enough for John to hear. Not that it helps when they're all wedged into the Egbert's painfully compact excuse for a motorized vehicle. Harley is on the roof with the two Scratch kids doing their best impressions of roadkill and Cogitator (Dirk, according to Ranger's nervous chatter), which helps a little, but still. Gah. Close quarters set off all the ancient inbred alarm bells in Karkat's head, informing him that at any moment one of these driveloving fetid shitheads could drop off the deep end and he and John would be pinned against the door with few escape options. "Now get me out of this vehicle before Dave decides it’s time to make good on his fantasies of rapperhood and share his imaginary new music hallucinations with the world at large."

"Nice try," John says, intercepting Karkat's claws before they can reach the door handle and release from this metal death trap. He closes his hand over Karkat's and squeezes, hugging Karkat from behind so that Karkat, grudgingly, has to fold his arms over his chest and let the soothing commence. If anyone else had tried this right now, Karkat would probably have ripped their arm out of its socket and proceeded to beat them upside the head for it, but John is exempt from the grievous assault with a bodily appendage clause. "We still have to drive the rest of the way to the lab, and you, mister, told me yourself that your ribs were sore again -"

"Sore as in I haven't done fuck all the past couple of days, not sore as in about to collapse again!"

"Whatever. Then you should have been more specific." John shrugs.

"It might help mitigate the situation if we were to open the windows," comes the muffled suggestion from Rose, squashed between Ranger/Roxy/What-the-fuck-ever this human is calling herself and Kanaya, who sits upright with the alert demeanor of someone ready to cull a bitch that Karkat recognizes because he's sure he gets the same way when John's vulnerable around a potential threat like Rose is right now. "Any generalized claustrophobia you might be experiencing at the moment may well be alleviated with a breath of fresh air, Karkat. Do you find these kinds of minor moments of panic occur often?"

Karkat flops over as best he can in confined quarters, and side-eyes Rose over the Ranger human's shoulder. "Me, casually descending into claustrophobic paranoia at a leisurely pace? No! Never. What a crazy idea!"

"Oh boy," Dave comments, despite the fact that literally no one wants him to comment. "Don't do it, Karkat. You don't want to go down that dark path."

Karkat, naturally, becomes instantly suspicious. "Pipe down, Strider, I'm not in the mood for your unfunny nuggets of condensed idiocy unless it's something mission critical and/or imperative to our survival," he says. He can hear John's eyes rolling as the kid tightens his hold on Karkat, his nose pressed to the nape of Karkat's neck, but if Dave's gonna hand out dipshit quips like free candy, Karkat's not just going to sit here and meekly accept it without throwing reciprocal words of scornful vengeance right back at his smug face. "What are you talking about now, you outrageous tool?"

"You don't want to get into a snark-off with Rose, man," Dave says; he shakes his head sagely as he twists around to stare at them from behind replacement sunglasses. Where does this evasive fuck even secret all these shades and useless swords on his person, anyway? "As hilarious as it would be to watch you have your ass served like a four-course meal complete with banquet table and creepy ambience-enhancing black candles, I think the last thing we need is you starting a third platonic blood feud over the fact that Rose can outmaneuver you six ways from Sunday. She'll psychoanalyze you. And it'll be embarrassing as hell. Fair warning, bro."

Karkat snorts, and if his teeth clack a little too sharply against each other, sending a dull jolt along his jaw, at least he doesn't break any of his own teeth. He's not strong enough to pull that kind of blueblood horseshit. "Why the fuck would I pull a stupid stunt like that? I approve of Rose's psychomongering, primarily because it proves she's not just frolicking around having auditory hallucinations and dance-fighting. Your entire existence is a waste of time, Strider."

"I honestly can no longer discern," Rose says, idly, her head turned so that it's obvious she's making an aside intended mostly for Kanaya, "whether friendship is what is taking place here, or if Mr Vantas simply finds my elusive, prestigious friendship gambit a topical point of argument."
"I am more inclined to think that he's simply the kind of person who is very easily distracted by arguments," Kanaya replies, still with the pretense that their conversation is somehow private. "He seems sincere enough when he's not shouting. Which is admittedly not often." Then, after a moment's reflection, she presses the switch to lower the window on her side of the car. It doesn't help much - the air's flat as stale soda, but John gives a little whistle and a twitch of his hand, and a breeze starts circulating, bringing with it the scent of damp stone from the pavement of the ranger station's parking lot.

"I can hear literally all of this, you two." Karkat grumbles when John starts laughing. The idiot tries to muffle it, but it doesn't work at all. "I am surrounded by assholes. Do you hear me? You're all assholes. How did I get mixed up in this car full of complete assholes?"

A shift, and the geography of the backseat rearranges a little, as Rose leans further into Kanaya's personal bubble and Roxy, her one hand still occupied with Horrorterror suppression, crosses her legs and takes up more room while she purses her lips, plucking at the collar of her bodysuit with trepidation. "Are you guise always so stroppy?" The human asks, raising her hand. "On account of this is incred awkward-making 'n I'm not sure who to root for here."

"There's no one to root for. I'm pretty sure everyone in this car is equally dumb," John says. He starts laughing again. "It's hilarious!"

"It's essentially a zero-sum game," Rose adds, a sly smirk curling her lip as she pats the back of the Scratch kid's hand with her free one. "Just know, Karkat, that the price of my friendship is high, and you may or may not be subject to a lifetime commitment to excavating your psyche."

"Damn, man, you think even John is an asshole?" Dave says almost over top of his sibling, so that there's a confused moment at the tail end of Rose's snide hogwash where it almost sounds like a deeper stereo has kicked in and Karkat doesn't know who to scowl at next. "That's harsh."

"Though I adore John, he is still an asshole. Look at what I have to deal with, here!" Karkat gestures back toward John's giggling squawk-gaper, which only earns him another round of boisterous laughter before John hugs him to try to either squeeze the life out of him or somehow try to pacify him after all this raging idiocy. Karkat, resigned to the fact that he has zero immunity to the John hug-gambit, can't make much more than a token effort at escaping in these close quarters. As much as he's loathe to admit it, though, the open window does help things a little.

Right up until a curtain of dark hair blocks the opening and Harley appears, an upside down face with a broad smile. "I can hear you all having fun in here without me, while I'm stuck with Mr and Ms Unconscious!" she says, blowing a raspberry at them all. "And Dirk won't talk to me."

"Is everyone still on board up there?" John's dad asks. Karkat can't help but think they're as far out of the guardian's comfort zone as it's possible to go - loitering with the engine running far from home with four kids perched on the roof of the car with no seat belts. A stern father figure's worst nightmare.

"Yup!" Harley nods.

"Then please do what you can to keep it that way, Ms Harley. I would be endlessly grateful."

"Nooo problem!" And with that Harley lifts her head back out of sight, and several loud thumping noises echo through the roof over their heads. Kanaya in particular looks up with wary eyes, the odd pale skin where her costume has torn casting a faint ripple of light over the back of the seat in front of her.
She is so a rainbow drinker. Karkat would be geeking out about this realization more if he weren't stubbornly trying to maintain the façade of being friend-worthy, here, and indulging in a massive flailing fit wouldn't help things when Kanaya already thinks he's unhinged. He's not sure if anyone else in this hell car realizes what a severe lack of pigmentation combined with luminescence in a troll means - but this is huge. This is, in fact, genuine comic book material.

I mean, how often does she need to chug blood? They've all been hanging out together for days and somehow Karkat never noticed any all night blood drives, when he's supposed to be the blood guy?

Fuck, he needs to step up his game. Does she sleep, or does she just pass out in a convenient corpse box every couple weeks during the new moon when there's no light in the sky whatsoever? Human vampires are totally fictional, of course, but rainbow drinkers are just rare. There have been whole centuries where troll civilization declared the mutated gene responsible for the metamorphosis extinct altogether, but they always seem to show up again just to prove the slurry wrong.

At the same time, however, there's the weirdest sensation in his head - like this realization just confirms something he already knew. Like the déjá vu that hit him so hard when he first laid eyes on Kanaya in person. He never noticing anything off when reading about the Malachite Sylph while she worked in Philadelphia, but now he's been getting the same flashes of recognition whenever that Sollux kid shows up on Pesterchum to lisp at them all to shut up.

Urgh. Karkat will just wait and freak out about this with John in private. He can't even imagine bringing up the topic with Kanaya - like, 'oh, hey, so do you prefer warm or cold blood with breakfast? Psych, I'm off-spectrum, sucks to suck' - no. Absolutely not. Lucky, their escort car shows up, gravel spitting from under the tires, and Karkat distracts himself by playing a death-defying game of is that the violetblood in the driver's seat oh god how fast can I put in the emergency contact lenses and nearly enucleating himself in the process of covering his brilliant red irises. Imagine his surprise and disgust when he realizes that no, it's not the coldblood novitiate driving, it's some human intern, thus rendering his idiotic struggle almost pointless. Dave certainly gets a good laugh out of it, prompting Karkat to try his best to kick the back of the douchebag's seat from across Roxy and Rose's legs.

John might let his regular eye color show around these people, because human eye color isn't that big of a deal in the grand scheme of things. But Karkat's still so far off the hemospectrum that he's frankly amazed that Kanaya takes the whole thing in stride. Maybe it's because rainbow drinkers have toed the cull-on-sight line for years. Jadebloods are almost exactly on the balance point between warm and cold, so he'd have thought she'd be at least a little more disapproving, but Karkat gets the feeling he doesn't register as significant enough in Kanaya's world to be worth reporting to colder bloods or anything like that.

-

It's only when everyone piles out of the car and Kanaya starts hauling emergency clothing supplies out of the trunk for herself that Karkat realizes he and John dumped their hoodies back in Seattle and never picked them up again.

John's costume is robust enough to pass for a very, very blue jacket and pants pairing. He just looks badass.

For Karkat, on the other hand...there is just no other way to say this...his costume is...tight. He and Jade have, by some twist of fate, ended up the only two here stripped down to bodysuits, but after Karkat tosses the remains of his horn prosthetics into the trunk there's no way he can muster up that ridiculously self-confident Hemogoblin persona that might have allowed him to strut around without a care in the world the way Harley does.
He feels fucking naked. John's dad is here, for fuck's sake. Rose's mom, who has somehow grown even more intimidating the more she loses her professional chic and gains the haunted, crazy-eyed look of a mad scientist, is here. Karkat is about to be surrounded by scientists, all with about twenty years on him, and he's basically not even wearing pants. Just really tight leggings.

All of these people are judging him. He can feel it.

He contemplates the pros and cons of murdering Dave for his pants. It's a close call. But he has other options, goddammit. "Rose. Rose. Make me invisible again," he hisses, seizing the opportunity when it presents itself to duck over and badger her for help.

Rose shakes her head at him, raising the hand clasped by the Scratch kid with an apologetic cant to her shrug. "I'm without magic for the foreseeable future, I'm afraid," she says, a lenient if tired smile spreading over her face when Roxy swings their hands in some fit of exuberance. "Even if I had reserves left, the results would most likely go horribly wrong."

"Sorry about that," the Scratch adds, and then is distracted in the next instant by the reappearance of the other blond, Cogitator, who darts between Roxy and the two unconscious kids being carted into the laboratory with uncanny speed. Karkat bristles whenever the Dirk human appears just on principle; upon comparing stories in the car on the way here, Karkat came to the conclusion that while Berzerker and Bolter might have inherited all the batshit slaughterminator genes - or been brainwashed into acting like dementia-ridden coldbloods on a rampage, God, brainwashed clones? He doesn't even know what to believe anymore - Cogitator is the one to watch out for. Three reasons why? Because he can apparently take Dave and Kanaya on at the same time; because with those shades and hell, even his hair style and the flat set of his mouth, he's the fucking spitting image of an evil Puppeteer which is the last thing anyone wants; and finally, because he's still conscious, whereas the other two potential grenades seem to be down for the count.

Roxy, on the other claw, doesn't register as a threat at all anymore. Her reaction, when Rue Lalonde strides out of the lab to meet them, most closely resembles that of a golden retriever barkbeast reuniting with its loving family, and the pinched expression on Rose's face as she is dragged toward her custodian is fucking priceless.

"Oh, holy crap." John fidgets at Karkat's side, rubbing the back of his head and messing up the windswept mass of hair until it sticks up in a downright impossible assortment of cowlicks. His eye looks awful, the goggles swinging around his neck battered to the point that one of the lenses has gone missing and the frame deformed and scored from the Berzerker's blow. "They look totally alike. I really wanted to be making that part up in my head or forgetting what Doctor Lalonde's face looked like or something. This is so weird.

Karkat rolls his eyes and crowds John into motion. "Come on, we need to get you something for that eye."

"You're not weirded out by this?" John asks, still stuck on this clone thing, because John is a simple soul. He stays close enough to Karkat that the troll knows for a fact that the idiot's still hung up on Karkat's ill-timed comment about his ribs. What a fucking worrier. "The Midnight Crew has clones of Rose's mom and Dave's bro and - those other two have to be Grandpa and my Nanna? And you're more worried about my eye?"

"We can actually do something about the massive swelling of your eye, dumbass." Karkat glowers at Harley as she catches up to them, humming to herself and sauntering around without a care in the world about the fact that her coat-less costume leaves about as much to the imagination as Karkat's does. Just with added galaxy print - that, admittedly, resembles an actual galaxy a little too closely for comfort. Basically, fuck her and her casual self-assurance, alright? "What do I care about clones? So they have the same gene profile - makes more sense than human reproduction usually does."

"Hey, that's right," Harley jumps in. Karkat does not resist the urge to smack his palm to his face. He welcomes it. "Trolls are always looking for their ancestors with the closest you can get to an identical genetic blueprint, aren't you - that's an interesting way to look at it!"

"No, it's not interesting, it's common fucking sense. You humans should try evolving to experience it some time, it's great." Karkat shakes his head. "And no one's perfectly identical anyway - that's a fucking myth. Just look at the height difference between the Condesce and the Heiress, if you're so hung up on hard facts."

"Still!" Harley bounces ahead, and Karkat bares his teeth in really fucking unholy glee when she misjudges the effect of the void wards or something and ends up almost knocking into the wall instead of walking through the door. "And carapacians clone from machine blueprints, so that's two out of three!" Her blather continues in this vein as she pulls steadily ahead of them.

-

The only reason Karkat doesn't kick up more of a fuss about getting roped into a meeting with Doctor Lalonde and all these assholes is that Rue pulls Rose and Roxy aside and returns with a void bracer locked on Rose's wrists, to a resounding round of applause led by John and Harley. The woman then swoops down on John, tutting over the state of his eye as she inspects it, and sends a lab tech to get a cold pack to take the swelling down, which automatically gets Rue back in Karkat's grudging good graces.

She may have been a shitshow at raising Rose, but fuck if she isn't overflowing with desperate maternal concern these days, lavishing more attention on the other kids the more determinedly Rose ignores her. Karkat, who gets more custodial care than he wants to think about on a daily basis, happily shoves John under the bus whenever it looks like she might be about to lunge at Karkat with that wild glint in her dark eyes. Even Dirk and Roxy get roped into the farcical display of human ancestor caretaking; the whole thing becomes momentarily less funny and more terrifying when Dirk reacts to a sudden move by stealing one of Dave's swords before Dave can block him, and by the time Roxy gets Cogitator to stand down everyone's nerves are once again rubbed as raw as open blisters.

Once everyone has been looked over and Berzerker and Bolter (it's hard to think of them having such innocuous, wholesome human names as Jane and Jake, so Karkat just doesn't) have been hooked up to intravenous drips full of enough opiates to keep them down for as long as it will take to get their heads checked out, however, Rue decides to drop a fucking tactical nuke right smack on top of Karkat's growing hope that maybe, just maybe, now that they've dropped these dangerous fuckwads off, Samuel will drive them all back out of the valley and Harley can teleport them back home. It really says something, that Karkat's looking forward to putting his fucking life in Harley's hands. He isn't in excruciating agony after a hero run for the first time in a long ass while, and he does feel like he could sleep for a week, and he wants to celebrate this miraculous achievement by not hanging out in this lab overnight again if he can help it.

"I'm afraid you may need to delay your return for several hours, Samuel," are the first words out of Rue Lalonde's mouth, and Karkat only swallows his howl of anguish because John pre-empts him by reaching over to clap a hand over his widening mouth, so all that can escape is a high-pitched, descending whine of suppressed fury. "There is a very real security risk; I'm sure you'll agree that this needs to be dealt with immediately." The doctor's eyes reach Karkat, and her smile of apology reminds him so strongly of Rose's earlier it's fucking unnatural. There are too many Lalondes and Striders in one room - Dirk, Roxy, Rue, Dave - fucking why. Max capacity was reached like three Strilondes ago and Karkat's fury escalates accordingly. Fuck it, he and John can fly back or something inanely stupid like that, they don't need to hang around for whatever fresh traumatic thing Doctor Lalonde wants to spring on everyone -

"Explain," Samuel Egbert says, his voice taut as he meets Doctor Lalonde's pronouncement of doom with equal seriousness.

"To provide some background into the situation - you all need to understand that my team in Maine was able to capture a group of trolls earlier in the year, all of them Midnight Crew operatives in pursuit of the Wondering Querent." The carapacian, Karkat notes, being very absent from this meeting. They've only been here fifteen minutes, and he already thinks seeing Spades earlier was just a fluke - carapacians are just cagey, evasive fucks, WV excepted.

"Ordinarily we would have turned them over to the relevant authorities - we're a research team, after all, not jailers," Rue goes on, reaching out with a chipped fingernail to tap on a laptop. It's plugged into a screen - not the hellscreens from a few days ago, just a regular projector in a regular meeting room (which, thank fuck, because John can not handle that room again on such short notice, and Karkat will make it his life's mission to keep John from losing his carefully cultivated mental stability all over again). When the projection appears, it displays a series of colorful scans, all of troll skulls judging by the horn roots visible along the edges of the skulls. "However, one of the trolls showed signs of extremely advanced coldblood dementia, and to be safe we scanned them all."

Rue tears her gaze away from the projection to meet their eyes. "All of them had what appeared to be a tumorous mass here -" she indicates the relevant area of the frontal lobe, and once Karkat's eyes adjust to the diagrams the massive fucking tumor things on each and every scan make him feel a little ill.

"They all had brain cancer?" Harley exclaims, her green eyes flaring as she presses a fist to her lips. "That's - that's - statistically -"

"Impossible," Doctor Lalonde finishes for her, nodding. "Which was when Novitiate Halburn was called in."

Karkat nearly pees himself when the violetblood's voice suddenly emerges from behind him; Karkat hunches down rather than listen to his idiot reflex which would have him whip around to stare at the other troll and risk the weird light of the projector glancing off his contacts in the wrong way. "I, unfortunately, have few methods by which to provide visuals of what I see in mindscapes. But the true nature of the masses was clear when I heard what they whispered in the Crew operatives' minds, and I could then help Marion arrive at the correct conclusion."

"Whispered?" Rose asks, one hand still running in repetitive circles around the ring of her new bracer. For safety's sake as much as out of any sense of unease, she and Kanaya have managed to maneuver themselves so that there's half a room between them and Roxy - and so between them and whatever weird void powers Roxy has that sucked all the usefulness out of the bracer in the first place. "An interesting choice of words."

Karkat refuses to turn to see Halburn, so he misses if the troll nods back or not in reply. "They are organic. Mindgrubs, to be precise. You see a variant of them used as grubmods by husktop hackers, for the most part, and others as gamegrubs for different systems. They work by - well, Marion understands the neurological aspect better than I - but I believe it has something to do with chemicals?"

"Neurotransmitters," another voice mutters, and this time Karkat sneaks a look back to see a human doctor glowering at the figure beside him with the expression of someone who has bitten into a lemon and is determined to inflict serious bodily harm on whoever dared them to do something so shitpanned in the first place. "They secrete neurochemicals until the brain's so saturated with them, the damn fools will do whatever they're conditioned to do. Dump enough serotonin into their systems, and they'll worship the next person they lay eyes on. Or just spiral into insanity or depression or why not both?! Anything is possible when you meddle with peoples' minds without their damn consent."

"Miss Lalonde, you have some experience with viewing the mind, correct?" Halburn adds, seemingly offhand, his tone completely nonchalant despite the ongoing vitriolic mutters emerging from Marion's dark corner of the room, and when Rose responds in the affirmative the troll goes on. "You probably understand more than the others here, then, when I say 'whispers.'"

Rose cocks her head to the side. "I can offer mere speculation. That much chemical interference in the brain would have to have an incredible impact on the psyche, particularly if it's - as you're postulating - being used to brainwash these people into service to the Midnight Crew."

"That is," Doctor Lalonde says, closing her eyes, "exactly what we believe has happened. Not just to these trolls, but to many members of the Crew."

"We've seen it hapen!" Roxy chirps in abruptly. She points to her own head and then to Cogitator's; the other Scratch is too-still, to the point where Karkat questions if the guy's breathing or not. "Tell 'em, Cogs!"

Cogitator grunts. A perfect Striderism. Karkat isn't surprised in the slightest. Even if - he angles just enough away from John to see - yeah, for some no doubt insipid reason, Dave's giving the Rue and Bro clones even more of a wide berth than Rose is. Given Dave's track record for picking up extra copies of himself, Karkat can only snort in derision. Maybe almost getting his ass handed to him sobered Dave up, as unlikely as the thought may sound.

If only Karkat could be so lucky.

Then Dirk starts muttering, as though he just needed some time to piece his thoughts together - unlike Dave, who just shoots off whatever reaches his mouth first like a frigging moron. "Dienek refers to it as being 'brought in for a review,' or synchronization. The son of a fuck's been pullin' us four in for reviews for years now." His spikey blond hair scrapes against the wall as he shakes his head, unreadable behind his triangular shades. "And yeah, my calculations give me an estimate that something like 87% of the Midnight Crew division has at least the bare minimum of synchronization. Keeps them from kickflippin' on over to the first cop who offers them a deal in exchange for intel."

"And I shaw one of the top Crew guys get dropped, once!" Roxy adds, backtracking quickly to correct, "saw, sorry," and then lowers her voice a little. "The lil guy, Clubs! Doctor Die got mad at him for spooping around, and the next thin I know, the poor troll dude has a hella nosebleed and passes out."

That's when Karkat's credulity levels tank out, and has to drawl, rolling his eyes, "Yeah, and next you'll fucking tell me Droog is just brainwashed to be a psycho, and actually she liked gardening in her spare time until she got some worm in her head." He rubs his forehead, the urge to nap stronger than ever before. "Uh huh. And after that comes the incredible revelation that the Beatles have also been cloned in this lab, and will be on tour shortly. Right? Right."

"Believe it or don't believe it," Cogitator says, his voice perfectly level and dry as sawdust. "We know what we've heard. Had to watch our best friends' personalities get wiped out of existence. And now we're telling you - one of your people has been compromised. A sleeper agent." And at long last, the Scratch kid cracks a smile. It isn't much of a smile at all, bitter and flat without his eyes visible, and it sends shudders of unease down Karkat's spine. "What you do with the intel is entirely up to you. We've said our piece."

And with that, he vanishes.

Karkat can't even pretend to panic about where the Scratch kid could have gone along with every other sad sap in the room; he's too busy realizing with genuine despair that they've all somehow stumbled their way into some kind of sick Manchurian Candidate remake.

After making sure that yeah, Dirk the amazing douchebag boy wonder just took off to go check up on the other two Scratches again and not to, you know, try to stage an uprising of some kind, Doctor Lalonde elaborates on the whole sleeper agent thing. "Roxy could give no further hints to elucidate who among us might have been infested with these things, and those we've operated on thus far to remove the mindgrub have stated they were unaware that there was anything implanted in their brains at all," she says, her expression troubled as she seats herself on the corner of the table rather than in a chair. Her eyes often stray back to the projection on the wall, as though the answers are somehow right there. "So. Marion and Halburn will scan the Scratch kids first - Jane and Jake first, most likely, given their rather violent predilections - and Marion will begin working to extract the mindgrubs just as he did the ones we found previously."

"Thank you thank you thank you," Roxy blurts out, hugging herself.

"And then, I must insist for the sake of everyone's security that we all undergo the scanning procedure." Doctor Lalonde surveys the room so fast Karkat isn't sure how the fuck she expects to see anything, but if she's searching their faces he's sure she must really enjoy the cranky glower he can't bring himself to wipe off his own face. He really prides himself on a fantastic glower. "Anyone could be the sleeper without being aware of it themselves, even one of you children, and we must take every precaution. Marion's assistants will take over the MRI once he's in surgery, and Halburn will rotate through the rest as quickly as he can manage, though mindscape viewing takes more time. I know you children must be exhausted after a day like today, but it won't require too much exertion on your part, and if we find nothing at all - so much the better."

"What about -" Harley starts, and then, uncharacteristically, she cuts herself off. "Uhm…Dave…"

"Sup?"

Harley's buck teeth gnaw at her lip. "What about Bro?" she says, still hesitant. "He's not -"

"Ambrose is still seeking out Oriole," Doctor Lalonde says; Karkat marvels at the fact that she keeps her tone just as utterly reassuring as ever, considering she's discussing the fact that one of the most fucking dangerous people in the world might be unknowingly brainwashed and on the lam. "But he ignores many of my missives even at the best of times, so it may be a while before he realizes that the situation is rather dire. I have every confidence in him but on occasion he can be petulant, and he has not been in the best of moods with me of late." Her smile takes a turn for the jack-o-lantern. "With good reason."

Karkat can't tell if the noise that comes out of Rose's mouth is a snort or a sigh. Maybe both. She's still doing her best impression of a wooden board whenever her custodian so much as glances in her direction, her face cast half in shadow by the faint glow that still gleams like white candlelight from Kanaya's face wherever her concealer has worn thin.

Dave's groan lasts a good fifteen seconds, and Karkat is tempted to ask if his soul has finally abandoned his meatsuit for shitty rapper heaven. "I'll…text him," Dave says at last, sounding outright disgusted. "Which I'll have you know will mean breaking my amazingly long-standing streak of not having a single fuck to give about his random puppet fieldtrip from hell."

"I would appreciate that, dear," Rue says.

"Yeah, whatever. I'm mads generous over here." Still muttering to himself, Dave slips out his phone and starts rapid-fire texting. "Like a goddamn soup kitchen, pouring one out for my homies. Goddamn."

"Samuel? Anything to add?" Doctor Lalonde finishes. "I'm sorry I didn't warn you ahead of time, but Roxy's warning came at the last moment, and we wouldn't want to delay this, would we?"

"No, we would not," Samuel confirms without pause, inclining his head to Rue respectfully. His expression is thoughtful but with intimations of a deep disquiet that Karkat doesn't like - mainly because it's the same look John's dad has worn a lot lately when quietly but firmly explaining why he thinks John needs to be relocated from Seattle before Droog can play the identity card, not after. It goes beyond fatherly concern and into outright fear. If the threat of Diamonds Droog outing John was enough to kick the man's alarmglands into high gear, Karkat dreads what news of a potential sleeper agent might provoke in him.

"The Scratches first, then ourselves, perhaps?" Samuel continues musing aloud, looking to Rue for confirmation. "And then the children. Excellent. Rue, if I may make use of one of your offices again, I can get to work notifying some of my contacts in the meanwhile. If the leak could be anyone, it may prove fruitful to investigate any lead, and if it is one of those I've trusted over the years…"

"It could be why Droog knew John's real name," Karkat mutters, and Samuel looks at him sharply before nodding.

"The same office should still be open. We couldn't manage to remove the whiteboard, however - no one here has felt particularly confident in their ability to operate a hacksaw or reconstruct part of the wall, not since Fredyn lost his appendix to Spades Slick." Rue sighs.

"...Oops," Harley says, not sounding nearly as sorry as she did back when it first happened. If anyone expects Karkat to apologize for Slick's stabbing spree, they'd better not hold their breath, because that fuckface is a fucking violent miscreant and [Blood Brother] bullshit or no, Karkat refuses to take responsibility for his alien mob boss's actions.

"A hacksaw, you say?" A smile that is just a little bit too eager blooms on Kanaya's lips. "I am proficient with many sawkind."

"Perhaps you can take a look at it later, before we leave," Samuel suggests, fast, before Kanaya can pull out the Sylph's chainsaw and start liberally applying it to the wall in question. Karkat doesn't blame him at all. "For now, I'll see who I can reach."

"And my own people will rotate through the scanning rooms soon after," Doctor Lalonde agrees, bowing her head. "Try not to stray too far, everyone. We'll get you home as soon as possible." And that seems to be that. No one can really argue with the logic of going through all these hoops as a precautionary measure - not even Karkat, who would fucking love to argue. But fuck, if the Midnight Crew has some kind of mole on their side, they need to know. What a fucking hassle, though.

"Stuck here again," Karkat grumbles to John, before sighing and shoving his chair back, cuffing John's shoulder to get him to hurry up. "Come on, let's go find something to eat. There has to be something other than sandwiches and grubsauce in this massive backwoods time-sucking excuse for a lab, even if it means we steal someone's shitty lunch right out of the break room. If they want to fight me, they can fucking well fight me because I am not in the mood to be fucked with, John.”

"Oh, boy," John says, shaking his head as he and Karkat head out into the hallway. "But on the other hand, food sounds really good right now. Better than wondering about worms in peoples' heads," he adds, wrinkling his nose and hooking his arm with Karkat's. "Come on, Karkat. Maybe we can find you some pants and a shirt or something before you freeze your butt off!"

"...Fuck."

---

(It is only much, much later that Karkat realizes John never said a word, even once, through the entire meeting.)

---

Roxy's presence is a boon. Rose is certain that if it weren't for Rue's utter fascination with being presented with a clone of herself, she and her mother would have found something to blow up about. It's a running theme, here.

But it's hard to find the opportunity to argue when Roxy proves equally fascinated with Rue, eyes wide as she reverently watches the proceedings. Naturally, everyone is stiltedly polite; all of them find themselves stymied by the potential social gaffes and pitfalls that might present themselves when one of the conversants is the clone of another. If Rose's contributions are restricted to polite murmurs, Rue's to her usual pedantry, and Roxy's to blurted questions, no one dares mention it. It's only when Rue allows a novitiate to slide into her seat in order to make some last minute adjustments to the bracer that Roxy mutters to Rose, as quietly as she can with excitement burning in her eyes, "So she's like me, but in a sexy science lady suit and cool as hell? This's so awesome!" she gushes, clenching her free hand into a fist of victory. "Oh man, I can't even deal!"

Well, at least she's not undergoing some kind of existential crisis or questioning the complex jurisprudential and moral ramifications of the whole thing. Though on that subject... "That's the full extent of your feelings on the realization that you're a clone?"

Roxy frowns, and shrugs. "Ye-es? Why wouldn't it be?"

"Well, psychologically speaking -" Rose cuts herself. At Roxy's quizzical look, she just smiles. "Nothing. Never mind me."

No need to get into the possible psychological issues. It would be rather crass, after all, when all three of the closest people in Roxy's life have been brainwashed into having cataclysmic amounts of psychological damage.

The click of the new void bracer around her wrist releases the tension, like slicing through a taut violin string; Rose flexes her wrist, still numb, but heartened by the reassurance that the bangle provides. "Thank you, Mother," she says, hearing the words emerge from her own lips as though through a bubble of silence, muffled and far away. The iron grip of Roxy's fingers around her hand falls away for the first time in what feels like hours.

The grey world bursts back into color, light surging back into the light the befuddling nothingness, and Rose can't quite bite back a sob of relief.

---

Earlier that day…
GG: hellllooo~~~! :D
GG: kanaya, rose, come talk to me! i'm at school and karkat and john are ignoring me because class.
:P
GA: I Thought Sollux Expressly Forbade Us From Unnecessary Communiques Except In The Event Of An Emergency. Is That No Longer A Thing?
GG: this totally counts as an emergency! these lame-o science and math classes they take here are so basic!
TT: What topic shall we whet our fine conversational blades upon, then?
GG: well...
GG: well, i'm still curious about the game, but i can't narrow down exactly what nanna could mean in some of my grandpa's notes by an 'angel of double death ushering in the end times' or how that could relate to the reckoning, because there's nothing like that in any of the records of our game that i could hear...
GG: i know i've heard the phrase before but can't pin it down! so for lack of hard evidence i'm tabling that one for now. how about quantum particle physics? :D
GA: I Should Probably Not Have Typed His Name. He Tends To Notice When You Do That. I'm Not Entirely Sure How.
TT: Particle physics and angels. An intriguing place to start. Tell us more, Jade.
GG: well you see, i just got to wondering about stuff recently, what with all this new data we have on the game!
GG: i asked doctor lalonde to forward me some of her res-
GG: uh, never mind! that's not relevant! what is relevant is that i've been trying to figure out where the carapacians fit into it all...
GA: Perhaps It Is Like One Of Those Urban Legends Where You Have To Speak His Name Three Times.
TT: Is there a particular reason for this curiosity about our alien NPC compatriots?
GG: partly it's because they're clearly constructs of the game - but what does that mean, exactly? they can exist on earth when the game's not in session, but when i found WV he was so quantumly unstable that he couldn't be perceived by the naked eye.
GG: do carapacians just randomly get unstuck from reality sometimes, or is something wonky with WV's atomic structure? are there a bunch of glitched carapacians running around the planet that we can't contact? what made him so different? inquiring minds want to know, rose!
TT: An interesting line of questioning, I agree. And of course, alas, poor WV cannot tell us his own perspective on the matter. Unless Dave has made remarkable progress in his efforts to tutor the poor dear in a very liberal interpretation of sign language.
TT: What do you think, Kanaya?
GA: What.
GA: Oh. I Am Still On The Fence About All This Game Nonsense. It All Just Seems A Little Farfetched To Me.
GG: even after all that video evidence? :P
GA: Something Happened. I Am Not Disputing This. I'm Just Saying That Blindly Buying Into Every Single Thing We Have Been Told Could Be Dangerous.
GG: that's fair! we do need a team skeptic or we could get carried away.
GG: but yeah, what do you think about WV?
GA: I Think That I Am A Mediculler, Jade, Not A Physicist.
GG: ...true. can't argue with that! my sidekick is the cutest sidekick! heehee!
GA: If It Helps I Have Heard Of A Similar Phrase Before. In The Ukraine. We Did Not Have Much Opportunity To Interact With The Locals Before Everyone Died Basically, But Many Cursed The 'Херувим Смерті Двічі' Which Roughly Means Cherub Of Death Twice Over.
GG: huh! i'll add that to the list! thanks kanaya!!!
TT: I can research the phrase as well, if you think it would help. But on the subject of WV - are you concerned that he may become unstable again? If we can't interpret his endearing charades into something resembling coherence, maybe you need to consult a different carapacian? The White Queen has proven quite informative on the rare occasions I've had the chance to speak with her one on one, and honestly I regret not consulting her more often.
GA: As The Progenitor Of Her Race She Would Likely Know More About Carapacians Than Literally Anyone Else On The Planet.
GG: whoops, hang on, gotta head to lunch! walking all the time is so dumbbbb...
GA: Truly It Is A Struggle For Us All.
GG: i just really wonder - was it something in the previous game that did it to him? he was travelling around with john a lot, but after crazyjack omniponoir started hurting everybody and WV helps get john to his questbed, could something else have happened?
GG: carapacians are cloned ectobiologically, and that tends to allow them to carry things over from one life to the next.
GG: so it just bothers me that something might have happened to WV that left him like this, and it probably happened in that gap no one can access on the tapes because of the troll session! at least according to these notes that i totally didn't get from your mom.
TT: I really don't mind, Jade.
GG: really?? because you guys still seem kinda testy around each other all the time...
TT: My mother is an excellent scientist; she is very good at her job. To the exclusion of all else, including being present to raise me. I'm resigned to it, and resignation is far less likely to prompt an argument or set off another round of binge drinking than hatred. So.
GG: glances at kanaya with a :/ face
GA: Wait Are We Roleplaying Now?
GG: (yes)
GA: Alright. Raises Eyebrow At Matesprit Significantly
TT: Dost thou waggle your eyebrow at me, Madame Maryam?
TT: Excellent. I'm glad we could see eye to eye on this matter. Was there anything else you wished to discuss, Jade?
TT: I myself have been pondering if there might be some way for us to prevent the game from repeating itself, as has become an increasingly likely possibility. Would it be possible for you to share some of your grandfather's and John's grandmother's notes on the subject with me?
GG: yeah, sure! i don't know what good it'll do, though, cause this whole thing is kind of doomed to happen! but i'll dig it all out of my sylladex later~
GG: urrrgh, i have so much more i want to talk about, but i need to eat now. text you both later! ;)
GA: Hang On I Need To Test A Theory.
GG: a scientific theory? :o
GA: In A Manner Of Speaking.
TT: What is it?
GA: Sollux Captor.
GA: Sollux Captor.
GA: Soll-
-- twinArmageddons [TA] has joined the chat! --
TA: did you know that the fiir2t ~ath program ever coded wa2 a viiru2-ba2ed 2elf-propagatiing cur2e capable of remotely blowiing up an electronic device from a 2iigniifficant dli2tance?
GG: uh...no!
TT: Fascinating.
GA: ...You Make Your Point Quite Eloquently, Sollux.
TA: cellphone2 off now and nobody ha2 two lo2e theiir pe2terlog acce22. go make out wiith your human or 2omethiing GA.
GA: Thanks, I Will.
GA: Now Why Are You Avoiding The Subject Of Your House Guests.
-- twinArmageddons [TA] blocked grimAuxiliatrix [GA] from the chat! -- TA: who2 next?
TT: I'm fairly certain you have peevd Kanaya considerably with that last one. Fair warning, I would fear for the sanctity of your limbs the next time you meet in person.
TT: Oh dear. Um.
TT: Sollux Captor So Help Me I Will Come Up To Canada Myself If Those Two Are Causing Trouble And You Are Seeking To Conceal It From Me -
-- twinArmageddons [TA] blocked thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] from the chat! -- TA: it'2 liike the niight of the liiviing dead iin here, je2u2.
GG: say, you're a programmer, right? :?
TA: ii 2hould block your a22 for that shiitty emotiicon alone but ii wiill allow you two plead your ca2e.
GG: ooookay, bossy pants~! have you ever written a program that can evaluate and predict the variables involved in a random quantum event in which the resulting product is already known? i'm okay with computers but they're not my specialty!
TA: yeah. that'2 liike fiir2t grade ~ath logiic. hang on, ju2t let me bru2h up on my advanced quantum mechaniic2 formula2.
GG: awesome!
-

Rose rolls her wrist back and forth, trying not to be overly gauche about how she needs to repeatedly check the color of her skin to reassure herself that it's back too normal. Physically, her arm took the brunt of the grimdark influx, and the muscles feel tender when she flexes her fingers and turns her arm over.

Mentally - well, she has one hell of a migraine, and one incredibly waterlogged mindscape she'll need to meditate on later to burn clean of bloodbrine and acid. But between the two bracers and the resurgence of her power after Roxy let go of her hand, Rose found it the work of only a moment to brute-force her way through banishing Leviathan from her mind with the same spell she chose the last time she faced such a devastating incursion. Even without John in her mind, it was more than enough to drive the tangle of writhing thorns back through the breach to the channel from whence it came. Her wards are dimmer, but holding, and that's enough for now.

Still. She speculates that, given the fact that John's presence helped so much the first time, the results of inviting Jade or Dave into her mindscape to help with the wards might be worth testing. But that's a thought for another time.

Right now, she and Kanaya have somehow found themselves in charge of fielding Roxy's exuberant chatter while the other Scratch kids are in the middle of being processed by Marion and Halburn. The younger variant of Bro, one with all of Ambrose's speed and skill but none of his unruffled composure, remains convinced that at any moment the entire laboratory could turn on the Scratches and do them harm, an insistent distrust that has him glued to the sides of Jake and Jane, both still unconscious. He exerts incredible control over his emotional reactions, yes, but is still so visibly wired and jittery with tension and paranoia that Rose is surprised he hasn't driven himself into some kind of mental break yet. Every few minutes he appears silently in the doorway between the waiting room and the MRI room, and Roxy will roll her eyes with wild exaggeration before staggering over to pacify him with reassurances that she's still in one piece.

Rose suspects, though she makes an effort not to spy on their conversations, that Roxy is also an integral reason why Dirk has yet to snap, seize his comrades, and proceed to hack his way out of the facility with a kitchen knife, if necessary. A significant portion of him buys into that brainwashed, cultish loyalty to the Midnight Crew; Roxy's soothing influence is the only thing that keeps him quelled.

Honestly, Roxy is a very pleasant young lady. It is difficult to understand how she and Rue might share a genetic code. Dirk's stare gouges into Rose's back until she sighs and glances back to raise an eyebrow. With neither excuse nor explanation he vanishes back through the doors. Roxy waves him off cheerily, then scampers - or trips, really - her way to the chair she has chosen to splay out in. "He says they're almost done with Jakey," she announces, her smile pleased as she half-falls backward into the chair. "Which is good because maybe then he'll remove the pole from his merry-go-round high horse's butt."

A mangled metaphor worthy of Dave himself. Incredible.

"Is he always so pleasant a character?" Kanaya asks, picking absently at the IV drip stuck in the fold of her elbow until Rose tugs her claws away again. In the light of her very obvious, gleaming white luminescence, and lacking enough sealant and makeup to cover up again on short notice, Kanaya straight facedly informed everyone in the party, including the medical staff, that she had 'a condition.' When no further explanation was forthcoming, the doctors took one look at the amount of blood soaked into her costume and hooked her up to an IV with as many spare packets of jadeblood transfusions they had in storage. It had been up to Rose to rather indiscreetly conceal some of that blood on her person and creep out to the restroom to dump out an entire thermos of cold coffee from the Egbert's vehicle and fill it with blood for Kanaya to drink straight. They've been swapping out the IV repeatedly with hopefully no one the wiser to the fact that the IV pump is off, there's a darkening stain of green over Kanaya's smeared lipstick, and all the empty packets have rips along the top of the thick plastic.

Ah, that rainbow-drinker life.

"Who, Dirk-a-dirk?" Roxy says, swinging her legs distractedly. Her fingers drum against the arm of the chair, but they keep skidding from the tremors that occasionally wrack her hands. She shrugs. "He's going against orders. He and me, we can do that. But - there's conquests - consequences." The blonde holds up her hand, just as a particularly large twitch sets her fingers trembling. "Like that, see?"

Rose's stomach lurches. She hasn't thrown up yet, but she's already marked all trash receptacles in the vicinity with a spark of light in her sight so that in the event she needs to expel another pint of gritty seawater, she'll be prepared to lurch in the most opportune direction. "The tremors aren't usual? You mentioned something about nerve damage, earlier," she recalls.

Roxy's lips flutter as she puffs out a breath of air. "Really gorram selective damage, yeee. It only kicks up all fussy when I'm thinkin' about doing something really, really stupid. I mean, when I had to snipe Sharpshooter the other day -" She snaps her hands into finger pistols, the jitter flattening out so fast it's uncanny, and grins again. "I was totes on point! But only 'cause I was doing what the worm wanted me to do. All day today I've been doing...kind of the opposite."

"Perhaps not nerve damage, then," Rose says, frowning as the Scratch's hands start shaking again. "If these grubs work by inundating the brain with neurochemicals, trying to mold how you think - well, even if they're not working correctly, you still have to function with a deluge of chemicals" swamping your brain. Your motor function would be affected only as a symptom; the nerves of your hands themselves are probably fine."

Unless they've been tortured, her mind suggests darkly, a thought that Rose sinks down beneath the level of her conscious mind almost as quickly as it intrudes itself. From the impression she's got from Roxy's scattered, often broken narrative, these kids have been trained by a legitimate mad scientist named Doctor Dienek since childhood, if not since birth. That kind of prolonged brainwashing by a criminal outfit would qualify as torture enough without considering how Roxy might have been punished over the years for failing to meet standards.

"Oh schnapps! Really? That's actually kinda a relief!" Roxy inspects her fingers with a lopsided grin, as though observing a miracle. "Ohmigod, I can't wait to have my head all screwed up right, with no more funnybiz!"

Rose wonders whether to mention that the girl's slurred speech and drunken gait might well be the result of the soup of neurotransmitters misfiring, too. She decides to not to; she's not the neurologist, here, and if her guess is wrong she doesn't want to have gotten Roxy's hopes up for nothing.

…Mmm. Schnapps would do wonders to rinse the last of the salty taste souring in the back of her throat -

No. Stop that. Rose gulps hard, and Kanaya's face turns toward her with the hawk-keen eyes that see right through Rose's efforts to control her wistful expression. The claw that just began reaching for that useless IV again freezes midmotion and reaches over to touch the back of Rose's hand, thumbing along the curve of Rose's knuckles until the moment passes. "You said you were raised in this other laboratory?" Kanaya says in the meanwhile, smooth as anything. "How long do you estimate you've all been brainwashed with these organic implants, anyway?"

"Dunno." Roxy folds her arms and pulls a face. "Coulda been in our heads forever, for all we know. But it only started getting reeeal obvious when our personality got all janked up. Like, when Jake stopped making Dirk download him shitty movies all the time, and me 'n Jane were like, what the absolute fuck is going on?" Another sigh. "Jake loved those crummy films and suddenly he didn't even wanna watch Indiana Jones, for cripes' sakes. Then it started getting worse, and then Jane went from normal to cuckoo-pagodas in a couple sessions, and finally Dirk admitted somethin' was up with Jake so we could go snooping around together. But by then, it was too late."

"And their personalities totally changed," Rose murmurs - perhaps too quietly for the other two to hear. Oh well. She flicks her eyes down, trying to determine whether the nausea roiling in her stomach will settle on its own, or if she should excuse herself now while there's still time.

Before Rose can execute a quick getaway, Roxy glances furtively towards the door, and scoots her chair closer to Rose and Kanaya. There is a low rumble as the chair legs drag over tile. "Tha's enough about all that depressing stuff. Look. Y'know that guy who drove us here?"

"Mr Egbert?"

"Yeah! Just...look..." Roxy takes a deep breath, clasps her hands before her, a twinkle in her eyes, and - "Is there, like, a Missus Egbert?"

Kanaya, Rose believes, sums up her initial reaction with a succinct, striking clarity of elocution that cannot be matched. While Rose finds her breath momentarily taken away, Kanaya looks up so slowly from the IV pump that almost ten seconds pass before her eyes lock onto Roxy's and she utters a single word.

"What."

Rose follows like an echo, right on the trailing end of Kanaya's flat statement. "...Come again?" she says weakly.

When Roxy sighs this time, she doesn't sound tired. It's a gusty whopper of a sigh, and Roxy's voice when she speaks next has become breathy and jumped almost a full octave. "Do I hafta French maid my way past some other lady frontin' in on him?" she asks, her eyes still distant and twinkly. "Because daaaaaaaa. That man reeks of cologne fresh from the Dadly Depot and I'm swoooonin' o'er here, Rose!" Roxy presses her hands to her flushed cheeks, kicking her feet a little. "Ohhh m g, I'm blushing so much!!!"

"Yes, I suppose I can...objectively see how Mr Egbert's fatherly aesthetic would appeal to..." Rose gives up halfway through. In that moment of silence, her brain presents to her the image of these same words - but, horror of horrors, emerging from Rue's mouth instead of Roxy's. She immediately forges on through the rest of her point before her brain can come up with something even more alarming. "- he's -"

"Daunting?" Kanaya suggests. She's moved on from blank mystification and skipped straight over the horror Rose is mired down in to reach the point of barely concealed chuckles.

"...Several decades older than you?" Rose finishes instead.

Roxy is an unstoppable force. "I refuse to cosign myself to a dudeless future just 'cause all said dudes are taken or aging like fine wine," she says, throwing up her hands. "I'm jus' saying, if there be a foxy dad placed before me, I get the right to ogle the fine specimen of foxy-dad-hood. It's the simple joys in life, you guys."

"I believe I shall take your word for it," Kanaya says, shaking her head.

-- ~ Welcome to the Divine Café ~ --
-- ~ 4 practitioners online ~ --

-- ~ ADVISORY WARNING: NO ONE HAS ANY IDEA WHAT THE FUCK IS GOING ON WITH THE WESTERN UNITED STATES AT THE MOMENT. STAY INDOORS AND KEEP YOUR BEST WARDS ONLINE UNTIL THE STORM PASSES. BEWARE OF SPORADIC CHAOS MAGIC INTERFERENCE WITH AURAS THROUGHOUT THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE. ~ --

Divine Café > Auras, Scrying, Divination > A general inquiry as to the measurable length of the Earth's viable lifespan (URGENT ANSWERED)

-- thoughtfulThaumaturge [ TT ] has joined the memo! --
-- necroMancer [ NM ] has joined the memo! --
-- huntersAnonymous [ HA ] has joined the memo! --
-- alternativeNewtonia [ AN ] has joined the memo! --

AN: α- Thaumaturge. You knew about this. You had to have known when you opened this memo. Please respond or PM me as soon as can be arranged-Ω NM: Oh, great. What the h___ has gone wrong now? I'm s___ at divination you guys and Star won't text me back, what's going on?

TT: Ah. Judging from your response, I suppose you have managed to confirm the potential for an apocalypse in the charmingly near future?
AN: α- It's 10 in the morning for Galya, but for the past couple nights she's been burning through all the mugwort and cinquefoil she can obtain in the middle of nowhere to try to figure out what she's seeing in her scrykind, so I doubt she's awake yet-Ω
AN: α- The last time she checked in with me, however, she was convinced that there is a 93.6667% chance of Earth being annihilated by the thirteenth of April. All the rest kind of got lost in the endless stream of her informing me that eto pizdyets and meteori vo vsem mirye, eto fignya -Ω
AN: α- Somehow, we were all distracted so much by the multiple chaos incursion events that we missed the fact that none - trust me, I trawled every thread - none of the most recent posts on this forum have predictions due to take place any later in the timeline than April. Not even the long range diviners have noticed the trend yet, since their visions are so rare already -Ω
AN: α- So I repeat - Thaumaturge, you knew. Please cite your sources -Ω
TT: Both an accomplished ~ATH programmer and a close friend's sister approached me with the belief that the apocalypse is nigh, each with their own perspective on the matter. The hacker in particular was rather distraught. The sister doesn't seem to believe there's any way to prevent the apocalypse at all, and shows no interest in attempting to change her blithe outlook on the matter.
TT: In the interim, the situation has...complicated itself. But there seems little doubt that unless extreme measures are taken, the planet and everyone on it may as well be fish in a barrel.
HA: oh for fuck's sake, not another one.
TT: I beg your pardon?
HA: lady, there's always some goddamn apocalypse about to happen.
HA: just say it. it's demons, isn't it.
AN: α- ... -Ω
TT: ...Oddly enough, no. Demons haven't come up yet.
HA: i'm telling you, 9 times out of 10, it's demons. demons and goddamn angels.
AN: α- Welp. We're completely outside my scientific comfort zone, to be honest. At least hivemind clusters of entropic majjyks can be analyzed with the proper equipment; demons are...uh, new -Ω
TT: Well, the term 'angel of double death' has been thrown around by someone, but I'll admit that demons would be a new and refreshing take on the already bleak portents.
HA: son of a bitch!
NM: Great. Now you f_____ up.
TT: How so?
HA: hang the fuck on. where is that feathery asshole when you need him.
AN: α- Oh no. Oh dear, sweet Uncle August, no -Ω NM: A______s, don't you dare put him on - HA: I DO NOT UNDERSTAND WHY I NEED TO COMMUNICATE LIKE THIS WHY CAN'T I JUST SPEAK TO THEM DIRECTLY NM: F___ everything.
TT: Ah. I don't believe we've met. Multiple users have access to your account, yes, Anon?
HA: IS SHE REFERRING TO ME
HA: BUT YOU TOLD ME TO TYPE EVERYTHING I WOULD SAY
HA: OH
NM: F____ it f____ it f____ it -
-- necroMancer [NM] has left the chat! --
AN: α- Yes, I have a...er...I believe I left my chaological sensors running, I had better go catch them -Ω
-- alternativeNewtonia [AN] has left the chat! --
TT: Well that was not suspicious by any stretch of the imagination.
HA: YES I HAVE BEEN INFORMED THAT YOU POSSESS INTELLIGENCE ON A POTENTIAL APOCALYPSE THAT MAY BE ANGELIC IN ORIGIN TELL ME MORE TT: ...
TT: Does 'an angel of double death' hold any significance for you?

HA: _THERE IS NO SUCH THING REAPERS AND ANGELS ARE FUNDAMENTALLY UNRELATED AND INCONGRUENT BEINGS WITH NO POTENTIAL FOR CROSSBREEDING_

HA: _PRIMARILY BECAUSE NEITHER OF THEM BREED THEY SPRING FORTH FULLY FORMED AT THE BEHEST OF THEIR CREATORS_

TT: I see. Just one last question, then - are you familiar with an angel named Malā'ikah, which does double duty as a chaotic abomination of the Furthest Ring?

HA: _OH_

HA: _MY APOLOGIES WE APPEAR TO HAVE APPROACHED THIS CONVERSATION FROM A MUTUAL MISUNDERSTANDING YOU ARE DEALING WITH AN ALTERNATE COSMIC BRANE'S CANON THAT HAS LITTLE RELATION TO MY OWN_

HA: _MY KNOWLEDGE WOULD NOT BE RELEVANT IN THIS CASE_

TT: That's alright. I didn't really expect much by way of straightforward answers in this case. I appreciate the effort, though.

HA: _HOW DO I TURN THIS THING O-_

-- huntersAnonymous [HA] has left the chat! --

TT: ...Well then.

TT: Still. Newtonia, give my thanks and regards to Galya for her assistance. This is more by way of confirmation than I had before, from a mostly impartial third party, and I appreciate it. I'm afraid I must restrict my use of the forums, and may not be able to reach you all for some time.

TT: I can only vow that I will do my utmost to preserve the Earth, by whatever means necessary.

TT: Godspeed.

-- thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] has left the chat! --

---

No one has shown up to visit by the time Doctor Marion and Rose's mother emerge from the inner bowels of the medical ward, so Rose finds herself inordinately captured by disposing of the remains of Kanaya's snack and rinsing out the thermos in the restroom. By the time she emerges, there appears to be a bit of an argument going on between Roxy, the neurosurgeon, and a tight-jawed Dirk, who hovers in a corner of the room as far from everyone but Roxy as possible, that is swiftly resolved by virtue of Dirk's complete refusal to take no for an answer.

"We've got everything mapped out and scanned for them," Marion is saying, clearly frustrated as he tears at his messy hair. "I thought -"

"I go first," Dirk says flatly.

Roxy has a hand on his upper arm, all her earlier cheer lost in a quiet worry as she chafes at his arm in a kind of soothing gesture. "Omigod, Dirk. Dirky-poo. Dirk-rizzle. Dirk. I know you're just super psyched about this, but mebbe we should let them do the thing to Jane and Jake first, since they're so much worse off, and that way you can watch them to be sure everything goes okay, and -"

"Anything they're going to do to Jake, they can do to me first." Dirk's jaw works. His shades look too black, like gaping pits that sink into the upper half of his face where his eyes should be, and Rose wonders just how much longer his frayed control over his brainwashed instincts can last. "If something gets fucked up, I can take it. I've got backups."

"Whaaaa?" Roxy shakes her head, hair bouncing. "It won't get fricked up, they've done it before! They're experts!"

"This isn't an argument, Roxy." A blink and Dirk is elsewhere, standing before Marion and frankly towering over the slightly shorter man without a word of warning. "Scan me next, and then do the surgery."

Marion squints. Then he turns his squint upon Rue, who, barely concealing the faintest of smiles, gives a small shrug, a silent but obvious deferral to the neurological expert in the room. "You... want to undergo this surgery," the doctor says slowly, as though still seeking confirmation as he turns back to Dirk. Anyone else would be intimidated by the presence of a very deadly in their personal bubble. But Marion seems to have something else on his mind.

Dirk darts a glance back at Roxy. It happens quickly enough that Rose almost thinks she imagines it. "...Yeah."

Doctor Marion presses his hands together, touches them to his lips, and appears to send a thankful prayer to some unseen deity through the ceiling tiles. "Then I," the neurosurgeon says when he finishes, his eyes feverish as he claps Dirk on the shoulder, "have some consent forms for you to sign, young man."

"He's never going to stop antagonizing Halburn about this," Rue says after Marion practically charges through the doors back into the ward, Dirk vanishing in his wake. "What am I going to do with them..." With this fresh piece of nonsense uttered, Rue appears to momentarily lose herself in thought, her furrowed brows partially offset by the smile that touches her lips.

But Rose is trying not to analyze her mother overmuch. No need to aggravate the situation. Lingering too much on Rue's actions in general only leads to acrimonious thoughts; Rose would like to avoid retreading old ground, particularly with her mind already off-center in the worst possible way.

Roxy turns toward the door - then spins back to them, her teeth worrying at her lip anxiously. "I'm, uh. Gonna go in with him," she says, pointing toward the door with an expression both uncertain and stubborn. "Make sure Cogs doesn't wake up halfway through and sassacre errbody in the operating theater, on account 'a he's an unpredictable sob." She pronounces the last word not as an acronym but, simply, as 'sob.'

Doctor Lalonde somehow manages to intercept the girl before she can reel on one foot and plough through the doors to the neurology wing again. "Here. I intend to oversee some of the operations, myself," Rue says, the uneven paint on her nails obviously chipped as she lightly guides her younger iteration back within arm's reach. "I can show you where the observation room is, so that we don't upset poor Marion by contaminating his clean room." She hesitates, and then looks back at Rose, who does her utmost to display no outward reaction at all. Yes. Apathy is best. "Rose, I - I would appreciate it immensely if you and I could... talk, before we all must rotate through with Marion's assistants and Halburn's room for the scans."

She enunciates each word with great care, and Rose catches just the barest flare of her mother's accent, lost through years of study in America but never quite gone. For a moment, the familiar intonation causes Rose's gut to clench, as though in anticipation of a sucker punch that does not arrive. "If we must," she forces out through dry lips. Though she intends to meet her mother's eyes straight on in some petty display of aggression, she shifts her head to the side ever so slightly so that she says it to the wall instead. "Shall I await you here" - my lady, so bitter, too bitter, check yourself, Rose not-Lalonde - "Doctor?"

Mm. Perhaps still a little too bitter. Or perhaps Rue is simply playing up her minute flinch as a sympathy play; Rose wouldn't put such a tactic past her mother, regardless of her professed inclination to repair their relationship. Years of passive-aggression can't be set aside in a heartbeat, after all, and Rue's favored tactic in Rose's earlier adolescence was always to overplay her reactions to Rose's latest teenage obstinence. Rose shall not allow herself to be swayed. "Thank you, Rose,"
Rue says with evident strain, biting back some further inanity with a clack of teeth before sweeping through the door.

The last view Rose has is of Roxy twisting around to throw both thumbs up in Rose and Kanaya's direction, gleeful rapture on her face as she starts to chatter at Rue. When at last the door shuts Rose feels the last of the tension roll out of her, and she closes her eyes to take a brief moment to enjoy the silence. Her mind echoes, still washed hollow, but on the mend nonetheless.

A faint pressure, and she allows her eyes to flick open, bemusedly looking to the side to see Kanaya has pressed their arms together. Her face isn't as impeccably put together as usual - the makeup is noticeably lighter in certain areas, though she has replaced her torn clothing with a long sleeved, high-necked blouse to conceal the great swathes of dead white skin where she didn't have the makeup on hand to cover up the rest. "So," Kanaya says, "can you furnish me any insight as to your current state of mind?"

"Ah, I can - but will I?" Rose replies, tilting her head so that it leans against the curve of Kanaya's shoulder with a faint smile on her lips.

"Sometimes, you are an incredibly articulate, well-spoken creature." Kanaya pauses, and sighs deeply. "And sometimes, you indulge in such a grossly overdone joke concerning trifling semantics that I fear for your intellect. I truly do."

"I try to keep you on your toes."

With utter solemnity - "As we are currently seated and my feet are firmly planted flat on the ground -"

Rose can't stop the laugh that bubbles up, shaking her head as much as she can before letting it just rest on Kanaya's shoulder. "You win, you win," she says, still smiling. "I yield."

"As well you should."

Despite the genial camaraderie of the moment, Rose still shifts a minute later, fidgeting as she chafes at - something. It's hard for her to say what. She is inclined to blame the restlessness on the fact that sitting here leans too close to listening to her mother than she can bear.

But - there's still something that nags at her. As though she perches at the brink of some unfathomable abyss, with the weight of an old decision pressing her further and further over the abyss until the angle allows for no other exit but to drop. It's the same sensation she complained about to John - horrors, was that only last night? It oozes over her skin like a viscous film, less horrific but perhaps more insidious than any grimdark residue, and clings like silk to everything Rose can see, with all her eyes. The intense certainty that something major is about to come to fruition; or perhaps, to use a different metaphor, a domino was tipped over long, long ago, and only now will the last piece fall.

It's too all-encompassing, to the point that all Rose can tell for a fact is that whatever comes of this sequence of events will bring about misfortune incalculable.

And yet, if she tries to stop it -

The results would be even worse. No matter how she cast her sight forward last night, laboring without a scrykind or any other ritual apparatus, her penchant for foretelling the luckiest possible path has found absolutely no way out of this that does not end in a fracture she cannot work her way around.
She tries to justify it as well as she can. Perhaps, once they forge through this inescapable dip in all of their fortunes, they can all mend and move on. Like draining pus from a wound, they might just have the opportunity to heal, to ease John through the worst of his recent lapses, to pry Jade from her obstinate belief that the world's end can't be averted, analyze Dave's many neuroses - and become stronger for it.

She's trying to be an optimist about this. She's rapidly failing.

She needs a distraction. And she won't allow alcohol or an argument with her mother to be the modus through which she indulges in that distraction. Rose surges to her feet in a hasty motion, shutting down the internal sight that allows her to observe her inner mind and the external sight that illuminates the outer world, both. "Where are you going?" Kanaya asks, rising from her seat apparently on reflex. "Rose…"

Restless, Rose turns on her heel to meet Kanaya's eyes just long enough to reassure the jadeblood that no, she's not about to run off without her this time. By some strange happenstance, her gaze drags up along Kanaya's form before reaching her face, a cursory glance that -

Not a cursory glance.

Hm. There's a thought.

It's not entirely an appropriate thought. Rose finds she approves. Soundly.

"Well, I am certainly not sitting here to wait on my mother's fancy. Wait -" Rose dramatically flings her hand up to the side of her head, making a show of closing her eyes as though struck by some vision to stem whatever Kanaya might say next. "Providence informs me that waiting on her is, in fact, not a thing I am doing. Observe." Rose walks to the other door, the one that leads not deeper into neurology but out into the main hallway. Mentally, she calls back the lights that mark trash bins - her nausea is not gone but forgotten, for the moment, and she has a far better use for her searching capabilities.

"You are being flippant," Kanaya says, her mouth a thin, reproving line as she paces out the exit after Rose.

Rose will have to fix that. "Astonishingly so," she says, shaking her head with a good dollop of feigned melancholy. Deciding upon her destination, she sets a flare to guide her even as she turns to walk backwards, a faint hint of a smile

Kanaya's eyes narrow with suspicion, completely unfooled by Rose's attempt to appear innocuous, and picks up the pace, closing the gap between them. "John and Karkat were going to meet us, too, and possibly Dave if he does not distract himself again. Jade could emerge from her recent studying binge at any moment."

Rose waves a hand, acknowledging but dismissive in equal measure. "They'll stop to meet with Mr Egbert first. And if I know anything, I know that our goodly Dadbert will not be able to resist the opportunity to impart some fatherly wisdom before they continue on their way here. We have...time."

That last sentence is, if Rose does say so herself, a work of art. Slight emphasis on 'we,' skimming over 'have,' and a judiciously measured pause long enough to tantalize, but short enough that Kanaya does not have the time to try to parse the incomplete sentence before 'time' lays itself out before her, weighted with subtle layers of implication and intimation just this side of suggestive. Taken as a whole, accented with just the slightest flick of a tongue over her lower lip, it is truly indelicate in its blatancy. Salacious, even.

Rose is being very obvious. And Kanaya is a very clever woman. It takes all of two seconds before she realizes what Rose is driving at, and to her credit, she doesn't look pole-axed by the sudden turn in the conversation. Her frown eases instead into a deliberate, restrained consideration.

Rose allows herself a little more of a smirk, slowing her backward stride a fraction so that Kanaya catches up. She reaches up to loop her arms around the jadeblood's neck, smiling all the while. "What do you think?" she asks, lowering her voice as smoothly as she can while still walking backward, angling for an empty room further down the hall. She draws Kanaya along after her.

"Rose." Kanaya purses her lips, walking in lockstep with Rose but not pressing forward of her own accord. Still not sold on it, then. "I was attempting to engage in a feeling jam, not fall prey to a spontaneous concupiscent hook up."

Rose flashes the warmest smile she has in her repertoire, with enough twist to one side to render it thoroughly lewd. They reach her target door and she leans back against it, still drawing Kanaya on. "Really? And yet I think we can find it in ourselves to share a mutual objective, Kanaya, dear." Rose lifts herself up ever so slightly on her toes to place her mouth against Kanaya's ear just so and whisper, "We usually do, after all, possess a certain knack for cooperation. I'm sure we can reach a...point of conciliation?"

"You," Kanaya says at last, "are a terrible influence. What you implied just now was incredibly perverse and you're not even going to apologize for it, are you."

"No, I'm afraid not." They're still in the hallway, but they're already in a rather compromising position here, so what's the harm in Rose sliding her foot around to hook behind Kanaya's calf? No harm. None whatsoever. "Perversion is the goal."

Perhaps a little harm when she moves her mouth down to kiss a line down the side of Kanaya's throat. Mmm. Yes, that's rather blatant. If someone were to walk around the corner right now, there'd be no innocent explanation for any of this, and Rose is surprisingly quite alright with that.

Kanaya hesitates for too long, and Rose is having none of that. "So? What do you say?" she asks, removing her mouth just long enough to ask.

"I say -" And ha. There's the faintest catch of breath, the hitch where Kanaya misplaces her train of thought out of distraction, and Rose knows she's won. "I am simply saying -"

A nibble. Just a little one, so that Rose can be certain her lips are smudged with grey as she tilts her head back to wait for an answer. "Go on?"

"I am saying that I will be here." Kanaya's breath skims over Rose's mouth - and then away again. "If you need me." The door opens, and Rose would tumble through if it were not for a very convenient claw curving around her waist. "That does not mean that a flushed flirtation is what is taking place here." The room is rather dark, and no move is made to locate a light switch or a fuse box as Kanaya quite determinedly marches forward. "Though I will admit, it could accidentally happen at any moment."

"Accidently?"

"Completely by chance," Kanaya says. "You shall have to persuade me further."

...Ah. "Shrewd, Ms Maryam, very shrewd." Rose gives in to the impulse, unlooping her arms and letting her hands slip up to catch and tangle in Kanaya's short hair. "You have earned my compliments," she murmurs, stroking until Kanaya's face tilts down for a proper kiss. "Then I shall have to use every tool of persuasion at my disposal."

---

The shit has hit the fan with such outstanding velocity that said fan has been knocked down a flight of stairs, sent crashing through the door in a burst of splintered wood, and has accidentally shoved an innocent bystander into oncoming traffic as an afterthought.

But is Dave paying attention to all these shitty shenanigans?

God, fuck no. He's only just recently accepted that he has a clone of himself with wings flying around who was actually an alternate version of himself in a past life - there is no way he's going to try to wrap his mind around the idea of Bro having a clone. Seriously, who the fuck thought that was a good idea? One planet isn't big enough for two Bros. Whoever decided clone spam was the answer to a question nobody in their right mind would ever ask needs some serious counseling. Or a straitjacket, judging by how incredibly fucked up and brainwashed these kids are.

God. He's so skeeved out right now. Just. Dave's just gonna...keep his distance. For like, ever. Mini-Bro seems totally on board with that plan, too, but that might be because he's convinced that if he turns his back on his boyfriend's unconscious body someone in the lab will knife them.

Which isn't even an issue anymore. Karkat's mob boss ditched the lab, apparently, so the chances of taking a knife to the kidney have plummeted.

Dave has research to do, dammit. He is surrounded by a bunch of assholes in various states of stress as they wait for the neurological department to get their shit together, and out of all of them, Dave's the one with the time to waste looking up the costs of exporting apple juice to Tokyo in bulk, spamming his bird-twin and his dipshit older bro/father/asshole incarnate with unanswered pesterings, and attempting to figure out what it means when your best bro is caught up in a troll romance.

In hindsight, Dave probably should have just paid attention to this kind of thing years ago. But Bro's idea of homeschooling involved puppets. Dave has repressed a lot of shit in his day (algebra is a haunting smudge on the shades of retrospection), but nothing has been buried so deep as his memory of the bird-puppets and the bee-puppets incident. For a guy who invented smuppets and has always acted like he had to strife his way past the legions of adoring fans to abscond from the club back in the day, Bro sure checked out an obscene amount of parenting books on how to give the talk instead of just ironically winging it, which might have at least given Dave some comedy material; the result turned out to be horrifyingly educational and yet somehow awkward beyond all hope of salvation.

Dave remembers none of it.

But if John isn't going to figure out his life choices, and Karkat is busy being basically the entire problem, then it's down to Dave as the last Strilonde in the building with half a fuck to give to try and counsel these dumbass mofos. Rose would be way more on top of this than Dave is - but Rose sprouts grimdark tentacles at odd moments and has recently picked up a clone of her mother that she and Kanaya are doting on like...like doting doters in one of the labs. And Jade's busy with research of her own, making a good faith effort to pull a Stark and become an expert in a previously unknown branch of brain-science-magic in a single spectacular one-nighter. She's also got some idea about hunting down the Wondering Querent/Queen lady to interrogate her about something-something-science-science-majjyks-WV-blah that Dave kind of just tunes out after a while and nods along with on autopilot because he's not the science guy, okay? He's not even the vaguely smart guy. He's just...the time guy, for what good it does him, and as cool as it is that Jade is excited about this, he doesn't understand a word of what she's saying.

So anyway. Rose's assigned reading homework on how not to be (too much of a) dick around the delicate soul that is Karkat 'I have cried actual legitimate tears over both Casablanca and X-Men: First Class and I will fight any shiptanned nookstain who dares to trash talk either of them.' Vantas has been helpful, but also most of it came straight out of psychology journals and dissertations, so Dave's like 120% sure at least three quarters of the material has performed an epic olly right over his head. But how hard can it be to just look up the basics of quadrants and figure out if it's acceptable for John to touch the butt or not while in the pale rhombus - oh god he's blogging again. How does this always happen. He doesn't even remember typing in the address bar, dammit.

Shitty memes. They are his weakness. His aesthetic is JPEG artifacts and Comic Sans chic, and it is just as ironic now as it was when he first designed it. He's particularly proud of SBAHJ, his magnum opus. If anything, Sweet Bro and Hella Jeff simply become more ironic the more outdated the comics become. Their archived potential, infinite. Their rich, typo-based sub-cognitive lexicon, infinitely nuanced.

Oh well. While he's logged onto this endless mecca of scrolling, he might as well see if anyone here can explain troll quadrants in short words and simple sentences. Or just romance in general. He's not too picky here. It's hard to tear himself away from the

And of course, given Dave's luck, the first post he comes across is a wannabe academic paper written by some guy with the caps lock key apparently shoved up where his spine used to be.

And oh god. Oh fucking Christ. The web browser's Alternian translator is jamming the fuck up and leaving everything backwards as all hell wherever this particular asshole decided to not translate into English. What a guy. What a real pal -

What a...really familiar...quirk…

Oh hell no.

TG: dude
TG: karbro
TG: wake up
CG: I'M NOT ASLEEP YOU BLITHERING ASS, I JUST HAVE BETTER THINGS TO DO WITH MY LIFE THAN REPLY TO YOUR DESPICABLE MESSAGESPAM WHEN WE'RE SUPPOSED TO BE CUTTING BACK ON PESTERCHUM.
CG: WHAT THE FUCK DO YOU WANT?
TG: you blog right
CG: WHAT DOES THAT HAVE TO DO WITH THE PRICE OF KUMQUATS IN NEW WESTMINSTER?
TG: you have a massive friggin boner for troll will smith right
CG: I AM PHYSIOLOGICALLY INCAPABLE OF HAVING A HUMAN BONER, JACKASS.
TG: metaphorically
TG: like an emotional boner
CG: I REFUSE TO DIGNIFY THAT WITH A RESPONSE.
CG: OH WAIT I WILL - GO FUCK YOURSELF.
TG: so thats a hell yeh on the will smith boner
TG: oh crap
CG: DO I WANT TO KNOW?
TG: probs not but im gonna tell you anyway
TG: blackmailmaterialoftheyear.jpeg
CG: HOW THE FUCK DID YOU FIND MY SIDE BLOG?!
CG: AND WHAT - WHAT THE FUCK IS THAT - DID YOU CHANGE ALL THE TEXT INTO COMIC SANS?
TG: we all suffer for our art
CG: THE SPECTACULAR BREADTH OF YOUR COMMITMENT TO THIS FARCE YOU CALL A LIFE IS TRULY BREATH TAKING. LITERALLY. I AM COMING TO THROTTLE YOU IN PERSON AS WE SPEAK.
TG: but no kismet fish right
CG: THIS IS A MERCY KILL BORN OF MY AMPLE RESERVES OF PLATONIC IRRITATION.
TG: wow thresh prince has a lot more love triangles than fresh prince CG: STOP READING MY SHIT.
TG: haha okay thats a love dodecahedron how are there even enough characters for that TG: ohhh shit is that hero spec i spy
CG: SOLLUXANDER CAPTOR GET YOUR ASS ON THIS THREAD RIGHT THE FUCK NOW.
-- twinArmageddons [TA] has joined the chat! --
TA: ii flagged that. now what the fuck diid ii tell you 2hiithead2 about me22a2ging each other all the tiime.
CG: HA, I'LL DO YOU ONE BETTER THAN THAT. DAVID HERE IS POSTING ON AN UNSECURED PUBLIC BLOGGING PLATFORM.
TG: karkat no
CG: KARKAT YES.
TA: yeah okay prepare two have your blog anniihiilated from the face of the planet, dumba22.
TA: al2o who the fuck 2aiid you could 2hout my name onliine and 2ummon me liike bad chainmaiil carciino?
CG: YOU'RE ALWAYS WATCHING.
TG: thats not creepy at all
TA: and wait a fucking minute how do you know my full name?
CG: REALLY? WAIT I WAS JUST GUESSING.
TG: holy shit
TG: i have to be honest solluxander is basically the best name i have ever heard TA: that'2 iit you both ju2t lo2t your pe2ter AND your blogging privilige2.
CG: HANG ON, CAN WE JUST TALK ABOUT THIS? LIKE HOW THE FUCK DO I EVEN KNOW YOUR - TA: no.
-- twinArmageddons [TA] blocked turntechGodhead [TG] from the chat! --
-- twinArmageddons [TA] blocked carcinoGeneticist [CG] from the chat! --

TA: you can me22age people againi eleven hour2 from now becau2e ii'm 2ure 2ome conveniient emergency wiill pop up that nece22itate2 remote communiiication funciiionality.
TA: eleven hour2 or however long iit take2 me two feel better about you people and your 2hiiitty Dave opens a message window to John and starts typing frantically. None of the messages will send, greying out and vanishing from the typing box no matter how many swear words he adds. Hell, he even tries changing his font color to Rose purple in a last ditch attempt to fool the block function, which is stupid as hell but he's desperate, here. When he goes back to his dashboard, the website loads as a blank page with the words 'go out2iide or 2omethiing' in puke yellow. Captor's final warning, apparently.

Well, shit.

Glumly, Dave sighs, and directs the rest of his research questions to Google.

Within a quarter of an hour, he has a plan.

TG: yo jade
TG: you seen rap board GG: i saw :(
GG: rip, rap board!
TG: what kind of stone cold mofo deletes an entire memos worth of chronically ailing beats like damn GG: oh well. we'll just have to rap more in person or something!
TG: whoa whoa slow your roll
TG: you think you're ready to throw down live and in person
GG: yeah, i think i'm getting pretty good!
GG: it's really not all that hard to just ramble nonsense rhymes about street cred and bling, dave ;/
TG: ...
TG: jade
GG: yes dave?
TG: you come into my house
GG: but we're not at your house. i'm at school still - TG: you insult my one true calling
GG: umm...
TG: on this the day of my egberts angry troll wedding
GG: what does that even mean? i thought we established no one was getting married!
GG: remember? mr egbert got really mad and threatened to ground us all until we were, like, thirty?
TG: like damn jade how could you
TG: this shits hells of serious like part of my family heritage and you diss it like that GG: dave? seriously, this isn't that big a deal...
TG: my family of literally me birdme bro and rose and momlondne
TG: the smallest most dysfunctional family of smoking hot pieces of ass ever ectoborn TG: rapping is our only outlet for all this mad dysfunction TG: and now this
TG: this is ten different kinds of profane jade GG: DAVE! >/;
TG: oh
TG: yeah what GG: ...you're really weird, you know that?
TG: oh its on
Dave forges his way through the hallways to John's last known location, his palms sweating with each aborted move to pick up his phone and start pestering the kid again. Seriously, he thinks he's developing some kind of anxiety issue, here. It only occurs to him as he inches the door open, squinting behind his shades into the room to make sure he's not accidentally walking in on anything, that he could just have texted the guy. Or hell, even called him. Pesterchum is not the be-all and end-all of messaging options. He considers mashing his face against the wall, but decides that would be counter-productive, seeing as how by some act of god the only person in the room is, in fact, the nerdlord he's been looking for.

Note to self - tell no one about this momentary lapse in brain function. No one.

"Dave!" John greets him, spraying crumbs around a mouthful of food. The lab has two kitchens in the building, but it's also hours away from any delivery place and inhabited by a skeleton crew of insane sciency workaholics, so the food choices are limited to wilted salad and sandwiches, essentially. With the way John and Jade can throw down at mealtimes, Dave's not really surprised to find John chowing down on a sandwich with three more waiting on the plate before him. "Karkat just went looking for you! He said something about murder but I think he's mostly just joking now."

"True. He hasn't legitimately tried to kill me in days. Guy's losing his touch." Dave sits down across from John and folds his hands in front of his face. "Jonathan."

John immediately swallows a bite of his sandwich the wrong way and winces. His incredible shiner, now fully swollen up and turning into a surreal mess of purple and green bruising around his eye, looks even worse now that they're indoors under artificial lighting. "Not the Gendo stare, Dave! Not with shades on!"

Ah, the pressure points of the consummate anime-loving weeb. "It wouldn't intimidate you if you weren't secretly anime trash, John. The unironic hero comics thing is bad enough; this is just sad."

"You watch Supernatural," John hisses. Like that's actually a comeback.

"Yes. Ironically."

John groans and pushes his paper plate aside to bury his head in his arms. "I really hope I'm there the day you realize all this irony stuff is just kind of dumb, and not actually cool," he says, muffled.

"Not possible. I already went through that crisis of faith, like, three years ago. Now whenever I doubt, I just blame it on my shitty childhood and pledge myself anew." Dave steals one of the sandwiches on the plate when his stomach rumbles a reminder that he didn't eat lunch earlier. The lettuce is withered and the whole thing is slathered with mustard, which means it's basically tailor-made to Dave's exacting specifications - namely, it's still edible. He's not picky here. "Anyway, man. I am here to solve all your butt romancing problems, so pay attention."

It takes a moment. Then what he just said hits him.

"...Goddammit."

"I think you need to be more specific. And hope Rose's Freudian senses didn't just start tingling,"
John manages to gasp out between snickers. He's almost collapsing into his plate, his sandwich falling away as he presses the back of his hand to his mouth in an effort to keep from decorating the room with his mouthful of food.

Dave scowls behind his shades, his lips flat as a plateau. "Yeah, yeah, yuk it up, Egbert. I'm not the one who wants to make out with his snugglebuddy because he has a perky rump." Secure in his superior razzing ability, Dave leans back in his seat and tilts his head back to try to swallow as much sandwich as he can in one bite.

This time, John chokes on his own spit, his face frozen in a mask of horror as his snickering cuts off. "Dave," he says, glancing across the room toward the open door so fast his neck makes a cracking sound. "Oh my GOD-"

Swallowing the dry bread takes forever; then Dave clears his throat and makes a show of checking the non-existent watch on his wrist while he checks his internal metronome. "Reports from future me give us six minutes before code name Furious Booty returns-"

"That is the worst code name ever."

Eh, he was bluffing anyway. He hasn't heard from a future him all this afternoon. Dave restricts himself to rolling his eyes and leaning forward again. "So do you wanna hear my ingenious plan or what? This isn't even an ironic plan, bro, this shit is hells of sincere."

Skepticism grafittis itself across John's face. The black eye doesn't help. "Preeetty sure I don't believe you," he says, rolling his eyes in return. "This is some totally convoluted plan that involves pissing Karkat off, doesn't it. I knew there had to be a reason he wouldn't tell me why he was ready to throw you over the side of the roof..."

"You blacken my good name, John. And I thought we were best bros." Dave shrugs, shaking his head sadly. "Aaand now I'm over it. Just listen."

John huffs. Rude. "Kay, I'm listening."

Hell yes. Dave allows himself a small smirk. "We're gonna get you a new drink of water, thirst prince."

John says nothing for five seconds. Dave can pinpoint the exact moment the kid gives up by the look he gives Dave. Brows knitted together, mouth slightly ajar, eyes squinting - the expression of someone who has completely given up all hope in the other person and is officially done. "...What the shit does that even mean?"

Dave claps John on the shoulder. "It means we get you a boyfriend, you obtuse triangle. One in the red quadrangle or the black one where you can grab butts without pissing into the wind."

When he finally replies, John's voice is doing something funny. "I'm pretty sure Karkat is my boyfriend," he says, sounding strangled, with that look in his eyes that says - Shit. "Whoa, yeah, like. Moirails. Pale boyfriends, whatever you call it," Dave says, scrambling a little, because he's pretty sure he almost just twisted John's poor head around into not quite remembering what life he's living. "But I've been doing research, man. Trolls always end up having, like, five people on call, that's basic polyamorous math. Either you get your shit together and tell him you want the booty, or we have to get you laid some other way." Dave pauses. "Or if it's like. Semantics at stake, here, there's always a girlfriend. Look, someone of some gender out there has got to appeal to you other than Vantas and by troll Jesus's left nipnop we are going to find them or so help me, I will tell Karkat myself."

John's jaw drops. "You wouldn't."

"No, I wouldn't," Dave agrees. John relaxes an inch.

What a trusting dweeb.

"I'd make Rose do it," he finishes, and John's horror transcends his previous grimace to achieve outright terror. "She used to write wizard fic, John. Do you really want her propositioning Karkles for you in all her purple-prosed glory? Shit would be downright lurid."

"No." John's eyes are distant, staring at some horrifying inner vision only he knows. "Dave, I used to beta-read that stuff for her. Dave, no."

Dave polishes off the sandwich in his hand, spreading his fingers wide when his hands are free. "Okay, awesome. Anyway, I figure either the sheer embarrassments of the online dating scene will terrify you into telling Karkat the truth, or we hit pay dirt and get you laid so it stops being an issue entirely." Then he points to the two sandwiches still on the plate to the side. "You gonna finish that?"

"Pretty sure it's not that simple, Dave." John looks down at the plate, turns an interesting shade of puce, and shoves the whole platter toward Dave's side of the table. "Take it, dude. I hope you get mustard on your suit."

"What's not that simple?"

Dave would laugh out loud at the look on John's face as Karkat stamps through the doorway, his hood up and his glasses on in full disguise mode as he scowls at Dave. "I should have known you'd turn up here after I leave," the troll says, sour as vinegar. He has his hands in his hoodie pouch as he throws himself into another rolling chair on the other side of the table, so at least he seems to have cooled off enough to not try to murder Dave on sight. Progress. "What stupidity is he vomiting now, John?"

"Uhhh. Um. Uhhhhhh..."

Truly, John is the soul of wit. Fuck it, Dave thinks, and he plucks a sandwich off the plate before sliding the last one at Karkat. "We're trying to get John laid. Thoughts?"

"DAVE!" John shouts. He actually looks like he might throw up - which, uh, Dave feels bad about. Maybe he shouldn't have dived straight into full asshole mode the moment Karkat waltzed in; if John starts having a panic attack or something because of him he might have to submit to Karkat's retaliatory murder attempt out of shame.

"Oh." Karkat, amazingly, wears nothing more than a vague frown of suspicion as he scowls at Dave. "I should have known you'd turn up here after I leave," the troll says, sour as vinegar. He has his hands in his hoodie pouch as he throws himself into another rolling chair on the other side of the table, so at least he seems to have cooled off enough to not try to murder Dave on sight. Progress. "What stupidity is he vomiting now, John?"

"Uhhh. Um. Uhuhhh..."

"Dave is just being a complete douchebag today, just ignore everything he says - what." John stops looking peaky and starts staring at Karkat like he's sprouted an extra horn. To be fair, Dave's probably sure he'd have the same look if he weren't repressing the hell out his facial expressions at the moment. He expected - shouting. Yeah, more shouting. Karkat being calm in the face of what should have been at least a mildly shocking announcement can only mean one thing -

"It's a Karkat clone," Dave says, utterly betrayed. "God dammit, not again. Not twice in one day."

Karkat's palm reaches out and cups John's cheek for an absent-minded pat even as the troll grimaces and shoves the sandwich plate away. "I'm not hungry enough to risk ingesting whatever shitpan-inducing drugs you're on, asshole," he says irritably. "Hush. Shoosh, John. It's alright, I have fucking mastered the art of ignoring everything Dave says."

What. Oh, hell no. "Lies. You have never once successfully ignored me. I'm too charming."

Karkat just rolls his dull burgundy eyes. "Watch me." He spins the chair around deliberately to focus on John. From what little Dave can see, the troll's grimace smooths out into something almost approaching fondness as he strokes John's shoulder. "I mean it, though. Not a single painthuffing cactusfuck at that school deserves you." The claws of Karkat's other hand dig into the arm of the chair a little, scratching absently in some kind of murdertroll reflex. "The only people who even came close to paying attention to you were those swimming morons, and they've all rotted their thinkpans on chlorine, so no, absolutely not."

Gobsmacked. Gobsmacked is the word for John's expression. Dave can't tell if it's a good gobsmacked or a bad gobsmacked. "...And you're okay with that?" he says weakly.

Karkat shrugs. "I'm your moirail. I get first culling rights on whatever shitty applicants for mutespritship Strider tries to foist on you." A pointed glare in Dave's direction proves that no, Karkat can't actually ignore him. Dave takes the opportunity to cross his eyes behind his shades, regardless of whether anyone can actually see it, to prove his superiority. "Honestly, you're a human on the far side of puberty. I'd be more worried if you weren't trying to find some kind of concupiscent partner by now."

"Oh my god," Dave says. This is even better than he could have hoped for - this is hilariously awful.
"I can't believe it. This is actually a conversation we're having."

"Feel free to disinvite yourself from it at any moment. The door's right there," Karkat says. Seriously, what a pal. "Why am I not surprised that you're as immature about mating instincts as a third-grade wriggler?"

John stares at Dave in raw panic. Dave mouths, 'just tell him,' because that's obviously the sensible solution to all of John's problems right now, up to and including the one where Karkat has no context for the fact that he might be stepping all over John's mushed up feels.

More blind panic. Oh lord. "Oh gosh, is that the time?" John says. His voice cracks and somehow hits a high C, and that is damn impressive. "Crap! We promised we'd help Kanaya and Rose watch the Scratch kids while they finished those tests, and be there when Doctor Lalonde wanted to start scanning herself and Dad!"

"Is it that late already?" Karkat says, but before he can so much as pull out his phone to check the time John has dragged him to his feet, making panicked noises as he hauls ass toward the door faster than Dave can say 'avoiding the issue.'

Never mind that Dave is the time guy, and thus well aware that they aren't due to check in with everyone else for ten minutes or so. Hey, if John wants to keep making this a bigger deal than it needs to be, that's his right. Dave's put in his ten cents.

Humming internally, he frowns as the grating whir surges in volume, and lays off the internal music as he saunters after the runaway dork squad. It's reached the point that the ongoing [ɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯɯᵢ game noises, he might as well hunt down Jade and get her input, or something.

He's gonna figure out what this weird fraymotif is if it's the last thing he does.

---

John keeps hearing weird sounds. He considers mentioning this to Dave - it would be really easy, since Dave's not going anywhere, just loping along behind John and Karkat through the halls.

[Thunk thunk]

…But also Dave can suck an entire bag of dicks! John is seriously considering the silent treatment for this one, and nothing gets to Dave more than being ignored! He so deserves it after springing this sudden incomprehensibly asshole move on John without any warning - or at least, not enough of a warning. Geez louise, but Dave can be a total dick sometimes…

[I would go on about this, but even though he's not directly relevant to the main story, I can't help but say that I love the way that Dave is portrayed. He's got a lot of layers to his character, and I think it's really interesting the way that he and John interact with each other.]

I mean, okay, he might have a point about how John should really, really talk to Karkat at some point about their relationship. That is indeed a thing that should happen. Rose has been pressing him about it, too, but she's been distracted for the most part by her ongoing quest to assure everyone (but particularly Kanaya) that she's not about to relapse again, so it hasn't been as bad as it could be given her knack for sniffing out all of John's weaknesses.

But there just hasn't been a good moment for it, and John does not appreciate having this whole mess sprung on him. And now - he cringes inwardly - Karkat seems blithely alright with thinking John wants to get another boyfriend. Or a girlfriend. Or a - dammit, why did Dave have to make this a thing!

[oooh ooo ooo ooo]

All John wants is to curl up in a corner and let Karkat pat the blistering headache out of his temples while the troll mutters angrily about the latest travesty DC has inflicted on the world of comics. Karkat's really good at that. Because Karkat is awesome. And John in no way wants to replace him at all.

Not that he'd be replacing Karkat, though, because in this weird mixed up scenario Dave's come up with in his asshole brain, John would end up dating two people at once. And yeah, trolls do that all the time, but trolls can date, like, five people at once and that's normal!

...Which means that at some point Karkat might do that. On account of he and John are in one quadrant, which leaves three more. Four squares in a quadrants, IF THERE WERE FIVE, THEY'D BE CALLED QUINTDRANTS, basic math. Duh.

He doesn't know how to feel about that, either.

Oh man. He's a mess. Maybe his brain's just tired after a long day of fighting crime when he was mentally prepped for a nice normal school day. Like - he's even gone over these kind of thoughts in the past, and he knows he's fine with Karkat looking for, like, a kismesis or something. Because a guy as angry as Karkat's gotta end up hating someone in a non-platonic way eventually, and John would never want to be hated by Karkat. Ever. Even in a romantic rival/eternal death match kind of way.

Maybe he's just selfish. Because the way these thoughts are going, it feels more and more like John just wants Karkat all to himself. Not even for butt-touching, just...the thought of Karkat loving someone else hurts.

Oh. Oh no. John's a fucking awful person. Oh, fuck.

His mood sinks accordingly as the realization settles over him like a smothering blanket. Worse than sinks, actually - John closes his eyes for a moment, and imagines he can almost see the dam in the back of his mind leaking, a sludgy puddle for his mood to roll around in like a dumb dog. Forget curling up in a corner for a couple hours; at this rate he's just gonna get swamped with all the gross, mucky stuff festering back there, and not even Karkat gonna be able to make a dent in this.

John must slow down a little in the middle of his charge down the hallway, because his grip on Karkat's hoodie sleeve loosens and claws brush the palm of his hand, squeezing gently when John struggles to yank himself out of the angst fest playing piñata with his brain. He pastes on a good smile for Karkat as he looks up, smacking himself internally for not paying attention while he's walking around in a still-kind of-unfamiliar setting. The shuffle of feet and subvocalized mutters behind them is Dave, duh, because now that Dave can talk again he can't seem to shut up, but it could just as well have turned out to be, like Spades Slick or something like that, about to stab them both for no reason!

Karkat greets John's grin with a skeptical frown, bordering on outright exasperation, which means he's not very fooled at all. Oops. "What's wrong, you dope? First you're dragging me along like a hopbeast on crack, and now you look like you're about to be sick," he says, in as quiet a voice as Karkat ever manages, casting a furtive look over his shoulder to scowl at Dave. "What did he fucking do?"

John glances back. Dave raises his eyebrow at both of them, a silent 'come at me bruh,' and John hurriedly cranks his head around to face forward. "Nothing!" John scrambles to fit words together into coherent sentences. "I just - can we sit down and do the talking thing, today? Not right now, I guess 'cause we probably don't have time, but I really need to -" He can't finish it; maybe because he's not even sure if he could finish with tell you something in good conscience. The risk that he'll just be a dumb butt and avoid the whole thing again is too high.

Karkat's eyes snap back to John, dull burgundy and startled, and then he presses John's hand again, the startled look fading into something downright soft. "You just have to ask. Obviously," he mutters, the pad of his thumb claw brushing over John's hand before he laces their fingers together. "We'll find all those mattresses and fucking well lock the door, this time."

...John's brain could interpret that in so many different ways. Luckily, this time, he's too busy staving off the burgeoning wave of depression to waste brain power on innuendo. "I don't that would stop Jade if she were really determined," he tries to joke, but Karkat just sets his jaw, grimly determined, and John gets the feeling that if Jade tried to break in on a feelings jam in the foreseeable future she'd end up fleeing in terror. He's not sure how Karkat would do it. But it would happen.

Urgh. John just really hopes all these scans and rituals go well, nobody has any brainthingies in their head, and they can all go back to the Lalondes' house. That would be a dream come true, right there! He's not too worried about how his dad's or Doctor Lalonde's scan will go because come on, think about who he's talking about, here! His money's on this brainwashed Crew secret agent either turning out to be one of Doctor Lalonde's scientists - which will totally suck, yeah, but would make sense - or that no one but the Scratch kids are actually brainwashed at all. Roxy and Dirk seem nice and all - Roxy more so than Dirk, really - but John just harbors what he feels is a healthy ongoing suspicion about people of whom his first impression was that of weirdo super villains. For all they know, the idea of a sleeper agent could just be another thing the Scratches were forced to believe. He thinks he knows how Kanaya feels when she plays the skeptic card, now!

The air warns John ahead of time, a faint disturbance as Dave blinks in and out of time to flashstep on John's other side, slapping him on the back with enthusiasm "So, do you have a shortlist yet?" he drawls, smirking, as Karkat's head jerks up to snarl at him. "Knowing Karkat's tight ass, it's gonna be a damn short list."

"Dave!" John protests, feeling his face turn the color of a tomato. "Cut it out!"

"Nah, bro."

"And here we behold the rare and much despised jackass in its native environment - right where it's not wanted," Karkat says, with the air of someone narrating a wildlife show on Animal Planet. "I wonder what he will do next?! Punch himself in the fat pursed lips until he falls unconscious? Smear shit all over himself in an attempt to lure in a mate? Try out a new style of cheesy women's sunglasses to see how far he can go in his ill-fated quest to resemble human Ben Stiller?"

"Hey, wearing these shades renders me instantly cool. Way cooler than Ben Stiller." Dave sniffs.

"I don't know, Dave," John says, eking out a laugh that doesn't sound half bad. "Stiller was pretty good in Mystery Men as Mr Furious, so he might still beat you in a contest of ironic hero coolness."

Dave just looks pained, pressing his fingers to the bridge of the shades so they dig into his nose. "Dude, no one has even heard of that movie. Do you know why? Because it was mediocre as hell."

"I've heard of it," Karkat replies, rolling his eyes.

"You don't count. Neither of you count. Our giant sky progenitor wept the day she gave birth to you two. Here she is, down on her luck and with hella bills to pay, and she gets saddled with these two mouths to feed and all they want in life is comics and shitty movies while the roof's leaking goddamn meteors everywhere -"

"You've heard of it," John feels the need to point out.

Dave doesn't miss a beat. "Yeah, well, financially disadvantaged sky mom wept tears of joy about me. I emerged from the ecto-womb a smoking hot badass - clearly I was meant to go the distance in spite - or perhaps because of - my crippling devotion to irony."

…

"Maybe if we just treated him like the mass hallucination he is, we could get on with our lives," Karkat muses aloud, after a long moment of staring blankly ahead in complete disgust.

"Nice try, Karkat, but he's still, somehow, one of my best friends." John sighs heavily. "Somehow."

Dave slings his arm around John's neck, dragging him down so that John almost stumbles as Dave grinds his knuckles against the top of John's scalp. "Doubt the stars' sick ass fires, doubt that the sun has sweet moves, doubt truth is a broke hooker in a seedy motel counting her ones - but never doubt we're bros."

"That's it -" Karkat says, voice tight but volume rising, and John hastily twists around in Dave's grip to grab Karkat by the shoulders and hold him off before he can try to kick Dave's ass. "Just let me hurt him a little, god fucking dammit -"

"No," John says firmly, and he ducks his head under Dave's headlock to put more space between the two of them before Dave can open his mouth and start rapping or something. Then John does a double take at their surroundings, and realizes they've passed his dad's borrowed office already without him noticing, too caught up in these two dumb assholes and their shenanigans. "Argh! You two, stop fighting while I get my dad. If I can't leave you alone for five minutes without you trying to hate make out or something -"

Karkat makes a noise remarkably similar to that made by an angry deer getting messily run over by a freight train, while Dave pulls away and fakes a gag. "Have fun with the Dadbert," Dave says, and he starts making tracks down the hallway, an ill-disguised abscond in double time.

"Do me a favor and never insinuate that kind of fuckery again," Karkat adds, face crinkled up with horror. "I think I need to scourge my thinkpan with bleach or something, eurgh."

"Yeah, yeah - I'll stop when you two stop trying to play feuding matchmakers." John pats Karkat's shoulders one last time, and turns to head two doors back the way they'd come to get back to the office.

"Want me to come with you?" Karkat asks, looking reluctant as he eyeballs the door. He still seems to view Dad as a kind of threatening human lusus that could turn territorial any second, but John figures that's just weird troll shit. He doesn't know what's up with all the rest of his friends being so intimidated by his dad, either, though. John doesn't always get along with the guy, but he's baffled by all this unwarranted apprehension! His dad is a cool guy! Not as cool as Bro, no, but Bro trades-off by being an even larger bag of dicks than Dave, so who cares.

"Nah, Dad'll probably want to give me a lecture and get a report on the fight today before he has to get strapped into a weird magic ritual pentacle. Stuff like that always gets him bothered because he doesn't like being out of commission." John wrinkles up his nose exaggeratedly, and waves at Karkat over his shoulder. "I'll be right there! Go talk to Kanaya and Rose, if you want to be their friend so bad!"

"Friendship is a disease, John," the troll yells back, waving a casual, affectionate middle finger back at him before shuffling off in Dave's wake. "I'd rather not expose myself to it with Strider still in a hundred mile radius."

"Bluh, bluh!" John wonders how his two of his best friends both turned out to be such belligerent douchebags, and then discards the thought because he probably wouldn't like the answer, anyway. Instead he knocks on the door of the office and turns the handle almost without pausing to wait for the 'come in' that follows right on the heels of the knock. Well, with all the noise Karkat makes, it would have been hard not to hear John approaching.

John's already fixing a rueful half-grin on his face by the time he looks over at his dad sitting behind the desk. He just hopes his bruised up eye doesn't ruin the impression! "Hey, Dad. You ready for this? It's so crazy, right?" Another forced laugh that doesn't sound half-bad, and John heads over to stand at some semblance of attention on the far side of the desk. Looking over at the half of a whiteboard that juts out of the wall to his left inspires a little more humor, because it just looks ridiculous! If Jade had done it on purpose it would have been a great prank! Even now, it's still hilarious.

Or maybe he pulls it off better than he thinks - lately (since Jade showed up, really) he's vacillated between being pretty okay at remembering his manners and being respectful about how he treats his dad - and being a total flake. Karkat called him out on it before it could get too bad, which is probably above and beyond the duty owed by one moirail to another, but still, John feels pretty awful about it. So for once his heels are firmly planted on the ground, and he twists his internal control on the wind up a notch until it cuts out all the rippling whorls and twining tugs that it's taken to wrapping around him all the time, lately. The air feels weirdly still without that reassuring flutter beneath the hood of his borrowed hoodie, but hey, it's felt odd for days now, with all this weird weather Washington's been having, and the oddball pocket of stillness the newscasters have noticed around Seattle.
"John," his dad says in greeting, and it's his tone of voice that makes John yank his lowered gaze up to blink at him. There are deeper shadows under Samuel's eyes than John remembers there being not even a couple of hours ago, and upon closer inspection John sees that his dad's PDA phone thingy is...not his usual PDA phone thingy. Huh. He's sure he would remember his dad buying a new phone - but no, when John scans the mostly empty desk, he spies the old grey PDA lying right there, perfectly straightened to sit parallel to the edge of the desk as usual. "I've been catching up with some of my contacts," Samuel says when he notices John's confusion. "One contact, really. Apparently, they've been making a concerted effort to minimize their online presence, but our time has run out regardless."
"Huh. That sucks," John comments, lacing his fingers behind his back and kicking back on his heels.
He needs something to distract himself from the weird mood in this room, and regardless of his current shitty dumb bad mood, moving helps keep his brain occupied. A little. Then a thought occurs to him. "Are you worried that they might be at risk, too, like Doctor Lalonde's people?" he asks, his heart thumping a little. His dad's contacts have been instrumental to John's hero work over the years different people scattered around the country who Samuel knew and trusted from his military career and his current office job network, who help by pulling criminal records from police stations, setting up proxies for sensitive information or online orders for costume materials, and faking certain medical records for when John's weird body prevents him from going to a doctor's office for injuries that would heal too quickly to be explained. If one of them has been compromised all this time, it could even put a real dent in John's and his dad's exit strategy, but also explain how Diamonds Droog caught on to his identity with so little warning...
"No, that's not a concern," his dad says, dismissing John's concern with a curt shake of his head. He pushes out his chair and stands, still with that odd black phone in hand. It's starting to look more familiar the longer John stares at it in puzzlement, but he can't place why when he's so certain his dad's always used his PDA for all his work things. "However, it will be most convenient for us to make our escape here and now, while Ms Harley is quite effectively hemmed in."
John feels...caught on the wrong foot. "...Say again?" he says, wetting his lips as his mouth goes kind of dry. "What - does Jade have to do with - escaping? From what?"
Samuel pinches the bridge of his nose, and the smile on his face doesn't match the considering look in his eyes; as though he's gauging John's likely response to whatever comes next. But John doesn't understand why they're suddenly talking about this when his dad agreed they'd stick around a lot longer! "No, you won't be amenable anymore, will you?" Samuel sighs, his eyes flicking away from John's in a dismissive manner that leaves John cold. "You've deviated further and further from the parameters since the moment you met that troll. I should have known better than to let you develop such attachments."
"Dad? You're kind of not making sense." John can't really put a finger on why he feels queasy.
Maybe it's the weird stuff his dad is saying; maybe it's the way Samuel sails past him without sparing him a second glance to halt before the exit and lock the door with a faint click Or maybe it's still just that droning, grating sound that has lodged itself in his ears, half moan and half scream, in a [ɯɯɯɯɯɯɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹɹooooooooʇʇʇʇʇʇʇʇʇ] of noise that makes everything Samuel says sound like it's coming from a million miles away.


"John, we really need to talk about -"

-

---

From: Samuel Egbert <pipefan413@skaia.net>
To: [redacted] <address unknown>
Subject: Compromised

[redacted],

Lalonde has given orders for all in the facility to be examined for mental abnormalities utilizing both physical and magical apparatuses, including myself. Attempting to excuse myself and TR-0413 from the proceedings will no doubt be seen as an admission of guilt. Permission to activate the asset and retreat to base?

Regards,

Samuel Egbert

---

From: [redacted] <address unknown>
To: Samuel Egbert <pipefan413@skaia.net>
Subject: Re: Compromised

Samuel,

Permission granted - but do not return to base. Make your way to safe house designation M113 at the attached scrambled coordinates and await further direction. Both you and TR-0413 will require review before you are cleared for the current situation at base.

Yours,

Robin Marlowe

-

"- your loyalties," Samuel finishes.

Oh god. His head hurts.

[ .getParam ]

John rams his hip into the corner of the desk in the process of swaying forward, his fingers numb and clumsy as he reaches up to press his hand to his upper lip. His other hand grips the edge of the desk, but his strength feels like its draining away. He opens his mouth on reflex to gasp in a breath of air, and the blood cascading from his nose runs into the gap to smear across his teeth and into the hollow beneath his tongue. It trickling down the back of his throat, too; he has to swallow before he chokes on it.

"No need to wipe this session. We won't be returning on terms conducive to infiltration any time in the near future." John can't tell which throbs louder in his ears, his handler's voice or -

[  paramName ]

Handler?
"- hurts," he gasps out, pushing off from the desk and lurching - away from Samuel, just away, even though that takes him further from the only door out of the room. Something’s wrong, or horribly right, and there's a third sound clamoring for his attention, like the echo of cackling laughter that has started to override even the drone of -

[ ιΔι ]

It's not enough anymore. He can pinpoint the exact moment the old fraymotif is drowned out, buried beneath the realization he can no longer deny.

_It was Dad. It was always him._

"Yes, yes, you've said," Samuel says, and the callous disregard is just another blow that rocks John's frame, sending him reeling against the wall, tilting his head forward in some desperate attempt to prop himself up. His cheek presses up on the cool of the wall and he forces his eyes back open - when did they close? - to see his bent elbow, his hand fanned out to the side blood from his nose leaving tracks all along the white surface.

Oh god.

_Oh god._

TR: not anymore! :B

TR: my turn, my turn!

"The transition wouldn't be so abrupt if you hadn't involved yourself in this farce of a moirallegiance, really." A heavy hand thumps down on his shoulder and John can't even react; he should - do something, he _knows_ all the self-defense moves he'd need to push away from the wall and fight his way to the door; he can outfight his handler, has been able to for years. "I'd thought, when the Seer left...but no. Too many conflicting chemicals for nearly two years, now." A tsk. "Do I need to use a stronger trigger?"

"No." John pulls his face away from the wall, but his first attempt - to smash his head back and hope to catch Samuel in the nose - aborts before it even begins, as his heads dizzies and dazes and his vision gets sucked into staring at the garish mask of bloody marks he's left on the wall where his face was. He blinks again. Only this time does he note the stickiness on his eyelashes, the way that his fingers come away too-dark a red when he wipes at the corner of his eye.

His head feels so light. So much blood loss, so fast - he needs to come up with something else before he can't even stay conscious…

The wind. Why did John turn it off, why did he _do that_ -

TR: mine mine mine! it's all mine now!

Because he always does. He's been suppressing the wind for years at his handler's command, keeping it so tightly under control in the house and on patrol that he can't even recall the last time it spoke to him with words. No matter how it begged and pleaded, wrenched him away from danger and offered to whisk him away to Rose, he would never leave his dad, never, why would it even _ask_ that of him -

Easier to just ignore it and ground himself. Even when the panicked instinct to bolt reaches a breaking point, he always comes back, didn't he?
Always...

His stomach can't even turn. The queasiness no longer registers, really; it feels like just a regular sensation, like everything from the ache in his joints and the bright, stabbing pulses of pain deep in his brain has somehow merged into a regular state of being.

It would be so easy to just shut down.

His handler makes it easy. John can't remember sagging and falling back against the wall, facing out toward the room, but a pair of hands frame his face to tip it up to the light. Samuel's frown is one more of irritation than concern, and that's more wrong than anything else about this moment. "John. Shutdown and inversion protocol. We need to go."

He shakes his head. "Nngh." Rosekarkatdavejaderosekarkatdavejaderosekarkarkarkar -

The fingers dig into the sides of his face, and the laughter roars in John's ears. "Shut. Down."

It is far easier, he thinks as the levee breaks and darkness swallows him whole, to follow orders than to try to disobey. How did RL-2408 manage it all these years?

"Invert."

(The screaming is unbearable.

Madness is, as always, the emergency exit.)

---

TR: hoohoohoo hooHOOHOOHOO! :B
TR: why
TR: aren't
TR: you
TR: LAUGHING?!

Jade paces. This is some intense pacing, too. All the better to show she's not fooling around, here! She's borrowed a lab coat just for the occasion - she kinda forgot her last clean one back in the middle of Seattle, so really! Just borrowing! She needs that daring awesome scientist adventurer look for maximum authority in an important meeting like this one! So what if the coat's a little baggy? It kicks out behind her when she gets enough momentum going, and that's all that matters in life.

When she feels she's properly set the mood by cultivating an air of SERIOUS BUSINESS, Jade spins to face the only other person in the room. It's a good spin, too. Her coattails get lots of mad air, as Dave would say!

She clears her throat, and begins. "I'd just like to start," she says, "by apologizing for our rudeness the other day! We left, but no one could figure out where you were, so we didn't say goodbye, and that was sucky of us."

The other inclines her head, the faintest of dips, in acknowledgement. Good start! Jade starts pacing again; the twistiness of the space around her really is a hassle, because she can't get a clear idea of what's going on in the rooms beyond this, so she has no idea how things are going with the Scratch kids. The not-knowing makes her pout inwardly. "But with that said, I'm still gonna ask a big favor of you, if that's alright," she continues, biting her lip momentarily before mentally smacking herself over the head with a newspaper kind for acting undignified. She needs to make a good impression here; these are negotiations, after all, no matter how informal their surroundings. Especially because of their surroundings - at least on some level, she really needs to make up for the fact that the best meeting room she could find on short notice was one of the few disused labs that doesn't show signs of having been torn apart by certain carapacians in a stupid dumb blood feud sex fest.

Yeesh. What a pair of oversexed, inconsiderate assholes.

"It's just - I am so tired of having an incomplete picture of what we're dealing with, here! I can't take it anymore!" Jade says, trying to get to the point in a timely manner. She stops in front of the table with great effort, reeling her feet back under her before she can launch into another round, because it occurs to her that pacing a lot might not actually be appropriate when the other person is seated, regal as anything in spite of the humble quality of her hood and robes. It might just make you look really nervous. Or douchebaggy. "My grandpa's files gave me some idea of what to expect about the game, and they were pretty accurate - to a point. And the records on the Hub have been even better."

If a little messed up and painful to watch, she adds, but only in the privacy of her own mind. Tact! Tact is key! "But it's not enough. Too much has changed. Grandpa always thought I'd end up dreaming of Prospit, and learning a lot of what I needed to know from watching the clouds...but that's never happened!" She sighs. "So...I know most things you've said are true. More true than what we'd get out of the Black Queen, anyway!" She sticks out her tongue. But tastefully, to better illustrate her point! "And out of everyone here, you're the one who's an expert in basically all the topics I have extremely pressing questions about that need answering, pronto."

She hesitates. Then she steels herself, breathing out, and leans forward, resting both palms flat on the table, and allows just the briefest hint of a sweet, cajoling grin to flare across her face. "So! Is it alright if we talk?"

And she waits.

Across the table, the White Queen raises her claws and folds back her hood so that the smooth surface of her shell gleams under the harsh light.

WQ: All you ever had to do was ask, my dreamer.

WQ: What do you wish to know?

"Great! Uh!" Jade fumbles for a moment, all of her questions having chosen right now to fly right out of her head. Urrgh... Start with the basics, and branch out from there. "So. The Hub, and all those recordings - how reliable would you say it is, generally? How accurate is it?"

The Queen blinks, her ink black eyes placid as she signs in smooth motions.

WQ: But these are not ordinary circumstances.

Jade waits. But the carapacian meets her gaze and doesn't say a word more. As though she's waiting on Jade to -

...Right. Game construct. At this rate, Jade might as well just be choosing what she says from on-screen dialogue options! "What are the circumstances, then?" Jade asks, folding her arms. "What changed so that the recording was damaged or disrupted or whatever?"

The Queen responds promptly, a smooth flow of words and intonations that diffuses through Jade's thoughts like white ink on black paper. There's power beneath its smooth gloss, a reverberation that thrums just beneath the level of Jade's hearing. As the conversation goes on, she can't help but feel more and more like a little kid again, sitting cross legged and watching with wide eyes as her Grandpa told her a story or demonstrated how to reload a flintlock. If the Black Queen lurks and crackles with barely-muted menace, her opposing piece appears no more harmless than the sleek crust of snow on a mountainside drift - before an avalanche.

WQ: When two game sessions overlap, there is always a measure of fallibility in the records. In this case, many of the records concerning the very end of your session may well have been logged under that of the troll game, which is beyond my power to access.

That's still weird. Weird and arbitrary. But then, so are most things about this game. "I'm sensing a 'but,' here."

WQ: But when the most Noble Circle of Horroterrorrrrrrrrrs invests itself so much into not one but two sessions, particularly a session with a player of Rage and a player of Void...the matter complicates itself. Both of those aspects affect the viewport: Rage through distortion, Void through obscuration. Games that involve even one of these players tend to suffer from blackouts and extremely convoluted plot twists that the Hub struggles to keep pace with. Games with both, and the involvement of the Furthest Ring? Are next to impossible to codify.

WQ: So - what you are able to view was most likely accurate. But it is, perhaps, what you are not able to view that poses the greatest potential threat.

"So basically, we're hooped on that front, 'cause we don't know the ending." Jade sighs. "Is there anything you can tell me about the game we're playing right now? How will the fact that two sessions got all cosmically mushed together affect it? Surely something like that's gotta have consequences!"

WQ: There have been consequences. But you consider them regular facts of life. The coexistence of humans and trolls on one planet, for example, has altered human history and current social norms deeply, and while the trolls survive in the absence of their own planet and history, there is no denying the fact that their culture has been almost completely subsumed by your own. All of this seems normal to you.

Oh. Awkward. Jade scrubs at the back of her head, wishing she had not-twist access to her sylladex so she could grab a hair brush or something. Then she recalls that she's trying to be a professional, and slaps her hand back down onto the table, trying her best to radiate innocence. "Well, that sucks. And the game? I know a lot of the others don't want it to happen at all" - she pulls a face - "because they think they can save everyone on the planet if we just don't play. But that..." She sobers. "That won't work, will it? No matter what we do..."

She trails off. For one thing, she's been trying to resolve herself to accept the imminent death-by-meteor-bombardment of everybody on the planet Earth for - well, her whole life! Or whenever it was Grandpa first sat her down and solemnly imparted the information to her. So she's kind of just coasted over it emotionally; when the apocalypse does happen, she can deal with the emotional fall out after the game is played, and not a jot sooner! There's just too much at stake.

But for another, she doubts that the White Queen, of all people, will legitimately sympathize with her about the dilemma of knowing billions of people are doomed to die. An alien creature who has witnessed countless civilizations die over the eons of Skaia's iterations...probably just wouldn't see a mass extinction event as all that big of a deal.

True to form, the Queen doesn't even take the half-hearted bait. She just confirms what Jade already knows.

WQ: The game will play itself out. This alone I hold to be an immutable fact, which I am comfortable stating for the record.

"Yeah, that's kinda the impression I got."

WQ: But it is already riddled with glitches and paradoxes, inconsistencies and stultiloquence that render it nigh on impossible to complete.

WQ: The scratch of the game session should have reset you all to your pre-god tier states. But you have emerged from this mire of contradictions already gods, with your memories and powers in a state of flux. This should not be.

WQ: That is part of why my sister-queen and I went to such lengths as we could to seek you out, once we became aware of your existence. She plots and she schemes, as is her wont, but she has no more wish to see these numerous glitches reach fruition than I do. If you all are to rise to the challenge before you, we cannot afford to sit idly by.

WQ: So. We will help.

Jade has to walk everywhere in this dumb-yet-awesome lab. It still takes getting used to. She floats along on occasion, and can sometimes find her sylladex dimension - but then the twistiness of the void wards will get into her powers all sneaky like, and she'll miss a step, or pull a spare shoe out of the sylladex in place of the notebook she meant to reach for. Doctor Lalonde has apologized for all the inconvenience, actually, but Jade gets it. This is the method the Lalondes have been using to hide themselves from Doc Scratch's all-seeing eyes for ages, and it's a pretty darn effective technique, from what she's seen!

But she can see why her none of her Grandpa's labs were shielded this way. A transportalizer would probably fritz out in minutes if you tried to set one up to teleport through all this shielding. Even poor Bec is napping again, down for the count within minutes of entering the valley.

She's got a lot tossing around in her mind by the time she trudges allll the way from her meeting with the White Queen to the makeshift waiting room between the hallway and the neurology department. A lot of the medical research wards are set up kind of like hospitals, but since this place has been decommissioned for so long, Jade has come across many rooms that have been repurposed by the small on-site staff just because they're closer to the main hallway. Judging by the number of filing cabinets that line the far wall of the neurology waiting room, someone's been using the extra space to keep their papers closer to their workspace.

It's efficient, if nothing else, she thinks as she shoves through the door and skips over to the hastily-improvised circle of chairs that occupies the center of the room. Karkat limps/stalks in a circle he seems to have marked out for himself in the corner, looking vaguely aggravated when he glowers at her entrance but not quite on the verge of a meltdown; Jade's gotten pretty darn good at picking up when Karkat's about to faceplant over the line from general disgruntlement to outright fury, and he's not there yet! For now, he just returns to his obviously very significant pacing, glancing at his phone sporadically with his jaw working nonstop. Dave, meanwhile, slouches over two chairs, his new shades (where does he even keep all those without a sylladex?) glinting as he inspects a single gear-shaped turntable rotating slowly over his lap.

It looks exactly like the kind of cool equipment he had in the game, and that's so fascinating that he's figuring out how to use those powers again! But before she interrogates him about the science-y stuff - "Where's John?" she asks, bouncing in her seat as she shrugs off the oversized lab coat to drape inside out over the seatback. She's down to just her body suit again, but who ever cares if they're all gonna get stuck in the MRI machine in an hour or so, anyway?

"Stuck listening to the fatherly lectures of the Dadbert," Dave says, thumbs darting over his phone screen with a practiced expression of boredom. "Seriously, I'm no longer surprised that kid has such a paranoia complex about his secret identity. The man's protocol hard-on is goddamn insane."

"Ohhh. What about Rose and Kanaya?"

A non-committal shrug. "Got me. Old Lalonde came in looking for them and got all pissy when she only got yours truly, so apparently they split like bananas before me and Karkles got here." Dave shakes his head, and spins the turntable a couple inches counterclockwise. "It's like rabbits, I swear to god." He tilts his head to the side, and raps his knuckles against the grooved black surface of the record. "Huh."

"God fucking dammit, will you stop fiddling with that thing?!" Karkat complains from his corner, and Jade looks over to see that the troll has altered his trajectory so that he's now rounding the circle of chairs, the Lalonde Labs logo of his hoodie cut in two by a crease in the printed fabric. "Why isn't John back yet?"

Dave taps at his phone some more, stoic on the surface, but Jade's at the right angle to see him roll his eyes like dice as he deliberately spins the turntable again with a desultory flick. "Oh yeah, Jade - and if you look to your left, Karkat's just stupefying everyone around him in his latest attempt to showcase the world's shortest separation anxiety fuse. What else is new?"

Jade can't help it; she smothers a giggle but doesn't succeed all the way, so that a choked off snerk escapes her. "Aww, don't be mean, Dave."

"It's not funny, Harley." Karkat reaches up to tear at his hair in frustration and ohhh no, there's the clack of sharp troll teeth as a clicking growl starts to edge into his voice. Maybe Jade needs to work on her Karkat-fury gauge, because it's clearly not up to snuff when John's removed from the equation. "Wow, that was fast! Prolonged exposure to the two of you is giving me a migraine. And by prolonged, I mean it's literally only been two seconds. A new record."

"Wow, rude!" Jade spits back, sticking out her tongue when Karkat next faces them. "One of these days, someone really needs to sit you down and catch you up on how manners work, buddy!"

"You're just pissed because you didn't have backup pants," Dave says. "You remember to pack your fancy ass contact lenses but not pants? 'S fucked up, man."

"Shut up. I would have been more prepared, but we were supposed to dump these shitstains off with the police and go home, not prance off to the mountains for 'mandatory brain scans,'" Karkat says, his scowl dark as storm clouds as he makes air quotes with his claws. "Look at this. Look at what I'm reduced to. Air claws, I swear to fuck - why is John not here yet?!"

"I'm sure he and his dad'll be here any sec," Jade points out, rolling her eyes at Dave in commiseration.

"I saw that!"
"Good!" Jade flops around to sit backwards on the chair, pushing with her toes so she and the chair lean back, the chair on two legs. "Ugh, guess what? It gives me a headache when you're pissy, so we're even! Stop complaining so much!"

"Whoa, sames," Dave chimes in, setting his phone down on top of the turntable so he can twine around in the far chair and sling his arm over the seat back to stare at Karkat mercilessly. "It's like we're connected."

"Congratulations," Karkat replies, looking utterly disgusted with life. "The king fucktruck trophy goes to you, Dave. You've earned it."

"I would like to thank my parents and also Jesus for inspiring me to reach for the stars and to always follow my dreams." Dave presses a hand to his chest, solemn. "But I would be nothing without my partner in Kat-baiting, Jade, so we'll have to get her name engraved on there, too."

"That's Harley with an 'h,'" Jade adds.

"Auuugggh!" Karkat flips both of them off soundly, but instead of lunging at them in some kind of murder attempt he spins on his heel and marches toward the door to the main hallway. Which, hey, is way better than how he would have reacted not a week ago! He flings said door open with enough force to set it rattling, still muttering to himself in a low shout about finding John.

Then he screeches to a halt. "Oh, you're fucking joking!" he says, his back still to the two of them as he stares at something in the hallway. "Just - get out of my way, you bilgesucking ascrumpt! You" - Karkat's head whips around and he snarls, jamming a claw at Dave - "Get yourself out of my way!"

Dave jerks upright, his feet swinging down from his secondary chair. "Whoa, wait. What?"

"Tell you to move!" Karkat clenches his claws into fists as he swings out of the way of the door frame, then flares them out in a Vanna White sweep to frame -

A second Dave. "Sup," he says, raising a hand in greeting.

- "And what's up with this, anyway?!" Jade finds herself growling a little with frustration, and she swallows hard, trying to smooth it out of her voice before continuing. "You and the Black Queen...you're capable of making decisions for yourselves. You have conscious thought, you act of your own accord - so what's up with the NPC routine? You could have told someone all of this stuff ages ago - heck, you could have just explained everything to our guardians and called it a day! Why all this rigmarole and acting like you can only share information when we specifically ask about it? You're more than that!"

WQ: ...It is difficult to say. You may as well ask yourself why you breathe. It's simply a part of how we function.

WQ: I will admit that of late I have...ruminated on the subject. My people have never before settled a planet with the pre-existing civilization still alive, and we carapacians have all be forced to grow and adapt, perhaps in ways that paradox space never intended when our role in the game was first conceived.

WQ: A good number, when the time comes, will no doubt allow their new independence to fall away and take up their roles without question. But - what do you know of the Creed of the Worthy Villein?
"I think I've heard of it?" Jade mulls it over for a few minutes, and the White Queen says nothing all the while. "It's some kind of minor religious philosophy, isn't it? I don't think I heard much about it after I hit the Mediterranean heading west." Something nags at her, in the back of her mind - someone had mentioned...urgh... "Maybe someone mentioned it once in South America? But it seems like it only pops up in isolated clusters."

WQ: South America? I'd not heard of many of my people journeying there. Ah, well.

WQ: More and more, among the carapacians of the mountains and the deserts and the taiga, Prospitians and Dersites alike have begun to put aside their differences and garb themselves in wrappings of brown and grey. Ordinarily, such behavior occurs only in the immediate aftermath of the Reckoning, as they wander what remains of the host planet and begin to rebuild civilization in a vacuum. And soon enough their cooperation ends, as they revert to their old nature.

WQ: But these followers of the Villein seem determined to foreswear their allegiances to royalty permanently. They still praise the players as gods, but they do not want to wage war in the names of their sovereigns. It is a measure of free will I had not thought the cloned ranks capable of.

WQ: They are...changing. We Queens bear no rings, and my King has laid aside his scepter in the capital. In the absence of royalty, they preach self-determination and democracy.

WQ: It's all very strange.

Jade blinks.

And slowly raises her hand, like one of the kids in John's lame high school.

WQ: ...Yes?

Jade closes her eyes, head cocking a little to the side as she thinks, and then shakes her head and opens her eyes with a laugh. "Say, how common are the initials WV? Because it's so weird that you mention the Worthy Villein - I've only ever heard it called the Creed of the Villein, usually, so -"

She trails off.

The Queen stares back, unblinking - until she coughs, awkwardly, and tries to cover it up by clearing her throat mentally. She also stops meeting Jade's eyes, which is incredibly suspicious...

WQ: Er.

WQ: About that.

Jade needs to sit down. "It's...really uncommon, isn't it," she says, blindly patting around to her right until she finds a stool to drag under her butt. "Ohhh boy..."

WQ: ...

WQ: Not so much uncommon as...unique.

"Pleeease tell me you're not saying what I think you're saying. Pretty please?"

WQ: Honestly, we'd been wondering where the little fellow ran off to. Derse had no records of his ectobiological profile being cloned, but he tends to just show up regardless -

This is how Jade finally comes to the realization that yes, WV is, in fact, the inspiration for a minor alien cult of democracy.
And she left him alone in Rose's house! Yikes!

- "Huh. That is a me." The Dave sitting by Jade scratches the side of his head, lips pursed ever so slightly. "Go figure." Shrugging with only one shoulder, he settles back down against the chair. "Whatever, me, let him through so he can have his ragefit in angry, angry peace. Also -" Dave pauses, and rubs at his shades with the sleeve of one hand, sitting up again more slowly. "Oh holy shit, what the hell are we wearing?"

Yeah - Jade's kind of noticing it, too.

This other Dave isn't in a suit or anything. He's in really familiar red pajamas, buckles and straps crisscrossing the front of his torso with a brilliant crimson gear emblazoned across the front. The collar that allows him to speak has been painted a bright, pale blue, but the weird contrasting note in a theme of reds sits tucked mostly within the messy folds where the cape (!!!) bunches up around his neck.

The important thing here is, he has a really sweet cape!

"Hey, you figure out the god tier jammies!" Jade exclaims delightedly, batting at Dave's foot because it's the nearest thing she can reach. "That's so cool!"

"It's news to me, man," Dave says, reaching a hand up to scrape at his own collar - maybe unconsciously, because his hand blinks back down to his side a second later, his face twitching from side to side as though checking to see if anyone caught him at it. "Yo, future-me, what up?"

"Out of the way!" Karkat interrupts before the future-Dave can respond, a little bit of spit flying from his mouth as he starts to hit his shouting stride. "I've got -"

"- a lab full of idiots, a severe lack of pants, and a thinkpan full of jolly mechanical monkeys ceaselessly clapping into the empty space where the off-switch on your anger should have been installed," the other Dave finishes for him, stepping into the waiting room. "Yeah, yeah, heard it all before."

Karkat's jaw snaps shut. "Th-that is not what I was going to say, fuckwad," he retorts, clearly unsettled to Jade's eyes but not willing to say so.

"No, but it's what I remember saying, so suck on that raging boner of temporal inevitability." Before Karkat can suck in a breath and start screeching at the top of his lungs - he's got his crazy eyes on - the new Dave holds up both hands and grimaces, shaking his head. "Look, I'm just working my way through start to end, trying to catch up on all the loops I left hanging around, so I'm just gonna say my piece and haul ass out of here, because we're running out of time -"

"What is it? Is something wrong?" Jade starts reaching for her sylladex in consternation, feeling it twist and dance out of the reach of her fingers at the last moment, so that she just barely taps the side of the gun she's aiming for. Darn it, she shouldn't have captchalogged them all… "If it's bad enough that you came back to give us a warning, it must be terrible!"

"Understatement of the goddamn year, Jade."

"So tell yourself what no doubt asinine thing you have to report! But first let me through before I bury you ten miles beneath the earth's crust in the process of running you down!" Karkat hisses, kicking at future Dave's shins with his black boot. "Out - of my - way -"
"Nah, you have to stay here a little longer. Trust me, it's really fucking important," the second Dave says, removing his shades to rub at his eyes, "that you stay here for five more fucking minutes. If you go see John too early, the body count for today just kind of does this thing where it hits the double digits and includes basically everyone in this stupid goddamn piece of shit lab who's too close to ground zero."

And then he hooks his shades over the fancy collar of his cape and stands there, looking exhausted and not at all like he just mentioned people dying.

Karkat's next kick misses and he nearly trips over his own feet into the wall, eyes bulging. "What?!

"People are dying? Who's dying?" Jade demands, rocketing up onto her knees in the chair and then swearing internally when the gun ducks out of her reach again, so she has to yank on the fabric of space to try and get the sylladex to behave. "Ohhhh my god, Dave, stop being a dumb stupid cagey moron and spit it out? Where do we have to be?"

"Right here," the future Dave says flat out, nostrils flaring. He slaps a hand against the side of the doorframe so that his arm almost clotheslines Karkat across the throat when he tries to lunge for the exit. "I mean it. If you guys run in there half-cocked too early it just gets worse."

"That...makes zero fucking sense," Dave says. He's out of his seat before one blink and the next, the turntable rotating around him in a lazy circle as he confronts the other Dave, shoulders hunched. "Run the whole thing by me again. On account of you haven't explained jackshit."

"It will," the other Dave says. "God, it'll make sense in five minutes, and I'm pissed as hell we can't do anything. But the thing you've gotta know - the only fucking useful thing I remember telling me - you have to get Lalonde out of the way. We can't lose her this early." He hesitates, and presses at his eyes with his fingers again, an open gesture of exhaustion. "And it doesn't kill you, when it would totally kill her. Fuck, you'll see what I mean. You just...you need to get that we couldn't stop this. That. Fuck. If we went and dicked around with what happens next, we just set ourselves up for a massive time paradox. And this universe eats paradoxes and every doomed bastard stupid enough to get locked into them for breakfast."

Then his gaze flies to Jade and pins her in place. "Jade. Ever read Harry Potter?"

"Everyone's read Harry Potter," Jade replies, exasperated. Alright, she's out of here, and the void shielding can get all bent out of shape as much as it wants because she is finding John so he can help with getting everyone to safety right now. "Oh, forget this, I'm go-"

"Splinching. That is all." Future Dave's lips twist down. "Seriously, do not do what you're thinking about doing. And Karkat -"

He sweeps Karkat into a hug.

Jade feels the critical moment at which her leaning tips the chair past the balance point, and the whole thing topples to the ground with a crash, the borrowed lab coat crumpled up against the tile floor. She, however, stays floating, frozen in place more out of bewilderment than any conscious effort. She's pretty sure the high pitched scream that quickly muffles itself is the current Dave, who has both hands clapped to his mouth in terror and looks like he might need to sit down or something.

She can't see much of Karkat's face with the future Dave's cape getting everywhere, but judging by the twitch of his single visible eye, he's about to lose it. One of his claws rises up, maybe to claw off Dave's ear or something, but the troll just seems too utterly thrown to figure out whether he's angry or horrified.
"Is this irony?" she asks the regular Dave in an undertone.

"Oh my god," he says, horrorstruck.

"Self-defense 101," the possibly-not-real-Dave says, oblivious to his own now-obvious lunacy. "Dude, someone grabs you from the front, knee them in the family jewels. From behind, smash them in the nose with your tiny angry horns."

"Are you - lecturing me?!" Karkat shrieks, finding his voice at last. "You - I'll - eeeeeaaaaAAGGGHIIIIHHH!" He thrashes around, but it's mostly ineffectual flailing with his arms flopping around like noodles.

"And Jade." The Dave nods at her as he claps Karkat on the back bracingly. Karkat doesn't seem to approve. "Counting on you - play this right, and nobody dies today. So go and wreck his shit."

...She can do that. Whoever 'he' is, anyway. Jade nods back, because maybe, just maybe, it'll make the weird shenanigans stop.

"Then I'm outtie. Don't worry about the bodies, they aren't the real you anymore. I'm the alpha you, and I'm obviously not dead yet. Plus, they tend to disappear after a couple hours anyway." And on that jarring note, the other Dave releases Karkat and steps back to click his fingers, summon a pair of floating turntables, and vanish into thin air.

Jade finally just puts her feet on the ground. Too much of her mind needs to be rerouted to processing what just happened; she doesn't need to deal with the headache of the void wards pressing down on her.

"Okay," the normal Dave says, staring at the empty air where his evil future self used to stand, "what the actual fuck just happened. Anyone? Anyone at all? Just - feel free to toss some suggestions out there, guys. Because I've got nothing. Any thoughts?" After another pause - "Bodies?"

"I think I'm going to get John right the fuck now before you pull any more of this pseudo-ironic bullshit!" Karkat yells at the top of his lungs, whirling on Dave with his face twisted into something ugly. He opens his mouth, then almost bites through his own lip as he closes it to shove the closing door open again and race out into the hallway so fast his boots screech on the tile, and he has to push off the wall opposite when he nearly rams into it to turn.

The door to neurology opens just as Jade grabs the still baffled current Dave by the shoulder to drag him along - or maybe to make him speed her up like he did Kanaya earlier, she's not sure because it's happening too fast - and Doctor Lalonde stares at the two of them, nonplussed. "What on earth is happening out here? We could hear Karkat shouting from the operation theater. Are you all fighting again because really, dears -"

Jade makes a split-second decision, and nearly knocks Dave over as she sprints back to grab Doctor Lalonde by the hand and pull her out into the hallway, too. "No time to explain you might be in danger so just stay behind us okay okay let's go let's go!" she babbles without pause, picking up the pace once they're in the open hallway so fast that there's an audible crack as the heel of Doctor Lalonde's spindly shoe splinters. To her credit the doctor slips out of the shoes midstep without breaking her stride, clamping down on Jade's hand in what Jade almost thinks might be a reassuring squeeze. On her other side, Dave vanishes and abruptly reappears three feet ahead - six - nine - as he flashsteps after Karkat as the troll seizes the handle of a door to better throw himself around the next corner.

For a wild moment, Jade's not even sure where they're going or how Karkat knows to go there - until... her brain shoves the answer at her in a mangled mash of deductions, all of them screaming that something's wrong.

The first confirmation she gets is when she nearly slams into Dave, who stops in a crouch over top of something right in the middle of the hallway. "Dave, don't stop!" she yells, desperately trying to swallow around the peach-sized lump that has lodged itself in her throat. Breathing feels so difficult, like trying to gulp down air and having nothing fill your lungs. Her body feels too tight, crunched in one place by this stupid stupid awful void shielding, all her atoms vibrating so hard she thinks that's half the reason she's broken out into a sweat that clings to her like the sharp stink of fear.

Wrong wrong wrong, and why is there nothing to breathe -?

Dave looks up, and then down the hallway, and Jade can feel him start shaking. "Holy shit. Holy shit, oh fucking shit."

It's around then Jade realizes that the thing Dave's crouched over is his own body.

A pretty dead body, too, the neck twisted all the way around at a stomach-tilting angle. What's worse is, when Jade looks where Dave's looking, there's three more like them scattered around the corridor. All of them in the same ripped up suit that Dave's wearing right at this exact moment, all of them doing their best impressions of corpses - and succeeding. Jade thinks she would throw up, but she hasn't eaten in hours and if she hurls now she might not have any breath left in her lungs by the time she stops heaving -

Breath -

"Dave," Rue Lalonde says, dropping Jade's hand and reaching out to touch Dave's shoulder's with fingers that don't quite disguise their own minute tremble. "David, sweetheart -"

"Just go," Dave gasps, shrugging her off and flinching as he prods the corpse-Dave's cheek with a glancing finger. He looks closer to throwing up than Jade feels. "Catch up with Karkat - aw man, what the hell is this...Go, just go."

"He said it wasn't really you," Jade throws in, plucking the thin thread of hope out of the whirlwind in her mind of what the future Dave (the very alive future Dave) had added just before he vanished into the depths of time. "He said he was you."

"Go." He says it through gritted teeth, and Jade isn't entirely sure how she stumbles around him when all she wants to do is grab him and hug him; she almost falls as she makes her legs run again, and loses track of whether Doctor Lalonde follows as she forces herself to look away from another Dave with his lungs - just all over the walls, oh god... Footsteps echo weirdly behind her in the hallway, and Jade spares enough of a glance over her shoulder to catch a glimpse of bobbing blonde Lalonde hair but where are Rose and Kanaya or anybody else in this stupid lab, for that matter?

Gun. She needs a gun. Whatever's been killing Daves could show up at any moment. With that in mind, Jade mentally stomps her foot and pulls the first gun to come to hand - and it's her backup tranq gun, the really oversized one she saves for giant rogue marine lusii and the like because the anesthetic formula is designed to take down big animals with expansive circulatory systems hard and fast.

Well. Good. Anyone who hurts Dave deserves to sleep for a week. The thought carves through the suffocating fog in Jade's swirling mind and sharpens her focus. She tears her eyes away from another dead Dave to home in on Karkat, who has reached the door where Samuel Egbert has his backup office and is aiming violent sidekicks at the apparently locked door. "John!" he yells, lowering his foot to slam both hands up against the door. "Mr Egbert, open the door!"

Spoilers? They don't open the door.

"Hands off, Karkat," Jade hollers, dropping the gun with a clatter to raise both hands. Her voice must emulate Grandpa's no-nonsense command voice well enough to fool even Karkat in a fit of mind-numbing panic, because he rips his claws away from the door (maybe just to turn and scream at her, but no one will ever know).

Jade wraps her senses around the door as best she can, and just rips.

Her ears pop as the pressure on her spikes, and Jade blinks through watering eyes to see that - at the very least - the door has vanished. She can't feel where she tossed it though. If it turns out anything like the whiteboard incident, she'll just cross her fingers and pray she didn't just bisect a human being instead of a wall.

"John!" Karkat takes advantage of the open doorway instantly, rushing into the office while Jade's still jogging to catch up. She raises her fingers to one ear, and pulls them away red with blood. If anything, the heaviness in the air just constricts further, even though she's not trying any space-y things anymore, and she's just as breathless as before.

She reaches the doorway and pivots, expecting the worst. She's not sure what the worst is, yet, but the mounting dread that Dave's future counterpart inspired, and that Karkat's frantic, seemingly groundless panic has only added to, makes her heart pulse painfully, thready and yet too fast at the same time.

Mr Egbert stands by the desk, a pillar of white in a central location that draws Jade's eye right away; he's calm as anything as he blinks quizzically at Jade. "Ah, Ms Harley," he says, with a fond smile. He reaches up to adjust his hat on his head, his icy blue eyes crinkled up at the corners in a way that reads like genuine happiness. "I should have known you wouldn't be far behind. Looks like this won't be the quick break I'd hoped for!" He moves his hands down to check his tie next, though he's as unrumpled and perfectly dressed as ever - it's something Jade has always thought was an obscure fatherly art form of some kind, ever since she met him, and she can't put her finger quite on why it unsettles her now.

Maybe it has something to do with the weird unreality of the moment - the Daves lying in the hallway - the weird way Samuel's hand sweeps into the folds of his suit jacket - the fact that John sits sprawled out against the wall opposite, head low and blood oozing from his nose in sluggish trails to drip all over the front of his lab brand hoodie as Karkat kneels beside him, hanging onto John's shoulders for dear life and shaking him -

The whole tableau reminds Jade of nothing more than a scene that would have made much more sense just a few days back, when John's amnesia kept whapping him upside the head and leaving him disoriented and bleeding from the nose. But she'd thought he'd gotten past that!

Samuel switches his gaze to something just over Jade's shoulder while she's still standing there frozen. "Ah. There you are, RL-2408. You've caused no end of trouble with this, you know." He clucks with his tongue, shaking his head.

Pulling a gun out of his jacket seems almost like a casual afterthought to him. "Well, at least I can neutralize one rogue asset," he says, wistful as he raises the pistol and fires at Jade, his eye almost winking as he aims in one effortless second. As tense as she is, the so familiar rapport of a firearm makes her flinch, dropping to the ground in a crouch to dodge on reflex.
But no (a belated realization) it was not at Jade, that trajectory's -

"No!" Jade shouts, raising her hands. She can't risk moving the person - Roxy?! - behind her in all this void but she can stop the bullet, right?

Her other eardrum pops at the worst possible moment as the pressure crushes down around her. Her eyes aren't just watering; tears stream freely down her cheeks from the hot spike of pain singing between her eardrums, and she turns in a clumsy arc, still crouched, ramming one shoulder into the doorframe, just in time to catch a glimpse of Roxy's face before Dave shoves the girl to the side. "Dave!" Jade says, too loud, but she can barely hear herself with the state she's in, so who even cares.

Roxy and Dave manage to stay upright, though Roxy yelps when Dave's foot goes wrong and jams against her toes. "Ow, fuck," Dave mutters. He's almost too quiet; Jade strains to hear as he peels himself away from the Scratch kid, his shades barely hanging onto the tip of his nose. He pats at the front of his suit, his eyebrows knitted together in an emotion so obvious Jade thinks he's too perplexed to conceal it as he touches a spot just over his where his liver would be.

"That son of a fuck," Dave says, holding up his hand and waving it incredulously. There's blood all over it. "The Dadbert shot me. That is f*cked up." And with that, his eyes rolls back in his skull, and he crumples. Roxy shouts and just manages to catch him under the arms, staggering under Dave's weight as she trades horrified glances with Jade.

"But he was foxy," the Scratch kid whispers.

"Really, now, was that necessary?" she hears Samuel say, through the bubbles of blood in her ears. He follows it with another deep sigh. "Children."

"You shot Dave," Jade repeats, turning just enough to stare at the man. As if it needs repeating!

Samuel shrugs. "Attempting to shoot you, of course, would merely be an exercise in futility," he comments, dipping a nod to Jade as though his acknowledgement is something she'd want, and he just kind of -

Lets his hand drop, back and to the side -

To point at the back of Karkat's head.

Jade is making a habit of punching people through things.

It's a really, really good habit. Really satisfying; works off some of that unfiltered, swelling devastation and betrayal by channeling it into something productive.

But in Samuel Egbert's case, it's not controlled enough to be called a punch. At the same time, with her space powers twisting and writhing to work under all the shielding, it's not strong enough for her to just toss him with the force of her will alone.

Then she's on Samuel, shoving him through the desk rather than over it as she latches onto the hand that holds the pistol kind and digging her fingernails into the flesh of his thumb. Shreds of plastic cut into her waist as she propels him through the desk, and green fire roils along her outstretched arms as her vision tunnels and she rips again.

She's aiming for the pistol.
She kind of takes a huge chunk of Samuel Egbert's hand with it. The green fire cauterizes instantly, leaving nothing but seared scars along what remains of the man's ring and pinky finger. Who even knows where the gun ends up.

She'll throw up about that, later, too. She pencils it in mentally, in a fit of hysterical whimsy, to come right after she finishes vomiting about the dead Daves in the hallway, and right before she has a crying fit about the fact that it was Dad, it was John's dad all this time and she trusted him -

Mostly, Jade just remembers screaming a lot. If there's a single coherent word in her shrieking fury - well, she can't hear much of anything.

(From the awed looks and weirdly sycophantic respect Karkat grants her later on, it must be pretty darn profane.)

Samuel grunts and brings his hands up to try to block her at last, just as they finish ploughing through the desk and slam into the wall opposite the open doorway. Jade's space powers might waver in and out, but she's still got her strength - the same strength as John (did he shoot John too?) - so the wall concaves behind Samuel's back, and Jade's still screaming into his face, her hair rising up limned with electric green to wrap around his throat.

He coughs and splutters, maybe to try to say something stern and fatherly as the remaining fingers on each hand curl around the strands of hair to try to rip them away, and Jade is one hundred and twenty percent over this guy!

She drops him. Well, alright, she kind of throws him, away from John and Karkat, before she can just - oooh! She's so angry! She hasn't been this angry ever.

But even still - she can't go around killing people. Least of all John's evil, bad guy dad.

He'd never forgive her for it. She'd never forgive herself for it. So instead Jade stalks over to the man, a visceral pleasure rising tight in her chest at the sight of his awesome suit rumpled beyond hope of salvaging, no matter how strong the starch or hot the iron. He pants, looking up at her, his hair a messy thatch now that his hat's fallen somewhere between here and the desk.

Jade can only imagine what she looks like, at that moment. But he smiles at her, calm and sincere and bemused, and she sobs as she punches him across the face, leaving him unconscious and sagging against the wall just like he left John.

Oh crap, John. "John, is he - Karkat, is John alright?" Jade asks, turning her back on the unconscious body. Her throat seizes up and she coughs on nothing as she makes her feet carry her back over to where Karkat has his fingers pressed to the underside of John's jaw, mashed against a pulse point.

"He's alive," Karkat replies, his voice hoarser than Jade's. "He just won't wake up."

For emphasis, Karkat rocks John with a frantic shake, and Jade nearly crashes to the floor as the pressure in her battered ears makes her vision white out with pain. When it clears her knees ache and she's just barely managed to float herself so that her head didn't hit the ground. "What was that?" she gasps. "I'm not doing that, I wasn't even using my powers!"

Karkat doesn't seem to have noticed it - or maybe, Jade thinks, blearily looking up at the side of the troll's face, he's just healing too fast and to frantically to notice the tiny trickle of blood that spills over the shell of his ear...and then just as quickly reverses its course, disappearing back into his ear canal to presumably seal over his own perforated ear drums. "John?" he is saying, raw hope in his voice, and his face looks weirdly young as he almost smiles. "John, you stupid fucking diamond of my eye,
"wake up."

"Mrrrglh?" John croaks, and Jade's heart leaps at the sound. "Krkat?"

"We need to get him and Dave to the doctors," Jade says, letting her head sink back down to her hands, knuckling at her forehead as the relief runs her ragged. Inspecting the floor seems really soothing right now, since the tile presents itself between her fingers and it's just so convenient. "And - urrrh, my head," she adds, biting her lip.

"Right," Karkat agrees. Without even arguing. Gosh, he must be really distracted. Or maybe, miracle of miracles, his instinct to take care of John really does override even his usual instinct to argue with Jade about every little thing.

Wow. He must really love him!

Jade lifts her head again, still wheezing for breath. "John, how are you?" she asks, massaging her sternum with a grimace. "Can you walk?" She wouldn't trust herself to float anyone anywhere in the labs, right now, and they're already gonna have to rush Dave to whatever counts as an emergency ward in this dumb science place. Jade's not even sure they have a regular surgeon on staff - but no, there has to be one, the person who stitched literally everyone up after Spades's casual attempt at a minor massacre. Dave'll be fine. They'll just find - whoever that was.

"John?" Karkat repeats when John doesn't answer Jade, darting in to press a chaste kiss to the side of John's head. "Come on, stay with me. How are you feeling?"

Finally, John shakes his head, slowly, and raises a hand to rub across his face. He still doesn't say a word, his head falling to the side as he pulls the hand away to inspect the blood from his nose smeared slick all over the hoodie's sleeve and his palm.

Then he raises his head the rest of the way, and lets it loll around to look at both Jade and Karkat, a wide, sickle of a grin splitting his face.

- and oh, oh, Jade realizes dimly, he's not okay.

"I feel," he says, blood streaming from the corners of his eyes, one of them so swelled shut that the blood has stuck his eyelashes together in stringy red webs, "...just peachy!"

His smile twitches wider as he adds, "Did you hurt my dad, Jade? That wasn't very nice of you!"

And he closes his hand into a fist.

If Jade thought she couldn't breathe before, she was so wrong. This is not being able to breathe. There's nothing there to breathe, and she raises her hands to scrabble at her chest, her mouth straining in a total absence of air, trying to gulp down something that's not there. She can't see, black swarming over her eyes as the asphyxiation hits her all at once.

Air filters back into her lungs with a rush, and Jade sucks it down greedily, her head a bright, tense swirl as she collapses in stages back against part of the desk. She looks to Karkat first because what if John lost it on him, too, but the troll looks fine, shaken but staring at her without showing any signs of having suffered the same localized vacuum. Then he turns his stare back to the human at his side.

Where, oddly enough, there's a tranq dart sticking out of John's neck, his jugular perfectly exposed by the way he turned himself to grin at Jade. His head flops over to crunch against Karkat's chest before the troll stops the fall, and from this angle Jade can see the whites of John's eyes as unconsciousness settles in.
That...was a great shot. Jade sets an arm out to hold herself up, and her muscles stutter and protest but she twists around to look at the doorway.

Roxy lets the tranquilizer gun fall out of her hands, and raises her hands in mute surrender.

"Awesome shot," Jade coughs, shooting the girl a messed up amalgamation of a thumbs up and a finger pistol.

Then unconsciousness hits her over the head like a hammer.

-

There is a hundred mile stretch between the northern Cascades and downtown Seattle that has been enduring an unusual dry spell. While the rest of the state and much of the West coast has been wracked by furious storms, local meteorologists have more than once commented on the odd quiescent area. The cloud cover, thick and ominously grey, hangs heavy over the region, still and stagnant, but does not erupt into the anticipated storm for so long that they begin to report it as just a fluke of pressure systems.

Doctor Rue Lalonde flinches at the first, throbbing BOOM that rocks through the air and crashes through her bones. Her child, her son, cringes as well, their hands meshed together over the sluggishly bleeding bullet wound to apply pressure, and when she shudders at the sudden shriek of the wind at last rising to a gale outside, she can feel another pulse of too-warm blood oozing out between their fingers. She's already called for help, for anyone not occupied by assisting in major brain surgery a few hallways down to hurry up and bring everything they have on hand to treat this. God, why did she leave Arika back in Maine? Exarchopoulos is good for minor surgery and stitching up shallow stab wounds, but xe hasn't practiced in a functioning ICU in years. All she can tell herself to quell the rising panic, as hail and rain begins to thunder down on the roof over head like a rockslide, is that she only hires the best. Exarchopoulos wouldn't be here if xe weren't one of the best, and if Rue has to pull on nurses' scrubs and assist xe herself, so be it -

"John," Dave gasps, one of his hands clutching at the sleeve of Rue's white coat and leaving bloody fingerprints in a ring around her wrist. "Oh fuck. John, no."

"It'll be alright." Rue tries not to think about the hallway full of impossible bodies behind her, about the way a girl with her face just fired a tranquilizer at someone Rue can't see from here, too preoccupied with not letting her son die. She wishes, desperately, that this were only some lucid dream. She is a scientist, and she has always believed in the physical evidence placed before her, but the mounting pileup looming in the periphery of her vision is something that she wants, with all her heart, to disbelieve.

"M not sure it ever was alright," Dave says, shaking his head.

And she does not have the words to comfort him.

---

Olympia, Washington

The weather as they've trundled northward has gotten steadily worse. Gusts of wind rip away the breath before it can reach your lungs, and roiling, bruised green and black clouds with lightning-filled bellies burst into rain and hail at the drop of a hat.

For Tavros, it's unreal to see the sky pour so much rain that the streets drown in it, and more than once he's had to tug on Gamzee's wrist and motion for the purpleblood to wheel him into the shelter of a covered garage or an overpass. People - the ones still driving their cars in this kind of aguacero - slow down while motoring through the deep trenches of water that lap against the sides of buildings, but the tires still kick up enough of a splash to soak Tavros and Gamzee con frecuencia.

Gamzee, Tavros knows now, isn't much bothered by weather - or at least, if Tavros weren't here, the loco guy would probably just push on through the storm without caring that the rain has sluiced away his face paints and left his clothes and sneakers a water logged, sloppy mess. The grey and white paints have stained the ragged collar of his latest 'borrowed' black shirt with a permanent crust, the yellows of his eyes glittering a muddy orange that sends more than one passerby scurrying back out into the rain.

Because that's the thing. Gamzee's getting worse. And Tavros isn't sure how to stop it.

The purpleblood's been brittle and restless basically since he first showed up on Tavros's doorstep, playing up the persona of a chill, benign clown for a while before bursting out into unpredictable fits of homicidal mania. Which at least keeps Tavros on his toes! Or, well, on his wheels, he guesses. It's not an ideal situation but herding Gamzee away from his latest attempt at prowling after some innocent bystander at least helps Tavros feel useful. He isn't sure what Gamzee would do if he managed to get these people alone in a dark alley - but he's seen the troll beat people bloody and ravage their minds mercilessly with chucklevoodoos, so he likes to think he has a pretty good idea. If good is even the word for it.

Unfortunately, playing the herdmaster to Gamzee's malabarista desquiciado seems less and less like it's working. More often, now, Gamzee'll snap his teeth together in a fanged glower instead of backing down sheepishly when Tavros fumbles through the inglés needed to make their apologies to the latest person backed into a corner; the grating rattle that underlies his voice, that warning, rolling growl of a feral troll, rumbles under his words to the point that he's unintelligible a lot of the time.

Tavros's meek offers to jam - regardless of their lack of any kind of pile, which they can't really fix, being mostly homeless at the moment - barely earns him a grunt in response. All he'll talk about, when they do jam, is this next troll. After the total mess that was Gamzee's run-in with the equally loco Eridan guy, Tavros thought that maybe the disappointment would knock some more sense into Gamzee's pan than Tavros has succeeded in doing these past few weeks. But no - if anything, Eridan's refusal to join them has left Gamzee more agitated than ever. He's not sleeping; not that he ever slept much to begin with, but Tavros strains to keep up with the insane pace and hours Gamzee keeps. Some nights he'll fall asleep, rocking to the tread of this newest stolen wheelchair, and wake the next morning disoriented by the dark clouds overhead into thinking it's still night time, jolted all the while by Gamzee's wavering strides.

Gamzee is determined to reach this Karkat, no matter how thin he wears himself in the attempt. And if Karkat's anywhere near as, uh, angry as that Eridan guy, Tavros isn't sure what will happen...

But for now, Tavros still has some control over the situation. Um, he thinks he does, anyway. Probablemente. And luckily Gamzee ran out of energy last night after pushing Tavros most of the way through Oregón, and acted mostly sleepy and agreeable when Tavros begged for them to stay in a shelter to recover for the night. He had to handle most of the talking with the woman behind the desk, which kind of is the opposite of a thing Tavros is good at, but because of all the rain this place was already pretty busy and they got hurried through the check in without too many people getting a peek at Gamzee's eyes. Never mind that he'd stand out just for being a coldblood in a shelter full of humans and warmbloods; one close look and the security guard at the door would have las autoridades on the phone before you could say 'violent dementia.' Gamzee proceeds to collapse in a jumble of long limbs on his cot for almost eighteen hours straight, his sleep punctuated by muffled

The purpleblood's been brittle and restless basically since he first showed up on Tavros's doorstep, playing up the persona of a chill, benign clown for a while before bursting out into unpredictable fits of homicidal mania. Which at least keeps Tavros on his toes! Or, well, on his wheels, he guesses. It's not an ideal situation but herding Gamzee away from his latest attempt at prowling after some innocent bystander at least helps Tavros feel useful. He isn't sure what Gamzee would do if he managed to get these people alone in a dark alley - but he's seen the troll beat people bloody and ravage their minds mercilessly with chucklevoodoos, so he likes to think he has a pretty good idea. If good is even the word for it.

Unfortunately, playing the herdmaster to Gamzee's malabarista desquiciado seems less and less like it's working. More often, now, Gamzee'll snap his teeth together in a fanged glower instead of backing down sheepishly when Tavros fumbles through the inglés needed to make their apologies to the latest person backed into a corner; the grating rattle that underlies his voice, that warning, rolling growl of a feral troll, rumbles under his words to the point that he's unintelligible a lot of the time.

Tavros's meek offers to jam - regardless of their lack of any kind of pile, which they can't really fix, being mostly homeless at the moment - barely earns him a grunt in response. All he'll talk about, when they do jam, is this next troll. After the total mess that was Gamzee's run-in with the equally loco Eridan guy, Tavros thought that maybe the disappointment would knock some more sense into Gamzee's pan than Tavros has succeeded in doing these past few weeks. But no - if anything, Eridan's refusal to join them has left Gamzee more agitated than ever. He's not sleeping; not that he ever slept much to begin with, but Tavros strains to keep up with the insane pace and hours Gamzee keeps. Some nights he'll fall asleep, rocking to the tread of this newest stolen wheelchair, and wake the next morning disoriented by the dark clouds overhead into thinking it's still night time, jolted all the while by Gamzee's wavering strides.

Gamzee is determined to reach this Karkat, no matter how thin he wears himself in the attempt. And if Karkat's anywhere near as, uh, angry as that Eridan guy, Tavros isn't sure what will happen...

But for now, Tavros still has some control over the situation. Um, he thinks he does, anyway. Probablemente. And luckily Gamzee ran out of energy last night after pushing Tavros most of the way through Oregón, and acted mostly sleepy and agreeable when Tavros begged for them to stay in a shelter to recover for the night. He had to handle most of the talking with the woman behind the desk, which kind of is the opposite of a thing Tavros is good at, but because of all the rain this place was already pretty busy and they got hurried through the check in without too many people getting a peek at Gamzee's eyes. Never mind that he'd stand out just for being a coldblood in a shelter full of humans and warmbloods; one close look and the security guard at the door would have las autoridades on the phone before you could say 'violent dementia.' Gamzee proceeds to collapse in a jumble of long limbs on his cot for almost eighteen hours straight, his sleep punctuated by muffled

The purpleblood's been brittle and restless basically since he first showed up on Tavros's doorstep, playing up the persona of a chill, benign clown for a while before bursting out into unpredictable fits of homicidal mania. Which at least keeps Tavros on his toes! Or, well, on his wheels, he guesses. It's not an ideal situation but herding Gamzee away from his latest attempt at prowling after some innocent bystander at least helps Tavros feel useful. He isn't sure what Gamzee would do if he managed to get these people alone in a dark alley - but he's seen the troll beat people bloody and ravage their minds mercilessly with chucklevoodoos, so he likes to think he has a pretty good idea. If good is even the word for it.

Unfortunately, playing the herdmaster to Gamzee's malabarista desquiciado seems less and less like it's working. More often, now, Gamzee'll snap his teeth together in a fanged glower instead of backing down sheepishly when Tavros fumbles through the inglés needed to make their apologies to the latest person backed into a corner; the grating rattle that underlies his voice, that warning, rolling growl of a feral troll, rumbles under his words to the point that he's unintelligible a lot of the time.

Tavros's meek offers to jam - regardless of their lack of any kind of pile, which they can't really fix, being mostly homeless at the moment - barely earns him a grunt in response. All he'll talk about, when they do jam, is this next troll. After the total mess that was Gamzee's run-in with the equally loco Eridan guy, Tavros thought that maybe the disappointment would knock some more sense into Gamzee's pan than Tavros has succeeded in doing these past few weeks. But no - if anything, Eridan's refusal to join them has left Gamzee more agitated than ever. He's not sleeping; not that he ever slept much to begin with, but Tavros strains to keep up with the insane pace and hours Gamzee keeps. Some nights he'll fall asleep, rocking to the tread of this newest stolen wheelchair, and wake the next morning disoriented by the dark clouds overhead into thinking it's still night time, jolted all the while by Gamzee's wavering strides.

Gamzee is determined to reach this Karkat, no matter how thin he wears himself in the attempt. And if Karkat's anywhere near as, uh, angry as that Eridan guy, Tavros isn't sure what will happen...

But for now, Tavros still has some control over the situation. Um, he thinks he does, anyway. Probablemente. And luckily Gamzee ran out of energy last night after pushing Tavros most of the way through Oregón, and acted mostly sleepy and agreeable when Tavros begged for them to stay in a shelter to recover for the night. He had to handle most of the talking with the woman behind the desk, which kind of is the opposite of a thing Tavros is good at, but because of all the rain this place was already pretty busy and they got hurried through the check in without too many people getting a peek at Gamzee's eyes. Never mind that he'd stand out just for being a coldblood in a shelter full of humans and warmbloods; one close look and the security guard at the door would have las autoridades on the phone before you could say 'violent dementia.' Gamzee proceeds to collapse in a jumble of long limbs on his cot for almost eighteen hours straight, his sleep punctuated by muffled growls and twitches and the occasional, plaintive whimper, and Tavros smiles and waves away anyone who strays too close throughout the day, informing them in stuttering, broken English or Alternian that everything is alright, there is really no need to wake up Gamzee for breakfast or lunch or the job application help session offered in the early afternoon. No need to move them to an open recopperacoon either, even when the crowd of people starts to clear out around noon - Gamzee won't go near sopor slime on a good day, and Tavros has been using the cheap, watered down quality mix for years now to save up for better legs, so he's not nearly as dependent on it as he could be.

This place at least has dry clothes for them to borrow and sleep in while theirs dry over the sides of overcrowded drying racks. When Gamzee shudders awake in the middle of the afternoon, shredding the pillow he's wrapped his arms around in the process with a strangled roar, Tavros pats at his cold cheeks until the purpleblood's shivers barely rock the bedframe, but he can't do anything about Gamzee's resulting insistence that they move. Tavros puts his foot down when Gamzee wants to stalk past the room where food handouts are being passed around, utterly refusing to let his lip tremble or his eyes fall when Gamzee tries to stare him down. "Not a chance," he says, folding his arms over his chest. "N-nice try. You haven't eaten in two days."

"Tav." Gamzee digs long, ragged claws deep into the wood of the door frame, shifting his weight from one bare foot to the other and scraping at the floor panels with his claws as well. He's not at the point of blowing up into a fit of rage, but he won't calm down. "Come on, brother. We'll all up and get at you with some eats later. Ain't you motherfucking seen the sky?"

Never mind that Tavros has been eating normally, unlike this guy. But logic doesn't usually work on Gamzee, anyway. Oh well. "I've s-seen it all day long, 'migo," Tavros says. "It's raining just like it was ayer y antes de ayer. You're gonna make yourself sick!" He shakes his head and nearly smacks a passerby in the ribs with the curve of his left horn. Oops. He really doesn't do well in unfamiliar small spaces with the whole horn safety thing. Especially since most trolls with horns as wideset as his own tend to be able to, uh, stand, so there's a lot more furniture to get in the way on Tavros's level. But he's used to it, really.

"Karkat'll make it all alright, my fine brownblooded brother." Gamzee's eyes lighten almost imperceptibly, his gaze flickering up and to the side so he can squint at something. Tavros is, uh, pretty sure it's not the painting of a tree and a farmhouse hanging on the wall in kind of the same direction as Gamzee's looking. It's a pretty bad painting, but at least it's not a computer or a TV screen. Gamzee doesn't like either very much. "Something big is all going down, I can feel it. Gotta make sure my best motherfucking friend ain't in some downright unmiraculous bind." A hoarse sigh. "You feel?"

He doesn't. Actually. He doesn't feel. But it never does any good to let Gamzee know that. In fact, hearing about Karkat kind of makes Tavros's tummy feel kind of upset? All queasy, like if he ate a whole batch of quesadillas at once, without sharing them with Tinkerbull: indigestion and guilt all rolled up into one. But almost nothing else makes Gamzee calm down as fast as talking about Karkat, and Tavros can only be supportive of anything that calms Gamzee down.

Even if it kind of hurts to hear, just from his voice, how much Gamzee loves Karkat. Which is a lot. Tavros isn't stupid. By the time Gamzee comes down from his momentary space-out, his eyes still golden yellow and soft with some emotion that doesn't quite match his usual brittle, haunted stare, Tavros has swallowed hard and set his chin in a stubborn jut. "Food first," he says, with the tone of voice that means business. "Déjate de tonterías and get us something to eat for the road, at least, or I'll put on the parking break the whole rest of the way there."

"And then it'll take even longer to get to Seattle. And Karkat. Which, uh, you don't want to take longer, right?"
The panic that claws at the back of Tavros's mind isn't entirely his own. Gamzee's eyes bulge and he shakes his head, his nails spasming and cracking an entire section of the door frame so that it splinters and peels away from the rests of the wood. "No," he says, more snarl than anything, and Tavros shivers before he can help himself. "I'll be right back, hombre. Be ready." The purpleblood rips his claws out of the doorway to lope over to the line and - ugh, try to cut in at the very front of said line, again, which always pisses people off - and Tavros sags back in his wheelchair, feeling his wings pang a little in protest when he forgets to adjust himself beforehand. They've been cramping a lot lately, since he's not using them as often as he did back home. The less attention they call to themselves here in América, whether through Gamzee's really noticeable crazy or Tavros's equally noticeable, really rare extra set of limbs, the better. Especially after all that murderuckus outside the weird dome thing in Los Angeles.

Tavros still isn't sure if the film crews toting cameras around that day got a good shot of them. He and Gamzee haven't exactly been able to keep up with the news, but a coldblood traveling with a paraplegic brownblood is pretty distinctive. At some point, someone is going to notice them. Someone is going to call them out. Someone is going to push Gamzee too far, and Tavros won't be able to hold him back.

B-but thinking about that too much will only get him down! Tavros shakes his head vigorously (nearly goring a human in the process - oops) to clear out all the bad thoughts, and wheels backwards, turning to roll a little further away from the doorway so he's not blocking it. There's a window next to a bookshelf packed full of self-help books with English titles that's gathering dust, so Tavros rolls up to it and leans all the way forward to fold his arms and use them to pillow his chin while he pouts at the awful weather outside. The tiny community garden visible just outside, a square of dirt barely larger than the alley gardens back home, has been rained on so heavily that the mud churned up by the drumming hail has swallowed up most of the actual plants, if there were any to begin with. Maybe it was too early in the year for seeds to sprout, this far north. The United States are strange. Cold and rainy and windy and extraños.

The shattering of glass startles Tavros badly, the bend of his horn slamming into the window hard enough to leave a jagged scratch along the pane as he twists his chair around to see where the sound came from. It could have been anything but yeah, who would he be trying to kid, here? It's gotta be Gamzee.

"Motherfucker-" an unfamiliar voice growls. "What the fuck was that?!

Not Gamzee, not Gamzee's voice, not nearly rabid enough - but when Tavros brakes hard in the doorway, blowing his limp mohawk out of his eyes impatiently, Gamzee still in the middle of it, a skeletal line that towers over the irate, sallow yellowblood spitting at his face. Everyone else has backed away, and the human manning the food handouts dashes away, probably to retrieve security. Which is, uh, not a thing that they want right now. Tavros half expects Gamzee to backhand the other troll right off...and then he blinks and takes another look at the floor, where glass shards litter the ground around the two troll's feet. There's a small amount green sopor slime smeared there, and the thin metal of a hypodermic stabbed at an odd angle in between two wooden panels. Gamzee's gone barefoot since his last pair of shoes wore out near Sacramento, and dull purple blood oozes out between his toes.

But Gamzee's not angry. De lo contrario - his face looks composed for once, a smooth mask of tolerance even with only the bare minimum of paint to tip his lips up in an artificial smile. "Shit'll rot your brain, brother," he says, casually, grinding the remaining shards of the hypodermic beneath the ball of his foot. "Rot it through til you don't as have much of a pan left. Motherfucking shooting it up'll just turn an invertebrother ten different kinds of heinous."
Oh, no. "Gamzee, it's none of our business," Tavros hisses, scooting around a gawping kid to roll up to Gamzee's side.

The goldblood doesn't pay attention to Tavros's approach. He just shoves at Gamzee's chest, snaggletooth bared to snarl, "You think this is funny, beachcrawler?!" Close up, this guy has all the hallmarks of a sopor addict. Even better, he has all the twitchy, paranoid signs of a sopor-sucker coming down from his high and realizing that his next score, probably drawn from one of the shelter's recooperacoons on the sly, just got dumped all over the floor. The sparks of sickly yellow psionics that crackle at his fingertips have no more force than static electricity, but they're still a warning sign, right up there with the lowered horns and the gnash of teeth.

Great. Why does Gamzee have to be so compulsive about this random stuff? There are tons of alcoholics and other addicts left without resources on the streets, but only the trolls who guzzle or shoot sopor tend to attract Gamzee's weird, rare moments of twisted helpfulness. Even the rarer human sopor addicts tend to get ignored, and the troll lets the resulting irritation directed at him wash right over his head, not really seeming to realize that his bouts of strange insane clown benevolence just tend to, well, tick off the worst possible people.

"Lo siento, lo siento," Tavros gabbles, trying to head this off before it can get any worse. He doesn't quite have the confidence to wheel himself between Gamzee and this other troll, but he has the presence of mind to seize Gamzee's wrist and start to roll backward. His face flushes and he keeps his head down, painfully aware of the bronzed blush creeping up to his ears as his awareness of everyone in the room spikes. "Nos sentimos, we - uh, sorry, we are very sorry. He, um, uh, he didn't mean it." He can't even bring himself to look up at the goldblood as he repeats the stuttered apologies in Alternian, trying to cover his language bases.

"Hey now, Tav, that is a lie most unkind," Gamzee says, his voice sticky slow and drawling as he shakes his head. "I am all up and getting my meaning on. Ain't right not to warn a brother about this most unrighteous of slimes." He turns his head back to the goldblood glowering at him over the yellow bags that line his eyes. "It's some flagrant poison, what you're sippin' at -"

"You preachy son of a fuck, d'you think I care?!" the goldblood growls, shoving Gamzee again.

They, uhm, they probably won't, no, he thinks, snappish and sarcastic in the privacy of his own mind. But Tavros can't seem to remember anything more than how to repeat, robotically. "I'm s-sorry, we're sorry," like all the rest of his English has flown right out of his head and left his tongue numb. He understands enough to feel even more humiliated, and now he digs his gnawed-on claws into the too-thin flesh of Gamzee's wrist. "Tenemos que ir. Karkat, ¿recuerdas? Tenemos que ir a buscar a Karkat."

"Hey! What about my sopor?" the other troll demands, a clicking creak rising in the gravel of his growl as Gamzee uncomplainingly takes up the handles of Tavros's wheelchair. "Don't you walk away from me, assholes!"

Gamzee walks away. Tavros clutches the brownbag to his chest as the wheelchair jolts over the raised threshold, and tries to ignore the rumble of someone - the guard probably - arriving at last to grumble at the goldblood and the sopor on the floor. Dios, if they can just get out of here without having the policía called on them, it'll be a minor miracle.

Tavros is pretty sure the Toreador never had to put up with this kind of mierda. But then, the Toreador was actually a good hero before his untimely demise, whereas Tavros is just kind of...um, middling. If he can even call it that, after getting sucked into this insane road trip with a troll he knows has no qualms about almost murdering people.

"Goodbye, thank you, we're really sorry," Tavros calls to the woman at the front desk as they roll past, tripping over the words so fast that all he earns is a blank stare in return, and she probably doesn't even know what he's apologizing for but he's sorry anyway. Shouts have risen up from the back room by the time they clear the front door, so Tavros is pretty sure any second now the goldblood might come after them. If he doesn't piss the security guard off more, anyway. He's grateful at least that the weather seems to have cleared up, for the time being. In fact - he glances up, blowing his hair out of his face again when it flops over (it really needs a trim) and sees that the ugly mass of clouds that has hung around for days, heavy and sluggish, have finally started crawling across the sky, taking the rain with them. It's still gross and grey and overcast, but maybe now this storm will move further north to Canadá or something. Good riddance.

"Hunh. Ain't that something, Tavbro?" Gamzee mutters, and Tavros tilts his head even further back to glance up at the troll's chin in curiosity. The passive bemusement has transitioned into a more normal squint, and the corners of Gamzee's lips turn down noticeably despite the white paint of his smile.

"Maybe we can make better time to Seattle, now," Tavros says, cajolingly, as a thrum of apprehension runs as far down his spine as it can go. His wings judder against his back uneasily; he wishes he could shake them out, if only for a moment. "Unless, uh, your feet are hurt. You cut them on that aguja hipodérmica, didn't you?" And Gamzee still wandering around with bare feet -

"Nah, I'm fine, brother." Gamzee's gaze, abruptly, goes distant, and Tavros shifts in his seat as they slow down, mostly distracted by the thought that Gamzee's gonna rot his foot off if he keeps walking around with an open wound on the sole. Purpleblood may be tough, but Tavros definitely saw blood and Gamzee's hygiene is kind of non-existent. "Hang on," the purpleblood mutters, mostly to himself, "Hang the motherfuck on..."

And then he stops altogether. "Aw, motherfucker-"

As usual, with Gamzee's episodes, Tavros has no idea what the troll is seeing, or hearing, or maybe just hallucinating - or all three jumbled together at the same time. He stops craning his head back and twists in his seat when his neck begins to crink up, but getting a better look at the distant expression on Gamzee's face doesn't help Tavros understand why they've stopped. The purpleblood just glowers up at the sky, the yellows of his eyes shading darker and darker by the second as his pupils flick from side to side, as though reading something.

M-maybe Tavros should head this off before Gamzee works himself up into a frenzy. "What's up?"

"I ever get the know on with you as concerns my most righteous rage, Tav?" Gamzee says at last. It comes so far out of left field that Tavros honestly sits there for ten seconds in complete incomprehension before his thinkpan finishes processing the question. "How you and I both know I
There's too much of warning click rattling deep in his throat, and Tavros runs his claws over the back of Gamzee's hands in a soothing press before fumbling to answer. "Um, not really? On account of you don't really explain anything...even when you're explaining." Well, nothing that doesn't just sound like legitimate insanity, anyway. Maybe it would make more sense if Gamzee didn't jump around in the story and lose track of what he's said and what he hasn't, or run off on tangents about unrelated stuff, or get distracted by a sudden swell of rage. Seeing as how these things happen all the time, Tavros thinks it's understandable that he has no idea what's going on. Really. He doesn't have a lot to work with, here.

Gamzee laughs, a hollow honk of a sound. Which is always better than the alternative. The wheels of the chair clatter a warning when Tavros gives a cautious push with his claws to set them into motion; he sighs and mentally chalks up another wheelchair that's probably going to end up culled early because of this extended cross-country trip, but it gets Gamzee moving, at least, his long, gangly legs falling into step with the wheelchair again right away. "I ain't never been the bitchits at school feedin' others, hombre, is what's the truth of it. I get my babble on and then no one understands a motherfucking thing. But we all of us are followin' along to the sweet tunes of our deepest being, as melodified and blasphemous as the universe saw fit to make us." Then, almost sad, almost melancholy: "And the conductor as laid its mark on me, that great wild minstrelsy of Rage and rotted pans - is Discordia."

Oh man. That's way too many mangled English words that Tavros is 85% sure are totally made up fakey nonsense words. And the cadence of Gamzee's sounds similar to the rhythm they strike up for rap-slams, which means it's probably poético made up fakey nonsense words. Ugh. "That - sucks? But just in case...say the whole thing again because it made no sense at all."

"Oh, my brother, you tell it like it most truly is." Another harsh laugh. "Makes a troll turn all kinds of jealous, how straightforward a thing your Breeze can be." He shakes his head, and the laugh transitions into a crooked, spindly smile - that goes too far, tipping right over into a feral grin, as they cross the street without a care for the enormous puddle that has flooded the street around their shins. "But some poor motherfucker's got his pan all twisted round and splintered up, not listening to his windy thing, and I can feel it clear down here, right in my pumpbiscuit, just like I did our good Eribro. Your breath-bro John's gone all kinds of mentally motherfucking unstable, and that don't mean anything good for anybody." A screech of claws on metal, and a new, twisted scratch joins the others that Gamzee has laid into the wheelchair handles over the past few days. "I would know. Be so easy, to just give a motherfucker a little push -"

"Um. That sounds like a thing that you should definitely not do," Tavros says, putting all the sternness he can muster into his voice. Because - "Because you're talking about making someone crazy and we d-definitely talked about this, Gamzee! No more chuckle hoodoos!" Tavros falters, then picks up the thread again when Gamzee just peers down at him, eyes glittering with too-keen interest, the kind of predator-intensity that reminds Tavros, always, that Gamzee has a pair of clubs hidden away where no one can reach them, stowed in his impossible Índice de los milagros. "You said you would stop," he says, sucking on his lip in a pout. "Prométeme."

Gamzee's too quiet. "Can't always control it," he says, with a low, dark chuckle. "I have all this murdirmirth in my soul, and the downright sickening whimtrocities invite themselves on without my say-so."

"Don't I know it..." Tavros mutters. Something scrabbles at his mind that chills him right through, but Gamzee seems to catch himself a moment later and retracts the raw terror before Tavros can say a word. "But promise me anyway." Again, he adds mentally.
"I motherfucking promise." And Gamzee bends in two at the waist, stooping to plant a kiss in the middle of Tavros's mohawk without breaking his stride. "For you and for now, my brother."

For now.

The water soaks through his just-dried socks by the time they reach the far side of the street, and Tavros blames that for the fact that he can't seem to stop shivering. There's a bay near here, right? He can't remember the last time Gamzee consulted a map - if he ever has at all in this entire trip - but Tavros is sure this part of the United States is all pretty close to water. It would just figure they'd arrive in time for a second Diluvio. "Gamzee? How do you know all this stuff, anyway?" he asks.

"Hell, Tavbro, if I told you," Gamzee says, lifting a hand to squeeze Tavros's shoulder just a little too tightly, "you'd probably -"

"Hey! Hey, don't you walk away from me!"

Tavros gives up; he makes this known by burying his face against the brown bag in his lap, eyes squeezed shut so he doesn't have to turn around and see that the goldblood has actually followed them. 'Please no murder,' he intends to groan, but it comes out more of a "Nnnnnhomicidio," that Gamzee, with his selective hearing/rampant dementia, probably feels free to totally ignore.

"I've all got a best motherfucking friend up Seattle way what needs me, soporbro," Gamzee says, his rumbling voice in direct contrast to the sunny smile Tavros sees that he's got leveled at the troll stamping through the puddle they just crossed. "So if you come here wanting to start something downright salty - piss the motherfk off."

Tavros is very tempting to just bury his head in the bag again but he has a responsibility here as a moiail to prevent Gamzee from unleashing total mayhem on everyone in a quarter mile radius by trying to keep the peace. "Look, we'll give you this -" Tavros reaches a hand into the paper bag and draws out the first thing he finds "- uh. Whatever this is." He can't be bothered to pause long enough to see what's in the can he twists in his seat to hold out at arm's length, as far from Gamzee as he can reach while still obviously waving it in the goldblood's direction. "Please, I'm very sorry about my friend. He is very rude."

The other troll doesn't even spare Tavros a glance, his long strands of hair still frizzed around his emaciated face with faint yellow sparks. "Bullshit, am I going to piss off. You uppity clown fuck, I don't want apologies, I want what I paid for that shit." With a buzz and the sudden reek of ozone, the goldblood flips a knife out of his pocket, eyes bright with delirious confidence as he lets it drop into his palm and points the specibus at Gamzee, hand trembling in a testament to how badly the sopor has wrecked his concentration. "Cash. Now."

Most people would be kind of intimidated by having someone point a knifekind at them.

Most people are not Gamzee Makara.

"Knife!" Gamzee exclaims. And he grins madly as he reaches out, delighted, and closes his long fingers over the other troll's wrist.

It only takes a light twist, and a casual snap, and the goldblood's hand juts at broken angle before Tavros or the other warmblood can so much as blink. Another tap - Gamzee's smile gone manic - and the goldblood yells, eyes bulging and weak psionics fizzling out as lukewarm blood pours in spurts from the new place where the stomach-tilting yellow of bone emerges from his arm. Another - now he's screaming -
Tavros turns with a squeal of wheels on sidewalk and lunges right of the chair, heedless of where it ends up rolling as he hooks himself over Gamzee's arm. Not enough time to shrug off his jacket and get his wings loose; he just starts frantically patting Gamzee's face, trying to shoosh him and turn his face away from the goldblood at the same time. Gamzee won't let him fall. "Shush! Stop it, stop it, stop it, shhh."

Gamzee's face turns livid.

And yeah, sure, he tosses the goldblood to the side - the troll still clutching at his thrice-broken arm and howling at the pain as the last of the sopor probably clears his system and leaves him nothing but agony - but he turns on Tavros instead, and that's terrifying. Because there's nothing left of the playful, lazy Gamzee who lolled around on Tavros's couch for days in the twisted mask of rage that bares so many teeth at Tavros. Tavros's stomach drops out as Gamzee straightens the arm he clings to out so Tavros can no longer reach his face. His feet dangle, and they're only a few feet above the ground but oh god Gamzee would let him fall. He would. "Shoosh me again," Gamzee hisses, "pap me one more motherfucking time and see how far that fraudulent shit gets you, brother."

Fraudulent-

Tavros can't even speak, jaw clamped shut at the stark reality of being confronted with a coldblood in a full-blown, unadulterated rage. Gamzee's arm is a freezing cold iron band under his weakening grip, and Tavros doesn't know what his face is doing aside from being frozen in a mask of startled fear, but it's definitely not soothing. How could it be, when his vision tunnels and smears under the rolling force of the rage Gamzee radiates, the terror shoving itself into his mind and poised to tear into it with sharp, cold claws at the slightest provocation.

He messed up. Oh god, he has messed up.

Later, when he can thinks back with a clearer mind, he realizes that shutting up might just have been the thing that saved his life. He does manage to pry his jaw open, dizzy with fear but drawing on some wellspring of stupid, plucky courage that would have had him try to shoosh Gamzee again - if not for the fact that his tongue will not cooperate. The resulting 'uh's' and 'ums' and 'ohs' don't quite qualify as shooshes, and Tavros's increasingly desperate, clutching grip on Gamzee's forearm doesn't meet papping standards in any way, shape, or form, and somehow, impossibly - that's exactly what keeps Gamzee from inflicting some new, creatively awful injury on him.

Instead, the stutters cut off and Tavros nearly lets himself just drop as Gamzee leans in just a little closer. His breath feels cold on the side of Tavros's face as he says, voice alternating between smooth, pleasant calm and raucous, throaty rage, "I motherfucking like you, Tav. Like you a whole motherfucking lot. But I only got one moiral.

"And you ain't motherfucking him."

It's not so much breaking a moirallegiance as it is revealing just how very, very wrong Tavros has been to assume it even existed in the first place.

Tavros can feel the shattered paleness still aching in his chest as Gamzee - carefully, carefully, the rage dissipating like a fog as quickly as it had come on - sets him back in his wheelchair and whistles as the goldblood's hoarse pleas for help fade into the distance. The pain doesn't hit until later. By the time they reach downtown Seattle, the pendulum of Gamzee's mood has swung back to that tissue-thin, efímero playfulness, as the purpleblood rides high on the storm that flays the streets with hail and shrieking wind and lightning.

Gamztee grins up at the first building on his agenda - or, perhaps, past it, to read something in the storm raging above.

Tavros just curls up in his chair, presses his claw to his chest, and, with all his might, does not scream as he realizes that no one is safe.

Not even him.

---

Years ago...

Joanna Egbert has been waiting for this moment for rather a long time. Decades, in fact! Most people her age wouldn't be nearly so splendidly mobile and energetic after living a full life; James is running down already, the old coot, however much he blusters. But her hands are sprightly enough to serve up some tasty piekind for a few years yet. Perhaps because they're ectobiologically encoded to remain forever the detached, ageless arms of a harlequin prankster. But who can say? Right now, at this moment, Jo thinks she could live forever.

News of the arrival of the other children late last year, exactly as her memories and visions predicted, helped give her a new burst of resolve. It is always nice to have one's deductions validated, after all! And by gum, with every day that passes, young Rue's helplessly delighted reports of Rose's darling eyes and James's more scattered news of Jade's exuberant crawling fire Jo up more and more with anticipation.

So! She presses the binoculars to her eyes, and surveys the newly built strip mall across the road. A very nice antiques shop occupies the corner lot - a lot which otherwise might have housed a very promising prankster's emporium, if only Jo hadn't relocated her new enterprise to a small lot five miles away. She's dreamed of retiring from her academic work to host this joke shop for some time now, and she's not about to let a little thing like a terrible accident involving a unabridged copy of Sassacre's tome and a good sized meteorite muck up all her hard work. She doesn't intend to fall for that one again, no sir. Crush Nanna Egbert with space debris once, and that's a real hoot! Crush her with space debris twice, and she might as well hang up her beaglepuss and resign her prankster's gambit on the spot!

Instead, she finds herself at a table on the patio outside a very nice coffee shop, observing from afar. Of course, she's already cased the joint today, and she's in luck; the antiques seller tends to close up shop early to attend yoga four days out of the week, so the place will be completely free of potential victims when the hubbub starts. One last cursory glance assures her that the windows are still dark and the door locked up tight (including the extra security measures that Jo may or may not have put in place herself to ensure no one could enter the doomed store today of all days), and so, at last, she turns her lenses to the sky above.

She does not have to wait long. She knew exactly when to expect the young dear, after all.

At 4:10 in the afternoon, Jo pauses to take a sip of her tea. When she looks up, she squints - rubs the lenses of the binoculars and the glasses on her face clean - rubs her own eyes on the off chance they're giving out on her now, of all times - and then confirms that yes, there is a black dot in the clear blue sky that certainly was not there a moment before.

A lovely white Honda Consensus trundles on by, unaware of the imminent destruction of the store to its right as it loiters at the intersection, signaling for a left turn. In the distance, Jo can hear the warbling of a fire truck racing past, not on this street but perhaps one just out of sight.

By 4:11, the plastic bits of the binoculars dig in painfully where they press the nubs of her glasses into the flesh on either side of her nose. The greenblooded waitress refills Jo's cup without a word on the old woman's intent focus on the sky - until, curious, the girl leans over to follow Jo's line of sight, craning her neck back. "Whatcha looking at, ma'am?"

"Something I've been waiting for rather a long time, my dear."

"Huh. That looks sorta like a…Oh, crap."

"Don't worry, we're outside the impact zone. It'll be a very localized strike."

"I'm just gonna…call my manager." The troll starts backing away, still staring up at the sky in growing horror, and knocks into an empty table before stumbling back to the door to the inner coffee shop. She does not return.

By 4:12 other people have started to take notice. This neighborhood slows to a crawl in the afternoons, a testament to the slightly aged demographic of the residents - there's a retirement community not five blocks down the road. Other neighborhoods only a few minutes to the north or west fill up quickly with young go-getters who commute to the big city, and their families, but here there is only a single burgundyblood troll passing by who happens to glance up when the crosswalk light blinks out. The heavyset troll scratches the side of her horns around the brim of her hat, leans against the pole of the streetlights, and frowns.

The Honda Consensus has actually pulled into the tiny row of parking spaces on the far side of the corner coffee shop, and Jo can hear the engine idling. But she couldn't tear her eyes from the incoming meteorite if she tried. The angle of atmospheric entry is quite steep - but Jo has Rue's notes inside her purse, the excited reports of an astronomer transfixed by the fact that there was no fragmentation or flares of light and sonic booms that would otherwise signal a significantly sized piece of space debris trying to survive the intense passage through the atmosphere.

Of course, what dear Rue has yet to fully accept is that the laws of physics as she knows them no longer necessarily apply. Jo has spent years mentoring the woman, but she's only been able to nudge the doctoral student so far along before more solid proof was required.

Well. They have it, now. All three of the children previous have survived hurtling unshielded through the atmosphere astride their interstellar steeds. It's actually a very controlled descent. Skaia could never conceive of risking its chosen few fresh from the ectobiological chambers, even during so catastrophic an event as the Reckoning.

At 4:13 on the dot, the meteorite shrieks through the air, and slams into the antiques store with an impact that rocks Jo back in her seat and knocks her cup of tea clean over, spilling all over the wrought iron of the patio table. A wave of heat and bright burst of light accompany the concussive impact, but Jo waits patiently - she's been waiting all her life; what's a few more moments? - and when the steam and dust clear away, the impact crater is a shallow, concave indent where the antiques store used to stand. Nothing else has been damaged; the crafts store on the other side of the demolished corner lot has scores of black ash in wild patterns along the wall closest to the crater, but aside from that the building might well be completely intact. Not nearly enough damage for a meteorite of this size, but who can argue with the will of paradox space?

With a grunt, Jo gets to her feet, righting the tea cup on its saucer and blinking down at the mess. Oh dear. She tucks the binoculars inside her purse and looks around to spy the waitress huddling just inside the door of the coffee shop, her green eyes stark against an unnaturally pale grey face. Poor dear must have had the living daylights scared out of her. Jo will come back directly after she's retrieved her new son to comfort her, and to help clean up the tea now dripping down onto the stone of the patio beneath the table. It's only good manners!
But right now, she won't rest easy until she has John in her arms. Jo hears the creak and the tinkling of the bell as the door pushes cautiously open behind her, but she's already turned her back to hurry across the street before any other passersby can reach her son before her.

The gun shot, in retrospect, sounds louder than the meteor impact had. And that's saying something. Jo jolts forward, stiffening in shock at the sudden, harsh staccato, and only realizes after a fraction of a second that the fire blooming deep in her chest means something has gone rather amiss.

She looks down. She's wearing the second-best dress she owns - her mother always said not to wear the best when there's physical labor like clambering in and out of dusty craters to be done - and, ridiculously, her first thought is that she'll never manage to scrub all the blood out of the blue-and-white paisley pattern of the fabric. Even as she stares down, utterly flummoxed, the blood spreads further, and she thinks she could pick out each individual thread as the red dyes it in an inexorable wash.

But John, she thinks, distantly. Oh, consarn it all. She crumples up, all the strength oozing out of her limbs - but for her hands, which have always rather had minds of their own. They fly out to catch the side of the table and try to break her fall, but she still hits the ground, torn between the instinct to crawl toward John if she can't walk, and the equally powerful urge to turn to see who just darn well shot her. A new, sharp crunch jolts through her hip - no, not now - just another painful distraction that she can't quite register in her shock.

It's the second gun shot that decides her. Jo flinches, gasping at the fresh wave of burning pain that seizes in her chest at the sudden cringe, and her hands drag her around to land on her side not facing out toward the street, but in toward the coffee shop door.

The waitress meets her eyes. She, too, is splayed out on her side on the patio floor, but the blood that pools out from the side of her head and sluices across her face in thin rivulets is of course of a different shade entirely.

That white Consensus is still idling in the parking lot.

She knows that car -

"Lordy loo," she manages, coughing. "Samuel? Sammy?" Breathing is hard - she's no expert, but whoever shot her seems to have been an excellent marksman, because her heart seems to be thudding to a sudden stop. Folding forward onto her stomach, Jo feels her fingers twitch, ghostly blue flesh rippling beneath their constraining sleeves and gloves and doing their utter best to drag her along toward the sound of the car engine as black dots splotch across her vision. Because Sammy -

He's not supposed to be home yet. Deployed for a fifteen month tour, and she hasn't heard a peep out of him about coming to visit early, but wouldn't it just be like her strange, silly boy to come home early, today of all days, to try to get the drop on her - oh -

Jo lets out a strangled sob. Both of her boys are in danger but this didn't happen before. This never happened before, and there are no more dreams of a past life to guide her.

Perhaps she should have realized her death was inevitable.

Before she can crawl more than a few feet, the agony in her chest and her hip swallows her whole, and she slumps forward. Just to rest her head against the pavement, for a moment. Sammy will find John, he will, he did last time, and that is the certainty, the last guarantee of her fading vision, as she fumbles into the dark.
At the intersection, a rustblooded troll adjusts her red-and-white striped hat with a groan, rolling her wide shoulders as she stops leaning on the pole. She isn't bothered by the stink of smoke that clings to her clothes - Matchsticks has been traveling through fire for years, now, and she is pleased to have a fresh new firefighter-standard respirator hanging from her belt.

What the Boss wants, the Boss gets, and the Boss wants confirmation that this deal goes down right - even if he doesn't wanna hear none of it until she rejoins him years in the future. Matchsticks wasn't hired to think too hard.

Trace slinks up alongside her a moment later, nodding slow and languid as he drapes himself over her shoulder, nosing absently at the side of her temple. It's taken both of them to pull this off; his ability to track the past trails of others means that he can see where their targets have moved and harass them based on that knowledge, but trying to do so from so many years in the future always meant too much extra crap for him to backtrack through - far easier for Matchsticks to bring him back in time so that there's less of a past trail to follow, and let him scent from there.

Course, they finished all that nonsensical time hopping, and he's still hanging around. Trace's job, technically, has been done for a while. But he and Fin have been damn clingy lately, no matter when in the timeline Matchsticks picks them up from, and she figures news of her impending demise must be spreading. Bozos.

The man who joins them in crossing the road is a real oddball. He polishes the blood off the muzzle of the pistolkind with a fresh white handkerchief, humming to himself as he works, and doesn't really see all that bothered by the fact that he just killed his own mother in cold blood.

She can't imagine murdering her own lusus - mostly because the thing passed away from natural causes on the reserve years from now, rest its decrepit, retired soul - but humans in general are freaks. Matchsticks is used to working with freaks.

"You'll be in touch?" Samuel Egbert says, the picture of politeness as he puts his specibus away. He's been back in the States for almost a month now, working with Fin when the woman can be spared to piece together his future plan of action. Last time Matchsticks saw him, Egbert was still in the fatigues of a private military contractor, but he's traded in for a pitch black suit of such impeccable form that he could probably give Droog himself a run for his money. He's resplendent in his new loyalty to the Midnight Crew branch, but the fond smile that he spares for the two Felt members shows just how deeply Dienek must have whittled into his brain.

Well, that won't do at all. "Don't wear all black, man," Matchsticks advises, shaking her head. Honestly. "You're going into deep cover."

"Discretion," Trace says helpfully.

"Of course, of course," the man says, waving a hand in dismissal. "I am well prepared, never fear."

"And no. We won't be in touch." Matchsticks fires a glance at Trace; the man just shrugs. "Expect Droog to activate you, and be your primary point of contact. That's as much as I know."

"Droog," Egbert's eyes sharpen. "Understood." And with that, he turns right as they continue on straight down the road. The human angles toward the impact crater, hopping over the raised ridge and sliding down in a smooth motion to the center. Matchsticks and Trace hang around long enough to confirm that he emerges with the tiny human wriggler - just as his past trail informed them he would days from now.

He won't be due to bring the kid in for synchronization until its brain's more fully developed, years from now, when the procedure has been finalized. Last she heard, Dienek was planning to start testing out new breeds on a bunch of kids not yet out of the test tubes. But that's none of her business. For now, their work here is done. The two Felt stroll on toward an abandoned lot just a few blocks away. Matchsticks can feel the clanging of a fire alarm ringing in her ears, a summons across time and space.

Time to set another fire.

-

…

…

…

Joanna opens her eyes.

The sky is very, very blue; the sun, a brilliant disk against it. And she, somehow, is not dead yet.

"Oh, mercy me," she says, hoarse, and when she tries to shift her body the gunshot wound throbs again. The press of the hot stone of the patio floor is an uncomfortable, growing burn against the side of her face. "Oof."

Most likely, the next time she falls unconscious, she won't wake up. Unless -

Unless, unless

The click of heels on pavement cuts through the delirious haze of pain that has so muddled up Jo's thoughts, and she lets her head roll to the side so she can better squint through her fuzzy vision at a pair of feet striding over to her. The feet pause by the corpse of the waitress so that the newcomer can stoop down, feel for a pulse, and just as quickly grunt a dismissal and continue on to Jo's side.

Jo looks up.

She knows the figure etched by the sun as well as she knows her dear James.

Her smile, perhaps, is a little bitter, and the weight on her heart is a heavy one. "Did you know...for long?" she asks, each breath a pained wheeze, and she feels bloody spittle track down the wrinkles framing her mouth. "A little forewarning would have been - ah. Haaaaa." Her lungs struggle to inflate again, and when they do the pain almost drags her down again. She doesn't have much time, but at least - "Well. At least you're...here. After so long, I wasn't sure..."

The response takes a while, and when it comes, the newcomer's voice is more tired than Jo has ever known it, flat and sad. "Girl, you know who I work for. Know how close I have to play this. If I'd've warned you, if you hadn't been here like you were supposed to be, they'd just come looking for you later on. If you're dead, you're safe." A rustle of fabric as the newcomer crouches beside her, and then an old, familiar scent wafts its way to Joanna's nose.

Even after so long, this is still the smell of home.

Her heart squeezes, not from pain, but from a sudden, fierce burst of love. Her sight is leaching away again, but she summons up a smile. No need to go out in a bad temper, after a lifetime of good humor! "I am glad you're here. I...understand. Forgive me, being a royal stick in the mud about...hoo hoo...dying. An old woman like me! As though I haven't done it before!"

"You ain't dying, girl. Not while I'm here to bail you out."

That…rather wakes Joanna up. She blinks. "Come again?"

An eye roll. "Dying. Not today. Got a reeeeeal good pal here who's gonna fix you right up." And there's the self-satisfied smirk, laced with gleaming teeth, that lends a lingering bite to the words. "You lay low for a few years, let things settle down...then you and Jimmy can do whatever you want. Play the long game with me, baby girl."

Without a word more, there is a lurch, and Joanna braces herself against the pain that sends her reeling, her vision whiting out momentarily before she refocuses and finds that she's being cradled in strong, thin arms, the coffee shop and the smoke of the meteor crash rapidly vanishing in the distance. "But - John. Sammy," Jo says, because that's important. She has to force it out, because her chest feels ready to collapse, and she's not sure how much longer she'll be able to speak. "Samuel's here - I know his car, he'll be in danger, too, if he tries to reach John -"

"I wouldn't worry about him," is the curt reply. "Can't do anything to help the kid now, anyway."

"What does that mean?" When only uncharacteristic silence greets her, Jo struggles to sit upright; but her chest simply cannot bear the strain, and a renewed spurt of blood trickles out across the mass of red the front of her dress has become. "What the diddly darn flimflam are you saying about my boys?!"

A palm clamps down across the exit wound, applying pressure to the damp spot, for all the good that'll do. "Means it's too late for Sammy. Been too late for a long time, now." The tone is grim, and leaves no room for argument. Which is precisely what Joanna means to do - because if something's wrong with Samuel, with her own flesh and blood baby boy, she has to help him. Has to.

And if something's wrong with Samuel...then what will happen to John, when the last time around Samuel had to raise him all by himself? She was supposed to be there for them. She promised, this time, things would be different and she wouldn't be dead - "I need to - help them - my boys -"

A shake of the head, and strands of dark hair fall into Jo's face, sticking to the blood tracks down the corners of her mouth. She doesn't even have the energy to spit them out as the other talks. "Ain't nothing you can do now. Nothing I can do either, not when there are eyes everywhere. Saving you is risky enough; trying that would just doom us all - had that one confirmed by someone in the know."

They round a corner, but Joanna is completely out of sorts, bamboozled by the dizzying twists her eyes take as the blood loss saps her consciousness. She has no idea where they are, how quickly they might be moving, which way is up or which is down.

"Or will you ask me to watch you die, girlie?" The voice sounds remarkably distant; Jo makes a feeble effort to shake her head, but the most she can do is flop it to the side, nestling closer to the body cradling her. If she weren't in such pain, she'd feel like a child again. "Oh, hell no. That ain't how we play. I'll only say this once, so listen good." Cool breath sweeps along Joanna's neck as a harsh whisper growls right into her ears. "I'm snatchin' you from the jaws of death, girl. Which means you're gonna live another day…"

"And you're gonna like it."

Really, given the circumstances - it's not as though Joanna has much of a choice.
The persistent ache deep between her lungs spikes, and she drifts back into unconsciousness with a sigh.

(If she'd known then what she knows now, she would never have left her sons alone.)

Chapter End Notes

I said the foreshadowing was in the Heir, didn't I?

Tell me that was not the sickest pun yet. Look me in the eye and say it.
Chapter Summary

Silent we went an hour together,
Under grey skies by waters white.
Our hearts were full of windy weather,
Clouds and blown stars and broken light.
Full of cold clouds and moonbeams drifted
And streaming storms and straying fires,
Our souls in us were stirred and shifted
By doubts and dreams and foiled desires.

Chapter Notes

EDIT: Okay, this is my STRONG spoiler-heavy warning for John’s section – he’s still in a serious depressive episode and the Trickster taunts him about it to no end. It is passive aggressive, verbally abusive, and it draws from years of John’s depression and anxiety to try to goad him into a suicidal break. If this could upset you or impact your own health, to skip the worst of it, ctrl-F “Pardon me. Mind if I cut in?” to move straight to the end of the worst of it. Pls take care of yourselves friends.

Hover over the Spanish for unapologetically terrible translations. Power anthems are Magia (Kalafina) and Icarus (Bastille). Chapter-specific warnings for [spoiler] noncon makeouts, disturbing imagery, and both depressive and suicidal thoughts. H&H belong to realmenweartights.tumblr.com - I just took one look at the John-Dad dynamic and thought you know what this needs? Fucking mind control.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

ARC VII - DEVASTATION

Jade's head feels awful. Like she jammed a skewer through one ear and out the other. The side of her face rests on two bars that provide no cushion whatsoever; when she tries to raise her head the first time, she thinks she can feel the tiny indents where the bars have left marks on her face.

"Ow," she says, with feeling, as she peels one eyelid open. Her chest snivels in protest when she pulls herself upright too fast, using what's left of the desk as a convenient backrest. For a moment, her vision refuses to resolve into something she can actually work with, and it takes her a groggy moment before she realizes that her glasses' zoom function got activated at some point. She dials it back so that she's not zoomed in at, like, 500% magnification and to her relief the world slides back into focus. "Ow," she adds, more contemplatively.

"Harley - agony later, panicking now," a really familiar, really angry voice snaps at her. And if she can hear it with her eardrums in this much pain, he must be screeching it to the high heavens. "I mean it, you shit-powered neon green lava lamp, I will fucking disembowel myself and strangle you with my own intestines if you don't wake the fuck up and focus on the issue at hand."

"Hey Karkat?" Jade grimaces and grinds her fingers into her temples. Unfortunately, all this does is make the pain spike even more; she whimpers and swallows the sound down. When she turns her head to the side, she half-expects her skull to fragment, all the pieces scraping and jabbing at each other, but her head feels remarkably solid. Just in horrible pain. "Sometimes you're really gross, you know that?"

"For fuck's sake will you help here, Harley?!" Karkat bellows, and if it makes her head hurt, it also stops her from drifting back off into unconsciousness any time soon! Jade looks at the troll, really looks at him for the first time in what feels like ages. Karkat looks stricken, his claws buried in John's hair and his face the queasiest, palest grey she's ever seen it, almost ashen. She remembers him kneeling at John's side, trying to shake him awake - Samuel lowering his gun to the back of the troll's head -

Jade wrenches her head to the side so fast that her inner ears give another sharp pulse of pain.
Barotrauma, she thinks muggily, as she lays eyes on Samuel's crumpled figure in white over in the corner of the office, right where she left him. Sudden change in ambient air pressure leading to ruptured eardrums. Why is that important, brain?

Because John -

"John!" Jade's eyes open all the way and she reorients herself as fast as her throbbing brain will allow. Karkat and John are leaning up against the wall opposite her. Karkat curled up around John in a defensive, twining coil. The two bars Jade fell over onto when she passed out just then turn out to have been John's splayed out shins. Karkat's eyes burn red - red red, not the rusty burgundy of his handy dandy contact lenses, but she can't think when he could have removed them. "He - tried to - "
Jade touches a palm to her chest, sucking in a breath just to check despite the fact that she has to have been breathing these past couple of minutes, would have noticed suffocating again…

"Tried to kill you," Karkat says, so faint one would think he'd been the one with the breath pulled out of his lungs. "You - maybe he thought - " The troll falters, and his grip on John tightens until the side of his face grinds down on the top of John's head. "He must have been confused. I mean, where the fuck is all this blood coming from? This fucking idiot has gone and sprung a leak. Fuck."

Karkat's face has turned a splotchy mix of red and ashy grey, but Jade, not being as up to snuff on Karkat's emotions as John is, doesn't realize he's started hyperventilating until it gets really obvious.
"Ohhh no. Don't freak out. Karkat, I'm serious, do not freak out," Jade orders. Karkat dissolves into gaspy hiccups, which don't really improve things, and his hands pat at John's face on autopilot, an obvious tremor in his claws. "I said don't freak out, dummy!"

"Oh, you know what, Harley, you telling me not to freak out could possibly be the single shittiest fucking suggestion this side of the continent," Karkat snaps, still hiccupping even as (to Jade's reluctant relief) he stops hyperventilating out of panic and starts hyperventilating in a rising tide of fury. Anger works better than panic. "What could there possibly be to freak me out in this patently wonderful situation? Everything will just be piss-yellow sunshine and daisies if I just not panic, right?
Well sorry, it's kind of hard to pull that off when we're only in this festering shithive excuse for a scientific facility because someone was a brainwashed traitor and look around!
" Karkat rips a hand away from John to jab an accusing claw at Samuel. "This is -"

Karkat's laugh doesn't just edge on the hysterical, it defines hysterical. There's gonna be an audio recording of Karkat's terrified, panicky laugh in the dictionary beside 'hysteric,' at this rate. "Are you guys okay in there?" Roxy calls from the doorway, drawing a full-body flinch from Karkat as his eyes spring from Jade to Roxy.

He opens his mouth - probably to yell, since that's his modus operandi - and before he can tear into Roxy for something stupid to try to distract himself, Jade lunges forward and claps her hand over his mouth. "No biting!" she says, firm in her drill sergeant voice, and Karkat's mouth shuts before he can chomp down on her fingers. "Look, you have the blood thing, right?"

He snarls, and troll-sharp teeth scrape her hand. "I will bite you, so help me -"

"Don't care, don't care!" Jade sing-songs, frustrated, wishing she was upright so that she could stamp her foot properly. "Can you do anything to help John? Can you fix his nosebleed or - or - anything? Anything would be great right now, Karkat!"

"No!" Karkat says, the word exploding from his mouth with such force that Jade feels spit on her palm. Ewww. "I don't even know if I can fix other people, I've only ever fixed me, selfish fuck that I am! And it's not like there's a fucking cut I could scab over! Now he's stopped bleeding and I can't even fucking tell what set it off to start with!"

Jade thinks she knows what set it off. But if Karkat's wading knee deep in the river Nile, she's not about to shove him underwater by bringing up the fact that John's probably just as brainwashed as any of the Scratch kids. Except worse.

"Well, Dave just got shot," Jade says, removing her hand from Karkat's face now that she's got him distracted from Roxy. "So I think you should probably start figuring how to fix other people right now."

Karkat stares at her, aggrieved. "I'm not leaving him."

Jade wants to scream. She wants her head to stop ringing with pain like a bell, reverberating in time with the claps of thunder that rage outside. When did it even start raining?

More than anything, she wants Karkat to just - "Listen to me for once!" She seizes Karkat by the shoulders, very aware of John's head nodding when she shakes the troll. "Do you think John will ever be okay if Dave dies?!" He doesn't answer in less than half a second, which is pretty much by sheer coincidence the exact length of time it takes for Jade's patience to fray. "The answer is no! I don't care how much you hate both of us, you fuckass, the answer is still gonna be no!"

"Did you just say fuckass?" Karkat says weakly.

This time, Jade does scream. "GET IT TOGETHER AND SAVE DAVE!"

"ALRIGHT, FUCK, WOMAN, I'M GOING!" Karkat screams back. He seems taken aback by his own response for all of the five seconds Jade can bear to watch his expression flip from surprise to consternation, so she takes charge of yanking him to his feet, his claws falling away from John as her ears roars like the sea, and shoves him in the general direction of the door.

"Roxy," Jade adds, somehow lowering her voice despite the fact that the scream of frustration swells in her throat, just waiting for another excuse. "Can you make sure he actually goes to Dave?"

Roxy nudges the fallen tranq gunkind not-very-subtly away from her with a toe, and Jade guesses she can see why it would be a bad idea to remind Karkat that Roxy just shot John out of the blue when the troll's not all the way rational. "Yeah, sure thing!" she says, folding her hands out of the way behind her back. Jade half expects her to start whistling to try to assert her total innocence.

Shooting? No, she's just casually loitering in the doorway. "But - will you be okay here?" Roxy asks, stepping out of the way before Karkat can motor her down in his break for the door. "'Cause whey didn't know there'd be two and 'm sorry, but ur John guy is so compurgated - compro - damnit, I can't talk today!"

Jade shouldn't have stood up so fast. Her eardrums might have popped, she knows for almost certain, but who can tell what damage all those pressure swings might have done to her vestibular system. That's the excuse she gives for the dizzy wave of pain that nearly lays her out flat; only a hasty hand on the cracked left side of the desk and a cautious touch of space powers keeps her upright to smile at Roxy. "No worries! They're both unconscious, after all!” she says. And then, before she can stop herself, her stupid brain with its need to know things and have evidence to mull over spits out: "You're sure John is -" She hesitates, and then makes wormy motions with her hands because if she tries to say it out loud she might cry. Or Karkat could hear and have another panic attack, which would also probably make her cry for a different reason.

Roxy sucks air in through her teeth, wincing. "Yuppers. I've seen that kinda bleeding afore, you know? It totes happened when Doc Die went 'n put a whammy on the Deuce dude. But brown blood, right, just like - all down his face. And then he got hauled into a review, which is the whatchamacallit when they suck more of your soul or something, idk. Poor little guy...

Jade can't quite find the power to feel even the least bit sorry about Clubs Deuce; she's still sore over the whole Mexico-Texas debacle, thanks very much. WV might have recovered fine, but she'll bet anything him and his crazy (but awesome) giant robot/missile launcher/subterranean drill/space power tracker-building team had something to do with the cage that cut her off from her space powers. "But it's definitely a mindgrub thing?"

Roxy nods, emphatic. "Def." She glances to her right, around the side of the door where Jade can't see - and can barely sense - any movement going on in the direction Dave fell and Karkat ran. "Jus' be careful, aright?" the Scratch says, lowering her eyes and swallowing hard. "He looked all smiley face while he choked you out. If he's anythin' like Janey ended up, but with smiles, you can't be all inveigled by his trickery. I don't think it's rightly him n e more."

Jade squeezes her eyes shut, then wrenches them open because the world does this seriously not-awesome spinning thing that almost drops her. She's trusted her powers enough, even in the void wards, to float herself on occasion and to play minor pranks with Dave, but maybe it would be a good idea to not even levitate herself after the whole hand-amputating saga and what with the way her head feels like radioactive mush. "Help Dave?" she says, her voice betraying more pain than she means it to; she shakes her head when Roxy takes a step forward instead of back. "Just – maybe if you see her, ask Doctor Lalonde if there're stretchers around here. We need to move these guys at some point. And if it looks like Karkat's gonna freak out" - and she hesitates before finishing, in a stage whisper - "knock him out, too. On account of, if he freaks, John...isn't gonna be able to talk him down." Jade doesn't think Karkat would hurt people (his ragefits seem more like they hurt him than other people, from what Jade has seen) but she's not risking another out of control hero running around this place!

"Karkat patrol and Lolonde stretcher request." Roxy salutes her with a tap of two fingers against her forehead. "Gotcha!" And she darts off, leaving the tranquilizer gunkind on the floor.

Which, as it turns out, is a good thing. The anesthetic-sedative from Jade's tranq dart might be a super strong mix, designed to take down lusii, but John's already murmuring and twitching, eye lashes fluttering, by the time help arrives in the form of two lab techs. Jade can hear other people racing by the door, headed for Dave, but it doesn't soothe her at all, not when John's eyes start glowing a bright enough blue to be seen through his eyelids.

It's only been maybe a few minutes - Jade was unconscious for a little while, so her sense of time is shot, but she's positive that it can't have been too long - which means that somehow John has recovered from being sedated even more quickly than Jade does. The lab techs who arrive with a stretcher and gurney don't comprehend Jade's rapid-fire, panicky explanation, and are mostly concerned with checking John's vitals. Jade ends up cracking open the tranq rifle Roxy dropped on the ground to seize another dart so she can inject John with before he can wake up properly. "What did you just dose him with?!!" the human intern gasps, horrified, as John slumps back down into oblivion.

She doesn't really blame them for not really getting why John waking up would be a bad thing - really! Honest! They weren't here to witness his smileypants power trip, so how could she expect them to understand? - but her head hurts enough that she can't help the irritability that spills over and turns her voice snappish. "Get a lot of sedatives, okay?" she says at last, when she has fought down the urge to use Samuel for convenient target practice. "I'm pretty sure John is - he's got one of those things in his head, you know?"

Thankfully, in the skeleton crew of a staff Rue Lalonde brought along from Maine, the news that everyone is to be tested for mindgrubs has spread outside of neurology, and the troll in a short intern's lab coat blanches, his dark brown eyes eyeing John warily. "Oh man," he says, pulling open half of his lab coat and drawing out a new syringe. "We're going to need the good drugs. Here. Morphine."

Jade blinks. "You lab guys carry narcotics around?" she asks, torn between being impressed and being kind of concerned.

"You're the one who raided anesthesiology before we left?!!" the other tech says almost at the same time, sounding faint.

"They had me in charge of the indigoblood in Maine," the intern says, grim, as he hands Jade the syringe and draws another to clutch in his own fist. "I had to fill out all the paperwork for her transfer to a facility that could take care of coldbloods in dementia while everyone else was getting ready for the move. I had to sedate her fifteen times in four hours and by god, I'm never going anywhere without sedatives again in my life. I don't care if it's probably illegal somehow. I've got barbiturates, morphine, benzos - seriously. Do you need extra?"

"...Yeah, can't hurt, right?" Jade gnaws on her lip and accepts another, holding both syringes in her hand awkwardly, wishing her sylladex could be relied upon so she didn't have to hold everything. She had more pockets on her lab coat, but she's down to her suit again and thus mostly pocketless. The pockets she does have would wind up with her stabbing herself in the leg with a sharp needle - no thanks. "Uh, has anyone seen Doctor Lalonde? Because I think we need to get John back to neurology and" - she scowls back at Samuel, still unconscious in his time-out corner - "ugh, probably that guy too."

Jade tries to squish down her instinctive sense of betrayal and apply some logic to the situation, because she's pretty angry right now, and more than a little hurt, and both of those things are making it incredibly hard to admit that maybe Samuel might have a grub in his mind, too. That potentially she totally amputated part of the hand of someone who's not entirely responsible for his own actions.

Except he tried to shoot Roxy and Karkat and he shot Dave oh nooo - "Someone is taking care of Dave, right?!" Someone other than Karkat, since he's a Knight and not some magical healer priest guy, and what was Jade thinking, sending him to try to patch up Dave? She does her utmost not to whimper at the fact that her logic seems to have shot itself in the foot. She can almost hear her grandpa's stern 'Bad form, dear girl, bad form…'

"Doctor Lalonde and her daughter and Ms Maryam are with him." The human intern nods to the other from the far end of the scoop stretcher, and Jade helps to lift John (he's all muscle!) up so they can dump him onto the rolling gurney. John's face is covered with blood still, lolling to the side so that his cheeks leave a smear of red on the sheet. "As well as the new young Miss Lalonde and Mr Vantas. Ms Maryam says she has medicull training, and to be honest, our only trauma surgeon mostly does research, so anything she can do..." Then the woman pauses, looking past Jade. "What about him?"

Ugh. Samuel is the only one she could be ogling in that direction. Jade sighs harder than she ever has in her life, and considers letting the pain white out her groggy brain so she can get some painkillers, too. But no! She has to be vigilant, because they're down a Dave and a John and those two aren't easily replaced in an emergency. Constant vigilance!

...Never mind. No Harry Potter references. They just make her think of splinching. Ugh. She's gonna have words with that future Dave if and when she catches up to him.

"I'll bring him," Jade says, teetering over to the corner. His hand draws her eye against her will, and she swallows hard at the seared wound that dips from the side of his ring finger to the point where his thumb used to meet his wrist. For a moment the horror of it almost eats her alive (this is John's dad, his weird stern but harmless dad who likes baking and lets kids stay in his house without prior notice and smiles as he makes enough pancakes to feed a small army and why is he bad) before she shakes it off and bends to inject one of her handy syringes of morphine into a vein, squeezing his arm with her other hand in the absence of a tourniquet to make things easier. "Let's go."

Jade hauls Samuel along by his ankle, letting his head drag along the floor as she stomps along behind the intern techs – Fredyn and Hannu, she thinks are their names, but her brain still hurts too much to fact check. She could probably make Samuel float but really, right now at this very moment, this mister has earned a lump or three on his noggin, and that's that. Before she leaves the room, she remembers to grab the tranq gun with its handy stash of more tranquilizers and sling it over her back, just in case. The bodies of dead Daves litter the hallway still, but as unnerving as they are, they've also started to grow transparent and thin, fading away into nothingness so gradually that Jade can barely just feel the atoms vanishing: matter erases itself from existence as paradox space asserts its merciless dominion over the laws of physics. It might take hours, but probably no more than that, and the scattered legions of dead bodies will have disappeared into the aether. Fredyn and the other intern went right for neurology, so Jade doesn't even have time to do more than sweep a worried gaze over the huddle of people surrounding Dave in the opposite direction.

At least, she thinks distantly, they know who that sleeper agent is. If only she had a way to call Grandpa back from his mission to check up on his robot body's creator. But for years she's accepted the necessity for radio silence on both their parts; legally and financially, and not in the least for his safety and her own, it's better for the world to believe James Harley dead. His concern that someone among the guardians would betray him if they knew about his survival has been vindicated, yet Jade finds herself wishing intensely that his paranoia had not been sooo strong. She could have kept a cell phone concealed, safe in the depths of the sylladex where no one could steal it, and heck, he could have a uranium-powered rotary phone installed in his chest cavity for all she knows! They could have made it work.

Instead, now, she finds herself oddly cold. Watching a Dave with cyanotic lips melt out of existence, Jade well and truly does not know what to do.

Which is why it's a pretty darn good thing that, when her throbbing ears finally register the swift tapping of footsteps behind her, she swivels to find Rose coming up beside her, the other girl's pale purple eyes narrowed and fixed on John. "I should have known. I should have seen," are the first words out of her mouth, a low murmur meant for Jade's ears. Her hair is kind of a wreck, barely held back from her face by her headband.

"We all should have seen," Jade says. It takes some juggling, but she switches which hand is clamped around Samuel's ankle and tucks her remaining morphine syringe away so she can pat Rose on the shoulder. "I mean, this...this is kind of a big thing for all of us to miss! But we did..."

"I knew something was coming. But it was so all-encompassing, I couldn't even begin to understand where all of this mischance came from." Rose surges forward, quickening her pace as though to catch up with John and the two techs - and then subsides, falling back in step with Jade. "What happened in that room, Jade?"

Where to even start? "Karkat got there first, but I was right behind him, so I saw that John was already unconscious or something and bleeding everywhere." Jade bites her lip. For a moment her emotions almost crunch down on her, the misery of the whole situation stinging her eyes with tears, but she gulps it down. "And then, the way his d- Samuel just starting rambling about how he wanted it to be a 'quick break'...and he called Roxy a 'rogue asset' when he saw her...He shot Dave and he was gonna shoot Karkat and then when John woke up, he acted all creepy and tried to kill me!" Jade can feel her lip quivering. "Rose, I'm pretty sure he did that to John. Maybe he's been working for the Midnight Crew all along, and now he's done the same thing to John that they did to the Scratch kids and my ears hurt and this is the most awful thing ever!"

Ah. She's crying now. "This is - the worst!" she says between gasps; her grip on Samuel's leg fumbles and she drops it so she can use both hands to smear around the tears and snot dripping down her face. Wiping with the sleeves of her suit just makes more of a mess, and that's the final straw. "Nngnh!"

"Jade. Here." Jade's ears feel like they hurt worse than before, if that's possible, two white hot points of pain that bring another flood of tears to her eyes. Her whole face feels hot and sticky and awful and she hates it, but she hears Rose through the white noise and blinks through the tears until she can make out a little folded square of cloth, held out in Rose's hand. She sniffs really loudly because handkerchiefs remind her of Grandpa (never go anywhere without a rifle and a good cloth to clear it with, dear!) and she wants him to be here to help right now. But then she accepts the handkerchief with wobbly fingers and rubs her whole face with it, blowing her nose in utter misery, and - It kind of helps. A surprising amount, actually! Having her face clean and not-sticky is a definite improvement, and Jade shudders through a breath that almost manages not to be a sob. "There must be something less than hospital-grade morphine we can find to help with your ears," Rose is saying, producing another folded cloth from her pocket and dabbing at Jade's ears and neck. "Mother must have a cache of ibuprofen lying around, if I know her at all. A perforated tympanic membrane?"

"Both." Jade snuffles, pushes up her glasses to scrub at her eyes one last time, and blows her nose again. She wrinkles her nose when she sees the gross mess she's made of the poor handkerchief, though. "Sorry."

"No matter. Dave's left eardrum was shot, too," Rose says, showing Jade the streaks of red-brown blood and dried flakes that have transferred from her neck to the second cloth. "It's a good thing he suffered from an abrupt cessation of consciousness, really, or he might have given himself an aneurysm trying to pretend it didn't hurt."

Jade tries to laugh. A smile counts, right? She tries and that's what matters. She then squats to glare at Samuel and start dragging him along by the leg again. The gurney has pulled ahead and turned the far corner, the rattling of its wheels on the tile a low buzz in her ears. There's another dead Dave by the wall - the first one Jade remembers seeing - but it's turning transparent just like the others, and she finds it a little easier not to look at it too long as she and Rose start walking again. "What's -" takes a shaky breath and needs to start again. Keep it together! "What's with all these Daves? A future Dave came and talked to us before we came to see what happened to John, so I know he's okay..." And he's going to be okay, Jade's brain finally pieces together, which is heartening to remember. It means Karkat can't possibly screw up Dave with the blood thing any time soon, anyway!

Rose closes her eyes and shakes her head. Jade takes the blood-stained handkerchief from the other girl, and carefully, captchalogs both handkerchiefs in her sylladex so at least Rose doesn't have to try to stick them back in her pockets and mess up her clothes. "I couldn't say, Jade. They're so riddled with bad luck they look like black pits in my sight. I can only speculate that they were Daves who tried to prevent this catastrophe and failed." Rose thumbs at one of the void bracers on her wrist, the side that needed to be replaced earlier.

Doomed, Jade thinks. "Dead ends."

"Precisely." Rose appears to rouse herself from a moment of consideration, and raises her head to look at Jade again. Her eyes are steely. "But we're alive. Have you noticed? Our fortunes have plummeted to an absolutely preposterous low - and yet no one has died with the sole exception, apparently, of Daves who appear to be erasing themselves even as we speak. Our own Dave is assured to survive by the very mechanics of time travel."

Jade likes to consider herself an optimist. Even so, she needs a good minute of dragging Samuel's unconscious meatsuit along behind her, mulling it over, before Rose's twisty, evasive point hits home. "No one died," she repeats, thoughtfully. "Which means that in a way...this is almost a best case scenario?" Rose confirms her guess with a sharp nod. "Huh! But I dunno, John is still brainwashed and probably about to wake up spitting mad if we don't get that thing out of his head..."

"And yet, here we all are." Rose's grin is harsh, but when she turns it on Jade, it almost seems wistful. "For some peculiar reason, amidst all this overwhelming potential for destruction, we survive. John is here, where we can reach him and help him, and the traitor in our midst is in hand, rather than hidden and ready to spring a more devastating trap on us. And through some impossible luck, we are in a facility with doctors who are perhaps the only experts in removing mindgrubs from human brains on the planet."

Rose begins to pull ahead, and Jade has to jog a little to keep up with the other hero's lengthening stride as they approach the neurology department. She manages to twist Samuel's shoe half the way off as she switches hands for a better grip, but when it falls off she drags him right over the poor fallen footwear without stopping. "So you think we'll be okay?" Jade asks, feeling a little lost.

"I have a plan to salvage the situation. We've rather forcefully hit rock bottom, but as long as we are alive, things are not beyond repair." Rose holds the door open for Jade to drag Samuel through; his remaining hand almost ends up squashed in the doorway when she pivots to continue on to the next door without waiting. "I will beg John's forgiveness later, when he's back in his right mind, but for the moment there is no time to waffle over matters as they stand. A coup is in order."

Jade's ears perk up. She can't help it. Ever since that minor uprising she helped out with in Southeast Asia, coups catch her interest. "A coup?"

"It appears that I must take up John's mantle." Rose's smile ticks up another notch. "I must be the friendleader."

Novitiate Halburn is the one to run into them. Jade is more aware than ever just how understaffed this place is as they venture through neurology, passing door after door with windows through which she can see machines and desks and filing cabinets covered in tarps. Rose navigates the unoccupied halls with unerring steps until they round the corner and Jade sighs with relief at the sight of the gurney with John in the middle of a hall of brightly lit rooms, with the familiar violetblood watching as one of the interns injects John with more of a sedative. "Ms Rose. Ms Harley," Halburn says almost before he looks up, his braid swinging as he turns toward them, his fine-boned face solemn as he takes in the unconscious man behind the two heroes. "We ran out of gurneys?"

"We ran out of caring," Jade sniffs, her lower lip edging out as she yanks demonstratively on Samuel's foot. "He did something to John to make him totally lose it, and we're pretty sure he's the Crew's agent!"

"So Hannu was explaining." Halburn's expression fills with distaste, and he shakes his head as he touches a talisman hanging around his neck. Probably a magic thingy. "Here, this way. We have placed the Scratch children in the room closest to the theater, but the next room over should have more beds with restraints. If you think we'll need them, of course," he adds, stepping out of the way so that the two techs can continue on with the rolling stretcher.

"Unfortunately, yes," Rose says, tucking her hair behind her ear. "The strongest restraints you all have."

"John choked me out because I hurt his dad. He'd never do that if he were himself!" Jade chimes in.

"His personality completely altered?" After Jade elaborates a little more, Halburn looks almost ill - or at least, more purple around the earfins - and he accompanies them into a mostly empty room taken up with a row of hospital beds, where the two interns have started wrestling John onto the bed nearest the door. Jade drags Samuel to the one furthest away and hauls him up by herself, pouting while Rose helps her quickly truss the guy up in as many restraining belts as they can commandeer. "And most of our staff, naturally, is still busy assisting with the surgery for the first boy."

"How much longer will that take?" Jade asks, grunting in the process of yanking a wrist restraint as tight as it will go. The sooner they can get John's brain free of unwanted parasite things, the better, in her opinion!

"It is, quite literally, brain surgery. Ordinary brain tumor removal procedures can take anywhere from three to five hours, without complications," Halburn says, leaning in to pluck Samuel's eyelid up with a faint hum. He's remarkably cool about checking a total traitor-pants's vitals, which Jade would be more impressed by if she were in a rational mood. "Marion is passably good at what he does, but he can't speed up that time frame without risking permanent brain damage."

"Then I hope you guys have a looot of sedatives and stuff, because John's going through morphine like water." Jade sighs as Rose finishes strapping down Samuel's disfigured hand with a deft flourish, and the two heroes exchange weary grins. "Also, does anyone have any ibuprofen I can have? My head hurts something fierce!"

Halburn winces.

...And okay, that silence where the answer to Jade's question should be? Not a good one.

"Doctor Lalonde should have a supply of ibuprofen in her office desk," the violetblood says, too slow, his claws fluttering as he grits his teeth. "But as to the matter of sedatives - well…"

"There's a reason I brought some from Maine!" Fredyn calls from John's bedside.
"Our main stockpile is there," Hannu adds.

Jade, wondering why the heck they're standing around Samuel like they actually care about his dumb butt, nudges Rose's arm with her elbow and leads the way back toward John and the techs. The closer she gets, the more her head throbs, a pulsing reminder that this whole mess is one huge horrorshow.

"By which you mean your supply here is limited," Rose translates, stepping right up to John's side and pressing her hand to the side of his face, her lip tight as she wipes at the blood. Fredyn has to inch around her to start hooking John up to an IV. "How bad is it?"

"We brought in enough anesthesia and anticonvulsant medication for a dozen or so of Marion's major surgeries," Halburn says, ticking them off on his claws. "Some general anesthesia, pain-killers, and sedatives for minor incidents and emergencies, but I am afraid that Exarchopoulos may have burned through most of the stock while dealing with a certain madman's stabbing rampage. We really didn't anticipate an attempted massacre when we were prioritizing what to transport here."

Jade's heart, momentarily bolstered by Rose's confidence declaration that she had a plan, drops, and maybe it's psychosomatic, but her chest starts to ache with renewed intensity. "And John would need basically all of it," she says, pressing her hand to her forehead. "If his murdery half wakes up, John can probably just teleport right out of bed and start hurting people again!" Jade frantically tries to calculate how much morphine they'd need to keep John down long enough to get him into the operating room - but there's still those five hours that they need to stall for, plus the need to keep Jake and Jane mostly unconscious as well, and if they're low on medicine already - and if Dave ends up needing painkillers - "Hmmm...crap!"

Which is, of course, when someone lets out a blood-curdling scream. Jade and Rose both flinch, heads swiveling at the same time toward the wall, as the shriek of rage cuts off and a female voice begins to roar, "RELEASE ME, YOU INSOLENT SHITFUCKING SCHMUCKS! YOU THINK YOU CAN KEEP ME HERE, YOU FUCKSHITTING FUCKS?! I WILL - SHIT FUCKING FUCKERS, I'LL KILL ALL OF YOU - LET ME GO!"

"Jane, I presume?" Rose has to shout to be heard, but she still manages to sound resigned. "Well, at least from the sound of things, it would appear these restraints do hold."

Fredyn doesn't even seem surprised. "On it," he groans, passing the IV bag to Hannu. "Why this again…"

"Wait, how much of that morphine do you have?" Jade asks before he can escape.

"Not enough," the intern says, darting out of the room at a dead run. The repeated shrieks of variants on old-school insults and ‘shitfuck’ evolve to ever more specific threats, and Jade wonders if she ought to go help or something when they hear the shriek of metal bending – when the Scratch kid’s shouts begin to slur and dwindle into incoherent shouts resembling something like ‘FFUFSKFHICIIITTS’ before, at last, Jane passes out again.

Dirk in surgery. Dave shot. John, Jane, and Jake all brainwashed and unable to control their actions. And one Samuel Egbert, who probably doesn’t guzzle morphine by the tubeful for breakfast like those last three probably do, but who Jade wouldn’t put past to have the sheer audacity (and the prankster’s gambit) needed to squirm his way out of those restraints, no matter how tight they’re drawn.

And Jade’s head won’t stop pounding. Darn it, if she starts crying again out of frustration, she’ll – she’ll – urgh! "Rose? Please tell me your plan still works?" Jade says, this close to pleading.
"Because any second now Karkat's gonna run in here somehow and if we don't have a plan he's gonna start yelling, too..." Which would basically be the worst. Karkat's yelling is funny only when he gets all riled about dumb stuff, not when it's over serious things like this.

Rose has a fresh handkerchief out, and finishes swabbing at the blood on John's face even as Jade starts freaking out a little. Soon there are only dry trails of red down John's dark cheeks to show where he bled everywhere. But Rose's little extra eye blinks open on her forehead; Jade takes that as a sign that Rose is trying super hard to see what can be done, and represses her own growing panic as the silence drags on.

"...Yes. But we can't afford those five hours." Rose says at last, laying the cloth aside and folding her fingers together. John's face twitches minutely, the slightest spasm of a muscle near his mouth, and Jade shivers. Even unconscious, there's something off about John's serene sleeping face. Someone with that much gore on their cheeks should not have a smile tugging on their mouth. "No," Rose says, firm. "Here's another question, Novitiate - who supplied this facility with sedatives before the relocation to Maine?"

Halburn's eyes may be a purplish kind of violet, but his smile is all shark as he inclines his head to Rose. "A private pharmacological supply company, serving the greater Seattle area. As a matter of fact, I believe Exarchopoulos placed a rush order before you all left, through a parent foundation we have in common. But even if they received the request right away and the foundation agreed to cover the surcharge, it would still take a day or so to fill the order and ship all of that out here."

"The hazards of building your laboratory facilities in the middle of a remote mountain-bound valley, no doubt. Mother always did have a crippling flare for the dramatic," Rose says, raising her folded hands to her mouth. "Damn. I may be able to alter my plan, but it would involve delving into his mind while we still have the medication to keep him from losing control -"

"Hold the front door," Jade interrupts, raising her hand. "Which parent foundation?"

Jade finds herself surrounded by disapproval, which is a pretty lame way to try to recover from burst eardrums. Novitiate Halburn disapproves of Rose's plan, Rose disapproves of Jade's plan, and Jade disapproves of the fact that neither of them is using the common sense they were born with.

"Performing a mindscape viewing ritual to gain a cursory idea of the state of his psyche and the effects of a mindgrub on it is one thing," Halburn tells Rose, the most agitated that Jade has ever seen him. "You're talking about an deep incursion into a mind in turmoil. It would take a full Lectoris to successfully engage with a mind so deeply -"

"I've performed similar incursions before," Rose says, her jaw set in a way that takes Jade too long to realize kind of resembles Bro Strider. "Not only in the reconstruction of my own mental world and its defenses, but in the process of accessing Kanaya's memories, with her permission, to remove traces of grimlight poisons from her psychic profile. John has been within my mind, as well, and he had no trouble manifesting a mental avatar to assist me with. I have reason to believe that Jade and Dave's presence would be beneficial. We're stronger together, and we might be able to help John free himself from whatever tricks and suggestions this grub has laid to entrap his mind. It would at least purchase us more time to wait for the worm itself to be extracted. All I would require would be access to some of your ritual circles."

"Your own mind is one thing. Interfering in the mind of another is quite another." Halburn massages his hornbeds through his hair, looking pained. But if he has a headache, Jade could not have less sympathy for him. "I cannot quite fathom how it is that I am the one arguing against an experimental "And I think I should go right now to get that medication!" Jade says, folding her arms and legs so that she hangs in midair. "There's a reason it's called the Harley Foundation, y'know! They'll listen to me, definitely. And with my powers I can bring the whole shipment here in less than an hour! Two hours, tops!" She's not entirely sure the agony in her head is entirely conducive to safe teleporting (and she's honestly curious about where the door and pistol might have ended up after she tossed them in these twisting wards) but if she can take Bec and drive him out to where the wards are thinnest, the wolf will most likely wake up and help her out.

Rose is shaking her head before Jade even finishes. "I am cognizant of the fact that having the de jure heir to the foundation make a personal request might speed along the delivery of more sedatives, but it's late in the day. They might simply be unable to obtain that much medication on such short notice, no matter what they do. I'd rather have the four of us together, Jade."

"Because you think John will get stronger and try to fight the mindgrub programming harder. But what if it just makes his brainwashed side stronger, too?!" Jade throws up her hands. "He used the windy thing to suck all the air away from me, so he can still use it, right? If we all pile in there at once and he gets some kind of power buff, the sedatives might stop working! He already heals really fast..."

As if to prove her point for her, John starts to twitch more on the hospital bed, one of his wrists flexing in its tripled restraints, and Hannu has to dive to inject more sedatives. "Giving him this much morphine can't be healthy," the intern says in an undertone to Halburn, but Jade and Rose hear anyway, exchanging glances. Rose's jaw is still stubbornly set, but her folded hands have gone white-knuckled, and Jade can tell she can't deny that Jade has a point. They have no idea how badly John's been messed up in the head, if he's just got orders to irrationally defend his stupid dad, or if this is an entire personality switch like the kind Jane and Jake got saddled with. Making him stronger, at least while he still has that mindgrub pumping chemicals into his brain, seems like a pretty questionable thing to do.

"We might have to take that chance. I can't tell if your leaving will bring good fortune or ill - we're already so deep in this sinkhole that any action we take is better than nothing," Rose says, which is neither a yes nor a no.

"The worst that can happen is that I really can't get the sedatives early," Jade points out. "And if that's the case I can bounce right back and we can do the mind visit thing anyway."

"The longer we wait, the more likely it is that John's system gets used to all this morphine, and adapts to filter it out even faster."

"I really do not believe that entering his mind is a viable prospect," Halburn interjects, and the whole argument cycles right back to the beginning. Urgh! By the time Doctor Lalonde arrives with Roxy, Kanaya, Karkat, and Dave's unconscious body on another gurney (one that Karkat practically drop kicks into the room so he can push past it to reach John's bedside), Jade is ready to roll her eyeballs right out of her skull at how much time everyone is wasting!

First things first, though. "Doctor Lalonde, do you have any ibuprofen?"

"Always." The doctor draws a pale prescription bottle from the pocket of her lab coat and rattles it so that the pills within click against the sides of the bottle. "To think, I used these for years to stave off hangovers of my own devising, and now I find them just as necessary to stave off the migraines of sobriety."
"Yay! Thank you!" Jade says, accepting the bottle and twisting the top off so fast that the child proofing gives with a crack that probably means it's splintered beyond repair. Oops. She taps five out into her palm and downs them in two swallows, pulling a face when her first gulp doesn't succeed in finishing the job. It'll take a while for the pain-killers to kick in, but the psychosomatic relief is worth a million bucks. The white bursts of pain that have taken up residence in her ears ease almost immediately; Jade blinks and the fuzziness around the edge of her vision clears up a lot. Hurray!

"I'm gonna teleport out to see if I can get the shipment of sedatives here faster," she informs the doctor while passing the pill bottle back, hurrying before Rose can interrupt her totally excellent and well-thought out plan again. "John's just too evil right now to let him run around loose but he's also too awesome and we're gonna run out of medication before you guys can get that thing out of his head." Also: "How's Dave?"

"Jade -" Rose begins, exasperatedly, but Kanaya's head snaps up from where she appears to be inspecting Dave's torso. His fancy suit jacket and shirt have been peeled up and Jade can make out a neat line of stitches over a wound that has already started to knit together into a scab. Which kind of makes the stitches redundant? But Jade can see why the precaution might have seemed reasonable in all this chaos. "I have performed field surgery," Kanaya says, nodding to Roxy, who digs into her pocket and produces a mashed up bullet slug with a wide grin. "He was able to speed our healing capabilities earlier during battle, but he seems to have passed out due to shock before he could repeat the phenomenon. He should awaken shortly, however."

Another knot of tension eases in Jade's beleaguered head, and the pain in her ears slowly starts to wean off. Dave will be okay. Dave will be awake soon.

"Our supply has run so low?" Doctor Lalonde asks, gaze flicking to Novitiate Halburn, who dips his head in a nod. He'd started looking a little frazzled before his supervisor arrived, and Jade is kind of impressed by how quickly he's managed to smooth the lingering irritation from their three-way debate from his face and tuck stray hairs back into the smooth black braid. "Then that may be our best option." She scans the room, reaches Samuel's unconscious body in his corner bed of shame, and averts her gaze, hurt lingering in her eyes before she recollects herself. "Would you know where to inquire?"

Jade shrugs. "I figured I'd head to wherever the Harley Foundation's local office is, and go from there."

Rue's eyebrow rises, while at John's bedside Rose sucks in a breath through her nose. "I would still prefer you, Dave, and I all went into John's mind together, Jade."

"If you're that worried about it, I'll hurry back!" Jade replies, crossing an x over her heart with a finger. "And you and Dave can visit first if you want to do, I don't know, reconnaissance or something! Recon is smart, right?"

"Who the taintchafing fuck," Karkat says, before Rose can concede Jade's totally valid point, "said anything about sticking your grungy human fingers into John's thinkpan? Whisper the name into my awaiting auricular sponges this instant. I need to add them to my shit list."

"I did. I only hope that membership on your list of excrement doesn't preclude our newborn friendship, Karkat," Rose says with an utterly straight face.

It confounds Karkat for a few seconds, before he swaps out incredulity for disdain. "Membership on the shit list is currently in the low thousands. You're in good fucking company, don't worry. But I have arrived to inform you that John's cracked pan is off-limits until actual professionals figure out what the fuck is wrong with him."
"That is in fact my aim - to ascertain exactly how John's psyche has been skewed by the mindgrub," Rose says. She and Karkat eye each other across the hospital bed, Karkat glowering and Rose implacable. Halburn and Doctor Lalonde have started to converse in low whispers back by Dave, while Roxy glances between the two conversations with a worried wrinkle between her eyebrows, tipping the bullet from one palm to the other absently. "Any chemical programming the mindgrub might have done will only be half the problem; even if the grub is removed, his psyche will still have the suggestions and orders it left behind engrained in his mind. At least this way we'll have the advantage of seeing exactly how John's father might have been manipulating him to think."

Karkat starts with a false sweetness in his voice, before the ire spills over again. "Well, I hate to be the bearer of shit-tastic news, but congratulations, Rose, you are crazier than Short-shorts in the next room over if you think this is a good fucking idea!" His eyes stay fixed in a glare at Rose, but Jade sees the troll's hands reach out automatically to grab John's hand. "And - fuck, where even were you people while this was all happening?! You and Kanaya, you weren't there and you think I'll just magically not notice if you don't mention it? Sorry to rain on your parade but here I am, dumping a metric fuckton of 'hell-fucking-no' on your state-mandated propagandistic marching event!"

Kanaya sighs, the sound full of remorse, as she finishes yanking Dave's shirt back down and smoothing out wrinkles in the cloth. She has, Jade sees, sewn up the tiny holes where the bullet tore through fabric, too. Rose just raises both eyebrows and says, bland as porridge, "We were having sex."

Karkat stares in horror; Roxy lets loose a wolf-whistle before cackling. Doctor Lalonde's head whips up from her discussion with Halburn so fast Jade can feel the woman's neck crack. "What?!" she says, her voice doing some really interesting gymnastics between octaves.

"Engaging in sexual intercourse," Kanaya clarifies. Jade can't help it - she starts cackling, too, and Roxy has to clap a hand over her mouth when she gets another look at Doctor Lalonde's stricken expression and the way that Halburn has begun to study the ceiling with remarkable intensity.

"And unfortunately that was a little distracting," Rose says, with a shrug. "But we are here now, and I have every intention of helping John. Even it takes a journey to the very center of his mind to do so."

"For-fucking-get it. If you think you're excavating John's poor dumbass gourd without me there to keep you fuckwads from shitting all over the only person I love, don't bother to think again - just remove your brain from its pan, put it on the floor, and let me find Casey so I can smash it with a hammer."

Oh no. Crap, crap, crap! Karkat is losing it again, Jade can tell. He's leaning further and further over John, curling up again into that defensive, growly stance he huddled up in earlier, and the more he spews vitriol the louder the clicking growl of genuine rage gets in his voice. Kanaya shifts from her position beside Dave, and Jade tries to be sneaky as she watches in the periphery of vision as Kanaya prowls over to Rose's side, all subtle and everything.

But - Jade has a solution! Yeah, this could totally work! "Karkat can go instead of me!" Jade says brightly, beaming at Rose.

Karkat's nostrils flare. Rose, on the other hand, frowns, thoughtful. "He's not a player from our session, though," the other girl points out, studying Karkat with a considering eye. Karkat just bares his teeth in reply.

"Yeah, but he's also John's moirail! So he'd know even more than we do about how to get John calm and sane again!" This idea sounds better and better with every reason Jade makes up on the fly. "Me, I can zip out to get the delivery, and you guys'll probably have John back before I even bounce back to the station! Right~?

"Harley, you're making sense?" Karkat takes a hand away from John's to prod at his ears in a way that makes Jade wince reflexively.

"I do do that. You know, a lot of the time," Jade says, huffing and folding her arms again. This covers the way she crosses her fingers for good luck. *Come on, come on...*as intriguing as a trip into John's mind sounds, Jade really just doesn't think they've got the time or the medication to make it work if all of them jump in at once. Okay, maybe she knows less about mind magic stuff than she does other sciences, but she's pretty sure this kind of trip will still eat up time and sedatives they don't have.

"If you're leaving, you may want to do so soon," Doctor Lalonde says, having recovered her ability to speak. She still looks pale, though. "I'm not sure how many people may even be left at the foundation headquarters; it's a workday, yes, but it's almost evening. With this weather, it may clear out even more quickly, I'm afraid."

Jade looks at Rose, trying to meet the other girl's eyes to plead one more time, but Rose's eyes are closed until she says, at last, "Alright. It - should work. Kanaya? I had thought to keep the group limited to players from this last game session, but if Karkat is coming -"

Kanaya shakes her head. "I prefer my own mind. And I do not know John as well as the rest of you; he might not want me in his memories, if he were awake to express an opinion one way or the other."

"Then it's settled." Rose bobs her head in a nod, and meets Jade's eyes to offer a faint smile. "Go for it."

Heck yes! Jade grins back and lands with both feet on the ground, bouncing on her heels. "I'll be back before you know it!"

- Leaving the valley takes up a good twenty minutes even with Jade taking extreme liberties with driving safety. She learned to drive using an off-road jeep in a jungle in the middle of the Pacific, and this naturally means her driving skills are awesome and specially honed to take shortcuts and consider stoplights mild suggestions. But even she has to admit that with her senses skewed she needs to watch herself on the switchbacks. The clouds overhead, so flat and still and pallid just a few hours ago, have swollen into dark thunderclouds so thick that Jade can barely see fifteen feet in front of her, dumping sheets of rain and hail that ping off the car's windshield and leave minuscule cracks in the glass that are eventually gonna give. The wind sheers across the road and flattens out the thick grass around the lake, so that more than once Jade finds herself hauling the steering wheel around to drag the car back onto the road. Once she's in the trees, thankfully, the worst of the storm cuts off, and the interwoven branches overhead shield the car from the hail. It's still dark, but at least without the sleeting rain Jade can see without the windshield wipers flailing around to try to keep the window clear.

She took the Egberts' car only because Bec is still passed out in the trunk - but the moment they break out of the thick tree cover there's a crackle of green light, and Jade yelps as Bec teleports into the passenger's seat, all several hundred pounds of fluffy white wolf getting its hair all over the seat. Not like she cares. Once upon a time she might have felt bad about messing up Samuel's nice functional car but now? Eh. She's so over it.
But Becquerel's fur bristles and its muzzle turns up, and Jade reaches out a hand to bury it in the wolf's ruff. Tremors twitch their way along Bec's spine and it sparks again, hard enough that Jade feels the tips of her fingers numb, and overhead the storm cracks with another roll of thunder.

If John's the one making the storm, what does it mean that it's still raging even while he's sedated? What would happen if he woke up right now?

John has spent all the time Jade's known him either concealing his powers at school, muffling them at home - because of his dad's rules, she might add - or using incredible restraint while fighting baddies. And even with all that holding him back, he could still whisk up a tornado fierce enough to push Jade away from his confrontation with Droog just by getting angry.

Jade's stomach knots in on itself with the creeping realization that there have been storms all around the greater Seattle area for days, now. Since, she's starting to suspect, they watched those stupid tapes about the game and John had a mini breakdown. This storm has been building steam for days.

John is a god. How much power can an Heir in the god tiers unleash if they're traumatized and brainwashed and in pain all at once?

Probably a whole frickin' lot.

"Bec," she says grimly, clamping down on the wolf's neck. "Help me push to these coordinates? Leave the car here - we won't need it."

Bec cocks its head to the side, still studying the roof of the car - or the sky beyond. A stray gust of wind snatches up the rain and splatters it under the last of the tree branches shielding the car like having a bucket of water splash against the window. Then Bec's body begins to hum with yellow static as its pelt turns bright green, and Jade reaches out with her senses for the hulk of Seattle lying to the south and west of the valley.

In retrospect, she should have taken the car, because she and Bec take coordinates to their literal extreme - in this case, they land with a bounce on the sidewalk in front of a towering, angular office building, just in time for the bruise-green and black clouds to dump a fresh wall of water down upon the city that soaks Jade right through in one freezing cold slap.

"HHhhhaaaEEEEEHHH!!" Jade isn't entirely sure what to call the noise that leaks out of her lips in an irrepressible hiss, but it's really embarrassing! A lump of hail thumps against her shoulder a moment later, the wind shrieking through the slim corridor formed by the rows of skyscrapers around her.

"Coldcoldcoldcold!" Jade chants, whistling for Bec to follow her as best she can while getting her butt into gear, teeth chattering as she hurries to the door of the building and pushes into the lobby, her hair dripping water all over the floor. Bec appears a few steps further into the lobby, its coat dry and utterly pristine as it sneezes at her. Show off.

Huffing, Jade reaches into her sylladex, accessible at last, and swaps out her suit for a dry one. She knots her hair up as best she can with a hair tie to keep it out of the way, and begins the business of wiping her glasses clean on the sleeve of her costume as she glances around the lobby, looking for a desk or a directory. As far as she could see outside, there was no sign or name on the outside of this building to advertise for whatever companies have set up offices inside; but these are the coordinates Doctor Lalonde gave her, so there should be something in here to give her a hint as to what floor they're on, right? Right.

She marches up to the directory by the elevators because she spies that first, but as she bounces over, feet barely skimming the glossy, caramel brown marble floor tiles, she notices two secretaries huddled behind a luxurious desk off to the side. She waves at them, smiling, but they give her horrified looks almost in unison and backpedal through the door behind them to the backroom, presumably. Maybe they just aren't used to strange girls with wolf sidekicks wandering in soaking wet. It's a sight that takes getting used to, probably. Oh well!

But to Jade's relief, a quick scan of the directory's neat black-and-white rows of text shows that the Harley Foundation does indeed have an office here, one that seems to take up the entire fiftieth floor, as all the other companies are listed on others. It's only the work of a moment to bounce up there, and Jade walks past the fiftieth floor's elevator doors, her footsteps mostly silent on the carpet that replaces the marble tiles. Unlike the well-lit lobby, this floor is relatively dim and quiet; but just a ways down the hall the wall switches from plaster to frosted glass windows that stretch from the ceiling to the floor, through which Jade can juuust make out the scattered yellow glow that means someone is in the office.

But just as she's about to barge into the Harley Foundation's office and start throwing around her totally legitimate authority, Jade freezes and has to rub her eyes, and blink, wondering if all the sucky stuff happening today has actually driven her crazy, too!

...What have they done?!

"You changed the logo!" Jade shoves the door open, pouting with the force of ten thousand ducks. "I mean, the new logo font is cool, but why? What was wrong with the old one! The old one had gumption, darn it!" Now Bec's head doesn't even have a massive letter on top of it!

The troll behind the desk doesn't even look up from her sleek laptop screen, her hair up in a messy bun that she keeps tearing more strands loose from by running her claws through it. "Tested better with focus groups after we announced our sponsorship of that new ga- wait, no," she says, her downward twisting horns scraping along the padded shoulders of her blazer as she looks up, distracted, from her computer screen to frown at Jade. "I'm sorry, miss, we're just closing the office for the day. We've had to close some of our late afternoon appointments due to the inclement weather - I'm sorry, I really need to ask you to -"

"Heheh, that's alright, I didn't have an appointment anyway! I guess I really should have said hi to you guys earlier, but I've just been so busy..." Jade glances around the office's front room, and bursts out into a grin when she spies a familiar portrait hanging on the wall; she can forgive the new logo thingy, as long as they keep this hilarious picture of Grandpa posing with both his vast collection of paintings of cerulean ladies and the trophies of his many tomb-raiding expeditions where everyone can see it! Becquerel sits loyally at Grandpa's painted feet in the portrait, looking exactly the same forty years ago as it does now.

Speaking of - Jade whistles, planting her hands on her hips when Bec finally gets its butt in gear and appears beside her. She can't even imagine why it decided to stay on the first floor to begin with. Bec is just so lazy sometimes! "I'm sorry it's so last minute, but I really am in a big hurry," Jade begins, but she stops and keeps her mouth shut politely as the woman splutters and shoves her rolling chair back from the front desk, cerulean eyes bulging with realization as she whips her head back and forth from staring at Jade's face to something just over Jade's shoulder. It's not so much of a double take as it is a quintuple take.

Jade looks, and lets out a low whistle as she realizes that the portrait on the wall opposite is uh, well - of her! Sure, it's a thirteen year old her, with one of her teeth missing from her smile and dirt smudged on her cheek, which makes Jade uneasy solely because - well - thirteen - but her arms are thrown around Bec and she kneels in the middle of her old greenhouse, surrounded by trays and pots of rare jungle flowers and the occasional pumpkin vine.

"That's convenient," Jade comments, pointing at the portrait when the ceruleanblood turns to stare at her again. "Yeah, that's me! So can we talk about -"

"Oh my. Oh my god. You're here." The troll stands up so fast the chair slams into the wall behind her desk, leaving a tiny chip in the mint green paint, and a good half of the hair in her bun gives up, falling over the left side of her face in a tangled mess. "Oh, god, everyone's gone home for the day, we weren't - pardon me, ma'am, we weren't expecting you to - doyouwantahotbeverage?!"

Jade looks down at Bec; it huffs at her and is absolutely no help whatsoever in deciphering that last line. "A wha?"

"I CAN MAKE COFFEE!" the poor woman practically shrieks, lunging for a complimentary coffee machine set up by the wall. Jade gets the feeling this is one of those local hospitality things, but she tends to punch through offices, not stop by them for a chat and a coffee and a time-critical pick up of a bunch of heavy duty sedatives.

Right. Focus! Back on track! "That's okay, really!" Jade says, holding up her hands and trying for a reassuring smile. The ceruleanblood almost crushes the handle of the coffee pot in her haste to jam it back into the machine. "What is your name?"

The troll almost sobs. "Janine Trevek, ma'am - I can't believe you're here - now - in my lobby - I mean, we've been held in trust for so long, we thought you'd never come visit!"

Hoo boy. Jade wonders if maybe she should have checked in with the Harley Foundation sooner...possibly...potentially...at some point...when she had free time. They have bigger offices in London and Tokyo and Singapore, right? All of them cities that she's been right nearby in recent memory. But she's been so busy fighting crime and kicking butt around the world, she just kind of...let it slide? Grandpa's files always mentioned that the Foundation was there to help if she ever needed it, but she hasn't before now! Honestly!

"I am here, I am," she says, rubbing the back of her head and grinning a little more apologetically. "But I can't stick around to talk long. Because I really just came for the cases of medical sedatives we ordered over at Lalonde Labs, and I thought maybe the Foundation could -"

"That was you?!" Janine casts a despairing look down the hall that leads deeper into the foundation, where the lights, like those in the outer hallway, have mostly dimmed or shut off to save power. "I don't know if Ruka heard from Unification Pharmaceuticals before she left, and she's our main liaison with local businesses - but if you need them, right now, ma'am, I could...call them myself?"

The troll says this last with such apprehensive gravity that Jade wonders if she needs to give the woman a pep talk or something.
"Oh, yeah, totally! That would work just fine," she says. "Sorry about calling in a favor on such short notice, but we really need that medicine. Seriously. They could wake up at any moment if we run out!"

Jade can't tell if Janine doesn't ask 'they?' because the woman really doesn't care about details like that, or is just really intimidated by the sudden arrival of the heir to the company she works for. "I'll get them on the line right away," Janine promises, fidgeting with her hair once more before slapping her hand back down against her side. The troll regains some of her bearings, nodding firmly as she appears to come to a resolution. "Yes, I'll take care of that immediately, ma'am," she says, bowing her head a few degrees and gesturing with one hand toward the dark inner hallway. "The meeting room is right this way; you can wait there while I see if the representative at Unification is still available, and how far along they may be in filling that order."

This is all going according to plan. Jade loves when things go according to plan. Surprises are nice, but she's had waaay too many of them these past few weeks. "That sounds great! Just let them know that they don't have to drive it out to the labs or anything - I can take it for them, as long as they have all the medicine together. No problem!" She scratches Bec behind the ear and tries to tug the wolf along as she follows Janine down the hallway, but the wolf just gives her an eyeless look (which is pretty darn impressive, all things considered) and meanders over to the portrait of Grandpa instead, curling up into a ball with its tail wrapped around as it takes up its favorite position, content.

Shrugging, Jade wanders past more offices that are dark for the night, desks and computers just visible through more frosted glass, and looks around curiously at the meeting room that Janine leaves her in with more feverish promises to get the pharmaceutical company on the phone. "Also, can you get me some rainbow rubber bands?" she calls after the woman, on impulse, and Janine looks like she's about to have another heart attack. Oops. The ceiling is high and all of the décor modern and sleek, with flat tablet computer screens embedded in the table in front of each chair. Jade immediately wants to fiddle with one, but she needs to hold off, here. It would rude to just bounce in and start messing with people's nice computer setups. Even if technically everything in here could belong to Jade, if she really wanted it. Eh.

A crack of thunder snaps her out of an intense examination of the tablet at the head of the table before she can do more than turn the screen on and begin the process of logging into the company server to peek around in their secret stuff. Because every company has secret stuff, right? Totally. But the thunder snaps her right out of it, and she dims the lights with a touch of her powers on the dial by the door to get a better look through the windows that stretch from wall to wall at the far end of the table. This high up, the rain lashes against the window panes - and the angle of the rain shifts every time, too, like the wind can't make up its mind about which direction to go. When Jade cups her hands around her face and squints out over the city, she can see that a lot of the skyscrapers have gone dark early, so that what little she can make out of the skyline around the building looks patched together with occasional gaps; a lot of people must have called it a day after all this rain started gushing everywhere.

A buzzing, sharp burst of static presses against the side of her leg, and Jade drops one hand to rub Bec's head thoughtfully, its fur still prickling and standing on end. "What a mess, boy," she says, sighing.

Bec whimpers in reply.

And that's - no, something is -

Jade frowns, and scritches behind the wolf's ears, because that was such an odd sound - a plaintive whine that wobbles and rises in pitch to a keen, a noise not of warning but of - Jade can sense no one in the room but them. Janine is in another of the offices, one belonging to Ruka, probably. And now Bec is here, with Jade. The rest of the office is still as a grave.

So why, she thinks, lifting her eyes so that she sees not the buildings outside but the reflection of the room, refracted at an odd angle against the darkness of the window, why why why -

Why is there another person standing behind her in the reflection.

Her stomach lurches, and stays lurched, leaving nothing but a hollow pit where her guts used to be and a great dollop of filmy, ice-cold terror trickling through her seized-up chest. Her ears edge just this side of exploding into pain again, clicking when she swallows and finds her mouth dust-dry.

She teleports before the fear can ground her, jumping so that she's got her back against the wall when she can see again, panting a little at the residual fear that spikes when she sees that yes, someone is in the room with her. Someone who, for all her space powers being free, Jade didn't sense approaching last time, either.

The horns are a dead giveaway, even before the rain-streaked, paint-slathered face turns to grin at her, all teeth. Her heart races along, queasy with nausea. The tightness in her chest constricts again, but when Jade feels like she can't breathe this time she clings to the fact that it's just fear. It's not real. It's not - that bad -

"Thought I felt a herosis around here somewhere," the juggalo says, drawling and pleased as his gangly limbs rearrange themselves so that he faces her and not the window. All the rain has left the facepaint even thinner and more smeared than it was the last time Jade encountered this guy all the way back in Mexico, and through it Jade can see, even in this dim light, how his expression twitches and fractures microscopically, flickering through other emotions but always returning to this default of a jagged smile and eyes that don't match up. Like he could explode into sudden violence at any moment, and his body doesn't know quite how to contain all that horrific, artless rage. "Been getting a wicked wonder on as to where you might be motherfucking at, sister."

"You-" Her tongue rasps over her lips like sandpaper on stone, and even when she swallows and tries again she can barely force the words out above a hoarse cough. Bec has stayed pressed tight to her side, which would be so reassuring under normal circumstances - yet that whimper lingers in her sore ears, a throbbing alarm to remind her that something is not right. Bec is just as terrified of this guy now as it was in a back alley in the dead of night. Like she really needs the hint! "But you're that guy. From Mexico! Why are you even here?!" she manages at last, because running into a guy like this once was a weird happenstance; running into him twice is so not awesome. And also kind of terrifying? Yeah, that.

His grin, if anything, widens. Which is not possible, not even troll lips could spread that far or reveal that many teeth - too many teeth to fit on a single jawbone -

"Have the best of all motherfucking friends to see, you know?" For a moment the clown sounds almost sane, his smile blissed out and distant, the kind of gooey expression people only wear in dumb soap operas. Then the troll starts slouching his way around the table that Jade has put between the two of them, slinking and pausing at intervals, sudden moments of stillness that leave him free to tilt his head to the side like a curious bird. Or something more reptilian, maybe.

That's hunting posture, is what it is.

Jade tucks a hand behind her back and starts digging through the sylladex in earnest. This troll must be about as deep into dementia as a purpleblood can get - or, worse, he acts like a predator on the hunt purposely, so he's just plain nutso.

"You been chilling here for a while, my most righteous hermanita?" the troll says, eyes glittering even when Jade jacks up the brightness of the overhead lights with another twist of her hand; if anything, more light just renders the clown in even starker contrast, all blacks and greys and dark purples, and it's worst with his eyes cast in shadow by the slant of the light. "Got a query for you, all rattling around in my old faith sponge."

The yellows of his eyes burn. "You seen a troll by the tag of motherfucking Vantas around these parts, sister?"

-Lie lie lie lie, Jade's every instinct screams, so loud her cells sing with it. Taking a steadying breath, unsurprisingly, does nothing at all to steady her, when their Breath player is -

Don't think about that. Just lie fast before this juggalo guy realizes you've hesitated.

Because whatever a guy like this wants with Karkat, there is literally no planet on which it can be a good thing. Jade thinks Karkat would have mentioned having a 'best friend' from another country who oh, by the way, can drive people insane and gurgling with just the power of his terrifying clown brain. Karkat 'John was one of my first friends ever Vantas? No way. Something's fishy here, and hearing that name out of the clowny guy's mouth was like a sucker punch. This guy has been bad news from the beginning, and if he wants to get his grimy clown claws on one of Jade's friends (no matter how constantly irritable said friend may be), he can suck her Colt revolver.

"Never heard the name before," Jade says, laughing and then almost choking on her own tongue.
She digs her fingers into Bec's neck, while the clown's close proximity continues to reduce the wolf to a state of staticky, whimpering fear. Elaborate, just a little more… "Sorry. I haven't had much time to get to know anyone in the area yet - except Heir, but that's all, really!"

The troll cocks his head to the side, eyes heavy lidded; his smile can't stretch any farther than it already has, but now the corners of his lips begin to twitch even more noticeably. "'S one sicknasty motherfucking mess that one is whipping up out there," he says, the long twists of his horns lowering as he bobs in a nod. "Makes a motherfucker wonder what's got at a herobro's lobe stem to set off all that mirthful madness."

The pistol in Jade's hand in the sylladex falls through loose fingers, which is such a rookie mistake!
Grandpa would shout her ears off for letting go of a weapon in a crisis situation! But her brain is whirring to keep up - this troll knows Karkat's last name - knows John's messed up in the head - knw Jade for a hero in a dingy alley and arrived just in the nick of time to unleash brainmelting levels of terror on Deuce and his lackeys -

How much does this guy know?! And how could he know it? This is awful...

"You-" she starts to say, her voice shaking and catching in her throat as she struggles to think of how to respond to this - should she try to get information out of him? Find out how he knows this stuff?
Or should she grab Bec and bounce them both out of here before that smile stops twitching and she sees what lies behind it? But then what about Janine and the sedative order? She can't leave someone alone with this guy, not again...

She dithers too much. But in her defense, the troll has stopped pacing toward her in a menacing fashion, has instead paused, eyes squinted and fixed on the wall beside the door, off to the side, rather than on her, and it fools her into thinking he's lost track of the conversation and been distracted by something else.

Then he lunges at her, a jerky motion with his arms trailing behind, his face cranking around to leer at her with jutting teeth and red-limned purple eyes, hungry and incensed and -

Jade dodges out of the way, yanking Bec along with her as she reappears out in the hallway, the sickly dread ratcheting up her heart rate until she can feel it pounding in her ears painfully. Janine, she has to get to Janine and - god, at this rate, she just wants to evacuate the whole building! This guy - the look on his face. No. Bec's whimpers rise in pitch as Jade casts one last fleeting look back at the door she bounced past -

Just in time for it to explode into a cloud of wood shards and splinters, the concussive force of it sending wood chips flying down the hall.

"Lie lie lie lie," the clown says, mocking and singsong, livid red sclera luminescent in the low light and black pupils swallowing up any purple that might have remained. "You think a sister can MOTHERFUCKING LIE TO MY MOTHERFUCKING FACE?!

Oh, shit.

There is an insane clown troll gone completely feral, and Jade is frozen in a dark hallway, completely exposed.

She hasn't watched many horror movies in her life. But good lord, this is common sense.

She teleports again, this time straight to Janine. The ceruleanblood looks up from where she is scribbling something on a pad of paper with a blue-ink pen, startled, but there is no time for explanations! Jade tackles the woman, still dragging Bec along as she goes, and by the time the door to this office shatters into a million pieces with the rattling, clicking roar of an enraged troll behind it, she's bounced the three of them to the front room of the Foundation's office block.

"Wehavetogocrazytrollgottagogottago," she babbles, tripping over the words as her dry mouth betrays the bright terror oozing into the back of her mind like cold claws. Oh god, and she had left Clubs Deuce to suffer the full force of this - no one should have this much raw horror in their head, no one at all.

By some stroke of luck, even if Jade's talking nonsense, Janine catches on - having the door explode probably gave her some idea of the danger they're in. The ceruleanblood shoves a crumpled sheet of paper into Jade's hand that Jade just kind of captures on reflex while the troll seizes her bag from behind the desk and runs back to Jade again. Fast fast fast before he rounds the corner and sees them -

Her vision skews. Janine screams, a blur of grey and blue that smears through the blue and gold of the portrait on the wall and Jade gasps without sound as the floor and the ceiling invert, even with her space sense shrieking that gravity is still working, the world's still right side up or is it can you even tell anymore liar liar liar?

Not real. Can't be real. This is madness, this is panic, this can't be real so just go, get out, part of "BEC!" Jade spits with the last of the air in her lungs, before the terror strangles her just as effectively as John could. Air is in her lungs but she can't stop hyperventilating, cold horror bubbling in her brain and murmuring lying liar lie to me motherfucking lie to me again TELL ME WHERE HE IS.

The green plasma burns against Jade's skin, stinging and too-hot, hot as the surface of an impossibly bright star - and then there's marble cracking hard on her knees as she collapses to the ground, stomach heaving uncontrollably. Throwing up leaves her shivering and kind of wrecked, but in the dry heaves that follow Jade finds that her vision has stopped slurring and warping; when she spits one last time and looks up, the sudden clarity of the lobby around her feels almost more unreal than the hallucinations had - too real, almost. Bec buries its nose in the crook of her shoulder, its whimpers quieter but still present, and Jade hugs the wolf almost as much to keep herself from faceplanting into her own vomit as to reassure herself that the stars pinwheeling against the yellow-green of the wolf's fur still burn.

Janine lies curled up in a ball only a foot away, the yellows of her eyes all Jade can see with her pupils rolled back, but when Jade reaches out with an uncertain hand to shake the troll her cerulean eyes snap back into view, the last of her hair tangled around her face and horns. "What happened?" she says, eyes glassy still with terror. "What was that?"

"Something bad." Something wrong, Jade thinks, but if she says it out loud - she's not going to say it out loud. She's just not. "You need to go home. Get somewhere safe. This whole building is -"

"But I didn't lock up," Janine whispers. Then she shakes her head furiously, placing one hand to the side of her head. "God, my head hurts."

"Go home and rest and lock those doors. I don't think anyone's gonna break into the foundation tonight." That isn't already there, and able to appear and disappear at a whim without triggering Jade's space sense, anyway.

"That's - the address of - the supplier!" Janine struggles to finish, fluttering her claws to indicate a piece of paper as they mutually help each other get to their feet. Jade sees some of the fear she feels reflected in Janine's pale face. "They'll have it ready for you in forty five minutes - they were about to shut down for the day, so that was the fastest I could talk them into -"

"That's fine. That's fantastic!" Jade says, injecting enthusiasm into her voice before it can crack. She feels around the lobby - those two secretaries hiding in the backroom (hiding from the clown? she doesn't even know anymore) seem to have left because she can't feel them taking up space behind the information desk, but there's - "There's someone in the elevator," she adds, giving Janine a little push on the shoulder blade toward the exit. "I'm gonna get them out really quick. Thank you so, so much for this. I appreciate it so much more than I can say right now because we're totally in danger and so I'll visit the foundation again some other day, alright?"

"Alright," Janine says, nodding in a daze. "That's good. That is good, right?"

"Yes," Jade says firmly, giving the ceruleanblood one last push. When the troll manages to stumble to the front door without that terror bringing the two of them down again, Jade feels reassured enough to bounce right over to the elevators and inspect the lone person she can feel sitting in one of them half a floor above - but only half a floor? Another terrifyingly hasty scan shows that yeah, the elevator carriage is stuck between floors, for some reason.

Jade just wraps all her focus around the figure in the elevator and snaps them down to her, complete with their chair.

Wheelchair, she corrects. A troll with an overgrown mohawk looks up at her in incomprehension - looks down at where he's paused in the middle of pulling off his shirt - and yanks the fabric back down, blushing a furious brown. "Tienes que salir, señorita!" he says, Jade's translator giving her some idea of what his rapidfire Spanish means. "Hay una persona muy peligroso aquí."

"Yeah, don't I know it!" she agrees, glancing back at where Bec remains shivering and terrified in the middle of the lobby. All she wants is to get coordinates for this address, get those meds, and get back to the lab before anything else can go wrong today - but first! Leave a guy in a wheelchair in a building with an unstable clown? Yeah, no, she's got to get this guy out or she'd never forgive herself. "Here, I can give you a lift."

Before she can even lay a hand on the handles of the wheelchair, however, the troll's expression shutters closed, a mulish frown furrowing his thick eyebrows as he wheels out of her reach. "No. No me puedo - I can't go. You go." Jade blinks and opens her mouth, and the brownblood cuts her off with a shake of his head, a stubborn jut to his jaw. "Fuera de aquí, fast. I will be, uh, fine. Maybe. Está tan enojado…"

Oh nooo. Jade does not have time for this. Urgh! "Yeah, he's really mad! So we should both leave!"

The troll just shakes his head. "I can't." His laugh is kind of shaky. "I don't think I ever could. Um. Go, please."

But no matter how many times Jade asks, as she drags her feet slowly to walk back to Bec, the brownblood won't budge. When she crushes Bec close and unfolds the paper with the address from her sylladex, plugging it into a program on her glasses to let them crunch the numbers and give her physical coordinates, she can only look back one more time at the troll staring expectantly at the hall of elevators, his raggedy appearance at sharp odds with the fancy marble of the huge lobby around him, and it's just one more moment of unreality for her mind to struggle and fail to absorb before she flings herself and Bec out of the building, away from the insanity curdling in the air, to the stock warehouse of Unification Pharmaceuticals.

Gosh, she hopes he's okay.

- Jade whiles away those forty five minutes combing her fingers through Becquerel's fur, the repetitive motion giving her something to do while she waits under the awning of a closed up store, the rain out here in at the edge of Seattle in a lull. The winds are still ferocious, though, yawning under her covered area to tug and shove at her, and Jade huddles down to wait. The combing distracts her from the writhing fear that squirms in her head, way too sharp and new for her to try to file it away somewhere to analyze later. But Bec has stopped whimpering, returning to its usual mode of passive watchfulness, and by the time an armored van emerges from the facility to idle just inside the property grounds, Jade feels almost settled again, like the encroaching madness has faded into a distant memory of a bad dream. In fact, she feels almost kind of silly for freaking out so bad! The fact that the clown guy can so easily upset her with his fear thing - and, more importantly, that he's looking for Karkat of all people - is worrying, but she'll deal with it later. Right now, the problem of John and the other brainwashed kids comes first. No exceptions. She can ask Karkat about it when the troll's not on the brink of a meltdown over John's condition.

"Time to go, boy," she says, nudging Bec with the back of her hand, and the wolf whuffles at her, showing no indication that it was ever scared enough by one feral troll to be left whimpering by the experience. It's the one thing Jade really regrets about Bec's inability to really communicate - she's so sure it could help explain what's going on, if only it could speak! But there's no point waffling over impossible things like that. She teleports across the street, right into the pharmaceutical company's yard, and bounces over on her toe to explain to the driver, in a carefully measured voice that betrays none of the shakiness still lingering in her chest, that yeah, she is the heiress of the Harley Foundation, yes, she's also Sharpshooter, no, she really needs to get back to work right now, an autograph would be kind of weird -

By the time Jade switches with the driver and whistles for Bec to join her in the front seat, she's just ready to get back to the others. So much could have happened in the hour and a half she's been gone, and she still has to make the slow trip down into the valley with this truck rather than a smaller, more maneuverable car once she's back under the void shields. If Dave woke up and Rose decided to do her mind thing on John -

There's a little regret that Jade has to push down over her decision to go out for supplies rather than helping with that. But only a little. Now she has all the sedatives they could possibly need to keep three super kids down for the count until they can be operated on, she knows that one scary clown guy is in town and needs to be dealt with at some point, and - there is a crunch of plastic when Bec sets its butt down, and when Jade moves its butt over with a jolt of power that the wolf mostly ignores, she reaches down and yanks a tiny packet out from underneath.

She rolls down the window and calls the driver back over to give him that autograph. Then she thinks about it, and scribbles out another one on the back of the paper Janine gave her with the address on it, to be given to the ceruleanblood whenever the driver has a chance. They totally earned it for making the extra effort to fulfill Jade's last minute request.

Satisfied, Jade nods and rips open the packet. Her fingers still tremble with the aftershocks of fear, but she knots two colors of rubber bands around her fingers in a few deft twists.

Blue for John, blue for not letting something like this ever happen again.

Red (it's more light pink, but that doesn't count, it's the closest she has) for Karkat, to remember to tell him that he has a clown stalker running loose in the downtown area.

She's been going off half-cocked for years now, racing around the world and bouncing through Seattle and getting herself kidnapped and all the while missing the fact that one of the bad guys was right under her nose, messing up John's head while she carried on blithely without a care in the world.

If it takes reminders to keep her from getting caught up in her own enthusiasm, then by golly, she'll use reminders again.

But not reminders, really, she thinks, flexing her fingers. More like promises to herself.

If they were good enough in a past life, they're good enough now.

With a clap of green, she and Bec and the entire truck full of medicine leave Seattle behind.

---

Rose knows -

"Rose?"

the exact moment -
"Rose, where are you going?!
- the world fractures.
"Ro-"
-
Later, they realize that only Karkat, Jade, and Dave's eardrums burst in John's initial flare of power. Though Roxy, Doctor Lalonde, and Samuel were all in close proximity to John, none of them suffered any tympanic trauma from what should have registered as wildly vacillating barometric pressure. And Kanaya and Rose, furthest from the scene, felt the pressure dive, yet seem to have been just out of range of the most deleterious effects.

Rose has her suspicions for this odd selectivity, but they really all begin with 'p' and end with 'layers of the game,' and really, only one person in the building is qualified to argue the point with her.

The White Queen does not argue; she simply inclines her head in an elegant nod as she settles into a chair. The carapacian arrives shortly after Jade leaves to sit at John's bedside, claws pillowed in the folds of her wrappings as she holds vigil with Karkat and the laboratory technicians who keep a steady stream of sedatives pumping into John's bloodstream.

The whole scene would be a lot more depressing, if it weren't incredibly tense. As vial after vial of morphine works its way through John's system much too quickly, his eyes flickering behind the thin skin of his eyelids in what are not REM saccades, Rose finds herself conceding that Jade made the right call. In this understaffed, understocked facility, there is no way they're going to be able to keep both the Scratches and John sedated for long. John's always said he heals quickly, has probably never been sick a day of his life - certainly Rose can't recall him missing a day of school in all the time they lived in close proximity to each other, or having so much as a sniffle as a child. That incredible healing factor, however, has come back to bite them in the posterior in the worst possible way. Karkat has cringed his way into a ball of snappish teeth and jutting limbs as close to lying on top of John as possible, his eyes a brilliant shade of scarlet as he washes John's gory face clean with a damp cloth, and Rose can't tell if he's doing more harm or more good with his ministrations.

And while she confirms Rose's guess with a nod, the White Queen also has no prior experience on which to draw on in this situation, a fact that Rose finds edifying but not particularly helpful.

WQ: This is not the way the game is meant to be played.

WQ: I told you once before, Doctor Lalonde, that these tactics are not...acceptable. Mind control and madness are not unheard of, but they are abhorrent, and I have never before witnessed an Heir of Breath so insidiously undermined.

Rose leaps upon the carapacian's wording, feeling rather like a gemcutter prying into the most minute cracks and facets of a jewel buried in rock. The rock, in this instance, being the Queen's constant need to be prompted with new questions, lest she fall into the grave silence of an NPC with no outside impetus to keep talking. Rose chooses to settle by Dave's bedside (Karkat takes up a remarkable amount of space for his size) so that she can focus better on the matter at hand. Dave is pale, but the bullet wound has almost entirely healed over, and Rose almost imagines she can feel his forehead twitch into a frown when she presses the back of her hand to it.

There is a precipice over which she could tumble, straight into the kind of self-recriminations and guilt that could paralyze her for days; only the knowledge that things could have gone so much worse keeps her balanced. She ignores Doctor Lalonde's standing vigil on the other side of the cot.
more for the sake of her own sanity than out of pettiness; thankfully, her mother is on the phone, engrossed in her latest effort to leave a voicemail that will convince Ambrose Strider break his radio silence. "But you've seen others brainwashed to this extent?" Rose asks,

The carapacian's ink black eyes blink, doleful, at Rose.

WQ: None with this particular method. But corruption of the mind is not an uncommon point of adversity for players. You have experienced for yourself the work of the Noble Horrors, Seer.

The merest mention of the Horrorterrors sets Rose's skin crawling; she has to tamp down the urge to shudder before it can give her away. "Yet even that was unusual?" she says.

WQ: As my cousin-queen and I said before. The Circle sways. They influence. They suggest. Their songs susurrate through the dreams of those of Derse and seep between the stars.

WQ: Delving so deeply as they have done into your mind, and into those of the Denizens in this past session...is a very rare occurrence. I've lived many lives, Seer, and it takes much to stir even one hivemind into active rather than passive interference. Their concerns generally lie in matters beyond the scope of just one game.

"Who," Karkat interrupts, his claws shredding the mattress pad of the hospital cot with a single-minded purpose as he rolls his head around to glower at both of them, "gives a flying fuck about that? What the fuck does it have to do with John?!

They are straying a little from the main point of the conversation. Rose blames the fact that there is just so much she doesn't know, and so much information that the Queen has to offer that could fill in all those gaps. It is rather easy to sidestep onto a tangent without intending it. "I am trying to determine if there might have been any kind of precedent we could apply to our situation. We require all the insight we can get." Before Karkat's trembling lower lip can drop to unleash some new wave of bile, Rose says, "But you're right. We can return to the question of horrors at a more expedient time. For now" - she turns back to the Queen, who has tilted her head to regard Karkat with that same wistful, ageless sadness she has shown both John and Rose - "could you elaborate on why it would be so unusual for an Heir in particular to fall prey to this sort of brainwashing?"

Karkat huffs loudly through his nose, but his teeth lock back together with a creak Rose can hear from across the room. The Queen closes her eyes for a long moment, and Rose doesn't miss how, in the moment when she opens them again, her gaze drops first to her claws in her lap before she meets Rose's eyes again.

WQ: Heirs possess an intimate connection to their aspect that provides them a measure of protection other classes do not have, even before they fully realize it. They find themselves protected by incredibly convenient gusts of wind, for instance, no matter how low on the echeladder they may be.

WQ: Heirs of Breath, in particular, are players of freedom and merriment. They are perhaps the most difficult beings to control in the game, both in body and in mind. In the god tiers? This should have been impossible; he and the Breeze should have been near symbiotic.

WQ: You must heal him. The Breeze itself has gone out of tune now, and this storm...

As though to make the carapacian's point all the clearer, a gust of wind shrieks outside - and then an enormous crash rattles from above, through the walls, and Rue Lalonde rips the phone away from her ear when it begins to vibrate and ring in rapid succession. Rose squints and summons what sight she can, and can just make out, above their heads, the white hot burn of something that has collapsed on the roof. "One of our radio telescopes appears to have toppled over, and taken more than a few of our sensors and communication dishes with it," Rue reports at last, swiping her thumb across her phone screen, her lips tightened to thin white lines. "We've retracted what we can, but I'm not sending anyone out in this storm to try to salvage the rest." She curses, and brings the phone back up, her expression one of grim resignation as she, apparently, tries for Ambrose once more.

Rose suspects that her efforts are in vain. Ambrose went after Oriole, doggedly determined to bring the other Strider back, and if he's been out of contact this long he probably won't realize that there's an emergency here until after he's succeeded.

Or something else has gone awry. But Rose can only deal with one catastrophe at a time; the predicament with John takes precedence over her ectobiological father's silence by virtue of the fact that, quite frankly, she cares more about John than about Ambrose. It is simply a fact.

WQ: It will only grow worse.

"Even if John remains unconscious," Kanaya says. It's not really a question. Kanaya looks weary when Rose squeezes the jadeblood's hand; there are spots of red blood - Dave's blood - in places where Kanaya didn't clean, and Rose finds herself imitating Karkat's near-obsessive cleaning on a smaller scale as she rubs her thumb over the spots until they come off. She can no longer tell if she's doing it to soothe herself or Kanaya - perhaps both.

Kanaya is only here because Rose insisted on adding this visit to Seattle to their original trip to Chicago. If Kanaya feels out of place, she has the grace not to have brought it up yet, or to complain about the fact that they haven't forged on to investigate the happenings in Los Angeles.

On the other hand, Rose is fairly certain that if anyone tried to suggest she leave right now, in the middle of this crisis, she'd annihilate the handle in her attempt to pirouette off it.

WQ: Heirs can bring perhaps the most raw power to bear of any class, second only to Pages. They inherit it. And if they dwell too deeply in their aspect, they can...become it.

WQ: Corrupted like this, with its Heir in limbo, there is no telling what the Breeze may do. It must be quelled.

...Disheartening. Across the room, Karkat has gone too quiet, an uncharacteristic silence where Rose would have anticipated him leaping to snap at the most convenient target. He could be brooding, seething, hurting - there's no way to tell, not when his jaws are clamped shut and not giving voice to every furious invective that comes to mind. She's not sure how much longer he's going to be able to hold himself together like this; of everyone in this room, Karkat is the one Rose feels least confident predicting the actions of.

And he wants to dive into John's mindscape with her and Dave. Halburn's not wrong that it's an incredibly risky move, and between Rose's recent grimdark breakdown and Karkat becoming an emotional question mark to her sight, she's not sure Dave can provide enough mental ballast to keep them afloat if John's mind proves too turbulent.

Yet the more she hears, the more Rose grows certain that this is the path to take. They can deal with all the rest - the question of just how much of Samuel's actions might have been under his control, for example, and just how much they all must have missed while living in close proximity to the Egberts these past few days - once John is stable, and himself, and whole.

John dove into Rose's mind once to raise her up. She fully intends to return the favor.
Dave takes another fifteen minutes to rouse. When he wakes, it's with an almost comical jerk, his eyelashes fluttering wildly as his exposed eyes dilate - then he smacks his own face in his haste to slam a replacement pair of shades onto his face, pulling them seemingly out of thin air. Roxy, having just returned to give another progress report on the state of Dirk's surgery - still ongoing, with Marion growing more and more harried and short-tempered with every interruption - can't quite conceal the fit of slurred giggles that escapes her.

If Rose weren't still deep in the throes of a post-grinddark hangover and dealing with the fact that her closest of friends has been brainwashed to within an inch of his sanity by someone she once considered a surrogate uncle, she might have joined in the chortling.

As it is, she can't quite remember how laughter works.

"God fucking dammit," Dave says, and then - "Rose. God fucking dammit."

Rose has only known she has a brother for a matter of weeks. But Dave, for all his stoic posturing, can't conceal the faint incredulity that twists his eyebrows into a knot as his hand prods the gunshot in his side. His head tilts only a fraction, but it's enough that she can spy the exact moment when his gaze finds John - and his shoulders slump.

She rather understands the sentiment.

- Dave is all for Rose's proposed plan of action. He practically vibrates his way out of the hospital cot by the time she finishes explaining, all jerky nods and tight steps. He doesn't betray so much as a single wince of the pain that must still be aching in his torso as he forces himself upright and into motion, dodging Rue's concerned inquiries with all the bullheaded, deliberate avoidance of someone trained from birth - or rather, from the moment of meteoric delivery - to dodge and derail and otherwise shut down emotional interaction before it can get off the ground, as though to make up for his momentary weakness earlier. Even when he edges too close to John's bed and Karkat lifts his head to glare a warning, Dave barely makes more than a few clipped comments that can hardly be termed snark before he stops talking altogether, hovering on John's other side. Rose wonders if either he or Karkat realize just how similar they look, strung with tension as they flank John like stony-faced gargoyles on guard against the unknown.

Whether they do or not, she can't help but be grateful that they're not about to launch themselves headlong into a third world war while John's out of commission. Kanaya might well be able to handle the two of them in the physical world if they provoke each other into a fistfight, but Rose needs them to damn well keep their shit together if they're going to join her on a journey to the center of John's mind.

Still. Both of them have served as John's main points of emotional support in Rose's absence over the past few years. The three of them together might be able to pull this off - if only just.

Novitiate Halburn, on the other hand, has absolutely no confidence in any of them.

"I would like to state that I am still opposed to this," he says, even after Rue Lalonde not-very-subtly strong arms him into leading the way to his isolated spell rooms, deeper in the neurological ward. One of the intern techs struggles to keep up with the brisk pace the novitiate sets, John's wheeled stretcher rattling along with jagged, high-pitched screeches whenever they have to make a sharp turn.

Rose finds her irritation with the violetblood waxing more with each passing quibble he raises about her plan, not just because he raises some excellent concerns that she really does intend to take into consideration, but because, for some odd reason, his focus keeps trailing away from Rose to fixate on Karkat instead. Karkat, who has nothing to do with an argument between two majjyk practitioners whatsoever. It stirs a remarkable ire in Rose, striking her as a particularly gauche dismissal of her authority in this situation - right up until realization hits her like a flying brick as she glances back at Karkat herself -

And realizes his eyes are still a brilliant candy red.

Karkat has made a concerted effort to ensure that every time they visit the Lalonde Laboratories, his disguise of an irritable but otherwise innocuous burgundyblooded troll remains in place for the duration. But in the panic that has seized everyone, his contacts from earlier have either fallen out or dissolved, and now his mutant eye color has been exposed to all and sundry.

If the scientists in this lab haven't yet picked up on the fact that Karkat is a hero like the rest of the young adults present (they haven't really been that subtle about it), it's really only a matter of time. And if Karkat's too distracted to realize his danger -

Well. Rose snaps her fingers, a sharp click that has Halburn's eyes flick back to her, startled and blinking at the sudden sound. Eyes on me, thank you. "I thank you for your professional opinion, but I am afraid that unless you can provide me with something with more substance than that, I'll continue to default in favor of my own. John wouldn't leave me to rot in the prison of my own mind; I'm hardly going to abandon him to his when he most needs me."

Oddly, in the corner of Rose's eye, she notices Rue Lalonde a few paces behind, and the flicker of movement as Rue raises her phone not to speak into again but to angle it indiscreetly toward the violetblood leading their group. When she catches Rose looking, Rue raises an eyebrow and touches a finger to her lips. Rose's stomach rolls unpleasantly, and she says nothing more because of the bile in her throat than out of any solidarity her mother might be trying to project between the two of them. Rue is being suspiciously supportive about all of this, and Rose distrusts any help her mother might offer just on principle.

"Even if you are able to navigate a mind primed to react with hostility to anything trying to counteract the effects of the mindgrub, there's too much risk that you could damage either his mind or your own in doing so," Halburn fires back, the frills of his ears flaring into purple-tinged fans that upset the fall of the strands of hair that hang loose from his braid. Even now, though, he hasn't lost his temper; he has a capacity for self-control that Rose privately admires, the expression on his face still relatively smooth despite the clear consternation in his voice. It has to grate on him to have a human half his age challenging him on the matter of his chosen specialty, but he's not taking it as personally as others might; again and again, instead, he returns to the theme that one of them could suffer mental damage from such an uncontrolled incursion. A persistent, rather aggravated concern, but concern nonetheless. "I would advise waiting until Marion can remove the grub. Otherwise, all your efforts to mend his psyche might be undone with the next flood of chemicals."

Then - damn, he's casting a glance back at Karkat again, and Rose stops so abruptly that Kanaya's arm yanks free from her own - she tries to impose herself between the two trolls in a flare of pique, if only so that Halburn has no choice but to flush and concede his own rudeness - damn it all, if Karkat would just stop glowering at everyone it might not be so obvious -

"This is why you put me on speaker phone in the middle of literal brain surgery?!” a garbled voice demands, and Halburn jack-knifes around to stare in horror at the phone that Rue holds out toward him, an expression of utter serenity undermined by the twist of her lips. "Oh, for god's sake - Halburn, I am in the middle of brain surgery. Have I mentioned that recently? I think it bears repeating. I am neurons deep in some poor kid's brain and our boss has me on speaker phone Halburn’s fins turn an incredible shade of plum, the color rising in his grey cheeks even as, Rose observes, fascinated, his mild consternation flips into a more recognizable irritation. "These are serious concerns, Doctor Lalonde," he hisses, flustered. "Now is not the time -"

Impassive, Rue Lalonde thumbs the volume button until Doctor Marion’s grumblings almost echo in the corridor. Dave's eyebrows appear over the top edge his shades and continue to climb as he and Rose exchange looks. Karkat just sighs with the force of a bellows, the faint rattle of an impending growl in the back of his throat that makes Rose re-evaluate her estimate of just how much time they have left before he explodes.

"...You know," Halburn says at last, nostrils flared.

"I know everything," Rue says, raising an eyebrow.

Then, after a long pause - "You've looked over the diagrams of the circles, I presume?" Rose barely has time to process the fact that Halburn has switched his attention back to her as he stiffly turns his back on both Rue and her cell phone, eyes fixed straight ahead as he strides away. Rue ends the call with the surgeon still complaining on the other end of the line a moment later, a wry smile still lingering on her lips, but the novitiate does not turn around again.

Whatever nonsense Rue hoped to achieve with that miniature power play, at least Halburn is more focused on reaching their destination than pondering the fact that Karkat's eyes have changed color or trying to talk Rose out of this plan. "I did. They seem similar enough to those I've utilized for meditation in the past," Rose says, finding Kanaya's hand again and receiving a slow squeeze in return. "Adjusting shouldn't be an issue." The only real concern will be pulling Karkat and Dave in at the same time, but Rose has some measure of confidence in her own ability to keep the two of them from drifting off into the aether. It is all a matter of concentration; as long as the void wards hold, not even Leviathan can undermine that.

"Excellent." And with that Halburn pushes open a door to their right, holding it so that the rest of the party can enter without the door slamming shut on John's stretcher. Unlike some of the lab room scattered around the facility, this room has not been drafted into service for extra storage space or torn up by the random acts of violence Karkat swears up and down Spades Slick and the Black Queen were responsible for; in fact, apart from a low set of cabinets on the far wall, the room languishes, almost entirely empty.

Except, in the very center of the cold white floor, where the arcs and curves of multiple patterns overlap and interlock in a deftly carved circle fifteen feet in diameter.
…To be fair, ‘circle’ may be a bit of an understatement. An insult, really. This is a masterpiece, and Rose’s estimation of Halburn’s skill rises considerably. Rose’s old meditation circles never achieved this level of complexity, primarily because by the time she lost control of the grimdarkness in her mind, she’d convinced herself in a drunken stupor that more intricate circles would be a waste of drinking time. She used chalks and cheap candles and pen ink in a pinch – this circle looks to have been inlaid with some kind of engraved quartz, possibly even slices of raw amethyst. This much detail layered in the limited space of a single circle speaks to true dedication.

Hmm. Rose may need to brush up on her passing knowledge of mind magic practitioners and their
ilk. She made a policy over the years of accumulating any and all scraps of information needed to cobble together her unique melding of light and mental magic to handle her unique psychic connection to the Furthest Ring, but never delved enough into it to make the acquaintance of a Lectoris. Her bastardized method of exploring mindscapes will probably horrify Halburn even further. She doubts her mother, with her exacting standards, would have hired the violetblood if he weren’t advanced in his studies, and this circle is a testament to how close the troll must be to taking up the Lectoris title.

Oh dear. She really does hope this works, or it’s going to be worse than embarrassing to return in abject failure.

"God damn. I did not sign up for this. This was not in the terms and conditions," Dave mumbles, an unbroken monologue just quiet enough that Halburn doesn't seem to hear it. The novitiate begins removing fresh candles from the cabinet to set at the cardinal points, scraping at leftover wax circles from recent rituals with deft claws while Dave continues to mutter, "This is black magic, isn’t it. If Bro were a good Baptist mom he’d never let me set foot in a church again. Have I ever been in a church before? God fucking dammit, it's like he wanted to set me up for eternal damnation with this pisspoor religious education."

"Dave, I will rip your fat lips off your godforsaken face and donate them to some poor lipless child in need, I swear to fucking god," Karkat says, his claws clenching at empty air and one eye twitching more than the other. He somehow manages to flail his way between the nearest lab tech and the stretcher - when said lab tech body-checks him out of the way to frantically inject more morphine into the nearest vein on John's body, Karkat just takes the hit and lets the momentum carry him in a ferocious lunge for Dave's throat.
Dave flashsteps out of the way, spinning Karkat back around to face John's unconscious form with a shove like an afterthought. Dave beseeches Rose instead. "Rose. Hey, Rose."

In Dave's own words - hell to the no. Rose can picture clearly just how thoroughly off-topic Dave could get her if he really let his mouth run, and she indulged him. Focus. "Synthetic, or natural amethyst?" she says, after clearing her throat as discreetly as possible and fixing her eyes on Halburn instead in desperation. Kanaya, at least, is not fooled in the slightest, but she can do no more than raise a judging eyebrow at Rose. "Put that down this instant," Rose murmurs. Kanaya just waggles it some more, because Kanaya is occasionally the most contrary woman on the planet and she enjoys being a snarky broad.

"Natural. I'm afraid we used to have a bulk import deal with the Russians, until we rather cleared out the last of the mines by Murzinka. Now nobody in all of the Sverdlovsk district will take our calls," Rue answers, coming to a halt far too close to Rose for comfort. Rose stoops to inspect the nearest candle for no reason whatsoever – or rather, to have the excuse to pull further away. "They claim the Vatih deposits are completely tapped, and now everyone orders from Ontario or Minas Gerais instead. A shame."

"Fascinating." Rose can barely pry her gritted teeth far enough apart to make the word audible. Halburn sniffs, surveying the circle and the careful arrangement of candles one last time before stepping back, his ear fins once more under control and pressed tight to the sides of his head. "Thunder Bay has odd vibrations," he says absently, nudging a candle a fraction of an inch to the side to center it better. "I ask only that you try not to damage this arrangement, Miss Rose, because if I have to replace another segment of the circle with quartz from Ontario, I'll never obtain the same clarity of vision again. Canadians." He gestures to the innermost spirals, and Rose follows the motion to squint at the difference in the color of the quartz. "Brazil gems may have finer quality of color, but for the strongest ambient majjykal resonance it's really Russian or nothing."

Dave, meanwhile, is not deterred by Rose's attempt to change the subject. "So where do we stand, Rose? Like, shit, if we're committing some hella unrighteous acts of iniquity, I need to know my angles."

"You can stand in the fucking corner," Karkat growls. "Or better yet, go find a trash can and make yourself a home. It's where you belong. Here, I can help you! Out of the rare in-fucking-credible goodness of my shriveled, decrepit lump of a bloodpusher, I will introduce you to the nearest dumpster as an early Christmas present -"

"Whoa man. Been there, done that," Dave says, tutting and shaking his head in mock sadness, sidestepping out of Karkat's reach once more. "Get with the times, Karbroski. The epic unironic trash swan dive happened weeks ago, goddamn." He prostrates himself on the stretcher alongside John, his face still utterly implacable as he sighs heavily. "This is why we need John around, obviously. I mean, holy shit on a stick, half an hour in, and look at us - Rose talking us into dark meme rituals and you trying to bring back tired trash jokes. When's the last time any of us made a good goddamn wholesome pun, I ask you? This shit is disgraceful."

Karkat nearly goes cross-eyed.

"It's not black magic, Dave," Rose interjects, shouting a little to be heard over Karkat's best impression of a steam whistle. "Though I know you've been looking forward to it, I'm afraid that mindscape viewing is a remarkably neutral branch of magic."

Dave flops a hand against his heart, but the jolt to his torso must hurt more than he anticipated in his exaggerated antics, because his lips slip into a clearly unintentional grimace before he forces his expression back into deliberate uncaring. "Aaaand there they go. All my totally legitimate dreams of double-majoring in being hot shit and devil worship - shattered. How am I supposed to master the four romsquares and become a penis ouija master if you keep yanking the shag carpeting out from under me, Rose?"

"Perseverance is a virtue," Rose says dryly.

Dave shakes his head again, and at the angle he's flopped onto the stretcher he hits John's shoulder with his cheek and shades without acknowledging it and - "Will you get off him while he's unconscious, nookstain?!" Karkat shrieks at last, pushing past hysteria and into proper fury as his eyes narrow and he seizes Dave by the closest appendage - in this case, the wrist Dave left hanging carelessly by his side.

Kanaya moves so fast that Rose can still feel her hair dancing in the burst of moving air kicked up by the jadeblood's passage. One moment Dave is sitting up, possibly to get even more in Karkat's face; the next, Kanaya has hauled Karkat bodily back onto the other side of room, and both Karkat and Dave wear mutual expressions of blank bewilderment. Rose has to indulge in a coughing fit to conceal the utterly uncouth laugh threatening to escape her. "John goes in the center of the circle?" Kanaya says, utterly composed as she sets Karkat back down on his feet as far away from Dave as the confines of the circle will allow. Karkat, arrested mid-shout with more efficiency than an emergency brake, just stares at Kanaya, baffled, as the jadeblood goes back to remove a stiff Dave from John's stretcher and relocate him as well.

Kanaya is nothing if not in her element. If John weren't drugged into unconsciousness in the middle of it all, it would be hilarious to behold; as is, Rose finds it all a little morbid, but really, her humor's been morbid for years. "For the sake of visualization - why not?" she says, smiling faintly when Dave dodges Kanaya and dives behind Rose as though that will save him. Kanaya pursues him, undeterred, of course, and it's as Rose twists her head around to watch Dave bristle and sidestep Kanaya again that she accidentally meets Rue Lalonde's eyes.

She looks exhausted. And has for a while now, though Rose has done her utmost to convince herself that it's none of her business. Perhaps it's simply due to exposure to Roxy, whose endearing exuberance has weakened Rose's stalwart determination not to feel sympathy for anyone with that face in the future, but Rose finds her smile frozen on her face rather than vanishing as it should, a brittle veneer that perfectly suits her inner turmoil over relenting even a fraction of her guard.

Rue blinks, her lips parting, and Rose can't do it. She spins on her heel and lets the smile shutter into a grimace that has her teeth creaking as she swallows down - something. "He's not wrong," she forces out, keeping her voice an undertone, still not quite able to meet Rue's eyes again. But this needs to be said, because Rose is attempting to play the friendleader in this farce, and that requires a certain level of maturity in dealing with others. "This could go awry. Painfully awry, if I've miscalculated. Should you really be playing on your employees' emotions to sidetrack them from justified objections?" she adds, because it's easy - pick at Rue's faults, erode any burgeoning empathy, annihilate even the faintest glimmer of caring.

"You need to be free to do what you believe needs doing, Rosie," Rue replies simply, her nails clicking against the phone in her pocket as she drums her fingers on it. The bags under her eyes may age her, but the wine-purple of her eyes still burn with sharp inquisitive fever, harried and shocked by Samuel's betrayal but already calculating how to adjust to a world where he's not to be relief upon. "I have little doubt that if I tried to interfere, you'd simply abscond again and take John with you to perform this exercise in an even less secure environment. You are a resourceful and independent young woman, after all."
Rose realizes too late that she's meeting Rue's eyes again, and that likening them to wine may or may not be a sign that she needs to drink a cool glass of water and focus on cleansing her own mind for an hour or two, before that lurking urge to drink something stronger can fully manifest.

Rue is not done yet, either. She truly is verbose. "More to the point - young Vantas needs to conceal his eyes before the threat of Marion is not enough to distract Halburn anymore," she says, and Rose's head jerks up. "The unethicalness of the fact that I've been reduced to manipulating my own employees' relationships in order to keep them from dwelling too long on the painfully obvious has not escaped me, dear, but these are extenuating circumstances." She pauses, to let the words sink in. "Unless Karkat is making a new policy of transparency?"

"Point taken." Rose raises her voice. "Dave, Karkat? Please oblige me by sitting cross-legged and closing your eyes. This will proceed much more rapidly if you do." Please, please, please do not instigate some inane argument -

Dave ducks under Kanaya's next strike and half-drops, half-slides so that he ends up inside the meditation circle - it is entirely possible that he tripped or something, but he acts for all the world as though the move was deliberate, and Rose sees no reason to disillusion him in his persistent belief that he fools people like that. He scratches under the lower ring of the collar on his neck, mumbling to himself low enough that she can't make out more than a few scattered words - something to the effect of 'this is some supernatural demon summoning horseshit, goddammit,' but she thinks he's being disingenuous, again, solely in the pursuit of irony.

Karkat is the one to huff and champ at the bit that is Rose's undisputed friendleadership. "How long is this going to take?!!" he says, sitting but fidgeting as though at any moment he could leap back up to his feet and start prowling around the room. "How fucking important can this be if you aren't doing anything yet?"

"From your perspective? It is absolutely vital. Do not fail me, Karkat, for John's mind hangs in the balance." By the end, she's more than half serious again; Karkat, even in his restlessness, seems to register that, and he tenses up so that at least he's sitting still, if not in the slightest bit relaxed, and his eyes blink shut at last as he mutters profanities to himself a little louder than Dave's ramblings. Good enough.

"And I have to go. I cannot stay to supervise, even if I want to." Rue's jaw twitches, and her expression turns curiously hard as she nods to Halburn and then to Rose. "I'll find out what I can about Samuel's condition after my turn in the MRI."

Rose almost falls for it. It's on the tip of her tongue - you're still going through with the rotation? - but before she can make a fool of herself, which was no doubt Rue's intention in making such a statement, she catches herself and swallows it down. Because of course Rue Lalonde would still go through the rotation of checking people for mindgrubs. If John and his father of all people have them, it just makes it all the more horrifically likely that anyone could be synchronized to the Midnight Crew's will without knowing it. "Good," is all she can think to say, hollowly, and with one last searching stare Rue seems to slump a little and strides out into the corridor, off to do god only knows what.

It leaves only Kanaya and Roxy for her to deal with. "You'll stay as a failsafe?" Rose murmurs to Kanaya when the troll leans in near.

Kanaya nods and touches their foreheads together before drawing back, the concern wiping itself from her face before it even fully expresses itself. "If neither you nor Jade complete your missions on time, I'll do my best to keep him unconscious and restrained."
"Try not to hack off too many of his limbs in the doing of it. We don't know if they'll grow back."
Rose tries for humor, and doesn’t quite achieve it. But Kanaya takes her utterly seriously regardless, giving a solemn nod and falling back against the wall to observe. "And you?" Rose turns to Roxy, relaxing incrementally as she once again processes all the minute differences between the Scratch kid and Rue Lalonde, all those small changes that somehow make Roxy an infinitely more pleasant person to be around, in Rose's personal opinion.

Roxy shrugs, rubbing her toe against the floor and dropping her gaze. "I figurine that I need to stick around for when Dirk gets done. Gotta make sure that guy doesn't flip like pancakes when he gets out of crazybrain grubtown over there." Worry crosses her face. "I should prob'ly get back -"

Rose feels a crooked smile tug at the corner of her mouth. "Feel free. From the outside, this will no doubt look incredibly boring, anyway. Kanaya should be security enough."

Roxy nods, teetering back and forth on the threshold of the open door - and then she darts back in to wrap Rose in a sudden, rib-cracking hug. "Good luck wit your crazy one,，“ she says mostly to Rose's hair, before she's back out the door, her footsteps echoing in the hallway as she runs back to the viewing room for the surgery theater.

Well. Rose is never one to take good will for granted. They could use all the luck they can get right now. Circling around to John's bedside one more time, Rose squeezes his hand - perhaps a little too hard, for a moment later the lab tech has to inject another vial of morphine, and casts her an accusatory look that says that regardless of whether or not that was actually her fault, if they all survive this Rose should probably avoid irritating her mother's staff excessively in the near future, lest their vengeance be swift and petty beyond all reason.

"Ready?" Halburn asks, his eyes uneasy as he looks up from lightning the last candle.

Rose wonders the same thing. "Yes," she says, and she strides to a place in the circle between Dave and Karkat's fidgeting bodies, keeping her sight fixed on John's unconscious body in the very center as she takes the two by the shoulder and starts preparing for the more complex mental exercise of bringing two extra minds along for the ride.

Rose has never entered John's mind before. He leapt into hers, once, with no more assurance than her word that the horrors there would not be able to harm him, but that only causes Rose to wonder if she should have seen something, all those weeks ago. Was there some sign, some alteration to John's mental image of himself that she should have noted, and mulled over, and investigated? Could she have realized how damaged he had become before it reached this terrible break?

Quizzing her past self like this is the short road to madness. She must stop.

Those last moments of second guessing and what ifs scatter like leaves as the wind rises up to meet her. Rose is used to floating and hovering in her own mind to survey the wards around her, but out of some silly naiveté she half-expects to land on her feet in John's mindscape, similar to how she and Kanaya traversed her mindscape on foot upon entry. But the dark, roiling wind wraps around her before she can so much as glimpse the ground, and Rose's breath catches for a moment before the breeze shoves. The mental force of it nearly flings her and her companions right back out the way they came. Her vision wavers and she almost finds herself staring at the purple stone of the ritual circle before she gathers herself and wrenches Dave and Karkat's mind back into the storm with her.

The wind shrieks in her ears, unearthly and wild as it tosses her back again. She tumbles backward and her feet fly out from under her before she manages to stabilize them, Karkat keening as though to prove he can still make full use of his vocal range even in the center of someone else's mind, and Dave clutching her avatar's arm so tightly he'd have left bruises if they were still in their physical bodies. Rose shakes her head to clear it, her hair flying up and tangling around her head in a halo as she squints around them to seek out a landmark. There has to be something - there's no way that this wind is all that makes up John's mind, it's not sustainable -

But it's so dark. Rose waits and waits for her extra sight to adjust to the darkness, but it's darker than night, the shifting and coiling winds almost visible but not quite; she feels their tugging on her ankles and wrists more than she sees them, and the impression she receives after a few moments of probing is that of an endless, spiraling ocean of breezes. Or perhaps a prairie field might be more apt a metaphor - if this were a sea, she could dive down into it, and take Dave and Karkat with her to the seafloor. Instead, the wind buffets them constantly, nudging them back toward reality and stubbornly refusing to let them pass through to what lies further in John's mind.

Rose breathes in and out, though it's not strictly necessary here, and wills herself to glow, threading light through her veins so that she radiates enough to make out Dave and Karkat on either side of her. A flutter of red catches her eye, and as Rose tethers them together with knots of light to prevent another surge of wind from knocking them out of John's mind, the wind bates and her eyes stop watering long enough for her to see that Dave's mental image of himself has a heavy cape mantled over his shoulders, sleek and long and utterly impractical in a strife. He has also turned a noticeable shade of green most nearly likened to the inside of an avocado, and his grip on her arms spasms as he swallows hard. "Flying is so fucking overrated oh my god," he says, barely audible over the windstorm, and then his internal monologue breaks off with an, "Urrp. Oh god. Please tell me mind can't hurl Rose because holy shit."

"You can't throw up as a mental avatar," Rose lies through her teeth. If he believes it, it might as well be true in practice. Hopefully. The last thing she wants to contemplate right now is the effects of Dave vomiting in all this wind and having it thrown right back into their faces by an aggravated breeze.

But there's something else, something that's not right…

The wind roars underneath them again, and when Rose glances down to try to make out anything beneath them, she sees her shoes have changed color. Rose tends to pattern her mental image of herself after what she is wearing at any given moment, and she is not wearing blue shoes right now. I'm wearing my spare clothes, she thinks, cold creeping low in her stomach. Sensible shoes and a nice skirt and long sleeves - so why can I see the bracers on my wrists?

For that matter, why are they orange?

Rose caves in and turns her sight on herself, lighting up every scrap of fabric on her person. If she hadn't watched a video of her own past life a matter of days ago, she wouldn't have known what in the world she was wearing. It really does feel like wearing pajamas, so soft and comfortable that even the brilliant orange leggings visible through the slits in the skirt, and when the wind rips around her head and tears the words out of Karkat's mouth so that she can't understand what he's trying to shout, a heavy, shawl-like hood falls further over her eyes, insulating her from the abrasive air.

In John's head, she and Dave wear their god tier uniforms. While she can make no claim as to how Dave pictures himself in his mind's eye, she knows for a fact that this is not what she pictures herself wearing. Worse yet, when she wastes precious time closing her eyes and willing her outfit to change back to her normal clothes, she can feel the exact, twisting moment it goes wrong. Her clothing changes, yes, but the color scheme and the soft fabric remains the same, her god tier dress altering just enough to mimic the cut and lines of a sweater and a short skirt without actually being exchanged for her outfit in reality.

But when she looks to her left, Karkat hangs in the air, barely visible in the light Rose's clothing radiates, trussed up all in greys and blacks with the Lalonde Labs logo on his hoodie replaced by the curves of some faded astrological symbol. "What the fuck are we looking for, Lalonde?" he shouts, clearly exasperated as he folds his arms over his chest, eyes bright in the dark, and it occurs to Rose that he might have been repeating the question for a while now while the wind worked to drown them out.

"Ideally? John himself," Rose replies. She doesn't think it a coincidence when the wind lurches and whirls them around at the mention of John's name. If what she suspects is true, John's mind is not just actively trying to throw them out; his perceptions of them are influencing their mental personas, trying to reconcile their past lives with their current selves. The way Karkat's face blanches and he unfolds his arms to seize her sleeve just serves to remind her how tenuous their place here is. "He must be in here somewhere, but he could be trapped. It could take some searching before we find where his sense of self resides, particularly in this weather."

In her own estimation, recalling how Leviathan once almost dissolved her in her own mind, Rose thinks that whatever havoc the mindgrub has wrought on John's mind may well have driven him to ground. He's been brainwashed and molded according to whatever obscure purpose Samuel and by extension the Midnight Crew might have wanted him set to, and he's no doubt exhausted all his mental fortitude over the past few days. Their goals here are threefold: reach John - raise him up so that he can reassert himself in his own mind - and loosen the mindgrub's influence on his thoughts. Whatever choked Jade out couldn't have possibly been any part of the real John, and however that madness manifests inside John's head, they'll need to avoid its psychic construct at all costs.

"Well, it sounds really fucking simple when you put it like that. Wow, I am so reassured. I guess I can just step down from my obnoxious soapbox and let it get back to its godgiven job of containing soap in a cubic receptacle and call it a day in the name of capitalism, except has it escaped your flimsy excuse for a thoughtmonger that John can turn into the fucking wind?!" Karkat demands, waving a hand wildly at the endless sea of air washing around them.

"...I will admit, that had yet to occur to me," Rose says at last, and Karkat groans. Rose shakes her head, trying not think about idioms involving trees and forests as pertains to seeing the bigger picture. That would be a way that John's mind might seek to protect him, and if Karkat hadn't mentioned it just now she might have wasted time without ever considering that John could have camouflaged himself all around them. She damns herself for a fool thrice over, then raises a hand and draws forth her memory of a spell that might be able to help. They can't afford to lose time here, not when the clock is still ticking in reality. "Here - I might be able to mark John out with a flare." One of her light spells can mark out crimes-in-progress and potential threats from halfway across a city; surely with a few tweaks, it can be used to illuminate where John has concealed himself. Even if he has somehow merged with all this wind, one stray breeze among many, there has to be a concentration of his conscious mind around here somewhere that she can recognize as quintessentially John.

She never sees it coming. Just as the first word of the relevant incantation passes her lips, Dave shifts at her side, reaching up to touch his sunglasses as though meaning to take them off for some reason. But whether he detects it before her or not, neither of them can react in time to Karkat's yelp as the wind punts them up and backwards with a roar.

Rose's tether to Dave holds.

Karkat's snaps.

Or, more accurately, something snaps it. Rose wheels and lunges for Karkat as the wind flings him off to the side. She catches a glimpse of the utter panic on the troll's face as he reaches out for her, but his flailing only sends him spinning more erratically out of her range.

So she also sees, in what light she can provide, the washed out pink rope that winds around Karkat's ankle, and yanks. Karkat's eyes meet hers one last time, and then he's howling, dropping like a stone straight through all the shifting winds and vanishing into the dark tumult beneath them.

"Oh my god, we're in Paranormal Activity," Dave says, voice climbing to an incredible pitch as he jumps at Rose and wraps himself around her bodily. "Rose. Rose. Say something."

Rose, still staring at the place where Karkat's mental representation of himself was just snatched down into some unseeable part of John's mind, can only cast her mind out frantically, channeling a burst of light through the palm of her hand to try to cast a searchlight through the darkness. Karkat is still there, to her senses, but she no longer feels the connection that should have kept him close to her side. As the majjykal practitioner enabling this jump, she should have been able to simply eject Karkat - or Dave, even - from this mindscape with just a thought.

But now Karkat is drifting around in John's mind of his own volition, under someone else's power, and Rose can't call him back.

"We have to retrieve him," she says, her voice sounding oddly distant to her own ears.

"No shit!" Dave says. "But are we not going to talk about how that was some ghostly shit there?!!"

"I highly doubt we're dealing with any form of necromancy, Dave. We're in a very heavily damaged mind; there are bound to be pitfalls."

"Cool, but consider the following - Karkat probably just got dragged down into windy hell."

"And we will get him back!" Rose's temper frays, and she rounds on Dave, elbowing until he peels away from her a little so she has space to breathe, all of her carefully scraped together self-control flying to pieces. "Do not let go of me," she warns, snapping her fingers, just enough forewarning for him to wrap his arms around her throat in a death grip again and hold on for dear life as Rose drops a tether of light down after Karkat and commands it to tug.

The wind fights her every inch of the way. Gusts haul at her joints and her head, as though trying to turn her to the side or send her into a tailspin, but this isn't reality, and her magic has never relied on the wind to control where she floats or teleports. She forces her way through the onslaught instead, tossing up shields along the way in some effort to keep the wind from slapping her across the face. The darkness remains amorphous, but moisture begins to streak along her cheeks, and Rose realizes that at some point they began to pass through clouds. The stink of ozone nags at her, and off to the left the darkness is abruptly lit up by a curl of lightning, far too close for comfort.

But there is no resounding crash of thunder. Just the lightning forking through the clouds and lighting them from within, before fading back into the darkness in silence. Rose's eyes begin to adjust, finally, to the greyish, sickly light as their descent steepens and more lightning rolls through the heaped up, billowing surfaces of the cumulonimbus clouds around them. There's a persistent updraft that she has to cut through, but slowly the worst of the wind sheer dies away. If there's an end to these swirling masses of cloud, they must surely be nearing it.

Yet no matter how quickly they drop (more falling than flying by now) Rose can't spy Karkat anywhere. Even if he were near, the black of his clothes would cause him to blend in against the silent storm. But he must yelling, she has no doubt. It is an essential truism of the universe - somewhere, Karkat is shouting, and at some point she and Dave will be able to hear him. She has to believe that.

Dave says something in her ear, but he is mumbling again, and when Rose opens her mouth to ask him to repeat it she first has to deal with the mouthful of precipitation that she almost swallows as they pass through another heavy cloud. Her godly sweater is almost soaked through, her skirt plastered down around her tights despite the wind, and there isn't even proper rain yet. If this were reality, she'd be shivering.

The ground arrives with a bang.

This is primarily because Rose does not see it coming.

There is no break in the clouds, no stretch of clear sky between the storm and the ground. No warning before the last shelf of clouds parts around her and Dave - just the earth rushing up to meet them, barely fifty feet away. "EMERGENCY BRAKE, ROSE," Dave yells, his chin somehow smashing into Rose's cheek as he does, and Rose obeys on pure instinct, jerking them to a stop twenty feet from an ignominious landing.

"I hate flying, I hate flying, I hate flying," Dave chants. At some point in their descent, he wrapped his legs around her waist in a death grip, and really, Rose wonders if she has the strength of character not to laugh at the fact that he is clinging to her like a koala.

Perhaps strength of character is beyond her, but she's still breathless from that sudden halt, and as she concentrates on lowering them to the ground at a more leisurely clip, the urge to giggle withers as Rose gets a better glimpse at the ground beneath them.

She actually might have been more reassured if John's mind were cloud and wind and sky, and nothing more. For the ground beneath their feet is blasted, craters carved deep into the ruined black tracts of dirt and stone. As far as Rose's sight can extend, deep, suppurating wounds cover John's mind, veins of tarry black sludge overflowing from crater-ridden streambeds to smear filth over what remains. The winds might run wild in the stacked clouds overhead, but when Rose brings them to a halt hovering a half foot over the ground, unwilling to risk setting foot in that black tar, she notices that for the first time the air in John's mindscape lies utterly still, eerily similar to the unnatural calm that plagued the greater Seattle area these past few days.

Like sailing through the doldrums - the air's stagnant now, but given the right incentive...

"We should hurry," she says, reaching up to unlock Dave's arms from around her neck. "Karkat surely can't have fallen too far from here" - unless that something altered its course after I lost sight of it - "but we still need to retrieve John after that." Their timetable has just been utterly fucked, and if Rose thinks too much about the passage of time in reality, she might get queasy.

"Please tell me we're not splitting up," Dave says. One moment he has her in a headlock; the next he is standing three feet away, pulling at the sleeves of his long-sleeved shirt and flattening his wind-tossed hair with his lips turned down. He has no qualms about standing in the black oil caked on the ground, and Rose sets down after a moment's hesitation, her thin blue slippers slipping without a grip in the sludge. "We're in some goddamn horror movie and we're not gonna be those assholes who split up and die in the first five minutes of a Supernatural episode."

Rose shakes her head, stepping around a oozing sore that bubbles up and sluices over the rim of the crater they're landed beside to trickle down into the depression. "Stay by me." Karkat, at least, she is confident she can track down - he's still here, somewhere, and unlike John he will stand out as a foreign presence rather than blending in with the mind around them.
Dave says nothing while Rose chooses a direction at random - the plain of craters looks the same wherever she looks, so one direction is as good as any other in the process of elimination - and she closes her eyes and lets the sparks of the tracking spell play in the palm of her hand as she rushes through the words of the spell.

When she opens her eyes, she realizes her mistake.

She is somewhere else entirely.

And she is alone.

"No, no, no, no," Rose says, growing more panicked with each word as she spins in a tight circle, sweat breaking out beneath her sweater. The air is still and tepid and all but the faintest of light has drained out of the sky, so that the crumbling black gravel beneath her feet seems to reach up to knit together with the clouds at the horizon. She can't even make out the craters that should litter the ground around her; the earth is black, the clouds overhead are black, and when she stumbles backward, losing her footing, she realizes belatedly that with the way she was positioned, she should have slipped back into the festering crater. It's not there anymore; there's only a smooth surface under the gravel beneath the soles of her feet, no landmark by which she could judge just where she is.

It doesn't make sense. It doesn't need too. John has a brainwashing parasite sinking its chemical tendrils into his thoughts, and Rose feels transcendentally stupid to have assumed that any part of his mind wouldn't be fundamentally warped and distorted by that. Solid ground? Piffle. And now her sense of Dave is just as distant and faded as her connection to Karkat, which means that both of her companions are lost to whatever portion of John's wounded mind has managed to catch hold of them, and she cannot pry them out.

Or maybe, she thinks, her chest constricting as she forces herself to turn in another slow circle, she is the one who has been lost. It's not beyond the realm of possibility.

Why did she assume this insane rescue mission would go well, again? The excuses have quite flown out of her head, and she has begun to sweat in earnest, the cozy warmth of her god sweater now claustrophobic and swaddling her, cotton thick and dry in her mouth as she turns again, and still finds nothing but the darkness -

"Just change, already," she mutters, swallowing rapidly and wrapping the fingers of one hand around the bracer on the wrist of the other, clamping down on the metal to remind herself that she's still in control. Her own personal source of madness remains in check. The sweater of her god tier clothing retracts into a short sleeved shirt, and then further still, into a tank top - though still with that frustrating hood attached, stubbornly refusing to vanish no matter how Rose wills it to. Some parts of the god tier pajamas seem to be ineffably permanent.

But the looser fit of the shirt keeps the soft fabric off her to some extent, and that eases her sudden fit of claustrophobia more than she would have anticipated. The strangeness of it sets something muttering in the back of her mind, but Rose can't analyze the peculiar dips and curveballs her psyche might be sending her when she's already in the midst of trying to sort out John's madness.

If she can find no landmark here, she might as well fly back up to the underside of the clouds and follow it for a ways. Even if John's mind can warp and send her to an isolated area like this on a whim, eventually she'll either find her way back to the original area, or it will warp again. In a worst case scenario, she'll escort herself out, and drag Karkat and Dave's minds out from the perspective of the real world. Something familiar will crop up, she is absolutely confident of it - or at the least, she can convince herself into believing it for a few minutes more, before she gives in to panic completely and misplaces her shit somewhere it cannot be found.

She turns one more time.

The house was not there before. Rose's stomach lurches as she processes it in utter silence, only the fact that her jaw seems to have welded shut preventing her from shrieking in surprise.

Well. At least she wasn't wrong. The Egbert house is, after all, a very familiar sight. If the ground weren't blasted, dead earth, she'd be standing approximately where the tree for the old tire swing should stand. She steps onto the non-existent path to the front door instinctively, not daring to take her eyes off the house for a single moment lest John's mind alter again in the space of a blink.

This house must be significant. With John's mind in such a state of ruination, any structure that has survived must have some meaning in his madness. Casting the flare spell at last reveals nothing she can see inside the building, but if John's concealed himself inside his childhood home -

No. She doubts she'd have the luck today of all days to stumble upon John's mental avatar purely by chance. It has simply been a spectacularly shitty day, where luck is concerned, and Rose is tempted to give the whole thing up as a bad job. Today might as well be stricken from the record if and when they all successfully exit John's mind, because it's a lost cause at this point. It probably has been since Samuel's betrayal became apparent, but what can she say. Somehow, Rose is still an optimist. She'll try not to make that mistake again and why is she claustrophobic again?! She lays a hand against the smooth, blank front door of the Egbert's house, refusing to blink even as her eyes water. She reads the numerals of the house number repeatedly, noting that the brass 21605 appears to have been corroded to the point that all that remains are the blackened outlines of the numbers, and uses that to ground herself before she turns the door knob.

She opens the door, and claustrophobia that is not hers clamps around her chest and brings her to her knees, her skin crawling with the terror that sings get away get away get away from here.

Not mine. That's not my fear.

Rose has to repeat that a few times out loud before her mind steels itself again, shoving away the echoes of panic and anxiety that emanate from the open doorway like so that she feels nothing but her own emotions.

John's house might be only a temporary construct, born of madness, but it's steeped in a terror so pervasive that Rose can't even rest a hand against the doorframe to brace herself without another wave soaking into her, colder than the chill of her damp clothes. He felt trapped here, she thinks, her limbs still trembling as she forces herself to take a step into the house. These kinds of intense emotions didn't just spawn out of nothing - they've been associated with this house for so long that Rose can't even distinguish between them. Trapped and terrified and strangled, and not a one of us ever guessed.

It rather casts all of John's paranoia and his intense dedication to concealing his powers in a new light. What could Samuel have done to keep John here, in a place he felt so miserable and stifled - to keep him under control and perfectly cheerful all the time, even as John's mind screamed for a way out?

Well. She supposes she already knows the answer to her own question.

She left him alone to this. How she or Rue could possibly have known before they left for New York, Rose has no idea, but it doesn't stop her from feeling as though she's doing penance by stepping further into the house, and doing her level best to analyze the nauseating waves of emotion that infuse John's childhood home.

The door closes behind her. Rose blinks, but the house doesn't disappear around her; all the color has been sucked out of the familiar arrangement of furniture in the living room. When she peers into the kitchen, she sees that the window over the sink is an opaque sheet of white through which none of the dark landscape outside can be seen - if it's even still out there. Everything in the house seems flat and skewed, panels of black and white and grey that don't quite gestalt into a coherent whole.

"John?" she says. It falls flat in the still air, and she feels that anxiety hone in on her again, as though speaking aloud was enough to renew the memories of claustrophobia and draw them around her. She tries to cast the spell again, but the light flares and casts shadows that go subtly wrong against the black and white panels of the walls, and she stifles the spell before she can see something she isn't sure she can bear to see.

It could all just be a strange abstraction. John might well have compartmentalized his fears related to his father into this building.

Rose knows this is not the full story when her foot sinks deep into the carpet at the foot of the stairs. She catches herself on the banister before she can fall over, but something sticky and stinging coats the railing and she has to retract her hand hastily when it begins to burn. As she hoists her leg back up out of the sudden sinkhole in the middle of John's flattened out interpretation of his house, she touches a hand to the goop that now coats her tights -

And it burns too, a sharp acidic sting that gnaws at her flesh.

"Gloves? Give me gloves," Rose whispers, horror coiling in her chest as she yanks her hand back and wipes it off on the hem of her shirt. Her shirt transforms again, becomes a sweater again with long sleeves that extend over her wrists and the backs of her hands to fold over her knuckles in fingerless gloves. It's not quite what she wants, but to be fair, she's a little distracted by the fact that she knows that sharp burn.

She concentrates instead on summoning all the light in her clothes into a single nova around her fist, and she holds it up to illuminate all of the black-paneled stairwell.

The grimlight contamination in Kanaya's mind was not difficult for Rose to deal with. Its influence was minimal, connected primarily to a limited set of memories, and Kanaya's mind was strong and otherwise healthy.

John's mind is not strong. It's not healthy - has not been for quite some time. And the acid that coats the carpet at the foot of the stairs and drizzles along the banister is incontrovertibly grimdark.

The panic that seizes Rose's mind is all her own. All that keeps her in place and not firing herself out of John's mind entirely is the objective fact that the grimdark trickling down the stairs does not pursue her when she totters back into the living room. There are no active tendrils, no thorns or tangles. Just the same kind of susurrating, soggy mire that wore away at the curtains of Kanaya's memories. A slow, passive corrosion. Rose thinks that she would have heard whispers from the Furthest Ring by now, if there were a true Horror attempting to carve its way through John's madness into reality.

Once she has found the couch - shades of white and grey that form a rough trapezoid, the cushions more of a suggestion than a reality beneath her as she sits - Rose lets out a laugh that is more of a sob, and watches as more of the acid pours down the stairs and the carpet sops up more of it to deepen the sinkhole.
The White Queen was so saddened and shocked by the fact that an Heir of Breath could be undermined and brainwashed. Rose wonders which came first - the mindgrub, or the grimdark contamination. Either would have made John's mindscape more vulnerable to the other. The temptation is there to blame herself for this as well; she pulled John into her mind whilst in the throes of her grimdark breakdown. She exposed him to an entire ocean of the stuff.

But that explanation scans wrong, like a line of poetry that breaks from the meter.

She needs to see where it's coming from. The stairs might not be as obviously worn away as the foot of the stairs where all that acid pools, but Rose doubts they're stable enough to take her avatar's weight. Instead, she hovers her way up to the second floor, the walls pressing in close with a fresh wave of tight, constricting panic and fear that has nothing to do with the bloodbrine acid seeping along the floor of the second story's hallway. There is a distinct gap between John's remembered emotions and the faint horror rising up from the grimdark; they both might have imbued this house as a symbol of John's mental distress, but it seems almost coincidental. The grimdark might have been attracted to a convenient bolthole, a place so immersed in panic and suffering, but it didn't cause the house to be this way, and feels too passive to have deliberately worsened the condition of John's mind.

It is simply present. A sign of just how susceptible this portion of John's mind was to outside influence.

Rose swallows hard, trying not to breathe in the distinct reek of salt and blood through her nose, and continues on to John's room. The door is a two dimensional rectangle that falls in without a sound when she touches it with a gloved hand. She can hear the steady plink of water - or something worse - dripping, perhaps from the faucets in John's bathroom.

But before she can investigate, Rose can only stare, because John's room is absolutely slathered with filth. It's the same tarry black oil and sludge combination that clogged up the rivers and guttered in the craters of the place she landed with Dave, but here it liberally coats every square inch of John's room, coagulating in greasy puddles on the sheets of his bed and forming a scummy sheen over the posters that line the walls. The window and walls drip; the trash can by John's desk overflows with it.

This isn't grimdark horror. Rose knows the feel of Leviathan's like too well to be sidetracked. And she is used to John's claustrophobic terror by now.

What she is not prepared for is the misery. It drops her, her knees skidding in the thin film of acid on the floor, but Rose can only hope that her godly clothing protects her from the acid while the depression rolls over her in a tidal wave. It starts slow, building momentum from inklings like useless and stupid and hopeless until her lungs are crushed under shit it's all fucking shit too fucked up to help anyone and it's still my fault they're dead why bother why bother just make it all stop make me stop but that's not very heroic is it -

She comes close to curling up in a ball and succumbing to it. Her face isn't protected; place it against the ground, and the acid would do the rest. All that listless, crawling misery lodges tight in her chest and head, and won't let her think of anything else; there's just the dull, spiraling certainty that it won't get better, so why bother pushing her low and holding her there, like a hand shoving her head underwater.

It's not me. I'm not the one who felt this. Dammit, move, move before it swallows you whole.

The noise she makes isn't much more than a whimper, broken and choking, but Rose manages to stagger to her feet. For a moment the house is less than two dimensional, and she can see through the illusion of it, through to the pit of tar and oil that underlies it all. It extends so much farther than Rose can see, all of that blackness that reaches up to smear over the underside of the clouds. Somehow, lost in John's madness, she's wandered to the hindmost, darkest recesses of his psyche, to the back of his mind where all the pain and sadness of two short lives have languished, and composted, and festered into this.

And now, this mess has spilled over, and has begun throttling the rest of his mind with a creeping oil slick.

The grimdark isn't here because of John's short sojourn into Rose's mind. In fact, she knows the exact moment a hivemind would have full, unimpeded access to John's mind for long enough to leave a mark. They all watched it happen on those damned tapes, and even when John nearly collapsed from the agony of reliving the memories he suppressed for most of his life, Rose never once thought to question if having Leviathan puppet his body into a deathtrap with his denizen might have left raw, weeping wounds. Wounds that, in turn, left him fragile and aching with memory right along into a second life, vulnerable to whatever conditioning Samuel might have seen fit to inflict on him. Her best friend in this world has been broken and suicidal and trapped, panicking, in his own mind while they merrily went about their lives in the delusion that once he accepted all those memories of the game, he would be fine.

It's too much. John won't be sane, even if they manage to remove all traces of this mindgrub successfully. How could he be, after all this? Depression can't be pried out of someone's mind; post-traumatic stress can't be shooshed out of existence. Dizzy with the implications of it, Rose uses both hands to shove her hair back out of her face, and stumbles and pitches in a gait close to drunk as she pushes her way into the mental image of John's restroom. The source of the acid is clear; a single droplet of grimdark falls from the faucet into the overflowing sink, adding periodically to the thin trickle that runs out into the hall and down the stairs. Nothing like the open channel in Rose's mind. She glances at her reflection in the mirror, and is so inordinately surprised by the fact that the mirror actually shows a reflection in this world of flat planes and monochromes that she smiles, bitterly, at her reflection.

Her reflection does not smile back. Its eyes just melt into black sockets full of filth, and it tilts its head in the opposite direction of her own.

"Charming," she says, staving off the wave of self-hatred that accompanies the frankly cheap hallucination. Here is the grimdark's real contribution, then: gimmicky, tacky horror movie scares. What little the grimdark acid can do pales in comparison to the paralyzing misery of John's true emotions.

She can't do anything about those emotions though, either. She came into John's mind intending to stabilize him and tear out the foreign influences of the mindgrub so that his mind could recover in peace. But if she tried to tear out all this pain that has fermented here over the years, she'd be shredding vast chunks of John's mind along with the filth. And any moment now the madness could shift again, and Rose will be torn away from all this.

But she can do for John what she did for Kanaya. She casts a disparaging glower at the reflection in the mirror, which seems to have caught on to the fact that she isn't intimidated by its usual tactics and has switched to forcing the hallucination that her eyes bleed white fire.

She sets it on fucking fire. The acid in the sink goes up like a pool of vodka, flames licking up into the faucet until it melts, too, leaving nothing behind through which the memory could leak more contamination. Then she strides down the hall and the stairs, ripping up the acid-soaked carpet as she goes and incinerating it in hot white bursts of light. The sinkhole where the acid has worn through the floor at the foot of the stairs poses slightly more of a challenge, however, as it seems to extend into the basement beneath the house, and she needs to see it to know it has all burned properly. So she locates the door to the basement and yanks it open, the flatness of this unreal house once again causing the whole door to fly off its hinges at an angle and float off to lodge between two jutting walls.

A pale face stares up at her from the darkness of the basement.

Rose freezes.

Perhaps that is her luck, after all.

"John?"

The eyes that blink at her are the right shade, but everything else is wrong. The John that stands at the foot of the basement stairwell is white as paper, and just as two-dimensional as the rest of this house. And he can't be more than thirteen years old, short and round-faced and bucktoothed despite the fact that, like the house, he's barely real enough to hold substance.

She isn't even sure if he has arms. Honestly.

EB: rose?

And Rose realizes, with a pulse of mingled disbelief and panic, that reality might not have much to do with John's mental avatar anymore. "John!" she cries sharply, missing a stair and almost plummeting all the way down in her haste to reach out to him.

EB: oh no! out out out!

And with that, he vanishes. No - more nonsensically, he doesn't. His body dissolves into tendrils of bright blue light, and it is only when said tendrils whoosh past Rose and rocket up the stairs to freedom that she realizes they're meant to represent the wind. She whirs to follow him, reaching out with her mind to grope at the air around her, but the rest of the house has vanished with him, and those blue lines of wind curve and dance their way up into the clouds, darting away from Rose's mental touch and blending back in with the rest of John's mind around them.

Rose whirls to fly after him - and then pauses. The stairs are still beneath her feet, and though the rest of the house has vanished as eerily as it arrived, the basement still lies below, dark as pitch.

Rose squeezes her eyes shut, and continues down. Sure enough, a vast pool of grimdark acid glitters in the darkness, lapping up against the mirrored walls of the Egberts' basement training room. By the time Rose clears away the buildup of grimdark, enduring more hallucinations that grin at her from the mirrors and try their utmost to horrify her, she's certain that whatever scrap of John's consciousness might have concealed itself in this house is long gone.

The basement seals over when she floats out, leaving no trace of the house full of John's emotions against the oil-strewn black gravel of the empty field. She curses the fact that she ended up separated from Dave and Karkat by all this insanity - Dave at least might have been able to give her a rough estimate of how much time may be passing in reality. Her own dim awareness of the passage of time is too subjective to be trusted in a mindscape. Going through the house and cremating the grimdark contamination felt like it only took twenty minutes or so, but Rose has been fooled quite thoroughly by a horrorterror's time-slurring presence before, and doesn't trust that impression. She just needs to reunite with the other two as quickly as possible; they might need to retreat from John's mind to check on the situation with the sedatives before attempting to track John down again.
But if she'd left that grimdark to tuck itself away beneath the surface of John's mind like a sore full of pus, it would only have erupted into grimmer consequences later on. She can't begrudge finishing it off, even if it cost her an opportunity to chase down that half-real John and try to draw some sense out of him. Sighing, Rose tries to shrug off the last of the emotions threatening to suck her back down into John's mindset, and snaps her fingers to start floating up into the air.

The wind buoys her up.

It takes her a good ten seconds to pause, blink, and do a double take.

In those ten seconds, the brilliant blue lines of wind manage to lose patience with how slow she's moving, and start to tug petulantly on her hair and her hood until, in a fit of impatient prankster's whimsy, the breeze yanks said hood back up over her eyes and down to tie it in a knot over her face. "Enough of that!" Rose splutters, yanking the hood back, and her heart starts to pound in earnest when she sees, to her cautious excitement, that the blue breeze doesn't immediately vanish the moment her eyes lose sight of it. "John?" she repeats, hardly able to believe her own luck.

EB: ehhhhhh

EB: he's still ignoring me right now. always ignoring me and trying to stuff me in with the rest of the stuff he ignores

The wind morphs into that same pale, half-formed image of John - and then just as quickly drops the rest of the illusion so that all that remains is a mouth that sticks out its tongue to blow a raspberry. When it's done, it unravels into the blue, visible wind once more.

EB: me! his own breeze!

A beat.

Oh. Not a breeze, then.

_The Breeze._

"Pleasure to meet you," Rose says on autopilot, because - well, really, what _does_ one say to the mostly incorporeal, partially anthropomorphized avatar of one's friend's godly powers?

The Breeze just speeds around her in a circle, impatient and once again hauling her up into the sky. It feels remarkably like the winds' efforts to cast her and Dave and Karkat out of John's mind altogether back in the beginning, but before Rose can voice her suspicions the windy thing whines at her, and she realizes - "Pardon the intrusion, but would it be possible for you to direct me to where Dave and Karkat might be?" She hesitates. "And John?"

The Breeze lashes restlessly, and Rose, not wanting to miss out on this strange chance by aggravating it, hurries to float along with the winds trying to carry her further away from where the house stood. Almost immediately the windy thing tangles in her hair in what seems to be some obscure gesture of approval.

BE: i can take you, yeah. because you are rose and we love you and they are dave and karkat and we love them

BE: but that depends on which john you want to see, the right one or the creepy one

Rose sucks in a breath. The implications of that statement are...well. She doesn't really care to contemplate them. But she must. "The...right John, thank you."
BE: oh so dave first then. maybe by the time we get there he'll have talked sense into the right john and the big dumbo, so that the wrong john will go away!

BE: i think that would be nice. that way he'll stop talking the right one back into going back to that horrible house all the time

"The Egbert house?" Rose glances back down at the receding ground, but can make out no trace of it.

BE: no one is supposed to go back there! you all should just listen to me more and do fun things like play pranks in school instead "You've...told John not to go back home before?" Rose can feel her stomach sinking further.

BE: of course i have! it's a bad place with a bad man. i told him so! i told him to go to the time boy and stay gone!

BE: but he didn't listen to me no matter how many times i rose up to take him there :( and with the big dumbo still sleeping and recovering all the time, it's not like i could make him listen for his own good! what a pain...

BE: now shhhhh! i'll take you to dave and the sleeping dumbheads, but you have to be quiet or that man will tell the wrong john where we are!

And with that, the Breeze seizes control of Rose's flight trajectory entirely, ferrying her along just beneath the amorphous roof of the cloud cover. She doesn't dare stop levitating her avatar with the power of her own mind, but the Breeze seems to have a better idea of how to navigate John's shifting, tumultuous mind than she has yet formulated, and she defers to its better judgment.

But she can't resist one final question? "What man?"

BE: the one who messed everything up and made everything break in two. he's still standing back there!

Goosebumps rise on along the flesh of Rose's arm, and she looks back before she can second guess herself, peering down at the ground below.

A figure in white watches them go. Before Rose can do more than recoil, the flat image of Samuel Egbert turns sideways, and like the house before him, flattens out into a thin line and disappears.

BE: oh man, not again. i don't know why john imagined that guy up in the first place when all it does is rile up the creepy one. we better hurry

It's not wrong. Whatever is afoot here, Rose didn't like that pale, faceless copy of Samuel Egbert one bit. She squints and winces as the Breeze picks up the pace, the resulting wind shear sets her eyes tearing up once more. Well, she might as well try - "Shades," she commands, tugging on the soft fabric of the hood beside her ear.

A golden visor falls down in front of her eyes, and when Rose reaches up she feels a good two inches have left the hem of the hood, so she shoves it back down off her head. What a bizarre application of conservation of mass.

BE: huh

BE: you're a very interesting seer, aren't you?
"And you are a very helpful...aspect," Rose says at last, after a moment of deliberating how exactly one is supposed to address a game power.

BE: only as helpful as john will let me be! but john is just as dumb as the big dumb guy! they deserve each other

It's only then, as they pelt towards Dave's location in John's mind as swift as the wind, that Rose thinks to ask -

"...What exactly do you mean by 'big dumb guy?'" Rose feels like she should already know the answer to this. Really, it's on the tip of her tongue. "Exactly who else is in here with us?"

And she's right.

When the Breeze tells her, as it so happens, she already does know the answer.

---

Dave wakes up.

Which was probably his first mistake. Really sets the tone for the rest of the day, you know?

God fucking damn, but he's parched. He could go for a sip of AJ right now.

But of course, instead of a bottle of that most delicious elixir being passed down to him by the hand of a convenient god - they've got like four of them running around this shitty lab, why are they not pulling miracles like that? - the first thing Dave sees when his vision stops swirling is a thatch of black hair and the nubby curve of really tiny horns.

"Karkat motherfucking Vantas, if you do not remove your hands from my fabulous bod right the hell now, I will back hand you into next week," he croaks, feeling kind of like there's a rhino slow-dancing on his chest, each heart beat a slow and tender reminder that there's a foreign object lodged in his lower torso. This hurts worse than being stabbed ever has, possibly because Dave's been stabbed like weekly since he was old enough to hold a sword so he's kind of over it. God, he got shot. By John's dad. That is actually a thing that actually happened in actual real life. Christ. "I can do that. I think. I believe in me."

But speaking of weird time shit. He should probably start paying more attention to his future-selves' vague and shitty warnings, and then start circumventing them through whatever means possible because there were so many better ways to have handled this situation than literally taking a bullet for some clone rando he barely knows.

Karkat doesn't take Dave's threat seriously, but hell, Dave can't blame him; he couldn't backhand a goddamn turkey into an oven to cook at 425 degrees Fahrenheit, with the state he's in. It's pathetic as hell. Bro's going to kick his ass for this one, he can feel it. "We're trying to make you not die, so will you for once in your dumbass life shut your mouth, you - you - butt biscuit!"

Oh, hell no. There's no way Dave can let that one slide. He squints at Karkat, lips pursed. "That was the worst goddamn insult I've ever heard."

Karkat's ensuing wordvomit turns out to be remarkably bracing. Or at least it distracts Dave enough that he can't say the troll doesn't try. "You think it's easy to dredge up insults of this caliber in the middle of a fucking crisis? We're not all lowlifes who think the height of profanity is sprinkling 'goddamn' and 'hell' and 'bro' on the half-assed, soggy, lopsided, pus-flavored cup of frozen yogurt that is your idea of sophisticated fucking conversation. Somehow I am still disappointed in you after all this time, which I didn't think was even possible, so congratulations! The amount of sheer incompetence you manage to cram into one ghastly fleshsack is actually an accomplishment in and of itself. How do you even wake up and remove yourself from your flat human reposer slab every morning living with the fact that you have no talent? Don't answer that. Do humanity a favor and don't even bother next time. You are officially demoted by me, your newly appointed trolltalitarian, from Knight of Time to the measly Earthworm of Shut-the-fuck-up."

Someone pokes at the hole in his side with a really sharp claw. Dave bites back a shriek of pain because that's just what he does. Get shot? Fuck it, if he's going down, he's going down cracking those wise asses. "...That was beautiful," he says at last, when the white hot agony of someone digging around through his insides subsides to a dull throb again and he can do it without crying like a baby. "Bruhvo. I think - I teared up a little. Oh my god. Reposer. Need to tell that one - to John or Jade or something -"

"Oh my fucking god, did you just say 'bruh' - no. Just stop talking. Stop punning. You're still leaking everywhere." A claw shoves Dave's shoulders back down against the floor before he tries to sit up, and then Karkat is glaring down at him. Or it would be a glare, if the troll weren't sweating and doing his best impression of genuine concern. Seriously. Dave's only ever seen that kind of look directed at John before. Which implies all kinds of fucked up shit that Dave can't even deal with right now. "Kanaya. Do the thing."

Wait. What. Dave makes a last ditch effort to sit up and stare cross-eyed at the two trolls leaning over him. He's still lying on the floor, and there is no goddamn way that's sanitary. His shades are kind of lopsided, and he does his best to level them solely by wrinkling his nose as he searches the hall around them for a sign of a goddamn medical professional - someone, anyone.

But there's just these two.

Oh shit. "Hold up," Dave says, trying and failing to wriggle out from under Karkat. "The hell is this? Why are you people -"

"Relax, Dave," Kanaya's voice floats up to his ears with all the soothing gravel of a troll trying their damndest not to sound like they have their claws poking around in one's fleshy bits. "I was a professional Mediculler in the war. Karkat, keep him still."

Dave's eyes bulge and he gives up on cool, shoving at Karkat frantically because - "Medicullers specialize in amputating shit, hold up - nonononononono - FUCK!"

Later, he'll try to convince anyone who didn't witness the incident that Kanaya tried to hack off a random limb based on the results of Karkat fiddling with a rigged Twister spinner, both of them cackling like the blood-happy nutballs that they are, but no one believes him. Nor does it distract them from the blatant fucking lie that Karkat spreads around about the fact that the collar around Dave throat glitches and lets out a piercing screech in its utter failure to convey his manly, manly shout of surprise when Kanaya pries a huge fucking bullet out of his insides.

He finally just passes out again.

-

Dave wakes up with bandages wrapped around his torso, and catapults out of the hospital bed before anyone can say a word.

He goes back because he needs to fix this.
He dies.

[timeline status: doomed]

In a lot of the attempts, he doesn't stop to ask anyone what happened after he got shot. He has no idea what's happening in John's poor screwed up head, what wheels are turning and juddering and flying off their axles.

This gets him killed a lot.

Dave beats his past self, Karkat, and Jade to the door. There are no bodies to distract him along the way, for some reason, so of course he gets there first.

John is unconscious, slumped against the wall, and Dave doesn't hesitate before flashstepping right to him, shaking the kid's shoulders to try to get a response. Karkat's frozen in the doorway Dave ran through, blocking Jade's view when she finally arrives, and Dave's too dumb a fuck to turn around and realize there's a gun pressed to the back of his head before the trigger's already pulled, gore splattering across John's bloody mask of a face just as pale blue eyes flutter open in a manic grin.

He becomes one of the bodies for the real Dave to trip over.

[timeline status: doomed]

Dave makes it all the way to the office to kick the door down while John's still upright. Tears and blood stream from the kid's eyes as he stares at Dave over Samuel's shoulder. They're so blue it's unreal, the usual blue glow jacked up to neon, and Dave sees the exact moment the switch flips in John's head. His early arrival tips the balance and makes the thing in John's head wake up all the faster -

He tries that five different ways. The thing in John's body gets more creative every time.

[timeline status: doomed]

Dave bursts in through the Egbert's front door a few months ago, early in the morning. He catches Samuel at the kitchen sink and stabs him in the back, right between the ribs and angling up to skewer his heart. His own heart drums too-fast in his chest, jolted by the rush of the first time he's ever gone so far back in time in one leap.

This has to be early enough. It has to be.

Upstairs, John sits bolt upright in his bed, screaming, and the only warning Dave gets is the weird damn popping noise his ears make as his lungs implode. Most of the neighborhood goes with him.
It's two years ago and Karkat is in the living room with John when Dave knocks so hard on the front door he nearly shoves it down. There is no white helicar in the driveway, and he spends most of the time explaining to the two dumbstruck young dweebs just how badly Samuel has fucked John up already. Karkat is all round eyes and a rounder face, and two years ago is before he even started training to become a hero - hell, before he and John were even really friends.

John nods, and looks appropriately sick to his stomach, hands trembling as he agrees to come to Texas with Dave for his own safety. He protests that he wants to wait and hear Samuel's side of the story, but John's always been easily persuaded by promises of adventure. And Dave figures that as long as he doesn't hurt Daddy Douchelord, he can probably avoid setting off whatever made John attack Jade.

But a paradox is a paradox, no matter how long the broken loop.

Turns out mindgrubs can be activated remotely. John shuts down when the plane is in the air over Nevada, and by the time they set down prematurely in Reno there's no one left alive but the pilots, John, and Dave. Said pilots kick it shortly thereafter. The things that a windy dude can do to an airplane are just -

Well.

That Dave doesn't die for weeks after the not-John, whistling cheerily, drags him off the plane and floats them down to the runway where Samuel stands waiting by a smaller, faster jet plane. He ends up in a lab, instead, and he only succeeds in finally killing himself after Roxy hacks into the time power canceling cage they've rigged for him and some other chick. Hell, maybe all she wanted was to talk to him, seeing as how the other new Scratch kid is crazier than sin.

But he's learned his lesson. He's been schooled. This Dave already knows he's doomed.

One of him succeeds.

It's pretty sweet for the first five years afterward. Thoughts about that apocalypse game that never turned out to be a thing sometimes mutter in the quiet hours of the night when Dave wishes he could just go the fuck to sleep, but he puts them aside, again and again, as Dadbert goes to sicko jail, the Midnight Crew fumbles and dies out after the odd disappearance of that wacky Scratch guy who lead them, John and Rose finally go through goddamn therapy and Jade takes off to explore South America more thoroughly. Their powers stop working, but he forces himself not to care.

When time starts to break down and the world slowly goes dark, he can't even regret that this entire offshoot was doomed from the start. More and more people vanish as reality pulls a Donnie Darko, but until the moment he fades, at the very end, Dave clings to the fact that they were happy. That. God. Maybe this wasn't how things were supposed to go, but like hell could he have lived with himself if he let events play out as paradox space wanted them to. Paradox space is a cocked up pile of bullshit, and Dave wants a refund.
And then he's gone, too.

[timeline status: doomed]

Dave wakes up from Kanaya and Karkat's ministrations with a flinch - and the weirdest sense of déjà vu. Bandages wrap right around his ribs, but the wound already feels like it's healing; he stares at the ceiling for a long moment before he realizes he's doing it without the protective cover of his sunglasses, and he fumbles like a basic bitch when he goes to replace them. His ears ache like a son of a bitch, but it's a low note that he can easily ignore.

The seconds tick by. Each one is a second that Dave is not rolling back the clock to stop this, to spare John from having his asshole anti-guardian turn on him and do - whatever Dave walked in on, there. This is John; what kind of asshole would just let the poor kid suffer like this?

But his mind won't stop repeating what that future Dave said.

We couldn't stop this.

He has to try - fuck it, he's going back and -

If he does, he'll cause a paradox. It's the one thing he's been smart enough so far to avoid, in all his short time loops and technically illegal pauses - dicking around with shit to make something happen that he knows for a fact didn't happen, and vice versa. Like the bullshit in New York where Rose's tentacle monsters from beyond the stars wrecked his shit; he could have gone back after he'd recovered to prevent that whole mess from happening and actually made himself useful in the effort to save Rose, but then the whole snarled mess would have spun off into a headache of broken causality that would make stabbing his brain with an ice pick sound like a good time.

He remembers being shot. He remembers Dad Egbert being the one to do it. And he remembers John passed out, bleeding from literally his entire face.

And because he remembers all that happening, he can't change it. He can't.

When he finally finishes coming to that shitty realization, all he can really muster up the will to say is, "God fucking dammit."

Something moves, and Dave turns his head to grimace at Rose, her posture prim and perfect as she pages through a book at his side. "Rose. God fucking dammit."

"I concur," Rose says, crossing her ankles and leveling a bitter smile at him. Her fingers tap in 3:4 time over the thin pages of the book, and Dave squints (or maybe he's just scowling - to hell with controlling his emotions right now) to try to read the words upside down. "How are you feeling, brother?"

"Like a useless napkin. You?" Dave cranes his neck around and - hang on a second. Those are pictures, not words.

Rose is reading a picture book.

...God, how long was he out?
"Mmm, the same." Rose snaps the book shut with a resounding clap before Dave can figure out why she's looking at pictures. "I don't suppose there is any hope of us turning back the clock on this?"

Dave grinds his teeth, clearing his throat with a hoarse noise that isn't a sob, and shakes his head mutely. "It already happened," he says, which is fantastically shitty one liner that could be interpreted twenty different ways.

But Rose gets him, nodding. Her eyes look swollen and red, like she might have been crying, but Dave's not one to call her out about it. "That's fine," she says, her voice perfectly steady as Dave scans the room, taking in the corner where a familiar but rumbled Dadbert lies, his snazzy white suit covered in dust and wrinkles and not at all snazzy, which is no more than he deserves for being a total asshole. "I have a plan. One that should hopefully salvage the situation - as much as it can be salvaged. At the least, we may be able to help John."

"John?" Dave asks like the intelligent specimen of humanity he is, sitting his woozy sack of organs upright and ignoring the throb of protest his side lets out when he twists the muscles in his general 'you got shot' zone too much. He wonders if this is what steak feels like after it's been, like, tenderized for human consumption. At least with stab wounds, it's a cut and not much else - this gunshot business feels like he's going to have leftover bruises all over for days and days, which is such bullshit. He shakes his head. "Damn. What's wrong with that kid?"

Rose tells him.

He kind of really wishes she hadn't told him.

-

Note to self.

_When Rose says she has a plan, remember that Rose's plans are just as, if not more, likely to be subject to epic failure as any plan made up by the rest of the team._

But no. Ordinary, run of the mill failure was just not enough, Dave thinks, kicking a gloopy chunk of black ooze and pulling a face when it sticks to the toe of his shoe. Nah, son. They had to all launch themselves into John's brain with unspeakable majjyks, and do it all without Rose making sure that Dave and Karkat had something like, you know, an emergency flaregun to call for help in the event they all got separated. Hell, even a handy dandy emergency eject button would have been nice.

First Karkat gets dragged down into a raging storm by some ghostly rope from hell, and now Rose has literally just vanished into thin air. There wasn't even some kind of lame sound effect or anything; one second she was standing there, lit up like her own personal nightlight - and then Dave blinked, and she was gone. Which is why he is currently freaking the fuck out.

But you know. In a chill, totally unbothered kind of way. So what if the other two people in the party are lost in the depths of John's pun-hell of a mind. He's on this shit. All up on it. Like a chimp on a jack-knifing semi truck, spilling bananas all over the freeway and fucking up traffic just in time for the five o'clock rush hour shitstravaganza and god, there's just banana smushed everywhere on the pavement, the massacred bodies stripped of their skins and left out to rot in the sun like some kind of fruit gore porno -

Okay, he's starting to wonder if he's just making this up because his own head is screwed up, or because at some point in his childhood Bro might have dipped into other kinds of puppet pornography that Dave's just blocked out until now. Anything is possible in a world where goddamn Dadbert can go full fucking Judas Contract on them.

...

God he has no idea what to do now. This is seriously some kind of horror movie shit. Everyone's split up and they're gonna get picked off one by one, and Dave's probably gonna be first because he's blond and pretty.

He looks to his left. The dark, cratered plains of fucking Mordor stretch out into the distance.

He looks to his right. Weirdly enough, the dark, cratered plains of fucking Mordor stretch out into the distance.

He wishes Rose hadn't checked out before explaining why John's head looks like actual hell. Now he's just stuck here, hanging out and totally not panicking, and he's stumped as to what all this stuff means. It's gotta be, like, you know, symbolic as fuck, right? That's how it works in movies. The clouds are symbolic of everything being terrible. The ground covered in massive meteor craters and black ooze is...also symbolic of everything being terrible.

Dave is pretty sure he just answered his own question, there.

He's also pretty sure he's mentally spacing out here, getting caught up in his own weird rambling nonsense like always. He should probably focus on something else. As a distraction, he scuffs his foot along the ground as discreetly as he can, until the oil rubs off.

Nice. Productive. He's on a roll here.

Fuck it. He's gonna start walking. "Whatever," he mutters, as he skirts around the edge of the crater. He begins to wind his way in between the other impact cavities, shuffling his feet in the dirt and occasionally surveying the landscape for some sign of the others. A few minutes in, and he doesn't really think about the logistics of using time powers in someone else's head - he just thinks 'to hell with it' and does it, flashstepping along to pick up the pace. At one point, the sky overhead flares with light, but when Dave flings himself to the ground, the too-close bundle of lightning just rolls along back into the heaving sea of storm clouds and vanishes.

This is all starting to get boring as hell. The creepiness of wandering alone in a bleak, deserted plain has officially worn off, which is kind of sad. Maybe wherever they are, Karkles and Rose are doing all kinds of awesome shit. Beating up super smiley evil anti-Johns and whatnot.

Dave's just gonna rap. Yeah. Start dropping mad beats everywhere in this hizz-ouse so that when John wakes up he has to clean them up off the floor like it's a game of 52-Pickup. Jade has the talent, so clearly as her ectogoop twin John must have some latent ability. Dave just needs to incept this mofo.

He's barely begun to really hit his stride and everything when the wind starts to rise. "Yeeeah, goin' crazy with the flow. Still gotta - tch - gotta thing or two to learn, yo." He trips over something tangled around his ankles, but catches himself before he can fall over. He keeps walking, not really noticing when the ground starts to even out around him, the blasted craters giving way to a flat field. There's less of this gross oily shit lying around everywhere, so he figures he's headed in the not-messed up direction. "Smoking some dank ass herbal - but your roommate throws you a curveball -" He stumbles again, and pures his lips at the fact that he's tripping over nothing. The wind sheers at him from the side, but hell, John's head is full of windy stuff, so he's mostly just ignoring it. "Says he's got asthma OH SHIT, now he's passed out in a bathroom stall -"
He realizes he fucked up when the gale whirls and tosses a handful of grit and dirt right into his face, his shades doing absolutely jackshit to shield him when it swoops up from around his ankles at the worst possible angle. Wheezing and rubbing at his eyes, Dave shakes his head, and his cape billows out again, yanking on his neck and smacking his face so that he gives some serious thought to just taking it off entirely. It's not worth it to be choked out by John's latest mind tornado.

Then the wind shoves him off his feet.

It just kind of keeps happening, and Dave finishes untangling his cape from around his head just in time to squint into the breeze and realize he's flying sideways, caught up in some random wind vortex bullshit. He kicks and scrambles to try to plant his feet back on the ground - because flying with someone else in charge is mildly off-putting, let alone flying because you're caught up in a tornado - but at some point he loses sight of the ground entirely. Also up and down no longer seem to be a thing. Which hey, cool, cool. He's cool with that.

And then he drops like a stone.

He is slightly less cool with that.

"SHIBNRRRLGHL!" he says eloquently as he lands, hard, on something that juts its way right into his diaphragm. To finish off that last rhyme on a good note, of course. He's not sure if he fell a short enough distance that his survival was basically assured, or if he got flung at the ground from so high up with such velocity that it just tested his mind self's resilience to the point that he lived by sheer dumb luck. Can mind people die in minds? God, where is Rose? He needs a goddamn magic Wikipedia, which she just so happens to be, but oh look, he's getting tossed around in a game of mental human ping pong instead.

Dave is starting to think he couldn't punch his way out of a mental paper bag. His coolkid gambit is tanking, here. At least there was no one around to see that. He peels himself off the offending object and flops over, taking stock of his surroundings as he focuses on deep breathing.

The pitch black dirt and craters are gone, at least, which means Dave can no longer claim he's walking around Mordor. Instead, the ground around him is made up mostly of dark sand and chunks of cobalt blue stone, with plateaus of blue and grey shale and larger hills of brown rock rising up at angles in the distance. Leafless trees and possibly radioactive glowing turquoise mushrooms sprout up in random places. There are still clouds overhead, but they're mostly dingy grey rather than dark as night, lit from below by all the shiny shrooms. As he rubs at the bruise (can he bruise if all of this is in John's head?) forming in the middle of his torso, he glances down at the nice jabby thing that broke his fall, and sees that it's a raw crystal of cloudy blue tourmaline. The only one he can see around him, too, so that's his luck for you.

Why. The hell. Does John have an entire section of his head dedicated to LOWA$$. Or however you spell it?

Dave has some pressing questions that need answers, and that one is going to the very top of the list. "Rose?" he calls, because hell, maybe his impromptu whirlwind tour of casa John has dumped him near where she vamoosed off to. "Karkles?"

No response. "Come on, you guys. This isn't cool," he mutters, mostly to himself, as he stands up and brushes black-and-blue sand off his pajama bottoms. When he checks his internal metronome, he can only sigh, because it says he's only been wandering around for, like. Twenty minutes, in real time. Twenty minutes and forty seconds and twelve milliseconds if he wants to get real damn technical about it. Karkat vanished three minutes in, and Rose disappeared at seven minutes, fifteen seconds. It just feels like it's been longer because he keeps zoning out, probably. The situation's not urgent.

Yeah he's still fucking lost. "This is me. Radiating neediness!" he calls, cupping his hands around his mouth and turning in a slow circle, leaning more on one heel than the other. "Yo! John! I am summoning your windy ass! Pay attention!"

This surprisingly does not work.

...Fuck it. Dave's fingers twitch, and before he can tell himself how pathetically stupid it is, he yanks his phone out of his pocket. It's his weapon of last resort, but the last time he saw this place, it was on fire and John was pretty dead, so he feels justified in pulling all the stops to try to find someone to at least talk to before he loses his shit.

-- no server detected --
TG: humor me
-- no server detected --
TG: thats okay self serve is just fine and dandy
-- no server detected --
TG: pls i just need to talk to somebody literally anybody would work hell patch me through to karkat even
-- no server detected --
TG: yeah i know theres no server but there can be miracles if you believe
-- no server detected --
TG: goddammit
-- no server detected --
TG: also that error message is gonna get real goddamn old real goddamn fast
-- no server detected --
TG: why did i think this would work in the first place
-- no server detected --
TG: come on for the love of god tier john its your head think me up some wifi -- server connected --
TG: oh holy shit youre joking
-- ?? [??] has joined the chat! --
??: I do not joke.
??: Often.

Dave takes a moment before responding to clap his hands together in prayer. I promise to take your name in vain way more often, John, you windy god, you. Then, his thumbs mostly take over on autopilot as he starts beatboxing under his breath and trots off in a random direction, in a much better mood now that he has an audience, at least. He heads in the direction with the least amount of steep cliffs and random gorges - hopefully - so if anyone does decide to turn up, he can claim he's still looking for John and not dicking around with a possibly imaginary phone conversation.

TG: this is amazing
??: Why have you come here? Why must you persist in this verbiage?
??: Some of us are trying to sleep in here. And if you can wake me when I'm sleeping, you should really reconsider your options.
TG: hold the hell up
TG: i still cant believe theres internet service in johns head and its talking to me
TG: come on youve got to admit that doesnt happen everyday
TG: i mean is this actual legit wifi that works in brains or is this like crazy magic bullshit fake wifi
TG: can you imagine if john were a walking talking wireless router
TG: hell it explains more than it doesnt TG: so have you been sentient long or ??: Good grief. I should have believed the Forgelord when he claimed a version of you talked him into submission.

Huh. Vague. Dave scratches the side of his nose, adjusting his sunglasses to cover the motion, and then has to look up for a second when he rams his knee painfully into a small boulder. Grimacing, he angles around it and eyeballs the ground in front of him more carefully. He's sauntering in a kind of downwards direction, blue rock stacking up on either side of the thin path, but it's still a path, and he can't make out any cliff faces in the distance before him, so he must emerge from RandomValley.com at some point without too many obstacles. It looks like this section is mainly just overgrown shrooms and brilliant tourmaline.

??: But the question still stands. Why have you ventured here, child? It is far too early for this nonsense.
TG: looking for my main squeeze
??: What.
TG: mi husbando
??: Just how long was I asleep?
TG: the target of my deepest darkest broclivities
??: A name, child, give me a name.
TG: well were literally fuckdeep in johns cracked mindspace so i kind of just assumed we both knew what we were talking about here
TG: you seen him around
TG: mildly buff kid with a permanent nerdon for comic book heroes and the bluest eyes to ever blue
TG: occasionally been known to do the windy thing
??: I know him, yes.
??: But if you seek the Heir, you have delved too deep. You have left his mind entirely. This is my domain.

...He did not just read that. Those are not the words on the pesterlog screen. And his favorite drink is not apple juice, and he is absolutely fantastic at lying to himself -

Dave groans, picks a convenient slab of brown rock just off the main road, and uses it as a springboard for his forehead. Repeatedly.

TG: oh youve got to be shitting me
TG: i didnt just manage to lose rose and karkat im literally in the wrong goddamn mind
TG: how can i p o s s i b l y be this lost
TG: this is such bullshit
??: It really is. I had not realized that puny players like yourself could wander from the Heir's mind into my own with impunity while I slept.
??: And you, not even a Mind player! This is embarrassing, quite frankly.
TG: how did i even get here
TG: i mean great i thought we were all wandering around johns brain which was like you know an enclosed space TG: but nope haha jk apparently you can just roam around and accidentally ollie into someone elses mind thanks for the heads up rose
??: His mind and mine are connected on the motifphorical level. I doubt you could have traipsed your way into just any other mind.
TG: well now i feel like a total asshole

Dave lifts his head up from the rock, where the phone has been casting a light on the stone and glinting off tiny chunks of mica, and rubs at the new grainy pattern indented on his forehead as he frowns at the screen. Even given the fact that this is all happening in the center of John's mind - or, okay, someone else's head, jeez - there's something really weird about this conversation he's having with the personification of someone's internal wifi.

But hell, any personification is better than none, right? Maybe this random dude can direct him back to John's head, since he knows so much about it.

TG: wait hang on TG: you know about game shit
??: I have a passing familiarity with it.
TG: then do a bro a solid and help me figure out how to get back to my boys head
??: I'm pretty sure dealing with you was not in my job description.
TG: they didn't mention it in the interview at all
??: No. I was born into this role.
TG: well shit man get your union rep on the line
TG: do you have a health plan at least
??: No.
TG: god
TG: damn
TG: no wonder you're so pissy
TG: so will you cc barack on this email or should i
??: You speak riddles again, child.
TG: you need to complain to your union rep just tell him that you know that you never got insured
TG: and now so does the president
TG: trust me this is a classic straight from the bowels of shitty internet humor TG: but seriously if you want me out of your head just point me back in the direction of eb
??: ...
??: Continue forward.

Dave blinks, and runs his fingers through his hair as he looks ahead again. Then, with a shrug - because it's not like he has any better ideas - he starts walking again, ambling along the light blue stone path with a little more hip in his stride. Having any direction at all is preferable to wandering aimlessly, at this point.

Possibly he should be considering just how smart it is to take directions from wifi. But hell, Rose isn't here to contradict him, and if Karkat were around to shout objections Dave would probably do it regardless just to piss him off.

And since John's still MIA...to hell with it.

TG: wait shit was i actually going the right way this whole time
??: No. But you are now. Something is wrong, so I am making it the right way for the sake of expediency.
TG: cool
TG: hang on you can do that
??: Of course I can.
??: Before you meander further, tell me - you have repeatedly referred to the Heir as...unstable. How serious are you being?
TG: more serious than a finalist on a food network reality based cooking competition with five minutes on the clock and a basket full of mangos the only thing standing between him and staged televised victory
TG: by which i mean his dad totally fucked him up in the head and now there's a dude
??: ...A dude?
TG: yeah a not john
TG: he tried to kill jade and im totes sure he killed lot of mes in a shiton of doomed timelines so were pretty sure its not him so we have to keep him sedated and shit until real johns back in control
TG: wait are you him oh shit on a shingle am i talking to the evil john rose said not to do that ??: No.
TG: oh
TG: wait do i believe you
??: Just keep walking, Knight. It may be good that you came here first.

Dave taps his fingers along the sides of his phone in a nice, syncopated rhythm that emphasizes the off-beats. It helps him gather his thoughts a little.

First, this asshole knows about players and shit. Now, he definitely knows that Dave is a Knight (even if Dave himself is questioning just how literal these title things are when his costume looks and feels like super comfy pajamas).

And there's that sweet portmanteau of 'motif' and 'metaphorical' he threw out there, while he was droning on about being connected to John's mind.

Time for some sick ass sleuthing.

TG: still a little hazy on how that happened considering i didnt do it on purpose TG: seriously i just started walking at random and here we are
??: I can see the path you took to come here. The wind tunnel between the Heir's mind and my own has been shredded, and everything on his side lies in tatters. And he is - ??: ...Well. I have slumbered overlong. I should have sensed this earlier. What's in his mind now is not right.
TG: no shit
TG: btw who even the heck are you
TG: on account of im not the mind dude
TG: but the fact that you and john have some mindmeld seems like a thing that should be explained

Oh yeah. So subtle.

??: You mean it's not obvious?
-- ?? [%] changed handle to TYPHEUS [TY] -- TY: Come.
TY: And come armed.
TY: I have yet to decide if I should eat you or not.

...

That was easier than expected.

-

TG: no fuck you that wasnt obvious at all

Dave heaves himself up onto an outcropping of rock. The terrain grows more rugged and sheer the further Dave tries to walk. What looked like a relatively easy trail through a valley of hallucinogenic shrooms has subtly - altered. He thinks, more than a little salty about it, that this giant snake dickwad could have at least had the decency to make the trip easier, not harder. But no.

TY: I am not in a good mood. Don't make me eat you.
TG: you wouldn't TY: I'm very tempted. I wonder how Hephaestus resisted the urge.
TG: hell if i know man
TG: i dont remember half that crap
TG: also where am i going TY: Forward.
TG: oh so thats how its gonna be TG: whatever
TG: explanations are so passe
TG: its not like i was happy to be wandering around in some random douchebags head to begin with anyway
TG: this is just the minor disappointment that confirms you are in fact still a douchebag
TY: I'm no happier about this than you are. I am a denizen. I am a trial and a challenge and an ultimatum and a Choice. That's my prerogative, Skaia damn it.
TY: But first I am seeded with horror by the Noble Circle's ilk and forced to rise early to fight the Seaswallower near to death, and now, even after a scratch of the game, everything is terrible and I have a small human in my head.
TY: This is not pleasant and I want it to be done with as soon as possible. For both our sakes.
TG: okay i admit thats not overly douchebaggy thats pretty damn reasonable
TG: on account of all those things sound really shitty
TG: but where am i going and why are you rearranging everything
TY: I said as soon as possible, no? I've shifted you to an area closer to where you need to be.
TY: It is not me being helpful. I am simply helping myself, and your goal happens to temporarily coincide with my own. Once you have helped remove the Heir from my mind, you may be on your way.

Dave goes crosseyed. He also stops dead, which is a good thing - when he manages to fix his eyeballs so he doesn't look like a total jackass, he notices that he's reached a dead end. If he wants to go any farther, he has to climb up a steep cliff face.

Thank god being a hero in a city like Houston means he's good at climbing things with minimal handholds to reach rooftops. Dave hastily sticks his phone in his pocket, cracks his knuckles, and starts flashing his way up the rock wall, the stone rough and occasionally even sharp under his fingerpads. When he reaches the top, he throws a knee over and rolls onto solid ground, taking his phone out again as he goes.

TG: wait johns here
TG: but i thought john was back in crazy town
TG: what is happening
TY: He appears to have retreated part of the way into the tunnel between our two minds, trailing madness in his wake. It is little wonder you went astray in that muddle; even I can barely peer into it. Listen, and you can hear the dissonance.

Dave puffs, and snaps his fingers. Because if he can flashstep and use wireless internet to pester a giant monster, he figures all powers are back on the table. And sure enough, like floating puppies, the timetable gears snap into view, bobbing at his hips. When he runs through the sequences of turns and taps and slides he'd been slowly feeling out over the hours before Dadbert's massive dick moment, he turns up the volume of the music in his head.

He turned it down in the first place because of all that distortion and interference from the incomprehensible note that wouldn't calm the hell down earlier. Now, however, the note has resolved itself into a painful, simple song that makes his ears throb - but also, finally, has stats that Dave can access when he makes the right hand sequence.
There is no way that is a good sign. Dave thinks he liked it better when he couldn't get the lowdown on this shit, because said lowdown is officially freaking him out.

TG: oh shit
TG: ive been hearing that noise all week and it didnt make words before
TG: what does it do all these readouts tell me half of nothing
TY: You all really aren't very good at this, are you.
TY: Don't answer that. I can already tell it'll take you ten lines to get to your point and cost me another sliver of my waning sanity to have to hear it.
TG: if you cant take the heat dont provoke the sick fires yo TY: [ Eye of the Storm ] is a basic ability inherent in Breath players. It cushions the blow when they experience extreme mental and emotional turmoil.
TY: Say, for instance, they find themselves playing a reality warping game that wipes out all life from their home planet in a single violent Reckoning. They are able to think around the guilt of having unleashed an unintentional genocide because the Breeze pushes the negative emotions to the back of their mind until they can deal with it.
TG: kay im following you so far
TY: It is also supposed to be limited to five days' duration.
TG: oh fuck me
TG: how long has john been spamming this thing
TY: Years. Literally years.
TY: It is entirely possible he never stopped, even after the scratch finished rewriting the world. He activated the god tier limit breakers and set it up to activate like an autofraymotif.
TY: All of this commagitation and torturauma has built up and festered, and left the back of his mind a cesspit full of raw, unprocessed suffering that he has never allowed himself to deal with.
TY: If he persists in playing it as he is now, even though it has already gone so far out of tune, he might cease responding altogether and fall into a sleep like death while the rest of his mind runs rampant.
TY: This is ridiculous. How is he supposed to pose a potent challenge to me if he's barely functional?

There is a deep, slim fissure that cuts down into the rock on Dave's left. It would be really so convenient if he just dumped his phone down there. It's not even a real phone. It's all his imagination. At this point, he wouldn't miss it.

But as much as he'd like to skim past this awesomely disturbing conversation, he doesn't think he can without being an even more enormous douchebag than Typhus himself. Scrubbing at the back of his neck, Dave casts another longing glance at the narrow strait, and then keeps walking. The spit of rock beneath his feet keeps getting thinner and thinner, with less space between him and the widening chasm, and soon he finds himself edging along it with his back pressed to the blue stone behind him, the tips of his toes in their grey shoes curled over empty air. The ground below dropped away really goddamn abruptly, there, and it's starting to make his feet sweat to think about it.

He texts to take his mind off these absurdly nerve-wracking circumstances.

TG: no hang on TY: What now?
TG: he totally has depression and like TG: shitty anxiety attacks TG: trust me he ended up in texas before we even knew each other and ended up bawling all over my shirt
TY: With [Eye of the Storm] this discordant? I'm hardly surprised he's overwhelmed.
TG: and he nearly passed out the other day because we had to rewatch all that game stuff and everyone dying
TG: hell i think he was even on meds for a while bc his dad had him see a psychiaoh fuck TY: ...
TG: his dad
TG: made him see a TG: oh FUCK
TY: You said his father was the one who 'totally fucked him up in the head,' child. I think you begin to understand just how much wrongness I sense bleeding through from the Heir's mind as we speak. The Heir broke himself down by letting that trauma rot the foundations of his mind, and while he was vulnerable, something else crept in.
TY: Something inverted. Something...candy coated and tooth-rottingly sweet, and unbothered by such little things as guilt or madness, because it was already rotted through by nature.
TY: If that creature is what his father introduced to his mind, I fear what it is capable of, with the Heir so undermined.
TY: And so I find myself helping you children out. AGAIN.
TY: I do not get paid enough to handle these glitches for you.

Dave raises an eyebrow.

TG: do you get paid at all
TY: No.
TG: oh
TG: SHIT
TY: Yes, quite. I have begun to take your advice into serious consideration. Who is this Barack and how may I contact him?
TG: fucking a
TG: well technically hes not president anymore because of the whole term limit thing
TG: but chalzana doesnt have the same ring to it plus barack is just classic
TG: and barack just seems like a really nice guy you feel me
TG: like i could definitely kick it with barack TY: I'm retracting my consideration. I'd forgotten who I was speaking to.
TY: For that matter, why are we discussing this when you should be seriously concerned about your fellow player's well-being?
TG: because its what i do
TG: fuck dude
TG: i am concerned about john like 24 7
TG: but do i show it like a squishy dweeb hell no
TG: you bottle that shit up and sell it in a six pack of apple juice for fun and profit
TG: like for example while youve been doing your whole expository shindig
TG: i have been getting so much shit done
TG: so much
TY: What do you mean?
TG: here ill send you a pic

Dave sidles around the last curve of the tiny cliff, and steps out onto the wider rock shelf that opens up past the gap. The gorge on his left spreads out and merges into the wide, circular valley below.

And at the center sits a palace. Pipes the color of lead run out around it in all directions, over the wide expanse of an empty moat that surrounds the teal and grey structure. Six larger pipes rise up straight above the palace itself, reaching toward the clouded sky, with an arrangement of curvier, shorter pipes splayed out behind them. It looks like one of those huge ass pipe organs you'd see in a fancy old church, and the entire palace is the windchest and console.

Nothing's wrong with Dave's memory, either, because he definitely remembers this set-up from the weekend horror movie spree. The only difference is, in those tapes, the palace had recently been flattened, whereas this one is clearly intact.

TG: wasn'tthisplaceblownupbyameteorsomethingearlier.jpg
TY: Did...did you just send me a purely mental image of my mindscape using your imagination powered communication device from within my own subconscious?
TG: yeeeee
TY: Skaia have mercy on us all. I'm not really awake, am I. This is a logistical nightmare.
TG: youre welcome
TY: But at least you have arrived at the nexus point. I would invite you down deeper to my humble abode so I could welcome you face to face, but then I might not be able to resist the impulse to devour you.
TG: uh
TG: metaphorically right
TY: No. I sleep, and when I wake, I wake hungry. The Seaswallower and I have that in common.
TY: Now. Come. You must ascend one of the tallest pipes to reach the Heir.

Okay. Awesome. Dave is all about ascent.

But first, he needs to figure out a way down into the valley. It takes him a good two minutes of swearing and griping under his breath before he finds the steep, switchback trail carved into the side of this new cliff face, and five near-death experiences before he manages to recklessly flashstep his way to the bottom. The closer he gets to the palace, the less dirt there is, until he's padding along on solid plates of dense blue rock.

He starts to get a better idea of the scope of this stupid palace when he reaches a point where his trajectory crosses paths with a horizontal lead pipe - and he realizes it's as tall as three of him. He parkours the shizznit out of it, and then flashsteps along the broad expanse of the upper curve of the pipe to cross the rest of the rocky ground and the moat. The teal pipe organ looks way more intimidating from in its shadow than it did on the high cliff, and Dave has to take a moment to sit down and rub his temples before he can work up the energy to start scaling the outer rampart.

John had better appreciate this shit. Because Dave is never gonna let this one go. The things he does for this kid, honestly.

Thankfully, this castle looks like it was put together by someone with a really shitty grasp of how battlements are supposed to work - or maybe combining a palace with a pipe organ just didn't work out unless you mashed them together in the least defensive way possible. Either way, the gabled roof of a covered walkway stretches right from the outer wall all the way to one of the two central pipes, simple parapets rising up at intervals on either side, so Dave is able to run straight to the pipe without trying to navigate the rest of the maze of a palace.

Oh yes. He is the boss ass ninja. This is a cakewalk.

TG: okay im at the pipe now what TG: just climb this shit
TY: First. Look up.
TG: uh

Dave looks up. And oh, wheeeeee - aside from the fact that there's hundreds and hundreds of feet of smooth lead pipe rising overhead (how the hell is he supposed to parkour that?!), he can also make out, up ahead, a break in the cloud cover.

But the sky's not empty. Instead, there's a flat blue spiral star thing rotating around in midair high above the tops of the pipes, spread wide and flowering as it turns like a massive pinwheel.

TG: isn't that one of those spiraljiggerypokery things you use to get to the next level
TY: Spirography. They serve as gates, or in this instance, the mental representation of gates.
TG: oh hell yes i am so good at this game
TY: But this one, as you can see, has been blown wide open.
TY: The Heir is near it still. I can sense his agony. If you scale the pipes, you should be able to reach his hiding place in the passage between our minds, and haul him back into his own mind to deal with his problems. If he thinks he can simply take refuge in my sanctum because his own is compromised, he has another thing coming.
TY: Or you could just fly. I promise not to hinder you. Too much.

Dave rolls his eyes.

TG: hell man i couldn't fly even if i wanted to TG: flying is overrated
TY: You can't fly?
TG: nope
TY: But you are in the god tiers. I can sense it.
TG: nothing doing
TY: This is a mindscape. Simply imagine yourself flying and it should be so.
TG: lol lets not and say we did
TY: I fail to comprehend why not.
TG: so does your mom
TY: Why are you like this?
TG: you mean my sparkling personality
TY: Everything about you.
TG: an emotionally stunted childhood spent training in the art of being hells of awesome will do that to you TY: ...
TG: ...

There is a low rumble, and Dave freezes in place, spooked, until the roof of the walkway stops shaking underneath him. When he looks around, wondering if he's about to be eaten by a giant snake monster, he sees that an absolutely miniscule section of the pipe has slid out from the rest of the metal, forming a tiny spiral ramp no more than a foot across that wraps around the pipe, presumably leading all the way to the top.

TY: Start climbing. Irritation makes me hungry.
TG: im doing it because i want to not because you -
TY: DO IT.
TG: im going im going

Dave starts walking. He is keenly aware that at any moment the ramp could slot right back in with the rest of the metal, but the refreshing thing about being a mental avatar in someone else's head is that it really frees you up from worrying about little things like dying. Even if Dave can't quite shake the instinct that keeps him hugging the pipe. The less of him hanging over the edge of the goddamn abyss, the better. That's just common sense.
TG: dude what the fuck
TG: im about to plummet to my doom here there are no hand holds on this giant ass pipe organ
TG: jesus fucking wept theres no way this is osha compliant you need guard rails on this shit
TY: Don't make me come up there and do this myself.
TG: yeah yeah like youd actually help
TG: and not you know eat people
TY: I am being the model of self-restraint right now. I have two players wandering around in my mind, completely at my mercy. Don't push it.
TG: i feel like you and the bq would get along like a house on fucking fire doused with accelerant in the middle of a drought
TG: gods honest truth
TG: i didnt think anyone could top her for pretentious helping but not really helping cockery TG: and yet here we are
TY: I take commission work from the agents of Derse all the time. It's how the game works, child.
TY: Of course, Queens are eternal, while I must respawn for each new game. We always manage to work something out though.
TG: but you remember the shit that happened last time
TY: A scratched game is not a new game. It is simply recycled.
TY: I do wonder though...something is off about that...
TG: if something else is wrong dont tell me
TG: i dont even want to know
TG: im getting john and im getting the hell out of here
TG: no more goddamn tangents
TY: Hmm. I simply wonder where all those troll players ended up. They were a rather indiscriminately violent bunch.

By this point, Dave is about a quarter of the way up the pipe, and he's only made it this far in so short a time because he's spamming his flashstep pauses, chaining them as close as he can manage when he doesn't have the space to access his timetables. It still feels like he's inching along. Worse, his texting speed apparently slow to a goddamn snail's pace when he's busy trying not to fall to his doom.

TG: wait
TG: you know about that TY: Obviously.
TY: I at least had the fortune to end up with a Breath player who listened long enough for me to pose the Choice. He didn't take it, pressured as he was by his fellows, but we got along amicably enough until they went on to the Battlefield.
TY: He never did make it very far in his maturity arc, though, and he cannot hear me now. My mind seems to be linked only to the Heir.
TG: do you remember shit about what went down when the two sessions collided or whatever TY: Well, yes. Duh.
TG: oh my god
TG: i cant believe we dont have time for this TG: i need to get john theres no way we can talk this out
TY: What do you mean?
TG: the queens ditched the session early and the recording we have goes all staticky and shit before we can see why we even scratched it to begin with TG: john cant remember for shit for reasons that are now really fucking obvious
TG: either because his dad didnt want him to or all this [Eye of the Storm] fuckery TG: but you
TG: random monster dude
TG: you remember what happened
TY: It would be rather hard to forget. I've dreamed of it often as I slumbered.
TY: It was all incredibly fucked up.
TY: But hush, child. You are almost there.

That's a bit of an overstatement. Dave can only wonder how much of his antics Typheus is aware of right now, because he's still got another quarter stretch of pipe between him and the top.

He has to stop looking down because his palms are starting to sweat, too. Like, sweat for days and days. So much sweat. Good lord. He puts his phone away as much for its own safety as for his own self-preservation, and only takes it out again when, feeling like twenty humid Houston summer days just combined their powers into one to direct a beam of hot terror at him, Dave precariously hugs the lip of the rim of the pipe and pulls himself up, his fingers aching and stiff.

He's gonna be fucked up about heights for days after this. This shit ain't right. Clearly there's a reason why he got the nice hot lava land and John got the place with all the stupidly tall structures.

TG: okay
TG: okay fine
TG: im at the top of deaddrop supermurder pipegorge
TG: where is john and his gigglemug
TG: what do i do now
TY: Now would be a very good time for you to recall how to fly.
TG: no
TY: It's that, or I use my own mastery of the Breeze to lift you up on high.
TY: But you are not a Breath player, and it has been riled into a frenzy by that candy creature wreaking havoc in the Heir's mind, so it might eat you as soon as aid you.
TG: will you stop threatening to eat me goddamn
TY: It's very early. I am supposed to eat players who come too early.
TG: i pick option three TY: There is no option three. You have a Choice between two options. The number is two. Not three. Now shut up and pick one.
TG: hell to the no put that significant capital letter back where it came from TG: were not making this some weird ass game choice nonsense
TG: just make your mind palace a little taller that cant be that hard TY: I told you, I'm not helping any more than is strictly necessary, and I'm certainly not meddling with the structure of my own mind any more to suit your fancy. I just want the two of you out of here so I can go back to sleep.
TY: You players got yourselves into this mess - now go get yourselves out of it.
TG: omg
TG: im gonna die
TY: Somehow, I doubt even mind death would stop you from pestering me.
TG: i would haunt the hell out of you
TG: you in particular
TG: because of this unhelpful shit right here
TY: JUST FLY.
TG: no f u

Dave stares at the spirograph overhead, and gulps. Again. Three times. For a moment, he rises up onto his tip-toes, dangerously close to the outer rim of the pipe - and then he hastily snaps back down, his stomach coiling and uncoiling in hot, nervous tension that even he can't pretend isn't anxious terror. His face stays perfectly, contemplatively smooth, and that's all he can really ask for at this point.
Where is Rose when he needs her? Hell, why isn't Rose the one here instead right now, instead of a useless jackass like Dave who can't even fly? He is like. The least qualified person to be doing this whole leap of faith thing right now. Who signed him up for this garbage?

Shit. Goddamn. He signed him up for this garbage. Past him is the equivalent of 70 mph of speeding idiot in motion, and Dave is the one paying for the speeding ticket.

TG: okay fuck it
TG: i dont have time to dick around trying to remember how to fly like a total asswipe TG: do the windy thing
TY: Really?
TG: dont you dare make me second guess myself this shits already sketch as hell
TY: Honestly, I thought you'd choose to fly under your own power way before now. I can't believe you walked all the here, for that matter.
TG: shut up lets do this before i lose my nerve TY: Very well then. I shall speak the sound of the wind as a breath. Be ready.
TG: im so ready
TG: born ready
TG: bring it on
TG: lets achieve some unreal air
TY: Stop that. This instant.
TY: The Forgelord should never have indulged you. The next time we meet, I am giving him such a thrashing.
TG: thats my denizen dude right
TG: bet he could kick your ass
TY: On the contrary. I would kick his ass.
TY: I have no ass for him to kick. My victory in the contest is therefore assured.
TG: oh come on
TG: ass sured thats so goddamn blatant im telling john his denizen is a pun nerd too
TG: you dont have feet either though
TY: Step into the organ pipe, before I just shove you off and watch you fly on your own. It could be a learning experience for you. So very tempting.

Dave looks down at the lip of the pipe opening beneath his feet. He's got three feet between him and the wide, echoing pit that leads down into the belly of the palace, and like shit is he getting any closer. It almost twice as bad as looking over the outer edge on account of it's twice as dark down there, and he has no idea where the pipe leads other than probably within ten feet (give or take) of giant snake mouth. This is some Chamber of Secrets bullshit that he will have no part in.

TG: i thought you said you werent going to eat me TY: I'm not. Probably.
TG: then why am i jumping down into the unspeakable darkness of the bottomless pit
TG: i am not the heir of slytherin
TG: this is not hogwarts
TG: this is windy hell
TY: I'm not even going to ask.
TY: The wind is coming up to you through the pipe. You have to step into it before it passes you by.

A low murmuring has begun to resonate through the pipe. The metal hums under Dave's feet, and he eyes the opening with even more pantshitting trepidation.

TG: you sure there isnt a third option
TY: Fine. The third option is I eat you.
TY: What a wonderful Choice. I should have introduced the third option earlier.
TG: ahahahahahahahahahahahahahaha
TG: hahahahahahahaha
TG: hahaha
TG: ha
TG: lmao
TY: Jump now, disingenuous child.

The pipe begins to rock and shake in earnest, so that when Dave raises a foot to take a cautious step toward the hollow center, the earth itself seems to roll. He nearly topples over backwards instead, right back the way he came. Arms pinwheeling, he wobbles for a too-long moment - then, heart pounding in his chest, he manages to fling himself forward so he falls at the pipe's opening. It's not the most graceful maneuver he's ever pulled, but hell, when has he ever been graceful?

For three white hot seconds, he's sure Typhheus was shitting him, and he's actually about to plummet down however many hundreds of feet below the surface this pipe might lead. But he at least has the fleeting sense to shove his phone back in his pocket and grab his shades with both damn hands as he falls, because he has the best survival instincts, ever, alright? Obviously. Ninja-like reflexes, right here.

Then the dark blue wind roars up to meet him, reeking of wet metal and just the faintest hint of eau de gasoline, buffeting him right back out the mouth of the pipe and on up into the sky.

At least when John's flying you around places, you feel like the wind's actually trying to, you know, make an effort not to drop you. This feels like riding the leading edge of the tempest in a pink plastic Barbie Jeep, except Dave doesn't even have the Jeep. It's just him and the wind and his cuddly knight pajamas and oh my god if it spins anymore he's gonna hurl. He doesn't even care what Rose says. He is going to make mind vomit happen. It's going to be his legacy.

[There. Is this so bad?]

"THIS IS TERRIFYING," Dave screams. Then he blinks. "Wait, we could have just been talking this entire time?!

[Well, yes. You just seemed rather attached to that communications device. This is my mind. One method is just as expedient as the other.]

Dave can't even try to fix his gaze on the spirograph anymore. He's almost there, and the wind hasn't dumped him to go to prom with the popular kids yet, but if he stares at it any more the nausea's actually going to get to him. "God. Fucking. Dammit."

[It's just as well this communication is purely mental, anyway. In reality, I speak a language understood only by my assigned player. Telepathy is always an option, but it is annoying.]

[Nice fall by the way. I can appreciate a well timed fall. It is almost flying.]

Dave flails. He thinks it gets his point across. "That wasn't a fall, that was me leaping into the jaws of death like the graceful goddamn gazelle that I am."

[Really, though, all you have to do is just fall and fail to hit the ground. Flying is really quite simple if you think of it like that. Some clever mortal wrote a treatise on the subject, but for the life of me, I can't recall who.]

Dave can. And it doesn't make fucking sense. "Did you just quote troll Douglas Adams?"
"That's the one! Or perhaps it was troll Shakespeare..."

"When did you even have time to read that if you've been asleep for like actual millennia? Like, do you get vacation days or something?"

[No.]

This isn't even ironic anymore. This is just sad. "Seriously. A union rep. Find one."

[You should probably pay more attention. You are almost to the gate, and past that, I can't guarantee the winds will listen to me.]

Dave rips his eyes open again, nausea be damned, and is treated to a view of the turquoise-and-cobalt blur that is all he can make out of Typheus's mind landscape between all this windy nonsense. "What happened to mastery of the winds?!" he demands, horrified.

[It is why Breath players and I are at odds, ostensibly. They challenge my reign as father and master of the winds, and in retaliation I occupy their lands and wreck shit. It's a living.]

"No, it's not!" Dave yells. Yeah, his shit is officially lost. He's going to have to put up missing posters when he gets back to reality. "You're not getting paid, remember?!"

[Wait. You're right. Even my Grist hoard eventually goes to the players to help fuel the Ultimate Alchemy.]

[There has to be a way to appeal to Skaia about this.]

[Thank you, child, for your words of wisdom, rare and scattered as they may be amid the rest of your babble. I shall sleep for now, and consider better how I might obtain this 'union rep' and contact the great Barack of whom you sing praises.]

"Wait, wha -"

[I wish you Skaiaspeed, Knight. Don't fuck it up.]

And then, with an almost anticlimactic whoosh, Dave is tossed right up through the spirograph.

Almost immediately, Typheus's nasty snake breath ditches him. Which is awesome. So awesome. He gets the feeling that Typheus might not be all that into a repeat visit, and would probably just let him fall to his doom if he flopped right back down through the spirograph. What an asshole. Thankfully, gravity decides to kick in - sideways. He slams up against a wall that seems to leap up out of nowhere, and when he pulls his head away from it, he realizes that somehow, the wall has become the floor. John's mind had better cut out this funky physics changing crap, because Dave's already sick of this.

He looks up, not really knowing what he expects this wind tunnel between John's mind and that of his asshole denizen to look like.

The checkerboard slopes of the Battlefield stretch out before him.

"John," he mutters, pushing himself upright. "You're so fucked up."

-

The worst part about John's head, Dave thinks, is the amount of shit lying around that is clearly designed so that you need to be able to fly to get around it. It's discriminatory, is what it is.
Somewhere else in here, he's dead sure that Karkat is thinking the exact same thing. In fact, he feels a remarkable sympathy with the troll right now. If he ran into Karkat at this very moment, he thinks he might even understand what might have possessed his future self to hug him.

And the higher he goes, the more the winds tug at him, yanking on his dumbass cape every chance it gets to try to toss him back down onto the floor of the Battlefield.

It's not the whole Battlefield, at least. As near as Dave can tell, this is just a thin, tiny strip of land, longer than it is wide - and even then, it's maybe the length of two football fields, tops. A channel between Typhues and John - that just so happens to be full of wind and checkerboard flooring. Dave's still trying to figure out how he might have missed this entire part of his weird transition from John's mind to the denizen's, but all he can really remember is getting swept up in a cloud of wind and dirt. He definitely must have fallen further than he thought. However the fuck that works.

Anyway. Right now, he's just aiming for the highest point, a thin, tapering conical hill that rises up at the exact midway point between the two spirographs on either end of the tunnel. The clouds overhead have turned dark and ominous again, and the higher he climbs the more wary Dave becomes of lightning.

"Almost there. Come on. Do not - oof! - fall." The wind wraps around his ankles and pulls, and Dave snarls and kicks until it lets go. There's nothing solid for him to kick, but hell, it seems to get the point across. "Piss off!"

He figures that if nothing else, at the top of this hill, he'll be able to survey the rest of the territory, and get a better idea of where to look for his dumbass next. But he doesn't think he'll need to look much further. The clouds overhead are churning in a definite circle that just so happens to center right over this exact hill, and while Typhues's breath seems to have fucked off into the distance, the regular wind streaming through the tunnel snarls and tangles up in a wild snag around the top of the hill, like this is some kind of magnetic pole for wind shit.

It's got to be John. Dave doesn't think he can take any more of these climbing Olympics. If this doesn't pan out, he's just gonna sit his ass down and wait for Rose to come and find him, like he should have done in the first place. Half because he's 120% done with life right now, and half because he's completely winded.

Christ on crepes. John must be in the vicinity. Dave's punning again. He staggers up on top of the hill, batting away the next wind that spirals around his head, and sags with such unfathomable relief that professional seafarers could sail around it for a thousand years and never goddamn fathom it. Because John is here. He's just passed the hell out in the middle of a bed carved out of the rock with the wind tousling his cowlick-riddled hair, wearing his dorky ass regular hero costume instead of god tier pajamas and to all appearances oblivious to the fact that while he's been napping, Dave has been suffering.

"Oh thank god," Dave wheezes, nearly bending in half as he grabs his knees to brace himself and catch his breath. Mind-Dave clearly isn't as totally in shape as regular-Dave. "John. John, you stupid dork, get up. We're so out of here."

No response.

No response is not what he wants to hear. He wants to hear a cheery, perky, 'yes sir, Dave sir!' because after all this bullshit he deserves to have something go his way for once. He looks up, frowning exhaustedly at John, who hasn't moved. "John. Up and at 'em!"
John's face doesn't even twitch. Another veil of wind careens past them, but while Dave has to brace himself, John just lies there like a rock, untouched. Even the little breeze messing up his hair tears away and joins the rest of them in working the cloud above into a froth.

"...John?" Dave repeats. He steps toward the bed, all his apprehension coming back in a rush when John doesn't react. "Hey. Kid. Wake the fuck up," he says, uneasy. "I mean it. This stupid bed thing seems like a really shitty place to take a nap. You know. From prior experience."

He takes another step forward.

The wind slams into him from the side, screaming, and Dave falls and skids, scrabbling at the ground for a handhold with increasing desperation as he gets buffeted toward the edge of oblivion. "John, wake up!" he shouts, digging his fingernails into the checkered ground. But it's smooth and the dirt is just a little bit slippery, and he gets absolutely zero traction. "I will be so pissed if I have to climb all that shit again! John! Jonathan goddamn Egbert, you listen to me right now, young man!"

The wind wails. Dave's too busy trying to army crawl forward to realize, at first, that its wailing actually sounds like words.

EB: no!

EB: i'm not listening to anything you say anymore! leave me alone!

His first thought is oh thank god he's awake.

His second thought is John you dick you're awake and there'll be a reckoning for this.

Because oh hell no. "John, I can hear you, dorkwad! Stop dicking around like a - an uberdick and talk to me!" Dave calls hoarsely, jabbing a finger at John that he should probably be using to focus on not falling off the hill.

But it totally works.

EB: wait, dave? is that you?

"Who were you expecting, Santa fucking Christ?" About two seconds after the words fly out of his mouth, Dave realizes who John would assume would be messing around in his head, and feels like the king of all assholes. His toes try to dig into the ground so he can shuffle forward again, but he finds nothing but air. "Don't shove me off this goddamn bedmountain! Cut that out!"

EB: what?

EB: oh, sorry! i didn't realize you were here!

"No shit!"

The wind drops, flowing in restless loops back to the rest of the windstorm outside the general vicinity of John's bed, and Dave hauls himself back onto solid ground, arms shakier than he'd like to admit as he stands up and brushes off the front of his god tier jammies. That done, he folds his arms and doesn't hug himself, frowning at John. "Are you paying attention to anything that's been going on outside because holy fuck, EB, shit's been crazier than a Walmart on Black Friday, and you've kind of been missing in action in your own brain."

To his disappointment, the John curled up on his bed - and it's not even a real bed, which just makes the whole thing worse; it's legitimately just a stone slab painted to look like a bed - doesn't move. His eyes stayed scrunched up tight, his fists pressed to his ears, and when he speaks again, he doesn't open his mouth; the wind just whisper-yells it for him right in Dave's ears.

EB: oh. so you know about my dad and...everything?

"Well, not everything because holy shit has there been a lot you weren't telling us," Dave says, grumpily edging closer to John. "But it apparently wasn't all that hard for Rose to deduce you were fucked up as all hell in here." Then, because he's still not over it - "Also, your dad totally shot me."

That gets a reaction. Thank god. John shifts and stirs on his quest bed, his face contorting in his not-sleep. His enforced shuteye time, maybe.

EB: what?!

Dave nods. "Yeah, and then Kanaya went all 'I have a questionable medical license from the war' on my ass and did field surgery. Never. Again." Dave shifts in place, his stomach sinking a little more as John stays passed the fuck out. He wraps his arms around himself tighter, until he realizes it's kind of definitely turned into this super lame self-hug, and he rips them back down to his sides. "Come on, man, you have to wake up and shit," he says, reluctantly letting a little more urgency creep into his voice. "Your dad's kind of evil and that sucks, yeah, but you can't stay cooped up in here forever.
We've got crime to fight and an apocalypse to stop, remember?"

The wind wraps in visible lines of blue around the four corners of the bed, twining and fretting, and then speeds off again while the clouds overhead clot with lightning that never quite reaches the ground. Dave has no idea what that means. What does that mean. Someone translate. He doesn't speak interpretive wind dance. When John finally does explain, his voice has gone bitter and quiet.

EB: i can't go back.

EB: he made me forget stuff, and sometimes he'd spend hours drilling me in his office and in the basement on ways to hurt you guys if we needed to get away, and afterward i had to pretend to jade i passed out because we were trying to talk about the game!

EB: then if i thought about the truth it would just make my head hurt until i stopped, so i just kept forgetting stuff because it made the pain go away longer.

EB: i don't want to go back if all those orders to hurt people are still there. what if i can't control it?

EB: :(

He can hear frowny faces now, apparently. This whole conversation is making Dave feels ten different kinds of tired. In a really depressing-as-shit sort of way that makes his chest hurt. So they should wrap this up and get back to Rose and Karkat, ASAP. "Yeah, well, too bad. On account of if you aren't in charge of you, some shithead who does like hurting people apparently gets to be in charge of you," he says, scratching at his jaw and feeling fucking ancient. "So nut up, John, because you need to be all kinds of in the right mind if we're gonna get this worm thing out of your head. It won't get better unless you fucking try, dammit."

Which must have somehow been the wrong thing to say, because the wind shrieks at him in full force again, a gale that nearly slaps his mental shades off his face and sets his cape cracking and snapping in the breeze, tight around his throat.

EB: i'm tired of trying! i forgot everything i could and did everything he said and it just made me more miserable! and not doing what he wanted just made everything twice as bad. i've been trying for years, and it never got any better!
Dave feels his sunglasses slide up his forehead again, and he yanks them back down onto his nose, eyes watering as the wind blasts his face. And he lets his mouth run. "Yeah, and I'm so goddamn proud of you for trying anyway," he says, babbling. The last thing he needs is for John to get another depressing word in edgewise, because clearly the kid's been stewing about all this for ages and repeating everything just makes him more upset. "What, since like, you came to see me two years ago? Shit, I can't even imagine having this kind of fuckery going on in my head that long -"

EB: no, longer than that! since rose left! he's been awful since forever, but that's when it all got a million times more terrible and my head wouldn't stop hurting all the time!

EB: running away to you like that just made him mad, and then he took me to a horrible place, and made it all worse...

His heart hurts. It hurts like a motherfucker, clutched tight in a squeezing fist that won't loosen up, and Dave hurts with it because fuck. Fuck everything. He takes another staggering step forward, and the wind wails at him plaintively, without words, which just makes everything hurt more. "That long, huh." He grimaces, trying to find the right words. He's not good at this; it should be Rose here, trying to talk sense into John, or hell, Karkat would be better than Dave at this point. Because John thinks Karkat's the goddamn bee's knees at shooshing and all that calming-down jazz, and who is Dave to argue with John's really bizarre romance choices? "Shit. That's just. Really uncool. Oh my god -" and then he has to snap his mouth shut and clench his jaw against the incoherent noises he wants to make.

He's almost in arm's reach of John, though. If this wind would calm its tits for five seconds, he might be able to drag John off the bed where people tend to bleed out and die. What was this kid thinking, making this particular slice of game shit his secret foxhole? Was some quest death thing really the only place he could think of?

EB: so yeah! i ignored everything that hurt and dumped it where it wouldn't hurt anyone else, but that just looks like it made all the bad stuff stronger. everything's just gone to shit...

EB: i think i'd rather go crazy and stay here than go back.

Dave swallows. Twice. It mostly makes the bile sink back into his stomach so that he doesn't feel like he's about to vomit with every breath. "Pretty sure Typhues, denizen of douchebaggery, won't be down with that," he says, tipping his head back toward Typhues's spirograph. "Apparently you're messing up the wind tunnel between the two of you by hanging around here, whatever that even means. Also, running away never works, dude."

John's hands just mash more firmly down on his ears and his eyes flare blue even through his eyelids. Thank god. He's just sulking, not actually paralyzed.

EB: don't care!

Dave smacks his face. "Yes, you do!" he fires back, trying not to roll his eyes. It's the hardest thing he's ever done to resist the urge, but he does it. "Shit, Egbert, you care more than anyone I know!"

EB: and look what good it's done for me! everyone's hurt or dead and i just make it a bajillion times worse whenever i try to fix it, so i might as well just stop.

Something slams Dave in the chest.

EB: just make

EB: it all
Dave claps his hands over his ears as feedback skates across his eardrums and vibrates through his teeth. The wind that's been talking for John drops, and the air goes dead still, and oooookay that description might be a little too on point for Dave's comfort right now. The feedback keeps climbing in pitch until it's nothing more than a throbbing, piercing whine; when he removes his hands from his ears because they do absolutely nothing to solve the problem, blood is smeared across the heels of his palms. He's distracted enough by the painful sound that he almost doesn't notice how thin the air's getting until he tries to breathe in - and his lungs wheeze, sucking desperately for oxygen that's rapidly dwindling.

[Eye of the Storm] is supposed to deaden your emotions, Dave thinks, struggling to think through the logic of it as he crash lands on his knees. His elbow jars against the cold stone of the bed as he tries to crawl toward John's curled up form. It - it calms shit. Like the weather they've been having these past few days, with the wind unnatural stagnant while huge fricking storms slammed the rest of the state. John's been using it to do shit it's not supposed to, though, so he can forget things and stay the chipper, happy-go-lucky, vaguely paranoid dork that he has always been.

It stops him from dealing with things and moving forward.

It stills breath.

Right now, right this very second -

Well, for one thing, it's stopping Dave, because he's right in the middle of it. Which is probably a bad thing. Yeeeeaaaaah. He should do something about that. Even if his throat feels like it's parched, and his tongue is made of sandpaper, and his vocal cords feel so gritty and dried out that not even the collar can make anything of what he's trying to say.

...Typhesus had better not have been shitting him. Dave pulls out his phone, sucking in whatever he can from the unmoving air, and starts typing. When he's finished, his vision's going kind of splotchy and all manner of messed up, but he thinks he's getting his point across.

TG: john
TG: you can hear this its totally the same as talking in here
TG: i know because a giant monster snake told me so TG: john open your eyes and look at me dumbass
TG: i cant breathe over here you master dick TG: this goes beyond ironic usage of uber
TG: this is the fucking max
TG: MAXIMUM dick
TG: fucking tumescent freudian torpedo
TG: oh god
TG: i think im rambling
TG: this is so not the time forf thata
TG: i canstsd even fuckinfk typp anymoe
TG: ha i am the moe kind it mee
TG: y up that
TG: thats som oxygen depvation there
TG: m turnin into a lalon
Yeah, everything's going -

- really fucking blurry -

Waking up is hard. It's hard and Dave doesn't actually know if you're supposed to fall asleep while you're in someone else's head, to begin with. He's trying to think - something about Inception - but hell, that movie was confusing enough while he was fully awake and in the prime of his fucking youth, he's not even gonna try to hash it out when he's on the brink of unconsciousness and probably like half dead inside.

"Dave, wake up!"

"Nnnnh," he replies. He's not sure he could, even if he tried. He used up all his energy just getting here.

There's something warm pressed against his mouth for moment, and then oxygen trickles into his lungs in a cool draft of air. It's enough to get his thoughts moving again, anyway. "Dave?!" the same person repeats.

"M awake," he mumbles. This is a blatant lie, but his head feels like he swallowed a tank of helium and it's about to pop off his shoulders and achieve liftoff on its own.

It doesn't help when this dude starts shaking him, making his head wobble back and force because his neck muscles seem to have fucked off ahead of schedule. Inconsiderate bastards. "Dave, you can breathe! Wake up! Don't die, please don't die!"

"Not dying. Good," Dave repeats back, blearily, because it seems like the thing to say. Then the person stops shaking him and starts crushing him like a goddamn python or some shit.

This isn't fair. He was told he wasn't supposed to die. He's just trying to follow orders here. "Snek. Snehk no," he says, feebly tugging at the arms wrapped around him.

Someone sniffs in his ear. "What?"

"Snake." Wait. That didn't make sense, did it. "Stop choking me out, goddamn."

"Sorry!" And just like that Dave's head snaps back into focus, and he blinks just in time to catch the tail end of John leaning away from him, looking miserable.

But awake. They're both still sitting - well, Dave's kind of sagging to one side, but he's waking up more now and pulling himself upright - on this dumb death bed, but all that matters is that John's up and his eyes are open, his fingers tangled loosely in his lap as he stares dolefully at Dave with wet eyes and tear streaks all down his face.

Oh hell yes. Mission. Fucking. Accomplished. And Dave didn't even have to die all the way to pull it off. Hell, who needs mind magic, clearly he's already mastered the wizardries here.

Okay. Good. Step two. There's a step two here, right? Yeah. "Okay," Dave says, coughing and shaking his head to shake off the last of the dizziness. "We need to get out of here. We're gonna roll up to your brain and kick ass, alright?"

And John -

Shakes his head.

Shit.

"You can go. I don't even know how you got all the way here in the first place," John says before Dave can whack him upside the head for being a dumb shit. "I'm really sorry about this, by the way. None of you ever needed to deal with my mess." He beams at Dave with all his teeth, brittle and brilliant all at once. "But you don't have to anymore! I'll be fine in here."

And all around them, [Eye of the Storm] wavers in and out of hearing, waiting to settle in again like a keening elegy. Dave can feel it, even without his turntables out. It's not supposed to play forever, but by god, if John wants it enough -

Either John has no idea what he's talking about - or he knows all too well, and Dave can't even contemplate that. He can't. Not if he wants to stave off the hysterical breakdown he can feel waiting for him on the far end of this. His emotional control has always been trash where John's concerned.

Maybe John’s just still not getting it. "Well awesome. Cool. You're fine in here" - it hurts to even say that, Jeeesus - "but do you care that evil John up there already tried to kill Jade?!" Dave says, gesturing useless up in the direction he thinks the real world might be. Which is stupid, because by this point he's pretty sure reality is a pipe dream he's never going to see again. It's just gonna be him and John, motherfucking entrenched in all this awful shit, for however long it takes Rose to come and fish them out. "That should probably bother you. Just a little bit, you know. You don't want to hurt people, but you are."

God, that's a low blow.

"No, I'm not!" John snaps back, and it's the first real anger Dave's seen him show all day. Then he hesitates, his eyes watery and shaky with uncertainty. "...Am I? Is - is Jade alright?"

"Yeah, for now," Dave says, folding his arms. "But none of us are gonna be if you fuck off like this. Not when there's some candy dude running around using your powers to attack people and try to bust out." Even if that evil asshole John gets unplugged when the worm does. Which Dave doubts. Nothing is ever that goddamn easy with them. "Things don't get better if you just check out, bro," he adds, trying for a line of attack that doesn't reek of a guilt trip. John doesn't need Dave getting manipulative, and he's not good at it, anyway. "We know about your dad and shit, so he can't pull this again. You're gonna be okay and we're gonna help, I fucking swear, but you have to be" - alive - "awake to see it."

Talking is hard again.

"I didn't know about that," John says. His face has a sickly sheen to it, and he looks as nauseous as Dave feels as he looks down at his hands in his lap. "I - I knew there was - something, always laughing at me when I pushed stuff down, and whenever I do the windy teleporting thing, but - " He looks up at Dave, genuine confusion in his eyes. "It actually used my powers?"

Progress. Progressssss. Dave nods, aiming for nonchalant. Control, control, and if he can keep John thinking about this and not going to sleep, maybe he can get both of them out of here with a minimum of kicking. "It talked to Jade and everything," he says, tossing out what details he remembers Rose telling him about. "Told her she shouldn't have knocked your dad on his ass, and started pulling all the air out of her lungs. I don't what the hell you've got floating around up there right now, kid, but you need to lay down the law or it's just gonna grow a mind of its own."

Personally, from all of Typhus's muttering, Dave's wondering if evil-John might not already qualify as having a mind of its own. John's so far off in his own little world here, Dave thinks the denizen might actually know more about the state of John's head than John himself. Something with a mind of its own, following all of the Dadbert's fucked up orders and using John's windy thing to pull them off, laughing all the while…

"I -" John's voice cracks. The muscles of his jaw are working, and Dave spies another tear thread its way from the corner of his eye. He doesn't comment on it. "Maybe, if I just keep -"

He glances off to the side, eyes going distant, and [Eye of the Storm] wails loud enough that Dave flinches and lunges forward before he can think it through, grabbing John by the shoulders and shaking him right back. "Cut that out!" he snaps, sharper than he means to, and maybe with the faintest hint of panic underlying his tightly enforced monotone. John stares at him, more startled than he should have been; his eyes are burning neon blue and Dave can't think what'll happen if his wind powers swoop in right now. Dave's throat feels kind of heavy, like he's swallowing around blood. "You're just gonna stay down here in a coma for the rest of forever? Because as awesome as it sounds that you can use this [Eye of the Storm] thing to avoid your problems, apparently it's like putting butter on bacon. 'Fuck yeah' in theory, 'you done fucked up' in practice."

John shakes his head, his shoulders trembling under Dave's hands. He digs his grip in until John sits up straighter, trying to shrug him off. "I - I don't know…"

Just keep talking. "Cause that's kind of the impression I'm getting here, man," Dave says. "Typhuck-ups over there made it pretty clear that you're not supposed to be using it this much." He swallows. Again. Three times. "And - And shit would be pretty goddamn desolate without you, bro. Since you're, you know, kind of a big deal around here."

"Not really." John's lip wobbles, and somehow ends up in a crooked smile that doesn't fit his face. "When you think about it, most of what's happened has been my fault in some way or another. Because I'm so useless and my head's a mess and I couldn't even remember to warn you all about my dad."

"That's not even negative ten percent true -" Dave starts to say.

And then he remembers. Stupid of him not to from the goddamn start, but Dave's not good at this shit at all.

John's probably never believed all their pep talks, his or Karkat's or Rose's, when he's been in the worst throes of his depression. He just buried it deeper so they'd buy it when he said he understood. Whenever his agony flared up, he'd turn to one of the three of them, so that the other two never knew all the times he might have broken down.

Just. He just needs to get John out of here, out of this corner he's backed himself into. If he has to drag the kid back into his head kicking and screaming, he'll fucking well do it, but the important thing here is, he can't push John into stopping everything again. No matter how shitty it feels to let John wander around thinking he's useless, Dave can't do shit about it here and now, where one wrong word could push John over the edge, silently shutting everything down on his way into oblivion.

Out of the wind tunnel. Deal with the nega-John. Get everyone out of John's head in time for dinner before something else can go wrong. And after that, they can worry about actually getting John help for this crap - without Dad Egbert around to undo all their work ten seconds later.

A totally godawful plan occurs to him. Since no one's around to spit out something better, Dave is once again left to his own devices. So he swallows whatever useless thing he's about to say next, and grabs John's hands instead. "We're ditching this shit, my man," he says, totally firm. John blinks at him. "Come on, we've gotta go drag Karkat out of the comic book section of your frontal lobe, or whatever."

"Right. Karkat," John says, closing his eyes and biting his lip. "And Rose. And Jade. And you," he adds, last of all, eyes opening. Tired and sore, but not watery anymore.

"And me," Dave confirms, clamping down on John's hands until his knuckles turn white and his nails dig into the kid's palms. Keep him grounded, keep him here. "Like, do not even sweat this one. Watch, we're going to get out of here and Rose will have probably solved all our problems, like, ten minutes ago. The woman is a psychoanalyzing god."

John laughs.

Relief rolls through Dave like a cool wash of air. "Then you and Karkat can go and, I don't know, splurge on Batman hentai or whatever it is you two do together in your mattress den of iniquity and papping," he adds, rolling his eyes. "Jade'll show up and probably try to watch it with you because she doesn't know any better."

Another irrepressible giggle, and John has to yank a hand free to cover his mouth with it, his shoulders shaking with laughter. "Dave, no."

Ha. Dave yes. "And it'll be fine," he says, with a note of finality. "It's fine if you don't believe me right now, but we're going to make things better. You're never gonna have to deal with this shit alone again."

John rubs at his face with that free hand, the other still clutching Dave's right back. "You promise?" he asks, desperation still underlying the humor in his expression as he hiccups.

"I swear. I swear," Dave says, and then - hell, he can't think of anything to swear by. Nothing that wouldn't be meaningless or bullshit, anyway.

He should have just let it go at that. But he also should have known that the game would never pass up the opportunity to provide the words he can't put together on his own. The phrase just presents itself like a whisper in his mind, not pushing or anything. Just there. Dave's the one who seizes it and runs with it, because it feels right. "I swear to you," he finishes, a song finally clicking into place in his mind with enough weight to counteract John's broken song's warbling. "I swear by my sword."

He's too distracted by John smiling at him genuinely to hear the name that whispers in his head as the fraymotif begins to, quietly and discreetly, tick and tock like a second metronome. Someone else with more experience has to inform him, later on, just what he set into motion at that moment.

[I Pledge Myself To Thee]
Also, in his defense, Rose has the worst goddamn timing. Dave, as the dude of Time, is uniquely qualified to say that Rose's arrival basically tops the list of worst timed entrances in the history of all man and trollkind.

Mostly because she should have been here ten minutes ago, dammit.

"I could make a quip about the remarkably unsubtle phallic nuances of that last part," she drawls out of fucking nowhere, "but I think they should be self-evident by this point."

"Rose!" John exclaims, his face brightening even further.

"Rose," Dave says, wondering just how fast he can sprint from here back to Typhereus's gate, "not fucking everything is about dicks."

"Au contraire, brother dear," Rose says, floating down toward them in a cat's cradle of blue wavy lines. It takes Dave way too long to realize that the winds knotted up and circling around in the sky overhead have started to filter away and flow off in all directions. The lines that unravel from around Rose when she touches down on the checkerboard hill are some kind of visible wind that proceeds to loop around them in darting flicks, investigating Dave's cape with intense interest. "Freud's theories can be as discredited as the scientific community likes - phallic symbols and Freudian slips are forever."

In times of trouble, at least Dave can always remind himself he's not the single most fucked up person in the Strilonde family complex. He'll always have Rose. Even if he's pretty sure that, judging by her smirk, she's just doing this on purpose to mess with him. She wins the snark gambit. For now. And probably for the rest of their lives, if Dave's honest with himself. He can't hope to beat Rose in a snark-off. She's just the goddamn best there is.

"The Breeze informed me that you were here with the right John," she goes on, smooth as anything, while Dave is still too busy facepalming. "It's good that you found each other down here - things have been shifting and altering so much in other areas of John's mind that I'm not surprised we were separated as easily as we were." Her eyes flick from John to something past them - Dave doesn't need to follow her gaze to know the only thing in that direction, aside from a bunch of random hills and trees, is the gateway to Typhereus's mind. "John, how are you?"

Dave winces. John's smile flags, but it doesn't vanish. "I am," he says, shrugging. And if Rose looks confused for a moment, Dave at least has the context to catch onto something quicker than her for possibly the one and only time in his life. "And this is -" he breaks, as the breezy blue filaments finish sniffing around Dave's cape and whip over to flow and prance in front of John in agitated loops.

BE: you are in suuuuuch trouble, mister!

BE: how dare you stick me down in the dark when you needed me out here?!

BE: now all the rest of the wind's gone topsy turvy and the wrong john's got his creepers in it.

"More talking wind," Dave says. There's a tug on his cape, and when he looks down he sees one last blue line stuck around to keep tangling up the hem. "Nothing surprises me anymore."

"You're the Breeze," John says, quiet, and this time Dave catches the capital letter. John's smile completely vanishes; he just looks grave and exhausted. "I think I always tried to forget you could talk."

BE: wow, rude!
BE: you're lucky i still like you better than the other one~~~

BE: and that the sleepy dummy is awake now. right?

A low rumble.

[No.]

BE: oh, okay then.

Rose catches Dave's eye, but he doesn't even need to read her lips to know she's mouthing 'Typhheus?' He inclines his head just a fraction in a nod, and her eyes sharpen as she casts another considering look at the far end of the tunnel. But like hell is she talking them into some kind of field trip into Lala Land to visit the giant snake monster. Are snakes phallic symbols? Dave doesn't even know what to think anymore.

John looks rattled, but Dave's still got one of his hands in a deathgrip, and he squeezes until John gives a little shake and jerks out of it, meeting Dave's eye gratefully before tugging his hand free and turning his attention back to the Breeze. "I'm sorry," he says, with the kind of simple sincerity that gives Dave hives to think about. Never admit to something when you can talk around it, that's his motto. Which is why he'd like to pretend the last fifteen minutes or so were a group hallucination. "I can't promise I won't screw up again. But I guess - I guess I have to keep trying, regardless!"

Dave tries to find anywhere to stare at that isn't John or Rose. He finds a nice cloud overhead shaped like a Ferrari - or no, a tank, that's - yeah, no, that's the Batmobile. Damn John and his subconscious hero brain.

BE: trying is good.

BE: as long as you don't stop and decide to lock me up again!

BE: or next time i won't be so helpful and nice!

BE: right?!

None of them have any idea which of them the wind might be directing that last question to - John looks just as baffled as Rose and Dave. Then -

[I don't care. Leave me out of it.]

BE: right!

Now John is starting to eye Typhheus's door curiously and no. Dave is putting his foot down. "Alright, alright," he says, snapping his fingers until everyone looks at him. Even the Breeze. Which doesn't have eyes. Christ. "Come on. Let's jet. We still have a rogue Karkat to hunt down before we deal with jackass-you, remember?"

"Right!" John says, nodding, and he finally hits that note of energy that Dave's been trying to shove him towards, the depression and apathy and exhaustion easing away as John hits on something that motivates him enough to bust through them. The Breeze reaches out to lift him before Dave's even registered that John's swinging his feet off the bed, the wind lifting him up off the stone in one fluid motion. Dave scrambles to stand as well, his cape swinging the wrong way until he raises an eyebrow and looks down to see that stray line of breeze ducking out of sight and billowing the cape in what it seems to think is a great hiding place. Eh. Whatever. "Where is Karkat?" John asks, and both he and Dave look to Rose at the same time.
Rose bites her lip.

Dave already knows he's not going to like what she says next.

"He's with the other John," she says, like that's not exactly the thing she said to avoid most of all.
"I'm not sure where."

And -

The metronome keeping track of how long they've been in here ticks at Dave, making itself all too painfully known.

Tick, and all the color drains out of John's face.

Oh no.

Tock, and the Breeze reaches out to wrap around Dave and Rose, too, insistent and rising with alarm.

Oh, shit.

Tick, and there's something Dave's forgotten, something so small but so important -

"We need," John says, "to go. Now."

But then they're racing towards the gate back into John's mind proper, and the thought flutters out of Dave's reach.

Tock.

---

Karkat is absolutely fucking useless before he has his morning coffee.

His head has been buzzing all morning, like someone filled his thinkpan with bees instead of brainmeat. He had some fucking unhinged dream last night, but like fuck can he remember what it was all about. He just remembers that it was long, pointless drivel that somehow involved persnickety assholes playing make-believe games for infants and acting like fucking freak-out weasels on methamphetamines. It makes him want to roll his ganderbulbs right out of their sockets just thinking about it.

He figures it's probably just a severe caffeine-deprivation headache, which would be easily remedied if John would hurry and get his ass to school already. With his patience quota for the day busy pole-vaulting its way into the event horizon of a supermassive black hole, Karkat taps his foot in growing exasperation, glancing around the mostly empty hallway. Off-handedly, he wonders where everyone else is - by now, the hallways are usually swarming with sorry motherfuckers and juvenile assholes trying to balance their oh-so-important social lives with the need to elbow their way through the mob to get to class on time. That annoying table those two girls set up for donations has finally been removed, thank fucking god. Karkat can't even remember what they were trying to scam people out of money for, anymore, he just knows they've been clogging up the flow of traffic and generally making his life ten times more hellish than it needs to be for way too fucking long.

Seriously, something about New York? Were they trying to get a bunch of culling-grade imbeciles to fund a trip to New York City for them? Fuck, there are no words even in Karkat's unparalleled vocabulary of obscenities for how little he cares. The only reason his pan won't stop buzzing about it is because John is taking his sweet fucking time getting here. Karkat levels a scowl that could peel paint at the row of lockers across the hall from him, eyes the echoing stairway, and shoves up his sleeve to get a look at the time on his watch.

...Aaand of course, his watch face chooses now of all fucking times to turn fucking demented on him. He must have scratched it up or smashed it in the car on the way to school or something, because he can't make heads or tails of it.

![Image of watch face]

For that matter, was that the design the background has always shown? He could have sworn it was just a plain black watch face with a Batman symbol in the center. Fuck, he can't be assed to care. He hardly wears this thing anyway. The piece of shit is overdue for a slumber party with the rest of the trash in the can, obviously, and he'll just have to rely on his phone.

Before he can grumble and take out his phone - more to try to text this dumbass than to check the time, by this point - a familiar giggle echoes in the empty spaces. Karkat's claws curl up before they reach his pocket so he can fold his arms to glower at the stairs again, just in time for a familiar head of dark hair to bob into view. It doesn't even register as odd when John comes floating down the hall. Why should it? John's always fucking floating. "Hellllooooooo~!" he says, bouncing in wide arcs so that his toes barely skim the floor, his eyes a pale but twinkling blue. "Hello Karkat! Hello hello!"

John has the unique ability to sound like the audible personification of a smiley face. Not some weak fucking :) either. These are XD levels of maniacally chipper. A weaker troll might have caved in the face of such undiluted jollity.

"Fuck you and everything you stand for unless you have coffee on your person, John," Karkat says, squinting at the distinct lack of a thermos in John's hands. He's tempted to ask what the fuck John was thinking when he put his outfit together today, but Karkat has his priorities. Whatever possessed John to wear white pants, a black shirt with a pink smudge in the center, and a pink, long-sleeved flannel, Karkat can wait to hear about them until after he has caffeine flowing through his veins.

John's grin just widens another fraction, and the dumbass presses his hands to his cheeks as he looks Karkat up and down. "I'm so happy you're here!" he exclaims, squirming like a wriggler on a sugar high. "Karkat Karkat Karkat! Hello~!"
"Yeah, yeah, I heard you the first time," Karkat growls, turning back to his locker one last time. He's left it hanging open; most of his pictures and notes tacked to the inside of the metal door have gone missing, but he thinks he recalls taking them down to clear the space for new pictures. The old ones had gone ratty and tattered with age and wear, anyway. There's only one book inside the hollow, and that's a little odder. He could have sworn he kept a few textbooks in here overnight, but it would be so fucking typical for him to have left them at home for some idiotic shitwipe to shred with their big, meaty claws.

Who?

Anyway, at least he won't have to lug all that shit around with him all day. Karkat takes the last book remaining to him and eyes it critically. The cover's faded and smudged, to the point that he can barely read it. But it looks like it's one of those moronic For Assholes series books, anyway, so he doubts it has anything to do with his classes today. God, it couldn't even have been a Harlequin novel?

"Yeah, there's just a wide open slot in my sylladex for that," Karkat mutters, mostly to himself, as he stuffs the book away - where is his backpack? Neither he nor John have any kind of carrying apparatus on their person, which means the chances that John's forgotten his coffee have just skyrocketed into the upper atmosphere. Anyway, Karkat puts the book away wherever books go when you captchalogue them, and feels it lock into place with a tiny thud.

He has more important things to worry about, like rounding on John, who has bounced on his toes all the way into Karkat's personal bubble, grinning like a loon all the while. "Please tell me you have something coffee related," Karkat says, his headache needling him in a concentrated buzz just behind his forehead. "How am I supposed to get through another day of devastating sorry motherfuckers in our lax and underfunded education system without chemical assistance?"

John blinks, and tilts his head to the side. He's still smiling, but with a more speculative glimmer in his eyes, his mouth pursing ever so slightly. "Don't worry, silly!" he says brightly, rolling up onto his toes and veering dangerously close to a collision with Karkat while they're both standing still. "School's already over, remember? That's why we're heading out now."

There is a moment where the world lurches, and Karkat knows in the pit of his stomach that something has dislodged, rotated, and slotted itself in the wrong place, and his mind has to scramble to adjust his weight so that the floor doesn't just drop out from under him like a Jenga tower. A hypnic jerk that almost snaps him out of the place between waking and dreaming. "I - fuck - I don't remember going to class," he tries to explain, the whirring static between his ears rising to a hum. There's something right there, on the tip of his tongue - if he could only put words to it -

"Memory's overrated. And booooring!" John wrinkles up his nose, and then darts in, hooking his arm with Karkat's and dragging the troll back down the hallway. "It's probably nothing to get too worried about though. Maybe it's like the inverse of déjà vu or something. Presque vu~!" John squeezes him around the shoulders, rubbing his cheek against Karkat's. And if that's a little more handsy than Karkat is used to dealing with in public, fuck, it's not like anyone is around to see. No wonder the school is dead, if he's somehow skipped right to the end of the day.

"It's not like anything important happened today, anyway!" John continues, his face still pressed close to Karkat's. He smells off - like he dumped multiple bags of sugar into the tub and bathed in it this morning, almost caustically sweet. There isn't even a hint of chlorine, so he must not have gone to swim practice.

...Piano practice. God, what the fuck is Karkat on today? John doesn't swim, unless you count the way he likes to wade into the lake by their houses and soak his pants through in the name of stupidity. Usually after school he stops by the band hall to practice on the studio piano with a tutor.

And that's why Karkat was waiting for him, despite the fact that school has - presumably - been over for long enough that even the teachers and janitorial staff have cleared right out.

All of this is so much more obvious in hindsight. Maybe he temporarily passed out while leaning against his locker, and that's why he feels like nothing adds up.

Karkat snorts. "You think school is so boring the spongecells in my thinkpan dedicated to today just decided to chug a liter of bleach and commit suicide en masse?"

"It could happen!" John laughs, bumping Karkat with his hip and looping his other arm around Karkat's neck so that walking becomes even more of a fucking trial. "Ahhhh~! I'm just so glad to meet you at last! Best! Day! Ever!"

Karkat rolls his eyes. "I see you every fucking day, you dipshit," he points out.

"It's not the same thing!" John insists, adamant, as they float down the stairs. Karkat gropes for the floor with his feet, but John only sets them down when they reach the first floor, oblivious to Karkat's scowls. "This is such an exciting day! Such a sweet, sweet, sweet day! And you're here, which was a surprise! But a good one! That makes it sweeter! Wheeee~!"

"You're stringing words together, but all I hear is 'hello, Karkat, I've finally gone fucking unhinged, please go on without me,'" Karkat says, shaking his head. John is still doing his best impression of a limpet mine, plastered along his side, so Karkat kind of ends up knocking him into shaking his head, too. John being John, the dumbass just giggles and does it right back with twice the force.

At least the constant contact is slowly but surely wearing away at the buzzing edge of Karkat's headache; even at his most annoying, John is soothing to be around. Probably because his unique brand of moron distracts Karkat from less endearing forms of moron before he can get too worked up about them. "Also, you reek of a cane sugar mill," he adds, sniffing again. "What, did you roll around in a bucket of molasses this morning?"

John pulls his head away from Karkat's cheek to stare at him, smile momentarily traded in for an 'o' of astonishment, his eyes wide as saucers. "Karkat," he says, breathlessly, looking at Karkat like he's the second coming of troll Jesus. "That is such a good idea! You're a genius!"
"No, it's a stupid fucking idea, you sugar glazed fuck," Karkat replies, rolling his eyes again as another wafting wave of saccharine goodness assaults his nostrils. He's seriously considering perforating his snout with a culling fork just to drown out the pure sucrose with a handmade nosebleed. He may never be able to use sugar-related metaphors for moirallegiance ever again because this just isn't worth it. His mouth opens so he can inform John of this unfortunate turn of events, when his wandering eyes spy, just over John's shoulder, a true abomination that proceeds to force itself upon his retinas.

It's in the same spot as that tacky pep rally flier someone posted a while ago. Good riddance, even if this one makes less fucking sense than ever. With the kind of scumlicking shitwipes who populate this school, Karkat wouldn't be surprised if this turned out to be some 'edgy' viral advertising campaign for the latest pathetic attempt at an anime club. The whole thing has that distinct air of weeb. Or maybe irony.

Irony. Why did he think that?

"Sugar glazed," John repeats. His eyes look different when Karkat finally recalls his own wandering ganderbulbs from their attempt to roll their way into the upper atmosphere. The pale blue of John's irises has mostly been swallowed up by the dark of his pupils. "That's a good one~! Ooh, I need to steal it!" John squirms again in delight, rocking back on his heels with his forearms still looped around Karkat's neck, gazing at him with dark-eyed fondness. "You catch on so fast, Karkat! That's why I love you!"

"Yeah, I love you too," Karkat says, the last of his pseudo-coffee-craving induced irritation sloughing away like old skin as he closes his eyes. It feels like it's been an incredibly long day, though he can't remember much because it passed in such a bored blur, but just being around John tends to make things more bearable. Even if he is bouncing up and down like a hopbeast hyped up on stimulants, nudging and jostling Karkat with fluttering fingers on the back of his neck.

He notices when John's hands move to cup his face. But Karkat's slow to react, so his eyes are still closed when John mashes their mouths together. There's too much force; even with his mouth shut there's a jarring, painful clatter, and Karkat's teeth slice up the inside of his lower lip and the side of his tongue before he can prevent it. John huddles up against him, floating up off his toes, and they tilt backwards until Karkat stumbles and slams his elbow and the back of his head against the wall. His ulnar nerve twangs and by this point he's disoriented enough that he finds himself frozen in place, his mind short-circuiting in fits and starts as he stares at John's too-close eyelashes and tries to figure out what the fuck is happening.
The taste of blood is what finally cuts through the buzzing fog in his head, as the cuts in his mouth seep and he swallows a mix of blood and saliva, still too startled to think of healing them the way he usually would. John keeps kissing him and presses closer, warm and humming in a way that would almost lull Karkat back into a sense of pacification if it weren't for the fact that John licks, and Karkat's teeth scrape along the inside of his lip again, and the jolt of pain wakes him right up out of his daze. John's hard to budge when he puts his mind to something, but Karkat gets his claws up and shoves anyway, until John finally seems to get the fucking hint and unwraps himself from where he's plastered himself against Karkat. He blinks at Karkat quizzically, tongue darting out to run over his own lips.

If Karkat thinks about it too much, he can taste the faintest hint of something sickly sweet where his lips press together. "That's enough of that fuckery, I think," Karkat says, licking at a cut instead so that the awareness of his own blood keeps him focused. He feels vaguely out of breath, in a way that makes his stomach turn. "Seriously, what the fuck, John, give a guy some fucking warning before you go off like a rocket propelled lip magnet."

"But you said it was okay. I remember that!" John says, pouting and making a face at Karkat. "You started it! Youuuuu~!"

That's - Karkat almost remembers that - but when the hell did they have that conversation? Where were they, for that matter? The details keep skittering away, back into that buzzing whine he can barely think around.

And his eyes go past John, just over his shoulder, to see that the sign has changed -

Karkat feels his eyes widen a fraction as cool terror trickles through his thinkpan, but he bites down on his tongue, deliberately this time, until blood's all he can taste. "I did say that, didn't I," he says, not entirely sure if his teeth are tinged red or not as he forces himself to look away from the poster and back at - John. "I don't fucking know who took a shit in my thinkpan today. I can't remember half of anything."

John's pout vanishes in a fresh grin, his whole face lighting back up with disquieting speed. How the fuck did Karkat miss that? "Ahahahaha! Silly goose! You should have just said so~!" He moves again, and Karkat almost flinches and elbows John's outstretch hand away before he forces his arms to stay locked to his sides, letting John hook their arms together and start bobbing back down the hallway again, whistling cheerily all the while. "There's no need to worry; everything is just fine and candy!"

"Dandy," Karkat corrects.

John giggles, and shakes a finger at him. "No, candy! Come on, you were doing so good before!" His head comes down to rub against the side of Karkat's again, occasionally brushing against the nub of Karkat's near horn. "Maybe we really should get you some coffee!"

Karkat seizes on that. "Yeah, coffee sounds fucking fantastic right now. We should go do coffee. Right. Fucking. Now."

And halle-fucking-lujah, John nods, a dreamy smile rippling across his face. "Yes! Coffee is soooo great! I'm sure there must be coffee in here somewhere in this dumb place...We can find it while we wait!"

Karkat still can't pin down just why he feels kind of sick. That poster - okay, what the fuck was up with that poster? There's no way some random asshat could have painted over the original words like that and then run off down the hall, not in the short time Karkat had his eyes closed, and definitely not without him hearing it. And okay, so they need to seriously work on John's pale make out technique, because that went past amateur hour and into the realm of the borderline unsalvageable.

But now that the buzzing headache has eased off, replaced by the red sharpness of the blood he keeps flowing from the still-open cuts, he is struck by the sense that something is wrong. Wrong enough to make him want to rip his arm away from John and bolt out the nearest window.

His suspicions that he's somehow managed to strand himself up a shit-filled creek with a leaky fucking raft are only confirmed when he sees the first puddle of oil. Correction: he's looking up at the ceiling, and over the tops of the lockers, trying to figure out if he can vault through one of the thin windows that run along the tops of the walls without literally tearing himself a new one, when he notices one of the ceiling tiles dripping. The panel itself is splotchy and pitch black in some places, soaked through with the weird black oil, and when Karkat follows the fall of a gloopy droplet of this shit, he sees that it's joined a pool just off the center of the hallway, tiny ripples spreading out from the center and lapping at the edges of the puddle with each drop that falls into it with a plink. Karkat can make out the stink of gasoline when he takes a long sniff.

"- and then we can make pancakes! With chocolate syrup and maple syrup and whipped cream and - Oooohhh nooooo~!" John exclaims, in the middle of his chattering about coffee and, from what Karkat can tell, literally every single sugary baked good under the sun. He could have sworn John was big into healthy eating, though. Just another detail that doesn't add up, that sits ill in his stomach and makes him wonder just who the hell he's walking with.

When he chances a quick sideways look at John, wary, he sees that the pink-clad kid has slapped a hand to his cheek again, outright frowning at the puddle of black oil the floor as though it has personally offended his taintchafing majesty. "Not again," he says, with a shake of his head. "Why couldn't that idiot have cleaned up after himself before he ran away? What a loser!"

Karkat can't help himself. "Yeah, because that's the right response to have when our schools starts spewing accelerant out of bugfuck nowhere in a stellar impression of a fire hose," he says, snapping more than he means to. The last thing he wants to do right now is piss off John when he's not entirely sure what's wrong with him.
John clucks his tongue, and a breeze springs up, skulking around their ankles before John whistles it over to the puddle. "Well, he kind of sucks at cleaning, anyway!" he laughs, his unnatural good humor reasserting itself as he watches the wind float around the oil spill. "If he's going to leave it lying around everywhere, I call dibs~!"

"Dibs on what? Arson supplies?"

"Not a bad idea!" And while Karkat is still reeling, trying to yank away from John in disbelief but trapped by the iron grip on his arm, John whistles again, and twirls his finger, and the wind stirs up a cloud of sparkles and rainbows. When it clears, Karkat can only stare at what the oil has become.

Oh god.

What

the

fuck.

"See?" John says, pressing his lips to Karkat's jaw. "All better!" When he pulls away, his eyes linger too long on Karkat's face, and then he starts laughing. "Oh my gosh! You should see your face right now!"

TaB soda isn't pink, it's fucking cola. It's definitely not a pink, syrupy goop with a glossy finish. As John yanks Karkat into motion once more and they sidestep the new puddle of pink liquid, the smell of burnt sugar rises up and stabs its way into Karkat's nasal cavities.

Karkat has no idea how John's wind powers could have pulled off that kind of radical transformation. Something is wrong, something is so wrong, and with each moment that trickles by, his heart sinks to make room for more horror.

This isn't John. Unless John has spontaneously developed magical powers based on soda and sugar and - apparently - a penchant for collecting arson materials with no explanation, there's no fucking way the person hanging off Karkat's arm is John Egbert. The hallways stand eerily empty and the posters hanging on the walls are blank and the lockers are all dyed with a fucking rainbow gradient.

How the fuck did Karkat miss that eyesore? Past him is clearly the dumbest bucket of frothing excrement he's ever had the displeasure to be the future self of.

His anguish bladder starts working overtime to inundate his system with dismay fluid, but Karkat grits his teeth against the shouts bubbling up in his mouth. This is a blatant rip-off of their school, that much is obvious now, but that means Karkat has zero fucking clue what might be waiting for them outside. He could start demanding answers from this strangely altered John, but fuck only knows what he would provoke.

He's starting to wonder if he's having one of those fucked up nightmares again. The ones where everybody dies. But those had all turned out to be about that game -

- that game. How the fucking fuck did he manage to forget that?! And everyone includes Harley and Dave and Rose and - why did he think he was suddenly back at school? How did any of this unhinged rainbow bullshit extravaganza fool him for longer than five seconds?!

Karkat remembers where he is. He's in John's head.

But if the thing walking with him isn't John -

They pass another, smaller splash of black oil. John doesn't even pause before transforming it into a Fruit Roll-Up (Electric Blue Raspberry, by the look of it), humming all the while.

…Fruit Roll-Ups are made by Betty Crocker.

Karkat is royally fucked.

Something does, though, and no amount of flailing or kicking can rip him loose from its stranglehold on his ankle. Instead, the loop hooks around his leg, stretching and twining around the other foot to lock both his legs together, and the winds and clouds rush up to greet him. He sinks through them too fast to fully register the fucking enormous storm as it rumbles past; his face and hands wind up streaked with rainwater anyway, so that when by the time he reaches the ground - too fast, he's moving way too fast - his hair feels like someone dumped a bucket of used toilet water over his head. Then the cloud cover breaks, and he abruptly becomes very aware of the ground mocking him with its supercilious flatness and its inbound trajectory that promises to make a Karkat shitcake out of him.

Naturally, he starts yelling his head off. He manages to drop a few of those choice pearls of invective that Harley was throwing around earlier, god fucking bless her surprisingly imaginative soul. But just when he assumes he's about to leave a bloody smear across the windshield of John's dumb deathtrap of a brain, the wind that's been rushing down alongside him shrieks hysterically, more like a hyena laughing rather than anything sane, and buoys him up so that he wafts gently to a halt.

But his legs are still stuck together. Literally, in this case. He cracks his eyes open and uncurls from his human fetal position, and notices at once that the pink tether has stretched even further, sending tendrils as high as his ribs. When he reaches down, intending to shred the thing with his claws, he gets an unpleasant surprise - this fuckery is sticky, and after two seconds of mentally screaming for hand sanitizer, Karkat realizes what he's stuck in.

"I got you, I got you!" a faint voice sings out. Karkat tries to twist around in place, but there's nothing to see, even when he nearly pulls something in his neck to twist further. He's alone in this fucked up plain of death and misery.

"I got you!" a faint voice sings out. Karkat tries to twist around in place, but there's nothing to see, even when he nearly pulls something in his neck to twist further. He's alone in this fucked up plain of death and misery.

Emphasis on the misery. Objectively, Karkat sees the cracks that run through the dark ground, the huge fucking craters carved out of the earth for the black oil to pool in, but more than that, he can just feel this sourceless ache. It crawls into the marrow of his bones and throttles his bloodpusher, similar to the twinge he feels whenever John's general pitiableness cries out for soothing, but more concentrated. He can barely breathe around it, and his claws spasm as though in desperate want of a cheek to pat.
He's often thought Rose's absence gouged a wound in John's heart, a soft sore riddled with gangrene that never healed over right, no matter how hard Karkat tried to be a balm for it. Well, that was probably because he has clearly underestimated the fucking colossal scope of the problem! John's mind is all one massive gash, bubbling over with whatever the shit this black gunk is. The storm overhead, ominous and barely fucking contained as it is, is somehow the healthiest part of the whole thing, because at least it's not peppered with lesions.

Clearly when they get out of here, Karkat's going to have his work cut out for him. If John's been hiding this veritable shit-canyon of fuckery from him for all these years, they're going to need industrial strength bleach to deal with all the excrement that appears to just now be hitting the fan.

"I got ~ the Karkat ~" that fucking voice sing-songs again, and Karkat twitches, growling as he glances around suspiciously. But the voice seems to be coming out of midair, and he can't pinpoint it. He struggles against the bubblegum with more fervor, his pulse throbbing in his head as the singing continues. "Me, me, mine!"

"I can fucking hear you!" Karkat shouts, and the singing trails off. He digs his claws into the gummy pink rope, but no matter how he tries he can't get a good grip on it. "Put me down, you gum chewing invisible shitsponge!"

When it comes next, the voice is right next to Karkat's ear, and he jerks away from it in shock. "But you are Karkat," it points out. It almost sounds familiar - almost - but it sounds almost two-dimensional in a way that doesn't make any fucking sense. It doesn't sound real. "Riiiiight~~~?"

"Like fuck am I answering that," he says, kicking again. The gum has started migrating again, sending little offshoots up to tug at his elbows, and Karkat looks fucking ridiculous as he holds his arms above his head grimly to prevent them from reaching. By god, if he can't break free from this gummy nightmare, he can at least make it as hard for the bastard as conceivably possible. "Go fuck yourself."

"I think you are!" The voice says, utterly delighted. In a delirious kind of way that makes Karkat wonder how bad it could hurt to just, you know, casually puncture his eardrums with a sickle. "Oh, happy day! You should come visit me instead of that grumpy gills! Yeah!!! The wind can bring you over to my place! We're so doing this. We're making -"

"Don't you fucking dare-"

"- this happen!"

-Karkat doesn't even want to know what kind of shit this fuckbiscuit pulled then. He just remembers his sense of his body vanishing as the wind swallowed him up and started rushing him merrily away, and that was disorienting enough for him to blank most of it out.

Does he even have a body in here? All of this is just John's imagination, isn't it? His mental shitscape or whatever, where all his trauma has apparently decided to set up camp and have a fucking sugar tea party over the wreckage. This crackhappy asshole on happy-go-lucky steroids must have snatched him up, plunked him down in this transparently fake sham of a school, and somehow expected to get away with it without Karkat noticing the difference.

Or maybe he just didn't care.

Karkat's starting to feel woozy again. Wait. Fuck. Is that his mind going again, or is he just nauseous because this is all so fucked up? He can't tell anymore, which just says fucktons about his competency gauge at the moment. He grinds his teeth as hard as he can, chewing neatly through a layer of skin on the inside of his cheek, and once again the taste of blood grounds him. He thinks it's only because he's trained himself his entire life to be as fucking alert as possible in any situation where he might bleed in public and accidentally expose his hemotype; if he hadn't drilled that into his porous excuse for cranial plates, he might not have been able to snap himself out of this daze.

He couldn't even say what this John's been chattering about. It's just. It's fucking nonstop, a stream of inanities and the occasional disturbing non-sequiturs that, after enough time, just starts to sound remarkably like that buzzing from earlier. Karkat tunes in just as they reach a pastel facsimile of the school's front exit, the doors flanked by giant green statues of ice cream cones. The glass of the doors and windows is frosted in such a literal way that Karkat nearly just vomits on principle. It looks like funfetti frosting, complete with star-shaped sprinkles.

If John has seriously developed some kind of sugar complex because his dad was a traitorous fuckwad who wouldn't let him eat sweets, Karkat will just - just - just lie down in a corner and sit there quietly in a puddle of his own tears, because he can't think of a reaction over the top enough to express his utter disbelief.

"It really is so sweet that you came to visit me," the not-John says as he clicks his fingers, and the wind blows the doors open. "So sweet."

"Yeah, totally," Karkat says in a low mutter. He peers around suspiciously as they step outside - And nearly runs right back into the school. The school was a candy coated shithole, but it was still a familiar shithole.

Outside the school, everything is gold. Skyscrapers tower up on either side - which is kind of a huge problem, because Maple Valley doesn't have any fucking skyscrapers. Buildings in the suburbs are lucky to crack four stories, jesus fuck. The unreality of it is nearly enough to give Karkat vertigo.

"Oh my blistering fuck, where are we?" spills out of his mouth without his consent. Karkat winces when not-John just laughs, rolling his eyes that are the wrong shade of blue and elbowing Karkat in the ribs hard enough to hurt.

All he gets by way of reply, though, is, "Isn't it obvious?" Not-John pulls on Karkat's arm impatiently, stamping his foot, and Karkat trips after him as he starts bouncing along a gilded sidewalk.

Sweet festering grub excrement on a stale saltine. Karkat glances around a lot less surreptitiously, and his blood chills when he realizes that yes, actually, he does recognize the streets and towers around them.

He's lived in Seattle his entire fucking life; he'd have to have shit for brains not to recognize downtown.

What throws him, however, is that everything gleams a burnished, brasssy gold. He wonders for a stomach-flipping moment if they're on the Prospit he's seen in his dreams, but the color's off, too harsh and bronze-tinted, like cheap tinsel. They're standing in the middle of Fifth Avenue, near the cross street with Olive Way, and as Karkat orients himself according to his mental map, he realizes that he can hear the faint, crunching rattle of a massive chain shifting somewhere out of sight. When the thin soles of his sneakers scrape across the road, he can feel the slight bumps of uneven cobblestones.
It's like someone flattened a Prospit overlay on top of downtown Seattle and called it post-modern art.

"Isn't it pretty?!" Not-John asks, jostling Karkat with a look of pure childish delight on his face. He surveys the vomit-inducing scene as though it's cheap tinsel Christmas in city form - and like he expects Karkat to like it, too. "It took me a while to build it up all nice and shiny like this without that Debby Downer trying to drag it down in the dumps with all the rest of his trash, but I did it~! And if he did sulk all over it, I just turned it into happy things instead. He barely noticed! So unappreciative..." Luminous eyes zip back to Karkat, and is it just Karkat's imagination, or are this fucker's teeth...sharper? "You appreciate it, riiiight?"

Oh god oh god oh god. He's so fucked. So fucking. "It's...it's really something else," Karkat croaks, his voice barely more than a wheeze with the tightness in his throat. "Very. Shiny." Particularly under the aneurysm-bursting light of the smiley face sun, high above in the rainbow gradient sky.

Good fucking god.

"Yayyyy!" John claps his hands together, laughing it up again, and this time Karkat recognizes that hyena cackling, the same laughter from when the bubblegum grabbed him. God, he really doesn't sound anything like John, how the fuck was Karkat fooled? "Kissing now!"

"Wait, wha-mrffl!" Karkat teeters and nearly falls over backwards as Not-John shoves him again, and then there are arms looping and squeezing around his ribs to hold him upright at an incredibly precarious angle - or just to try to fucking crush his ribcage into kindling, holy fuck. He has to breathe through his nose, close to hyperventilating from shock, because this fucked up John skips right past face mashing straight to tongue, and Karkat has no fucking clue what to do about that. The threat of sharp troll teeth doesn't really seem to register for this stooge's sugar-coated synapses; his tongue wanders right between them, and when Karkat tries to shut his fucking mouth he just seems to take it as encouragement, pulling away only far enough to angle his lips differently and then dive back in. His tongue drags over the open scrape on the side of Karkat's, and Karkat has to breathe through his nose, close to hyperventilating from shock, because this fucked up John skips right past face mashing straight to tongue, and Karkat has no fucking clue what to do about that. The threat of sharp troll teeth doesn't really seem to register for this stooge's sugar-coated synapses; his tongue wanders right between them, and when Karkat tries to shut his fucking mouth he just seems to take it as encouragement, pulling away only far enough to angle his lips differently and then dive back in. His tongue drags over the open scrape on the side of Karkat's, and Karkat is pressed against him so tightly that he can feel the asshole laugh. Another curl and he's found the bloody marks left by Karkat gnawing on the inside of his cheek and starts lapping at the blood, giggling, while completely of its own accord one of his hands stops crushing the air out of Karkat's lungs and migrates down to grab his butt.

Why this.

Karkat only realizes his mind is slipping again when the buzzing rises to an angry throb - more like wasps than bees. His breathing through his nose has gone too shallow, like he's slowly forgetting to keep doing it, and his vision's going blurry. It's too much and it's too close and his mouth is warm and full of sugar that's starting to taste like - that's - that's not sugar, there's this sickly sweetness, like warm rotted fruit, with soft bruised skin and fleshy white maggots curled up in rotten flesh, like spoiled meat -

Oh fuck it.

Karkat pulls his knee back and launches it right into this fucker's crotch. Then, when that doesn't get him more than a faint noise of complaint and hips grinding against his own, Karkat just bites. The blood that bursts out around his teeth as he chomps down on Not-John's tongue fizzes unpleasantly, like the sharp crack of carbonation, and when the asshat finally pulls away Karkat needs a second to remember how to unclamp his jaws from their determined crunch. He does manage it pretty much solely out of a desperate need to spit out the too-sweet blood, and it leaves a pink-and-blue pastel glob on the gold sidewalk when he manages to drool the last of it out, wiping furiously at his chin and lips with the back of his hoodie's sleeve.

"Is biting something we do now, too?" Not-John asks, puzzled, not sounding at all like someone who just had a good-sized troll try to shred his tongue with their teeth. He still has an arm around Karkat holding them together, but the one previously located on Karkat's ass (for whatever reason) has moved to inspect the triangular gouges at the end of Not-John's tongue, his fingernail prodding at the pastel, bloody grooves in the meat of his tongue with an expression of bland curiosity. "You are the Knight of Blood, aren't you? I guess that makes sense!" He nods decisively, as though agreeing on something internally, and grins at Karkat again.

His teeth are definitely sharper.

He's been stalling the inevitable because, as fucked up and bizarrely surreal as this whole thing is, Karkat is still trying to tell himself this is John's mind. The thought of hurting John is completely at odds with everything in Karkat's being.

But this is not John. He can wear John's face all he wants, but Karkat's not fucking buying whatever the fuck he's selling.

He hauls his arm back and punches the scumbag across the jaw. Fighting instincts kick in, and before the imposter can retaliate Karkat seizes the back of his collar with his punching hand to shove him again, snags his wrist with the other hand, and spins away, yanking so that Not-John stumbles after him, off-balance. Karkat grabs his wrist with both hands now and bends to toss the fucker over his hip and drop him where Karkat can smash his face with his heel.

Everything goes fine right up until he tries to roll this twisted John over his hip, because Karkat forgot one key thing. His brain is primed for the shithead to drop to the ground and have the air smacked out of him, so it stutters and bluescreens when Not-John stops midfall, bobbing around with his face tilted back to stare up into Karkat's inquiringly.

Floating.

Fuckfuckfuckfuckfuck -

"That was interesting!" Not-John chirps. Too quickly, his wrist snakes free from Karkat's grip and his hand twists to clamp down on Karkat's forearm, squeezing until the bones creak. His - fuck, his arm shouldn't be able to bend that way - "Like going upside down in a loop on a rollercoaster! You're so much fun, Karkat!" He flops over in midair, rising a little to grin right at Karkat's face as he sits upright on nothing but air. "I have something for you!"

"I don't fucking want it!"
"Yes you do! You said so!" With that stunning display of blithe not-caring, the imposter John pretends to reach behind his back - and pulls out a thermos. "Coffee!"

Karkat stares at it in abject horror. "Like fuck am I drinking that," he says, snarling and trying to tug his arm free. "Holy fuck, where did you even have that-"

"I can make aaanything in here~!" Not-John twists Karkat's arm, and when Karkat yelps and has to twist his whole body to prevent his arm from snapping, he sets the thermos in the palm of Karkat's twitching hand. "Duh! I even made it taste better!"

Karkat is going to take a wild chance and guess that means this thing is loaded with raw sugar. It's probably not even coffee-flavored sugar. Just. Fucking chocolate syrup in a can. Possibly laced with amphetamines jesus christ.

He has to get the fuck out of here. So he bares all his teeth in a grimace - and then forces the corners of his mouth to edge up into a pained grin. "Alright then. Fine. Fucking fine," he says, slowly raising his hand to unscrew the lid of the thermos. And thank fucking god, the imposter reacts just like he wants him to, letting go of Karkat's wrist so Karkat can lift the thermos to his mouth, pillowing his chin on his hands and watching Karkat with manically eager eyes.

They make a very convenient target and Karkat is all about convenience. He splashes the entire thermos of - bright purple death water that is not coffee oh my god - right in this fucker's eyes. Then he bares all his teeth in a grin - just fucking nails the sucker with the empty thermos, because he fucking deserves it.

And while the imposter sputters and blinks, pouting in confusion, Karkat runs. He just picks a direction at random - even if he vaguely recognizes some of the buildings around him, he also picks out unfamiliar spires on the horizon as he scans frantically for a landmark to guide him, which means this bullshit replica of Seattle doesn't even have the fucking decency to be an accurate replica.

"Kaaaaarkat!!! Where are you going?"

"Anywhere that's not here!" he screams back.

Not-John pops out of thin air right in front of him. "Whyyyy~?" he says, as Karkat screeches to a halt. Literally. He can't contain his screech of outrage by this point.

"Fuckshitfuckshitfuck," Karkat starts chanting as he hangs a last minute right, launching himself past the gold-covered rendition of a stoplight and down a street that he - does not recognize.

"Does this mean you just want coffee to play pranks on people? I can get behind that!" Not-John says into his ear, his voice surpassing all previous levels of bloodthirsty delight. Karkat throws a sharp elbow out to the side wildly, but all he gets for his trouble is an elbow-full of giggles and air. "Can we kiss again?"

"OH, HA HA!" Karkat slams on the brakes and whirls around, because clearly running from a douchebag who can teleport is getting him nowhere. And sure enough, the imposter is floating along like he doesn't have a care in the world not two feet behind Karkat, and doesn't even have the basic human decency to hide his smug fucking grin when Karkat wheels to unleash verbal Armageddon on his candy ass. "NO!" he yells. When the fucker goes and opens his mouth, Karkat can only assume there's two options, here: either Not-John is about to spew neon blue vomit everywhere, or he's about to say some shit that'll make Karkat want to punch him in the nose, so Karkat might as well not even wait to hear it. "N. O. SHUT UP AND RESPECT MY BOUNDARIES, NOOKBLISTER! YOU'RE NOT JOHN. I DON'T KNOW WHAT THE FUCK YOU ARE OR WHAT GOD OF RAINBOWS AND BULLSHIT SHAT YOU ONTO THIS BASED EARTH, BUT YOU KNOW WHAT? I THINK I'LL SAVE MYSELF THE TROUBLE OF CARING. GOOD FUCKING BYE."

Not-John has the audacity to pout some more. "Of course I'm John! What are you talking about, silly Karkat?"

Well, since he was stupid enough to ask - "No fuck you," Karkat snarls, jabbing a claw at him. "You're not John, you dented can of flat fucking soda. Go shove a rake down your chute and take your fucking insulin and leave me alone."

"Awwwww~~~" the imposter sighs, shaking his head. "But I aaaam John! You're in my head, Karkat, isn't it obvious it's me?" He sets his feet on the ground, or a few inches off it, leaning back on his heels and sticking his hands in his jacket pockets as he keeps staring.

Too bad. Karkat's already fucking unnerved; having this asshole leer at him some more is just the icing on the diabetes-incarnate cake. "No. You're not him, fuckface, do you think I'm a complete fucking moron?" Karkat snaps, trying not to make it obvious as he glances around to get his bearings again. Off in the distance he can spy a familiar skyscraper, but his sense of direction is utterly fucked - that, or the building has somehow been transposed five blocks to the north of where it is in reality. Either way, he's screwed. "Where the fuck am I?"

The fake John shrugs, smiling at him bemusedly as he drifts nearer, and that's about when Karkat realizes that his teeth are sharp as Karkat's own. Sharper. Sharp enough to make Karkat's thinkpan throb with a low base level of terror. "You're with me, duh!"

Karkat takes a totally voluntary step back. Or five. He doesn't need to draw blood anymore; whatever buzzing mojo attempted to drown out all his completely legitimate concerns and turn him into a gullible little bloodshitting moron back at the school is completely drowned out by his internal screaming. Yes, Karkat is usually screaming internally by default, but his thinkpan is screeching louder than it usually does, soaring to new heights the longer this creepy fucking conversation runs. "You're not John," he repeats. He tucks his shaking hands into fists. "And this isn't fucking joke-around pranktime, shithead, I want answers and I want them ten seconds ago!"

Not-John chortles, rolling his eyes. "It's always prank time! Don't be a downer, Karkat, we were having so much fun before!" He holds out both hands invitingly. "You don't have to leave soooo soon, right? The fun is just getting started!"

Karkat wants to make his internal scream external. But the internal screaming, not usually very coherent at the best of times, has been reduced to wordless gibbering, so he just lets his shoutlung take the wheel. "What, you think you can just kidnap me and try to make me guzzle liquid fucking saccharine, and everything will be fucking peachy? We'll just braid some fucking hypersaturated rainbow friendship bracelets and use them to jump rope into the electric pink sunset?!"

"These are all great ideas! I'm glad you've been putting real thought into this!"

"THOSE ARE ALL SHITTY IDEAS AND I'M LEAVING, YOU WORTHLESS FAKE SACK OF SUGARY BILGE." By the end Karkat is almost out of breath, unconsciously bracing for his ribs to send up one last complaint - and then he remembers this isn't even his real body so fuck that noise, he's in the free and clear and nobody can stop him. He's a yelling machine with no bedtime and enough rage programmed into him to shriek at the endless void of the universe until fate itself blows off its own ears to make it stop.

Unfortunately, before he can capitalize on his newfound ability to impart a gargantuan serving of 'fuck you' to the world, his plans get put on hold. Not-John considers him for a long moment, head cocked to one side. Long enough that Karkat starts to think he's actually succeeded in breaking this nooksniffer with his incredible display of wit and reason in the face of impossible odds, and might not need to follow up with all the violently florid swear words just waiting to be served up on a nutrition plateau.

But then this beautiful daydream is shattered in the worst way possible.

Not-John smiles.

And claps his hands.

Just like that, Heir is floating in front of him, except oh god that's not Heir that is the opposite of Heir.

It's John's face and John's eyes and John's body, and yet everything about him has gone fucking pastel harlequin eyescream. His hair has turned a sandy blond, his cowlicks tossing in a feverish breeze, and his eyes have gone an even paler blue with pink threading through the iris in tiny cracks. He's in Heir's uniform but it looks like someone took a bucket of pale pink paint to it; coral spots pattern his pink jacket, his pants have brilliant pink-and-blue swirling up them like a barber's pole, and his boots, gloves, and all the belts and buckles of his uniform are a pastel shade of baby blue in diamond patterns. When he raises a hand to press to his mouth, laughing harder than ever at the expression on Karkat's face, Karkat can make out sparkling, bright green nail polish adorning each nail but the ring finger, which is watermelon pink.

And with his mask tugged down around his neck, Karkat is still being treated to that absolutely terrifying, toothy grin. Not even the constant giggling and the buckteeth can rescue that smile. "What the fuck," he breathes, not really a question, just a statement of utter disbelief, "Oh fucking - what the fucking fuck-"

"That was getting boring anyway!" Not-Heir laughs, running his fingers through his hair. "I'd hate to ever be boring! Boring is lame, like John is lame!"

Oh god. Karkat is such a fucking idiot. He's completely shit the cocoon here, and now he has to wallow in it like the pathetic herdbeast he is, trampling around in circles into an eternity of smelly stupidity. This thing radiates a surreal kind of horror; worse, even though Karkat would have said the overpowering smell of burning sugar was as bad as it could get, he's now more aware of the faint undertone of rot, thick and sweet and growing stronger all the while.

There has to be some way to abscond. He has to get out of here. Because this thing is terrifying.

"What are you?" he says, fighting to ignore the aftershocks of static stinging his shoulders in the shape of fingers. "I think I of all people would know if John had some vile pink chutestain fluttering around in his numb skull."
"Oh my god, Joooon," the Trickster drawls, rolling his eyes.

Said eyes literally roll. Right out of his sockets. They pop right back in again after a moment of grotesque bobbling in midair, but that's not enough to obliterate the horrific image that just painted itself across the backs of Karkat's eyelids to haunt his nightmares forever.

While he's busy trying not to projectile vomit all over the golden cobblestones of the street, the Trickster starts drifting around him in lazy circles, toes barely tapping against the ground. "Talk about a total stick in the mud!" he says, snapping the band of the goggles hanging around his neck. "He doesn't know anything about aaaaanything! At least I'm self-aware! I'm embarrassed to think I used to be him! Ever since I went solo, things have been sooo much more fun!"

Oh god. Yeah, he threw up in his mouth a little. Gagging, Karkat shakes himself and tracks the Trickster with his eyes, not daring to let him out of his sight for more than a moment. Not even that. "Wow. Fascinating," he says, swallowing frantically because if he lets up he's going to puke instead of yell. "Well, that was a nice talk. I'm just going to duck out before my innate reservoir of deeply offensive grumpiness ruins your bright fucking sunshiny day. I'm doing you a favor, here."

Fuck. Please let that convince this fucker Karkat's not worth the effort. Otherwise, how the fucking hell is Karkat supposed to escape this shithole with some kind of trashbag, insane Heir floating around with his teleportation powers intact. Karkat's never had any illusions that in a straight fight, Heir could totally kick Hemogoblin's ass all over the Seattle skyline, and the thought of an Heir who thinks collecting arson materials is a good way to pass the time -

He thinks it's safe to say that Heir's moral code does not apply here. The inverse, actually.

Rose said that there would be real fucked up shit in here because of the mindgrub having a field day brainwashing John. This is not the form Karkat expected it to take - but at the same time, why is he surprised? He saw the look on John's face when he started choking out Harley for no fucking reason. He just didn't comprehend at the time that it wasn't John looking out -

It was this thing.

"But why? You'll be so much happier here, I promise," the Trickster says, batting his eyelashes. "Even if you went looking for that useless guy, you wouldn't find him; he totally went AWOL and left me in charge! Me, me, me! I'm the one who's the strongest now - just look at how I caught you!"

He laughs again, his grin peeled back to expose all of his teeth. "Trust me, I'm a bazillion times more fun than anything else that could have snatched you up! I like kisses and I can get you presents and stuff until it's time to go!"

Do not ask where. Do not fucking engage. Except - "What, there's other shit in here like you?" Karkat says, horrified. He's been wondering where the sweet fuck Rose and Dave might have ended up, those assholes, but if something worse grabbed them, he feels guilty for cussing them out internally. Kind of. Not really. But he won't chew them out in person later, alright, because he's not fucking unreasonable.

"Mmmmmmm," the Trickster hums, floating around Karkat with his head bobbing, eyes never leaving Karkat's, smile never fading. "The other guys in here? Preeetty lame! Not as lame as John, but so annoying!"

Lame could mean literally anything. "What other guys? What the fuck are you talking about?"

"You reeeally want to know?" Trickster John's eyes bug out in their sockets - past the point they normally should have, so wide and bulging that Karkat's stomach turns because he's completely convinced for a horrid moment that they're going to pop like grapes in a microwave. "Wow! There's all kinds of messed up things in here! All that stuff he never bothered to get rid of - he just tossed it into the back. Like a garbage dump!" Another laugh, harsh and derisive. "The house can have silly Rose, if she's dumb enough to go looking for it. Maybe it'll get the tentacles' attention, and they'll come play, which would be more exciting than anything that lives there now!" A dismissive flip of a hand, and the Trickster's feet roll up so that he hangs upside down in the air, shrugging as he walks around Karkat again. "There's another dude, but he's always sleeping. Not fun at all! He's pretty ginormous, though, so he could probably eat people if he put his mind to it. So who even cares what Dave does - he can't save anyone, least of all himself!"

And that just kind of solidifies it for Karkat, really. Because John would never say those kinds of things; he's physically incapable of thinking of something so callously, openhandedly cruel as that. John would probably believe Dave if that dick told him the moon was made of the curdled milk of irony, hung in the sky by Ambrose Strider himself, and if this imposter thinks he can convince Karkat John would ever call Rose dumb, he has another thing coming. "What the actual fuck," Karkat says hotly, his claws curling into fists. Then he realizes what this asshole said about Rose and tentacles and oh fuck - "And wait, are you fucking telling me there are Horrorterrors in here? Is that seriously the reason John's pan is so cracked?"

"Not real ones," the Trickster sighs wistfully. Like that's actually a disappointment. "Just squishy stuff they left over in our memories, the last time they were here." Then he perks up, his smile secretive and pleased. "But memories have a lot of power, you know! Those guys like eating sanity, and they carved out some nice real estate back there! And then John found it and started shoving things into the backroom, because why not? It was empty storage space!"

This is some cryptic fucking mind fuddlery, and Karkat gets the feeling he only understands a tiny fraction of the implications of this. All he wants to do is defer to Rose and get the hell out of here because sweet almighty fuck, John's worse than any of them thought.

The Trickster's not finished, though. Karkat wonders how long he's been waiting for audience. He seems like the kind of heinously overdramatic shithead who would hate to be ignored. "And then, all that despair and sickness and crazy, all piled up in one place" - a contented sigh - "it was like a candy store. The acid had melted all the foundations, so that all that junk rotted and went sickly sweet. Some of it's still oily and gross, but some of it...helped make me!" He beams.

"And you follow orders from Father Fuckface," Karkat says, feeling kind of like he needs to sit down. Seriously. His ass is probably still planted on the ground in the real world, but his mental self is fucking exhausted and he hasn't even been doing anything.

Another flippant wave of a hand. "Mostly. I used to do it a lot more, but now - well, I listen mostly only when it's interesting, these days. At least it's usually waaaay more interesting than what John wants to do! And Dad can't tell the difference!" Then the Trickster adds, in a loud whisper, "You shouldn't call him that kind of name, though. I like you a lot, but his name is Dad! I'm giving you a second chance because you swear all the time so you don't know any better~!"

"You're insane."

"Yeeees!" the Trickster says. Happily. He actually says it like it's the best news in the world. "Thank you for saying so!" His pupils look like black nickels as he waxes rhapsodic about his personal crazy. "Why be sane? John's always getting so worked up about it, but why bother? If he's stuck on some mopey train of thought, rattling down the rails to where the screaming's unbearable, there's always madness! It's the emergency exit! It's - me!" A blissed out sigh. "And I can do whateeeever I want!"
Well doesn't that just fondle major seedflap for everyone. Karkat wonders what the gibbering fuck Samuel Egbert was thinking, assuming he could control whatever he stirred up in John's head. Maybe, maybe the Trickster would go along with whatever sick purpose the Midnight Crew wanted to brainwash John for - or maybe it would just blow everyone up so he could cackle at the chunky salsa and make s'mores over the roasted bodies.

The White Queen said Breath players were hard to brainwash. Yeah, well, no fucking shit; no matter how these mindgrubs work in theory, of course it all went topsy-turvy in practice. Dumbshit Dad probably tried to program John to be evil, and this fucker took that order and fucking ran with it clear into the next fucking state.

"Now, I have an idea! Since you want to run around and stuff!" the Trickster says, flipping right-side up and scooting closer to Karkat. Karkat backtracks and nearly keels over backwards by tripping on the raised stone of the curb. "Shall we play a game?"

"No, see, I'm pretty sure whatever you're about to suggest is about to go over like a heavily pregnant human pole vaulter," Karkat says, shaking his head. "That is to say, it's fucking not and every doctor in the nation is shocked and appalled at your audacious stupidity."

"We should play a game~" the Trickster says rapturously. "They'll run out of medication soon, and then we can go outside and have fun! But for now...let's play hide and seek! I'll even give you three minutes' head start, since you're a little slow."

...Okay, so this fucker knows about the sedative shortage.

Fuck, Harley had better be on top of her shit today. Like, she needs to be in prime fucking form. If she gets the medication here on time, Karkat will personally prostrate himself at her feet and beg forgiveness for every completely true but usually assholish thing he's ever thought about her.

But for right now -

Three minutes. It has to be enough time for him to run like hell for wherever this city ends. It can't go on forever, and this might be his only shot at reaching Rose and Dave so they can find him and help. Because he has no fucking clue what to do about this Trickster thing.

"Deal," Karkat says. And he spins on his heel and runs.

"Hurray! A game, a game!" the Trickster squeals behind him as he peels away down the street. "A game with Karkat!"

As Karkat seizes a streetlight pole and uses it to round wildly onto another unfamiliar side street, he can hear the cheerful sound of a countdown echoing in sing-song off the buildings around them.

- Karkat stands corrected.

This city goes on for fucking ever.

He loses track of the countdown almost as soon as he's out of earshot of the Trickster, and he regrets that to no end when he realizes, with a sinking bloodpusher, that he's going to need to actually hide. The streets around him remains stubbornly empty, occasionally curving off onto turrets and parapets that are recognizably alien and not any part of Seattle Karkat knows. There are no people, no animals, no cars, no bicycles - there are trees, but they're all giant lollipops wrapped in golden foil with ribbons tied around them, wedged between the stones of the sidewalk at weird angles.
If the smiley face sun in the sky follows the same path as the real sun, he should have hit Pier 59 and Elliott Bay by now. He's not sure why he picked that direction, except he thought maybe the city would end at the waterline - or hell, if the bay was full of water and not maple syrup, he might have been able to swim for it. But the skyscrapers continue on overhead, more than Seattle has ever had, and the streets are dry as bone. Those three minutes must be almost up; Karkat is going to have to pick a building at random and hope for the best.

Fuck. He did not crawl out of the 'coon this morning to play stupid wriggler games with the mental manifestation of all his moirail's brainwashed crazy. One day he's going to learn better and just give consciousness the middle finger when it comes knocking in the morning. Swearing to himself, Karkat races up to the nearest door, and almost sobs when it opens without giving him a hard time. He ducks inside and pulls the door shut behind him, glancing wildly around at the room around him. It's a wide open lobby without much by way of cover - but on the other claw, it's not painted with tinsel. It just looks like a regular old lobby, and Karkat is so fucking alright with this turn of events. His footsteps reverberate as he makes tracks for the next nearest door, set in the wall behind a semi-circular front desk.

He makes it halfway there before the wind picks up.

Indoors.

And he realizes just how he's been set up to fail.

"Ready or not," the wind shrieks in his ears, "Here I come!" The next second, all the wind whooshes out to make room for the Trickster as he teleports in, and Karkat's garbled scream gets cut off as a John-class object tackles him from behind and sends them skidding across the marble tile. "Gotcha!"

At least the fall isn't that hard, Karkat thinks, as he does his best to try to wriggle his way out of the arms wrapped around his waist. When you're being chased by a fucking maniac on a sugar high through the town, it's the little things. Really. But he still managed to jar his chin against the floor and send a canine ripping right into his upper lip, so now he's basically drooling blood all over the tile. Concentrating hard enough to call the blood back and seal it takes up precious time. "You fucking cheated," he says around his swollen lip, reaching to try to shove himself free. "Ugh! Get off me, douchebag!"

"But I caught you!" A puff of air against the back of Karkat's neck, and then the Trickster nuzzles the side of his head, laughing. "What an awful hiding place, Karkat! But it was still a good game!"

"This physical altercation is getting really fucking uncomfortable and it's starting to piss me off now!" Karkat says, spitting all over the floor by accident in his hissing rage.

"But cuddles!" the Trickster protests, flopping down on top of him with hundreds of pounds of dead weight and temporarily knocking the breath right out of him.

Karkat has a response to that. It runs something along the lines of 'I'd rather jump barefoot off a fifty foot cliff into boiling hot water and get served up alongside my useless crab lusus at a five star restaurant in Vegas,' but he bites through his own lip to swallow it down. "You didn't win," he says, instead, with grim resignation.

The Trickster goes still. "Huuuuuh?"

Please work. "Best two out of three. And!" he says quickly, before the Trickster can jump in. "It has to be a real fucking challenge. What's so hard about this if you just use the wind to find me every time? That's too easy and you know it." Inspiration strikes. "It's boring as fuck, you ingrate."
"Gasp! Oh noooo, you're right!" the Trickster exclaims, reeling back. Karkat shoves himself up on his elbows immediately, meaning to take advantage of the moment to elbow his way free, but the fake John pulls him up by his collar until they're both upright; Karkat's too busy flailing to appreciate it. "It can't be boring! That would be terrible!" He sounds almost frantic, but there's still that note of glee in his voice that refuses to fade. Like nothing Karkat says or does could faze him for more than a second.

"Five minutes head start, so you have to try harder," Karkat says, injecting as much of a challenge into the sentence as he can. He tries to pull away from the grip tight on his collar, but the hand there just twists until the neck of his hoodie pulls painfully tight across the front of his throat, and he has to freeze. "Well?"

"Hahaha! I'm still gonna find you, don't worry!" the Trickster says. He wheels Karkat around to grin at him and wink. "But I accept your terms!"

Karkat shouldn't be fooled into thinking it can really be that simple, yet he is. He nods in a jerk and tries to walk away, but the Trickster pulls him back in close and kisses him again before he can so much as demand to know why. Two quick, fluttering pecks that barely graze his lips, so delicate he's almost bamboozled into thinking it's still pale - and then an open-mouth press that forces his head back, the Trickster's free hand raking through Karkat's hair and dragging across the skin at the base of his horns, hard enough that Karkat can feel tiny lines of blood oozing across his scalp. He still doesn't get it until the fake John drags Karkat in even closer and sighs into his mouth with breath that tastes like burnt sugar again - and then, inexplicably, grinds his leg between Karkat's with a whine.

Oh no.

"Mine~" the Trickster hums against Karkat's mouth. The hand on Karkat's shirt collar drops long enough for the troll to yank back in reflexive horror, but it just moves to cup the curve of his waist and haul him in close again. "My Karkat," he says, even as his fingernails dig in too deeply, sharp as claws.

OH NO.

Okay, so apparently, the inverse of John is horny as fucking hell. Horny enough to vacillate on Karkat, straight into the depths of the concupiscent quadrants without passing Go or collecting two hundred boonbucks. Karkat can't even tell if this is flushed or pitch or some mangled human combination of the two.

All he knows is it's making him feel ill to have someone who even vaguely resembles his moirail in the fakest, most superficial way grind up on him. "Stop that!" he says, hoarse, feeling his stomach lurch and threaten to eject everything he has in his mind-stomach up out his chute. He brings an elbow up and jams it into the Trickster's side, but the fucker has wound them too close together for Karkat to hit at the right angle to do real damage.

The Trickster bites Karkat's lip, and unlike this asshole, Karkat doesn't just laugh that kind of fuckery off. It fucking hurts, needle-sharp teeth digging in and drawing blood, and Karkat lets out a strangled yelp as he reaches up to pry the Trickster off - by gouging out his amazing floating eyeballs, if need be. Karkat rakes his claws down across the Trickster's face, cotton-candy colored blood oozing out in the corners of his vision, but the asshole Heir only pulls away a second later, apparently oblivious to the scratch that cuts deep enough into his eyelid that it would scar anyone who wasn't insanity personified. "Five minutes head start," he agrees again, grinning maliciously as he covers his eyes with his hands. "Unless I get bored!"

...Fuck.
Karkat cups his hand over his slowly scabbing lip and runs like hell, shoving his way out the doors of the lobby with his shoulder and stumbling out into the street again. Fuck fuck fuck. He spins around, wondering if he should devote the time to vomiting just to make the nausea stop, and feels the first seizing spasm of a dry heave strain his throat.

It wasn't John. It wasn't. It's whatever fucked up shit Samuel tried to turn him into. And Karkat can't let this hold him up when he's got five minutes - less than that, probably - to try to find an exit again. He steps backward and has to spin again regardless, dazedly staring up at the buildings around him for some kind of landmark he can work with. But everything's kind of blurry and oh fuck he might be crying a little. He's frustrated and increasingly terrified and alone and the closest thing to his moirail is a douchebag jerkface and he wants John back.

He cannot freak out now. Can. Not. Karkat drags a claw across the scabs that have finished coagulating in his lip and swallows hard, closing his eyes to make them clear, just for a second -

When he hears the faintest, grinding clink.

Karkat's eyes wrench open and he stares up at the sky again.

He can't see it. Not with all these tall buildings in the way. But there has to be a golden fire escape replica around here somewhere - or fuck, Hemogoblin's mastered more ways of scaling a building than Karkat can count.

Because if this is some traumatic mashup of Prospit and Seattle, he can only think of one thing that could make that kind of sound.

- The universe, for once, is in the mood for being pleasant and agreeable. At least as regards to Karkat's wild, blatantly unsupported guesses. This day may well go down in infamy - the one time Karkat got something ridiculous right. If he's not careful, this sweet, sweet vindication might cause his stunted, previously conjectured but never confirmed to exist self-esteem to swell to heretofore unimaginable corpulence. His ego will block out the fucking smiley face sun and he won't even care.

He clambers on the roof of a skyscraper after putting a few blocks of buffer between him and the Trickster. And what greets him, rattling up in the too-clear sky, is an enormous orange-gold chain. Karkat thinks that its anchor point isn't even all that far from his current perch - it's just that the chain rises up at an odd angle, pointing not straight up or towards the sun, but off to the north, before spiraling off in lazy loops that vanish into the sky. If there's a moon attached to the end of it, Karkat can't make it out, for some fucking reason. But that's not his concern.

It's a landmark. And it's better than running around on the ground like a dumb squeakbeast waiting for the Trickster to catch up to him, or hiding in a random building where Rose might not be able to see him. Get up high enough, and he might have longer than these five minutes to hide - the Trickster will be too busy hunting through the city itself to look up.

Hopefully. If he underestimates Karkat. And if Karkat gets high enough that the Trickster doesn't just spy him in the first ten seconds. There are a lot of ifs. In fact, Karkat is about seventy nine percent sure that this is an idea that could win national awards for its unique new interpretation of stupidity.

But hell, if he loses this round before Rose shows up, maybe he can talk the Trickster into switching places so that that asshole's the one hiding instead. When Karkat magically fails to ever find him, ever, maybe this fucker will take a massive fucking hint and fuck off back to playing Candy Land alone.
And even better still, this entire city is made up of skyscrapers - however, from what he can see, the vast majority of them are equally tall - the tallest buildings stand out like sore claws, and here and there Prospitian spires and arches jut out from the rest of the pack, but in general the brassy gold skyline is way more level that Karkat usually has to deal with. He can probably just run across the rooftops all the way to the chain, barring any unforeseen pitfalls. There's an advantage to the fact that this place is mostly a duplicate of Seattle only on the sketchiest level - Seattle has a fucking lot of areas where the roofs give way to parks and strip malls.

This time, as he runs, he keeps time by spitting it out in between breaths. One minute gone to his daze on the streets, another lost to climbing up to roof level.

He's not going to make it in three minutes. Please, please let that asshole search the ground first.

The first jump takes him almost by surprise, if only because it's been ages since he actually ran around the rooftops in real life - not since Diamonds Droog beat the everliving fuck out of him, maybe. He's either been in too much pain or stuck out in the science boonies or fighting on the ground rather than going on patrol. But either he's fully healed or his mental version of himself decided that even the last faint pangs of soreness from his ribs weren't worth copying and pasting. He jumps the gap in one smooth leap, braced for a jab of pain on impact - and feels nothing, tumbling and rolling back up onto his feet to start running again without a pause. Then he reaches the raised lip of the end of this roof, and repeats the same stunt, and slowly he has to admit to himself that, at least in John's head, he's almost fully recovered. In fact, fuck that 'almost' noise, he's back in business, here, and no one's going to tell him otherwise when they get out of this place.

This is almost enough to distract him from the fact that three minutes tick by with disheartening speed, before he's even three quarters of the way to the orange-gold chain. Karkat has to detour around a gap that - ha - doesn't manage to fool him, because he sees it coming before he can throw himself to his mental doom and sidetracks around to the roof adjacent. When he glances down, he sees, to his horror, a bubbling pit of that black oil from before has taken up the entire square of ground where the missing skyscraper should be.

He starts watching where he lands and rolls more carefully. The last thing he wants is to slip in that shit if it turns up on one of the rooftops. He doesn't really want to touch it at all. He just focuses on screaming mentally for the Trickster to stay on the ground, stay down. The fake Heir hasn't shown up yet, and Karkat can't feel the winds shifting around him at all to announce the end of the countdown, so he can only suppose that, for the moment, the Trickster is following his rules.

But only for so long as it's still fun. And Karkat suspects the Trickster doesn't have all that long of an attention span when he doesn't have someone else to pay attention to him.

Karkat is so surprised when he actually reaches the chain that he nearly does tumble off a building. Of course. Naturally. Because he wouldn't be Karkat if he didn't almost kill himself by sheer fucking accident at least once a day. There's another gap, and Karkat has to brake so hard he falls backwards, skidding hard in the bronze gravel that layers the rooftop and ripping right through the fabric of his hoodie to scrape his elbow when he uses it to hold his torso upright. He leaves a trail of blood all along the last foot or so, but he can't be assed to call it back into his body - he just seals the shallow wound with what's leftover and tries not to think about how he's leaving an incriminating blood trail on a rooftop - again. Pulling himself up on the raised edge of the roof, Karkat glowers out over the end of the roof, at the gap between him and the enormous orange-gold chunk of metal where the chain hooks to the ground.
Unfortunately, he has also vastly underestimated how huge this chain is. He remembers seeing it in his dreams, but only ever in blood-drenched, moon-exploding passing, and it's - fucking gigantic. Even if the moon's nowhere in sight, no matter how he strains his eyes staring at the harsh glow of the sky, he can't see it from here, so he'd have nowhere to go even if he did somehow scale the outside of it.

Also, climbing is so fucking overrated. There has to be another way to get Rose's attention. Where is that woman? Even with Dave no doubt being the asshole to end all assholes, surely they should have stumbled across a golden city in the middle of all John's blasted, wounded mind. This place has to be lit up like a fucking neon sign. Unless they decided to go look for the real John first, in which case they can accept his sincere approval of their choices but also die in a fire.

"Kaaaaaaaaarkaaaaaat~! Where arrrre you?"

Karkat almost screams. Almost. The voice rings over the city, low and echoing, but - it's not coming from right behind him. He checks, glancing around wildly, but there's no sign of the Trickster yet. No wind shear, either, which is probably a better indication of just how fucked he really is at any given moment.

Either way, there's no doubt that the Trickster's on the move - and from the sounds of it, already impatient enough to start losing interest in winning the game fair and square.

Karkat heaves himself over the ledge of the building and starts inching his way down, using window sills as handholds to drop feet at a time in a haste he normally wouldn't pull off for fear of missing a grip and breaking his leg on the pavement. When he reaches the ground after a nine foot drop that nearly jars him enough to panic about his ankle, he sprints for the huge chunk of orange metal in the middle of the intersection of two streets.
Grooves in the surface of the base let him grapple his way up to the top. But even though it's not that far a climb, Karkat's still sweating by the time he reaches the flat surface where the chain welds to the base; it's more out of anxiety and terror that the Trickster will spy him from the streets while Karkat's back is turned than due to physical exertion, but he's still fucking fed up about it by the time he's able to spot check and make sure he's still alone.

...Well, from what he can tell, the sky is still clear, and there's no sign of a pink and blue nightmare bobbing at the entrance of one of the streets that merge here, so he might still be alright. For now. Which gives him some free time to, you know, ponder the weather, fondly regard the new scab along the knob of his elbow, and oh yeah, wonder just what the fuck he's going to do now. It's just him and this giant nubfucking chain with links the side of houses and all of Karkat's extensive resume of terrible ideas gone by, haunting him like the Ghost of Christmas Go-fuck-yourself.

What a time to be alive.

Just when Karkat begins to think he's going to have to sit there and contemplate the knotted hell of stupidity he's doomed himself to for always and eternity, he realizes he and the giant nubfucking chain and his newly updated resume of terrible ideas are not actually the only things on this stupid block of metal.

There is...a fourth thing. He's not entirely sure what to call it, because it doesn't look like more than a raised hunk of more orange metal. It's not until he squats down beside it and prods the outer rim of it that he realizes it is carved of stone. There's a bizarre symbol on the top that's so close to familiar he can almost taste it. Or maybe that's still the lingering taste of sugar and blood and decay.

Why does he feel like he's supposed to step on it. This is a trap, isn't it. Karkat can very clearly picture himself, in his mind's eye, stepping onto this piece of shit triangle matrix abomination and somehow being launched into the upper stratosphere like the world's most gullible jack in the box. It's the kind of blatantly obvious setup for a prank he'd expect to find in this nutjob's section of John's mind.

…Wait. He does remember this fucking thing. He remembers seeing it in Rose's house, on the game monitors. Doctor Lalonde had them all installed in that ludicrous mansion in another life, but according to Harley, they don't work in void fields, so the Lalondes must not have been concerned about warding themselves in that weird, surreal other universe with no trolls and dying thirteen year olds. It's a transportalizer.

Which just makes it even more suspicious, really. Karkat sighs through his nose, folding his arms and glaring at the platform.

Oh god. He's going to step on it, isn't he.

"Karkat! Have you been bleeding?" a voice sings out from very close by.

Karkat doesn't even look back - not enough time. Seized by panic, he steps onto the platform and hopes to fucking god it doesn't kill him.

-

[Wind skims the voids keeping neighbors apart, as if grazing the hollow of a cut reed, or say, a plundered mailbox. A familiar note is produced. It's the one Desolation plays to keep its instrument in tune -]

Karkat can hear the annoying monologue. He just can't tell where the fuck it's coming from, or why it keeps repeating the same sentences over and over again. It sounds like it's being played on a very badly damaged record, skipping and crunching and returning to the first line again and again as he charges up the stairs.

The transportalizer did, in fact, launch him into the upper stratosphere, and Karkat will never disbelieve his instincts ever again. Whenever he passes a window or an area where the wall has been blown up, he can see nothing outside but thick, hazy rainbow sky.

Prospit-Seattle does have a moon in John's mind, as it so happens, but the flossy rainbow clouds outside wrap around it thick as wool. Karkat can see why it wouldn't have been visible from the ground.

"I know you're up here!"

"Faaaaaaahck," Karkat hisses, and he scrambles off the stairs at the next landing, narrowly dodging a pitfall where the floor crumbles away into nothingness.

The problem with the moon is that the moon is still, for the most part, a complete trash heap. Someone must have reeled all the shattered pieces of it together from John's memories of when it got blown to kingdom come, but they didn't glue them back into place. Everything's just sort of...hovering there, in generally the right location, but with huge gouges and thin but deep cracks where the dull, brassly gold doesn't quite form a seam.

And also, the Trickster caught onto Karkat's abscond right off the fucking bat. So now he's being chased around this warren of fallen stairs and empty spires by a complete raving lunatic.

[Desolation plays -]
He realizes he's managed to run himself into a dead end when he comes to an antechamber with the ceiling open to the sky. He rips all six of the doors that lead off the hall open, but each opens up onto a tiny square room with no further doors, all packed with rubble or broken furniture. More than a few earlier turnoffs were full of this junk, too, but now Karkat casts a panicked look over his shoulder - wheezes - and runs around again, closing all the doors as quietly and sneakily as he can before flinging himself through the last one and hauling it shut behind him.

"Shhhhhhh!" he says, before the fact that he just tried to hush a disembodied record player hits him like a week old jug of grubsauce. He takes stock of his options, bloodpusher working overtime so that adrenaline keeps pumping through his veins and wards off the wooziness of what might be shock.

Finally, all he can do is creep around the pile of tarnished bricks and chains that form a lopsided pile, taking up most of the left half of the room, and huddle in the corner behind the rubble. There's a crack in the wall, but Karkat couldn't fit a hand through it, much less his entire body - and, no, yeah, when he presses his face to it, all he can see is the antechamber, so it would just take him right back to where he started.

God, he can't believe he's been reduced to going along with this incredibly fucked up game. There has to be a way out of here -

- or a way to signal Rose.

Or John.

When is John in all this? The Trickster said he went AWOL, which Karkat doesn't doubt - he wouldn't hang around with this asshole, either, and he can't imagine John was in any state of mind to stick around in the wastelands, either. Where could he have gone in his own head? There doesn't seem to be a limit on how much space the Trickster can imagine up for his tinsel town, so if Rose is trying to find John first instead of Karkat, fuck only knows how much ground she's having to cover.

He's going to be trapped in the rainbow candy asscrack of John's mind forever. God fucking dammit. This isn't how Karkat wanted to go.

"What was that? Oh. Youuuu. What is it, Dad?"

Karkat nearly cracks his head open on a slab of rock as he whips around, staring in horror at the crack in the wall behind him. He's ducked out of sight, but he can hear the Trickster loud and clear through the gap.

Wait, fuck. Is he talking to - Karkat eases up onto his knees and squints through the slit in the wall. He can just barely make out the dull orange-gold of the antechamber... but nothing that isn't in a direct line of sight. The Trickster must still be by the entrance, off to the side.

But Dad -

There is no other voice but the Trickster sighs gustily like he just heard something he didn't like. "Really? And without even going a liiiittle bit grimdark? How dumb!"
Another long pause, like there's another half of the conversation that Karkat is definitely not hearing. Or maybe the Trickster's just trying to lull him into a false sense of security by pretending to be even crazier than he already is. Yeah. Somehow that makes more sense than it doesn't.

"She WHAT?!"

Karkat rips back away from the crack in the wall and lands hard on his hands, crawling backwards at the sudden, ugly roar that sets his eardrums ringing. He stares at the thin opening in utter horror because that roar?

That was the Trickster.

And he sounded enraged. Fuck, he barely sounded human.

"How dare it. HOW DARE IT?! It's mine now! My Breeze!" the Trickster says, insistent, his sing-song marred by the occasional snarling break. "Mine! It's not allowed to go off and help other people!"

When the next silence stretches on and on, and the only thing Karkat hears is the thumping of his own pusher spasming in his rib cage, he hesitates - and creeps back to the opening in the wall, as slow and silent as he can. Stealth. He can do stealth. On a good night, he is a fucking god of stealth.

He peeks out into the room beyond.

But what he notices first isn't that the room beyond has tarnished further still, the walls encrusted a dull and mouldering brown. No, what hits him first is the rank smell of decay. It's tinged with blood, but Karkat can't sense any open wounds out there, nothing fresh.

A loud crash and Karkat nearly jumps out of his skin. "Not here~" comes the sickly sweet hum - and then a BOOM! This time, even closer than the first. "Not here either!"

And Karkat's skin crawls.

Because the Trickster's blowing open the doors open by one. But Karkat's no longer so blithe about his chances of convincing the evil piece of shit out there to play another round. Not after that abrupt outburst of rage. Another door blows open and Karkat flinches despite himself.

Then the Trickster steps into view, directly across the hall, in front of the door of the room opposite.

He has his back turned, but the change is still evident. Like one last layer of saccharine camouflage peeled away like dead skin, and left behind - this. The Trickster's replica of Heir's costume looks ragged at the edges, and the hood has grown longer, trailing behind him and dragging on the floor. Karkat blinks, and the costume is soaked in that thick pink syrup - blinks again, and it's that disgusting black oil from earlier, smeared all over the uniform's jacket in wide streaks.

A thunderous, hollow thud, and that door bursts inward. "Nothing again!" the Trickster says, a faint gurgle in his simpering voice.

And he turns to face Karkat's door.
The entire front of his uniform is caked to the neck in dried blood. Karkat's just grateful he can't see its eyes from this angle; he doesn't want to see what they look like now that the candy coating's fallen away.

Karkat's dead. He's so fucking dead. For a moment he can feel unconsciousness rolling in a dull white roar over him, sucking him down into a pit where at least he won't have to look at that - that thing anymore. But he wrenches himself away from the precipice at the last moment, because if he faints now he doesn't know what he'll wake up to.

"You know, I was thiiiinking~~~" the Trickster drawls, way too close for comfort. Karkat clamps his hand over his mouth to stifle his breathing, holding it for as long as he dares while the wind susurrates just outside his hiding place.

[without a course -]

"I was just gonna keep you in here for a little while, until you were happy, too! And then you could go back to your own mind, and we could be happy in real life! And everything would be awesome. But now," it adds, sighing. "I think...maaaaybe...you can just stay in here with me! That way we'll never be apart!"

Oh fucking Christ, just when Karkat thinks the situation can't get any more fucking disturbing.

"Karkat…"

A moment of utter silence. Karkat's nerves shriek at him, but there's nothing he can do. He's crawled back from the opening again, but not seeing it anymore can't erase that blood-drenched uniform from his memory. He clamps one hand around the wrist of the other, claws trembling a little as he digs them into his skin to steady himself.

"You know I can feel you breathing, right?" the Trickster whispers in Karkat's ear.

Karkat's eardrums pop in sharp, bloody bursts.

The rest of the room explodes outward.

[away, afar -]

Rock creaks, and shifts, and subsides with a sigh.

Karkat, hand still clamped around his wrist, opens one eye, half expecting the Trickster to be standing right there, leering at him.

But all that he sees in front of his nose is the new, shattered edge of the floor where it crumbles away into the air below. He's huddled on a tiny splint of rock - and he can feel the wind plucking at the back of his hoodie, so rolling over would be the terrible idea to end all terrible ideas. That last boom seems to have taken most of the rest of the room right along with the door.

On the plus side, that awful droning voiceover seems to have shut the fuck up out of respect for Karkat's new resignation to his own doom.

"Would you like," an equally awful voice asks, cheerfully, "to play again?"

"Karkat is not here right now. Please leave a message after the censorship beep. You fucking monster," Karkat replies tiredly, closing his eye again. Not worth it.

"Awwww! Are you mad because I caught you?" The Trickster must be putting in effort again, because Karkat barely smells the rot at all as it leans forward in a cloud of sugar and artificial additives, close enough to boop a finger against his nose. "Silly, sulky Karkat."

Eyes closed. Don't think about it. Don't even fucking contemplate the fact that this thing floating next to him could probably pop his lungs like it popped the entire fucking room.

Just. Focus.

That becomes fractionally harder as the Trickster buries its face in his hair, nosing at his ear. And then licking it. Eurgh. "Yes. You should stay here!" it decides, nodding against the curve of his horn. It presses down on him, too heavy a weight for someone who can fly, and Karkat can feel claustrophobia eating away at his sanity. "You're much safer without a body. In here, I can always put you back together if you get hurt!"

Through gritted teeth pressed together so tightly he can hear a faint whine in his aching ears - "Joy to the fucking world."

"Ahahaha, I'm glad you agree!" This time, it licks a trail down the side of his neck. "There's no need to be scared, Karkat! Because I'm just so happy you're here!"

Do not fuck this up.

"You are really either that fucking moronic," Karkat says, opening both his eyes, "or you're just that fucking crazy, and either way you should have still known fucking better."

The Trickster blinks at him. There are new upside down triangles beneath its wide, pale eyes that weren't there before, but Karkat doesn't even have the concentration to spare on wondering where they came from. "What do you mean?" it asks, pouting.

"I don't play stupid fucking games for wrigglers fresh out of the Mother Grubs' slurry-filled pusbubbles." Karkat reaches out and seizes the front of the Trickster's collar, glaring at it with every ounce of fury he can dredge up from the very bottom of his soul. And that's a lot of fucking anger. "Fuckwad. I could fucking melt this entire shithole of a city to the ground just with the pent up fury I've stored up from you running around daring to wear John's face, you vile, sociopathic nimrod."

He sucks in another breath. "You're not him. You're just a nightmare. So congratulations. I'm here to wreck your shit."

Sickles are not a good stabbing weapon. Knives, however, are.

Karkat takes a leaf from both books and stabs the Trickster in the stomach, while his sickle finishes wrapping around the back of his wrist to hook around its throat and slice it open.

All that comes out is more pink ooze. Not a surprise. The Trickster doesn't even really look too bothered by it. "Allrighty then!" it says, rolling its eyes.

Karkat lets the sickle and knife turn back into his own liquid blood, and they splatter all down the front of the Trickster's jacket.

He smiles, and brings his foot up to plant it in the middle of the Trickster's chest. "Bye bye, shittmaggot."

He kicks out and shoves the Trickster away from his spindly rock plinth, closes his fist so that the blood splashed across the Trickster's front digs into its body as spikes, and then thinks, shoving both his hands flat against the ground - DOWN.

The Trickster's shirt goes first, and then the rest of his torso follows; he yelps in surprise as the spikes of blood yank him down along with them, dropping down into the thick, candy floss clouds.

Red fog swarms Karkat's vision instantly, and the sheer effort blinds him for a moment. He keels over, elbow grinding into a sharp splinter of stone, but manages to keep himself on the rock. He almost thinks, over the throbbing pulse of what is probably actually a legitimate fucking aneurysm squeezing his brain into mush from overstretching what his power can do, that he hears a tiny voice.

[no. bind and link and call together. not apart. like to like. blood to blood.]

"Fucking go," he orders, closing one hand into a fist and digging his knuckles into the golden stone. He just wants to drag this asshole down as far as he can. He's never tested how far he can send blood away from the rest of him, but by fucking god, there has to be a loophole here he can exploit. He wants to drop the Trickster facefirst back down to ground level.

But fuck, that might be too fucking far. It already feels like his head's about to explode, and the Trickster's barely gone anywhere, just barely out of sight. The wind's screaming, too, streaming down and splitting the clouds in clear funnels as though to reach down and haul the Trickster back up.

All he can do is hold it. His head screams at him and his bloodpusher seems to be having trouble finding anything to push, but he's not bleeding anymore. It's just the phantom sensation of pushing those spikes of blood further and further away, when all his body wants is for him to call them back and draw the wounds closed.

[limitlimitlimitlimitlimit]

Oh, that is such fucking bullshit. Karkat almost passes out from the powerful urge to pull a Trickster and roll his eyes out of his sockets on account of how much fucking bullshit that is.

Just. Hold it.

He knows for a fact that he loses time right then. Every minute seems to take its sweet time in passing, stretching out into hours that aren't really hours, he thinks, just his thinkpan's way of informing him that he's getting fucked over for like the fifth time today and that's all there really is to say on the matter.

But every minute he's stroking out is another minute he's not having to deal with that Trickster asshole, so good times. Good times.

"Karkat?!"

And now he's hallucinating. This is exactly what Karkat has always wanted. To literally melt his own brain and go out in a fucking head-exploding bloodorgy, complete with the delusion that he can hear familiar assholes yelling at him in his dying moments oh wait.

"Busy dying in agony over here," he yells back. He thinks. Hard to tell. He could just be thinking it. What is the measure of a mental shout when basically everything is purely mental, anyway?

"Don't be ridiculous, you're not dying," a voice that sounds bizarrely like Rose says, admonishing him. "Probably. What on Earth have you done to yourself?"
"Have some respect for my ability to know that I am actually having an actual aneurysm for the first time in my life," Karkat says, groaning at another twitch of agony. "This is a momentous occasion, now fuck off."

"It's not an aneurysm, most likely - John, calm down, he's just overreached himself -"

Karkat does not remember lying down, but someone hauls him upright and - yeah, that's a NO from him, that's not on the agenda today. He starts kicking and flailing but he's still mostly lost in a fog of red and can't aim for shit. "Stop distracting me, you insensitive fucks!" His one palm is still pressed to the rock, but his concentration keeps spinning out in wild bursts, so that one moment he's thinking downdowndown without fully remembering why he needs to, and the next he can't even manage that much.

Fuck. That's a problem.

Arms are wrapped around him from behind, and someone is prodding at his nose and temples, and finally Karkat just cracks his eyes open because not even writhing in a puddle of his own suffering juices can vindicate putting up with someone manhandling his person. He takes a snap at the fingers with his teeth, but Rose just calmly moves her fingers out of the danger zone and flicks him on the forehead.

Rose.

"You fucking useless shitheads found me," Karkat says. This is the biggest surprise he's had all day. Really. Not even Dadbert going evil could beat this. He never has this kind of luck.

"I only apologize for it taking as long as it did. We all got rather held up for a while there." Rose inspects his face, and then nods. Karkat has no fucking clue why she's nodding.

The arms wrapped around him squeeze, and the person behind him sobs, silently, but with Karkat leaning on them he feels it anyway. "I'm so sorry," they say and oh. Oh. That's John. Karkat tenses for a moment - and then feels all the stress rush out of him. He sags backward, raising a hand to pat at the back of John's arm. John smells like a windstorm, which doesn't completely make sense and might just be his imagination, but also doesn't smell like a sugary rotten monster, and that's really all Karkat needs at this point. They've found John. John is safe. Their situation has downgraded from a category five clusterfuck to maybe a category two. Tops.

Dave has to ruin the moment. Karkat can't even be bothered to look around and see where that asshole is; he's just as annoying out of sight as he is if Karkat subjected his eyes to that human mess. "Karkat. Don't pass out. Dude. Is there a dude?"

Karkat lets his head fall back, lolling onto John's chest and feeling exhaustion fall over him like a blanket. If John's here, he can relax a little, but that also means all the adrenaline that's been fueling him starts to seep away. "Oh my fuck, yes, there is a 'duuuuude,' Dave. Now shut up, I'm convalescing and you're a douchebag."

Then he opens his eyes and realizes what he just said.

"Oh fuck."

"Where'd the dude go?" Dave asks, insistent, and Karkat - really can't blame him.

Karkat pulls his hand off the stone and stares at it. He doesn't remember his blood powers cutting off. Maybe he lost too much of his concentration when these three arrived, maybe it finally dropped out of his powers' range, maybe Rose did something while she was poking him -
Either way, he's lost all sense of the blood he used to drag the Trickster down through the clouds.

And the wind is far too still.

"I dropped it," Karkat says, his voice sounding oddly distant to his own ears as he gingerly peers over the edge of the floor. There's nothing. Just the pale, misty clouds, and the drifting fragments of the moon, and a whole fuck lot of nothing Trickster-shaped. "But also, it can fly."

"It?"

Karkat starts scanning the skies around them in a growing panic. He kind of wants to pass out, but the adrenaline's pumping back into his system, and the combination is making him feel vaguely nauseous. But like hell can he fall asleep now. "Fuck. It's still here. It's got to be. That fucker."

"The wrong John," Rose says, but she's got no idea. None. The thing lurking around, no doubt watching them, doesn't get to be called 'John.' It just fucking well doesn't.

Karkat's thinkpan tries to slog through the growing difficulty involved in trying to string words together. John hugs him tightly, shivering, and Karkat musters up the wherewithal to at least spit out the name.

"The Trickster."

---

John is tired.

He's been tired for a while, actually. Sometimes he doesn't even remember what it's like to feel all the way awake. His brain has been humming along for years, trying to balance all the stuff going on in his head, but now he's lost the hang of it and everything's kiiinda gone to shit. He just doesn't have the energy to piece it all back together again the way it used to be; Dave seems pretty sure that using his old tricks would be a dumb idea, and John is, paradoxically, too tired to argue with him about it.

In a way, John kind of owes it to his handler that he's even up and moving at all. It's what he's supposed to do when he gets overwhelmed - he stays calm. He deals with things quietly. He pretends everything is normal.

And sometimes that doesn't work! He's not really all that good at it, actually. It's not perfect, by any means, and right now Rose is throwing him studying looks that tell him he's not fooling her. Not even a teeny tiny bit. But in John's defense he's kind of had a lot on his mind! All this stuff overpowers his better judgment and he ends up panicking and sweating through his bed sheets in the night, kicking them off and determinedly not looking out the window at the wind waiting in the morning sky to snatch him up and away from the claustrophobic mess of his life.

He could just step outside, and all this lying to himself would stop. He can't really think what's stopped him from just flying away all these years, other than force of habit - and the knowledge that for any plan he might come up with to escape, his handler probably has twenty different backup plans designed to track him down and reel him back in.

Easier to let all those orders - to keep his identity a secret, to fly beneath the radar at school, to clamp down and stifle his powers unless absolutely necessary for his hero work - be just another part of his personality, with all the extra fuss and fine print swept away to the back of his mind where he doesn't have to think about them all the darn time. If he doesn't think about why he's ignoring the Breeze's whispers of alarm, it can't hurt him.
Remembering the game didn't help things. So he tossed all \textit{that} junk to the back of his mind, too. In fact, that was one of the first things to go, so early on in John's life that he can't remember when he tucked it away. No need to deal with the pain or the trauma or the heartbeat. His handler even approved of \textit{that} trick, because after that John stopped acting out so much as a kid. He was an awful toddler, always swooping up into the sky and listening to the Breeze's suggestions because he remembered a time when it saved him; after he made himself forget, and stopped remembering all the worst parts where everybody died a lot, he turned out a lot more obedient, actually. They set up his hero identity so he'd have an outlet for the bad times when he couldn't restrain his powers anymore, and settled into routine.

It's an almost seamless system where John can nod along to his handler's lectures, sweep everything back into the part of his mind he's set up to store it and handle it all, and then go about his daily life with his conscious mind completely clear of anything that might trip him up or break him into pieces. The back of his mind takes the brunt of the agony of betraying his dearest friends, but everyone else stays happy! As long as he and his handler stay undercover, John only has to worry about dragging all that hidden shit out to smear across the front of his mind when it's time for a lecture or a report in the study room.

And maybe he still aches inside, a slow-growing, apathetic sadness where he's kind of resigned to being the most useless, awful person on the face of the planet, desperate and fretting and never able \textit{to do} anything about it, but orders keep him grounded. Orders keep him from just bringing the house down on his and his handler's head in the night. He's trapped and it's a nightmare and there's something in his head, something that reinforces the orders and the training with thick coating of slime that sucks him back down into the muck when he starts to fight too hard to be free again. No matter how nervous and terrified he is of approaching his handler after a failure or a fleeting moment of disobedience, no matter how much he wants to fly away to Rose or Dave or Jade and never go back to \textit{that house} again, he always comes crawling back. Smiling. Cheerful. And ready to leave the office and go to school and not let himself hug Karkat for \textit{too} long, though all he wants to do is collapse and never wake up again.

Rose probably could have warned him about the hazards of letting all those bad things compost in the back of his head like manure - yet, how could she have warned him anything at all when John's never told her the full scope of it? If he weren't such a useless, stupid dumb \textit{bluh} incarnate, he could have just ignored all his handler's shitty orders and \textit{told her the truth} while they were still kids, before he got this worm thing in his head and everything became ten times harder as it crunched him into pieces.

No, he had to bide his time and save the last of his will power for just this occasion. His handler's exit strategies usually involve a lot of casualties - casualties that make John scream and scream in the back of his head, slowly losing what's left of his mind as he nods along with plans that include killing people - killing his \textit{friends} - and thinking that he only gets one shot at preventing it. He assumes that if he just shuts everything down, if he cranks up \textit{[Eye of the Storm]} as loud as it can go, then he can shut down enough of his emotions and thoughts that his body won't have enough input to keep moving. A coma is better than hurting everyone he loves, right?

But now there's something \textit{else} in here. Something John \textit{didn't} know about. It leaves a rotting taste on his tongue, like he ate a heck of a lot of Halloween candy and then forgot to brush his teeth for \textit{years}.

And its laughter is so, so familiar.
He underestimated his own madness.

His madness apparently didn't like being underestimated.

"Get them out. Get them out right now, Rose," John says, swaying a little as he floats to his feet. "All of you should go, like, right now."

He needs them out of here. John doesn't know what this Trickster thing is or how it turned up without his noticing, but he knows that the sooner Karkat is back in his own head, the less John will have to worry about him. Rose and Dave don't look nearly so run down, but Dave can't fly on his own so what happens if Rose gets hurt or the Breeze gets distracted, and John doesn't want Rose hurt either and they all need to get to Jade, to somewhere safe - somewhere that isn't his messed up head. John can barely survive in here; there's no way he wants his best friends getting caught up in whatever goes wrong next.

(where he can't hurt them anymore)

And something will go wrong. Seriously, none of their plans ever work out right. Maybe if you'd asked him ten minutes ago what could go wrong, John would have been able to tell you kiiiind of how this would all inevitably get messed up; and then he'd heard the news that there was a second John running around, which kind of put a new spin on things! There's even a whooole new section of his mind, apparently, one that the Breeze led them to by diving down and around what John would have thought was the very back edge of his mind, only to find this place spread out along the outermost reach of his mind, a glittering golden spot surrounded by oceans of oily muck and clouded with a haze of flossy clouds.

While his mind's been messed up and storming above, this thing's been making itself comfy. Just. Wow. So many new possibilities. All of which fall under the category of 'how this could go wrong like it's going out of style.'

So many.

"Like fuck are we going anywhere without you, you sad fuck of a noodlebrain," Karkat snaps, reaching and digging his claws into John's forearm. "This thing is a fucking lunatic."

But, see, here's the thing! Karkat doesn't seem to notice that his ears are oozing red blood, or at least, he's not making any effort to heal them. Karkat, the blood guy! He glares at the sky around them with a familiar anger that shows no signs of dying down any time soon, but he's also pale, his mouth a bruised, sore red splotch on his face.

Whatever this creepy thing calling itself the Trickster is, it's - it's done something. It's spooked the heck out of Karkat, that's for sure! And if John can't bear to think about other things it could have done right now - well, to be honest, there's a bunch of things he can't bear to think about right now! He could write up a list, but that would involve thinking about all those things, which would defeat the point of very determinedly not doing that.

John shakes his head, and knows just how badly he's doing when the world keeps shifting and spinning after he's stopped moving. Closing his eyes for a moment to try to stop the vertigo just makes the back of his eyelids pulse woozily, and he is seized by the certainty that if he opens them again, something will pop up behind Karkat and grab them both.

He opens his eyes, and all around them, this weird, stapled together version of Prospit's moon glints like dulled bronze, the cracks where the blown-up pieces don't quite meet wide and gaping. It killed Jade, is all his mind can whimper, which, considering this isn't even the real moon, is about as dumb as it gets. "You're not safe here," he says, wrapping his hand around Karkat's claws and squeezing, trying to make his eyes stop rolling and smearing the moon across his field of vision like running wax. "What if it blows up again?"

"I personally vote that we all move our asses in a generally upward direction and peace right the hell out of here," Dave says, smacking Rose's arm until, with a roll of her eyes, she turns him around in midair so he can keep watch. "Including John. Then we can crack open a cold bottle of AJ and wait for all this shit to blow over."

"I second the motion involving the ascension of our derrières. I couldn't have come up with a better plan myself. Well done, Dave," Rose says. "Come on, you two. With Dave and I here, John should have more than enough power to retake control of his conscious mind, at least." She catches John's eye, and there's as much relief in her eyes now as there was back on that windy hill where she and Dave found him. "We're stronger together. I know you can do this, John."

Oh, wow. Oh man. John closes his eyes, and he's not sure if it's because he's dizzy again or because if he starts crying now he's not gonna stop.

Or maybe just on account of, he doesn't know how to break it to Rose that he doesn't have anywhere near the confidence she seems to have in this plan. It's not her fault that John's spent a lifetime hiding how weak he is from her.

"Well, look who decided to wake up! Back to being as boring as usual, you useless dumbo? Or are you just falling asleep standing up?"

John's eyes open.

And what now floats in the air between him and Karkat and the two others is both nothing and everything like what he expected to see when Dave and Rose informed him that there was an evil version of himself running amok in his head while he tried to sleep it all away. He can't look at the harlequin patterns and spirals for too long before his head begins to ache, and he tears his gaze away from the grotesque, gaudy parody of his hero costume.

It has his face. He knows without even needing to look. Maybe it even looks more like him than John does, at the moment; the thought seizes him and he coughs out a bitter laugh at the thought that at least this thing can smile, blithe and carefree and whirling like a dervish in the air as it spins to survey all four of them.

"Oh man. That's fucked up. That's seriously fucked up," Dave is saying; he really means it, too, his mask broken so that his eyebrows climb up under his bangs and the corner of his mouth pulls back in a silent 'eurgh.'

"I told you," Karkat points out, shifting in place. John puts out a hand to steady Karkat, but then he realizes that Karkat's angled himself so that he's between John and the Trickster, shoulders hunched and head low as though he's ready to launch himself into a strife at any moment.

Too slow, John's too slow on the uptake, and if this comes to a fight he's pretty sure he's gonna be about as useful as a set of headphones with only one earbud working. He needs to - he needs to do - something - he needs to get them all someplace safe, before -

"Stronger together, huh?" The Trickster smiles. "Ohhhh, I get it! You think you guys can beat me if you work together and stuff, huh? How lame~!" Then its smile widens, and it claps its hands together. "Well, I guess now I know how to beat you, bozos!"

Without warning, the Trickster vanishes in a gust of wind. "Fuck!" Karkat spits, whirling around in a circle. "Where'd the shitmuffin fuck off to now?!"

John looks around too, mostly because Karkat's doing it - his head still feels like a slug in slow motion, churning along five seconds behind everyone else. "I don't know," he starts to say, turning back to Karkat just as the troll finishes a circuit and grimaces back at him.

The moment Karkat faces John, a disembodied hand waves at John over the troll's shoulder. The Trickster finishes swiping into view, right behind Karkat, and John's still frozen in shock as it flashes him a crazed smile and whirs to hug Karkat around the waist. "Sorry, Karkat," it says, yanking the troll right off the slab of rock. "Just in case, you need to go for now! But I'll see you in a little while, outside! We can play some more then!"

Karkat lets out a genuine skree of fury, raucous enough to put John in mind of Crabdad, and shoves his head back, slamming the back of his skull into the Trickster's nose. Goopy pink blood drizzles out and webs through Karkat's hair, but the Trickster doesn't even seem mad as it crushes Karkat in a hug. "Byeeeee!" it says, tossing Karkat away with a merry chuckle.

The sky in this upside down place has been soft and misty; the wind, for the most part, has shifted in slow, drifting patterns. John, too preoccupied with just getting here as fast as he could, hadn't really been able to spare a thought for it.

Now he wishes he had. He feels the flossy winds jolt - and then roar, clenched in a fist that feels totally foreign to John's sense of the wind. Before Karkat can fall - before John himself can even reach out to catch him, or try to exert his own control over the breezes - the winds scream and catch the troll up, yanking him away from the rest of the group with a jerk and into the pale white cotton of the distant sky. "Fuck you!" is the last thing John hears before, with a wrench, he suddenly knows Karkat's gone.

It feels a little like having an organ ripped out of his stomach. Like a kidney or something. Maybe two kidneys. And, you know, his entire circulatory system, heart and all.

"Out, out, out~! Bye, everybody! I'll see you all soon, don't you worry!" the Trickster chants, a twisty blur of blue and salmon pink that makes John's eyes water. It dashes over to Dave next, spinning him away from Rose's side before either of them can react. "Think like a bouncy ball, Dave!"

John doesn't recall Dave having a sword out when he first showed up, but now a broken half-length of jagged metal slices out, aiming for the hands that have gleefully latched onto his other arm. But the winds roar, out of control again, and the Trickster casually tosses Dave into the air, whirling him away into the pastel sky and laughing as it cranes its neck back to observe its handy work.

John reaches out without thinking. Not like he had a lot of thinky thoughts to really spare in the first place, but this time he's even more stupidly mindless than usual as he tries to yank the winds back down, and Dave along with them. Maybe he panics a little, maybe he panics a lot, because not Dave too Dave promised, but with everything else that's gone so horribly wrong, John doesn't think he could calm himself down enough to think things through if he tried.

So when the wind doesn't respond to his frantic mental yell, John feels like he's been dumped head first into ice cold pool water -

And he doesn't have the time to react, either, when the Trickster hits him like a hammer.
Correction - hits him with a hammer, pulled right out of nowhere. It's striped yellow and neon green, even more cartoonishly oversized than Casey with a lollipop spiral in the center of its face. It knocks the air right out of him. John wheezes at the sudden pain, bringing his guard up way too late to do anything about it, and by that point Dave's gone, too, not even a speck in the sky where he's been bounced off to who knows where.

His absence just rips another growing, gnawing hole in the already yawning pit where John's lungs should be. That, almost as much as the physical hit, nearly has John sagging to his knees, his chest feeling like it's caved in on itself.

"Aaaaaand, three~~~!" the Trickster laughs, rounding on Rose with its hammerkind swung back at an odd angle, like it means to punt her into the sky like a golf ball.

A panel of flat golden light rises up in a screen before Rose, and the hammer rebounds with such a jarring clang that the Trickster yelps, yanking back and shaking out one of its hands with a frowning pout. It circles away from Rose, its expression not changing even a little as it stares at her from a safer distance.

"Really?" Rose says, arching an eyebrow. "Come now, surely you can do better than that?"

John feels the wind move before he realizes what it's doing. It's the strangest sensation, not one that he likes at all, being aware of the wind around him, and yet also realizing that being aware means nothing in terms of being able to control it. The breezes here just won't listen to him, even though he could swear he's trying to use his powers the same way he always has.

By the time he catches on, the wind has already begun to thrash and flex and roar up underneath Rose. "Rose, look out!"

Twined cords like knitting yarn lash out and lace Rose's feet and ankles to the stone of Prospit before the winds can do more than ruffle her hair. She even ignores that, tossing it back into order with a flick of her chin, the corner of her lip twitching into a languid curl. She waits for the miniature tornado to blast off into the sky without her before it curls another fraction, into outright confidence.

The Trickster stamps its foot. "No, no, no! First you go messing around where you shouldn't, and now this! Go awayyyyyy!" it whines, totally pouting like a little kid on the verge of a red-faced tantrum. "So dumb! Go wait outside until it's time to have fun! You're spoiling everything!"

"You really don't get a say in the matter," Rose says, brushing down the hem of her jacket where it's ridden up on her back in the gale force winds. "I've dealt with a mindscape far more caustic than anything you could muster. I assure you - in a contest of who can better manipulate mind majjys, you're nothing but hot air."

John forces himself upright; he still feels like he's hanging heavier in the air than usual, his feet dangling like dead weight and his head bobbing like it can't help but lie down again. He's more aware of gravity than the air at this point, and he's pretty sure that's one of those Not Good™ things he's been trying not to think about. But there's a steady mantra that sings in his head like a cold note - Rose, Rose, Rose - and it keeps him vertical. "You're okay?" he asks, his throat clogged with something, and he presses a hand against the new, bruising ache in his side. It almost doesn't hurt, compared to the hollow in his center, but he's been living with that for years - the side pain is new.

Rose looks at him, and her smile is grim but reassuring. "I couldn't hold them," she says, in a sigh. "Something snapped my hold on both of them earlier, when we were separated. But they're back in their own minds - I can sense them from here. They're fine."
John can't smile back. Even the instinct to mirror Rose's expression feels deadened, like he can't figure out how the unfamiliar muscles on his face work. "Good - that, that's good," he says. It doesn't get rid of the screaming chasm where Dave and Karkat should be, but they're at least out of here and away, which was all John wanted to begin with. And Jade was never here from the start (which hurt in ways he can't even find words for), but that means she's out there with both of them - and her with the best teleporting ability of the group. She can get everyone away, if she tries. He knows she has the power to outrun him and that's really all that matters.

"And you." Rose's voice sounds startlingly similar to Rue's in that moment, more severe than John has ever heard her before. She folds her arms over her chest and casts a chilly glare at the Trickster, still sulking in its failure to move her. "You're nothing more than a mental construct gone wrong. Whatever your original purpose, you're not serving it now - you're just decaying, and spiraling out of control while you do."

"Says you!" the Trickster replies, fluffing its own blob of luridly blond hair with a shake of its head. Not really a shake, though; more of a twitch, a flicking, spasmodic jitter, like the mindscape glitches for a moment, and John can almost see what's behind the candy shell -

But what he almost sees is still too much. From the look on her face, suddenly twisted in a grimace, Rose probably sees a whole lot more of it; enough to shake her confidence, at least a little.

"But Rooose! I think I'm still doing exactly what I'm s'posed to, so nyeeeeeh!" The Trickster sticks out a bright pink tongue, sharp teeth glinting like needlepoints. "S'not my fault you all are being so silly! Silly billies!" Its eyes fix on John (too pale too lightning-cold) and it bares even more of those teeth in a sickle. "John knows, riiight? He knows what I'm here for. He knows why I'm better."

He looks at it for too long - or maybe just the words are enough. John closes his eyes and feels the world roll under him, the air tossing like the deck of a ship at sea under his feet.

He feels unsteady. More so than he already did. "I don't know you at all," he says, aiming for fierce and slogging out somewhere around trembling. The effort of dragging the words out from where they've dug into his throat like fishhooks exhausts him.

He can't bring himself to look directly at the thing with his face anymore, but he can tell it's rolling its eyes. "Gosh! Still a waste of breath then, huh?" John's gaze has to flash over the Trickster's face to get back to Rose, and he catches a frame of the way its cheeks dimple in a careless grin that it focuses on Rose, smiling at her secretively as though inviting her in on some doozy of an inside joke.

"I don't know why you guys put up with him! Honest! He's just sooo boring!"

John thinks at that moment he almost passes out - he loses something in the rush of wind that drowns out the sound of any response Rose might have made. He's barely aware of the thin trails of blue tugging on his arms and legs as the rest of the air twists into another fierce gale and tosses her words away where no one can hear them. He can make out her lips moving, if he squints, but he's not good at translating that into words, not when his eyes won't stop burning like they've been dunked in - in - in whatever eye doctors use to make your pupils dilate, sharp and stinging and raw.

"-ing!" Rose finishes, just as the wind cuts out. John stiffens at the sudden quiet. Both he and Rose stare at the pink and blue figure hovering between them. "If you believe that you can defeat both of us together, you're wrong," she says, her smiling smirk gone as she raises a pair of needles. "You are so very, very wrong."

"I think you're just sore 'cause I stole Karkat! Bluh, bluh, bluh!" The Trickster's no longer pouting, which seems like a thing to be worried about. It rests the hammerkind over its shoulder instead, lounging in midair with an ease that John envies. "But it's whatever, you know? If you can't see what's right in front of your nose, it's not my business!" It giggles. "A blind Seer, a soggy Knight, a reckless Witch - it's no wonder you ended up with a shitty Heir! A full set of washed up heroes~!" A smile, this time definitely for Rose only. "But we can still be friends, right?"

Rose looks at John. "John."

John looks at Rose. "...Rose."

"I was going to suggest we ignore all the pointless distractions and raise you up above this meager, twisted thing so you could assert your rightful authority in your own mind," she says, rolling her left wrist absently. "But…now I say we just set it on fire."

That, John can smile for. "Yeah, I think I'm okay with that plan."

"Well, since we're in accord -"

"Too late!" the Trickster chimes in.

"-we may as well - I beg your pardon?" Rose says, breaking off mid-sentence with a blink.

She never sees the dreaded artifact of confection coming. The Trickster whistles, a high note that slowly lowers in pitch - until it abruptly drops, and the Trickster ends the whole thing with a squishing noise, laughing. John gets it a fraction of a second before Rose does, and he sees the realization widen her eyes as she looks up, just in time to take an entire blue-and-white frosted triple decker birthday cake to the face.

"You're prooobably right that I can't take you on in here, just 'cause you cheat and you're better at magic and stuff," the Trickster says, after it finishes snorting through another round of giggles. "But that's okay! Dad can distract you for a bit!"

*Dad - *

A strangely flat, two dimensional image of his handler appears, and John gags, cold fear shooting through his stomach. He has no eyes and no mouth - just the jut of a nose, and strips of too-white flesh stretched thin over the places where those cavities should be in his skull. When Rose's eyes start glowing right through the buttercream frosting and she lashes out with one needlekind like a dagger, the handler doppelgänger turns sideways - and basically just disappears. He flips back a moment later, when Rose's strike has already flown wide, and that's when John realizes he really is flat. Another confection appears in the faceless man's hands, and he lobs it at Rose; when she dodges and sets off a burst of dazzling light, he winks out of existence again. Every time Rose tries to turn and fight her way back toward the moon of Prospit - back to John - his handler neatly turns her aside and starts driving her away once more, using all the sleight of hand and japery that marks his real life strife style, too.

*Except in real life, he would have probably shot her by now. Misdirection, and then, while she's distracted - *

"You shouldn't have gone in his house!" the Trickster calls after them, "Dad hates having other people in the house! Always has!"

"And now," it adds, glancing back at John with sparkling eyes, "I can deal with you, mister!"
Karkat is - gone
And Dave is - gone
And Jade - never was here

And now Rose is fading out of sight, strifing in furious circles with his handler as the figure in white pushes her further and further around the curve of the moon.

There isn't an abyss waiting for him to step backward into it, like there is when he thinks about the other three. But only just. If Rose goes, the last of his sanity might just go flying out the window.

Rose won't go. Rose wouldn't leave me.

Rose already left you once, you idiot.

John floats backward when the Trickster skips toward him - circles right when it arcs around at his left - stays on his guard - tries to banish that last thought. The one that almost gutted him. There's a way he could drift over the chasms where his internal organs should be, to blow right over it and ignore the pain, but he can't bring [Eye of the Storm] back into the picture. He can't.

The Trickster just seems content to dog his trail, regardless, its smile growing crueler and crueler the further away Rose goes. "Looooooool," it says lazily, fluttering thick lashes at him. "Not even going to say anything? Moron."

A tiny pang. "What even are you?" John asks, his voice a ragged mess. He wouldn't recognize it if he heard it in a recording, he thinks. "How did you get in here?"

Another roll of its eyes, and the Trickster kicks its heels up, still floating along effortless on a cushion of air, where John's struggling to stay aloft. "Not telllliiiiiiing~~~" it laughs, tapping a finger along the side of its broken nose. The cartilage has already mostly straightened itself out, though John doesn't remember seeing the Trickster yank it back into place. "If you don't know already, you're even dumber than you look!"

There are also streaks of very faint red all down the front of the Trickster's uniform. John hadn't seen it there before, but he could swear they look like faded bloodstains.

And he's already seen the Trickster bleed pink syrup.

The implications are enough to fire his temper; enough that he feels the first stirrings of genuine anger and can muster up a pissed off shout. "Oh yes, you are! I'm sick of having secrets in here, so 'fess up!" he says, straightening his shoulders and his spine, against the vocal protests of every other part of his body that kind of just wants to curl up in a ball and stop moving.

The Trickster snorts, and scratches the back of its head, eyes rolling in impossible circles. "No way! You've never cared before, so why start now? Just go back to where you went earlier, so the rest of us can have fun without you getting all weepy over everything~!"

It pauses, and winks. "Besides, right now it just looks like you're talking to yourself. You crazy
And then it's gone, without even the clap of air rushing in to fill the hole where it used to float.

For a wild moment, John cringes and can't quite piece together enough of his mind to figure out whether or not the Trickster was ever even really there to begin with. It would so easy for all of this to have just turned out to have been his mind hallucinating, screaming alone to itself in the dark -

TR: :)

He's not entirely sure how he hears that. But he does. John whips his head around and squints until he makes out a figure in pastels lounging on a crenellation down below, swinging its feet and whistling with the clouds lacing around it as the winds flag and swirl around him.

Like the Trickster is the center of everything.

"I'm definitely not the crazy person of the two of us," John says, easing himself down to the Trickster's altitude with teeth-clenching care. Going down feels rather a lot like outright falling, and he has to hastily pull himself to a halt a few feet too high because the jolts and starts of the lonely breeze wafting him down are beginning to give his heart palpitations or something. "I'm not the one who hurt Jade!"

The Trickster looks up, and it's like looking into a mirror - but the image in the mirror is sneering when John can't even smile, a lurching disconnect from reality. "Of course you are! Do you know how long I've had to listen to you whine?" It raises a hand from the faded gold of its seat, and mimes a mouth talking with it. "Bluh, bluh, bluh! I'm so sad, everyone died, my dad wants me to do terrible stuff!!!" The hand snaps shut. "More like awesome stuff!!! You are seeeriously lacking in perspective, buddy!"

John never stopped feeling nauseous, but it certainly makes itself known again. When he thinks about some of that 'terrible stuff' - the things his handler wanted him to do to Karkat alone -

"There's no way something like you came out of my head," he says, shaking. His fingers can't seem to stop twitching, and he closes them into fists. "Oh my god. You're the worst. The actual worst."

"And you're still a cranky pants McGee!" The Trickster rolls its eyes, and then beams at him, sickeningly sweet. "Learn to take a joke, dipshit."

"That's not a joke, that's terrible!" John snaps, feeling his stomach tie itself into another coiled knot. "You're talking about hurting people!"

"Who cares, if it's fun?"

"That's not fun!"

"More fun than anything you could come up with," the Trickster says, dismissing him with a wave of its hand. It kicks up and over and backwards off the crenellation, skipping down the circumference of the moon. There's a huge gouge where a chunk of the buildings hasn't been fitted back into place, exposing the chains dangling loose like guts in the center of the moon, but the Trickster continues darting down without a care in the world. "I told you - I'm just...better!"

John doesn't even know how they went from him trying to back away to him chasing after this maniac, as they dip into the southern hemisphere of the moon. John keeps his head upright, but the Trickster is flying along at an angle, its hood fluttering in a breeze that John can't feel. "At what - being a totally insane homicidal maniac??!!"
"Oh, no," the Trickster says, slapping its palms to its cheeks and widening its eyes. Then, just as quickly, it laughs again, ruining the act. "Well, yes, that too. But more importantly -"

It vanishes into the air, dissipating into the wind without a trace. John stops. Maybe he's starting to pull himself together, because this time he doesn't just stand there like a complete idiot - he has the wind turn him so his back is to the roof of the nearest building, a tower that points down toward the earth at an angle. When he looks up, he can see the window openings of the tower leading down to the surface of the moon. It's dizzying to look at, which is the last thing he needs right now, and he gulps and looks straight out instead, scanning the horizon and the sky below him for wherever the Trickster might decide to pop up next.

He looks up.

The Trickster grins at him, upside down. Hands reach down and clamp on either side of John's head, squeezing too hard and holding him in place when he instinctively flinches away. "At being you," it tells him, its eyes stabbing into his own as it keeps him from looking away.

"Nn-

"I'm not depressed all the time," the Trickster says, right through whatever protest John might have made. "I'm not the one who's so stupid and panicky, he'd just roll over and let a total dick mess around in his trashcan of a brain."

"St-

The hands on either side of his face shake him, hard enough that John's head slams back against the roof. The Trickster walks upside down and holds him there. "When I want to do something, I do it~!" it says, sweet as chocolate pie. "And I don't drive myself crazy over it, either!"

John has to scream to be heard. "THAT'S BECAUSE YOU'RE ALREADY CRAZY!"

"Duhhhh," the Trickster sighs, a beatific smile on its face. "Isn't it great? Sanity is highly overrated, if you ask me - look where it got you!" Another rattling shake that jars him against the golden shingles, and John feels something wet trickle down the back of his neck, warm and sticky and clotting in his hair like - "Alone and broken and useless -"

John reaches up and seizes the Trickster by the wrists, yanking with all his strength until those clawing fingers tear away, leaving scrapes around his face. "Get out of my head! Get out get out get out!" he screams again, trying to duck out from under him.

The Trickster laughs and lets him go. John can still hear him talking, though, because the winds come and go at the Trickster's beck and call, biting at John's heels and forcing the words into his ears when the last thing he wants right now is improved hearing.

"Whyyyy? Because you're super sensitive and you suck the joy out of everything?" That casual laugh sounds right next to John's left ear, and John puts on another burst of speed, limping along as fast as his breeze will take him. He's wandering further into the interior of the moon, through the cracks that riddle its surface, but all he can think is that he needs to get away. And when the person you're trying to get away from can just teleport anywhere it wants, anyway, going further in is probably just as useless as trying to fly away into the sky.

"Just face it, everyone would be better off without you, and you know it!" A flicker of pink and blue strolls past in the corner of John's eye and he can't help that his gaze darts out to watch the Trickster walk along the outer wall of one of the intricate golden buildings. "I mean, Dave and Karkat sure took off in a hurry, didn't they? Heheheh!"

That - that one almost gets him. John's vision blurs for a long second - and then he snaps out of the daze, gasping for air and wiping furiously at his cheeks. "No, they left because you launched them out of my head, asshole!" He glares up at the Trickster. "If they'd stayed here, you probably would have hurt them, anyway!"

The Trickster presses a hand to his chest, his laugh echoing weirdly in the broken acoustics of the moon city. "Gasp! I would never hurt Karkat!" A pause. "Unless he was into that."

John only realizes he's about to throw up when the taste of bile reaches his tongue, and he has to swallow it back down in a caustic, rank burn before he upchucks everywhere. "Oh my god, stop talking about him like that!" he says, and it comes out more pleading than demanding, more desperate than sane.

The Trickster coasts down to John's level, humming with happiness as he bats his eyelashes again and leans into John's personal space. "We totally made out while you were gone~" he says in a stage whisper.

"You -" John can't seem to get air into his lungs. Then, when he finally does: "You - what did you do to him?!

"I just told you!" the Trickster cackles, wrapping his arms around his stomach as he laughs with his whole body. Like John's white-hot terror is the funniest thing he's ever heard. "There was tongue and everything!"

John doesn't remember landing on the ground, the last of his control over the wind wobbling as he hits the stone of the road and the moon's gravity catches him. "I think I'm gonna be sick," he gasps - but why, when there's no one here who would care? Sweat prickles along his skin, cold along his back and hot against his sides and too tight in his stomach, too close, he can't breathe -

The Trickster leans in close again, bending over John's hunched back to keep whispering in his ear. "I also touched his butt! And did other things...but he didn't seem too like that too much! He wanted to play hide and seek more!"

Yup. There it goes. John's coherent just long to finish one last, "Oh my god," before he retches and throws up all over the floor, both arms shaking with the effort of keeping him from collapsing into it.

By the time he runs out of anything to throw up, he thinks he's just in tears. He spares one hand to scrub at his face, feeling hot and miserable, and sees - what he just threw up. He freezes in horror.

Black coats the back of his hand, and the puddle in front of him is one of black oil that oozes into the cracks between the cobblestones even as John watches, dripping from his lips like molasses.

"Ewww! Ahaha, you're disgusting~!" the Trickster crows, like this is the funniest thing in the world and not, you know, horrifying.

"What the heck?" John choked out, feeling his stomach wrench and try to heave again just at the sight of whatever the heck just came out of his mouth, oh my god - "What did you do to me?!

"I didn't do anything!" The Trickster pretends to wipe away a tear of mirth - no, wait, it's an actual tear. It's an iridescent, silvery purple, and he is actually crying and laughing at John's bewilderment. "You're the one who keeps getting depressed and dumping that stuff everywhere! No wonder no one wants to kiss you, with that mouth!"
John tries to push himself back up to his feet. Twice. It just doesn't quite take the first time, or, you know, the second. He gives it a good effort though! "That - has nothing to do - with anything! Just - just stop talking!" He sits back hard, his legs folded up in a jumble under him, and sways as he wipes the last of that gross stuff off his lips. It tastes like - like gasoline, and something rancid, and just a little like licorice, which just makes him all the more suspicious. "You clearly don't know anything about anything! You just like making stuff up about me and my friends, so I officially am not listening to you anymore! I just want you to go away!"

Silence.

Then - "Heheh, nice try." The Trickster taps his foot against the oil puddle, and it bursts into a bright emerald green liquid, before fading into gold to match the rest of the ground. "Soorry~ But I can do this now!"

He closes his fist, and all that sucking emptiness in John's chest, all those gaping holes, swallow. But there's nothing there to swallow, just more of that aching hollow that he can't help but fall backward into. John crumples, a weird ringing in his ears as he curls into a ball, the last of the energy sucked out of the marrow of his bones.

(And he remembers exactly one day like this. Just one. He remembers locking the door of his room, his handler out at work, and lying in bed instead of going to school and just breathing, because that was the only thing left he had the strength for, staring at the uncurled cage of his fingers on the hand beside his face on the pillow, barely blinking, barely moving -

The next day he ran, and what he found at the end, when he couldn't run anymore, was Dave.)

The Trickster nudges John's shoulder, and with a happy laugh, applies pressure until John rolls to escape it, staring past the Trickster at the roofs of the golden buildings overhead. He never really saw Prospit's moon until it and Jade were both in pieces; it's not a happy memory. But it's better than watching his own face leer down at him with a viciously saccharine grin.

"Can you hear that?" the Trickster asks, crouching down beside John. He smiles even wider when John can only let his head fall to the side and look away. "Ask me what I can hear."

"Hear what?" John asks, barely more than a mumble.

A faint pressure on his throat - a tap of a finger that makes John swallow reflexively. "It's the winds of change, dumbass."

The Trickster smiles, and starts pressing down. Things start getting really fuzzy right around then. "You kind of suck, you know? A whole lot!" he says, and that's the last clear thing before John's not sure what he's really hearing and what's just his brain shooting off dying sparks as the heel of a palm grinds down against his trachea.

TR: while you were off napping and angsting, the winds came to me. :) TR: cause...you see...they like me better! i pay attention to them! :) :) :) TR: it's just like how all of your friends will like me better! :) :) :) :) :) :) :) :)

"Leave them alone," John gasps, his eyes way too slow to respond when he wants them to open. Panic slouches through him like a lumbering thing, fighting through the oxygen deprivation and everything else to make itself felt. "Jus' leave everyone 'lone!"

The Trickster's smile goes crooked.
He starts squeezing now, fingers digging into the skin on either side of John's throat. The ringing in John's ears morphs into a low, rolling rumble, and he's pretty sure only the tiniest flutters of air are getting through his slowly crushed windpipe to his lungs.

TR: heck, i'll take rose and dave and jade and karkat with me and dad. i don't see why they should get left out of all the fun~! they can all be my friends instead of yours.

TR: and i can kiss them too! it will be so fun!

A moment of clarity. Really, seriously grossed out clarity. "Jade's ss'r ssister!" he slurs out, indignant.

TR: yeah, yeah, bloohoohoo!

TR: now shut up and stop vomiting your gross depressing stuff everywhere so i don't have to clean it up in my mind anymore~

TR: just die. :)

John gets a hand up, and makes a feeble effort at peeling the fingers away from his throat. But the fingers he feels under his own have too many joints, for a moment, the knuckles sharp and jutting, and John doesn't even have the strength to raise his other hand, let alone try to untangle what's real from what's hallucination.

Another sharp burst of clarity, and he can hear, through the pain - "Everyone hates you, anyway. Not as much as I hate you! But almost. Everyone. Even Jade, even Dave. Even Rose. Even Karkat."

And that -

Is a mistake. It's almost not enough of one to jolt John out of it. But it is, just barely. It's enough.

John opens his eyes and glares at the Trickster.

"My friends," he says, "don't hate me!"

The Trickster blinks, and then regains himself. "They totally do!" he argues, just the slightest hint of a pout returning to his face. "It's true! They got sick of you a looong time ago!"

No, no, no, the song in his head sings, Rose, Rose, Rose.

Rose is still here.

"She left!" the Trickster snarls.

John seizes the wrist of the distorted, inhuman hand that's wrapped around his throat, and uses his free hand to punch the Trickster in the chin. "She came back!" he hisses.

And finally, all his training kicks in and does some fucking good for once. John kicks his legs up, and, unfortunately for the Trickster, he's leaned over John at exactly the right angle for John to wrap his legs around his neck in a lock - and from there, it's just a matter of dragging the Trickster's head to the side with a wrench, hauling his head in one direction and holding his body in place by his arm.
in the other -

If it worked, it probably would have dislocated a normal person's shoulder, or worse. But the Trickster has options normal people don't have, and he vanishes into the air before John can finish snapping his legs back down. The sudden snapback jars John's heels - but there's air in his lungs, and the swallowing hole in his chest stops trying to swallow him, and if he has nothing else, he has the knowledge, a haunting violin refrain in his mind, that Rose is somewhere in here with him.

"They're not sick of me." His voice sounds worse than ever, barely more than a rasp, but the Trickster's not the only one who can project. "You're a liar." John shoves himself upright, onto his feet. If there's just one thing he has to say to gravity right now, it's this - not today.

Gritting his teeth, John starts floating back up into the air, toward the open sky. He can find Rose, and help her with that thing, and then they can leave.

"A liar, huh?!"

The voice comes from everywhere and nowhere. John keeps floating. It takes a lot of effort to pull off, but he allows himself a jerky nod. "You're just some hallucination, trying to trick me," he says, rising up past the roof tops, and adjusting himself so that his feet point toward the earth below instead of the moon.

"Why trick you? You do that just fine on your own! I'm the one who remembered everything when you didn't want to. And I know they all hate you for getting them killed."

His flight path shudders. John puts his hand out, but there's nothing to grab onto; so stupid! His throat feels like one huge swollen mess, getting worse by the moment - so the faster he gets to Rose, the faster she can probably do something magical and awesome to help fix it. "They - don't," he gasps, casting his senses out for something he can follow back to her. "They wouldn't have come in here to find me if they hated me!"

"A liar, huh?!"

The voice is mocking him in earnest, now. "They were just being nice. You're kind of pathetic, oops! Pathetic and shitty, what a combo! You're a loser and you should have just died in your sleep~"

"You can shut up any day now!" John says, exasperated.

"Make me, make me!" the voice says, imitating his tone exactly. "It's nothing you haven't thought of yourself already! You just dumped it all in the back for me to play with, so you don't get to complain if I'm just repeating what you thought! You're a shitty hero and a shittier god, and I'll do way better~!"

"Stop it!" John can't help himself, because he's totally a sucker; that last voice sounded like it came from right over his shoulder, and he whirls to face it even though nothing is there. Aside from the lonely wind keeping him dangling in the air, the rest of the breezes around him might as well be foreign objects, brushing off his silent pleas without leaving their restless, stalking circles. He knows the Trickster's in them, but he can't see him at all. "Ugh! You're so annoying!" he says, frustrated, and he does his best to start limping up again, straining his eyes to peer through the dense cotton candy clouds for some sign of Rose.

TR: well, you're annoyinger! annoying and useless.

TR: you always have been and you always will be and that -

John feels the exact moment all the air empties out of the sky around him, and leaves him in a vacuum. Stupid! he thinks, throwing out his arms and trying to balance himself as his one lone breeze seems to crap out on him. It's only when he starts falling that he realizes it's wrapped around his head instead, breathing air into his lungs even as he starts plummeting through empty space. Maybe if he had another breeze, he could multitask, but -

TR: - is why -

- he never gets a chance to try splitting his focus, anyway. The Trickster drops on him like a car - or maybe like a semitruck - feet planting themselves right on John's chest, and then they're both falling, faster and faster, toward the golden city of Seattle far below.

TR: - i -

If there's a way to turn off gravity in John's head, he's drawing a blank. He starts struggling, trying to flip him and the Trickster so at least he'll take the brunt of impact, but no matter how he claws the Trickster just cackles down at him, hurtling them down at the ground with a blast of wind from above. A huge orange chain appears through the thinning clouds off to John's left as they rocket downward; it clanks and rattles in a gale that doesn't reach John, doing him absolutely no good as it flashes past.

John looks up. The Trickster grins down, his mouth a smile full of knives.

John looks down.

Oh man. This is going to hurt.

And, well -

He's not wrong. At all.

He's not really sure what the acceleration due to gravity is in his mind, or exactly how much the Trickster is making it worse by driving them along with a tornado drill, but he's really fucking sure that they hit the ground at really fucking hard miles per hour.

TR: -win!

TR: :D
He doesn't get the luxury of unconsciousness. Just a lot of pain.

They hit hard enough to blast a new crater in the road, and John is pretty sure that his back managed to slam into every single solitary chunk of debris on the way down. When he shifts, something in his chest grates the wrong way, and he lets out a noise that's kind of a cross between a 'rrrrgl!' and 'hlkgh!'

He'd like to think the fact that he didn't just die on impact is a good sign, but he remembers, with harsh clarity, exactly how much Rose's mental self managed to survive, adrift and slowly dissolving into an ocean of grimdark acid.

Oh gosh. He's so screwed. "Haaaaagh," he says, lifting his head and instantly regretting it. The back of his hair feels like it's soaked through, and as he runs through a painfully slow check of his arms and legs, moving his fingers and rolling his ankles just to make sure he still can move them, his body screams at him. His spine is either still working or else, heck, does he even have a spine in here, technically? If it were broken, would it even count?

But there's a weight on his chest that he notices only when he gets used to the general pain enough to focus on something else. "Get...off..." he says, and the weight laughs at him, a merry, hiccupping giggle.

"Nope!" the Trickster says, brushing away John's punch with a wave of his hand and a roll of his eyes. He looks none the worse for the wear after their meteoric drop; there's a fine layer of gold dust covering his blue and pink mockery of John's uniform, dusted in his flyaway hair, but other than that and a splatter of red high on his cheek, the Trickster looks the same as ever. Another laugh as he leans forward, pressing both of his palms flat against John's chest, the 'Trickster looks the same as ever. Another laugh as he leans forward, pressing both of his palms flat against John's chest, and the agony spikes. John screams and jerks away, but the Trickster's sitting mostly on his stomach, pressing on his sternum with his hands, and he's just too heavy to squirm out from under.

John finally thinks to look at his chest. He kind of figures out why this is hurting so much when he sees the way the Trickster deliberately presses down on what feel like massive bruises, aiming for broken ribs and shoving them even further out of place.

Oh. Haha. Well that explains a lot. Now he knows how Karkat felt.

"I like you better, dying! You're much more fun now!" The Trickster drums his fingers along what feels like a rib that's snapped in two. "Like a jigsaw puzzle~"

"M'not gonna die," John says. If nothing else, he's pretty sure he can survive way more than this, which could potentially really suck.

"Was that a challenge?" the Trickster says, sounding utterly delighted. "I love a challenge!"

John forgot about the fingers, with their extra joints and sharp nails. Or maybe he still half-believed he was imagining all the little ways that the Trickster's glamour has been flickering on and off, revealing glitchy hints of the monster underneath.

He remembers when the Trickster jams all the claws of one hand into his skin and rips, carving into his chest below the bone of his sternum like a serrated knife. John screams, because he just keeps clawing and it doesn't stop. "Stop being such a drag and keep dying," the Trickster says, shoving John back down when he tries to sit up. "Look at all this blood! Do you think Karkat would like to see?" He holds up the hand digging around in John's chest for him to see, and John feels the urge to throw up again when he sees that it's gory, dripping with a mix of dull red blood and pitch black oil. "Nah, heheheh, he probably wouldn't - too much greasy, grody oily crap! Not enough actual blood!"
"Don't talk about him!"

The splortch his insides make as the Trickster jams his hand back into the growing gouge in John's torso turns his stomach. Or possibly the Trickster just does that, you know, manually. It all just kind of hurts, he can't tell how bad the damage might be anymore. "I'll think of a better present for him," the Trickster decides, apparently content to ignore John's wheezes. "I'll be outside soon, which should be exciting!"

John can already barely breathe through his swollen, bruised throat. When he starts feeling a pressure on his lungs, the Trickster casually leaning more of his weight on one arm while the other hand's occupied with sinking further into John's chest, he freaks out. "Get. OFF!" he screams, groping around for his sense of the wind, and yanking until that one breeze pushes the Trickster back.

The rest of the wind wraps around and, in response to a whistle from the Trickster, holds him right where he's sitting until another stab of pain jolts John out of his attack. "Hoohoohoo! You never did use the Breeze enough!" the Trickster says, beaming. "This is so fun! Try something else!"

The thing is, John can't think of anything else to try. It's agony layered on exhaustion and topped off with a woozy, listless merengue, and maybe, maybe, if someone else were here they could talk him out of the stillness creeping through his mind. But they're not. Even Rose is so far away…

"Wassamatter?" The Trickster removes his hand from the wound and folds his arms to lounge on John's chest, studying his face with eyes that have gone more white than blue, like shards of ice. Dried blood streaks the Trickster's cheeks that wasn't there before, with pale upside down triangles under his laughing eyes. He smiles, and draws a line across John's lower lip in blood. "Don't feel like babbling anymore? About time!"

You know what would be fun? Saying something right now, just to be a contrary dickhead. Channel his inner Karkat, because there's some really choice swear words on John's mind right now that would make Karkat proud. But there's some miscommunication between his mouth and his lungs and his vocal cords, probably since two of the three feel like they're mostly out of commission.

Okay, maybe it's only Rose who's really resilient in her mind. Maybe John's just dying.

"Stop wasting air and go away already," the voice says, from a distance. John thinks the Trickster might be moving away - but no, he's the one dying, right? "Nobody will care that you're gone. I promise."

……well, he has a point that it's nothing John hasn't thought before.

"Pardon me. Mind if I cut in?"

John blinks.

The Trickster blinks, and looks up.

Just in time for Rose to kick him in the face.

She must really put some effort into it, too, or else cast a spell at the same time, because her foot plants itself square on the Trickster's forehead, and then appears to blow up. Kind of. There's a burst of light, and then the blowback from the miniature explosion spell puffs John's hair back out of his face. The Trickster takes the full force of it, though, and is blown back through the air to crash thirty feet away from the crash site.

"I've missed that spell," Rose comments, dropping down beside John in a fluid rush, her eyes full of worry that she seems to be carefully swallowing down so that her voice sounds utterly calm. "It's so useful, in the right circumstances."

Rose. John huffs and it's almost a laugh. "Why'd you stop using it?" he asks, hoarse, as Rose touches wonderfully cool, glowy fingers to his throat. This time when he swallows, it actually feels like his airway is clearing up, which is ten different kinds of awesome.

"Oh, the grimdark latched onto it, and was constantly trying to lure me into blowing up people who aren't rabid mental constructs." Rose smiles, serene, while she presses the back of her other hand to John's forehead, and casts a studying eye on the bloody front of John's jacket. "At the moment, I'm pleased to say, I don't particularly care. Good lord, has that thing been using you for target practice?"

"Nothing I haven't thought before," John says before he can stop himself. A burst of anxiety fills his head now that he has enough oxygen to think about something like that, and he tries to cover the gaping wound before Rose can see all that black gunk in his insides. He's never wanted her to see that, not ever. "Don't -"

"You'll need to let me look at that, before we leave," Rose says, but before she can press the issue she tenses and her head whirls to grimace in the direction the Trickster fell. John tries to raise his head and follow her gaze, but she cups a hand around the back of his head, touching the welt there and easing the bloodflow before she stands. "That copy of Samuel found itself on fire, but it retreated before I could finish it. It shouldn't return - try to focus on healing yourself."

"What about you?!" John says, one hand clutched to his chest as he tries to sit up. He manages it, mostly, but his chest hates him for it, and when he sees that the Trickster has risen into the air he regrets looking, anyway. He's hovering there, the hood of his uniform longer than before, and his head hangs low so that his face is obscured. But more and more, John thinks, the Trickster looks like he's daubed in black, oily paint.

"You can deconstruct this thing yourself when you're in better health." Rose draws a needle out of her sleeve as she strides toward the Trickster. "Right now, I really am in the mood to practice blowing things up. I'm out of practice with anything harsher than light."

"That seems dangerous." John hauls himself further upright, then falls back, all the blood draining from his face. It feels like there's a stake lodged in his chest, now that he doesn't have the pain in his throat and the back of his head to leave him dizzy and distracted with the lack of air. "Rose? That's really dangerous!"

"So am I." Rose raises her chin and stalks off, her voice echoing off the buildings around them. "You shouldn't have hurt him."

"You should have stayed grimdark!" the Trickster says in reply, listing his head to one side and tilting it to stare at Rose. "That would have been way more interesting!"

BE: ...

BE: is this a bad time?

John tears his eyes away from the two people facing off in font of him, and for a wild moment he can't recall whose voice that is.

The next, the Breeze makes it easier for him to remember - the wind that's been listening to him coalesces back into blue swirls, and then further still, until a shrimpy version of himself, flat and kind of monochrome in armless versions of his god tier pajamas, stares down at him, tapping its foot in midair.

Maybe the Breeze is trying to look stern, but it mostly just looks like a cartoon thirteen year old, frowning with the buck teeth it hasn't grown into yet sticking out and ruining any seriousness it might have had.

The Breeze sticks out its tongue, and that doesn't exactly make it any easier to take it seriously.

BE: i mean are you still ignoring me??? :/ cause you kinda look like you could use some help!
BE: but usually even when you need help you just send me away...so i don't know!

John stares for a moment.

And then his stomach drops out from under him.

Because he can't remember if the Breeze has said a word since they found Karkat. He's just...tuned it out.

Like he always does.

"Sorry - about that," he says, wondering if it's possible to hate himself even more, and finding, as always, that nothing is impossible.

The Breeze stamps its foot this time, raising a tiny bluster of air that messes up John's hair.

BE: you said you were sorry already!
BE: and then you totally did it again!!!
BE: ruuuuuuuuude!

"I did," he echoes, letting his gaze drift back to the mangled mess of his torso. He can't see any of that oil stuff, just a deep gash where his jacket's been torn open and blood wells out. He should probably put pressure on it, or something. "I just...I guess I don't know what to think anymore."

The Breeze blows air out of its flat line of a mouth, angling it up so that it puffs up its own bangs in exasperation.

BE: uh...weeeell...i think rose could use some help! do you want to help rose?

Like that's even a question! "Yeah, of course!" John looks past the hovering cartoon. He can make out less and less of the Trickster's pastel uniform between the rising tornado and the black gunk that seems to be obscuring his form, but Rose has basically lit herself up like a beacon, the Light symbol on her front blazing as she casts spells like potshots at the Trickster. She ducks and spins to dodge a huge chunk of debris that the Trickster lob's at her with the wind, and for a moment John thinks he sees exactly what Rose got from the Strider side of the family.

It's probably just her new thing for sweet shades.

He just doesn't know how much longer she can keep this up. Magic is pretty much Rose's specialty, and since most of the rules in a mindscape seem to favor who can manipulate mind magic the best, she can totally kick ass.

But the Trickster cheats. He already cheated once, by distracting Rose with John's handler for so long. Any second now he could get bored of fighting her like this and do something horrible.
So it's pretty much the most crushing thing in the world when John leveres himself up on the edge of the crater, the Breeze floating aside to make room for him - and then his chest seizes up, dropping him again. Frustrated, John mashes his hand down on top of the wound, but even if he could will himself to heal faster in here, he can't imagine how to make his shattered rib cage any less painful in the meanwhile. "Great. I'm a mess, and Rose is in trouble right now, and I can't do anything!"

And now he's whining. No wonder his friends always end up hurt or worse, when he's so usele-

BE: you know, if the big dumbo were here and not sleeping again, he'd probably say something really ominous and inspirational to get you off your butt!

BE: or like threaten to eat you, which i guess is pretty ominous still.

"Is that supposed to make me feel better or something?" John asks, dubious.

BE: urgh! quick, think of reasons to fight this creepy dude for once!

There are just so many reasons, honestly, that John fumbles trying to pick just one. "...What if he tries to choke Jade again?" he says at last, because it's close to the top of his mind when he sifts through it.

BE: that would suck! we love jade! :(

"Or hurt Dave, or Rose...or Karkat-" He has to break off because he still doesn't know what was a lie and what was the truth and what might have just been implied, he doesn't know what the Trickster did to Karkat and the possibilities'll just make him sick again.

BE: oh yes, we love all of them! so we should not let that happen! sooooooo...?

And the Breeze trails off, and watches John expectantly.

Hey, it's not as bad as some of the pep talks John has given in his life. Lives. Whatever. He nods jerkily, sets his jaw, and stands up again to start hobbling towards Rose. Maybe if she sees him up and moving, he can convince her to snap them out of here or something. He thinks he can keep himself conscious and hold down the fort - he's in too much pain to think he can retreat into sleep again.

BE: big sigh!

John stops mid-limp, and has to turn that one over in his head a little before: "...Did you just sa-

The Breeze bops him on the side of the head before he can finish asking, pouting at him furiously and gnashing blunt teeth at him in a miniature flip-out. When he rolls his eyes at its antics and tries to turn back toward the fight, it just bops him one again, and stamps its foot.

BE: do. you. want. me. to. help?!

Oh. John rubs the side of his head, grazing the scabbed dent where he got his head knocked open with the tips of his fingers, and nods, slowly. He thinks about all those years where he just kind of floated through life, ignoring and forgetting everything that had gone so horribly wrong, and how he just reached out and the wind would answer, tirelessly helpful.

How long has he just kind of...taken the Breeze for granted? And now here he is, about to charge off again, discarding even the mere thought that the Breeze might be useful because the Trickster has so many other winds that answer to him instead, more than enough to outclass one small breath of air.
John's kind of an asshole. "Yes, please," he says, humble and heartsick at just how badly he's managed to mess things up, this time around. "Please."

A loud harrumph - and then the Breeze forms itself a pair of cartoon arms, folding them over its chest, eyes closed as it gives a considering nod.

BE: it'll take some doing! all these winds and breezes have been running around rampant while you've been ignoring everything and playing that dumb music, and this creepy you has been encouraging them to get angry and play awful pranks and stuff, so they like him!

BE: you're not just gonna quit on me halfway through, right?

"I won't!" John says. Even now, there's a part of his head almost in tears, not from the pain or the misery or the terror, but just from the thought that he's saying yes to something the Breeze wants. He's listening to its advice, something his handler's been trying (and mostly succeeding) in training him not to do for years.

Well, his handler is stupid and a jerk and evil, and John's been sick of it for years.

So to heck with it. "I won't," he repeats, quieter, less desperate to convince himself.

The Breeze opens its eyes, totally serious as it watches him.

BE: so you [Accept Your Inheritance]?

Why does he hear capital letters of significance in there?

Probably because he's heard them before, he suspects. Gosh, he's got a lot of memories he's going to need to sift through to make up for all this forgetting…

The difference is, now he doesn't have anything to keep him sabotaging all his efforts. No excuse to pretend he doesn't have two lives worth of trauma sunk into his noggin. He's done with forgetting. "I do."

The Breeze swells up, the look on its face sliding right past happiness and into something sublime - before it transforms back into bright blue wind, twining around him in ecstatic loops, as though it can't express itself better in any other form.

BE: well then! it's about time!

When John breathes in, the Breeze unspools down into his lungs, like words pouring themselves back through his throat to be swallowed and spoken again. He looks down at his ragged hero uniform, bedraggled and bloodstained and not at all comfortable, and when the Breeze excitedly chatters a suggestion, John doesn't see why he shouldn't follow it. It takes a snap of his fingers to mentally blink into his god tier pajamas, but a few more fumbling snaps and snaps before he and the Breeze manage to suss out how to fix his ribs. It's different from healing in real life, and Rose would probably understand more how to translate wind powers into mental stuff like sewing up your mental avatar, but they wing it. The Breeze is abuzz with words and sighs and childish, delighted joy, shoving what it thinks are useful memories at him left and right and center, but it's never overwhelming - just overly exuberant, and trying to coax him into it, too.

It's not the Breeze's fault that John's still weary and sad down to his bones. But between the two of them, they snap said bones back into place and will his skin not to have been broken in the first place, and by the time John turns to give the Trickster a piece of his mind, he's - not happy, not anywhere near as on cloud nine as the Breeze feels to finally be acknowledged, but he's got a lungful of brisk, fresh air in him, and it wakes him up just enough -
- to be totally pissed off.

And if there's one thing that hanging around with Karkat has taught John, it's that being pissed off is basically a way of life. If you can gain experience points by proxy, John's probably observed enough of Karkat's epic meltdowns to have accidentally scaled the entire subecheladder.

"Hey, asshole!" he shouts, storming over toward the edge of the crater. At some point during his (totally minor) existential crisis shenanigans, Rose and the Trickster migrated out onto the street. John would have expected the light show to have been crazy because of all the gold, reflective surfaces everywhere, but he wrinkles his nose to see that actually the familiar buildings around him have turned all grungy and gross, brassy and not reflective at all. Rose hasn't given an inch, though she's got two needlekind out now, whereas on the other hand -

The Trickster has seen better days. John thinks it's less that Rose is definitively beating him, and more that the Trickster's just totally dropped any pretense at sugar coating everything. He has his hammerkind out now, swinging it like he's playing whack-a-mole, and every time Rose ducks out of the way or fends off a gust of wind with a burst of light, the Trickster snarls and lashes out again, his face contorted in an inhuman scowl.

(He, his - when did John start thinking like that?)

When he notices John marching toward them, the Trickster just loses it. "You're supposed to be dead!" he says, his voice more a roar than a sing-song. "Why are you like this all the time! Why can't you do anything right!"

A few minutes ago, that would have rocked John back on his heels. But the Breeze is pretty buoyant, and he floats up to their level in a single hop. He's very aware of the winds snarled and knotted around the Trickster, drawn down out of the sky far overhead by the promise of excitement and action - but, all at once, he can tell that the winds are aware of him at the same time, the cyclone faltering as some of them orient themselves to roughly brush past him.

There's a storm in his head, and John's been trying to treat them like something tame. Not even the Breeze, probably the longest-suffering of them all because it's followed him right through the Scratch, would put up with that forever.

If he's gonna wake up and deal with his stupid messed up life, he can't let the Trickster order them around, either. How much of the mess on the topside of John's mind is because John swept all that stuff away until it exploded on him, and how much is because the Trickster's been biding his time back here, picking his way through John's mind and snagging a restless breeze here, an infuriated gale there, until he saw the opportunity to rise up and tip John completely over the edge into utter crazy?

He said he lived with all John's unwanted crap for years, listening to his handler's lectures and nodding along, taking all that violence and nastiness to heart. No wonder he's even crazier.

"John," Rose says, her voice even but muffled as he floats up a few yards away from her - the last thing he wants is her to get caught in the crossfire if the Trickster freaks out on him worse than before. She got a tiny cut across her right cheek, just under the curve of her shades, but now that he's up close, John can see that she's altered her outfit again, which is a pretty nifty trick! She has a headband that covers her ears, now, and a really familiar mask design pulled up from around her collar to cover her mouth and nose. Between that and her visor, and the fact that god tier pajamas are basically super game armor in really soft fabric form, John thinks he sees why the Trickster hasn't just tried his trick of tearing the air out of her lungs to choke her out, or popping her ear drums.

He figures now's not really a good time to explain about the Breeze, especially since the Trickster is still, you know, right there. Listening. No monologues that give away their secrets this time, thanks! "I think I have an idea," he says, correcting himself on the next sentence when the Breeze blows a raspberry at him, which is the single most uncomfortable thing that has ever happened to John's lungs, ever. Oh well. "We think we do, I mean."

"Oh, excellent," Rose says, her eyes sweeping his front. Her expression, when she's made sure that John's not bleeding through his clothes, turns from steely concern to a small, discreet smile, just barely creasing the folds of her mask. "Please, feel free. This exchange has been growing tedious, anyway."

"TEDIOUS?!" the Trickster shrieks, rounding on her again. The last of its control shatters, and John tries not to gag at the twisted mockery of himself that lies underneath. It sluices that mucky, paint-like oil all over its shredded harlequin costume, all of its teeth and fingernails and edges sharp. Even its skin looks like it's mottled and discolored with streaks of rot.

It smells like rotting fruit and old blood and decay. But, more importantly, it still has the faintest hint of gasoline to it.

Quickly, before he can second-guess himself, John reaches out and casts his awareness to the winds. The Breeze sweeps him along as they weave their way through all the gusts and drafts and air currents that the Trickster has been flinging around at random. When the two of them dip and start to straighten out the snarl the Trickster's made of the winds, the rest of the breezes at least turn to follow, restive and agitated but drawn along in the wake of an Heir.

BE: what a mess, what a mess!

John can't yank the breezes into listening to him, but he finds he can slap away the Trickster's creeping, disquieting sway before it can rouse the winds into a frenzy. Some of the more fickle winds tear off into the sky immediately, streaming up and out to rejoin the storm clouds that roll all around the outermost layer of John's mind. I'll probably mean they'll be all the more violent when he has to deal with that mess, later, but they're not listening to the Trickster, and that's what counts. The Breeze wheels them around for a second pass, and this time they thresh out even more of the gusts that prance around John in curious circles; they're not helping John, but not paying any attention to the Trickster, either, more fascinated by what their old Heir can still do.

John almost doesn't notice the tamest winds - the ones who obeyed because if the Trickster looked like John and talked to them like John should have been doing, maybe it was John - when they shyly flock back to him. Then the Breeze flicks him and huffs out several grumpy harrumphs until John pays proper attention. They feel so familiar he almost can't tell where he ends and they start, which is probably half the problem right there.

Incorporeal, it's easy to distract himself from his tiredness, but when he stops drifting around and solidifies as a physical body again he's gasping. Fatigue makes him sloppy and slow, and Rose has to yank him out of the way when the Trickster tries to leap on him.

Even exhausted as he is, though, John can peek through bleary eyes and laugh humorlessly as the Trickster's jump carries it all the way to the building on the far side of the road, where it clings to the scuffed up surface and twists its head around to glower at them. One breeze answers when the Trickster yanks, but that's all - the rest have pulled away or left for other parts of John's mind, no longer interested enough in the spectacle to hang around. "You ruin everything! You're so horrible!" it says, glancing around at the city tarnishing around them with wild eyes. Some of the stuff - the candy decorations and trees, dissolves and drips down as oil, but others, like the Prospitian towers that have no place in Seattle, just fade and dull and then stop there, the golden veneer sluicing away but leaving the underlying bones of the building upright. "Do you know how hard it was to turn all your gross shit into something nice?!"

Rose grips John's wrist, her thin fingers tight. "It's still dangerous," she murmurs in his ear, her face turned so that not even her covered mouth can be seen by the Trickster wailing across from them. "It's built itself up out of intense trauma and emotions; even without the wind, it still has other resources to draw on." She pulls back a little - meets his eyes, searching. "Can you dismantle it?"

"I think I'm just too tired," John says. It's not really an admission, because he's not really trying to hide it anymore; he leans on Rose more than he means to. The Breeze filters through his lungs and coos encouragement at him, but it's not enough to make up for the fact that John's at the end of his rope, here. "If it came to a straight fight between me and it, it could probably take me apart. I'm no good at this brain stuff, Rose."

The stifled noise Rose makes could be a snort or a sob. "And it has too many connections to too many of your emotions for me to rip it out by the root," she says, and the way she says it tells John that if he mentions that he'd be totally okay with her ripping out some of his emotions, too, she'd say no. And maybe cry. He doesn't think he could bear to see Rose cry. "John, what in the horrors did you let it have, that it's this strong?"

"Everything I couldn't handle. Which was a lot," John says. That's kind of all there is to say on the matter.

"And then the mindgrub came and gave it that extra jolt of suggestion and personality it needed to splinter itself off," Rose guesses - and then she shakes her head. "No. There are too many factors here, and I can't account for all of them. Does the Breeze have any idea how we might be able to render it harmless, for now?"

Before John can consult with the Breeze, though, the Trickster lunges again. John yelps, and makes Rose and himself drop ten feet so that the Trickster soars overhead. But when he thinks it's going to crash into the wall of another building, the Trickster twists in the air, its last wind gust stubbornly ignoring John and the Breeze when they try to reach out to it. Now it hovers over their heads, dripping oil from its fingertips and the point of its hood, and it laughs at them as it holds out a hand and calls up its hammerkind again. "Gotcha!"

A drop of oil splatters against John's cheek, and he suddenly he's flashing back to what Rose said, earlier -

Because he remembers where the mental image of oil comes from now. His brain is totally ripping off ꩌ˲˲˲˲˲˲, though it didn't channel all this gunk through pipes - it just piled it all up in the back of his head.

But see, the thing is - ˲˲˲˲˲˲ burned.

"Please tell me you can still set it on fire," John says as they dodge out of the way of the Trickster's first swing.

Rose has to think about it, spinning herself and John out of the path of the next wild strike like they're dancing. "That won't finish it, you know," she says, but the tone of her voice says she's totally considering it. And not two seconds later, she pauses, her lips twitching. "It would still be incredibly gratifying. And might cleanse it of some of the mindgrub's suggestions."

"Can we just agree we want to set it on fire?"

"Well, yes, of course. I'm just attempting to expound upon the possible long term consequences."

"Rose, you are my friend, and-" John has to teleport them out of the way, and continues talking once they're bobbing out of range of the Trickster and solid again ", and I love you, but also if you don't set that guy on fire, I'll have to go set that guy on fire, and I'm pretty sure I'll mess it up somehow and light, like, my entire brain on fire." Just the thought is enough to give him nightmares. "Rose, my brain is already screwed up enough without being on fire."

"Perish the thought." Rose squeezes his arm one last time, and lets go. "Oh, Trickster?"

"You just had to come in here, didn't you!" it yells, veering towards her. "I - I'll squash you two - you're both so awful!"

"I really think not." A twitch of her fingers, and an incomprehensible murmur, and Rose's palm fills with light. The Trickster's bearing down on her by the time she finishes a second spell thingy and the light sparks into fire. John's tensed, about to tackle her to safety, when she eludes the Trickster in two neat steps and pats it on the shoulder as it passes, her hand full of fire.

It goes up like a torch soaked in gasoline, and in an instant the scent of rot vanishes entirely in an open gas fire. "Ow, ow, ow!" the Trickster howls, when any normal being would probably be in shrieking, wordless agony. It drops its hammerkind and slaps its hands frantically against its burning coat of oil and fire. "I hate you two! I hate both of you!"

"Hate is such a strong word," Rose says, the picture of offended delicacy as she drifts back to John and hooks her arm with his. "Perhaps you should learn to play more nicely with others. You've certainly made no friends this way."

The Trickster glares at both of them; if the venom in that stare could kill, they'd have been dead in a heartbeat. It strikes John that the Trickster should say something, right now - some terrible cliché, like, 'you haven't seen the last of me,' or another traditional but totally overused threat straight out of the worst movies.

Which just makes it all the more ominous when the Trickster just smiles.

Half of its face is on fire, but only the oil is burning.

"Bye bye, then!" it says. The switch from roaring snarl back to super sweet, bright giggle jolts John badly enough that he flinches. "Say hi to Karkat for me, John~!"

Then the Trickster claps its burning hands together and disappears. John can't even feel the wind carrying it away; one second it's there, and the next he and Rose are alone in the sky. Just because he can't sense the Trickster watching doesn't mean it's not still there.

But then, after several long, tense seconds, nothing happens. The city underneath them is nothing but grey steel bones and faded yellow façades, like all the bursting energy that lit it up like a fairground got sucked out of it along with the Trickster.

Rose is the one to say it. "That wasn't anywhere near as gratifying as I thought it would be."

"Tell me about it," John says, sighing. He can't seem to stop sighing, and then it's a full-fledged yawn, and the Breeze complains at him for it.
BE: why are you still so tired?!

BE: you and the big guy, both of you are so sleepy all the time! :/

"I just want to go to sleep. Regular sleep," John corrects himself. Rose's shoulder is right there, so he rests his head on it. Rose, Rose, Rose.

"I suspect that napping down here would be inadvisable," Rose says, but she doesn't shrug him off either. "Shall we at least sojourn somewhere closer to consciousness? And I'll see what I can do about regular sleep. I hate to think what all these drugs might be doing to your system."

"Yeah," John says, taking Rose's hand and holding it tight. "Yeah, let's go."

"Excellent."

BE: i can show you where to go!

BE: i know places where he can sleep, i guess, even if i think he sleeps too much :T

"That would be much appreciated," Rose says, and John would open his eyes to help fly them out of here, but the tiny breezes give his feet a boost before he finishes the thought.

"Thank you," he says, as they slowly climb up through the clouds, ascending back into his own mind. And it's slurred, to the point where he's not sure he said it aloud or just thought it, but the Breeze settles deeper into his chest with a contented sigh.

And he thinks that might be enough.

-

Somewhere else entirely, an enormous sigh.

TY: Well. It is about time.

-

There isn't a computer screen in Halburn's workroom.

But over in the surgery theater, a screech of panicked fury can be heard as every machine monitoring Dirk's vitals blanks out, and begins to flash the same phrase, over and over again, until they're forced to reset the whole system. Later in the night, when everyone has calmed down, they realize that every computer in the lab with an internet connection has been hit, too.

WKSHRISEHSKW

Chapter End Notes

All the extra POVs are gonna have to come next chapter…we have hit the chapter character limit…I have failed u all…or perhaps I have gone too far...

But yeah wow all that build up, and trickster John gets sent packing just like that. There’s no way he could possibly turn up again later. Nah. No way. Not in a million bajillion years.
Chapter subtitle – I’m gonna make everyone regret that they wanted the makeouts
#youshouldhaveknownbetter
Across Disastrous Years

Chapter Summary

From days laid waste across disastrous years,
From hopes cut down across a world of fears,
We gaze with eyes too passionate for tears,
Where faith abides though hope be put to flight.

Chapter Notes

After the emotional roller-coaster that was this last arc (good frigging god), we're ready to start the transition to the next arc and the great and wonderful Operation [spoilers redacted]! As hard as it is to believe, we're actually past the worst of the angst for the foreseeable future, and now we only have a few weeks until the apocalypse. That's still a thing, you know. It hasn't stopped happening or anything like that. H&H belong to realmenweartights.tumblr.com.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

He gets all motherfucking turned around, at first.

But Gamzee Makara ain't one to lose himself to the chucklevoooods for long, no matter how motherfucking tenacious they may be. Not anymore. His rage is laughter and screams, purging ecstasy and rapturous terror, it is goddamn motherfucking sublime, and if there's a note of something wrong woven into it, a horror that not even the asylum could bleach out, then he is motherfucking down with it.

He

is donw.

((The scripture writes itself out before him, sprawling and sloppy and sickening, and he will hold it accountable for its heinous motherfucking blasphemies with all the profound whimsy at his disposal-)

- And that means he can't let loose yet. He's got his understand on about that. It would be all kinds of atrocious for him to pull that kind of horror show too early. He's got to all up and find the rest of his friends, so they can tear this manic dialectic down with him to trample beneath their feet, like the motherfucking gods they deserve to be. So he reels in the madness that wants to roll out further, that blissful revelruckus what cries discord, and he swallows it down until the dashes

- settle back into place.
-
Of course, when he all comes back into one righteous excuse for a right mind, he realizes just how motherfucking flagrant he all up and got in a herosis's face. He was just so motherfucking pissed to see those words rolling out before him, all the ways the little Witchsis was ready to set him up to go amiss, that he pulled some motherfucking unkind shit. Tav gives him nothing but sass for it, and as Gamzee slouches and takes that noise as the strict scold he deserves, he reads more, squinting through the last slurs of deliration, until he sees all the ways he's gone and scared his herobro, too.

So he swallows the hymnfrenzies, and the pain-pleasure too, until all that's left is his present mind, sadfaced and repentant as he waits for Tavros's scold to pass. His claws still itch and twitch for an instrument to untune, mind to unravel, his lyre to play Discordia -

But hush. H u s h, he says to all the voices that clamor for their say, the ones that never quite left him when Malbro up and realized what kind of grievous motherfucking mistake it'd made in trying to devour something as heinously indigestible as he.

Because his miracles ain't no thing, yet. They cannot be.

...

Yet.

)o:

-(But he does have so many of them up his sylladex. It would be a real motherfucking shame to let them go to waste.)

-

Tavros settles, eventually, though a lot of his vibeharshings flew right between Gamzee's horns as he went about the process of making himself sane again. Gamzee can read the wariness in Tav, the splintered pieces where all the poor motherfucker's illusions and delusions of palehood used to reside, but on that front he is motherfucking unapologetic as all hell.

Poor motherfucker all got it in his faithbiscuit that he could soothe all the cruel and capricious alterity of something like Gamzee. But only one troll ever done that thing right and proper and true, and it wasn't ever Tav.

Gamzee knows who his motherfucking best friend is.

He's all kinds of apologetic for keening the chucklevoodooos throughout the building, though; he bows his head and pays confession at the back of Tavros's wheelchair as he wheels him down the street. He shouldn't have been so short with a herosis who didn't know any better, who looks him up and down and don't even as know him by name, let alone if she could trust a brother she only just met in the street. His distemper is a yawning, systaltic thing, and he doesn't know how much longer he can keep bringing it back to the middle ground.

But he can't fit all that into words, so what comes out is a motherfucking lackluster, "I'm sorry." It's motherfucking atrocious, shameful as shit, but he couldn't do much better unless he went and yanked his own tongue out to lay on the ground at Tav's feet. And Tavbro has a thing about that kind of motherfucking nonsense, though some parts of Gamzee have the thought in his head that it would just grow back, anyway. "I'll be on my best motherfucking behavior," he promises next, and he at least half means it, so Tavros's next angry sigh comes out more resigned than pissed as he folds his arms and continues the silent treatment.

That's okay. It's all okay. Gamzee can feel words layering and overlapping as they get close to the apartment where all those text blocks stack up like caps-locked grey shouts, and he vibrates so hard that Tavros's wheelchair comes near to shaking apart at the battered hinges -

And then Gamzee stops.

He realizes his mistake.

Karkat was here - but it's old, horrifically old, the text faded and dull but informing him in no uncertain motherfucking terms that his best friend left this hivestem an age ago. The next place it leads him is a field where a bitchtits strife went down not long ago, and then a hall full of books, with sentences full of old blood and revelations tacky on the floor where Tavros can't read them, but Gamzee ain't in the mood for fucking blasphemies -

- (not today)

- and the effort it takes to haul his mind back onto the rails exhausts him, until he's crumpled up over the back of the 'chair and Tavros has twisted around to start in on him about sleeping again. The rage crawls behind his eyes, sharp like relief and burning like dry ice, but the only one around now is Tav, and inspiring that much crazy in one poor little trollbro would like as to set his pan to bursting in a most unrighteously literal way. "You need to lie down," the brownblood insists, stern and frantic as one. Maybe Gamzee's bleeding panic into the air all suasive like, without noticing. He clamps down on the rage one last time to make it stop.

"Just a little farther," he says, just a little -

No, that's not right, he's forgetting the enclosure talons that go around words again. It's not right.

- The sun's awake and Tavros has fallen beneath the horizon by the time Gamzee sorts himself out, weaving his way through all the wicked words to figure out where Karkat might have motherfucking wandered off to next. Concentrating hard enough to read what he wants makes his ganderbulbs ache - or maybe they'd all up and ache, regardless, on account of when they open and close he can hear the click like his eyes have gone dry and tired, twitching and fretful and sticking together like all they want is to seal over.

He can't sleep yet. He has a notion in his gourd, a motherfucking inkling that to sleep would be to dream, and to dream would mean -

Well. It ain't time yet, time being what it is, and all.

But Karkat must be near. The streets are motherfucking full of him, where they aren't slashed with void thick enough to carve out the sky itself. And if he can get to Karkat, then surely the rage will bide a while longer

Surely.

"Please tell me you're here to deal with that lusus, already! It's been screeching and setting off the fire alarm at all hours of the night, and that troll won't do a damn thing to -"

It takes every ounce of self-control he's never had to keep from reaching out, casual as all motherfucking hell, and plucking the blasphemer's head from his necknub. Gamzee couldn't tell a soul what his face looked like in that moment, balanced on that crawling point between violence and collapse, but he turns his eyes on the person who's almost finished crossing the street, and the motherfucker stops so dead fast it's a wonder he ain't dead in truth.

"Oh my god, you-" the motherfucker squeaks out, his voice breaking, and while he's held on the brink edge of terror, Gamzee tries to puzzle out with his lagging puzzlesponge just who this motherfucker thinks he is.

All he gets for his trouble is 'neighbor.' Turns out, the motherfucker's just not all that interesting. "Vete ya, brother," Gamzee says, leaning in until the man stumbles backward, and flashing a grin full of toothsome until the poor running human trips all at and over his own feet to rush back to his own hive. "Heheheh."

"¿Dónde estamos?" Tavros mumbles, as they rattle up the front path. Gamzee don't mean to jostle the little motherfucker, but facts are facts, and facts are that this wheelchair ain't long for this world.

He can't bring himself to answer, running claws over the battered front door with a squeeze in his pusher that's been twisting for a long motherfucking time. This place smells like miraculous blood and Blood alike, and - fainter - like a wind what's swept through the place and swept back out again. He knows, he motherfucking knows that Tav's windy bro's been here before, though it's been a while. All that candy crunching madness pulled back in the night, all the fits of laughter that made Gamzee's own chuckles scrape at his throat, and when it went the clouds stopped dumping their noisesome motherfucking rain, like as maybe the Heirbro got his fool of a self mastered.

Don't mean the craze's gone, though. Gamzee being the motherfucking expert that he is, he knows it's probably up and slithered into whatever hole it can find to watch -

- and wait -

But that's none of his, now. Now, there's just Karkat.

Seeing as the door's already been off its hinges once, all kinds of banged up and battered and jammed back onto its hooks again, Gamzee hums happily, turns the doorknob, and after some motherfucking consideration pulls the whole thing out of the doorframe so to lay it off to the side on the grass. He's got all used to this world where lusii don't eat grubs as aren't theirs' unless they've gone rogue and wild, most of 'em tolerating the kinds of visitors that no custodial monster would have motherfucking allowed back in the before.

But he knows that territorial, wicked skree anyplace. When a pale, skulking shape whips out from where it has concealed itself behind the overturned sofa like a fort, Gamzee laughs and lets it yank him off his feet, manic glee bubbling in his chest as Crabdad screeches at him like a challenge and drags him along into the hive.

Tav's sweet little motherfucking custodian ain't never had the temper nor size to throw a strop like this. But Crabdad's always had the most beautifully salty constitution of any sea lusus to ever throw a sicknasty tantrum on land, and when Gamzee miracles his way upright again, grinning and grinning and grinning, the lusus squalls and launches itself at him with both claws snapping. "Hell yes, my motherfucker," he says, dancing out of the way with a laugh. "Hell motherfucking yes."

"Uh, why does this always happen?!" Tavros yells from the door, as Crabdad slams past Gamzee and rams headfirst into the wall, scrabbling and gouging new holes as it scuttles around to face him again. "How do you always end up pissing gente off?!"

Gamzee cackles.

"Um, that's really not an answer, I think!"

Crabdad rises up to its full height, up onto tipclaws, even, the bony plates of its carapace and the sharp points of its spines scraping the ceiling as it gives up on skulking and screeches another challenge, but when it charges Gamzee just spins to the side, and with all its bulky armor and heavy claws, the lusus again has to wind itself up before it can launch another attack in the right direction.

Or at least Gamzee thinks that, but his thinkpan's alive with excitement, trawling through the hive with tendrils of mania that he can't as quite control, seeking out any sign of the mind he's got a pining for. The disappointment doesn't hit as hard as it could when he realizes Crabdad's the only poor motherfucker in the hive - because Crabdad is here and not fraudulent in the least bit, which can only mean Karkat's nigh.

But while he's thinking those thoughts, Crabdad's thinking others, and Gamzee doesn't get the warning he should before the lusus tramples him from the side, hauling shell to barrel him over and pin him with chittering jaws that snap close an inch from his cartilage nub. Startled and blinking, Gamzee lays claws on the motherfucker's head nubs before it can close the gap, spit and the scent of rotting seafood hot on his face as Crabdad skree his frustration.

Then Tavbro rolls into the side of the giant crab with a creak of metal being treated most unkind, and Crabdad raises its head to skree right in the brownblood's face. Looking sour-sore, Tavros puts his claws to his head and frowns until, with a chitter of surprise, the cangrejo rears back, banging its pincers against its pale skull like that'll knock Tav's lusus mojo clean out of it. It steps away from them, knocking into the sofa as it stumbles and chirrs in confusion.

Gamzee sits with his elbows propping him up and his legs splayed out to wink at Tavros, and the other troll goes flustered all over. "Um, r-really, Gamzee, why do you always cause, uh, trouble? I mean, wow, I'm sure there was a better way to break into someone's house without, you know, making some poor lusus mad."

"That's how I motherfucking roll, brother," Gamzee says, smiling and knocking a claw on the wheel of Tav's chair.

(And a touch is all he needs to know it, all the loose screws and weak points where the tire has worn thin, and all it would take is a flick to fuck this motherfucker up but good. He's done it before, gotten his under motherfucking standing on as to what all it would take to make a motherfucker break, to things and bodies far bigger than a tiny little scrap of metal like this. Moons, buildings, bodies, minds - all of them can be destroyed, can be laid to motherfucking waste.

But not now, not now.

Not. Motherfucking. Yet.)

"S just how it goes," he finishes, a second and an age later, and if his smile's more crook than curl, and if Tav don't heed that, well...

"You're, um, awful. I mean - uh, yeah, that is absolutamente the word for it," Tavros says, but he totally doesn't mean it this time, his smile reluctant but un-motherfucking-deniable, an impish twitch like as he gets when he's about to lay down some strict ass rhymes. Tav could never stay mad at any brother for long.

Not even when a brother deserves it.

"Aw, Crabdad was just making with greetings, you feel?" Gamzee says, shrugging. At the sound of its name the lusus's head jerks up, fast and alert and beady eyed; Tavros winces and has to close his eyes to keep the custodian still. "Or maybe it don't remember. Ain't a bother to me." There's plenty as don't remember him.

Oh, but they will.

"Él -" Tavros starts; then he gnaws on his lip with pinprick teeth, one hand mussing at his hair as he chews and furrows his brow at Crabdad. "Uh. Oh man. That's, uh, not normal - oh no!"

That's all by way of warning Tav gets out, but Gamzee's got miracles to spare; he kicks up backwards, balanced on his elbows and his feet hanging overhead, to avoid the wicked laser beam that erupts from Crabdad's pincer. It's white outlined with red, like blood the color of a punchline, a beam of energy that fizzles out against the ground leaving behind a scorch mark, and Gamzee can't stop laughing, hard enough that his stomach cramps and he nearly faceplants.

"I'm, um, pretty sure that's not funny! Gamzee!" Tavros says, rolling backwards as fast as his wheels can carry him. Both of Crabdad's claws start charging up for another sprite blast, spheres of light that flicker in and out before deciding on more red-white plasma. Gamzee just keeps laughing, because this is a better joke than even the one about the seadweller and the sushi bar. And that's a motherfucking tough one to follow. "Gamzee! Estúpido! Please don't zone out on me!"

Gamzee raises a hand and waves it, flippant, until Crabdad makes up its mind and rounds on him again instead of Tavros, screeching as it jabs a pincer back toward the front door. Gamzee doesn't need Tav to translate the really loud GET OUT. Ahaha, motherfuck, has he missed this! "We're here to see Karkat, my main crabbro," he drawls, holding out his claws all beseech like. "You know where he's motherfucking at? K-a-r-motherfucking-kat?"

Crabdad chirrs, suspicious, and shoves a claw full of laser at Gamzee's face. But he smiles, and smiles, and -

The pincer jerks to a stop, the sharp edge crackling with ectoboom, just before Gamzee's nose.

Another questioning chirr, closer to a chirp than a screech.

"Karkat," Gamzee confirms. "My best friend, you feel me?" And he leans forward, ever-smiling, just enough that his nose bumps against the claw.

(Crabdad's weak point is a crack in its shell, a soft indent at the back of its neck where the carapace has cracked and not healed right, and this is a knowing that Gamzee keeps tucked away, on account of Karkat would not get his appreciate on if Gamzee were to break what couldn't be fixed.)

The sprite blast dies off, and Gamzee grunts as Crabdad lunges and hauls him up, holding him at claws' length to inspect him. Gamzee's tall enough that his feet still scoot along the floor, and he hangs limp and laughing, letting his head loll back to smile at Crabdad's craggy face. And maybe, just a little, he leaks delirious joy, because this house smells like Karkat, every inch of it, and how could he not spread the joy when at last, at last, Karkat's near?

It is possible he's laying it on a little heavy, though, because Crabdad's response is a piercing, ululating screech of happiness. It trills as it gives Gamzee one last shake as to reprimand him for giving it one wicked scare, and hauls him into a crushing hug. Tavros hovers in the periphery of his vision, looking torn between wheeling closer and rolling out the door - but, in the end, he stays where he is, brown eyes pretty and bright in the dark of the overturned living room. Meanwhile, Gamzee hugs back, patting the line of Crabdad's neck just above the spines - does he smile.

And oh -

- :o)

---

One Day Later

Karkat had one fucking job.

And he fucking blew it.

He blew it out of existence and then pissed on the radioactive, bombed out remains.

What kind of moirail misses something like this?

Literally his only consolation is that everyone else of any fucking significance in this charade missed it, too. And by consolation, ahaahaaa, he means what the actual fuck was wrong with all of them. It makes Karkat want to run outside and scream from the highest available cliff, and then usher all of them over the edge like a herd of lemmings on a suicidal dare. All of them had a piece of the picture, but all the most damning evidence ended up locked away in John's head, or brazenly concealed by Samuel's incredible one-human impersonation of an upstanding member of society. And because of that, no one seems to know exactly how broken John is.

Not even Karkat.

They have to shave part of John's hair off to open up his skull, and then extract the mindgrub, and by the time the procedure is over (sometime in the middle of the night) and Karkat glares and shouts his way into the room where they've set John up to recover post-op, that realization is almost enough to stop Karkat in his tracks. John's dark skin almost has a greyish cast to it, stark against the cot's white sheets, and half his head is wrapped round in bandages with his cowlicks all matted down into surrender, and no, actually, Karkat is not prepared to deal with this. He thought he was, after fretting himself sick through the lingering, drawn out hours of the one Scratch kid's surgery and then John's, which felt like it took twice as long as the first.

He's not. He's really, really fucking not.

But the dumbass who helps Karkat get through the things he's not prepared to deal with is lying there, hooked up to a fresh IV drip, and so Karkat does the only thing he physically can do. He creeps closer, walking on tipclaws despite the fact that he doubts a fucking giant rogue lusus rampaging through a china shop could walk John up right now. The closer he goes, the more he can make out the frown lines that crease John's forehead even in his sleep, the exhausted bags under his eyes that would be more suited to Karkat's own face in the mirror, the place where, at some point in Samuel's attack, his teeth tore up part of his lip and left a swollen sore. They finally got all the blood off his face while he was being prepped for surgery, but Karkat can almost feel the echo of it on John's skin when he presses a palm to his cheek, like the blood left tracks down John's face that only Karkat's powers make him sensitive to.

Dave asked him at some point, during the blurry period between Karkat getting shunted out of John's mind by the Trickster and Harley's timely arrival with a fuckton of drugs, how Karkat knew that shit was going down with the Egberts.

Karkat himself didn't think his sense of blood could extend far enough to sense people bleeding at a distance unless he made an actual fucking effort to reach out. In the race to reach John before anyone could die, Karkat hadn't given much thought to the fact that, even before the intervention by the future Dave, aka the nookstain from futurehell, Karkat had felt irritable, prowling around the room as though waiting for John to speak with his human custodian in a generic office wasn't a completely normal occurrence. John and his guardian have had their bizarre talky human relationship for literally as long as Karkat has known the two of them.

Now Karkat feels a sinking sensation in his digestive sac as he starts to suspect that he might have sensed, on some subconscious level, John bleeding from literally every orifice on his face.

Which is a whole new level of fucked up, even for Karkat.

He keeps his hands on John's face for a while, though John's not awake to be shooshpapped, and soon Karkat finds himself smoothing at the creases between John's eyebrows, massaging the tense, fluttering muscles along his jaw and temples until they ease, careful with his claws as he traces the tender skin of closed eyelids. A few times his claws catch on tiny clots of dried blood that didn't get cleaned off, and Karkat scrapes them off with a single-minded determination; soon he's combing through John's hair as delicately as his ham-handed self can manage, unknotting tangles and fluffing cowlicks until the half of John's head that isn't covered in bandages almost looks like his normal, flyaway mess.

So single-minded, in fact, that he doesn't notice the chair until it nudges at the backs of his locked-up knees and he nearly rocks forward. He shakes himself out of his daze of shooshing with effort, scowling weakly over his shoulder, only to see that it's just a chair - one of the rolling ones from an office, one that was definitely not fucking behind him five seconds ago. In fact, it's still drifting a little, like someone gave it a push and it's trundling along on that momentum. But no one else has entered the room.

Only one person wouldn't have needed to.

Grudgingly, Karkat sighs, sits down, and resigns himself to the fact that Harley might not be such a complete disaster of a human being, after all.

(At least they all know better than to try to talk to him about the Trickster until John's awake. Karkat's busy compartmentalizing all that, and he'd hate to have to shit down some unsuspecting asshole's neck for bringing up what he's too leery and jumpy and twitchy to think about.)
At some point during the day, one of them was bound to end up on the Internet. This is because, in spite of the ongoing panic and the urgent rush to get everyone else in the lab scanned and cleared for duty, certain people out of the young humans and trolls gathered in this place are, as it turns out, fucking Internet-addicted pustules of easily distracted mucus who can't keep their twitchy fingers off their phones for longer than five fucking seconds at a time.

It's Dave. He's talking about Dave. Karkat doesn't even know where that fuckmarble finds the time to browse around on local news sites, but fuck, he's the shithead of time! That probably explains how he manages the constant stream of useless dumbfuckery he gets up to. Karkat doesn't know how he keeps forgetting that annoying little fact.

Anyway. Rose, Karkat, and Kanaya are minding their own fucking business, holding vigil over the bedside of John, Dirk, and Jane (but mostly John), while Harley's off bouncing through an MRI scanner. Dave barges into the room from fuck only knows where - it's not Karkat's job to keep track of where he fucks off to, okay? - and his mouth is already in motion before the door shuts behind him. "Hey Rose. Rose. You busy?"

Rose looks up; Karkat, try as he might to ignore Dave's ramblings, looks up too, if only because he'll take any shot he can get to have a target for a decent scowl. "Yes, Dave, I was actually in the midst of deep meditations," Rose says gravely, "ruminating on the presentiments of what is to come."

"Cool, so listen," Dave says, holding up his phone without pausing to let Rose breathe. "Remember how I was joking and bullshitting Bro about us being called terrorists and then he got unrighteously pissed because he can't take a joke that doesn't involve puppets?"

...No conversation that opens on that note is one Karkat wants any part in. Unfortunately, his thinkpan is a perverse and contrary pile of hoofbeast shit, and the more Karkat silently prays to be spontaneously struck deaf, the keener his hearing seems to become. That, or to make up for his muteness during the first half of his visit, Dave has fucked with his collar so that it's now capable of breaking the sound barrier.

Karkat will bet money he doesn't have it's the latter. "What the fuck are you on about now, asshole?" he asks, palming his face and mashing the heel of his hand against one eye. There's a lingering headache that won't go away, and his muttered complaining had only made Rose look at him with alarm no matter how much he tried to convince her it was just from the excessive amounts of 'I'm fucking done' compressed into such a tiny thinkpan.

Dave just looks at him. Or at least, Karkat feels like he's being watched. The obnoxious douche shades are in the way, as usual. Dave has two settings, asshole and douchebag, and this look is neither of those, which is just fucking unsettling. "Don't worry about it."

"Well, of course I'm not going to fucking worry about it now, shithead, since you've just completely assuaged every possible concern your mention of the word 'terrorist' might have stirred up in the frothing primordial hateooze of my fermenting pan, Dave!" The sarcasm cap on paradox space has to be specifically lifted just to deal with his generous contribution to the cause.

Dave, of course, continues to be Dave. That is to say, an insensitive garbageheap given life by some idiotic god who went overboard on the essence of douchebag when they were shitting out the universe. "Dude. Chill."

"Dave," Rose says, her voice pitched to carry. Karkat's mouth snaps shut on whatever he was about to yell – he had something suitably enraged all ready to let fly, but then his eyes dart back to John's face and he loses it again. "What was it you came to tell me?"
Rose has been writing in a notebook for nearly an hour, exchanging whispers and sidelong glances with Kanaya every so often, but Karkat's been too busy counting and recounting the number of joints on John's fingers, a nerve-soothing tap-dance that helps keep him sane, to muster up to the will to guess what those two are plotting. Now, she closes it and lays her purple-ink pen aside, turning her full attention to Dave - or faking it well enough that Karkat can't tell the fucking difference - with her eyebrow quirked.

Dave waves his phone again. "Seriously, I'm not making shit up. There's problems."

"Show me," Rose commands, rolling her chair away from John's bedside and rising as Dave shuffles over to hold the phone screen up. Their hair is two different shades of blonde, Dave's skating close to albino white, but with their heads together like that Karkat can see the weird, uncanny human sibling resemblance. Kanaya joins them around the phone, looking politely interested, and Karkat casts one last reluctant glance at his and John's interlaced grey-and-brown crisscross of fingers and claws, and John's dumb sleeping face, before admitting defeat and detaching himself. He tries to be discreet and peer around Kanaya's side, but from this angle the screen's colors look undersaturated, and too greyed out from lack of contrast for Karkat to make out details.

The video Dave's decided to subject them to starts playing, the sound quality of the audio disturbingly realistic compared to the tinny whine Karkat's craptastic phone usually vomits out, and Karkat listens with unwilling interest as he shuffles to peek between Rose and Kanaya instead. The voice sounds familiar, but Karkat has to place it first. He finally recognizes it; it's one of the local reporters for KOMO 4, a tealblood whose been dyeing the teal sheen of age out of her hair for probably longer than Karkat's been alive. But her horns are long and twisty and her eyes stained enough from pupations past that no one is fooled. No one with half a sponge, anyway.

"-before the postponed press release Monday evening, Mayor Brinner released a statement in which she announced that she would not be able to attend the conference in person, for reasons which remain unclear -"

"Are there issues with your mayor's health?" Kanaya asks. Karkat belatedly realizes that he's the only Seattle native conscious in this entire room, and is the expected authority on this kind of shit.

He has to disappoint her, though. "Fuck, I know about as much about Brinner as anyone in town - fuck all. I don't think the woman's even been seen since she was elected, and half the time they can't reach her for comment, either. The fact that they got something from her is the weirdest news I've heard all day."

"I thought she still gave speeches for the Fourth of July parade," Rose says, absently, her lips parted as she frowns at something on the screen.

Karkat snorts. "Not in years. I can't remember what she looks like, anymore -"

"Sssssshut up," Dave hisses, batting his hand around like he's reaching to smack Karkat in the face, but he doesn't move to look behind him, so it misses by a mile. "God damn we do not know when to shut up. Like, this is a collective issue we all need to work on. Oh my god. Now I'm doing it."

As though to prove his point, of course, the door opens (slowly, rather than with the usual bang) and Jade peeks her head in, blinking at them all owlishly from behind her glasses when she sees them all bunched together like a cluster of concentrated grubfisting asininity. "Whatcha watching?" she asks, scratching her head.

"- but that she supports the FVRT in whatever measures they may choose to take, with the full cooperation of the Seattle PD. This seemed to come as a surprise to the police chief, who before yesterday hadn't previously received word from the mayor's office on the subject -"

"What the fuck are we watching?!” Karkat demands, screeching when Dave bats at him again. "I'll kick you in the shameglobes, so fucking help me!"

"Oh, so it's thataak kind of meeting." Jade rolls her eyes and joins them on Dave's far side, raising her glasses and squinting at the monitor by John before shrugging. "Well, as long as John's still okay, and there's not something spooky going on! You guys had me worried for a second!"

She snaps one of the new, colorful rubber bands she's taken to tying around her fingers, and Karkat can already tell that's gonna get really old, really fast. Worse yet, she keeps giving him these looks when she snaps one. He'd give her a sarcastic standing ovation for the fact that she's kept interaction between the two of them to a tolerable minimum while John's out cold, but the furtive looks are getting on Karkat's oversensitive nerves.

"- call for the mayor to speak publically after the rather drastic tone of the press release, in light of what some are calling a 'vigilante free-for-all' that played out near the Seattle Needle in broad daylight yesterday -"

That shuts everyone up. Karkat almost chips a tooth with how hard his teeth clamp together, and in a rare communal moment of 'oh god, this is going to be bad,' all five of them stare at the screen.

Sure enough, the reporter does not disappoint. She shuffles her papers and pulls stern newscaster sympathy face #25, the one that means she could really give no shits about any of this. "The FVRT representative, Detective Ace Dick, insisted that a policy of zero tolerance concerning vigilant justice be enforced until the recent spate of gang violence can be brought back under control by police. According to him, this way the FVRT will be able to assess the allegations that these bombings have been acts of villainous terrorism, free from distractions, and make an official ruling on where the investigation should go from there -"

Dave, unconscionably, snickers. "His name is the best part of the whole thing," he says, as gleeful as someone with the humor of a thirteen-year-old in raptures.

"- which will certainly put a damper on the activities of such well-known local vigilante heroes as Heir of Breath, who has maintained a friendly working relationship with Seattle's police force for years" - Karkat somehow knows what's coming next, his stomach clenching even before the words come out of the reporter's mouth - "and Hemogoblin, who just recently came under suspicion himself due to an irregular, highly-criticized investigation of the circumstances surrounding the bombing of the downtown police station -"

"WILL YOU ALL LET THAT DIE?!" Karkat shrieks, lunging for the phone. Dave flashsteps it out of the path of Karkat's paroxysm of rage before he can peel the screen off with his bare claws, and before Karkat can lunge again Jade and Kanaya both grab him by an arm each and reel him back so that his flailing kick hits nothing. Both of them being disgustingly strong, Karkat nearly tears his arms off trying to pull free.

"I think I remember John messaging me about that incident," Rose says, totally missing the point as she stands a fixed point in the middle of their antics. Her lips purse, and she taps a finger on them before nodding. "Ah. That would have been before he knew your identity as Hemogoblin, of course. Something about being accused of arson, at least."

"Karkat, you're fucking hardcore, holy shit," Dave says, sounding absolutely fucking delighted, because Dave is an asshole.
"IT WASN'T ME!" Karkat wants to throw up his hands or possibly kick Dave in the face, but of course he's being fucking restrained. Dave's expression has transformed into an admiring little smirk, and it's not fair that he can be such a douchebag and Karkat can't hurt him for it. Not even a little. "GOD FUCKING DAMMIT, WERE YOU BORN WITH AN EMPTY CAVERN WHERE YOUR BRAIN SHOULD BE?"

"I don't think even Bro has been accused of arson, I mean - I mean, vandalism and destruction of public property, yeah, but setting shit on fire - that's just one step beyond, you know?"

"I'LL SET YOU ON FUCKING FIRE, YOU WITHERED EXCUSE FOR A RUTABAGA!"

"Dave, will you shut your piehole for a sec?" Jade says, grunting and planting her feet when Karkat starts writhing in incoherent rage. He twists and, in a moment of clarity that cuts through the red haze of fury, tries to squirm his way out of her hold like he would if he'd been grabbed by some criminal while out on patrol. She readjusts her grip without giving an inch; Kanaya, on the other side of him, is more grounded than a chunk of granite. "Jeez!"

"Snrlgf."

Karkat freezes.

Dave loses the smirk, finally, and stares at Rose, looking lost. "What."

Rose arches an eyebrow, disapproving. "Pardon?"

"What did you say. I did not catch that. It was probably some longass fancy word telling me how much of an ass I'm being, but literally it sounded like a keyboard smash."

Rose's eyebrows climb even higher. They may not be as thick as Dave's, but that's the measure of true power, right there. "I didn't say anything, brother dear. Though now that you mention it, might I suggest you curb your more antagonistic impulses until ."

"Krrr?"

Karkat, who stopped paying attention to all this stupidity when he realized who was actually talking, is already staring at the bed when John lifts his head, squinting at them. It's the other four dumb shits in the room who have yet to catch on. "John," he says, and if it sounds quiet and small, that's because he was shouting ten seconds ago and his ears are still ringing from that. Not for any other reason whatsoever.

"Whyrr shoutin'?" John lifts an arm, and consternation creases his features when the IV drip keeps him from finishing the motion. "Augh. Hey everyone."

Kanaya releases Karkat before Karkat himself is even fully aware of it, and he thinks she might also be the one who puts a hand on Jade's shoulder and does - something - that causes Jade to make a tiny 'oh!' of comprehension and let go, too. But his focus narrows from being frustrated with everyone in this room and with life in general to John and that puts a limit on the number of other things Karkat registers. His first priority is striding past Rose and pushing John's hand back down against the bed before the dumb stupid idiot can pull out the IV and start bleeding all over the place.

"Jde?" he says. Jade perks up, leaning closer to the bed than Karkat's instincts like, but she keeps her hands clasped together, fingers laced so that her latest act of weirdness in the form of bright rubber bands is exposed along her knuckles. "Sorry about. Th'thing." John tries to raise his hand again, probably to pantomime some kind of explanation, but Karkat hauls his hand back down. "Strangly thing."
"Oh!" Jade blinks and waves a hand, her gesture dismissive but her expression anxious and jubilant all at once as she smiles at John. "No biggie! I've had worse!"

(They very strategically fail to inform John about the news broadcast.)

(But it doesn't stop those other assholes from exchanging looks when they think Karkat can't see.)

Rose tells them all that the Trickster is still around, but that it fucked off after she and John set it on fire. Dave gives her a thumbs up, Jade laughs her fool head off, and Kanaya, who never experienced the Trickster firsthand, just nods her approval of the strategic use of fire.

Karkat feels like he's the only one who's not the least bit reassured by this. But that's not true, he thinks, because Rose looks ill when she says it, and when Doctor Lalonde catches his eye next he could almost swear he sees the same kind of anxious nausea there that won't stop churning in his stomach whenever he thinks about that psycho candy dipshit. Just remembering how casually evil that thing was makes Karkat's skin crawl, and he kind of curls up with his head buried against John's side, twitching and jittering until John falls back asleep and the reassuring headpats stop.

The worst part of this whole shitstorm is that the next real words out of John's mouth - the first fucking words - when he wakes up from another slow doze hours later, are, "I'm'srry, Karkat. R'lly sorry."

The second words are some refrain of, "I'm sorry I messed up," and just because they're less drug-slurred and more coherent this time around doesn't mean Karkat doesn't burst out into fucking tears. In front of witnesses, no less - Jade and Roxy and a couple of asshole interns, all four of whom just so happen to be in the room while Karkat's trying not to have a fucking meltdown and failing miserably. Jade picks at her rubber bands and chatters bright nonsense with Roxy and John that Karkat's too soggy to pay attention to. But she succeeds in distracting John so that he stops slurring and trying to reassure Karkat with things like "I'm sorry! Again!" that really don't help in this particular context at all. Roxy's only in the room because Dirk and Jane are both laid up on cots opposite John's, but she inserts herself into the babbling conversation with slurred enthusiasm until, between the two of them, she and Jade talk John into exhaustion once more.

At least after John's dozed off again, Karkat has an opening to excuse himself to pitch a bawling fit, in a nice dark lab where no one can see him royally lose it.

All the resistance he's built up since his recent attempt to outdo the world record for being sleepless in Seattle crumbles, and he has to sprint the last few yards before he starts clawing at the walls. He seizes the first inanimate thing he sees once the door shuts behind him - a plastic rack meant for holding test tubes upright - and flings it at the wall, strung so tense with echoes of terror and worry and anger that he barely notices when his ribs start aching again, phantom pangs of warning as he smashes up a fume hood and an entire row of empty, dust-strewn cabinets.

By the time he does wind down, every panting breath a hiccup, Karkat feels numb. Not soothed, because there's only one person who could do that for him right now, but as though he's just...stopped. He's run out of energy to fuel any more of this tantrum and he can only stand there for a moment to regain his balance. He notices that the knuckles of one hand are bleeding after a second of forced clarity; he hastily stems the flow of blood, his pulse still throbbing in his ears like a memory of burst eardrums, and then sees the overturned cabinet with the shattered glass front where he doesn't remember shoving it.
Good. Fucking perfect. Glad to know he got that out of his system. If only he could do the same for all this bitter sarcasm stopping up his throat.

Except, of course, when he walks out, having left some poor fuck’s abandoned work station worse for the wear, the last person he wants to catch him in the hall is Kanaya. Jade, Dave - he's flipped out in front of both those annoying pissbuckets before, and he's starting to get resigned to it. So what. Karkat is a fucking hysteric, this is news to pretty much no one, ever.

But he's been trying to keep his shit together in front of Rose and Kanaya. Rose because she's fucking tolerable, even after prolonged exposure, and Kanaya because, well -

He knows for a fact she's the KM from that pisspoor excuse for a list Spades Slick managed to scrounge up - knows it in his bones, looks at her and knows with utter certainty that they've met before, a constant déjà vu that fucks him up in a really subtle, freaking-out-internally kind of way because a) it never fucking turns off, and b) Kanaya herself shows absolutely no signs of ever admitting this chronic déjà-fuckery has been bothering her, too. Which means it could just be Karkat being a freak, as usual.

So when Karkat steps outside the door, his hair a tangled, matted wreck from being torn at and one of his teeth wobbling loose from the force he needed to clamp down on screams in a lab full of paranoid scientists, he groans and nearly marches right back in for round two of his marathon freak out session. "Fuck me sideways with a rusty sickle," he says in a weary rush, not loud or forceful enough to qualify as a growl. It's mostly a token greeting/an acknowledgement of his myriad failings as a rational being on every conceivable level, and he doesn't expect a response. He doesn't want a response, with the mood he's in.

"That really does not sound hygienic. Or comfortable," Kanaya says, with an imperturbable expression. She and Rose have clearly been fuck deep in each other's pockets for way too fucking long, because their straight-faced sense of humor is tuned to permanently verbose snark, and it's obvious that they're doing it on purpose. "Perhaps you should reconsider your choice of implement."

She pauses, but not long enough for Karkat to snap at her. "Ah. You're being rhetorical. I am beginning to catch on to the quirks of your abrasive oratory. Unless you intended to proposition me."

"God, why," Karkat says, burying his face in his claws. "No. I'm sorry. I'm going to fucking crawl back into my dark corner now, thanks." He's not sure he's embarrassed by any of this - he's managed to permanently insert his foot into his shoutgaper where Kanaya's concerned, and the persistent humiliation of being a complete, socially maladjusted cretin just reminds Karkat of how awful he's always been at making friends who aren't John.

And ha! Fucking ha! Look at how well he held up his end of that relationship! How did he not see - Snarling, Karkat wheels around before he starts rolling around on the floor like a wriggler throwing a hissy, shrieking fit.

Kanaya seizes him in a chokehold, and carts him off before Karkat processes this completely unanticipated turn of events. It's not a gentle tug, either; Kanaya fucking yanks when he drags his heels, and he finds himself stumbling along off-kilter in her wake to keep from getting choked out.

"What," he says, stating his point as eloquently as he ever does, "the fuck?"

"You're being a menace to yourself and your surroundings."

His don't-be-a-total-asshole filter rips itself out of his brain and absconds for Vegas. "Well, fuck, I wouldn't have guessed if you hadn't told me!" Karkat says, the sarcasm so thick it's not even sarcasm anymore. It's a mournful, agonized howl of existential despair. He starts kicking in earnest, trying to sidetrack them, but Kanaya's taller than him, with what he suspects is the unparalleled ability to kick ass of a rainbow drinker, and not even stabbing her would slow her down, if Dave is to be believed.

"You will desist or I will assist you in desisting."

...Yeah, okay, Karkat is a huge fucking nerd, and he recognizes the Malachite Sylph's usual pre-auspicizing spiel. He sighs and goes limp, crossing his arms and glowering up when she pauses and raises an eyebrow at him. "I'm not about to fucking swandive into the deep end of the empty concrete pool," he mutters, not able to meet her eyes. "Just fuck off and let me handle it. I'm fine."

He's not the one who had a brainwashing grub in his head for fucking years, or a custodian who put him through such an isolating, abusive mindfuck that he went insane trying to deal with it, or who had that insanity congeal into some shithive maggotbrained trickster with a permanent hardon for unsuspecting trolls. He's just the fucking leaky-panned shithive excuse for a moirail who didn't do anything to stop it.

"Yes, of course you are," Kanaya says, watching him. "But you are also currently dealing with the temporary incapacitation of your moirail."

"So fucking what?" Karkat snorts, worrying at the loose tooth with his tongue in a perverse, moody sort of way, like fucking with a tooth until it pops out will somehow improve the quality of his life right now. "Look at me. I'm dealing with it. By myself."

Kanaya's expression turns a lot more readable. In fact, her message is written so clearly on her face that Karkat's disturbed to see that the words That is such fucking bullshit haven't miraculously inscribed themselves across her forehead in bright red flashing letters. "We are engaging in the preliminary stages of platonic amity. Humor me," she says, rolling her eyes.

Karkat has to start walking again when Kanaya strides off down the hallway. "...You. Want to be friends?" he says, suspicious.

"I have come to the conclusion that you are a very angry, very loud troll," she says. Karkat nods, because...yeah, pretty much. "However, I have also come to the conclusion that you possess qualities that may make you suitable for friendship despite your insistence on shouting at everyone in your immediate vicinity. So yes. We might as well give it a shot."

Karkat squints at her. Because he's about, oh, one hundred fucking percent sure that he has about as many redeeming, friendship-inducing qualities as a bucket full of pimple ooze and the kind of intestinal armageddon unleashed by ingesting dangerous quantities of sugarless gummy bears. John's always been a fucking fluke, and after all this fresh fuckery, Karkat has convinced himself that by the time John's fully recovered, he'll have come to his newly unbrainfucked senses and realized that trying to be moirails with Karkat is an exercise in self-inflicted masochism that no one deserves to put themselves through.

No one.

It only makes sense that Kanaya must think this is the best way to stop Karkat from acting like a stark raving lunatic in abandoned rooms full of expensive lab equipment. Some kind of twisted, hyper-advanced auspicism technique that wraps right back around to pretending the irritation is friendship. Accepting this logical conclusion makes Karkat relax and shrug in resignation. "Whatever," he says. He wants to sound derisive, so she knows he's not fooled, but his voice keeps fucking him over today, and it comes out a tired, miserable mutter.
With a sigh of what might be exasperation - yeah, it's probably exasperation - Kanaya hauls him into a room and sets him down, unlooping her arm from its chokehold and walking away. Karkat rubs his neck needlessly (it's not even sore) and looks around.

Someone has converted this room into some kind of fabric-strewn mecca, and Karkat is thrown by the sight of an actual literal sewing machine in the middle of one of the repurposed lab counters because - fuck, there is a lot of random nubgrinding miscellaneous crap lying around the storage rooms here, but a sewing machine?!

Worse still, he recognizes the two long, rectangular mirrors propped up on the wall - because if you stuck the two halves together, they'd be the same shape and length as the mirror from the communal ablutions block closest to the lobby of Lalonde Labs. He hasn't been there in a while, but fuck, this is just blatantly and Kanaya is not allowed to talk about vandalizing lab property.

"What," Karkat says. It gets his point across.

Kanaya digs through a duffle bag at the base of one of the mirrors. "I left most of my supplies here before we left for the house," she says, holding up a small case. She shakes it before opening it, and inspects the contents. "Hmm. No. I thought, perhaps -"

"Perhaps what?" Karkat steps around a skein of floaty green fabric, inching through the maze of fabric and almost paralyzed by the certainty that if he steps on something Kanaya could probably rip the offending foot off.

Kanaya sets the case aside and straightens, inspecting him with a grave stare. Karkat huddles up before he can help himself, because he reacts to scrutiny almost as badly as Dave 'Asshole' Strider does - by getting defensive. Prolonged staring, big surprise, tends to set off his paranoid little fuckwaffle instincts. "Occasionally I wear contact lenses to conceal my own eyes," she says, and it's so far from what Karkat expected her to say that he fumbles to keep up. "Jadebloods tend to attract unsolicited attention in the streets. But I only brought the one pair, and I've used them before. It would be unspeakably unsanitary. So I do hope you brought a spare pair for yourself, or we'll have to request that Dave donate his shades to the cause."

Just the mention of Dave is enough to sour Karkat's mood. He's petty that way. "Why?!" he demands, folding his arms and tucking his chin in a little into the collar of his hoodie.

Kanaya stills. "Karkat," she says, with a voice like someone trying not to aggravate a pissed off lusus. "You have been without contact lenses since yesterday evening. People will begin to notice."

A beat. Two. And then Karkat claps both hands over his eyes, sucking in air to screech because oh holy fuck -

"Scream, and someone will come looking to see what is wrong," Kanaya points out. And fuck her and her logical reason for him to not freak out. Karkat grinds his teeth and rubs his eyes, trying and failing to remember when or where or how his contact lenses could have possibly fallen out. What, did they just evaporate into thin fucking air?! He can't remember noticing his vision suddenly improving, on account of he's been crying so fucking much his eyes hurt regardless. Way to fucking sabotage himself, fucking fuck.

"Why didn't any of you limp fronded assholes warn me about this?!" he manages to force out at an acceptably low volume.

Kanaya sighs and starts digging through the bag again, pursing her lips. "Because at first, things were a little hectic. By the time I noticed, you three were all entering John's mind, and there wasn't an opportunity for a while after that. We couldn't have told you or removed you from John without risking you losing it even more publicly."

Karkat is starting to see things in the dark static behind his eyelids. "I didn't bring any extras. Fuuuuck!" Maybe now he just has an excuse to curl up in some convenient corner and close his eyes and pretend the world doesn't exist for a couple hours...or a few days...or weeks...

"I thought as much." Kanaya's voice comes from close bye, and the back of Karkat's thinkpan starts banging out an alarm on a bunch of tin cans like a stupid wriggler at the fact that he's alone in a room with someone and he can't see what they're doing. Fuck his paranoia; he cracks his eyes own reluctantly and removes his hands enough to peer between them, trying to figure out what Kanaya's doing now. "Dave's sunglasses?"

"I will smash them with my bare claws before those things touch my face," Karkat replies. Not the most rational answer, but it's the truth.

"Then we need to minimize the saturation as best we can." Kanaya walks toward him and inspects his face, her expression smooth as Karkat squirms. "Yes, I think I can manage this. It would help if they weren't so bright, though. Are they normally this luminescent in well-lit areas, or can you turn it off?"

Karkat blinks, and holds up a hand to his eye again, close enough that he can make out the faint red glow cast along the grey of his palm. And that...should not be happening. Like Kanaya says, troll eyes are only supposed to glow this much in the dark of night. "...I have no idea why they're doing that," he says, miserable. "What the fuck else could go wrong today? Wait. Don't answer that. Nothing you come up with could possibly top whatever my body or thinkpan decide to fuck up next."

"You are very creative," Kanaya says. Karkat can't decide if he wishes she'd try to prove him wrong or not. Instead, she brandishes a black case and a small stylus. "Try to focus your efforts on turning down the brightness while I try to dull the hue to something more acceptable by society's less than tolerating standards."

Karkat eyeballs the case with growing apprehension. "With what?"

The case clicks open under Kanaya's claw. "With makeup. Enough brown tones and purples, and we might be able to bring out darker notes so that you're less 'bright mutant red' and more 'particularly vivid burgundy,'" Kanaya says, swabbing at a square of dark brown powder. "Close one of your eyes, please."

Karkat gives the (really pointy, vaguely threatening) stylus another token glower - and then sighs, closing one eye and trying not to flinch out of his meatsack when Kanaya starts dabbing at the thin skin over his eye. "I'm putting my fucking ganderbulbs in your claws here, you know," he says, feeling his claws twist into a gnarled knot, trying to remember what it felt like to be holding John's hand, because he needs to stop twitching or he'll impale his eye on the makeup stylus all of his own volition.

Kanaya smiles at him. It's faint, and he sees it from a weird angle with only one eye open, but her eyes smile, too, like she means it. "We are engendering a true esprit de corps, Karkat. Now be a dear and stand still."

Talk about flying right out of the starting gate, flogging the rest of the hoofbeasts on the racetrack, and leaping straight over the finish line into a fucking hardcore friendship trust exercise, holy fuck. Karkat breathes in hard through his nose, digs his claws into the backs of his hands, and starts groping around with his powers for whatever weird fuckery they’ve caused this time.

After a while, his eye stops flinching every time Kanaya cakes another layer of makeup on top of it, and when she moves to start dabbing under his eyes, Karkat only has a few tics before it stops. "Don't forget to leave the massive fucking bags under there, or no one will buy it," Karkat mutters.

"Mmm. Good point."

(It vexes Kanaya to no end when, despite all her best efforts, Karkat's eyes come out the most disturbingly close to garish red-fuchsia he's ever seen them.)

(It does worse than vex Karkat. It makes his stomach tighten with a frisson of trepidation, because the gills along his sides are his business -)

(But put a pair of fake fins over his nubby ears, and he doesn't want to even think how weird a picture this would make.)

- By the time he leaves Kanaya with a quiet, returning Rose, and creeps back into the hospital room through hallways with most of the lights dimmed, there are two more bodies laid out on a cot on the Scratch kids' side of the room. But one of them is Roxy, and she's snoring raucously with no sign of the monitors and IV stands that accompany the other post-surgery humans in the room, so Karkat thinks she might have just passed out on the first available surface, oblivious to the fact that it's probably her turn to be degrubbed.

(But then, the neurology team probably needs to sleep, too, after half a day and a night and another day of brain surgery on multiple patients.)

It's certainly what he intends to do. The Roxy human has had an excellent idea and he's emotionally exhausted enough that he'd probably tell her that to her face if she were awake right now.

Dave looks up at him as Karkat stomps past, his face illuminated by the light of his phone screen and his shades a flat, unreadable screen. He ducks his head in a curt nod, and goes back to - whatever the fuck he's always doing on that thing. And. Fuck. If that dick's planning to keep his mouth shut for once, Karkat's not going to provoke him into changing his mind. He's too tired. He grabs the other chair instead, leaning his weight on it more than he should as he tugs it back around to the other side of the bed from where the last person dragged it. Ready for a night of cramped, hunched over snatches of sleep (because at this point, he couldn't leave John to find a recooperacoon if he tried), Karkat spins the seat around and goes to sit.

The chair yanks out from under his claw, and Karkat swallows back a yell of terror only because his butt hits something else instead of the ground. He whips around, nonplussed, and realizes his chair has been swapped out for an empty cot.

And a pair of bright green eyes blinks at him from the other side, as luminous with space powers as Karkat's were for some unknown reason earlier. Jade's squatting on the ground, the tips of her fingers tapping a sheepish beat out on the mattress before she smiles up at him. "There's something I have to tell you tomorrow, okay?" she says, fiddling with one of the rubber bands on her finger, again.

...Fuck it. "Yeah, fine. Whatever," Karkat says, shifting and glaring sourly at the bed under his butt until Jade shuffles off, humming something under her breath, into the hallway. He's almost self-conscious about lying down with Dave still in the room - but then he stops caring. He's too tired for this bullshit, and fuck, if Dave's here, that's just one more barely competent person to keep John's unconscious ass safe.

It takes more of the pressure off Karkat than he wants to admit. To avoid doing that, he curls up on his side, trying to avoid smearing makeup all over the pillow. He gropes out, blind because his eyes don't seem to remember how to stay open, now that he's let them fall mostly shut, and finally his claws catch John's near hand. The relief is immediate, loosening more of the knot in his chest until he can stop flinching and \textit{breathe}.

He holds John's hand until he stops seeing the dim glow of Dave's phone screen, and there's only black.

- (John's fingers have the right number of knuckles.)
- (And Karkat hates himself for the fact that he has to keep checking.)

\textit{Karkat dreams -}

Vaguely, Karkat thinks that he hasn't really dreamed in a while. Not the shitty dreams where people die, anyway. For the most part, it's just been repeats, his thinkpan replaying horrific shit over and over again because Karkat dwells on that kind of fuckery, okay? He doesn't know how to let it go.

But now, as he drifts, he's stubbornly convinced that the problem isn't that he isn't dreaming. It's that he \textit{can't wake up}. Someone put him back to sleep, someone who laughed, and told him it was too early, and sunk him back down into the flashing rainbow static. And ever since then, he hasn't been able to claw and scream his way into waking up.

This is such bullshit. He couldn't wake up his dreamself last time, either, and now, just when he got the hang of it -

But before he can finish that thought (or even pause to realize the implications of what he just said), Karkat feels something tug him further into dreaming, hauling him down with quiet insistency until he stops kicking and lets his eyes fall shut.

When he opens them, he's somewhere entirely new.

Which is really fucking ominous, because in his experience, new places in his dreams mean new ways for all his asshole human friends to die.

Karkat growls, and feels his shoulders hunch defensively as he glances down to make sure that he's in his own body, this time. Thank fuck, he is -

Then he blinks, and looks down again, raising his claws to inspect them with increasing trepidation. They're the claws of someone barely six sweeps old (sweeps? no, years, thirteen \textit{years} old, what is he remembering?), blunt and nubby and gnawed on by sharp teeth. Karkat broke himself of that fucking habit years ago, for fuck's sake, because sometimes he'd run out of clawkeratin to chew on and absentmindedly start chewing his fingers, which was just plain fucking dangerous if he bit too deep in public.

Oh god what the fuck. Now \textit{he's} thirteen?
There is no way this ends well. Thirteen year olds in dreams tend to die a lot - if he's joined their ranks, the remainder of his lifespan probably just got trimmed to a matter of minutes.

"I do not like this place. Perhaps it would have been more prudent to wait for the others."

"Nah, that would have been thuch a wathte of time. Let'th jutht find the dipthhit and get out."

Karkat looks up, and oh god Kanaya's deaged, too. She and another troll stand near him, all three members of the group in their awkward thirteen year old phase (and why does his stupid pan keep trying to autocorrect that to six sweeps?), all of them more than a little worse for the wear. Kanaya's in a pink, floral sundress with long white gloves and a white Virgo sign across the front, her eyes an anonymous grey, her cheeks still round enough that her future cheekbones are only a suggestion on a child's face. The massively oversized chainsaw in her claws looks even more oversized because she's so much shorter than usual.

He knows the name of the other troll even before Kanaya says, reprovingly, "Sollux -"

And the sight of Sollux Captor mashes all the déjà vu buttons in Karkat's thinkpan so hard that he reels internally, unable to react because it seems this is one of those dreams where he barely has any autonomy over his own actions. Sollux is taller than both Karkat and Kanaya, but hunched over so that it barely even counts. His shirt looks like it's been worn for over 600 hours, covered in the slime and gunk of strifing, to the point that the yellow symbol on the front is almost entirely obscured. He looks bored, more than anything, like whatever the fuck they're doing is a massive waste of his time but he's humoring them.

And what lodges in Karkat's chest, as he stares at Kanaya and Sollux, cannot be mistaken for anything other than that most despicable of all communicable troll diseases, the dreaded plague called friendship. It's kind of like grudging fondness mixed in with a heaping dollop of exasperation, fortified with the cautious trust that if he turns his back on them or bares his neck, they won't whip around and disembowel him with sharp claws or slit his throat with shredding horns.

Because the true measure of a friend is how much confidence you have that they won't kill you just for shits and giggles.

Wow. Fuck. That was morbid, even for Karkat.

They stand on the edge of a massive monochrome city; cathedrals and castles and towers rise up before them, glittering monoliths in shades of black and grey and white. All of them radiate a faint, pulsating white light, so that the excessive ornamentation along the walls and arches gleams garishly. The sky overhead is just as bad, burning a white so harsh that Karkat's eyes start to water and ache. Behind them is a black, monochrome plain, polished and featureless and without any kind of defensive cover. Karkat can just barely make out more towers in the distance across the obsidian field - another city. Off behind Sollux, pin wheeling gently and occasionally revolving until it has a different pattern, a violet spirograph gate hovers just a few yards above the ground, easily within jumping distance.

They're waiting on something, Karkat thinks. Or someone. But no matter how much he tries to suggest that his body, you know, fucking move, he just keeps standing in place, fidgety as fuck but unmoving. Finally he pulls out a weird looking phone, his claws moving on autopilot over an Alternian keyboard as he goes through the motions of opening up an app called Trollian.

-- carcinoGeneticist [CG] at 06:12:43 opened memo on board ERI DAN YOU FUCKING MORON IT'S TIME FOR THE EN DGAME -- CG: ERI DAN, WE'RE WAITING.
CG: WE ARE LITERALLY STANDING ON \( \text{"word_not_penetrable"} \) OR HOWEVER THE FUCK YOU SPELL THAT. RIGHT BY THE SPOIROGRAPH AND GUESS WHO'S NOT FUCKING HERE.

CG: GUESS, YOU FUCKING NO-SHOW NOOKSTAIN.

CG: OKAY HAS ANYONE HEARD FROM ERIDAN?

CG: YEAH, FUTURE ME HAS KIND OF SHIT THE COON WITH THE WHOLE MEMO THING, AND FOR THAT I HAVE SO MUCH FUCKING REGRET, BUT THIS IS SERIOUS.

CG: FEFERI, YOU'RE HIS FUCKING SERVER PLAYER, WHAT THE HELL DO YOU SEE ON YOUR SCREEN?

CG: AS FUN AS IT IS YELLING AT MYSELF ALL THE TIME, THERE IS A GIANT CHESTHEMED BONEBULGE THE SIZE OF YOUR FUCKING LUSUS WE STILL NEED TO TAKE CARE OF BEFORE YOU ALL ARE ALLOWED TO START DISREGARDING MY ORDERS, AND ERIDAN'S OFFICIALLY MISSED THE RENDEZVOUS RUMPUS.

-- cuttlefishCuller [CC] has joined the memo! --

CC: )(-ELLO!!!

CC: )(a)(a, sorry about t)(at, Crabcatc)(! I don't c)(eck t)(ese all t)(at often anymore!

CG: YEAH, THAT'S UNDERSTANDABLE. UNFORTUNATELY.

CG: COME ON, JUST SEND US A SCREENSHOT OF WHERE HE IS ON YOUR MAP SO WE CAN DRAG HIM OUT OF WHATEVER NOOK HE'S CRAWLED INTO.

CC: O)(, I'm sorry...but I )aven't reelly been able to see muc)( of anyt)(ing on -Eridan's client window for a w)(ile now, oops!

CG: WHY THE FUCK NOT?

CC: I stopped looking after )e tried to mess wit)( Sollux. )e's been a reel ass)(oal t)(ese past couple weeks, to be conknest!

CG: IF YOU SEE ANYTHING, TELL ME. WE DON'T HAVE A LOT OF TIME LEFT, HERE.

CC: All I can see on )ere is a bunc)( of brig)(t w)(ite lig)(t! It's pretty fis)(y, but I'll dolp)(initely keep wat)(cing in case somefin c)(anges!!! You'll be t)(e first to know! 38)

"Yeah, Feferi's got fuck all," Karkat announces, his mouth still framing the words while his thinkpan struggles to keep up with the weird turns this dream is taking. "Says she can't see anything but light."

"He'th juth thulking," Sollux insists, sounding like his tongue has been replaced by cotton balls or some shit. He sighs, tapping on the side of his weird two-toned glasses until he grimaces at something. "Oof. FF'th not kidding, though. That'th way too bright."

"He should have pestered someone by now," Kanaya says, shaking her head. "If only to feed his own need for dramatics. That no one has seen his dreamself either is -" She breaks off and stares uneasily at the nearest rampart, as though she expects something to launch itself at them the moment their backs are turned. There's an eerie stillness - a distinct absence that makes the younger Karkat shift his weight like he too is uneasy.

He's certain that it's not just this Eridan guy who's missing. This whole place is a ghost town, and the Karkat once removed from this younger version of himself thinks that this is a prime set up for all three tiny kid trolls to get gratuitously stabbed. He's not looking forward to it.

"I'm sure he's fine," he says, though Karkat has no control over the words coming out. And holy fuck he sounds like a ten year old with a chronic sore throat trying to sound angry and commanding, but failing fucking miserably. He wants to gag himself but his claws won't listen; he's just stuck following the motions. "He's probably fan-fucking-tastic, off having a pissparty all by himself in one of his douchebag castles with a bunch of dead angel corpses stacked up in a hipster throne like the genocidal moron he is. But if he's lording it over this hellhole, he's not helping on the Battlefield, so he can suck grubphlegm for all I care. We drag him out of here by his gills if we have to because I'm so fucking tired of this."

Kanaya looks at him, anxious. "If you require sleep -"

Karkat snarls. "Tired of this game. Sleep is for people who don't have the fucking endgame boss battle about to get served to them on a heaping nutrition plateau. Let's just get it over with." He starts walking.

Sollux has to have the last word, of course. "If you thay tho, KK, but I'm on the record ath thtating tht ith thupid."

Karkat glowers at him, all hundred-pounds-sopping-wet of him trying to be intimidating and once again faceplanting somewhere around petulant wriggler. This is embarrassing, and Karkat cringes while mini-him natters on. "I respect your right to have an opinion, but also your opinion doesn't fucking count, because you shithard wrigglers need a fucking dictator to keep you focused and oh look. I am that dictator. It's me."

He stomps onward into the city on that note, the black plain segmenting into dark, glittering cobblestones with lines of white grout between them. Kanaya falls into step beside him, her chin up and her grey eyes alert as she glances around, in sharp contrast to the way that Karkat puts his head down and pushes his way forward. Sollux falls behind, but then there's a crackle of red and blue neon light and the other troll catches up in seconds, levitating with psionics that make Karkat's hair stand on end with static.

The deeper they press into the maze of cathedrals and palisades, the more unsettled Karkat is, watching from behind his own eyes. He has no control and no way to defend this body if (when) the shit hits the rotating device. The streets are too still. He turns his head in tiny motions, bobs that let him catch glimpses of the walls and crenellations, but he can't tell if it's him or the thirteen year old wriggler Karkat who's following his own routine, oblivious to the older (and fucking wiser) Karkat dreaming behind his eyes. The gargoyle statues looming overhead resolve in weirdly sharp focus; a blink confirms that he's not wearing any contact lenses thick enough to obscure his vision to conceal his hemotype - fuck, he really is thirteen.

Huge gouges and scorch marks start to appear after a minute or so, marring a fuckton of the gleaming churches and castles crammed into the tiny space. Entire courtyards, when they walk past, stand piled full of felled arches and shattered stone, like some idiot went around taking pot shots at the buildings with a laser cannon. The sky burns steadily white, empty and clear, and that bothers Karkat. There's no way he could have murdered all of them -

All of who? But Karkat only gets that brief flash of insight before his body's wandering around of its own accord again.

But as though to answer his question, all three trolls flinch and scramble backward when a dark figure crashes through a fortification to their left and flails on the street before them. Kanaya raises her chainsaw and Sollux curses like a lispy sailor, and Karkat's autopilot has him drawing neon pink and green sickles before he's processed that at least thirteen-year-old him isn't slow on the draw.

But the creature doesn't lunge for them. It flops around on the cobblestones, whining and trilling nonsensical syllables of song that sound like a bird gargling water as it drowns. Its limbless body writhes like a snake, but feathery avian wings bat and flex as though the creature means to fly away, the feathers as black as the obsidian stone beneath their feet. It senses them in the next moment; or maybe by sheer coincidence, the creature rolls over and keens at them. It raises diamond-shaped eyes in a mournful stare; the tears that stream from the three bottom corners of its four-sided eyes are a thick, brilliant violet, not at all the watered-down tint of troll tears.
Then, with a final thrash, the bird-snake twists and the gaping hole blasted through its snake belly is exposed, before it crumples up and sags, a sad husk leaking violet tears and blood onto the channels in the street. Its elongated jaws snap shut on the last of the song.

"Oh come on!" Karkat says at last. Apparently this younger version of himself has different standards for what counts as really fucking weird and potentially lethal, because Karkat is more inclined to run the other direction, not march over and start prodding at the (hopefully) dead body with a sickle to investigate. "He really is still pulling this fuckery?!

"Theriouthly, I'm pretty thure we don't need him. You know he'th going to be a jackathth about the whole thing. Let' th jutht go," Sollux mutters, and Karkat approves whole-heartedly of the middle claw his younger self throws up in reply.

"He must be close by, though," Kanaya says. While Karkat pokes at dead bodies that could spring back to life and murder everyone at any second (he's learned to expect that kind of bullshit from these nightmares), Kanaya jumps up onto the broken wall that the winged snake angel pulverized in its death throes, and shades her eyes against the white glare of the sky as she peers through. "Unless, of course, the creature died slowly enough to crawl some distance away from where he attacked it."

"Hey, a lead is a lead. And any lead that takes me one step closer to pissing in Eridan's last bowl of grubflakes for forcing us to hunt him down? Is a lead that I fucking well cherish." Karkat brushes non-existent dirt off his pants and follows Kanaya up and over the rubble and into the walled courtyard beyond. He's a moody fuckhead about it, too; Karkat can feel the reluctance in his own limbs, the grumpiness that has him inching his way over larger blocks of black stone instead of jumping like a normal person. He can't tell if it's because his past self doesn't trust himself to jump without slipping, or if he's just acting like a grumpy, stomping drama queen out of the overdramatic goodness of his shriveled husk of a vascular pump.

"Here's something odd," Kanaya says, in what Karkat - maybe even both Karkats - thinks of as her speculative, musing 'I have stumbled upon a vaguely intriguing quandary' voice. "Did Eridan ever speak of canals in his land? I distinctly recall him attempting to engage someone in pale antics over the fact that his land was peculiarly landlocked."

She jumps down from her boulder of debris and Karkat scrambles to follow her. He loses track of Sollux, but he can still hear the troll's muttering like an afterthought as he and Kanaya cross the courtyard. The ground here has a deep incline, and occasionally the black cobblestones sink down a layer in steps that form wide, square insets. There's none of the blood that the older Karkat would have expected to see from that winged thing flopping around everywhere in its death throes - but then, it wasn't bleeding back on the street, either, was it? Just crying - and yeah, when he thinks to look again, he catches tiny, tiny splots of violet here and there.

But the fact that the creature didn't bleed or leave any grist behind just strikes him as even more unsettling. Like it was something that shouldn't have been killed.

They skirt around the eerie, obsidian obelisk that rises up in the center of the concentric squares and back up the steps on the far side, and Karkat finally sees what Kanaya's pointing at, through an open archway. The two of them stop three feet from it, and Karkat prays to fuck that his younger self doesn't decide this is the time for a swim.

There's something...wrong about that canal. It's flowing, sure, slow as a glacier, with a sickly skin on the top of the white liquid that has an iridescent sheen to it. Even though it's all just shades of white, Karkat can't help but think this is the wrong shade entirely - it doesn't match the glittering light that limns the rest of the buildings. It turns his stomach to look at it for too long; and of course, naturally, his thirteen year old self just keeps looking, like it's the most fascinating thing he's laid bulbs on all ... day. They look up and down the street, but the pallid canal stretches off in one direction as far as Karkat can see, and vanishes into another arcade where the street runs up against a row of archways.

"This shouldn't be here," he says, and for once, what he wants to say and what the younger Karkat says sync up perfectly. "What the fuck, Eridan -"

That's all he has time for.

And then the white water erupts like it's boiling, and the liquid reaches out in arching wings to wrap around Kanaya and suck her down.

She doesn't even have time to scream.

Karkat does. "Kanaya!" he yells, but then he starts backpedaling, eyes darting back and forth between the spot where Kanaya's ripples are fading and the new churning spot that is way too close to him -

He trips. Like a fucking plebe. But falling backwards on his ass, stumbling down the step in the cobblestones, means he falls right under the next rippling wave that tries to crash over him. He catches a glimpse - something with wings - and too many eyes - along arms like wheels -

But then it crashes up against a pillar that supports one side of the arch, at just the right angle that Karkat's out of the splash zone. He scrambles backward, still hoarsely shouting Kanaya's name, but some of the white liquid splashes against his pants and starts sizzling. It's acid, and that's fucked up, that's so fucked up, because Kanaya's submerged in that.

He doesn't even see what gets Sollux; he just hears another garbled shout, and a splash, and he doesn't know if psionics would be enough to get the other troll out of something like this. Fuck, he barely even sees what kills him. He stumbles back to his feet at last, sickles in his claws, and feels more than hears the vibrations as something shakes the ground behind him.

The sky is empty.

So why is there a shadow looming over him, like a winged angel of double doom perched atop a column of black?

Karkat spins, and a pale parody of the avian creature from early rushes him. It's all black, tarry tears and an absolutely horrific number of extra teeth, and it latches onto his torso and shakes him like a lusus playing with live food. It only lets go, with a squawk like broken chimes and a symphony screaming out of tune, after Karkat's sickles have already gone spinning away, and he's in too much pain to see anything but white. He thinks it drops him, though he can't imagine why.

The older Karkat's just removed enough from the physical pain to realize Kanaya's still gone. It hurts more than he thinks it has any right to, considering they only just became friends; a sharper pain that watching any of his human friends but John die. But nothing could hurt more than John, to be honest. The thirteen year old him just curls up in a defensive ball, even though that makes the caustic bite wounds through their torso pulse with more agony, and he doesn't even seem to be trying very hard to seal them up with their blood powers.

If they even still have them.

A muffled shuffle. And then another.

Like footsteps.
The younger him opens his eyes because he thinks it's Kanaya, it has to be, or Sollux, where is that fuck-for-brains, while the older Karkat wishes he'd just keep them shut because he's figured out by now that whatever shows up next is just going to kill them deader. These nightmares have stuck staunchly to their 'EXTREME FATALITY' motif for as long as he's been having them, and he doubts they're about to break their winning streak now.

"Nah, my main motherfucker. That ain't how it went."

Someone stands over Karkat. But the fucking annoying as shit thing is, they're looming again, so even though Karkat can just barely make out the silhouette of them, gangly and skinny and topped with wavy horns, the burning bright sky overhead casts them completely in shadow.

They tilt their head down, and the eye that Karkat sees is black as pitch, the pupil blown out wide in sclera redder than his own irises, feral red and feverish.

When they bare their teeth in a manic grin, he almost thinks that they have more fangs than the angel did.

But there's no way that many teeth could fit on one troll's jaw.

"You're getting your remembering all wrong. This ain't right at all," they say, shaking their head in a mockery of sadness. "You do most grievously need to wake the motherfuck up, best friend."

"You weren't here," Karkat says, and both versions of him are lost. "You weren't here, I know you weren't -"

"As if that ever stopped a motherfucker." A low honk, of all things, and a laugh like that shouldn't be so familiar -

- (- but when has that -

- - but before he can place that sense of déjà vu, Karkat dies -

- - ever stopped him?)

- - and jolts awake, paralyzed for a moment on the hospital bed with the last grip of REM sleep. He's sweated through his hoodie in cold terror, and when he wrests his jaw apart, panting in the last vestiges of panic, he realizes that Dave is staring at him over his phone, his eyes so wide behind sunglasses falling down the tip of his nose that Karkat can actually see the red of his eyes.

"Fuck," Karkat says, the word exploding out of his mouth. He levers himself up on one elbow, squeezing John's hand hard with the other because it's the only anchor he has, and grimaces as he tugs the damp fabric of his hoodie off his gills and torso. He think he should still feel that bite, and the absence of pain is almost as upsetting as the rest of the unpleasant process of waking up. "Shit. Fuck."

"Dude," Dave says, sounding openly unsettled, for once in his life. "You've only been asleep for an "hour."

Karkat doesn't want to believe him. Then he drags his phone out of his pocket with claws that splay out for a befuddled moment before he remembers this is a mixed Alternian/English keyboard, to turn it on and see that yeah. It's barely been fifty minutes, actually. How could that possibly have been long enough to dream that much.

He falls back against the bed to stare at the ceiling, letting his phone drop to one side and go dark. "Don't fucking remind me," he tells Dave.

"Yeah, yeah." Dave is quiet for longer than Karkat ever thought the human capable of.

Then, with a click, Dave's phone turns off, too.

--

71°39′N 128°52′E

Murmansk was too close to Europe and St Petersburg. Archangelsk was the main base of ops for a long bass time, but they needed to expand after a certain point. And so east and north it was, all along the northern coast of Russia.

Tiksi is pearlfect. Shrimpy, isolated. This far north, the sea's icebound all but two months outta the year. Or at least, that's what she likes to keep people believing. The nice thing about the nearest town being inhabited solely by your own employees? They know to keep their mouths shut when things get fishy, and they're too exhausted from operating the icebreaker ships to pay attention to the construction going on at the new docks.

It's cold as shell, but what can you do?

The Condesce doesn't visit this remote Crocker Corporation outpost all that often, but when she does, she gets downright snapperfish. There are other moorage points similar to this in warmer waters - but ole Doc's been eyeballin' everything, angling to peer his way through natural void zones and get his peeps on her private business, and so she's needed to make - a shudder at the thought - concessions.

Tethys Peixes pulls a face as she steps down the ramp from the shuttle that brought them here, baring sharp teeth at the sheer wind that burns cold against her cheeks. It feels like swallowing icicles to breathe, here; if it's cold enough that a tyrianblood can feel the numb hooked deep in her bones, it's cold. The last time she tried to swim up here, she coughed up ice cubes for weeks. She's dried her hair (despite the fact that the whole thing is a motherglubbing ordeal to get dry) so that it won't freeze into a chunk of dark ice heavier than she is, and her suit has an extra layer of seal blubber between her and the dry air, because there's no one to carp on about 'animal cruelty' and 'advocacy' and all that other weird glubbing shit humans have thought up over the centuries.

They shoulda just stuck to good things. Ohh, like inventing new kinds of alcodhol - they're good at that!

...Now. Where is her buoy? Tethys whirls and her attendants turn with her, their fur-lined coats dyed bright Betty Crocker red because as far as any paper trail shows (and there isn't much of one to find) this whole town was just some branch of the company that went under with the Soviets. She cranes her neck back and purses her lips when the ramp stays empty. "Where you at, Psii?" she calls.

A shuffle above, and a sigh. "I hate that title." Another fidgeting sound. "Is this really necessary?"
"This scampi happening." She growls it low enough that he probably can't hear, smacking her gum with an impatient pop, and then raises her voice again, this time with just enough shark bite to it that he knows she's already at the end of her line. "Come on, Captor, move it or lose it! #stopbeingsobassic"

Finally, the shuffling stops, and the faint, always-present whine of psionics picks up to a dull, thrumming crackle as red and blue reflect off the inside of the hull. "It is below -32° out here," Ledaei Captor says as he levitates his way down to the ground, and Tethys is about to roll her eyes and say it's at least 2 degrees when she remembers he uses Celsius.

Canadians.

"Yeah? At least you got yo sparky thing to keep you warm," she says as he floats to a stop. He's up a few inches higher than usual, like he thinks she won't notice that his one remaining foot's dangling. Har, har. "So don'tchu try to play me, boy."

"I'm retired," he points out, using the hand with the most claws left to pick at the lines around his left eye until a stray spark of red static dislodges itself and rejoins the rest of his psionics supporting his leg at the knee. "Also, old. I'm way too old for field trips to the Arctic Circle. And did I mention? I'm retired."

...Whale, he walked right into this one! "Oh, you're ancient," Tethys says, cackling and pressing the back of her hand to her forehead, a fake swoon. One of her attendants nearly takes a horn through the chest, but if they don't have the reflexes to avoid their boss's pointy-ended antics after the first week, they really haven't earned their hefty paycheck, anyway. "A regular old troll Methuselah! Look at me, I'm a glubbin' tadpole!"

"You don't count," he says, letting Tethys yank him down by the elbow until his foot hits the ground. He still towers over her, but that's only 'cause he's on the tail end of the pupation cycle, and as it turns out, when you're not farming them out as telekinetic engines to power massive intergalactic ships, plenty of the lower bloods last longer than you'd think - at least as long as humans do. Tethys would feel an inkling of guilt over that, but regret's for squares and she's never regretted a thing in her life.

Well, aight. One thing. It was awkward and inconvenient and a total load of carp. She's taking steps to prevent that from happening again.

"Some of us live normal life spans," Ledaei says. But see, the nice thing is, no matter how snarky this buoy gets, his voice never changes much. It's faint and scratchy-soft from old screams, and that's shells of soothing. Tethys snaps her claws at one of the attendants and she lopes off at once, boots crunching in the salt-strewn slush that leads down the dock. "Proportionally speaking, I'm way older than you."

"Keep telling yourself that, honeyboo."

Tethys starts walking and doesn't wait up for him. He wouldn't appreciate it. The thing with Ledaei is, he's got whatcha'd call...the opposite of a limp; he's been using psionics to make up for the half a leg they amputated for decades, apparently, so he walks almost too smooth.

But he's not wrong that for a goldblood, he's old. The shit he went through back in his stupid dumbass hero days means he's down a coupla limbs. Glub it - Tethys hasn't had it this bad for someone in diamonds in a few centuries. People tend to die too fast for her to get too attached just for the halibut.

The cold doesn't get any easier to bear as they walk past a couple of tug boats. When the Condesce tosses her hair a little, she can feel the ice encrusting the ends where it drags along the ground. It's no heavier than it was back in the days when battle jewelry was still in vogue on the battlefield, but it's annoying. "If I ask why we're here, are you going to give me a not-answer again?" Ledaei asks.

Another dismissive flip of her claws. "Ah, you just get me all tongue-tide, you do." Before he can open his mouth and starting fishing again, she tells him. "Someone coulda been spying on us, before. I got another old geezer here who keeps that from happening, though." She winks at the look Ledaei throws her way. "Took some convincin', but he's been cooped up for too long anyway. He needed to get outta the house - ain't that right, yah old coot!" she finishes in a shout, her breath bursting out between her lips in a cold cloud of visible moisture.

Approaching them from the far end of the dock, the lord E%ībimus greets her yell with a blank look, not quite meeting her eyes. The attendant is absolutely dwarfed in the shadow the hulking troll casts, and as Tethys strolls up to him the sheer size of this landglubber becomes all the more obvious. Meteos Zahhak hasn't stopped growing in all the centuries Tethys has known him, and it shows.

He also hasn't gotten any better at social interaction. Tethys has been punched through a wall a few times in her life, but she's never achieved as much air as she did the one memorable time she glubbed up and clapped a hand on Zahhak's shoulder without warning him ahead of time. Took her awhile to catch onto all his quirks and angles and shit, but it helps that she remembers him from another life. Vaguely. She's lived a lot since then.

Anyway. Don't make eye contact. Don't go poking at him. Don't make fun of the stupid horse puns, no matter how much of a nightmare (urgh) they are. She's slipped up before and Zahhak's not too intimidated by her being a tyrianblood to be afraid to flash her a reproachful glare. Tethys paid a price to stay on the humans' good side, watering herself down and curbing her instinct to rule all of trollkind with an iron fisht, and unfortunately Zahhak's too glubbin' useful for her to lose. It's a world where the thought of alienating Her Imperious Condescension doesn't inspire the same kind of utter terror as it used to, and oh, okay yeah, she regrets that.

But it inspires enough. Zahhak's old enough to remember what she did to Elizabet when that old seawitch got too big for her gills, what she did to Saturn's face when he thought run-of-the-krill chucklevoodoos would win him Spain. She can't gut lowbloods and mutants and hang them from the ramparts by their entrails anymore - but they can disappear quietly and never be seen again. Always with the coddamn concessions.

"Water you up to, Zahhak? Which is it today?" she drawls, all slanted smiles as she draws out her phone and starts tapping her way into the app Crocker Corp released a while ago. It was going to be an app dedicated to some random human with a name that had too many letters - Kardas? Ardashia? Humans need to tone that shit down, for glub's sake - but then Tethys heard tell of it.

"She," Zahhak says, curt. He - ah, she - tilts her head to the side, long, stringy raven black-blue hair hanging in her face as she squints over Ledaei's shoulder, her goggles covered with fern frost. "I do not know you."

"Yeah, I don't know you, either." Ledaei shrugs, unphased. He never seems phased by much. He claims it's because he's old; Tethys is pretty sure it's because he's got pale game out the whazoo, and no one's allowed to call themselves old until they crack the third century mark.

"Ex, Psiioniic - Psioniic, E%ībimus." Tethys keeps walking, trusting that the two of them will eventually start following. They do, of course, Ledaei levitating along to catch up with her and Zahhak lurking back and to the side, her heavy cloak dragging almost as much as Tethys's hair. In between selecting dialog options on her phone, she glances down into the water on either side of the dock as it begins to widen, stretching far out into bay. Chunks of broken ice bob up and down in the dark water, but the water's deceptively deep here. They should reach the first of the line any second now. "Zahhak's good with void, and machines. #aregularrenaissancegill"

Literally. The Renaissance was a weird time for everyone involved.

This point is, Meteos Zahhak has a unique talent for flying under the radar. Her name appears in no history books, her contributions to the fields of robotics and prosthetics are known only to a rare and discerning few, and sometimes even Tethys has been fooled over the years into thinking the troll has vanished off the face of the earth. She's worked hard to become as invisible and obscure as possible. If she didn't show up at the Condesce's doorstep without fail whenever Tethys sends out a summons, no one would see this troll F2F, ever. You could probably parlay her in front of Scratch himself and he wouldn't be able to sniff her out.

If anyone's presence can keep the Condesce's private business private, it'll be Zahhak. Russia's been a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma long before Churchgill picked up on it, rich in magic and pocketed with void, and with Zahhak around to leak her anonymity everywhere - it's an opportunity Tethys can't pass up.

"Not these kinds of machines," Zahhak mutters. When Tethys glances over, subtle as a brick wall, the troll is staring straight down over the opposite side of the dock, consternation in her face. "Why did you call me here, my Condescension?"

She preens a little, and ignores the little eye roll that Ledaei gives her at the extra sway in her hips. With everyone but her attendants and her old courts, it's always so informal. Condy here, HIC there - only the old guard has that note of respect mixed with fear that reminds her of the times before the world ended and she got stuck in cahoots with a basshole like Scratch on a planet full of squishy aliens that needed their sensitive moray-eelity catered to. "Eh, you've haddockraving for something new to learn for decades, girlfrond," Tethys says, flipping her phone in her hand with a sly grin. "Don't I alalways have the best projects for you? Wasn't the last one a reel challenge?" She controls her eyebrows with immense effort; Zahhak wouldn't look, anyway.

"It was relatively simple, actually. The mane concern was a matter of paying attention to detail." A huff of breath that comes out a billow of white fog. "Though it did stirrup some thoughts on the finer points of prosthetics that...preoccupied me for some time..."

Tethys can see the exact moment Zahhak takes the bait; between one breath and the next the troll's face turns thoughtful, measured and calculating as she stops and stares down into the water. Assessing what lies beneath.

Hook, line, and sinker.

"What are you two looking at?" Ledaei asks, leaning out over the bay at an angle that woulda been dangerous if he weren't already floating. One of his doubled horns chipped off long ago, and Tethys finally gives in to temptation and yanks on it - gently - okay, gently for her, which ain't all that gentle by a lot of people's standards - until he turns his head to the left and can see what there is to see. She beams with pride at the machines that lie below the surface, scritching behind Ledaei's horn as he opens and shuts his mouth in silent little fish blubs.

She should commemorate this moment. She flips the phone in her hand and snaps a shellfie of the two of them before Ledaei can get his shit together. While Ledaei's still gaping, Tethys checks how it turned out and - Ah, fishsticks. Tethys sighs and shakes her head when she spies the blurry, dark shadow looming in the corner, just barely visible through her own horns. As she watches, the shadow starts to spread, darkening her hair and horns into a murky blur. No image with Zahhak in it ever lasts long, so that one's a bust. Yeeesh.

Well. Good. That's exactly the kind of security she needs here to guard what lies beneath the surface, cold and quiescent.

"Tethys," her buoy says at last, his voice half strangled and his psionics tangling in knotty, worried loops, "why do you have an army of submarines in the middle of the Arctic!!"

She smacks him on the back bracingly, the cold forgotten as she beams down at her fleet beneath the thin crust of ice. Meteos beats her to the correction, on accounta she gets so distracted by the crimson hulls, stretching out along the line of the dock until they disappear in the dark, rippling filter of the sea. "These are not submarines."

"Really? Because they look a whole lot like they're under the sea..." Ledaei starts floating up again, too high, until his feet are somewhere around the tips of Tethys's horns and she can't reach him anymore. "How many of the obviously not-submarines do you even have?" he says in disbelief. "They're enormous!"

Seeriously. It was so worth bringing him here, just to see the look on his face. "Hadda spare decade or two, so I decided to get shit done," Tethys says, strolling along. One of her attendants is tryna be discreet and all in an attempt to get her attention, but she sails past him and taps a sharp claw on each metal console that rises up from the edges of the dock - marking the controls that can raise the machines up from the sea floor so the airbreathers can do work her seadwellers can't. "Also, I bought NASA. #soworthit."

Okay, so, she bought out nearly every space agency on the planet. But baby steps. No need to give the poor guy a heart attack by telling him she owns basically everything that's caught her eye in the past few centuries. Yeeeeeee.

"NASA," he repeats.

"Yyyyyup."

"These are space ships."

Tethys is a veritable fountain of patience. She points her thumb over her shoulder, back the way they came. "The shuttle was the prototype."

Ledaei sets down with a thump and a wobble. He drags his mismatched eyes away from the sunken armada to stare at her, incredulous. "I've heard of impulse buying," he says, "but please tell me you had a reason for impulse buying a space fleet. I need to hear you say the words."

Now she's almost offended. "Of course I did!!" she says, slingin an arm around his waist to tug him along in her wake. Zahhak doesn't move to follow, this time, intently staring at one of the ships spread out along the other side of the bay, but Tethys isn't worried. Give her a week, Zahhak'll have that thing stripped down and fileted like a fish; give her two weeks, and it'll be in one piece again, with all the systems functioning at 200% capacity. She might even solve the ongoing issue of how to pilot these suckers without frying too many brains.

It's a work in progress. When the time comes, they'll be ready.

And no one - not even Scratch - will see them coming.
As they walk, Tethys snaps her claws, and the attendant finally catches up, inclining his head as he hands her one of her many spare PDAs. “Another no, my Condesce,” he says, lips twisted with disdain.

_Not_ what she wants to hear. Then Tethys reads the actual message on the screen, and realizes with a sour growl that the attendant was interpreting it optimistically. Aside from the single 'no,' there's also an extra sting - a poorly 'shopped JPEG of some old glubbin' meme character, raising a glass full of what's either apple juice or...something else, in a mocking toast.

Oh yeah. This guy's a real piscine of work. She'll hafta teach him a lesson.

"Set Motts on his ass," she says, chucking the PDA into the sea. There's plenty more where it came from. "Sea if he feels more cooperaytive when he realizes we own them, too."

"I don't even want to know, do I," Ledaei observes, mild as anything, as the attendant races off with a new PDA already clutched in his fist.

Tethys considers it - but nah. Stick to space ships for now. "Just some brat," she says, leaning in and batting her eyelashes with a glint of bared teeth until Ledaei gives her another look, blanches, and starts doing that thing. The thing where he starts rambling about something else entirely, in his nice faint monotone, until the irritation seeps right outta her. The troll has a talent, he does.

The politics of apple juice are probably too intense for a first date, anyway.

Juice is serious business. Space ships are _fun_.

Oh, shell yeah. She is _so_ good at dates.

---

_Wednesday_

Rose finds herself with a vanguard that consists of Roxy and Jade as she ventures out. Kanaya has made a personal project out of distracting Karkat with the prospect of friendship, and while Rose _does_ find the distinctly stilted manner in which trolls go about establishing totally platonic relationships a fascinating thing to behold, she also agrees with Kanaya that until John can stay awake for longer than hour-long stretches at a time, Karkat is to be their silent priority. It took some persuading with Jade and Dave to convince them not to leave Karkat alone, but now the two have taken it up as a kind of test, seeing how closely they can stick to the troll's side without annoying him to the point of a screaming fit.

(There is also the fact that thousands of years of interspecies diplomacy have been built on the back of a single key truism – do _not_ bring up the hilarious oddities of troll friendship initiation rites. Do not laugh. Don't even _think_ a snicker. It is unbelievably gauche, and they always know. Always.)

It's probably a more traditional form of irony than the kind Striders bandy about, Rose thinks, that of the three people in this laboratory who have proclaimed themselves friendleaders in the past, all three - John, Karkat, and Rose herself - have proven the most vulnerable to spectacular breakdowns. She can't tell if that says something about the three of _them_, or if the job's just more jinxed than a professorial position at a boarding school for the sorcerously inclined. Whichever the case may be, the fact remains that Karkat is a troll whose moirail is incapacitated and thus a prime candidate for another collapse, and the more friends he has watching his back, the less likely it is he'll manage to wander off and shake himself apart in some dark, isolated corner. He's already tried it once.

Roxy, woozy and stumbling still, gamely forges along with a crutch that she commandeered from a supply room. She leans on it or flings it up to catch on a wall whenever she tilts too far to one side. But she's very alert, considering she only just began recovering from brain surgery, adamant that she's not lying around in bed while there's 'innerstesting stuff' afoot, and soon she and Jade have started chattering in loud, increasingly excited whispers that echo in the hall. They seem to pertain to the Queen's Hub and something about computer software, but when the two start speaking in computer code Rose loses all sense of the conversation - she's not well-versed in the finer points of ~ATH, and definitely not able to make heads or tails of a spirited debate on more esoteric methods of hacking.

She has other matters to attend to, anyway.

She's found herself thinking about the brainwashed Crew members - the first ones to be dewormed in Maine, from whose example Rue first learned that not all about the Midnight Crew was as it appeared at first glance. In particular, she wonders just how some of them may be progressing in terms of recovery. More particularly still, like a shard of kernel shell digging into the soft flesh of gums - just how loyal are they to their Crew, now. The only word that Rose has had of them came in the form of a few off-handed but nonetheless ominous intimations that the sanity of at least one of the Crew's number had fractured, leaving her deep in the clutches of a coldblooded dementia that she may not recover from.

The mindgrubs in theory reinforce commands and pro-Crew thoughts with chemical encouragement, according to Marion's initial findings. In some instances, such as that of the more unstable indigoblood, the drastic chemical imbalance caused by the worm's secretions causes them to deteriorate to the point of insanity.

But as the Scratch kids' collective case has shown, not all members of the gang joined voluntarily, and the grub must have been altered somehow to force their minds and personalities to suit the lead scientist's will. Roxy insists that neither Jane nor Jake were homicidal fanatics before Dienek began tinkering with their brains in regular 'review' sessions, and since none of the Scratch kids can remember a time before they lived in the Midnight Crew's Felt division labs, they also can't remember when they would have signed up to be made guinea pigs and trained villains. They all certainly fought it for as long as they could.

The mindgrub in John's head would have been the same kind of altered grub used on the Scratches, one capable of giving more complex commands than just reinforcing pre-existing loyalties, because there was zero chance he would ever have voluntarily gone under the knife for such a thing. Even if he hasn't been handling the memories of their past lives well - or, Rose supposes, at all - he had no prior villainous inclinations that would have led him to embrace a life of crime; it must have required extreme measures to break his mind down so thoroughly that it required a mental construct as horrifyingly, wildly unhinged as the Trickster to handle it all.

So the question becomes - which example applies to Samuel Egbert? Did he join the Crew of his own volition, like the troll members from earlier, and only later ended up 'synchronized' and left coiled like an adder in the breast? Or were both he and John, in their own ways, forcibly brainwashed into submission, perhaps absolving him of some of his sins?

If the latter, they may be able to trust that when Samuel is roused from his post-surgical slumber, he will express just as much remorse, and have suffered just as severe a trauma, as the Scratches and John.

If the former, they may well never be able to trust him again.

Rose finds that...difficult to contemplate. She swallows hard, more than a little perturbed by how strong the sting of betrayal still feels whenever she casts her mind back to Monday's incredible clusterfuck. She never considered how fundamental a place Samuel Egbert held in her conception of how the world - nay, how the universe itself - functions. The sun rises and sets, the Horrors whisper from the spaces between stars, alcohol burns as it numbs, and John's father is a stern but nevertheless kind pillar of decency, distantly fond and blandly watchful, a permanent fixture throughout Rose's memories of hers and John's shared childhood. More than her own mother, sometimes, Samuel was constant, and Rose appreciated that; he served as a fixed point that she could put her faith in, even when her mother wandered off to her labs and left Rose at the Egberts' for hours, if not days, on end.

However distant the memories became over the intervening years, Rose thought of Samuel Egbert as a stalwart figure of fatherly consideration. And now that previously inviolable maxim has been stripped away, and a piece of Rose's worldview has shattered along with it.

Samuel's betrayal has ripped away the recent scab Rose has only just managed to grow over the wound left by her mother's years of absence. Not even Dave's repeated attempts to cajole everyone into referring to the man not as Dadbert, but as Dickbert, can ease the exquisitely raw pain.

So Rose is determined she will be present when he is brought out of his medically induced coma. She wants to know if Samuel was ever the father she thought he was.

- Rue beats her to the punch.

They've sectioned Samuel Egbert off in a ward as far from John and the Scratch kids as possible without physically removing him from the building altogether. There are rooms back here run by automated systems, with experiments that appear to have been left running even in the absence of the researchers themselves - a room full of plants that rustle and shift when watered, a lab with an empty pedestal that looks as though it was set to measure something with the wide array of instruments scattered around at random, an elaborate set of magnets that bob and rearrange themselves in strange patterns that seem to coincide with controlled majykal bursts.

She loses Roxy and Jade along the way, the two of them sprint-hobbling off down another hallway with Jade's arm hooked through Roxy's to balance her out, with excited shouts of "WE TOTLALLY SHOULD!" and "YEAH! FOR SCIENCE!" Without their chatter to keep her aware of something other than her own musings, Rose runs right into the intern who has attached herself to Rue's side of late. They dodge each other awkwardly at the last moment, and Rose grimaces an apology while studying the closed door of the room. Through the clear Plexiglas pane that stretches along the wall off to the left, she can see the single hospital cot - and the single man tied to it with every kind of restraint a scientific laboratory has.

No one wants to risk the man with twenty different variations prank-related specibi slipping his handcuffs.

Her mother is on the other side of the glass as well, her steps brisk as she leans in to check the packet attached to the IV stand. Rose has to give Rue Lalonde credit; she doesn't look like a woman brute-forcing her way through alcohol withdrawal anymore. At some point during the nightmarish flurry of surgeries and scans over the past two days, Rue traded her unstarched, badly-askew white lab coat for a coal grey dress that ends with an angular, cutting hem, her pale hair blown out and restyled back into an angular bob, not a hair out of alignment. Her eyes are still shadowed with strain when she turns on her heel, but her lipstick is perfectly applied, her cheekbones contoured into blades, and the wine-red paint on her nails looks fresh.

"Has she been in there long?" she asks, unable to take her eyes off the scene long enough to glance back at the intern. Rose wishes she could feel irritated that while everyone else has been falling apart, Rue is finally pulling herself back together. But all she feels is a traitorous stab of gratitude. Drunken Rose viciously assassinated more than a few of her own brain cells trying to get herself to the point of reconciliation with her mother, and now, for the first time in too long, Rose can't feel even the faintest trace of the weary old hate. The bitterness remains, oh yes, but it's far too much effort to maintain it all the time - and it's like blood in the water to any passing Horrorterror. The sooner it runs its course and she and Rue can treat each other like civil human beings, the better.

So she keeps telling herself. It's almost working.

"O-only a few minutes. She gave him something to wake him up," the intern says. She fidgets, and then edges away from Rose, casting a few more fleeting but terrified glances her way before doing it again. Rose doesn't pay her any mind; there's movement through the glass, and that's enough to distract her from the fact that at least one person in Lalonde Laboratories is terrified of her.

Rose can see the exact moment Samuel Egbert wakes up. His face stiffens minutely, but his eyes stay shut. If nothing else, the fact that he's strapped to the bed with almost as many restraints as it took to keep Jane and Jake down would give him pause for consideration.

"Samuel," Rue says, her voice low and crackling with static through an intercom beside the door, "we need to talk."

Samuel's eyes blink open - too quickly, Rose thinks; he's not nearly as bleary as John and Dirk and Roxy were after waking from a drugged sleep. She doesn't think he can see through the window into the hallway, but for a few long seconds his pale eyes linger on the glass, cool and assessing and fixed just to the left of where her face would appear if he could see through.

"Ah," Samuel says at last, shifting like he means to stretch as he twists his head to look at Rue. The restraints prevent him from following through, and Rose can't fight the unsettling conviction that he's testing their strength. "Well, Rue. You're looking well." A bland smile touches his face...and the thing is, Rose cannot say for a definitive fact that it isn't the very same smile Samuel has always worn. He looks perfectly at ease; perhaps there's a smidgen of resignation to his expression, but otherwise the man doesn't seem all that bothered to find himself strapped to a bed. "Where is John?"

Rue's face darkens, and Rose catches her own hand inching up to press her fingers to the seam where the window meets the wall. She can't tell if the tightness in her stomach is wariness or concern. "Recovering," Rue says, her voice light enough to balance out her expression. "As are you."

"Mm. And I'm not trusted to do so unrestrained?"

"Not at the moment, I'm afraid. You've - done some things, Samuel. People have been hurt."

"Clearly not as many as intended," Samuel says.

The regret is so thick in his voice that Rose has to replay it three times in her head before she realizes what he's regretful about. Her stomach lurches in a sickening drop.

Rue, through the glass, has to visibly pause to breathe. Rose counts along in her head to a count of five before Rue flinches back into motion, a catch in her voice that wasn't there before. "I beg your pardon?"

"I did receive orders to have the asset cause whatever mayhem he could before leaving, but I'll be the first to admit that he never listened very well. Always an uphill battle with that boy."

"Samuel's chest sinks under the straps in a sigh. "That's the trouble with investing all that time and suggestion in an asset that's so badly damaged from the start - things never turn out the way one would expect." He shrugs as well as he can. "If they'd asked me my professional opinion, I would have said, stick to hiring people sane enough to know what they're doing...But I wasn't really paid to give them advice."

"Paid." Rue's voice has gone flat.

"I'm a mercenary. They hired me to do a job. I did it." Another sigh. "As best I could, of course. Babysitting a young brainwashed sleeper asset 24/7 for years would never top my to-do list. I'll be glad never to go through another PTA meeting in this lifetime."

Rue presses her knuckles to her forehead and drags them down. "You had a mindgrub in your brain, too, Samuel!" she snaps, removing her hand from her face and clutching it with the other behind her back, clasped tight as she starts pacing. When she speaks again, she bites back several attempts before she figures out what to say. "This is not - you've been brainwashed yourself. You clearly haven't been in control of your actions for some time, and don't fully realize what you're saying, but we can -"

"I knew about all that," Samuel interrupts.

Rose feels cold. There is a film of bile coating the back of her throat, and every time she swallows it tastes like nausea. A purely mundane brand of horror makes a cold home in the pit of her stomach, where it seems content to stay. Each damning word that emerges from Samuel's mouth feels like a trickle of ice water pouring in through her ears.

Hope is so hard a thing to cling to when the expression on Samuel's face still looks the same as ever; this is the bland, well-meaning earnestness that greeted her and John after school and gently chided them until they turned off the television and went to sleep. And now he's using those same expressions, that same tone of voice, to say things that are just - just -

"...What," Rue says. Being interrupted has never really fazed Rose's mother, but in this case she's slow to formulate a response. Rose can't imagine how she would have responded, herself, if she had been the one to reach Samuel and speak to him first, if she and Rue switched places and it was Rose who had to deal with this. Her right hand is a closed fist pressed up against the glass and her nose is almost touching it as well, all of her angled toward the room beyond with single-minded intensity. But her mouth tastes like ashes and if she tried to speak nothing would come out but cinders.

The man nods, rolling one of his heels until it gives a little pop before switching to the other. "The neurological loyalty mods. Well, I must admit they're not all that common in the business - something out of science fiction, really! - but then, the Midnight Crew is hardly aboveboard. The Felt is worse still." Samuel flashes a winning smile. "But I never sign a contract without reading the fine print. There was quite the last minute shuffle to get the implementation timing right, and if I hadn't known the finer points of how the modifications worked I wouldn't have been able to handle the boy properly."

Handle, handler - both words that are starting to make Rose bristle no matter the context.

Rue's pacing has grown erratic, to the point that her skirt flares when she pivots on her heel, and her clasped hands tremble behind her like she's taken a chill. "And you...you - you knew. You knew they would be - essentially brainwashing you to obey their orders. To never betray them. And that doesn't bother you. At all?" Her voice cracks sharply at the end, like the effort needed to keep her tone measured and flat has finally broken her resolve.
The more Rue struggles for calm, the more Samuel's smile ticks up at the side. The change is so gradual that Rose is not able to judge precisely when it crosses the line into a derisive smirk. The nuances are so subtle. "Really, Rue - for me, a job is a job. Some of the people I've worked for in the past would kill rather than see their secrets sold. Compared to that, altering someone's mind a little to keep them from breaking their confidentiality clause is fairly mild. I suppose it's a matter of perspective. It hasn't really bothered me." He clicks his tongue. "But it would seem it's already starting to wear off, if I can speak this openly about it with you without a fuss. I don't believe they thought anyone would realize the grubs existed, let alone learn how to remove them in such short order. Well played on that front, Rue."

That hits Rose harder than the rest of the conversation combined. Because John is still twisted into knots by the psychological after effects the grub's suggestions forced on his mindscape; Roxy still slurs her words with every sentence because even with the mindgrub gone, her brain has been slowly trained to stutter and skip like a scratched record whenever she says something that might be construed as running counter to the orders she was spammed with on a constant basis. Dirk, now that he's started defying doctors' orders and pushing himself to stand guard around Jane and Jake's bedsides when he should be resting, often goes perfectly, terrifyingly still mid-sentence, his clipped voice swallowed up as he gets pulled into some internal debate until Roxy distracts him from whatever planted order seized his attention. Roxy doesn't have trouble talking about Felt secrets and past trial missions they've been sent on, but John and Dirk evade questions without fully realizing they're doing it. The effects of the mindgrubs didn't fade the instant they were removed; they're just no longer being chemically reinforced, that's all.

If Samuel is already so free of the grub's trained influence, effortlessly shrugging at the thought of accidentally spilling the beans about his goddamn mercenary contract with the Midnight Crew, could he really have been all that heavily brainwashed to begin with? The more Rose's mind fumbles to produce a rationale that will explain all this away, the more her insides twist.

This is Samuel. This is John's father, 'Dad Egbert,' a man with a taste for baking and a fondness for harlequins and a copy of the restraining order from the Cirque du Soleil that he kept framed on his office wall for a while there. And he was also, apparently, a private military contractor with no qualms about signing on with a criminal outfit even before he was brainwashed into loyalty.

This rather puts a damper on things.

Her mother isn't responding to this any better. Her voice snaps, growing steadily frostier as she watches Samuel's face. Her composure is brittle, and Rose can't imagine it will hold for much longer. "And does it not 'bother you' that John's been hurt by all this?! That your own son has been in agony?!"

Samuel snorts. "Rue, please. He's not my son. More of a half-brother, if that, and certainly not one I had any prior personal attachments to when I took the job. As far as I'm concerned, this whole guardian episode has been two decades worth of proving I should have been an actor, not a contractor. Pretending to care so much, all the time - do you know how many tired old parenting guide books I had to read to pull that off?" He shakes his head, contemplative. "Hell, I've trained people for deep cover operations before, and I could have sworn it wasn't as boring as this has been. Maybe he'd have been more interesting to train if he hadn't fought it every step of the way, but ever since all these other foolish children started arriving he's been more difficult to handle than ever before."

Rue paces an ever narrower circle. There are too many conflicting emotions contorting her face for Rose to hope to decipher them all and extrapolate Rue's predominant reaction to all this poison bubbling between Samuel's lips like blood. "And what do you think," Rue says, "Joanna would think, to see her own son treat the other like this?"

Samuel stares at her. His smile is bemused and nothing more. Like watching Rue struggle to wrap her mind around the cutthroat train of his thoughts provides him no end of entertainment. "I think," he says, his tone just this side of pedantic, "that Joanna is unfortunately too inconvenienced by her untimely demise to think much of anything at all about the subject. My mother was outspoken, but not even she can offer an opinion from beyond the grave."

Rue slams to a stop, jerking to face Samuel, her eyes electric with anger. "Did you even realize how proud she was? Her son off fighting to protect people; she never stopped missing you. She would have trusted you would protect John. Does that mean nothing to you? She would have wanted him safe."

Samuel pauses - and the smile that crosses his face before he speaks again is familiar in the worst way, because it's the same way the Trickster smiled as it rearranged John's insides, the look that Samuel might have worn while revealing he's played an absolutely fantastic prank to a pair of small, delighted children. "Then she should have been the one to raise him. A shame that wasn't in the cards. You'd think she would have remembered what happened last time."

And he waits.

Perhaps there is some context here that Rose isn't privy to. There's something Samuel is talking around, sauntering ever nearer to the point at a leisurely pace, but she can't quite see it. Last time - if he's referring to that past universe, to the fact that Nanna Egbert recalled some of what happened in her past life and prototyped afterlife, then could he be implying she -

- she -

Rose's hands both drop to her side, and all she can do is stare blankly ahead, scrambling through her memories as quickly as she can. Her mindscape flickers across her vision but she never jumps into it, scanning too quickly to linger in any one place for long. Surely she knows - surely it's been mentioned before, by John or his father or even Rue...

Somehow, no matter how she strains and coaxes her mind to offer up the relevant details, Rose doesn't know how Joanna Egbert died. One part of her mind, the section dedicated to childhood memories, has a record of some vague, murky explanation lost to the blurring effect of time: her asking Rue about the woman in the picture frame on the Egbert's mantle, and receiving the talk about the mortality of man that she didn't really need after Jaspers's death. Another, more recent memory contains details of viewing the Reckoning of the past universe, wherein John's meteor crash-landed in the middle of a prankster shop and inadvertently led to Joanna's death. If John or Samuel commented on the subject at any point...well, could she even trust what they said, in hindsight?

But she suspects, with a squirming knot in her stomach, that they never did say anything. No one has ever said. Rose, at least, has never asked. Rose just assumed, in some unconscious way, that John's Nanna succumbed to both a meteor impact and, on a more existential level, to paradox space's fondness for coincidence and repeating motifs.

But -

Wouldn't Joanna have known better? It wouldn't make sense for someone with retrocognitive visions of a past incarnation to fall victim to the same death twice, would it? Unless...unless, unless...

Rue realizes first. "No," she says, her voice almost inhuman with denial and horror as she takes a step back from the bed.
"It was emphasized in my briefing that there were to be no conflicting authority figures in the picture; too much chance they could undermine his programming." Samuel almost sounds apologetic, but even with pity in his eyes, his smile is still a smirk. "Hard enough trying to train him, without someone there trying to encourage him to have a mind of his own."

There are some moments when Rose forgets that her mother is both a fighter and woman of science.

Right up until the fraction of a second before Rue punches Samuel Egbert across the face, when the fact returns to her with remarkable clarity. The smack of knuckles on flesh is so loud that both Rose and the intern flinch away from the window as though it were aimed at them. Samuel doesn't make a sound, head jerking to the side with his mouth shut tight. Rue freezes, her hair obscuring her face where she's bent over the bed; then she straightens, her other hand tugging her closed fist behind her back once more. "My apologies, Samuel," she says. "I shouldn't have done that. We've contacted several psychiatrists, who should arrive to assist you and the children in recovering from the effects of this brainwashing as soon as they can arrange to transfer here."

"Oh, not to worry; I've had worse," Samuel says. He smiles with his eyes closed for a moment, before they open and he watches Rue walk to the door. "Rue?"

Rue must pause - she's out of sight, now, in the obscured space between the door and Rose's range of vision through the window, and she neither reappears nor exits the room. If Rose were to squint and use other methods of sight she might be able to make out her mother's expression even through walls, but the effort to see that and yet ignore the hollow void that makes up Rue's aura would just give her a headache. "Samuel."

He might be smiling, but Samuel's unreadable; Rose would have said once she knew his expressions as well as she knew John's, but she's clearly been misinterpreting things badly for years now. "Please tell John that I am still very proud of him. Always."

The door clicks open and Rue walks out. Rose moves away from the window again almost unconsciously, her feet making a narrowly aborted attempt to step toward her mother before she catches herself. "I don't think that would be a good idea, Samuel. Try to get some rest," Rue says without turning back to the room, and she closes the door behind her. A quick glance at Samuel confirms that his face hasn't altered in the slightest, despite the denial of his request. Rather, he rolls his shoulders again, adjusting his jaw to test what damage Rue might have done, and then takes to watching the ceiling, unconcerned.

Of all things, it makes Rose pine for the days when she still trusted in her mother. She and Rue never got along well, but before she outright abandoned Rose to her own demons and vices, Rose had the cold comfort of an overbearing, passive-aggressive guardian, one who would always make a point to be around at Christmas time to annoy her to no end and stick Rose's final exams and graded essays to the refrigerator with ridiculous magnets.

Samuel filled in the gaps where Rue fell short.

Now, she doesn't know what to think.

"Are you alright, Doctor Lalonde?" the intern asks, when Rue rests her head back on the door.

"I shouldn't have lost my temper that way," Rues says, rounding regretful as she lowers her chin and shakes out her fingers, inspecting her knuckles. There isn't a mark on them, but with her fistkind specialization, there wouldn't be. She rubs them as though smoothing away an imagined pain. "Send for intern Fredyn. From experience, I can say that restraints won't hold Samuel for long unless we change the configuration periodically."

Well, that won't do at all. Rose clears her throat, and smiles when Rue looks to her - tepid and just this side of sharp, but still a smile. "That punch was perhaps the most satisfactory thing I've seen all day. Excellent form, mother dear."

Rue appears to weigh Rose's words for a moment, flexing her fingers in contemplation. "Far be it from me to doubt your judgment," she says at last, and her smile turns conspiratorial; there's more than an echo of the impishness Rose has grown to associate with Roxy. "Try not to punch people to resolve your disputes, though, Rose. It is a powerful, addiction-forming habit."

Given how many people Rose has had to punch in her lifetime, in situations where magic just won't cut it, the warning comes a little late. "And the last thing either of us needs right now is another addiction," Rose says.

It's intended to be a glib rejoinder; she realizes too late that it's still too sobering a thing to joke about, in this context, in this company. Rue freezes and the silence that ensues jars like a sour note. "Fair enough." Rue flexes her fingers one last time and closes her eyes. Rose wonders if she's holding back tears. "I was never much good at setting a laudatory example of moderation and temperance for young ladies.

This whole episode leaves an odd taste in Rose's mouth. Samuel is a liar at the best, an unrepentant, borderline psychopathic traitor at worst, and now she can't tell whether she should be trying to reconcile further with Rue or simply keeping their relationship on an even keel so that it doesn't plunge back into the abyss they've worked to drag it out of. "No. But, as it turns out, it could have been worse," she says in utter seriousness.

Rue sighs in agreement. "That's no consola-" Her mother breaks off and blinks, looking lost for words as she stares through Rose. "Oh no. Oh no."

"What?"

"Joanna is dead. James is dead. I failed you in ways I'm still coming to terms with." Rue sails past that loaded sentence without leaving room for Rose to interject. "I always put my faith in Samuel. Of all of us surviving, he was the most competent of guardians, he kept John safe - but this - this means -"

"Means what?" Rose asks, her alarm rising as Rue presses her fingers to her temple, all the color draining from her face at a decidedly unsettling rate. The intern on Rue's other side looks just as alarmed, arms braced as though to catch the doctor if she swoons.

"The only one left not disqualified by death, the only one who hasn't failed miserably," Rue says, close to tears, "is Ambrose. I - I think I need to sit." And she almost does, slumping back against the door as her face falls into her hands in despair. "He will never let us live this down." Her voice cracks again.

"Doctor Lalonde, you are really pale," the intern says, wringing her hands. "Should I get you a glass of water?"

Rose forces her limbs into motion and touches Rue's shoulder. When Rue just continues to shake her head, wordlessly, her face ghoulishly white, Rose nods at the intern. "Yes, that might be helpful. Please do." Once the intern rushes off, Rose sets herself to the strange task of patting her mother on the shoulder. Perhaps it's just the events of the past few days catching up with Rue; perhaps she truly is having some sort of existential crisis over the fact that Ambrose has apparently won guardian of the year by default.

Whichever the case may be, Rose can't help but sympathize. This whole situation is incredibly disturbing. Viewing the records of the past universe at least had the buffer of having taken place in a life Rose didn't really recall, so that the tapes, while upsetting, could at least be considered from a somewhat objective distance.

"Joanna," Rue whispers, before going frighteningly quiet.

Rose doesn't know that any of them can be objective about Samuel Egbert.

-- ~ Welcome to the Divine Café ~ --
-- ~ 7 practitioners online ~ --

-- ~ ADVISORY WARNING: NEW WARNING FOR POSSIBLE CHAOS TYPE INTERFERENCE OCCURRING IN THE CHESAPEAKE AREA - ANALYSIS IN PROGRESS. STORM IN THE NORTHERN UNITED STATES APPEARS TO HAVE SUBSIDED. BEWARE OF CONTINUED SPORADIC CHAOS/UNCATEGORIZED FAITH-BASED MAGIC INTERFERENCE WITH AURAS THROUGHOUT THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE - DO NOT OPERATE OUTSIDE PRE-ESTABLISHED WARD RITUAL CIRCLES. ~ -- Divine Café > Auras, Scrying, Divination > the end of the world and you! :)

Angeles didn't take well to being torched?
HA: ain't that the understatement of the friggin' century.
HA: new rule, we're sticking to ghosts and other normal supernatural monsters from now on.
figuring out the banishing ritual for that thing was way too lovecraft.
TT: You succeeded in banishing it, though?
HA: that part of it, yeah. piece of shit couldn't leave the charter circle these guys set up, so it looked like it just left a puddle and bugged out.
LS: un†il i† s†ar†ed growing †en†acles and wings again...†alk abou† a nigh†mare!
AA: wow sounds like you guys have been having a lot of adventures!
AA: what about you rose? :)
TT: I'm sorry, I don't believe I've seen you on these forums before. A pleasure to meet you...?
AA: AA will do for now!
AA: heheheh!
TT: AA it is. My own week has been essentially awful in several ways, but as some of the events involve the private mental health of someone close to me, I prefer not to discuss it on a public memo.
NM: Ugh! I just want to be able to speak to my babies again. When will someone do something about that stupid dome?!
TT: Something is still interfering with you and your necromancy?
NM: Didn't you hear? Newtonia and zer crew at UW figured it out - that the new energy dome in LA? Pure f______ faith magic. It's radiating more purification vibes through the atmosphere than a ⁠ga______ priest on a mass exorcism spree. That's why it's felt like there's been a wall between me and the dead for weeks.
LS: Whooa, really?! o
AN: α- Affirmative. If you believed something hard enough in the general vicinity of that dome, it might actually happen. We haven't seen that much concentrated wish fulfillment in the ambient energy readings since, well - ever. It would be much more fascinating if the world weren't ending -Ω TT: Ah. Yes. That.
AN: α- Considering the header of the memo, I'd say we are all strenuously avoiding the topic at hand
-Ω
AN: α- Has anyone made any progress in divining how it will happen, or how to prevent it? -Ω
LS: ...Are you guys being serious? I †hough† †ha† o†her memo was jus† a joke!
HA: we're not touching this one with a 1046 foot pole. we're done. we're out of the apocalypse ending business. we met our goddamn quota.
TT: My own sources have stated emphatically that preventing the end of the world is most likely impossible. And recent events have...shaken me badly. I could try to see what the most fortuitous path might be to stop the Reckoning, but I've never tried something on that scope before.
AN: α- Everyone we can spare is trying to extrapolate that ~ATH code you brought up and reverse engineer it, but they just keep getting looped by higher and higher levels of abstraction in the source code. The death loops just keep stacking and interlacing. It's like it's not just the Earth that is doomed to be annihilated, but literally all of reality. I don't think it's even possible to code something like that, even in ~ATH -Ω
LS: But †ha†'s jus† †errible! :(
AA: oh i wouldnt say it was all a bad thing necessarily AA: in the end all loops must be tidied up
HA: well that's a shitty way of looking at it.
AA: really? i suppose thats just my perspective on it
AA: all things will end in time
AA: even reality!
NM: ...That's...really f______ morbid. And I say that as someone who regularly communes with dead people.
AA: heheheh
AN: α- Galya, ty? -Ω
ВГ: ...
ВГ: –––
ВГ: ...
LS: (I'm not †he only one who's seeing a bunch of do†s, right†? My †ransla†or can'† be †ha† buggy!)
NM: (Definitely not just you.)
ВГ: Мой сигнал умер на секунду. Прошу прощения.
ВГ: Я видела, что произойдёт. Некоторые из них, в любом случае. Проклятые метеоры...Какое бедствие.
TT: Nothing new?
LS: Oh my s†ars, we're so doomed...
ВГ: Я оставила инструменты, но мне нужно было ехать на север, через Якутию. Они будут продолжать посылать данные на вас, аН.
AN: α- Kuda ty xodish? Shto sluchilos? -Ω
ВГ: Что-то странно. Что-то, что беспокоит меня. Момент конвергенции нескольких совпадений. Мне нужно связаться с Защитником и обратиться за помощью. Он не часто говорит человеку, но я верю, что он сделает исключение.
HA: (it could have been any language. it could have been ecclesiastical latin. hell, i'm good at latin. but no. it had to be russian.)
NM: (your f_____ up latin exorcisms don't count, j______.)
HA: (dude you need to learn how to let go of a grudge, okay. lay off.)
ВГ: Это хорошая новость - одна из моих отчужденных кузенов связался нашу семью в первый раз за много лет! Правдиво это признак апокалипсиса...
AN: α- Heh -Ω
AA: :) :) :) see this is much better! you just have to find a little humor in the situation is all
AA: no need to get all gl00my about everything just because theres an apocalypse due!
TT: Positivity as a coping mechanism in the face of imminent doom? I suppose I can see the merits, AA.
TT: ...Hang on...
AN: α- You are new to the boards, Arisen. Your profile looks a little odd, I noticed; it looks like the account age counter is off by a couple centuries. Something you wanted to share? -Ω
AA: i couldnt say :
LS: Hey, hey, no need to in†erroga†e a new member! Posi†ivi†y sounds like a grea† idea †o me, AA. o I'm sure †his whole mess will †urn ou† †o be no†thing and we'll all be joking about† i† like we did wi†h †he las† apocalyp†e someone †hough† up~!
HA: again - you're fucking welcome.
AA: oh no :
AA: that wasnt the impression i meant to give
AA: im just excited to see what it looks like when this whole place breaks apart!
HA: what the hell.
AA: of course if someone thinks of a way to prevent it i guess thats okay too TT: AA.
TT: I wondered where I'd seen those initials before. There is a sense of duality to them. Something that would surely appeal to someone with a fondness for binary and twinned aesthetics. Someone whose handle might well also share an apocalyptic theme.
AA: :) :) :
TT: Aradia, the 'insane apocalypse maiden,' I presume?
AA: someones been talking to sollux! :) its just maid actually
AN: α- You two know each other? -Ω
TT: We share a mutual acquaintance.
AA: im glad everything worked out okay with john AA: once that storm started gathering i was afraid something would go catastrophically wrong way ahead of schedule!
TT: Could we take this to private messaging?
AA: sure thing :) its good to speak to you at last rose. id like us to be friends!
AA: please feel free to pester me whenever you like. im made of time after all -- apocalypseArisen [AA] will leave the chat! --
AN: α- Perhaps we should contact one of the moderators. That account seems very glitched -Ω
AN: α- I say that, and then I realize just how trivial a thing it is to worry about a possible hacked account in the face of the end of the world -Ω LS: Everyone, I †hink I need †o †ake a break...My head is sore...
-- ladyStardancer [LS] has left the chat! --
NM: S____, I'm out too. It's not even worth sticking around to reclaim my quirk color. There's a total a_____ in LA I need to send a sternly worded curse to, see how much he likes it when someone d____ around with his magic.
HA: haha, don't.
NM: You can't stop me, d______s, you don't even know where I live now!
HA: dude, we will fucking find you. don't make us come over there.
-- necroMancer [NM] has left the chat! --
HA: not a fucking gain.
-- huntersAnonymous [HA] has left the chat! --
AN: α- Galya, bud ostorozhen -Ω
BF: ...
BF: ...
AN: α- And you as well, Thaumaturge. Be careful. I know from some of the readings we've been seeing out here that there have been a lot of anomalous events occurring out your way -Ω
TT: Just one thing before I go - would you mind forwarding me some of what you have learned about that dome over Los Angeles. I have a personal acquaintance with a particular interest in Horrors who might be venturing out to investigate what caused such a drastic change in the dome and the ambient energy in the surrounding area. If I know her, she's getting impatient by now.
AN: α- Not a problem, but if it's a chaos type hivemind she's looking for, she may be out of luck. You were right that this magic isn't light, either. Someone's generating a hell of a lot of raw power and Mancer's not wrong that if they can generate it in this capacity, they can probably use it for anything they can think of -Ω
AN: α- Makes you wonder what'll end the world first - all this chaos, Galya's meteors, or this guy, whoever he is -Ω TT: I'm not ready to make a bet on that. Not yet. I would rather see what can be done to keep the planet in one piece.
AN: α- Fair enough -Ω
-- alternativeNewtonia [AN] has left the chat! --
-- thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] has left the chat! --
-
It is very obvious to those with eyes to see that the Scratch children bear absolutely uncanny resemblances to the guardians. When the DNA test results rush through the lab and arrive late in the afternoon, it just confirms that Roxy is almost an exact genetic clone of Rue. No one seems sure how the Midnight Crew could have pulled it off. The best explanations - or worst, really, depending on how one views it - are those that point out that Samuel Egbert would have had every opportunity in the world to obtain genetic samples from each intended custodian over the years.

Even Dirk and Roxy, the two who had the hacking prowess and autonomy needed to try to snoop around while they were still in the complex where they were 'synchronized' and trained, can offer little to explain their origins. They have a lot to say about the Felt - the doctor who developed the mindgrub procedure, Dienek, inspires a good deal of anger, in particular. Neither knows much about Doc Scratch, having never come in direct contact with the boss of the two merged gangs, but they shed a little more light on the nature of the Midnight Crew's inner workings. The tension that boils between the Felt and the Midnight Crew proper; the way that nearly everyone involved in either gang has gone under Dienek's knife once before; the uncanny abilities of the mysterious Felt 'hat' members, who can apparently manipulate time in their own unique ways.

Rose can tell the exact moment that Dave shuts down to process all of this; her brother expresses more than he means to in his body language, and when he shudders and whips out his phone in the middle of the conversation, she knows he's checking out of the discussion. Jade, previously in the middle of having Roxy help her braid her hair, doesn't seem to have realized that she's stopped braiding and begun to just tug on a lock of hair listlessly. Karkat hasn't stopped glaring at his phone suspiciously this entire time - Rose can't discern if it's because Dave's pestering him or due to some other distraction. Despite their combined best efforts, the troll still looks like he's in a decline again, haggard and alternating between periods of unnatural quiet and increasingly snappish fury.

The only person in the room with energy to spare is Roxy; the rest of them could sleep for a week and it would probably do them a world of good. It's hard, contemplating the vast array of trials and enemies that have once again stacked up before them. It's hard, and Rose thinks John has the correct idea when he makes the executive decision to doze off.

A quiet moment with Kanaya is exactly what Rose needs after all this. So she makes it happen. When the rest of the heroes have either fallen asleep or scattered, haunting the lab like shadows of their former selves, Rose squeezes Kanaya's shoulder and tilts her head to the side in silent query. Kanaya blinks and nods, and they leave the room. "I'll meet you there," Rose says, when they reach a juncture in the hallways, and Kanaya gives her a doubtful look. "I require tea. There's an electric kettle in one of the break rooms, as I recall. If I take more than a minute, I give you formal permission to drag me back from whatever den of boozy iniquity I've stumbled into."

Kanaya just raises her eyebrows, takes out her phone, and stares at the time as she continues the rest of the way to the room where she and Rose have set up camp. Thinking, grimly, that she should have perhaps said 'a few minutes' rather than just one, Rose hastens to the break room, unplugs the sad white kettle from the wall to fill with water, and pilfers the entire tin of tea bags when she realizes it's still sealed. No one in the facility has been drinking tea of late, it would seem.

Of course, she needn't have hurried, because Kanaya has settled herself down in one of the impromptu piles that litter the room, buffered with a mattress that they 'borrowed,' when Rose powerwalks through the doorway. Which means that Kanaya was just messing with her about the countdown. Blast. The jadeblood has what appears to be a lime green armbands folded over one knee as she stitches a seam along the beginnings of a sleek, sleeveless black shirt. "What are you working on, Kanaya?" Rose asks as she turns the electric kettle on and pours water into the borrowed mugs, passing Kanaya the one emblazoned with the mug that, well, may in fact be an oddly shaped beaker or measuring cup, judging by the markings on the clear glass. It's too late to switch it out now. She takes the other, which boasts a vintage portrait of a man in a lab coat proclaiming 'New, Improved Science: Now, With Death Rays!' and adds a dollop of milk as Kanaya adds a sample of blood to her own mug.

"Something for Jade." Kanaya lifts a different pile of fabric by a sleeve that has been completed - the rest of the garment is still held together by pins and prayers. "I would have had all these completed sooner, but to be honest, I never anticipated the number of fashion-challenged heroes this road trip would give me the chance to meet in person. All of my designs were purely hypothetical before now."
"And that?" Rose stirs her tea and gestures with her chin to the other pile as she sits. She curls in close and rests her chin on Kanaya's shoulder, closing her eyes for a moment to settle herself as she takes comfort in the solidity of Kanaya at her side.

Kanaya smiles and touches the side of her face to the top of Rose's head, her claws never ceasing to stitch. "For Karkat. It is a little less...interesting, maybe, but also more functional than what he has right now."

"Do you think you'll be able to talk them into changing? You and I may exchange hero guises without qualm, but Karkat may be more attached to his." She doesn't think Jade will care much; the other girl has been wearing the same series of three or four space-patterned suits and lab coats for years; a change in costume would probably delight her, even if she never sought one out. Karkat seems more of a creature of habit, though.

"He requires a disguise with more armor, no matter what he says. He might as well be wearing nothing at all," Kanaya says, rolling her eyes. "I will grant that he has more fortitude than I would have thought, to pull off something as audaciously skintight as that and still venture out in public, but I would be remiss if I didn't at least offer him an alternative that might prevent him from having his rib cage smashed in at the next opportunity." Kanaya then smiles, her eyes glittering with mischief as she tosses a scrap of fabric at Rose's face; Rose unfolds it, to find it's Hemogoblin's eye mask. "Also, something that actually conceals his identity. How he and John didn't recognize each other for ages continues to boggle the mind."

Rose looks on as Kanaya begins the arduous process of attaching a Kevlar lining to the inside of the shirt, and notices only when Kanaya turns it over that it isn't just her imagination: the tank top is far shorter than it should be, cropped so that skin would definitely be exposed if Jade wore it without something underneath. "Functional, hm?"

"Jade is far more resilient than most," Kanaya says, holding the shirt up before her to inspect it with a critical eye. "So I'm trying to take that, as well as her personality, into account. It lets me be - creative. Though I have no idea where I'm going to obtain more lime green dye in the middle of the mountains..."

Rose hums, her head bobbing as she lets her eyes fall closed. If she presses her nose to Kanaya's shoulder, she can smell tea and blood, sealed paint and the faint perfume meant to cover it. And given the softness of this particular pile, it is all too easy to snuggle closer. The mug of tea in her hands is almost forgotten, a weight that radiates warmth through her hands and up her arms, and when she rouses herself enough to take a sip, she can almost forgive that it's the cheapest kind of store brand tea available in all of Washington state.

"Rose, before you sleep," Kanaya says, though her voice goes low as she says it.

"Yes?"

"I have been thinking about Los Angeles."

Ah. Rose will need to be awake for this. She blinks her eyes open and sets the tea aside before it can lull her back into a drowse. Kanaya still hasn't set her sewing aside, but Kanaya is good at multitasking. "I thought this might come up soon," Rose says, not sure whether to call the twist in her lips a smile or not. "Particularly given the multitude of delays that have held us up here, again and again, when I'm sure you've been wanting to move along."

Kanaya shakes her head. "To be fair, this situation here in Seattle does appear to have been dire. I shudder to think what might have happened if we had continued on before John's peril became clear."

"Perish the thought."

"And I am growing rather fond of all of your friends. Even your brother, as obnoxious as he can be - I am glad to have been here to lend my assistance." Kanaya's eyes narrow as she pauses sewing to rest her chin on a fist. "But I cannot deny that I still want to find out what in the world is going on beyond that dome. Do you know that the news has begun to report unverifiable rumors of miracles, of all things, occurring in the general vicinity of it? The grimlight abomination may be gone, but if the heroes in Los Angeles were going to bring down that construction from the inside, I believe they would have accomplished it by now, or at least attempted and failed."

Rose feels her lips curve into a proper smile as she rubs her cheek on Kanaya's shoulder. "Miracles might not be all that out of the realm of the possible. According to my sources, it's powerful faith magic. It is most likely fueled entirely by the power of hope."

Kanaya gives her a look. Kanaya is a master of looks, really, and this one says all it needs to about what Kanaya thinks about this news. "Is that a thing now," she says, utterly deadpan. "Why was I not informed of this."

"Well, it's not as though the sheer quantity of hope that we're seeing here has ever been manifested before. I can only speculate that the source must be a powerful new majykal practitioner, or a hero of some kind newly come into their powers, or we would have noticed them before." Rose stretches her arms out, lacing her fingers and pushing out until they give a satisfying little pop. "If you want to go investigate -"

She breaks off, as the rest of her thoughts catch up with what Kanaya is proposing. To go to Los Angeles would be to leave John - and Karkat, too, who could not be pried from John's general vicinity without consequences. On some level Rose has gotten it into her head that Dave and Jade and John and Karkat would of course accompany them to Los Angeles, that damnable instinct she thinks must be a product of the game that insists they would be stronger if they stuck together as a team.

But John can't be moved. Even now that he's recovering at twice the speed of any normal human after brain surgery, there is still the matter of his deep depression, and the Trickster that still lurks in his mind, ready to seize control and cause mayhem if John abdicates control of his conscious mind again. A trip to deliberately hunt for leftover traces of a Horrorterror manifestation is the last thing he needs to endure.

The thought of leaving him here, even for a matter of days, feels abhorrent. Rose has learned well that a 'few days' can change everything.

"That look on your face is terrible. Desist at once," Kanaya says, and Rose jolts a little when the jadeblood touches her face gently - and then flicks her on the nose. That snaps Rose right out of her woolgathering. "I know you do not wish to leave John. Not as things stand. That was why I intended to make a request of Jade."

"You mean...to have her transport you there?" Rose's mind whirls to include this in her considerations. She taps a finger to her pursed lips. "It would certainly be more expedient than driving all that way."

"I also have hope that she can utilize her space powers to circumvent the dome; then I could reconnoiter as well, pending further investigation when, perhaps, the situation is not so dire here." Kanaya nods, as though speaking the plan out loud has confirmed it for her. "Yes. You may remain here with John and the rest - the fact that these people need all the help they can get is one that I am comfortable stating for the record. If Jade does agree, we should be able to return in no time at all. I am still unsure about all of this business with the game, but the Midnight Crew needs dealing with. I will be here to help. If you all need me."

Rose smiles. The warmth from the tea has faded a little, but nonetheless something golden and warm seems to have bubbled up in her chest. "When do you think you'll go?"

Kanaya shrugs. "I must still establish whether or not Jade would be amenable to such an excursion. If she has plans of her own, we would need to arrange for a moment that invites the least amount of interruption. Not for a few days yet, at least; I really do want to finish these costumes before traveling again."

"Then I wish you all the luck," Rose says. She finds she cannot stop smiling at Kanaya, nor does the warm glow in her chest appear to be fading in the near future. Being in love can feel so peculiar, sometimes.

Then she wraps an arm around Kanaya's waist and drags her down with her onto the pile. It upsets the stitchwork balanced on Kanaya's knee, but it also gives Rose an armful of Kanaya, and so it is justified.

"Rose."

"I'll send you a copy of all I learned in the morning," she assures Kanaya, pressing a kiss to her neck. "Cross my heart."

"I was going to occupy Karkat with a fitting tomorrow." Kanaya shakes her head and sighs, allowing her claws and the cropped shirt drop to rest on her stomach while Rose makes herself comfortable.

"Mmm. No. Sleep now."

"I do not sleep. You can rest while I keep working."

Rose finally figures out where to lay her head, so that her forehead just touches the side of Kanaya's head, beneath the base of her near horn. "Just for a little while longer." She squeezes the arm tucked around Kanaya, and Kanaya gives in with a huff, laying a hand over Rose's arm and rubbing small circles with the pad of her thumb. There's a sweet, singing hollow in Rose's stomach, part and parcel of that warmth in her chest.

Don't go just yet. Let me stay like this just a little while longer.

AA: I'm sure that when the time comes everything will turn out just as planned :)
AA: the end is nigh after all!
AA: also tell karkat I really am sorry
AA: I don't know what he's dreaming about but he can't wake up right now...
AA: we still have a ways to go yet!

---

30°20'N 81°39'W
The car has been set to zig zag across the country as it makes its way east.

Unfortunately, the car only has so many reserve gas tanks to run through before, at last, it trundles to a stop. It has other power sources, but no matter how the suggestions blink and beep on the dashboard, no one is sitting in the driver's seat to acknowledge them. Idling on the last of its juice, the car waits, neatly parallel parked alongside a random, unplotted hivering in a nondescript neighborhood. It still needs to travel north along the coast before it'll have reached the destination that was programmed into it. But again, there's no one driving it, and therefore no one to tell it otherwise.

Several hours later, when Equius Zahhak emerges and breathes in the throaty Florida humidity, the car is still there. By the time he's crossed the front walkway to reach the sidewalk, his heavy black shirt is soaked through with sweat, and the backs of his knees in his pinstriped leggings are excruciatingly moist. He makes sure to lay careful hands on the car's hood as he leans over to peer into the tinted windows, before tapping the button in his earpiece that shuts down the silent alarms that have been alerting him to an unfamiliar vehicle loitering outside his place of residence for half the morning.

Nepeta is due to arrive any moment. It will not do for there to be some suspicious automobile outside the house when she gets here; she'll insist on investigating it herself, and then where will they be? Instead, Equius sets himself to inspecting the car carefully. The license plates have never been registered anywhere in the United States, according to his computers, but oddly enough, he receives a ping from a database in Toronto, Canada. It will need looking into.

With a huff, Equius eases down into a crouch and frowns at the space between the tire and the wheel well. He hopes to at least find a keyring tucked away there, some sign that the owner of this perplexingly abandoned vehicle will return shortly, but he's already seen from the exterior camera feed that no one has exited or entered the vehicle since it rolled to a stop out here. A foolish notion, on his part.

The idea that this car apparently drove here of its own volition is even more foolish, though. Someone must have directed it to this location. It couldn't possibly have been coincidence. That would snap the suspension of disbelief in even the most trusting of trolls.

"Go forth," he says, plucking a handful of miniature, spindly drones from the pocket of his shorts. When he places them on the ground with sweating palms, the machines' tiny LED eyes flicker orange-red and begin to scuttle along the ground and up the tires to tap their way along the underside of the chassis. They are spiders, leftovers from his time supplying the Scourge with tools for her ludicrous exploits. He's severed ties with her - or rather, ties were mutually severed by virtue of his sabotaging her gauntlet arm from afar, and her proceeding to vanish into the night with her kismesis - and has yet to make the opportunity to redesign them to look more like horses or something else noble and elegant. But they are some of the most clever multipurpose tools he has designed on so small a scale, and therefore useful for tasks like this.

So he grinds his teeth in a tooth-splintering grimace when every single spider freezes in the midst of their inspection and starts whistling with alarm, warning him that something about the car is not normal. Some of them begin relaying what their simplistic 'eyes' see to his glasses, and Equius picks a shard of enamel from where it's lodged itself in his lower lip as he pieces together what he's seeing.

..."This...is not a car," he says at last. He gives up and lies flat out on the road to roll under and look at this himself, growling and peeling greasy strings of hair out of his face when they insist on getting in the way. One of the spiderbots makes the mistake of dropping from an impossible extra duct onto his neck, and he squashes it with a single claw when he goes to brush it off. Even in the shade cast by the car, which prevented the afternoon sun from reaching this particular rectangle of the road all day long, beads of sweat itch all along his back, and every time he twists he feels like the sweat is making more of the filthy grit of the road stick to him. But he won't risk moving this thing into his workshop when Nepeta's coming over, not until he knows what it is.

What he's seeing still makes no sense, even from this perspective. He removes his glasses, thinking perhaps that the added darkness has befuddled his otherwise excellent night vision, the boon of his species, but that doesn't make the underside of the car any less mindboggling. Equius can feel a headache stirring behind his forehead, and when he turns his head the jagged keratin of his broken horn drags across the concrete and makes it worse. This car is riddled with extra parts; they're expertly tucked underneath so that no casual passerby would notice anything amiss, but it's been retooled so thoroughly that he's not surprised the spiderbots couldn't figure out if it was a threat or not.

He almost wants to say it looks like a - but no. That would be absolute foolishness of the highest degree. He won't think the thought. Instead, he slides back out from under the car, the back of his shirt and binder riding up uncomfortably. "Fiddlesticks," he mutters, yanking them back down before he sits up.

And goes perfectly, utterly still at the sight of the people standing around him.

Oh dear. Oh, horsefeathers. He only managed to venture outside today because he worked himself up to it all morning long, pacing for long hours back and forth in the relative safety and security of his workshop before forcing himself out the door into the exposing light of day. He even convinced himself to do it without the armor of multiple layers of sweaters that would shield him from the sight of others, because he was only going to the edge of his own lawn. Since an...incident a short time ago, he has ensured that his neighbors have seen even less of him than usual, but has also monitored their comings and goings so that he knows when the neighborhood is most likely to be deserted. Everyone should be at work or school at this moment; this is a troll neighborhood, populated almost entirely by coldbloods of various ages, and therefore there are no human custodial figures who might have elected to work from home, only the occasional lusii who, not feral like Nepeta's, rarely leave their lawnrings.

This is...unacceptable. He's already awash with sweat; now, as he climbs stiffly to his feet, he can feel the heat of the sun burning down on the back of his neck. Far worse are the eyes on him, though - four pairs in total, two trolls and one human in black, and a single, wide-shouldered woman in bright lime green, who rolls a coin over her knuckles as she smiles at Equius with eyes just dark enough that they're not the teal blue of a troll. Her hair has been combed back harshly from her face, but the plait of it coils over her shoulder like a coarse, knotted rope. The sun glints off the tie that holds it in place, and Equius tenses. It's not a tie - it's a chunk of metal, heavy enough that if she spun fast enough the braid would be a flail.

"So, 'zul," the human in green says, swallowing s's fast and dropping consonants where they inconvenience her, "you wanna be compañeros? Or do you wanna make this harder than it has to be?" She sounds earnest, her eyes bright and her smile close-mouthed as she tilts her head back, the blunt brim of her hat barely shading her face as the sun plays over long bangs.

"I beg your pardon," Equius says slowly, taking in the other three and realizing with growing unease that none of them are familiar. None of these people have ever shown up on his surveillance of the neighborhood. This is...troubling. No matter how innocuous the woman acts, all four have the look of some of the hardest criminals he and Nepeta have dealt with in their midnight rounds of the city, and the fact that the three in black are all wearing ragged suits in a similar style, in the middle of the day - "I do not believe we've met before. Can I help you?"
The woman laughs, rattling and fast like a machine gun. "'Course you can. Compays, remember?"

She smiles again, leaning more of her weight to one side so that her hip juts out and the coattails of her suit jacket swing. "Call me Quatorze, cariño. Me and my friends, we just want to know how a cute kid like you would end up all mixed up with a mujer peligrosa like Droog. That's all. Hm?"

Equius has to mentally scramble to keep up with the woman's accent; he prefers not to interact with people when he is forced by circumstances to leave his hive, and as such his practical knowledge of any languages other than Alternian and English leaves much to be desired. Moreover, none of them will stop staring at him and the more they stare the harder it becomes to resist the urge to solve this problem by punching them all in the face and absconding back into the safe darkness of his rooms. "I'm not familiar with anyone by that name. You would have to elucidate further."

Quatorze's smile doesn't shift an inch, and it requires a few more not-very-discreet glances around the circle before Equius picks up on the fact that his words have caused the expressions of the other three to darken. The two trolls, previously standing with their horns at neutral angles, have begun to lower their heads, eyes focused on him with intent. Their lime-green clad spokeshuman might be smiling, but the rest of the group don't seem to find his answers satisfactory.

"Oh, cariñito, don't play hard to get," Quatorze sighs, rolling the coin through her fingers again, faster than before, so that it catches the sun. If Equius weren't wearing his sunglasses, as cracked as they are, the flicker of light might have dazzled him. "This'll only take a momentico if you just play nice. We followed this auto de mierda halfway to hell and back - and where should Droog have it stop after all that, but outside one particular hivering..." She pauses - not long enough for Equius to even begin to formulate a response to a sentence as nonsensical as that last one - just long enough to take out a phone and flip it open to nod at the screen. "In the middle of one of the biggest zonas nulas south of Maine and east of Houston." She flips the phone shut. "Coincidence? With Droog? Never."

Previously, Equius was sweating merely because...well, because the price of his incredible STRENGTH has always been paid with an equivalent amount of perspiration, and because, as loathe as he is to admit it to anyone but Nepeta, going out in public isn't one of his many strengths. He would be perfectly content to disappear completely if it meant no one laid eyes on him again, so he could work in peace and solitude.

But now, he can feel sweat prickling up and down his spine, along the soles of his feet, as his body grows even more tense. It's the kind of tension that precedes a strife - after all, he has four people who he highly suspects to be criminals of some sort making ludicrous accusations on his front lawn. He isn't sure what to do with his expression, either; it tends to fall into a default, tooth-grinding scowl when he's on edge, which he most definitely is right now. He knew this car could be nothing but trouble, but this is far worse than he anticipated. He must settle this before Nepeta returns.

"Be that as it may, I must disappoint you. I have never communicated with anyone called 'Droog.' This is not an attempt at misdirection. If you have come for the vehicle, you are welcome to it."

Equius steps to the side, careful, aware as he shuffles that both of the trolls in the group are some shade of indigo, like himself. As his equals, they could prove difficult to handle.

Not that anyone ever really has before. Equius simply recognizes that if anyone could match him in terms of STRENGTH, it would be someone with blood as cold as his own.

"Hey, hey, slow down, kid!" Quatorze sidesteps with him, the other human in the group of four neatly stepped out of her way so that she can stay level with Equius, grinning all the while. "We're cool, we're cool. We're just talking. Like friends, right? Lemme guess, Droog just asked you to strip the car down and make it disappear? She likes delegating, that one. Como una encantadora!" The human picks up the pace, so that when Equius tries to dodge out of the circle formed by the four and the car, she's right in his path, tossing her bangs as she inspects the coin balanced on her knuckles. "Likes void, too, these days. A nice hidden place like this, that no one could see? Right up her alley."

"I don't know why this place would be any more occluded than any other," Equius says, hands clenching into fists. "I just came out to see why this vehicle has been idling outside my home. That's all. Now please remove yourselves from my property."

Quatorze studies his face - she has to look up to do it, but the foot of difference between their heights does nothing to calm Equius's stiff panic. He can feel a dull flush staining his cheeks, sweat dripping from his temples in ever more copious trickles as the human stares him down. He can feel the other three watching his rigid shoulders, too. Nights of fighting crime with Nepeta have instilled in him positively unacceptable instincts which urge him to deck all four of these people and escort them in zipties to the nearest available police station. But he has no proof that they're criminals at all. They've done nothing but ask him oddly leading questions about a very unusual car that he wants nothing to do with.

Then Quatorze starts laughing again, tossing the coin into the air. She snags the quarter midflip without waiting for it to fall to the ground, and slides it into the same pocket as her flip phone. "I like you!" she declares, turning her gaze so that she's looking at the car instead. Equius sags with relief at the lack of scrutiny. "You seem like a real smart kid. Wouldn't lie to me, nah?"

"...No," he says at last, when it seems she's waiting for an answer.

"Then we'll get along just fine. Bueno." Quatorze raps her knuckles against the hood of the car, nodding. "Yeah, just fine. Droog kinda sprung this one on you, huh?"

Equius almost nods along with her before he catches himself. "I am still not familiar with anyone by that name."

"Oh. The Crew's Trébol, then? Clubs Deuce? Ringing a few more bells?" Quatorze starts nodding for him again, like it's a given that he agrees. Equius can't seem to stay on top of the conversation - he wants, badly, any kind of excuse that would get these people and this execrable, troublesome car away from his home. He doesn't even care why the vehicle came here unpiloted, crammed with excess parts, and apparently watched by group of inexplicable ruffians; he just wants this interaction to be at an end. "Pobrecito...He always was wrapped around Droog's little finger. I could see her talking him into it, no matter what Dienek did. Yeah...

"I don't know that person either," Equius says. He has to dredge up the words and force them out of his throat, but he makes himself sound firm and unyielding. It is utterly unacceptable that he's letting this strange human control the conversation when he just wants it to end. He needs to make himself more clear, and stop sweating; in this context, it can only be making him look guilty. Curse his perspiration glands... "You seem to have some issue with the two of them, but I'm not a part of any of this. Now, if you do not stand aside, I will contact that authorities." There. That should be commanding enough. Surely these people will understand now.

He's underestimated others' capacity for stubbornness, though. Or perhaps he's just not as commanding and convincing as would befit a blueblood of his hemotype. The human tosses her braid and laughs, the deep, murky blue-green bowtie around her neck exposed. The braid itself thumps against her back with an audible thud that makes Equius jolt. "Ah, you're good, 'zul! Not bad at all." She leans in and Equius steps back, feeling part of the front bumper of the car creak and crumple beneath the iron strength of his calf. Oops. "But whatever they're paying you to be this discreet? The Felt can match it. So relax, my friend, yeah? Don't sweat it!" Her smile is cocky. "I gotta a good friend in accounting, a real pal. He and I, we can hook you up."
"No one is paying me anything, and - and I don't need to explain myself to you any further. You are being unreasonable, and this conversation is at an end." Equius jerks his chin to the side and starts walking back toward the house. He should never have left it, in retrospect. He's soaked through with sweat, his sunglasses seem to be cracking just from being in close proximity to his furrowed brow, and the binder feels simultaneously too tight and as though it is doing absolutely nothing to accomplish its purpose. He needs to contact N-

"Equius!"

Equius stops and closes his eyes, but this does nothing to make Nepeta stop racing down the sidewalk toward him, her white uniform skirt tangled up with a new bright blue cat's tail. She's early. Today, of all days, she is early. The timing could not have been worse; even one half hour more, and the car and its unpleasant hangers-on might have already vacated the premises. "You're outside!" she says, delighted, her wild hair already starting to defy gravity where the helmet would have matted it down earlier. Then, as Equius turns, shoulders hunched, to shake his head and attempt to order her to make her way into the house at once, Nepeta coasts to a stop short of tackling him, her last step dragging as she frowns at the four people gathered around the car. "Equius? Who are they?"

"Nepeta. Not now. Get into the house, now," he orders, blood on his tongue. He can't even tell what tooth has shattered, this time.

To his horror, Quatorze speaks again before Nepeta can obey (or argue with him, as the cross look on her face would suggest is the way she intends to respond). "Nepeta, huh? Hey, another friend! You should have said something, 'zul, if you were expecting company and all."

This is not good. This is the opposite of good. This is, in fact, very bad. "Are these guys bothering you meow, Equius?" Nepeta says, pouting with suspicion as she eyes the gangsters. The last thing he needs is Nepeta fixating on these people - let alone vice versa.

"No one is bothering anyone. They were just leaving," Equius says, insistent.

A hand lands on his shoulder. "Who said anything about leaving? You wound me, Equius," Quatorze says, repeating the name as though it's the most marvelous things she's heard this year. "Equius and Nepeta, mis nuevos compañeros. We were just having a nice talk between friends. No need to run off!"

Equius jerks away from the hand - too fast. The sharp snap of one of Quatorze's fingers being yanked from its socket sounds too loud in the otherwise empty street. The human yelps, yanking her hand back to her chest, and Equius feels the other three moving before he hears them. Nepeta lunges but he hauls her around as he rounds on the four hooligans, forcing Nepeta behind him repeatedly when she claws at his arm and yells downright lewd invectives at the three levelling specibi at them. Two guns and a knife - Equius can more than handle those -

"No, no! We're fine!" Quatorze says, breathless but sharp, waving her free hand at the other three. Her laugh sounds more like choking as she raises the dislocated finger and prods at the already swelling, soft flesh of the human digit. "Our new friend's got a good pull!" Her eyes, when she lifts them to smile at Equius again, are malicious beyond a shadow of a doubt. "Equius y Nepeta," she repeats.

He recognizes the threat for what it is. Another tooth crunches into shards at his own foolishness; he couldn't have stopped Nepeta from using his name to greet him, but he should have stopped himself from using Nepeta's name in front of these people.

Because this human won't forget either of their names, now.
"Leave," he says, one last time. There's too much growl in his voice for anyone to hear the wretchedness behind it.

"Just tell me what they asked of you, Equius, what they promised you," Quatorze says coaxingly, shrugging and letting the hand with the dislocated finger hang loose by her side. "Droog and Deuce. Our poor wayward amigos en común. I understand, I really do! Droog is a lovely woman, always so sly. I admire her, myself! But she...doesn't like loose ends. What she's promised you won't be worth the price you pay."

"What is she talking about, Equius?!" Nepeta hisses in his ear. She keeps trying to wriggle out from behind him, but Equius is an expert at maneuvering her so that she stays a warm weight, safe at his back.

"I do not know," he says, though not quietly enough that only Nepeta hears. Quatorze won't stop looking at him, waiting for an answer he doesn't have to give, but he has to divide his attention between all four of the strangers, waiting for his glasses to analyze the make and model of each gun - the balance point of that knife - yes, he can manage this.

Then Quatorze shakes her head, and twists her lips to the side, and reaches behind her under the folds of her suit jacket. "Ah, I don't like treating friends like this! But you're being very stubborn and not very smart, kid." The coin she draws out is heavier and darker than the first one, a circle of gunmetal-grey that she flips without breaking eye contact. "Cara." This time, she catches it flat in her palm - and the whole thing expands, swapping out into a minigun that she swings up expertly into the crook of her arm. "That's better! Now, where is Droog?"

On the one hand, this complicates things, because there is now a multi-barreled, hand-held Gatling gun pointed at Equius. On the other, it simplifies them, because by extension, there is also now a multi-barreled, hand-held Gatling gun pointed at Nepeta.

There is only one logical response to such a situation.

"Nepeta, go!" he says, one last time, though he knows she won't listen. When he pushes her to the side, so that she will at least have the mysterious car between her and the rest of their assailants, Nepeta somersaults, tearing her school bag open with her claws and coming up in a crouch with a pair of clawkind strapped to her hands that he could have sworn he confiscated several months ago. The first indigo, the one with a pistol, never sees her coming; while their eyes stay fixed on Equius, Nepeta skirts the trunk of the car in a silent leap, yowling only at the last moment as she collides with the troll and knocks him to the ground.

Equius, meanwhile, does his utmost to keep the other three occupied. Starting with Quatorze, whose miniature machine gun poses the most potential for devastating consequences. If she fires that thing, she could unleash an absolutely ridiculous amount of bullets on them. Intending to crush it in his fists, Equius reaches out with both claws, shoving the circle of rifle barrels up toward the sky.

Before he can close his hands and squeeze the minigun into a pretzel, though, the metal abruptly vanishes from under his claws. Quatorze smiles and catches the coin that reappears in its place. She sidesteps his charge, flips the coin again, and calls, "Cara!" When the coin smacks her palm, it's a minigun again.

What a pernicious strife specibus. And while Equius has been distracted by the woman's antics, the other indigoblood and human have circled around him. Nepeta appears to have the fourth hooligan well in claw, as blue blood pours down his face and the flesh of his arms hangs in strips, but she can only do so much like this. It wouldn't ordinarily be an issue if he were wearing armor, but this was supposed to be a normal day.
Oh, applesauce. Equius snaps his fingers. As one, the spiderbots clustered under the car swarm out and latch onto the nearest target - the other human's pants' leg. They are light and deft, so it takes a long moment before the human yells and jerks away from the strife, preoccupied with the spiders scurrying up towards his groin. They don't have much by way of offensive weaponry, but they'll do as a distraction.

When the other indigoblood rushes Equius, he lets it happen. He doesn't punch him so much as he puts out his fist and the fool runs into it; Equius only has to plant his feet and wait. When the troll rams into him, he feels little more than a faint jolt. The attacker doesn't let go of his knife, even when the air appears to have been knocked out of him, so Equius helps him by closing his fist on the troll's claws until they creak and snap. The knife slices into his palm a little but cracks in two before falling to the ground.

To his left, Nepeta squawks as her opponent finally succeeds in hauling her off and throwing her. She slams into the hood of the car and rolls again, but the thud of her body on impact sets off that something twitches in Equius's mind, some switch that tends to react to threats to his moirail very poorly -

(some old flicker of thought, a shame more dream than memory)

- so that when the black-suited indigoblood recovers enough of his breath to try to pull back and draw a new weapon, Equius seizes him by the front of the suit and throws him.

Hard. Harder than he means to, except that in this moment, with Nepeta yelling screaming in his ears, he does mean it. The other troll flies over the tarmac, limbs flailing, and Equius catches a brief moment of surprise on the other troll's face before he ploughs through the front window of the hive across the street.

A flash of lime green in the corner of his eye gives him warning that Quatorze has moved again. Still seized by adrenalin, Equius turns back to her with both hands raised to grapple the specibus from her hands, but the human is out of reach, her palms turned up toward him beseechingly with the minigun slung around her neck. "Come on, no need for all that! We just want Droog and Clubs. A coupla nice kids like you - no need to start a fuss like this! Compañero, I promise you, if you tell me what your orders were, this'll go so smooth."

"I received! No! Orders!" Equius throws a punch.

Quatorze opens fire. One moment her hands are wide and open, and the next she braces the minigun expertly and sparks and noise spit from the barrels as they rotate, the external power source on the side of the gun vibrating with the aftershocks. A sharp, burning pain jars Equius in the side, throwing his aim off, and he half-falls, half-twists out of the way of the rest of the burst before it can strafe across him. Instinct has him turning even though he shouldn't turn his back on the woman - but he has to reassure himself with the sight of Nepeta tucking tail and slithering her way under the belly of the car to relative safety, her olive eyes gleaming at him in the shadows. "Equius!" she shouts, as the hail of bullets punch through the metal of the hood of the car.

He looks down at the cold blood oozing in dark blue splotches through his shirt.

Then, incensed, he reaches out and closes a hand on Quatorze's ankle to yank her down. With an 'Oof!' she falls over, the bone human-thin and fragile under Equius's grip, and the last of that burst of gunfire spends itself firing at the sky. Never letting go of the specibus, the human drives her free foot down to break his nose, but his nose has endured worse. He bares his teeth at her and pulls so that the minigun clatters across the ground into his range. He raises a fist to smash it before she can swap it out for a coin again.
"Oh, you have orders, E-qui-us," the human hisses, pulling the barrels away, again. "Never knew a civ that could pack a fistkind like that. Where does that crazy mujer find you people, is the real question!" Before Equius can protest the point for what feels like the thousandth time, someone rushes him from the side and he has to scramble back onto his feet. The twinge of the wound in his side slows him only for a moment before he sees that the human he set the spiderbots on has squashed the last of them, and is coming back around with his pistol raised. His head spins a little with the change in altitude as he rises, and he jams his hand to the bullet wound to apply pressure with his knuckles.

"Nyao!" Nepeta leaps on the human from behind. Her clawkind strikes true, jamming into the soft flesh of the man's forearm, and her other arm locks around his neck. She looks absolutely ferocious, and just past the two struggling figures Equius can see that the indigoblood lies on the ground with his face ravaged, unconscious. The other one, the one he threw into the house across the street, has yet to resurface. Excellent.

"The Felt will know where Droog went, one way or another," Quatorze says when Equius turns and punches again. This time she can't quite dodge fast enough and Equius clips the outside of her elbow. The bone shatters - he knows it does, he knows his own strength after all these years - but the human just flinches and keeps turning out of his way, collapsing the minigun back into a coin when Equius presses the advantage and reaches for it. "Clubs's car," she continues, bending backward to dodge his swing, "deep in the void," and she rolls back up with the coin falling past her face, "here with you - escudo - aha!" She whirls and her braid snaps out; Equius only remembers the chunk of metal clamped around her hair too late, and it catches him across the claw sharp enough to make him jerk back. He stumbles back, and the coin transforms back into a minigun before Quatorze snags it again. He is sure that must be cheating. "We never did know most of Droog's contractors!"

"I am not one of them," Equius says, but he's getting the feeling this won't change what the human has talked herself into believing. His hand and side throb - the hand's just barely bruised, though. His STRONG disposition allows him to power through the worst of the pain from his side as well, and he thinks that blood has stopped hemorrhaging from the wound and begun to clot.

This situation is still...dare he say it? Manageable.

"Oh, but you must be! Why else would we be here?" the woman asks, looking genuinely bewildered. Her finger is on the trigger of the gatlingkind but she hasn't pulled it yet. Equius tenses to dodge out of the way, regardless. "We followed the car when the boss couldn't see it, all the way to where it stopped - here! No one else came to check on it while we were watching..."

"It was encroaching on my territory, and I was going to remove it. Now it appears that I have to remove intruders, too." Equius cracks his knuckles. Yes. This is far more in line with his interests.

Violence is much easier than social interaction. He highly recommends it as a method of solving problems.

Charging in would be ill-advised, though. Equius punches without the expectation of making contact as a way to put the human on her guard; when she flinches and dodges, he exerts all the force in the muscles of his legs to lunge - not for the minigun, too obvious a target, but for the arm that supports most of its weight where Quatorze cradles it to her side. He has tested how effective his leaps are under Nepeta's pushing, and has learned that he is more than capable of leaping small buildings. The speed and force of this jump, now that he exerted true effort, are more than enough for him to overtake the human. The lime of her suit's arm tears like tissue under his claws, and Equius latches onto her with the utmost precision - forearm and then just above the elbow. After that, it's a matter of mechanics: only a twitch of his hands, and the olecranon of Quatorze's weakened elbow fractures, the minigun spinning on its strap as the human lets out a hoarse scream.

He doesn't need his shades to identify the weak points of a human. He certainly doesn't need them to assess the electric motor that powers the minigun and tell him how to dismantle it. He just reaches out and smashes it, the metal still hot from firing under his cool skin. Digging his claws in proves most satisfying, because when Quatorze pulls away to try to put space between them again, all she succeeds in doing is helping him to tear the motor into pieces, rendering the specibus inoperable.

But just to be safe, Equius grabs the end of the barrels and yanks that as well. It only takes a fraction of his strength, and the damage is done. Metal squeals under his claws as Quatorze finally dances her way out of reach, so that there are groove marks running the length of the uppermost rifle barrel and sharp slivers jabbing into the clawbeds.

"And stay down, dipshit!"

"Nepeta, language," Equius says before he even finishes turning to see where Nepeta has ended up. He has no idea how she keeps picking up these sorts of vulgarities; he has had multiple stern talks with her football team, the most likely culprits, and they fear him well enough. He has his suspicions about some of those online forums she has been frequenting, though...

"Yeaaaah, I heard you, meowster," Nepeta says, grumbling as she raises her foot to stamp on the other human's face one more time. One of the extra-long claws on her specibus has broken off and sticks out of the tire of the car, which has slowly begun to deflate. Nepeta looks undamaged in all the ways that matter - that is to say, her school uniform will never be fit to be worn out in public ever again, but the only sign of actual injury is a stray trickle of olive blood dripping from her left nostril. She snorts as he watches, making the most undignified snuffling sound, and then rubs the rest of the blood off on her forearm. When he opens his mouth to reprimand her, she smiles and darts to his side to wipe a smear of blood (and most likely snot) off on his arm.

Sometimes, he despairs of teaching Nepeta civilized mannerisms. He closes his mouth, because when Nepeta is in a mood like this, complaints only encourage her misbehavior.

And despite the fact that the other member of the gang unaccounted for has yet to reappear - perhaps Equius punched him hard enough that hitting the house knocked him unconscious - they still have Quatorze herself to handle.

Of course, between the two of them, Equius has little doubt they can handle one human. Particularly one who is now listing to the side, frowning at the car and then at Equius, and back again. "Alright. That's fine. You're not half bad, kiddies," Quatorze says, grimacing. Her smile is gone, and her arm bends the wrong way. Her elbow is a swollen, purple-bruised wreck and the minigun twists at a ninety-degree angle. "So, I guess you really don't know why Droog sent the car to you...que molesto!"

"No one sent a car to anyone!" Nepeta tries to step forward; Equius puts out an arm and she wraps around it, scowling at him before adding, "You keep making all these crazy mousumptions!"

Quatorze laughs, shrugging. "I guess we shoulda expected Droog to pull some tricky shit. I remember this one time at the old - hang on, why am I telling you this?" She shakes her head, braid half-undone by the strife. "No hard feelings, right?"

Nepeta looks at Equius. It is one of those looks that expresses a remarkable amount of her thoughts without the need for words.

This time, it runs something along the lines of, 'this is compawlete and total horseshit,' because Nepeta's nonverbal vocabulary is just as foulmouthed as she's been, lately. Equius wishes he could communicate a silent reprimand with the same eloquence, but he has never really mastered facial contortions beyond grimacing and frowning, let alone minutiae like the 'glower of righteous remonstrance' or the 'reproving yet indulgent stare.' It will just have to go unsaid.

"You assaulted us over the matter of a misplaced vehicle," Equius says aloud, folding his arms tight. "I am afraid I must inform you that yes, there are...hard feelings."

"En serio? Shit. Shit!" Quatorze tugs at the bowtie around her neck, fretting at it until it's looser. "Ah, I just wanted to ask my two new friends some questions, and now you're mad at me..."

"Please tell me you called the pawlice," Nepeta whispers, bouncing on her toes while the human rambles on.

"There are multiple gunshot detection systems installed throughout the neighborhood. They should arrive momentarily." Most of the alerts route through Equius's work room before being forwarded on to the police dispatcher, of course, but when he didn't give a shutdown signal in the first three minutes, it would have forwarded itself to the police automatically.

He just hopes that they allow Nepeta to do most of the talking. He will have to explain the first few minutes of this ridiculous event to her before they arrive, because he has an unfortunate tendency to clam up and sweat enough to short-circuit waterproofed circuits in his armor - and that's when he and Nepeta are in their hero personas. He has managed to avoid dealing with people in positions of relative authority over him for the most part since applying for Nepeta's transfer to the Academy, and he would do much not to break that streak.

When he begins to listen to Quatorze again, however, he is just in time for yet more oddness. "Then there's only one thing for it!" the human says, still fiddling with her hair and sighing. The broken minigun vanishes from around her neck and reappears as a coin folded neatly in two on her palm. Smoothing her braid back down over the curve of her shoulder and patting at her clothes until they're in order again, Quatorze focuses on the two of them once more. "Equius and Nepeta! It has been very nice meeting you. But I guess I misunderstood something...it is a real shame, having to go back to tell the boss this was a bust, but I met two new compañeros, and isn't that what really matters, in the end?"

She smiles, her eyes crinkling and her cheeks flushed, and she holds up another coin. One that's unbent, and whole.

"Down!" Equius says, reinforcing his order by hauling Nepeta down against the street with him. Quatorze smiles merrily up at the coin as she flicks it into the air. But as Nepeta squirms and elbows him, trying to crawl out from underneath, Equius can see that this coin isn't the color of a gun: the two sides have different colors, one pale purple, the other dark green. He can't tell what design or numbers they might spell out.

The purple side lands face up in Quatorze's cupped hand though, and she heaves an exaggerated sigh of relief. The coin flickers and purple light starts shining up from the human's hand. "I'll remember you two!" she says. "We'll talk about the car again next time, alright? I know you'll think of something to tell me! But I must go for now. Hasta luego!"

Nepeta bristles and shoves Equius's arm out to the side, wriggling out from under his guard before he can pull her back in. "You're not going anywhere!" she says, pouncing.

She hits nothing but air. One hand skids on the ground when she lands, and she comes up in a crouch. Equius clicks his tongue as Nepeta raises the scraped up flesh of her palm to her mouth before she can lick it the way he knows she's going to.

But there are more significant things to be concerned about. First and foremost, the fact that Quatorze has been replaced by someone else entirely.

The situation is once again spiraling rapidly out of control. If possible, this sends even more of Equius's calculations into a tailspin than the minigun's appearance had. An incredibly dangerous strife specibus with a high potential for collateral damage is one thing; having one's assailant swap out with someone new is quite another.

"And don't forget to record the transactions properly - we don't need a repeat of what happened last time," the man says. His back is turned to both Equius and Nepeta as he scans a sheaf of papers. He's much shorter than Quatorze, with rounded shoulders and pale skin. He licks a finger and uses it to flip a page over, a mug of tea balanced in his other hand. "The revenue flow from slots still looks..." He trails off, glancing around him slowly with watery lavender-blue eyes. When he sees Equius and then Nepeta, he gives a little sigh. "Oh. This isn't accounting."

"This is Florida," Nepeta says, settling back on her haunches and watching the man with consternation. "Where did that weird lady go?! Do mew know?"

"Wei- oh, Quatorze was out in the field. That's right." The man adjusts his hat to scratch at his pale blond, flossy hair. "Why she felt the need to swap us out when I was in the middle of the quarterly budget meeting...I hope she hasn't been causing too much trouble?"

Nepeta jabs her clawkind accusingly at the two unconscious bodies on the road. "She attacked us over a car!"

"She seemed...deliberately, single-mindedly convinced that we knew information which we did not," Equius adds. "It was - perplexing."

The man nods along with them, his expression sympathetic. "Yes, she does that, sometimes, when she gets an idea in her head. She's still the newest at all this. Brash, you know." He scans the scene again, huffing at little as he catches sight of each downed person in a black suit. Equius straightens a little at the sound of sirens approaching. "And those would be the police?"

"Yes."

"Looks like I'll be picking up the tab for bail again." The man doesn't look angry; just resigned. Doffing his hat, he tucks the entire stack of paper along the inner curve and then sets it back on his head. As the first of the police cars rounds the corner, lights flashing, he shakes his head at the hole punched through the wall of the hive opposite. None of the three trolls who reside there appear to have been in residence, but now that there's no longer a machine gun pointed at him or Nepeta, Equius can see a single leg folded over the side of the hole in the wall, the only sign of the other troll. "Mmm. Still not as bad as the collateral from Seattle. That was a real nightmare to budget for."

By the time they sort out what story to tell the police - with the police standing right there, much to Equius's intense displeasure - and the purple-hatted man joins the three black suited gang members in the police cars with his mug of tea gone cold in his hand, Equius feels wrung dry. The man, who gives his name as Clover at some point in the stressful proceedings, raises the mug to them in a farewell gesture. He's remarkably chipper all the while, cooperating with the police and being utterly reasonable about the whole confused thing. "We'll send someone to tow the car for you, not to worry!" Clover calls before the door shuts on him, but it's no real consolation. Several of the neighbors have begun to return from their commutes and the low light of the late afternoon doesn't conceal Equius enough for him to be comfortable, not with the police lights casting everything into sharp, blue-and-red relief.

The police cars drive away, leaving him and Nepeta standing around by the accursed vehicle, but Equius keeps finding his gaze drawn back to the other trolls clustered together on other lawns and leaning over the hedges of the rings, luminescent eyes seeing everything. What are they whispering?

He is too tall, too obviously exposed. He hunches as much as he can, hair swinging into his face like a curtain to obscure his features, but it doesn't help. They're still going to know he was here, that this hive was visited by police. After all his work to ensure his hive and life go unnoticed, unobtrusive and ignored, this incident has upset his equilibrium.

"...What just happened?!” Nepeta exclaims, throwing up her hands. "Equius, what the effurloving heck did you do?! Who were those people?"

She's too loud, shouting and drawing even more attention down on them, and it's more than Equius can bear. Troll eyes gleam like jewels all around them, watching his every move.

With no other acceptable options at his disposal, Equius picks up Nepeta. It is, generally, a viable solution to many of his problems, because it allows him to carry her inside. The neighbor right next door has started edging down the sidewalk in their direction by the time Equius reaches the front door. His strength sabotages him, though - when he slams the door shut behind them, it splinters nearly in two.

But now that he is within the hive, he has more options. Using his fist, he punches one of the panels set into the wall next to the door, and the force is enough to depress the button behind the panel as well. Shields shutter down, another layer over the shades that already black out most of the windows in the upper half of the house, and the sagging halves of the door are shunted out of the way by an emergency blast door. "Lockdown initiated," the computer chimes in his ear.

"Lockdown?!" Nepeta kneels him in the side. Normally, Equius can more than take her writhing, but at the moment he has a bullet lodged in his torso that he is still ignoring and he grunts at the surprisingly sharp pain that spikes anew at the blow. "Equius, what is going on?"

"I do not know, Nepeta," he says, setting her down on the kitchen table, between the heaps of broken parts and shattered mugs. He can hear the faint clop of hooves as Aurthour returns from further within the house, a broom in one hand. The lusus looks at them quizzically, and then returns to the task of sweeping up the nuts, bolts, and assorted other fragmented tools that litter the floor. "But we will remain in here."

"Ugh, you're freaking out, aren't you! I can tell!" Nepeta jumps off the table and reaches for him. Equius dodges the touch and rips another panel off the wall instead, his claws shaking with the effort it takes to stay calm and not annihilate the keypad with a single touch. "A bunch of meowscreants just show up out of nowhere with guns and stuff? You can't just lock us up in here like a scaredy-cat, we have to go find out who they were! What if they come back?!"

"That is exactly what I fear will occur." When a final confirmation screen appears, Equius enters the code and closes the panel. The faint rumble of the ground shaking under their feet loosens the knot in his chest. "We'll be secure here for the time being."

When he can finally bring himself to lower his shoulders and relax out of the tense stance that kept him coiled and on high alert for the past hour, Nepeta has folded her arms, glaring at him without reservation.
Ah. It would appear that in his blind panic, he has truly annoyed her. It was not his intent, but in this, as in many things, he knows better. Nepeta is impetuous - her 'investigation,' if not carefully monitored and planned ahead of time, would be the most reckless of follies. "There are leads I will be able to research from here."

Nepeta says nothing. She just drums her claws on her arms.

Equius begins to sweat. But that is just a matter of course. It means nothing. Really. "A foe who wields a dangerous specibus and can vanish at will is not one that I will allow you to go out and hunt down. Even with your lusus, it would be intolerably dangerous. You will remain here as well."

Her teeth begin to glint, sharp even through her pout. Equius's sweating intensifies; what managed to survive the encounter on the street and the interaction with the police that followed will no doubt reek of sweat for generations to come after this. This is...an extreme sweat.

"That is final," he says. His voice falters, but doesn't fail him. Then he clamps his jaws shut and moves away, looking away from Nepeta's accusatory stare. He busies himself by stamping past Aurthour to reach the stairs down to his work space, and the lack of footsteps padding after him tells him just how very upset Nepeta is...feline.

Well. Nepeta can sulk as she likes. Equius has endured worse than her disappointment, though admittedly the list of things that are worse than upsetting Nepeta isn't a long one. He cannot condone the thought of her running around the city at night when these strange threats might still lurk around his house, trying to pinpoint a connection between the two of them and this enigmatic figure called Droog. He cannot stand the thought of venturing outside where someone could see him, not after an afternoon ruined like this.

To think, his main concern over the years has been ensuring that neither he nor Nepeta's identities as heroes would be exposed. But now here, on his own street, outside his own safeguarded home - that something like this could occur in broad daylight only reaffirms his worst fears.

There must be a way to secure the hive further. Something that could turn a strange threat like Quatorze away without her ever laying gun sights on Equius or Nepeta again.

He could not say for certain what leaps his mind takes next. Perhaps the answer presents itself to him of its own accord, like an old promise rising to the surface of his mind. All he knows is that the word that draws his attention, that begins to consume his thoughts as he hurries down into the dark of the deepest rooms of the hive -

- is void.

It sounds too familiar for him not to have heard of the concept before. Someone out there must understand how to harness it, how he might be able to capitalize on whatever property it is that makes Jacksonville - or perhaps even all of Florida - a 'null zone.' Absurdly, he almost wants Quatorze standing in front of him so that he could shake her hand, thank her for giving him such a promising idea, and then toss her into the nearest jail cell.

He doesn't care what it takes. He will make them safe.

---

Thursday

It's three days after the fact that Bro pulls his head out from whatever asspuppet it's been up all week and checks in. Dave wakes up at four in the fucking morning to his phone vibrating off the pillow with the force of the incoming message barrage. There's a trail of spit dribbling down his chin as he lifts his head to squint at the blurry lines and lines of asshole-orange Pester notifications.

He comes so close to just putting his head back down and going back to sleep.

But nah. He's never had the willpower to resist Pesterchum. He is weak.

-- temperedTitan [TT] began pestering turntechGodhead [TG] at 04:12:30 --

TT: kid.
TT: kid, wake the hell up.
TG: dude its like 4 am here chill
TT: wake up, brat, and tell me what the fuck kind of drugs Lalonde's on.
TG: literally ive sent you like ten messages about all this shit
TG: but haha oops
TG: maybe if you didnt conveniently go goddamn black ops radio silent on everyones asses youd know already TT: great, i really do need to come back and kick your ass. as if my to-do list wasn't long enough.
TG: bring it on dickhead
TG: now let me sleep
TT: no. answer the question, dingus.
TG: jfc
TG: look johns dad was totally evil but we handled it okay cool
TT: yeah, that's what I thought she said...
TG: oh and hurry up and come back on account of people are mad unaware of the fact that theyre brainwashed around here
TG: its like stand op these days not anything personal TG: except anyone who messages people at four in the morning is like 10x more suspicious than the average american so shit
TG: you blew it man
TG: you fucking blew it
TT: where did I go wrong raising you?
TG: somehow i think going wrong was like your main goal and now im an asshole too
TG: even giant wifi snake monsters are pointing it out so thanks a lot TT: stop babbling and give me an actual summary instead of fucking sass. the hell went wrong with Egbert?
TG: he was working with the mc and shit
TG: and he fucked up johns head like its not funny
TG: so dickberts a dick and johns had major brain surgery
TG: and you might be evil w/o knowing it so seriously where are you how long can it take to track down one bird me
TT: he ain't a just bird you, asshole child.
TG: youre avoiding the question
TG: i need to wake rose up this is classic avoidance shell eat it up TT: kid's slippier than you.
TT: probably since everything you know about stealth, you learned from me to begin with.

This is unbelievable. Dave literally cannot believe this conversation is happening. It must be a delirious product of his naphappy mind, because there is no way Bro could possibly be this dense. Not even irony can justify this shit.

TG: dude
TG: he's orange
TG: with wings proportionate to lift the weight of a human body
TG: and goddamn feathers on his arms and face
TG: this shit can't be that hard
TT: the kid beat me to Houston and started in on some shady bs on the downlow.
TT: including pissing off every MC member in the city by setting their shit on fire.
TG: so you mean he's being a total badass
TT: well, yeah.
TT: but he's also being an evasive little prick on a vigilante revenge kick because he's developed an inferiority complex roughly the size of Wisconsin.
TG: but he's setting fires and you can't track him down
TT: ha. did you know about Crow?
TG: the fuck
TT: didn't think so. he might be shit with a sword, but the kid's got a fucking history.
TT: turns out when you're a mutant kid there's a club for that.
TG: it's too early for this
TT: please stop
TT: a whole mutant underground. mostly off-spectrum trolls 'n shit.
TT: but if they don't want you finding a kid on the street, you're not finding him.

There has to be a way to derail this conversation. Dave rolls over onto his stomach and reaches in the most awkward way possible to scratch his side, the hand with the phone held out in front of him and his eyes aching from squinting at it.

TG: it's West Side Story isn't it
TT: what
TG: you know gangs of kids roaming the streets fighting each other with like wings and horns and lasers and sick beats idk
TT: no you shit it's not a goddamn musical.
TT: jesus fuck.
TT: look. how urgent is shit up there?
TT: and don't give me some flippant crap, I need to know.
TG: dude were fine
TG: goddamn hunky dory
TG: we need to go pick up wv and some stuff from the Lalonde house but were cool
TG: there's a no hero warning in effect anyway so we couldn't do jackshit without the police riding our dicks TT: just like old times then.
TG: yeah basically
TT: fine. tell Lalonde I need more time or Oriole's gonna incinerate downtown Houston.

Dave buries his face against the pillow and silently screams into it. He's too tired to pretend Bro isn't being an infuriating ass on purpose.

TG: tell
TG: her
TG: yourself
TG: at like
TG: NOT FOUR IN THE MORNING
TT: it's almost seven here, so deal with it.
TG: and hell no the whole point is you need to come back asap to make sure you're not you know tG: casually evil
TG: evil on the backburner
TG: evil beef stew simmering in a slow cooker until tender
TT: my head is fine kid, im not evil.
TG: no see we bought that line when john and his dad were telling it and fuck look at us now
TG: momlonde will get mad at me if you dont get your shit together and come back here
TT: heheh.
TG: ...
TG: you asshole
TT: stop disrespecting your elders and piss off to go tell her, lil man.

Whelp. He has just one card left to play.

TG: you dont even want to meet clone you or anything
TT: ...
TT: okay, I thought Lalonde was just making shit up by that point.
TG: there is a mini you across the hall
TG: his name is dirk he likes stabbing things and warm hugs TG: everyones gonna have a clone by the end of this shithive rumpus or something its majorly fucked up
TT: I'm reading the rest of that stuff, shut up for five seconds.
TT: jesus, mary, and joseph.
TT: I am never leaving you dumb punks alone again.
TT: seeing as you can't go more than a day without three new crises.
TT: jesus.
TG: told you so
TT: whatever, I'll make this quick.
TG: no dont -
-- temperedTitan [TT] has left the chat! --
TG: god dammit

Dave does the only thing he really can do in a situation like this.

He drops his phone on the pillow, rolls over, and lets the faint, snuffling sounds of a bunch of teenagers sleeping knock him out again, the afterglare of orange text still burning along the inside of his eyelids.

- He wakes up with Jade's foot in his face, a toe dangerously close to jabbing him in the eye. But after camping out like this with a bunch of personal-space challenged dumbasses for days on days, Dave figures Jade's tendency to migrate around a room in her sleep is the least of their many, many issues. Seriously. It barely even registers.

What does register is the fact that there's someone extra in the room. Once that processes, Dave's on his feet in a flash, nearly squashing Karkat's face as he scrambles for a fighting stance in the crowded floor space.

Dirk stares at him without expression, one foot still out in the hall, the other raised over the threshold. He sets it back down without comment.

Dave waits. Now they're both just awkwardly standing around like king douchelords, and he has no idea what to say because he's been avoiding this on purpose. Roxy and Rose have been chumming it up, and Jane, Jake, and John all have legit excuses for not talking to each other yet, since two out of the three are still marginally crazy and the third's recovering from being just as nuts in his own way.

But he and Dirk have followed a strict anti-mutuals policy by edging around each other with a vengeance. This guy looks like Bro, fights like Bro (though with fewer creepy puppets), probably has the same DNA as Bro - but isn't Bro.

For some reason, Dave feels like he's the only one majorly concerned about the fact that the Scratch kids are genetically everyone's ectoparents. Round two. Everyone else stopped somewhere around 'clones of our guardians' and never went a step further. On some level this kid is, like. His dad or something. He has enough trouble thinking Bro is his dad. This is too fucking much. Every time he tries to bring it up with Rose her eyes light up and she gets that look that somehow combines 'at last my time has come' with 'Freud, give me strength,' and Dave has to furiously backpedal until they've stopped talking about his obviously nonexistent daddy issues.

He falls back on what's tried and true. "Sup," he says, sticking his hands in his hoodie pockets and trying, discreetly as hell, to flatten down the parts of his hair that have been smushed to the side in his sleep. He's not the one going for blatant anime hair, here; Dirk's got that more than covered. How he's managing it when no one in this building has hair gel lying around is anyone's guess.

"Sup," Dirk says, shifting his weight from one foot to the other. "Need something to do."

Was that a statement or a question or a suggestion or what? He can't tell. The kid's monotone game is too strong. "So?" he says. Yeah, that shit's noncommittal enough that this guy will be totally fooled into thinking Dave gets it.

Another shuffle of feet. "Sixty six percent of the people in my immediate acquaintance are still tripping balls, and the other third is asleep." A slow, slight tilt of the head. Maybe it's because of the four-in-the-morning daze Dave was in when Bro starting pestering him, but the gesture reads more like Oriole than anyone else in the family - short and piercing even through shades. "So I propose that, given we two are both fortuitously conscious, we could -"

"- eat -"

"- strife."

Okay, never mind, Dave completely misread that one. He definitely thought this was going to be about food. Dirk smacks his face with both palms and Dave starts sweating. "Fighting, no, yeah, that is what I meant to say," he says, making weak motions with his hands like backing it up with faltering signs will make his backtracking any less total horseshit. "Uh. Why are we fighting again?"

Dirk doesn't look up from his palm stare of despair. "Because I'm functioning at 58% capacity with significant intermittent disorientation, and I suspect that a practice round with you and Maryam would end with me flattened in 98.3 seconds."

"Oh." Dave shrugs and steps over Jade. "Hell, you could have just said you were bored."

"Dave?"

He stops – still midstride, so of course he wobbles and nearly curbstomps Jade's face, which would be a one-way ticket to twisty space hell, like the kind that left an entire door punched with tiny holes in the pattern of a checkerboard, drifting in the lake, and part of Dickbert's hand turned inside out and left on the roof for a repairman to find. "Yeah man," he says, rotating a little by shifting his base foot to the left until he can see the bed.

John blinks at him, his eyes ringed with shadows that make the blue look darker in the halflight of the morning. But they glow all the time lately, as bright and shiny as troll eyes in the dark, so he looks unearthly. There's a faint breeze circulating that wasn't as active a second ago, though the wind never seems to stop now, either. "Something wrong?" he asks, his voice rough from sleep and wary, eyes flicking from Dave to Dirk with exhausted caution. And if John's up, Karkat won't be slow to follow.

Dave shrugs, noncommittal, but he also lets half a smile twitch the corner of his lip, so John knows shit's fine. "Going outside for a bit."

John relaxes fractionally, sinking back down against the pillow like his body's too heavy to hold up when he could still be sleeping. "Cool. Try not to stab each other by -" a wide yawn "- by accident?"

Dave gives a half-assed salute and heads for the door again. "Aye aye, man."

-

His instinct is to take this to the roof. But he's not willing to risk the wrath of Mom Lalonde, not when she's taken the Dickbert's dickish rampage as a personal betrayal that requires her to act more momnish than Dave's ever had to put up with in his entire life. So they go outside instead, where the grass is still damp days after John's storm died down, and Dave lets Dirk borrow one of his shitty swords.

Neither of them realizes just how shitty a choice of strife field they made until about seven minutes in, when Dirk manages to drive Dave a few feet closer to the lake and they both try to sidestep the other's slice. At which point the mud under their feet decides to suck at the soles of their shoes - and then give. Dave has a brief moment in which he sees Dirk's face flash by, the Scratch kid's shades already flying off his face and his mouth a thin line of resignation, because he's realized what fate awaits them.

Dave lands in the mud. He's still so shocked about it, he forgets to put his hands out and faceplants, cold, slimey muck plastering itself along his face and seeping into his hair.

Dirk was only a little luckier; his balance is still shot, so he even has an excuse for falling, but he managed to get his forearm up and his face has been spared. Mud has turned his shirt and pants into a disgusting mess, but he's still looking over at Dave's stiff form with a raised eyebrow. "Dude."

Dave takes a long moment to think of an appropriate excuse for how badly he just fucked up. "...eeeeeUUUUUUURRRRGGGH," emerges from between his lips at last. Awesome Awesome job.

"Dude."

Dave makes a noble effort to push himself upright. His hand slips in the mud and he almost faceplants again. This time, he stays down. "EEEEEEEEEEEEUUUUUUUUUUUUU-"

"What's wro-"

Dave stops keening. Not because he's recovered from how stupidly lame this is, but because there's a second Dave standing behind Dirk, his pajamas coated in grass and nature slime, and his face that of vengeance incarnate as he holds up palms full of mud and slams them down into Dirk's anime hair.

While Dirk's still spluttering, his monotonous mask shattered by the loss of his sunglasses, Dave digs his hands into the ground under him and comes up with two fistfuls of muck.

He has a loop to complete, after all.
Unfortunately, Thursday decides to go downhill from there, mostly because when Dave and Dirk slog back inside, looking like the most uncool pair of bros ever to mudwrestle while trying to stab each other, Jake is awake.

And trying to shoot people.

(The fact that his pistols got fucking confiscated days ago while he was still unconscious doesn't seem to be slowing him down.)

"YOU ROTTERS!" he's screaming, voice shrill, and before Dave finishes working out who the hell is talking Dirk is off like a shot, sprinting around the corner and out of sight. "YOU THINK YOU CAN KEEP ME HERE?! WELL, YOU BLEEDING WELL CAN'T -"

"Jakey! Jakey, babe, breathe!" Roxy is shouting back by the time Dave gets his head in gear and flashsteps to the scene of the minor crisis. Jake, unlike John, appears to have decided staying in bed and recovering is for fucking scrubs; he's still trailing the restraints that were supposed to keep him down if he woke up angry, and his arm pours blood in spurts where the IV got ripped out. Roxy stands right in his path, her hands up as she slurs her way through a good-faith attempt at making the other Scratch kid calm the hell down. "'Okay, babbu, we're all okay now! Jus'- jus' hang on a sec!" Her eyes dart down the hallway, and land on Dirk with a wave of relief. "See? Dirk-a-dirk's here, too! Everthing's fine."

"Traitors, the lot of you!" Jake hisses back. He sways on his feet, one hand pressed on the doorway as his head shakes. "Can't trust a blinking word out of you." He reaches for his waist again, and lets out a low bellow of frustration when he keeps not finding a gun. "Botheration!"

Dave reaches Rose and Kanaya around the same time Dirk does Roxy, all of them spread out in a vague half circle around the door to Jake's demolished room. Kanaya has a tube of lipstick in hand, eyes fixed on the three Scratch kids here, while Rose has all her eyes, including the weird ass extra one, directed at Jane's door, which is still closed. Probably to make sure with all this racket they don't end up with two pissed-off powerhouses roaming the halls. "The hell happened?" Dave asks, stopping at Rose's shoulder.

"He woke up. Unfortunately, Jake still believes that he should be following the orders they had last," she murmurs, reaching out and squeezing his forearm before letting her hand fall. "With any luck, they'll be able to talk him down -" Rose stops and looks down at her hand with a frown. "Why are you covered in mud, brother dear?"

"This is so not the time."

Dirk tries next. He looks kind of like he's trying to subtly shift Roxy out of the way of danger, but Roxy just keeps elbowing him back until they end up practically standing on top of each other as they face Jake. "Jake. Chill. You're making an ass of yourself."

"You betrayed us," Jake retorts. The longer he's upright, the sicklier he looks; Dave isn't sure what the recovery time for brain surgery is anymore, since none of these fuckers are good examples of normal human beings, but he does know that Jake and Jane are still on mild sedatives so they wouldn't run around and knock their heads open again, so he kind of doubts Jake's doing himself any favors by mixing that with adrenalin. "Started ignoring our mission and consorting with these ruffians!"

He points at Dave as though to prove his point. Dick.

"Dude, do you even hear yourself? That shit we were doing was fucked up," Dirk says, clipped and matter of fact. He's stonewalling as hard as Dave's ever seen Bro pull off, which might actually be working for him; there's nothing in his expression that might set Jake off more than he's already gone. "Come on. If Rox and I can think our way out of it, you can too."

"No! Something's bloody well wrong with you, Cogitator, can't you tell?" After one last useless patdown of his hospital gown, looking close to feverish tears, Jake turns pleading. "They've done something to you, old chap, you're not yourself anymore! There's still time; we can find Berzerker and with your knack for gadgetry and gizmos, we four can escape and go home!" He puts out his hands, lip trembling. "Cogitator, please."

Dirk stiffens up so abruptly it looks like a full-body flinch. His hands spasm as he raises them to his head, as though to hold his skull together, and Dave is sure that behind his shades Dirk can't break the sudden staredown with Jake. Dave doesn't remember pulling a swordkind, let alone one of the pieces of shit that broke in half at some point in the past week, but it's in his hand now as he feels the tension in the hallway skyrocket. He has no goddamn idea what it was that Jake said that hit the right button, but Dave can almost see the way that Dirk's frozen internally, like something in his head has latched onto those words and is trying to reassert itself.

Give it two seconds, and the kid Dave just tried to shampoo with mud could turn into a killing machine all over again.

Roxy breaks the silence. "Jakey? Dirk?" Her hand reaches out and misses Dirk's shoulder once before she squeezes it, tearing her eyes away from Jake to stare at Dirk's face. "...Dirk?"

Dirk trembles one last time - and then gasps, falling back as the rigid tension runs out of his shoulders. "I can't, Jake," he says, and the naked agony in his voice is something entirely foreign to Dave, so unlike Bro for a moment that Dave almost has to grab his own head in case it explodes. "I - that wasn't home. I know, in your head, you can't think of it any other way, but what Dienek did fucked you up. Fucked us all up. Going back would just make things worse, not better, dude."

Jake draws back. He barely looks angry anymore; just baffled, his eyebrows knotted together as though at a loss as to what Dirk's saying. "But we have to go back," he says, soft and genuinely confused.

"No, Jakey. We don't. We don't hafta do anything anymore." Roxy smiles, brightening as her excitement catches up with her. "That was all such bullshit, and now we can go back to being our normal selves! You and Jane, you'll be okay and we can be bffs again -"

Jake lunges at Roxy, shouting incoherently. Dirk hauls her back so hard the two of them ram into Rose - Kanaya snaps her lipstick out into a chainsaw, her voice pitched to carry over Jake's shouting to no effect - Dave is still wondering why he grabbed a broken sword of all things, and where the heck is Jade when you need her -

Jake jolts to a stop. Dave takes a good five seconds to realize it's because the kid's feet aren't touching the ground anymore, so he can't get any traction. He makes one last grab for Roxy and Dirk, and then stops, indignantly kicking at his feet as though he can't figure out why they aren't working anymore.

"Wow. I guess he's still pretty turned around about everything in his head, huh," John says, looking asleep on his feet as he hobbles out the open door of his room. Karkat's growling something at him in a volume that somehow Dave can't quite hear (holy shit) and also doing temporary double duty as a living crutch, seizing John's arm when he falters and propping the kid up with his shoulder. But if John's still stumbling a little, the wind dancing around Jake and holding the Scratch kid safely aloft is fully awake now, ruffling Dave's mud-stained shirt and threading through Rose's hair and Kanaya's horns in branching loops. Jade bounces after Karkat and John, her hands tucked behind her back and a determined look on her face that reminds Dave why she would probably not have wanted to be the one to intervene with her powers, in the void voodoo shit. "That sucks."

"Put me down, you wanker!" Jake demands, twisting with his expression caught between fury and misery. "Why are you all acting like this?!"

"We'll figure this out, Jake," Dirk says. He seems to have decided that looking right at the other Scratch kid while he says this would be a shitty idea, and is just staring at his feet, shoulders sagging. "We will."

John tilts his head to the side, his eyes still exhausted. "Where should I put him down?"

"Back in the cot, I suppose. I'll fetch one of the assistants who knows where we might locate more supplies we could use to keep him calm," Rose says, nodding a little and shaking away the eye on her forehead. She rubs her temple with the wrong thumb and leaves behind a smear of crumbly dirt that she doesn't seem to notice. Dave snickers, swallowing the sound down fast when she glances at him suspiciously. "Leave him loose, and I shudder to think what damage he could do, to himself or the rest of the facility."

Honestly, the whole incident is kind of depressing as hell, Dave thinks as John slowly levitates Jake back into the room. It was one thing for Rose and that Halburn guy and others to say that the effects of the mindgrub wouldn't fade right away, but a whole other deal to see how confused and desperate Jake seemed to be, unable to even consider that what he's been trained into thinking might be kind of, you know, blindly evil. Or maybe evil's not really the word for it. Urgh. Whatever.

"So," Jade says, sounding just this side of chipper, scratching the back of her head after she helps John and the assistants manhandle Jake back onto the cot, "...whooo's going to the Lalonde house today?"

The trip back to Maple Valley actually goes well, up to a certain point. Dave ends up tagging along with Doctor Lalonde and Jade and the handful of geeks who plan to stop by the Egbert house and sweep it for traps and surveillance stuff Dickbert might have left running in case of intruders. Also, they figure at some point John's going to want clothes that aren't his uniform or a hoodie or hospital scrubs at some point, when he stops sleeping all the damn time.

(Dave's getting mildly worried about that. Mildly, okay. Just a little.)

He and Jade tried to talk Karkat into coming along. But a) Karkat still hates them, kind of, probably, and b) the fact that Jake woke up pissy and still brainwashed off his ass means that they probably need to leave as many heroes as they can spare at the lab in case shit goes south again. Kanaya assures them that she can keep Karkat occupied for the hours they're gone. Something about a surprise costume fitting, which Dave is sorry to miss.

Except he's totally not. He has time powers and by god he is going to abuse them.

But first things first. None of them thought when they left on Monday that they wouldn't be coming back right after kicking ass, so there's a little someone they forgot who's more important than clothes and shit.

WV looks down when Doctor Lalonde opens the door, and squeaks at them incoherently, waving his arms from on top of God's one true chosen couch fort.
Seriously. This is the shit religions are made of. From the looks of it, WV re-purposed literally every couch, armchair, and ottoman in the house in the name of stacking them in the living room, which has the highest ceiling.

It's a triple decker. Dave's not sure how a short guy like that managed to haul all these sofas down here, let alone lift one up on top of another without being smushed like a tiny adorable squished beetle alien. There are bed sheets billowing in the breeze from a window that Dave doesn't remember leaving open, and with the light streaming in through the skylight, illuminating the dust swirling in the air, it looks like an altar to the god of couch forts. And the sides of the couches, floor, and the walls are all covered in -

"Rose left her makeup here on Monday, didn't she," Doctor Lalonde says, sounding faint. "Oh. Oh dear."

- lipstick drawings.

"WV!" Jade exclaims, folding her arms. The hellbeast flops down behind her feet, a poofed-up mass of static-charged fur smash in the middle of the doorway, and gives a faint woof, like it can't be bothered to work up the energy to back Jade up in this. "You can't just go around drawing on people's things in lipstick! It's impolite!"

WV rises up on his tiptoes, teetering at the top of the pile next to a makeshift red flag and lifting his claws -

Only to topple over backwards as gravity kicks him in the ass, squeaking all the way down. Jade reaches out with a hasty jolt of space shit to lower the carapacian to the ground in a cloud of green, and the alien lands in a heap of leftover cushions and empty soda cans. He lays very still for a few long moments, and then flops out spread eagle, having apparently given up on life.

"Well, I suppose the decor was a little out of date," Mom Lalonde sighs. She shakes her head at the tower of power, a smile tugging at her lips as she glances over the scribbly artwork on the walls. "At least he made provisions for himself in our absence."

"I am sorry about this," Jade says, walking over and stooping to prod WV on the cheek. The carapacian flops over again onto his side, whining and muttering soundlessly to himself. "He usually not this - okay, yeah, he's usually this bad...I guess I've just never left him alone this long before!
When WV gets bored he gets kind of creative!"

Dave takes out his phone and takes a picture of the couch fort before he heads over and joins Jade in waiting for WV to stop sulking. He posts it in an open memo, but gets distracted by WV attempting to barrel-roll away from them before he can see if anyone's online to respond to it. "C'mere, little man," he says, scooping WV up by the armpits and hauling the alien into a hug. Doctor Lalonde keeps checking a PDA, frowning absently as she ventures further and further into the maze of the Lalonde house. Jade tags along after Doctor Lalonde, floating around a good foot or two above the ground.

Which means Dave could dick around with this couch fort, if he wanted. "This thing is the shit, WV," he says, nodding his head as he tries to figure out what the best angle of approach might be. "I wonder if we cou-

His phone goes off in his hand and WV squirms at the same time. It takes some coordination to juggle the two, but Dave manages it, texting with one thumb.

CG: DAVE.
CG: DON’T IGNORE ME, JACKASS.
TG: calm your troll tits me and wv are having a moment
CG: BOTH YOUR DELIBERATE, UNFAILING LACK OF UNDERSTANDING OF TROLL ANATOMY AND YOUR OBSESSION WITH THAT CARAPACIAN ARE DISTURBING AND WEIRD.
TG: what no wv is awesome okay
TG: hes like a national treasure
TG: he must be protected at all costs
TG: did you see the fort he made
CG: HOW DO I EXPRESS HOW MUCH I DON’T CARE ABOUT THIS.
TG: you know you like him
CG: HE’S MORE TOLERABLE THAN YOU, BUT THAT’S NOT EXACTLY HARD TO ACCOMPLISH.
TG: dont play hard to get karkles
TG: youre making him sad
CG: HE DOESN’T GIVE A SHIT.
TG: omg yes he does how could you say that TG: look his lip is doing the little wobbly thing
CG: I DON’T EVEN HAVE TO BE THERE TO SEE IN MY MIND’S EYE THAT YOU’RE CURRENTLY ASSAULTING THAT POOR CREATURE WITH A HUG AND HE’S STRUGGLING IN VAIN TO ESCAPE YOU.

Dave looks down.

WV looks up, white eyes squinting.

TG: what no hes totally resigned to it
CG: JESUS.
TG: say it
CG: I DON’T EVEN KNOW WHAT YOU WANT ME TO SAY BUT THE ANSWER’S STILL NO IN ADVANCE.
TG: say you like wv
TG: everyone likes wv
CG: NOT THIS AGAIN. STOP PUSHING THIS ON ME, NOOKSTAIN, THIS IS NOT WHAT I MESSAGED YOU ABOUT.
TG: say it
CG: NO.
TG: say ittttt
CG: IF I GIVE INTO YOUR INCREDIBLY IDIOTIC REQUEST WILL YOU DO ME A FAVOR?
TG: probably yes
CG: I LIKE WV. THERE. I SAID IT. SCREENSHOT IT SO YOU CAN GAZE ON THOSE THREE WORDS LATE AT NIGHT ALONE IN YOUR ROOM LIKE THE CREEPY FUCK YOU ARE.
TG: done and done
CG: FUCKING FUCK.
CG: NOW CAN WE GET BACK TO THE REASON I’D EVER BOTHER CONTACTING YOU?

Without warning, WV bursts into green-tinged static. Dave lets go before it can sting him, and the carapacian lands on his feet, scolding Dave with a look as he fixes his askew hood. Bec looks at the two of them, despite the fact that the wolf has no goddamn eyes, judges the disturbance as though wondering why someone else in the room is shooting lightning everywhere - and then curls up in a ball, muzzle tucked down around its hindfeet.

TG: you may proceed
CG: CAN YOU STOP BY MY HIVE TOO WHILE YOU'RE OUT THERE? I NEED PANTS THAT AREN'T LEGGINGS OR SOMEONE'S BORROWED SWEATS.
CG: I DON'T EVEN WANT TO FUCKING KNOW WHERE THESE THINGS HAVE BEEN.
TG: kay sure
CG: WAIT WHAT.
CG: IT CAN'T BE THAT EASY.
TG: dont you need like shirts or something too
TG: your hoodies getting dank as fuck bruh
CG: WHY ARE YOU BEING AGREEABLE. WHAT IS HAPPENING.
TG: lmao dude you really think id make you run around like a goddamn ragamuffin troll child in stripper tights
TG: that would be a real dick move
TG: also youd probably just try jade next and shed do it regardless CG: UH. FUCK, THEN. YEAH, THE DOOR'S PROBABLY NOT LOCKED BY NOW SINCE CRABDAD BREAKS IT PERIODICALLY, BUT IF IT'S STILL MIRACULOUSLY INTACT THE WINDOW BY THE BACK DOOR'S BEEN CRACKED FOR MONTHS, JUST PUNCH IT.
TG: ahhaha breaking and entering sweet
CG: I'M REGRETTING THIS ALREADY. THAT HAS TO HAVE BEEN THE FASTEST TURNAROUND EVER. I'VE CHANGED MY MIND I'LL ASK HARLEY TO DO THIS INSTEAD.
TG: too late already out the door
CG: FUCK.

"Dave? Where are you going, dear?" Doctor Lalonde calls after him just as he sails right back out the door, WV scurrying in his wake with disgruntled clicks and angry fist-waving.

Dave tilts his head back to watch Momlonde hurry to the door, her face lined with worry that he feels guilty about for two seconds because they're all paranoid and on edge. Understandably. "Going to Karkat's to pick some sh-stuff up for him so maybe he'll stop moping around all the time," he says, sticking his hands in his pockets. "Brb."

"Should you be going alone?"

He points at WV. She doesn't seem overly impressed by this flawless argument. Rolling his eyes, Dave elbows WV until the Dersite looks up at him with an indignant glare. 'Dude, shape up, she thinks you're a wimp,' Dave signs fast.

WV claps his claws to his head in dismay; then he hastily plants his fists on his hips and puffs his chest out while Dave looks expectant. The effect is instant: Doctor Lalonde sighs and rubs at her temples, looking pained as she waves them on their way. They pass the scientists along the way, a pair of trolls in lab coats that are still unloading delicate equipment from the back of the car Jade zapped them here in.

There are a couple minutes where Dave's not entirely sure where they're going, on account of all these streets full of short box houses look the exact same and in the end he has to be surreptitious as fuck by sneaking onto the map app on his phone and using that to navigate when the street signs are goddamn useless. WV, luckily, could care less about Dave fiddling around with his phone and potentially getting them lost in the depths of suburb hell. The little guy must have been done with being stuck in that house because he's zooming back and forth from one side of the street to the other, investigating every bush and eventually vandalizing some poor mailbox to steal its red flag thingy. Dave doesn't have the heart to stop him, as long as he remembers to come circling back to Dave once in a while. Get lost here, and they might never see the carapacian again.

They trip over the Egberts' house at last, and from there Dave knows kind of vaguely where he's going. He makes sure to toss the house a special two-finger salute as they give it a wide berth. From the outside, it doesn't look any different from the houses on either side; certainly not like some angst-infested hellhole. Hell, any one of the residents of these Stepford houses could turn out to be just as full of fucked up shit as Dickbert. Dave's never trusting the suburbs again.

This resolution is totally justified when he and WV round the last corner, pass a couple more houses, and come to a stop outside Karkat's hive.

Where, of course, the front door is goddamn MIA. Like. Just completely gone. All of the windows are dark, some of them with cracks spidering along the panes of glass. Between that and the overgrown lawn, this place looks like it's frigging haunted.

 Seriously. Dave is getting some goddamn vibes from this place. Are there things in there. There are things here, aren't there.

Or maybe he's just being paranoid. There's a totally mundane explanation for this.

TG: dude
CG: WHAT.
TG: street number is 21197 right
CG: YEAH.
TG: okay shit i think your house got broken into CG: WHAT THE FUCK ARE YOU TALKING ABOUT?!

"Come here, little dude," Dave mutters, grabbing WV when the carapacian makes a beeline for the open doorway before he can scope out the scene. WV starts signing at him, but Dave's on the alert now, scanning the neighborhood around them to make sure they're not being watched or followed. It's probably just a bunch of the random swear words and other signs that Dave started teaching him the other day, anyway. Uneasy, Dave finishes looking around - it's just a bunch of homes and hives, none of them over two stories, with all the nice lawns and pruned trees and scraggly bushes a suburban neighborhood could ever want for - and edges toward the door in jittery flashes, patting WV when the carapacian starts digging claws into his forearm in a bid for freedom.

At least he finds the door pretty damn quick - it's leaning up against the wall just inside, though it looks like it's been to hell and back. The first floor looks like someone threw the rager of the century and didn't clean up afterwards - messed up furniture, broken plates scattered around the entrance to the kitchen block, shit like that. The television sits crooked on its stand, the volume muted and the screen playing nothing but static, like it's been tuned to a channel that cable doesn't cover. It's kind of hard to tell what part of the squalor is left over from Karkat's regular lifestyle and what might be the result of this apparent break in.

Or, maybe, break out?

TG: i mean like the doors off the hinges and uh
TG: look dont you have a screaming crab lusus that you inherited your lack of volume control from or something
TG: because its not here
TG: your tvs still present and accounted for though so youre good
CG: OH MY GOD.
CG: IS THERE STILL FOOD IN THE FRIDGE?

Still uneasy, Dave sets WV down when the carapacian jabs him in the gut one time too many. While the alien goes off to inspect the television, Dave heads for the kitchen. He accidentally steps on a shard of broken plate, and the sharp crack makes him jolt. Aside from him and WV and the faint, ringing buzz of the TV that won't stop humming in his ears, the house is dead silent. This is some horror movie shit and he regrets letting WV out of his sight. Internally smacking himself, Dave goes to the fridge and yanks it open. The handle comes off in his hand and he stares at it for a long second before setting it down on the counter. He'll just say it was like that when he got here. It's foolproof.

TG: there's
TG: uh
TG: no looks like there's just a jar of pickles or something dude do you even eat
CG: NO, NO, I EXPECTED THOSE KIND OF FAMINE CONDITIONS WHEN I LEFT THAT ONE-CRAB BOTTOMLESS PIT ALONE FOR TOO LONG.
TG: yeah but the crab dudes definitely not here this place is empty

Whatever happened here must have happened recently, because Dave finds himself picking his way over upturned pieces of furniture that haven't been looted yet. Or maybe it's just a suburb thing, where everyone in the neighborhood politely ignores the front door hanging wide open like a goddamn invitation to any passing housebreaker, without asking questions. WV won't stop jamming at the buttons on the remote, which he seems to have wriggled under the torn up couch cushions to find. The TV doesn't appear to care. It gives another whine, and Dave grits his teeth before heading upstairs. The faster he gets Karkat's stuff, the sooner they can get out of this blatant ripoff of the first five minutes of a Supernatural episode.

It helps that Karkat's house is relatively small; it also helps that the door to the bedroom has been removed from its hinges as well, so Dave doesn't need to go poking around the rest of the upstairs looking for it.

TG: i think someone might have gone through your room
CG: WHY ARE YOU IN MY ROOM?!
TG: literally how the fuck did you expect me to get you clothes without setting foot in here is the real question
TG: also investigating the scene of a fucking break in thank me later TG: oh no
TG: oh god
TG: jfc
CG: WHAT'S WRONG NOW.
CG: DAVE ANSWER ME THIS INSTANT.
TG: its everywhere
TG: the batman hentai
TG: oh god the floors are just papered with it TG: and your computers on and -
CG: YOU ARE THE DUMBEST FUCK I HAVE EVER HAD THE STOMACH-CURDLING DISPLEASURE TO HAVE TO BE FRIENDS WITH. THERE'S NO FUCKING HENTAI IN THERE, YOU'RE CONFUSING MY RESPITE BLOCK WITH YOURS.

As a matter of fact, the computer is on. Sadly, no sign of Karkat's secret stash of weird troll porn, and Dave's too twitchy to sit down and try to pull some hacking shenanigans. There's an empty spot with old green stains where the recooperathing used to sit before it got relocated to the Lalondes', but other than that the room looks like someone dug through it like they did all the downstairs, without finding what they were looking for.
TG: nah i dont know i cant tell if anythings missing or not here
TG: theres just clothes and shitty comic books lying around everywhere CG: WAIT. THEY'RE NOT IN A PILE?
TG: no
CG: SHIT. I HAD AN ORDER TO THAT PILE. IT TOOK ME YEARS TO PERFECT. IF THAT FUCKING PISSBUCKET TORE THROUGH MY ROOM LOOKING FOR ME AND UPSET THE COMIC BOOK AND ROMANCE STRATA LAYERS I'LL DRAG IT BACK HOME AND KICK IT OUT OF THE HOUSE MYSELF.
TG: your priorities are being taught in psych classes around the nation as an example of what not to do CG: SHUT UP. THERE'S ONLY THREE RATIONAL EXPLANATIONS FOR THIS.

Oh, this is gonna be good.

TG: like what
CG: ONE: BURGLARS BROKE IN AND KIDNAPPED THAT FATASS, WHICH IS SO UNLIKELY AS TO BE RENDERED NULL AND VOID. THERE'S NO WAY THEY'D TAKE IT OVER THE TV. CROSS IT OFF THE LIST.
CG: OPTION TWO THE FUCKING IDIOT FINALLY BROKE OUT AND DECIDED TO HAUL CLAW FOR THE COASTLINE, LEAVING ME BLISSFULLY EMANCIPATED FROM ITS DESPICABLE APPETITES.
CG: OR THREE, THE LUSII CONTROL PEOPLE FINALLY SHOWED THEIR UGLY HORNES AND TOOK HIM.
CG: I CAN'T BELIEVE THIS IS HAPPENING.
TG: yeah i guess thats kind of shitty dude
CG: THIS IS THE MOST BEAUTIFUL DAY OF MY LIFE. I HAVE TO WAKE JOHN UP TO SHARE THE GOOD NEWS, HOLD ON.
TG: wait hang on i think i missed something CG: OH MY FUCK I THINK I'M CRYING.
TG: theres too much whiplash here man get a hold of yourself
CG: TEARS OF JOY.
CG: THAT SHITNOODLE'S GONE AT LAST. I CAN'T BELIEVE I MISSED THE CHANCE TO KICK THAT OBNOXIOUS SHRIEKING LUNATIC TO THE FUCKING CURB IN FRONT OF THE NEIGHBORS.
CG: BUT I CAN SURVIVE OFF THE SWEET SWEET VINDICATION OF MENTAL IMAGERY.
CG: HILARY DUFF WAS WRONG, DAVE.
CG: THIS IS WHAT DREAMS ARE MADE OF.
TG: holy shit
CG: YOU CAN'T TAKE THIS MOMENT FROM ME DAVE. I'LL ALWAYS HAVE THIS DAY. ALWAYS. EVEN IN MY DARKEST HOUR. EVEN WHEN YOUR SHITTY PSEUDO-IRONIC ANTICS DRIVE ME TO THE BRINK OF RAGE INDUCED INSANITY. I'LL ALWAYS HAVE THIS THURSDAY TO CARRY ME THROUGH.
CG: THE DAY CRABDAD RODE OFF INTO THE SUNSET AND LEFT ME THE FUCK ALONE FOR THE REST OF MY LIFE.
TG: you may never see the crabdude again and this is your reaction CG: I'M SO HAPPY.
TG: ...
TG: alright cool whatever milks your goat bro
CG: NEVER SAY THAT PHRASE AGAIN.
TG: milks your goat
CG: YES, THAT ONE.
TG: kay
TG: whatever tickles your pickle
CG: STOP.
TG: creams your cheese
CG: WHERE ARE YOU EVEN COMING UP WITH THIS FUCKERY?!
CG: ...
TG: ...
TG: tingles your jingles
CG: GET OUT OF MY HOUSE.

And with that, Karkat appears to sign off - or at least, his handle in the Pesterchum sidebar powers down. Shrugging, Dave gives the room one last look and then goes to the closet. He kind of despair at the fact that Karkat's wardrobe is about as varied as John's - that is to say, it's fucking well not: hero shirts and oversized hoodies and flannel, as far as the eye can see. Dave finds a stash of slightly more professional shirts hidden at the very back, but if he just brings that back Karkat'll probably be a baby/grub/whatever about it and not wear anything at all. Which, no thanks. In the end he ends up grabbing them and a bunch of hero shirts and pants, wishing he'd thought to bring a backpack or something to dump all this in. Flashstepping back to the Lalonde house with all this is going to make him look like some kind of rogue clothing bandit. Worse, he's going to look like an underwear bandit, because Dave's already gone through the existential crisis of providing his own bird twin with underwear. After solving that kind of ethical dilemma, getting underwear for another dude barely even registers as weird.

He's still gonna throw a pair of boxers at John's face when he gets back, though. That'll wake the kid up, for sure. Heheheh.

Ping.

Dave blinks, one foot out the door of the bedroom. As hilarious as thoughts of messing with the heronerd duo are, they can't quite distract him from the sound of a Pesterchum notification.

Specifically, one that seems to be coming from Karkat's computer.

...Dammit. Dave slings the pile of clothes over the railing at the top of the stairs, fidgeting with it until it stays balanced, and then goes back to the bedroom to look at the screen.

-- terminallyCapricious [TC] is waiting --
TC: honk.
TC: HONK.
TC: honk.
TC: HONK.
TC: honk.

Huh. Spambot or something, Dave guesses. He can't think of any other explanation for the weird honking, or the equally weird lack of a real header. 'Waiting'? Not even 'waiting for angryMcangerbutt,' which would at least explain why Karkat's computer is the target? Lame. Dave snorts and goes to click out of the window. Karkat had better appreciate the weird shit Dave is putting up with for the sake of his hygiene.

TC: DON'T YOU MOTHERFUCKING DARE, MOTHERFUCKER.

Dave yanks his hand away from the mouse, heart thumping out of sync in his chest because holy shit he was not expecting that. The pinging sound of the message alert sounds weirdly distorted, and he watches as more goddamn bizarre shit starts appearing on the screen.
TC: hahahahahahah.
TC: I KNOW YOU'RE THERE STILL.
TC: you're not karkat.
TC: SO WHY ARE YOU MOTHERFUCKIN IN HIS MOTHERFUCKIN ROOM.
TC: is the real question.
TC: HELP ME GET MY SCHOOLFEED ON, MY FRIEND.
TC: let's slaughter this wicked ignorance together, hermano.
TC: IF YOU KNOW WHAT I MEAN.
TC: :o)

Dave has not gotten as far as he has in life without learning some really basic shit from watching television. And rule number one is: if it sounds like the pestermessage is coming from inside the house, run like fuck. But his feet feel like they're rooted in place, a ringing in his ears, and his hands go to the keyboard almost without his conscious approval, cold sweat prickling across his forehead as he starts to type. The fact that the message font comes out in his quirk's red, with his handle initials on the side instead of Karkat's, which would have made sense, does not escape him.

TG: dude
TG: what the shit
TG: there's not even a webcam on the computer or the desk
TG: the fuck is you
TC: ...you.
TG: ???
TC: DO MINE MOTHERFUCKIN EYES DECEIVE ME?
TC: after all this motherfuckin time.
TC: DAVE MOTHERFUCKING STRIDER.
TG: oh my god what the fuck what the fuck
TG: this is a fucking joke right
TG: karkat signed me up to get punkd or something TG: ahhaha nice one you guys got me
TG: the excuse to get me over here was pretty lame but the execution was awesome TC: uhhhh, what?
TC: DON'T KNOW WHAT YOU'RE ON ABOUT, FRIEND.
TG: nah man you got me
TG: bring in the cameras and the laughtrack
TG: i totally thought this was some b-movie horror schtick
TC: >:o?
TC: NEVER DID UNDERSTAND HALF OF THE RIGHTEOUS NOISE YOU WERE SPITTING.
TC: but that's alright.
TC: YOU ALWAYS KNOW HOW THE WICKED MOTHERFUCKIN SHIT IS TO BE KICKED.
TC: revealing all the unkind heresies and fakey fraidy bullshit as had their downright unfunny claws stuck in my biscuit.
TC: SHOVING ME BACK DOWN THE PATH OF MOTHERFUCKIN PERNICIOUS BEATS.
TC: been too long, brother.
TG: suddenly i understand nothing at all
TC: STINE, BROTHER, JUST MOTHERFUCKIN FINE.
TC: my tavbro don't remember, either.
TC: BUT YOU WILL.
TC: you all will.
TG: why does that sound ominous
TG: jfc you need to turn the menacesinister meter like waayyyyy the fuck down i think there are people in canada who are freaked out by this conversation and they dont even know why
TC: HONK.
TG: yeah like that stop doing that TC: hahahahahahahahah.
TC: WISH I COULD STOP BY TO GET OUR GREETINGS ON IN PERSON.
TC: but i got a certain other motherfucker i got a need to see first.
TC: IT'S JUST THE FINDING OF HIM THAT'S BEEN A TRIAL MOST TENACIOUS.
TG: how about that
TC: got a lot of void betwist he and me.
TC: o:\
TC: makes the words all a most grievous motherfuckin harsh on my eyes.
TC: BUT IT'S ALL COMING CLEAR NOW.
TG: thats good i guess
TC: then why does it feel like a sign most sickeningly ominous, my brother?
TC: WHY DO I HAVE A MOTHERFUCKIN PREMONITION AS IN MY PAN AS ANY HARSHWHIMSY.
TC: that shit's coming together soon.
TC: REAL FUCKIN SOON.
TC: guess we'll see who makes it happen first.
TC: THE EYES OF THAT BLASPHEMEOUS MOTHERFUCKING SCRATCH
TC: or me
TC: o:\
TG: dude seriously
TG: im getting like
TG: negative twenty five percent of this
TG: its like youre speaking another language only underwater and run through google translate like twenty different ways before turning back into english
TG: wait did you just say scratch
TC: GOTTA RUN, BROTHER.
TC: if you see karkat before me
TC: LET HIM KNOW HE IS MOST SORELY MISSED.
TG: uhhh yeah sure
TG: ill get right on that
TC: motherfuckin knew i could count on you.
TC: AND ONE MORE THING.
TG: (goddammit)
TC: tell your bro to keep his motherfuckin guard up
TG: you know my bro now
TG: okay why not this cant get much weirder
TC: HE'S GOT OUR MUTUAL FRIEND ON LOCKDOWN FOR NOW.
TC: locked down tighter than the cloudmom herself.
TC: BUT HE'LL WAKE UP SOON E MOTHERFUCKIN NOUGH.
TC: and start whisperin all up in the hear ducts of them as has the mind to listen.
TC: ONLY LEADS TO BAD TIMES, MY BROTHER.
TG: can you be a little more specific holy shit
TC: he ain't nice like me, motherfucker.
TC: HE'S GOT SOME NASTY MOTHERFUCKIN THINGS TO SAY IN THAT QUIET LITTLE VOICE OF HIS.
TC: so don't
TC: MOTHERFUCKING
TC: listen.
TC: :o)
TC: let's slam a little sometime soon, aight?
TC: HONK.
TG: uh
TG: aight man
TG: i dont know if youre crazy or what but at the very least youre a goddamn trip TC: motherfuuuuck, yes.
-- terminallyCapricious [TC] is gone --

Dave finds himself staring at the computer screen, wondering what the fucking hell just happened. "Holy shit," he says, his voice shaking a little, as he pushes up his shades to rub his eyes with his fingers.

When he opens them again, the screen is blank.

No matter where he looks once he boots the computer back up again, he can't find any trace of the pesterlog.

As far as the computer is concerned, the last time it turned on was over a week ago.

---

Ambrose Strider catches up to his runaway shithead kid at last.

What a fucking hassle. Still got a shitten of messages stacked up in his phone, too, because the plan to have Dave deal with Lalonde's fussing backfired spectacularly when the woman realized Bro's phone must be on again. All of them calling and messaging and spamming him with new ways that apparently everything has gone to hell in his absence.

Starting to think he should just let the dumbass get his ass kicked and head back up to Seattle. Dave always responded well to having his ass kicked, by Bro or other parties. Inspired him to do better next time...or just be more of a sulky shit about it, so, eh.

But circumstances - and his own damn inability to let shit like this go - conspire against him. Had to search through hell and half of Houston to track the kid down, but after yet another shady, seemingly abandoned gas station goes up in smoke Oriole slips up. Getting cocky, confident that he can give anyone chasing him the runaround, probably.

The key is not looking for a bird kid; it's looking for the other slippery little punks that Bro keeps spying out of the corner of his eye, the ones with horn covers and medical eye patches and gloves that lurk around on street corners pretending to be with the rest of the gawping onlookers. Little shits try to be sneaky about it, switching up who comes to observe the aftermath after each act of arson on a Midnight Crew base of ops, but he's got an eye for prosthetics and disguises and this many kids, some of them with makeup caked on so thick their smiles leave craters around their mouths? They're hiding shit. He tracks one pack of them back to one of their hangouts and confirms they're homeless kids, all of them - or least aren't interested in going home to their guardians or lusii. A whole posse of teenagers, all of them concealing parts of themselves deliberately to fly under the radar, paying mighty keen interest in the fires Bro knows Oriole's been setting?

Shoulda known the kid with bird wings would get chummy with other weird kids. Could kick himself for not noticing them before, though - he always thought he had the area around the apartment pretty secure, thanks to the shields Lalonde forced on him after the split in Georgia, but patrolling the rest of the city regularly couldn't keep the Crew from making inroads, or prevent him from overlooking shit like these mutant kids laying low where he didn't bother looking.

To be fair, training Dave to be as much of a badass as possible was the top of his list of priorities for most of the little shit's life, not necessarily keeping the city entirely on lockdown. Not even he could pull that off.

Well. Heh. The kids might be good. But he's better. Got a solid lead now, he's checked back in with Dave (and again, what the fuck has been going on back there, Jesus lord have mercy) and when the gas station goes up in smoke he's already lurking in the shadows when the latest gaggle of kids shuffles by to observe the aftermath. One of ‘em's a repeat offender that's been at nearly every scene, a troll kid with a limp and a horn that looks to have been filed down, and as the group wanders through the streets, chattering in whispers with the occasional bark of laughter, he follows. Lil Cal is a familiar weight with plush arms looped around his neck, ever-grinning from where the puppet's chin sits on his shoulder.

Almost doesn't recognize Oriole when he joins the group, actually, which says shitty things about Bro's observation skills again - or maybe the kid's just that good, when he wants to be. He certainly managed to dodge Bro all the way back to Texas. But his coat shifts the wrong way when he turns, and the fake-ass tinted glasses he's wearing instead of decent shades don't quite conceal his eyes when he scans the rooftop and windows of the tall, isolated apartment buildings that dot this stretch of road.

Haha. Nice try, kid.

“Crow,” one of the girls says, in greeting, and Bro almost snorts and gives away his position. The name's what got him suspicious about these kids in the first place - and what is it with his kids and birds? Is Rose an exception because she's not a dumbass punk or because Lalonde knew something he didn't about raising non-bird obsessed children?

But shit, yeah. A bird-themed name, connected to kids who run around ex-Midnight Crew bases to watch the buildings burn and - on one occasion - the police making arrests when one pack of numbnuts in black suits wasn't quick enough to ditch the hideout. It was enough to go on for him, anyway. And whaddya know - the dumb kid's running around in a too-big black jacket and going by the tackiest bird name short of Raven.

Kids these days and their angst.

“Still no sign of that Crowbar guy,” another one reports, and hell, he's almost be proud of Oriole for somehow amassing a small gang to gather intel for him if the kid weren't doing it out of some misguided sense of inferiority. Dodging the wary glances the hindmost two punks are throwing over their shoulders proves a little more challenging as they start crossing a bridge on foot over the bayou. But he's quick enough to dodge between the cars veering between lanes as they adjust to a sharp curve in the road before the street light, stopping at intervals to wait until the gang crosses the intersection and he can catch up again. “They caught one girl in a black suit, but no one in green.”

“He's still in town,” Oriole says, his shoulders shifting in a way that shoulders shouldn't as his wings rearrange themselves. “And they know by now they're being targeted deliberately. He wanted a Dave bad enough to jump me the first time? That shithead'll show up eventually. He might be wound up enough that I can just flash feathers at the mall - they grabbed me fast enough last time, that's for sure.”

Can't quite swallow down the growl of exasperation that inspires; he changes it into a cough instead, though on the inside he's fucking pissed. One of his kids using themselves as bait? Where do they even learn this shit?

“The Divested is gonna catch wind of this any day now, and come down on us like a fancy santakind,” a troll with horns like fish hooks mutters. “I don't know what's got into you, but you know she wouldn't want you calling attention to yourself like this, it defeats the whole purpose of -”

Oriole shrugs again, his hands buried in his pockets. The group spread out a little as they cross the parking lot of a lonely restaurant, but they keep moving parallel to the street. Can hear the traffic of the freeway to the south, but for the most part this street is quiet - no street in Houston is ever empty, but there are long stretches between individual vehicles now that the morning work rush has cycled through. “Don't care. She's got a whole network to run. Anyway, you all don't need to watch anymore, it'll just get you noticed. I can handle this myself.”

Ha. Couldn't have asked for a better opening. Bro speeds across the parking lot just as the group starts across the grass to reach the sidewalk again, alongside a squat set of apartments. A snap is all it takes for Lil Cal to unwind himself and twine around Oriole's legs, an old trick that even Dave still falls for after all these years. The kid lets out an undignified squawk as he staggers and just barely doesn't fall, the other kids looking baffled.

“Yeah. 'Handling it,' huh,” he says, slowing to a stop. One of the trolls flinches so hard at Bro's sudden appearance that he stumbles into a dip in the grass and keels over. “Wrong.”

Oriole snarls at Bro, his hood falling back as he grunts and digs into Lil Cal's soft arms with claws that are still sharp through gloves. He's tamed his feathers and hair so they don't stick out, but with the hood down he's just as much a neon orange signpost as ever. “I thought I told you guys to leave me alone,” he says, kicking to try to free himself. “What the hell are you doing here?!”

“Hunting down my wayward kid. You really think we'd let you go off like a complete dipshit and get your fool self killed?” A couple of the kids are pulling specibi now. Easy enough to ignore them, though he does have to shunt one out of the way when they throw themselves at him with a frying pankind in hand. Maybe what weapons training they've managed on their own is good enough for a tussle on the streets, but like Oriole when he first walked into casa Strider, they don't know how to fight on the level of someone who strifes for a living, let alone Bro. “Kid, I've been running all over hell's half acre looking for you. Guess what. I no longer have a shitbrick to give about whatever stunt you think you can pull here with the Crew. You're coming with me."

The look the kid gives him is pure venom. “You already have a kid,” Oriole says. He rips Lil Cal's arms off and tosses the puppet aside. It vanishes and returns to Bro's shoulder. “Trust me. Having an extra copy around won't get you brownie points.”

“Nice try.” Bro folds his arms, meeting the open antagonism on the kid's face with a stone wall.
Can't remember Dave ever showing that much emotion unless he was absolutely shitting himself with panic. A girl tries to stab him with a pokerkind and Bro blinks out of her path, redirecting her so she trips over the fallen troll and he doesn't have to look away from Oriole. “S'not how it works though. You wanna go live your own life, fine by me. But you start flinging yourself at cult crime groups as bait and setting fires like a pyro? That's not living, that's trying to get yourself killed.”

Oriole's cheeks burn orange. He's back on his feet, eyeing Lil Cal warily - pretty rookie mistake, but Bro didn't have long to work on the kid's reflexes before they had to leave for Seattle. “It's none of your business,” he says, his jacket straining at the seams like he's ready to flip the fuck off the handle and fly out of here in broad daylight. No filter at all, honestly. “I know what I'm doing.”

Where do kids come up with shit like this? It's like Rose running off half-cocked with her head still a mess to shack up with her girlfriend while Rue goes on and on about her being 'mature' enough to not need adult supervision anymore. Bull fucking shit. Must be something in the Strilonde genes that convinces them they're invincible. “Yeah, well, you're still accomplishing jack shit, little man. And while I'm down here chasing you down, the other problem children are busy getting mindfucked back up in Seattle, and Egbert's gone traitor.”

While the other kids trade blank looks, that gets Oriole's attention. His head snaps up, the sullen orange flush draining out of his face. “What? What the hell happened?”

"Crow," one of the kids whispers, reaching out and yanking on his jacket. They've all stopped staring at Bro like he's the Antichrist, but that's not saying much.

Lil Cal's grip on Bro's throat tightens, a brush of fabric on skin, but he doesn't need the warning.
"The Crew likes brainwashing people," he says, clipped as he casts his senses out to count how many are coming up on them. Feels like five, which is odd, since Crew tend to run in packs of four.
"They got Egbert early and his kid's been fucked up ever since. Tried to make a break for it when Lalonde started spot checking the lab for plants." Or at least, that's the impression he got from catching up on the emails and text messages. Shit's confusing. Mainly, what he took away from it was now he needs to keep an eye on both the Egbert kid and his and Rue's latest set of clone children.

Just gotta deal with this kid and the shit he's stirred up, first.

"Huh!" a voice says from Bro's six o'clock, where they probably think they've come up in his blind spot. Lil Cal darts away in silence. "That was Matchsticks and Die's group proyecto, wasn't it?"

The first voice yelps, accompanied by the dull thud of someone being smacked upside the back of the head. "Quatorze, will you just keep yer damn fool mouth shut for five seconds?"

"You punks might wanna run, now," Bro says, adjusting the brim of his hat and his gloves before he turns around. Be lying if he said he hadn't been expecting a fight before the end of this. Most of the kids are already running, some of them crossing the street without checking both ways and skidding out of sight down the embankment of the bayou. Oriole stays where he is, his eyes wide and his breathing harsh as he watches the five people in green and black come to a stop a safe distance away.
At least, they must think it's a safe distance. Tch.

It's the two in green that tick a checkbox in Bro's brain. Could basically discount the other three - they're in Crew uniform, but they're nothing but cannon fodder and muscle, the kind of small fry Oriole's been smoking out of their holes these past few days. One Felt member is a man with an angular jaw and an equally angled maroon hat, while the other is a woman in two different shades of green, rubbing the back of her head with a pout. "Ah, busted." She lowers her hand and tosses a coin between it and the other as she meets Oriole's stare with a smile. "How exciting, though! I have never had a friend who was a bird before!"

Yeah, that specibus is barely concealed. At all. Bro sends Lil Cal to snatch it, the puppet a blur as it pauses by the woman's hand and then vanishes again with coin in plush hand. She takes a moment to notice, looking down at the sidewalk with a frown as though puzzled as to where she might have dropped it - only to look up and yell, "Hey!" when she sees the glint of metal in Lil Cal's glove. "Give that back!"

"Damn. This is why you don't get solo jobs, from now on," the other Felt member says, hauling Quatorze back by her shoulder when she tries to stomp toward Bro. "You're never foolin' me into thinking you've mastered impulse control again."

"Come on, he took one of my coins!" she complains, and pulls another coin out of her pocket with a scowl. "Droog wouldn't put up with that kind of mierda."

"The fact that you think Droog is some kinda god damn role model is just another reason why you don't get solo rounds on the roster no more."

"Crowbar," Oriole says, and his rage is bare in his voice, all the kinds of raw and exposed that Bro trained Dave never to show because it's a vulnerability. Tells Bro everything he needs to know, honestly - that Oriole's got a bone to pick with the Felt and the Crew, and he'll burn through the anger because he's absolutely stupid with it.

"Oh look, the wrong Dave Strider," Crowbar says, disgruntled. "Damn, kid, you couldn't just abscond and piss off? Hey, hey, I get it, you're not the time kid. My bad. Now stop toasting all the primo locations in town."

"No." Oriole takes a step forward. Bro debates whether to just let the kid get his ass handed to him, but it's not really a question. The mere mention of Droog alone's enough to set Bro on edge, whether she's here in person or not, and he doesn't like that. Droog's never going to stop being a sore spot after what went down in Georgia. After what happened to Dave on his watch.

Step one, get the kid out of here. Can clear the trash out of Houston some other day, because right now whatever the fuck is going on in Seattle right now needs undivided attention. "We're out of here, little man," he says, sending Lil Cal to snag the new coin out of the Felt woman's hands - and to pick a few more out of her pocket, for good measure. "Save the grudge match for when you don't suck at fighting."

Oriole glares at him, taking off his shitty glasses and reaching up to defiantly start unzipping his jacket, like he's already forgotten that he got his wing fucked once already with these people. Before he can do it, though, Quatorze lets out an outraged shriek, digging her hands into the pockets of her lime green suit and coming up empty. "Why would you do that?!" the Felt member demands. "Crowbar, let me -"

Crowbar jabs a finger at her. "No."
"Why not!!"

"Because if you wanted to still be able to make the call in field ops, yah shouldn't have gotten the head of accounting nearly arrested in Florida."

Lil Cal returns, laden with the sweet loot, to rest a chin on top of Bro's head. The three Crew members look back and forth between their two green-suited Felt leaders with rolling eyes, one troll in a black suit passing a fistful of cash to another as though they're taking not-so-subtle bets on what'll happen next.

Whatever. A free distraction is a free distraction. They're out of here, whether Oriole like it or not. Bro might be able to take all five of these guys at once, but he's not in the mood to do it with the hapless kid trying to throw himself into the middle of the strife. Instead, before the little shit can shrug off his jacket and bat his bright orange 'shoot me now' targets all over the place, Lil Cal wraps around Oriole in a twined-arm bear hug, bright blue eyes gleaming as Bro seizes the kid around the waist and blinks out of sight, hauling ass toward the apartment building off to the left. Cut through there, head for the freeway -

He dodges the first hail of bullets, but only just. Oriole rips a feather-laced arm and a wing free and that is not the kind of shit he needs to be juggling when he hears the clink and rattle of a machine gun firing up behind them. Cursing, Bro throws the kid to the ground and follows, moving as fast as he can maneuver in a crouch as he drags Oriole toward a row of bushes. The gunfire cuts off briefly, and a brief recon shows the two Felt arguing again - and Quatorze has a handheld machine gun in her grip, yanking the specibus away from Crowbars' grasping hands with a barking laugh. Before she can open fire again Bro throws Oriole over the shortass fence and hops it himself, shoving the kid into the open entrance to the nearest hallway that runs along the length of the apartment complex's ground floor. The fence is made up of black bars with gaps a goddamn mile wide, so it's not going to be cover enough. The kid's wing is flagging as Oriole whirls, looking dazed at the sudden change in scenery, but Bro doesn't have time to wait for him to get his head on straight. Pulls a hard right instead and drags the kid behind him, so at least they have a solid wall and a row of apartments between them and the next round of gunfire that splits the air open, louder than a car backfiring. Clearly, he didn't have Lil Cal pick enough pockets.

And that's -

That's odd, that's very odd. Huh. Where are they going?

No, really. Where did they go? Why can I not - that's almost like they've just left the n-

...What street were they just on?

Oh no. Oh no. You people are not-"- supposed to be here!!" a girl screams, just as Bro rams the nearest door open with his shoulder and heaves Oriole inside, slamming the battered door shut behind them. He doesn't spare more than a glance for the troll standing half out of her seat at a patio table that seems to be doing double duty as a kitchen table, her headphones sliding down from behind her horns as she gapes at the intruders in horror. Yeah, yeah, tough shit; Bro's taken shortcuts through plenty of other random apartments in his time, and no one's gotten too ornery about it. Or at least no one's managed to do anything about it.

"But you don't understand!!" the troll keeps yelling. She stumbles and nearly falls when her headphones, plugged into her laptop, yank her to a stop. Almost whimpering in frustration, she yanks the headphones off and slams the laptop lid shut. "You all can't be here! I can't see what happens here! She could be about to start shooting again!"

Outside the door, something clinks and rattles. "Get down!" Bro barks, voice hoarse with the effort of making it a shout, as he shoves Oriole's head down and drags them behind the kitchen island. The troll's hair is still flying when the first bullets punch through the wall at around stomach height and start flying through the air in a strafing pattern, mowing down the glass patio door on the wall opposite in a burst of glass shattering outward. But the girl does get down in time, hitting the concrete floor and covering her horns with her arms, screaming at the top of her lungs. Hell, she keeps screaming even after the minigun stops firing again.

"Dude, get off of me!" Oriole says, elbowing Bro in the gut like that'll actually do anything. Kid has sharper elbows than Dave, which is saying something, but ha. Nice try.

"Learning a valuable life lesson about not fighting criminals with heavy artillery right now, you little shit?"

"Yes, oh my god, I'm sorry!"

"MP?" the troll calls, uncurling a little from her crouch by the table and crawling toward the couch. "MP, are you okay?"

Shit. Didn't even realize there was someone else in the damn room. Bro looks around, braced for the fucking worst, because he does make an effort not to get civilians killed, Jesus -

Only to see a pale carapacian in colorful wrappings, standing stock still in the center of the barren living room, between the couch and the patio doors. The alien's claws are folded tightly in front of her, coal black eyes wide as she trembles.

But what's stomach height on Bro, the level the minigun was strafing at, is actually above the carapacian's head. Thank Christ for the minor miracles, like aliens short enough that they dodge machine gun fire just by existing.

Before the carapacian can sign a word, though, the bullet-hole riddled door of the apartment jolts. To hell with this, then; Bro draws a sword and sends Lil Cal snaking toward the doorway, giving Oriole enough room to scramble away and press his back against the side of the kitchen counter. With a mighty shove, Crowbar levers it open, slapping a crowbarkind against his palm as he strides into the room. "And yer not getting any of them back until circumstances present themselves which, if I'm not mistaken, will never present themselves in any way, ever," he snaps over his shoulder at Quatorze's hanging head. When Lil Cal wraps around the man's feet to bind him, Crowbar wobbles in place and looks irritated when he spies Bro with sword in hand. "This is not how I wanted this week to go, yah kn-" His jaw snaps shut.

Thinks it's a trick, at first, on account of 'look over your opponent's shoulder and pretend there's something behind them' is the most overplayed tactic in the book. There's no one else in this dinky little apartment but Bro and Oriole in the room anywhere close to being a potential threat; the carapacian and the troll are just random bystanders whose apartment unfortunately ended up the site of a shootout. Sucks for them, but why would they matter to the Felt?

Makes him feel like a real shithead for thinking that when Crowbar starts smiling like a sharp hook, chuckling and punching Quatorze in the arm until the sulking woman looks up. "Well, well, well. Ain't that something. Looks like with Droog off the radar, we beat her to her target. Ms Paint, huh?"

“Crap. Crap," the troll says, looking nauseous as she gets to her feet, shaking harder than the carapacian. Her burgundy eyes flick back and forth between the Felt and Crew members crowding in the doorway and Bro and Oriole in the kitchen, looking like she's gonna upchuck all over the floor. “Oh god - you're not supposed to be here.”

Then she lunges forward. It carries her closer to the Felt and Crowbar reacts accordingly, swinging the crowbar at her (slow, slower than Droog, and isn't that the only standard that matters), but the girl flings herself on top of her laptop instead, of all things, yanking the power cord out of the wall socket and tripping over herself to back away again.

So the crowbar doesn't hit her. It hits her laptop across the lid, scoring the metal and hrows the pale carapacian bodily out the patio doors. The glass has been shot out, thank fuck, and the carapacian - MP? - takes the throw like a champ, rolling back up onto her feet as the troll girl shouts, “Run! Get to the car!” She runs out through the empty door frame after the carapacian with keys and laptop in hand. Her shoes skid in the dirt but MP grabs her wrist and the strange duo exit stage left, rounding the corner and disappearing down another hall of the apartment complex.

EMITFOETSAWLANGSDIIIIIVLNADUOIVBDSYENFJCIVYCDBIAJCBDVHKNAERGIVDE

"Get after them, go!" Crowbar snaps at the Crew members, blood dripping down over his eye as he gnashes his teeth at Bro. Coolly, Bro calls Lil Cal away from where the puppet's wrapped around Quatorze's face to keep her blind and clawing at the puppet with muffled Spanish swears. There's a moment where the puppet doesn't move, but not long enough to concern him; Cal smacks into the side of Crowbar's face with all limbs flailing, and Bro takes the opportunity to break their deadlock. Whatever weird shit mojo is in the crowbar stops messing with his sword once he disengages from it (probably fucking magnets), and after that it only takes a second to slam the hilt into the man's temple like a hammer. The Felt man drops like a stone, Lil Cal still stuck to his face with a wild grin.

Those two had the right idea, though. Something happened just there, something that's left Bro with the kind of raging headache he hasn't had since he stopped DJing regularly. Got a nagging feeling, a shard in his gut that makes him think things like don't remember sending Lil Cal at Quatorze and that girl wasn't wearing shoes before - none of which make sense, because those things did happen. Whatever just happened, it's too much; Bro tables it in his mind to analyze later, when he doesn't have every Felt and Crew member in the city trying to hunt down his kid for being a shithead arsonist.

To hell with it. Reaches out, grabs the kid by the scruff of his shirt, and goes as fast as he can. He doesn't stop blurring in and out of sight until they're halfway across the park - the opposite direction of the freeway, but that'd be too obvious an escape route anyway.

They're getting the hell out of Dodge before something else goes wrong. If it takes them a little longer than it would if they'd stuck to the freeway, fine by him. Fine and goddamn dandy.

Oriole's got some explaining to do, anyway.

TT: okay.
TT: runaway asshole child present and accounted for and grouching at me like a toddler.
TT: comin' home now.
TT: please tell me no other shit has gone horribly wrong in the past five hours, Lalonde, because if it has that's a new damn record and also no. hell no.
TG: Remarkably enough, nothing else has gone horribly wrong in the past five hours, Ambrose.
TT: bull. shit.
TG: Hard to believe, I know. You may wish to hasten your trip back, regardless.
TT: shit, why?
TG: Well, the reason that stands out most prominently in my mind is that you really do need to be checked for any signs of a mindgrub making a home in your cerebral cortex.
TG: But also because I am receiving some troubling readings from within my and Rose's old home here in Maple Valley, and I suspect that when I take them by the Egbert's house, the results will be all the more worrisome, because they were closer to the edge of the shield radius.
TT: what the hell?
TG: It would appear that, at some point in the past month, someone stole the void ward generator I left here to safeguard John and Samuel against wandering eyes.
TG: I would avoid visiting your apartment, Ambrose. If one generator is missing, yours could also have been stolen in your prolonged absence.
TT: shit. how do you know it's only been the past month?
TG: The void this generator harnessed hasn't entirely dissipated from the neighborhood. It may have been a month, it may only have been a week or so; I cannot estimate without more data. But it's thinning fast, and the machine is nowhere to be found. It may well have been gone even before the children came to stay here.
TG: I fear that if Samuel is responsible, he may have passed it on into the hands of someone in the Midnight Crew who could learn to reverse-engineer it - or even to counteract the effects of existing void shields.
TT: pretty fuckin' sure this qualifies as 'going horribly fuckin' wrong,' Lalonde.
TG: After this past Monday, I'm afraid that this barely registers as more than a moderately dismaying turn of events. Remind me again why I gave up appletinis, my dear Ambrose?
TT: shit's hell for your liver.
TG: Mmm.
TT: but whatever. anyone who tried to rob casa strider would be in for a damn unpleasant surprise.
TT: brb.
TG: Oh. And before you go haring off again, there is just one more thing.
TT: what?
TG: I have given Roxy your handle. She is very excited to test out her new Pesterchum account on her secure new phone.
TG: She has taken to calling me Mom, in defiance of the exact genetic sequence we share, and was most enthusiastic to hear more about you.
TT: what the fuck have you done
TG: The next time you choose to ignore my messages during a time of crisis - TG: Reconsider.
-- tartGuardian [TG] blocked temperedTitan [TT] from the chat! --

-- tipsyGnostalgic [TG] began pestering temperedTitan [TT] at 12:30:18 -- TG: gomg!!!
TG: *omg
TG: hello mister strideer!
TT: well played, Lalonde. well played.

---

Thursday and Friday

Lurid and sluggish are good words for that week.

Lurid because everything in the first day after the surgery is garishly bright and loud. The drug cocktail Marion and his team put together out of Jade's new stock of medical supplies has to be strong enough to knock him for a loop, or it doesn't work at all. The place where they had to go in through his skull to reach the grub heals over way faster than it does for the Scratch children, so he's soon weaned off the worst of the pain meds and his head stops clouding up in a way that makes him paranoid the Trickster will take advantage of the fuzziness to rear its ugly head.

It lurks in the back of his mind like a bad dream, so faint and flickering he's not sure if he's actually sensing something else in his head or if it's just his imagination.

(Is there a difference between the two, anymore?)

Sluggish because, no matter how hard he tries, he can't seem to muster up much energy. What just ends up happening is he slows down. A lot.

Because the oil slick in his head isn't something that'll go away. It crept in at some point without him noticing, and now John's stuck at this base level of dull, quiet sadness. No matter how he smiles at anyone who comes to check in on him, it feels like an incredible effort. The first couple of days, he sits still for hours, and doesn't fidget once. Just sitting up and talking to his friends sucks the energy right out of him, and then he'll have to curl up and go back to sleep. They seem to assume it's because he's in that post-op recovery period. All through Tuesday and Wednesday he keeps drifting in and out of drug-laced, unremembered dreams to find different people with him: Kanaya holding up measuring tapes to his arms while he sits up for her in bemused incomprehension, Dave keeping silent vigil, Jade sitting on the next bed over and filling the air with words even when all he can do is nod back, Rose reading to him out of one of her borrowed magic books, Karkat holding his hand and looking like the world already ended and they've come out the other side of it burned out and hollow.

John knows the feeling.

He considers asking Rose to burn it out of his head or something - but then he thinks asking her to take a second trip into his messed up brain twice in one week might be too much. The Breeze huffs at him when he thinks thoughts like that, but it can't make him stop thinking them altogether. He's alright at dealing with this, at least; he's been dealing with it, in not-so-good ways, for basically as long as he can remember. Not perfect, but good enough that he thinks no one has noticed yet that he could technically just float out the window, bed rest be darned. That the only reason he'd still be putting up with Marion's thing about 'rest and recuperation' is because he's too sad in his head to argue properly.
He's just so tired.

-

He's drifting in and out by the time Dave and Jade return from their trip with Doctor Lalonde back to Maple Valley. But the news they bring rouses him, if only because apparently Karkat has some kind of clown person stalking him now? Not even John could sleep through something like that, holy crap!

"I first ran into him when I was still on my way to find you, John," Jade says. She snaps a pink rubber band off her finger, stuffing it into a pocket, and points at Karkat, her eyes afire with curiosity. "And then I ran into him again on Monday, all the way up here in Seattle, and he was asking about you, mister! I kept meaning to ask whether you knew him or not, but you've been so worried about John and all..."

Dave's story is shorter, but no less strange, since it just now went down while he was picking up clothes at Karkat's house. Which makes the whole thing a little more ominous, to be honest. "Dude, I don't even know what was up with your piece of shit computer, but I fucking blinked and the whole thing was gone," he says. "I mean, me and WV tried to put the door back up and lock down your place before we left, but this guy apparently thinks walls are more like...suggestions?" He looks at Jade for backup, and she nods hard enough that her hair bounces. "But yeah. Whoever this guy is, he's definitely still looking for you. Seriously, man, I thought John was like. Literally your only friend. Why does this guy 'miss you' and shit?"

"How the fuck should I know?!" Karkat just keeps shaking his head, frustrated. John reaches out to pat him, because the frown on Karkat's face is more fear and confusion than anger and so needs to be shooshed away, but the swing of his hand falls way short. Stupid, stupid, he can't reach from here, not when Karkat's standing in the middle of the room. "Neither of you could get a fucking name?" Karkat can't pull off 'irritated' all that well when Kanaya's holding different swatches of cloth up in front of him and looking to Dave on occasion for a second opinion, but he makes an attempt. "I mean, if there's some random shithead clown stalking me now - on top of all the other fucking behemoth leavings the universe is bestowing upon me like a demented lusus! - you don't think you could have made the extra effort to find out his n-"

Before he can finish, Karkat's face starts doing that thing. The thing it does when he looks at Kanaya, sometimes, all contorted like he's swallowed something strange and can't figure out what the flavor is.

Or maybe just like he's constipated.

"What is it?" John asks, though there's an inkling of familiarity bothering him, too. Something about a clown...something else, about Mexico...If Karkat's getting his whole déjà vu on, though, John doesn't want to interrupt him with something that might just be John's dumb, sleep-slow brain making stuff up. He's kind of in that stage where everything that happened more than five minutes ago feels like a weird dream. The start of this conversation feels distant, and the memory of stopping Jake in his tracks this morning had to be confirmed by Rose and Karkat before John decided he probably hadn't been dreaming that either.

"Oh my fuck I still can't remember," Karkat says in a rush, kneading his eyebrows with his claws as he glares at a wall. "GM, though. Slick said some bullshit about a clown or a juggalo or something being a player he remembered, but all the names he came up with before he fucking vanished were useless."

...Huh. John doesn't know what it is about that mini rant that makes the jumbled pieces click into place. He sits up, anyway, sharply enough that he catches more than a few gazes whirling to fix on him in concern. He tries to snap his fingers as the name finally hits him, but they won't make the snapping sound, so he gives up. "Juggaloco!"

"Who what now?" Dave asks, voice flat, but there's some recognition on almost everyone else's face. Karkat's and Rose's are the most foreboding - Karkat because he knows just as much random hero trivia as John, and Rose...probably because Rose likes psychology, and if there was ever an anti-hero poster child for being messed up in the head, Juggaloco is it.

"That troll guy who broke out of a hospital in Europe and went on a rampage," John says. He's relieved when Karkat starts nodding along, because it means he's not just making this up off the top of his head. "Or something. It was a while back, though, and I think most people thought it was a onetime thing, or he got caught, until there started being rumors that he showed up in Central America."

"Most of the records were destroyed or incomprehensible, but it has been confirmed that whoever he may be, he has a diagnosis of clinical coldblood dementia. Judging from your story, Jade, he's still demonstrating signs of homicidal anger," Rose adds, using her psychology lecture voice. "I don't believe anyone has yet established whether he actually possesses powers or other abilities, or if he's just far enough gone that he reverted to a feral predator state."

Jade sniffs. She has the bottom half of the new outfit/costume thing Kanaya's been making for her on, and while John's still in that stage where everything's difficult to process, he's pretty sure that the short black shorts and lime green boots are real. Even though he's got this voice in the back of his head telling him that costumes like that are only practical for fighting crime in fiction, not in real life. "Ohhh, I think he's got powers, alrighty! He keeps sneaking up on me, and I have no idea how he does that! It freaks Bec out - and it takes a heck of a lot to scare Bec!"

John wishes he remembers what role the trolls' game session played when it got mixed up in their own. Karkat keeps getting frustrated and pulling at his hair, straining to remember more than he does, but no matter what Jade and Dave bring up about the details of the encounter with Juggaloco, no one can figure out who he might have been, or why he'd be so fixated as to travel all the way here to find Karkat. Other than, you know, the same kind of game-driven instinct that kept pushing the four humans to find each other. There's something really, really weird and ominous about this guy's way of following through on that instinct, though - no one can deny it.

But John only recalls his own session. When he asks the Breeze where the trolls might have come in, why they scratched their sessions together to form this one, the wind wraps around him in slow, uneasy loops, and doesn't reply. It's not unlocked yet, the Breeze whispers, lifting a length of fabric from one of Kanaya's temporary piles and tying it into knots. games are funny with rules like that. you aaaaalways have to follow the rules of paradox space! it keeps things in order, you know? maybe that sleepy head will talk to you about it later, when you both finish waking up.

The conversation has gone on without John as he drifts, and when he tries to find his place again he can already tell that he's about to fall asleep again. There's a faint rustle and a weight plops down near his feet, and he sees that WV has decided to crawl up onto the bed. The carapacian doesn't seem too badly off, considering he got ditched for a few days there; John smiles at the alien as he putters around with a ruler and a little mailbox flag thing. It kind of sucks that WV can't talk anymore - the outspoken little dude that kept trying to boss John around and guide him through his land (despite the fact that neither of them actually had any clue what they were doing) seems frustrated by his own enforced silence, and John can't blame him.

It's the weirdest thing, though. Before his eyelids sink down under their own weight, John could have sworn WV signs something at him that almost makes words in his head.

WV:sílimgobhfuilrudéiginmícheartanbhfuiltúagéisteachtuachailtháinigmégoléirarbhealachseoagustúnachbhfósthuiscintdom!

WV: !

-

Friday, he starts to wake up.

It starts early in the morning, when John wakes up to Karkat yelping and the distinct, ringing thunk of something being lobbed at the wall in a panic. Jade and Roxy have been working hard on something with the White Queen helping them at all hours of the day, Kanaya and Rose stay in their own room overnight, and Dave left even earlier this morning to strive with Dirk again (it seems to be their primary mode of interaction now that they're not pretending the other doesn't exist like a pair of numbuts). So John's the only one there to react, jolting up in bed in a blind panic to see Karkat frozen midthrow, staring back and forth between John and the phone lying on the floor in the far corner with eyes like saucers. "...Fuck. Sorry," Karkat says. He crawls out of the recooperacoon and tiptoes over to pick up the phone, dripping green sopor along the towels spread all over the floor.

"What the heck happened?" John asks when his heart stops being like it's going to punch out of his chest, reaching out until he hooks Karkat's sleeve and can tug the troll over to the nearest chair. He focuses on Karkat because honestly, Karkat needs focusing on. The troll went days without sopor by the time John noticed and called him out on it. They had to cajole some of the interns into hauling a spare recooperacoon out from the scientists' living quarters, and then John hauled his dumb butt out of bed long enough to manhandle Karkat into it. Of course, that made Karkat fuss more, but hey, at least now he gets in the sopor slime and sleeps fitfully, in hour-long snatches of time.

Because Karkat's dreaming again. This time, the dreams are apparently strange variations on him and Kanaya and some other troll guy wandering around a dead city and getting eaten by acid monsters, rather than visions of different ways John and the others could have died in their own messed up game session.

At least he's not driving himself into a breakdown trying to avoid them. The last thing any of them need right now is for someone else to succumb to one of their many, many issues.

Karkat gives him the shiftiest look John has ever seen. It is incredibly suspicious. "Whaaat?" John asks again, summoning his best stern frown. But the template for that frown has been tainted, lately, so he only holds it a fraction of a second before his stomach gives a sickening squeeze and he has to stop thinking about it. "Karkat..."

"I didn't think it would actually work!" Karkat spits out at last, looking at his phone with a combination of disgust and horror. "I mean - fuck, I don't know what I thought would happen. Just more proof that my thinkpan's a piece of shit, what do you know."

"But what did you dooo?" John asks, leaning over until he can look at the screen with Karkat. He has to twist his torso uncomfortably to pull it off, and for a moment, the inertia fights with the urge to move his legs to fix it.

But he's kiinda sick of lying around miserable all the time. He swivels his legs out from under the sheets and sits up properly, leaning his elbows heavy on his knees for extra support as he does. "I remembered a chumhandle, from one of those new dreams," Karkat's saying, reluctant. "And when I went and finally messaged it, I thought it would just, I don't know, connect with some random account or a spambot or something. But -" Karkat breaks off, eyes widening as his phone pings at him, and his voice starts to rise in pitch. "Oh god, she's still messaging me. Holy fuck. Fuck. This cannot be happening."

-- carcinoGeneticist [CG] began pestering cuttlefishCuller [CC] at 07:04:33 -- CG: OH GOD.
CG: I CAN'T BELIEVE I'M ACTUALLY DOING THIS.
CG: ALRIGHT, FUCK IT, HERE GOES.
CG: IS THIS FEFERI PEIXES?

"Isn't Feferi Peixes that really famous troll girl?" John asks, scratching the side of his face, and then scrubbing at his eyes. They're all gunked up with sleep crust, still, so that every time he blinks the screen looks kind of blurry and all he wants to do is keep them shut again. Gross. "Uhh...yeah, the one related to the Batterwitch?"

"John, you are the only person on the planet who thinks that just because her Condescension owns Betty Crocker, it somehow literally makes her the incarnation of cake-based armageddon." Karkat shakes his head, but the look he gives John is ten different kinds of sappy fondness. "But yeah. One of the first tyrians in the past couple of centuries to survive, and she's got enough slurry in common with the Condesce that she's a legitimate descendant and heiress."

John's brain is still running in slow-motion. "...And you're pestering her at a chumhandle that came to you in a dream?"

"Don't fucking remind me." Karkat says, gloomily tabbing over to a notes application to show John a copy of a list of initials John has seen him scribbling on in a real notebook over the past week. "The initials FP were on that list of fucking useless hints I got from Slick, but I didn't think they stood for her of all trolls until idiot dream me started messaging someone on a memo with this handle and the first name Feferi. This is unbelievable. This shouldn't have worked. On what planet does a scenario as ineffably stupid as this one actually play out!!"

CC: W)(y yes, yes it is!
CC: )(a)(a)(a, but )(ow did you get t)(is )(andle, frond?
CC: T)(is is supopposed to be a private account!
CC: S)(ello? Are you still t)(ere?

John nudges Karkat in the side when he finishes picking his way through that quirk. "Aren't you going to answer her?"

"No? Yes?! I don't fucking know, I didn't think it would actually get this far!" Karkat says, raising his hand like he's going to toss the phone out the window. Which, considering this is Karkat he's talking about, isn't all that much of a stretch of the imagination. Before he can follow through, John reaches out and the Breeze reaches with him. The wind's whistling like panpipes with curiosity as it brings the phone back to John's hands, and he starts typing while Karkat looks on in trepidation.

CG: I SAW IT IN A DREAM! CRAZY, RIGHT?
CC: W)(OA! T)(AT'S INCR-EDIBL-E!
CC: ...Is w)(at I would say, if it were true!
CC: -Eridan, is t)(at you again? 38T
CG: NO, REALLY! HONEST! SOMETIMES I HAVE WEIRD DREAMS WHERE I ACT LIKE A DOOFUS AND THIS TIME THEY GAVE ME YOUR CHUMHANDLE! I THINK WE WERE FRIENDS IN ANOTHER LIFE! :)

Karkat screams at the top of his lungs, transitioned from apprehensive to horrified in less than two seconds, which is probably a new record. "JOHN, WHAT ARE YOU DOING?!!"
"Hehehe!" John dodges Karkat's grabby hands, scooting back onto the bed until his back's up against the wall next to the windows. "Telling her the truth. If she was one of the players in your guys' game session, it's worth a shot, right?"

"NO. NOOOOO!"

CC: Anot)(er life, )(u)(?
CC: )(mmm...
CC: W)(ale, answer me t)(is, mister S)(outs-s)(allot - if you knew me in anot)(er life...
CC: W)(AT WAS MY TITL-E?! 38O

Oh crap. John looks at Karkat, who's still frantic to get his phone back and crawling onto the bed in his sopor-slime clothes to do it. Eurgh...John really didn't think this one through. "Help, what's her title?"

Karkat glowers at him, swiping at the phone again. "Heiress? Something Italian? How the fuck would I know, she hasn't announced one yet! Will you - give me -"

John removes the phone from harm's way, rolling so that Karkat ends up grabbing nothing at all. It kind of makes his head throb, but only a little. "No, like, you know. A title title! The game one!"

Karkat stops, disconcerted and chewing on his lip, his mouth moving without sound a few times as he appears to mull something over in his head. He mouths the same three words a couple of times before he says them aloud, "Witch of...Life?" It's more a slow, rising tide of recognition than uncertainty in his voice.

"What, witch like Jade?"

"Maybe?! How the fuck should I know!"

CG: LET ME GUESS...
CG: THE WITCH OF LIFE!
CC: O)! You do know!
CC: W)(at's your name! I'm starting to raymember t)(ings wit)( Glubby's )elope, but I don't recognize t)(at )andle...
CC: It's on t)(e tips of my gills!
CG: IT'S ME! KARKAT! :D

"Okay, fuck, give me that, you're mangling my quirk, dumbass," Karkat insists. This time when he reaches out, John passes the phone back, still snickering. Probably in an act of revenge, Karkat chooses that moment to flop down right next to him and pat a claw to John's face - smearing him with sopor slime. Oh, jeez...this stuff never washes off... "Fuck. Holy taintchafing fuck, I can't believe we're messaging a Peixes."

"She doesn't seem that bad," John says, resigning himself to having gross sopor-hair when Karkat presses their heads together. "Kind of enthusiastic, but hey! It looks like she remembers your game a little! And she likes puns!"

Karkat throws him another glare, and starts wiping sopor from his sleeve off on John's shirt. Oh boy.

CC: Karkat...Karkat...
CC: Karcrab?
CG: WHAT IS IT WITH YOU PEOPLE AND TURNING MY NAME INTO A PUN?
CC: KARKAT! I do remember you! T)(IS IS SO -EXCITING!
CC: Maybe you can help me with my mission! Are any of t(e ot)(ers with you?

CG: WHAT, LIKE, OTHER PLAYERS? TROLL PLAYERS? KANAYA'S WITH ME, YEAH.

CC: Glub glub glub! 38

CC: I mean, I know about -Eridan now, but I just can't deal wit)( all t(e w)(ining t( at would )appen if I asked )im to kelp out over )ere!

CG: ERIDAN? THE GUY WITH THE LAND OF GIANT ASS CASTLES AND DEAD CRYING ANGEL THINGS?

CC: hehe, yep! I could give you )is )andle if you want to tangle up )is net. But )e was still in Los Angelfis)(es )eard from )im last.

CG: FUCK. ISN'T THAT PLACE STILL RE-ENACTING A STEPHEN KING NOVEL?

CC: I'm dolp)(initely glad I got out of t)( when I heard from )im last. )is )andle is caligulasAquarium.

CC: But back to my quaystion! Would you and Kanaya come )elp me wit)( somefin?

"This is real life." Karkat doesn't look like he knows whether to be happy about that yet or not.

"What should I say?"

"She wants you and Kanaya to help her with something, huh...I guess that makes sense, since she'd probably only know about your guys' session?" John shrugs. "If I can't remember your session, the opposite makes sense." But then what about Karkat's -

"I'm more concerned about the fact that a fucking tyrianblood wants help with something," Karkat says, his claws rising up toward his mouth like he means to start chewing on them. John grabs the drifting hand and pulls it away again. "She could run the fucking world if she wanted to, so what good would me and Kanaya do that she couldn't get from twenty other people on call right away?"

Oh. Well, that one's obvious. "Game stuff."

CG: I DON'T KNOW ABOUT KANAYA. SHE THINKS WE'RE A BUNCH OF GULLIBLE FKTRUCKS FOR BUYING INTO THIS SACK OF GAME SHIT, SO SHE PROBABLY HAS HER OWN PLANS.

CG: AND I - FUCK, I DON'T KNOW. WHAT KIND OF HELP ARE WE TALKING ABOUT HERE?

CC: It's my ancestar((! I t(ink s)(e's up to somet)ing PR----ETTY SUSPIC-ES!

CC: Me and Glubby )ave been investigating, and s)(e's responsible for a bunc)( of gross w)(ite pollution all over t)(e -East Coast.

CC: I'm going to conc)(front )(er about it - but I t)(ink I'll need )elp because she's so muc)( older t)(an me!

CC: It reely wouldn't take muc)( time! Plus, we were buddies, rig)(? T)(is'll go muc)( quicker if we work toget)(er.

"Hahaha, well, that was a fun conversation. I'll remember not to try again, ever," Karkat says, his voice falsely bright and cheery as he raises the phone up to chuck it at the wall. John intercepts again, but when he tries to shove the phone back at Karkat with a look the troll shoves it away. He actually looks kind of ill. "The fuck. It had to be her ancestor, didn't it. Fucking hell. There's nothing I could do to help her with that, John."

"Why not?" John asks. Pesterchum blinks at them, but Karkat keeps avoiding looking at the screen.

He does look at John, though, sour as a crabapple as he raises a single claw and jabs it at his own eye, bright crimson red in the dark. "Trust me, I doubt Kanaya wants any attention from the Condesce, either, what with her - whatever. Off-spectrum trolls don't last long, and they last less long when they go parading themselves into front of the Culling Queen like it's the fucking Fourth of July."
John bites his lip. Because he tends to forget stuff like that. His dislike of the Batterwitch is mostly an immaterial thing, something that carried over from before the scratch - just because, apparently. He's not a troll, so he forgets sometimes just how odd it is that Karkat's hemotype isn't on the hemospectrum; humans don't really think about that much in general, he guesses, since it doesn't affect them personally. But Karkat's been hiding all his life just to survive. "Then what are you gonna say to Feferi?" he asks. This time, when he makes an aborted motion to pass the phone back, Karkat takes it, sighing.

CG: LOOK, THIS IS KIND OF SHORT NOTICE. I BARELY REMEMBERED YOUR CHUMHANDLE. WHERE THE FUCK EVEN ARE YOU RIGHT NOW?
CC: )a)(a)(a! Isn't it obvious, dummy? I'm in Wasington DC...as Nymph! Surprise!
CC: And t(e )('roic t(ing to rig)(t now is to stop )IC before s)(e strikes again!
CG: YOU KNOW, BASICALLY EVERYONE KNEW WHO YOU WERE AS A HERO FOR YEARS NOW EVEN WHEN YOU KEPT CHANGING THE NAME.
CG: WHY DO I FEEL LIKE ALL OF US ENDED UP RUNNING AROUND IN SHITTY COSTUMES AND DICKING AROUND WITH THE LAW? IT SEEMS TO BE THE GENERAL THEME HERE. THE UNIVERSE HAS A SICK FUCKING SENSE OF HUMOR THAT WAY.
CC: Glub glub glub S)(RUG.
CC: So will you )(elp me?
CG: I'M KIND OF ON THE OTHER SIDE OF THE FUCKING COUNTRY AND ALREADY IN THE MIDDLE OF DEALING WITH ONE CRISIS. IF WE STACK ANOTHER TURDCAKE ON THIS SHITSTACK OF DESPAIR, MY PAN WILL PROBABLY EXPLODE.
CC: Awww! But Glubby seems pretty s)(e we'll need )(elp...t)(e situation is desperate!
CG: WHAT THE FUCK IS A GLUBBY.
CC: My lusus, DU)(, stupid! S)(e's been )assled by my ancestor for years, so s)(e )asn't been around muc)( before now.
CG: OKAY, WHATEVER. ANYWAY, HOW DESPERATE ARE WE TALKING ABOUT HERE? ON A SCALE FROM 0 TO 10, WITH 0 BEING OH NO WE'RE OUT OF MILK AND 10 BEING THE CONDESCE IS ABOUT TO LAUNCH THE PLANET INTO THE FUCKING
SUN TO BAKE US INTO A PIE AT 10000 DEGREES UNTIL CRISPY.
CC: Ummmm...
CC: Probably an 8!
CC: I doubt s)(e's gonna launc)( us into t)(e sun, but s)(e does )(ave some secret operaytion going on (at Glubby says could end wit)( a lot of people getting )(urt! S)(e mig)(t be trying to start )er own empire again! 38O
CG: OH YOU'VE GOT TO BE SHITTING ME. I CANNOT BELI- HANG ON.

"I *fucking knew it!!" John says, laughing. "I totally called it! Ohhh my god!!" And okay, maybe from the look Karkat's giving him, he's a little hysterical about it. But after days and days of being depressed as heck, having all of his suspicions about the Condesce confirmed is the most hilarious thing ever. There are tears in his eyes. Oh crap. He's crying juuust a little.

"No - oh for fuck's - *shoosh!!" Karkat drops the phone and presses his hands to John's cheeks, shaking his own head like that'll stop the Batterwitch from totally being a real thing and not just an imaginary cake-based tyrant made up by a thirteen year old who was just really sick of eating cake tall the time on his birthday. John isn't entirely sure why that makes him cry a little more, even with his cheeks hurting from laughing so hard, but the longer Karkat pats his face, the less John's smiling and the more he's crying. "No, don't cry either, dumbass," Karkat says. When John gives one last hiccupy laugh-sob thing, Karkat just keeps pressing his thumbs in strokes over John's cheeks, like that'll make the stream of tears turn off.
And okay, it does. John closes his eyes and lets his head tip forward. Karkat doesn't complain that John's making him hold his head up, and eventually he cries himself out. Some of the past few days are a little hard to remember, but he thinks this might have happened before, at least once. Like he's being all weepy now to make up for lost time. One time he definitely remembers, it was only Dave in the room with him, and the blatant panic on Dave's face as he freaked out was funny enough that John stopped crying all on his own. "Sorry," he says, feeling sheepish, because this has to be getting old by now.

Karkat rolls his eyes. "I can't even tell if you're just that fucking ecstatic to have been right about her Condescension, or if you've actually realized the most powerful troll on the planet possibly going on another cull-happy empire-building streak for the first time in over a century is, in fact, not a laughing matter."

"...Both?"

Karkat scowls, and needs to relocate one of his hands to smack his face. John follows the other hand so that the side of his face rests entirely on that one, instead. He's pretty sure there's sopor all over his face now, but he really needed to shower today anyway. "Dork," Karkat says at last, with all the explosive force of any cuss word. John makes sure there's a grin on his face by the time Karkat peeks up through his claws again, because the faux-disgust on the troll's face is always amazing to behold.

By the time John finishes pulling himself back into working order, Feferi seems to think Karkat's just left the conversation altogether, and has left rows of fuchsia text waiting for them when Karkat picks the phone back up.

CC: T)(ere's no reason to be scared!
CC: I just know for sure t)(at if we worked toget)(er we could at least saboatage )(er plans!
CC: I'm now)(ere near ready to take )(er )(ead on yet! So don't worry about t)(at...
CC: Please come )(elp? We're stronger as a group! Glubby says so, w)(ic)( means it's true!
CG: LOOK. THE LAST PERSON WHO COULD HELP YOU IS ME. MY TRACK RECORD
AS A HERO BASICALLY GOES SOMETHING LIKE RUN INTO ENEMY'S FIST, NEARLY DIE, RINSE, AND REPEAT.
CG: EVEN IF WE HAD SOME KIND OF GAME POWER BOOSTING EFFECT FROM BEING IN THE SAME FUCKING ROOM AS EACH OTHER, I'M PRETTY SURE MY OWN INGROWN ABILITY TO RUIN EVERYTHING I LAY CLAWS ON WOULD 'SABOATAGE' US MORE THAN IT WOULD HER.
CG: I DON'T KNOW. YOU CAN ASK KANAYA. BUT I'M BASICALLY A HIGHLY VIRULENT CONVEYOR OF INFECTIOUS FAILURE.
CC: I'm sure t)(at's not true!
CG: YEAH, IT KIND OF IS.

"It really isn't," John says.

"Fucking yeah, it is."

John finally has his turn to roll his eyes, bonking his head against Karkat's. "Nooo, it's not."

Karkat shrugs his shoulders in a way that means he's not gonna admit defeat, but also doesn't intend to let this devolve into a fresh cycle of complete stupidity. "Yeah, well, that doesn't change the fact that it's still the best fucking excuse I can come up with for me not going to say hi to the Condesce up close and personal."

CC: Well...I still t)(ink we could work toget)(er!
CG: REALLY. REALLY NOW.
CG: I HAVE ABSOLUTELY NO FUCKING CLUE WHERE YOU'RE GETTING THIS DESPICABLE OPTIMISM FROM BUT YOU NEED TO TURN IT OFF WHERE I'M CONCERNED. TRUST ME.

CC: UGGG)()()(! MISTER GRUMPY GILLS!
CC: Clam on, t(is s)ould only take a day or so! I promise!
CC: If you )elp me, t(en Glubby and I will )elp you!
CC: Glubby can very V---ERY )(-ELPFUL w(en s)(e's )appy!

CG: WHAT FUCKING GOOD COULD YOUR LUSUS DO FOR ANYONE, EVER. IN MY OBVIOUSLY EXTENSIVE EXPERIENCE, LUSII ARE FUCKING USELESS SHITMUNCHERS. THANK FUCK I NEVER HAVE TO DEAL WITH THAT AGAIN.

CC: S)(e's a very large lusus! You said you were in a crisis, rig(t?
CG: NOT REALLY THE KIND OF CRISIS THAT A GIANT ASS PROBABLY UN-FUCKING-SToppable TYRIAN SEA LUSUS COULD HELP WITH.

CC: Reely, t(ougu)()? R----EEEEEEEELY? 38)
CC: Is t)(ere any problem t)(at couldn't be raymedied wit)( t)e addition of a giant lusus?
CG: THIS INVOLVES, LIKE. EMOTIONAL PROBLEMS, OKAY. SO NO, ACTUALLY, A GIANT LUSUS WOULD BE REALLY FUCKING COUNTER PRODUCTIVE, AMAZINGLY ENOUGH.

CC: Glubby can )elp wit)( t)(at too! S)(e's a very good listener!
CG: YOU'RE NOT GOING TO DROP THIS, ARE YOU.
CC: PL-------EAS-E? You and Kanaya t(e only two I know now, ot)(er t)(an t)(at total bass)(ole - Eridan, and I can't reac)( )(im wit)( t)(at dome...
CC: I could )andle most of it! If we run into my ancestor, you can leave rig)t away! No )ard feelings!

CG: UGHHHHH...

John doesn't say anything at first, watching expectantly while Karkat holds the phone without typing anything. Then, as the minutes drag on, John pokes the troll on the shoulder. "Karkat?"

"Mmmflr." Karkat looks up, lips pressed together tightly. "Nhhrldr."

Huh. "You want to go help, don't you," John interprets, raising both eyebrows when Karkat makes another unintelligible death rattle noise. "Really?"

"I don't know," Karkat says, holding his phone in the pincer of a single claw and his thumb and looking ready to drop it on the floor. "Am I supposed to let the fuckpanned fish-for-brains go and get herself killed at the hands of the Condesce like literally every other tyrianblood that's ever tried this kind of bullshit? She's a player - what the fuck happens if she dies?"

John would point out that people sort of have a track record of coming back to life in those kind of circumstances, but he's spent basically his entire life still fucked up and traumatized by the all the dying, regardless of the fact that most of his friends got better. So yeah, he's hardly one to talk. "I mean -" John hesitates, sucking his lower lip into his mouth. He tries to contemplate the idea of him and Karkat and everyone else going all the way to the other Washington (the lesser Washington, obviously).

But heck. Who is he kidding? He can barely imagine himself walking around the labs. The mere thought of going back to that house in Maple Valley makes him want to vomit, and venturing out to Seattle? Not happening any time soon. Going farther than that...

"We could go," he says, though the words sound hollow, talking through the panic squeezing his throat shut. There's something laughing at him, cackling at his struggle like it's the funniest joke it's ever heard, and knowing what that something is just makes John panic even more. "I could - we - I -
"You're not going anywhere, dumbass," Karkat snaps, glaring at John like he's said the stupidest thing the troll's heard all day. Which might not be all that far of a stretch. It's still early in the morning, after all. "What the fuck, you just had brain surgery. Do you think that's a minor fucking inconvenience or something?"

"I'm mostly better," John says. He reaches up impulsively to poke at where the bandage was, because it's already grown over with the fuzz of hair. "I wouldn't let you go alone!"

Karkat swallows, looking like he's still torn. "Well, maybe Kanaya will want to come along," he mumbles, mostly to himself. He turns his glare on the screen instead, like he's blaming his phone for turning on this morning in the first place. "Or - fuck - maybe her and Rose? But fuck, John, remember the part where you need to fucking rest?"

"So do you!" John is starting to blame the phone for this, too - it couldn't have broken when Karkat threw it at the wall, or something like that, and done them a favor? Yeesh. "What if you got hurt?!" What if you got hurt and I wasn't there, again? Don't go, don't leave me like Ro-

But then he has to stop, because Rose came back. It's one of the truths that keeps John from wrapping himself up in [Eye of the Storm] all over again, something that is bedrock in his mind, now. She came back, and she set stuff on fire, and it was fricking awesome.

He doesn't know what to think about this. On the one hand, the thought of Karkat leaving is...unthinkable. On the other, John recognizes what it's like, now - what it feels like when someone needs help. He could no more have chosen to abandon Jade to the Midnight Crew's base, or to leave Rose to rampage through New York unchecked, than he could have chosen to not go to Dave when things turned unbearable in his house, with his handler.

Maybe it's a game thing. (It totally is.) But if Karkat's got even a fraction of that same instinct to help a fellow player, to group together in a time of dire need, how is John supposed to tell him not to? Especially if it's the Batterwitch herself who's apparently threatening to take over the world or something else dastardly?

When he snaps out of this train of thought, John sees Karkat staring at him. He stares back, caught in some kind of helpless limbo where thoughts of the game make words hard. "Fuck. Hang on," Karkat says at last, when it must become clear that John's frozen up.

CG: OKAY. LOOK. THE LAST THING I NEED IN MY LIFE IS TO PISS OFF THE CONDESCE. I MEAN IT, THERE IS A LONG FUCKING LIST OF THINGS I NEED, AND WOW, WOULD YOU LOOK AT THAT? THAT COMES IN LAST PLACE.
CG: IF YOU REALLY THINK YOU NEED HELP WITH THIS, I'M FUCKING DROPPING WHATEVER I'M HOLDING AND RUNNING BEFORE SHE CAN SO MUCH AS BLINK IN MY GENERAL DIRECTION. NO TAKE BACKS, NO TURNING AROUND TO ACT LIKE SOME MORON BY TRYING TO HELP YOU OUT. HOWEVER YOU PLAN TO PREVENT HER FROM DOING WHATEVER THE FUCK SHE'S DOING, I'M NOT HELPING YOU FIGHT HER.
CC: No, no, like I said! T(at's totally cool! S)(e's been building somet)(ing big - like a mac)(ine I t)(ink? So I just plan to BR-EAK IT. A lot.
CC: You can be t(ere as support!
CG: AND THIS WON'T TAKE LONGER THAN A DAY?
CC: T(at is correct! Glubby makes t)(ings easier t)(at way.
CC: I don't know w)(ere you are, t(oug)(, so I can't say )(ow long it'll take you to get )t(ere and back afterward!
John's voice sounds gravelly when it starts working again. "Karkat?"

"Yeah?"

"You know that our plans never work out right, right?"

"...I'm vaguely fucking aware of that fact."

CG: I'LL GET BACK TO YOU LATER.
CC: 38(
CC: By tominnow? I wanted to )ead out by Sunday.
CG: I DON'T KNOW. FUCK. WE'LL SEE.
CC: Alrig)(t...
CC: Talk to you soon, Crabcato)!
-- carcinoGeneticist [CG] ceased pestering cuttlefishCuller [CC] at 07:34:06 --

"...I still can't believe you're happy Crabdad is missing."

"Not a word, John. Not a word."

- Kanaya, as it turns out, does have plans.

"Jade has agreed to accompany me on an outing to Los Angeles, either tomorrow or Sunday. She believes that she and Roxy and the Queen may have completed their extra-curricular project by then, or at least reached the point where she may no longer be able to make meaningful contributions to the programming components. We should not be gone overlong, but if the Heiress wants a response by tomorrow, I'm afraid that my own must be in the negative," the jadeblood says, regretful, as she adjusts Karkat's arm. Any time Kanaya goes near him with a pin, they go through this weird ritual where Kanaya waits patiently and Karkat fidgets for like five minutes before they've apparently established that no one is stabbing anyone.

John sort of slept through the start of this weird proto-friendship thing Kanaya and Karkat have going on, anyway. He sure as heck doesn't remember Karkat being this bad when John was infecting him with that wonderful cross-species disease called friendship, but then again, he might have barged in completely oblivious to the traditional paranoia of troll friendship initiation because he was just that desperate for them to get to the friend part. The last time his handler willingly let him have a friend, it was only because Rue Lalonde would have been suspicious, otherwise, and Rose had been gone for so long.

Kanaya's cool, at least! The Malachite Sylph is a total badass. Her interests seem to be more about fashion and gardening and auspicing than about comics or a lot of the other things John knows Karkat likes. But Kanaya likes supernatural gothic romance books, and Karkat's dabbled enough in that through his general romance novel obsession that the two of them sometimes start debating how realistic the vacillations are in a bunch of controversial books in the genre. It's amazing. Karkat finally has someone other than John (who's only mildly interested in that kind of stuff at best) to argue with about terrible troll Fabio cover art.

"Fuck. Maybe I shouldn't go at all, then," Karkat mutters, reaching up and scratching at his arm with his free hand until Kanaya frowns at him reprovingly. "Wait, Los Angeles?"

"It was always our intention to continue on there after Seattle, to investigate that dome," Rose says. She turns a page in her book, but her eyes find John's, her smile quick and small. "But circumstances rather spiraled out of control here before we knew it, and the trip kept getting delayed. I think it best I remain behind, for the moment."

Part of John relaxes fractionally, a part he hadn't realized was tensing from the moment Kanaya said she was going somewhere. He assumed that meant Rose would automatically be going along, too, in a kind of fatalistic, resigned, dumb way. They're not attached at the hip, after all. "But there's apparently a troll player guy there, too," he says, throwing in his two cents. From the look Karkat gives him, Karkat meant to bring it up anyway. "Feferi said so! Eri-something?"

Karkat shrugs, and he and Kanaya flinch apart when she nearly pokes him in the arm with a pin because of that; they have to wait the requisite ten seconds before they can move again, and John can't quite stifle a giggle at how ridiculous they look. Rose gives him the judging eye for it, but John's been laughing at silly Karkat things for too long to stop now. "Eridan," Karkat finishes for John, squinting at him, which just makes John giggle harder. "Laugh it up, John. Laugh. It. Up."

"I still cannot believe you're on speaking terms with a Peixes," Kanaya says.

"Neither can I," Karkat says, scowling harder than ever. John thinks he still bitter about the whole it-came-to-him-in-a-dream thing. "Do you know how many fish puns she knows? Because it's fuckery like that that makes me regret my life choices on an hourly basis."

John grins. "I think they're great. The world is her oyster!"

"No. Stop that. Don't you even dare start with me, John -"

The door swings open part of the way through Karkat's diatribe, which might be the only thing that stops him from going on some kind of pun-hating rant that John would have no choice but to respond to in the most punctastic form possible. Dave walks in, typing on his phone, which is his default setting. There have been a lot of time-looping Daves around the past few days, jumping through time with the dual purpose of handling some weird thing with his apple juice side business and conspiring to show up at every single fitting that Kanaya has talked Karkat into allowing for a new costume. It's more subtle than the ways Jade and Dave messed with Karkat before, but if John in all his exhaustion has noticed it, he can only imagine that Karkat's sitting on a cantankerous new bubble of fury, just waiting for the opportune moment to explode.

"So I heard there were problems," he says, not looking up from behind his shades as he walks around Karkat and Kanaya's latest frozen pose, and flops down almost on top of Rose, who just moves her book out of the way. The Breeze flutters around Dave for a cursory inspection, the way it tends to whenever anyone enters a room lately; John doesn't know why it bothers when it's always the same people, but the Breeze blows raspberries at him when he questions its enthusiasm about stuff, so yeaaaah. He avoids that whenever possible. "But what I really want to know is - Karkles. Karkitkat. Karamel."

"That was a reeeeal fucking stretch, even for you," Karkat replies, disgusted.

Dave is unperturbed. "Are you seriously going to make us live through you waffling back and forth about whether to take your extreme field trip to DC and back without John for the next three fucking hours, or can you just fast forward straight to the part where you decide, fuck it, extreme field trip it is?"

Rose's eyebrows fly up; Karkat's mouth snaps shut. It's Kanaya who says, "...That is a thing that is in fact happening?"

"You better believe it," Dave says, shaking his head. "Three hours. Like, I know that future me really shat the bed by invoking temporal inevitability like a total jackoff when he started complaining about it to my face, but I still have to try to stop this future before it begins. I'm only human."

Kanaya frees up a hand to rub at her eyes. "I was referring to the fact that he is, in fact, going to follow through on this remarkably poorly thought out decision to venture out to meet someone he barely knows on the basis of a nightmare and a chatlog."

"What? Oh, yeah, for sure." Dave shrugs his shoulders, and starts pointing at people as he names them. '"You and Rose went on a goddamn cross-country road trip to go hang out with two crazy troll girls you barely knew and ended up shipping them to Canada because why not. I paid cold hard cash to fly up here because Egdoofus was having a crisis over Karkle's unconscious body. And hell, Jade goes off and does random shit like getting kidnapped all the time. We don't judge here, Maryam. Not anymore. Mostly because none of the rest of us have a goddamn leg to stand on, but also because if Karkat needs to have his own solo run, we need to damn well respect his random ass spur of the moment fuck-it-all life choices." And with that, Dave takes a long gulp from a jug of apple juice.

John feels the need to interrupt at this point, because if he's hallucinating, this is a thing that people probably need to be aware of! "Dave, are you drinking apple juice?"

Dave's eyebrows appear over his shades, and he stops drinking long enough to say, "EB, when am I ever not drinking the elixir of the gods? Which are totally us, btw." He takes another sip, because apparently that's a reasonable answer.

...God, Dave is weird. John starts to feel a little bit better when Rose starts staring, too, with her 'fascinated' face on. "$\text{Brother.}\"

"Mmph?"

"You...were not carrying apple juice when you came into the room - is what, I believe, John was attempting to point out."

"Uh, yeah I was," Dave says. The juice jug started out full, and is already half-empty, sloshing around whenever Dave whips it down to answer them. "Obviously. Do you think I can just pull an entire container of AJ out of thin air?" When no one can come up with a response to that before time's up - which, with the way Dave's mouth runs, is basically after three seconds have passed - Dave nods, sets the apple juice down on the floor by his and Rose's feet, and doesn't appear to notice or care at all when the entire jug vanishes. "So can we get back to the point of this conversation? Karkat, this is me being the ambassador of all of us in the future, telling you that three hours is way too long to argue about something with yourself."

"Watch me," Karkat says, pulling his eyes away from the empty spot where the apple juice used to be long enough to flip Dave the bird. "$\text{Anyway, fuck all future versions of you. We've just established that Kanaya and Harley are going to be headed in at fucking ninety degree angle from the direction I'd need to go that day, so that's it, genius. It's a no-go. Another one of my shitty plans doomed to get tossed in the trash where it fucking belongs.}\"

Kanaya retrieves Karkat's arm and glances at him reprovingly until he timidly puts the middle claw back down and lets her go back to work. "$\text{Would it not be possible to ask the Heiress to wait for a few days?}\" she asks. "$\text{Really, Jade and I don't expect to take that long.}\"

"That's the second hour, I got a play-by-play," Dave says. He slumps over onto Rose and puts his feet up by John. Rose seems too distracted by inspecting the magical vanishing apple juice point with her magic Seer eye to put up a fight. "$\text{Spoilers - he checks with fish troll girl and she says no.}\"
"Stop telling me I'm going to do things before I do them!"

Rose meets John's eyes while everyone else argues about this. "I'm fairly certain he just captchalogueed that," she says.

John nods, shrugging. That's what it looked like to him, too. Sometimes he forgets that he's the only one here who really remembers when sylladices were things that everyone could have, not just Jade... "Yeah, probably." Though heck if he knows why it's working for Dave now, of all times.

Rose glances at Dave, who is now engaged in some escalating argument with Karkat that Kanaya appears to be ready to mediate at the drop of a hat. Rose's eyebrows go totally out of control. "He doesn't seem to have noticed," she says, in a stage whisper.

John just laughs. Remembering's not so bad when the memories are of a thirteen year old Dave pretending to be the bomb at video games, with his fancy alchemizing and his weird stock market free-for-all...and he can compare those memories to the fact that now Dave's basically falling ass backwards into figuring out game mechanics on the rebound. He's pretty sure that's actual irony, not the fake bullshit kind Dave and his Bro worship or whatever.

Though John does wonder...what would happen if he were to check -

"Nah, man," Dave says loudly, derailing John's train of thought before it even leaves the station. "I'm just saying, Jade has a company jet loaned out to Momlonde that's just sitting around, waiting to be used."

Karkat squints at Dave, as though he can't believe what he's looking at is a real human being. "...Harley has a fucking jet plane."

"Yeah, I mostly zoned out when we were on that thing, but it was real. It happened," Dave says. He kicks John in the foot - okay, it's more of a tap, but John's not expecting it, so it jolts him more than it probably should. "Back me up, man, you were there."

"...Oh! Yeah, the Harley Foundation has a plane," John says. There's a delay between him thinking he ought to kick Dave back for being a butt, and him actually following through on that impulse, so he ends up kicking air while Dave smiles and yanks his feet out of range between one blink and the next. "They just seem to let Doctor Lalonde borrow it for stuff because the foundation didn't have an acting head for a while there." He vaguely recalls having a conversation with a flight attendant about that, but it's been a while and he's got a lot more memories to sort through now than he used to. Though maybe now that Jade's contacted them that might have changed. John isn't sure how it works; Jade shrugs whenever someone brings up the foundation, because she cares negative ten percent about taking charge of it or anything like that.

"Anyway, it's probably a good thing if we get you out of town for a while or something, dude," Dave adds. "On account of the whole stalker clown thing. Shit's whack. We'll leave for a while until the coast is clear, chill with our newest troll BFF, and get her to join our Smash party. Sure, our plans always go to shit, but will we ever know when to quit? Probs not."

What follows is the distinct silence of four people processing...and processing...and coming to the realization that -

"You just said we," Karkat says, aghast.

Dave's face doesn't move. He scratches under his collar idly, looking more at the ceiling than at anyone else in the room. "Yup."
Rose rests her chin on her hand and opens her mouth a few times before saying, mostly to herself, "It would be safer than if he went alone..."

Kanaya sets her needle to the side, hastily, before Karkat can jab himself on it. She throws a look of warning in John's direction, but yeah, he's kinda already picked up on the fact that Karkat's about to blow a gasket. He pushes himself up onto his feet and catches Karkat's other shoulder; Karkat's already vibrating like a motor. "You're not coming with me, shitstain," the troll says. His tone says 'still struggling to process the depths of your stupidity;' his twitching face says 'there will be blood.'

"Of course I'm going with you. Who else is going to keep you from getting your ass kicked?" Dave gropes around on the pile he and Rose are seated on blindly, and doesn't appear bothered when a bag of chips appears under his hands where there were no chips before. He accepts it and tears the bag open, crunching loudly on the first bite. "Alright, everyone. Prepare for the first hour. In three, two, o-"

No one seems entirely sure who's won the argument by the time Kanaya picks Dave up and physically removes him from Karkat's presence. John is inclined to think Dave might have won by virtue of time shenanigans, since he knew how the whole thing would play out from the beginning, but Karkat doesn't really admit defeat one way or another; John just keeps a hold of the troll all the way through, shooshing when he can. Dirk looks in at one point, apparently drawn by the noise, but manages to abscond and save himself from the pointlessness of it all. Even Rose has to shrug, because around the end of hour two Dave and Karkat seemed to end up agreeing to go to Washington DC together without either one saying so in as many words. They just. Keep arguing. It doesn't stop. Even when they're not actually arguing, just agreeing in a super passive-aggressive way on Dave's side and agreeing in an incredibly angry, in-denial way on Karkat's.

Basically, they're both just dipshits! John's starting to think that if Karkat and Dave weren't bickering all the time, they'd be perfectly fine friends, but neither is willing to stop acting like a total assmunch first. It wears him out, and once Kanaya puts her foot down John wants nothing more than to go back to bed and roll his eyes until he falls asleep. It takes Karkat giving him a weird look before he realizes it's time to eat lunch. Sleeping through lunch just because eating feels like it would take too much effort would be the opposite of a good thing, so he compromises by propping himself up at an awkward angle in bed so he won't fall asleep while Karkat runs to get food and bring it back.

Anyway. What with all the pointless dumb arguing this morning, there's someone John hasn't seen yet today. John listens as the door swings open and Karkat's shouts vanish down the hall - and then, just as the door begins a closing sweep, there is the slightest fraction of a pause as someone slips in at the last moment.

When he opens his eyes, ever so slowly, so cautiously, Jane is standing at the end of his bed.

They all moved to these rooms along the perimeter of the building a couple of days ago, away from the neurology ward and the main hall of offices that now hold so many bad memories. John keeps the blinds pulled up to let light in during the mornings, and especially likes to roll the window itself open - or have Karkat or Dave do it, since those are the two most likely to start crapping their pants at the idea of John standing for more than two seconds - so that the Breeze can frolic in and out, running pale blue tendrils of air through the fields of grass and wildflowers that stretch between this side of the building and the lake.

The Breeze doesn't seem to reflect John's depression much; it has a will of its own, and the fact that he ignored it for so long, throwing his power around willy-nilly for years because he couldn't bear the thought of the game, means it's just all the more boisterous now that it has the freedom to explore without worrying about John shutting it down and tossing it into the back of his mind again.

Anyway. John's seen Jane's room all of once since they all went through Massive Happy Fun Group Brain Surgery Day, as he likes to call it (MHFGBSD for...not so short). It's on the inner corridor, because of the four Scratch kids, Jane and Jake were the two most messed up by the mindgrubs, and deemed the most likely to be flight risks during the process of recovery and counseling. John's preetty sure Jane isn't supposed to actually leave her room without an escort, but on the other hand, it's not like she's hurting anybody, right? She doesn't really do anything; she just shows up to stare out John's window, her eyes flat and pale grey from this angle, pretty much whenever there's a (really, really rare) moment when he's alone.

John hears Jake screaming a lot from his room. That guy's strapped in with restraints still, because when they tried to let him out yesterday afternoon he nearly clawed Dirk's eyes out trying to escape. In comparison, since she woke up, Jane has just been...quiet. Reeeally quiet. Like she's thinking deep thoughts and doesn't have words for them yet. Roxy tries to cajole her into talking a lot when she and Jade aren't working on their thing - John can hear it even across the hall - and because Roxy is there Rose and Kanaya spend a lot of time there, too, with Jade bouncing back and forth between the rooms on foot in a way that clearly frustrates her since she can't teleport from one conversation to the next. Their group has settled into the kind of pack behavior John remembers fuzzily from their last trip to Lalonde Labs. Occasionally everyone drags their mattresses back into their respective rooms for the sake of propriety, but for the most part Jade, Dave, and Karkat end up without fail sprawled out in a semicircle on the floor of John's room. Kanaya and Rose sometimes join them, but also sometimes they need to get a room. Literally.

John doesn't actually know if Dirk and Roxy are staying in their own rooms or doing the same thing, guarding their friends through the night. But Jane doesn't seem to have trouble slipping away from them when she wants to. And if they're just hanging around, being quiet together, no one is hurt by that, right?

At least, that's how it worked yesterday.

"Do you know?"

John jolts; he can't help it. "What?" he blurts out, too loud. He hasn't heard Jane talk since - since they fought, in Seattle, and that was days ago, now. So much has happened since then that it's like hearing her for the first time. The first time he asked Jane why she was here, she slipped right back out the door without acknowledging his presence.

Jane's head slowly tilts to the side, exposing more of the side of her head that's been shaved in an undercut and which has now begun to grow out in short spikes, not yet long enough to form curls to match the other side. Her eyes never leave the window. It's partly open, and there's a slow breeze streaming in, languidly doing a circuit of the room to ruffle one of Rose's books on the bedside table and stir John's hair before flowing out again. Usually it's still too cool in the mountain air in the mornings to open it, but today has been really sunny and warm, so Jade (Jade is usually the easiest to persuade) had given in and opened it early when John begged her to, and rolled her eyes at Karkat when he tried to close it.

It's the Breeze, more than anything, that makes John more chill about these visits than he normally might have been. Sometimes the Breeze knows about danger before John does himself - it never stopped warning him about explosions, for example, no matter how hard he tried not to listen. But the most it's done around Jane lately is run through her hair whenever she walks in, and it does the same thing when anyone walks in. When it comes to Jake, on the other hand, the Breeze actively circulates through the Scratch kid's room in anticipation of the next time he breaks loose from his restraints.

When Jane reaches out and lays her hand on the windowsill, fingernails digging into the frame, John can't help but tense. The slow wind freezes with him, and almost instantly he feels that eddy in his mind that means the Breeze has spread its awareness out, filling the air with a sense of purpose.

But Jane doesn't try to vault out. She just stands there, watching the lake. "We're supposed to go back," she says. She sounds at a loss, slow and uncertain, like she's testing the words out and finding them unfamiliar. "That's - what we're supposed to do. Afterward. We go back. And report to our handler." A pause. "I...I thought so, anyway."

Almost immediately, John's head starts to ache. It tends to do that, lately, whenever something comes up that almost triggers the orders embedded in his mind by his handler and the mindgrub's chemical reinforcement. He's way better off than Jake, from what he's heard and seen, but it's only thanks to sheer dumb luck, and the fact that his handler is kept locked away in a ward John can't get near, that he hasn't lost control and tried to follow a planted command yet.

"Do you know?" Jane says again; this time, she sounds almost urgent, the most emotion John's heard from her yet. "I - sometimes I think I know, but sometimes I think - other things." Her head turns in a jerk toward him, but her eyes won't meet his, focusing instead on the blankets at the foot of the bed. "You. Do you know what is real?"

...Wow, that's not a loaded question at all! John's busy absorbing the fact that Jane's talking, and it's not until he notices her fingers trembling and twitching on the windowsill that he thinks he might want to, you know, answer. Fast. "Some of the time," he says, totally honest. "I have a lot of help, though."

Jane's hand spasms; she draws it back from the window in the next second, tucking it behind her back, and her eyes flicker across the bed, the bedside table, the wall, before falling on the sheets next to John's feet again. "Are we - supposed to -" She breaks off and shakes her head, as a look that might almost be agitation knots her brows together. "Are we...desynchronizing?" she says, an unrecognizable emotion tight in her voice. She lays heavy weight on the last word that could make it expletive or plea or prayer.

Slow but sure, John nods. "That's the idea, yeah." Maybe it would be smarter to lie, but he doesn't have that in him, right now. And the Breeze is all around the room now, ready to sweep Jane up and off the ground and carry her back to her room in case she tries to go full Berzerker mode on him.

But she won't lose it, he thinks. Probably.

Without warning, without a sound, Jane's eyes flicker up to meet his, searching, and John almost panics. He'd forgotten how blue Jane's eyes were because he never got a good look at them during their faceoff, and ever since one or both of them have been sedated out the wazoo and/or asleep. They're a pale, icy blue, piercing and intent in spite of the confused furrow of her brows, but what truly throws John for a loop is the fact that he recognizes them.

It's one thing to have Rue Lalonde inform everyone that yes, the Scratch kids appear to be clones of their original guardians, only a year or so younger than the heroes themselves. It's quite another to see his dead Nanna's eyes looking out at him from a living person, not an old photograph.

And of course, it's a whooole other can of worms because they're the same color as his handler's eyes, too.

Jane is Jane, John reminds himself, his pulse rising as he gulps and tries not to let the panic set his mind swimming. The Breeze wraps around him, repeating the same assurances, but Jane keeps staring and John still can't look away, his shoulders straightening into something like attention.

"There are so many things that I should do," she says, searching his eyes. "I can feel them, still, here." She touches the side of her skull, so quickly that John almost misses her fingers tapping the square bandage where they shaved more of her hair off to clear the way to skin and bone. "But...I don't...have to do them?"

"Not if you don't want to," he says, unable to break their staring contest. "Not anymore."

A slow, hissing breath through her nose - a twitch of her fingers by her side - another beat - and then Jane's mouth works for a moment, the words slow when they do come. "That's against orders."

Oh man. This has the potential to go so bad, so fast. "Yup!" John agrees, bracing himself inwardly.

"..." Jane looks away. "Huh." Or maybe it's just a huffing grunt of acknowledgment, and not meant to be words at all. Then she turns back to the window, and John sags back against the heap of pillows and tries not to get dizzy. He mostly succeeds.

Jane stays, quiet again, right up until the faint roar of noise of the lunch crowd returning echoes in the halls. Then, without a word by way of explanation or farewell, she spins on her heel and slips out the door, her eyes avoiding his as he watches her leave. "Good...bye?" he calls, but the door shuts before he can hear if she answers.

John wonders if he should maybe, you know. Tell someone about this. Jake's still obviously trying to follow through on the last orders the mindgrub whammied him with. But probably no one knows if Jane's plotting to escape or slowly making the effort to untangle herself from the Crew's orders - except her.

But that afternoon, he hears Roxy chattering away as usual across the hall. They have the rooms to all the doors open so people can pass in and out at will and conversation floats through the hall at random. Still, it's only thanks to John's hearing, enhanced by the wind as it tugs scraps of conversation to him, that he hears the quiet, monotone grunt of Jane replying to something Roxy's said.

Karkat flinches and stares at the open door with open-mouthed shock at the shrill squeal that rises up, full of Roxy's startled joy. "What the fuck?" the troll says, emphatic, as he stands up, probably meaning to go charging across to provide backup in the event that someone's getting attacked or something.

"She and Jade probably just had some epiphany about that computer thing," John says, smiling, and he doesn't stop until Karkat threatens to go out to the lake to grab a bucket of water to dump on his 'dumbass head.'

In the end, John thinks it almost makes sense that he hears the news about his handler and the ward generator and Seattle from Doctor Lalonde. Everyone else has been careful not to spill any beans around him that they think might drive him over the edge; they're omitting stuff and talking around things, not just in person but also on the memo forums that have started back up with a vengeance.

But they can't sit on this forever. He's figuring out how to push through and keep living, even without the [Eye of the Storm] providing a buffer between his emotions and his Trickster and...him. Doctor Lalonde's been around constantly, now that John's lucid enough to notice and remember, and he's taken this long to realize that she's keeping an eye on all of them. Not just Rose and Roxy and Dave and Dirk. John can't imagine she has a lot of time for her own science-y stuff with all the watching she's been doing, but inwardly he nods because it's obvious she's filling in where Samuel ought to be. Or the pseudo-parental role he always played up in public, at least. She's got ten kids, WV, and a whole lab of staff to wrangle in the meantime, but she's made the kids her priority.

Eventually, he needs to start dealing with their current problems again. Stuff like the Midnight Crew, and the Felt, and Karkat's stalker, and all the new game stuff that keeps cropping up as both Kanaya and Karkat prepare for their trips to go investigate leads. Stuff like the fact that Samuel is a bad guy, and Seattle has become a no-zone for any and all hero activity until the FVRT feels they have the situation under control.

Yeeeah, if it wasn't Doctor Lalonde, John suspects that no one would have mentioned any of this to him. Ever. The end of the world could have come and gone again, and they would still have laughed in a really high-pitched, awkward way and tried to distract him from the fact that the last good thing about being Heir - the one thing the Trickster couldn't taint just by wearing his uniform in his mind, the ability to go out and use his game powers to help people rather than let them die all over again - got stripped away for the foreseeable future.

Doctor Lalonde doesn't seem to know what part of this barrage of bad news John will take worse; she's sitting down in a chair beside him, looking more put together than John remembers her being since New York, but he recognizes the way her fingers occasionally pinch together where they hang over the edge of her lap, the way they always would when she was about to saunter off to mix herself an appletini. Her weakness, John recalls his handler lecturing him, was always her bond with Joanna Egbert; his Nanna's death broke Doctor Lalonde, and turned her from someone who drank copiously but controllably into a complete drunkard, on a downward spiral that only worsened the more she flitted around the country with Rose looking for support. She tried Ambrose Strider, but when the Crew tracked them down Bro's paranoia ratcheted up to the point that he suspected even Doctor Lalonde of possibly leaking their location. Then she tried Samuel and John -

And, well. John could have warned her from the start that his handler would do nothing but undermine her further. But by then, he'd already learned it was easier to smile and forget and pretend everything was fine. John always knew his handler was bad news. If the fact that Samuel took a contract with the Midnight Crew willingly hurts him, he honestly can't tell that pain apart from what's already there. Heck, with his memories this scrambled, odds probably are that he knew already. So that's fine.

(It's really not.)

The Federal Villain Response Team's representative thinks shutting down hero work will help the police deal with the recent influx of the Midnight Crew's operations? Well, fine. The police won't be able to do much by themselves, but heck, he already had Diamonds Droog's knowledge of his identity looming over his head, a sure threat to keep him from interfering in Crew criminal activity. He couldn't help fight the Crew; from the moment his handler switched them from sleeper to passive status, the two of them probably would have been looking for ways to help rather than hinder operations.

(Thinking about all this isn't helping. He's this close to flipping off the handle.)

"What does it mean, that the generator's gone?" he asks, to buy time. He can almost see the gears switch in Doctor Lalonde's head, because this is a subject she's an expert in, and she'd probably rather talk about that than watch John slowly cave in on himself. While she considers how to answer, John reels the Breeze back in through the window with a half-gentle, half-desperate mental tug, that just ends up being really panicky. The Breeze ravels and unravels, filtering through the room and bolstering John as much as it can. "I don't remember me or my handler moving it; it was useful for anonymity and stuff," he says, pressing a hand to his chest and breathing in fresh air the Breeze carries back in with it.

He thinks he should have not said that last part; Doctor Lalonde looks stricken for a moment. But John's awake, and he's trying, and trying means that he has to force out all the words he'd usually gulp down. "Well, Samuel was my first suspect, so that's unfortunate. At least then we would have known who had it last," Doctor Lalonde says, when she's regained control of her expression. "I left the generator behind at the house so that you both would remain cloaked from wandering eyes, but judging by the rate of decay, it's been non-functioning or absent long enough that the void around your neighborhood has started to dissipate. It tends to do that, when there isn't a machine drawing its attention. The only interference left is minimal. You all could have been exposed to outside surveillance and magical forces if you'd remained at either our old home or your own for much longer."

"Well, that sucks..."

"It also means that someone out there has a piece of technology that I've done my utmost to keep private," Rue says, sighing. "I published some of my earlier findings when I was younger, but when I realized what vulnerable targets we all were to surveillance, I stopped and developed the shield generators without making any more of my research public. Not many have chosen to make void their field of study - like paradox universe theory, it's considered more than a little esoteric. If anyone else has learned to manipulate it to the same degree my machines can, they haven't come forward, either." The doctor nibbles her lip, leaving marks in the otherwise smooth film of lipstick. "Now my design is out there for anyone to recreate. It compromises the security of this lab, and the one in Maine, as well as my other bolt holes and Ambrose's apartment. I wish I'd realized sooner."

John can only imagine. He's lived in his own personal hell long enough that he can't call to mind how it feels to think you're safe, and then to have that safety ripped away from you in the most unexpected way possible. Dave was almost kidnapped, Jade was kidnapped, and Rose got left on her own for so long because Doctor Lalonde supposedly wanted to distract other kidnapping attempts...

Well. John's never had to worry about a thing like that happening to him. Heheheh. Ha. Agh. "Doctor Lalonde?" He waits until the woman looks up and meets his eyes. "I've been wondering - what happened? That made you and Bro avoid each other for so long?"

Rue snorts and casts an eye at the closed door of the room. "To be honest, I don't know that I could tell the whole tale before the rest of them lose patience. But you may already know more than I assume - if Samuel told you more about Droog than either of you let slip?"

Oh, that makes his head twinge. John rubs his arms where they're prickling with goosebumps, shaking his head. "He got a basic dossier on her from one of his contacts, but...I don't know. Maybe it was classified because she's one of the bosses, but even he couldn't get much that wasn't pretty heavily censored! All the rest that he lectured me about was just rumors and intelligence he picked up over the years." He has to take a few steadying breaths when his throat threatens to lock up, before he can finish. "My handler, he - I know there are still things he never told me. Even after you and Rose left, and he got that thing put inside my head, I think he never really trusted me with anything that wasn't need-to-know. Why?"

"Because Droog was what happened," Rue says. She folds her hands together, fingers laced tight, and taps the pad of one thumb against the lacquered nail of the other. "I'd taken Rose out of town with me that week for work - perhaps if the timing hadn't been so perfectly coincidental, leaving him and Dave alone in the house at the worst possible moment, Ambrose would not have grown so paranoid that I may have betrayed them." Her smile turns crooked. "He's actually not nearly as bad these days as he was in the immediate aftermath - time mellowed him, I suppose. He took a ward generator when I finalized the design, but he never wanted me in the same state as Dave again."

A shake of her head. "I didn't get the whole story out of him, though. From what I've interpreted, the Midnight Crew began to operate in Atlanta, riling the local gangs and getting into sporadic turf battles...and within two days of their arrival in the city, Droog was at our door. Ambrose didn't even know they were targeting Dave before then. He had no way to know to run." Doctor Lalonde's talking mostly to the glass of water sitting on the bedside table, now, her eyes distant. "I returned to find the house in ruins. What hadn't collapsed already had been torched. By the time I tracked down Ambrose's hiding place, he was bleeding profusely and couldn't" - she huffs - "or wouldn't give me a straight answer as to how he escaped."

John's trying to picture it, but he can't. Dave's bro is one of the most bizarrely hardcore people he knows; the guy took on Jack Noir and held his own for ages before John messed things up for him. Diamonds Droog is intimidating, sure! And she hurt Karkat pretty bad, and she must have known John's identity because it was time for their sleeper cell to activate, which means she could know all kinds of things John really wouldn't want a mob boss to know about him. John can't shake the impression that if anyone could have fought her on an even footing, it would have been Bro... The fact that he couldn't, and Droog ran him and Dave out of town as a result, isn't a happy thought to have. "He lost that bad?" he says, making a face.

"Heh. You know Ambrose as he is now. He's had years to train until he mastered his fighting style; back then, he was not nearly so swift. He only ever utilized puppets in some odd parenting techniques I believe he picked up from watching the Muppets with Dave." Rue has her eyes closed, like she can still picture it. "Unfortunately, at the time, Droog outclassed him - thoroughly. There was...so much blood. She nearly gutted him, you know, and then used his own sword to cut him open, from here to there." Rue gestures against her own torso, touching splayed fingers from shoulder to hip in a neat diagonal line. John thinks Bro might have mentioned that, a loooong time ago; the injury sounds familiar when Rue puts it like that. "I was so distracted, trying to convince him to go to a hospital, that I didn't even notice Dave -"

The panic is instantaneous. The Breeze rushes out around the sides and cracks of the closed door before John's finished sitting straighter, rushing through the halls until it finds Dave. It doesn't matter that Dave was literally just here ten minutes ago, or that he and Doctor Lalonde are talking about something that happened years and years ago; the anxiety is too strong and his self-control is in shambles these days. "Dave? What happened to Dave?!"

Rue looks at him - seems to register that John's quietly about to lose his shit - and schools her face until it's controlled. "Nothing," she says, emphatic. "There wasn't a mark on him. He simply...never spoke again."

The Breeze finds Dave with Jade and Roxy and the White Queen; John relaxes. "He could talk?" he says, distracted as the Breeze's awareness checks and double checks and triple checks that everyone is breathing and then loses patience with John for making it do 'pointless repetitive stuff.' "I thought - " What did he think? If he ever wondered why Dave could talk before the scratch, and not in this reset life, John's didn't come up with a good explanation on his own.

"Ambrose always maintained that the fact that Dave spoke first proved he knew what he was doing about parenting. Considering how terrified he was about being a guardian going into it, I wasn't inclined to really argue with him about anything that gave him some measure of confidence." Rue unfolds her hands and legs, and stands. "As it is, he only ever told me about Dave's sudden muteness as a way of lashing out when I pressed him about coming to Houston to pay a visit. Whatever went on while Ambrose was fighting Droog, until Ambrose finished piecing together that collar design - Dave never spoke again."

- He can't pretend everything will be okay if he just forgets it and places it to the side, to never be thought about again. He tried that, and look what it got him: a head full of trauma he's never dealt with and a Breeze that barely trusts him and a handler that no one will let him see and a Trickster mode that has dealt with it all, in the absolute worst possible way.

So! He and Karkat need to talk.

They still haven't spoken about whatever it is the Trickster did to him. Well, they have - everyone kind of shared what went on while they were scattered to the four corners of John's mind, so John has the general gist of how totally messed up he is (read: very) - but Karkat skimmed over parts of his story, growling something about hide and seek and a fake copy of their school and never saying a word more while Dave and Rose and Jade or any of the others are in the room.

Something happened. John's pretty sure the Trickster is a filthy goddamn liar, but it might not have lied if the truth was already bad enough. Making out with Karkat would be bad enough. Particularly if Karkat didn't want to make out at the time. That thing's a laughing nightmare whose idea of a good time would be playing jump-rope with John's intestines; the list of things it might have done to mess with Karkat covers a lot of ground!

Of course, he and Karkat talking kinda requires that both of them...well, talk! But the moment John tries to open up the conversation, stilted because he kind of sucks at this, Karkat spooks. It took real effort to convince everybody else to clear out of the room again for a while - John gets that they're all still paranoid, but sheesh! - so that there wouldn't be eyes on them for this, because Karkat's at his most honest when they're in private and he doesn't have to shout all the time to fool passersby into thinking he's a grump 24/7. But Karkat's not even trying to hide the fact that he's avoiding the subject. "I already told you people what happened," he insists, batting John's hand away with an irritable scowl that would be a lot more convincing if he could meet John's eyes instead of furtively looking anywhere but. When Karkat can't even glare right, there's shenanigans afoot.

"Since when am I 'you people?'" John points out. He catches Karkat's hand and tugs until Karkat sits down on the bed next to him, a prickly, hunched up ball that keeps avoiding John's eyes by fiddling with a new hole in the sleeve of his hoodie. "Which means everybody, which means Jade and Dave, which means you totally didn't talk about a bunch of important stuff because you don't like them. And I've been sleeping all the time. Telling a sleeping me doesn't count, dude." He doesn't think he could have dragged himself out of that mood where sleeping was easier than breathing any faster than he did, but he regrets that it meant Karkat had time to batten down the hatches in preparation to deny, deny, deny.

"I'm fine. Trust me, dumbass, everything I know about these new dreams, you know."

"That's not what I'm talking about, Karkat." When Karkat's claws clamp down on John's hand hard enough to bruise, he knows that Karkat knows what he is talking about, and doesn't like it. Well, too bad. Whenever one of them gets upset and doesn't say something, bad stuff tends to happen? And then escalate unreasonably to unprecedented levels of total bullcrap that could probably have been avoided if they'd just talked about it in the first place? Yeah... John has to fight the urge to bite through his own tongue before he makes himself croak, "What happened with that - other me?"
Karkat bristles. "Who?" he says, sarcasm slathered on his words like honey. "The candycoated shithive full of maggots that tried to take over your dumb pan? Barely remember it." The troll's elbow somehow migrates its way into John's side, a needling hint that Karkat wants the conversation to switch gears right now.

But. See, John thinks he might have an idea of what the Trickster could have done to make Karkat act like this. And the idea is not a good one. It is, in fact, the kind of idea that makes him want to vomit and curl up in a little ball and not move again. He has a lot of those! But this one is worse than most. Maybe because John doesn't have anything to go on but Karkat's unwillingness to talk and the Trickster's all-too-willingness to plant even worse ideas in his head.

John put a lot of stuff in the back of his head to rot. Including all those times when he hasn't been sure whether he wants to shoosh Karkat or kiss him in a really not-pale way. Everything like that, those fleeting moments John fretted about and shoved back there to be ignored, got snatched up and twisted whenever the Trickster got its hands on them. Pain over Rose leaving turned into hate that John knows he's never felt, because he's never blamed Rose for not getting back in contact with him - he's always blamed himself. The inexplicable trust and fondness for Jade and Dave that John has always fought so hard on his handler's orders turned into some weird combination of cruel dismissal that either of them had any merit, except, possibly, as ways to torment John more. If the Trickster were just John's bad thoughts, surely the only person it hates would be John himself. But that's not the case.

So what would it have done with the urge to kiss Karkat because he has a nice butt, while high on power and candy and with a vicious streak a mile wide?

"Karkat, what did it do?" John lets his eyes close as he hits a moment of vertigo; his hand moves to touch Karkat's arm, in a weak attempt to steady himself. "What happened?"

"Nothing happened," Karkat says forcefully. His expression is absolutely miserable; he yanks his arm out of John's loose grip. "It tried to convince me it was you, and that we were at school. The rainbow colored walls and the yellow brick road should have been a massive fucking hint that I wasn't in Kansas anymore, but no sirree, I, being the fucking paragon of intelligence that I am, was completely fooled. It was great."

They're going to be here all night at this rate. Karkat's too darn stubborn, and John flounders for a long moment, trying to string words together in his head that both make sense and will be convincing enough that Karkat'll just answer the question.

Uh. Well. Maybe it would help to actually ask the question. Not the generic ones like 'what happened,' but the one that's actually eating away at John like poison, and has been ever since the Trickster first poured it into his ears. "Did he try to kiss you?"

Karkat stills. John's stomach does a good impression of recreating what it felt like to fall. Oh no oh no oh no -

"Yeah. Yeah, it did," Karkat says, folding his arms over his chest. His voice is flat and neutral and too quiet, which is the opposite of what Karkat should sound like. "The fuckhead wouldn't know pale if it bit him in the ass, either, so that was fun."

John's fingers dig into the bedsheets and the wind starts to tie itself into knots around him, tangled and snarled. If the Breeze complains, John's too distracted to listen. "Shit. I didn't...are you okay?"

"Shut up, John, I'm fine." Karkat forces a laugh. "This all happened in your thinkpan, remember, not real life. Blah blah fucking blah, Trickster was a raving sack of living excrement, the candy thing was creepy as fuck, and the sucker shot itself in the foot if it thought it could fool me into thinking it was you after that." He won't meet John's eyes, still - he stays perched on the edge of the bed, his eyes flitting from his own feet to John's hands and back again. "You're absolutely forbidden from blaming yourself for something the batshit insane brain parasite did, got that? I know you, John. If you were vacillating as hard as that, it would be really fucking noticeable."

John's heart seems to have transplanted itself without his permission so that it pounds right in his ears, leaving his chest hollow and his stomach twisted. "That's...not...entirely accurate," he says.

"...oh." Karkat looks at him. Looks blank, uncomprehending - and then John is the one who can't look anymore. He can't bear to watch Karkat's expression change. "Fuck."

"I didn't - I don't -" He has to stop and gulp, twice. His throat just doesn't seem to want to cooperate. But no. He's not going to be a big weenie and ignore this anymore. He's said too much to swallow it down now; Karkat's not stupid, he'll connect the dots on his own, and John chickening out now will only make it worse. "I dumped a lot of bad things back there. And I don't know why it all turned into the Trickster, or how, but...it wasn't just things about my handler, or about the game. It was also stuff about you." He feels kind of light headed. And sick. Pretty nauseous, yeah. He's been not-talking about this around Karkat for so long that breathing feels like choking. This conversation was never supposed to have to happen.

"What. About. Me." Karkat's voice is like stone, and John's too cowardly to look up.

He has a choice between passing out and saying it. This is a thousand times worse than he imagined. Just say it, say it, say it. "Sometimes I really want to kiss you. A lot. AndalsoIthinkyouhaveareallynicebutt." Ack! Too fast, that was actually literally incoherent. But like heck can he repeat himself. Oh goddd...

Karkat says nothing for long enough that John begins debating inwardly whether it would be a good investment to just, you know, pass out now that he's said it! Passing out beforehand would have been a problem, but hey! He's said what he should have said months and months ago, and if he just so happens to be unconscious while Karkat's deciding he never wants anything to do with John ever again, he's already done his part.

The effort is more obvious in Karkat's voice this time, and John wilts further. "So you're flushed for me, is what you're saying? Is that what you're saying?"

"No-ot really?" John's voice cracks and his throat is dry and he can't breathe and when the Breeze tries to fix that John shoves it away mentally, on reflex, because there's nothing but panic left fueling him. Today's been too long and he's made a mistake. He's made an awful mistake. He should have never talked about this, never, never, never.

That kinda sorta ends in a shout, and Karkat clearly isn't expecting it, jumping in surprise. "Wha-where the fuck are you getting that from?!" the troll demands, sounding both exasperated and baffled. John can only cringe. "I don't hate you, I'm fucking floored because apparently on top of missing that you've been abused by your shitty fucking custodian for years, I managed to overlook the fact that you've been going red without telling me! How long have we not been on the same page, because it feels like I've been the fucking moron reading the wrong book altogether."

"No - no, we're - I like this! I like you!" John's crying and there's three feet of space between him and Karkat that might as well be a mile, because Karkat's not making a move to close it and John couldn't blame him if he never did again. "I like being near you and listening to you shout at bad rom-coms and reading comics with you and spending time together after school and seeing you after swim practice and eating outside under our tree and talking about dumb stuff on a pile instead of doing homework and I just want to stay with you. J-just -" His hands are shaking too much as he raises them to wipe at his face, so he ends up using the heel of his palm, mashing it against his eyes and sobbing with his mouth open. "I just don't want to mess this up and wreck everything - but I already did, didn't I? God..."

Something touches his face. John keeps his hands on his eyes. They're not doing anything to really stop him crying, but he can't look, he can't. "...Jonathan Egbert. Do you want to be moirails or not?" There's nothing in Karkat's voice, there's nothing at all, John can't breathe and he hates that he keeps crying all the time because he can't handle his own problems alone anymore.

"YES!" he yells in a burst, shuddering. "Yes - because - you - I'm never more happy than when I'm with you! I just...I don't know why I couldn't just stop thinking about stupid things you wouldn't want!" Why couldn't I just forget it a-no, no, stop that! John curls up with his knees to his chest. Gosh, and he went into this trying to coax Karkat into talking...Why couldn't he just leave it alone? "But it doesn't matter," he says, sniffing with an accompanying horrible noise. "I promise! I just want to stay with you!"

Karkat pulls on John's elbows. He probably trying to pull his hands away from his face or something. Nuh-uh, not happening. John can only think of bad things that might happen if he moves his hands right now. "Unbelievable," Karkat mutters. His voice isn't flat and unreadable anymore, but John can't tell what the growl in his tone means without looking and like heck is he doing that! "John. Look at me, dumbass." John doesn't realize he's shaking until Karkat presses the palms of his hands against John's amazing arm shield. "Hey. Hey. Shhh. I don't hate you, stupid. You're the last person in the world I could ever hate. You're officially at the bottom of the list."

"I ruin everything." Karkat's just a blob through the streaming tears. "I love you and I still couldn't not ruin it."

"You didn't ruin anything. You're flipping the fuck out and having a panic attack over it, fuck. Just. Breathe." Karkat curls around him, John's head tucked under his chin. "There. Are you breathing?"

John obeys, gulping down air. It doesn't feel as though it reaches his lungs, so he stays gasping and out of breath, arms jittering while Karkat keeps rubbing them with his hands, making hushing sounds. The murmurs of the Breeze are slow to filter back into John's hearing, full of susurrating complaints about being shoved out (again) and faint, humming worry. He can almost picture it in his mind's eye, a stumpy little version of him kicking its feet with a pout.

Clarity creeps back in a couple of minutes later, as the oxygen starts to kick in and clear the panic from his brain. Karkat registers the shift with a look of relief, just as John switches over from blind panic to thinking panic. God, he can't go a full day without crying and losing his shit to the point that Karkat has to intervene, can he. So stupid. He went into this because Karkat was the one who got hurt, not the other way around - and it was his fault in the first place, so what right does he have to lose his resolve like that? This is just pathetic. He needs to get over it and stop wallowing; if he could just m-

BE: i said, no! cut that out! :T

"Thank fuck." Karkat pulls on John's wrists again, and this time John lets them fall away. Karkat's expression is a mess of irritation and fondness that it takes John too long to recognize - he's convinced himself it wouldn't be there at all. "Okay, just sit there and breathe for a second, got it? Good."
Karkat stops rubbing John's arms, which sucks, because it was helping him time his breathing. The troll seizes the pillows that have accumulated at the head of the bed over the past few days and starts mashing them up against the wall. John gets the idea, but when he goes to help Karkat casts him a withering stare and doesn't let John touch anything until the pillows have been rearranged in a mangled heap. Then he leans precariously over the side of the bed and starts yoinking the pillows from Jade's and Dave's camp-out spots, too. John's mind wants to think that's a bad sign, that Karkat doesn't want him helping; but Karkat's always been the dude in charge of making the pile, on account of the strategic arrangement of random textbooks and other assorted pointy-edged objects that end up tossed in a pile for substance needs a troll to manage. Even then, John usually ends up taking a DVD case to the kidney, on good days. But this time Karkat doesn't add anything other than pillows before he starts tearing the whole thing apart again, hollowing out a space so that he ends up with a pillow cave.

Sometimes Karkat's just...really weird. John lets himself get hauled into the pile, watching Karkat with sore, achy eyes while the troll grumbles to himself. He's cried out but no less panicked because of it, and now he's got this ominous feeling in his stomach that won't leave him alone, tying everything into further knots. Heck, he's still struggling to process the fact that Karkat hasn't stomped out the door yet. Honestly, it's what Karkat should do, before John messes up worse. Maybe he should try the apology thing again? Only it doesn't come out right. "I love you. I love you. I didn't mean to..."

"Don't be stupid. You're not ruining it just because you've got some vacillating human hormones." John's face burns, so he buries it against one of the pillows because the fabric's cool. Karkat's a warm weight, right there in arm's reach, and John can't figure out why he'd put himself at risk like that. It's kind of been established that John's not exactly the most trustworthy person in the universe. He keeps his arms frozen and folded around himself so he won't give in to temptation. This is significantly harder to achieve when Karkat keeps wriggling closer.

"Shhhhh. Shoosh. You're fine." Karkat brushes a hand lightly against John's cheek; the repetitive motion starts to get to him, and John can't quite catch himself before he angles his face so Karkat can reach better. His stomach stops heaving like it wants to hurl itself out through his mouth. John relaxes by inches. Karkat's breath whistles out through his nose, a faint huff. "Alright. I can pretty much guaran fucking tee that as long as this is still working?" Karkat removes his hand for a second and John lifts his head to follow it. "We're still pale here. So let's just talk some points out so you can't let this shit fester. Which you clearly fucking would. And have."

Oh. Uh. "Probably, yeah...okay," John agrees, blinking and trying to ignore the wistful ache that starts eating at him.

It goes away when Karkat mashes his palm against John's face in the roughest pap ever. "First fucking thing...what the fuck was that about my butt?!"

Okay. John can actually defend his poor life choices about this part. In fact, he's almost required to. By like. Law. "It's a really nice butt! I don't know! It kind of started just as a general thing, but then it kinda turned into more of a thing when Hemogoblin showed up? And then you were Hemogoblin, so I couldn't even say I was thinking about someone else's Butt finally instead of yours. It was all one butt. Singular." He's still not over that.

Whatever hesitation or understandable wariness might have gotten to Karkat has clearly gone out the window; he rolls his eyes at John and clamps his hands on John's cheeks, squeezing until John makes a helpless fish face. "Oh my fucking god John. Of all the things to fixate on. IT'S A BUTT."

"Okay, yeah, I know where you're coming from, but..." John has to find a way to put this into words. There has to be a way to make Karkat understand why this has been stuck in John's head for literally almost years. "...Dat ass."

Karkat cuffs him upside the back of the head. Yeah, he deserves that one. "Unbelievable. Really?!"

"...I don't know?" John protests, shrugging. "I just tried not to stare a lot because it's creepy."

Karkat is dead silent for a long moment.

And then he busts out laughing.

"Nooooo, don't laugh!" John is horrified, sitting up a little as Karkat wraps an arm around his gut and pitches forward into the pile, laughing like this situation is somehow funny. It takes a lot to get Karkat to laugh. Why is this happening now. How did John ruining things somehow become a laughing matter. "I think you have a nice looking butt! This is a problem! Why are you laughing?!"

"Only you would have this kind of problem, dumbass," Karkat says, his voice muffled because he won't stop cackling into that pillow. "Oh my fucking christ." He lifts his head, his usual scowl struggling to reassert itself while he's still pissing himself laughing over there. "And that's it?"

John has to think about that one. Kissing, butt touching...what else could the Trickster have latched onto and inflicted on Karkat? Oh crap, he can't think. "What else would there be?" he says, worried.

Native exasperation takes its rightful place in Karkat's expression. "You want to kiss me and admire my apparently aesthetically appealing ass? That's the gist of this fucking meltdown? We've covered all the fidusfucking bases, here?"

John's drawing a blank here. "Yeah, I think so?" he says, hazarding a guess. At least he's not panicking anymore. He's too lost to panic. "I'm...sorry?"

Karkat throws his claws up, knocking a pillow off the top of their pillow cave. "You want to stay moiralles? That's what you want?"

John nods so hard he nearly knocks his own glasses off.

"Alright, fuck, then." Karkat breathes in and out, apparently thinking about something. John's heart is doing something really painful and jarring in his chest, a tango of relief and disbelief. "But there's something we need to test firs- no, do not lose your shit again, John," Karkat says; John guesses the color his face turns isn't exactly the healthiest. He knows that his heart probably shouldn't be laboring that badly. "No, fucking listen to me. That Trickster shithead took what you feel and fucked it over, right? We're just going to set this straight so you'll stop dithering yourself into thinking it's somehow an issue." And with that Karkat rolls over and pokes John with a jabby finger. "So kiss me."

John tries to shove himself out of the pile so fast that a pillow flies off the pile and ricochets over the bedside table. "What?!"

Karkat scowls at him and yanks him back down by his shirt, eying the slowly-collapsing pile with disdain. "I told you, I'm fine with kissing, dumbass," he says. "That's as much a thing for moirallegiance as it is for any other kind of romance, you shining example of trunkbeast-like memory retention. Or did that just fly out of your dumb pan the moment you realized you needed something new to add to your collection of things to torture yourself with?" When John can't even start to answer that (because it's all such a tangled, thorny mess, all of it was awful when it was just him alone with his thoughts screaming in the dark, so why does it sound so stupidly okay coming out of Karkat's mouth?), Karkat pulls him in closer. "I know what I'm about, John. Kiss. Now, before those other fucking geniuses show up."
John can't move. He can't. Which, of course, means that Karkat and the Breeze end up losing their patience at the same time and make up his mind for him, Karkat knotting a fist in John's shirt to tug down and the Breeze whumping him right in the back of the head so he loses his balance. His heart is still jarring with sick bursts of panic and his pulse is thready and when Karkat kisses him the main thing on John's mind is oh god do not pass out. His arms start to ache almost right away with the effort to keep holding himself up so he doesn't squash Karkat. There's an echo of memory in his head that belongs to him and yet doesn't, at the same time, something that's not him but almost-him, laughing sweet like cotton candy and shoving the memory of grinding down and licking blood out of Karkat's mouth into the front of his mind -

"Shhh," Karkat says, lips moving just over John's. John whimpers, his head screaming, and Karkat threads his claws into John's hair, combing through and lightly scratching at the base of his skull, so light it feels like a brushing tickle. "Shush. Stay with me." Karkat presses, insistent, until John tilts his head down again; then he goes back to smoothing a thumb over the side of John's neck where his pulse is throbbing erratically. One of John's arms kind of gives up and he crumples. He keeps waiting, braced for the moment where Karkat will push him away and want this all to stop.

But it doesn't come. The troll just keeps making soft noises and coaxing him back down when he tenses. John teeters internally for a long moment - Karkat rubs the knotted crook of one shoulder, though, and that decides things. It's very difficult to stay tensed up and anxious when one's moirail is right there, and part of the knotted mass in his stomach melts when John just lets himself ease down so he's lying on his side and his arm doesn't have to strain anymore. Karkat moves with him, arms wound around his neck and lips parted just so under John's, making a sound like a purr, and yeah, John's gone. The last of the tension unwinds from his shoulders. Karkat is very warm. John curls in closer and at some point his lips kind of miss Karkat's and he ends up nuzzling the side of his face instead. But that's okay. It's warm and soft and quiet, and Karkat is solid in his arms and not hating him for it.

Cuddling is good. Cuddling is the best. John squeezes Karkat in a hug, carefully, and Karkat presses a kiss to the hollow of his throat, making a soft trilling sound that comes out muted and fluttering. John closes his eyes and drifts for a while, until Karkat says something that might be words. He shakes himself out of the doze before it can set in. "Wha?"

Karkat taps him on the cheek with a claw, making a 'hmmm' noise like he's had something confirmed. "That's what you wanted?" When John nods, wordlessly, Karkat sighs gustily. "You do realize that's about as pale a makeout ever conceived of by troll kind, right?"

Words are wayyyy beyond him right now. How is Karkat talking? "Muh?"

"I said, you've been freaking yourself the fuck out and feeding your inner crazy incarnate over wanting more pale makeouts. Congratulations. This is about as pale as pale gets." Karkat noses John's neck, and his insides go gooey some more.

"Oh. "Oh," he says aloud, helpfully, so that Karkat's up to date on his latest thoughts.

"Oh is right. This is fucking disgraceful. Have you paid no attention to any of my movie marathons? Clearly I need to make you read more because if that's what you've been panicking yourself into thinking is flushed, you've got some basic misconceptions that need to be addressed." Yeah, now Karkat's just getting huffy. John's too blissed out to do more than pat him on the head by way of apology. "The butt thing's still weird, okay. That's just really fucking weird. But if all you want to do is touch it we can talk about that later."

There's a twinge of anxiety at that, but nothing John can't ignore. Besides, the phrase 'we need to talk about your butt' is unequivocally hilarious and not to be trifled with. "Kay," John agrees. He'll hold that one in reserve. "Heheh." Whoops. Don't laugh about it yet.

Karkat drags his knuckles up and down John's back once, sweeping as though to check for any more points of tension. "Are you calm now?" he asks, with a note of suspicion in his face until John nods. "Good. Fucking fantastic, you huge dope. Just - general rule of thumb, John?" John nods to show he's listening, even though his eyes are starting to sink closed. Karkat thumps him lightly. "If the makeouts are soothing to the point that you nearly bliss out into a fucking cuddleblob after five minutes? You're probably not thinking concupiscent."

"But you're okay?" John asks. That's still the point of this whole mess of conversation, and it's important that even though he's completely lost control of said conversation, he actually get this from Karkat. In words. "The Trickster me did hurt you. I know he did."

Karkat pauses, and then nods. "Yeah. Better now." He wrinkles up his nose. This is adorable. "Fuck. The Trickster thing...yeah, that fucked me up a little. But like I said, it's pretty obviously not you. Not anymore, if it ever was." The troll sighs. "We did need to have a feelings jam like this. I applaud your remarkable foresight in making this conversation happen. Now listen to your fucking moirail and don't ever sit on a bombshell like that again."

"I'll try not to. Sometimes it just happens, though," John says, making a face when Karkat starts shifting. "Noooo..."

"Up," Karkat says, stroking John's face and then sitting up, dragging his hand over his own face. When John weakly tries to tug him back down (why must cuddles end prematurely?) the troll clicks his tongue. "I mean it, Harley and the douchebag will be here literally any second. Make yourself decent and brush your teeth, before they see you looking like a shooshpapped pile of human ooze."

"Nrrrrrrgh." John thinks he makes a great argument. But Karkat still somehow manages to win, dropping a kiss on John's lips and then sitting right back up so that John has to follow him. It's unfair. There's a chill coming in from the open window now that night's set in and they're not buried in pillows anymore, so John grabs the first layer of sheets and wraps them around his shoulders in a cape.

The door swings open before Karkat can get more than a yard from the bed, before John has mustered the will to stand up and make the trek to the locker rooms down the hall. "What do you wa--" is all Karkat gets out before the figure in the doorway blurs, and throws something past Karkat - at John, who doesn't have time to react.

And a pair of boxers smacks him in the face.

"I would just like you both to know," Dave says, from somewhere beyond the veil of shock and black cotton, "that this? Is worth what you two are about to do to me in retribution. This is so worth it."

---

Saturday, March 29th

Jade cracks her knuckles.

It's mostly just for show.

Kanaya inspects her with a critical eye, but from what Jade can see, everything looks fantastic!

"It will do," the jadeblood announces, and really, isn't that all the validation an outfit needs?
- gardenGnostic [GG] opened memo on board group project :D at 06:34:22 -
GG: goooooood morning, everyone! is everybody up and at em?
TT: Yep.
TG: ısh so early sobes
TA: why the fuck am ii even here jade
GG: because you're the computer guy!
TA: ii kind of already have this ma2iiively more iiimportant thing ii need two be working on GG: multitask! it's good for the soul! and anyway, i leave today and won't be able to help for a while, so you're being drafted into the cause.
TA: no. and didn't ii ıday a2 your undii2uted e-diicatıor that you all needed two top wiıth the extraneou2 group memo2?
TT: We're secure for now.
TA: and who the fuck are you?
TG: no, tha fuck r u?
TA: who the fuck are eiither of you?!
GG: i see everyone woke up on the wrong side of the bed this morning :/
TA: no, ii'm ii in a timecrunch, there're two complete dip2hit2 trying two complaiin to me about their hatefeelı2 24/7, AA i2 riıding my a22 about her project, my cu2todiian ha2 been iınexplııcably fuckiing AWOL for dayı2, and you and the2e two random people here are makiıng my job twııce a hırd a2 iit need2 two be.
TA: thiı2 ii2n't me 'waking up on the wrong ıde of the coon,' thiı2 i2 me not haviıng been iın the coon for nearly a week
TA: becauııe ii keep FLOATIING OUT AND WRİITIING CODE ON THE CEİILING İN MY 2LEEP.
TG: that doesn't sound like funtimesıes
GG: is the floating normal?
TA: ii can't feel my toe2.

-

It would be easier to keep track of everyone if Jade could use her powers! Urfffgghhh. People tend to accumulate in either John or Jane's room or Kanaya's fitting room, which are just far enough away from the Queen's Hub that Jade can only communicate with them by text or by making the run all the way from one wing of the lab to another without the benefit of space powers. It's not that bad, but it is a hassle and a half when she's used to bouncing wherever she needs to be!

She's never distrusted her own strength, before. Now she's seen what happens when she pushes too hard, too fast, in these twisting void shields. The thing with the whiteboard was harmless enough, because no one got hurt; what happened to Samuel Egbert's hand was...kind of disturbing. Jade's been to look in on him over this past week, to peer in at him as though watching will reveal some smidgen of guilt or remorse in his bland expression, but she always finds her eyes turning, with irresistible force, to the cauterized stump where his hand abruptly cuts off.

Sometimes it's easy to forget just how powerful the four of them are. The way Grandpa raised her, with a constant awareness of the game always present even when it went unstated, it just seems normal that she and Dave and John and Rose are like this. But even if it turns out Samuel's not a total stinker, he's not gonna grow that part of his hand back or anything.

-
TT: I'm fairly certain this guy won't be much help.
GG: nooo, we need him!
TG: idk, i think we've got this shtie handled
TG: were pretty bobmbob ass haxxors here w/o floaty troll's input GG: true, you guys are great! but he's also one of the troll players, according to karkat, so i get the feeling we'll need his help at some point! i'm almost positive!
TA: okay you know what?
TA: ii'm 2ick two death of thi2 game 2hiit. liike. 200% over iit
TA: make 2omeone el2e be your troll programming god
GG: but that's just it! you're the only troll player with amazing computer skills that we know about right now!
GG: karkat and kanaya are both leaving, too, and neither of them is any good at hacking anyway...
TT: Understatement.
TA: and you're the two who've been diickiing with my 2ecuriity patche2? fanta2tiic.
TG: you noticed hat?
TA: of cour2e ii diid. on top of everything el2e goiing wrong iin my liife.

Jade swings around to retrieve the White Queen from where the carapacian has settled in for the morning. Some times that task is harder than others; carapacians have this tendency to vanish and do their own thing without warning anyone else (just look at how the Black Queen and Spades Slick took off, totally at random, and haven't been seen since). But today, Jade gets a pleasant surprise when she opens up a group memo to ask who's run into the Queen lately, only half expecting a response, John messages her back almost right away to say that the WQ is in his room! Jade hurries over, urging John via text to keep the WQ still for a few seconds, and thankfully by the time she reaches the room the pale carapacian waits outside John's door, her claws signing a greeting as Jade skids to a stop.

WQ: You seek me, my dreamer?
"Yup!" Jade pauses for a moment as breeze streams through her hair, yanking on the end of a braid once until the tie comes off, and then rolls her eyes as the wind carries the hair tie back under the door with almost palpable glee. "I'm headed out today, so would you mind helping us take one more look at the Hub?" she asks. "Just so if you think of any more parts that might help, I can add them to the list!"

WQ: Of course. I only wish that I could offer more assistance with it. Alas, I reached the limits of my own ability to recreate the terminal with my first attempt.

"No, no, what you did already was pretty darn impressive, I think," Jade exclaims as they start down the hallway. The Queen moves at a default sedate, stately pace, so Jade finds herself hard pressed to stop and backtrack a little before she can leave the carapacian in the dust by accident. The trip to the computer room takes a whole lot longer than Jade would have taken if she'd gone alone, but the carapacian queen has really is easy to talk to, as long as you keep teasing out what questions you need to ask to prompt her to explain details. "What were you and John talking about, anyway?"

WQ: He wished to clarify some of what he recalls, now that his mind is mostly his own. In addition, it would appear his aspect's manifestation has informed him that some of his memories may not be available or unlocked yet.

Before, Jade was just curious; now, she's super curious. Of the four kids, she and Rose have been the ones to try to grill the queens for info. Dave, as near as Jade can tell, was so gosh darn awful at deciphering the Black Queen's shenanigans that he just gave up on ever getting a straight answer, ever. John, with his intense, kneejerk reflex to forget the game whenever anyone mentioned it, would also have had his dad riding his butt constantly whenever he tried to learn more about his powers. Jade's not sure he's ever had the will to reach out and talk about what he does remember with the WQ. His memories would give him a different perspective than Jade and Rose have, hampered as they are by the fact that most of what they know is still based solely on the recordings, Karkat's sparknotes and crappy diagrams, and in Jade's case, what was recorded in her Grandpa's files of Joanna Crocker's visions. Having that benefit of real memories might lead him to ask questions they could never think of.

"His memories of the very end, with the scratch?" Jade hazards a guess, and is only a little disappointed when the Queen predictably nods an affirmative. She holds the door of the conference room open for the carapacian when they reach it at last, and complains a little when she sees Dirk is absent - probably off checking Jake and Jane on his periodic rounds of the lab. "That's dumb. Sooo arbitrarily dumb! What, is someone just making up new rules out of nowhere to justify this?"

WQ: It is entirely probable.

"Wait. Huh?" Jade stops in her tracks, and the carapacian actually passes her up before realizing the human stopped. "What are you talking about?"

WQ: Something occurred at the end of the last game. Something traumatic enough, and entwined enough with the troll players' game session, that paradox space could not record it properly.

WQ: Part of that is due to the interference of a second game session, which would naturally have been saved under its own file. But there also must have been something...untenable. As you have speculated amongst yourselves, there must have been a reason for you all to decide to scratch both game sessions at once. It is a drastic measure for a session that has become unwinnable. And something so devastating that it required not one, but two scratches to try to produce a viable session? The circumstances are unusual, and I regret that my fellow queen and I had already vacated the session when it happened.

WQ: If the game judged the precipitating incident significant enough, it may have shaped reality to try to bring order out of a particularly damaging event. Locking memories of one of its players in the name of asserting a sequential order to the narrative would not be beyond its power.

Jade shakes her head, and starts walking again so that they can start sorting through all the panels and exposed wires and circuit boards that Jade, Roxy, and Dirk have dismantled over the past few days. "Even knowing it's one big video game, it's still so weird to think about how random and arbitrary video game logic is," Jade says, chewing on her lower lip as she crawls under the terminal to start holding out parts for the Queen to nod or shake her head at.

WQ: It is the most fundamental logic there is. What seems perhaps arbitrary and shoehorned in to you is an order as old as Skaia itself. Without these game mechanics, paradox space would have collapsed in on itself under the weight of improbability and glitches long ago. However inconvenient, narrative structure is everything.

"You really do have an interesting perspective on it!"

WQ: I have lived it. I could, of course, offer my speculations as to what the traumatizing event might have been - Doc Scratch's influence, then and now, suggests particularly disturbing possibilities that do not bode well for the future session - but I would prefer to wait until we can view the troll session. It could make all the difference.
They get sidetracked for a few minutes after that, as Jade holds up a particularly mangled, twisty bit of computer innards, and they have to puzzle over it for a good while trying to figure out just what it was before the heat and strain of the Queen's Hub fried it and left behind an indistinguishable puddle of silicon. Jade comes up with another question by the time they're done - she actually almost forgets it, the words completely escaping her for a second while she mumbles to herself, and then the question comes back to her. "Do you think any of the rest of us will remember, soon?"

WQ: I imagine you all will be able to retrieve them soon. Heirs have a tendency to come into their powers early, sometimes before they're capable of controlling or understanding them - not always to their benefit. What triggers each of your own memories could be different for each player.

Jade shakes her head, and has to turn her head to tug a wayward curl of hair from where it's pinched between a particularly snarled mess of wires and melted metal with her teeth - her hands are kinda busy at the moment, and her space powers are still on pause. "Any advice?"

WQ: Explore your aspects and powers. All four of you are in the god tiers, and that means much. Coming to a deeper understanding of their roles helps players to understand themselves.

"Oh, wow...I wouldn't even know where to start doing that!" Jade chews on the hair in her mouth - it's there already, and all, so... "So I should try doing new things with my space powers?"

WQ: Experimentation might help, yes. Witches are very versatile, I have found - maybe the most versatile roles in the game. You have only scratched the surface of your capabilities as yet.

"Sooo, get creative? Jade can do that! But still - "Urgh!" she groans, tossing another useless chunk of semiconductor out to add to the trash pile. "I just can't believe Karkat had all these dreams about our session, but me and Rose and Dave haven't even had any cool dreams or anything!" That's the most unfair thing about all this, to Jade's mind. True, Karkat has been really messed up by all his nightmares, but at least he has something to go on!

WQ: I still find the Knight of Blood's visions most peculiar. I can only imagine he must have some connection to your session beyond the obvious merge of the two sessions that allows him to recall these things in his dreams. The presence of blood alone would ordinarily not be enough for a Knight to function as a Seer might. One would almost think he has viewed your session before.

Huh. Jade hasn't really thought about that, before. Sure, Karkat knowing more about the game session and everyone dying a lot kind of nagged at her, since it was so weird and all, but she hasn't devoted much brainpower to investigating why he might remember more than the actual players of their own game! She thinks the Queen might have mentioned some of this before, but it just wasn't all that high on her list of priorities with everything else that was going on. "What about the troll players? Didn't they have dreamers, too?" she says, hesitant. The WQ just watches her with thoughtful black eyes, waiting patiently for Jade to finish where she sits, making a computer chair a throne. "The ones on Prospit would have prophetic visions in the clouds, wouldn't they?" Grandpa always thought Jade would have a lot of those, but Jade supposes it's just one of many things that he didn't understand fully.

WQ: Prospitian dreamselves can indeed experience prophecy through Skaia's clouds during an eclipse, but those are usually far more simplistic visions. The thought may have merit. I shall see what I can recollect, but I do not believe I spoke enough with the Knight on Prospit to know for certain what visions he might have had...Actually, now that I think on it, I'm not certain that I ever spoke with him at all. Like your Heir, he may have woken very late, and given that my cousin-queen and I were exiled early on, in that game session...

If John and Karkat were both sleepy dumb butts, it would not surprise Jade at all. Seriously! She's not sure how two people could be so different but so similar in such random ways. "Do you remember much of the troll's game at all?" she asks, scooting out from under the terminal and sitting up with her hands braces behind her to look up at the Queen. It feels kinda like sitting by the fire with Grandpa in the grand foyer, listening to him recount some wild adventure from his stint as a tomb raider or lecture on the best way to maintain a flintlock rifle.

WQ: They were hasty players, as I recall. So quick to lash out, so slow to question the consequences of their actions. Two of them spent a good amount of time dreaming, though they flew around more doing silly things more than they did complete any dream quests. I recall the Sylph awoke very early, but she didn't consult me often. There was also a girl with the oddest taste for red chalk.

"Like, chalk drawings?"

WQ: No, my dear. She enjoyed the taste. Literally.

Oh, jeez. Trolls and their 'addictions.' Jade shakes her head - and then blinks, and slowly turns her head again, just in time to catch a scrawny black claw reach out from under the conference table and snag one of the melted hunks of scrap metal from the pile.

"WV! There you are!" she says, laughing, leaning to the side so she can peek into the darkness under the table. A pair of beady white eyes frown at her in silent reproach, and the claw snaps out to grab a whole bunch more chunks from the pile. He probably needs them for one of his construction projects! But when WV scurries out from under the table with an overflowing armful of computer parts stacked higher than his head, the White Queen manages to gently catch him by the back of his clothes with a single claw, trading the look of faint amusement for one of gentle curiosity.

WQ: Ah. There you are, indeed, small Villein. I wished to ask -

WV drops all the metal with a clatter, sudden enough to make Jade jump a little! He starts struggling to wriggle himself free from the Queen's grip on his clothes and then seems to change his mind. He raises his claws and Jade rocks back on her butt and then forward on to her knees, meaning to lean just a little bit forward and pull him away before he can bite or scratch or something else like that. WV tends to get a little scratchy when he doesn't get his way.

She sits back on her butt in total surprise when WV starts signing instead, flailing his claws with a purpose - and actual words pop up in her head!

Well. Not words. But a stream of random syllables that are so close to being words Jade's brain ties itself into knots with the conviction that she should be able to understand, despite the fact that it's nonsense.

WV: kątudaraijūsmanotekadjumsžinotikasgeriausiavisiemsirjūsgalitebosasžmonėsaplink. naijūsnegalitepasakytimankądaryti! darautaikanoriusi.

Thankfully, the White Queen seems just as baffled as Jade, her smooth face screwed up with confusion that she should be able to understand, despite the fact that it's nonsense.

WV: irkątudaraikosomosomergina?! pirmiausaijūmsirjūsųvilkaspagrobtimanetadavilkiteaplinkmanevisąįkvailaplanetojeodabartai?! kodėlvėjuotaberniukastaiplūdnakodėlviskassiaubinga?

WQ: But this is fascinating. I thought you incapable of speech, small one. Slow down, you speak too quickly. Your thoughts are rushed and garbled.

Jade sets an elbow on her knee and sets her chin on her fist, watching in amazement as WV just keeps blaring something that's just barely not speech into their heads. It's all gobbledygook, is the problem; like listening to a foreign language on fast forward, with no pauses for breath that would make the sentences coherent. It sounds like it should make words, but Jade can't parse them at all.

Still! This is the closest WV has come to genuine speech in as long as Jade's known him. It's all been squeaks and other plain old verbal clicks before; no matter how much he moved his claws, he couldn't seem to make the telepathic part of carapacian communication work no matter how frustrated he got. He must have been practicing while they left him alone in the Lalonde house!

WV: nesustabdytikadnesutinkujūsųautoritetąašatmestimonarchijostironijapaleisk!

WQ: I only wish to assist -

Unfortunately, the Queen lets go of WV's clothes at the wrong moment, and tries to touch his shoulder - maybe to try to calm him down a little so she can get a word in edgewise amid all the telepathic garble. At the touch WV starts signing even more emphatically, though, and backpedals away. The Queen has longer strides than him but when she rises to try to follow him, her expression both concerned and interested, WV seems to have had enough. He crackles with green energy for a second, flaring enough that Jade feels the static electricity right down in her bones, and then swipes at the WQ's outstretched claw and takes off at a dead run, leaving behind his gathered metal scraps in his haste to abscond.

WV: despotasdzieržymordablogi!

"Crap. Did he get you bad?" Jade asks, standing up properly so she can get a look at the White Queen's arm. There's a faint abrasion across the back of one hand, but it doesn't look there's any blood, at least. Jade's gonna have to give that carapacian a stern lecture about manners! "Did you get any of what he tried to say?"

WQ: No, unfortunately. He still has no love for monarchs, I see. He can be childish and indignant in temperament, but it is rare to see a pawn carapacian with such a determined desire to rouse revolution.

WQ: Do you know what might have imparted him with that ability to make use of space powers? I don't know that he had that before.

Jade scuffs her foot against the floor, sighing as she does. "I still don't know what made him turn out that way. I keep running into all these more urgent things to do, even in a lab full of all the coolest scientific equipment I could ask for..." For all she knows, it might just be a side effect of the spontaneous way she stabilized him on the quantum level - or it might be something else entirely.

WQ: Mmm. I wish him well. Perhaps I can coax him into speaking intelligibly, if he lets me assist him. Whatever stripped him of the ability in the first place, his progress thus far to reclaim it seems nigh incomprehensible. I thought I recognized his mode of speech - it reminded me a little of my own mind. I think he may well have been basing his attempts off my own telepathy, which is odd. Particularly for a Dersite.

The carapacian opens and closes her claw slowly as she says this, though it doesn't seem to impede her speech or anything. Jade has noticed that the queens seem to have more leeway when it comes to their telepathy and sign language. "You know, I get that it's a big cosmic chess game, kind of, but seriously - why do the Derse carapacians and you guys fight, anyway?" she asks, stooping to start brushing the scattered mess of dropped metal fragments back into the pile with little touches of her power. "I mean, what - when we start the game this time, are you all just gonna pretend you didn't live for centuries here on Earth without really trying to hurt each other or anything?" If the WQ says it's more 'video game logic' again, Jade is gonna have to postpone Kanaya's trip in order to have a meltdown to match one of Karkat's, honestly!

And so, naturally, that's exactly the answers the Queen gives. Blrughhgl.

WQ: There is always a game. Two armies wage war across the Battlefield, one in Skaia's name, one in ruthless opposition. And throughout it all, the heroes work to revitalize their lands, reclaim the Battlefield, and forge the sacred tadpole that will give rise to the next Frog.

It even sounds like one of the voiceover spiels that would come at the start of a video game intro sequence! "Why, though? Why would Dersites hate the idea of a new universe so much?" Heck, Jade can't even picture WV participating in a war at all - he's too much of an adorable little oddball. Spades Slick, on the other hand...that guy, she could totally see trying to shank people on the Battlefield.

WQ: They are as they were born to be. As we all are. Those of Derse oppose the creation of Himself because that is at the core of their existence. They curse Skaia because Skaia requires that they do so. Their destructive nature carries them forth to overwhelm Prospit's forces, and initiate the Reckoning - which both carries the players to their paradoxical points of origin, and provides the impetus for their later exodus into the Medium.

WQ: And so in their own way, Derse serves Skaia just as faithfully as Prospit does. They have a different calling, but I could never begrudge my sister for her aims. All things are for the sake of the game.

"Is she really helping us, then? I mean, you two seem like you're working together now, mostly...and she's trying to help us figure out this messed up game session. Kinda." Jade tries to get back on track. The issue of how weirdly the BQ went about trying to advise Dave is probably beyond comprehension. Unless you're an evil alien queen, anyway. "It all seems less like video game logic and more like contradictory stuff."

WQ: She is a creature of contradictions. Once, we communed more often, when we faced each other across the Battlefield, while the Kings sheltered where we could best defend them. But times changed. The game changed. And the Black Queen and I fell out of the practice of corresponding, except in times of dire need. This strange session, and the circumstances under which the last one ended, qualified enough for her to seek me out, as chance would have it.

WQ: But that does not mean she likes it, and she is taciturn when it suits her. It is easy enough to guess what she recognized. The signs of Doc Scratch's arrival, once one thinks to look, are always unmistakable. And once he comes into being, a session is almost invariably cursed with unfathomable misfortune. Skaia attempts to compensate for the imbalance, but with each emergency protocol that it activates to restore order, the glitches proliferate and begin to stack up. Essential game functions go haywire, or cease entirely. Players go rogue or become lost, trapped in a maze of their own insecurities and flaws, unable to progress forward in their maturation and attain fruition. Those like Jack Noir, always skating the fine line between wildness and madness, go over the edge.

This all sounds like a repeat of some of the White Queen's advice that she gave the other day; Jade supposes that her question must have kicked off something in the carapacian's mind that she already discussed once before. "How do you know so much about it, anyway?" she asks, settling her hands on her hips and surveying the Hub terminal, which looks absolutely forlorn with all its guts and melted parts strewn across the floor. Someone - maybe Roxy - lined up some of the transceiver parts on the ledge of one of Karkat's whiteboards and arranged them in a little pyramid.

When the alien says nothing, Jade glances at her and realizes the carapacian has her head tilted to the side. Like she's waiting for more input. "Doc Scratch, I mean. You say having a game session crash as hard as ours did is reeeeally unusual, but you also sound like you've seen this all happen before."

That does the trick.

WQ: There are always rumors. News that filters through paradox space, inklings that whisper of the failure of other game sessions, of branches of universal potentiation that have been terminated, never to regenerate again. But of course, one never imagines that it will happen to your session. Until it is too late. He is already here.

WQ: Once Doc Scratch appears, it has always been too late, they say.

Nuh-uh! That's the kind of naysaying that the others are always going off about when they start trying to say the game can just not happen. Like it's just as simple as not loading Sburb, if they want to stop the end of the world. "We'll figure out a way to beat him," she says encouragingly, smiling at the carapacian until the WQ smiles fondly back. "We will! We'll figure out this game and beat it so good, it'll make Scratch's dumb cue ball head spin!"

WQ: If anyone could do it, I believe it could be you, my dreamer. But, ah. The path will be fraught with danger. The current Genesis Frog has grown weak and will not fight this cancer; Skaia has always been too passive an entity to change that now. If we fight this ending, we fight alone, without Skaia's guiding light. If need be, when the time comes, my King and I may be able to redirect those of Prospit to help you all more in your quests than on the Battlefield. It may take some persuading with the Black Queen though. I'll see what I can talk her into.

That's depressing. And kind of sucky. But Jade refuses to let that get her down! Nodding her head firmly, she goes to the table and starts flipping through the notebook paper that they've all been working on as they added parts to the list of things they need to order in sporadic bursts of wildly varying handwriting - Roxy's haphazard and sloppy, Dirk's tight and constrained, Jade's loopy and bubbly in cursive.

One last thought occurs to her, while she and the White Queen go through and put the last finishing touches on the order sheet. "Where is he, by the way? Your King, I mean. He turned into a Protector a while ago, right?" Jade says, gnawing on the end of the pen with her front teeth and talking around it. Carapacians are pretty private about their politics and lives, especially the ones who retreated back to the original landing site cities in the Central Asian deserts. But she definitely thinks that was a thing that happened; initials aren't as big a deal for humans and trolls as they are for carapacians, but the change from WK to GP was big enough to end up in some textbooks. Especially since the carapacian in question was the one apparently in charge of most of the alien civilization, at the time!

WQ: Oh! My dear King...it has been long since I saw him. Yes, he is the Grey Protector now. He seeks to watch over both Prospitians and Dersites, in the absence of both Dersite monarchs. It is a noble aim, and I can only speculate that he has been, at least in part, successful. What happened in the genocide would have confirmed it for me, if nothing else.

Jade removes the pen from her teeth and blinks, cocking her head to the side and looking up from the list after a short delay. "The - you mean the Holocaust?"

WQ: Yes. You know how that world war ended. It is in your history texts.

Everyone knows. It's kinda the entire reason no one has messed with the carapacian civilization in the past century, no matter where they branch out and set up their colonies. "Two giant carapacians, yeah. They just showed up out of nowhere and started stomping on Germany!" A lot of the designs for modern giant robots are based on them actually - Jade knows for a fact that the Japanese have been extrapolating their blueprints for Power Ranger zords from them for years.

If Jade were a more suspicious person, she'd think that the look on the White Queen's face was almost a smug smirk. But her features are way too regal for such a thing.

WQ: An Arch Deaconstructor and a Siege Titan. Whether they respect my Protector enough to see him as liege - which I doubt - the Dersites would have had to agree to activate their war vats in order to clone a Greater Rook of that magnitude, and design it to work in tandem with a Greater Bishop of Prospit. We carapacians had not dealt with something like your human and troll genocides, what you've inflicted on each other for such strange things as hemotype or ethnicity or religion. The ectobiological terminals are usually secure in the Furthest Ring. Having them destroyed like that, so callously, for no reason but that Hitler thought us a threat to his Lebensraum, along with so many others...the losses are still incalculable. So many carapacian genetic codes, lost forever. It might have been enough to bring Derse around to my Protector's side.

Jade never thought about it that way! Perhaps because all she's known a whole life through are the carapacians who, despite being split up into Prospitians and Dersites, don't really fight too much - at least not where human and troll observers have been able to see. They stick to their own cities, yeah, but even then there are some enclaves that mix the two up without obvious problems. She supposes those might be the ones who somehow got inspired by WV to try to change things. Seriously, what a wreck the Earth would be if the two carapacian races had decided to duke it out here as they would on the Battlefield - complete with whole armies of Deaconstructors and Titans!

Tucking her hair behind her ear, Jade looks over the list one last time, nods to herself, and rips off all of the sheets of paper from the notepad. She folds them up, then takes one final lingering look at the Hub in case it decides to spark and blow another fuse or something. But with how much she and Roy and Dirk have stripped from it, and all the batteries they disconnected to save fuel, she thinks it might be under control for now! "We'll figure this out," she says to the White Queen. Then she squints, staring hard at the carapacian. "If the parts get here before I do, you will help them put this together properly...right?" she asks, waving the folded up square of paper to emphasize her point.

The White Queen hesitates almost too long - and then nods.

WQ: I built it last time without the request of a player; I can set myself to the task again. I shall assist the two humans.

"Thank you." Jade sticks the list in her pocket and sets her jaw, raising her chin as she marches to the door. '"Time to go!"

---

TA: you two are okay. liike, not half bad. ...mediocre. eh.

TT: We know how the Felt's security crackers operate. There were holes in that shit you could fly a plane through.

TA: no, no, no!

TA: the gap loop2 are deliiberate! they're what he expect2 two 2ee! god, ii had two tear that 2hiit apart all over again two fix it.

TA: you want two play 2criipt kiiddy wiith the maiin wall2, fiine. you're competent and probably won't fuck up two badly.

TA: but leave the deep code alone. thii2 ii2 layered for a rea2on. you worry about tho2e 2econdrate hack2. ii'm dealling with the white text douche and he'2 2o beyond that level it'2 unreal.

GG: has doc scratch been trying to contact people again?

TA: you 2ay that liike he ever 2topped. 2ee how good a job ii'm doiing? praii2e me.

GG: not while you're being a dick about it. but yeah, thank you! so will you help us with this?
Leaving sucks more than it has any right to.

WV has been sparking a lot, lately, despite the void wards, and Jade doesn't want to risk someone like Clubs Deuce showing up again and driving them into the kind of rapid teleporting that caused the carapacian to nearly overheat last time. Dirk shows up for all of five seconds so he and Dave can have a staring contest (Jade figures it's some weird Strider thing) before darting off again without a word to anyone, but Roxy and Jane both venture out to the lobby to say goodbye. Roxy keeps nudging Jane in the side, but the other Scratch girl stays silent and watchful through the whole thing. Jade's not too worried though! Jane started talking again yesterday, but she can still go hours between words; it's just a relief that she came out of the surgery relatively lucid. Unlike poor Jake, who can't sort out his scrambled brains and thinks every therapy session is an opportunity to bust out in a daring jailbreak. Apparently he used to be really big on movies...all movies. The Shawshank Redemption being no exception.

And going by how little some of the Crew members that got dewormed earlier are making in terms of progress, the fact that Jake's stuck doesn't seem like a good sign.

"We'll keep at it," Roxy says, when prodding Jane does nothing more than make the other girl grunt and shift position. "Even though I think troll guy is obsolescent. Uh, obnoxious. And hopefully nothing too awful will happen." She sighs, way longer than Jade ever thought any person had the lung capacity to pull off, looking mournful as she does. "Why? Why did it have to be the foxy dad who turned out evil?"

Well yes, Jade can objectively agree that Samuel is pretty darn good looking in a total douchebag asshat fuckface kind of way, but unfortunately, she has no idea how to answer. Mostly because she's got a policy - they've all got a policy - of talking about Samuel as little as possible in as low a voice as possible whenever John's in the room. Heck, when John's even in the same hallway! There's a constant breath of fresh air hanging around the air-conditioned halls that wasn't present before, when John was so obsessed with keeping his control on his powers clamped down.

...And in hindsight, there's just so much of John's behavior in the past that makes Jade squirm with guilt over just how much they all missed. Heck, half the time John wasn't all that good at hiding it - they just never knew the signs for what they were. John and his dad were paranoid (in Jade's opinion, anyway, since she didn't see why they had to act that way even in their own home) but they were nice.

There's a blue rubber band on her fingers to remind her that appearances can be deceiving.

Anyway, she's required by law or something to never say good things about Samuel Egbert again. "He's kinda old," she feels the need to point out, making a face.
"Aged like fine whine," Roxy counters, wistful. "Evil, evil wine. Not fair, I tell you, everyone I like bein' either taken or evil or probs both at the same time."

Jane rolls her eyes. She does it without a sound, and Roxy's still sighing and not paying attention, so Jade thinks she's the only one to notice. By the time Roxy hooks her arm with Jane's and pulls the girl over to say goodbye to Dave, Jane's face is blank once more. Dave is still hastily trying to convince a very unimpressed Rue Lalonde to let him go - because, being the lame goofball he really is under all the cool, Dave completely failed to mention he would be going with Karkat when she agreed to have the private jet meet them at the Seattle airfield. Now she's threatening to make him stay (just on principle, Jade thinks).

But Karkat is definitely going, and Jade knows - they all know - that if he's going, he isn't going alone. If Dave had to stay behind, John might try to go along, even though he still needs to rest, and gosh only knows if they'd be able to stop him if he just did the windy thing to jump across the entire country in a panic. Rose is probably gonna have her work cut out for her keeping John here as it is...

Then there's the problem of watching John and Karkat and then Rose and Kanaya standing off in their own respective corners saying goodbyes. Having to leave John and Rose behind feels awful, though Jade can see the logic behind it. John is still messed up and Rose can help him with his head in the event of an emergency. But she's also still recovering from having a grimdark episode in Seattle, and all four of them look like they're being gutted by inches at the idea of splitting up the party. Jade doesn't blame them at all. She grabs John and Rose the instant they peel away from their respective trolls and hugs them, jamming her eyes closed until they stop burning and prickling. John holds back a little too tightly, while Rose's arm feels so slender and fragile in comparison that she could snap like a twig in a strong breeze.

Then of course they have to shuffle after Dave like a hug monster; he takes it like a real champ this time, after the initial waffling where he's clearly thinking reeeal hard about sprinting off back into the lab. But he gets stuck between John and Jade eventually. There's a faint touch on Jade's back, before Kanaya sneaks in between Rose and John, and then all of them just kind of look, as one, at Karkat.

Karkat scowls back. Jade punches Dave in the arm as discreetly as she can when they're all wobbling into one another, and Dave gives her an aggrieved look before vanishing and reappearing from some other point in time behind Karkat to gently persuade him into joining the circle. Dave's idea of gentle persuasion is a silent shove of encouragement that sends Karkat reeling at John, which is probably the only thing that saves them all from a shouting match once they've reassembled.

Jade wonders how many of them would actually protest or make a fuss if she suggested they just stay here. Karkat would, yeah, but she thinks it would mostly because he wants to disagree with her, not because of any real objection. None of them are really okay about this and the fact that they're going through with these trips not even a week after learning about Samuel Egbert and what he's done to John feels abrupt, like they're jumping the gun and everything could crumble again if someone else in the Crew or the Felt decided to apply some elbow grease, or if the clown guy caught up with them, or John -

The key to not crying is to focus on Kanaya. While the rest of them are slowly untangling from the group hug, Jade turns to see that Kanaya is already straightening up her outfit and looking towards the door. Kanaya's been so patient! Jade hadn't had a clear idea of what brought her out here to accompany Rose, other than some vague notion that the jadeblood wanted to visit Chicago and the two girls' trip escalated rapidly and without warning. But Kanaya's been waiting on this Los Angeles leg of their trip for ages, apparently, while they've been having all this crazy stuff going on, so Jade thinks it's only fair that she finally get to go investigate her own thing. The dome over Los Angeles sounds like an interesting phenomenon, too! Jade would like to check it out, see if maybe she can circumvent it with Bec's help...it should be fun! Yeah!

Leaving still sucks.

A lot.

TT: The Querent and I have been trying to decipher how to retool the primary relay for an hour already this morning. Shit looks like it's borked. She wasn't kidding when she said she jacked this thing up three ways to Sunday to make it work the way it does. Now all we're picking up is static on three monitors, and the fourth one's stuck in some loop.

GG: what's wrong with it now?! i thought i replaced all the broken stuff earlier!

TT: Most of the peripheric components, yeah, but it's a good thing you didn't dick with the inner stuff too much. The cryogenic low-noise amplifier's on its last legs. I'm not sure how it's possible, but there's at least four different ways this hub could explode at any minute. And that's only the ways that I'm seeing right now. A lot of it is frying as we speak.

TA: je2u2. what kiind of piece of 2hiit are you all workiing on?

TG: (hook)

TT: (line)

TG: (snkerrr)

GG: it's called a queen's hub! it functions as a terminal that can analyze old recorded paradox data of the pre-scratch universe and display it as video feeds. we're still having trouble making it work to access your guys' game session, though. everything's either locked or encrypted or just plain scrambled when the WQ tries to access it!

TA: why would you want to watch that 2hiit?

GG: so we can figure out why we scratched it and mashed our two sessions together in the first place! there's too much we don't know right now...like my grandpa always said - never stop digging until you've gotten to the bottom floor of the remote jungle temple and excavated all its secrets and shipped all the sweet loot back home for the collection!

TG: woah wait hold teh phon, foxy grandpa oldjake went legit tomb raidin?

GG: oh yeah, he got really bored for a while there in the 50s.

TG: oh man jakey would love this if he weren still mad atm

TA: (are you gettiing half of thii2?)

TT: (The part about two past universes hypothetically merging to form this one, or the tomb raider saga?)

TA: (eiither.)

- They jump to Karkat's house for the troll to stare in horror at the topsy-turvy mess his living room has turned into and then grab the package of colored contact lenses from his room so he can do the incognito thing properly. Jade practically sits on Bec's head as she zaps Karkat in and out of the house, spinning around so often to check all her blind spots that she gets a little dizzy! But Bec doesn't make a sound, Karkat's computer doesn't turn on, and Kanaya and Dave don't run into any weird juggalo stalker trolls while they're waiting in the living room, either. They must be in the clear...for now, anyway. Jade still links up with Bec and teleports them all in as few jumps as possible, straight from the suburbs to the airport runway, where the airplane that brought Doctor Lalonde to Seattle sits idling well away from the rest of the traffic. She's not willing to risk that clown guy popping up out of nowhere again!

Dave stares at the private jet like it's gonna bite him, and he's gearing himself up to endure. Karkat still looks distraught, eyes distant as he bites his lip and fiddles with his phone. Both of them are doing that thing where they hunch over and bristle like hedgehogs, prickly and defensive; Jade doubts either would admit to it. It makes her want to hug them, but there's no way Karkat would react well to that. So she settles for jumping Dave from the side when he least expects it, squeezing until he hugs back in a quick, furtive burst and drops his arms again. As though showing emotion in public will give him the heebie-jeebies. "Be safe, you two silly cool guys," she orders, in her best brook-no-shit voice, peering at Karkat over Dave's shoulder.

"Don't lump me in with that asshole and his ridiculous coolkid fetish," Karkat mutters, folding his arms over his chest and not meeting her eyes. "But yeah, yeah. Whatever." He hunches his shoulders some more as he looks at Kanaya, who eyes him right back and then puts out a hand, waiting until Karkat gingerly clasps it. "Don't get yourselves killed or some shit while you're off on the amazing
'whee, let's go poke a giant fucking impenetrable dome with a stick' field trip from hell."

Kanaya cracks a smile at last. "And I wish you two all the best with your plan to help one Peixes sabotage the other. The other, far more experienced Peixes, who has survived countless centuries of similar acts of rebellion and sabotage."

"Well, when you say it like that, it sounds stupid as fuck."

Kanaya's smile is utterly implacable. "Because of this game," she finishes, patting the back of Karkat's hand before letting go. "These are all facts -"

"- which you are stating for the record, yeah, okay, the meme is done," Dave says, Jade's still got him in a headlock, so he can't really do much except flap a hand at Kanaya with his face perfectly, disapprovingly expressionless. She plants a kiss on his cheek before she lets go of him, and his whole face turns red, but it doesn't stop him from finishing with, "It's tired. Let it sleep."

"Never. In my quest to verbalize pertinent information for the sake of future documentation, I cannot be stopped," Kanaya says, serene. Her smile's mostly faded though, as she reaches out and grabs Karkat's shoulder, gripping it until he looks up at her with an expression like he chugged a cup of raw lemon juice on a dare. "Be. Careful."

Karkat nods, his neck stiff and his eyes dulled behind the contacts. "Same," he says in a tight voice.

"And don't forget, all of the armor. If I learn you have been leaving off significant portions of the costume because they take somewhat longer to put on and ruining the silhouette, I will be displeased.
Putting all that together depleted most of my reinforcement plating."

"Why you would bring all that shit across the fucking country is beyond me."

Kanaya releases Karkat's shoulder and steps back to Jade, but she has time for one last parting shot before Jade bounces them out. "Never you mind that. If anything needs adjusting, Dave, I trust in you to implement an emergency field resuscitation of his outfit. Do not let me down."

Jade has to nudge Bec with her foot and teleport them away before her laughter gets the best of her.
Karkat and Dave's expressions are just priceless.

-

TA: whatever. 2ound2 liike what you people have ii2 a hardware problem anyway. junk iit and build a new machine.
GG: we almost might have to...a couple of the parts won't come cheap though. :( and then there's still the problem of the fact that the operating system just doesn't seem to register the troll universe at all!
TT: The best part about all this? Q is telling me she got most of these parts brand new. They shouldn't have deteriorated anywhere near this badly in so short a time. From the tests we've been running, this thing just burns through everything like tissue paper.

TA: have you people ever heard of a fucking heat 2iink, holy 2hiit, you're going to lo2e all the integrated circuit2. they'll ju2t melt.

GG: it has one! a lot actually, but they started breaking down too. part of the problem is these processors just need soooo many uranium battery packs to keep running without wiping out the lab's power grid.

TG: itsa hi performance not so lien computing machine

TT: Just lost another GPU. Well, it's probably been lost for a while...Yeah, this thing is just kind of melded to the frame, we might need to replace the whole damn thing.

TA: look. worry about your 2hiitty que2t two watch some gory torture porn apocalyp2e game recap later. cool that poor computer down, liike, ye2terday.

TA: 2alvage what you can; maybe run the component2 through a pha2e changer or fiive. figuring out how two acce22 incompatble encrypted fiile2 from another uniiver2e can wait until you have a terminal that actually, you know, ii2n't a piece of 2hiit.

GG: hmmm...oh! there might be a way for me to order a bunch of parts we need quickly! i'll check with someone i know when me and kanaya leave - we just need to draw up a list of all the stuff that needs replacing or reinforcing.

TG: yee. ill be there 2 help in a jyiff, dirkalurkin

TG: though idk where youd' get the kinda heatshank wizerdries to keep this babey cool...

GG: we'll figure something out! :) especially now that sollux is helping out, riight? eyebrow wiggle

TA: no ii never 2aiid that ever. no. ii have a liife you know.

TT: Weak, bro.

TA: ii don't care. the world'2 going two hell anyway. there'2 no poiint. thi2 2hiit game ii2 broken beyond repair. the uniiver2al termiinatiion poiint ii2 here. ii2 wa2 iineviitable from the 2tart.

TG: sho...ur gonna help? ); TG: whooops *;)

TA: FIINE. but only becau2e ii2teniing two you people brutaliize that computer ii2 giiviing me hiive2.

GG: yay! :D we can't make the game not happen, but the more we know, the better we can maybe minimize some of the effects!

- "This should only take a second, I promise," Jade says, setting them down just outside the frosted glass window front of the office.

Well. What she expects to be glass doors, anyway. When she and Kanaya turn around, though, what greets them is a wall of plywood, neatly boarded up from one end of the office to the other, with a space left for the doors to sit propped open. The doors' glass is cracked so badly it looks as though it fractured in two, and is only holding itself together with tape, plywood, and hope.

"Are you certain this is the right place?" Kanaya asks, sounding dubious, and Jade can't blame her! She doesn't remember this place being in such bad shape when she visited last time - but then again, she bounced out of here in a real hurry because of reasons. It wouldn't surprise her if the juggalo troll dude did a number on this place, with whatever his weird powers are that let him blow up doors and poke around in peoples' minds to send them stark raving bonkers.

But there is a note taped to the front of the door, on a piece of stationary with the foundation's old logo at the top.

The Harley Foundation office is open! Please pardon our appearance while renovations to the "They're just fixing the place up 'cause of that clown guy," Jade explains, pushing open the door with extra care. Bec doesn't appear to sense the scary clown anywhere; the wolf trots on over to the portrait hanging askew on the wall and sits obediently under it, head tilted to the side as though it anticipates the image of James Harley reaching down to scratch it behind the ears. "Hiiii, Janine!" she says when she spies a familiar figure behind the desk.

The ceruleanblood has her back to them, inspecting a stack of folders that sits beside a printer. But at the sound of Jade's voice the troll jolts so hard the stack of papers dips to one side and sheets of paper start to slide out before Janine Trevek can slam her hand down on top of the folders. Jade nudges it all back upright with a spark of power, just in time for Janine to whirl around to stare at her, mouth agape. "You - Miss Harley!"

"I'm back!" Jade waves, laughing and nudging at the plastic that covers the floor; most of it's stuck down with blue tape, but some of the corners flutter where the tread of people walking over it all day long must have pulled up the adhesive. "Sorry about all the weirdness the other day.' This place is a mess and she can't help thinking - if she'd only been able to resist that terror Juggaloco pushed on her, this wouldn't have happened. At least no one got hurt that night.

For a long moment, Janine appears to have stammered herself out of words. Then - "You're okay!" she says in a rush. The troll rams her hip into the side of the front desk as she dashes over and snatches Jade up in a surprise hug. "It was so irresponsible of me to go home like that," Janine sobs, shaking her head. "The founder's daughter here, in the middle of a crisis, and I couldn't even get you a h-hot beverage or anything - it was disgraceful!"

"Uh. It's okay! No worries!" Jade says, doing her best to pat the troll in reassurance on the back of the head without accidentally mashing her face against Jade's chest. "You got home alright, though?"

Janine doesn't appear to hear her, swept up in the babbling flow of her own recounting. "And then I c-came back into work the next day and the office was such a wreck, and I thought I was going to be fired for not locking up and letting the place get into this state and -" Kanaya taps Jade on the shoulder and passes her a handkerchief when Jade looks up. Jade hands the fancy embroidered cloth over to Janine, who pauses just long enough to lift her face, sheepishly take the kerchief, and use it to wipe her cerulean-blotched face. "And - and Ruka said there'd been a delivery for me and it was a note from you! Thanking me!"

...Oh yeah! Jade does remember sending that! "Well, yeah! Of course! You really saved our butts by getting that medicine shipment ready faster - you got the note okay, then?"

"I owe you my job, and I couldn't even help you fight that awful person!" Janine wails.

Maybe Jade should just wait this one out. She flashes a glance at Kanaya, who just raises an eyebrow and sidles away, pausing when her gaze reaches the portrait of Jade herself on the far wall. Okay, that's a little embarrassing now that it's someone Jade knows seeing it...Grandpa, why...

Jade starts fidgeting eventually, and when the ceruleanblood sobs herself out Jade does her best to extricate herself. Without being rude or anything! "It's good that you didn't get into trouble!" she says encouragingly. "I didn't want that, at all, especially over something as dumb and random as that. But, uh...I was wooodering..." She hesitates and then gives up with a mental shrug. Janine is watching her with rapt attention, now that her outburst is over with. Might as well ask! "Could I ask another favor? Pretty please?"

"Oh! Do you want coffee this time? Tea?!" The look in Janine's eyes borders on the feverish. Uh -
''I would not be opposed to a quick cup of coffee,'' Kanaya says. When the ceruleanblood whips her head around to stare at the other troll avidly, Kanaya's face does some interesting contortions to keep from looking openly alarmed. ''If that is...alright?''

''And you, ma'am?'' Janine's hair is coming loose again; part of it hits Jade's nose as the troll turns to look at her again.

''I'm not really thirs-''

Kanaya's frantic gestures are wild enough that Jade backtracks before she realizes what's going on, changing the slow, sheepish shake of her head to a desperate nod. ''No, I mean, coffee would be awesome! Thank you! But that's not what I was going to ask.''

Janine looks like someone just set off a round of fireworks in her honor. ''It's already percolating,'' she says, clenching a fist and rushing over to the machine. ''I made sure to keep it running, just in case. What else do you need, ma'am?''

At least when Jade peeks at Kanaya, the jadeblood is making the hand signal for 'crisis averted.' Or at any rate, that's what Jade thinks she means! She could also be asking for something in some obscure sign language that Jade doesn't know. ''I actually came to place another order for Lalonde Labs,'' she says, getting her brain back on the tracks for the original route this conversation was supposed to take. She pulls the list of computer supplies and parts from her pocket - it's more like a small stack of paper than a single sheet, whoops - and passes it to Janine with a tentative grin.

The troll takes it, propping the stack up at an angle between the wall and the table with coffee machine to read while she assembles two cups of coffee without even having to look down at her hands. ''You'll need Boxemina for tech orders,'' she says, distractedly pouring coffee into little mugs with the Harley Foundation logo on the side. As she gets further down the list, the ceruleanblood nods with more certainty. ''Ooh, though Hyram might be on call still for that new wholesaler we've been in talks with. If you need to buy this many items in bulk, that might be your best shot...How soon would you need it all? Another rush job?''

''Oh, no! This one's not nearly so crazy urgent,'' Jade says. She bounces on her toes and accepts the mug of coffee that comes her way. Kanaya takes hers as well, nostrils flaring as she inspects the liquid like she expects to see some kind of unctuous film to form on the surface. Which would just be odd, and kinda gross. Jade wishes she hadn't thought about that - it's making her eye the coffee with suspicion, but she has to take a hasty sip when Janine's eager anticipatory happyface gets the better of her. Anyway - ''I'll be out of town for a while, so whenever you guys think you can get these parts in, you could probably just ship it out to Doctor Lalonde's lab, okay? It's for an important project, but it's not life or death or anything like that.''

The ceruleanblood nods - and then the full impact of Jade's words appears to hit her, and her expression falls. ''You're leaving again? Already?'' Janine clutches the list to her chest, glancing from Jade to the coffee machine to the plastic sheet hanging over the empty doorway at the end of the hall where the door exploded with concussive force earlier in the week. ''D-don't you want to - meet with someone? Someone in charge, I mean? Most of the senior members are here today - a conference, actually, about how to reach you since you finally reached out to - are you sure?''

Nooo way do they have time for that. Or rather, Jade just wants to get a move on. Kanaya has already sipped most of that coffee away, polite but disinterested as she inspects the walls and wanders over to stand behind Bec and regard the portrait of Grandpa. But Jade promised the jadeblood that this would be a quick pitstop, and nothing more complicated than leaving this order to be filled ASAP - a fullblown meeting with whoever's in charge of the Foundation office here to hash out some mumbo-jumbo's nowhere near 'quick pitstop.'

Besides! Jade is determined that she and Kanaya are going to have fun on this daytrip, if it's the last thing Jade does. The mood in the labs has been depressing and ominous for long enough that it's really starting to get Jade's goat, and even if it would be ten times more fun if all their friends had come along with them, that's no reason not to make this the most incredible investigative recon trip yet! It'll be a good time!

So, as much as she doesn't want to step on Janine's toes... "Sorry! We really can't stay right now. Maybe next time?" Jade suggests. She realizes she's stopped drinking the coffee and nearly slops it on her shirt when she goes to chug it down. She gets the feeling that if there's even a drop left when she and Kanaya try to make their hasty exit, Janine might take it as implying her coffee is somehow subpar. And hey, it's actually dang good coffee! "We've gotta go, but I'll definitely be back in Seattle soon. Probably. You've been so much help, I promise!"

She whistles for Becquerel, and the wolf zaps over to her side from Grandpa's portrait without complaint. Jade considers it, and then tosses a quick salute to the portrait on the wall, mentally projecting a silent good luck, Grandpa for him, wherever he may be and whatever ruckus he's kicking up while there. Kanaya looks alert when Jade puts out a hand, striding back over and setting the mug down on the front desk before taking Jade's hand. "Shall we be on our way, then?" the jadeblood asks. She's practically vibrating with anticipation - if Jade were as hyped as Kanaya is right now, she'd have been bouncing of the walls in the most literal way!

Well, the only solution is to be just as pumped! "Time to get this show on the road," Jade agrees, grinning with all her teeth. When Kanaya grins back, it's a lot toothier, with a sharp edge.

Jade puts her hand out to brush the top of Bec's head, and holds the coordinates of their first jump point clear in her mind. They're gonna have to make these jumps in stages, and she doesn't want any mess ups that might take them across the frickin' ocean! "Let's go, Bec," she says.

And with a rush of green light, she and Kanaya and Bec leave Seattle behind.

--

TA: ii don't thiink thii2 ii2 going two work.
GG: trust me! we're doing this, man!
GG: we're making this happen! :)

Chapter End Notes

Well. Wow. That's it for ARC DEVASTATION... ARC VIII - UNISCENSION will open with Chapter 22, Spring Flowered Ways. Shit guys, let's assemble.

"average John wants to touch the Vantass 24/7" factoid actualy just statistical error. average John thinks about touching butt once a month or so. Trickster Mod, who lives in cesspit & thinks about butt-touching 10000 times a day, is an outlier adn should not have been counted.

We also now have a John 8tracks mix that takes into account the developments of Chapters 19 and 20, because it's not like I have homework I should be working on...no...no way...
Spring-Flowered Ways

Chapter Summary

So, clothed with love and fear that makes love great,
And armed with hope and hate,
He set first foot upon the spring-flowered ways
That all feet pass and praise.

Chapter Notes

Aaaad we're back! It is time to assemble the Ultimate Friendsquad of Super Goobers. Yes, that is their team name. No, we can’t change it now, except possibly to Friendsquad of Ultimate Dumb Goober Eggheads, just so the acronym is FUDGE.

Look, I don’t make the rules, here.

EDIT: Please enjoy further Rose & John antics, starting at around, 'Sollux, do you have a moment?’ These kooky kids and their crazy shenanigans... Anyway, next up is Chapter 23: With God's Eyes, which is where all the AWESOME FIGHT SCENES happen, and we finally start to get all these violent children to cool their jets B)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

ARC VIII - UNISCENSION (AKA SHIT, GUYS, LET'S ASSEMBLE)

Clubs Deuce wakes with an awful, foggy headache. Everything spins like a top, and when he closes his eyes and woozily curls up into a ball on his side, it doesn't really help much.

He opens his mouth to call for Sollux, and then pops it shut again, because his child hasn't lived with him in years. His head's been scrambled like that, lately, so that it seems harder to keep track of where he is and when he might be. It's really a bit of a bother. Clubs touches a claw to the side of his head on impulse, the sore spot that's been bothering him for a few days now, but pressing on it just makes it feel worse. Oh, dear.

Without much warning, a perfectly filed nail flicks his claws away from his head. A stern grunt of disapproval warns him off when he tries to do it again, and finally Clubs shakes the last of the foggy cobwebs out of his head to blink at the person sitting beside him.

Oh! He hasn't seen Yavari in a while! Not since he visited the doctor for a review, at least. She has, oddly enough, traded her usual stringent black uniform in for the day, when Clubs has never before in his entire life seen someone from Diamonds' branch in anything less than Midnight Crew standard midnight blacks. Even at their most casual, no one dares to dress not to impress when a lady like Diamonds is in charge of dress code! But Yavari's wearing a wine red hijab with a black fringe of lace, which is definitely not usual, and her suit has been replaced by a long coat almost like a dress, close in the sleeves and split down the front to reveal dark red pants, and while it certainly looks nice, it's still impractical enough that Clubs can't imagine Diamonds approved it. He raises his hand to scratch his head, puzzled -

And Yavari smacks it away again. "Stop that," she says, reproving, and when Clubs timidly tucks his hands underneath the pillow, she narrows her eyes at him in a level stare before returning her attention to the handgun in her lap, picking up a cloth and using it to wipe down the partially-opened casing.

Really now, just how long was Clubs napping? He looks around the room, but can find no clues that might help him out of this muddle - the room looks just like any number of Diamonds's safehouses might, classily decorated but windowless, the walls hung with spartan, monochrome decorations (in the case, large sideways diamonds, that look like they might conceal safes behind their thick exteriors) to distract from the fact that the only light comes from the lamps and the overhead light.

It's all very strange, though, because the last he remembers, Clubs was about to go off on a mission for the boss! He can't remember exactly what he was supposed to do, but he's sure it was important! If he and Yavari are in a safehouse, who is taking care of things outside? This is all pretty worrisome...

"Shouldn't we be somewhere else?" Clubs whispers, reaching out and tugging on Yavari's sleeve. She levels her gaze at him and he drops his hand hastily, wishing he could reach up and scratch at his horns sheepishly, but rather starting to think that at this rate Yavari might just hogtie him, with the mood she's in. "Oh, Ms Yavari, my head is in such a futz."

"Dizzy, or in pain?" she asks, though her dark eyes don't look up from her inspection of the handgun.

As though to make his point for him, Clubs's head gives a throb - not quite hurting, but close enough that he squirms. "Both, I think."

A resigned sigh, and Yavari sets down the cloth to hand him a glass of water that's been sitting on the bedside table, and then a tablet of what looks like aspirin. "You took quite a blow to the head, sir," she says, her face unreadable as she watches him gulp down the medicine and the water.

And, well - he must have! It's as good an explanation as any for the way Clubs can't concentrate past the tip of his nose without his head feeling like it's got one doozy of a cramp; he hadn't even known heads could cramp! The water in his mouth helps soothe the dryness in his throat, at least. "Where's Diamonds?" he asks. He starts talking too soon, though, and water dribbles down his chin to splash on the pillow. Then, when Yavari harrumphs and says nothing - "Or Hearts? Were we attacked?"

The door in the far wall swings open before Yavari can answer him, and both she and Clubs look over, Clubs in curiosity and Yavari with a stiffness in her neck that probably means she's on edge. But the only person who walks in is Diamonds - which is a relief! Clubs does hate waking up in strange places, and he and Diamonds get on passably well, when she's not horribly frustrated with his muck-ups, so he tends to trust that either she or Hearts will always have an explanation for these things. They're good coworkers. "You're awake," she says, the click of her heels muted by the carpet as she crosses the room.

There's something strange. Clubs can feel it as another, quiet pulse of pain in his head, though the aspirin helps mute it. For some reason, he thinks that he used to look at Diamonds differently. But when his mind tries to wander its usual paths, he keeps getting tugged back around to worrying about the fact that he's here in this room, and not out on his mission for the boss. He's supposed to be going to keep an eye on the Condesce, one of the Crew's main financial and political assets, and a murmur in his head keeps whispering that if he doesn't hurry, something awful could happen! It really is a very important job, after all. Maybe his head would stop hurting and his horns would stop aching in sympathy if he got up and went about doing something.

Then Diamonds tilts her head at Yavari, a small jerk of her chin, and Yavari stands to leave so that Diamonds can settle herself on the vacated chair. It's more obvious now that this is one of Diamonds's safe, secret places, because the chair is high enough that it suits her long legs more than it did Yavari. Yavari goes to the door and walks through, but no matter how Clubs cranes his neck to blink after her, he can't see much in the room beyond except another door in the far wall, possibly the one that leads to the outside. These safehouses tend to have few obvious points of entry, but more than a few secret ways to leave, on account of Diamonds is sort of paranoid about stuff like that.

"Diamonds, I need to go," he starts out immediately, babbling a little, because that tends to happen when Diamonds is around, for some reason. "I don't know how long I've been asleep, but I must be so late by now! Oh, the boss will not be happy about this...why didn't you wake me up sooner?" Usually Diamonds is so good about keeping Clubs on track! "I need to - I really do need to go -"

"Will you be quiet?" Diamonds interrupts, irritation flickering across her face. "You're not going anywhere, you wooden nickel."

"But I have to!" Clubs says, sitting up. He knots his claws in the sheets, and realizes that he's not even in a suit; just plain black pajamas. "Orders is orders, Diamonds!"

"And I am giving you an order to lie back down before I gotta make you do it," Diamonds says, her voice sharpish and cutting. Then, before Clubs can argue some more, her voice goes - funny. "You're not hitting on all sixes, so lay off the goddamn fidgeting. The boss knows. You've been taken off duty."

Clubs blinks, and looks down at his claws. "Oh," he says, a little embarrassed. Diamonds is on top of things, as usual; he shouldn't have been caught so wrong-footed by it. The relief of it helps his head stop aching, even, because why would Diamonds lie about something like this? He can't believe he'd forget something as important as being taken off the mission! He starts twiddling his thumbs, ashamed. "Sorry 'bout that. My head hurts something fierce, Diamonds."

"I'll handle that, too. God knows, you'd only fuck this up worse if you started running around like a chicken with its head cut off," Diamonds sniffs.

Clubs nods, still mortified, and spies one of her hands in the corner of his eye. The right one - and here's something odd - it's all bandaged up, with a black splint that wraps her wrist right up under the edge of her sleeve, laced around the back of her hand with extra material supporting her ring finger. It's odd...odd because...his mind tries not to wander down the path, but it's odd, and for a moment Clubs stops thinking about his messed up, aborted mission, because he can't remember the last time he saw Diamonds with a splint, or a lot of bandages. One of their last missions together - oh, it must have been weeks and weeks ago, now! Time sure does fly! - she'd nearly got caught in an explosion when Clubs mistimed a detonation, and he'd felt really bad about that. But even though she complained a lot and gave him a good lecturing on the misuse of C4, Diamonds was tough enough that she hadn't even bothered bandaging the burns for more than a week.

Whatever happened that Clubs can't remember and that Diamonds is hurt this bad, it must have been a real kerfuffle! "Did someone get the jump on us?" Clubs says, apprehension overtaking his shame. His claws itch to move, and he worries for a moment before, with the sensation of something untwisting in his head, he can no longer stop himself from reaching out to grab at Diamonds's hand, trying to inspect it and only realizing how silly that is when all he can do is poke at the splint.
Unlike Yavari, though, for once Diamonds doesn't yank away. "You could say that," she says, inclining her head. When Clubs looks up, puzzled, he notices - he notices -

He doesn't notice anything. It's probably rude of him to be staring at Diamonds like that, anyway! And he tries not to be rude, these days. He needed to be a lot more responsible and considerate about that sorta thing, so people won't get so annoyed at him. He doesn't know nothing about nothing!

"But I will deal with them myself," Diamonds says. When Clubs tries to pull away, the splinted hand twists around with all its usual dexterity to clamp down on his wrist. Clubs starts to regret the way that he couldn't really pay attention when Diamonds walked in, because as he looks up, startled, he realizes with unease that Diamonds looks - he can't help but notice, honest! - well, let's just say if he saw that look on a troll, he'd think they'd gone feral, in the throes of coldblood dementia. Her eyes look glazed and feverish, and there's an almost savage, smug twist to her smile that usually only turns up when Diamonds is about to give someone a good drubbing. "You're not well, after all," she continues, and this time, when Clubs tugs his hand away, she lets him go, lounging back in her chair in what would be her usual elegant posture...if Clubs weren't becoming increasingly aware that there's violence, taut and simmering, in the way Diamonds holds herself, like she could snap at any moment.

And yes, she always has that brutal, vicious streak. Diamonds really does have quite the temper, when she's not being a professional! But Clubs hasn't seen her this close to violence when she's not in the middle of a strife since - since he can't even remember when! The only people in the safehouse are the two of them and Yavari, and Clubs can't imagine for the life of him why Diamonds would be so mad at either one of them.

"There are some people I need to track down," she is saying, when Clubs pays attention again. "The situation is rather complex, and I'm sure with your limited brain capacity you'd just get confused." Another vicious, biting grin, and Diamonds rises to her feet, reaching up to adjust the cinch of her tie with a deft twist, smoothing the edges and tucking it into her jacket. "Now, all you need to know is that the boss has ordered you to remain in this safehouse until I can...take care of some business." Her stare turns considering, some of the near-mania draining from her face as she frowns down at Clubs. "Is that clear, you damned, bumbling idiot?"

"If the boss says so!" Clubs agrees, without needing to think about it. What the boss man wants, the boss man gets! He bobs his head in a nod for too long, probably, and too earnestly, which he's trying to be better about.

But Diamonds doesn't even look exasperated, which is her normal mood when she and Clubs tend to be in the same building. In fact, she looks almost pleased! "Good," she says, reaching into the inner pocket of her suit jacket and fishing out a pair of deep green gloves, drawing the first one over dark skin and the second over the splinted hand without flinching. "We're all in danger. The last thing I need to deal with is you getting it into your fool head that you should be wandering around when you've been ordered not to."

Well, there's no worry about that, now! Clubs would never dream of disobeying such a specific order. But now he perks up his head, curious. "In danger? From who?" Presumably the same people who hurt Diamonds's hand, and who must have knocked Clubs for a loop, but who could it be? Most of the other gangs and mobs who used to cause a ruckus when the Midnight Crew came to town have backed down or relocated since they joined up with the Felt, so it must be someone new and bold! It has the potential to be very exciting, and Clubs will grumble endlessly if Diamonds and Hearts get to have all the fun dealing with these hooligans.

"No need to worry about it. I've got it covered," Diamonds says, with a stern enough scowl enough that Clubs sighs and lets it go. Instead, he purses his lips and flops back against the pillow - which is a mistake, as it gives his head another woozy turn - and wonders why those gloves seem so familiar. Diamonds doesn't repeat a lot of articles of clothing - she has her favorite hats and guns and things like that, but she really is a stickler, and she only breaks out different colored gloves when -

Clubs changes his mind and sits upright, letting his legs dangle over the side of the bed. Someone has removed his shoes and - yes, these are really nice footie pajamas, but he can't imagine Diamonds ever demeaning herself to ever lay a finger on footie pajamas, so it was probably Yavari. "Are you going to torture someone?" he asks, curious.

Because colorful gloves mean torture. It's a rule! And really, Diamonds's tight-mouthed smile in reply is all the confirmation he needs.

"Incoming," Yavari says, her voice low, leaning in from the other room. "Confirmed it's Marlowe."

"Check again." Diamonds is on the move even as she says it, pivoting and crossing the room to tap a finger on the dark wood paneling of a counter. A tiny light starts flashing, and Clubs thinks it must be a security device, though he can't see it from here.

Yavari puts her head to the side, one hand to the length of cloth covers her ear as she murmurs something, and then nods again. "Confirmed with backup codes."

Clubs looks back and forth between Yavari and Diamonds, feeling a little more worried as he realizes how long it takes Diamonds to make up her mind. She's paranoid, but really, Clubs can't recall if she was this paranoid even that first time they faced off against the Felt, when the time-manipulating gang was a mystery and not at all their friends. He can't remember her putting her assistants through this kind of rigmarole before! There's a part of him that wants to be even more worried, but it doesn't yammer very long before his headcramp distracts him again.

But sure as fiddles, Diamonds eventually gives a curt jerk of her head and taps the counter again. The door that Clubs thought was the entrance stays closed, while a bookshelf on the left wall of the bedroom smoothly slides open - like something out of a proper whodunnit! - and one of Diamonds's taller assistants sags into the room. He's a newer one, and if Clubs musters up the brainpower, he can remember that this guy held Diamonds's umbrella for her when they met up a while ago, while he was chasing the Witch. Time sure flies!

Now, though, Marlowe has a distinct limp, favoring his left side heavily and scanning the room with darting eyes. When Yavari tilts her head he meets her gaze and something silent passing between the two assistants, before the man's lip twitches. "Teach me better than to let down my guard around carapacians again," he says, shaking his head.

Yavari's mouth almost twitches into a smile, too, her arms folded over her chest as she clicks her tongue and ducks back into the far room.

"Hello!" Clubs says, by way of greeting, putting as much cheerfulness as he can rally into it, because Diamonds is just in a weird mood, and Marlowe seems so earnest as he limps gamely into the room, the bookshelf sliding shut behind him.

"It's still functioning?" Diamonds demands before Marlowe can answer, prowling around her subordinate as though one wrong word or move could set her off. It almost makes Clubs's head hurt worse, seeing her so on edge, like there's something he should be doing...but he can't puzzle out what!

"As near as I can tell, ma'am," Marlowe says, hefting a microwave-sized package that rests on his hip. He stands at attention, but the effort of meeting Diamonds's standards for manners takes a clear toll on whatever injury is hurting him; he's already broken out in a sweat from the effort. "I'm not...an expert with this sort of technology, though. Its settings haven't been altered, and I've made sure to touch it as little as possible."

"Good." Diamonds says, brusque and short, even though surely this is good news! Uh, whatever it's even news about. Clubs can't really make out anything about the package except that it's rather large and probably heavy, judging by how much effort it's taking Marlowe to haul it around - him being a fully grown human, and all. "Any trouble?"

"None, ma'am." The man's face hardens as he sets the parcel down on the counter where Diamonds impatiently gestures, with a cutting slash of her hand. "Really, this thing - the effect it has - no one would so much as look at me on the way here."

The smile Diamonds allows herself is small, but still too close to a snarl, teeth flashing. "That's the point of it," she says. "To avert wandering eyes. Do try to keep up, dear Marlowe." Her voice cuts like knives, sharp enough that Marlowe goes sheet white, like he's realized exactly what mood his boss is in - and just how fine a line there seems to be between Diamonds as his boss and Diamonds as she could be, if someone doesn't wrangle her back down into some kind of sanity.

It's finally enough to propel Clubs out of bed. He doesn't care how much his head aches (and it does protest, pretty painfully, in fact). He determinedly powers through it to touch a claw to Diamonds's elbow.

Because Diamonds is supposed to be cool! And calm, and collected, and professional around her assistants, and angry and cruel only when she's fighting someone or committing some new felony. But now it seems as though one side of her has slurred into the other, and Clubs doesn't know much, but he knows that she should be calmer.

Why did he ignore what she looked like when she walked into the room, earlier? He noticed it, but he didn't say anything, or try to distract her from it. Isn't that what he would normally do? Gosh, he can't sort these things out anymore…

He beams up at Diamonds's instant scowl, because that's normal. Yeah! That's how these things usually go! "There, there," he says, patting her arm as well as he can manage. "I'm sure it will all get better soon! No need to be so mean, Diamonds…"

She stares down at him, incredulous, and Clubs finds himself noticing more and more things. Like the fact that she's not wearing her hat, and that's just plain nonsense! Her face looks strained, too, the lean, wolfish look she gets when she's gotten caught up in one of her convoluted kidnapping schemes and doesn't remember to eat extra to make up for all the stress. "You -" she starts, and then she visibly has to swallow down whatever she was about to say next, Adam's apple working. "You buffoon. You don't even know what's wrong," she says at last, her expression strange and mixed up.

"Nope!" Clubs says. "But I'm used to that. I know you can handle it, Diamonds. And once this headache goes away, I'll get right back on the ball to help yah!"

A long silence follows, which is okay. All Clubs can hear is the odd thrum of the parcel on the desk, and the faint shuffle of Yavari's pacing footsteps in the other room, and that does wonders for the cramp in his head, actually. Better still, Diamonds hasn't pulled away yet, so Clubs gets to keep patting her arm for once. Perhaps she's feeling better! Or maybe worse. Ooh, it's hard to tell, with someone as contrary and cranky as Diamonds Droog -

Without any warning at all, the stabbing pain bursts into his head again, a burst of agony that pangs through his horns and centers on that twisting, sharp knot that has taken up residence in his poor thinkpan. "Owowow!" he says, clapping both hands to his head to try to keep it from cracking in two.

...What was he doing?! Diamonds doesn't like being shooshed! How could he be so dumb and silly and unprofessional! Clubs whimpers, almost in tears. He can't even think why he'd make such a fuss over Diamonds when all it does is distract them. His mind curves off to one side, refusing to let him think about another time, another place, another life -

He is just absolutely sure that his head would stop hurting if he didn't think about all this and instead got about his business and headed out to Virginia for his mission. Why isn't he there already? He really should get going. The more he thinks about it, the better he feels about the idea.

Before he can try to wander out the same way Marlowe came in, though, Diamonds laughs. It's cold and humorless, and when Clubs raises watering eyes full of milky brown tears to look at her, he sees that her face has lost that feral edge and replaced it with familiar, bright eyed scorn. "If you believe that," she says, "then you're just as insipidly stupid as ever." She straightens her sleeve with a brush of her gloved hands, and then clamps a hand down on Clubs's shoulder. "I should not find that as reassuring as I do, but hell, here we are."

"Well, as long as you're feeling better," Clubs says, smiling at her distractedly. They need to go. "We should get back to work, though, really!"

Sharp fingernails dig into his collarbone before he can wheel around to look for some clothes. "No. Your orders are to sleep. Bad enough I have to coddle you like a bumbling toddler - at least try to emulate the attention span of a goddamn gnat," she says, shoving him back towards the bed with an unrelenting grip.

Ah! Right! He'd forgotten about the new orders. Almost instantly Clubs can feel sleepiness creeping over him, and he bobs his head in a nod. He's very aware that both Yavari and Marlowe musta heard him mess up, and he starts tapping his claws together guiltily. "I forgot. I'm sorry, Diamonds, you know I don't have a head for these things."

"No. You don't. And no doubt your incompetence will be the death of me." Another shove, and Diamonds lets him go. Clubs climbs into bed himself, sternly telling himself on the inside not to scrape or pick at the sore spot on his scalp. He's gone a little bleary-eyed with the constant pain of it, and it feels like there's some rowdy bunch of bozos playing jump rope in his head. But when Yavari returns, her hands glistening with green blood because she's forgotten to wear gloves like Diamonds does, to pour him another glass of water, the thought that seems to emerge in the aftermath is the calm, unbreakable certainty that has carried Clubs for years past counting.

Diamonds will sort everything out. No mere headache can convince him otherwise.

Even if she is acting very peculiar, indeed.

---

Karkat is making a concentrated effort to make this work. And by make this work, he means not giving in to the urge to reach out and snap Dave Strider's asshole sunglasses in two.

Because the thing is, Karkat is almost 80% certain that the spectacular example of go-fuck-yourself sitting across from him at a diagonal has fallen asleep sitting up. But fuck if he can tell with the sunglasses in the way. Dave just kind of stopped responding when Karkat snapped at him for being obnoxious, pulled on a set of headphones, and slumped down a little, his annoying mumblesphincter an inscrutable line that for once isn't overflowing with nonstop word vomit. Fuck, he's almost halfway tolerable like this - except that Karkat is instantly suspicious that the human's not actually asleep, and is in fact attempting to fuck with him in some new annoyance gambit behind the fucking shades.

But when the hour mark ticks past, and then the second, Karkat has to concede that maybe the walking vomit-volcano of smarmy bullshit is legitimately in some kind of coma. He expected this trip to be nightmarish and tedious and possibly end in his demise at the hands of the fucking Condesce (seriously, why is this trip even happening), but he never expected to get skeevied the fuck out by Dave not talking for hours.

Fuck. The silence is getting to him. The lack of a base level amount of verbal nonsense is somehow unnerving. Karkat can only spend so long scrolling through news sites and assorted forums before that just starts making him want to throw his phone through a window - when it gets to the point that he's shaking his head over vacillating real life celebrity couples (Justin and Jessica seem have to gotten their shit together in the flushed quadrant but god, haven't they all heard that story before...) he's forced to admit that his efforts to avoid paying attention to whatever is going on with the investigation in Seattle are too obvious to be effective in any way, shape, or form. There's some ongoing news coverage about exploratory recovery efforts in the Ukraine - apparently people have stopped dying, and everyone is incredibly confused by this, but they're trying to avoid saying anything for certain until they confirm the massive death swamps are in fact receding. Go figure.

Some good news, though: apparently the Condesce hasn't been spotted around DC in the past couple of days, and is rumored to be off plotting her next one-celebrity KO in the wake of the ex-Kardashian app smackdown (may Kim rest in pieces). Good riddance if she is - they might still have a shot at talking Feferi down from Operation Saboatage Some Random Shit and Get Ourselves Culled Because Why Not. SSRSGOCBWN in polite company.

Around the third hour Karkat stops being discreet about his phone usage and tries to switch from texting John on the sly to dialing the number to call him. The flight attendant must have some sort of sixth sense, because he barely thinks about it and suddenly she's sauntering over with an entire assortment of shitty pretzel packages and other inflight snacks to foist on him with the kind of bland customer service smile that reeks of 'try that fuckery again and I will pleasantly and agreeably make you ride in the cargo hold for the rest of the flight.' She also tries to chat him up with some spiel about the company that owns the stupid plane and Harley's grand-lusus/ecto-lusus/whatever the fuck is going on with humans and their familial relationship networks right now, but Karkat's not that desperate.

Not yet.

-- carcinoGeneticist [CG] began pestering ectoBiologist [EB] at 12:06:30 -- CG: I THINK HE'S BROKEN.
EB: wha?
CG: DAVE. HE HASN'T MOVED. NOT A WORD OUT OF HIM IN ALMOST THREE HOURS.
CG: I FINALLY HAVE THE CROTCH BLISTERING GOOD FORTUNE TO BE FREE OF HIS FACETIOUS JAWING, AND I CAN'T EVEN SAVOR THE MOMENT BECAUSE I'M HALF SURE HE'S STILL JUST FUCKING WITH ME.
EB: he's not on his phone or anything?
CG: NO.
EB: huh. can you check if he's still breathing?
CG: OF COURSE I'VE FUCKING CHECKED. HE'S JUST SITTING THERE.
CG: MENACINGLY.
EB: he probably just zoned out again. he does that on planes sometimes, i guess!
EB: it's probably not that big a deal. he just doesn't really like flying.
CG: OR HE'S FUCKING WITH ME.
EB: :/
CG: DON'T MAKE THAT FACE AT ME, JOHN, YOU KNOW HE DOES IT ON PURPOSE. ALL THE FUCKING TIME.
EB: you know, there's a simple way to tell if he's just dicking around or not...
CG: ...IS THE WORD 'PRANK' GOING TO BE INVOLVED IN THIS SOMEWHERE?
EB: a totally sweet prank!
CG: NO.
EB: come on!
CG: MORAL HIGH GROUND, JOHN. MORAL. HIGH GROUND.

He lasts all of ten seconds. He'd last longer because he is a stalwart example of self-control, obviously, but there are outstanding circumstances here. One factor working against him is that his suspicion that Dave is pulling some extended fake-irony trick is too strong; the other is that this might be the first prank John has suggested of his own accord in days. Karkat didn't know if John would ever want to so much as hint at things like pranking or jokerkind again, after the fuckery his dad put him through.

CG: OKAY FINE, WHAT HAVE YOU GOT FOR ME?
EB: don't worry, this one is really simple and barely stupid at all.
EB: what you need to do is get something really light and balance it on his nose.
CG: AND WHAT DOES THAT FUCKING ACCOMPLISH?
EB: well if he's awake, he'll probably stop faking and start flailing around a lot! confirming that he's messing with you...
EB: and if he's not, you get to spend the next two hours or so watching him zone out with something silly on his nose!
CG: JOHN, I LOVE YOU DEARLY, BUT THAT IS SO INCREDIBLY STUPID THAT IT MAY YET WIN AN ACADEMY AWARD IN A CATEGORY MADE UP JUST NOW AT THIS MOMENT TO ACCOMMODATE 'REALLY FUCKING STUPID PRANK IDEAS.'
EB: you're totally doing it, aren't you.
CG: OF COURSE I AM. WHAT ELSE AM I GOING TO DO WITH ALL THESE EMPTY PRETZEL WRAPPERS.
EB: haha, rose says to send her pictures if it works :D
CG: WHAT FOR?
EB: probably blackmail material or a funny phone background or something.
CG: FINE, I CAN GET BEHIND THAT. HOW ARE YOU, ANYWAY?

Karkat has to put the phone down. This is a delicate operation. On the first try he can't quite get the angle right; the pretzel packet slips and Karkat gags on a swallowed curse as he yanks his claws back and waits with his heart in his throat for a reaction.

But Dave is apparently out. Karkat glances around guiltily and oh joy, the flight attendant is motioning at him from the back of the plane - fuck, she's trying to give him tips through silent hand signals, why is this his life right now - and goes in for round two, changing the angle of the packet ever so slightly until, at last, it balances along Dave's nose and over the bridge of his sunglasses.

Not a fucking peep out of him, either. Which means he probably is just asleep. Fantastic. Karkat inches back into his seat warily, but Dave doesn't even twitch.

EB: oh! we're fine!
EB: just hanging out with roxy and jane. dirk is kind of trying to be everywhere at once right now...
EB: Jake tried to escape again, through the vents this time!
CG: WHEN DOES ESCAPING THROUGH THE VENTS EVER WORK IN REAL LIFE?
EB: I don't know, he almost made it! He just severely underestimated how wide his shoulders were. Like I know I couldn't fit through the vents here without a lot of work!
EB: Anyway we caught him when he ran into Wv in there.
CG: FUCK. NO.
CG: WHAT HAPPENED, IS HE ALRIGHT? FUCKING SHIT ON A STICK JOHN TELL ME THAT STUPID ALIEN IS OKAY.
EB: Oh, the mayor's fine! He did the sparky spark thing and kind of made part of the ceiling vanish, so they both fell on top of Roxy.
CG: THE MAYOR?
EB: Yeah... just something I remembered from before!
CG: WHAT, THAT Wv WAS A MAYOR? GOD I DON'T EVEN REMEMBER IF THAT CAME UP BEFORE IN THOSE STUPID TAPES. DID YOUR TRASH GAME SESSION HOLD A DEMOCRATIC ELECTION TO SET HIM UP AS FRIENDLEADER SUPREME AND I BLANKED IT OUT OF MY MEMORY OUT OF SELF-PRESERVATION?
EB: No, he just liked to pretend he was the mayor of all the little towns he built. He really liked alchemizing cans and stuff.
EB: Also he led an uprising against the monarchy before I met him.
CG: WHAT.
EB: He has really strong opinions about the right to self determination of the common man. Er. Carapacian.
CG: JOHN, HE CAN'T EVEN FUCKING TALK.
EB: He's working on it! We tried giving him a phone so he could text but now he's busy teaching himself how to yell at everyone in rapidfire gibberish or something so he doesn't want one.

Karkat has to put the phone down again, for an entirely different reason. He pays homage daily to his righteous despair at the many stupid ways the universe seeks to fuck with him with more unceasing regularity than Dave himself, and yet somehow... this. This still surprises him.

EB: But other than that nothing too exciting has happened.
CG: I'M NOT TALKING ABOUT RANDOM ASS 'EXCITING' SHIT, JOHN, I'M TALKING ABOUT YOU. HOW. ARE. YOU.
CG: THAT WAS ALREADY A TANGENT FROM HELL, DON'T YOU DARE TRY IT AGAIN.
EB: I'm fine! Jeez, Karkat! You guys have only been gone for a few hours, not even I can have a meltdown that fast.
EB: The most wild thing me and rose have done is gone outside and let Wv go to town on the road with chalk.
EB: Otherwise he starts drawing on walls, and floors, and vital scientific equipment that's really hard to replace...
EB: I didn't realize Jade did so much work wrangling this guy until she was gone! :/
CG: BUT YOU'RE NOT ON THE VERGE OF A FUCKING EMOTIONAL BREAKDOWN, HERE.
EB: No... I'm alright. Still just tired a lot. It's kind of boring!
CG: I'D RATHER HAVE BORING THAN 'IN THE MIDDLE OF ANOTHER FUCKING CRISIS AND NOT TELLING ME ABOUT IT.'
EB: No, I think I learned my lesson about that!
EB: I don't know. I'm just gonna see how it goes.
EB: I think now that I had time to process everything, it doesn't hurt as much?
CG: WHAT DOES THAT EVEN MEAN?
EB: Like I spent so long making myself not think about it that actually made it hurt more the longer... time went on.
EB: but now that i'm thinking about things, it's not as bad as i always believed it was...does that make sense? i think i'm rambling.
CG: KEEP DOING THAT, THEN.
EB: like everything was really awful, i'm not gonna lie!
EB: but dealing with it feels like a relief. really, really shitty relief, but relief.
EB: anything’s better than how i was.

That almost does it. That's almost enough to make Karkat force the pilot to turn this stupid plane around and go back to Seattle. He should still be with John right now.

CG: AND THE CANDY NIGHTMARE DOPPELGANGER?
EB: haven't heard anything! maybe we'll get lucky and it'll just go away on its own.
EB: but then again, i can't remember hearing it a whole lot before, either. i think it can be really sneaky when it wants to be...
CG: WE'RE NEVER LUCKY. IF YOU AND ROSE GO FIDDLING AROUND TRYING TO GET RID OF IT, BE FUCKING CAREFUL, ALRIGHT?
EB: she hasn't said anything about that...but yeah, i'll let you know if i hear anything weird. or think anything weird? i don't know.
CG: ALSO, THIS IS ME TELLING YOU OUTRIGHT IN PLAIN FUCKING ENGLISH THAT IF YOU DO END UP GETTING PANICKED AND SHIT, TALK TO ROSE.
EB: ??
CG: YOU FUCKING HEARD ME.
CG: THERE'S LITERALLY NO ONE ELSE FROM YOUR RIDICULOUSLY CODEPENDENT HUMAN FRIENDSQUAD OVER THERE, SO SHE'S YOUR FUCKING PILLAR OF EMOTIONAL SUPPORT. SHE BETTER HAVE HER GAME ON FUCKING POINT.
EB: really? because, uh...
CG: WHAT.
EB: you got kind of mad when dave showed up. because he was worried about me. and stuff.
CG: THAT'S BECAUSE DAVE IS A TOOL. A MASSIVE, MASSIVE TOOL.
EB: okay good point.
EB: but still!
CG: ALSO BECAUSE I'M APPARENTLY A TERRITORIAL JACKASS. WHICH IS AN AWESOME THING TO HAVE LEARNED ABOUT MYSELF.
CG: BUT I THINK IT'S PRETTY FUCKING SAFE TO SAY THAT YOU DON'T INTEND TO FLIP AND START PLYING LALONDE WITH SNICKERDOODLES AND PILES OF SUGAR CUBES ANY TIME SOON, SO IF YOU TWO END UP NEEDING TO HAVE ONE OF YOUR HUMAN PLATONIC FEELINGS JAMS, DO NOT TEAR YOURSELF UP ABOUT IT. I'M DONE WITH BEING A RAGING SHITHEAD ABOUT WHO YOU TALK TO ABOUT YOUR EMOTIONS IN A PLATONIC FASHION, I PROMISE.
EB: unless it's dave?
CG: HE'S AN EVASIVE SHITSTAIN AND I RESERVE THE RIGHT TO BE HEALTHILY SUSPICIOUS ABOUT HIM.
EB: wait that's still actually a thing?! dude, i thought you two were bros now!
CG: YES, HE AND I ARE BROS, BUT THAT INVOLVES HIM BEING AN ANNOYING ASSHOLE TO ME 24/7 AND GOING SPORADICALLY PALE FOR YOU. IT'S ALSO WHAT HE CALLS HIS LUSUS. THE WORD HAS VARIABLE DEFINITIONS AND YOU CAN'T TELL ME HE DOESN'T CASUALLY CHA-CHA DANCE AROUND QUADRANTS FOR THE HELL OF IT. THIS CONCEPT OF 'BRO' IS SKETCHY AS FUCK AND I REFUSE TO TRUST IT.
EB: omg. please tell me you're not going to interrogate him while you're trapped on an enclosed metal tube thousands of feet in the air.

...Yeah, kind of.

CG: DON'T YOU BACKSASS ME JOHN.
CG: I WILL CONCEDE THAT HE IS, IN FACT, ASLEEP AND NOT DICKING WITH ME AT THIS EXACT MOMENT, BUT THAT MEANS NOTHING.
CG: EVEN WHEN HE GIVES ME A STRAIGHT ANSWER HE DOES IT IN A WAY THAT IS INCREDIBLY SUSPICIOUS.
EB: i think that's just the paranoia talking. and the fact that you've had three hours to let it stew. because when you guys left i thought you were getting along okay...
CG: MAYBE. OR MAYBE THAT'S WHAT HE WANTS YOU TO THINK.
EB: ///////////////////////////////////////////////////
CG: ANYWAY THE ENCLOSED FLYING METAL DEATH TRAP ASPECT IS PERFECT. IT MEANS THE BULGECHAFING DICK CAN'T ABSCOND LIKE A COWARD.
EB: ooooooookay...yeah, i think you're just bored. please don't toss each other out the airlock?
EB: i can't make you two get along, but i'd like for both of my best friends to come back in one piece!
CG: YOU'RE NOT THE FRIENDLEADER ANYMORE, REMEMBER. ROSE CALLED DIBS.
EB: sigh! rose says both of you need to come back in one piece, too.
   -- thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] has joined the chat! --
TT: And if you so happen to provoke my dearest brother into spilling the proverbial beans about anything, I expect a full report.
TT: My brother is a study in contradiction and pseudostoic attempts at repression, but alas, he has also caught on to my wily attempts to delve into his psyche on the sly. I require all the sources I can obtain if we one day wish to understand the mind of David Strider.
CG: I MAKE NO PROMIFUCK, I THINK HE MOVED.
TT: Oh, don't let us keep you.
CG: WAIT, HANG ON.
CG: LOOKATTHISSDOUCHEBAG.jpeg
TT: Ah, yes. Excellent work. I think Mother might like to see this one.
   -- thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] has left the chat! --
EB: heheheh, i told you it would be hilarious!
CG: SURE, CHALK ONE UP FOR THE PRANK GAMBIT. NOW PARDON ME WHILE I DEVASTATE THIS SORRY MOTHERFUCKER. <>
EB: <>

The interrogation does not go as planned, but Karkat is inclined to blame that on the interrogated, not the interrogator, here. Or okay, maybe he just sucks at this, like he sucks at basically everything else he's ever put his mind to. What matters is that Dave snaps out of his bizarre naptime with a barely perceptible twitch - and then the pretzel packet is gone in a tiny blur. There's not even a crunch of plastic to mark its passing. If Dave reacts at all, it happens too fast for Karkat to appreciate it.

And naturally, the conversation starts out focused, then dovetails nicely into complete and utter humiliation in the span of fifteen minutes of bickering. It's fucking tame compared to some of the dumb arguments they've gotten into in the past - most of them probably Karkat's fault, since he was being a pissy sleep-deprived fuckhead for most of the past few weeks, and he cringes at just how bad his already poor impulse control got during that period of time - but it's still stupid as fuck.

Frankly, it's amazing. Or it would be, if Karkat weren't the one making a fucking ass of himself.
"Shit, I don't know what to tell you," Dave says, his face perfectly blank. It's so fucking annoying. Words have not yet been invented to describe how annoying it is. "Other than yeah, me and Jade were messing with you. But we had, like, honorable intentions and shit."

Seriously, Karkat can't fucking wait to hear what excuse they've come up with for this dunderfuckery. After hours of sitting bolt upright while asleep, Dave's slumped over to the point that he's almost horizontal, one foot tapping a beat against the seat across from him at a diagonal - the one right next to Karkat, in other words. He can feel every tiny beat like a jackhammer to his rageglands.

But the goal here is to not escalate this. "Fine. Awesome. You and Harley win whatever weird Karkat-baiting contest you've got going on." Another tap. Karkat stares at the ceiling and lets the fascinating whorls of the dinky overhead lights distract him - and another foot tap god fucking piss balls shit fucker - Karkat snaps, "Okay, cut it the fuck out! Pissing me off can't be as stupidly entertaining as you're so determined to make out with me to be!"

Dave's face turns the color of vanilla pudding, and he was already pretty vanilla to begin with. Karkat's shoddy excuse for a thinkpan, meanwhile, takes a full five seconds to process he's just said - and then he smacks both hands over his mouth, horrified.

"Oh, hell no," Dave says, sitting part of the way up and yanking his foot back. "You did the thing. Oh my god, if Rose were here right now -"

The raw embarrassment feel like it's turning Karkat's face the brightest red it's ever gone. People might actually be able to see the candy red through his skin at this rate; his pores might as well be oozing blood everywhere. "Shut up, shut up, shut up." God, why did past-him have to open his mouth.

"Oh my god, was it all the dick puns? Did that seriously, like, get you hot under the collar or something?!" Dave starts babbling, which makes the whole situation about 120% more stupid than it already was. "What do I have to do to make you believe that dick puns were not actually a come on-"

Dave cuts off...and then starts shaking with silent, snickering laughter because oh for fuck's sake.

"Fuck, I did not mean - will you stop that?" Karkat snaps, when Dave just keeps wheezing with laughter. "Look, you've said you don't want anything pitch with me and to be completely fucking honest, I somehow managed to scrounge up enough self-respect from the bottom of the slurrybarrel to not want anything pitch with you, of all people -" Dave opens his mouth, presumably to say something disingenuously provocative, but Karkat's on a roll now "- but you cannottell me you're not deliberately trying to piss me off, and maybe that's platonic for you but it's coming off really fucking strong to me. So this is me. Asking you to please, just. Just tone it down."

Dave shrugs. He's still laughing, the bastard, and he has his phone out for the first time in hours, which means he's probably texting a liveblog of this to someone. When is this guy not texting?

"Dude. Karkat. We did tone it down. Way the hell down, on account of we're not total dicks and you and John were having recovery week or whatever." He reaches up and starts scratching under the line of his collar, but before Karkat can start listing the ways the two of them have been antagonizing him over the past week under the guise of being 'helpful' or 'a distraction' (fuck that word), he shrugs again. "After a point, this is my basic personality."

Ugh. Karkat feels a low grumble echo through his chest, and his mouth works for a second, but the thing is, he knows. He's come to terms with the fact that John's friendtype tends to be 'mouthy assholes' - almost everyone in their circle qualifies in some way or another. Dissatisfied, Karkat folds his arms over his chest and hunches in, wishing he'd just had the sense to not open his mouth. Maybe he and Dave could have traded off pretend comas and gone the entire trip without speaking. That would have been ideal, why is he only thinking of this now? "Well, your basic personality is obnoxious," he mumbles.

"Really? There goes my dream of sweeping the Miss America pageant." Dave slumps back down in his seat. Then he tilts his head to the side and sits back up, realization dawning on his face. "Oh god, have you been thinking about hate makeouts with Jade, too?"

This isn't happening. "Sorry. As far as this conversation is concerned, we are now parked squarely in the shut the fuck up zone."

"You totally have, oh my god." Dave shakes his head and lifts his phone; his thumbs don't move for a long moment, though, before he sighs through his nose. He lets the cellphone drop into his lap with an inscrutable noise. "There."

Karkat glares at him. "There what?"

Dave makes jazz hands. "That was me not texting Jade. Or Rose, who would have a field day with this. Are we cool now?"

For fuck's sake. "One act of you abstaining from rampant douchebaggery doesn't miraculously make everything 'cool,' Dave."

"But we're cool."

"Anything to make this conversation stop." Karkat tucks his feet up onto the seat with him - he considers switching seats entirely and just putting an entire plane between the two of them so the noxious amount of raw humiliation have time to clear the air, but honestly, it's gotten as worse as it's going to. Why bother at this point.

Dave won't let it go, though. Because Dave isn't familiar with tact. "No more square shenanigans?"

Karkat rolls his eyes. "Don't fucking flatter yourself."

"Sweet."

-

If nothing else, they've got their shit together by the time the plane touches down at Reagan. Together enough to hopefully fool Feferi Peixes, anyway.

At least half of Karkat's thinkpan is informing him that there's no guarantee that the person they're going to meet the heiress; in fact, the odds are this is just some random troll off the internet that Karkat had the misfortune to pester and who then decided to play him for the ultimate sucker. If that is the case, the only thing that can possibly salvage this train wreck of a situation is that neither Karkat nor Dave paid a fucking cent for the flight out here, and they can fly right back with minimal hassle. The pilot might give them shit for it, but the pilot is a limp fronded stooge who started threatening to do a barrel roll if he didn't get the last thing of pretzels, so fuck that guy, anyway.

But there is someone crossing the runway on foot when they disembark, which is marginally more than Karkat was expecting. The sky overhead is overcast, with a faint drizzle that sticks to the exposed skin of his hands and face like mist; Karkat thinks it might have been warmer back in Seattle, but oh look. Wearing a hoodie seven days a week has its perks. Dave flashsteps down the stairs like the freakout weasel he is and looks ready to hug the ground or something equally seconhand-embarrassment inducing, but he doesn't get the chance before the figure starts rushing towards them, the hood of their white jacket buckled around horns that seem eerily familiar, dark hair spilling out in tiny, bead-studded braids.

"Karcrab, Karcrab! Over here!" Feferi Peixes calls, even as she crosses the last few yards at a jog. She barely spares Dave a curious look before she comes to a stop, adjusting wide-rimmed fuchsia goggles before putting out a claw and shaking Karkat's before he can blink. Fuck, is her hand cold - like dunking his claws in a cup full of ice water on a cold winter day. Even if his sense of déjà vu didn't start wigging the fuck out at the sight of her, he'd have no doubt this was her; temperature-wise, she feels like what the deep sea looks like. "Oh, I'm so glad you cod come!" she says, the fins of her ears flaring enough to puff out the sides of her jacket hood. Her cheekbones look sharper than Karkat remembers from random talkshow interviews and public appearances, with freckles stark against grey skin that's maybe a shade too pale to look healthy, but she laughs with her whole body, her eyes bright, nearly pink, and she's so, so familiar. "Don't worry, this shoaldn't take long at all!"

That pun was fucking weak. Karkat keeps his mouth shut, on account of he's not quite stupid enough to bad mouth her puns in person while he's in stabbing distance. "Uh. Sure. Whatever." What the fuck else was he going to say? He had this planned out, but look at how fucking useful that is right now. Wait, he remembers - "Mostly we came to try to talk you out of being a fucking moron. So, there's that." Off to his right, Dave starts nodding in agreement, because Dave is a dick but he also understands that this is first and foremost an intervention, not an excuse to be a dick in public.

Feferi blinks at him with the wide, uncomprehending eyes of a goldfish - and then she starts laughing again with the teeth of a shark, some of the sharpest Karkat's ever had a troll bare at him in his fucking life. Karkat can't help the vaguely panicked look he throws at Dave, silently screaming for backup. Somehow, this is both more and less intimidating at the same time than he thought meeting a tyrianblood would be but those teeth are the equivalent of smacking his amygdala with a freshly severed arm and screaming at him to run for his life. "Oh Karkat, you doofish!" Feferi says, rolling her eyes and tugging on his hand. Karkat means to stand his ground but Feferi barely exerts any visible effort at all and he nearly gets yanked off his feet; it's only then that he gets just how careful her hold on him is, that she could probably snap his fingers like sea-bleached bones. "Don't worry, me and Glubby have been pracfishing the tricky part, so we know exactly how to make this work. Anyway, if you only came all this way to try and talk me out of it, why would you come at all?"

"Because when you try to persuade people not to do stupid fucking shit over Pesterchum, they have this tendency to agree with you and then go do it anyway," Karkat snarls, trying to pry his hand free. He might as well be flapping his hands at her for all the good it does. The jet plane landed and taxied close to the edge of the airfield rather than near the rest of the incoming traffic, and Feferi's strides carry them right along back the way she came. Just a flat strip of pathetic, yellowing grass lies between them and the waterway - what is that, anyway, the riverfront? The bay? He can't fucking tell, he's too turned around. Common sense is telling him they're facing east, but the sight of the waterline makes him think they're back home, where water would mean west, usually. "How about we just hold our hoofbeasts for a hot second and consider, I don't know, not walking up to your ancestor and poking her with a stick until she decides to serve us as hors d'oeuvres at her next party?"

"Dude," Dave mutters, right in Karkat's ear. He's keeping pace with them despite the fact that he doesn't have a tyrian-blooded powerhouse to haul him around by the wrist. Instead of helping Karkat drag Feferi to a stop - where is she even going? Literally the only thing in the direction she's headed is the river - Dave hovers at Karkat's side like the world's most useless hummingbird. "Can you hear that?"

"Hear what?!" Karkat hisses back. He plants his foot in a hole in the ground covered by grass and stumbles, while Feferi sails on ahead.
"Whatever," Feferi says, oblivious, shrugging her shoulders dismissively. "I already said we wouldn't go fight her head on - just for you! Glubby'll take us as close as she can, and we should be back before dark here. Piece of roecake!"

"And you really think the Condesce won't catch on to the fact that you're the one going around trying to wreck her shit?!" Karkat says. When Dave doesn't add anything to the secondary conversation he decided to start in the first place, Karkat elbows the human in the side. "Hear what, you dick?"

"Well, she'll probably suspect...but if we do this fast enough, she won't be able to prove it!" Feferi pauses. "Did you say somefin else, Karkat?"

Shit. "No, nothing. Never mind," he says, ducking his head and glaring at Dave with all the power in him without lifting his face.

Dave's still mulling over whatever was so important he felt the need to bring it up right now. "It's like if a migraine could talk," he says, finally. Great. That makes zero sense at all. When Karkat lets his glare naturally intensify to express how few fucks he has to give about this, Dave's forehead wrinkles, and his eyebrows come together in an outright frown. "God, where have I heard this before...I'm serious, man, I think something is -"

"And here we are!" Feferi says. Even though they've hardly walked anywhere. The airport is still right the fuck there. All they've done is gone to the river bank - and Karkat's still not even sure if it is a riverbank, or just a really skinny section of Chesapeake Bay. He didn't think he really needed to brush up on bodies of water in the DC area today, but now this is just starting to piss him off.

There's a gross sheen on the surface of the water as they near it; at first Karkat assumes it's just the clouds overhead draining the color out of everything, but the closer they get the glossier the river looks. He's heard something about the Potomac being pretty fucking nasty even on a good day, but if this is that pollution Feferi wouldn't stop nacking about and blaming on the Condesce, he can see her point - the river look sickly and swollen, lapping up into the grass and leaving mucky pits when it recedes, as regular as breathing. Tiny dead fish wash up on each ripple. "Okay, that's disgusting," Karkat says, digging his heels in. "Feferi, stop for two seconds, you're gonna walk right into-

Feferi doesn't stop. Her feet skim the top of the water and don't sink in an inch - which, yeah, is a thing Nymph can do. Right. It's not a thing Karkat can do, so he gives one last yank on his arm, feeling like his shoulder might dislocate, and finally wrenches himself free from Feferi's death grip. This leaves him at a really fucking inconvenient angle, poised to topple into one of these filmy puddles of mud soup, but at the last second something knocks into his shoulder and shoves him back onto both feet. He whips his head around, but Dave has already gone back to skulking, the only sign that he might have almost been caught in the act of being helpful the fact that he now has one of his hands pressed to a temple, frowning in either concentration or outright consternation.

"Usually I can clear stuff like this right out," Feferi is saying, walking on water further out into the river before coming to a halt with her hands on her hips. It's only then that Karkat really processes what she's wearing because it's - not usual. Feferi Peixes is a fucking fashion icon; he knows next to nothing about how anything more complicated than a hoodie works, as Kanaya has been quick to tell him over the past few days, but he can tell that Feferi looks almost...drab. His head keeps picturing someone in pale blues and greens and pink and golds, but Feferi's in almost all white, from her unseasonably thick jacket to her tights. "But this stuff just keeps filtering in more and more! I have the pull to get a moratorium put on people visiting the beaches or jumping in the river willy-nilly, but that's no good with all the seadwellers in the area having their homes half-flooded with the stuff! I guess my powers aren't strong enough to beat whatever the HIC is using to cook this up."
Karkat can't help the face he's making right now. Thankfully, Feferi appears more interested in dipping her toe into the gross river slime than noticing his healthy skepticism. "And you're absolutely fucking positive she's the one making it? This isn't just, you know, regular spring time sludge for DC?"

"Who else could?" Feferi's face darkens, her lower lip pressing forward in a moue. "I cleaned the river out when I first got here - and now, this happens and I can't make a dent in it! There was someone who might have been a witness...a carapacian, actually. But it took off in a reeeel hurry when I tried to ask what it meant about the Condesce being involved. Since then, me and Glubby have been busy scoping out her local factories and other interests, but it was only when she left the country this past week that we realized she might be manufacturing it elsewhere! It seems like an awful lot of work for her to go through, shipping it back all this wave, but this is the Condesce we're talking about here..." With that Feferi sticks her tongue out in a silent raspberry.

Karkat is still hooked way the fuck back on 'left the country.' Oh, she cannot be serious. "Left the country?" he repeats, incredulously, loud enough that he probably can't just excuse it by saying he was shouting to be heard over the sound of another plane coming in for a landing behind them. "Remember that part when you said this would only take, like, a day? What the fuck, Feferi?"

Feferi just rolls her eyes at him, her expression patronizing. Her head tosses a little, like maybe she meant to toss her hair, but her hood is still up. "It'll be fiiiin, Krabsnack," she says, dragging the words out like he needs them slow. "Glubby and I have got it all taken care of. You and Daveid will just be along for the ride, mostly."

"Dave," Dave says, which might well be the first thing he's actually said to Feferi.

"Shore, shore, whatever you say." Feferi's staring distractedly downriver, now, one foot tapping on the surface of the water and sending little droplets of filmy dark water splashing up onto her boots. "We can leave in just a moment!"

Ha. Karkat likes how now she's just kind of assuming they're going along with this. Coldbloods can get that way, when they think they know what's best. He can already tell his sarcasm gland is going to get a fucking workout today. "Please tell me this sounds as far-fetched to you as it does to me," Karkat grinds out between his teeth, not daring to move his lips too much, as he elbows Dave in the ribs again.

Dave just turns his head, enough that Karkat catches a glimpse of red side-eyeing the tyrianblood in the river, and shrugs. "Do we even get to make judgment calls about what counts as 'far-fetched' anymore, man? Maybe troll ladies outsource their river pollution production all the time, I'm not gonna judge."

Whatever. Dave can be as fucking naive as he wants, while Karkat can be the voice of reason in the face of two complete imbeciles. Like that's anything new. "Really? You can't think of any original arguments that might talk her out of this?! Because the more I argue, the more she apparently thinks I have no idea what I'm talking about-"

"Hngnghk," Dave says. It comes out a faint, wheezy gasp with a click at the end that actually comes remarkably close to approximating the fourth conjugation for the Alternian word 'to make use of the body of an opponent as a weapon in combat,' meaning that Karkat is temporarily thrown for a fucking loop because Dave couldn't speak Alternian even if he replaced his brain with a dictionary or three. Never mind that beating someone up with the body of a beaten opponent might actually count as an diplomatic tactic back in the day.

But the next words out of Dave's mouth are, "Oh, fuck," before he seizes Karkat by the shoulder and bolts.

Karkat goes along with it in a blind panic. His backpack of emergency supplies, slung over one shoulder, jolts him in the side with each step, before he thinks to wonder what the fuck they're running from and looks back over his shoulder. "JESUS MOTHER OF SCREAMING FUCK!"

He's in time to see a tentacle the size of the Washington Monument rise up out of the river, blanched and lusus white against the washed out grey of the sky. Feferi stands dwarfed beneath it - and then wraps her arms around the thing in a hug that can't even reach all the way around, giggling like a fucking maniac.

Please, please, fucking please, let that not be her -

"Glubby! We're ready to go now! Karkat's here," Feferi announces, chipper as anything. "And he brought a friend!"

"That's her lusus," Karkat groans. Why is he not surprised, this is the worst fucking possible thing he could imagine. I mean, fuck, all tyrian lusii are things out of fucking horror stories, the absolute worst of the worst that the deep sea has to offer (frilled sharks and viperfish are bad enough in their natural habitat; giant versions of them are fucking nightmare fuel incarnate).

But somehow, with a name like Glubby, he thought it would be somewhat less...unspeakably terrifying? But no, looks like he should have been thinking along the lines of tentacle monster larger than a national monument, haha, fucking hilarious. The universe is having a merry fucking shortle over this one.

"Not a lusus oh god we're not running fast enough," Dave says all in a single breath; Karkat's eyes snap back to the back of the human's head because Dave shouldn't sound like that - he's supposed to sound like a smug dick, not like someone just barely keeping his shit together. "They won't stop screaming - we need Rose - oh my shitballs Karkat, you still can't hear that?"

They're almost back to the airfield; Karkat nearly falls flat on his face when the ground clips out from under him, but Dave keeps an even tighter grip on his shoulder than Feferi had on his wrist, hauling him upright again. "Okay, maybe we should have explored the implications of 'oh my tyrian lusus will be helping us, no worries.'" Dave throws him a look that is openly contorted with disbelief, but Karkat finishes, "But I don't think it'll eat us if she doesn't tell it to! Jesus fuck, you'd think you were the one raised in the fear of other peoples' custodial beasts..."

"It's a thing!" Dave yells. Which totally clears that up. Not. When Karkat tries to stop (he can hear Feferi calling their names quizzically, now) Dave starts waving frantically with one hand before he seems to remember how to use words that make sense. "Like what got Rose in New York - the death noodle monster things - shit, you weren't there, you don't - can you not hear that?"

"Hear what?!" All Karkat can hear at the moment is the blood pounding in his eardrums, and Dave's heartbeat - faster than Karkat's ever felt it, not that he pays much active attention to anyone's pulse but John's - and, more distantly, Feferi's...which is...a little...fuzzier...

He's only trying to feel for a pulse; they're far enough away that with his powers' shitty range he couldn't do much else, anyway. But what he gets for his trouble, heard out of only one ear (or maybe only one side of his thinkpan) runs something like:
That -

For a moment, Karkat can't piece thoughts together - and then a moment of pure, unadulterated rage forces itself together to produce a coherent sentence, because seriously -

"Is Horrorterror really that hard of a word for you to remember?!" Karkat screams. He doesn't mean to draw attention to them, honestly, but right now his brain is doing a sprightly rendition of the traditional 'GET THE FUCK OUT OF HERE' screechhymns, and his default volume control is minimal at the best of times, let alone when he's in the process of adding Feferi + Horrorterror-lusus and coming up with some farcically large exponential equation that equals their fucking doom and Dave fucking Strider says things like 'death noodle monsters' instead of the actual fucking name in the middle of a fucking emergency.

Either way, Dave doesn't have time to defend himself (which he fucking couldn't), and heck, they don't even make it halfway back to the jet plane. This is because the jet, at some point, had to start taxiing away and is now much closer to the row of terminals and loading gates than it was five minutes ago.

But it's also because they probably couldn't have outrun this thing in the first place; when the tentacle lashes out and slams against the ground with an earth-rattling thud, it stretches and curves in a wide arc further out than even Dave could probably have run without Karkat's ass slowing him down - and then lashes back at them in a single sweep, curling in on itself so that they're surrounded on all sides. Dave skids to a stop and then lunges to the side, pulling Karkat along with him, but the ground only clips out from under them once before the tentacle closes in.

Karkat expects to get slammed, hard; but at the last moment the pale tentacle flows and wraps around them in bends and coils, lifting them as neatly off their feet as if it were picking up fragile toys. Then it bears them gently back over to the river, and Karkat can only watch and dangle uselessly as the airfield recedes again. His arms are trapped, one down by his side and the other bent crookedly against his chest where he failed to raise it in time. When they reach her, Feferi just smiles and smiles, her eyes wrinkled shut by the wide force of her grin as she waits for them to be reeled back in and lowered to her level. She's sitting on another coil of lusus-tentacle like she hasn't a care in the world. Nah. Of fucking course not. She sends her mostly-likely voracious elder god lusus out to recapture wayward friends all the fucking time.

Why does everything go so wrong, so much?

"Hey, I know Glubby can be a little intimentadating, but there's no need to worry! She listens to me!" Feferi says, in what she must think is a tone of benevolent reassurance. She pats the curl of tentacle under her hand, and the filmy white skin twitches under her touch. "She's promised to be very careful with you guys, since you're not as used to her as I am! Bene?"

"NO, ACTUALLY, NOT FUCKING BENE," Karkat finds himself yelling uncontrollably. His arms and backpack are pinned to his sides, and he can feel the cold right through his layers of clothing, chillier than Feferi herself and this is not doing his hindbrain any favors when it comes to the kneejerk reaction to run away from the enormous, presumably territorial lusus in the vicinity. While Glubby has a good hold on his upper body (which is not at all reassuring in any fucking way whatsoever) his legs are dangling and exposed, and he can't fight the horrific flashes of what-if's that intrude on his attempts to think of a way out of this - like what would happen if Glubby decided to not be careful, and instead reach out and detach his upper body from his lower body. Fucking shit like that is what'll keep him up at night, even if they get out of this miraculously in one piece.

Dave, dangling off to one side, on the other hand, has managed to get an arm loose - fat lot of good it's doing him, when he's hanging upside down, but he does manage to slam his shades back onto his nose before they can fall into the water below. Which, if you're a complete and total fucking shitgargler, is probably a really important task to accomplish and all. Then he starts gamely trying to stab Glubby in the tentacle with a broken piece of shit sword that he pulls out of - Karkat misses it, or something, but he just assumes Dave keeps swords hidden everywhere, because the asshole never seems to run short no matter how many snap in two. He manages to jab the swordkind into the horrorlusus's pallid flesh, and a line of dark, brackish blood starts to well up around the metal - only to drop into the water below.

Karkat can't even say what makes his eyes follow the blood instead of trying to wriggle his way loose, but he watches in mute fury as the blood hits the water and spreads out in slimy, iridescent ripples.

It looks remarkably like the pollution that's already there. What a fucking coincidence.

Ha.

Fucking.

Ha.

Well, at least now Feferi's monochrome outfit makes sense. She's clearly done a fucking swandive off the nearest cliff into villainhood, and played him and Dave for the dumbass chumps they are. No, actually, scratch that - Dave can't be blamed for this. Karkat's the stupid, stupid fuck who bought into the whole 'please help me fight evil' thing to begin with.

"No, none of that!" Feferi says, swinging her legs up on the tentacle and jumping over to the tangled knot that's wrapped around Dave in an effortless bound, reaching down and touching the wound with a look of petulant concern. When she splays her claws over it, the skin starts to seal together again, without coagulation or a scab. "Clam down, you guys, she's just gonna -"

Dave tries stabbing in another place - doesn't even try to aim for Feferi, which is...probably smart, all things considered - but the moment the blade sinks into the lusus's tentacle the whole thing jerks. Karkat tenses up, thinking they're about to be dunked in the probably toxic river water for fun times; then Dave starts wheezing, his heart rate shooting through the fucking roof, until Karkat finally notices the way the coil wrapped around the human is slowly contracting. Karkat cringes internally, anticipating the crack of bone, but it never comes - the broken sword vanishes instead and Dave closes that hand into a fist, waiting with a stiff expression for the Horrorterror to loosen its grip. Feferi's expression smooths out into something like pleased satisfaction as she watches this, and finally she lifts her head from the sealed over wound and turns that smile on Karkat once more. "There! We're all fronds here, aren't we?"

There's a foul taste in Karkat's mouth, but it's also gone so dry with utter terror that he couldn't spit even if he wanted to. "So the whole Condesce shtick was a fucking lie," he says, using his chin to indicate the river below. When Feferi just cocks her head to the side, puzzled, he grits his teeth. "Your horrific lusus is the thing causing all this pollution - oh my fuck, it literally just bled more of it everywhere right in front of us. Did you think we would just go along with this fucking charade like a bunch of sad sacks to help you go piss of the Condesce over something you did?!

"What are you talking about, Karkat?" Feferi says. She actually has the nerve to peer down past Dave at the water, adjusting her goggles again as though that'll make the faint trails of slime oozing off the lusus's limb stop floating out over the surface of the river. Karkat's just waiting to see what a fucking mess that slop makes of their clothes. His claws still feel relatively dry, so maybe there's not as much horrific sea monster sweat on the parts holding them captive, but that's no guarantee this thing won't start break out the slimier tendrils and start dousing them with ooze. Kanaya is going to be so mad.

"This thing is leaking." Dave says. Upside down, his grimace looks pained, but at least he's backing Karkat up on this for once. "Oh god. Tell me that isn't jizz. Hell, no."

On second thought, Karkat could do without Dave's idea of back up.

Feferi shakes her head, the smile slowly slipping from her mouth. The tentacle has started coiling again, and Karkat's stomach slowly drops into freefall as he realizes the airport appears to be moving away from them - or, rather, they're moving away from it. Surely someone has to have noticed the enormous fucking tentacle hanging out on the river, but no; Glubby starts carrying them downriver with no one even attempting to stop it. "Nooo, don't be silly," she says, tugging on one of her braids as she walks casually along the tentacle away from Dave. The lusus shifts to accommodate her, so she's almost looped back to Karkat by the time the Washington Monument vanishes around a bend in the river. Shit, are they moving faster? "Are you guys squidding around with me? Glubby has nothing to do with it!"

This is a load of barnacles. Wait. Fuck, now he's doing it. "It literally just happened! It's happening right now!" Karkat yells, kicking a foot furiously. He's doing his best to outline the filmy trail of seepage they're leaving in their wake, but Feferi doesn't bother following his gesture so he gives up. "We're! Not! BLIND!"

"Wait. Shut up," Dave says, cutting Karkat off before he can really launch his new tirade. "I think it's -"

"No..." Feferi says, almost at the same time, a low mumble as she leans over the edge of the tentacle. For a moment, doubt plays across her face. "That couldn't...No. No!"

When she looks at Karkat next, there's a cloudy film over her eyes like cataracts, her pupils so hazy and blurred that he doesn't think she can even see him. "Glubby has nothing to do with it," she says, but it's almost - mechanical. Like she's saying words someone else wrote in a script. "We're going to go meet up with the rest of Glubby now."

The rest -

Karkat looks down. Well, down and sideways. Just under the surface of the water, he can barely make out the rest of the tentacle that's holding them. There are no boats out on the river, maybe because of all the shit in the water, so there's nothing for him to get a good comparison with from this angle. He just - oh god. "Isn't this all of it?" Karkat asks, in trepidation. He already knows the answer to this one, but fuck. He has to try.

"Oh, no," Feferi says. She walks over to him, her steps jerky at first as though being controlled by something not entirely familiar with how joints work, and then smoothing out. She sits next to him, legs swinging over the side of the tentacle as she does, and smiles. Her eyes are pupilless and white as milk, almost totally opaque. "Glubby had to grow this arm especially long to reach this far inland! The rest of her is back off the coast, since she takes up so much space," she says, and then she bares a few more razor sharp teeth before tilting her head over to rest on top of his. "Don't worry. We've tidally got this under control!"

And with that, the arm continues to haul them further downstream, the noises of Washington DC fading into the distance as they pick up speed.

He can't even reach his phone from here.
There's no other traffic on the Potomac today. Even when they curve around a final spit of land and start coasting over what Karkat is fucking positive is the bay, racing along ever faster as the tentacle takes advantage of open water, there's not a single solitary other person in sight. They're soon speeding along to the point that keeping his eyes open makes them water and ache - when salt starts stinging his face, Karkat just closes them to slits, because his glasses are doing nothing to protect him and at this rate his contacts are going to blink out in a sluice of tears, and then where will they be? He'd come into this tentatively hoping that Feferi wouldn't be that bad - maybe even a possible friend like Kanaya, one who might remember more than he does and acknowledges the game happened - but like fuck does he think he can trust her with anything right now.

He doesn't think Feferi's been in charge here a long fucking while. She keeps up a constant stream of chatter, both with him (and occasionally Dave) and with her lusus, her eyes angular, chalk-white, and utterly blind to the fish bones and bleached jellyfish that rise up to bob in the waves kicked up by their passing. But no matter how many different ways he and Dave try to point out the truth or try to bargain with her to take them back to dry land, Feferi just shakes her head and shrugs, like they're speaking an entirely different language. This Horrorterror - is it even a real lusus? - has its tentacles so deep in her head Karkat's absolutely kicking himself for not realizing sooner. She'd believe anything it made her believe about the Condesce; she wouldn't have a choice. He doesn't think he's hearing half of what Dave is evidently picking up of their conversation, because the human is honestly turning a pasty greenish color (though that might be from the fact that he only just got flipped right-side up when they hit open water), but what he can make out makes his head throb. From what happened with Rose in New York, and from what they learned from those tapes, once a Horrorterror's decided to make your thinkpan its personal wading pool, it doesn't take long before things like sanity and rational thought just can't cope anymore. So on top of being kidnapped by this tentacle monster to some unspecified location in the middle of the Atlantic, he and Dave are going to have to figure out how to untangle Feferi. While Rose, their only fucking resident expert in how to deal with these things, is back home and unreachable. Even if one of them managed to pull a phone, they're at this thing's mercy - one dunk and all of their electronics are going to be shot.

Karkat is sick of it. Seriously, the whole 'molesting brainstems with dolorous flagella' thing is getting real fucking old. Between horrific gods and mindgrubs is there anyone involved with this godforsaken game that hasn't had holes punched in their brains?!

Also, the odds of him and Dave being eaten by a sea monster have just skyrocketed to completely unacceptable heights. The chance of being personally culled by the Condesce is now disappointingly low. Yes. Disappointing. He said it. Running into the Condesce would be preferable to what fresh fuckery is going right now.

"Here we are!" Feferi announces, after the most awkward, terrifying, yet still remarkably dull thirty minutes in Karkat's recent memory. They're out in the ocean now, there's no doubt - Virginia and Maryland got left behind a while ago, and now there's nothing but choppy waves around for miles. Karkat's only hope is that Feferi's been deluded into thinking the Condesce has set up something in another country - by fuck, if they have to play along with whatever scenario Glubfucker over here has planted in her mind to get back on dry land, Karkat will do it.

Unless it was all just a lie to get them out here to be served up as a late lunch.

But from what Karkat can see when he cracks his eyes open, still watering with reddish tears, they're just...floating. There's nothing here but the three of them and the resident giant tentacle. The water's too dark for him to make out anything beneath the waves. You know, aside from the fucking hordes of dead fish lying belly-up everywhere, sprinkled in with the earthly remains of what looks like dozens of larger animals and lusii.

"Wow. What a view," Dave drawls. Karkat knows that inflection in his voice - it's the 'I'm going to be a reckless fuckwad and start talking shit at the worst possible moment' tone. "Look at all that water. And sky. I'm getting all choked up over here. Where's my camera, I need to take a shitty hipster pic. And add filters. So many filters."

...Fuck it. "Why am I not surprised," Karkat says, rolling his eyes as hard as he ever has. "The dead sea life aesthetic would be exactly the kind of thing you blog about ironically."

"Don't hate it 'til you try it, man. You've got to walk in my photographic shoes before you can judge.
It's all about ambiance." Dave pauses. "And filters."

"You two are so crabby today!" Feferi comments, but she sounds indulgent rather than genuinely offended. "Ah, but no worries. Once we get there, we'll be having too much fun for you to complain!"

They move again, lowering down towards the water this time. It's just as filmy and iridescent here as it was on the river; maybe more so, actually, because in a certain slant of grey light, Karkat thinks the dark of the water looks almost white and sallow. "Feferi, enough fucking around," he says, swallowing hard as he desperately tries to see where the rest of Glubby might be. There's nothing there. "Where are we going? Because I know you're not fucking in control right now, but we can't breathe underwater so holy fuck don't let your lusus drag us under."

Well. That's not entirely true. But no fucking way is Karkat testing whether his pathetic excuses for gills could sift through the kind of toxic waste the Horrorterror's filled the ocean with. For that matter, unless the human's has been hiding something pretty fucking big from the rest of them, Dave wouldn't last long in the water here, either. Dave dying is not a good thing, no matter how infuriating he gets.

"You say the oddest things, Karkat, really." Feferi almost dances around the place where Karkat's trapped, sliding a little down the incline formed by the tentacle into the sea. At the last minute she brakes and starts walking on the waves, neatly adjusting to the swell and ebb of the water with each step. "Anyway! Russia!"

Karkat waits a beat. Two.

Dave appears to have lost control of his face.

Karkat says, after a few more beats spent uselessly waiting for Feferi to laugh and tell them the punchline, "I'm sorry, did you say Canada? Or maybe Mexico? Yeah, that's what I thought you said."

"No, Russia," Feferi says. It's the kind of unrelenting salvo that sinks an entire nation's worth of naval vessels. She kneels and dips a claw into the water, pale eyes closing. "Do you need your ears checked, or somefin?"

"I don't think she's joking." Dave pries at the coil holding himself in place, still aghast, and Karkat takes a cue from him and does his level best to wriggle an arm free; neither of them are making much progress, but it's the thought that counts, alright? It's obvious that the unspoken plan to wait and make a run for it when they hit dry land again just got shot down before it even left the ground, and is now on fire but still taxiing on toward the end of the runway. "Ohhhh, piss."
"There! These should get you guys down to the level we need to reach." Feferi stands up and waves them down - not like they have any choice. She's done something to the water because it's gone oddly concave. Deep pockets of air have sunk down into the waves and the water can't seem to spill over into them. "Cause of the pressure and all. Me and Glubby were very particular about the dimensions!" She claps her hands. "Now! Andiamo!"

Karkat has enough time to chant a nice round of "Nononononono," before Glubby dumps them into the hollow pockets of water, without ceremony or warning. He spies Dave flounder wildly for a moment before there's a thin wall of dark water between them.

When he expects to hit water, he hits - something elastic. "Fuagh?" he says, peeling his face off the thing he landed on and looking around, feeling thoroughly fucking abused by this point.

It's a bubble. He has to put out a claw to prod at the curve of the wall, but even when he realizes too late what a stupid idea that is, he can't push through the surface of it; the bubble just gives under his hand, and then reforms when he moves it. At first he can hardly see anything outside it but the rush of dark water; he only realizes they're moving again (down and fast) when the bubble begins to glow a faint, radiant pink. It illuminates an absolutely tiny circle of the ocean around him - enough for him to squint and see the neon pink glow of another bubble, and the gleam of a pair of fuchsia eyes as they blink at him, then blink out again. Feferi's a slip of white, barely visible in the gloom.

...How much air do they have in these things? Because down does not equal Russia. Down mostly likely equals them being eaten.

They might not really travel all that far down. Karkat's sense of scale is a dead, rotting corpse, by this point, because he's spent all morning flying on a plane and being yanked across the Chesapeake like a dog on a leash. But they must reach a certain depth, because Glubby decides now would be a good time to show itself. At first Karkat doesn't realize what the sudden pale, faintly luminous lines are, through the pink of the air bubble he's been popped into.

Then he sees.

It's horrifying, yeah, but almost unreal enough that Karkat's thinkpan is happy enough to start whistling and pretending that what he's looking at isn't nearly as terrifyingly massive as his senses are screaming it is. Bigger than any sea lusii, bigger than any museum replica of a historical tyrian lusus; more and more tendrils just keep unfolding, shaking off the layers of silt that have settled on top of them and stretching out to reveal more still. It's more than a few football fields long, but beyond that Karkat can't even fucking begin to quantify what he's seeing.

\[ G \text{ r e e t } \text{ t u n g } \frac{1}{8} h s, \] something whisper-screams in his ear. If thousands and thousands of screaming voices could sound quietly smug, these do.

Well, fuck. Looks like the dark gods win this round.

"We're going now! Is it still intact?" Feferi's voice echoes through the water and through the lining of the bubble. Karkat catches a fleeting glimpse of her white clothes as she dives past, one of the other tendrils rising up to meet her. When he pulls his eyes away from the abomination of chaos unspooling along the floor of the ocean, he peers at Dave's bubble in time to see the antagonizing fuck try to shove his own hand through the elastic bubble.
Now Dave's hands are digging through his pockets - and he's pulling out his cell phone. No. Fuck no. Karkat wonders if screaming THERE'S NO SERVICE AT THE BOTTOM OF THE OCEAN will make any impact on Dave's one-human mission to prove stupidity is an art form, but he doubts he can figure out how to make his voice do what Feferi's doing.

Then his traitorous phone starts buzzing in his pocket.

TG: dude
CG: NO.
TG: okay so my logic is
CG: SHUT UP RIGHT NOW.
TG: if there's wifi in johns head
CG: SHUTUPSHUTUPSHUTUPSHUTUP
TG: there's gonna be wifi at the bottom of the atlantic
CG: SSSSSTTTTTTTTOOOOOOPPPPPP.
TG: its like
TG: game rules or something
CG: I WILL FUCKING PUNCH YOU IN THE DICK IN AN INCREDIBLY PLATONIC FASHION.
CG: NO. THERE IS NO EXCUSE FOR THIS.
CG: NONE. THIS IS JUST FUCKING UNBELIEVABLE.
CG: WAIT FUCK HAVE YOU TEXTED -
TG: already on it

Feferi is barely more than a darting speck in the water compared to her lusus. Karkat, torn between peeking out to see what the fuck those two are doing and trying to make his claws stop trembling long enough to type out something coherent to John, can't tell what's going on.

More light does the trick, though. Karkat fumbles and nearly drops his phone at the sudden flare, as lines and whorls and loops appear in the dark beneath them, in a familiar symbol the size of a least a small town, if not a city.
CG: JOHN FUCK
EB: karkat? what's going on? dave just started texting rose and something's messed up, he's not making -
CG: OKAY TH E IMPORTANT THING IS NOT TO Plumbthroat HERe
EB: why are you typing like that!
CG: DO NT PANIC BUT
CG: ME AND DAVE MIHGT BE BEING squiddlePPED
CG: A LITTLE
EB: you're not making sense either! i can barely read any of this, what's wrong with your phone?
CG: THERE'S AHHHHRRRR

With a sickening whine and a pop that makes his heart jolt, Karkat's phone sparks in his hand, and the screen whites out. The colors slowly fade back in, but -

He's not using Pesterchum any time in the near future.

There's no sign of the window he and John were talking in, and despite the fact that, over in the other bubble, Dave is clearly still attempting to use his phone, nothing else appears, either. Karkat doesn't think he could even navigate away from this screen right now; it might just crash altogether.

The asshole responsible for this fucking nightmare doesn't even have the gall to say anything more about it; Glubby just keeps inspecting the lines of the spirograph below with wandering tendrils, while Feferi comes to rest on another of the horrorlusus's sides.

"Ready to go!"

The bubble lurches under Karkat's feet. Dave maintains his balance, somehow, but Karkat lands hard on one knee before he catches himself, the phone flying out of his claws and lying pitifully on its back until he scrambles over and snatches it up. Feferi has a claw raised to reel them in. In an even more disturbing turn of events, as she draws them to bob on either side of her perch, Karkat can see that her eyes have fucking inverted or something - the pupils and irises are solid white, while the
He opens them, the ocean is brighter than he remembers.

His right eyelid feels sticky with salt or something; his contact lenses feel tacky and inflexible, like they would normally if they were ancient and he really needed throw them the fuck away. He raises his head (though he's not sure he remembers setting it down) and with a dull vmp one of his glasses' lenses just. Just gives up. It tumbles out of the frames, still intact; the other is cracked in dizzying patterns, and finally Karkat just pulls them off with a disgusted jerk. Without the glasses to help correct for what his colored contacts distort, he can't see for love or hate or money. It's all just a blur of deep blue - and then lighter blue - and then sudden, blinding white.

In a snap, both of the bubbles vanish. An unyielding grip catches his arm and lifts him up before the water can suck back into the vacuum, but Karkat's too busy acclimating to the fact that it's cold as the fucking pits of icy death hell. "Whoops! It's a little chilly, isn't it," Feferi giggles.

His eyes adjust to the light and if he squints things slide into nice, blurry, rage-hazed focus: the sun's low in the sky - too low, and distant and cold through the flossy clouds, but still glancing off the scattered fles of ice around them brightly enough to be a pain in the ass; Dave's dangling from Feferi's other hand, his shades shattered in circling cracks and his mouth the color of a bruise. "Oh man. Oh shit. That time difference, though," he says, sounding like he's higher than a fucking comet.

Oh, hell no. Karkat kicks him. He can't get up much momentum with the way Feferi is the only thing supporting their weight, here, and she's mostly holding them out on opposite sides of her, but he manages to nail the human in the knee and say, "No, you do not get to fucking space out on me, you useless time stoner!" Dave throws him a wounded look, chips of plastic trickling out of the frames of his sunglasses, but he also tenses up and stops doing his best impression of the world's only living brain donor. Feferi barely reacts; she just inches them away from each other, her arms unwavering as she continues to hold them up over the icy water.

It doesn't help. The air is cold enough that Karkat feels like the tips of his horns are going numb, down to the root, and neither he or Dave are wearing more than light hoodies over their uniforms. They're not dressed for weather below freezing like this.

Karkat clenches - his ears are starting to hurt - but Dave looks like he's biting back total agony; his head turns as Karkat watches, and now he can see there's blood flowing freely down the side of Dave's neck from his ears, smeared in the strands of his hair. When Karkat looks where he and Feferi are looking, he can just make out the shifting of enormous white tendrils tangling and retracting in restless motions under the water and ice. If the Horrorterror is still lying close to the sea floor, it's clear why it couldn't take them any.
closer to land, flat in the distance; there's just no more room without it beached itself on the shelf or breaking the surface. G of f o f rh, m o s t p r e c i o u s. Fe f e r i. F i n d w h a t. E t h y s h o t s s o d e a r e, a n d C R U S H T.T.

"Of course," Feferi says. More of her hair has spilled free from the hood, and now Karkat can see that many of the braids are frayed and undone, left to fall apart from lack of attention. She blinks, a momentary frown creasing her face, and when her eyes open they're normal again, the white draining away so that the regular fuchsia of her eyes are clear and the yellows burn through. "Are you two guppies ready for this?"

"No," Dave says, almost in unison with Karkat.

She shrugs. "Oh whale."

And starts walking towards the shore.

--

Elsewhere...

Spades Slick is sprinting across the street when it knocks him flat on his ass.

One minute, he's mindin' his own damn business, and then outta nowhere the blast of PANICDANGERFUCK blindsides him, a siren throbbing through his pulse, down into the marrow of his bones and the meat of his heart, and all he can do is snarl as he collapses. It's a thousand times stronger than he remembers it being not even a month ago - hasn't been this strong in a lifetime - and for a while (too long of a while) all he can do is huddle over in the middle of a crosswalk in broad daylight.

He shoulda expected as much after remaking the blood contract with the shit's living body. Spades is used to ignoring that punk's habitual fits of stupidity and panic, because all of those tend to get his blood pumping over a bunch of baloney and if Spades had gone running to help the brat every time he thought he was in danger, he'da never had a life.

This feels like a genuine omen. Like the slow-growing sense of 'that stupid brat's doing something life-threateningly stupid' that drew him to Seattle in the first place, but compacted into a single whammy that reaches out to Spades and shrieks at him to come help. Blood binds him.

God dammit. When the blood stops rushing through his head, Spades staggers upright, sourly casting a quick glance around to make sure she hasn't caught up. He thought he had more time to lose her before trying to circle back around to where all the action's been with his new crew, but hell. If he hijacks a car with a good set of wheels, he should be able to make Seattle in time to scrape the kid off the fucking pavement after whatever's going down.

He's only taken five steps before he realizes the blood's not urging him to Seattle. There's too much of a sense of distance to it; hell, this feels almost as distant as when he first felt it on another freaking continent -

Oh. He did not. Oh, that son of a b-

Spades missteps. He's been so good about that, too, fighting every instinct to skulk in the shadows like Dersites do because even the bright of direct sunlight is safer, at the moment. But he steps off the street and right into the shadow cast by the nearby speakeasy. He fucking well deserves it when the whip cracks out of the darkness to snap around his neck, for bein' as dumb as to step into the shadows when he knows she's on the prowl. He claws at it, teeth bared, but his claws can't even make a dent in the thin, wiry loops of the specibus, and when it tightens with a yank, sirens start goin' off in his own head.

SS: Ugh...Beat it, woman. I have to - hafta -

Another tug, and pain cracks across the front of his throat, the shell splintering open under the whip and putting pressure on the fleshy bits that he needs to breathe. But the burn of the voice that burns through his thoughts hurts worse, because this dame isn't fucking around anymore.

BQ: Oh, Spades. Please. Save your breath.

BQ: It's in such short supply, these days.

One last pulse of alarm cuts through the haze, but Spades is already down on one knee, wheezing. Yeah, yeah, Vantas has got himself into some shit and needs help again.

Whoop-de-doo. So does Spades.

 Doesn't look like either of ’em are gonna get it.

---

-- apocalypseArisen [AA] was pestering thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] at 00:00:00 --

AA: i wonder if you two will remember how to see clearly
TT: I beg your pardon?
AA: nothing! :) just talking to myself
TT: You're being rather disingenuous about this. Why all the convoluted artifice?
AA: i dont mean to come off that way
AA: its hard being a time player
AA: not that i would trade it for the world!
AA: but i have to watch out or i could let something slip too early ;)
TT: Spoilers?
AA: not on my watch!
AA: you may want a heads up though
TT: Oh? Do tell. I'm on the edge of my seat with anticipation.
AA: so keep your eyes open
AA: a rather lot of them actually!
AA: youre going to have some visitors soon
AA: now whos being disingenuous :)
TT: Do you do that on purpose, or is it really beyond your control?
AA: heheheheh sorry
AA: i would ribbit right now but you wouldn't get the joke for a while TT: How unfortunate. Is there any possibility that you might clarify who these visitors will be? When they might arrive? And where will we find the space to put them all?
AA: oh me and sollux and vriska and terezi should be there as soon as sollux finishes hacking something important
AA: the others might beat us there depending on how things play out
TT: Let me guess - other trolls from your session.
AA: correct :)
AA: you might want to stock up on more food beforehand
TT: I'll notify the butler. Which we obviously have.
AA: and more surgeons
TT: What.
AA: :(
Rose can sit still for hours, if need be. It's a useful skill to master when one needs to meditate to keep the balance in one's mind over the years. When they go outside (because as it turns out, it is easier to point WV in a new direction than to try to tell him a flat out no) she settles cross-legged in the grass by the side of the parking lot, breathing in and trying not to pay heed to the occasional pang when she looks to the side and expects to see Jade, or when her hand goes out to brush against Kanaya's. Those two are only a text away, if some emergency struck; Dave and Karkat would need to fly back the old fashioned way, unless they located some other form of transport, and the silence where they should be is enough to make things stir in Rose's mind that she's been trying to tuck back into their proper place since Leviathan's last assault on her mental space.

John sits next to her, with a lingering sigh, which would surprise her more if she hadn't been observing him this past week and tabulating what is new about his behavior and what was there all along, if only she'd thought to look. As the changes have persisted, in spite of John's rapid physical recovery, she's only become more grimly aware of how much pain he's been in. It's an impression belied by the rushing, faint giggles and whispers of excitement that Rose catches on the Breeze when it tousles her hair for fun, but not one she can deny. John is emotionally exhausted - more than that, even - and the moment the others leave his sight he sags like he no longer has the strength to carry himself. She'd thought he and Karkat had resolved something between themselves that might have eased the strain, but she should have known better. The kind of debilitating mental anguish John carries won't go away so easily as that; she saw just how deeply it rooted itself in his mind for herself. It could take years just to do the damage Samuel Egbert did, the tiny triggers buried in his psyche, let alone heal the trauma left over from the game.

They don't have years. Not with the kind of timeframe they're talking about, here. Only a few weeks ago Rose could have comfortably stated that they had over a month before the anniversary of the Reckoning - when, according to multiple apocalyptically-inclined sources, they're doomed to play out the game all over again. But they've lost an entire week to recovering from Samuel and the Midnight Crew's machinations, and suddenly there's barely two weeks and a few hours' spare change before John's birthday, and the end of the world.

She wants to have faith in their ability to pull themselves together and do something about the whole mess. But, as much as it galls her to admit it, one more blow like this one, and there's a good chance that many of them might not be able to get back up again. John is the most obviously vulnerable, but Rose is herself just as much one of the weak links in their collective chain. Jade and Dave are the most stable out of everyone - and honestly, just thinking that thought makes Rose shudder, as though she's tempting fate by drawing attention to them.

They still don't know what Scratch's endgame is. They have no idea how exactly the Felt play into it, or why they bothered cloning the guardians to create the Scratch kids, or what the consequences might be from the way two scratched game sessions have merged to form one singular universe. And the Midnight Crew - Boxcars, Clubs, and Droog, the three who helped knock down the first dominos that brought Rose, Jade, John, Dave, Karkat, and Kanaya all together in the same place - well, god only knows how they fit into the snarled mess that these potential threats and traps have become, working at cross-purposes to each other and unraveling strands just as they seem most relevant. She's supposed to be their Seer, but she can't see how she's meant to untangle all this yarn to knit it into something coherent, something that can see them through this madness and out the other side.
And even if they simply cut through the Gordian knot of these many problems, and somehow win the game, it would still involve their entire world being annihilated - and for what? To give birth to some ribbitting, cosmic tadpole of questionable viability that may or may not mature into a new celestial space frog? Would they simply become the distant gods of some new breed of sentient species in a galaxy far far away, destined to mourn the loss of everything they knew for however long god tiers live?

What is the point?

Rose steers her thoughts away from that particular dead end with significant effort. She's just woolgathering, now, not meditating. Her mental effort would be better spent shoring up new defenses in her own mind, or helping John, or ensuring WV doesn't transition from chalking up the parking lot to 'redecorating' some poor unsuspecting lab tech's vehicle.

That last one is particularly important, because WV is a menace. An endearing, frequently irritable little spitfire of a menace who may or may not have appointed Roxy the treasurer of the democratic micro-nation that is Lalonde Labs by shoving a piece of paper with a dollar sign on it into her hands last night, but a menace nonetheless.

Speak of the devil - WV has started to fill in an entire parking space with green chalk, bristling and throwing small tantrums whenever the chalk sticks snap in two, but other than that and the faint breeze, there's silence.

"Jonathan," she says.

"Rosathan," he returns, innocent as anything. When she arches an eyebrow at him in judgment, all he does is cough out a laugh, unapologetic.

She decides now would be an excellent moment to take vengeance for the wind-blown state of her hair these days, by reaching up and fondly mussing up John's hair until it's a rumpled, disheveled mass of cowlicks gone wild. This requires both hands to accomplish, and by the time John realizes what's going on it's too late for him to give more than a token protest, petulant as he folds his arms and waits her out. "I was going to ask how you were doing," she says, allowing herself just the faintest of smirks as she pats down one of the cowlicks sticking straight up at an incredible angle. "Holding up alright?"

"I'm fine," John says, an automatic response that appears to come to him as easily as breathing. "I just hope they'll be back soon."

"I do, too." Rose folds her hands together in her lap and looks out towards the lake. Its color today reminds her of the ink from one of her old gel pens, back in younger days when writing fiction of dubious repute in metallic, glittering silver-blue ink on dark pages gave her immense pleasure. She assumes most of it blew up with the rest of the house in New York, which is a shame; she would have liked to see the face Dave would make if she tricked him into reading it. John's face alone was priceless. "Have you given any further thought to my suggestion?"

John ducks his head. He's listing to the side, like a slowly capsizing ship, and Rose wonders if he even realizes. "I think we should probably not mess around in my head until everyone's back," is all he says, folding one of his legs up against his chest and hugging it there, chin resting on his kneecap. "Especially, uh - the sleeping guy. I know you want to talk to him, but also I'm still not sure how Dave found him and woke him up to begin with."

John's anxiety and various other mental traumas were hard to take in; the Trickster was just plain alarming, distinct from John's personality, yet so deeply enmeshed with his memories and madness that Rose has barely begun to understand how a mental construct could go so fundamentally wrong.

Typhus, now. Typhus is intriguing. Rose didn't have time for an in depth spelunking of that portion of John's mind, but the fact that he's somehow mentally linked to an immense creature of unknown power, and possibly has been all his life, raises far more questions than Rose can even start to sort through. From what she's gathered from the White Queen, all of them are meant to be similarly joined with their denizens.

But what is the purpose of such a connection in the first place? From what Dave shared of his conversations with John's denizen, Typhus didn't seem all that inclined to attack, or even to sabotage Dave's efforts to reach John in some subtle fashion. It just...helped. Grudgingly, but still. It aided John in the game as well, once freed of the grimdark corruption trying to twist all their minds, before apparently surviving the scratch in some form and falling back into a slumber.

It's probably too risky to investigate the connection between John and Typhus's minds, for now. Rose also wishes she could have wrangled either Dave or Jade - or perhaps even Karkat or Kanaya - and persuaded them to let her perform a cursory sweep of their minds for a similar link, which would at least pose less of a threat of provoking the Trickster into resurfacing. Understanding the denizens might be the key to winning themselves potent allies against Scratch's plans. But any attempts to communicate with Typhus will have to wait until John feels secure in his mental stability, which may not happen any time soon. There's always the Breeze, but outside of John's mind, it only reliably speaks with John himself; Rose can't get it to give her a straight answer for love or money - or whatever it is a sentient windstorm could possibly want out of life. It prefers tugging her shoe laces loose and gleefully waiting for her to notice before zooming back out the window.

It's strange, though. Something the whole situation strikes Rose the wrong way, like a mistuned piano wire. Because the only other minds that have ever linked to her own -

It troubles her. She cannot quite put her finger on why.

"At least the weather has cleared up," Rose says, after the quiet has stretched long enough. When John just hmms by way of response, she leans her head on his shoulder. "Nothing to say?"

John starts a little; a small enough twitch that she might not have noticed it under other circumstances. "No, I was just - thinking," he says, hastily, his voice threaded with guilt. Which means he most likely wasn't paying attention. He's got a habit of becoming lost in his thoughts, lately, no matter what tactics they've all used to try to distract him. "Weather? Yeah, the weather should be fine today."

Rose tilts her head back and inspects a bloom of white clouds that are low enough to brush around the tips of the mountains. Apart from that and a few other lacy stragglers, the sky is almost clear.

"And after that?"

John makes a face. "What do I look like, a meteorologist?"

Rose doesn't say a word.

"Haha, hilarious, Rose." A few seconds tick by. "I think it's gonna rain tomorrow and Monday. But only, like, drizzling."

"And it only just began to clear here. What a shame."

Rose considers her options for a moment, while John goes back to his brooding. She's not a trained therapist, no matter how many books on the subject she may read, and hinting at that sort of thing has only made John shut down in the past. Karkat has been peerless in helping to get John from sinking back into the mire of pain, but Karkat's no therapist either, and won't be back for hours, besides.

Coming outside isn't enough, clearly; Rose had hoped bringing him out into the fresh air would lift his spirits a little, to little avail. When they were children (before things became absolutely unbearable for John, she supposes) she can recall having difficulty keeping John from climbing literally every tree in sight, or wading into the lake just for the heck of it. He hid his powers from her at the time, but if Jade's any indication, he probably had trouble keeping his feet on the ground when he could be flying. He didn't lie back down in bed after the others left, but his energy's still flagging.

So. How to get John active and engaged again?

She can think of one way. It will mean the end of any hopes she had of maintaining some semblance of neatness today, but in the contest between her hair and someone else's well-being - it's not really much of a contest. There really isn't any way to secure her headband behind her ears more than she already has, so with any luck it will stay put. She presses it firmly into her hair one last time for good measure, then uses a hand to boost herself up from the ground. "Well, while the weather's nice..."

John watches her get up without making a move to follow suit. Then, after Rose waits with an expectant look, he gets up as well, his hands in his pockets and his expression tired. "There has been something I have been meaning to attempt," Rose continues, tapping the back of one hand against the outside of John's wrist ever so lightly; he takes his hand out of his pocket automatically and clasps hers so that she can direct them, putting some distance between them and the main laboratory structures. No matter how cautious Rose intends to be, the risk of knocking a receiver dish askew on the roof, and thus interrupting some presumably vital scientific experiment below, is not one she's willing to gamble on. Dave and Ambrose did something up there (Rose would guess sword fighting and senseless posturing were involved, given the nature of the two culprits) that drew Rue's sweetest, most passive-aggressive ire, the kind that used to take Rose weeks of grinding away at her mother's gears to provoke, and she's trying to avoid doing that for the foreseeable future. At least until Ambrose returns and they have some alternative pseudo-parental figure around to keep the peace.

Then again, Ambrose might well just hand Rose a sword and tell her to strife to resolve her and Rue's differences. As far as alternative pseudo-parental figures go, Ambrose is not exactly a paragon of 'peace.' Even 'pseudo-parental' might be a bit of a stretch.

"What do you want to do, Rose?" John asks as they cross the wild grass, into the stretch of slightly inclined dips and bluffs with nothing too scientific and/or expensive around to damage.

"Hiking," she ad-libs with a perfect straight face, until John's look of abject alarm causes her to crack a smile. "I jest, I jest, dear sir."

"We're still friends because of this. Because we make bad jokes like that. You and me have equally awful senses of humor and I hope it keeps you up at night," he says. "You know what I want to do?"

"Force me to watch a cheap bootlegged copy of Con Air for perhaps the thousandth time in our mutual acquaintance?"

Now he pouts. "How did you guess?"

Technically? Because it was his favorite tactic back when they were young, in part due to the fact that it sadly worked to drive Rose up a wall, particularly when they could have been rewatching one of Rose's collection of obscure psychological films instead. But Rose would be damned before she'd let on that it might still work; she doesn't need to hand him that weapon all over again. She can recite that movie line for line and regrets every iota of mental power dedicated to such an ignoble endeavor.
"Your pranks need updating."

He sticks out his tongue at her. "Con Air isn't a prank, Con Air is a way of life."

"I'm sure." Rose stretches her free hand over her head, up on the tips of her toes as she examines the sky through splayed fingers. She can't feel the Breeze at the moment, but of course it'll no doubt come circling around when it notices they're doing something other than sit. "I'd like to try to fly."

"I can use spells to levitate. It requires more effort than it's worth, generally." That and teleportation both necessitate time, magic, and concentration that don't always make them particularly serviceable in a fight; Rose is quicker on the draw where teleporting is concerned, but even then it's a far cry from the type of effortless jumps Jade makes without batting an eye. "From what I gather, players who reach the god tier obtain a native talent for flying. I've never tried flying without spells - logic and the laws of physics tended to persuade me against it. Thus the need to experiment."

"Huh. Go for it!" John says, letting go of her hand and stepping back. He looks excited, the most enthusiastic Rose has seen him in - far too long. As predicted, the Breeze rushes in only a second later, buffeting him and yanking at their sleeves with curious, wordless rustling. Rose is only ever half certain she's hearing those noises; from the way John rolls his eyes, he definitely hears more than she does at any given moment. "It wants to know if you want help, even though that would kind of defeat the point of the whole thing," he says, his voice rising a little in the last half of the sentence in order to be heard over a huffing gust.

Rose cracks her neck to the side and contemplates her options. "Well, I wouldn't be adverse to any advice it might have," she says dryly, probing her own mind in a quick sweep, scouring for any evidence of some heretofore undetected flight center of her brain. Really, where does one even begin? After all the rebuilding she's done, one would think she'd know her own mind inside and out, but she's never found any evidence of the ability to just float off the ground at will. Nor, for that matter, has she been able to locate any of the original memories of the past game that John's example would argue must be stashed away somewhere. "Any suggestions?"

"I don't know." John shrugs with a sheepish look. "I use the Breeze, which I think is...kind of a different thing? Breath players fly either way, I guess."

And Rose already knows the limits of what light magic can do for her in this instance. Mmm. She rolls up onto her toes again, wondering - if she just stretches far enough -

And then settles back, drawing a complete blank. John watches, apparently fascinated by her efforts, but doesn't say anything. The only real solution for this quandary her mind can produce is to just cast the levitation spell and have done with it. "I'm beginning to feel ridiculous," she admits, after two more subtle false starts.

Swinging back on his heels, John gnaws on his lip for a second, his eyes distant before focusing back on Rose. "Uh. The Breeze says, try aiming for the ground and then missing it." When all he gets is a blink, John clarifies, "The ground. You just...keep missing it."

"Life, the Universe, and Everything," Rose says. "I had no idea you'd read that book." John may be a genius when it comes to comic books, unironically awful movies, and the occasional (yet equally awful) anime, but even taking the movie adaptation into account, Rose doesn't think that quote would have turned up in any of those.
Sure enough, John draws a blank. "Book? I mean, it sounds familiar, but..."

"Never mind." Now that Rose thinks about it, technically it would have been the Breeze that decided to quote troll Douglas Adams, and she's not ready to follow that tangent through to its end. "As bold as the suggestion is, I don't think now would be the appropriate time for me to quite literally break my leg." Her feet meander in a slow turn. She pushes her hair back, pressing some of the strands of bangs that have grown long enough to start falling in front of her eyes out of the way. "I can't even think of how to get off the ground. How mortifying." She couldn't drop the hint harder if she tried.

"I could help with that part," he says. "And you totally won't break your leg, Rose, I'd catch you before that happened."

"Careful, John, your hero is showing."

He just huffs and holds out a hand, the other raised in a position similar to that needed to snap one's fingers. "I wouldn't let you fall. I promise!"

Rose nods and takes his hand. "Oh, I believe you."

John must take this as agreement, because the wind starts lifting them almost instantly. The moment Rose's feet leave the ground she starts to second-guess all of the choices in her life that have led her to this moment. It's not the same as it was in John's mind when the Breeze helped her locate everyone; then at least she had the comfort of knowing she was only present mentally.

But John's smile is radiant by the time they hit thirty feet. It's difficult to argue with that.

Now there's just the small matter of figuring out how to fly before he gets the fantastic idea to let her figure it out through the process of trial and error. "So, just say when," he says, still beaming.

She doesn't recall her shoes feeling this loose when they were flat on the ground. It's remarkably similar to the sensation of going on a swing ride at a fair and living with the existential fear that ones shoes could fall off and smite some poor unsuspecting soul watching from below. "That could take some time. This would be so much simpler if these blasted game functions came with an instruction manual," she grouses, her fingernails digging into the flesh of John's forearms before she catches herself and forces her grip to relax. "Really. Where is a well-organized, coherent walkthrough when one needs it?"

The wind carrying them does a lap around her neck so quickly her hair prickles her skin when it falls flat again, and then goes back to twining around her wrists, as though sniffing around for a way to get under the void guards on her wrists. It doesn't appear to be hassling John a quarter as much as it is her; she suspects this to be blatant favoritism. "And your parts were all fancy and glittery and stuff but I'm not sure coherent is the right word for it when you get going..."

If that's a knock at her prose, she'll have to let it slide - this time. "I don't suppose it included any instructions on flying?"

"None of us were god tier yet, so nah."

Not surprising. Rose rifles through the corners of her mind as though another scavenging attempt will be any more productive than the last run. But the memories continue to elude her, to the surprise of no one ever. "Perhaps it's a matter of thinking happy thoughts," she says. "No - something far more cliché. Faith. I have to believe in myself." Since literary allusions are the go-to metaphors, this morning...

"Or maybe it'll just kick in on its own if you really need it to?" Even as he suggests this, a glint appears in John's eye. The type of glint that usually precipitated a bucket of water left balanced on top of the door to her room, to dump its contents upon the next unwitting victim to walk through.

"Don't," she says sternly. "Just...give me another moment to think." Yes. The more she ponders this, the more she suspects that cliché is exactly the trend du jour as far as the game is concerned. She could fly, therefore it follows that she can still fly; it's only a lack of practice thinking that way. Gravity is difficult habit to break.

"Okay," she says once she's made up her mind that yes, this hypothesis is just ridiculous enough that it should work, if only just to spite her. Logic is a strange, inscrutable thing. "You may let go."

John gives her a look. "Are you sure?"

Well. Now she's not. If she ever was to begin with. "Don't you dare second guess me now, John. This enterprise is questionable enough as it stands." With him thus reprimanded, Rose waits for the wind to drop her, her stomach clenched.

"Aaaaand...now!" John takes his hands away. The air stops supporting her weight -

Flying does not happen. Falling does. Rose wishes she could at least say she doesn't panic excessively; she finds herself shrieking the incantation for her levitation spell at what might be considered an unreasonable volume, but the syllables are all blaring noise in her ears, blotted out by the pounding of her heartbeat, so she can't even be certain she's pronouncing them correctly. Before she can finish rattling it off, hands wrap around her wrists and jerk her to a halt, her legs dangling as she blinks up through her hair at John. As grateful as she is, it's still mildly terrifying to realize John's hanging upside down. The whole thing feels precarious. Her mouth is weirdly dry when she says, "A rousing first attempt."

John seems to be having an issue with controlling his face. As nice as it is to see him looking something other than sad and exhausted, Rose has her suspicions about this particular expression. "Rousing," he agrees, barely containing his laughter.

"John. What."

"Rose, you -" he breaks off, and yes, now Rose can feel his hands twitching. He nearly chokes on the swallowed laughter shaking his body. "You forgot you were wearing a skirt, didn't you -"

"I am wearing tights, you ridiculous human being!" John busts out laughing. Tears are welling up in the corners of his eyes. She can't even kick him in the shin from this angle. Yes, alright, she's willing to admit that she may have failed to think through the particular logistics of falling while wearing a skirt, but on the other hand - "Can we please try to be mature adults about this?"

"Oh. Yeah!" John's lower lip wobbles as he flips back right-side up and pulls her back up onto his level. He only makes it seven seconds before another snerk escapes him, and Rose has no choice but to smack him on the arm. "I'm s-sorry!" he says; the choked laughter doesn't help his case in the slightest. "It flew up like - like an inside out umbrella - haha, no!" he protests, floating up out of range of her efforts to cuff him upside the back of the head. Of all the ways for him to start showing a sense of humor again!

"We're going to watch La Jetée again," she threatens. It takes some doing, but she manages to swat him on the arm a few more times before she finally gains enough altitude to mess up his hair again.
"Multiple times."

John freezes, only one eye visible through his bangs. "Which one was that?"

"The French one with the still photos."

"Noooo! Anything but that, Rose!" Floating back, he raises his hands in surrender - yet he keeps laughing in fits and starts for the duration, so he can't be too intimidated by her perfectly legitimate threat.

"Yes. Debating its underlying late modernist messages and the exploration of the psychoanalytic re-narration of the self should be a fine way to pass the - afternoon - hold still -"

John snatches her headband off her head. The sheer effrontery of it leaves Rose speechless, her fingers flying up - too late - to touch the unbound hair where the headband rested. "Don't look down," he says, swinging back out of arm's reach, his face screwed up in concentration as he tries to fit the wayward band onto his own head.

This can't be allowed to stand. "Saying something like that is absolutely guaranteed to induce a nigh irresistible urge to look down in my mind, I hope you know," Rose say, looking down. They've drifted somewhat higher amidst all this tomfoolery, the cars and the lab complex oddly small from this vantage, compared to how they would appear on foot. With this angle she can even make out the faint, blurred reflection of the mountains and the clouds overhead in the mirror-like surface of the lake. Four entire chunks of parking spaces have been completely filled in with different colors, red and green and blue and a shade of purple that hardly stands out against the grey-black road, with a small dark figure chalking in more pictures as decoration. "What am I not looking down at, again?"

"When you see it, you'll know," John says, with a tiny 'aha!' when the headband finally sits in place. One of the arms is pinning his left ear in a way that will shortly cut off blood circulation, but Rose's altruism gambit coincidentally just landed on empty, so she says nothing. Between the way the wind keeps running through his cowlicks to make them stand on end and the contrast with the headband flattening the hair underneath it down, he looks -

Rose looks down. Then she looks back up at John, who simply watches her with an anticipatory grin. His eyes are lit up, and the Breeze circles around him in constant loops marked only by the fluttering of his clothing and hair.

Rose's hair feels oddly still, considering the kind of casual harassment it's had to put up with these past few days.

"Don't look down," John repeats, rolling his eyes when Rose does it anyway. "And don't think about it. If you overthink it, it might stop working or something."

The exact same thought had occurred to Rose as well. She finds herself warily eyeballing her own shoes before realizing just how ridiculous she must look. The whole thing feels disconcertingly normal; there's no gleam of magic at her heels, no streams of wind wrapped around her, just the curious sensation that if she'd wanted to fly, all she really had to do was take a step. Or perhaps have sufficient motivation to do it, anyway. She can't tell whether it's magic or something physical - she has the unnerving feeling that she may have just done something to the laws of physics.

This...may be what John was referring to when he told her not to overthink it. Speaking of: John is drifting off to one side, still with her headband perched at an outlandish angle on his head, yet still keeping one eye on Rose as he wanders, looking ready to swoop in at the vaguest sign that physics might decide to have its way with her again. It takes some doing - her mind contorts in the oddest ways before she realizes all she has to do is think about moving in the direction she wants to go - but she manages to curve after him, bobbing and tucking one foot behind the other so that she'll stop trying to walk in midair. "I'm not sure I like it," she informs him. "I find the whole enterprise suspiciously simple." The only explanation she can come up with for why she wouldn't have stumbled upon this ability earlier in her life is that she just never tried to do it, and that's bothersome.
At this rate, they'll all be changing their clothes into pajamas and breaking any number of inviolable laws of physics at will.

Oh wait.

"...So, you're mad because it's easy?" John says, with the kind of smile that says he's still holding back laughter. It's the best thing she's seen all day, even if it comes at her own expense.

"Not mad. Just put out. It's so easy for all of this to seem utterly normal, when in fact all of us are about as far from normal as it is possible to be." That said, Rose takes out her phone and, before John can move, takes a picture of him. "You look wonderful," she says, while he gapes at her. "I'm sure Karkat will appreciate this."

Blank confusion dawns into slow horror as John raises a hand to the headband. "Rose," he says, worriedly.

Getting down is a little more nerve-wracking to pull off, if only because it feels like sauntering in a downward direction with nothing under her feet. If Rose had to compare it to anything, she would say it felt similar to crawling down a flight of stairs on all fours - breathlessly precarious, and probably not at all safe. But she has only to think she'd like to descend at a more sedate pace, and she slows at once. As she does, she taps the send button with a tiny smile. "Too late."

John catches up to her when she hesitates a yard from the ground, and hands her the headband back.
His hair is still matted down in odd places. "You don't want to start a prank war here, Rose," he says, fighting to look serious. He fails. "There are no friends in prank wars."

Movement catches Rose's eye, and she looks to see WV running toward their landing spot, the carapace's expression one of total annoyance as he waves a fistful of chalk sticks at them. The layers of his wrappings are coated in a dull pastel layer of chalk dust that makes Rose shake her head; they're going to be the ones responsible for hosing him down before he walks around sensitive lab equipment in his own personal cloud of chalk particles. That'll be...interesting. "Oh, there's no need for a war," Rose says, landing with a dip of her knees as her body tries to keep floating down toward the ground before she figures out where the healthy medium is. Once she's secure, she combs her hair out with her fingers and tucks her headband back into place. "I've already accomplished what I set out to achieve."

"What, was your plan this whole time was to get a weird picture of me to use as blackmail, or something?"

He sounds petulant.

But he is still smiling.

"Or something," she says.

-- apocalypseArisen [AA] will now pester thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] at --:--:-- -- AA: life is a joke death is the punchline
AA: its all about the timing
TT: Ominously droll. Would you mind elaborating on what other trolls we may need to keep an eye out for? Names in particular would be greatly appreciated, given the fact that no one here can remember much at all, and you have us at a slight disadvantage.
AA: oh right!
AA: sorry were just getting everything settled now TT: From what I understand, you, Sollux, and the Scourges intend to arrive shortly? Neither I nor Kanaya was aware that you planned to visit the States. Will there be trouble on that front? I can't imagine smuggling two of our mutual acquaintances across the border can be accomplished without a potential national incident.
AA: yes we get here safely not to worry :)
AA: what i meant to warn you about was gamzee!
TT: Gamzee...GM?
AA: yup
TT: We've encountered him already over the course of the past week or so. I'm afraid you missed your moment.
AA: i never miss my moment :)
AA: hes going to make it to the lab pretty soon as far as youre concerned TT: Oh.
TT: Damn.
AA: but not too soon! hes still got a ways to go yet
AA: hes got tavros with him so you might want to dig out a spare wheelchair for when they arrive AA: the one they had before was basically scrap metal and tavros definitely appreciates that you had one waiting for him
TT: At least Karkat has already vacated the premises. Damn. John isn't ready for this.
AA: oh karkat will be back by the time we all arrive
AA: which is a good thing if you think about it TT: Please. Explain. Without cutting off abruptly, I beg of you.
AA: compared to the alternative trust me this is a very good thing
AA: youll see for yourself
AA: dont worry about it too much get excited! were all together at last!
-- apocalypseArisen [AA] stops pestering thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] at --:--:-- -- TT: Oh, for the love of –

They only realize there's yet another escape attempt in progress when they reenter the lobby and start down the main corridor, WV keeping up a constant stream of babble in what may be some mangled form of French, only for Roxy's voice to shriek, "JAKEY, FOR THE LOVE OF PISS, STOP RUNNING AROUN'!"

"YOU'LL NEVER TAKE ME ALIVE!" Jake screams back, still out of sight but drawing nearer with each step.

John groans. "Again? How many times is he going to try this?"

"Presumably, as many as it takes." Rose shakes her head and holds John back with a touch when he goes to turn down the hall the voices are coming from. "One moment." They could just have the Breeze tip Jake off his feet, as has become sadly standard procedure -

Or, Rose could simply place her foot out at the exact moment Jake races past, and watch in devilish amusement as he trips over her leg and goes flying with the force of his own momentum. His expression is priceless, frozen in shock even as he scrambles to right himself before plowing into the "Ruffians! Hooligans!" he shouts at them, the sound rather muffled by the fact that he's landed mostly on his face. When he peels himself up off the floor, his nose is bleeding and the bandage around his head has started to blot with red splotches where his stitches have apparently torn open for the fifth time in as many days. "Face me in a proper fight, cowards!"

"We really don't want to fight you. At all," says, shrugging.

"They're just trying to help, Jake," Roxy says, jogging up to them. There's a growing, dark bruise beginning to swell under her chin, and her hair is in disarray as she crouches down by Jake. "Sorry, he tried to pull a fast one while me and Di-Stri were working on stuff."

By 'stuff,' Rose takes her to mean the on-going project to salvage the Queen's elaborate computer system. Dirk has thrown himself into it with a single-minded intensity that is worrying, quite frankly; Roxy shared in confidence the other day that staying focused on a complex project helps him control the lingering after-effects of the mindgrub. After a week of doing little other than recover from surgery and gossip about the mysterious Felt, Roxy and Dirk seem to have latched onto Jade's project, while Jane seems content to watch everyone, slowly reabsorbing what it means to be human.

Taking care of John while his psyche learns new ways to cope without the [Eye of the Storm] isolating him has been Rose's primary concern. That doesn't mean she hasn't had time to give due consideration to the trouble with Jake's on-going resistance to any attempts to get him to speak to a counselor. She walks around Jake to kneel beside Roxy and meets Jake's eyes deliberately; an unreadable expression flashes across his face before he grimaces and rips his gaze away, staring down at the floor as though about to burst into angry tears. "This must be frustrating for you," she comments; she catches a fleeting glimpse of John shifting in the corner of her eye, but doesn't allow herself look away from Jake for the moment. "I'm sorry. But letting you run back to the Felt and the Midnight Crew wouldn't be doing you any favors, believe me."

"For frig's flipping sake, just leave me alone." Jake shrugs away Roxy's hand when she lays it on his shoulder, but the motion barely has any energy behind it. Interesting. "First Cogitator and Ranger, then Berzerker too...I don't know what you've done to them, but I won't let you do it to me too," he says. His body almost hunches up in a defensive curl, but with the way he's laid out flat on the ground means its more of a bodily shrug before he subsides, looking glum.

At her side, Roxy resettles in her crouch, her hands clamped on top of her kneecaps as she looks between Rose and Jake and back to Rose again, her pale eyes curious. "Are you going to try and do that?" Roxy gestures with her hands, making intriguing gestures toward her own skull for emphasis ":- head thing? Like what you did to him." She points at John with both fingers. John, still standing, makes a face back.

"No, not that," Rose says, half to herself. "It was recklessly dangerous to jump in half-cocked like that, as the actual mindscape expert has seen fit to lecture me when he can, but the situation at the time was desperate. Let me see..." She drums the fingers of one hand against her thigh absently, looking for - something. Jake squirms under the scrutiny, but he doesn't try to leap up or dash away.

There's something about that. Something that she hasn't seen, because she hasn't had much spare time. But...Trying to go through the wall with a spoon filched from a meal, clambering through the ducts, running through the halls at breakneck speeds: these aren't effective tactics for someone trying to escape. It's not as though the laboratory complex is designed to keep people contained or anything, for that matter. Jake's either grossly incompetent, or not trying very hard.

Or...

He is trying. In a very specific way. The mind grub latched onto certain impulses in John's mind and spammed him with chemical reinforcement until they became neuroses he couldn't break out of. Neither he nor Jake nor Jane went into surgery intending to go along with it, and certainly not with the malicious apathy Samuel Egbert has demonstrated.

Rose thinks she can make a guess as to how they need to approach Jake. Perhaps not all that accurate of a guess, considering she barely knows him, but as good of a guess as she can generate with what she does know. "He likes movies, yes?" At some point, her mind sifting through the threads of what is and what may be, she remembered that being brought up, in a discussion of what Jane and Jake were like before their minds were tampered with.

"Used to," Roxy says, sighing.

"Any movies in particular?"

"Literally all movies. Addition is a powerful thing." Roxy winds a strand of hair tight around her finger, and then lets it bounce back into place. "Even the super shitty ones. Such an effin' dork."

"My movies aren't shitty, Roxy, they're perfectly legitimate specimens of cinematography," Jake retorts. While Rose has been meditating, he has been stewing - and still not attempting to get up. No one's holding him down or anything, he's just lying there with his arms folded under his chin, sniffing around the last smears of blood from his nose, in a sulk. The sulk in question includes elements of both Jade and John's pouts, which makes it all the more fascinating to observe the slight differences.

"Nah Jaje, most of them were pretty horrible. Like ur weird thing about Avatar."

Jake half-pushes himself up on his elbows, wiping at his upper lip with a hasty hand. "Don't be ridonkulous, Avatar is a classic of our time!"

"Please tell me he's talking about the blue alien movie and not the...other one," John says, looking pale.

Rose cuts in. "Like the Shawshank Redemption? The Great Escape?" Jake recoils, with the strange expression from before back on his face. "That's how Die pinned down your mind, isn't it. You've been trying to play out escape sequences because it's all you've been allowed to know in a situation like this." She's tempted to namedrop the Manchurian Candidate, but upon further consideration, she doesn't know if she dares risk the chance that Jake might take it as meaning they're the ones brainwashing him while he believes he's trapped as a sort of prisoner of war in the enemy camp. She just doesn't know him well enough predict how he'd interpret the hint.

At least now she can put a name to the look on his face, now. He's a hairsbreadth from lucid, and terrified with it when he pushes off his elbows and scrambles up onto his feet, trying to put distance between himself and Rose. She puts out a hand and taps John's knee, since that's in reach, almost before the wind starts to pick up. "Let him be," she murmurs. Instead of trying to dart past John, which would have been the quickest route back to the main exit, Jake starts sprinting back the way he came. Roxy hangs her head so deeply she teeters on her heels and almost somersaults forward, then stands up and calls after Jake with resignation in her eyes.

"Roxy," Rose says, before Roxy can take off. The girl swivels her head back while the rest of her limbs momentarily try to keep moving. Rose offers her a faint smile. "He didn't call you a codename that time."

After a second's delay, Roxy bursts into a grin so wide her eyes crinkle shut, pumps a fist, and takes off after Jake, her shoes squeaking on the tile. Jake has a lead on her - right up until a shorter shape tackles him from an open doorway and pins him in place against the wall. Rose and John wince in unison at the impact. Jane holds Jake there while Roxy jogs to catch up, unmoved when Jake whispers something to her.

The Scratches are doing better than Rose would have believed they would even a few days ago. Out of all of them, she'd worried the most that Jake would lock down.

But she thinks there's still hope for him left.

-- apocalypseArisen [AA] may pester thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] at ∞:∞:∞ -- TT: If you intend for all of these cryptic tidbits of information to come off as threatening, you're succeeding.
AA: oh no thats not what i intend at all
AA: sometimes me in the past and me now get a little jumbled
AA: we only have so much time left to work with after all
TT: And when is your 'now' compared to my own?
AA: now youre getting it :)
AA: this me is a bit farther ahead but i cant say much more TT: Can't, or won't?
AA: either
AA: both
TT: And when is your 'now' compared to my own?
AA: i did say that didnt i
AA: things are gonna be a little crazy for a while AA: but i prepared for it in advance so dont panic
TT: If you've prepared for it - meaning, presumably, you at some point in the relative past - then the question becomes: why will we still need surgeons at all? Haven't you already rendered them extraneous?
AA: not at all im afraid
AA: some things have to happen for the alpha timeline to remain coherent
AA: if those key events are altered then we just become a dead end and vanish
AA: unless of course...
TT: Really, your dramatic pauses have me riveted to the screen. I do hope this one doesn't last another three hours.
AA: heheheheh
AA: ah you made me laugh and now the melodrama is gone
AA: we're going to break it
TT: And by it, you mean...the timeline?
AA: the game
TT: I'm listening.
AA: i cant really say much more than that for the you of right now
AA: perhaps we should bring back jades old password system...
TT: Then simply tell me what you can.
AA: lets just say that even if we play fast and loose with the game rules theres really no need to worry about breaking time which gives us some wiggle room
AA: time is already has always been and will be forevermore broken
AA: he is already here
TT: He who?
TT: Doc Scratch?
AA: he's always been here
TT: I need a drink.
-- ectoBiologist [EB] has joined the chat! --
EB: no. ;/
TT: John, I cannot be expected to remain sober under these working conditions.
EB: nooooooooot happening. ;/

Rue nods when Rose visits her office, bearing news of Aradia's disturbing advice. "I've actually already called in someone to provide backup for Archaeopolis; god only knows xe needs assistance, with all the injuries you children may drum up between you," she says, closing one of the many file folders open on her desk and folding her hands under her chin. "Petrinne owes me favors, and she's flying in her team from Pittsburgh tomorrow morning. They're very well qualified in the realm of trauma surgery."

"Favors?" Rose asks, trying and failing to resist the urge to scan the upside down titles of some of the other folders and papers stacked on her mother's desk. She catches something to the effect of 'Samu-' in one of the headings, and averts her gaze before she can read further. When she last bothered to check in on him, Samuel Egbert was as unapologetic and blasé about the entire situation as if being locked in an isolated ward were no more than a passing inconvenience. The longer he goes without displaying any signs of remorse, the less Rose is inclined to try to forgive him - and honestly, he doesn't seem to want forgiveness. He could care less about any of them. That much is transparently clear.

"I try to cultivate contacts that don't require going through the Harley Foundation for all the lab's needs. Favors owed, congenial past interactions, ex-staff who have gone on to other positions..." Rue gently closes the file on Samuel, her eyes never leaving Rose's. Her gaze is not quite soft, but it is understanding, and - it jars something sharp in a fragile part of Rose's insides, painful and yearned for all at once. "James Harley and I were never more than cordial acquaintances, and that relationship became more distant after Joanna's death. After that, and before his passing, he acted unusually distrustful."

She can taste the cutting remark on her tongue, just waiting to be said - someone, distrustful of you? Is that meant to shock me? Swallow it down, swallow it down. She can't remember striving to be genuinely civil with her mother a day of her life, but civil she wants to be. For however long that resolve lasts. "Distrustful?"

Shaking her hair out, Rue unfolds her hands and opens a drawer to extract compacts of makeup, her fingers shaking so slightly Rose almost misses it. "I wonder - though I suppose we'll never know - if he might have suspected something about Joanna's death. He never so much as mentioned the possibility of murder or...or Samuel being involved, not to me at least. But it would explain a few things about his behavior, and why he chose to keep Jade isolated for so long throughout her lifetime rather than returning to the mainland."

"But it complicates others," Rose says, watching as Rue begins to sort through the compacts with the inattentive air of one who doesn't need to look at the labels or colors to know what she's looking for. Rue inclines her head. "Yes. When the last thing we really need at the moment is more complication." Using the tip of a fingernail, she clicks open one of the makeup packs. "It's enough to make one wish dear Ambrose would hurry along and bring Oriole back, if only so that there were two fewer things to worry about, with them exposed out there."

The last thing Rose's constitution is willing to put up with is more talk about Samuel. But she can't stop herself from asking, with a sort of bile fascination, "Has Samuel given any more insight into what he was supposed to be doing for the Crew?" Aside from putting John's mind through a blender, she adds, in the privacy of her own thoughts.

"He only shares what he thinks will strike a nerve," Rue says, sour. She wipes her face and begins to reapply the powder with a furrow between her brows. That'll leave creases in the makeup if she doesn't smooth it out, but Rose bites her tongue for the moment. "Occasionally I believe I can pick out when he's deliberately lying or omitting details concerning the Felt's inner workings - other times, he's just vague enough about his contract work to be irksome."

Conversational topics like this are why Rose suggested John remain outside. The mere mention of Samuel causes him to flinch; one step at a time. "What a tiresome man."

Rue doesn't argue with the sentiment. "I don't think he's been in contact with the Crew for most of this time, and may not even have had time to pass on much information about you children to them; he and John were intended to remain a sleeper cell, and yet not even the Crew members seem to have been aware of it until recently. I can't tell if he's confused, himself, or just deliberately trying to confound me, because the timeline doesn’t always add up." She throws Rose a faintly contrite look. "I wish I had more to share. But I don't exactly keep interrogators on staff around here, and for the most part Samuel is quite content to talk me in circles."

"I do not blame you; I blame him," Rose says. Her voice sounds flat and strange in her ears, and for a moment she can almost imagine the rush of the sea, rustling along the underside of her mind, before a sharp look from Rue snaps her self-control back into its place. Horrorterrors may not be able to reach her through the channel here, but there's no reason for Rose not to snap the good old fashioned way and show Samuel just what she thinks of what he's done to John.

But John wouldn't thank her for taking matters into her own hands.

He wouldn't.

She shakes off the nagging thoughts. "I should be going," she says, taking half a step backwards, the heel of her shoe dragging along the ground. A faint sound from Rue's computer distracts the woman enough that the mild concern on her face flickers into curiosity, and Rose takes advantage of the distraction to try for a quiet, amiable abscond. Waiting out in the hall, with nothing to do but text Karkat and Dave (which only makes him restless), John will no doubt have started plotting how to sidle into Rue's office and embroil them in a well-meaning conversation that will keep Rose and Rue in close proximity to each other for perhaps longer than is truly wise.

But Rue frowns in the middle of reapplying her lipstick, and holds up a hand to stop Rose just as she's about to turn back to the door. "One moment - there's something - hm."

"A problem?" Rose turns over so slightly, shifting her foot so that it points back to the desk.

Rue sets down the tube of lipstick and taps a lacquered nail on the keyboard instead, her lips parting a little as she silently reads the email. "I...well, that's odd," she says. "They must have sent this to the email account I was using back in college - I have filters set to forward anything pressing to my current address, but it's been years...Where would they have even located it, after all this time?" Rue appears to be speaking mostly to herself by now, a low mumble as she scans the email again. Rose considers slipping out while Rue is engrossed, but it occurs to her that given the circumstances, that might come off as more of a slight than she really means to give, right now, when they're in the process of regaining a functional, if somewhat stiff, relationship.

Then Rue’s expression darkens, a muscle in her jaw tensing as she leans back slowly in her chair. It's the most forbidding Rose has seen her mother look in a while, and she doesn't think it bodes well. "My dear, would you remind me of the initials that Karkat shared with you?" the doctor asks, her eyes meeting Rose's only for a transitory moment before she goes back to staring at the email on her screen.

Thankfully, Karkat muttered that exact list under his breath numerous enough times for Rose to have long since memorized it. "The ones we haven't already come across or identified?" she asks, to be precise about it.

"Run the entire thing by me again. I could be forgetting one."

"AM, TN, SC, NL, KM, TP, VS, EZ, GM, EA, FP." Feferi, Kanaya, Aradia, Sollux, and more than likely Vriska and Terezi, have all been almost positively identified, in addition to Karkat himself, while the 'GM' most likely refers to the as-yet nameless clown stalking them all. However, the identities of TN, NL, EZ, and EA remain unconfirmed. Unless Karkat has had some further epiphany that he failed to share with the rest of them before leaving. It wouldn't surprise Rose if he'd recalled something in one of his nightmares and told only John; Karkat's ongoing grumpiness and sense of privacy mean that most new intel can take some time to reach everyone else, no matter how time-sensitive it may turn out to be. But who among them hasn't been guilty of omitting vital information, accidentally or otherwise, at some point or another? It's hard to begrudge any of the others anything when they've all fucked up spectacularly in their own unique ways. The high ground has morphed into a flat line, by now.

Rue clicks her tongue, and then laughs, curling her finger to gesture Rose over to the side of the desk, where she can get a glimpse of the computer screen. "Could this be the 'EZ,' then?" she asks, with the kind of barely submerged humor in her voice that could quite easily have set Rose back on her guard if not for the fact that she was already leaning in, fascinated, to read the email itself.

Doctor Rue Lalonde,

I apologize for any potential rudeness there may be in contacting you out of the blue, but it has come to my attention that you were once one of the few researchers in the field of particle physics and related fields with published articles concerning the phenomena of ambient void and its relationship to dark matter and paradox theory. It has been excruciatingly difficult to locate copies of your work that have not been expurgated from archives or screened from public viewing; however, what I have read so far gives me the strong impression that your work is relevant to my interests.

I understand that this research may now be several years out of date, and may not have been the focus of your current work in some time, but it is one of the few leads that I have located that has not dismissed the manipulation of the void except as a purely theoretical exercise, and suggested designs for harnessing it. I do not know if you've made any further progress since then in putting those designs into practice, but I would owe you a debt if you would be willing to share any of the schematics with me. I would not normally make such a ludicrous request, knowing that you may not wish anyone to purrloin your work, but I have reason to believe myself and one of my colleagues are under immediate threat from a group of criminal malcontents, and it would be inexcusable for me not to at least attempt any possible method of defense, even one so farfetched as this.

If need be, money is not an issue.

My regards,
When Rose stops reading, the humor has reached her mother's eyes, too, dancing with triumph. "And only a troll would mention their ancestor in their signature," Rose says, drawing even more of the smile out of her mother. "A troll with the correct initials, interested in the void and paradox theory, with 'criminal malcontents' -" one might as well swap the two words to get another familiar pair of initials, honestly "- threatening them."

"And a colleague, who may well be one of the other players not yet identified," Rue finishes. She reaches out and Rose holds herself very still as her mother carefully brushes a strand of longer hair out of Rose's face and back behind her ear. "There. Now, how shall we respond to this? It would be rather boorish to leap upon the poor troll, firing off inquiries concerning whether or not they recall a past life or not that might frighten them off."

"We could be incorrect, after all." She'd like to think they're not, but when she puts out feelers of intuition, trying to spy out some further from the email before them, Rose receives only a faint, hollow sensation, made twistier by the usual void of her mother by her side. Rue is, as always, only an outline where an aura should be, and Rose supposes that might be why she can't sense anything more from the email. She could try to foresee what the most best response might be, but she can never perceive much other than a hole when Rue's involved.

"I suppose we'll have to see for ourselves," she says. Rue nods, popping the knuckle of her index finger by pressing it beneath her thumb. The faint smile hanging around her lips hardly irritates Rose at all, even as they settle down to bicker over the phrasing of the reply.

---

TG: rose TG: weve got porpoises

tick tock

--

Somewhere in Maine...

PM: I apologize for the intrusion, but I believe there is a message waiting for me here? Or perhaps a person...

The human who has answered the door is a familiar one, a Lab Technician that PM recalls meeting more than once during the time she and the Querent spent here. LT blinks, and then smiles, her oodles and oodles of curly hair bouncing as she holds the door open and turns, calling, "Denali? Is the new one still in the waiting room." When PM nods and steps inside, peering around for any changes that may have occurred in the facility since she left, the LT turns back to her with a question. "By the way, how do you guys always find each other so fast? I could have sworn we only sent that email off to Washington an hour ago - how did you know before Doctor Lalonde? Or were you just already on your way here to begin with?"

PM clicks her tongue, allowing herself a short frown as she follows LT through the lobby and down the hall.

PM: I had other messages and errands to run. Everything's been so hectic lately! Sometimes it feels like there aren't enough hours in the day...

PM: Also, I recently met a wise old woman, who told me I might want to come here before reuniting with my Querent if I wanted to procure some interesting information, and as I approached I knew who would be waiting here.

The woman looks mystified. "How - er, never mind. Anyway, he arrived this morning and he won't tell us what he's here about. Something about us not having the right credentials. He just keeps asking for us to contact a Peregrine Mendicant, which, with the initials...is you, right?"

At that, PM has to take a moment to bury her face in her claws before she can work up the willpower to keep going.

PM: Yes, that's me. Has he tried to shoot anyone yet?

"No, I don't think he's even armed - why would he."

PM: Not armed? Oh. Maybe it's not him then. I don't think I've ever seen him with anything less than three assault rifles on his person at all times.

AR: I heard that.

The carapacian who pokes his head around the corner of a doorframe is, indeed, the exact Authority Regulator PM is expecting to see. She hasn't seen him in ages and ages, though, not since he decided to investigate the ins and outs of human and troll military structures. There are new, brittle marks along one claw as he raises it to sign, but the dark hum of his mind is still the same - sharp and paranoid but well-intentioned. With some Dersites, it almost hurts to hear them, with how little they tend to trust others. But there has always been some camaraderie between PM and AR, unspoken but strong, and so they get along just fine. He doesn't complain (too much) about how Parcel Mistresses will break any number of frivolous bylaws concerning travel between lands in the Medium in the name of the mail, and she doesn't roll her eyes all the time when he thinks 'shoot first ask questions never' is a legitimate method of enforcing said frivolous bylaws.

Not much, anyway. It helps that he tends to make up and change his own regulations on a whim, rather than sticking to strict Derse law code. She also has it on relatively good authority that he has feelings where she is concerned. This is not something to be taken lightly.

AR: Hello. I have information of vital importance, and I think it may be of interest to you. I'm not sure who else to tell about it, since most of the people I would have reported to normally are non-existent. Is there somewhere private we can talk about this?

He squints at the LT with suspicion in his pale eyes, until the human fidgets under his gaze.

PM: If it really matter that much, we can probably talk outside or something.

AR bristles, his mental voice scandalized.

AR: Outside! Anyone could be listening out there! It's completely unsecured.

All she can do is sigh, and look up at the LT with a rueful expression. The human is very understanding about it, too. "We run a sweep for bugs regularly, and everyone here was recently scanned for signs of mindgrub infestation," LT says, cracking one of her knuckles. "The whole complex is fairly secure, but if you need someplace that's really isolated, there's always one of the sensory deprivation rooms - or the greenhouse, since we need to keep it sealed off to prevent outside plant material from getting in."
PM: The greenhouse sounds lovely. I visited it the last time I was here. Thank you for your help.

"Not a problem." LT makes as though to show them the way, regardless, but AR won't stop squinting like the silly guy he is, so PM excuses the two of them as politely as she can - and then seizes AR by the faded black fabric of his wrappings. She hauls him out of the main building and through a series of vacuum sealed doors on the eastern side of the complex. The decontamination process makes her eyes water and sting, and AR seizes up with a fit of sneezing that last until one of the kind scientists waves them through the far doors and into the greenhouse itself. Someone is already there, a troll with a mask over their mouth whose wiry hair has gone frizzy in the artificial humidity, and they don't look up from the clipboard they're using to tick off boxes while inspecting a four-foot tall flower blossom. Before AR can sign a word, PM has already changed course so that they walk along the far wall, leaving tracks in the tamped down dirt of the pathway.

PM: There we go! Is this alright?

AR: It should be fine. However, I have serious concerns about the state of the security protocols here - they let me just walk right in when I said I knew you, when I could have been absolutely anyone! Even an enemy! Very lax, very lax...

If she lets him go off, they're going to be here for a while. Before AR can start shaking his head and listing possible ways to improve security, she claps her hands together.

PM: Augh! First I was supposed to stay and help the Knight, but I kept getting sidetracked and none of them would just stay together in one place and then when I went back to check on them again the Knight was gone and now everyone is the land of Washington except for me!

PM: Please tell me what was so important that you would not just tell these kind people what information you have? I understand that finding a quality mailperson can be difficult on this planet, but the people are very nice and they could have helped you find a more direct way to contact me, instead of me only knowing to be here because of a tricksy lady!

AR: Ah. Um. I'm sorry. The last I heard, you were here, so this is where I came. What tricksy lady?

PM: An old one, who was very strange.

AR: Oh. Anyway -

The redirect doesn't work. She is hitting her stride now.

PM: That is the entire point of the postal system, you know. These people sadly only have their prototype version in place but you could have made do! I apprenticed in it for a while, it's not beyond salvaging! I met a lot of very wonderful people through it -

She throws up her claws, one of them knocking against a hanging vine clustered with red fruits. A quick survey shows that, with all the plants between them, the troll probably did not see that. When she pokes at the fruit to see if it's still intact, her claw perforates the skin. She and AR speed up until they're well away from the scene.

AR: ...Querent?

PM hesitates, biting her lip for a moment, and then decides it'll be fine to tell him. From the look on his face, the sense of knowing has begun to rise in the back of his mind, that same kind of recognition that led to their becoming friends. Neither of them may remember what came before properly, but all carapacians know existential déjà vu like they know the back of their claws. How ordinary humans and trolls function without the odd coincidences and the spontaneous hunches that help guide Carapacians from day to day is a true mystery.

PM: My Queen. Yours has been around, but I have not met her myself.

Carapacians do not feel the cold or the heat as intensely as the people on this mild planet do. Which means it says something when AR breaks out into a sweat, and his mouth dries to the point that he rasps with fuzzed-out words for a moment before PM can make sense of him again.

AR: She...oh dear. No one said anything about her returning - either of them -

PM: I'm not sure that all that many of us know, yet. Officially, anyway.

Rumor has been spreading - PM has tried to keep abreast of it, as part of her duties as a Protege, but there's only so much she can track - about the reappearance of the White Queen. But with so few of their people in this part of the world, she doubts that the truth has reached the city yet. Under any other circumstances, PM would have seen it as the height of her duty to carry such news even unto the Protector himself...

But the Querent and the heroes need her here. Seriously, they need all the help they can get. Even hearing only scraps, torn between deliveries as she has been, PM has put together that even now that they have gotten their acts together and regrouped, as they were always supposed to, the gods are still unstable. She wants to trust in them, she really does; not just the Prospitian dreamers, but all of them! But she's worried and impatient and troubled over them all at once, because no matter how hard they try, things still go awry.

_Doomed_, some part of her wants to whisper, but that answer doesn't scan right. If they were in a doomed splinter, every carapacian on the planet would know it for a fact, and resign themselves to their fate. No, not doomed, but...cursed, almost. Like everything that can go wrong, _will_ go wrong, every circumstances dragging them further into misfortune like the sucking crawl of the undertow. Even with the Querent pushing the limits of what a Queen would usually do to aid players in a game, brute-forcing her way through constraints set in place by patterns older than old, PM isn't sure it's enough.

And the game hasn't even started yet. A portion is played before the heroes progress to the Medium, yes, but this much pre-gaming seems more and more ludicrous the more PM turns it over in her thoughts. So much built up pressure with no outlet is bound to explode in some awful way.

AR: PM? Are you listening?

She snaps out of her daze with a jolt, in time to realize that AR is watching her with genuine concern. She smacks her cheeks with her hands and shakes off the last of her mumbling thoughts.

PM: Sorry about that.

AR: Anyway, yes. It's here now. Or at least it was the last time I saw it.

...She may have missed more than she thought. How terrible! A good Shatranj member is always attentive when someone has something to share! Sheepishly, she has to ask him to repeat the context.

PM: Ah, I'm sorry. You may need to start over.

AR: A Horror. From the Ukraine. It has moved.

...
"Keep it down, over there!" someone calls irritably through the thick air, but PM is already taking deep breaths, grinding a claw against each temple in an effort to ground herself.

No one ever knew for sure what came through in the Ukraine. Carapacians who tried to investigate didn't usually report back in. If one of the chaos-mongers is roaming around - and now it's here, so close to their hapless heroes that PM feels the need to flail about in utter panic - Skaia only knows how badly everything is going to go wrong all over again!

But AR puffs out his lower lip, staunch and utterly righteous in his conviction.

AR: There are rules about this sort of thing you know. I couldn't tell these people - I have no idea where they are in the chain of command. They might not have the right clearance. That's why I brought the news directly to you!

The logic of the law can be a merciless thing. PM paces, AR's eyes following her as she does laps around a fern, but it doesn't help - this is a message of the utmost urgency that the Querent must hear at once.

PM: You said it's here, but where here?

AR: It beat me to this continent, and made a new nest along the coastline in the south. It's not acting like any Horror we used to see out by the Ring; I thought maybe it would stay where it had nested originally, when it went quiet and stopped expanding its territory, but then the troll queen told it to leave!

She just keeps repeating to herself - they're in Washington. By the Pacific, by the ocean, but perhaps with enough landmass between them and here that the hivemind might not be able to reach them. And with the Querent there to advise them, there's no way they'd try to walk up to a Horrorterror and fight it -

Wait. Oh no. They would, they absolutely would. They've already done it once before. PM grabs AR by the wrist and sprints for the exit. For a moment, he moves slower than she expects, one nimble leg dragging, but she's too distracted trying to coax the story out of him as they bang through the heavy metal doors. One of the scientists in the booths shouts after them, worry in their voice, but they can't stop now.

AR: Where are we going?!

PM: No time! Talk while we run, please! My car's still out in the parking lot and we need to deliver this news to the Querent at once!

AR: ...Yours or mine.

PM: Mine! Yours was never a Querent. Come on, we have to hurry. And I don't think you're telling this in the right order, on account of you're not making sense. Please finish telling the story from the beginning.

The Lab Technician is little more than a blur in the corner of her vision as they hurtle past. "What's wrong? What's happened?" PM hears, and before she and AR push through the outside doors, she waves her free claw over her shoulder.

PM: Emergency! Thank you I'm sorry goodbye!
And then they're through and away. The vehicle in the parking lot is one that PM had to borrow a while ago, the front seat slid as far forward as it can go to accommodate her shorter legs, and she left the keys in the ignition when she went inside. In a moment of confusion, she and AR both try for the driver's side door at the same time, before she pushes him toward the other side. He talks all the while, the words blinking out whenever PM has to look away and close the door and fiddle with the seat again.

AR: Two humans and I went into the older Ukraine. The Horror seized them and swallowed them, but then a craft appeared in the sky and the Imperious one descended to confront it. She spoke as though familiar with the Horror, and accused it of being involved in something. A strange word that I do not think translated properly.

She waves at the LT hanging out the front door of the lab one last time, though she's sure by the look on the human's face that she's doing a poor job at a fond, reassuring farewell. Then she slams on the accelerator and yanks the wheel all the way to the side, the back wheels fishtailing before they regain traction.

PM: What was it?

Taking her eyes away from the road greatly increases the chances of them running into a tree; she does it anyway, her mind filled with images of nightmarish salmon as she stares at AR with trepidation. New York? Perhaps watching the road just caused her to misinterpret some hasty click on his part.

PM: A summoning, you mean?

AR: No, I heard her quite distinctly. Salmon were involved. Perhaps they were horrific salmon, but that's only conjecture at this point. She used many such colloquialisms. I lost most of my resources crossing the ocean and couldn't speculate further.

Pressing her head to the conveniently placed noisemaker in the center of the steering wheel would be rude, and may well startle some passing woodland creature into running out onto the road. Driving out here in the forests is already hard enough compared to driving city streets as it is without bounded obstacles.

PM: Trust me. The human Seer was possessed by grimdark and nearly completed a summoning spirograph. In New York. That has to be it!

Stroking his chin, AR takes forever to nod, reluctance still radiating from his mind. He's always been shorter than her, heavy set and built for enforcement rather than swift deliveries as she was, but with his legs not quite reaching the floor, his neck stretched just so he can peer over the dashboard, he looks so small. It reminds her of -

AR: I see. Right, that could be one explanation. Anyway, she said that she suspected this involvement because hiveminds tend to be in 'cahoots,' and then banished it from the Ukraine on the grounds that it had lost its murder privileges there.

AR: However, from what I saw, it has begun to poison the waters here. I fear that whatever mysterious sway the Condescension held over that Horrorterror, it now strikes out on its own.

This is all serious news. PM reaches down and plucks the mail cap out from her bag to slap on her head, securing it in place with a few good tugs.
This calls for PRIORITY MAIL SERVICE.

PM: Let's ride, AR.

She floors it.

Lab technician Karolina Toov is rather at a loss.

Denali jogs up behind her a moment later, hair flopping into his face as he joins her in staring uselessly after the car careening out of sight. She empathizes with the put-out look on his face greatly. "I thought - I thought we might as well call Doctor Lalonde, so they could just talk to her," he says, mournful. "She's waiting on the secure line... Did they happen to say what was so urgent, by any chance?"

All she can offer is a shake of her head. "Not a word," she says, shrugging. "Well, we can tell her they were here. Or something."

He sighs through his nose, adjusting his glasses by the corner of the frame as they turn back inside. "Carapacians are so strange."

---

They're so boned.

It's cold as tits, his brain is full of popping static, the day is suddenly tomorrow, and they're being hauled around by the scruff of their necks by a troll princess who doesn't seem to notice that her two pressganged lackeys are turning into popsicles.

Seriously. Parts of Dave are freezing that he didn't even know he had. The cold cuts right through his jacket and his suit like the fabric's all holes, numbing his fingers and ears and nose and - okay, everything. Everything is cold. By the time they reach the ice-slick, rocky beach and Feferi lets them go to walk on their own, his feet are numb to the point that setting weight on them feels like walking on needles. Karkat outright keels over, landing hard on one knee and looking ready to pass out.

Okay. Shit. Plan, they need a plan. Feferi's too messed up on whatever the Horrorterror is feeding her to realize she's magically 'ported them to the fucking Arctic Circle or something without coats or gloves or boots. Dying of hypothermia would be a lameass way to go.

"Feferi," Karkat says. The troll's kneeling, but he pushes himself up with his hands and starts limping after Feferi. How long does it take before you get frostbite out here? Dave lives in Texas, he's not supposed to have to put up with bullshit like this. "Feferi, you fishbrained fuckwad, stop!"

"No time for that! We can't just hang out on the beach, Karkat, she'll have people on guard." Feferi turns a little to grin at them, her skirt swirling around. How is she not cold in that? Dave's trying to make his brain work to figure out what she's wearing that's she's not feeling this, but eventually he just gives up because a) it's not fucking worth it and b) for all he knows, all of her grim...lighty bullshit is letting her just ignore the fact that her fins are living ice cubes. The point is, is...is...

What was his point again?

Fuck, is it cold.

"We're going to get frostbite!" Karkat's explaining, his breath billowing out in clouds of steam that Dave can just barely make out in the harsh light of day. There are buildings not far off, but most of them look like either warehouses or factories or ancient apartment buildings with peeling paint - when they reach a road there's barely any boundary between the water, the dead grass, and then the crumbling pavement. Piles of rusted metal parts and vehicles break up the gradient here and there and that's...kind of the general impression Dave gets from this place as he looks around some more. There are entire buildings with the roofs stripped down to the bare structural bones, open to the elements, and even the apartments with some color to them are pallid and faded, all greens and yellows and greys that are so dull they blend together in a blocky, faded panorama.

And snow is everywhere. The only concession the locals have made to try to fight the elements is that the roads have been mostly cleared - or maybe that's just happened on its own, thanks to the sun overhead. Grass grows in yellowed tufts between wide cracks in the broken concrete, but it's so dry and brittle Dave feels guilty stepping on it.

But there has to be something. This town is a goddamn fixer-upper, sure as shit, but it's still most of the way intact. More than a few walls sport monolithic Soviet murals or something with Russian words Dave can't read, but others have been painted over with bright reds and deep crimsons, because someone has definitely staked their claim here.

It's all giant red forks and spoons, as far as the eye can see. So at least this hasn't gone completely tits up - Feferi has, in fact, brought them to where she (probably) intended.

Seriously. This place would be John's worst nightmare come true. Or maybe he'd just be vindicated or some shit.

Has he mentioned it's cold? This bears repeating. He doesn't have an internal thermometer to match the internal metronome, but he can scientifically guesstimate and say it's around you're about to lose your toes and fingers and possibly your earlobes, congratulations jackass degrees Fahrenheit. They can't stay out here much longer. They've started drifting apart, with Feferi darting on ahead and peeking around street corners without paying attention to Karkat's repeated attempts to yell at her. She's so far gone it's almost surreal - like she's off in her own little world, and they're just watching from the outside. And if this is her idea of keeping her head down for a sabotage mission, there's no way this 'stealth' thing is going to end well.

To hell with it. She's on her own. Dave only came along on this wild ride because someone needs to keep an eye on Karkat.

Dave reaches out and shakes Karkat's shoulder with fingers that barely register the sensation of cloth under them. The troll glares at him blearily, his eyes bloodshot and almost weepy looking. "What?" he growls, seriously undermined by the fact that his teeth won't stop chattering.

Dave only remembers what he was going to say after pausing to gather his thoughts. He hooks a thumb at one of the nearest buildings, an apartment or a hotel of some kind with short metal stairways leading to the front doors.

"We need to get clothes, dude."

"D-don't dude me right now, I can't deal with it," Karkat says, rubbing his hands together furiously to try to generate heat. It doesn't look like it's working. "I kn-know that already. What are we supposed to do, break in and piss off whoever has the globes to live in this icy pit of death?"

"...Yup, that's the plan," Dave says. His teeth jam together weirdly and - shit, his teeth are gonna start chattering, too. At this rate neither of them is gonna be able to make words work. "We'll be frosty fucking snowmen if we don't."

Karkat stops rubbing his hands together and starts chafing at his arms, biting his lip as he nods. He looks exhausted. Belatedly, Dave remembers he's got a hold of the troll's shoulder and when he takes his hand away, hastily, Karkat scowls, his reaction so delayed that Dave ticks another notch closer to freaking the fuck out.

"Over here," he says. One last look confirms that Feferi's off on her merry way down the street and doesn't appear to notice or care that she's lost the other two members of her party. God. Hopefully she doesn't wander into a trap while they're scoping this place out, but goddamn if Dave can't bring himself to care too much right now. She'll be fine. As long as she doesn't actually run facefirst into her ancestor person's fist, she'll be totally fine. Right?

His feet feel like they've been doused with ice water as he drags Karkat off the road and over the broken up patches of concrete to the apartment. The door, when he knocks and then tries the handle in the subtlest way he knows how, doesn't budge (no surprise there) and isn't opened by whoever lives inside. Heck, from out here, he can't even tell if this place is still inhabited. Everything looks so washed out and derelict that for all they know, they could be knocking on the door of an empty building.

Could he pick the lock? Flexing his fingers just proves how little sensation he's got left in them, and he doesn't want to think about how many needles he'd lose or snap or accidentally stab himself with if he tried it. "Try the window," he tells Karkat, and it says something about how fucking cold the troll is that he actually does it with a minimum of grumbling. The window's high up but Karkat stands unsteadily on his toes, trying to peer in.

A hand slaps against the inside of the glass. Karkat startles back with a tiny screech. Bright red curtains yank closed behind the window panes a second later, ratting loud enough that Karkat flinches again, leaning back against the metal railing for balance with eyes wide as saucers.

"H-hey!" Dave calls, breathing on his hands and then tucking them back into his pockets, trying to conserve heat lost in the seconds he spent prodding at the door knob. His throat is starting to feel stiff; he's not sure exactly how the collar reacts to extreme cold. Humidity and Texas levels of hot-as-fuck, sure, it's weatherproof. But Dave doesn't know if Bro would have designed the internal circuits to function while deep frozen and crusted with ice. That, and his hands - "Shit. Hey, lady? Ma'am? Look, we -"

"Уходи!" a voice calls from within. The woman sounds muffled, but obviously pissed. "Мы не хотим неприятностей."

Dave groans. Karkat, who only just moved away from the railing, leans forward to grind his forehead against the wall, slowly shaking his head in despair. "Of course. Of course they don't speak English. Why would they. Ha. Haha.

"No, she might, hold on," Dave says. He knocks on the door again, hand balled up in a fist. The door rattles a little on its hinges. "Hey, uh! L-look, I know this looks bad - how often do you get two random American kids running around Siberia or whatever, right? Right. Seriously, that's got to be a weird thing to wake up to." There's still no response - the curtains at the window lay flat, and Dave swallows a nervous laugh. "Hell, I get it, for all you know we could be, like, connected to the mob or some shit like that? Which would be the opposite of what we are. No mob people here," He pauses. Then he frowns, and looks at Karkat, who seems determined to make out with the wall in a fit of despair. "Shit, that was a lie. Dammit. I forgot the stabby dude recruited us. Does that mean technically, we're the Midnight Crew now?"

Karkat shoves off the wall and seizes Dave by the face. " Shut. The. Fuck. Up," he says through his teeth. He shakes Dave hard enough to rattle his brains around like dice in a tumbler. "This is your plan, you watery celery stick? No, we're not the Midnight Crew. Stop humoring that asshole when he's not even here!"

It's not a good sign that Dave can't judge which is colder, his face or Karkat's claws. It's like comparing icebergs and glaciers - there's probably a scientific reason why one of the two would be colder than the other, but does he give a shit? Nope. No shits to give.

"Пожалуйста, уходи," the voice says, wearily. Dave gets the feeling it's Russian for 'get the fuck off my ice lawn' because the curtains get drawn on the window far off to the left of the door, too, where the walkway doesn't reach. This lady is having none of this bullshit today, and he can't say he really blames her.

Alright. That's cool. "Plan B," Dave says decisively, raising a hand and pointing at the next door over. "That one -"

The curtains get ripped across the windows of the apartment he's pointing to so fast that one of the corners of the fabric rips off the railing and hangs uselessly at a diagonal. Dave's finger droops a little.

"Why am I not surprised that Plan Bullshit is just as much a rousing success as plan A." Karkat doesn't even sound sarcastic anymore, just amazed. Dave's about to lose his cool and snap at the troll to come up with his own plan, if he thinks he can do better, but - god. He doesn't think he has the energy for that, right now. "This is just. Wow. We're fucked."

"Are you guys done lollygagging around?" a cheerful voice calls. Dave smacks his face with his palm as a figure in white skips back along the road and spins on a heel to face them, her hands on her hips. "You guppies! Stop attracting attention - any one of these people could be Crocker Corp!"

Feferi taps her foot and glances between Dave and Karkat expectantly.

If she's looking for an apology...good luck with that. Frankly, these people could be members of the KGB for all Dave cares. His eyelashes are starting to look frosty when he blinks. Karkat's doing his best impression of a miserable turtle as he retracts further into his hoodie. "We're going to lose claws in this cold, Peixes," the troll says, sour. "Unless you and your custodial abomination from hell have extra winter gear shoved up your chutes, you're gonna be on your fucking own. Is this getting through? Earth to Peixes, we're not all coldblooded fish people, here -"

"No need to get snappy!" Feferi says. Her eyes are clear and pinkish purple as they roll, which is better than her creepy grim thing earlier. It was different from Rose's grimdark thing - all opaque and smooth rather than dripping white fire and full of worms - but there's still the uncomfortable sensation of being looked through by something that thinks of people as utterly inconsequential, except maybe as a tool or as the butt of a horrifying joke. That sensation is still there, even now, but either Dave's gone numb enough not to notice it as much or the migraine of Glubby's many, many voices is far enough off shore that they've got some leeway.

"If you're cold, do a blood thing; anyway, I wouldn't let you two die." Feferi sniffs and knocks a boot against the side of a pole. Curtains flutter shut across the windows of the apartment complex across the street behind her and she turns unerringly to wave her hand at them. "I really thought you all were more prepared than this," she adds, turning back to him and Karkat with a hint of a sharp grin on her lips. "Shorely you can remember how to make everything work."

...Game stuff. Right. Ah, crap.

If Rose were here, she'd know some awesome warmth spell or something. Heck, John and Jade wouldn't even be in this situation, because the two of them could've teleported away at the first signs of trouble (though knowing those two, they'd be more inclined to punch the giant tentacle monster in the face than run away).

But nah. Dave is just the time guy. And with Glubby radiating crazy whispers at him, he couldn't even do anything with that. Right now, he can think of literally zero things that would help them prevent hypothermia or frostbite. When he checks through the chipped fragments of his shades (he should really swap those out) Karkat looks just as hornswoggled as Dave feels. If there's a blood thing for this, he must not know it.

They're so screwed. Is there a motif for this? Dave's ears have been ringing with screams, but... God. Why do they always know jackshit about what they need to know? Come on, it's not fair that the evil mind-controlled royal troll and her Horrorterror mom know more about their game powers than they do; is it really that hard to just get a freaking list of power up and cheat codes?
[display fraymotif options? y/n]

Oh. Shit. Ohhhhh shit. "Yes!" Dave says. Really loudly. It occurs to him that he may or may not have been spacing out again, and he hasn't said anything out loud in a while. Karkat twitches and Feferi looks at him like he's the crazy one. But whatev, whatev.

Dave's more interesting in frantically reading through the menu options playing across the shattered lenses of his shades.

Hell yeah. Score.

There's a lot of red, in two different shades. A few of the options have scrambled or crossed-out text that's fuchsia as hell, but little of it is legible and more than a few are greyed out, like a dead link. When someone catches Dave's arm and pulls, Dave follows on auto-pilot, Karkat's drawn face barely registering as Dave tries to sort through the sound byte samples cycling through his hearing.

[In the Blood's Beat] [Metronomic] [Bells, Bells, Bells!!] [Dutybound] [Allegretto Vivace] [Hot Blooded] [Pulse Syncronicity] [Bleed It Out] [Awake and Alive] [Back to Back] [Paint the Town Red]

Some have song verses, others look like groan-inducingly awful puns, other still sound almost familiar. Like Dave read them once but scrolled by in disinterest.

But one in particular catches his eye. Ten guesses which one. The first nine count, but you'd have to live with the shame of guessing wrong for the rest of your life. "Hot Blooded," he says aloud. "Yeah. That one."

Nothing happens.

Obviously, because it's the wrong shade of red. It's Karkat's red, it's Karkat's significant bratwurst red. Dave blinks until his eyes refocus and goes to reach out - wait, shit. Karkat's already got a grip on him. They're trailing after Feferi (Dave's autopilot is potent shit, let me tell you), passing by still more rows of dilapidated buildings and old machinery that's been abandoned by the wayside. There are more storage containers, the kind you'd find at a dock or a shipyard or something, but most of them are hanging open, empty. The cold's so sharp it's like brain freeze incarnate.

Even as Dave thinks that, Karkat stumbles, and nearly rams them into a metal pole without a sign on the street corner, because - right, they're both doing pretty shitty at this point. Dave manages to nudge them to the side at the last second, but Karkat's head bobs limply. He doesn't even look up. The music distracted Dave for a second there, but his mind's slowing to a sluggish crawl where sleep just sounds awesome. The sunlight burns through his broken shades, and all he wants to do is close his eyes. Why hasn't he replaced his sunglasses yet?

Not cool. Focus. "Say hot blooded," he says, shaking the arm that Karkat's using as part-leash, part-crutch.

"No. Stop...stop being s-stupid," Karkat says. The comeback has all the force and substance of damp tissue paper. "That song is shit and you know it."

What? Oh, right. That. "Please do not argue with me right now, bro. For like, five seconds, alright? That's it, that's all I ask. I swear I'm not messing with you."

Karkat sighs like a critically wounded elephant. "What?"

"Hot Blooded." Dave tries to make it do the color thing with his voice, but hell if he can hear if it worked or not. "Just say it, man."

"Honestly, I would have thought awful rap music, not awful eighties music." Karkat rolls his eyes and mumbles, "Hot Blooded."

Dave expects more of the usual random ass sounds and beats that the game thinks passes as theme music. His and Kanaya's stuff was passable but still kinda weird as hell. It usually all pianos and violins and flutes and wubbing with the occasional random tune thrown in.

But no. What starts playing is worse. So much worse.

[HOT BLOODED CHECK IT AND SEE I'VE GOT A FEVER OF ONE HUNDRED AND -]

Oh god. It's actually literally Hot Blooded. Of all the conceivably relevant fraymotifs in this goddamn stupid fucking game, they found the joke track.

On the other hand, Karkat hisses and starts radiating heat like a....radiator. Fuck. That analogy bombed. Pretend he didn't try to think that one. Karkat's hand goes from a cold cuff wrapped around his forearm to a localized point of heat so abruptly that it actually hurts. So that's good, that's fantastic. But Dave's not a furnace. Nothing's happening to him. He's still freezing his ass off over here. When he puts out a hand and concentrates, his timetable is there between one blink and the next, but all he gets when he fiddles around with the controls is -

[ Hot Blooded - basic notation ɕx.o. limit: 1 player effects: (max Knight echeladder advancement attained; see God Tier for limit breakers) ]

That's not fair. That's favoritism, is what it is. Or something. Dave tries to scroll through more of the motifs on his shades but another shard of glass falls out and that's that - most of his right field of vision is entirely clear, and the motif phrases fade out.

He looks down at the timetable, and his fingers splayed out pale and cold over the black and red surface, and grimaces. He couldn't think of any way time powers could pull off furnacekind, anyway. But heck, he would have said the same thing about Karkat's bleedy thing not three minutes ago. He just wants an extra jacket. Or a badass scarf, he totally used to wear those all the time, because irony is a demanding mistress and Houston in the summertime is an unspoken challenge. Even those dorky ass pajamas would be better than nothing and those things are hells of dorky. The cape alone would punch a hole in his coolness that no amount of irony could fix, but it would be warm, right? Right.
"Oh. That's...better," Karkat says, sounding much more awake than he did before. He inspects his hands warily, like he expects the heat to shut off at any moment. When he frowns at Dave, reluctant, his eyes have done the thing where contact lenses wither in the face of weird game shit, flaring bright blood red. Which is going to go over like a sack of bricks. "Oh my god what the fuck are you wearing."

Well the same thing's he's been wearing all along, obviously. But there's a little whisper in Dave's head, and when he glances down, uneasily, instinctively, to see what Karkat's talking about, only half of him is surprised to see that his suit and jacket are redder than they were before, and that there's extra fabric lying heavy on his back. It's a buffer between him and the cold air, and even though he couldn't say how or when exactly his clothes swapped out for god tier pajamas, he can't say it doesn't feel right.

He's probably taking this way too calmly. But also, these pajamas are really damn warm, and he's not about to stare looking gift pajamas in the mouth, even if they are the spawn of the same messed up, freaky game mechanics that let Pesterchum work at the bottom of the ocean. And hey, if he questions it, it might stop working, and then where would he be? Stuck in the middle of the Arctic with no pajamas, that's where.

Yeah, this whole situation is just freaky as hell. It's dreamlike and ten different kinds of surreal, but when Dave shakes the sleeves out to fall over his hands, they start warming up almost instantly, and that's too awesome to argue with. Warm is good. Warm is fantastic. Shake the dorky cloak over his shoulders, and it's even warmer. Who can argue with those kind of perks.

"What," a cold voice says, softly, "are you two doing?"

Fuckfuckfuck. Dave's hands move before Dave himself fully realizes what he's doing, reaching up and yanking his shades off the bridge of his nose to jam onto Karkat's face. He comes this damn close to jabbing the troll in the eye by mistake, but his coordination wins out at the last minute, so that the glasses land at an incredible angle on Karkat's face, but still manage to (mostly) cover his eyes. Time obliges by waiting until Dave's done the deed to snap back into motion, which is convenient; holding and pausing time has gotten a lot less painful since he stated using the timetables to manage all of his loops and stops. Then he hastily vanishes them, tucking his hands behind his back under his cloak, and starts looking anywhere but Feferi's suspicious face. He even whistles a little until Karkat elbows him hard in the sore spot developing in the squishy place under his ribs.

"Nothing." Karkat laughs tightly. "Nothing at all. Just did a fucking blood thing, whoop-dee-fucking-do." Dave nods along after a short delay, flashing Feferi's his least smug smirk while he crosses his fingers under his cape.

God, that thing is so convenient. He's changed his mind. The cape is useful. It can stay.

"...We need to go this way, now," Feferi says at last, her voice still soft and remote. Dave fights the urge to shiver - not out of cold anymore, oddly, but out of unease. When the tyrianblood turns her back on them again, boots crunching in frost-coated grass as she heads back to the main road, Dave lets his shoulders loosen fractionally.

He doesn't even want to think about how close they're cutting it with Feferi here - New York was a hell of a lot bigger than this place, and Rose's grimdark tore it up so bad they're still digging through the mess of the uprooted subway system and toppled buildings weeks later. How long until troll princess over here loses it? Until the giant calamari out in the bay decides it's had enough of dicking around in the water, and heaves itself onto land?

"What did you have me do?" Karkat demands, muttering under his breath as they start after Feferi again (at a reasonable distance, obvi). The troll lifts one of his feet extra high and lets melting snow drip off the soles of his sneakers with a look of grudging amazement before setting it back down. He also raises his hands like he wants to yank Dave's shades off and snap them in two, but Dave bats the troll's claws away before he can. The black fragments keep plinking out to fall onto the street, leaving a trail of glass in their wake, but Feferi didn't seem to notice Karkat's eye color change, so that's good. "How did you even know that would work? And when the fuck did you change into god tier clothing, you ass?"

Dave shrugs and sticks his hands in his hoodie pockets. They're toasty as hell in there, which is a nice change, though he still has to deal with the pain of having sensation return to his fingers and toes. He could waste brain power trying to figure out what happened to his original outfit, but he's got to keep his head in the game, here. "Been hearing more weird game stuff, lately," he says, tapping a finger against the side of his temple where the bands of his shades used to be. "Sometimes it seems like all you have to do is, like, ask. None of this game stuff really ever stopped working, or EB wouldn't have been able to get hooked on his anti emotional trauma fix for all these years."

Karkat makes a face, first at Dave, and then at Feferi's back. "I'm sorry."

He almost doesn't catch that, on account of Karkat usually speaks at a default yell, and Dave's thrown by the sudden switch to a reluctant mutter. "Whoa, what?"

"I said I'm sorry!" Karkat shouts. Dave winces and they both glance at Feferi at the same time, but all she does is toss them another impatient look and stride further away. Dave can make out the sea through the buildings again as they near the shore, the apartments falling away to make room for even more dilapidated warehouses and - uh. Actually, not so dilapidated. In fact, some of the stuff they're passing right now looks almost new; there are containers that have shiny steel locks holding them shut, and through the gaps between buildings Dave can make out piers that stretch across the water, lined with machinery that isn't rusted in the slightest.

"I walked us right into a trap. Yay, me," Karkat says. He's leaving a trail of melted snow and damp concrete in his wake. "I didn't...fuck. I didn't think things would turn out like this."

Dave has to point out - "No one thought things would turn out like this. This is some pretty fucking weird shit, even for us, man. Don't sweat it." Of course, Dave will never let Karkat live this down, but the point is you have to wait until the opportune moment. Ragging on the guy right now would only end with their attracting Feferi's attention, or worse. Better if they both keep their heads down, let her do her thing, and try to figure out some way back to America that doesn't involve going anywhere near Glubby. Ever again.

(He's trying not to think about what he saw in those scattered moments between going through that portal and closing his eyes. It was...bad. Bad enough to make Glub's creepypasta self look downright harmless. If they never take a detour through that place again, it'll be too soon. He likes his brains on the inside of his skull, not dripping out through his ears, thanks.)

But hey, at least it's not cold anymore. He really is willing to put up with all goddamn kinds of strange and illogical game mechanics if it means he and Karkat don't die out here over something as dumb as walking up to a Horrorterror and saying hi.

Anyway, that's reminds him. He scoots over midstep, right next to Karkat, and the troll leans away automatically with a look like he's barely restraining the urge to shove Dave into a snowy drift. But they've got problems, and said problems include the fact that Dave's not sure what will happen if said Horrorterror decides it would be happyfun times to go to town in Dave's head. Rose's grimdark dude definitely wanted to; he remembers that much being discussed afterward. He just won the lottery here, by being a Derse dreamer with no idea how to do the mind magic thing like Rose does, and no convenient void-themed accessories to keep unwanted noodles out of his head.

So he pulls the zipper on Karkat's backpack open and starts dumping all of his stuff in there. Anything that might cause trouble or be a weapon, other than his swords, goes into the backpack. It's already crammed full of random shit, but Dave makes room. If things go as horribly wrong as they potentially could, Karkat might end up on his own with two tanglebuddies and a Horrorterror on his hands.

"What are you doing?!" Karkat squirms and tries to sidle his backpack out from Dave's hands. "Carry your own stuff, you fucking hoarder -"

"I can hear more than you do," Dave says, gritting his teeth as he gives the next item due consideration - and then chooses to chug the last of his bottle of apple juice right here and now, rather than tuck it into the side pocket of Karkat's backpack. Too much risk that it might fall out. "In New York, it - they get inside your head. Me and Rose get whammied worse that John and probably Jade, I think, and you have to have seen what Rose did on national fricking television by now. Dude, you need to be ready to go." He isn't entirely sure where he's been keeping these random throwing knives (he thought he left them at home, but things have been making a weird habit of turning up out of the blue when he needs them, lately, just like something that he's forgotten, something that nags at him whenever there's a quiet moment because he can't remember where that thing went) but he puts them in the side pocket instead. For, you know, ease of access. Does Karkat even know how to work knifekind?

"Do not turn evil on me. Fucking no," Karkat nearly shrieks. "This situation couldn't possibly get any worse. It'll implode into a fucking supermassive black hole of worseness at this rate, so you better be clearing out whatever horrific fuckery you think might be invading your thinkpan right now, Dave."

"Sure, my mind is a temple, blah blah, yadda yadda. Take this stuff anyway." Dave's so preoccupied with shoveling a bunch of partially used red pens into the ratty mesh pocket on the very front of Karkat's backpack, he only notices that they've reached something new when Karkat abruptly slows down and Dave has to brake hard to keep from hitting the kid.

Their surroundings go from crumbling, ex-Soviet shithole chic to brilliant Crockertier red in less than half a step, and Dave cringes because it's so red. Like, neon, fire truck levels of red. Rows and rows of piers stretch out into the water, with a gleaming red shuttle sitting at the point where one dock meets the land and an entire stretch of land that has been cleared of rusted debris to make room for shipment containers and enough forklifts to transport a small nation. People in red and white uniforms (most of them trolls, but who's counting?) move briskly from one station to the next, ducking out of sharp new buildings that line the docks and weaving between containers with cutting efficiency as they go about their creepy business. Two of the longest piers on the bay are crowded with absolutely enormous machine parts and curved sections of metal that are probably taller than Dave is, like pieces to a 3D puzzle that Dave can't make heads or tails of.

Compared to how dead and abandoned most of the town behind them felt while they were passing through, with what few people remain shuttered in behind closed doors, the sudden industrial activity is downright spooky. For a moment, Dave could swear he catches the shadow of a huge figure passing between two curving arcs of red metal - but it's just his eyes playing tricks on him, and then next second he darts with Karkat and Feferi behind the relative safety of an older, rusted shipping container to avoid the wandering eyes of a pair of Crocker trolls on patrol.

"Oh my god," Karkat says, mostly to Feferi, his face one huge no. There's a light layer of snow on the ground, like it's been cleared off and salted to prevent the kind of slick build up they saw down the street, that Karkat's new internal motif is doing its best to turn into slush. They've cycled through that song at least three times now, but Dave has the power of volume control, thank god. He wants to ask if Karkat can hear that, at least, but now's really not the time. "You weren't completely making all this up. What the fuck."

"Why would I make anything up?" Feferi whispers back, waving them back further into the shadow of the container with a hand, the other splayed out against the metal to help her keep her balance in a crouch.

Karkat whips around and nearly knocks into Dave, who hadn't realized they were huddled that close until he almost takes an elbow to the jaw. He's still, after all this, clinging to his backpack full of random shit, his claws tearing mini holes in the material so that he has to keep adjusting his grip before the straps just rip in two. "Fuck it. Fuck this. Fuck everything. We're out of here," Karkat hisses, pushing up onto his feet and dragging Dave up with a hand that burns.

Feferei reaches out without looking back, her hand closing on Karkat's forearm in a vice with an almost audible creak that makes Karkat's face pale. Problem. Dave weighs his chances of getting his ass kicked into the Arctic Ocean - and realizes that, hey, apparently watching someone getting their arm snapped in two isn't something he's able to put up with. He has fucks to give about that particular scenario. Feferi could beat his ass through the pavement, but he's still the only resident pajama god wonder present, unless Feferi omitted some real pertinent shit.

When he pulls a piece of shit sword to level at Feferi's face, he's not laughing. "Let him go. Now, lady."

The muttering migraine crawls its way into his head like horrific static in an instant, choked screams and burbling whispers crackling in his ears as Feferi - and through her, something else - considers the broken edge of sharp metal inches from her eye. She doesn't turn her head, but her eyes flicker to and burbling whispers crackling in his ears as Feferi - and through her, something else - considers the tension that almost has him trembling like a total scrub. Be cool. So cool. Frostier than this icy hell. Don't freak out don't freak out don't freak out. Fuck he can't do this.

"...God," Feferi says at last, in that way that means she's not talking about any religion Dave's ever heard of. Extra voices layer over hers like drowning echoes. Her eyelids flicker as blanched white swallowing her irises like a second lid, fuchsia blood limning the white circles of grimlight. Her head tilts to the side, too quick, too stilted. "You think to meddle? Peixes belong to we."

Don't freak out don't freak out don't freak out. Fuck he can't do this.

But he's the only one who can. "Just let him go," Dave says, his arm strung like piano wire with tension that almost has him trembling like a total scrub. Be cool. So cool. Frostier than this icy hell. "That's not meddling. That's me asking nicely."

Feferei narrows creepy, possessed eyes; Karkat breathes so raggedly Dave's wondering how much pain the kid is in, his eyes too obviously red through Dave's broken shades. He looks like he could pirouette off the handle at the drop of a hat.

Dave just breathes - sword's still half an inch from that eye - and breathes - so what if Rose's mangotango buddy dropped him like a rock with a single hit - and breathes -
And that's not terrifying at all, Dave thinks. "Yeah?" Come on, think of something badass to fire back. "Time is still on my side, you cheapskate back alley sushithulhu ripoff." Nice. Very nice.

"P'tea 'se s'Fr' o'r' f'r' e'n'd." Feferi tosses her hood back, snapping the buckles that tuck around her horns with a practiced flick so that her long hair spills free. The Horrorterror rides her smile one last time, smug and simpering as it casts a disdainful look at Dave.

...That was ominous. Feferi spins on a heel before Dave can figure out how to make words work and ask her what the hell that meant, her horns giving away her position even when she ducks behind a crate. She doesn't spare them another glance as she makes her way, bold as brass, closer to the very exposed docks with minimal cover. The Crockercorp workers fail to see her only because of sheer dumb luck, and maybe a little bit because of her white clothes that camouflage her a little as she skirts workers with the most lackadaisical stealth gambit Dave's ever been forced to watch in action. Bro would have a shitfit over how little effort Feferi makes to actually conceal herself. She fails ninja school forever. No retakes.

Which leaves him and Karkat to do their own thing, apparently. Whatever that may be. Helping Feferi right now is just way too shitty a plan, at this point, for Dave to consider it an option. "So, play least in sight until Feferi blows up...whatever she came here to blow up?" he suggests, scratching the side of his head with the sword's crossguard and looking at Karkat. "Or make a break for it? We could try to borrow a phone and call Jade, maybe? Idk man."

A quick inspection of his own phone just confirms that the chaos filter is still humming right along, rendering Pesterchum a living nightmare to try to message with and garbling the regular call screen so badly that Dave can't make sense of the number buttons - they appear to be written in Necronomihell-speech, which he just so happens to not be fluent in. If this is permanent damage, he's gonna be pissed. The inability to text is already giving him preemptive hives; the last time they had a tentacle monster in town, it took his collar out right away, and neither he nor Karkat would do well if Dave was reduced to sign language and attempted Horrortexting.

Karkat's looking at him weirdly, though. It's not even a glare, which is not natural. "What?" Dave says, instantly on the defensive.

"Nothing," Karkat says, after a delay. His eyebrows snap back into a frown. Good. "We didn't exactly get very fucking far when we tried running the first time."

"Yeah, but maybe now she's pissed enough to let us go," Dave points out, "whereas before, she had yet to realize how annoying we can be when kidnapped."

Karkat snorts softly, reaching up to rub at one eye. "There has to be a working phone somewhere in this area," he says, leaning over to scope out the crowded piers before them. "The rest of town is probably a crapshot, but if we knock out one of these Crocker Corp fuckers without being noticed -"

"We can yoink one of their company PDAs. On it." Dave nods, and scans the yard for an easy mark. Flash in, flash out - piece of cake. He might not even need to worry about knocking someone out and leaving an unconscious body lying around for an employee to trip over if he's fast enough. Cryptic as hell warnings about time aside, Dave's pretty sure that all he needs is a spin of the timetables and the two of them can have their pick of phones to steal out of unsuspecting corporate slave pockets.
It would have been easy. So easy. Naturally, they never get a chance to try it. Hell, they don't even get as far as having the requisite pointless argument about whose phone to steal, because three things happen in quick succession that render the entire plan null and void.

First, a voice breaks out over the roar of heaters and machines and power tools and forklifts - "What're you all jabberin' on aboat? This haul better be in ship-top shape! #standards"

Dave may know so little about troll culture it's legit embarrassing at this point, but he still knows the Condesce's voice when he hears it. Karkat lets loose a strangled noise, eyes wide as saucers as Dave yanks the troll back as far into the shadow of the container as they can go, crouching down with his heart thumping in his chest - he didn't see her, so she probably didn't see them, right? Right?

But then the second thing happens. That thing. Which just so happens to be Feferi completely and utterly screwing herself over. Dave suspects that this might have been part of Glubby's plan for a while now, since the theme of the day here seems to have been mostly focused on causing ludicrous amounts of mayhem on a relatively short budget.

Having Feferi walk out from behind an idling forklift, stand blatantly out in the open so that people in red start to slow down and stiffen, turning to stare at the interloper in their midst - that qualifies. It gets worse, obviously. Feferi then reaches out, seizes the nearest computer station to just rip it out of the ground with the wrenching screech of cold metal warping, and finally tosses the whole thing overhand at the nearest drum barrel.

Of course, the second the sparking computer station cracks the drum, the whole stupid thing explodes.

The icing on the cake is when, after the (honestly very minor) explosion, Feferi walks away from the immediate blast radius without a care in the world. "Tethys!" she calls.

There aren't enough hands in the world to encompass the magnitude of the facepalm needed here.

"Dave," Karkat says, sounding faint. "Dave, oh my god -"

"Yeah, she's screwed," Dave agrees, unable to pry his eyes away from the burning oil drum, and the space the fire clears out as the red shirt brigade scatters. Feferi looks transcendent, her hair swirling out behind her as she walks toward a short - absolutely goddamn miniscule, tbh - figure that's her polar opposite, dressed all in black and fuchsia and gold with the kind of hair that eats combs for breakfast. The horns are the same basic shape, however, but the Condesce has had centuries to grow those things out until they look almost as tall as she is.

"Dave -"

Oh man, they've both got trident or 3Dent or whatever -dentkind out, now. This strife is actually happening. Dave thinks now would be an awesome time for the two of them to get the hell out of here before crazy tyrianblood senior and junior over there decide to blow up more shit in their quest to see who can poke more holes in the other before noon. This is equal parts terrible and awesome and is the phone's camera working, at least? Maybe if they get this on video, John will be too distracted by the epic fight sequence to panic when they tell him what happened today -

"Dave, you spongedeprived asshole, we have a problem," Karkat says, voice cracking all over the place.

Dave turns and oh.
Right. Now they're screwed, too.

He and Karkat stare up at the massive troll looming over them.

Said massive troll stares back down from a...considerable height.

"You should not be here," the troll says.

"Well no fucking shit, Sherlock," Karkat fires back. While he sounds like he's about to wet his pants in terror, he also rolls his eyes so hard they nearly achieve orbital velocity, which means they've at least reached the panic saturation point, beyond which there is only flippant bullshit and hysterical laughter and running for their lives.

The troll - good fucking grief, even if this guy's a blueblood, he's got to be literally older than America, at least - inspects them through lightly tinted goggles, long, blue-black hair slinking over his shoulders when he shakes his head. "That is not my name."

"Yo, E%!" How did the Condesce even pronounce that? Karkat flinches back against the container, wheezing, while Dave grabs his own cape and flings it over Karkat's head. Karkat doesn't even tear it off, which means shit's dire as hell. "See anyfin interestin' over there? Looks like we got us a reel motherglubbin' moron wanderin' around, not minding her own business."

Dave doesn't dare twist around or creep to the corner of the shipping container to see where the Condesce is, or where Feferi stands now - Karkat is frozen, swallowing with a click that sounds like bone snapping to Dave's overstrained ears. Desperate, unable to tear his eyes off the blueblood in front of them, Dave reaches out and yanks the cape further down over Karkat's head, the ambient temperature rising another three degrees as Dave shoves him down and awkwardly tries to not-hug the troll in an epic attempt at making it look like Dave's the only one crouching here.

This would be more successful and make at least twice as much sense if the blueblood hadn't already spotted them. But to be fair, the guy doesn't seem to have the fastest reflexes right now.

"...I am working," the blueblood says, sounding puzzled, faint frown lines creasing his brow as he continues to watch Dave and the lump-formerly-known-as-Karkat. "I am not wandering."

"Oh, for glub's - naut you, gurlfrond. I was reefering to this dumb heiress of mine over here. Just get yo ass over here and do me a solid."

"Ah." And just like that, the blueblood shrugs and...starts walking away, blinking owlishly at Dave one last time before nodding to him and continuing on his - her? - merry way. "Yes, my Condescension. I will be there momentarily."

Jesus fucking christ, did they really just get away with that? Under the cape a new sauna has come into being, but it's another few beats before Dave feels absolutely positive that the blueblood isn't coming back (???) and lifts the cape off Karkat's head before he accidentally broils him or something. God, they've gone from being too cold to having the exact opposite kind of problems. He almost misses -

Jk, jk. Dave would rather they die of overheating than go back to the hypothermia thing. Living in Houston, it was always the way he expected to go. Karkat doesn't appear to be suffering any ill effects from running this constant fever, either, so who's complaining? Nobody, that's who.

Karkat does look appalled when he blinks and sees the blueblood wandering off toward the commotion in the dockyard. "You're fucking joking," he says, as the two of them creep over and crank their necks around to peek out around the corner of the container. "I mean, coldbloods can be
"This is not something to complain about, man," Dave says. The sunlight that’s been stabbing his eyes finally skulks out of sight behind a veil of clouds - they’re thin and ragged, but enough to cast a muted grey tone over the ice and metal that have been reflecting the light so it was a million times brighter than it had to be. This close to the water it...it smells like cold, and salt, and steel, and judging by the migraine Dave can feel nibbling on his brain, all of the attention of the Horrorterror out in the deep waters far off-shore just focused on this yard in particular with avid, hungry interest.

Karkat appears to be having a wheezing fit, but he's still whisper-yelling at a volume that no one else appears to be able to hear, so Dave lets him go off for a bit. "Fuck you and your comically blasé standards, I want to know what asshole made the executive decision to make the two of us into such pathetic, leprous specimens of uselessness that we aren't taken seriously even when we get caught in the middle of the fucking act of trespassing on the Condesce's top secret black market shipping yard of doom! This doesn't seem like something to be grateful about, this is just another first place trophy to add to my ever-accumulating wealth of shitty awards testifying to the fact that we suck as heroes."

"Dude, keep your negative Nancy vibes on the DL, alright? Just think your angry troll happy thoughts or something. Like, look, we're not dead yet." Always a plus, in Dave's book. "Now shut up, we're still hiding."

The good news is, when Dave gives the yard another onceover, most of the Crocker employees have bolted, darting into buildings with dark windows or, in the case of sea trolls, yanking on hoods and face masks and diving into the frigid surf over the sides of the piers, swimming for god knows what.
Which leaves only three trolls in the center of the yard, surrounding by machines and forklifts - Feferi, acting more rabid by the second as she prowls around in circles, eyes white and wide; the Condesce, who stands her ground while Feferi circles, close enough for Dave to make out the disgruntled expression on her face; and the blueblood, who honestly just looks like she got lost along the way and is perplexed as to why there are two people snarling at each other in the middle of her work station.

Feferi gets as far as, "Tethys, I'm here t-" before the Condesce ploughs right over her, voice pitched to carry. "Unbelievable," she says, tapping the trident against the ground with a scowl. "Un. Be.
Lievable. This is what I get for tryna be nice and shit, so kelp me god. I mean, what did I tell you?"
She doesn't even wait for Feferi to finish opening her mouth. "WHAT DID I MOTHERGLUBBING TELL YOU?!"

Karkat flinches; whatever he was about to whisper dies a sudden death and emerges a faint, whistling noise of sheer terror. Feferi steps back with her jaw dropped, mouth moving but apparently stunned speechless by the sudden roar. Dave doesn't blame either of them - he's not sure how the blueblood just bows her head and waits, unflinching as the Condesce keeps shouting over Feferi's stammered noises. "I told you," the older troll goes on, "I told you, don't let that crazy Glub-bitch into yo head. Because she makes you crazy. And so what did you do? You got all glubbin' cuttley with her." The tyrianblood raises her culling fork and jabs it - out to the side, toward the sea. She's in motion now, circling around Feferi, who can only backpedal in bristling, snarling confusion. "Now the tentabitch is out there, ain't she?! And she's got you all hyped up on some cray scheme where you actually think you can paddle up to my backdoor and not get a fork through your fucking face!"

Holy shit. They might want to get out of here. Or better yet, never have come anywhere near this place to begin with, on account of there's now officially an older-than-sin troll looking furious enough to stab anyone who so much as breathes at her funny. Karkat might not have been groundlessly paranoid when they had that three hour long argument concerning how helping Feferi oppose the Condesce could lead to one bloodthirsty troll on a rampage and three dead idiots. Dave feels kind of bad about that now.

Scrap all previous plans. Hell, they can hitchhike across all of Russia to get home. Their chances of surviving would still be higher than if they stuck around here trying to steal a phone. Between Glubby and Feferi and Condy - nah. There's no way. Karkat's already having some kind of minor heart attack over here, just from those two yelling at each other. What'll happen when they start trying to kill each other?

Dave'll hold time. He can do that, now. The trick of having Karkat follow him into a flashstep pause might be a little more difficult to pull off, since Dave doesn't have the time or the chill needed to sort through fraymotifs and abilities to find one that would replicate what happened with Kanaya the other day. But Dave can carry him if it comes down to the wire. Pausing used to knock him on his ass if he held it too long, but the timetables smoothed all that shit out.

...But could he really walk away and leave Feferi to (presumably) die in the most misguided smackdown ever?

Also, how many of Dave's internal organs would Karkat try to perforate if he dragged him away, after the troll pried himself from his weird codependent thing with John just to make it this far?

"We need to help her," Karkat says, taking off the shades and dumping his backpack on the ground. Which basically answers all those questions.

"Come on, maybe she can handle this on her own." Dave realizes about ten seconds too late that playing devil's advocate here isn't going to make a dent in Karkat's new awesome fun suicide mission mindset; the troll just peels off his hoodie and starts digging through his backpack, removing the new mask Kanaya made for him with claws that are shaking with something that's not cold. "How many more stupid things are we going to do in our lives before we learn better?"

Karkat stops in the middle of pulling on his mask, mulls it over, and then says, "At least one more."

"Probably, yeah."

"Oh. Awesome." Dave grabs a handful of his pajama shirt's hem, grimaces, and then lets it go. He could try to turn it back into a suit, but what if that turns off the buffer between him and the freezing cold air? As unquestionably lame as these god tier jammies are, he really, really likes being warm. Couldn't he at least get, like, a time-themed suit? How hard would that be?

Between one second and the next, the long sleeved shirt and pants adjust themselves so that they look like a suit. This is a little off-putting, due to the fact that they still feel like really soft, warm pajamas. But then his cape and the weird little hood thing he never wears up mold into a suit jacket, an enormous red gear still plastered over his chest, and Dave shrugs internally. "What's the plan. Just so I can get a generous head start on all the many, many ways it'll inevitably go to shit?"

By the time he looks back at Karkat, the troll has done that weird thing where he appears to have flipped an internal switch; he's met with a wide, cocky smirk that permanent-raging-thunderclouds Karkat would never wear, and bright red eyes that almost manage to look not-terrified in the face of extremely reckless life choices. "The plan is, don't fucking die."
...Wait. "Can that not be the plan?" Dave says, horrified. "What part of our plans go wrong do you not understand, holy shit!"

Logic barely gets a shrug from Karkat. "Fine. Fuck it. The plan is, help the Condesce." He nods, his smile growing wider as he goes on. "And also, we are not going to try to successfully grab Feferi and escape back to Seattle. That is the opposite of the thing we plan to be doing." He eyeballs Dave with one eye twitching. "We are definitely planning on dying horribly in the process of achieving these goals. Please tell me you understand what I'm getting at here, you obtuse fuck."

Dave pauses, and then whispers, "So, like, we're gonna try to reverse-psych out the universe?"

"Any better ideas?" Karkat whispers back, hissing out of the corner of his mouth.

No. No, this is exactly the kind of shit Dave can get behind. This may well be the most hilariously ironic plan that he's ever heard of. He might be tearing up a little with pride; his eyes feel unabashedly moist as he claps Karkat on the shoulder. "I just want you to know that I approve of this plan so hard. There is no possible way it could go wrong. It's foolproof."

Karkat squints at him, suspicious, and then gives a short nod. "Not even we could possibly fuck this up. Because we're better than that, now."

This plan is going to suck so bad.

Dave can hardly wait.

--

Elsewhere...

The last time James Harley ventured forth in Siberia, he inspired three separate Bond films.

Alas! His efforts to play least in sight mean that he hasn't been able to get into a vigorous bout of fisticuffs in the longest time. Even with this excellent cybernetic body making up for the many ways his body began to fail in his later years, he simply can't afford to get into the kind of flashy battles that marked his youth. Dearest Joanna, too, is a sprightly as one could hope for, but her remarkable hands can only make up for so much, with her age and her old wound.

The two of them knew something was afoot from the moment Joanna was gunned down upon young John's arrival. But damn and blast it all, if their lone source of information on the subject didn't clam up when they tried to understand just what went on that day. Joanna never saw her attacker, and blood loss soon rendered her unconscious.

Anyway. Even if the circumstances of what went on all those years ago remain murky, it is at least clear whose work this nonsense has been. A few day's worth of reconnaissance upon his arrival in Russia has made obvious the full extent of the operation. The Condesce has ever taken the philosophy 'go big or go home' to heart. James can't fathom what might have drawn the E%ībimus to work on a project such as this, so far outside the troll's usual area of expertise, but neither does he appear to be here against his will. Set Zahhak to a task, and he tends to fixate upon it to the exclusion of all else until it's complete; it is a trait that, given his druthers, James would rather prefer the troll kept. It saved his own life, after all, though it could not preserve his body.

Everything is mechanized now, and though his mind still tells him he is feeling concern, urging his heart to pound at the sight of the armada that the Condesce has accumulated in the remote waters, there is nothing but the thrum of his engines, ceaseless as the finest clockwork. Replicating the physical signs of emotion was not high on the E%ībimus's list of priorities in this body's design. It is a loss. But one that James has become pragmatic about. The work he has been able to accomplish as Bailey has proven too significant for him to have died with his body.

Unfortunately, there are limits to what he can accomplish, here. Being concerned about the Condesce's plans does not mean he can do anything to stop them, particularly given the fact that he has a policy of avoiding the tyrianblood's works as much as possible. His curiosity nags him regardless. The Condesce is a power-hungry creature, and always has been; she funnels vast sums of money into the Midnight Crew's coffers at regular intervals on the sly, but there's not a single black or felt suit to be seen at any of these subarctic construction yards. Which means that this is one of her private projects. Something of her own devising, though damn it all if James can't quite put a finger on what.

Nothing to be done for it, he supposes. Joanna might be able to learn more about this with her methods, but she's half a world away yet, occupied with gathering information on where the Felt kept and raised these Scratch children that Jade and her friends fought the other day. The E%ībimus appears content to remain here, and he has ever been a difficult one to keep tabs on, so he may as secure here as he would be anywhere else in the world.

There's just one last thing that James means to investigate before taking the obvious course of action in order to deal with the Condesce, and then return to assist Jade in unearthing the suspected traitor in their ranks. A hunch and nothing more brought James south of the town of Tiksi, and what should he lay eyes upon but a figure in dark clothing, doggedly making their way slowly but surely north toward the settlement and its secret docks. James found a place to settle out of sight, going quiet so as to not give away his position with the rockets in his feet, and observes as the figure presses forward with a lowered head. The wind shear here is blowing at a strong angle, but they don't seem to heed it. James telescopes his vision and can make out that the coat worn by the figure is dark grey (not a perfect midnight black, but close enough to be of concern) lined with darker fur, a hat wrapped low over their ears in the same dark material. She - he thinks that is the case here, at least - traverses the worn road with long, easy strides, belying the fact that she must have been walking this road for at least an hour to have come so far without being detected by the Condesce's patrols, on guard against those who'd approach the town by car or train or aeroplane.

But a lone walker is discreet enough, in the correct circumstances, to go unnoticed. The Colonel has played such risky games before. And this woman is tall, the strands of her hair tossing in the wind where they escape from beneath her hat, never once turning aside from her path. She might well walk right up to the water's edge in another few hours. It's admirable, if potentially a suicide mission; the Condesce never has taken well to having her projects thwarted or her secrets uncovered.

Still. It's only one woman.

Or so James thinks, until the first, distant rumble rocks the earth beneath his feet.

And then another.

And another, this time strong enough to send his stabilizing servomotors into a tizzy. On the road, the figure comes to a halt, swaying with each roll of the earth. When she lifts her hands to unwind the scarf covering the lower half of her face, James sees that there are symbols knitted into the scarf and the backs of her gloves. But the next jarring rattle is what finally causes him to lift his gaze from the woman, who has tilted her head back to expose her throat, and look up at what she's turned to observe -

- and up -

- and further up still -
- until at last, as a final THMP makes the hills roll, James realizes what he's looking at here. Douse him in gravy and call him a biscuit. Of all the things he would expect to find roaming greater Siberia, he can most certainly attest to the fact that this... was not even in the vicinity of being on the list. It's a specter out of the old, sensationalized radio broadcasts and films of his youth, though none of what made it to the screen truly approached realism in portraying these creatures.

He would be afraid, but exhilaration will have to do - he's always been more of one for appreciating something as awe-inspiring as these beings for what they are, rather than frittering away his reason on fear. He's well concealed where he rests now; he can't imagine that the now-dwarfed figure on the road will be able to duck out of sight of the approaching giants in time.

For that matter, the woman doesn't seem at all that inclined to move. James watches, fascinated, as the foremost of the enormous beings takes another thunderous step; then it kneels, not at all the slow, ponderous motion James expected from a thing of that size. Ball joints swivel, the knee elegantly bending as the triangular helm inclines - and then parts, the visor splitting along the line of symmetry so that the woman gazes up into a hollow compartment where the giant's visor used to guard its face.

James can't restrain his curiosity anymore; by gum, what kind of gentleman-adventurer would he be if he didn't investigate this further. He begins to inch forward, scanning the terrain for a second vantage point. It doesn't necessarily need to be closer to the two giants and the woman, but a more useful angle would be greatly appreciated.

But although he cannot quite see into the hollow of the bishop's visor yet, the words that emerge are perfectly clear in James's mind, a rumble of thunder that seems to sound everywhere at once.

??: You are she who sent word through the Shatranj?

"Ах. Нравится меня, что мое сообщение достигнуты вами в времени," the woman says, her voice low but carrying. She shakes her head, but James is too busy attempting to adjust his vantage point to see her expression. When she continues, she sounds almost reverent. "Удивительный. Они реальны. Я надеюсь, что я не тяготит вас."

??: No, not at all. We appreciate your willingness to share what you've seen with us. It was very enlightening.

??: We have sent scouts more discreet than these ahead of us, but already we believe we have some idea as to what could have inspired such a vision as the one you related.

??: If we are wrong in this, then these two will perhaps be disappointed not to have been able to exercise more after so long a time. But if we have interpreted it correctly, their capabilities will be of the utmost necessity.

The woman laughs softly, so that even his rather improved ears need to strain to catch the sound. "Вы знаете больше, чем я знаю. Метеоры и хаос и пустота - я не понимаю..."

??: We have the benefit of some prior knowledge.

??: This creature of the grimlight should never have been allowed to manifest itself a full body on the material plane; if we recall correctly, it had an unfair advantage that has allowed it to cheat the spirography system without corrupting the gates it passes through.

"Как вы говорите." The woman mumbles something, too low for James to hear and translate, but then her next sentences are audible. He's almost in a position to see who speaks from within the titanic carapacian's helmet; his Russian, thankfully, is passable enough that he understands most of it without needing to rely on internal translator programs. "Я намерен наблюдать, что происходит здесь, в лицо. Смогу ли я быть в пути?"

??: Oh, not at all. Do you wish to accompany us? It will make short work of your journey, and we owe you a boon for alerting us to the situation here.

The woman bows her head, a gentle smile still playing on her lips. "Большое спасибо. Меня будет честью."

??: Then it is settled. Welcome to the Arch Deaconstructor, friend.

And with that, a pale claw, broader than any James Harley has seen in all his many, many years, reaches out from within the giant's helmet. The grate of the war carapacian's visors swivels down to form a ramp until the Russian woman is able to take the claw offered to her with a nod, her hair streaming around her face in the wind as she steps lightly into the breach. Above, the giant blinks doleful eyes from within the shadows, just as ivory pale as the rest of its grand shell. Another quick step and the woman vanishes behind the visor as it deftly slides shut, swallowed whole.

But James has little doubt who held out a claw to help her into the larger carapacian's control center. He has even fewer doubts about what could have possibly brought the Grey Protector of the carapacian race this far north. Damned the Condesce. What on earth has she done to provoke this kind of response from a minor world power that has spent the past few decades cultivating a reputation as an alien concerned only with mediating internal disputes among his own people?

James ducks back just as the second giant impatiently pushes past the first, a dark Siege Titan with a more heavily built carapace, bristling with heavy armaments and sharp edges - less elegant, perhaps, but brutal. Each step, at this proximity, rattles him to his core, jostling his brain in its chassis. The titans cut a trail of deep tracks into the dark, frozen soil, the pale bishop following close behind the rook.

Incredible. To think, he would live to see the war engines that ended the second great war walk the earth once more. It is information like this that keeps James Harley constantly on the move, trying constantly to decipher the many moving parts that this impossible game has set or glitched into action.

He intended to give the docks at Tiksi a wide berth, and perhaps consult the Condesce only from a safe distance (as most interactions with her have to be carried out) but now, he finds he has no other choice.

When the two war carapacians have receded into the distance, striding effortlessly toward the coast like beasts towards Bethlehem, the Lieutenant-Colonel kicks his rockets into gear and follows in their wake.

--

TT: Sollux, do you have a moment?
TA: no
TT: Excellent. There may be an issue with the Pesterchum client. Dave and Karkat at least seem to be experiencing tentacle difficulties on their end.
TT: *Technical, excuse me. And here I am without even an ounce of alcohol to blame that one on.
TA: no2 have time for you people two diick around with the securiity why thii2 why now
TA: where ii2 the problem exactly TT: Several of their words appear to have been replaced with a selective filter, and they cut off abruptly mid-conversation.
TA: well there's nothing wrong on my end
TA: oh. look like their app data is corrupted. they'll need two reboot and download a clean copy of the app before it'll start up again
TT: What could have caused it?
TA: weird hit, what else? i'm more concerned that it happened to both phones at once TA: turn off all your phones and hit, i don't want anyone communicating with the client in case they're contagious
TT: Would it be safe to try and call them instead of using the chat? Texts don't seem to be going through either.
TA: you could try but it look like they're out of service range anyway TA: you people and your fucking codependency is so you can't go more than two hours without gazing longingly at each other colorful text
TA: anyway, tell your alien queen that if she wants to overwrite file with that terminal 2he need two input the correct encryption key TT: I'll pass the word on. What is the encryption key?
TA: AA away you'll know by then tomorrow
TT: She also says that you all will be visiting us soon. Coincidence?
TA: hahaha, that joke is funny now that i'm hearing it the second time amazing
TA: hold on i need two punch someone before they blow up the kitchen again TT: Which someone?
TA: all of them
TA: just keep your phone off for a few hours or something until i can run a diagnostic TT: As you will.
TT: I have other urgent business to care for.

- John is starting to get the feeling that there's gonna be an incredibly stupid explanation for all this.
But right now, he doesn't have an explanation, and it's killing him by inches. In this, at least, he and the Breeze are on exactly the same wavelength - the wind laps the building and tears at the trees outside, tossing scattered leaves and branches up to rain down out of the sky, then rushes back into the building to press in close to John, still thrumming with tension. Something's off, something's odd, and it would be all too easy for he and the Breeze to jump to DC from here. It's all air, after all.

But he promised Rose, and Karkat, and okay basically everybody made him swear he wouldn't panic and mess around with the teleportation thing while he's still a mess. They didn't say so in as many words, but it was implied and John's not stupid. Most of the practice he's got with using the air as a way to dissolve and move from point to point is from when he was desperately trying to pretend the Breeze didn't speak to him - and - some of the practice was - it was just his handler telling him off for using powers like that without permission, and John cringes away from those memories still. They hurt enough to make the memories of the game seem like healed over scar tissue, not all that difficult to face, after all, compared to what's happened more recently.

So he swallows and doesn't scream, mentally hauling the Breeze back until it stops doing the windy equivalent of pacing in worry. "Why won't they text back?" he asks Rose. His throat feels like it's clogged up.

Rose has her game face on, the one she wears when she's trying to stay level-headed for someone else's sake. His sake. For a nasty moment, John hates himself so much he's breathless with it, because he's sick of worrying everyone. Sick of being worried, sick of being sick. "Sollux says they're most likely out of range of a cell tower, still," she says, her voice betraying none of the strain John knows must be there. "Let's try not to worry about it for now."
He nods for her. It feels foreign to smile, like he has to use mental fingers to pull up the corners of his mouth. Kanaya and Jade haven't texted or pestered them in a while, either, but they didn't leave some dumb spooky nonsense messages to scare John's pants off so he thinks they're okay. Hopefully.

Never mind that in every movie ever, having cell phones die is basically sign number one that some ghost or zombie or serial killer with chainsaws for fingers is about to start offing the main characters one by one. Horror movies aren't really his thing, but he knows, okay. If it turns out there's a totally normal explanation for all this, it'll be a huge relief, but right now he can't stop thinking about the mess of a Pesterlog Karkat left before cutting off - and heck, Dave's, while Rose was showing it to him, was just as bad.

TT: I do not even know where to begin parsing that sentence. Congratulations, I suppose, though I've no idea how you managed to go from the capitol to some sort of marine wildlife conservation facility. I was under the impression the aquarium there was shut down.

TT: Additionally, what on earth is wrong with Pesterchum? That is not my handle anymore, it really shouldn't be showing up...

TG: oh for berryboos sake why is that happening

TT: Is that not what you meant to type?

TG: no

TT: I do not even know where to begin parsing that sentence. Congratulations, I suppose, though I've no idea how you managed to go from the capitol to some sort of marine wildlife conservation facility. I was under the impression the aquarium there was shut down.

TT: Additionally, what on earth is wrong with Pesterchum? That is not my handle anymore, it really shouldn't be showing up...

TG: quick me and karkat need advice on how to deal with squiddles TT: Slow down, Dave. There's something...very odd going on here. Perhaps Sollux's security updates have gotten something jumbled.

TG: replacing the words shit

TG: cant you see through it with your se

TT: Dave?

See, the thing is, Squiddles? John remembers that show; he used to watch it in elementary school, before he met Rose again. And before that, he remembers both Jade and Rose used to like them - Jade in a chipper, gotta-collect-em-all kind of way that meant she had a whole rainbow of the plush toys in her room, and Rose in a kinda-ironic, kinda-weeaboogothic sort of way where you could catch her humming 'Squiddle-dee-dee, Squiddle-dee-dah,' under her breath over the Pesterchum mic, and she would accuse you of projecting when you called her out on it. Which totally isn't how projection works, so blah. If you'd asked him a couple weeks ago, he wouldn't have been able to tell you anything about the show except it sometimes involved puppets and kind of felt like a crossover between old-school Spongebob and the Care Bears. With tentacles.

She's uneasy, but Rose insists that squiddles are mostly just problematic in the sense that thinking about squids and octopi encourages thinking about other things with tentacles. Unfortunately, 'things with tentacles' is a broad umbrella category that also includes Horrorterrors and god, that is such a stretch - but she doesn't remember all that happened to her in the game. Neither he nor she could say for sure what happened after her screen went grimdark. What if, what if, what if -

The casing of his phone creaks under his grip. Haha, oh god, if he breaks the stupid thing right now, he - he doesn't even know what he'll do! Probably flip his shit off the handle or something else dumb and unproductive. On the other hand, what happens if Dave and Karkat do text them and it's bad and they're in danger and terrible things really are happening to them! It's like with Nicolas Cage in Stolen, where the kidnapper has Cage's beloved but estranged daughter held hostage and any phone call Cage receives could be the one saying his daughter's been killed, and it all ends climactically with said daughter in a sinking car that's on fire while Cage has just been shot what if Dave and Karkat are on fire -

There is no way that thinking about stuff like this is helpful. Reel it in, man. Breathe. For a second there his vision went all wonky and the words on the phone screen skewed, and it would be so easy to picture everything on fire. Lime green space fire from Jack Noir hell. He's never more than half sure these days whether looking at Becquerel makes him afraid of the dog, or afraid for it, and he's relieved that Jade took it with her on Kanaya's field trip. No one really seems sure what Bec actually is (let alone how long it takes before it starts radiating cancer beams or something), but it's powerful enough to get Jade out of serious trouble, probably.

No, Jade and Kanaya are most likely okay. They're two of the most competent people he knows, and Jade may not remember all her spacey powers but she's still a god as far as the game is concerned. Getting kidnapped that one time was a fluke. Surely.

Darn it, he's not going down that hellish train of thought. Karkat and Dave are the ones he can justify worrying about, seeing as how they're dicks with the combined potential to piss off anything with a pulse - and, now that he thinks about it, some things without a pulse. No matter where he looks, John can't find any signs of something weird and possibly marine wildlife-related going on in Washington DC. The only relevant news reports that might have anything to do with it are repeats of the ones he read with Karkat earlier, while they were trying to figure out what the deal was with Feferi and the Batterwitch. Blah blah, there's a bunch of fish dying off the East coast, strange oil spill suspected, blah-dee-blah-blah none of this tells him anything new. The latest news stories are all cultural announcements about an on-going cherry blossom festival (confirming John's suspicions that the capitol of the United States is, in fact, infested with people who have watched too much anime), an upcoming science and engineering festival at the end of April, and an exhibit called Puppetry in America that is due to end soon.

But there's no follow-up article about, say, a weird blond guy in silly shades stabbing puppets at some poor, unsuspecting museum exhibit. Which, knowing Dave, wouldn't even be all that unrealistic. Also, the aquarium apparently shut down a while ago, with most of the animals moved to Baltimore. Sollux told Rose it was just something wrong with Dave and Karkat's Pesterchum apps, so does any of this even matter? On the political sites, there's no mention of the Condesce being near DC - all anyone is talking about is Russia being a dick about the Ukrainian refugees in the Crimea; they've been shuttling troops around to occupy the peninsula for a while now, and claiming that with the death rates purportedly plummeting in the fringe areas of the Novaya Ukraine, the expats should be able to move back to the war zone, if not the old areas that got hit the worst during the genocide. It's a mess, yeah, but it's an ocean away.

Maybe there's just nothing to find. He could be low-key freaking out over absolutely jackshit. The less he finds - the hero forums are dead today, not a word out of anyone about sightings of Flashstep or Hemogoblin - the more he feels like he's chasing ghosts.

Somehow they got from Doctor Lalonde's office to one of the perimeter rooms - not one of the bedrooms, just some random room with windows all along the east side and a bunch of dusty old symbols carved into the floor. His memory blanks out on exactly when Rose had time to make tea, but the handle of a warm mug sits in his free hand, full of liquid dark as coffee from oversteeping. That hand jitters and nearly slops tea all over his knees and shoes when he lifts it, so he ends up bowing his head over it instead to take a sip.

It's not sweet enough. Augh. But that sounds like something really ominous to think, given the circumstances, so he keeps drinking without asking for milk or honey or anything, with the weirdest urge to sneeze tickling his nose with each bitter sip. He can't even tell what kind of tea this is.

He can't remember feeling this anxious at the drop of a hat before. This isn't how he used to be, and he hates what that says about him. What happened to the old John, who didn't have a care in the world except retrieving a wayward game disc, and whose biggest problem was an overabundance of cakes?

BE: you changed. duh! :T that happens when you grow up

Most people don't end up nervous wrecks when they grow up. John thinks back, mashing the heel of his palm against his diaphragm. He couldn't even say where the nausea is centered anymore - his whole abdomen just feels like one huge coiled up spasm waiting to happen. He keeps telling himself it's low key, dang it, and not a full-blown panic attack. Not yet.

BE: yeah, well, you put off growing up for a looong time. and instead of letting me help, which is obviously the smart choice, you just decided to ignore everything

BE: here come the emphasis caps: THAT WAS A BAD THING~!

The shout slams John in the face with a gale force breeze. Stifled snickers float to his ears until his eyes stop watering, at which point Rose appears to have smoothed over her face and the Breeze has gone back to lapping the room with a distinct air of 'who, me?' When he raises his hand to poke at it, his hair has transformed into a massive poof. "Dissension in the blustering ranks?" Rose asks, two of her fingers pressed hard to her lips like that'll flatten the corners out.

There comes a time in everyone's life when they have to concede defeat; pranks are one thing, but Rose knows her strengths, and she is the undisputed snarkmistress. It is her. John puts down the cup and his phone and starts flattening down his hair manually. At one point he grazes a clump of hair near his scalp that's weirdly stuck, which means he missed a glob of sopor slime when he showered last, and now his hair is probably gunked up for the rest of forever. Thanks, Karkat.

His hands catch in his hair and tug a little. Karkat. God, where is he, where are they? Why won't they answer? He's not - this is so dumb, so dumb.

BE: please remember to breathe :o

It hurts.

BE: i know

How do I make it stop? When do I get better?

Holy heck, he can't even remember what 'better' feels like. The 'better' center of his brain wore thin a while ago.

BE: some stuff is up to you. the big guy can challenge you to face it and overcome it instead of wallowing around and drowning forever, and i can help, but...you have to do it.

BE: and between you and the egg and butter man, you've done a lot of the exact opposite of what you need to do to get better

Oh man. His stomach is doing something funny, a fluttering spasm just under his sternum, and is he panicking again? He can't tell.

BE: yes, you are. breathe, dummy!

Okay. He's panicking again. Hahaha! No problem! Just breathe - just - keep breathing - he knows breathing exercises, he really does. He's just so used to the shortcut that waiting for the forced, steady breathing to slow his heartrate feels like a crawling eternity. He keeps the palms of his hands pressed to his head, waiting and waiting and not freaking out anymore, no sirree -
"Outside?" he croaks at Rose. "I need to - I can't sit anymore, I need air-"

"Outside it is," Rose says immediately. She beats him to the window. It doesn't even strike John as odd that neither of them even bother with the door; Rose clicks the locks on the window frame to the side with two snaps of her thumbs, pushes it open, and primly folds her knee over the side to test the open air before walking out the second story window. The Breeze is there, but she doesn't need it - for someone who only figured out how god tier floating works a matter of hours ago, Rose isn't one to make a big deal out of it. John half-falls out after her with no grace left in him, his flight pattern twisty as he staggers up into the sky.

The wind starts wafting him eastward by the time his thoughts catch up with his panic. And they could make the jump, they could, but a faint pressure squeezes his wrist and John feels the bubble of heady confusion fade as Rose keeps them fixed in one place. Her grip is loose enough that he could wrench free in a heartbeat, strong enough that John could probably bring her with him, if he wanted.

But when she talks, Rose is having none of it. "John, may I propose an entirely hypothetical and in no way relevant scenario?" she asks. She doesn't wait for him to answer. "Say I had recently gone grimdark."

"You did nearly go grimdark recently," he feels the need to point out.

A wave of her hand. "Details. Furthermore, say that I wasn't an expert in guarding and mediating my own mind to restore what was damaged in a timely fashion. Would you think it wise for me to race off and make use of powers I've only just begun experimenting with to try to cross over 2000 miles in one disastrous swoop?"

Crap. She's doing the logic thing. "I got to Houston without practicing at all," he tries, weakly.

"Didn't you nearly impale yourself on a pile of swords of questionable quality?" Rose takes a step back, her foot flattening out like she's actually stepping on something, and John sighs and floats after her. "The last thing we need is for you to jump while panicked and reappear in front of an airplane. Or worse, at the bottom of the sea. I've jumped into water before, so I can tell you with some degree of certainty that it's not pleasant. At all."

"Alright, alright, jeez! I get it, Rose, I'm not going anywhere!" Though heck if he knows how long that resolution will last. He just wants to know that they're okay. It sounds stupid and childish when he thinks about it, but he repeats it out loud anyway, for like, the fifth time.

Rose just nods, and for a moment her forced calm breaks, a brooding worry in the furrow of her brow. "I know. I feel the same. It's the not-knowing that will get you, every time."

BE: we could just go...check really quick...and then we will know! it's that easy, right?

aren't you supposed to be the voice of reason here?

BE: what do i look like, your conscience?

BE: something's weird. and i can't put my whirlydoos on what it is that's weird...

"I don't think Rose would appreciate being ditched," he says out loud, so Rose will at least know the Breeze is the one being the sneaky pooplord in this conversation and not John. Sometimes other people seem to be able to hear it, but John can just by looking at her that Rose was conveniently left out of the loop just then.

Rose shakes her head at both of them. "If what you are planning involves anything vaguely synonymous with 'abscond' or 'teleportation' or 'the capitol of the United States, I disapprove strongly and if need be will appeal to the highest authority in this laboratory to keep you here. Much as it would pain me to do so."

Hang on, they have an authority now? It's not like the friendleader system ever really worked all that well... "Wait, who, the Queen?"

He can't judge whether the ominous wind that tosses Rose's hair is natural or not. "Worse. My mother."

Oh no. She's serious.

"You are all," a voice says from below, in a monotone barely loud enough to carry over the wind, "being goshdarn inconvenient, you know."

Down below, Jane stands on the roof. Correction - she's balanced on the uppermost point of an antenna of unknown purpose, heavier than Jade but making it look just as effortless. The tousled head of curls that is Roxy sits with her legs swinging over the edge of the roof, her hands busy attempting to juggle two rocks.

Er. How long have they been there? Wow, John needs to work on paying attention to his surroundings, even when he's rattled in the brain, because he definitely should have noticed them breathing there, at least. Then it registers that he and Rose have drifted far enough up and away that if the Scratch girls are looking to talk, hanging around up here would be a jerkass thing. "Oh. Sorry," John says, glancing at Rose. "Be right down?"

Rose gives him a final look of warning ('I've got my eyes on you'), nods, and starts walking down through the air like it's stairs. There's a pun here, somewhere, about not trusting stairs due to the fact that they're always up to something, but honestly Dave ruined stair jokes for all of time with his stupid famous stair warning meme that somehow survived the remix of the entire universe to plague them all in the next life. John floats down more smoothly until his toes brush the roof and no further, primed to fly right back up with a tap of his feet. "Where have Jake and Dirk gone off to?" Rose asks, her foot flexing in her shoe before she sets it down on the inside of the curb around the roof.

Roxy replies, "Dirk's watchin' Jakey, but he's mostly just skulking a lot, now. I think your 'leet seeing skills nailed him to tha metaphorical wall, and now his brain's all pissy. Which is at least an improvement over all the crazy."

Her speech is still a little slurred but there's wayyy less wrong words than John remembers - her fingers toss the makeshift juggling rocks up and she catches them in her palms without issue. Looking up from the rocks, Roxy grins at him from under her bangs, winking one pale pink eye, and then starts up the process again. Someone's given her makeup - probably Rose or Doctor Lalonde - so her eyes are shadowed with white and pink and gold. "Way better, rite?" Her wrist wobbles and messes up the next toss, but her other hand comes up to snag both rocks at once.

"Yeah," John says. He folds his legs up crisscross under him, hands latching around his ankles as he sits on nothing. "Did you guys need something?" Restlessness plucks at his insides, laced with just enough panic to make his stomach quiver, but he can manage this. Long enough to have a regular conversation, anyway. Long enough to maybe make his brain stop getting hung up on the idea of his friends being in trouble based on technological hiccups.

Above, Jane steps off the antenna like Rose stepped out the window earlier. Unlike Rose, Jane drops like a rock and lands with the distinct crunching sound of a roof in abrupt agony. She looks completely unfazed as she walks over to them on ankles that probably should have snapped or something, leaving tiny indents in the roof behind her. Uh, actually, scratch that one, actually - there's a tiny hint of a smile edging her mouth when she reaches the satellite dish nearest Roxy and leans against it. "Jus' wanted to talk," Roxy says for both of the girls, nose wrinkled up when her voice cracks. "And stuff. Y'know us, all about the hot gos' and things."

Orrr - and John's reading between the lines here - literally everyone in this entire laboratory has gone on active make-John-calm-his-tits duty, in the conspicuous absence of Karkat. Do they have some kind of game plan for dealing with him? They totally do. He's surrounded himself with asshole nerd friends and heck, they've only known Roxy and Jane and the other Scratch kids for, like, less than a week, so how did they end up friends already? He thinks this might have been an on-going friendship process that he slept through all week long, he's spoken maybe two sentences total to that Dirk guy so does that even count, and when you get right down to it the whole thing is such bullcrap.

"Yes," Jane says, all of the smile gone from her face as she observes John with piercing blue eyes. "Tell us...the hot gos'."

Two choices are available to him at this moment. He could fly away and go talk to Doctor Lalonde, as the last person in this entire mountain range who isn't in perpetual 'cheer people up by giving them a hard time' mode, or he could laugh hysterically and risk Jane flipping back into surprise berserker mode just to bop him in the nose.

He sort of ends up stifling the laugh so it comes out a high-pitched wheeze through his nose. Then he claps both his hands over his traitorous nose because that was so dumb.

"Kanaya, Jade, Dave, and Karkat are all out of contact," Rose says, while John's still fighting not to burst out into distraught laughter. This task is made ten times harder by the fact that now he's got both Jane and Roxy grinning at him, Jane in the form of a tiny smirk and Roxy in a shit-eating, silent laugh. "Dave and Karkat in particular are either out of service range or have broken their phones in some way. Their last messages were incomprehensible, unfortunately, so it's difficult to determine which."

"That sucks," Roxy says, shrugging. "What do you usually do when that happens?"

"Panic," John says, gloomily.

"Is this you panicking?" Jane asks, with a squint.

"Give me another five minutes. Ten, tops." Maybe they should start timing this. Make a chart of how long John can last between freak out sessions, Karkat would be totally down for that. The troll would think it was a bonding activity or something.

Also, he might be hanging around with Rose a little too much. He can't remember his humor being this morbid since their brief dip in moody teenager-dom before she moved away, and that was weird. Let's not do that again.

Jane tilts her head to the side to study him, like she's some kind of intrepid gumshoe detective who can deduce what he ate for breakfast by the color of his shoelaces. "I've taken a gander at how Vantas fights, and he's not a completely inept doofus," she says, arms folded. "And your Strider and Maryam together measure up to D- Dirk. To Dirk. I can't imagine there's much they couldn't nip in the bud."

Oh, right. The Scratch kids probably don't know about the collective weirdness magnet yet - which is a shame, seeing as how their turning up to fight out of the blue on Monday was really freaking weird in and of itself. "Yeah, well, we kind of have this tendency to attract wayyy over-powered bad guys. And our plans have a 90% failure rate, or something like that. So the odds are actually pretty high that something has gone horribly wrong."

Rose sighs. "The worst thing that's happened since Monday has been Jake attempting to escape multiple times - we were overdue to meet our weekly quota, I suppose. It makes an awful sense that Saturday would be the day we would have to pay the piper."

"I'm almost afraid to ask what elfe has happened to you guys. Like, some of the stuff you mention in passing is kinda -" Roxy wiggles her hand. John has absolutely no idea what she means. "Cept nah, I'm gonna quiz you later," she then says, as she catches her juggling rocks again. "Hellsa yeah.
Think I can nail Dirk with one a these suckers if I get good enough? Might get him to put down the keyboards for two hot seconds."

Jane gives her a pained look. "Lordy."

It's hard to panic when there are people being so weirdly normal about things. "What have you all been up to?" John asks, half-surprising himself with the question. "Have you thought about what you want to do when Jake is - uh -"

"Less cuckoo-bazonkers?" Roxy finishes for him, sounding weirdly philosophical. Jane grunts in what might be agreement. "Idk, our skill sets are mostly limited to being badass haxxors and snipering and being turned into brain experiment subjects. Which I get the feel is not what regular people do on their days off."

"Mother wouldn't turn you out - she's more likely to leave you the entire lab to yourselves while she cavorts off to terra incognita." Rose brushes past the moment before John can get a look at her face, but there might still be a tinge of bitterness there. "You've rather missed out on the public schooling experience, by this point, but studying to obtain a GED and going from there might not be beyond the realm of the possible if you want to live normal lives."

And how long would those lives last, when the game is -

Suddenly it's a lot harder to look Jane or Roxy in the eye. "Normal's overrated," Roxy says, kicking out her feet, her laugh distant through the buzz in John's ears. "What d'yew think, Janey? Should we try to pull wild shenans? Do the stabby fork think for good and not felty, felty evil?"

"We'll get revenge, of course," Jane says, almost bored, like this shouldn't be news to anyone. "Trace our way back to that violent hooligan Boxcars, serve him a heaping helping of humble pie, and proceed from there. Between Dirk and myself, we should be able to deduce the base's coordinates and unleash hell on those bastards."

John blinks. One of Roxy's juggling stones flies over her shoulder and past the edge of the roof to its presumed doom. Rose is making an attempt to keep her eyebrows from flying up and off her head to visit the moon, but it's a close call. "Are we sure that's an...entirely safe course of action?" she asks.

Jane cracks her knuckles. '"Safe' can kiss my keister. Dirk and I have already discussed the logistics of an approach, based on pre-existing security measures. They may have changed them due to our desertion, but that's of little consequence. All we need wait on, once you two are done with that computer, is Jake." One of her cheeks dimples as she smiles. "That's good and not evil, isn't it?"

"That's...a thing. That sure af is a thing," Roxy says, bewildered. "We're not even gonna hang around to wait an' meet the hot tamale?"
If John had a drink, he would spit it out. "The what?"

"Y'know, Di-Stri senior!" Roxy flaps her hand at him, her eyes starry. "It's like. Dirk, plus elder, and hopefully immune to the stupid sexy Jake whammo effect. Foxy dad was a bust due to excessive levels of evil - sry, John-boo - but there's always hope!"

Rose's eyebrows have blasted off to go orbit Pluto. "I may be misunderstanding, but I think you just said you intend to hit on my ectobiological father."

Thoughts of Bro Strider aside (why??? God, he's such an annoying douche, why?!) John's more concerned about - "Stupid sexy Jake whammo effect?"

Jane buries her face in her hands. "If no one else's got a bull's-eye on the man, I reserve the right to call dibs," Roxy says. She stands up, the rocks tucked into her pockets, and makes fists with both her hands, eyes still shining. It takes a second for her to snap out of it and answer John. "Oh! Yeah, y'know how you here are a fine ass specimen of the human race who is totes mackable, yet ineligible due two angry troll claim?"

John grabs Rose's sleeve. "Help."

Rose looks disturbingly fascinated. Oh god. "No. Let her speak."

Oblivious to the bombs being casually dropped here, Roxy goes on. "Well, Jakey was what we in the bizz call prime boyfriend material before he got brain-zwogled, given as he is also a hunky nerdmuffin like urself. Jane and Dirk were trying to climb that boy like Mount Sexeverest at the same time, so I had to remove myself from the competition under best friend code."

"These are the sacrifices I make. Look at 'em and tell me I don't deserve a chance to take a danger at foxy dad, round two." She pauses. "Donger. No. Gander! Ha!"

Jane's face has turned the color of eggplants behind her cupped hands. "Why?" she mumbles. John empathizes on so many levels.

In sharp contrast, Rose appears to be riveted. It takes John a long second to notice, but there's also a bizarrely familiar sense of anticipation in the air. Like some incorporeal manifestation is paying rapt attenti-

No, stop listening!

"Oh, godspeed, then," Rose says. The barely-suppressed glee is rolling off her in waves; if she weren't good at restraining herself, John thinks she'd be rubbing her hands together in anticipation. "Have at mine father dearest. I have only one condition - please, I implore you, make sure you do so when both I and Dave are in the same room. For - er, for propriety's sake."

Propriety, schmiety - knowing Rose, she's gonna have a camera stuck to Dave's face like glue. Worse, she'll probably try to rope John or Jade into videoing Bro's reaction. Holy cripes, she's diabolical. This takes trolling to unprecedented levels.

John then wastes another five seconds rubbing the side of his temple until he remembers that trolling used to mean being a supreme asshole on the internet, and not just, you know, acting like a troll in general. Wait. Shit.

He's never been so grateful to hear weird thumping noises coming out of a vent in his life. His ears catch it first, and he snaps around to face one of the covered air vent openings that opens up to the roof before the others. Could be Jake again -
The vent cover flies off at a precarious angle and joins the juggling rock in a swan dive off the roof, green sparks whirling around it in dazed circuits. Something resists him for a second when John reaches out with the wind to grab the chunk of metal before it can hit the ground, but soon WV is too busy scuttling out of the vent to keep up the spontaneous space thing, so John is free to lift the cover and set it back down on the roof.

WV: niyəbuatünburadavarsızələmandeyənalıraməndərkədəbilməz? bəlkəqulaqlanyoxlanırmişələndərməmdənə?

"Mr Mayor!" Roxy tosses a salute at the short carapacid, roping her arm around Jane's neck and taking the resulting elbow to the gut with a beam. "What can we do for you, sir?"

WV starts signing at all of them at once, face screwed up in a pout as he tries to usher Rose, the closest target, into the vent with hands flailing so badly and mental voice so rushed that it's all a mangled blob of words in a language no one can understand.

WV: mənkəmək! dirkinsanılmışmənsəhərplanlanonuxahişamanatlarçəkməkəçünnebəlibir. zəhmətolmasa?

"We were sixteen," Jane groans. She's as strong as John and Jade, but she bats at Roxy without any effect. "Dadburn it, Roxy, of all the things to bring up among new acquaintances -" "And I betcha you'd still drink him like a tall glassa water if him and Dirk didn't have things," Roxy says, planting a kiss on top of Jane's head with a smack and starting to drag the other girl off toward the stairs. WV seems torn between scolding Rose and wondering why they're not going down the vent, too, before smacking John in the side and running after them as fast as his stubby legs can go. "C'mon, let's go help the mayor build stuff out of junked computer parts and get in Dirk's way!" She looks back at John and Rose. "Coming?"

"Oh, yes." Rose still has a fiendish glint in her eye when she looks at John. "Better, now?"

He takes stock, and shrugs. "I...think so." He feels like how tepid water tastes, but that's an improvement. "I'll keep you posted."

"Excellent. That's all I ask." They hurry to catch up to Roxy and Jane and the Mayor, but John stops to bite his lip and look up at the sky before going in through the door.

...Well?

BE: ...I guess...

BE: Dave and Karkat will be alright. probably...

The long, meaningful pauses aren't reassuring me.

BE: don't...don't worry about it. they should be fine. if they're still not online by tonight, we'll take rose and politely check in!

John feels a tremor run through his stomach, and forces himself down the stairs in a jumping float, before he can convince himself otherwise.

- He makes it an hour before the thought occurs to him.
"Typheus.

BE: what :?

BE: wait crap no

"Couldn't he help?" He's aware he said that out loud (and yeah, the last thing he needs is a reputation for having one-sided conversations with thin air), but WV is rattling off unfathomable instructions to Roxy on how he wants the soup can turrets stacked, while Rose and John do their best to stabilize a finished can skyscraper without setting off WV's canny radar for people trying to tone down his structurally-unstable designs so that they don't fall over when someone so much as bats an eye.

City-building is a powerful addiction, and addiction is a terrible thing. Dirk literally crawled into the bowels of the Queen's Hub to escape WV's efforts to recruit another volunteer, and Jake looks flabbergasted as to how he got roped into arranging melted computer parts to make miniature roads, unaware that the door to the terminal room is hanging wide open.

BE: he doesn't - urgh. he's not really a helpy kind of guy, okay?

John doesn't even bother thinking words; he just blares the impression of DAVE and the Breeze rustles the construction paper chains that stretch between the chairs around the table in an eye roll.

BE: i really don't think anyone wanted the bad you winning at that point. not even this guy. there's harsh, and then there's stupid, and he's not stupid

BE: okay sometimes he helps, but mostly he's just a grumpy asshole who wants to sleep and eat people. dave was lucky he caught him in a good mood

What's the point of having a connection to him if it doesn't get used? And he helped me before that, too, with Cetus -

BE: ummm, having a denizen go grimdark is pretty much a major emergency, wayyy overpowered, glitchy beyond reason, and also basically lame as heck. no way'd you'd be expected to take her on your own

These all sound like excuses. Bluh to that. "Rose, I have an idea!"

BE: a dumb idea!

Yeah, Rose heard that one; he can tell by the way her eyebrows arc up and she starts watching the agitated breeze with pursed lips. "What kind of idea, again?" she asks, dry as toast. A swift side glance at WV confirms the carapacian is now digging around under the table for more supplies, and Rose presses the disjointed cans back into alignment with the rest of the turret, while John holds it steady on top.

"A perfectly fine idea," John retorts, flicking his fingers and trying to send the wind away. Once upon a time, it would just do what he asked of it, in gestures and in thought, but now that he's listening to it again the Breeze has a bad habit of prancing around and doing its own thing. He doesn't even want to think how this'll work in an actual combat situation. "I want to go talk to Typhesus."

Rose jumps like a mosquito has stung her. "Through your mind," she says, the flip from 'bemusing WV antics break time' to 'John suggested something questionable at best just now' instant as her eyes narrow.
"That's the idea, yeah," he confirms. It's too spur of the moment for him to have any real rational arguments, so if it comes to an argument, Rose could probably talk him down from it. "Maybe we can ask about Dave and Karkat," he adds, since that's the first thing he picks up off the top of his head. "Maybe he could tell what might have caused all those words to get messed up, or...uh...something..." The anxiety flutters, and threatens to rise back up, but he focuses on the thought that this might actually be a way to squash the panic altogether, and it subsides.

She doesn't. After chewing on her lower lip for a moment, Rose breathes out slowly. "It has almost been a week, now," she says. "You're much more clear now than you were then, too. If nothing else, it would good to check and see if your mind has settled a little. And I'll admit I'm curious to meet this denizen of yours." Rolling her wrist, Rose smiles and steps back from the stack of cans. John lifts his hands away, gingerly, and lowers them when the tower stands upright on its own. With quick, waved goodbyes to Roxy and Jane, they slink out before WV can catch them mid-abscond. "Let's go see if we can scandalize Halburn with our audacity in asking to make use of his circles again..."

He knew she'd want to come along - when could Rose ever resist psychoanalyzing someone right in the center of their brain? - but the pang of relief in his chest is still strong. 'Perfectly fine idea' aside, everything in him revolts at the thought of venturing into his mind on his own, knowing what lives there. Just because he hasn't heard from it in a while...

The Breeze coasts along with them as they navigate the halls, fretting and muttering just loud enough for Rose to hear its end of the conversation, too. What it has to say doesn't sound all that promising, but John thinks it might be playing up the ominous drama on purpose to try to discourage him from doing something dumb. It has a flare for drama when the mood strikes it, and he remembers with a throb that it wanted him to leave the crushed ruins of Typhus's palace alone, too. But by then the Horrorterrors had started seeping in, and the faint whisper of the Breeze that was all he heard pre-god tier was drowned out in the rolling tide of the sea.

BE: you can try, i guess. but he's not gonna think them being out of contact counts as an emergency. he'll probably just try to eat you, watch!

"Can he even eat me if it's all in my head?" John asks, skeptically.

BE: of course he can! not to mention all the other stuff we might run into while we're in there...

Rose sniffs. "I'll be there," she says. "If we run into anything untoward, I'm far more prepared to deal with them this time around." She doesn't have to name names.

BE: but that's an even worse idea! maybe jade would work, since he likes echidna, but dave's already annoyed him once this century, and you - uh -

Yyyyyikes. Yikes because the look on Rose's face is legitimately scary, and yikes because John thinks he knows what the Breeze might have been about to say. He remembers, he remembers and he doesn't even get nose bleeds from it, now, which means he can think of one very huge reason why a denizen might not like Rose in particular. "What about me?" Rose asks, and her voice isn't scary. Just trembling on the edge of a realization of her own.

BE: he miiight still be angry at you.

BE: because you said yes. you said yes and Cetus broke.

-There is one thing they are all very good at, and that is not talking about things. Right now, with Rose's face green and splotches of color high in her cheeks, John thinks that talking would probably just end in shouting. And crying, because they tend to cry a lot. And guilt that they can't do anything about, anyway.

Persuading Halburn doesn't take much - John asks the Breeze to make up for upsetting Rose by leading them to the troll when he's not in his assigned office. They find him in an office down the hall from the MRI rooms, and there's a blot of purplish bruises on his neck where the troll doesn't seem to have noticed it before he came to greet them through the cracked open door. He looks pained when they say what they want to do, promises to meet them in fifteen minutes to supervise them while they're in John's head, and then ducks back inside to hiss at someone.

Rose can't hear what Halburn says to the other person behind the door. John can, and it makes him turn as purple as Jane went earlier.

Opening his eyes and seeing dark clouds makes John twitch. Rose streams in like sunlight, the symbol on her god tier robes radiating softly. The guilt over Cetus has ebbed enough that she just looks distant; when she spins around in a slow circle, she's all business. "It's...quiet," she says at last, neutral.

BE: good. that means no one's making a big fuss or throwing a tantrum. let's go, let's go!

Apart from the Breeze agitating their clothing with hissed whispers of disapproval, the sky of his mind actually feels...oddly calm. He remembers in a vague way that it was a wreck, the wind roaring through the storm clouds and lashing out at anything that tried to pass through. But the Breeze hustles them through the heavy clouds without facing much opposition, other gusts with less substance brushing up against them and then whirling away. A couple stick around, nosing at his shirt and the hems of his pants like invisible puppies, and don't leave. "We're not going below?" Rose calls, when they skim in and out along the top line of the clouds without diving.

BE: trying not to attract attention, here :T

BE: the bad man could be in the house still, and if he catches us, the bad john will know like that!

The Breeze snaps. Since it doesn't have fingers, John is at a loss. Then he catches sight of a disembodied arm on Rose's far side, unraveling back into visible blue lines of wind as he watches. Half-heartedly, John thinks about suggesting they look for shapes in the clouds. But they're all still gloomy and shadowed, and the shapes he sees in the corners of his eyes aren't nice ones. He only gets as far as opening his mouth before shutting it again, wordlessly. Rose keeps holding his hand but doesn't catch his slip, her attention turned out to examining the sky and staring down through the clouds, with her forehead thing alight. After flying like that for five minutes or so, the Breeze descends through the cloud cover at a slantways slope, and come out over a stretch of ground that's crusted over with dry, dark oil, broken up and chipped with mud cracks. A spirograph cycles through different, arching patterns, brilliant against the craggy ground, the colors shifting through a faded rainbow before flaring bright blue and then starting over. They land, in the sense that the three come to a hovering stop just above the pulsating gate, and John watches with a shiver as the spirograph blooms and then coils back up again. The gates on his land were all blue, for the most part - the rainbow thing must be new.

BE: at least he hasn't locked it, that's good.

"I don't think this is where we found it, last time," Rose says, frowning. "But I'll admit, the way everything tends to shift in here makes it hard to say...

BE: no, you're right! :) it moves, which is a little annoying sometimes. looks like the coast is clear for now

It's true that there's no obvious signs of gold or candy around for miles (or whatever the distance is in here; like Rose's mind, it feels really subjective). All he can see is this spirograph and the endless expanse of blasted, cratered ground. Heheh, figures. He always knew his mind was an ugly place.

The thought slips out and he winces. Something drips along his skin; it's the exact same temperature, neither hot nor cold to the touch, so he mistakes it for a curl of wind rolling down under his sleeve. When he looks down, curious, at his hand, a thick dribble of black has run down between the lines of the back of his hand, dripping to the ground below from the tips of his fingers.

He closes his hand, and smiles for Rose when she says, "I suppose I'll remain here to ensure nothing unfortunate happens. Given that you'll be the one approaching your denizen, I wonder if you might be able to ask something in my stead."

"Sure, Rose!" John waits for her to say what she wants to ask, but Rose peels a thin strip of light out of nothing and waits for it to solidify, tiny words in sunshine-orange cursive filling the insta-post it note when she hands it to him. He takes it with his clean hand and grimaces at the lines and lines of questions. Some of them are labeled parts (a)-(g), like a science problem set. How long has it been since he even thought about homework last, anyway? Whatever his and Karkat's teachers are thinking, it surely can't end well when they realize they can't get ahold of anyone at their houses...

He tries not to let it poke stickers in his brain as he folds up Rose's questions into a pocket of his pants. The world's ending before school lets out, anyway and spring break is either the week of the 6th or the 13th itself, so any way you look at it, he wouldn't have much time to worry about homework or quizzes or essays anymore. Hahaha! It was definitely the week of the thirteenth, last time; he'd been on top of the world, because it was like having a week-long vacation to celebrate his birthday, and he figured he'd have all that time to play the hot new Sburb game with Rose when it arrived. The public schools in Seattle had already had their break, but their middle school in the 'burbs was off late.

He wonders when Sburb will show up, this time. They already have game powers, but it's not like he's been seeking out news of an anticipated game release in the middle of April. Do they even need to go through the game disc process, or is the Reckoning already hurtling towards them on automatic?

BE: okay! part of me will stay here with you rose. we should be able to keep our eyes peeled

With a tiny pop, some of the curving blue lines come together in a cartoonish, simplified version of John, conspicuously armless as it zooms around the spirograph in a quick loop before coming to bob beside Rose. "That would be helpful, in the event the mindscape shifts again," Rose says. "I would hate to turn around and find the spirograph has cut and run for parts unknown."

"You'll still be here when I get back?" John asks.

"Of course." Rose searches his face, and must find something there that darkens her expression a little. She reaches out and waits until he hugs her, maybe a little too abruptly. "And if you're gone too long, I will come looking for you. Denizen be damned."
He can't help trying to look around the channel as they pass through it, old jolts of agony rocking through him - but then the wind slams into him and flings him all the way through the far gate so fast everything's a blur. The Breeze laughs with delight all the way. Even when gravity starts going a different direction, and John has to regain his balance in the air before he crashes into something.

He's starting to think the Breeze has an even weirder sense of humor than him. And this is the aspect that's supposed to be helping...

BE: i mean it, try not to tick him off, okay? i don't think he'd drown you after all this, but getting eaten would still be awful "Drown?"

\( \text{ändigä} \) is unfamiliar from above. It looks like someone else's land, maybe, and the reason why is pretty freaking obvious. He doesn't recognize it without the tarry seas of oil. The ground is dark still, but the black chips of gravel and soil, seeded with crystals and untended mushroom farms, glint with flecks of midnight blue. He and the Breeze bound gently from one plateau to the next, to get their bearings, and they fly over dried up riverbeds that glitter with crystalline silt and chunks of blue gemstones that should have been covered with sluggish streams of crude oil. The low hanging clouds in the sky aren't as hazy as John remembers, either; when they pass through them, there's no sign of fireflies.

BE: well, it \textit{is} his mind. he can decorate it however he wants \textit{That's really the explanation for it?} He keeps flipping between talking aloud and thinking his answers back at the Breeze. In the real world, both work equally well - in this mindscape, he's not sure there's a difference at all. It's all in his head...or Typheus's head, anyway.

BE: you could look it up by going on a lore side quest, but those are only fun because of the dungeon puzzles

John also notices, as they cross a particularly jagged, rough-hewn fin of blue-gradient rock, that the Breeze really goddang blatantly ignored his question. "What was that about drowning, again?"

If thin blue lines could look sheepish, these do.

BE: uhhhhh i should not have said that. he's not nice, okay? how many different ways do i gotta say that before you believe it? :T he might have gone easy on dave because dave wasn't his, so he didn't think it was his job to be harsh, but you \textit{are} his which makes all of this ten times more dangerous

BE: if you \textit{do} get him talking, you might get lucky - he tends to ramble if he forgets to be a stodgy old dumbo. but please, please please, don't go down there, no matter what he says

"Down where? Into the palace, you mean?" Since that place got smashed up via meteor before John ever arrived, he doesn't have any idea what the layout of that place might be. They skim over another crest of rock, past a deep gulch, and then the pipe organ palace itself rises up. Without flying, or following the correct sequence of spirograph gates, John thinks the place would be next to impossible to find - the pipes rise up a considerable height, but the sprawling building sits in the crook between mountains and would be concealed behind stone from anyone approaching from the wrong angle on foot. There's a shortcut, some part of his brain insists, a way to skip a couple of the gates and come out right at the base of the palace itself. But for the life of him, he can't remember where he learned that. It's not like he had time to fool around with that before their game went south.

BE: yeah, he can totally talk to you without us wandering right down his gullet. heck, you could probably talk to him without crossing over here, but he's more likely to ignore you and pretend he was asleep and didn't hear you call. just us being here is gonna piss him off enough to answer

John picks a courtyard close to the outermost walls and lands, taking in the layout of the palace while he can. Empty pipes coil around, some connecting to bends that lead out of the palace complex, other open so that the empty, cavernous mouths lead down into the depths. None of them appear to have any oil flowing through them, though even the smallest pipes are taller than John, in here - taller than three of him. And while he would normally use the wind to scout out a place like this, feeling for lungs breathing in and out to get a feel for what he's up against, he doesn't dare do anything but drawn the Breeze in tighter. There's already a heavy presence in the air that isn't quite humidity. Just...presence. Like the Breeze, but ponderous and foreign and wholly outside his grasp.

"He's already listening," John mutters, scraping his foot on the ground as he takes a hesitant step forward. "Okay, seriously, before I start yelling - will he tell me anything? At all? Or was this whole trip completely stupid?"

BE: oh, he'll tell you. that doesn't mean you'll like what he has to say :(

"Yeah, that sounds about right." John cups his hands around his mouth, and when he breaths out the Breeze carries the sound away far louder than he could have on his own, shuttling the noise down all the nearest pipe openings. "HEYYYY! CAN WE TALK?"

Only silence replies to him. He strains his ears trying to catch the faintest of grumbles. But there's nothing. "Hello?" he tries again, feeling more than a little stupid. "Are you even there? I have some questions .-

[Oh, you have got to be fucking with me. Child, I am trying to sleep.]

BE: wake up, sleepy head, time's a wasting!

The Breeze thrums, and John feels it race up and force air through one of the thinnest organ pipes until it gives rusty, hoarse whistle. The earth beneath his feet shudders, like something below the surface just rolled over in its sleep.

"It's only a couple questions!" If need be, Rose's questions can come second to asking about Dave and Karkat. She'll understand, after she's done shaking her head at him in mock disapproval. "And then you can go right back to sleep! Promise!"

[No. Go away and come back never. I've already had to parley with the Knight and it's given me a migraine. Leave me be.]

John looks at the Breeze. The Breeze makes a face just to look back at him - and then sticks out its tongue and vanishes. Jerk. "It might be an emergency?"

[Not with that tone of voice, it is not. But fine. Come down so I may greet you...face to face.]

Wow. Oh, gosh, wow. That trap is so blatant John can't even find it anything but hilarious. "Thanks, but no thanks, mister! We can talk like this!"

[I object. You don't feel insane any longer, and what I sense above seems relatively stable. Clearly if the matter is not urgent enough to warrant a visit, and doesn't concern that rotted abomination you've had percolating in your skull, it is not urgent enough to justify shouting like this and renewing my headache. Begone.]

John throttles the frustration - and the moment of unease - before it can make him get pissy. Because politeness probably works better here. Snarking off like he's Dave would probably just make the situation worse. "Sorry, but Dave and Karkat might be in trouble! I promise it'll only take a few minutes...really! So please stop trying to trick me into eating range."

[Ha.]

[I suppose there's always another way to go about it. One moment.]

Another rumble, and one of the nearest pipes heaves a musty sigh. While Typheus does - uh, whatever it's doing down there - maybe stretching? - John sidles from foot to foot, listening to the denizen's mutters.

TY: [Well, at least you did not bring the Knight with you. That is where I draw the line.]

TY: [Now then. If you shall not come to me...]

The pipe organ groans, faint slithering sounds emerging from within. Something scrapes along the metal with an ear-piercing screech. The tremors rock John until his teeth clack together painfully, and he fights the urge to float right the heck out of here. What is he doing down there? he whispers to the Breeze, bewildered.

BE: oh

BE: oh, crud

Damp breath soughs against the back of John's neck - and his entire body. He whips around and stares, eyes slowly tracking up the teeth taller than he is, up to where shimmering frost-white scales give way to an eye like sea glass, bottle green and cocked to peer down at him. When he gulps and tries to see how much of Typheus is aboveground, he can only make out a short section of ropy, wing-studded coils before the rest of the denizen's bulk vanishes into one of the empty oil pipelines. Perfectly placed around the courtyard for the easy transportation of crude oil in bulk - or, in this case, to let Typheus slither its head and neck right out from under the palace.

'Oh crud' doesn't seem like a strong enough swear for this kind of situation. Karkat would know a better one.

A tattered, thin wing folds up, the claw at the end of each rippling veil of skin clacking against the ground with a sound almost delicate compared to the rattling of the pipes, and comes to rest under Typheus's massive chin.

TY: So, child. You dare rouse me from my slumber. How foolish.

John is cringing. His hands are making really half-assed fists, but honestly, the shock of having a massive snake-dragon monster show up behind him with zero warning kind of threw him off his game, here. Jeez.

...

Huh. He hasn't been eaten yet.

This is an incredible turn of events. But awesome! Especially since Rose would have been so mad if he got eaten on her watch.

After the pause lasts long enough, John hesitantly asks, "Are you mad, or...are you just being melodramatic?"
TY: I am never melodramatic.

TY: Speak. I only have a few weeks left to sleep, and you're cutting into my quota.

The head moves. John jolts back, but Typheus merely resettles his chin so he's watching John through the other eye. His mouth is too big and too close for John to tell if he's being laughed at or not for being jumpy. Also, his snake breath is totally rank, like - hey, what a coincidence - the kind of funky smell you'd get after sleeping and not brushing your teeth for thousands of years. It's hard to concentrate on words with that clogging up your nose, but John perseveres. "Dave and Karkat - he's one of the troll players - stopped answering messages really abruptly, and we're worried something might have happened to them. Could you -"

TY: No.

John glares. "You didn't even let me finish!"

TY: At some point I need to enforce standards, here. You obviously want me to help by seeking them out or some other such nonsense, and I unequivocally refuse on the grounds that if the time child is involved, silence is a vast improvement. I didn't think anyone could talk so much and live.

TY: Next question.

"But -!"

TY: I said, no. Next question, or get gone. It's still weeks too early for you to be harassing me like this.

John groans and smacks his face with his hand. Shot down in less than a minute. Short of teleporting blind after them, this was the next best way he could think of to figure out what's up with Dave and Karkat, and it sank before it even got a chance to sail. Then he thinks better of taking his eyes off Typheus for even the briefest moment, and jerks his head back up to see another tooth peeking out from behind thin lips. The denizen is too big and too close for John to be sure, but he thinks Typheus is smirking at him. A mondo smirk. So lame.

TY: I'm waiting.

John yanks Rose's piece of light paper out of his pocket, grumbling to himself and squinting against the radiance of the letters to decipher one of the lines. Distractedly, he asks - demands, really; now he's irritated, which is a vast improvement over panic - "What's the deal, anyway? The Breeze said something about drowning. Like, where did that even come from? When did it become a thing that you do instead of just eating people like a normal giant monster?"

TY: What.

TY: Breeze.

The blue wind starts chuckling with a nervous edge.

BE: uh...it wasn't me!

TY: There. No one said anything about drowning. That is clearly not a thing that has occurred.

Wait, hang on. John looks up from the paper, his expression officially closer to weirded out than to irritated. "That is totally a thing it said."
TY: Nope. This is in fact the first time I am hearing about these grossly fraudulent accusations.

"Are you lying to me? That's kinda super weird."

The enormous green eyes won't even meet John's suspicious stare anymore; Tyheus is looking anywhere but at him, twiddling its silvery claws together while avoiding eye contact at all costs.

TY: Well, since some aspects have no verbal filter -

BE: hey!

TY: There. Er. May be vast oil reservoirs below. Ah. Not that I would flood the Inner Sanctum with it...no...that would never happen...who would even consider such a silly thing...a pisspoor excuse for a denizen, obvio-

"You were totally gonna dump a bunch of oil on me as a final boss battle, weren't you," John says flatly.

TY: This is why I need legal representation. Look, I wouldn't do it now -

He jabs a finger at Tyheus. "Melo. Dra. Matic." It's worth it just to see a humongous monster flinch. "Seriously, that's what I have to look forward to when we go through this whole stupid game again? That's part of your lame Choice uberquest thing?!"

Quick as a snap, Tyheus's eyes lock onto John, and he flinches back, heart suddenly pounding twice as fast as the Breeze goes taut around him. Oh, he fucking up, he fucked the fuck up, oh man -

TY: Oh, I think you've done quite well drowning yourself on your own time, child. You have drawn my pipes dry, and now look how little work is left to me.

A massive shrug, and more shredded wings fan out, sweeping to encompass the empty courtyard and more. The oversized grin has vanished, and when John steps back, Tyheus leans in, eyes gone dark and deep.

TY: I meant to dump it on your land, since last time it all went up in flames before you could deal with it. But I suppose as far as challenges go, you've set yourself up for a far more difficult maturation crisis than even I could have dreamed of.

TY: Thank you, ever so much - for once, you've made my work easier. It almost makes up for dragging me into your ludicrous glitches.

It comes up his throat so suddenly his gag reflex doesn't even have time to trigger; one second, John is cold, slowly raising his hand to stare at the smear of black smudged along the back, and then he's coughing, splattering droplets of black bile on the golden light of Rose's list. It tastes like gasoline and nothing more. He thought - for some reason, he thought it tasted even worse the last time this happened, flavored like licorice and something rotten, but honestly? Gasoline is just as incredibly nasty all on its own. He wipes at his mouth with the back of his smudged hand, struggling not to swallow because if he does he'll probably throw up for real. "Urgh! This is all part of your dumb quest! Why?!" he says, spitting between words.

TY: Sometimes it's physical. Others it is metaphysical. The mental option is most delicate of all to manage properly, and you decided to muck around with it on some self-destructive bender. I was asleep, and will admit I was cross at first to realize your unconscious mind had set the terms of your own challenge, but seeing as the work has been done for me...I'll let it stand.
TY: The candy abomination is new, though. I had no part in that, and I don't like it.

Why? Why did he think coming here to talk to the huge in-game boss enemy would end well? "All that stuff...you could take it back, though?" He finishes wiping the black off and flicking it as best he can onto the ground instead, but his hand is stained with it, and he rests his fist against his mouth knowing it probably looks the same, like a murmur of disgusting, so disgusting.

TY: Oh, we're seeing this through to the end, now. It's not the route I would have chosen, but it is as it is.

TY: You suffer, child. You suffer deeply, mired in despair and pain and self-loathing. The oil is only a sign and symptom that you have taken on yourself, not the root of it. Since we're here, and I'm awake, and that doesn't appear to be changing to a more desirable state anytime soon, I suppose we may as well lay this out now:

TY: I challenge you, child. Master your pain. As once I would have challenged you to heal your land, I charge you now with the healing of your mind. It has been ravaged and laid waste, and shall lay stagnant until you prevail.

TY: Then, and only then, will I deem you a worthy Heir, and offer you a worthy Choice.

The air throbs with it, a proclamation that John knows with a weight in his chest can't be taken back. He just...walked right into that one, didn't he. Oh jeez. What does that all even mean?!

Of course, he only has to look at the smug look on Typheus's face to know that the denizen would be less willing to give a hint about that than it would about Dave and Karkat's status. "Fine. Whatever. You're such an asshole," he says.

Typheus just booms in laughter, loud enough to make the pipe organ jar with a low note.

TY: Good. Never think me a friend. Now, I will answer one final question - if you grant me a request."

John mostly wants to tell him he can shove his request up his butt. Unfortunately, he's not sure snake monsters have butts, so it might just get him laughed at. Again. "Fine," he says, folding his arms. Rose's note is clamped tight in his fist, his expression more pout now than glare. "What request?" If it's something dumb, he's taking off and not coming back.

TY: Excellent choice.

TY: It is this: if you intend to gather the troll players and embark on this disgustingly puréed session that the scratch has produced, as some of your actions would imply, please inform them that if they attempt to approach any denizen, they will be summarily dispatched.

That isn't what John expected to hear at all. "Huh? Why?"

TY: Because the horrible little heathens murdered almost all of us instead of listening for two damn seconds. This session could have had twelve denizens, twelve choices for you all to test yourselves against. But no. Murderous. Little. Heathens.

This talk is taking a turn for the surreal again. This kind of mood whiplash can't be legal.

John has his suspicions, though. Call it an educated guess. "Did you all threaten to eat them? Because I'm pretty that would kiiinda set the mood for the rest of the conversation..."

The sea glass eye narrows at him, and when Typheus speaks next it's with an affronted huff in his TY: You know nothing, John Egbert. You come into my palace, you criticize my conversational openings -

His tone starts to get heated, and that means more nasty snake breath all up in John's face, and no. He loves himself more than that. "Okay, okay, sheesh, I'm sorry!" he says hastily, clapping a hand over his nose and trying to pinch it discreetly. "I'll tell them!" All things taken into consideration, it's not even that hard of a request. He can just tell Karkat and Kanaya when they get back and viola. Mission accomplished.

TY: Perfect. Now, ask your question. Try to make it a good one.

Still pissed, John finds his hands shaking a little again as he smoothes out Rose's paper. He sure as heck hopes she thought them up in the order of which she'd most like to have answered, because he feels like he can barely see as he reads aloud, the words stilted and not-right in his mouth as he forces them to make sentences. "What happened after we four achieved god tier and stripped Jack Noir of his ring, and why can John not remember the end game immediately preceding the Scratch?" There's subquestions labeled a through c, but like heck is he pushing his luck. Then - "Wait. Me. Why can I not remember the end game?"

TY: That is technically two questions.

"They're related, though."

TY: Oh, just rephrase it.

Easier said than done, right now. "What happened after we beat Jack Noir that made us scratch the game?" he manages at last. He thinks that's the gist of it.

TY: And you cannot remember it on your own. Yes, I recall the Knight mentioning something to that effect, though with the damage you've accumulated over there, I'm not particularly surprised. But at the same time, I sense Skaia's will in this. Yes, this is the correct order of things.

TY: Sit.

John makes a face. "Uh, no thanks."

TY: Sit down, child, I need to impart to you an egregious amount of elucidatory exposition and we could be here for a while.

He folds his legs up without saying a word, and the Breeze floats him there in silent accord. The double-team judging stares just make Typheus roll his eyes.

TY: Where to begin...Hm. You must understand: the troll game session produced your own. Their game gave birth to your universe, your Bilious Slick, your cosmic genesis.

...So melodramatic, holy crap. "Yeah, okay, cool." It rings true in John's head, anyway. Someone probably mentioned it before.

TY: But they never seem to have completed the synchroclusion sequence. They must have been driven away from the platform before they could conclude their session, and fled between sessions through the abyss of the Horrors.

TY: Because they did not properly complete the session, sequential order broke down. Instead of their session coming temporally before your own, they became able to communicate with your session asynchronously.

TY: They...meddled.

"And none of that got recorded, because for some weird reason it counted as being part of their session. Yeah, I think I got that." John tries to swallow back some of the sarcasm, because he doesn't like the sharp look in Typheus's eye. "How did they meddle, again?"

TY: That wasn't the question you asked. How unfortunate for you.

Oh, that's such bullcrap. John fumes to himself while Typheus unfurls a wing to make some incomprehensible winged-snake gesture.

TY: By all rights, the Horrors of the Ring should have consumed them. I can only speculate, but it tastes of truth in my lungs, and so I think my assumption correct: the Horrors feared what chased them. The meteor passed unhindered, hurtling towards your session's location in the Medium, because what followed in its wake was too powerful a force even for a Horrorterror to think of challenging it.

TY: And as it stalked them, time tore itself to shreds. Technically, they mistimed it - there is always disjointment between a game's medium and the space between sessions, where the abyss of Horrors leaks through the void, and time is not what it used to be. But this destruction exacerbated the problem, and their meteor was so jostled by the cracks that it arrived several centuries before you were even born.

Just like that, John knows. "They landed on your house, didn't they."

TY: The meteor landed on my fucking house.

Ha. 'Murderous little heathens,' John's butt. This is clearly just a case of the giant monster being angry about having its house crushed. He can't wait to tell Karkat.

TY: The meteor did. But not they. You see, once you dealt with Noir, your Witch and your Knight were able to enact a [ T A R D I S ] maneuver and pull those that still lived to Skaia, before the meteor crossed into the session proper.

TY: But the being had already chased them here. You fought - we all fought - but there was no possibility of victory. There never was.

TY: Even the scratch has but delayed it. Perhaps the scratching of both sessions at once managed to confuse it for a time. But time does not mean much where such a creature is concerned.

Suddenly, nothing is funny anymore. John swallows, the taste sour and his mouth dry. "What...was it."

Tyheus doesn't bicker about the accidental intrusive question; he just quietly answers. Nooot a good sign.

TY: A Lord of Time. The Master class of entropy and destruction incarnate, beyond the power of any god or denizen or Horror, beyond even Skaia.

TY: A...terminal glitch. Everything ends. Heed me - you will know him by the lurid glory of his Cairo Overcoat, the gold of his assault rifle, the felt of his minions, and the skeletal hollow of his face, ever working from behind the scenes to bring about the end of all reality. To know his true name is to know terror no one ever has. To hear his honk is to know the cessation of existence.

"So wait a second...he has a skeleton face? It's just a skull?" John can feel something. Oh, there's horror, and more than a little fear, and the whole thing sounds even more dire than all the scenarios he came up with in his head. He doubts even Rose could have thought up something that sounds as ominous as this. This sounds like such a seriously bad guy.

TY: His image is seared into my mind. Yes, it is a skeleton face, with minimal skin. It is also green. Why do you ask?

"And - he's a lord. So, like, a king? And he's always hanging around, messing things up for us while lurking in the shadows or something like that?"

Typhheus rears back. He looks utterly distraught. It probably takes a whole lot to make a boss enemy distraught, but on the inside John's too strangled between horror and perverse hilarity to do more than wheeze gasps of laughter.

TY: Stop. Desist at once. I already know where you are going with this child, and that is where I draw the line. A Lord is not a king so don't you da-

He can't stop now. The force of his hysteria can't be tamed. "So you could almost say he's...skullking?"

Typhheus slams a wing against the ground. John, floating, doesn't care, though the shockwave bowls him over; the Breeze rolls with him, short gusts of laughter shrieking over Tyheus's groan of despair. Good.

TY: Get out of my mind.

"Nah." John has one more. "He destroys time? What, by eating it? That sounds a little time consuming -"

The wing slams again, and then slaps against Tyheus's pale face.

TY: I'm never telling you anything ever again. Ever. These puns are the biggest stretches I've heard in countless millennia and I hope you are ashamed of yourself for trying to make them work.

John sniffles. "Give me a break, I'm traumatized and stuff."

TY: Don't remind me. Get. Out.

A blast of uncontrollable air catches John and the Breeze mid-roll. They yelp at the same time, while Tyheus's gust shoves them up and out of the palace courtyard, toward the blue spirograph in the sky. "Okay. Uh, thank you!" John calls down, but the massive serpent has already started slithering back down the pipe it came from, leaving brush marks where its wings drag over the earth.

[Don't come here again. Stay in your own mind, and leave me to my rest.]

"Why do you sleep so much?"

[OUT.]

Tyheus must really put some effort into that last shout, because John hurtles through the channel so fast that Rose doesn't even have time to blink before he slams into her on the far side.

The Breeze just laughs at all of them.
Mr Zahhak,

No apologies are necessary. As it so happens, I have continued with my research into ambient void over the years, though due to some sensitive aspects of that research, I have kept it classified and not published anything in the public domain in quite some time. In terms of my older research, you may find some items relevant to your interest in the archives of Journal de Physique prior to 1998, and the European Physical Journal in the years since, but I'm afraid that none of it covers my current work, since I moved on from the theoretical to the applied mechanics of void manipulation.

I would be perfectly willing to share the schematics for a void ward generator that may be of some help to you. However, even with a secure point of contact, there is a considerable threat that even an encrypted file could be compromised. Your mention of a group of criminal malcontents causes me to be greatly concerned, as I suspect that the people threatening you and your colleague may well be the same group that currently threatens my own family - have they mentioned, perhaps, the Midnight Crew or the Felt? The two criminal organizations are linked, and they are a significant part of the reason why I ceased publicizing my work.

If I assume this in error, forgive me. But if they are indeed the ones harrying you, you are in graver danger than you can possibly know. I have attached below a hopefully secure file that may be enough to help you construct a portable void aggregation device, but that is only a stop gap measure. I urge you in earnest to come speak with me in person. Bring your colleague as well; I possess a powerful ward generator that took me many years to assemble on the premises of my laboratory, that should keep you hidden and safe until you decide whether to craft one of your own and return to your place of residence.

I understand that I ask much, as such an offer requires you to rely heavily on my own good will and sincerity, of which you have no way to ascertain. But I urge you all the same. Come to Seattle, and either I can arrange for a private vehicle to escort you to the secret coordinates of my lab, or (depending on the time of day) ask that one of my cohort bring you here by means of her own particular talent for swift travel. There is much I would like to discuss with you in person, both for the sake of your safety, and as a fellow scientist. Money is no issue.

Yours,

Doctor Rue Lalonde, Ph.D.

-

Doctor Lalonde,

Thank you for your fast response. I have completed the device, though it's hard to tell what effect it may have yet.

It goes against my instinct to leave the house at this time, and my instincts are very strong. But at the same time, I must express that my concern that the defenses already in place may not be enough. They have not breached the walls yet, but my cameras have captured members of just the criminal groups you have named circling and surveying the premises. From within here, I have no way to obtain shipments of the materials I'd need to reinforce the house further without opening a path in for them to take advantage of. And my colleague has begun to grow stir crazy. Last night she almost clawed her own way out, insisting that she could face them on her own if need be, and I was forced to subdue her for her own safety.
I have booked a flight to the Seattle-Tacoma International Airport as early in the morning as could be arranged. I put myself at your mercy, but make no mistake: while I must take your good will on faith, if you seek to delude me and betray this trust, and thus put my colleague in jeopardy, there is no power on this earth that will stop me from repaying you any injury done to her a 100 times over. Nay, a 1000 times over.

My regards,

Equius Zahhak

---

They reach the outskirts of Los Angeles with hardly any mishaps.

It's amazing! Jade is squirming with delight by the time they reach South Pasadena, and when they touch down next on the highway, only a mile from the dome itself, she can barely contain herself. How often do her trips go so smoothly? It took them an hour to get here, with as few bounces and stops as Jade and Bec could manage while still being cautious; it helps that Kanaya doesn't get feverish like WV or nauseous and antsy like Dave and Karkat, the two repeat complainers. Kanaya just makes small talk, totally unfazed by the teleportation, which is how they've ended up in the middle of a conversation about the old struggle known to gardeners everywhere concerning the growing of pumpkins.

"I used to have a whole section of my greenhouse room full of pumpkins and other gourds!" Jade says, as they look west, the morning sun at their backs. And there the dome sits, sparkling and twinkling like a snowy diamond, light lancing off it at odd angles that flare across Jade's lenses. It's not at all greasy and filmy like some of the original footage showed, when the thing first appeared and all contact was lost with the residents of LA. Jade has been doing her research! Ever since Kanaya requested this trip, she's done her best to compile all the available data in between efforts to get the dumb terminal working again and keeping Karkat distracted from his moping. Rose and her mom had some contacts they could pull raw data from, tapping their respective contacts in the thaumaturgic and scientific communities, so Jade could compare the before and after readings from the moment the dome transformed. A few text messages apparently got through the communication white out, but it wasn't more than a few calls for help dated back to the first day of the isolation, so it wasn't very helpful in getting an idea as to what the Horrorterror might have done to the place before leaving.

Kanaya, her arm still linked with Jade's as they stride down the road, sighs. "They always vanish before harvest," she says, and the two of them nod sagely together in commiseration. "I did not have much space on the roof of my apartment building for gardening projects, so eventually I was forced to prioritize other projects." The troll huffs, sidestepping Bec when the wolf pops from their original landing site to almost right under her feet in a silent blaze of stars. "I do hope young Daniel has kept his promise to water the seedlings. I didn't anticipate being away for so long. What else did you grow?"

"Welll, I always tried to grow some pretty perennials, but the annuals were a lot harder to keep up with year to year, since we didn't get many shipments of nonessentials from the mainland." She grins. "But I coaxed some of the local flora to grow closer to the house, which really brightened up the place!"

Kanaya smiles, folding her knees up as Jade floats them over a chunk of highway that appears to have buckled and warped. This entire area has been cleared out; Jade imagines most everyone has been relocated by now, out of the fear that the dome could expand or something. The Stanford team is stationed north of here, so there's not much worry about running into civilians or anything. Jade doesn't mind attention, but Kanaya was firm in that she wants to keep this low-key. "You lived on a tropical island? I wish I'd had as much room to spread out as that."

"Yeah." Jade heaves a gusty sigh. "I almost wish I hadn't had to set off the volcano and everything!"

Kanaya chokes on her own spit. "What?"

"Oh, yeah, my Grandpa had a lot of stuff he collected there," Jade says, shrugging. "His last wishes always specified that the day I left to travel the world, I had to hit the self-destruct button and all that." Mostly for the sake of confidentiality, partially for science! "Grandpa had tons of secret things he didn't want falling into the hands of unsavory characters. Not even I could get into all of the labs without permission or passwords, though." She technically could have teleported in, or hacked the deactivated transportalizer pads; her curiosity did get the better of her a few times, particularly as she got older and she trained to use her powers to sense just how far down the subterranean lab complex extended in empty magma chambers. Someone spent a lot of time and money clearing all that out! Sometimes Jade wonders how Grandpa did it all just in his lifetime, and what other strange machines and experiments might have gone on in the deepest depths, where Bec never let her venture.

The jadeblood just looks stunned, so Jade starts chatting (just a liiittle tangent) about how the self-destruct sequence worked, and how totally awesome it looked when she finally set it off. It was a bittersweet moment at the time, considering all the wealth of knowledge and artefacts that the island took down with it, but Grandpa was adamant. That conversation lasts them all the way to the foot of the dome, so at least it's a way to pass the time.

This close up, Jade can scope out the dimensions of the dome for herself, contrasting her own perceptions with the measurements from the Stanford and Wisconsin teams that she waded through earlier. She has the basic specs loaded on her goggles for ease of reference. The structure feels...tingly - like golden, carbonated soda, fizzling under her space sense, which might be because it's made of magic and all. It encompasses most of downtown LA, stretching almost 2058 feet in height. More than tall enough to accommodate the tallest of the buildings in the city, if they're still intact.

Briskly, Kanaya walks over to inspect a smashed-up section of the guardrail and a half-demolished wall, and a crumpled car folded up on the road like an accordion. Jade chose this spot to approach the dome specifically because there was a mysterious fight the other day, with rumors and grainy footage showing that a hole opened up in the dome before being sealed over one last time. John and Karkat and their hero chat boards tentatively identified the fighters as that Juggaloco guy (argh) and the relatively little-known Summoner, from Mexico, facing off against some odd troll who shot white lightning everywhere before getting his butt kicked and vanishing into the dome. Which at least helped Jade fill in a timeline for the clown's steady trek north from the Mexico-Texas border, apparently in the company of that troll in the wheelchair she had no explanation for at the time - made all the more ominous by the fact that it's entirely possible they've been following her to get to Karkat. It doesn't make sense, since Jade didn't even know Karkat when she first ran into the clown, but the way that the purpleblood has brought up Karkat with both her and Dave, there's no question that that's who he might have been after all this time. If he is a game player from the troll's session, he's sure got a scary way of going about it!

Anyway, if this part of the dome opened up once, it's possible Jade and Kanaya can figure out how to make it open a second time. They won't know until they try!

"Can you feel anything on the other side?" Kanaya asks, straightening from the side of the guardrail and returning to Jade with a faint frown as she looks over the dome herself. A faint breeze ruffles the fabric of her cowl and the chunks of hair that frame her face. "It looks whole to me; there doesn't appear to be a seam of any kind."

Right! First things first. "Uhm...here, let me check!" Jade says, flicking through a couple of different settings on her goggles until they start recording what's in front of her. You never know what might happen too fast for her and Kanaya to catch; better to have something to replay later. When that's set up, she squints and starts concentrating on the glinting white dome before them, sending out a pulse of power to try to get some idea of the dimensions - just how thick are the walls of this thing before she hits air again?

What she gets is a big fat nothing. Her space sense rams right into a wall, unyielding and solid underneath the fizzy layer. It's totally smooth, seamless, and as far as her powers can tell, there's nothing past it. When she scrunches up her nose and tries again, her spatial sense laps up against the dome as far around as she can reach, like water against the hull of an overturning boat. The sensations less like the twistiness of Doctor Lalonde's void wards, and more like those awful minutes trapped in Droog's cage that nullified her space powers entirely. As long as that dome's up and running, Jade doesn't think she's getting through it. Nothing's getting through it.

Air's probably not getting through it.

Oh no. How are those people breathing?! Jade just assumed (hoped) that there had to be some kind of holes or filtration or permeable membrane that let fresh air pass through; maybe other scientists and news crews weren't able to detect them because they just didn't have the right tools for the job. But Jade can't sense anything either and that's - not good. The inhabitants of the city have been cut off for ages.

Between the Horrorterror and the lack of air, she's suddenly not looking forward to what they're about to find. She darts a look at Kanaya, feeling kinda sick. "Nothing. It's like there's nothing on the other side - not even empty space like there would be if all the buildings were knocked down..." She picks at one of the rubber bands on her pinkie finger, nervous. "I can't even tell if the road or the ground itself continues on the inside. I think my powers just aren't working, here!"

Stone would be more expressive than Kanaya's face right now; the troll takes a steady breath and says, "That is not entirely unexpected. We know this thing has proven impenetrable during other attempts to cross through it. What might be the most effective method of getting through? I hate to speculate what might happen if we attempted to teleport in without having some idea of what the terrain inside looks like." Kanaya drums the claws of one hand along the side of her folded arm, strands of her hair falling into her eyes so that she has to blow them out of the way. "The Ukraine was incredibly treacherous; if the ground here is as saturated with acid as it was there, our shoes won't last long."

Jade chews on her lip, squinting one eye almost shut as she concentrates - but nada. "If it is that bad, I can probably just float us around. No one said we had to land on our feet, after all! Let's try Bec, next." Jade whistles and Bec's ears perk up in attention, the wolf's nostrils flaring as it turns its head toward her from where it lies on top of a pile of rubble. "Bec, I need you to do something for me, okay?"

There's a brief flicker of electric green, and then Bec sits at her feet, head tilted back and tongue lolling out in eagerness. "Good boy!" she says, bending down and scratching behind its ears. "Can you get in and out of this dome? We're trying to figure out what's on the other side."

A moment passes while Becquerel processes the request - long enough of a moment, honestly, that Jade wonders if maybe something didn't translate right. Bec is smart, yeah, but there's always the chance that the wolf didn't understand what Jade asked of it. Grandpa knows a lot more about how it works. Just when she's about to repeat herself - she darts an anxious look at Kanaya, who's watching the two of them with a curious expression - Bec huffs and vanishes. Hastily, Jade reaches out mentally and follows the burst of the wolf's power -

All the way to where her senses slam up against the side of the dome. Again, Becquerel appears to have vanished without a trace when Jade reaches out for it, gone as thoroughly as if it never existed. She and Kanaya can't see or feel anything through the barrier, either, so Jade can't even say for sure that the wolf made it through. Darn it!

"Um. Jade," Kanaya begins, touching Jade's arm hesitantly and pointing. But Jade's already felt the flicker of power, and looks up in time to see Becquerel reappear, sitting at a steep angle on the side of the dome, with the mournful air of a canine who has somehow disappointed its human friend and isn't entirely sure how it happened. It cocks its head to the side and stands, still at an impossibly precarious angle, and starts scenting around the smooth surface of the dome, trotting along and finally pawing at a particular spot close to where the dome meets the twisted road with a whine.

Jade...has no idea what that means. Bec's not good at communicating things back to her. "What is it, boy?" she asks, jogging closer and bouncing over one of the larger chunks of cement in her way. By the time she reaches it, Bec has buried its nose against the dome, whimpering constantly. Uncharacteristically, it starts making little burrowing motions, digging at the dome with scrabbling claws in a way that Jade hasn't ever seen it do, ever.

She has heard that whimper, before, though, and she's starting to get pretty paranoid about it. Whipping around, Jade nearly clocks Kanaya with a faceful of her hair as she glares at the road behind them, visually scanning all of the shatter window fronts and the insides of overturned vehicles as she looks for that guy. Clown troll has a nasty habit of turning up right behind people and dodging her space sense up until the last possible second; she doesn't think he would have backtracked all the way from Seattle to Los Angeles when he's looking for Karkat, but it's been days since Dave heard from him in the mysterious Pesterchum event. He might have had time.

There's nothing, though. Kanaya, tensing at Jade's sudden shift, only shakes her head when Jade checks to see if she's noticed anything. "Sorry. Nervous, I guess," Jade says, trying to shake off the unease that creeps up her spine. It's pretty annoying how just the faintest hint of the juggalo troll sets her on edge. "Usually when Bec makes that noise, it means that clowny guy is around..."

"I don't blame you."

"Maybe he smells something similar, or just something left over from when that guy was here. I think we're okay for now." Jade reaches out and taps at the spot Bec's circling around; the wolf nudges her fingers with its nose, whining. But direct contact doesn't reveal anything for Jade to sense, either.

Mmm. There's just nothing else for it! Jade sucks her lip into her mouth, pulls her phone out of her sylladex pocket, and opens Pesterchum.

-- gardenGnostic [GG] began pestering thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] at 10:06:11 -- GG: rose?
TT: Jade.
GG: rose!
TT: Jade?
GG: heeehe! hi! :) are you busy right now?
TT: Not particularly. I was attempting to establish stable contact with one Aradia Megido, but her chat clientele appears to think that linear conversation is for saps.
TT: She seems to find it endlessly amusing. Or at least, that is what I'm taking away from all of the laughter. I think it convoluted and frustrating, but also an exercise in patience and perseverance.
TT: How may I help? Have you and Kanaya reached Los Angeles already?
GG: yup yup! no problem whatsoever getting here!
TT: We may need to commemorate this momentous occasion.
GG: it really is amazing!
GG: but also kind of sad, that having one of our plans work out right is now mind-blowing...
TT: If it's any consolation, Dave and Karkat appear to have gotten through the first few minutes of their flight without killing each other, and John and I have spent the past half hour thwarting WV's best efforts to turn my mother's best spectrometer into the next Picasso. We may yet break our recent streak of horrific luck.
GG: let's not jinx it, i guess. anyway, we were wondering if you had any more advice on how to poke a hole in this dome thing. i can't sense anything through it, which means we're mostly flying blind at the moment.
TT: Nothing at all?
GG: nope!
TT: That's not promising, but not surprising, either. Someone with quite a lot of magic to burn decided to throw an absolutely outrageous amount of it into making that dome as impressive as possible. Considering it took a Horrorterror to craft the original structure, that means this person - or person(s), I suppose - is powerful to the point of absurdity.
TT: Worst case scenario - this person may have rigged it so that they end up exactly as strong as they believe themselves to be, as they've always hoped to become. A dangerous, stacking progression.
GG: oh nooo...
GG: still, there's gotta be a way through! bec did it, but it can't tell me what's on the other side.
TT: Becquerel managed it? Is there anything that creature can't do?
GG: talk :(
TT: Ah, yes.
TT: Unfortunately, there's not much I can do to assist you further from here. The mere thought of scrying across that kind of distance puts me in mind of migraines.
GG: blah! what can you tell me about this magic?
TT: Belief is tricky. The only people I'm familiar with who deal with faith magic on a semi-regular basis are casual exorcists, or necromancers who would give anything to avoid it. Hope is a potent thing, and unfortunately, the kind of priests who actually channel that kind of power don't tend to frequent the kind of forums I peruse. It hasn't truly been utilized on a large scale since the Crusades.
TT: But Becquerel did pass through?
GG: yeah! or at least, it felt like it did - i couldn't sense it reappear on the other side, so it must have been inside the area i can't feel...
TT: That's promising. It means that whoever is generating this dome didn't take into account something like Becquerel existing. Physical objects can't pass through, but space powers may not be countered. Trickiness does work both ways, after all - if one isn't even aware that something exists, how can one hope something into existence that counteracts it? It may be able to take you through, even if you're not confident in your own ability to jump in without a point of reference.
GG: no way to know until we try, i suppose! we'll keep you posted.
TT: Good luck. Be safe.

"Rose says if Bec can get through, that probably means it can take us through with it," Jade announces, looking up from her phone. She keeps it out for a moment, turning the phone over in her hands as she ponders, and then finally tucks it back into the pocket for safe keeping. "Orrr, I guess...we said we were coming here to do reconnaissance. Maybe I could strap my glasses onto Bec, to record what it sees on the other side..."

"I suppose it depends on which would be the most favorable option," Kanaya muses aloud, shifting her weight from one foot to the other as she contemplates the dome. Jade waits, trying to be patient while the troll thinks, because this is Kanaya's trip and Kanaya should probably be in charge of deciding important stuff like this. Jade's all for leaping right in for some hands on observation, but the glasses plan might be the safer one to start out with. With a nod, Kanaya raps her knuckles against the dome. "Let's attempt it. This affliction we call curiosity has been eating at me for quite some time now."

Jade can't quite repress a giggle of anticipation, clapping her hands together in excitement, and Kanaya grants her a small smile.

"wwho's there? gam is that you you stupid fuck? i knoww youre out there this time an i told you no."

Jade squeaks and shoots a foot in the air; Kanaya yanks her hand back from the dome, eyes startled and wide, as the voice emerges out of nowhere. A quick brush over their surroundings once again reveals...nothing at all. "Who are you?" Kanaya returns while Jade's still spinning around with her hand outstretched, trying to figure out where the voice is coming from. Bec doesn't appear overly concerned, still nosing at the dome, but that doesn't necessarily mean they're not in trouble.

"i asked you first," the voice says, irritable enough to rival Karkat in one of his moods. "wait hang on. kan?"

Jade hears it as 'can,' at first, and Kanaya must take it the same way before comprehension hits. Kan, like, short for Kanaya? Oookay. "Did you know someone in LA?" Jade whispers, feeling a little at a loss.

But Kanaya shakes her head, just as confused. She clears her throat, and calls, "This is the Malachite Sylph and Sharpshooter." Jade wonders if the troll realizes that she lowers her voice a little, defensive and growly, kinda the way John would do for his Heir thingy. "We beg your pardon; we are just investigating this dome structure."

"oh fuck it is you," the voice says, sounding gobsmacked. Then there's the sound of a throat clearing, and they make this really blatant attempt at sounding nonchalant. "i see so its one a those things. look can wwe not do the secret identity crap kan? slingin around all of these made up names is frankly kiddie playtime shit an i wwas pretty much ovver it after the second time fef changed her name."

Okay! So this person really seems to think they know Kanaya, which is...interesting. They're also talking like they knew about the whole super hero, secret identity thing before it was cool. But when Jade glances at Kanaya again the troll just looks twice as baffled, thrown for a complete loop. The fact that the voice is still just sort of emanating from thin air doesn't help much. "I'm sorry, I really don't know what you're talking about. Who am I speaking to?" At Jade's frantic, soundless motioning toward the dome, Kanaya hurries to add, "Also, we were under the impression that no one could communicate through the barrier. Where are you?"

"wwha -" the person breaks off, and then makes a frustrated noise like someone hrrgling. They keep doing something strange with their w's and v's, too, in a really pretentious, wobbly accent. "its me eridan obviously. come on wwe can be cool right kan? i pulled some really stupid shit but wwere more mature noww right? yeah. all scores are settled - okay mine obviously didnt stick so maybe wwere not exactly equal but thats all dealin wwith technicalities." There's a really rushed laugh that makes Jade and Kanaya just look at each other, but then the voice's tone shifts to sounding more guarded. "and wwho else is ovver there?"

"Me!" Jade pipes up. She finally settles on glaring at the dome, since that's the direction she's getting the overwhelming impression that the voice is coming from - the only place that would make sense, since she can't spy a loudspeaker or anything else that would explain how the unseen person is projecting their voice here without her sensing them.
"oh one of the humans," Eridan says. The eye roll is almost palpable. "i remember that vvoice. the jade one i guess it makes sense you twwo wwould end up hangin out together. i passed on the code for my legendary one of a kind wweapon to you did you evver actually evven use that thing? you wwere bein needlessly stupid about it but i wwas kinda busy and couldnt check back in."

Jade isn't entirely sure what this is about. But she's pretty sure she's offended. "Hey!" Then her brain finishes putting all the clues together, and she gets even more offended. "You! You're a game player, aren't you!"

"of course i am. god youre not gonna pull the same forgetful bs rubbish as tavv are you. of course you are. first gam is his insane clowwn self times 1000 and noww no one else remembers anythin wwhat a load of bull."

Meanwhile, Kanaya looks like she's swallowed something sour without expecting it. "No. Absolutely not." She makes grabby motions with her claws and turns her eyes skyward like the heavens will open up and reassure her that this isn't game stuff. "How is it possible that we haven't come far enough to escape that being the explanation for everything?"

Jade can't do more than shrug when Kanaya looks askance at her; she doesn't think they'll ever be able to outrun the game, so Kanaya being skeptical about everything doesn't really affect her. Eridan's voice just keeps babbling - and then, mid-sentence, his tone abruptly shifts. "come on kan i knoww wwe didnt exactly end on g- you dont remember it. It's like a revelation to him or something. Quite apart from how Jade hasn't missed that Eridan hasn't explained how he's talking through the dome, that shift would be more than enough to tip her off to the fact that something's up with this guy.

"Is there something I should be remembering?" the jadeblood says, slowly, folding her arms.

The backpedalling that ensues is so obvious, it makes Jade and Kanaya wince hearing it in action. "no! uh i mean - look that game wwas just a disaster from start to finish. look at howw many people vvrissa killed before wwe evven started like wwowwie wwhat a clusterfuck that all wwas. id forget it all if i could but i dont havve that luxury anymore. got wway too many fires in the iron and all that bee ess."

Kanaya falters. "...You remember Vriska?"

"as if i could forget that connivvin hag." And without elaborating any further whatsoever, he does that really suspicious subject change again. Jade starts a mental tally, 'cause this guy's trying wayyy too hard to sell them something shady as heck. Like, wow, she wonders why she thinks that this guy and Kanaya weren't good friends...at all. Really. No sarcasm here! "anywway wwere havvin a real fresh start right noww kan. i can feel it. this is the kind a amicability that wwill drivve the other members of our wwashed up game session mad wwith friendship jealousy. you said you wwanted to see my court yeah?"

"Your court?" Jade asks. She runs her tongue over her teeth, then gives in to the instinct to whistle, low and kinda patchy, for Bec to return to her side. She nods when Kanaya angles her head toward Jade without taking her eyes from her watch on the dome, kneels, and buries her head in the fur by Bec's ear. There's no way to tell how well this Eridan person can hear or see through the dome, so hopefully her loud question and the resulting pompous, warbled blather that starts coming from the speaker covers the whisper of her next order. "Bec, stay out here, out of sight. Okay, boy?"

"oh im totally in charge ovver here its pretty great. had a couple a mishaps but thats on account a mal bein a douche."
Jade lifts her head and calls loudly, her voice sounding high-pitched even to her ears, "Mal who?" When Bec wags its tail in acknowledgment, Jade presses a kiss to the top of the wolf's head to add another whispered caveat, "And if I whistle, get me and Kanaya out right away. No stopping, no check-in - straight to Pasadena." Having the wolf act as an emergency get away plan has worked in the past, but by default Bec will usually wait until Jade confirms that she wants it to take her away. That could cost her and Kanaya precious seconds in the event of a crisis that Jade's leery about chancing after the experience with the clown troll, who knocked her for such a loop that she almost didn't remember to call Bec at all.

Eridan tries to verbally shrug them off again, Jade can hear it; she chalks another one up on her mental tally as she gets up from her crouch. She waits for Bec to wink out of sight in a flicker of green that counts as inconspicuous, by Bec standards. Of course, Eridan also fails miserably by virtue of the fact that the first word out of his intangible mouth is the one word guaranteed to make Kanaya bristle and bare her teeth. "horrorterror. not a thing anymore though they fucked right off. Frankly they wwerent evven fit to call themselvves a terror - first sign of faygo and they bolted it wwas fuckin lame. noww its just me and my court. im in the middle a somethin but you can come in and vvisit i guess. since wwe are spillin the mad camaraderie here and youre curious about my process an shit. nothin i approvve of more than some empirical investigatin between chums like us."

"Just a moment," Kanaya says. Casual as anything, the troll hooks her arm with Jade's again, like they did to teleport all the way here, and they bend their heads together while facing away from the dome to get up to some whispering. "Do you trust him."

It's not a question. "Not even a little." On the one hand, Jade would trust to the bond between her and Rose and Dave and John with everything she is; on the other, Kanaya doesn't give a lick of credit to anything related to the game, so Jade wouldn't trust in the same kind of bond existing between the troll game players. At least, not when Eridan has done so epic a job of poisoning the well in the space of one short conversation. That takes real talent! Jade is impressed, in a 'I am now suuuper suspicious' kind of way.

"We could return to Seattle by noon, if we were so inclined?"

Jade raises both her eyebrows and puts on her best skeptic face. "Yeah, but are we really gonna?" Doubt Eridan all she wants, Jade can't deny that the possibility that this is all one big game thing that - if they don't investigate it ASAP - will probably do that thing where it blows up in their face later on. Heck, she almost wishes that things hadn't turned so awful and sad-making with John and his dumb dad this past week, so that maybe they might have all come to look into Los Angeles sooner. Because what do you know, there's this ginormous potential for it to blow up in their faces...right the heck now. Between the Midnight Crew and the Felt and the game itself, the last thing they all need is to let a bunch of potential awfulness like this go because they've got (completely healthy) misgivings where the guy in charge is concerned.

And if Eridan remembers the troll game session, this may be too good an opportunity to pass up. If they can convince him to spill the beans, they might get a little more context for the human game session that they badly, badly need.

That, and Kanaya really probably just wants to hear more about the Horrorterror thing. The jadeblood hangs her head and sighs, and Jade pats her on the back in consolation. "No, I suppose we are not," Kanaya says, resigned. Then the troll straightens her shoulders and raises her chin, lower lip jutting a little as she looks to the dome. "I would like to discuss this Horrorterror with you, Eridan," she says with care. "It is relevant to my interests, at the moment."
"really? i mean yeah sure wwhatever. wwe can hang out and stuff. bring the jade human too wwhat the heck and i can givve you both the grand tour. ruth wwill meet you on the inside. here i need a sec the amazin wwizardries wwill kick in momentarily."

Jade's about to ask who that is, but the odds of getting a straight answer here have depleted to the point of nonexistence, so she saves her breath and waits to see what will happen next.

What happens is the dome opens up. Like it's nothing at all, like teams of scientists haven't been attempting to hack their way through for days and days, like Jade hasn't just been having a premature midlife crisis over the fact that she can't feel anything through it. Nope, none of that in any way affects the fact that opening a portal through the dome apparently only takes Eridan five seconds. It...dims open, is the best way Jade can think to describe it; the rock solid, diamond hard surface fades like a dying lightbulb right in front of her and Kanaya. As the circle fades out of existence, Jade lets out a tendril of power and lo and behold, she can feel things! Her space sense still can't pass through the rest of the dome, but the circular gap evaporating in the morning sun lets her sneak right through. It's such a relief that there still is stuff to sense that Jade almost drifts forward without realizing, until a firm hand on her shoulder halts her back. She smiles sheepishly at Kanaya in thanks.

"So it can open," Kanaya comments, at least half to herself. "Why do I get the impression that this simplicity is not permissible?"

Jade shrugs. "Because nothing's ever this easy for us?"

Kanaya's jaw works, but not with a swallowed laugh; her mouth twitches downward. "It raises an unfortunate question."

Joke's aside, Jade has figured that out, too. "If it's that easy...why hasn't anyone left?" The potential answers for that are sobering.

Kanaya considers the smooth-edged opening in the dome - it could have been shaped with a cookie-cutter, it's so perfectly carved - and then bows her head. "We came all this way to perform reconnaissance, did we not?"

"Nothing ventured, nothing gained!" Jade adds, pushing up the sleeves of her coat. The grey Seattle weather lately has been spoiling her into forgetting she grew up in tropical conditions; the constant sun on their backs, with the gleaming, cold white mirror of the dome, is almost enough to make her sweat a little.

"I merely wonder if it will be as easy for us to walk out as it appears to be to walk in." Kanaya has lost all her droll humor, and just looks grim.

After a moment of thought, Jade offers her arm. "Together?"

The jadeblood takes it. "Let us go to see the wizard."

The moment they're through, Jade breathes in deep - and sighs with relief when what she gets is a lungful of breathable air, and not just the waste CO2 of a city of people isolated from a fresh air supply. Something's filtered it, thankfully. Maybe hope magic? Jade doesn't know what limits that has; Rose wasn't exactly clear about it, apart from calling it 'tricky.'

The road before them resembles what it looked like on the outside of the dome, too, broken up and warped like it's been through an earthquake, but for the most part still intact enough for Jade and Kanaya to walk on with minimal floating. No acid at all, which was Kanaya's biggest worry on the way here. A bunch of the buildings on either side of the road have been damaged, with blast marks and chunks of masonry missing or caved in with no apparent pattern, but they still match up with what Jade would expect to see here, based on her research.

Yeah, all battered yet standard American city-issue architecture...right up until everything goes absolutely loopy and Renaissance on them. The grey and dun and beige of the outer rim of buildings gives way to an entirely different style of architecture, beetle-shell black with white bleeding through the chinks in the stone, cast into chiaroscuro by the brilliant backlight of the dome overhead, a constant illumination shining down on a city of impossible, alien contrast. Seriously, Jade's loaded a map or three onto her goggles to reference for this trip, on the off chance they managed to get through the dome, and she's seen pictures, but the very center of the dome-covered area doesn't look like Los Angeles at all, anymore! Monochrome cathedrals and castles crowd together in tight blocks when Jade casts her power out in a light blanket, spires rising up like a forest of sharp spears toward the dome.

"What on Earth," Kanaya says, astonished; she walks with her head tilted just so, keeping one jade eye locked on the hole in the dome behind them. Jade's got all her senses trained on the opening, too, licking her lips once in case she has to whistle for Bec in a hurry. She really hopes it won't be necessary, though; after various ways this past week has gone to heck in a handbasket, she'd be pretty okay with this trip going better than expected. They're already through the dome when Jade was half-sure they'd be doing nothing more than inspecting the outside of it, so that's awesome! Now, they're just gonna have to capitalize on this amazing streak of good luck before it runs out and all their plans start to go wonky again...

To her unending relief, a group of four people walk toward them, a human woman at the fore of the scattered line as they scale a rough barricade to approach Jade and Kanaya. Real, living people! "Hello? Is that - are you really there?" the woman calls, hesitant, as she skids down the far side of the short wall and stumbles into a jog that carries her to meet the two of them halfway. She's average in height, features drawn taut by an echo of pain, and dressed more for the odd, patchwork city than Jade anticipated; her dreadlocks are back in a high ponytail, and she wears piecemeal armor that could be the same material as the stone of the cathedral walls down the street, lined with threads of fizzling light. The armor's so fascinating - like something out of an RPG game, if Jade's honest, completely different from anything she's encounter in all her travels, vaguely reminiscent of old imperial armor but more ornamental, in a way - right up until Jade's gaze reaches the woman's arm and she realizes that's not armor. Part of the arm has been entirely replaced, an elegant prosthetic that doesn't have any of the stiffness or lag that you get sometimes with even medical grade work when the woman - Ruth? - uses it to vault over one last pile of rubble with a soft, chiming ring. In fact, Jade's not sure she can find a single wire or servomotor in this thing! It glitters with silvery white blades that form minimalistic bones and tendons, glossy and lucent enough that Jade can see through to the heart of burning white light that makes up the core. It's more like an artistic interpretation of what a prosthetic would look like and really has no business functioning at all without the power of magic and wishful thinking, in her opinion.

"Yes, we are," Kanaya answers, when Jade's too busy trying to figure out that wondrous arm to respond right away. Whoops. She didn't mean to stare... "You are Ruth?"

"That's me," the woman says; she doesn't sound at all happy about it, her head shaking slowly as she drinks in the sight of them with exhausted eyes. The other three in the patrol group catch up but hang back some distance from Kanaya and Jade, two of them clutching spears of the same stone as the buildings, that they seem to be using as glorified walking sticks to lean on with every other step. "I don't suppose you have any way to keep that open, do you?"
Jade blinks and looks over her shoulder, at the open circle in the dome. "Why, do you want to leave?"

Ruth closes her eyes; another member of the patrol whimpers. "He'd know," is all the woman says, closing her translucent hand into a fist, the blades chiming as they rearrange themselves and gleam, faceted like crystal. "He's - he's altered it, before. Even if we tried..." She swallows and has to visibly dredge up the effort to smile at Jade. "It would just snap close again once he noticed. Probably better not to piss him off."

Uh oh. Jade and Kanaya exchange glances. Only two minutes in, and already Jade's getting confirmation of her developing theory that Eridan might be a douchebag. She's tempted to just reach out and sort of tap Ruth on the shoulder, to bounce the woman right out the opening before it can close up (it better stay open, or Jade's gonna totally wreck Eridan's shit, no questions asked) but Ruth is already turning away, giving a short shake of her head when a troll looks at her with a hopeful expression. "You're the first new faces we've seen in - a while, I guess," Ruth says, leading them back over the barricade with stiff shoulders. When they reach her patrol group (a man, another woman, and a greenblood) Ruth brushes their arms with the fingers of her ordinary hand. "Can't really count the days all that well in here, and most electronics have been dead for a while, so..."

Three more pairs of eyes are watching Kanaya and Jade now, wary and disbelieving, like they're mirages that could vanish any second. The troll has a prosthetic limb as well, Jade notices, a whole leg that's been replaced with obsidian crystal flush with his hip. It's not as transparent as the metal and crystal of Ruth's arm, but Jade doesn't doubt the internal workings are just as impossible. "It is March 29th, today," Kanaya says; they all stiffen, the man's face contorted with such agonizing relief that Jade has to look away.

"Not as long as it's felt, then." The woman sighs, and rubs her face with the back of her hand. "Anyway. He called down that he wants us to walk you to the courtyard, which isn't much of a problem. Right now he's up reinforcing the roof - he started a while ago, so..."

They've barely stopped before the group starts moving again, and Jade, startled, almost trips both her and Kanaya over a rock when she starts walking again. "Why? The dome already seems pretty darn sturdy! No one on the outside can do anything about it," she asks.

Ruth slows a little for them to catch up, her expression unreadable. "Something's coming. Something big. He calls it the Reckoning."

This time, Jade does nearly trip over a rock, too distracted by this sudden announcement that she loses track of her surroundings in shock. Kanaya just looks confused - and then aghast realization sets in as she presumably remembers where she's heard the word before. "The what?!"

The woman just points toward the ceiling, ambivalent. "According to him, most of the planet's done for. So we're going to try to outlast it in here, whether we like it or not. A lot of nutjobs claim the world's gonna end, it's not exactly a new thing. But most of those guys can't make something like -" another shake of her head "- well, all of this. So if we go along with him, there might be a chance we survive it."

That's...wow! Jade's known the game would play out for ages, and tried to get used to the idea of the world ending after Grandpa shared what would happen. It's been a sticking point in her own thought process, a snag in her ethics that she couldn't never quite bring herself to tackle head on because that would mean acknowledging that so many people were going to die while they went on to the Medium. Since watching the actual Reckoning unfold in part through the hub, she's been avoiding the thoughts as much as she could.
But if this dome of Eridan's is actually designed to hold off the worst of the meteor storm, that's...that's incredible! Jade supposes the only reason no one ever thought of it before was because so few people would have the foreknowledge of the Reckoning itself and the necessary time to plan how to circumvent it before the end.

Kanaya hums. Jade guesses she would be less than impressed by all this; meanwhile, Jade's just trying to calculate how strong that dome would need to be to withstand a bombardment capable of annihilating most life on the planet. The numbers she's getting are somewhere in the range of 'really dang strong.' "You do not sound all that convinced," Kanaya says, lifting part of her skirt as they climb (and float) over a pile of dark stone rubble that spans the entire road. Jade steadies the green blooded troll with a spark of power when he starts to backslick in the gravel.

Ruth rolls her wrist - the one that's all crystal and knives and light - in a slow circle, before gingerly using it to help her clamber over the last chunk of fallen rock, and begins to skid down the far side. "I was, at first, I think. But more than a few of us have been trying to piece things together, what happened here in those days the dome first appeared and...a lot of things aren't adding up, right." Her volume drops to a low whisper, so that the other members of the patrol can't hear. "His story keeps changing. Some things he said to me early on were - let's just say, he's trying very, very hard to act like he never said them at all. Sometimes, I can't tell if those conversations were even real...But people stopped dying. He took charge, and started fixing people." She cracks her neck to one side, pensive. "Faith and the some of the other kids came through that nightmare without a scratch on them, and they believe everything he says. The rest of us - well, we're not getting out of here any time soon, not when he has the angels hanging around all the time and the dome on lock down."

She's all but saying it flat out; Jade's stomach churns as she follows Ruth's cue and whispers back, "You're all trapped here. You do want out."

"I don't want to die in a meteor storm!" Ruth explodes; then she flinches and switches back to a low hiss. The other patrol members take a quick peep back at their trailing group of three, but don't say a word when they see Ruth is still up and walking. "He kept saying the meteors would fall soon and yakking on and on about bilunar perigees, and it took us ages to realize he was using the old Imperial calendar. Apparently, by April thirteenth, most of the world's going to be a wasteland. A lot of people plan to wait it out until then, to see if he's full of bullshit or not." She looks bleak. "And while we wait, those things keep watching everything."

"What things?" Kanaya asks.

A faint cree from overhead lets them know.

Jade sensed them before, but at first she couldn't place what it was she felt. There's been constant movement above their heads, but it doesn't feel like any helicopter or other airborne vehicle she's ever tracked, and she doubts anyone here would be flying one around, anyway. When Ruth nods up at the castle on their left, Jade finally connects the faint rustle of beating wings to the unsettling beastie that peers down at them - something with a face and a torso like a human or a troll, but with wings that furl against its back and a lower body that lashes and coils around the gargoyle beneath it for balance. Diamond-shaped eyes radiate sharp interest as it watches them trek through the city streets.

And there are more like it. Lots more, circling overhead, if all of the soaring objects in the sky are the same type of thing. The patrol group hurries past the castle, but there are three more of the beings sitting on top of an archway that passes over the road, so that they have no choice but to duck their heads and walk underneath. "Angels," Ruth says, hushed. One of the other humans crosses herself, jaw tight. "Or at least, that's what people call them. They don't attack anymore."
"Anymore?" Kanaya keeps her eye on where the angels were perched, even after the dark stone of the archway comes between them and the winged-lizardy things.

"Those first few days, it was bad; they'd swoop down and help drag people into acid pools. He took over, and they listen to him, but -" Ruth shrugs "- I just can't shake the feeling that any day now everything could go back to the way it was. It's a choice between possibly dying in a few weeks, and living with him in charge. With everyone we ever knew dead out there, if he's right about the Reckoning." She digs a thumb into the bleached white flesh around the joint of her prosthetic arm, deep enough that Jade thinks she'll leave a bruise. "No matter which we choose, we lose. I just want to live."

The deeper into the city they go, the more uneasy Jade feels.

This whole thing smells fishier with every new piece of information Ruth shares with them, scattered fragments that build a broader, more horrifying picture of what happened in Los Angeles when the Horrorterror first starting eating people. Combine that with all the creepy angels watching them, flocking and huddling in dark eaves and generally being really weird, and she and Kanaya only have to look at each other and nod to know that they're on the same page about being on their guard. Jade keeps one hand trailing into her sylladex, always with a rifle held firm in her grip. She's not gonna drop it like she did when confronted with Juggaloco; she's learned her lesson.

But they're gonna be dealing with someone else like him, with game powers that could be wholly different from what Jade and the other human players can do - she doubts any of them could have made this kind of dome, or gone around making prosthetics that can (apparently) fire lightning at will. None of the patrol is willing to demonstrate that particular function, not even for science, and Jade gets the impression from Ruth's tense shoulders that there might have been unfortunate accidents before.

Seriously, though! Lasers, air filtration, the strange alterations to the buildings, and the dome itself - what can't this Eridan guy do? He's got to be pretty strong to pull all of this stuff off and keep it going for as long as he has. Like, wow! Jade is kind of impressed by what they've seen so far. It gives her a new perspective on what kind of potential these game powers can have when applied in out-of-the-box ways, and it makes her itch to test her own.

What's more reassuring to feel, though, are the people. Deep in the shadows of the strange architecture, more and more humans and trolls peek out from arcades and cloisters, and that's awesome because it means they're not dead! Jade is all for the not-dead thing, here. Most of them appear to be in armor like Ruth's, with legs like spun glass, arms like lances, carnival masks that frame artificial eyes with lightning in them, fingers replaced with digits like Ruth's, all rotating, silvery blades. Hardly anyone has come through this without some kind of major injury, and Eridan has outfitted them all with weapons instead of regular prosthetics to replace what was lost. Ruth calls it a court, but to Jade it reads more like a militia...

Soon, they reach a central kind of location, where Jade's road map falls completely short because, from the looks of things, a loot of the buildings that used to stand here have been cleared out, leaving nothing behind but a wide, empty circle of ground, and two structures in the very middle: one last cathedral, with a domed roof, its glass windows stretching from the ground to the fourth floor. Jade can't distinguish any details in the stained glass; it's all in shades of black and really, really dark grey. Across a short stretch of black cobblestones, a walled in courtyard with high, thick walls rises up, the entrances set between a series of pillars veined with grey and white light. There's a lone tower in one corner of the squared off area - Jade can feel things moving on the roof of it, scuttling around and watching. They coo and cree to each other in low tones, but occasionally an angel will screech like diamonds on glass, and a flock will rise up in the distance with a rush of wings, circling away to soar over the refurbished city.

There's a lot more living people in the courtyard when Ruth takes them in, the most Jade has sensed so far, all of them fixating on Jade and Kanaya in a fraction of a second, maybe drawn by how different their clothes look compared to all the dark armor and white light here. The person in the very center, however, isn't Eridan - a little troll girl sits on what probably used to be a dais for a statue, her short legs swinging over the dark stone floor as she watches them with blue eyes. None of her limbs or eyes or anything have been replaced, that Jade can see. Ruth motions for Jade and Kanaya to stay where they are, then slips through the crowd to go to the girl's side, using her intact hand to shake the girl by the shoulder until she looks up and smiles. Her face is filled with quiet trust.

"What's going on, Faith?" Ruth asks, gruff.

"He's still above," the girl says, reverent, kicking a foot out as she cranes her neck back to smile at the sky. (Urgh. The dome, not the sky...) "He should be done soon."

Jade looks up, following the incline of the dark tower, and then further - and up - until finally she realizes how close they've come to standing beneath the apex point of the dome, just a few yards off from the center of the upside bowl. At her side, Kanaya squints, and Jade's not sure how much the troll can make out; she has her own goggles that can zoom in on the speck of darkness hovering up there. The sight of it makes Ruth's lips tighten, and Faith's eyes go soft with devotion. Even with her goggles at max, she can't make out more than a fuzzy purple and black blob, but Eridan is up there.

Doing...something? Who knows.

They find out a second later, though, when a swell of white light ripples out from the center of the dome, like a wave in a pond. The hairs on Jade's arms all stand on end at once, crackling with static electricity that for once hasn't been generated by her own powers. She finds herself stretching up on the balls of her feet, like a plant turning towards the sun, and when Kanaya tugs on her arm Jade looks quickly to see that the troll is on her toes too, alarmed and pale. Another ripple of power diffuses out across the inner curve, but this one is slower and denser, like heavy cream that sinks into the dome and making it radiate even more bright light.

When the impromptu light show ends, though, a cacophony rises up. It sounds kinda like someone breathing into a hundred poorly tuned flutes at once, and Rush shudders bodily, more than a few of the other adults cringing back against the walls of the courtyard. Jade claps her hands to her ears with a grimace at the jangling notes climb in pitch, while Kanaya bears through it with her jaw clenched. The seated troll girl just sighs and keeps smiling. By the time the awful noise stops, Ruth looks green; she doesn't hurl like Jade half expects her to, but the sounds of someone else throwing up emanate from the far corner, and Ruth swallows repeatedly before the color returns to her face.

"Does that happen often?" Kanaya asks, while Jade peels her goggles off her face to pop the seal that feels like it's gonna suck her eyes out. After a moment's consideration, she pinches her nose and breathes out until her ears pop with a twinge of soreness. She doesn't think the pressure changed as wildly as it could have if John were doing some windy thing, but the atmosphere definitely shifted. Seriously, what is that guy doing up there? She's still got her power stretched to keep tabs on the hole in the dome, and she can definitely still feel the outside from here, so it hasn't shut...for now.

"Often enough," Ruth says, clipped and short. When Jade blinks at her, thrown by the sudden shift, Ruth won't meet her eyes. "He should be down. Just -" She breaks off to glance up, and then veers away from them, brushing past a burgundyblood in her hurry. "Be careful," she calls before she vanishes into the crowd, the sound still tinny and distant as Jade's ears readjust.
Up above, amid the flurry of the angels resettling themselves in new perches, she can sense the violet figure descend.

Eridan is, when Jade stops to consider it, exactly like she would have pictured if she'd had more data to work with and if someone had asked her about it. The swooshy cape almost covers for how gangly his shoulders look in comparison; while it's all floaty and poofed up dramatically, at least. But when he touches down and gravity catches up with the fabric, he looks like he's been swallowed by it and the rest of his dark, glinting armor. Jade can't spy any prosthetics here, just violet armguards and that (honestly pretty swanky) cape. He's shorter than both of them, with spiky ear fins and spiky teeth and spiky horns and a spiky gun (that lights up!) and a really spiky demeanor to complete the ensemble, like a mer-hedgehog or a sea urchin or something. He frowns at them with just as much wariness as Jade's sure they're projecting right back.

"So. Kan," he says, his voice a lot less echoey and disembodied now that they're speaking in person. "Long time, no see." Fidgety and still sporting a scowl - possibly a permanent fixture, like Karkat's constant grumpy face - the violetblood uses the end of the glowy rifle to rub the side of his head, and then catches himself and jerks it away. That's so not how to properly handle firearm. "Uh. And Jade human, long time no hear. Yeah."

Oh, jeez. This is gonna be awkward, isn't it. Hearing Ruth's story got Jade all pumped up for some super sinister guy with a god complex and a ton of magical powers, but for all his scowling Eridan has managed to completely undercut his own advertising in the space of fifteen measly words. He's pouting and trying too hard. ...Overcompensating. That's the word for it.

"Eridan," Kanaya says, still saying the name carefully, like a foreign word. "You have altered the city. Vastly." Her tone stays perfectly neutral.

"Yeah, I hardly recognize it!" Jade adds, plastering on her best bright, admiring smile for when Eridan blinks at her. This close, she spies heavy violet-tinted bags under his eyes; Jade wonders how much sleep this guy's been getting, what with all his apparent work to reinforce the dome against the Reckoning, of all things. "I mean, did you completely make it from scratch? Or are we talking matter manipulation?"

The troll shifts around, restless, shrugging with one shoulder and avoiding direct eye contact. "Well, it was kind of a spur of the moment thing." He puffs up and waves her over as he starts walking. The court parts around him when he stomps through their midst, ducking their heads back into the shadows of the arcade unless they're under a certain age - children turn toward him like flowers toward the sun. "But my mastery over all this most righteous hope magic gets more awesome every day. Once Mal booked it, and I started remembering all this game lore, everything started coming together."

Huh - that's interesting. "You only remembered recently? How did you pull it off?" Jade asks.

"Circumstances," Eridan says, emphasizing each syllable. "Like. Mal circumstances. Look, I don't want to talk about that guy, or Gam - fuck both of those guys. We were gonna have a royal tour here, right?"

Avoiding the subject again, huh! Jade folds her arms over her chest and feels her lip start to pout a little, frowning as Eridan's gaze flashes back to Kanaya and lingers too long, like he expects to see more than polite incomprehension there. "A tour, then," Kanaya agrees, meeting Eridan's stare with an implacable, smooth face.
Jade lets Eridan sweat for a bit before she bumps Kanaya with an elbow, so that the jadeblood will break the merciless staring contest that appears to be freaking Eridan out. "A tour sounds cool, yeah," Jade agrees. "And you can tell us more about what went on here, and all these 'circumstances.'" Before Eridan can protest her word choice or notice the implied air quotes or make another excuse, Jade rushes on, "Did you really build this dome for the Reckoning? That sounds like such a good idea, actually! How do you estimate it'll hold up?"

It's the right note to take to make Eridan stop acting all twitchy (what is his deal); instead of sweating in anxiety under Kanaya's stare, Eridan starts preening. Jade has met Oriole, an actual bird person, but never before has she witnessed someone preen upon receiving flattery. "Mal put up the first one to keep people from bothering it," he blabs, ruffling Faith's hair absently as he paces past her, his eyes brimming with exultation as he waves lazily at the courtyard around them and the dome overhead. "I altered it a lot, naturally, and I put more power into it every day. I know my apocalypses and this is always at least a class 5. Once the King falls...we'll be ready."

"But - we all have to play the game! Are you gonna be able to keep this up once we're in the Medium?" Jade thinks these are some pretty big things to take into consideration for this whole Eridome plan. Their powers aren't without limit, you know...

Eridan snorts, one side of his frown twisting up into a smirk. "I don't have to do any damn thing."

Kanaya presses her fingers to the side of her temple, the only sign she gives that she's probably vexed as heck over the fact that Jade and Eridan won't stop talking game stuff. "As remarkable as this accomplishment is," she says, sweeping after Eridan when he starts stalking through the crowd. Jade gets pulled along, not willing to get left behind. "I wished to speak to you more about the Horrorterror that nested here. You called it Mal - did it ever mention the Ukraine?"

Eridan looks disgruntled; the court disperses and reforms around him, always leaving a clear space for him to walk. "Well, its full moniker of doom was Malā’ikah or something, and it was a dick." He makes a so-so motion with his hand. "If you wanna know more, go ask someone else, on account of I was busy being possessed and all. We didn't have heart to heart chats about foreign nations whilst it was riding me around and weepin' about clowns."

Kanaya keeps probing. "But there was a Horrorterror in the Ukraine, too. This Malā’ikah didn't say anything at all?"

"Nothing that didn't get bailed out along with the rest of it when Mal decided to ditch. Took most of my lungs with 'em, too," Eridan rolls his eyes. "It knocked loose the game and all that, so at least now if that angel asshole decides to show its ugly faces again, I know exactly where to tell that hive to stick it. No way in hell am I letting it in my head a third time."

"What? Third. We're still talking about Horrorterrors, right?" Jade demands, scratching the back of her head. Eridan doesn't seem fully aware of how much he's saying; his mouth runs so much that maybe he's lost track of whatever subject he kept (badly) avoiding. But now this is just getting sort of surreal? Because Jade was under the impression that Rose barely survived being fully possessed once - what on earth is Eridan talking about?

"Third," he confirms, flippant as anything. He scowls at the heavens, which...basically seems to be him in a nutshell. "They got me in the game, too. Before we fought the King, even. Once you've got horror tangled in your head, they don't seem to take 'no' for an answer later on." Shifting his weight, Eridan balances mostly on one foot before he shoves off and starts pushing through the crowd again at another angle, leaving them in the dust.

These 'circumstances' just keep getting weirder and weirder, and Jade thinks Eridan shared more than he meant to. Unfortunately, in this instance, sharing more only leaves Jade utterly bamboozled. She can't tell if that's because she's missing something key to understanding it all, or because Eridan caught himself and shut down before he could give away more than he intended.

Kanaya closes her eyes, breathes in through her nose, and then smiles at Jade thinly. "Rose did warn us it was unlikely to be the same creature. What a muddle..."

"Hey, at least we've got that much almost confirmed," Jade says, striving for positivity. "And it looks like it's gone now, at least, without us even having to kick tentacle butt." She keeps an eye on Eridan's cape as it swishes; one of the trolls clustered around the court has started talking to him, and he listens with that faint scowl taking on an impatient edge. Jade can't make out what they're discussing over the constant murmur of the crowd.

"Now we simply need to appeal to him about the dome itself." Kanaya grimaces, shaking her head. "Defense against this supposed game is all well and good, but precautionary measures aside, it is clear those present here wish to leave. Perhaps he's simply been too caught up in reinforcing it to listen. He strikes me as the type to hear only what he wants to hear."

All this cosmic horror stuff is making Jade as paranoid as Karkat, honestly. "He did say he got possessed twice," she points out. "Maybe it screwed with his head and left behind slime that's gunking up his brain, and that's why he's not thinking rationally about this stuff. That could happen, right?"

"Then we'd require Rose to burn it out; I wouldn't even know where to begin..." The jadeblood shakes out her wrist, unwinding her and Jade's arms, and goes to draw out her phone. But she doesn't get the chance to try to pester Rose (would their phones work, even with the opening in the dome? If Eridan has opened portals on a temporary basis before, none of the reports mentioned scattered bursts of texts being delivered...) before Eridan scoffs loud enough to be heard over the court and whips back toward the two of them, his scowl derisive and furrowing more when he lays eyes on Kanaya. "Come on, let's go," he says, twitching his cape out from under someone's foot before they can finish taking that step that would have crumpled the hem. Then he jumps up onto the crenellations of the courtyard wall, a huge floating leap right over their heads, and gestures at her and Kanaya impatiently.

"Uhm..." Jade starts, reaching out with her powers and trying to feel where Ruth has vanished to, but when she locates Ruth the woman's already fallen far back into the far corner of the courtyard, slipping between the crowd and out of sight, maybe even making for the exit.

They might as well go after Eridan, for now. Jade's still trying to get a bead on how he might react to a request that he just, y'know, let these poor people out of the dome. Ruth's testimony didn't make things sound too promising, and Jade wishes they could have spoken with her longer, or gotten her and Eridan to sit down and maybe have them hash things out.

But Eridan is a game player who remembers things about the troll session, which is more than even John can say. If those memories and Mal messed him up a little, it wouldn't be surprising. At all. Maybe it'll give them some leverage that Ruth and her group haven't had thus far; Eridan'll still go down on the record as a royal doucheblossom for pulling this power trip, but Jade figures anyone deserves a break when Horrorterrors are involved in anything. It could all be a misunderstanding she and Kanaya are just in time to help resolve! "Up?"

"Up," Kanaya agrees - and then jumps completely without Jade's help, her dark skirt flaring to reveal the green underside as she kicks off one broken pillar to another that leans against the courtyard wall, scaling the dark stone in a few quick steps. Bemused, Jade bounces up the slow way, floating gently up the way Eridan does rather than teleporting. When she reaches the same level, Kanaya has already made herself comfortable, balanced on an overhanging spit of rock with a few yards buffer between her position and Eridan's. Better safe than sorry, after all!

From up here, at least, Jade has a better view of this drastically altered Los Angeles to go along with what her space sense is feeding to her. At first she thought her maps weren't gonna be much use, but that's surprisingly not the case! The buildings themselves have changed, yet, when Jade traces the pattern of the streets and alleys and empty canals, she finds that they all follow the same roadmap - it's just overlaid with dark stone. What's more intriguing to see is that there's even more deformations and breaks in the obsidian portion of the city than Jade thought; scalloped hollows pockmark the streets and some of the dark glass of tall stained glass windows lies shattered on the ground below the cathedrals, while some of the covered walkways and arcades and towers have partially collapsed like the pillars of this courtyard, evidence of past strife.

"I guess you wouldn't recognize it, but - it's like LoWaA," Eridan says, his voice rough. He coughs to clear it when they both give him equally baffled looks. "Land of Wrath and Angels. Mal - Mal helped reshape everything, before it left. It liked fuckin with my head, I think." The violetblood points with his chin, the riflekind under his arm crackling with compressed power. "Then Gam stopped by and started provokin' me into shooting up the place. Enough to make you miss when that guy was just a dipshit stoner who ate sopor in pies."

"LoWaA? Shouldn't that..." Jade tries to figure out what's weird about that, but she can't quite put her finger on it. The acronym - and the name itself - just sounds off. Something's missing. If she saw it written down on a page, she'd know. "Never mind."

"'Gam'?" Kanaya says instead. Her claws are never far from her side, even now, one clacking a slow beat on the case of a tube of lipstick, as steady as a pulse.

Eridan snorts. "Gamzee? Makara? Stupid bard and his stupid drama bullshit...you don't wanna run into him these days. He's on some next level juggalo cult shit, and not takin' no for an answer."

And just like that, Jade has a name! "Gamzee Makara," she repeats, adding that to her mental dossier on the clown guy. Her fingers itch to pester Karkat, see if the full name triggers some of that déjà vu of his, but she can't be distracted right now. "What did he want from you?"

Lip curled, Eridan jumps to the tower next to them, landing on a balcony that runs around the upper levels. Jade doesn't know if he expects them to follow, but she knows she's keeping her distance: three of those angel-lizard things are perched on the conical roof of the tower, one of them out of sight so that Jade only knows it's there through her space sense. "I wasn't too keen to listen to crazy ramblin'," Eridan says, his voice carrying. "He had Tav - Tavros - with him, so eventually I persuaded them to buzz off and leave me to do my own thing. If Gam wants to conoitter with everyone for some weird Bard of Rage rave, I ain't interested. I got responsibilities and shit here."

Responsibilities that include keeping a bunch of people from access to professional medical care after what was clearly a pretty dang traumatic grimlight event, Jade thinks, cynical. "I can't blame you. Running into that Gamzee guy was pretty scary!" she says aloud, digging a toe into some gravel under her feet.

As long as Eridan's talking, she's got more time to reach out with her powers to confirm what Ruth's already hinted at - this Horrorterror, Mal, killed so many people. A downtown area like this should have been jam-packed at the time the dome came down, full of motion and bodies taking up space, but the vast majority of the cobblestone streets and carved channels feel still and empty. If the massacre left any bodies, they've either been cleared away or fell apart into ash. The court is one of the most densely occupied places around for miles - and that's a leaden punch in the gut, one that makes Jade close her eyes as she struggles to process it. Civilians have died on her before, but nothing on this scale.

Even if they persuade Eridan to take down the dome, or break it themselves, Jade thinks this is gonna be even more difficult for people to recover from than New York City. Rose's grimdark breakdown was destructive, yeah, but the last estimates Jade read through showed most of the damage was in property, not necessarily lives. Leviathan, Rose said, when she could bring herself to talk about it at all, was busy trying to carve a massive enough summoning spirograph to let it transport its whole hive through to the physical world, not in actively trying to kill people. Most of the casualties were bystanders, fleshy things that got in its way by accident. Whatever the Horrorterror here wanted, it was definitely more along the lines of the thing in the Ukraine - and if killing people was the goal, it achieved that much.

It's stomach turning.

"Look, can we stop talking about Gam and Mal and just appreciate my visionary status, here?" Eridan demands, waving a hand at the view before them and tapping his foot. "Look at this craftsmanship and tell me that's not a clear example of my genius. They should have put me in charge a long damn time ago."

Kanaya tilts her head to the side, lips pursed. "I thought that the Horrorterror caused this state of affairs?"

"Yeah. That's what I said, isn't it?" Eridan says. Uhhh...'kay. "I tweaked some of Mal's ideas, what's the big deal? We had a partin' of ways over the fact that it was afraid of Gamzee, that's all, so I kicked it to the curb. Of all the stupid things to wimp out over, after we already had this place ground under our heel...go figure, right?"

Wait, now he kicked the Horrorterror out? As opposed to it just absconding of its own accord? Jade runs her fingers through her hair and tugs on the ends as she looks out over the city one last time. She can feel a thought piecing itself together in her mind, a question that's so simple, but devastating to put into words, because of all the things Eridan hasn't said, this might be the most damning of all. "That's it?" Jade has to say it aloud before she can make sense of it. "That's - that's all?"

She catches herself a moment too late and winces. Kanaya has gone utterly still, her eyes flat and fixed on Eridan, whose silence stretches on and on, frowning at Jade like he has no clue what she means.

He can't mean that. Maybe Jade didn't include enough context, and she lost him. She tries again: "Just because it was afraid? Not because it killed people, or mutilated them? You say 'ground under our heel' like -" Like it was something he'd really been perfectly okay with, Horrorterror possessing him or no. But she can't say something like that, she can't! "You only fought off that Horrorterror because it was afraid?"

She's trying to give him an out, here. And sure, Eridan takes it, but only in the most bizarre, twisty way possible. He tosses his head and looks down his nose at her and Kanaya, trying for some snotty look like what Jade just inferred was stupid, but - when he responds, finally, he's still not saying no. "Mal was a winged dick and yeah, a mass-murdering asshole, I admitted that already. Like, I have completely learned my lesson about consortin' with the zoologically dubious, hallucination-inducing elder gods, is that what you want to hear?"

"No." Kanaya's voice is a hard, brittle thing. "We want to hear you say that you would give anything to have wrested control back earlier. That none of what happened here was in your control."
"Of course that's what I meant, Kan!" Eridan throws up his hands; his rifle flies up with them, and Jade tenses, but it looks like he's just being melodramatic, not actively trying to threaten them. "You know me better than that. Okay, maybe you don't -" a roll of his eyes in Jade's direction "- but we were friends. And yeah, me and Vris, we get tunnel vision sometimes about stuff, but you always got it. You were very understandin' about the fact that growing up is hard. It's hard and sometimes we make poor life choices whilst under the influence. It's not my fault neither of you two remember any of this important stuff pertaining to the quality of my character." His lip tugs to the side.

This is, apparently, the straw that breaks the camel's back.

Or at least, it breaks Kanaya, who stamps her foot so hard on the stone of the wall that Jade wobbles and Eridan cowers back against the tower wall, though he couldn't have felt it from up there. All the color drains out of his face in a sudden wash of fear. "Fine. I accept it," Kanaya spits, glaring irritably at both Eridan and Jade. Her face looks weirdly bright all of a sudden, as though she's started glowing like a firefly.

"Uh, come again, Kan?" Eridan says, squeaking a little.

Kanaya doesn't care; she's on a roll, throwing up her own claws in such frustration that she teeters on her skinny stretch of rock. "I believe it! Fine! You all have successfully provided sufficient proof that there was, in fact, a bizarre and mythologically convoluted game which played out in some disturbing proto version of our lives." Incensed, Kanaya presses her fists to her head, scrunching up the fabric of her hood. "Clearly there is little to no point in my belaboring the skeptic's point of view when random people in completely arbitrary cities appear to have catapulted aboard the conspiracy bandwagon, and every single one of you keeps demonstrating how it drove you all completely insane!"

...Jade wouldn't go that far...

"That's great, Kan," Eridan says, sounding like he means the exact opposite. He's spooked - almost too spooked, his shoulders up and his horns down in a defensive hunch, and his eyes dilated as heck. "But you, um. You still don't remember it though, right? Right?"

Kanaya lowers her hands, slowly. "No. I do not."

Then she crouches and jumps, one hand just barely hooking on the edge of the balcony Eridan's on at the uppermost point of her arc. With a growl, Kanaya heaves herself up without assistance - Eridan stumbles backward with a panicky, wide-eyed expression, but isn't fast enough to avoid Kanaya when she swings herself up and snags his collar, yanking him back into range. "So, I do not suppose you would be adverse to informing me what. You. Did."

Jade's not sure if she should be more worried about Kanaya or Eridan here. She's never seen Kanaya lose her temper like this! "I don't know what you two are talkin' about! Kan!" Eridan pleads, shaking his head as his voice cracks three different ways. "H-honest! Anything you might of heard, it's all a bunch of bs! Have you been talking to Vris? Cause you can't trust a word outta that acrimonious -"

"You are far too invested in assuring yourself that I don't recall this game, and with convincing me that nothing happened," Kanaya says, teeth bared, "and not nearly concerned enough with how unsuccessful you've been in convincing me of anything at all. Please. Enlighten me, Eridan. Why do you fear me?"

Ack! Okay, it's almost go time! Jade kicks off the wall and lands on the balcony on the other side of Eridan with a deft twist, resting her fists on her hips so that when Eridan cranks his head around, pale, she's got her serious expression on. "You really suck at acting. Just FYI," she tells him, keeping her eyes forward while the rest of her senses lock onto the angels. She doubts they'll just hang back watching with Kanaya thisclose to dumping Eridan over the side of the balcony.

Eridan's laugh sounds jittering and too high-pitched. "Why don't we just let bygones be bygones, Kan?! We were all dumb kids, and it was hard, and we fucked up a lot. You understand that, right?"

"That's still not an answer," Jade points out. "And for that matter, why are you keeping the people here captive?" Kanaya nods along with her, grasping Eridan's collar with an implacable grip that the violetblood tries to scrabble at and peel away with his own claws in increasing panic. "You claim you want to prepare this place for the end of the world, but why would you disregard what they want like that? A lot of them probably still need medical attention you don't have the know-how to pull off! This isn't defense, this is dictatorship."

Aaand, yup, those angels are on the move now, a rustle of wings and slithering bodies that reaches Jade's ears, along with brief burst of harsh, strident song calls that reverberate through the city. Jade feels more of them coasting through the air toward this tower, in wheeling flocks of four apiece. The closest group of three, the ones bating on the conical roof above, scramble across the dark stone with hisses that raise Jade's hackles. When she looks up to glare at them, diamond-shaped eyes stare back at her with hollow hostility.

Kanaya doesn't give an inch, levelling a critical stare at Eridan and raising her hand just enough that the violetblood totters on the tips of his toes, lifted up off his feet. "All we have seen and heard," she says, "has really not helped you make a good case for yourself in the slightest. But I want to hear your real reasoning. Because I refuse to believe that anyone in the world could possibly be this dense."

But Jade's words appear to have struck a nerve, because Eridan doesn't look scared anymore. He's pissed, his scowl turned ugly. "So. You guys are here to mess with my rightful reign, huh. Just like Gamzee. Well, that's just fuckin' grand."

"Why would you even be ruling in the first place?!!" Jade kind of wants to shake him, herself, but that's not gonna defuse the situation... "Can we rewind a little? Is it really so much to ask that you let some people out?" Sure, not everyone would want to come back, but there has to be a way to balance between this really good idea of defending against the Reckoning and the equivalent but terrible idea of Eridan being some kind of tyrant with his own mini-armed forces.

Why is that last part even a thing? Jade's having trouble comprehending why Eridan's mind would have gotten fixated on it at all, but she's never really had the urge to rule anything herself...So weird!

"They're my subjects!" Eridan snarls. He's not cringing as much, but that's because he's started going into infuriated troll mode, ear fins flared and the yellows of his ears turning orange. Kanaya, meanwhile, is definitely glowing like a lightbulb, and shows no signs of dimming any time soon, both of her claws white-knuckled. "Don't any of you sorry dicks recognize a troll's blood right to rule?"

"Nope," Jade says, flatly.

"Not in the slightest." Kanaya narrows her eyes. "You are being a danger to everyone left in this city, and I am not overly impressed with this initial assessment of your motivations and the threat you pose to yourself. Help me understand further, because all I see is that people are dead and you won't stop giving excuses that have no merit with me." Jade nods, hard enough that her neck gives a little creak; he's got to realize he's facing a unified front, here, and maybe if they don't escalate the violence further (Kanaya's aggressive posture isn't helping things, but Jade isn't sure there's much she can do to tamp down Kanaya's ire when she's in hero mode) Eridan will notice he's outnumbered and stop talking in circles around himself.

Instead of responding, Eridan takes on all the cooperative traits of a mule. He spits - and Jade catches how he thumbs at his strife specibus, and the way the hushed chatter of the angel-lizards overhead picks up in tempo. "I don't have to fucking justify myself to you, Kan. Mal's gone. I'm in charge. Let it drop." He glowers at Kanaya with something bordering on barely concealed dislike, poisonous and disdainful - like he can't believe he has to put up with this kind of talk.

No good. The longer this conversation lasts, the more defensive it feels like he's getting, and that's not a good thing. At all. "Kanaya -" Jade starts to whisper.

Eridan breaks in again before she can finish, though, making some dramatic flourish with his cape as he raises a claw and jabs toward the road they walked down, toward the hole in the dome. "Whatever. We're done here. I wanted to show you my grand design, but I don't need this bullshit from you guys all over again. Get. Out."

"Excuse me -" Kanaya begins, but Eridan isn't done: "Get out. I fucking mean it. Only warning." An odd glow starts burning through the cracks in his armor, a pulse of the same bubbly white light bright enough to paint afterimages across the insides of Jade's eyes when she inspects the weaponized prosthetics here. It's brighter than Kanaya's interesting, steady glow, brighter even than the constant backlight of the dome overhead, and if that's the hope magic Rose was talking about, Jade's not sure they want to tackle it head on, without a firm idea of what Eridan can actually do with it.

But Jade keeps her silence, not whistling for Bec. The wolf has to stay their last resort, and if worst comes to worst, she has no intention of leaving the people of the court behind when they make the jump. If Eridan wants to rule Los Angeles, he can rule an empty city, and good riddance.

"Not without them," Kanaya says, clearly following the same train of thought. "Keep your dome, if it makes you happy, and we'll leave if that's what you want - but you can't hold them here. We cannot leave those people here without medical treatment, not in good conscience. They've been telling us -"

"They don't know what's good for them!" Eridan screams back. Spit's flying now. Jade is amazed he hasn't gone to raise his specibus yet, with how close he seems to punching Kanaya in the face with his bare fists. Jade has one hand out ready to close into a fist and yank the rifle out of his hands and tuck it into her sylladex, and the other cast out to the side and up, toward the three angels milling around like jungle snakes winding up to strike. "You said Malachite Sylph, right? Your old village ashen two-wheeled device complex finally turned your thinkpan into irritated slag. Well, fuck off. No one ever wants you meddlin' in their fucking business! Not me, not Vriska, nobody!"

"We're not necessarily asking you to take down the whole dome thing - just let the people who want to leave go out the way we came in!" Jade repeats. "The concept was solid! Please, let's just try to help each other out? You know what happened in the trolls' game - but you might not know what happened in mine. I'd love to get around the Reckoning, too, it's a really good idea! If we work together and share what we know, maybe we can even make it work and avoid, you know, the teeeeney tiny problems with the execution -" her voice drops a little, awkward "- like, uh, the minor attempted dictatorship thing."

"WE KNEW LITERALLY EVERYTHING ABOUT YOUR SESSION!" Eridan yells, rolling his eyes. He won't stop baring his teeth, either, so it comes out barely comprehensible. He breathes hard through his nose, but all that achieves is that his voice quiets enough that it doesn't make Jade's ears ring. "We had the time to watch all of your stupid eyesore mistakes at leisure, so pardon me if I don't think you human morons get a say in anythin' at all!"
He finally smacks Kanaya's claws away and drops to the balcony, recoiling with utter disgust in his eyes. "I should have known - between you pain in the ass aliens and our own crop of god-awful rubbish players, not a one of you are ever gonna give me my due. Not even Fef took me seriously, not ever." His ugly scowl has twisted into something cruel and filled with feverish pride, that almost makes him look like a different person. When Kanaya moves like she means to grab him again, he shoves her away, voice ringing with awful zeal. "I fucking killed you, Kan, and still you come into my house and piss on my fucking parade!"

And then he raises the rifle and pulls the trigger.

Jade snaps it out of his hands before it fires and shoves it skyward, so that the pale, pale golden white lightning that shoots out fires up at the dome above instead. It doesn't manage to blow a hole in the shield - darn - but when Eridan whips around to stare at her, livid, Jade has the unique pleasure of closing her fist with a bright smile and crushing the rifle into an itty-bitty clump of metal, white fire sputtering out and dying away. "That was a bad idea," she says. "Want to try again?"

"Witches," is all Eridan says. So, he does know a little about the human game session. Or else his choice in insults just so happens to include her title by complete coincidence. "You really think I need that useless thing to blow you to kingdom come? I'm the Prince of Hope. Destruction is what I do." He's lit up with harsh fire now, his face cast in odd shadows by the weird light.

Worst case scenario - this person may have rigged it so that they end up exactly as strong as they believe themselves to be, as they've always hoped to become. A dangerous, stacking progression.

...Bluh. Well, diplomacy didn't work out. So much for that!

The nearest angel screeches, the echoes lodging right in Jade's eardrums like broken bells. It's crawled its way around to the overhanging of the roof above, tail lashing viciously - and then its wings rip open with a crack like canvas snapping in a gust of wind. When it lunges for her, the wings flare out so that its shadow swallows the sky above her. It moves fast, too, with a quick dark and jaws that crack as they unhinge.

Jade could close her hand, or teleport out of the way. But the last thing she wants is to leave Kanaya alone up here. And besides, this way is a little more challenging than just dodging would be. She ducks instead, and the angel's strike carries it over her head with a squawk of disappointed song. Quick as a flash she rockets back up to seize it around its snaky neck, throwing in all her strength and little bit of extra push for extra leverage. For a moment she's distracted by the fleeting but disturbing sensation of the thing's skin on hers - skin, not scales or armor plating or crystals or anything like that, and there's something wrong about it, something that makes her rush her next move in her haste to get this thing away from her. She has an armful of flailing, sinuously writhing winged-lizard monster doing its best to squirm free and chattering with outrage, as Jade flips them backwards off the edge of the balcony, spring upside down and slamming the angel's head into the wall of the tower in a totally choice piledriver.

When Jade releases her grip (still cringing for a reason she can't quite put her finger on...) the angel can't seem to figure out which way is up or down, flopping its wings out of sync with one another. It spirals down in a limping, upside down loop before just plummeting. The people of the court scatter, some screaming in raw terror; the girl Faith sits motionless right in the middle of the angel's wobbling corkscrew trajectory before someone - a woman with an arm of blades - tackles her off the stone and hauls her over a shoulder, sprinting for the exit of the courtyard at a dead run.

When the angel finishes crashing to the ground and lays still, twitching, Jade nods in approval and kicks back upright, rising until she's even with Kanaya and Eridan once more. What feels like every flying body - all angels, presumably - in Los Angeles appears to be rushing to converge on their location, the dome resonating like the inside of a massive bell as the creatures shriek challenges.

Probably too many for her to piledrive them all. Oh, darn. And Kanaya's otherwise focused on doing her thing, attempting to punch Eridan in the face properly, so the least Jade can do is keep these hordes of inbound pseudo-angels off Kanaya's butt for the duration of that noble effort.

Well, trouble does tend to present itself to them - it's always a nice surprise! Why get mad about it when you can get excited? With a laugh, Jade reaches up and yanks her lab coat off over her head to captchalogue before it can get rucked up around her wrists; it's one of her last ones left intact, but also one that she might have uh...borrowed from someone at Doctor Lalonde's lab, so no need to get it shredded.

Kanaya had many a rueful apology to murmur before they left, explaining that, in her rush to outfit Karkat (who needed a ton of armor to help guard against him getting the ever-loving crap beat out of him a second time), the jadeblood had to curtail some of her other costume work. John's didn't end up finished before they left, and Kanaya stuck to repairing the tears inflicted on her own costume by Dirk rather than making anything new or fancy to replace it. Then she tried to apologize for the 'simplicity' of what she came up with for Jade, but Jade wouldn't let her. It's simple, but it's amaaaazing! Jade loves it! There's a distinct lack of galaxy pattern, but she's got plenty of that in her sylladex already if she wants to switch back. Grandpa miiight have disapproved, if he were here to see it...but he's old! And also now a cyborg who doesn't get a say in modern fashion. Kanaya has assured Jade that she looks badass, and Jade thinks Kanaya probably knows more about appropriately badass attire for a young lady hero than a venerable old guy raised in the 1910s and twenties, honestly.

Plus, the golden rule states that if Jade feels good wearing it, that's what counts! The hugging dark fabric and Kevlar underneath bares her midriff, a white version of her space symbol sitting off center and at an angle so that it curls around her side and over her shoulder, but the shorts and the delightfully bright shade of green boots balance it all out. Kanaya swore that the color of the boots alone 'may possibly induce retinal bleeding as a secondary defense mechanism,' a claim that Jade thinks was probably jokey but also made her crack up with laughter. It's all very modest. Really. Truly. Between that and the wrist guards, and the fact that her shoulders are mostly covered, Jade is totally in the clear.

The cape's not done yet, sure, but the hood attached to the shirt has two points, like that god tier outfit, though it's much shorter than what she had back then. That little detail somehow makes the whole thing perfect.

Jade cracks her knuckles.

This is not for show.

--

AT: uHM, aRE YOU THERE,
AT: i THINK THAT THIS IS THE CHUMHANDLE YOU GAVE ME,
AT: bUT ALSO, mAYBE I FORGOT IT, sINCE IT'S BEEN A WHILE SINCE I HAD ACCESS TO PESTERCHUM,
AT: oR ANY TECHNOLOGY AT ALL, rEALLY,
AC: :33 < ac scratches her head and wrinkles her nose in purrplexment
AC: :33 < she ponders who this mouseterious pesterer could be!
AT: oH, tHIS IS TAVROS, uHH, i FRIENDED YOU ON FACEBOOK A WHILE AGO,
AT: I GUESS I MEAN, FURIENDED,
AC: oh its you! X33
AC: what have you been up to?
AT: I HATE TO SAY THIS, BUT, EVERYTHING HAS BASICALLY BEEN REALLY STRANGE, AND TERRIFYING, AC: ac rests her chin on her paws and frowns
AC: well terrifying doesn't sound like its fun at all
AT: yEAH, IT KIND OF SUCKS,
AT: MY FRIEND HAS BEEN ACTING STRANGE FOR A WHILE NOW, AND I HAVE BEEN TRYING TO HELP HIM WITH IT,
AT: ONLY NOW I'VE KIND OF LOST CONFIDENCE, IN MY ABILITY TO PULL THAT OFF, AC: ac bats at your knuckles for encouragement
AT: SHOULD I BE DOING THE ASTERISK ROLE PLAYING THING, TOO.
AC: (sure! :33)
AT: ALRIGHT THEN, *i pretend that i am encouraged, by the encouragement,
AT: and that i am not typing this on a borrowed phone, in the middle of the mountains, in this dumb foreign country,*
AC: what's up with your friend?
AC: dont worry it cant pawsibly be as bad as what my dumb moirail is doing right meow
AT: OKAY, HE'S SORT OF NICE MOST OF THE TIME, BUT ALSO REALLY SCARY, AT: AND NOW WE'RE TRAVELLING WITH A CRAB LUSUS THAT CAN FIRE LASERS, AT: WHICH IS UNUSUAL, EVEN FOR US,
AC: oh WOW!
AC: but yeah its been pretty frustrating
AC: because hes also been ignoring stuff like eating and showering AC: id rather do maths than have to put up with the sweat for another second! :((
AT: oh, MY FRIEND DOES THAT TOO, THE SOLUTION IS USUALLY JUST TO RUN INTO HIM WITH THE WHEELCHAIR, UNTIL HE FALLS INTO A RIVER.
AC: *s33 that might work but there aren't any rivers or bayous or anything in this stupid house
AC: and when i try to lure him into the shower he just picks me up and walks away!
AT: DO YOU HAVE A WHEELCHAIR THAT, POSSIBLY, COULD BE USED TO GENTLY NUDGE HIM IN THAT GENERAL DIRECTION, AC: no
AT: i'M OUT OF IDEAS,
AC: ac kneads at her blanket in frustration
AC: if he thinks im gonna just sit around and let him sulk around for the rest of his life he better think again
AT: DO YOU HAVE ANY TIPS FOR DEALING WITH, WELL, STUBBORN PEOPLE, AT: i'M NOT SURE IT WOULD ACTUALLY BE USEFUL IN MY CASE, BUT I'M WILLING TO TRY ANYTHING, aT THIS POINT,
AC: :33 < does he have any curtains you could tear up?
AT: nO,
AC: :33 < hmmm
AC: :33 < can you shoosh him?
AT: tHAT WOULD BE, aN ABSOLUTO NO,
AC: :33 < does he wear any dark clothes?
AT: iT'S MOSTLY ALL SHADES OF DARK GREY,
AC: :33 < close enough
AC: :33 < now find a cat friend or thr33
AT: uH-HUH,
AC: :33 < and have them shed all over it!
AT: i'M NOT SURE HE WOULD NOTICE, aND ALSO, i'M ALLERGIC TO CATS, AC: :33 < im out of ideas too then :(,
AC: :33 < what about the tasty crab?
AT: wHAT ABOUT IT,
AC: :33 < could it help you get back to civilization hypurrthetically?
AT: aCTUALLY, wE'RE MOSTLY IN THE MOUNTAINS BECAUSE THE CRAB IS THE ONE LEADING US,
AC: :33 < what
AT: bECAUSE APPARENTLY GAMZEE CAN'T SEE WHERE HE'S GOING ANYMORE, so THE SOLUTION WAS TO FIND THE LUSUS OF THE PERSON HE'S TRYING TO FIND AND, uH, tRACK HIM DOWN THAT WAY,
AT: bUT WE'RE STILL GOING IN CIRCLES, i THINK,
AC: :33 < thats weird but okay
AC: :33 < we both just n33d to be more furceful! these stupid asshats cant ignore us forever!
AT: oKAY, THAT'S MOSTLY WHAT I WAS THINKING, TOO,
AT: bUT I'M NOT GOOD AT BEING FURCEFUL,
AC: :33 < dont give up!
AC: :33 < if all else fails kick his butt!
AT: tHAT SEEMS LIKE BAD ADVICE, iN THIS INSTANCE, bUT I'LL, uH, KEEP IT IN MIND,
AC: :33 < raaaagh i have to go my idiot is calling me
AC: :33 < good luck with your strange friend and finding whatefur youre looking for AC: :33 < ac waves goodbye while twitching her tail
AT: tHANK YOU, vERY MUCH, i GUESS,
AT: i'LL TRY TO MESSAGE YOU BACK SOONER NEXT TIME, AT: aND, IN THESE FANTASY ASTERISKS, i WAVE GOODBYE TOO,
-- adiosToreador [AT] stopped pestering arsenicCatnip [AC] at 16:07:20 --
Chapter End Notes

/slams hands down on the table/ YES I KNOW THIS IS THE KIND OF QUALITY MUSIC YOU GUYS COME TO ME FOR NO NEED TO THANK ME

Somewhere, Doug Dimmadome, owner of the Dimmsdale Dimmadome, is weeping tears of dimma-envy.

Tiksi photo source (before I annihilated the contrast)
Chapter Summary

And one dim dawn between the winter and spring,
In the sharp harsh wind harrying heaven and earth
To put back April that had borne his birth,
From sunward on her sunniest shower-struck wing,
With tears and laughter for the dew-dropt thing,
[...]
One met him lovelier than all men may be,
God-featured, with god's eyes.

Chapter Notes

EDIT: Wow, that was an inexcusably long break. Sorry guys, Jade's section fought me all the way into writing it over again from the beginning. Search for 'Magic is hard to quantify' for the start of the section.

Our power anthems for the day are lined up in The Smackdown Condescension playlist over at 8tracks.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

When Karkat was very small, still figuring out how the fuck bipedalism worked after so long using grub claws and metachronal rhythm to wiggle around like the world's saddest sack of grub sauce, schoolfeeding modules started arriving in the mail. There's a critical period between a lusus choosing a grub and said troll eventually being able to pry himself away from said overbearing custodial annoyance to attend real school - or really even get out the front door without being dragged back inside the hive kicking and screaming. Making it out to the lawn ring to play in one's first years of life is considered a crowning achievement. Or is just evidence that one has a really fucking laid-back lusus. So all the critical language grubmodules - English and Alternian, usually - get shoved in through the mail slot so that young trolls don't grow up only speaking lusus nonsense tongues.

After the first few rounds, though, Karkat remembers the bootleg arriving. The grub didn't fit in the slot for their shitty old deskhusk; he just had to jam it in and hope for the best.

Sometimes he wonders who delivered it. Because they saved his life. If it was the same troll who marked him down on his hatching certificate as a burgundyblood, he owes them twice over. If he hadn't learned early on just what happens to off-spectrum trolls that get caught, the first time he scraped his knee on pavement in front of an adult troll could have been his last.

-

There are a million and one reasons why running out in front of the Condesce is a stupid idea. No, really, give him enough time and Karkat could come up with a million, at minimum. Most would look remarkably similar, something along the vein of, 'SHE IS GOING TO STAB YOU,' repeated over and over again ad infinitum. And every single one of those counts as a separate, distinct reason, thank you ever so fucking much.

What neither of them counted on was the difficulty of actually getting anyone's attention when the two fuchsiabloods in the room are already locked in mortal fucking combat. After she recovers from her recoil at the Condesce's sudden aggression, Feferi starts giving as good as she gets, both trolls using 2x3dentkind with stomach-dropping, ruthless precision. Her Condescension is smaller and quicker to duck under wild swings to jab for tender innards, knocking away Feferi's strikes with a casual effortlessness that says she's had centuries to learn the tricks of fighting with a culling fork. But Feferi fights like a woman possessed - wow, Karkat wonders why that is - spinning in circles with her disheveled hair flying every which way as she keens, the whistling moan of some thing out of the darkest waters that no light can reach. Her jacket's in tatters from the Condesce's slashes but the blood barely gets a chance to spill over before the wounds seal back up. It's not quite like Gl'bgolyb's nauseating, blancmange-like flesh sticking itself back together, but it's not far off, either.

They're so focused on trying to disembowel each other, neither troll can afford to spare a glance for him and Dave as they approach. Fuck, the fucking enormous blueblood is standing right there, looking almost bored at the fact that she's been sidelined, too. They could tap one of the combatants on the shoulder or something idiotic like that, but again - idiotic. A really fucking loud, obnoxious voice in Karkat's head says that now would be a prime opportunity to do the smart thing for once in his life and take advantage of the fact that just this once, his possession of a miserable mutant hemotype might not be a death sentence. All he has to do is take Dave and run before anyone notices them, and they can all go back to prancing around Seattle and enjoying the constant explosions that tend to crop up on a semi-regular basis.

But Feferi just had to be possessed, didn't she. Which means if she gets herself killed, it's not like it's actually her getting herself killed - it's the Horrorterror puppeting her around like a ragdoll, having her throw herself on the Condesce's fork like a trout jamming itself on a gutting knife. Willful, suicidal stupidity is one thing, but if Feferi dies here, not in her right mind, that'll be on Karkat for not stepping in to drag her globes out of the line of fire.

Oh, well. At least they'll all be bulgefisting morons together in this lovely circlejerk of stupidity. His blood burns as he draws it out in a stream to form sickles, the dull red blades steaming with residual heat from the annoying song that won't stop playing in his head, driving out the cold. His pulse feels like it's relocated to the bottom of his stomach, cramping and too-hard as he creeps around, trying to assess what angle would be better to come from. He keeps one eye on the blueblood at all times, because wouldn't it be just fan-fucking-tastic to get so caught up worrying about the two trolls-of-mass-destruction in the middle, and forget about the presumably ancient but still dangerous tank in troll form lurking in the shadows. Bluebloods like that are almost all at least past the third century mark; this one could pop his head like a grape if it caught him from behind.

Dave makes the first move - though Karkat blinks at the exact wrong moment almost doesn't catch it. One second he's circling around clockwise compared to Karkat's counter circuit, and the next he flashes out of sight, reappearing in a red blur to jab his broken swordkind between the Condesce's shoulder blades.

She doesn't even glance back; she hooks that end of the trident under her arm and catches the blade with a twist of the tines, bringing Dave to an abrupt stop. Her foot sweeps around - Feferi lunges - and Dave's hand gets flicked up and away with a snap of her wrist, his red eyes wide and blinking as the Condesce shoves him back with a single hand and continues her spin, culling fork once again snapping behind her to hook around Feferi's throat.

Feferi gags as the Condesce neatly flips her grip to face the younger troll once more. Dave, on the other hand, goes flying in the most literal way; he gets tossed toward land rather than the docks, and lands in a practiced roll to finish skidding back on his knees instead of his face. The legs of his pants drag along the salt-gritty stone before he pushes back upright.

In what feels like another life, Karkat remembers backing up Heir at a dockyard. But nothing is the same now, there aren’t convenient stacks of shipping containers for him to conceal himself in, what remains of the sunlight on snow and metal lights everything up with an unforgiving sheen, and god, he doesn’t even remember how to pretend to be someone else. Doesn’t know how to fight when it’s Dave and not Heir, who he spent so long obsessing over for a while there that as Hemogoblin he thought he knew exactly how to fit into the other hero’s fighting routines.

It's just Karkat and Dave and the oldest troll living and her heiress and their pancurdling eldritch custodian out in the icy bay, munching on whatever the Horrorterror equivalent of popcorn may be as it settles back to enjoy the show.

Fuck it. There's nowhere for him to sneak up from, no cover that would lend itself to him following his usual stealth tactics. It's like fighting Jane all over again, but with fewer police cars and more chance of sudden death.

Karkat looks down at the sickles in his hands, casts one last look to fix where the blueblood stands, still as a statue, and leaps into the fray.

--

See, culling isn't something that gets brought up in polite company. Most of the history grubfeeds for wrigglers get scrubbed, anyway, a pretty and simple version of history that skims over the bad and glorifies the good so dumb babies don’t have to worry their pans about complications. For fuck’s sake, some of the Condesce’s bloodiest exploits throughout history got reduced to a footnote in one of his textbooks in middle school. No one talks about it, few humans ever bother to learn more about it, but no matter how illegal and frowned upon it is in public, the extra feeding lessons that snuck into Karkat's mail over the years gave him all the gritty context.

Trolls can’t openly enforce old culling traditions. It’s not good politics to mention it in front of humans, and the older coldbloods lost in dementia with no control on their raging flappers tend to be treated like embarrassing relatives at human family reunions when they bring up the ‘good old days.’ But mutants who get caught tend to disappear. Depending on how high in the spectrum they might be posing as, there might be more of a public outcry, but trolls in the rust make up one of the largest demographics in missing persons reports worldwide, with some of the lowest 'found' rates.

And nothing like that could happen under the watchful eye of Her Imperious Condescension without her permission.

He's never been safe.

--

He doesn't even get the courtesy of a culling fork - when he gets within three feet of her, the Condesce just kicks him flat in the chest with the relative force of a wrecking ball. Then Feferi is shrieking like an unholy terror, some babbling mixture of Alternian and maybe Italian with a dash of horrific elder god tossed in to make a keening, clicking word salad. She manages to wrest herself free from that end of the trident, knocking it aside with a fist that makes the metal clang, and forgets to bring up her own fork to retaliate - she lowers her head and goes for the Condesce's throat horns first.

Karkat isn't as lucky as Dave; he gets slammed into the side of a forklift - thankfully not the one Feferi was standing nearby earlier, which is a little bit on fucking fire - and the only reason he can come up with for why his bones don't start snapping like twigs is because Kanaya is a legitimate saint. She kept adding layers of Kevlar and crash padding and what Karkat would swear up and down are knee pads like he used to wear as a kid to go rollerblading. She slimmed it all down and kept it light, bulkier than he's used to it - but, apparently, it cushions so well that being thrown by the Condesce herself feels like falling out of bed, unpleasant but not painful.

It meant giving up the skintight full body suit from before, because that thing had no room to spare for extra armor like this. She let him keep something close to his fucking color scheme, all over in black edged with red between rust and maroon, nothing bright enough to give him away if he had the dark of night to work with, here. And over top of the padded clothes she strapped on still more guards for his arms and legs and sides. It feels like armor, utilitarian and sleek but less flexible than he's used to, with the diamonds of open skin along his wrists the only part of him that's exposed.

(He does miss the spikes. Capes and skirts, sure, Kanaya's all about that, but spikes? Spikes are where she draws some inscrutable fashion police line.)

He peels himself away from the side of the forklift, his legs shocky for three limping seconds before the heat running through his blood reaches out and unwinds the tension deep in the muscle. Honestly, he expected to get thrown; he didn't even have the air knocked out of him. As far as the strife goes, though, he and Dave are both zero for one in a fight where they can't afford to be their usual spectacular fuck-up selves. All aboard the competency train.

"Okay, so that was a bust. Did we learn a life lesson from it, at least?" Dave asks from somewhere next to Karkat's ear, and Karkat does a double take and realizes Dave is literally right there. "Like, we need to coordinate or some shit. She's only got two pointy ends there."

Like hell is Karkat falling for the most basic trap in all of troll-limited strifing. "Three. If you forget the massive fucking horns and get yourself impaled the old fashioned way, I'm not dragging your sorry ass to whatever run-down Siberian gulag emergency room they have in this town."

Dave purses his lips as Feferi stabs her 2x3dentkind into the turf and uses it to vault both her feet at the Condesce's face. Their respective heights make it a lot less of a leap than it might have been for anyone else. The Condesce steps to the side, and only the incandescent fury on her face keeps her from looking bored out of her mind when she snags Feferi by the ankle, rips her hands off the trident pole, and pivots to slam Feferi into the ground.

And then heaves the younger troll up with no apparent effort over her head to repeat the process on the other side, leaving body-shaped marks in the slush each time. Dave and Karkat both wince. "Oh my god, she's getting her Horrorterror ass whipped. Do you know how fucking hardcore Rose was? Like, she had ectoplasm tentacles and explodey magic death balls."

"This is so not the time." Karkat checks again, and for a wild-eyed moment can't find the bluebl-over there. She's moseying the fuck over to the brilliant Crocker red shuttle parked by the office, dark cloak and hair concealing her face as she waits for the ramp to descend, her horns twin arrows pointing towards the sky and her fucks to give completely non-existent. "Look, you - you go high, I go low."

"Wait, are we doing the ironic opposite? Or are we feeling all sincere and shit right now?"

"NO." Karkat runs forward, because running toward the Condesce is a more promising option than trying to work his way to the end of one of Dave's convoluted abominations of logic.

The Condesce is swinging Feferi back up into the air when Karkat reaches them and drops to the ground, sickles grating against the grainy concrete as he brings a low kick around at the backs of her knees. To his (sarcastic) relief, Dave doesn't try to go low and whack Karkat in the face with a sword; he flashes into place, bringing the sword from the opposite side right at her face.

Before either of them makes contact, the Condesce's free hand shoots out and grabs Dave by the collar, yanking him and Feferi in and slamming their heads together. She jumps over Karkat's kick with a skip and raises a foot; Karkat snaps his leg back into a tuck before she can drive the heel of her shoe down and break his leg, but it's a close call. Dave blurs and vanishes, a thin line of red-purple blood opening up against the dark of the Condesce's forearm and her claws jolted open.

Feferi doesn't try to pull free - she braces both claws on the Condesce's arm and uses it to lever herself up and swing at the shorter troll's face. The Condesce rolls her eyes, clenches her fingers, and arcs Feferi up in a single smooth motion - to slam her down on top of Karkat. Feferi's horror-wraith skinny but Karkat still takes a bony elbow to the stomach, and Feferi is still dense, and not rational enough to notice her pointy knees and fists driving into Karkat as she uses him to scramble her way back onto her feet. Karkat can't see any blood on the side of her face, though Dave's got a trickle of blood painting a line down his temple and jaw when he turns.

Dave tries to sneak in past Feferi's horns, while the Condesce is still grappling to drag the younger tyrianblood away from her gut, but Feferi herself thwarts him when the Condesce loses patience and smacks her upside the chin with enough force Karkat can feel his teeth ache in sympathy. Dave's stab goes wild as he checks it in time to avoid nicking Feferi between the horns.

Karkat tries for the sicklekind this time, the curved blades driving for separate targets. A single arm batters them away with an imperious slap, but both sides of his blades are edged, the blood as sharp as he could pull off on the fly, and he's treated to the Condesce herself snarling at him in half-distracted annoyance when two new cuts score the back of her arm to match the one Dave gave her. Another slice and she dips under, hair snagging along the blade before ripping free; another and Dave is there, so that when the Condesce seizes Karkat by the wrist, snaps the sickle with a thumb, and tries to use him to bodily batter Feferi off her front, she's finally, finally too distracted to notice Dave stabbing her in the most absolutely random place, the jagged blade digging into the top of her right foot and driving down in a bright burst of fuchsia.

This new hole in her foot doesn't appear to bother the Condesce in the slightest. She squints, and then raises her stabbed foot to grind Dave's head into the ground. Before she can crush his skull (she has done that before, god, they're in so much danger here, the Condesce has been around so long that she invented things like curbstomps, holy fuck) Dave disappears, pinned for no more than half a second.

But it buys Feferi all the distraction she needs to claw her way free, diving for her strife specibus where it clattered to the pavement and letting it drag with a screech of pained metal as she whirls in a tight spin to face them again.

"Cod dammit," the Condesce mutters, shoving Karkat out of the way. Once again, it feels like being hit by a tiny car going a hundred miles an hour, and Karkat tumbles hard before he mentally slaps himself and forces his body to remember how to fall properly. The momentum still plows him back and - he's not braking hard enough, the ground's slick under his feet because it's all salt-strewn pavement and melting ice that his insane body temperature is only making worse, and when he stumbles upright in a panic, his feet just keep backpedalling because the inertia threatens to topple him on his ass, but the water line is right there -

He doesn't want to test his fever against the fucking Horrorterror infested ice water. He definitely doesn't want to turn into a living troll popsicle, even if he possibly can melt his way free at this point.
A hand grabs his wrist and he clasps it blindly, so that Dave can haul him forward before his foot drops off the artificial edge of the yard and into the water. "Just how goddamn durable is this lady?"
Dave demands, one side of his face raw and red where it made hatefriends with the pavement.
"Because getting stabbed in the foot is, I don't know, something that generally gets more of a reaction than that. Shit hurts, yo."

Karkat lets his eyes scrunch shut for a bare second. "She's the Condesce, dipshit. I doubt there's anything we can do to her she hasn't already seen a million times before."

That's part of what is so utterly pants-wettingly terrifying about this clusterfuck. The whole fight feels like pulling a roundabout at a run, leaping into the thing while it's going full tilt, and clinging to the bars howling like a wriggler for its lusus while dizzying centrifugal force sucks at his center of gravity to try to fling him off again. Only with more ancient tyrant ripping the roundabout out of the ground and using it to bash her heiress like a piñata.

Then he cracks an eye open. "Wait. You've been stabbed in the foot before?"

Dave stares back, utterly straight faced. "You haven't?"

Right. Karkat forgot who he was talking to, obviously. "No. Fuck, focus. I know we have the collective focus of a leaking bucket of excrement, but focus on thinking of a way to -" His jaw clamps shut before he can say the goal here out loud. The less said, the better, actually. The easiest way out of here would most likely involve knocking Feferi unconscious and having Dave do some timey-wimey hoofbeast shit to get them the fuck out of here, but with the complication of the Horrorterror out in the bay, they wouldn't get far before either the Condesce caught up or Glubby did.

Dave rolls his eyes. "Look, I'm trying to have your back here, man. New plan, go."

Karkat erupts. "NO PLAN IS GOING TO WORK!" He points at the Condesce with a righteous glare. "She's got more strife experience in her pinky claw than we do in our entire bodies combined, and she -" now at Feferi "has grimlight bullshit to make up for the fact that she's slightly less capable of killing us in one hit!"

Also, never mind the logistics of knocking out a coldblood in a raging fit in the first place - if he dares speak any coherent plan aloud, the universe will notice and the plan will spontaneously explode into a cosmically-ordained, obscene atrocity of disappointment and failure the likes of which has never before been seen on this based earth. "Our only advantage here is she doesn't seem interested in murdering us," he finishes, reining in his urge to shout only with immense effort. Yet, he adds, to himself. "We're just annoying her right now. Like tiny gnats."

"It's what we do," Dave says, shrugging. Yeah, well, good for him, being content to live out the rest of his days as an unrepentantly annoying douchebag. Karkat's resigned to it, too, but at least he has the decency to hate himself, past, present, and future, for it. "I could try to dick around with the fight scene music, but I don't know what all this stuff does. The descriptions are so fucking unhelpful, dude."

"I weep for your pain." Over in the center of the yard, Feferi and the Condesce have gone back to trying to poke new holes in each other; they seem perfectly happy pretending Dave and Karkat never showed up at all. Karkat sighs. "At least you don't have the world's shittiest hard rock song slobbering and leaving foul auditory residue all over your long-suffering ear ducts."

"Oh thank god you can hear that," Dave says in a mangled rush, clapping Karkat on the shoulder. "Thought I turned the volume down but - oh thank John and his snake monster wifi, half the time I'm still convinced I'm just hallucinating this shit."

Karkat shrugs the hand off because someone here is responsible for inflicting this aural monstrosity on his person, and it's sure as fuck not Karkat. "I hear it and it gets worse every chorus. On a scale of one to really fucking irritated, I'm currently at 'gouge my own spongeclots out with a sickle as a mercy stroke.'"

Dave shakes his head - Karkat can't judge if it's sympathetic or mocking - and starts tapping on a red and black turntable, bobbing by his wrist. ...When did it even get there? Does Karkat want to know the answer when said answer is no doubt stupid at best, pan-shatteringly annoying at worst? "There's gotta be something fucking rad as hell here," the human mutters, leaning more weight on one foot so that the other can rub at the grit ground into the knees of his pants. They look like regular pants, but Karkat felt that sleeve - it's pajamas all the way down. Pajamas aspiring to suithood. "I don't think we can do the ones that Kanaya made light up, but I know I heard a couple somewhere - or saw them - ugh, why are they all so goddamn cryptic."

It occurs to Karkat that they're standing around in the corner while there's still a strife-in-progress going on here. This would be more of an issue if anyone seemed to give a fuck about them participating, but no, they might as well go fuck themselves.

[activate fraymotif? y/n]

Karkat flinches and eyes the sky warily, but Dave looks pleased as punch. "There we go. Don't worry, pretty sure these things stack, so you probably won't freeze your ass off." He pauses. "Probably." Then he clears his throat before Karkat can stop him. "Yes."

[fraymotif activated: Back to Back]

New music starts assaulting Karkat's ears in an instant, and instinct has him casting a look over at the dueling trolls (Feferi is now up against a shipping container with the Condesce's fist introducing itself to her face) to see if they hear any of this fucking nonsense.

The effects, thank fuck, aren't nearly as unsettling as [Hot Blooded] is - Karkat would prefer to never have to feel his temperature skyrocket like this again in his lifetime. Once is more than enough. All he hears is a syncopated beat, wordless techno noises inserting themselves at random intervals to form something like a melody, loud and weird enough that it almost drowns out the song that plays on repeat in hell.

It's also disgustingly catchy. "I hate it," he informs Dave, on principle.

"Yeah, that's why you're tapping your foot." Dave smirks.

Oh god. "At least I haven't stabbed my foot before," Karkat retorts; the fact that Dave just shrugs at that with a thoughtful nod speaks volumes. Fucking volumes.

"Anyway, this should make us not suck. Is the general gist I'm getting here," Dave says, with a vague wave of his hand. His eyes go unfocused. "Or whatever x2 vim means. Also, not entirely sure why we've got +8 coop/assist bonus, because I've never seen a number above five. Sweet."
Karkat doesn't feel any different. At least the fever had been really fucking blatant. "This is the least helpful techno speakervomit I've ever heard and I have no idea what that means."

"Pls, Krakatoa, it's clearly French house." On that note, Dave - does something that makes Karkat go cross-eyed, the turntable vanishing and that ridiculous broken swordkind smacking into his palm like a magnet. "Now, be cool."

"Don't even start with me, asshole."

"Aaand, go." Dave starts jogging back toward the fight. Really, it's a casual jog. Karkat shakes his wrist out and jams his thumb claw into the scabbed skin where the other sickle snapped off. He isn't sure where the blood ended up - he stopped holding it solid, so it's probably a splatter of crimson on the floor around here somewhere. If he took the time to draw it back toward him he could probably remake the sickle from that, but casual jog aside Dave's already halfway to where the Condesce has started whacking Feferi upside the face with the flat side of her forkkind's tines, which means Karkat needs to get his fucking ass in gear.

This music better be worth the burgeoning headache. Karkat runs after Dave. Sneaking up on the Condesce is an exercise in hilarity, and trying to trip her up by attacking from multiple angles has yet to be in any way effective, so why bother?

Dave beats him there despite wasting his head start, his broken sword caught mid-slash by the backhanded 2x3dentkind trick once again. He drops before she can turn, ramming his shoulder into the back of the Condesce's right knee, and there's an odd moment where the Condesce staggers - Feferi sags to her knees in a daze when the culling fork stops hitting her - and Karkat jumps over Dave's ducked head, wrapping his legs around the Condesce's hips and holds on for dear life.

"Fucking wrigglers," is all the warning he gets before a single grasping claw bends back over to seize his shirt and flip him over. He tries to lock his legs but he just can't match the kind of muscle contained in one tyrian body, no matter how tiny. Before she rips him off he jams a sickle forward and feels it sink into the side of her back; it tears back out messily a second later, the Condesce unflinching as she does worse damage to herself than he probably ever could on his own.

Dave is the one who stabs her in the soft underside of her arm, darting in and out like a red blur, and the Condesce's shout of annoyance reaches Karkat from a foot away - three feet - six - as Dave pulls him back out of range, the Condesce's hand wide as that arm drips a strip of blood down the side of her wetsuit to match the curves of her symbol. "Okay, still not dead yet," Dave says, letting go of Karkat so abruptly he nearly trips over his own feet stuttering to a stop. He looks like he's twitching on some kind of trip, half-sword flaring in the light as he adjusts his grip. "This is going so good."

The Condesce turns her back on Feferi's slumped figure, and growls at the two of them, her face a livid maroon.

Dave's face turns the same color Karkat's is shooting for, which is more of a pasty rainbowdrinker chic. "...And now she's pissed at us."

She jumps, and it carries her over their heads in a single bound, the golden culling fork in her claws. Karkat spins, raises his sickles and fucking prays, and when the fork stabs at him he catches it with both, waiting for the blood to snap in two. He doesn't know how to bind it any tighter or stronger, and it wasn't enough to hold up against Droog so like fuck would it be enough for the Condesce.

He misses what Dave does entirely. To be fair, the Condesce appears to miss it as well, so it's not just Karkat's slow reflexes. It must happen in the space of a single long flashstep, time paused just long enough for Dave to try - something. The pressure from the trident slacksl abruptly, the Condesce blinking in mild surprise as Karkat stumbles back with his sickles intact and his hands aching but not, you know, broken. Then she's her own blur of motion, the points of the fork arcing down and back up to catch Dave's wrist. Karkat lunges forward without thinking, spinning inside the trident's stabbing radius and slamming his back against the Condesce to stamp on the back of her heel, jabbing his elbow back blind and with only an approximation in his head of where the side of her head is.

She dodges the elbow, not the stomp, but it doesn't do more than make her yank her foot to the side and widen her stance. Metal clangs off metal as Dave flashes free - Karkat can't see but he knows, like there's two pulses throbbing under his jaw - and Karkat drops, kicking the Condesce in the side of the leg with the stabbed foot. She wobbles, doesn't fall, and when the fork arrows back and down for his leg he - can't yank it back in time -

- except somehow she misses. Or didn't intend to stab him in the calf, anyway. He could fix that kind of injury, but it would still take a while to knit muscle together in anything but a patch job. Instead the prongs stab on either side of the flesh of his calf, through the pavement as a base so she can lean back and kick Dave in the face. She doesn't even make it look like a stretch, and Dave's nose is so broken now, blood gushing down from a split in his lip, too. The human looks grim (and Karkat thinks taking a kick to the nose from a tyrannblood should probably have rearranged his face into an entirely new configuration, so something is definitely odd), but just wipes it off on his red sleeve and raises his swordkind again.

The Condesce arches an eyebrow, glancing from Dave to Karkat, her expression sour as she yanks the fork out of the ground and squares her stances so one foot points to each of them. "Will you two guppies stop ridin' my bulge for a second? Cod damn. #ivegotbiggerfish2fry #youthstoday"

Some poor panleaks actually believe the shit they're fed about limebloods dying out due to a naturally-occurring autoimmune disease. Or a virus. Or whatever the latest excuse out of the PR machine is, depending on the newest trend.

This, despite the fact that the Condesce's vendetta against them is a matter of public record. Despite the fact that all the primary sources of the time referred to it as a 'bloodplague,' more virulent than anything they'd seen before, and affected only those whose blood fell within a certain section of the hemospectrum. Despite the fact that it started mere months after a limeblood marched up to the Condesce in the field of battle, and shooshed her, and cradled the tyrannblood in her lap until the enemy armies had scattered to safety, a bloodless abscond.

But there's only so much even a limeblood can do. And once the shock of placating hormones faded from her cold blood, the Condescension smiled, and stroked the troll's cheek - and ripped her horns out by the root.

